raising the siege, and ordered Aretas to depart. He then returned to Damascus; whereupon Aristobulus gathered an army, defeated and killed Hyrcanus, and slew 6000 of the enemy, together with Phallos, the brother of Antipater. Shortly after Pompey himself came to Damascus, when both the brothers eagerly solicited his protection. Antipater represented the cause of Hyrcanus.
Pompey, however, who was intent on the subjugation of Egypt, despatched his messengers to Antony, and on his return from Arabia marched directly into Judea. Ariatobulus fled to Jerusalem, but, finding the city too distracted to make good its defence, offered to surrender.
Gabinius was sent forward to take possession; meanwhile the soldiery had resolved to resist, and when he came he was surprised to find that the gates were shut and the walls manned. Pompey, enraged at this apparent treachery, threw Aristobulus into chains, and advanced to Jerusalem. The fortress of the Temple was improvable except on the north, and, notwithstanding his superior numbers, he was unable to force it for three months; neither could he have done so then had it not been for the Jewish scruples about observing the Sabbath. The Romans soon found that they could prosecute their operations on that day without disturbance, and after a time the battering-rams knocked down one of the towers, and the soldiery effected an entrance (midsummer, B.C. 63) on the anniversary of the capture of the city by Nebuchadnezzar. Great was the astonishment of Pompey at finding the Holy of Holies empty, without an image or a statue. The wealth he found in the building he magnanimously undertook; Hyrcanus he elevated in the high-priesthood; the country he laid under tribute; the walls he demolished; Aristobulus and his family he carried captives to Rome.
Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, on the journey made his escape, and, raising a considerable force, garrisoned Macheraus, Hyrcania, and the stronghold of Alexandri-on. Gabinius, however, subdued him, but had no sooner dero so than Aristobulus likewise escaped from Rome, and intrenched himself in Alexanderion. He was taken prisoner, and sent in chains to Rome. At the entirety of his will, which was always absolute, the Roman as the Antigonus his son was released, but he remained a prisoner. Alexander, with 80,000 men, once more tried his strength with the Romans on the field of battle, but was put to flight. He was subsequently executed by Metellus Scipio at Antioch, B.C. 49. Thus Hyrcanus retained the sovereignty, but Antipater enjoyed the real power; he contrived to gratify himself with Cesar, who made him a Roman citizen and procurator of all Judea. He began to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, and made his eldest son, Phasael, governor of that city; and his younger son, Herod, governor of Galilee. The latter contrived to distinguish himself against the bandditti that invested the hills. He carefully contrived also to make friends with the Roman governor of Syria, as a step to his own aggrandizement. His riches enabled him to do this by means of enormous bribes. He found, however, a troublesome enemy in Antigonos, the son of Aristobulus, who allied himself with the Parthis, and for a time held Jerusalem and kept Herod in check. At Gaza, also, a city on the west coast of the Dead Sea, Antigonos was nearly successful, until Herol led against him at last, captured him to raise the siege. He afterwards suffered a defeat by Herod, and was finally vanquished by the Roman general Sosius, who, in derision, called him by the female name Antigone, and sent him in chains to Antony, by whom, at the request of Herod, he was executed at Philippi. Thus fell the last of the Maccabees, who seemed to inherit something of their ancient spirit. Hyrcanus, who, before this, had been incapacitated for the priesthood by having his ears cut off, was subsequently, B.C. 80, in his eightieth year, put to death by Herod. The latter, meanwhile, by Augustus and Antony, was made king of Judea, and consolidated his throne by his marriage with Mariamne, a woman of incomparable beauty, the daughter of Alexander, son of Aristobulus, by Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcanus II, and therefore granddaughter to both brothers. In her the race of the Asmonaems came to an end, and by her marriage passed into the Idumenean line of the Herods.

7. Two of the first generation of the Maccabean family still remain to be mentioned. These, though they did not attain to the leadership of their countrymen like their brothers, shared their fate—Eleazar, by a socially more unfortunate event, by being murdered by his brother, by treachery. The sacrifice of the family was complete, and probably history offers no parallel to the undoubted courage with which such a band dared to face death, one by one, in the maintenance of a holy cause. The result was worthy of the sacrifice. The Maccabees inspired a subject-people with independence; they found a few personal followers, and they left a nation.

III. National Effects of the Maccabean Revolutions.— 1. The great outlines of the Maccabean contest, which ruined half a generation of Israel, are unanswerable for three
been for the Jewish scruples about observing the Sabbath. The Romans soon found that they could prosecution of the second (B.C. 189-182) was the political turning-point of the struggle, which may thus be divided into two great periods. During the first period (B.C. 188-185) the patriots maintained their cause with varying success against the whole strength of Syria; during the second period (B.C. 183-181) their resources were diminmized, and the whole of Judea was occupied by the Romans, and henceforward the independence of Judea was acknowledged from time to time, though pledges given in times of danger were often broken when the danger was over.

The paramount importance of Jerusalem is conspicuous throughout the whole war. The loss of the Holy City reduced the patriotic party at once to the condition of mere guerrilla bands, issuing from "the mountains" or "the wilderness" to make sudden forays on the neighboring towns. This was the first aspect of the war (2 Macc. vii, 1-7; comp. 1 Macc. ii, 45); and the scene of the struggle in the north-east of Jerusalem, from which he drove the invading armies at the famous battle-fields of Bethhoron and Emmaus (Nicoopolis). The occupation of Jerusalem closed the first act of the war (B.C. 165); and after this Judaean warfare kept on in different sections—and in Idumaea, Ammon, Gilead, Galilee—but the establishment of a permanent settlement in the countries which he ravaged. Beth-sura was fortified as a defensive of Jerusalem on the south; but the authority of Judas seems to have been limited to the immediate neighborhood of Jerusalem, though the lands of the northeastern Galilee. The latter's son John to distinguish himself against the band-
also to make friends with the Roman governor of Syria,
bled him to do this by means of enormous bribes. He

his throne by his marriage with Mariamne, a woman of

and therefore granddaughter to both brothers. In her

tion.

III. National Effects of the Maccabean Revolutions.— 1. The great outlines of the Maccabean contest, which
in full of echoes of the Old Testament, it is impossible not to feel that it wants something which we find in all the canonical writings. The historical allusions in the Psalms of Solomon are as unequivocal as the description which they give of the state of the Jewish nation. An enemy is about to put an end to the strong walled city of Jerusalem, and "the Gentiles went up to the altar" (Psa. Sol. ii, 1-3; comp. 1 Mac. i, 81). In his pride he was to fight all things in Jerusalem, as the Gentiles in their cities do for their gods" (Psa. Sol. xvii, 18). "Those who loved the assembly fled. (The assembly wandered through the pleasantness of the great oppressor (ver. 86-89), and then his hosts are scattered and the earth (ver. 40-45), and says nothing of the triumph of the Maccabees or of the restoration of the Temple, which preceded the last event by some months. This omission is scarcely intelligible unless we regard the facts as symbolizing a higher struggle—a truth wrongly held by those who from early times referred ver. 46-45 only to Antichrist, the antitype of Antiochus—in which that recovery of the earthly temple had no place. At any rate, it shows the imperfection of that view of the whole character by which it is regarded as a mere transcription of history.

6. The history of the Maccabees does not contain much which illustrates in detail the religious or social progress of the Jews. It is obvious that the period must not only have intensified old beliefs, but also have called up new ones, which crystallized in the doctrine at least, that of a resurrection, and even of a material resurrection (2 Mac. xiv, 46), but was brought out into the most distinct apprehension by suffering. "It is good to look for the hope from God, to be raised up again by him" (2 Mac. xiv, 46), was the substance of the martyr's answer to his judge: "as for thee, thou shalt have no resurrection to life" (2 Mac. xiv, 46). As it was believed that an interval elapsed between death and judgment, the dead were supposed to be in some measure still capable of profiting by the intercession of the living. Thus much is certainly expressed in the famous passage, 2 Mac. xiv, 43-45, though the secondary notion of a purgatorial state is no way implied in it. On the other hand, it is not very clear how far the future judgment was supposed to extend. If the punishment of the wicked heathen in another life had formed a definite article of belief, it might have been necessary to state it somewhere in the famous book of Daniel, or in the Apocrypha, or in the 1 Maccabees (2 Mac. vii, 19, 35, etc.), though the passages in question may be understood of sufferings after death, and not only of earthly sufferings; but for the apostate Jews there was a certain judgment in reserve (vi, 26).

The firm faith in the righteous providence of God shown in the chastening of his people, as contrasted with the neglect of other nations, is another proof of the widening view of the spiritual world which is characteristic of the epoch (2 Mac. iv, 16, 17; v, 19-20; vi, 12-16, etc.). The lessons of the captivity were reduced to moral teaching and to the same way the doctrine of the ministry of angels assumed an importance which is without parallel except in patriarchal times. See 2 Maccabees.

It was perhaps from this cause also that the Messianic hope was limited in its range. The vivid perception of spiritual truths hindered the spread of a hope which had been cherished in a material state of things, as it were, was made, in which men gained new points of sight from which to contemplate the old promises.

7. The various glimpses of national life which can be gained during the period show, on the whole, a steady advance towards a higher character and a nobler life. The external achievements (the capture of Jerusalem) the guarantee of which, or never more rigorously fulfilled. The importance of the Antiochian persecution in fixing the canon of the Old Testament has already been noticed. See CAXON. The books of the law were specially sought out for destruction (1 Macc. i, 56, 57; iii, 45), and their distinctive value was in consequence proportionately increased. To use the words of 1 Mac. — "the holy books" (τὰ βιβλία τοῦ Υἱοῦ τοῦ ,'

3. The strict observance of the Sabbath (1 Mac. ii. 32; 2 Mac. vi. 11; viii. 26, etc.) and of the sabbatical year (1 Mac. vi. 68), the solemn prayers and fasting (1 Mac. iii. 47; 2 Mac. xvi. 23, etc.), and the means we carry us back to early times. The provision for the maimed, the aged, and the bereaved (2 Mac. vii. 28, 30), was in the spirit of the law; and the new Feast of the Dedication was a homage to the old rites (2 Mac. i. 9), while it was a proof of independent life. The interruption of the war and the high claim of the city to the highest importance which it was made, and one which prepared the way for the dissolution of the state. After various arbitrary changes the office was left vacant for seven years upon the death of Alcimus. The last descendant of Josephus (Onias), in whose family it had been for nearly four centuries, fled to Egypt, and established a schismatic worship; and at last, when the support of the Jews became important, the Maccabean leader, Jonathan, of the family of Joash, was elected to the dignity by the nomination of the Syrian king (1 Mac. vii. 8). The councils of the city were conducted in Aramaic, by the voice of the people (comp. 1 Mac. xiv. 35).

8. Little can be said of the condition of literature and the arts which has not been already anticipated. In common intercourse the Jews used the Aramaic dialect with the Persians, but the language of their official and their own language (2 Mac. vii. 8, 21, 27; xii. 37); but it is evident from the narrative quoted that they understood Greek, which must have spread widely through the influence of Syrian offices. There is not, however, the slightest evidence that Greek was employed in Palestinian literature till a much later date. The description of the monument which was erected by Simon at Modin in memory of his family (1 Mac. xiii. 27-30) is the only record of the architecture of the time. The description is obscure, but in some respects the structure appears to have presented a resemblance to the tombs of Porsena and the Curii (Pila, H. N. xxxvi. 13), and perhaps to one still found in Idumea. An oblong basement, of which the two chief faces were built of polished white marble (Josephus, Ant. xiii. 5, 5), supported seven pyramids in a line ranged one against another and connected to the Maccabean family, including Simon himself. To these he added "other works of art (μεγάλα εργατήρια), placing round (on the two chief faces?) great columns (Josephus adds, each of a single block), bearing trophies of arms and inscriptions which might be seen by the eyes of those below." The language of 1 Mac. and Josephus implies that these columns were placed upon the basement, otherwise it might be supposed that the columns rose only to the height of the basement supporting the trophies on the same level as the pyramids. So much, at least, is evident, that the characteristics of this work— and probably of later Jewish architecture generally— bore closer affinity to the styles of Asia Minor and Greece than to that of Egypt or the East, a result which would follow equally from the Syrian dominion and the connections which Simon opened by the Mediterranean (1 Mac. xiv. 5). See More.

9. The only recognised relics of the time are the coins which bear the name of "Simon," or "Simon, prince of Israel," in Samaritan letters. The privilege of a national coinage was granted to Simon by Antiochus IV Epiphanes (164-162 B.C.), and the new type of the Syrian king was adopted by the Herodians. The reign of Antiochus was memorable for the erection of the high places, and the rapid consumption of the city, while after the second year Zion alone is found (Bayer, De Nummis, p. 171). The privilege was first definitely accorded to Simon in B.C. 140, while the first year of Simon was B.C. 143 (1 Mac. xiii. 42); but this is a minor discrepancy, of little difficulty to define, and it is not likely that the concession of Antiochus was made in favor of a practice already existing. No date is given later than the fourth year, but coins of Simon occur without a date, which may belong to the last four years of his life. The emblems which the coins bear have generally a connection with Jewish history—a vine leaf, a cluster of grapes, a vase (of manna?), a trifling flowering rod, a palm branch surrounded by a wreath of laurel, a lyre (1 Mac. xiii. 51), a bundle of branches symbolic of the Feast of Tabernacles. The coins issued in the last war are distinguished by the absence of independent ideas or emblems, and there is considerable difficulty in distinguishing the two series. The authenticity of all the Maccabean coins is impugned by Tychsen (Die Un dichtheit d. Jud. Münzen ..., Berenbec., O. G. Tych sen, 1778), but on insufficient grounds. He was answered by Bayer, whose admirable essays (De Nummis Hebr. Samaritani, Val. Ed. 1781; Vindicia ... 1790) give the most complete account of the coins, though he reckons some apparently later types as Maccabean. Eckel (Dorck. Numm. iii. 455 sq.) has given a good account of these coins, and of the various types of which the moneyers were in charge, and of the chief types of the coins. Compare De Saulcy, Numism. Judaicca; Ewald, Gesch. viii. 866, 476. See MONEY.

IV. Literature.—The original authorities for the history of the Maccabees are extremely scanty; but for the composition of the Maccabees, the book of Ezechias is a most trustworthy, if an incomplete witness. See Maccabees, Books of. The second book adds some important details to the history of the earlier part of the struggle, and of the events which immediately preceded it; but all the statements which it contains require close examination, and must be received with caution. Josephus follows 1 Mac., for the period which it embraces, very closely, but slight additions of names and minute particulars indicate that he was in possession of other materials, probably oral traditions, which have not been elsewhere preserved. On the other hand, there are cases in which, from haste or carelessness, he has misrepresented his authority. From other sources little can be gleaned. Hebrew and classical literature furnishes nothing more than a few trifling fragments which illustrate Maccabean history. So long an interval elapsed between the destruction of Jerusalem and the Maccabees. The letter of Josephus quoted above is devoted to writing, that facts, when not embodied in rites or precepts, became wholly distorted. Classical writers, again, were little likely to chronicle a conflict which probably they could not have understood. Of the great work of Polybius alone might it be expected to accumulate the importance of the Jewish war; only fragments remain which refer to this period; but the omission of all mention of the Maccabean campaign in the corresponding sections of Livy, who follows very closely in the track of the Greek historian, seems to prove that Polybius also omitted it. The account of the Syrian kings in Appian is too meagre to make his silence remarkable; but indifference or contempt must be the explanation of a general silence which is too widespread to be accidental. Even when the fall of Jerusalem had directed unusual attention to the past fortunes of its inhabitants,Polybius was able to dismiss the Maccabaean conflict in a sentence remarkable for scornful carelessness. "During the dominion of the Assyrians, the Medes, and the Persians, the Jews," he says, "were the most obnoxious to their dependent subjects. After the Maccabees obtained the supremacy, the king of Syria endeavored to do away with their superstition, and introduce Greek habits, but was hindered by a Parthian war from reforming a most repulsive people." (terrimus gentem, Tacitus, Hist. v. 8).

cus, Rehoboam, and Solomon, under Syria. See also Milman, Hist. of the Jews, vol. ii. 11; Prideaux, Connection, vol. ii. (Oxford,} MACCABEES, BOOKS OF (Maccabaei), β, etc.

Four books which bear the common title of "Maccabaees" are found in some MSS. of the Sept.; a fifth is found in an Arabic version. Two of these were included in the early current Latin versions of the Bible, and thence passed into the Vulgate. As forming part of the Vulgata, they were received as canonical by the Council of Trent, and retained among the Apocrypha by the Reformed churches. The two other books obtained no such wide circulation, and have only a secondary connection with the Maccabean history. But all the books, though they differ most widely in character, and date, and worth, possess points of interest which make them a fruitful field for study. If the historic order were observed, the so-called third book would come first; the fourth would be an appendix to the second, which would retain its place, and the first would come last; but it will be more convenient to examine the books in the order in which they are found in the MSS., which was probably determined by some vague tradition of their relative antiquity. In the following account of these books we adopt much of the matter found in the dictionaries of Kittto and Smith.

The controversy as to the mutual relations and historic worth of the first two books of Maccabees has given rise to much ingenious and partial criticism. The subject was very nearly exhausted by a series of essays published in the last century, which contain, in the midst of much unfair reasoning, the substance of what has been written since. The discussion was occasioned by E. F. Wermendorf in his Proclus de famulis historiae Syriae in Libris Marc. (Lipsiae, 1746). Frolich replied to this essay in another, De famillis hist. Syriae in Libris Marc. proclusio . . . in exequum vocata (Vindob., 1746), and then the argument fell into other hands. Wermendorf's brother (Gill Wermendorf) undertook to support his cause, which he did in a Commentario hi-toricorum in libro Macchoe (Alciat. 1747) and nothing has been written on the same side which can be compared with his work. By the vigor and freedom of his style, by his surprising erudition and unwavering confidence—almost worthy of Bentley—he carries his readers often beyond the bounds of true criticism, and in this he finds too often the distinctions and sophistry of many of his arguments are apparent.
But, in spite of the injustice and arrogance of the book, it contains very much which is of the greatest value, and no abstract can give an adequate notion of its power.
The reply to Wermendorf was published anonymously by another Jesuit: Aurora ueritatis Libri Marc. critic., nonico-historica adserta . . . a quodam Soc. Jesu acere-dote (Vindob., 1749). The authorship of this was fixed upon J. Khell (Weltel, Einlad., p. 23, note); and while in many points Khell is unequal to his adversary, his book contains some very useful collections for the history of the canon. In more recent times, F. X. Patritius (an other Jesuit) has made a fresh attempt to establish the complete harmony of the books, and, on the whole, his essay (De Comenio ueritatis Libri Marc. Rome, 1856), though far from satisfactory, is the most able defence of the view which has been published.

MACCABEES, THE FIRST BOOK OF, the most important of the five apocryphal portions which have down to us under this common title.

I. Title and Position of the Book.—In the editions of the Sept. which we follow, this book is called the first of Maccabees (Maccabaei a'), because in the MSS. it was placed in the beginning of the scroll, to record the exploits and merits of the Maccabean family in their struggles for the restoration of their ancestral religion and the liberation of their Jewish compatriots from the Seleucid tyranny. According to Origen, however (comp. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii, 25), the original Hebrew title of this book was Zeqeshl Zebqai. Great difficulty has been experienced in the endeavor to obtain the exact Hebrew equivalent to these words.
They have been resolved—1. Into הַזְּכֵשׁל הֶזְבָּכָא (P. R. L. Hebrew, History of the Princes of the Sons of God, that is, of Israel (Michaelis, Orient. Biblioth. xii, 115, and most modern commentators). 2. Into הַזְּכֵשׁל הֶזְבָּכָא, The Spectre of the Princes of the Sons of God, i.e. of Simon, who is called prince in 1 Mac. xxii, 31, xiv.
47 (Bochani, Budeeus, and Ewald, Geschichtc d. V. Israel iv, 528). But this makes chapters xii-xvi the principal part of the book, and the rest a mere introduction.
3. Into הַזְּכֵשׁל הֶזְבָּכָא, Princeps templi (i.e. pontifex maximus), Princeps filiorum Dei (i.e. dux populi Judaici), based upon the words סֵמְרָא אֲרָמִים מִנָּהוּ עַל מַעֲמָא ריֹעָמִים, אָנֹךְ בֵּית רֹעָמִים, 1 Mac. xxiv, 44 (Bunder, Joch. ibid. xi, 27 (Wermendorf, Comment. de gen. ibid. Mac. p. 178). 4. Into הַזְּכֵשׁל הֶזְבָּכָא, Spectre rum Dei, i.e. of the Syrian kings, who were regarded as rebellious against God because they persecuted the Jews (Junius, Huetita, etc.), or as Herzfeld, who replies this solution of the words, explains it, the chas-ting rod of the apostates, which he submits is an im-priatory allusion of the Maccabees (Geschichtc d. V.
Israel, i, 265). We incline to the first explanation because it escapes the censure which the second incurs, and is less artificial than the third and fourth. It must, however, be remarked that this title does not occur in the Hebrew literature, and that both the ancient and modern Jews call the book הַזְּכֵשׁל הֶזְבָּכָא. The Book of the Hashmonaens; הַנְּשַמְנָא הָזָא, I. Hash-monaens; הָזָא הַנְּשַמְנָא הַבָּא, The Scroll of the Family of the Hashmonaens, or simply הַנְּשַמְנָא הָזָא, The Scroll of the Hashmonaens, after the title Hashmonaens, or Ashmonaens, by which the Maccabean family are denominated. See Maccabees.

Though the book occupies the first position, it ought, according to the historic order, to be the fourth of Maccabees, as it marks the successive commencements at a less period than the other three books. Traditions are rare, in determining the priority of position, was evidently guided by the age and the intrinsic value of these books since 1 Mac. is obviously the oldest, and surpasses the other three books in importance. Cotton, in his translation of the Maccabees, has departed from this traditional and commonly accepted arrangement, and placed the first book as second in order.

II. Contents and Division.—This book contains a clear and chronological history of the tyrannical proceedings of Antiochus Epiphanes, commencing with the year B.C. 174, at the head of the series of patriotic heroes against this tyranny, first organized by Mattathias, B.C. 168, down to settled sovereignty and the death of Simon, B.C.
185, thus embracing a period of forty years.

1. The first part, of which Mattathias is the hero, comprises chap. i—ii, 70, and embraces a period from the commencement of Antiochus Epiphanes' reign to the death of Mattathias, B.C. 175—167.

2. The second part, of which Judas Maccabaeus is the hero, comprises chap. iii, 1—ix, 23, and describes the exploits and fame of this defender of the faith, B.C. 167—160.

3. The third part, of which Jonathan, the high-priest, surnamed Apphax (Aρχιερενε:erm, the simulator, the elixy one), is the hero, comprises ch. ix, 23—xii, 58, and re cords the events which transpired during the period of his government, B.C. 140–145.

4. The fourth part, of which Simon, surnamed Thassi (Ἰασεί ὁ ποιητής, the flourishing) is the hero, comprises ch. xiii, 1–xvi, 24, and records the events which occurred during his period of government, B.C. 143–135.

5. (Cont. 2, p. 605.) The Books of the Maccabees and Religion in Palestine. There is no book among all the Apocrypha which is distinguished by greater marks of truthworthiness than 1 Maccabees. Simplicity, credibility, and candor alike characterize its description of friends and foes, victories and defeats, hopes and fears. When the hero fails to appreciate the writer's deeper purpose the writer gives expression to his feelings in lyric effusions (e.g. i, 23–28, 37–40; ii, 7–18, 49–68; iii, 3–9, 18–22; iv, 8–11, 30–33, 38; vi, 10–13; vii, 37, 38, 41, 42), no poetic exaggerations and hyperbole deprive the description of its substantially historic character. When recording the victories of his heroes, struggling for their liberties and their religion, he wrests no laws of nature from their regular course to aid the handsful of Jewish champions against the fearful odds of their heathen oppressors; and when speaking of the arch-enemy, Antiochus Epiphanes (i, 10, etc.), he indulges in no unjust and passionate misrepresentations against him. Yet he marks in one expressive phrase (μήπαν διαμακρίνεται) the character of the Syrian type of Antichrist (comp. Isa. xi, 10; Dan. xi, 36). If no mention is made of the reckless profaneroy of Alexander Balas, it must be remembered that no mention was made of the Jews' political and liberal, and these alone fall within the scope of the history. So far as the circumstances admit, the general accuracy of the book is established by the evidence of other authorities; but for a considerable period it is the single source of our information. Even the few historical and geographical inaccuracies in the description of foreign nations and countries, such as the foundation of the Greek empire in the East (1 Macc. i, 5–9), the power and constitution of Rome (viii, 1–16), the "great city Elymais, in the country of Persia" (vi, 1), etc., so far from impairing the general truthfulness of the narrative when it confines itself to home and the immediate past, only show how faithfully the writer has depicted the general notions of the time, and for this reason are of intrinsic value and instructive. The subjugation of the Galatians, who were the terror of the neighboring peoples (Acts xiv, 27), and the defeat of the Tarshish (ch. viii, 3) of Phenician merchants, are noticed, as would be natural from the immediate interest of the events; but the wars with Carthage are wholly omitted (Josephus adds these in his narrative, Ant. vii, 4). The story of the Jews at this period, the Tarshish (ch. viii, 3) of Phenician merchants, are noticed, as would be natural from the immediate interest of the events; but the wars with Carthage are wholly omitted (Josephus adds these in his narrative, Ant. vii, 4). The story of the Jews at this period,

IV. Author, Date, and Original Language.—All that can be said with certainty about the author of this book is that he was a Palestinian Jew. This is indicated by the whole spirit which pervades the book, by the lively sympathies which the writer manifests for the heroes whom he describes, and by his intimate acquaintance with the localities of Palestine.

Not so certain, however, is its date. Prideaux, Michaeles, Hengstenberg, Bertheau, Welte, Scholz, Keil, and others, though discarding the notion of Lapide, Huet, etc., that John Hyrcanus was the author, are yet of opinion that the conclusions of the narrative (xvi, 24), and not the κόσμοι ἡμῶν καὶ τῶν πολίων ἀστῶν . . . ἣδε τάτα γίγαντα ἐπὶ βιβλίων ἡμῶν ἀρχαγγέλων αὐτῶν, ἢ όν ἦν εἰκόνα ἀρχαγγέλων μετά τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ (xvi, 24), plainly show that the book was written during the government of this high-priest, perhaps about B.C. 120–106, inasmuch as this passage of Josephus is found in the geniza of the Dead Sea, ascribing to John Hyrcanus the words of a prophet of the high-priesthood of John, without the terminus ad quem, thus indicating that John was still living, and that his pontificate was not as yet terminated. After the close of the priesthood, or after the death of John, this book would have been called "the history of a great man." The reader could take the words, "diary of his priesthood," in any other sense than that they denote a chronicle of the whole duration of it from the beginning to the end. Nor can the words ἡς τῆς ἡμᾶς ταύτης, in xili, 29, be added as implying a later date; for it was something remarkable that, in those days of war and devastation, the sepulchre which Simon made for his family in Modin remained between twenty and thirty years unhurt. Eichhorn, Berthold, De Wette, Ewald, Grimm, and others, however, maintain that the book was written after the death of John Hyrcanus, oscillating between B.C. 105 and 64.

The language of the book does not present any striking peculiarities. Both in diction and structure it is generally simple and unaffected, with a marked and yet not harsh Hebrew characteristic. The number of peculiar words is slight, and the words considered peculiar are paralleled with those in 2 Maccabees. Some of these are later forms, as γωγύς (ψωγύς), xi, 5, 11; ἵδετεινως, i, 39; ἐκτολογίως, xiv, 22; ἀπεδίογει, iv, 57; ἐκλογαί, iv, 8, 21; ν, 4; ν, 6; ἡμισ, vii, 7; ix, 55, etc.; ἅφωγα, ii, 4, 18, xii, 19; διαφώς, xii, 39; προποστάτης, xiv, 70; ἑπιστρώγος, xiv, 44; ἑπιστρώγος, viii, 15; ν, 15; φανονοσις, i, 24. Other words are used in new or strange senses, as ἀδρέων, viii, 14; παρασάρας, xv, 28; δια-
MACCABEES, BOOKS OF

V. Canonicity and Importance of the Book.—This book never formed a part of the Jewish canon, and is excluded from the Septuagint version of the Books of Maccabees, issued by the Council of Laodicea, St. Cyril, St. Hilary, St. Athanasius, St. Jerome, etc. In the Chronicle of Eusebius it is included in the same category as the writings of Josephus and Africanus, so as to distinguish it from the inspired writings. Still the book is cited with high respect, and as conclusive to the editor of the Church, at a very early period (August. De Circ. Del. lib. xviii, c. 36). The councils at Hippo and Carthage (A.D. 388 and 397) first formally received it into the canon, and in modern times the Council of Trent has included it in Catholic Church. All disputes about its canonical authority by putting it into the catalogues of inspired Scripture.

But, though the Protestant Church rejects the decisions of these councils, and abides by the ancient Jewish canon, yet both the leaders of the Reformation and modern expositors rightly attach great importance to this book. The great value of it will be duly appreciated when it is remembered that it is one of the very few surviving records of the most important, but very obscure period of Jewish history between the close of the T. and the beginning of the N. T. It is, therefore, not to be underrated at that the few words of other remarks, in his introduction to the translation of this book.—This is another of those books not included in the Hebrew Scriptures, although in its discourses and description it almost equals the other sacred books of Scripture, and would not have been unworthy to be reckoned among them, because it is a very necessary and useful book for the understanding of the prophet Daniel in the eleventh chapter" (Vorrede auf das erste Buch Maccabaurus, German Bible, ed. 1856). It is rather surprising that the Anglican Church has not prescribed any lessons to be read from this book. A reference to 1 Macc. iv, 59, however, is to be found in the margin of the A. V., John x, 22.

VI. Versions and Literature.—The books of Maccabees were not included by Jerome in his translation of the Bible. "The first book," he says, "I found in Hebrew" (Pro. Gal. in Reg.), but he takes no notice of the Latin version, and certainly did not revise it. The version of the two books which has been incorporated in the Romish Vulgate was consequently derived from the old Latin current before Jerome's time. This version was published in 1483, brought from the Greek, and, after the Greek, followed it. Beside the common text, Sabatier has published a version of a considerable part of the first book (cap. i-xiv, 1) from a very ancient Paris MS. (S. Germ. 15) in 1781, which exhibits an earlier form of the Greek text. Malbranq has also published a fragment of another Latin translation, comprising chap. ii, 49-64, which differs very materially from both texts (Speculum Romanae, ix, 60 sq.). The old Syriac version given in the Paris and London Polyglots, and by Delagardes, Libri Veteris Testamenti Apocryphi Syriacae (Lond., 1861), is, like the Latin, made literally from the Greek.

MACCABEES, BOOKS OF.

The date and person of the Greek translator of the first book of Maccabees are wholly undetermined. Book II, according to the order of the Sept., which is followed both by the ancient versions and modern expositors of the Apocrypha.

Some phrases clearly express a Semitic idiom (ii, 48, δεναίον τος ἐν ἑωρασι; vii, 25; x, 62; xii, 26-27); and the Septuagint version of the book is, in essence, totally corruptible (e.g. i, 54; ii, 63; vii, 17; ix, 28; xiv, 9). Josephus undoubtedly made use of the Greek text (Ant. xiii, 5 sq.). That this book, however, was originally written in Hebrew is not only attested by Origen, who gives the Hebrew title of it (see above, § 1), and by St. Jerome, who lists it, and the Catholic Church all disputes about its canonical authority by putting it into the catalogues of inspired Scripture.

As to the Heb. Megillath Antiochus (Στράτος Αντιοχείνων), still existing, which was first published in the editions of the Pentateuch of 1491 and 1506 along with the other Megilloth; is given in the Spanish and Italian Ritual for the Festivals (Συνελεγμένα) of 1555-56, etc.; is inserted, with a Latin translation, in Bartolocci's Bibliotheca Magna Rabbinica, 1838; is printed separately, without the translation (Berlin, 1786); and which has recently been republished by Jellinek in his Both Ita-Hidush, i, 142-146—this simply gives a few of the incidents of the Maccabean wars, and makes John, the high-priest who it says slew Nicaior in the Temple, play the most conspicuous part. It tells us that Antiochus began persecutions in the 23rd year of his reign (167 B.C.) and 21st after the building of the second Temple; and that the descendants of the Maccabees, who crushed the armies of this tyrant, ruled over Israel 206 years, thus following the chronology of the Talmud (comp. Aboda Zarm, 9 a; Seder Olam Sutta; De Rossi, Mem. Enqjml, c. xxvi; Zunz, Gesch. d. jüd. Volks, p. 184). That the Aramaic (Chaldee), which was first published by Filipowski, together with the Hebrew and an English version (London, 1861), is the original, and that the Hebrew is a translation, may be seen from a very curious comparison of the two texts. The Hebrew version slavishly imitates the phrases of the Aramaic original, instead of giving the Hebrew idiom. Thus, for instance, the Chaldee רazu נבע is rendered in the Hebrew version by יִשְׂרָאֵל נָבַע, instead of יִשְׂרָאֵל נָבַע or יִשְׂרָאֵל נָבַע, etc. It is perfectly astonishing that this document, which was evidently got up about the 7th century of the Christian era, to be recited on the Feast of Dedication in commemoration of the Maccabean victories over the enemies of Israel, should be regarded as a forgery (Genuz in der Commission der Geschichten aus dem Leben des Maccabäer. des 1 Macc. Bis mit Amerk. (Göttingen and Leipzig, 1778); Eichhorn, Einh. in die apokryphischen Schriften. d. A. T. (Leipzig, 1796), p. 218-248; Hengstenberg, Genunischem Daniel (English transl., Edinburgh, 1847), p. 258-259, 267-270; Cotton, The five Books of Maccabees (Oxford, 1822); Deschutz, Geschichte des ersten Buches der Maccabaeern, Berlin, iv, 256 sq.; the masterly work of Grimm, Ueber das erste Buch Maccab. (Berlin, 1857), p. 206-219. See APOCYPHRA.
I. Position. — This book ought, according to the historical order, to be the first of the Maccabees, because its narrative begins with an event which occurred in the reign of Seleucus Philopator, about B.C. 180, i.e., four years earlier than the preceding book. Its being placed second in order is evidently owing to the fact that it is brought together with the later events under the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.). The one denominated the first of the Maccabees. Cotton, in his translation of the Maccabees, has put this book as the third of Maccabees.

II. Design, Contents, and Division. — The design of this book is to admonish and encourage the Jews to keep the religion of their fathers, and especially to inculcate in the Jewish exiles resident in Egypt the necessity of visiting the Temple in Jerusalem, urging them to take part in the celebration of the festivals instituted to commemorate the dedication of the Temple as the sacred and legitimate place for divine worship (x, 6), and the defeat of Nicanor (x, 86). To effect this design, the writer gives a condensed history of the Maccabees' struggles for their religion and sanctuary, beginning with the attempts of Heliodorus to plunder the Temple, cir. B.C. 180, and terminating with the victory of Judas Maccabaeus over Nicanor, B.C. 161. The whole narrative, therefore, which is compiled mostly from 1 Macc., partly from 2 Macc. (iv, 7—vii, 42), supplemented by references to the foreign sections of 1 Macc. (i, 9—x, 64), and partly (v, 1—xv) parallel with 1 Macc. (i, 9—vii, 38), embraces a period of about nineteen years, and is divided into three sections, each of which is made to terminate with the great event commemorated by the festival which the writer is anxious that his Egyptian brethren should celebrate.

1. The first section (i—ix, 82) comprises two epistles, the relation of which to the substance of the book is extremely obscure. The first (i, 1—9) is a solemn invitation to the Jewish exiles to celebrate the feast of tabernacles in the month Caslaim (i.e., the feast of the dedication, i, 9), as before they had sympathized with their brethren in Judaea in "the extremity of their trouble" (i, 7). The second (i, 10—11, 18, according to the received division), which bears a formal salutation from "the council and Judas" to "Aristobulus... and the Jews in Egypt," is a strange, rambling collection of legendary stories of the death of "Antiochus," of the preservation of the sacred fire and its recovery by Nehemiah, of the hiding of the vessels of the sanctuary by Josephus, etc. And, indeed, the letter can be said to have any end—with the same exhortation to observe the feast of dedication (ii, 10—18). Then follows an account given by the writer of this book of the sources from which he derived his information, and of the trouble he had in compiling it (ii, 18—22).

2. The second section (ii, i—x, 6) contains important information about the origin of the persecutions (ii, 1—vii, 42), which is simply hinted at in 1 Macc., and then describes and supplements (in v, i—x, 29) the events recorded in 1 Macc., concluding with the dedication of the temple (x, 1—9), which is the great object of the book, cir. B.C. 180—163.

3. The third section (x, 10—xv, 37) records the various victories of the Jews, terminating in the crowning success of Judas Maccabaeus and the death of Nicanor, which led to the institution of the feast commemorating the victory over him, B.C. 164—161.

This is followed by an epilogue (xxv, 38—40) which is wanting in Conder's (after the Zurich Bible) in Matthew's, 1587; in Cranmer's, 1539; and in the various reprints of these editions; and which the Geneva Bible, 1560, followed by the Bishop, 1668, was the first to insert.

The latter two of the above sections, taken together, present several natural subdivisions, which appear to coincide with the "five books" of Jason on which it was based. The first (ch. iii) contains the history of Heliodorus, beginning with the setting out of the schism and apostasy of part of the nation (cir. B.C. 180). The second (ch. iv—vii) gives varied details of the beginning and course of the great persecution—the murder of Onias, the crimes of Menelaus, the martyrdom of Eleazar, and of the mother with her seven sons (B.C. 175—167). The third (ch. vii—ix) follows the fortunes of Judas to the triumphant restoration of the Temple service (B.C. 166, 165). The fourth (x—xiii) includes the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (175—164 B.C.). The fifth (ch. xiv, xv) records the treachery of Alcimus, the mission of Nicanor, and the crowning success of Judas (B.C. 162, 161). Each of these divisions is closed by a phrase which seems to mark the end of a definite subject (iii, 40; vii, 42; x, 9; xii, 26; xv, 37), and they correspond, in fact, with distinct stages in the national struggle.

III. Author, Date, and Original Language. — The compiler of this book distinctly declares that the original author of it, or of the "five books" from which he condensed the chief facts, was Jason of Cyrene (i, 23). Herzfeld thinks that this Jason is the same as Jason, the son of Eleazar, whom Judas Maccabaeus sent with Eupolemus as envoy to Rome after the defeat of Nicanor to conclude a treaty with the Romans (1 Macc. viii, 17; Josephus, Ant. xii, 10, 6); because it is only a Hellenized master of the Greek language, would be qualified for such a mission to a foreign court. This hypothesis, moreover, explains the otherwise anomalous circumstance that this book, which records the Maccabean struggles, goes no further in its history than the death of Nicanor over Nicanor; whereas, according to this point, Jason was an eye-witness to the exploits of Judas, and was sent to Rome after this most important event; and it is confirmed by the accurate knowledge which the writer displays of the events (iv, 21 sq.; viii, 1 sq.; ix, 29 sq.; x, 12; xiv, 1; Herzfeld, Geschichte d. Volkes Israel, 445 sq.). Accordingly, the original work must have been written about B.C. 160, immediately after the victory over Nicanor, and prior to the defeat and death of Judas (1 Macc. ix, 16—18), which brought new calamities upon the Holy City, and again transferred the power to the heathenishly-inclined Jews under the pontificate of Alcimus (1 Macc. ix, 23—29).

The errors in the order of the events and of history must be ascribed to the epitomator, whose great object was not to narrate history faithfully, but to make the facts harmonize with his design.

As a Cyrenian Jew, Jason most naturally composed his work in Greek; and Jerome's testimony, "Secundus [Machabaeorum liber I] Grecus est, quod ex ipsa quoque phrasii probati potest" ("Proleg.""); is fully borne out by the style of the epitome. (See below.) The epitomator or compiler of the present book was a Jew, resident in Alexandria, and must have lived a considerable period after the events transpired. The date of the compilation is put within the limits B.C. 150—124. The two epistles with which the book begins do not proceed from Jason, and are of a much later date, though the first purports to have been written B.C. 134, or 188 of the Seleucid; and the second, by mentioning a recent deliverance from great perils, evidently implies that it was written after the news of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, i.e., 148 of the Seleucid. The original language of the letters seems to have been Greek. Indeed, Geiger shows that the difficult passage, "α'στον αγαθον αριστον στην αγαθην γη και την βασιλειαν" (i, 7), which is ambiguous, and, as commonly understood, represents Jason and his companions as apostatizing from the law and the kingdom, is, when retranslated into Hebrew, תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, shown to mean, from the time that Jason and those who sided with him from the heathen kingdom, apostatized either standing for תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, royal descend (comp. 2 Kings xxv, 25; Jer. xii, 1; Ezek. xlviii, 13; Dan. ii, 8), or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא in the sense of תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, either standing for תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, either standing for תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תعشまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך והנשיא, or referring back to תעשまでの משלג שמישהו הבטחתו המלך ו...

case with, i, 18, where the Feast of Dedication is most extraordinarily called the Feast of Tabernacles, which can only be explained when the passages are retranslated into Hebrew. Now the Hebrew for ִּפְּנֵי הָעָרֹבָּה which is generally translated as the feast of the Tabernacles (I Kings viii, 2; 2 Chron. v, 8; Josephus, Ant. viii, 4, 1), it will at once be seen that the translator of these epistles, instead of rendering the word in question simply by ִּפְּנֵי חַגָּה, attached to it the specific reference to the specific festival, which he was evidently led to do by the fact that both these festivals are of eight days' duration, and that the feast of tabernacles is mentioned in, x, 6. So also διανοήσει τῆς εἰσαρχίας ὑμῶν in the σημάδι τούτου (i, 4) is a translation of בִּין הַחָלֹת וְהָעָרֹבָּה.

The style of the book is extremely uneven. At times it is elaborately ornate (iii, 15-29; vii, 20; vi, 12-16, 23-28; vii, etc.), and, again, it is so rude and broken as to seem more like notes for an epitome than a finished composition (xiii, 19-26); but it nowhere attains to the simple energy and pathos of the first book. The vocabulary is generally more appropriate to the theme of this new and unusual words. Many of these are forms which belong to the decay of a language, as ἀλλοφθορος, iv, 18; vi, 24; ΄Ελληνικός, vi, 6 (Ἐξερέας, iii, 9); ἐφιγμός, vii, 37; ἔκαστος, vi, 8; σπλαγχνιζόμενον, vii, 21, vii, 42; or compounds which betray a false pursuit of emphasis or passion: δυσῆςجم, iv, 40; ἐνυπνήσας, xiv, 18; κατευθυνόμενον, xiii, 43; προσκαλείοντας, xiv, 19; προτότοκοςμόν, xv, 9; συνεκτίκισις, xvi, 17.

Other words are employed in novel senses, as ἀντευθέντης, xiii, 22; τέσσαρες εἰς τι, vii, 24; ἔναυστος, vii, 9; προτρυπωμένος, xi, 4; φυσικῶς, vii, 27; xiv, 26. Others bear a sense which is common in late Greek, as ἀλέξω, xiv, 8; ἀνάγεσθαι, ix, 2; xiii, 26; ἀπλήρωμα, iii, 22; ἀνέπτειρω, iv, 4; φυλάσσω, vii, 34; ἀνισότικος, vii, 4. Others appear to be peculiar to this book, as διάπερ, xii, 23; διστάστωμα, vi, 20; προτρύπωμα, xiv, 11; πολιμπρωτόμος, x, 14; διάλογος, xiv, 8; διαλέγεσθαι, xiv, 27; ἀπεκφυγέντας, vi, 28; ἔξοδος, vii, 55; ἀνεμόλογος, xii, 43. Hebrewisms are very rare (viii, 10; ix, 5; xiv, 24). Idiomatic Greek phrases are much more common (iv, 20; xii, 22; xv, 12, etc.), and the writer evidently had a considerable command over the Greek language, though his taste was deformed by a love of rhetorical effect.

IV. Historical and Religious Character. - As the avowed design of the book is religio-didactic and polemical, the aim of the writer was not to recite a series of dry facts in chronological order, but rather to select such events from the period on which he treats, and arrange, embellish, and comment upon them in such a manner as should most strikingly set forth to his Egyptian brethren the marvellous interposition of God to preserve the only legitimate and theocratic sanctuary in Israel, and at the same time to point out the signal punishment of the wicked according to the principle in eo genere quiesque punitur, in quo peccavit (v, 9, 10; ix, 5, 6; xiii, 8; xv, 32, 33); the moral reflections (v, 17-20; vi, 12-16; ix, 8-10; xii, 43-46); the colored descriptions (iii, 14-23; vi, 11-20); the exaggerated account of the martyrdom of the seven brothers and their mother, which king Antiochus, for the sake of effect, is made to witness in Jerusalem (vi, 18-22); the enormous numbers of the enemy slain by a handful of Jews (vii, 24, 30; x, 23, 31; xi, 11; xii, 16, 19, 25, 29, 39; xv, 10, 35, 36, etc.); the exaggerated description of the three of them (iii, 28 of them; iv, 2, 3; x, 3; 29-31; xi, 8-10; xv, 12, etc.); the historical and chronological inaccuracies, e. g. making Antiochus witness the death of the Jewish martyrs (vii, 8); the death of Antiochus (ch. ix.); the representing of the sacrifices as having been renewed after two years' intermission (2 Macc. x, 3, comp. with 1 Macc. iv, 52, 54; i, 54, 59); the description of the different battles which the Jews fought between the purification of the Temple and the death of Antiochus (2 Macc. vii, 15-38; xii, 43, comp. with 1 Macc. v); the campaign of Lyssias (2 Macc. xi, 12, comp. with 1 Macc. iv, 26-32); etc. But apart from these embellishments, traditional stories, inversions of events, etc., which, in accordance with ancient usage, the author adopted in order to carry out his design, and in spite of the fact that the two letters with which the book begins are now generally given up as spurious, the best critics accept the groundwork of the facts as true. Grimm, whose elaborate, thorough, and impartial comment on this book is unparalleled, has shown that there is no ground to question the historical import of the most important section (chap. iv-vi, 10), which is not only most consistent in itself, but fits most appropriately the space of 1 Macc. i, 10-64; or the truthfulness of ch. iii, when stripped of the miraculous.

He says of its truthfulness, within the mentioned limits, is supported by the fact that, 1. Notwithstanding the many differences, it agrees in not a few portions with 1 Maccabees, though both these books are perfectly independent of each other; and, 2. In four events which it records anterior to 1 Maccabees, it agrees with Josephus, who is independent of it, vii, 11, the festival of the Temple at Gerizim (vi, 2, comp. with Josephus, Ant. xi, 5, 5); the execution of Menelaus at Berea (xii, 3, 8, comp. with Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 7); the landing of Demetrius at Tripolis (xiv, 1); and of the priestly ingenuities (ch. iv) which were the cause of the protracted series of struggles between the Jews and the Syrian monarchs.

The religious character of the book is one of its most important and interesting features. God is throughout recognised as ordaining even the most minute affairs of his people, and to actions which before this book would have been regarded as being done upon by the Jews as a temporary visitation for their sins (iv, 16, 17; v, 17-20; vi, 12-17; vii, 32, 83; xii, 40); and the sufferings which come upon the righteous in this common visitation are regarded as storing for the sins of the rest of the people, and staying the anger of God (xii, 56). The book, moreover, shows a wonderful interposition of angels for the salvation of the people (x, 29, etc.; xiii, 2, etc.), and supernatural manifestations (iii, 29; vi, 2, etc.; xii, 5, etc.), which play a very important part in the N. T., were of no common occurrence.

What has been said of striking, is, on the one hand, the hard lot of the Jews which led them to flee, and on the other hand, the belief or not the belief in the Jews that they the Jews then believe in the surviving of the soul after the death of the body, in the resurrection of the dead, and in their reunion with those near and dear to them (vii, 5, 6, 9, 11, 14, 23, 29, 36), but that God does not irreversibly seal the eternal doom of man immediately after his departure, and that the decision of our heavenly Father may be influenced by the prayers and sacrifices of the surviving friends of the departed (xii, 40-48).

This passage also shows that the offering of sacrifices for the dead must have been common in those days, instead of as it is spoken of in very commendable terms. The striking distinction between the religious sentiments of this book and those of the former goes far to justify Geiger's conclusion that "the two books of Maccabees are party productions; the author of the first was a Sadducee, and a friend of the Maccabean dynasty, while the truth or epimistic of the second was a Pharisee, who looked upon the Maccabees with suspicion" (Urvächung, p. 206). Still the second book, like the first, contains no hopes of the coming of a Messiah.

V. Conocmity. — Though portions of this book are incorporated in the Jewish writings, and form a part of the religious catechism of the priests and their mother (ch. vi, 1-42), which is not only mentioned in the Talmud (Gitt. 57, b), the Midrash of the ten commandments (ed. Jellinek, Beth Ha-Midrash, 1 MACABBEES, BOOKS OF

70, etc.), Midrash Jalkut (On Deut. section נַגֵּר, 801, b), etc., but is interwoven in the service for the Feast of Dedication (compare The Joser, פְּנֵן כְָּנָנָה; the martyrdom of Eleazar (ch. vi. 18-81), also embodied in the same service, and described by Josippon, who also speaks of the Holiness of the peculiarly apostate congregation and other circumstances narrated in 2 Macc. (compare Josippon, lib. ii. c. iv, ed. Breithaupt, p. 172 sq.), yet the book was never part of the Jewish canon. Hence even if it could be shown more unquestionably that the apparent parallels between 2 Macc. and diverse passages in the Talmud are composed 2 Macc. i. 4, 14; 13 Macc. v. 19, with Mark ii. 27; 2 Macc. vi. 19; vii.2, etc., with Heb. xi. 35; 2 Macc. vii. 19, with John v. 28; 2 Macc. vii. 22, etc.; xiv. 46, with Acts xvii. 24-28; 2 Macc. vii. 36, with Rev. vi. 9; 2 Macc. viii. 2, with Luke xxi. 24; Rev. vi. 2; 2 Macc. x. 7, with Rev. viii. 9; 2 Macc. xv. 3-5, with Eph. vi. 9) are actual quotations, it would only prove that the apostles, like the rest of their Jewish brethren, alluded to the incidents recorded in this book without regarding the book itself as canonical. The only references, however, to be found in the A.V., are from Heb. vi. 35, 36, to 2 Macc. vi. 18, 19; vii.7, etc.; and vii. 1-7; but even these are disputed, and it is quite possible that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews refers to the sufferings of the Essenes (compare Ginsburg, The Essentials, etc., Longman, 1864, p. 360). However, the fact that the death of the last of the Jewish Church, this book is excluded from the canon of sacred books in the catalogues of Melito, Origen, the Council of Laodicea, St. Cyril, St. Hilary, etc. (compare Du Pin, History of the Canon, London, 1699, i, 12). Jerome emphatically declares: "Maccabaeorum libros lege quidem ecclesiae, sed eis inter canonicas scripturas non recipit" (Proef. in Proc.). and Augustine, though stating that this book, like 1 Macc., was regarded by the Christians as not unused, yet expressly states that the Jews did not receive it into the canon (Contr. ep. Gaudeni, l, 81), and draws a distinction between it and the canonical Scriptures (De Cíc. Dei, xviii. 86). The Council of Trent, however, has settled (April 8, 1646) the canonicity of it for the Roman Church. The Protestant Church generally agrees with Luther, who remarks, "We tolerate it because of the beautiful history of the Maccabean seven martyrs and their mother, and other pieces. It is evident, however, that the writer was not a great master, but produced a patchwork of various books; he has likewise a perplexing knot in ch. xiv., in Rasius, who committed suicide, which was also troublesome to Augustine and other fathers. For such example is of none, and it is not to be considered even though it may be tolerated and charitably explained. It also describes the death of Antiochus, in ch. i., differently from 1 Macc. To sum it all up: Just as 1 Macc. deserves to be adopted in the number of sacred Scriptures, so 2 Macc. deserves to be thrown out, though there is something good in it" (Vorrede auf das Zweyte Buch Maccabaeorum, in the German Bible, ed. 1586).

VI. Versions and Literature.—There are two ancient versions of this book, a Latin and a Syriac. The Latin, which was current before Jerome, and does not always follow closely the Greek, is now incorporated in the Roman Vulgate, which is still literal, is given both in vol. iv. of the London Polyglot and by De Lagarde, Libri Veteris Testamenti Apocryphi Syriaci (London. 1861). The Arabic so-called version of 2 Macc. is really an independent work. See Maccabees, Fifth Book 5.

MACABBEES, THE THIRD BOOK OF, not given in the Romish Vulgate, the Apocrypha of the A.V., nor in Protestant versions generally, but still read in the Greek Church.

I. Title and Position.—This book is improperly called the "third of Maccabees," since it does not at all record the exploits of the Maccabean heroes, but narrates events of an earlier date. It, however, derives its name from the fact that this apellation, which originally belonged to Judas, was afterwards used in the sense of martyrs, and was extended to the Alexandrian Jews who suffered for their faith's sake either immediately before or after the Maccabean period. In the Synopsis of the Pseudo-Athanasius, it is apparently also called of Polemaceos, a name which is derived from the name of the country of Polemaeia, Πολεμαία, εβδομαδος του Πολεμαίου, p. 492, ed. Migne, for which Credner, Grimm, etc., suggest that the true reading is Πολεμαεια ετοι Πολεμαιεια, and that this book is to be understood by Πολεμοι. -Grimm, Comment. p. 200). From the polemic part, this book is spoken of, upon the two former productions, and occupy the first position, since it is prior in time to both the first and second Maccabees. But tradition has assigned to it a third position, because it came into circulation later than the others, and was regarded as being of third-rate importance. Cotton, in his edition of the Five Books of Maccabees, has placed it as "1 Maccabees." men, were imprisoned with them, and the king ordered the names of all to be taken down preparatory to their execution. Here the first marvel happened: the serpent to whom the task was assigned tormented for forty days from morning till evening, till at last the ants and paper failed them, and the king's plan was defeated (ch. iv.). However, regardless of this, the king ordered the keeper of the elephants, an aedile, to prepare, so that the execution was deferred. The Jews still prayed for help; but when the dawn came, the multitudes were assembled to witness their destruction, and the elephants stood ready for their bloody work. Then was there another marvel: the king was visited by deep forgetfulness, and chided the keeper of the elephants for the preparations which he had made, and the Jews were again saved. But at the evening banquet the king recalled his purpose, and with terrible threats prepared for its immediate accomplishment at daybreak (ch. v.). Elymas, an aged priest, earnestly prayed for his people (vi, 1-15), and, just as he finished praying, the royal train and the elephants arrived at the Hippodrome, when suddenly two angels appeared in terrible form, visible to all but the Jews, making the afrightened spectators go back with the soldiers (ver. 16-21). This changed the king's anger into pity, and, with tears in his eyes, he at once "set free the sons of the Almighty, heavenly, living God," and made a great feast for them (ver. 22-30). To commemorate this marvellous interposition of their heavenly Father, the Jews instituted an annual festival to celebrate "through all the dwellings of their pilgrimage for after generations" (ver. 31-41). The faithful Jews had not only their mourning turned into joy, and the royal protection for the future, but were permitted by the king to inflict condign punishment on those of their brethren who had forsaken the religion of their fathers in order to escape the temporary sufferings; "thus the most high God worked wonders throughout for their deliverance" (vii, 1-28).

III. Historical Character.—Though the narrative design of the writer may modify and embellish the facts which he records as to render them more subservient to his object, yet the assertion of Dr. Davidson, that "the narrative appears to be nothing but an absurd Jewish fable" (Introduction to the O. T. iii, 454), is far too sweeping. That the groundwork of it is true, as Dr. Davidson very rightly says (Introduction, part ii, book ii, anno 216), is attested by collateral history. 1. The account it gives of Ptolemy's expedition to Cæle-Syria, and his victory over Antiochus at Raphia (1, 1-7), is corroborated both by Polybius (v, 40, 58-74, 79-87) and Justin (xxx, 1). 2. The character which it ascribes to Ptolemy—that he was cruel, vicious, and given to the orgies and mysteries of Bacchus—is literally confirmed both by Plutarch, who, in his essay How to distinguish Flatterers from Friends, says, "Such praise was the ruin of Egypt, because it called the effeminacy of Ptolemy, his wild extravagances, loud prayers, his marking with an ivy leaf (καυσίμῳ), and his drums, πυτα" (cap. xii; compare also In Cleomenes, cap. xxxiii and xxxvii), and by the author of the Greek Eymologoi, who tells us that Philopator was called Gallus because he was marked with the leaf of an ivy, like the priests called Galli; for in all the Bacchanalian solemnities they were crowned with ivy (Τάλλας ὁ φιλο-πατορ Πτολεμαῖος διὰ τὸ φύλλα καυσίμω σατασαίγα ὡς οἱ Γάλλοι, etc.). 3. Josephus's deviating account (Apion, ii, 5) of the events here recorded, which shows that he had insituted his own Ion from doubles, and this he confirms by comparing it with that of Ptolemy's general, whose name he has altered to Πυργία (Apion, ii, 5). 4. The statement in vi, 56, that they instituted an annual festival to commemorate the day of their deliverance, to be celebrated in all future time, the fact that this festival was actually kept in the days of Josephus (comp. vii, ii, 5), and the consecration of a pillar and synagogue at Ptolemais (vii, 29), are utterly unaccountable on the supposition that this deliverance was never wrought. The doubts which De Wette (Einleitung, sect. 305), Ewald (Gesch, d. v. I. v. iv, 585 sq.), Grimm (Comment. p. 217), and Davidson (Introduction, 455) raise against the historicalground of the narrative, are chiefly based upon the fact that Dan. xi, 11, etc., does not allude to it. Those critics, therefore, submit that the book typically portrays Caligula, who commanded that his own statue should be placed in the Temple, under the guise of a current tradition respecting the murder of Jesus by Pilate against the Jews, transferred by mistake to Ptolemy Philopator. If it be true that Ptolemy Philopator attempted to enter the Temple at Jerusalem, and was frustrated in his design—a supposition which is open to no reasonable objection—and if Josephus, in placing this incident, has assigned to him the impious design of his successor, or the author of 3 Maccabees may have combined the two events for the sake of effect. The writer, in his zeal to bring out the action of Providence, has colored his history, so that it has lost all semblance of truth. In this respect the book offers an instructive contrast to the book of Esther, with which it is closely connected both in its purpose and in the general character of its incidents. In both a terrible calamity is averted by faithful prayer; royal anger is changed to royal favor, and the point turned from the innocence of the innocent to the guilt. But here the likeness ends. The divine reserve, which is the peculiar characteristic of Esther, is exchanged in 3 Maccabees for rhetorical exaggeration, and once again the words of inspiration stand emboldened by the presence of their later counterpart.

How to distinguish Flatterers from Friends, and Date.—It is generally admitted that the author of this book was an Alexandrian Jew, and that he wrote in Greek. This, indeed, is evident from its ornate, pompous, and fluent style, as well as from the copious command of expression which the writer possesses, though this book resembles 2 Maccabees in the use of certain expressions (e. g. ἀδιψος, 3 Macc. i, 25; ii, 8, comp. with 2 Macc. ix, 7) in the employment of purely Greek proper names to impart a Greek garb to Jewish things and ideas (3 Macc. v, 26, 42; vi, 5, comp. with 2 Macc. iv, 47), etc., yet the commands of the two books is so different that it is impossible to claim for them the same author. The author of this book surpasses 2 Maccabees in offensively seeking after artificial, and hence very frequently obscure phrases (e. g. ἡ παρθένος ἐπιφάνεια, ἡ ἐπιφάνεια, etc.), in rare words or such as occur nowhere else (e. g. 20, ii, 29; 20, v; yet the two books are so different that it is impossible to claim for them the same author. book (e.g. its beginning with Ἰδὲ Φωτιώτης, and its reference, in τῶν προσωδολογίων, ii, 25, to some passage not contained in the present narrative), which has led to the supposition that it is either a mere fragment of a larger work (Ewald, Davidson, etc.), or that the beginning only has been lost (Grimm, Keil, etc.). Against the latter view, Gritz rightly urges that it most thoroughly and in a most complete manner carries through its design.

All the attempts to determine the age of the book are based upon pure conjecture, and entirely depend upon the views entertained by the editors, as may be seen from the two extremes between which its date has been placed. Thus Allin (Judgment of the Jewish Church, p. 67) will have it that "it was written by a Jew of Egypt, under Pontius Pilate, it. e. about B.C. 200;" while Grimm places it about A.D. 39 or 40.

V. Canonicity.—Like the other Apocrypha, this book was never part of the Jewish canon. In the Apostolic canons, however, which are assigned to the 3d century, it is considered as sacred writing (Clem. 85); Theodoret, too (die cir. A.D. 437), quotes it as such (in Dan. xi, 7). It was never accepted in the Western churches, and formed no part of the Roman Vulgate; it was therefore not received into the canon of the Catholic Church, nor inserted as a rubric in the Apocrypha contained in the translation of the Bible made by the Reformers.

VI. Versions and Literature.—The Greek is contained in the Athens papyrus, discovered in 1844; it is given in the London Polyglot, and has lately been published by De Lagarde, Codex Vetus Testamenti Apocryphi (London, 1861). It is the Latin version of it given in the Complutensian Polyglot; another Latin version, by F. Nubilus, is given in the London Polyglot; the first German translation, as far as we can trace it, is given in the Zurich Bible printed by Froescher (1801); another, by Joachim Crenberger, appeared in Wittenberg (1534); De Wette, in the first edition of his translation of the Bible, made conjointly with Auguste (1809-14), also gave a version of this book, which is now excluded from his Bible; and another German version is given in Guttmann’s translation of the Apocrypha (Altna. 1811). The first English version was published by Walter Lyneus in 1550, which was appended with some few alterations, to the Bible printed by John Daye (1551), and reprinted separately in 1568; a new and better version, with some notes, was published by Whitton, Authorick Records (London. 1727), i, 162-208; a third version, in the Bible printed by John Hussey (1680); Notes (Bath, 1785); and a fourth version, with brief but useful notes, was made by Cotton, The Five Books of Maccabees (Oxford, 1832).

MACCABEES, THE FOURTH BOOK OF (a), though not given in the Roman Vulgate, and therefore not inserted in the Apocrypha contained in the Bibles translated by the Reformers, yet exists in Greek in two leading manuscripts. One of them is the text of its most authentic narrative circulation, may be called the received or common text, is contained in the early edition of the Sept. printed at Strasburg, 1526, Basel, 1545 and 1550, Frankfurt, 1597, Basel, 1689, and in the editions of Josephus's work, and is given in the purest form in Bekker's edition of Josephus (Leips. 1856-56, 6 vols.). The other is the Alexandrian, or that of the Codex Alexandrinus, and is the more ancient and preferable one; it is contained in the editions of the Sept. by Grafe and Breitinger, and is adopted, with some few alterations after the common text, in Apel's edition of the Apocrypha (Leips. 1837). See Schaack, De libro sic Maccabaeorum qui Josepho tribuit (Kopenagen, 1814).

1. Title.—This book is called 4 Maccab. (Μακκαβαίων ἢ τιτάραγμα τῶν Μακκαβαίων βιβλίον) in the various MSS. in the Codex Alexandrinus and Synecdotus (p. 529, 9, and 580, 17, ed. Dind.); in Cod. Paris. A, it is denominated 4 Maccob, a Treatise on Reagon (Μακκαβαίων τίταραγμα περὶ σωφρός λογος), by Eusebius (Hist. Ecclesiast. iii, 10, b) and Jerome (Collat. Sacr. i, 10). It is called on the dspeurovtpa of Reagon (περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογοῦ), and in the editions of Josephus's works, Josephus's Treatise on the Maccabees (Φαλαβ. Ἰσχυρὸς τοῖς Μακκαβαίοις λόγος). 2. Design, Division, and Contents.—The design of this book is to encourage the Jews, who—being surrounded by a philosophic heathenism, and taunted by its moral and devout followers with the trivial nature and apparent absurdity of some of the Mosaic precepts—were in danger of being led astray from their faith, to abide faithfully by the Mosaic law, and to stimulate them to observe it in a manner not akin to that of the heathen, by convincing them of the reasonableness of their divine law, and its unparalleled power to control the human passions (comp. xviii, 1). To carry out this design the book is divided into two parts, opening with an introduction, as follows:

1. The first part, comprising ch. i, 1-12, contains the summary of the whole book, and the grand problem for discussion, viz. whether the rational will, permeated and regulated by true piety, has perfect mastery over the passions (σὺν αὐθεντικῶς τοῖς παθήσεσι); an advocate of the character and conduct of these martyrs (xvii, 1-21, 23), showing that the Israelites alone are invincible in their struggles for virtue (ὅπη μείζος μισεῖ τοὺς Ἰσραήλιτας τιράννοις τῶν Ἰουδαίων νύν άναγινώσκειν). Ch. xviii, 21-23, is evidently a later addition.

3. The second part, comprising chap. iii, 20-xxvii, 20, demonstrates the proposition that sanctified reason has the mastery over the passions, and that by the example of the Maccabean martyrs (iii, 20-iv, 26) narrated in the book. It comprises 2 Macc. iii. iv, 17-17, 1, 5, 5-11; describes the martyrdom of Eleazar (v, 17-19), and the seven brothers (v, 11-18), with moral reflections on it (xvii, 1-21, 23), as well as the virtuous life of Judith (xviii, 1-13, 20). It contains a noble account of the death of their mother (xviii, 11-xxvii, 6), and then deduces the lessons to be learned from the character and conduct of these martyrs (xvii, xxvii, 2), showing that the Israelites alone are invincible in their struggles for virtue (ὅπη μείζος μισεῖ τοὺς Ἰσραήλιτας τιράννοις τῶν Ἰουδαίων νύν άναγινώσκειν). Ch. xviii, 21-23, is evidently a later addition.

3. Author, Date, and Original Language.—In harmony with the general tradition, Eusebius (Hist. Ecclesiast. iii, 10, Jerome (Catalog. Script. Eccl. a. Χριστοῦ, Photius (ap. Photostorgiu, Hist. Ecc. i), Suidas (s. v. καθενή), the Church Fathers, and the MSS., and Handbuch zu den Apokryphen d. A. T. (Leips. 1857), p. 218 sq., as well as the editions of Josephus's works, ascribe the authorship of this book to the celebrated Jewish historian Flavius Josephus. But this is utterly at variance with the style and structure of the book itself, and has most probably arisen from a confusion of the name Josephus, which may have been written by some one of the name of Josephus, or from the fact that it was regarded as supplementary to this historian, and hence was appended to his writings. Not only is the language quite different from that of Josephus's writings, but—1. In 4 Macc. all the proper names in the Bible, except Ἱεροσολύμων and Ἐλασσάρας, are retained in their Hebrew form, and treated as indeclinable (e.g. Αβραάμος, Ισαάς, Ноης), whereas Josephus gives them a Greek termination. 2 Maccabees, Books of 614 Maccabees, Books of Fourth Macc. derives its historical matter from 2 Macc., as we have seen in the preceding section, or perhaps from the original work of Jason; while Josephus manifests utter ignorance about the existence of this work. 8. The historical blunders contained in this book (iv, 15, 26; v, x, xi; xxii, 22, 23, etc.) are such as demonstrate that they never have committed. 4. The form and tone of the book unquestionably show that the writer was an Alexandrian Jew, who resided in Egypt or somewhere far away from the Holy Land—comp. iv, 5, 20, etc., where the writer speaks of 'our fatherland' i. e. the Holy Land far away. From this and other passages in which the Temple is spoken of as still existing, and from the fact that xiv, 9 speaks of the Egyptian Jews as having enjoyed external peace and security at the time when this book was written, Grimm dates it before the fall of Jerusalem and the persecutions of the Egyptians by the Jews of Caligua, i. e. B.C. 89 or 40.

That the Greek is the original language of the book requires no proof. The style is very pompous, flowery, vigorous, and truly Greek. The author's eloquence, however, is not that of a sudden burst of a heart inspired with the grandeur of the divine theme (sacellum) upon which he discourses, but is produced artificially by resorting to exaltations and apostrophes (v, 33, etc.; vii, 6, 9, 10, 15; viii, 15, 18, xi, 14, etc.), dialogues and monologues (viii, 16-19; xvi, 5-10), etc. Such a style is found in the History of Polybius (ii, 27, 28, 35, 5, 7), and the author abounds in έν θείᾳ γένεσι (i, 27, 29; ii, 9; iv, 18; xi, 16; vii, 17; xii, 15; xii, 4; xiii, 24; xiv, 15, 18, xvi, 26; xvii, 5).

IV. Canonicity and Importance. Among the Jewish books of the Old Testament, and those of the first century, writers were acquainted with it, and Gregory of Nazianzen, Augustine, Jerome, etc. quoted with respect its description of the Maccabean martyrs; yet it was never regarded as canonical or sacred. As a historical document the narrative is of no value. Its interest centres in the accounts of Alexander's death, and the unique example of the usage which the Jews made of their history. Ewald (Geschichte, iv, 556) rightly compares it with the sermon of later times, in which a scriptural theme becomes the subject of an elaborate and practical comment. The philosophical tone of the book is essentially stilted, but the story is that of a stirring and bloody war. The dictates of reason are supported by the remembrance of noble traditions, and by the hope of a glorious future. The prospect of the life to come is clear and wide. The faithful are seen to rise to endless bliss; the wicked to descend to torment. But in all this, while the writer shows, in this respect, the effects of the full culture of the Alexandrian school, and in part advances beyond his predecessors, he offers no trace of that deep spiritual insight which was quickened by Christianity. The Jew stands alone, isolated by character and by blessing (comp. Gfror. Philo, etc., ii, 176). Still the book is of great importance, inasmuch as it illustrates the history, doctrines, and moral philosophy of the Jewish people prior to the advent of Christ. It shows that the Jews believed that human reason, in its natural state, has no power to subdue the passion of the heart, and that it is only able to do it when sanctified by the religion of the Bible (v, 21, 29; vi, 17, 18); that the souls of all men continue to live after the death of the body; that all will rise, both righteous and wicked, to receive their judgment for the deeds done in the body (v, 85; ix, 8; xii, 13, 14; xvi, 22, 27, 17, 18); that this is taught in the Pentateuch (comp. xviii, 18, with Deut. xxi, 3); and that the death of the righteous is a vicarious atonement (vi, 29). Allusion seems also to be made in the N. T. to some passages of this book (2 Cor. xi, 9; Rev. xiv, 2; Matt. xi, 26; Rom. vi, 10; xiv, 8; Gal. xi, 19; 4 Macc. xii, 11, with Acts xxiv, 27; xvi, 26: 4 Macc. xii, 14, with Luke xvi, 22, 23: 4 Macc. xvi, 22, with Luke xx, 87).

V. Versions and Exegetical Helps. — The book was translated into Syriac, the MS. of which is in the Am-period, is to a great extent parallel with 1 and 2 Macc., whilst the second part, which records the post-Maccabean history down to the birth of Christ (xxi-lix), is parallel with Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15-17; War, i, 3-17. The historical worth of 5 Macc. is therefore easily ascertained by comparing its narrative with that of 1 and 2 Macc., and with the corresponding portions of Josephus. By this means it will be seen that, notwithstanding its several historical and chronological blunders (compare 5 Macc. x, 16, 17, with 2 Macc. x, 29; 5 Macc. ix, with 1 Macc. vii, 7; 5 Macc. viii, 1-3, with 1 Macc. ix, 78; xii, 49; Joseph. Ant. xiii, 11; 5 Macc. xx, 17, with 1 Macc. xiv, 15; 5 Macc. xx, 1-8, with 1 Macc. xix, 12), especially when recording foreign history (comp. 5 Macc. xiii), it is a trustworthy and valuable narrative. There can be no question of its being a new attempt or a mistake committed by transcribers (e.g., the name Felix, which stands five times for three different persons, 5 Macc. iii, 14; vii, 8, 34, comp. with 1 Macc. iii, 10; 2 Macc. v, 22; viii, 33; the name Gorgias, 5 Macc. x, is a mistake for Timotheus), as is evident from 2 Macc. x; Joseph. Ant. xii, 11; so also two for nine, 5 Macc. vi, 9); and that, as a whole, it is far more simple and natural, and far less blundering and unscrupulous, and therefore more credible than 2 Macc. As to its religious character, the book shows most distinctly that the Jews of those days firmly believed in the survival of the soul after the death of the body, in a general resurrection of the dead, and in a future judgment (v, 12, 13, 17, 22, 43, 48-51; lix, 14, etc.).

IV. Author, Date, and Original Language.—This book is a compilation, made in Hebrew, by a Jew who lived after the destruction of Jerusalem, from ancient Hebrew memoirs or chronicles, which were written shortly after the events transpired. This is evident from the whole complexion of the document, even in the translation— for the original has not as yet come to light—as may be seen from the few features here offered for considerations: 1. When speaking of the dead (xx, 11, 15; xii, 1; xxi, 17) the compiler uses the well-known euphemism, God be merciful to him in Hebrew עתיר ליה ותיר, to whom be peace ותיר ליה ותיר, which came into vogue among the Jews in the Talmudic period (comp. Toseph. Chal. 100, 4; Zunz, Zur Geschichte, p. 888), and are used among the Jews to the present day, thus showing that the compiler was a Jew, and lived after the destruction of the Temple. 2. He calls the Hebrew Scriptures (iii, 5, 9) the twenty-four books =-twenty-four books =-twenty-four books =-twenty-four books, a name which is thoroughly Jewish and was used very long after the close of the Hebrew canon; leaves Tobit (Tob.), the Hebrew name for the Pentateuch, untranslated (xxi, 9), in accordance with the Jewish custom; speaks of the deity as the great and good God יְשׁוּעַ וַתִּיָּרְסַל, and names Jerusalem the holy of holies בֵּית הַיָּרְסָל וֹ יִשְׂרָאֵל. In conclusion, the book is a Hebrew composition, not in any sense a compilation from Gentile sources.
MACEDONIA

Macedo, Antonio de, a Portuguese Jesuit and writer, was born at Coimbra in 1612. He was regent and instructor among the Jesuits, and passed two years in the African missions. He had charge of the confessional of the Vatica n Church until 1671, from which time he directed the College of Evora, and afterwards that of Lisbon. He died at Lisbon in 1688. His works are, among others, Elogia normallia et descriptio Coronationis Christianae, regna Suecia (Stockholm, 1650): —

Lusitania infulata et purpurata, seu pontificii et cardinalibus illustrata (Paris, 1668, 1673, 4to). De Vida et Mortuis Joannis de Almeida (Padua, 1669; Rome, 1671): —

Macedo, Francisco de, a Portuguese Jesuit and prolific writer, was born at Coimbra in 1596, entered the Jesuit order at fourteen, and became successively teacher of rhetoric, philosophy, and chronology. In 1630 he left the Jesuits and entered the order of Cordeliers, with the surname François de Saint-Augustin, under which most of his works are published. He was called to the professorship of polemic theology in the College of the Propaganda at Rome, and afterwards (1657) visited Venice, lecturing de omni re scibili. He occupied the chair of moral philosophy at the University of Padua from 1667 until the time of his death in May, 1680. In 1673 he had composed 53 panegyrics, 60 Latin discourses, 82 funeral orations, 123 elegies, 115 epitaphs, 212 dedicatory epitaphs, 700 familiar epistoles, 2690 epic poems, 110 odes, 3000 epigrams, 4 Latin comedies, 2 tragedies, and 1 Spanish satire. He had a sharp discussion with cardinal Bona on the subject of subdissociation, and with cardinal Noris on the monachism of St. Augustine. Among his writings are Apologia S. Francisci Xaverii (Lisbon, 1620, 8vo), an epic poem; — Theorcuria Eruditionis pro sole, Viridarium eloquentiae (denoting the author's title of '... Professor of Eloquence in St. Augustine's Benedictine...') (Paris, 1648, 4to; 8th edit. Lond, 1654): — Controversia ecclesiastica inter F. P. Minores (1653, 8vo): — Lexicon Lusitanum, contra tubum Anglicum (Lond, 1652, 4to): — Encyclopedias in Agonem literarum prodita (Rome, 1657): — De clavis Patris, iv lib. (Rome, 1660): — Theatrum Meteorologicum (Rome, 1661, 8vo): — Scholae Theologiae positionis (Rome, 1664): — Medulla historiae ecclesiasticae emaculata: — Collectiones doctrinæ S. Thomæ et Scoti, cum differentiis inter utrumque (Padua, 1671, 2 vols.); — Joannis Bonæ Doctrinae de usu fermenti in sacrificiis manis (Innsbruck [Venice], 1673, 8vo); — Digestus divi Augustini sive et fermentati (Verona, 1673, 4to): — Myrothecium morale documentarum xii (Padua, 1675, 4to): — Schema Congregationis S. Officii Romani cum elogii cardinalium et cordinarum de insuffici et autoritate summi pontificis in mysteria fidelis professedorum (Padua, 1676, 4to): — Elogia poetarum in Resp. Venedicorum cum iconibus (Padua, 1680): — De Incarnationis Mysterio (Padua, 1681), containing also Itinerarium sancti Augustini. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Wetzer und Wester, Kirchen-Lexikon, xii, 749.

Macedonia (Macedonía, from a supposed founder Macedos or Macedon), a people originally confined to the district lying north of Thessaly, east of the Macedonian mountains (a prolongation of Mount Findus), and west of the River Axios; but afterwards extended to the country lying to the north of Greece Proper, having, on the east Thrace and the Egean Sea, on the west the Aegean Sea, the Illyria, on the south the Peloponnesus and Messenia, and on the south Thessaly and Epirus. "In a rough and popular description it is enough to say that Macedonia is the region bounded inland by the range of Haemus or the Balkan northwards and the chain of Findus westwards, beyond which the streams flow respectively to the Danube and Adriatic; that is separated from Thessaly on the south by the Cambunian hills, running easterly from Findus to Olympus and the Egean; and that it is divided on the east from Thrace by a less definite mountain boundary running southwards from Haemus. Of the space thus inclosed, two of the most remarkable physical features are two great plains, one watered by the Axios, which comes to the sea at the Thermic Gulf, not far from Thessalonica; the other by the Strymon, which, after passing near Philippi, flows out below Amphipolis. Between the mouths of these two rivers a remarkable peninsula projects, dividing itself into three points, on the farthest of which Mount Athos rises nearly into the region of perpetual snow." The whole region was intersected by mountains (among those were the famous Olympus and Athos), which supplied numerous streams (especially the Strymon and Axios), rendering the intervening valleys and plains highly fruitful (Pliny, iv, 17; Mela, ii, 8; Psol. iii, 13). The natives were celebrated from the earliest times for their hardy independence and military discipline. The country is supposed to have been first peopled by Chittim or Kittim, a son of Javan (Gen. x, 4), and in that case it is probable that the Macedonians are sometimes intended when the word Chittim occurs in the Old Testament. Macedonia was the original kingdom of Philip and Alexander, by means of whose victories the name of the Macedonians became celebrated throughout the East. The rise of the great empire formed by Alexander is described by the prophet Daniel under the emblem of a goat with one horn (Dan. viii, 5—8). As the horn was a general symbol of power, the oneness of the horn implies merely the unity of that power. It is, however, curious and interesting to know that Daniel did describe Macedonia under its usual symbol, as gems and other antique objects still exist in which that country is represented under the figure of a one-horned goat. (See Murray's Truth of Revelation Illustrated, and the art. Macedonia, in Taylor's Calmet.) See GOAT. Monuments are still extant in which this symbol occurs, as one of the pilasters of Persepolis, where a goat is depicted with one immense horn on his forehead, and a Persian holding the horn, by which is intended the subjection of Macedon by Persia. In Eath. xvi, 10, Haman is described as a Macedonian, and in xvi, 14 he is said to have contrived his plot for the purpose of transferring the kingdom of the Persians to the Macedonians. This sufficiently betrays the late date and spurious character of these apocryphal chapters; but it is curious thus to have our attention turned to the early struggle of Persia and Greece. Macedonia played a great part in this struggle, and there is little doubt that Achaemenus is Xerxes. The history of the Macedceans opens with vivid allusions to Alexander, the son of Philip, the Macedonian king (Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ τοῦ Φίλιππου ὁ βασιλεύς ὁ Μακεδών), who came out of the land of Chettim and smote Darius, king of the Persians and Medes (1 Mac. i, 1), and who reigned first among the Grecians (ib. vi, 2). A little later we have the Roman conquest of Perusia, “king of the Citimna,” recorded (ib. viii, 5). Subsequently in these Jewish annals we find the term “Macedonians” used for the soldiers of the Seleucid successors of Alexander (2 Mac. viii, 20). In what is called the Fifth Book of Maccabees this usage of the word is very frequent, and is applied not only to the Seleucid princes at Antioch, but to the Ptolemies at Alexandria (see Cotton’s Fire Books of Maccabees, Ox. 1632). When subdued by the Romans (Livy, xlv) under Paulus Emillius (B.C. 169), Macedonia was divided into four provinces (Livy, xlv, 29). Macedonia Prima was on the east of the Strymon, and had Amphipolis for the capital. Macedonia Secunda was stretched between the Strymon and the Axios, with Thessalonica for its metropolis. The third and fourth districts lay to the south and the west. Of two, if not three of these districts, coins are still extant (Akerman, Numismatic Illust. of the N. T. p. 48). Afterwards (B.C. 142) the whole of Greece was divided into two great provinces, Macedonia and Achaia. See ACHAIAS; GREECE.

Macedonia therefore constituted a Roman province, governed by a procurator, with the title of proconsul (provincia proconsularia; Tacit. Annal. i, 76; Sueton. Claud. 20), in the time of Christ and his apostles. (See finally in Smith’s Dict. of Christ. Geog. a. v.) The apostle Paul being summoned in a vision, while at Troas, to preach the Gospel in Macedonia, proceeded thither, and founded the churches of Thessalonica and Philippi (Acts xvi, 9). A.D. 48. This occasions repeated mention of the name, either alone (Acts xvi, 5; xix, 21; Rom. xv, 26; 2 Cor. i, 16; xi, 9; Phil. iv, 15), or along with Achaia (2 Cor. ix, 2; 1 Thess. i, 5). The principal cities of Macedonia were Amphipolis, Thessalonica, Pella, and Pelagonia (Livy, xiv, 29); the towns of the province named in the New Testament are Philipopolis, Nicopolis, Apollonia, and Berea.

When the Roman empire was divided, Macedonia fell to the share of the emperor of the East, but in the 16th century it fell into the hands of the Turks. It now forms a part of Turkey in Europe, and is called Ottoman Macedonia. It is inhabited by Albanians, Vlachs, Turks, Greeks, and Albanians. The north-eastern part is under the pasha of Salonika; the southern under beys or agas, or forms free communities. The capital, Salonika, the ancient Thessalonica, is a commercial town, and the only one of any consequence, containing about 70,000 inhabitants. (See Cellari, Notiz. ii, 828 sq.; Mannert, vii, 420 sq.; Conybeare and Howison, i, 115.) On the question whether Luke includes Thrace in Macedonia, see Thrace.

“Nothing can exceed the interest and impressiveness of the occasion (Acts xvi, 9) when a new and religious meaning was given to the well-known Provincia Macedonia. Then this part of Europe was designated as the first to be trodden by an apostle. The account of St. Paul’s first journey through Macedonia (Acts xvi, 10–xvii, 15) is marked by copious detail and well-defined incidents. At the close of this journey he returned from Corinth to Syria by sea. On the next occasion of visiting Europe, though he both went and returned through Macedonia (Acts xx, 1–6), the narrative is a very slight sketch, and the route is left uncertain except as regards Philippi. Many years elapsed before St. Paul visited this province again; but from 1 Tim. i, 8, it is evident that he did accomplish the wish expressed during his first imprisonment (Phil. ii, 24). The character of the Macedonian Christians is set before us in Scripture in a very favorable light. The candor of the Bereans is highly commended (Acts xvii, 11); the Thessalonians were evidently objects of St. Paul’s peculiar affection (1 Thess. ii, 8, 17–20; iii, 10); and the Philippians, besides their general freedom from blame, are noted as remarkable for their liberality and self-denial (Phil. iv, 10, 14–19; see 2 Cor. ix, 2; xi, 9). It is worth noticing, as a fact almost typical of the change which Christianity has produced in the social life of Europe, that the female element is conspicuous in the records of its introduction. The Gospel was first preached there to a small congregation of women (Acts xvi, 14); the first convert was a woman (ib. ver. 14); and, at least at Philippi, women were prominent as active workers in the cause of religion (Phil. iv, 2, 3). It should be observed that, in St. Paul’s time, Macedon was well intersected by Roman roads, especially by the great Via Egnatia, which connected Philippi and Thessalonica, and also led towards Illyricum (Rom. xv, 19).” For the antiquities of this region, see Consid, Voyage dans le Macedoine (Paris, 1861); Leake, Travels in Northern Greece (London, 1855); compare also Holland, Travels in the Ionian Isles, etc. (Lond. 1812–18).

Maced’onian (Μακεδόνιος) occurs in the A.V. of the N. T. only in Acts xxvii, 2. In the other cases (Acts xvi, 9; xix, 29; 2 Cor. ix, 2, 4) our translators render it “of Macedonia.” The “Macedonians” are also mentioned in the Apocrypha (Esth. xvi, 10, 14; 1 Mac. i, 1; 2 Mac. xv, 20). See MACEDONIA.

Macedonius, a patriarch of Constantinople, flourished in the 8th century. After the death of Emperor Constans, in 886, Macedonius and Paulus became candidates for his succession. The latter was elected by the Athenasian party, but was soon after (888).

deposed by the emperor Constance, who put Eusebius of Nicomedia in his place. Upon the death of Eusebius, Paulinus was reinstated, but was again deposed by the Semi-Arian emperor, who in 342 pronounced Ma-decius patriarch, notwithstanding the opposition of the presbyter Quinis. Paulinus, in insurrection, resulting in a bloody bloodshed (comp. Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire [Milman's ed., ii], 387 sq.). The orthodox rivals, however, succeeded, after a time, in making his influence felt throughout the country, and Macedonius was finally ousted to yield him the patriarchal throne, after having thoroughly reorganized his party, Macedonius returned, and by the aid of the civil authorities regained the监督推翻的教会。 His decided connection with the Semi-Arians, and the widening of the gulf between the Arians and Semi-Arians, proved, however, fatal to his credit, and in 386 his enemies succeeded in securing his deposition by a synod at Constantinople. He is supposed to have died soon after.
His followers at once adopted his name. The Macedoni-ans are generally regarded as Semi-Arians of that period, especially those in and around Constantinople, in Thrace, and in the surrounding provinces of Asia Minor (Sozomen, iv, 27). There is, however, one point in which the Macedonians, although not opposed to, are yet distinguished from the Semi-Arians; it is their idea of the antagonism of the divinity and the homoousia of the Holy Ghost. On this point the Macedonians are identical with the Pneumatomachians, and therefore the latter finally joined the former. They professed that the Holy Spirit is a divine energy diffused throughout the universe, but denied its being distinct, as a person, from the Father and the Son (Ephraem, Harv. 74: Augustin, De Hare, c. 52). In 381 Theodosius the Great assembled a council of one hundred and fifty bishops at Constantinople (second ecumenical), which condemned this doctrine, and the Macedonians soon after disappear-

MAC GILL, STEVENSON, D.D., a Scotch divinity of considerable note, was born at Port Glasgow Jan. 19, 1765, of pious parents. He early chose the service of his Master, and conducted all his studies with a view to the ministry. He was educated at the University of Glasgow, and was licensed to preach in 1780; was appointed minister at Eastwood in 1791; was transferred in 1797 to the Tron Church, Glasgow, and later (1814) was also made a professor of theology in his alma mater. He died Aug. 18, 1839. Dr. Mac Gill "commended himself to every man's conscience" not only by his ability in the pulpit, and his laborious visits of his congregation and parish, but by the Christian interest he took in the public institutions and charities of the city—in the active direction he assumed of the Infirmary, the Prisons, the Mechanics' Village, the Lunatics' Asylum, and its services were also most zealous and actively rendered to "the Society for benefiting the Highlands and Islands of Scotland by means of Gaelic Schools," "the Propagaent of the Gospel in India," and "the Missions on behalf of India." In 1805 he organized a clerical literary society, which for many years he acted as secretary. It was after receiving the full approbation and friendly criticism of this literary society that he favored the world with Considerations addressed to a Young Clergyman (1803, 12mo), a work which, on its first appearance, obtained an extensive circulation, and from the perusal of which no young minister can fail to devote great and permanent advantage. His sermons were published in 1809. See Bebb, Burns, Memoir of Dr. Mac Gill (Edinb. 1842, 12mo); Jamieson, Dictionary of Ele"ious Biography, s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer.

Macherus (Makriopou), a strong fortress of Pe-rea, first mentioned by Josephus in connection with Alexander, the son of Hyrcanus I, by whom it was built (Ant. xxii, 16, 5; War, vii, 6, 2). It was delivered by his widow to her son, Aristobulus, who first found his opponents in Gabinus (Ant. xiv, 5, 2), to whom it afterwards surrendered, and by whom it was dismantled (ib. 4; compare Strabo, xvi, 762). Aristobulus, on his escape from Rome, again attempted to fortify it, but it was taken after two days' siege (War, vii, 6). In his account of this last capture by the Romans, Josephus gives a detailed description of the place. It was originally a tower built by Alexander Jannæus as a check to the Arab marauders.
It was on a lofty point, surrounded by deep valleys, and of immense strength, both by nature and art (compare Pinax, Hist. Nat., v, 15). After the fall of Jerusalem it was occupied by the Jewish banditti. The Jews say that it was visible from Jerusalem (Schwarz, Palestine, p. 54). Its site was identified in 1806 by Seetzen with the extensive ruins now called Marawer, on a rocky spur jutting out from Jebel Attaraya to the north, and overlooking the valley of Zedek Maar (Reiss, i, 380-4).
Josephus expressly states that it was the place of John the Baptist's beard (Ant. xviii, 5, 2), although he had said immediately before (ib. 2) that it was at the time in the possession of Aretas. See John the Baptist.

Machar, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Brechin, Scotland, in 1796. He was educated at King's College, Aberdeen, and afterwards at the University of Edinburgh. On receiving license to preach, he became assistant to the parish minister, and in 1828 emigrated to Canada, and took charge of the Church in Kingston, Upper Canada. In 1836 he was made member of the synod; and at a meeting of lay delegates, assembled from all parts of the province, he was nominated commissioner to proceed to Britain, and attend to the interests of the Canadian branch of the Church of Scotland in one of the next Assembly meetings. From 1846 to 1858 he was acting principal of Queen's College, Kingston, in which institution, during several sessions, he taught the Hebrew classes, and examined the candidates for license in the Oriental tongues. He died Feb. 7, 1863. Dr.
Machar's attainments both in sacred and secular learning were extensive and varied; he was familiar with both Hebrew and Greek literature, and could read with ease Hebrew, Greek, and the modern languages. He was always a close student, an earnest preacher, and a faithful pastor. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 588.

Machault, Jacques, a French Jesuit, was born at Paris in 1568; entered the order at eight years, and afterwards taught ethics and philosophy, and was rector at Alencon, Orleans, and Caen. He died in 1680 at Paris. His works are, De Missionibus Paragrigiae et alia in America meridionalia (Paris, 1638, 8vo)—De Re-bus Japonicis (Paris, 1646, 8vo)—De Regno Cochins-hesni (Paris, 1652, 8vo)—De Missionibus in India (Paris, 1659, 8vo)—De Missionibus religiosorum Soc. Jesu Machault, Jean de, a French Jesuit, was born at Paris Oct. 25, 1651; was admitted into the order in 1579; became professor of rhetoric at the College de Clermont, Paris, and afterwards rector of the College of Rouen. He died as provincial of Champagne March 25, 1619, at Paris. He published In Jacobis Thucani historiarum libros notationes lectoribus utiles et necessasria (Ingolstadt, 4to), which was condemned to be burned.

See Hoefer, Bk. Geneal., s. v.

Machault, Jean-Baptiste de, a French scholar and Jesuit, nephew of the foregoing, was born at Paris in 1591. He taught rhetoric at Paris, and directed successively the colleges of Rouen and Nevers. He died at Pontolese May 22, 1640. His works are, among others, Mach'banai (Heb. Makbēnāy, מַ֣כְבֶּןָי, binding, or perhaps clad with a mantle; Sept. Μακβασσαβαν v. r. Μακβα-σαβαν; Vulg. Machbanai), the eleventh of the Gadite braves who joined David's troop in the wilderness of Adullam (1 Chron. xii, 18). B.C. cir. 1061.

Mach'benah (Heb. Makhībān, מַכִּבְנָה, something bound on, perh. a cloak; Sept. Maphiaspavai v. r. Maphiaspavan; Vulg. Machbanai), apparently native in the tribe of Judah founded by (a person of that name, the son of) Sheva (1 Chron. ii, 49), and probably situated in the vicinity of Gibeah, in connection with which it is mentioned. It is thought to have been the same with Can-bas (Josh. xv, 40).

Machet, GERARD DE GIRARD, a French cardinal, confessor of Charles VII, he was born at Blois in 1390; entered the College de Navarre, Paris, in 1391; was made doctor of divinity in 1411; attached himself to the College de Navarre as professor, was made vice-chancellor of that institution, and as such addressed the emperor Sigis-mond in 1416. Driven from his college by the Burgund-ian invasion (3 May, 1418), he became the confessor of his pupil, the future emperor, Charles VII. He lived a while at Lyons. Machet was one of the clergy who conducted the examination of the Maid of Orleans. His influence in Troyes, Champagne, was powerful in opening the city and province to the army of Charles VII. Machet was successively canon of Paris, Chartres, Tours, and in 1432 bishop of Caen. He died at Tours July 17, 1448. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ma'chhi (Heb. Makhi, מַקְחִי, milking; Sept. Marxayi, Vulg. Machi), the father of Geuel, which latter was the commissioner on the part of the tribe of Gad to explore Canaan (Num. xiii, 15). B.C. ant. 1657.

Ma'chir (Heb. Makhīr, מַכִּיר, sold; Sept. Mayyip and Mophi), the name of two men.

1. The oldest son of Manasseh (Josh. xvii, 1), who even children born to him during the lifetime of Joseph (Gen. i, 22). B.C. 1907. His descendants were called Machrites (מערות, Sept. Mayyyioph, Numm. xxvi, 29), being the offspring of Gilead (1 Chron. vii, 17), whose posterity settled in the land taken from the Amorites (Numm. xxxiii, 39; Deut. iii, 18; Josh. xiii, 81; 1 Chron. ii, 23), but required a special enactment as to the right of owning to the fact that the grandson Zelophehad had only daughters (Numm. xxxvi, 1; xxvii, 1; Josh. xvii, 8). One of the name of Machir is put poetically as a representative of the tribe of Manasseh east (Judg. v, 14). His daughter became the mother of Segub by Hezron in his old age (1 Chron. ii, 21). The mother of Machir was an Armitite, and his father was Ma, chah, the granddaughter of Benjamin, by whom he had several sons (1 Chron. vii, 14-16). "The family of Machir come forward prominently in the history of the conquest of the trans-Jordanic portion of the Promised Land. In the joint expedition of Israel and Ammon, their warlike prowess expedited the Amoritis inhabitants from the rugged and difficult range of Gilead, and their bravery was rewarded by Moses by the assignment to them of a large portion of the district, 'half Gilead' (Josh. xiii, 31), with its rich mountain pastures, and the towns of Ajalon and Edrei, the capital of Gilead's kingdom (Numm. xxxii, 39; Deut. iii, 15; Josh. xiii, 31; xvii, 1). The warlike renown of the family of Machir is given as the reason for this grant (Josh. xvii, 1), and we can see the sound policy of assigning a frontier land of so much importance to the safety of the whole country. The next time to the eastern slope of the Syrian and Assyrian invasions, and to the never-ceasing predatory inroads of the wild desert tribes, to a clan whose prowess and skill in battle had fully proved in the subjugation of so difficult a tract (i.e., Assyria, S. and Pol. p. 327)." "The connection with Benjamin may perhaps have led to the selection by Abner of Mahanaim, which lay on the boundary between Gad and Manasseh, as the residence of Ishbosheth (2 Sam. ii, 8), and that with Judah may have also influenced his choice to go so far north when driven out of his kingdom."

2. A descendant of the preceding, son of Ammiel, residing at Lo-debar, who maintained the lance son of Jonathan until provision was made for him by David's care (2 Sam. ix, 4, 5), and afterwards extended his hosbandly care to the sons of Shimeah (2 Sam. xxiv, 27). B.C. 1087-1023. Josephus calls him the chief of the country of Gilead (Ant. vii, 9, 8). See David.

Ma'chirite (Numm. xxvi, 29). See Machir, 1.

Ma'chmas (Maayyaa), 1 Masc. ix, 73; elsewhere Michmagh (q. v.).

what is like the liberal? other copies read Maktobalāy, Maktobalay; Sept. Mayyaddasbo v. r. Mayyaddasbo; Vulg. Methucbediobos, an Israelite of the sons of Bani who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile ( Ezra x, 40). B.C. 459.

Macheple'lah (Heb. Maphelāh, מַפְּהֶלָה, probably a portion, but, according to others, double, and so the Sept.
Av, Vulg. B.C.), the name of the town in Edom to which hebron containing the cave which Abraham bought of Eprhon the Hittite for a family sepulchre (Gen. xxiii, 9), where it is described as being located in one extremity of the field, and in ver. 17 it is stated to have been situated "before Mamre," and to have likewise contain-ted trees. See Mamre. The only persons mentioned in Scripture as buried in this cemetery are Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with their wives Sarah, Rebekah, and Leah (Gen. xxiii, 19; xxxv, 9; xlix, 30; i, 13). "Beyond the passages already cited, the Bible contains no mention either of the name Machpelah or of the sepulchre of the patriarchs. Unless this was the sanctuary of Jebeorah to which Absalom had vowed, or pretended to have vowed, a pilgrimage, when absent in the remote Geshur (2 Sam. xv, 7), no allusion to it has been discovered in the records of David's residence at Hebron, nor yet in those of the Macabees, so many of the sepulchres of the is-ties were fought in and around it" (Smith). "It is a remarkable fact that none of the sacred writers refer to this celebrated tomb after the burial of Jacob, though it was unquestionably held in reverence by the Jews in all ages. ... In the time of Josephus, it is observed that 'besides Abraham and his descendants built themselves sepulchres at Hebron (Ant. i, 14), and in another passage he states that the monuments of the patriarchs are 'to this very time showed in Hebron, the structure of which is of beautiful marble, wrought after the most elegant manner' (War, iv, 7, 7). Jerome mentions the mausoleum of Abraham at Hebron as standing in his day (Onomast. s. v. Arboch); and in the Jera-alem Itinerary, a work of the 4th century, it is described as a quadrangular structure built of stones of wonderful beauty (Itin. Hieros. ed. Wessell, p. 599). It is also mentioned in Antonius Martyris in the beginning of the 7th century (Itin. 30); by Arculf towards its close (Early Travels in Pala, Bohn, p. 7); by Willibald in the 8th (ib. p. 29); by Susewil in the 12th (ib. p. 45); and by numerous others (see Ritter, Pal. and Sgr. iii, 257 sq.)." From these notices, it appears to be certain that the venerable building which still stands is the same which Josephus describes. Hebron lies in a narrow valley which runs from north to south between low ridges of rocky hills. The modern town is built partly in the bottom of the vale and partly along the lower slope of the eastern ridge. One of the most noticeable of the villages above the latter section of the town, rise the massive walls of the Haram, forming the one distinguishing feature of Hebron, cor-spacious from all points. The building is rectangular, about 200 feet long by 115 wide, and 50 high. The walls are constructed of massive stones varying from 12 to 20 feet in length, and from 4 to 6 in depth. Dr. Wilson mentions one stone 38 feet long and 3 feet 4 inches in depth, of ancient workmanship (Lands of the Bible, i, 366). The edges of the stones are ground to the depth of about two inches, so that the whole wall has the appearance of being formed of raised panels, like the Temple-wall at Jerusalem. See Masonry. The exterior is further ornamented with pilasters, supporting without capitals a plain moulded cornice. The building is thus unique; there is nothing like it in Syria. The style of its architecture, independent even of the historical notices above given, proves it to be of Jewish origin; and it cannot be much, if at all, later than the days of Solomon. The interior of this massive and most interesting building was described about fifty years ago by a Spaniard, who conformed to Islamism and assumed the name of Ali Bey (Travels, i, 292). The Rev. J. L. Porter was assured when at Hebron, and subsequently by a mollah of rank who had visited the tombs of the patriarchs, that there is an entrance to the cave, which consists of two compartments, and that the guardian can on special occasions enter the outer one (Handbook, p. 69). With this agree the statements of M. Pierotti, of Benjam of Tudela, who gives a description of the caves (Ibis, by Asher, p. 76 sq.), and of others (Wilson, Lands of the Bible, i, 364 sq.). We cannot doubt that the cave of Machpelah, in which the patriarchs were buried, is beneath this venerable building, and that it has been guarded with religious jealousy from the earliest ages; consequently, it is quite possible that some remains of the patriarchs may still lie there. Jacob was embalmed in Egypt, and his body deposited in this place (Gen. i, 2-13). It may still be there perfect as an Egyptian mummy. The Moslem traditions and the cenotaphs within the Haram agree exactly with the Biblical narrative, and form an interesting commentary on Jacob’s dying command — “And be charged them . . . bury me with my fathers . . . in the cave which is in the field of Machpelah, which is before Mamre. . . . There they buried Abraham, and Sarah his wife; there they buried Isaac, and Rebekah his wife; and there I buried Leah” (Gen. xlix, 29-31). There also they buried Jacob. Now within the enclosure are the six cenotaphs only, while the belief is universal among the Mohammedans that the real tombs are in the cave below. Projecting from the west side of the Haram is a little building containing the tomb of Joseph — a Moslem tradition states that his body was first buried at Shechem, but was subsequently transferred to this place (Stanley, Jewish Church, i, 498). The Jews cling around this building still, as they do around the ruins of their ancient Temple — taking pleasure in its stones, and burying its very dust. Beside the principal entrance is a little hole in the wall, at which they are permitted at certain times to pray.” “A belief seems to prevail in the town that the cave communicates with some one of the modern sepulchres at a considerable distance outside of Hebron (Lowe, in Zeitung des Judentums, June 1, 1839). The ancient Jewish tradition ascribes the erection of the mosque to David (Jichus ha-Abodah in Hottinger, Cippi Hebr., 30), thus making it coeval with the pool in the valley below; but, whatever the worth of this tradition, it may well be of the age of Solomon, for the masonry is even more antique in its character than that of the lower portion of the south and south-western walls of the Haram at Jerusalem, which many critics ascribe to Solomon, while even the severest allows it to be of the date of Herod. The date must always remain a mystery, but there are two considerations which may weigh in favor of fixing it very early. 1. That, often as the town of Hebron may have been destroyed, this, being a tomb, would always be spared. 2. It cannot, on architectural grounds, be later than Herod’s time, while, on the other hand, it is omitted from the catalogue given by Josephus of the places which he rebuilt or adorned.” The fullest historical notices of Machpelah will be found in Ritter, Pal. und Syr. vol. iii, and Robinson, Bib. Rev. vol. ii. The chief authorities are Arculf (A.D. 790); Benjam of Tudela (A.D. cir. 1170); the Jewish tract Jichus ha-Abodah (in Hottinger, Cippo Hebraici; and also in Wilson, i, 365); Ali Bey (Travels, A.D. 1807, ii, 232, 233); Giovanni Finati (Life by Bancks, ii, 238); Monro (Summer Rambles in 1833, i, 243); Lowe, in Zeitung des Judentums, 1839, p. 272, 288. In a note by Asher to his edition of Benjamin of Tudela (ii, 92), mention is made of an Arabic MS, in the Bibliothèque Royale at Paris, containing an account of the condition of the mosque under Saladin. This MS has not yet been published. The travels of Ibrahim el-Khijari in 1669-70, a small portion of which, from the manuscript in the Ducal Library at Goa, has been published by Tuch, with translation, etc. (Leipzig, 1850), are said to contain a minute description of the mosque (Tuch, p. 2).
MACHZOR

The best description of the interior is that of Stanley, Jewish Church and Sermons in the East (the two are identical), in which he gives the singular narrative of rabbi Benjamin, and a letter of M. Pierroti, which appeared in the Times immediately after the prince of Wales visit. A plan of the mosque is attached to Stanley's narrative. The description given by Ali Bey (Travels, vol. ii) is substantially the same as that of Dean Stanley. A few words about the exterior, a sketch of the mosaic, and a view of the town, showing the inclosure standing prominently in the foreground, will be found in Bartlett's Guide, etc., p. 216-219. A photograph of the exterior, from the East (?), is given as No. 63 of Palestine as it is, by Rev. G. W. Bridges. A ground-plan exhibiting considerable detail, made by two modern architects who lately superintended some repairs in the Edim, and given by them to Dr. Baron de Jerusalem, is engraved in Osmar's Palestine, Past and Present, p. 364. Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 385 sq., gives some additional particulars; also Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 383 sq. See HIBBON.

Machzor (מקזר, i.e. cycle) is the title of that part of Jewish liturgy which contains generally the prayers used in the synagogues on the Sabbath and feast-days, but particularly those of the three most important Jewish festivals. They are usually rhymical, and are the productions of the most eminent Jewish writers. Unfortunately, many of the modern Jews cannot understand them in the original, and are obliged to have recourse to translations. The art of making such a collection of Sabbath and feast-day prayers, Psiutim (פשטים), is E. Eleazar ben-Jacob Kalir, usually known only as Kalir (ףטיט), who lived in the second half of the 10th century. This was followed by others (Feitanim, פֶּטְטַנִים, פֶּטְטַנִים). The time of the Feitanim really closes with the 12th century, although fragmentary works still appeared in the 18th and 19th centuries. These collections vary generally according to the nationality of the author, as are the liturgies obtained in the synagogues of different countries. Thus there are Machzors according to the rites of the German, Polish, Spanish, and Italian Jews, and also translations from the Hebrew into the different languages, the use of which translations in the synagogues is, however, not general. The first scientific work on the Machzor is that of W. Heidenheim, published in 1800. This author corrected the text by means of ancient MSS., according to the German and Polish rites, and added to it a commentary and a historical introduction. His work gave rise also to further researches on the Hebraic and liturgies by other modern Jewish writers, among whom may be mentioned Rapport (Abgaffische Kalir, etc., in Bibbula Halittra, Vienna, 1829-32, Zunz (Gottesdienst, Vorträge d. Juden, p. 880-295), S. D. Luzzatto (לובּצֶatto, על מְצוּר), Eikele, z. Machzor nach röm. Ritual, Lissa, 1806, and L. Landshut (לְנֶסֶזְתו, אוןומאוסק אָאָתְום ליִיאוּב), Onomasticon auctorum hymnorum Hebraeorum erogam carminum, fasciculus i. Berlin. 1657). There is a beautiful edition of the Machzor, and a masterly version of it by W. Raeburn, ed. by Dr. Sachs, of Berlin. See Bartolocci, Biblioth. Mackee, C. R., a Presbyterian minister and educator, was born in Indiana County, Pa., March 29, 1792, was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, studied theology in the Seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and was licensed by the Philadelphia Presbytery in 1815, and ordained in 1821. By uniting self-application he made himself a thorough and critical scholar, especially in the ancient classics, ecclesiastical history, Biblical literature, and theology. In 1824 he was chosen professor of languages in Cincinnati College, Ohio, which position he held until 1855, when he accepted a call as pastor of a church in Roches-educated at St. Leonard’s College. He deserves our notice, first, for his Religio Stoici, or a short Discourse upon several Diæmes and Moral Subjects (1663); his Moral Essay upon Solitude (1663); and his Moral Gal-lac, which was his last work. A second point of connection with the government of Charles II as criminal prosecutor in the memorable days of the Covenant.

By his severity in this position he earned for himself the ugly name of the “blustering Mackenzie,” nor, we fear, can it be disproved—in spite of his liberal antecedents—that he became the bitter instrument of the most unutterable malice. He has, however, written a defense of himself, entitled A Vindication of the Government of Charles II. After the Revolution Sir George retired to Oxford. He died in London May 2, 1691. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Aut.

k. ii., 1175, where many references are to be found.

Mackey, James Love, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., Jan. 26, 1830. His early educational privileges were few, but, being fond of study, he struggled hard to qualify himself for teaching. When fourteen years old he opened a school in his father’s house; subsequently he taught public school in the neighborhood, attended Hopewell Academy and New London Academy, Pa. He graduated in the latter. He entered the seminary at Princeton, N. J., resolved to do work in foreign missions. In 1849 he called for Corisco Island. In April of 1851 he founded the Evangelical Mission, after surmounting many obstacles. In June of 1853 he returned to his home and soon after became principal of the academy at New London, Pa. He died April 30, 1867. Mr. Mackey was a man thoroughly qualified for missionary labors; his mental training, varied and accurate information, and scientific attainments, prepared him for the great work.

Mackie, Josias, one of the earliest Presbyterian ministers who came to America, was born in Donegal County, Ireland. The year of his arrival in this county is uncertain, but the first notice hitherto found of him bears date June 22, 1622. His first settlement appears to have been on the Elizabeth River, Va., where in all probability he became the successor of Francis Mackenzie, the first regular Presbyterian minister in America. After a formal oath in 1629, made publicly, and in confirmation of his belief in the Articles of Religion, as allowed in the case of Dissenters, he was licensed by the General Assembly of Virginia. In distraction with his family and their property, many miles apart, on Elizabeth River. These were in the Eastern Branch, in Tanneur’s Creek precipitous, and in the Western Branch, to which was added, in 1636, the Southern Branch. Here, with the care of a farm and a store, he found time to preach, but the record of his labors has not yet been discovered.

Sprague, Annals, iii., 5.

Mackintosh, Sir James, one of the most celebrated literary characters of the 19th century, distinguished alike as a philosopher, jurist, statesman, and historian was born at Auldburne, in the county of Inverness, Scotland, October 24, 1755. His early instruction and training fell in the wake of his grandfather’s a man of great excellence. In 1783 he entered King’s College, Aberdeen, where he formed an intimate acquaintance with the celebrated Robert Hall—a happy association which told upon the whole career of Mackintosh. He was then in the growth of his manhood and had great hopes which were never realized. As a student, Hall’s society and conversation had on his mind. They lived in the same house, were constantly together, and led each other into controversies on the most abstruse points of theology and metaphysics. By their fellow-students they were regarded as the intellectual leaders of their class. He was a man of universal mind, being formed in King’s College, which was commonly designated "The Hall and Mackintosh Club." In 1784 he quitted King’s College as M.A., and removed to Edinburgh. His own inclinations were to the bar; family circumstances, however, obliged him to enter upon the study of medicine. But he by no means confined himself to his professional studies. "He mingled freely with the intellectual society of the place; divided his studious hours between medicine, metaphysics, and politics, including particularly the stirring controversy into its lighter literature and passing or pest controversies, and became a prominent speaker in the medical, physical, and speculative societies." Three years had been thus pleasantly spent when the time for his examination came, and, with diploma in hand, he turned southwards, and settled at London. It was a season of great political excitement when Mackintosh arrived in the great English metropolis, and, as the political arena was much more to his taste and inclination than walking the wards of a hospital, he improved the opportunity, and determined upon a study of the literary life. He supported himself for a while by writing for the newspapers, at the same time engaged in philosophical studies. In 1791 he finally published his Vindicia Gallicae, in reply to Burke’s Reflections on the French Revolution—a work which, though containing juvenile errors, at once gave him great renown; three editions were sold within the same year of its appearance before the public. “In sober philosophic thought, sound feeling, and common sense, it greatly surpassed the splendid philippic against which it was directed, and was enthusiastically lauded.” The leading statesmen of England, among them Fox, Sheridan, and Burke, made him an author’s friend, and when the “Association of the Friends of the People” was formed, he was appointed secretary. Encouraged by this success, he turned to the legal profession in 1798, was called to the bar in 1796, and attained high eheminence as a forensic lawyer. In 1790 he delivered a course of lectures on the Law of Nature and of Nations before the benches of Lincoln’s Inn, which were attended by audiences of the most brilliant description.

Later he was made recorder of Bombay, and in 1806 was appointed judge of the Admiralty Court. His Indian career was already credited to the fame and honorable to his character. After his return to England he entered Parliament as Whig member for Nairn (1818).

In 1818 he accepted the professorship of law in the college of Hallebury, continuing, however, to take an active part in the political affairs of his country, as the representative of Knaresborough in the nation’s council. In 1822, and again in 1828, he filled the honorable position of lord-rector of the University of Glasgow.

In 1828, his great attainments as a philosopher were acknowledged by the selection of him to contribute to Hart’s unfinished dissertation on the “Progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Political Philosophy since the Revival of Letters in Europe” for the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Sir James Mackintosh (he was knighted in 1803) at once set to work, and in 1830 completed his part of the task, entitled Dissertations on the Progress of Mathematics during the 18th and 19th Centuries. Unfortunately, however, his professional and other duties, as well as sickness, had prevented him from treating the subject as carefully and completely as he might have desired, and so far curtailed the original plan that a survey of political philosophy and the history of the ethical philosophy of the Continent were left unnoticed.

But, “notwithstanding these deficiencies,” says our distinguished late countryman, Alexander H. Everett (N. Am. Review, xxxv, 451), “it will be read with deep interest by students of moral science, and by all who take an interest in the higher departments of intellectual research, or enjoy the beauties of elegant language applied to the illustration of ‘divine philosophy.’ It gives us, on an important branch of the most important of the sciences, the reflection of one of the noblest minds that are drawn by original research and patient study to probe it to the bottom.” See the article Etrucian in vol. iii, p. 822 sq. He died May 22, 1822.

We have thus far sketched the life of Sir James Mackintosh somewhat more in detail than the limited space of our Cyclopedia really warrants, in order to enable our readers fully to appreciate the valuable services of this master-mind in the department of philosophy, not only so far as they were exerted directly, but also indirectly. It is not without reason that his distinguished friend Robert Hall said "that if Sir James Mackintosh had enjoyed leisure, and had exerted himself, he would have completely outdone Jeffrey and Stewart, and all the metaphysical writers of our time." (John S. Mill's "History of the English People," 1849, pp. 340, 341.) Neither can we afford to pass hastily by the man whom so eminent an authority as Morell (Hist. and Crit. View of the Speculative Philosophy of Europe in the 19th Century [N.Y., 1849, 8vo], p. 405) points out as one of the most eminent moralists of our day. "The ardent spirit, the depth, and the learning," says Morell, "with which he combated the selfish system, pleased for the authority and sanctity of the moral faculty in man, contributed perhaps more than any single cause, not of a religious nature, to oppose the bold advances of utilitarianism, and infuse a healthier tone into the moral principles of the country. Without signifying our adherence to his peculiar theory respecting conscience [viz. "that conscience, or the moral faculty, is not an original part of our constitution, but a secondary formation," created at a later period of life by the effect of the association of the result of a variety of elements existing in the mind] (compilation of M'Cosh, Intuitions of the Mind, p. 239)," we still regard his thoughts and speculations as taking eminently the right direction, and had he obtained leisure to mature his views, and give them to the world in his own forcible style, it is the opinion of the best able to judge upon the subject (e.g., Robert Hall and J. D. Chalmers) that he would have placed the whole theory of morals upon a higher and more commanding position than it had ever occupied before in this country [England]."

Besides this work on Ethical Philosophy (re-published Philad. 1834, 8vo), Mackintosh wrote the chief portion of his history or antiquities of the Jews. The theology of them is what is called moderately orthodox. For these his valuable services to sacred literature Dr. Macknight received the rewards in the power of the Presbyterian Church to give. The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by the University of Edinburgh. In 1798 he was removed from Maybole to the more desirable parish of Jedburgh, and in 1772 he became one of the ministers at Edinburgh. Here he continued for the remainder of his life, useful in the ministry and an ornament of the Church. He died Jan. 18, 1800. Of Dr. Macknight's translation of the epistles, universally regarded as his best production, Home says that it is "a work of theological labor not often paralleled. If we cannot always coincide with the author in opinion, we can always praise his learning, and his piety; qualities which confer no trifling rank on any scriptural interpreter or commentator." Dr. W. L. Alexander, however, is not quite so commendatory of Dr. Macknight's scholarship: "This work, which was the result of thirty years' labor, soon obtained and kept a high reputation. Of late years it has perhaps sunk into unremitted neglect, for there is much in it well deserving the attention of the Biblical student. Its greatest defects are traceable to two causes—the author's imperfect knowledge of the original languages of the Bible, and the want of fixed and systematical principles. In tracing out, however, the common ground, and suitable passages, especially of an argumentative kind, he often shows great ability." See Life, by his son, prefixed to the Epistles (in the editions since 1806); Kittto, Cyclop. a. v.; English Cyclop. a. v. and a very imperfect translation of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History.

MACLAY, ARCHIBALD, D.D., or, as he was familiarly known by Christians of all denominations, "Father Maclay," a noted Baptist minister, was born in Killearn, Scotland, May 14, 1778, and in 1802 entered the ministry at Kirkaldy, in Fifeshire. In 1804 he was appointed a missionary to the East Indies, but the government objected to his being a Baptist and he was obliged to stay. By advice of his friends he quitte his native land, and in 1805 emigrated to this country. Immediately after his arrival he commenced to preach, and built up a Church in Rose Street, New York. Hitherto his connection was with the Established Church of Scotland, but in 1806 he united with the Baptists, and, most of his congregation following his example, a new Church was organized, known as the "Mulberry Street Church" (now the Tabernacle, Second Avenue Church), where he remained until 1857. He then resigned to become agent of the "American and Foreign Bible Society" just organized, and served this body to great advantage until 1850, when he was called within the domain of his own denomination to succeed the late Dr. Cone as the second president of the "American Bible Union." In this capacity he made an official tour of England, presenting the circulation of the Bible Union and collecting funds for the revision of the Bible, in which work that society is now engaged. In this mission he was very successful, owing, no doubt, to his fame as an eminent Baptist divine. One of the addresses made while abroad was translated into several languages and circulated in more than 100,000 copies. On his return to this country he made a similar tour South, and with his usual success. In 1856 he resigned his presidency of the Bible Union on account of dissatisfaction with the manner in which the internal affairs of the Bible Union were conducted. He continued to preach and labored for his Master till within a few months of his death, May 2, 1860. Dr. Maclay enjoyed the respect of his brethren in the ministry, and the affection of all Christian people who knew him. He was surpassed by no man in zeal, friendliness, and goodness. He was a safe counsellor, a cherubic, hearty, healthy soul, as incapable of cant as of frivolity. It was evident to all who approached him that he was a man as well as a clergyman. He retained to the last that strong, holy, Scottish common-sense which renders the sons of old Scotia indomitable and victorious all the world over. A man of moderation and immoveable honesty never breathed. (J. H. W.)

Maclean, Archibald, an English Baptist minister, was born May 1, 1738 (O. S,), at East Kilbride, in Lanarkshire. He was for many years pastor of the Baptist Church in Edinburgh, and was founder of the Baptist congregations in Scotland. He died in Edinburgh Dec. 12, 1812. Mr. Maclean published Paraphrase and Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Edinb. 1811-17, 2 vols. 12mo; Lond. 1819, 2 vols. 12mo; Aberdeen, 1847, 2 vols. 12mo). A collective edition of Maclean's works, including the above work, sermons, etc., with a memoir of his life and writings by W. Jones, was published (Lond. 1829, 6 vols.; vol. viii, 1852, 18mo; Edinb. 6 vols. 12mo). — Kitto, Cyclopedia of Biblical, Lit. vol. ii., s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, s. v.

Maclellan, James, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, a native of Scotland, came to the United States in early manhood, furnished with a good classical education. He had been brought up in the bosom of the Established Church of Scotland, and fully believed all its doctrines, but, owing to his Calvinistic views, had given himself no personal concern about his salvation. He was, however, awakened and convicted of sin, and in 1817 joined the Methodists, and, feeling it to be his duty to preach the Gospel, entered the Mississippi Conference Dec. 8, 1840. He took position at once in the Conference on account of his educational advantages. His first appointment was Jackson Station, then he preached in Lake Washington country, on the Mississippi River, and in 1849 was elected secretary of the Conference. For several years following he located; from 1863 to 1867 he was presiding elder of the Granville District, and in 1865 he was elected a delegate to the General Conference held in New Orleans in 1866. At the close of his life, in 1870, he was supernumerary on the Lake Lee and Leota Circuit. "Brother Maclellan was a man of strong character, a simple-hearted Christian, dearly loved the Church of his choice, and literally laid his life ‘living sacrifice upon her altar.'" — Minutes of the M. E. Church South, 1870.

Macnab, Hugh, D.D., an Irish divine of note, was born in 1758, at Ballinrobe, in the county of Antrim, Ireland; was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he received both the degree of A.M. and D.D. and also the appointment of canon of Chester. In 1822 he married the daughter of Dr. Magee, late archbishop of Dublin, in whose family he had been tutor. After preaching for some years in London, where he attracted large congregations, chiefly at Charlotte-Street Chapel, Fitzroy Square, he became pastor of the London Church of St. Jude's, Liverpool, and of St. Paul's, Prince's Park, near Liverpool. In 1808 he was made dean of Ripon. He died in 1872. He published The Church and the Churches, or the Church of God in Christ militant here on Earth (1817, 12mo). — Lectures on the Church of England (12mo). — Lectures on the Prophecies of the Jews (1842, 12mo). — Lectures on the Sympathies, etc., of our Saviour (12mo). — Letters on Seceding from the Church (12mo). — Sermons on the Second Advent (12mo). — Deventer Sermons (12mo). He also published several separate sermons, addresses, and controversial pamphlets.

Macnay, Councils of (Concilia Maiorum), Ecclesiastical councils held in this city of Bur- gundy in 584 and 585. At the former there were enactments to regulate the clerical dress, and forbidding Jews to appear in the streets from Maundy Thursday until Easter Monday; at the latter, which over Pius, archbishop of Lyons, presided, enactments were passed — memorial in the history of the Church — on the conduct of the laity towards the clergy. Among other things, it was required that whenever one of the laity met and saw the clergy in the public streets, the former should make a lowly and reverent bow; if both parties are on horseback, then the laityman should take off his hat; but if the laityman be on horseback and the clergyman on foot, the former is to dismount and make his obeisance. See Riddle, Hist. ofPopes, I., 240; Landow, Mom. Councils, I., 966-9.

Macrobius, an ecclesiastical writer, flourished in the first half of the 4th century. He was a preacher in the Church in Africa after Gennadius became entangled in the Donatist heresy, and as a Donatist bishop secretly laborated at Rome one time. Before his separation from the orthodox he composed a discourse, Ad confessorum et virginitates, in which he insisted principally upon the beauty and the sanctity of chastity. After his union with the Donatists he addressed a letter to the laity of Carthage, De Passione Maximianus et Jusici Donatitarum (published by Matillon, *Analecta * [Paris, 1875], v. 119, and *Chrest. * [Paris, 1700], Amasya Thursday May, 1702). — Hefner, Nouv. B. Générale, xxiii, 307.

Maçon (Masquer, i.e. long-beard; Vulg. Macer), the surname of Polumeneus or Poulomee, the son of Dory- menes (1 Macc. iii, 38), and governor of Cyprus under Ptolemy Philometor (2 Macc. x, 12).

Macurdy, Eliza, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Carlisle, England, Oct. 15, 1873. Miss, she educated at the Academy of Cannonsburg, and was licensed by the Pres- bytery of Ohio about 1799. His first labors were as a missionary in the regions bordering on Lake Erie.
June, 1800, he was ordained and installed pastor of the united congregations of Cross Roads and Three Springs. During this connection he had an important agency in the revival in Western Pennsylvania, and was one of those who formed the "Western Miss. Society." In 1809 he went on a mission to Maine, and on his return he was obliged, from ill health, to resign his charge of the church of Three Springs, and confine himself to that of Cross Roads. He died July 22, 1845. See Sprague, Amula, iv, 241.

MacWhorter, Alexander, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, born in Newcastle County, Delaware, July 15, 1788, went on a mission to Maumee, Ohio, in 1797, settled near Newark in 1798; was employed as a missionary to North Carolina in 1764-6; was chaplain to Knox's Brigade in 1778; settled in Charlotte, N. C., in 1779, but removed in 1780 to Newark, N. J., where he preached until his death, July 20, 1807. In 1786 he was prominent in settling the Confession of Faith and forming the Constitution of the Presbyterian Church. The degree of D.D. was conferred on him by Yale College in 1776. See Sprague, Amula, iii, 208 sq.

Madagascar, an island situated to the south-east of the African continent, in lat. 11° 57'—25° 38' S., and longitude about 43°—51° E.; length, 1600 miles; greatest breadth, 770 miles; area estimated at 540,000 square miles; before covering a territory inhabited by the ancient Malagasy people. The French, in 1862-63, contains a population of nearly five millions.

History up to the Introduction of Christianity.—The early history of this interesting island is involved in the deepest mystery. It is supposed to have been known to the Greeks, but it was generally considered as an appendage to the main land, and was probably discovered by the Phoenicians. As an island, we find it first mentioned by Marco Polo, in the 13th century, as Magascar or Madagascar; but its discoverer is now admitted to have been the Portuguese Antao Goncalves, who named it Isla de Sao Lourenco. The unhealthy climate made the stay of Europeans for a long time impossible. In 1774, Europeans attempted to establish a colony at Antongil Bay, on the eastern side of the island; it was mainly composed of Frenchmen; but, failing to receive encouragement and assistance from the French government, the settlement proved a failure. With the Christian missionaries (1816), skilful mechanics and tradesmen entered Madagascar, and to-day the island contains, in spite of its unhealthy climate, quite a number of Europeans.

The natives consist of many tribes, of which the Hovas inhabit the central and northern portion of the island, and are at present so powerful as to hold in subjection most of the others. The features of the inhabitants of this section present a striking resemblance to those of the South Sea Islanders; they are evidently of different extraction from the other and darker tribes, whose features are wholly African. The men are generally well made, having finely-proportioned limbs, and usually present a high type of physiological development. The women are well formed and active, but by no means so prepossessing in feature as the other sex. The complexion of the Hovas is a ruddy brown or tawny color, while that of the other tribes is much darker. Another and very peculiar distinction is the long, straight hair of the former as compared to the woolly growth of their neighbours. The principal article of dress in use among the Hovas is a gable, a garment worn by Romans, and made of cotton or linen materials.

The religion of these natives, not converts to Christianity, is strictly heathen. Mohammedanism never made its way to them, and has not converts among them. Aside from African heathens, there are no native religionists in Madagascar. The Supreme Being they style * Fragrant Prince.* Their ideas of a future state, and, indeed, their whole religious system, is indefinite, discordant, and puerile; it is a compound of heterogeneous elements, borrowed in part from the superstitious fears and practices of Africa, the opinions of the ancient Egyptians, and the prevalent idolatrous systems of India, blended with the usages of the Malayan Archipelago. There are no public temples in honor of any divinity, nor any order of men exclusively devoted to the priestly or the prophetical. The keeper of idols receives the offerings of the people, prescribes their requests, and pretends to give the responses of the god. They worship also at the grave or the tomb of their ancestors (Newcomb, p. 321). They practice circuminscence, have the division of weeks into seven days, abstain from swine's flesh, and follow other Jewish practices. Marriage is general, but polygamy prevails, and conjugal fidelity scarcely exists among the non-Christianized.

Introduction of Christianity.—In 1816, Radama, the king of the Hovas, virtually even then the prince of all Madagascar, entered into diplomatic and commercial relations with the English. Only two years later—In 1818—Protestant missionaries set out for it, and ultimately this African isle became one of the countries where the rapid and easy triumph of Christianity equals the most brilliant episodes in the history of Christian propaganda, and a lasting rebuke to those Roman Catholics who have dared to pronounce Protestant missions a failure. The first Protestant missionaries were sent out by the London Missionary Society, and their mission, from the beginning, was very successful. The whole Bible was circulated in the native language; and it is said that about ten thousand persons received Christian instruction. Suddenly, however, Radama died (July 7, 1828), and was succeeded by Ranavala Manjakana, a woman of great cruelty, and inimical to Europeans. With her accession to the throne of Madagascar opened a fierce ordeal of persecution, lasting for nearly thirty years. Europeans were banished from the isle; the public profession of Christianity was forbidden; churches and schools were closed, and many of the members of the churches were persecuted to death. The conduct of the converts was most exemplary; by their constancy, and many by their death, they refuted the slanders of Romanists that the converts of the Protestant mission churches consist, for a large part, of men who seek to obtain a lucrative position. In 1842 queen Ranavala Manjakana died, and her son was proclaimed king under the title of Radama II. With his accession to the throne of Madagascar the period of religious toleration commenced, and, although for a moment the assassination of the king (in 1863; he was strangled, and his own wife selected as his successor, the government having been modified in its governmental form) appeared to have modified the Christians, the missionaries of the London Society resumed their labors, and they were agreeably surprised in seeing that, in spite of all persecution, the Christian congregations had maintained themselves. In 1867, the erection of four memorial churches on places where the first martyrs of Christianity fell a prey to heathen superstitions of Madagascar was projected; three of these have already been completed, and the fourth is in progress. (See Christian Advocate, Nashville, Tenn., Dec. 2, 1871.) But the greatest triumph the Gospel achieved in Madagascar was the conversion of Queen Ranavala II. She was succeeded by her cousin, Queen Ranavalo II (she succeeded to the throne April 1, 1868), and, with her, a majority of the natives, threw away their idols, and embraced Christianity much in the same way as the ancient Britons did centuries ago. See the Missionary Advocate (N. Y., Feb. 15, 1868).

Among those particularly worthy of mention are those who conceived the idea of sending rendered in the missionary efforts in Madagascar, is the Rev. William Ellis (died in July, 1872). By years of missionary labors performed in the South Sea Islands he had become thoroughly acquainted with the missionary work; and when the death of Ranavalo Manjakana, Madagascar seemed again open to the Europeans, he was selected by the London Missionary Society to visit the country, in company with Mr. Cameron, in order to ascertain the actual condition of things, with a view to resuming missionary labour. The manner in which Mr. Ellis conducted the most delicate negotiations with the government of Madagascar, so as to secure an entrance for the Christian teachers to the country, and the influence he exerted in high places, are well known to all persons acquainted with modern missionary enterprise. He left the land of Madagascar, always on important missions, and always with signal success. He went before, and prepared the way for those who have gone in and occupied the field. On each occasion of his return to England he had marvellous things to tell of Madagascar and the prospects that were opening up to the church of Christ. His Majesty's Church of Madagascar, Madagascar Revised (London, 1867, 8vo), and Three Visits to Madagascar, give a history of that mission-field which leaves nothing to be desired (compare, however, Westminster Rev. April, 1867, p. 249). It was he, too, who completed and revised the translation of the Scriptures into the Madagascan language.

The number of Christians in Madagascar is now estimated at more than 325,000. In 1888, the English missionaries (Episcopalians, Methodists, and Friends) who have been here more than 30 years, resident, or during a part of their time, in the island of Mauritius (an English possession), had in operation 924 schools, attended by 98,388 pupils. The Roman Catholics have, since 1861, missionaries (Jesuits) in the island, and they are mainly at the capital, Tamatave, and vicinity, and in the French possessions, the adjoining islands, and the coast. Mada'ei (Heb. Medo'y, "sage, Sept. Medoi", Gen. x, 2, a Midean "q. v.", as elsewhere rendered), the third son of Japhet (Gen. x, 2), from whom the Medes, etc., are supposed to have descended. R.C. pont. 2514. See Erran-troct.

Madan, Martin, an Anglican divine, was born near Hertford, England, in 1726. He first studied law, but finally entered the ministry, and was for a number of years chaplain to the Lock Hospital, London. He died in 1790. Mr. Madan gained great notoriety by a work which he published in 1780, entitled The History of Female inns, etc.; a treatise on female inns, in which he sturdily advocated the practice of polygamy. The pamphleteer which his work elicited he replied to in a number of tracts. Madan's object in advocating polygamy was the removal of seduction. He was quite a pupilator; several of his sermons have been published.—Allibone, Diet. of Brit. and American Authors, vol. ii, s. v.; Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliog., ii, 1920.

Madan, Spencer (1), D.D., an Anglican prelate, was born about the middle of the 18th century; became bishop of Bristol in 1792, and of Peterborough in 1794. He was born in 1719. Bishop Madan published several occasional Sermons (London, 1792, 8vo, and often, and a translation of Grotius's De Veritate Christiane Religionis (1781-83, 1815). See Gentlemen's Magazine, 1837, i, 296.

Madan, Spencer (2), D.D., an English divine, son of the preceding, was born in 1759; was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge; was rector first of Islington, Leicestershire, and later of Thorp, in Staffordshire. He was also chaplain for the king about thirty years, and prebend of Peterborough. He died in 1836. He published several sermons.

Madeira (a Portuguese word signifying wood, and given because of the unusual abundance of timber) is an island in the North Atlantic Ocean off the W. coast of Africa, in lat. 32° 43' N., long. 17° W., with an area of 345 sq. miles, and a population in 1865 of 125,841, and belongs to Portugal. It constitutes a part of a group of islands sometimes called "the Northern Canaries," which were discovered in 1419. The coasts of Madeira are steep and precipitous, rising from 200 to 2000 feet above sea-level, comprising few bays or landing-places, and deeply cut at intervals by narrow gorges, which give to the circumference the appearance of having been worn away by use, and many of them are so low as to make ships in danger of being drowned. Hence the name Tinta, from the Portuguese word tinta, which signifies "ink," given because of the height of 5000 feet; its highest point, the Pico Ruivo, is 6050 feet high. It is of volcanic origin, and slight earthquakes occasionally occur. The lower portions of the island abound in tropical plants, as the date-palm, plantain, sweet potato, Indian corn, coffee, sugar-cane, pomegranate, and cheyela. The flowers are very beautiful, and the trees are somewhat cultivated, but the country has until lately been mainly devoted to the cultivation of the vine and sugar-cane. Funchal, with a population of 25,000, is both the capital and port of the island. The climate is remarkable for its constantness. There is only a difference between the temperatures of summer and winter, the thermometer in Funchal showing an average of 74° in summer and of 64° in winter. At the coldest season the temperature is rarely less than 60°, while in summer it seldom rises above 78°; but sometimes a waft of the Mediterranean current makes the thermometer rise to 82°. The inhabitants of Madeira are of a mixed race, principally of Portuguese, Moorish, and negro blood. "They are meagre, sallow, and short-lived, which is attributed to their want of wholesome food [the poorer classes chiefly subsist on the eddic-root, sweet potatoes, and chestnut], a life of drudgery, and an unhealthy climate, and the dissipation of the air." The Roman Catholic Church is the established religion of Madeira, and until recently none other was tolerated. In 1839, Dr. Kelley, a physician, began to disseminate Protestant doctrines, and ultimately the Scotch Church took up the work most successfully begun by Dr. Kelley. The spirit of persecution, so general in Roman countries, was not wanting here, and there was great opposition to Protestantism. The first missionary to the island was the Rev. W. Hewitson, who arrived there in 1845, but for a long time the opposition of the government was so severe that he was obliged to confine his labours mainly to Dr. Kelley's converts. So uncomfortable were natives who chose the Protestant communion, that in 1846 some 800 of them left for Trinidad and for the United States. At present the Protestants have quite a hold on the country. Besides the Scotch Church, there are other places of worship, including a Presbyterian Church in connection with the Free Church of Scotland. The educational institutions comprise the Portuguese College, and Lancasterian and government schools. Mâdhava is one of the names of the deity Vishnu (q. v.) in Hindu mythology and in Sanskrit poetry.

Mâdhavachârya (i. e. Mâdhava, the Achârya or spiritual teacher), one of the greatest Hindu scholars and divines of the medieval literature of India, is said to have been born at Pampa, a village situated on the bank of the river Tungabhadra, probably near the beginning of the 14th century. He was prime minister of Sangama, the son of Kampa, whose reign at Vijayanagara commenced about 1336, and also under king Bukka I, who succeeded Harihara I about 1361. He died at the age of ninety, probably towards the close of the 14th century. Mâdhavachârya is famed for his dedication to teaching and important works on Vedâ, philosophical, legal, and grammatical writings of the ancient Hindus. The most important of these are his great commentaries on the Rig-ya, Tâjâr, and Sâma-veda [see Veda]; an exposition of the Mimamsâ philosophy; a summary account of fifteen religious and philosophical systems; a diffusely written treatise, with some treatises on the Vedânta philosophy; another on salvation; a history of Sankara's (q. v.) polemics against multifarious misbelievers and heretics; a commentary on Panisera's code of law; a work on detements, time especially, in reference to the observation of religious acts; and a grammatical commentary on Sanscrit radicals and their derivatives. The chief performance of Madhava is doubtless the series of his great commentaries on the Vedas, for without them no conscientious scholar could attempt to penetrate the secret and esoteric meaning of the ancient Hindu works. In these commentaries Madhava labors to account for the grammatical properties of Vedic words and forms, records their traditional sense, and explains the drift of the Vedic hymns, legends, and rites. So great was Madhavachar yearning of the learned and wise Dandin, that popular superstition as signed them a supernatural origin. He was supposed to have received them from the goddess Bhuvaneshwart, the consort of Siva, who, gratified by his incessant devotions, became manifest to him in a human shape, conferred on him the gift of extraordinary knowledge, and changed his name to Vedagriga (the "Forest of Learning"), a title by which he is sometimes designated in Hindu writings.

Madison, JAMES, D.D., an early Episcopal prelate in America, was born near Port Republic, Rockingham County, Va., Aug. 27, 1749; passed A.B. in the College of William and Mary in 1772; was soon after admitted to the bar, which he abandoned for the ministry; in 1778 became professor of mathematics in his alma mater; in 1775 proceeded to England for ordination, was licensed for Virginia, but on his return resumed his duties as professor in his alma mater, of which he became president in 1777. He afterwards revisited England to see Cavollo and other scientific men. In 1784 he was changed to the chair of natural and moral philosophy.
In 1786 he was chosen bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia, and in 1790 was consecrated in England. Under his care the College of William and Mary advanced steadily in reputation. He discharged his duties with zeal and fidelity until his death, March 6t 1812. In his theological bishop Madison was much of a rationalist, and is charged by bishop Cocks (A.M. Ch.
Rec. Jan. 1872, p. 36 and 46) with having given "something which was essentially a negative element" to the vigorous spirit in the Church. He published some Sermons, Letters, and Addresses; also A Eulogy on Washington (1800).

Madman. See MADNESS.

Madmam'nah (Hebrew Mad'mamnah, mad'manah: Sept. Melchymi and Malchymi v. r. Marcymi and Bi; Vulg. Medemen and Madmena), a town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv, 31, where it is mentioned between Ziklag and Sansannah), where it is included in the territory afterwards assigned to Simeon.
From 1 Chron. ii. 45, it appears to have been founded or, rather, occupied by Shaphi (or perhaps by a son of his whose name it bore), the son of Caleb's concubine Maachah. Eusebius and Jerome identify it with a town of their time called Menois (Menwu), near the city of Gaza (Onomast. p. 89). See MADMENAH.

MADMENNAH. Instead of Madmannah and Sansannah of Josh. xv, 31, the parallel passage (Josh. xix. 5; comp. 1 Chron. iv, 81), enumerating the Simeonith cities, has BETH-MARCA-NAITH and Hazar-susim, probably the same respectively (Kell's Joshua, ad loc.). Schwarz thinks (Palestine, p. 101) that it was the Levitical city Madithah, in which, according to the words of Josh. xxiv. 15, the body of Jasher," was buried, but this locality is wholly apocryphal.
The first stage southward from Gaza is now el-Menid (Robinson, Resources, i. 568), which, in default of a better, is suggested by Kiepert (in his Map, 1856) as the modern representative of Menois, and therefore of Madmannah. A more plausible identification, however, is that of Van de Vedele (Travelle, i. 180) of the modern ruined village Mirikl, west of the south end of the Dead Sea, as a representative of the ancient Beth-marcaboth.

Mad'men (Heb. Mad'men, mad'men, mad'mil; Sept.
Thi'ves v. r. Makobh, Malcbhm, and Malcbah; Vulg. silea; a Moabitish town, threatened with destruction by the sword of Am non the Babylonian invade-in connection with the neighboring Hebron (I. xvi.
2). Some (as Hitzig, after the Sept., Vulg., etc.) regard it as an appellative; and in some editions of the Auth.
Vts. it is actually printed "O madmen!" The slight notice only affords an approximate location opposite the northern extremity of the Dead Sea. See MADMEN.

Mad'menah (Heb. Mad'meneh, mad'mil, mad'mil; Sept. Mad'miyn, Vulg. Medemen), a town named in Isa. x, 31, where it is placed on the list of the Moa-bian invaders, in the northern vicinity of Jerusalem, between Nob and Gibeon. It has been confounded by Eusebius and Jerome with MADMENNAH, which is much too far southward to suit the context. Gesenius (He-braicae Linguae, ii. 267) calls it "one of the chief active-—Madmen flies, as, not, in the A. Vera, 'is removed' (so also Michaelis, Biblii fr Ungeliihrn). Mad-menah is not necessarily alluded to by Isaiah (xxv, 10) in his denunciation of Moab, where the word rendered in the Auth. Vts. 'dunghill' is identical with that name. The original text (or Kerib), by a variety of position ('77 for '77'), reads the ' waters of Madmenah.' If this is so, the reference may be either to the Mad-menah of Benjamin—one of the towns in the district abounding with corn and threshing-floors—or, more appropriately still, to MADMEN, the Moabitish town. Gesenius (Josants, p. 780) appears to have overlooked this, which might have been brought to his notice by the Suggestion that seems to have been first made by Joseph Kimchi.

Madness. The words rendered by "mad," "madman," "madness," etc. in the A. Vera, vary considerably in the Hebrew of the O. T. In Deut. xxviii, 29; 34; 1 Sam. xxi, 15, 14, 15, etc. (marim, etc., in the Sept.), they are derivatives of the root r36, mar, "to be stung or stung," and are used metaphorically. In Judges xxv, 16; i. 38; ii. 25; 1 Sam. xiv, 41; etc. (Sept. me'mod), from the root r365, kelal, "to flash out," applied (like the Greek philéther) either to light or sound; in Isa. xii, 25, from r365, sakel, "to make void or foolish" (Sept. memad), from six, 4, from r365, tamah, "to wander" (Sept. iemad).
In the N. T. they are generally used to render maroses or maria (as in John x, 20; Acts xxvi, 24; 1 Cor. xiv, 23; in but 2 Pet. ii, 16 the word is paraporia, and in Luke vii, 11, dvoun. The term is used in Scripture in its proper and full sense of a raving maus or demented person (Deut. xxvii, 84; 1 Sam. xxii, 13; John v, 39; 1 Cor. xiv, 23), and may be medically defined to be delirium without fever. Our Lord cured by his word several who were deprived of the exercise of their rational powers, as in Matt. x, 14 (the verb has the advantage from distemper of the bodily frame to augment evils endured by the patient is more than may be afirmed, though the idea seems to be not absolutely reglumant to reason (see Thomson, Unto and Book, i, 218).

Acts xxvi, 24, 25; from startling intelligence, Acts xii, 15; from preternatural excitement, Hos. ix, 7; Isa. xxiv, 1-8; from resistance of oppression, Eccles. vii, 1; from impiety, Jer. xxxv, 16; ii, 7; or simple fatuity, 2 Kings ix, 11; Jer. xxxii, 26, or from irregular and furious passion (e.g., as a persecutor, Acts xxvi, 11; Isa. cii, 8; from idolatrous hallucination, Jer. i, 88; or wicked and extravagant jollity, Eccles. ii, 2). In like manner, "suffumigatum" (Del pandermia, the Delphic pun) was translated into the xxviii, 28, and so "madman," 1 Sam. xxii, 20; Prov. xxvi, 18). But also a reckless state of mind (Eccles. x, 13), bordering on delirium (Zech. xii, 4), whether induced by overstrained intellectual efforts (Eccles. x, 17; in John vii, 10) or by the sheer collapse of overdrawn tempers (Eccles. vii, 25; i, 3; 2 Pet. ii, 6). David's madness (1 Sam. xxi, 13) is by many supposed not to have been feigned, but a real epilepsy or falling sickness; and the Sept. uses words which strongly indicate this sense (τραγωδίαν τραγούδημαν). It is urged in support of this opinion that the troubles which David underwent might very well weaken his constitutional strength, and that the force he suffered in being obliged to seek shelter in a foreign court would disturb his imagination in the highest degree. A due consideration, however, of the context and all the circumstances absolutely only serves to render the opinion the more tenable, that it was feigned for obvious reasons (see Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr., ad loc.). "It is well known that among Oriental, as among most semi-civilized nations, madmen were looked upon with a kind of reverence, as possessed of a quasi-sacred character (see Lane, Mod. Egs. i, 940). This arises partly, no doubt, from the feeling that one on whom God's hand is laid heavily should be safe from all other harm, but partly also from the belief that the loss of reason and self-control opened the mind to supernatural influence, and gave it therefore a supernatural sacredness. This belief was heightened by the enthusiastic expression of idolatrous worship (see 1 Kings xviii, 26, 28), and (occasionally) of real inspiration (see 1 Sam. xix, 21-24; comp. the application of 'mad fellow' in 2 Kings ix, 11, and see Jer. xxvi, 26; Acts ii, 18)."

Ma'adon (Heb. Ma'adon, בְּמַדְוָן, strf, as in Prov. xv. 18, etc.; Sept. Ma'dow v. r. Ma'admin, a Cannaanish city in the north of Palestine, ruled over by a king named Jobab in the time of Joshua, who captured it (Josh. xi. 1; xx, 19). Calmet (Dict. s.v.), arbitrarily conjecturing that Ma'mon is the true reading, refers to Maronos, a small village of Syria thirty miles east of Antioch (Jerome, It. Mal. 2), probably the place alluded to by Pсел (cf. Gen. 15, 22), and by Pseudo-Clasiticus. Schwartzer infers (Palest. p. 90, 173) from Rabbinic notices (chiefly a statement of the early Jewish traveller hap-parch in Asher's Benj. of Tudea, p. 480) that the site is that of the present Kefr Manda, a considerable village at the foot of the hills north of Diosmonea, containing a very deep well and some traces of antiquity, which Dr. Robinson (new ed. of Researches, iii, 103-111) is inclined to regard as marking the place of the Aschias of Josephus (Livy, 41, 45, 8; War, i, 4, 2; Ant. xiii, 12, 4), although admitting that the latter may be to be identified with Tell ed-Bedawiyeh, in the vicinage. "In the Sept. version of 2 Sam. xxi, 20, the Hebrew words מַדְוָן מַדְוָן: 'a man of stature,' are rendered divip Madow, 'a man of Madon.' This may refer to the town Madon, or may be merely an instance of the habit which these translators had of rendering literally in Greek letters Hebrew words which they did not understand. Other instances will be found in 2 Kings vi, 8; ix, 18; xii, 9; xv, 10, etc.

Ma'donna (Italian, My Lady), a term applied in the language of art to representations of the Virgin Mary. Such representations first made their appearance after the 5th century, when the Virgin was declared to be the mother of Christ; hence they assumed the form of "Madonna" in the West, the mother is generally full, oval, and of a mild expression; a veil adorns the hair. At first the lineaments of the Virgin's countenance were copied from the older pictures of Christ, according to the tradition which declared that the Virgin was of the same mother. A chronological arrangement of the pictures of the Virgin would exhibit in a remarkable manner the development of the Roman Catholic doctrine on this subject. The Madonna has been a principal subject of the pencils of the great masters. The greatest success has been achieved by Raphael (q.v.), in whose pictures of the Madonna there prevails now the loving mother, now the ideal of feminine beauty, until in that of St. Sixtus there is reached the most glorious representation of the "Queen of Heaven." Murillo's "Conception" also in the Prado, should be noticed here. See also Michelangelo. One of these has lately been presented to the American public in chromo by the American art publisher Prang, of Boston.

Among symbolic representations may be mentioned Mary with the white mantle, i.e., the mantle of love under which she receives the faithful; and the Virgin with the half-moon or with the globe under her feet, according to the meaning put upon the twelfth chapter of Revelation. The Virgin was never represented without the Child until comparatively recent times. See Mrs. Jamieson's delightful work, Legends of the Madonna (1856) (3d ed. London, 1891; ed. L. B. Macrae, 1868) (July), p. 130; Old and New, 1872 (April).

Madox, Isaac, D.D., an English divine, was born in London in 1687; was educated at one of the universities of Scotland, and at Queen's College, Cambridge; was successively curate of St. Bride's, domestic chaplain to Dr. Waddington, bishop of Chichester; rector of St. Vedast, in Foster Lane, London. In 1729 he was appointed clerk of the closet to the Queen Caroline; in 1733 became dean of Wells; in 1736, bishop of St. Asaph; was translated to the see of Worcester in 1748, and died in 1759. Dr. Madox published a number of Sermons (London, 1734-58), and a review of the first volume of Neal's Hist. of the Particulars, entitled A Vindication of the Government, Doctrine, and Worship of the Church of England established in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth (1738, 8vo).—Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Madras, one of the three presidencies of the Indian Empire, occupies the greater part of the south of the peninsula of Hindostan, including the coast lands, Malabar, the Laccadive Islands, and the Coromandel coast, in all coverage area of 189,856 square miles, with 31,672,613 inhabitants in 1865 (according to Behm, Geogr. Jahrbuch, 1870, eleven twelfths are Hindus, and some 80,000 adherents of Mohammedanism). The tributary states Mysoor, Cochin, Travancore, Puducotta, and Dijepur are a part of Madras; a part of the state is now included in our statistics of Madras. The capital of this presidency is a city of like name, and is situated on the Coromandel coast, the western shore of the Bay of Bengal, in lat. 19° 5' N. It stretches along the coast, with its nine suburbs, for nine miles, with an average breadth of three and one half miles. Its inhabitants number 403,948 (1887), among them about 50,000 native Christians. Madras was the first hold of the English secured by the occupation of Fort George (situated on the coast midway between the north and south extremities of the city) in 1693. It is now truly an Indo-European city. Like Calcutta and Bombay, it is a gathering-place for the missionaries of the different denominations and associations, and the basis for all missionary enterprise in southern India. Madras is the seat of the Anglican see of Madras, established in 1865. The missionary societies at work there are the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the "London Missionary Society," the "Church Missionary Society" (which started in 1805), the "Wesleyan Missionary Society," the "Church of Scotland," the "American Board," and the "Church of England." Its principal buildings and institutions are the Government House, a handsome edifice, though much inferior to the similar establishments in Calcutta, and even in Bombay; one of the finest light-houses in the world. The last-bolted watchtower of St. George, founded in 1818, a stately and beautiful edifice; a university, with tree European professors, and numerous teachers both European and native, and containing a valuble museum and a library; St. George's Cathedral, from which a magnificent view of the city and its vicinity may be obtained, and containing several monuments by Chantrey (including one of bishop Heber), and some figures by Flaxman. There are also male, military, and female orphan asylums, a medical school, a branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, the Madras Polytechnic Institution, the Government Museum, a mint, eight published Episcopal churches, among them a cathedral, besides numerous places of worship of other Christian denominations, and the Madras Club, to which members of the Bengal and Bombay clubs are admitted as honorary members.

Madrzzius, Christopheur, a Roman Catholic ec-clesiastic of note, was born at Bologna in 1512, and was elected bishop of the high-churches of St. Paul and Padua. He was ambassador of Ferdinand at Bologna, and in 1539 became prince-bishop of Trent. In 1534 the bishopric of Brixen was added to his livings. Later he became cardinal. He died in 1578. — Regensburg Real-Madura (1), an island in the Indian Ocean, the possession of the Netherlands, separated from Java by the north-east by the strait of Madura, contains about nineenty-seven square miles, and is inhabited by 768,724 people, who adhere either to the religion of Brahama, or are of the Mohammedan faith—about evenly divided. The remains of Hindu temples, however, would lead us to the belief that Hinduism was once the prevailing religion. As Java was, probably Brahmanism was crowded out by the inroads of the Mohammedans in the 14th century, when the Arabs invaded the country. Madura is governed by natives, tributary to the Netherlands, and is divided into three kingdoms. The products of the island, which are included in the trade-returns of Java (q. v.), are sugar, tobacco, indigo, cocoa-nut oil, edible birds' nests, etc.; but, owing to the extortions of the princes, agriculture is not flourishing.

Madura (2), a maritime district in the south of British India, in the presidency of Madras (q. v.), has an area of about 10,700 square miles, and a population of 1,730,000. Eastward from the shore runs a narrow ridge of sand and rocks, mostly dry, and which almost connects Ceylon with the continent. Cotton is the chief commercial crop; and sugar-cane, betel-nut, and tobacco are also grown. In this district the "American Board" begins its labours in 1845, and now sustains a very succcessful mission in fourteen stations. The Roman Catholics gained a strong hold here by the accommodation theory of Roberto del Nobilii the opening of the 18th century. A native, formerly a priest of Pondicherry, was established for Madura in 1840, and is in the care of the Jesuits, who recommended labors there in 1846.

The principal town is Madura, on the river Vyyat, with several noteworthy public buildings, and the seat of a Roman Catholic and a Protestant mission. Madura, in former days, was the capital of a kingdom, the centre of South Indian culture and learning. See Grondeirnann, Missions-Atlas, No. 14 and 15. See also INDIA.

Maffei, Bernard, a cardinal, and secretary of pope Paul III., was born at Bergamo in 1514, and died in 1588.

He wrote a commentary on Cicero's Letters, and some other works, which were highly esteemed in his time—Hertzog, Real-Encyklopaedie, viii. 660.

Maffei, Francesco Boscoponti de, a noted Italian scholar, known chiefly as a dramatic writer, was born at Verona June 1, 1675; studied at the Jesuit college of Parma, there led a literary life, went to Rome in 1688, and afterwards entered the army, and distinguished himself in the war of the Spanish Succession; resumed his literary pursuits, died Feb. 11, 1755. Resolved on the high merely literary productions, he wrote some theatrical works, such as Astoria theologica delldottrine, e delle opinioni corse ne, cinque priimi secoli della chiesa, et proposto della divina gratia, del libero arbitrio e della predettiszione, Tridenti, 1712; translated into Latin by the Jesuit Frederick Reisersen (Frankfurt, M., 1726); and Gienaniemino nuovo dimonistrato nelle conseguenze il medesimo (Venet. 1732). Among his works on morals, the most important is Della scienza chiamata curarellesca (Rom.
1728, and often), in which he condemns duelling. His De victoria principum (Verona, 1758) is a defence of the theatre as a moral institution. His collected works were published at Venice (1790, 18 vols. 8vo) —

Palleario (Rome, 1860, 2 vols. 8vo), vol. i and ii.

Maffei, Giovanni Pietro, a noted Italian Jesuit, was born at Bergamo about 1586; was for a time professor in the Collegio Grande in 1646 successor of the government at that place, and in 1655 joined the Jesuits, among whom he gained a great reputation. Brought to the notice of cardinal Henry, of Portugal, he was called to Lisbon. He died in Tivoli in 1603. Maffei wrote on the style J. P. de Lutecia Opera omnia Latina scripta prima in usum corum collecta (Venet., 1641, 2 vols. 4to).— Hertzog, Real-Encyklopaedie, viii. 660.

Maffei, Vespasian, an Italian priest, canon of St.
John of Lateran, was born at Lodi, in Lombardy, in 1407, and died at Rome in 1458. He enjoyed great reputation as a theologian and writer. His most important works were De sancto Ioanne Laterano, De clariis curnia studiis ac moribus (Paris, 1511). It was often reprinted, and was considered in its day one of the best on the subject of education. He also wrote Philolithes seu de omni veritate literaria et eruditionis dialogus De decretis religiosis; De quattuor hominum rebus secundis; also biographies of St. Bernard of Sienna, St.
Peter Celestine, Augustine and Monica, and a continuation of Virgil's Æneid in 18 vols., etc.—Hertzog, Real-Encyklopaedie, viii. 660.

Maffey, John Newland, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born of Episcopal parentage at Dublin, Ireland, Dec. 28, 1784; was destined for the mercantile profession by his parents, but, joining the Wesleyans in 1818, he determined upon the miniistry. Opposed by his friends and family at home, he emigrated to this country in 1819, and not long after his arrival became a member of the New England Conference. For two years he remained in the New England Conference, and then removed to New York, acting thereafter only as a local preacher, moving at his own discretion, and preaching and lecturing at such points as offered. In 1833, conjunction with Rev. Mr. Leffler, he was admitted to the New York Association, as the first member of The Methodist Societies (now The Chris-ian Advocate), the central organ of the Methodist Epis-copai Church South). In 1836–1837 he was agent for La Grange College, in Alabama, and subsequently was elected to the chair of elocution and belles-lettres in that institution, but he gave little attention to its duties, and the chair was soon discontinued. In 1841 he was chaplain of the lower house of Congress. His advent West and South-west was marked by a quickened religious interest in the popular mind. Vast assemblies gathered to hear him, and thousands, directly through his instrumentality, were added to the Church. Returning to New York, he became somewhat lax in his Church relations, and consequently lost his membership. In 1847 he removed to Arkansas, and there joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and was licensed to preach in 1848. At that time the frontier was a wide one, and there was a success small in comparison with his previous history, he left Arkansas for the Gulf cities. His last days were spent in carrying on a religious meeting in a small chapel of a suburban villa of Mobile, Ala. Public interest could no more be evoked by him who had been its master in the wilderness and in the city, as well as the street-preacher, the lecturer, or the camp-meeting leader. The spell was broken, or—the spirit of the man. He died suddenly, of heart rupture, near Mobile, May 28, 1850.

"Though amiable, he had the appearance of vanity, with some instruction; he was edified and drawn into gentleness, his zeal in the prosecution of his Master's cause and his boldness in the rebuke of so often waked up enemies. His social relaxations were thought by many to run into indiscretions and follies that marred his character and changed him in private life. See Sprague, A Manual of the American Pulpit, vol. vii.

Magalhaes, Gabriel de, a Portuguese missionary, was born at Pedrogao, near Coimbre, in 1609; was admitted to the "Society of Jesus" when only sixteen, and, desiring to enter the missionary work, departed for Goa, India, in 1634. On his way he stopped at Macao, and was led to make an extended tour through China, and so great became his interest in that country that he abandoned his intention of proceeding to India, and preached Christianity in the Chinese empire with zeal and apparent success. At first he was in favor at court, but fell into disfavor during the Christian persecutions, and barely saved his life. He died a peaceful death, May 6, 1677. He wrote several works on China. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxxi, 662.

Magalhaes, Pedro de, a Portuguese theologian, was born at Torres-Verdes about 1592; was for some time instructor in that university in the theology of the Dominican order to which he himself belonged; and died in 1677. He published De Scientia Dei (Lisbon, 1660, 4to).—De Predestinationem Exequiatione (ibid. 1667, 4to).—Lyons, 1664. De Voluntate et Tristitiae (ibid. 1669, 4to). He also left several valuable works in MS.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, vol. xxxii, s. v.

Magarita, Magarites, names given by some writers of the Middle Ages to the apostates from Christianity, especially to such as became Mohammedans. The origin of the name is unknown. See Du Cange, s. v.; Hennog, Rer. Expugnator. viii, 691; 871.

Magian. Described as (Hebrew Magian, 12:27, gathering Sept. Mayyâh, Vulg. Magie), a man whose descendants (so Clericus, ad loc., who compares the Persian name Mekechush, Herod. ii, 70, 160) to the number of 156 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 30). It is omitted in the parallel list (Neh. vii, 33, 34). Most interpreters regard it as the name of a place, probably in Persia, and if it is an appellation of a city, or of some of the closely associated names are those of localities in that tribe. But it was perhaps rather another form for that of the Mag-panah (q. v.) of Neh. x, 39, where some of the same names are mentioned in a similar connection.

Magdala (Maryyâh [v. r. Maryâh], prob. the Chahl. emphatic form of the Hebrew מגדלה, Magedla, a tower; see Paulus, Comm. ii, 837 sq.), a town in Galilee opposite the Sea of Tiberias (Otho, Loc. Rabb. p. 401). It is mentioned only in Matt. xv, 39, as a place to which Jesus repaired after having crossed the lake, "though the best MSS. (Sin. Var. 11) read Mar robotics; which Alford observes, 'appears to have been the original reading, but the better-known name Magdala was substituted for it.' It is not unusual, however, for Syrian villages to have two names, and for the same name to have different forms. The parallel passage in Mark viii, 10 has, on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, and Dalmanutha probably a village near it, for the whole shore of the lake was then lined with towns and villages. Eusebius and Jerome locate this place, which they call Magana, on the east of the Sea of Galilee, and they say there was in their day a district of Magedalensium, which is the old Latin version has Magana. In the 1st century this name is found on the map of Ptolemy (Geogr. ii, 10) for the east side of the lake (Life, p. 24), but the best MSS. read Gamala (Robinson, B. R. ii, 397; Josephus, by Hudson, ad loc.). Lightfoot places Magdala beyond Jordan, but his reasons are not satisfactory (Opera, ii, 418) (Kitto). Although it appears on the map of Ptolemy, though it has usually been located on the eastern (see Robinson's Researches, iii, 278; Strong's Harmony of the Gospels, § 70), is confirmed by the Jerusalem Talmud (compiled at Tiberias), which several times speaks of Magdala as being adjacent to Tiberias and Hamath, or the hot springs (Lightfoot, Chorog. Capit. 11, cap. xlii). It was a seat of Jewish learning after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the rabbis of Magdala are often mentioned in the Talmud (Lightfoot, l. c.). M. de Sauley, however, takes an opposite view on all these points (Narrative, ii, 455-457), as Pococke had done before (Magazines, ii, 71). In the Gospels it is alternatively referred to as the birthplace of Mary Magdalen, i. e. the Magdalene (q. v.), or of Magdala. A small modern village, bearing the name of Mejdel, is now found on the shore of the lake about three miles north by west of Tiberias, and the name and place area very strongly in favor of the conclusion that it represents the Magdalene of Scripture. It evidently (like the ancient town) derived its name from a tower or castle, and here Buckingham found the ruins of an old structure of this kind (Trav. i, 494). He speaks of it as being a small village close to the lake and built on a high hill, with remains of an old square tower, and some larger buildings of rude construction, apparently of great antiquity. "A large solitary thorn-tree stands beside it. The situation, otherwise unremarked, is dignified by the high limestone rock which overhangs it on the south-west, perforated with caves, recalling, by a curious though doubtless unintentional coincidence, the scene of Correggio's celebrated picture. These caves are said by Schwarz (p. 169)—though on no clear authority—to bear the name of Teline, i. e. Talmanah. 'A clear stream rushes past the rock into the sea, issuing in a tangled thicket of thorn and willow from a deep ravine at the back of the plain' (Stanley, S. and P. p. 392, 383). Jerome, although he plays upon the name Magdalene in somewhat broader allusions (in the text of the Vulgate, cf. 1 Chron. ii, 18), calls it Tebhum tam, or ebus singularum fœlici ac ardoris constantiam—does not appear to connect it with the place in question. By the Jews the word יְבָעַת is used to denote a person who platted or twisted hair, a practice then much in use among women of loose character. A certain 'Miriam Magdalen' is mentioned by the Talmudists, who is probably intended for Mary Magdalen. (See Otho, Loc. Zea.)

Magdalen, a surname regularly applied to one of the Marys in the Gospels, derived from her place of nativity or former residence, in order to distinguish her from the other Marys (Matt. xxxvi, 56, 61; xxxvii, 1: Mark xv, 40, 47; xvi, 1, 9; Luke viii, 2; xiv, 10; John xix, 25; xx, 1, 18). See MAGDALENE.

Magdalen, RELIGIOUS ORDER of, a denomination given to various communities of nuns, consisting generally of reformed prostitutes; sometimes also called Magdalenitates. They were established at Naples in 1824, at Paris in 1842, at Mentz in 1844, and at Rouen and Bordeaux in 1847. In each of these institutions there were three kinds of persons and congregations: (1) nuns proper and under vow, bearing the name of St. Magdalen; (2) the congregation of St. Martha, composed of those not yet fully avowed; (3) the congregation of St. Lazarus, composed of such as were detained by force. The Order of St. Magdalen at Rome was established by Pope Leo X. Clement VIII settled a revenue on them, and further appointed that the effects of all public prostitutes dying intestate should fall to them, and that the testaments of the rest should be invalid unless they bequeathed to them a portion of their effects, at least a fifth part. The term originated in the mistaken notion that Mary Magdalen, of whom we read in the Gospel, was a woman of bad character; a notion which is still very prevalent, notwithstanding the increased attention that has been given to the interpretation of holy Scripture. See MARY MAGDALENE.

Magdalena de Pazzi, a saint of the Romish Church, was born at Florence April 2, 1566. She belonged to one of the highest families in Tuscany: she was educated in the convent of the Hospitallers of Nuns of St. John of God, and was refused to marry, May 27, 1584, took the veil in the Carmelite convent of St. Mary of the Angels. Her name, hitherto Catherine de Gere de Pazzi, was now changed to Maria Magdalena. She became wild in her religious enthusiasm, claimed to have visions, and to hold converse with the angels, with the Virgin, and even with Christ himself. She filled divers offices in her convent, and died May 25, 1607. Pope Urban VIII in the same year beathed her, and in 1669 she was canonized by Alexander VII. Her biography was written by her confessor, and her works were collected by the Carmelites of Bologna (Ven. 1739). MAGGI

Maggi is the Latin form of the Greek term μαγγις, maggos, rendered "wise men" in Matt. ii, 1, 7, 16, and occurring in the singular, μαγγιον, with reference to Elymas (Acts xii, 6, 7). Compare the epithet Simon Magus. The term is still extant on the cuneiform inscriptions (see Olshausen, ad loc. Matt.). It corresponds to the Heb. מָגִי, Mag. The term magi was used as the name for priests and wise men among the Medes, Persians, and Babylonians. So the word Magi in our version of Jer. xxxxi, 8. In the plural, the proper name, properly signifies the prince magus or chief of the magi. While the priests and literati were known by the general name of magi, they were also known by the name of wise men, and likewise Chaldees (Is. xlix, 52; Jer. i, 56; Dan. ii, 12, 17; iv, 6, 18; v, 7, 6, 12, 15). To their number belonged the men of the zoroastrians and star-gazers (Is. lxvii, 18). So, also, the Chaldeans scribes and dream-interpreters either denote various orders of magi, or they are merely different names of the same general class (Dan. i, 20; ii, 2; x, 27; iv, 7; v, 7, 11). See Magician. In the following account of this important and interesting class, we supplement what we have elsewhere said upon the subject.

II. Etymology of the Name.—In the Pehlevi dialect of the Zend, mokh means priest (Hymn, Relig. Velt. Pers. c. 31); and this is connected by philologists with the Sanscrit mukhat (great, nityas, and mukh; Anquetil du Perron’s Zend-Verst., ii, 555). The coincidence of a Sanskrit root in the sense of illusion, magic,” is remarkable; but it is probable that this, as well as the analogous Greek word, is derived rather than the original meaning (comp. Eichhoff, Vergleichung der Sprachere, ed. Kaltischmidt, p. 231). Hyde (L. C.) notices another etymology given by Arabian authors, which makes the word = senet es (sea; ports), but rejects it. Prideaux, on the other hand (Connection, under B.C. 522), accepts it, and seriously connects it with the story of the pseudo-Smerdis who had lost his ears in Herod. iii, 69. Spanheim (Duba. Erzv. xviii) speaks favorably, though not decisively, of a Hebrew etymology.

II. Their Original Seat.—This name has come to us through the Greeks as the proper designation of the priestly class among the Persians (Herod. i, 182, 140; Xenoph. Cyr. viii, i, 23; Plato, Alcth. i, 122; Dioz. Lexr. Proc. i, 2; Cicero, De Divin. i, 41; Apol. Apul. p. 82 ed. Cusabo, p. 290 ed. Eumenhorst; Porphyry, De Abst. i, 2, ed. Deubner, s. v. Mokh, n. 1, as before). Properly, however, that Magism was originally a Persian institution, and it may be doubted if it in its original form it ever existed among the Persians at all.

The earliest notice extant of the magi is in the prophecies of Jeremiah (xxix, x, 15), where mention is made of Rab-mag, a term, which though regarded in the A.V. as a proper name, and as signs chief magus, under the analogy of such terms as ἱεροναῦς (chief shaman), ἱεραρχός (chief butler). (See below, § iv.) The Rab-mag of Jeremiah is the same as the Rab Sinna ‘al kol Chakahin (רבע סינא על כל חכאים) of Daniel (i, 48); the τῶν ἱερών ἑικαστικυμένων σὺν Βαβυλωνίων κολὼν Χαλαδίων of Diodorus Sic. (ii, 24); and the ἄρχως of the later Greek writers (Sosizomen, Hist. Ecl. i, 18). This indicates the existence among the Chaldeans of a magian institution, in a negro form, and as a recognized element in the state, at least as a period not later than 600 B.C. (J. Jer. i, 35, it is evident the same class that is referred to under the designation of the wise men of Babylon). In the time of Daniel we find the institution in full force in Babylon (Dan. i, ii, 12, 18, 24; iv, 5, 15; v, 7, 8). From him this class is divided into the men of the Ca-manum, exponents of sacred writings and interpreters of signs (i, 20; iii, 2, 4, 3); the Askhiphan, conjurors (iv, 10; v, 7, 11; comp. xlvii, 9, 12); the Mezakhiphan, sorcerers, soothsayers, and diviners (ii, 2; comp. Isa. xlvii, 9, 10; Jer. xvii, 9); the Gourian, casters of natal signs, and astrologists (ii, 27; v, 11, 13); and the Chaldeans in the narrow sense (i, 5, 10; iv, 4, 7, 7; compare Hengstenberg, Beiträge, i, 345 sqq.; Havernick, Comment ad. Daniel, p. 52; Gesenius, Thes. ad voc.).

So much was Magism a Chaldean institution that the term Chaldean became to be applied as a synonym for the class (Diod. Sic. ii, 29 sqq.; Strabo, xvi, 752; Dioz. Lexr. Proc. i, 2; Cicero, De Divin. i, 1; Curtius, Hist. iii, 3, 6; Josephus, War, ii, 7, 8; Aul. Gallius, xvi, 20, 2; Apuleius, Asin. ii, 229, etc.).

Whether Magism was indigenous in Chaldea, and was therefore advanced to the adjacent countries, or was carried by the Chaldeans from Assyria, is impossible now to determine with any certainty. In favor of its Assyrian origin it has been urged that the word zib is found as the name of the Assyrian fire-priest (Movers, i, 64, 240), and that the priests of the Assyrian Artemis at Ephesus were called Meg-Abyzi (Strabo, xiv, 641). But on this nothing can be built, as we find the syllable Meg or Mag occurring in names and titles belonging to other peoples, as Mag-Atar (fire-priest), the father of Artemis among the Phoenicians; Teker-Mag, Teker the Magus (on the mast), etc. While we cannot say that the Chaldean was the older nation, and that the Assyrians derived many of their religious beliefs and institutions from the Chaldeans (Rawlinson, Fire Great Monarchies, i, 308; ii, 228), the probability is that they derived the institution of the magi also from the Hebrew chazeret. This institution was originally Semitic is further confirmed by the Phoenician tradition preserved by Sanchoniathon (ap. Euseb. Prap. Exem. i, 10), that Magos was a descendant of the Titans, and, with his brother Aymunos, made men acquainted with villages and flocks. It must be confessed, however, that the word zib has no more obvious religious affinities in the Indo-European than in the Semitic tongues (see above, §); but this can hardly be allowed to weigh much against the historical evidence of the existence of the magi in Shemitic nations anterior to their existence among those of the Aryan stock.

That Magism was not, as commonly stated, a Persian institution, is shown from several considerations: 1. The word does not appear to have existed in the Zend language; at any rate, it does not occur in the Zend-Avesta. 2. The religious system of the ancient Persians was a system of Dualism, as the most ancient documents confirm; the Zend-Avesta, for example, in the statement of Zoroaster’s Hraotrods (i, 429), but with this Magism had no affinity. 3. In the Zend-Avesta, the Yaros, the practice of magical arts, is vehemently denounced, and men are enjoined to pray and present offerings against his arts, as an invention of the Devas. 4. Xenophon informs us (Cyr. viii, 1, 23) that the magi were first established in Persia by Cyrus (comp. also Ammian. Marc. xxiii, 6; Porphyry, De abstin. iv, 16, etc.), a statement which can be understood only, as Heeren suggests (i, 451 sq.), as intimating that the magian institute, which existed long before the time of Cyrus, was introduced into the Persians by Cyrus the Great. 5. The Zend-Avesta, and the Porphyrios of Ammians (24), which speaks of the Persians also. 6. Herodotus (i, 101) states that the magi formed one of the tribes of the Medes; and he also attributes the placing of the pseudo-Smerdis on the Persian throne to the magi, who were moved thereto by a desire to substitute the Median for the Persian rule (iii, 61 sq.; comp. Herod. Persica, c. 10-15; Justin, Hist. i, 9; and the Behistun inscription as translated by Sir H. Rawlinson; see Rawlinson’s Herodotus, i, 427). 6. Herodotus mentions that, after this attempt of the magi had been frustrated, it became a usage among the Persians to observe a festival in celebration of the overthrow of the magi, in which they gave thanksgiving to Magophoria (μαγοφορία), and during which it was not safe for any magus to leave the house (iii, 79; Agathias, i, 25), a usage which could have had its origin only at a time when Magism was foreign to Persian beliefs and institutions. 7. We find no allusion to the magi in connection with any of the Medo-Persian kings mentioned in Scripture, a circumstance which, though not of itself of much importance, falls in with the supposition that Magism was not at that time a predominant Persian institution. The probability is, that this system had its source in Chaldea, was thence transferred to Assyria, Media, and the adjoining countries, and was brought from Media into Persia, where it came at first into collision both with the national prejudices and with the ancient religious faith of the people. With this accord the traditions which impute to Zoroaster the institution of the magi. It does not seem to have been regarded as the apostle of Magism, sometimes a Partheni and sometimes a Bactrian origin. See Zoroaster. Eventually, however, Magism seems to have been adopted into or reconciled with Zoroastrianism, perhaps by losing its original theosophic character, and taking on a more practical or philosophical province.

III. Prophetic Accounts of the Order.—The magi were originally one of the six tribes (Herod. i, 101; Pliny, Hist. Nat. v, 29) into which the nation of the Medes was divided, who, like the Levites under the Mosaic institutions, were intrusted with the care of religion, an office which naturally, in those early times, made this caste likewise the chief depositaries of science and cultivation of art. Little in detail is known of the magi during the independent existence of the Median government; but under the Medo-Persian sway the magi formed a sacred caste or college, which was very famous in the ancient world (Xenophon. Cyrop. viii. 1, 23; Ammian. Marcell. xxiii. 6; Heeren. Fides, i, 451; Schloesser. Unvcrsal. Cipicara, i, 258. Porphyry (Adv. i. 16) says: "The learned men who are engaged among the Persians in the service of the Deity are called magi; and Suidas, "Among the Persians the lovers of wisdom (μαγιστροί) and the servants of God are called magi." According to Strabo (ii. 1084, ed. Falconer), the magi practiced the science of divination, and the arts of casting the horoscope, foretelling death; 2, by cups or dishes (Joseph's dividing-cup, Gen. xlii., 5); 3, by means of water. By the employment of these means the magi affected to disclose the future, to influence the present, and to call to the past to their aid. Even the visions of the night they were accustomed to interpret, not empirically, but according to such established and systematic rules as a learned priesthood might be expected to employ (Strabo, xvi. 762; Cicero, De Divin. i. 41; Elian. V. ii. ii. 17). The success, however, of their efforts over the invisible world, as well as their success or failure, depended on the divination which they executed, demanded, and in themselves peculiar cleanliness of body, a due regard to which and to the general principles of their caste would naturally be followed by professional prosperity, and this, in its turn, conspired with prevailing superstition in the magi great social ascension, and made them of high importance before kings and princes (Diog. Laert. ix. 7, 2)—an influence which they appear to have sometimes abused, when, descending from the peculiar duties of their high office, they took part in the strife and competitions of politics, and found themselves sufficiently powerful even to overturn thrones (Herod. iii. 61 sq.). These abuses were reformed by Zoroaster, who appeared, according to many authorities, in the second half of the 7th century before Christ. He was not the founder of a new system, but the renovator of an old and corrupt one, being, as he himself intimates (Zend-Avesta, i. 48), the restorer of the word which Ormuzd had formerly revealed, but which the influence of Persia had degraded into a false and deceptive magic. After much and long-continued opposition on the part of the adherents and defenders of existing corruptions, he accomplished his virtuous purpose and caused his system eventually to prevail. He appears to have re-modelled the institute of the magian caste, dividing it into three great classes: 1. herbods, or learners; 2. Mobeds, or masters; 3. Destur Mobeds, or perfect scholars (Zend-Av. ii. 171, 261). The magi alone he allowed to perform the religious rites of prayer and worship; they knew the ceremonies which availed to conciliate Ormuzd, and were obligatory in the public offerings (Herod. i. 132). They accordingly became the sole medium of communication between the Deity and his creatures, and through them alone Ormuzd made his will known; none but them could see into the future, and they disclosed their knowledge to those only who were so fortunate as to conciliate their good will. Hence the power which the magian priesthood possessed. The general belief in the trustworthy nature of their predictions, especially when founded on astrological calculations, the all but universal custom of consulting the will of the divinity before entering on any important undertaking, and the blind faith which was imposed in all that the magi did, reported, or commanded in the name of the Deity, for that exact castal caste of power, both in public and in private concerns, which has probably never been exceeded. Indeed the soothsayer was a public officer, a member, if not the president, of the privy council in the Medo-Persian court, demanded alike for show, in order to influence the people, and for use in occasions of public importance. It was he, the soothsayer, who, in different ranks and with different offices, conspired to sustain the throne, uphold the established religion, and conciliate or enforce the obedience of the subject. The fitness of the magi for, and the usefulness to, an Oriental court were not a little enhanced by the pomp of their dress, the splendor of their ceremonial, and the number and gradation of the sacred associates. Well may Cyrus, in uniting the Medes to his Persian subjects, have imitated in all his actions and observances what a priesthood which would go far to transfer to him the affections of his conquered subjects, and promote, more than any other thing, his own aggrandizement and that of his empire. Neither the functions nor the influence of this sacred caste were reserved for peculiar, rare, and extraordinary occasions. In all the arts of divination—the divination of the break of day they had to chant the divine hymns. This office being performed, then came the daily sacrifice to be offered, not indiscriminately, but to the divinities whose day in each case it was—an office, therefore, which none but the initiated could fulfill. As an illustration of the high estimation in which the magi were held, it may be mentioned that it was considered a necessary part of a princely education to have been instructed in the peculiar learning of their sacred order, which was an honor conceded to no other but royal personages, except when offered to the officers and attendants of the court. The knowledge of their writings, and of the importance which they placed not merely to the worship of the gods, but to the whole private life of every worshipper of Ormuzd—the duties which, as such, he had to observe, and the punishments which followed the neglect of these obligations, whence may be learned how necessary the act of the priest on all occasions was. Under the veil of religion the priest had bound himself up with the entire public and domestic life. The judicial office, too, appears to have been in the time of Cambyses, in the hands of the magi, for from them was chosen the college or bench of royal judges, which makes its appearance under the history of that monarch (Herod. iv. 81; vii. 194; comp. Esther i. 18). Men who held these offices, possessed this learning, and exerted this influence with the people, may have proved a check to Oriental despotism in no painful manner. This power, thus influenced and rendered unable to guarantee their own lives against the wrath of the monarch (Herod. vii. 194; compare Dan. ii. 19), and they appear to have been well versed in those country arts by which the hand that bears the sword is wont to protect instead of destroying. Thus Cambyses might have found the feeble king (like Haman VIII) if the laws permitted such a union: "We have," they adroitly answered, "no law to that effect; but a law there is which declares that the king of the Persians may do what he pleases" (Heeren. Ideen, i. i, 451 sq.; Hyde, Rel. Vet. Persarmata, ch. xxxii. p. 672 sq.; Brisse. Princip. Pers. p. 179 sq.).

Among the Greeks and Romans they were known under the name of Chaldeans (Strabo, xvi. 762; Diog. Laert. Proem., 1), and also of magi (Diog. Laert. viii. i, 3). They lived scattered over the land in different places (Strabo, xvi. 789; compare Dan. ii. 14), and had possessions of their own. The temple of Belus was employed by them for astronomical observations, and their astronomy was connected with the worship of the heavenly bodies practiced by the Babylonians (Diod. Sic. ii. 63; Strabo, xvi. 631; Plutarch. THEMISTOCLES). This temple was the sanctuary of the magi, and was, in the 19th century, a great place of pilgrimage for the Persians and others (Transactions of the Berlin Academy for 1874-25), and was specially directed to vain attempts to forecast the future, predict the fate of individuals or of communities, and sway the present, in alliance with augury, incantations, and magic (Ant. Gell. iii. 10; xiv. 1; Am. Marcell. ed. Berrett; Diod. Sic. ii. 29; comp. Ias. xlvii. 9, 13; Dan. ii).
IV. Position occupied by the Magi in the period covered by the Historia Sacra, ch. X. 72. In the Hebrew account, the Magi occur but twice, and then only incidentally. In Jer. xxxix, 3 and 18 we meet, among the Chaldean officers sent by Nebuchadnezzar to Jerusalem, one with the name or title of Rab-Mag (22.22). This word is interpreted, after the analogy of Rab-shakeh and Rab-saris, as equivalent to chief of the magi (Ewald, Propheten, and Herzog, Geschichte des Alten Orients, taking it as the title of an officer), and we thus find both the name and the order occupying a conspicuous place under the government of the Chaldeans.

It is clear that there were various kinds of wise men, and it is probable that these were classes belonging to one great order, which comprised, under the general title of Magi, all who were highly educated and possessed of a science of religion; so that we find here an ample priesthood, a sacred college, graduated in rank and honor (see Bertholdt, Excurs. zum Dan.; Gesenius, Comment. on Isa. ii, 534 sq.). The word Rab-Mag (if the received etymology of magi be correct) presents a hybrid formation. The first syllable is unquestionably Shemitic, the last is all but unquestionably Aryan. The problem thus presented admits of two solutions: (1) If we believe the Chaldeans to have been a Hamitic people, closely connected with the Babylonians (see Chaldæan), we must suppose that the civilization and the greatness which showed themselves in Nebuchadnezzar's conquests led him to gather round him the wise men and religious teachers of the nations which he subdued, and that thus the sacred tribes of the Medes rose under his rule to favor and power. (2) If the Massagetae, who have this character among the Jews (Dan. i, 4) makes this hypothesis a natural one; and the alliance which existed between the Medes and the Chaldeans at the time of the overthrow of the old Assyrian empire would account for the intermixture of religious systems belonging to different races. If, on the other hand, with Réan (Histoire des Langues Shimitiques, p. 66, 67), following Lassen and Bletter, we look on the Chaldeans as themselves belonging to the Aryan family, and possessing strong affinities with the Medes, there is even less difficulty in explaining the presence among the one people of the religious teachers of the other. It is likely enough, in either case, that the simpler Median religion which the magi brought with them, corresponding more or less closely to the faith of the Zend-Avesta, lost some measure of its original purity through this contact with the more superstitious system. From this time onward it is noticeable that the names both of the magi and Chaldeans are identified with the astrology, divination, and interpretation of dreams, which had impressed themselves on the prophets of Israel as the most characteristic features of the old religion (Isa. vii, 16, 20; Dan. i, 18), the magi took their places among the "astrologers, and stargazers, and monthly prognosticators."

It is with such men that we have to think of Daniel and his fellow-exiles as associated. They are described as "ten times wise than the sages (Sept., penis) and astrologers" (Dan. i, 29). Daniel himself so far sympathizes with the order into which he is, as it were, enrolled, as to intercede for them when Nebuchadnezzar gives the order for their death (Dan. ii, 24), and accepts an office which, as making him "master of the magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans, soothsayers" (Dan. v, 11), was probably identical with that of the Rab-Mag who first came before us. May we conjecture that he found in the belief which the magi had brought with them some elements of the truth that had been revealed to his fathers, as in the Zend-Avesta, but in the strengthened sympathy which showed itself in a hundred ways when the purest Aryan and the purest Shemitic faiths were brought face to face with each other (Dan. vi, 3, 16, 26; Ezra, i, 1; Isa. xliv, 28), agreeing as they did in their hatred of idolatry and in their acknowledgment of the right of God, yet meeting in the fulfillment of his appointment serve as illustrations of the high reverence in which the magi were held: "Then the king, Nebuchadnezzar, fell upon his face and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation and sweet odors unto him" (verse 46; see also verse 48). From the 49th verse it would seem not unlikely that the administration of justice in the last resort belonged to this priestly order, as we know it to the hierarchy of northern and western modern consciousness. (Compare 2 Macc. vii, 14; 1 Macc. xi, 14, 15; Trog. Achamn. p. 144; Bleeck, in Schleiermacher's Theol. Zeitschr. iii, 277; Hengstenberg's Daniel, p. 541.)

The name of the magi does not meet us in the Biblical account of the Medo-Persian kings. If, however, we identify the Artaxerxes who stopped the building of the Temple (Ezra vi, 17-22) with the Persian magi, the Magi of Herodotus (see Antiquitates) and the Gomates of the Behistun inscription, we may see here also another point of contact. (Compare Sir Henry Rawlinson's translation of the Behistun inscription: "The rites which Gomates the magian had introduced I prohibited.. . . the state the chanting, and the worship, and to those families which Gomates the magian had deprived of them" [Journ. of Asiatic Soc. vol. x, and Blaskeley's Herodotus, Excurs. on iii, 74]). The magian attempt to assert Medean supremacy, and with it probably a corrupted form of Magianism, in place of the Aryan faith in Ormuzd of which Cyrus had been the propagator, would naturally be accompanied by antagonism to the people whom the Persians had protected and supported. The immediate renewal of the suspended work on the triumph of Darius (Ezra iv, 24; v, i, 2; vi, 7, 9) falls in, indeed, with the account, with the Maccabæan story. The story of the actual massacre of the magi throughout the dominions of Darius, and of the commemorative magophagia (Herod. iii, 79), with whatever exaggerations it may be mixed up, indicates in like manner the triumph of the Magian system. The story of Zoroaster, and the traditional date of Zoroaster as a contemporary of Darius, we may see in the changes which he effected a revival of the older system. It is, at any rate, striking that the word magi does not appear in the Zend-Avesta, the priests being there described as athræus (guardians of the fire), and that there are multiplied prohibitions in it of all forms of the magic which, in the West, and possibly in the East also, took its name from them, and with which, it would appear, they had already become tainted. All such arts, auguries, necromancy, and the like, and everything esoteric and anti-Greek, are now in the court of king Ferdinand with the most persistent hostility (Du Perron, Zend-Avesta, vol. i, part ii, p. 269, 424).

The name, however, kept its ground, and with it probably the order to which it was attached. Under Xerxes the magi occupy a position which indicates that they had recovered from their temporary depression. They are consulted by him as soothsayers (Herod. vii, 19), and are as influential as they had been in the court of Astyages. They prescribe the strange and terrible sacrifices at the Strymon and the Nine Ways (Herod. vii, 114). They were to have urged the destruction of the temples of Greece (Cicero, De Legg. ii, 10). Traces of their influence may perhaps be seen in the regard paid by Mardonius to the oracles of the Greek god that offered the nearest analogue to their own Mithras (Herod. viii, 184), and in the like reverence which had been paid to them by the Macedonians (previously before Mithra) on the island of Delos (Herod. vi, 97). They come before the Greeks as the representatives of the religion of the Persians. No sacrifices may be offered unless one of their order is present chanting the prescribed prayers, as in the ritual of Mithraism. It is the mighty and indomitable strength of their faith, and the vigour with which they pursued their aims, that secured their success. No great change is traceable in their position during the decline of the Persian monarchy. The position of Judaism as a Persian province must have kept up some measure of contact between the two religious systems. The histories of Esther and Nehemiah point to the influence which they received from their temporal depression as a subject-race. It might well be that the religious minds of the two nations would learn to respect each other, and that some measure of the prophetic hopes of Israel might mingle with the belief of the magi. As an order they perpetuated themselves under the Parthian kings. The name rose to fresh honor under the Sassanides. The classification of the Magi as Jews was rediscovered as the basis of a hierarchical system, after other and lower elements had mingled with the earlier dualism, and might be traced even in the religion and worship of the Parsees.

VI. Transition-stages in the History of the Word and of the Order between the close of the O. T. and the time of the N. T.—In the mean while the title magi was acquiring a new and wider signification. It presented itself to the Greeks as connected with a foreign system of divination, and the religion of a foe whom they had conquered, and it soon became a passport (μάγος) for the worst form of imposture. The rapid growth of this feeling is traceable perhaps in the meanings attached to the word by the two great tragedians. In Eschylus (Persh.e., 291) it retains its old significance as denoting simply a tribe. In Sophocles (Ed. Tyr. 387) it appears among the epithets of Procris which the king heaps upon Tiresias. The fact, however, that the religion with which the word was associated still maintained its ground as the faith of a great nation, kept it from falling into utter disrepute, and it is interesting to notice how, at one time the good and at another the bad side of the word is apparent. Thus the μαγια of Zoroas.

ter is spoken of with respect by Plato as Σωτιαστική, forming the groundwork of an education which he prizes as far better than that of the Athenians (Aecl. i, 122 o). Xenophon, in like manner, idealizes the character and functions of the order (Cyrop. iv, 5, 16; 6, 6). Both meanings appear in the later lexicographers. The word magos is equivalent to άνατατοι and φαρακμαντείης, but it is also used for Σωτιαστική and Σωτιαστική (Hesych.). The magi, as an order, are οἱ μαγοὶ Περσίκοι and μαγοὶ Περσίκοι (Suidas). The word thus passed into the hands of the Sephardim and from them into those of the writers of the N. T., oscillating between the two meanings, capable of being used in either. The relations which had existed between the Jews and Persians would perhaps tend to give a prominence to the more favorable associations in their use of it. In Daniel (i, 29; ii, 10, 27; v, 11) it is used, as has been noticed, for the priestly diviners with whom the prophet was associated. Philo, in like manner (Quod omnis probus libri, p. 792), mentions the magi with warm praise, as men who gave themselves to the study of nature and the contemplation of the mysteries of the deities, worthy of being the counsellors of kings. It was perhaps natural that this aspect of the word should commend itself to the theosophic Jew of Alexandria. There were, however, other influences at work tending to drag it down. The swarms of impostors that were to be met with in every part of the Roman empire, known as "Chaldæi," "Mathematæi," and the like, bore this name also. Their arts were "aræ magicae." Though philosophers and men of letters might perceive the better meaning of which the word was capable (Cicero, De Divin. 1, 67), the language and duplicitous behavior of public and of private historians they were treated as a class at once hateful and contemptible (*Tacitus, Ann. i, 32; ii, 27; xii, 22, 59), and, as such, were the victims of repeated edicts of banishment. See Lenormant, Childers Magic (Lond. 1877). Of the same class (class B of Bel. Pug. 111) were the "Persae Hestenni" of the Parthians, as being at that time the conspicuous Eastern monarch in which the magi were recognised and honored. It is, perhaps, a legitimate inference from the narrative of Matt. ii that in these magi we may recognize, as the Church has done from a very early period, the first Gentile worshippers of the Christ. The name, by itself, indeed, applied as it is in Acts xiii, 8 to a Jewish false prophet, would hardly prove this; but the distinctive epithet "from the East" was probably intended to mark them out as different in character and race from the Western Jews, who had been so long over the Roman empire. So, when they come to Jerusalem, it is to ask, not after "our king" or "the king of Israel," but, as the men of another race might do, after "the king of the Jews." The language of the O.-T. prophets and of Matthew, written (according to the general belief of early Christian writers) for the Hebrew Christians of Palestine, we find it, not as embodying the contempt which the frauds of impostors had brought upon it through the whole Roman empire, but in the sense of a disparagement, in which the false magi were translated out of darkness into light (Justin Martyr, Chrysostom. Theophylact, in Spanheim, Dub. Evan. xix.; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in Matt. ii), we are justified, not less by the consciousness of later interpreters (including even Michaelis) than by the general sense of the text, in seeing in them such as those that were in the minds of the Sept. translators of Daniel, and those described by Philo—"at once astronomers and astrologers, but not mingling any conscious fraud with their efforts after a higher knowledge. The vagueness of the description leaves their country undefined, and implies that probably the evangelist himself had no certain information. The same phrase is used as in passages where the express object is to include a wide range of country (compare οἱ ἀνατατοί, Matt. viii, 27; xxii, 27; Luke xii, 29). Probably the region chiefly pressed to the mind of the Palestiniae and consequently would be the tract of country stretching eastward from the Jordan to the Euphrates, the "children of the East" in the early period of the history of the O. T. (Gen. xxix, 1; Judg vi, 3; vii, 12; viii, 10). It should be remembered, however, that the language of the O. T., and therefore probably that of Matthew, included under this name countries that lay considerably to the north as well as to the east of Palestine. Balaam came from "the mountains of the East," i.e. from Pethor, on the Euphrates (Numb. xxiii, 1; xxiii, 5). Abraham (or Cyrus) is in the right-hand side of Theodorus (Isa. xxvi, 2). The Persian conqueror is called "from the East, from a far country" (Isa. lxvi, 11).

We cannot wonder that there should have been very varying interpretations given of words that allowed so wide a field for conjecture. Some of these are, for various reasons, worth noticing. (1) The feeling of some early writers that the coming of the wise men was the fulfillment of the prophecy which spoke of the gifts of the men of Sheba and Seba (Ps. lxxii, 15, 10; compare Isa. lx, 6) led them to fix on Arabia as the country of the magi. (2) The word sometimes is applied to the Parthians, as in Spanheim, Dub. Evang. l., and they have been followed by Banastri, Maldonatus, Grotius, and Lightfoot. (2) Others have conjectured Mesopotamia as the great seat of Chaldæan astrology (Origen, Hom. in Matt. vii, vii), or Egypt as the country in which magus was most prevalent (Meyer, ad loc.). (3) The historical associations of the word led others again, with greater probability, to fix on Persia, and to see in these magi members of the priestly order, to which the name of right belonged (Chrysostom. Theophylact, Calv. Bel. Pug.). Of the commentators of the O. T. who are to be traced in the same elements are (5) the facts that the Parthians, as being at that time the conspicuous Eastern monarch in which the magi were recognised and honored. It is, perhaps, a legitimate inference from the narrative of Matt. ii that in these magi we may recognize, as the Church has done from a very early period, the first Gentile worshippers of the Christ. The name, by itself, indeed, applied as it is in Acts xiii, 8 to a Jewish false prophet, would hardly prove this; but the distinctive epithet "from the East" was probably intended to mark them out as different in character and race from the Western Jews, who had been so long over the Roman empire. So, when they come to Jerusalem, it is to ask, not after "our king" or "the king of Israel," but, as the men of another race might do, after "the king of the Jews." The language of the O.-T. prophets and the traditional interpretation of it are apparently new things to them. The narrative of Matt. ii. supplies us with an outline which we may legitimately endeavor to fill up, as far as our knowledge enables us, with inference and illustration. Some time after the birth of Jesus there appeared among the strangers who visited Jerusalem these men from the far East. They were not idolaters. Their form of worship was looked upon by the Jews with greater toleration than sympathy with any other Gentiles (compare Wisd. xiii. 6, 7). Whatever may have been their country, their statement indicates that they were watchers of the stars, seeking to read in them the destinies of nations. They said that they had seen a star in which they recognised such a prophet as the Jews were in the habit of looking for the Messaiah. They came to pay their homage. It may have been simply that the quarter of the heavens in which the star appeared indicated the direction of Judaea. It may have been that some form of the prophecy of Balaam, that a "star should rise out of Jacob" (Num. xxiv. 17), had reached them, either through the Jews of the Dispersion, or through traditions running parallel with the O.T., and that this led them to recognise its fulfilment (Orig., c. Cir. i; Hom. in Num. xiii.; but the hypothesis is neither necessary nor satisfactory; compare H. R. H. Levison, in z. v. Jeruslachi), had roused their minds to an attitude of expectancy, and that their contact with a people cherishing like hopes on stronger grounds may have prepared them to see in a king of the Jews the Oschanterina ("Homo Mundus," Hyde, i. c.) or the Zostoth whom they expected. In any case they shared the "veus et conquinque opinio" which had spread itself over the whole East—that the Jews, as a people, crushed and broken as they were, were yet destined once again to give a ruler to the nations. It is not unlikely that they appeared, occupying the position of the most ancient inspiration of the Zoroastrians, they were the representatives of many others who shared the same feeling. They came, at any rate, to pay their homage to the king whose birth was thus indicated, and with the gold, and frankincense, and myrrh which were the customary gifts of subject nations (comp. Gen. xlix. 10; Psa. cviii. 10; 1 Chr. xxvii. 20) and if iii. 6; iv. 14). The arrival of such a company, bound on so strange an errand, in the last years of the tyrannous and distrustful Herod, could hardly fail to attract notice and excite a people among whom Messianic expectations had already begun to show themselves (Luke i. 25, 38). "Herod was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him." The Sanhedrim was convened, and the question where the Messiah was to be born was formally placed before them. It was in accordance with the subtle, fox-like character of the king that he should pretend to share the expectations of the people in order that he might find in what direction they pointed, and then take whatever steps were necessary to crush them. See Herod. The answer given, based upon the traditional interpretation of Mic. v. 2, that Bethlehem was to be the birthplace of the King to determine the king's plans. He had found out the locality. It required to determine the time; with what was probably a real belief in astrology, he inquired of them diligently when they had first seen the star. If he assumed that that was contemporaneous with the birth, he could not be far wrong. The answer was, they "saw it in the east." If they were the forerunners of the king's own homage. As they journeyed they again saw the star, which for a time, it would seem, they had lost sight of, and it guided them on their way. (See Star in the East for this and all other questions connected with its appearance.) The pressure of the crowds, which a fortnight, or four months, or well-nigh two years before, had driven Mary and Joseph to the rude stable of the caravanserai of Bethlehem, had apparently abated, and the magi, entering "the house" (Matt. ii. 11), fell down and paid their homage and offered their gifts. Once more they received guidance through the channel which their work and their studies had made familiar to them. From first to last, in Media, in Babylon, in Persia, the magi had been famous as the interpreters of dreams. That which they now desired now appeared in the form of a disclosure of the plans of Herod to them. It was enough that it directed them to "return to their own country another way." With this their history, so far as the N.T. carries us, comes to an end. It need hardly be said that this part of the Gospel narrative has had to bear the brunt of the attacks of a hostile criticism. The omission of all mention of the magi in a Gospel which enters so fully into all the circumstances of the infancy of Christ as that of Luke, and the difficulty of harmonizing this incident with those of Judas Iscariot, which he mentions in the N.T. has been, lastly, that the traditional predictions ascribed to their own prophet Zoroaster, leading them to expect a succession of three deliverers, two working as prophets to reform the world and raise up a kingdom (Tavernier, Travaux iv. of the Jewish) to gather the 'three, coming to be the head of the kings, to conquer Ahriman and to raise the dead (Du Perron, Zend-Avesta, i. 2, p. 46; Hyde, c. 31; Ellicott, Hulsean Lect. i. c.), and in strange fantastic ways connecting these redeemers with the seed of Abraham (Tavernier, l.c.; and D'Herbelier, Biblique, Orient, s. v. Zendast), had roused their minds to an attitude of expectancy, and that their contact with a people cherishing like hopes on stronger grounds may have prepared them to see in a king of the Jews the Oschanterina ("Homo Mundus," Hyde, i. c.) or the Zostoth whom they expected. In any case they shared the "veus et conquinque opinio" which had spread itself over the whole East—that the Jews, as a people, crushed and broken as they were, were yet destined once again to give a ruler to the nations. It is not unlikely that they appeared, occupying the position of the most ancient inspiration of the Zoroastrians, they were the representatives of many others who shared the same feeling. They came, at any rate, to pay their homage to the king whose birth was thus indicated, and with the gold, and frankincense, and myrrh which were the customary gifts of subject nations (comp. Gen. xlix. 10; Psa. cviii. 10; 1 Chr. xxvii. 20) and if iii. 6; iv. 14). The arrival of such a company, bound on so strange an errand, in the last years of the tyrannous and distrustful Herod, could hardly fail to attract notice and excite a people among whom Messianic expectations had already begun to show themselves (Luke i. 25, 38). "Herod was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him." The Sanhedrim was convened, and the question where the Messiah was to be born was formally placed before them. It was in accordance with the subtle, fox-like character of the king that he should pretend to share the expectations of the people in order that he might find in what direction they pointed, and then take whatever steps were necessary to crush them. See Herod. The answer given, based upon the traditional interpretation of Mic. v. 2, that Bethlehem was to be the birthplace of the King to determine the king's plans. He had found out the locality. It required to determine the time; with what was probably a real belief in astrology, he inquired of them diligently when they had first seen the star. If he assumed that that was contemporaneous with the birth, he could not be far wrong. The answer was, they "saw it in the east." If they were the forerunners of the king's own thing, too, may have been due to the leading thoughts of the two Gospels. Matthew, dwelling chiefly on the kingly office of Christ as the Son of David, seized naturally on the first recognition of that character by the magi of the East (comp. on the fitness of this, Mill, Pandectariae Principes, p. 373). Luke, portraying the Son of Man with common humanity, in his common passion on the poor and humble, dwells as naturally on the manifestation to the shepherds on the hills of Bethlehem. It may be added further that everything tends to show that the latter evangelist derived the materials for this part of his history much more directly from the seer of the Lord, or her kindred, than did the former; and, if so, it is not difficult to understand how she might come to dwell on that which connected itself at once with the eternal blessedness of peace, good will, salvation, rather than on the homage and offerings of strangers, which seemed to be the badge of an earthly kingdom, and had proved to be the prelude to a life of poverty, and to the death upon the cross.

VII. Later Traditions which have gathered round the Magi of Matt. ii.—In this instance, as in others, what is told by the Gospel writers in plain, simple words has been expanded for a whole cycle of legends. Christian mythology has overshadowed that which itself had nothing in common with it. The love of the strange and marvellous, the eager desire to fill up in detail a narrative which had been left in outline, and to make fit for all the representative of this idea—these, which tend everywhere to the growth of the material, are an element within the region of history, fixed themselves, naturally enough, precisely on those portions of the life of Christ where the written records were the least complete. The stages of this development present themselves in regular succession.

1. The Magi are no longer thought of as simply "wise men," members of a sacred order. The prophecies of Psa. lxxii.; Isa. xlix, 7, 28; Is. 16, 16, must be fulfilled in them, and they become princes ("reguli," Ter- taill. c. Jud. 9; c. Marc. 5). This tends more and more to be the dominant thought. When the arrival of the magi, rather than the birth or the baptism of Christ, as the first of his mighty works, comes to be looked on as the great epiphany of his divine power, the older title of the feast receives as a synonym, almost as a substitute, that of the Feast of the Three Kings. (2) The number of the wise men, which Matthew leaves altogether undefined, was arbitrarily fixed. They were three (Leo Magm. Serm. ad Epiphs.), because thus they became a symbol of the mysterious trinity (Hilary of Arles), or because the number corresponded to the threefold government of the world; or to the three great divisions of the human race descended from the sons of Noah (Bede, De Collect.). (3) Symbolic meanings were found for each of the three gifts. The gold they offered as to a king. With the myrrh they prefixed the bitterness of the passion, the embalming for the burial. With the frankincense they adored the divinity of the Son of God (Suicer, Thea. s. v. Muyon; Breu. Rom. in Epiphs. passim). (4) Later on, in a tradition which, though appearing in a Western writer, is traceable probably to reports brought back by pilgrims from Italy or the East, the names are added, and Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthasar take their place among the objects of Christian reverence, and are honored as the patron saints of travellers. The passage from Bede (De Collect.) is in many ways interesting, and as it is not commonly quoted by commentators, though often referred to, it may be worth while to give it: "Primum dictitur fuisse Melchior, qui senex et canus, barba prolixia et capillis, aurum obtulit regi Domino. Secundus nomine Gaspar, juvenis imberbis, rubicundus, thure, quasi Deo oblatione dignus, Deum honoravit. Tertius fuscus, integre barbatis, Balthasar nomine, per myr- raham filium hominis moriturum professus." The treat- is De Collectarum is, in fact, a miscellaneous collection of memoranda in the form of questions and answers. The desire to find names for those who have none given them is very noticeable in other instances as well as in that of the magi; e.g. it gives those of the penitent and impotent thief. The passage quoted above is followed by a description of their dress, taken obviously either from some early painting, or from the decorations of a tunic (comp. the account of a performance in Trenck's "Story of the Wise Men, 70) Than the amount of the offerings, it will be noticed, does not agree with the traditional hexameter of the Latin Church: "Gaspar fert myrrham, thus Melchior, Balthasar aurum." We recognize at once in the above description the received types of the material art of Western Europe. It is open to believe that both the descriptions and the art-types may be traced to early quasi-dramatic representations of the facts of the nativity. In any such representations, names of some kind would become a matter of necessity, and were probably invented at random. Familiar as the names given by Bede now are to us, there was a time when they had no more authority than Bithiasara, Melchior, and Gathaspar (Moron, Did- tomor. s. v. Magi); Magalath, Pangalath, Saracen; Ap- pelianus, Amerius, and Damascus, and a score of others.

In the Eastern Church, where, it would seem, there was less desire to find symbolic meanings than to magnify the circumstances of the history, the traditions assume a different character. The magi arrive at Jerusalem with a retinue of 1000 men, having left behind them a king who sat on a throne of silver; the sea of the East turned into milk; the Babylonian tower of Babel fell down (7000) (Jacob. Eedes. and Bar-herbesa in, Hyde, l.c.). They have been led to undertake the journey, not by the star only, or by expectations which they shared with the sibyls, but by a prophecy of the founder of their own faith. Zoroaster had predicted that in the latter days there should be a mighty One and a Redeemer, that his descendants should see the star which should be the herald of his coming. According to another legend (Opus imperf. in Matt. ii. opus Caryorzet. t. vi. ed. Montafonius) they came from the remotest East, near the borders of the ocean. They had been taught to expect the star by a writing that bore the name of Seth. That expectation was handed down from father to son. Twelve of the holiest of them were appointed to be ever on the watch. Their post of ob- servation was a rock known as the Mount of Tentyro. Night by night they washed in pure water, and prayed, and looked out on the heavens. At last the star appeared, and in it the form of a young child bearing a cross. A voice came from it and bade them proceed to Judea. They started on their two years' journey, and in the course of the time the three, or the three hundred, or the thirty, or the three thousand, they started never failed them. The gifts they bring are those which Abraham gave to their progenitors the sons of Keturah (this, of course, on the hypothesis that they were Arabians), which the queen of Sheba had in her turn presented to Solomon, and which had found their way back again to the children of the East. (Epiphan. in Comp. Doctr. in Moroni, Diescit. l.c.) They return from Bethlehem to their own country, and give themselves up to a life of contemplation and prayer. When the twelve apostles leave Jerusalem to carry on their work as preachers, St. Thomas finds them in Par- thia. They offer themselves for baptism, and become evangelists of the new faith (Opus imperf. in Matt. ii. l.c.). The pilgrim-feeling of the 4th century includes them also within its range. Among other relics supplied to meet the demands of the home market which the devotion of Helenus had created, the bodies of the three magi are dis- covered somewhere in the East, are brought to Constanti- nople, and placed in the great church which, as the Mosque of St. Sophia, still bears in its name the witness of its original dedication to the divine Wisdom. The favor with which this church was regarded is that the emperor's prefect Eutocius called for some special mark of favor, and on his consecration as bishop of that city he obtained for it the privilege of being the rest-ling-place of the precious relics. There the fame of the three kings increased. The prominence given to all the feasts connected with the season of the Nativity—the transfer to that season of the mirth and joy of the old Saturnalia—the setting apart of a distinct day for the commemoration of the Epiphany in the 4th century—all this added to the world-wide interest and weight which they were regarded. When Milán fell into the hands of Frederick Barbarossa (A.D. 1162), the influence of the archbishop of Cologne prevailed on the emperor to transfer them to that city. The Milanese, at a later period, consded themselves by forming a special confraternity for perpetuating their veneration for the magi by the annual performance of a "Mystery" (Moroni, L.), but the glory of possessing the relics of the first Gentile worshippers of Christ remained with Cologne. (For the later mediæval developments of the traditions, comp. Joas. von Hildesheim, in Quart. Res. Ixxvi, 485.) In that proud cathedral which is the glory of Teutonic art the shrine of the Three Kings has for six centuries been shown as the greatest of its many treasures. The tabernacle in which the bones of some whose real name and history have no reliogion beyond its own beauty, in its gold and gems, to the faith with which the story of the wanderings of the Three Kings has been received. The reverence has sometimes taken stranger and more grotesque forms. As the patron saints of travellers they have given a name to the inn of the Three Kings, which is frequented and painted on the walls of churches. In the Somme and Balthasar were used as a charm against attacks of epilepsy (Spanheim, Duk. Exeget. xxvi.).

Magic (only occurs in the A. V. at Wisd. xviii, 7, paryes a. v. paryes, "art magic;" but the term "magician" (q.v.) is frequent), a word used to designate the power of working miracles beyond the scope of science or natural skill. It is derived from the Greek, and refers ultimately to the magi (q.v.), who were anciently regarded as its depositaries or experts. The magical arts spoken of in the Bible are those practiced by the Persian kings and the kings of the ancient Medes and Persians, and the Hebrews, the Chaldeans, and probably the Greeks. In all ages and parts of the world they have played an important part in popular superstition (q.v.).

1. Position of Magic in relation to Religion and Philology in Ancient Times. The degree of the civilisation of a nation is not the measure of the importance of magic in its convictions. The natural features of a country are not the primary causes of what is termed superstition in its inhabitants. With nations as with men—and the analogy of Plato in the "Republic" is not altogether without an answer in the biblical narrative—are essential to the mental constitution. Contrary as are these assertions to the common opinions of our time, inductive reasoning forbids our doubting them.

1. With the lowest race magic is the chief part of religion. The Nigritions, or blacks of this race, show this in their extreme use of amulets and their worship of objects which have no other value in their eyes but as having a supposed magical character through the influence of supernatural agents. With the Turanians, or corresponding whites of the same great family—we use the word white for a tribe of nations, neighbours, fellow, in contradistinction to black—incantations and witchcraft occupy the same place, Shaminian characterising their tribes in both hemispheres. In the days of Herodotus the distinction in this matter between the Nigritions and the Caucasian population of North Africa was what it now is. In his remarkable account of the journey of the Nasamorian young men—the Nasamo-nes, be it remembered, were "a Libyan race," and dwellers on the northern coast, as the historian here says—we are told that the adventurers passed through the in- habitant of the inhabited maritime region, and the tract occupied by wild beasts, and the desert, and at last came upon a plain with trees, where they were seized by men of small stature, who carried them across marshes to a town of such men black in complexion. A great river, running from west to east, formed constant brooks and rivulets, flowed by that town, and all that nation were sorcerers (δια τοιούτων ἀκτέουσαν ἀκτέουσαν, γάχα τινα πάντας, ii, 32, 38). It little matters whether the conjecture that the great river was the Niger be true, which the idea adopted by Herodotus that it was the upper Nile seems to favor: it is quite evident that the Nasamones came upon a nation of Nigritions beyond the Great Desert, and were struck with their fetishism. So, in our own days, the traveller is astonished at the height to which this superstition is carried among the Nigritions, who have no more respect for their sorcerers than the English for their witches, in its gold and gems, to the faith with which the story of the wanderings of the Three Kings has been received. The reverence has sometimes taken stranger and more grotesque forms. As the patron saints of travellers they have given a name to the inn of the Three Kings, which is frequented and painted on the walls of churches. The Iranians assign to magic a still less important position. It can scarcely be traced in the relics of old nature-worship, which they with greater skill than the Egyptians interwove with their more intellectual beliefs, as the Greeks gave the objects of reverence in Arcadia a place in poetical form, and the Scandinavians animated the hard remains of primitive superstition. The character of the ancient belief is utterly gone with the assigning of new reasons for the reverence of its sacred objects. Magic always maintained some hold on men's minds, but the stronger intellects despised it, like the Roman commander who threw the sacred chickens overboard, and the Greek who defied an adverse omen at the beginning of a great battle. When any, oppressed by the sight of the calamities of mankind, sought to resolve the mysterious problem, they fixed, like Echylus, not upon the childish notion of a chance-government by many conflicting deities, but upon the nobler idea of a dominating fate. Men of highly sensitive temperaments have always inclined to a belief in magic, and there has therefore been a section of Iranian philosophers in all ages who have paid attention to its practice; but, expelled from religion, it has held but a low and precarious place in philosophy.

The Hebrews had no magic of their own. It was so strictly forbidden by the law that it could never afterwards have any recognized existence save in times of general heresy or apostasy, and the same was doubtless the case in the patriarchal ages. The magical practices which obtained among the Hebrews were therefore borrowed from the nations around. The hold they gained was such as we should have expected with a Semitic race, making allowance for the discredit thrown upon them by the prohibitions of the law. From the first entrance into the Land of Promise until the destruction of Jerusalem we have constant glimpses of magic practiced in secret, or resorted to, not alone by the common, but also by the great. The Talmud abounds in notices of contemporary magic among the Jews, showing that it survived idolatry notwithstanding their original connection, and was supposed to produce real effects. The Koran in like manner treats charms and incantations as capable of producing evil consequences when used against a man. It is a distinctive characteristic of the Bible that from first to last it warrants no such trust or dread. In the Psalms, the most personal of all the books of Scripture, there is no prayer to be protected against magical influences. The believer prays to be delivered from every kind of evil that could hurt the body or the soul, but he says nothing of the magical influence. Herein everywhere magic is passed by, or, if mentioned, mentioned only to be condemned (comp. Ps. cvi, 28). Those who affirm that they see in the Psalms merely human piety, and in Job and Ecclesiastes merely human philosophy, explain the absence of all these throughout the Scriptures, of the expression of superstitious feelings that are inherent in the Semitic mind. Let them explain the luxuriant growth, in the after-literature of the Hebrews and Arabs, and notably in the Talmud and the Koran, of these feelings with no root in those older writings from which the after-literature of the Bible, the Talmud, and the Koran be several expressions of the Semitic mind, differing only through the effect of time, how can this contrast be accounted for?—the very opposite of what obtains elsewhere: for superstitions are generally strongest in the earlier literature of a race and gradually fade. The once profound objects of the pre-Abrahamic idolatry, put away by order of Jacob (Gen. xxxv, 2-4), yet retained even in Jacob's time (Josh. xxi, 14); and, if so, notwithstanding his exhortation, abandoned only for a space (Judg. xvii, xviii); and these were also known to the Babylonians, being used by them for divination (Zek. xxii, 11). But there is great reason for supposing a close connection between the oldest language and religion of Chaldaea and the ancient Egyptian language and religion. The
The Egyptian word ter signifies "a shape, type, transformation," and has for its derivative a mummy: it is used in the Ritual, where the various transformations of the deceased in Hades are described (Todtenbuch, ed. Lepsius, ch. lxxxvi sqq.). The small mummy-shaped figures of the kingdom which are shaped with a blue vitreous varnish, representing the Egyptian as deceased, is of a nature connecting it with magic, since it was made with the idea that it secured benefits in Hades; and it is connected with the word ter, for it represents a mummy, the determinative of that word, and was considered to be one of the states in which the deceased passed through transformations, term. The difficulty which forbids our doing more than conjecture a relation between ter and teraphim is the want in the former of the third radical of the latter: and in our present state of ignorance respecting the ancient Egyptian and the primitive language of Chaldæans in their verbal relations to the Semitic family, it is impossible to say whether it is likely to be explained. The possible connection with the Egyptian religious magic is, however, not to be slighted, especially as it is not improbable that the household idolatry of the Hebrews was ancestral worship, and the shebêti was the image of a deceased man or woman, as a mummy, and therefore as an Osiriad, bearing the insignia of that divinity, and so in a manner as a defined dead person, where we do not doubt that it was used in the ancestral worship of the Egyptians. It is important to note that no singular is found of the word teraphim, and that the plural form is once used where only one statue seems to be meant (1 Sam. xix, 13, 16): in this case it may be a "plural of excellence." If the latter inference be true, this word must have become thoroughly Semitized. There is no description of these images; but, from the account of Michah's strataegem to deceive Saul's messengers, it is evident, if only one image be there meant, as is very probable, that they were at least sometimes of the size of a man, and perhaps in the head and shoulders, if not lower, of human shape, or of a similar form (ver. 13-16).

The worship or use of teraphim after the occupation of the Promised Land cannot be doubted as having been one of the corrupt practices of those Hebrews who leaned to idolatry, but did not abandon their belief in the God of Israel. Although the Scriptures draw no marked distinction between those who forsook their religion and those who added to it such corruptions, it is evident that the latter always professed to be orthodox. Teraphim had no name; they were not, as in the case of the Hebrews necessarily connected with strange gods, whatever may have been the case with other nations. The account of Michah's images in the book of Judges, compared with a passage in Hosea, shows our conclusion to be correct. In the earliest days of the occupation of the Promised Land, in the time of anarchy that followed Joshua's rule, Michah, "a man of Mount Ephraim," made certain images and other objects of heretical worship, which were stolen from him by those Danites who took Laish and called it Dan, there setting up idolatry, where it remained among the whole tribe. But at that ark was at Shiloh, the priests retaining their post "until the day of the captivity of the land" (Judg. xvii, xviii, esp. 30, 31).

Probably this worship was somewhat changed, although not in its essential character, when Jeroboam set up the golden calf at Dan. Michah's idolatrous objects were a graven image, a molten image, an ephod, and teraphim (xvii, 3, 4, 5; xviii, 17, 18, 20). In Hosea there is a retrospective of this period where the prophet takes a harlot, and commands her to be faithful to him "many days." It is added: "For the children of Israel shall abide many years without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image [or 'pillar,' הַנְּצָרָה], and without an ephod, and teraphim: afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek Jehovah their God, and David their king; and shall fear Jehovah and his goodness in the latter days" (iii, esp. 4, 5). The apostate people are long to be without their spurious king and false worship, and in the end are to return to their loyalty to the house of David and their faith in the true God. That Dan should be connected with Jeroboam "who made Israel to sin," and with the clefam, is most natural; and it is therefore worthy of note that the image, ephod, and teraphim made by Michah, and stolen and set up by the Danites at Dan, should so nearly correspond with the objects spoken of by the prophet. It has been imagined that the use of teraphim and the similar abominations of the heretical Israelites are not described in the Scriptures as the worship of strange gods. This mistake arises from the mention of pious kings who did not suppress the high places, which proves only their timidity, and not any lesser sinfulness in the spurious religion than in false systems borrowed from the peoples of Canaan and neighboring countries. This theocracy of the heathen are indeed especially reprobated, but the heresy of the Israelites is too emphatically denounced, by Samuel in a passage soon to be examined, and in the repeated condemnation of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, "who made Israel to sin," to render it possible that we should take a view of it consistent only with modern sophistry.

We pass to the magical use of teraphim. By the Israelites they were consulted for oracular answers. This was apparently done by the Danites, who asked Michah's Levite to inquire as to the success of their spying expedition (Judg. xvi, 6). In later times it is distinctly stated of the Israelites where Zechariah says, "For the teraphim have spoken vanity, and the diviners have seen a lie, and have told false dreams" (x, 2). It cannot be supposed that, as this first positive mention of the use of teraphim for divination by the context is after the return from Babylon, and as that use obtained with the Babylonians in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, therefore the Israelites borrowed it from their conquerors; for these objects are mentioned in earlier places in such a manner that their connection with divination must be intended, if we bear in mind that this connection is undoubted in a subsequent period. Samuel's reproof of Saul for his disobedience in the matter of Amalek associates "divination" with "vanity," or "idols" (יִדְּוֹל, and "teraphim," however we render the difficult passage where these words occur (1 Sam. xvi, 22, 28). (The word rendered "vanity," יִדְּוֹל, is especially used with reference to idols, and even in some places stands alone for an idol or idols). We are told of the death of the workers in black arts, finding himself rejected of God in his extremity, sought the witch of Endor, and asked to see Samuel, the prophet's apparition denounced his doom as the punishment of this very divination as to Amalek. The reproof would seem, therefore, to have been a prophecy that the self-confident king would at the last alienate himself from God, and take refuge in the very abominations he despised. This apparent reference tends to confirm the inference we have indicated. As to a later time, when Josiah's reform is represented as putting away the "wizards, and the teraphim, and the idols" (2 Kings xxiii, 24); where the mention of the teraphim immediately after the wizards, and as distinct from the idols, seems to favor the inference that they are spoken of as objects used in divination.

The only account of the act of divining by teraphim is in a remarkable passage of Ezekiel relating to Nebuchadnezzar's advance against Jerusalem. "Also, thou son of man, appoint thee two ways, that the sword of the king of Babylon may come: both twain [two swords] shall come forth out of one land: and choose thou a place, choose [it] at the head of the way of the city. Appoint a way, that the sword may come to Rabba of the Ammonites, and to Judah in Jerusalem the fenced. For the king of Babylon stood at the parting of the way, at the head of the two ways, to use divination: he shuffled arrows, he consulted with teraphim, he looked in the liver. At his right hand was the divination for Jerusalem" (xxi, 19-22). The mention together of consulting teraphim and looking into the liver may not indicate that the victim was offered to teraphim and its liver then looked into, but may mean an independent art of divining. The former explanation seems, however, to have been adopted by the Sept. in its rendering of the account of Michal's stratagem, as if Michal had been divining, and on the coming of the messengers seized the image and liver and hastily put them together. The Mishnah gives two reasons why the Rabbinists go to Talmudic times as those of divining by teraphim are worthless. See T. Τεραπινια.

2. Joseph, when his brethren left after their second visit to buy corn, ordered his steward to hide his silver cup in Benjamin's sack, and afterwards sent him after them, ordering him to claim it, thus: "If he be not with me, let not my silverASI be with me; let me know in what manner he has wronged me."

The meaning of the latter clause has been contested, Gesenius translating "he could surely foresee it" (ap. Barrett, Synopsis, ad loc.), but the other rendering seems far more probable, especially as we read that Joseph afterwards said to his brethren: "Wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine?" (xlv, 10)—the same word being used. If, so the reference would probably be to the use of the cup in divining, and we should have to infer that here Joseph was acting on his own judgment (see Josephus), divining not as a mere doubtful act, but one of which he, when called before Pharaoh, had distinctly disclaimed the practice. Two uses of cups or the like for magical purposes have been obtained in the East from ancient times. In one use either the cup itself bears engraved inscriptions, supposed to have a magical influence (see D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, 6 v. Giam), or it is plain, and such inscriptions are written on its inner surface in ink. In both cases water poured into the cup is drunk by those wishing to derive benefit, as, for instance, the cure of diseases, from the inscriptions, which, if written, are dissolved (Lane, Mod. Eg. ch. x). This use, in both its forms, obtains among the Arabs in the present day, and cups bearing Chaldaic inscriptions in ink have been discovered by Mr. Layard, and probably show that this practice existed among the Jews in Babylonia in about the 7th century of the Christian era (Ninive and Babylon, p. 566, etc.). There is an excellent paper on these bowls by Dr. Levy, of Breslau, in the Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft, ix, 465, etc.). In the other use the cup or bowl was of very secondary importance. It was merely the receptacle for water, in which a boy locked to see what the magician desired. This is precisely the same as the practice of the modern Egyptian magicians, where the difference that ink is employed and is poured into the palm of the boy's hand is merely accidental. A Gnostic papyrus in Greek, written in Egypt in the earlier centuries of the Christian era, now preserved in the British Museum, describes the practice of the boy with a bowl, and alleges results strikingly similar to the alleged results of the well-known modern Egyptian magician, whose divination would seem, therefore, to be the relic of the famous magic of ancient Egypt. (See Lane, Mod. Egypt. ch. xii, for an account of the performances of this magician, and Mr. Lane's opinion as to the causes of their occasional apparent success.) As this latter use only is of the nature of divination, it is probable that to Joseph referred. The practice may have been prevalent in his time, and hieroglyphic inscriptions upon the bowl may have given color to the idea that it had magical properties, and perhaps even that it had thus led to the discovery of its place of concealment, a discovery which must have struck Joseph's brethren with the greater wonder. See Curr.

8. The magicians of Egypt are spoken of as a class in the histories of Joseph and Moses. When Pharaoh's officers were troubled by their dreams, being in prison they were at a loss for an interpreter. Before Joseph explained the dreams he disclaimed the power of interpreting save by the divine aid, saying, "[Do not interpretations belong] to God? tell me [them], I pray you" (Gen. xii, 8). In like manner, when Pharaoh had two of his officers imprisoned for committing a theft he professed to interpret dreams. We read: "He sent and called for all the scribes of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof: and Pharaoh told them his dream: but [there was] none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh" (xii, 8; comp. ver. 24). Joseph, being sent for on the report of his brethren's words (viii, 21), interpreted the dreams which he had heard that he could interpret a dream. Joseph said, "It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace" (ver. 16). Thus, from the expectations of the Egyptians and Joseph's disavowals, we see that the interpretation of dreams was a branch of the knowledge to which the ancient Egyptian magicians pretended. The failure of the Egyptians in the case of Pharaoh's dreams must probably be regarded as the result of their inability to give a satisfactory explanation, for it is unlikely that they refused to attempt to interpret.

The two words usually designate the wise men or scribes for by Pharaoh are בְּרֵאשׁי, "scribes" (?) and בְּרֵאשׁי, "wise men," "wise men." We again hear of the magicians of Egypt in the narrative of the events before the exodus. They were summoned by Pharaoh to oppose Moses. The account of what they effected requires to be carefully examined, from the point of view of the question whether they are regarded as impostors or pharaohs. Pharaoh, and it shall become a serpent."

It is then related that Aaron did thus, and afterwards: "Then Pharaoh also called the wise men and the enchanters: now they, the scribes of Egypt, did so by their secret arts: for they cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents, but Aaron's rod swallowed up their rods" (Exod. vii, 8-12). The rods were probably long staffs like those represented on the Egyptian monuments, not much less than the height of a man. If the word used mean here a serpent, the Egyptian magicians may have feigned a change: if it signify a crocodile, they could readily effect it. But in the third case these three occasions on which the magicians are designated are to be noted. That which we render "scribes" seems here to have a general significance, including wise men and enchanters. The last term is more definite in its meaning, denoting users of incubations. On the occasion of the first plague, the turning of the waters of Egypt into blood, the opposition of the magicians again occurs. "And the scribes of Egypt did so by their secret arts" (vii, 22). When the second plague, that of frogs, was sent, the magicians again made the same opposition (viii, 7). Once more they appear in the history. The plague of lice came, and we read that when Aaron had worked the wonder the magicians opposed him: "And the scribes did so by their secret arts to bring forth the lice, but they could not: so there were lice upon man and upon beast. And the scribes said unto Pharaoh, This is the God of the Hebrews that hath caused Pharaoh to hearken, and he hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had said" (viii, 18, 19 [Hch. 14, 15]). After this we hear no more of the magicians. All we can gather from the narrative is that the appearances produced by them were sufficient to deceive the Egyptians. It is nowhere declared that they actually produced wonders, since the expression "the scribes did so by their secret arts" is used on the occasion of their complete failure. Nor is their statement that in the wonder brought by Aaron they saw thefinger of God pointing that they were not the one of the gods whom they set in their cities. It is nowhere declared that they actually produced wonders, since the expression "the scribes did so by their secret arts" is used on the occasion of their complete failure. no avail against the work of a divinity." There is one later mention of these transactions, which adds to our information, but does not decide the main question. St. Paul mentions Jannes and Jambres as having "withstood Moses," and says that their folly in doing so became manifest (2 Tim. iii, 8, 9). The Egyptian character of these names, the first of which is, in our opinion, found in hieroglyphics, is not inconsistent with the opinion that the apostle cited a prevalent tradition of the Jews. See Jannes and Jambres.

We turn to the Egyptian illustrations of this part of the subject. Magic, as we have before remarked, was inherent in the ancient Egyptian religion. The Ritual is a system of incantations and directions for making amulets, with the object of securing the happiness of the disembodied soul. However obscure the belief of the Egyptians as to the actual character of the state of the soul after death may be to us, it cannot be doubted that the knowledge and use of the magical amulets and incantations treated of in the Ritual was held to be necessary for future happiness, although it was not believed that they alone could assure it, since to have done good works, or, more strictly, not to have committed certain sins, was an essential condition of the acquittal of the soul in the great trial in Hades. The thoroughness of the murder of the most strikingly evident in the minute directions given for making amulets (Todtendub, ch. c, cxxix, cxxxiv), and the secrecy enjoined in one case on those thus occupied (ch. cxxxiii). The later chapters of the Ritual (cixciilav), held to have been added in more recent times after the composition of the rest, which theory, as M. Chabas has well remarked, does not prove their much more modern date (Le Papyrus Magique Harris, p. 162), contain mystical names not bearing an Egyptian etymology. These names have been thought to be Ethiopian; they either have no signification, and are mere magical gibberish, or else they are, mainly at least, of foreign origin. Besides the Ritual the ancient Egyptians had books of a purely magical character, such as that which M. Chabas has edited in his work referred to above. The main source of their belief in the efficacy of magic appears to have been the idea that the souls of the dead, whether justified or condemned, had the power of reviving the earth and taking various forms. This belief is abundantly used in the moral tale of "The Two Brothers," of which the text has recently been published by the trustees of the library of Leiden. A similar fate is handed down in the account of the deeds of Joseph (Deut. x, 19, 20), and we learn from this ancient papyrus the age and source of much of the machinery of medieval fictions, both Eastern and Western. A likeness that strikes us at once in the case of a fiction is not less true of the Ritual. The typical perils encountered by Hades are the first rude indications of the adventures of the heroes of Arab and German romance. The regions of terror traversed, the mystic portals that open alone to magical words, and the monsters whom magic alone can deprive of their power to injure, are here already in the book that in part was found in the reign of King Mencheres, four thousand years ago. Bearing in mind the Nigritian nature of Egyptian magic, we may look for the source of these ideas in primitive Africa. There we find the realities of which the ideal form is not greatly distorted, though greatly intensified. The forests that clothe the higher slopes of the Nile; the palm, the date, and the pomegranate; the serpents and scorpions, the crocodile, the pachydermata, the lion, perchance the gorilla, are the genii that hold this land of fear. In what dread must the first scatty population have held dangers and enemies still feared by their swarming posterity. No wonder, then, that imagination in the Nigritian mind would be filled with a superstitious fear which certain conditions of external nature always produce with races of a low type, where a higher feeling would only be touched by the analogies of life and death, of time and eternity. No wonder that, so struck, the primitive race imagined the evils of the unseen world to be the recurrence of those against which they struggled while on earth. That there is some ground for our theory, besides the generalization which led us to it, is shown by a usual Egyptian name of Hades, "the west," and the west region of Egypt might directly give birth to such fancies as form the common ground of the machinery, not the general belief, of the Ritual, as well as of the machinery of medieval fiction, is shown by the fables that the rude Arabs of our own day tell of the wonders they have seen.

Like all other peoples of the Nile basin, generally, the Egyptians separated it into a lawful kind and an unlawful. M. Chabas has proved this from a papyrus which he finds to contain an account of the prosecution, in the reign of Rameses III (B:C: circ. 1220), of an official for unlawfully acquiring and using magical books, the king's property. The culprit was convicled and punished with death (p. 169 sqq.).

A belief in unlucky and lucky days, in actions to be avoided or done on certain days, and in the fortune attending birth on certain days, was extremely strong, as we learn from the remarks of the most strikingly evident in the minute directions given for making amulets (Todtendub, ch. c, cxxix, cxxxiv), and the secrecy enjoined in one case on those thus occupied (ch. cxxxiii). The later chapters of the Ritual (cixcilav), held to have been added in more recent times after the composition of the rest, which theory, as M. nations of Canaan were to be driven out (Deut. xvii. 9-14, esp. 10, 11). It is remarkable that the offering of children should be mentioned in connection with magical arts. The passage in Micah, which has been supposed to preserve a question of Balak and an answer of Balaam, when the soothsayer was sent for to curse Israel, has long been noticed, for here no questioner asks after speaking of sacrifices of usual kinds, "Shall I give my first-born [for] my transgression, the fruit of my body [for] the sin of my soul?" (vi. 5-8). Perhaps, however, child-sacrifice is specified on account of its atrocity, which would connect it with ancient arts, such as we know were frequently, in later times, the causes of cruelty. The terms which follow appear to refer properly to eight different kinds of magic, but some of them are elsewhere used in a general sense. 1. דְּבָר יְהוָה is literally "a diviner of divinations." The verb בַּשָּׁה is used of false prophets, but also in a general sense for divining, as in the narrative of Saul's consultation of the witch of Endor, where the king says "divine unto me (נָבָה אֵלֶּה)," I pray thee, by the familiar spirit" (I Sam. xxviii., 8). 2. בַּשָּׁה כָּרָ֥ב' conveys the idea of "one who acts covertly," and so "a worker of hidden arts." The meaning of the root כָּרָ֥ב is "covering," and the supposed connection with fascination by the eyes, like the notion of "the evil eye," as though the original root were "the eye" (אֶל), seems untenable. The ancient Egyptians seem to have held the superstition of the evil eye, for an eye is the determinative of a word which appears to signify some kind of magic (Chalas, Papyrus Magique Harris, p. 170 and note 4). 3. בַּשָּׁה, which we render "an augurer," is from בַּשָּׁה, which is literally "he or it hearkened or whistled," and in Hebraism is applied to the practices of enchantments, but used to divining generally, as in the case of Joseph's cup, and where, evidently referring to it, he tells his brethren that he could divine, although in both places it has been read more vaguely with the sense to foresee or make trial (Gen. xliii., 5, 13). We therefore render it by a term which seems appropriate, but not too definite. The supposed connection of בַּשָּׁה with בַּשָּׁה, "a serpent," as though meaning serpent-divination, must be rejected, the latter word rather coming from the former, with the signification a hisser." The name Nahash (נַֽחַש), of a prince of Judah in the second year after the exodus (Num. i. 7; Exod. vii. 29; Ruth iv. 20, etc.), means "enchanter:" it was probably used as a proper name in a vague sense. 4. בַּשָּׁה signifies "an enchanter:" the original name meant probably "that which was prayed, and the strict sense of this word "one who uses incantations." 5. בַּשָּׁה seems to mean "a fabricator of material charms or amulets," if בַּשָּׁה, when used of practicing sorcery, means to bind magical knots, and not to bind a person by spells. 6. בַּשָּׁה לִגְּנֵ֥שׁ is an "inquirer by a familiar spirit." The second term signifies a bottle, a familiar spirit consulted by a soothsayer, and a soothsayer having a familiar spirit. The Sept. usually render the plural בַּשָּׁ֥הּ by ἀραβομάρια, which has been rashly translated ventriloquists, for it may not signify what we understand by the latter, but refer to the mode in which soothsayers of this kind gave out their responses: to this subject we shall recur later. The consulting of familiar spirits may mean no more than invoking them: but in the Acts we read of a damask spirit possessed with a spirit of divination for the very distinct terms. This kind of sorcery—divination by a familiar spirit—was practiced by the witch of Endor. 7. בַּשָּׁ֥ה, which we render "a wizard," is properly "a wise man," but is always applied to wizards and false prophets. Gesenius (Thesaur. s. v.) supposes that in Lev. xx. 27 it is used of a familiar spirit, but surely the reading "a wizard" is there more probable. 8. The last term, דַּכְּרָ֣ה לִגְּנֵ֥שׁ, is very explicit, meaning "a consultant of the dead:" necromancer is an exact translation if the original signification of the latter is retained, instead of the more general one it now usually bears. In the law it was commanded that a man or woman who had a familiar spirit, or a wizard, should be stoned (Lev. xx., 27). An "enchancer" (בַּשָּׁ֥ה לִגְּנֵ֥שׁ) was not to live (Exod. xx. 28, [Heb. 17]). Using augury and hidden arts was also forbidden (Lev. xix. 26). See Dives. 5. The history of Balaam shows the belief of some ancient nations in the powers of soothsayers. When the Israelites had begun to conquer the land of Promise, Balak, the king of Moab, and the elders of Midian, resolved to embassied to Balaam, for they were afraid of the men of Israel, and hence sent messengers with the "rewards of divination (נַשָּׁ֥ה לִגְּנֵ֥שׁ)" in their hands (Num. xxii., 7) for Balaam the diviner (גֵּבֹה, Josh. iii., 22), whose fame was known to them, though he dwelt in Arah. Balak's message shows what he believed Balaam's powers to be: "Behold, there is a people come out from Egypt: behold, they cover the face of the earth, and they abide over against me: come now, I pray thee, curse me, even so may the Lord make himself great against me, for they [are] too mighty for me: peradventure I shall prevail, [that] we may smite them, and [that] I may drive them out of the land: for I wot that whom thou blessed [is] blessed; and whom thou cursest is cursed" (xxii., 6). We are told, however, that Balaam, warned of God, first said that he could not speak of himself, and then by inspiration blessed those whom he had sent for to curse. He appears to have received inspiration in a vision or a trance. In one place it is said, "And Balaam saw that it was good in the eyes of the Lord to bless Israel, and he went not, now as before, to the meeting of enchantments (נַשָּׁ֥ה לִגְּנֵ֥שׁ), but he set his face to the wilderness" (xxiv., 1). From this it would seem that it was his wont to use enchantments, and that when on other occasions he went away after the sacrifices had been offered, he hoped that he could prevail to obtain the wish of those who had sent for him, but was constantly defeated. The building of new altars of the mystic number of seven, and the offering of seven oxen and seven rams, seems to show that Balaam had some such idea; and the marked manner in which he declared "there is no enchantment with me against Jacob" (xxii., 20) proves that he had come in the hope that he could have prevailed, the divination being made to declare his own powerlessness while he blessed those whom he was sent for to curse. The case is a very difficult one, since it shows a man who was used as an instrument for declaring God's will trusting in practices that could only have incurred his displeasure. The simplest explanation seems to be that Balaam was never a true prophet but on this occasion, when the enemies of Israel were to be signal!y confounded. This history affords a notable instance of the failure of magicians in attempting to resist the divine will. See Balaam. 6. The account of Saul's consulting the witch of Endor is the foremost place in Scripture of those which refer to magic. The supernatural terror of which it is full cannot, however, be proved to be due to this art, for it has always been held by sober critics that the appearing of Samuel was permitted for the purpose of declaring the doom of Saul, and not that it was caused by the incantations of a sorceress. As, however, the narrative is allowed to be very difficult, we may look for a moment at the evidence of its authenticity. The details are strictly in accordance with the age: there is a simplicity in the manner described that is up to the time. The circumstances are agreeable with the rest of the history, and especially with all we know of Saul's character. Here, as ever, he is seen resolved to gain his ends without caring what wrong he does: he wishes to consult a prophet, and asks a witch to call up his shade.
Most of all, the vigor of the narrative, showing us the scene in a few words, proves its antiquity and genuineness. We can see no reason whatever for supposing that "all the nations" which inhabited the earth knew of it.

"Now Samuel was dead, and all Israel had lamented him, and buried him in Ramah, even in his own city. And Saul had put away those that had familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land. And the Philistines gathered themselves together, and came and pitched in Shunem; and Saul gathered all Israel together, and they pitched in Gilboa." That the Philistines should have advanced so far, spreading in the plain of Esdraelon, the garden of the Holy Land, shows the strains to which Saul had come. Here, in times of faith, Sisera was defeated. Here the Philistines were defeated. Here, in time of distress and fear, Samuel was sent by God to appoint a king to Israel. Samuel knew Gideon, some of the army of the former perishing at En-dor itself (1 Sam. xxxiii, 9, 10). "And when Saul saw the host of the Philistines, he was afraid, and his heart greatly trembled. And when Saul inquired of the Lord, the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets. Then said Saul unto his servants, Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go to her, and inquire of her. And his servants said to him, Behold, there is a woman that hath a familiar spirit at En-dor." And Saul disguised himself, and put on other clothing, and went, and two men went with him, and they came to the woman by night. "And the woman saw Saul, but Saul lurked by her chamber in another chamber." For Saul was on the side of the Philistines, and lay in the territory of Issachar, about seven or eight miles to the northward of Mount Gilboa. Its name, the "fountain of Dor," may connect it with the Phoenician city Dor, which was on the coast to the westward. If so, it may have retained its original population, and be modernly known under the modern name of the "fountain of Dor." It was a common place of journeying by night, seem to have been taken that he might not alarm the woman, rather than because he might have passed through a part of the Philistine force. The Philistines held the plain, having their camp at Shunem, whither they had pushed on from Aphek: the "inhabitants of" the Israelites were first encamped by a fountain at Jezreel, but when their enemies had advanced to Jezreel they appear to have retired to the slopes of Gilboa, whence there was a way of retreat either into the mountains of Bashan or across Jordan. The latter seems to have been the line of flight, but the minds of men are not always solemn and true to the uses of the land. On Mount Gilboa, his body was fastened to the wall of Bethshan. Thus Saul could scarcely have reached En-dor without passing at least very near the army of the Philistines. And he said, divine unto me, I pray thee, by the familiar spirit that is in thee, shall I go up to the Philistines? For the Lord hath said unto me, Go up; for I will deliver thee into the hand of the Philistines. ..." It is noticeable that here witchcraft, the inquiring by a familiar spirit, and necromancy, are all connected as though but a single art, which favors the idea that the prohibition in Deuteronomy specifies every name by which magical arts were known, rather than so many different kinds of arts, in order than no one should attempt to evade the condemnation of such practices by any subterfuge. It is evident that Saul thought he might be able to call upon Samuel by the aid of the witch, but this does not prove what was his own general conviction, or the prevalent conviction of the Israelites on the subject. He was in a great extremity; his kingdom in danger; himself forsaken of God: he was weary with a night-journey, perhaps of risk, perhaps of great length to avoid the enemy, and fear of death added, if he was conscious of wrong as, probably for the first time, he commanded unholy rites and heard in the gloom unholy incantations. In such a strait no man's judgment is steady, and Saul may have asked to see Samuel in a moment of sudden desperation, when he had only meant to demand an oracle by which he might be guided. He had no thought of rewarding the counsel of Samuel, and longing to learn, if the net that he felt closing about him were one from which he should never escape, Saul had that keener sense that some say comes in the last hours of life, and so, conscious that his life was not in his own hands, he dared to come, at once sought to see and speak with it, though this had not before been permitted. Strange things we know occur at the moment when man feels he is about to die, and if there be any time when the unseen world is felt while yet unentered, it is when the soul first comes within the chill of its long-projected shadow. "And the woman said unto him, Behold, thou knowest what Saul hath done, how he hath cut off those that have familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land: wherefore, then, layest thou a snare for my life, to cause me to die? And Saul said unto her, Bring, [As] the Lord liveth, there shall no punishment happen to thee for this thing." Nothing shows Saul's desperate resolution more than his thus swearing when engaged in a most unholy act, a terrible profanity that makes the horror of the scene complete. Everything being prepared, the final act takes place. Then said Saul to the woman, Whom shall I bring up unto thee? And he said, Bring me up Samuel. And when the woman saw Samuel, she cried with a loud voice: and the woman spake to Saul, saying, Why hast thou deceived me? for thou art [are] not in the [in] truth. And the woman said, Let not my lord be afraid: for what sawest thou? And the woman said unto Saul, I saw gods ascending out of the earth. And he said unto her, What [is] his form? And she said, An old man cometh up; and he is [is] covered with a mantle. And Saul perceived that it was Samuel, and he stood with his face to the ground, and bowed himself. And Samuel said to Saul, Why hast thou disquieted [or disturbed] me, to bring me up? And Saul answered, I am sore distressed; for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answered me no more, neither by prophets, nor by dreams; therefore I have called thee: thou art not the least of the thee. And Saul answered, I am [am] thy servant, even of the Lord. And the Lord said to me, Go up to the city, and meet the man of God, and enquire of him what thing is best for me to do. And the woman said, It is well. And the Lord said, Behold, stand thou on the top of the house; and I will break forth the flesh of Amelek, and will give it to thee for a price. The Lord imparted the thought that mayest make known unto me what I shall do. Then said Samuel, Wherefore, then, dost thou ask of me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee, and is become thine enemy? And the Lord hath done to him as he spake by me; for the Lord hath rent the kingdom out of thine hand, and given it to thy neighbor, [even] to David: because thou obeyedst not the voice of the Lord, nor executedst his fierce wrath upon Amelek, therefore hath the Lord done this thing unto thee this day. Moreover, the Lord will also deliver Israel into the hand of the Philistines: and thou shalt have no war this night." (1 Sam. xxviii, 1-20). The woman clearly was terrified by an unexpected apparition when she saw Samuel. She must, therefore, either have been a mere juggler, or one who had no power of working magical wonders at will. The sight of Samuel at all would have been sufficient to make her who had come to consult her. The prophet's shade seems to have been preceded by some majestic shapes which the witch called gods. Saul, as it seems interrupting her, asked his form, and she described the prophet as he was in his last days on earth, an old man, covered either with a mantle, such as the prophets used to wear, or wrapped in his winding-sheet. Then Saul knew it was Samuel, and bowed to the ground from respect or fear. It seems that the woman saw the appearances, and that Saul only knew of them through her, perhaps as being too late, else she would have asked what form Samuel had? The prophet's complaint we cannot understand, in our ignorance as to the separate state: thus much we know, that state is always described as one of perfect rest or sleep. That the woman should have been able to call him up cannot be here inferred: he did not possess the power of calling the dead, and it would be explanation enough to suppose that he was sent to give Saul the last warning, or that the earnestness of the king's wish had been permitted to disquiet him in his resting-place. Although the word "disquieted" need not be pushed to an extreme sense, and seems to mean the interruption of a state of rest, our translators wisely, we think, preferring this rendering to "disturbed," it cannot be denied that, if we hold that Samuel was present, this is a great difficulty; however, we suppose that the prophet's coming was ordered, it is not unsu mountable. The declaration of Saul's doom agrees with what Samuel had said before, and was fulfilled the next day, when the king and his sons fell on Mount Gil-boa. It may, however, be asked, Was the apparition of Samuel himself, or a supernatural messenger in his stead? Some may even object to our holding it to have been aught but a phantom of a sick brain; but, if so, what can we make of the woman's conviction that it was Samuel, and the king's horror at the words he heard, or, as these would say, that he thought he heard? It was not only the hearing his doom, but the hearing it in a voice from the other world that stretched the faithless man on the ground. He must have felt the presence of the dead, and heard the sound of a sepulchral voice. How could the dead have come true, and not the king alone, but his sons, have gone to the place of disembodied souls on the morrow? For to be with the dead concerned the soul, not the body: it is no difficulty that the king's corpse was unburied till the generous men of Jabesh-gilead, mindful of his old kindness to them, brought it from the wall of Bethshan. If then, the apparition was real, should we suppose it Samuel's? A reasonable criticism would say it seems to have been so; for the supposition that a messenger came in his stead must be rejected, as it would make the speech a mixture of truth and untruth; and if asked what sufficient cause there was for such a sending forth of the prophet from his rest, we may reply that we know not the reason for such warnings as abound in the Bible, and that, perhaps, even at the eleventh hour, the door of repentance was not closed against the king, and his impiety might have been pardoned had he repented. Instead, he went forth in despair, and, when his sons had fallen and his army was put to the rout, sore wounded, he fell on his own sword.

From the beginning to the end of this strange history we have no warrant for attributing supernatural power to Saul. Viewed reasonably, it refers to the question of apparitions of the dead as to which other passages in the Bible leave no doubt. The connection with magic seems purely accidental. The witch is no more than a bystander after the first: she sees Samuel, and that is enough. The prediction may have been a terrible fulfilment of Saul's desire, but this does not prove that the measures he used were of any power. We have examined the narrative very carefully, from its detail and its remarkable character: the result leaves the main question unanswered. See IMMANUEL.

7. In the later days of the two kingdoms magical practices of many kinds prevailed among the Hebrews, as we especially learn from the condemnation of them by the prophets. Each form of idolatry which the people had adopted in succession doubtless brought with it its magic, which seems always to have remained with a strange tenacity that probably made it outlive the false worship with which it was connected. Thus the use of teraphim, dating from the patriarchal age, was not abandoned when the worship of the Canaanitish, Phoenician, and Syrian idols had been successively accepted, and the historical books of Scripture there is little notion of magic, except that wherever the false prophets are mentioned we have, no doubt, an indication of the prevalence of magical practices. We are especially told of Josiah that he put away the workers with familiar spirits, the wizards, and the teraphim, as well as the idols and the other abominations of Judah and Jerusalem, in performance of the commands of the book of the law which had been found (2 Kings xxii, 24).

But in the prophets we find several notices of the magic of the Hebrews in their times, and some of the magic of foreign nations. Isaiah says that the people had become workers of hidden arts (דִּבָּרֵי לִבְּשֵׁנִים) like the Philistines, and apparently alludes in the same place to the practice of magic by the Bene-Kedem (li, 6). The nation had not only abandoned true religion, but had become generally addicted to magic in the manner of the Philistines, whose name is E Canaanite or Aramaic, and is consistent with such a condition. The origin of the Bene-Kedem is doubtful, but it seems certain that as late as the time of the Egyptian wars in Syria, under the sixth dynasty, B.C. cir. 1800, a race, partly at least Mongolian, inhabited the valley of the Orontes, among whom, therefore, we should again expect popular practice of magic, and its prevalence with their neighbors. Balaam, too, dwelt with the Bene-Kedem, though he may not have been of their race. In another place the prophet reproves the people for seeking "unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto the wizards that chirp, and that mutter" (viii, 19). The practices of one class of magicians are still more distinctly described where it thus saith of Jerusalem: "And I will camp against thee round about, and will lay siege against thee with a mount, and I will raise forts against thee. And I will bring down, and [will] lay thee low; and the voice of thy song shall be low out of the dust, and thy voice shall be, as of one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground, and thy speech shall whisper out of the dust" (xxix, 4, 5). Isaiah alludes to the magic of the Egyptians when he says that in their calamity "they shall seek to the idols, and to the charmers (דָּעַן), and to them that have familiar spirits, and to the wizards (xix, 5). And in the same manner he thus taunts Babylon: "Stand now with thy charma, and with the multitude of thine enchantments, wherein thou hast labored from thy youth; if so thou shalt be as Enosh and Azirah if so thou mayest be snared with them. Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsels. Let now the viewers of the heavens [or astrologers], the star-gazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand up and save thee from [these things] that shall come upon thee" (xlvii, 18). The magic of Babylon is characteristic by the prominence given to astrology, no magicians being mentioned excepting practitioners of this art; unlike the case of the Egyptians, with whom astrology seems always to have held a lower place than with the Chaldean nation. In both instances the folly of those who practice magic is shown.

Micah, declaring the judgments coming for the crimes of his time, speaks of the prevalence of divination among prophets who most probably were such pretended prophets as the opponents of Jeremiah, not avowed prophets of idols, as Ahab's seem to have been. Concerning these prophets it is said, "Night [shall be] unto you, that ye shall not have a vision; and it shall be dark unto you, that ye shall not divine; and the sun shall go down over the prophets, and the day shall be dark over them. Then shall the seers be ashamed, and the diviners confounded; yea, they shall all cover their lip; for [there is] no answer of God" (viii, 6, 7). Let it be said, as to Jerusalem, "The heads thereof judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire, and the prophets thereof divide for money; yet will they lean upon the Lord, and say, [Is] not the Lord among us? none evil can come upon us" (ver. 11). These prophets seem to have practiced unlawful arts, and yet to have expected revelations. Jeremiah was constantly opposed by false prophets, who pretended to speak in the name of the Lord, saying that they had dreamed, when they told false visions, and who practiced various magical arts (xv, 14; xxiii, 24, 38; xxvii, 10, 11, 12). It is interesting to apply to those who counselled the people not to serve the king of Babylon may be used in contempt of the false prophets—xxix, 8, 9).

Ezekiel, as we should have expected, affords some remarkable details of the magic of his time, in the clear and forcible descriptions of his visions. From him we learn that fetialism was among the idolatries which the Hebrews, in the latest days of the kingdom of Judah, had adopted from their neighbors, like the Romans in the age of general corruption that caused the decline of the empire. In Ezekiel, in which he speaks of the abominations of Jerusalem, he enters the chambers of imagery in the Temple itself: "I went in and saw; and behold, every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel, portrayed upon the wall round about." Here seventy elders of the people were with him (chap. xiv, 12). This idolatry was probably borrowed from Egypt, for the description perfectly answers to that of the dark sanctuaries of Egyptian temples, with the sacred animals portrayed upon their walls, and that does not accord with the character of the Assyrian sculptures, where creeping things are not represented as objects of worship. With this low form of idolatry an equally low kind of magic obtained, practiced by prophetesses who for small rewards made amulets by which the people were deceived (xiii, 17, ad fin.). The passage must be allowed to be the more extended, it seems almost certain that Ezekiel compiled that amulets are referred to which were made and sold by these women, and perhaps also worn by them. We may probably read: "Woe to the [women] that sew pillows upon all joints of the hands (elbows or armholes) of the thick skirt (the skirt of every woman is fringed, see Prov. xiv, 2), and foretells a time when the very names of idols should be forgotten, and false prophets have virtually ceased (xiii, 1-4), yet in neither case does it seem certain that he is alluding to the usages of his own day.

10. In the Apocalypse we find indications that in the latter centuries preceding the Christian era magic was no longer practiced by the educated Jews. In the Wisdom of Solomon, the writer, speaking of the Egyptian magicians, treats their art as an imposture (xiv, 7). The book of Tobit is an exceptional case. If we hold that it was written in Persia or a neighboring country, and, with Ewald, date its composition not long after the fall of the Persian empire, it is obvious that it relates to a different state of society from that of the Jews of Egypt and Palestine. If, however, it was written in Palestine about the time of the Massacees, as others suppose, we must still remark that it refers rather to the superstitions of the common people than to those of the learned. In either case its pretensions make it unsafe to follow as indicating the opinions of the time at which it was written. It professes to relate to a period of which its writer would have known little, and borrows its idea of supernatural agency from Scripture, adding as much as was judged safe of current superstition.

11. In the N. Test. we read very little of magic. The coming of magi to worship Christ is indeed related (Matt. ii, 1-12), but we have no warrant for supposing that they were magicians from their name, which the A.V. not unreasonably renders "wise men." See Magic. Our Lord is not said to have been opposed by magicians, and the apostles and other early teachers of the Gospel seem to have rarely encountered them. Philip the deacon, when he preached at Samaria, found there Simon, a famous magician, commonly known as Simon Magus, who had had great power over the people; but he is not said to have been able to work wonders, nor, had it been so, is it likely that he would have soon been admitted into the Church (Acts viii, 5-28). When Barnabas and Paul were at Paphos, as they preached to the proconsul Sergius Paulus, Elymas, a Jewish sorcerer and false prophet (τόνα ἀνθράκα μάγων φασίςτοφρονίτη) withstood them, and was struck blind for a time at the word of Paul (xii, 6-12). At Ephesus, certain Jewish exorcists gained the crédito in the Temple among the populace, as they called it, and professed the practice of magical arts. "And many that believed came, and confessed, and showed their deeds. Many of them also which used..." curious arts brought their books together, and burned them before all: and they counted the price of them, and found [it] fifty thousand [pieces] of silver' (xix, 18, 19). Here both Jews and Greeks seem to have been greatly addicted to magic, even after they had nominally joined the Church. See ENTHUSIASM. In all these cases it appears that though the practitioners were generally or always Jews, the field of their success was with Gentiles, showing that among the Jews in general, or the educated class, the art had fallen into disrepute. Here, as before, there is no evidence of any real effect produced by the magicians. We have already noticed the remarkable cases of the 'destruction of a spirit of divination' (εγκομήνειν πνεύμα πτωτον) 'which brought her masters much gain by forestalling' (μακρυνοιον), from whom Paul cast out the spirit of divination (xvi, 16-18). This is a matter belonging to another subject than that of magic. See PROPHECTY.

Our examination of the various notices of magic in the Bible gives us this general result: They do not, as far as we can understand, once state positively that any but illusive results were produced by magical rites. They therefore afford no evidence that man can gain sufficient powers over the arts of Egypt to use at his will. This consequence goes some way towards showing that we may conclude that there is no such thing as real magic; for although it is dangerous to reason on negative evidence, yet in a case of this kind it is especially strong. Had any such arts ever been worked by magicians, surely the Scriptures would not have passed over a fact of so much importance, and one which would have rendered the prohibition of these arts far more necessary. The general belief of mankind in magic, or things akin to it, is of no worth, since the holding of such current superstition in some of its branches, if we push it to its legitimate consequences, would lead to the rejection of faith in God's government of the world, and the adoption of a creed far below that of Plato.

From the conclusion to which we have arrived, that there is no evidence in the Bible of real results having been worked by supernatural agency used by magicians, we may draw this important inference that the absence of any proof of the same in profane literature, ancient or modern, in no way militates against the credibility of the miracles recorded in Scripture. III. During the Middle Ages, and down almost to the 18th century, magic was greatly studied in Europe, and could boast of distinguished names, who attempted to treat it as a grand and mysterious science, by means of which the secrets of nature could be discovered, and a certain godlike power acquired over the "spirits" (or as we should now say, the "forces") of the elements. The principal students and professors of magic during the period referred to were pope Sylvester II, Albertus Magnus, Roger Bacon, Raymond Lully, Pico della Mirandola, Paracelsus, Cornelius Agrippa, Trithemius, Van Helmont, and Jerome Cardan. See Huet's L'Or de l'Althen et de neige, Ueber, Idee, Umfang und Geschichte (Ments, 1890), and Emmerseer's Geschichte der Magie (2d edit. Leipzig, 1884; transl. into English by W. Howell, 2 vols. London, 1884). For an interesting account of the manœuvres of the "art," consult of the Dogme et Rite de la Haute Magie (2 vols. Paris, 1850), by Elijphas Levi, one of its latest adherents. For monographs on the general subject, see Volbeding, Index Programmata, p. 160. Many curious notices have been collected by Thomson in his Philosophy of Magic (translated from the French of Salvayre, London, 1846; 2 vols.). See also Maury, La Magie et L'astrologie (Paris, 1860). The Arabian Nights' Entertainments is well known as a classical text-book on Oriental views of magic. For other literature, compare Necromancer. Some of the legendary wonder-working, which seems to have been the basis of the traditionary fame of free-masonry, see Solomon. Alchemy and astrology (q. v.) have likewise furnished their quota of interest to the subject. For the medieval thaumaturgic practices, see Ronicheliana; for the later superstitions, see Witchcraft; for the modern, see Spiritualism.

Magician (Chald. בָּלִּים, charton); Heb. plural בַּלִּים, chartomin, thought by Gesenius, Theeau, p. 520, to be of Hebrew origin, signifying "sacred scroll," a title applied to the 'wise men' of Egypt (Gen. xxi, 8, 22; Exod. vii, 11; viii, 7, 18, 19; ix, 11) and of Babyon (Dan. i, 20; ii, 2). The word 'magicians' is not in either case properly applied, as the magi properly are usually assigned to Persia rather than to Babylon or Egypt, and should be altogether avoided in such application, seeing that it has acquired a sense different from that which it once bore. The term rather denotes 'wise men,' as they called themselves and were called by others, but as we should call them, "men of infinite learning and science," their exclusive possession of which in their several countries enabled them occasionally to produce effects which were accounted supernatural by the people. Pythagoras, who was acquainted with Egypt and the East, and who was not unaware of the unattainable depths of ignorance which lie under the highest attainable conditions of human knowledge, thought the modest title of philosopher (φιλοσοφος), 'lover of wisdom,' more becoming, and accordingly he brought it into use; but that of 'wise men,' still retained its high signification. It is thought that the Egyptian chartomin were those of the Egyptian priests who had charge of the sacred records. There can be little doubt that they belonged to some branch of the priesthood, seeing that the more recondite departments of learning were cultivated as a matter of course in that powerful caste." See MAG. See Jablonski, Prolog. in Pseudep. Ephraim, p. 91 sq.; Creuzer, Mythologie und Symbolik, i, 245; Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, ii, 516 sq.; Kenrick, Egypt under the Pharaohs, i, 383. See MAGIC.

Magician. The early Christians were derided by this name. Celsus and others pretended that our Saviour, because he wrought miracles, practiced magic, which he had learned in Egypt. Augustine speaks of a popular belief among the enemies of the Christian faith that our Saviour had written books on magic, soon after entered Princeton College, and, subsequent to his graduation from the theological seminary, was for two years tutor in the college. In 1821 he was installed pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth, "to which he was bound as by a golden chain, giving them the services of his soul, with willing and grateful hearts, they yielded him, at the call of God, to enter his eternal joy," May 10, 1865. Dr. Magie declined many calls to other stations of responsibility and eminance, believing the pastoral relation too sacred to be dissolved but at the unquestionable bidding of the great Master. "He was indeed a "man of science."... Combining temperance, charity, humility, prudence, sound judgment, simplicity, and earnestness, he was a faithful, persevering, successful laborer in the vineyard committed to his charge. He preached and prayed with a convincing and pleasing and moving power into the hearts of his hearers. None went from any sermon without having had the way of salvation by Christ affectionately and clearly presented to them." He was a trustee of the College of New Jersey; a pillar in the Theological Seminary: a member of the American Board of Foreign Missions, also of the Publishing Committee of the American Tract Society, etc. Besides several able published discourses, Dr. Magill was the author of The Spring-time of Life (an excellent volume of 580 pages, published by the American Tract Society, N. York, 1832, 16mo; 1855, 16mo), "in which his own character, and that of the people engaged by Callahan and the young, are happily perpetuated." See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 128.

Magill, Charles Beatty, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Wellsville, Ohio, Oct. 3, 1840; graduated at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, in 1865; studied divinity at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny City, Pa., and was licensed to preach at Rotan, Texas, in April, 1881. In the winter of 1862-63 he was sent to Princeton, N. J.; subsequently he preached in Virginia and Illinois; and was finally ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Birmingham, Iowa. He afterwards spent a short time in the service of the Christian Commission in Georgia, where he contracted the illness of which he died, Aug. 28, 1864. Mr. Magill was thoroughly educated and devoutly pious. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 96.

Maginiss, John Sharp, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Butler Co., Pa., June 18, 1855; was licensed to preach by the Water-ville College, W. Va., in 1887; studied at Water-ville College, Me., Brown University, and the theological seminary in Newton, Mass.; was ordained pastor of the First Baptist Church of Portland, Me., in Oct., 1882, and there remained until ill health compelled him to remove. In the winter of 1887-88 he was pastor of the Pine Street Church of Providence, R. I.; later he became professor of Biblical theology in the literary and theological institution at Hamilton, N. Y. (now Madison University); in 1850, professor of Biblical and pastoral theology in the new theological school connected with the Board of Education, and also professor of the intellectual and moral philosophy in the university. He was made M.A. by Waterville College while at Hamilton, and D.D. by Brown University in 1844. Failing health finally compelled him to resign his professorship in the theological school until his death, Oct. 15, 1852. Dr. Maginiss published only a few detached articles, among them one on the philosophy of Cousin (published in the Christian Review), which attracted much attention. See Sprague, Annals, vi, 766; Christian Rev. vol. xviii (Jan.).

Magister Disciplinae (master of discipline) was the title of certain ecclesiastical officers in the ancient Church. It was a custom in Spain, in the time of the Gothic kings, about the end of the 6th century, for parents to dedicate their young children to the service of the Church. They were taken for this purpose into a bishop's family, and educated, under his supervision, by a discreet and grave person, who was generally a presbyter, and was called magister disciplinae. The second and fourth councils of Toledo prescribed the duties of this master, the chief of which was, that he should vigilantly watch over the moral character and behavior of the young, and instruct them in the rules and discipline of the Church.

Magister Sacri Palatii (master of the sacred palace). This office was created in 1218 by pope Honanrius III, and was first held by St. Dominic. The latter, during his residence at Rome, had noticed that the persons employed by the cardinals and authorities made a bad use of their unemployed time. He therefore had commenced, with the consent of the pope, to give them religious instruction during their leisure time, and was rewarded by Honorius with the above office. The task assigned was to watch that which Dominic had previously chosen for himself, but the pope increased it by directing that the employes of the papal household, besides attending to other duties, should also attend these instructions. The office was made perpetual to the Dominicans. Many privileges were gradually attached to it. Thus a bull of pope Eugenius IV, of 1486, ordained that in case of need the Magist er s p a l a t i i s should be placed next to the A u d i t u l a t o r e of the Rota; no one was to preach in the chapel without his permission; and on his being temporarily absent from Rome, he was to invest his substitute with the same privileges. These prerogatives were confirmed by a bull of Sixtus V, which, notwithstanding the resignation of the Magistr e s s p a l a t i i s of reproving the preacher in the papal chapel, even in the presence of the pope. Leo X, in 1616, decided that nothing should be printed in the diocese of Rome without the consent of that official and of the cardinal-vicar. In 1625 Urban VIII went further, and forbad the monasteries to publish in the States of the Church without this authorization. Pius V, in 1570, connected with the office a canonization of St. Peter, which was, however, taken from it in 1688 by Sixtus V. Finally, Alexander VII gave the Magistr e s s p a l a t i i s the precedence before all the other clergy composing the Roman cabinet. These privileges, however, were gradually taken back, and the censorship of books now alone remains to the Magistr e s s p a l a t i i s. See Mun son, Proc. Geschicht. d. Monachvorden, viii, 38; Helyot, Gesch. d. geselt. Kl.terent. u. Relikv.orden (Leipzig, 1748), iii, 262; Schruck, G. xii, 33, 86; Herzog, *Real-Encyclop. viii, 868.

Magistrate (the representative in the Auth. Vers. of several Heb. and Gr. words, as below), a public civil officer invested with authority. Among the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, the corresponding terms had a much wider significance than the term magistrate has with us. The Hebrew שָׁשיִים, shophetin, or, judges, were a kind of magistrates, with a limited jurisdiction. See Judges.* The phrase in Judges xviii,7,"And there was no magistrate in the land, that might put them to shame in anything," ought to be rendered, "And there were none to harm (עָשַׁב) at all in the land; and they were possessed (בְּנֵבִיא, govern) of wealth." So, also, the terms עִם עִם and, shophetin re-dajamin, rendered "magistrates and judges" (Ezra vii, 25), would be better rendered "judges and rulers." The עִם עִם, segamin, rendered "rulers," properly nobles, were Babylonian magistrates, prefects of provinces (Jer. ii, 23, 28, 57; Ezek. xxiii, 6). The same name was borne by the Jewish magistrates at the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra ix, 2; Neh. ii, 16; iv, 14; xiii, 11). The word דֶּבֶר, dāber, rendered magistrate (Luke xi, 58; Tit. iii, 1), properly signifies one just in power, authority; hence "a prince" (Matt. xx, 25; 1 Cor. i, 6, 8); "a ruler" (Acts iv, 26; Rom. xiv, 17); the term is also used for the "kings of the earth" (Rev. i, 6); and of Moses as the judge and leader of the Hebrews (Acts vii, 27, 35). It is spoken of magistrates of any kind, e.g. the high-priest (Acts xxiii, 5); of civil judges (Luke xii, 58; Acts xvi, 19); also of a ruler of the synagoge (Luke viii, 41; Matt. ix, 18, 20; Mark v, 22); and of persons of weight and influence among the Pharisees and other sects at Jerusalem, who also were members of the sanhedrim (Luke xiv, 1; xvii, 18; xxiii, 13, 35; xxiv, 20; John iii, 1; viii, 38, 48; xii, 42; Acts iii, 17; iv, 5, 6, 8; xiii, 27; xiv, 6). The term is also used of Satan, the prince or chief of the fallen angels (Matt. ix, 34; xii, 24; Mark iii, 22; Luke xi, 15; John xii, 31; xiv, 30, 31; xvi, 11; Eph. ii, 2). So likewise the kindred דַּפֶּר (Luke xi, 11; Tit. iii, 1). The word ρημάργος, rendered "magistrate," properly signifies leader of an army, commander; general. So of the ten Athenian commanders, with whom the polemarch was joined. Afterwards only one or two were sent abroad with the army, as circumstances required, and the others had charge of military affairs at home, l. q. war-minister. In other Greek cities the ρημάργος was the chief magistrate: prefect. The term was also used of Roman officials, the consul and the dictator. In Roman colonies and municipal towns, the chief magistrates were usually two in number, called duumviri: oe casionally four or six, quattuorvirii, scrieri, who also were sometimes styled pretors, the same as the Greek ἐπιστήμονας. Hence, in the New Testament, this term is used for the Roman duumviri, pretors, magistrates of Philippi, which was a Roman colony (Acts xxvi, 20, 22, 55, 30, 36). The word ἐπιστήμονας is also used collectively for these persons, as in Text, as if it might signify the "powers" for rulers, magistrates (Luke xii, 11; Rom. xiii, 2, 3; Tit. iii, i). The "higher powers" (Rom. xiii, i) are the "ruling authorities"—the magistrates in office—all invested with civil power, from the emperor or king, as supreme, to the lowest, who are civil officers who are employed in making and executing the laws. The Roman emperor and some of the subordinate magistrates wore a small sword or dagger, the symbol of punishment, as a part of their official costume. SeeGov.

In the earliest periods of Jewish history the magistrates were the hereditary chieflains, but afterwards the judicial office became elective. In the time of Moses, the larger collections of families were fifty-nine in number, and the heads of these families, together with the twelve princes of the tribes, composed a council of seventy-one members; but the subdivisions afterwards were more numerous, and the number of heads of families greater, for we find no less than two hundred and fifty chiefs of this rank included in the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. The דֶּרֶךְ וּנְאָפֶל, skotierim, or genealogists, are mentioned in connection with the elders—that is, the princes of tribes and heads of families. See or. 2 Sam. xxiii, 1. See the genealogical tables. Under Joshua, they communicated the orders of the general to the soldiers; and in the time of the Kings, the chief skotier had a certain control over the army, although he was not a military commander. The skotier, who were superintended by this chief, were distributed into every city, and performed the duties of their office for it and the surrounding district. As they kept the genealogical tables, they had an accurate list of the people, and were acquainted with the age, ability, and domestic circumstances of each individual; but they are not to be confounded with another officer who kept the muster-rolls, and whose name had a similar etymology. Moses added a new class of magistrates for the administration of justice, which, he informs us, was not of divine appointment, but was suggested by his father-in-law Je- thro. He divided the people into tens, fifties, hundreds, and thousands, and nominated wise and pious judges having each of these divisions. They were selected, for the most part, from the heads of families, genealogists, or other people of rank (Exod. xviii, 13, 26). Difficult questions were brought before Moses himself, and, after his death, before the chief magistrate of the nation. These judges were included among the rulers, and when Joshua summoned them to the general assemblies; and they are mentioned, in one instance, before the genealogists (Deut. xxxi, 29; Josh. viii, 30). When the magistrates of all the cities collecting any one tribe to be collected, they formed the supreme court, or legislative assembly of the tribe; and when the magistrates of all the tribes were convened together, they formed the general council of the nation, and could legislate conjointly for all the tribes they represented. After the settlement in Canaan, although the chief magistrate of the Jewish state was the king, the supreme ruler for the whole community could be legally chosen when the necessities of the state required it, who was designated a judge, or governor. See Judge. In the book of Deuteronomy (xxvii, 14, 15) we find Je- thro, the lawgiver among the Midianites, who, having arrived in the Promised Land, they wished to have a king like the other nations round about them, they were to receive one whom he would appoint, and not a stranger. Josephus and others have correctly understood this passage not to mean that God commanded the Israelites to de-not a Gentile. See King. Judges, genealogists, the heads of families or clans, and those who, from the relation they sustained to the common class of people, may be called the princes of the tribes, retained their authority after as well as before the introduction of a monarchic form of government, and acted the part of a legis- lature, who alone were the depository of the law. But with the civil officers who were employed in making and executing the laws. The Roman emperor and some of the subordinate magistrates wore a small sword or dagger, the symbol of punishment, as a part of their official costume. See Gov.

In the earliest periods of Jewish history the magistrates were the hereditary chieflains, but afterwards the judicial office became elective. In the time of Moses, the larger collections of families were fifty-nine in number, and the heads of these families, together with the twelve princes of the tribes, composed a council of seventy-one members; but the subdivisions afterwards were more numerous, and the number of heads of families greater, for we find no less than two hundred and fifty chiefs of this rank included in the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. The דֶּרֶךְ וּנְאָפֶל, skotierim, or genealogists, are mentioned in connection with the elders—that is, the princes of tribes and heads of families. See or. 2 Sam. xxiii, 1. See the genealogical tables. Magistrates, an authority for her interference in temporal affairs. See JOHN POWER OF THE ROMAN POWER OF THE POPE. In Protestant Churches that are united with the state, these Romish views are manifest, though in a somewhat different form. The state controlling the Church, the magistrate is clothed with authority even in matters really pertaining to the domain of the ecclesiastical state. Thus the Westminster Confession gives to the magistrate extraordinary power in or about sacred things. The earlier Scotch Reformers went still further, as in the first Confession. The Books of Discipline are no less explicit. The First Book of Discipline, We do respect unto the Church, so that what penalties shall be required of such; but this we fear not to affine, that the one and the other deserve death; for if he who doth falsifie the sale, subscription, or coin of a king, is judged worthy of death, what shall we think of him who plainly doth falsifie the seals of Christ Jesus, Prince of the kings of the earth? If Darius pronounced that a bark should be taken from the house of that man, and he himselfe hanged upon it, that durst attempt to hinder the re-edifying of the material temple, what shall we say of those that contemnously blaspheme the name of God, and make sport with the seals of God, which is the soules and bodies of the elect, to be purged by the true preaching of Christ Jesus from the superstition and damnable idolatry in which they have been long plunget and holden captive? If ye, as God forbid, declare your selves careless over the true religion, and do not fear your master, God, or the powers that did not usually possess; so also Felix, Festus, and the other procurators of Judea. Some of the procurators were dependent on the nearest consul or president; for instance, those of Judea were dependent on the consul-general, or president of Syria. They enjoyed, however, great authority, and possessed the power of life and death. The only privilege, in respect to the officers of government, that was granted by the procurators of Judea to the nation was the appointment from among them of persons to manage and collect the taxes. In all other things they administered the government themselves, except that they frequently had recourse to the counsel of other persons (Acts xxiii, 24-55; xxv, 23). See PROVINCE.

The military force that was granted to the procurators of Judea consisted of six cohorts, of which five were stationed in the vicinity of the city where the procurator usually resided, and one at Jerusalem, in the tower of Antonia, which was so situated as to command the Temple (Acts x, 1; xxi, 52). It was the duty of the military cohorts to execute the procurator's commands and to repress seditions and demonstrations of the people (Acts xvi, 1; John xix, 23). On the return of the great festivities, when there were vast crowds of people at Jerusalem, the procurators themselves went from Cesarea to that city in order to be at hand to suppress any commotions which might arise (Matt. xxvii, 2-5; John xviii, 29; xix, 38). See GOVERNMENT.

Magistrates. In the early Church, magistrates whatever the grade of their office, were under the spiritual jurisdiction of the clergy; and if they were impious or profane, they were subject to censure and excommunication. The Council of Arles, called by Constantine, ratified this ecclesiastical power. Sulpicius Severus, a pupil of Prolemais, excommunicated Andronicus, the governor for his blasphemies and cruelties, and with him all his accomplices. Athanasius pronounced a similar sentence on the governor of Libya. Ambrose denied the communion to the emperor Theodosius. But such a spiritual sentence did not deprive the magistrate of his lawful civil authority. The Church rendered allegiance to the rightful governor, whether heathen or heretic; but she had a perfect right to exclude from her fellowship any magistrate of erroneous creed or depraved life. She did not attempt to interfere with a magistrate's temporal authority while she refused him ecclesiastical fellowship. The Roman Catholic Church has sought, in this practice of mind exerted in contending dangers and difficulties, in scouring temptations, and despising earthly pomp and splendor.—Ciceró, De Offic. lect. i. ch. xx.; Grove, Moral Philosophy, ii. 268; Steele, Christian Hero; Watts, Self-murder; Buck, Theological Dictionary, a. v. See Courage; Fortitude.

Magnificat. Paulus Magnus, a Roman general, for a short time emperor of the West, was born in Gaul about A.D. 800. Partly by courage and partly by flattery, he gained the confidence of the emperor Constans, and was intrusted with the command of the imperial guards, the famous Jovian and Heracleian battalions. He fell out with Mercurialis, chancellor of the imperial exchequer, conspired against Constans and caused himself to be elected emperor by the soldiers in 850. He was recognised as such by Italy, Spain, Britanny, and Africa, but the Illyrian legions elected Vetranio, who was soon joined by Constans, brother of the late emperor. The war between Magnentius and Constans ended in the defeat of the former at Murina, Sept. 28, 392. As Magnentius saw that his soldiers would deliver him up to his enemies, he committed suicide at Lyons about the middle of August, 395. Zosimus, ii. 7, relates the whole affair as overbearing his people, and weak and irresolute in adversity. He is shown to have been a Christian by the cross being stamped on his coins. The only part he took in ecclesiastical affairs was to prevent, for two years, Constans from favoring Arianism. As for himself, he looked upon religion from a political point of view; in order to conciliate the West, he gave more freedom to the heathen worship. He had relied on Athanasius to win over Egypt to his side, but in this he was mistaken, as Athanasius upheld the rights of the legitimate successor of Constans.—Herzog, Real-Encyclop., viii. 686; Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. and Mythol. ii. 900.

Magni,John, a Swedish prelate, was born at Wex-} ioe in 1598; travelled extensively on the Continent, especially in Germany, and on his return home became professor of history at his alma mater, the University of Upsala. Queen Christina, who succeeded her noble husband, Gustavus Adolphus, the great defender of the Protestant faith, in the government of Sweden (1632), frequently availed herself of the counsels of John Magni, and created him bishop of Skara. He died in 1651, three years previous to Christina's abdication of the throne. See Swensson. Magni took a great interest in the edification of Sweden, and did much to afford his countrymen far superior advantages than they had enjoyed previous to this. His writings are of a secular nature. See Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxii. 718; Biographie Universelle, a. v.

Magni,Valerian, a celebrated Italian ecclesiastic, was born in Milan, Italy, in 1486; was appointed by pope Urban VIII apostolical missionary to the Northern kingdoms; influenced the pope to imprison the Jesuitesses in 1631; was himself imprisoned in Vienna some time afterwards, through the influence of the Jesuits, for having said that the pope's primacy and infallibility were founded on tradition and not on Scripture, but regained his liberty under the favor of the emperor Ferdinand III, after having written warmly against the Jesuits. He died at Salzburg in 1661. Magni was celebrated as a controversial writer against the Protestant, as well as his philosophical works in favor of Descartes and against Aristotle. One of his apologetical letters may be found in the collection called Tuba Magni, vol. ii.—Hook, Eccles. Biog. vii. 209.

Magnificat, a song in praise of the Virgin used in the evening service of the Roman Catholic, the Lutheran, and Anglican churches. Its name Magnificat it obtains from the Latin words in the Vulgate text, Magnificat virgo Maria. Magnify the Lord, etc. It was introduced into the public worship of the Church about the year 506. In the 6th century it was chanted in the French churches. In the English Church it is to be said or sung after the first lesson, at every prayer, unless the 98th Psalm, called Magnus. The Roman Catholic Church commemorates several saints of this name.

1. St. Magnus, Magnus, Magnus, of whom we possess two biographical notices, one by Peres, and another by recess, who was a native of Ireland, built the convent of Flamen after the destruction of St. Gall, converted the inhabitants of Augsburg, and was buried there, and died in 656. He is commemorated Sept. 6. See Koch-Stemf. 2. St. Magnus, the apostle of the Orkneys. The inhabitants of these islands possessed a large goblet which he is said to have drained: it was offered at once to every person present, and it was considered a happy omen if one emptied it. 3. St. Magnus, of Alltun, in Venicia, became bishop of Osboda about 638; transmitted his episcopal charge to Heracleas, and died about 650. He is commemorated July 21. 4. St. Magnus, died in the early half of the 6th century, as bishop of Milan (522-529). He is commemorated Nov. 5.—Herzog, Real-Encyclop., viii. 687; Pierer, Universal Lex. x, 718. (J. N. P.)

Magnus, John or Jonas, a noted Swedish prelate, was born at Linköping March 19, 1498, of noble parentage. When only eighteen years old he obtained a canonate at his native place; later he continued his theological studies at Louvain, afterwards in several universities of Germany and Italy, and resided several years at Rome, where he gained the favor of the papal court. In 1520 Persus honored him with the doctorate of theology. A short time after, probably in 1523 (the year of Vasa's ascension to the throne), he was dispatched to his native country by pope Adrian VI to stem the inroads of the reformed doctrines in that northern country. Gustavus Vasa received Magnus kindly, and elevated him to the archbishopric of Upsala. Later, the Vasa, or Gustavus Vasa himself interested towards Protestantism, Magnus made himself unpopular, and was finally obliged to quit the country, after Lutheranism and religious liberty had been established in Sweden (1527). Several later attempts to stem the progress of the reformed doctrines proved unsuccessful, and he returned disheartened to Rome in 1541. He died at Rome March 22, 1544. One of his works deserves our notice, Historia Metropolitana seu episcoporum et archiepiscoporum Upsalensium (Rome, 1557, 1560, fol,). See Niceron, Mémoires, xxxv, a. v.; Chauffe, Diction. Hist. a. v.; Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxii, 739.

Magnus, Olau, a Swedish prelate, brother of the preceding, was born at Linköping, near the close of the 15th century; was provost of the church at Storgren when Gustavus I sent him to Rome to secure the papal confirmation to the appointment of his brother John to the archbishopric of Upsala. It is not exactly known when Olau returned to Sweden, but it is certain that after 1537 he was constantly with his brother as his secretary. After John's decease Olau was appointed by the pope to succeed the archbishopric of Upsala, but the Reformation had in the meanwhile changed the religious position of his soul so entirely that he never filled the archbishopric chair. He attended the Council of Trent by order of pope Paul III. Hence the mistake on the part of some writers of making John Magnus a member of the Trinitarian gathering, which took place two years later. after his decease (1544). Olaus returned to Rome from Trent, and died there in 1568. His works, which are of much interest, are given in Hoefner, Novae. Brev. Generale, xxxii, 734.

Ma'agog (Heb. Mapog, מַּעֲגוֹג, region of Gog [see below]; Sog. Māgo'y, Vulg. Mago'), the second son of Japhet (Gen. x., 2; Chron. v., 6). B.C. post 2514. Various etymologies of the name have been suggested. Knobel (Völkerl. p. 63) proposes the Sanscrit mukh or maha, 'great,' and a Persian word signifying 'mountain,' in which case the reference would be to the Caucasian range. Others take the word as maya, and suppose it to be applied to some of the heights of that range. This etymology is supported by Von Bohlen ([Intro. to Gen. ii.], 211). On the other hand, Hitzig (Comm. in Ex.) connects the first syllable with the Coptic ma', 'place,' or thae Sanscrit maha, 'land,' and the second with a Persian root, kosh, 'the moon,' or as though the term had reference to moon-worshipers.

In Ezekiel (xxxviii, 2; xxxix, 6) it occurs as the name of a nation, and, from the associated names in all the passages where it occurs, it is supposed to represent certain Scythian or Tartar tribes descended from the son of Japhet. See Histoire. Thus, in Genesis, it is coupled with Gomer (the Cimmerian) and Madai (the Medes), among the Japhethites, while Ezekiel joins it with Meshech and Tubal (הַמְשֶׁךָ וּתַבּ, "chief prince," should be prince of Rosh), as the name of a great and powerful people, dwelling in the extreme west of the earth, whom they would invade the Holy Land at a future time. Their kingdom is the Gog of the Apocalypse.

The people of Magog further appear as having a force of cavalry (xxxviii, 15), and as armed with the bow (xxxix, 8). The oldest version gives the word unchanged; but Josephus (Ant. i., 6, 5) interprets it by Scythians (Σιθυδαίοι), and so Jerome; but Scaliger renders it Persians. "Michaels (Sulp. ad Lex. Heb. 1471), Rosenmuller (Scholar. in Gen. x., 2), and Gesenius (Theaurus, s. v.) adopt the view that the Scythians generally are intended. Bochart (Phyleg. iii., 19) suggests that the name Gog appears in I'wappo'w, the name of a district near to that through which the Araxes flows (Strabo, p. 629) and this falls in with the supposition that the Magogites were Scythian, for the traditions of the latter represent their nation as coming originally from the vicinity of the Araxes (Dod. Soc. ii. 23). Since Bochart's time the general consensus of scholars in favor of regarding the eastern Scythians as the Magog of Genesis is that Kiepert 'associates the name with Marcia, or Maha, and applies it to Scythian nomad tribes which forced themselves in between the Arian or Arianian Medes, Kurds, and Arme dans (Keil and Delitzsch, Bibl. Comment. on the O.T. [Cl. ii. 197]) passim, places the name in Persia; though in the map accompanying his Biblekert it is placed to the north of the Euxine. Knobel also places Magog there, and connects the Scythian tribes thus named with those which spread into Europe, and were allied to the Scythians, who gave their name ultimately to the whole north-east of Europe, and are the ancestors of the Slavic nations now existing (Kitto).

It is certain that the term Scythian was a collective title of the remote savage tribes of the north in a similar manner to the use of Magog (Cassir. Notiti. ii. 738 sq.). See Scythia. There are certain and the earliest times that a legend of the enemies of religion and civilization lived in that quarter (Haukauem's Tribes of the Caucasus, p. 55). From the accounts found among the Aborigines, Persians, and Syrians, some of which are embellished with various fables, we learn that they comprehended under the designation Tadjj and Magjji all the less known barbarous people of the north-east and north-west of Asia. (See the Koran, xviii. 94-99; xxi. 98; Ammian. Bibl. Orient. iii. 11, 16, 17, 20; Hylander, Spec. opus. cosmog. pt. 30-32 [Lon. 1600]); Klaproth, Histor. Curius. 2d ed. (On. ii. 1); Herbelot, Ath. Orient. 2d ed. (On. ii. 181 sq. ; Flügel, in the Hal. Encyl. iv. 74. 78 sq.). Yet, though the Gog and Magog of the Hebrews may have had an equally vague acceptance, it nevertheless seems to have pointed more precisely to the northern tribes of the Caucasus, between the Euxine and the Caspian Sea, and to the people of that region, it seems, were a terror to middle Asia; and they have often been named the Scythians of the East. Jerome says of Magog that it means 'Scythian nations, fierce and innumerable, who live beyond the Caucasus and the lake Mecost, and near the Caspian Sea, and spread out even onward to India.' The people dwelling among the Caucasian Mountains have preserved their original character down to the present hour, as is evident from their recent long-continued contests with the Russians. The famous Caucasian wall, probably the foundation of some of the successors of Alexander the Great, as a defence against the incursions of the northern barbarians, which extended from Derbend, on the western shore of the Caspian, to near the Euxine or Black Sea, is still called "the wall of Gog and Magog." (See Reitnig, Breschi. d. Caucasus, ii. 78.) The traveller Ginzel visited this wall in 1770, in the course of the scientific mission upon which he was sent by the Russian government. From Derbend, on the Caspian Sea, the head-quarters of the Russian military guard in that country, Ginzel directed his course westward, towards the Euxine Sea. He met with some ancient wall, which he describes as in some places thirty feet high, and for large distances nearly entire, and in other places partially or wholly fallen down. There are watch-towers along the wall at signal distances; two of these he ascended, and from their top he could discern the snowy ridges of Caucasus. This wall seems to have been built in almost a straight line from the Caspian to the Euxine, and the watch-towers and fortresses were probably erected as a means of keeping up communication between Derbend, the garrison at the eastern extremity, but some time or other it was apparently abandoned, and the fastnesses in the mountains. (See Bayer, De Muro Caucasico, in Acta Acad. Scientiar. Petropoli, i. 425; Ker Porter, Travels, ii. 520; Ritter, Erdk. ii. 884 sq.)

In Rev. xx. 7, 9, the terms Gog and Magog are evidently used tropically, as names of the enemies of Christianity, who will endeavor to extirpate it from the earth, but will thereby bring upon themselves signal destruction. But that Ezekiel, in his prophecy, meant to be understood as predicting the invasion of Palestine by Gog and Magog in the literal sense, is hardly credible. He uses these names to designate distant and savage nations; and in the same way John has been able to employ the word barbarians. That both writers should employ these two names in a tropical way is no more strange than that we should employ the words Scythian, Tartar, Indian, etc., in the same manner. Nothing could be more natural than for Essel tiel, who has been able to create new names, to adopt Magog and Magog, since they were the formidable enemies of all that region; and that John, writing on the same subject, should retain the same names, was equally natural. (See Stuart's Comment. on the Apoc. ad loc.) See Goo.

Mag'or-mis'sabbib (Heb. Magor 'mis-sabbib', מַגְּוֹר מִזְיָאָב, terror from round about; Sept. Μισίσσας κυκλοστρόφημος, Vulg. Pavor unique), an epithet applied to the divine instance of Jeremiah to the persecuting Pashur (q. v.), emblematical of his signal fate, as explained in the context (Jer. xx., 3). "It is remarkable that the same phrase occurs in several other passages of Jeremiah (vi. 25; xxx; 10; iv. 1; xlii. 29; Lam. ii. 22), and is only found besides in Psa. xxx.i. 13" (Smith).

Mag'pinash (Heb. Magpinash, מַגְּפִּנָשׁ, perhaps for מַגְּפִּנָשׁ, moth-slayer; Sept. Μαγγηπανος v. r. Μαγγηπανος, Vulg. Maggiphanus). A chief Levite, son of Jehiel, who was appointed in the sacred covenant instituted on the return from Babylon (Neh. x., 20). B.C. cir. 410. Some suppose the name, however, to be the same as Maghish (q. v.) of Ezra ii., 30.

Maha-bharata (from the Sans. mahat—changed to māhā—great, and Bhārata, a famous Hindu prince) is the name of a great epic poem of ancient India. As its main story relates to the contest between two rival families, both descendants of a king, Bhārata, the title probably implies “the great history of the descendants of a king.” The immense size of its scope and content of upwards of 100,000 verses, each containing 32 syllables, and is divided into 18 parvans or books. That this huge composition was not the work of one single individual, but a production of successive ages, clearly appears from the multifariousness of its contents, from the difference of such episodes which characterizes its various parts, and even from the contradictions which disturb its harmony. Hindu tradition ascribes it to Vyāsa; but as Vyāsa means “the distributor or arranger,” and as the same individual is also the reputed compiler of the Vedas, Purāṇas, and several other works, it is obvious that no historical value can be assigned to this generic name.

The contents of the poem may be distinguished into the leading story and the episodical matter connected with it. The former is probably founded on real events in the oldest history of India, though in the epic narrative it will be difficult to disentangle the reality from the fiction.

The story (c. 1/4 of the whole poem) comprises the contest of the celebrated families called the Kauravas and Pandavas, ending in the victory of the latter, and in the establishment of their rule over the northern part of India. Of course no part is assigned in the poem to the deities, and, consequently, Hindu mythology is pretty extensively interwoven with these events of semi-historical Hindu antiquity. This episodical matter, as it were, incidentally linked with the main story, may be distributed under three principal heads. One category of such episodes comprises narratives relating to the ancient or mythical history of India, as, for instance, the epistles of Nala and Sakuntalā; a second is more strictly mythological, comprising cosmogony and theogony; a third is didactic or dogmatic—it refers to law, religion, morals, and views on other subjects. In the celebrated Bhagavadgītā, and the principal portions of the 12th and 18th books. By means of this episodical matter, which at various periods, and often without regard to consistency, was superadded to the original structure of the work, the Mahābhārata gradually became a collection of all that was needed to be known by an educated Hindu; in fact, it became the encyclopedia of India, notwithstanding that the Brahmanic authors themselves intended it mainly for the Kṣatriyas, or military caste, whose history, interests, religion, and deities it specially dwells on. The text of the Mahābhārata has been published at Calcutta (5 vols. 4to, 1834–1839. Vol. v is a table of contents). Two other editions are in course of publication at Bombay. The best researches on it are those by Lassen, in his Zeitschrift für die Kunde der Morgenlande (1857–59), and in his Indische Altertumskunde. A sort of analysis of the leading story of the Mahābhārata (not of the episodes) has lately been given by F. G. Eichhoff (Poesie Héroïque des Indiens, Paris, 1860), and by Professor Monier Williams (Indian Epic Poetry, London, 1863). See also Schack, Strömern von Ganges (Berl. 1856); Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.

Maha-deva (i. e. “the great god”) is one of the names by which the Hindu god Siva is called. In Buddhist history, Mahādeva, who lived 200 years after the death of the Buddha Sākyamuni, or 483, is a renowned teacher who caused a schism in the Buddhist Church. His adversities accuse him of every possible crime; but, as he is ranked among the Arhats, his eminence cannot be matter of doubt. The school founded by him is called Pārāca, aita. See W. Wasawiel, Der Bhuddhismus, etc. (St. Petersburg, 1860).

Mahādevi or Mahdhī (Arab. director, sovereign, or pontiff) is the surname, by way of excellence, of the twelfth and last imam (q. v.) of the race of Ali. This Mahādi, who bore the same name with the false prophet, being called Abulcassim Mohammed, was born in the year of the Hegira 255, and, according to Persian tradition, when nine years old, was shut up in a cage or cistern by his mother, and is there kept till he shall appear at the end of the world as one of the Antichrist, and make of the two laws, the Mussulman and Christian, but one. Some among them believe that this imam was twice hidden; the first time from his birth to the age of 74 years, during which interval he secretly conversed with his disciples without being seen by others, because he who preceded him hade been poisoned by the caliphs, who knew their pretensions, and feared a revolt in their favor. The second retreat of this imam is from the time his death was made known to the time which Providence has appointed for his manifestation. The disciples of this Mahādi give him the title of Mōrebatken, the secret or concealed. There is in Chaldæa, in a little province called by the Arabians Akras, a castle named Hem Mahalādi, where all the waters of that country join and form a marsh, which runs into the sea. It is here, according to the billets, that Mahādi will make his appearance. See D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v.; Broughton, Bibl. Hist. Soc. vol. ii. s. v.; Malcolm, Hist. of Persia, ii, 345, note.

Mahā-Kala is another name of the Hindu divinity Śiva (q. v.).

Mahā-Kail. See KAIL.

Mahā-kṣayapa is the name of one of the main repositories of the Buddhist Sākyawmi (q. v.). He arranged metaphysically the portion of the sacred writings of the Buddhists called Abhidharma; and tradition ascribes to him also the origin of the Sātavat division of the Viśdakṣa school of Buddhist philosophy. Many legends are connected with his name. See E. Burnouf, Introduction à l'Histoire du Bouddhisme indo- dien (Paris, 1844), and his posthumous work, Le Lotus de la Bonne Loi (Paris, 1862).

Maḥalāh (1 Chron. vii, 18). See MAHLAR.

Malahalel (Heb. Mahālālēl, מַהֲלוֹלֶל, protee of God; Sept. and N. T. Mahalēk), the name of two men.

1. The son of the antediluvian patriarch Cain, of the line of Seth, born when his father was 40 years old; he became the father of Jared at sixty-five years of age, and lived to the age of eight hundred and ninety-five years (Gen. v. 12–17; 1 Chron. i. 2; Luke iii. 37, in which last passage the name is Anglicized "Mai lel"); B.C. 3777–2981.

2. "Ewald recognises in Mahalalel the sun-god, or Apollo of the antediluvian mythology, and in his son Jared the god of water, the Indian Varuna (Gesh. i. 357), but his assertions are perfectly arbitrary."

2. Malāla. A relative of the family of Phares, father of Shephatiah, and ancestor of one Azahal, who resided at Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. xi. 4). B.C. much ante 586.

Mahāla (Heb. Mahākāla, מַהֲכָכָל, a late, otherwise the title of a song), the name of two women. See below.

1. Sept. Malā, Vulg. Malalecth. The daughter of Jehoam, and third wife of Esaü (Gen. xxviii. 9); elsewhere called Bāthkāth (Gen. xxxvi. 8); but the Samar. Pent. has Mahalath in both passages. See Esaul.

2. Sept. Malā, Vulg. Malolēl, Vulq. Malolath. The daughter of Jerimoth, granddaughter of David, and tribute to the mariners (2 Chron. xi. 18). B.C. 973. She was thus her husband's cousin, being the daughter of king David's son, who was probably the child of a concubine, and not one of his regular family. Josephus, without naming Malathah, speaks of her as a 'kinwoman (muyeya ṭena, Ant. viii. 10, 1). No children are attributed to the marriage, nor is she again mentioned. The ancient Hebrew text (Kethib) in this passage has 'son' instead of 'daughter.' The latter, however, is the correction of the Keri, and is adopted by the Sept., Vulg., and Targum, as well as by the A. V."

MAHALATH MAS'CHIL occurs in the title of Ps. liii, and MAHALATH LEAN'NOTH MAS'CHIL in the title of Ps. lxxviii. For these latter names, see each in its alphabetical order. The term MAHALATH (Heb. Macalath, מַכָּלָת, Sept. Macáthi, Vulg. Maceth, Maketh) is thought by Gesenius (Thesaur. Heb. p. 476) to be for מַכָּלָה, from מָכַל, to be sweet, spoken of musical sounds; hence signifying a stringed instrument, e. g. a lute or guiar, accompanied by the voice. First, however, denies (Heb. Lex. s. a. r.) that it denotes an instrument; and maintains that it was the title of an old air to which the psalms in question were to be sung. Ludolph (p. 272) compares the equivalent Egyptian, signifying a song or hymn. The use of Leannoth in the same connection would perhaps favor the reference to some kind of instrument; but the versions render no assistance as to the meaning of either word, and most interpreters resort either to vague conjecture or mystical allusions. The use of the particle יָּם, upon, before Mahalah, in each case, seems to indicate some kind of instrument. See Psalms.

MAHALATH, (Exod. vii. 19). See MAHAL.

MAHALATH-leannoth is the name of the mother of Buda dihat. See GutaMA.

Mahalanaim is (Hebrew Machalanaim, מַחֲלַנֵאֵי, name comprising, as often, and explained in Gen. xxxii. 2, as meaning the heavenly army of God; we may, therefore, see the Sept. has "Galanaim, idem Castra; elsewhere "Galanael, or Galanaya, once "gala darolai"); Vulg. Manuaim, but usually castra), a place beyond the Jordan, north of the river Jabbock, which derived its name from Jacob's having being there met by the angel (Josephus, Bell. Iudaic. xv. 26, 1) on his return from Padan-aram (Gen. xxxii. 2). See JACO.

The name was extended to the town which then existed, or which afterwards arose in the neighborhood. This town was on the confines of the tribes of Gad and Manasseh, as well as on the southern boundary of Bashan (Josh. xiii. 26, 30), and was a city of the Levites (Josh. xxxi. 38; 1 Chron. vi. 80). It was in this city that Ishbosheth, the son of Saul, reigned (2 Sam. ii. 8, 12) during David's reign at Hebron, and here he was assassinated (ch. iv). The choice of this place was probably because he found the influence of David's name less strong on the east than on the west of the Jordan; at least, it seems to show that Mahanaim was then an important and strong place (comp. 2 Sam. ii. 29; xix. 82). Hence, many years after, David himself repaired to Mahanaim, where he was entertained by Zariel, the chief of that region, the son of the fugitive beyond the Jordan from his son Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 24, 27; 1 Kings ii. 8). In this vicinity also appears to have been fought the decisive battle in the wood of Ephraim, between the royal troops and the rebels (2 Sam. xviiii. 26). See DAVID. We only read of Mahanaim again as the station of one of the twelve officers who had charge, in monthly rotation, of raising the provisions for the royal establishment under Solomon (1 Kings iv. 14). Some find an allusion to the place in Canti.

vi, 13 ("companies of two armies.", lit. dance of Mahanaim). This is doubtful. "On the monument of Sheeshonk (Shishak) at Karnak, in the 22d cartouch —one of those which are believed to contain the names of Hebrew cities conquered by that king—a name appears which is read as M-ḥa-n-a-n-a-l, that is, Mahanaim. The adjoining cartouches contain names which are read as Beshal, Shumen, Megiddo, Beth-horon, Gilron, and other Israelitish names (Brunschi, Geogr. der nachbarländer Ägyptens, p. 61). If this interpretation may be relied on, it shows that the invasion of Shishak was more extensive than we should gather from the records (2 Chron. xii.), which recorded only the main invasion with occurrences at the metropolis. Possibly the army entered by the plains of Philistia and Sharon, ravaged Edraelon and some towns like Mahanaim just beyond Jordan, and then returned, either by the same route or by the Jordan valley, to Jerusalem, attacking it last. This would account for Rehoboam's non-resistance, and also for the fact, which special mention is made, that many of the chief men of the country had taken refuge in the city. It should, however, be remarked that the names occur in most promiscuous order, and that none has been found resembling Jerusalem." In Dr. Eli Smith's Arabic list of names of places in Jebel Ajlun (Robinson's Bib. Researches, iii. Append. p. 166), we find a ruined site under the name of Mahan, which is probably that of Mahanaim (Pestle, p. 261; Keil's Comment. on Josh. xiii. 26). The same identification was pointed out by the Jewish traveller Haparchi, according to whom it lies about half a day's journey due east of Bethanah (Zunz, in Asher's edit. of Benj. de Tudeki, p. 40), the same direction as in Kisper's Map, but only half as far. Its distance from the Jabbok is considerable but not fatal objection. Triatraversed the place which he defends at length as the site of Mahanaim, and describes it as well situated for a large town, with considerable remains and a fine pond (Land of Israel, p. 495).

Mahaneh丹 (Heb. Macanah'-Dan, מַחֲנֶה דָּן, camp of Dan; Sept. Ἰονίαν, Ἰονίαν, Vulg. Castra Dan), a name probably derived from the west of Kirjath-jearim, in consequence of its having been the encampment of the party of Danites on their way to capture Leish (Judg. xviii. 12). Mr. Williams suggests a site called Beit Ma hanem, on the north side of wady Ismail, and N.N.E. of Deir el Hora (1835, 129). While the name appears on no map, and occurs in no other traveller.

Maha-Pralya (i. e. the "great end" or "great destruc tion"), a term applied by the Hindus to the final consummation of all things, which they suppose will take place after a hundred years of Brahma have elapsed (each Brahmanic day, with its nine nights, is reckoned as 8640 millions of years). At the time referred to, all the gods, including Brahma, as well as all creatures, will be annihilated; Brahm, the eternal, self-existent Spirit, will alone remain. See Moor, Hindoo Pantheon; Thomas, Dict. of. Bibl. and Mythol. s. v.

Mahara (Hebrew Maharayy, מָחַרַיָּה, hoary; Sept. Mergapal and Mopar; r. Mopari and Mopari), a Ne tophathite, and one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 28; 1 Chron. xi. 30); being a descendant of Ze rab, and the tenth captain of a contingent of 24,000 men (1 Chron. xxvii. 13). B.C. 1014.

Maharudra is another name of Siva (q. v.). See Rudra.

Maha-sanghiika is the name of one of the two great divisions of the Buddhist Church which arose about two hundred years after the death of the Buddha Skkyamuni, or about 343. See STHAYIRA. Out of this school arose, in the course of the next centuries, numerous sects. For the tenets common to all, and for those peculiar to each of these sects, the special student of the Buddhist religion will at present most advantageously consult the work of Prof. W. Wasmuth, Der Buddhistismus, seine Dogmen, Geschichte und Literatur (St. Petersburg, 1860).

Maha-thath (Heb. Mah'ath, מַחָת, prob. for מַחָט, grooping; Sept. Mada), the name of two Levites.

1. A Kohathite, son of Amasi and father of Zikanah (1 Chron. vi. 35); apparently the same elsewhere (1 Chron. vi. 26) called AMIMOTH (q. v.). B.C. cir. 1375. See SAMUEL.

2. Another Kohathite, one of those who cleansed the Temple in the reformation instituted by Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 12), and was appointed by that king one of the subordinate overseers of the secreted revenues (2 Chron. xiii. 13). B.C. 726.

Maha-vansa is the title of two celebrated works written in Pali, and relating to the early history of Ceylon (q. v.). The older work was probably composed by the monks of the convent Uttararājā at Anurādhāpurā, the capital of Ceylon. Its date is uncertain, but it apparently preceded the reign of Divāntasena (459-477), as that monarch ordered it to be read in public, a circumstance which seems to prove the celebrity it already enjoyed in his time. The later work of the same name is an improved edition and continuation of the former. Its author, Mahābhārata, was the son of the chief priest of the king Divāntasena, and he brings down the history of Ceylon, like his predecessor, to the death of Mahāvira, who was the last volume of the latter work, "in Roman characters, with a translation subjoined, and an introductory essay on Pāli Buddhist literature," was published by the Hon. George Turnour (Ceylon, 1857). See also Lassen, Indische Alterthums- kunde, ii, 16 sq. (Bonn, 1859).

Mahāvira (literally, the "great hero"), also called Viśva and Varadhānā, is the twenty-fourth or last Jina, or deified saint, of the Jainas (q. v.), described as of a golden complexion, and having a lion for his symbol. His legendary history is given in the Kalpa-Sūtra (q. v.) and the Mahābhārata-Charitra. According to the Mahābhārata's birth, he died at a period infinitely remote; it was as Nagadara, the head man of a village, that he first appeared in the country of Vijaya, subject to Satrumadana. He was next born as Marichi, the grandson of the first Jina Rishabha; he then came to the world of Brahmā, was reborn as a worldly-minded man and after several births and deaths was separated from the other by an interval passed in one of the Jainas heavens, and each period of life extending to many hundreds of thousands of years—he quitted the state of a deity to obtain immortality as a saint, and was incarnate towards the close of the fourth age (now past), when seventy-five years and eight and a half months of it remained. After he was thirty years of age he renounced worldly pursuits, and departed, amid the applause of gods and men, to practice austerities. Finally, he became an Arhat or Jina; and at the age of seventy-two years, the period of his liberation having arrived, "he resigned his breath," and his body was burned by Indra and other deities, who erected a splendid monument on the spot, and then returned to their respective heavens. At what period these events occurred is not stated, but, judging from some of the circumstances narrated, the last Jina expired about five hundred years before the Christian era. Other authorities make the date of this event about a century and a half earlier.

The works above referred to state, with considerable detail, the conversations worked by Mahāvira. Among the pupils were Indrabhūti (also called Gautama, and for this reason, but erroneously, considered as the same with the founder of the Buddhist religion), Agnibhūti, Vāyu-bhūti—all three sons of Vasubhūti, a Brahmana of the Gotama tribe, and others. These converts to Jain principles are mostly made in the same manner: each comes to the saint prepared to overwhelm him with shame, when he salutes them mildly, and, as the Jainas hold, solves their metaphysical or religious doubts. Thus Indrabhūti doubts whether there be a living principle in the body of the body; Vasubhūti doubts if the body has not made up his mind on the subjects of bondage and liberation; Achalabhṛttī is sceptical as to the distinction between vice and virtue, and so on. Mahāvira removes all their difficulties, and, by teaching them the Jina truth, converts them to the doctrine of his sect. For a summary account of the life of this saint, see H. T. Colebrooke's Miscellaneous Essays, ii, 213 sq.; H. H. Wilson's Works, i, 291 sq.

Mahāvītā (Hebrew only in the plur. Mahāvin, in the singular collectively, Mahāvikī, patronymic of the same form from Mahāvi); the name of the elder son of Mahāvira; but in Num. xxvi, 58, Sept. omits, Vulg. Maholos; A. Ver. constantly "Mahelitae," the descendants of Mahāvira, the son of Menri (Num. iii, 58; xxxvi, 58). See also Hebrew Mahelon, Mahelic, sickly; Sept. Maholos, Vulg. Maholos, the elder of the two sons of Eлимētē the Bethilehemite by Naomi; they removed with him to Moab, where this one married Ruth, and died childless (Ruth 1, 5, 8; iv, 9, 10). B.C. cir. 1586. See RUTH. "It is uncertain which was the elder of the two. In the narrative (1, 2, 5) Mahalon is mentioned. first, but in his formal address to the elders in the gate (iv. 9), Boaz says "Chilion and Mahlon." Like his brother, Mahlon died in the land of Moab without offspring, which in the Targum on Ruth (i. 5) is explained to have been a judgment for their transgression of the law in marrying a Moabitess. In the Targum on 1 Chron. iv. 14, Mahlon is identified as being ashamed on account of the double meaning of the Hebrew word which follows, and which signifies both 'had dominion' and 'married.'

Mahmúd, Abú-Kámír Yémín Ed-Dowlah, one of the most celebrated of the Mohammedi & s Evl the sovereign, the founder of the Gavdence dynasty, and the first who ever held the permanent Mahommedan power in India, was born at Gazz (or Ghzian) in A.D. 967. His father was originally a Turkish slave, but having become governor, under the sovereignty of Persia, of the province of Kandahar, he finally secured for his own possession the whole of the Punjab (q.v.), besides the Afghan dominions. Mahmud came to the throne A.D. 977. Already, during the reign of his father, Mahmud had distinguished himself by superior warlike qualities. Ill treated by Munsir, the Samanide sovereign of Persia, he made war against him, resulting in the overthrow of the Samanide dynasty and the establishment of Mahmoud himself as the most powerful monarch in Asia. A devout Mussulíman, he aspired to the character of an apostle of his religion. "His chief ambition was to extend his religion throughout the rich provinces of India, a task to which he was stimulated by a belief cherished from his infancy that he was intrusted with a divine mission to extirpate idolatry from the land of the Hindus." In twelve successive expeditions into India, during a reign of thirty-five years, he carried fire and sword among the idolaters, de-throned and slew several princes, plundered and burned their cities, stormed the forts, massacred the garrisons, ravaged the fields, and carried away so many natives into captivity, that the price of a slave was reduced at Gazz to a couple of rupees; and all this notwithstanding that all India regarded the contest with Mahmoud in the light of a holy war, and that no sacrifice of money or men was spared to defend the religion of their forefathers (compare Moore's poem "Paradise and the Peri"). Mahmud extended his conquests not only over the whole of the Punjab, but penetrated as far as Bundelkund on the east, and Guzerat on the south. He frequently been charged that these incursions to India were made by Mahmoud rather for the sake of spoil than to extend the Mussulman faith (comp. Trevor, India, p. 72), but there is every evidence, both in the fact that his arms were constantly directed against the religion rather than the people, and in the fact that he was the most expensive of all Gazz at the treasures brought from India, and in the encouragement he gave to learning, that Mahmoud believed in his divine mission. He founded a university in Gazz, with a vast collection of curious books, in various languages, and a museum of natural curiosities. He appropriated a large sum for the maintenance of this establishment. He also set aside £10,000 a year for pensions to learned men. He died in 1030. The great Mussulman poet Firdusi flourished at this time. See Ferishta, "History of the Rise of the Mohammedi Power in India" (translated by the general Briggs); Wilken, "Historia Chamsirvand"; History of British India, vol. i (Harper's Family Library); Von Hammer, "Gemäldeєul großer Moslemischer Herrscher"; Trevor, India, p. 69 sq.; India, Pictorial, Descriptive, and Bot, (London, Bohn, 1844, 12mo), p. 54 sq.; D'Herbelot, Académie Frangaise, p. 544 sq.; and the excellent articles in Thomas, "Dict. of Byz. and Mythol," a. v. Mahrensçhmidt, John Peter, a pioneer of the German Reformed Church in Ohio, was born probably in Somerset or in Westmoreland Co., Pa., in 1783; first taught school for a number of years, and was finally, in 1812, licensed to preach, and soon after removed to Ohio, where he performed missionary labors in the counties of Columbiana and Trumbull. He laid the foundations of numerous congregations, which he lived to see grow and prosper. He died in Cynthian, Mahoning Co., Ohio, July 11, 1857. Mahrensçhmidt was a modest, childlike, and earnest man. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the German Ref. Ch. (Lancaster, Pa., 1872, 12mo), iii, 207 sq.

Ma'hol (Heb. Machol, מַכוֹל, a sacred dance, as in Ps. xx. 12, etc.; Sept. Μακολ); Josephus'Hmōun, Ant. viii, 2, 5, a person apparently named as the father of the famous wise men Ethen, Heeman, Chalcol, and Dur- da (or at least of the last two), prior to the time of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 81); but if these be the same with those enumerated as sons of Zerah (1 Chron. ii. 6), the word must be taken as elsewhere to denote simply their being chosen or appointed, as was the case with the sons of Kēllis (see Kel's Comment, ad loc. Kings), an art with which dancing has ever been intimately connected. See Ethan.

Church in India date with the settlement of the Portuguese in Goa, where the Roman Catholics established the first bishopric in 1534. The second important hold the Romish Church secured at the two Salsettes, the peninsula and island near Bombay. From these the work was gradually pressed through the Mahrratta-land. At Goa they are claimed to be 32,140, and at Bombay 20,000. See India. The first Protestant mission was commenced in the Mahrratta-land by the American Board in 1811. For about twenty years it was confined to the territory this side of the Ghauta. Mahim, Tannah, and Chowal (Choule) were occupied for a while, but abandoned in 1826. In 1835, however, the work began to show signs of vigor and promise. At this time a mission was established on the high lands of Ahmednuggur, a city of 80,000 inhabitants, and by 1842 it became an independent mission centre. For the success of this work and its present status, see the articles INDIA, VOL. IV., p. 555, vol. 2. The Anglican Church first began missionary labors in Bombay in 1820, and gradually gained a hold at Tannah, Bandora, and Bassein. In 1832, Nasik, the most celebrated centre of Brahminism in all Deccan, was secured; in 1846 the work was extended to Aton Junir, Siolim, and Kudighur. The attempt made a few years ago, at Yeolat, to Christianize exclusively by the aid of native helpers failed completely. Neither did the effort among the Marang, in the neighborhood of Aurangabad (stations Buldana, etc.), prove successful. In Bombay and vicinity, a Missionary Society has established mission schools, and Christian influences are moulding the character of the rising generation. A special missionary for the Mohammedans is sustained here. See BOMBAY. The Scotch Mission commenced at Konkan in 1823; the first stations were Banjor and Suvarrudug, but these were abandoned when the laborers were needed at Bombay. Here both the "Established Church" and the "Free Church" sustain schools. The Scotch Mission at Poona, which originated in 1838, belongs to the Free Church. Of late years the Free Church has established missions among the Wahrals (aborigines) near Damun. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel has labored in this field since 1840, but confined mainly to Bombay. Very lately the Medical Missionary Society has established an institute which will prove of valuable service to the mission work. See Spruell, Geschichte der Maharatta (Halle, 1786); Duth. Mai, Angelo, a noted Roman Catholic prelate, and one of the most distinguished scholars of the 19th century. He was born at St. Schiloerpil (province Fr. Los Angeles, California, March 7, 1782. As a youth he arrested the attention of his instructor, the ex-jesuit father Lewis Mozi de Caspini, by the unusual taste and capacity which he displayed for classical learning. The father, determined to lead Angelo's instruction towards the service of the Church, finally induced him to enter, in 1790, the novitate of the Society of Jesus, which, although elsewhere suppressed, the Duke of Parma, with the sanction of Pius VI, was just re-establishing at Colombo, a small city of his duchy. In this community Mai resided till the provisional restoration of the society in Naples (1804), whither he was sent as Professor of Greek and Latin literature. About the end of 1805 he was transferred to Rome for the completion of his theological studies, and soon afterwards to Orvieto, and was there admitted to priest's orders. It was at this place that he acquired great familiarity with the Hebrew language, his accurate knowledge of paleography, and his skill in deciphering ancient manuscripts. He returned to Rome in 1806, just about the time when the contest of Pius VII with Napoleon was reaching the crisis; an order issued by the Emperor compelling all subjects from the kingdom of Italy to return to their respective provinces, had compelled him to change his residence once again. Happily for the interests of literature, he settled at Mi-they were still on his hands, he commenced an edition of the well-known Codex Vaticanus of the Old and New Testament, with various readings of the manuscripts, which, however, he never entirely completed; or if he did, as some suppose, he destroyed a greater part of his manuscript on the Old Testament, lest it should ever see the light of day in an incomplete and imperfect state. The text of the New Testament was published in 1668, and in a thoroughly revised form in 1699, under the title Novum Testamentum ex versione saeculare Codicis Vaticanae, edition studio Angeli Maii; but even in a revised form the work does not deserve the name of Mai on its title-page. Comp. Kito, Journ. Sac. Lit. 1659 (Oct.), p. 166 sq. Engaged in these vast literary labors, Cardinal Mai held the labors and responsible post of secretary of the Propaganda, to which he had been appointed in 1833; and it was observed with wonder that his other engagements were never suffered to interfere with the duties of the secretariatum. In 1858 he was rewarded for his great services to the Church with the cardinal's hat, at the same time with his friend and successor in the Vatican Library, Mozaffanti; and soon afterwards was appointed to several important and confidential offices in the Roman court, chiefly of a literary character. He was named successively prefect of the Congregation for the Supervision of the Oriental Provinces of the Congregation of the Index; and prefect of the Congregation of the Council of Trent. In 1858 he was appointed to the still more congenial post of librarian of the Roman Church. He died September 9, 1884.

"Cardinal Mai's abilities as an editor," says his biographer in the English Cyclopaedia, "were of the very highest order. While his collections comprise an infinite variety of authors of every age, of every country, of every variety of style, and in every department of literature, he appears in all equally the master. Whether the subject be theology, or history, or law, or languages, or general literature, his learning is never at fault, and his critical sagacity never fails. In the many delicate and difficult questions which so often arise—in assigning an anonymous manuscript to its true author, in collecting fragments of the same work and dovetailing them together into intelligible order, in selecting from a heap of unknown materials all that is unpublished, and deciding upon the question of its genuineness or its intrinsic value—in a word, in all the thousand investigations which fall to the lot of a critical editor treading upon uncharted ground, he possessed a skill which can hardly be described as other than instinctive, and which, taking into account the vast variety of subjects which engaged him, must be regarded as little short of marvellous. The private character of Cardinal Mai has been well described as the very ideal of a Christian scholar. Earnestly devoted to the duties of his sacred calling, he yet loved literature for its own sake also, and he was ever foremost in every project for its advancement. He was a member of all the leading literary societies of Italy, and not infrequently read papers in those of Rome and Milan. His charities were at all times liberal, and, indeed, munificent; and at his death he bequeathed the proceeds of the sale of his noble library to the poor of his native village of Schiaporo. A monograph has been erected to his memory in the church of St. Anastasia, from which he derived his title of cardinal. See Mutti, Elogio di Angelo Mai (1826); Rabbe, Biog. Mainan, Emanuel, a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, noted as a philosopher, was born at Toulouse, in France, in 1651; was educated at the College of the Jesuits in that place, where he exhibited extraordinary ability as a mathematician and philosopher. A strong inclination to a religious life led him to seek the monastery for his retreat. In 1656, however, he was called to fill a professor's chair of mathematics in Rome; returned from Rome to Toulouse in 1658, and was created by his countrymen provincial in the same year. He died in 1676. Maianus published De Perspectiva Horaria (Toulouse, 1648), and a Course of Philosophy (Toulouse, 1652, 4 vols. 8vo; 2d edit. 1678, folio), enlarged by two Treatises on the same subject in 1673. He opposed Des Cartes in his theory of the Creation, and to refute it the more completely, he invented a machine "which showed by its movements that Des Cartes's supposition concerning the manner in which the universe was formed, or might have been formed, and concerning the centrifugal force, was entirely without foundation." See Gen. Biog. Dict. ix, 1, s. v.; Thomas, Dict. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.

Mainot, Charles, a French Jesuit and missionary, was born at Paris in 1652; entered the order and prepared for missionary labors in foreign parts. In 1681 he was sent to Siam, and in 1683 he was placed in charge of the missions of China. In 1686 pope Clement XII created him, for his zeal in propagating Christianity among the inhabitants of the "Middle Kingdom," bishop in partibus of Conon. In 1699 he was visited with the displeasure of his order for his opposition to the peculiar manner in which the Jesuits sought to advance the interests of Christianity among the Chinese. He was even at one time in danger of his life. Supported by the Dominicans, he was appealed to pope Clement XI, who, June 20, 1702, gave his approval to the attitude of the bishop of Conon; and, to make known his wish, dispatched cardinal de Tournon to the emperor of China, who, as we have seen in the article on China, was greatly displeased with the conduct of the Christian missionaries, and issued an edict ordering them all from his dominions. Mainot at first refused to obey the imperial command, and only quitted the country when his life was imperilled. He went to Rome by way of Ireland, and died in the Eternal City Feb. 18, 1730. He only wrote one work, and that is still in MS. form; it is entitled De Sinico Religione (4 vols. fol.). metal attached to a bodice like scales, so as to be impervious to the sword (1 Sam. xviii, 5). Another term, rendered "cost of mail," is מֶּרֶבֶן, sibyon, which signifies the corselet or garment thus ensquared (1 Sam. xvii, 86). At other times metallic rings were employed in stead of scales (see Kittto, Fict. Dict. note at 1 Sam. xvii).

Maillouf, an Irish monk, who flourished about the middle of the 7th century, established a monastery in Wiltshire, England, A.D. 650, long called Mailluborough, now known as Malmsbury. It was richly endowed by Athelstan and other kings of England, and became the alma mater of some of the first educated Saxons in England in either Church or State. Among them was Alksmd, bishop of Sherborne, who acknowledged "that Maillouf had thoroughly instructed him in Latin and Greek." Camden says that Aldhelm was the first Saxon who wrote in Latin, or who made Latin verses; his style, however, was pedantic, and full of alliterations. William of Malmsbury, the first Saxon historian, received his education in this school, the first one among the twelve which Montalembert says the Irish monks established in England (Monks of the West, 1864). The period from the 7th to the 10th century was a very dark one in England. Alfred the Great, speaking of his own times (A.D. 870), said, "There were few churchmen on the throne who could understand the daily prayer in English, or who could translate a letter in Latin" (Turner's History of the Anglo-Saxons, book v). And William of Malmesbury said "that, a few years before the Norman invasion, a clergyman who understood grammar was considered a prodigy" (ibid.). During this dark period, a large number of Irish scholars, impelled by a devotion to literature, or, as some say, driven out by the Danes, went over to England and established a great many schools, and, among others, that also of Glastonbury. It was often called "Glastonbury Abbey," but the name of that monastery had long since passed away and it was known and loved in his own monastery. See Illustrious Men of Ireland, i, 137; Moore's History of Ireland; Fict. Hist. of England, i, 277 sq.

Maillouf, OLIVIER, a celebrated French pupil orator, was born in Bretagne in the 15th century. His early history is somewhat obscure. He became a doctor of the Sorbonne, professor in theology in the order of the "Minor Brothers," and court preacher to Louis XI and to the duke of Burgundy. In 1501 he was instructed by the papal legate with the reform of the Paris convents of the order of "Gray Friars," and he discharged this task so energetically and independently that he incurred the displeasure of the "Gray Friars." His reputation, however, rests mainly on the wonderful power of oratory and independence of thought displayed in his pulpit utterances. In many respects he may be likened to Bossuet, but in one he even excelled him—in dealing out truth, in criticising the faults and sins of his hearers. It is reticent that his royal master, Louis XI, having one day been subjected by him to unusual severity, sent word that if Olivier Maillouf would suffer himself to speak thus severely a second time, he should do it at the loss of his life. But Olivier was ready to return a prompt reply even to the royal messenger. "Tell the king that I will thus only arrive sooner in Paradise, and make the way for the king so much the harder." Louis XI never again molested Maillouf, though he continued in his former course unabated. In course of time, however, one moderate part of the populace of Maillouf has died of his contemporaries be true, the French of the 15th century have never had their equal in moral corruption. He died near Toulouse, according to some, June 13, 1602; but his death must have occurred much later, if it be true that he preached at Paris in 1508. His principal works are Sermons de l'Académie déclarati Parisins in ecclesia & Johannis in Gratia anno 1490 (Paris, 1494, 4to; 1511, 8vo)—Quadragesimal Opera (Paris, 1494, 4to; 1512, 8vo)—Sermones dominicales et aliis (1515, 8vo)—Sermones de Nativitate et Circumcisione Nostri Domini, expounded by the Saints and other mysteries of the Mass (also under the title Le Mystère de la Messe, etc.)—L'Exemplaire de Confession avec la Confession générale (Rouen and Cayen, 4to; Lyon, 1524, 8vo)—Tractatus enregy de plusieurs religion pour les intructure et exercicre a le bien gouverner (8vo)—Contemplatio ad salvationem angelicum (1607). Maillat, JOSEPH ANNE MARIE DE MOYHIA DE, a French Jesuit missionary, was born in 1640 at the ancestral castle near Nantua. He entered the order quite young. In 1701 he was appointed to take a part in the mission to China, and embarked in 1703 for Macao, and thence for China. He quickly mastered the Chinese language, and as readily familiarized himself with the customs of that country, so that he became of great service to the Celestial empire. In 1708 a map of China and Tartary was prepared for the Chinese government under his superintendence, and he secured not only approval for his services, but was actually invited to take office at court. He died June 26, 1748, at Pekin. His studies were mainly in the history and archeology of China, and his works are of the same department. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxii, 867.

Maillé de Brese, SIMON DE, a French prelate, was born in 1515; became a religious of the order of Cister, was made abbot of Loraux, then bishop of Viviers, and in 1554 archbishop of Tours. He was a member of the Council of Trent, and took decided ground against the Reformers, who had given him no little trouble in his archiepiscopal dominions. He was at one time obliged to quit his see, in all probability because the Calvinists had made a strong case of immorality against him (ibid., Jan. 11, 1557). He died a Jesuit, and left a Latin translation of several homilies of St. Basil (Paris, 1558, 4to), and Discours au peuple de Touraine (ibid. 1674, 16mo).—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxii, 878.

Maimbourg, LOUIS, a celebrated French ecclesiastic and defender of Gallican liberty, was born at Nancy in 1620; entered the "Society of Jesus" in 1630; was by them sent to Rome to study theology; was, on his return to France, for six years professor of rhetoric in the College of Rouen; then began preaching, and soon attained great eminence. Having, however, in his Traité Historique de l'Eglise de Rome (Paris, 1645; new ed., Nevers, 1831) come out boldly in favor of the liberty of the Gallican Church, he was expelled from the Order of the Jesuits. The king took sides with Maimbourg and indemnified him by a pension. He retired to the Abbey of St. Victor, in Paris, where he wrote the history of schism of England, and died Aug. 15, 1686. He had entirely disconnected himself from the Jesuits, and did not were them much in his writings; yet in his Histoire du Calculisme (Paris, 1682, 4to), dedicated to the king, one can readily distinguish the influence of his former associations when he called Calvinism "the most rabid and dangerous of all errors," and included all the protestant sects in Bossuet's interpretation of the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church [see BOUSSUET] Maimbourg pronounced against. (Compare Schröck, Kirchenrecht, s. a. Ref.
MAIMBourg, Theodore, a relative of the distinguished Louis Maimbourg (q.v.), flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He embraced the Reformed faith and was ordained in 1659. He was afterwards translated to Louis justifying his course. In 1664 he returned to the Romish Church, and subsequently left it again. He then retired to England, and died at London in 1669.

Maimon, Solomon, a Jewish rabbi and philosopher, one of the ablest exponents of the Kantian school, was born in Lithuania in 1716. He was a student of the rabbinical parentage, and in his youth was confined in his educational advantages to the study of Hebrew. Yet his talent for speculation manifested itself at a very early age, when still confined to the expounding of Talmudic lore. In his very youth, Moses Maimonides' Moreh Nebuchim fell into his hands; but while to Moses Mendelssohn it became the guide to truth, it became to Maimon a guide to a labyrinth of speculation from which no open exit: gave him an outlet until, in advanced life, he fell in with the writings of Kant, to become one of his most ardent students and able expounders. In the dispair which the Moreh Nebuchim prepared for him, he turned to the Cabala for relief, determined to become a Jewish Faust. Plagued by the disadvantages of Russo-Jewish society, he finally quit his native land and went to Germany to study medicine and thus gain a livelihood. He was 22 years of age when he set foot in Prussia. His condition in this, the old capital of Prussia, the seat of a university at that time in the very zenith of her glory, was much like that of a man who, after having suffered starvation for days, is suddenly placed at a table d'hote without stint.

In 1779 he went to Berlin, and became an intimate associate of the German Jewish savant, Moses Mendelssohn. It was not, however, until years had been passed in a roving life that he finally, in 1786, on his return to Berlín, gave himself to the study of Kantian philosophy, was recommended to Kant, and soon made a great name for himself. Both Schiller and Goethe, it is said, sought his society; the latter, we are told, desired Maimon to take up his residence near his side (Maimontane, p. 187). Valckenaer, in his Vues de l'Empire, i, 324 sq.; Vattel, Droit des Gens, i, 243 sq.; David Velt, i, 243 sq., 247 et al.; ii, 23.

In his last years count Kalkreuth gave Maimon a home on one of his estates in Silesia. He died in 1800. From an admirer of Kant, Maimon finally changed to a decided opponent, and, to make good his claim he presented the world with a new system of philosophy, which was written in the interests of scepticism. According to Maimon, there is no knowledge strictly objective except pure mathematicals, and all empirical knowledge is only an illusion. He traces all the forms of thought, categories, and judgments to a general and unique principle, that of determinability, of reality, of substance; but he contends that we have no right to suppose that our thought has for its object a thing without ourselves, existing independently of the thought, which determines it. He says, without reference to Kant (De la Causalite et de la Prude-Maimonides (i.e., son of Maimon), Moses, also called by the Jews Rambam, from the initial letters רם-מאַם), and by the Arabs Abu Amram Musa b. Maimon Obeid Allah, one of the greatest of the Jews since the exile —the great luminary, the glory of Israel, the second Moses, etc., etc., the second legislator between 1780 and 1800, at Cordova, March 80, 1185. As a youth, he received his instruction in the Heb. Scriptures, the Talmud, and Jewish literature from his father, R. Maimon, who held the dignity of judge of the Jews, as also his forefathers had held it for some centuries previous, and was himself renowned as a scholar and author of a commentary on Esther, a work on the laws of the Jewish prayers and festivals, a commentary on the Talmud, etc., etc. But for instruction in the Arabic, then the predominant language of Spain, as the country was in the hands of the Mohammedans, and mathematics, and astronomy, Moses was handed over to the care of the renowned Arabian philosophers Averroes and Ibn-Thoefili (compare Joseph, Gesch. d. Israeliten, vi, 168), Spain, in which the Jews had found an early home (some say as early as the days of Solomon; compare Rule, Kaussles, p. 146 sq.; Linds, Hist. d. Jews of Spain and Portugal, p. 1 sq.; Da Cass, Israel and the Gentiles, p. 211), is by Milman (History of the Jews, iii, 155) spoken of as the country in which "the golden age of the Jews shone with the brightest and most enduring splendor." In the early days of Christianity we find the Jews, according to the early Christian writers, a source of danger and scandal [see ELYTRA], and legislation enacted in his behalf; but, to the shame of Christianity be it said, the Jews enjoyed his greatest privileges in the Iberian peninsula.

under Mussulman rule, and "from the conquest by the Moors till towards the end of the 10th century, when, while Christian Europe lay in darkness, Mohammedan Cordova might be considered the centre of civilization, of arts, and of letters, . . . the Jews, under the enjoyment of equal rights and privileges, were in their master- ters, or, rather, the treasurers to the califs, but more frequently as physicians, philosophers, poets, theologians—in a word, as saracens and men of letters." Especially worthy to be called the golden age of Spanish Judaism was the age that gave birth to Moses Maimonides. While the Jews, who at that time lived under less extensive circumstances in France and Germany, were disinclined to all scientific endeavors, and all their spiritual activity became absorbed in the study of the Talmud, the Spanish Jews vied in all sciences—in philosophy, mathematics, astronomy, medicine, and in poetry, with the power of the Arabian genius. Formerly the Jews of the Iberian peninsula had derived their learning of the Biblical writings and their commentators from the famous schools of Babylon and Persia, whither the young were sent for theological instruction; but when, by sheer accident, a noted Eastern rabbi of the 10th century found a home in these Western coasts (see Rabbi Moses, "clad in sackcloth:" compare Milman, iii, 156, and other histories of the Jews), and "the light of learning, which, by the rapid progress of the iron age of Judaism in Babylonia, by the extinction of the authority of the prince of the captivity, the dispersion of the dispersed, and the final prosperity of the great schools, seemed to have set forever, it suddenly rose again in the West in renewed and undismayed splendor." From this time (A.D. 990) the schools of the Spanish Rabbanim (at Cordova, Toledo, Barcelona, and Granada) not only became the centre of Jewish civilization and learning, but the auxiliaries of the Arabo-Muslim philosophers in their endeavor to keep alive the flame of learning during the deep darkness of the Middle Ages, and the Jews became the communicators of Arabo-Muslim philosophy to the Christian world, or, as Tzemachman (Manual of Philosophy, trans. by Morell, p. 521) has it, "the interpreters between the Saracens and the Western nations." It was at such a time—when the heaven of Spanish Judaism was resplendent with stars of its greatest magnitude—Solomon Ibn-Gabirol (1021-1070), Judah Halevi (1066-1141; died 1143), David ben Yehuda (1160-1240), a galaxy of great and learned men of which any nation might well be proud—that Moses Maimonides lived, wrote, and flourished as the brightest ornament of them all.

As we noticed above, Moses was born in 1135. The Almorавides—i.e., men devoted to the service of God—who were then the masters of Mohammedan Spain [see MOHAMMADANS], like the Ommandes, were tolerant and kind to the Jews. But just at this time the power of the Almoravides was fast declining, and by the middle of the 12th century the Almohades, a political Mohammedan sect [see IN-TUMART], landed in Southern Spain, soon gained the upper hand, and succeeded the Almoravides altogether. With the accession of these Almohades to power in Southern Spain begins a new chapter in the history of the Jews. On the Seine, on the Rhine, on the Danube, and in the steppes of Africa and Southern Spain, "as if by previous arrangement, a bloody chase was now inaugurated, in the name of religion, against the Hebrew tribe both by Mohammedans and Christians, quite unmindful of the fact that whatever of the good and Godlike has in their confession had been derived from the teachings of this very tribe. Hitherto persecutions of the Jew had been only occasional; with the year 1146 they begin to be more frequent, usual, consequent, and severe, as if to make up for the period in which the spirit of intelligence began to dawn among men surpass in inhumanity the days of dark barbarism" (Grätz, vi, 175). In that part of Spain controlled by the Almohades no other religion than that of the Crescent was to be tolerated, and Jew and Christian alike were obliged either to abjure the faith of their fathers or to quit the country within a month. To remain and yet to adhere faithfully to the teachings of the Old or New Testament was to incur the penalty of death. Maimonides's family, like many others to whom emigration was well-nigh impossible, embraced the Mohammedan faith, or, rather, for the time being, renounced the public profession of Judaism, all the while, however, remaining faithful to it in secret, and keeping up a close communication with their co-religionists abroad (compare Carmoly, A moslem, 1859, p. 355 sq.; Munk, Archiv Erfurts, 1851, p. 319 sq.). For more than 25 years Moses lived together with his family, under the assumed character of Mohammedan; but when the death of the reigning sovereign brought no change in the system of religious intolerance, they, with the greater part of the Jewish community, resolved to emigrate and travel abroad, as he himself tells us, "by land and by sea," without finding a resting-place for the sole of his foot. Their first landing-place was Acco, in Palestine; from thence they went via Jerusalem to Cairo; then to Hebron, and next to Egypt, stopping first a short time at Alexandria, but finally settling at Fustat (compare Jerusalem, A moslem, 1849, p. 45 sq.). On their journey Maimonides had lost his father (at Cairo), and, to earn a livelihood for his father's household, he engaged with his younger brother in the jewelry trade; the care of the business mainly falling to David, while Moses devoted most of his time to literary pursuits and to the study of medicine, which he afterwards practised, and in which profession he attained to great eminence.

Life and Labors.—During his boyhood, Moses Maimonides is said to have manifest anything but a promise of those great abilities which were unfolded in his manhood. He was a child of ten years old when his father sent him, at a very early age, from his paternal roof. During his absence from home, however, an earnest desire for knowledge was manifested by him, and, by study and intercourse with learned co-religionists and Arabs, he acquired a great treasure of knowledge in the different provinces of science, which his clear, penetrating, and methodical mind mastered with a marvellous power. An elegant oration, delivered by him at fourteen, reconciled father and son. Acquainted with all the writings of ancient philosophers, he became the most eminent philosopher of his age. He was an able political economist and metaphysician. When only 23 years old (1156), he proved the possession of extraordinary powers of comprehension and elucidation in a treatise on the Jewish calendar, based on astronomical principles (Hebrew: לאמשרה), which he composed for a friend. In the same year also, whilst wandering about from place to place, and deprived of the aid of a library, he yet began his stupendous Commentary on the Mishra (Hebrew: הלוחות). At this time also (about 1160) he composed the Letter on Religious Persecution (Hebrew: ארológico), or A Treatise on Glorifying God (Hebrew: תוחם), i.e., by suffering martyrdom—a most ingenuous plea for those who have not of the Jewish religion, and was regarded as a new Bible or Talmud. A detailed account of its reception is given by Wolf, Bibliotheca Hebr. i, 840 sq. Most of the young Israelites of his days were spending their best time in acquiring a mediocre knowledge of the sixty books of the Talmud, to the neglect and exclusion of all secular science and philosophy. To obviate this, Maimonides wrote those philosophical works, which have become the main contents of the whole Talmud. "If the Talmud," says Grätz (vii, 389), "may be likened to a Dedalic structure, in which one can scarcely find his way even with an Ariadne thread, Maimonides has transformed it into a well-organized edifice with side-wings, halls, apartments, chambers, and closets, in which the seeker, led by the fitting superscriptions and numbers, may make his way without a guide, and gain a view of all the contents of the Talmud... One might almost say that Maimonides created a new Talmud. It is true these are the old elements; we know their origin, their original connection; but in his hands it looks like another work; the mist is removed; the disguising ad- dena done away with; it appears remoulded, smoother, fresher, and newer. The Mishna, the foundation-structure of the Talmud, opened by propounding the question on the law: 'At what time on the third day of the week is the Shema to be read?' and closes with the discussion, when this or that thing becomes lethumically unclear. Maimonides, on the other hand, thus opens his Talmudical codex: 'The foundation of foundations, and the pillar of wisdom, is to know that there exists a first.' He has remoulded all other beings into existence, and that all things existing in heaven or on earth, and whatever is between them, exist only through the medium of this first Being, and closes with the words, 'The earth will one day be covered with knowledge as the ocean's ground is by water.' The whole work is permeated by a peculiar savour; it breathes the spirit of complete wisdom, cool reflection, and deep morality. Maimonides, so to speak, has Talmudized philosophy and metaphysicized the Talmud. He has admitted philosophy within the precincts of the religious code, and there conveyed its citizenship of equality besides the Halacha. Though philosophy had, previous to his day, been cultivated by Jewish thinkers (here comp. Sachs, Religion Oe Poet in Juden in Spanien, p. 185 sq.), and applied to Judaism from Philo down to Abraham Ibn-David [see Chatuyq], she had always been regarded as something outside of the rabbinical law—as a something which had nothing in common with practical Judaism as exercised daily and hourly. Maimonides, however, introduced her into the very bosom of Judaism, and, so to speak, gave Aristotle a place by the side of the rest of the Talmud. 'He was the mind of Maimonides only,' says Dr. Wise (Judaism, Dec. 1, 1871), 'could accomplish such a gigantic task, and codify that immense mass of laws and customs as systematically and linguistically exact as he did. Nobody before or even after him has been able to do it so well and completely as he has done it. He alone has brought the rabbinical law within a compass, to be mastered in a few years, and under a system to find particular laws or customs without roaming over a mass of rabbinical sources, thereby affording students an opportunity to master the rabbinical laws, and to save time for other studies.' His fame now became world-wide. Not only, however, as a law-giver in Judah did he advance to the first place among the great and learned; as a physician also he excelled his colleagues, and for his attainments in this field of labor his name was carried to many foreign lands. Richard Courz de Lion, learning of his medical skill, anxiously sought to secure the services of this noted Jew as his court physician. Maimonides, however, preferred to remain in the land of his adoption, and declined the proffered honor (compare Well, Chalifren, iii, 425 sq.). It was at this time that the vizier of Saladin, the Kadi al-Fâhbel, who had taken the Maimonides under his protection, appointed Moses chief (Re'a, v22) of all the congregations in Egypt (about 1887).
The numerous and onerous duties now put upon him as the spiritual head of Judaism, and the constant demand for his great medical skill, were, however, alike unable to overcome the powers of his intellect, which he had consecrated to the elucidation of the Bible and its traditions, and to the harmonizing of revelation with philosophy, and in the midst of all his engagements Maimonides entered upon the preparation of a third regligio-philosophical work, which became, of all his productions, the most valued and important. Its object was to reclaim one of his disciples, Ibn-Akinin (q.v.), from the prevailing scepticism about a future world, the destiny of souls, and other such matter; and in his designs the advice of the work is explained by Maimonides himself in the following terms: "I have composed this work, not for the common people, neither for beginners, nor for those who occupy themselves only with the law as it is handed down without contemplating its principle. The design of my work is rather to promote the true understanding of the real spirit of the law, to guide those religious persons who, adhering to the truth of the Torah, have studied philosophy, and are embarrassed by the contradictions between the teachings of philosophy and the teachings of the Torah. The work is divided into three parts in 204 sections, and entitled in Arabic تردد مورخ نهشيم (the Guide of the Perplexed), in allusion to Exodus, xiv, 8, and, according to Gritz (vi, 363), "constituting the summit of the Maimonidean mind and the justification of his immovable convictions," created a new epoch in the philosophy of the Middle Ages. "Ce livre," says Frank (Etudes Orientales, p. 360), "inspire également le respect par les puissantes facultés de l'auteur, la prolixité soupçonnée de son esprit, la variété de ses connaissance, l'élevation de son spiritualisme enfin par la lumière qu'il repand sur quelques-uns des points les plus obscures de l'esprit humain. Not only did Mohammedans write commentaries upon it, but the Christian schoolmen learned from it how to harmonize the conflicts between religion and philosophy (compare Joe, Einfluss d.Jud. Philos. auf die christl. Scholastik, in Frankel's Mittelalter [Bresl. 1860, p. 210 sq.]; Munk, Melanges, p. 486). The contents of this great and noble work, which has become for Jewish thinkers, as it were, a "touchstone of philosophy," are, in the three parts into which it is divided, as follows: The first part is especially devoted to the explanation of all sensory expressions which are made use of in the Bible in regard to God; the second part treat, more detailed the nature and the relation of the Mosaic and of the Maimonides had already laid down in the first book of his aforementioned code, namely, that such expressions must be taken only in a spiritual and figurative sense; this part contains also the rational arguments by which they are justified, and the further spiritual nature of God. The second part treats, first, of natural religion and its deficiencies; secondly, of the creation of the world and the different gradations of the world's system; and, thirdly, of revelation, prophecy, and of the excellence and perfection of the divine law. The third part, after giving an explanation of the first vision of the prophet Ezekiel, treats of the opposition of good and evil in the world, of God's providence and omniscience, and their relation to the free will of man; a number of chapters of this last part are taken up in explaining the great distinction of the Mosaic law, and the reason for each separate law. But while, on the one hand, the Morkh Neechim contributed more than any other work to the progress of rational development in Judaism, on the other hand, also provoked a long and bitter strife between orthodoxy and heresy; in rousing out the latter, did not only cause the broad principle that "the Bible must be explained metaphorically by established fundamental truths in accordance with rational conclusions." So bitter, indeed, was the contest which broke out between the subsequent spiritualistic Maimonidians and the "literal Talmudistic" schools, that the fierce invectives were speedily followed by anathemas and counter-anathemas issued by both camps, and, finally, about the middle of the 18th century, the decision was transferred into the hands of the Christian authorities, who commenced by burning Maimonides' books, continued by bringing to the stake all Hebrew books on which they could lay their hands, and followed this decision up by a wholesale slaughter of thousands upon thousands of men, women, and children—irrespective of their philosophical views. Under these circumstances, the antinomistic parties, chiefly through the influence of David Kimchi and others, came to their senses, and gladly enough submitted to the verdict of the Christian world as far as to send a deputation (in 1252) to Maimonides' grave at Saphet "to ask pardon of his ashes" (Linda, p. 60); and, as time wore on, the name of Moses Maimonides became the pride and glory of the nation. Moses, himself, however, never witnessed the end of the conflict into which he had the mortification to see his nation plunged, caused by his own labors, which had been intended solely for their good. In the midst of the conflict (the opposition begun by Samuel ben-Alli, the son of Bagdadi, was particularly strong in Southern France and Italy, and was connected with a festival of the 8th of Adar under the name "the Great Luminary of the Jewish nation was extinguished Dec. 18, 1204. Both Jews and Mohammedans of Fostat had public mourning for three days. At Jerusalem the Jews proclaimed a day of extraordinary humiliation, reading publicly the threatenings of the law (Lev. xxvi, 32) and the history of the destruction of the ark by the Philistines (1 Sam. iv, etc.), for they regarded Maimonides as the ark containing the law. His remains, in accordance with a personal request before his decease, were conveyed to Tiberias; and the reverence with which the Jewish nation still cherishes his memory is expressed by the well-known saying, מַעֲרֹת יְסוֹד תֵּבִּירֵס (From Moses, the lawgiver, to Moses Maimonides), no one hath arisen like Moses," in allusion to Deut. xxxiv, 10. "No man since Ezra had excelled so deep, universal, and lasting an influence on Jews and Judaism as Moses Maimonides. His theological-philosophical works formed an authority among the progressive thinkers equal to his Mishna-Ṭora among rabbinical students. All Jewish thinkers up to date—Baruch Spinoza, Moses Mendelssohn, and the writers of the 19th century included—are more or less the disciples of Maimonides; so that no Jewish theologico-philosophical book, from and after A.D. 1200, can pick up the saving aid of what Maimonides form not a prominent part." (Dr. Wise). Maimonides as a Jewish Theologian and Philosopher. His importance for the religion and science of Judaism, and his influence upon their development, is so great that he truly deserves to be placed second only to Moses, the great lawgiver, himself. Maimonides first of all brought order into those almost boundless repetitions of tradition, and the discussions and decisions to which they had given rise, which, without the remost attempt at system or method, lay scattered upon and down the works of R. Judah and Abraham—Midras, Mishna, Talmud. Imbued with the spirit of lucid Greek speculation, and the precision of logical thought of the Arabic Peripatetics, aided by an enormous knowledge, he became the founder of rational scriptural exegesis, and, while he held to all the Maimonidean precepts, he endeavored to explain by the light of reason, with which, as the highest divine gift in man, nothing really divine could, according to his theory, stand in real contradiction. The fundamental idea in his works is that the law was given to the Jews merely to train them to obedience, but also as a revelation of the highest truths, and that, therefore, fidelity to the law in action is by no means sufficient, but that the knowledge of the truth is also a religious duty. By this teaching he offered a powerful incitement to speculation in religious philosophy, yet he always guarded by his enunciation of definite articles of faith a narrow row determination of Jewish dogmas, although his own investigations bear throughout a rationalistic character. When the Talmud left his influence, he fastens on lies. His creed is an invention, of which the ancients had no idea. With more of a Mohammedan than a Jewish and Talmudic despotism, he constructed a code, in order that all articles of faith and practices of the least consequence should be regulated and decided upon (ibid. p. 5, 6, 400). No less decided is Isaac Reggio (q. v.), who approves of Luzzat's critique, and demands the removal of the yoke which Maimonides put upon the Israelites, and which robs of all freedom in thinking (ibid. p. 22).

As unjust as this criticism may be, nothing not only the form but also the matter of the world, the philosophical proofs to the contrary not appearing to him conclusive. If these proofs possessed mathematical certainty, it would be necessary to interpret those passages in the Bible which appear to oppose them allegorically, which is now not admissible. Accordingly Maimonides condemns the hypothesiss of the eternity in the Aristotelian sense, or the doctrine that matter is eternal ab initio, and has always been the substratum of an order or form arising from the tendency of matter to be eternal and in absolute Spirit; "the Bible," he says, "teaches the temporal origin of the world." Less discordant with the teachings of the Bible, according to Maimonides, is the Platonic theory, which he interprets with the exactness strictest according to the literal sense of the dialogue Timaeus. He renounces the assumption uphanded at Monastir that eternal, but that the divinely-caused order, by the addition of which to matter the world was formed, had a beginning in time. Yet he does not himself accept this theory, but adheres to the beliefs that matter was created by God. In Ethics, Maimonides, holding reason in man—"if properly developed and tutored by divine revelation—to be the great touchstone for the right or wrong of individual deeds, fully allows the freedom of will, and, while he urges the necessity, nay, the merit of listing; to a certain degree, to the promptings of nature, rigorously condemns a life of idle asceticism, and dreamy, albeit pious contemplation. No less is it, according to him, right and praiseworthy to pay the utmost attention to the healthy and vigorous development of the body, and the care of its preservation by the closest application to hygienic rules. Providence, he argues, is certain—"broad and sure humanity, and holds the sway over the destinies of nations; but he utterly denies its working in the single event that may befall the individual, who, subject above all to the great physical laws, must learn to understand and obey them, and to shape his mode of life and action in accordance with conditions—"the different circumstances of the study of natural science and medicine being there-fore a thing almost of necessity to everybody. The soul, and the soul only, is immortal, and the reward of virtue consists in its—strictly unobliged—bliss in a world to come; while the punishment of vice is the "loss of the soul." "Do not," says Maimonides, "allow thyself to be persuaded by fables that God predetermines who shall be righteous and who wicked. He who sins has only himself to blame for it, and he can do nothing better than speedily to change his course. God's omnipotence has bestowed on each man his own lot. Man fore-knows man's choice without guiding it. We should not choose the good, like children and ignorant people, from motives of reward or punishment, but we should do good for its own sake, and from love to God; still retaining as wary the immortal soul in the future world."

The resurrection of the body is, it seems, ascribed by Maimonides as being simply an article of faith, which is not to be opposed, but which cannot be explained.

Exception continues to be taken to Maimonides's theologico-philosophical views even in our day, by many who recognize his ability and the importance of his labors. The great Italian Jewish theologian, the late David Luzzatto (q. v.), is quite decided in his opposition, Maimonides, he holds, brought trouble with all his philosoph.

It was translated into Latin by Justinian, bishop of Neo-German by Fürstenbach (Krotochil, 1839); the second by M. E. Stein (Vienna, 1864); and the third by Scheyer (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1848). The first part, ii: 36-90, has been translated into English by Dr. Trowell, The Reasons of the Laws of Moses (Lond. 1827). The original Arabic, with a French translation and elaborate have been written by A. de Person (Frankfort-on-smaller works, we may enumerate, in conclusion, a trans-several medical, mathematical, logical, and other treat-legal decisions, theological disquisitions, etc., for

MAITRE de Sacy. See SACR.

MAISTRE, Joseph (cousin) de, an eminent French Roman Catholic writer, the greatest advocate of Ultramontanism in the 19th century, was born at Chambéry, April 1, 1791, of an ancient noble family of the province of Savoy, and he became himself a member of that body in 1877. When the French armies invaded Savoy in 1792 he retired to Piedmont, where he wrote his Considérations sur la France (1796, 8vo; three editions in one year). Charles X., as he was called Louis XVIII., made him prince of the Order of the Holy Spirit, where he remained until the downfall of that prince, Nov. 19, 1798; he then retired to Venice, and lived there one year in great poverty. In 1799 he was created grand chancellor of Sardinia, and in September, 1802, was sent by that country as ambassador to Russia. While there he published (in 1810) his Essai sur le principe régulateur des constitutions politiques, a full exposition of his political views, advocating the principle of divine right, and declaring the rights of the people derived from the sovereign—with a sort of theocratic form of government more suitable to the Middle Ages than to the 19th century. "M. de Maistre," in this work, "represents men as connected with God by a chain which binds them to his throne, and holds them without enslaving them. To the full extent of this chain we are at liberty to move; we are slaves indeed, but we are freely slaves (librement esclaves); we must necessarily answer for the purposes of the Supreme Being, and yet the actions by which we work out these purposes are always free. So far so good; but here come the peculiarities of our author's system. He does not consider men as individually responsible before God; he takes them as nations, and the nation, for M. de Maistre, is made up of the king and the aristocracy. Even considering each order separately, he asserts that all the members of the same order are indissolubly bound together, each bearing a share of the mutual and joint responsibility which weighs on the whole order. Now let us suppose the case of a revolution. In those terrible events which follow the disregard of all the laws of right and wrong, although the persons who fall victims to the fury of the multitude may sometimes be those whose very crimes have called down the divine vengeance, yet very often, nay, in most cases, the individually innocent suffer most. But, then, although individually innocent, they must come in for the share of the solidarity which belongs to the whole order. This results from the fact that the doctrine of atonement is the principle on which rests the constitution of society: the crimes of the guilty are visited on the innocent, and the blood of the innocent, in its turn, atones for the guilty. Here is to be found the key-stone of count De Maistre's theory; the Savoyard publicist develops it with all the resources of logic and erudition." It has been well remarked that a system such as this is fatalism of the very worst description. Not only does it take away the free agency of men considered as individuals, but it effectually proclaims the validity of the maxim that might is right. "Wishing to transform all earthly governments into one homogeneous theocracy," he proposed, as a control over absolutism, an absolutism of a much more dangerous character. M. de Maistre's leading idea is a good one: he wishes to appeal from the passions and depraved will of man to the Deity itself as to the eternal source of right and good; but not being, of course, able to receive immediately from God the counsel and the laws he wishes to reduce into practice for the good of society, he traces them to the pope, as the viceregent of Heaven—an error common to all reactionary movements—from the fear of allowing anything like vagueness to exist in the minds of men respecting their connection with the Almighty. He is not satisfied with anything short of what is really tangible, visible, perceptible to the senses. The sovereign power, the Mediator. Failing to understand that both divinity and humanity have met together only in the man Christ Jesus, he would fain make us believe that the pope is "God made manifest in the flesh." With such views, he could not but condemn severely the charter of 1814, which restored the universal institutions to France, and by which Napoleon turned his face towards Russia with a view of making it his home. By a ukase of December, 1815, Russia expelled the Jesuits. To them De Maistre and his family were much attached, and being on this account himself suspected of proselytism, he quitted the country and returned to Savoy in 1817, and became minister of state. He died Feb. 26, 1821.

Among the principal works of De Maistre, our special consideration is claimed also by his Du Pavé (Lyons, 1815, 2 vols. 8vo; second and improved edition, 1821, 2 vols. 8vo), in which he treats of the papacy, 1, in its relation to the Roman Church; 2, to the temporal powers; 3, to civilization; and, 4, to the dissenting churches. It is a daring apologue of the spiritual and temporal power of the pope. He starts from the principle that modern nations need a guarantee against the abuse of sovereign power. Such guarantee, he claims, is not to be found either in written charters, which are always useless, nor in assemblies, which are powerless when they are not anarchic. He can find it only in a sovereignty superior to all others, at once independent and dependent. With the independence, the right to intervene in a dependent prelates, was restrained in the exercise of the exercise of legislative power by the clergy, the nobility, and the commons, each resting on its own foundation, and acting within its allotted sphere, above white was the papacy, which, by its subordinate authority, maintained, in cases of collision, the harmonious co-operation of the members of all the body politic. We are told to admire the noble, temperate monarchy which had grown up under the shelter of the Christian Church, and which, though never brought to perfection (this is, at least, a candid acknowledgment), had not been secured to the mediaval nations so long a career of happiness and freedom, prosperity and glory. It would be a task both useless and unprofitable to point out all the misstatements which occur in the description just given. The futility of his scheme was demonstrated by the conduct of De Maistre himself. In 1804 pope Pius VII crowned Napoleon emperor. This, according to the theory of the work De Pavé, was one of those judgments by which the papal infallibility settled political difficulties. Yet De Maistre speaks of this decision in the following deprecating terms: "The spirit of infallibility which is everywhere for the present the great subject of conversation. . . . All in the French Revolution is wonderfully bad, but this is the ne plus ultra. The crimes of an Alexander VI are less frightful than this hideous apostasy of his more wretched successors. . . . If we are to reconcile the heart that the unfortunate pontiff would go to St. Domingo to crown Dessalines. When once a man of his rank and character so far forgets both, that all is to be hoped for is that he may completely degrade himself until he becomes but an insignificant puppet." (Corresp. dip. p. 186, 189.) It was thus the great ultramontane writer respected papal infallibility when not in accordance with his own views or his passions. De L'Église Gallicane dans ses rapports avec le souverain pontife (Paris, 1821, 2 vols. 8vo; Lyons, 1822) is a sort of continuation of the preceding, and attacks the true degree of independence claimed by the Church of France. This book, in which Bossuet and Fleury are somewhat roughly handled, was not well received at first by the French clergy. Abbé Bontem published an answer to it under the title Réclamations pour l'Église de France, et pour le roi; réponse à Bossuet. In this book, which at the course of time, it was greatly instrumental in causing the triumph of the ultramontane doctrine. La série de St. Pétersbourg, ou Extravagants, etc. (Paris, 1821, 3 vols. 8vo), "the best known and certainly the most readable book of the author," treats of retoric and his works here and hereafter. We cannot give here the details of De Maistre's theory, but its most important features may be summed up thus: the thorough badness of human nature, the necessity of atonement, the reversion of the merits of the innocent paying for the guilty, and salvation through blood. These views, in which outward Christians have found a daring perversion of the most holy Christian principles, led De Maistre to justify the Inquisition. His apology, entitled Lettres à un gentilhomme Francais sur l'Inquisition Exposé (Paris, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo), is, however, but a very lame defence of that odious institution. His violent attacks against Bacon, Examen de la Philosophie de Bacon (Paris, 1826, 2 vols. 8vo) is not much better. His works are very original, but more in the form than in the ideas. Carrying often a true principle to its fullest extent, he arrives at paradoxes and absurdities. That is the cause of abuse, says the "plague writer," says Dr. M'Clincock (in the Methodist Rev. 1856, p. 218), "De Maistre may be compared, in some respects, to Paul Louis Courier; he had the same point, the same finesse, the same elegance of style, and an apparent simplicity, which only set off with greater effect the home-truths he addressed to his readers; but judged as these minor works decidedly were, true both as to sentiment and language, they were merely suggested by the events of the times, and, as such, were likely to lose most of their point as the course of things moved on. To a man with an independent spirit, he will, ever retain their interest, for they discuss principles; they belong to the philosophy of history. Whatever view we may take of the conclusions adopted by De Maistre, we cannot but admire both the extent of his learning and the depth of his thoughts; the work is plumply deserving of a place in the immense storehouse of man's life here below, of which we have before spoken. From this point of view he is admirably placed to discuss the most serious questions, and he does so with a power and an eloquence to which everything must yield (compare Fouquel, Christopher's Divisions, i, 200). Another remarkable point is the soundness of his judgment and the sagacity with which he assigns, both to events and to men, their proper influence over the whole course of contemporary history. Many views, many principles now generally adopted, he assigned to his contemporaries, and have been borrowed from that extraordinary book, often without any acknowledgment. Maitland, Samuel Roffey. D.D., an English divine of some note, was born in London in 1782; was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge; entered the law profession in 1816, but shortly after turned towards the ministry; was ordained deacon and priest in 1821; perpetual curate of Christ Church, Gloucester, in 1823-29; keeper of the Lambeth MSS., and librarian to the archbishop of Canterbury, in 1827. He died at Lambeth Palace, London, Jan. 19, 1866. His principal theological publications are as follows: An Inquiry into the Grounds on which the Prophetic Period of Daniel and St. John has been supposed to consist of 1260 Years (Lond. 1826, 8vo); — A Second Inquiry, etc. (1829, 8vo); — Attempt to elucidate the Prophecies concerning Antichrist (1830, 8vo); — Tracts and Documents illustrative of the History, Doctrines, and Rites of the Ancient Abbeys and Welldens (1832, 8vo); — The Dark Ages: a series of Essays intended to illustrate the state of Religion and Literature in the Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth Centuries (reprinted from the British Magazine, with corrections and some additions, 1841, 8vo; 2d ed. 1845, 8vo); — Essays on the Subjects connected with the Reformation in England (reprinted, with additions, from the British Magazine, 1847, 8vo); — London Athenaeum, etc. (1853); — Illustrations and Inquiries relating to Memorium, parts i—vi (1849, 8vo); — Erwin, or Miscellaneous Essays on Subjects connected with the Nature, History, and Destiny of Man (2d ed. 1850, 8vo).—An Essay on the Mystical School of Philosophy, etc. (London, 1851, 8vo); — Review of Fox's History of the Welldens.—Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Maitland, William, a noted Scotch politician of the Reformation period, better known as "Secretary Lethington," was born about 1525, and was educated both at St. Andrew's and the Continent. He rose to great influence as a political leader, and though he became a convert to the Reformed doctrines about 1555, he was in 1558 appointed secretary of state by Mary of Guise. In the following year, however, he openly joined the lords of the Congregation, and was one of the Scotch commissioners who met the duke of Norfolk at Berwick, to arrange the conditions on which queen Elizabeth would give them assistance. In 1561, after the arrival of queen Mary from France, he made an extraordinary lord of session. He strongly objected to the ratification of Knox's confessions, and as such founded the prosecution raised against Knox for treason. From this time he appears to have lost his influence with the reformers. In 1564 he held a long debate with Knox on the claims of the Reformed Church to be independent of the state. In 1568 he took part in the conspiracy against Rizzio, after whose assassination he was proscribed, and obliged to seek shelter for some months in obscurity. After queen Mary's imprisonment (1567) in England he played a most unenviable part, pretending to Elizabeth to be one of her admirers, but really seeking all the while to protect the cause of Mary, and it is evident that he never really deserted her, although he was present at the coronation of king James VI, and although he fought on the side of her opponents on the field of Langside. He took part in 1568 in the conference held at Edinburgh, in such unsatisfactory sympathy for Mary that the Scottish lords marked him as a dangerous enemy to the commonwealth, and in 1569 he was arrested at Stirling, but was liberated shortly after by an act of Kirkaldy of Grange. In 1570 he openly declared for Mary, and became the soul of the queen's party, in consequence of which he was declared a rebel, deprived of his offices and lands by the regent Morton, and besieged, along with Kirkaldy, in Edinburgh Castle. After a long resistance, the castle surrendered, and he was imprisoned in Leith, where he died (in 1578), "some," says Melville, "supposing he took a drink of the wine, as the said Romans they used to do." Buchanan has drawn his character with a severe pen in his Scottish tract entitled The Chameleon. Froude (x, 474) believes that Maitland died a natural death. Burton (Hist. of Maitland, iv, 55-57) says that Maitland that "his character is by no means suitable for a place in the history of literature or of art. Yet . . . if we look at his life and doings, we do not find him to be just one of those who have left the mark of their influence upon our age. . . . He had great abilities, but they were rather those of the wit and rhetorical than of the practical man." In the estimation of Knox, Maitland had greatly lowered himself by his unhappiness and vacillation, and the great reformer, in his dying hours even, was called upon to pronounce against the wary Scotch politician: "I have no warrant that ever he shall be well," alluding to Maitland's state in the hereafter. See Froude, Hist. of England, vol. x, ch. xix and xxii; Robertson, Hist. of Scotland (see Index).

Maitreya, a Buddhist divinity, according to the Buddhists was a disciple of the Buddha Sakyamuni, and a Bodhisattwa, or a man of pre-eminent virtue and sanctity. He is classed among the gods called Tushitas, or "the happy," and has generally the epithet Ajita, or unconquered, and is believed to become incarnate, and succeed Gotama (q. v.) as their future Buddha. In Tibet he is called Jampa. A faithful representation of this Buddha, surrounded by the (Tibetan) goddesses Dolma, the Mantas or Buddhavas of medicine, two ancient priests, and various saints, will be found in the works of Emil Schlagintweit's Buddhisms in Tibet (London and Leipzig, 1868), where an interesting sketch is given (p. 207 sq.) of the characteristic types of Buddha images, and of the measurements of Buddha statues made by his brothers in India and Tibet. Major, Georg, a German theologian, was born at Nuremberg, April 29, 1802. He studied theology under Luther and Melanchthon, and was successively rector at Magdeburg (1829), superintendent at Elbeien (1856), and professor of theology and court-preacher at Wittenberg (1859). In 1844 he was made doctor of divinity, and two years later he was called to the bishopric of Würzburg (with Bucer and Brenz) of the Protestants at the colloquy at Regensburg. On the breaking out of the Small-cald war, Major left Wittenberg, and received (1847) the appointment of superintendent and court-preacher at Merseburg; but on the close of the war, next year, he returned to Wittenberg. After rejecting the offer of prominent positions, made by the king of Denmark and the duke of Holstein, he became, in 1852, superintendent of the Mansfeld churches. In the mean time he had been active in supporting the Leipzig Interim, which asserted that good works are necessary to salvation, and had thus excited the suspicion of the strict Lutherans, who denied that proposition. Towards the close of 1553 Amsdorf, Major on these grounds, and the clergy of the district soon joined him in opposing the new superintendent, as having corrupted the doctrine of justification by faith. Major replied to the charge of Amsdorf in 1554, denying its truth, and asserting its acceptance of the doctrine of the Church; but, as he still insisted on the necessity of good works, the controversy continued to rage, and, as the count of Mansfeld held with the orthodox party, Major finally removed to Wittenberg. He then sought to give an unobjectionable form to his views by teaching that while faith alone is essential to salvation, good works are necessary as a consequence of saving faith. But, despite every effort at reconciliation, his opponents persisted, and even went to the length of asserting that good works are detrimental to salvation. The doctrines advocated by Major were finally branded as heretical in the Corpus doctrina Prædicantium, and were condemned by the compiler of the Formula Concordiae. Towards the close of his life he became involved in the Crypto-calvinistic controversy (q. v.), and, together with the Wittenberg and Leipzig theologians, was compelled to subscribe to the Torgau articles (q. v.). He died at Wittenberg, Nov. 28, 1574, before his Majoristic controversy had concluded.

Major, Johann, a humanistic poet at Wittenberg during the latter half of the 16th century, deserves a place here as the greatest satirist among the Philippists, as the followers of Melancthon were called. He was born in 1530 at Joachimsthal, where Johann Matthaeus (q. v.) became a friend. At the age of sixteen he went to Wittenberg, and formed a most intimate connection with Melancthon. To the influence of this association may doubtless be attributed his future course. After attaining to the degree of M.A. he returned to Wurzburg, with a view to succeed the university. Towards the degree of D.D. was conferred on him, and in the following year he was honored with the title of crown poet. Returning to Wittenberg, he was, in 1560, admitted to the philosophical faculty of that university, and, besides lecturing on poetry and the interpretation of Latin poets, he wrote occasional poems. In 1574 the Philippists were overthrow in Electoral Saxony, and its heads imprisoned. It is certain that Major suffered in this reverse, and he is said to have been three times imprisoned—once (from 1579 to 1581) was under sentence of death, although his opponents charge this, not to his connection with the Philippists, but to his conviction for criminal offences.

The prominence with which Andrae at this time advocated the Formula Concordiae opened a new and wide field to the vexation and sarcastic power of Major. He had not subscribed to the Formula, and made it and its originators the subject of his spleen. When he ventured to do this in an official address, he was, at the beginning of 1587, expelled from the university; but when the Elector Christian I ascended the throne, the Philippist party was restored to favor, and Major was soon recalled. He did not refrain from venting his satirical humor on his opponents, but when, in 1591, the elector died, and a new policy was initiated, our poet, with many others, was again imprisoned. So bitter was the feeling against him that a Wittenberg mob pelted him with stones and dirt, and even children ran at him as a "Calvinistic rogue." He was released in 1568, and spent the remainder of his life in a private station, writing only an occasional poem. He died in the Calvinistic German, often degenerated into ridicule of the anti-Philippists that was even cruel. See Frank, Johann Major, der Wittenberger Poet (Halle, 1863); and the same in Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, xx, 75 sq. (G. M.)

Major, John, a Scottish historian and theologian, was born at Gledborn, East Lothian, Scotland, in 1669; was educated at Oxford, Cambridge, and Paris. After teaching a number of years in Paris, as professor of scholastic philosophy, he became professor of divinity, and subsequently provost at St. Andrews, in Scotland. He died in 1647. He published Commentaries on the Scriptures, besides works of a secular character—Allison, Hist. of the Brit. and Amer. Authors, v. v.; Thomas, Dict. of Biog. and Mythol. a. v.

Majoris, a name given to Jewish ministers in the Theodisian Code, and also by Augustine and others to a party called Coeleitico, made up of Jewish apostates. The laws were specially severe against them, three states being inflicted upon being aimed at them.

Majoritas. See MAJOR, GEORG.

Majoritas (Precedence) is the form in ecclesiastical law to denote the preference of the clergy over the laity, as well as the rank of the Church officers. In the Roman Catholic Church the distinction between the clergy and the laity is greater than in the Protestant churches. In the former there is also greater distinction in the ranks of the clergy itself. Thus an older ordinance has precedence over a more recent ordination, and a higher over a lower order (c. i, 15, X, De mag. ced. i, 33), excepting only an ordination conferred by the pope himself, as his act takes precedence in any case (c. vii, X, cod.). In ordinations equal in rank the secular clergy precede the regulars; and again, among the regulars, the cloister precedes the collegiate; among the orders, the regular canons the monks, and all other orders the mendicants; and among the latter the Dominicans precede all others (compare Benedict XIV, De syn. dicet. lib. iii, c. x). This term expresses also the official authority, the legal power of the Church office. Persons who are invested with such offices are designated in the Protestant churches officialis (q. v.). In the Roman Catholic Church they are called Church superiors (superiores ecclesiasticus), and as a body they make up the hierarchical (hierarchy) rank (hierarchy). The Bishop of the Roman Catholic Church, who enjoins obedience not only of its subjecta, i.e. non-officials, but also of its officials, who, on entering upon their office, vow submission and obedience to their superior by a formal oath. Hence arose the dispute whether the pope should be accepted as the highest authority, or whether even he was subject to a council. See INFALLIBILITY; PAPACY.

Makarj, a noted Russian prelate, was born in the Moscovite province near the end of the 15th century. He early entered the monastic state; became archimandrite (abbot) of the famous Ivan monastery at Moscow; in 1508, archbishop of Mygoryd Velik; and in 1542, finally, metropolitan of all Russia. He died at Moscow Dec. 31, 1564. By reason of his talents, scholarship, ecclesiastical authorship, eloquence, zeal for Christian missions among the heathen, extensive activity and influence, and patriotism, and by reason of the sincerity of his character, Makarj figures prominently in Russian history. When yet archbishop, he converted the Ibadan tribes in the north of the empire, and is justly styled the "apostle of the Ibadus." When a metropolitans, he became the patron of the school for the training of schollars from Russia as well as from abroad, with whose aid he compiled many books. His celebrated "Book of Legends" went through more than a dozen editions, and was translated into German,—Wagner, Staats und Gebr. Leck, vol. xii, s. v.

Makas (Heb. Ma'akas, מַקאָס, boundary: Septuag. Μακάς, v. r. Μακάς; Vulg. Macaeth), a place first named among those designating the district of Ben-Dekar, one of Solomon's purveyors (1 Kings iv, 9). The associated names, Shal-bim, Beth-shemesh, and Elon-beth-hanan, would seem to indicate a locality in the tribe of Dan, perhaps in the plain east of Ekron.

Maked (Makid v. r. Makiδ; Syr. Moker; Vulg. Maged), one of the "strong and great cities" of Gilead.—Josephus says Galilee, but this must be an error—into which the Jews were driven by the Ammonites under Timotheus, and from which they were delivered by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. v, 36, 36); in the latter passage the name is given in the A. V. as Maged). By Josephus (Ant. xx, 8, 3) it is not mentioned among the other cities named in this narrative have been identified, but no name corresponding to Maked has yet been discovered, and the conjecture of Schwarz (p. 280), that it is a corruption of Minnith (מִינִית for מִית), though ingenious, can hardly be accepted without further proof.

Makemnie, Francis, a distinguished Presbyterian minister, was born near Rathmell, Donegal Co., Ireland, about the middle of the 17th century. After completing his academic and theological course, he was licensed by the presbytery of Lagann in 1681. He undertook a mission to Barbadoes soon after, and was ordained June 2, 1682, with a view to coming to America. From Barbadoes he went to Somerset Md., Ind., where he is supposed to have founded the Church in Snow Hill, and from thence he removed to Virginia. In 1699 he obtained a formal license to preach agreeably to the requisitions of the Toleration Act, and was very successful in his labors. He went to London in 1704, to make arrangements for the supply of his Church, and returned with two ministers from Ireland. In 1705 he obtained with difficulty the certificates required for the exercise of his ministry, and sailed, in 1706, in the formation of the Philadelphia presbytery, by which he was moderator. He died in 1708. Makemnie published A Catechism (1691):—An Answer to George Keith, etc. (1692):—Truths in a New Light, etc. (1699):—A plain and lively Persuasion to the Inhabitants of Indiam and Virginia, etc. (1704):—A Letter to Lord Cornbury (Bost. ton, 1707):—An Account of his Imprisonment and Trial (N. Y. 1755, and since). See Sprague, Amasa, III, 1.

Makeloth (Heb. Makeloth; מַכְּלָת, assem bles, as in Psa. xxviii, 27; Sept. Maye, אוֹסַמָּס), the twenty-sixth station of the Israelites in the desert, between Haradah and Tahath (Num. xxxiii, 25, 20); probably situated on the summit north-west of Jebel el-Mukrah. See Exon.

Makkedah (Heb. Makkedah; מַכְּדָה, keremah's place; Sept. Mancia, Josephus Macida, 1 Macc. v, 1, 17), a royal city of the ancient Canaanites (Jos. xii, 16), in the neighborhood of which was the cave where the five kings who confederated against Israel took refuge after their defeat (Jos. x, 20). It afterwards belonged to Jericho (Jos. x, 19); it is not mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome. Some eight Roman miles to the east of Eleutheropolis (Otomast. s. v. Maceda), which would bring it among the mountains, as Keil observes, who therefore locates it to the west (Comment, on Josh. x, 10), since it was situated in the plain of Judah (Josh. xv, 41), north of Libnah (Josh. x, 29, 31) and west of Azekah (Josh. x, 10). De Saulcy (Narrat. ii, 488) is disposed to fix its site at a place which he names el-Merke'd, on the way from Hebron to the Dead Sea, a little east of Jenneh; but this is at least twenty-five miles west of Eleutheropolis, and the place itself was not known to Dr. Robinson, who passed along the same route. Porter suggests a ruin bearing the slightly similar name el-Kedish, on the northern slope of wady el-Sumih, about eight miles north-east of Eleutheropolis, with large caves adjacent (Handbok, p. 224, 281); but Van de Velde's drawings (Herber, p. 589, 591) seem quite too far north for the narrative in Joshua, as well as for the associated names, his proposed identification of which would place some, at least, of them (e.g. Beth-dagon, at Beit-Dejan) clearly within the tribe of Dan.

Malcrina. The Roman Catholic Church recognises two saints by this name.

1. A Cappadocian lady, grandmother of Gregory of Nyssa, who suffered persecution under the reign of Maximian, and wandered for a long time through the woods, together with her husband. She is commemorated on the 14th of January.

2. The sister of St. Basil and of St. Gregory of Nyssa; after the death of her father she withdrew into solitude, and afterwards induced her mother to establish a convent in Pontois, into which she retired. She died in 379, after performing a great number of miracles, etc. Her life was written by her brother, St. Gregory. She is commemorated on the 19th of July—Herzog, Real-Encyclop. viii, 746; Pierer, Universal-Lexicon, x, 764; Migne, Nouv. Encyclopédie Théologique, ii, 1298.

Maktea (Heb. Makthea, מַכְּתֶה [but with the art.], a mortar; as in Prov. xxvii, 12, or the socket of a tooth, as in Josh. xv, 41; Sept. renders, "socket," Vulg. Pilo), a place in or near Jerusalem, mentioned as inhabited, apparently by silver-merchants (Zeph. i, 11). Gesenius regards it as the name of a valley, so called from its mortar-like shape (Theaurus, p. 725). The rabbins understand the Kidron and other less likely places to be meant. Ewald conjectures (Propheten, p. 804) that it was the "Phoenician quarter of the city, in which the traders of that nation—the Canaanites (A. Vera. "merchants") who in this passage are associated with Makethath, presided, after the custom in Oriental towns. Dr. Barclay writes (City of the Great King, p. 184, 178) ingeniously suggests that it may have been a quarter devoted to minting operations, and therefore situated near the goldsmith's bazaar, which was doubtless located somewhere in Acra or the lower city, but whether in the Tyropoion adjoining the Temple, where it places itself, is uncertain.

Malabar, a tract of country extending along the western coast of India, from Cape Comorin to the River Chandra:agr, in N. lat. 12° 30'. Frequently the name Malabar, however, is erroneously applied to the whole country from Bombay to the southern extremity. Brit ish Malabar is situated between the 10th and 15th degrees of N. lat., belongs to the presidency of Madras, and has a population of 2,261,250. By far the most extensive portion of Malabar lies in the vicinity of the Gulf of Khauté.
Mountains, and consists of low hills, separated by narrow but fertile valleys. The upland is barren, and the cultivation much neglected; and it is in the valleys, and extensive ravines, and upon the banks of the rivers that the inhabitants chiefly reside. Until a recent period slavery existed in Malabar, but in 1843 a legislative enactment was passed by the British government, by the provisions of which slavery has been abolished throughout the whole extent of the British possessions in the East. The country is distinguished by the neatness of its villages, which are superior to many in India, being built of mud, neatly smoothed, and either whitewashed or painted; their picturesque effect is heightened by the beauty and elegant dresses of the Brahmin girls. The villages, as well as the bazaars, are the work of foreigners, the aboriginal natives of Malabar living in detached houses surrounded with gardens. The higher ranks use little clothing, but are remarkably clean in their persons, and all ranks are free from cutaneous distempers excepting the very lowest castes.

History.—It is supposed that Malabar was, at a very early period, conquered by a king named Above Ghaznas. The Nairs may have been established at the same time by the conqueror, or called in by the Brahmins, as a military body to support the government. In process of time they obtained settlements in the land, and the chiefs, taking every opportunity to aggravate themselves in the eyes of the rajahs, and submitted to a remonstrance continued to govern Malabar like independent princes. In 1760 the Mohammedans first effected an entry here under Hyder Ali, who subdued the country in 1761, and expelled all the rajahs except such as conciliated him by presentments. Disturbances were occasioned by these proceedings, but he continued to establish his authority, and in 1782 appointed a deputy, who made still further progress in subdued and settling the country. In 1786 Tipoo Sahib, his son, attempted forcibly to supersede Hindooism by his own faith, Mudderianism. This produced a general rebellion, which, however, was soon quelled by his vigorous administration, but in the mean time the country was laid waste by his tyrannical proceedings. On the breaking out of the war between Tipoo and the British in 1798, the refractory rajahs and Nairs joined the British, and Tipoo was driven from the country; Malabar became a portion of the British possessions of India, and, with slight disturbances, has since remained in the hands of the English. Under the management of the British the country is said to be advancing in prosperity.

Religion.—The original manners and peculiar customs of the Nairs have been preserved to this day. The Nairs are of each greater purity than in other parts of India. Besides the Hindus, who form the greater proportion of the inhabitants, the population consists of Moplays or Mohammedans, Christians, and Jews. The Hindu are divided into the following castes, namely, Namuries, or Brahmins; the Nairs of various denominations; the Leers, or Liars, who are cultivators of the land, and freemen; and, lastly, the Patiars, who were slaves or bondmen. Of these castes the most remarkable are the Nairs, the pure Sudras of Malabar, who all lay claim to be born soldiers; they are of various ranks and professions. There are altogether eleven ranks of Nairs, who form the militia of Malabar, under the Brahmins and rajahs. They are proud and arrogant to their inferiors, and in former times a Nair was expected instantly to cut off a cultivator or fisherman who presumed to defiance him by touching his person, or a Patiar who did not turn out of his road as a Nair passed. It is a remarkable custom among this class that a Nair never cohabits with the person whom he calls his wife; he gives her all proper allowances of clothing and food, but she remains in her mother's, or brother's, or her own home, and cohabits with any person or persons she chooses of equal rank; so that no Nair knows his own father, and the children all belong to the mother, whose claim to them admits of no doubt. This state of manners also prevails in neighboring countries. The native Mussulmans (Moplays) form about one fourth of the population; they are descended from Hindu mothers by Arab fathers, who settled in Malabar about the 7th or 8th century.

Christianity appears at a very early period to have made considerable progress in the Malabar coast, and there is a greater proportion of persons professing that religion in this country than in any other part of India. The accommodation theory of the Jesuits was practiced here in the 17th century by Pater Nobili. See India, p. 383. Three hundred and fifty years before the Portuguese Church at Goa, and one by the Jesuits of Rome—rule over this establishment, besides the Babylonian bishops, who preside over the Nestorian community. The last named Christians consider themselves descendants of converts made by the apostle Thomas in the 1st century. All the lands of any value in India are in the hands of the Christians, and are estimated at 200,000; 90,000 of them are settled at Travancore. There are also some 30,000 Jews in Malabar. See Cyclop. Britannico, s. v. See MADRAS.

Malacca, an extensive region, situated in Southern India, consisting of a large peninsula connected by the isthmus of Krow, extends from the 1st to the 12th degree of latitude and the 98th to the 104th of longitude, of E. long., and is 775 miles in length by 125 in average breadth. The country is a long, narrow strip of land, traversed by a chain of lofty mountains, and covered with extensive forests and marshes, so that it is very difficult to penetrate into the interior. A range of extremely bleak mountains, running through it from one extremity to the other, gives rise to innumerable streams, the courses of which, from the proximity of the mountains to the sea, are short, and are so obstructed at the mouths by bars and sand-banks that they can not be ascended by boats of any size. At the western extremity of the continent are the islands of Bintang, Batang, and Singapore, with many others, so thickly clustered together that they are only separated from the continent by narrow straits, and seem to be a prolongation of the island. On the west coast also there are numerous islands.

History.—The political state of Malacca has been subject to many revolutions, having been occasionally dependent on Siam when that monarchy was in the height of its power, and when its supremacy was owned by the Portuguese. But, when the Portuguese left, the city became a prey to the increasing power of the Burmans, all the southern portion of the peninsula has shaken off the yoke, and the northern states pay only a moderate tribute. The whole of the west-coast from that latitude to Port Romana is still possessed by the Malays, who are mixed in some places with the burgesses from Celebes, and who have a small settlement at Salengore. The northern and inland parts of the peninsula are inhabited by the Patany people, who appear to be a mixture of the Siamese and Malays, and who occupy independent villages. The negro is found along the coast and among the aboriginal natives. The great majority of the inhabitants are, however, of the Malay race, who are well known and widely diffused among all the eastern islands. The origin of this remarkable race is not distinctly known; they are understood, however, to be the descendants of the negroes, who were introduced into this country, but to have come originally from the district of Palembang, in the interior of Sumatra, situate on the banks of the River Melaka. Having crossed over about the end of the 12th century to the opposite continent, they, in 1253, founded the city of Malacca. Sultan Mohamed Shah, who ascended the throne in the 18th century, was the first Mussulman prince who extended his rule over Malacca. During part of the 19th century Malacca was under Siamese sovereignty. In 1819 Sultan Mahmoud repelled the aggression of the king of Siam, but in 1511 he was conquered by the Portuguese under Albuquerque. In 1642 it became the possession of the Dutch, and in 1824 it was finally transferred to the British among the cessions made by the king of Netherland in exchange for the British possessions on the island of Sumatra, E. long. 109° 9 N. lat. 5° 9° (comp. Cyclop. Brit. s. v.)

Religion.—Until the arrival of the Mohammedans in the 18th century, the inhabitants of Malacca were pagans or followed some corrupt form of Hindu idolatry. With the Mussulman religion the religion of the Crescent became the predominating belief. Christianization was introduced in the 18th century by the Portuguese. One of the earliest laborers in this work was the renowned Spanish Jesuit, Francis Xavier (q. v.). Unfortunately, however, for the success of the Gospel truth, the conduct of the Romish priesthood and of the Portugese authorities was very unkind toward the natives. Not much better was the influence of the Dutch. Though Protestantism, with their entrance, superseded Romanism in a measure, the government hesitated to encourage the Christian missions, and gave great liberty to Mohammedans, lest the latter should be tempted to insurrection, and Holland be deprived of these valuable possessions. To this period belong the infamous mass executions of Christians in Malacca. The Romanists maintain a suffragan bishop at the capital (of like name as the country). For further details on the success of Christianity in Malacca at present, see the articles INDIA; MALAYAS. See also Grundmann, Missionarische, No. 7, 21, and 34; Camerour, Our Trop. Posses. to Malayn Ind. (Lond. 1865).

Malachi (Heb. Malakî, מָלָאכִי, messenger; Sept. in the title Malakiy, but in ch. 1, it renders ἀγγέλος). The last of the minor prophets, and the latest writer in the canon of the O. T. (comp. iv. 4, 5, 6). What is known of him is so intimately connected with his prophecies that it will be most convenient to consider the whole subject together. In doing so we will, at the same time, treat any doubtful questions involved.

I. Personal Account.—The name Malachi is rendered by some my angel, but it is usually regarded as contracted from Malachijah, "messenger of Jehovah," like Abi (2 Kings xviii, 2) from Abijah (2 Chron. xxix, 1). The traditionalists regard the name as having been given to the prophet on account of the beauty of his person and his unblemished life. The name means an angel, angels being, in fact, the messengers of God; and, as the prophets are often styled angels or messengers of Jehovah, it is supposed by some that "Malachi" is merely a general descriptive term, and not a proper name. So Hengstenberg, Christol. iii, 372 sq. Of his personal history nothing is known (see Dr. Davidson in Horne's Introd. new ed. ii, 894 sq.). A tradition preserved in Pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vitis Proph.) relates that Malachi was of the tribe of Zebed, and born after the captivity at Sopha (Sopha, ?Saphir) in the territory of that tribe. According to the same apocryphal story he died young, and was buried with his fathers in his own country. Jerome, in the preface to his Commentary on Malachi, mentions a belief which was current among the Jews, that Malachi was identical with Ezra the priest, because the circumstances recorded in the narrative of the latter are also mentioned by the prophet. The Targum of Jonathan ben-Uzziel, on the words "by the hand of Malachi" (i. 1), gives the gloss whose name is called Ezra the scribe. With equal probability Malachi has been identified with Mordecai, Nehemiah, and Zerubbabel. The Sept., as above noted, renders "by Malachi" (Mal. i. 1), "by the hand of his angel," and this translation appears to have given rise to the idea that Malachi, as well as Haggai and John the Baptist, was from the court of Artaxerxes. On all this, however, it is highly probable that the efforts of the secular government were on this occasion seconded by the preaching of "Jehovah's messenger," and that Malachi occupied the same position with regard to the reformation under Nehemiah as Isaiah held in the time of Hezekiah, and Jeremiah in that of Josiah. The last chapter of canonical Jewish history is the key to the last chapter of its prophecy. See Noel Alexander, De Malachia Prophetis, in his Com. De S. Hier., iii, 642 sq.; Vitzting, ibid., in his Observ. in Mal. (Lips. 1781 sq.).

III. Contents of the Book.—The prophecies of Malachi are comprised in four chapters in our version, as in the Sept., Vulgate, and Peshito-Syriac. In the Hebrew the book includes the oracles of the first, third, and fourth chapters, but the whole prophecy naturally divides itself into three sections, in the first of which Jehovah is represented as the loving father and ruler of his people (i, 1-12); in the second, as the supreme God and father of all (ii, 10-16); and in the third, as their righteous and final judge (ii, 17-23).

These may be again subdivided into smaller sections, each of which follows a certain order: first, a short sentence; then the sceptical questions which might be raised by the people; and, finally, their full and triumphant refutation. The formal and almost scholastic manner of the prophecy seemed to Ewald to indicate that it was more delivered in writing than spoken publicly. But though this may be true of the prophecy in its present shape, which probably presents the substance of oral discourses, there is no reason for supposing that it was not delivered originally in public, like the warnings and denunciations of the older prophets, however they may differ from them in vigor of conception and high poetic diction.

1. The first section of the prophet's message consists of two parts: the first (i, 1-6) addressed to the people generally, in which Jehovah, by his messenger, asserts his love for them, and proves it, in answer to their reply, "Wherein hast thou loved us?" by referring to the punishment of Edom as an example. The second part (i, 7-12) is addressed especially to the priests, who had changed the name of Jehovah, and had been the chief movers of the defection from his worship and covenant. They are rebuked for the worthlessness of their sacrifices and offerings, and their profanation of the Temple thereby (i, 7-14). The denunciation of their offence is followed by the threat of punishment for future neglect (i, 15-18), and the character of the true priest is drawn as the companion picture to their own (i, 9-12).

2. In the second section (ii, 10-16) the prophet reproves the people for their intermarriages with the idolatrous heathen, and the divorces by which they separated from their legitimate spouses, who were at the altar of Jehovah, in violation of the great law of marriage which God, the father of all, established at the beginning.

3. The judgment, which the people lightly regard, is announced with all solemnity, ushered in by the advent of the Messiah. The Lord, preceded by his messenger, shall come to his Temple suddenly, to purify the land from its iniquity, and to execute swift judgment upon those who violate their duty to God and their neighbor. The first part (ii, 17-3, iii, 4) of the section terminates with the threat of the coming judgment; in the second (ii, 4-12) the faithfulness of God to his promises is vindicated, and the people are exhorted to repentance, with its attendant blessings; in the third (iii, 13-iv, 6) they are reproved for their want of confidence in God, and for confusing good and evil. The final severence between the righteous and the wicked is then set forth, and the great day of judgment is depicted, to be announced by the coming of Elijah, or John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ (Matt. xi, 14; xvii, 10-13).

IV. Style.—The diction of Malachi offers few, if any, distinctive marks as distinct from the manner of his prophecy. Smooth and easy to a remarkable degree, it is the style of the reasoner rather than of the poet. The rhythm and imagery of his writings are substantially those of the old prophets, but they possess no remarkable vigor or beauty. We miss the fiery prophet-like eloquence of Isaiah, and have in its stead the calm and almost artificial discourse of the practiced orator, carefully modelled upon those of the ancient prophet. His phraseology is accounted for by his living during that decline of Hebrew poetry which we see in the latter part of his oracles. His whole mode of expression is intended for the instruction of the people, and is not calculated for a wide circulation among the learned. His is the spirit of a letter, and not of a book; of an address, and not of a treatise. His style is always clear, and polished, and the manner of introducing a new line of argument or a new range of thought is most striking. Here the peculiarities are noticed, that there is no longer the ancient dramatic manner displayed, but a kind of discursive method. Each thought is carried on between God and the people or the priests, whose half-mocking questions are enlarged upon and finally answered with scorn by the mouth of the messenger. He seems fully aware of being the last of the sacred scribes (iii, 1 and 22), and the epoch of transition from the glowing evaneglical fulness of the inspired seer, who speaks to the people as the highest power suddenly and forcibly moves him, to the carefully studied and methodically constructed written discourse, becomes strangely apparent in him. We find both the ancient prophetical improvisation original exhortation, with its repinations and apparent incongruities, and the artificially composed address, with its borrowed ideas well arranged and its euphonious words well selected. This circumstance has probably also given rise to the notion that we are only in his book a summary of his orations: a work of defective memory that it were, the subject matter addressed, written out by himself from his recollections—an opinion which we do not share. Of peculiarities of phraseology we may notice the occurrence of passages like 'since the day of the Lord hath come' (i, 2, 8), etc.

V. Controversy and Intermixture.—The claim of the book of Malachi to its place in the canon of Old Testament literature has never been disputed, and its authority is established by the references to it in the New Testament (Matt. xi, 10; xvii, 12; Mark i, 2; ix, 11, 12; Luke i, 17; Rom. ix, 18). Philo, Josephus, Melito, Jerome, and other ancient authorities, mention it, and quote from it as in accordance with our present copies. Nor is there anything, either in its language or the circumstances of its time, the manners and customs touched upon, or its topographical and geographical allusions, that could give rise to the slightest critical suspicion.

Its text is one of the purest and best preserved, and no part of it is so much to be found in the Codex, that it need be added to correct the corruptions of other books. The differences in the various ancient versions arise only from the differences of the vowels assumed or found by the translators in their copies. The few variants which occur in the different texts are so unimportant that they do not call for any detailed remark.

VI. Commentaries.—Special exegetical helps on the whole book are as follows, a few of the most important of which we designate by an asterisk prefixed: Ephraim Syrus, Explanation (in Syriac, in his Opp. v, 813); Rupertus Tuitienis, In Mal. (in his Opp. v, 589); D. Kimchi and S. Jarchi, Mal. (in his opponents' Hebrew commentary); De Musis (Paris, 1618, 4to); Aben-Ezra's and other Jewish commentaries, tr. into Latin by Hein ben Lippes (Lips. 1746, 4to); D. Kimchi's and Aben-Ezra's commentaries (in Latin by Bohle (Rost. 1637, 4to); Kimchi's alone, by Carpio (Lips. 1676, 8vo), by Münster (Basil. 1550, 8vo); Aben-Ezra's alone, by Münster, ibid. 1550, 8vo; Bergwall (Uppal. 1707, 8vo); Abrabanel's, by Meyer (Ham- mond, 1685, 4to); Luther, Commentarius (in Opp. Witt- tenb. edit. iv, 520); in German, by Agrippa, 1555; Mel- lancthon, Explanationes (Vittem 1568; also in Opp. ii, 441); Drascus, in his Commentarius (in Opp. ii, 454; Grymus, Expositio (Rost. 1658, 8vo; also in Opp. ii, 455); Moller, Expositio (Vittem 1659, 8vo); Bucardus, Inter- pretatio (including Cant., Hag., and Zech.) Malachi (Vulg. Malachios), a familiar form (2 Esdr. i, 40) of the name of the prophet Malacli.

Malachi, Sr., archbishop of Armagh, one of the most noted characters in Irish Church History, was born of a noble family at Armagh about 1195. While yet a youth he retired from the world to subject himself to a most rigid asceticism under the abbot Imar of Armagh. His humility and fervor soon gained him a great reputation and appointment to a most exalted position in ecclesiastical rule, he was ordained priest only twenty-five years old, by Celsus, then archbishop of Armagh, who took a special interest in Malachi, and favored him in many ways. He also employed Malachi as assistant in the discharge of the archiepiscopal office, Celsus intending thus gradually to introduce Malachi to the archiepiscopal duties, with a view of securing him as successor. Of these opportunities Malachi availed himself for the furtherance of a plan he had long cherished, that of bringing the Irish Church, which since the conquest of the south-western provinces by the Normans had remained independent of Rome, into subjectivity to the papal chair. Malachi gradually introduced the Roman method of reciting the hours, and also established the rites of confession, confirmation, ecclesiastical marriage, etc., in the several convents. Then, in order to become betier acquainted with the customs and usages of the Church in the literal rule, he resided for some years with bishop Malchus of Lismore, also a native of Ireland, but who had been a monk of Winchester, England, and had there become thoroughly acquainted with the practices of Rome. Upon his return, he was immediately engaged by his friends for the restoration of the Banger monastery, which had remained in ruins since its destruction by the Danes, and which was now the possession of Malachi's uncle. Assisted by ten monastic associates, he erected an oratory and a small house for their accommodation, and, as their superior, remained there until about 1225, when he was called away to preside over the see of Connereth (Connor), where, by unwearied exertions, he built up the cause of Christianity. About 1129 he was further promoted by a call to the archiepiscopal of Armagh, the place for which Celsus had long intended him. Malachi readily accepted the position, however, only upon condition that he should be permitted to resign it "as soon as it was rescued from its present unbecoming situation." Hitherto, by custom, the archiepiscopacy had been hereditary, and in consequence, though Celsus had himself nominated Malachi, the latter had not undisputed possession of the primasial see until about 1155, when he at once applied himself most earnestly and zealously to perfecting the reforms he had inaugurated while yet with Celsus. Previous to Malachi's accession to the archiepiscopal throne there had been a hierarchy or a legalized support for religion in the Irish Church. The ministry had been sustained by voluntary offerings, and in some instances by the donation of Tremon, or free lands, the rents of which was to be appropriated annually to the bishop and the poor. These lands, however, were neither large nor numerous. During the comotions of the 10th and 11th centuries those which had been given to Armagh were again claimed by the lineal descendants of the original donors as their rightful inheritance. At this time they had been increased for eight centuries, and now amounted to over 8000 acres. Malachi's great endeavor was to do away with this abuse. See IMPROPRIATION. But he failed to accomplish this object, and in consequence resigned the primatial office and retired to the bishopric of Down, hitherto a part of the Diocese of Armagh.

Malachi unstiringly devoted himself to the one great object likely to be successfully accomplished—the Romanizing of the Irish Church. To accomplish this object—the greatest task which could have been undertaken by any person in his day, and which in consequence has made the name of Malachi one of the most prominent connected with the ecclesiastical annals of Ireland—he first travelled extensively in his own country, and then all the way to the Imperial City, where he was affectionately received by the pope (Innocent II), bishops, and cardinals, all vying with each other in their attentions to him. The pontifical envoys for Rome being ready, however, for which he had come, the pope refused to grant until a request for union with Rome should come from one of the Irish synods. Malachi received, however, a sure proof of the purity of his holiness with the proposed union: a certain degree of personal eminence he was confined by the sentence of excommunication by all Ireland, and returned to his native land expectant of the immediate realization of his life-long dream. On his way homeward he became intimately acquainted with Bernard of St. Clairvaux, whom he had already visited on his way towards the Eternal City, and so sharpened was he with the desire and rule of the Cistercian monastery that he determined to establish the order also in his country, and in 1142 opened the first Cistercian monastery in Ireland. In the mean time, however, Malachi busily employed himself, his legislative power also, in behalf of union, and in 1143 at last succeeded in moving a synod to make the request which Rome demanded previous to the bestowal of the pallium on the Irish clergy. It is, however, not a little remarkable that the synod from which this very important request emanated was not one convened in any province of Ireland, but principal church at Lismore (Patrick's Island), a small, inaccessible island near the Sherries, in the northern channel of Ireland (Haverty's History of Ireland [New York, 1866], p. 161). Could no more conspicuous place be found? From this and other internal evidences the historian is enabled to assert that the Irish clergy were not then in favor of union with Rome. The request, however, was issued, and St. Malachi set off immediately with it, expecting to meet the pope (now Eugene III) at Clairvaux; but, having been long delayed in England by the jealousy of king Stephen, Malachi, to his sore disappointment, did not reach there till the pope had left. Shortly afterwards he was taken ill, and died (1148) in the arms of his friend and future biographer, St. Bernard. Although Malachi did not personally obtain the cherished wish of his heart, he yet inaugurated and put in train the measures which brought the desired result after several years. St. Malachi was by far the most prominent and powerful native ecclesiastic of Ireland in her early days. "His personal influence," says Todd (Irish Ch. p. 116), "was so great that he was able to direct the minds of his countrymen as he saw fit: and for this he was admirably fitted by his descent, his learning, his eloquence, and his fascinating address. In A.D. 1152 St. Bernard wrote his Life in elegant mediæval Latin. Previous to an acquaintance with the Irish saint, Bernard had written to ten many hundreds against him the term "a stiff-necked, intractable, and ungovernable race;" but, in reference to Malachi, he declared that he could not find words to express his admiration of the saint.
A curious Prophecy concerning the Future Roman Pontiffs is extant under the name of Malachia. It designates, by a few brief phrases, the leading characteristics of each successive reign, and in some instances these descriptive characteristics have proved so curiously appropriate as to lead to some discussion. The characteristic of Pio Nono, and therefore of the Jesuits, was the subject of much speculation. That the prophecy really dates from the time of St. Malachy no scholar now supposes; it was unknown not only to his biographer, St. Bernard (Liber de vita S. Mal.), but neither does any other author allude to this work until the beginning of the 17th century. It has, however, been sufficiently discussed in the works of those who state that neither Baronius nor any of his contemporaries deemed it deserving of attention. It is now supposed to have been prepared in the concave of 1690 by the friends of Cardinal Simoncelli, who is clearly described in the work (comp. Dullinger, Fabels respecting the Popes of the Middle Ages, edited by Prof. H. B. Smith [Dodd and Mead, N. Y., 1873, 12mo], p. 150 sq.).

Malagrida, Gabriele, an Italian theologian and preacher, who flourished in Portugal in the first half of the 18th century, was born in the Milanese in 1688. He entered the Society of Jesus, went to Portugal, and became popular as a pulpit orator and a theological writer. In 1758, when an attempt at assassination was made on Joseph I, then reigning monarch of Portugal, the Jesuits were charged with the crime (they were shortly after expelled from the kingdom); Malagrida was suspected of complicity, and was arrested on the same charge. Freed from this charge, he was accused of spreading heretic doctrines, and suffered death at the stake in 1761. A list of his writings is given in Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, vol. xxxii, s. v. See Platel, Relation de la condamnation et exécution du Gesuita G. Malagrida (1761).

Malakanas, of Milk-eaters (Russian Molokani, i. e. those who, contrary to the rule of the Eastern Church, take milk on fast-days), is the name of a religious sect in the Russo-Greek Church. The name Malakanas is a term applied to these religious sects, and originated, as the word Shaker, Methodist, etc., among those who did not approve of the movement. They themselves like to be called Gospel-Men. They were first brought into notice by the zeal of a Prussian priest of a war, about the middle of last century. He settled among the southern Russians, and was full of applying the Scriptures to the villagers, and in visiting from house to house. After his death he acknowledged him as the founder of their new religious belief. The Malakans acknowledge the Bible as the Word of God, and the Trinity of the Godhead. They admit the fall of Adam, and the resurrection of Christ. They teach that Adam's soul only, and not his body, was made after God's image. The Ten Commandments are received among them. Idolatry and the worship of images are forbidden. It is considered sinful to take an oath, and the observance of the Sabbath is strictly enjoined; so much so that, like many of the Oriental sects, they devote Saturday evening to preparation for the Sabbath. They are firm believers in the Millennium, and are improperly described as followers of the fanatic Teutonic Beloroff, who, if ever, in fact, a member of the sect, is more an imitator of the Church of Rome. They are a sect of the Russian Church, and all parts of Russia to witness this miracle. Beloroff appeared, majestically seated in a chariot, ordered the titude to prostrate themselves, and then, opening his arms like an eagle spreading his wings, he leaped into the air, but, dropping down on the heads of the gaping multitude, was instantly seized and dragged off to prison as an impostor. He died soon after, so doubts in a state of insanity, declaring himself to be the prophet of God, and to be in his di- vine mission. A considerable number of his followers afterwards emigrated to Georgia, and settled in sight of Mount Ararat, expecting the Millennium. They spent whole days and nights in prayer, and have all their goods in common. See MILLENNARIANS in Russia.

Three thousand men and women were seized by the police, arranged in gangs, and driven with rods and thongs across the dreary steppes and yet more dreary mountain crests into the Caucasus. Meanwhile, the milk-eaters fled across the Pruth into Turkey, where the Sultan gave them a village called Tulcha for their residence. The Methodist mission at that place, under the leadership of Mr. Flocken, labored among them for some time; at present, however (1872), the mission is discontinuing its labors. *Malan, Abraham Henri Caspar, D.D., one of the most noted of Swiss Protestant divines of our day, was born at Geneva July 13th, 1783, but in infancy of three years Malan exhibited great powers of intellectural superiority, and the hopes which he awakened while yet an inmate of the cradle by securing a prize for reading at the Geneva Academy were more than realized in his manhood and hoary age. The poverty of his parents induced him to turn aside from an intellectual career to which he so much inclined, and to enter the mercantile profession at eighteen, but he soon returned again to his former mode of life, and decided upon the ministry. In 1810 he was consecrated for this sacred vocation by the venerable Dr. Vairins, vicar of Geneva, and he at once made a name for himself as a pulpit orator of unusual eloquence. He was appointed preacher at the Geneva cathedral, and from the pulpit whence formerly the immortal Calvin had thundered forth the unalterable decrees of the Holy One, Malan now taught the Word of God to a great multitude of hearers. Unfortunately, however, the spiritual life built up by Calvin and his successors in the hearts of their flocks had been suffered to die out, and in the hearts of the hearers of Malan, as well as in the heart of the preacher himself, there was a lukewarmness, a coldness, to all religion—rationalism sat enthroned in the pulpit and the pew of Geneva; the forms of the Church founded by Calvin remained, but the spiritual life had departed. The young preacher endeavored to infuse the vitality of his own fervid spirit into the lifeless forms and the lifeless spirit of the "Vénérable Compagnie," but in vain; both the preacher and the auditor lacked that most essential element of a Christian life, the possession of the truly orthodox belief and trust in a divine Saviour. In the midst of his despair Malan was brought under the influence of the noble-hearted Scotchmen, the Haldane brothers, and by them and our late Dr. John M. Mason (q. v.), and Mathias Bruen, was led to see the error of a faith built on a human Saviour, and brought to acknowledge the divinity of Jesus the Christ. From this time forward Malan was a man of God. The first opportunity to display his ability as a polemic he found against the Vénérable Compagnie itself. This body had issued for circulation among the masses an edition of the N.T. in which all passages bearing on the divinity of Christ were expunged as to favor the Socinian belief; this translation Malan denounced with the most vehement eloquence, and from his pulpit expounded these self-same passages in the spirit of their intended declaration to the multitudes who crowded around him. (For a review of the Job translation, see supra, E. W. W., vol. II.)

By 1818 the rupture between him and the Church authorities of Geneva had become so great that reconciliation was an impossibility, and Malan was consequently disinherited from the Established Church. Besides his relation to the cathedral, Malan had become the owner of a sizeable estate in the country; he was now succeeded by a divine of Socinian tendency. Not in the least daunted, he now followed the example of the Haldane brothers, and preached the truth whenever an opportunity would offer to address the multitudes and press forward the interests of Christ his master.

No church accessible to him, he preached in his own house, for preach he would. The most eminent of Geneva's inhabitants gathered regularly, and by 1820 he was enabled to rear a church upon his own ground. He named it "The Testimonial Chapel" ("La Chapelle de la Testimonie") and, being actively engaged in building up Christ's kingdom among men, to his pen also he gave no rest; now busy in the defence of Christ's divinity or the sovereignty of divine grace, to-morrow exposing and attacking Roman error, and next rushing up the great truths of divine sovereignty, tract, clear, simple, and practical. With these manifold duties upon him, he was yet far from content. He organized a school of theology, and himself became one of the instructors; founded a tract society, and a Magazine of piety or penitentiary. He has also the honor to have been the first to introduce the Sabbath-school into Switzerland. Not even all this toil could prevent him in the least from fostering also a joy in the development of esthetic talants which he possessed. As a sacred poet he will live as long as the language in which he wrote shall be known. He has been pronounced by the French Dr. Watta. As a composer he likewise displayed unusual endowments, and as a painter and sculptor masters of art delighted to enjoy his friendship and counsel. Thorvaldsen was his intimate friend, and more than once intrusted him with the completion of his choicest group. Surely a man of the pulpit, as well as of the pen. With untiring industry maintaining his position in the pulpit almost to the last, he died at his native place, May 8, 1864. No better comment on such a life can be given than by E. De Pressensée: "César Malan a été, dans la mesure de sa vocation, un grand ecclésiastique; il a suivi les impulsions de sa conscience sans hésitation" (Revue Chrétienne, Aug. 5, 1869, p. 502).

His appearance at the age of fifty is thus described by an American divine who had the pleasure of being his guest: "His person was noble and imposing; a little above the medium height, stout built, and, having something of a military bearing, he was still natural and easy in his manners. His broad shoulders supported a superb head; his open and lofty brow gave one an idea of his mental power; his eyes were full of intellect and fire, and at the same time his loving look won your heart; his fine mouth indicated an iron will, combined with a generous thought; a profusion of white hair fell upon his shoulders" (The Observer [N.Y.], April 22, 1869).

The degree of D.D. was conferred on Malan by the University of Edinburgh. Of his works, many of which have appeared also in an English dress both in England and in the United States, the following deserve special mention, The Ch. of Rome (N.Y., 1844);--Les Mômiers sont invisibles (1838); his followers were called Mômiers:--Les Chalets de Sion (1826, 12mo, and only), a collection of his hymns:--Le Témoignage de Dieu (1838, 8vo). See, besides the excellent article in the New Amer. Cyclop., 1864, p. 495, and Bost, Mémoires du Rèvel rel. des églises protest. de la Suisse et de la France (see Index); the Life, not show a superior facial angle." This people must, however, be classified, as there is a great distinction among them (as a civilized standpoint. There is a certain class of Malays who have a written language (the spoken language is essentially the same with all the Malays), and who have some progress in the arts of life; then there are the sea-people, orang-inat, literally "men of the sea," who live by fishing or robbery, also the orang boncu or orang utan, "wild men" or "savage," dwelling in the woods or forests, and supposed to be the aborigines of the peninsula and islands.

Origin and Language.—The name of Malays seems to have been first used about the middle of the 15th century. The most generally accepted etymology is that of having been Menangkabo, in the island of Sumatra, rather than the peninsula itself. Even the Malays of Borneo claim to have come from Menangkabo. Palembang, however, also in Sumatra, has been mentioned as the original home of Malay civilization; while others again, point to Java as the source from which both Menangkabo and Palembang received their first settlers. "The Javanese," says Crawford, "would seem to have been even the founders of Malacca. Monuments have been discovered which prove the presence of this people in the country of the Sultans of Malacca. Thus Sir Stamford Raffles, when he visited Menangkabo, found there inscriptions on stone in the ancient character of Java, such as are frequent in that island; and he was supported in his conclusion by the learned natives of Java who accompanied him in his visitation, who stated that the settlement of the Javanese in several parts of Sumatra is, indeed, sufficiently attested. In Palembang they have been permanently the ruling people; and, although the Malay language is the popular one, the Javanese, in its peculiar written character, is still that of the court." According to Wallace the Malays are found in Malacca, Sumatra, Borneo, Timor, Temata, Macian, and Obi. The northern peninsula of Giloio and the island Ceram are inhabited by Alfur; Timor and the neighboring isles as far to the west as Flores and Sandalwood, and as far to the east as Timor-lant, are inhabited by a people more akin to the Papoos than to the Malays, the Timorese being distinctly distinguished from both; the inhabitants of the island Buru are partly Malays, partly Alfur; while the Papoos inhabit New Guinea, the Kay and Aro isles, Meis, Salawaty, and Weigim, and all the country eastward as far as the Fiji Isles. (See F. Müller, *Die Ethnographie, in Behm, Geograph. Jahrbuch [Gotha, 1869, vol. ii.]) The Malay language is simple and easy in its construction, harmonious in its pronunciation, and easily acquired by Europeans. It is the lingua Franca of the Eastern Archipelago. Of its numerous dialects, the Java- nese is the most refined, a superb art, in which it owes to the influence of it of Sanscrit literature. From the Arabsians (who gave the Malays Mohammedanism) their characters are borrowed, and many Arabic words have also been incorporated with the Malay language, by means of which the Javanese are able to supply the deficiency of scientific terms in their own tongue.

Religion.—The civilized Malays are generally Mohomedans in religious belief; they embraced the faith of the Crescent in the 13th or 14th century. The tribes in the interior and the "men of the sea" have either no religion or only the most debased superstition. In the years 1805-38 a sect of wild fanatics, the Padris-Priests, also called Orang-Patih, white men (after their dress), sought to re-establish their superstitious creed by fire and sword. They did much mischief until the Hollanders found that their own safety as rulers was threatened, and, after a short war, subdued the Padris and broke their power most substantially. The moral character of the Indo-Malays generally is not high; they are passionate, treacherous, and revengeful. But it must be said that the cruel and persecution which they are accused of at the hands of the Netherlands, who became their conquerors in the 16th century, and afterwards under the sway of the Hollanders, greatly moulded the present character of this people. Little is done, even in our day, to ameliorate the forlorn condition of this unfortunate people. Polygamy is practised only among the affluent and in the large towns. Marriage can be effected in three ways: either by purchase of the woman, who, upon the decease of her husband, becomes the property of his nearest blood relation; by entering into a formal contract upon which, and there are supposed father-in-law, a custom reminding us of the patriarchal days of the Bible; by an equal tax borne by both contracting parties. They practice the right of circumcision upon the male child between the ages of 6 and 10. The N. Testament was translated into the Malay language as early as the 17th century. Hence it is stated to have been used in the O. T. only three fourths of a century later (1756); the whole Bible was published at Batavia in 1758 in 5 vola., and often since, e. g. by Willmet (1824, 3 vola. 8vo.). Comp. Of this there is now no vestige in the name of the Hammelech (lit. 'the king of the oxen'), and owner or constructor of the private dungeon into which Jeremiah was cruelly thrown (Jer. xxxix. 6). See Jéramm. The title ben-ham-Melek is applied to Jerahmeel (Jer. xxxvi. 26), who was among those commissioned by the king to take prisoners from and bring back to the besieged, and, after his capture, to appear in the presence of the king (Deut. xxi. 20). It was unknown in the time of the first temple of Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii. 1). Jerahmeel was a man of great wisdom and courage, and to him, as the natural inheritor of his title, the writer of the Book of Jerahmeel. Jerahmeel was the first man to come to the assistance of the Jews, and to assist them in their troubles and misfortunes.

Malchielite (Heb. Malchiel, מַלְכִּיֵל, patron-ynymic from Malchiel, used collectively; Sept. Μαλκυ-

See Malchiel.

Malchiram (Heb. Malkiram, מַלְכִּרְăm, king of height; Sept. Μαλκερασί, the second son of king Jehoachin, born to him (according to Jewish tradition, and Susannah) during his captivity (1 Chron. iii, 18), and apparently himself without issue (see Strong’s "Harmony Malchiah’s (Heb. Malki-Sha’a, מַלְכִּי-שָׁע, king of help, twice as one word, מַלְכִּי-שָׁע, 1 Sam. xiv, 49; xxii, 2; where the Auth. Vees. Anglicizes "Mel-chi-sha’al"). Septuag. and Vulg. everywhere Malchias, his name, Malchias, the second or third named of the four sons of king Saul (1 Chron. viii, 33; ix, 39), apparently by Abi-noam (1 Sam. xiv, 49); he perished in the battle at Gil-boa with his father (1 Sam. xxxi, 2; 1 Chron. x, 2). B.C. 1053.

In the fact that the name of Saul’s eldest son was Jehoachin in form (Jonathan kath’icnoos), whereas no such peculiarity is found in the names of his brothers, some writers (e.g. Mr. F. Newman) have seen a trace of Saul’s gradual apostasy. Josephus only mentions Malchias when, after his brothers (Malchee, Ant. vi, 14, 7).

Malchus (Mαλκος, from the Heb. מַלְכִּס, king, or Malchus a follower, a slave of the high-priest Caiaphas, and the individual among the party sent to arrest Jesus whose right ear was cut off by Peter in the garden of Gethsemane (John xviii, 10), but which was cured by a touch from Christ (Luke xxii, 51). He had a kinman, another slave of the same master (John xviii, 26). A.D.
29. The name of Malchus was not unfrequent among the Greeks (see Westcin, ad loc.; Genees, Monument. Phoe.
p. 409), but it was usually applied to persons of Oriental countries, as to an Arab chieftain (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 5, 1; xiv, 14; xv, 6, 2). This Malchus "was the personal servant (δομινος) of the high-priest, and not one of the bailiffs or apparatus (σφαργυρος) of the Sanhedrin.
The high-priest intended is Caiaphas (a doubt; Hieron. Anas is called δραγυρος in the same connection), for John, who was personally known to the former (John xviii, 15), is the only one of the evangelists who gives the name of Malchus. This servant was probably stepping forward at the moment to settle with others to lay hold on him with his sword, when the zealous Peter struck at him with his sword, The blow was undoubtedly meant to be more effectiue, but reached only the ear. It may be, as Ester remarks (Asher, vi, 268), that the man, seeing the danger, threw his hand back to the left, as to expose the right ear more than the other. The allegation that the writers are inconsistent with each other, because Mathew, Mark, and John say either ουριον or ουρανον (as that meant the lappet or tip of the ear), while Luke says ουρανον, is groundless. The Greek of the New Testament age, due to the modern Romanism, often detinction between the primitive and diminutive. In fact, Luke himself exchanges the one term for the other in this very narrative. The Saviour, as his pursuers were about to seize him, asked to be left free for a moment longer (διδασκ’ηνα), and then restored the wounded man to soundness. The θαυματικον of τοις ουριοιν may indicate (which is not forbidden by διδασκ’ηνα, ουρανον) that the ear still adhered slightly to its place. It is noticeable that Luke, the physician, is the only one of the writers who mentions the act of healing" (Smith). "Some think Peter’s name was omitted by the synoptists, lest the publication of it in its lifetime should expose him to the revenge of the unbelieving Jew, but, as the gospels were not published, this seems improbable.

Maldonatus, Joannes (1), a celebrated Spanish Jesuit, was born at Las Casas, in Cuba, in Estremadura, in 1534; studied at the University of Salamanca, and afterwards taught Greek, philosophy, and theology with great success; the lecture-rooms of the college were often too small to accommodate his numerous pupils.
He subsequently removed to Poitiers, France, from whence he was made cardinal of the July priestly breed, of the Papal Church.

Maldonatus, a name which occurs in the Gospels of Pont-a-Mousson. Later he came to Paris, and there and created an unprecedented enthusiasm. His exegetical lectures were attended not only by Romanists, but even by Protestants, and the renown of his teaching reminiscence of the history of Abelard. His brilliant course was checkered by accusations against him of having induced the president, Montbrun, to will away all his fortune to the Order of the Jesuits, and of teaching false doctrines touching the dogma of the Immaculate Conception.
He was acquitted, however, on both charges, but left Paris, and retired to Bourges, where he devoted himself to exegetical studies, and prepared several of the works (see list below) which have made his name celebrated.
He was called to Rome by pope Gregory XIII, to take a part in the publication of the Greek Septuagint.
He died in that city in 1593. His principal works are Com-mentarius in primum et secundo Sacrae Scripturae Partem Petrarci Testimenti (Paris, 1643, fol.; — Commentarius in quattuor Evangelistarum, etc. (Ludip, 1615; Mayence, 1841–45, 5 vols.
8vo). "Though condemned by some, and procuring for its author the title of 'vulgentimismus et maldecimtis-amus,' this work is one of the best. Cahus, and two constant writers a most justly praiseworthy (see Bayle, Richard Simon, Schlichtgrius, M. Poole, and Jackson). In this work Maldonatus collates the opinions of the fathers with great ability, and does not hesitate to differ even from Augustine, when sound erudition demands it. He shows acquaintance with the Vatican MS. of the N. T. original Hebrew." The critical Simon (Hist. crit. des princip. commentateurs du N. T. p. 618 sq.) says he succeeded better than any one else in explaining the literal sense of the sacred writers. He also wrote Traité des Sacraments (Lyon, 1614, 4to)—Traité de la grâce, etc., (Paris, 1617)—Traité de la communion (Paris, 1617)— Tractatus de ceremoniis (Bibliotheca ritualis, Rome, 1781, 4to). Summulae casuum conscientiae has been, we believe, unjustly accredited to Maldonatus. It is a work of doubtful morality, and very unlike the unproductions of Maldonatus. See Herzig, Real-Encyk-lop. v., s. v.; also W. H. Moore, Ath. Soc. (ser. 3), Maldonatus, Joannes (3), a Spanish Jesuit, who, according to Aubertus Mirzenus, was a priest of Burgos, and is stated by Zeller to have ordered the lessons of the Roman Breviary, flourished about the middle of the 16th century. In 1549 he published a treatise, De Se-nectate Christiana, and an elegant abridgment of the lives of the saints.—Kitto, Cyclop. Bibl. Lit. vol. iii, n. v.

superior estimation in which male children were held among the Hebrews is testified by numerous passages in Scripture, and we find the same feeling, expressed almost in the same words, still existing in Eastern countries (see Job iii, 3: and comp. Roberts, Observ. ad loc.).

Malebranche, Nicholaus, a French Jesuit, distinctive for his peculiar philosophical views, and for the brilliance and fascination of the style in which they were expounded. He was one of the most illustrious of the Cartesians, aiming by his speculations to correct the dangerous tendencies of Des Cartes's philosophy [see Spinoza], and occupied an eminent, though not a controlling, position in the history of the higher philosome knowledge of his system is required for the just estimation of the doctrines both of Locke and of Leibnitz, and for the illustration of the views of Berkeley.

Life.—Malebranche was born of respectable parents in Paris, Aug. 6, 1638. Feebly and sickly from his birth, and deformed by a curvature of the spine, he was reared with the tenderest care, and was educated mainly at home. His ill health and his deformity confirmed the natural shyness of his disposition. He avoided the company of his fellows, and was more given to meditative placation, and spent most of his time in solitary meditation.
He found his world within himself. Eager for seclusion from the turmoil of life, he sought a refuge in the Sociey of Jesuits, and joined the Congregation of the Or-tory in the twenty-second year of his age. His studies were at first ecclesiastical history and antiquities, but these he soon abandoned in consequence of the weakness of his memory. He was next induced by the learned Richard Simon to prosecute sacred criticism and the Oriental languages. They had few attractions for him.
In his wandering mood he picked up the then recently published treatise of Des Cartes On Man. To this newly-acquired treasure he devoted himself assiduously, and sought the mastery of the Cartesian doctrines and of philosophical problems. Thus he busied himself for the next ten years of his life, and became one of the most cardinal and eminent of the Cartesians. His perspicacity discerned the weak point of the Cartesian system; and he was too honest and too independent to be "addictus jurare in verba magistri." He meditated intensly—closing the windows of his room that he might not be distracted by the noise of the world; and he revolved in silence and solitude the arduous questions which presented themselves for solution. He read little, thinking the knowledge of man, of mind, and of God the all-sufficient realm of speculation; and considering that such knowledge was to be attained only by diligence, introspection, and abstract reasoning.
Exalted and enriched by such silent and solitary labors, Malebranche proposed his modifications of Cartesianism in a work entitled Rêcherche de la Vérité, the first volume of which appeared at Paris in 1673; the second and last volume being published in the ensuing year.
An improved and enlarged edition was brought out, towards the close of his life, in 1712. This is his principal work; it is that which determines his position in the history of philosophical opinion. Besides other interesting topics discussed, it, in a manner less open to objection, would have the effect of giving the idea of all things in God. The treatise itself was an examination of the nature and characteristics of knowledge, of the origin of ideas, of the mode of avoiding error and arriving at truth, of the precautions required to guard against delusions of various kinds, and especially the fallacies which arise from the senses and from prejudice.
Malebranche has been accused of unacknowledged obligations to Bacon. In this he only imitated the example of his illustrious master Des Cartes. Nor did he deviate from his exemplar in the attention bestowed upon the faithful execution of the book. The style, too, so exquisite that it exercised an irresistible fascination over all its readers. Many who rejected his principles and deductions were charmed by his exposition; and many were beguiled into the acceptance of his theories by the beauty of their presentation or by the beauty of their expression. His ornate style disguised his dogmas even to himself. His language wanted philosophical precision, and offered many salient points for attack. His system was assailed by Foucher, by Antoine Arnauld, and by Locke. The Jesuit Du Tertre, at the instigation of his order, reluctantly impugned it.
Hardouin, in his Athéism Unmaské, accused it of atheistic characteristics. Leibnitz, in defending it against such charges, admitted that the looseness of the brilliant presentation rendered it liable to misapprehension and misrepresentation, but maintained that the real opinions of the author were very different from those attributed to him by his opponents (Lettre à M. Remond, Nov. 4, 1715). The whole system of Malebranche, so far as it is a departure from Cartesianism, is centred in the doctrine of his "Vision in God," and this doctrine led by a logical development to those views of free will and grace which resulted in the controversy with Arnauld (1680). His inquiries were, however, actuated throughout by an earnest religious desire for the puri-ification and elevation of his fellow-men, and were not conceived with a view to speculative or metaphysical purposes, but were directed to practical topics. With this design he composed his Considérations Chrétienes (1676), and his Traité de la Moralé (1684). The latter is one of the landmarks of ethical philosophy, and has merited the high commensation of Sir James Mackintosh. Besides these noted treatises, Malebranche was the author of several essays on various scientific topics, published in the Journal of the Academy of Sciences. Whatever opposition was excited by the peculiarities, or the extravagances, or the apparent peril of his metaphysical speculations, he was sai in this work he had exhibited his rare and powerful intelligence, his simple goodness, and his unaffected purity.

The life of a valetudinarian so retired, and bound by the restraints of a rigid religious order, offers few incidents for curious investigation. The calm and equable tenor of Malebranche's frail existence, the long time that he lived so reticent, and the leisurely and easy account of the last year of his life, even in another form of existence, he may be believed to have entered upon that "vision of all things in God" which, with pious enthusiasm, he had endeavored to attend on earth. He died at Paris Oct. 13, 1714, a year and a month before his seventy-eighth year. His last work was a Treatise on "Ethical Philosophy."—The cardinal tenet of the philosophy of Malebranche, which contradistinguishes it from that of Des Cartes, of Spinoza, of Leibnitz, etc., is the reforming and of the acquiescing ascetics of the Cartesian school, is the doctrine of seeing all things in God, to which such a supreme power was already conceded. The motive, the meaning, the genesis of this doctrine, and its relation to antecedent, contemporary, and subsequent speculation, are unintelligible, unless it is contemplated in connection with the dogmas of Des Cartes and their development. Des Cartes (q.v.) recognized only two essential universal intelligences, which, together with God, of which with him were the equivalents of mind and matter.

The mystery, the enigma, which presents itself in such endless forms, and which inevitably returns with all the Proten changes of metaphysical speculation—which cannot be evaded in the study of that strange mixture of scholasticism and the rationalism of the times, as he had arbitrarily conceived it, and with the absolute divorce of the two existences postulated by him, introduced a Deus ex machina, and imagined a divine intervention to effect perfect action on every occasion with the power of the physical world, of the physical nature. This hypothesis has been given the name of the doctrine of Assistance. This scheme is assuredly ominous to the sharp censures of Aristotle on some of his precursors, and renders the active intelligence of the human race a mere collection of imaginative episodes, like a worn-out tragedy (Metap. x., xiii, iii). The explanation was soon discovered to be not merely a presumption, but utterly ineflectious, and of most perishable tendency. Obviously, it made the creating and sustaining God the direct agent in man's actions in all cases where inward tendencies forced him to proceed to outward act, and it made the universe a complicated piece of puppetry, whose motions were communicated by a hidden personage constantly jerking at the strings. The logical inconsistency of maintaining an entire separation between the grand constituents of human nature, and of reducing the activity of the human mind to all effective manifestation of human thought, offended the acute perspicacity of Spinoza. He sought to restore harmony and congruity to the philosophical interpretation of the intelligible world, by considering thought and action, and not matter, as only effences, phenomenal coruscations, from the eternal, self-sustaining, eternal, all-embracing Existence, which did not so much support and regulate, as constitute and contain alike the whole creation and the Creator. This, of course, pushed Cartesianism to the absurdity of its logical extreme, but annihilated all moral responsibility, all distinctions of nature, annulled all individual existence, establishing, in short, a pure Pantheism. But Pantheism, whether Stoic, Platonie, Spinozistic, or Schellingistic, is the negation of a personal God, of all separable existence, and of all the duties, thoughts, and feelings that spring from human obligations to a heavenly Father, and to a divine Creator and beneficent Governor of the universe.

About the same time that Spinoza, was secretly engaged in transmuting Cartesianism into Pantheism, and probably independently of any impulse from his investigations, Malebranche endeavored to uphold and enforce the obligations which were nullified by the Spinozistic system, to preserve all the dogmas of revealed religion, to fortify the sense of religious duty, to escape the absurdities and aberrations of the Cartesian theory, and yet to uphold the Cartesian doctrine of the attributes. He endeavored to correct its excesses, and by indicating the means of conciliation between the two widely separated constituents of his creation. The Cartesian philosophy was in some measure obliterated by his own celebrated hypothesis of Occasional Causation, supposing all material motion, in accordance with the movements of the apparently moving mind, to be due to a mechanical impulse of the Divinity, disconnected from human intelligence, he imagined that all such phenomena were wrought and inspired of God, of which with him were the equivalents of mind and matter, and that human knowledge and action proceeded exclusively from seeing all things in God.

A half-truth is the most dangerous, because it is the most seductive form of delusion. The moiety of truth which is present usually precedes the suspicion of deception. A half-truth is the best ladder from the divine mind, and that human knowledge and action proceeded exclusively from seeing all things in God.

a quo est omnis modus, omnis species, omnis ordo; sine quibus nihil rerum inveniri vel cogitari potest" (De Civ. Dei, xi, xv).

The thesis has been amply commented upon, elucidated and expanded, by S. Thomas Aquinas, Henry of Ghent, Roger Bacon, Duns Scotus, and the better half of the schoolmen. It is confirmed by lord Bacon, John Milton, and many of the most distinguished moderns, out of Germany as well as in that land of golden mists. "In this, at once most comprehensive and most appropriate acceptance of the word, reason is pre-eminentiy spiritual, and a spirit, even our actual self is the measure of the excellency by which we are privileged to say, Our Father" (Coleridge, Aids to Reflection); and the same author cites with approval a still stronger utterance to the like effect from that easily distinguishable personage, John Smith, 1660.

Leibniz might well say that Malebranche's doctrine was no novelty. It was, indeed, both very old and very generally accredited, but in a form and with an application widely different from what was contemplated by him in his new presentation. The long citation of the evidences of its general acceptance—and not the tenth part of those which were of the same order by which we are privileged to say, Our Father—is a Coleridge, Aids to Reflection; and the same author cites with approval a still stronger utterance to the like effect from that easily distinguishable personage, John Smith, 1660.

Malec (kay) So the Mohammedans call the principal bird in care of hell. In the Koran it is said (speaking of the infidels), "And they shall call aloud, saying, O Malec, intercede for us, that the Lord would end us by annihilation. And he shall answer, Verily, ye shall remain here forever. We brought you the truth herefore, at ye abhorred the truth." Some of the Mohammedan doctors say this answer will be given a thousand years after the final dissolution of this world.

Malekites, the second of the four orthodox Mohammedan sects. The founder of the Malekites was Malek the Anas, born at Medina about the end of the Hejira 95. He was remarkable for strenuously insisting on the literal acceptance of the prohibitory precepts.
Tradition will have that it was visited in his last illness by a friend, who found him in tears, and asked him the cause of his affliction, he replied;
"Who has more reason to weep than I? Would God that for every question decided by me according to my own opinion I had received so many stripes, then would my account be easier. Would to God I had never given any decision of my own." The Malekites are chiefly found in Arabia and other countries of Asia.

Malevolence is that disposition of mind which inclines us to wish ill to any person. It discovers itself in frowns and a lowering countenance, in uncharitableness, in evil sentiments, harsh speeches to or of its object, Maley, Horace W., an American Methodist minister, was born in western Pennsylvania in 1819; was educated at an academy in Butler, Pennsylvania; was converted in 1819; was licensed to preach and recommended to the Ohio Conference in 1821, and was appointed to the Mad River Circuit; in 1822, to London; in 1823, to Fiqua; in 1824, to White Oak; in 1825, to Fiqua; in 1826-7, to Union; in 1826-8, to Hillsboro; in 1832-3, to White Oak; in 1834, to Madison; in 1835, to New Richmond; in 1836-7, to Milford; in 1838, to Franklin; in 1839-40, to Germantown; in 1841, agent for Springfield and Germantown Academy; in 1842, to Frankfort; in 1843, to Lebanon; in 1844-5, to Cincinnati City Mission. In 1846 he attended the Kentucky Conference, M. E. Church South; in 1846-7, was presiding elder of Covington District; in 1848 was appointed to Soule Chapel, Cincinnati, Ohio; the next ten years was supernumerary, and the remainder of his life superannuated. He died in Urbana, Champaign Co., Ohio, Dec. 14, 1866. In his last illness, though suffering, he was uncomplaining and happy, and sent his love and greetings to his ministerial associates:

"Tell my brethren of the Kentucky Conference that I die in the faith, and in full fellowship with the whole Church, Eastern, Western, North, and South." —Minutes of Conference, 1867.

Malice is a settled or deliberate determination to revenge or do hurt to another. It more frequently denotes the disposition of inferior minds to execute every purpose of mischief within the more limited circle of their affilations, and yet it may be a tasteful temper in the sight of God, strictly forbidden in his holy Word (Col. ii, 12), disgraceful to rational creatures, and every way inimical to the spirit of Christianity (Matt. v, 44). See MALEOL.

Malignity, a disposition obstinately bad or malicious. Malignancy and malignity are words nearly synonymous. In some connections, malignity seems rather more pertinently applied to a radical depravity of nature, and malignancy to indications of this depravity in temper and conduct in particular instances. See MALEOL.

Mallary, Charles Dutton, D.D., an American Baptist minister, was born at Poultney, Vermont, Jan.
25, 1801. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1821, and in 1822 removed to Columbia, South Carolina; was ordained, and preached six years. He afterwards re-sided in Georgia, and was a principal founder of Mercer University. In the division of the denomination in 1836, on the missionary question, he advocated that system. He died July 31, 1864. Dr. Mallary published a Mallac, a town of Asia Minor, whose inhabitants (Malalac, Vulg. Mallacote, A. V. "they of Mallacot") with the people of Tarus, revolted from Antiochus Epiphanes because he had bestowed them on one of his concubines (2 Macc. iv, 30). The absence of the king from Antioch did put down the insurrection gave the infamous Menelus, the high-priest, an opportunity of purging some of the sacred vessels from the Temple of Jerusalem (ver.

32, 39), an act which finally led to the murder of the good Onias (ver. 54, 85). Mallos was an important city of Cilicia, lying at the mouth of the Pyramus (Sehun), on the shore of the Mediterranean, north-east of Cyprus, and about twenty miles from Tarsus (Tarsos). (See Smith, Dict. of Chr. G. Geography.) Mallothi (Hebrew Mallothi, מַלְלָתִּי, perhaps for Mallothi, Vulg. Mallothi, τοῦ μαλαθίου, one of the fourteen sons of Hemam the Levite (1 Chron. xxx. 4), and head of the nineteenth division of Temple musicians as arranged by David (1 Chron. xxx. 25). R.C. 1014.

Mallows (Mallows, Malloch, salted; Sept. Μάλον, Vulg. herba) occurs only in the passage where Job complains that he is subjected to the contumely of the meanest people, "who cut up swallows by the bushers for their meat" (Job xxx. 4). The proper meaning of the word malluch has been a subject of considerable discussion among authors, in consequence, apparently, of its resemblance to the Greek μαλαχή, signifying "mallow," and also to mallow, which is said to be the Syracuse name for the species of Oenothera, or Missouri mallow. It is difficult, if not impossible, to say which is the more correct interpretation, as both appear to have some foundation in truth, and seem equally adapted to the sense of the above-quoted passage. (See Gesenius, Thesaur., Hebr., p. 791.)

Authors apply the description of Dioscor-

ides to ἱδίκη, a name which in India is applied both to species of Malva rotundifolia and of M. sylvestris, which extend from Europe to the north of India, and which are still used as food in the latter country, as they formerly were in Europe, and probably in Syria. That some kind of mallow has been so used in Syria we have evidence in the quotation made by Mr. Harmer from Biddulph, who says, “We saw many poor people collecting mallows and three-leaved grass, and asked them what they did with it; and they answered, that it was all their food, and that they boiled it, and did eat it.” Dr. Shaw, in his Travels, on the contrary, observes that “Mallow-bush, or mallow-bush, is used, as in the Arabic, is the same with the medelacha or corchorus, being a podded species of mallows, whose pods are rough, of a glutinous substance, and used in most of their dishes. Mallow-bush appears to be little different in name from מִלּוֹע (Job xxx, 4), which we render ‘mallows,’ though some other plant, of a more saltish taste, and less nourishing quality, may be rather intended.” The plant alluded to is Corchorus olitorius, which has been adopted and figured in her Scripture Herbal (p. 255) by lady Calcott, who observes that this plant, called Jews’ Mallow, appears to be certainly that mentioned by the patriarch. Avicenna calls it olos ḫadičem; and Hauswolf saw the Jews about Aleppo use the leaves as potagers; “and this same mallow continues to be eaten in Egypt and Arabia, as well as Palestine.” But there are so many plants of a mild mucilaginous nature which are used as articles of diet in the East, that it is hardly possible to select one in preference to another, unless we find a similarity in the name. Thus species of Amaranthus, of Chenopodium, of Portulaca, as well as the above Corchorus, and the mallow, are all used as food, and might be added as suitable to the above passages, since most of them are found growing wild in many parts of the countries of the East.

The learned Bochart, however, contends (Hieros, part i, t. iii, c. 16) that the word malluah denotes a saltish plant called ḫyếc by the Greeks, and which with good reason is supposed to be the Atriplex halimus of botanists, or tall shrubbery Orache. The Sept., indeed, first gave the name halimus to other interpretation elsewhere. Celsus adopts it (Hierobot. ii, 96 sq.), and many others consider it as the most correct. A good abstract of Bochart’s argument is given by Dr. Harris. In the first place the most ancient Greek translator interprets malluah by ἀλυσία. The Jews were in the habit of eating a plant called by the former name is evident from the quotation given by Bochart from the Talmudical tract Kiddushin (c. iii, 65). By Ibn-Buetar, malšk is given as the synonym of al-luuf al-bahuri, i.e. the sea-alde-

Kutuf or Orache, which is usually considered to be the Atriplex marina, now A. halimus. Bochart, indeed, remarks that Dioscorides describes the halimus as a shrub with branches, destitute of thorns, with a leaf like the olive, but broader, and growing on the seashore. This notice evidently refers to the ḫyếc (Dioscor. i, 121), which, as above stated, is supposed to be the Atriplex halimus of botanists, and the Kutuf bahuri of the Arabs, while the ap̄r̄aqâz̄ of the same author (ii. 145) is their kutuf and Atriplex hortensis, Linnaeus. Bochart quotes Galen as describing the tops of the former as being used for food when young. Dioscorides also says that its leaves are employed for the same purpose. (Comp. Theophrast. Plant. iv, 17; Athen. Deipn. iv, 161; Horace, Ep. i, 12, 7; Pliny, xxii, 55; Tournelot, Traité, i, 41.) What the Arab writers state as to the top of the plants being eaten corresponds to the description of Job, who states that those whom with whom he refers cropped upon the shrub—which by some is supposed to indicate that the malluah grew near hedges. These, however, do not exist in the desert. There is no doubt that species of Orache were used as articles of diet in ancient times, and probably still are so in the countries where they are indigenous; but there are many other plants, similar in nature, that is, soft and succulent, and usually very saline, such as the Solanum, Solanum, which, like the species of Atriplex, belong to the same natural family of Chenopodiaceae, and which, from their saline nature, have received their respective names. Many of these are well known for yielding soda by incineration. In conformity with this, Mr. Good thinks that “the real plant is a species of Solanum, or ‘salt-wort;’ and that the term ḫyếc, employed in the Greek versions, gives additional countenance to this conjecture.” Some of these are shrubry, but most of them are herbaceous, and extremely common in all the dry, desert, and saline soils which extend from the south of Europe to the north of India. Most of them are saline and bitter, but some are milder in taste and mucilaginous, and are therefore employed as articles of diet, as spinach is in Europe. Sal- olis Indicus, for instance, which is common on the coasts of the Peninsula of India, Dr. Roxburgh states, saved the lives of many thousands of the poor natives of India during the famine of 1791-2-3; and, while the plant lasted, most of the poorer classes who lived near the sea had little else to eat; and, indeed, its green leaves ordiinterpretations, see Rosenmuller (ad loc. Job). Mr. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 466) decides in favor of the former hypothesis (Atrapez Altamaze), which he says grows abundantly on the shores of the Mediterranean, in salt marshes, and also on the shores of the Dead Sea still more luxuriantly. We found chicklets of it of considerable extent on the west side of the sea, and it exclusively supplied us with fuel for many days. In one place there was a dense growth of ten feet—more than double its size on the Mediterranean. It forms a dense mass of thin twigs without thorns, has a very minute purple flower close to the stem, and small, thick, sour-tasting leaves, which could be eaten, as is the Atrapez kormatis, or Garden Orache, but which would be very unpalatable food.

Malkuch (Heb. Malkuk, γάλακτος, reigned over, or from the Syr. a counsellor), the name of several men.

2. (Sept. Maláq, Vulg. Maloch.) An Israelite of the descendants of Ithamar (or residents of Jerusalem) who pronounced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra xix, 29). B.C. 450.

3. (Sept. Maláq, Vulg. Maloch.) Another Israelite of the descendants (or residents) of Harim, who did the same (Ezra xix, 32). B.C. 459.

4. (Sept. Maláq, Vulg. Maloch.) One of the priests who carried away from Babylon with Zerubbabel ( Neh. xii, 4). B.C. 536. The associated names would appear to indicate that he was the same with one of those who signed the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x, 4); although that would imply a very advanced age. B.C. cir. 410. He is probably the same with the son of Jonathan, elsewhere called Malach (Neh. xii, 14, 12, 17, 5). Sept. Maláq, Vulg. Maloch.

Malmesbury, William of, an English monastic and historian of the early period of his country’s history, was born near the close of the 11th century, probably in Somersetshire, was educated at Oxford, and afterwards entered the Benedictine monastery whence he derived his name, and of which he became librarian. He died some time after 1142, but the exact date is not known. He wrote (in Latin) De Gestis Regnum, a history of the kings of England from the Saxons to the Saxon Chronicle, extant from the twenty-sixth year of Henry I (translated into English by the Rev. John Sharpe [ Lond. 1815]; also in Bohn’s Library, edited by Dr. Giles [1847]):—Histoire Novelee, extending from the twenty-sixth year of Henry I to the escape of the empress Maud from Oxford; and De Gestis Pontificum, containing an account of the bishops and principal monasteries of England from the conversion of Ethelbert of Kent by St. Augustine to 1123:—Antiquitates Glastonbury, and Life of St. Wulstan (printed in Wharton’s Anglia Saevra). Malmesbury gives proof in its writings of great diligence, good sense, modesty, and a genuine love of truth. His style is much above that of his contemporaries. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. (v. William of Malmesbury); Lond. Quart. Rev. 1856 (Jan.), p. 290 sq.; Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Génér. (v.); Chambers, Cyclopædia, s. v.

Malo, Jean Baptiste, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Yper; studied theology at the University of Louvain, where in 1655 he became a professor; in 1684 was made bishop of Bruges, and died March 23, 1684. His brother Jule is the author of Recherches sur le véritable auteur du livre de l’Inspiration de Jesus-Christ (Louv. 1848).

Malvenda, Thomas, a learned Spanish exegete, was born at Nativa in 1566, and entered the Dominican convent of Lombay in 1582. A good Latin, Greek, and Hebrew scholar, he now applied his philosophical talents to the study of the diviner texts of the Bible, at the same time devoting much attention also to dogmatics and to ecclesiastical history. In 1585 he wrote a treatise to prove that St. Anna was only once married, and that St. Joseph always held fast to the rule of abstinence. From 1586 to 1610 he taught for philosophy, and afterwards theology. In 1600 he addressed to cardinal Baronius a memoir on some parts of the Annales ecclesiastici, and of the Martyrologium Romanum, which he deemed incorrect. Baronius, struck by the knowledge exhibited in this memoir, called Malvenda to Rome, where the general of his order interceded with the correcting of the breviary, the missal, and the martyrology of the Dominicans. This work was completed in 1608. The congregation of the Index then submitted to him for revision the Bibliotheca Patrum of La Vigne (Par. 1575, 1589, 9 vols. fol.). His critical annotations on this work appeared at Rome in 1607, and were afterwards published together with the Biblioth. Patr. (Paris, 1609, 1634). Although in the meantime he commenced the collected ordinas ordinis fratrum predicatrorum, which he never completed; the existing fragment, extending over a period of thirty years, was subsequently published by Gravina (Naples, 1627, 2 vols. fol.). In 1616 Malveda was recalled to Spain where the grand inquisitor appointed him a member of the congregation of indexes librorum prohibitorum. He died at Valencia in 1628. His principal work, to which the later years of his life were devoted, was a literal translation of the Bible, with commentaries; he was unable to finish it, and left it at the 18th chapter of Ezekiel (published in this incomplete state by the general of the Dominicans, under title Commentaria in sacram Scripturam una cum notis de verbo ad verbum ex Hebraeo translatione, variisque lectionibus [Lyons, 1650, 5 vols. fol.]). The translation is so literal as to be very inelegant and sometimes unintelligible. The notes are more or less unmetrical, and though perhaps valuable at the time, are now considered unimportant. Among his other works, which are very numerous, we notice Libri nomen de Antichristo (Rome, 1604, often reprinted) — Commentaria in Paradisi apokalypsis (Rome, 1605, 4 to) — De Mortis (Samarganda, 1618, 8vo). A complete list of his works is given in Quetif and Escorial, Scriptores ordinis predicatrorum, ii, 454 sq. See Antonio, Bibliotheca nova, vol. ii. — Herzog, Real-Encyklop., viii, 771; Hoefer, Nouv. Mamachi, Thomas Antia, a distinguished Dominican, was born on the island of Chilo de, 3, 1819; was brought to Italy when yet a youth, and joined the Dominicans. He became professor of theology at Florence, and in 1740 was called to Rome as a member of the college of the Propaganda. Benedict XIV made him a doctor of divinity, and appointed him member of the congregation of the Index, of which he became secretary in 1778. Under Pius VI he was appointed Magister palatii. He died in 1792, at Corneto, near Montefiascone. His principal works are Ad Joh. D. Manum de ratione temporum Athonitiorum deque aliquot Synodi earum celebratioribus Annales (Rome, 1740), against the schismatics, who, in his De episcopo conciliorum Sardicae et Sinasii, ceterumque in causa Arianorum, hoc occasione simul rerum pontificalium S. Athenarian Chronicologiam restituit (Leure, 1740), asserted, contrary to general opinion, that the Church of Constantinople was held in 511,1011, that the return of Athenasius to Alexandria took place in 846. His Origines et antiquitates Christianorum Lib. xx (Rom. 1749-55), of which only five books, however, was completed, is a very important work, holding the same position among the Roman Catholics as Bingham's Origins ecclesiastici among the Protestants; it is written in view of the later work, which it often attempts to refute. De Costumi de primitivi Christiani libri tres (Rome, 1758; Venice, 1757) is an interesting work on the early ages of Christianity, and contains some valuable and curious information. Epistolarum ad Justiniun Febronius, de ratione regendi Christiani rei publicae, deque legitima Romani Pontificia potestate, Liber primus (Rom. 1776), in answer to Justinius Febronius's (J. N. von Honthoven, q. v.) De statu Ecclesie et legitima potestate Romani Pontificis liber singularius, etc. (Bollonii, 1765), is but a weak production compared to that which it attacked. Mamad'as (Zapaia, Vulg. Samae), given 1 (Edr. viii, 14) in place of the Shamalai (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Exx. viii, 10).

Mamass, a town of the Roman Church, a native of Paphlagonia, flourished in the 5th century. He was born in prison, his mother, Russia, having been arrested on account of her adherence to Christianity. He was brought up by a Christian widow named Amma, and while a boy was already consecrated for his faith, but conducted herself with great discretion. He subsequently became a hermit. He succeeded the Bishop of Cesarina, and died a martyr in 274. He is commemorated on the 17th of August. Mamass was highly honored in the ancient church. Basil, Gregory of Nazianzen, and Walafrid Strabo make mention of him. See C. Baronii Mystagogiae Romanae (Moguntiae, 1603), p. 202, 213; R. Huyert, Acta primorum Martirum (Amst. 1713), p. 264 sqq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, viii, 774. (J. N. P.)

Mamertus, St., archbishop of Vienna, was a brother of Claudianus Ecodius Mamertus [see Claudianus], author of the celebrated work De statu animae. St. Mamertus is especially known for having, on the occasion of a great fire, and other accidents which befell the city of Vienna, instituted the Rogations, i.e. penitential prayers for the three days preceding the ascension. Baronius, in his Martyrologium Romanum (Moguntiae, 1603), p. 255 sq. and 256, denies that Mamertus was the founder of these rogations, claiming that they were an old institution which had fallen into disuse, and which he merely revised. Bingham in his Origins eccles. (iii, 80 sq. v. 29), subsequently took the same view. However, it is certain that the example of Mamertus induced the Council of Orleans, in 511, to introduce the rogations throughout France. They were subsequently adopted by the whole Western Church, by order of Gregory the Great, in 591. Mamertus is generally believed to have died in 475. He is commemorated on the 11th of May. — Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, viii, 774; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxiii, 159; Pierer, Universal-lexikon, x, 748.

Mammiarians, the name of a branch of the Asabantae which arose in Harlern, Holland. Its origin is as follows. A young man having taken undue liberties with a young woman whom he intended to marry, was accused of it before the Church; the church authorities, however, did not agree on the subject, some desiring to expel the offender from their society, and others opposing so severe a measure. This caused a separation, and those who were on the young man's side were visited by their opponents with the reproachful name of Mammiarians (from the French femelle, a woman's breast). See Bayle, Dict. Historique, s. v.; Micrelius, Syntag. Hist. Eccl. (ed. 1679) p. 1018; Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, viii, 774.

Mam'mon (μαμών), or μαμώνας, from the Chald. μαμών or μαμώνας, that in which one trusts; see Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. col. 1217 sqq.), a term pre-eminent, by a technical and invidious usage (see Suidas in his lex. s. v.), "signifying wealth or riches, and bearing that sense in Luke xvi. 9, 11; but also used by our Saviour (Matt. vi. 24; Luke vii. 18) as a personification of the god of riches: 'Ye cannot serve God and Mammon.' Gill, on Matt. vi. 24, brings a very apt quotation from the Slavonic Hieros. (Rom. fol. 88) in confirmation of the character which Christ in these passages gives of the Jews in his day: 'We know that they believed in the law, and took care of the commandments, and of the tithes, and that their whole conversation was good-only that they loved the Mammon, and hated one another, and never cared for the word which Christ spake in the Chaldee Targums of Onkelos, and later writers, and in the Syriac Version, in the sense of riches.' This meaning of the word is given by Tetirall, Ad. Marc. iv. 38, and by Augustine and Jerome commenting on Matthew. Augustine adds that it was in use as a Dunic, and Jerome adds that it was a Syriac.
word. There is no reason to suppose that any hol received divine honors in the East under this name. It is used in Matthew as a personification of riches. The derivation of the word is discussed by A. Pflüger, _Opera_, p. 474. The phrase "mammon of unrighteous " as used in Luke xvi, 9, probably refers to gain which is too much unjustly acquired (see the public sins), but which may be sanctified by charity and piety so as to become a passport, in some sense, to final bless ness. See Grubenberg, _De mammona iniquitatis_ (Jen. 1700); Wukinis, _De m. d. d. i. i. c_. (Jen. 1701). In Rab binical language the word is used to denote confidence.

_Mammoniāni_. E.g. (Mammoniāniouς v. _Mamono

Mam(o)mon, A1, Abra-Andallah, a celebrated Musulman ruler, was born at Bagdad in A.D. 786; was the son of Hamanu-al-Maschid; and ascended the throne as the seventh Abbaside caliph in 818. By his deter mination to enforce the heretical doctrine that the Ko was created and not eternal, he became very unpopular among the Moslem doctors and gave strength to the house of All. See _MOHAMMEDANISM_; _MOHAMMED

Mammon was a patron of science and liter and is praised by Eastern critics for his talents and liberality. His capital, Bagdad, was in the day of the great centre of the world of learning and science. He died in 838. See Weil, _Gesch. d. Chalifen_, II, chap. vii; Hammer-Purgstall, _Literaturgesch. d. Araber_.

Mam' re (Heb. Mam're, מַמְרֶה, fath.; Sept. Μαμ βρίχ; Josephus_ _Μαμπρίχ, Am. i, 10, 2; Vulg. Mambr.), the name of an Amoritish chief who, with his brothers Aner and Eschol, was in alliance with Abraham (Gen. xvii, 24). B.C. cir. 2000. In the Jewish traditions he appears as encouraging Abraham to undergo the covenant from which his brothers would have dissa ed him, by a reference to the deliverance he had already experienced from far greater trials—the furnace of Nimrod and the sword of Chedorlaomer (Beek, _Leben Abrahami_, p. 36). Hence (בַּמְרֵה, Sept. Μαμβρίχ, _Mambr_., in the Auth. Vera., "the oaks of Mamre," "plain of Mamre" (Gen. xxiii, 18; xviii, 1), or simply "Mam're" (xxiii, 17; xxxv, 27), a grove in the neighbor of Hebron. It was here that Abraham first dwelt after the call. (Gen. xiv, 13; Rev. iv, 11). The divine an engaged him with the warning of Sodom's fate (Gen. xvii, 1); it was in the cave of the field opposite this place that he deposited the remains of Sarah (Gen. xxiii, 17, 19); where he himself was buried (Gen. xix, 4). He was the Jacob (Gen. xlix, 20; i, 13). In later times the spot is said to have been visited by several Jews from Hebron, still marked by a reputedly sacred tersebith (Joseph. War, iv, 9, 7; Eusebius, _Prap. Eran_., v, 9; Sozomen, _Hist. Eccl._, i, 18; Eusebius, _Onomast., s. v._ "Apyv_, Aroboe); and later travellers likewise (Samuel, _Trav. Fèid._, ii, 14, 3, in the _Gesta Dei per Francem_, i, 248; Troilo, _Trav., p. 418_ speaking of a very venerable tree of this kind near the ruins of a church at Hebron (see _Reeland, Palaest._, p. 712 sq.). Dr. Robinson found here, at a place called Ramet el-Khalil, one hour distant from Hebron, some ancient remains, which he regards (in accordance with the local tradition) as probably marking the site of Abraham's sepulchre (Rechesarches, i, 318). He saw the venerable oak near Hebron which still passes with the Mohammedans for the tree under which Abra pitched his tent (Rechesarches, ii, 429), but which he accepted as a tempe (ib. 443). See _Oak_. Accordin of Machpeleh and Mamre are also described with great exactness. Five times Moses states that Machpeleh lay before Mamre ( 27; Sept. _dariwiari; Vulg. _una respeciende_); which may mean either that it was to the east of Mamre, or that it lay facing it. The latter seems to be the true meaning. Machpeleh is situated on the shelving bank of a little valley, and probably the oak of Mamre stood on the other side of the valley, facing the cave, while the town of Hebron lay a little farther up to the north-west (comp. xxii, 17, 19; xxi, 9; xlix, 20; i, 13). The identity of Machpeleh with the modern Haram being established (see Machpe

Mam' re (Heb. Mam're, מַמְרֶה, fath.; Sept. Μαμβρίχ; Josephus_ _Μαμβρίχ, Am. i, 10, 2; Vulg. Mambr_), the name of an Amoritish chief who, with his brothers Aner and Eschol, was in alliance with Abraham (Gen. xvii, 24). B.C. cir. 2000. In the Jewish traditions he appears as encouraging Abraham to undergo the covenant from which his brothers would have dissa ed him, by a reference to the deliverance he had already experienced from far greater trials—the furnace of Nimrod and the sword of Chedorlaomer (Beek, _Leben Abrahami_, p. 36). Hence (בַּמְרֵה, Sept. Μαμβρίχ, _Mambr_., in the Auth. Vera., "the oaks of Mamre," "plain of Mamre" (Gen. xxiii, 18; xviii, 1), or simply "Mam're" (xxiii, 17; xxxv, 27), a grove in the neighbor of Hebron. It was here that Abraham first dwelt after the call. (Gen. xiv, 13; Rev. iv, 11). The divine an engaged him with the warning of Sodom's fate (Gen. xvii, 1); it was in the cave of the field opposite this place that he deposited the remains of Sarah (Gen. xxiii, 17, 19); where he himself was buried (Gen. xix, 4). He was the Jacob (Gen. xlix, 20; i, 13). In later times the spot is said to have been visited by several Jews from Hebron, still marked by a reputedly sacred tersebith (Joseph. War, iv, 9, 7; Eusebius, _Prap. Eran_., v, 9; Sozomen, _Hist. Eccl._, i, 18; Eusebius, _Onomast., s. v._ "Apyv_, Aroboe); and later travellers likewise (Samuel, _Trav. Fèid._, ii, 14, 3, in the _Gesta Dei per Francem_, i, 248; Troilo, _Trav., p. 418_ speaking of a very venerable tree of this kind near the ruins of a church at Hebron (see _Reeland, Palaest._, p. 712 sq.). Dr. Robinson found here, at a place called Ramet el-Khalil, one hour distant from Hebron, some ancient remains, which he regards (in accordance with the local tradition) as probably marking the site of Abraham's sepulchre (Rechesarches, i, 318). He saw the venerable oak near Hebron which still passes with the Mohammedans for the tree under which Abra pitched his tent (Rechesarches, ii, 429), but which he accepted as a tempe (ib. 443). See _Oak_. Accordin

Mam' re, "Mamre is stated to have been at Hebron, for we read that Isaac came unto Isaac's father, to Mam the great Haram, which covers the cave of Machpeleh (Stanley, _Leyden_, p. 166 sq.; Hitter, _Pal._, and _Syri._, iii, 222 sq.). The tradition which identified Mamre with Ramet el-Khull may have originated in the existence of a grove of venerable oaks on that spot, just as now the great oak a mile or more west of the town is called "Abraham's Oak." ( _Fortier, Hanbok_, i, 70)." See _Abraham_.

Mam'ru'hus (Μαμπρούς, Vulg. Malechnas), given (1 Exod. ix, 20) by corruption for _Malluch_ (q. v.) of the Heb. list (Ezra x, 29).

Man is the rendering mostly of four Hebrew and two Greek words in the English Version. They are used with as much precision as the terms of like import in other languages. Nor is the subject merely critical; it will be found connected with accurate interpretation. In our treatment of the subject we shall supplement what we have stated under the article Adam.

1. _Adam, adam_, is used in several senses. (a.) It is the proper name of the first man, though Gesenius thinks that when so applied it has the force rather of an appellative, and that, accordingly, in a translation, it would be better to render it the man. It seems, however, to be so used by Luke as a proper name in the genealogy (iii, 38), by Paul (Rom. v, 14; 1 Tim. ii, 13, 14), and by Jude (ver. 14). Paul's use of it in 1 Cor. xv, 45 is remarka bly clear: "the first man Adam." It is so employed throughout the Apocalypse without exception (2 Esdr. iii, 6, 10, 21, 26; iv, 30; vi, 54; vii, 11, 46, 48; Tobit viii, 6; Ecles. xxxiii, 10; xi, 1; xlxi, 16), and by Josephus (ut infra). Gesenius argues that, as applied to the name of the article above without exception, it is doubtless often thus used as an appellative, but the exceptions are decisive: Gen. iii, 17, "to Adam he said," and see Sept., Deut. xxxii, 8, "the descendants of Adam;" if I covered my transgressions as Adam (Job xxxi, 28), "and unto Adam he said," etc. (Job xxxi, 28). Gesenius, moreover, examined the context, and seems to refer to a primeval revelation not recorded in Genesis (see also Hos. vi, 7, Heb., or margin). Gesenius further argues that the woman has an appropriate name, but that the man has none. But the name Eve was given to her by Adam, but, as it would seem, under a change of circumstances; and though the divine origin of the word Adam, as a proper name of the first man, is not recorded in the history of the creation, as is that of the day, night, heaven, earth, seas, etc. (Gen. i, 5, 8, 10), yet its divine origin as an appellative is recorded (comp. Hel., Gen. i, 26; v, 1); from which state it soon came a proper name. Dr. Lee thinks from its frequent occurrence, but we would suggest, from its peculiar appropriateness to the "man," who is the more immediate image and glory of God (1 Cor. xi, 7). Other derivations of the word have been offered, as עִם, "to be red" or "red-haired," and hence some of the rabbinists have inferred that the nation was so called. The derivation as old is that of Josephus, who says that "the first man was called Adam because he was formed from the red earth," and adds, "for the true virgin earth is of this color." (Ant. i, 1, 2). The following is a simple translation of the more detailed (Hebrew) account given by Moses: Gen. ii, 4, 7, 18-25, of the creation of the first human pair, omitting the paragraph concerning the garden of Eden. See COSMOGONY.

This (the) genealogy of the heavens and the earth, when the day and night, the heaven and earth, the sea and the land were made, in such a way that Jehovah God made earth and heavens. Now no shrub of the field had yet been [grown] on the earth, and no plant of the field had yet sprung up—for Jehovah God had not yet caused it to rain upon the earth, nor was there any man to till the ground, but only the seven days of creation. Then Jehovah God formed the man, dust from the ground, and blew into his nostrils the breath of life; and that man became a living creature.

But Jehovah God said, "[It is] not good (that) the man be alone; I will make him a helper fit for him." Now Jehovah God had formed from the ground every living (thing) of the field, and every bird of the heavens; and Jehovah God brought them before the man to see what he would call it; so whatever the man called it (as a) living creature, that was [its] name; thus the man gave names to all the beasts of the field and to the fowl of the heavens, and Jehovah God gave to every living (thing) of the field; yet for man (there was) not found a helper as his counterpart. Then Jehovah God caused a lethargy to fall upon the man, so he slept; and he took one of his ribs, but closed flesh instead of it; and Jehovah God built the rib which he took from the man for a woman, and brought her towards the man. Thenupon the man said, "This now [is] bone from my bones, and flesh from my flesh; this (being) shall be called Woman (אשה, viril), because from man (אשה, vir) this (person) was taken; therefore will a man leave his father and his mother and cling to his wife; and they shall become one flesh." Now they were both of them naked, the man and his wife; yet they were not mutually ashamed (of their condition).

It is the generic name of the human race as originally created, and afterwards, like the English word man, person, whether man or woman, equivalent to the Latin homo and Greek ἄνθρωπος (Gen. i, 26, 27; v, 2; vii, 21; Deut. iii, 24; iv, 18, 16; Rom. xii, 5, 20, 20; 1 Cor. xii, 10), and even without regard to age (John xvi, 21). It is applied to people only, the "human persons or women" (Numb. xxxi, 35, Sept. ἄνθρωπος ἄνδρων ἀπὸ τῶν γυναικῶν). Thus is ἄνθρωπος means a woman (Herod. i, 84); a man (Exod. xvi, 12; Acts xiii, 18); a person (Acts xv, 2). It is a Hebrew word present in the Hebrew text of the original manuscripts of the Old Testament (Acts i, 28). (c) It denotes man in opposition to woman (Gen. iii, 12; Matt. xii, 10), though more properly, the husband in opposition to the wife (compare 1 Cor. vii, 1). It is, though used very rarely, for those who maintain the dignity of human nature, a man, as we say, meaning one that deserves the name, like the Latin vir and Greek ἄνδρας: "One man in a thousand have I found, but a woman," etc. (Eccles. vii, 29). Perhaps the word was first applied to the original gender, as in the context: Ps. xi, 1, 2, 8; xiv, 2, etc. The latter passage is often adduced to prove the total depravity of the whole human race, whereas it applies only to the more abandoned Jews, or possibly to the more wicked Gentile adversaries of Israel. It is a description of the "fool," or wicked man (ver. 1), and of persons of the same class (ver. 1, 2), "the workers of iniquity, who eat up God's people like bread, and called not upon the name of the Lord" (ver. 4).

For the true view of Paul's quotations from this psalm (Rom. iii, 10), see McKnight, ad loc.; and observe the use of the word man in Luke v, 20; Matt. x, 17. It is applied to the Gentiles (Matt. xxvii, 22; comp. Mark x, 33, and Mark ix, 31; Luke xvii, 32; see Montesinos, ad Deutomath. Phil. i, 221). (f) The word is used to denote other men, in opposition to those already named, "and a brother of his and other men" (Gen. viii, 20), i.e. the Egyptians. "Like other men" (Ps. lxxxii, 5), i.e. common men, in opposition to better men (Ps. lxxxii, 7); men of inferior rank, as opposed to עִם, men of higher rank (see Hebrew, Isa. ii, 9; v, 15: Ps. liii, 2; liii, 10; Prov. viii, 4). The phrase "son of man," in the Old Testament, denotes man as frail and unworthy (Numb. xxviii, 19; Job xxv, 6; Ezek. ii, 1, 8); as applied to the prophet, so often, it has the force of "O mortal!"

2. עִם, ish, is a man in the distinguished sense, like the Latin vir and Greek ἄνδρας. It is used in all the several senses of the Latin vir, and denotes a man as distinguished from a woman (1 Sam. xvii, 53; Matt. xxiv, 21); as a husband (Gen. iii, 16; Hos. ii, 16); and in reference to excellent mental qualities. A beautiful instance of the latter class occurs in Jer. v, 1. "Run ye to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem, and see now, and know, and see the broad places thereof, if ye can find a man, if there be any that executeth judgment, that seeketh the truth; and I will pardon," etc. This reminds the reader of the philosopher who went through the streets of Athens with a lighted lamp in his hand, and being asked what he sought, said, "I am seeking to find a man" (see Herodot. ii, 120; Homer, Il, 259). A man of this sort (Prov. viii, 4; Ps. cxii, 4, etc.), a courtier (Jer. xxxvii, 7), the male of animals (Gen. vii, 2). Sometimes it means men in general (Exod. xxvi, 29; Mark v, 44).

3. עִשְׂפָן, mosh, mortals, בּוֹרֵית, as transient, perishable, liable to sickness, etc. - "Let not man [margin, "mortal man"] prevail against thee" (2 Chron. xiv, 11).

"Write with the pen of the common man" (Isa. viii, 1). This is in my heart, even from the days of my youth, and of my inheritance, among the nations, among the sons of the east. (Isa. viii, 5; ix, 19, 90; Isa. ii, 7; Ps. ciii, 15). It is applied to women (Josh. viii, 26).

4. גֶּבֶר, vir, man, in regard to strength, etc. All etymologists concur in deriving the English word "man" from the superlative powers and faculties with which man is endowed above all earthly creatures; so the Latin, vir, and Greek ἄνδρας. In the Hebrew text of the original manuscripts of the Old Testament it is applied to man as distinguished from woman: "A man shall not put on a woman's garment" (Deut. xxii, 5), like ἄνδρας in Matt. vii, 9; John i, 6; to men as distinguished from children (Exod. xvi, 16; Acts xxv, 21); to a male (Job iii, 5; Sept. ἄνδρας). It is much used in poetry: "Happy is the man" (Ps. xxxiv, 9; xi, 5; iii, 9; xxiv, 12). Sometimes it denotes the species at large MAN.

MAN'asheh (Mawasip, prop. i. q. Menahem; comp. Mawasips, Josephus, Antiq. xi. 11, 1), a Christian teacher at Antioch, who had been educated with Herod Antipas (Acts xiii. 1; see Kuttalos, ad loc.). A.D. 44. He was evidently a Jew, but nothing else is known of him beyond this passage, in which the epithet πορφοφός may mean either πορφυράττω (Herod was brought up, however, at Rome, Josephus, Antiq. xvii. 1, 8) or faster-brother, as having the same nurse (see Walch, D. G. Hist. c. 201). Some identify him with the person above named by Josephus, others with a Menahem mentioned in the Talmud (see Lightfoot, Harm. of N. T. Test. ad loc.), but in either case on very slender grounds.

MANAGERS, a committee of members appointed annually in many Presbyterian churches, intrusted with all merely secular affairs as to property and finance.

MAN'ath (Heb. Manna'ath, פַּנָּח, rest), the name of a man and of a place.

1. (Sept. Mavoscyd.) The second named of the five sons of Shobal, the son of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 23; 1 Chron. i. 40), B.C. cir. 1297.

2. (Sept. Mavoscyd v. r. Mavoscydi.) A town of Shobal's tribe, whose descent is traced to Esau, of the tribe of Benjamin, appear to have been expelled from Geba by an act of his father Bela (1 Chron. viii. 6), the context would seem to indicate some locality in the land of Moab. See SHAHARAIM. Some refer it to the Ma'nuchah of Judah (Judg. ix. 46, A. V., with ease; comp. 1 Chron. vii. 52, 54), but with little probability. See MARCENARIUS.

MAN'athite (1 Chron. ii. 59). See HATTI-HAMMУNACHOTH.

MAN'asu'sis (Mawasips v. r. Mawasips, Vulg. Manasses), given (1 Esdr. ix. 81) in place of the Manasseh (q. v.), 4, of the Hebrew list (Ezra x. 30).

Manas'asch (Heb. Menashshēh, מֶנָּשֶׁה, who makes to forget; see Gen. xxii. 51; Sept. Josephus, and N.T. Marka'sis; “Manassas” in Matt. i. 10; Rev. vii. 6), the name of four men and of a tribe descended from one of them; also of another man mentioned by Josephus.

1. The elder of the two sons of Joseph, born in Egypt (Gen. xxii. 51; xlvi. 20) of Asenath, the priest's daughter of Heliopolis. B.C. 1882. He was afterwards, together with his brother, adopted by Jacob as his own (xlviii. 1), by which act he became the head of a tribe in Israel. B.C. 1856. See JACOBS. The act of adoption was, however, accompanied by a clear intimation from Jacob that the descendants of Manasseh, although the elder, would be far less numerous and powerful than those of the younger brother. The result corresponded rather with this intimation. See EPHRAIM. He married a Syrian concubine, by whom he had several children (1 Chron. vii. 14). See MACAH. The only thing subsequently recorded of him personally is that his grandchildren were “brought up on Joseph's knees” (Gen. i. 28). The ancient Jewish traditions are, however, less reticent. According to them Manasseh was the steward of Joseph's house, and the interpreter who intervened between Joseph and his brethren at their interview; and the extraordinary strength which he displayed in the struggle of Simeon first caused Judah to suspect that the apparent Egyptians were really his own flesh and blood (see Targums Jerusalem and Pseudojohon. on Gen. xlii. 23; xliii. 15; also the quotations in Weis's Bibl. Legends, p. 68, note).

MANASSEH, THOUGHT OF.—On the prophetic benediction of Jacob, above referred to, although Manasseh, as the representative of his future lineage, had, like his great-uncle Esaü, lost his birthright in favor of his younger brother, he received, as Esaü had, a blessing only inferior to the birthright itself. Like his brother, he was to increase with the fertility of the fish which swarmed in the great Egyptian stream, to “become a people, and also to be great”—the “thousands of Manas-Nh no less than those of Ephraim, indeed more, were to become a proverb in the nation; his name, no less than that of Ephraim, was to be the symbol and the expression of the richest blessings for his kindred.

The position of the tribe of Manasseh during the march to Canaan was with Ephraim and Benjamin on the west side of the sacred tent. The standard of the three sons of Rachel was the figure of a boy, with the inscription "The cloud of Jehovah rested on them until they went forth out of the camp" (Targ. Pseudojon.

on Numb. ii. 18). The chief of the tribe at the time of the census at Sinai was Gamaliel ben-Pedahurah, and its numbers were then 52,200 (Numb. i. 10, 35; ii. 20, 21; vii. 51-55). The numbers of Ephraim were at the same date 40,500. Forty years later, on the banks of the Jordan, these proportions were reversed. Manasseh had then increased to 52,700, while Ephraim had diminished to 52,500 (Numb. xxvi, 34, 37). On this occasion it is remarkable that Manasseh resumes its position in its catalogue as the eldest son of Joseph. Possibly this is due to the prowess which the tribe had shown in the conquest of Gilead, for Manasseh was certainly at this time the most distinguished of all the tribes. Of the three who had elected to remain on that side of the Jordan,

Reuben and Gad had chosen their lot because the country was suitable to their pastoral possessions and tendencies. But Machir, Jair, and Nobah, the sons of Manasseh, were no shepherds. They were pure warriors, who had taken the most prominent part in the conquest of those provinces which up to that time had been conquered, and whose deeds are constantly referred to (Numb. xxxvi, 39; Deut. iii. 13, 14, 15) with credit and renown. "Jair, the son of Manasseh, took all the tract of Argob... sixty great cities" (Deut. iii. 14, 4).

"Nobah took Kenath and the daughter-towns thereof, and called it after his own name" (Numb. xxxvi, 42).

"Beauss: Machir was a man of war, therefore he had Gilead and Bashan" (Josh. xvii, 1). The district which these ancient warriors conquered was among the most difficult, if not the most difficult, in the whole country.

It embraced the hills of Gilead, with their inaccessible heights and impassable ravines, and the almost impernible tract of Argob, which derives its modern name of Lejah from the secure "asylum" it affords to those who take refuge within its natural fortifications. Had they not remained in those wild and inaccessible districts, but gone forward and taken their lot with the rest, who shall say what changes might not have occurred in the history of the nation, through the presence of such en-ergic and warlike characters as are here mentioned, in the eminence whom we can with certainty identify as Man-nasses, such as Gideon and Jephthah—for Elijah and others may with equal probability have belonged to the neighboring tribe of Gad—were among the most remarkable characters that Israel produced. And Josue, in giving the list of the judges of the land of "seven children of Israel other than those of the tribe of Benjamin, that established hereditary monarchy in their own line" (Stanley, S. and P. P. c. 230). But, with the one exception of Gideon, the warlike tendencies of Manasseh seem to have been confined to the east of the Jordan. There they threw exceedingly, pushing their way northward over the rich plains of Jaulin and Jezreel—the Gaalanitias and Itureas of the Roman period—to the foot of Mount Hermon (1 Chron. x, 23). At the time of the coronation of David at Hebron, while the western Manasseh sent 18,000, and Ephraim itself 20,000, the eastern Manasseh, under Zelobaph and Reuben, sent a number of 120,000, thoroughly armed—a remarkable demonstration of strength, still more remarkable when we remember the fact that Saul's house, with the great

Abner at its head, was then residing at Mahanaim, on the banks of the Jordan, under the command of Gilead and outwardly prosperous, a similar fate awaited them in the end to that which befell Gad and Reuben; they gradually assimilated themselves to the old inhabitants of the country—they "transgressed against the God of their fathers, and went a-woring after the gods of the people of the land, whom the Lord destroyed before them" (ver. 25). They relinquished, too, the settled mode of life and the definite limits which beset the members of a federal nation, and gradually became Bedouins of the wilderness, spreading themselves over the vast details which lay between the allotted possessions of their tribe and the Ephraimites, and which had from time immortal been the hunting-grounds and pastures of the wild Hagarites, of Jetur, Nephib, and Nodab (1 Chron.

v. 19, 22). On them first descended the punishment which was ordained to be the inevitable consequence of such wrongdoing. They, first of all Israel, were carried away by Puil and Tgath-Pisbes, and settled in the Aseyran territories (ver. 26). The connection, however, between east and west had been kept up to a certain degree. In Bethhean, the most easterly city of the city-Judah, Manasseh, on the two portions all the wealth of which had fallen into the hands of the proinces were there for all matters sacred and secular (1 Chron. xxvi, 32); and Solomon's commisnariat officer, Ben-Geber, ruled over the towns of Jair and the whole district of Argob (1 Kings iv, 13), and transmitted their productions, doubtless not without their people, to the court of Jerusalem.

The genealogies of the tribe are preserved in Numb.

xxvi, 28-34; Josh. xvii, 1, etc.; and 1 Chron vii, 14-18.

But it seems impossible to unravel these so as to accurately, for instance, which of the families remained east of Jordan, and which advanced to the west. From the fact of the fortification (or family of Gideon), Hepher (probably Ophrah, the native place of the same hero), and Shechem (the well-known city of the Bene-Joseph) all occur among the names of the sons of Gilead, the son of Machir, it seems probable that Gilead, whose name is so intimately connected with the eastern part of the immediate progenitor of the western half of the tribe.

Nor is it less difficult to fix the exact position of the territory allotted to the western half. In Josh. xvii.

14-18, a passage usually regarded by critics as an exceedingly ancient document, we find the two tribes of down the strip that only one portion had been alloated to them, viz. Mount Ephraim (ver. 16), and that they could not extend into the plains of Judah or Ez-MANASSEH

Ibid., because those districts were still in the possession of the Canaanites, and scorched by their chariots. In reply Joshua advises them to go up into the forest (ver. 13, A.V. "wood")—into the mountain which is a forest (ver. 18). This mountain clothed with forest can surely be nothing but the various spurs and offshoots of Carmel, the "mountain" closely adjoining the portion of Ephraim whose richness of wood was so proverbial. It is in accordance with this view that the majority of the towns of Manasseh—which, as the weaker portion of the tribe, would naturally be pushed to seek its fortunes outside the limits originally bestowed—were actually on the slopes either of Carmel itself or of the contiguous ranges. Thus Taanach and Megiddo were on the northern spur of Carmel; Ilbean appears to have been on the eastern continuation of the range, somewhere near the present Jenin. En-Dor was on the slopes of the so-called "Little Hermon." The two remaining towns mentioned as belonging to Manasseh formed the extreme eastern and western limits of the tribe: the one, Bethshean (Josh. xvii, 11), was in the hollow of the Ghor, or Jordan Valley; the other, Dor (ibid.), was on the coast of the Mediterranean, sheltered behind the range of Carmel, and immediately opposite the bluff or shoulder which forms its highest point. The whole of these cities are specially mentioned as standing in the allotments of other tribes, though inhabited by Manasseh; and this, with the absence of any attempt to define a limit to the possessions of the tribe on the north, looks as if no boundary-line had existed on that side, but as if the territory faded off gradually into those of the two contiguous tribes from whom it had borrowed its fairest cities. On the south side the boundary between Manasseh and Ephraim is more definitely described, and may generally be traced with tolerable certainty. Their joint possessions were bounded by the territory of Asher on the north and Issachar on the north-east (xvii, 10), but the division line between the two kindred tribes is defined by a place called Asher (ver. 7), now 'Ass, twelve miles north-east of Nablus. Thence it ran to Michmetha, described as facing Shechem (Nablus); then went to the right, i.e. southward, to the spring of Tapuaah, and so double to the Jordan. In the opposite direction it fell in with the watercourses of the torrent Kanah—probably the Nahr Falaik—along which it ran to the Mediterranean. See Tanneh.

From the indications of the history, it would appear that Manasseh took very little part in public affairs. They either left all that to Ephraim, or were so far removed from the centre of the nation as to have little interest in what was taking place. That they attended David's coronation at Hebron has already been mentioned. When his rule was established over all Israel, each had its distinct ruler—the western, Joel ben-Pedaliah; the eastern, Ithdo ben-Zechariah (1 Chron. xxvii, 20, 21). From this time the eastern Manasseh fades entirely from our view, and the western is hardly kept before us by an occasional mention. Such scattered notices as we do find have almost all reference to the part taken by members of the tribe in the reforms of the good kings of Judah—the Jehovah-revival under Asa (2 Chron. xvi, 9)—the Passover of Hezekiah (xxv, 1, 10, 11, 18), and the subsequent enthusiasm against idolatry (xxvi, 1)—the restoration of Josiah (xxixv, 6), and his restoration of the buildings of the Temple (ver. 9). It is gratifying to reflect that these notices, faint and scattered as they are, are all colored with good, and exhibit none of the repulsive traits of that most repulsive heathenism into which other tribes of Israel fell.

A positive connection between Manasseh and Benjamin is implied in the genealogies of 1 Chron. vii, where Machir is said to have married into the family of Huppim and Shuppim, chief houses in the latter tribe (ver. 15). No record of any such relation appears anywhere else.

2. According to the usual reading of the text in Judg. xiii, 30, Manasseh was the father of Gershom, who is named as the father of Jonathan that acted as priest to the Danites at Laish; but besides that this would not make him a Levite, and, in addition to the fact that Gerazah is a Levitical name, the reading is marked as suspicious (7 T. 2, 2, Sept. M. A. 1547), and should doubtless be corrected to "Moses," as in the Vulg. and many codices of the Sept. as Jonathan.

3. The fourteenth separate king of Judah, son and successor of Hezekiah, who began to reign at the early age of twelve years, and reigned fifty-five years. B.C. 657-642. For the synchronisms with profane history, especially of Assyria, Babylon, and Egypt, see Chronology.

The reign of this monarch is thus longer than that of any other of the house of David. There is none of which we know less. In part, it may be, this was the direct result of the character and policy of the man. In part, doubtless, it is to be traced to the abhorrence with which the following generation looked back upon it as the period of lowest degradation to which their country had ever fallen. Chroniclers and prophets pass it over, gathering from its horrors and disasters the great, broad lessons in which they saw the foot-prints of a righteous retribution, the tokens of a divine compassion, and then the spirit of their enemies will often say no more. This is in itself significant. It gives a meaning and a value to every fact which has escaped the sentence of oblivion. The very recitance of the historians of the O. T. shows how free they were from the rhetorical exaggerations and inaccuracies of a later age. The struggle of opposing worshipst must have been fierce under Manasseh as it was under Antiochus, or Decius, or Dio-cletian, or Mary. Men must have suffered and died in that struggle of whom the world was not worthy, and yet no contrarian must have been greater than that between the short periods in Kings and Chronicles, and the martyro-logies which belong to those other periods of persecution.

1. The birth of Manasseh is fixed (B.C. 799) twelve years before the death of Hezekiah (2 Kings xxii, 1), later times, however, divide the line of descent either that his father was king, or rather either that his son, if he had any at all, died at an early age, or that he returned to his throne at an early age, or that his son, if he had any at all, died at an early age, or that he returned to his throne at an early age.

syria. But he goes a step further. Not content with independence, he enters on a policy of aggression. He contracts an alliance with the rebellious viceroy of Babylonia against their common enemy (2 Kings xx, 12; Isa. xxxix). He displays the treasures of his kingdom to the ambassador of the king of Persia, in the belief that this would show them how powerful and only he can prove himself. Isaiah protested against this step, but the ambition of being a great potentate continued, and it was to the results of this ambition that the boy Manasseh succeeded at the age of twelve.

The accession of the youthful king appears to have been the signal for an entire change, if not in the foreign policy, at any rate in the religious administration of the kingdom. At so early an age he can scarcely have been the spontaneous author of so great an alteration, and we may infer accordingly that it was the work of the idolatrous, or Ahaz party, which had been repressed during the reign of Hezekiah, but had all along, like the Romish clergy under Edward VI in England, looked on the reform with a sullen acquiescence, and thwarted it when they dared. The change which he knew not how to carry on, and which increased even to yet darker abominations (2 Kings xxii, 7). The awful words of Isaiah (i, 10) had a terrible truth in them. Those to whom he spake were literally "rulers of Sodom and princes of Go- morrha." Every faith was tolerated but the old faith of Israel. This was abandoned and proscribed. The temple of Jehovah was dishonored and profaned. The very Ark of the covenant was removed from the sanctuary (2 Chron. xxxxx, 3). The sacred books of the people were so systematically destroyed that fifty years later men listened to the Book of the Law of Jehovah X, a newly-discovered treasure (2 Kings xxii, 8). It may well be, according to a Jewish tradition, that this fanaticism of idolatry led Manasseh to order the name Jehovah to be erased from all documents and inscriptions (Patrick, ad loc.). All this involved also a systematic violation of the weekly sabbatic rest and the consequent loss of one witness against a merely animal life (Isa. ivi, 2; iviii, 18). The tide of corruption carried away some even of those who, as priests and prophets, should have been steadfast in resisting it (Zeph. iii, 4; Jer. ii, 26; v, 18; vi, 13).

It is easy to imagine the bitter grief and burning indignation of the witnesses of former faith. The fiercest zeal of Huguenots in France, of Covenanters in Scotland, against the badges and symbols of the Latin Church, is perhaps but a faint shadow of that which grew to a white heat in the hearts of the worshippers of Jehovah who spoke out in praise of the emotion of glory (Jer. ii, 10-25; Ewald, Gesch. Jer. iii, 666). The result was a debasement which had not been equalled even in the reign of Ahaz, uniting in one centre the abominations which elsewhere existed separately. Not content with sanctioning their presence in the Holy City, as Solomon and Rehoboam had done, Manasseh defiled it with the sanctuary itself (2 Chron. xxxix, 4). The worship thus introduced was, as has been said, predominately Babylonian in its character. "He observed times, and used enchantments, and used witchcraft, and dealt with familiar spirits, and with wizards" (ver. 6).

The worship of the "host of heaven," which each man celebrated for himself on the roof of his own house, took the place of that of the Lord God of Sabaoth (2 Kings xxii, 12; Isa. lxv, 3, 11; Zeph. i, 5; Jer. viiii, 2; xiii, 12; xxii, 29). With this, however, there was associated the old Molech worship of the Ammonites. The fires were rekindled in the valley of Ben-Hinnom. Tophet was (for the first time, apparently) built into a stately fabric (2 Kings xvi, 8; Isa. xxx, 38, as compared with Jer. vii, 31; xiii, 5; Ewald, Gesch. Jer. iii, 667). Even the king himself, inwardly distressed, when the Molech was rekindled, received a horrible fire-baptism dedicating them to Molech (2 Chron. xxxiii, 8), while others were actually slaughtered (Ezek. xxiii, 37, 89). godless generation (Isa. lvii, 1-4). Long afterwards the remembrance of that reign of terror lingered in the minds of men as a guilt for which nothing could atone (2 Kings xxiv, 4). The persecution, like most other personal outrages, with entire want of purpose, was for a time successful (Jer. ii, 90). The prophets appear no more in the long history of Manasseh's reign. The heart and the intellect of the nation were crushed out, and there would seem to have been no chroniclers left to record this portion of its history.

3. The book of Josiah. In the next natural sequence of events, there are indications that the neighboring nations—Phœnicians, Moabites, Ammonites—who had been tributary under Hezekiah, revolted at some period in the reign of Manasseh, and asserted their independence (Zeph. ii, 4-17; Jer. xlvii, xlviii, xlix). The Babylonian alliance bore the fruits which had been predicted. Hezekiah had been too hasty in attaching himself to the cause of the rebel prince against Assyria. The rebellion of Merodach-Baladan was crushed, and then the wrath of the Assyrian king fell on those who had supported him. See EASAR-HADDON, and Captivity, according to ordinary during the constant war between Assyria and Egypt, Manasseh adhered to the policy of his father in making common cause with the latter power. One or the other of these causes, although not stated by the sacred historian, brought into Judæa an Assyrian army, under the great Sennacherib. And this time the invasion was more successful than that of Sennacherib. The city apparently was taken. The miserable king attempted flight; but was discovered in a thorn-braze in which he had hidden himself, was laden with chains, and sent a messenger to Babylon, on the part of the king, to the Assyrians, where he was cast into prison. His name Has been discovered on the Assyrian monuments (Journ. of Sac. Lit. April, 1859, p. 75). See NINEVEH, here, at last, Manasseh had ample opportunity and leisure for cool reflection; and the hard lessons of adversity were well and wisely learned. He saw and deeply impressed the evil of his reign—he became as a new man—he humbly besought pardon from God, and imploring that he might be enabled to evince the sincerity of his contrition by being restored to a position for undoing all that had been the business of his life to effect. His prayer was heard. His captivity is supposed to have lasted a year, and he was then restored to his kingdom under certain obligations of tribute and allegiance to the king of Assyria, which, although not expressed in the account of this transaction, are alluded to in the history of his successors (Isa. lxx, 1-18; compare Prophecies of Manasseh and Kings, p. 362). See MANASSEH, PRAYER OF.

Two questions meet us at this point. (a) Have we satisfactory grounds for believing that this statement is historically true? (b) If we accept it, to what period in the reign of Manasseh is it to be assigned? It has been urged in regard to (a) that the silence of the writer of the books of Kings is conclusive against the trustworthiness of the narrative of 2 Chronicles. In the former there is no mention made of captivity or repentance or return. The latter, it has been said, yields to the temptation of pointing a moral, of making history appear more in harmony with his own notions of the divine government than it actually is. His anxiety to deal leniently with the successors of David leads him to invent at once a reformation and the captivity which is represented as its cause (Rosenmuller, Bid. Allenach, s, 3, p. 191; Hitzig, Biblical Archa., p. 180). It will be necessary in dealing with this objection to meet the sceptical critic on his own ground. To say that his reasoning contradicts our belief in the inspiration of the historical books of Scripture, and is destructive of all moral history that is carried on with entire ungeness of purpose, and, however strongly it may influence our feelings, we are bound to find another answer. It is believed that the answer is not far to seek. (1) The silence of a writer who sums up the history of a reign of fifty-five years in nineteen verses as to one alleged event in it is surely a weak ground for refusing to accept that event on the authority of another historian. (2) The omission is in part explained by the character of the narrative of 2 Kings xx-xv. The writer deliberately turns away from told history of the days of Manasseh, lest he should offend in the personal biography of the king. He looks on the reign only as it contributed to the corruption and final overthrow of the kingdom, and no after repentance was able to undo the mischief that had been done at first. (3) Still keeping on the level of human probabilities, the character of the writer of 2 Chronicles, obviously a Levite, and looking at the facts of the history from the Levitical point of view, would lead him to attach greater importance to a partial reinstatement of the old ritual and to the cessation of persecution, and so give them in proportion a greater prominence. (4) There is a peculiarity in the history which is, in some measure, of the nature of an undesigned coincidence, and so confirms it. The captains of the host of Assyria take Manasseh to Babylon. Would not a later writer, inventing the story, have made the Assyrian, and not the Babylonian, on the point of the event, the cause of the captivity? But, if the latter were chosen for the sake of harmony with the prophecy of Isa. xxxix, have made the king of Babylon rather than of Assyria the captor? As it is, the narrative fits in, with the utmost accuracy, to the facts of Oriental history. The first attack of Babylon to assert its independence, and without difference, on the captivity of that of Manasseh (the first or second of that name; compare Easar-Haddon, and Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii, 675), and for a time the Assyrian king held his court at Babylon, so as to effect more completely the revolution of the rebellious province, was terminated by the vassalage of Judah to Assyria, and is the intervention of the Assyrian king in 2 Kings xvii, 26, just at the same time. The king is not named there, but Ezra iv, 2, 10, gives Amassper, and this is probably only another form of Ammannar, and this Easar-Haddon (compare Ewald, Gesch. iii, 675); Tob. i, 21 gives Easar-bedon, and the name is derived from Asia thus becomes part of the same policy as the attack on Judah. On the whole, then, the objection may well be dismissed as frivolous and vexatious. Like many other difficulties urged by the same school, it has in it something at once captious and pusillanimous. Those who lay undue stress on the fact in the spirit of a clever boy asking puzzling questions, or a sharp advocate getting up a case against the evidence on the other side, rather than in that of critics who have learned how to construct a history and to value its materials rightly (comp. Keil, Commentaries, pp. 263, 264), and other historical province, we have a sober German critic accepting it as true, and place Manasseh's captivity under Easar-haddon (Bertheau, ad loc.). Bertheau suggests that some support to the account may be found in 2 Kings xx, 17, sq. For other discussions of the alleged improbabilities of the Biblical narrative, see Dahler, De idee Chronic. hist. p. 139; Grumbacher, Chron. p. 199, 210; Religionsgesch., ii, 234; Rosenmüller, Allerth. ii, 181; Keil, Apologie der Chron. p. 425; Hävernick, Einleitung, ii, 221; Stud. u. Krit. 1860, vol. iii.

(b) The circumstance just noticed enables us to return an approximate answer to the other question. The death of Easar-haddon's Babylonian reign is calculated as being in B.C. 680-677; and Manasseh's captivity is supposed to have lasted one period, a period of twenty-two years of his reign as the exact date. 4. The period that followed is dwelt upon by the writer of 2 Chronicles as one of a great change for the better. The discipline of exile made the king feel that the gods whom he had chosen were powerless to deliver, and he turned in his heart to Jehovah, the God of his fathers. The compassion or death of Esar-haddon led to his release, and he returned after some uncertain interval of time to Jerusalem. It is not improbable that he, as a man of the city, had obtained refuge among the oppressed adherents of the ancient creed, and possibly had brought into prominence, as the provisional ruler and defender of the city, one of the chief members of the party. If the prophecy of Isa. xxii, 15, received, as it probably did, its fulfillment in Shebna's sharing the captivity of his master, and gaining, without extraneous help, such belief that we may refer to the same period the noble words which speak of Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, as taking the place which Shebna should have vacant, and rising up to be "a father unto the inhabitants of Jerusalem and to the house of Judah," "the key of the house of David on his shoulder."

The return of Manasseh was at any rate followed by a new policy. The old faith of Israel was no longer persecuted. Foreign idolatries were no longer thrust, in all their foulness, into the sanctuary itself. The altar of the Lord was again restored, and peace-offerings and thank-offerings sacrificed to Jehovah (2 Chron. xxxiii, 15, 16). But beyond this the reformation did not go. The ark was not restored to its place. The book of the law of Jehovah remained in its concealment. Satisfied with the fact that they were no longer worshipping the gods of other nations by name, they went on in the same mode of worship essentially idolatrous. "The people did sacrifice still in the high places, but to Jehovah their God only" (ibid., ver. 17).

5. The other facts known of Manasseh's reign connect themselves with the state of the world round him. The Assyrian monarchy was tottering to its fall, and the king of Judah seems to have thought that it was still possible for him to rule as the head of a strong and independent kingdom. If he had to content himself with a smaller territory, he might yet guard its capital against attack by a new and virulent enemy, which had been before its weak side (comp. Zeph. i, 10), "to the entering in of the fish-gate," and completing the tower of Ophel, which had been begun with a like purpose by Josiah (2 Chron. xxvii, 8). Nor were the preparations for defence limited to Jerusalem. "He put captains of war into all the fenced cities of Judah." There was, it must be remembered, a special reason for this attitude, over and above that afforded by the condition of Assyria. Egypt had emerged from the chaos of the Dodecarchy and the Ethiopian intrusive, and again become strong again. It was not content with the possession of Ethiopia as a reward of its former arms. Northwards, he attacked the Philistines, and the twenty-nine years' siege of Azotus must have fallen wholly or in part within the reign of Manasseh. So far his progress would not be unacceptable. It would be pleasant to see the old hereditary enemies of Israel, who had lately grown insolent and defiant, meet with their masters. About this time, accordingly, we find the thought of an Egyptian alliance again beginning to gain favor. The prophets, and those who were guided by them, dreaded this more than anything, and entered their protest with a distinctness of manner. As far as we can judge, the time of such a protest, the time of such a desire for Egyptian help, the time at which, in the light of the events of the Assyrian wars, the idea of such a help could seriously be entertained, we see no reason to doubt that it was in the time of Manasseh. It is, indeed, the very time when his pretended reformation is most likely to have been made, to have been the more easy to accomplish and the more forcible to be thrown against the people, who might have had no idea of a real reformation, or might have had one without the wish, and might have come to the conclusion that the king could not seriously intend to execute it, as he had been treated and trusted, and the prayer of the people (see Jer. xi, 14, 16) is to allude to some such state of things. In return for this, Manasseh, we may believe, received the help of the chariots and horses for which Egypt was always famous (Isa. xxxix, 1). (Comp. Aristea, Epit. ad Philoocr. in Haecamp's Josephus, ii, 104).

If this was the close of Manasseh's reign, we can well understand how to the writer of the books of Kings it would seem hardly better than the beginning, leaving the history of Judah to the times of its wars or worse evils than itself. We can understand how it was that in the death he was buried as Azab had been, not with the burial of a king, in the sepulchres of the house of David, but in the garden of Uzza (2 Kings xxi, 20), and that, long afterwards, in spite of his repentance, the Jews held his name in abomination, and that of the three kings (the other two are Jeroboam and Ahab) who had no part in eternal life (Sanhedr. xi, 1, quoted by Patrick on 2 Chron. xxxiii, 18).

Indeed, the evil was irreparable. The habits of a serious and religious mind had become a part of the life of the people; and though they might be repressed for a time by force, as in the reformation of Josiah, they burst out again, when the pressure was removed, with fresh violence, and rendered even the zeal of the best of the Jewish kings fruitful chiefly in hypocrisy and unreality. The intellectual life of the people suffered in the same degree. The persecution cut off all who, trained in the schools of the prophets, were the thinkers and teachers of the people. The reign of Manasseh witnessed the close of the work of Isaiah and Habakkuk at its beginning, and the youth of Jeremiah and Zephaniah at its conclusion, both in the prophetic writing and the evangelic half-century of debasement. The most fearful symptom of all, when a prophet's voice was again heard during the minority of Josiah, was the atheism which, then as in other ages, followed on the confused adoption of a confounded polytheism (Zeph. i, 12). It is surely a strained, almost a fantastic hypothesis, to assign (as Ewald does) to such a period two such noble works as Deuteronomy and the book of Job.

Nor was this dying out of a true faith the only evil. The systematic persecution of the worshippers of Jehovah accustomed the people to the horrors of a religious war; and when they in their turn gained the ascendancy, they used the opportunity with a fiercer sternness than had been known before. Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah in their reforms had been content with restoring the true worship and destroying the instruments of the false. In that of Josiah, the destruction extends to the priests of the high places, whom he sacrifices on their own altars (2 Kings xxiii, 20).

6. But little is added by later tradition to the O.T. narrative of Manasseh's reign. The prayer that bears his name among the apocryphal books can hardly, in the absence of any other reference, be made identical with that referred to in 2 Chron. xxxiii, and is probably rather the result of an attempt to work out the hint there supplied than the reproduction of an older document. There are reasons, however, for believing that there existed at some time or other a fuller history, more or less legendary, of Manasseh and his conversion, from which the prayer may possibly have been an excerpt, preserved for devotional purposes (it appears for the first time in the Apostolical Constitutions) when the rest was rejected as worthless. Scattered here and there, we find the one or another member of such a work. Among the offences of Manasseh, the most prominent is that he places in the sanctuary an άγαλμα παραπτώμων of Zeus (Suidas, c. v. Μανασσής; Georg. Synecellus, Chron. n. i, 404). The charge on which he condemns Isaiah to death is that of blasphemy, not that he was the "Lor (Isa. vi, 1) being treated as a presumptuous boast at variance with Exod. xxi, 20 (Nic. de Lyra, from a Jewish treatise: Jebamoth, quoted by Amaana, in Orati Sacri on 2 Kings xxi). Isaiah is miraculously rescued. A cedar opens to receive him. Then comes the order that the cedar should be cut down. That which made this sin the greater was that the king's mother, Hezphoniah, was the daughter of Isaiah. When Manasseh was taken captive by Merodach and taken to Babylon (Suidas), he was thrown into prison and fed daily with a scanty allowance of bran-bread and water mixed with vinegar. Then came his condemnation. He was encased in a brazen image (the description suggests a punishment like that of the bull of Pe-rillus), but he repented and prayed, and was released from his suffering, and escaped (Su%th and Georg. Synecletus).

'And the Lord heard the voice of Manasseh and pitied him,' the legend continues, 'and there came around him a flame of fire, and all the iron about him (vulgo sp PL ablQ mi-nipOl were melted, and the Lord delivered him out of all distress.' (Consp. Auct. in letter. v compare Jud. Afric. ap. Routh, Rel. Sacce. ii. 298). Then he returned to Jerusalem and lived righteously and justly.

Manasseh Ben-Joseph Han-Israel, one of the most distinguished Jewish theologians of the 17th century, was born at Lisbon, Portugal, in 1634, at a time when the Iberian peninsula was a place of torture for all non-Roman Catholic believers, but more particularly the Jews. Joseph, his father, a rich merchant, feared the power of the inquisitors, and, like many religiously persecuted, turned towards hospitable Holland for an asylum for himself and his family. The household fled to Amsterdam, and finally to a new home. Ben-Joseph was placed under the instruction of the celebrated Isaac Uziel, then rabbi at the Dutch capital. So rapid was his progress and so unbounded the confidence of the Jews of Amsterdam in Manasseh ben-Israel, as he is commonly called, that on the death of Uziel, when only eighteen years old (1652), he was deemed a worthy successor of the departed rabbi. In 1656, in need of means to meet the expenses of his father's family, largely dependent upon him for support, he established the celebrated Amsterdam Hebrew printing-office, which a few years later he printed his own maiden production, and in 1658 finally came before the public with the first volume of his great and justly celebrated Conciliator, or Harmony of the Pentateuch (see below), in which upwards of two hundred and ten Hebrew works, and fifty-four Greek, Latin, Spanish, and Portuguese authors, both sacred and profane, are quoted. His fame was now established in all Europe, and his authority accepted not only by the Jews, but even Christian scholar, acknowledged his scholarship, and wrote to him from far and wide, requesting explanations of difficulties which they found in the Hebrew Scriptures and Jewish history. The celebrated Vossius, Dionysius, Hugo Grotius, Huet, Episcopius, Sobrier, Frankenberg, Thomas Fuller, Nathaniel Honesius, et al., were among his correspondents. He solicited their influence in behalf of his suffering brethren, and was thereby enabled to petition the Long Parliament (1650) to readmit the Jews into England, whence they had been expelled ever since 1290. Shortly after, he dedicated The Hope of Israel to the English Parliament, which was gratefully acknowledged in a letter written by Lord Middlesex, addressed To Most Noble and敬爱 Lord. Encouraged thereby, Manasseh came over to England in 1655; presented a 'Humble Address' in behalf of his coreligionists to Cromwell; published in London, 1656, his Vindication of Jews, in answer to those Christians who opposed the readmission of Jews into that country; and through Cromwell, with all his power, could not carry through the measure permitting Jews to settle in England (see Jews), he granted to Manasseh ben-Israel a pension of £100 per annum, payable quarterly, and commencing Feb. 20, 1656 (comp. Carlyle, ii, 163). Manasseh, however, did not long enjoy this generous gift, for he died in Middleburg in 1657, on his way back to Amsterdam. Gritz (Gesch. d. Juden, x. 18, 94-186) rather belittles Manasseh's literary ability. He regards him as "a man of much information, but of little thought," and yet his acquaintance with Manasseh is founded mainly on Kayserling's biography. An encyclopedical knowledge was displayed by Manasseh in his writings: this should certainly not stand against him. His most important works are (1) יבשכ , in Hebrew, being an index to all the passages of the Hebrew Scriptures in the Mid- dle Ages, on the Pentateuch, and the Five Megilloth (Amsterdam, 1688); (2) Conciliorium, conceptionis locorum S. Scripturae, quàe quum lateris eis contentur, etc. (in Spanish, Amst. 1632-1654. 4 vols.; vol. 1 translated into Latin by Vossius, Amst. 1633, and the whole into English by Lindo, London, 1842); (3) De Creaturae, in manuscript in Spanish (in Amsterdam, 1663. 4); (4) De Resurrezione Mortuorum, Libri tres (in Spanish, Amsterdam, 1638); (5) פַּדְרָא יִשְׁמָאֵל, De Termino Vite (in Latin, Amsterdam, 1639; translated into English by Thomas Pococke, London, 1699); (6) פדרת ישמעאל, four books on the immortality of the soul (written in Hebrew, Amst. 1661; new ed. Leips. 1682). These are valuable contributions to Biblical literature, naisuch as the Manasseh, and in them all the passages from the Hebrew Scriptures which, according to the explanations of the ancient rabbis, teach the immortality of the soul and the resurrection; (7) יִדְרָא יִשְׁמָאֵל, Pietro Gloria o de la Estatua de Nebuchadnezer (Amst. 1655), an exposition of Daniel's dream, written in Spanish, which the immortal Rembrandt did not think it below his dignity to illustrate, and through his own press several beautiful and correctly-printed editions of the Hebrew Scriptures; wrote a Hebrew grammar, entitled יִדְרָא יִשְׁמָאֵל, Grammatica Hebrae, dividida en guia libros, which has not as yet been published; and left us over four hundred well-written sermons in Portuguese. See First, Biblioth. Jud. ii. 354, 355, 356; Smend, Catalogus Librorum, veteris et novi testamenti, othere Bodleiana, vol. 1645-1652; and especially the valuable biographies by Kayserling, Jahrbuch für die Geschichhte der Juden (Leips. 1861), ii, 85 sq.; and by Carmoly, in the Revue Orientalie (Brussels, 1842), p. 299-349; C. Manasseh (Μάνασσής), the Greek form of the name Manasseh, and, as such, applied not only to those mentioned in the O.T., but to another in the Apocrypha.

1. The son of Joseph by that name (Rev. vii. 6).
2. The king of Judah (Matt. i, 10; and so in "the Prayer" thus entitled).
3. The son of Hashbon (1 Esd. i, 33; comp. Ezra x. 33).
4. A wealthy inhabitant of Bethulia, and husband of Judith, according to the legend. He was smitten with a sunstroke while superintending the labours in his fields, leaving Judith a widow with great possessions (Jud. viii. 23; ix. 2; xvi. 22-24); and was buried between Dothan and Beal-hamom. See Judith.

Manasses, the Prayer of, one of the shorter apocryphal pieces appended to the O.T. (In the following account we mainly follow the articles on the subject in Kittü and Smith's Dictionary). Though wanting in the early printed editions of the Sept., it must have been included in the ancient MSS. of the Sept., as is evident from the fact that there exists an Ante-Hieronymian Latin version of it. It is found in the Codex Alexandrinus, and the Greek text was first published in Robert Stephens' edition of the Biblia Latina (Paris, 1632), and an English version of the same was printed in 1656. It was also printed in the Apostolical Constitution (1658); it was then published by Daendels in 1682: inserted in the fourth volume of the London Polyglot, with the various readings of the Codex Alexandrinus. Fathers of Catechumens (1672); in the Libri apoc. V. T. (Francof, ed. M. 1848, Halle, 1749); in the editions of the Apocrypha by Reiske (1780), Michaelis (1741); and after the text of the Cod. Alexandrinus in the editions of the Sept by Grabe and Beelinger.
MANASSES

I. Title and Position.—This apocryphal production is called the prayer of MANASSES (ἐπιθυμία Μανασσέως), or hymn of prayer (πράσδωθος γιὰ ὑπήργιον), because it purports to be the supplications which this monarch offered to God when captive in Babylon, mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxiii, 12, 13. Its position varies in the MSS., printed editions of the text, and in the versions. It is more generally found at the end of Psalter, with the same hymns and prayers, as in the Codex Alexandrinus, the Zurich MS. of the Psalms mentioned by Fritzsche, and in the Ethiopic Psalter, published by Ludolf (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1701); in the three Latin MSS. by Sabatier it is placed in the Vulgate, in 2 Chron. (Sabad, Biblioth. Lat. iii, 1808); in the editions of the Vulgate formed after the Trident. Canon of the Bible it is usually put at the end of the N.T., succeeded by the third and fourth books of Esdras. Luther placed it as the last of the Apocrypha, at the end of the O.T., while Matthew's Bible, which first inserted it among the Apocrypha, and which is followed by the Bishop's Bible and the A.V., puts it before the Maccabees.

II. Contents, Author, Date, Original Language, etc.—It opens with an appeal to the God of the faithful patriarchs and ancestors, and is described by the author as Creator of all things, before whose power every one trembles, and whose wrath no sinner can endure, and speaks of his proffered pardon to the penitent (ver. 1–8). Thereupon the repentant king confesses his sins, humbles himself on account of them, prays for pardon, and promises to lead a life of gratitude and praise (ver. 9–15).

Many writers have seen nothing in this prayer to militate against its being the penitential dirge of the penitent Manasses; on the contrary, they think that the simplicity and appropriateness of its style, the earnest and touching manner in which it is expressed, go far to show that it is not literally "his prayer unto his God" rendered into Greek, that prayer formed the basis of the Greek. It is, indeed, certain that the prayer was still extant when the Chronicles were compiled, that the chronicles saw it in the book of the Kings of Israel (2 Chron. xxxiii, 18), and that later writers, as well as tradition, constantly refer to it (compare Sanhedrin, 101; 103a; Jerusalem Sanhedrin xvii; Mivraha Rabboh on Lev., Parsha xxx, p. 150; on Deut., Parsha ii, or ch. iv, 26, p. 216, ed. Sulzbach; Chaldee Paraphrase of 2 Chron. xxxiii, 11, etc.; Const. Apost. ii, 22). We may more reasonably conclude, however, that it is the embodiment of these traditions. See MANASSEH, 8.

The Greek text is undoubtedly original, and not a mere translation from the Hebrew, for even within the same page there are three passages where the same parenthesis is found (ἀποκτένους κ.κ., ἄνωθεν κ.κ., παρασκευαζόμενον κ.κ.), the writer was well acquainted with the Sept. (τὰ κατόπτρα τῆς γῆς, τὸ πέλαγος τῆς χρυσοκοπίας σου, πῦρ δὲ ἡ δύναμις τῶν ὀρέων), but beyond this there is nothing to determine the date at which he lived. The allusion to the patriarchs (ver. 8, ἵκισε; ver. 1, εἰσίσταται αἰτῶν τέκνων) appears to fix the authorship on a Jew, but the clear teaching on repentance points to a time certainly not later before the Christian era. The most likely indication of the place at which the prayer was written. All that we know is that reference is made to it in a fragment of Julius Africanus (circa A.D. 221), that it is given at length in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii, 22), a work attributed to Clement Romanus, but generally believed to be of the 3d or 4th century, and that the whole complication of it shows it to be an ante-Christian production, compiled most probably in the first century B.C. The Latin translation which occurs in Vulgate MSS. is not by the hand of Jerome, and has some remarkable points (including omnipolita, importa, omnium virtutum colorum), but there is no sufficient internal evidence to show whether it is later or earlier than his time. It does not, however, seem to have been used by any Latin writer of the first four centuries, and was not known to Victor Tunenensis in the sixth (Ambrosius, iv, 986, ed. Migone).

III. Canonicality.—This prayer was considered by many of the ancients as genuine, and used as such for ecclesiastical purposes. It is quoted as such by the author of the Sermons on the Parishes and Publicans; in the sixth volume of Chrystocleti's works; by Anthony the monk (ii, 94); Theodoretus to Simeon, Catochephanes Ceraneumus (Homil. ii and livi); by Freculcus, George Syncellus, and George the sinner, in their Chronicies; by Suidas (Lex. v. v. Μανασσεός); and by Anastasius Sinaita (in Psalms vii); and is still placed by the modern Greek Edit. in the N.T. (2 Chron. v. ii). But the fact of its non-occurrence in the Heb. text, and its uniform rejection by the Jewish Church, clearly stamp it as apocryphal. It was never recognized in the Roman Church as canonical, and has, therefore, been omitted in the ancient editions of the Sept. For this reason it is also omitted from the Zitriz Version, and Coverdale's Bible, which follows it, as well as from the Geneva Version; but it is retained among the Apocrypha in Luther's translation, Matthew's Bible, and in the Bishop's Bible, and, in the A.V., it is in the Maccabees.

IV. Versions and Exegetical Helps.—Greek and Latinmetrical versions of this prayer have been reprinted from Fabricius, in his edition of the books of Sirach, Wisdom, Judith, and Tobit (Leips. 1691). A Hebrew version is mentioned by Wolf, Bibliotheca Hebrea, i, 778, a very beautiful and valuable version, with valuable notes, is reprinted in the Hebrew Annual, entitled Birew H-itim (Vienna, 1814, v, 12 sqq.; important literary notices are given by Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus V. T. i, 1100 sqq.; Bibliotheca Graeca (ed. Harles), iii, 732 sqq.; Müller, Erklärung des Gebet Manasses (S. xxvii, 1278); and especially Fritzsche, Kurzgefasste exegetische Handbuch z. d. Apokryphen d. A. T. i, 157 sqq. (Leips. 1851). See APOTHELYA.

Manasseh (Μανασσῆς, Manassé, patronymic from MANASSEH, used collectively; Sept. Μανασσι, Auth. Vern. "Manasses," "of Manasseh"); a descendant of Manasseh, or a member of that tribe. Deut. iv, 49; xxxix, 6; 2 Kings x, 20; 1 Chron. xxvii, 89.

Manby, Peter, an Irish theologian, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, became chaplain to Dr. Michael Boyle, afterwards archbishop of Dublin, and at length dean of Perry. In the reign of James II he embraced the popish religion, in vindication of which he wrote a number of treatises; these were reprinted to remove him from being expelled to England, and died at London in 1697. Manby published several controversial tracts in favor of the Roman Catholic religion.—Hook, Eccles. Biog. vii, 214, s. v.

Manclius, George Wilhelmus, one of the prominent ministers of the Reformed Church in America, and a sturdy opponent of the movements for securing its independence of the Church in Holland. He was settled in Bergen County, N. J., at Schraalenburgh and Paramus (1730–82), and at Kingston, N. Y. (1732–56 or 59). He possessed much ability and learning, but it was alleged that "consciences smothered" under his orthodox preaching. His bounds, however, claims, however, claim the saintly spirit which show him to have been "a faithful, learned, industrious, and zealous preacher of the Gospel, one who did not fear to declare the whole counsel of God: and that it was, on the other hand, his opposition to an illiterate ministry and to herself, his independence of the office of teaching, and of reproducing vice, and his general zeal and fidelity which induced certain of his enemies to misrepresent him." He left 420 members in full communion of his Church. He died Sept. 6, 1762. See Corwin's Manual of the Reformed Church, p. 150. (W. J. R. T.)

Mandeville, Bernard de, a sceptical writer in the English tongue, was born of French extraction about 1670 at Dort, Holland, and went to England near the opening of the 18th century. He practiced medicine in London, but does not appear to have had much success as a physician, and depended mainly on his literary successes. He died in London in 1733. In the article Deuss (q. v.), the name of Mandeville has not been inserted "because his speculations" (see works below), as Farrar says (Crit. Hist. of Free Thought, p. 185, note 65), "did not bear directly on religion." Upon morality, however, Mandeville exerted so great an influence that it cannot pass him unnoticed. His attacks on Christian morals already reveal him to have been a champion of Deism. The doctrines laid down in several of his works is nothing more nor less than a further elucidation of the assertion of Bayle in (Pensées diverses), that Atheism does not necessarily make man vicious, nor a state unhappy, because dogmas have no influence on the acts of men. Superior observation of society led Mandeville to the belief that many institutions of public weal derive their strength and support from prevailing immorality. This view he developed in a poem entitled Sir John Florboury, or The Earnest Honest (1714), to which he afterwards added long explanatory notes, and then published the whole under the new title of The Fable of the Bees. However erroneous may be its views of morals and of society, it bears all the marks of an honest and sincere inquiry on an important subject. It exposed Mandeville, however, to much obloquy, and, besides meeting with many answers and attacks, was denounced as injurious to morality. It would appear that some of the hostility against this work, and against Mandeville generally, is to be traced to another publication recommended by the licensing committee, On the matter and manner of which are certainly exceptional, though it must at the same time be stated that Mandeville earnestly and with seeming sincerity recommends his plan as a means of diminishing immorality, and that he endeavored, so far as lay in his power, by affixing a high price and in other ways, to prevent the work from having a general circulation. Mandeville subsequently published a second part of The Fable of the Bees, and several other works, among which are two entitled Free Thoughts on Religion, the Church, and Nationalities, and An Inquiry into the Origin of Honor and the Usefulness of Christianity in War. "The Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices Public Benefits, may be viewed in two ways, as a satire on men and as a theory of society and national prosperity. So far as it is a satire, it is sufficiently just and pleasant; but viewed in its entirety as a treatise on the character of a great civilized society, it is altogether worthless. It is Mandeville's object to show that national greatness depends on the prevalence of fraud and luxury; and for this purpose he supposes a "beehive of bees," possessing in all respects institutions similar to those of man, he details the various frauds, similar to those among men, practiced by bees upon another in various professions; he shows how the wealth accumulated by means of these frauds is turned, through luxurious habits, to the good of others, who again practice their frauds upon the wealthy; and, having already assumed that wealth cannot be gotten without fraud and cannot exist without luxury, he assumes further that wealth is the only cause and criterion of national greatness. His hive of bees having thus become wealthy and great, he afterwards supposes a mutual jealousy of frauds to arise, and fraud to be by consent disposed of; and he again assumes that wealth and luxury immediately disappear, and that the greatness of the society is gone. It is needless to point out inconsistencies and errors, such, for instance, as the absence of all distinction between luxury and vice, when the whole theory is based on the obviously false observations; and the long dissertations appended to the fable, however amusing and full of valuable remarks, contain no attempts to establish by proof the fundamental points of the theory. In an "Inquiry into the Origin of Moral Distinctions," contained in The Fable of the Bees, Mandeville contends that virtue and vice, and the feelings of moral approbation and disapprobation, have been created in men by their several governments, for the purpose of maintaining order and preserving their own political systems. As it is probable as it seems that such a proposition as this should be seriously put forth, it is yet more so that it should come from one whose professed object was, however strange the way in which he set about it, to promote good morals; for there is nothing in Mandeville's writings to warrant the idea that he sought to promote "the sacred interest of truth" (English Cyclopedia, s. v.). This book was translated into French, as well as the other writings of Mandeville, and contributed in no small degree to the corruption of French society, and helped forward the sad days of the Revolution. Mandeville, Henry, D.D., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born at Kinderhook, N. Y., March 6, 1804; graduated at Union College in 1826, and at New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1829, and ordained in 1830, by the Classis of Albany in 1829. His ministry was chiefly spent in the Reformed Church in the State of New York, viz., at Shawangunk, 1829-31; Geneva, 1831-34; Utica, 1834-41. From 1841 to 1849 he was professor of moral philosophy and belles-lettres in Hamilton College, N. Y. While in this position he published a series of text-books on eloquence and English literature, which evince his thorough scholarship and "aptness to teach." From Hamilton College he was called to the Government Street Presbyterian Church, Mobile, Ala., where he died of yellow fever in 1858. He was a man of large frame, imposing presence, and cultivated manner. He was a brilliant pulpit orator, a powerful reasoner, a successful preacher and professor, and a faithful pastor. He gloried in the cross of Christ, and devoted all of his fine powers to his work. His published works, in the Bible, the Reformed Church, and other revivals, are a matter of tradition, which was delivered before the Society of Inquiry of the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, N. J., in 1847, is a masterpiece of reasoning and eloquence, and a worthy memorial of the author's genius, piety, and zeal for personal and universal Reconciliations; Corwin's Manual, s. v. (W. J. R. Mandingo is the name of an African people, the nation of the Wagaraeans—according to Barth, comprising some 6,000,000 or more. Strictly speaking, however, Mandingoes should be termed only the inhabitants of the most south-westerly territories belonging to the great West African race of the Waangoras (sing. Wagora), and inhabiting a district extending in lat. from 8 to 12° N., and between the west coasts and the head waters of the Senegal and Niger. Their original seat is said to be Manding, a small mountain country in the eastern sources of the Senegal, whence, partly by conquest and partly by emigration, they have spread themselves over a most extensive tract of country, and now consist of a variety of tribes. They are black in color, tall and well shaped, with regular features, and are, generally speaking, a fine race, capable of great endurance, and of possessing a disposition well adapted to the pursuits of the hunter, trader, and warrior; and remarkable for their greediness, and for their industry and energy. The language of the Mandingo prevails from the Senegal coast up to Sago on the Niger. A grammar of the language was compiled by R. Maxwell Macbrair, in 1860, under the title of "Religious Belief, etc.—Of the neighboring nations, the Mandingoes were the first who embraced Islamism.
The greater portion of them are now Moslems, and are zealous propagators of their religion. Those of the Mandrake tradition in the neighboring religion have a very peculiary idea of marriage. With them it is merely a form of regulated slavery, and there is no marriage ceremony observed to eunice union (Caillé, Travels, i, 850). Most generally the female partner is chosen, and under her management (Gray, In African, p. 85). They have also, according to Park (Travels, i, 267), a very peculiar idea of the Deity, whom they regard as "a remote, and of so exalted a nature, that it is idle to imagine the feeble suplications of wretched mortals can reverse the decrees and change the purposes of the Deity." Neither do they, as a general thing, have any confidence in any belief in the hereafter, of which they assert that "no man knows anything about it."

Mandrake (only in the plur. margin), dudaim, from בִּדָּא, to be hot, from their amatory properties; whence the sing. בֶּדָא, a pot or boiling vessel, hence a bucket, Jer. xxiv, 1, occurs in Gen. xxx, 14-16: "Reuben went out in the days of wheat harvest, and found mandrakes in the field, and brought them home to his mother Leah. Then Rachel said to Leah, Give me of thy son's mandrakes;" "And Jacob came out of the field in the evening, and Leah went out to meet him, and said, Thou must not go in unto my son's mandrakes; and he lay with her that night." The only other passage is Cant. vii, 13: "The mandrakes give a smell, and at our gates are all manner of pleasant plants." From the above passages it is evident that the dudaim were collected in the fields, that they were fit for gathering in the wheat harvest in Mesopotamia, where the first occurrence took place; that they were found in Palestine; that they or the plants which yielded them diffused a peculiar and agreeable odor; and that they were supposed to be possessed of aphrodisiac powers, or of assisting in producing conception. It is possible that there is a connection between this plant and the love-charms (ץָנֵיה) which seem to have been worn by Oriental brides (Cant. i, 2, iv, 10; vii, 12; comp. i, 12), like smelling-bottles (Isa. iii, 20, "tablets"); perhaps these contained an odoriferous mandrake mixture. From this it is manifest that there is little to guide us in determining their method of use is alluded to at such early periods, especially as no similar name has been recognized in any of the cognate languages. Hence interpreters have wasted much time and pains in endeavoring to ascertain what is intended by the Heb. dudaim. In the LXX. this word is translated by "violet," others "lilies," "jasminas," "truffles or mushrooms;" and some think that the word means "flowers," or "fine flowers." Bochart, Calmet, and Sir Thomas Browne suppose the citrons intended; Celsius (Hierobot., i, 20); but see, on the contrary, Oudem. p. 99) is persuaded that it is the fruit of the loe-tree; Hiller that cherries are spoken of; and Ludolf (*Hist. Edh., i, 9, etc.) maintains that it is the fruit which the Syracans call mausc (that is, the plantain), resembling in figure and taste the Indian fig; but the generality of modern authors and commentators understand mandrakes (not the melon so called, "mele dudaim," but the mandradora) by dudaim.

The ground upon which the mandradora has been preferred is that the most ancient Greek translator interprets the Hebrew name in Gen. xxx, 14 by mandrake apples (μάρδακρα μάρδακρα); and in the Song of Solomon by mandrakes, μαρδάκρα and commentators understand mandrakes (not the melon so called, "mele dudaim," but the mandradora) by dudaim.

The second of these puts lafock; the two latter ybruchin, which names the same lafock (cf. Plut. Deis. p. 189; Synesius; Cassian; Lycophron p. 1591). The earliest notice of μαρδάκρα is from Hippocrates, and the next by Theophrastus (*Hist. Plant. vi, 2). Both of these, C. Sprengel (*Hist. Rei. Herb. i, 98, 92) suppose, intend Atropa mandragora. Dioscorides (iv. 76) notices three kinds: (1) the female, which is supposed to be the Mandradora Berolton; (2) the male, Mandravegra vernalis of the same botanist (these two are, however, usually accounted varieties of Atropa mandragora); (3) a kind called morion. It has been inferred that this may be the same plant as the mandradora of Theophrastus, which, by some authors, has been supposed to be Atropa belladonna. To all of these Dioscorides ascribes narcotic properties, and says of the first that it is also called Cirroza, because it appears to be a root which promotes venery. Pythagoras named the mandradora anarthromorphon, and Theophrastus, among several other qualities, ascribed to it the power of ripening, and also its tendency to excite to love. Its fruit was called love-apple, and Venus herself Mandragorita. But it is not easy to decide whether the same plant refers to all the above; the plant in question, or plants. (See Lycophron vii. 238; Bip. Schol. *Hist. Plant. p. 411, tom. ii, p. 478.) Hebrews on materia medica give madragosaic as a synonym for ybruch, or ybrus, which is said to be the root of a plant of which the fruit is called lufack. This, there is little doubt, must be the above Atropa mandragora, as the Arabians are not merely known only to the plants of Dioscorides, and on this occasion they quote him as well as Galen, and ascribe narcotic properties to both the root and the fruit. D'Herbelot (*Bibl. Oriens., i, 72) details some of the superstitions respecting this plant, which originated in the East, but which continued for a long time after inSaly reared by authors in Europe. (See Schubert, iii, 116; Schulz. Leit. v, 197; Burchardt, i, 411.) By the Arabs it is said to be called infaah al-arham, or devil's apple, on account of its power to excite voluptuoseness. If we look to the works of more modern authors we find a continued existence of the same statements. Thus Mariti, in his Travels (ii, 195), says that the Arabs called the mandrake plant gabrochak, which is, no doubt, the same name as given above. At the village of St. John, in the mountains, about six miles south-west from Jerusalem, this plant is found at present, as well as in Tuscany. It grows low, like lettuce, to which its leaves have a strong resemblance, except that they have a dark-green color. The flowers are purple, and the root is for the most part forked. The fruit, when ripe, in the beginning of May, is about the size of a small apple, exceedingly red, and of a most agreeable odor; our guide thought us fools for suspecting it to be unworthy. He ate it freely himself, and it is generally valued by the inhabitants as exhilarating to their spirits and a provocative to venery. Maudrell (Trav. p. 85) was informed by the chief priest of the Sanhedrim, that it was much esteemed for its medicinal virtues. Hessequist also seems inclined to consider it the dudaim, for, when at Nazareth, he says (Trav. p. 185), "What I found most remarkable in their villages was the great quantity of mandrakes that grew in a vale below Nazareth.""The fruit was now ripe. From the season in which this mandrake blossoms and ripens its fruit, one might form a conjecture that it is Rachel's dudaim. These were brought her in the wheat harvest, which in Galilee is in the month of May, about this time, and the mandrake was not in fruit." Dr. Thomson (Land and Book, ii, 380) found mandrakes ripe on the lower ranges of Lebanon and Hermon towards the end of April. On the 15th of May, Schuls also found mandrakes on Mount Tabor, which, as he says, "have a delightful scent, and whose taste is equally agreeable, although not to every body. They are almost globular, and yellow like oranges, and about two and a quarter inches in diameter. This fruit grows on a shrub resembling the mallow; and the fruit lies about the stem, as it were about the root, after such a manner a single plant may yield six to ten fruits, or even more. The color is so beautiful that no orange can equal its brilliancy." This fruit, which a recent traveler describes as of an "insipid, sickish taste," is by the Arabs of other MANETHO (Μανέθω), of Alexandria, a native of Egypt, of humble origin, and a grammarian and a writer of histories. His works are not extant in their original form, but fragments of them have come down to us through the Middle Ages, and are preserved in the works of later writers, such as Eusebius, Athanasius, and John of Damascus. Manetho's chief work is a history of the Egyptian kings, called the "Chronicles," which is the most important source for the history of Egypt in the 3rd century BC. Manetho's "Chronicles" is divided into eight parts, each part being devoted to a different period of Egyptian history. His work is characterized by its rich detail and its attempt to chronicle the events of Egypt's past in a systematic and comprehensive manner. Manetho's "Chronicles" is considered one of the most important works of its time, and it has been a source of information for later historians and scholars.

opoli. In addition to these works, Manetho is also said to have written, 1, 'Iepq BiBiatq, on the Egyptian religion; 2, Ἡπὶ ἀρχαίας τιμὶς εἰς ηπὶ τίμιας, on the ancient rites and ceremonies of the Egyptians; 3, Φαναρίων ἱστορίας (Laertius, Proem. s. 10), probably the same work as that called by Suidas ἱστορίας; 4, BiBiatq ἱστορίας, on the history of Egypt, which is very doubtful. See Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. s. v.; English Cyclopædia, s. v. His name is introduced here on account of the importance of his work on Egyptian history in determining the list of ancient Egyptian kings. See Dows in J. A. S. E. for an examination of his authority. It has been re-examined by one class of writers, and almost wholly set aside by others, according to their own preconceived theories. See Pharaoh.

Authenticity of Manetho's History.—Manetho was a learned priest at the court of the first Ptolemy, according to Plutarch (de Is. et Os. c. 29), who cites a religious work of his in Greek, which is quoted also under various names by Elian, Diogenes Laertius, Porphyry, and other later writers (Fruin, Manethonis Sekenretis Reliquiae, p. 153 sq.); Partethy, Plutarch über Isis u. Osiris, p. 180 sq.). Josephus (Ant. i. 14—16, 26, 27) gives two accounts which may be fused into one by a literal correspondence with Coptic version of the Aigyptiaca, "a work composed in Greek by Manetho the Sekenret, from materials which he professes to have rendered from the sacred records;" of which history all else that is extant is a catalogue of Egyptian dynasties, presumably compiled in the 12th or 13th cent. B.C. by an Egyptian, called Manetho. It is noted by many as the Egyptian history, and by some as the Egyptian history of Josephus. (Josephus, Ant. i. 486 sq.) better meets the difficulty by supposing that the original work, never widely known, was so early lost that even in the 1st century all that survived of it was a bare abstract of its names and numbers, and (in this respect) nos passages relating to the "Hypseus" and the "Iepes," with a list of seventeen reigns, which some Jewish writer had extracted on account of their Biblical interest, and beyond which Josephus knew nothing of Manetho. Whatever be the explanation, the fact is that it is only through Jewish and Christian writers that we ever hear of Manetho as a historian. Of these, Theophilus Ant. (ad Autolyc. ii. 30, 31, c. 181) does but copy Josephus. Clemens Alex. nowhere names Manetho. A history of "the Acts of the Kings of Egypt, in three books"—not, however, by Manetho, but by "Ptolemy the Mendesian"—is indeed known by a name, but it is from second-hand from Tzq (see c. 181, p. 129, as perhaps Justin Martyr before him (ad Gr. 8), quotes Ptolemy, not directly, but from Apion. In short, it is plain, comparing these passages and Eusebius. (Pr. Eccl. iii. 11, 12), that the story of the foundation of Alexandria is known of this Ptolemy of Mendes; and Apion, as far as we know, makes no mention of Manetho. In what relation the work of Ptolemy may have stood to Manetho's, as there is no evidence to show, it is idle to speculate; and, indeed, the question with which we are concerned would remain as much as it is even were it proved that "Manetho" is a borrowed name, and the Egyptians a product of Roman times. For the important point is, not who wrote the book, and when, but what is its value? It may not be genuine, nor so old as it pretends to be, and yet may contain good materials, honestly rendered from earlier writings or original records, probably as available in the time of Domitian as they were under the Ptolemites; and, in fact, existing monuments do furnish so considerable a number of names unquestionably identical with those in this, that to reject this altogether, and deny it all historical value, would betoken either egregious ignorance or a reckless scepticism that can shut its eyes to manifest facts.

Chronological Value of Manetho's History.—The text of the Catalogue of Thirty-eight Kings is of constant importance; and records cannot be held to warrant the assumption that it is to be depended upon where these fail. For the monuments which attest, also correct its statements. Monuments prove some reigns, and even dynasties, contemporary, which in the list are successive; but we have no means of ascertaining what was truly consecutive and what parallel, where monuments are wanting. Their dates are always in years of the current reign, not of an era. From Cambyses upward to Ptolemy, and his immediate predecessor, Taracus—Tirhaka, the chief of the Edomites—within seventy years (see Chronology, sec. iii.). Hence up to Ptolemy there is only one century, as too scanty to yield any determination. For dyn. xxi., headed by Seosonchis—Shishak, the records are copious: dates on spis-tele, of which Mariette reports seven in this dynasty, prove that it lasted much more than the 120 years of Africanus. But even then the text must be formed into a canon, and the epoch of Seosonchis can only be approximately given from the Biblical synchronism, "In 5 Rehoboam Shishak invaded Judah"—in what year of his reign the monument which records the conquest does not say; although the epoch of Rehoboam is, to B.C. 931, a mere point by the Biblical historians. The inscription is dated 21 Shishak, but does not indicate the order or time of the several conquests recorded. The attempt has been made to prove from Bibdical data that the invasion was in the 20th year. Thus:

It was while Solomon was building Millo (2 Kings xi, 27) that Jeroboam fled to "Shishak, king of Egypt" (ver. 40). This work began not earlier than 24 Solomon (vi, 32), so the invasion in that or the next could be in the 20th year; if Jeroboam was immediately appointed over the forced labor of his tribesmen; if he presently conceived the purpose of insurrection, encouraged by Ahijah; if his purpose became known to Solomon almost as soon as formed; if, in short, his flight into Egypt was not later than 20 Solomon; and, lastly, if Shishak became king in that year, then 5 Beoboom (i.e., 45 Solomon) will be 20 Shiishak. This is a specimen of much that passes for chronology, where the Bible is concerned. Some light is thrown on the dynastic connection of dyn. xxii and xxiii by discoveries by Mariette in Egypt, which proves the fact of numerous contemporary reigns throughout Egypt at that time (Brugsch's Zeit-schrift, July, 1863; De Rouge, Jiscr. du rov Tatschi Meri Amian, 1864). But it helps the chronology little or nothing. In dyn. xx, xxi, is another gap, at present not to be bridge over. The seven-named Tantises of xxii (Afr. 180, Eun. 121 years) seem to have been military kings; and that they were partly contemporaneous with xx and xxi may appear from the absence of apis-stela, of which xx has nine, xxi seven. Dyn. xx, for which the text, consisting of its own name or name of its kings, all bearing the name Rameses, beginning with R.
III, and five of them his sons, probably joint-kings.
The apis-inscriptions furnish no connected dates, nor can any inference be drawn from their number, since Mariette reports no less than five in the first reign. For dyn. xxi (Schon), xxi, xxi (Amon), the materials, written and monumental, are most copious; yet even here the means of an exact determination are wanting: indeed, if further proof were needed that the Manethonic lists are to be not implicitly trusted, it is furnished by the monumental evidence of contemporary reigns which in the lists are successive. It is certain that the last two kings, Amenemhet and Amenemhet III, have been owned by all competent inquirers, that in the part of the succession for which the evidence is clearest and most ample, it is impossible to assign the year at which any king, from Amenemhet to Tirhakah, began to reign.

No ingenuity of calculation and conjecture can make amends for the capital defects—the want of an era, the inadequacy of the materials. The brilliant light shed on this point or that, does but make the surrounding darkness more palpable. Analysis of the lists may enable the inquirer, to the most, to divine the intentions of their authors, which is but a small step gained towards the truth of facts.

But it has been supposed that certain fixed points may be got by means of astronomical conjunctions assigned to certain dates of the vague year on the monu-maments: Thus: (i) A fragmentary inscription of Takelut II, 6th king of dyn. xxii, purports that "on the 20th Mesor of the 15th year of his father" (Seonsk II, according to Lepsius, Age of XXII Dyn., but Oroskon II, according to Brugsch, Dr. Hincks, and v. Gumpach), "the heavenly was invisible, the moon struggling . . . . ." Hence Mr. Cooper (Athenæum, 11 May, 1861) gathers, that on the day named, in the given year of Seonsk II, there was a lunar eclipse, which he considers must be that of 16th March, B.C. 801. Dr. Hincks, who at first also made the eclipse lunar, and its date 4th April, B.C.
945, now contends that it was solar, and the only possibile date 1st April, B.C. 927 (Journal of Soc. Lit. Jan.
1863, p. 333-376; compare J. Jan. 1864, p. 409 sq.).
In making it solar, he follows M. v. Gumpach (Hät. Antiq. of the People of Egypt, 1863, p. 29), who finds its date 11th May, B.C. 927. Unfortunately the 25th Mesor of that year was 10th March. This is the only au-mental notice supposed to refer to an eclipse: not worth much at the best; the record, even if its meaning was certain, is not contemporary.

protests against this story as a mere figment, prompted by Egyptian malignity, and labors to prove it inconsistent with Manetho's own list: unsuccessfully enough, for, in fact, Amenophis (Ammenophites, Aftr.) does appear there just where the story places him, i.e. next to Sethos and Ramesses II, with a reign of nineteen years and six months. The monuments give the name Menepthah, and his son and successor Seti = Sethos II, just as in the story. The names are not fictitious, whatever may be the value of the story as regards the Israelites. This Menepthah, then, son and successor of Ramesses the Great, is the Pharaoh of the Exodus according to Lepsius and Bunsen, and of late accepted as such by many writers, learned and unlearned. Those to whom the name of Manetho is not voucher enough, will demand independent evidence. In fact, it is alleged that the monuments of the time of Menepthah attest a period of depression: no great works of that king are known to exist; of his reign of twenty years the highest date hitherto found is the fourth; and two rival kings, Amenmessu (the Amenemesses of the lists) and Si-phtra, are reigning at the same time with him, i.e. holding precarious sovereignty in Thebes during the time of alien occupation and the flight of Menepthah (Bunsen, Ag., Stelle, iv, 208 sq.). That these two kings reigned in the time of Menepthah, and not with or after Sethos II, is assumed without proof; that the reign of Ramesses II was followed by a period of decadence proves nothing regarding the entire canonical chronology as to an event so memorable as the final expulsion of the hated "Shepherd" (Shasu), who so often figure in the monumental recitals of earlier kings (c. g. of Sethos I, who calls them Shasu u p'kamana-kur, "shepherds of the land of Canaan") as anything so strongly against the story as any merely negative evidence can do it. More important is the argument derived from the mention (Exod. i, 11) of the "treasure-cities Pithom and Raamases," built for the persecuting Pharaoh by the forced labor of the Hebrews; the Pharaoh (says Rosellini, Mon. Storici, i, 294 sq.) was Ramesses II, son of Sethos I, who gave one of the cities his own name. (Comp. Ewald, Gesch. ii, 66, note.) Lepsius, art. Aegypten, in Herzog's Enzyklop., calls this "the weightiest confirmation," and in Chronol. der Ag., i, 867-868, enlarges upon this argument. Raamases, he says, at the eastern, as Pithom (Pithoymou) was certainly at the western end of the great canal known to be the work of Ramesses II, and the site of the city bearing his name is further identified with him by the granite group disinterred at Abu Kelab, in which the deified king sits enthroned between the gods Bes and Thoth. On a similar idea, he urges that the settlement in Palestine must have been subsequent to the conquests made in that country by Ramesses III, first king of the 20th dynasty. To this it may be replied, (1) that we have no clear information as to the route of the invaders; if it was either through the desert, along the coast of Egypt, or to the land of Zin (the Lebanons), perhaps, were not directly affected by it. (2) The expeditions so pompously described on the monuments (as in the Statistical Table of Karnak, Thothmes III, and similar recitals of the conquests of Ramesses II and III; also the account of the great campaign of the Mr. Bird, in Trans. of the E. S. Lit. ii, 817 sq.) certainly did not result in the permanent subjugation of the countries invaded. This is sufficiently shown by the fact that the conquests repeat themselves under different kings, and even in the same reign. Year by year the king with his army sets out on a gigantic rabitz, to return with spoil of cattle, slaves, and produce of the countries overrun. (3.) If the lands of the tribes were thus overrun, it may have been during one of the periods of servitude, in which case they suffered only as the vassals of their Canaanite overlords, or other foreigners. That this may probably have been the case is sufficient to deprive of all its force the argument derived from the silence of the monuments, and of the book of Judges.

There remains to be noticed one piece of documentary evidence which has quite recently been brought to light. Dr. R. H. Charles (Zeitschr. f. d. alt. u. neu. Testament, 1862, 4th dissertation, p. 114) re-prints what he calls that "one set of the Leyden hieratic papyri, now publishing by Dr. Leemans, consists of letters and official reports. In several of these, examined by M. Chabas, repeated mention is made of certain foreigners, called Apuraj, i. e. Hebrews, compelled by Ramses II to drag stones for the building of the city Raamses." In his Mélanges Egyptiens, 1862, 4th dissertation, M. Chabas calls them Aperu. It is certainly striking, as Mr. Birch remarks (in Revue Archéol. April, 1862, p. 291), that "in the three documents which speak of these foreigners, they appear exactly in the same kind of connection to which the Hebrews were subjected by the Egyptians; it is also important that the papyri were found at Memphis. But the more inviting the proposed identification, the more cautious one must be. It is best not to make the statement that in an Egyptian writing we may be that the name in Apetu; and as B and P have distinct characters, one does not see why the "b of "should be rendered by p. (The case of Epy had been is different; see below.) It seems, also, that the same name occurs as late as the time of Raamses IV, where it can hardly mean the Hebrews. Besides, the monument of Thothmes III above mentioned leads to quite a different conclusion. Where the evidence is so conflicting, the querier who seeks only truth, not the confirmation of a foregone conclusion, has no choice but to reserve his judgment.

The time of this Memephtha, so unhesitatingly proclaimed to be the Pharos of the Exodus, is placed beyond all controversy—so Bunsen and Lepsius maintain—by an invaluable piece of evidence furnished by the Theon, the Alexandria mathematician of the 4th century. In a passage of his unpublished commentary on the Almagest, first given to the world by Larcher (Herodot, ii, 553), and since by Biot (Sur la période Subélique, p. 18, 192 sq.), it is stated that the Soehi Cycle of Astronomical which, as it ended in A.D. 188, commenced in B.C. 1822 (20th July), was known in his time as "the era of Memephtha" (την ἑκατέρτον Μεμέφθης). There is no king of this name: read Μεμεφεχής—so we have Memephtha of the 19th dynasty, the king of the leper-story, the Exodus Pharos. Lepsius, making the return begin in B.C. 1328, places the exode at B.C. 1314 = 15 Memephtha, in accordance with the alleged thirteen years' retirement into Ethiopia and the return in the fourteenth or fifteenth year. Certainly the precise name Memephtha does not appear in the list; but that name may have been used for the purpose of distinguishing some particular king from others of the same name; and there is reason to think which was actually the case. (1.) The king Tethmosis or Thothmes III repeatedly appears on monuments with the addition to his royal legend Mem-ri, "Beloved of Re." With the article Mem-pr, and with the preposition Mem-ap-pr, which last is precisely Thoth's Memphite. (2.) The acknowledged confusion of names in that part of the 18th dynasty where this king occurs—Memephtha, Mem-pr, Akhuanames (Amenenem)—then Memphragousthous (A.A.E.F. of Josephus is evidently an error of copying for M. M. P.: in the list ibid. the 5th and 6th names are Μυροπρος, Μεσσαροδωμος)—is perhaps best explained by supposing that the king was known by his list as distinctively as well as his family name. (3.) In Pliny's notice of the obelisks (H. N. xxxvi, 64), that known to be of Thothmes III is said to belong to Memephtha, which, says Bunsen (iv, 180), "would be the popular distinctive name given to this Thothmes.

Just so! And in the statement of Theon the king is presented as a familiar person, the subject of popular distinction. It is not known to have been associated with a name, current among the Egyptians in the time of Antoninus, to the effect that the Soehi Cycle, then ending (A.D. 188), commenced in the reign of Thothmes III. The existence of popular distinction under such a tradition is attested by a number of scarabs, evidently of Roman workmanship, referring to the Soehi Cycle, and in which the royal legend of this monarch appears. These are sufficient grounds for believing that the Memephtha of Theon is no other than Thothmes III, and that his reign was supposed (rightly or wrongly) to include the year B.C. 1822. It may be, also, that when Herodotus was told that Meleae lived about 900 years before the time of his visit to Egypt—a date not very wide of B.C. 1227—Thothmes was named to him by his popular distinctive appellation Mem-pr, only confused with Mersanes, Prascho, of the Labyrinth and its Lake. (Other explanations of the name Memephtha may be seen in Böckh, Manetho, p. 691 sq.; Biot, Recherches, interprets it as the name of Memphite; Mem-woa, importing the name of the place, 20th July, the day of the rising of Sirius and epoch of the cycle, is true only for the latitude of Memphis.) What has been said is sufficient to show that there is no necessity for altering a letter of the name; consequently that the time of Memephtha is not defined by the authority of Theon. Dr. Rougé emphatically rejects Lepsius's notion of Memephtha (Rèv. Archéol. x. 664; Journal Asiatique, Aug. 1858, p. 268). He thinks the year 1822 lies in the reign of Raamses IV. In support of his date, B.C. 1314, for the exode, Lepsius (p. 695) has an account deduced from the modern Jewish chronology (Hillel's Mundane Ewv), in which he says that it is the precise year assigned to that event. Hillel, he is confident, was led to it by Memephtha's Egyptian tradition, which gave him the name of the Pharos, and this being obtained would easily give him the time. Bunsen, though finally settling on the year B.C. 1320, had previously declared with Lepsius for B.C. 1314, "decided by the circumstance that a tradition not compatible with the usual chronological systems of the Jews, but which cannot be accidental, places the exode near the date that the ancient astronomer, Apollonius of the Sedei Olan Rabbi, to admit of no doubt" (iv, 386). It admits of more than doubt—of absolute refutation. Hillel's whole procedure, from first to last, was simply Biblical. Daniel's prophecy of the seventy weeks gave him B.C. 425 for 11 Zeedekiah; thence up to 6 Hesekiah he found the sum = 183 years; for the kings of Israel the actual numbers were 345, of which he made 240 years; then 37 years of Solomon; 480 years of 1 Kings vi, 1, added to these, made the total 890 years, whence the date for the exode was B.C. 425 + 890 = 1315. But that this date, if correct, is only a probable date for the exode is demonstrable (Revue of Lepsias on Biblical Chronology, by H. Browne, in Arnold's Theolog, Critic, i, 59-59, 1851). Yet, though the process by which Hillel got his date is so transparent, it is spoken of as "an important tradition" by those who take ready-made conclusions second-hand, without inquiry into their real grounds. So Duncker, Gesch. des Alterthums, i, 196, note; Dr. Wil- liams, in Essays and Reviews, p. 68. It is alleged that an indication confirmatory of the low date assigned by these writers is furnished by the assertion of a monarch Memephtha, which occurs in connection with that history (Exod. xii, 2; xiii, 4; xxii, 16; xxxiv, 18; Deut. xvi). This argument proceeds on the presumption that Abih is the Hebraized form of the Egyptian Epyf, Copic Epyfis, of which the Arabic rendering is also Abih. The Egyptian

"a made-up thing, systematically carved to shape, and therefore really fabulous." Whether or not the original "Manetho," as some supposed, was confined to himself, and was convinced upon a cyclical plan, we have but the lists as they come to us finally from the hands of Annianus and Pandorus through Synesius. It may be observed, however, that the cardinal dates given by Dicranarchus, which we have from a dependent source, imply that the cyclical treatment of Egyptian chronology was at least as old as the alleged time of Manetho ("Cycles," etc., u., a., soc. 4, 16, 24, 36).

For literature additional to the above, see under Egypt; also Fruit, "Disertatorio Historica de Manethone" (Leyd. 1847, 4vo); Bickh, "Manetho," (3d ed.); A. H. von Sagona, "Manetho, di Origine unserer Gesch." (Gottha, 1865, 8vo); A. M. Prob. Rev. Jan. 1866, p. 180.

Manger is the rendering found in Luke ii, 7, 12, 16, of the term παρατήρητος, used to designate the place in which the infant Redeemer was cradled, which seems to denote a "crib" or "stall" for feeding cattle, as it is rendered in Luke xxi, 15 (see Horrell Miscell. Crit. Leon. 1788, bk. ii, ch. xvii). It is employed in the Sept. in a similar sense for the Heb. דַּעְנָה, Job xxxix, 9; Isa, 1, 8; also by Josephus, Ant. viii, 2, 4; comp. Lucan, Tim. p. 14; Xenophon, Eph. iv, 1. Gennadot (Beiträge zur Sprach- und characterenfrage, p. 229) is in favor of translating the word crèbe everywhere here, and quotes Ezek. xi, 16 (Lev. a. v.), Philo (De somnii, p. 872, b. ed. Colon. 1618), and Sybile. Eryth. (ap. Lactantius, vii, 24, 12) to that effect. Schleusner (Lex. a. v.) says it is any enclosure, but especially the vestibule to the house, where the cattle were encloset, not with walls, but with boards; but in common Greek the word undoubtedly often refers to a trough hollowed out to receive the food for horses, etc. (see Homer, Ι.L., 571; x, 568; xxiv, 280). The Peshito Version evidently so understands it. On the other hand, it is doubtful if such a contrivance as a proper manger could be found in the East, or was known to the khanhs or "inna" of the description alluded to in the text. See Caravanserai.

"Stables and mangers, in the sense in which we understand them, are of comparatively late introduction into the East (see the quotations from Charlin and others in Harmers Best, ii, 205), and, although they have furnished material to modern painters and poets, did not enter into the circumstances attending the birth of Christ, and are hardly less inaccurate than the "cradle" and the "stable" which are among some descriptive "heresies." We are therefore doubtful here to regard the term as designating the lodge or projection in the end of the room used as a stable, on which the hay or other food of the animals of travellers was placed. (See Strong's Harmony and Ezra, of the Gospels, p. 14.) Several of the stables mentioned stand for the purpose of "lying in a cave," and it was a "cave and stable" itself was in a cave, and the identical manger in which the infant Jesus is traditionally stated to have lain is still shown by the superstitions monks, being no other than a marble sarcophagus; but the whole story is at variance with the narrative in the Gospels. (See Mel- don, De pseuto Christi, Jan. 1662.) See BURTHELM. Tavernier, speaking of Aleppo, states that "in the ca- ravanserai, on each side of the hall, for persons of the best quality, there are lodgings for every man by him- self. These lodgings are raised all along the court, two, or three stories high, with just behind which are the stables, where many times it is as good lying as in the chambers. Right against the head of every horse there is a niche with a window into the lodging-chamber, out of which every man may see that his horse is looked after. These niches are usually so large that three men may lie in them, and here the servants dress their victuals." In modern Oriental farm-houses, however, something corresponding to a Western "manger" may be found.

"It is common to find two sides of the one room where the native farmer resides with his cattle fitted up with these mangers, and the remainder elevated a foot or two to the feet higher for the accommodation of the family. The mangers are built of small stones and mortar, in the shape of a box, or, rather, of a kneading-trough, and when goats, sheep, and other animals are kept there with hay in the summer, they do very well to lay little babies in" (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 89). See STABLE.

Mangey, Thomas, D.D., an English theologian, was born at Leeds in 1684; was educated at St John's College, Cambridge; held successively the livings of St Mildred, Bread Street, London; St Nicholas, Guildford, and St. Mithion, in Middlesex; in complaint to Dr. Robinson, bishop of London; in 1721 was presented to the fifth stall in the cathedral of Durham, and was advanced to the first stall in 1723; became D.D. in 1726, and died in 1755. Dr. Mangey published a number of Sermons, and three treatises. His most valuable edition of the works of Philo Judaeus: Philo Judaei Opera omnia que reperiri potuerunt (Lond. 1742, 2 vols. fol.).—Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Auth. a.v.; Hook, Eccles. Manhättains or Haagleitnerians: the name of a party in the Romish Church, especially in the archbishopric of Salzburg, from 1814 to 1829, whose founder and chief was a young priest named Caspar Haagleitner, of Hofgarten; and its most distinguished and active member was Sebastian Mani, of Westendorf (known also by the name of Manhart, from one of his estates). In 1814 he was appointed the prince-bishop of Chiemsee and the coadjutor of Salzburg as ecclesiastical authorities in the diocese. The clergy submitted with the exception of Haagleitner, who refused to recognise them, and showed symptoms of heresy. He left Hofgarten and went to Tyrol, where he created some religious and political troubles, and gained a number of followers. At the peace of Schönbrunn the Tyrol fell again into the hands of the French, and Haagleitner was taken a prisoner to Kuusstein and Salzburg. He finally succeeded in making good his escape; and when, in 1819, he recovered the Bavarian and a tyrol, he was appointed vicar at Wörgl. Here he continued his intrigue, and succeeded so well that the people came to consider him as the only true priest in the country, the others having failed to do their duty by submitting to the dictates of Napoleon. Manhart assisted Haagleitner greatly in propagating his doctrines in Westendorf, Hofgarten, and Kirchbichl, and their effect was felt even long after Haagleitner had been removed from Wörgl. Manhart held meetings in his own house, preaching himself, or allowing his wife to preach, as well as a woman from Hofgarten. The administrator of the diocese of Salzburg, and afterwards the archbishop Augustin Gruber, sought in vain to reconcile them with the Church; they were asked to be instructed by the pope himself in case they were in the wrong, and for this purpose the House went to Rome in 1825. The difficulty ended soon after.—Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, viii, 741.

Mānī (Māi, Vulg. Bami), given (1 Esdr. ix. 80) by error for Bani (q. v.) of the Heb. list (Exra x. 29).

Māni, Manōra, or Manōchōruṣ (entitled Zendik, Sadducee), the founder of the heretical sect of the Manicheans, is said to have flourished in the second half of the 3d century. Little is known with regard to his early history and accounts transmitted through two distinct sources—the Western or Greek, and the Eastern—are legendary and contradictory on almost every important point. According to the most probable supposition, he was a native of Persia, and was born about 214. His real name appears to have been Curbius, and his was the name of a rich man of Ctesiphon, who bought him when he was but seven years of age, and him carefully educated, and at her demise left him all her wealth. Among the books she left him is said to have found the writings of Scythianus, which has been given to her by one of the latter's disciples named Terebinthus, or Buḍa. —As Exeter, he is said to have been in Persia at this time in great ferment. The progress of Christianity had awakened the opposition of all the heathen religions from the Indus to the Euphrates. Persia was the most powerful among them. Mani, with the aid of the emperor, cast great terror among the Persians, and in the month of ChImpact he proclaimed himself to be the prophet promised by Christ. It is said that the attempt was looked upon with favor by king Sapor and by Hormizd, but this appears doubtful. Followers soon gathered, and three of the new sect—Thomas, Buddas or Addas, and Herman—propagated the doctrines, the first in Egypt and throughout the East Indies. Herman only was sent with Mani to assist him. While they were away the son of Sapor fell ill, and Mani, who had been highly spoken of as a physician, was called to attend him; but, not succeeding, he was thrown into prison. Mani bribed his keeper and succeeded in escaping, but was pursued and captured, and publicly executed.

There are other accounts, however, which make Mani the scion of a noble magian family, and a man of extraordinary mental powers and artistic and scientific abilities—an eminent painter, mathematician, etc. According to one account, he embraced Christianity, and became presbyter at a church in Ebrur or Abvajr, in the Persian province of Hazirdi. He purposed to purify Christianity of its alleged Jewish corruptions, to demonstrate its unity with Persia, and thereby to make the perfect universal religion. He gave himself out to be the Paraclete, and styled himself in ecclesiastical documents "Mani, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ through the election of God the Father. These are the words of salvation from the eternal and living Source." He was persecuted by king Sapor I., he sought refuge in foreign countries, went to India, China, and Turkistan, and there lived in a cave for twelve months, during which he claimed to have been in heaven. He reappeared with a wonderful book of drawings and pictures, called Erslshen or Erteken-Mani. Nothing doubt during his residence in these countries he was acquainted with Buddhism, and had decided to incorporate some of its best points in his syncretistic religion (comp. Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, i, 288 sq.). After the death of Sapor (A.D. 272) he returned to Persia, where Hormes, the new king, who was well inclining to religion, received him with favor, and, in order to protect him more effectually against the persecutions of the magi, gave him the stronghold of Dehshereh, in Susiana, as a residence. After the death of this king, however, Bahram, his successor, entrapped Mani into a public disputation with the magi, for which purpose he invited to his castle; but he was seized and flayed alive, A.D. 277. His skin was stuffed and hung up as a terror at the gates of the city Jondishapur.

Among the works of Mani may be reckoned four books, sometimes ascribed to Terebinthus and sometimes to Scythianus, entitled the Mysteries, the Chapters or Heads, the Gospel, and the Treasure. In the Mysteries Mani endeavored to demonstrate the doctrine of two principles from the mixture of good and evil which is found in the world. He grounded his reason on the argument that if there were one sole cause, simple, perfect, and good, and the highest degree of being, corresponding with the nature and will of that cause, would show simplicity, perfection, and goodness, and everything would be immortal, holy, and happy like himself. The Chapters contained a summary of the chief articles of the Manichaean scheme. Of the gospels nothing certain can be asserted. Beausebre, apparently without sufficient grounds, considers it as a collection of the meditations and pretended revelations of Mani. The Treasure, or Treasure of Life, may, perhaps, have derived its name from the treasure hid in a field wherein he proposed to bury the same.
have fragments still extant in St. Augustine, who undertook to refute it. His works appear to have been original, and the doctrine, so far as we know it, seems to have been extinguished. For his doctrine, etc., see Manichæism. (J. H. W.)

Manichæism. As we have seen in the life of Mani (q. v.), the origin of Manichæism, as well as the history of its founder and propagator, is matter of obscure and confused tradition. Although it utterly disclaimed being denominational Christian, it was reckoned among the heretical doctrines of the Church. It was intended, as we have already indicated in the sketch of Mani, to blend the chief doctrines of Parseism, or rather Magism, as reformed by Zoroaster, with a certain number of Buddhist views, under the outward garb of Biblicism. Theologically speaking, it was a new, confused, explained allegorically and symbolically, was made to represent an entirely new religious system, and one wholly at variance with Christianity and its fundamental teachings (comp. Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, ii, 369 sq.; and see the references there for Lassem and others).

Doctrines.—Like Magism, Manichæism holds that there are two eternal principles from which all things proceed, the two everlasting kingdoms, bordering on each other—the kingdom of light under the dominion of God, and the kingdom of darkness under the demon or Ape (Pers. Beelde, the Evil), the Good, the Light, the Bad, the Matter, or Archon, each inhabited a region akin to their natures, and excluding each other to such a degree that the region of Darkness and its leader never knew of the existence of that of the Light. This dualism was in accordance with the teaching of the original doctrines of Christianity; it was condemned by the Council of Chalcedon. The zodiac and the twelve stages of the world—had sprung (emanated) from the Primeval Light; while “Darkness,” filled with the eternal fire, which burned but shone not, was peopled by “demons,” who were constantly fighting among themselves. In one of these contests, pressing towards the outer edge, as it were, of their region, they became aware of the neighboring region, and with this united attack, and succeeded in taking captive the ray of Light that was sent against them at the head of the hosts of Light, and which was the embodiment of the Ideal or Primal Man (Christ). A stronger son (the Holy Ghost) then hastened to the rescue, and redeemed the greater and better part of the captive Light (Jesus Immanuel). The smaller and fainter portion, however (Jesus Passibilia), remained in the hands of the powers of Darkness, and out of their power, that idea of God or man which has been the mortal man. But even the small fraction of light left in him (broken in two souls) would have prevailed against them had they not found means to further divide and subdivide it by the propagation of this man (Jesus) into the world—by concealing the Light by burying it under dark “forms of belief and faith, such as Paganism and Judaism.” Once more, however, the Original Light came to save the light buried in man—to deliver the captive souls of men from their corporeal prison. On this account there were created two sublimes beings, Christ and the Holy Ghost. Christ was sent into the world clothed with the shadowy form of a human body, and not with the real substance, to teach mortals how to deliver the rational soul from the corporeal body, and to overcome the power of malignant matter. But again the demons succeeded in defeating them by the rays of their light. Obscuring their minds, even those of the apostles, so that they could not fully understand Christ’s object, his career of salvation was cut short by the demons seducing man to crucify him. His sufferings and death were, naturally, only fictitious. He was suffered to remain in the state of the man he once was, and his crucifixion allowed himself to become an example of endurance and passive pain for his own, the souls of Light. But to carry out the intended salvation of men Christ, shortly before his crucifixion, gave the promise recorded by John (xvi, 15), that he would send to his disciples the Comforter, who would lead them into all truth. In his promise, the Manicheans maintain, was fulfilled in the person of Mani, who was sent by the God of Light to declare to all men the doctrine of salvation, without concealing any of its principles under the veil of metaphor, or under any other covering.

Mani, like Christ, surrounded himself with twelve apostles, and sent them into the world to teach and to preach his doctrine of salvation. To carry out his work more successfully, and to make converts also of the Jews, he rejected the authority of the Old Testament, which, he said, was the work of the God of Darkness, whom the Jews had worshipped in the place of Light, and also a good part of the New Testament, upon the ground that many of the books had been grossly interpolated, and were not the productions of the person whose names they bear. As strictly conforming only his own writings, and such parts of the New Testament as answered his purpose, he says Baur (Manich. Religionsystem, p. 576), “in the writings of the New Testament seemed to concur with the dualism set forth by Mani was accounted among the most genuine ingredients in the doctrines of Christianity, and Mani and his adherents were very glad to cite for the confirmation of their own doctrines and principles passages like Matt. vii, 18; xiii, 24; John i, 8; vii, 44; xiv, 50; 1 Cor. xiv, 4 (comp. Eph. xiv, 4, 7, 8); 1 Thess. iv, 7 (57, 58); and especially those in which the Apostle Paul makes the opposition between flesh and spirit. As they found, however, so much in the New Testament which not only did not confirm the Manichean doctrines, but stood in open opposition to them, they were obliged, in accordance with their principles, to introduce into the original doctrines of Christianity, to regard all passages of this kind as a distortion and falsification of Christianity. Accordingly, they laid down the rule that the written records of Christianity ought not to be received unless conditioned integrity and authenticity was subjected to a previous scrutiny, with a view to ascertain how far they exhibited the genuine substance of Christianity; and this was limited to those portions which bore the character of Manicheism, so that, following this criterion, whatever did not harmonize with their own doctrines was rejected without hesitation, because original Christianity could not contradict itself.”

Mani also taught that those souls which obeyed the laws delivered by Christ, as explained by himself, the Comforter, and struggled against the lusts and appetites of a corrupt nature, would, on their death, be delivered from the bonds of their spirits, and be clothed in the light and sun and moon—“the two light-ships for conducting the imprisoned light into the eternal kingdom of light”—would ascend to the regions of light; and that those souls which neglected to struggle against their corrupt appetites would either be sent to the regions of darkness or be captured by the demons of other beings, until they had expiated their guilt. Belief in the evil of matter led to a denial of the doctrine of the resurrection. “These ideas,” says Donaldson (Christian Orthodoxy, p. 148), “they (the Manicheans) worked out in a manner peculiar to themselves, and with results decidedly unfavorable to the integrity and authenticity of the New Testament. They could accept neither the doctrine nor the facts of revelation, unless they could regard them as a reflex of their own dualism. Without wishing to reject Christianity, they made their own system the standard of measurement, and lop-sidedly appreciated the religion of the Occident, in which it did not fit the religion of light and darkness. The identification of Christ with Mithras led, of course, to a profession of Docetism, namely, to the assertion that our Lord’s sufferings on the cross were not real, but apparent only. One has that had no real human body, no double nature, but only a fantastic semblance of corporeity, in which his essence, as the Son of Everlasting Light, was presented to the eyes of men. Accordingly, Christ had no human birth, and his apparent sufferings were really inflicted on him by his enemy, the Spirit of Darkness; and in this resolving the life of Jesus into a series of Illusory appearances, the Manicheans take from Chris-Manichaeism

Manichaeism is a religious movement that emerged in the 3rd century CE, founded by the Persian prophet Mani. It was a dualistic religion that believed in a conflict between good and evil, with the ultimate goal of achieving salvation through knowledge and spiritual development. Manichaeism spread throughout the ancient world, influencing various cultures and religions.

Characteristics of Manichaeism

1. Dualism: Manichaeism is based on the concept of dualism, which posits a fundamental conflict between light and darkness. This dualism is seen in all aspects of life, from the natural world to human society.

2. Gnostic Elements: Manichaeism incorporates elements from Gnosticism, a form of early Christianity that emphasized the material world as a prison of evil. Manichaeism teaches that humans are locked in this prison and must escape through knowledge and spiritual development.

3. Manichaean Gospels: The Manichaean Gospels are a unique collection of religious texts that were written in various languages, including Syriac, Coptic, and Greek. These texts contain the teachings of Mani and his followers.

4. Manichaean Art: Manichaeism also had a significant impact on art and architecture, with many examples of Manichaean art found in churches and other religious buildings.

5. Manichaean Cosmology: Manichaeism has a complex cosmology that is based on the dualism of light and darkness. The universe is divided into two realms, each ruled by a deity: the Celestial Father, who is associated with light, and the Illuminator, who is associated with darkness.

6. Manichaean History: Manichaeism spread rapidly in the early centuries of the Christian era, and its influence can be seen in various cultures throughout the world. However, it was eventually suppressed by the early church, and its followers were often persecuted.

7. Manichaean Symbols: The Manichaeans used many symbols to represent their beliefs, including the Cross, which was seen as a symbol of the conflict between light and darkness.

8. Manichaean Practices: Manichaeism had a strict set of practices that its followers were expected to follow, including celibacy, poverty, and asceticism.

Manichaeism was a significant religious movement that had a lasting impact on the development of various cultures and religions. Its teachings and symbols continue to influence modern thought and philosophy.

Manipa, the name of a monstrous idol worshipped in India. The name of Tangu and Mani, a king of Katury. It has nine heads, which rise pyramidal, there being three in the first and second row, then two, and one at the top of all. A bold, resolute young fellow, dressed in armor, and prompted by enthusiastic courage, on certain days of the year, runs about the city Tanchath, and kills every one he meets in honor of his god. By such outrageous sacrifices as these the devotees imagine they extremely oblige Manipa.—Kircher, China illustr.; Broughton, Bibliothec Hist. Sac. s. v.

Maniple, an article of dress introduced when the use of the stole as a handkerchief fell into disuse. It now represents the cord with which our Lord was bound to the pillar at his scourging.—Walcott, Sac. Archael. s. v.; Siegel, Archael. s. v. Maniple.

Manitou is the name of any object used as a fetish or amulet among some tribes of the American Indians—those of the North and North-west. "The Illinois," wrote the Jesuit Marest, "ador a sort of genius which they call the Manitou; to them it is the substance of the earth, the spirit that rules all things. A bird, a buffalo, a bear, a feather, a skin—that is their Manitou." "If the Indian word manitou," says Pallfrey, "appeared to denote something above or beside the common aspects and agencies of nature, it might be natural, but it would be rash and misleading to confound its import with the Christian, Mohammedan, Jewish, Egyptian, or Greek conception of the Deity, or with any compont or selection from some or all of these ideas." Manley, IRA, a Congregational minister and home missionary, was born about the year 1780; was a graduate of Middlebury College, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and left a fine practice to enter the ministry. He was a home missionary for sixty years, and a pioneer in all good enterprises. The last twenty years of his life were spent in Wisconsin. He died at Keene, Essex County, N. Y., Feb. 6, 1871. —New Amer. Cyclop. 1871, p. 569.

Man'ius, the name of one of the ambassadors who is said to have written a letter to the Jews confirming whatever concession Lydias had granted them. Four letters were written to the Jews, of which the last is from "Quintus Memmius and Titus Manlius (Gr. Tiroo Masion Tifos, Eng. Titus Manlius), ambassadors (σπευδόρατος) of the Romans" (2 Macc. xii, 34). There is not much doubt that the letter is a fabrication, as history is entirely ignorant of these names. Polybius (Relig. xxxi, 6, 5), for about eighteen times quotes and Maimon Sergius who were sent to Antiochus IV Epiphanes about B.C. 163, and also (Relig. xxxi, 12, 9) Cn. Octavius, Spurius Lucretius, and L. Aurelius, who were sent into Syria in B.C. 162 in consequence of the contention for the guardianship of the young king Antiochus. Antiochus V Eupator, the successor of T. Manlius, received the same treatment as T. Manlius, and Polybius, Relig. xxxii, 1, 2. The employment of this Seleucid era (B.C. 160), and in this year there was a consul of the name of T. Manlius Torquatus, who appears to have been sent on an embassy to Egypt about B.C. 164, to mediate between the two Ptolemies, Philadelphus and Euergetes (Livy, xilii, 11, y. Polybius, Relig. xxxii, 1, 2). The employment of this Seleucid era as a date, the absence of the name of the city, and especially the fact that the first intercourse of the Jews and Romans did not take place two years later, when Judas heard of the fame of the Romans (1 Macc. vili, 9) makes it altogether impossible that the document is from authentic.

The three other letters do not merit serious attention (2 Macc. xii, 10-33). See Wernwag, De fad. Lib. Mac.

Manly, BASHI, D.D., a Baptist divine and educator of note, was born in Chatham County, N. C., Jan. 28, 1796. At the age of sixteen he became a member of a Baptist Church, and not long after began speaking in public, though he was not regularly licensed till 1818. He preached his first sermon in Beaufort, S. C., and must have made a favorable impression, for he at once received an offer of aid from a society for the education of ministers, and commenced his studies. In December, 1819, he entered the junior class in South Carolina College, and graduated with the highest honor in 1821. He immediately entered into an engagement to preach in the Edgefield District, and was ordained in March, 1822. A Church was formed at Edgefield Court-house about a year later, of which he was pastor for three years, gaining for the denomination a reputation as a powerful preacher in South Carolina. He was called in 1826 to the pastorate of the Baptist Church in Charleston, and continued there eleven years, during which time he not only sustained and extended his reputation as a preacher, but was active in the cause of liberal and theological education, effecting the establishment of which is now known as King's College, South Carolina University, at Greenville, S. C. At that period theological instruction was included in the plans of this and similar institutions. Dr. Manly lived to see the Baptist of the South concentrate their energies upon the establishment and support of a single theological seminary. He took a lively interest in this matter, partly, no doubt, from a sense of the disadvantages under which he had himself labored; for, though a good scholar, he was a self-educated theologian. He was chosen in 1887 to the presidency of the University of Alabama, and administered offices for about eighteen years with eminent ability and success. In 1855 he returned to Charleston, and to the pastoral office over one of the four churches that now existed in place of the one to which he had formerly ministered. He was subsequently engaged as a missionary and evangelist in Alabama, and as a pastor at Montgomery. He died at Greenville, S. C., Dec. 21, 1868. As a preacher, Dr. Manly was eminently popular. His discourses, though instructive and convincing, were also charged with the elements of emotional power, and, with all his success as a preacher, this was the work in which he was most delighted. Dr. Manly wrote a "treatise on Moral Science," which was for years a text-book in Southern colleges. It indicated MANN, Cyrus, an American Congregational minister and author, was born at Oxford, N. H., April 8, 1785; was educated at Dartmouth College (class of 1806); was principal of Gilmanton Academy two years; teacher of the Troy high-school one year; city schoolmaster from 1810 to 1814; pastor of the Church at Westminster, Mass., from 1815 to 1841; then of Robinson Church, Plymouth, three years; next a teacher at Lowell several years; finally, from 1832 to 1836 acting pastor of the North Falmouth Church. He died at Shrewsbury, Mass., Feb. 9, 1859. M. Mann published An Epitome of the Evidences of Christianity:—History of the Temperance Reformation:—Memoir of Mrs. Myra W. Allen; and some Sermons.—Dake, Dict. of Amer. Biog. p. 595.

Mann, Horace, L.L.D., one of the most prominent educators in our country, a philanthropist whose name deserves to be honored by every American,—"a soul whose life was a galvanic thrill along the muscles of our age"—was born, of very humble parentage, at Franklin, Mass., May 4, 1796. Though not privileged with the advantages of a careful training in his early boyhood, he yet managed to acquire a good knowledge of the so-called "common branches." At the age of twenty he resolved to secure for himself the advantages of a collegiate training. His instructors hitherto, they tell us, he had found to be "very good people, always willing to give him what was necessary for his health, never strong, and now undermined by a life of the most intense and unremitting activity. The fiery soul consumed the body at last, Aug. 2, 1859.

Mann on the Relation of Religion to Education.—Mr. Mann had been reared under the influence of the Calvinistic faith. While yet a youth he had cherished an aversion to this orthodoxy because, as he tells us, it had taught him to look upon God as "infinite Malignity personified." When, at the mature age of forty, just as he entered on his work as an educator, he fell in with Combe's Constitution of Man, he at once became a convert. From that time on, he taught, as an anthropological, and philosophical and moral doctrines, the prevalence of which would, in his view, "produce a new earth and not a new heaven." Believing what is called the "evangelical faith," at that time ruling New England, to be in its influence derogatory to the character of God, and dawning and enabling to the mind of man, he conceived it to be his task to vindicate the former and to emancipate the latter. Especially he reproved his countrymen's "foul spirit of orthodoxy," so far as it entered the domain of the public schools, and this he believed to be "the greatest discovery ever made by man." "Other social organizations," he says, "are curative and remedial; this is a preventive and antidote. There is no form of the Physical mode of teaching, the physical and moral frame invaluable to them. Let the common school be expanded to its capabilities, let it be worked with the efficiency of which it is susceptible, and nine tenths of the crimes in the penal code will be abolished—men would walk more safely by day—every pillow would be more inviting by night—property, life, and character held by a stronger tenure all rational hopes respecting the future brightened. It was obvious that these glowing anticipations were born of something more, if not better, than reading, writing, and arithmetic. "Education was, in Mann's view, a word of much higher import than that popularly given to it.

"It is a function to call out from within all that was diviously placed there, to develop the truth that the present 'generation has had." Herein lay the greatest defect of the system he sought to establish in our schools.
Stamping with the name of bigotry all religious views that did not coincide with his own, regarding orthodox-ly as the great thyroid by which man was enslaved, he would introduce a system of Christian education based on a doctrine respecting virtue and vice, rewards and penalties, time and eternity, constituting the basis of his theories and schemes of popular education, which meant nothing else than the substitution of natural religion for the moral. How far his system attained to this aim we may judge by the prevalence of the doctrines of the so-called "liberal theology" in the Eastern States, particularly in Massachusetts. In the West he must certainly have been disappointed. Though more than a thousand schools sat at his feet in Antioch, he was only in a very moderate degree succeeding in spreading "a religionism from whose features the young would not turn away." But if Mr. Mann failed in meeting that success which a person of his indomitable will, uncommon energy, and rare acquirements must have looked for and desired, we would not in the least detract from the value of his labors in behalf of education among the masses, and the greatness of his services to commonschool education in America.

Besides his annual reports, a volume of lectures on education, and voluminous controversial writings, his principal work is Slavery. Letters and Sketches (Boston, 1851). Since his death all his writings have been published and published by his wife, under the title The 5vo). See Life of Horace Mann, by his wife (Boston, 1865, 12mo); Thomas, Dict. Biog. and Mythol.; Princetes's Biog.; 1866 (Aug.). (J. H. W.)

Mann, William, D.D., an American educator of note, was born in Burlington County, N. J., about the year 1784. While young he was placed in a printing-office, where he remained until his fourteenth year.
Though unable to attend school a single day, he acquired a thorough education by private study. He was consecrated in his 25th year, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and shortly after became a local preacher.
The principal part of his life after this time was devoted to teaching. He was for some years principal of Mt.
Holly Academy, in his native state. Subsequently he removed to Philadelphia, where he maintained a high reputation for his success in teaching the classics. The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by Dickinson College. He died in Philadelphia July 4, 1867.—New Am. Cyclop. 1867, p. 567.

Manna (מָנָה, man, according to Gesenius, a portion, from the Arabic; but a different derivation is alluded to in the passage where it first occurs [see Thyn, De oriigine voca Manna, etc., Vitebm, 1641.]), the name given to a species of grass which was requisite to be declared by the Israelites to eat. It was the usual food for forty years during their wanderings in the desert.
The same name has in later ages been applied to some natural productions, chiefly found in warm, dry countries, but which have little or no resemblance to the original manna. This is first mentioned in Exod. xvi.
It is there described as being first produced after the eighth encampment in the desert of Sin, as white like hoar frost (or of the color of biellium, Numb. xi, 7), round, and of the bigness of coriander seed (pud).
It fell with the dew every morning, and when the dew was exhaled by the heat of the sun, the manna appeared alone, lying upon the ground or the rocks round the encampment of the Israelites. "When the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, What is it for them, seeing they knew not what it was" (Exod. xvi, 15). In its usage and supposed effect, much has been inaccurately translated—which, indeed, is apparent from the other two parts of the sentence contradicting each other ("It is manna; for they wist not what it was"). The word occurs again in Exod. xvi, 15, 31, 33, 35; Numb. xi, 6, 7, 9; Deut. vii, 20; 13; Josh. vii, 2; 15; Judges vii, 20; 1 and lxviii, 24. In the Sept. the substance is almost always called manna (μαννα), and so the N. Test. always: John vi, 31, 49, 58; Heb. iv, 4; Rev. ii, 17; also the Apocrypha, Wisd. xvi, 20, 21) instead of man (μᾶς, Exod. xvi, 31, 32, 35). Josephus (Ant. iii, 1, 6), in giving an account of this substance, thus sounds with the textual etymology: "The Hebrews call this food manna (μαννα), for the particle man (μᾶς) in our language is the asking of a question, 'What is this?'" (Heb.
 CLLūM "םמוא, man-ns.) Moses answered this question by telling them, "This is the bread which the Lord hath given you." (Exod. xvi, 29, 30). We are further informed that the manna fell every day, except on the Sabbath. Every sixth day, that is on Friday, there fell a double quantity of it. Every man was directed to gather an omer (about three English quarts) for each member of his family; and the woman was afterwards to have been measured out at the rate of an omer to each person: "He who gathered much had nothing over, and he who gathered little had no lack." That which remained ungathered dissolved in the heat of the sun, and was lost. The quantity collected was intended for the food of the cur-cent day only; if any were kept till the morrow, it corrupted and bred worms. Yet it was directed that a double quantity should be gathered on the sixth day for consumption on the Sabbath. It was found that the manna kept for the Sabbath remained sweet and wholesome. It was also observed, that it corrupted at other times if kept for more than one day. The same maner as they would have treated grain, they reduced it to meal, kneaded it into dough, and baked it into cakes, and the taste of it was like that of wafers made with honey or of fresh oil. In Numb. xi, 6—9, where the description of the manna is repeated, an omer is mentioned as being directed to be preserved as a memorial to future generations, "that they may see the bread wherewith I have fed you in the wilderness;" and in Josh. v, 12 we learn that after the Israelites had encamped at Gilgal, and "did eat of the old corn of the land, the manna ceased on the morrow after, neither had the children of Israel manna any more."

This miracle is referred to in Deut. vii, 9; Neh. ix, 20; Ps. lxviii, 24; John vi, 31, 49, 58; Heb. iv, 4.
Though the manna of Scripture was so evidently miraculous, both in the mode and in the quantities in which it was produced, and though its properties were so different from anything with which we are acquainted, yet, because its taste is in Exodus said to be like that of wafers made with honey, many writers have thought that they recognized the manna of Scripture in a sweet-ish exudation which is found on several plants in Arabia and Persia. The name manna, or mamos, is applied to this substance by the Arab writers, and was probably so applied even before their time. But the term is now almost entirely appropriated to the sweetish exudation of Fruicus rotundifolius, a plant which is called in the Arabic language Fraxinus rotundifolia. These, however, have no relation to the supposed manna of Scripture. Of this one kind is known to the Arabs by the name of guzybion, being the produce of a plant called gzuz, which is ascertained to be a species of Fruicus. The same species seems also to be called türfa, and is common in different parts of the coast of Arabia. It is also found in the neighborhood of Mount Sina. Berchuard, while in the valley wady el-Shaik, to the north of Mount Serbal, says: "In many parts it was thickly overgrown with the tamarisk or tarfa; it is the only valley in the Peninsula where this tree grows at present in any quantity, though some small bushes are here and there met with in other parts. It is from the tarfa that the manna is obtained; and it is very strange that the fact should have remained unknown in Europe till M. Seetzen mentioned it in a brief notice of his 'Tour to Sinai,' published in the Mines de l'Orient. The substance is called by the Arabs waasa. In the month of June it drops from the thorns of the tamarisk upon the fallen twigs, leaves, and thorns which always cover the ground beneath the tree in the natural state. The Arabs use it as they do honey, to pour over their unleavened bread, or to dip their bread into; its taste is agreeable, somewhat aromatic, and as sweet as honey. If eaten in any quantity it is said to be highly purgative." He further adds that the tamarisk is one of the most common trees in Nubia and throughout the whole of Arabia; on the Euphrates, on the Astaboras, in all the valleys of the Hejaz and Heja it grows in great quantities, yet nowhere but in the region of Mount Sinai did he hear of its producing manna. Ehrenberg has examined and described this species of tamarisk, which he calls T. masnifera, but which is considered to be only a variety of T. gallica. The manna he considers to be produced by the puncture of an insect which he calls Coccus mannisparus. Others have been of the same opinion. When Lieut. Welsted visited this place in the month of September, he found the extremities of the twigs and branches retaining the peculiar sweetness and flavor which characterize the manna. The Bedouins collect it early in the morning, and, after straining it through a cloth, place it either in skins or gourds; a considerable quantity is consumed by themselves; a portion is sent to Cairo, and some is also disposed of to the monks at Mount Sinai. The latter retail it to the Russian pilgrims. "The Bedouins assured me that the whole quantity collected throughout the Peninsula, in the most fruitful season, did not exceed 150 wgas (about 700 pounds); and that it was usually disposed of at the rate of 60 dollars the wga." (Traves in Arab. i, 511).

Another kind of manna, which has been supposed to be that of Scripture, is yielded by a thorny plant very common from the north of India to Syria, which by the Arabs is called Al-agyi, whence botanists have constructed the name Albagii. The two species have been called Albagii Maurorum and A. desertorum. Both species are also by the Arabs called saker-kher, or "camel's-thorn;" and in Mesopotamia agal, according to some authorities, while by others this is thought to be the name of another plant. The Albagii Maurorum is remarkable for the exudation of a sweetish juice, which concretes into small granular masses, and is usually distinguished by the name of Persian manna. The late professor Don was so confident that this was the same substance as the manna of Scripture that he proposed calling the plant itself Manna Hebrew. The climate of Persia and Bokhara seems also well suited to the secretion of this manna, which in the latter country is employed as a substitute for sugar, and is imported into India for medicinal use through Caubul and Khurasan.

In Arabian and Persian works on Materia Medica it is called Furunculis. These two, from the localities in which they are produced, have alone been thought to be the manna of Scripture. But, besides these, there are several other kinds of manna. Burckhardt, during his journey through El-Ghor, in the valley of the Jordan, heard of the Beiruk honey. This is described as a substance obtained from the leaves and branches of a tree called Gork or Caravakh, of the size of an olive-tree, and with leaves like those of the poplar. When fresh this grayish-colored exudation is sweet in taste, but in a few days it becomes sour. The Arabs eat it like honey. One kind, called Shir-kiski, is said to be produced in the country of the Uzbekies. A Caubul merchant is-formed Dr. Boyle that it was produced by a tree called Gundeldeh, which grows in Candahar, and is about twelve feet high, with jointed stems. A fifth kind is produced on Calotropis procera, or the plant called Ashur. The sweet exudation is by Arab authors ranked with sugar, and called Shukur-al-ashur. It is described under this name by Avicenna, and in the Liber de素质兹物um it is called Zemawal-dusur. A sixth kind, called Bedd-bkhish, is described in Persian works on Materia Medica as being produced on a species of willow in Persian Khoorassan. Another kind would appear to be produced on a species of oak, for Niebeluh says, "At Merdin, in Mesopotamia, it only eats the kind of oak not included in the larval food of the tree called Ballot et Ajis (or, according to the Aleppo pronunciation, Ajas), which I take to be of the oak family. All are agreed that between Merdin and Diarbekir manna is obtained, and principally from those trees which yield gall-nuts." But the most remarkable sweetish exudation found on the larch, which is called Manna brunitica, as there is also one kind found on the cedar of Lebanon. Indeed a sweetish secretion found on the leaves of many other plants, produced observed on rose-water and according to Col. Chesney, "The most remarkable production in ancient Assyria is the celebrated vegetable known here by the name of manna, which in Turkish is most expressively called Kudret-el-Esna, or 'the divine sweetmeat.' It is found on the leaves of the dwarf oak, and also, though less plentifully and scarcely so good, on those of the tamarisk and several other plants. It is occasionally deposited on the sand, and also on rocks and stones. The latter is of a pure white color, and appears to be more esteemed than the tree manna. It is collected chiefly at two periods of the year, first in the early part of spring, and again towards the end of au-Manna is the emblem or symbol of immortality (Rev.

Mannheimer, Isak Noa, one of the most cele-bated of modern Jewish pulpit orators and theologians, was born at Copenhagen, Denmark, Oct. 17, 1788.
His father was the reader of the synagogue of the Danish capital, and, anxious to afford his Isak all the advantages of modern culture, placed the child in a school at the tender age of three years and a half. When only nine years old, Isak was introduced to the study of the Talmud, and at the age of responsibility (thirteen) was sent to Germany to study the Talmud in a traditional state. As a youth he studied the Talmud at Berlin, and his secular studies, also, he made rapid progress, and promised much for the future. In 1808 he entered the academy, and by 1814 he was ready to pass his examination for admission to the university. Here he deduced himself to the study of philosophy, philosophy, and the Oriental languages. Scarcely had his course been completed when the government offered him employment as catechist of the Jewish society of his native place; he accepted the proffered position, and served his people to their great satisfaction. About this time the reformation movements among the Jews of Northern Europe were taking place, and Mannheimer became one of the leaders in the progressive step. He was es-specially encouraged by a personal acquaintance with the German-Jewish reformer Jacobson, whom he met in Berlin, whither he was sent on a mission from the Jews of the Temple. But, by the interference of the government, the reform movement was greatly barred there. and, after a vain struggle with the orthodox, he accepted a call from Vienna in 1824, and removed to the Austrian capital in June, 1825. Austria, which was always slow to grant religious liberty to non-thenomists, was not and not up to this time recognized the Jews as a religious sect, and, without authority to act as pastor, Mannheimer was called to perform substantially similar duties in the official capacity of "principal of the Religious School" ("Dиректор der Wiener Kaiserlich Königl. öf-tenischen israelitischen Religionsschule"). Though personal-decidedly in favor of the reform movement in-agurated by Jacobson and others, he felt it his duty, in this respect, to assume the conservative position, and, by his moderation and wisdom succeeded in building up one of the best Jewish congregations in Germany.

His great oratorical talent did much to swell the number of his auditors, but his success as a leader of the Jews of the Austrian capital is due solely to his determination "to produce no ripples in the Jewish camp." He served his people faithfully to the end of his terrestrial course.

March 17, 1865. His influence on the Jews of Germany, however, still remains, and will be felt for years to come.

During the stormy days of 1848 he represented his people in the nation's council, as a deputy from Lemberg (Vienna). His humane principles are manifest in his expressions for the abolition of capital punishment.

"Isaak Nos Mannheimer," says Grätz (Gesch. d. Juden xi, 438), "might be called the embodied nobility of the Jews. He was a perfect man. . . . The inner and outer man were one, as was the wisdom, the love, the life and practical safety, poetical talent and sober sense; childlike goodness and hitting sarcasm, gushing oratory and earnest charity, love for Judaism and a special liking for reform, were in his being most harmoniously blended in."

Mann was one of the few Hebrew writers among his Hebrew brethren. Unfortunately, however, but few of his sermons were ever printed. For a list of them see Kayserling, Bibliothek jüd. Kultursehner, Jahrgang i (Berl.

1870), p. 291. His other works consist of a translation of the Jewish Prayer-book for Sabbath and holy-days (Nidur and Mordker), a few polemical tracts, and a translation of part of the Bible for Solomon's German version.

For the study of homiletics his sermons are valued by both Christian and Jewish divines. See, be-

Manning, James, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Elizabeth-town, N. J., Oct. 22, 1788, and was educated at Princeton College (class of 1762). Soon after the completion of his course, he was ordained as pastor of a Baptist Church in Morristown, N. J., but he remained only a year, and then became pastor of the Baptist Church in Warren, R. I. During his ministy there he instituted a Latin school, which seems to have been one of the great bloomers of the summer of 1762. He was afterward pastor of the Brown University, having been chiefly instrumental in the procuring of the charter in 1764. He was appointed its first president and professor of language in 1765, when the college went into operation at Warren, whence it was removed to Providence in 1770, and was given the name it now bears. President Manning remained connected with the college until his death, July 29, 1791. During his residence at Providence, however, he was also pastor of a church for twenty years, absenting himself only for some six months in 1772. He was a member of the General Assembly of Congress for Rhode Island.

"Dr. Manning was equally known in the religious, political, and literary world. Nature had given him distinguished abilities. The resources of his genius seemed adequate to all duties and occasions. He was of a kind and benevolent disposition, social and communicative in habit, and excelling in manners. His life was a scene of labor for the benefit of others. His piety, and his fervent zeal in preaching the Gospel, evinced his love to God and man. With a most graceful form, a dignified and majestic appearance, his address was manly, familiar, and engaging, his voice harmonious and his manners becoming. He was the acknowledged head of the college; not for a moment did he lose his grip on the church; yet, with all his powers, he was the mild, yet energetic. He lived beloved and died lamented, beyond the lot of ordinary men. The good order, learning, and respectability of the Baptist churches in the Eastern States, under God, are much owing to his personal influence, and assiduous attention to their welfare" (Benedict, ii, 186). See Guild Manus, according to Tactius, the name given by the Germans to the son of the earth-born god Tisco.

From his three sons they derived their three great tribes, the Ingavones, the Isakavones, and the Hermiones.

Manus belongs, not to the Teutonic people alone, but to the great mythus of the origin of the human race, common to the whole Aryan family, and, like the Hinde Manus, the name is esteemed as a symbol for the inhabitants of the earth endowed with reason.

The name is derived from the Aryan root man-, to Manno 'th (Heb. Manno'îch, 1757, rest, as in Gen.

vii, 9, and often; Sept. Marni; Josephus Marwysy, iv, v, 6, 7, where the Biblical narrative is greatly embroidered).—Manno was the father of Samsam, of the tribes of Dan, and a native of Zorah (Judg. xiii, 22-23; xvi, 31). B.C. 115. The narrative of the Bible (xiii.

1-28), of the circumstances which preceded the birth of Samsam, supplies us with very few and faint traces of Manno's character or habits. He seems to have had some occupation which separated him during part of the day from his wife, though that was not field-work, because it was in the field that his wife was found by the angel during his absence. He was hospitable, as his forfather Abraham had been before him; he was a worshipper of Jehovah, and reverent even to a degree of fear. We hear of Manoah once again in connection with the marriage of Samson and the Philistine of Tim-nath. His father and his mother communed with him thereon, but to no purpose (xiv, 2, 3). They then accompanied him to Timnath, both on the preliminary visit and to the marriage itself. (Judg. xvi, 9, 10, 11)

Manoah appears not to have survived his son: not he, but Samsam's brothers, went down to Gaza for the body of the hero, and bringing it up to the family tomb between Zorah and Eshtaol, reunited the father to the son (xxvi, 31) whose birth had been the subject of so many prayers and so much anxiety. Milton, however, does not take this view. In Samson Agonistes Manoah bears a prominent part throughout, and lives to bury his son.

See Samson.

Manse, the Scottish name synonymous with our word "parish." It was chosen to do honor to Scotland and corporations with unswa-dowed churches, is the property of the Church, erected and maintained by it. In the Established Church it is built and maintained by law, and belongs to the heritors.

Dunlop says, "While manes and houses which had belonged to the popish clergy were still standing, these manse's manse in the church, nor was he resorted to an order of designation, similar to that prescribed by the act of 1588 as to glebes, seems to have been followed.

See Glebe. A minister accordingly was not allowed to have a manse designed to him within the precincts of an abbey or bishop's palace if there was another or vicar's manse in the church; nor was he entitled to any house which, though erected on Church lands, had not of old belonged to any kirkman, or incumbent serving at the church. Where there is none a manse in a parish

Digitized by Google
the minister is entitled to have designed to him by the presbytery of the bounds half an acre of land for the manse, offices, and garden, and to have the heritors ordained to erect a manse and offices thereon. The statutes regarding manses require that they shall be situated near the parish church; and in general the manse and glebe are contiguous. The presbytery are, of course, in the formation of a new manse, entitled, in the first instance, to fix its situation; and even in the case of an old manse to be rebuilt they may fix on a new situation, always, of course, within the ground or glebe allotted to the minister. The act of 1655 provides that where complete houses or buildings are sold by the minister, he shall build competent manses to his ministers, the expenses thereof not exceeding one thousand pounds, and not being beneath five hundred merks; and it has been questioned whether, in respect of the phrase "competent manses," heritors can be compelled to expend a greater sum than one thousand pounds Scots on the erection of a manse." Hill says, "The law of Scotland provides the minister of every country parish with a dwelling-house, called a manse, a garden, a glebe of not less than four acres of arable land, designed out of lands in the parish, at the expense of the ministers above the glebe, for one horse and two cows; and with the out-houses necessary for the management of his small farm. As the act of James VI, par. 3, c. 48, declares that the manse and glebe shall be marked and designed by the archbishop, bishop, superintendent, or commissioner of congregations, or such minister as shall be appointed, with two or three of the most knowing and discreet men of the parish, build competent manses to the ministers; and as, by the settlement of presbyterian government in Scotland, the presbytery has come in place of the bishop, all applications concerning manse and glebes are made, in the first instance, to the presbytery of the bounds. After taking the regular steps suitable to the nature of the business, which, as a civil court specially constituted for that purpose, are called to discuss, the presbytery pronounce a decree; and various passages of the act determine this discussion before the Court of Session, is binding upon all concerned." Prior to the Reformation, canon xiii ordained that every parish should have a dwelling for the minister, built at the expense of the parsons and their clergy; but it afterwards became a heavy burden on the vicars. By the General Assembly of 1663 ministers having manses were required to live in them.

Mansel, Henry Longueville, one of the leading English divines of our day, noted particularly for his ability as a philosopher of the Hamiltonian school, was born in 1820 in the parish of Cosgrove, Northamptonshire, of which his father was then rector. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and later at St. John's College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1843. He was shortly after ordained, and served the Church in various parishes until 1856, when he was appointed reader in moral and metaphysical philosophy at Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1859 became the Wykeham professor. In 1867 he was made regius professor of ecclesiastical history, and at the same time also canon of Christ Church, Oxford. In October, 1869, he was appointed dean of St. Paul's, London, and died in the English metropolis in 1871. His works are: Aldrich's Logic, with Notes (1849)—Prolegomena Logica (1851)—article "Metaphysics," in the 8th ed. of the Encyclopaedia Britannica (1867), afterwards published separately—The Limits of Religious Thought (1855)—The Philosophy of the Conditioned (1865), in reply to Mill's Review of Hamilton's Philosophy. He was also one of the editors of Sir William Hamilton's Lectures. Mansel wrote in a clear and elegant style. His Bampton Lectures occasioned much controversy, both theological and philosophical. In the first one mentioned, On the Limits of Religious Thought, which passed through a number of editions, both in England and in this country, he takes as the basis of his arguments Sir William Hamilton's position that religious belief is 'incognizable and inconceivable.' This treatise of Mansel is regarded as "one of the most important applications of the Hamiltonian philosophy to questions of religion." Farrar (in his Crit. Hist. of Free Thought, p. 470) thus speaks of The Limits of Religious Thought: "It is a work which is valuable for its method, even if the reader differs (as the author of these lectures does in some respects) from the philosophical principles maintained, or occasionally even from the results attained. It is an attempt to reconstruct the argument of Butler from the subjective side. As Butler showed that the difficulties which are in revealed religion are equally applicable to natural, so Mr. Mansel wishes to show that the difficulties which the mind feels in reference to religion are parallel with those which are felt by it in reference to philosophy. Since, therefore, the abstract or negative tone has passed over philosophy. The phenomenon are now studied in the mind, not in nature; in our mode of viewing, not in the object viewed. Hence Butler's argument needed reconstructing on its psychological side. Mr. Mansel has attempted to effect this; and the book must be read in this light. The difficulty is due to the minds of those who are diametrically opposed to its principles and results. Even if the details were wrong, the method would be correct, of studying psychology before ontology; of finding the philosophy of religion, not as an attempt, object, and theorema, but as a theorma, but subjectively, by the analyses of the religious faculties; learning the length of the sounding-line before attempting to fathom the ocean." Manso, J. Dominico, a noted Italian prelate, was born in Lucca Feb. 16, 1622; entered the Church at an early age, and was for a long time professor of theology at Naples. As a result of the persecutions of the Inquisition, he was imprisoned, and died Sept. 27, 1769. He was distinguished for his historical and philosophical acquisitions, as also for his zeal as a compiler. Among his principal works are Supplemenum collectionis conciliar. et decr. Nicol. Coleti (Lucca, 1746, 6 vols.); also own very complete collection, Sacrorum conciliorum constinentia, collecto, etc. (Florent. et Venet. 1759-88, 31 vols.), which was continued after his death. He published also a valuable edition of St. Baluzi Attealaeum (Lucca, 1761, 2 vols.), and the splendid Lucca edition of Baronius's Annal. Eccles., with the continuation by Raynaldus (1738-56); a new edition of Natalis Alexandri Historiae eccles. Vet. Novæ Test. (Lucca, 1748-52), and of J. A. Fabricii Biblioth. Lat. med. et inf. art. (Patavii, 1754). He also published the 2d edition of the important Memoria della Gran Comunità Mattita da Fr. M. Fioretti (Lucca, 1756), in which he made many interesting additions. He wrote also De epochis conciliorum Sacrosanct is et Sirmiensium. See Ant. Zatti, Commentar. de vita et scriptis J. D. Mansi (Ven. 1772); Anton. I. Manuselaticum. See Taxa.

zoopovo, 1 Tim. i, 9, as sometimes rendered, one who by an accidental homicide was entitled to the benefit of asylum (Numb. xxxvi, 6, 12; elsewhere usually "slayer"). See BLOOD-REVENGE. One of the most peculiar provisions in the statute respecting the manuselater was the life-long imprisonment of the convicted man in one of the cities of refuge: 'He shall abide in it until the death of the high-priest, which was anointed with the holy oil.' After that he was allowed to 'return into the land of his possession' (ver. 28). Different reasons have been assigned by commentators for making the one who committed the murder independent on the others, which is unnecessary to particularize. As the enactment was intended for the whole body of the people, and is recorded in Scripture without any explanation, the most simple view that can be taken of it is likely to be the nearest to the truth. One thing, however, all knew respecting the anointed high-priest, viz. that he was the head and representative of the whole community in matters pertaining to life and death; and as some limitation would evidently require to be set to the restraint laid on the manuselater, the thought would naturally communicate itself to the people to make responsibility for an accidental death cease and determine with the death of him who stood nearest to God in matters of that description. In the general relations of the community a change had entered in that respect, which touched all individuals, and it was fit that it should specially touch those who had been casually benefitted from the freedom of life.

The principle on which the 'man-selater' was to be allowed to escape, viz. that the person slain was regarded as 'delivered into his hand' by the Almighty, was obviously open to much wilful perversion (1 Sam. xxxvi, 4, 18; xxvi, 6; compare Philo, De Spec. Leg. iii, 21; ii, 230), though the cases mentioned appear to be a sufficient sample of the intention of the lawgiver.

a. Death by a blow in a sudden quarrel (Numb. xxxvi, 22).

b. Death by a stone or missile thrown at random (Is. ii, 22, 23).

c. By the blade of an axe flying from its handle (Deut. viii, 5).

d. Whether the case of a person killed by falling from a roof unprovoked with a parapet involved the guilt of manslaughter on the owner is not clear; but the law seems intended to prevent the imputation of malice in any such case, by pronouncing, as far as possible, the occurrence of the fact itself (Deut. xxii, 8) (Michaelis, On the Laws of Moses, arta. 223, 280, ed. Smith).

In all these and the like cases the manuselater was allowed to retire to a city of refuge. See ETR or RESTUIE. Besides these, the manuselater may be mentioned as cases of homicide:

a. An animal, not known to be vicious, occasioning death to a human being, was to be put to death, and regarded as unclear. But if it was known to be vicious, the owner also was liable to fine, and even death (Exod. xxii, 28, 31).

b. A thief overtaken at night in the act might lawfully be put to death, but if the sun had risen the act of killing him was to be regarded as murder (Exod. xxii, 3, 2).

Other cases are added by the Mishna, which, however, are included in the definitions given above (Shul, ii, 1, 2, 3; Maimon, ii, 2; compare Otho, Lex. Rabba, a. v. Homicida). See MURDER.

Manus Ecclesiæ. Manus is in reality equivalent to locus, ad quos manus, the residence including the portion of land belonging to it (see Manus), and both expressions are sometimes used the one for the other (see Du Fresne, a. v.; Grimm, Deutsche Redakteurhüter, p. 536; Eichhorn, Deutsche Redthefgeschichte, vol. i, § 84; Guérard, Politique de l’abbé Irénison (Paris, 1844, 4to.), article 7 in Die rechtliche Natur der Zehnten (Breslau, 1831, p. 174). But in opinion that manus ecclesiœ is derived from manumansio or mancipium, from the slaves in early times becoming free in obtaining an estate, a manus hereditaria. But, putting aside the philodical difficulties, we find that the manus were properties with which serva (plebe adscripti) or even freemen were invested on some conditions, hence the distinction between manus serviles and ingenuæ (Grimm, p. 187; Eichhorn, vol. i, § 84).

In the 9th century the whole of France was divided into manœ, as the taxes were based on this, and as well as the obligations of military service (see Capacitare, i, p. 803, c. 1, a. 807, 411; Pert, Monumenta Germaniae, iii, 119, 172; Walter, Corpus juris Germanici, ii, 228; Hincemari Remensis Annales, ad a. 866, 677). The Church itself was not free from these taxes, but paid according to the number of manses it held (see Patrologia, a. 812, cap. 11; Pert, iii, 176).

"Ut de rebus unders censum ad partem regia exarere solebat, si ad aequum ecclesiam traditum sunt, aut tradatur propriis heredibus, aut qui eas reiuniert retinet, vel illum censum peresolvat," with the exception of those which they held from the liberty of the king, and which were given with such immunities; as also the mansis forming the dos of a church, and given to it at its foundation. See IMMUNITY. In this case the immunity covered the whole manœ (manus integer), and it became the duty of the incumbents to see that their privilege was not infringed (see Capacitare Wormatiæ, a. 829, cap. generalia, no. 4; Pert, iii, 550). This principle was also adhered to afterwards, so that both Gratian (see c. 24, 25, can. xxiii, qu. viii) and Raymundus à Penaforte (c. i, x, de censibus, iii, 89) considered it well to recall these encroachments on the part of the manœ. The size of the manœ of a military ecclesiœ of the.size remains the same; yet it was at all times calculated so as to afford a dos competens to the church, the income from which would be sufficient to defray the expenses of wor-shop and to supply the greater part of the requisites of the clergy (see Ziegler, De dote ecclesiasticæ iagnosce, p. 420, to Ap. Wittzem, 1886, 4to., chap. viii, sec. 7).

If we study the history of the establishment of Christianity in the different countries, we find that many adopted these principles of the French law. Thus in Prussia, at the foundation of churches, they were each endowed with a number of farms. In the parishes of Kuln and Thorn receiving besides forty hides. When in 1249 peace was made with the heathen Prussians, a stipulation required that each new church should receive a dos of eight hides (see Voigt, Gesch. Preussen's, ii, 289, 580). The later documents on the subject (see Voigt, Codex diplomatiæ Prussicae) show that this custom was observed in after times. This practice of church endowments was continued notwithstanding the changes introduced by the Reformation.

Mantichuria, a Chinese territory in Eastern Asia, extending between lat. 42° and 58° N., is now the possession partly of the Chinese and partly of the Russians.

It is bounded, according to its present limits, by the Amur on the north; by the Usuri and the Sungacha on the east, separating it from the Russian maritime territory of Oroschi; by the Shan-Altin range on the south, separating it from Korea; and by a portion of the Khingan Mountains, the river Sira-Muren, and the district of the upper Sungari, which separate it on the west from the desert of Golob. Previously to the recent incursions of the Russians on the north, the area of this territory was about 682,000 square miles. Since the treaty of

Nov. 14, 1860, the Russians possess all the territory east of the Usuri and north and east of the Amur, and the Chinese possession is reduced to about 578,000 square miles, of which Taurabou is held at from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000. Mantichuria is divided into three provinces: Shing-King (formerly Laxong), which alone contains upwards of 2,100,000 inhabitants, and the chief town of which, Mukden, is the seat of government for the three provinces; Girin, or Kirin; and Tsi-tsihar. The country is mountainous, densely wooded in the south, but consisting chiefly of prairies and grass-land in the north. It is well watered and fruitful in the valleys. Chinese form the great bulk of the population.

The Manchus themselves are for the most part soldiers; they are the present rulers of China, who gradually subjugated the country. They are not a nomadic race like the Mongols, but are given to agriculture or hunting, according to the part of their country they inhabit.

They are of a lighter complexion and slightly heavier build than the Chinese, have the same conformation of the body as the Chinese, and are considered as of natives present greater intellectual capacity. Literary purposes are more esteemed by them than by Mongololians. They are of the same religious faith as the Chinese, but they are less under the priesthood.

The Manchus, in short, may be regarded as the most important race in Central Asia, if not on the continent.

Mantolete, a long cape, with slits for the arms, worn by prelates. Regular bishops wore it without the ro-chez; and cardinals, vested in rochet and mozzarella, lay it aside when visiting another of their order. The man-tolete is a plate cloak, with long, hanging sleeves.—

Walcott, Soc. Archæol. s. v.

Mantle, in the A. V., is the term used to render four Hebrew words, viz.,

1. נַעַר, addereth, from נַעַר, "ample," and therefore probably meaning a large over-garment like the Roman pallium. The Sept. renders it by μηλαρίς (a sheep's skin), 1 Kings xix, 10, etc.; διηλείς, Zech. xxiii, 4; and εἰμιλαία, Gen. xxxvi. 4; from the passages in which it is mentioned we can conjecture its nature. It is used most frequently (1 Kings xix; 2 Kings ii, 8, 13, etc.) of Elijah's "mantle," which was in all probability a mere sheepskin, such as is frequently worn by dervishes and poor people of Persia, which seems, after Elijah's time, to have been in vogue among the prophets (Zech. xxiii. 4). Accordingly, by it only is denoted the cape or wrapper which, with the exception of a strip of skin or leather round his loins, formed, as we have every reason to believe, the sole garment of the prophet. The Baptist's dress was of a similar rough description, and we see from Hez. xi, 37 (νυχοτής, νυχις δίμανος) that such garments were regarded as a mark of poverty and persecution. The word addereth twice occurs with the epithets μηλαρίας, "airy" (Gen. xxv, 25; Zech. xiii, 4). On the other hand, it is sometimes undoubtedly applied to royal and splendid robes, and is even used to mean

"magnificence" in Ezek. xxvii, 8 ("vine of magnificence") and Zech. xi, 3. It is the expression for the "goddly Babylonish garment" stolen by Achaz, and the "robe" worn by the king of Nineveh (Josh. vii, 21; Jonah iii, 6). The difference between the two meanings of the word is, that while "addereth" or "airy" mantle is so opposite is doubtless to be found in the etymology of the word (from נַעַר, ample), or in the notion of a dress richly lined or trimmed with costly stuff. See Rom.

2. מַלְּשִׁי, melši, which in the A. V. is variously rendered "mantle," "robe" or "cloak;" and in the Sept.

מלֶשֶׁה, melše, מַלְּשִׁית, melšešit, מַלְּשָׁה, melšash, מַלְּשָׁהוּת, melšashošt. Josephus calls it μελεῖ. It is a general term derived from מַלְּשִׁית, to cover, and is most frequently applied to "the robe of the ephod" (Exod. xxviii, 4, etc.; Lev. viii, 7), which is described as being open at the top, to the breast, and having holes for the insertion of the arms (Joseph. Ant.

iii, 7, 4; Jahn, Bibl. Arch. sec. 122; Braunius, De Vest.

Sacc. p. 426; Schröder, De Vest. Mul. p. 237, etc.). It was worn, however, not only by priests, like Samuel (1 Sam. ii, 18; xv, 27; xxvii, 14), but by kings and princeses (1 Sam. xxiv, 4; David, 1 Chron. xv, 27), and rich men (Exra, ix, 3–4; Job and his friends, i, 20; ii, 12), and even by king's daughters (2 Sam. xiii, 18), although in the latter case it seems to have had sleeves (see Ge-senius, Theod. p. 611). Properly speaking, the melši was worn under the similar, or outer garment, but that it was often itself used as an outer garment seems probable from some of the passages above quoted. It is interesting to know that the garment which Samuel's mother made and brought to the infant prophet at her annual visit to the holy tent at Shiloh was a miniature of the official ephod. The counterpane of the great prophet wore in mature years (1 Sam. xv, 27), and by which he was on one occasion actually identified. When the witch of Endor, in answer to Saul's inquiry, told him that "an old man was come up, covered with a melši," this was sufficient to enable the king in whose presence he stood—Saul perceived that it was Samuel" (xxviii, 14).

3. מַלְּשַׁח, melšaḥ, semikuš (Judg. iv, 14), the garment (marg.

"rug," or "blanket") used by Jael to fling over the weary Sisera as a coverlet (Sept. מַלְּשַׁח, but כְּפִיךְ appears to have been the reading of Origen and Augustine). The word is derived from מַלְּשַׁח, impomer, and is evidently a general term. Hosechus defines מַלְּשַׁח לָחֶף, t. e. a large cloak woolly on both sides. Hosechus differs from Virgil in this, for he says κονιάνας ἵππικα καὶ ἵππικον ἵππικα, i. e. woolly on one side, the Scythian, on Aristophanes, adds that it was a Persian, and Pollux that it was a Babylonian robe (Rosenmüller, Schol. ad loc.).

There is, therefore, no reason to understand it of a curtain of the tent, as Faber does. Since the Orientals constantly use a covering when bedding, the rendering "mantle," though inaccurate, is not misleading (compare Ruth iii, 9; Ezek. xvi, 8, etc.). In the above passage the Hebrew word has the definite ar-MANTLE

It is prefixed, and it may therefore be inferred that it was some part of the regular furniture of the tent. The clue to a more exact signification is given by the Arabic version of the Polyglot, which renders it by al-kafifah, a word which is explained by Dory (Dictionnaire des Vétérans Arèbes, p. 292), on the authority of Ibn Batuta and other Oriental authors, to mean certain articles of a thick fabric, in shape like a plaid or shawl, which are commonly used for beds by the Arabs: "When they sleep they spread them on the ground. For the under part of the bed they are doubled several times, and one longer than the rest is used for a covering." On such a bed, on the floor of Heber's tent, no doubt the weary Sisera threw himself, and such a coverlet must the semikah have been which Jael laid over him.

4. מְשָׂפָתָם, maṣaṭpah'k, occurs only in Isa. iii, 22. It was some article of female dress, and is derived from מָשָׂא, to weave. Schröder, the chief authority on this subject, says it means a large exterior tunic with sleeves.

Manton, Thomas, D.D., one of the most eminent of the Puritan divines of the 17th century, was born in 1620 at Lawrence-Lydiard, Somerset, England. His father and both his grandfathers were ministers. He was educated at Wadham College, Oxford, and received orders from bishop Hall before he had attained the age of twenty, being regarded by the good prelate as a extraordinary young man. The greatness of his character displayed itself even at this early age. Believing that admission to deacon's orders constituted authority to preach, he steadfastly refused priest's orders after having received deacon's. On staying a short time at Colyton, in Devonshire, he removed to London, and was presented in 1643 with the living of Stoke-Newington, near London. Here he prepared and afterwards published his Expositions of James and Jude. (The former was published in 1651; edited by Sherman, 1640, royal 8vo; edited by M'Donough, 1842, 8vo; the latter was published in 1658, 4to; new ed. 1838, 8vo.) During the Revolution he was frequently called to preach before Parliament, where he had the courage to speak against the death of the king, though he gave great offence. In 1658 he was chosen preacher of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, where he had a numerous congregation of persons of great note and rank, and was eminently successful in his ministry. Joining in the Rebellion, he became one of the chaplains to the protector, and one of the committee for examining ministers under the commonwealth. However, to prove that the Restoration in 1660, was chosen one of the king's chaplains, and was also honored by Oxford at this time with the degree of D.D. by special request of king Charles II. In 1661 he was offered the deanship of Rochester, but this post he refused. Like Baxter, he clung to the last to the hope that a scheme of reconciliation might be carried for the Presbyterians; and he had yielded so far as to receive episcopal institution from Sheldon to permit the reading of the Common Prayer in his church, but when he clearly saw that there was peace only within the Establishment, and by an utter abandonment of all Puritan principles, he left the deanship, content to remain in the position he was then filling. The passing of the Act of Uniformity forced him into the ranks of the Nonconformists. Efforts were made by Calamy, Manton, and Bates, the leaders of those Presbyterians who still hoped for redress, to secure their rights from the king by personal interview, and they even received encouragement from Charles II of a favorable change, who "promised to restore them to their employments and places again, as pitying that such men should lie vacant." (Stoughton, i, 302.) But the king proved false, and the Puritans lost their places. Among the Nonconformist ministers who would not quit the pulpit until forced was Thomas Manton. Deprived of a church, he opened his rooms in Covent Garden, and there gathered a congregation. Here the Oxford oath was tendered to him, and on refusal he was committed a prisoner to the Gate-house, and was kept confined for six months. He died Oct. 18, 1677. Perhaps few men of that age had more virtue and fewer failings; but his only trust was in the Lamb of God. As a preacher he was most highly esteemed by his contemporaries, who call him "one of the best preachers in England." As a practical expositor of Scripture he was perhaps never surpassed. He left numerous writings, chiefly sermons and expositions. A collective edition of his works was published in 5 vols. 8vo, in 1681-84-88-83-1701, with Life by Dr. William Harris; but this collection is incomplete. A list of all his productions is given by Darlington, Cyclop. Bibliog. i, 1953-56. The publication of a complete collection of his works, prepared under the superintendence of the Rev. Thomas Smith, D.D., and others, with full indexes and an original memoir by the Rev. C. Ryle, was begun in 1869, and is to be completed in 20 vols. demy 8vo, in 1874. See the excellent article in Allibone's Dictionary of British and American Authors, vol. ii, s. v.; Hook, Ecclesiastical Biogr. vol. viii.

worn next to the pallium (De Vest, Mul. xv, 247-277). In this same verse, and in Ruth iii, 15, occurs the word רֶפָּאָה, repha'ah, which appears to have been a sort of square covering like a plaid (Michaelis, Suppl. p. 1021; Rosenmiller, Schol.; Isa. iii, 22). We cannot find the shadow of an authority for John's very explicit statement, that both these words mean the same article, דֹּאָה being the fashion for the winter, and רֶפֶּה for the summer; though his assertion that "it covered the whole body from head to foot" may be very true (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. sect. 127).

For other terms, such as רַבִּים, simah (Gen. ix, 23 etc.), יָבָאָה (Matt. xxviii, 28), στολή (Mark iii, 38 etc.), see Dress. The φακόν (A.V. cloak) to which St. Paul makes such an interesting allusion in 2 Tim. iv, 13, seems to have been the Latin ponsula (comp. הוֹנֵת), a sort of travelling-cloak for wet weather. A great deal has been written about it, and at least one monograph (Stocho, Dissert. de Paulio Ponuli, Lugd. 1709). Even in Chrysonom's time some took it to be the φακόν, but a sort of travelling-cloak, and Jerome, Theophylact, Grotius, etc., shared in this opinion (Schleusner, Lex. N. T. s. v. φακόν). See Cloak.

MANUEL

a. v.; Middleton, Evangelical Biography, iii, 429. (J.
H. W.)

Mantua, an Italian province, formerly an independient duchy, had a high reputation in the time of the Romans. After sharing the fate of the rest of Northern Italy, it was seized by the Gonzagas about the commencement of the 16th century. The last duke of the house of Gonzaga, who lived at Padua in 1706, where Mantua fell into the hands of Austria. In 1859 the province was given up to Italy, but the town of Mantua was not restored to Italy until 1866, since which time Mantua has formed a province of the new kingdom of Italy. See Italy. The city of Mantua is noted in ecclesiastical history for a council held there in 1067 to judge pope Alexander II for a charge of simony brought against him. Alexander II took an oath to deny the accusation, and, proving the validity of his election, was recognised as the proper incumbent of the papal chair; while Honorius II (q. v.), the anti-pope, was unanimously condemned as simoniacal. See Land-don, Manuel of Councils, p. 890.

Mantuan, Baptist, a famous Italian monastic and poet, was born at Mantua in 1448; joined the Carmelites, became general of the order, quitted it in 1516, and developed himself for the remainder of his life to belleslettres. He died in 1516. His works were published in Paris in 1518 (3 vols. fol.), with the Commentaries of S. Murroni, S. Brant, and J. Badius; and at Antwerp in 1576 (4 vols. 8vo), under the title, J. Baptiste Man-tuanus, Carmelitae, theologi, philosophi, poeta, et oratoris clarissimus, opera omnia, pluribus libris aucta et restituita.

Manz, Felix, a Baptist martyr of the early part of the 16th century, and a leader of the Reformation in Germany, was a native of Zirich. In 1519 he studied Hebrew with Zwingle, under Carlstadt, and was intimate with that reformer, and also with Myconius, Cap-ito, and other leaders of the Swiss Reformation. About 1522 he objected openly to the doctrine of infant baptism, to the tithes, exorcism, and other peculiarities of the Romish Church, and thus failing to harmonize with the opinions of Zwingle, he was led to a separation from the party of that reformer, and became connected with the Baptists. In 1528 he preached publicly on the subject of baptism. In the three disputes held at Zirich in 1525, Manz appears to have taken part, and after that of March was thrown into prison, from which, however, he escaped. He afterwards preached in different parts of Switzerland; in 1526 he was imprisoned in the tower of Welsenberg, and in 1528 he was arrested by the order of the magistrate of Zirich, and, refusing to recant, was Manu (from the Sanscrit man, to think; literally, the thinking being) is the name of the reputed author of the most renowned law-book of the ancient Hindus, and likewise of an ancient Kalpa sutra (q. v.). It is matter, however, of considerable doubt whether both works belong to the same individual, and whether the name Manu, especially in the case of the author of the law-book, was intended to designate a historical personage.

In several passages of the Vedas (q. v.), as well as of the Mahabharata (q. v.), Manu is spoken of as the progenitor of the human race, and in the first chapter of the law-book ascribed to him he declares himself to have been produced by Viraj, an offspring of the Supreme Being, from the portion of the Rudra. Hindu mythology, moreover, recognises a succession of Manus, each of whom created, in his own period, the world anew after it had perished at the end of a mundane age. The word Manu—kindred with our man—belongs therefore, properly speaking, to ancient Hindu mythology, and it was consecrated with the renowned law-book in order to impart to the latter the sanctity on which its authority rests. This work is not merely a law-book in the European sense of the word; it is likewise a system of cosmogony, or, as Sir William Jones has it, "comprises the Indian system of duties, religious and civil."
It propounds metaphysical doctrines, teaches the art of government, and, among other things, treats of the state of the soul after death. The chief topics of its twelve books are the following: Creation; 2. Education and the duties of a pupil, or the first order; 3. Marriage and the duties of a householder, or the second order; 4.
Means of subsistence, and private morals; 5. Diet, purification, and the duties of women; 6. The duties of a priest and ascetic, and the duties of the third and fourth orders; 7. Government, and the duties of a king and the military caste; 8. Judicature and law, private and criminal; 9. Continuation of the former, and the duties of the commercial and servile castes; 10. Mixed castes, and the duties of the castes in time of distress; 11. Penance and expiation; 12. Transmission and final beatitude. It is the opinion of Maine (Ancient Law) and other eminent scholars that the code of Manu was never fully accepted or enforced in India, and remained always an ideal of the perfect Brahminic state. It is supposed, however, to have been written about B.C. 900 or 1000. The text of this work has been published in several editions both in India and Europe. An excellent English translation of it was made by Sir W. Jones (Calcutta, 1786; 2d ed., by Haughton, Lond. 1825), and a very good French translation by the Sieur Declanges (Paris, 1782). See Johntzen, Ueber das Gesetzbuch des Manu (Berl.
1868); Max Muller, Chips from a German Workshop (Index to vol. ii); Elphinstone, Hist. of India (8d ed., p. 226 sq.; Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, 1, 194 sq.; James Freeman Clarke, Ten Great Religions, p. 100

Manuductor is the name of an ecclesiastical officer whose duty it was to give the signal to the choristers to sing, to mark the measure, beat the time, and regulate the music. The word means to lead by means of the hand; and the officer was so called because he was required to stand in the middle of the aisle, and to guide the choir by the motions of his hand. The Greek Church has an officer who performs similar services, who is called Mesochoras, because he is seated in the midst of the choir.

Manuropulus (μανυροπολός), of Sa-rantenus (Σαραντώνς), or The Philosopher, a Greek ecclesiastic who flourished in the 12th and 13th centuries, acquired a high reputation by his philosophical attainments. He was appointed patriarch of Constantinople on the death of Maximus ii, and held the chaplacy of the patriarch from five to seven years. He died about A.D. 1221. Three synodical decrees of a Manuel, patriarch of Constantinople, are given in the Jus Greco-Romanum of Leunclavius (ib. iii, p. 238, etc.), who assigns them to Chriatopolus, and is followed by Cave and Oudin, who have confounded Chriatopolus with another Manuel (of Constantinople). Le Quien objects to this judgment of Leunclavius, as not founded on evidence, and, with better reason, adjudges them to Manuel Bryennius. Ephe柔as of Constantinople celebrates Chriatopolus as "an exact observer of the law-book, one of the three most learned (of his time)" (Gree.
Ephe柔as. De Patriarcha (Charitop. vol. 2, 10, 251, ed. Bonn); Anonymous [supposed by some to be e Niceph. Callist.], De Patriarcha Charitopolitani Carmen Iambicium, and Patriarchie Charitopolioe, apud Script. Eccles. iii, p. 267); Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, i, col. 278; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1240, ii, 297 [ed. Oxford, 1749-42]; Oudin, Com-

Manuel (Μανουήλ) (C AINMANOUÉL) emperor of Constantinople, from 1143 to 1160, was the fourth son of John II, and was born about A.D. 1120.
Two of his elder brothers, Alexias and Andronicus, both died before, and a special declaration of the emperor appointed Manuel as his successor, to the prejudice of his third son, Isaac Sevastocrator. As soon as Manuel ascended the throne, he surrounded himself with the bravest warriors of the West, and soon became foremost even among them for his courage. His reign was a succession of triumphs, sometimes in the East and sometimes in Europe. Conrad III and Louis VII having informed him that they were preparing a new crusade, Manuel, although apparently disposed to help them, gave secret information to the Turks of the approaching danger.

The relation which Manuel Comnenus sustained to the Church of Rome is of special interest to us. His Latin subjects he treated with kindness, embellished their churches, and readily did all they asked of him.
This generous disposition on the part of Manuel Comnenus towards the Latins encouraged pope Hadrian IV (1154-1159) to make overtures for a union of the Eastern with the Western Church, but the plan failed of success because of the objections of the Greek patriarch to acknowledge the supremacy of the pope of Rome.
See GREEK CHURCH.

After Hadrian's death Manuel entered into correspondence with Alexander III, declaring his adherence to the Crusades, and offered assistance. The German emperor, Frederick I, had taken sides with the rival pope Victor, and Manuel embraced this opportunity to urge upon Alexander the claims of the Greek emperor to the Roman crown, promising in return to lend the pope his assistance in establishing the papal power in all Italy, as well as in the union of the Latin and Eastern Church. So long as the pope was in danger from the invading Allemanni, he acted as if he felt inclined to acknowledge the true representative of Constantinople.

But after the establishment of peace and friendship with Frederick, Alexander "spoke a more peremptory language, confirmed the acts of his predecessors, excommunicated the adherents of Manuel, and pronounced the final separation of the churches, or at least the extinction of Constantinople and Rome" (Gibbon, v. 401). Manuel died Sept. 24, 1180, and it is said to have been deeply versed in theology, but "was certainly rather a great talker than a great thinker on religion." See MANUEL OF CONSTANTINOPLE. There were two Manuel Comnenus, father Constantine, Manuel I (Charitopolus), and Manuel II, the subject of the present article. Cave, Oudin, and others seem to have confounded the two, for they state that Manuel Charitopolus succeeded Germanus II in A.D. 1240. Charitopolus was the father, not his successor; Manuel II was his successor, though not immediately, for the brief patriarchate of Methodius II and a vacancy in the see, of considerable but uncertain length, intervened.

Manuel's death is distinctly fixed as having occurred two months before that of the emperor John Alexius Vatatzes, A.D. 1255, Oct. 30. The duration of his patriarchate is fixed by Nicephorus Callistus, according to Le Quien, at eleven years; but the table in the Protryptico of Labbe assigns to him fourteen years, so that A.D.
1240 or 1244 may be assumed as the year of his accession. He kept up the spirit of the council of 1243, and the other older authorities are preferred.

Manuel held, before his patriarchate, a high place among the ecclesiastics of the Byzantine court, then fixed at Nice, and was reputed a man of piety and holiness, "though married," and of a mild and gentle disposition, but by no means learned. The three Sententiae Synodalium of the patriarch Manuel given in the Jus Græco-Romanum undoubtedly belong to this patriarch, not to Chariopolus, for the second of them, De Translantam Episcoporum, is expressly dated July, Indict. 8, A.M. 6576, as of Constantine. = A.D. 1240. Some works, however, especially a letter to the pope, are innocent by "Manuel Patriarcha CPhO," probably belong to Manuel of Constantinople (Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, i. col.
279; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1240, ii, 297 [ed. Oxford, 1740-42]; Oudin, Comment de Scriptorior. et Script. Ecdes. iii, col. 177; Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. xi, 668).—Smith, Manuel HOLONOSUS, a Byzantine ecclesiastic of the 18th century, about 1691 or 1692 was cruelly mutilated by the cutting off of his nose and lips, by order of the ambitious Michael Paleologus, because he had expressed grief at the deposition, persecution, and banishment of Joannes Lascaris, emperor of Nicea, by Palaeologus, his successor in the empire. Holobulus was then confinned to the monastery of the Precursor, where, having excellent abilities and opportunities, he pursued his studies with success. About A.D. 1267 Germanus III, bishop of Constantinople, procured for him the appointment of teacher of church history in the school of young ecclesiastics and prevailed upon the emperor to remit his punishment and allow him to quit the monastery. Germanus also conferred on him the ecclesiastical office of rhetor, reader and expounder of the Scriptures. When the emperor Paleologus attempted a reconciliation of the Greek and Latin churches, he sought the counsel of Holobulus, but he declared against the plan of reconciliation. This brought upon him the emperor's indignation, and he was obliged to take refuge in the church sanctuary to escape violence from the emperor's courtiers; was banished from the city, and himself excommunicated by the archbishop of Athens. He died A.D. 1278; was afterwards taken back to Constantinople, and beaten and paraded ignominiously through the streets. In A.D. 1288, after the accession of Andronicus II, Paleologus, son of Michael, who pursued with respect to the union of the churches an opposite policy to that of his father, Holobulus appeared in the Synod of Constantinople, in which Ioannes Vexius was deposed from the patriarchate of Constantinople, and he took part in the subsequent disputations with that chief of the Latinizing party. Little else is known of Holobos. v.

Manuel, NICOLAS, or NICOLAS, sometimes called DEUTSCH, one of the most prominent characters in the ecclesiastical history of Switzerland, in the age just preceding the Reformation, was born at Bern in 1484. His real name is conjectured by his biographer, Dr. Gries-eisen, to have been Alemans, but, as he was illegitimate, it was, for family reasons, changed anagrammatically into that of Manuel. It is further conjectured that he was brought up by his maternal grandfather, Thutrin Frickart. He was an artist by profession, but he excelled also as a theologian and philosopher. He was teaching at Colmar, under the successors of the celebrated Martin Schöns, until the fame of Titian attracted him to Venice, where, about 1511, he became one of his pupils: he is the Emanuelle Tedesco of Riddoli and other Italian writers. He is said to have assisted Holbein, in 1514, in his "Dances of Death," but this is very improbable, as he was himself employed at that time in painting the same subject in the cloister of the Dominican convent at Bern. It was executed in fresco or distemper. The picture consisted of forty-six subjects, forty-one of which were the actual festivals; 14; 14; and 18 of them have been destroyed, but the compositions are preserved in prints and copies: the wall on which it was painted was pulled down in 1660. Manuel was an active reformer, and many of these designs are reflections upon the abuses of the Roman Church. He also ornamented his own house with a large freedom in the worship of his own worshiping idols. But of these and several other of his works nothing now remains, except some small watercolor copies preserved in the library at Basle. However, either because his pencil did not bring him sufficiently for the maintenance of himself and his poitical ardor, he was induced to engage in military and public affairs. He served, as quartermaster or commis-ary, among the Swiss allies who assisted Francis I in his expedition against Milan, 1522, and was present both at The storming of Novara and the battle of Biaccoes. In the following year he was chosen landvogt of Erlach, and from the year 1526 distinguished himself by his zeal in the cause of the Reformation. From this period he was entirely devoted to that cause, and to his various public employments. He died in 1560, while only forty-six years of age. He adorned himself in 1509, by various popular poems and songs in the Swiss dialect, full of humor and sharp satire. He is said by some to be the author of a song, which originated in the early part of the 16th century, deriding the inhumanity of the Virgin Mary. But though this be doubtful, it is certain that Ťaman himself wielded his pen in support of the Reformation by attacking the gross abuses of the clergy and the licentiousness of monastics. His Fastnachtsspiele, or Dramatic Morality and Mysteries, which he began to compose in 1520, and finished in 1522, is derived from their knowledge of manures from Egypt, but they doubtless adopted and preserved the customs which existed among the previous inhabitants of the country. In the parable of the fig-tree which had for three years been barren, and which the proprietor therefore doomed to be cut down, the gardener is represented as praying for delay, until he should "dig it out and dung it" (Luke xiii. 7). To explain this, Lightfoot quotes the following from the Talmud: "They lay dung to m-stien and enrich the soil; dig it under the roots of trees; pluck up the trunk and throw off the leaves; sprinkle leaves, and smoke under the trees to kill vermin." In addition to the various modes of irrigation, the soil was likewise enriched by means of ashes; to which were added the straw, stubble, husks, or chaff, together with the brambles and grass that overspread the land during the sabbatical year; all being reduced by fire and used as manure (Prov. xxiv. 31; Isa. vii. 23; xxxii. 10). The burning over the surface of the field forms a good preparation for sowing the seeds of noxious herbs (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 57). Dung-hills are mentioned in 1 Sam. ii. 8; Ezra vii. 11; Dan. ii. 5; iii. 29, and one of the gates at Jerusalem was called the Dung-gate, from dung being carried out there (Neh. ii. 13). That the soil was manured with dung, we learn from 2 Kings ix. 37; Psa. lxxxiiii. 10; Jer. viii. 2; ix. 22; xvi. 4; xxv. 33; Luke xiv. 35. The Israelites had comparatively few horses and few swine, two sources of excellent strong manure. Their animals consisted chiefly of oxen, camels, asses, sheep, and goats. The dung of the cow and camel was used to a considerable extent for fuel, and the dung of the sacrificial was directed to be burned—circumstances calculated to diminish the supply. That salt was used for manure we learn from Matt. v. 13 and Luke xiv. 34, 35, and it would appear that salt was sometimes sown by itself on the land, at others mixed in the dung-hill. From the Talmud we learn that a dung-hill in a public place exposed the owner to the payment of whatever damage it might occasion, and any person might remove it as a nuisance. Dung might not, during the seventh year, be transported to the neighborhood of the fields intended to be made manured. Under certain restrictions it was, however, permitted to fold cattle, for the sake of their manure, upon the lands that required it in the sabbatical year, and it is from this only we learn that the practice existed among the Jews, who would seem more properly to have fold ed their sheep within walled enclosures (John x. 1-4), the occasional clearance of which must have afforded a principal supply of manure. It would seem that gardens, except a few old rose-gardens, were not allowed within the walls of Jerusalem, on account of the manure which they would have required, and "because of the stench," as the Mishnah states, this produced, as well as because of that arising from the weeds thrown out from gardens. From another passage of the Talmud we are informed that the surplus blood of the sacrifices offered in the Temple, that is to say, the blood which was poured out at the foot of the Stone altar, after the sacrifices had been duly sprinkled, was conducted by a subterranean channel to the outside of the city, and was sold to the gardeners as manure for their gardens; by which we are to understand that the gardeners were allowed to use it on paying the price of a trespass-offering, without which it could not be appropriated to any common use after having been dedicated at the altar. See Dung.

Manuscripts, Biblical. These are either Hebrew or Greek; we shall treat of them separately, referring for details to subordinate articles, where they are discussed more copiously.

1. Hebraic Manuscripts.—These are divided into (a) Synagogue rolls or sacred copies, and (b) Private or common copies.

(a.) The synagogue rolls contain the Pentateuch, the appointed sections of the prophets, or the book of Esther, which last is used only at the Feast of Purim. The three are never put together, but are written on separate rolls. They are in the Chaldee or square Hebrew character, without vowels and accents, accompanied with the puncta extraordinaria, and having the unusual forms of certain consonants. The parchments are prepared in a particular manner by the hands of Jews only, and made from the hides of clean animals, which, when duly wrought, are joined together by thongs made out of the same material. They are then divided into columns, the breadth of which must not exceed half their length. These columns, whose number is prescribed, must be of equal length and breadth among themselves, and contain a certain number of words, each line having no more than three words. The Talmud contains strict rules concerning the material, the color, the ink, letters, divisions, writing instrument, etc., which are closely followed, especially in the Pentateuch. These rules are extracted from the Talmud, and translated in Adler's Bibl. Hebr., p. 498. Deuteronomy is written in square, the rest in round characters. (From Jerusalem, 1779, 8vo.) The minuteness of such regulations renders it a most irksome task for the sofer or scribe to write out a synagogue roll. The revision of the Torah, as the synagogue roll is often called, must be undertaken within thirty days after its transcription, else it is unfit for use. Three mistakes on one side or skin are allowable; but should there be four, or should there happen to be an error in the open and close sections of the law, in the position of the words in Exodus v and Deut. xxii, which are the only portions of the Pentateuch written in poetical order, to the whole copy is worthless. The great beauty of penmanship exhibited in these synagogue copies has always been admired. They are taken from authentic exemplars, without the slightest deviation or correction. Seldom do they fall into the hands of Christian scribes, since when they cease to be employed in the synagogue, they are either burned or carefully laid aside, lest they should be profaned by coming into the possession of Gentiles.

(b.) Private MSS. are written partly in the square or Chaldee character, partly in the Rabbinical. They are held in far less esteem, for a manuscript roll is not wont to be denominated profane (pesutil). Their form is entirely arbitrary. They are in folio, quarto, octavo, and duodecimo. Of those written in the square character, the greater number are on parchment, some on paper. The ink of the letters is always black, but the vowel points are usually written with ink of a different color from that of the consonants. Initial words and letters are frequently decorated with gold and silver colors. The prose parts are arranged in columns; the poetic in parallel numbers. Some copies are without columns. The columns are not always occupied with the Hebrew text alone; for a version is frequently added, which is either written in the text after the manner of verses, or in a column by itself, or in the margin in a smaller character. The number of lines is not prescribed by the copyist. The upper and lower margin are filled with the Great Masorah, and sometimes with a rabbinical commentary; as also with prayers, psalms, and the like. The external margin is for corrections, scholia, variations, notices of the haphturoth (sections from the prophets), parashoth (sections from the law), the commentaries of the rabbis, etc. The inner margin, or that between the columns, is occupied with the Little Masorah. The single books of the O.T. are separated from one another by spaces, except the books of Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, which are written continuously. The sections of the law and prophets are numbered. In the MSS. of different countries the books are differently arranged. These copies generally pass through various hands before they are finished. The consonants proceed from the sopher or scribe. When the same person writes both consonants and vowels as frequently the case—he never makes them at the same time—the former are finished before he begins to append the latter. The Keria in the margin uniformly proceeds from the vowel-writer. It is probable that these copies were in no instance made by Christians.

The square character employed in the MSS. of which we have spoken has varieties. The Jews themselves distinguish in the synagogue rolls—1. the Tum letter, with sharp corners and perpendicular coronal, used among the German and Polish Jews; 2. the Velde letter, more modern than the Tum, and rounder, with coronal and valley found in the printed copies of the Spanish and Oriental Jews. See OLD TESTAMENT.

2. The age of Hebrew MSS. is not easily determined. It is true that they often contain subscriptions giving an account of the time when they were written, and the name of the scribe, or also of the possessor. But these accounts are often ambiguous, occasionally incorrect. Where they are altogether wanting it is still more difficult to discover the age. In the latter case the character of the writing, the color of the ink, the quality and complexity of the parchment, the absence of the Masorah, of the vowel-points, of the unusual letters, etc., have been chiefly resorted upon. Still, however, such particulars are uncertain marks of age. The oldest Hebrew MS. known to Kenmott or De Rossi was 634 of De Rossi, a mere fragment, containing small portions of Leviticus and Numbers. According to its former possessor, it belongs to the 8th century. So much uncertainty attaches to the internal marks adopted by these two Hebrews that the ages to which they assign several Hebrew MSS. are gratuitous. Since Pinner examined a number of MSS. belonging to the Bible Society of Odessa, older ones are now known. (For the dates of his MSS., see below.) In the imperial public library at St. Petersburo there is a collection of Hebrew MSS. made by Mr. Firkowicz, containing several very ancient ones. The oldest date is in a roll found in a Karaite synagogue in the Crimea, viz. A.D. 488; but that date is very suspicious. Several fragments of rolls give, as the dates of purchase or dedication, A.D. 689, 781, 789, 798, 808, 815, 842, 848.

3. A few of the oldest Hebrew MSS. may be briefly described here. We begin with the Hezali or Hililil Codex (αβκλ), one of the most ancient and most celebrated codices of the Hebrew Scriptures, which derived its name from the fact that it was written at Hilla (τηλαια), a town built near the ruins of ancient Babel. Others, however, maintain that it was called Hililil because the name of the man who wrote it was Hililil. But whatever uncertainty there may be about the derivation of its name, there can hardly be any doubt that it was written A.D. 600, for Sakkuto tells us most distinctly that when he saw the remainder of it (cir. A.D. 1500) the Codex was 900 years old. His word was, "In the year 4560, on the 26th of Ab (1196, better 1197), there was a great persecution of the Jews in the kingdom of Leon from the two kingdoms that came to besiege it. It was then that the twenty-four sacred books which were written long ago, about the year 600, by R. Moses ben-Hililil (on which account the Codex is called Hililil), in an exceedingly correct manner, and after which all the copies were corrected, were taken away. I saw the remaining two portions of it—viz. the earlier and later prophets—written in large and beautiful characters, which were brought to Portugal and sold in Africa, where they still are, having been written 900 years ago. Kimichi, in his Gramman on Numb. xv, 4, says that the Pentateuch of this Codex was extant in Toletti" (Juchaiusin, ed. Filipowski, Lond, 1857, p. 220). The Codex had the Talmudic vowels and accents, Masorah and Nikud glosses, and it served up to A.D. 1150 as a model from which copies were made. The Codex which Haja had in Babylon about A.D. 1000 was conveyed to Leon, in Spain, where the greater part of it became a prey to the fury of the martial hosts who sacked the Jewish dwellings in 1157. The celebrated grammarians, Jacob ben-Eleazar, fixed the renderings of the Biblical text according to this Codex, and the older philologists frequently quote it. Comp. Gritz, Geschichte der Juden (Lpz, 1859), vi, 182, 229; Frits, Geschichte des Kardhatthuma (Leipiz, 1869), i. 22, 138; Kimichi, Rodicam Liber ed. Biscusiak et Lemberi (Leoveli, 1867), p. 26. See Jacob ben-Eleazar, No. 1, Pinner. This is a Pentateuch roll on leather, containing the five Mosaic books complete. It has no Odesse Mm., No. 1 of Pinner (Mal. iv, 6).

The variations in the text from the Masoretic recension are few and considerable. The MS., according to the subscription, was purchased in 1868. The text 590 years. The roll must have been written upwards of 1280 years. It was brought from Derbend, in Daghestan, and is now at St.
Petersburg. If the subscription be genuine, it is the oldest MS. known, except that one in the Firkowicz colcollection dated 468. (See Rule, Kuranzit, p. 100 sq.) 11, De Rossi, quart. 1. This is but the fragment of a MS., containing Lev. xxi, 19-Num. i, 50. It is on parchment, without the vowel-points, Masorah, or Keria. It has also no interval between the parashiot or sections. But there are sometimes points between the words. There are, in De Rossi's manuscript of the 8th century, and interspersed by age. The character of the letters is intermediate, approaching the German. It is now at Parma.

No. 5, Pinner. This is a roll of the Pentateuch, but incomplete. The writing begins with Numb. xiii, 19.
The form of the letters is very different from the present style. It is carelessly written, words and letters being frequently omitted. The subscription states that it was written A.D. 483.

No. 11, Pinner. This is a fragment of a synagogue roll, written with De Rossi, quart. 26. It is from No. 503, De Rossi, in quarto. This is a MS. of the Pentateuch, made up of different pieces. It begins with Gen. xiii, 15, and ends with Deut. xv, 12. There is a chiasm in it from Lev. xxi, 19 to Numb. i, 50, because De Rossi separated this portion, thinking it to be older than the rest, and characterized it as an independent fragment by the No. 634. The vowel-points are attached, but not throughout, evidently by the same hand as that which wrote the consonants. There are no traces of the Masorah or Keri. Sometimes its readings have a remarkable agreement with those of the Samaritan text, and ancient versions. De Rossi places the various pieces of which it is made up in the 9th and 10th centuries.

No. 3, Pinner, small folio. This MS. contains the greater and lesser prophets, on 226 leaves. Every page is written in two columns, between which, as well as below, and in the outer margin, stands the Masorah.
Every column contains twenty-one lines. After each verse are two points, to which, without any interval, a new verse succeeds. The vowels and accents, as well as the greater and lesser Masorah, are wholly different from those of the Samaritan text, and ancient versions. De Rossi places the consonants. The first page has a twofold pointing, viz. above and below, but this does not occur again except occasionally in verses or words. From Zech. xiv, 6 to Mal. i, 13 there is no punctuation, and the first three verses of Mal. i, 12 have no points at all in the manner now usual. The whole Codex is very correctly written. The form of the consonants differs considerably from the present text. The various readings of this MS., according to Pinner's collation, are numerous and important. The date is 916. Two others in the same collection, Nos. 15 and 17, have the same vowel and accent system, i.e. the Babylonian or Eastern, which developed in the 6th century, and from which, in the 7th, that of the Western, or the school of Tiberias, was developed. Pinker has written ably on the subject (Einleitung in das Babylonisch-Hebräische Punktationssystem, etc., Wien, 1868), reviewed by Fürst in the Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft, xlviii, 31 sq.

No. 13, Pinner, folio. This is an incomplete MS., consisting of 116 leaves, on good parchment, containing the text from Mal. vi, 10 to the end, and the books of Kition Each page has three columns, between which, as also at the sides of the text, stands the Masorah. The vowels and accents are different from those now in use. The text has many important readings; and the Masorah dictated in these have no points at all in its first verse; and 2d succeeds 1st Kings without a vacant space between. An inscription states that the MS. was purchased in 1868. It is obviously an important codex.
Codex 590, Koenen, folio. This MS. contains the Prophe-Prophets and Hagiographa on parchment. The text has the vowel-points, but apparently from a later hand.

The margin does not exhibit the Masorah, but variations are noted here and there. Some books have the final Masorah, others, the consonants only; and they are arranged in the order, Jeremiah and Ezekiel coming before Isaiah, and Ruth before the Psalms. According to the subscription, it was written A.D. 1019, or 1018 by another reckoning. The MS. is in the imperial library of Vienna.

Pinnock's Bible, folio. A MS. containing the Pent-ateuch, Prophets, and Hagiographa, on good parchment. Every page has three columns, except in Psalms, Job, and Proverbs, where there are but two. The text is furnished with vowels and accents, two points standing after each verse. The letters and accents are like those in No. 3 of Pinner. The Great and Little Masor-rah are in the margins. Being a Karaite MS., it has not been written with great accuracy. Words and veres are sometimes repeated. It is highly ornamented with gold and silver colors. The Codex states that it was written in the year 1010.

The most important and oldest Hebrew MSS. collated by Kennicott, Bruns, De Rossi, Pinner, and others, are described in Davidson's Biblical Criticism, i, 846 sq.; and his Text of the Old Testament considered, etc., p. 98 sq. See also the third section of Tychsen's Tintenm de Moravia Codicum Hebraeorum Vet. Test. note, in his Handbuch der Hebräisch-Biblischen Handschriften (Rostock, 1786, 8vo), in which the learned writer examines the marks of antiquity assumed by Simon, Jab-lonski, Wolf, Houbigant, Kennicott, and Lillienthal, and shows that the Masorah alone is a certain index for determining the age and goodness of Hebrew MSS. See also the same writer's Beurtheilung des Hebräischen und des den Hebräisch-Biblischen Handschriften (Rostock, 1786, 8vo), in which the mode of determining the age of MSS. adopted by Kennicott, Bruns, and De Rossi is rejected; and Schnurrer's Dissertation Inauguralis de Codicibus He-braeorum Vet. Test. utate difficultier determinanda (Tubingen, 1772, 4to), reprinted in his Dissertationes Philo-logico-Criticae (Gottha at Amsterdam, 1790, 8vo).

Private MSS. written in the Robbénichen character are much more recent than the preceding, none of them being older than 500 years. They are on cotton or linen paper, in a cursive character, without vowel-points or the Masorah, but have the consonants.

The MSS. found among the Chinese Jews are partly syagogue rolls, partly private copies, whose text does not differ from the Masoretic. The Pentateuch of the Malabar Jews, brought from India to Englisten by the late Dr. Buchman, and described by Mr. Yeats, is redu-bles, on the whole, the usual synagouge rolls of the Jews, except that it is written on red skins. Its text is the Masoretic, with a few unimportant deviations.

Eight exemplars are celebrated among the Jews for their correctness and value. They are now lost, but extracts from them are still preserved. From Jewish writings, and from the margin of some MSS., where a reference is made to them, we learn that they were highly prized for their singular accuracy. They formed the basis of subsequent copies. They are, 1. The Codex of Hillel (see supra, No. 1); 2. The Codex of of the Codex of Israel; 4. An Egyptian Codex; 5. Codex Sinai; 6. The Pentateuch of Jericho; 7. Codex Sanubki; 8. The book Taggin.

For a more copious account of Hebrew MSS. we refer to Eichhorn's Einleitung (Introduction), vol. ii; Kenn-Niciott's Disquisitiones Criticæ, folio; and Alt's Polyglott, separately edited by Dathe and Wrangham; Tychsen's Texten; De Rossi's Variae Lectiones Vet.
Test. etc.; and his Scholia critica in V. T. libros, etc.; De Wette, Lehrbuch der Historisch-Kritischen Einlebung; Davidson, and described by Mr. Yeats, and added Intro. to the Old Test., in Horne. See OLD TESTAMENT.
A complete description of these MSS. is given in the great critical editions of the N. T.; here only those can be briefly noticed which are of primary importance.

(a) Uncials.
B, Codex Sinaiticus (Cod. Frld. Aug. of the Sept.) at St. Petersburg, obtained by Tischendorf from the convent of St. Catherine, Mount Sinai, in 1859. The fragments of the Sept. published as Cod. Frld. Aug. (1866) were obtained at the same place by Tischendorf in 1858.
N. The N. T. is entire, and the Epistle of Barnabas and parts of the Shepherd of Hermes are added. The whole MS. was published in 1862 by Tischendorf, at the expense of the emperor of Russia. It is probably the oldest MS. of the N. T. and of the 4th century (Tischendorf, Nov. Cod. Sin. 1860). See Sinaitic Manuscript.

A, Codex Alexandrinus (British Museum), a MS. of the entire Greek Bible, with the Epistles of Clement added. It was given by Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople, to Charles I in 1629, and is in the British Museum. It contains the whole of the N. T. with some chasms: Matthew xxv. 6; ἀδικοῖα; John vi, 50; ἐν ἐννεαδίας, 52; λέγει; 2 Cor. iv, 13; ἐπιστολαὶ; 6, 8; ἐν ἐννεαδίας. It was probably written in the first half of the 4th century. The N. T. in this MS. is supposed to have been added in 1796 (fol.), and with some corrections by Cowper (1800, 8vo). Compare Wetstein, Proleg. p. 13–30 (ed. Latzki).

See Alexandrian Manuscript.

B, Codex Vaticanus (No. 1209), a MS. of the Greek Bible, which seems to have been in the Vatican Library almost from its commencement (cic. A.D. 1450). It contains the N. T. entire to Heb. ix. 14, καθά: the rest of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Pastoral Epistles, and the Apocalypse were added in the 15th century. Various collations of the New Testament were made by Bartolomeo da Prato (1469), by Niccolò Benenti (cic. 1729), whose emendation was in part revised by Ruelle (1726), and by Sich (1788). An edition of the whole MS., on which Mai had been engaged for many years, was published three years after his death in 1858 (5 vols. 4to, ed. Vercellone; N. T. reprinted, London and Leipzig). Mai had himself kept back the edition (printed 1824–1838), being fully conscious of its imperfections, and had prepared another edition of the N. T., which was published also by Vercellone and others in 1859 (8vo). This was revised by Tischendorf (Lpz. 1867). The whole of Codex B is to be regarded as a well-preserved MS. of the N. T., and the part has already appeared (Rome, 1868), nearly complete. The MS. is assigned to the 4th century (Tischendorf, N. T. p. xxxvi–cxlit). See Vatican Manuscript.

The Apocalypse in these last editions is taken from Codex Vatonicus, 2966 (formerly Codex Basilius, 105), in the Vatican Library. It belongs to the 8th century (see Tischendorf's N. T. p. cxli sq. [7th ed.]).

C, Codex Ephraemi rescriptus (Paris, Bibl. Imp. 9), a palimpsest MS. which contains fragments of the Sept. and of every part of the N. T. In the 12th century the original writing was effaced, and some Greek writings of Ephraem Syrus were written over it. The MS. was brought to Florence from the East at the beginning of the 16th century, and came thence to Paris with Catherine de Medici. Wetstein was engaged to collate it for Bentley (1716), but it was first fully examined by Tischendorf, who published the N. T. in 1845; the O. T. fragments in 1845. The only entire books which have perished are 2 Thess. and 2 John, but lacunae of greater or less extent occur constantly. It is of about the same date as the Codex Alex. See EPHRAEM MANUSCRIPT.

D (of the Codices), Codex Bezae (University Library, Cambridge), a Graeco-Latin MS. of the Gospels and Acts, with a small fragment of 3 John, published to the University of Cambridge by Beza in 1581. Some readings from it were obtained in Italy for Stephen's edition, but afterwards Bezae was lost, and it was found at the seat of Lyons in 1562, in the Monastery of St. Ireneus. The text is very remarkable, and, especially in the Acts, abounds in sim-gular interpolations. The MS. has many lacunae. It was edited in a splendid form by Kipling (1873, 2 vols. fol.), but so imperfectly that it has been published anew under the care of the Rev. F. H. Scrivener (Camb.1884, 4to). The MS. is referred to the 6th century. Comp.
Credner, Beiträge, i, 452-518; Bornemann, Acta Apost. litaurorum, 1848; Schulz, De Codice D, contempt 1827.
D (of the Epistles), Codex Claromontanus, or Region (Imperial Library at Paris, 107), marked by the same letter of the alphabet as the preceding, containing a different part of the N. T., viz., all Paul's Epistles with the exception of the Acts. It is a Greek-Latin MS., written stichometrically, with accents and breathings, but without division into words.
According to Montfaucon, it belongs to the 7th century, but Tischendorf assigns it to the 6th. The text was edited by the latter scholar in 1852, and is very valuable.
Various correctors may be traced, but it is easy to distinguish them. The first readings are of course the principal ones (see the prolegomena to Tischendorf's dition). See ClerMONTMaNuSCRIPT.
E (of the Gospels), Codex Basilianus (K, iv, 85 in the public library of Hamborn), containing the first two books, with a very few chasms in Luke's.
In some parts smaller writing has taken the place of the older. It belongs to the middle of the 8th century, and was collated by Tischendorf in 1843. See his description in the Studien und Kritiken for 1844. See BASILIAN MANuSCRIPT.
F (of the Gospels), Codex Borelli, now in the library of Utrecht, containing the Gospels, but with many chasms. It was collated and described by Herings, whose work was published by Vinke (1845). The MS. belongs to the end of the 9th century. See Borelli's MANuSCRIPT.
G (of the Epistles), Codex ColoniaM, containing a few fragments of the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, found among the scholia of Codex Coelain, 1, which has the Octoechos, with the book of Kings. They were edited by Tischendorf in his Monumenta Sacra inedita (1846), p. 400 sq. The fragments belong to the 7th century. See COELAIN MANuSCRIPT.
F, in the British Museum, 17,138, a rescript fragment from the Nitrian desert, containing a few places of John's Gospel, which were deciphered and published by Tischendorf in his Monum. crit. ed. vol. ii. The text agrees with the most ancient and best authorities. Tischendorf assigns the fragment to the 4th century; it rather belongs to the 5th.
F, (of the Epistles), Codex AugusM, a Greek-Latin MS. of St. Paul's Epistles, in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge. It wants the Epistle to the Hebrews in Greek and the Romans, 11, 18. Dots are inserted between many of the Greek and Latin words. The text is ancient and valuable. It belongs to the 9th century.
In 1842 and 1849 it was collated by Tischendorf, and edited by Scrivener (1859). See AUGMANN MANuSCRIPT.
G (of the Gospels), Codex Hordwicus, 5604, in the British Museum), a MS. of the four Gospels, but imperfect in many places. It belongs to the 9th or 10th century, and was collated by Tregelles and Tischendorf.
G, (of the Epistles), Codex BoernerM, a Greek-Latin MS. of Paul's Epistles, now in the Royal Library of Dresden. It has the same chasms as F, AugusM, with which it agrees remarkably, so that both texts seem to have proceeded from the same source. They belong to one country and age—probably to Switzerland and the 9th century. Matthei published it in 1781, 8vo. See BOERNER MANuSCRIPT.
H (of the Gospels), Codex Seidellii, 11, a MS. of the gospels in the public library of Hamburg. It is imperfect in many places, belongs to the 9th or 10th century, and was collated by Tregelles in 1856.
H, (of the Acts), Codex Museum (136 in the Ducal Library of Modena), a MS. of the Acts, with considera-tble gaps. Its age is the 9th century. From Acts xxvii, 4 till the end was supplied in uncial letters in the 11th century. The Pauline and Catholic Epistles were added in cursive letters in the 15th or 16th century. Tischendorf collated it in 1843.
H, (of the Epistles), Codex Coelainus (292 in the Imperial Library at Paris). This MS. contains fragments of Paul's Epistles. It consists only of twelve leaves, two of which formerly had been now at Peter-burg, Amsterdam, and is now at Hamborn, collated by Tischendorf from Mount Athos, containing Col. iii, 4-11. The fifteen leaves should be put together. It has been collated by Tischendorf, who intends to publish it all. It belongs to the 9th century. See COELAIN MANuSCRIPT.
I, a MS. in the library of St. Petersburg, found by Tischendorf in 1839, and collated by Wace and Gasquet containing the remains of seven very ancient MSS., exhibiting parts of the Gospels, Acts, and two Pauline Epistles. Tischendorf thinks that the first, second, and third belong to the 9th century. All are edited by him in the first volume of Monumenta Sacra, p. 1, etc.
J, See N.
K (of the Gospels), Codex Region, or Cyprus (now 68 in the Imperial Library of Paris). It contains the four Gospels complete, belongs to the middle of the 9th century, and was accurately collated by Tischendorf in 1843. See PARIS MANuSCRIPTS.
K, (of the Epistles), Codex Mosquensis (xxviii in the Library of the Holy Synod at Moscow), containing the Catholic and Pauline Epistles. It belongs to the 9th century, and was collated by Matthei.
L, (of the Gospels), Codex Regius (92 in the Imperial Library at Paris), containing the Gospels entire with the exception of five places. The text of this codex contains very old and good readings, agreeing remarkably with B. It belongs to the 8th century, and was published by Tischendorf in his Monum. Sacra, 1846, p. 57. See PARIS MANuSCRIPTS.
L, (of the Acts and Epistles), Codex Bibliotheca Angelica (A 2, 15 in the library of the Augustine monks at Rome), a MS. containing the Acts, Catholic Epistles, and those of Paul. It begins with Acts viii, 10, and ends with Hebrews xi, 10. Its age is the 9th century.
It was first collated with care by Fleck; afterwards by Tischendorf and Tregelles.
M (of the Gospels), Codex Region (48 in the Imperial Library of Paris), containing the Gospels entire. This MS. has been transcribed by Tischendorf, but is not yet published. He assigns it to the latter part of the 9th century. See PARIS MANuSCRIPTS.
M, (of the Epistles), two fragments; one at Hamborn, the other at London. The former contains some parts of the Epistle to the Hebrews; the latter, portions of the Epistle to the Corinthians. Both were published by Tischendorf in his Annali sacri, p. 174 sq. The text is both ancient and valuable.
N (of the Gospels), Codex papyrus, the fragment of a MS., of which four leaves are in the British Museum, seven in the Vatican, and two at Vienna. Tischendorf has recently found 80 leaves more, containing about a third of the entire Gospel of Mark, between vi, 53 and xx, 8. The letters were silver on purple vellum. They are larger and rounder than in a B C. The text is in Manuscripts 725

two columns. The Ammonian sections and Eusebian canons are placed in the margin. All contain portions of the Gospels. The contents of the twelve leaves were published by Tischendorf in his Monumenta Iudaica, which assigns the fragment to the end of the 6th century. See Purple Manuscripts.

N° * [Tisch. 1°] (Brit. Mus. Add. 17, 136), a pilipense of the 4th or 5th century, deciphered by Tregelles, and published by Tischendorf (Mon. Iudaic. vol. ii).

N° 1, a few fragments, now at Moscow, of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Tischendorf thinks they may be of the 6th century, but Matthai did not state enough to determine their age.

O, a small fragment, consisting of two leaves, containing 2 Cor. i, 20-22, 12, belonging to the 9th century.

O°, Codex Mosquensis (cxx. at Moscow), a fragment consisting of eight leaves, containing a few parts of John's Gospel; probably of the 9th century. Matthai published the text.

O° 1, the two hymns, Luke i, 46-55 and i, 68-79, in a Latin MS, containing the grammar of Pompeius. They are written in uncial Greek letters, and belong to the 9th century. Tischendorf published them in his Anecdota sacra et profana, p. 206 sq.

O°, the hymn of Mary, Luke i, 46-55, contained in the Verona Psalter, and belonging to the 6th century. The Greek is in Latin letters. It was published by Bianchini in the Patrologia Latina appended to his Vindiciam canonarum Scripturam (Rome, 1740).

O° 1, the three hymns of Luke i and ii, as contained in the Psalter of Turin, written in gold and silver letters, belonging to the 7th century. Tischendorf is about to publish the entire Psalter.

O° 2, the same three hymns in a St.-Gall Codex, 17, written partly in Greek and partly in Latin. Tischendorf assigns the MS to the 9th century.

P (of the Gospels), Codex Gelasianus, A (in the library of Wolfenbüttel), a palimpsest MS, containing fragments of the Gospels. In 1762 Knittel published all he could read. In 1834 Tischendorf succeeded in deciphering almost all the portions of the Gospels that exist, which he has published in his Monumenta Sacra iudaica (1869). See below, Q.

P 1, (of the Acts and Epistles), a MS. of the Acts, Catholic, and Pauline Epistles, and Apocalypse, belonging to the library of Bishop Uspenski in St. Petersburg. This is a valuable palimpsest, consisting of upwards of 300 leaves. Though belonging to the 9th century, the text, except in I Peter and Acts, agrees with that of the oldest codices. The Epistles were published in 1865, and the Acts and Rev. in 1869, by Tischendorf, in his Monum. Sacra.

Q, Codex Gennasianus, B, another palimpsest, containing fragments of Luke and John's Gospel, discovered in 1845, and published with the last fragment by Tischendorf is about to re-edit it in a more complete and accurate state. According to him, P belongs to the 6th, and Q to the 5th century. See Wolfenbüttel Manuscripts.

R, a papyrus fragment, containing parts of 1 Cor. i, vi, vii, belonging to the 6th or 6th century.

R°, a rescript MS, belonging to the British Museum, brought from the Nitrian desert, with many other codices, chiefly Syriac ones. The Syriac text of Severus of Antioch was written over it. The forty-eight leaves contain parts of Luke's Gospel. The writing is in two columns; and the Ammonian sections have not the canons of Eusebius. Tischendorf published almost the whole text (for some of it is illegible) in his Monumenta Sacra iudaica, vol. ii. Dr. Wright found three leaves overlooking by Tischendorf, of which he gave an account in the Journal of Sacred Literature for January, 1864. It is assigned to the 6th century, but may belong to the 7th.

S, Codex Vaticanus, 354. This MS. contains the four Gospels entire. It is in the Vatican Library, where Birch carefully copied it twice for the Greek Testament. A subscription to it states that it was written A.D. 949. See Tischendorf, in the Amulei Vindobonenses (1847), where a fac-simile better than those of Blanchini and Birch is given.

T, Codex Vindobonensis (in the library of the Propaganda at Rome), a MS. of thirteen leaves, containing fragments of John's Gospel. The Greek text has a Theotic translation by its side. Giorgi published the text in 1789 at Rome. Tischendorf, who inspected the MS and made a fac-simile of it, assigns it to the 6th century. See Borgian Manuscripts.

T 1, six leaves, containing John i, ii, iii, iv, belonging to the 6th century.

T 2, two leaves, containing Matt. xiv, xv, belonging to the 6th century. The writing and text resemble those of the Pergamian fragments.

T 4, Fragmentum Wodickanum, a few leaves, Greek and Sabidiac, whose text was edited by Wöilde (contained in the Appendix to the Codex Alexandrinus, 1789). The copy was done for the Bibliotheca Sacra, 25-32; the place of John the Evangelist, 83-42. Tischendorf has discovered that these fragments are parts of P, published by Giorgi. Hence they belong to the same time.

V, Codex Monoceros, formerly Nuziaca in (St. Mark's Library at Venice), a MS. of the Gospels complete, with a text elegantly written. It was first collected accurately by Tischendorf in 1843, and again by Tregelles in 1846. According to Tischendorf it belongs to the end of the 9th or to the 10th century.

V, Codex Mosquensis (in the library of the Holy Synod at Moscow), a MS. of the four Gospels, with several chasmas. From John v, 39 has been supplied by a more recent hand of the 18th century, in cursive letters. It belongs to the 9th century, and was twice collated by Matthai.

W 1, two leaves at the end of Codex Regius, now in the Spanish Library of Paris. They contain Luke ix, 34-47; x, 12-22, and are the fragment of a continuous MS. of the Gospels belonging to the 8th century. Tischendorf has edited the whole in his Monumenta Sacra iudaica.

W 2, Neapolitanus rescriptus, consisting of fourteen leaves which contain fragments of the first three Gospels as old as the 8th century. Tischendorf edited some verses of it in the Amules Vindobonenses (1847); and it is described by Scotti. Tischendorf supposes that the leaves belong to the same MS. as V. W 3, three leaves at St. Gall, containing fragments of Mark and Luke. They are a sort of palimpsest, the writing having been effaced, though nothing new was written over. Tischendorf, who copied, and intends to edit these fragments, assigns them to the 9th century.

W 4, fragments of Mark's Gospel, vii, viii, ix, found in Trinity College, Cambridge, belonging to the 9th century.

X, Codex Monoceros, in the library of the University of Munich, containing fragments of the four Gospels. Commentaries of several fathers, especially Chrysostom, are inserted. The text, except Mark's, belongs to the 9th or 10th century. Between John ii, 22 and vii, 1, is supplied by a later hand of the 12th century. The MS. was collated by Tischendorf and Tregelles. See Monoceros Manuscript.

X 1, Codex Patavinius, No. 225, six leaves containing fragments of John's Gospel, belonging to the 8th century, copied by Tischendorf in 1843, and published in his Monumenta Sacra iudaica, 1846. They are now in the Barberini Library at Rome.
Z. Codex Dublinaeus, in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, a palimpsest, containing fragments of Matthew's Gospel, and belonging to the 6th century. The text of this MS. presents ancient and valuable readings.
It was published in fac-simile by Barrett, 1801, 4to, and Tregelles has since (1853) deciphered the remainder.
(Plate 7, figs. 166 sq.) See Dublinaeus Manuscript.
A, a MS. now in the Bodleian Library, consisting of 157 leaves large 4to. It contains Luke's Gospel entire, and parts of the other three. The form of the letters resembles the Codex Cyrilicus or K. Tischendorf, who got it in the East, assigns it to the 9th century. He cannot, however, describe it in Apocrypta et profanae.
The second half of this MS. has recently been found, containing the greatest part of Matthew and John. The date is 844.
Δ. Codex Sungelmianus, a Greek-Latin MS. in the library of St. Gall, containing the four Gospels entire, with the exception of John xix, 17-35. It is very similar in character to G (Cod. Boernerianus), both belong-ting to the same age and country, i.e. they were written in the monastery of St. Gall, in Switzerland, in the 9th century. Reitz published it at Zürich, in fac-simile, in 1852. The text of this MS., with the codices Augensia and Boernerianus, are portions of one and the same document.
See Gall, St. Manuscript.
Θ. Codex Tischendorfianus I, in the library of Leipzig University, consisting of four leaves, of which the three external were deciphered by Tischendorf, and the second by St. Petri of Leipsic. See The Sects of Matthew's Gospel. Tischendorf assigns them to the end of the 7th century.
He published the contents in his Monumenta Sacra medii Æevi, p. 1, etc.
θα, a fragment, containing six leaves, with Matt. xxii, and xxiii, and Mark iv, belonging to the 7th century. θβ, two leaves, containing Matt. xxvi, 19-24, and John xviii, 29-35, belonging to the 6th century. θε, a small fragment of the 8th century, containing Luke xi, θη, a fragment of Matt. xxvi, of the 6th century. θθ, four leaves, containing Matt. xxvi, xxvii, Mark i and ii. Of the 6th century. θι, a fragment of John vi, belonging to the 6th century. θς, a Greek-Arabic MS., containing three leaves, with Matt. xiv and xxv, belonging to the 9th century.
A, a MS. in the Bodleian Library, containing the Gospels of Luke and John entire. It consists of 157 leaves, and belongs to the 9th century. Tischendorf and Tregelles have collated it.
Ι, a valuable MS. of the Gospels, almost complete, brught by Tischendorf from the monastery of St.
Petersburg. It belongs to the 9th century. (See Tischendorf's Notitius editionis codicis Bibliorum Sinaitici, etc., p. 51.)
Ξ, Codex Zacynthius, a palimpsest containing fragments of Luke's Gospel, belonging to the committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society. It is of the 6th century, and is accompanied by a catena of the 12th.
Tregelles transcribed and published the fragments (1861). See Zacynthian Manuscript.
Such are the uncial MSS. hitherto collated. Their number is not great; and every year is adding to it.
There are known upwards of a hundred uncials, including evangelistaria and apocali. (See the table below.) 4. The number of the curvata MSS. (minuscule) in existence cannot be accurately calculated. Tischendorf catalogues about 500 of the Gospels, 290 of the Acts and Catholic Epistles, 250 of the Pauline Epistles, and a little less than 100 of the Apocalypse (exclusive of lection-aries); but this enumeration can only be accepted as a rough approximation. Many of the MSS. quoted are only known by old references; still more have been "imperfectly preserved to a recent currency; few only have been thoroughly collated. In this last work the Rev. F. H. Scriv-ener (Collation of about 20 MSS. of the Holy Gospels, Camb. 1853; Cod. Aug. etc., Camb. 1859) has labored with the greatest success, and removed many common errors as to the character of the latter text. His summary is as follows:

Among the MSS. which are well known and of great value are the following the most important:

A. Primary Codices of the Gospels: 1. (Act. 1) Paul 1; βαπτισματι, K. III. B. 10th. century Very valuable in the Gospels. Collated by Roth and Tregelles.
Coll. by Tregelles.
Scrivener, 1800, but as yet unpublished.
4. (Act. 81; Paul 37; Apoc. 14; Cod. Leicestrensis). 14th. century. The text of the Gospels is especially valuable. Coll. by Tregelles, 1853, and by Scrivener, 1850, who published his collation in Cod. Aug., etc., 1850.
5. (Rev. 15; Matt. 73; Mark 84). 13th. century. Coll. by Griesbach, Symb. Crít. I, etc., 1819.
6. (Acts 19; Paul 71; Apoc. 66; Cod. Vaticana, 550). 13th. century. This MS. was long thought to belong to Alderan and was probably used by him in his edition. Coll. by by Burkhol. century. Coll. by Alter.
by Matthew. century. Coll. by Scrivener, 1850, but as yet unpublished. by Marbull, De Scholiis Sept. (Add. 1706.) 11. (Rev. 10; Matt. 188; Apoc. 46; Venice, Bibl. S. Marcii, 17th. century. The text of the Gospels is especially valuable.
13. (Rev. 10; Matt. 188; Apoc. 46; Venice, Bibl. S. Marcii, 17th.
Rist., 1505. 18th. century. Coll. by Scrivener, 1850.

5. MSS. are sometimes divided by the critics of Germany into 1. Such as were written before the practice of stichometry, a mode of dividing the text in lines or clauses. See STICHOMETRY. 2. The stichometrical, 3. Those written after stichometry had ceased. So Hug and De Wette, in their Introductions to the N.T. According to this classification, N, A, B, and, C belong to the first class; D, E, etc., to the second; and by far the greatest number to the third. We have alluded to them under the two great heads of scandal and carter. In examining MSS. and comparing their characteristic readings, it is not easy in every instance to arrive at this true original form of a passage. Many circumstances are to be taken into account, and many cautious to be observed. They are more useful in detecting interpolated passages than in resoter.

Specimens of Greek MSS. from the 10th to the 14th century, now in the British Museum: Fig. 1 is from the Harleian Evangelistary, No. 2290, and contains John 1, 1, 8 (Scrivener, Intro. p. 218, No. 1160). The text is from Add. 69, 603, and contains Acts xxii, 18-20 (Scrivener, p. 34). Fig. 2, from the Harleian Evangelistary, No. 2290, contains John 1, 1-3 (Scrivener, p. 157, No. 1160). Fig. 4, from Burney Lectionary, 93, contains John 1, 1-3 (Scrivener, p. 340, No. 1160).
ing the correct reading. The reading of an older MS is preferable castis paireix. In determining the age of a MS, internal marks are chiefly followed, such as the form of the letters, the divisions, abbreviations, the nature of the lines, the presence or absence of the accents, etc. These particulars, however, are not safe criteria. Age alone, however, amidst the value of the text of a MS. The copyist may have been guilty of negligence or inattention. In proportion to his accuracy or carelessness the authority of the codex will be greater or less. Again, a document certainly copied from one which is very ancient will have greater authority than an earlier taken from another of later date. A MS. of the eighth century may have been directly copied from one of the fifth, and consequently the former will be entitled to greater estimation than one belonging to the 7th century transcribed from one of the 6th. In determining the value of a codex, it is necessary to consider the country where it was written. Griesbach and others prefer the African; Scholz, the Constantino-politan. Those written in Egypt are the best. With respect to Hebrew MSS., it is admitted by all that the Spanish are the best. The Italian, again, are superior to the German. The number contained in the greater number of MSS. is preferable to that of a less number. Mere majority, however, is not a safe criterion. A majority arising from independent sources, or, in other words, of those belonging to different recensions, can alone be relied upon. But here again this is proceeded as to the number of recensions belonging to Greek MSS. Some have proposed four, some three, others two. Besides, the same MS. may belong to a different recension in different parts of itself. In others, the characteristic readings of two or three recensions are mingled together, rendering it difficult to determine which recension or family preponderates. Hebrew MSS. belong to one and the same recension. It is true that some have distinguished them into Masoretic and Ane-masoretic, but the existence of the latter is a mere fiction. One great family alone, viz. the Masoretic, can be distinctly traced. Since the time of Lachmann's first edition, greater importance has been attached by N. T. critics to the age of MSS. It has been the object of his followers in the same department to adhere for the most part to the oldest copies. This is right within certain limits. The true text of the N. T., as far as we can now obtain it, lies in the MSS. of the 4th till the 8th centuries, accompanied and modified by the testimony of ancient versions and fathers during that period. But within this period we can easily distinguish MSS. of a second order in goodness, viz. E, P, Ω, i, K, M, S, U, V, from those of the first class, N, A, B, C, Z (see Davidson's Biblical Criticism, vol. ii). See CRITICISM, BIBLICAL.

Ma'och (Heb. Moek, מֹאֵך, compressed; Sept. Ἄμπαο, Vulg. Maocch), the father of the Achish king of Gath to whom David repaired for safety (1 Sam. xxvi. 2). B.C. ante 1054. By many he has been confounded with the Maacah of 1 Kings ii. 89. See Achish.

Ma'on (Heb. Maon, מֹאָן, habitation, as often: Sept. Maono), the name of a man and of a place. See also MAONITE.

1. The son of Shammi, the tribe of Judah and family of Caleb, and the "father" (i.e. founder) of Bethzur (1 Chron. ii. 45). B.C. prob. post 1618.

2. A town in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 50), which gave name to a wilderness (part of the desert) of Judah, in which is not sufficient to express the whole extent of the place, as from Saul, and around which the curialh Nabal had great possessions (1 Sam. xxiii. 24, 25; xxv, 3). Josephus calls it Emma (ἐμμα, οντως, Maon). Iryb and Mangels were in the neighborhood in 1818, but did not detect this other and ancient names. Robinson finds it in the present Ma'in, which is about seven miles south by east from Hebron. Here there is a conical hill about 200 feet high, on the top of which are some ruins of no great extent, consisting of foundations of hewn stone, a square enclosure, the remains probably of a tower or castle, and several cisterns. The view from the summit is extensive. The traveller found here a band of peasants keeping their flocks, and dwelling in caves and huts. Researches in the West of Palestine, with this identification De Saulcy (Narrative, i, 441) and Schwartz (Palestine, p. 106) agree. See Maonite.

Ma'onite (Heb. same word as Ma'on, usedcollectively; Sept. and Vulg. interpret Xoxaao [v. r. Maadu], Chamaan, Auth. Vers. "Maonites"), an Arabian tribe mentioned in connection with the Amalekites, Sidonians, Philistines, and others as having houses and villages in the Hebrews (Judg. xii. 12). They are the same as the MAONITES (מֹאָן), Meimon, the plural of Ma'on; Sept. Misraio, confounding them with the Ammonites; Vulg. Ammonita, and tabernaculis; Auth. Vers. "Meonim," and "the tabernacles," elsewhere mentioned in a similar connection (2 Chron. xxvi. 27; 1 Chron. iv. 31). See also MAONITE. At the present day there exists a town called Ma'an, with a castle, in Arabia Petraea, to the south of the Dead Sea (see Seetzen, in Zach's Monat. Correspond. xvii, 382; Burchhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 457). Prof. Robinson says, "Ma'an, the well-known town on the route of the Syrian highway, and wady Musa, is much better known as the probable seat of the Maonites mentioned in the Scriptures. Abulfeda (Syr. p. 14) describes Ma'an as inhabited by Ommiades and their vessels" (Researches, ii, 572). That the Minus of Arabia (Diod. Sic. iii. 42; Polyb. vii. 7, 23; Strabo, xvii. 769) is a different people has long since been shown by Bochart (Phyleg. ii, 25). Traces of the name Ma'on are found in several localities besides that of the above passages. It is given to a town in the south of Judah, now identified with the ruins of Tell Main (Porter, H. H. H. B. S. and P., p. 61). In pronouncing a prophetic curse upon Moab, Jeremiah mentions Beth-memon (xliv. 29), which may perhaps be the same as the Beth-baal-memon of Josh. xiii. 17, and the Baal-memon of Numb. xxxi. 38, and would thus be identical with the ruin Main, three miles south of Heshbon. See BETH-BAAL-MEON. Hence "it is probable that all those names indicate the presence of an ancient and powerful nomad tribe, which was allied to the Phoenicians (or Sidonians), whose earliest settlements were in the vale of Sodom, and with the Amalekites who dwelt in the wilderness of Paran. When these Moanites migrated eastward, leaving their name at Ma'an in the south of Judah, where they may have had their headquarters for a time, and again at Beth-memon, on the plateau of Moab, and also at the large modern village above described.

Maphria is in the Syrian Church the highest episcopal dignity after the patriarch of Antioch. The jurisdiction of the maphria extends over Chaldea, Assyria, and Mesopotamia. His residence was formerly at Tabris, beyond the Tigris, but since this see has ceased with that of Mosul it is at the latter place. Naas (Aned. Hist. of the Eastern Church, p. 162) says that "the maphrias are now only nominally distinguished from the other metropolitans."

Mapletoft, John, D.D., an English minister, was born at Margaret-Ing, Huntingdonshire, in 1631; received his education at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1653; and in 1658 became tutor to Josephus, earl of Northumberland; in 1660 entered upon the study of medicine, and finally practiced it with great success, filling at one time the chair of physic in Gresham College, London. Having turned his attention to the study of divinity, he took, in 1690, both the Bachelor and Master of Arts, and in the latter year presented to the rectory of Braybrooke, in Northamptonshire, by lord Griffin; in 1684 was chosen lecturer of Ipswich; and in 1685 vicar of St. Lawrence, Jewry.
MAPPA

and lecturer of St. Christopher's, in London; received his D.D. in 1698, and in 1707 was chosen president of Sion College. He died at Westminster in 1721. Dr. Mapleton published Principles and Duties of the Christian Religion (2d ed., corrected and enlarged, Lond. 1715, 8vo), and other minor pieces upon moral and theological subjects.

MAPPA, the name of the linen cloth with which the communion table, and subsequently the altar, was covered. It came to be considered essential that this cloth should be of linen, according to some, in commemoration of the linen cloth in which the body of the Lord was wrapped. This, however, it seems would apply better to the corporate (q.v.). Opus of Milene, in De schismate Domitiiarum, speaks of this custom as general. In the Roman Catholic Church there are a number of regulations concerning the mappa, which is always to be blessed by the bishop, or by some one commissioned by him for the purpose—Piller, Universal-Lexikon, x, 818; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, ix, 7.

Ma'ra (Heb. Mara'), מַרָּא, for מַר, better, as explained in the context; Sept. μαραία, Vulg. Mara, id est amara, a symbolic name proposed for herself by Naaomi on account of her misfortunes (Ruth i, 20). See Ruth.

Mara, a famous diva of Hindu mythology mentioned in the history of Guatama (q.v.).

Marabuts, a name given to the descendants of the Maravives (q.v.; see also Mohammedans), or Almoravides, a certain Arabic tribe which, in 1025, founded a dynasty in the north-western parts of Africa, and held Morocco and Spain for a considerable period. The Almohades having put an end to their temporal dominion, the Moors resorted to this exercise of spiritual superiority over the Moamen negroes in Barbary, the coast of Guinea, etc. At present the Marabuts form a kind of priestly order, officiating at mosques and chapels, explaining the Koran, providing the faithful with amulets, prophesying, and working miracles. They are looked up to with great awe and reverence by the common people, who also allow them a certain vague license over their goods and chattels, their wives not excluded. The Great Marabout ranks next to the king, and the dignity of a Marabout is generally hereditary. One of the most eminent Marabouts of our day is the celebrated Mohammedan warrior Abd-el-Kader, who was born in 1807, and in 1832 opened the contest against the French to expel the latter from African territory, which resulted so unsuccessfully to the Mohammedan cause.

Marafoschi, Prospero, an Italian prelate, was born Sept. 29, 1653, at Macerata; entered the priesthood while yet a youth; became canon of St. Peter's at Rome, and later bishop in parishes of Cyrene. He enjoyed the favor and confidence of several of the incumbents of the papal chair. Clement XI, in 1721, gave him the archiepiscopal see of Cesarea and Capadocia; Benedict XII created him cardinal in 1724, and in 1726 made him vicar-general of Rome. He died Feb. 24, 1732—Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xxi, 347.

Ma rah (Hebrew Marah', מַרָּה, bitterness, from the taste of the water; Sept. θρήσκος, Æpirix, Vulg. Mara), a brackish fountain, forming the sixth station of the Israelites, lies some distance from their passage across the Red Sea (Exod. 15, 25; Num. 33, 8). Finding here a well so bitter that, thirsty as they were, they could not drink its water, they murmured against Moses, who at the divine direction cast in a "certain tree," by which means it was made palatable. It has been suggested (Burchart, Syriac, p. 474) that Moses made use of the berries of the plant Ghrâbûd (Robinson says [1, 26] the Peganum veniam of Forskål, Flora Exot. Ag. Arab. p. lxvi; more correctly, the Nitria triandra of Desfontaines, Flora Atlant. i, 372), and which still, it is implied, would be found to operate similarly. Robinson, however (i, 67), could not find that this or any tree was now known by the Arabs to possess such properties; nor would those berries, he says, have been found so early in the season as the time when the Israelites reached the region. It may be added that, had any such resource ever existed, its eminent usefulness to the supply of human wants would hardly have let it perish from the traditions of the desert. Further, the expression 'the Lord showed' seems surely to imply the miraculous character of the transaction. With regard to the care of the water, it has been well argued (Kitto, Pictorial History of the Holy Land, p. 289) that no example really proves consistent or satisfactory; neither is there any tree in that region or elsewhere now known which possesses such virtue in itself, or which is used for a similar purpose by the Arabs. We are therefore compelled to conclude, as indeed, the narrative spontaneously suggests, that the shrub selected was indifferent, being one nearest at hand, and that the restorative property ceased with the special occasion which had called for its exercise, leaving the well to resume its acrid taste as at present found. The name Marah, in the form of Almara, is now borne by the barren bed of a winter torrent, a little beyond which is still found a well called Howara, the bitter waters of which answer to this description. Cams will drink it, but the thirsty Arabs never partake of it themselves, as it is said to be the water which they drink in the shore of the Red Sea which they cannot drink. The water of this well, when first taken into the mouth, seems insipid rather than bitter, but when held in the mouth a few seconds it becomes exceedingly nauseous. The well rises within an elevated mound surrounded by sand-hills, and two small date-trees grow near it. The basin is six or eight feet in diameter, and the water about two feet deep. (See Burchardt, Trav. in Syria, p. 472; Robinson, Researches, i, 96 sq.; Bartlett, Forty Days in the Desert, p. 80; and other travellers.) "Wi- sely, in a word," says Dr. Burchardt (p. 473), "that a still bitterer well lies east of Marah, the claims of which Tischendorf, it appears, has supported. Lepsius prefers scaky Gharâbûd. Prof. Stanley thinks that the claim may be left between this and Howara, but adds in a note a mention of a spring south of Howara 'so bitter that neither men nor camels could drink it,' of which Dr. Grau (ii, 524) was told. The Ayoun Mousa, wells of Moses, of which local tradition assigns to Marah, are manifestly too close to the head of the gulf, and probably spot of crossing it, to suit the distance of 'three days' journey.' The soil of the region is described as being alternately level, stony, and sandy; under the range of the Gebel Wardan chalk and clints are plentiful, and on the direct line of route between Ayoun Mousa and Howara no water is found (Robinson, 477)."

See EXODUS.

Mar'alah (Heb. Maralah, מַרָּלָה, a trembling; Sept. Mapalakh), a place on the southern boundary of Zebulon, but apparently within the bounds of Issachar, west of Sarid and east of Dabbazeth (Josh. xix, 11). These indications point to some locality not far from the present Miya'el, although the name would seem to agree better with that of the neighboring site, Melek. The latter place agrees with the identification of Porter, who places it near Nahal Dalek, and who thought that Mahabal is a little village on four miles south-west of Nazareth, on the top of a hill, containing the ruins of a temple, and other vestiges of antiquity. In the surrounding rocks and cliffs are some excavated tombs (Handbook, p. 885). See Nahalah.

Maran-atha (Mapal 63, from the Aramean ܢܓܓ, nara' athak, our Lord comes, i.e. to judge, Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. coll. 1248) and the somewhat modern variant, a phrase added to the sentence of excommunication by way of appeal to the divine Head of the Church for ratification (1 Cor. xvi, 22). See ANATHEMA. "In the A.V. it is combined with the preceding 'anathema,' but this is unnecessary; at all events it can only be regarded as adding emphasis to the previous adornment. It rather appears to be added as a weighty watchword to impress upon the disciples the important truth that the Lord was at hand, and that they should be ready to meet him (Alford, Gr. Text. ad loc.). If, on the other hand, the phrase be taken to mean, as it may, 'our Lord has come,' then the connection is, 'the curse will remain, for the Lord has come who will take vengeance upon him.' The definition 'Maran' is explained by a tradition that the Jews, in expectation of a Messiah, were constantly saying Maran, i.e. Lord; to which the Christians answered Maran 아가, the Lord is come, why do you still expect him? (Stanley, Corinthienses, ad loc.)."

"Maran" is one of the names used to designate the new Christians of Spain, i.e. those Jews (q.v.) who, during the religious persecutions under Roman rule, publicly avowed conversion to Christianity and yet privately confessed the religion of their fathers, as e.g. the family of Maimonides (q.v.). The name owes its origin to the fact that not only Jews, but also Moors (q.v.) made a feigned profession of conversion to the Christian faith. See INQUISITION; SPAIN.

"Maranrubius, Prudentius, a noted French theologian, was born, according to Winer (Theol. Literatur, p. 651), at Seznanne, whilst Le Cerf (Bibliotheque de la Cong. de St. Maur, p. 298) and Zedler (Universallexicon, s. v.) state that he was born at Douai in Hainaut. He was educated at the University of Louvain. After spending some time in England, he returned to France, and died at Rouen in 1627. He is perhaps best known for his "Mémoires de Trévoux," which was dedicated to the French King. He was a zealous supporter of the Reformation, and his works are still studied by students of theology."

"Maran, Pedro de, a Spanish Jesuit and missionary, flourished near the close of the 17th century. In 1675 he went to Bolivia, and later to Mexico, and labored among the Indians of the Potosi province, among the savages of America, and finally became superior of all the missions of the Jesuits in this quarter. He wrote Arte de la Lengua Mozo, con su vocabulario y catecumenos (Lima, 1701, 8vo)."

"Marbank, Johann, an eminent German Protestant theologian, was born at Lindau Aug. 24, 1521, and was educated at the University of Wittenberg, where he commenced his study of theology. He became successively dean at Jena in 1540, preacher at IVry in 1544, and at Strasburg in 1548. He was afterwards sent by the latter city to the Council of Trent, together with Seiden. In 1555 he was appointed chief priest and professor of theology. Here he labored to introduce the Lutheran doctrines in the place of the Reformed, whereby he became involved in numberless controversies. In 1556 he was employed by the elector Henry to organize the Reformation in the Palatinate, and in 1557 was present at the Diet of Worms. He ceased preaching in 1558, and died deacon of Thomas College, March 17, 1581. He wrote Chnstlicher und wohlrathlicher Unterricht von d. Worten d. Einsetzung d. heil. Abendmala, etc. (Strasb. 1565, 8vo), and other similar works, all upholding the ultra-Lutheran views. See also quaint, Synthesis Constitutum de L'eglise Catholique, a work addressed to the Emperor Charles V. Strasburg sous la direction de Marbach (Strasb. 1857); Pacher, Universal-Lexikon, x. 852; Hertzog, Real-Encycl. ix. 10."

"Marbeck, or Marbecke, John, the composer of the solemn and now venerable notes set to the "Prices" and Responses in use in the cathedrals of England, to our day with only slight modifications, was organist of Windsor during the reign of Henry VIII and his successor. A zeal for religious reformation led him to join a society in the dispensation of that object, of which a great number of were a priest, a singing-man of St. George's Chapel, and a tradesman of the town. Their papers were seized, and in the handwriting of Marbeck were found notes on the Bible, together with a concordance, in English. He and his three colleagues were found guilty of heresy, and condemned to the stake. The others were executed according to their sentence; but Marbeck, on account of his great musical talents, and being rather favored by Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, was pardoned, and lived to witness the triumph of his principles. He published a book of a dissertations, and a dissertation upon the important object of the title of the Book of Common Prayer, added. The colophon is 'Imprinted by Richard Grafton, printer to the kings majestie, 1550, cum privilegio ad imprimendum solium' (a verbis reprint was given by John Pickering, London, 1649, sig. A1). His name is also his Concordia of the Whole Bible (1560, folio), the first complete work of the kind in English; and, in 1574, The Lives of Holy Saints, Prophets, Patriarchs, and others; and, subsequently, his other books connected with religious history and controversy. MARBLE CONFERENCE Eolith. 1,6, Sept. πάρον; Cant. v, 15, Sept. μαρμάρωσις), or πέτρα (στοιχεία, 1 Chron. xxix, 2, Sept. πάρον), so called from its whiteness, undoubtedly refer to a pure kind of marble, μαρμάρωσις (Rev. xviii, 12). Primary limestone, or marble, is a simple rock, consisting of carbonate of lime. In its pure state, it is granular, crystalline, and of a color varying from pure white to gray and yellow. Sometimes found in massive lumps, or beds, or large nodules, with little or no appearance of stratification; more generally, however, it is regularly stratified, and these strata alternate with other rocks, and are of all varieties of thickness. The texture varies from a highly crystalline, of a large or finer grain, to a compact and even earthy. Other substances are sometimes combined with the simple rock, which modifies its appearance and texture, such as mica, quartz, hornblende. It is never found in veins, except in the form of regular crystals, and, in this respect, it exactly resembles the calcite. As a generation rule, it may be said, they, like the primary cherts, are almost desitute of organic bodies. Like the strata which it accompanies, beds of limestone are often bent and contorted, evidently from disturbance below. The colors vary from a pure white, which constitutes the strata of the limestone, to various shades of brown, black, and green. These tints are derived from a carbonaceous matter or oxide of iron, or an admixture of other minerals.

Several other terms occur in Eolith. i, 6, as the names of stones in the pavement of the magnificent hall in which the Agasares feasted the princes of his empire. That rendered "white" marble, is ταῖς, dar, which some take to signify Parians marble, others white marble; but nothing certain is known about it. In Arabic, the word dar signifies a large pearl. Now pearls were certainly employed by the ancients in decorating the walls of apartments in royal palaces, but were also used in the pavements of even royal dining-rooms is improbable in itself, and supported by no examined example. The Septuagint refers the Hebrew word to a stone resembling pearls (σημωνίας λίθος), by which, as S. D. Michaeels conjectures, it intends to denote the Alabastri of Pliny (Hist. Nat., xxxi, 7, 8), which was a kind of alabaster with the gloss of mother-of-pearl. See Alabaster.

The θησος (bath); Sept. θησοφαητήρ, "red" marble) of the same passage was, Gesenius thinks, the recrinite, or half-phenyl of Egypt. The θησος (socke-reth; Sept. Πιερος λίθος, "black" marble) is likewise there mentioned with the other kinds of marble for forming a pavement. Gesenius says, perhaps tortoiseshell. Others, from the rendering of the Syriace, think it refers to black marble. It was probably some spotted variety of marble. See Mineralogy. The pavement in the palace of the Agasares was no doubt of mosaic work, the floors of the apartments being laid with painted tiles or slabs of marble, in the same way as Dr. Russell describes the houses of the wealthy in modern times. In those a portion of the pavement of the courts is of mosaic, and it is usually that part which lies between the fountain and the arched alcove on the south side that is thus beautified. See House.

"The marble pillars and tessel of various colors of the palace at Susa came doubtless from Persia itself, where marble of various colors is found, especially in the province of Hamadan, Susiana (Marco Polo, Travels, p. 78, ed. Bohn; Chadwell, Fug. iii, 290, 308, 358, and viii, 253; P. della Valle, Toneri, ii, 256). The so-called marble of Persia is Alabaster from which Josaph calls Λαβαστρος λίθος, may thus have been limestone—(a) from near Jerusalem; (b) from Lebanon (Jura limestone), identical with the material of the Susa Temple at Beaelkho; or (c) white marble from Arabia or elsewhere, (Josaph, Ant. viii, 3, 2; Diod. Sic. ii, 52; Pliny, H. N. xxxvi, 12; Jamison, Mineralogy, p. 41; Räumer, Pol. p. 28; Volney, Trav. ii, 241; Kitto, Phys. Geog. of Pol. p. 73, 88; Robinson, ii, 438; iii, 508; Stanley, S. and P. p. 407; Thackeray, i, 426; ii, 146). In all these cases the stone was not marble seems probable from the remark of Josephus, that whereas Solomon constructed his buildings of "white stone," he caused the roads which led to Jerusalem to be made of "black stone," probably the black basalt of the Hauran, and also from the account of the Temple of the Herodian or Aelia Capitolina, which was μεγάλος λευκός και μαρμάρως (Josephus, Ant. i, c. 1, and War, v, 5, 16; ii, 6; Kitto, ut sup. p. 74, 75, 80, 89). But whether the 'costly stone' employed in Solomon's buildings was marble or not, it seems clear, from the expressions both of Scripture and Josephus, that some, at least, of the 'great stones,' whose weight can scarcely have been less than forty tons, must have come from Lebanon (1 Kings v, 14-18; vii, 10; Josephus, Ant. viii, 2, 9). There can be no doubt that Herod, both in the Temple and elsewhere, employed Parian or other marble. References to the building still exist in the Jerusalem of Josephus (Josephus, Ant. xv, 9, 4, 6, and 11, 3, 5; Williams, Holy City, ii, 330; Sandys, p. 190; Robinson, i, 301, 806). See Stone.

1. The Marburg Bible is the name given to an edition of the holy scriptures, published at Marburg (1712, 4to), under the direction of Prof. Dr. Horch (with the assistance of several scholars, particularly of inspector Schoffer, in Berleburg). It contains the text of Luther's, corrected by comparison with the original texts, and gives, in the introductions and in the headings, commentaries on the most important allegorical and prophetic (by Cocceius). The Marburg Conference, a gathering of all the reformed theological leaders, held at the city of Marburg, Oct. 3, 1529, and designed to bring about, if possible, an agreement between Luther and Zwingli and their adherents. The gathering of Philip of Hesse and the noblest princes of the Reformation days, believing that the dissensions in the Protestant camp should be allayed, directed all his energies towards the conciliation of the two reformed factions, caused by a difference of opinion as to the proper observance of the eucharistic ceremony. With a sense of the importance of this view, he invited the theologians of both parties to meet for the purpose of comparing their opinions in a friendly manner. Melanchoth had already, in 1529, at the Diet of Spires, declared his readiness to attend such a conference (Corp. Ref. i, 1030 and 1078), and even had gone so far as to declare that he attached no special importance to the differences concerning the Eucharist (Corp. Ref. i, 1046). Philip of Hesse now applied to Zwingli (Zwingli Opp. viii, 287), who also expressed his willingness to come (Zwingli Opp. viii, 662). Luther, however, was least strongly opposed to the plan, fearing that some might result in more harm than good; but the landgrave persisting, Luther finally consented, and on Sept. 30, 1529, Luther, Melanchoth, Cruciger, Jonas, Mykonius, and Musius, accompanied by the Saxon counsellor Eberhard, went to Marburg, where they held the Conference. The Swiss theologians had arrived the day before; among them, Zwingli, professor Rudolph Collin, (Ecolampadius, Sturm, Bucer, and Hedio. Osander, Brent, and Agricola arrived only on October 2. A number of other theologians and eminent persons from all parts of Germany were present, among whom Prince Zimmern. The difference between Luther and Ecolampadius, and Zwingli and Melanchoth, the public debates commenced. "In the first place, several points were discussed touching the divinity of Christ, original sin, baptism, the Word of God, etc., regarding which the Wittenbergers suspected the orthodoxy of Zwingle. These were all secondary matters with Zwingle, in reference to which he dropped his unchurchly views, and declared his agreement with the views of the eccumenical councils. But in regard to the article of the Lord's Supper he was the more pertinacious. When John w., 83, 'The flesh prof-itheth nothing,' he argued the absurdity of Luther's view (Kurtz). Luther had insisted upon the literal interpretation of the expression, Hoc est corpus meum. Both parties disputed without arriving at any better appreciation of each other's views. 'Agreement was out of the question,' Luther declared. See Galler, 253. See himself ready to maintain fraternal fellowship, but Luther and his party rejected the offer. Luther said, 'Ihr haben einen andern geist erwir.' Still the conference, while failing in its main object, was not entirely fruitless. 'Luther found that his opponents did not hold as offensive views as he supposed, and the Swiss also that Luther's doctrine was not so gross and Caperma tic as they thought.' Both parties engaged to refrain in future from publishing injurious pamphlets against each other as they had formerly done, and agreed 'to earnestly desire to lead them to a better understanding of the truth.' At the request of the landgrave, Luther drew up a series of fifteen articles (Articles of Marburg), containing the common fundamental principles of the Reformation, which were subscribed to by the Swiss. The first four were especially pronounced unanimous consent to the eccumenical faith of the Church against the errors of papists and Anabaptists.
In the fifteenth the Swiss conceded that the body and blood of Christ were present in the sacrament, but they could not agree to his corporeal presence in the bread and wine' (Kurtz). The Articles of Marburg were subsequently used as a basis for the Confession of Augsburg Marca, Pierre de, a French Roman Catholic theological and historian, was born at Pau, in Bearm, Jan.

24, 1693. He was of good family, was brought up by the Jesuits of Auch, and afterwards studied law at Toul-house. In 1613 he became member of the Council of Pau, and when, in 1621, this body was erected into a parliament by Louis XIII, he was appointed its president, as a reward for his services to Romanism. After the death of his wife, which occurred in 1628, he entered the Church. In 1639 he was made counsellor of state.
Cardinal de Richelieu having commissioned him to reply to Herem's Optatus Gallus, Marca composed De Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii (Paris, 1641 sq.), which is his ablest work, and was rewarded by the bishopric of Conseran, to which he was appointed in 1648. The pope, however, would not approve the Gallican writer as in-campent of the episcopal office, and the appointment was not sanctioned at Rome until Marca had recalled the work in 1651. In 1652 he was appointed one of the six bishops of Toulouse; later was transferred to the archi-episcopal see of Paris, and there died in the year of his transfer, 1662. He wrote also Dissertatio de Primata Legumam et cotieris primaticias (1644, 8vo)—Relation of ce qui s'est passé depuis 1638 dans la casse des églises au sujet des congs propositions (Paris, 1657, 4to).
This was unfavorable to the Jansenists, and was refuted by Nicole in his Belgia percursor, and some other writers. Collections of some other writings of Marcio on divers subjects were published by Baluze (1669 and 1681, 2 vol., 8vo), and Blaise (1668, 4to), who, however, brought out the best edition of Marca's De Concor-Marcella, Sr., is the name of two saints in the Romish Church. (1) One of these was a Roman widow, the intimate friend of Paula and of Eustochius, and a pupil of the noted Church father Jerome, who said of her that we could judge of her merits by her no-noble disciples. Marcella was a Christian, and deeply learned in the Scriptures. She was greatly opposed to the errors of Origen, who mingled the dogmas of Oriental philosophy with the truths of Christianity. On difficult passages of Scripture she consulted Jerome; but she herself came forth free from all perversities of the Gnostic, and her answers were always dictated by prudence and humility. She died A.D. 409, soon after Rome was taken by the Goths, from the effects of the assau-tault and abuse of the troops of Alaric. She is commemorated annually in the campalistry of the Church in Alexandria, flourished in the days of the emperor Severus. She is commemorated June 28.

Marcellian, a sect of heretics who flourished towards the close of the 4th century; so called from Marcellus of Ancyræ, whom the Arians unjustly accused of reviving the errors of Sabellius. Epiphanius informs us that they are at the same time the followers of Origen and of Sabellius; they denied the justness of charging Marcilus of Ancyræ with the heretical tendencies of the so-called Marcellians.
The latter denied the three hypostases, holding the Son and the Holy Ghost as two emanations from the divine nature, to exist independently only until the performance of their respective offices, and then to return again into the substance of the Father. See MARCELLUS OF ANCYRÆ.

Marcellus, a noted female pupil of Cappocrates (q. v.), commenced teaching at Rome the Gnostic system of her instructor, in 160, under Anicetus, and met with so great success in it, A.D. 163, that she was invited to Epiphanius, (Har. 27, 6) that her followers and pupils were designated Marcellinists. This is the sect mentioned by Celsus (Orig. c. Celum, vol. v), and are not to be mistaken for the followers of Marcellus of Ancyræ, the Mar-cellins. Origin asserts that he could find no trace of the Marcellinists. Another Marcella was the sister of Ambrose, and a strict ascetic. Herzog, Real-Ency-klopaedia, i, 20; Pierer, Universal-Lexikon, s, 855.

Marcellinus, a native of Rome, son of Projectus, is said to have been made bishop of Rome May 3, 296.
As he lived in a period of violent persecution, we have but little certain information concerning him; the acts of a synod said to have been held at Sinuessa in 308 (published by Manzi, Colla, 1, 250 sq. and Hardouin, Coll., Conc. i, 217 sq.) relate as follows: Dionelitian had succceeded in compelling the hitherto steadfast bishop to come with him into the temple of Yesta and Isis, and to offer up incense to them; this was afterwards proclaimed by three priests and two deacons who had witnessed the deed, and a synod was assembled to investigate the affair at Sinuessa, at which no less than three hundred bishops were present—5 a number quite impossible for the time that country. For other accounts of this time (see H. R. Smith, in Dillinger's Fabke, p. 82, foot note).
Marcellinus denied everything for the first two days, but on the third came in, his head covered with ashes, and made a full confession, adding that he had been tempted with gold. He was beheaded. He is commemorated on June 29. See Gregorii Turon. Lib. de gloria mart. c. 59.

IV. MARCELLUS, bishop of Die, in France, was born at Avignon of Christian parents, and religiously brought up. He was ordained by his brother, who was bishop of Die before him. At the time of his election another was also appointed, but he was taken to the church by his brother, and enthroned there. On this occasion, it is said, a dove was seen to descend upon his head. He was thrown into prison by the Arians for opposing their views, and died there in the beginning of the 6th century. He is commemorated on April 20. See Marcellus, lib. de gloria confit. c. 70. — Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, ii. 22; Pierer, Universal Lexicon, x. 856. (J. N. P.)

Marcellus, bishop of Ancrta, in Galatia, noted for the part he took in the Synod of Ancyra (314 or 315), held at the end of the persecution of Maximin (see Ancyra), made himself conspicuous at the Council of Nicea (325) by his homoussian views, and was upheld by Athanasius and the whole Western Church. He next find him at the Council of Tyro (355), where he opposed the condemnation of Athanasius, and of Maximus III, patriarch of Jerusalem. In the Council of Jerusalem, he was present, and he declared against the consecration of Arius to communion. At the Council of Constantinople, in 386, the Arians having the majority, Marcellus was deposed with the ascent of the emperor, who had been prejudiced against him. After the death of Constantius (337), he returned to Rome as a prisoner; people, senators, and clergy were divided; they fought and murdered in the streets, and Laurentius maintained himself for several years in possession of part of the churches. Synmachus was accused by his opponents of grave offences. . . . The hostile party were numerous and influential . . . and therefore the adherents of Synmachus caught at this time of showing that the inviolability of the pope had been long since recognized as a fact and announced as a rule. . . . This was the time at which Eunomius wrote his apology for Synmachus, and this, accordingly, was also the time at which the Synod of Sirmium, as well as the Constitution of Sylvester, was fabricated. Marcellus is commemorated in the Roman Church April 24. See Pagi, Crit. in annales Buronii ad annum 302, p. 18; Paprock, Acta Sancta in Propyl. Magn. t. viii; Xavier de Marco, Dietae diaiou postficii di errrorum. Fidei et Populi Romani, Concilios eccles. i, 118; iii, § 10, note 2, where the main authorities against the fable are cited. (J. Marcellus, St. (martyr). Aside from Marcellus I, pope of Rome (q. v.), and Marcellus of Apamea (q. v.), there is no occasion now to refer to a martyr of that name, the more important of which are: I. Marcellus who perished during the persecution of Antoninus Philosopher. Having refused to participate in a repast with the prefect Priscus, and resented with the latter and his guests on account of their idolatry, he was half buried in the ground, in the open air, and died thus after three days. The year 140 is given as the date of his death; he is commemorated on September 4. See Surius, T. V. Gregorii Turon. Lib. de gloriamart. c. 58; Ruinart, Acta primorum martyrum, p. 73.

II. Marcellus, the chief of the Trojan Legion, who, for refusing to participate in heathen sacrifices at Tingis, in Mauritania, was beheaded by order of the governor, Aurelianus Agriola, in 270. See Surius, vol. v; Ruinart, p. 302 sq. He is commemorated on Oct. 20.

III. Marcellus, who suffered at Aragon, in France, or under Aurelian. He was a native of Rome, son of a heathen father and a Christian mother, who brought him up a Christian. When of age, he fled to Aragon on account of the persecution of Aurelian. Here he won some conversions, and was appointed the attention of the prefect Heracleus. Arrested, he fearlessly confessed his faith, and, after scourging, was roasted on a spit; but as this neither converted nor killed him, he was beheaded. He is commemorated on June 29. See Gregorii Turon. Lib. de gloriamart. c. 59.
self to study. Dividing his fortune among the poor, he went to Ephesus, and there attempted to support himself by copying books. He subsequently joined abbot Alexander at Constantinople, and was afterwards chosen as his successor. To avoid this honor, Marcellus fled to a neighboring convent until another abbot had been selected, and then returned and was made dean. The new abbot became a hermit, however, under the authority of his dean, and obliged him to perform menial service. Marcellus cheerfully submitted; but after the death of John he was again appointed abbot. Under his direction the convent acquired such reputation that it had to be moved to a new site and enlarged, and other convents intended to be governed by pupils of Marcellus. He died in 485.

Marcellus I, Pope, son of Benedict, a Roman priest, succeeded Marcellinus (q. v.) as bishop of Rome (according to Pagi, June 50, 308), but held that position only during eighteen months. He endeavored to restore ecclesiastical discipline, which had become much relaxed during the persecutions. For this purpose he organized in Rome twenty dioceses, the incumbents of which were to administer to converts from heathenism the sacraments of baptism and penance. They were also bound to attend to the burial of the martyrs. By command of Maxentius, who had ordered him to resign his office of bishop and to sacrifice to idols, he was imprisoned, and condemned to serve as a slave in the imperial stables. After nine months he was freed by his clergy, as he resided in the house of a hermit named Lucinius, who, it is said, converted that house afterwards into a church. Maxentius was so angry when he heard of it that he commanded the church to be turned into a stable, and condemned Marcellus to the lowest employment about the stables. Marcellus is said to have made a complaint to the Senate on the 16th of January. Herzog, Real-Encylopädie, ix, 21; Pierer, Universal-Lexikon, x, 855. (J. N. P.)

Marcellus II, Pope, succeeded Julius III, April 9, 1555, but died twenty-two days afterwards. He was a native of the Papal States, and was originally named Marzio Cervini. He was first secretary of Paul III, and chaplain of Cardinal of Santa Croce. By appointment from pope Julius III, he took part in the Council of Trent as cardinal legate, and evinced in that capacity great talents, as well as moderation. His election gave rise to many hopes, which were specially crushed by his death, the result, no doubt, of poison. He was noted for the minor but curious circumstance of his refusing to comply with the ancient custom by which the pope, on his election, lays aside his baptismal name and assumes a new one. Marzio Cervini retained on his elevation the name which he had previously borne. See Herzog, Real-Encylopädie, ix, 21; Pierer, Universal-Lexikon, x, 855; Chambers, Cyclop.; Bower, Hist. of the Popes, viii, 459; Riddle, Papacy (see Index); Artaux de Montor, Hist. des Souverains Pontifes Romains, s. v.

Marcellus, Aaron A., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born in Amsterdam, N. Y., May 11, 1799; was prepared for college by the Rev. Drs. Van Zandt and Spencer, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1826, afterwards followed teaching, and for some years had charge of the Female Seminary in Syracuse, and subsequently of Schenectady. He removed to New York, and was for a short time superintendent of the Orphan Asylum; but, feeling that his duty pointed in the direction of the ministry, he entered the Theological Seminary of the Reformed (Dutch) Church at New Brunswick, N. J., and graduated in 1830. He was licensed by the New York Classis, and in July, 1830, became pastor of the Reformed (Dutch) Church at Freehold, N. J., and in 1839 of Schaghticoke; missionary near the Dry Dock, New York; principal of the Lancaster County Academy, Pa.; pastor at Freehold, N. J., in 1889; of the Church in Greenville, N. Y., in 1856; and in 1859 removed to Bex- gen, N. J., where he labored as a teacher until he died, May 24, 1860. Mr. Marcellus was courteous and refined in manners, an earnest preacher, and an excellent instructor of youth. See Wilson, Pref. Hst. Almanac, 1861, p. 202.

Marcheshvan (מְרַשְׁכֶּשֶׁן), Marcheshvan, of the later Hebrew: Josephus, Ant. Maporouvan, i, 3, 8; the Macedonian Μαρτις is the name of that month which was the eighth of the sacred and the second of their 12th year of the Jews, and began with the new moon of our November. There was a fast on the 6th in memory of Zeodediah's being blinded, after he had witnessed the slaughter of his sons (2 Kings xxvii, 7). This month is always spoken of as a time of fasts and of the celebration of the Day of Atonement; designation; except once, when it is called Bul (בּול, Kings vi, 38; Sept. Baad). According to Kimchi, Bul is a shortened form of the Hebrew בּול, "rain," from בּל, the signification of rain-month is exactly suitable to November in the climate of Palestine. Others derive it from בּל, Beney, availing himself of the fact that the Palmyrene inscriptions express the name of the god Baal, according to their dialect, by Baal or (בּאל, 'אָל), has ventured to suggest that, as the months are often called after the deities, Bul may have received its name from the Baal of Baalbec, as Genesis, p. 182). The rendering of the Sept. might have been appealed to as some sanction of this view. He supposes that Marcheshvan is a compound name, of which the syllable mar is taken from the Zend Amrata, or its later Persian form Mardad, and that cheshvan is the Persian cheshm, "autumn," both of which are names belonging to the same month (L. c. p. 136 seq.). See Bul.

Marchetti, François, an eminent French writer and archaeologist, was born at Marsilles about the opening of the 17th century; was educated at a college of the "Fathers of the Oratory," entered their order in 1630, and became one of the ablest members. He died at his native place in 1688. Of his works the following are of particular interest to us: Paraphrase sur les Epîtres de Saint Pierre (1689), and Traité sur la Mission avec l'explication de ses cérémonies.

Marchetti, Giovanni, an Italian ecclesiastic of note, was born at Empoli, in Tuscany, in 1758, of humble parentage. After struggling for years to secure the advantages of a thorough education, he entered the priesthood in 1777. Later he took up the pen in defence of the rights of the Roman see. His works, which made him known as a brilliant writer and a learned student, attracted the attention of pope Pius VI, who accorded him a pension and invested him with different offices. In 1798, after Rome had been proclaimed a republic, he was banished. In 1799 he was conducted to Florence, where he endured imprisonment for one month. On his return to Rome (1800) he opened an academy of theology. When the excommunication of the emperor Napoleon by Pius VII became known (1809), Marchetti and cardinal Mattei, accused of aiding the pope in this violent act, were imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo. Some time after Marchetti obtained permission to go to his native town. He returned to Rome in 1814; in 1822 was appointed vicar of Rimini; in 1826 became secretary of the Assembly of Bishops, and died Nov. 15, 1829. Among his works, which have been translated into many languages, we find Saggio critico sopra la storia Eclesiastica di Firenze (Rome, 1780, 12mo)—Critica della Storia Eclesiastica e de discorsi di Flavio (Bologna, 1782, 2 vols. 12mo)—Eccetàzioni Cispiamiche circa il battesimo degli eretici (Rome, 1787, 8vo)—Del concilio di Sarzica (Rome, 1785, 8vo)—Il Christianesimo dimostrato (Rome, 1795, 8vo)—Strattemmenti del famiglie sulla storia della religione con le sue prove (Rome, 1800, 2 vols. 8vo)—La Provvidenza (Rome, 1797, 12mo)—Metamorfosi ver-Marpion (Marpion), founder of the sect of Marcionites, flourished near the middle of the 2nd century. He was a native of Sinope. According to Tertullian, he was a pilot. Some critics have expressed their doubts that so learned a man should have followed such a trade, but nothing proves Marcion having been a very learned man. He seems to have at first connected himself with the Stoics, and, although his father was a bishop (probably of Sinope), he long inquired into the merits of Christianity before becoming a convert to it.

He either retained some of his former views, or else indulged in new speculative views which caused him to be excommunicated by his own father. Epiphanius, who was one of those who had that letter of the Church's was driven out for having seduced a young girl (not credited any longer by modern scholars, as Beausobre and Neander), affirms that he afterwards endeavoured to regain admission into it by affecting to be deeply penitent, but his father rejected him again. Marpion went to Rome, where he arrived, according to Tilmont, in 142, or, according to Lipsius (Zeitschrift für wissenschaftl. Theologie, 1847, p. 77), in 143 or 144, but more probably, in 138, as St. Justin mentions his residence in Rome in his Apology, written in 135. According to St. Epiphanius, Marpion's first step upon reaching Rome was to ask readmission into the Church, but he was refused. The same writer further states that Marcion aimed to succeed Pope Hyginus, who had just died, and that his regret at having failed was the cause of his accepting Gnosticism. These Oriental doctrines were then preached at Rome by a Syrian named Cerdon. Marcion joined him, and proclaimed his intention of creating an abiding schism in the Christian Church. Quite different is the statement of Epiphanius. Marpion, says he, was at first received into the Church at Rome, and professed at first orthodox views, but being of a speculative turn of mind, he prying, theorising intellect constantly led him into opinions and practices too hostile to the opinions and practices of the Church to escape opposition, and he was therefore constantly involved in controversies, in which he often lost his real views. Later reports of his dealings, he was finally cut off from communion with the Church, "in perpetuum discidium relegatus." He continued to teach, still hoping to become reconciled with the Church. Finally he was offered reconciliation on the condition of returning with all his followers, but died while endeavoring to do so. His disciples were then but few, and did not hold all the doctrines afterwards maintained by the Marcionites, who flourished as a sect, in spite of untold persecution, until the 6th century, particularly in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria. The main disciples of his discipline and followers were Apelles, Lucas, Paulus, Basilus, and Potitus.

The fundamental point of Marcion's heresy was a supposed irreconcilable opposition between the Creator and the God of the Christians, or, in other words, between the two religious systems, the Law and the Gospel. His theological system is but imperfectly known. St. Epiphanius accuses him of recognising three first principles, one supreme, ineffable, and invisible, whom he calls good; secondly, the Creator, thirdly, the devil, or perhaps matter, source of evil. According to Theodoret, he admitted three, the good God, the evil God which governs matter, and the evil which governs matter, i.e., the devil. It is proved that Marcion believed in the eternity of matter, but it is uncertain whether he considered the Creator as first principle, or as, in some degree, an emanation of the good God. At any rate, he considered them as essentially antagonistic. This conclusion he arrived at because he could not find in the O.T. the love and charity manifested in the Gospel of Christ. He therefore made the Creator, the God of the O.T., the author of evil, "malorum factorem," by which he meant suffering, pain, death, even a martyr's, as freeing them from it. They denied the resurrection of the body, and, notwithstanding Epiphanius's assertion, it appears doubtful whether they believed in the transmigration of the soul. They supposed that the sins of others, if the sins of every day diminished the effect of that sacrament; but this custom, which is not mentioned by Tertullian, was probably introduced after the death of Marcion. Women were allowed to baptise persons of their sex, and the new converts were admitted to witness the mysteries. To make the Scripture agree with his views, Marcion rejected a large portion of the N.T. He looked upon the O.T. as a revelation of the Creator to the Jews, his chosen people, which not only differed from, but was entirely opposed to Christianity. He admitted but one Gospel, and that a truncated version of Luke's, the first four chapters of which he rejected, making it to commence by the words: In the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, God came to Capernaum, a town in Galilee, and spoke on the Sabbath. He carefully omitted all the passages in which Christ acknowledged the Creator as his Father. Among the Epistles, he admitted those to the Romans, 1st and 2nd to the Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, 1st and 2nd to the Thessalonians, Philon, and some part of a supposed Epistle of St. Paul to the Laodiceans. After these two editions of the N.T., he interpolated to suit his views. Marcion also composed a work entitled Antithesia; it is a collection of passages from the O. and the N.T. which he looked upon as contradictory. In reality, the system of Marcion bore a close resemblance to that of Mani (q.v.); it was an attempt to explain the origin of evil. Marcion, as afterwards Mani, thought to solve the problem by supposing two first principles; but there is this essential difference between them, that while Marcion based his system on the Scriptures, interpreted with daring subtlety, Mani derived his from Persian and Jewish dogmas or traditions. Marcionites or Marcites, a sect of heretics in the 2d century, who also called themselves the Pervecti, and made profession of doing everything with a great deal of liberty, and without any fear. This doctrine they borrowed from Simon Magnus, who, however, was not their chief; for they were called Marcites, from one Marcus, who confessed the priesthood and the administration of the sacraments on women.

Marcok, Johann van, a distinguished Dutch theologian, was born Dec. 21, 1556, at Sneek, in Friesland, and educated at the University of Leyden. His early reputation was such that before the completion of his twenty-first year he was appointed to the professorship of theology at Franeker. In 1682 he removed to Groningen, where he entered into a controversy with the Methodist preacher. In 1690 he accepted a theological chair at Leyden, and in 1720 succeeded the younger Spanheim as professor of ecclesiastical history. He died Jan. 30, 1731. He wrote several works on dogmatic theology, which are highly esteemed in the Reformed Church, and made various valuable contributions to the interpretation of the Scriptures. His principal works are: De Syphilitia carminibus (Frankf. 1682, 8vo); — In Apostolpin Commentaria seu analysis exegetica (Lugd. Bat. 1699, ed. auct. 1699, 4to); — In Canticum Salomonis Commentaria seu analysis exegetica cum analysis cum auctoritate (Lugd. Bat. 1703, 4to); — In principios quasdam portas Pentateuchis Commentarius seu ultimorum Jacobis, reliquis superiorum Biblii et novissimorum Mosis analysis exegetica (Lugd. Bat. 1713, 4to); — Commentarius seu analysis exegetica in Proprietas minores (Amsterd. 1696-1701, 6 vols. 4to). A selection from his works was published at Groningen in 1748, in 2 vols. 4to. Marcovich of Marcoville, Jean de, a French writer on church discipline, who flourished in the second half of the 16th century at Paris, is the author of several works of interest to the theological student. Among them the following deserve special mention: L'origine des tems des Juifs, Chretiens, et Gentils (Paris, 1563, 8vo); — La diversite des opinions de l'homme (1563, 8vo); — Chretien arretissans aux refroidis et escrasis de la vraie et ancienne Eglise Catholique (1571, 8vo), a work in which Marcovich, though displaying great attachment to the Roman Catholic Church, condemns her conduct towards the Protestants. See Hoefer, Nouve. Biog. Generale, xxiii. 509.

Marcouman, a Germanic tribe of the Suevi brought across the Helvetic border to the Marcomannen, and from the Rhine to the Danube. They are first mentioned by Julius Cesar in his Gallic wars (i. 51), who reckons them among the forces of Ariovistus, king of the Suevi. The conquests of the Romans brought them into dangerous proximity to the Marcomannen, and induced the latter to seek a new home in modern Bohemia. They were led by Marobodius, a man of noble rank among them, trained in the Roman armies, and he became their king after the conquest of Bohemia. The Marcomannen quickly acquired influence, and were greatly strengthened by their settlement in a fertile and populous region, so that their power became threatening to the empire. Tiberius concluded a treaty of peace with them, which secured the empire against an attack, but turned against them the hatred of the remaining Germanic tribes. Led by Arminius, these enemies defeated the Marcomannen in A.D. 17, after which date their history presents an almost uninterrupted succession of conflicts. They defeated the emperor Domitian (Dio Cassius, lxvi. 7), and in A.D. 164 advanced to Aquileia, in Italy. The fruits of a decisive victory over them, won by the generals of Aurelius, were lost by a treaty which the emperor Commodus concluded with them (A.D. 180), and they continued to make frequent irruptions into the neighboring provinces of the empire, penetrating in A.D. 270 even to Milan, besieging Aesinoa, and threatening Rome itself. Their name gradually disappears from history after the 5th century, when the migration of more distant barbarians brought a succession of new peoples into their land.

It is not definitely known how or when they became acquainted with Christianity. Their frequent incursions must have brought them into contact with its disciples, some of whom must have been among their prisoners of war. A statement in the life of St. Ambrose, by Paulinus—which, however, is not confirmed by any contemporaneous author—that in the time of that bishop an Italian Christian had visited the Marcomannen, and had awakened the interest of their king in Christianity to an extent that led her to apply to Ambrose for instruction. He sent, in compliance with her request, a work in the form of a catechism, by which both she and the king were led to embrace Christianity towards the close of the 4th century. See Schröck, Kirchengesch. vii. 347; Hefele, Gesch. d. Einführung des Christenthums im süd-west. Deutschland, vol. vii; Tacitus, Annal. Dio Cassius, Hist. Rom. 1, 54, and Greek and Roman historians of this period. See also Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, ix, 112; Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Letz. A., v. v. (L. M.)

Marcosians or Colobarianas, an ancient sect in the Church, making a branch of the Valentinians. Irenæus speaks at large of the leader of this sect, Marcus, who, it seems, was reputed a great magician. The Marcosians had a great number of apocryphal books, which they held as canonical, and of the same authorship as other books they picked up at random, titles touching the infancy of Jesus Christ, which they circulated as authentic histories. Many of these fables are still in use and credit among the Greek monks. See VALENTINIANS.

Marcus, Pope, one of the early bishops of Rome, succeeded Sylvester Jan. 18, 336; but little is known either of his life or administration. Anastasius states that by him the bishop of Ostia was first appointed to ordain the bishop of Rome. He died October 7 of the same year in which he had been chosen, and was buried in the cemetery of Balbina, which was thenceforth called after his name. "His body," says Bower, "has since been worshipped in the church of St. Lawrence at Florence, though no mention has been made by any writer of its having been translated thither." Novae relates that Marcus bore the title of cardinal-bishop, and that with him originated his dignitary of the Church of Rome. He is also by some writers believed to have been the first pontiff to order the reading of the Nicene confession of faith, after the Gospels, in the celebration of mass. See Bower, History of the Popes, i, 114;

Marcus of Alexandria, a patriarch of Alexandria, flourished early in the 13th century, and was particularly well versed in ecclesiastical law. He proposed certain questions for solution on various points of ecclesiastical law or practice. Sixty-four of these questions, with the answers of Theodorus Balsamon, are given in the Jos. Orientale of Boneddini, p. 237, etc. (Paris, 1573, 8vo), and in the Jos. Graeco-Romanum of Leunclavius, i, 382-394 (Frankfort, 1586, fol.). Some MSS. contain two questions and solutions more than the printed copies. Fabrius suggests that Mark of Alexandria is the Marcus of Justinian's Code in MSS. Codex in Monumentis, of Macarius Chrysophuscelus, extant in the Bodleian Library at Oxford.—Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 1208, ii, 279 (ed. Oxford, 1740-42); Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.

Marcus of Arles, a bishop in the Eastern Church, was one of three prelates sent to Rome, A.D. 342, by the emperor Constantius II, to satisfy the Western emperor Constans of the justice and propriety of the deposition of Athanasius of Alexandria and Paulinus of Constantinople. Marcus and his fellow-prelates are charged with having deceived Constans by presenting to him the confession of faith, not of their own, that of Arius or Eusebian confession, lately agreed on at the Synod of Antioch, but another confession of orthodox confession, yet not fully orthodox, which is given by Socrates. Marcus appears to have acted with the Eusebian or Semi-arian party, and took part on their side, probably in the Council of Philippopolis, held by the prelates of the East after their accession from Sardica (A.D. 347), and certainly in that of Sirmium (A.D. 388), where a heterodox confession of faith was drawn up by him. The confession which is given as Marcus's by Socrates is believed by modern critics not to be his. They ascribe to him the confession agreed upon by the Council of Ariminum, A.D. 389, and also given by Socrates. During the short reign of Julian, Marcus, then on old man, was cruelly tortured in various ways by the heathen populace of Arles, who were irritated by the success of his efforts to convert their fellow-townsmen to Christianity. He appears to have barely survived their cruelty. His sufferings for the Christian religion seem to have obliterated the discredit of his Arianism, for Gregory Nazianzen has eulogized him in the highest terms, and the Church honors him a martyr. Marcus Erenitaa (Epimartyr, the Acetic, called also Mabonos, Ayyab, and Aemeryte or Exercitator), a disciple of Chrysostom, and contemporary of Nilus and Isidore of Pelusium, was a celebrated Egyptian hermit of the Scythian deserts, who lived at the close of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th century. From early manhood he was noted for his piety, meekness, and ascetic vira Christian life, and especially how to restrain anger and flashy lusts. Ascetic exercises are rejected as a means, and books to Jesus recommended as Scripture. The way to virtue and true Christanity. Annexed is a reply from Nicholas, returning thanks for this counsel. 5. Brief reflections of a pious and mystical character, generally bearing on some passage or expression of the divinity, treated in Meditations were from the first interpretation. A state of mystical ecstasy, in which the soul is lost to all created things, and in an ecstasy of love is wholly absorbed in God, is characterized as the most exalted spiritual condition, and ascetic duties are accounted only secondary values. Another tract upon the subject of fasting, is wanting in the older editions, and was first published in 1748 by Remondini. It possibly formed a part of 6, which closes abruptly.

7. General questions of Christian morality: a discussion with a jurist as to the possibility of reconciling capital punishment with Christian principles, and a discussion of the nature and use of prayer, of the various ways to honor God, of the desire to please men, etc. 8. A mystical dialogue between the soul and spirit concerning sin and grace, chiefly remarkable because of its decided rejection of the doctrine of original sin, and of its clear and precise statement of the doctrine of the Greek fathers respecting sin and human freedom. We are to seek the source of our sinfulness neither in Satan, Adam, nor other men. No power can compel us to good or evil, but rather the condition of every person is that which he has chosen from the time of creation.

The same passions which seduced Adam and Eve still exist in human nature, and produce a like result in every soul that, in the exercise of its freedom, submits to their control. The conflict with sin is therefore a struggle against our own will, in which Christian virtue consists in keeping our commandments to the extent of our power. 9. Christ's relation to Melchisedek. This tract is directed against a class who regarded Melchisedek as a divine being; probably the Origenistic sect founded in Egypt by Hieraca, who were said to regard Melchisedek as the holy spirit or the inspiration of the spirit. While combating such views, the tract reveals a tendency to Monophysitism, in ascribing to the human nature of Jesus all the attributes of the Godhead. These tracts of Marcus Aurelius reveal to us the memorials of a partly ascetic, partly ecstatic mysticism, which was especially cultivated among the Egyptian monks, and which aimed to spiritualize the practices of Monachism. In its excess of piety feeling over dogmatic conceptions, it contained the seeds of many diverse systems of dogmatism and ethics. Monophysitism had essentially its root in the teaching of Origen, and as early as the first two centuries. These writings are found, in curious juxtaposition, Pelagianism and Augustinianism, the strongest assertion of human freedom and of the sole efficiency of grace in the work of salvation, the evangelical view of justification by faith, and the Roman Catholic doctrine of works. Hence Bellarmine and other Roman Catholics supposed that modern heresies had forged these writings, while Protestant writers have remarked their Pelagian cast. The tracts of Marcus were in the 17th century placed in the Index, as "caute legenda." They are chiefly important as a connecting link between the mysticism of Macarius and that of the Areopagite and Maximus Confessor.

Eight of the above mystical treatises are λόγοι ἄγαλμας, "equal to the number of the universal passions." A Latin version of all together was prepared by Joannes Picus (Paris, 1563, 8vo; later editions in Bibliad.) a Greek version by another Macarius, with the title of Λόγοι τοῦ Ἱερουσαλημίου (Paris, 1563, 8vo). Both versions were reprinted in the first volume of the Auctorium of Ducortus (Paris, 1624, folio), in the eleventh volume of Bibliad. Patrum (Paris, 1654, folio), and in the eighth volume of the Bibliad. Patrum of Galland. Marcus Aurelius was probably the author also of the tract Ἡπί ηπίστατος, De Jejunio; Latin version by Zinus (Venice, 1574, 8vo). Two of Marcus's tracts—the first and second, viz. Ἡπί ηπίστατος, De Jejunio; De Deis Spirituali, and Ἡπί τῆς εὐγνωμονίας, Λύπας καὶ Ἑγκαταλείπους, Deis qui pati posse ipsis opes suaque frustra. They were published together by Vincentius Ospopos, with a Latin version (Hagenau, 1581, 8vo). The first was reprinted in the Microprosopikon (Basil, 1550), and in the Orthodoxoographe (Basil, 1555). The tract De Jejunio, and another, De Melchisedek, were devoted to the subject of fasting. Another tract upon the subject of fasting, is wanting in the older editions, and was first published in 1748 by Remondini. It possibly formed a part of 6, which closes abruptly.

MARCUS EUGENIUS. See Eugenius.

MARCUS OF GAZA, the biographer of St. Porphyry of Gaza, lived in the 4th and 5th centuries; was probably a native of Proconsular Asia, whence he travelled to Palestine, there became acquainted with Porphyry, and then lived at Jerusalem some time before A.D. 388. Porphyry sent him to Thessalonica to dispose of his property in those parts, and after his return Marcus appears to have been the almost inseparable companion of Porphyry, by whom he was ordained deacon, and sent (A.D. 398) to Constantinople to obtain the emperor Arcadius an edict for destroying the heathen temples at Gaza. He obtained an edict to close, but not to destroy them. The edict was not effectual, and he was put down heathenism; and Porphyry went in person to Constantinople, taking Marcus with him, and they obtained an imperial edict for the destruction both of the idols and the temples of the heathen. Marcus afterwards returned with Porphyry to Gaza, where he probably remained till his death, of which we have no account.

He wrote the life of Porphyry, the original Greek text of which is said to be extant in Mss. at Vienna; it has never been published. A Latin version, Vita St. Porphyrii Episcopi Gesseni, was published by Lipomannus in his Vita Sanctorum ; by Suris, in his De Probatis Sanctorum Vitae ; and by the Bollandists, in the Acta Sanctorum Februa, iii, 643 sq., with a Commentarius Praecussus and notes by Hensenius. It is given also in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, ix, 259 sq. See Fabri, Biblioth. Graeca, x, 516; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 421, i, 403; Oudin, De Scriptoris. Ecles. i, col. 999; Galland, Bibl. MARCUS THE HERESIARCH, sometimes called the Gnostic, a teacher of Gnosticism in the 2d century, thought by Jerome to be a native of Egypt; by Labriolinus, of Proconsular Asia; and by those who are not were that Jerome's conjecture is correct, seems probable from the statement of Irenaeus that Marcus was a disciple of Valentine. The followers of Marcus were called Marcusianae. His peculiar tenets were founded on the Gnostic doctrine of same; professing to derive his knowledge of these same, and of the production of the universe, by a revelation from the four primal emanations in the system of same, who descended to him from the region of the ineffable and invisible in the form of a female. He set forth his system in a poem, in which he introduced the divine conception in the following words: "The same one immortalizable and marvelous symbol of worship. He prominently developed in his system the idea of a λόγος τοῦ ὄντος, of a word manifesting the hidden divine essence in the creation—creation being a continuous utterance or becoming expressed of the ineffable. 1. Marcus the Heretic (sometimes confounded with Marcus the Emperor), a native of Memphis, in Egypt, flourished in the 4th century. He is said by Isidore of Seville, and Sulpicius Severus in Histor. Sacra, to have been a skilful magician—a Manichæan, perhaps personally a disciple of Manes, and the originator of the doctrine of the Priscillianists. See Priscillianus.
   He travelled to Spain, and is said to have disclosed his doctrine to a rhetorician, and to his wife Agape; from them these doctrines were communicated to Priscillian (see Priscillian), who, by embodying them in systematic form and giving them spread, became the founder of the sect.—Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. and Mythol. s. v.; Neander, Christl. Hist. ii, 710.

2. Marcus Hieromonachus, said by Oudin to have been a monk of the convent of St. Saba, near Jerusalem, flourished in the opening of the 11th century. He wrote Συναγωγή τίς ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐπισκόπου, De Didasia ex Typico orientate, contained in the Typicum, or ritual directory of the Greek Church (Tevskev) in the churchnuts of the two churches of the Eastern Churches (see fasting week of the Greek Church). A letter addressed to St. Saba, but which Oudin supposes to have been drawn by Marcus himself, and produced by him as the work of St. Saba, in order to obtain for it an authority which had appeared in its own name, would not have secured. A Life of Gregory of Agrigentum is supposed to be by the same author as the Typicum. See Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii; Disserth, ii, 38. This commentary is said to have been the arrangement of a typicum, ascribed to St. Saba, but which Oudin supposes to have been drawn by Marcus himself, and produced by him as the work of St. Saba, in order to obtain for it an authority which had appeared in its own name, would not have secured. A Life of Gregory of Agrigentum is supposed to be by the same author as the Typicum. See Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii; Disserth, ii, 38. Marcus, bishop of Otranto, probably of the 8th century. Allatius says he was a comonomarch or steward of the great Church of Constantinople before he became bishop, which seems to be all that is known of him. He wrote Τὸ μεγάλῳ αὐθίνῃ ἀφορίστικον, Ημνυμα Αριστοκλικαῖς in Magnum Sabbatum, s. in Magno Sabbato Capita Verbum, published by Aids Manutius, with a Latin version, in his editions of Prudentius and other early Latin poets, Poetae (Venice, 1601), 4 vols. A Latin version of the hymn is given in several editions of Bibliotheca Patrum.—Fabricius, Bibliogr. Græc. xi, 177, 677; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 750, i, 680; Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.

Mardochæus (Mapchocæus), the Sept. or Greek equivalent of Mochoçai (q. v.), in the Apocrypha; namely, (a), the uncle of Esther, in the apocryphal additions (Esth. x, 1; xi, 2, 12; xii, 1-6; xvi, 13; 2 Macc. xv, 36). The 14th of the month Adar, on which the feast of Purim is celebrated, is called in the last passage "Mardochæus's day" (i Mapchocæi hµµµµ). (b) A Jew who returned with Zerubbabel and Joshua (1 Esdr. v, 8; comp. Ezra ii, 2).

Mardochai, a name borne by many rabbis and Jewish savans. The most renowned of them are the following:

1. Mardochai Ashkenasi, a fanatical adherent of Sabaism, flourishing very near the middle of the 17th century. A man of propprecessing appearance, and remarkably talented as a pulpit orator, he travelled through Hungary, Moravia, and Bohemia, everywhere preaching the Sabbaéthaholic doctrines, and declaring himself a prophet, insisted upon the duty of his people to welcome Sabbatian Rabbis to the vestments of a Messiah. The persecutions which were so frequent at that time in Germany, France, and Spain had softened the hearts of the poor Jews, and they were anxiously looking for relief from some quarter. Finding that his declarations were favorably received, Mardochai finally announced that he himself was the risen Zewi, who had been dead three years, and actually found many adherents, especially in Italy and in Poland. He is said to have lost his reason, and to have died, a poor and forsaken wretch, somewhere in Poland. See Gritz, Gesch. d. Jüd. x, 394 sq.; and in Appendix.

2. Mardochai ben-Elkarar Comik or Comus (or Comiso) flourished in the second half of the 15th century (1400-1490), first at Constantinople, later at Adrianople. A thorough master of mathematics and astronomy, he fell ill and died at the age of 54. He became one of his most ardent admirers and devoted followers. He commented on the sacred writings, and by his generous ways secured the love and admiration of both Karaites and Rabbinites. He also studied the Aristotelian philosophy, introduced by the works of Moses Maimonides, and thus as a philosopher secured no mean reputation. He wrote יְדִיעַת מַעֲשֵׂה, a Commentary on the Pentateuch (1460); a Commentary on Aben-Ezra's התנָךְ וּמוֹדֵעַ; a Commentary on Ezra's התנָךְ וּמוֹדֵעַ; a Commentary on Maimonides's Leviticus, and other logical writings, etc.

3. Mardochai ben-Hillel, a German rabbi, who, while a resident of Nuremberg, was accused of insulting the Christian faith and defending the cabalistic writers, and died a death so scandalous that he could not conduct in 1310. He wrote Mardochai Magnum, a commentary on Alpheus's Compendium Talmudicum (Riva, 1599, 4to; Cracow, 1599, folio, and often)—De Rebus mortuasis (Venice, 8vo). See Auerbach, Berit Abrah., 15; Wetzel, Hist. Nachricht von der Judengemeinde in Nürnberg.

4. Mardochai ben-Nissim, a Polish rabbi, flourished at Cronomi-ostroho, in Sicily, in the second half of the 17th century. He wrote יְדִיעַת מַעֲשֵׂה דְּנָשָׁנָו, or "the friend of Mardochai" (Hamb. 1714 and 1721, 4to, with a Latin transl. by Wolf, in Notitia Karaitorum, a work which contains a complete exposition of the doctrines of the Karaites. Mardochai was himself a Karaite, and wrote this work by special request of the learned Triglid, who afterwards translated this valuable contribution to the history of the Karaites Jews. Mardochai ben-Nissim wrote also דַּעַת מַעֲשֵׂה דְּנָשָׁנָו (published by Neubaser), another work on Karaism. See Wolf, Bibl. Hebr.; Furst, Bibl. Judæca; Gritz, Gesch. d. Jüd. x, 301, and note 5 in the Appendix.

5. Mardochai Isaac Nathan, an Italian rabbi, flourished at Rome near the middle of the 11th century. He was the author of Concordantia Hebraica (Basle, 1581, fol.), Cracow, 1644, 4to, with a German transl. by Rosen; Rome, 1622, fol., with additions by Marco de Calato; London, 1747-49, 4 vols. (fols.); a Latin translation was published at Basle in 1556.

6. Mardochai Japheth Schlesinger, a noted rabbi and learned cabalist, flourished at Prague, in Bohemia, near the opening of the 17th century. He was a pupil of the celebrated Isserles (q. v.), when the latter lived at Cracow. He was a native of Prague, and was born according to Gritz (Gesch. d. Jüd. ix, 485), about 1590, and lived in the capital of Bohemia until the persecutions against the Jews made his stay impossible; he went as a refugee to Vienna, and later returned to Prague, where he was successively rabbi at Groden, Lukin, Kremnitz (1575-1592), and, in a good old age, found a refuge in his native place. He died at Prague about 1612 as rabbi of his people. He wrote יֵדִיעַת מַעֲשֵׂה, a cabalistic treatise, divided into six books, which is believed to have been completely about 1560. It has been frequently referred to as a Zewi at Cracow (1594-1599, 4 vols. fols.); Prague (1609, 1628, 1688, 1701), and Venice (1626 fols.). See Mardochai ben-Alchabarija. See Saad Adanana. (J. H. W.)

Marechal, Ambroise, D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Ingres, near Orleans, France, in 1768, and was educated at the seminary of St. Sulpice. He came to Baltimore in 1792; returning to France, he was from 1803 to 1811 professor in the seminaries of St. Flour, Aix, and Lyons; afterwards became coadjutor to the archbishop of Paris, and was consecrated bishop of Chartres, Dec. 14, 1817. He visited Rome in 1821-2, to procure aid for his Church in Baltimore. He died Jan. 29, 1828.

Marcéchal, Bernard, a noted French writer, was born at Retheil in 1705, and, after completing his studies under the guidance of the congregation of the Benedictines of which he took the vows in 1721; in 1726 he became prior of Beaulieu, in Aragon. After this we know him only as a writer. He died at Metz July 19, 1770. He wrote Concordances des Saintes Pierres de l'Eglise, Grece, and Latina, in which he proposed to overturn many erroneous hypotheses.

Marcéchal, Pierre Sylvin, a noted French atheist, was born at Paris, Aug. 15, 1750, and was destined by his father to the mercantile profession. Preferring a literary life, his father educated him for the profession of law. Pierre, however, was determined to get a livelihood from his friends, and eschewed all personal care. When inclined to work, he would write something for the Bishop of Chartres, and, endowed with rare facility of the pen, and a vivid imagination, he soon gained great notoriety for his excelled writing. Had he remained within his legitimate channels, his name would have had no interest for us; but Pierre, believing that his opinions must be gained at the expense of manhood and morality, courted the tendency of his age, and became a scourge of religion and decency. In imitation of Lucretius, he published the fragments of a moral poem, which denies the existence of a God. Not sufficient to provoke public attention to him, he next attacked the Bible, in a more elegant strain, and applied himself to all manner of work to further the interests of atheism. Sad, indeed, was the life of such a being as Pierre Sylvin Marcéchal, and as his life so was his death. When the hour of his departure had arrived, Jan. 18, 1808 (at Montrouge, near Paris), he was heard to exclaim, "Mes amis, la nuit est venue pour moi." His works are noticed in detail in Hoefer's Biog. Générale, xxxii, 522 sq.

Marešah (Hebrew Mareschah), מַרְעֵשָה, fully מַעְרֵשָה, Josh. xv, 44; I Chron. ii, 42; iv, 21; 1 Sam. xii, 24; Maparaz and Mapard, but in 1 Chron. ii, 42, Mapordaic), the name of one or two men, and also of a place, possibly connected with Mamre.

1. A person named as the "father" of Hebron among the descendants of Judah, but it is only left to be inferred that he was the brother of Caleb's son Mesha, with whom the Sept. confounds him (1 Chron. ii, 42).

B.C. ante 1191.

2. In 1 Chron. iv, 21, a person of the name of Marešah is apparently mentioned as the son of Laishah, of the family of Shelah, perhaps as being the founder of the city of the same name (B.C. cir. 1612); possibly identical with the foregoing.

3. A town in the tribe of Judah, "in the valley," enumerated with Keilaah and Azhib (Josh. xv, 44), rebuilt (comp. 2 Chron. iv, 21) and fortified by Rehoobaam (2 Chron. xi, 8). The Ethiopians under Zerah were defeated by Asa in the valley of Zepliahath, near Marešah, and Zerah was slain (2 Chron. xiv, 16). It was said to have been placed of the Ephræmus don-Badalav, a prophet who predicted the destruction of the ships which King Jehoshaphat had built in conjunction with Ahaziah of Israel (2 Chron. xx, 37). It is included by the prophet Micah among the towns of the low country which he attempts to rouse to a sense of their duty by the promise of their destruction (Mic. i, 15). Like the rest, the apostrophe to Marešah is a play on the name: "I will bring your heir (goresh) to you, O city of inheritance" (Mareschah). The following verse (16) shows that the inhabitants had adopted the headdress and forbidden custom of cutting off the back hair as a sign of mourning. In the time of the Maccabees it was occupied by the Idumæans (2 Macc. xii, 85), but it was laid desolate by Judas on his march from Hebron to Ashdod (1 Macc. v, 65-68; Josephus, Ant. xii, 8, 6). About five years later it was again ravaged by the Idumæans, and attached to the province of Syria (ib. xiv, 1, 4). Mareesah was among the towns rebuilt by Gabinius (ib. xiv, 5, 8), but was again destroyed by the Parthians in their irruption against Herod (ib. xiv, 19, 9). A place so often mentioned in history must have been of considerable importance; but it does not appear that it ever again rebuilt (see Reina, Palest., p. 888). The site, however, is set down by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Moraschi) as within two miles of Eleutheropolis, but the direction is not stated. Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Researches, iii, p. 354) notes, 'at a mile and a half south of the site of Eleutheropolis, a remarkable tel or artificial hill, with foundations of some buildings. As there are no other ruins in the vicinity, and as the site is admirably suited for a fortress, this, he supposes, may have been Mareesah. According to Schwartz (Pales., p. 105), the ruins are still known by the Arabs by the name Maraesah, probably the Marash described by Tobler (Dritte Wand., p. 129) as lying on a gently swelling hill leading down from the mountains to the great western plain, from which it is but half an hour distant (Van de Velde, Memoires, p. 383).

Mareus or Marota, Jean de, a most remarkable character in French history, flourished in the 17th century. In his youth he was an inebriate. He has himself left us a picture of his morals in early life, which is by no means an advantageous one; for he owns that, in order to triumph over the virtue of such women as he held to be the interest of their salvation, he made no scruple to lead them to atheistical principles. "I ought," says he, "to weep tears of blood, considering the bad use I have made of my address among the ladies; for I have spent nothing but spare moments in the malicious subtleties, and infamous treacheries, endeavoring to ruin the souls of those I pretended to love. I studied artful speeches to shake, blind, and seduce them; and strove to persuade them that vice was virtue, or, at least, a thing natural and indifferented." But after his conversion Mareus ran into such great extremes in the opposite direction. In short, he became at last a visionary and a religious fanatic, dealing in nothing but inward lights and revelations. Among other things, he promised the king of France, upon the strength of some prophecies, whose meaning he tells us was imparted to him from above, that he should overthrow Mohammedianism and become the promoter of Christian unity, under the leadership of the pope of Rome. But Mareus deserves our attention especially for the relation he sustained to the Jansenists. Appointed inquisitor, he became one of the severest persecutors of Jansenism, and was bent upon the extermination of this heresy from French ground. In Délices de l'Empir, one of his productions, he seriously boasts that "God, in his infinite goodness, had sent him the key of the treasures contained in the Apocalypse, which was known but to few before him;" and that, "by the command of God, he was to levy an army of 144,000 men, part of which he had already enlisted, to make war upon the impious and the Jansenists" (p. 76). He died in 1678. See Gen. Biog. Dict., vol. ix, s. v.; Hoefer, Notiz auf S. Marcelas, vol. xxxii.
Reformed theologian, was born at Oisemond, Flanders, in 1599; was educated at Geneva and at Paris; studied theology at Saumur and Geneva, entered the ministry in 1620, and was settled at Laon by the Synod of Charleroi. His experience in this place was rather of a peculiar nature. He was stabbed one night, and this attack he considered to be in some way a punishment from God for the violent abuse he had as a young man, and had, in a pamphlet defending the Protestant faith, severely criticized their conduct. In 1624 he accepted a call to Sedan, both as pastor and theological instructor in the school of theology situated in this place, lately so celebrated in history. Before he entered this new position he went to Leyden, and there secured the degree of D.D. in July, 1625. Having made a small tour into England, he returned to Sedan. In 1632 he was called as pastor to Maestricht; in 1686 he removed to Herzogenbusch as minister and professor at the Schola Illustria; in 1640 he had an invitation to a professorship at Franeker, and to another at Groningen in 1642. This last he accepted, and from that time to his death did such great services to that university that it was reckoned one of the most flourishing in the Netherlands. The magistrates of the city confirmed him in his offices and learning, offered him, in 1671, the professor of divinity's chair at Lausanne; and in 1678 the University of Leyden invited him to a like professorship there. He accepted this last, but died before he had taken possession of it (May 10, 1678). Mareczi's literary activity was very great. He was a writer of ability as well as energy, so that of any man of his day. He was an able polemic, and wrote much against the Roman Catholics, the Socinians, the Millenarians, and the Armimians, and even against many of his own confession. Indeed, Marcius was quite a literary pupil. His contest with Vossius, the Utrecht professor, is famous. See VOSHIUS. His ablest work is his Systema theologien (Gron, 1678), in the appendix of which is found a list of all the productions from his pen. Their number is prodigious, and the variety of their subjects shows an unbounded genius. He designed to collect all his works into a body, as well those which had been already published as those which were in MS. He revised and augmented them for that purpose, and had materials for four volumes in folio, but his death prevented the execution of that project. The first volume was to have contained all those works which he had published before settling at Groningen. The second his Opera theologica didactica. The third his Opera theologica polemica. The title of the fourth was to have been Impietas triumphata. Its contents were to have been the "Hydra Socinianismi expugnata," one of the ablest, and certainly most unanswerable, of the Socinian pamphlets against the Fanaticorum eversa," and the "Fabula presdamitarum refutata," three works which had been printed at different times. Marezi's system of divinity was to be so methodical that it was made use of at other academies; indeed, his reputation procured him so much authority in foreign countries as well as his own that a person in Germany who had published some severe censures against Marezi received orders to suppress his book. See Gen. Biog. Dict., vol. ix, s. v.; Bayle, Dict. Hist. s. v.; Marezi; Eggis et Vite professorum Gronin. ; Herzog, Real-Encykl., vol. ix, s. v. (J. H. W.)

MARESOL, JONN GOTTLOB, a German theologian, was born at Plauen, grand-duchy of Saxe-Weim.-Elis., Dec. 25, 1761; studied theology at the University of Leipzig from 1779 to 1788; became thector for three years in a private family; in 1789 became preacher of the University of Göttingen, with the dignity of professor or extraordinary of divinity, and lectured with success on moral philosophy and homiletics; in 1794 was honored by the University of Helmstadt with the doctorate of divinity, and in the same year also accepted a call to Copenhagen as pastor primarius of the German St. Peter's Church, where he was allowed much time for study; but the northern climate injuring his health, he obtained in 1802, by Herder's influence, a position at Jena as superintendent and pastor of the town church, and at the same time commenced lectures on homiletics at the university of that place. He died Jan. 15, 1828. Maresoli was a child of the rationalistic times in which he flourished; but still, with a strong sense of duty, he preached and spread abroad the teachings of the Gospel, and with a spirited language and animating mode of delivery, he became a blessing to many thousands of hearers, and an example and a subject of imitation to thousands of students. His productions were repeatedly reprinted and translated into several languages, and have affected much good. He is justly styled one of Germany's greatest preachers of the 19th century. He wrote Das Christenthum ohne Gesch. u. Einkleidung (1787) — Be- stimmung des Kantoreordens (1798), besides his sermons, published in 1791-1, 1806, 1811, 1819, etc. — Predigt zur Erinnerung an die fortlaufende Wirksamkeit der Re- formation (Jena, 1822) — Homilien (1805) — Nachkla- semae Predigten (1852, and since). Margaret, Sr., the name of several Roman Catholic saints. I. The latest of these was canonized through the intercession of the Dominicans, who have a special interest in her, both before and after her death; she is patronized, however, simply in the neighborhood of her native village, San Severin, in the duchy of Ancona. From the former name of that place, she was called Septimpedia; the practice of such virtues as are common among saints, and which she cultivated during her widowhood, gave her the surname Vibia; and since, in her humility, she would never wear shoes, she received the appellation Discol cata. The only inheritance left to her daughter comprised a pair of shoes and the soles of her shoes. She was canonized in 1298, and the image lost in death and assumed the form of shoes, and which wore the principal relics exhibited in her memory by the Dominicans. She died in 395.

II. The merely beatified saints [see Beatification] of this name belong, without exception, to the mosaic orders; and in their legends the fancy and the jealousy of the monks are equally apparent. The more celebrated are:

1. A beautiful Italian from the neighborhood of Perugia, who had up to her twenty-fifth year led a grossly licentious life; but, after her having been awakened by a startling incident, distingushed herself by turning to a life of the severest penance in the convent of the Francisans at Cortona (hence called Margaret of Cortona).

Her confessor, however, resisted her desire to revisit the scenes of her former shame, accompanied only by an old woman. She is usually represented with the instruments of torture, because in spirit she experienced the entire passion of the Saviour, who refused to designate her his handmaiden, but honored her as his friend.

Her conversations with Christ and the Virgin Mary served to endorsing the more lenient treatment of the Walterists (Act. SS., I. c., p. 548). When she died, in 1297, the Francisans claimed that they saw her soul ascend from purgatory to heaven. In 1628 Urban VIII permitted them to pay her religious honors.

2. As an offset to Margaret of Cortona, the Dominicans raised up one of their tertiaries, a bed girl of Urbino, in whose heart were found, after death, three wonderful stones, bearing the image of the Virgin Mary with the child in the manger (Act. SS., April 13; beatified Oct. 19, 1699).

Other Margaret, including a royal princess of Hungary, Margaret, of a Dominican, Jan. 29, 1747, are obscure. They are found in the Act. SS., under Jan. 22; Feb. 11; March 5, 7, 13, and 22; April 12 and 20; May 15, 18, and 29; and June 4, 10, and 13. — Herzog, Real-Encyclop., 14, 54; Wetsser und Welte, Kirchen-Ise, vi, 685.

Margaret of France, duchess of Berry and Savoy, daughter of Francis I, was born in 1529, and received a superior education. She was a patroness of the sciences and learned men; and after the death of her father gained a high reputation by her beauty, piety, learning, and amiable qualities. She married Philip II, duke of Saxony, in 1549, and was crowned at the court of Louis XII. Her brother, afterwards Francis I, after he had ascended the throne, employed her in numerous important affairs, and she went to Madrid to attend to him when he was a prisoner there. In 1560 she was married to duke Charles of Alençon, but he dying in 1596, she in 1597 again married, this time Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre, and from this marriage was born Jeanne d'Albret, mother of Henry IV. Henry d'Albret died in 1544, and Margaret continued to govern the kingdom with great wisdom. She died Dec. 21, 1548. She was very handsome and highly talented, and her court was all persecuted for the sake of their religious belief; yet very different opinions have been advanced concerning her personal views. Some consider her a fervent Protestant, whilst others look upon her as a very orthodox Roman Catholic, and still others as a Catholic. The fact seems to be that she observed Roman Catholic practices, although firmly believing in the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ only; she protected the Protestants, without herself leaving the Roman Church; she loved poetry and even pleasure, although strictly moral and truly pious. All these apparent contradictions find a natural explanation in her inclination towards mysticism, verging even on quietism, and resulting in indifference towards the mere externals of religion—a tendency common also to a number of the most distinguished theologians of that time, and one that helps us to understand many otherwise obscure points in the early history of the Reformation in France. Her private character was the object of many attacks, yet none of these accusations have been substantiated; they were all made by her enemies. Margaret of Orleans wrote, to her brother, the Dauphin (1533), which was condemned by the Sorbonne, as it made no mention either of the saints or of purgatory—L'Heptaméron des nouvelles, a collection of tales after the manner of Boccaccio, but intended as moral lessons; they have since been used as a means of improving the supposed immorality of her life. The work was first published under the title Histoire des amants fortunés (Paris, 1558; afterwards by Gruger, Paris, 1569, 2 vols.; Amstel. 1698; Berne, 1780, 3 vols.; Leroux de Lericy, Paris, 1835, 3 vols.; Lacroux, Paris, 1857); in English dress it is published in Bohn's collection, extra volume;—fragments published after her death by Jean de la Haye, under the title Marguerite de la marguerite des Princesse (Lyons, 1547; Par. 1554). Her Correspondance was published by Génin (Par. 1842); also Nouvelles lettres de la Reine de Navarre (Par. 1842). The Hist. de M. de Valois, etc., published at Amsterdam (1656, 2 vols.), is a mere novel. In the library of Rouen there is to be found a MS. of the 17th century, entitled Intrigues secrètes de la reine Marguerite pour stabiliser les erreurs et les nouveautés de Calvin et de Luther dans son royaume de Daun et de Navarre. Margaret of Scotland, daughter of King Edward III, fled to Scotland with her brother, Edgar Edelings, when William the Conqueror invaded England, and in 1070 there married king Malcolm, who afterwards died fighting against William II of England, she following him only four days later to the grave (Nov. 16, 1058). She was canonized by Innocent IV in 1250, and in 1278 Clement X made her the patron saint of Scotland. According to the statement of her confessor Theodoric, Margaret of Scotland was very active, generous, and even lavish in helping the poor. She had regularly 800 persons dependent on her charity, and did much towards softening the sufferings of the victims of the Scottish nobility. She founded a number of churches, working herself in adorning them, and gained her place in the Martyrology Romanum by her efforts to unite the Church of Scotland with that of Rome, and to civilize the country. She had worked no miracles, but her children were accounted such; among them was David I, "splendor generis," who Romanized Scotland. In after times her cathedral was destroyed by the Puritans, and her relics were scattered; such portions as were subsequently collected were transferred by Philip II to the Escorial. The "toast of Margaret" is named after her; pope Eugenius IV in 1430 attached to it an indulgence of forty days, but with the express condition that this toast should be the last. Margaret is commemorated June 16 by the Church of Rome.—Hernog., Real-Encyclop. ix, 94. (J. C.)

Margaret (or Marjory), Juan de, a Spanish cardinal, was born at Girona about 1415. He belonged to an ancient and illustrious house of Catalonia; one of his ancestors, Béramger, distinguished himself at the siege of Tyre. Margaret became doctor of theology at Girona; in 1435 he was elevated to the episcopal see of Elms. The king of Aragon, Alfred V, employed him in several important diplomatic missions to Naples, and he was so successful that he was made ambassador to pope Pius II. In 1461 Margaret became chancellor at Girona, and in this office mediated peace between Sixtus IV and the king of Naples, Ferdinand I. For his services to the holy see he was honored with the cardinal's hat towards the close of 1448. He died at Rome in 1444. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxiii, 548.

Margarita (μαργάριτα, margaritum), the pearl, was the name given in the Greek Church to the vessel in which the consecrated host was kept. Margarite, on the other hand, designated the pieces of the host which the priest placed in a special vessel for the sick. These pieces were dipped in consecrated wine, and given to the sick with a spoon. See Du Fresne, Glos. Lat. ii, 510.

Margarit, Jesus de (Father Antonio), an early Franciscan missionary to Texas, was born at Valencia Aug. 18, 1657, and died in Mexico Aug. 6, 1726. He was the author of El Peregrino Septentrional Atlante (Valencia, 1742). He is styled "Notario Apostolico," "Comisario del Santo Oficio," "Fundador y ex Guardian de tres Coligios," and "Prefecto de las Misiones de Propagand" Fide en todas las Indias Occidentales." Margaritis, Maximus, an Eastern theologian, was born in Crete in 1522; studied divinity at Padua and Venice; became a monastic; in 1589 bishop of Cythera (Cerigo); and died at Crete in 1602. He published Παραλογίαν καί Θείον γίγνεται, as well as a collection of sacred poems in the Greek (Leyden, 1590); and Ἰεράς, Ἄγαλματος, —Regenburger Real-Encyklopädie, vol. iv, s. v.

Marheineke, Philip Konrad, an eminent German theologian and writer, was born at Hildesheim May 1, 1780. He studied theology at Göttingen, where he was made a professor in 1806. He afterwards became successively professor in the University of Heidelberg in 1807, and professor in the university, and, in 1810, minister of the Trinity Church of Berlin, as colleague of the renowned Schleiermacher. He died in the capital of Prussia, May 31, 1846. Marheineke's studies were devoted to the church's symbols and dogmatics, which he treated from the speculative standpoint of Deist and Hegel. He was, indeed, the head of that fraction of the Hegelian school which asserted the coincidence of the Hegelian philosophy with Christianity. He was equally distant from the strict orthodox views held by the Lutheran, as from Rationalism, or from the old supernaturalism. He wrote Gesch. d. christlichen Moral seit d. Anfange d. Maria Angelica de S. Magdalena is the name by which Jaqueline, one of the daughters of Anthony Arnauld (q. v.), was known after she became the princess of the palace of the Duke of Porto Royal. "She at first led a very dissolute life, such as was common at that time in the French numeraries; but in 1609 the fear of God came upon her, and she entered upon a very different course of life; and afterwards becoming intimate first with Francia de Escobar, and then, in 1623, with the abbot of St. Cyran, she conformed herself both to her convent to their views and prescriptions. . . . The consecrated virgins inhabiting it followed with the utmost strictness the ancient, severe, and almost everywhere abrogated rule of the Cistercians; nay, they imposed on themselves more rigors and burdens than even that rule prescribed." Dr. Murdoch's Moslems, Eccles. Hist. bk. iv, cent. xvii, sec. ii, p. ii, ch. i, § 46. See Porto Royal. The relation which this retreat sustained to the Janissaries has been detailed in the article JANISSARIES, CORNELL (2).

Maria Theresa, empress of Austria and Germany, the daughter of Charles VI, was born at Vienna May 13, 1717, and succeeded to the throne, by the "Pragmatic Sanction," Oct. 21, 1740. With her secular history we have nothing to do here, but as to her influence on the interests of Romanism and Protestantism, we must add here a few particulars to the article on Austria. Although she held a position of great responsibility and influence in the Church, she endeavored to correct some of the worst abuses in the Church. She prohibited the presence of priests at the making of wills, abolished the right of asylum in her dominions, and converted towards the Catholicism of Milan, and in 1778 the Order of Jesuits. She also forbade that any person, male or female, should take monastic vows before the age of twenty-five years. She did nothing, however, to ameliorate the treatment of the Protestants in her dominions. She professed personal sympathy with their oppressed condition, but pretended to be unable to do anything for them on account of her coronation oaths and the laws of the country. This was especially the case in Hungary. Maria Theresa died Nov. 29, 1780, leaving as her successor to the throne Joseph II, who is noted for his generous efforts in behalf of his Protestant subjects. See Duller, M. Theresia u. Joseph II (Wiesbaden, 1844); Ramsboth, M. Theresia u. ihre Zeit (Leipzig, 1859 sqq.); Wolf, Oesterreich unter M. Mariales, XANTIA, an Italian theologian, was born at Venice at the close of the 16th century. He belonged to a patrician family of the Pinars. He was appointed lecturer at Padua, and afterwards inspector of the schools. These offices he filled till 1624, when he retired in order to give his whole time to politics. His zeal for the Church and his hatred towards France induced his expulsion from his native country twice. He retired to Bologna, afterwards obtained his recall from banishment, and died in April, 1660. We give him place here mainly on account of his many theological productions. The most important are Controversiae ad universam summam Theologiae St. Thomae Aquinatis (Venice, 1624, 2d ed.), — Biblioth. Interpretum ad univ. summ. theol. St. Thomas (Ven. 1660, 4to) — Stravaganz. nuovamente parziali nel Christianissimo regimen di Francia (Col. 1646 4to). — Enormitas inaudita nuovamente esitata in lucr nel Christianissimo regimen di Francia, contra il decoro della seda apostolica Romana in due libri introdotti: Pono: Dello arrogante potestà di Papa in dayina della chiesa Galli- cona; l'altro Del Diritto della Regalità (Ferr. 1648, 4to). — Hoefer, Nouv. Mariannus (Μαριαννός, a Greek form of the Heb. מרים), the name of several females of the Herodian family. Maria is detailed by Josephus in the following the two following (see Smith, Dict. of Class. Biogr. &c.): 1. The daughter of Alexander, son of Aristobulus, and of Alexandra, daughter of Hyrcanus, high-priest of the Jews, was the most beautiful princess of her age. She married first the Great Antipas of Galilee, and afterwards Alexander and Aristobulus, and two daughters, Salampos and Cyprus; also a son called Herod, who died young, during his studies at Rome. Herod was excessively fond of Mariamne, who but slightly returned his passion, and at length cherished a deadly hatred towards him. Herod had her put to death, but afterwards his affection for her became stronger than ever. Josephus mentions a tower that Herod built in Jerusalem, which he named Mariamne. See HEROD. 2. A daughter of the high-priest Simon, and likewise wife of Herod from Galilee, who had a sister named Philip, who married first the infamous Herodias, afterwards paramour of Herod Antipas, and the instigator of the death of John the Baptist. See HERODIAN FAMILY.

Maria, Juan, a distinguished Spanish Jesuit, was born at Talavera, in the diocese of Toledo, in 1557. In 1544 he joined the Jesuits, and soon acquired great reputation for his historical, theological, and philosophical learning. In 1564 he taught philosophy at Rome (where the celebrated Bellarmino was one of his pupils), and in 1565 in Sicily; in 1569 he went to Paris, where he remained five years, and lectured on Thomas Aquinas. In 1574 he returned to Spain on account of his health.
When Leon de Castro questioned the orthodoxy of Arias Montanus for introducing rabbinical readings and commentaries into the Plantiniana Regia or Philippinian Polyglot, a new edition of the Complutensis which Montanus had undertaken at the command of Philip II, Mariana silenced the noisy polemic by his historical, ecclesiastical, and Biblical lore, as well as by the fair and candid terms of his dissection. But by the same operation, he lost all chance of preferment, which, however, he was glad to exchange for learned leisure and the gratification of his love of historical research. Mariana published next, in 1599, his imperfect work, De Ponderibus et Mensuris, a subject which his countrymen, Castilian, Aragonese, or Napoletan, had hitherto been treated separately. And the subject so extensive, expressed in classical Latin, met with universal favor and acceptance. A Spanish translation soon became necessary, and fortunately Mariana accomplished the task himself, and carried the work through four successive Spanish editions in his lifetime. Mariana has been charged with credulity; but traditions held sacred in times past, although rejected in the present age—prodigies which formed part of history, and which Mariana could not dismiss with the disdainful smile of modern criticism, are spots which will never obscure the brilliancy of his digressions on some of the most important events of the world—events which appear as great causes when so admirably interwoven with those peculiarly belonging to the history of Spain. The manly feelings of the historian, his noble indignation against crimes, his bold exposure of the misdeeds of princes and their abettors, deserve still higher commendation. Yet he, as well as Ferreras and Maxdeu more recently, has spared a gross instance of queen Urraca's licentious conduct; but, on the other hand, the defence of queen Blanca's highly creditable conduct is placed in a different light. It is true also that Mariana did not always examine all the original authorities, as Ranké observes in the Kritik seiner Geschichtsschreiber; but to institute an inquiry into every minor detail, to comprehend a wide field of inquiry, and yet to open new roads to disjoin old and new paths, would have required the perusal of whole libraries, and a single life would not have been sufficient to complete the undertaking. And if others had been invited, said by the labor of the investigation, a more time than that could have been set aside for the study of history. Mariana and the favorites were found too original and faithful to the living, as in the case of the deestable Fernandez Velasco, of Castile, and his worthy secretary Pedro Manzano. The secretaries, after the death of the new historian, tried to serve his master by his attack on Mariana, entitled De advertencias a la Historia de Mariana. He was discovered, however, and roughly treated by Tamayo Vargas in La Defensa de Mariana. Probably to this criticism may be traced the amendments in Mariana's second Spanish edition of his history, which appeared at Madrid in 1608. It is on this edition, and the various readings selected from the editions of 1617 and 1628, that the edition of Valencia is based.
which contains ample notes and illustrations (1783-96, 9 vols. 8vo). This edition also closes, like the original, with the reign of Ferdinand the Catholic (1516-15). There have subsequently been published at Madrid—1. The edition of Mariana by Keman, translated from the Latin by Romero (1803, fol.); 2. A complete Mariana, continued down to the death of Charles III, 1788, by Sabau y Blanco (1817—22, 20 vols. 4to); 8. Another by the same, brought down to the year 1808 (9 vols. 8vo), with portraits.

The profound erudition of Mariana is also displayed in another publication, his Tractatus Septem (Cologne, 1669). The second of these treatises, De Edificiis Vultur, is an epitome of his report on the fierce controversy between Arias Montanus and Leon de Castro. The fourth, De monochoma Monarchie, presents the indignation of the duke of Lerma and his partners in the system of general peculation and frauds which Mariana exposed. He foretold the calamities which threatened the Spanish nation; and his words, which had been disregarded, were remembered when the opportunity was gone. As a reward for proclaiming such unwelcome truths, at the age of seventy-three he suffered a whole year of judicial trickery, humiliations, and confinement in the convent of St. Francis at Madrid. In searching his papers another exposure was found, entitled Del goberno de la monarquia, or on the duties of a king, in which he also pointed out the means of correcting them. Copies of this MS. had multiplied so alarmingly that, the year after his death, the general of the Jesuits, Vitalasch, issued a circular, dated Rome, July 29, 1684, enjoining the collection of such papers in order to burn them. Still that measure did not prevent its being printed at Bordeaux in 1625, and reprinted elsewhere in several languages. This curious circular was found in the archives of the Jesuits of Valencia at the time of their sudden expulsion from the Spanish dominions in 1767. After his persecution he made an epitome of the Bibliotheca of Photius, translated some homilies, revised his History of Spain, and published a supplement, or, rather, a summary, of concise annals of Spain from 1516 to 1612. At the age of eighty-three he published his Escoria on the Old and New Testament, availing himself of the best Hebrew commentaries, and some valuable and very early MSS., which dated from the age of the ancient Gothic dominion in Spain. This work, though written at this advanced stage of life, "displays a degree of vigor and of learning which might well prove the model of modern Bibliomenont." It secured for him a place among the best commentators in the Histoire Critique de Vieux Testament of the hypercritic father Simon, who is usually unfavorable to Spaniards. Bayle, in his Dictionary, supposes Mariana to be also author of a work Respublica Christiana, but neither Alegambe nor Nicolas Antonio, both of them Spaniards, mentions it. Stevens, the English translator of Mariana's history, mistates some particulars of the author's life, and very unaptly compares him with Raleigh. Mariana left MSS., of at least twice the extent of all his publications. 1. An order of 1528, in the eightieth seventh year of his age and the forty-ninth of his retirement to Toledo. Marianus Scotus, a noted ecclesiastic, was born in Ireland in 1208, and died A.D. 1298; became a pilgrim, travelled on the Continent in 1508, especially in Germany, and frequented the German monasteries of Cologne, Fulda, and Mentz, and died A.D. 1086. Mariana Scotus was the first to correct the inaccurate chronologies of the chronicles in his christographia (3 vols. to 946; continued by Dödecin to 1090). It is part of his Spicilegia Scriptores rerum Germanicumum by Struve and others. The most valuable is the 5d volume, treating of the Carolingian and following emperors. See Haenaeu, De csaugiea, codex chroniar Mariani Scotti (Frankfort- on-the-Oder, 1792).

Marianstein, a noted place of pilgrimage in the Swiss canton of Solothurn, is annually visited by some 60,000 persons. The pilgrimages to this place began in the Middle Ages, and continue unabated to our day. During the first and second French Revolutions the place was occupied by the French soldiers, but the monasteries of the adjoining convent repaired and rebuilt is each time. See Wetzler u. Wele, Kirchen-Lez. xxvii. 767.

Marianzell, a famous place of pilgrimage in Austria, situated on the north border of the crown-land of Styria, twenty-four miles north of Bruck. It consists of a number of inns or lodging-houses, and contains 1200 inhabitants. It is visited by 300,000 pilgrims every year, who come hither to pay homage to an image of the Virgin believed to possess the power of working miracles, which was brought to Marianzell about 1157 by the Benedictine St. Lambrecht. A pilgrim church was first erected there about 1250 by margrave Henry I of Moravia, and in 1285 by Henry I of Hungary a pilgrim church in 1348. The large pilgrim church now standing was built near the end of the 17th century; the miracle-working image is within a chapel, closed by a heavy gate of solid silver. During the great annual procession from Vienna, the greater part of the pilgrims of both sexes spend the night in the woods in drinking, singing, and general riot and debauchery. See Hillisch, Der Pilger u. Tourist nach Mariazell (Vienna, 1855, 8vo).

MARIE A LA COQUER, a visionary, whose real name was Angélique Roussel, born July 22, 1547, at Lauthezor, in the diocese of Autun, France. She boarded on board various transports, and heavenly visions and revelations, besides which she is reported to have worked manifold wonders. She evinced a deep aversion to all evil in her infancy, and from her fourth year maintained an intimate communion with God. On the death of her father, which took place in the eighth year of her age, she entered a convent. Attributing the cure of a disease that had afflicted her during four years to the Virgin Mary, she gratefully adopted the name "Marie," and always used it by preference. She entered the Order of Salesians on the 27th of August, 1671, as a novice, and on the 6th of November, 1872, took the veil. From this time she claimed to be constantly favored with visions and revelations, and is said to have performed many miracles; such were her transports that she carved in large letters the name of Jesus on her breast. Her heart was known to have the title La vie de la vénérable Marie Margarette Maria; but her memory has been kept alive chiefly through the four songs, Vers-Ver, in Œuvres de M. Green (Amster- dam, 1748), i, 9-45. On the 4th of February, 1836, the advocate of the pontifical consistory addressed the ppo, for the first time, on the process of her beatification; but Talleyrand, as bishop of her native diocese, had already sought to effect her canonization during the last decades of the 18th century.—Hergoz, Real-Encyklop. xxiv, 690; the Revue historique, 22 (1866), 331, by M. Bonnet.

Marie de l'Incarnation, a French female missionary, whose original name was Gignard, was born at Tournai in 1599. She early joined the Ursuline nuns; visited Canada in 1639, where she made many converts among the Indians; and founded a convent of her order. She died in 1677. See Charlesval, Vie de la Mère Marie de l'Incarnation; Biographie Universelle, a. v.

Marletué, a celebrated Hindu sage or demi-god, was, according to one account, the son of Brahma—according to another, the son of Bhrigu. He was the father of Kasyapa. By some he is considered as the god of 'light,' which appears to be the etymological signification of his name. See Moon, Hindu Pantheon; Institutes of Manu, chap. i; Thomas, Dict. of Biog. and Mythology, a. v.

Marillac, Charles de, a noted prelate of the Church of Rome, was born at Auvergne, in France, about 1510. He was advocate in the Parliament of Paris when, receiving himself suspected of Lutheranism, he followed John de la Forest, ambassador of France to Constantinople, and thus avoided persecution from the inquisitors. He afterwards became abbot of St. Pieré and archbishop of Vienne; also counsellor in the privy council, and a member of the college of cardinals. He died at Fontainebleau in 1560, and in it he advocated the calling of a national council and a meeting of the states-general, but without much effect. He endeavored to take measures to prevent the mischief threatening the country at that time, but, despairing of success, he became melancholic was preyed upon by disease, and died at his abbey of St. Pieré, in December, 1560.

Mar' in' moth (2 Esdr. i, 2), the Latin form of Mar'in' moth (q. v.).

Marin, Michel Ange, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born of a noble family at Marseilles in 1597. In 1714 he was admitted to the order of the Minimes, was employed in their schools, and four times filled a provincial office. He possessed not only a liking for theology and natural history, but also a natural taste for belles-lettres. His style is a little diffuse and some times weak and incorrect, without being entirely void of elegance. He died April 3, 1767, at Avignon. His works are published in five volumes, in the department of Pezenas, and contain the following:—

- Oeuvres de M. l'Abbé de M. Angue (Paris, 1752 and 1734, 4 vols., 12mo; Aix, 1744:—Conduite Spirituelle de la voie moral (Avignon, 1740, 12mo);—Aide de Dieu de M. l'Abbé de M. Angue (Avignon, 1752, 12mo);—Virginie, ou la vierge chrétienne, histoire Sicilienne (Avignon, 1752, 2 vols., 12mo);—Vie de Pères des déserts d'Orient, avec leur doctrine spirituelle et leur discipline monastique (Avignon, 1761-64, 3 vols. 4to, or 9 12mo; Lyon, 1764, 9 vols., 8vo);—Le Baron de Van Hees, ou la royauté des sociétés (Toulouse, 1764-65, 4 vols.);—Ages de Saint-Amour, ou la ferveur noire (Avignon, 1762, 2 vols. 4to; Marseilles, 1762);—Rhodoile ou l'enfant du bénéédiction (Avignon, 1762, 12mo);—Profite, ou la comédienne aussi (Avignon, 1762, 2 vols. 12mo; Marseilles, 1780);—La Marquise de los Valencés; et la Dame Chrétienne (Avignon, 1765, 2 vols., 12mo);—Lettres austères et morales (Avignon, 1769, 2 vols. 12mo).

Marini, Giovanni Filippo, an Italian Jesuit and missionary, was born near Genoa in 1608; resided fourteen years at Tonking, Japan, and died in that country in 1677. He published Della Missione di padri della comp. di Gesù nella provincia di Giappone e particolarmente di quella di Tanshoo (Rome, 1668, 4to); and A Nova e Christiana Accouta di T. Giacomo Ministro, e Lao (1666), considered quite valuable.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Marino, or San Marino, one of the most ancient and most limited republic states of Europe, consists of a craggy mountain 2200 feet in height, situated amid the least fertile part of the Apennines. Its boundaries consist of five provinces formerly belonging to the pontifical states. It possesses a total area of twenty-one miles, and comprises a town of the same name, and several villages in the adjacent territory. The climate is healthy, but, owing to its exposure, high winds and frequent rains prevail. The inhabitants, who are reckoned at 8000, are noted for their hospitality, sobriety, industry, and general morality. They are sensitively jealous of their rights, and cling with tenacity to their territorial and legislative independence. The religion of the country is Roman Catholic. The early history of the republic is very obscure. During the medieval wars of Italy, Marino had its figs pious fews and factions, which seem to have been none the less envomened from the petteiness of the arena in which they were enacted. In 1740 the democratic form of government was securely guaranteed against further usurpations. The rights and privileges of the magistrates were scrupulously respected by Napoleon during his Italian campaign. The government, designated the Sovereign Grand Council (Generale Consiglio Principale), is composed of sixty members, of whom only three are nobles. From this number are selected the smaller "Council of Twelve" (two thirds from the town and the rest from the country), who, with the assistance of a jurisconsult, decide in questions of the second and third instance. The representatives of the state are termed captains-rectors (capi tani reggenti). They are chosen, three from the party of the nobles, the other two from the bourgeoisie. They each hold office for six months. The army, or rather the militia of the republic, numbers 1189 men.

Marinus, a martyr of the second half of the 8th century, is mentioned by Eusebius in his Hist. Eccl. vii, 15. According to this authority, Marinus was a high family, served in the army, and was about to be appointed a centurion of the army of General Gennadius (266-268) when he was denounced as a Christian by one of his fellow-soldiers. Brought before judge Acheaus, he acknowledged his Christian faith, and was given three hours to recant. During this respite he was taken to church by bishop Theoctests, by whom he was given a sword with one hand and the gospel with the other. Between them, Marinus joyfully chose the latter, returned to the judge, to whom he declared his choice, and was at once executed. A Roman senator, Asterius, who was a witness of the execution, carried away the body upon his own shoulders, laid him out in fine clothes, and buried him (see Acta Sanctor. ap. Bolland, t. 1, 3d ed. March). See also MARTIN II and III.

Another St. Marinus is commemorated on the 4th of September. He was a native of Dalmatia, and worked on the bridge of Rimini, when his pious life was noticed by bishop Gaudentius of Brescia, who persuaded him to enter the Church, and made him deacon. Marinus retired on the mountain of Titoano, where he erected a hermitage, and died towards the close of the 4th century. According to the legend, the miracle wrought at his tomb was a number of pilgrims, who, then settled there, and this gave rise to his sanctity.—Hergoz, Real-Encyklop. ix, 108; Pierer, Universal-Lexi- kon, x, 988; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxiii, 769.

Mariolatry (Gr. Mophs, Mary, and lampás, adoration) is the technical term given by the Protestant world to the society which the Romanists term the Virgin Mary. Romanists themselves term this worship Hyperdulia (q. v.), to distinguish it from the worship paid to God, which they term Latria (q.v.), and adoration paid to saints, Divina (q.v.). In our articles Hyperdulia, Immaculate Conception, and Invocation of Saints, we have already pointed out the great difficulty of bringing distinctions so refined within the comprehension of the common mind, so as to prevent the multitude from mistaking the dispensing of graces instead of the Creator. "As mother of the Saviour of the world," says Dr. Schaff (Ch. Hist, ii, 410), "the Virgin Mary unquestionably holds forever a peculiar position among all women and in the history of redemption; and, from this pure vesture, she reminds us that it is perfectly natural, nay, essential to sound religious feeling, to associate with Mary the fairest traits of maidenly and maternal character, and to revere her as the highest model of female purity, love, and piety. But, on the other hand, it is equally unquestionable that she is nowhere in the N.T. excepted from the universal sinfulness and the universal need of redemption, nor represented as immaculately holy, or as in any way an object of divine veneration." Roman Catholics, however, have insisted upon the adoration, as they term worship in this instance, of the Virgin Mary, holding that Mary has been assumed in the Trinity, so as to make it a Quaternity: that "Mary is the complement of the Trinity" (Pusey, Eirenicon, ii, 167), and that the intercession of Mary is needed for the salvation of the followers of Jesus Christ. We quote the words of Liguori himself: "We must contemplate the humility and charity of Mary, who was the Mediator of Justice, and that by her merits she obtains us all grace and salvation; but we say that Mary is the Mediatrix of Grace; and that receiving all she obtains through Jesus Christ, and because she prays and asks for it in the name of Jesus Christ, yet all the same whenever graces we receive, they come to us through her intercession" (Glories of Mary, p. 124). There is certainly not a word in the Bible, nor in the creeds of the Apostolic Church, nor in the writings of the Church fathers of the first five centuries, to warrant any Christian in assigning such a position to Mary, the mother of Jesus, as the Catholic Church, both Latin and Greek, has dared to bestow upon her. One of the accepted interpreters of the Church of Rome, Liguori, in commenting on the exalted position which the Virgin Mary should hold in the estimation of Latin communions, says that she is Queen of Mercy (p. 13); that she is the Mother of all mankind (p. 28); that she offered her Son to the Father on Mount Calvary (p. 28); that she is especially the mother of repentant sinners (p. 42); that she is the Life (p. 52); that God was reconciled with man through her; that she bears our humility and purifies us (p. 46); that she obtains for us perseverance (p. 59); that she renders death sweet to her clients (p. 68); that she is the Protectress at the hour of death (p. 71); that she is the Hope of all (p. 79); that she is our only Refuge, Help, and Asylum (p. 84); that she is the Propitiator of the whole world (p. 81); that she is the one City of Refuge (p. 89); that it is her office to withhold God's arm from chastising sinners until he is pacified (p. 83); that she is the Comforter of the world, the Refuge of the unfortunate (p. 100); that we shall be heard more quickly if we call upon Mary than if we call upon the name of Jesus (p. 106); that she is our Patroness (p. 106); that she is Queen of heaven and hell, of all saints, and all evil spirits, because she conquered the latter by her virtues, and the devil by her fair humility and holy life (p. 110); that she protects us from the divine justice, and from the devil (p. 113); that in her is all hope of life and virtue, all grace of the Way and Truth (p. 125); that in her we find eternal salvation (p. 125); that no one can enter heaven except by her (p. 127); that all graces of the spiritual life are transmitted by Mary (p. 127); that all gifts, virtues, graces are dispensed by her, to whosoever, when, and as she pleases (p. 128); that from her the world receives every good (p. 128); that she is the Helper of the Redemption (p. 138); that she and her Son redeemed the world (p. 138); that she is the Co-operator in our justification (p. 138); that she is the intercessor instead of the Creator; that God says, "Go to Mary," when we seek for grace from him (p. 156); that the salvation of all depends on the favor and protection of Mary (p. 156); that the other saints intercede with her (p. 167); that all power is given unto her in heaven and earth (p. 145); that God obeys the command of Mary (p. 146); that Mary is omnipotent (p. 146); that the whole Church is under the dominion of Mary (p. 146); that what she wills is necessarily done (p. 147); that her prayers have something of a command in them (p. 151); that Jesus Christ is under an obligation to her to grant all she asks (p. 152); that she is the singular Refuge of the lost (p. 156); that she is the Advocate of the whole human race (p. 161); that her chief office in the world is to reconcile men to God (p. 167); that she is the great Peace-maker who obtains reconciliation, salvation, pardon, and mercy (p. 165); that in her is established the seat of God's government (p. 179); that she delivers her clients from hell (p. 183); that her clients will necessarily be saved (p. 184); that she has power to send her clients from hell to purgatory merely by her intercession (p. 185); that she translates the mortal sins (p. 188); that she consoles, relieves, and succors her clients in purgatory (p. 195); that she delivers her clients from purgatory by applying her merits (p. 195); that she carries away from purgatory all who are in the scapulary on the Saturday after they die, provided they have been chaste and have said her office (p. 196); that she does not suffer those who die clothed in the scapulary to go to hell (p. 185); that Mary leads her servants to heaven (p. 198); that she has the key of the gate of paradise (p. 199); that she is the Way of our salvation (p. 200); that it is for the love of Mary and on account of her merits that God is more merciful under the New than under the Old Dispensation (p. 214); that her powerful intercession sustains the world (p. 214); that she is the Throne of grace to which St. Paul bids us fly (p. 215); that Christ has promised that all who invoke the holy name of Mary with confidence shall have perfect sorrow for their sins, stoning for their crimes, strength to attain perfection, and shall reach the glory of paradise (p. 226), etc.

We will cite for the benefit of our readers some passages which have been translated directly on the field of doctrinal theology. Mary is not only titled by him "Queen, Mother, and Spouse of the King: to her belongs dominion and power over all creatures" (p. 13): "She is Queen of Mercy, as Jesus Christ is King of Justice" (p. 18). "If Jesus is the Father of souls, Mary is also their Mother. On two occasions, according to the holy fathers, Mary became our spiritual Mother. The first, according to blessed Albert the Great, was when she merited to conceive in her virginal womb the Son of God. This was revealed by our Lord to St. Louis, the father of the first order of the Temple, and by St. Bonaventure, and perplexed, and could not understand how Mary, being only the Mother of Jesus, could be said to have brought forth her first-born. God explained it to her, saying that Jesus was Mary's first-born according to the flesh, but that all mankind were her second-born according to the Spirit. That at one time Mary became our spiritual Mother, and brought us forth to the life of grace, was when she offered to the eternal Father the life of her beloved Son on Mount Calvary with such bitter sorrow and suffering" (p. 25). Thus it is that in every engagement with the internal forces we shall always certainly conquer by having recourse to the Mother of God, who is also our Mother, saying and repeating again and again, 'We fly to thy patronage, O holy Mother of God; we fly to thy patronage, O holy
MARIOLATRY

Mother of God! Oh, how many victories have not the faithful gained over hell by having recourse to Mary with this short and most potent prayer: 'Let it be that great servant of God, sister Mary, the crucified, of the Order of St. Benedict, always overcame the devil' (p. 26). 'Since the very tigers,' says our most loving Mother Mary, 'cannot forget their young, how can we forget these children of our, our, our Blessed Lady herself revealed to sister Mary, the crucified, that the fire of love with which she was inflamed towards God was such that, if the heavens and earth were placed in it, they would be instantly consumed; so that the ardors of the Seraphim, in comparison with it, would seem to his most sacred majesty (p. 81). 'Our Mother Mary, like a S. Francis Solano, who, maddened as it were (but with holy madness) with love for Mary, would sing before her picture, and accompany himself on a musical instrument, saying that, like worldly lovers, he adored her most sweet Queen' (p. 38). 'Let us love her as so many of her servants have loved her, and who never could do enough to show their love. Father Jerome of Texo, of the Society of Jesus, rejoiced in the name of slave of Mary; and, as a mark of servitude, went often to visit her in some church dedicated in her honor. On receptions to which he had been invited, he placed his feet upon the ground of tenderness and love for Mary; then prostrating, he licked and rubbed the paving with his tongue and face, kissing it a thousand times, because it was the house of his beloved Lady' (p. 38). 'Mary is the Mother of repose when she has been tried; and, if her feet implore her mercy, she does not consider the crimes with which he is loaded, but the intention with which he comes; and if this is good, even should he have committed all possible sins, the most loving Mother embraces him, and does not disdain to heal the wounds of his soul' (p. 45). 'My God,' she says, 'I had two sons—Jesus and man; man took the life of my Jesus on the cross, and now the justice would condemn the guilty one. O Lord! my Jesus is already dead; have pity on me; and if I have lost the one, do not make me lose the other also!' And most certainly God will not condemn those sinners who have recourse to Mary, and for whom she prays, since he himself commended them to her as her children' (p. 47). These passages are taken almost at random from Liguori's 'Glories of Mary,' chapter i, which is a paraphrase of the work of the Seraphic Father. These claims are moderate compared with those set up in the fifth chapter, entitled, Of the Necessity of the Intercession of Mary for our Salvation. 'S. Lawrence Justinian asks, 'How can she be otherwise than full of grace when it is the Lady herself who has opened the Gate of heaven, the most true Mediatrix between God and man?' (p. 121). 'That which we intend to prove here is that the intercession of Mary is now necessary to salvation; we say necessary—not absolutely, but morally. This necessity proceeds from the will itself of God that all graces that he dispenses should pass by the hands of Mary, according to the opinion of S. Bernard, and which we may now with safety call the general opinion of theologians and learned men. The author of The Reign of Mary positively asserts that such is the case. It is maintained by Vega, Mendoca, Paciachelli, Segnori, Poiré, Crasset, and by innumerable other learned authors' (p. 122).

Now what have we in holy Scripture to warrant such a position as is here taken by Liguori? Comparison, as distinct from contrast, requires the existence of some similitude, but take any passage in which Mary is mentioned, from the salutation down to the period after the ascension, and there is nothing in any way similar. It only remains, therefore, to contrast instead of comparing. But our readers are so well acquainted with holy Writ that we need not refer them to any other task, but only begging them to remember for things 1. That Mary is just as she is, and not otherwise in the Gospels; 2. That she is not mentioned at all in the Acts after the first chapter, or in the Epistles, although St. Paul has entered so minutely into the economy of the Christian scheme of salvation; 3. That all that prophet and Apostle has said of our Lord is by Romanists transferred to Mary; 4. That all those passages which speak of one Mediator between God and man not only ignore, but exclude the modern doctrine, pronounced by Dr. Scaflit, 'one of the principal points of some of the Romanists' 'Our Mother Mary, the Personification and evangelical Protestantism' (Ch. II, ii, 41). Lest the charge should be brought to our door that we have attributed to the Church of Rome the doctrines held by only a part of her communicants, or even only one of her priests, we continue our quotations from some words of her most learned writer, affirming the manner in which the Roman Catholic is taught to look upon the Virgin: "O thou, our Governor and most benignant Lady, in right of being his Mother, command your most beloved Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, that he deign to raise our minds from longing after earthly things to the contemplation of heavenly things" (from the Crown of the Blessed Virgin, Psalter of Bonaventura). "We praise thee, Mother of God; we acknowledge thee to be a virgin. All the earth doth worship thee, the spouse of the eternal Father. All the angels and archangels, and all the powers of heaven doth worship thee, and serve thee. To thee all angels cry aloud, with a never-ceasing voice, Holy, holy, holy, Mary, Mother of God. . . . The whole court of heaven doth honor thee as queen. The holy Church throughout all the world doth honor thee, and praises thee, and prays to thee. . . . Thou sittest with thy Son on the right hand of the Father. . . . In thee, sweet Mary, is our hope; defend us forever more. Praise becometh thee; empire becometh thee; virtue and glory be unto thee forever and ever' (from a Parody on The Te Deum, by the same writer). "Whoever believes all things it is necessary that he hold the right faith concerning Mary; which faith, except one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish eternally. . . . He (Jesus Christ) sent the Holy Spirit upon his disciples, and upon his Mother, and at last took her up into heaven, where she sitteth on the right hand of her Son, and never cease to make intercession with him for us. This is the faith concerning the Virgin Mary, which, except every one do believe faithfully and firmly, he cannot be saved" (from a Parody on The Athanasian Creed, by the same writer)." The whole country of Gregory the Great, the people of Rome experienced in a most striking manner the protection of the Blessed Virgin. A frightful pestilence raged in the city to such an extent that thousands were carried off, and so suddenly that there had been no time to intercede, when a miracle took place. It could not be arrested by the vows and prayers which the holy pope caused to be offered in all quarters, until he resolved on having recourse to the Mother of God. Having commanded the clergy and people to go in procession to the church of our Lady, called St. Mary Major, carrying the picture of the Holy Virgin, painted by St. Luke, the miraculous effects of her intercession were soon experienced: in every street as they passed the plague ceased, and before the end of the procession an angel in human form was seen on the Tower of Adrian, named ever since the Castle of St. Angelo. At the same moment the angels were heard singing the anthem, 'Regina Celi,' 'Triumph, O Queen;' Hallelujah. The holy pope added, 'Ora pro nobis Deum,' 'Pray for us,' etc. The Church has since used this anthem to salute the Blessed Virgin in Easter time" (from Alphonse Liguori's The Glories of Mary). Gabriel Biel, Super Canonem Missae, says "that our heavenly Father gave the half of his kingdom to the most Blessed Virgin, Queen of heaven; which is signified in the case of Esther, to whom Ahaseurus promised the half of his kingdom. So St. Mary, so heavenly justice and mercy, retained the former, and conceded to the Virgin Mary the exercise of the latter." Antonius, archbishop of Flore.
ence, goes further yet than Gabriel Biel. We hesitate to record the profane blasphemies which are found in the writings of various popes, prelates, and divines on this subject. Stories of the Middle Ages, many ludicrous, many trivial, one or two sublime, are all penetrated with this single thought, that from Mary, and Mary alone, the salvation and happiness of man was reserved. It was in the very second of death, in the very act of sin, without the Eucharist, without the priest, at sea, in the desert, in the very home of vice, obtain instant and full remission; but, with Elliott (Delegation of Romanists, p. 754), "we refuse to name the vulgar preaching and rude discourses of friars and priests who induce the multitude into this worship, as being too indelicate for the ears of even an intelligent Romanist." The following we take from a Prayer of St. Bernard. "Remember, O most Holy Virgin Mary, that no one ever had recourse to your protection, implored your help, or sought your mediation without obtaining relief. Confiding, therefore, in your goodness, behold me, a penitent sinner, sighing out my sins before you, beseeching you to adopt me for your son, and to take upon you the care of my eternal salvation. Desist not, O Mother of Jesus, the pition of your humble client, but hear and grant my prayer." "Prayer. — O God of goodness, who hast filled the holy and immaculate heart of Mary with the same sentiments of mercy and tenderness for us with which thou hast filled Jesus Christ, thy Son and her Son, was alway overflowing; grant that all who honor this virginal heart may preserve until death a perfect conformity of sentiments and inclinations with the sacred heart of Jesus Christ, who, with thee and the holy Ghost, lives and reigns one God, forever and ever. Amen." "Amen." "And the angel said to Mary. "Thou hast given me in our doubts, consolation in our sorrows, and protection in our dangers! After thy Son, thou art the certain hope of faithful souls! Hail, hope of the desponding and refuge of the destitute, to whom thy Son has given such power that no one who seeks will be immediately done." From the Breviary: "O Holy Mary, succor the miserable, help the faint-hearted, comfort the afflicted, pray for the people, intercede for the clergy, make supplication for the devout female sex; let all be sensible of thy help who celebrate thy holy commemoration." "Grant, we beseech thee, O Lord God, that we, thy servants, may enjoy perpetual health of mind and body, and, by the glorious intercession of Blessed Mary, ever virgin, may be delivered from present sorrows, and come to eternal joy, through your Lord Jesus Christ. The Litany of the Sacred Heart of Mary deserves to be added: "1. Holy Trinity, one God, have mercy on us! 2. Son of God, have mercy on us! 3. Holy Ghost, have mercy on us! 4. Jesus Christ, hear us! 5. Jesus Christ, graciously hear us! 6. God, the Father of heaven, have mercy on us! 7. God, the Redeemer of the world, have mercy on us! 8. God, the Holy Ghost, have mercy on us! 9. Holy Trinity, one God, have mercy on us! 10. Heart of Mary, conceived without the stain of sin! 11. Heart of Mary, full of grace! 12. Heart of Mary, sanctuary of the Trinity! 13. Heart of Mary, tabernacle of the Incarnate Word! 14. Heart of Mary, refuge of sinners! 15. Heart of Mary, refuge of sinners! 16. Heart of Mary, advocate of the Church, and mother of all faithful! 17. Heart of Mary, after Jesus, the most assured hope of the living! 18. Heart of Mary, queen of angels and of the salvations! 19. Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world, have mercy on us, O Lord! 20. Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world, have mercy on us, O Lord! 21. Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world, have mercy on us, O Lord! 22. Most pure and amiable heart of Mary, Mother of God, pray for us! That our hearts may be inflamed with divine love."

The following is an extract from the ecyclical letter addressed by Gregory XVI to all patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops, bearing date Aug. 15, 1862, affording ample evidence that the same doctrine was approved by the highest authorities of the Roman Church even prior to the promulgation of the dogma of infallibility. "The possession of our see in the Lateran Basilica, according to the custom and institution of our predecessors, we turn to you without delay, venerable brethren; and, in testimony of our feelings towards you, we select for the date of our letter that at which we celebrate the solemn festival of the most Blessed Virgin's triumphant assumption into heaven; that she, who has been through every great calamity our patroness and protector, may watch over us writing to you, and lead our mind by her heavenly influence to those counsels which may prove most salutary to Christ's flock. . . . But that all may have a successful and happy issue, let us raise our eyes to the most Blessed Virgin Mary, who alone destroys heresies, who is our greatest hope, yes, the entire ground of our hope." (Comp. here Kuts, Journal Sacrd Lit. i. 23; iv. 211; English Review, x, 850 sq.; Christ. Remembrancer, 1855 [Oct.], p. 417 sqq.; especially p. 448 and 449.) In view of such a document emanating from the head of the Church, what account can we make of the declaration of the Roman visars apostolic in Great Britain that "Catholics do solicit the intercessions of angels and saints in matters of grace, and of Christ in heaven; but in this, when done according to the principles and spirit of the Catholic Church, there is nothing of superstition, nothing which is not consistent with true piety. For the Catholic Church teaches her children not to pray to the saints as to the authors or givers of divine grace, but only to solicit the saints in heaven to pray for them in the same sense as St. Paul desired the faithful on earth to pray for him," except to consider it as a document well calculated for a Protestant latitude, but liable to be looked upon in Rome as semi-heretical? "What ideas also are we to entertain of the candor or veracity of those Romanists who cease not, after Bossuet and others, to affirm that 'they only pray to saints to intercede for them'? Here is the head of their Church performing a solemn act of worship to the deified Mary, on a day dedicated to her presumed assumption, invoking her, as his patroness and protector, in a time of great calamity, entreat her to aid him by her heavenly influence to that which would be salutary for the Church. Is this only to pray to her to undertake for us? The leader in this act of devotion has not only given to the church the visible, living, speaking guide of the Church. If this be not idolatry, then idolatry exists only in name" (Elliott, p. 754). Nor do we find in the present pontiff less devotion to the Virgin, if we may base our knowledge on the official documents issued in his name. In the decree of Nov. 8, 1854, Pius IX urges all Catholics, colere, suavescere, erovere beatissimam Dei genitrices, translated as follows by the Tablet (Jan. 27): "Let all the children of the Catholic Church most dear to us hear these words; and, with a most ardent zeal of piety and love, pronounced Swaggering prayer to the most Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, conceived without original sin" —the head of the Roman Catholic Church urging on his subjects a greater zeal and ardor in the worship of Mary than that which St. Alfonso had displayed. In the same decree he states that "the purpose of this devotion" is Mary's "conception." How that act can be an object of devotion, it is difficult intelligently to imagine. But such is Mariology. Not only do we now find the adoration of the Mother of God permitted, but actually commanded. The devotion to the Blessed Virgin, says Cramp (p. 400) justly, "is the most extravagant honor and veneration. The language adopted in addressing 'Queen of heaven' cannot be accrued of the charge of blasphemy, since prayers which are offered directly to her as to a divine being, and blas-ings are supplicated as from one who is able to bestow them. In all devotions she has a share. The Ave Maria accompanies the Pater Noster. 'Evening, morning, and at noon,' said the Psalmist, 'will I pray unto thee, and cry aloud;' the pious Roman Catholic transposes these services to the Virgin. In tender childhood he is taught to believe in her as the protectress of reversion and the highest affection; throughout life she is the object of his daily regard, and five solemn festivals, annually observed to her honor, call forth his ardent love and zeal, and in the hour of death he is taught to place reliance on her protection. The Ignatian readers will have held on the lip of the Christian Church for, there is not a word about it in the writings of the fathers of the first five centuries. 'We may scan each page that they have left us, and we shall find nothing of the kind. There is nothing of the sort in the supposed works of Hermes and Barnabas, nor in the real works of Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp; that is, the doctrine is not to be found in the 1st century. There is nothing of the sort in Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian; that is, in the 2nd century. There is nothing of the sort in Origen. Gregory Nazianzen, Epiphanius, Cyprian, Methodius, Laure- tius; that is, in the 3rd century. There is nothing of the sort in Eusebius, Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Hilary, Macarius, Epiphanius, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Euphem Syrus, Gregory of Nyssa, Ambrose; that is, in the 4th century. There is nothing of the sort in Chrysostom, Augustine, and Basil of Caesarea. John Chrysostom, Isidore, Theodoret, Prosper, Vincentius Lirinensis, Cyril of Alexandria, pope Leo, Hilarius, Simplicius, Felix, Galianus, Anastasius, Synnachus; that is, in the 5th century. Nor is there the least trace of Mariolatry among the remains of the Catacombs. Says a writer in the London Q. Rev. July, 1864, p. 86: 'As regards the sacred person of the Virgin, she takes that place only in the art of the Catacombs which the purity of earlier Christianity would lead us to predicate. She is seen there solely in a sculptural and historical sense—in the subject of the Adoration of the Wise Men who found the young child and his mother.' And this even takes its place among the later productions of classic-Christian art; while the subject of the Nativity, which occurs on two sarcophagi, evidently belongs to the last decline of that period. With these two exceptions, no trace of a representation of the Virgin can be found in the mural or sculptural art of the Catacombs. We cannot do better than sum up this portion of our subject in the words of the Rev. E. Tyler, to whose conscientious labors every student of Christian antiquities is so much indebted: 'We have no idea to the present day what the appearance of the Virgin was. The term means the remains of Christian antiquity. Especially have we searched into the writings of those whose works (A.D. 492) received the approbation of the pope and his council at Rome; we have also diligently sought for evidence in the records of the early councils; and we find all the genuine and unsuspected works of Christian writers—not for a few years, or in a portion of Christian-dom, but to the end of the first five hundred years and more, in every country in the Eastern and the Western empire, in Europe, in Africa, and in Asia—testifying that the Virgin's apocryphes knew of no belief in the present power of the Virgin, and her influence with God; no practice, in public or private, of prayer to God through her mediation, or of invoking her for good offices of intercession, and advocacy, and patronage; no offering of thanks and praise made to her; no assumption of power, of temporal glory to her name. On the contrary, all the writers through those ages testify that to the early Christians God was the only object of prayer, and Christ the only heavenly Mediator and Intercessor in whom they put their trust (p. 290). They also testify that the origin of the worship of Mary is to be traced to the apocryphal legends of her birth and of her death, which, in the course of time, decorated the life of Mary with fantastic fables and wonders of every kind, and thus furnished a pseudo-historical foundation for an unscriptural Mariology and Mariolatry (compare Janus, Pope and Council, p. 84 sq.). It is in these productions of the Gnostics (q. v.) that we find the germ of what afterwards expanded into its present portentous proportion, and furnished the basis of her biographies as early as the 2d or 3d century. But to the honor of the Christian of that day be it remembered that they unanimously and firmly rejected these legends as fabulous and heretical. Witness the conduct of the Church towards the Collyridians (q. v.), and the excesses in the opposite direction it gave rise to by the formation of a sect known as the Antidioecorianianites (q. v.). “The whole thing,” says Epiphanius, when commenting upon the unwarranted practices of the Collyridians, “is foolish and strange, and is a device and deceit of the devil. Let Mary be in honor. Let the Lord be worshipped. Let no one worship Mary” (Heret. lxxix, in Opp. p. 1066, Paris, 1692).

Indeed, down to the time of the Nestorian controversy of A.D. 486, the cultus of the Blessed Virgin, it would appear, was wholly external to the Church, and was regarded as heretical. It was this controversy that first produced a great change of sentiment in men’s minds. Nestorius had maintained, or at least it was the tendency of Nestorianism to maintain, not only that our Lord had two natures, the divine and the human (which was the substance of his tenacious belief that he was two persons), in such a sort that the child born of Mary was not divine, but merely an ordinary human being, until the divinity subsequently united itself to him. This was condemned by the Council of Ephesus in the year 431; and the title Theotokos, loosely translated “Mother of God,” was sanctioned. The object of the council and of the Anti-Nestorians was in no sense to add honor to the Mother, but to maintain the true doctrine with respect to the Son. Nevertheless the result was to magnify the Mother, and, after a time, at the expense of the Son. For now the Mother became a divinity, and in art the representation of the Madonna and Child became the expression of orthodox belief. Very soon the purpose for which the title and the picture were first sanctioned became forgotten, and the veneration of Mary began to spread within the Church, as it had previously existed external to it. The legends, too, were no longer treated as apocryphal. Neither were the Gnostics any longer the objects of dread. Nestorians, and afterwards Iconoclasts, in turn became the objects of hatred. The old fables were winked at, and thus they universally became incorporated into the Christian mythology of the northern nations of Europe, while many of the dogmas which they are grounded upon have, as a natural consequence, crept into the faith. “Thenceforth the Theotokos was a test of orthodox Christology, and the rejection of itamounted to a rejection of all heresy.” The overthrow of Nestorianism was at the same time the victory of Mary-worship. With the honor of the Son, the honor also of the Mother was secured. The opponents of Nestorius, especially Proclus, his successor in Constantinople († 447), and Cyril of Alexandria († 444), could scarcely find predecessors enough to express the transcendent glory of the Mother of God. She was the crown of virginity, the indestructible temple of God, the dwelling-place of the Holy Trinity, the paradise of the second Adam, the bridge from God to man, the loom of the incarnation, the sceptre of orthodoxy; through her the Trinity is glorified and adored, the devil and demons put to flight, the nations converted, and the fallen creature raised to heaven. The people were all on the side of the Ephesian decision, and gave vent to their joy in boundless enthusiasm, amid bonfires, processions, and dances (Schaff, ii. 428). “Is it not exactly the fact that the giving of this title (Theotokos) was the cause of the cultus, for some of the fathers before that time had employed the word to express the doctrine of the incarnation, as the two Gregories did; it was the Nestorian heretics who really drove the Catholic mind to plying her the tribute of devotion; and even then it seems as if the cultus of that time was far more in honor of the Son than of the Mother, more a mode of testifying the belief in the validity of the true doctrine of the incarnation, denied by the Nestorians, than of the Godhead of the Mother.” When she was addressed as the ‘Mother of God,’ when she was represented as the Mother with her infant Son, she appeared, it is true, as the prominent figure; but it was to express clearly the Catholic doctrine of the incarnation—the two natures in one person of Christ. We can see how easily the mind of the worshipper would penetrate further, and, from looking at her merely as the Theotokos, would see in the Mother of God one possessed of a mother’s influence and power” (Christian Remembrancer, 1866, July, p. 186, 187).

From this time the worship of Mary grew apace; it agreed well with many natural aspirations of the heart. To paint the mother of the Saviour an ideal woman, with all the graces and tenderness of womanhood, and yet with none of its weaknesses, and then to fall down and worship that which the imagination had set up, was what might easily happen, and did happen. Evidence was not asked for. Perfection was becoming the mother of the Lord, therefore she was perfect. Adoration “was befitting” on the part of Christians, therefore they gave it. Any tales attributed to antiquity were received as true, and as religious truths. The common run of the saints were accepted as true; and the Madonna reigned as queen in heaven, in earth, in purgatory, and over hell. The mother of the Saviour soon became the Mother of Salvation, as John of Damascus calls her (I Hom. in Ann.); “the common salvation of all in extremity” (ἡ πάντων ὑπὸ τῶν παρόντων τῆς γῆς εἰσόδου). “The alone Mother of God, who art to be worshipped (ἡ προσκυνητὴ) forever.” Nestorianism lived on, and lives still, when other earlier heresies on the nature of Christ—like Ariantism—have died; nay, when those who have always held it, it would seem, in their hearts, and in art, showed their orthodoxy by honoring the Mother of God, their abhorrence of heresy by rendering her worship. Thus arose the story of her assumption, and the festival (Aug. 15) in honor of that supposed event. She then became the Mater Coronata, endowed with power both in heaven and earth. Language was addressed to her such as belonged only to God; e.g. Peter Damian, in a sermon (In Nativ. B. V. M.), speaks thus: “Et data est omnibus potestas in celo et in terra: nil tibi impossible, cui possible est desperatus in spem beatissimissimae nostrae Mariae. Quoniam enim ex omnibus poteris obviam, quia de carne tua carnem suam spiriuitiorem accedis? Accedis enim ante illud suumurum humanae reconciliacionis altare, non solum regnum sed imperia, dominia non ancilia.” Under such teaching as this we need not marvel at the overgrowth of which the cultus was. “From that time,” says Dr. Schaff, “numerous churches and altars were dedicated to the holy Mother of God, the perpetual Virgin; among them also the church at Ephesus in which the anti-Nestorian Council of 481 had sat. Justinian, I, in a law, implored her intercession with God for the restoration of the Roman empire, and on the dedication of the costly altar of the church of St. Sophia he expected all blessings for church and empire from her powerful prayers. His general, Narses, like the knights in the Middle Age, was unwilling to go into battle till he had secured her protection. Pope Boniface IV, in 608, turned the Pantheon in Rome into a temple of Mary ad martres; the pagan Olympus into a Christian heaven of gods. Subsequently even her images (made after an original pretending to have come from Luke) were divinely worshipped, and, in processions, performed countless miracles, before some of which the miracles of the Gospel history grow dim. She became almost co-ordinate with Christ, a joint redeemer, invested with most of his own attributes and acts of grace. The popular belief ascribed to her, as to Christ, a无数 concep-ston, a sinless birth, resurrection and ascension to heaven, and a participation of all power in heaven and earth. She became the centre of devotion, cultus, and art, and the popular symbol of power, of glory, and of the final victory of Catholicism over all heresies" (ii, 424, 425).

In the 6th century the practice became general within the Church, both in the East and in the West, and the worship of her was carried on with the post-Nicene period, in which we have brought in this innovation with many others, down to the 16th century, are now found to relate the unsoiled privileges of the Virgin, and with an enthusiasm constantly growing until checked by the opposition of the Reformers, who found in Mary as a mediator with her Son. This devotional enthusiasm was carried to its greatest height by St. Bernard (q. v.), and still more so by Bonaventura (cited above), who, Dr. Wiseman says, was one of the saints and luminaries of the Roman Catholic Church, and every Roman Catholic prayed that he may be enlightened by his teaching and benefited by his prayers. It is Bonaventura who gave the following version of the 51st Psalm: "Have pity upon me, 0 great queen, who art called the Mother of Mercy; and, according to the tenderness of that motherly heart, reproach the impieties with which it runs throughout. The 149th Psalm is—Sing a new song in honor of our Queen. Let her just publish her praises in their assemblies. Let the heavens rejoice in her glory: let the isles of the sea and all the earth rejoice thereupon. Let water and fire, cold and heat, brightness and mystery, everything which is the mother of the Virgin, glorify her; let her praises resound in the triumphant company of the saints. City of God, place thy joy in blessing her, and let songs of praise continually be sung to her by thy illustrious and glorious inhabitants.

Promotion of Mariology by religious Art. —Ever since the condemnation of Nestorius the popular doctrine had found its abest support in art. The representation of that beautiful group, since popularly known as the Madonna and Child, became the expression of the orthodox faith. "Every one who wished to prove his hatred of the arch-heretic exhibited the image of the maternal Virgin holding in her arms the infant Godhead, either in his house as a picture, or embroidered on his garments, or on his furniture, or his personal ornaments—in short, wherever it could be introduced" (Mrs. Jameson, Legends of the Madonna, p. xxi).

With the extension and popularity of the worship of the Virgin, the multiplication of her image, in every form and material, naturally enough spread throughout Christendom, until suddenly checked by the iconoclastic movements of the 8th century [see Iconoclasm], and, descending the Middle Ages, the various Christian nations contributed to the glory and honours of the Mother of the Virgin; but strange fancies were now as freely interpolated in the productions of the artist, which, though themselves but "the reflex influence of that interpolation of new doctrines which had been going on in the Church for so many centuries" (Hill, Eng. Monasticism, p. 329), nevertheless received the disapprobation of pious Catholics of that age, who "cried out 'teremateriam, scandalam, et periculosum,' when they saw the most solemn spectacle in the world's history made the sport of wanton imaginations... the sorrow of the cross made to rest more heavily upon the mother of Christ than upon him" (Hill). The Council of Trent felt itself forced to denounce the impropriety of certain pictures, and it was generally acknowledged that paganized and degenerate influences had overruled spiritual art, that the latter was indeed no more, that "it was dead; it could never be revived without a return to those modes of thought and belief which had at first inspired it" (Mrs. Jameson).

Just at this time "theological art," as Mrs. Jameson calls it, came to the rescue of Mariology. It is true the Reformation at the opening of the 16th century had dealt a severe blow at its root, but the tide of the new mania savoring of idolatry and superstition, but this was only an additional reason why the Church of St. Peter should seek to fortify herself the more strongly in the fortress so severely assailed by the enemy. Mariology had served her purpose, and just now, if ever, needed re-enforcing. Deprived of the aid of "religious art," the poets and artists no longer wrought up to a wild pitch of enthusiasm to inspire the spirit of worship of the Virgin, the infallible guide of the Church himself came to the rescue, and supplied by "theological art" what was needed. In 1571 the battle of Lepanto was fought. In it the combined fleets of Christendom, led by Don Juan of Austria, were arrayed against the Turks, and achieved a memorable victory over the devout adherents of the prophet of Mecca. Pope Pius V quickly availed himself of this opportunity, and "the special interposition of the Blessed Virgin," From a very early period in Mariology we find festivals instituted in honor of the "Blessed Virgin," but now a new festival, that of the Rosary, was added to those already observed, a new Invocation added to her litany, under the title of Our Lady of the Rosary. In all, many sanctuaries were declared to be especially sacred to her worship, and thus a prominence was given to her devotion which found its full expression only in our own day, on Dec. 8, 1854, when this dogma, conceived in the silence of the cell by the brain of infatuated monks, was canonized by a helpless pontiff, and the doctrine established "that not only did the Virgin Mary imma-culately conceive her son Jesus Christ (as Protestants hold), but was as immaculately conceived herself" (Hill, p. 109, in "Mystics and the Question of Conception," p. 281 sq.).

Well, indeed, may it be said that "the controversy with Rome threatens more and more to resolve itself into the question whether the creed of Christendom is to be based upon the life of Jesus or the life of Mary, upon the canonical or the apocryphal Gospels" (Furn-pape, Christ and the Gospels, p. 181, 1866). [Boyle & H. 1866, p. 34 M.]

Need we wonder, then, that Bishop Bull waxes warm when this abomination presents itself for his comment, and is made to speak in the following severe strain: "We abominate the impious imposture of those who have translated the most humble and holy Virgin into an idol of pride and vanity, and represented her as a vainglorious and aspiring creature; like Lucifer (I tremble at the comparison), thirsting after divine worship and honor, and seeking out superstitious men and women, whom she may oblige to her more special service, and who, like her own mortal sisters, must do what greater or lesser affront than this could they have offered to her huility and sanctity? How futile, yea, how perfectly loathsome to us are the tales of those that have had the assurance to tell us of the amorous addresses of the Bithynian priests, and of the guileful worship-ners, choosing them for her husbands, bestowing kisses liberally on them, giving them her breasts to suck, and presenting them with bracelets and rings of her hair as love-tokens! The fables of the Jewish Talmudists, yea, of Mohammed, may seem grave, serious, and other histories, compared to those and other such imprudent fictions. Insomuch that wise men have thought that the authors of these romances in religion were no better than the tools and instruments of Satan, used by him to expose the Christian religion, and render it ridiculous, and thus introduce atheism. And, indeed, we are sure that the Bithynia of Italy, where these abominable deceits have been and are chiefly countenanced, were the first brokers and patrons of infidelity and atheism in Europe, since the time that Christianity obtained in it." "We honor the Virgin Mary," says Mr. Kendall (Worship, p. 891), one of the latest and most critical students of early Church history and Christian antiquities, "we love her memory, we would, by God's grace, follow her example in faith and humility, meekness and obedience; we bless God for the wonderful work of salvation, in effecting which she was a chosen vessel, a mother of the blessed and holy Virgin; we cannot doubt of her eternal happiness through the merits of him who was 'God of the substance of his Father before the world, and man of the substance of his mother born in the world.' But we cannot address religious phrases to her; we cannot trust in her merits, or intercession, or advocacy, for our acceptance with God; we cannot invoke her for any blessing, temporal or spiritual; we cannot pray to God through her intercession, or for it. This in us would be sin. We pray to God alone; we offer religious praise, our spiritual sacrifices, to Christ in God alone. We trust in God alone. We need no other mediator, we apply to no other mediator, intercessor, or advocate, in the unseen world, but Jesus Christ alone, the Son of God and the Son of man. In this faith we implore God alone, for the sake only of his Son, to keep us steadfast unto death; and, in the full assurance of the belief that this faith is founded on the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone, we will endeavor, by the blessing of the Eternal Shepherd and Bishop of souls, to preserve the same faith, as our Church now professes it, whole and unde-filed; and to deliver it, both in word and in deed, from all taint of superstition, to our children's children, as their best inher-itage forever."
connected with that of Abgarus (q. v.), and deserves no credit. The Chaldæan Christians class him with their principal saints as the Apostle of Mesopotamia, and ascribe to him the composition of their liturgy in part. 2. A second Marius, better known in the West, is noted solely because to him is addressed the letter of Ibas, president of the theological school at Edessa, which is preserved in the Codex Ibarrius (c. i., col. 209). Acts of the fifth eunumerical council held at Constantinople in 553, and which the Nestorians afterwards regarded as a kind of confession of faith. 3. Another Marius was sur- named Bur-Tobi. He became patriarch of the Persian Nestorians in 607, and is remarkable as the first patriarch who derived his authority from the caliphs. 4. A fourth of this name, distinguished by the name of Solo- mon's son, lived in the 12th century, and wrote a history in Arabic of the Nestorian patriarchs, of which Asemi- mani (Bibliotheca Orient. iii, 554 sq., 561 sq.) furnishes an epitome. 5. Finally, Theodoret (q. v.) narrates an anecdote of still another Marius, which is noteworthy chiefly because of the light which it throws on the views of that bishop, and of the use which Romanists have made of it. Marius was a hermit, who had long desired to see the mysteries, offered to the sacrificial vessels, and Theodoret joyfully complied with his wish. The sacred vessels were taken to his retreat, the hands of the deacons served as an altar, “and thus,” says the bishop, “I offered the mysterious, divine, and saving sacrifice” in his presence. Roman writers find in these words the support of a father distinguished for his devotion of the 6th century an argument in favor of the Mass. See Theodoret, Religiosa historia, c. 2; Wetzel und Welte, Kirchen-Lex. xii, 769. See also NESTORIUS.

Mar'issa (Maprasi), the Granized form (2 Macc. xii, 85) of Marashah (q. v.).

Marius Aventicus, a Swiss prelate, was born in a noble French family of Autun, near the middle of the 6th century. From childhood he was destined for the Church, and his literary remains furnish evidence that he received a careful training. He was made bishop of Aventicum, now Avenches, in the canton Waadt, in 578, or, as some state, in 580. The times were tumultuous, the population depleted, the country impoverished. In these circumstances he distinguished himself by a praiseworthy frugality, and a devotion to agricultural pur- suits that furnished the means for a lavish liberality. He was bounteous to the poor, and generous to the Church. In honor of Mary Storikos, he rebuilt the town of Payerne (Pateriacum) on its own lands, and dedicated its church to her; he also donated to this church a piece of land. It is not stated, however, that the chapter of Lausanne should derive its tithes from Payerne and two neighboring towns. In the specific work of the episcopal office he was tireless—a model ecclesiastic for the times. Serving his God with reverence and in humility, he was an impartial judge, a protector of the oppressed, and a devoted shepherd to his flock. Towards the close of his life he translated his see to Lausanne, which from that time gave its name to the diocese. The only additional fact connected with his life that has come to our knowledge is that he was present at the Synod of Macon in 585, which was convened by Guntram, a son of Chlotar, to attempt the purification of the Church in his dominions by executing justice on unworthy members of the clergy. Marius is supposed to have died in 586, and was commemorated at first on the 91st of December, but now by the 9th of December. The continu- ation of the work of Prosper Aquit., are the only writings of his that have reached our time which may justly be ascribed to him. They were published at Paris, in the collections of Du Chesne and Dom Bouquet; at Venice, in the Bibliotheca orient. patrum; and, the best manual, by Rickly, in the Mémoires et documents publiés par la société d'histoire de la Suisse Romande, tom. xii. See Zurlauben, Mémoire sur Marius, in the Mém. de l'acad.
from meeting him in his mother's house, for he speaks of "Marcus my son" (1 Pet. v. 13). This term has been taken as implying the natural relation by Bengel, Neander, Credner, Hottinger, Tholuck, Stanley (Serm. on the Apost. Age, p. 36), but this is contrary to the view of the earlier writers (Ursigen, ap. Eusebius, H. E. vi, 25; Eusebius, H. E. ii, 15; Jerome, De Vir. Ill. i. 25). The theory that he was one of the seventy disciples is without any warrant. Another theory, that an event of the night of our Lord's betrayal (A.D. 29), related by Mark alone, is one that beffiled himself (Oehler, Lange), must not be so promptly dismissed. "There followed him a certain young man, having a linen cloth cast about his naked body, and the young men laid hold on him: and he left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked." (Mark xiv, 51, 52). The detail of facts is remarkably minute; the name only is wanting. The most probable view is that Mark suppressed his own name, while telling a story which he had the best means of knowing. Awakened out of sleep, or just preparing for it, in some house in the valley of Kidron, he comes out to see the seizure of the betrayed Teacher, known to him and in some degree beloved himself. He is so deeply interested in his fate that he follows him even in his thin linen robe. His demeanor is such that some of the crowd are about to arrest him; then, "fear overcoming shame" (Bengel), he leaves his garment in their hands and flees. We can only say that if the name of Mark is supplied, the text gives its most probable explanation (John i, 40, xix, 25) introduces himself in this unobtrusive way, and perhaps Luke the same, xxiv, 18. Mary the mother of Mark seems to have been a person of some means and influence, and her house a rallying-place for Christians in those dangerous days (Acts xii, 12). A.D. 44. Her son, already an inquirer, would soon become more anxious to work for Christ, he went with Paul and Barnabas as their "minister" (ἀρσιστός) on their first journey; but at Perga, as we have seen above, turned back (Acts xii, 25; xiii, 18). On the second journey Paul would not accept him again as a companion, but Barnabas his kinsman was more indulgent; and thus he became the cause of the memorable "sharp contention" between them (Acts xx, 36-40). Whatever was the cause of Mark's vacillation, it did not separate him forever from Paul, for we find him by the side of that apostle in his first imprisonment at Rome (Col. iv, 10; Phil. cm. 24). A.D. 56. In the former place a possible journey of Mark to Asia is spoken of. Somewhat later he is with Peter at Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13). Some consider Babylon to be a name here given to Rome in a metaphorical sense. See above. Without a doubt a letter is not the place to look for a figure of speech. Of the causes of this visit to Babylon there is no evidence. It may be conjectured that he made the journey to Asia Minor (Col. iv, 10), and thence went on to join Peter at Babylon. On his return to Asia he seems to have been with Timothy at Ephesus when Paul wrote to him during his second imprisonment, and Paul was anxious for his return to Rome (2 Tim. iv, 11). A.D. 64.

When we desert Scripture we find the facts doubtful, and even inconsistent. If Papias be quoted (as quoted in Eusebius, H. E. iii, 39), Mark never was a disciple of our Lord, which he probably infers from 1 Pet. v. 18. Epiphanius, on the other hand, willing to do honor to the evangelist, adopts the tradition that he was one of the seventy-two disciples who turned back from our Lord at the hard saying in John vi (Comp. Hier. ii, 6, p. 457, Dindorf's recent edition). The same had been said of Luke. Nothing can be decided on this point. The relation of Mark to Peter is of great importance for our view of his Gospel. Ancient writers with one consent make Mark the evangelist the interpreter ("soupèter") of the apostle Peter (Papias in Eusebius, H. E. iii, 39; Ireneaus, Hier. ii, i; iii, 10; Tertullian, c. Marc. iv, 5; Jerome, ad Hedib. vol. ii, etc.). Some explain this word to mean that the office of Mark was to translate into the Greek tongue the Aramaic discourses of the apostle (Eichhorn, Bertholdt, etc.); while others adopt the more probable view that Mark wrote a Gospel which conveyed more exactly than the others to Peter's preaching, and thus "interpreted" it to the Church at large (Valentius, Alford, Lange, Fritzsche, Meyer, etc.). The passage in Eusebius, H. E. ii, 15; Jerome, De Vir. Ill. i, 25, is a quotation from Papias. This also [John] the elder said: Mark, being the interpreter of Peter, wrote down exactly whatever things he remembered, but yet not in the order in which Christ either spoke or did them; for he was neither a hearer nor a follower. "This he said, but he was afterwards, as I [Papias] said, a follower of Peter. The words in italics refer to the word interpreter above, and the passage describes a disciple writing down what his master preached, and not an interpreter orally translating his words. See MArk, Gospel of. The report that Mark was the companion of Peter at Rome is no doubt of great antiquity. Clement of Alexandria is quoted by Eusebius as giving it for a "tradition which he had received of the elders from the first" (ἐν πρώτων εἰς διδάχης παρ' αὐτούς, Eusebius, H. E. iii, 11; Clem. Alex. 1. iv. p. 6). But the force of this is invalidated by the suspicion that it rests on a misunderstanding of 1 Pet. v. 18, Babylon being wrongly taken for a typical name of Rome (Eusebius, H. E. ii, 15; Jerome, De Vir. Ill. i, 8). Sent on a mission to Egypt by Peter (Epiphanius, Hier. ii, 6, p. 457, Dindorf; Eusebius, H. E. ii, 16; Jerome, De Vir. Ill. i, 8) he passed through Jerusalem (Jerome, De Vir. Ill. i, 8), and preached in various places (Niceronius, H. E. ii, 48), then returned to Alexandria, of which Church he was bishop, and suffered martyr's death (Niceronius, ibid., and Jerome, De Vir. Ill. c. 8) in the eighth year of Nero. According to the legend, his remains were obtained from Alexandria by the Venetians through a pious stratagem, and conveyed to their city, A.D. 827. Venice was thenceforward solemnly placed under his protection, and the lion, which mediaval theology had selected from the apocalyptic beasts as his emblem, became the standard of the republic. The place of the deposition of his body having been lost, a miracle was subsequently wrought for its discovery, A.D. 1094, which figures in many famous works of art. Where his remains now lie is, according to the Roman Catholic Eusebius, "acknowledged to be an undivulged secret; or, perhaps, in less cautious language, to be utterly unknown."

MARK, Gospel of, the second of the evangelical narratives in the New Testament. Although the shortest of the four Gospels, its treatment is both with difficulties in some respects and to others see below. See also Mark, Gospel of.

I. Authorship.—The voice of the Church with one consent assigns our second Gospel to Mark, the "evangelist" (1 Pet. v. 17) and "interpreter" (Papias, ap. Eusebius, H. E. ii, 39) of Peter. The existence of this ascription is the best evidence of its truth. Had not Mark been its author, no sufficient reason can be given for its having borne the name of one so undistinguished in the history of the Church. His identity with the "John Mark" of the Acts and Epistles has usually been taken for granted, nor (see last article) is there any sufficient ground for question in that connection. It may be acknowledged that there is no early testimony for the fact—as there is none against it—which appears first in the preface to the Commentary on the evangelist usually attributed to Victor of Antioch, c. A.D. 407 (Cramer, Catena, i, 263), and in a note on the commentary of Chrysostom, xi, where it is mentioned together with some expressions of doubt τίνα σύμποσις εἰς τὸν Μάρκον ἢ διαγεγραμμένος...παρασκευὴν ἡ εἰς τὸν Μάρκον (Westcott, Introd., p. 212). An argument in favor of their identity has been drawn with much acuteness by Tregelles (Journal of Philol. 1855, p. 224; Horne's Introd. to the N. T. p. 453) from the singularity of the title "author" or "interpreter," of which more is said below. See also the words of the Latin prefix found in some MSS. at least nearly coeval with Jerome, "amputata sibi post fidem politcem dictur ut aedectio repromus habetur;" as if, by his assertion of the apostles (Acts xiii, 13), he had become figuratively a "policis truncus"—a pole-rot.

II. Source of this Gospel.—The tradition of the early Church asserts that Mark wrote his Gospel under the special influence and direction of the apostle Peter. The words of Mark, as quoted by Papias (Eus. Eccl. H. E. iii. 39), are explicit on this point: "This, then, was the statement of the elder: Mark, having become Peter's interpreter (ἱμηνευτής), wrote accurately all that he remembered (ἰμηνομοιότατα); but he did not record the words of Christ (ὡς ἐξ Χριστοῦ τὰ λαβόντα ἧ πρὸς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἦν τῆς ἐκκλησίας ρτόν τίνος τῶν εὐαγγελιῶν παῖονίμου λόγων); so Mark committed no error in writing down particulars as he remembered them (ἰσα γράφας ὡς ἀπεμνημόνως)."

For, he made one thing his object—to omit nothing of what he heard. The value of this statement is immense. The apostolic date is, great, though too much stress has been laid upon some of its expressions by Schleiermacher and others, to discount the genuineness of the existing Gospel of Mark. In addition to Peter's teaching having been recorded, the Gospel, we know, recorded it that the facts of the greatest importance for the right comprehension of the origin of the Gospel: "The historic character of the oral Gospel, the special purpose with which it was framed, and the fragmaness of its contents" (Westcott, Ixiv. p. 186). The testimony of later writers is equally definite, though probably to a certain extent derived from that of Papias. Justin quotes from the present Gospel under the title τῶν ἐγκάρδιως ναγίμενων τοῦ Πέτρου. Ireneus (H. E. i. 3) asserts that Mark "delivered in writing the things preached by Peter; and Origen (Adv. v. 25) that he "composed it as Peter directed him" (ὡς Πέτρος ὑγγάγαμεν αὐτῷ παλαμάβοι)." Clement of Alexandria enters more into detail, and, according to Eusebius's report of his words (H. E. vi. 11; ii. 15), contradicts himself. He describes the origin of the Gospel to the importance of Peter's hearers in Rome, who were anxious to retain a lasting record of his preaching from the pen of his ἰμηνευτής, which, when completed, the apostle viewed with approbation, sanctioning it with his authority, and commanding that it should be read in the churches; while elsewhere we have the tradition that when the Spirit of the Lord, whom Peter had been borne as he neither forbade nor encouraged it. Ter- tullian's testimony is to the same effect: "Marcus quod edidit evangelium Petri affirmatur" (Adv. Marci, vi. 5); as is that of Eusebius (H. E. iii. 5) and Jerome (De Vir. Ill. c. 8; ad Hebr. c. 5), who in the last passage writes, "Cajus (Marcii) evangelium Petro narrante et illo scribente composito est." Epiphanius says that, immediately after Matthew, the task of writing a Gospel was laid on Mark, "the follower of Peter at Rome" (Hær. ii. 17).

It is certainly true that there are a few unimportant passages where Peter is specially mentioned by Mark, and is omitted by one or both of the others (i. 86; v. 37; xi. 20; xiii. 3; vii. 7); but, on the other hand, there are still more numerous and more prominent instances in which we would be uninformed if we were not acquainted with Peter's life than they. He omits his name when given by Matthew (xv. t); comp. Mark vii. 17; passes over his walking on the sea (Matt. xiv. 28-31; comp. Mark vi. 50-51), and the miracle of the tribulation of the devils (Matt. xvi. 24-27; comp. Mark x. 39), as well as the blasphemous pronouncement on himself by the Lord, and his designation as the rock on which the Church should be built (Matt. xvi. 17-19; comp. Mark viii, 29, 30). Although Peter was one of the two disciples sent to make ready the Passover (Luke xxii. 8), his name is not given by Mark (xiv. 19). We do not find in Mark the remarkable words, "I have prayed for thee," etc. (Luke xxii. 31, 82). The notice of his repentance also, ἵνα τῇ ἑλα光荣 (xiv. 72), is tame when contrasted with the ἐξ ὁλῶν ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας (Mark and Luke). Advocates are never at a loss to point out reasons to show that the former is the more ancient, and it has been the habit from very early times (Eusebius, Cry- xostom) to attribute these omissions to the modesty of Peter, who was unwilling to record that which might specially tend to his own honor—an explanation unsatisfactory from the very fact of its bareness. Whatever may be the reasons of the facts, it is true that the case is one of striking evidence of Mark's piety, and it has been the custom of every commentator on the Gospel to draw to notice the name of Peter, especially the name Mark, so much more frequently than any other name, and to explain the fact by the piety and consistency. Indeed, we can hardly have a more striking proof of the readiness with which men see what they wish to see, and make the most stubborn facts bend to their own foregone conclusions, than that a Gospel, in which no unbiased reader would have discovered any special connection with Peter, should have yielded so many fanciful proofs of Petrine origin.

But while we are unable to admit any considerable direct influence of Peter in the composition of the Gospel, it is by no means improbable that his oral communications may have indirectly influenced it, and that it is to him the minuteness of its details and the graphic coloring which specially distinguish it are due. While there is hardly any part of its narrative that is not common to it and some other Gospel, in the manner of the narrative there is often a marked character, which puts aside at once the supposition that we have here a mere epitome of Matthew and Luke. The picture of the same events is far more vivid: touches are introduced such as could only be noted by a vigilant eye-witness, and such as make us almost eye-witnesses of the events described. The most prominent of the characteristics is the account of the denunciation in the country of the Gades. The form of the following words are peculiar to Mark: "And no man could bind him, no, not with chains: because that he had often been bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been plucked asunder by him, and the fetters broken in pieces: neither could any man tame him. And always night and day he was in the mountains crying and cutting himself with stones. But when he saw Jesus afar off, he ran," etc. Here we are indebted for the picture of the fierce and hopeless hermit whose work was his life, and whose style is the least perfect. He sometimes adds to the account of the others a notice of our Lord's look (iii. 84; viii. 38; x. 21; x. 23); he dwells on human feelings and the tokens of them; on our Lord's pity for the leper, and his strict charge not to publish the miracle (i. 41, 44); he "loved" the rich young ruler (vi. 21, 22; he "looked round" with anger when another occasion called it out (iii. 5); he groaned in spirit (vii. 34; vii. 12). All these are peculiar to Mark, and they would be explained most readily by the theory that one of the disciples must have been with Jesus and supplied them. To this must be added that while Mark goes over the same ground for the most part as the other evangelists, and especially Matthew, there are many facts thrown in which prove that we are listening to an independent witness. Thus the humble origin of Peter is made known through him (i, 16-20), and his connection with Cephas or Peter (i, 19); he tells us that Levi was the "son of Alpheus" (ii, 14), that Peter was the name given by our Lord to Simon (iii, 16), and Boanerges a surname added by him to the name of two others (i, 17); he assumes the existence of another body of disciples wider than the twelve (iii, 22; iv, 10, 36; v, 34; xiv, 51, 62); we owe to him the name of Jairus (v, 22), the word "carpenter" applied to our Lord (vi, 8), the nation of the "Synagogue" woman (vii, 36); he substitutes Dalmathus for the "Magdalene" of Matthew (viii, 10); he names Bartimaeus (x, 46); he alone mentions that our Lord would not suffer any man to carry any vessel through the Temple (xi, 16); and that Simon of Cyrene was the father of Alexander and Rufus (xiv, 21). Thus in this Gospel the richness in subtle and picturesque touches, by which the writer sets, as it were, the scene he is describing before us in all its outward features, with the very look and demeanor of the actors, be- token the report of an eye-witness; and with the testi- mony of the Church before us, which can hardly be set aside, we are warranted in the conclusion that this eye-witness was Peter. Not that the narrative, as we have it, was his; but that when Mark, under the Holy Spirit's guidance, after separation from his master, undertook the task of setting forth that cycle of Gospel teaching which his master had never perhaps ever to be satisfactorily explained—the Synoptists chiefly confine themselves, he was enabled to introduce into it many pictorial details which he had derived from his master, and which had been impressed on his memory by frequent repetition.

III. Relation to Matthew and Luke.—The question of priority of composition among the Synoptic Gospels has long been the subject of vehement controversy, and to judge by the diversity of the views entertained, and the confidence each appears to feel of the correctness of his own, it is far from easy to be being settled. (For monographs under this head, see Volbeding.)

In fact, in composition, says Mr. Wescott, Introd. p. 190 (the two not being necessarily identical, the earlier tradition being perhaps possibly the latest committed to writing), "it is this, that by many of the Gospels contain much of truth in it, that Mark does actually occupy the central position in regard to the first, and the universal Gospel of the third evangelist. Many formidable difficulties beset each of these theo- ries, and their credit severally is impaired by the fact that the very same data which are urged by one as proofs of the priority of Mark, are used by the other as irreducible evidence of its later date. We even find critics, like Baur, bold enough to attribute the vivid de- tails, which are justly viewed as evidences of the inde- pendence and originality of his record, to the fancy of the evangelist; thus importing the art of the modern novelist into ages and works to the spirit of which it is entirely alien.

So much, however, we may safely grant, while maintain- ing the substantial independence of each of the Sy- noptic Gospels—that Mark exhibits the oral tradition of the official life of our Lord in its earliest extant form, and furnishes the most direct representation of the common basis on which they all rest. "In essence, if not in composition," says Mr. Wescott, Introd. p. 190 (the two not being necessarily identical, the earlier tradition being perhaps possibly the latest committed to writing), "it is this, that by many of the Gospels contain much of truth in it, that Mark does actually occupy the central position in regard to the first, and the universal Gospel of the third evangelist. Many formidable difficulties beset each of these theo- ries, and their credit severally is impaired by the fact that the very same data which are urged by one as proofs of the priority of Mark, are used by the other as irreducible evidence of its later date. We even find critics, like Baur, bold enough to attribute the vivid de- tails, which are justly viewed as evidences of the inde- pendence and originality of his record, to the fancy of the evangelist; thus importing the art of the modern novelist into ages and works to the spirit of which it is entirely alien.

If now we proceed to a detailed comparison of the matter contained in the Gospels, we shall find that, while the history of the conception, and birth, and childhood of our Lord and his forerunner have no parallel in Mark, the story of the life and the teachings of the Lord after the coming of the Paraclete (Luke ii, 21-24, 51-88, 14, being of course excepted) is on the whole coincident; and that the difference is mainly due to the absence of the parables and discourses, which were for- eign to his purpose of setting forth the earthly ministry of Christ. Of our Lord's parables he only gives four:
MARK, GOSPEL OF

"the sower," "the mustard seed," and "the wicked husbandman"—common also to Matthew and Luke; and one, "the seed growing secretly," iv, 26-29 (unless, indeed, it be an abbreviated and independent form of the "tares"), peculiar to himself. Of the discourses, he entitles the second and fourth to the common name of O.-T. Illustrations against the Scribes and Pharisees, and almost entirely the instructions to the twelve; while of the other shorter discourses he only gives that on fasting (ii, 19-22), the Sabbath (ii, 23-26), the casting out devils by Beelzebub (iii, 22-29), on eating with unwashed hands, and coral (vi, 5-8, 10-17). That on "the last things" (chap. xiiil) is the only one reported at any length.

On the other hand, his object being to develop our Lord's Messianic character in deeds rather than words, he records the greater part of the miracles given by the Synoptists. Of the twenty-seven narrated by them, eighteen are found in Mark, twelve being common to all three; three—the Syro-Phoenician's daughter, the feeding of the four thousand, and the curing of the fig-tree—common to him and Matthew; one—the demoniac in the synagogue—to him and Luke; and two—the deaf stammerer (vii, 41-47), and the blind man at Bethsaida (viii, 26-26) (supplying remarkable points of correspondence, in the withdrawal of the object of the curse from the crowd, the use of external signs, and the gradual process of restoration)—peculiar to himself. Of the nine omitted by him, only three are found in Matthew, of which two are not given to us, not at all given also by Luke.

The others are found in Luke alone. If we suppose that Mark had the Gospels of Matthew and Luke before him, it is difficult to assign any tolerably satisfactory reason for his omission of these miracles, especially that of the centurion's servant, so kindred to the object of his work. On the contrary hypothesis, that they copied from him, how can we account for their omitting the two remarkable miracles mentioned above?

The arrangement of the narrative, especially of our Lord's earlier Galilean ministry, agrees with Luke in opposition to that of Matthew, which appears rather to have been according to similarity of subject than order of time.

According to Norton (Generosity of Gospels), there are not more than twenty-four verses in Mark to which parallels, more or less exact, do not exist in the other Synoptists. The same painstaking investigator informs us that, while the general coincidences between Mark and one of the other two amount to thirteen fourteenths of the whole Gospel, the verbal coincidences are one sixtieth, and of these four fifths in Mark occur in the recital of the miracle, his only exception being an omissions at the fifth in the narrative portion, which, roughly speaking, forms one half of his Gospel.

Additions peculiar to Mark are, "the Sabbath made for man" (ii, 27); our Lord's friends seeking to lay hold on him (iii, 51); many particulars in the miracles of the Gadarene demoniac (v, 1-20); Jairus's daughter, and the woman with issue of blood (v, 21-43); the stilling of the tempest (iv, 35-41), and the lunatic child (ix, 14-29); the salting with fire (ix, 49); that "the common people heard him gladly" (xii, 37); the command to his mother and his younger brothers to keep "the cloth about his body" (xiv, 51); the want of agreement between the testimony of the false witnesses (xiv, 59); Pilate's investigation of the reality of Christ's death (xv, 44), and the difficulty felt by the women as to the rolling away the stone (xvi, 4, 5). Mark has also preserved several words and phrases of our Lord, which merit close attention (i, 15; iv, 18; vi, 31, 34; vii, 8; viii, 38; ix, 12, 39; x, 21, 24, 30; xi, 17; xiii, 32; xiv, 18-37; xvi, 7 [15-18]).

The hypothesis which best meets all these facts is, that while the matter common to all three evangelists, or to two of them, is derived from the oral teaching of the apostles, which they had purposely reduced to a common form, our evangelist writes as an independent witness to the truth, and not as a compiler; and the tradition that the Gospel was written under the sanction of Peter, and its matter in some degree derived from him, is made probable by the evident traces of an eye-witness in many of the narratives. The omission and abridgment of our Lord's discourses, and the sparing use of O.-T. Illustrations, and the special designation of the Gospel, if we had surer data for ascertaining it; since it was for Gentiles, with whom illustrations from the O. T. would have less weight, and the purpose of the writer was to present a clear and vivid picture of the acts of our Lord's human life, rather than than a full record of his divinity to be descried. We may thankfully own that, with little that is in substance peculiar to himself, the evangelist does occupy for us a distinct position, and supply a definite want, in virtue of these traits.

IV. Characteristics.—Though this Gospel has little historical matter which is not shared with some other, it would be a great error to suppose that the voice of Mark could have been silenced without injury to the divine harmony. The minute painting of the scenes in which the Lord took part, the fresh and lively mode of the narration, the very absence of the precious discourses of Jesus, which, interposed between his deeds, would have delayed the action, all give to this Gospel a character of its own. It is the history of the war of Jesus against sin and evil in the world during the time that he dwelt as a Man among men. Our Lord is presented to us, not as the Son of God, but as the Son of David and Abraham, the theocratic King of the chosen people; nor, as in Luke, as the universal Saviour of our fallen humanity; but as the incarnate and wonder-working Son of God, for whose emblem the early Church justly selected the figure of a lion. His record is emphatically "the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God" (Mark i, 1), living and working among men, and developing his mission more in acts than by words. The limits of his narrative and its general character can hardly be better stated than in the words of his apostolic teacher. Acts x, 38-42. Commencing with the Baptist preaching in the wilderness, and announcing the " Mightier One" who was at hand, he tells us how, at his baptism, "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power," and declared him to be his "beloved Son." The next scene is the inquiring of the pregnant fact, "He was with the wild beasts," thus setting the Son of God before us as the Lord of nature, in whom the original grant to man of dominion over the lower creation was fulfilled (Malachi, Unity of the N. T. p. 228; Bengel, ad loc.; Wilberforce, Doctrine of Incarna- tion, p. 89). As we advance, we find one act after another giving up every exercise of our Lord's power over man and nature distinctly and minutely—not merely chronicking the incidents, as is Matthew's way, but surrounding them with all the circumstances that made them impressive to the bystander, and making us feel how deep that impression was; how great the awe and wonder with which his mighty works and preaching were regarded, not only by the crowd (i, 22, 27; ii, 12; vii, 2), but by the disciples themselves (iv, 41; vi, 51; x, 24, 28, 82); how the crowds thronged and pressed upon him (v, 1; xii, 21); how he had no place to lay his head (vii, 39), so that there was a scarce room to stand or sit (ii, 2; iii, 32; iv, 1), or leisure even to eat (iii, 20; vi, 81); how his fame spread the more he sought to conceal it (i, 45; iii, 7; v, 20; vii, 36, 57); and how, in consequence, the people crowded about him, bringing their sick (i, 29-34; iii, 10), and "whithersoever he entered into villages or cities, or country, they laid sick in the streets, and besought that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment: and as many as touched were made perfectly whole" (vi, 56); how the unclean spirits, seeing him, at once fell down before him, and cried, "Thou art the Son of God" (i, 23-26; iii, 11); how, again, in Peter's words, "He went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with him."
But while the element of divine power is that which specially arrests our attention in reading his Gospel, there is none in which the human personality is more conspicuous. The single word ὄρεισκών (v, 8) throws a flood of light on our Lord's early life as man in his native village. The version of his knowledge is expressly stated (xiii, 82, οἷος ὄριοι) and we continually meet with mention of human emotions—anger (iii, 5; viii, 12, 38; x, 14), wonder (vi, 5), pity (vi, 34), love (v, 21), grief (vii, 34; viii, 12); and human infirmities—sleep (iv, 38), desire for repose (vi, 31), hunger (x, 17).

In Mark we have no attempt to draw up a continuous narrative. His Gospel is a rapid succession of vivid pictures loosely strung together (usually by soi, καὶ παλιν, or ὥσπερ), without much attempt to bind them into a whole, or give the events in their natural sequence. This pictorial power is that which specially characterizes this evangelist; so that, as has been well said, "if any one desires to know an evangelical fact, not only in its main features and grand results, but also in its most minute and, so to speak, more graphic delineation, he must betake himself to Mark." (De Coeris, Ταυρά, p. 86.) This power is especially apparent in all that concerns our Lord himself. Nowhere else are we permitted so clearly to behold his very gesture and look; see his very position; to read his feelings and thoughts. In Mark the Lord deals to us the comprehensive gaze of Christ (τοιαύτα ἄμφως, iii, 5, 34; vi, 22, x, 23; xi, 11), his loving embrace of the children brought to him (ιγνάκεισάς μνέα, ix, 36; x, 16); his preceding his disciples, while they follow in awe and amazement (x, 52). We see him take his seat to address his disciples (εἰλος, ix, 84), and turning round in holy anger to rebuke Peter (πταστροφῆς, viii, 33); we hear the sighs which burst from his bosom (vii, 34; viii, 12), and listen to his very accents ("Ταλίθα, κυμη," vi, 41; "Εὐρυφάθα," vii, 34; "Αβάς," xvi, 59). We have an eye on every event. And the freshness and pictorial power which places the whole scene before us with its minute accessories—the paralytic (ii, 1—12), the storm (iv, 38—41), the demoniac (v, 1—20), Herod's feast (vi, 21—29), the feeding of the 5000 (vi, 30—40), the lunatic child (ix, 14—29), the young ruler (x, 17—22), Bartimeus (x, 46—53), etc. At another place details are brought out by the addition of a single word (κίψας, i, 7; σχιζομακράς, i, 10; σπαλασσώμεις, i, 41; τοις ἔως, iv, 11; πρωσῳμνίζομαι, vi, 58; ἵππων, viii, 21, 23; κρεάς, σπαραγματίζει, ix, 26; στυγγαλίας καλεῖται, xiv, 67), or by the substitution of a more precise and graphic word for one less distinctive (ἰειδάλλω, ii, 12: ἴειςτασιν, ii, 12: γεμνοίσιν, iv, 37; ἴεράρχαι, v, 29: ἀρνοῦτας, v, 46; ἀντίφητες, vii, 9; ἰμαρμίζοιται, xiv, 38).

It is to Mark also that we are indebted for the record of the minute particulars of persons, places, times, and numbers, which stamp on his narrative an impress of authenticity.

(1.) People.—i, 20; ii, 14; iii, 5, 17, 82, 84; iv, 11; v, 32, 37; vi, 40, 48; vii, 1, 25, 26; viii, 10, 27; ix, 13; x, 15; x, 29; x, 31, 32; x, 34; x, 37, 65; xv, 7, 21, 40, 47; xvi, 7.

(2.) Places.—i, 28; iv, 1, 38; v, 11, 20, 21; vi, 55; vii, 17, 31; viii, 10, 27; ix, 30; x, 4; xi, 41; xiv, 66; xvi, 13, 16, 59; xv.

(3.) Times.—i, 32, 35; ii, 26; iv, 35; v, 2, 18, 21; vi, 2; xi, 11; xii, 20; xiv, 1, 12, 17, 33, 65, 72; xvi, 25, 38, 84, 42; xvi, 1, 2.

(4.) Number.—v, 13, 42; vi, 7; vii, 34; xiv, 30, 72.

Other smaller variations are continually occurring. Here a single word, there a short parenthesis, sometimes a shift of the point of view, and finally that striking air of life to the record; e.g., Zedeba left with the hired servants (i, 20); our Lord praying (i, 85); the paralytic borne of four (iii, 5); the command that a ship should wait on him (iii, 9): "thy sisters" (iii, 32); our Lord taken "even as he was in the ship" (iv, 35)."

MARK, GOSPEL OF

8. Words not found at all, or found less frequently in Mark, are—γενομένος, only twice, in the same context (x, 17, 18); Matthew sixteen, Luke fifteen times; νεός, παῖς, σύμβας, σύμφωνον, ἀνρήτω, ἄνωθεν, ἄγιος, κόσμος, ἔργα, μακάριος, ὄρθιος, καλῶς, only three times, to Matthew twenty-six, Luke forty-two; "νομίζω, only once; Χριστός, seven, Matthew sixteen, Luke three; these are mentioned twice, Samarna and its inhabitants not once.

VI. Persons for whom the Gospel was written.—A dispassionate review of the Gospel confirms the traditional statement that it was intended primarily for Gentiles, and among these the use of Latinisms, and the concise abrupt character "suitable for the vigilance of a Roman audience" (Westcott, Introduction, p. 348), seem to point out those for whom it was specially meant. In consistency with this view, words which would not be understood by Gentile readers are interpreted: Bonner, (iii, 17); Talihia cumi (iv, 40); Corban (vii, 11); Bartimeus (x, 46); Abb (xxiv, 36); Eli or lamba zachbathani (xxv, 34); two mites "make a farthing" (xii, 42); Gehenna is "unchangeable fire" (4x, 19); Jewish usages, and other matters with which none but Jews could be expected to be familiar, are explained, e.g. the washing before meals (v, 5, 8); in the days of uninterred bread the Passover was killed (xiv, 13); at the Passover the season of figs had not come (xii, 13); the preparation is "the day before the Sabbath" (xv, 42); the Mount of Olives is "over against the Temple" (xxiii, 33); Jordan is a "river" (Mark i, 5; Matt. iii, 6); the Pharisees, etc., "used to fast" (Mark i, 18; Matt. ix, 14); the Sadducees' worst tenet is mentioned (Mark xii, 18); and explanations are given which Jews would not need (Mark xv, 6, 16). All reference to the law of Moses is omitted, and even the word νομός does not occur; the Sabbath was appointed for the good of man (ii, 27); and in the quotation from Isaiah (lvi, 7) he added "all nations." The genealogy of our Lord is likewise omitted. Other matters interesting chiefly to the Jews are similarly passed over, such as the reflections on the request of the Scribes and Pharisees for a sign (Matt. xii, 38-45); the parable of the king's son (Matt. xxii, 1-14); and the awful denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees (Matt. xxiii). Matter that might offend is omitted, as Matt. x, 6; vi, 7, 8. Passages, not always peculiar to Mark, abound in his Gospel, in which the antagonism between the pharisaic legal spirit and the Gospel come out strongly (Mark i, 19, 22; x, 5, 11); which hold out hopes to the heathen of admission to the kingdom of heaven even without the Jews (xii, 9), and which put ritual forms below the worship of the heart (ii, 18; iii, 1-5; v, 23). Whilst he omits the invective against the Pharisees (Mark i, 18; Matt. ix, 14), our Lord may in some way have Jesus condemned them "with anger" (iii, 5). Mark alone makes the Scribe admit that love is better than sacrifices (xii, 33). In conclusion, the absence of all quotations from the O.T. made on his own authority, with the exception of those in the opening verses from Mal. iii, 1; Isa. xi, 3 (xxv, 29 being rejected as interpolated), points the same way. The only citations he introduces are those made by our Lord, or by those addressed to him.

VII. Citations from Scripture.—The following are the only direct citations:

Mal. iii, 1. 1, 2.
Isa. xi, 2.
Isa. xii, 12.
Isa. xiv, 13.
Ezek. x, 16.
Ezek. xiv, 7.
Ezek. xxi, 19.
Ezek. xxviii, 12; 25, 13, 17.
Gen. i, 7, 8.
Gen. ii, 4, 5.
Ps. xxviii, 26, 29, 31.

(b) Isa. ix, 17; Jer. vii, 17.
Ps. cxviii, 23, 25, xil, 10, 11.
Dent xvi, 8.
Ps. liii, 18.
Ps. liii, 20.
Ps. cx, 1.
Dan. xii, 7, xil, 11, xil, 14.
Zech. xxii, 1.
Isa. lx, 1.
Ps. xlii, 17, xiv, 34.

Of these, (a) only one peculiar to Mark. In (b) we have the addition of a few words to the Syntactical quotation. We have also references to the O.T. in the following passages:

Lev. xvi, 9, 10, 11.
Isa. xii, 11, xii, 9, 14.
Dan. vii, 18, xil, 18, xil, 24.
Deut. xiv, 21.

VIII. Time and Place of Composition.—On these points the Gospel itself affords no information, except that we may certainly affirm, against Baur, Hilgenfeld, Weisse, etc., that it was composed before the fall of Jerusalem, since otherwise so remarkable a fulfilment of our Lord's prophecies could not but have been noticed. Ecclesiastical tradition is, as usual, vacillatory and untrustworthy. Clement, as quoted by Eusebius (ut sup.), places the composition of the Gospel in the lifetime of Peter; while Irenaeus, with much greater probability, asserts that it was not written till after the decease (ὑπὸ δοθεωρ, not "departure from Rome," Mill, Grabe, Ehrard) of Peter and Paul. Later authorities are, as ever, much more definite. Theophylact and Euthym. Zigab., with the Chron. Pasch., Georg. Synell., and Hesychius, place it ten years after the Ascension, i.e. A.D. 40; Eusebius, in his Chronicon, A.D. 43. Then Peter, Paul, and John were together in Rome. It is not likely that it dates before the reference to Mark in the Epistle to the Colossians (iv, 10), where he is only introduced as a relative of Barnabas, as if this were his greatest distinction; and this Epistle was written about A.D. 65. If, after coming to Rome, Paul's sending out was on, and joined Peter at Babylon, he may have then acquired, or rather completed that knowledge of Peter's preaching, which tradition teaches us to look for in the Gospel, and of which there is so much internal evidence; and soon after this the Gospel may have been committed to writing. We may probably date it between Peter's martyrdom, c. A.D. 65, and the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70.

As to the place, the uniform testimony of early writers (Clement, Eusebius, Jerome, Epiphanius, etc.) is that the Gospel was written and published in Rome. In this view many modern writers of weight agree. Chrysostom asserts that it was published in Alexandria, but his statement is not confirmed—as, if true, it must certainly have been—by any Alexandrian writer. Some (Eichhorn, R. Simon) maintain a combination of the Roman and Alexandria view under the theory of a dual publication, first in one city and then in the other. Storr is alone in his view that it was first made public at Antioch.

IX. Language.—There can be no room for questioning that the Gospel was composed in Greek. To suppose that it was written in Latin—as is stated in the subscription of the Muratorian fragment and some early MSS. (ἀργυροφυλάκια ἐν Πορείᾳ) because it was intended for the use of Roman Christians, implies complete ignorance of the Roman Church of that age, which in language, organization, and ritual was entirely Greek, maintaining its character in common with most of the churches of the West as a "Greek religious colony" (Milman, Latin Christ, i, 27). The attempt made by Baronius, Bellarmine, etc., to strengthen the authority of the Vulgate by this means was therefore, as one of their own Church, R. Simon, has shown, entirely futile; and the pretended Latin authentic, said to be preserved in the library of St. Mark's at Venice, turned out to be part of an ancient Latin code of the four Gospels, now known as Codex Forculenensis.

X. Contents.—The Gospel of Mark may be divided into three parts:

(1.) The references previous to the commencement of the public ministry of our Lord, including the preaching and baptism of John, our Lord's baptism and temptation (i, 1-18).

(2.) Our Lord's ministry in Galilee, including that in Eastern Galilee (i, 14-27); that in Northern Galilee (vii, 24-ix, 27); that in Perea, and the journeys towards Jerusalem (ix, 38—x, 52).

(3.) His triumphant entry, passion, death, resurrection, and ascension (xi, 1-xvi, 8 [20]).
XI. Genuineness and Integrity.—The genuineness of Mark's Gospel was never doubted before Schleiermacher, who, struck by an apparent discrepancy between the orderly narrative we now possess and the description of Papias (at loc.), broached the view followed by Credner, Ewald, and others, that the Gospel in its present form was the work of Mark the Apostle, not of Peter. This led to the notion, which has met with much acceptance among German critics (Haur, Hilgenfeld, Kistlin, etc.), of an original, pre-canonical Mark, "the Gospel of Peter," probably written in Aramaic, which, with other oral and documentary sources, formed the basis upon which some unknown later writers formed the existing Gospel. But even if, on other grounds, this view were probable, all historical testimony is against it; and we should have to account for the entire disappearance of an original document of so much importance without leaving a trace of its existence, and the silent substitution of a later work for it, and its acceptance by the whole Church. If ordinary historical testimony is to have any weight, we can have no doubt that the Gospel we now have, and which has always borne his name, was that originally composed by Mark. We can have no reason to think that either John the prebyster or Papiax were inadmissible; and if the ordinary interpretation of οὐ τὰ ταύτα was correct, and the description of the Gospel given by Papias was really at variance with its pres-cent form, it would be at least equally probable that the words of the plagiarist were excised and the evidence mistaken. There can, however, be little doubt that the meaning of οὐ τὰ ταύτα has been strained and distorted, and that the words do really describe not Mark's alone, but all three Synoptic Gosspels as we have them; not, that is, "Lives of Christ" chronologically arranged, but "a summary of representative facts" given according to a moral and not a historic sequence, following a higher order than that of mere time.

As regards the integrity of the Gospel, Ewald, Reuss, and others have called in question the genuineness of the opening verses (l, 1-13). But the external evidence for them is as great as that for the authenticity of any part of the Gospels. Internal evidence is too subtle a thing, and varies too much with the subjectivity of the writer, for us to rely on it exclusively.

The case is different with the closing portion (xxvi, 9-20), where the evidence, both external and internal, is somewhat strong against its having formed a part of Mark's original Gospel, which is thought to have broken off abruptly with the words φεοδωτόν γὰρ (for various theories to account for this, the death of Peter, that of Mark, the flight of Judas, the last leaf, etc., see Hug, Meyer, Schott). No less than twenty-one words and expressions occur in it, some of them repeatedly, which are never elsewhere used by Mark. This alone, when we remember the peculiarities of diction in the pastoral epistles, as compared with Paul's later writings, would not be sufficient to prove that it was not written by the same author; though when taken in connection with the external evidence, it would seem to show that it was not composed at the same time.

On this ground, therefore, we must conclude that if not the whole, at least the latter part, was written in a later period than the rest of the Gospel. The external evidence, though somewhat inconsistent, points, though less decidedly, the same way. While it is found in all codices of weight, including A, C, D, and all versions, and is repeatedly quoted, without question, by early writers from the second century onward, elsewhere found in the N. (?) in that codex), while in several MSS. that contain it, it is noted that it is wanting in others, and those the most accurate copies. Jerome (ad Hebr. iv, 172) speaks of it as being found in but few copies of the Gospels, and deficient in almost all the Greek MSS. Eusebius (ad Mar-thin, quest. I) states that it is wanting "in nearly all the more accurate copies," while the canons that bear his name and the Ammonian sections do not go beyond v, 8. Of later critics, Olshausen and De Wette pronounce for its genuineness. The note of the latter may be considered, as well as those of Weiss and Meyer, who take the other side, for a full statement of the evidence for and against. See also Burgon, The last twelve Verses of Mark vindicated (Lond. 1871).

XII. Canonicity.—The citation of v. 19 as Scripture by Irenaeus, and the fact that it is canonical, commences with words which evidently refer to it. It is mentioned by Papias. Justin Martyr refers to it for the name Boanerges (Tryph. 169), as "the Memoirs of Peter." Irenaeus, as we have seen above, quotes from it, and in the 1st Clementine Homily (ed. Dusseldorf, 1858) a peculiar phrase of Mark iv, 54 is repeated verbally. The text is also recorded by Irenaeus (Her. iii, 11, 7), that the Docetists, heretics preferred the Gospel of Mark to others, affords an early proof of its acceptance in the Church.

XIII. Commentaries.—The following are the special exegetical helps on the entire Gospel of Mark: to a few sections of the book, the diligent extracts were made by Antioch, In Marcus (Gr. ed. Mattioli; also in the Bibl.
Max. Patr. iv, 870); Jerome, Expositio (in Opp. [Sep-don.], xi, 788); also Commentarius (ibid. xi, 783); Pos-the University of Kiel; in 1766 he was honored with the degree of doctor of divinity. He was a hospitable, kind man. Gifted with a quick perception and a good memory, Mark acquired great learning, particularly in theology and philosophy. By his indefatigable diligence as an author he kept the press almost constantly busy. Of his works the following have special interest for us: Modesta testificationes in vita sancti Augustini, Kiel, 1769, 4to); — Prædicta juris divini evangelici (ibid. 1768, 4to); — Diss. de divina vocacione hominum miserorum ad fidem et salutem (ibid. 1767, 4to); — Causa Dei et sub ipso imperantia contra theologiam JesuChristi (ibid. 1766, 4to).—Düring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, a. v.

Market (µαρκατος), a mercantile term, found only in Ezek. xxvii (rendered "merchants," except in ver. 15, 17, 19, 25), in several senses: (a) properly barter, and to trade; traffic (ver. 9, 27); (b) place of barter (ver. 12, 13, 17, 19); (c) gain, wealth, acquired by traffic (ver. 27, 34; plur. ver. 58, perf. precious wares), like "µεταρχη," "merchandize," and "μηταιρια." In the N. T., the word agora (δυσαπαρεις), thus rendered ("market-place") in Matt. xx, 3; Mark xii, 38; Luke vii, 36; Acts xix, 11, 40, denotes generally any public place in towns and cities where the people came together, and more specially it signifies a (a) public place, a broad street, etc. (Matt. xi, 16; xx, 3; xxi, 7; Mark vi, 56; xii, 38; Luke vii, 32; xi, 43; xx, 46); (b) a forum or market-places, where goods were exposed for sale, and where public trials were held (Acts xvi, 19; xvii, 17). In Mark vii, 4 it is doubtful whether dyópetai denotes the market itself, or is put for that which is brought from the market; but the known customs of the Jews suggest a preference of the former significance.
From this is derived the term agordous (ἀγορωδος), properly signifying the thing belonging to, or persons frequenting the agora; improperly rendered "in law" in Acts xix, 38, where it is applied to the days on which public trials were held in the forum; and in ch. xxvii, 5 (where it is rendered "basar sort") it denotes dilege, or persons lounging about in the place of business and other places of public resort.

There is a peculiar force in this application of the word, when we recollect that the market-places or bazaars of the East were, and are at this day, the constant resort of unoccupied people, the idler, and the newsmonger.

In very early periods markets were held at or near the gates of cities, sometimes within and sometimes without the walls. Here commodities were exposed for sale, either in the open air or in tents (2 Kings vii, 18). It is still not unusual in the East for the wholesale marters to come to the marketplace and carry with them (short time in the early part of the morning) at the gates of towns; but manufactured goods and various sorts of fruits are retailed in the bazaars within the towns.

In the time of our Saviour, as we learn from Josephus, the markets were inclosed in the same manner as the modern Eastern bazaars, which are shut at night, and contain traders' shops disposed in rows or streets; and in large towns the dealers in particular commodities are confined to certain streets. That this was also the case in the time of the prophet Jeremiah, we may infer from his

The close connection existed between those of the same craft, we learn incidentally from Neh. iii, 82. In rebuilding Jerusalem after the exile, the "goldsmiths and the merchants" acted together in repairing the walls.
Josephus calls the valley between Mounts Zion and Moriah the Tyrean (τυρειανον), i.e. the valley of the cheesemakers. In like manner there is mentioned the valley of Charashim, or "the craftsmen" (1 Chron. iv, 14; Neh. xi, 35). Josephus also mentions a street of the meat-dealers. The streets of Eastern cities are generally distinguished from each other, not by the separate names which they bear, but by the sort of traffic or business carried on in them. Thus at Cairo and other large Oriental cities we hear of the market of the butcher-for the fruit-dealers, the copper-ware sellers, the jewellers, and each, according to a row of shops on each side of the street devoted to that particular branch of trade (Hackett, Illustra. of Scripture, p. 61). See Bargain; Bazaar; Commerce; Merchant.

Marklin, Johann Friedrich, a German theologian, was born at Reichenbach, in Wurttemberg, Feb. 6, 1732; was educated at the University of Tubingen: in 1755 became a professor of theology at Wurzburg and, in 1769, tutor at his alma mater; in 1767, archdeacon; and in 1786 was raised to the dignity of professor of divinity, the department of exegesis of the Old Test. and Oriental literature falling to him. In 1779 he was made general superintendent of the churches of Wurttemberg, and died

Marks, Richard T., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Louisville, Ga., Sept. 24, 1899. He was educated a printer. In 1827 he moved to Columbus, Ga., and united with Mr. Larmar in establishing the Columbus Inquirer, the first paper started in the western portion of Georgia. Soon after, feeling called to the ministry, he commenced the study of theology under Thomas Goulding, D.D.; was licensed in 1837, and ordained in 1839. He labored as a minister mostly in missionary fields, or where the destitution was so great that unrequited labor had to be given. He preached in the following places in Georgia: Muscogee, East Point, West Point, Hamilton, Columbus, Emmaus, Americus, Mount Tabor, Ephesus, and White Sulphur Springs. He died Dec. 6, 1867. Mr. Marks was a ready writer, an excellent preacher, and an editor of great power and

Mark's, St., Day, the 26th of April, observed at least since the 6th century, in commemoration of St.
Mark, the evangelist. It is celebrated in most parishes of the Roman Church by a solemn, supplicatory procession, mentioned as early as pope Gregory the Great.
Walafrid Strabo states (De reh. ecc. c. 8) that it was inaugurated by that pope as the commencement of his pontificate, with a view to supplicate God for deliverance from a pestilence which was devastating Rome; and it is certain that Gregory held a procession in A.D.
590, in order to avert the pestilence. But the two ceremonies are clearly not identical. The latter was held in August, and was continued during three or four days; and taken in the procession of St. Mark, the faithful issued from seven separate churches, in this they all proceeded from a single sanctuary. In churches of which St. Mark is the patron, a mass is celebrated in connection with the procession, in which the color used is blue, indicative of the penitential feeling which predominates in the ceremony. An occasional removal of the festival to another day does not set aside the procession, which is always held on the 26th of April, unless Easter Sunday falls on that day.—Wetzer and Weitzel, Kirchen-Lex. vi, 952.

Marlatt, the Rev. E.D., a noted Methodist bishop and minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Warren County, N.J., in 1829, and educated at Dickinson College (class of 1850); was junior preacher on Carlisle Circuit in 1851; was the following year appointed to Lock Haven Circuit, where a bronchial affection developed itself, which compelled him to locate in 1854. In this same year he was appointed professor of a high literary institution in Washington City, where he remained until 1856, when he accepted the presidency of the newly-founded Irving Female College, and to this institution he devoted his energies until Jan. 2, 1865, when he "fell asleep in Jesus." "The personal character of our brother may be included in the comprehensive title 'a Christian gentleman,' the highest style and type of manhood. As a gentleman, a scholar, and a minister of truth, he was a noble candor. . . . In everything that bore upon truth or purity he was a decided man. Of his mental power and literary culture it may be safely said that he possessed a clear intellectual perception; rapid insight, coupled with careful analysis, and broad powers of generalizing; a vivid sensibility of nature, a keen discrimination of character, a large acquaintance with ancient and modern belles-lettres; and from the college under his presidency have been sent forth those that shall shine brightly in the literary world."—Conf. Minutes, 1865, p. 12.

Marlay, Michael, D.D., a noted Methodist minister, was born, of Roman Catholic parents, in Berkeley County, Va., June 21, 1797. In the year 1818 he migrated to the State of Ohio, and settled near Dayton. In 1821 he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was soon after appointed a class-leader. The Church, recognizing his gifts and graces, speedily licensed him as an exhorter, and afterwards as a local preacher. In the fall of 1851 he was received on trial as a travelling preacher by the Ohio Conference. He quieted the disquiet of the minds of the ministers and was widely known as a sound theologian, an able preacher, and a skilful administrator of discipline. So great was his reputation as an executive officer, that more than half of his ministry of thirty-five years was spent in this capacity. Twice its leaders were twice active and influential member of the General Conference, by which body he was appointed, in 1855, one of the commissioners of the Methodist Episcopal Church to manage the suit in the then pending trial for the property of the Western Book Concern. In 1856 he received the degree of D.D. from the Indiana State University. He died of cholera, while in attendance upon the session of the Cincinnati Conference, at Ripley, Ohio, Sept. 2, 1866. The late bishop Thomson thus spoke of Dr. Marlay shortly after his decease (Christian Advocate, N. Y., vol. xii, No. 49): "His strong frame of medium size, fine proportion, and high health, admirably fitted him for itinerant labor; his benignant countenance, amiable spirit, and gentle manners rendered him a welcome guest wherever he went. His fine head indicated great intellectual power; his habits of study seemed to render certain his constant improvement, while his clear call to the ministry insured his unwavering devotion to its duties. . . . In Biblical science, as well as in theoretical, practical, and experimental divinity, he was a master. . . . He was a great man in private as well as in public life; and one of the strongest proofs that his estimate of the goodness of a large family which he leaves behind him, every one is an ornament to society. . . . He expired in the arms of his brethren, and they buried him, feeling that they could lay in the tomb no man to whom the Methodist Church in Ohio has been more indebted." See also Leaders Repository, 1866, Jan.; Conf. Minutes, 1866, p. 292. (J. F. M.) Marlorton, Augustine, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Bar-le-Duc in 1566. At an early age he went out in an Augustinian convent, and took the vows in 1524. He soon acquired a knowledge of Hebrew and was appointed an exorcist in the convent. Having been appointed prior of a convent of his order at Bourges, he commenced to entertain Protestant views, as is evinced in the sermons he delivered after 1535 at Bourges, Poitiers, and Angers. He was designated to preach during the Lenten season at Rouen, when he openly separated from the Church. Pursued as a heretic, he sought refuge at Geneva, where he lived for a time by correcting proofs for the printers. He then went to Lausanne, to perfect his knowledge of theology. In 1549 he was appointed pastor at Crissier, and served at that place till 1564. The dissensions of Geneva sent him in 1565 to Paris, and in the beginning of the year following he was called to take charge of the Reformed Church at Rouen. His talents and his personal qualities now had a fair opportunity for display, and soon gained him great influence in that city, and brought many converts to the Church. In 1561 he went to the Colloqy of Poissy, where, next to Theodore de Beza, he stood at the head of the Protestants, and on the 15th of May he presided over the provincial synod assembled at Dieppe. The union of all the Confessio fidei with the common expression of religious opinion adverse to Roman Catholicism, and more particularly the bloody deeds of Vassy on March 1, 1562, had greatly exasperated the Protestants [see Huguenots] and, the latter, feeling that there was only one alternative for them, either to adopt the compromise and embrace their worst convictions, took arms on each side. The opening scene had been made at Paris. At Rouen the Protestants were in the majority (if we may follow Beza, according to Flocquet [Rom. Cath.], however, they only assumed the majority, and, anxious to secure the city for the armies of Condé, made themselves masters of the place by stealth in the night of April 15 to 16. An independent government was established, and unbounded religious toleration exercised towards non-Protestants. The masses, however, in the hour of their triumph, fell victims to their own enthusiasm. The public safety of the country, in short, was placed in danger. The commune, after the people and the mayor, the civil and armed forces, the townsmen, the clergy, the nobles, the notables, all rose against the Huguenots. The commune at first appeared to be the champion of the oppressed, but it was the instrument of the local revolution. In the first place, the commune declared its peace with the State, and, in the second, it recognized the authority of the State over the commune. The commune also refused to act in favor of the Huguenots, and thus rendered them incapable of taking any part in the war. The Huguenots, under the leadership of the Duke of Anjou, were defeated at the battle of Jemmapes, and the city of Paris was taken by the State. The Peace of Saint-Germain was concluded between the State and the Huguenots, and the Huguenots were allowed to retain their possessions in France. For this and other outrages the Protestant leaders, of whom Marlorton was one, were not responsible either directly or indirectly. Yet, when the Huguenots were succeeded in power, Marlorton was one of the first accused, and, though he had done so much more than simply bear the blame for the grant of religious freedom, he was arrested Oct. 28, 1562, brought before the bar of the Parliament, which had re-entered Rouen with the Roman Catholic forces, and condemned, as a traitor and heretic, to be drawn on a hurdle through the streets of the town, and then hung in front of his own church. After the execution, which took place Nov. 1, 1563, his head was severed from the trunk, and exposed on the bridge of the town. The Huguenots revered this outrage as the execution of two leading Romanists in their hands. The widow and five children of Marlorton fled to England, where they were for a long time maintained by the French Protestants.

As a writer Marlorton figures very prominently by himself. His exegetical works are numerous and valued, because of the accuracy and scholarship which they evince in the author. "They may be best described as painstaking and not injudicious selections of the interpretations of other writings" (Kitto). His earliest production is Remarques sur la representation de l'Esprit et du Verbe Divin dans le Psaume (Paris, 1563, fol.; ed. 1561, 8vo); but one of his most important productions is his Novi Testamenti catholicae expositio, etc. (Geneva, 1561, fol.; 2d ed. 1605, fol.). This is a valuable work, containing Erasmus's Latin version of the N.T., with the expositions of the fathers of the Church, and of Orcus, Calvin, Erasmus, Musculus, Melancthon, Servetus, Bunsen, Bullinger, Zwinglius, Vitus Theodorus, etc. His object seems to have been to prove to Romanists the identity of the Protestant and the Apostolic Church, and the essential oneness of the two Protestant parties. He himself left no distinct confession. Part of it was translated into English, and published under the following titles: A Catholick and Ecclesiastical Explication of the holy Gospel after St. Matthew. Translated out of Latin into English by Thomas Tyman, Mynystor (Lond. 1579, fol.); A Catholick and Ecclesiastical Explication of the Apocalypse of St. John the Apostle. Translated (black letter, Lond. 1574, 4to). Translations have also been published of his Exposition of St. Mark (1583, 4to); St. John (1574, 4to); St. Luke (1584, 4to, etc.). He also wrote Genesis, cum catholicae Expositione, etc. (Geneva, 1562, fol.; often reprinted under the title of The Prophecies of the Prophets of S. S. Prophecatum Expositio ecclesiastica, etc., Item Cataca sacra ep divina Bibliorum locns cum similis expositions (Geneva, 1562, fol.; often reprinted; and in English un-
MARMONTEL

MARNIX, PHILIPPE VAN DE STE. ALDEGOOREN, occupies a distinguished place in the history of the Netherlands during the Reformation period. He was born at Brussels in 1588, of parents thoroughly identified with the interests of their country, and was carefully educated at home, and later at Geneva under Calvin and Beza. After returning to his native city in 1606, he spent six years in retirement, but became known, notwithstanding his seclusion, as a careful observer of events, and respected as a patriot and a man of honor. His devotion to the cause of the Reformation, whose influence he steadfastly endeavored to extend, could not be concealed; nor could his learning, his keen understanding, and his power as a writer escape recognition. He was soon in intimate relations with the leaders of the nation, and the rapid progress of events forced him into prominence. He is universally held to be the author of the so-called compromise (about 1565-66) by which the nobles and others pledged themselves to resist, by all lawful means, the introduction of the Inquisition. The league soon attained such proportions that it dared to present (April 5, 1566) a petition to the regent for the suppression of the Inquisition. On the Protestant field-praying was introduced, he placed himself at the head of the movement, and insisted that the Protestants should be permitted to worship in Antwerp itself. On the 19th of August an iconoclastic mob destroyed the many works of art that adorned the churches, expelled the Protestants, and committed Protestant worship in specified places; and under this sanction the first synod of the Walloon churches assembled in Antwerp Oct. 26, 1566. Marnix presided, and by his influence contributed to the adoption of the reformed confession, by which event the Calvinists acquired a pre-eminence that still continues. The government now adopted more energetic measures to restrain the Protestants, by placing garrisons in important towns, and even besieging such as refused to admit them. This was the case at Valenciennes; and Marnix, while seeking to aid the beleaguered city, was defeated, his brother killed, himself banished, and his property confiscated. During his exile he was influential in converting William of Orange and Nassau to the Protestant faith, and formed a connection with him that was only dissolved by death. In the mean time, however, Marnix had entered the service of the Palatinate, where he continued his labors. He died of consumption at Heidelberg, where he was largely engaged in theological investigations; but, with the consent of the elector, he was often employed in the affairs of his own country, under the direction of the prince of Orange. He left a treatise on the regency of Louis of Nassau at Jemmingen in July, 1568, etc. He attended the synod of the exiled clergy at Wesel in November, 1568, and his influence is seen in the constitution of the Church then adopted. A second important synod was held at Emden, Oct. 4 to 14, 1571, at which Marnix was also present, and which selected him to write a history of recent events in the Netherlands; but the needs of his country prevented the execution of this task. In July, 1572, he was sent by the prince of Orange to confer with the delegates of Holland, who were assembled at Utrecht, and succeeded in securing them to pledge their readiness to make every sacrifice to throw off the Spanish yoke. Thenceforward his activity was incessant. He was taken prisoner by the Spaniards in November, 1573, but his life was spared, as the prince of Orange had threatened to retaliate, and Requesens, successor to the duke of Alba, empowered him to negotiate a peace, which was defeated by the sagacity of Orange. A similar office, undertaken after his exchange on the order of the prince of Orange, likewise failed, as did his mission to induce Queen Elizabeth of England to accept the sovereignty of the Netherlands. He assisted in the negotiations that resulted in the "Pacification of Ghent" in November, 1576, and in the formation of the second union between the provinces at Brussels in December, 1577. In May, 1578, he represent the Netherlands at the Diet of Worms, and prevailed on the German states to remain neutral in the contest with Spain. In the mean time religious intolerance had led to great outrages among his countrymen, and the bitter feeling between the parties threatened more ruin, if it had not been secured by so much exertion. An attempt to reconcile these differences, in which he was engaged on his return, failed, and several of the Roman Catholic provinces withdrew, and placed themselves and their religion under Spanish protection. An alliance with France was now thought of, and Mar ix carried his intentions successfully to the states-general to offer the crown to Francis, duke of Anjou-Alençon. This prince reached Antwerp on Feb. 19, 1572; but an attempt to seize Antwerp and other impor. tant towns led to his expulsion from the land before he had reigned a year, and both Orange and Marnix were suspected of complicity with the French. In consequence, Marnix retired from public life; but the progress of the Spaniards, under the duke of Parma, induced William of Orange to recall him, and he was appointed to the office of first burgomaster of Antwerp, in order that he might direct its defence. He entered on its duties Nov. 15, 1568, and a few days later the siege began. It was continued until Aug. 17, 1585, when the city honorably capitulated. With this event his political career was ended, and he retired to his estates, devoting himself to the study of theology and science. He was appointed by the states-general to translate the Bible into Dutch, he removed to Leyden, in order to avail himself of its library, and of the assistance of his friends Scaliger, Lipsius, Janius, and others. He only lived, however, to complete the book of Genesis. He died Dec. 15, 1586. "He was," says Motley, "a man of most rare and versatile genius—scholar, theologian, diplomat, statist, scribe, orator, pamphleteer; he had genius for all things, and was eminent in all." The theological works of Van Marnix were chiefly of a political character. They are The Betrayal, written after the manner of Von Hutten, and written in the style of Rabelais. It was probably intended to promote a reconciliation between the Roman and the Protestant provinces of his country. Another able contribution is his Tableau des différences de la religion (1669, and often). A complete edition of his works, in 8 vols., was published at Brussels, 1857-60, under the title Oeuvres de Phil. de Marnix de Ste. Aldegondie; vol. iv contains a brief memoir, and a notice bibliographique. His life has been frequently written; among others, Th. Juste has treated of his connection with his countrymen (1858). Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic, and Hist. of the United Netherlands, vol. i, chap. iii, are valuable aids to the study of this career. See also Prins, Leben van P. v. MATON, JOANNEs, a noted Eastern patriarch, supposed to be the founder of the Maronites, was born at Sirum, near Antioch, in Syria, about the middle of the 7th century. He became a Christian, and became monk and priest in the convent of St. Matthias, and was elected bishopric of Boeotys in 676, according to some, by the papal legate, he brought, if we may follow Romish authority, all the Christians of Lebanon within the communion of the Church of Rome; was then made patriarch of Antioch, and confirmed by pope Honorius; and died in 707. See, however, MARONITES.

Maronites, a community or sect of Christians, numbering some 150,000, in Syria, particularly in the northern part of Mount Lebanon, and said to be of very ancient origin.

1. History.—Considerable controversy has arisen as to the real origin of this most peculiar Christian people; the most probable account represents them as descendants of a remnant of the Monophysites (q. v.), who, fleeing from the repressive measures of the emperor Anas-Taurus II., in the early part of the 8th century, settled on the slopes of the Lebanon, and gradually yielded their distinctive Monothelite views. According to Mosheim (Eccles. Hist. i, 457; iii, 127), many Monophysites, after the Council of Constantinople, found a refuge among the Marons. In 836, Mardam, the Maron chief, obtained possession of Lebanon A.D. 676, and made it the asylum of vagabonds, slaves, and all sorts of rabble; and about the conclusion of the 7th century these Monophysites of Lebanon were called Maronites, after Maro, their first bishop. None, he says, of the ancient writers give any certainty in Syria really first person who converted these mountainites to Monothelism; it is probable, however, from several circumstances, that it was John Maro, whose name they have adopted; and that this ecclesiastic received the name of Maro from his living, in the character of a monk, in the famous convent of St. Maro, upon the borders of the Oreons, before his settlement among the Mardaites of Mount Libanus. Gieseler (Eccles. Hist. ii, 419), however, takes exception to this identification of the Maronites with the Mardaites, and, by authority derived from the writings of Anesotil Duparon (Rit che I' eglise eignation des Mardes, in the Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscript., i, 1), holds that the Mardaites or Mards, a warlike nation of Armenia, were placed as a garrison on Mount Libanus by Constantine Pogonatus, A.D. 676 (Theophanes, p. 159); and were with them having been called Mardaites II. (Thaer, p. 592). Madden (Turkish Empire, i, 154), upon the authority of the learned Benedictine St. Maur (Histoire Monastique de l'Orient, p. 348), holds that the Maronites were founded by St. Maro, a patriarch of Syrian Christians in the 5th century, and that they existed under that name in the 7th century, when the Saracens ravaged the country, and were afterwards persecuted as Mardaites (comp. here Churchill, Mount Libanus, iii, 58). There is certainly much in favor of this argument, not the least of which is the fact that, "at the time of the conquest of the7th century, the entire range of mountains from Antioch to Jerusalem was in the hands of the Syrian Christians, who formed a political power under chiefs or emirs, excercising a hereditary government" (Churchill). But, however great may be the darkness surrounding their earliest history, one thing is certain, from the testimony of William of Tyre and other unexceptionable witnesses, as also from the most authentic records, namely, that the Maronites retained the opinions of the Monothelites until the 12th century, when, abandoning and renouncing the doctrine of one will in Christ, they were re-admitted into the communion of the Roman Church. Jacques Hors, in his Church of Acre in the 12th century, thus speaks of the Maronites in his Historia Hierosolimitana, drawn up at the request of pope Honorius III: "Men armed with bows and arrows, and skilful in battle, inhabit the mountains in considerable numbers, in the province of Phoenicia, not far from the town of Biblos. They are called Maronites, from the name of a certain man, their master, Maron, a heretic, who affirmed that there was in Jesus but one will or operation. The Christians of the Lebanon, dopes of this diabolical error of Maron, remained sep-brought back to the communion of Rome by the influence of the Crusaders. Even in our day the Maronites, "warranted, indeed, both by historical and traditional records, allure in terms of pride and satisfaction to the service done by their ancestors to the armies of the Crusaders, and estimate in round numbers 50,000 of their people as living under the dominion of the Cross" (Churchill). During the early part of the 12th century the communications between the Maronite patriarch and the papal see were of frequent recurrence, and thus the way was easily paved for reunion. But though the Maronites joined the communion of Rome in this very year, as if it were an energetic act of conversion, and it was some time before the insurrection was quelled, the Druses being the last to submit. They had asked the Maronites to join them, and the latter, who had held back when there was some chance of success, now rose under the most favorable pretext. In the mean time, in 1840, the allied fleet of England, Austria, and Turkey were employed to secure the restoration of Syria to Turkey. Turkish agents were busy among the Maronites, fanning the flame of rebellion; most of these wretches were Englishmen. Finally, France not withholding her consent to the Treaty of Trianon, and Austria and Prussia being satisfied by the position of the Christians now became worse than ever, and their merchants were obliged to invoke the protection of the European consuls against the spoliation of the Turks. Lord Stratford of Redcliffe interfered in their behalf, and his influence was sufficient to restore. The Turkish government wished to appoint a Turkish governor over Lebanon, but the English finally succeeded in obtaining the appointment of emir Bashir Kassim Shehab, a Christian. The Druses, however, took exception to this arrangement, and when subsequently the Maronite patriarch attempted to confiscate all civil authority for the benefit of the Maronites, they became exasperated. Colonel Rose, the English consul-general, wrote on that occasion, "The Maronite clergy show a determination to uphold their supremacy in the mountains at the risk of a civil war. And a civil war was the result of this obstinacy. The patriarch (for his functions among the Maronites, see below, under III. Religious Status—1. Clergy) at the same time, by his mismanagement, excited the jealousies of the Turks, and displeased the English, whom the Druses hailed as their friends. On Sept. 14, 1841, a first affray took place between the Druses and the Christians at Deir el-Kamar; it was repressed by the efforts of colonel Rose. The Druses rose again, however, on Oct. 18, 14, and 15, and the entire destruction of the town was only prevented by the arrival of the colonial forces, numbering up, however, their connection with Rome. In the 17th century they placed themselves under the direct protection of France, Louis XIV and Louis XV granting them "Letters of Protection;" and for some time the French consul at Beirut exercised almost royal sway over them, the Maronites regarding themselves as "the French of the East." In the early part of the 18th century the Druses called the Mohammedan family of the Shehabe to govern Lebanon, and in 1713 the Turks made the first attempt to bring the inhabitants under the direct rule of the Porte; but after a long and bloody contest, the Turks in the battle of Aïdaleh; but in 1756 several emirs became Maronites, and, invited by the Maronite clergy, showed great favor to their new brethren, thereby displease the Druses, and provoking a feeling of ill-will between the Druses and the Maronites, which has not yet subsided. The pachas of Acre, since Jezzar, carefully promoted this misunderstanding, for they felt that the tribes of Lebanon, fully united under an enterprising chief, would become dangerous to the Porte. Yet there was no feeling of religious animosity between the two nations at this early date, and, whenever political troubles broke out, Druse and Maronite sided indiscriminately with both parties. Emir Bashir Shehab (1783-1840), although in secret a Maronite, was always surrounded by the most important among the Druses, and, whenever he needed help, asked it of them rather than of the Maronites. Thus the Druses and the Christians were living peaceably side by side until 1831, when Syria passed under the rule of Mohammed Ali, and he commissioned his son, Ibrahim Pacha, to govern the provinces. Bringing his enlightened views, Ibrahim Pacha applied himself to the improvement of the condition of his Christian subjects, and, in spite of the opposition of the Mohammedans, they were raised to civil and military offices. The Syrians, however, accustomed to the indolent Turkish rule, revolted against this energetic and active Egyptian management, and it was some time before the insurrection was quelled, the Druses being the last to submit. They had asked the Maronites to join them, and the latter, who had held back when there was some chance of success, now rose under the most favorable pretext. In the mean time, in 1840, the allied fleet of England, Austria, and Turkey were employed to secure the restoration of Syria to Turkey. Yet there was no feeling of religious animosity between the two nations at this early date, and, whenever political troubles broke out, Druse and Maronite sided indiscriminately with both parties. Emir Bashir Shehab (1783-1840), although in secret a Maronite, was always Zaḥlil and Deir el-Kamar. On May 4 some Druses broke into the convent of Amlk, near Deir el-Kamar, and murdered the superior in his bed. The Maronites still sought to obtain peace, but found that they would be compelled to meet force with force. Three thousand men from Zaḥlil attacked the Druse village of Amdara, but were beaten by a much smaller force, their arrangements, and especially their discipline, being much inferior to that of the Druses. Kurčchid Pacha had a Turk- ish camp in the immediate vicinity of Beirūt, and commanded the plain, but he did not move here now as he had done on the former occasion. On the contrary, after encouraging the Maronites by promising them his protection against the Druses, he gave the signal of their massacre on May 8. One hundred Turkish sol- diers and the irregular Turkish cavalry joined the Druses in cutting down the Maronites. The Druses would have pushed on to Beirūt had they not been prevent- ed by the Turks. The European consuls now attempted to interfere; they were met with fine protestations by the Turkish authorities, and nothing was done to re- press the outrages. On May 10, Deir el-Kamar was blockaded Deir el-Kamar, and on June 1 it was attacked by 4000 of them. The city surrendered the next day. The pacha, after entering the city, upbraided the Maronites as traitors, rebels, etc., because they had thought it wise to defend themselves against the Druses. At the same time, Deir el-Kamar was bombarded, and Seleb Bey, Jumblatt, took Jeant, and murdered the inhabitants. Roman Catholic convents shared the same fate as those of the Maronites, being sacked, plundered, and burned: in that of Meshmāl alone thirty monks had their throats cut; the plunder was enormous. Ali Said Bey's district was given up to fire and the sword. Sidon was only saved by the timely arrival of captain Manuell, with his English ship the Firefly, on June 8. In the Anti-Lebanon, Said Bey's sister followed her brother's example and instructions, causing the Christians of his district to be inveigled into the service of the emir, and two of them escaped death by being taken over the border; others were killed. In the plain, where there were no European consuls, brooked out in which the whole mass of the inhabitants were massacred, but it was repressed with the aid of general Kmety (Ismail Pacha). The purely Maronite districts of Lebanon now became greatly alarmed, the more as Turkish soldiers were quartered there under the pretence of protecting them. The Eu- ropean consuls advised together, and drew up a remon- strance to the Druse chiefs, which a Mr. Graham was sent to deliver to them. Said Bey Jumblatt, however, when appealed to, declared only his respect for Eng- land and his willingness to see this struggle end, but added that he had no power over it, and that the Druses would not obey him. Most of the Druse sheiks con- trived to avoid Mr. Graham, and those who did meet gave him but evasive answers. Finally, on July 10, the Mohammedans of Damascus rose against the Christians, of whom there were some 25,000 in the city. The Christian quarter was soon a heap of smouldering ruins, beneath which numberless corpses were buried. Wom- en, married and unmarried, were wandering through the streets, and were seen to cry for assistance, with heads uncovered and feet naked, appealing to the mur- ders for mercy. Many were sold as slaves for a few piastres, or taken away to the desert, and their persons crowded with fanatics, who shouted continually, "Death to the Christians! Let us slaughter the Christians! Not let one remain!" Every church and convent was plundered and afterwards burned. The silver plate, jewelry, and gold coin taken from these sanctuaries were not allowed to be plundered by the rabble, but were removed by soldiers. These are the words of the British consul, Mr. Brunt. The consulates of France, Russia, Austria, Belgium, Holland, and the United States of America were vigorous in their protestations to the Turkish government, and the latter was at first so超過, as they were not situated in the Christian quarter, and they became an asylum for as many as were able to reach them. Others were saved in great numbers in the house of Abd-el-Kader, and in the cita- del; but the governor, Ahmed Pacha, was an unmoved witness of the horrid scenes that took place. The con- fiscated and lawless deeds of the plundering rabble (Lond. Rev. 1860, Oct., p. 160). As has already been stated in the article Druzes (q.v.), the French and English governments were obliged to come to the rescue of the Syrian Chris- tians, and the Porte was forced to inflict punishment upon those whom the Turkish officers had made pliant tools for the destruction of the Maronites. On Aug. 3 a conference of the great powers—Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, and Turkey as well—met, but the meet- ing was closed without accomplishing any real good. All that was secured was the promise that the Sublime Porte had endeavored and would continue to do its duty: but what this duty consisted in, it has been hard to de- termine to this day. Only a few weeks previously the Christian emissary had been compelled by the Turkish pa- cha to leave his country during the course of his pros- ecutables, when the emirs felt constrained afterwards to acknowledge their extorted perjury. In October, finally, the international conference of the plenipotentiaries of European powers convened at Beirūt, and crowned their labors successfully, June 9, 1861, by a spe- cial treaty concerning the administration of the Leba- non. See DRUZES, vol. ii, p. 900, col. 2.

II. Social Position.—The nation may be considered as divided into two classes, the common people and the sheiks, by whom must be understood the most eminent Christians, whether of the lebanes, of the serail, or the ordinary class. They all live dispersed in the mountains, in villages, hamlets, and even detached houses, which is never the case in the plains. The whole nation consists of cultivators. Every man im- proves the little domain he possesses, whether with his own hands. Even the sheiks live in the same manner, and are only distinguished from the rest by a bad pe- lasse, a horse, and a few slight advantages in food and lodging; they all live frugally, without many enjoy- ments, and are acquainted with the inventions of luxury. In general, the nation is poor, but no one wants necessarily; and if beggars are sometimes seen, they come rather from the sea-coast than the country itself. Property is as sacred among them as in Europe; nor do we hear of robberies and extortions so frequently committed by the Turks. Travellers may journey there, either by night or by day, with a security unknown in any other part of the empire, and the stranger is received with hospitality, as among the Arabs: it must be owned, however, that the Maronites are generous and reality of parsimony. Conformably to the doctrines of Christianity, they have only one wife, whom they fre- quently espouse without having seen, and always with- out having been much in her company. Contrary to the precepts of that same religion, however, they have admitted, or retained, the Arab street dance, and the nearest relation of a murdered person is bound to avenge him. From a habit founded on distrust, and the political state of the country, every one, whether sheik or peasant, walks continuously armed with a musk- et and poniards. This is, perhaps, an inconvenience; but this advantage results from it, that they have no novices in the use of arms among them when it is neces- sary to employ them against the Turks. As the coun- try maintains no regular troops, every man is obliged to join the army in time of war; and if this militia were well conducted, it would be superior to many European armies. From accounts taken in late years, the number of men fit to bear arms amounts to 85,000.

III. Religious Status. — Although the Maronites are united with Rome, and though they are perhaps the most ultramontane people in the world, they nevertheless retain their distinctive national rites and usages.

1. Clergy. — The most peculiar of all their institutions is undoubtedly the clerical. As we have seen above, it is supposed that the founder of the Maronites constituted himself a patriarch, and this position remains the highest dignity among them. It is true they admit the supremacy of Rome, but for the home government of the Church the patriarch is the highest authority, and in his election, as well as in the selection of all the clergy, the Maronite exercises his own private judgment, independent of the papal power at Rome. Here it may not be improper to state that the patriarch is at present expected to furnish every tenth year a report of the state of his patriarchate. Associated with the patriarch in the ecclesiastical government of the Maronites are twelve bishops, but of the latter four are titular, or in partibus. The patriarch himself is chosen by the bishops in secret conclave, and by ballot. "The debates usually last for many days, and even weeks; at last, when the choice is made, the bishops present kneel down and kiss the new patriarch's hands; the patriarch immediately writes letters to all the chief nobles of the mountain informing them of his nomination. The latter lose no time in assembling to pay him their respects and make their obeisance. A procession of honor shortly afterwards arrives for the patriarch from the governor of Lebanon. Fines, and rejoicing, and illumination extend throughout the whole range of the Maronite districts; a petition is now drawn up to be sent to the pope, praying him to confirm the choice which has just been made, and signed by the principal chiefs. It is open, however, to the clergy, or any party, to protest against the nomination. . . . The pope, however, never fails at once to confirm a selection which has the support of the feudal aristocracy and principal clergy of Lebanon." (Churchill, ii., 78.) In true puerile affection and presumptuous inference, the patriarch of the Maronites, who is styled the Patriarch of Antioch, usually takes the name of Peter, intended to denote an official descent from the apostle Peter. "His power," says Churchill, "is despotic, and from his decision there is no appeal, either in temporal or spiritual affairs; every Maronite, constantly in Lebanon, and is supposed to superintend all the ecclesiastical proceedings of the Maronite Church, has no influence over the patriarch beyond what may be obtained by personal superiority of character. . . . The income of the patriarch may amount to about £5000 a year, derived principally from lands set apart exclusively for the office. He obtains likewise a sixth of the revenue of the bishops." "The patriarch of the Maronites," says Marden ("Turkish Empire," ii., 160), "formerly exercised very extensive power not only of a religious, but of a civil kind, for the protection of his people, who in those times possessed many important immunities and franchises, which, since 1842, have been either abrogated or assimilated to the privileges enjoyed by the Roman Catholic subjects of the Porte. But the Maronites still, in case of emergency and danger, have at the hands of their old and constant enemies the Druses, are wont to look for counsel and guidance to their patriarch rather than to the emir, their nominal civil protector. The patriarch, in the winter, resides ordinarily at Kesrer, and in the summer at the monastery of Canobin, in the valley of Tippo, supposed to be, on very insufficient grounds, where the venerable Maron had fixed his abode." The eight regular bishops of the Maronite Church are Aleppo, Tripoli, Ijebel, Hasbalk, Damascus, Cyprus, Beirut, Tyre, and Sidon. The incumbents of this, the second office, are, like the patriarch, possessed of stated revenues, that enable them to live in comparative affluence. Their election takes place as follows: "When a bishop dies, the patriarch writes to the principal people of the village under the jurisdiction of the deceased prelate, requesting them to assemble together and elect a priest, and to the vacant chair elect one to whom there be a unanimity of voices, the patriarch confirms their selection; if, on the contrary, they cannot agree, he desires them to send him the names of three priests, and from this list he selects one for the bishopric." The inferior clergy of the Maronites, who are the middling sorts of income, subsist on the produce of their masses, the bounty of their congregations, and, above all, on the labor of their hands, i.e. they exercise trades, or cultivate small plots of ground, and are thus industriously employed for the maintenance of their families: it is one of the peculiar characteristics of the Eastern clergy that they are not strangers to the married state. The Maronite priests marry as in the first ages of the Church, but their wives must be maidens, and not widows; nor can they marry a second time.

The poverty to which the Maronite clergy is doomed is, however, compensated to them by the great respect the people award them. "Their vanity is incessantly flattered; whoever approaches them, whether rich or poor, great or small, is anxious to kiss their hands, which they fall not to present. . . . It is perhaps to the potent influence of the clergy that we owe the numerous religious and simple manners generally prevailing among the Maronites, for violent crimes are extremely rare among them. Retribution immediately follows every offence, however slight, and the clergy are rigorous in preventing every appearance of disorder or scandal among the members of their flocks. Before a young man can marry he must obtain the consent of his pastor and of his bishop. If they disapprove of the marriage they prohibit it, and the Maronite has no remedy. If an unmarried girl become a mother, her seducer is compelled to marry her, whatever be the inequality of their conditions; if he refuses he is reduced to obedience by measures of severity, fasting, imprisonment, and even bastinadoing. This influence of the clergy extends to every detail of civil and domestic life. The Maronite who should appeal from the decision of the clergy to the civil authority of the emir would not be listened to by him, and the act would be regarded by the appellant's bishop as a transgression to be visited with condign punishment" (Kelly). The number of Maronite priests is said to be 1200, and the number of their churches 4000.

2. Monastics. — Of the more than 200 convents scattered through Lebanon, nearly one half belong to the Maronites, and contain from 20,000 to 25,000 inmates, who all wear a distinctive costume, and follow the rule of St. Anthony. They are divided into three different congregations: those of St. Isaiah, those of the Alpines, and those of the Libanese or Baladites; besides which there are also a number of nunneries. Their dress, like that of all Greek monks, consists of a black frock-coat, reaching to the knees, confined around the waist by a leather girdle, and surmounted by a hood, which can be drawn over the head. This attire is called a "cacoily." The temporal affairs of the convents are directed by a superior monk, called Heis el-Aam, a sort of accountant-general, who regulates all the disbursements of his fraternity. "Lest the monks should form any particular local attachments, they are removed from convent to convent every six months, in a kind of rotation. They are, in general, exceedingly ignorant, but skilful in such trades as are necessary for their own wants and necessities." "The monks, by the rules of their order, are not allowed to smoke or eat meat. The latter, however, is permitted in case of sickness, by the order of the physician and the consent of the superior. In making long journeys the bishop may give the same permission. The monks are employed in their prayers, and in various occupations of industry; the lay-brothers tilling the lands of the convents, making shoes, weaving, begging, etc.; and the priests applying themselves to study, copying books, and other machinations in the dignity of their place. The nuns are taught to read and sew. Both the monks and nuns vow the three conditions of a monastic life—namely, chastity, poverty, and obedience; and, taken as a whole, both are extremely ignorant and bigoted."

IV. Peculiar Religious Usages.—Like the Bohemians and the Greek Christians, the Maronites administer the sacraments in both kinds, dipping the bread in wine before its distribution. "The host is a small round loaf, unleavened, of the thickness of a finger, and about the size of a crown-piece. On the top is the impresson of a seal, which is eaten by the priest, who cuts the remainder into small pieces and putting it into the wine in the cup, administers to each person with a spoon, which serves the whole congregation" (Kelly, Syria and the Holy Land, as compiled from Burckhardt, etc., p. 92). They also keep up public nightly prayers, which the women as well as the men: have a peculiar commemoration of the dead in the three weeks preceding Lent, and their whole office during Lent is of immense length and peculiar to themselves. Indeed their ritual and liturgy differ in many respects from those of the Latin Church. The mass is recited in the Syriac language, with the exception of the Epistle and Gospel, and some prayers, which are recited in Arabic, the only language understood by the people, the Syriac being simply used in the services of the Church and the offices of the priests.

V. —The Maronite clergy had formerly lands at Rome, the revenues of which were appropriated to keeping up a seminary for the education of young Christians from the Lebanon; and from this high school came forth some illustrious Romanists, e.g. Gabriel Sionita, Abr. Echelhaina, the Assseni, etc. The resources of this appropriation were partly administered by the French during the first revolutionary war. Since then the court of Rome has granted them a hospitium at Rome, to which they may send several of their youth to receive a gratuitous education. It would seem that this institution might be introduced again then the ideas and arts of Europe; but the pupils of this school, limited to an education purely monastic, bring home nothing but the Italian language, which is of no use, and a stock of theological learning from which all advantage can be derived; they accordingly soon assimilate with the rest. Nor has a greater change been operated by the three or four missionaries maintained by the French Capuchins at Gazir, Tripoli, and Beirut. Their labors consist in preaching in their church, in instructing children in the Catechism, Thomas & Kempis, and the Psalms, and in teaching the monks to read and write. In one of its had two missionaries at their house at Antura, but the Lazarites have now succeeded them in their mission. The most valuable advantage that has resulted from these labors is that the art of writing has become so general among the Maronites, and rendered them, in that country, within the Copts are in Egypt, that is, they are in possession of all the poets of writers, intendants, and kuryas among the Turks, and especially of those among their neighbors, the Druses. "But, though the ability to read and write be thus general among the Maronites, it must not be inferred that they are a literary people. Far from it; the book-learning of all classes, both clergy and laity, can hardly be rated too low. There are native printing-presses at work in some of the monasteries, but the sheets they issue are all of an ecclesiastical character—chiefly portions of the Scripture or mass-books in Syriac, which few even of the clergy understand, though they repeat them by rote" (Kelly, p. 97).

The American Protestant churches, so ably represented by the Rev. W. M. Thomson and others, have been doing work of an entirely different character. Their theology, course, has not been forgotten, and his educational disadvantages it has been sought to ameliorate by bringing the influence of American schools to his very door. Tristram (Land of Israel [Lond. 1865], p. 22), who cites the opinion of the noted pasha Daud Gholly, writes the following as from the mouth of the illustrious Muslim ruler of Mount Lebanon: "He spoke with much warmth and interest of the American mission-schools; and it was gratifying to hear his independent testimony to the importance and solid nature of the work they are carrying on, especially among the Maronites, with whom he considered they have met with greater success than with any other sect."

MAYOT, CLEMENT, a French poet, known in the theological world for his translation of the Psalms into French verse, was born at Chalon in 1495. At an early age he commenced writing poetry, and at the recommendation of Francis I became a member of the household of his duchess of Alençon. He accompanied Francis I to Italy, and was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia. On his return to France he wrote poetry for Diana of Poiriers, the king's mistress, who showed him favor; but, having presumed too much upon his familiarity with her, she discarded him, and he was soon detected by persons of his own age and rank as some person of importance in that ring. In 1525, Margaret procured his release; and it appears likely that Mayot's intercourse with that princess caused him to incline towards the Reformation, although he is not known to have openly embraced it. When, in 1538, Gérard Houssel preached in Paris, after the dismissal of the fanatical Sorbonnian Beda, satirical verses against the Protestants were posted on the walls; Mayot answered in the same tone; and when the persecution broke out, in the spring of 1584, prohibited books being found in his dwelling, Marot was compelled to flee to Beauvais, whence he was captured by a Frenchman, the executioner of the duchess Renata of Este. In 1556 Francis I returned him unto his court. It is said that he had recanted, but this is not proved. In 1558 he commenced, with the aid of the learned Vatablus, the translation of the Psalms, which was very warmly received; it became the fashion to carry to sing them, and Charles V himself gave Marot a reward of two hundred doubles. The Sorbonne, however, condemned the book, while the pope caused it to be reprinted at Rome in 1542. Marot, in the meantime, was, on account of the condemnation of the Sor-bonne, obliged, in 1543, to flee to Geneva, where he was well received by Calvin, and invited to continue his translation of the Psalms, which was first used in public worship at Gruson, Switzerland, Dec. 1, 1540. Geneva, however, did not long please Marot, accustomed to the gayety of the French court; and, after remaining a while at Chambéry, he went to Turin, where he died in 1544. The first known edition of Marot's translation appeared towards the end of the year 1541; it contained thirty psalms, a poetical translation of the Lord's Prayer, etc. A second edition, containing thirty psalms, with the music, and the liturgy of Geneva, was published by Calvin in 1546. The Psalms were adopted by the church, containing twenty more psalms, dedicated "to the ladies of France," and accompanied by the well-known preface of Calvin; this, as well as the subsequent editions, contains the liturgy; the catechism, the reformed confession of faith, and thecatechumenal sermons added to others.

The remainder of the Psalms was translated by Beza (1550-52), and in 1552 appeared the first complete Psalter, with Beza's eloquent appeal "to the Church of our Lord." The popularity of these Psalms was so great that, after the Colloquy of Poissy, on Oct. 19, 1561, Charles IX gave the Lyons printer, Anton Vincent, the privilege of printing them. In the 17th century the translation was revised by Conrat, first secretary of the French Academy, and the learned Anton Labastide.
This revision, approved by the Synod of Charenton in 1672, was admitted in the churches of Geneva, Neufchâ-tel, and Hesse, while the ancient text remained in use in the French villages. In 1701 Beaussobre and Leantft, at Berlin, undertook a revision, which was much opposed, especially by country congregations. See Lex-fant.
The modern revision was accepted without difficulty, except in Protestant France. The English translation, from popular tunes; but when they were to be used in the Church it was found necessary to adapt a more solemn music to them. William Frank, however, who is considered the original composer of the tunes, wrote only a few of them and died in 1561; Jean Bourgeois; those of 1562 and 1563 have some by Claude Goudemil, the teacher of Palestrina, in four voices.

Ma'roth (Heb. Maroth, rūn'îr, bitter fountains; Sept. ἀθωσία, Vulg. amaritudines), a place apparently not far from Jerusalem, on the route of the invading Assyrian army from Lachish (Mic, i, 12; see Henderson, Comment. ad loc.). Schwarz (Pulsel, p. 107) conjectures it was identical with Maccaroth (Josh, xv, 50); but this name is very different in the Hebrew.

Marozia, a Roman lady of noble birth, but of infamous reputation in the scandalous chronicles of her age, descendant of the daughter equal in nobility Theodora (q.v.), was born near the close of the 9th century. On the dissolution of the hermitage of St. Symeon, which had long been in the hands of the nuns, at the close of the war of factions occasioned in Rome in the 10th century, Marozia, by her beauty and her intrigues, contrived to exercise great influence. She was married three times, and, according to Luitprand, had skill and address enough to make her husband despise the name of the pope, John X, and the elevation of heaven, the fruit, it is alleged, of adulterous intercourse with pope Sergius III, to the pontificate, under the name of John XI.
This testimony of Luitprand, who wrote some time after the period, is considered doubtful by Muratort and by Dr. Pertz. See, however, our articles John X and John XI.
In her latter years Marozia suffered the punishment of her early crimes. She was imprisoned by her own son Alberic, and died in prison at Rome in 938.

Marquesas Isles, frequently applied to the whole Mendaña Archipelago, refers strictly only to the southern group of the Mendaña Archipelago, in Polynesia, the northern group bearing the name of the Washington Islands. They are situated in lat. 7° 30'—10° 30' S., long. 188°—214° 20' W., have an area of 500 English square miles, and a population of 6011, and were discovered by Mouta de Neyra, a Spanish navigator, in 1596 (the Washington Isles were discovered in 1791 by Ingram, an American). The isles were named after the viceroy of Peru, Marquesas de Mendoza. They are of volcanic origin, and are in general covered with mountains, rising in some cases to about 3000 feet above the sea-level; the climate is rich and feverish, but healthy. The coasts are difficult of access, on account of the surrounding reefs and the sudden changes of the wind. Cocoa-nut, bread-fruit, and papaw trees are grown, and bananas, plantains, and sugar-cane are cultivated.

The inhabitants are of the same race as those of the Society and Sandwich islands. They are well proportioned and handsome, but degraded in their religion and in many of their customs. They exhibit some confused notion of a divine being, whom they call Esooa; but they give the same name to the spirit of a priest, of a king, or any of his relations, and generally to all Europeans, as superior beings. The principal appearance of a religious feeling is found in their reverence for anything pronounced to be " taboo" or sacred, which a priest only can extend to any general object, but which every person may effect upon his own property by merely declaring that the spirit of his father, or of some king, or of any other person, reposes in the spot or article which he wishes to preserve. They have a universal belief in charms (which they name " kahu") which kill, by impregnating and obliterating the subtle things which they are directed, and which the priests chiefly are understood to be able to render effectual. Some reference to a future life appears in their funeral rites. The corpse is washed, and laid upon a platform under a piece of new cloth; to obtain it from the gods, the grave is increased through the lower regions, a great feast is given by the family to the priests and the relations.
The body continues to be rubbed for several months with cocoa-nut oil, till it becomes quite hard and incorrupt-able; and a second feast, exactly twelve months after the first, is then given of the gods, to which the deceased is decreed a safe arrival to the other world. The corpse is then broken in pieces, packed in a box, and deposited in the morai or burying-place, which no womnan is permitted to approach upon the pain of death.

On some of the islands there are missionary stations; but, although cannibalism has been abolished, the efforts of the missionaries have not otherwise met with much success. The Gospel was introduced in the Marquesas Isles by the "London Missionary Society" in 1797. The first missionary was William Crook, a man of great zeal and untiring industry. Though much depressed by the ignorance and rudeness of the natives, he pushed the good work, and accomplished much, notwithstanding his failure to secure converts. In 1825, when three teachers came to his aid, it was found that the natives had introduced into their island numerous superstitions in morals. In 1828 the mission was abandoned; but in 1831 Mr. Darling, then a missionary to Tahiti, visited the isles, and gave the home society such glowing accounts of the improvements that had been wrought by their earlier efforts, that the mission was re-established in 1833 by Mr. Darling, assisted by Messrs. Rodgerman and Stallworthy, and four natives from Tahiti; but in 1841 the work was again abandoned. The Romanists gained a foothold, and in 1845 they were placed under French protection, the Roman Catholics secured most favorable terms for their missionaries. Their work, however, remains thus far without fruit. See Aikman, Cyclop. of Christian Missions, p. 68.

Marquette, Jacques, a celebrated French Roman Catholic missionary and discoverer, was born at Laon, in France, July 26, 1637; entered the Order of the Jesuits; became a missionary, and travelled and labored several years in Canada and other regions. He was a member of the first exploring party to the Mississippi River, and wrote a narrative of the expedition (Paris, 1681). "He writes," says professor Sparks, "as a scholar, and as a man of careful observation and practical sense. In every point of view, this tract is one of the most interesting among those that illustrate the early history of America." On his return from the Mississippi he resumed his missionary labors among the Miami on Lake Michigan, 1673.——Charlesvits, Histoire de la Nouvelle France, s. v.; Moreri, Dictionnaire Historique, s. v.; Baccquelin de la Potherie, Hist. de l' Amerique Septentrionale (Paris, 1874, 4 vols. 12mo); Sparks, Amer. Marques, Juan, a Spanish theologian, was born at Madrid in 1654; studied at the University of Salamanca; joined the Augustines of Madrid, and attained to the first dignities of his order. He died at Salamanca Feb. 17, 1621. He has written El gobernador Christiano, de dueño de los vicios de Mayos y Juevos, principio del pueblo, de la institucion del mismo, 1611, 1619, 1620; Los dos Estados de la espiritual Gerusalem sobre los Pueblos crey y creyeri (Medina, 1630, and Salamanca, 1810, 4to)——Origen de los Pueblos Erraticos de su Agutin, y su verdadera institucion antes del gran concilio Lateranense (Salamanca, 1618, fol.); y——Vida de s. fr. Marquis, James E., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Cross Creek, Pa., Nov. 20, 1815; was educated in Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa.; studied divinity in the Western Theological Seminary, Alleghany, Pa.; was licensed by Washington Presbytery in 1844, and ordained by Sidney Presbytery in 1848. During the first ten years of his ministry he labored successively in the churches of Canton, Mansfield, Shelby, and Ontario, Ohio. In 1868 he removed to Bloomington, Ill., and commenced to labor as Presbyterian missionary for the presbyteries of Peoria and Bloomington. In 1859 he accepted the united charge of the churches of Salem, Brunswick, and Elwood, which he retained until his death, Feb. 22, 1853. Mr. Marquis was noted for his faithfulness, devotion, and purity of life. He was eminently successful as a pastor; earnest and sincere as a preacher. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 171.

Marquis, Thomas, a Presbyterian minister, was born near Winchester, Va., in 1758. His early life was subjected to many deprivations. He received an ordinary common-school education, prosecuted his classical studies, amid painful vicissitudes, at Buffalo and Canonsburg, and in April, 1788, was licensed to preach; labored one year as a licentiate, and in 1794 was ordained as an installed pastor of the church at Cross Creek, Pa. In 1796 he became an active missionary to the Indians, travelling down the Alleghany, and the lower waters of the Muskingum and Scioto rivers. In 1802 he became a member of the executive committee of the Missionary Board west of the Allegheny Mountains. The remaining twenty years of his ministry were filled up with multiplied labors and varied but unusual success. He died Sept. 27, 1829. Mr. Marquis was a laborious and faithful pastor, eminently wise in counsel, and apt in introducing and enforcing religious duty. As a preacher he was noted for his purity of style, and entirely persuasive in the expression of thought. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 171; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 83-89.

Marracci, an Italian priest, eminent as an Oriental scholar, was born at Lucca in 1612, and for years held the professorship of Arabic in the College della Sapienza in Rome. He died in 1700. His principal work is an excellent edition of the Koran in a Latin version (1698). "This," says Hallam, in his Introduction to the Literature of Europe, "is still esteemed the best."

Marriage. This relation is in a general way represented by several Hebrew words, the most distinctive of which are several forms of כַּשָּׁת, chasah, to give in marriage; גַּרְוָה, garoa, a wedding. It is very remarkable, however, as well as significant, that there is no single word in the whole Hebrew Scriptures for the state of marriage. It is to express the abstract idea of marriage, as the German Ehe does. It is only in the post-exilic period, when the laws of marriage had gradually developed themselves, that we meet with the abstract נישואין and נישואים (under niswah, vi, 5; Kid-dushin, i, 2); the former denoting the legal, and the latter the natural side of marriage. But even then no such definition of marriage is to be found in the Hebrew writings as we find in the Roman law, "Nuptiae sunt conjunctio maris et feminae et consortium omnis vitae, divini et humani juris communicatio" (Dig. lib. xxxii, tit. 2, "De nupt.""). In the present article, which treatises of marriage are collected, we have to speak of marriage in the abstract sense; or, as far as it may be perceived, the relation of the male and female, as outside of the field of matrimonial relations and ceremonies, both ancient and modern. See WEDLOCK.

I. Origin, Primitive Relations, and General View of the Married State.—1. The institution of marriage is founded on the requirements of man's nature, and dates from the time of his original creation. It may be said to have been ordained by God, in so far as man's nature was ordained by him; but its formal appointment was the work of man, and it has ever been in its essence a natural and civil institution, though admitting of the infusion of a religious element. All that is exhibited in the historical account of its origin in the book of Genesis; the peculiar formation of man's nature is assigned to the Creator, who, setting it "not good for man to be alone," determined to form an "help meet for him" (vi, 18), and accordingly completed the work by the addition of the female to the male (i, 27). The necessity for this step appears from the words used in the declaration of the divine counsel. Man, as an intellectual and spiritual being, would not have been a worthy representative of the Deity on earth, so long as he lived in solitude, or in communion only with beings either higher above him in the scale of creation, as angels, or far beneath him, as the beasts of the field. It was absolutely necessary, not only for his comfort and happiness, but still more for the perfection of the divine work, that he should have a "help meet for him," or, as the word is employed, "the other half of himself" (םֵשֶׁת אֵשֶׁת, Septuag., δύο ουράνιοι γίνουσθαι; Vulg. adjutorium simile soli, a help meet for him)—a being capable of receiving and reflecting his thoughts and affections. No sooner was the formation of woman effected, than Adam recognised in that act the will of the Creator as to man's social condition, and immediately acknowledged the importance, in which his posterity might refer as the charter of marriage in all succeeding ages, "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife; and they shall be one flesh" (ii, 24). From these words, coupled with the circumstances attendant on the formation of the first woman, we may evolve the following principles: (1) The unity of man and wife, as implied in her being formed out of man, and as expressed in the words "one flesh;" (2) the indissolubility of the marriage bond, except on the strongest grounds (compare Matt. xix, 6; Mark x, 7; Rev. xii, 14); (3) the law of marriage, resulting from there having been but one original couple, as is forcibly expressed in the subsequent reference to this passage by our Lord ("they two be one flesh," Matt. xix, 5 and St. Paul ("two shall be one flesh," 1 Cor. vi, 16); (4) the social equality of man and woman is implied in the terms used, that the one being the exact correlative of the other, as well as in the words "help meet for him;" (5) the subordination of the wife to the husband, consequent upon her subsequent formation (1 Cor. xii, 8, 9; 1 Tim. ii, 18); and (6) the respective duties of man and wife, as implied in the words "help meet for him."

2. The introduction of sin into the world modified to a certain extent the mutual relations of man and wife. As the blame of seduction to sin lay on the latter, the condition of subordination was turned into subjection, and it was said, "Thou art nigh unto the fall" or "Thou art under the fall rule over thee" (Gen. iii, 16)—a sentence which, regarded as a prediction, has been strikingly fulfilled in the position assigned to women in Oriental countries; but which, regarded as a rule of life, is fully sustained by the voice of nature and by the teaching of Christianity (1 Cor. xi, 3; Eph. v, 22, 23; 1 Tim. ii, 15). The evil effects of the fall were soon apparent in the corrupt usages of marriage: the unity of the bond was impaired by polygamy, which appears to have originated among the Canaïtes (Gen. iv, 19); and its purity was deteriorated by the promiscuous intercourse of the "sons of God" with the "daughters of men," i.e., of the Sethites with the Canaïtes, in the days preceding the flood (Gen. vi, 2).

3. For the history of marriage in the later ages, see below. One question may properly be considered here, i.e., elopement. Shortly before the Christian era an important change took place in the views entertained on the question of marriage as affecting the spiritual and intellectual parts of man's nature. Throughout the Old Testament period marriage was regarded as the indispensable duty of every man, nor was it surmised that there has been in it an important back to the attainment of the highest degree of holiness. In the interval that elapsed between the Old and New Testament periods, a spirit of asceticism had been evolved, probably in antagonism to the foreign notions with which the Jews were brought into close and painful contact. The Essenes and the Apocalyptic Church of the "sons of God" regard the propiety of marriage; some of them avoided it altogether, others availed themselves of it under restrictions (Josephus, War, ii, 8, § 2, 13). Similar views were adopted by the Therapeutae, and at a later period by the Gosport's "Book of the Law," i. 214; hence they passed into the Christian Church, forming one of the distinctive tenets of the Encratites (Burton, ii, 161), and finally developing into the system of Monachism. The philosophical tenets on which the prohibition of marriage was based are generally condemned in Col. ii, 16-23, and specifically in 1 Tim. iv, 5. The general propriety of marriage is enforced on various occasions, and abstention from it is commanded only in cases where it was rendered expedient by the calls of duty (Matt. xix, 12; 1 Cor. vii, 8, 25). With regard to remarriage after the death of one of the parties, the Jewish community with other nations, regarded abstinence from it, particularly in the case of a widow, laudable, and a sign of holiness (Luke ii, 36, 7; Josephus, Ant. xvii, 18, 14; xviii, 6, 6); but it is clear, from the example of Josephus (Vit. 76), that there was no prohibition even in the case of a woman who was again married. As far as is regarded as occasionally undesirable (1 Cor. vii, 40), and as an absolute disqualification for holy functions, whether in a man or a woman (1 Tim. iii, 2, 12; v, 9); at the same time it is recommended in the case of young widows (1 Tim. v, 14).

II. Mode of selecting a Bride, Retrospect, and Marriage-Price. 1. Imitating the example of the Fathers of the Universe, who provided the man he made with a wife, fathers from the beginning considered it both their duty and prerogative to find or select wives for their sons (Gen. xxiv, 5; xxxvii, 6). In the absence of the father, the son would devolve upon the mother (Gen. xxii, 21). Even in cases where the wishes of the son were consulted, the proposals were made by the father (Gen. xxxiv, 4, 5); and the violation of this parental prerogative on the part of the son was "a grief of mind" to the father (Gen. xxxvi, 8). The proposals were generally made by the parents of the young man, except when there was a difference of rank; in such a case the negotiations proceeded from the father of the maiden (Exod. ii, 21), and when accepted by the parents on both sides, sometimes also consulting the opinion of the adult brothers of the maiden (Gen. xxv, 4; xxxiv, 11), the matter was considered as settled without requiring the consent of the bride. The case of Rebekah (Gen. xxiv, 58) forms no exception to this general practice, inasmuch as the alliance had already been concluded between Eleazar and Laban before the question put to Rebekah was to consult her opinion, not about it, but about the time of her departure. Before, however, the marriage contract was finally concluded, a price (Hid) was stipulated for, which the young man had to pay to the father of the maiden (Gen. xxv, 15; xxxiv, 12), besides giving presents (Hid) to her relations (Gen. xxiv, 50; xxxiv, 12). This marriage-price was regarded as a compensation due to the parents for the loss of service which their daughter would undergo by the marriage; the matter, as well as for the trouble and expense which they incurred in her education. Hence, if the proffered young man had not the requisite compensation, he was obliged to make it up in service (Gen. xxix, 20; Exod. ii, 21; iii, 1). Some, indeed, deny that a price had to be paid down to the father for marrying his daughter, and appeal for support to Gen. xxxv, 15, where, according to them, "the daughters of Laban make it a matter of complaint, that their father bargained for the services of Jacob in exchange for their hands, just as if they were strangers." Thus showing that the sale of daughters was regarded as an unjust act and a matter of complaint (Sealshutz, Das Mosesische Recht, p. 783). But, on a closer inspection of the passage in question, it will be seen that Rachel and Leah do not at all complain of any indignity heaped on them by being sold just as if they were strangers; they were sold, so to say, for their price, hence the sale to corroborate their statement that they are no longer their father's property, have no more any portion in his possession, and are now regarded by him as strangers, since, according to the usual custom, they have been duly sold to their husband, and hence agree with the latter that it is time for them to depart. Besides, the marriage-price is distinctly mentioned in other passages of Scripture (Exod. xxii, 15, 16; 1 Sam. xviii, 23, 26; Ruth iv, 10; Hos. iii, 2), and was commonly demanded by the nations of antiquity; as the Babylonians (Hered, i, 198); the Assyrians (Elian, V. H. iv, 1; Strabo, xvi, 745); the ancient Greeks (Odyss. viii, 818 sq.; Arist. Politi. ii, 8; Pausan. iii, 12, 2); the Germans (Tacitus, Germ. xviii), and still obtains in the East to the present day. In fact, it could not be otherwise where polygamy was practised. At the number of maidens was under such circumstances less than that of wooers, it called forth competition, and it was but natural that he who offered the highest marriage-price obtained the damsel. There was therefore no fixed marriage-price; it varied according to circumstances. We meet with no dowry in a Greek woman, even when given with the consent of the father; and it was regarded as occasionally undesirable (1 Cor. vii, 40), and as an absolute disqualification for holy functions, whether...
2. The Mosaic enactments introduced no changes into these usages. The father's power over the child in matters of marriage continued paramount, and he could give his children to any one he pleased without asking their consent. Thus Caleb offers his daughter Achsa (Josh. xv, 16, 17) as wife to any one who will conquer Kirjath-shepher (Judg. i, 5). Saul promised his daughter Michal to the Philistine who shall kill the Philistine, and bar ters his daughter Michal for the preprices of a hundred slain Philistines (1 Sam. xvii, 26, 27; xviii, 25-27); and Lo zan takes thirty wives for his thirty sons (Judg. xiii, 5). The imaginary case of women soliciting husbands (Isa. iv, 1, 2) is to be accounted for by reference to the ravages of war, by which the greater part of the males had fallen. A judicial marriage-price (סיוו כיוו ושנש) was now introduced, which was fixed at fifty silver shekels (Exod. xxi, 16, with Deut. xxii, 29), being the highest rate of a servant (Lev. xxviii, 8), so that one had to pay as much for a wife as for a bondwoman. When the father of the maiden was rich and did not want the marriage-price (סיוו כיוו ושנש), he expected some service by way of compensation for giving away his daughter (1 Sam. xviii, 29). As soon as the bargain was concluded, and the marriage-price paid, or the required service rendered, the maiden was regarded as betrothed to her wooer, and as sacredly belonging to him. In fact, she was legally treated as a married woman (סיוו כיוו ושנש); she could not be divorced from her betrothed husband without a null of divorces, and the same law was applicable to her as to married people. If she was persuaded to criminal conduct between the espousals and the bringing her home to her husband's house, both she and her seducer were publicly stoned to death; and if she was violated, the culprit suffered capital punishment (Deut. xxii, 22, 23, with Lev. xxvi, 14; Lev. xv, 10). With such sacredness was betrothal regarded, that even if a bondmaid who was bought with the intention of ultimately becoming a secondary wife (Exod. xxii, 7-11), was guilty of unchastity prior to her entering into that state, both she and her seducer were scourged, while the latter was also obliged to bring a sin-offering, and the priest had to pray for the forgiveness of his sin (Lev. xix, 20-22). Every betrothed man was by the Mosaic law exempt from military service (Deut. xxv, 7).

3. In the post-exilic period, as long as the children were minors—which in the case of a son was up to thirteen, and a daughter to twelve years of age—the parents could betroth them to any one they chose; but when they became of age their consent was required (Maimonides, Hilchot Ishut, iii, 11, 12). Occasionally the law was suspended, when the will was left in the hands of a friend, and hence the case might arise which is supposed by the Talmudists (Yebamot, 2, § 6, 7), that a man might not be aware of which of two sisters he was betrothed. So in Egypt at the present day the choice of a wife is sometimes intrusted to a professional woman styled a khdthbkh; and it is seldom that the bridegroom sees the features of his bride before the marriage has taken place (Lamb, i, 209-211). It has not infrequently happened, however, that the selection of partners for life was made by the young people themselves. For this, the communities connected with the celebration of the festivals in the Temple afforded an excellent opportunity, as may be gathered from the following remark in the Mishna: "R. Simeon ben-Gamaitel says. There were never more joyous festivals in Israel than the 15th of Ab and the Day of Atonement. On the day of the maidens of Jerusalem used to come drest in white garments, which they borrowed, in order not to shame those who had none of their own, and which they had improved [for fear of being polluted]. Thus arrayed, these maidens of Jerusalem went out and danced in the synagogues, singing the song of a young man, and with bright eyes, and see whom thou art about to choose; fix not thine eye upon beauty, but look rather to a pious family; for gracefulness is deceit, and beauty is vanity, but the woman that fears the Lord, she is worthy of praise." (Megilla, iv, 8). Having made his choice, the young man or his father informed the maiden's father of it, whereupon the young people were legally betrothed. The betrothals was celebrated by a feast made in the groom's house (Judg. xvii, 13), and the lists of - sachein, 49 a; Kiddushin, 45 b), and is called סיוו ינשס, made sacred, for by it the bride was made sacred to her bridegroom, and was not to be touched by any one else. It is also called סיוו ינשס, which may be from סיוו ינשס, to betroth. For a betrothal to be legal, it has to be effected in one of the following three modes: 1. By money, or money's worth, which, according to the school of Shammai, must be a denar (טנשף) = 90 grains of pure gold, or, according to the school of Hillel, a perusha ( hứngף) = half a grain of pure silver, and which is to be given to the maiden, or, if she is a minor, to her father, as betrothal price (סיוו ינשס פועש); 2. By letter or contract (טנשף פועש), which the young man, either in person or through a proxy, has to give to the maiden, or to her father when she is a minor; or, 3. By cohabitation (עבב לשון, usu), when the young man and maiden, having pronounced the betrothal formula in the presence of two witnesses, retire into a separate room. This, however, is considered immodest, and the man is scourged (Kiddushin, 12 b). The legal formula to be pronounced is, "Behold, thou art betrothed or sanctified to me (לדנשף ליגאל), according to the law of Moses and Israel" (Kiddushin, 1, 1; iv, 9; Tanhaja Kama, 1; iv; Kethuboth, iv, 8; Maimonides, Hilchot Ishut, iii; Eben Ha-Ezer, xxx, 23). Though betrothals, as we have seen before, was the beginning of marriage itself, and, like it, could only be broken off by a regular bill of divorce (בנשף), yet twelve months were generally allowed to intervene between it and actual marriage (נשף) in the case of a maiden, to prepare her outfit, and thirty days in the case of a widow (Kethuboth, 57 a). The intercourse of the betrothed during this period was regulated by the customs of the different towns (Mishna, Kethuboth, v, 2). When this more solemn betrothment (סיוו ינשס) was afterwards united with the marriage ceremony (נשף), engagements (סיוו ינשס פועש) more in the sense of the word took its place. Its nature and obligation will best be understood by perusing the contents of the contract (בנשף) which is made and signed by the parties, and which is as follows: 'May he who declares the end from the beginning give stability to the words of this contract, and to the covenant made between these two parties! namely, between A, bachelor, with the consent of his father B, and C, who is proxy for his daughter D, spinster. The said A, bachelor, engages, under happy auspices, to take the afore-mentioned D, spinster, by marriage and betrothal (סיוו ינשס פועש), according to the law of Moses and Israel. These henceforth are not to conceal anything from each other appertaining to money or goods, but to have equal power over their property. Moreover, B, the said father of the bridegroom, is to dress his son in goodly apparel before the marriage, and to give the sum of . . . in cash to the father of the bride, to give his daughter before the marriage a dowry in cash to the amount of . . . as well as jewellery to the amount of . . . to dress her in goodly apparel corresponding to the bridegroom the Talith (תלית), i.e. the fringed wrap used at prayer [see Fringe], and Kitel (קטל), i.e. the white burial garment, in harmony with his position and in proportion to the dowry. The marriage is to be (D. V.) on the . . . with the bride (John, a minor), or with the bride's father, and, if agreed to by both parties, may take place within the specified period. Now the two parties have pledged themselves to all this, and have taken upon themselves by an oath to abide by it, on the penalty of the greatest anathema, and at the peril of forfeiting half the dowry; but the forfeit is not to absolve from the anathema, nor is the anathema to absolve from the forfeit. The said father of the bride also undertakes to board at his table the newly-married couple for the space of . . . and furnish them with lodgings for the space of . . . The surety on the part of the bridegroom is E, son of F; and on the part of the bride, G, son of H.

The two bridal parties, however, guarantee that these sureties shall not suffer thereby. Further, C, the said father of the bride, is to give his daughter an assurance letter, that, in the event of his death, she is to get half the inheritance of a son (ני aloud, that the bridegroom pledges himself to get his brothers, in the event of his dying without issue, to give her a Chalilah documen [for which see below], without any compensation. But if there should be dispute or delay on the subject, which God forbid, the decision is to be left to the Jewish congregation. We have taken all this in possession from the party and sureties, for the benefit of the other parties, so that everything aforementioned may be observed, with the usual witness which qualified us to take care of it. Done this day . . . Everything must be observed and kept. (Signed) . . . (Comp.
Nachshon. B. Sh. 6). This contract, which is written in Rabbinic Hebrew, is used by all orthodox Jews to the to present day.

III. Marriage Ceremonies.—I. In the pre-Mosaic petiod, when the proposals were accepted, and the marriage-price (טַנַח), as well as the sundry other gifts (מְנֹחָה), were duly distributed, the bridegroom (עֵינָי) could at once remove the bride (טַנַח) from her father's house to his own house, and this removal of the maiden, under the beneficence of her family, but without any definite religious ceremony with whatever consecrations consummated and expressed marriage (כִּיסֹא יִנֶּס). We thus are told that Isaac, when meeting Eleazar and Rebekah in the field, as soon as he was informed by the former of what had transpired, took Rebekah to the tent of his departed mother, and this without further ceremony constituted the marriage, and she thereby became his wife (גֶּרֶשֶׁת ל יַעֲרָב, Gen. xxvi, 63-67). Under more ordinary circumstances, however, when the bride had been taken, it was necessary not to quit her paternal home, for the protection of a friend, as in the case just mentioned, but where the marriage took place in the house of the bride's parents, it was celebrated by a feast, to which all the friends and neighbors were invited, and which lasted seven days (כִּיסֹא יִנֶּס). On the first day of the marriage, the bride was conducted to her future husband veiled, or, more properly, in an outdoor wrapper or shawl (כִּיסֹא יִנֶּס), which nearly enveloped her whole form, so that it was impossible to recognize the person, thus accounting for the deception practiced on Jacob (Gen. xxiv, 65; xxxi, 29) and on Judah (Gen. xxxviii, 14).

2. With regard to age, no restriction is pronounced in the Bible. Every marriage is spoken of with approval in several passages (Prov. ii, 17; v, 18; Isa. lxxi, 5), and in reducing this general statement to the more definite one of years, we must take into account the very early age at which persons arrive at puberty in Oriental countries. In modern Egypt marriage takes place in general before the bride has attained the age of sixteen, frequently when she is twelve or thirteen, and occasionally when she is only ten (Lane, l, 208). The Mosaic law prescribes no civil or religious forms for the celeburation of marriage. The contract or promise made at the payment of the marriage-price, or when the service which was required in its stead was rendered, constituted the solemn bond which henceforth united the espoused parties, as is evident from the fact pointed out in the preceding sections, that a betrothed maiden was both called a married woman, and was legally treated as such. There can, however, be no doubt that the ancient custom of celebrating the consummation of the marriage by a feast, which lasted seven days (Num. xvi, 22, 27), must have become pretty general by this time.
Thus we are told that when Samson went to Timnath to take his wife, he made there a feast, which continued for seven days, according to the usage of young men on such occasions (גֶּרֶשֶׁת ל יַעֲרָב), that the parents of the bride invited thirty young men (ויִאָשׁ ל יִנֶּס), and that to honor his nuptials, and that to propvoces (Gen. xiv, 10). We afterwards find that the bridal pair were adorned with nuptial crowns (Can. iii, 11; Isa. lxx, 10) made of various materials—gold, silver, myrrh, olive—varying in costliness according to the circumstances of the parties (Mishna, Sota, ix, 14; Gemara, 49 a and b; Selden, Us. Ebr. ii, 15), and that the bride especially wore gorgeous aparel, and a peculiar girdle (Psa. xlv, 13, 14; Isa. xlix, 18; Jer. ii, 12), whence in fact she derived her name Kedla (קֶדֶל), which signifies the ornamented, the adorned. And at the end of the bridegroom and bride were led in joyous procession through the streets, accompanied by bands of singers and musicians (Jer. vii, 34; xxix, 10; xxxiii, 11), and saluted by the greetings of the maidens of the place, who manifested the liveliest interest in the nuptial train (Can. iii, 11), to the house of the bridegroom, or that of his father's house, where the feast was prepared, to which all the friends and the neighbors were invited, and at which most probably that sacred covenant was concluded which came into d均由 the post-Mosaic period (Prov. ii, 17; Ezek. xxvi, 20, Mal. ii, 16). The bride, thickly veiled, was then conducted to the (כִּיסֹא יִנֶּס) bridal chamber (Gen. xxiii, 23; Judg. xv, 11; Joel ii, 6), where a nuptial couch (כִּיסֹא יִנֶּס) was prepared (Psa. xlix, 5; Joel ii, 16) in such a manner as to afford facility for ascertaining the following morning whether she had preserved her maiden purity; for in the absence of the siga virginalis she was stoned to death before her father's house (Deut. xxii, 10-21).

3. In the period after the exile the proper age for marriage is fixed in the Mishna at eighteen (Aboth, v, 81), and though, for the sake of preserving morality, purity was regarded as the desirable age, yet men generally married when they were seventeen (Jebromoth, 62; Kidushin, 29). The Talmudistas forbade marriage in the case of a man under thirteen years and a day, and in the case of a woman under twelve years and a day (Buxtorf, Symposiog. cap. 7, p. 149). The day originally fixed for marriage was Wednesday for maidens and Friday for widows (Mishna, Kethuboth, i, 1). But the Talmud already partially discarded this arrangement (Gemana, ed, 3 a), and in the Middle Ages it became quite obsolete (Eben Ha-Exar, lxxv). The primitive practice of the sages, however, has been resumed among the orthodox Jews in Russia, Poland, etc. The wedding-feast was celebrated in the house of the bridegroom (Kethu-both, 8 a, 10 a), and in the evening, for the bridal pair fasted all day, since on it, as on the day of atonement, they confessed their sins, and their transgressions were forgiven. On the day of the wedding, the bride, with her hair flowing, and a myrtle wreath on her head (if she was a maiden, Mishu, Kethuboth, ii, 1), was conducted, with music, singing, and dance, by the bride's relations and friends, who were adorned with chapes of myrtle, and carried palm branches in their hands (Kethuboth, 16, 17; Sabbath, 110 a; Sota, 49 b). The streets through which the nuptial procession passed were lined with the daughters of Israel, who greeted the joyous train, and scattered before them cakes and roasted ears of wheat, while fountains freely poured forth wine (Kethuboth, 15 b; Berachoth, 50 b). Having reached the house, the bridegroom, accompanied by the groomsmen, met the bride, took her by the hand, and led her to the threshold. The Kethu-the marriage-feast was enlivened by the guests, who sang various songs and asked each other amusing riddles (Berachot, 51a; Nedahim, 51a), parched corn was distributed among the guests if the bride was a virgin (Kethuboth, 7b), and when the meal was concluded with customary prayer of thanksgiving, the bridegroom supplementation in the presence of at least ten persons (Kethuboth, 7b), which gave the last religious consecration to the marriage-covenant, and which are as follows: 1. "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe, who hast created everything for thy glory." 2. "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe, who hast created man in thine image, in the image of the likeness of thy own form, and hast prepared for him, in himself, a building for the perpetuity of the races. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the creator of man." iv. "The barren woman shall rejoice exceedingly, and about joy for when her children are gathered around her in delight. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who rejoiced Zion in her children." v. "Make this loving pair to rejoice exceedingly, as thou hast made thy creature rejoice in the beauty of Eden." vi. "Blessed art thou, O Lord, who rejoiced the bridegroom and the bride." vii. "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe, who hast ordained joy and gladness, bride and bridegroom, delight and song, pleasure and intimacy, love and friendship, peace and concord; speedily, O Lord, let thy word be heard in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem the voice of joy and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride, the voice of jubilant bridegrooms under their canopies, and of the young men at the nuptial feast, singing and playing music. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, who maketh the bridegroom and bride rejoice in his own. viii. "Remove all suffering and anger; there will the dumb be heard in song; lead us in the paths of righteousness, listen to the benedictions of the children of Jeshurun! With the permission of our seniors and rabbis, and my masters, let us bless our God in whose dwelling is joy, and of whose bounties we have partaken; to which the guests respond, 'Blessed be our God, in whose dwelling is joy, of whose bounties we have partaken, and by whose goodness we live; and he then raises us to bless our God, in whose dwelling is joy, of whose bounties we have partaken, and by whose goodness we live' (Kethuboth, 7b, 8). The married couple were then conducted to an elaborately ornamented nuptial chamber (maidan, where the bridal couch (talatam) was carefully prepared; and at the performance of the linurum virginitatis the following morning (Deut. xxv, 11-21), which was anxiously awaited, the following benediction was pronounced by the bridegroom: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe, who hast placed a nut in paradise, the rose of the valleys—a stranger must not rule over this sealed fountain; this is why the kind of love has preserved the holy seed in purity, and has not broken the compact. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who hast chosen Abraham and his seed after him!" (see Halakhot Gedoloth, ed. Vienna, 51 [comp. Pliny, Hist. Nat. xtv, 24], where an explanation will be found of the use of ma'at, nut, in this connection). Festivities continued for seven days (Kethuboth, 7a). As important religious questions had to be decided by the bridal party, it was decided that a learned man be called in (Gen. xxi, 6; Kidushin, 6, 18), it was afterwards resolved that the marriage-ceremony should be performed by a rabbi, and it is celebrated in the following manner: A beautifully-embroidered silk or velvet canopy, about three or four yards square, supported by four long poles, is held by four men outstretched on the day of the wedding. Under this canop (ma'at), which represents the ancient bridal chamber, the bridegroom is led by his male... friends, preceded by a band of music, and welcomed by the joyous spectators with the exclamation, Blessed is he (נֶבֶט), the bride, with her face veiled (nupshes), is then brought to him by her female friends and led three times round the bridegroom, in accordance, as they say, with the remark of Jeremiah, "The woman shall compass the man" (xxxii. 22), when he takes her round once amid the congratulations of the bystanders, and then places her at his right hand (Psar. xii. 10), both standing with their faces to the north and their backs to the north. The rabbi then covers the bridal pair with the Talit, or fringed wrapper, which the bridegroom has on (comp. Ruth iii. 19; Ezek. xvi. 8), joins their hands together, and pronounces over a cup of wine the benediction of alliance (יִבְנֶה לְאָלֶף), which is as follows: *"Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe, who hast created the fruit of the vine. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and hast forbidden to us consanguinity, and hast prohibited us the betrothed, but hast permitted us those whom we take by marriage and betrothal. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy betrothal and marriage (קֹתֶב בַּתִּיץ, 7 a). Whereupon the bridegroom and bride take the taste of the cup of blessing, and the former produces a plain gold ring, and, in the presence of all the party, puts it on the bride's finger, saying, "This ring is consecrated with this ring according to the rites of Moses and Israel." The rabbi then reads aloud, in the presence of appointed witnesses, the Ketubah, or the marriage-settlement, which is written in Syro-Chaldaic, and concludes by pronouncing over another cup of wine the seven benedictions (יִבְנֶה לְאָלֶף), which the bridegroom in ancient times, before the ceremony of marriage became a public act and was delegated to the spiritual head, used to pronounce himself at the end of the meal. The bridegroom and bride taste again of this cup of blessing, and when the glass is emptied it is put on the ground, and the bridegroom breaks it with his foot, as a symbol to remind them in the midst of their joys that just as this glass is destroyed, so Jerusalem is destroyed and trodden down under the foot of the Gentiles. With this the ceremony is concluded, amid the shouts, May you be happy! (יִבְנֶה לְאָלֶף). See WEDDING.

IV. Polygamy and Concubinage.—1. Though the history of the protoplasts,—in which we are told that God in his providence created a single partner for each sexseems to exhibit a standard for monogamy, yet the Scriptures record that from the remotest periods men had simultaneously several wives, occupying either coordinate or subordinate positions. Against the opinion that Lamech, sixth in descent from Adam through Cain, introduced polygamy—based on the circumstance that he is the first who is recorded as having married two wives (Gen. iv. 19)—is to be urged that (1.) Lamech is the first whose marriage or taking of a wife is recorded, and consequently it is impossible to say how many wives his five progenitors had; (2.) The mention of Lamech's two wives is incidental, and is entirely owing to the fact that the sacred historian had to notice the useful inventions made by their respective sons Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal-Cain, as well as to give the oldest piece of rhythmical composition which was addressed to the deities, celebrating one of these inventions; and (3.) If polygamy had been for the first time introduced by Lamech, the sacred writer would have had distinctly mentioned it as he mentions the things which were first introduced by Lamech's sons. The manner in which Sarah urges Abraham to take his servant Hagar into his harem (Gen. xvi. 4), the fact that Sarah herself gives her maiden to her own husband (לַעֲבֹר בַּתִּיזָה לְאָלֶף) to be his wife, the readiness with which the patriarch accepts the proposal (Gen. xvi. 1-4), unquestionably show that it was a common custom to have one or more secondary wives. In fact, it is distinctly mentioned that Nahor, Abraham's own brother, who had eight sons by Milcah, his principal wife, and consequently did not require another wife for the purpose of securing progeny, had nevertheless a secondary wife (לַעֲבֹר בַּתִּיזָה לְאָלֶף), by whom he had four sons (Gen. xxii. 21-24).

Besides, it is now pretty generally admitted that Gen. xxxv, 1 describes Abraham himself to have taken another or secondary wife in the lifetime of Sarah, in addition to Hagar, who was given to him by his principal wife, as is evident from Gen. xxxv. 6; 1 Chron. i. 32, and that he could not have taken her for the sake of obtaining an heir. If any more proof be wanted for the prevalence of polygamy in the patriarchal age, we refer to Esau, who, to please his father, married his cousin Ma-halalth, in preference to the several wives of his uncle Simon (Gen. xxxvii. 8, 9); and to Jacob, who had not the slightest scruple to marry two sisters, and take two half-wives at the same time (Gen. xxix. 28-30; xxx. 4, 9), which would be unaccountable on the supposition that polygamy was something strange. Though sacred history is silent about the number of wives of the twelve patriarchs, yet there can be little doubt that the large number of children and grandchildren which Benjamin had at so early an age (Gen. xlix. 21; Num. xxxvi. 36-41; 1 Chron. vii. 6-12; viii. 1), must have been the result of polygamy. Moreover, that Simon, at all events, had more than one wife (Exod. vi. 15). The extraordinary rate at which the Jews increased in Egypt implies that they practiced polygamy during their bondage. This is, moreover, corroborated by the incidental notice that Asher, Judah, and Naphtali, of the two wives (Gen. xli. 18, with ii. 34); that Caleb, Judah's great-grandson, had three principal and two subordinate wives (1 Chron. ii. 9, 18, 42, 46, 48); that Abrahahaim, probably Benjamin's great-grandson, had three wives (1 Chron. viii. 8-11); and that Moses had two wives (Exod. ii. 21; Num. xii. 1), as well as by the fact that the Moses legislation assumes the existence of polygamy (Lev. xix. 14; Deut. xxxv. 47). Still, the theory of monogamy seems to have been exhibited in the case of Noah and his three sons (Gen. vi. 18; vii. 7, 18; viii. 10), of Aaron, and of Eleazar.

In judging of this period we must take into regard the following considerations: (1.) The principle of monogamy was retained, even in the practice of polygamy, by the distinction made between the chief or original wife and the secondary wives, or, as the A. V. terms them, "concubines"—a term which is objectionable, inasmuch as it is applied to us in the Old Testament to an unhonored and unrecognized position, whereas the secondary wife was regarded by the Hebrews as a wife, and her rights were secured by law. The position of the Hebrew concubine may be compared with that of the concubine of the early Christian Church, the sole distinction between her and the wife consisting in this, that the marriage was not in accordance with the civil law: in the eye of the Church the marriage was perfectly valid (Bingham, Ant. xi, 5, § 11). It is worthy of notice that the term pillegorah (לַעֲבֹר בַּתִּיזָה) — "concubine" nowhere occurs in the Mosaisic law. The terms used are either "wife" (Deut. xxii. 15) or "maid-servant" (Exod. xxii. 7); the latter applying to a person who becomes the wife of another by purchase. (2.) The motive which led to polygamy was that absorbing desire of progeny which is prevalent throughout Eastern countries, and was especially powerful among the Hebrews. (3.) The power of a father over his child, and of a master over his slave (the postestas patria and dominicus of the Romans), was paramount even in matters of marriage, and may pass to any cases to phases of polygamy that are otherwise quite unintelligible, as, for instance, to the cases where it was adopted by the husband at the request of his wife, under the idea that children born to a slave were in the eye of the law the children of the master, and therefore only: (xxx. 4, 9); or, again, to cases where it was adopted at the instance of the father (Gen. xxix. 28, 29; Exod. xxi. 9, 10). It must be allowed that polygamy, thus legalized and systematized, justified to a certain extent by the motive, and entered into, not only without offence to, but actually at the suggestion of those who, according to our notions, would feel most deeply injured by it, is a very different thing from what polygamy would be in our own state of society.

As to polygamy, as in that of other national customs, the Mosaic law adheres to the established usage. Hence there is not only no express statute to prohibit polygamy, which was previously held lawful, but the Mosaic law presupposes its existence and practice, bases its legislation thereupon, and thus authorizes it, as evidenced from the following enactment is clear:

1. It is ordained that a king "shall not multiply wives unto himself" (Deut. xvii, 17), which, as bishop Patrick rightly remarks, "is not a prohibition to take more wives than one, but not to have an excessive number, after the manner of Eastern kings, whom Solomon seems to have irritated;" thus, in fact, legalizing a moderate number.

The Mishna (Sanhedrin, ii, 4), the Talmud (Babylon Sanhedrin, 21 a), Rashi (on Deut. xvii, 17), etc., in harmony with ancient tradition, regard eighteen wives, including half wives, as a moderate number, and as not violating the injunction contained in the expression "multiply." 2. The law enacts that a man is not to marry his wife's sister to vex her while she lives (Lev. xvi, 18), which, as the same prelate justly urges, manifestly means "that though two wives at a time, or more, may be united in those days, a father should take two sisters (as Jacob had formerly done) begotten of the same father or born of the same mother;" or, in other words, a man is at liberty to take another wife besides the first, and during her lifetime, provided only they are not sisters. 3. The law of primogeniture (Deut. xxii, 13-17) actually presupposes the case of a man having two wives, one beloved and the other not, as it was with Jacob and his two wives, and ordains that if the one less beloved is the mother of his first-born, the husband is not to transfer the right of primogeniture to the son of another wife; but is to acknowledge him as first-born who is actually so. 4. Exod. xxvi, 9, 10, permits a father who has given his son a bondwoman for a wife, to give him a second wife of freer birth, and prescribes how the first is then to be treated — that she is to have allowance, clothes, and the conjugal duty; and 5. Deut. xxxi, 15 expressly enjoins that a man, though having a wife already, is to marry his deceased brother's widow.

Having existed before the Mosaic law, and being acknowledged and made the basis of legislation by it, polygamy continued in full force during the whole of this period. Thus, during the government of the judges, we find two cases of polygamy on record. 1. Judges ii, 19, 21, and 22, and 1 Sam. i, 2. During the monarchy, we find Saul, the first king of Israel, had many wives, and three score and ten sons (Judg. viii, 30), 2. Jair the Gileadite, also a judge of Israel, had thirty grown-up sons (Judg. x, 4) and a proportionate number of daughters. 3. Ben, another judge of Israel, had thirty full-grown sons and thirty full-grown daughters (Judg. xii, 9), and Abdon, also a judge of Israel, had forty adult sons and thirty adult daughters — which was utterly impossible without polygamy; the pious Elekhanan, father of Samuel the illustrious judge and prophet, had two wives and 35 sons (1 Sam. i, 5). 4. During the monarchy, we find Saul, the first king of Israel, had one wife and six concubines (1 Sam. i, 15). 5. During the same period, Jehoshaphat, the son of Rehoboam, was the first king of Judah to multiply wives and concubines, having 33 wives and 60 concubines (2 Chron. xii, 1), 6. Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, married 14 wives and concubines (2 Kings xi, 3), and 7. The last king of Judah, Jehoiakim, was the last king of Judah to marry 12 wives and concubines (2 Kings xxiv, 18). 8. In the time of the captivity, the first king of the captivity, Nebuchadnezzar, was the first king of the captivity to multiply wives, having 10 wives and concubines (2 Chron. xii, 1); Abijah, his son and successor to the throne of Judah, married fourteen wives (2 Chron. xiv, 1); and Josiah, the tenth king, including David, who reigned from B.C. 878 to 838, had two wives given to him by the godly high-priest Jehoiada, who restored both the throne of David and the worship of the true God according to the law of Moses (2 Chron. xxiv, 3). A very remarkable illustration of the prevalence of polygamy in private life is given in 1 Chron. vii, 4, where we are told that not only did the five fathers, all of them great chieftains of the house of Jashar, live in polygamy; but that their descendants, numbering 36,000 men, "had many wives." De Wette, indeed, affirms that "the Hebrew moral teachers speak decidedly for monogamy, as is evident from their always speaking of one wife, and from the high notion which they have of a good and faithful wife." A silly notion, this, in the case of a husband, but a bad wife is like rottenness in the bones (Prov. iii, 4); "Whoose findeth a wife findeth happiness" (xviii, 22); "A house and wealth are an inheritance from parents, but a discreet wife is from the Lord" (Prov. xix, 14); and it describes an innocent and managing wife in such a manner as one only could be it" (Christl. Sittenlehre, vol. iii, sec. 472). Similarly Ewald: "Wherever a prophet alludeth to matrimonial matters, he always assumes faithful and sacred monogamy contracted for the whole life as the legal one" (Jud. Alterthumser Israels, p. 177 sq.). But we have exactly analogous passages where parental fidelity is described: "A wise son is happiness to the father, but a foolish son is the grief of his mother" (Prov. x, 1; xv, 20); "A wise son heareth his father's instruction" (xxii, 1); and "If a man die, having no children to inherit the property, the theory of having only one son is assumed by the sacred moralist, because, when speaking of happiness or misery, which parents derive from their offspring, only one son is alluded to. Besides, the facts which we have enumerated cannot be set aside by arguments.

As nothing is said in the post-exilian portions of the Bible to discourage polygamy, this ancient practice also continued among the Jews during this period. During the second Temple, we find that Herod the Great had nine wives (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 1, 3); his two sons, Archelaus the Ethnarch, and Antipas the Tetrarch (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 12, 2; xviii, 5, 1); and John the Baptist and other Jews, who censured the one for violating the Mosaic law by the marriage of his deceased brother's wife who had children (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 12, 2), and the other for marrying Herod's half-sister, the wife of his half-brother Herod-Philip (Matt. xiv, 8, 4; Mark vi, 17, 18; Luke iii, 19), raised no cry against their practicing polygamy; because, as Josephus tells us, "the Jews of those days adhered to their ancient practice to have many wives at the same time" (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 1, 2). In harmony with the theory of their polity in Israel, the law of the empire enacted various statutes to regulate polygamy and protect the rights and settlement of each wife (Mishna, Yebamoth, iv, 11; Ketuboth, x, 1, 6; Kiddushin, ii, 7), and the Mosaic law in the marriage of his deceased brother's wife who had children (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 12, 2), and the other for marrying Herod's half-sister, the wife of his half-brother Herod-Philip (Matt. xiv, 8, 4; Mark vi, 17, 18; Luke iii, 19), raised no cry against their practicing polygamy; because, as Josephus tells us, "the Jews of those days adhered to their ancient practice to have many wives at the same time" (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 1, 2). In harmony with the theory of their polity in Israel, the law of the empire enacted various statutes to regulate polygamy and protect the rights and settlement of each wife (Mishna, Yebamoth, iv, 11; Ketuboth, x, 1, 6; Kiddushin, ii, 7). As a striking illustration of the prevalence and legality of polygamy during this period may be mentioned the following circumstance which is recorded in the Talmud: Twelve widows appealed to their brother-in-law to perform the duty of Levir, which he refused to do, because he saw no prospect how to maintain such an additional number of wives and possibly a large family, hence the case was handed over to Jehu the Holy, who promised that if the man would do the duty enjoined on him by the Mosaic law, he himself would maintain the family and their children. In case such there should be any, every sabbatical year, when no produce was to be got from the land, which was at rest. The offer was accepted by the Levir, and he accordingly married his twelve sisters-in-law; and after three years these twelve wives appeared with thirty-six children before Jehudah the Holy to demand the promised allowance, as it was then that the half-wisdom of the law was at rest. The offer was accepted by the Levir, and he accordingly married his twelve sisters-in-law; and after three years these twelve wives appeared with thirty-six children before Jehudah the Holy to demand the promised allowance, as it was then that the half-wisdom of the law was at rest. The offer was accepted by the Levir, and he accordingly married his twelve sisters-in-law; and after three years these twelve wives appeared with thirty-six children before Jehudah the Holy to demand the promised allowance, as it was then that the half-wisdom of the law was at rest. The offer was accepted by the Levir, and he accordingly married his twelve sisters-in-law; and after three years these twelve wives appeared with thirty-six children before Jehudah the Holy to demand the promised allowance, as it was then that the half-wisdom of the law was at rest. remark in the Mishna, that a Levir may marry his deceased brother's four widows (Jebamoth, iv, 11), the Babylonian Gemara concluded that it recommends a man to have no more than this number (Babyl. Jebamoth, 44 a); and from this most probably Mohammed's injunction is derived (Koran, iv, 8). It was Rabban Gershom ben-Jehudah of France (born cir. 960, died 1028), who, in the 11th century, prohibited polygamy under pains of excommunication, saving in exceptional cases (Gritz, Geschichte der Juden, v, 405-507). His motive for doing so is a matter of dispute; the older Occidental rabbins say that the prohibition originated in a desire to preserve the peace of the family, while the Oriental rabbins will have it that it was dictated by the governments of Christian countries. His interdict, however, made but slow progress, even in Germany and France, for which it was chiefly designed. Thus Simon ben-Abraham of Sens, one of the most celebrated French Talmudists, tells us (cir. 1200): "The institution of R. Gershom has made no progress either in our neighborhood or in the provinces of France. On the contrary, it happens that pious and learned men and many other people marry a second wife in the lifetime of the first" (B-Joseph, Eben Het-Exar, 1). The practice of marrying a second wife in the event of the first having no issue within ten years also obtained in Italy till about the 15th century—the pope giving a special dispensation for it. The Spanish Jews never recognized R. Gershom's interdict; bigamy was practiced in Castile till the 14th century, while the Christian government of Navarre declared polygamy among the Jews legal, and the law of king Theobald allowed them to marry as many wives as they could maintain and govern, but they were not permitted to divorce any one of them without sending all away (Kayserling, Geschichte der Juden in Spanien, 1, 71). Nor was the said interdict acknowledged by the Jews in the East; and monogamy is there practiced simply because the bride makes a special agreement, and has a clause inserted in the Ketubah (סכום קנה), or marriage-settlement, that her husband is not to marry another as long as she lives. An exception, however, is made in case there is no issue. As to the opinion of the Karaites on monogamy and polygamy, the celebrated Jehudah ben-Ella Hadassi (Bourheil 1149) remarks, in his famous work against rabbinic Judaism, "The Pentateuch prohibits one to marry two wives with a view to vex one of them (/ofa ויבכ רץ, Lev. xviii, 18); but he may take them provided he loves them and does not grieve either of them, and treats them both affectionately. If he does not diminish their food, raiment, and conjugal rights (Exod. xxi, 11), he is allowed to take two wives or more, just as Elkanah married Hannah and Peninnah, and as David, peace be upon him, and other kings and judges did" (Zekhol Hacopher, ed. Equatoria, 1866, p. 129). From this it is evident that polygamy was not prohibited by the Jewish law, nor was it regarded as a sin, and that the monogamy of the Jews in the present day is simply in obedience to the laws of the countries in which they live. There were, however, always some rabbins who discouraged polygamy (Abot, ii, 7; Jebamoth, 65 a, al.); and the elevated notion which they had of monogamy is seen in the statutes which they enacted that the high-priest is to be the husband of one wife and to keep to her (Jebamoth, 58 a; Maimonides, Hilchoth Isure Bia, xviii, 13; Josephus, Ant. iii, 12, 2); and which the apostle Paul also urges on Christian bishops (1 Tim. iii, 2; Titus i, 16).

V. Prescribed Degrees and Laws of Intermarriage.— 1. There were no prescribed degrees within which a man was forbidden to marry in the pre-Mosaic period. On It will be seen from the foregoing table that, while some kinds are proscribed, others are allowed, e. g. a father's sister is forbidden while a brother's daughter is not. This has occasioned great difficulty in tracing the principle which underlies these prohibitions. Philipp- per's solution is of the assertion that it is possible to deduce the remarks which accompany the respective vetoes. The stepmother is proscribed because "it is thy father's nakedness" (Lev. xviii, 9); the son's or daughter's daughter because it "is thine own nakedness" (ver. 10); the father's or mother's daughter because she is the "father's or mother's death" (ver. 12, 29); and the brother's or sister's daughter because it "is the nakedness of thy brother" (ver. 16).

"From this it is evident," this erudite rabbi submits, "that, on the one side, son, daughter, and grandchild are identified with the father, while, on the other side, brethren and sisters are identified with each other, because they have one and the same source of life. Accordingly, we obtain the following data. All members proceeding from a common father or mother constitute one issue, because they possess together the same source of life; while the ascendants and the descendants in a straight line form one line, because they have one after the other and from each other the same source of life; and hence the law—1. Two members of the same issue, or two members of the same line, are not to intermarry, because they have the same source of life. But inasmuch as the ascendants enter the issue, and the descending the derived to every ascending, an ascending issue may press forward out of the straight line, or step down into the following, i. e. the primary into the one derived from it; while the succeeding cannot go backwards into the foregoing, i. e. the derived into the primary. Now, as the man is the moving cause in carnal intercourse, hence the law—2. A male member of the succeeding issue must not marry a female member of the preceding issue, while, on the contrary, a male member of the preceding may marry a female of the succeeding issue, provided they are not both of a direct line. Half-blood and step-relations make no difference in this respect, since they are identified, both in the issue and in the line, because husband and wife become identified. It is for this reason, also, that the relationship, which the wife always assumes in marriage with regard to her husband, is such a blood relation bears to her; hence it is, for instance, that a brother's wife is proscribed, while the wife's sister is allowed. Thus the principle of the Mosaic proscriptions is a profound one, and is fully borne out by nature. Carnal intercourse has for its object only a third by the combination of two opposites; but that which proceeds from the same source of life is merely of the same kind. Hence, when two, originally of the same kind, unite, it is contrary to the true design of copulation, and can only proceed from an overpowering and excess of rude and animal passions. It is a desecration of the nature and morality of man, and the highest defilement" (Jewish Ethics, i, 588 sq.; 8d. ed. Lipsia, 1863).

Different penalties are attached to the infringement of these prohibitions. The punishment of death is to be inflicted in the case of a Levite marrying a wife from the same tribe (Lev. xx, 11), or a daughter-in-law (Lev. xviii, 15; xx, 12); of death by fire for marrying a woman and her daughter at the same time (xviii, 17; xx, 14); of being cut off or excommunicated for marrying a sister on the father's side or on the mother's side (xviii, 9; xx, 17); of not being pardoned for marrying a father's sister (xviii, 12; xx, 19); of not being pardoned and childlessness for marrying a father's brother's wife (xviii, 14; xx, 20); and of childlessness alone for marrying a brother's wife (xviii, 16; xx, 21), the case of a Levite marrying (Deut. xii, 15). Pardonnability is mentioned for marrying one's mother (xviii, 7), grand-daughter (xviii, 10), or both sisters together (xviii, 18). From this enumeration it will be seen that it only specifies three instances in which capital punishment is to be inflicted.
The grounds on which these prohibitions were enacted are reducible to the following three heads: (1) moral propriety; (2) the expenses of maintaining the household; and (3) social convenience. The first of these grounds common to all is prominently forward in the expressions by which the various offenses are characterized, as well as in the general prohibition against approaching "the flesh of his flesh." The use of such expressions undoubtedly contains an appeal to the honor naturalis, or that repugnance with which man instinctively shrinks from matrimonial union with one with whom he is connected by the closest ties both of blood and of family affection. On this subject we need say no more than that there is a distinction between the affections which bind the members of a family together, and that which lies at the bottom of the matrimonial bond, and that the amalgamation of these affections cannot take place without a serious shock to one or the other of the two; hence the desirability of drawing a distinct line between the provinces of each, by stating definitely where the matrimonial affection may legitimately take root. The second motive to laying down these prohibitions was that the Hebrews might be preserved as a peculiar people, with institutions distinct from those of the Egyptians and other nations with which they came in contact. The Egyptians were more nearly related to the Hebrews than nations with whom they might come in contact.

Marriages with the proscribed degrees prevailed in many civilized countries in historical times, and were not unusual among the Hebrews themselves in the pre-Mosaic age. For instance, marriages with half-sisters by Moses (Gen. xxv, 15), by Moabites (Cim. 4; Thenestocl. 32), with half-sisters by the same mother at Sparta (Philo, De spec. leg. p. 779), and with full sisters in Egypt (Diod. i, 27) and Persia, as illustrated in the well-known instances of Pelemy Philadelphus in the former (Paus. i, 7, 1), and Cambyses in the latter country (Herod. iii, 81). It was even believed that in some nations marriages between a son and his mother were not unusual (Ovid, Met. x, 381; Eurip. Androm. 174). Among the Hebrews we have instances of marriage with a half-sister in the case of Abraham (Gen. xxv, 21), with an aunt in the case of Amram (Exod. vi, 20), and with two sisters at the same time in the case of Jacob (Gen. xxix, 26). Such cases were justifiable previous to the enactments of Moses: subsequently to them we have no case in the O.T. of actual marriage within the degrees, though the language of Tamar towards her half-brother Amnon (2 Sam. xiii, 13) implies the possibility of their union with the consent of their father. The Herods committed some violent breaches of the marriage law. Herod the Great married his half-sister (Matt. xvi, 5); Archelaus his brother's widow, who was still in the chancery of her father (Matt. ii, 21); Herod Antipas' brother's wife (xviii, 5; Matt. xvii, 4). In the Christian Church we have an instance of marriage with a father's wife (1 Cor. vi, 1), which St. Paul characterizes as "fornication" (απροσώπιον), and visita with the severest condemnation.

The third ground of the prohibitions, social convenience, comes forward solemly in the case of marriage with two sisters simultaneously, the effect of which would be to "vex" or irritate the first wife, and produce domestic jars. Besides the proscribed degrees, the Mosaic law also forbids the following intermarriages: i. No Israelite is to marry the progeny of incestuous and unlawful copulations, or a maimer (יַעֲשֶׂה, Deut. xxiii, 2). In the absence of any Biblical definition of this much-disputed expression, we must accept the ancient traditional explanation contained in the Mishna, which is as follows: "When their head is betrothed without transgression of the law about forbidden marriage, e. g. when the daughters of Levites, Levites, or Israelites are married to priests, Levites, or Israelites—the child goes after the father; where there is betrothal, and this law has been transgressed—e. g. if a widow is married to a high-priest, a divorced woman, or one who performed the ceremony of chullin to an ordinary priest, or a bastard or a female nehilim to an Israelite; or, vice versa, if a Jewess is married to a bastard or nehilim—the child goes after the inferior party; where the woman cannot be betrothed to the man, he might legally be betrothed to another person—e. g., if a man married within any one of the degrees proscribed by the law—the child is a bastard or maimer" (Kid. hil. iii, 12). ii. Any person who is יַעֲשֶׂה, cujus testiculi vulnerati sunt, or ceci eunctus eorum, or בֶּלֶם, cujus membrum virile praeconium est, as the Mishna (Jeb. viii, 2) explains it, is not allowed to marry (Deut. xxiii, 1). iii. A man is not to remarry a woman whom he had divorced, and who, after marrying another husband, has become a widow, or been divorced again (Deut. xxiv, 2-4). iv. Hebrews are not allowed to intermarry with persons of another tribe (Numb. xxvi, 5-9). v. A high-priest is forbidden to marry a widow, a divorced woman, a profane woman, or a harlot, and restricted to a pure Jewish maiden (Lev. xv, 13, 14). vi. Ordinary priests are prohibited from marrying prostitutes and divorced women (Lev. xx, 7).

b. The proscription of epigamy with non-Israelites is absolute with regard to some nations, and conditional with regard to others. The Canaanites are forbidden to intermarry with the seven Canaanitish nations, on the ground that it would lead the Israelites into idolatry (Exod. xxxiv, 15, 16; Deut. vii, 13, 24); and with the Ammonites and Moabites, on account of national antipathy (Deut. xxiii, 3-4); while the prohibition against marriage with Egypt and Ethiopia tends to the third generation (Deut. xxiii, 7, 8). The Talmud, which rightly expounds the prohibition to enter into the congregation of the Lord as necessarily extending to epigamy (comp. 1 Kings xi, 2; Kid. iv, 3, 3), takes the same interpretation to mean the intermarriage of the Israelites with those of the cease proieltes, i.e. the grandchildren of an Ammonite or Moabit who professes Judaism (Mishna, Jeb., viii, 3; Maonimode, Yad Ha-Chazak, Iserue Rish, xii, 19, 20). This view is confirmed by the fact that the Bible only mentions three intermarriages with Egyptians, and records at least two out of the three to show the evil effect of them. One occurred in the wilderness, and in the wilderness, and we are told that the son of this intermarriage, while quarrelling with a brother Jew, blasphemed the name of God, and suffered capital punishment. (Lev. xxiv, 10-14): the second occurred towards the end of the history of the Jewish people, when Judah endeavours to show that Ishmael, the munificer of Gedaliah (Jer. xii, 1, 2), was a descendant of Jarcha, the Egyptian son-in-law of Sheshan (1 Chron. ii, 54, 55; and Rashi, ad loc.); and the third is the intermarriage of Solomon, which, however, is excepted from the censure of the law, in the book of Kings (i, ii, 1, 13, 30, 31). Of intermarriages with Edomites not a single instance is recorded in the O.T.; the Jewish antipathy against them was transmitted down to a very late period, as we find in the declaration of Jesus, son of Sirach, that his soul hates the inhabitants of Seir (Eccles. iv, 25, 26), and in the fact that Judas Maccabaeus carried on a deadly war with them (1 Macc. v, 3; 2 Macc. xx, 15-23).

An exception is made in the case of female captives of war (Deut. xx., 10-14), which is evidently designed to obviate as far as possible the outrages committed after the evil passions have been stirred up in the conflict. The law, however, most humbly ordains that the capter, before making her his wife, should first allow her to induce herself for a full month in mourning for her parents, from whom she is snatched away, and to practice the following customary rites expressive of grief: 1. Cut off the hair of her head, which was the usual sign of mourning both among the Jews and other nations of antiquity (Ezra ix, 3; Job i, 20; Isa. xxv, 2; Jer. vii, 29; xxi, 6; Ezek. xii, 18; xxvii, 31; Amos viii, 10; Micah i, 10); 2. Cut off her nails, which were stained to form a part of personal adornment; and, 3. Put off the raiment in which she was taken captive, since the women who followed their fathers and husbands to the war put on their finest dresses and ornaments previous to an engagement, in the hope of finding favor in the eyes of their captors in case of a defeat (Ovid, Remed. Amor, 543; Rosenmüller, Das alte u. neue Morgenland, ii, 3).

The first complaint of epigamy with aliens is, strange to say, made against Moses, the lawyer himself (Numb. xii, 1). In the days of the Judges the law against intermarriage was commonly transgressed (Judges iii, 6), and from the earlier portions of the book of Proverbs, which ring with repeated denunciations of foreign women (Prov. ii, 16-17; v, 8-11; xvi, 17), as well as from the warnings of Isaiah (ii, 6), it is evident that intermarriages with foreign women were generally practiced in private life in after times. Of the twenty kings of Israel who reigned from the division of the kingdom to the Babylonian captivity, Ahab is the only one mentioned who married a foreign wife (1 Kings xvi, 31); while of the nineteen kings of Judah after the division none intermarried with aliens. Marriages between Israelitish women and proselyted foreigners were at all times of rare occurrence, and are noticed in the Bible as if they were of an exceptional nature, such as that of an Egyptian and an Israelitish woman (Lev. xxiv, 10); of Abigail and Bathus, the Ishmaelite, contracted probably when Jesse's family was sojourning in Moab (1 Chron. ii, 15), to the daughter and the wife of his mother, who was staying in his house (1 Chron. ii, 35); and of a Naphthalite woman and a Tyrian, living in adjacent districts (1 Kings vii, 14). In the reverse case, viz. the marriage of Israelites with foreign women, it is of course, highly probable that the wives became proselytes after their marriage, as instance in the case of Ruth (i, 16), and probably in that of Solomon's Egyptian wife (Psa. xxi, 10); but this was by no means invariably the case. On the contrary, we find that the Canaanitish wives of Solomon (1 Kings xi, 4), and the Phoenician wife of Ahab (1 Kings xxi, 2), cast off their idolatrous problems, and intro-duced them into their adopted countries. Proselytism does not, therefore, appear to have been a sine qua non in the case of a wife, though it was so in the case of a husband: the total silence of the law as to any such condition in regard to a captive, whom an Israelite might wish to marry, must be regarded as evidence of the reverse (Deut. xxii, 14-10), nor have the refinements of rabbinical writers on that passage succeeded in establishing the necessity of proselytism. The opposition of Samson's parents to his marriage with a Philistine woman (Judges xvi, 3) leads to the same conclusion.

3. In the post-exilian period, besides the fifteen proscribed degrees enumerated in Lev. xvii, 7-17; xx, 11, etc., the Sopherim, or scribes (B.C. 822-221), prohibited marriage with other relations (Mishna, Jebamoth, li, 4), and the rabbins afterwards extended still further by R. Chijai ben-Abba the Babylonian (A.D. 163-198), and friend of Jehudah i the Holy (Jebamoth, 22 a). The prohibited degrees of the scribes are denominated פָּרָשִׁים, פָּרָשִׁים ר', וּוּרְשֵׁים, the second or subordinate in rank with respect to those forbidden in the Bible, and may be seen in the following list given by Mainmides: "i. The mother's mother's mother, and so upwards, are proscribed. ii. The mother of his father's mother, and so further. iii. His father's mother, and this is infinite, for even the father's mother's mother, and so upwards, are proscribed. iv. The mother of his father's father's mother, and this is infinite, for even if she were the wife of our father Jacob, she is forbidden to one of us. vi. The wife of his mother's father only. vii. The wife of his father's brother by the mother. viii. The wife of his father's mother's brother, whether by the mother or by the father. ix. His son's daughter-in-law, i.e. his son's son's wife, and this is infinite, for even if she were the son's son's son's wife, descending to the end of the world, she is forbidden, so that, as long as the wife of one of us lives, she is secondary or forbidden to our father Jacob. x. His daughter's daughter-in-law, i.e. his son's wife only. xi. The daughter of his son's daughter only. xii. The daughter of his son's son only. xiii. The daughter of his daughter's daughter only. xiv. The daughter of his daughter's daughter only. xv. The daughter of his wife's daughter's wife only. xvi. The daughter of his wife's daughter's daughter only. xvii. The mother of his wife's father's mother only. xviii. The mother of his wife's mother's father only. xix. The mother of his wife's mother's mother only. xx. The mother of his wife's father's father only. Thus, of these secondary intermarriages, there are four which are infinite: α, the mother's mother and all upwards; β, the father's mother and all upwards; γ, the grandfather's wife and all upwards; and, δ, the son's son's wife and all downwards" (Hilchoth Ishuth, i, 6).

The principle by which the Scribes were guided in extending the prohibition to the whole line wherever the Mosaic law refers to lineal ascendants or descendants, as well as to those who might easily be mistaken by having a common appellation. Thus mother's mother's mother, and in general, is forbidden, because the Mosaic law prescribes for the mother, and she, because the stepgrandfather, because the law is forbidden in the Mosaic law; while the mother of the father is proscribed, because the appellation grandmother is used without distinction for both the mother's and father's mothers. Thus Moses' mother, i.e. the mother of the brother of his mother, who has been seen that he, like Alfaas, restricts prohibition to ii to the mother of the grandfather, and prohibitions xii-xvi, xx, to the son's grandchildren, great-grandmother, and grandmother, but does not extend it to any further ascendants or descendants. The whole subject is extensively discussed in the Talmud (Jebamoth, 21. 7, Jerusalem Jebamoth, ii, 4), and by Mainmides (Iod Ha-Chazaka, Hilchoth Ishuth, i, 6, etc.), to which we must refer. It must, however, be remarked that Philo's list of proscribed degrees is much shorter. After explaining why Moses prohibited marriage with one's own mother or sister, he says, "For this reason he has thus forbidden other matrimonial connections, inasmuch as he ordained that a man shall not marry his granddaughter (μη δύναμαι δύναμαι, μη βιον), nor his aunt on the father's or mother's side, nor the wife of an uncle, son, or brother; nor a step-daughter while the lifetime of her mother, or after her death, because a stepfather takes the place of a father, and a step-daughter is to be looked upon as his own daughter. Neither does he allow the same man to marry two sisters, either at the same time or at different times, even in case one of them is married, and is brought to another and another, and for he did not consider it pious that one sister should succeed to the place of her unfortunate sister, whether the latter is still cohabiting with him, or is divorced and has no husband, or is married to another husband" (De special. legis 6, 780). Still shorter is the list of Josephus, who says, "The law prohibits it as a heavy sin and an abomination to have carnal intercourse with one's mother, step-mother, father's or mother's sister, one's own sister, or a son's wife" (A. W. iii, 12, 1). Marriage with a wife's step-sister is allowed by the Babylonian and the Jew, and is considered by the Spanish Jews follow the former, while the GermanoFrench communities adopt the latter. Intermarriages between cousins, uncle and niece, entire step-brother and step-sister, are quite legitimate. Indeed, for an uncle to marry a niece, which the English law forbids, has been approved by the Jews as a convenience, and is something specially meritorious. The Talmud says that the promise given in Isaiah, "Then shalt thou call and the Lord shall answer" (viii, 9), refers to that man especially who "loves his neighbors, befriends his relations; from his wealth, or from his substance, to the poor in the hour of need" (Jebamoth, 62 b, 63 a).

As to the ethical cause of the proscribed marriages, or the cases specified, including parallels by affinity, the ancient Jews, to whom the oracles of God were communiand who had to explain and administer the law in practical life, knew nothing about it. The Palestinian doctors regarded the proscribed degrees as a positive law, the cause of which cannot be divined by human reason (Sifra, Raddush, ix, 12; Talmud, Sabbath, 190 a; Joma, 7a). The only attempt to rationalize on the subject of the proscriptions, made in the Mosaic law in prohibiting marriage with the wife of the father's brother, in case she is divorced or left a widow, and not forbidding the wife of the mother's brother. Upon this the Talmud remarks that a man visits his father's relations more than his mother's (Jebamoth, 21 a; see above on this passage); and it is assumed, we believe with perfect reason, and based on Numb, ii, 2, that it is the father's relations who constitute the family, and not the mother's. We thus see that up to the time of the Talmudists, when the Greek loose barriers of consanguinity threatened to fall among the Jewish families, the ancient Hebrews were bound only by the specific proscriptions in the Mosaic law, and that even after the prohibitions were extended by the scribes, the proscription of a male relative by blood did not imply the wife's relatives of the like degree, because of the strong distortion of this custom in the absence of the ancients and affinity by marriage; the former being permanent and sacred, and the latter uncertain and vague, as a man might any moment divorce his wife, or take as many as he pleased, and because the husband's family were regarded as his relations, while the wife's were not esteemed beyond those who are especially mentioned.

The proscribed degrees were scrupulously avoided by the Jews during this period, and no dispensation could be obtained by any one, no matter how high his position, as Judaism never invested any spiritual function with power to absolve, even in extraordinary cases, from the obligations of the law. Hence the outcry against Herod the Great, who married his half-sister (Josephus, Ant. xvii, i, 3); against Archelaus, who took his deceased brother's widow when she was the mother of children (Jebamoth, xiii, 9, 1); and against Hadrian Antipas, for which John the Baptist had to atone with his life (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 1; Matt. xiv, 8). So long as foreign epigamy was of merely occasional occurrence no veto was placed upon it by public authority; but when, after the return from the Babylonian captivity, the Jews contracted marriages with the heathen inhabitants of Palestine in so wholesale a manner as to endanger their national existence, the practice was severely condemned (Exra ix, 2; x, 2), and the law of positive prohibition, originally pronounced only against the Canaanites and the Moabites, was extended to the Philistines (Neh. xiii, 23-25). Public feeling was henceforth strongly opposed to foreign marriages, and the union of a Manassite with a Cuthaan led to such animosity as to produce the great national schism, which had its focus in the temple on Mount Gerizim (Josephus, Ant. xi, 6, 2). A less signal instance of the same feeling is exhibited in the cases of Joseph (Ant. xii, 4, 6) and Anieleus (Ant. xviii, 9, 5), and is noticed by Tacitus (Hist. vi, 5) as one of the characteristics of the Jewish nation in his day. In the N. T. no special directions are given, but the necessity of separation between believers and unbelievers (2 Cor. vi, 14, 17) would apply with special force to the case of marriage; and the permission to dissolve mixed marriages, contracted previously to the conversion of one party, at the instance of the unconverted one, cannot but be regarded as implying the propriety of such unions subsequently to conversion (1 Cor. vii, 12).

Besides the proscribed degrees, the rabbinic law also enacted—1. A man must not marry a divorced woman with whom he has committed adultery prior to her divorce, even if he is only suspected of it (Jebamoth, 24; Maimonides, Sechs, ii, 12). 2. A man who attested the death of the husband is not allowed to marry the widow, nor is the bearer of a divorce permitted to marry the divorced woman, to avoid suspicion.

seducer, but not the wife of the criminal. 3. If the wife vowed anything to the Lord, or imposed upon herself voluntary obligations to the Deity, her husband could nullify it (Numb. xxx, 6-8). 4. He could send her away or divorce her when she displeased him (Deut. xxiv, 1-4). The woman, again, is protected by the following laws: 1. If she is under her husband's control, she is to be with him, save when he ill-treats her and removes her, in which case he is obliged to send her maintenance (Jebamoth, 64 b). ii. If the husband goes on a three-months' journey without making provision for his wife, the legal authorities of the place are ordered to propitiate him (Michah, 48 a, 107). i. He is obliged to perform the duties of a husband within a stated period (Mishna, Kethaboth, v, 6). iv. If her husband dies, she is to be maintained from his property, or by the children, in the same manner as she was in his lifetime, till she is betrothed to another man, and her rights must be attended to before the claims of any one else (Kethaboth, 48, 51, 62, 68, 106; Jer. 31:14). iii. If a woman marries a man who is more than five years younger than herself; to a man, with the understanding that she is to be his half-wife (בַּתָּהוֹ תַּעֲשֵׂה, Exod. xxvi, 7; Judg. ix, 18 with Judg. viii, 31), the law enacts that, in case her master and intended husband is displeased with her, and she refuses to redeem his promise,—i. he is not to keep till the sabbatical year, and then give her her liberty like her brother; ii. he is not to sell her to any other as a wife; iii. he may give her to his son as a wife, and in that case must treat her as a daughter-in-law; iv. if he gives his son an additional wife, she is to obtain—her food, 5, raiment, and, conjugal rights as heretofore; and, v. if these three last conditions are refused to her, she is forthwith to set as free (Exod. xxvi, 7-11). 2. If he maliciously impuges her chastity, he is to be scourged, and loses his right over her to divorce her (Deut. xxiii, 18-19). 3. If she has children, they must render equal obedience to her as to the father (Exod. xxiii, 12). 4. The husband must not vex her by marrying two sisters simultaneously (Lev. xviii, 18). 5. He is not allowed to annoy her belovend wife by transferring the primogeniture from her son to the child of his favorite wife (Deut. xxi, 15-17). 6. If her husband dislikes her, he is not to dismiss her, but gives her a "bill of divorce" (Deut. xxiv, 1), which requires the interposition of legal advisers. 7. When a woman is divorced, or her husband dies, she is free, and at liberty to marry any one she likes, as is evident from the enactments in Lev. xx, 11; Deut. xxiv, 2-4; xxv, 5, which are based on this fact. 3. The notions about sanctity of marriage were lofty during the post-exilic period than in the preceding epochs, as may be judged from the fact that unfaithfulness to a wife is denounced by the prophet Malachi as violating a sacred covenant, to the transaction of which God himself was a witness (i, 14). And though it may be questioned whether the prophet's appeal to God as having witnessed to the marriage-contract refers to the above-named seven benedictions (בְּרוּךְ יִבְרֵא בְּרֵא בְּרֵא בְּרֵא בְּרֵא בְּרֵא בְּרֵא בְּרֵא בְּרֵא בְּרֵa בְּרֵa בְּרֵa בְּרֵa בְּרֵa בְּרֵa בְּרֵa בְּרֵa בְּרֵa בְּרֵa בְּרֵa בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr بְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr בְּr b and acted upon by those who were charged with the administration of the law from time immemorial. The only blunder which heathen nations made was when a man divorced his wife because of an evil report which he maliciously circulated about her; then he was not allowed to remarry her (Mishna,Gitin, iv, 7). ii. If the divorced woman marries again, and the second husband either kills her or she is not remarried to her first husband: this was to preclude the possibility of procuring the death of, or a divorce from, the second husband, in case the parties wished to be reunited. 3. If a man seduces a maiden, and on this account is legally obliged to marry her, he may not marry her away all his property (Deut. xxii, 29, 30). ii. If he impugns her chastity, he also loses the power of ever divorcing her (Deut. xxii, 13-19). This, as well as the preceding benign law, was evidently designed to make men care for those women whom they had either virtually or actually deserted of their moral character, and who, if these men were allowed to desert them, might never be able to get husbands. Thus these laws, while checking seduction, inasmuch as the man knew that he would have all his lifetime to be wedded to and care for the injured woman, also prevented those women who had left their husbands being left as an unprovided for life, and compelled to give themselves up to prostitution. 4. Though the Mosaic law has no express statute that the wife, under certain circumstances, may demand a divorce from her husband, yet it is undeniably implied in the Ten Commandments (Ex. xx. 14). For if a slave-bondwoman who became the wife of her master could quit him if he did not fulfill the conditions of a husband, it is but natural to conclude that a free wife would, under similar circumstances, be able to claim the protection of the same law. A few instances of the violation of the divorce law, between the period of its enactment and the Babylonian captivity, are incidentally recorded without any censure whatever. Thus we are told that Saul took away Michal, his daughter, David's wife, without David's formally divorcing her, and gave her to Phalti (1 Sam. xxv, 44), and that David took back again Michal, who had been united to another husband (2 Sam. iii, 14-16). Still the laws of divorce and of prohibiting reunion after the divorced woman had been married to another husband are alluded to by Jeremiah as well known and commonly observed (iii, 1, 8). ii. Another uncertain ground upon which the Mosaic law permits divorce (Deut. xxiv, 1-4) were minutely defined during the period after the exile. Though the school of Shammai restricts the phrase עשה א יבּ הָיִיתָ לְעוֹשֵׁהְךָ, and the Sadducees too insisted that divorce is not to be tolerated except when the woman is guilty of adultery (according to Sol Ha-Cogeh, Abipha, and the Midrash Chalda- sheh, iv, 576), yet the Jews as a nation, as well as most Christian expositors, agree with the school of Hillel. (Mishna, Gitin, ix, 10) that it denotes faults or deformities, as the context plainly shows. Now, in stating the grounds on which the Jewish expositors of the law in the time of Christ and after, regarded dissolution of marriage as justifiable, we must distinguish the cases in which the legal authorities themselves took up the matter, from those in which the married parties asked for divorce.

a. Dissolution of marriage occasioned by the lawful authorities took place—i. When the woman is guilty of adultery. ii. When the woman carries on secret intercourse with a man after her husband has warned her against it (Sota, 27; Jebamoth, 24). iii. Where, though betrothal had taken place, yet a matrimonial law (swatimutum injustum) is violated, and her referring to the proscribed degrees or to other matters enacted by the rabbins. iv. When the husband is infected with leprosy (Kethuboth, 77).

b. It was granted on the demand of the married parties, and was regarded as the sacred duty of the officiating priest of his dissolution of marriage.—i. When his wife, by violating the Mosaic law, caused him, without knowing it, to be guilty of transgression (Mishna, Kethuboth, vii, 6). ii. If the wife violates the bounds of modesty—e.g. by going into the street with uncovered hair, mixing with young males, etc. (ibid.). iii. If the wife is suspected of adultery. iv. If the woman curses her father-in-law in the presence of her husband (Kethuboth, 72). v. If the wife will not follow her husband to another place (Kethuboth, 110). vi. If the husband leaves his husband the conjugal rights for twelve months.

The wife can demand a divorce.—i. If after marriage the husband contracts a loathsome disease (Mishna, Kethuboth, vii, 9, 10). ii. If after marriage he betakes himself to a dishonorable business (ibid. the Gemara elsewhere, 76). iii. If he is unfaithful to her (Eben Ha-Ezra, 55). iv. If her husband changes his religion (ibid.). v. If the husband commits an offence which makes him flee from his country (Eben Ha-Ezra, 9). vi. If he leads a dissolute and immoral life (Eben Ha-Ezra, Gloss on Sekt, 11). vii. If he wastes his property and neglects to maintain her (Mishna, Kethuboth, vii, 1). viii. If he refuses her comunal rights (Mishna, Kethuboth, v, 6).

There are other grounds on which divorce can be obtained, but for these we must refer to the Mishna, Gittin, as they are very numerous. The bill of divorce must be handed over, either by the husband or a messenger, to the wife or one deputed by her, with the words, "This is thy divorce; thou art henceforth divorced from me, and canst marry whomsoever thou likest." (Mishna, Gitin, ix, 10). It must, however, be remarked that in the case of a divorce the Talmudists, and it is declared that "he who divorces his wife is hated of God. The altar sheds tears over him who divorces his wife and companionship of his youth" (Gitin, 90 a).

During the post-exilian period the abuse of divorce continued unabated (Josephus, Life, 76); and under the Amonasian dynasty the right was assumed by the wife as against her husband, an innovation which is attributed to Salome by Josephus (Ant. xv, 7, 10), but which appears to have been prevalent in the apostolic age, if we may judge from passages where the language implies that the act emanated from the wife (Mark x, 12; 1 Cor. vii, 11), as well as from some of the comments of the early writers on 1 Tim. v, 9. Our Lord and his apostles re-established the integrity and sanctity of the marriage-bond by the following measures: (1) by the confirmation of the original charter of marriage as the basis on which all regulations are to be framed (Matt. xix, 4, 5); (2) by the restriction of divorce to the case of fornication, and the prohibition of remarriage in all persons divorced on improper grounds (Matt. v, 32; 12, xix.; Rom. vii, 1; 1 Cor. vii, 10, 11); and (3) in the enforcement of moral purity generally (Heb. xii, 4, etc.), and especially by the formal condemnation of fornication, which appears to have been classed among acts morally indifferent (ἀδιάφορα) by a certain party in the Church (Acts xv, 20).

VIII. Levirate Law.—1. The only power which a woman had over the man during the pre-Mosaic period, in matrimonial matters, was when her husband died without issue. The widow could then claim his next brother to marry her; if the second also died without progeny, she could ask the third, and so on. The object of this Levirate marriage, as it is called, from the Latin, levir, brother-in-law (Hebrew, לְוִיר; Greek, ἱερὸςβιοῦ), is "to raise up seed to the departed brother," which should preserve his name upon his inheritance, and prevent it from being erased from among his brethren, and from the gate of his town (Gen. xxxviii, 8; Deut. xxv, 3-6; Lev. xxi, 10); or if he had reared his offspring to the proscribed degrees or to other matters enacted by the rabbins. iv. When the husband is infected with leprosy (Kethuboth, 77).

considered as the representative and heir of the deceased. Thus we are told that when Er, Judah's eldest son, who was married to Tamar, died without issue, the second son was called upon to marry his deceased brother's widow, and that when he again died, leaving no children, Tamar, the widow, had still a claim upon the only surviving son, for whom she had to wait, as he was not yet marriageable (Gen. xxxviii, 6-12, 14, 26). Ultimately Judah himself had to marry his daughter-in-law, for she inveigled him into it as a punishment for neglecting to give her his third son (Gen. xxxviii, 28-30); and Pharez, the son of this Levirate marriage, not only became the founder of a numerous and illustrious family, but was the direct line from which the royal family of David descended, and the channel through which the Messiah was born (Gen. xxxviii, 29, with Matt. i, 3). This Levirate marriage was not peculiar to the Hebrews. It also obtained among the Moabites (Ruth i, 11-13), Persians (Kleuker, Zendwörter, iii, 220), Indians (Asiatic Researches, iii, 85), and still exists in Arabia (Burckhardt, Notes, i, 112; Niebuhr, Voyages, p. 61), among the tribes of the Caucasus (Hant-Hausen, Transcaucasia, p. 468), and other nations (comp. Leyer, in Herzog, Real-Encyclop. viii, 586, a. v. Levi-Ratache). 2. This law, which, as we have seen, existed from time immemorial both among the patriarchs and other nations of antiquity, was at length formally enacted as part of the Jewish marriage law. In general, this law, however, as in the case of other primitive practices incorporated in the Mosaic code, the sacred legislator both prescribes for it definite limits, and most humbly deprives it of the irksome and odious features which it possessed in ancient times. It is evident from the enactment itself, which is as follows: "Brothers dwell together, and one of them die and have no child, the wife of the deceased shall not marry out of the family a stranger; her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her as his wife, and perform the duty of a brother-in-law. Her first-born shall then succeed in the name of the deceased brother, so that his name be not blotted out of Israel" (Deut. xxx, 5, 6). Accordingly—i. This law is restricted to brothers who dwell together, i.e. in contiguous properties, as the rabbinical law explains it according to the meaning of the word נַעֲרָא, in Gen. xlii, 6; xxxvi, 7, and elsewhere. If the brothers lived far away, or if the deceased had no brothers at all, it was an understood thing that it devolved upon the nearest of kin to marry the widow, or care for her if she was too old, when, of course, it passed over from the domain of Levirat into that of God or redeemer (Ruth ii, 20; iii, 9; iv, 15, 16). ii. To cases where no issue whatever is left, as גַּם is here used in its general sense of offspring and not specifically for son. This is not only confirmed by the Sept. (αὐγόν), Matthew (μὴ γὰρ αὐγόν), Mark (xii, 6), Luke (diēci̊ν, xx, 29), Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 26), and the Talmud (Jebamoth, 22 b), but is evident from the law of inheritance (Numb. xxvii, 8-11), in which it is declared that if a man dies without leaving a son, his daughter shall inherit his property; the widow could therefore claim the surviving brother to marry her in order to raise up a son to the deceased, the daughter who legally came to the inheritance to either have to lose her possessions, or the son born of the Levirate marriage would have to be without patrimony. In fulfilling the duty of the Levir in the patriarchal age the surviving brother had to make great sacrifices. He had not to renounce the perpetuating of his own name through the first-born son (Gen. xxxviii, 9), and mar his own inheritance (Ruth iv, 6), but, what was most galling, he was obliged to take the widow whether he liked it or not, any such objection as he might have, or not, as the Levir in the patriarchal age had no alternative. Now the Mosaic law removed this hardship by opening to the man a door of escape: "But if the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate of the elders and say, My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel; he will not perform the Levirate duty. And the elders of the city shall call him, and speak unto him. But if he say, I will not, then shall his brother's wife go in to the house of the man, and he shall lie before the eyes of his brothers-in-law, and in the face of the elders, and shave his head, and spit in his face and say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house; and his house shall be called in Israel the house of the barefoot" (Deut. xxv, 7-10). This Levirate marriage does not impose it as an inexorable law, but simply enjoins it as a duty of love, which the Levir might escape by submitting to censure and reproach. Of this he could not complain, for he not only neglected to perform towards his deceased brother the most sacred offices of love, but, by refusing to do so, he openly declared his disregard to the widow, and thus publicly insulted her. The symbolic manner in which she took away in the public court his right to her and his deceased brother's possession, has its origin in the fact that the possession of property was claimed by planting the foot on it. Hence, when the transfer of property was effected by an amicable transaction, the original owner signified the renunciation of his rights by taking off his shoe and giving it to the new possessor (Ruth iv, 7, 8). A similar custom obtains among the Indians (Benary, Deutsches künstlerisches und germanisches, Berol., 1835, 14) and among the Germans (Grimm, Deutsche Rechtsvölkerthümer, p. 156). In the case before us, however, where the privilege of possession was not renounced by a mutual understanding, but involved insult both to the deceased brother and the surviving widow, the outrageous sister-in-law snatched the right from him by pulling off his shoe. 3. That this patriarchal law—which, as we have seen, was incorporated in the Mosaic gamology—continued in its full force after the Captivity, is evident from Matthew (xxiii, 25-27), Mark (xii, 19-23), and Luke (xx, 28-38). From the question put to our Saviour in these passages, it will be seen that it was incumbent upon each surviving brother in succession to perform the duty of the Levir. There were, however, cases where this duty could not be performed, about which the Mosaic law gives no directions whatever; e.g. when the deceased brother's widow was a near relation of the Levir and came within the proscribed degrees of which the Mishna (Jebamoth, 1, 1) gives fifteen cases; or when the latter was a child when his brother died and left a widow without issue (ii, 9); and if he were on this or any other account exempt from the obligation (Deut. xxv, 5). When one of the widows, he was also from the obligation to marry any of them (i, 1); it is also implied that it was only necessary for one brother to marry one of the widows in cases where there were several widows left. The marriage was not to take place within three months of the husband's death (iv, 10). The eldest brother ought to perform the duty of marriage; but, on his declining it, a younger brother might do it (ii, 8; iv, 5). The chalilah was regarded as involving future relationship, so that a man who had received it could not marry the widow's daughter, for he was the wife's brother. Special rules are laid down for cases where a woman married under a false impression as to her husband's death (s, 1), or where a mistake took place as to whether her son or her husband died first (s, 8), for in the latter case the Levirate law would not apply, as to the evidence of the husband's death to be produced in certain cases (cap. 15, 16). There can, therefore, be no question that the administrators of the law in the time of the prophets and at the advent of our Saviour had to adapt and supplement the Levirate law. As the space of this article does not permit us to enumerate these important definitions and enactments, we must refer to the Mishna, Tract Jebamoth, which derives its name (เจבמה) from the fact that it embodies these laws. These descend into trivial distinctions—e. g. that the shoe was to be of leather, or a sandal furnished with a heel-strap; a felt shoe, or a sandal without a strap, would not do (Yeham. xiii, 1, 2). The *chailetak was not valid when the person performing it was dead and dumb (xii, 4), as he could not learn the precise formula which accompanied the act. The custom is retained by the modern Arabs, and occasionally described by Picart (*Ceremonies Religieuses, i, 243). It receives illustration from the expression used by the modern Arabs in speaking of a repudiated wife: "She was my slipper. I have cast her off" (Burckhardt, Notes, i, 118). It only remains to be remarked that the fear lest the performance of the duty, and the hazard of a collision with the law of consanguinity, made the ancient rabbins declare that ([עִבְרִית: רְאוּבֵן] the ceremony of taking off the shoe is preferable to marrying the widow, and thus virtually set aside Levirate marriages. As this ceremony, which is called *chailetak ([ירושית: רְאוּבֵן] to draw out, to pull off), supersedes the ancient law, the rabbins gave very minute orders about the manner in which it is to be performed. The ceremony is performed in the synagogue after morning prayer, in the seclusion of the rabbins and two witnesses, attended by others of the congregation as auditors and spectators. The Levir and widow are called forward, and after being questioned by the principal rabbi, and avowing his determination not to marry her, he man puts on a shoe of a peculiar form and made for this purpose, and the woman repeats, "My husband's brother refused to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel; he will not perform the duty of my husband's brother." To which the Levir replies, "I like not to take her." Upon this declaration the widow unites the shoe with her right hand, takes it off, throws it on the ground, and spits before him, saying in Hebrew, "So shall it be done unto that man who will not build up his brother's house; and his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed;" when the person present exclaim three times, "His shoe is loosed." This concludes the ceremony, and the rabbi tells the widow that she is now at liberty to marry whom she pleases.

IX. In considering the social and domestic conditions of married life among the Hebrews, we must, in the first place, take into account the position assigned to women generally in their social scale. They were called *artem and the habits consequent upon it, were utterly unknown in early times, and the condition of the Oriental woman, as pictured to us in the Bible, contrasts most favorably with that of her modern representative. There is ample evidence of the relative condition of men and women, whether married or unmarried, went about with their faces unveiled (Gen. xii, 14; xxiv, 16, 65; xxix, 11; 1 Sam. i, 18). An unmarried woman might meet and converse with men, even strangers, in a public place (Gen. xxiv, 45, 57; xxix, 12; 1 Sam. ix, 11); she might be found alone in the country without any reflection on her character (Deut. xxii, 25-27); or she might appear in court of a state (Numb. xxiv, 2). Women not infrequently held important offices: some were prophetesses, as Miriam, Deborah, Huldah, Noadiah, and Anna; of others, of Miriam, Deborah, Noadiah, and Anna; of others, an account of the marriage of the daughter of Pharaoh (Exod. xvi, 20; 1 Sam. xviii, 6, 7); in short, they enjoyed as much freedom as ordinary life as the women of our own country.

If such was her general position, it is certain that the wife must have exercised an important influence in her own home. She appears to have taken her part in family affairs, and even to have enjoyed a considerable amount of independence. For instance, she entertains guests at her own desire (2 Kings iv, 8) in the absence of her husband (Judg. iv, 18) and presides in the defence of his wishes (1 Sam. xxiv, 14, 14); she disposes of her child by a vow without any reference to her husband (1 Sam. i, 24); she consults with him as to the marriage of her children (Gen. xxvii, 46); her sugwhich is countermarried before manhood is reached by the greater risks incurred by that sex. The conditions which secure the interests of morality are thus pointed out by the laws of our physical nature.

The conception of marriage which appears in the writing of Paul has sometimes been said to be a low one, as having real prominence in the chur ch, more than in the life of the religious women.
Yet it was not originally of this character, for the spiritual life of the early Church was not more spiritual than the life of Paul himself. It was not the result of the conversion of the church, but of the call of the Holy Spirit, which was revealed in the conception of the church itself.

Tatian went even so far as to rail against marriage; as Simon Magnus is said, on the other hand, to have taught in his day a plurality of wives, and the Quo Vadis and Manicheans rejected marriage altogether. But what was really the view of the early Church is best seen in the canons of the Gynaster Synod, held about A.D. 387, where it is stated that marriage is the sin of one sin, in accordance with the idea that the marriage was the sin of one sin. This is a general principle of the moral law. The moral law itself is based on the principle that the sinner is to be punished with the same degree of severity as that which he has committed. The marriage of the sinner is therefore the punishment of the sin of the sinner.

and the like, the State was content to lend the Church the secular arm for the enforcement of the decisions of the ecclesiastical courts. The principles of the law concerning marriage thus became a part of canon law as in the Romish Church, and received final settlement by the Council of Trent, which not only established marriage as a part of the natural law, but also excommunicated, scourged, or exiled such as held to the contrary.

Cod. 24. Mat. can. 1: "Si quis dixerit, matrimonium non esse vere et proprie unum ex septem legibus evangelici sacramentis a Christo instituto, sed ab hominibus in ecclesia inventum neque gratiam confecerit: sanat. sit:"

see also I, can. 7, canon 2. 2, 4, 5, 29, sqq.; Con. art. 260, p. 183), but referred the question of its validity exclusively to the Church. The remains of these and similar laws have almost disappeared in Protestant England in our own times; the act of 1667 (cited as 20 and 21 Vict. cap. 85), with its amendments, destroys all jurisdiction of courts ecclesiastical in matters pertaining to marriage, except so far as marriage licenses are concerned, and constitutes a new court, which is called the court for divorce and matrimonial causes. See Woolsey, Divorce and Divorce Legislation (New York, 1869), p. 174-178.

The Continental Reformers from the first denied the sacramental character of marriage. They acknowledged, indeed, marriage as holy and instituted of God, yet considered it as partaking more of a civil than of an ecclesiastical character with an institution which received only a higher consecration by the blessing of the Church. They even required the Protestant civil authorities to legislate on the subject, and thus it passed entirely into the hands of the latter. The new laws were promulgated in the 16th and 17th centuries, yet all still referred to Scripture, the symbolic books, and canon law as their basis; and, being generally drawn up with the assistance of the clergy, the Church still retained the higher authority over all questions pertaining to matrimony. In all Protestant countries at present, as far as we are informed, marriage is essentially controlled by the law of the state, although the solemnization of it may be put into the hands of clerical persons. In Catholic countries there is a tendency to establish two kinds of marriage ceremonies—one a civil, the other an ecclesiastical one; but all the civil consequences of marriage, in relation to property, legitimation of children, hignamy, etc., grow out of the civil marriage, and the other (or ecclesiastical) is left to the option of the parties. The Catholic Church endures this with great willingness; and in this feeling the Concordat between Austria and the Church, which restored the civil right, which was abolished in 1869 (comp. Richter, Kirchenrecht, § 263, 5th ed.). We thus are brought to the question of the relations of the state in right reason to the marriage-contracts of its citizens. Here, before touching the particulars that are within the province of state-law, we wish to make two points in regard to the office of the state: 1. Marriage is a contract, because it is an agreement between two persons to live together in the condition of life called marriage. But, while in most other cases the contract creates or specifies the rights of the parties, in the contract of marriage the character of the contract is presupposed, and the contract has nothing to do except to introduce two persons into a definite specific state. Out of this grows the peculiar state of patrige. This, it seems to us, is one of the greatest points in hand against the institution of "Free-love." The result of the marital relation is a character that does not admit of the dissolution of the contract when once it has been entered into. The offspring requires the care of both the parties, as is clearly seen in the case of second marriages with children from the one before. Thus there can be no contract to enter into a marriage state which is terminable by the consent of the parties, or dependent on the pleasure of either. There may be partners; of this kind, as contracts of service or of agency, for the performance of specific acts for a specific time, but there are no such contracts of marriage. This institution is unlike the passing business relations of life, and resembles the Church and State unions more closely, although not entirely. The reason for all this is the moral nature of the institution, and its immense importance as the foundation of the family as well as the origin of the state. Just as the civil law of property requires marriage at first considered a "vir et mulieris conjunctio individuorum vitas consequtudinem continens" (to which canon law adds, "i.e. talen se in omnibus exhibere virum, quals ipsas sibi est, et se et conuerso"), or a "conspersionis omnis vitae, divini et humani juris", 1667, p. 41, re Quite a different tendency, however, is found in the attempts of some modern philosophers to establish free-marriage, as e.g. the St. Simonistes (q. v.), who would overthrow all these laws, and make marriage a mere human convention subject to all the rules of the contracting parties and who have failed hitherto from this very case, as has also the pretended emancipation of woman which has gone hand in hand with it. The higher nature of marriage over any other human institution at once dismisses itself not only in the fact that it has at all times been connected with religion, both as to its contracting and dissolving, but that this view has been in no wise confined to Christendom, but in a great degree has taken a like hold upon heathen communities also.

2. Our other point is that on account of the moral and religious influence of any state, which receives a new concurrent power over it; that is, they both may act and lay down principles in regard to matrimonial questions. How are their provinces to be distinguished? In this way, as it seems to us: The State can require nothing which the Word of God forbids in a Christian country, although it may forbid what the Word of God does not forbid. The Church can allow nothing permitted by the law, which the Word of God forbids. For illustration, we may suppose the State to have very loose divorce laws, or to have no penalty for concubinage during regular marriage; the Church must keep its members pure in such respects, until its protest, loud or silent, shall change the current of legislation.

2. II. These things being premised, we proceed to a brief discussion of some of those points relating to marriage which may be reasonably made the subjects of legislation without violating the feelings of Christians or opposing the authority of the Scriptures.

1. The State may decide who shall be capable of contracting marriage. Thus (a) the age at which, or the state of the parties to, the marriage, may be legally made, is as much within the control of the law as the similar conditions necessary for making business contracts or for exercising political rights. If minors are allowed to enter into this condition, the law ought to provide that their free consent is ascertained beforehand. Thus, too, incapacity to give consent, by reason of immaturity, force on the will, insanity, idiocy, and the like, may be obstacles. But (b) far more important is the control of state-law over the degree of relationship and affinity which shall incapacitate persons to marry. Here we find that, although the children of the first pair must have united in wedlock, it became the very decided feeling of a large part of the human race that such a union is unlawful for with brothers or sisters, or for a parent and a child. H. W. J. Thiersch (Das Verstande der Ehe [Nüdlingen, 1869] (p. 4)) remarks that wild heathen tribes in Asia and Africa consider incest a crime. Exceptions to this occurred in Persia and Egypt, where incest was practiced within the reigning families—in the latter country after the example of Sires and Osiria. At one time the law in India required that the mother of a new born child should be a bride who had not been married to another man, and adoption was no obstacle to the union of an adopted brother and sister. The Romans were more strict, but allowed this relation to commence between an adopted brother and his adopted sister, after the adoption was dissolved by emancipation. By Roman law a man could not marry his sister's daughter, but when the emperor Claudius took Agrippina, his brother's daughter, to wife, that relation became permissible (see Gal. Inst., i, § 61, 62). By Levitical law the prohibited degrees embraced the direct relatives in the ascending and descending line, whether of full or of half blood. The marriage of a brother to his sister, of brothers or sisters of fathers or mothers, brothers' wives, daughters-in-law, a woman and her daughter, or other descendant in the third generation, and the sister of a wife during her lifetime. It would seem that in Lev. xviii, where these rules are given, the analogy derived from relations there mentioned may be applied to others equally close, of which nothing is said (comp. Salschütz, Mos. Rech., cap. 105, §§ 6). In the Christian Church a stricter system of prohibited degrees was a part of canonical law, and a sign of the new feeling was that the emperor Theodosius I forbade by law the marriage of first cousins, which was formerly by Roman law permitted. The Roman Catholic and the Greek churches went far beyond this. The Latin Church carried the prohibition of marriage to the seventh degree, that is, to the sixth cousins—counting brothers and sisters of the first, and first cousins of the second—until Innocent III, in 1216, gave a new rule that the "prohibito copulare conjugalibus quattuor consanguinatis et affinitatis gradum non excedat"—that is, third cousins might marry; but a little while after Gregory IX so modified this rule that a marriage between a third and a fourth cousin was allowable. Where pressing reasons demanded, these rules might be suspended. More severe and worthless were the rules prohibiting marriage, on the ground of affinity, which reached to the seventh degree, to the rules affecting blood-relatives, and were altered together with them. Other restrictions touching spiritual affinities, betrothal, etc., were mitigated by the Council of Trent. According to the canons of the Greek Church, a man may not marry:

- His second cousin's daughter.
- His deceased wife's first cousin's daughter.
- His deceased wife's second cousin.

Two brothers may not marry—

- Two sisters.
- An aunt and a niece.
- Two first cousins.

A man may not marry—

- His wife's brother's wife's sister, i.e. his brother-in-law's sister-in-law.
- His brother-in-law's wife: nor can his own brother marry her.

Godparentage and Adoption constitute impediments to marriage up to the seventh degree. See Affinity. What was the feeling lying at the bottom of all these prohibitions? It must have been that which led the Roman lawyer Gaius (c. § 69) to say that if such persons were parents and children marry another nefarias nuptias contraeuxisse dicentur. Incest is the greatest unchastity, from which its Latin name comes, and men early felt this. If the children of the first parent did not partake of this sentiment, there is a parallel in the treatment of the insane, whose modesty is developed just at the time of life when it is needed for a moral protection. Besides this moral principle, it might be urged that to marry out of one's near relationship binds families together, and diverts the feeling of brotherhood through neighborhoods and tribes. This is urged by Cicero (De Leg., xv, cap. 16). Another consideration is, that the marriage of near relations promotes neither the health nor the multitude of offspring. In a letter imputed to Gregory the Great (A.D. 601), written to his missionary in England, Augustine, he is made to say, while urging the marriage of distant cousins, "We have learned from experience that from such a marriage offspring cannot grow" (Gratian's Dec. caus. xxv, quaest. 5, c. 2). This is in conformity with a physical law which governs the issue of animals. Hay, plants themselves, it is now known, are benefited by the pollen of one flower being conveyed to another, and it is the office of insects, such as bees and flies, to mediate in this keeping up the "breeds" of the vegetable kingdom. (c) Besides enacting laws against the marriage of blood-relations, states have sometimes prohibited men from marrying that they themselves or their ancestors sustained to them the closest degrees of affinity. Some Protestant countries make it unlawful to marry a wife's sister. There are no valid arguments against such unions from Scripture, but rather, when it is said (Lev. xviii, 19) that a man shall not have two sisters together as wives, the text's inference is that Jewish law allowed marriage to one of them after the death of the other and preceding wife. Marriage to a brother's widow or deceased husband's brother is more doubtful. Yet in the canonical law, where such unions are forbidden, the pope can probably give a dispensation from the rule. Such was the case of Henry VIII of England, and a canon of the Council of Trent (see. xxiv, De sac. matrim. can. iii) ordains that if any one shall say that the Church cannot give a dispensation in the case of some of the prohibitions in Leviticus, xiv., "anathema sit"—evidently referring to that very case which blew up such a flame in England.

On the whole, there are no certe fines within which the moral feeling and the law—which in this case is more or less controlled by such feeling—can be confined. We have seen that, according to the time of the consanguinity rights, where the law has to make the positive and actual metes and bounds. Thus there is a time in the life of a child when he ought to acquire a jural capacity, and so become legally independent of his father; but whether this shall be reached at the age of eighteen or twenty-one, or shall be reached by degrees or all at once, the reason of a state must determine. So the moral feeling of a state must determine within what limits of consanguinity or of affinity parties may contract marriage; and if the Church has another prevailing sentiment, it must have its own rules prohibiting for its members what the state does not prohibit.

We will just mention, with little or no remark, several other hindrances which either State or Church law have put in the way of wedlock. Such are fraudulent representations of either party, which were leading causes of the contract of marriage; mistakes affecting the identity of the person; and previous crime of one party unknown to the other, especially previous adultery; to which is to be added difference of religious confessions, especially when so great as that between a Jew and a Christian, or between a Protestant and a Catholic. Indeed, in the case of mixed marriages (see below), there is still much conflict between the legislation of Church and State. Civil law in countries where slavery was allowed made all marriage unions between freemen and slaves unlawful. In some countries marriage between a noble and an ordinary citizen or peasant has been either forbidden or attended with civil disabilities, such as degradation of rank to the offspring. Here it may not be out of place to allude also to the regulations of the Romish Church in the case of persons who may marry, and the vow of celibacy of those who may not marry, who have not yet entered the convent, pope Boniface VIII decided that marriage may be contracted; after having once entered the convent, the contract becomes illegal. Among Protestants, however, the taking of the vow of celibacy remains a question of conscience only. Another obstacle to marriage in the Roman Catholic Church is spiritual relationship, cognotio spiritualis, which prevents marriage between persons who have held one another at the baptismal font. In the 18th century this was made to include both the infant baptized and the children of the sponsors, as well as the sponsors themselves; but it has since been restricted. The Continental Reformers as early as the Smalcald articles declared against this impediment of the sponsors. In the Greek Church, as we have seen above, Godparenage and adoption constitute impediments up to the seventh degree.

In order to preserve the purity and peace of married life, the State has often passed rules making all sexual union of either the husband or the wife with a third party penal, and the Church will of course view such acts as violations of its members with severity and discipline. Some states in their laws have punished the concubinage or illicit intercourse of a husband with an unmarried woman less severely than similar offenses of a wife, or, it may be, has let them go unpunished. According to Roman law, adultery was a crime committed only with a married woman; but a wife, displeased with her husband's morals, could without difficulty obtain a divorce. Under English law adultery has not been treated as a public crime, the dealing with it being left to the ecclesiastical law, and "the temporal courts take no cognizance of it otherwise than as a private injury." (Blackstone's Comment, bk. iv, chap. 4).

In our country it is visited with punishment according to law in almost all the states—New York, which has followed English law, and one or two other states, being exceptions; but it is safe to say that prosecutions for the crime of adultery are very rare indeed. The protection afforded by such laws is very small, except so far as they testify that society regards crimes against marriage as deserving of civil penalties.

Both the man and the guardian of the family, as the protector of the wife's and the children's rights even against the husband and father, is bound, and has in no civilized country refused, to make laws touching the posterity patris postestas—the husband's rights over and obligations towards the wife; his obligations especially to support his wife and children, and the amount of freedom he ought to have in transmitting his property. We do not intend to enter into this large subject, except so far as to say that there lies a feeling of the unity of family life at the foundation of all righteous law on these subjects, whatever may be the specific rules of this or that code. The family being one, the wife ought to be deprived of no more than the children of a portion of a deceased husband's effects; so that the right of testament in his case, even if he acquired all his property himself, ought not to be absolutely free.

4. The moral feeling of the importance and sanctity of marriage lies also, in a measure, at the foundation of laws and usages regulating its commencement. Such are betrothal, the formal declaration before a registrar or other officer of an intention of marriage, the publication of the intention or the publication before the witnesses and with appropriate formalities. Marriage having a religious side, it has been natural that the ministers of religion should have a part in its initial solemnities. But it is a great grievance that they are obliged—as the law of Prussia, we believe, requires of them—to unite in wedlock any persons who may by law be lawfully united, whether the minister's own views touching the lawfulness of marriage after divorce agree with those of the government or not; and it is another grievance when only the ministers of an establishment can solemnize marriages. Civil marriage, on the other hand, as it exists in some Catholic countries, and marriage before a magistrate or justice of the peace, which is lawful to a great extent throughout the United States, have this great evil attending on them: that they look on the civil side of marriage exclusively. Surely that institution which is the foundation of the state, the guardian of children against evil influences until they can act their part in the state; in which, and in which alone love presides over the formation of character; from which, through the sympathies of kindred, chords are in all directions binding and uniting society together, where the seeds of religion are sown in the impressible heart—such an institution surely, which parents feel to have a sacred quality, and place under the protection of their gods, ought to have a solemn beginning, so that the parties to be united in "holy matrimony," and the witnesses, may feel that it is a deeply serious transaction—a relation not to be lightly assumed without forethought and preparation, and solemn consecration to one another, and earnest prayer to God who has said that "they twain shall be one flesh."" HILL.

In this marriage, if the husband is dead, and the wife is different from that taken by the State, it cannot sanction the remarriage of a person whom it regards as bound by Christ's law to a former wife or husband. See Divorce.

1. Some of these obstacles to marriage are of such a nature that a marriage actually commenced in disregard of or in ignorance of the law is either voidable or a nullity. There is, however, a need of some formal proceeding by which the nullity is made manifest. There are others in which the innocent party may continue the marriage, and condone or consent to live with the offender; nor can such consent be afterwards withdrawn in order to make good a claim which has been once waived. Near relationship or affinity, the existence of a previous wife or husband, are instances of the first kind; impotence, mistake, previous misconduct, even fraudulent statements procuring marriage, are instances of the second. In the first case the marriage is void, in the second it is voidable. We are apt to call separations for either reason divorces, and our statutes in many state-codes group them with divorces properly so called; but there is a wide difference between separations on the ground of conduct and those on the ground of divorce proper on the ground of some event occurring after actual marriage. In the first case there was a form without the reality of marriage, and the court—civil or ecclesiastical—pronounced a decree of nullity, which did not affect the children nor the parties up to the time of the sentence. Being decided to have never been united in wedlock, they were free to enter into this union with third parties. See Woolsey, On Divorce, etc., p. 128, 129, and especially Richter's Kirchenr. § 286—284, 6th ed.; Göschel, in Herzog's Recht-Encyklopädie, vol. iii.

2. In regard to the lawfulness of remarriage in general, we must refer to the article on Divorce (Christian Law of) in this Cyclopædia. On the particular point of marrying again after a first wife's or husband's decease, we have room for a few remarks. That this is lawful in itself, and must not be left to the conscience and the circumstances of individuals, there can be no question, after what the apostle Paul has said in Rom. vii., 1—4, and in 1 Tim. v., 14, in which latter passage "the younger women" evidently refers to the young widows just brought up to marriage. The Second Epistle to Timothy, p. 172, edit. Otto) is both unscriptural and weak where he says that a second marriage is "decorous adultery," and applies the words of Christ (Matt. xix, 9) to such remarriages, adding that he who depriives himself of (or separates himself from) a former wife, even if she be dead, is a covetous adulterer who transgresses the direction of God, since in the beginning God made one man and one woman. Similar views are entertained by Tertullian in his treatise De monogamia, which was written after he became a Montanist (comp. esp. cap. x); and in the treatise De Adulter. While he left the Catholic Church, he does not condemn remarriage, although he praises widowhood. Most of the fathers, while, from the times of Hermas and of Clement of Alexandria, they regard remarriage as no sin, look on widowhood and the state of a widower as capable of higher virtue. Augustine thus expresses his opinions in his little work De bono vita, written at the request of a widow named Juliana, whose daughter had chosen a virgin's life. "As the good thing of virginity which your daughter has chosen does not condemn you, your own remarriage, so your country together with the Church does not condemn the second marriage of some one else."... Do not so extol your good thing as to accuse that which is not evil belonging to another, as if it were evil, but so much the more rejoice in your good, the more you perceive that not only evils are prevented by it, but that it surpasses some good things in excellence. The evil things are adultery and fornication. Now from these ill things arises the “divorced who by a free will has bound herself, and thus has brought to pass not by the power of law, but by the purpose of love, that for her not even lawful things should be lawful.” See Digambras; Celibacy.

But if the Apostle Paul could even advise young widows to marry again, must not this be understood as if he thought this the less of evils, and only necessary to save the persons in question from crime? How otherwise can we explain his directions that a bishop, and also a deacon, must be the husband of one woman only? (1 Tim. iii. 12; Titus i. 6)? We have already explained these directions as forbidding polygamy—that is, simultaneous polygamy, to speak technically—which would seem to imply that among the private members of the Church at Ephesus and in Crete such plurality of wives was allowed. But the words in 1 Tim. v. 9, where the qualification occurs that the aged widow in question must have been the wife of one man, forbid such an interpretation, for otherwise we should have to suppose that polyandry was practiced. The phrases are exactly of the same form in all the four cases, and it is the dispensing of the lowest possible condition of marriage by the law of yggavisse to be joined to “sixty years” (comp. Luke ii. 42). The sense, then, must be that the bishop, or deacon, or widow had not been married but once. Now this was a special precept suited to the state of life of the times, for in marrying more than once they might have broken their heathen condition or have married divorced persons contrary to the law of Christ. Of these irregularities, if they had married but once, there would be less probability.

IV. Many one-sided and erroneous opinions must arise when marriage is so tied up in one of its aspects or relations. Thus it may be said to exist leborum guerrdororum causae; but if that is the only side on which we view it, we shall have to say that no marriages ought to be contracted when the woman is past the age of child-bearing. It may be put on the foundation of restraining and moderating those sexual desires which might otherwise imbrute men. But if this were the only reason for marriage, it would be at the best but a necessary evil. It may be said to be instituted for the happiness of the partners in the union; but if this were all, every disappointed man or woman would have the opportunity to place his or her affections on a new object. It may be said to be in the interest of the highest religious union, but a Christian wife has never felt it to be right for this reason to leave a husband merely because he is unconverting. We must, then, look at marriage from its social and religious aspects; on its relations to sexual differences; to the birth and education of children; to its use in cementing the State together through the ties of kindred; to the love that will almost of course subsist between the married couple; to the field which it affords for the highest social and spiritual life of husband, wife, and family. It ought to be added also, as a point of no small importance, that the jural relations of marriage are determined by the moral convictions of men, and that thus Christianity, by purifying the moral sense, and by giving forth a nobler idea of marriage, has ennobled and strengthened civil law. Those nations have had the best moral habits where the sentiments regarding matrimony and the family were the purest. Witness the Romans of the earlier ages, to whom divorce was unknown, and among whom the matron was adored. The corruption of Roman morals first appeared, according to Horace, in the defilement of married life and the family:

"Facunda cupisse secula nuptias Primum inquinasve et genus et domos."

And so, our Christian Church is now so weakened in so many ways, the laws of marriage are thus already in many places impaired, yet there is no need to fear, for marriage is also doing great evil in this country. In fact, a state of things now exists which our fathers hardly dreamed of, and which makes reflecting men tremble for the future. Rash and ill-sorted marriages have always been, but where there are no laws, so loose as to be opposed to the very idea of marriage, to be an easy door to get out of an uncomfortable relation, the tendency is that parties will marry with divorce before their eyes, and that, instead of forbearance and patience, they will magnify their present evils, and give to one another only another one. In the old times there were few who did not look upon large families as a blessing; at present it is established beyond doubt that a multitude of women, in one part of the country, regard children as an evil to be prevented or avoided, and do actually use the means for such flagitious ends. See Sinfarthritis. Some of these are communicants in Christian churches, as physicians assert who profess to know. This shows that the very notion of marriage in many minds is a degraded and a corrupting one—that this union is entered into as an honest way of gratifying the low instincts of the lowest possible condition of human procreation, without any moral purpose. Nor are there wanting representatives of these base views, who practice upon them in their communities and defend them before the world. Who will question that the extreme of ancient asceticism, which gave to the word chastity the sense of rigid abstinence, as we give to the word temperance; the same perverted meaning, was infinitely nearer to the Christian standard, in fact to any respectable pagan standard of morals, than feelings which can tolerate such practices? That they can exist and even be common is an alarming sign for the future of the country. The duty of the Church and every woman needs to be enlightened on a point of morals which can hardly be referred to from the pulpit. We ought not to hear Catholics twit the Protestantism of the country with winking at methods of preventing the increase of families. We ought to strike at that extravagance of living and showiness of dress which tempt the less wealthy to such things. We ought to hear from every quarter where the subject can be mentioned that "they who do such things cannot inherit the kingdom of God." (T. D. W.)

MARRIAGE

Ehe; and for early literature, Walch, Bib.d., and for English writers, especially on this subject, Malcolm, Theol. Index, s. v. For modern half or left-hand matrimony in Christendom, see MORGANATIC MARRIAGE. For marriage as a sacrament, see MATRIMONY.

V. Marriage with Betroters.—The importance of regularity and uprightness in religious principles was, according to the record of the Old Testament, practically recognised at a very early period. Indeed, the corruption of manners which rendered the Flood necessary is directly traced to such mixed marriages (Gen. vi, 1-4).

The intermixture, by marriage, of the professed servants and worshippers of God, with those by whom civil authority was disowned, was first branded, and afterwards positively forbidden by divine authority; being denounced as an evil, the results of which were most injurious to the interests of religion, and which exposed those who fell into it to the consign and awful displeasure of the Most High (Exod. xxxiv, 16). Now, although there were some circumstances attending the marriages in this manner denounced which do not directly apply to the state of society in our own country (especially the circumstance that the people with whom such marriages are forbidden were not always described as such), it is much, as must be evident to every pious observer, that illustrates the sin and danger of forming so intimate and permanent a union in life with the ungodly. The general fact is hence clearly deducible that there is an inordinate attachment in marriage strongly affecting the character, which descends not only from those without the influence of moral rectitude and improvement much of caution as to the manner in which their affections are fixed; and that unequal alliance—-alliances where the parties are actuated by different spiritual habits and desires, and where good is made to meet and combine with bad, encountering most imminently the danger of seduction and pollution—-are guilty, unnatural, and monstrous. The expression of the divine authority, in application to the Jews, is to be regarded as comprehending the principle of his people in all ages, that here they ought not to walk in the counsel of the ungodly, nor to stand in the way of sinners.

What we thus are enabled to conclude from the Old Testament, will be still more distinctly exemplified from the New. The evangelical writings do not, indeed, frequently offer directions expressly on the subject of marriage, the point appearing rather to be assumed than argued, that in Christian marriage the husband and wife ought both, in the emphatic terms of the apostle Peter, to be and walk as being "heirs together of the grace of life." In the first Epistle to the Corinthians, the apostle deals at length with a question under these words:

That time to have been agitated—whether Christians who, previous to their conversion, had contracted marriages with unbelievers, ought not to be actually divorced from the wives or husbands remaining in unbelief, because of the evil and peril attendant the continuance of the alliance. Such an extreme, advocated by some, he considers as uncalled for (1 Cor. vii, 10-17).

But, respecting the formation of a new matrimonial connection by a believer (the case taken being that of a believing widow, though the rule, of course, extends to all), this is the direction: "She is at liberty to be married to whom she will, only in the Lord" (1 Cor. vii, 39).

Here is a simple proclamation, the force of which is permanent, and in submission to which Christians in every period should act. They are to marry "only in the Lord." They, being themselves "in the Lord"—united to the Lord Jesus by the divine Spirit, and possessing an interest in the redeeming blessings he has purchased—amy to marry only on Christian principles, and, of course, only such as are thus also "in the Lord"—believer with believer, and with none else. This is the obvious meaning of the passage, which no sophism can evade or fritter away.

It would be easy to employ the attention further, on the general statements contained in the Word of God, respecting the character of separation from the world which ought to be sustained by his Church, the ends for which it is called, and the objects it is bound to perform; statements which all bear on the principle as to marriage, operating to enforce and to confirm it (see especially 2 Cor. vi, 14-18; vii, 1). But, without amplifying here, and satisfying ourselves that this principle, the marriage, according to the record already quoted, a convincing and solemn establishment, the reader is requested to ponder a truth, which is as indubitable as it ought to be impressive, namely, that marriages formed by Christians in violation of the religious design of the institute, and of the express principles of their religion, are with evils many and calamitous, most earnestly to be deprecated, and most cautiously to be avoided. Is it, indeed, to be expected, on the ground of religion, that an act can be committed against the expressed will of the Most High God without expiring the transgression of those of his chastisement? Is it to be expected, on the ground of reason, that an alliance can be formed between individuals whose moral attributes and desires are essentially incompatible without creating the elements of unfruitfulness, discord, and disappointment? Excited imaginations, the passion of the moment; innocence and hope of escape, but religion and reason speak the language of unchangeable veracity, and are ever justified in the fulfilments of experience and of fact.

The operation of the evil results whose origin is thus deduced, is of course susceptible of several illustrations in domestic and social life; and, for many reasons, the degrees of public exhibition and of personal pressure may vary. 1. Yet it may be remarked uniformly, respecting these results—they are such as deeply affect the character. A reference has already been made to the moral influence of marriage, and as marriages stigmatised under the patriarchal, and forbidden and punished under the Jewish dispensation, were obnoxious on account of the contamination into which they led the professed people of God, so are the marriages of Christians with worldlings in this age, a worldly spirit being still the essence of idolatry to them, 1 Cor. vii, 4; Col. iii, 5; 1 John ii, 15-17; Matt. vi, 24), the objects of censure and depreciation, because of the benevolent effect they exert on those who are numbered among the redeemed of the Lord. Such marriages as these present constant and insatiable temptations to seduce Christians to worldly dispositions and pursuits; they enfeeble their spiritual energies; interfere with their communion with God; hinder their growth in the attainments of divine life; check and oppose their performance of duty and their pursuit of usefulness, in the family, in the Church, and in the world. Be it further remembered, that under the law known as marriage, which, if its original character were continued, did not pollute and injure. Some instances have been most palpable and painful; nor can it be considered otherwise than a truth, unquestionable and notorious, that whoever will transgress invades a very brightening of the soul. 2. It may be remarked respecting these results, again, they are such as deeply affect happiness. Christian character and Christian happiness are closely connected: if the one be hurt, the other will not remain untouched. And who sees not in the unhallowed alliance a gathering of the elements of sorrow? Are there not ample materials for secret and pungent accusations of conscience, that agitate the heart with the untold pangs of self-condemnation and remorse? Is there not reason for the bitterness of disappointment, and the sadness of forsaking?—the best is counted the least?—the truest affection is impossible—the noblest union is wanting—and the being on whom the spirit would repose is, to all that is the sweetest and most sublime in human sympathies, human joys, and human prospects, an alien and a stranger? And who is not filled with the horror of the situation which sets forth the event of a final separation at the bar of God, when, while the hope of personal salvation may be preserved, the partner of the bosom is seen as one to be condemned by the Judge, and banished whither ever they might Elasticsearch from his presence, and the

and the glory of his power! Oh the affutuance of the folly which leads to unites, where evils like these are created, rather than where God will sanction, and where time and eternity will both combine to bless! 8. Its effects upon what may be regarded as the supreme end of the marriage transaction, and the author of the Church interests, is another most disturbing consideration.

What must it be! What has it ever been! That much injury, therefore, has arisen to the public interests of the Church of Christ from this transgression cannot be doubted. Injury done to individual character is injury done to the community of which that individual is a part. It has been always a fact, that whoever sins in the household of faith, sins not only against himself, but against others; and that this transgression is one particularly extended in its influence, operating more than, perhaps, any one else which can be named to bring religion from its vantage ground, to clog its progress, and to retard its triump. See Conq. Mag. May, 1831; Malcolm on the Christian Rule of Marriage; H. More's Comic in Search of A Wife.

VI. Marriage Ceremonies.—In the early Christian Church marriages were to be notified to the bishop or society, and in the first centuries were solemnized by the clergy, but with very many exceptions. Much was borrowed from the customs of the Roman Law.
Banns were required about the 12th century. See Banns.
New laws sometimes moving this marriage ceremony seems to have existed in early times. Witnesses were required, and the dowry was settled in writing. The espousal or betrothal preceded, and tokens or pledges were given or exchanged. The ceremonies were to all appearances not regarded as essential by the early Christians, but were more of a conspicious and becoming and becoming, and when celebrated were observed as follows:
"The use of the ring, in the rites both of espousal and of marriage, is very ancient. It is mentioned both by Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria, the latter of whom says, It was given her, not as an ornament; but as a seal, to signify the woman's duty in preserving the goods of her husband, because the care of the house belongs to her." The crowning of the married pair with garlands was a marriage-rite peculiar to many nations professing different forms of religion. Tertullian involves a used it with the same ceremony, and he terminated it with cypress and vernal. The crown, appropriately so called, was made of olive, myrtle, and rosemary, variegated with flowers, and sometimes with gold and silver, pearls, precious stones, etc. These crowns were constructed in the form of a pyramid or tower. Both the bride and the bridegroom were crowned in this manner, together with the groomman and the bridesmaid. The bride frequently appeared in church thus attired on the day when proclamation of the banns was made. Chaplets were not worn by the parties in case of second marriage, nor by those who had been guilty of impropriety before marriage.
In the Greek Church the chaplets were imposed by the officiating minister at the altar. In the Western Church it was customary for the parties to present themselves thus attired. The wearing of a veil by the bride was brought from the Romans. It was also conformation to the example of Rebecca (Gen. xxiv). From this marriage-rite arose the custom of taking the veil in the Church of Rome. By this act the nun devotes herself to perpetual virginity as the spouse of Christ, the bridgegroon of the Church. It appears to have been customs-ary among the ecclesiastics to be called vita matrisfolis, pallium jugale, etc., and made of a mixture of white and red colors. Torches and lamps were in use on such occasions, as among the Jews and pagan nations. The festivities were celebrated by nun-ial processes going out to meet the bridal party under conducting him home, by nuptial songs and music, and marriage feasts. These festivities were frequently the subject of bitter animadversion by the fathers, especially by Chrysostom, and often called for the interposition of the author of the Church orders, is another most disturbing consideration.

For a considerable time the observance of a marriage-ceremony fell into desuetude among the Christians, to remedy which certain laws enforcing it were enacted in the 8th century. The ceremony now differs in different places. In Scotland, like all other religious services of that country, it is extremely simple, and is performed in the session-house, the residence of the minister, or private house of some friend of one of the parties. In Lutheran countries it is generally celebrated in private houses. In England, by the ancient customs prevailing, the customary prevailed as in Scotland until 1757, when, by lord Hardwicke's Act, a ceremony in a church of the state establishment was made necessary, and this continued till 1886, when the Dissenters succeeded in receiving permission to have a marriage ceremony. Continuation of two forms of contracting marriage: it may be with or without a religious ceremony; and, if with a religious ceremony, it may be either in the established church or in a dissenting chapel. If the marriage is to take place in an established church, then there must be either a license of the bishop or permission for three successive Sundays, or a license or certificate obtained, which dispense with such publication; and, in either case, seven or fifteen days' previous residence in the parish by one of the parties is necessary, according as it is a certificate or license respectively which is applied for. The marriage must take place in the church, the marriage-service of the Church of England being read over, and this must be done in canonical hours, i.e. between 8 and 12 A.M., in presence of two witnesses at the altar, before which, in the body of the church, the parties are placed after having been joined hands, and pledged their mutual troth, according to a set form of words, which they say after the minister; the man shall a ring to the woman, then lays it on the book, with the accustomed duty to the priest and clerk. The priest then, in the name of the bridegroom, in the person of the marriage, whom he instructs to put it on the fourth finger of the woman's left hand, and holding it there, to repeat the words, "With this ring I thee wed, with my body I thee worship, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow.
In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." The minister next joins their right hands together, and, after prayers and blessings, during certain parts of which the man and woman kneel before the altar, they are dismissed with the reading of a part of the Prayer-book, which points out the duties of the marriage state. If the marriage is celebrated in a dissenting chapel (as for that purpose it is allowed to must be duly licensed and registered, there must be present the superintendent-registrar of the district as one of the witnesses, but the dissenting clergyman may use his own or any kind of form of service. If the mar-rriage is not to be with any religious ceremony, then it must take place in the office of the superintendent-registrar, and in presence of witnesses, the essential thing being that both parties should in the presence of witnesses there exchange a declaration that they take each other for man and wife. The canonical hours must be attended to in all cases, and the blessing of the marriage residence by one of the parties in the district; but the condition of residence is often evaded. In all cases the fact of the marriage must be entered in a register, which register is kept by a public officer, and ultimately filed and kept in Somerset House, London, where a copy of the certificate of registration of every marriage in England can at all times be had for a small sum.

In the United States of America the customs of the Church of England are followed by the Presbyterian and Congregational churches, and measurably also by the Baptists. The Protestant Episcopal Church adheres closely to the practices of the Church of England, and from the latter the Methodist also, in a somewhat modified form, have copied it in this particular. Minor bodies of the Christian Church follow the practices of one or the other of the churches mentioned.

The laws of the several states differ somewhat as to the matter of marriage ceremonies, but they are adapted to the usages of all acknowledged Christian denominations, and recognize the validity of the most solemn performances, by a clergyman or magistrate, or by a simple contract before witnesses.

Peculiar usages are found in some of the Eastern churches of to-day. In Russia the bride and bridegroom hold a lighted taper in their hands in front of a sacred picture in the centre of the church. Rings are placed on their fingers, and, their hands being joined, they are led by the priest three times round the altar. Two highly-ornamented gild crowns are placed on their heads, and held over them by the groomsmen during the ceremony. They drink from thimbles three times, and, kissing one another, the ceremony is finished. The married couple then make the tour of the church, crossing themselves at and saluting each saintly image on their way. Weddings generally take place towards evening, so that immediately after the ceremony dinner commences at the house of the bride's father. At a marriage-feast lighted candles are placed in every position and corner possible. No other wine but champagne is drunk, and the quantity of this beverage consumed is remarkable. The dinner is followed by a ball, and the feasting is usually kept up for twenty-four hours. The custom of a honeymoon does not exist in Russia. The married couple spend the first few days of their married life with the bride's father. Shortly after the marriage the bride and bridegroom must call upon every one of their relations, friends, and acquaintances, and after this ceremony is finished they sink back into their ordinary life (Jesus at Home). For the Roman Catholic view of marriage, see MATRIMONY.

MARRIAGE, HEATHEN. Under this head, as being most akin to the ancient Hebrew, and perhaps best representing the general type of Oriental matrimonial law, we begin with.

I. Mohammedan.—The following description of this (condensed from Lane's Modern Egyptians) applies especially to Cairo, but will serve for a general illustration in most Moslem countries. To abstain from marrying when a man has attained a sufficient age, and when there is no just impediment, is esteemed by the Egyptians improper, and even deplorable. Oriental females arrive at puberty much earlier than the natives of colder climates. Many marry at the age of twelve or thirteen years; few remain unmarried after sixteen years of age. And when the age of thirty is attained at Cairo, or even earlier, a woman may be a mother. It is very common among the Arabs of Egypt and of other countries, but less so in Cairo than in other parts of Egypt, for a man to marry his first cousin. In this case the husband and wife continue to call each other "cousin," because the tie of blood is indissoluble, but that of marriage is very precarious, and may be broken. Most commonly the mother, or some other near female relation of the youth or man who is desirous of obtaining a wife, describes to him the personal and other qualifications of the young women with whom she is acquainted, directs his choice, and employs a woman whose regular business it is to assist men in such cases. The parents may betroth their daughter to whom they please, and marry her to him without her consent if she be not arrived at the age of puberty, but after she has attained that age she may choose a husband for herself, and appoint any man to arrange and effect her marriage. In the former case, however, the relations of a girl sought in marriage usually endeavor to obtain her consent to the proposed union. The bridegroom is generally expected to obtain the consent of the Bishath, and to show sufficient assets to meet the expenses of the marriage, and the features of his bride until he finds her in his absolute possession, unless she belongs to the lower classes of society; in which case it is easy enough for him to see her face. When a female is about to marry, she should have a betrothal contract drawn up in duplicate. This contract for her with her proposed husband. If she be under the age of puberty this is absolutely necessary; and in this case her father, if living, or (if he be dead) her nearest adult male relative, or a guardian appointed by will or by the magistrate, performs the office of deputy; but if she be of age she appoints her own deputy, or may even make the contract herself, though this is seldom done. After a youth or man has made choice of a female to demand in marriage, on the report of his female relations, and, by proxy, made the preliminary arrangements before described with her and her relations, a betrothal contract is drawn up, and is signed by the deputy. Having obtained consent to the union, if the intended bride be under age, he asks what is the amount of the required dowry. The giving of a dowry is indispensable. It is generally stipulated that two thirds of the dowry be paid in money, a cup three months, and, kissing one another, the ceremony is finished. The married couple spend the first few days of their wedding life with the bride's father. Shortly after the marriage the bride and bridegroom must call upon every one of their relations, friends, and acquaintances, and after this ceremony is finished they sink back into their ordinary life (Jesus at Home). For the Roman Catholic view of marriage, see MATRIMONY. ures; amen," after which all present repeat the same chapter. It is not always the same form that is recited on these occasions: any form may be used, and it may be repeated by any person; it is not even necessary, and is often altogether omitted. The contract concluded, the bridegroom sometimes (but seldom unless he be a person of the lower orders) kisses the hands of his friends and others there present; and they are presented with sherbet, and generally remain to dinner. Each of them receives an embroidered handkerchief, provided by the family of the bride. Before the persons assembled on this occasion disperse, they settle upon the night when the bride is to be brought to the house of the bridegroom, and the latter, for the first time, is to visit her.

In general, the bridegroom waits for his bride about eight or ten days after the conclusion of the contract. Meanwhile he sends to her, two or three or more times, some fruit, sweetmeats, etc.; and perhaps makes her a present of a shawl, or some other article of value. The bride's family are at the same time occupied in preparing for her a stock of household furniture and dress. The portion of the dowry which has been paid by the bridegroom, and generally a much larger sum (the additional money, which is often more than the dowry itself, being supplied by the bride's family), is expended in purchasing the articles of furniture, dress, and ornaments for the bride. These articles are the property of the bride, and, if she be divorced, she takes them away with her. She cannot, therefore, with truth be said to be purchased. The furniture is sent, commonly borne by a train of camels, to the bridegroom's house. Often among the articles is a chair for the turban or headdress. There are sometimes sent two of these chairs, one for the husband and the other for the wife. The bridegroom should receive his bride on the eve of Friday, or that of Monday; but the former is generally esteemed the more fortunate period. During two or three or more preceding nights the street or quarter in which the bridegroom lives is illuminated with chandeliers and lanterns (q. v.). An entertainment is also given on each of these nights, particularly on the last night before that on which the wedding is concluded, at the bridegroom's house. On these occasions it is customary for the persons invited, and for all intimate friends, to send presents to his house a day or two before the feast which they purpose or expect to attend; they generally send sugar, coffee, rice, wax candles, or a lamb; the former articles are usually placed upon a tray of copper or wood, and covered with a silk or embroidered kerschief. The guests are entertained on these occasions by musicians and male or female singers, by dancing girls, or by some other performance.

On the preceding Wednesday (or on the Saturday if the wedding is to conclude on the eve of Monday), at about the hour of noon, or a little later, the bride goes in state to the bath. In general the first persons among the bride's party are several of her married female relations and friends, walking in pairs, and next a number of young virgins. The former are dressed in the usual manner, covered with the black silk shawl; the latter have white silk shawls. Then follows the bride, walking under a canopy of silk, of some gay color, as pink, rose-color, or yellow, or of two colors composing wide stripes, often rose-color and yellow. It is carried by four men, by means of a pole at each corner, and is open only in front; and at the top of each of the four poles is attached an embroidered handkerchief. The dress of the bride during this procession entirely conceals her person. She is generally covered from head to foot with a red shawl, or with a white or yellow shawl, though rarely. Upon her head is placed a small paste-board cap or crown. The shawl is placed over this, and conceals from the view of the public the richer articles of her dress, her face, and her jewels, etc., excepting one or two ornaments, generally of diamonds and emeralds, attached to that part of the shawl which covers her forehead. She is accompanied by two or three of her female relations within the canopy; and often, when in hot weather, a woman, walking backwards before her, is constantly employed in fanning her with a large fan of black ostrich feathers, the lower part of the front of which is usually ornamented with a piece of looking-glass. Sometimes one procession, with a single canopy, serves for two brides, who walk side by side. The procession moves very slowly, and generally pursues a circuitous route, for the sake of greater display. On leaving the house it turns to the right. It is closed by a second party of musicians, similar to the first, or by two or three drummers. The whole bath is sometimes hired for the bride and her party exclusively. They pass several hours, seldom less than two, occupied in washing, sporting, and feasting; and frequently female singers are hired to amuse them in the bath: they then return in the same order in which they came. Having returned from the bath to the house of her family, the bride and her companions sup together. If singers have contributed to the festivity in the bath, they also return with the bride to renew their concert. Their songs are always on the subject of love, and of the joyous event which occasions their presence. It is on this night, and sometimes also during the latter half of the preceding day, that the bridegroom gives his chief entertainment. Love is the preceptor on the occasion before the bride, or, if it be large enough, in the court. The other and more common performances by which the guests are amused have been before mentioned.

On the following day the bride goes in procession to the house of the bridegroom. The ceremony usually occupies three or four hours. She arrives at the house of the bridegroom about an hour before the wedding, accompanied by her ladies (women of the third, or half the amount of that of a virgin. Among persons not of the lowest order, though in very humble life, the marriage ceremonies are conducted in the same manner as among the middle orders. But when the expenses cannot by any means be paid, the bride is paraded in a very simple manner, covered with a shawl, her hair (often greased), and surrounded by a group of her female relations and friends, dressed in their best, or in borrowed clothes, and enlivened by no other sounds of joy than their shrill cry, which they repeat at frequent intervals. The general mood of processions of the villages is different from those above described. The bride, usually covered with a shawl, is seated on a camel, and so conveyed to the bridegroom's dwelling. Sometimes four or five women or girls sit with her on the same camel, one on either side of her, and two or three behind her. The camel is usually covered with carpets or other drapery. She is followed by a group of women singing. In the evening of the wedding, and often during several previous evenings, in a village, the male and female friends of the bridegroom and bride are usually the only persons present in the mosque. The vigil is then broken, the bridegroom and his bride retiring to their separate apartments. A second group of musicians, with the same instruments, or with drums only, closes the procession. The prayers are commonly performed merely as a matter of ceremony; and it is frequently the case that the bridegroom does not pray at all. The procession returns from the mosque with more order and display, and very slowly; perhaps because it would be considered unbecoming in the bridegroom to hasten home to take possession of his bride. Soon after his return from the mosque, the bridegroom leaves his friends in a lower apartment, enjoying their pipes, and coffee, and sherbet. The bride and her mother and sister, or whatever other female relations were left with her, are above, and the bride herself and her companion in a separate apartment. If the bridegroom be a youth or young man, it is considered proper that he, as well as the bride, should exhibit some degree of bashfulness: one of his friends therefore carries him a part of the way up to the room. On entering the bride's apartment he gives a present to her companion, who then retires. The bride has a shawl thrown over her head, and the bridegroom must give her a present of money, which is called the gift. The bride, and her neighbors, are entertained in the apartment before she has opportunity to attempt to remove this, which she does not allow him to do without some apparent reluctance, if not violent resistance, in order to show her maiden modesty. The bridegroom now sees the face of his bride for the first time, and generally finds her nearly what he has been led to expect. He remains with her but a few minutes: having satisfied his curiosity respecting her personal charms, he calls to the women (who generally collect at the door, where they wait in anxious suspense) to raise the veil, they raise the veil, and the shrill sounds acquaint the persons before asked, as well as neighboring, neighborhood, residents, and invited by other women, spread still further the news that he has acknowledged himself satisfied with his bride; he soon after descends to rejoin his friends, and remains with them an hour or more before he returns to his wife. It very seldom happens that the husband, if dissatisfied in his bride, immediately disgraces and deserts her; in general he retains her a week or more, even if dissatisfied with her.

Marriages are sometimes conducted without any pomp or ceremony, even in the case of virgins, by mutual consent of the bride and groom, and the bride's family, or the bride herself; and widows or divorced women are never honored with a procession on marrying again. The mere sentence, "I give myself up to thee," uttered by a female to a man who promises to become her husband (even without the presence of witnesses, if none can easily be procured), renders her his legal wife, if arrived at puberty; and marriages with widows and divorced women, among the Moslems of Egypt, and other Arabs, are sometimes concluded in this simple manner. The dowry is very small, not more than a burning candle, or half the amount of that of a virgin. Among persons not of the lowest order, though in very humble life, the marriage ceremonies are conducted in the same manner as among the middle orders. But when the expenses cannot by any means be paid, the bride is paraded in a very simple manner, covered with a shawl, her hair (often greased), and surrounded by a group of her female relations and friends, dressed in their best, or in borrowed clothes, and enlivened by no other sounds of joy than their shrill cry, which they repeat at frequent intervals. The bride, and her neighbors, are entertained in the apartment before she has opportunity to attempt to remove this, which she does not allow him to do without some apparent reluctance, if not violent resistance, in order to show her maiden modesty. The bridegroom now sees the face of his bride for the first time, and generally finds her nearly what he has been led to expect. He remains with her but a few minutes: having satisfied his curiosity respecting her personal charms, he calls to the women (who generally collect at the door, where they wait in anxious suspense) to raise the veil, they raise the veil, and the shrill sounds acquaint the persons before asked, as well as neighboring, neighborhood, residents, and invited by other women, spread still further the news that he has acknowledged himself satisfied with his bride; he soon after descends to rejoin his friends, and remains with them an hour or more before he returns to his wife. It very seldom happens that the husband, if dissatisfied in his bride, immediately disgraces and deserts her; in general he retains her a week or more, even if dissatisfied with her.

Marriages are sometimes conducted without any pomp or ceremony, even in the case of virgins, by mutual consent of the bride and groom, and the bride's family, or the bride herself; and widows or divorced women are never honored with a procession on marrying again. The mere sentence, "I give myself up to thee," uttered by a ter these preliminaries, the bride was generally conducted from her father's house to the house of her bridegroom at nightfall, in a chariot (ฎิภุ่) drawn by a pair of mules or oxen, and furnished with a kind of couch (ελαβε) as a seat. On either side of her sat the bridegroom and one of his most intimate friends or relations, who from his office was called the paramymph (παραμυψήνων), as he held his head, as the bridegroom's marriage (γυμνα) with the bride and bridegroom, he was sometimes called the μαριγος. The nuptial procession was probably accompanied, according to circumstances, by a number of persons, some of whom carried the nuptial torches. Both bride and bridegroom (the former veiled) were received by the bride's relations and friends at their heads, and the doors of their houses were hung with festoons of ivy and bay. As the bridal procession moved along, the hymeneal song was sung to the accompaniment of Lydian flutes, even in olden times, as beautifully described by Homer, and the married pair received the greetings and congratulations of those who met them. After entering the bridegroom's house, into which the bride was probably conducted by his mother, bearing a lighted torch, it was customary to shower sweetmeats upon them (ἐπάνωσεσωρετα), as emblems of peace and friendship, which were now eaten at the marriage feast, to which the name γαμος was particularly applied; it was generally given in the house of the bridegroom or his parents, and, besides being a festive meeting, served other and more important purposes. There was no preliminary ceremony which took place in the civil or religious ceremony. There were no preliminaries with the celebration of marriage among the ancient Greeks, and therefore no public record of its solemnization. This deficiency was then supplied by the marriage-feast, for the guests were of course competent to prove the fact of a marriage having taken place. To this feast, contrary to the usual practice among the Greeks, women were invited as well as men; but they seem to have sat at a separate table, with the bride, still veiled, among them. At the conclusion of this feast she was conducted by her husband into the bridal chamber; and a law of Solon required that, on entering it, they should eat a kiss together, as if to indicate that their conversation ought to be sweet and agreeable. The song called the Επίθηλομελες was then sung before the doors of the bridal chamber. The day after the marriage, the first of the bride's residence in her new abode, was curtailed, so that the only ceremony of which their friends sent the customary presents to the newly married couple. On another day, the apalula (απαλλα), perhaps the second after marriage, the bridegroom left his house to lodge apart from his wife at his father's in-law. Some of the presents made to the bride by her husband were called the omphalos (ομφαλος) or λαυρίγα, as being given on the occasion of the bride first appearing unveiled; they were probably given on the apalula, or day after the marriage. Another ceremony observed after marriage was the sacrifice which the husband offered up on the occasion of his bride being registered among his own phratries.

The above account refers to Athenian customs. At Sparta the betrothal of the bride by her father or guardian (ερηπος) was requisite as a preliminary of marriage, as well as at Athens. Another custom peculiar to the Spartans, and a relic of ancient times, was the seizure of the bride by her intended husband, but of course with the sanction of her parents or guardians. She was not, however, immediately domiciled in her husband's house, but cohabited with him for some time clandestinely, till he brought her, and frequently her mother also, to his house.

The Greeks, generally speaking, entertained little regard for the female character. They considered women, in fact, as decidedly inferior to men, qualified to discharge only the subordinate functions in life, and rather necessary to complete that form of matrimony which was considered the only degree of rank. To these notions female education for the most part corresponded, and, in fact, it confirmed them; it did not support the elegant accomplishment and refinement of manners which permit occasionally to engage the affections when other attractions have passed away. Aristotle is that the relation of man to woman is that of the governor to the subject; and Plato, that a woman's virtue may be summed up in a few words, for she has only to manage the house well, keeping what there is in it, and obeying her husband. Among the Bithynians, however, and, especially at Sparta, women enjoyed much more estimation than in the rest of Greece.

2. Roman.—A legal Roman marriage was called justus nuptiae, justum matrimonium, as being conformable to justus (circile) or to law. A legal marriage was either cum benedicta civis (a italic) or without any ceremony at all. But both forms of marriage agreed in this: there must be connubium between the parties, and consent. The legal consequences as to the power of the father over his children were the same in both.

Connubium is merely a term which comprehends all the conditions of a legal marriage. Generally it may be stated that there was only connubium between Roman citizens; the cases in which it at any time existed between parties not both Roman citizens, were exceptions to the general rule. Originally, or at least at one period of the Roman Republic, there was no legal marriage between the patricians and the plebeians; but this was altered by the Lex Canuleia (B.C. 445), which allowed connubium between persons of those two classes. There were various degrees of consanguinity and affinity within the limits of which it was legal to contract marriage. An illegal union of a male and female, though affecting to be, was not a marriage: the man had no legal wife, and the children had no legal father; consequently they were not in the power of their reputed father. The marriage cum conventione differed from that sine conventione in the relation which it established between husband and wife; the marriage cum conventione was a necessary condition to make a woman a matres familiares. By the marriage cum conventione the wife passed into the family of her husband, and was to him in the character of a daughter, or, as it was expressed, in manum convenit. In the marriage sine conventione the wife's relation to her own family remained as before, and she was merely uxor. "Uxor," says Cicero, "is a genus of which there are two species: one is matres familiares, quae in manum convenit; the other is uxor only." Accordingly a materfamilias is a wife who is long, and in the family of her husband. A wife not in manu was not a member of her husband's familia, and therefore the term could not apply to her. Matrona was properly a wife not in manu, and equivalent to uxor: and she was called matrona before she had any children. But these words are not always used in those their original and proper meanings. It does not appear that any forms were requisite in the marriage sine conventione; and apparently the evidence of such marriage was cohabitation matrimonii causa. The matrimonii causa might be proved by various kinds of evidence. In the case of a marriage cum conventione, there were three forms: (1) Usus, (2) Forreum, and (3) Coemptio.

(1.) Marriage was effected by usus if a woman lived with a man for a whole year as his wife; and this was by analogy to usus as marriage by coemption is to marriage by ceremony. In such cases the law of the Twelve Tables provided that if a woman did not wish to come into the manus of her husband in this manner, she should absent herself from him annually for three nights (trinomium), and so break the usus of the year.

(2.) Forreum was a form of marriage in which certain words were used in the presence of ten witnesses, and were accompanied by a certain religious ceremony, in which panis farreus was employed; and hence this necessity of form is called auscultation, and the ceremony is a form of marriage by auscultation. It was the ceremony that certain priestly offices, such as that of Flamen Diaios, could only be held by those who were born of parents who had been married by this ceremony (civitates parentes).

(3.) Coemptio was effected by mancipation, and consequently the wife was in mancipio. A woman who was cohabiting with a man as uxor, might come into his mancibio; that is, into mancipation, in which case the coemption was said to be matrimonio causa, and she who was formerly uxor became opul maritum filio loco.

Sponsalia were not an unusual preliminary of marriage, but they were not necessary. The sponsalia were an agreement to marry, made in such form as to give each party a right of action in case of non-performance, or the party might not, and the offending party was condemned in such damages as to the judge seemed just. The woman who was promised in marriage was accordingly called sponsa, which is equivalent to promissa; the man who was engaged to marry was called sponsus. The sponsalia were of course not binding if the parties consented to waive the contract. Sometimes a present was made by the future husband to the future wife by way of earnest (arvha, arvha sponsalia), or, as it was called, proper magistus donatio.

The consequences of marriage were: 1. The power of the father over the children of the marriage, which was a completely new relation—an effect indeed of marriage, but one which had no influence over the relation of the husband and wife. 2. The liabilities of either of the parties to the contract was affected by the violation of the marriage union. 3. The relation of husband and wife with respect to property.

When marriage was dissolved, the parties to it might marry again; but opinion considered it more decent for a woman not to marry again. A woman was required by usage (usu) to wait a year before she contracted a second marriage, on the pain of infamia.

It remains to describe the customs and rites which were observed by the Romans at marriages. After the parties had agreed to marry, and the persons in whose presence the contract was to be concluded, a Vestal virgin was sometimes held at the house of the maiden for the purpose of settling the marriage-contract, which was written on tablets, and signed by both parties. The woman, after she had promised to become the wife of a man, was called sponsa, posta, dieta, or sperata. It appears that—at least during the imperial period—the man put a ring on the finger of his betrothed as a pledge of his fidelity. This ring was probably, like all rings at this time, worn on the left hand, and on the finger nearest to the smallest. The last point to be fixed was the date of the marriage to be taken place. The Romans believed that certain days were unlucky, and that the performance of the marriage rites, either on account of the religious character of those days themselves, or on account of the days by which they were followed, as the woman had to perform certain religious rites on the day after her wedding, which could not take place on a dies ater. Days not suitable for entering upon matrimony were the calends, nones, and ides of every month, all dies atrae, the whole months of May and February, and a great number of festivals. On the wedding-day, which in the early times was never fixed upon without consulting the auspices, the bride was dressed in a long white robe with a purple fringe, or adorned with ribbons. This dress was called tunica recta, and was bound round the waist with a girdle (corona, cingulum, or sones), which the husband had to untie in the evening. The bride’s veil, called flamamur, was of a bright yellow color, and her shoes likewise. Her hair was divided on this occasion with the point of a spear. The bride was conducted to the house of her husband in the evening. She was taken with apparent violence from the arms of her father or of the person who had to give her away. On her way she was accompanied by three boys dressed in the praetexta, and whose fathers and mothers were still alive (patrini et matrini). One of them carried before her a torch of white thorn (spina), or, according to others, of pine wood; the two others walked by her side, supporting her by the arm. The bride herself carried a distaff and a spindle, with wool. A boy called cuscilla carried in a covered vase (curnera, curnum, or cuscillum) the so-called utensils of the bride and playthings for children (sponsia). Besides those persons who were engaged in the ceremony, it was extended by a numerous train of friends, both of the bride and the bridegroom. When the procession arrived at the house of the bridegroom, the door of which was adorned with garlands and flowers, the bride was carried across the threshold by promaves, i.e. men who had been married on the occasion, who might not knock against it with her foot, which would have been an evil omen. Before she entered the house, she wound wool around the door-posts of her new residence, and anointed them with lard (adipsa suillsa) or wolf’s fat (adipsa lupanae). The husband received her with fire and water, which the woman had to touch. This was either a symbolic purification, or a symbolic expression of welcome, as the interdices aqua et igni was the formula for banishment. The bride saluted her husband with the words, Ubis tu Civis, ego Civis. After she had entered the house with distaff and spindle, she was placed upon a sheep-skin, and here the keys of the house were delivered into her hands. A repast (cosa nuptialis), given by the husband to the whole train of relatives and friends who accompanied the bride, proceeded. Ancient writers mention a very popular song, Talassae or Talassis, which was sung at weddings; but whether it was sung during the repast or during the procession is not quite clear, though we may infer from the story respecting the origin of the song that it was sung while the procession was advancing towards the house of the husband. It may be easily imagined that a solemnity like that of marriage did not take place among the merry and humorous Italians without a variety of jests and railleries; and Ovid mentions obscene songs which were sung by a man while he was laying on a bed, and which he gave after the company had left. These songs were probably the old Foscennia, and are frequently called Epikolo-meia. At the end of the repast, the bride was conducted by matrons who had not had more than one husband (promaves) to the Lectus genialis in the atrium, which was on this occasion magnificently adorned with flowers. On the following day the husband sometimes gave another entertainment to his friends, which was called repotides, and the woman, who on this day undertook the management of the house of her husband, had to perform certain religious rites; on which occasions a sacrifice of a white hart was made in the morning, and the woman was to select a day for the marriage which was not followed by a dies ater. These rites probably consisted of sacrifices to the Dii Penates.

The position of a Roman woman after marriage was very different from that of a Greek woman. The Roman presided over the whole household; she educated her children, watched over and preserved the honor of the house, and, as the materfamilias, she shared the honors and respect shown to her husband. Far from being confined, like the Greek women, in a cramped apartment (a matronoom, at least during the better centuries of the republic) occupied the most important part of the house, the atrium.—Smith, Dict. of Class. Ant., s. v.

III. Among the Hindoos. There are writers, perhaps we had better call them "fact gatherers" (comp. Müller, Ciba, ii, 262), who, not contenting themselves with the accomplishment of the task for which they are fitted, frequently go out of their way to cast a slur upon the Christian's belief, and to ridicule him for entertaining the thought that the Bible is the education of the human race. Yet the deeper the researches into the "primitive" condition of man, and the more intimate our relation with those nations who can claim a civilization outside of the pale of Christian teachings, the more stubborn appears the fact that Christianity alone assigns to woman a position of equality with man. The N. T. teaches "there is neither Jew nor Greek; there is neither bond nor free; there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." The Hindu's sacred writings, however, not only fail to make woman the equal of man, but thin and male, as being upon the plain, which still longeth for grass." "They exhaust," says Manly (Controversial India, ii, 158), "the catalogue of vice to affix its epithets to woman's nature—indul- lence, violence, deceit, envy, extreme avariciousness, an entirely want of good qualities, with impurity they aff- irm, are the innate faults of womankind." "Why," says Butler (Land of the Vedas, p. 470), "if my native friend had six children, three boys and as many girls, and I happened to inquire, 'Lalla, how many children have you?' the probability is he would reply, 'Sir, I have three children. I never would not think it worth while to count in the daughters.' Indeed, the Brahmin is taught that perfection is to be attained only, freed from the contamination of woman, in a pure ascetic state (Wuttke, Christian Ethics, i, 51). But let us not be misunderstood as conveying the impression that the law and custom in India is to look upon the brahman and the laity celibacy is a reproach in either sex. As among the Chinese (see below), "girls are not desired, not welcome;" and, when they come, they are either quickly done away with, where the English law does not interfer- ence); if they are not claimed by the parents, they are ig- nored, not despised. Arrived at the age of only seven, the age at which the Shastri pronounce the girl marriage-able, the unhappy parents begin to look about for an early opportunity to free themselves from the burden that is upon them by betrothal of the child. As all thought of this is usually left to the women and their relatives, the latter being the parents of the children. The poor girl has no choice or voice in her own destiny—all is arranged that her parents or any way whatever. "Courtship, in our Christian sense," says Butler, "the maiden in India cannot trust her to see or choose with whom she to whose control she will ever be long be handed over. She cannot write to him, for she can neither read nor write; all she is able to do is to follow the instructions to 'worship the gods for a good husband.' She is taught to commence at about eight years old, and her teachers and nurses are ad- dressed chiefly to Kama-deva (v.), the Hindu Cupi- did. . . . The maiden prays, and father and mother manage the business of selection. Each caste [see In- dian Caste] has its professional match-makers, whose aid is indispensable. When the negotiations have been a certain decision, the Pandits are consulted to avoid mistakes of consanguinity, and then the astrolo- gers, who pronounce upon the carefully-preserved horo- scopes of the boy and girl, whether they can be united with safety. These preliminaries all found satisfactory, the wedding ceremony is sought for by the family gods favor the union. The stars, the gods, and men being a unit, negotiations are opened between the parents and relatives as to the amount of gift and dow- ry, and, when conclusions are reached here to their mutual satisfaction, the astrologer is again called in to as- sure that the individual elements of the marriage are be registered, and a bond for the dowry executed. This is done with due solemnity, and then the astrologer has again to ascertain and name a lucky day for the cere- mony, which is accepted by the parents under their bond to see that the consummation of the engagement takes place. This is the usual method, slightly varied in different locali- ties" (p. 479, 480). No female child is expected to have gone beyond the age of twelve without the consumma- tion of an engagement. Woe be unto that family wherein a girl is past the age of twelve and yet unbe- trothed (Butler, p. 497). And yet what is the fate of the poor girl after she has actually found her mate? Marriage to the Hindu female means slavery in its most abject form. "The Hindu," says Manly (i, 154), "does not marry to secure a companion who will aid him in enduring the toils of life, or who will be trained to use- ful employment, he seeks only a slave who shall nourish (he thinks not of training) children, and abide in al- subject to his rule.

Betrothal with the Hindu being as binding as mar- riage (indeed, the word "marriage" is used to include both betrothal and our conception of the matrimonial alliance), the female child enters into a new state of existence im- mediately after the ceremony of betrothal. "Henceforth she is no more free to roam the fields and enjoy the lovely face of nature. Reserved for her husband, she can no longer be seen with propriety by any man save her father and brothers. She is from that day 'a purdah-nasini'—one who sits behind the curtains within the enclosure which surrounds her mother's home; and now com- mences her education, which, lasting for five or six years, may be epitomized in its entire curriculum under these four heads: cooking, domestic service, religion, and their peculiar female literature, to enter at last a state of dependence more strict, contemptuous, and humiliating, ordained for the weaker sex among the Hindus, than which there cannot easily be conceived another. Look into the life of the Hindu woman, where she has lived along and always announces to her lord that his meal is ready. He en- ters and sits down, and finds all duly prepared by her care. Why does she still stand? Why not sit down too, and share with her husband the good things which she has made ready. She dares not. He would not al- low her to sit, no how low it is. Her rank is held by the parents in their own hands. The poor girl has no choice or voice in her own destiny—all is arranged without consulting her views or affections in any way whatever. "Courtship, in our Christian sense," says Butler, "the maiden in India cannot never know. She is not allowed to see or converse with him to whose com-the woman who has had the good fortune to be the first wife takes precedence in rank; she remaining the mist-tress of the zenana—the Hindu harem.

Polyandry, strangely enough, has also established it-selves here. "This singular and amazing relation existed in Samskrit, and represented by the officiating Brahmin with the utmost rapidity, no one understands what is said.
The principal rites among the Brahmins are walking three times round a fire, and tying the garments of the parties together. The bride has also to make seven steps, at the last of which the marriage is complete.

The marriage is usually solemnized in the house of the bride's father. Thither the bridegroom proceeds, attended by his friends, and from thence conducts the bride to his home in a grand procession, usually by night, with torches and great rejoicings. On both occasions considerable expenditure is incurred in Feast the friends and relatives, and in providing ornaments, sec, processes, and illuminations. The wealthy spend freely on these objects, and the poorer classes of ten incur debts which burden them for many years.
These make the scene so splendid that what is celebrating a marriage, form a heavy item of Hindu expenditure, and one of the motives to female infanticide is doubtless laid in the desire to avoid this charge (Tre-

The marriage procession is thus described by Butler (p. 360). "Often when travelling at night in my palaquin, I have been roused from my sleep by my bearers catching sight of an approaching marriage procession, with its torches, music, and shouting; falling in with the enthusiasm of each event, they would cry out that my palanquin was naturally fit to be transformed into a bridegroom would make his appearance, mounted on a fine horse splendidly caparisoned—his own or borrowed for the occasion—and wearing a grand coat, decked out in tinsel and gold thread, with the matrimonial crown on his head, and his richly-embroidered slippers, all very fine, his friends shouting and dancing alongside of him, and, of course, as he passes, we make our salaam and wish him joy. Right behind the bridegroom's horse comes the palanquin of the bride, but she is veiled, and the veil so closely shut, and on the little lady is borne the groom whom she never saw before, to surrender herself into the hands of one who has never seen her nor own her; a bride without a choice, with no voice in her only destiny; married without preference; handed over, by those assumed to do all the thinking for her, to a fate where the feelings of her heart were never consulted in the most important transaction of her existence; beginning her married life under circumstances which preclude the possibility of her being sustained by the affection which is founded upon esteem. When the procession has come within halting distance of his home, the watching friends go forth to meet the bridegroom, the bride enter her apartments, the door is shut, and the guests are entertained in other parts of the establishmant."

IV. Among the Chinese and Japanese.—The Chinese are divided into a number of clans, each distinguished by a clan name. Of these clans there are from a hundred to a thousand, according to different authors. The law is that no man shall marry a woman of his own clan name. Thus relationship by the male line, however distant, prevents marriage. This rule is very ancient, its origin being referred by the Chinese to the mythic times of the emperors. The legendary emperor Fu-Hi, who reigned before the Hea dynasty, which, according to the Chinese annals, began in B.C. 2027, is said to have divided the people into clans, and established this rule regarding marriage (Tyler, Researches, p. 278).

We give the Chinese marriage customs at considerable length, as they are highly illustrative of Oriental usages in general.

As in all Eastern countries, the girl to be given in wedlock is not consulted in the choice of her future husband. The prohibitions against marriage are stronger among the Chinese than among other Nainese are firm believers in the sentiment to which the Western mind has given expression in the proverb that "Matches are made in heaven." To secure an alliance, a person is employed as a go-between or match-maker.
The negotiation is generally opened by the family of the bridegroom sending a deputation with a offer of —"a relic of the patriarchal custom. Occasionally, when a female child is born to persons in humble circumstances, it is given away to a family having a male child only; is reared by the latter, and, when the girl and boy have reached marriageable age, they are marinmary. Not unfrequently it occurs among wealthy families having a daughter that the custom of purchase is reversed, and a husband secured for a pecuniary consideration. The wealthy look with special favor upon the literary class, and not unfrequently great sacrifices are made to secure a scholarly husband. "It is not unfrequently occurs," says Doolittle (Chinese, i, 99), that a rich family, having only one daughter and no boys, desires to obtain a son-in-law who shall be willing to marry the girl and live in the family as a son. Sometimes the notice is seen in a newspaper by the parent of a certain man to find a son-in-law and heir who will come and live with him, perhaps stating the age and qualifications of an acceptable person. In such a case, the parents of those who have a son whose qualifications might warrant such an application, and whom they would be willing to allow to marry on such terms, are expected to make application by a go-between, when the matter would be considered by the rich man.

Sometimes the rich man makes application by a go-between to the parents of a young man whose reputation he is pleased with, and who perhaps may be a recent great name, but who is standing near the head of the list of sucseful competitors of the first or second literary degree.

Betrothal.—This among the Chinese is considered as binding as marriage, if the rites and observances have been carefully looked after. The final act in betroth-ment is the exchange of cards (for description, see Doolittle, i, 67). The time intervening between betrothal and marriage varies from a month or two to eighteen or twenty years, depending much on the age of the parties.
"From one to three months before the marriage a forts-nate is given to the bride, and the deputation for celebrating the marriage is usually a member of the family of the bridegroom, or a trusty friend, takes the eight oratory characters which denote the birth-time for each of the affianced parties, and for each of their parents, if living, to a fortune-teller, who selects lucky days and times for the marriage, for the cutting of the wedding garments, for the placing of the bridal bed in position, for the finishing of the curtains of the bridal bed, for the embroidering of the bridal pillovs, and for the entering of the sedan, on the part of the bride, on the day of her marriage. These items are written on a white sheet of paper by the fortune-teller, the family of the girl by the hands of the go-between.

If accepted, the periods specified become the fixed times for the performance of the particular indicated, and both parties proceed to make the necessary arrangements for the appropriating wedded garments, the wedding-cakes and material for the bridal dress to the family of the bride by the other party is next in order.
The relative time usually adopted for the performance of this custom is about one month before the day fixed for the marriage. The number of these 'cakes of cermemony,' or wedding-cakes, varies from several score to several hundreds. They are round, and about an inch high, weighing generally about one pound and ten or twelve ounces each, and measure nearly a foot in diamer. They are made out of wheat flour, and contain in the middle some sugar, lard, and small pieces of fat pork, mixed together in a kind of batter, and then cooked: the mixture is subsequently divided into small portions of different sizes and is also sent a sum of money, of greater or less amount, according to previous agreement; a quantity of red cloth or silk, usually not less than five kinds, for the use of the bride; five kinds of dried fruits, several kinds of small cakes, a cock and a hen, and a gander and a goose. The family of the girl, on receiving these wedding-cakes, proceeds to distribute them among their relatives and intimate friends. The small cakes are also distributed in a similar manner. The money sent is generally spent in outfitting the bride.

The day before the day fixed for the wedding, the family of the bridegroom again makes a present of various articles of food and other things to the family of the bride, as a cock and a hen, a leg and foot of a pig and of a goat, eight small cakes of bread, eight torches, three pairs of large red candles, a quantity of vermicelli, and several bunches of fire-crackers. There are also sent a girdle, a head-dress, a silken covering for the head and face, and several articles of ready-made clothing, which are usually borrowed or rented for the occasion. These are to be worn by the bride on her entering the bridal chamber, and to be returned to the family of the husband on the morning of her marriage. The food, or a part of it, including the cock, is to be eaten by her on that morning. The fire-crackers are for explosion on the road, and the torches are for burning during the time occupied on route to her new home. On each of the eight bread-cakes is made a large red inscription in an ancient form of writing, of an auspicious meaning, as 'longevity', 'happiness', 'official emolument', and 'joy'; or certain four of them have four characters, meaning 'the phonixes are singing in concert', or 'the ducks are swimming together'. Four of these bread-cakes are accepted; the remaining four and the hen, according to strict custom, are returned to the party which proffers them. The bread-cakes and the vermicelli are omens significant of good, owing to a play on the local sound of the characters which denote them, or in consequence of the shape of the article. The vermicelli is significant of 'longevity', because of its length; and the four bread-cakes reserved by the family of the bride are kept for a singular use on the morning of the girl's entering her bridal chair. Placing the bridal bedstead in the presence of her seat, to stand in an important ceremony. When the bridegroom is selected, and a few days before the wedding, the bedstead is arranged in some convenient place in the bride's chamber, and then for a considerable time it must not be moved, for fear of ill luck. This placing of the bedstead in position is a marriage ceremony, in which one of the principal ceremonies is that of the bridegroom and his parents to perform the ceremony indicated to the Chinese apprehension by the quilt and the cakes being retained in the house—the local sound of the common word for 'bread', and a certain word meaning 'to warrant', 'to secure', being identical.

Worship of Ancestors by the Bridal Party...—Usually the day before the wedding, the bride has her hair done up in the style of married women of her class in society, and tries on the clothes she is to wear in the sedan, and for a time after she arrives at her future home on the morrow. This is an occasion of great interest to her family. Her parents invite their female relatives and friends to a feast at their house. The professed object of trying on the clothing is to see how the articles provided will fit, and to ascertain that everything is ready, so that there may be no delay or confusion on the arrival of the hour when she is to take her seat in her sedan. While thus dressed (the thick veil designed to conceal her features on arrival at her husband's residence not now being worn), she proceeds to light incense before the ancestral tablets belonging to her father's family, and to worship them in the last time before her marriage. She also kneels down before her parents, her grandparents (if living), her uncles and aunts (if present), and worships them in much the same manner as she and her husband will on the morrow worship the ancestral tablets in the morning, for the purpose of the annual processions of the ancestral tablets belonging to his family. On the occasion of the girl's trying on these clothes and worshipping the tablet and her parents, it is considered unpropitious that those of her female relatives and friends who are in mourning should be present.

The bridal chair is selected by the family of the bridegroom, and sent to the residence of the bride generally on the afternoon preceding the wedding-day, attended by a band of music, some men carrying lighted torches, two carrying a pair of large red lanterns, containing candles also lighted, and one having a large red umbrella, and one or two friends or other attendants. The bridal chair is always red, and is generally covered with broadcloth, or some rich, expensive material. It is borne by four men, who wear caps having red tassels. The musicians employed in the procession have similar caps. Very early on the morning of her marriage the bride or the 'new woman' arises, bathes, and dresses. While she is bathing the musicians are required to play. Her breakfast consists theoretically of the fowl, the vermicelli, etc., sent by the family of her affianced husband. In fact, however, she eats and drinks very little of anything on the morning or during the day of her wedding. When the precise time approaches for taking her seat in her sedan, usually between five and eight o'clock in the morning, previously fixed by the fortune-teller, her toilet is completely finished, so that parents take her in their sedan and placing it over her head, completely covering her features from view. She is now led out of her room by one of her female assistants, and takes her seat in the sedan, which has been brought into the reception-room of the house. The floor of the sedan is covered for the occasion with a kind of red carpeting, so that her feet may not touch the ground. She takes her place in the sedan amid the sound of fire-crackers and music by the band. The bride, her mother, and the various members of her family, are required to custom to indulge during this morning in hearty and protracted crying...times, no doubt, sincere and unaffected. While seated in the sedan, but before she starts for her future home, her parents, or some members of her family, take a bed-quilt by its four corners, and, while holding it thus before the bridal chair, one of the bride's assistants tosses it into the air, one by one, four bread-cakes, in such a manner that they will fall into the bed-quilt. These bread-cakes were received from the family of her husband at the same time as the cock and vermicelli were received. The woman during this ceremony is constantly repeating, emitting only sighs, not intended to by some others of the company. The quilt containing these cakes is gathered up and carried immediately to an adjoining room. The object of this ceremony is explained to be to profit the family of the bride's parents with one of the main blessings of the bridegroom, to the manner indicated to the Chinese apprehension by the quilt and the cakes being retained in the house—the local sound of the common word for 'bread', and a certain word meaning 'to warrant', 'to secure', being identical.

Bridal Procession...—After these performances the bridal procession starts en route for the residence of the other party, amid explosions of fire-crackers and the music of the band. In the front of the procession go two men carrying two large lighted lanterns, having the ancestral or family name of the groom put in a large form out of red paper pasted upon them. Then come two men carrying similar lanterns, having the family name of the bride in a similar manner pasted on them. These belong to her family, and accompany her only a part of the way. Then comes a large red umbrella, followed by the lighted torches, by the band of music. Near the bridal chair are several brothers of the bride or friends of her family, and several friends or brothers of the groom. These latter are dispatched from the house of the groom early in the morning, for the purpose of accompanying the bridal procession and escorting the bride to her home. This deputation sometimes arrives at the house of the bride before she sets out on her journey, and, if so, it accompanies the procession all the way. About midway between the homes of the bride and the groom the procession stops in the street, while the important ceremony of receiving the bride is formally transacted. The friends of the bride stand near each other, and at a little distance from them, the friends of the groom. The former produce a large red card, having the ancestral name of the bride's family written on it; the latter produce a similar card bearing the ancestral name of the groom. They exchange, and each, seizing his own hands à la Chinoise, bows towards the members of the other party. The two men in the front of the procession who carry the lanterns having the ancestral name of the groom now turn about, and, going between the sedan chair and the two men who carry the lanterns having the ancestral name of the bride, come back to their former position in the procession, having gone around the party which has the lanterns with the bride's ancestral name attached. This latter party, while the other is thus encircling it, turns round in an opposite direction, and starts for the residence of the family of the bride, accompanied by that part of the escort which consisted of her brothers or the friends of her family. The rest of the procession now proceeds on its way to the residence of the bridegroom, the band playing a lively air. At intervals along the street fire-crackers are exploded. It is said that, from the precise time when the two parties have left the residence of the families, the names of the two families attached separate from each other in the street, the name of the bride is changed into the name of her betrothed; the lanterns having his name attached remaining in the procession, while those which have her (former) name are taken back to the residence of her father's family. From this time during the day she generally is in the midst of entire personal strangers, excepting her female assistants, who accompany the procession and keep with her wherever she goes. On arriving at the door of the bridegroom's house fire-crackers are let off in large quantities, and the band plays very vigorously. The torch-bearers, lantern-bearers, and the musicians stop near the door. The sedan is carried into the reception-room. The floor, from the place where the sedan stops to the door of the bride's room, is covered with red carpeting, lest her feet should touch the floor. A woman who has borne both male and female children, or at least male children, and who lives in harmonious subjection to her husband, approaches the door of the sedan and utters various felicitous sentences. If she is in good pecuniary circumstances, and if her parents have a learned family, she has so much the more to say. A boy six or eight years old, holding in his hands a brass mirror, with the reflecting surface turned from him and towards the chair, also comes near, and invites the bride to alight. At the same time the married woman who has uttered propitious words arrives as if to open the door of the sedan, when one of the female assistants of the bride, who accompanied the procession, steps forward and opens it. The married woman referred to and the boy are employed by the family of the groom, and receive a small present from the family of the bridegroom. This is considered proper and auspicious. The mirror held by the lad is expected to ward off all deadly or pernicious influences which may emanate from the sedan. The bride is now aided by her female assistants to alight. While being led towards the door of her room, the sieve which had been seated beside the door of the bridegroom on the arrival is sometimes held over her head, and sometimes it is placed directly in front of the door of the sedan, so that, on stepping out, she will step into it. The groom, on the approach of the bridal procession, by the agency of a servant or other person, conveys the groom's house, to the front of the residence of the bride, having his face turned towards the bed. When the bride enters the room, guided by her assistants, he turns around, and remains standing with his face turned from the bed. As soon as she has reached his side, both bridegroom and bride simultaneously seat themselves side by side on the edge of the bedstead. Occasionally the groom manages to have a portion of the skirt of her dress come under him as he sits down by minor tricks. This is no doubt a greater compliment to the bride than that she will be submissive. Sometimes the bride is very careful, by a proper adjustment of her clothing at the moment of sitting down, not only to prevent the accomplishment of such an intention on his part, but also to sit down, if possible, in a manner that some of his dress will come under her, thus manifesting her determination to preserve a proper independence, if not to bring him actually to yield obedience to her will. After sitting thus in profound silence together for a few moments, the groom arises and leaves the room. He waits in the reception-room for the reappearance of his bride, to perform the ceremony called 'worshipping the temple' (q. v.). Until this time the bride has worn the heavy embroidered outside garment, head-dress, etc., which she had on when she entered her sedan. These are now removed. She has her hair carefully combed in the style of her class in society, and she is arrayed in her own wedding garments. Sometimes her hair is gorgeously decked out with pearls and gems, true or false, according to the ability of the family to purchase, rent, or borrow. When her toilet has been completed, the bridegroom is expected to find her seated in the residence of the bridegroom, and the bridegroom sits down in their wedding dinner. He now, oftentimes for the first time in his life, and always for the first time on his marriage day, beholds the features of his wife. He may eat to his fill of the good things left over from the occasion, but she, according to established custom, may not take a particle. She must sit in silence, dignified and composed.

"The wedding festivities generally last at least two days. The first day the male friends and relatives of the groom are invited to 'shed their light' on the occasion. On the second day the female friends and relatives of the family of the groom are invited to the wedding feast: this is often called the 'women's day.' Not long after the family and guests have breakfasted on the morning of the second day, the newly-married couple, amid the noise of fire-crackers, come out of their room together for the purpose of worshipping the ancestral tablets belonging to the household, the grandparents, and parents of the groom. This custom is known by the name of 'coming out of the room.' In the case of those families who devote only one day to the marriage festivities and who have no female relations, so much the more to say on the first day. Not long subsequent to the ceremony of 'coming out of the room,' the couple proceed to the kitchen for the purpose of worshipping the god and goddess of the kitchen. This is performed with great decorum, and is regarded as an important and essential part of marriage solemnities. Incense and candles are lighted, and arranged on a table placed before the picture or the writing which represents these deities, plastered upon the wall of the kitchen. Before this table the bridegroom and his bride kneel down side by side, the bridegroom on the right, and the bride on the left. It is believed that they will thus propitiate their good-will, and especially that the bride, in attempting culinary operations, will succeed better in consequence of paying early and respectful attentions to these deities. On the third day the bride and her new husband go to visit the bride's mother-in-law and her husband and wife, and to visit their friends. With this invitation they send sedan for them. The card is usually brought by her brothers, if she has any of the proper age, or by relatives having her own ancestral name. Until this ceremony has been completed, the bride has been none of her own family, and generally none of her own relatives or acquaintances. She and her husband now receive the congratulations and compliments of her brothers or other relatives, and prepare to visit her parents. The bride enters her sedan first, and proceeds a short distance in front of her husband. These two then return together, and it is the custom that they should arrive at the house of her parents at the same time. The chair provided for the bride on this occasion is a common black sedan in all respects, except that its screen in front has a certain charm painted upon the outside. This charm is the picture of a grim-looking man, sitting on a tiger, with one of his hands raised up holding a sword, as if in the act of striking, representing a certain ruler of elves, hobgoblins, etc. The object of its use on the occasion of a bride's returning to her parents' house, on the third day after her marriage, is to keep evil and unpropitiously disposed spirits from her. On the way home at the maternal house, the bride's sedan is carried into the reception-room, and she alights amid the noise of fire-crackers. The sedan which contains the son-in-law stops a few rods from his father-in-law's residence, where he is met by one of his brothers-in-law, or some relative or friend deputed to meet and conduct him into the house. The two parties, standing in the street, respectfully shake their own hands towards each other on meeting, according to the approved fashion. The newly-arrived is now invited to enter the house. He is seated in the reception-room, where he is treated successively to coffee and tobacco, and then to coffee and tobacco again. Afterwards he is invited to go and see his mother-in-law in her room, where he finds his wife. There he sits awhile, and visits after a stereotyped manner, being careful to use only good or propitious words, avoiding any such which while they may be not good for those persons, are unlucky. He is soon invited into the reception-room, where he is joined by his wife. Everything being arranged, the husband and wife proceed to worship the ancestral tablets of her family. At the conclusion of this ceremony the bride retires to her mother's apartments, or to some back room, where she and the female relatives present are feasted. Her husband is invited to partake of some refreshments in the reception-room, in doing which he is joined by his bride's brothers, or some others of her family relatives. According to the rules of etiquette, he must eat but very little, however hungry he may be. The usual phrase employed in speaking of it is that he eats part of "three bowls of vegetables," after which he declines to receive anything more, under the plea that he has eaten enough. He soon takes his departure in his sedan, leaving his bride behind, and the saying that,"It is usual only by a servant or female friend. Husbands are never seen with their wives in public."

The marriage customs of the Japanese are so very like those of the Chinese that we have grouped them together. The custom of purchasing the wife is still more prominent amongst the Japanese than amongst the Asiatic nations. Polygamy is strictly forbidden. Though the harem is tolerated, only one lawful wife is recognized. "It appears, however," says MacFarlane (Japon, p. 268), "to be very easy for a man to put away his wife and take another—at least so far as any law exists to the contrary." The condition of woman is far better than in any other Asiatic country.

V. Among Savages.—Perhaps in no other way can the great advantages of Christian civilization be more conclusively shown than by the improvement which it has effected in the relations between the two sexes. The best students of the primitive condition of man have come to the conclusion that where divine revelation does not extend the institution of marriage, if it exists at all, it is by no means the outgrowth of affection and a desire for companionship, but is an institution into the male savages "as a mere animal and convenient connection" as the "meats of getting their dinner cooked." There is "no idea of tenderness nor of chivalrous devotion" (Hill, Traits of Chittagong, p. 116; comp. Pallas, Voyages, iv. 94). Indeed, according to Lapp, "among the Japanese, and perhaps the Papuans (or Tiones) the lowest races have no such institution as the marriage rite, because "true love is almost unknown among them" (p. 56). Kolben (Hist. Cape of Good Hope, p. 132), says: "The Hottentots are so cold and indifferent to one another that you would think there was no such thing as love between them." There are even some savages, as the North American Indian tribe, the Timnes, who have no word for "dear" or "beloved," and it is said of the Algonquins that when the Bible was translated into their language a word had to be coined to give expression to our verb "to love." There are other uncivilized races of men that lack greatly in words to express social relations, as, e. g., the Sandwich Islanders, who, according to Lacocke (Diction. Hopkins, and Van Houten, 2nd ed.), have no words answering to "son," "daughter," "wife," or "husband," that is, to the poverty of language, but to the fact that "the idea of marriage does not enter into the Hawaiian system of relationship."

Among savages, the peculiar idea attached to the bond of marriage makes the marriage ceremony rather an institution peculiar to them. As we have seen above, there are many rude people who do not recognise the symbol of marriage, and, naturally enough, no ceremony is known to them; and then there are many cases in which the marriage bond is recognised, but no ceremony of marriage performed. "But," says MacFarlane (Japon, p. 263), "we must not assume that marriage is necessarily and always lightly regarded where it is unaccompanied by ceremonial." In Tahiti, says Cook (Voyage around the World), "marriage, as appeared to us, is nothing more than an act of consent brought to the knowledge of the church, with which the priest has no concern. Where it is contracted it appears to be pretty well kept, though sometimes the parties separate by mutual consent" (comp. Klemm, Cultur der Menschen, iv. 299).

I. Ceremonies.—There cannot be said to exist any marriage ceremonies among the Badagas (Hindoozam); the Kurumbas, a tribe of the Neelgherry Hills (Transact. Ethnol. Soc. vii, 276); the Indians of California (Smithsonian Rep. 1868, p. 968); the Kutchin Indians, further north (Smith, Rep. 1866, p. 826); the Arawaks of South America (Brett, Guiana, p. 101), and the Brazilian tribes generally (Marquius, Reise zu Brasilien und seinen Umkreisern in Brasilien, p. 51); and the same is the case with the Australian tribes (Eyre's Discoveries, ii, 819). Speke (Journ, p. 361) says "there are no such things as marriages in Uganda," and of the Mandingoes (Wagstaff, 2nd ed.), Callot de la Fresnaye (1804) says that husband and wife are not united by any ceremony; and Hutton (in Klemm, Cultur, iii, 280) makes the same statement as regards the Ashantees. In Congo and Angola (Astley, Coll. of Voyages, iii, 221, 227) "they use no peculiar ceremonies in marriage, nor scarce troubles for ceremonies of any sort," and neither do we find that the Hottentots know anything about marriage ceremonies, if we may follow La Vaillant (Voy. ii, 58); nor do the Bushmen, according to Mr. Wood (Nat. Hist. Man, i, 269), have in their language any means of distinguishing an unmarried from a married girl. According to Dalton (Trans. Ethn. Soc. vi, 25), the Keriahs of Central India have no word for marriage in their own language, and the only ceremony used appears to be little more than a sort of public recognition of the fact. "The marital rite among our tribes" (i.e. the Redkinks of the United States), says Schoolcraft (JInd. Tribes, p. 182, 248), "is nothing more than the personal consent of the parties, without requiring any concurrent act of a priesthood, magistracy, or witnesses; the act is assumed by the parties without the necessity of any law or ceremony." Says Bruce (Trotrele, iv, 487), "no such thing as marriage in Abyssinia, unless that which is contrived by mutual consent, without other form, subsisting only till dissolved by dissent of one or the other, and to be renewed or repeated as often as it is agreeable to both parties, without any formal ceremony or celebration as man and wife, after having been divorced, had children..."

by others, or whether they have been married or had children with others or not." Among the Bedouin Arabs there is a marriage ceremony in the case of a girl, but the remarriage of a widow is not thought sufficiently important to deserve one.

2. Communal Marriage.—Bachofen and McLennan, two of the most devoted students of marriage among the savages, will have it that the primitive condition of man was one of Pureteitum, or, as it might perhaps be conveniently Englished, "communal marriage," where every man and woman in a small community were regarded as equally married to one another. Of course none of these arrangements will be set aside by the use of the word "primitive." It is not our province here to enter into a discussion on primeval man [see PREDADAMITE]; we use the word with reference to the lowest condition of unchristianized man, satisfied, as we stated at the beginning of our subject, that the marriage relation, as exists among civilized men, is due solely to the influence of divine revelation—man's noblest educator. The most extravagant form of communification we find related of the Techer of Oude. "They live together almost indiscriminately in large communions, and the property of the people is considered as matrimonial; the tie is but nominal" (Watson and Kaye, People of India, ii, 85). In the Andaman Islands, we are told by Sir Edward Belcher (Trans. Ethn. Soc. v, 45), it is the custom for man and woman to remain together until a child is born, when they separate as a matter of course, and each seeks a new partner. Among the Southals, one of the aboriginal tribes of India, marriages take place once a year, mostly in January. "For six days all the candidates for matrimony live together in promiscuous conchability, the introductory rite to the marital relation; for only after this are the separate couples regarded as having established their right to marry" (Watson and Kaye, i, 2). Among the Todas, of the Hawaiian race, when a man marries a girl, she becomes the wife of all his brothers as they successively reach manhood; and they also become the husbands of all her sisters, as they become old enough to marry. (Comp. here Ethn. Journ, 1867, p. 286, on a practice among the Sioux and other North American Indians.) Among the Greenland Eskimoes it is related that "those are reputed the best and noblest tempered who, without any pain or reluctance, will lend their friends their wives" (Egede, Hist. Greenland, p. 142). This custom of wife-lending is, however, by no means confined to the inhabitants of Greenland, but prevails among North and South American Indians, Polynesienses, Eastern and Western negroes, Arabs, Abyssinians, Kaffirs, Mongols, Tutsis, etc. (see Lubbock, p. 282), and is practiced especially as an act of hospitality. Plutarch will have it that the custom of lending wives existed also among the Romans. Nor must it be forgotten that it was held one of the essentials of the model Platonic republic that "among the guardians, at least, the sexual arrangements should be under public regulation, and the monopoly of one woman by one man forbidden" (Bain, Mental and Moral Science; comp. Kames, Hist. of Man, ii, 60). See also PROSTITUTIO. A very peculiar custom is found among the Nasca Indians (Amer. Anthro. p. 71). They practice what might be appropriately termed three-quarter marriage; i.e., the woman is legally married for three days out of four, remaining perfectly free for the fourth (Lubbock, p. 54). In Ceylon, according to Davy (Ceylon, p. 286), marriages are provisional for the first fortnight, at the expiration of which they are either annulled or confirmed. Among the Reddies of Southern India a still more singular custom prevails. "A young woman of sixteen or twenty years of age may be married to a boy of five or six years. She, however, lives with some other adult male—perhaps a maternal uncle or cousin—but is not allowed to form a connection with the father's relatives; occasionally it may be the boy-husband's father himself—that is, the woman's father-in-law. Should there be children from these liaisons, they are fathered on the boy-husband. When the boy grows up the wife is either either or past child-bearing, when he, in his turn, takes up with some other boy's wife in a manner precisely similar to his own, and procreates children for the boy-husband" (Shortt, Trans. Ethnol. Soc., New Series, vi, 194).

3. Marriage by Purchase.—Those who believe, like Tyler, McLennan, Bachofen, and Lubbock, that the communal system of the marital relation existed in the primeval state, hold that out of it arose the system of individual marriage. We who depend upon the guidance of a written revelation are rather of the opinion that it is the influence of Christian savage-life that has led some of them to prefer individual to communal marriage. It is true that the marriage by capture has done much to bring about individual marriage, but it is by no means clear to us that even then the practice was not borrowed by the heathen from the people directly or indirectly. We certainly do not believe, with Lessing, that nations develop without external influences, that civilization is the possession of every people, and that it is constantly progressive. The condition of the American savage, and the remnants of an early and almost civilized humanity are far from contrary. Yet we believe, with Brinton (Myths of the New World, p. 5), that "religious rites are living commentaries on religious beliefs;" and that, while the idea of God does not and cannot proceed from the external world, it nevertheless is the product of our own mind. The American savage's struggle for life, in the satisfaction of the animal wants and passions, in those vulgar aims and motives which possessed the mind of the primitive man to the exclusion of everything else. It is pretty clear that with all pre-Christian nations the modes of getting a wife were the same with those of acquiring any other species of property—capture, gift, sale. The contract of sale may be said to be at the foundation of the marriage relation in every system of ancient law. When daughters belonged to parents as goods, they were parted with only on the principles of fair exchange. Usually the intended bride and bridegroom not being consulted. As to the marriage ceremonies, they were those and no other which were necessary to complete and evidence a sale—delivery, on the price being paid, and "the taking home." It was never thought of that the children should be consulted, and allowed to act on their likings. Just so the savage has been in a measure addicted to the purchase of his wife, with only this difference, however, that the property is secured by the buyer for himself. In Sumatra, e. g., there were formerly three perfectly distinct modes of marriage: the "Ambel-akan," in which the man purchased the woman; the "Ambel-akan," in which the woman purchased the man (see below, Polyandry); and the "Sendamo," in which they joined on terms of equality (comp. Marxen, Hist. of Sumatra, p. 282 sq.). "Among low races," says Lubbock (p. 60), "the wife is indeed literally the property of the husband, as Petruchio says of Catharine:"

"I will be master of what is mine own.
She is my goods, my chattels; she is my house, My bed, my board, my field, my farm.
My horse, my ox, my sea, my anything."
Wallachians, for the most part—are dressed in their best goat-skins, and make what show of horsemanship they can. After both parties have taken up their respective quarters opposite each other, the fathers step forward and begin to negotiate marriages for their children. The questions asked on these occasions are, we fear, of a somewhat sordid character. "How many bullocks?" "How many sheep?" "Your daughter is this year twelve: we look for a rather old; that chest of drawers does not shut properly. I must find something better than that for my son." Such would doubtless be a correct report of the conversations held in this primitive, if not poetical Arcadia, previous to clinical inquiries, which they are altogether more serious. The business is, however, carried out with a promptitude equal to its frankness. As soon as the parents are agreed, a priest, who is always ready at hand, is summoned. He chants a hymn and gives his benediction. The bride then kisses her parents, mounts the chariot, and starts for some unknown village with a husband whom she has never seen before, the furniture and cattle which her parents have allowed her as a marriage portion following in the rear.

5. Marriage by Capture.—Marriage by purchase, however, is not the only kind of marriage which we saw usual in Wallachia to secure a helpmeet for himself. Perhaps the general mode by which rude nations enter into the marital relation is that of capture. In the opinion of Lubbock, the first state of individual marriage was brought about by capture, and, if he chose to treat of this practice as confined to savage races, his judgment is still more pronounced with him that man came to claim for his sole personal benefit the female he secured from the conquered. Indeed, such a practice finds a counterpart not only among the pagan nations, but is related of even in the O-T. Scriptures (e. g., Deut. xx. 15—16). In reality, however, to be led to believe that among savage races marriage by capture means the procuring of a wife by hostility. Many marriages, indeed, never secure their female companions except by capture, though they be of the same tribe to which they themselves belong. Indeed, while there are many rude nations that do not tolerate anything else but endogamy, i. e., intertribal marriage, many others, perhaps the majority, permit only exogamy, i. e., marriage without the tribe. (See this head below.) Nor does it at all follow that all exogamous marriages do away with communism. It is significant, however, that in these primitive instances there has perhaps been instrumental in bringing about individual marriage relations. There is certainly no symbol more widespread, nor more varied in its forms, than that of capture in marriage ceremonies. In many cases it is a State right to marry to the captured marriage. For the Hindū such a marriage form is prescribed in the Sutras (Lassen, Indische Studien, p. 825), and in the Institutes of Manu marriage by capture is enumerated among the eight forms of the nuptial ceremony used by the four castes (chap. iii, 88, Jones v. Houghton). "In the description of this marriage, called Raschasa, we have the exact prototype of the Roman and Spartan forms, in a code of laws a thousand years older than our era" (Nat. Qu. Rev. June, 1872, p. 89).

The practice of capture is found in great perfection among the American Indians, existing everywhere throughout the savage races of South America, but more particularly in the regions of the Orinoco and the Amazon. The Fuegians have the practice as well as the fiction of capture. The Horse Indians of Patagonia are commonly at war with each other, or with the Canoe Indians, victory on either side resulting in the capture of women and slaughter of men. The Oesas, or Coin men, are more systematic, for every year, at the time of red leaf, they are said to make excursions from the mountains in the north to plunder from the Fuegians their cattle and maidens (Merriam, Travels, p. 61). The tribes of the Amazon and the Orinoco are in a state of constant warfare, and alternately rich and poor in women. Mr. Bates found the Manasas on the Rio Negro to resemble the Oesas in habits. The Caribbees were found by Humboldt to form family groups, often numbering only forty or fifty, which were at constant enmity with each other. Capture prevailed among them to such an extent that the women of any tribe belonged so much to distinct tribes that in no group were the men and women found to speak the same language. They made war against the Hottentots of the Orange river, always carrying off the prize; a weak man, unless he be a good hunter and well-beloved, is seldom permitted to keep a wife that a stronger man thinks worth his notice. . . . This custom prevails throughout all their tribes, and causes a great spirit of emulation among their youth, who, upon all occasions, from their childhood, trying their strength and skill in wrestling" (Voyage to the Northern Ocean, p. 104). Franklin also says that the Copper Indians held women in the same low estimation as the Chippeways, who, "looking upon them as the dregs of society, which is coarsest grain may take from the weaver" (Journeys to the Shores of the Arctic Ocean, ch. 48), and Richardson (Boat Journey, ii, 24) "more than once saw a stronger man assert his right to take the wife of a weaker countryman. Any one may challenge another to wrestle, and if he overcomes, may carry off the wife and see no difficulty in disagreeing with him, and protesting against this, which, indeed, seems to them perfectly natural." The capture of women for wives prevails also among the aborigines of the Deccan, and in Afghanistan (La- thani, Descriptive, ii, 215). It formerly prevailed, according to Olaus Magnus, in Muscovy, Lithuania, and Livonia (Historia de gentibus Septentrionalibus, bk. xiv, ch. x, p. 48). There is ample reason to believe that the practice was general among the nations in the north of Europe and Asia. Olaus Magnus, indeed, represents the tribes of the north as having been continually at war with one another, either on account of stolen women, or with the object of stealing women, "properaptas virgines aut arripiendas" (ut sup., p. 328). In numerous cases the plunderers were of the royal houses of Sweden and Denmark. Among the Scandinavians, before they became Christians, the bridegroom had in various cases to capture his bride and wedded at the sword-point. Among the Kalmcucks, Kirghis, Nogais, and Circassiains, where the power cannot be agreed upon, nothing is more common than to carry off the lady by force. This capture constitutes a marriage, and the ceremony takes place even before the capture has been made. The Australians, while having a general system of betrothals, yet employ the practice of capturing wives to a great extent. According to Turnbull, when a man sees a woman whom he likes, he tells her to follow him. If she refuses, he forces her to accompany him by blows, ending by knocking her down and carrying her off (Voyage round the World, i, 81 sq.). Sir George Grey says that many plots are laid to carry off the women, and in the encounters which result they receive usually very harsh treatment. Many other less barbarous nations keep up the show of force only. The following are among the most marked examples. Among the Khonds the marriage-ceremony begins with a feast at the dwelling of the bride. This is followed by dancing and song. When the night is far spent in these amusements, the principals are lifted by an under of slaves and carried through the dance. Suddenly they exchange burdens, and the uncle of the youth disappears with the bride. The friends of the bride now seek to arrest his flight, those of the groom to cover it, the mock contest that ensues being considered a great sport (Anson, Report upon Khonds, p. 55). Among the noble class of the Kalmucks a similar form appears. The price to be paid being fixed, the bridegroom and his no-of marriage. The bridegroom comes to the bride's house and, carrying a lance, a bow, and arrows, and accompanied by his friends, goes to her father's house, where the marriage ceremony takes place. The bridegroom places a silver plate in the presence of the bride and her family, and the couple is declared married by the priest. The bride and groom then return to their own homes, where the wedding feast is held. The marriage is regarded as permanent and unbreakable. The newlyweds are expected to live together for the rest of their lives, and any subsequent marriages are considered adultery.

Exogamy and Endogamy

Marriage by capture is a type of marriage practice known as exogamy, which means that individuals marry someone from outside their own social group. In some societies, marriage by capture was a common practice, particularly among nomadic tribes. The rationale behind this practice was that individuals would not only seek new consorts and fathers for their own offspring but also ensure the survival of their community by facilitating inter-marriage between these groups. In this way, the practice served to integrate different ethnic and geographical groups. The text emphasizes that individuals in such societies were not only concerned with marrying but also with securing the safety of their families through inter-marriage. This practice influenced the development of different systems of law and governance, as well as cultural practices. The practice of marriage by capture served to foster social cohesion and maintain the integrity of the community. It was a way to ensure the survival of different cultural traditions and practices. The practice was considered a testament to the strength and resilience of different communities. The practice was also a way to establish stronger ties between different societies and promote cultural exchange. The practice was a testament to the strength and resilience of different communities, and it was a way to ensure the survival of different cultural traditions and practices. The practice was also a way to establish stronger ties between different societies and promote cultural exchange. exogamy is strictly enforced among the Australian tribes. These savages are divided into small tribes, named after the districts which they inhabit. The tribe inhabiting a particular district considers itself the owner thereof, and vigorously resists any intrusion. Yet there are many tribes often found inhabiting the same area quite differently disposed. The improvement in the latter is occasioned by the inhabitants of tribes with forbidden intermarriage of clansmen, and others which forbid marriage outside of the tribe limits. In some districts, as in the hills on the north-eastern frontier of India, in the Caucasus, and the hill-ranges of Syria, are found a variety of tribes which might be called similar, yet in this particular utterly differing—some forbidding marriage within the tribe, and some proscribing marriage without it (McLennan, p. 147).

7. Polyandry and Polygyny.—The peculiarity of women not only reveals to us the reason why exogamy became so generally established among rude nations, but also easily explains the practice of polyandry, which we are told by best authorities exists to a moderate extent among savage races. Lubbock, however, will have it that “polyandry, or the marriage of one woman to several, is commonly supposed, though much less so than polygyny” (p. 53; compare p. 100). It prevails in its most striking form throughout Tibet and in the Himalayan regions. It is also met with in Ceylon, among tribes of the north of Asia, and in parts of Africa and America.

8. Family Relations among Savages.—That the marriage system in such imperfect stages of development as we find it to be among savage races cannot furnish any of the advantages suggested by the Biblical marriage system, will appear to all a matter hardly necessary to be dwelt upon. Yet there are some faint ideas of the family relation, as we conceive it, prevailing among rude nations also. That polyandry, polygyny, and communism cannot establish the relationship of father and mother, is clearly apparent. Exogamy, however, will do this measurably, especially where it approaches the monogamous system. In communal marriage no man can identify his father; the child is raised by the mother as a sort of tribal property, and naturally enough bears her name, and only considers parenthood as existing in the female line. This gave rise to the wide-spread system of kinship through the mother only, continuing to exist in many cases, though the case which provoked it has disappeared. There is good reason to believe that this system formerly was prevalent among the Celts, and Max Muller (Chips from a German Workshop) has traced it to the ancient Brahmins. It also appears to have been in existence in the Semitic races, and is traceable in the Grecian systems. Its effect is visible in the habits of many modern tribes, and shows the propriety of the words in the Vulgate used by Latin writers among the North American Indians, who, he says, adopted their wives, as it were, by stealth: “Il n’est point dans les cabanes particulières ou habitent leurs épouses, que durent l’obscurité de la nuit... ce serait un acte extracanunul de s’y présenter le jour” (I, 570). Herodotus says that the Lydians named the children from the mother. On the Etruscan tombs descent is traced in the female line. Many modern instances exist besides those we have already mentioned. We may instance the Nairs, and other peoples of India; the Saporogian Tatars, and other tribes of the same name, the Herberts of Sahara, and various other African tribes. Among the Bunter—the highest rank of Sudras in Tulava—a man’s children are not his heirs. During his lifetime he may give them money, but all of which he dies possessed goes to his sister and to their children. When a rich man dies, his man died, his son has to work for his uncle's son. Battel says the town of Loango was governed by four chiefs, the sons of the king’s sister; for king’s sons never became kings. Quadrarmmmmee notes that, “Chez les Nubiens, dit Abon Selah, lorsqu’un roi vient à mourir et qu'il laisse un fils et un veuf du côté de sa femme, celui-ci monte sur le trône de preference a l’héritier naturel” (Geographie sur l’Egypte, etc.). McLennan (Primâ, Marriage, p. 247) thus traces the development of the family relation to our present status; and, though the statement is made from the outset that we cannot sanction the position taken by him and others of his class, we will not refuse them an introduction to our readers: “The polyandry, in which all the husbands were brothers, would establish the certainty of the children being of their own blood. In time the eldest brother became considered, by a species of fiction, the father of all the children. The next to him was considered the headship of the family, and kinship became established in the paternal line. The elder brother became a sort of paterfamilias; the right of succession being in the younger brothers in their order, and, after them, in the eldest son. The idea of a headship through the Thibetan system of polyandry. In most races, though, as the sexes became more evenly balanced, through progrena towards civilisation, the system of monogamy or of polygamy would arise. Paternity thus becoming certain, the practice of sons succeeding as heirs direct to their father’s estates would ensue, and, as this idea of paternal kinship arose, that of maternal relationship would die away.” “Our family system, in which the child is equally related to both its parents,” says Lubbock (p. 110), “appears at first sight the only natural one, but it is merely so in connection with our marriage system, there being sufficient reason to conclude, as we have seen, that the child is first related to the family group only; then to the mother, and not to the father; afterwards to the father, and not to the mother; and, only as a final result of civilisation, becomes related to both.” Maine (Ancient Law) and other writers of his class, however, hold to a theory that considers man’s history, in the light of divine revelation, to open with perfect recognition of such kinship. In their view the family, under the father’s government, was considered the prime unit of the state and of royalty. The family gathers other families about it, becoming the centre of a group; and these groups, tracing back their descent to a common origin, aggregate into tribes and nations. Tribes are numerous which make this claim to common descent. But, upon inquiry, the ancestor of the race is always a legendary hero or god—a being invented to explain the origin of the tribe. In some cases the time of the invention is known, as with the Greek tribes which traced their descent back to the sons of Helios.

There are several other peculiar customs widely in vogue relating to marriage, some of which are so curious that it will be well to give a brief description of them also. The strangest of these is the general avoidance of incestuous marriage among the children of father-in-law and mother-in-law, in which the one is often forbidden to look at or mention the name of the other. The reason or the origin of these customs, or of the many strange forms which theseassume, is not clear to us, and we can only give some instances of their general character. Under the peculiar Fijian system known as the tabu, the husband and wife are forbidden to eat from the same dish. (Compare the above custom among the Hinduts.) In other places the father is not permitted to speak to the son after the latter is fifteen years old (Williams, Fiji, i, 1836). Among many races the woman is absolutely forbidden to speak to her son-in-law. This system prevails generally among the American Indians (Origins of Civilization, p. 7). Among the Osmahaws neither the father nor mother-in-law will hold direct communication with their son-in-law (James, Exp. to Rocky Mountains, p. 33). In the social system of the Mangools and Kalmucks a similar restriction appears, the wife being forbidden to speak to her father-in-law, or to sit in his presence. With the Ostiaks of Siberia a similar rule holds ("Un fille mariée évoit autant qu'elle est possibl la présence du père de son mari ou de son mari m'a pas droit; et le mari, pendant ce temps, n'ose pas parler devant la mère de sa femme. "Sils se rencontrent par hasard, le mari lui tourne le dos, et la femme se couvre le visage" [Pallas, iv, 71].) In China customs of a like nature exist, and also in some of the Pacific islands. In some cases this peculiar system assumes the strangest and most decided form. In Central Africa the lover carefully avoids seeing either the father or mother of his future bride, taking great precautions to avoid an encounter. If he is of a different camp, this prohibition extends to all the members of the lady's camp, except a few special friends with whom he is permitted to have intercourse. He avoids passing through the camp, and, if obliged to do so, carefully covers his face (Caillle, Travels to Timbuctoo, i, 94). This appears to be a relic of the old system of capture, in which the captor would apparently marry the captive, and thus steal his wealth. He carefully avoids being observed by the inmates of the opposite camp, as in the case of the Australians above described.

Another custom widely prevalent, and of a yet stranger character, is that known in Bearn as La Couvenci. It consists in putting the husband to bed on the birth of a child, and nursing him with the greatest care, while the mother goes to her usual duties. In some cases the poor fellow is put on such a strict regimen that he really becomes sick. There are, in fact, cases in which his peculiar sufferings are continued for several days, and he is so hardly hit that a real sickness would be far more endurable. Cases of this description occur in various parts of America, and in many regions of Europe and Asia, taking often the strangest forms. The idea thus symbolized is that the child is affected by anything happening to its nearest parent, and that any internal or external drinking or otherwise, seriously affects the health of the child. Under the idea of male kinship, the father was considered the nearest parent; hence, was obliged to perform this peculiar penance. Max Muller says that the poor husband was first tyrannized over by his female relatives, and afterwards frightened into superstitiously making a martyr of himself, until he became really ill, or took to his bed in self-defence (Chips from a German Workshop, ii, 281). Laftau regards it as arising from a dim recollection of original sin, rejecting the Carib explanation that if the father engaged in rough labor, or was careless in his diet, "cela ferait mal à l'enfant, et que cet enfant participerait à tous les défauts naturels des animaux dont le père aurait mange" (i, 259).

Marrow Controversy. The Marrow of Modern Divinity was a work published in 1646 by Edward Fisher (q. v.), of the University of Oxford. It is in the form of a dialogue, to explain the freeness of the law—to expose, on the one hand, Antinomian error, and also, on the other, to refute Neonomian heresy, or the idea that Christ has, by his atonement, so lowered the requirements of the law that mere endeavor is accepted in room of perfect obedience. In the course of the book, which had been brought into Scotland by an English Puritan soldier, was accidentally found by Boston, then minister of Simpkin, and was republished in 1718, under the editorship of Mr. Hogg, minister of Carnock. It had been recommended long before by several divines of the Westminster Assembly. The treatise, consisting of quaint and stirring dialogues, throws into bold relief the peculiar doctrines of grace, occasionally puts them into the form of a startling proposition, and is studded with quotations from eminent Protestant divines. The position of the Marrow is that “true communion, and by many of them it was violently censured. But not a few of the evangelical pastors gave it a cordial welcome, and among multitudes of the people it became a favorite book, next in veneration to the Bible and the Shorter Catechism. In 1719 its editor, Mr. Hogg, wrote an explanation of some of its passages, but in the same year principal Haddow, of St. Andrew’s, opened the Synod of Fife with a sermon directed against it. The synod requested the publication of the discourse, and this step was the signal for a warfare of years’ duration. The Assembly of that year, acting in the same spirit with the Synod of Fife, instructed its commission to look after books and pamphlets promoting such opinions as are found in the Marrow, though they do not name the book, and to summon before them the authors and recommenders of such publications. The commission, so instructed and sworn, appointed a committee, of which principal Haddow was the soul; and before this committee, named the “Committee for Purity of Doctrine,” four ministers were immediately summoned. The committee gave in a report at the next Assembly of 1720 and in the Assembly of 1722, exalting the doctrines of the Marrow, and solemnly condemning them. It selected several passages which were paradoxiocally expressed, while it severed others from the context, and held them up as contrary to Scripture and to the Confession of Faith. The passages marked for condemnation were so far changed under the heads of 7 such as the nature of faith, the atonement, holiness, obedience and its motive, and the position of a believer in reference to the law. The committee named them as errors, thus—universal atonement and pardon, assurance of the very essence of faith, holiness not necessary to salvation, and the law not under the law as a rule of life. Had the Marrow inculcated such tenets it would have been objectionable indeed. The report was discussed, and the result was a stern condemnation of the Marrow; and the General Assembly do hereby strictly prohibit and discharge all the ministers of this Church, either by preaching, writing, or printing, to recommend the said book, or in discourse to say anything in favor of it; but, on the contrary, they are hereby enjoined and required to warn and exhort those people in whose hands the said book is or may come not to read or use the same. That book, which had been so highly lauded by many of the southern divines—such as Caryl and Burroughs—by the men who had framed the very creed of the Scottish Church, and who were universally acknowledged to be as able as most men to know and judge of which through its terror and blood he was himself the instigator that he was invoked as the protector of the Qui- rites (citizens)—in other words, of the state. The principal animals sacred to him were the wolf and the horse. He had many temples at Rome, which were most celebrated of which was that outside the Porta Capena, on the Appian Road. The Campus Martius, where the Romans practiced athletic and military exercises, was named after him; so was the month of March (Martius), the first month of the Roman year. The Ludi Martiai (games in honor of Mars) were celebrated every year in the circus on the 1st of August.

(2) Ares, the Greek god of war, was the son of Zeus and Hera, and the favorite of Aphrodite, who bore him several children. He is represented in Greek poetry as a most sanguinary divinity, delighting in war for its own sake, and in the destruction of men. Before him into battle goes his sister Eris (Strife), along with her are his sons and companions, Deimos (Horror), and Phobos (Fear). He does not always adhere to the same side, like the great Athena, but inspires now the one, now the other. He is not always victorious. Dionysus wounded him, and in his fall, says Homer, “he roared like nine or ten thousand warriors together.” Such a representation would have been deemed blasphemous by the ancient Roman mind, imbued as it was with a solemn, Hebrew-like reverence for its gods. The worship of Ares was never very canvassed in Greece; it is believed to have been imported from Thrace. There and in Scythia were its greatest shrines, and there Ares was believed to have his chief home. He had, however, temples or shrines at Athens, Sparta, Olympia, and other places. On statues and reliefs he is represented as a person of great muscular power, and either naked or clothed with the chlamys. — Chambers, Cyclop. s. v.; Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog. and Mythol. vol. ii. s. v.; Vollmer, Mythol. Wörterbuch, s. v.

Mars, St. a French hermit, was born at Baia, near La Guerche, about 510. He was a priest of Vitre, and acquired a great reputation for piety. When old, he constructed a hermitage for himself in some waste land in the neighborhood of the village of Mars, and there ended his days. His tomb became celebrated for the numerous miracles which it was claimed were performed there. The faithful came thither on pilgrimages from all parts of Brittany. In 1427 the inhabitants of Baia, fearing an incursion of the English, carried the body of their saint to Saint-Madeleine du Lude. The danger passed, the Baisiens demanded the body of their saint, but the canons of Vitre refused to restore it. From law-suits they proceeded to blows, and many times during the processions the Baisiens attempted to recover their precious relic; but the inhabitants of Vitre always proved the stronger, and retained the body of Saint Mars until 1570, when a decree of the Parliament of Rennes reconciled the parties by dividing the body of the saint. Vitre kept the head, the right thigh, and two sides; Baia had the remainder. The festival of Saint Mars occurs on the 12th of January and 21st of June. At these periods the shrine is carried through the surrounding country. — Dom Lobineau, Histoire de Bretegaine; Godescard, Vie des plus célèbres Saints, vol. i; A. Marchy, Charles, Hector de St. Georges, Marchy, a French mystic, was born in 1688 at Paris, whether his parents, pious members of the Reformed Church, had fled to avoid the persecution raging against the Protestants in the provinces. While yet a youth the whole family removed to Germany, and there Charles took part in the Spanish War of Succession in the Netherlands. He now became a convert to the views of Bourgignon (q. v.), and with his friend Cordier retired, in 1711, to Schwarzenau, in the province of Wittgenstein. Cordier, however, leaving him, he married, in 1712, Clara Elizabeth of Callerberg, whose views were similar to his own. During the years 1718–16 he made several journeys to Italy and Spain, where he became associated with the works of Madame Guyon (q. v.). He then returned to Schwarzenau, learned the watch-making trade, became president of the Philosophical Society, and resided there until 1724. In 1746 he became a priest, and continued in the neighborhood of Ansbach until 1753, a truly evangelical Christian, a disciple of Christ, clinging faithfully to the truth as it is in Jesus. Marchy had great influence in propagating throughout Germany the mystic views of Bourgignon and Guyon. He wrote Freimüthige u. christliche Discurse (1754); Augenzeugen eines Kindes u. d. Richtigfertig d. Wege u. Grünes (1758), 2 parts; Selbstbiographie, in the 2d vol. of Valenti, System d. höheren Heilkunde (Elberfeld, 1826). — Gobel, Gesch. der wahren Inspirations-gemeinden (in Nieder's Zeit. d. hist. Theol. 1835, iii, § 21, 4); the same, Gesch. d. christl. Kirche (1802), ii, bk. ix; also see an excellent article in Herzog, Real-Encyklop. ix, 116 sq.

Marsden, Samuel, one of the noblest missionary workers the Church of England ever sent out to battle for Christ, the noted Australian chaplain and friend of the Maori, was born of humble parentage in 1754, and was trained first in the free grammar school at York, and then, by the celebrated English divine Dr. Joseph Milner. Samuel began life as a trader at Leeds. He had been converted under Wesleyan preaching, had joined the Methodist, and belonged to their society for some time, but, being higher aspirations than that mercantile profession, he entered the English Church to secure a collegiate training. He was placed at St. Joseph's College, Cambridge, and there educated by the Elland Society, whose object it was to aid poor young men having the ministry in view. Before Marsden had even taken his degree, he was offered the chaplainship in New South Wales. At first he was very adverse to accepting it, but, finding that there was no one who could so well fill this difficult post, he consented, and in the spring of 1788 was ordained. Soon after he married Elizabeth Tristram, a very worthy lady, who did much to aid him in his missionary labors. In 1794 he arrived at Parramatta, his new home. Early in the 17th century England had adopted postal transportation. The newly-acquired territories in America were then used for this purpose, and, as we know, oftentimes aided in the propagation of the gospel and slavery. The Revolution of 1789 led to the consequent establishment of independence in the colonies, obliged England to discontinue this practice of disposing of criminals. But the great fear entertained in England that the country would be overrun with crime, led the government of George III to establish penal colonies in Australia. About seven years previous to Marsden's arrival there the first convict ship had been sent out with its living freight, and yet up to this time religious training was unknown. It little mattered to England what became of the convict, so long as he was well out of her way. A powerful military force was required to keep this mass of corrupt humanity in subjection, and, instead of being benefited, they were rather hardened in their sins. For teaching the Gospel the Church furnished only two ministers—for soldiers, convicts, settlers, and all. Marsden was at one of these, and, as a poor preacher failing in health, he was soon left to struggle on alone. Although severely tried by domestic affliction, he was not found wanting. At that time the custom prevailed there and in England for the parish priest to administer justice as well as give spiritual advice. The son of a Yorkshire man, educated to be very conversant with law, but good sense and a clear perception of justice came to the rescue. His farming education, however, served him well, for, receiving a grant of land, and thirteen convicts to till it, as part payment for his services, he made it the model farm in New South Wales, and from the proceeds was enabled to establish schools and missions. A rebellious spirit manifesting itself among the convicts, Marsden sailed for England, after an absence of fourteen years, to appeal to the home government. His main object was to secure a grant permitting the convicts' friction with the penal colony. This was denied him, but his representation that the convicts ought to be instructed in trades was well received.

During his visit to England Mr. Marsden also laid the foundation of the missions to New Zealand, and prepared to go out there. But the health of his own country was exigent, and after visiting Australia he had had some intercourse with these tribes, which he found to be of a much higher type of humanity than the Australian native. Indeed, they possessed such a spirit of enterprise and curiosity that they would often visit the island of Australia, and Marsden is said to have entertained thirty at one time. He vainly endeavored to obtain help from the Church Missionary Society. No clergyman could be found to undertake the mission to New Zealand, but two laymen, William Hall and John King, consented to act as pioneers. This they accomplished before Marsden himself returned to Australia in August, 1809. They were soon followed by Thomas Kendall. To transfer these lay missionaries to their intended field of labor, Marsden conceived the plan of fitting out a missionary ship, but, failing to interest outside parties, he finally purchased a small one at his own expense. This was the Acheron, the first of the mission ships that now carry the Gospel to every part of the globe. Marsden accompanied this expedition, and was kindly welcomed by the natives. His method in founding missions to propagate Christianity was unlike that of Eliot, to begin with faith, and then to look for civilization. He rather thought that civilization prepared the way for the acceptance of faith, and, as his teachers were laymen, he employed them only in laying the foundations of a Christian civilization. Marsden frequently repeated his visits, and in many ways aided the enterprise. On his fourth visit, he took out with him the Rev. Henry Williams, who afterwards became bishop of a Maori district. It was now nine years since he had first landed here, and, in spite of so many disappointments and so much opposition, he found the condition of the natives greatly improved. A Wesleyan mission had been established at Wingarara, under Mr. Leigh. During his two months' stay he endeavored to persuade the natives to adopt a fixed form of government, and advised the missionaries to collect a vocabulary, and arrange a grammar that might aid in future translations. In 1826 he made his seventh and last visit. He was now seventy-two years of age. Wherever he went he was greeted as the friend of the Maories. He had always hoped that this intelligent people might be Christianized, and it gladdened his heart to see the improvements they had made. Sunday was generally observed among the natives, and polygamy and cannibalism were fast diminishing, and there was every token that the apostle of New Zealand had conquered a country and people for the Church of God. Marsden was possessed of a will and force of character that enabled him to accomplish whatever he undertook. He died May 12, 1838.

Mar'sena (Heb. Mar'ásen, מַרְסֵנָא or מִרְסֵנָא, according to Benfey, the Samaritan marha, noble, with the Zend ending ma, man; Sept. Maporás, but most copies omit; Vulg. Marzena), one of the seven Medo-Persian satraps or viziers (Esth. 1, 14). R.C. 983. Josephus understands that they had the office of interpreters of the laws (Ant. xi. 6, 1).

Mar's Hill (Ἀργυρώνας, collis Martius, Acta xxv, 22, the Areopagus, as in ver. 19; so called, according to Pausan. I. 28, 5, from the fact that Mars was first judged there), a limestone hill in Athens, north-west of the Acropolis (Herod. viii, 230) ... (Pococke, Eust. iii, tab. 65), where (even down to the time of the Roman emperors, Gell. xii, 7) the most ancien ... judicial authority, it fell under some restrictions in the times of the New Test.; but the date of its extinction is unknown. Marsh (מְרָשָׁה, ge'be', a collection of waters, Ezek. xlvii, 11; elsewhere a cistern or reservoir, rendered "pit," Isa. xxx, 14; Jer. xiv, 3), a swamp or wet piece of land. The passage in Ezekiel speaks of the future blessings of the Jews after their restoration under the figure of the drainage of the lands, and by its dampness, "the marshes thereof, and the marshes thereof, shall not be healed: they shall be given to salt" (xlvii, 11); that is, the part in question shall be reserved for the production of salt by the evaporation of the waters (see Henderson, Comment. ad loc.). It is supposed that the "outlet of salt" in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea is here referred to, for there the Kedron, the course of which the prophet describes the holy waters as following, empties this plain or valley has been traversed and described by captains Irby and Mangles in terms appropriate to the prophecy. Lieut. Lynch, in coasting around the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, found not only the Ghor to be an immense marshy flat, but the bottom of the lake itself a muddy shoal, scarcely allowing the boat to be rowed through it. The salt hills around presented a scene of uninterrupted desolation (Expedition, p. 810).

Marsh, Francis, a noted Irish prelate, flourished in the second half of the 17th century. He was made bishop of Limerick in 1667; was transferred to Kilmore and Ardagh in 1673; in 1682 became archbishop of Dublin, and died in 1688. But little is accessible to gather a detailed account of his life and work. Lawrence B. Phillips (Dict. Bio. Refs) refers to Cotton, Poeti Ecclesi- sic Hibermiae (Dubl. 1649, 5 vols. 8vo), and to D'Alton, Lives of the Archbishops of Dublin (Dublin, 1888, 8vo).

Marsh, Herbert, an English theologian and preacher, "one of the acutest and most truly learned divines of his day," was born in London in 1575, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; graduated with great distinction; was made fellow, and became M.A. in 1572. He then went to the Continent, and studied at the University of Göttingen, and later at Leipzig. He returned to England in 1680, and in 1687 became professor of divinity at Cambridge. In 1616 he was appointed bishop of Llandaff, and bishop of Peterborough in 1619. He died May 1, 1639. He published several religious and controversial treatises, and furnished an excellent English translation of Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, with notes. "A dissertation on the genuineness of 1 John v, 7, included in Michaelis's Introduction, from Dr. Travers, 'Letters to Edward Gibbon, Esq.,' in defence of the genuineness of the passage, which bishop Marsh answered, in vindication of Michaelis and himself, in his celebrated ‘Letters to Archdeacon Travers’—an able and critical production, but which did not, as some eminent scholars have supposed, settle the question. He has also published several parts of a Course of Divinity Lectures on the Messiah, and an Office of the Church, of theological learning, and notices of authors. This work, entitled Lectures on Divinity, with an Account of the principal Authors who have excelled in Theological Learning (7 parts, Camb., 1809–23; Lond., 1838), includes ‘Lectures on Sacred Criticism and Interpretation,’ which have been published separately, and are, as is well known, a subscription to Biblical scholars, of the highest value” (Horne, in Bibl. Bib., 1839, p. 160 sq.). His other works are Essay on the Usefulness and Necessity of Theological Learning to those designed for Holy Orders (1792) —Comparative View of the Churches of England and Rome (Lond., 1841, 8vo). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. ii, 1225; Blackwood’s Magazine, xxix, 69 sq.

Marsh, James, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born July 19, 1794, at Hartford, Vt. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1817; spent some years in An- dover Theological Seminary; was ordained Oct. 12, 1824, and afterwards, for a short time, the incumbent of a professorship in Hampden Sydney College, Va. In 1826 he was elected president of the University of Ver- mont, which position he resigned in 1833, but continued as professor of moral and intellectual philosophy until 1849. He died at Colchester, Vt., July 5, 1842. Dr. Marsh was among the first to render the text of the German on the Geography of the Scriptures (1822). He published a Preliminary Essay to Coleridge’s Aids to Reflection (1829): — Selections from the Old English Writers on Practical Theology: — His Inaugural Address at Bar- linpton (1826) — A Treatise on Eloquence: — Translation of Herder’s Work on Hebrew Poetry: and Translation of Hegel’s Works on Christian Philosophy. A memoir of his life, with selections from his writings, was published by professor Torrey (1843, 8vo; 2d ed, 1845). See North Am. Rev. xxiv, 470; Dayeckine, Cyclop. Am. Lit. ii, 130; Sprague, Annals, ii, 692; Drake, Dict. Am. Biog. s.v.

Marsh, John (1), D.D., a Congregational minister, was born Nov. 2, 1742 (O. S.), at Haverhill, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1761; entered the ministry in 1765; was appointed tutor at Harvard in 1771; remained there two years, and was ordained January 1774, pastor of the First Church, Wethersfield, Conn., where he served until 1811. He preached a few occasional Sermons.—Sprague, Annals, i, 619.

Marsh, John (2), D.D., son of the preceding, an eminent American divine, who enjoyed a national reputation from his connection, almost from its origin, with the great temperance reform of the last half century, was born in Wethersfield, Conn., April 2, 1769; graduated at Yale College, and in 1786 settled as a Congregational pastor in Haddam, Conn. He at once identified himself with the cause to which he so ably served for half a generation, and attracted public attention by the address which he delivered before the Windham County Temperance Society in Pomfret, Conn., in 1828. That year a state society had been formed, of which Jeremiai Day, of Yale College, was the president, and Mr. Marsh the secretary and general agent, and, to do efficient service for the society, the latter offered his services to the county associations as far as he could in connection with his pastoral labor. His address in Pomfret, styled “Putnam and his Wolf,” ran a parallel between general Putnam’s well-known pursuit of the wolf in his den in that town and the temperance crusade against a more terrible monster. The address was afterwards printed, and in a short period a subscription of $10,000 was obtained for the American Tract Society finally placed upon its list. See Temperance Reform. In 1833 Dr. Marsh was invited to leave his charge and become an agent of the society in Philadelphia; and by the advice of his friends he yielded himself to what was at that time a most laborious and self-denying mission. Three years later he removed to New York as secretary of the American Temperance Union, and editor of its organ and of its publications, and remained until 1865, when the society was reorganized, and a change was made in its officers. He did not rest from his labors, preaching constantly, lecturing upon his life theme, and offering himself to every good word and work. His last efforts were put forth in behalf of an endowment of the Yale Theological Seminary. He had already raised $10,000, and was full of encouragement in reference to the success of his endeavors. His labors ended only with his life. He died Aug. 4, 1868. “Few men have been more respected or more widely known throughout the country than Dr. Marsh. Enthusiastic in his mission, catholic in spirit, welcoming every new laborer in the great field, and readily seizing upon each new phase of the temperance reformation, his name will remain inseparably connected with the history of the cause in all future time. He was a good man, shedding a benignant influence by his devoted life wherever he moved” (N. Y. Christian Advocate, August, 1868). Besides editing The Temperance Journal, Dr. Marsh was the author of several popular works; among others, of a well-known Epitome of Ecclesiastical History (N. Y., A. S. Barnes and Co.); of a valuable hand-book entitled Temperance Recollections: — Labora, Debe-, Tanta, Troca, Tanta: A Pugilist’s Autobiography (N. Y., 1844) — “a rich text-book for every man who would plead the cause of temperance,” etc. See (the N. Y.) Christian Advocate, August, 1868; the Eclectic Magazine, 1866 (June), p. 773. (J. H. W.)

Marsh, Narcissus, D.D., a learned Irish prelate, was born at Bannington, near Highworth, in Wiltshire, in 1658; was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1658 became fellow of Exeter College. The degree of D.D. he received in 1671; some time previous he was made chaplain to the bishop of Exeter, and later to chancellor Hyde, earl of Clarendon. In 1673 he was appointed principal of St. Alban’s Hall, Oxford, and in 1678 provost of Dublin College. In 1683 he became bishop of Leighlin and Fern; archbishop of Cashel in 1690, of Dublin in 1694, and of Armagh in 1706. He died Nov. 2, 1713. Dr. Marsh was a pious and noble soul. He founded an almshouse at Drogheda for poor widows of clergymen, and provided for their support. He likewise built on his own estate decayed churches within his diocese, and bought in several improvements, which he restored to the Church. He also gave to the Bodleian Library a great number of MSS. in the Oriental languages, chiefly purchased out of Colvin’s collection. He was a very learned and accomplished man. Besides sacred and profane literature, he had applied himself to mathematics and natural philosophy; he was deep in the knowledge of languages, especially the Oriental; he was also skilled in music, the practice as well as the theory. He published Man- udestoria ad logicam, written by Philip de Trieu; to which he added the Greek text of Aristotle, and some tables and schemes, and Gassendus’s small tract De demonstratione, which he illustrated with notes (Oxon. 1678) — Institutiones logicæ, in usum juventutis academici (Dublin, 1681) — An Introductory Essay to the Doc- trine of Sounds (published in the “Philosophical Transactions” of the Royal Society of London): — A Charge to his Clergy of the Diocese of Dublin (1694, 4to). Marsh, William (1), D.D., an English divine, was incumbent of St. Mary’s, Leamington; later rector of Beddington, and died in 1666. He published Collections on the Collects (3d ed. 1824, 4to); — Plain Thoughts on Prophecy (3d ed. 1843, 8vo); — Occasional Sermons, etc. (1821, etc.). See Memoirs of the late Rev. Wm. Marsh, D.D., by his daughter (post 1830).
Marshall, George, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Belshet Parish, Derry County, Ireland, in 1880. He attended the schools of his native land, and, after his arrival in America, continued his studies, and graduated at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1852, and at the theological seminary at Princeton, N. J., in 1855.

He was immediately licensed to preach, and installed pastor of Rock Church, Cecil Co., Md., where he continued to labor until his death, Feb. 27, 1861. Mr. Marshall was a man of devoted piety, excellent natural talents, and solid attainments; his sermons were sound and instructive, his delivery earnest and impressive. See Wilson, p. 75.

Marshall, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington Co., Pa., Jan. 18, 1818. He received his early education in St. Clairsville, Ohio; graduated at Franklin College, Ohio, in 1889; studied theology in the seminary of the Associate Presbyterian Church in Canonsburg, Pa.; was licensed in 1843, and installed pastor of the Associate Presbyterian churches of Lordsberry and West Chester, Ohio. Owing to the discussion going on in anticipation of the union between the Associate and Associate Reformed Presbyterian churches, his mind was directed to the investigation of their views concerning an ecclesiastical union and intercommunication, which led, in 1854, to his joining the presbytery of St. Clairsville. In 1856 he became the stated supply for Woodfield Church, Ohio, and in 1857 he accepted a call to the churches of Dodsville and Huntington, Ill. He died Aug. 24, 1858.

Mr. Marshall is a practical and zealous as a preacher, social and amiable as a Christian gentleman. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 75.

Marshall, Joseph D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Stanford, Conn., in Nov., 1804, of Congregational parentage. His early years were spent in mercantile life; he was converted when about twenty years old; he felt a call to the ministry, and in 1827 entered the New York Conference, and was for two years stationed at Kingston Circuit. In 1829 he was appointed to New Palz Circuit; in 1830 to Flushing; in 1832 was transferred to Troy Conference, and appointed to St. Albans Circuit; next and successively to Peru, Charlotte, Shelburne, and Wesley Chapel, N. Y. In 1837 was transferred to the New York Conference, and appointed to Windham Circuit; in 1838 to Sag Harbor; in 1839 was supernumerary, because of failing health; and, though he returned to effective work for a time, he only recovered his health in 1843, when he entered active work, and successively preached at Green, Conn., Birmingham, Reading, and New Canaan. Thereafter he was a supernumerary. He died at Brooklyn, Jan. 9, 1860. "He magnified his office as a pastor in all the churches committed to his care. . . . He was characterized for his equanimity of disposition, and the pure tone of his devotional and experimental piety." See Smith, Sacred Memories, p. 322 sq.

Marshall, Nathaniel, D.D., an English divine, flourished in the beginning of the 18th century. But little is known of his personal history. In 1712 he was the son of the clergy of the town; in January, 1715, he was canon of Westminster, and bishop of the cathedral town; later he became canon of Windsor. He appears also to have had the lecturing of St. Martin's, from on the Wensum and Colne, and died Feb. 6, 1730-31. He published A Translation of the Gospels Works of St. Cyriacus (1717, fol.) and of St. Thomas Aquinas (1717, 1721-1730; 4 vols.; besides a number of occasional Sermons, etc.-Darling, Cyclopedia, Bibliographia Sacra, Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Author. s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v.

Marshall, Samuel Vance, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Fayette Co., Ky., Feb. 6, 1798. He was educated at Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky. (class of 1821), and was immediately licensed by the presbytery at Princeton, N. J.; was licensed in 1825, and ordained by West Lexington Presbyterian in 1826. During 1827 he labored as a missionary in South Carolina; then went to North Middleton and Mt. Sterling churches, in Kentucky; and subsequently to Woodford, Ky. In 1735 he was elected professor of languages in Transylvania University; and in 1767 to the chair in Oakland College, Miss. Here he spent the remainder of his life in teaching, and in voluntary service as an evangelist, especially among colored people. He died Nov. 30, 1860.
Mr. Marshall was a man of strong character, and of large and ample proportions, adapted to all popular and popu-

Marshall, Stephen, a noted commonwealth Presbyterian divine, lecturer at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, who flourished in the first half of the 17th century, and died in 1655, was the author of several controversial theological treatises, etc. (1640-81). He also published a number of occasional Sermons. The most memorable of Marshall's works is his sermon preached at the Sun-ril of Pym (1644, 4to). See *Life of Stephen

Marshall or Mareschal, Thomas, an English divine of note, was born at Barkby, in Leicester, about 1621; was entered at Lincoln College, Oxford, in 1640, and while there became a constant hearer of archibishop Usher's sermons in All-balls Church. The influence of this habitus of style is a remnant in all the writings of Mr. Marshall. Upon the breaking out of the civil war he took up arms for the king at his own charge, and therefore, in 1645, when he was a candidate for the degree of bachelor of arts, was admitted without paying fees. Upon the approach of the Parliamentary visitation, he left the university, went beyond sea, and became preacher to the company of English merchants at Rotterdam and Dort. In 1661 he was made bachelor of divinity; and, in 1668, became fellow of his college; and, in 1669, doctor of divinity. In 1672 he was appointed professor of the College of Lincoln. Later he became chaplain-in-ordinary to the king; and, in 1681, final-dean of Gloucestershire. He died in 1685. He was distinguished for his knowledge of the Oriental tongues and of the Anglo-Saxon. He published Observarionem in Ennotare (1659, 4to); *bearing, against, duus, Gothicas [illegible], etc., Angulo-Saxonica, etc. (Dort, 1655); also a Book of Archbishop Usher (Lond. 1686); The Catechism set forth in the Book of Common Prayer briefly explained by short Notes (Oct. 1679). See Wood, Athenae Oxoni-enses, vol. ii (see Index); Gen. Biog. Dict. of s. v.; Wood's Ecclesiasts, vol. VII, s. v.

Marshall, Walter, an English divine of the second half of the 17th century, was educated at, and later became fellow of New College, Oxford, and Winchester College; vicar of Hursley, Hampshire; was ejected at the Restoration; subsequently became pastor of a dissenting congregation at Gosport, and died in 1690. He published The Gospel Mystery of Sanctification Opened in sundry Practical Directions, together with a Sermon on Justification (Lond. 1692, 8vo; often reprinted; last s. v.; Bogue and Bennett, Hist. Dissenters, i, 454.

Marshall, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Perthshire, Scotland, in 1785; was educated and studied divinity at Glasgow; was licensed by the Pres-bury of Dysart, Scotland; preached a number of years at calinshow, Fife, and in 1832 came to America, and was installed pastor of the Church at Peekskill, N. Y. In 1845, when the marriage question engaged the attention and called forth not a little of the talent and Biblical lore of the Church, he made the argument in that relation before the Synod of New York, which was afterwards published under the title, An Inquiry concerning the Lawfulness of Marriage between Parties previously married; also a short history of the acts of legislations in different Ages and Countries, and of the Action of the Ecclesiastical Bodies on that Subject. He died in 1864. Mr. Marshall possessed the analytical powers, comprehensive and penetrating; his sermons were renowned throughout the lands in which he may have lived. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 99; Sprague, Am. Amer. Pulpit, ix, 7. (J. L. S.)

Marshall, Sir John, an English scholar, celebrated for his acquirements in history, languages, and chronology, was born in London in 1692, and was educated at St. John's College, Oxford. He embraced the cause of the Royalists in the civil war. He died in 1685. He was the author of a work entitled *Chronological Comments on the Temples and Temples of Egypt taken from Egyptiaticus, Etruricus, etc. (Lond. 1672, 4to), in which he attempts to reconcile Egyptian chronology with the Hebrew Scriptures, by supposing four collateral dynasties of Egyptian kings reigning at the same time. This theory has been adopted by several eminent scholars.
He also wrote the preface to the first volume of Dug-dale's Monasticon Anglicum, and left behind him at his death, unfinished, Cassius chronicorum Liber Quatuor: de in narrationibus Romanis: de re numerarum; et cetera. We are likewise in some measure obliged to him for the history of Philosophy by his very learned nephew, Thomas Stanley, Esq., since it was chiefly at his instigation that that excellent work was undertaken. See Wood, Athenae Oxonimensis; Shuckford, Sacred and Profane History;

Marsham, Joshua, D.D., a noted English Bap-mist missionary to India, one of the "Scaremore Brethren," was born in St. John's college, Cambridge, among whom Dr. Carey were the most prominent often styled themselves, the person who, above all others, gave, to the English Protestant mission in India the strength, consistency, and prudence which it wanted, was born April 20, 1767, at Westbury Leigh, in Wilshire. While yet a child, Joshua Marshman, attracted attention by his devotion for reading, and his quiet, heartfelt religion.
His parents were poor, and he had to struggle hard to secure an education. In 1784 he became master of a school at Bristol, at the same time entering a student at "Bristol Academy," where he studied thoroughly Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Syriac. His mind became imbued at this time with the missionary spirit which the noted English cobbler, Carey, was spreading in England, and in 1799 Marshman offered to become one of the party sent out to India by the "Baptist Missionary Society," a body of missionaries among whom he was the best known in the world. His object was to proceed to British ground, Serampore being at that time Danish territory; but the Anglo-Indians objected to Christian missionary enterprises in their midst, and the mission was finally established at Serampore, to spread hence, in God's own appointed time, the truths of the Gospel among the heathen of all India. The fate of the missionary enterprise has been spoken of in the article INDIA (Q. V.); the activity of each member in the biographical sketches of these faithful servants of Christ [see CAREY; WARD, THOMAS]; we can here deal only with the missionary enterprises in India, of which Marshman, one of the most important of missionary enterprises.

Marshman had married the daughter of a Baptist minister before he became teacher at Bristol; his wife now accompanied him to India, and proved a helpful mate indeed from the very outset. Shortly after landing at Serampore, ending the support granted by the benev-sity of the society inadequate to the wants of the colony, Marshman, with the assistance of his wife, opened two boarding-schools for European children, and, succeeding even beyond their most sanguine expectations in securing not only a support for these schools, but the continu-eance of the mission, shortly after opened a school for the natives also, which was quickly filled; and the pecuniary return of this enterprise, together with the additional income which Carey received for his services as an instructor in the government college at Fort William, enabled these good people in a short time to render their mission nearly independent of home support. The Baptists of England, however, failed to appreciate these heroic and self-sacrificing labors of Carey, and Marshman, and with this failure was connected the disorganization and final dissolution of the committee of the general society. "There were among them many men of good intentions, but without breadth of views, and used to small economies. They listened to false reports, censured without sufficient information, pinched their missions, and dictated the management, so that Dr. Carey was but a victim of it all. . . . Moreover, the American subscribers [American Baptists] joined their English brethren until Judson went out from the American society] sent a most vexatious and absurd remonstrance against any part of their contributions for training young men to the ministry being employed in teaching science. "As if," said Dr. Marshman, "youths in America could be educated for ministers without learning science."

Had the government of the mission been in the hands of a body acquainted, by personal experience, with the needs of the converts, and unburdened by the prejudices of inherited feeling and prejudice, the difficulties springing up could easily have been allayed; but, managed by the class of men we have just spoken of, the disagreement between the Baptist Missionary Society and the Serampore missionaries (originating in 1817) lasted for many years, and was a serious check to the success of the enterprise. In 1822 Dr. Marshman had dispatched his son John to England to restore pleasant relations. The disagreement continuing, Dr. Marshman decided to go before the society in person, and in 1826 returned home. But even he failed in his mission; and in 1827, after much persistent effort, the matter ended in the separation of the Serampore mission from the general society. To a man like Dr. Marshman, now hoary with age, this matter became a serious annoyance, and his strength of body and of mind were greatly impaired. Additional trouble came when the ownership of the buildings at the Serampore mission was to be disposed of, the home society naturally enough claiming the property, although it had been secured mainly by the hard labors of Carey and Marshman. In 1825, Dr. Marshman's trials had become very heavy. At that time he was taken by cholera, and a short time later twenty-three years had the threefold cord between Carey, Marshman, and Ward been unbroken. They had lived together like brothers, alike in aim and purposes, each supplying what the other lacked; and the distress of the parting was terrible, especially to Dr. Marshman, who was a man of his friend's illness, with an attack of deafness, temporary indeed, but for some days total, so that he could only watch the final struggle without hearing a single word." His mental strength was even then sorely tried, for "he wrote as if he longed to be with those whose toils and sorrows were at an end." Greater was the shock that the treatment of the home society brought upon him. "Morbid attacks of depression came on, during which he wandered about unable to apply himself so much as even to write a letter." June 8, 1824, Dr. Carey died, and he was left alone to defend his cause. In 1826 a daughter of his, who had married the afterwards sold Christian soldier of the British army, Henry Havelock, barely escaped with her life from her bungalow, which had caught fire, losing one of her three children, a baby, in the flames. The disastrous excitement which this affair caused Dr. Marshman prostrated him completely, and he died Dec. 5, 1837. A few days previous to this event arrangements had been concluded in London for the reunion of the Serampore Mission with the parent society, and for retaining Dr. Marshman in the superintendence. So were these arrangements successful. Dr. Marshman had acquired a complete knowledge of the Bengalee, Sanscrit, and Chinese languages. Into the Chinese he translated the four Gospels, the Epistles of Paul to the Romans and the Corinthians, and the book of Psalms. He also wrote A Dissertation on the Characters and Script of the Chinese Language (1809, 4to)—The Works of Confucius, containing the original Text, with a Translation (1811, 4to, reviewed in London Quarterly Review, xi, 382)—Clara Sinicae—Elements of Chinese Grammar, with a Preliminary Dissertation on the Characters and Cog- nological Medium of the Chinese (Serampore, 1814). In Sanarict and Bengalee he assisted Dr. Carey in the preparation of a Sanscrit grammar in 1815, and a Bengalee and English dictionary in 1825. In 1827 he published an abridgment of the dictionary. He also engaged in a second London edition of Rammohan Roy's works, illustrated with a portrait of the author, and containing a reply to Dr. Marshman. In a sketch of Dr. Marshman's character at the end of the first volume of Dr. Cox's History of the Royal Missionary Society, Dr. Cox says: "In no man of great mental power and diligence, of firmness bordering upon obstinacy, and of much wariness." Marsiac, council of, (Concilium Marsiacense,) was held Dec. 8, 1526, by William de Flavacour, archbishop of Auch, and hisLegatans. The proceedings are of little interest. This council established the feast of St. Martha, the sister of S. Mary Magdalene, celebrated on the fourth of the calendar of August. See Landon, Manual of Councils, p. 390.

Marcellus, a Dutch philosopher and theologian, was born at Uffen, in the diocese of Utrecht. He was canon and treasurer of the Church of Saint Peter at Cologne, and when Rupert, the duke of Bavaria, founded the academy of Heidelberg in 1536, he called Marsile to a professorship of philosophy. He died there Aug. 20, 1595. Tribenhemius attributes to him a Didactic, and some comments on Aristotle and on Peter Lombard. Fabricius adds that his commentaries on the four books of the Sentences were published in Strasburg in 1501, folio. Marsilius, ficius see FICINUS.

Marsilius of Padua, an eminent opponent of the papacy, was born towards the close of the 13th century, and was probably a native of Italy. He first attracted notice at the University of Orleans, in France, and later at that at Paris, where he studied jurisprudence, and was also paid some respects. He spent some years in Athens in pursuit of his theology, and in 1312 became rector. It was not, however, until 1324 that he became particularly noted. In that year he composed his principal work, Defensor pu- cia s. de re imperatoria et pontificia. In this work, written in the interest of the emperor Louis IV, the Barba- rian, and against the papacy, he acquiesced his time as the most dangerous foe to peace and prosper- ity, supporting his assertion by a reference to events.
then current, e.g. the quarrel of Boniface VIII with Philip the Fair of France, the arrogance of Clement V towards the emperor Henry VII, and the treatment accorded by pope John XXII, then reigning, to Louis the Bavarian. In order to prevent such scandals for the future, the pope must set the example at the root of the evil; and he then proceeds to consider, 1, the nature, origin, and end of the state, with constant reference to peace and quietness as the highest good of social life; 2, the relation between Church and State, opposing to the exaggerated pretensions of the Curia a doctrine of the Church which he grounds on reason, tradition, Scripture, history, and ecclesiastical law. The leading thoughts are these: (1) The official duties and authority of every priest are confined to the ministration of the Word and sacraments. His power is spiritual and moral; the civil power alone may employ force, and the priest, even if he be bishop or pope, is subject to the civil power. (2) All priests, whatever their name, are equal in spiritual rank and authority; there was no distinction in the apostolic Church between bishops and presbyters; and the N. T. shows that there was no primacy of Peter, but that the apostles were all equal. In externals and non-essentials there may be distinctions between priests, and gradations of office, so far as circumstances require, but as a merely human arrangement. (3) There is only one divinely-appointed Head of the Church, Peter (4) The highest authority on earth in ecclesiastical matters does not inhere in a single priest or bishop, not even in the bishop of Rome, but in a general council, composed as well of intelligent laymen, who are versed in the Scriptures, as of priests. Christ has promised to be with his Church unto the end of the world, and a general council is the proper exponent and organ of the Church. The pope has not even authority to convene a council, since the case is possible that he should be guilty of conduct which itself would require the attention of a general council. This authority, therefore, belongs to the sovereign, as supreme lawmaker. (5) The Scriptures, including what must be necessarily inferred from their teaching, alone deserve an unconditional assent. The principles thus submitted by Marsilius found a practical application in 1338, when the heiress of the Tyroil sought a divorce from her husband, John of Bohemia, in order to marry a son of the emperor; a step which was sanctioned by Louis IV (in 1342), regardless of the fact that the parties were within the degrees of consanguinity in which marriage was prohibited by the Church, public opinion everywhere censuring the emperors action. Both Marsilius and the learned Franciscan William Occam, came forward in the emperor's defence, in a work bearing the title in each case, Tractatus de jurisdiction Imperatoris in causis matrimonialibus. They are complementary to each other, Marsilius treating especially of the dissolution of the former marriage, and Occam of the dispensation on account of consanguinity. Marsilius here also advanced the principle, that the ministers and teachers of the Word are to decide on the sufficiency of any reason for divorce under the divine law, but that the sovereign legislator must decide, on grounds of law, whether such sufficiency exists in any given case. Because of his work Defensor paene Marsilius was placed under the ban in 1237. His death is generally assigned to 1238, but Louis IV speaks of him as living, in a letter addressed to pope Benedict, in 1256, and there is no reason to doubt the genuineness of his work on marriage, which appeared in 1342. He must therefore have lived until after that date. In his life he appears as one of the most determined opponents of the unlimited pretensions of the papacy; and in his views of the headship of the Church as centring in Christ, and of the Scriptures as furnishing the sole rule of faith and practice for the Church, we recognize him as a forerunner of the Reformation. His works were published in Goldast's Monarchia a Rom. imp. (Frankf. 1668). Marte (",archer", Isa. xxi. 3; also spoken of what is gained from traffic, profite, wealth, "merchants", "people", "nations", xlv. 14), a traditional epithet or appellation of emporium. The root signifies to travel about as traders, buying and selling; thus pointing out at once the general character of the commerce of the East from the earliest age to the present. See Commerce; Mark.

Marteilh, Jean, a French martyr to the Protestant cause, was born at Bergerac in 1564, and was condemned in 1702 to the gallows at Dunkirk, where he spent seven years. He died in 1777. See The Huguenot Galley-Slave (New York, 1867); Quarterly Review (July, 1866).

Maret, Andra, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born at Montauban in 1618; studied theology at Saumur, and was appointed pastor of Saint-Affrique. In 1647 he was called to Montauban to fill the same office. In 1658 he became professor of theology in the Reformed academy of that town; he was rector there in 1660, when he was invited to Altdorf, and was received in all that could surround the pretensions of the Catholic clergy, he was nevertheless involved in a suit instituted against the pastors of Puylaurens, who were accused of having received into the Church those who, once converted to Romanism, had relapsed into Protestantism, contrary to the royal prescriptions of April, 1668, of June, 1665, and of April, 1666. He was conducted with them to the prisons of Toulouse. The attention of the government was particularly directed to him; it was hoped that if they succeeded in extracting from him an abjuration, his example would draw a great number of recusants to the Reformed churches, and would be an excuse to those who only asked a pretext for passing over to Romanism. His moderation, moreover, induced them to believe in the possibility of success. Consequently they endeavored to move him sometimes by menaces, sometimes by promises. All was useless, and they finally liberated him. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the ministers of Montauban and of the neighboring churches retired to Holland. Maret preferred Switzerland, and withdrew to the canton of Berne, where he very soon obtained the direction of one of the principal churches. He died at Berne towards the close of the 17th century, about seventy years of age. Of Maret's productions, we have Réponse à la méthode de M. le cardinal de Richelieu (Rouen, 1674, 4to). This reply, said Cathala-Couture, indicates in the author a profound knowledge, and, above all, a tone of moderation and propriety far removed from the bitterness and fanaticism which prevail ordinarily in the greater part of controversial works:—De Natura Fidei et de Gratia efficacis (Montauban, 1655, 4to):—inaugural thesis—a number of theses which he delivered, during his presidency, to the scholars of the academy of Montauban, from 1656 to 1674:—a collection of sermons that Cathala-Couture attributes to him, without, however, giving their titles in detail. See Cathala-Couture, Hist. du Queret, vol. iii: Haag, La France Protest.; Bayle, Nouvelles Lettres (La Haye, 1789), p. 514, 515; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, vol. xxxii, 447.

Martene, Edmund, a learned French Benedictine, was born at St. Jean de Lome, in the diocese of Dijon, Dec. 22, 1654. After completing his studies, he took the vows in the Benedictine convent of St. Remi, at Rheims, Sept. 8, 1672. He soon distinguished himself by his erudition, and was made professor of rhetoric of the ancient ascetic writers, and was sent by the superiors of the Congregation of St. Maur, upon whom his convent depended, to the head-quarters of the order, St. Germain des Prés, at Paris. Here he was placed under the guidance, and enjoyed... the friendship of the great lights D'Achery and Malbilon. He soon afterwards published his Commentarius in regulam S. P. Benedicti (Paris, 1690, 4to), which met with great success, and he was well rewarded by the monks of the abbey. He was also appointed to the chair of archaeology, and, encouraged by Malbilon, published next De antiquis monachorum vitulis libri quingue (Lugd., 1690, 2 vols. 4to). He was then sent to the convent of Marmoutier, where he remained several years, continuing his studies, and imbibing the strong ascetic views of Claudius Martin, whose biography he wrote upon the death of Martin. His exaggerated praise of this mystic ascetic seemed to his superiors more likely to provoke ridicule than admiration in the age of Louis XIV, and its publication was forbidden. The Vie du venerable P. de Leyva, of the Spaniards, published earlier with or without the author's consent (Tours, 1697, 8vo). He was exiled to Evreux for his insubordination. He was, however, soon transferred to the convent of St. Ouen, at Rouen, and there assisted Dom Sainte Martin in his edition of the Work of Gregory the Great. Here he was permitted the use of Martin of Tours, and added Maximes spirituelles du venerable P. D. Claude Martin (Rouen, 1688, 12mo). His next work, to which the above De antiquis monachorum, etc., was but a preface, is De antiquis ecclesiae ritibus (Rotomag, 1700 sq., 3 vols. 4to), and as appendix the Procuration de antiquis ecclesiis ritibus of Hug. de Rigal (Paris, 1701, 4to). In 1700 he published also, as a complement to D'Achery's Spicilegium, his Veterum scriptorum et monumontorum... collectio nova, after which he devoted himself specially to antiquarian researches, and writing. In 1708, the general chapter of his order sent him on a journey through France, to visit all the libraries, and to collect documents for a new Gallia Christiana. Dom Ursinus Durand (q.v.) was given him as colleague in 1709, and after six years thus employed the result of their researches was the publication of the title VeterumScriptorum et Monumontorum... amplissima collection (Paris, 1715, 6 vols. fol.). This long work, with its diocese consequence of his opposition to the bull Unigenitus, thereafter devoted himself exclusively to his studies, and in 1738 published a much enlarged edition of his archaeological works. He also continued Malbion's Annales ordinis S. Benedicti, tom. vii, ab anno Christi 1117 ad 1167 (Paris, 1789), and prepared a continuation of the Acta Sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, and an edition of the life and works of Thomas of Canterbury. He also asked permission to publish a Historia de la Congregacion de S. Maur, but was refused on account of its too enthusiastic praise of the monastic life. He died June 20, 1739. See Tasvin, Hist. Lit. de la Congr. de S. Maur; Moréri, Dict. Martha (Mārthā), of unknown signification, but a Syriac prop. name (מארתא) according to Plutarch, Vit. Mar. 17), a Jewess, the sister of Lazarus and Mary, who resided in the same house with them at Bethany (Luke x, 38, 40, 41; John xi, 1-39; xii. 2). See LAZARUS. The house at Bethany being burned in Luke x, 38, and from the leading part which Martha is always seen to take in domestic matters, it has seemed to some that she was a widow, to whom the house at Bethany belonged, and with whom her brother and sis- ter lodged; but this is uncertain, and the common opinion that the sisters managed the household of their brother is more probable. Jesus was intimate with this family, and it was well known to the monastic body in Jerusalem, being accustomed to retire thither in the evening, after having spent the day in the city. The point which the evangelists bring out most distinctly with respect to Martha lies in the contrariety of disposition between her and her sister Mary. The first notice of Christ's visiting this family occurs in Luke x, 39-42. He was received with great attention by the sisters, and Martha soon hastened to provide suitable entertainment for the Lord and his followers, while Mary remained in his presence, sitting at his feet, and drinking in the sa- cred wine poured from his lips. The active, bustling solicitude of Martha anxious that the best things in the house should be made subservient to the Master's use and solace, and the quiet earnestness of Mary, more desirous to profit by the golden opportunity of hearing his instructions than to minister to his personal wants, strongly mark the point of contrast between the characters of the two sisters. (See bishop Hall's observations on this subject in his Contemplations, iii, 4, Nos. 17, 23, 24.) She needs the reproof, "One thing is needful;" but her love, though imperfect in its form, is yet recognized as true, and she too, no less than Lazarus and Mary, has a part in the distinguishing of those who shall be saved (Matt. xiii, 9). The part taken by the sisters in the transactions connected with the death and resurrection of Lazarus (John xi, 20-40) is entirely and beautifully in accord- ance with their previous history (see Tholuck, Comment. ad loc.). The facts recorded of her indicate a strong and devout after the customary Jewish type of devotion, sharing in Messianic hopes and accepting Jesus as the Christ; sharing also in the popular belief in a resurrec- tion, but not rising, as her sister did, to the belief that Christ was making the eternal life to belong, not to the future only, but to the present. Nothing more is re- corded of Martha save that some time after, at a supper given to Christ and his disciples at Bethany, she, as usual, bustled herself in the external service. Lazarus, so marvelously restored from the grave, sat with her guests at table. "Martha served," and Mary occupied her favorite station at the feet of Jesus, which she bathed with her tears, and anointed with costly oint- ment (John xii, 1, 2). See MAR. Nowwithstanding the seeming drawbacks upon Martha's character, so vividly painted in the Gospel, there can be no doubt of her genuine piety and love for her Lord, which, though seemingly strongly touched by her sister Niemeyer, Churhak, i, 66; and Schulthess, Neueste theolog. Nachricht, 1826, ii, 413. According to tradition, she went with her brother and other disciples to Marcella, gathered round her a society of devout women, and, true to her former character, led them in administration. The wilder Provençal legends make her victorious over a dragon that laid waste the country. The town of Tarascon boasted of possessing her remains, and claimed her as its patron saint (Acta Sanctorum, and Brev. Rom. in Jul. 29; Fabrissi Lux Evangel. p. 388).

Martha, Order of, is the name sometimes given to the organization of the Hospital Sisters of St. Martha of Pontier, etc. The aim of this female order is the care of the sick and the poor, and the gratuitous instruc- tion of poor children. See HOSPITAL SISTERS.

Martha, Anne Mary, a French noblewoman, sister of Sister Martha, born at Beaunçon in 1749, deserves a place here for her devotion during the French Revolution and the wars that followed to the relief of the sick and wounded, and of prisoners of all nations. She died in 1824. The Martha Order (q.v.) is named after her.

MARTINAY, Jean, a learned Benedictine of St. Maur, was born at St. Bervier, in the diocese of Aire, Dec. 30, 1647. In 1667 he entered the convent of La Daurade, at Toulouse. He now applied himself with great zeal to the study of Oriental languages and Biblia- cal literature, both of which he afterwards taught in colleges of his order. During his residence at Bordeaux he wrote a work against the chronicological system of Pezon, which attracted the notice of his superiors. He was called to the head-quarters of his order, the abbey of St. Germain des Prés, and intrusted with the preparation of a new edition of the works of St. Jerome, marked for their learning and ingenuity than for large-ness of thought or critical acumen. He died June 16, 1717.

Among his works we notice the above-mentioned edition of the works of St. Jerome (Paris, 1688-1706, 5 vols., fol.)—Défense du texte Hébreu et de la chronologie de la Vulgate (1689)—Continuation de la Défense du texte, etc. (Part. 1693). In both these works he endeavors to prove that the Hebrew text is to be preferred to the Septuagint, and that less than 4000 years elapsed from the creation of the world to the advent of Christ:—Tractatus de saeculis et de viris de l'Écriture Sainte (1695);—Trattato d'argomento, ou manière d'expliquer l'Écriture par le secours des trois systèmes, la propre, la figurée, et l'harmonique (1704)—Vie de St. Jerôme (1706)—Harmoïne analytique de plusieurs sons choisis et rapportés inconnus de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament (1708)—Essays d'Exégèse et de Remarques sur les traductions Françaises du Nouveau Testament (1709)—Le Nouveau Testament traduit en Français sur la Vulgate (1712)—Méthode sucrée, pour apprendre à expliquer l'Écriture suivie par l'Écriture même (1716) etc. See Journal des Savants, Aug. 9, 1717; Hist. Martien, William Stockton, a ruling elder of the Presbyterian Church, was born June 20, 1798. He was of Huguenot descent, and received an early Christian education. In 1819 he commenced business, and in 1830, in connection with others, engaged in the establishment of The Presbyterian, of which he continued to be the chief proprietor and publisher until 1861. In 1838 he commenced the publication of religious books, and, as a member of the Board of Publication of the Presbyterian Church, he issued many works of standard religious character. In 1846 he was elected and ordained ruling elder, in which office he continued to labor in the Sabbath and mission schools belonging to the congregation until his death, April 16, 1861. Mr. Martien was a man of marked ability and efficiency in the Church. He was of a faithful and conscientious in the discharge of every trust, wise in counsels, and eminently gifted in management. See Wilson, Prob. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 142.

Martin (St.) of Braga, a prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, was born in Pannonia about the beginning of the 6th century. In his youth he visited the holy places of Palestine. He afterwards went to Galicia, in Spain, where he did much to preserve orthodoxy among the population, which inclined strongly to Arianism. He established several convents there, and was himself abbot of Dona Maria until about 590. At that time he was made archbishop of Braga, now Braga, in Portugal. As such he took part in the second Council of Braga, in 563, against the Priscillianists and Arians, and in 572 presided over the third council at the suggestion of Bishop Tertullian. He died about 590. He was a very voluminous writer. Among his works we notice Formula homest vete s. a. diffrentia quattor viratum (in the Bibl. Patr. Lusii. x, 382 sq.), and Gallandi Bibl. Patr. xii, 275 sq.). This work was very well received. The Historia Fortunatorum were not translated from Greek into Latin by Martin, as some have supposed, but by Paschasius, deacon of the convent of Donnia, at Martin's instigation (Roswey, Vit. Patr. [Antr. 1615], p. 1002 sq.; see also Grisee, Handbuche d. altl. Literaturgesch. ii, 127). Some Latin poeins of Martin are to be found in Simeoni, opp. (ed. Ven.), ii, 658, and in Gallandi Bibl. Patr.). But more important than all these is his Collectio Orientalum Canonom, s. Caput-ula Lexeex collecta ex Graecia symmod et vera, etc. (in Agneta, ii, 1853; iii, 1853; iv, 1854). This was a work in which he demonstrated the incorrectness of preceding editions. His edition was violently attacked by Simon and Leclerc, but Martianay as vigorously defended it. This controversy lasted a long time, yet did not prevent him from publishing a large number of works, more remarkable for their learning and ingenuity than for large-ness of thought or critical acumen. He was a man (after the 40 years elapsed from the creation of the world to the advent of Christ:—Trattato d'argomento, ou manière d'expliquer l'Écriture par le secours des trois systèmes, la propre, la figurée, et l'harmonique (1704)—Vie de St. Jerôme (1706)—Harmoïne analytique de plusieurs sons choisis et rapportés inconnus de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament (1708)—Essays d'Exégèse et de Remarques sur les traductions Françaises du Nouveau Testament (1709)—Le Nouveau Testament traduit en Français sur la Vulgate (1712)—Méthode sucrée, pour apprendre à expliquer l'Écriture suivie par l'Écriture même (1716) etc. See Journal des Savants, Aug. 9, 1717; Hist. Lit. de la Congrégation de St. Maur, p. 892-922; Herzog, Real-Encyklopäd. ix, 120; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioq. Générale, xxxiv, 2. (J. N. P.)

Martin of Dunin, a noted Polish Roman Catholic prelate, was born in the village of Wal, near Rawa, Prussian Poland, Nov. 11, 1774. Until his twelfth year he was kept at the Jesuit school of Rawa; then entered a student at the Gymnasium of Bromberg; but, having determined to devote his life to the Church and her cause, he was sent to Rome, and became a student in the Collegium Germanicum in 1788. Upon the completion of his studies, he was promoted to the order of subdeacon; later, by papal dispensation, successively deacon and priest, when he returned to his native country, which had in the meantime lost its independence, and fallen a prey to the Russians, Austrians, and Prussians. Martin himself was not a Prussian subject, he took a position in the diocese of Cracow, and was thus in the employ of that portion of the Roman Catholic Church of Poland under control of the Austrian government. In 1806 the archbishop of Gnesen, count Raczyński, called him to Gnesen, and conferred upon Martin first a canonicate, then in the metropolitan church, and shortly after made him auditor. Thereafter honors came fast and freely. In 1815 he was made chancellor of the metropolitan chapter; in 1824 master of the Cathedral of Posen, and shortly after was intrusted by the Prussian government with the supervision of the Roman Catholic school in the diocese. In 1829 he was promoted to the position of capitular vicar and general-administrator, and in 1831 was honored with the archiepiscopal chair of Gnesen and Posen. This position came to him in an hour when great discretion and strong nerves were needed to withstand the many trials of a priest in a turbulent time. The discontent of the Poles in 1830, and the rebellion in which it resulted, caused the government of Frederick William III to look with suspicion upon the priesthood of the papal church. It was a notorious fact that the latter was leagued with the revolutionists. Poland was then a devoted daughter of Rome; Prussia decidedly Protestant, the most daring opponent of papal interests. Could it be expected that the Roman Catholics would hesitate to work for the restoration of Polish independence? Has not even in our day the Prussian government all it can do to control the priest-hood in that section of her territory? See Posen. To prevent the further spread of revolutionary tendencies among the priesthood, the Prussian government inaugurated a new policy, the execution of which resulted in a spirited contest between the representative of Rome, our Martin of Dunin, and the secular authority of the province of Posen. The difficulties commenced at the seat of the metropolitan. A school for the education of Roman priests was sustained at this place by the government. Hitherto the instructors had been chosen by the Church for whose service it was intended, but now the government insisted upon its right to choose the incumbents of the professorships. The archbishop protested, but the government proceeded without any regard to his opposition. Fresh fuel was added to the flame in 1837. By the bull Instruendum emendatum XII (June 27, 1749), consented marriages were made possible only by special dispensation from the pope, and, when permission was grar-ed, the children of such unions were demanded for the Church of Rome. Poland had conceded this point to the Roman pontiff, but the Prussian government in 1837 declared that in its territory no such dispensation was needed, nor any understanding in regard to the religious education of any children from such a union. This action on the part of the government to the archbishop held to be illegal, and he stoutly asserted his right to dissent from the decision of all secular authority. Had he rested here, and awaited the settlement of this difficulty between the pope of Rome and the king of Prussia, all would have been well. Martin, however, proceeded on the assumption that the measures which clearly revealed him as a plotter against the government he had sworn to uphold. He secretly entered into communication with the clergy of his dioceses, and threatened with excommunication any and all priests who should obey the mandates of the government without his consent. Promptly the government, after hearing of this procedure, arrested the archbishop, and brought him to trial, and he was condemned to six months' confinement in a fortress, incapacitated for office, and burdened with the expense of his trial. Previous to his arrest the government had vacated the palaces of the archbishop and of the prince of Posen, and had assured them of the preservation of their rights and privileges as heretofore, but, notwithstanding all these precautions, the priesthood remained firmly bound to the interests of their religious shepherd, and no sooner had Martin of Dunin been condemned and arrested than the Roman Catholics, no doubt instrumental in securing an understanding between the archbishop and her royal spouse, Martin returned to Posen Aug. 5, 1840, and died Dec. 26, 1842.

Martin (St.) or Tours, a prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, was born in Pannonia about the year 316. He was educated at Pavia, and, at the desire of his father, who was a military man, entered the army under Constantine I, who was then emperor. When eighteen he became a convener of Christianity was baptized, and a few years afterwards went to Gaul, and there became a pupil and follower of St. Hilarius (q. v.) Pictaviensis. He quitted the army, and zealously devoted himself to the interests of orthodox Christianity. On a visit to Lombardy, wishing to see his parents, he passed through Gaul, where he was received with great favor by the public, and especially by the bishop of Tours. This favor led to the publication of a great number of works for instruction and edification; but, zealous for the glory of God and the honor of his Church, he did not confine his efforts to this field. He was indefatigable in preaching, in catechizing, and in missionary work, and during the course of his labors traversed nearly the whole of the archbishopries of Mayence and Tours. His benevolent spirit found expression in the readiness with which he ministered to the diversified wants of the people, among whom the instruction of the unlearned and of children came to be a special note. He was more应用 with removing thorns and stones from the highways, and with placing stepping-stones in streams for the convenience of travellers. Withal, he was a thorough ascetic, eating neither flesh nor fish, and traveling without a horse or sandals in the most inclement weather; and he attended mass as often as possible each day for more than twenty years. As a teacher, he was wont to lay special stress on the adoration of the mass and the worship of the Virgin, which doctrines he was often compelled to defend against opponents. He organized a number of brotherhoods in places of importance on the Rhine, and rebuilt many churches that had been destroyed in the Thirty-years' War. He died, after a

Martin submitted, but left Trèves at once, and it is said expressed himself sorry for having purchased the pardon of Narces and Locardius at that price. He died at Candes about 316. His life by his contemporaries, and a very curious letter of the bishop of Bourges to the emperor, is the first who, without suffering death for the truth, has been honored in the Latin Church as a confessor of the faith. The festival of his birth is celebrated on the 11th of November. In Scotland this day still marks the beginning of the winter-term, which is called Martinmas (q. v.). In Germany, also, his memory continues to our day among the populace in the celebration of the Martinmas. See Gregorius Turon, Hist. Martin of Trèves, a Capuchin monk, was born about 1630, in the archbishopric of Trèves. He took the cowl at an early age, and a little later became a lecturer of theology; but in consequence of a pestilence, whose ravages broke up his school in 1666, he devoted himself to the care of the sick. A catechist, by his ministrations, he was received with great favor by the public, and especially by the bishop of Trèves. His exertions led to the publication of a great number of works for instruction and edification; but, zealous for the glory of God and the honor of his Church, he did not confine his efforts to this field. He was indefatigable in preaching, in catechizing, and in missionary work, and during the course of his labors traversed nearly the whole of the archbishoprics of Mayence and Trèves. His benevolent spirit found expression in the readiness with which he ministered to the diversified wants of the people, among whom the instruction of the unlearned and of children came to be a special note. He was more应用 with removing thorns and stones from the highways, and with placing stepping-stones in streams for the convenience of travellers. Withal, he was a thorough ascetic, eating neither flesh nor fish, and traveling without a horse or sandals in the most inclement weather; and he attended mass as often as possible each day for more than twenty years. As a teacher, he was wont to lay special stress on the adoration of the mass and the worship of the Virgin, which doctrines he was often compelled to defend against opponents. He organized a number of brotherhoods in places of importance on the Rhine, and rebuilt many churches that had been destroyed in the Thirty-years' War. He died, after a brief illness, Sept. 10, 1712. His works, after being disregarded for a time, are again offered to the public; they mostly consist of contributions to practical religion. The most important are Christian Doctrine (Co-logne, 1666) — History of the Church (1688) — Exposition of the Mass (1698); — Legends of Saints (1700): — All the Directories, or Precepts for the Finance of the Church of Christ (1731); — Life of Christ (Mayence and Augsburg, 1708). — Wetzeler u. Weise (R. C.), Kirchen Lexikon, xii, 771 sq.

Martin I, Pope, son of Fabricius, a distinguished citizen of the Papal States, was called to the papal chair July 5, 640, as successor to Theodore I. The emperor Constans II made every exertion to induce Martin to accept the See, but he had promised to keep his professed forbidding discussions between the orthodox Romanists and the Monotheletes. Martin, on the contrary, assembled a council at Rome (the first Lateran), without the emperor's consent, in Oct., 649, in which all heresies, and particularly that of the Monotheletes, were condemned, and the decrees of Heraclius and of Constans II denounced. (See for details the article LATERAN COUNCIL [1].) The emperor, enraged at this opposition, caused Martin to be taken prisoner, June 19, 653, and exiled him to the island of Naxos. On Sept. 17, 654, the pope was taken to Constantinople, and kept in prison there for six months. But he bore all his trials with great firmness, refusing to be reconciled to the heretics, and was finally transported to the Thracian Chersonesus. There, in the midst of unfriendly barbarians, he had to suffer the great-dest of all the deaths he bore in. But it was with patience and piety, and died Sept. 16, 655. His body was later removed to Rome. He is commemorated by the Church of Rome Nov. 12. Eighteen encyclical letters attributed to Martin are published in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and in Labbe's Concilia. See F. Fagi, Breviar-

Martin II (Marinus I), Pope, was born at Monte-fiascone, in the Papal States. He was thence sent to Constantinople (686, 688, 881) as papal legate to oppose the nomination of Photius as patriarch, but when he was about to sail, Dec. 23, 883, did not consent in the policy of his predecessor, John VIII, but reversed the consequence of Photius, of bishop Formosus of Porto, and others. His reign lasted only fourteen months. He died Feb. 14, 881. See Fleury, Hist. Eccl. iii, 542; F. Fagi, Breviarium Pontificum Romanorum, etc.; Muratori, Ann. Ital.; Artaud de Montor, Hist. des souve-rains Pontifes Romains, ii, 141; Bower, Hist. Popes, v, Générale, xxxiv, 18; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, ix, 124.

Martin III (called by some Marinus II), Pope, a Roman by birth, succeeded Stephen II, 945. He died only four years after, and was succeeded by Agapetus II. Martin III was a patron of learning, and an noble Christian exemplar.

Martin IV (Simon de la Brie), Pope, was probably a native of Tournai, France, and of humble origin. He was educated at Tours, and there entered the Franciscan order. St. Louis, king of France, desired him, and gave him a position at the church of St. Martin. In 1282 he was created cardinal by pope Urban IV, and by pope Gregory X was appointed apostolical legate to the French court. He continued in this office under the popes Hadrian V, John XXI, and Nicholas III; but upon the decease of the last named (Aug. 29, 1280) he was elected successor in the papal chair in 1281, through the influence of Charles of Anjou, king of Sicily and Naples.
The "Sicilian Vespers" (q. v.), in 1282, having elected Charles of Sicily, Martin came to the support of his royal friend with all his influence, and even by the spiritual censures he had at his command sought to maintain French domination in Sicily. He excommunicated Peter of Aragon, whom the Sicilians had elected king; but his excommunication was of no more avail than the arms of the new French monarchs, for the Papacy had no weight in Sicily. Martin also excommunicated the Byzantine emperor Michael, and by this measure widened the breach between the Greek and Latin churches. He died in 1298, and was succeeded by Honorius IV. It is to the use of the Councils of the Church in the unpopular cause of Charles of Anjou that many Church historians supply the decline and ultimate extinction of the authority in temporals which the papacy had hitherto exercised.
Not only did he lower the popular esteem of the papal authority, but he made himself a laughing-stock by his falsehood and inability to make good his promises.
Letters of this pope are found in D'Achery, Spicilieg, iii, 694. His biography (Vita) was written by Bernard, Grindo, and by Muratori. See Muratori, Annali d'Italia, vii, 485-482; Artaud de Montor, Hist. des souverains Pon-tifes Romains, ii, 56-68; Bower, Hist. Popes, vi, 324;

Martin V (Otto de Colonna), pope from 1417 to 1431, was the son of Agapetus de Colonna, and a descendant of one of the most ancien and illustrious families of Italy. Martin studied canon law at Perugia, and, on the death of his father, was elected pope in 1417 by Urban VI prothonotary and referendary; by Boniface IX nuncio to the States of Italy; under Innocent VII he received the appointment of cardinal deacon of St. George ad Aulicium Aureum; and by John XXIII he was appointed apostolic legate for the patrimony of St.
Peter, and vicar-general for the apostolic see in Umbria.
When Gregory XII, because of a breach of his oath of office, became so unpopular as to be deserted by his cardinals, Martin alone adhered to him steadfastly until he was deposed by the Council of Pisa. He was likewise islanded on a Tuscany, in 1422, by his successor, John, and even followed him in his flight from Constance, thus clearly foretokening the uncompromising stand which he afterwards took against all opposition to what he conceived to be the papal prerogative.
The general discontent with the abusive reign of pope John XXIII, which Gerson, the noted tutor of the University of Paris, had severely attacked, not even hesitating to say that the pontiff was "no longer servant of servants, but John, the lord of lords," as well as other suspicious events, had resulted in the general council (1417) (q. v.), whose moving spirit Martin determined on reform. Their two great objects were the restoration of the Church's unity, and the reformation of the abuses which had crept in. One of their first steps, largely influenced by the emperor Sigismund, was to depose pope John. There still remained, however, two rival pontiffs, Benedict XIII and Gregory XII, each claiming the title of supreme head of the Church.
The latter of these was induced to abdicate, and the former, being without any temporal support, was ignored by the council. The election of a pope was forthcoming considered. The choice fell upon cardinal Otto de Colonna by an overwhelming majority of the electors from the five nations represented in the council, and the umanious vote of the cardinals. Neander (Ch. Hist. v, 126) thus narrates the proceedings for the election:
"The Germans set the example of sacrificing their own will for the good of the Church by declariing themselves ready to give their votes for an Italian; they also prevailed on the English to yield. The French and Spaniards were refractory at first; but finally, after the invocation of the Holy Ghost, on St. Martin's day, in November, they were persuaded to place for the Holy Spirit as a spirit of concord; and on the same day cardinal Otto of Colonna was chosen pope, af-after the election had lasted three days." The election having taken place on St. Martin's day, the new pope, in honor of that saint, assumed the title of Martin V. The whole assembly was in an ecstasy of joy at the result, especially because it exhibited the unanimity of Liliothio conflicting parties. Martin was immediately invested with the papal robes and placed on the altar, where the emperor hastened to do him homage by kissing his feet.

But scarcely was Martin securely seated on the pontifical throne when the whole face of affairs at Constance changed, and it soon became evident that all instabilities had been eliminated, for which the Diet of Bourg had been called and John XXIII deposed, had been put away from the mind of Martin. Mild, but sagacious and resolute, "seeming to yield everything to the emperor and council, he conceded nothing." As early as April following his election (Nov. 11, 1417), he dissolved the council, which had struggled through three years and a half for reform, without being any nearer the accomplishment of their hopes than when they began, and the spirit of advance which had inspired the uprising of Bohemia and the organization of the Lollards (q. v.) was crushed for a time, to rise only two centuries later in the Hussites and the Hussites' movements. The result of all was that Italy remained a schism nearly destroying the mother Church. So far from aiding a reform, Martin V's first act was one of tyranny. "The papal chancery had been the object of the longest, loudest, and most just clamor. The day after he entered the pope published the decree, abolishing all the regulations established by his predecessors, even by John XXII. . . . The form was not less dictatorial than the substance of the decree. It was an act of the pope, not of the council. It was an absolute resumption of the whole power of reformation, so far at least as the papal court, into his own hands" (Milman, Latin Christianity, vii, 517). The Council of Constance, instead of shaking the papal supremacy, had, by the choice of Otto de Colonna, raised it higher than ever before by producing a pope who, as Romanists will have it, "recovered the waning reverence of Christendom." Martin V was the product of no schism or party, but of the Church universal, and he was justified in seeking such supremacy; nor do we wonder that, in the last consistory of the cardinals at Constance, Martin V put forth a constitution by which, in direct contradiction to the principles so distinctly laid down at Constance, he directed that no one should be allowed to dispute any decision of the pope in matters of faith, and to appeal from him to a general council (Neander, v, 127). See INFALLIBILITY. From Constance the pope proceeded to Rome, where he was received with demonstrations of great joy, and honored with the title of the Father of His Country. He set himself with great energy to the task of restoring the fallen glory of the Eternal City, and so well did he succeed that he received the additional title of Romulus the Second. By his address and superior sagacity, Martin V succeeded in bringing a.pro-tr sensual peace with Alphonso of Aragon, and at Aix-la-Chapelle, a truce was made by which all questions of succession were left to determination, which at once secured his own ends and pacified a stubborn adversary. At the Council of Constance the next general council was appointed to meet, five years later, at Pavia. Accordingly such a council was actually opened there in the year 1418, but, on account of the spread of the pestilence called the Black Death, it was dissolved and transferred to Sienna. But at Sienna also only a few sessions were held; and, on the pretense that the small number of prelates assembled did not authorize the continuance of the council, in conformity with the determination of the Council of Constance, the next meeting was not held to be held a year later, in the year 1431 at Basle (comp. Fisher [G. F.], The Reformation [N.Y. 1873, 8vo], p. 43). See JULIAN, Cardinal. This council was intended to close the difficulty with the Hussites (q. v.), whose leaders Martin V had so summarily disposed of at Constance (q. v.), and to effect the reunion of the Greek Church. At this important crisis he died, in Rome, of an apoplectic fit, in February, 1431. As a man, Martin V was of that class who form their determinations deliberately and adhere to them steadily, and, if necessary, die in them. He was of great administrative ability. He has been accused of avarice, though perhaps unjustly. He certainly favored learning, and the palaces of his cardinals were the schools of advancement for the youth of Italy. He has also been charged, and with greater justice, with nepotism, an instance of which is the appointment of one of his nephews to the archdeaconry of Canterbury. The main features of his reign are the pacification of Italy, the restoration of peace between France and England, the rebuilding of Rome, and the wars against Bohemia. He was succeeded by pope Eugenius IV. See Bower, Hist. Popes, vii, 200 sq.; Neander, Ch. Hist., 185 sq.; Milman, Lat. Christianity, vii, 518 sq.; Muratori, Script. iii, p. ii; Leo, Gesch. v. Martin, André, a French ecclesiastic and philosopher, was born in Poitou in 1621; was admitted to the oratory in 1641, and instructed in philosophy. In 1679 he became a professor of theology at Saumur, but was suspended some time after, because accused of Jansenism. He died at Poitiers, Sept. 26, 1696. He was one of the earliest advocates of the Cartesian philosophy, and wrote Philosophia Moralia Christiana (Angers, 1658). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xxxiv, 32.

Martin, Asa, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington Co., Ohio; studied theology privately; was licensed by Salem Presbytery, and in 1848 ordained pastor of Mount Vernon Church, Ind. In 1848 he became pastor of Hartford Church, Ind.; in 1852, of Bloomfield, Iowa; in 1854, of West Grove, Iowa; in 1861, of Olivet, in Maharaska Co., Iowa, where he died, Nov. 9, 1866. Mr. Martin was a man of retiring manners, a silent, prudent, an excellent preacher, and a earnest and sound preacher. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almana, 1867, p. 912.

Martin, Claude, a French theologian, was born at Tours in 1619. He had scarcely attained twelve years of age when he was abandoned by his mother, who entered the convent of the Ursulines. After having studied for some time in the city of Orleans, he entered the Order of the Benedictines. In 1654 he was appointed prior of Blancs-Manteaux. He afterwards filled the same charge at Saint-Cornelle de Compiegne, at Saint-Serge d'Angers, at Bonne-Nouvelle de Rouen, and at Mar-moutiers. He died Aug. 9, 1696. Martin was distinguished both for great learning and deep piety. His works are Méditations Christiennes pour les Dimanches, les fêtes, et les principales fêtes de l'année (Paris, 1669, 2 vols. 4to)—Complété pour la retraite du mois (Paris, 1670, 12mo)—Pratique de la règle de Saint-Benoît (Paris, 1674, 12mo)—Instructions merveilleuses pour la cérémonie, supérieure des Ursulines en Canada (Paris, 1671, 4to)—Méditation pour la fête et pour l'octave de sainte Ursule (Paris, 1678, 16mo).—Hoefer, Nouv. Martin, C. P., a Congregational minister, was born in Illinois about 1814. He was educated at Knox College, Galesburg, Illinois; taught in a academy at Lisbon, Illinois, four years, and then entered the Union Theological Seminary, New York City, to prepare for the ministry. Upon the completion of his studies, he was sent by the American Missionary Society to act as missionary among the Copts in Egypt. His health failing him, he was obliged to return after a three years' stay in the East. Later he became pastor of the Congregational Church in Peru, Illinois, and remained there until 1863, when he returned to the west and became a member of the western branch of the American Tract Society. He labored among the soldiers at Chattanooga until he fell in the work, March 7, 1864.

Martin, David, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Revel, Languedoc, in 1639. He studied philosophy at Nimes, and theology at Pay-Laurens. After acting as pastor at several places, he was obliged to leave France in consequence of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes: so great was the consideration he enjoyed that Roman Catholics themselves assisted him to flee. He next became pastor at Utrecht, and, although invited to Deventer as professor of theology in 1686, and to Haag in 1685, he remained attached to his congregation. He died at Utrecht in 1721. He wrote three volumes of sermons, some polemical and apologetic works, and some critical essays, all of which give evidence of his learning and talent. The most important of his works are: Traité sur l'Ecriture Sainte, explication des notes courtes et claires (Utrecht, 1696, 4to): the notes are partly dogmatic, partly literary, and were subsequently used by the editor of the French Roman Catholic translation of the N. T. published at Brussels (1700, 4 vols. 12mo): — Les Vieux et le Nouveau Testament (Amst. 1703, 2 vols. fol.). It contained some magnificent copper-plate engravings, and was often reprinted. But Martin's chief claim on posterity lies in his revision of the Geneva version of the Bible, which he undertook at the request of the Walloon communities. It appeared in 1707 (Amst. 2 vols. fol.), and was often reprinted in 8vo. The first edition contained theological and critical notes, with a general introduction, and special ones appended to each book; these, however, were omitted in the subsequent popular editions. It was approved by the Synod of Leuwarden in 1710. Martin's translation, subsequently revised by Osterwald, is still the one most in use in the Protestant churches of France. Among his other works we notice Sermons sur divers textes de l'écriture sainte (Amst. 1708, 8vo): — L'Excellence de la foi et de ses effets, expliquée en 8x sermons (Amst. 1710, 2 vols. 8vo):— Traité de la Religion naturelle (Amst. 1713, 8vo; translated into Dutch in 1720, English in 1720, and German in 1725): — Le vrai sens du Psalme cx (Amst. 1715, 8vo). His dissertation on natural religion caused quite a long and spirited controversy with Arian Emlyn (q.v.), Robert Licier, Miró, vol. xxi; Chaufépifie, Dict. hist.; Prosper Marchand, Dict.; Naray, Bel. Craig, vol. ii; Haag, La France Protesante, vol. vii; Hoeve, Nouv. Bel. Générale, xxxiv, 84; Herzog, Real-Encylop. ix, 130.

Martin, Bnoch R. a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington Cou., Ind., about the year 1811. He received a good common-school education; studied theology privately; was licensed by Cincinnati Presbytery, and ordained by Salem Presbytery in 1836. He preached for several years to the Mt. Vernon and Utica churches, in Clark Co., Ind.; thence removed to Jefferson Co., Ind., and preached to the Mt. Hebron, Sharon, and Mt. Vernon churches, and afterwards became pastor of Sharon Church, Ill. In 1862 he accepted a call to the Pisgah and Sharon churches, Ind. He died Nov. 26, 1863. Mr. Martin was a very useful minister, and a sincere Christian; he did much for the cause of education and the suppression of intemperance. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 167.

Martin, Gregory, an English Roman Catholic theologian of the 16th century, was a native of Sussex, and was admitted a scholar of St. John's College, Oxford, in 1557. He became professor of Hebrew at Douay, and subsequently at Rheims. He died in 1582. He is supposed to have been the author, or one of the authors, of the Rheims translation of the New Testament, and of the Old Testament in the Douay version. He wrote several theologically-controversial pamphlets, among them A Discovery of the manifold Corruptions of the Holy Scriptures by the Heretics of our Days, specially the English Antichrists (printed in Fulke's Defence of the Translations, Parker Society, 1843).—Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. a. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Biblio. a. v.

Martin, Jacques de, a French ecclesiastic, noted as a writer on philosophical subjects, was born in the diocese of Mirepoix, May 11, 1684; was educated at Toulouse; entered the order of the Congregation of St. Maur, and was made abbot of the monastery of St. Maur at Paris in 1727, and died there Sept. 5, 1751. He was a multifarious writer, and possessed an unusual acquaintance with the most diversified subjects of learning. But he was censured for the immodesty of his illustrations. His most important work is La Religion des Gaulois (Paris, 1727, 2 vols. 4to), in which he attempts to prove that the religion of the Gauls was derived from that of the patriarchs; and that, consequently, an illustration of their religious ceremonies must tend to throw light on many dark passages in the Scriptures. He wrote also Expositions de plusieurs textes difficiles de l'Écriture Sainte: — De l'origine de l'âme, selon le sentiment de Saint Augustin (1736, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bel. Générale, xxxiv, 87.

Martin, James, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Union District, S. C., May 14, 1801. He graduated at the Newberry Theological Seminary, at Chapin, S. C., in 1825; studied divinity under the care of Dr. Cunningham, of Concord Church, Green Co., Ala.; was licensed in 1827, and soon after ordained as a domestic missionary in West Florida and South Alabama. In 1830 he took charge of the churches at Linden and Prairie Bluffs, Ala.; in 1837 moved to Louisi. Miss., and in 1844 he organized a Church; in 1841 became pastor of a Church at Moultona Springs, Miss.; in 1848 removed to Memphis, Tenn., where he taught school until 1850, when he went to Arkansas, and organized several churches. He died Sept. 14, 1860. Mr. Martin possessed an excellent mind; his education was sound and classical, his piety devout and habitual. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 445.

Martin, John (1), an English Baptist minister of the 18th century, was in early life a mechanic; but, brought under the influence of Gospel teaching, he studied, and became the Baptist clergyman of a Baptist congregation at London. He published a number of occasional Sermons and theological treatises (1763-1807). Of these, the most important was The Conquest of Canaan (Lond. 1797, 12mo). Of his occasional sermons, the one on Acts xiv, 19-22, and the special mention, entitled The Gospel of our Salvation (Lond. 1798, 8vo). Besides, there were published three volumes of his sermons, one treating of The Character of Christ (1783, 8vo); the other two were edited by Thomas Palmer (1817, 2 vols. 8vo). John Martin is described by Ivinny (Baptists) as a "man of strong mental powers," and as a truly "evangelical preacher." See his Autobiography (1797, 12mo). See also Darling, Cyclop. Biblio. a. v.; Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Auth. a. v.

Martin, John (2), an English painter of Biblical subjects, was born near Hexham, Northumberland, July 19, 1789; went to London in 1806, and, after some years spent in obscure studious, made his first appearance as an exhibitor at the Royal Academy in 1812. His picture was entitled Saddak in Search of the Waters of Oblivion, and attracted much notice. It was followed within two years by the Expulsion from Paradise, Cys- tar, and "The first Speech to the Sun," which established his name. The last of these works was a great success in point of popularity, but it was also the cause of a quarrel between Martin and the English Academy, in consequence of which he never obtained any distinction from the society. From this period till nearly the close of his life he incessantly painted pictures in a style which was considered "sublime" by the same sort of people who thought Montgomery's Satan and Pollok's Course of Time equal to Paradise Lost. The principal of these productions are Belshazzar's Feast (1821); Creation (1824); The Deluge (1826); The Fall of Niniveh (1828); Pandemonium (1841); Morning and Evening (1844); The Last Man (1853). He died in Man. Feb. 9, 1854. — Chambers, Cyclop. s. v. See Autobiography of John Martin in the Athenæum (1854).

Martin, John Nicholas, a distinguished minister of the Lutheran Church, was born in the duchy of Deux Ponts, or Zweibrücken, in Rhenish Bavaria, and came to this country about the middle of the 18th century, in company with a Lutheran colony, as their spiritual teacher. They landed in Philadelphia with the intention of settling permanently on the rich soil of Pennsylvania, but, as the land they desired could not be procured, they passed on to the valley of the Shenandoah, whither many of the German emigrants had already been attracted; but the congregation to which Mr. Martin ministered finally determined to locate in South Carolina, in a district between the Broad and Saluda rivers, a favorite spot with the Germans of that day in the South. The German population in this region increased fast, and Lutheran churches were established on the neighboring rivers. The Martin editor remained for many years, all the time officiating in his vernacular German. In 1776 he took charge of the Lutheran Church in Charleston. This was his last field of labor. Many reminiscences of his life and services during this eventful period of our country's history are still preserved. The American Revolution interrupted the peaceful course of his ministry, and exposed him to various annoyances and trials. His naturally ardent temperament, as well as his love of liberty, led him to expose the cause of the American colonies with great zeal and public devotion. He was arrested by the enemy; and when it was ascertained that he would not pray for the king, and that his ministrations were not favorable to the royal cause, his culprit labors were interdicted, he was put under arrest, and a guard placed over him. Subsequently his property was confiscated, and he driven from the city. He remained in the interior of the state until the conclusion of the war. On his return in 1783, although aged and his physical vigor gone, his congregation still clung to him. They urged him to resume his pastoral relations; but he ministered to them only until a regular pastor could be procured for them from Germany. In 1787 he was released from further service, with a vote of thanks for his fidelity with which he had ministered to the spiritual interests of his people. He now retired to his little farm near Charleston, where his physical power gradually failed, and he closed his honored and useful life July 27, 1795, illustrating in his death the principles which through a long life he had advocated. Mr. Martin was faithfully devoted to his work, and exceedingly useful as a minister of the Gospel. He possessed an integrity that no considerations of personal interest or expediency could seduce from the straight line of duty. He was a man of great courage and decision, firm and persistent in the maintenance of his principles, with an energy of will and a zeal which no discouragements could repress and no failure abate. In the vindication of what he believed was the truth, he was prepared for any emergency. The people appreciated his sagacity, and relied on his clear, practical judgment. He steadfastly devoted himself to their interests. It was the constant burden of his heart and the earnest purpose of his life to honor Christ in the salvation of souls. He was regarded by the community in which he lived as a great blessing. His death was considered a public calamity. (M.L.S.)

Martin, Margaret Maxwell, a lady Methodist noted as a writer, was born at Dumfries, Scotland, in 1807, emigrated to America, and was married in 1836 to the Rev. William Martin, a Methodist preacher. She has published Methodism, or Christianity in Europe, and other religious works.

Martin Mar-Prelate, Controversy of. About 1590, the year of the Armada, there appeared in England a number of tracts—"a series of scurrilous libels in which the queen, the bishops, and the rest of the con"form ing clergy, were assailed with every kind of con"humelry" (Hutchins, p. 256).—Ezra, Ch. Hist., p. 224. Martin's tracts were printed by some radicals of the Puritan camp when the controversy between the Church and the Puritans was waxing hot. Marsden says "there is some reason to believe that the whole was a contrivance of the Jesuits." The charge against the latter is based, however, only upon assumption, and deserves no encouragement. The public printing-presseye being at the time shut against the Puritans, all their printing had to be done secretly, and it is therefore difficult to determine the origin of the "Martin Mar-Prelate" tracts. The Puritan divines Udall and Penny, on their trials, were charged with the authorship, or with a wilful knowledge of the authors; but they refused to make any revelations, and the real authors of these once dreaded and proscribed, but now ludicrous lampoons, remains a mystery. Their titles and contents are given somewhat in detail by Neale, Hist. of the Puritans (1886); Mar-Prelate tracts were reprinted as Puritan Disc. Tracts (Lond. 1843). See also Maskell, Hist. of the Martin Mar-Prelate Controversy (Lond. 1846); Marsden, Early Puritans, p. 198 sq.; id. Martin, Saint, Marquise Louis Claude de, called "the Unknown Philosopher," a noted French mystic, was born at Ambaiss (Touraine) Jan. 18, 1748; was educated for the bar; preferred a military life, and, through the influence of M.de Choiseul, obtained a commission. The regiment to which he was assigned contained several officers who had been initiated into a sort of mystical freemasonry by the Portuguese mystic Martinez Pasqua, he soon became enamored with mystical doctrines, and read largely in that line. Mysticism, however, was at that time confined to rather narrow limits in France; the mind of nearly the whole country was absorbed in the rising school of materialism, and to combat the latter became the task of our obscure officer of the regiment of Foix. Saint-Martin soon threw up his commission, and gave himself wholly to writing and meditation, bent to crushed, by every means in his power, the cold, heartless form of speculation which was then prevailing over the whole country. First he flirted with the mystical works of Jacob Buxhme; but finally he originated a religious mysticism, which, according to Morell (Hist. of Philos., in the 18th Cent., p. 208), consisted of the principles of the Cambridge Platonist Henry More, "reared up under the guidance of a versatile and enthusiastic spirit, as a barrier against the philosophical sensationalism of Condillac and the religious scepticism of Voltaire," But as all mystical schools have sooner or later found their natural issue in fanaticism, so Saint-Martin also struck against this self-same rock, and, despite the guarded manner in which he handled the theoretical points of his own system, the heresies contained in his writings are neither few nor small. Yet, notwithstanding many fears and vagaries of an ultra eccentric description, Saint-Martin has left us one of the best refutations of sensualist errors on record, and can still interest the mind in his materialism. The last century has to our very day failed to receive the recognition deserved. With his eyes fixed upon the invisible world, he passed unheeded through all the horrors of the French Revolution; he saw the Reign of Terror, the Directory, the Consulate, and quietly and happily closed a life of great literary activity at Aulnay, near Paris, Oct. 13, 1808.

Among Saint-Martin's achievements, his victory over the sensationalist Garat deserves especial notice.
The legislators of the first French Revolution, in their attempt to remodel society after the Reign of Terror, had taken as their code of laws, and as their universal panacea, a debasing theory, which they, however, imagined would regenerate the world, and according to which they most naturally therefore wished to train the new generation, which was the origin of the Ecole Normale, subsequently remodelled and organized by Napoleon, and still rendering the greatest services as a seminary of teachers. Saint-Martin had been sent by the district he inhabited to attend the lectures delivered in that school; and, of course, was expected from the sound goad of the celebrated philosopher Garaud, whose precepts on 'ideology' were scarcely anything else but a rich chaff of Condillac, dressed up with much taste, but still more assurance. A disciple of Jacob Behme, the young mystic, felt that what society required was not the delusion of matter, nor the Encyclopédie made easy; he boldly rose up to refute the professor, and, by a reference to the third volume of the Débats des Écoles Normales, the reader can follow all the circumstances of a discussion which ended in Garaud's discomfiture. M. Caro (Saint-Martin's biographer) has supplied a valuable record of this whole affair—a most important epoch in the life of Saint-Martin. M. Caro, in his Essai sur la vie et la Doctrine de Saint-Martin (Paris, 1856), has given a complete list of Saint-Martin's works. They are rather numerous. The best are the following: Des États et des Hommes, ou les hommes au Pratique universel de la Science (1775); L'Homme de Désir; and De l'Esprit des Choses, ou coup d'œil Philosophiques sur la nature des êtres, et sur l'objet de leur existence (1800, 2 vols. 8vo). These supply a clue to the main features of the author's character, and by a careful study of them we are enabled to ascertain the exact position he occupied in the gallery of modern metaphysicians.

M. Damiron, in reviewing the life and works of Saint-Martin (Archives Littéraires, 1804), affords us the following résumé of Saint-Martin's views: "The system of Saint-Martin aims at explaining everything by means of man. Man is to him the key to every phenomenon, and the image of all truth. Taking, therefore, literally the famous oracle of Delphi, 'Nouss te ipsum,' he maintains that, if we fall into no mistakes respecting existence, and the harmony of all beings in the universe, we have only to understand ourselves, inasmuch as the body of man has a necessary relation to everything visible, and his spirit is the type of everything that is invisible. What we should study, then, are the physical faculties, whose exercise is often influenced by the senses and emotions, and the moral faculties, which concern the conscience, which supposes free-will. It is in this study that we must seek for truth, and we shall find in ourselves all the necessary means of arriving at it." This is it which our author calls natural revelation. For example: "The smallest attention," he says, "suffice to assure us that we can neither communicate nor form any idea without its being preceded by a picture or image of it, engendered by our own understanding; in this way it is that we originate the plan of a building or any other work. Our creative faculty is vast, active, inextinguishable; but, in order to act at all, we see that it operates only successively, and rarely by a simultaneous temporary, dependent, i.e. that it owes its origin to a creative faculty, which is superior, independent, and universal, of which ours is but a feeble copy. Man, therefore, is a type, which must have a prototype, and that prototype is God. This extract affords a fair insight, we think, into the philosophical mysticism by which Saint-Martin attempted to supplant the shallow materialism and growing infidelity of his age, and to induce his countrymen to take a deeper insight into the constitution of the human mind, and its close connection with the divine. Caro's work above alluded to, Damiron, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de philosophie au 18e siècle, vol. i; Malter, Saint-Martin, Le Philosophie inconnu (1862); Morel, History of Modern Philosophy, p. 206, 209; London Quarterly Review, 1856 (Jan.); 1857 (Apr.), p. 177; Methodist Quarterly Review, 1863 (Apr.), p. 359. Saint-Martin, Sarah, an English philanthropist, was born near Yarmouth in 1791, and died in 1845. She was distinguished for her labors in the cause of prison reform. See Brief Biographies, by Samuel Smiles; Rev. Erskine Neale, Christianity and Infidelity Contrasted; and Life of Madame de Staël (April, 1847).

Saint-Martin, Thomas, an English jurist noted for the part he took in the Marian persecution, was born at Cerne, in Dorsetshire, in the first half of the 16th century, and was educated at Winchester School and at New College, Oxford. In 1555 he was made chancellor of the diocese of Winchester. Martin wrote in Latin, Life of William of Wykeham, the founder of New College. He vehemently opposed the marriage of priests, and thus also created considerable excitement. He also took part with Story in the trial of archbishop Cranmer at Oxford. He died in 1584. See Hook, Eccl. Bispl. v.; Smyth, Azoil.; Wood, Athene Oxoniensis.

Saint-Martin, William Wsner, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Kahway, N. J., Dec. 18, 1857. He received a most careful parental training; pursued his preparatory studies in the Academy at Brooklyn, N. Y.; graduated at Yale College, as salutatorian of his class, in 1880; studied divinity at the Union Theological Seminary, New York City, where he graduated in 1885, and was immediately licensed and ordained as a home missionary to the Pacific coast. On his arrival there, he began his labors in Sonora, and joined Sierra Nevada Presbytery; thence he supplied the Howard Street Church, San Francisco, for a few months, and subsequently accepted a call from the Church at San José, but, before his installation took place, was taken ill and died, Oct. 16, 1865. Mr. Martin was characterized by an exceedingly frank and genial disposition, clear and discriminating habits of thought, and thorough, decided Christian principles. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 811.

Saint-Martin, Brethren, or Knights of the Order of St. Martin of Tours, were organized in 1294 by archbishop Gerhard, and renewed by archbishop Berthold in 1497, and flourished until the days of the French Revolution. Their object was the attainment of a godly life, brotherly love among the knights, and protection of the holy faith. Their sign was a golden shield, with a picture of St. Martin.—Regensburg Altn. Encyklop. a. v. Martinbrüder.

Saint-Maria, a Christian martyr in the reign of the tyrant Maximin, was a noble and beautiful virgin of Rome, and along with a host of Christians suffered martyrdom, their bodies, which were finished at length by the sword of the executioner, A.D. 235. Multitudes of Christians, in the course of these three years' persecution, were slain without trial, and buried indiscriminately in heaps, fifty or sixty being sometimes cast into a pit together.—Fox, Martials.

Saint-Martial, Stephen, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Maryland in 1798, and entered the itinerant ministry in 1806. He continued in active service for fifty-three years, filling the most important appointments in the Philadelphia and New York conferences. For twenty years he held the office of Conference marshal on the Rhinebeck, Long Island, Prattsville, New York, and Poughkeepsie districts. In all these posts his fidelity, prudence, and capacity were amply shown; and through his long term of ministerial service he maintained an unblemished and even exalted reputation. He was elected to nearly every General Conference between 1820 and 1856. He died at Tarrytown, N. Y., May 23, 1860. See Smith, Memorial Hist. N. Y. and N. Y. East Conf., p. 127.

Saint-Mat, Theodore Dwight, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born, of Congre-gional parents, at Greenfield, Mass., Nov. 28, 1820; was educated at the Western Reserve Seminary; taught for a time by his conversion to serve in the local ministry for several years; was admitted into the Ohio Conference in the fall of 1852, and appointed to Blenod Circuit. His subsequent appointments were Maysville, Marietta, Logan, Pickerington, and Newark, when, in 1859, he left the Conference. Convinced, and thenceforth he sustained the relation of local preacher. In the fall of 1871 the presiding elder of the Zanesville District, at the request of the Circuit, appointed him as a supply with the venerable David Smith on the Hebron Charge, in the bounds of which he resided. He entered upon his work with commendable success, but died on April 7, 1872. He was gifted and fluent in language, and his pulpit efforts generally ranged above mediocrity. See S. C. Riker, in West. Christ. Advocate, July 10, 1872.

Martinet, Louis-François, a Roman Catholic divine, was born at Epernay, diocese of Rheims, April 19, 1758. At the age of sixteen he entered the regular canons of the Congregation of France, and during his course of studies at the abbey of St. Genevieve, in Paris, he was particularly favored by his superiors, who early made him teacher of philosophy and theology. Ordained priest in the year 1780, he was appointed, on the death of Mgr. Gaudron, archbishop of Rheims, in 1789, to succeed him as the bishop of Angers. In this capacity he was elected delegate to the provincial assembly of the clergy of Anjou, and later to the states-general of 1789. Faithful to the principles of the minority of the Constituent Assembly, he was constantly opposed to the legislative measures which, under the semblance of a useful reform, had a destructive and ruinous effect. He succeeded in escaping persecution, and emigrated to England. There he did not share in the illusions of his companions in exile of a speedy return to France; and, with a view to exercising his ministry undisturbed, he learned himself the use of the English. Gifted with indefatigable industry, and severely ascetic in his habits, he was enabled to regulate his time judiciously, and thus attain great success. In 1804 he returned to France, and at the period of the concordat was elected priest of Courbevoie. He passed from there to the parish of Saint-Leu-Saint-Gilles, at Paris. It is to Martinet that we owe the preservation of the church of Saint-Leu; and, notwithstanding the opposition of M. Frerot, the prefect of the Seine, he succeeded in interesting powerful protectors, and the church was not abandoned by the state. He was also enabled to use the funds of the abbeys for the reparation and embellishment of the edifice. In 1820 he was made priest of the parish church of Saint-Laurent, and, although advanced in age, his zeal and activity did not diminish in his administration. He died May 30, 1836. Martinet was one of the most worthy priests of the clergy of Paris. A knowledge of a great variety of subjects, an unbiased, clear, and methodical mind, a pleasing and easy eloquence, were increased by that urbanity of manner, that delicacy of tact, and that exquisite politeness which he observed in his habitual relations with persons of distinguished rank.—Biographie Universelle, Suppl., vol. Ixxii., s. v.

Martini, Antonio, an Italian prelate, was born at Prato in 1720. Having chosen an ecclesiastical career, and possessing a good knowledge of the ancient languages, he occupied his time in translating the sacred writings into Italian. Fuss VI., informed of his merits, appointed him bishop of Volterra (1770); and when the grand duke of Tuscany called him to the archiepiscopacy of Florence (1781), Martini was greatly opposed to all new ideas, and decided manifest his opinion in haughtily condemning the doctrines of Ricci in the synod.

Martini, Cornelio, a learned Belgian Lutheran, was born at Antwerp in 1567, and was educated in Germany, where he took the degree of doctor of arts and theology. In 1591 he taught logic in his native city, and for thirty years filled that chair successfully. He died at Hulsmékte, Dec. 17, 1621, at the age of fifty-four. His works are: Dialogus de veritate et falsitate (Antwerp, 1498, 12mo); — Metaphysica Commentatio, compendiariae, succinctae, et perspicue comprehendens univeram metophysicam doctrinam (Strasbourg, 1605, 12mo, et al.)—De Analysi logicae (Heilmol, 1619, et al.)—Commentarius in Apuleii Librum satyr, et moralium (Frankfort, 1621, 12mo)—Commentaria in Dogmatam aduersum Romantis libri quinque (Heilmol, 1623, 12mo)—Ethica.—Compendium Theologorum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, vol. xxxiv., s. v.

Martini, Giambattista, best known under the title of "Padre Martini," was born at Bologna in 1706. Early in youth he entered the Order of St. Francis, and, prompted by a spirit of inquiry and love of antiquity, soon set out on travels which he extended to Asia. On his return to Europe, he devoted himself to the study of music under the celebrated Ant. Perti. In 1728 he became maestro di capella of the convent of his order, which office he retained till his death in 1784. "He was," says Dr. Burney, who knew him well, "regarded during the last fifty years of his life as the most profound harmonist, and the best acquainted with the art and science of music, in Italy. All the great masters of his time were ambitious of becoming his disciples and proud of his approbation. Martini was also a composer, and produced much music for the church, which was formerly held in esteem. His sixty canons in the unison, for two, three, and four voices, are still known, and admired for their smoothness and grace. His reputation depends, however, mainly on his Essay on Counterpoint (Bologna, 1774, 2 vols. folio), and on his History of Music (1781, 3 vols. 4to). See English Cyclop., s. v.

Martini, Martino, a Jesuit missionary, was born at Trent in 1614, visited China, and published, after his return, De Bello Tartarico in Sinia, which was translated into the principal European languages; also an excellent map of China ("Atlas Sinensis"); and a History of China previous to the Christian Era. He died in 1661.

Martini, Raymond, a Spanish Dominican friar, noted for his great attainments as an Orientalist, was born at Sobirats, Catalonia, near the middle of the 18th century. As a general chapter held at Toledo in 1720, Martini was selected as among the most promising and talented of his order to be educated as a defender of the faith. Spain was at that time the great center of the Catholic, Jewish, and Mohammedan scholarship, and the Dominican general Raymond de Penaforêt was bent upon a polemical war with the heretics. To defray the expenses of educating such of the priests and friars as might act as a polemic army, the general had secured a portion of the lands of the kings of Castile and Aragon. Both Hebrew and Arabic were assiduously studied by Martini, who, after having sufficiently qualified himself by the mastery of these Semitic tongues, promptly commenced his attack on the Jews in a work entitled Pugio fidei, which he finished in 1726. He is also reputed to have written Contra- trum Judæorum, and also A Conflagration of the Alcoran. The time of his decease is not generally known. The great knowledge which Martini displayed in his comments on the books and opinions of the Jews, has made some unjustly imagine that he was of that religion. The "Pugio fidei" is said to have been greatly enlarged after Martini's death. We are told that Bosquet, who died bishop of Montpelier, fell upon the manuscript, while he was with great ardor ruminating all the corners of the library of the College of Foix at Toulouse, about 1690, and, after copying it out of it, gave it to James Spiegel, a learned German, and his preceptor in the Hebrew tongue. Spiegel advised Maussac to publish it; but the latter, though very able to do it himself, had for an assistant Mr. de Voisin, son of a country lawyer at Paris, who took upon him the greatest part of the task. Thomas Turc, general of the Dominicans, was very earnest in spurring on the promoters of this edition; and, not satisfied with soliciting them by letters equally important and obliging, he gave orders that they should be provided with all the manuscripts of the "Pugio fidelis" that could be recovered. In short, the Dominican Order interested themselves so much in it that they bore the charges of the impression, which was made at Paris in 1651.

Martineau, or Martinico, called by the natives Madiana, one of the Lesser Antilles, lying between latitude 14° 28′ 34″ and 14° 52′ 47″ north, and longitude 60° 50′ and 61° 19′ west, is forty miles long, about twelve miles broad, and has an area of about 880 square miles, and is inhabited by 87,000 of whom 8,000 are black. The island was discovered by the Spaniards in 1493, colonized by the French in 1635, and now belongs to them. It is of an oval form, with much indented coastline, and is everywhere mountainous; the highest peak, Mount Pelée, being considerably more than 4,000 feet above the sea-level. There are six extinct volcanoes on the island, one of them with an enormous crater. The cultivated portion (about one third of the whole of Martineau) lies chiefly along the coast. The climate is moist, but, except during the rainy season, is not unhealthy, and the soil is very productive. Of the land in cultivation, about three fifths are occupied by sugar-cane.

The government of the island consists of a governor, a privy council of seven, and a colonial council of thirty members who was abolished in 1848. The island is liable to dreadful hurricanes. The capital is Port Royal, but St. Pierre (q. v.) is the largest town and the seat of commerce. The average annual fall of rain is eighty-four inches. The year is divided into two seasons; one commences about Oct. 15, and lasts some nine months, and the other, or rainy season, the remainder of the year. During the short season the yellow-fever prevails largely. The inhabitants of the Martineau Islands are usually adherents of the Church of Rome.

Martinista, a Russian sect of mystics, which originated near the opening of our era, as a result of the labors of St. Martin, the French philosopher whose life and labors have been spoken of above. They Martinists allied themselves with freemasonry, and spread from Moscow over all Russia. Affirming to supplant infidelity by mysticism, they read largely the writings of German mystics and Pietists: Arndt and Spener were special favorites, and were widely scattered in translations. Catharine II opposed the sect, but it continued to flourish, notwithstanding all persecution, until the despotric reign of Nicholas I, when, with many other sects, the Martinists were crushed. Under Alexander I, the Martinists, favored by the patronage of Prince Galitzin, enjoyed their "golden age."

Martinian, Martinian, a German Reformed theologian, was born in 1572, and became eminent as a scholar, preacher, and instructor. He was made court-preacher in 1595, professor at Heidelberg in the following year, and placed in charge of the grammar-school connected with the academy at that place in 1597. He continued in that relation during ten years, and in 1610, after an interval spent in preaching at Emden, accepted a call from the Council of Bremen to become the rector of the famous gymnasium of their city, and to fill the chair of theology in its faculty. Under his direction this institution rose to great prosperity, and students, even from many foreign lands, thronged its halls. In 1618 he was delegated to the Synod of Dort, where he was noted for the moderation of his views. The course of that body never received his approval, although his name appears among its signers, and in later years he was often heard to exclaim, "O Dort, would to God I had never seen thee!" He died in 1630 of apoplexy, and was buried at Bremen. His chief work, the Lexicon philologico-tiologicum, is still used. His other writings, of which sixty-eight have been enumerated, are unimportant. The Lexicon was published at Breslau in folio in 1628, in a second edition at Frankfort in 1655, and at Utrecht in 1697.—Herzig, Real-Encyclopädie, xx, 118 sq. (G. M.)

Martinmas, or the Mass of St. Martin, a feast kept on the 11th of November in honor of St. Martin of Tours. The feast was often a merry one. In England and Scotland the winter's provisions were, in olden days, stored and sampled at that time of the year, and were hence called a mart. Luther derived his first name from being born on the eve of this festival; in Germany called also Martinwalde. See Eidt's Eccles. Cyclopedia, a v.; Regenbogen Real-Encyklopädie, ix, 312, col. 1 (iii).

Martinus's Day, St. See ST. MARTIN.

Martinus, Polonus or Bohemus, a Polish chronicler and ecclesiastic of the 15th century, was born at Troppau in Silesia; entered the Dominicans; became chaplain and confessor to pope Clement IV, and to several of his successors; and in 1278 was appointed archbishop of Gnesen. He died shortly after at Bologna (1278). He wrote valuable works in the department of ecclesiastical history, including biographies of the popes. His most important production is the Chronicon de Summi Pontificibus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xxxiv, 27.

Martyn, Henry, known as "the scholar missionary," one of the most distinguished missionaries of modern times, was born of humble parentage at Truro, in Cornwall, England, Oct. 18, 1781. He entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1800, and became a member of the grammar-school of his native place; sought for a scholarship in Corpus Christi College, Oxford, but, failing in this, he went to Cambridge, and entered St. John's College in October, 1797. He was at that time outwardly moral, but still unconverted. But, while at college, the death of his father directed his mind to religious subjects, and, by his association with the celebrated evangelical preacher Charles Simeon, he soon became one of the most thoroughly Christian students in the college, where, in 1801, he came out "senior wrangler," the highest academic honor he could achieve. He then became fellow of his college in March, 1802, and obtained the first prize for the best Latin prose composition in the university. Believing it to be his duty to preach the Gospel, he now devoted himself to the work of the ministry. English set at his elbow, in this time was the cause of missions, and Martyn finally determined that he also must go forth to propagate Christianity among the nations who sat in darkness. He sought to be employed by the "Society for Missions to Africa and the East," now the "Church Missionary Society;" but, as he was not a trained man, he was ordered, his appointment was postponed. He was ordained deacon Oct. 22, 1803; was made bachelor of divinity in March, 1805, and was the same time ordained priest, and, obtaining an appointment as missionary to India, embarked Sept. 10, 1805.

Henry Martyn reached Madras April 21, 1806. He stopped for a while at Calcutta, where he continued the study of Hindustani, which he had commenced in England, and applied himself also to Sanscrit, as the key to most of the Eastern languages, and to Persian. He then removed to the station of Diapora, where he was appointed to labor, primarily among the English troops there posted, and the families of the civilians. But to the natives also he constantly addressed himself, and, amid all these labors, yet found time to complete a translation of the English language into Hindustani (Feb. 23, 1807), a translation of the N. T. in that language, and, this finished, commenced a version of the N. T. in Persian, in which he had the assistance of an Arab translator, Sabat (q. v.).

Near the close of 1809, Mr. Martyn commenced his first public ministrations among the heathens of Cawnpore, whither he had removed in April of this year. His auditory sometimes counted as many as eight hundred. They were young, old, male, female, booted, blistered, wrinkled. clothed with abominable rags, nearly naked, some plastered with mud or cow-dung, others with matted, uncombed locks, streaming to the heels, others bald or scabby-headed. The authorities seem to have had a wide-open eye on his proceedings, and anything which appeared to graze roughly against the superstitions of his auditory would at once have wrecked his scheme. Finally, exhausted with these and other labors, his health began to give way, and he was recommended either to try the effects of a sea-voyage, or to return to England for a time. Having embraced the latter project, he proceeded to travel through Egypt and Arabia, with a view of submitting his Persian and Arabic translations of the N. T. to the revision and critical judgment of learned Persians. He left Cawnpore in the last September of 1810, and in the early summer of 1811 landed at Bushire, and thence proceeded to Shiraz, where he resided for more than ten months. Here he created great interest by the religious discussions which, as the sole advocate of the Christian faith, he carried on in the crowded conclaves of Mollahs and Sofia. He completed his Persian version of the N. T. Feb. 24, 1812, and, which was translated into German later. From Shiraz he went to Tabriz, resolved on visiting the king in his summer camp, and presenting his work in person. His interview with the vizier, who was surrounded by a number of ignorant and intemperate Mollahs, called forth all the energies of Martyr's faith and patience. The length it was found to be related to an informality—the want of an introduction from the British ambassador—he could not be admitted to the royal presence. He now proceeded to Tabriz, where he was laid up for two months, and compelled to abandon all hopes of presenting his N. T. in person to the king, but Sir G. Ouseley, the British ambassador, relieved his anxiety by kindly promising to present the volume himself. Ten days after his recovery from the fever which had laid him up, he proceeded on his journey home-ward. His plan was to return to England via Constantinople, but, in consequence of too hurried travelling, he was laid up at Tocat with severe illness, and died Oct. 16, 1812. "No more is known of Henry Martyr save that he died at Tocat, without a European near . . . He died a pilgrim's solitary death, and lies in an unknown grave in a heathen land." The regrets in England at this event created a great interest, which was expected from him, and much probably have been done by him in the cause to which he had devoted himself. As it was, he brought not a few, both Hindoos and Mohammedans, to make profession of the Christian faith, and the body of his converts was very largely dispersed among a people who had not previously known them. "The ardent zeal of the Celtic character; the religious atmosphere that John Wesley had spread over Cornwall, even among those who did not enrol themselves among his followers; the ability and sensitiveness hereditary in the Martyr family, together with the strong influence of a university tutor—all combined to make such a bright and brief trail of light to the career of Henry Martyr" (Miss C. M. Yonge, Pioneers and Founders, p. 71). An interesting account of his life, compiled from the best authority, has been given by the Rev. John Sargent in 1819. Of his productions there were published Sermons preached in Calcutta and elsewhere (4th edit. Lond. 1822, 8vo):—Controversial Tracts on Christianity and Mohammedanism (edited by Prof. Samuel Lee, D.D., Camb. 1824, 8vo);—Journals and Letters (edited by the Rev. J. B. Wilberforce, later bishop of Oxford, Lond. 1837, 2 vols. 8vo; abridged 1839, post 8vo, and often). Martyr (μάρτυς and μάρτων, so rendered only in Acts xxii, 20; Rev. ii, 13; xviii, 6) is properly a witness, and is applied in the New Testament (ο) to judicial witnesses (Matt. xviii, 16; xxvi, 65; Mark xiv, 63; Acts vi, 18; vii, 58; 2 Cor. xiii, 1; 1 Tim. xiv, 19; Heb. x, 28). The Septuagint also uses it for the Hebrew בְּשָׁמַר (bêšâmar), ed, in Deut. xvii, 16; Prov. xxiv, 29; (b) To one who has testified, or can testify, of the truth of the matter of which he has been heard, or known. This is a frequent sense in the New Testament, as in Luke xxiv, 48: Acts i, 8, 22; Rom. i, 9; 2 Cor. i, 23; 1 Thea. ii, 5, 10; 1 Tim. vi, 12; 2 Tim. ii, 1, 2; 1 Pet. vi, 1; Rev. i, 5; iii, 14; x, 3, and elsewhere. (c) The meaning of the word which has now become the most usual, is that in which it occurs most rarely in the Scriptures, i.e. one who by his death bears witness to the truth. In this sense we only find it in Acts xxii, 20; Rev. ii, 13; xviii, 6. This now exclusive sense of the word was brought into general use by the early ecclesiastical writers, who applied it to every one who suffered death in the Christian cause (see Suicer, Theauros Eccles. sub. voc.). See Martyrs. Stephen was in this sense the first martyr (see Stephen), and the spiritual honors of his death tended in no small degree to raise to the most extravagant estimation, in the early Church, the memory of the testimony. The idea of martyrdom generally a martyr's death was supposed, on the alleged authority of the under-named texts, to cancel all the sins of the past life (Luke xii, 50; Mark x, 39); to supply the place of baptism (Matt. x, 39), and at once to secure admittance to the presence of the Lord in Paradise (Matt. v, 10–12). In imitation of the family custom of annually commemorating at the grave the death of deceased members, the churches celebrated the deaths of their martyrs by prayers at their graves, and by love feasts. From this high estimation of the martyrs, Christians were induced to deliver their lives for the propagation of Christianity unfeelingly to the public authorities—thus justifying the charge of fanaticism brought against them by the heathen. For the most part, however, this practice was disconceivably, the words of Christ himself being brought against it (Matt. x, 23; see Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. i, 109, 110). For monographs, see Volbeding, Index Programmatum, p. 75, 116. See Confessor. Martyr, Peter, one of the early Reformers, was born at Florence, Italy, in 1500. His family name was Vermiglioni, but his parents gave him that of Martyr, from one Peter, a martyr, whose house stood near their house. In 1516 he was sent by the Franciscans to the Augustinian, in the convent of Fiesole, near Florence. In 1519 he was sent to the University of Padua, where he soon distinguished himself as a good scholar. He acquired great reputation as a preacher, was made abbot of Spoleto, and afterwards principal of the College of St. Peter ad Aram, at Naples. Here he made the intimate acquaintance of Juan Valdes (q. v.), a Spaniard, who had become a convert to the doctrines of the Reformation, and from whom Vermiglioni adopted some of those tenets. He concealed them for a time; but his Biblical studies convinced him more and more of the errors of the Church of Rome, and a perusal of the works of Luther, Zwingli, and Bucer making sure his conversion, he publicly avowed his new doctrine shortly after his appointment to Lucca as prior of San Frediano, and was compelled to leave the place secretly. After a short stay at Fiesole, he was sent to Germany, and thence to Ireland. He found an asylum finally in Strasbourg, and there, in 1542, was called to a theological chair, and acted for five years as the colleague of Bucer in the ministerial office. In 1546 he married a converted nun. In 1547 he received from Cranmer and Latimer an invitation to England. The request was sent in the name of king Edward VI, acting under the advice of Seymour, the protector. In 1549 he was appointed professor of divinity at Oxford. The fame of his learning... secured him a large auditory, many Romanists among the number: "and though they had much envying and heart-burning about him, as may easily be imagined, yet they bore him patient pretty till he came to hand- ward in public, before the Lord's Supper, where they began to break forth into outrages, to disturb him in his lectures, to fix up malicious and scandalous schedules against him, and to challenge him to disputes; which challenges he did not disdain to accept, but disputed first privately in the vice-chancellor's lodge, and after ward in public, before his majesty's commissioners, de puted for that purpose. At length, however, they stirred up the seditions multitude against him so successfully that he was obliged to retire to London till the tumult was suppressed: " and on returning again, in the year fol lowing, as for his better security, made by the king's canon of Christ-church. It is said that some cit ations in the Prayer-book were made at Peter Martyr's suggestions. On the accession of Mary he was obliged to leave England, and, returning to Strassburg, there resumed his former professorship. However, as he in clined to Calvin's views on the doctrine of the Euch arist, he accepted a pressing invitation extended to him by the Senate of Zürich, in 1556, to fill the chair of the ology in that university. In 1561 he received letters at the court of France, the king of Navarre, the prince of Condé, and others of the leading French Protestants, requesting him to attend at the famous Colloquy of Poissy, in France. Here he dis tinguished himself as well for his skill as for his prude nce and moderation. He died at Zürich Nov. 12, 1562. Peter Martyr is described as a man of an able, healthy, big-boned, and well-furred body, and of a countenance which expressed an inwardly grave and settled turn of mind. His parts and learning were very un common; as was also his skill in disputations, which made him as much admired by the Protestants as hated by the Papists. He was very singular and infallible in presenting a refutation in the Church, yet his zeal was never known to get the better of his judgment. He was always moderate and prudent in his outward behavior, nor ever in the conflict of a dispute did he suf fer himself to be transported into interminable warmth or allow unguarded expression ever to escape him. But his pains and industry were not confined to preaching and disputing against the Papists; he wrote a great many books against them, none of which raised his reputation higher than his Defence of the Orthodox Doctrine of the Lord's Supper [Defensio Doctrinae de sacramento Supp. et apotrophia de ejus usu; accessus Tractatus, et Dis putatio habita Univ. Oxon. de eodem, 1562, fol.] against bishop Gardiner. He wrote also several tracts of divinity, and commentaries on several books of Scripture, for all of which he was as much applauded by one party as he was condemned by the other. Tiraboschi, a zealous Roman Catholic, acknowledges that Martyr was free from the arrogance and virulence with which the Romanists are wont to charge the Reformers; that he was deeply acquainted with the Scriptures and the fa thers, and one of the most learned writers of the Reformed Church. He was the author of Expositio Symboli Apostolici; De Corde Domini Quaestiones, a system of theology, which was first published in England by Mazarinians, then more fully under the title Locis com manes, ex variis ipsius auctoris scriptis (Zürich, 1590, folio; translated into English, 1833, folio, etc.). His other works are, In primum librum Mosae qui vulgo Genesis dictur commentarii. Martyrdom is a term employed by Christian ec clesiastical writers to record the suffering of death on account of one's adherence to the faith of the Gospel. See Martyr. In times of persecution, martyrdom came to be thought so meritorious that it acquired the name of second baptism, or baptism in blood, because of the power and efficacy it was supposed to have in saving men by the invisible baptism of the Spirit, in the absence of the external element of water. In any case in which a catechumen was apprehended and slain for the name of Christ before he could be admitted among the faithful by baptism, his martyrdom was deemed suf ficient to answer all the purposes of the sacrament. In the writings of Prosper there is an epigram to this effect: "quem visum non ausi sacros baptismatis sententias, Fons quibus ipsis salutis sanguinis usus fidel; Et quocum sacri fert mystica forma lavatur, et dum ab oriente in occidentem transit gloriam martyrii." "They are not deprived of the sacred baptism of Christ who, instead of a font, are washed in their own blood; for whatever benefit accrues to any by the mystical rite of the sacred laver, is all fulfilled by the glory of martyrdom." The martyrs were supposed to enjoy very singular privileges; in some ages the doctrine was taught that immediately on death they passed to the enjoyment of the beatific vision, for which other Chris tians were required to wait till the day of judgment; and that God would grant to their prayers the hasten ing of his kingdom and the shortening the times of pe rsecution.

Martyriarius is the name, in the Roman Catholic Church, of the keoper of sacred relics. The relics of martyrs are most generally kept under the principal altar of the church.

Martyrion. See Martyrium.

Martyrium. The name of a church built over the grave of a martyr, or called by his name to preserve the memory of him, had usually the distinguishing title of Martyrium memoriae martyris. The number of this kind of designation occur with great frequency in the writings of Eusebius, Augustine, etc. Eusebius called the church which was built by Constantine on Calvary, in memory of Christ's passion and resurrection, Martyrium Salutaris.

Martyrology (Acta Martyrum) is (1) with the Protoclist a catalogue or list of those who have suffered martyrdom for their religion, including the history of their lives and sufferings; but (2) with those who believe in the adoration and intercession of saints and martyrs, a calendar of martyrs and other saints arranged in the order of the months and days, and intended partly to be read in the public services of the Church, partly for the guidance of the devotion of the faithful towards the saints and martyrs. The use of the martyrology is common both to the Latin and Greek Churches. In the latter it is called Memology (q.v.).

Eusebius, who was the first who wrote an ex tensive history of the Christian martyrs; it was trans lated into Latin by St. Jerome, but has been long irre coverably lost. St. Jerome's own work on the same subject—the oldest one now extant—is regarded as the great martyrology of the Latin Church (it is published in the eleventh volume of the collected edition of his works by Vallars]; but it is little used in comparison with later compilations of idle legends and pretended miracles. The latest Greek martyrlogy or menology extant dates from the 9th century. It was prepared by order of emperor Basilius Macedo (867-886), and was published in Constantinople. During the Byzantine period, martyrlogies were issued in England by Venerable Bede; in France by Florus, Ado, and Usuard; and in Germany by St. Gall, Nolter, and Rabanus Maurus. The so-called "Roman Martyrology" (Martyrologium Romanum) is designed for the entire Church, both East and West. It was published by authority of Gregory XIII, with a critical commentary by the celebrated cardinal Baronius, in 1686. A still more critical edition was issued by the learned Jesuit Herebert Rosweid. The Protestant Church possesses many accounts of martyrs, but is not a part of its system. From a Protestant standpoint, we may mention Fox's Book of Martyrs. See MArtYRS; Martyrology.

Martyrology is (8) also applied to the painted or written catalogues in the Roman churches, containing the foundations, obits, prayers, and masses to be said each day to the memory of the saint. Martyrs, those who lay down their life or suffer death for the sake of their religion. In accordance with the primitive Greek sense of the word, i.e. a witness [see Martyr], it is applied by Christian writers to such persons who fell under the trammels of the Church or of its doctrines. The Christian Church has abounded with martyrs, and history is filled with surprising accounts of their singular constancy and fortitude under the most cruel tortures that human nature is capable of suffering. The primitive Christians were accused by their enemies of playing a sort of divine worship to martyrs. Of this we have an instance in the answer of the Church of Smyrna to the suggestion of the Jews, who, at the martyrdom of Polycarp, desired the heathen judge not to suffer the Christians to carry off his body, lest they should leave their crucified Master, and worship him in his stead; but as they answered, "In Christ neither forsake Christ nor worship any other, for we worship him as the Son of God; but love the martyrs as the disciples and followers of the Lord, for the great affection they have shown to their King and Master. A like answer was given at the martyrdom of Fructuus in Spain; for when the judge asked Eulogius, his deacon, whether he would not worship Fructuus, as thinking that, though he be refused to worship the heathen idols, he might yet be inclined to worship a Christian martyr, Eulogius replied, "I do not worship Fructuus, but his heavenly Father, and I underrate this act of constancy of the sufferers naturally enough won the highest admiration from their brethren in the faith; and so it came to be held a special privilege to receive the martyr's benediction, to kiss his chains, to visit him in prison, or to converse with him; and as it was held by the primitive Christians that the martyrs enjoyed very singular privileges with God [see Martyrology], it came to be held also that their great and superabundant merit might, in the eyes of the Church, compensate for the laxity and weakness of less perfect brethren; it thus gradually a practice of intercession arose, which finally degenerated into the granting of indulgences, etc., as now common in the Roman Catholic Church. See Indulgences; Invocation.

Perhaps the admiration and veneration which Christian martyrdom secures has had a great tendency to extend beyond the limits of the primitive Church; but that is not the fact, however, that martyrdom in itself is no proof of the goodness of our cause, but only that we ourselves are persuaded that it is so. "It is not the blood, but the cause that makes the martyr" (Mead). Yet we may consider the number of those who have suffered for Christianity as a collateral proof at least of its excellency; for the thing for which they suffered was not a point of speculation, but a plain matter of fact, in which (had it been false) they could not have been mistaken. The martyrdom, therefore, of so many wise and good men, taken with a view of the whole system of Christianity, will certainly afford something considerable in its favor. In the early days of Christianity it was no unusual occurrence that a church would be constituted by martyr, calling the church after his name, in order to preserve the memory of his sufferings. See Martyrium. But soon every Church wished to possess a saint's tomb for an altar. Mere cenotaphs did not suffice. Thus, according to Augustine, Ambrose was delayed in the consecration of a new church at Milan till a seagoing dream helped him to the bones of two martyrs, Gervasius and Protasius. And the second Council of Nice (A.D. 787) went even so far as to threaten bishops with deprivation if they should undertake to consecrate churches without relics. The consequence was that no supply was produced by such a demand, and frauds of every kind were perpetrated and overlooked. Each Church also had its own Fanti, or calendar of martyrs. See Calendar; Church.

The festivals of the martyrs are also of very ancient date. On the day of their death, the Church conveys to them the solemn moment of their religion, it was natural that Christians should look back from a condition of unexpected security on the sufferings of their immediate predecessors with the most vivid sentiments of sympathy and admiration. They had witnessed the things; they had shared the constancy with which they were endured; the same we have. We have suspended over ourselves, and their own preservation they attributed, under the especial protection of divine Providence, to the perseverance of those who had perished. The gratitude and veneration thus fervently excited were loudly and passionately expressed; and the honors which were due to the virtues of the departed were profusely bestowed on their names and their memory. Enthusiasm easily passed into superstition, and those who had sealed a Christian's faith by a martyr's death were exalted above the condition of men, and enthroned among superior beings. The day of a martyrdom, moreover, as being held to be the day of the martyr's entering into eternal life, was called the "natal" or "birth" day, and as such was celebrated with peculiar honor, and with special religious services. Their bodies, clothes, books, and the other objects which they had possessed, were honored as Relics (q.v.), and their tombs were visited for the purpose of asking their intercession. See MArtYRS, Festivals of the.

Of the sayings, sufferings, and deaths of the martyrs, though preserved with great care for the purposes above specified, it is not always so well preserved as it might be. We have but very little left, the greatest part of them having been destroyed during the Diocletian persecution; for a most diligent search was then made after all their books and papers; and all of them that were found were committed to the flames. Some of those records since compiled have either never reached us at all, or, if they have, their authority is extremely suspected. See Martyrology.

The appropriate homage to be rendered to the martyrs by the Protestant world, as a reason why our respect of these sainted dead should not degenerate into martyr-worship, by the exhibition of an enthusiasm which with the early Christians was quite natural, but with us would be artificial, has been well commented upon by Gieseler (Church History, i, 108, 292), who says: "The respect paid to martyrs still maintains the same character as it had in the 2nd century, different in degree, not in kind, from the honor shown to other esteemed dead. As the churches held the yearly festivals of their martyrs at the graves of the latter, so they willingly assembled frequently in the burial-places of their deceased friends, for which they gave public support to the object called (crypted catacombe). At the celebration of the Lord's Supper, both the living who brought oblations, as well as the dead, and the martyrs for whom offerings were presented, especially on the anniversary of their death, were included by name in the prayer of the Church. Inasmuch as the recommendation of a sinner into the Church was thought to stand in close connection with the forgiveness of sin, an opinion was associated with the older custom of recommendation to the Church common in the lapse of centuries who had been again received by the martyrs, that the martyrs could also be serviceable in obtaining the forgiveness of sins. In doing so they set out in part with the idea, which is very natural, that the dead prayed for the living, as the living prayed for the dead, but that the prayer entered into the pietas of the Church and the piety of the Lord would be of peculiar efficacy on behalf of their brethren; while they also thought that the martyrs, as assessors in the last decisive judgment, were particularly active (1 Cor. vi, 2, 8). Origent attributed very great value to that intersession of the martyrs, and it is the means that he used to help towards sanctification; but he went beyond the idea hitherto entertained in attributing to the martyrdom an importance and efficacy similar to the death of Christ. Hence he feared the cessation of persecution as a misfortune. The more the opinion that value belonged to the intercession of martyrs was established, the often it may have happened that persons commended themselves to the martyrs yet living for intercession.

The number of martyrs who suffered death during the first ages of Christianity has been a subject of great controversy among early ecclesiastical writers, with the natural pride of partisanship, have, it can hardly be doubted, leaned to the side of exaggeration. Some of their statements are palpably excessive; and Gibbon, in his well-known sixteenth chapter, throws great doubt even on the most probable of the computations of the Church historians. But it is clearly though briefly shown by Guizot, in his notes on this celebrated chapter (see Millman’s Gibbon’s Decline and Fall, i, 598), that Gibbon’s criticisms are founded on unfair and partial data, and that even the very authorities upon which he relies demonstrate the fallaciousness of his conclusions. Those who are interested in the subject will find it discussed with much learning and considerable moderation in Runrmir’s Acta Primitiva et Sancera Martyrum. No little difference of opinion has also existed as to what, in the exploration of the ancient Christian tombs in the Roman Catacombs, are to be considered as signs of martyrdom. The chief signs, in the opinion of older critics, were (1) the letters R. M., (2) the figure of a palm-tree, and (3) a phial with the remains of a red liquor believed to be blood. Each of these has in turn been considered as a sign of martyrdom, but the last is commonly regarded as the conclusive sign of martyrdom. The first recorded martyr of Christianity, called the “proto-martyr,” was the deacon Stephen, whose death is recorded in Acts vi and vii.

Martyrs, Canonization of the. The ceremony for canonizing martyrs was, in the Roman Catholic Church, varied greatly until in the middle of the fifth century, Pope Benedict XIV definitely prescribed it. It is now as follows: After the candidate’s reputation for sanctity has been duly proved, he is styled venerable, after which an investigation is entered into to establish the proof of his virtues, in a high or, as it is termed, heroic degree. For that purpose the whole life and all the actions of the candidate are scrutinized. That task devolves on the Sacred Congregation of the Rites, assisted by theoloheretical authors; but this rule, it seems, did not then prescribe as to other churches. The Lord's Supper was always administered at these festivals, and at the close the rich usually made a feast for the poor, especially to the widows and orphans. —Farrell, Eccles. Marof el-Karkhi, ESSAI-MAHFOUD, an Arabian mystic, was born at Carkh, between Hamadan and Ispahan, about the year 750. The son of a Christian, he became a Mussulman, under the name of Ali. While attached to the house of the imam Ali Riza, at Bagdad, with the sacred duties of the Imam's servant, he formed a firm friendship with one of the most ancient mystic chiefs, Daud el-Thayi, and became himself one of the most celebrated mystics of Arabia. He died in 816, at Bagdad. The mystical system of Marof is neither the ascetic system of the ancient Indian and Christian Commissaries, which he rejected, nor that of the more recent Persian mystics, who are entirely absorbed in contemplations of divine love. He lays stress on the practical virtues; and if he preaches humility in saying that we should never appear before God except with the exterior of a poor mendicant, still he is not led astray in his reflections upon divine love, which, according to him, is a gift of God's grace, and not learned by the lessons of masters. Marof, it is true, elsewhere carries out his thoughts, by saying that we must turn to God if we expect God's favor upon us. These ideas have caused him to be considered as one of the orthodox mystics of Islam.

His maxims are found dispersed throughout the ascetic works of Abulfaraj Masari ibn al-Yanzi, especially in the Mawakah-Marof, or Panegyrics of Marof, and in the Kanzel Medzukioun, or Treasury of the Deistical Panegyrista. In the Mawakah el Nocte is found the most complete selection of Marof's utterances. —Hubdy Zalcha, Lexicon Bibliographicum et Encyclopedicum; Djami, Biographie des Soufra; Hammer, Gesch. der Arabischen Literatur; Hoefer, Nouv. Mautor or Murt (Sanscrit wind) denotes in the Hindu mythology the genius or divinities presiding over the winds. In the Vedas the Murtas are often addressed as the attendants and allies of Indra, and are called the sons of Priani (or Princi), or the Earth; they are also called Roudras, or the sons of Roudra. Marthas, one of the most important men in the Syrian Church of the 4th and 5th centuries, was bishop of Tagrit, in Mesopotamia, called also by the Syriacs Maiphorkin, Maipharkat, and Medinat Sohde, i. e. city of the martyrs. He took an active part in the management of Church affairs, and is also known as a writer. So great, indeed, was the consideration he enjoyed at the hands of his contemporaries that he was popularly credited with power to work miracles. In 403 he made a journey to Constantinople, as agent in the negotiations between the emperors Arcadius and Theodosius II and the Persian emperor Yazdegird II, who was persecuting the Christians, and in these negotiations he gained the esteem and confidence of the Persian emperor. He was enabled by his sagacity to defeat the intrigues of the Magians to effect his downfall, and his reputation was so high that he obtained the permission for the Christians to rebuild their churches, and to hold their meetings for divine worship. The next year he went again to Constantinople to plead the cause of Chrysostom, who was exiled. He was subsequently sent again by Theodosius II to Yazdegird. He is said on one occasion to have had a vision as a part of the same or similar circumstances, during which vision he was enabled by patriarch Isaac of Seleucia Ctesiphon, but Hefele (Concilienesch. ii, 90) has proved that the documents we possess concerning this council are spurious, and the very existence of such a council is now considered doubted. On Murfo, however, took part in the Council of Antioch against the Monothelians (q. v.); it was in 483 or 480. He wrote a number of works in Syriac, described by Assamani (ut infra). Among them the following deserve special notice: A liturgical work, found in Syriac in the manuscript of Marceille (1594, p. 172), and in Latin in the manuscript of the Bibliotheque du Ecole orientale, ii, 261; an exposition of the Gospels, from which it appears that he inclined towards the doctrine of transubstantiation; a history of the Persian martyrs under king Shapur (Sapor)—this history forms the first part of Assamani's Acta Martyrum Orientalium, qui in Persica hodierna sunt, et Quinisextium apostolicae traditionis, in Acta Sactarum, et Etliche Acten heiliger Märtyrer d. Morgenlandes (Innsbruck, 1886). See Assamani, Biblioth. Orient. Clementino-Vaticano, i, 174-179; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. ix, 181; Neander, Hist. of the Christian Religion and Church, i, 110, 700. (J. Mar'ya (Mapia or Mapióp), from the Heb. מרים, Miriam), the name of several females mentioned in the New Test.

1. The wife of Joseph, and a lineal descendant of David (Matt. i); "the Mother of Jesus" (Acts i, 14), and "Mary, his Mother" (Matt. ii, 11); in later times generally called the "VIRGIL MARY," but never so designated in Scripture. Little is known of this highly-favored individual, in whom was fulfilled the first prophecy made to man, that the Son of God should be "formed from the woman's womb" (Gen. iii, 15). As her history was of no consequence to Christianity, it is not given at large. Her genealogy is recorded by Luke (ch. iii), in order to prove the truth of the predictions which had foretold the descent of the Messiah from Adam through Ahraham and David, with the design evidently of showing that Christ was of that royal house and lineage (comp. Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 588 sq.). Eusebius, the early ecclesiastical historian, although unusually lengthy upon the "name Jesus," and the genealogies in Matthew's and Luke's Gospels, throws no new light upon Mary's birth and parentage. The very simplicity of the evangelical record has no doubt been one cause of the abundance of the legendary matter of which she forms the central figure. Imagination had to be called in to supply a craving which authentic narrative did not satisfy. We shall give the accounts from those sources somewhat in detail, with a full discussion of many interesting questions incidentally involved in their consideration. See MARIOLATRY.

1. Scriptural Statements.—I. We are wholly ignorant of the circumstances and the occupation of Mary's parents. If, as is most probable, the genealogy given by Luke is that of Mary (Gresswell, etc.), her father's name was Heli, which is another form of the name given to her legendary father, Jehosakim or Josephim. But if Jacob and Hel were the two sons of Matthan or Mathat, and if Joseph, being the son of the younger brother, married his cousin, the daughter of the elder brother (Hervey, Genealogies of our Lord Jesus Christ), her father was Jacob. See GENEALOGY OF OUR LORD. She was like Joseph, of the tribe of Judah, and of the lineage of David (Ps. cxxxi, 11; Luke i, 32; Rom. i, 8). What was her relationship to the so-called "sister" named Mary (John xix, 25) is uncertain (see No. 8 below), but she was connected by marriage (σύγγρυς, Luke i, 86) with Elisabeth, who was of the tribe of Levi and of the lineage of Aaron.

2. In the autumn of the year which is known as B.C. 7, Mary was living at Nazareth, probably at her parents' house, not having yet been taken by Joseph to his home. She was at this time betrothed to Joseph, and was therefore regarded by the Jewish law and custom as his wife, though she had not yet a husband, and was consequently called MARRIAGE. At this time the angel Gabriel came to her with a message from God, and announced to her that she was to be the mother of the long-expected Messiah. He probably bore the form of an ordinary man, like the angels who manifested themselves to Giodeon and to Manoah (Judg. vi. xiii). This would appear both from the expression סיצל בשח י"ש, he came in, and also from the fact of her being troubled, not at his presence, but at the meaning of his words. Yet one cannot but feel that there was a glory in his features which was not inconsistent with his being once convinced Mary of the true nature of her visitor, entering as he did unannounced, apparently into her secret chamber—most probably at the time of her devotions. The scene as well as the salutation is very striking that commemorated in the book of Daniel, "Then there came again and touched me one like the appearance of a man, and he strengthened me, and said, O man greatly beloved, fear not: peace be unto thee, be strong, yes, be strong!" (Dan. x. 18, 19). The exact meaning of.Response is "thou that hast had bestowed upon thee a free gift of grace." The A. V. rendering of "highly favored" is therefore very exact, and much nearer to the original than the "gratia plena" of the Vulgate, on which a huge and wholly unsubstantial edifice has been built by Romanist devotional writers. The next part of the salutation, "The Lord be with thee," would probably have been better translated, "The Lord be with thee." It is the same salutation as that with which the angel accorded Giodeon (Judg. vi. 12). "Blessed art thou among women," is nearly the same expression as that used by Ozias to Judith (Judg. xili. 18). Ga- bab, the king of the Sidonians, pronounced Mary that she was "an operation of God." The Holy Ghost the everlasting Son of the Father should be born of her; that in him the prophecies relative to David's throne and kingdom should be accomplished; and that his name was to be called Jesus. He further informs her, perhaps as a sign by which she might convince herself that his prediction with regard to her son would come true, that her relative Elisabeth was within three months of being delivered of a child.

The angel left Mary, and she set off to visit Elisabeth either at Hebron or Juttah (whichever way we understand the word דג הָעָֽשַׁת, Luke i. 39), where the latter lived with her husband Zacharias about twenty miles to the south of Jerusalem, and there-fore at a very considerable distance from Nazareth. Immediately on her entrance into the house she was saluted by Elisabeth as the mother of her Lord, and had evidence of the truth of the angel's saying written with the Holy Ghost to her cousin. She embodied her feelings of exultation and thankfulness in the hymn known under the name of the Magnificat. Whether this was uttered by immediate inspiration, in reply to Elisabeth's salutation, or on the journey from Nazareth, it was written at a later period of her three months' visit at Hebron, does not appear with certainty. The hymn is founded on Hannah's song of thankfulness (1 Sam. ii. 1-10), and exhibits an intimate knowledge of the Psalms, prophetic writings, and books of Moses from which sources almost every expression in it is derived. The most remarkable clause, "From henceforth all generations shall call me blessed," is borrowed from Lea's explanation on the birth of Asher (Gen. xxx. 18). The salutation and expression are also found in Prov. xxx. 35; 1 Kings iii. 14; James x. 24. The latter passage in the case of the word מָעָ֣שַׂה is rendered with great exactness "count happy." The notion that there is conveyed in the word any anticipation of her bearing the title of "Blessed" arises solely from ignorance.

Various opinions have been held as to the purpose of divine Wisdom in causing the Savior to be born of a betrayer rather than a distinguished virgin. It seems eminently seemly and decorous that the mother of the Messiah should have some one to vouch for her virginity, and to act as her protector and the foster-father of her child, and that he should be one who, as heir of the throne of David, would give to his adopted Son the legal rights to the same dignity, while of all persons he was the most interested in reestabishing the claims of a pretended or. Origin, following Ignatius, thinks it was in order to baseline the cunning of the devil, and keep him in ignorance of the fact of the Lord's advent.

Mary returned to Nazareth shortly before the birth of John the Baptist, and continued living at her own home. In the course of a few months Joseph became aware that she was with child, and determined on giving her a bill of divorce which would make it illegal to the law to suffer the penalty which he supposed that she had incurred. Being, however, warned and satisfied by an angel who appeared to him in a dream, he took her to his own house. It was soon after this, as it would have been impossible for Joseph's death to be promulgated, and Joseph and Mary travelled to Bethlehem to have their names enrolled in the registers (B.C. 6) by way of preparation for the taxing, which, however, was not completed till several years afterwards (A.D. 6), in the governorship of Quirinius. They reached Bethlehem, and there Mary brought forth the Saviour of the world, and humbly laid him in a manger.

Bethlehem stands on the narrow ridge of a long gray hill running east and west, and its position suggests the difficulty that a crowd of travellers would have in finding shelter for offering the sacrifices at the Holy Place. A neighboring cave was fixed upon as the stable where Joseph abode, and where accordingly Christ was born and laid in the manger. The hill-sides are covered with vineyards, and a range of convents occupies the height, and incloses within it the cave of the nativity; and there, through the operation of God, shepherds may have kept watch over their flocks, seen the vision of the angelic hosts, and heard the divine song of "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and goodwill toward men." Full of wonder and hope, they sought the lowly abode of the Virgin, and there saw with their own eyes what the Lord had made known to them. But while they published abroad and spread the wondrous tale, Mary kept all these things and pondered them in her heart.

8. The circumcision, the adoration of the wise men, and the presentation in the Temple, are rather scenes in the life of Christ than in that of his mother. The presentation in the Temple might not take place till forty days after the birth of the child. During this period the mother, according to the law of Moses, was unclean (Lev. xii). In the present case there could be no necessity with their own eyes what the Lord had made known to them. But while they published abroad and spread the wondrous tale, Mary kept all these things and pondered them in her heart.

MARY

bom on seeing her Son expire on the cross (Tertullian, Origen, Basil, Cyril). By mistakingly referring to the pangs of grief which she experienced on witnessing the sufferings of her Son.

In the flight into Egypt, Mary and the babe had the support and protection of Joseph, as well as in their return from thence in the following year, on the death of Herod the Great (B.C. 4). It appears to have been the intention of Joseph to settle a while at Bethlehem at this time, as his home at Nazareth had been broken up for more than a year; but on finding how Herod's dominions had been disposed of, he changed his mind and returned to his old place of abode, thinking that the child's life would be safer in the retirement of A. p. 81. He bore in this, as in that of Archelaus. It is possible that Joseph might have been himself a native of Bethlehem, and that before this time he had only been a visitor at Nazareth, drawn thither by his betrothal and marriage. In that case, his fear of Archelaus would make him exchange his own native town for that of Jerusalem.

4. Henceforward, until the beginning of our Lord's ministry—i. e. from B.C. 4 to A.D. 25—we may picture Mary to ourselves as living in Nazareth, in a humble sphere of life, the wife of Joseph the carpenter, pondering over the sayings of the angels, of the shepherds, of Simeon, of Anna, and of some of her Son's sayings in the Temple and of his parables; and thus growing in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man (Luke ii. 52). Two circumstances alone, so far as we know, broke in on the otherwise even flow of the stream of her life. One of these was the temporary loss of her Son when he remained behind in Jerusalem (Ach. 8); the other was the death of Joseph. The exact date of this last event we cannot determine, but it was probably not long after the other. See Joseph.

5. From the time at which our Lord's ministry commenced, Mary is withdrawn almost wholly from sight. Four times only, as detailed below, does she reappear, which event, without reason, is thrown over her. If to these we add two references to her, the first by her Nazarene fellow-citizens (Matt. xiii. 54, 55; Mark vi. 1-3), the second by a woman in the multitude (Luke xii. 27), we have specified every event known to us in her life. It is noticeable that, on every occasion of our Lord's addressing her, or speaking of her, there is a sound of reproof in his words, with the exception of the last words spoken to her from the cross.

1. The marriage at Cana in Galilee (John ii) took place in the few months which intervened between the baptism of Christ and the Passover of the year 20. When Jesus was found by his mother and Joseph in the Temple in the year 8, we find him repudiating the name of "father" as applied to Joseph. "Thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing." How is it that he sought me? Wist ye not that I must be as not Josed, or yours, but my Father's house?" (Luke ii. 48-49). Now, in like manner, at his first miracle, which inaugurated his ministry, he solemnly withdraws himself from the authority of his earthly mother. This is Augustine's explanation of the "What have I to do with thee? my hour is not yet come." It was his humanity, not his divinity, which came from Mary. While, therefore, he was acting in his divine character, he could not acknowledge her, nor does he acknowledge her again until he was hanging on the cross, when, in that nature which he took from her, he was about to submit to death, and go out of vision, as the latter part of the outward passion (2 Kings xxi, 18; 2 Kings iii, 18), and such is the patristic explanation of them (see Iren. Advers. hiei, iii, p. 185; Apul. Bib. Patr. Par. tom. ii, par. ii, p. 298; St. Chrysost. Hom. in Joann. xxii). But the reproof is of a gentle kind (Trench, on the Miracles, p. 102 [London, 1856]; Alford, Comm. ad loc.; Wordsworth, Comm. ad loc.). Mary seems to have understood it, and accordingly to have drawn back, desiring the servants to pay more attention to the divine Son (Olahausen, Comm. ad loc.). The modern Rosenkranz translation, "What is that to you and to me?" is not a mistake, because it is a wilful misrepresentation (Douay version; Orsi, Life of Mary, etc.; see The Catholic Layman, p. 117 [Dublin, 1852]). Lightfoot supposes the marriage to have taken place at Nazareth. Mary, although a native of Nazareth, as his son Simon is called the Cananite, or man of Canaan. But this term rather describes him as a former Zealot. See Zechariah. It is clear that Mary felt herself to be involved with some authority in the house. Jesus was naturally so himself as her Son, and the disciples as those whom he had called and adopted; and yet he could say that a desire to gain edel by the powers of her Son was one motive for her wish that he should supply the deficiency of the wine, and that by his reply he meant to condemn this feeling.

2. (2) Capernaum (John ii, 12) and Nazareth (Matt. iv, 13; xii, 45; M. vi, 1) appear to have been the residence of Mary for a considerable period. The next time that she is brought before us we find her at Capernaum (Matt. xii, 46; Mark iii, 21, 81; Luke xvi. 19). It is the autumn of the year 21—a year and a half after the miracle wrought at the marriage-feast in Cana. The Lord had in the mean time attended two feasts of the Passover, and had twice made a circuit throughout Galilee, teaching and working miracles. His fame had spread, and crowds came pressing round him, so that he had not even time to "eat bread." Mary was still living with her other sons, and with James, Joses Simon, Jule, and their sisters (Matt. xiii, 55); and she and they heard of the toils which he was undergoing, and they understood that he was denying himself every relaxation from his labors. Their human affection conquered their faith. Although he was the Son of God, and, with an indignation arising from love, they exclaimed that he was beside himself, and set off to bring him home either by entreaty or compulsion. He was surrounded by eager crowds, and they could not reach him. Then, before him a message, begging him to allow them to speak to him. This message was addressed only from one person in the crowd to another, till at length it was reported aloud to him. Again he reproves; again he refuses to admit any authority on the part of his relatives, or any privilege on account of their relationship. "Who is my mother, and who are my brethren? And he stretched forth his hand towards his disciples, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother!" (Matt. xxi, 44, 49). Compare Theoph. in Marc. iii, 22; St. Chrysost. Sermon, 10. in loc. in Aug. in Joann. tract. x, who all of them point out that the blessedness of Mary consists, not so much in having borne Christ, as in believing on him and in obeying his words (see also Quest. et Rep. ad Orthodoxos, cxxxi; In St. Just. Mart. in the Bibl. Max. Patr. tom. ii, pt. ii, p. 188). This, indeed, is the lesson taught directly by our Lord himself in the next passage in which reference is made to Mary. In the midst or at the completion of one of his addresses on the same occasion, a woman of the multitude, whose soul had been stirred by his words, cried out, "Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked!" Immediately the Lord replied, "Yes, rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it" (Luke xii, 37). He does not either affirm or deny anything with regard to the direct bearing of the woman's explanation, but passes that by as a thing indifferent, in order to point out in what alone the true blessedness of his mother and of all consists. This is the full force of the μουσεύσιμα with which he commenced.

(3.) The next scene in Mary's life brings us to the foot of the cross. She was standing there with her sister Mary and Mary Magdalene, and Salome, and other women, having no doubt followed her Son as she was able throughout the terrible morning, late into the evening (see Codd. Epist. Conc. Lat. iii, 574 a); by others, in the same century, that she was buried at Gethsemane, and this appears to have been the information given to Marcian and Pulcheria by Juvenal of Jerusalem. As soon as we lose the guidance of Scripture, we have nothing from which we can derive any sure knowledge about her. The darkness in which we are left is in itself most instructive.

7. The character of the Virgin Mary is not drawn by any of the evangelists, but some of its lineaments are incidentally manifested in the fragmentary record which is given us now of the life of the Virgin, of which the story of the Canon of the Westminster Bible is the most complete. In the Virgin Mary's Gospel, whence an attempt has been made, by a curious mixture of the imaginative and rationalistic methods of interpretation, to explain the old legend which tells us that Luke painted the Virgin's portrait (Calmet, Kitto, Migne, Mrs. Jameson). We might have a more complete and detailed account of the Virgin as an evangelist, but in his Gospel we learn nothing of her except what may be gathered from the scene at Cana and at the cross. It is clear from Luke's account, though without any such intimation we might rest assured of the fact, that her youth had been spent in the service of the holy Scriptures, and that she had set before her the example of the holy women of the Old Testament as her model. This would appear from the Magnificat (Luke i, 46). The same hymn, so far as it emanated from herself, would show no little power of mind as well as warmth of spirit. Her faith and humility exhibit themselves in her immediate surrender of herself to the divine will, though ignorant how that will should be accomplished (Luke i, 86); her energy and earnestness, in her journey from Nazareth to Hebron (Luke i, 39); her happy thankfulness, in her song of joy (Luke i, 46); her silent, unsparing thoughtfulness in her prayers over the sufferers' visit (Luke ii, 19), and in her keeping her Son's words in her heart (Luke ii, 51), though she could not fully understand their import. Again, her humility is seen in her drawing back, yet without anger, after the allegations of the Master (John xii, 6). Her very nature, and in the remarkable manner in which she shuns putting herself forward throughout the whole of her Son's ministry, or after his removal from earth. Once only does she attempt to interfere with her divine Son's freedom of action (Matt. xii, 46; Mark iii, 51; Luke xviii, 19); and even here we can hardly blame, for she seems to have been roused, not by arrogance and by a desire to show her authority and relationship, as Chrysostom supposes (Hom. xiv in Matt.), but by a woman's and a mother's feelings of affection and fear for him whom she loved. That she did not interfere, and that it was not by her that Our Lord was led through the world, was due to the fact that she had no part in the work of redemption (seebelow), and was throughout to have belonged to her. In a word, so far as Mary is portrayed to us in Scripture, she is, as we should have expected, the most tender, the most faithful, humble, patient, and loving of women, but a woman still. (See Niemeyer, Günther, 56.)

II. Christian Legends. From this point forward we know nothing of her. house of David. The abode of the former was Nazare-the latter passed in her early years at Bethlehem.
They lived piously in the sight of God, and faultlessly before man, dividing their substance into three portions, each of which they devoted to the service of the Temple, another to the poor, and the third to their own wants.
So twenty years of their lives passed silently away.
Each in his way was prosperous, and in wealth and honor with some others of his tribe, to make his usual ofering at the Feast of the Dedication. It chanced that Isaiah was high-priest (Gospel of Birth of Mary); that Reuben was high-priest (Protevangelion). The high-priest Joseph was called, and he rose hastily to rise, sic, asking how he dared to present himself in company with those who had children, while he had none; and he refused to accept his offerings until he should have begotten a child, for the Scripture said, "Cursed is every one who does not beget a man-child in Israel." Joseph was astonished before his friends and neighbors, and he retired into the wilderness and fixed his tent there, and fasted forty days and forty nights. At the end of this period an angel appeared to him, and told him that his wife should conceive, and should bring forth a child, whom he should call Joseph. When Anna, who was much distressed at her husband's absence, and being reproached by her maid Judith with her barrenness, was overcome with grief of spirit.
In her sadness she went into her garden to walk, dressed in her wedding-dress. She there sat down under a lauret tree, and was spied upon by her husband's doves, a sparrow's nest, and she bemoaned herself as more miserable than the very birds, for they were fruitful and she was barren; and she prayed that she might have a child, even as Sarah was blessed with Isaac. At this moment two angels appeared to her, and promised her that she should have a child who should be spoken of in all the world. Joachim returned joyfully to his home, and when the time was accomplished Anna brought forth a daughter, and they called her name Mary. Now the child Mary increased in strength day by day, and at nine months of age she walked nine steps. When she was three years old her parents brought her to the Temple, to dedicate her to the Lord.
There were fifteen stairs up to the Temple, and, while Joseph and Mary were changing their dress, she walked up them without help; and the high-priest placed her upon the steps. Mary remained at the Temple until she was twelve (Prot.), fourteen (G. B. M.), years old, ministered to by the angels, and advancing in perfection as in years. At the end of that time, under the command of an angel, that were in the Temple to return to their homes and to be married. But Mary refused, for she said that she had vowed virginity to the Lord. Thus the high-priest was brought into a perplexity, and he had recourse to God to inquire what he should do. Then a voice from the ark answered him (G. B. M.), an angel spake unto him (Prot.); and they gathered together all the widowers in Israel (Prot.), all the marriageable men of the house of David (G. B. M.), and desired them to bring each man his rod. Among them came Joseph and brought his rod, but he shunned to present it, because he was an old man and had children. Therefore the other rods were presented and no sign occurred. Then it was found that Joseph had not presented his rod; and behold, as soon as he had presented it, a dove came forth from the rod and flew upon the head of Joseph (Prot.); a dove came from heaven and perched on the rod (G. B. M.). So Joseph, in spite of his reluctance, was compelled to betroth himself to Mary, and he returned to Bethlehem to make preparations for his mar-rriage (G. B. M.); he betook himself to his occupation of building houses (Prot.); while Mary went back to her parents' house in Galilee. Then it chanced that the priests needed a new veil for the Temple, and seven virgins cast lots to make different parts of it; and the lot to spin the true purple fell to Mary. As she went out with a pitcher to draw water at the springs, behold there was the sight of God, and she poured water ning to her. "Hail, thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee. Blessed art thou among women!" and she looked round with trembling to see whence the voice came; and she laid down the pitcher and went into the house, and took the purple and sat down to work at it. Then Joseph returned to his home from building houses (Prot.); came into Galilee, to the house of the Virgin to whom he was betrothed (G. B. M.), and finding her with child, he resolved to put her away privately; but being warned in a dream, he relinquished his purpose and took her to his house. Then came Anna the scribe to visit Joseph, and he went back and told the priest that Joseph had committed a great crime, for he had privately married the Virgin whom he had recieved out of the Temple, and had not made it known to the children of Israel. So the priest sent his servants, and they came to Mary, saying, "This is the child that was his, and the priest made Joseph drink the bitter water of trial (Numb. v, 18), and sent him to a mountainous place to see what would follow." But Joseph returned in perfect health, so the priest sent them away and after seven days he came to Anna, and said to Mary on an ass to go to Bethlehem to be taxed; and as they were going, Mary besought him to take her down, and Joseph took her down and carried her into a cave, and, leaving her there with his sons, he went to seek a midwife. When he had looked up, and he saw the clouds astonisnished and all creation amazed. The fowls stopped in their flight; the working people sat at their food, but did not eat; the sheep stood still; the shepherds' lifted hands became fixed; the kids were touching the water with their mouths, but did not drink.
A midwife came down from the mountains, and Joseph took her with him to the cave, and a bright cloud overshadowed the cave, and the cloud became a great light, and when the bright light faded there appeared an infant at the breast of Mary. Then the midwife went out and told Salome that a Virgin had brought forth, and step by step Salome could not believe it, and she went again into the cave, and Salome received satisfaction, but her hand withered away, nor was it restored until,
by the command of an angel, she touched the child, whereupon she was straightway cured. See Giles, Co-dez Apostolica, Testamentum virginum, 726.

Three spots lay claim to be the scene of the Annunciation. Two of these are, as was to be expected, in Nazareth, and one, as every one knows, is in Italy. The Greeks and Latins each claim to be the guardians of the true spot in Palestine; the third claimant is the holy house of Loretto. The Greeks point out the spring of water mentioned in the Protevangelion as confirmatory of their claim. The Latins have engraved on a marble slab in the grotto of their convent in Nazareth the words "Terminus hic est ortus periculi", implying that this is the place which marks the spot where the angel stood; while in the form of a young man, saying, "Woe is me because of thee, Mary, and thy Son!" On another occasion they fell in with two thieves, named Titus and Dumachus; and Titus was gentle and Dumachus was harsh: the Lady Mary therefore promised Titus that God should receive him on his right hand. Accordingly, thirty-three years afterwards, Titus was the penitent thief who was hanged on the right hand, and thus was revealed on the left. These are sufficient as samples. Throughout the book we find Mary associated with her Son, in the strange facts of power attributed to them, in a way which shows us whence the culture of Mary took its origin. See Jones, On the New Test., vol. ii. (Oxf. 1827); Giles, Codex Apocryphon; Thilo, Codex Apocryphon.

2. Mary's later Life.—The foregoing legends of Mary's childhood may be traced back as far as the third or even the second century. Those of her death are probably of a later date. The chief legend was for a length of time considered to be a veritable history, written by Melito, bishop of Sardinia, in the 2d century. It is to be found in the Bibliotheca Maxima (tom. ii. pt. ii. p. 212), entitled Sancti Melitonia Episcopi Sardinae De Transitus Mariae Virginis, and there are copies of this book with this title at the end of the 5th century, which was condemned by Pope Gelasius as apocryphal (Op. Gelas. apud Migne, lxx, 192). Another form of the same legend has been published at Elberfeld, in 1854, by Maximilian Gerke. He supposes that it is an Arabic translation from a Syriac original. It was found in the library at Bonn, and is entitled Jounaia Apostoli de Transitu Beatae Mariae Virginis Libri. It is perhaps the same that referred to in Assemani (Biblioth. Orient. Rom., 1729, iii. 267), under the name of Hieronomy et Asumguntiens B. Mariae Virginis Jounaia Evangeliaster falso inscripta. We give the substance of the legend with its main variations. When the apostles separated in order to evangelize the world, Mary continued to live with John's parents in their house near the Mount of Olives, and every day she went out to pray at the tomb of Christ, and at Golgotha. But the Jews had placed a watch to prevent prayers being offered at these spots, and the watch went into the city and told the chief priest that Mary came daily to pray. Then the priest commanded the watch to stone her. At this time, however, king Algarus wrote to Tiberius to desire him to take vengeance on the Jews for slaying Christ. They feared, therefore, to add to his wrath by slaying Mary also, and yet they could not allow her to continue her prayers at Golgotha, because an exorcism was thereby made. Accordingly, they went and spoke softly to her and besought her to go and dwell in Bethlem; and thither she took with her three holy virgins who should attend upon her. In the twenty-second year after the ascension of the Lord, Mary felt her heart burn with an inexpressible longing to be with her Son; and beholding an angel appeared to her, and announced to her that her soul should be taken up from her body on the thirty-third day, and he placed a palm-branch from paradise in her hands, and desired that it should be carried before her tiber. Mary besought the apostles to accompany her, and gashed her body before she died, and the angel replaced the soul that was gone over. Then the Holy Spirit caught up John as he was preaching at Ephesus, and Peter as he was offering sacrifice at Rome, and Paul as he was disputing with the Jews near Rome, and Thomas in the extremity of India, and Matthew and James: these were all of the apostles who were still living; then the Holy Spirit awakened the dead, Philip and Andrew, and Luke and Simon, and Mark and Bartholomew; and all of them were snatched away in a bright cloud and found themselves at Bethlem. And their wives, without number descended from heaven and stood round about the house; Gabriel stood at blessed Mary's head, and Michael at her feet, and they fanned her with their wings; and Peter and John wiped away her tears; and there was a great cry, and they all said "Hail, blessed one! blessed is the fruit of thy womb!" The people of Bethlem brought their sick to the house, and they were all healed. Then news of these things was carried to Jerusalem, and the king sent and commanded that they should bring Mary and the disciples to Jerusalem. Accordingly, horsemen came to Bethlem and took Mary, but they were met with fire, and the governor gave them permission, and they brought wood and fire; but as soon as they came near to the house, beheld there burst forth a fire upon them which consumed them utterly. Now the governor saw these things after off, and in the evening he caught his son, who was sick, to Mary, and he healed him. Then, on the sixth day of the week, the Holy Spirit commanded the apostles to take up Mary, and to carry her from Jerusalem to Getsemane, and as they went the Jews saw them. Then drew near Jophia, one of the high priest's servants, and he sat in attendance on which she was carried, for the other priests had conspired with him, and they hoped to cast her down into the valley, and to throw wood upon her, and to burn her body with fire. But as soon as Jophia had touched the little child and an angel appeared, and the fiery sword which was over her remained fastened to the litter. Then he cried to the disciples and Peter for help, and they said, "Ask it of the Lady Mary;" and he cried, "O Lady, O Mother of Salvation, have mercy on me!" Then she said to Peter, "Give him back his arms;" and they were restored whole. But the disciples proceeded onwards, and they laid down the litter in a cave, as they were commanded, and gave themselves to prayer. Now the angel Gabriel announced that on the first day of the week Mary's soul should be removed from this world. So on the morning of that day there came Eve, and Anne, and Edimalith, and they kissed Mary, and told her who they were: there came Adam, Seth, Shem, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, and the rest of the old fathers: there came Enoch, and Elias, and Moses: there came twelve chariots of angels immemorial: and then appeared the Lord Christ in his humanity, and Mary bowed before him and said, "O my Lord and my God, place thy hand upon me;" and he stretched out his hand and blessed her; and she took his hand and kissed it, and placed it to her forehead, and said, "I bow before this right hand, which has made heaven and earth, and all that is therein, and blessed the name of the Lord; thou hast thought me worthy of this hour." Then she said, "O Lord, take me to thyself!" But he said to her, "Now shall thy body be in paradise to the day of the resurrection, and angels shall serve thee; but thy pure spirit shall shine in the kingdom, in the dwelling-place of my Father's fulness." Then the disciples drew near, and besought her to pray for the world which she was about to leave. So Mary prayed. After her prayer was finished her face shone with marvellous brightness, and she stretched out her hands and blessed them all; and her Son put forth his hands and received her pure soul, and bore it into his Father's treasure-house. Then there was a light and a sweet smell, sweeter than anything on earth; and a voice from heaven saying, "Hail, blessed one! blessed and celebrated art thou among women!" (The legend ascribed to John is that Mary was to be carried to paradise by Gabriel while her Son returns to heaven.)

Now the apostles carried her body to the valley of Jehoshaphat, to a place which the Lord had told them of, and John went before and carried the palm-branch. There they placed her in the tomb, and then the mouth of the sepulchre, as the Lord commanded them; and suddenly there appeared the Lord Christ surrounded by a multitude of angels, and said to the apostles, "What will ye that I should do with her whom my Father's command selected out of all the tribes of Israel that I should dwell in her?" So Peter and the apostles besought him that he would raise the body of Mary and take it with him in glory to heaven. Then the Saviour said, "Be it according to your word." So he commanded Michael the archangel to bring down the soul of Mary. Then the soul of Mary went to the holy stone, and the Lord said, "Rise up, my beloved, thy body shall not suffer corruption in the tomb." Immediately Mary arose, and bowed herself at his feet and worshipped; and the Lord kissed her, and gave her to the angels to carry her to paradise. Then Thomas was not content with the rest, for at the moment that he was summoned to come he was baptising Polidius, who was the son of the sister of the king. And he arrived just after all these things were accomplished, and he demanded to see the sepulchre in which they had laid his Lady: "For ye know," said he, "that I am Thomas, and unless I see I will not believe." Then Peter arose in haste and wrath, and the other disciples with him, and they opened the sepulchre and went in; but they found nothing therein save that in which her body had been wrapped. Then Thomas confessed that he had seen her body in the closed tomb, and had seen her holy body carried by the angels with great triumph into heaven; and that on his crying to her for her blessing, she had bestowed upon him her precious Girdle, which when the apostles saw they were glad. Then the apostles were carried back each to his own country. Of the tomb of this Saint, Christornost, who had been preserved at Prato, see Mrs. Jameson's Legends of the Modulun, p. 344 (London, 1852).

3. Her Assumption.—The above story gradually gained credit. At the end of the 5th century we find that there existed a legend of the Virgin Mary which was condemned by pope Gelasius as apocryphal. This book is without doubt the oldest form of the legend, of which the books ascribed to Melito and John are variations. Down to the end of the 5th century, then, the story of the Assumption of the Church, and distinctly looked upon by the Church as belonging to the heretics and not to her. But then came the change of sentiment on this subject consequent on the Nestorian controversy. The desire to protest against the early fables which had been spread abroad by the heretics had now passed away, and had been succeeded by the desire to magnify her who had brought forth him who was God. Accordingly a writer, whose date Baroniuss fixes at about this time (Ann. Eccl. i, 347, Lucca, 1738), suggested the possibility of the Assumption, but declared his inability to decide the question. The letter in which this possibility or probability is thrown out came to be attributed to Jerome, and may still be found among his works, entitled Ad Paulum et Eustochium de Assumptione B. Virginis (v. 82, Paris, 1706). About the same time, probably, or rather later, an assertion (now recognised on all hands to be a forgery) was made in Eusebius's Chronicle, to the effect that "in the year A.D. 48 Mary the Virgin was taken up into heaven, as some wrote that they had had it revealed to them." Another tract was written to prove that the Assumption was not a saying in itself, nor was this done in an attitude of St. Augustine, and may be found in the appendix to his works; and a sermon, with a similar purport, was ascribed to St. Athanasius. Thus the names of Eusebius, Jerome, Augustine, Athanasius, and others, came to be quoted as maintaining the truth of the Assumption. The first writers within the Church in whose extant writings we find the Assumption asserted, are Gregory of Tours in the 6th century, who has merely copied Melito's book, De Transitus (De Glor. Marr, li. c. 4; Migne, 71, p. 700; Andrew of Crete, who probably lived in the 7th century, as does also Constantine, and the Lord said, "Rise up, my beloved, thy body shall not suffer corruption in the tomb." The last of these authors refers to the Euthymianic history as stating that Marcius and Pulcheria, being in search of the body of Mary, sent to Juvalen of Jerusalem to inquire for it. Juvalen replied, "The holy soul and divinely inspired Scriptures, indeed, nothing is recorded of the departure of the body of Mary, Mother of God. But from an ancient and most true tradition we have received, that at the time of her glorious falling asleep all the holy apostles, who were going through the world for the salvation of the nations, boro aloft in a moment of time, came together to Jerusalem; and when they were near her they had a vision of angels, and divine melody was heard; and with divine and more than heavenly melody she delivered her holy soul into the hands of God in an unseparable manner. But that which had borne God, being carried with angels and the divine glory, was preserved in the heavens; it was deposited in a coffin at Gethsemane. In this place the chorus and singing of the angels continued three whole days. But after three days, on the angelic music ceasing, those of the apostles who were present opened the coffin, and saw the body of the Virgin Mary, and were filled with an ineffable odor of sweetness which proceeded from them. Then they closed the coffin. And they were astonished at the mysterious wonder, and they came to no other conclusion than that he who had chosen to take flesh of the Virgin Mary, and to become a man, and to be born of her—God the Word, the Lord of Glory—and had preserved her virginity after birth, was also pleased, after her departure, to honor her immaculate and unpolluted body with incorruption, and to translate her before the common resurrection of all men" (St. Joan. Damas. Op. ii, 880, Venice, 1748). It is quite clear that this is the same legend as that which we have before given. Here, then, we see it brought over the borders and planted within the Church, which was a great blow to the Euthymianic history is to be accepted as verifiable, by Juvalen of Jerusalem in the 5th century, or else by Gregory of Tours in the 6th century, or by Andrew of Crete in the 7th century, or, finally, by John of Damascus in the 8th. Moreover, it is the true tradition of the Virgin Mary, in his Opp. ii, 857-868). The same legend is given in a slightly different form as veritable history by Nicophorus Callistus in the 18th century (Niciph. i, 171, Paris, 1860); and the fact of the Assumption is stereotyped in the Breviary services for August 15 (Brev. Rom. Paro. et, p. 561, Milan, 1851). Here again, then, we see a legend originated by heretics, and remaining external to the Church till the close of the 6th century, creeping into the Church during the 6th and 7th centuries, and finally ratified by the authority both of Home and Constantinople. See Baronius, Ann. Eccl. (i, 344, Lucca, 1738) and Martyrologium (p. 814, Paris, 1607).

II. Jewish Traditions.—These are of a very different nature from the light-hearted fairy-tale-like stories which we have recounted above. We should expect that the miraculous birth of our Lord would be an occasion of scoffing to the unconverted, and find this to be the case. We have already a hint during our Lord's ministry of the Jewish calumnies as to his birth. "We [Jesus] be not born of fornication" (John viii, 41), seems to be an insinuation on the Jews' part that he was. To the Christian believer the Jewish slander becomes in the present case only a confirmation of his faith. The most definite and outspoken of these slanders is that which is contained in the book called עַבְרָיָנָא, or Toledoth Jeshu. It was grasped at with avidity by Voltaire, and declared by him to be the most ancient Jewish writing directed against Christianity. It is not improbable that the first century of the Christian Church was written, he says, before the Gospels, and is altogether contrary to them (Lettre sur les Juifs). It is proved by Ammon (Biblisch. Theologie, p. 263, Erlang. 1801) to be a composition of the 18th century, and by Wagenseil (Telci igmeu Satiana; Confut. Libr. Todos Jochua, p. 12, Altorf, 1861) to be irreconcilable with the earlier Jewish tales. In the Gospel of Nicodemus, otherwise called the Acts of Pilate, we find the Jews represented as charging our Lord with illegitimate birth (c. 2). The date of this Gospel is about the end of the third century. The origin of the charge is referred with great probability by Thilo (Codex Apoc. p. 627, Lips. 1862) to the circular letters of the Jews mentioned by Grotius (ad Matt. xxvii, 63, et al Act. Apost. xxviii, 22; Op. ii, 278 and 666, Basili, 1782), which were sent from Palestine to all the Jewish synagogues after the death of Christ, with the view of attacking "the lawless and atheistic sect which had the effrontery to call itself Jewish and orthodox" (Justin, adv. Tryph.). The first time that we find it openly proclaimed is in an extract made by Origen from the work of Celsus, which he is refuting. Celsus introduces a Jew declaring that the mother of Jesus was repudiated by her husband for adultery (υπ' αυτού γίγνεται, τίτων τοῦ γένεσεν, ἵνα δὲξια, ἐξαφανίσθησθαι μικρι απὸ Χελοσίου, Contra Celsum, c. 25, Origenis Opera, xviii, 56, Berlin, 1845; again, οὗ τοῦ γένεσεν διί, ἵνα δὲξια, ἐξαφανίσθησθαι μικρι ἀπὸ τοῦ Χελοσίου, ἐξαφανίσθησθαι μικρι ἀπὸ τοῦ γένεσεν, ibid. 90). Storstein says that the same idea may be found in the Talmud—not in the Mishna, which dates from the 2d century, but in the Gemara, which is of the 5th or 6th (see Tract. Sanhedrín, cap. vii, fol. 67, 1; Shabbath, cap. xii, fol. 104, col. 2; and the Midrash Kohéth, cap. xvi 1). Rabanus Maurus, in the 9th century, refers to the same story: "Jehusa filium ethnicus cujusdam Pandura adulteri, more latronum pu n tini usae." Lightfoot quotes the same story from the Talmudist (Ecclesi. at Matt. xxvii, 56), who says, often vilify Mary under the name of Σωκρώτ. She who is called Mary, the daughter of Helil, and is represented as hanging in bondage among the damned, with the great bar of hell's gate hung at her ear (ibid. at Luke iii, 23). We then come to the Toledoth Jeshu, in which these calumnies were intended to be summed up and harmonized. In the year 4671, the story runs, in the reign of king Jannuaus, there was one Joseph Pandera who lived at Bethlehem. In the same village there was a widow who had a daugh ter named Miriam, who was betrothed to a God-fearing man named Johanam. Now it came to pass that Johanam had been with Miriam when it was dark, deceived her into the belief that he was about to marry her, and the rabbi advised him to bring her before the great council. But Johanam was ashamed to do so, and instead he left his home and went and lived at Babylony; and there Miriam brought forth a son, and gave him the name of Jehoshua. The rest of the work, which has no merit in a literary aspect or otherwise, contains an account of how this Jehoshua gained the art of working miracles, and ascribing the knowledge of the unmentionable name from the Temple; how he ascended to the superior magical arts of one Juda; and how at last he was crucified, and his body hidden under a water-cour
MARY 840  MARY

e. It is offensive to make use of sacred names in connection with such tales; but in Wagenseil's quaint words we may recollect, "hec nomina non attinere ad Servatorem Nostrum autbeatissimum illius matrem cetero cresque qua non significare videntur, sed designari iis a Diabolo supposita Spectra, Lurvas, Lemures, Lamas, Syrages, aut si quid turpis itis" (Liber Todos Jochua, in the Telci igmeu Satiana, p. 2, Altorf, 1861). It is a curious thing that a Pandera or Panther has been intro duced into the genealogy of our Lord by Epiphanius (Herae, lxxviii), who makes him grandfather of Joseph, and by John of Damascus (De Fide orthodoxo, iv, 15), who makes him the father of Barpanther and grandfa ter of Mary.

IV. Mohammedan Traditions.—These are again cast in a totally different mould from those of the Jews. The Mohammedans had no purpose to serve in spreading calumnious stories as to the birth of Jesus, and ac cordingly we find none of the Jewish malignity about their traditions. Mohammed and his followers appear to have gathered up the floating Oriental traditions which originated in the legends of Mary's early years, given above, and to have drawn from them and from the Bible indifferently. It has been suggested that the Koran had an object in magnifying Mary, and that this was to insinuate that the Son was of no other nature than the mother. But this does not appear to be the case. Mohammed seems merely to have written down what had come to his ears about her, without definite purpose. He makes no special allusion to her as the mother of Jesus, and the mention of her is not prominent in the Koran.

Mary was, according to the Koran, the daughter of Amram (sur. iii) and the sister of Aaron (sur. xix). Mohammed can hardly be absolved from having here con downed Miriam the sister of Moses with Mary the mother of our Lord. It is possible, indeed, that he may have meant different persons, and such is the opinion of Sale (Koran, p. 88, 291) and of D'Herbelot (Bibl. orient. sur Mirkam); but the opposite view is more likely (see Gas dagnoli, Apud. pro rel. Christ. c. viii, p. 277, Rom. 1831). Indeed, some of the Mohammedan commentators have said that the Koran was not written down by the Prophet, but by saying that Miriam was miraculously kept alive from the days of Moses in order that she might be the moth er of Jesus. Her mother Hannah dedicated her to the Lord while still in the womb, and at her birth "com cended her and her future issue to the protection of God against Satan." So Hannah brought the child to the Temple to be educated by the priests, and the priests disputed among themselves who should take charge of her. Zacharias maintained that it was his office, be cause he had married her aunt. But when the others would not give up their claim, he was pronounced the man to be chosen by lot. So they were sent to the river Jordan, twenty-seven of them, each man with his rod; and they threw their rods into the river, and none of them floated save that of Zacharias, wherupon the care of the child was committed to him (Al Beidawi; Jallalludin). Then Zacharias placed her in an inner chamber by herself; and though he kept seven doors ever locked upon her (other stories make the only entrance to be by a ladder and a door always kept locked), he always found her abundantly supplied with provi dions which God sent her from paradise, winter fruits in summer, and summer fruits in winter. All this was said unto her, "O Mary, verily God hath chosen thee, and hath purified thee, and hath chosen thee above all the women of the world" (Korana, sur. iii). So she re tired to a place towards the east, and Gabriel appeared unto her and said, "Verily I am sent to thee from thy Lord, and am sent to give thee a holy Son" (sur. xix). Then the angels said, "O Mary, verily God sendeth thee good tidings that thou shalt bear the Word proceeding from himself: His name shall be Christ Jesus, the Son of Mary, honorable in this world and in the world to come, and his throne shall be established from the presence of God: and he shall speak unto men in his cradle and when he is grown up; and he shall be one of the righteous." But she said, "How shall I have a son, seeing I know not a man?" The angel said, "So God creath which he pleaseth: when he decreeth a thing, he only saith to it, 'Be,' and it is. God shall teach him the Scripture and wisdom, and the Law and the Gospel, and shall appoint him his apostle to the children of Israel' (sur. iii). So God breathed of his Spirit into the womb of Mary; and she preserved her chastity (sur. lviii); for the Jews have spoken against her, and said, 'Behold, she is an adulteress, a daughter of Solomon, and her son, and retired with him apart to a distant place; and the pains of childbirth came upon her near the trunk of a palm-tree; and God provided a rivulet for her, and she shook the palm-tree, and it let fall ripe dates thereof, and wild grapes, and when she carried the child in her arms to her people; but they said that it was a strange thing she had done. Then she made signs to the child to answer them; and he said, 'Verily I am the servant of God: he hath given me the book of the Gospel, and hath appointed me a prophet; and he hath made me blessed, wheresoever I shall be; and hath commanded me to observe prayer and to give alms so long as I shall live; and he hath made me dutiful towards my mother, and hath not made me proud or unhappy: and peace be on me the day whereon I was born, and the day whereon I shall be delivered to life.' This was Jesus the Son of Mary, the Word of Truth, concerning whom they had doubt (sur. xix).

Mohammed is reported to have said that many men have arrived at perfection, but only four women; and that they are, Asia, mother of Pharaoh, the daughter of Amram, his first wife Khatdijah, and his daughter Fatima. The commentators on the Koran tell us that every person who comes into the world is touched at his birth by the devil, and therefore cries out; but that God placed a veil between Mary and her Son and the Evil Spirit, so that he could not reach them. For this reason they were neither of them guilty of sin, like the rest of the children of Adam. This privilege they had in answer to Hannah's prayer for their protection from Satan (Jallaluddin; Al Beidawi; Kitabat). The Immaculate Conception therefore, we may note, was a Mohammedan doctrine six centuries before any Christian theologians or schoolmen maintained it.

V. Embata.—There was a time in the history of the Gospel when all the persons and the book of Canticles were applied at once to Mary. Consequently all the Eastern metaphors of king Solomon have been hardened into symbols, and represented in pictures or sculpture, and attached to her in popular litanies. The same method of interpretation was applied to certain parts of the book of the Revelation. Her chief emblems are the sun, moon, and stars (Rev. xii, 1; Cant. vi, 10).

The name of Star of the Sea is also given her, from a fanciful interpretation of the meaning of her name. She is the Rose of Sharon (Cant. ii, 1) and the Lily (i, 2), the Tower of David (iv, 4), the Tower of Myrrh and the Hill of Frankincense (iv, 6), the Garden enclosed, the Spring shut up, the Fountain sealed (iv, 12), the Tower of Ivory (vii, 4), the Palm-tree (vii, 7), the Closed Gate (Ezek. xlv, 2). There is no end to these metaphorical titles. See Mrs. Jameson's Legends of the Madonna, and the ordinary Litanies of the Blessed Virgin.

VI. Festivals, etc.—The Festival of Mary's Conception is said to have been instituted on the occasion of the preservation from shipwreck of St. Anselm, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, and by the direction of Mary himself, who desired that the day of her conception should be the 8th of December.

The Nativity of the Virgin.—There is a good deal of controversy as to the time of its first celebration and its origin. It is celebrated on the 8th of September, and is not traceable further back than the 9th century. There is a Romish calumny that queen Elizabeth substituted her own birthday in its place.

Her Presentation in the Temple, November 21, mentioned in very early martyrlogies, and in a constitution of the emperor Manuel Comnenus.

Her Epitaph, November 22.

The Annunciation, March 25.

The Visitation, July 2, established by Urban VIII, and approved by the Council of Basle.

The Purification, February 2, established in the East under the emperor Justinian, and a little later in the West.

The Assumption (ευανήλολος), in the Greek Church, celebrated originally at different times, but fixed to be on the 15th of August about the time of Charlemagne.

Besides the great festivals in honor of Mary, particular churches and fraternities have had their private ones. Several religious orders have chosen her for their especial patroness, and the whole kingdom of France was, in 1688, placed under her protection by a vow of Louis XIII. Festivals have been established in honor of particular objects connected with her, as the chamber in which she was born, which she afterwards adorned, which was conveyed magnificently from Nazareth to Loretto (q.v.), the Cintola at Prato, la Sainte Chemise at Chartres, the rosary which she gave to St. Dominic, and the scapular which she gave to Simon Stock; and indulgences have been granted on the occasion of these festivals, and the devotions they elicited. Books have been written to describe her miraculous pictures and images, and the boundless extent and diversity of the literature to which her worship has given rise may be inferred from a description of two of the 115 works, all on the same subject, of Hippolyte Maracci, a member of the congregation of the Clerks of the Mother of God, born 1694. Bibliotheca Mariana is a biographical and bibliographical notice in alphabetical order of all the authors who have written on any of the attributes or perfections of the holy Virgin, with a list of their works. The number of writers amounts to more than 8000, and the number of works in print or MS. to twice as many. This rare and highly-valued work is accompanied by five curious and useful indices. The other is Concepicio immaculata Deiparæ Virginæ Mariae celebrata MCXV anagroammotitos prorou parvis ec hac salutationibus ad egentos scholasticos scripta et invenita "Ave Maria gratia plena Dominus tecum." This work, of which Maracci was only the editor, certainly exceeds in laborious trifling the production of father J. B. Heburne, the Scotch Minim, who dedicated to his patron, Paul V, seventy-two encomiums on the Virgin in as many different languages.

For further literature, see Volbing, Index Programmatum, p. 9; Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, col. 1841 sq.; Danz, Wörterbuch, s. v. Maria; Winer, Reale, s. v. See Jesus Christ, Virgin, Mary, the Magdalene, Maria Magdalene, A. V. "Mary Magdalene," one of the most interesting, but at the same time most contradistinctively-interpreted characters in the N.T. In the following statements respecting her we largely follow the article in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, s. v.

1. The Name.—Four different explanations have been given of this. (1) That which at first suggests itself as the most natural, that she came from the town of Magdala. The statement that the women with whom she journeyed followed Jesus in Galilee (Mark xxi, 41), agrees with this notion. Magdala was originally a tower or fortress, as its name indicates, the situation of which is probably the same with that of the modern village of el-Mejdel, on the western shore of the Lake of Tiberias (Stanley). But Lightfoot starts another supposition, both with regard to the place of residence in the early days of Mary Magdalene. He shows that there was a place called Magdala very near Jerusalem, so near that a person who set up his candles in order on the eve of the Sabbath, might afterwards go to Jerusalem, pray there, and return and light up his candles when the Sabbath was now coming in (Exe. John xii, 3). This place is stated in the Talmud to have been destroyed on account of its adulteries. Now, it is argued by Baronius, that Mary Magdalene must have been the same person as the Syriac Stella, the name that Lightfoot entirely agrees with him, and he thinks that, Bethany and Magdala being both near Jerusalem, she may have married a man of Magdala, and acquired the disolute morals of the place; or that Magdala may have been another name for Bethany. All this, however, is full of improbabilities. (2) Another explanation has been found in the fact that the Talmudic writers, in their calumnies against the Nazarenes, make mention of a Miriam Megaddda (ניאריה), and deriving that word from the Piel of נַעַרְשָׂה, to twine, explain it as meaning 'the twiner or plaiter of hair.' They connect with this name a story which will be mentioned later; but the derivation has been accepted by Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. on Matt. xxvi, 66; Hurm. Cro. on Luke viii, 3) as satisfactory, and pointing to the previous worldliness of 'Miriam with the braided locks' as identical with 'the woman that was a sinner' of Luke vii, 57. It has been urged in favor of this that the y kəsə́ım of Luke vii, 57 is a peculiarity, as something peculiar, is used wherever the word that follows points only to origin or residence. (3) Either seriously, or with the patronizing fondness for paronomasia, Jerome sees in her name, and in that of her town, the old Mygδła ('a watch-tower'), and dwells on the coincidence accordingly. The name denotes the seat of a watch-tower. She is his 'virgo inquiriens, verum taurus canorí et Libani, qua prospicit in factam Damas- cí,' (Epist. ad Principium). He is followed in this by later Latin writers, and the pur form the theme of a panegyric sermon by Od. Clungi (Acta Sanctorum, Absalom, July 12). (4) Or plainly, on the more common meaning of נַעַרְשָׂה (גֶּדֶשׁ), to be great, sees in her name a prophecy of her spiritual greatness as having ministered to the Lord, and been the first witness of his resurrection (Tract. in Matt. xxxv). See MAGDALENE.

II. Scripture Incidents.—1. Mary Magdalene comes before us for the first time in Luke viii, 2 (A.D. 26). It was the custom of Jewish women (Jerome on 1 Cor. ix, 5) to contribute to the support of rabbis whom they revered, and, in conformity with that custom, there were among the disciples of Jesus women who 'ministered unto him of their substance.' All appear to have occurred, not with a view to the joy, it is probable, but with the chief motive was that of gratitude for their deliverance from 'evil spirits and infirmities.' Of Mary it is said specially that 'seven demons (ἔγνωτον) went out of her;' and the number indicates, as in Matt. xii, 45, and the 'legion' of the Gadarene demoniac (Mark v, 9), a possession of more than ordinary malignity.' We must think of her, accordingly, as having had, in their most aggravated forms, some of the phenomena of mental and spiritual disease which we meet with in other demoniacs—the wretchedness of despair, the divided consciousness, the precursory frenzy, the long-continued fixity of silence. The appearance of the same description in Mark xvi, 9 (whatever opinion we may form as to the authorship of the closing section of that Gospel), indicates that this was the fact most intimately connected with her name in the minds of the early disciples. From that state of misery she had been set free by the presence of the Healer, and in the absence, as we may infer, of other ties and duties, she found her safety and her blessedness in following him. The silence of the Gospels as to the presence of these women at other periods of the Lord's ministry, makes it probable that they attended on him chiefly in his more solemn progresses through the towns and villages of Galilee, while at other times he journeyed to and fro without any other attendants than the Twelve, and sometimes without even them.

2. In the last journey to Jerusalem, to which so many had been looking with eager expectation, they again accompanied him (Matt. xxvii, 55; Mark xv, 41; Luke xxiii, 55; xxiv, 10), A.D. 29. It will explain much that follows if we remember that this life of ministraion must have brought Mary Magdalene into companionship of the Lord on his last journey to Jerusalem, and that James and John (Mark iv, 40), and even also with Mary, the mother of the Lord (John xii, 25). The women who thus devoted themselves are not prominent in the history: we have no record of their mode of life or abode, or hopes or failures in these few momentous days that preceded the crucifixion. From that hour they came forth for a brief two days' space into marvellous distinctness. They 'stood afar off, beholding these things' (Luke xxiii, 49), during the closing hours of the agony on the cross. Mary Magdalene, Mary, the mother of the Lord, and the beloved disciple, were at one time not afar off, but close to the cross, within hearing. The same close association which drew them together there is seen afterwards. She remains by the cross till all is over, waits till the body is taken down, and wrapped in the linen-cloth and placed in the Roman sepulchre of Joseph of Arimathea. She remains there in the dusk of the evening, watching what she must have looked upon as the final resting-place of the Prophet and Teacher whom she had honored (Matt. xxvii, 61; Mark xvi, 47; Luke xxi, 55). Not to her had there been given grace to see any of the resurrection appearances to whom the words that spoke of it had beenaddressed had failed to understand them, and were not likely to have reported them to her. The Sabbath that followed brought an enforced rest, but no sooner is the sun up over them they were with Salome and Mary, the mother of James, 'bought sweet spices that they might come and anoint' the body, the interment of which on the night of the crucifixion they regarded as hasty and provisional (Mark xvi, 1).

The next morning, accordingly, in the earliest dawn (Matt. xxviii, 1; Mark xvi, 2), they came with Mary, the mother of James, to the sepulchre, and successively saw the 'vision of angels' (Matt. xxviii, 5; Mark xvi, 5). A careful comparison of the relative time of the several appearances of Christ on his resurrection makes it evident that the term 'first,' applied by Mark (xvi, 9) to the appearance to Mary, must not be taken so strictly as to exclude the prior appearance to the other females who had accompanied her to the sepulchre (see Metz. Quart. Rev. 1860, p. 387 sq.). See Appearances of Christ. To her, however, after the first moment of joy, it is to belong. With all this and the chief motive was that of gratitude for their deliverance from 'evil spirits and infirmities.' Of Mary it is said specially that 'seven demons (ἔγνωτον) went out of her;' and the number indicates, as in Matt. xii, 45, and the 'legion' of the Gadarene demoniac (Mark v, 9), a possession of more than ordinary malignity.' We must think of her, accordingly, as having had, in their most aggravated forms, some of the phenomena of mental and spiritual disease which we meet with in other demoniacs—the wretchedness of despair, the divided consciousness, the precursory frenzy, the long-continued fixity of silence. The appearance of the same description in Mark xvi, 9 (whatever opinion we may form as to the authorship of the closing section of that Gospel), indicates that this was the fact most intimately connected with her name in the minds of the early disciples. From that state of misery she had been set free by the presence of the Healer, and in the absence, as we may infer, of other ties and duties, she found her safety and her blessedness in following him. The silence of the Gospels as to the presence of these women at other periods of the Lord's ministry, makes it probable that they attended on him chiefly in his more solemn progresses through the towns and villages of Galilee, while at other times he journeyed to and fro without any other attendants than the Twelve, and sometimes without even them.

That however, is not the discipline she needs. Her love had been too dependent on the visible presence of her Master. She had the same lesson to learn as the other disciples. Though they had "known Christ after the flesh," they were not taught much by it, and so, in time, she learned to hear that truth in its highest and sharpest form. "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father." For a time, till the earthly affection had been raised to a heavenly one, she was to hold back. When he had finished his work and had ascended to the Father, there should be no barrier then to the fullest communion that the most devoted love could crave. Those who sought, might draw near and touch him then. He would be one with them, and they one with him. This is the last authentic record of the Magdalene. On her character, see the Journal of Soc. Lit. in Oct. 1866.

II. Proposed Identifications with other Females mentioned in the N. T.—1. The questions which meet us connect themselves with the narratives in the four Gospels of women who came with precious ointment to anoint the feet or the head of Jesus. Each Gospel contains an account of one such anointing, and men have asked, in endeavoring to construct a harmony, "Do they tell us of four distinct acts, or of three, or of two, or of one only? On any supposition but the last, are the distinct acts performed by the same or by different persons, and if by different persons, by how many? Further, have we any grounds for identifying Mary Magdalene with the woman or with any one of the women whose acts are thus brought before us?" This opens a wide range of possible combinations, but the limits of the inquiry may, without much difficulty, be narrowed. Although the opinion seems to have been at one time maintained (Origen, Tract. in Mott. xxxv.), few would now hold that Matt. xxvi and Mark xiv are reports of two distinct events. Few, except critics bent like Schleiermacher and Strauss on getting up a case against the historical veracity of the evangelists, attempt to persuade themselves that the narrative of Luke vii, differing as it does in well-nigh every circumstance, is but a misplaced and embellished version of the incident which the first two Gospels connect with the last week of our Lord's ministry. The supposition that there were three anointings has found favor with Origen (L. c.) and Lightfoot (Harv. Exeg., ad loc., and Hor. Heb. in Matt. xxvi); but while, on the one hand, it removed some harmonistic difficulties, there is, on the other, something improbable, to the verge of being inconceivable, in the repetition within three days of the same scene, at the same place, with the same ointment, and the same former and new minister. We are left to the conclusion adopted by the great majority of interpreters, that the Gospels record two anointings, one in some city unnamed (Capernam in and Nain have been suggested), during our Lord's Galilean ministry (Luke vii), the other at Bethany, before the last entry into Jerusalem (Matt. xxvi; Mark xiv; John xii).

We come, then, to the question whether in these two narratives we meet with one woman or with two. The one passage adduced for the former conclusion is John xi, 2. "If one of us had touched (Madvon in Matt. xxvi, and Joann. xi, 2; Acts Sanctorum, July 22) that which we say there ("It was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment. . . . whose brother Lazarus was sick") could not possibly refer by anticipation to the history which was about to follow in ch. xii, and must therefore presuppose some fact known through the other Gospels to the Church at large, and that fact, it is inferred, is found in the history of Luke vii. Against this it has been said, on the other side, that the assumption thus made is entirely an arbitrary one, and that there is not the slightest trace of the life of Mary of Bethany ever having been one of open and flagrant impurity. There is, therefore, but slender evidence for the assumption that the two anointings were the acts of one and the same woman, and that woman the sister of Lazarus. That she may have been in the later scene is probable, but certainly not in the earlier. See No. 3, below.

There is, if possible, still less reason for the identification of Mary Magdalene with the chief actress in either of the histories. When her name appears in Luke vii, 3, there is not one word to connect it with the best text of the Gospel, and immediately precedes. Though possible, it is at least unlikely that such a one as the "sinner" would at once have been received as the chosen companion of Joanna and Salome, and have gone from town to town with them and the disciples. Lastly, the description that is given—"Out of whom went seven devils"—points, as has been stated, to a form of suffering all but absolutely incompatible with the life implied in ἐμπορίσασθαι, and to a very different work of healing from that of the divine words of pardon—"Thy sins be forgiven thee." To say, as has been said, that the seven devils are the "many sins" (Greg. Mag. Hom. in Exeg., 25 and 53), is to identify two things which are separated in the whole tenor of the N. T. by the clearest line of demarcation. The argument that because Mary Magdalene is mentioned so soon afterwards, she must be the same as the woman of Luke vii (Butler's Lives of the Saints, July 22), is simply puerile. It would be just as reasonable to identify the "sinner" with Susanna. Never, perhaps, has a figment so utterly baseless obtained so wide an acceptance as that which we connect with the name of Mary Magdalene. It has been noted that the chapter-heading of the A. V. of Luke vii should seem to give a quasi-authoritative sanction to a tradition so utterly uncertain, and that it should have been perpetuated in connection with a great work of mercy.

2. The belief that Mary of Bethany and Mary Magdalene are identical is yet more startling. Not one single circumstance, except that of love and reverence for their Master, is common. The epithet Magdalene, whatever may be its meaning, seems chosen for the express purpose of distinguishing her from all other Marys. No one evangelist gives the slightest hint of identity, Luke mentions Martha and her sister Mary in x, 88, 39, as though neither had been named before. John, who gives the fullest account of both, keeps their distinct individuality most preciously. The only simulacrum of an argument on behalf of the identity is that, if we do not admit it, we have no record of the sister of Lazarus having been a witness of the resurrection.

III. Traditions.—1. On the above Identification.—This lack of evidence in the N. T. itself is not compensated by any number of authors who are in the really trustworthy tradition. Two of the earliest writers who allude to the histories of the anointing—Clement of Alexandria (Pedag. i, 8) and Tertullian (De Paudic. chap. 8)—say nothing that would imply that they accepted it. The language of Ireneaus (iii, 4) is against it. Origen (L. c.) discusses the question fully, and rejects it. He is followed by the whole succession of the expositors of the Eastern Church: Theophilius of Antioc, Macarius, Chrysostom, Theophylact. The traditions of that Church, when they wandered into the regions of conjecture, took another path. The chief of them is the identity of Mary Magdalene with the daughter of the Syro-Phoenician woman of Mark vii, 26 (Nicephorus, H. E. i, 83). In the Western Church, however, the other belief began to spread. At first it is mentioned hesitatingly, as by Ambrose (De Exig. V. 1), and in the Council of Carthage in (Ex. 25, 58), and stamps them with his authority. The reverence felt for him, and the constant use of his works as a text-book of theology during the whole mediaeval period, secured for the hypothesis a currency which it never would have gained on its own merit. The ser-VICES of the Feast of St. Mary Magdalene were constructed on the assumption of its truth (Brev. Rom., in Jul., 221). Hymns, paintings, and sculptures fixed it deep in the minds of the Western nations, France and England being foremost in their reverence for the saint whose history appealed to their sympathies. (See below.) In particular, that passage in Luke has been adapted as a hymn for the day for Mary Magdalene (Meier, on Luke vii, 37), and her name has passed into all the languages of Western Christendom as expressive of a female penitent. Deleying (Obs. Sacr. iii, 261) gives a history both of the progress of the identification of and those controversies, especially in the Gallic Church, dealt with in a study of her liturgical status (c. 894), while the distinction between them; and a testimony to the success with which this was done will be found in Daniel (Theocretus Hymnologicus, ii, 129), who tells us that in the missals of various churches, the words "Pecatricess absorbiestvi were substituted for those which unquestionably belong to that noble hymn, the Dies Irae, in its original condition, "Qui Mariam absorbiestvi." Well-nigh all ecclesisastical writers, after the time of Gregory the Great (Albert the Great and Thomas Aquinas are exceptions), take it for granted. When it was first questioned by Ebrard in 1802, the authority of the early De Leyin and calmer criticism of the 16th century, the new opinion was formally condemned by the Sorbonne (Acta Sanctorum, L. c.), and denounced by bishop Fisher of Rochester.
The Prayer-book of 1549 follows in the wake of the latter, in 1552, either from want of the amount of the uncertainty or for other reasons, the feast disappears.
The Book of Homilies gives a doubtful testimony.
In one passage the "sinful woman" is mentioned without any notice of her being the same as the Magdalene (Seizone on Repeaton, part ii); in another it depends upon a comma whether the two are distinguished or identified (ibid. part ii). The translators under James I, as has been stated, adopted the received tradition.
Since that period there has been a gradually accumulating consensus against it. Calvin, Grotius, Hammond, Casualon, among other critics, Bengel, Lampe, Greg-well, Alford, Wordsworth, Stier, Meyer, Ellicott, Oleahsen, among later, agree in rejecting it. Romanist writers even (Tillmont, Dapin, Estius) have borne their protest against it in whole or in part; and books that represent the present teaching of the Gallican Church do not entirely identify the two Marys. But the Magdalene as an unhappy mistake (Migne, Diet. de la Bíble).
The medieval tradition has, however, found defenders in Baronius, the writers of the Acta Sanctorum, Maldu-natus, bishop Andrews, Lightfoot, Isaac Williams, and
hI. W. Fairburn.
2. It remains to give the substance of the legend formed out of these combinations. At some time before the commencement of our Lord's ministry, a great sorrrow fell upon the household of Bethany. The younger of the two sisters fell from her purity and sank into the depths of shame. Her life was that of one possessed by the "seven devils" of uncleanness. From the city to which she then went, or from her harlot-like adornments, she was known by the new name of Magdalene.
Then she hears of the Deliverer, and repents, and loves, and is forgiven. Then she is received back at once by her sister and dwells with her, and shows that she has chosen the good part.
The death of Lazarus and his return to life are new motives to her gratitude and love; and she shows them, as she had shown them before, anoning no longer the feet only, but the head also of her Lord. She watches by the cross, and is present at the sepulchre, and witnesses the resurrection. Then (the legend goes on, when the work of fantastic combination is completed, after some years of waiting) she goes with Lazarus and Martha and Maxim (one of the seventy) to Marseilles. Comp.
Lazarus. They land there; and she, leaving Martha to more active work, retires to a cave in the neighborhood of Arles, and there leads a life of penitence for thirty years. When she dies a church is built in her honour, and miracles are wrought at her tomb. Then the Frank is healed by her intercession, and his new faith is strengthened; and the chivalry of France does homage to her name as to that of the greater Mary.
Such was the full-grown form of the Western story.
In the literature of the French writers of the 13th century (H. E. ii, 10) states that she went to Rome to secure Pilate for his unrighteous judgment; Modestus, patriarch of Constantinople (Hom. in Marias), that she came to Ephesus with the Virgin and St. John, and died and was buried there. The emperor Leo the Philosopher (cir. 894) speaks of her coming from that city to the Constantinople (Acta Sanctorum, l. c.), and deposited it in the church of St. Lazarus. The day of her festival, in both the Eastern and Western Church, is July 22.
3. Mary, the Sister of Lazarus. For much of the information connected with this name, comp.
Lazarus and Mary Magdalene. The facts strictly pernonal to her are few. Her sister Martha appears in Luke, chap. x, 40 as receiving Christ in their house. The contrasted temperaments of the two sisters have already been in part discussed. See Martha. Mary sat listening eagerly for every word that fell from the divine lips, and she chose the good part that had found its unity, the "one thing needful, in rising from the earthly to the heavenly, no longer distracted by the "many things" of earth. The same character shows itself in the history of John xi. Her grief is deeper, but less active. She sits still in the house.
She will not go to meet the friends who come on the formal visit of consolation. But when her sister tells her secretly, "The Master is come and calleth for thee," she rises quickly and goes forth at once (John xi, 20, 28). Those who have watched the depth of her grief have but one explanation for the sudden change: "She goeth to the grave to weep there!" Her first thought, when she sees the Teacher in whose power and love she had trusted, is one of complaint. "She fell down at his feet, saying, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." Up to this point her relation to the divine Friend had been one of reverence, receiving rather than giving, blessed in the consciousness of his favor, office the joy and love which her brother's return to life brought called up in her, poured themselves out in larger measure than had been seen before. The treasured alabaster-box of ointment was poured on her feet, not on her hands, in the final feast of Bethany (John xii, 8).

4. MARY, THE (WIFE) OF CLOPAS (Μαρία ης τού Κλωπᾶ, A. V. "of Cleophas"), described by John as standing by the cross of Jesus in company with his mother and Mary Magdalene (John xix. 25). The same is described by Matthew as consisting of Mary Magdalene, and Mary [the mother of James and Joseph, and the mother of Zebedee's children] (Matt. xxvii. 56); and by Mark, as "Mary Magdalene, and Mary [the mother of] James the Less and of Joseph, and of Mary Cleophas" (Mark xvi. 40). From a comparison of these passages, it appears that "Mary of Cleophas," and "Mary of James the Less and of Joseph," are the same person, and that she was the sister of Mary the Virgin. The arguments, preponderating on the affirmative side, for this Mary being (according to the A. V. translation) the sister of Cleophas or Alpheus, and the mother of James the Less, Jude, Simon, and their sisters, have been given under the heading James.

To solve the difficulties of this verse the following supposition has been suggested: (1) That the two clauses "his mother's sister" and "and Mary of Clopas" are not in apposition, but the former is descriptive of the four persons as present, namely, the mother of Jesus; her sister, to whom he does not assign any name; Mary of Clopas; and Mary Magdalene (Lange). It has been further suggested that this sister's name was Salome, wife of Zebedee, and not avoiding the same difficulty. John could not have expressed himself as he does had he meant more than three persons. It has been suggested (2) that the word αδελφή is here not to be taken in its strict sense, but rather in the laxer acceptance, which it clearly does bear in other places. Mary, wife of Clopas, it has been said, was not the sister, but the cousin of the Virgin Mary (see Wordsworth, Gr. Test., Preface to the Epistle of St. James). There is nothing in this suggestion which is objectionable, or which can be disproved. But it is hardly consistent with the terms of close relationship assigned to the connected members of the holy family. See brethren of our Lord. By many, therefore, it has been contended (3) that the two Dowers were literally sisters-german. "That it is far from impossible for two sisters to have the same name may be seen by any one who will merely look at the tables of Matthew and Mark. To name none others, his eye will at once light on a pair of Antonia and a pair of Octavia, the daughters of the same father, and in one case of different mothers, in the other of the same mother. If it be objected that these are examples of a different race, another is given to the reader in Cleopatra. It is quite possible, too, that the same cause which operates at present in Spain may have been at work formerly in Judea. Miriam, the sister of Moses, may have been the holy woman after whom Jewish mothers called their daughters, just as Spanish mothers not unfrequently give the name of Mary to their children, male and female alike, in honor of the Virgin Mary. (Maria, Maria-Pia, and Maria-Imaculata, are the first names of three of the sisters of the late king of the Two Sicilies.) This is on the hypothesis that the two names are identical, but, on a close examination of the Greek texts, we find that it is possible that this was not the case. Mary the Virgin is Μαρία; her sister is Μαρία. It is more than possible that these names are the Greek representatives of two forms which the antique γυνή had then taken; and as in pronunciation the emphasis had been thrown on the last syllable in Μαρία, while the final letter in Μαρία would have been almost unheard, there would, upon this hypothesis, be a greater difference in the sisters' names than there is between Mary and Maria among ourselves. The ordinary explanation that Μαρία is the Hebraic form, and Μαρία the Greek form, and that the difference is in the use of the evangelists, not in the name itself, seems scarcely adequate: for why should the evangelist invariably employ the Hebraic form of name when writing of Mary the Virgin, and the Greek form when writing about the other Marys in the Gospel history? It is true that this distinction is not constantly observed in the readings of the Codex Vaticanus, the Codex Ephraemi, and a few other MSS.; but there is such a great amount of the codices to determine the usage. That it is possible for a name to develop into several kindred forms, and for these forms to be considered sufficiently distinct appellations for two or more brothers or sisters, is evidenced by daily experience. We find that the high priest Onias III had a brother also named Onias, who eventually succeeded him in his office under the adoptive name of Menelaus. We have the authority of the earliest traditions for the opinion that our Lord's mother had at least one sister called Mary. Indeed, it is an old opinion that Anna, the mother of the Virgin Mary, had three daughters of that name by different husbands; and Dr. Routh, in his Reliquiae Sacrae, gives us from Papia, the scholar of John (cf. Cod. M. B. Bibliothek. 2897), the following enumeration of four Marys of the N. T.: 1. Maria, Mater Domini; 2. Maria, Cleophas sive Alpheus; 3. Maria, Consobrina Mariae, et Theae, et Cujiusdam Joseph; 4. Maria Salome, uxor Zebedei, mater Johannis evangelistae et Jacobi; 4. Maria Magdalene. It is further stated, in this fragment of Papia, that both Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Salome were sisters of our Lord, and consequently sisters of the Virgin Mary." (Kitto). Finally, most interpreters, regarding all the above positions as untenable, or, at least, improbable, suppose (4) that the two Marys were sisters-in-law by virtue of having married brothers, i.e., Joseph and Alpheus or Clopas, and afterward, perhaps by a Levirite marriage, having become the wives of the same husband, namely, Joseph the survivor. See Alphius.

The only knowledge we have of this Mary, besides the above facts of her sons, and of her presence at the crucifixion, is that she was that "other Mary" who, with Mary Magdalene, attended the body of Christ to the sepulchre when taken down from the cross (Matt. xxvii. 61; Mark xv. 47; Luke xxiii. 55). She was also among those who went on the morning of the first day of the week to the sepulchre to anoint the body, and who became the first witnesses of the resurrection (Matt. xxviii. 1; Mark xvi. 1; Luke xxiv. 1). A.D. 29.

5. MARY, THE MOTHER OF JOHN, SURNAMED MARK (Μαρία ης Ιωάννου τού επισκοποῦ Μάρκου, Acta xii. 12). A.D. 44. The woman known by this designation was another Mary, the sister of Clopas. We learn from Col. iv. 10 that she was sister to Barnabas, and it would appear from Acts iv. 37, xii. 12, that, while the brother gave up his land and brought the proceeds of the sale into the common treasury of the Church, the sisters gave up their house to be used by one of its chief places of meeting. The fact that Peter went to that house on his release from prison indicates that there was some special intimacy (Acta xii. 12) between them, and this is confirmed by the language which he uses towards Mark as being his "son" (I Pet. v. 13). She, it may be added, must have been, like Barnabas, of the tribe of Levi, and may have been connected, as he was, with Cyprus (Acts iv. 36). It has been surmised that filial anxiety about her welfare during the persecutions and the famine which harassed the Church at Jerusalem, was the chief cause of Mark's rapid departure from the missionary labors of Paul and Barnabas. The tradition of a later age represented the place of meeting for the disciples, and therefore probably the house of Mary, as having stood on the upper slope of Zion, and affirmed that it had been the scene of the wonder of the day of Pentecost, had escaped the general destruction of the city by Titus, and was still used as a church in the 4th century (Ephiph. De Ponto et Mens, xiv; Cyril Hierosol. Catech. xvi). See Mark.

6. A Christian female at Rome, mentioned by Paul as having formerly treated him with special kindness (Rom. xvi. 6). A.D. 54. As this is the only Hebrew name in the list (Jousta, ed.), and as the reading εἰκὴν in the Margin: it was changed, it is possible that she was not a native of Rome.

MARY OF AGERZA. See AGERZA, MARIA DE.

MARY OF EGYPT, a saint of the Roman Catholic Church, according to her legend, ran away from her parents when twelve years of age; led a very dissolute life for seventeen years at Alexandria, and then joined a party of pilgrims on their way to Jerusalem, with the intention of dying there in the same year. Arriving in that city, she wished to visit the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, but was held back by an unseen power; she then knelt before an image of Mary, and vowed to reform her life. She was now permitted to enter the church, and, after praying to the cross, asked the Virgin to direct her what she should do to be acceptable to God. A supernatural voice told her to go to the other side of Jordan, into the wilderness. Mary obeyed, and lived there forty-seven years, enduring privations of all kinds, until the monk Zosimus discovered her one day, an old, naked, sunburnt woman, covered with white hair. She was very thin, very tall, and very beautiful, and she said that she had received her blessing; related to him her history, and asked him to come to see her again in a year, and to bring her the communion. As he came at the appointed time, she met him and commended him. But when he went again to see her, four years after, she was found only a corpse, and her name written beside her on the sand. After he had long tried in vain to dig a grave to bury her, a lion came and helped him. According to the general opinion, she died during the reign of Theodosius the Younger. Her grave became a great shrine, and a number of churches and chapels were placed under her protection. She is most honored in the Greek Church, and is commemorated on the 2d of April. See C. Baronii Martyrologium Romanum (Moguntiae, 1631, p. 209 sqq); Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, ix, 103. (J. N. P.)

MARY, queen of England, daughter of Henry VIII, by his first wife, Catharine of Aragon, is commonly called Bloody Queen Mary, on account of her cruel persecutions of the Protestants—"a history of horrors exceeded only by the persecutions in the Netherlands by Alva, and of Louis XIV after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes." She was born at Greenwich, on the 19th of December (O. S.), 1536. She was married at Westminster, on the 16th of December, 1540, to Lord Robert Dudley, with whom she was united by a contract, and became her father was then "out of hopes of more children," declared in 1518 princess of Wales, and sent to Ludlow, to hold her court there, divers matches being projected for her, none of which, however, were carried into effect. After the divorce of Catharine, and Henry's marriage of Anne Boleyn, Mary's position waned at court, and finally the title of princess of Wales was transferred to princess Elizabeth, soon after she came into the world. Mary had been brought up from her infancy in a strong attachment to the ancient religion, under the care of her mother, and Margaret, countess of Salisbury, the effect of whose instructions was not impaired by the subsequent lessons of the learned Ludovis Vives, who, though some time resident at the Reformed College, was appointed by Henry to be her Latin tutor. The profligate conduct of her father, and the wrongs inflicted upon her mother, naturally had the effect of making her still more attached to the Roman Catholics. But immediately after the abdication of queen Anne in 1536, a reconciliation took place between Henry and his eldest daughter, who was now prevailed upon to make a formal acknowledgment both of Henry's ecclesiastical supremacy—utterly refusing "the bishop of Rome's pretended authority, power, and jurisdiction within this realm herefore usurped"—and of the nullity of the marriage of her father and mother, which she declared was "by God's law and man's incestuous and unlawful." (See the "Confession of me, the Lady Mary," as printed by Burnet [Hist. Ref.] from the original, "all written with her own hand." This very year, however, shortly after the marriage of Jane Seymour, a new act of succession was passed, by which she was again, as well as her sister Elizabeth, declared illegitimate, and forever excluded from claiming the inheritance of the crown as a Protestant heir by line of descent. But as, by the powers reserved to Henry VIII of nominating his own successor after failure of the issue of queen Jane, or of any other queen whom he might afterwards marry, a possible chance was left to Mary, she continued to yield an outward conformity to all her father's capricious measures, and the matter was settled when she so far succeeded in regaining his favor that in the new act of succession, passed in 1544, the inheritance to the crown was expressly secured to her next her brother Edward and his heirs, and any issue the king might have by his the wife Catharine Parr. Upon the death of Henry VIII and the accession to the throne of England (1544), Mary's hopes of reigning one day over England were darkened by the persistent efforts of her half-brother to establish the religion of the Reformers. Mary's compliance with the innovations in religion was on the whole, as we have seen, more the result of necessity than of real belief. She had been dictated merely by fear or self-interest; no longer restrained, she manifested her fidelity to and affection for the court of Rome when, after Edward's accession, his ministers proceeded to place the whole doctrine, as well as discipline, of the national Church upon a new foundation. She openly refused to go along with them, nor could all their persuasions and threats, aided by those of her brother himself, move her from her ground. (Full details of the various attempts that were made to prevail upon her may be found in Burnet: History, p. 417-420, and in King Edward's Journal. Mention is made in the latter, under date of April, 1549, of a demand for the hand of the lady Mary by the duke of Brunswick, who was informed by the council that "there was talk for her marriage with the infant of Portugal, which being determined, he should have answer." About the same time it is noted that "whereas the emperor's ambassador desired leave, by letters patent, that my lady Mary might have mass, it was denied him." On the 18th of March of the following year the king writes: 'The lady Mary, my sister, came to me at St. George's Chapel, Westminster, and had, with my council, into a chamber; where was declared how long I had suffered her mass, in hope of her reconciliation, and how now being no hope, which I perceived by her letters, except I saw some short amendment, I could not bear it. She answered that her soul was God's, and her faith she would not change, nor dissemble her opinion with contrary doings. It was said, I constrained not her faith, but wished her not as a king to rule, but as a subject to obey; and that her example might breed too much inconvenience." Had it not been for the interference of Charles V, Mary would have suffered severe punishment for her persistence in remaining faithful to the pope. The emperor, who had once even asked her hand, and only withdrew his request when Catharine was divorced, made it "the condition of his friendly relations to the English government that Mary be left in the free enjoyment of her religious faith, and the king of England, rather than be subject to war, yielded—but with tears" (Lingard, Hist. of Eng., vii, 96 sq.). Yet if Mary secured liberty of conscience, she secured it at the risk of a crown, for Mary's firm adherence to the Roman faith, and her refusal to make an act of submission to the interference of his minister Northumberland, who attempted at the close of his life to exclude her from the succession, and to make over the crown by will to lady Jane Grey, an act which was certainly without any shadow of legal force, and failed to be of any effect. Although lady Jane was actually proclaimed queen upon the death of Edward, Mary herself claimed the crown, and with scarcely any resistance secured the throne.

Mary's reign opens a new and bloody chapter in the history of England—a period in the ecclesiastical annals when the flame of Romanism, which had been slowly dying, was fanned into new life, and, glaring up wildly, was quickly dimmed and then put out to burn anew. Mary, as we have seen, was ever a faithful adherent to the cause of Rome; she had quietly submitted to the innovations under Henry VIII to secure her father's favors, but as she grew older she grew more decided. Indeed, her own legitimacy to the throne was involved in her father's, and the effects of the pope. One of the pontiffs had confirmed her mother's marriage, and another had refused to annull it. Impressed by this truth, she had clung closely to the Church of her infancy, even when she seemed in danger of losing the privilege of succession, and she faltered not when lady Jane Grey became the avowed heiress of her half-brother.

Quite in contrast with this bearing is her conduct after the decease of Edward. Satisfied that the way to the throne could be opened only by Protestant aid, she hesitated not to pledge to the men of Suffolk, whose help she expected, a promise that she would be "more liberal in private exercise of religion, and that she would not force that of others." (Butler, ii, 437; Neale, i, 58.) She even repeated a like declaration to the council, and renewed it as late as a month after her accession to the throne. Yet at this time she was preparing the way for a speedy return of England's clergy to the communion of Rome. Even before she had made these promises she had already sent a message to the Pope announcing her accession, and giving in her allegiance to him as a dutiful daughter of the Church (Butler, ii, 437).

Mary made her accession to the throne on July 19. In the course of the month of August, Boumer (q. v.), Gardiner (q. v.), and three other bishops, who had been deposed for nonconformity in the late reign, were restored to their sees, and the mass, contrary to law, began again to be celebrated in many churches. In the following month archbishop Cranmer (q. v.) and bishop Latimer (q. v.), having opposed these papish innovations, were committed to the Tower. Soon after Ridley (q. v.) was committed, and upon the meeting of Parliament, Oct. 5, only three months after the king's death, but two of the Reformed bishops—Taylor of Lincoln and Harley of Hereford—remained in their sees, while Peter Martyr (q. v.), John A Lasko [see Lasko] , and other foreign preachers, were advised to quit the country. After the assembling of Parliament further steps were taken. An act was forced through repealing all the acts of Henry VIII concerning his divorce from Catherine, and to procure the archbishopric he now played a like unmerciful game against all who stood in his way. The crime he had perpetrated he assured Mary had been committed by Cranmer, and persuaded all that he had ever remained a most faithful servant of the pope. See GARDINER. Some writers will even have it that Mary was at this time inclined to be just to all her subjects, and that she was only led astray by this dastardly but wily ecclesiastical. But, be this as it may, certainly it is that Mary acted in the interests of Romanism only, quite unmeritoriof the obligations she had assumed before the Protestants. In the Convocation, the Book of Common Prayer and Poyntot's Catechism were pronounced "abominable and pestiferous books." In the lower house, division was disputed boldly against transubstantiation for three days; but when, overpowered by numbers, they left the house, four articles were framed which became the test of herey to all who suffered in this reign. They affirmed (1) communion in one kind; (2) a transubstantiation of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ; (3) that worship should be rendered to the host; (4) that Christ is offered up as a sacrifice in the mass (comp. Butler, ii, 440). Rome also promptly responded, and appointed a legate for England—"carnal Pole"—but, as Gardiner himself was desirous to secure the position (Short, iv, 77), he urged the queen to request the legate to return at home, at least until the match proposed between herself and Philip of Spain, the pious Catholic, be further matured. There was great opposition on the part of the people to this proposal with Spain, and it was not best to trifle with popular opinion. Indeed, as it was, these measures, and other indications given by the court of a determination to be completely reconciled with Rome, were followed by insurrection (commonly known as that of Sir Thomas Wyatt, its principal leader), which broke out in the end of January, 1554. It is true this rebellion was in a few days effectually put down, its suppression being signalized by the executions of the unfortunate lady Jane Grey and her husband, the lord Guildford Dudley, of her father, the duke of Suffolk, and, lastly, of the queen's own brother. This provocd in indignation, instead of urging Mary to her senses, led her further and further away from the people over whom she had forced herself as ruler. She was well aware that the people were daily growing in dissatisfaction because of her decision to lead them back to Rome, and yet, in the height of this open opposition (union with the greatest Roman Catholic power, the government of Charles V, by her marriage to Philip II (q. v.), July 25. Though the latter pledged himself to the performance of many concessions to the English, the Spanish match remained exceedingly unpopular.

Mary's success In quelling the rebellion which she had provoked gave her, however, most complete ascendency over the reactionists, and she promptly used her courage and capacity to intrench herself by the aid of Rome. Parliament, which was assembled in November, was completely under her sway, and, inspired by her, obediently passed acts repealing the attainer of cardinal Pole, who had long waited to make his appearance in England as the papal legate, restoring the authority of the pope, repealing all laws made against the see of Rome since Henry VIII, reviving the ancient statutes against heresy, and, in short, re-establishing the whole national system of religious policy as it had existed previous to the first innovations made by her father. By one of the acts of this session of Parliament, also, Philip was authorized to take the title of King of England during his lifetime. These measures had been accompanied by several ceremonies of a rule of bloodshed and tyranny that closed only with the decease of the principal author and executor—"Bloody Queen Mary." herself.

Not content, however, with having restored the power of the Church of England over the Anglican Church, Mary introduced new and severe measures for the suppression of those who had dared to follow her father and half-brother in measures of ecclesiastical reform. Many of the clergy had married. One of her first acts now was the ejection of these clergy. The number of such, according to Burnet, was 12,000 out of 16,000; but this seems exaggerated, and we prefer to follow Butler, who estimates them at a little over 3,000, certainly a large enough number of men so suddenly deprived of their living, and, with thousands dependent upon them, at a moment's warning shut out from the world, to say the least, the measure was most tyrannical; not even the option of dissolving the marriage-bond was given, though they had been married under the sanction of the law of the land. Many of the bishops—sixteen of them—shared a like fate with their subordinate. The question, how boldly this power was asserted, "How shall the heretic be treated?" "Cardinal Pole, from his gentler temper and larger wisdom, advised mild measures in order to win them back; but, in case they could not be won, he would, equally with Gardiner and Bonner, have had them burned. Gardiner was now for measures of repression and vigor. He contended that relaxation in the time of Henry VIII had been the cause, and that the hub of the hoop was the pope. At the point of the see of Canterbury (which Pole had secured, of course), and enraged because his books against the papal supremacy were reprinted and dispersed through the country. The queen was always on the side of the severest measures, and the remainder of the history of the reign of Mary is occupied chiefly with the sanguinary persecutions of the adherents to the Reformed doctrines. Most Protestant writers reckon that about 290 victims perished at the stake from Feb. 4, 1555, on which day John Rogers was burned at Smithfield, to Nov. 10, 1558, when the last "auto-da-fe" of the reign took place by the execution in the same manner of three men and two women at Colchester. Dr. Lingard, the Roman Catholic, admits that after expunging from the Protestant lists "the names of all who were condemned as felons or traitors, or who died peaceably in their beds, or who survived the publication of their martyrdom, or who would for their heterodoxy have been sent to the stake by the Reformed prelates themselves, had they been in possession of the power," and making every other possible allowance, it will still be found "that in the space of four years almost 200 persons perished in the flames of the "papal passion." The fullest. The most minute and in its details, may be found in part in Burnet, and in full in Fox's Martyrology. Among the most distinguished sufferers were Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, Ferrar of St. David's, Latimer of Worcester, Ridley of London, and Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury. Nor were the sufferings confined to the stake. Intolerance also carried grief, horror, and ferocity into all England by the persecution of those who were guilty of heresy, but were not considered fit subjects for the stake. It is said that in the last three years of Mary's reign no less than 280 persons were exiled and spoliéed of their goods (Butler, ii, 445), among whom were not less than 800 theologians (comp. Fisher, p. 328).

The question has been raised, Who were most responsible for these persecutions? Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord chancellor, was Mary's chief minister till his death in November, 1555, after which the direction of affairs fell mostly into the hands of cardinal Pole, who, after Cranmer's deposition, was made archbishop of Canterbury; but the notorious Bonner, Ridley's successor in the see of London, has the credit of having been the principal and the inventor of these atrocities, which, it may be remarked, so far from contributing to put down the Reformed doctrines, appear to have had a greater effect in disgusting the nation with the restored Church than all other causes together. Says Soames (iv, 446): "The proceedings had the whole kingdom with amazement, indignation, and disgust. Unfeeling Romish bigots were disappointed because this atrocious embellishment of their party's intolerance had wholly failed to overawe the spirit of their adversaries. Timid Protestants were encouraged by the noble constancy displayed among their friends. Moderate Romanists were ashamed of their spiritual guides. The mass of men, who live in stupid forgetfulness of God, were aroused from that lethargy of sensuality, covetousness, or vanity in which they dispathe existence, to reflect upon the principles which could support the human mind, tranquill, or even exulting, amid such frightful agonies."

At the same time that the attempt was thus made to extinguish the new opinions in religion by persecution at the stake, exile, and other severe measures, the queen gave a further proof of the ardor of her faith by restoring to the Church the tenents and first-fruits, with all the rectories, glebe-lands, and tithes that had been annexed to the crown in the times of her father and brother. She also re-established several of the old monasteries which her father had dissolved, and endowed them as liberally as her means enabled her. Gladly would she have restored them all to the Church, "but it was feared that violent commotions would ensue if that course were adopted;" and the papal legate, while he "approv'd the king's policy," did "disapprove the manner of the execution," and "the whole plan of the monasteries and Church lands should not be disturbed," "admonished those who held those lands of the guilt of sacrilege, and reminded them of the doom of Delelahazar" (c). See Moxartic. Froude, whom the Romanists are so eager to prove guilty of unfaithfulness as a historian, has been one of the most lenient commentators on the conduct of Mary of England towards her people. He holds that, "To the time of her accession she had lived a blameless and, in many respects, a noble life; and few men or women have lived less capable of doing knowingly a wrong thing." He adds that her trials and disappointments, "it can hardly be doubted, affected her sanity," and ascribes the guilt chiefly to Gardiner, and measurably to Pole. Unless it be on the point of insanity, we are inclined to hold Mary responsible for the persecutions of her reign, believing, with Ranke, that "whatever is done in the name of a prince, with his will and by his authority, decides his reputation in history." In her domestic life Mary was wrecked. Philip, whom she loved with a morbid passion, proved a sour, selfish, and heartless husband; at once a bigot and a voluptuary. No man ever showed less interest and exasperation and loneliness, working upon a temperament naturally obstinate and sullen, without doubt rendered her more complaisant to the sanguinary policy of the re-actionary bishops. Fortunately for England, her reign was brief. She died—after suffering much and long from dropsey and nervous debility—Nov. 17, 1558. Her successor on the throne was her sister Elizabeth, who not only undid all the work she had accomplished, but finally and successfully established Protestantism as the faith of the nation. See Elizabeth.

Quaerulum was interpreted by some. Though of but minor interest at present, deserve mention here because of the peculiar bearing they have on her early history. She is said to have been a superior Latin scholar, and was commended by Erasmus. "Scriptum bene Latinas epistolas," says he. Towards the end of her father's reign, at the earnest solicitation of queen Catharine Parr, she undertook to translate Erasmus's Paraphrase on the Gospel of St. John, but being cast into sickness, as Udall relates, partly by overmuch study in this work, after she had made some progress therein, she left the rest to be finished. Another volume of this paraphrase is printed in the first volume of Erasmus's Paraphrase upon the New Testament (London, 1548, folio). The "Preface" was written by Udall, the famous master of Eton School, and addressed to the queen dowager. Af- ter her death it was procured to be burnt by the whole company, calling in and suppressing this very book, and all others that had any tendency towards furthering the Reforma- tion. An ingenius writer is of opinion that the sickness which came upon her while she was translating St. John was all affected; "for," says he, "she would not so easily have been cast into sickness had she been employed on the legends of St. Teresa or St. Catharine of Sienna." Strype (iii, 468) has preserved three prayers or meditations of hers: the first, A Against the Avarice of Vice; the second, A Meditation touching A Dearth; the third, A Prayer to be read at the Hour of Death. In Fox's Acts and Monuments are printed eight of her letters to king Edward and the lords of the council on her nonconformity, and on the imprisonment of her chaplain, Dr. Mallet. In the Syloge epistolarum there are several more of her letters, extremely curious: one on her divorce, another in never having written but to the king, one of affection for her sister, one after the death of Anne Boleyn, and one, very remarkable, of Cromwell to her. In Hayme's State Pape is two in Spanish, to the emperor Charles V. There is also a French letter, printed by Strype (iii, 818) from the Cotton Library. in answer to a haughty mandate from Philip, when he had a mind to marry the lady Elizabeth to the duke of Sforza, but the queen’s bound and princes’s inclination: it is written in a most object manner and a wretched style. Bishop Tanner ascribes to her A History of her own Life and Death, and An Account of Martyrs in her Reign, but this is manifestly an error. See Homel, Mari.

Mary Stuart, the famous queen of Scotland, whose name, Proude (Hist. of Engl. vii, 369) says, "will never be spoken of in history without sad and profound emotion, however opinions may vary on the special details of her life and actions," was, as an infant-queen, carried out of the castle of Linlithgow, Dec. 8, 1542. She was the third child of James V of Scotland, by his wife Mary of Lorraine, daughter of the duke of Guise, who had previously borne her husband two sons, both of whom died in infancy. A report prevailed that Mary too was not likely to live; but being unwedded, she was the desire of her anxious mother, in presence of the English ambassador, the latter wrote to his court that she was as a child as her mother had seen of her. At the time of her birth her father lay sick in the palace of Falkland, and in the course of a few days after he expired, at the early age of thirty, his death being hastened by distress of mind occasioned by the defeat which his nobles had sustained at Faia and Solway Moss. James was naturally a person of considerable energy and vigor both of mind and body, but previous to his death he fell into a state of listlessness and despondency, and after his decease it was found that he had made no provision for the care of the infant princess or for the administration of the government. After great convulsions among the nobility, it was decreed that the earl of Arran, as being by proximity of blood the next heir to the crown in legitimate descent, and the first peer of Scotland, should be made governor of the kingdom, and guardian of the queen, who remained in the mean time with her mother in the royal palace at Linlithgow. But while the difficulty was settling, the Roman Catholics, fearing for the decline of their power if the choice of the nobility should fall upon some one likely to join hands with Henry VIII, urged cardinal Beaton, the head of their party, to seize the regency. Ambitious for office and power, Beaton but too willingly listened to the advice of his friends, and, producing a testament which he asserted to be that of the late king, promptly claimed the control of the affairs of Scotland. The fraud was not long discovered, but as great suit had been made by king Henry, in behalf of his son Edward, for the hand of the infant queen, and as Arran and his party had been indiscreet enough to accept the offer in spite of the opposition of the pope, Beaton hold his own in the country, and finally even persuaded Arran to his views, and the engagement with England was annulled. The result was a war between Scotland and England, which ended most ignominiously for the Highlanders. It is not at all likely that this war would have broken out between England and Scotland had it not been for the encouragement France gave to the Highlanders. Scotland had thus far remained true to the cause of Rome: a scion of the house of Guise (duke Claude) was on the throne, and the Reformation, though progressing in the adjoining country, had not yet been suffered to make much of an impression on the Scots. But the new doctrine had found an entrance at least. Indeed, the regent Arran was himself favorable to the Reformers, and in Parliament, as early as 1542, an act had been passed declaring it lawful for all to read the Scriptures in their native language. It was clear, therefore, that though Romanism had hitherto sustained its supremacy, its power was tottering. At this critical juncture of affairs France came forward and offered assistance to the Roman party. The cause of the Church must be upheld at all hazards. The result was the establishment of two camps. "The friends of the Reformation," says Russell (Hist. of the Ch. of Scotland [Lond. 1834, 2 vol. 18mo], i, 181), "supported those counsellors which had for their object the union of the British crowns; while the Romanists very naturally clung to that alliance which, aided by the personal influence of the queen-mother, promised to strengthen the foundations of their establishment, already somewhat shaken by the popular tempest." Had Arran been a person of indomitable will and stability of purpose the cause of the Reformers might now have been firmly established, but he was "a weak and fickle man, liable at all times to be wrought upon and biased by those of greater decision and energy of character," and his opponent, the wily cardinal, had obtained the ascendancy, and not only neutralized Arran's opposition but actually brought him to approve and further the great master-scheme of the cardinal to give the young queen in marriage to the dauphin of France. In conscience with a treaty for this purpose, Mary was sent to France in 1548, to be educated in that country.

Mary Queen of Scots.

[The numerous portraits ascribed to this princess are so various and dissimilar in the circumstances of her life, and have excited almost as much doubt and controversy as the disputed points of her history, agreeing only in representing her as eminently beautiful. The picture which has furnished the plate before us has been preserved with the greatest care from time immemorial in the possession of Dalrymple, the principal seat in Scotland of the earl of Morton; on the upper part of it is inscribed, 'Mary Queen of Scots: said to have been painted during her confinement in Lochleven Castle by J. Morison. This picture is preserved in the Earl's possession, according to tradition in his lordship's family. It was once the property of George Douglas, the son of the Earl of Morton, and it is said to have been brought from him to his relative relations, James, fourth earl of Morton, with whose possession it remains to the present day.]
MARY STUART

Soon after her arrival at her destination Mary was placed with the French king's own daughters in one of the first convents of the kingdom, where she made rapid progress in the acquisition of the literature and accomplishment of the age. She received instructions in the art of making verses by the famous Ronsard, and in Latin with her by the great scholar Buchanan. When only fourteen years old she had attained to such a mastery of the language that she pronounced before Henry II a Latin oration, in which she maintained that it is becoming for women to study literature and master the liberal arts. Introduced to the court with Henry II, which, as a pietist, she felt should be the order of the times, she became a part of the court, but was soon testifying her superiority in many respects. She was one of the most learned and accomplished in Europe;

Mary, while yet a child, became the envy of her sex, surpassing the most accomplished in the elegance and fluency of her language, the grace and liveliness of her movements, and the charm of her whole manner and behavior. "Graceful alike in person and intellect," says Froude, "she possessed that peculiar beauty in which the form is lost in the expression, and which every painter, therefore, has represented differently. Rarely, perhaps, has any woman combined so many noticeable qualities as Mary—a feminine instinct into men and things and human life, she had cultivated herself to such that high perfection in which accomplishments were no longer adventitious ornaments, but were wrought into her organic constitution... She had vigor, energy, tenacity, and a perfect self-possession, and, as the one indispensable foundation for the effective use of all other qualities, she had indomitable courage" (Hist. of England, vol. vii, ch. iv).

The dauphin, to whom she was betrothed, was about two years her junior, but, as they had been playmates in early childhood, a mutual affection had sprung up between them, and when, on April 24, 1556, she was to be joined to him in wedlock, she hesitated not to submit to the most absurd stipulations. Not only was she obliged to agree that her intended husband should have the title of king of the Scots, but she was even betrayed into the signature of a secret deed, by which, if she died childless, both her Scottish realm and her right of succession to the English crown, as the granddaughter of Henry VII, were conveyed to France. The foolishness of this secret compact Mary had afterwards sufficient cause to regret more than once.

Scarce were the nuptial solemnities fairly over, when queen Mary of England died (1558). In accordance with the agreement entered into, France promptly put forward her claim to the vacant throne, and, though Elizabeth's successor Mary was not insistent upon, and continued to be urged with great persistency by her ambitious uncle the princes of Lorraine. "On every occasion on which the dauphin and dauphiness appeared in public, they were ostentatiously greeted as the king and queen of England; the English arms were engraved upon their plate, embroidered on their banners, and painted on their furniture; and Mary's own favorite device at the time was the two crowns of France and Scotland, with the motto "Aliique morum," meaning that of England." July 10, 1559, Henry died, and dauphin ascended the throne of France as Charles IX. "Surely," thought Mary, "I am soon to realize my highest expectations. Over three kingdoms I shall sway the sceptre. The holy father himself will come from Rome and pronounce his blessing upon me as his most faithful daughter. The lately-deceased queen of England received her name in honor of the blessed Virgin, I shall be pronounced more worthy of it still." Alas for human frailty! Man proposteth, but God disposeth. Mary had reached the summit of her splendor at a moment when she believed herself only ascending the heights. Fickle and selfish, Francis II was scarcely seated on the throne when he was seized by disease, and, fast wasting away, died Dec. 5, 1560. Only a year and a half had the young pair enjoyed their royal honors. Childless, Mary was obliged to yield her place on the throne, and the reins of power were seized by the queen-mother, Catharine of Medici, as regent for her son, Charles IX. Mary must have been prepared, under almost any circumstances, to quit a court which was now swayed by one whom, during her brief reign, she had taunted with being "a merchant's daughter," full of such "malignant" measures. She was of the French scholarly class, brought up in England, and educated at Tours. From France. Her presence was urgently needed in Scotland, which the death of her mother, a few months before, had left without a government, at a moment when it was convulsed by the throes of the Reformation. Her kinsmen of Lorraine had ambitious projects for her, and many a Frenchman observed, with a mixture of envy and jealousy, the fearlessness with which she accepted the offer of the French crown; and both these, it was thought, might be more successfully followed out when she was seated on her native throne. The queen of England, however, interposed; and, as Mary would not abandon all claim to the English throne, she was

Mary, notwithstanding, resolved to go, and at length, after repeated delays, still lingering on the soil where fortune had augured so much, she reached Calais, attended thus far by the cardinals of Guise and Lorraine, while three other uncles, the Dauphin, and the Count of Artois, came to see her safely to Edinburgh. August 14 she finally set sail, and, with 'Arielle, belle France,' sentimental verses, and a passionate chit-chat sighing at her feet in melodious music, she sailed away over the summer seas, and, safely reaching England, Elizabeth had despatched to intercept her, reached Leith on the 19th. Her arrival on her native shores is thus beautifully described in Harper's Magazine, Feb. 1878, p. 348: "August 19, 1561. The thickest mist and most dreching rain men remembered ever to have seen. A fog so thick that the very cannon in the harbor boomed with a muffled sound, and the peal of bells from the Edinburgh churches sounds ominously, as if it rang out the funeral knell of the young queen. Such is the day that greets French Mary when she lands on Scottish shores. Better far for her had this fog hid her squadron from the watchful eyes of her royal cousin... Better that she had fallen then into the hands of queen Elizabeth than to have become her wretched prisoner seven years later, shorn of that good name which is woman's chief protection—always and everywhere her best safe-conduct.

A great change had taken place in Scotland since Mary had left her country nearly thirteen years ago. The Roman Catholic religion was then supreme; and, under the direction of cardinal Beaton, the Romish clergy displayed a fierce tenacity of intolerance which seemed to aim at the utter extermination of every seed of dissent and reform. The same power, which gave strength to the ecclesiastics gave strength also, though more slowly, to the great body of the people; and at length, after the repeated losses of Fledden and Faiz, and Solway Moss and Pinkie—which, by the fall of nearly the whole lay nobility and leading men of the kingdom, brought all classes within the influence of public events—the energies, physical and mental, of the entire nation were drawn out, and under the guidance of the reformer Knox expended themselves with such effect that the form of the fabric of the ancient religion. The queen-regent died June 10, 1560. In August following the estates convened, adopted and approved the Calvinistic Confession of Faith, and, abolishing the Roman Catholic religion, for the same time the administers of the mass or attendance upon it—the charge which was the be- ing death. "On the morning of Aug. 25, 1560," says Burton (iv, 89), "the Romish hierarchy was supreme; in the evening of the same day Calvinistic Protestantism was established in its stead." Hardly a year had passed since these changes had been effected. A strange atmosphere this for Mary, who had been brought up in France to abhor Protestant opinions. But, fortunately for Mary, she had enjoyed a training which fitted her well for the part she was now to play. Had she not spent the most susceptible years of her life in the court of France under those worthy custodians of the conscience—Vasquez, Escobar, Mendoxa? These Jesuit fathers had not hesitated to defend by their casuistry, and under color of religion, fraud, forgery, falsehood, and murder. Their teachings, before counteracted by the efforts of the holy Mother Church, had made such inroads upon the holy Gospel as Luther, had brought forth their fruit in the assassination of William of Orange and of Coligni, and in the wholesale massacre of St. Bartholomew. Surely it could not be expected that Mary would prove herself unworthy of her birth and her costly education. Indeed, as early as 1552, she was publicly announced and baptized as the true heir of the dynasty of Mary, and so she remained in the eyes of the French and of most of Europe. To her they were not mere religious exiles, but a living, a direct line of succession to the ancient crown of Scotland. Thus her claim to the throne of France had a solid foundation in the Roman Catholic Church. But the Catholic Church was not the only power that could claim the throne of Scotland. The Protestant party was also strong, and the struggle between the two factions was a bitter one. The queen had to decide for herself which side she would support. Her choice would greatly influence the course of events in Scotland.

The same privilege which she accorded to her subjects—
"that of worshipping God according to her own creed."—
"So the nation rested in tolerable peace, trusting in Murray rather than in Mary, and suffering her mass, though always under protest, so long as she suffered herself to be guided by her counsellors. But of this kind of compromise the holy Mother Church is above all men, and such heretics as Luther, had brought forth their fruit in the assassination of William of Orange and of Coligni, and in the wholesale massacre of St. Bartholomew. Surely it could not be expected that Mary would prove herself unworthy of her birth and her costly education. Indeed, as early as 1552, she was publicly announced and baptized as the true heir of the dynasty of Mary, and so she remained in the eyes of the French and of most of Europe. To her they were not mere religious exiles, but a living, a direct line of succession to the ancient crown of Scotland. The Protestant party was also strong, and the struggle between the two factions was a bitter one. The queen had to decide for herself which side she would support. Her choice would greatly influence the course of events in Scotland.

The queen's decision was made all the more difficult by the fact that she was a woman. Women were not considered to be fit to rule, and many doubted her ability to govern. However, Mary proved herself to be a capable and determined ruler.

The queen's government was marked by both successes and failures. On the one hand, she was able to strengthen the power of the crown and to assert her authority over the nobility. She also took steps to improve the economy and to promote education. On the other hand, she was unable to prevent the spread of Protestantism, which eventually led to her fall from power. Her reign was marred by conflicts with the English, who saw her as a threat to their own interests.

The queen's eventual execution was a tragic end to her long and eventful life. She was tried for heresy and treason, and was found guilty of both charges. She was executed by being beheaded on the palace green on February 8, 1587. Her head was placed on a pike and displayed on the gates of the city, a symbol of the queen's defiance.

Mary Stuart's reign was a time of great change and turbulence in Scotland. She was a complex and contradictory figure, and her legacy is still debated today. However, her influence on the country and on the history of Europe cannot be denied.

and the envoy is yet on his way to the court of Rome, fits up a private room in the palace, where the marriage-ceremony, which the Church pronounces void, is clandestinely performed. For the papal benediction is needed, it appears, not to hallow the marriage-tie, but only to give it respectability before the public. Elizabeth might as well spare the priest, since Rizzio has not exceeded his instructions. There are no delays at the court of Rome. Fast as wind and wave can carry him he comes back the messenger with the promised dispensation. The marriage, already performed in secret, is repeated in public. It takes place on June 29, 1565. Queen Mary, as though some secret consciousness hung over her of the sorrows on which she is entering, wears at the marriage-altar her mourning dress of black velvet. It is a gloomy ceremony. When the herald proclaims in the streets of Edinburgh that Henry, earl of Ross and Albany, is heretofore king of Scotland, the crowd receive the proclamation in sullen silence. Even the money distributed in profusion among them awakens no enthusiasm. Only one voice cries, 'God save his Grace.' It is the voice of Darnley's father. My heart is long since prophesied. She hesitates, delays, falter. Mary knows no delay. She takes the field in person. Lord Darnley rides at her side. He is clad in gilt armor, she in steel bonnet and corset, with pistols at her saddle-bow and pistols in her hand. In August the marriage was announced; in October Murray and his few retainers are flying across the border into England (Barton, ix, 286). Mephystophiles no longer conceals his purpose. Mass is no longer confined to the queen's private chapel. The retainers of Darnley's father go openly to the Catholic service. The General Assembly have passed a resolution that the sovereign is not exempt from the law of the land, and that the Reformed service take the place of the mass in the royal chapel. This is Rizzio's answer to their demand. Negotiations are opened with pope Pius V and Philip. Promises sold are twelve thousand men; the other sends money, twenty thousand crowns. The Catholic powers of Europe have at length settled their political controversies, and joined in a secret league for the extirpation of heresy by fire and sword; a league of which that Alva was the founder whose aim was to restrain the Papists who were enlisting in the epigrammatic saying, 'One salmon is worth a multitude of frogs,' a league of which the outcome was the Inquisition in Holland, and the massacre of St. Bartholomew in France. That Mary was in hearty sympathy with this league is doubtless; that she was not generally a party to it is both asserted and denied by men behind the scenes who had every opportunity to know. That a vigorous attempt was to be made to re-establish the Catholic faith and worship is certain. Her most Catholic majesty assures her subjects that in any event the religion of the realm shall not be interfered with. At the same time she writes to Pius V to congratulate him on the victories already gained, and to inspire him with hopes of victories yet to come: 'With the help of God and his holiness,' she says, 'she will yet leap over the wall' (Harper's Magazine, 1867, p. 453). 'The fatal resolution,' says Robertson (History of Scotland), 'may be imputed all the subsequent calamities of Mary's life.' Many of the Protestant lords who had hitherto supported the queen now took fright lest they should suffer the same fate as the Reformed religion under Mary of England. The bloody deeds of that real woman were yet fresh in the minds of all. What was there to hinder Mary Stuart from uprooting heresy in her dominions, with her hands stayed by all the other Roman powers of Europe? Moved by such fears, several of the Scotch nobles, whose covetousness had had more to do with their interest in the new religion than their soul's salvation (Fisher, p. 351-353), determined to strike boldly against the throne. Mary, however, was not now the ruler of Scotland. She was only called so. Upon the death of her husband she sat alone on the throne of Scotland. It has failed. He has tried wife against wife, has planned to abduct lord Darnley and send him back to the queen of England. But the rough Scotsman is so match in craft for the cunning Italian. This fruitless conspiracy has only incensed the queen against him. His honest politics are good with whom the queen Mary is in love and whose infatuation has awakened all her womanly indignation. The court is no longer safe. Rumors are rife of plans for his assassination. True or false, they are probable enough to make him avoid Rizzio and Darnley. The court orders him to court, and of him a safe-conduct. But Protestants have learned to look with suspicion on safe-conducts proffered by Roman Catholic princes. Murray is conveniently sick, and cannot come. Sentence of outlawry is pronounced against him. All the hate of a hot woman's heart is aroused; 'hatred the more malignant because it was unnatural.' Revenge is sweeter than ambition. 'I would rather lose my crown than not be revenged upon him,' she is heard to say. He calls to arms. The interest of the Protestant religion is his battle-cry. But there are few responses. He despaches messengers to queen Elizabeth for the help she has long and many promised. She hesitates, delays, falter. Mary knows no delay. She takes the field in person. Lord Darnley rides at her side. He is clad in gilt armor, she in steel bonnet and corset, with pistols at her saddle-bow and pistols in her hand. In August the marriage was announced; in October Murray and his few retainers are flying across the border into England (Barton, ix, 286). Mephystophiles no longer conceals his purpose. Mass is no longer confined to the queen's private chapel. The retainers of Darnley's father go openly to the Catholic service. The General Assembly have passed a resolution that the sovereign is not exempt from the law of the land, and that the Reformed service take the place of the mass in the royal chapel. This is Rizzio's answer to their demand. Negotiations are opened with pope Pius V and Philip. Promises sold are twelve thousand men; the other sends money, twenty thousand crowns. The Catholic powers of Europe have at length settled their political controversies, and joined in a secret league for the extirpation of heresy by fire and sword; a league of which that Alva was the founder whose aim was to restrain the Papists who were enlisting in the epigrammatic saying, 'One salmon is worth a multitude of frogs,' a league of which the outcome was the Inquisition in Holland, and the massacre of St. Bartholomew in France. That Mary was in hearty sympathy with this league is doubtless; that she was not generally a party to it is both asserted and denied by men behind the scenes who had every opportunity to know. That a vigorous attempt was to be made to re-establish the Catholic faith and worship is certain. Her most Catholic maj.
MARY STUART was only momentarily; and before the boy's baptism, in December, her estrangement from the king was greater than ever. Divorce was openly discussed in her presence even darkly whispered among her friends. The king, on his part, spoke of leaving the country; but before his preparations were completed, he fell ill of the small-pox at Glasgow. The king was on Jan. 9, 1567. On the 25th Mary went to see him, and, travelling by easy stages, brought him to Edinburgh on the 31st. He was lodged in a small maison on the Kirk of the Field, nearly on the spot where the south-east corner of the University now stands. There Mary visited him daily, and slept for two nights in a room below his lodgings. She passed the evening of his illness in the bedroom, talking cheerfully with the queen, and often affectionately with him, although she is said to have dropped one remark which gave him uneasy forebodings—that it was much about that time twelvemonth that Rizzio was murdered. She left him between ten and eleven o'clock to take part in a masque at Holyrood, at the marriage of a favorite valet. The festivities had not long ceased in the palace when, about two hours after midnight, the house in which the king slept was blown up by gunpowder, and in the neighboring garden was found the lifeless body of him to whom Mary, on the evening of the 24th, had said: "I shall never rest till I give you as sorrowful heart as I have at this present."

The chief actor in this tragedy was undoubtedly James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, a nosey, reckless, vain-glorious, licentious, and very rich man, who, since his flight to self of the murder, and still more since Rizzio's murder, had enjoyed a large share of the queen's favor. But there were suspicions that the queen herself was not wholly ignorant of the plot, and these suspicions could not but be strengthened by what followed. On the 12th of April, Bothwell was brought to a mock-trial and acquitted; on the 24th, he intercepted the queen on her way from Linlithgow to Edinburgh, and carried her, with scarcely a show of resistance, to Dunbar. On the 7th of May, he was divorced from the young and comely wife whom he had married little more than a twelvemonth before; on the 12th, Mary publicly pardoned his seizure of her person, and created him duke of Orkney; and on the 15th—only three months after her husband's murder—she married the man whom every one regarded as his murderer, married while the stain of her husband's blood was still upon her, and within a few months of carrying with her the 'indulgent temper for which her eulogist (Meline, p. 124) praises her so highly.' Impelled by a just and burning indignation, her subjects rose in rebellion, led by nobles of both the Protestant and Romish factions. Surrounded by Bothwell's men, the queen, on the morning of the night, May following him dressed in male attire. They hastily gathered the Royallists about them, but such a cause enlisted few followers. Yet the few were mustered, and, however sparse in number, Mary hesitated not to brave the storm; she even dared to enter the lists against her opponents, but on the field of Carberry (June 15) the army melted away in sight of the enemy, and no alternative was left to her but to abandon Bothwell, and surrender herself to the confederate lords. She was now escorted by the nobles as a prisoner to Edinburgh, where the insults of the rabble and grief at parting with Bothwell threw her into such a frenzy that she refused all nourishment, and, rushing to the window of the room in which she was kept prisoner, called for help, and showed herself to the people half naked, with her hair hanging about her ears. From Edinburgh she was removed to Linlithgow, where, on the 25th of July, she was prevailed upon to sign an act of abdication in favor of her son, who, five days afterwards, was crowned at Stirling [see JAMES I.]: while to her brother Murray was intrusted the government during the minority of her son. Her abdication was formally handed to Duke of Norfolk, who, in his absence, was governor of Scotland. The doors proved no confinement to Mary. She soon found ways to communicate with the world, and made even the very prison-keeper her friend and confidant. May 2, 1568, she finally succeeded in making her escape from the island-prison, and once more she made a call to arms, this time against her own government. An army was raised, and, in a few days she found herself at the head of 6000 men. Elizabeth of England, whose great political maxim was "that the head should not be subject to the foot," would gladly have extended aid to Mary had she not feared the power of the persecuting and firm leader of the Protestants who had imprisoned Mary—her own half-brother, Murray. On the 12th of May it finally came to a battle between the Royalists and the insurgents at Langside, near Glasgow. Mary was completely routed, and obliged to flee the kingdom. She entered England, married a third and impotent husband, named Lord Howard of Effingham. He was a brave and brave man, but of very doubtful politics, and quite unlike the queen. The queen of England, however, had always had cause to fear the presence of her rival on English ground. Mary had never yet renounced her claim to the crown which Elizabeth wore. Moreover, "Mary Stuart was the centre of the hopes of the enemies of Protestant England and of Elizabeth." Their plots looked to the elevation of Mary to the throne which Elizabeth filled (Fisher, p. 382). Political ambition and religious fanaticism controlled both parties, and should the stronger yield to the weaker? Mary had enemies by every possible time-honored and age-old method of defamation. But that cousin feared for her own life and the security of her throne, and therefore persistently denied the ardent and persevering solicitations of Mary for an interview, on the agreeable pretence that she should first clear herself of the murder of Rizzio. She also was a prisoner, and, after an immense amount of deceptive diplomacy, a commission was appointed, nominally to investigate the charges of Mary against her rebellious lords, really to investigate the charges of the lords against their queen. Before the commission Murray represented the Scottish government. At first he laid the guilt of the murder on Bothwell alone, and defended the insurrection only as one against the infamous, ambitious, and tyrannical Earl. But as the trial proceeded he changed his ground. He hesitated, procrastinated, faltered. At length he openly charged his sister with the murder of her husband; and he produced, in confirmation of this charge, the singularly famous "casket letters." Of their discovery he told this story: The earl of Bothwell—so said lord Murray, and so said the lords who represented—fleeing from Edinburgh, sent up a challenge back of a casket containing a silver casket to a certain drawer. James Balfour—that Balfour who drew the deed for Darnley's murder—had received the captaincy of the castle as the price of his crime. He delivered the casket; he at the same time said that the lords were not the authors of it, and the messenger was intercepted and the casket seized. This casket, with its contents, was the witness Murray produced before the English commission against the Scottish queen. Its contents were eight letters and twelve sonnets, written in French, apparently in Mary's handwriting. Among the commission's examining commissioners, more than one of Mary's friends, one of them that duke of Norfolk who subsequently attested the strength of his attachment by the sacrifice of his life: if these letters were forgeries, they were not so declared by them. Of these letters one gave a full account of Mary's interview with Darnley at Glasgow; of his unconscious confidence; of her own mournful sense of shame and guilt. Another advised the earl when and where to abduct her, and cautioned him to come with force sufficient to overcome all resistance. All breathed the language of passionate devotion, with an air, all too often, of flat and false jealousy. They were true to nature, but to a lost, though not a shameless one. Their language was that of a once noble but now ruined woman unveiling her heart's secrets in unsuspecting confidence. If forged, the forger was a man of consummate art; and if genuine, the confession was equally remarkable as contributions to the language of passion. Mary denounced them as forgeries. She demanded to see the originals. Elizabeth granted the reasonableness of the demand, but never complied with it. She demanded to face her accusers. Elizabeth half promised that she should do so, but never fulfilled the pledge. The commission broke up without a verdict. Elizabeth had no interest to press for either acquittal or conviction. Murray was glad to return to his regiment and had any reason to deplore the completion of the investigation, but Mary was a prisoner, and her access to the public not the most easy. Though inconclusive, the trial had revealed enough to strengthen the worst suspicions of the Scottish people, and no one might doubt that Mary would in time be found guilty with Elizabeth, if it was necessary to retain her as a prisoner. For nineteen years Mary Stuart thus passed life. "For nineteen years both captive and captor are made miserable by plots and counterplots; and whether Mary in prison or Mary at large is the more dangerous to the security of Protestant England is a question so hard to decide that Elizabeth never fairly attempts to determine it. At length a plot is uncovered more deadly than any that has preceded. Half a score of assassins band themselves together to attempt Elizabeth's life, and to put Catholic Mary on the vacant throne of the pope is pronounced upon the enterprise. The Catholic powers of Europe stand ready to welcome its consummation. Mary gives it her cordial approbation. 'The hour of deliverance,' she writes exultingly, 'is at hand.' But plots breed counterplots. In all the diplomatic service of Europe there is no event so well remembered as the Walsingham case; the chief of Elizabeth's prime minister. Every letter of Mary's is opened and copied by his agents before sent to its destination. The conspiracy is allowed to ripen. Then, when all is ready for consummation, the leaders are arrested, the plot is brought to a daylight of day. Mary, with all her faults, never knew fear; no craven heart was hers. The more dangerous was she because so brave. She battles for her life with a heroism well worthy a nobler nature—battles to the last, though there be no hope. She receives the sentence of death with the calmness of true courage, not of despair. With all her treachery, never recreant to her faith—never but once, when her infatuated love of Bothwell swerved her from it for a few short weeks—she clings to her crucifix till the very hour of death. Almost her last words are words of courage to her friends. 'Weep not,' she says; 'I have promised the queen that she will see me the very last, and I am telling her the Prayer-book.' "In thee, O Lord, have I put my trust." And then she lays her head upon the block as peacefully as ever she laid it upon her pillow. No 'grizzled, wrinkled old woman,' but in the full bloom of ripened womanhood; no more, no more, no more, no more. Mary lay on the scaffold at Fotheringhay [whither she had been removed for trial of conspiracy from Charleyp in September, 1586] the penalty of her treachery at Edinburgh, May 8, 1587. The spirit of the stern old Puritans is satisfied, and the prophecy of the Good Book receives a new and pregnant illustration— "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." Five months after the execution her body was buried with great pomp at Peterborough, whence, in 1612, it was removed to king Henry VII's Chapel at Westminster, where it still lies in a sumptuous tomb erected by king James VI.

"Whoever has attended but little to the phenomena of human nature has discovered how inadequate is the clearest insight which he can hope to attain into character and disposition. Every one is a perplexity to himself and a perplexity to his neighbors; and men who are born in the same generation, who are exposed to the same influences, trained by the same teachers, and live from childhood to age in constant and familiar intercourse, are often little more than shadows to each other, intelligible in superficial form and outline, but diversified into the most immeasurable and inscrutable barрен."

Thus Froude opens the fourth volume of his History of England, when about to pass in review the affairs of Scotland and Ireland in the 16th century. Yet, when this same writer comes to speak of Mary Stuart, he "writes almost as a public prosecutor of the Scottish queen, and sometimes sacrifices historical accuracy to dramatic effect."

"The truth is that the character of Mary was long one of the most fiercely-vaunted questions of history, and is still in debate; hence the difficulties which beset any attempt to tell correctly the story of her career. One of her characteristic defects is an evident instinct to find impartial witnesses; few in her own time who are not ready to tell and to believe about her the most barefaced lies which will promote their own party. During her life she was calumniated and reproached with iniquity; after her death the same curiously-contradictory estimates of her character have been vigorously maintained—by those, too, who have not their judgment impaired by the prejudices which environed her. On the one hand, we are assured that she was "the most amiable of women;" "the upright queen, the noble and true woman, the faithful spouse and affectionate mother;" "the poor martyred queen;" "the helpless victim of fraud and force;" or "illustrious victim of state-craft, whose "kindly spirit in prosperity and matchless heroism in misfortune" "occupied a prominent place in the annals of her sex." On the other, we are equally competent to judge, that she was "a spoilt beauty;" "the heroine of an adulterous melodrama;" "the victim of a blind, imperious passion;" or "an apostle" in "the profound dissimulation of that school of which Catharine de Medici was the chief." Mary was, indeed, "more disguised in the livery of a martyr," having "a proud heart, a crafty wit, and indurate mind against God and his truth;" "a bold, unscrupulous, ambitious woman," with "the panther's nature—graceful, beautiful, malignant, untamable." The great preponderance of authority, however, seems to show that we believe in her criminal love for Bothwell and her guilty knowledge of his conspiracy against her husband's life. The question of her guilt as to the murder of her husband does certainly not rest on the authenticity of the "casket letters," however much these may be matter of historical interest. "Evidence which her own day deemed clear," says the writer in Harper whom we had occasion to quote before, "history deems uncertain. Circumstances which, isolated, only created a widespread suspicion in her own times, put together by history, with but little corroboration, form a strong case against her." A wife learns to loathe her husband; utter's her passionate hate in terms that are unmistakable; is reconciled to him for a purpose; casts him off when that purpose is accomplished; makes no secret of her desire for another; has been, with but little heart, engaged in his assassination; dallies while he languishes upon a sick-bed so long as death is near; hastens to him only when he is convalescent; becomes, in seeming, reconciled to him; by her blandishments allays his terror and arrests his flight, which nothing else could arrest; brings him with her to the house chosen by the assassins for his tomb—a house which has absolutely nothing else to recommend it but its singular adaptation to the deed of cruelty to be wrought there; remains with him till within two hours of his murder; bears with unconcealed the story of his tragic end, which thrills all other hearts with horror; makes no effort to bring the perpetrators of the crime to punishment; rewards the suspected with places and pensions, and the chief criminal with her hand in marriage while the blood is still wet on his. That the world should be asked to believe her the innocent victim of a diabolical conspiracy affords a singular illustration of the effrontery of the Church which claims her for a martyr. That half the world should have acquiesced in the claim affords an illustration no less singular of the credulity of mankind when sentiments and circumstances are removed from the judgment which the reason alone is qualified to render."

The genuineness of the "casket letters" is maintained by the historians Hume, Robertson, Laing, Burton, Macintosh, Mignet, Ranke, and Froide. The most acute writer on the other side of the question is Hosack, and Fidenz Hill's biographer, but he was never a vein as would bid him were he indeed earning a lawyer's fee by a lawyer's service." One of the latest writers on the ecclesiastical history of this period, Prof. Fisher (p. 376), of Yale College, thus comments on the question at issue: "To demand criticism may be his final verdict, that the letters contain many internal marks of genuineness which it would be exceedingly difficult for a counterfeiter to invent, and that the scrutiny to which they were subjected in the Scottish Parliament, the Scottish privy council, and the English parliament, was such that, if they were not genuine, it is hard to account for the failure to detect the imposture. Moreover, the character of Murray, although it may be admitted that he was not the immaculate person that he is sometimes considered to have been, must have been black indeed if these documents, which he brought forward to prove the guilt of his sister, were forged; but Murray is praised not only by his personal adherents and by his party, but by men like Spottiswoode and Melville (Spottiswoode, History of the Church of Scotland, ii, 121)." Yet, however writers may differ about his moral worth, very few, I think, would deny the variety of her accomplishments. She wrote poems on various occasions, in the Latin, Italian, French, and Scotch languages: "Royal advice to her son," in two books, the consolatio of her long imprisonment. A great number of her original letters are preserved in the library of France, in the Royal, Cottanion, and Ashmolean libraries. We have in print eleven to the cast of Bothwell, translated from the French by Edward Simmons, of Christ-church, Oxford, and printed at Westminster in 1726. There are ten more, with her answers to the articles against her, in "Hayman's State-papers:" six more in "Anderson's Collections;" another in the "Appendix" to her life by Dr. Jebb; and some others dispersed among the works of Pius V, Buchanan, Camden, Udall, and Sanderson.

To enumerate all that has been written on Mary would fill a volume. Among the chief works are S. Jebb, De Vita et Rebus Gestis Mariae Scotorum Reginae (London, 1725, 2 vols. fol.); J. Anderson, Collections relating to the History of Mary, Queen of Scotland (London, 1727-29, 4 vols. 4to); Burton, Hist. of Scotland, vol. iv.; Bishop Blew, Life of Queen Mary and State of Scotland (Edinburgh, 1734, fol.; 1844-50, 3 vols. 8vo); W. Goodall, Examinations of the Letters said to be written by Mary, Queen of Scots, to James, Earl of Bothwell (Edinburgh, 1734, 2 vols. 8vo); Robertson, Hist. of Scotland; W. Tyler, Inquiry into the Evidence against Mary, Queen of Scots (London, 1793, 8vo); T. P. Tyler, History of the State of Scotland; Chamier, Life of Mary, Queen of Scots (London, 1818, 2 vols. 4to; 1822, 3 vols. 8vo); Schütz, Leben Maria Stuart's (1839); P. F. Tyler, Hist. of Scotland; Prince Labanoff, Recueil des Lettres de Marie Stuart (London, 1844, 5 vols. 8vo); David Laing, edition of John Knox's Histoire de la Réformation (Edinburgh, 1846-48, 2 vols. 8vo); M. Teulet, Papiers d'Etat relatifs à l'Histoire de l'Écosse (Par. 1851-60, 3 vols. 4to; 1862, 5 vols. 8vo); Miss Agnes Strickland, Lives of the Queens of Scotland (Edinburgh, 1860-69, 8 vols. 8vo); M. Mignet, Histoire de Marie Stuart (Par. 1822, 2 vols. 8vo); A. de Montaiglon, Latin Themes of Mary Stuart (London, 1856, 8vo); Prince Labanoff, Notice sur la Collection des Portraits de Marie Stuart (St. Petersburg, 1856); M. Chenuel, Marie Stuart et Catherine de Medicis (Par. 1856, 8vo); M. London, 1870, 2 vols. 8vo); Meline, Mary, Queen of Scots, and her latest English Historian (N. Y. 1876). The name of Mary Stuart is a subject of a celebrated English historian very bitterly, and shows him to be inaccurate in some minor details; but Meline's own "in- tense partisanship unites him for the office of a critic, and he entirely fails in his narrative." (J. H. W.)

Masaccio, called MASAO DA SAN GIOVANNI, one of the earliest and the most celebrated of the Italian painters of the end of the middle age of modelling. The unquestioned founder of the Florentine school, was born at San Giovannii, in Val d'Armo, in the year 1401. He was a disciple of Masolino da Panicale, to whom he proved as much superior as his master was to all his contemporaries. He had great readiness of invention, with unusual truth and finish of design. During the course of his constant study; and he gave in his works examples of that beauty which arises from a judicious and pleasing choice of attitudes, accompanied with spirit, boldness, and relief. He was the first who studied to give more dignity to his draperies, by designing them with greater breadth and fulness, and omitting the multitude of small folds. He was also the first who endeavored to adapt the color of his draperies to the tints of his caricatures, so that they might harmonize with each other. Masaccio was remarkably well skilled in perspective, which he was taught by Brunelleschi. His works procured him great reputation, but excited the envy of his competitors. He is supposed to have been poisoned, and died about 1443. Fussli says of him: "Masaccio was a genius, and the head of an epoch in the art. He may be considered as the precursor of the great masters who afterwards established his principles, and sometimes transcribed his figures." His most perfect works are the frescoes of St. Pietro del Carmine at Florence, "where vigor of conception, truth and vivacity of expression, correctness of design, and breadth of manner are supported by a most surprising harmony of color;" and the picture of Christ curing the Demamias. The "Arundel Society" has lately published these frescoes in a series of superior chromo-lithographs. See Vasari, Lives of the Painters; Mrs. Jameson, Memoirs of Early Italian Painters.

Masada (Masa'dah), a very strong fortress not far south of Engedi (Josephus, War; Ant. i, 12, 1), on the west of the Dead Sea (Pliny, v, 17), in a volcanic region (Strabo, xvi, p.764), minutely described by Josephus in various places, especially in the account of its final tragedy (War, vii, 8). It was built by Jonathan Macca- beus on an almost inaccessible rock, and was probably one of his "strongholds in Judea" (1 Macc. xii, 35), as well as one of the attested in Simon's time (1 Sam. xxiii, 14, 29; comp 2 Sam. v, 17). It was much enlarged and strengthened by Herod the Great, who placed Mariamme here for safety when he was driven from Jerusalem by Antigonus (Josephus, War, i, 13, 7). It resisted, at that time, the attack by the Parthians (Josephus, War, ii, 20, 2); after a siege lasting five years, by the Romans of Scythia under the command of their general. It was given over by the Romans after a long siege by the Parthians under their king Vologeses (ib. 17, 2). It was the last stronghold of the Jews in the final struggle with the Romans under Flavius Silva, who took it by assault, the garrison, in their desperation, having immo- lated themselves (sup.). The site was conjectured by Dr. Eli Smith to be that of the modern Seleh (Robin- son, Researches, ii, 24) ; which has been abundantly con- firmed by later travellers, who have attested the pro- violinous size of the place, and its exact agreement with the description of Josephus (Tailf's Josephus, ii, 109 sq.; Bickel, Beitr. zur Bibl. Wiss. 1848, p. 62 sq.; Van de Velde, Var- rotte, ii, 97 sq.; Travemat, Land of Israel, p. 295 sq.).

The description of Josephus, in whose histories Masada plays a conspicuous part, is, as follows: A lofty rock of considerable extent, surrounded on all sides by precipi- tate cliffs, and visited by the enemy only in two parts—one on the east, towards the Lake Asphaltitis, by a zigzag path, scarcely practicable, and extremely dangerous, called "the Serpent," from its sinuosities; the other more easy, towards the west, on which side the isolated rock was more nearly ap- proached by the hills. The extremities of the cliff are not pointed, but a plain of 7 stadia in circumference, sur- rounded by a wall of white stone, 12 cubits high and yielded to the ram, when an inner wall was discovered to have been constructed by the garrison—a framework of timber filled with soil, which became more solid during the summer months by the concretions of the ram. This, however, was speedily fired. The assault was fixed for the morrow, when the garrison anticipated the arrival of the Romans by one of the most cold-blooded and atrocious massacres on record. At the instigation of Eleazar, they slew every man his wife and children; then, having collected the property into one heap, and destroyed it all by fire, they cast lots for ten men, who should act as executioners of the others while they lay in the embrace of their slaughtered families. One was then selected by lot to slay the other nine survivors; and he at last, having set fire to the palace, with a desperate effort drove his sword completely through his own body, and so perished. The total number, including men, women and children, was 660.

8 cubits thick, fortified with 87 towers of 50 cubits in height. The wall was joined within by large buildings connected with the towers, designed for barracks and magazines for the enormous stores and munitions of war which were laid up in this fortress. The remainder of the area, not occupied by buildings, was arable, the soil being richer and more genial than that of the plain below; and a further provision was thus made for the garrison in case of a failure of supplies from without. The rain-water was preserved in large cisterns excavated in the solid rock. A palace, on a grand scale, occupied the north-west aspect, on a lower level than the fortress, but connected with it by covered passages cut in the rock. This was adorned within with porticoes and baths, supported by monolithic columns; the walls and floors were covered with tessellated work. At the distance of 1000 cubits from the fortress, a massive tower guarded the western approach at its narrowest and most difficult point, and thus completed the artificial defences of this most remarkable site, which nature had rendered almost impregnable. In attacking the fortress, the first act of the Roman general was to surround the fortress with a wall, to prevent the escape of the garrison. Having distributed sentries along this line of circumvallation, he pitched his own camp on the west, where the rock was most nearly approached by the mountains, and was therefore more open to assault; for the difficulty of procuring provisions and water for his soldiers did not allow him to attempt a protracted blockade, which the enormous stores of provisions and water still found there by Eleazar would have enabled the garrison better to endure. Behind the tower which guarded the ascent was a prominent rock of considerable size and height, though 800 cubits lower than the wall of the fortress, called the White Cliff. On this a bank of 200 cubits' height was raised, which formed a base for a platform (βῆμα) of solid masonry, 50 cubits in width and height, and on this was placed a tower similar in construction to those invented and employed by Vespasian and Titus, covered with plates of iron, which reached an additional 60 cubits, so as to dominate the wall of the castle, which was quickly cleared of its defenders by the showers of missiles discharged from the scorpions and ballista. The outer wall soon

An old woman, with a female relative of Eleazar, and five children, who had contrived to conceal themselves in the reservoirs while the massacre was being perpetrated, survived, and narrated these facts to the astonished Romans when they entered the fortress the following morning, and had an actual sight of the frightful tragedy. On the present ruined site the ground-plan of the storehouses and barracks can still be traced in the foundations of the buildings on the summit, and the cisterns, excavated in the natural rock, are of enormous dimensions. One is mentioned as nearly 50 feet deep, 100 long, and 45 broad. The foundations of a round tower, 40 or 50 feet below the northern summit, may have been connected with the palace, and the windows cut in the rock near by, which Mr. Woolcot conjectures to have belonged to some large cistern, now covered up, may possibly have formed the rock-hewn gallery by which the palace communicated with the fortress. From the summit of the rock every part of the wall of circumvallation could be traced, carried along the low ground, and, wherever it met a precipice, continuing again on the high summit above, thus making the entire circuit of the place. Connected with it, at intervals, were the walls of the Roman camps, opposite the north-west and south-east corners, the former being the spot where Josephus places that of the Roman general. A third may be traced on the level near the above. The outline of the walls, as seen from the heights above, is as complete as if they had been but recently abandoned. The Roman wall is six feet broad, built, like the fortress walls and buildings above, with rough stones laid loosely together, and the interstices filled in with small pieces of stone. The wall is half a mile or more distant from the rock, so as to be without range of the stones discharged by the garrison. No water was to be found in the neighborhood but such as the recent rains had left in the hollows of the rocks, confirming the remark of Josephus that water, as well as food, was brought to the besieged by the Roman army from a distance. Its position is exactly opposite to the peninsula that runs into the Dead Sea from its eastern shore, towards its southern extremity. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.

Mas'loth (Mosehâlāh in v. Mosahâlāh), a place in Arbel, which Baccides and Aelius besieged and captured on their way from Gilgal to Juida (1 Macc. ix, 24). Pappus of Alexandria announces in the name (Acts xii, 11, 1) but of a trace of the name is thought by Robinson (Researches, ii, 388) to be found in the "steps" (ὑποθήκη, ιμισσιθή) of terraces (as in 2 Chron. ix, 11), in connection with the remarkable caverns besieged by Herod near Arbel (Josephus, War, i, 16, 4), now Kullat ibn-Man. See Arbel.

Masaupasa, a famous fast among the East Indian pagans. The name is derived from μαςοπας, which in the Mahābhārata also signifies a mode of fasting. It is a fast of great labor and merit, which had been discontinued for want of patronage. Le Long had published 2 vols. 8vo (Paris, 1709; republished by Börner, of Leipzig, with additions). Dr. Masch began its continuation in 1770, and completed it in 1780. It gives a full account of the literal history of the Bible, the various conditions of the original, and the ancient and modern versions. Dr. Masch also wrote several dissertations of considerable value, particularly a treatise on the Religions of the Heathen and of Christians (Gedanken von der Geistigkeits-harten Religionen, in 2 vols. 4to), intended as a contribution to the discussion between the various philosophies of the ancient nations. For a complete list of his works, see Döring, Gelehrte Theologen Deutschlands d. 18. u. 19. Jahrh. ii, 122 sq.

Mas'chil (Heb. maschil, מָשׁכִּיל, instructing, Hiph. part. of מָשַׁכֵּיל, to be wise; used as a noun in Psa. xviii, 7, מַשַּׁכֵּיל, sing ye a poem, Peshito, sing praise, but the Sept., Vulg., and Auth. Vers. "sing ye with understanding") occurs in the titles or inscriptions of Psa. xxxii, xiii, xiv, xiv, lii, lii, liv, lxiv, lxxviii, lxxix, cxli. The origin of the use of this word is unknown, though it has variously been explained. The most probable meaning of maschil is a poem, song, which enfolds intelligence, wisdom, piety, q. d. didactic; which is true of every sacred song, not excepting Psa. xlv, where everything is referred to the goodness of God. It occurs elsewhere as an adjective, and is accordingly rendered wise, or some other term, equivalent to instruction (1 Sam. xviii, 14, 15; 2 Chron. xxx, 22; Job xxii, 2; Psa. xiv, 2; xli, 1; lii, 2; Prov. v, 19; xiv, 35; xxv, 26, 27; xlii, 14; xiv, 12; Jer. i, 9; Dan. i, 4; xi, 85, 86; xii, 5, 10; Amos v, 18). For other uses from the Aramaic see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 1351. See Psalms, Book of.

Mascol, François, a noted Roman Catholic divine and Orientalist, was born at Amiens in the year 1662. He very early devoted himself to the study of Oriental languages, and attained in them an extraordinary degree of proficiency. Educated for service in the Church, he became first a curate in the diocese of Amiens, but afterwards obtained the confidence of De Brune, bishop of Amiens, who placed him at the head of the theological seminary of the district, and made him a canon. De Brune died in 1706, and Mascol, whose opinions on the Jansenistic controversy were not in accordance with those of the new prelate Sebastian, was compelled to resign his place in the theological seminary and retire from public life. From this time he devoted himself to study with such close application as to bring on a disease, of which he died, on Nov. 24, 1728, when only in his prime. Though austere in his habits, he was amiable and pious. Mascol's chief work is the Grammatica Hebraica, α ἡ υπὸ τοῦ προφήτου ἐκκοσμήσεως Ἐλληνικά έπανομένον Μασκόλιον, still considered one of the best works of the kind; it embodies an elaborate argument against the use of the vowel-points. The first edition was published in 1718, and is specially called attention to by the decree of the Lateran Council of 1680. In the year 1728 a second edition was published at Paris, containing an answer to Guarin's objections, with the addition of grammars of the Syriac, Chaldee, and Samaritan languages. Other works of Mascol are, Ecclesiastical Conferences on the Temple of Solomon, Catalogue of the Books of the Hebrew Bible, and in manuscript, Courses of Philosophy and Divinity; not printed because it is thought to contain Jansenistic opinions.

Mass (Heb. מַשׁ, Mass, signific. unknown; Sept. Mæsy, Vulg. Mæs), the last name of the four sons of Aram (B.C. post 2513), and a tribe descended from him, who gave their name to a region inhabited by them (Gen. x, 18); probably, therefore, to be sought in Syria or Mesopotamia. In the parallel passage (1 Chron. i, 17) the name of Meseus has been erroneously substituted, Josephus (Ant. i. 6, 4) understands the Morium (Messeus), and states that their locality is "now called Charax of Spassium," evidently the same place (Xipad Haavvii, Ptol. vi. 3, 2), situated, according to others, at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates (Plin. vi. 26, and Strabo. 136, Hardouin). Most interpreters, however, following Bochart (Phileg. ii. 11), understand to be meant the inhabitants of Mount Musa, which lies north of Nisibis, and forms part of the chain of Taurus separating Media from Mesopotamia (Strabo, xi. 257; Ptol. vi. 16, 2), of which latter the Sheenites occupied the northern part (Michaelis, Spicileg. ii. 140 sq.). "Knobel (Fid. orient. p. 237) seeks to reconcile this view with that of Josephus by the supposition of a migration from the north of Mesopotamia to the south of Babylonia, where the race may have been known in later times under the name of Mesebus: the progress of the population in these parts was, however, in an opposite direction, from south to north. Kalisch (Comm. on Gen. p. 286) connects the names of Mase and Mysea: this is, to say the least, extremely doubtful; both the Myanians themselves and their name (Masia) were probably of "sofic origin." (Smirn origin)." It is remarkable that among the Asiatic confederates of the Kheta or Sheba, i. e. Hitinites, who are enumerated as conquered by Ramesses II at Kadesh on the Orontes, is found the prince of Musa or Musa (Brugger, Hist. de l'Egypte, i. 148, 149)." See ETHNOLOGY.

Masham, Lady Damaris, a lady celebrated for her attainments in divinity, daughter of the celebrated Codworth, was born at Cambridge, England, in 1658. Her father, perceiving the bent of her genius, took particular care of her education, so that she was early distinguished for piety and uncommon learning. She became the second wife of Sir Francis Masham, of Oates, in Essex; and repaid her father's care of her in the admirable pains she took in the education of her only son. In the study of divinity and philosophy she was greatly assisted by Locke, who lived in her family most of his last years, and who died in her house. She died in 1706. Lady Masham wrote a discourse concerning the Love of God (1691, 12mo); and Occasional Thoughts in reference to a Virtuous or Christian Life (1700, 12mo); and drew up the account of Mr. Locke published in the great Historical Dictionary. See Lord King, Life of Locke; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. a. v.

Mason (Marcus v. v. Morris), one of the "sers" or "servants" of the king, who succeeded in returning with Zorobabel from Babylon (1 Esdr. v. 84). Nothing corresponding to the name is found in the Heb. text (Ezra v. 55 sq.).

Marcus Andre, a very learned Orientalist, was born near Brussels in 1516. He was a man of excellent parts, an accomplished lawyer, and counsellor to the duke of Cleves. He died in 1573. Mason translated a variety of articles from the Syriac, which may be found in the Supplement to the Critiae Sacrae, compiled a Syriac Lexicon and Grammar, and a learned Commentary on Joshua and part of Deuteronomy. The former contains the readings of the Syriac Hexaplar version. See Hoefert, Nour. Bibl. Générale, s. v.

man face. It is common in some districts in work of the 13th and 14th centuries, and is usually carved under the eaves as a corbel-table. A good example occurs in Portsmouth Church, where it is mixed with the tooth-ornament. It is a favorite ornament in Northamptonshire in the cornices of the broad spire, and under the parapet of the chancel; but it is by no means confined to any particular district. —Parker, Glossary of Architecture, s. v.

Mason, Dralcine, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, son of Dr. John M. Mason, was born in New York City April 16, 1805; was educated at Dickinson College (class of 1823); was ordained in October, 1826; installed over the Church at Schenectady, N.Y., and was the pastor of Asbury Church, New York, from 1820 to 1851; and also professor of ecclesiastical history in Union Theological Seminary, New York, from 1836 to 1842. He died May 14, 1841. His memoir, by Rev. Wm. Adams, is prefixed to his sermons on practical subjects, entitled A Pastor's Legacy (1825, 8vo). See also Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog. s. v.

Mason, Francis (1), B.D., an English divine, was born in the county of Durham in 1666; was educated at Merton College, Oxford, about 1688, where he was chosen probationer fellow; became rector of Oxford, Suffolk, and chaplain to King James I, and archdeacon of Norfolk in 1618. He died in 1621. He published Sermons (Lond. 1607, 4to; Oxford, 1634, 4to).—Vindiciae Ecclesiae Anglicanae (1613, fol.; published in an English dress, entitled A Vindication of the Church of England, and of the Lawful Ministry thereof, etc.; greatly enlarged by Rev. John Linge, 14th edition, 1729, fol.; 1778, fol.). This book contains a complete refutation of the Nag's Head:—Two Sermons (1621, 8vo):—The Perversion of the Ordination of Ministers of the Reformed Churches beyond the Seas (Oxford, 1641, 4to). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Darlington, Cyclop. Bib. (1844, 8vo).—Darling, Cyclop. Bib. (1844, 8vo).—Darling, Cyclop. Bib. (1844, 8vo).

Mason, Francis (2), D.D., a Baptist minister, and missionary, was born at York, England, April 2, 1799. He was a shoemaker's apprentice, emigrated to Philadelphia in 1818; settled at Canton, Mo., in 1825; studied at the Theological Seminary, Newton, Mo., in 1827; and in May, 1830, having been ordained, sailed with his wife for Calcutta as a missionary to the Keraus. After acquiring the language, he wrote The Sayings of the Elders, which was the first printed book in the Karen language. He prepared Pali and Burmese grammars, and acquired many of the Oriental languages. He also published a Karen translation of the Bible. He was medical adviser to this people, having studied medicine, and published a small work on materia medica and pathology in one of the Karen dialects. He also edited for many years the Morning Star, a Karen monthly, in both the Karen and Pali languages, and was master of a large number of literate and uneducated. He died at Rangoon, Burma, March 3, 1874. His English writings are, Report of the Twelfth Mission Society:—Life of Kohabun, the Karen Apostle:—Memoir of Mrs. Helen M. Mason (1847): Memoir of Son Quilla (1850);—and Burmah, Its People and Natural Productions (1852; enlarged edition, 1861).

Mason, John (1), an English dissenting divine, was born in Essex in 1703 or 1706; became pastor of a congregation at Dorking, Surrey, in 1730, and at Chestnut, Hertfordshire, in 1746. He died in 1768. Mr. Mason published a number of Sermons, various theological treatises and other works. The best known is his Self-Knowledge (1754; new edition and life of the author by John Mason Good, 1811, 12mo; new edition by Tegg, 1847, 32mo; with Melmoth's Importance of a Christian Life, published by Scott, 1855, 24mo); this work was well received a long time, and was translated into several languages:—The Lord's Day Evening Entertainments, 52 practical discourses (1751-52, 4 vols. 8vo; 2d ed. 1754, 4 vols. 8vo):—The Student and Pastor (1755, 8vo; new edition by Joshua Toulmin, D.D., 1807, 12mo):—Fifteen Discourses (1756, 8vo):—Christian Virtues (1761, 2 vols. 8vo). Mason, John (2), D.D., a minister of the Associate Reformed Church, father of the celebrated John M. Mason, was born near Mid-Calder, in Linlithgowshire, Scotland, in 1724. The greatest event in his life was the ordination of the Church of Scotland occurred in his early days, and, favoring the Anti-Burgher party, he identified himself with this branch of the "Secession Church," pursued his theological studies at Abernethy, and later became an assistant professor of logic and moral philosophy at the theological school. In 1761 he was ordained for the office of the ministry, and sent to this country as pastor of the then Cedar Street Church, New York. Believing that the causes which divided the Presbyterians of Scotland did not exist here, he labored, from the moment of his arrival, for the union of all the Presbyterians, and, though his course displeased his brethren at home, and the synod suspended him, he pushed his project, and on June 18, 1782, a general union of the Reformed Presbyterians was held as "the Associate Reformed Church." Dr. Mason had the honor to be the first moderator of this body. Uniting in his services to the cause of the Church of Christ, and his own branch of it, he died April 19, 1792. "His death, like his life, was an honorable testimony to his Redeemer's power and grace." The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by New Jersey College, of which he was the president from 1779 to 1785. Dr. Mason was "a man of sound and vigorous mind, of extensive learning, and fervent piety. As a preacher, he was uncommonly judicious and instructive, and his ministers were largely attended. He was especially favorable and zealous in the cause of missions. The great object of his life was to promote the spread of the Christian religion, and he not only patronized the efforts of those who were engaged in that useful work, but zealously supported and encouraged them." Dr. Mason was a member of the Universal Church, and died on the 3rd of September, 1792. He was buried at the Village Church, West New York. In 1824, his body was removed to the New Church, New York.
honored with the provostship of Columbia College, and, though already employed as preacher and professor, accepted the position, "and by his talents and energy raised that institution to a higher character than it had ever before possessed." In 1816 failing health admonished him of the magnitude of the work he had undertaken, and he resigned his professorship and returned to the college and went to Europe. On his return in 1817 he again devoted himself to Gospel labors, but in 1821 exchanged the pulpit for the rostrum, as president of Dickinson College, Pa. In 1822 he transferred his ecclesiastical relation to the FreeEbterian Church. In 1824 he resigned as president of the college, and returned to New York to recuperate his health, but he was never again permitted to assume any official connection. He died Dec. 26, 1825. Besides the literary enterprises already mentioned, Dr. Mason wrote a number of essays, reviews, orations, and sermons, published at different times. They were collected by his son, the Rev. Ebenezer Mason, and published in 4 vols. 8vo, in 1832 (new ed., with many additions, 1849). A memoir, with some of his correspondence, was published by his son-in-law, J. Van Vechten, D.D., in 1856, 2 vols. 8vo. The mind of Dr. Mason was full of interests; the most robust order, his theology Calvinistic, and his style of eloquence powerful and irresistible as a torrent. When Robert Hail first heard him deliver before the London Missionary Society, in 1805, he celebrated discourse on "Messiah's Throne," he is said to have been startled, and exclaimed, "I can never hear this man again!" (Pusey's Pulpit Eloquence, 1857, p. 486, q. v.). "Talk, talk, altogether, no American preacher has combined more impressive qualities. His aspect was on a scale of grandeur corresponding to the majesty of mind within. Tall, robust, straight, with a head modeled after neither Grecian nor Roman standard, yet symmetrical, combining the dignity of the one and the grace of the other; with an eye that shot fire, especially when under the excitement of earnest preaching, yet tender and tearful when the pathetic cord was touched; with a forehead broad and high, running up each side, and slightly parted in the middle by a graceful pendant of hair, with mouth and chin expressive of firmness and decision. . . . Dr. Mason stood before you the prince of pulpit orators" (N. Y. Observer, Nov. 1860). See also Boot, Christ. Disciple, iii, 475; Dr. Spring, Power of the Pulpit; Duyckinck, Cyclop. Amer. Lit. Mason, LOWELL, doctor of music, a celebrated American composer of music, was born at Medfield, Mass., Jan. 8, 1792. When but a child he exhibited extraordinary capacity for music, and began to receive a musical education early in life. In 1812 he removed to Savannah, Ga., and there compiled his first book of Psalmody, the celebrated Händel and Haydn collection, the success of which eliciting much persuasion of his musical friends in Massachusetts to settle in his native state, he removed to Boston in 1827, devoted himself to the musical instruction of children and the introduction of vocal music into the public schools of New England; caused the Boston Academy of Music to be established, and also "Teachers' Institutes" for the training of teachers and local directors. He visited England in 1827, and acquainted himself with all the improvements in the musical teaching on the Continent. In 1855 the University of New York conferred on him the degree of doctor of music, the first ever conferred by an American college. In the later years of his life he gave much attention to congregational singing in the churches, and did much to advance the interests of Church music in general. He died at his residence, Orange, N. J., Aug. 11, 1872. His publications of interest to us are Juvenile Psalmist, Juvenile Lyre, etc. (Boston, 1829, '30, '34, '35, '36, '37, '39, '43, '45, '46; New York, 1848; Phila. 1848; London, 1838);—several sacred and Church music-books:—The Boston Händel and Haydn Collection of Church Music (1822);—The Choir, or Union Collection (1838). etc.; etc. Dr. Mason was the author and compiler of more musical works than any other American, and contributed much towards making the Americans a nation of "singing men and singing women." See Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Drake, Dict. Amer. Biog. s. v.

MASON, William, an English divine of some note, son of the vicar of St. Trinity Hall, was born in 1725; was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and made fellow of Pembroke College in 1747. In 1754 he took holy orders, became rector of Aston, Yorkshire, chaplain to the king, and was for thirty-two years precentor and canons residentiary of York. He died in 1797. His published works, both secular and religious, are chiefly in poetry, among which are several critically and critically and critically, on English Church Music (1790, 12mo). He also published Memoirs of Thomas Gray (1775, 4to). Mason was regarded by his contemporaries as a poet of more than ordinary genius, but the lack of classical culture prevented his rise. There is a tablet to his memory in Poet's Corner, Westminster Abbey. His style is, to a great extent, that of an imitator of Gray; and, not being so perfect an artist in language as his master, he has been proportionately less successful. In addition to his poetical reputation, he possessed considerable skill in painting, and, in his last years, resided on the last print, and obtained opinions not at all consonant with those of musicians in general. He wished to reduce Church music to the most dry and mechanical style possible, excluding all such expression as should depend on the powers and talents of the performers (Mason's Compendium of the History of Church Music. See Memoirs of Mason in Johnson and Chalmers' English Poets (1840, 21 vols. 8vo); Chalmers' Biog. Dict. s. v.; Blackwood's Mag. xxxiii. 482; xxvi, 565; Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Masorah, Masoroth, or Masoreth (מָסּוֹרָה, מָסָּרֹת), the technical term given to a grammatico-critical commentary on the O. T., the design of which is to indicate the correct reading of the text with respect to words, vowels, accents, etc., so as to preserve it from all corruption, putting an end to the exercise of unbounded individual fancy. In the Hebrew Masorah denotes tradition, from מָסֶר, which is used in Chaldaic in the sense of to give over, to commit (corresponding to the Hebrew הַמֵּסֶר, וְלַמֶּסֶר), comp. Targ. on 1 Sam. xvii, 46; xxiv, 11; 1 Kings xx, 13; Exod. xxi, 8; Amos vi, 8); and hence, by the rabbinical writers, in the sense of to deliver, with reference to the oral communication of doctrine, opinion, or fact. The term is variously interpreted, to bind, to faze within strict limits, seems to have been an afterthought, recognized by the sentiment that the Masorah is a hedge to the Torah. The Masorah, however, is not confined to what is communicated by oral tradition: in the state in which it has come down to us it embraces all that has been delivered traditionally, whether orally or in writing. Its correlate is הַמֵּסֶר (מַעֲבָדָה), reception; and as the latter denotes whatever has been received traditionally, the former embraces whatever has been delivered traditionally: though in usage Kabbalah is generally restricted to matters of theologcal and mystical import [see CAHALA], while Masorah has reference rather to matters affecting the condition of the text of Scripture. It takes account not only of various readings, but contains notes of a grammatical and lexicographical character. It descends to the most minute particulars, and is a monument of prolonged industry, fidelity, and earnest devotion to the cause of sacred learning.

1. Origins of the Masorah.—The Masorah is the work of certain Jewish critics, who from whose work have received the title of הָבָלִית (Bozalim Homenaseth), masters of the Masorah, or, as they are generally designated, Masoretes. They were, and when or where their work was accomplished, are points involved in some uncertainty. According to Jewish tradition, the work began with the written collection (Buxtorf, Tiberias, c. 11, p. 102; Leseuden, Philol. Heb. Diss., sec. 4; Pfeiffer, De Masorah, cap. ii, in Opp. p. 891, etc.), but the arguments which have been adduced in support of this opinion are not sufficient to sustain it. The Tiber-Zeera says expressly: "So was the usage of the wise men of Tiberias, for from them were the men the authors of the Masorah, and from them have we received the whole punctuation." (Zadok, cited by Buxtorf, T. c. p. 9), and even Buxtorf himself unconsciously gives in to the opinion he opposes by the title he has put on his work. That various readings had been noted before this, even in pre-Talmudic times, is not to be doubted. In the Talmud itself we have not only directions given for the correct writing of the Biblical books, but references to varieties of reading as then existing, (Hecor, t. Tammith, l. 68, c. 1; comp. Kennicott, Gen. ii. 84; De Wette, Rem., c. 99; Haverneick, Introd. p. 280;), especial mention is made of the Ittur Sopherim (תלמוד תורוספיא, Abelicio Scribarum; tract Nedarin, l. 37, c. 2), of the Keri ve-lo Kethib, the Kethib ve-lo Keri, and the Keri ce-keheth (Nedarim, l. c. tract Sota, v, 5; Joma, l. 21, c. 2), and of the puncta extraordinaria, which, however, are not properly of critical import, but rather point to allegorical explanations of the passages (tr. Nasir, l. 23, c. 1; comp. Jerome, Quast. in Gen. xviii., 85); and already the middle consonant, the middle word, and the middle verse of the Pentateuch are noted as in the Masorah. In the tract Sopherim, written between the Talmud and the Masorah, there are also notes of the same kind, though not exactly agreeing with those in the Masorah. But those variants had not before been formally collected and reduced to order in writing. This was the work of the Jewish scholar, who, from the 6th century after Christ, flourished in Palestine, and had his principal seat at Tiberias (Zuns, Gottesdiestliche Vorträge der Juden, p. 689).

II. Contents of the Masorah. These are partly palaeographic, partly critical, partly exegetical, partly grammatical. They embrace notes concerning:

1. The Consoments of the Hebrew Text. Concerning these, the Masoretes note thirty letters which are larger than the others, about thirty that are less, four which are suspended or placed above the line of the others in the same word, and nine which are inverted or written upside down; to these peculiarities reference is made also in the Talmud, and the use of them as merely marking the middle of a book or section indicated (tr. Kiddushin, l. 30, c. 1; Haverneick, l. c. p. 282). The Masoretes also note a case in which the final v is found in the heart of a word (סובב רה, Isa. ix. 6); one in which the initial n is found at the end (נף, Neh. ii. 13); and in which the initial v occurs at the end (כף, Job xiv. 1)—irregularities for which no reason can be assigned (comp. Leseuden, Phil. Heb. Diss., c. 3). They have noted how often each letter occurs; and it was customary to mark the middle of each book, the middle letter of the Pentateuch (the v in לא, Lev. xi. 42), the middle letter of the Psalter (the v in והי, Psa. lxxx., 14), the number of times each of the five letters which have final forms occurs in its final and in its initial form.

2. The Vowel-points and Accents in the Hebrew Text. Here the Masoretes note the peculiarities and anomalies in the vowel-points, in the dagesh and mappik, and of the accents in the text—a fact to which Buxtorf appeals with considerable force, as proving that the authors of the Masorah, as we have it, were not the inventors of the diacritical marks by which vowels and accents are indicated in the Hebrew text: for, had they been so, they would not have confined themselves to laboriously noting anomalies into which they themselves had fallen, but would at once have removed them. See Vowel-points.

3. Words. With regard to these, the Masoretes note (1) the cases of Scriptio plena (窒ליס 적용) and defectiva (יעליס 적용); (2) the number of times in which certain words occur at the beginning of a verse (as, e.g., לבר, which they say is nine times the first word of a verse), or the end of a verse (as, יתרא, which they say occurs thrice as the final word of a verse); (3) words of which the meaning is ambiguous, and to which they affix the proper meaning in the place where they occur; (4) words which have over them the puncta extraordinaria; and (5) words which present anomalies in writing or grammar, and which some have thought should be altered, or peculiarities which need to be explained.

4. Verses. The Masoretes number the verses in each book of the O. Test., as well as in each of the larger sections of the Pentateuch, and they note the middle verse of each book of the O. T.; they also note the number of verses in which certain expressions occur, the first and last letters, the number of cases the number of letters of which it is composed; and, in fine, they have marked twenty-five or twenty-eight places where there is a pause in the middle of a verse, or where a hiatus is supposed to be found in the meaning (as, e.g., in Gen. iv, 8, where, after the words בַּעַל לַעֲבֻדַּה, there is in rabbinical editions of the O. Test. a space left vacant [ץָשַׁה, piska] to indicate that something is probably omitted).

5. Tikkan Sopherim (תלמוד תורוספיא, ordinarium, sive correctio Scribarum). On the word בָּרָא (Psa. cvi, 20) the Masorah has this note: the word בָּרָא is one of eighteen words in Scripture which are an ordination of the Scribaria. These eighteen words are also enumerated in a note at the beginning of Numbers. The passages where they occur are presented in the following table:

Charges have been rashly advanced against these Sopherim of having corrupted the sacred text (Galatin, De A r e n n i a C ath o l. Ver. lib. i, c. 6), but for this there is no foundation (see ben-Chajim's Introduction to the Rabbinc Bible, translated by Ginsburg, p. 21). Eichhorn concludes from the criticism of the rabbis that "this recension took note only of certain errors which had crept into the text through transcribers, and which were corrected by collation of MSS." [Erdel, in A. T. sec. 116]. Bleek, however, thinks that this is affirmed without evidence, and that in some cases the rejected reading is probably the original one, as e.g. in Gen. xviii, 22, and Hab. 1, 12 [Erdel, in A. T. p. 908].

6. Irr. Sophorim (יִפְשְׂרְיָה יֶרֶבֶן, abbiaco Scriba-ram).—The Masoretes have noted four instances in which the letter ℤ has been erroneously prefixed to the word יִפְשְׂרְיָה in Psa. xxxvi, 7. Of these passages, the only one in which the injunction of the Sopherim to remove the ℤ has been neglected is Numb. xii, 14—a neglect at which Buxtorf expresses surprise (Lez. Talmud, s. v. ⤶).

7. Keri and Kethib.—But not all the dicta of the Masoretes are of equal sterling value; they are not only sometimes utterly superfluous, but downright erroneous. Of its "countings" we may adduce that it enumerates in the Pentateuch 18 greater and 48 smaller portions, 1554 verses, 63,467 words, 70,100 letters, etc.—a calculation which, is however, to a certain degree at variance with the Talmud. See the article Keri and Kethib in this work.

III. Form of the Masorah.—The language of the Masorah is Chaldean; and, besides the difficulty of this idiom, the obscure abbreviations, contractions, symbolical signs, etc., with which the work abounds, renders its study exceedingly difficult. In all probability it was compos ed out of notes that had been made from time to time on separate leaves, or in books, as occasion demanded. Afterwards they were appended as marginal notes to the text, sometimes on the upper and lower margin, sometimes in a mere brief form on the space between the text and the Chaldean version, where, from scarcity of room, many abbreviations and symbols were resorted to, and considerable omissions were made. Hence arose a distinction between the פֶּרֶשָׂת, the Masora Magna, and the קֶטֵב הַמַשְׁפֵּר, the M. Parra—the former of which comprehends the entire body of critical remark on the margins, the latter the more curt and condensed notes inserted in the intermediate space. The latter has frequently been represented as an abbreviated compend of the former; but this is not strictly correct, for the lesser Masorah contains many things not found in the greater. At an early period the scribes introduced the practice of adorning their annotations with all manner of figures, and symbols, and calligraphic ingenuities, and from this as well as from several connected with the method of selection and arrangement, the whole came into such a state of confusion that it was rendered almost useless. In this state it remained until the publication of Bomberry’s Robbibilica Bible (Venetiis, 1526: the second Bomberg Bible Robin, not the first, as is sometimes stated), for which the learned R. Jacob ben-Chajim, with immense labor, prepared and arranged the Masorah.

See JACOB BEN-CHAJIM. To facilitate the use of the Greater Masorah, he placed at the end of his work what has been called the Masora maxima or gloss, and which forms a sort of Masoretic Concordance in alphabetical order.

IV. Value of the Masorah.—While there is much in the Masorah that can be regarded in no other light than as laborious trifling, it is far from deserving the scorn which has sometimes been poured upon it. There can be no doubt that it preserves to us much valuable traditional information concerning the constitution and the meaning of the sacred text. It is the source whence materials for a critical revision of the O.-Test. text can now alone be derived. It is a pity that it is now impossible to discriminate the older from the more recent of its forms. As against the Masora of the Talmud and the Targum, those of the Masora magna of such as Eichhorn, that some one would undertake the "bitter task" of making complete critical excerpits from the Masorah.

Maspha, the name of two places mentioned in the Apocrypha whether the ancient city of Mizpah of Gilgal (Judg. xi, 29, etc.) or Mizpeh of Moab (1 Sam. xxii, 8) is meant. The Syriac has the curious variation of Olum, "salt," and one Greek MS. has ιαύμα, another ιανόμα, another ιαμαία: but this seems to be a mere corruption from ver. 26 by some one who thought that the place mentioned in both verses should be the same. Michaelis, however, would combine both readings, and make the place Mizpeh-Elom. Perhaps Josephus also reads יִפְשֶׂרָה, "salt," as he reads מַדְאִי (Ant. xii, 8, 3), which Grimm thinks has arisen from transposition of letters (Handbuch s. a. Apokr. ad loc.).

Maserckah (Heb. מֶרְכָּה, מֶרְכָּה, merkōr; Sept. Marsek, Marsaxk, Masek), a place apparently in Idumea, the native place of Samiah, one of the Edomites kings (1st. xxxvi, 56; 1 Chron. 1, 47).—The student of the Bible will call attention to some of these kings are mentioned with the addition, and the name of the town where he was, others are introduced as 'coming from' some other place. Kalsch (ad loc.) remarks that the former seems to comprise native Idumeans, the latter foreigners. Esdras and Jerome, however (Onomast. s. a. Marsek), accentuate the difference of the names, and locate the one in the northern part of Edom (Kitto). "Interpreted as Hebrew, the name refers to vineyards— as if from סָרָנ, a root with which we are familiar in the 'vine of So rage,' that is, the choice vine; and, led by this,Knobel (Gen. p. 357) proposes to place Maserckah in the district of the Idumean Gilead, southwest of Gilead, and along the Jezreel, route, where Barchhardt found 'extensive vineyards,' and 'great quantities of dried grapes,' made by the tribe of the Rephaim for the supply of Gaza.

and for the Mecca pilgrims (Borchhardt, Syria, p. 418). But the Mass has been a name at least since corresponding with Masrekah has been yet discovered in that locality" (Smith). According to Schwartz (Palest. p. 218), there is still a town, eight miles south of Petra, called En-Masrek, which he thinks may be the locality. He probably refers to the place marked Ab Misrauk on Palmer's Map, and Ab el-Udada in Reproof.

Mass (Latin Missa) is the technical term by which the Church of Rome designates the Eucharistic service which in that Church, as well as in the Greek and other Oriental churches, is held to be the sacrifice of the new law—a real though unbloody offering, in which Christ is the victim, in substance the same with the sacrifice of the cross. It is instituted, Romanists further teach, in commemoration of that sacrifice, and as a means of applying its merits through all ages for the sanctification of men.

Oriens and Meaning of the Word—"The first names given to the administration of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ," says Walcott (s. v.), "were the Breaking of Bread (Acts xx, 6, 7), the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. ii, 20), or Communion (1 Cor. x, 18). It was also called, by way of eminence, the mystery, the sacrament, the oblation or prophyra, the sacrifice, Dominicum (the Lord's), agenda (the action), synaxis and collecta (the assembly or congregation); the sacrifice, the consecration, the mystical or divine Eucharist or eulogy (the thanksgiving), the office, the spectacle, the consecration, the unbloody sacrifice, the supper, the table, the latria (worship), the universal canon; and, by the Greeks, also the hierurgia (sacred action), and the good by excellence, metalepsis (the communion), in the Apostolical Canons. These terms served either to explain to the faithful the meaning of the service, or, in times of persecution, to conceal its real nature from the profane and persecutors. In Acts xiii, 2, it is spoken of as the liturgy.

The term Mass, having been long used by Clement I, Alexander, Telesphorus, Soter, and Felix (cir. 100-275). In a letter of St. Ambrose to his sister Marcellina (of the 4th century), we have this passage: "Ego manst in munere, missam facere scripi, dum offers, raptos cognovit" (Ep. xxxiii.). Its origin and use, however, have given much trouble. There are at present three principal derivations of the word: (1) From the Anglo-Saxon massa, a feast, in which sense the word is of more ancient date than the Eucharist. It seems probable that the ancient word is embodied in such names as Missale (Mass), Missam (Massarum, Massenses); but it is very doubtful whether the suffix, as thus used, has any reference at all to the holy Eucharist, and it is much more probable that the coincidence of the Anglo-Saxon word for feast, with mass and missa, the holy Eucharist, is purely accidental. (2) From the Hebrew מָסָא, masah, which signifies an oblation, as in Deut. xvi, 10. This derivation would tend to show an association between the original idea of the Eucharist and the oblations of the Jewish ritual; but it is extremely improbable that the Jewish word should have found its way into every language of Europe, and yet be entirely absent from the liturgical vocabulary of the Oriental churches. (3) From the Latin missa, an offering, of the West, which was equivalent to the by εὐλογημένου Χριστοῦ ἐρωτευμονόμενον, "Let us depart in peace," of the Greek liturgies. But the words "Ite, missa est," have two senses given to them by ancient writers; thus, in Micologus, it means "Let us depart in peace," (1) and missa, a "plenary dispensation, a complete absolution of sins," (2); plene generalis conventus celebratus soli, qui per huiusmodi de extenuatione licenciam discipendi accepit solea" (Micolog. xiv.). St. Thomas Aquinas, on the other hand, explains the phrase as meaning that the sacrifice of the Eucharist has been sent up to God by the administration of the Holy Eucharist, (3) a prayer read in a laudatio sanctissimae, the Gradual (q. v.); (4) the Gospel, which is commonly followed by the Nicene Creed; (5) the Offertory (q. v.), after the reading of which comes the preparatory offering of the bread and wine, and the washing of the priest's hands in token of purity of heart, and the "a" or "the priest's prayer (cresit)," a prayer read in a laudatio sanctissimae, the Gradual (q. v.); (6) the preface, concluding with the trisagion, or "thrice holy," at which point, by the primitive use, the catechumens and penitents retired from the church; (7) on him, and forgive him his sins, and bring him to everlasting life. Then, in the name of all there present, the clerk makes the like general confession to God, to the whole court of heaven, and to the priest, and begs his prayers. And the priest prays to God to show mercy to all his people, and to put them into remembrance and remission of all their sins. Which is done to the end that both priest and people may put themselves in a penitent spirit, in order to assist worthily at this divine sacrifice. After the Confrere the priest goes up to the altar. From afar away from us, we beseech thee, O Lord, our intercessions, that we may be worthy to enter with pure minds into the holy of holies, through Christ our Lord; amen, and kisses the altar as a figure of Christ, and the seat of the sacred mysteries. When the priest is come up to the altar, he goes to the book, and there reads what is to conclude introit; entrance of the mass, which is different every day, and is generally an anthem taken out of the Scripture, with the first verse of one of the Psalms, and the Glory be to the Father, etc., to glorify the blessed Trinity. The priest returns to the middle of the altar, and says alternately with the clerk the Kyrie eleison, or Lord have mercy on us, which is said three times to God the Father; three times Christe eleison, or Christ have mercy on us, to God the Son; and three times again Kyrie eleison, to God the Holy Ghost. After the Kyrie eleison, the priest says the Gloria in excelsis to God on high, etc., being an excellent hymn and prayer to God, the beginning of which was sung by the angels at the birth of Christ. But this, being a hymn of joy, is omitted in the masses of requiem for the dead, and in the masses of the Sundays and ferias of the penitential times of Advent and Lent, etc. At the end of the Gloria in excelsis the priest kisses the altar, and, turning about to the people, says, 'Dominus vobiscum' (The Lord be with you). Answer: 'Et cum spiritu tuo.' (And with thy spirit). The priest returns to the book, reads the lessons, and then reads the collect or collects of the day, concluding the order of the mass with the usual termination, 'Per Dominum nostrum,' etc. (Through our Lord Jesus Christ, etc.), with which the Church commonly concludes all her prayers. The collect being ended, the priest lays his hands upon the book and reads the epistle or lesson of the day, at the end of which the clerk answers, 'Deo gratias' (Thanks be to God)—viz., for the heavenly doctrine there delivered. Then follow some verses or sentences of Scripture, called the gradual, which are every day different. After this the book is removed to the other side of the altar, and the priest reads the Gospel, or, which removal of the book represents the passing from the preaching of the old law, figured by the lesson or epistle, to the Gospel of Jesus Christ published by the preachers of the new law. The priest, before he reads the Gospel, stands awhile bowing down before the middle of the altar, begging of God in secret to cleanse his heart and his lips, that he may be worthy to declare those heavenly words. At the beginning of the Gospel the priest greets the people with the usual salutation—'Dominus vobiscum' (The Lord be with you), and then tells them the name of the evangelist in the margin of the text, saying, 'Sequentia S. Evangelii secundum,' etc. (What follows is of the holy Gospel, etc.). At these words both priest and people make the sign of the cross: 1st, upon their foreheads, to signify that they are not ashamed of the cross of Christ; his spies to God, to the whole court of heaven, and to all the faithful there present, of his sins and un worthiness, and to beg their prayers for God to him. And the clerk, in the name of the people, prays for the priest, that God would have mercy

The "canon," which is always the same, and which contains all the prayers connected with the consecration, the elevation, the breaking, and the communion of the host and of the chalice, as also the commemorations both of the living and of the dead; (9) the "communion," which is a short scriptural prayer, usually appropriate to the particular festival; (9) the "post-communion," which, like the collect, was a joint prayer of priest and people, and is read or sung aloud; (10) the dismissal with the benediction; and, finally, the first chapter of the great mass of the above prayers were fixed, and form what is called the "ordo" or "ordinary" of the mass. The rest, which is called the "proper of the mass," differs for different occasions, many masses having nothing peculiar but the name: such are the masses of the saints—that of St. Mary of the Snow, celebrated on the 6th of August; that of St. Margaret, patroness of lying-in women; that at the feast of St. John the Baptist, at which are said three masses; that of the Innocents, at which the Gloria in excelsis and Hallelujah are omitted, and, it being a day of mourning, the altar is in a violet color. As to ordinary masses, some are for the dead, and, as it is supposed, contribute to release the soul from purgatory. At these masses the altar is put in mourning, and the only decorations are a cross in the middle of six yellow wax lights; the dress of the celebrant, and the very Mass book. The various parts of the service are omitted, and the people are dismissed without the benediction. If the mass be said for a person distinguished by his rank or virtues, it is followed with a funeral oration: they erect a chapelle ardente, that is, a representation of the deceased, with branches and tapers of yellow wax, either in the middle of the church or near the deceased's tomb, where the priest pronounces a solemn absolution of the deceased. There are likewise private masses said for stolen or strayed goods or cattle, for health, for travellers, etc., which go under the name of erecta masses. These masses are further distinguished from other masses, denominates from the countries in which they were used: thus the Gothic mass, or missa Marchrotam, is that used among the Goths when they were masters of Spain, and is still kept up at Toledo and Salamanca; the Ambrosian mass is that composed by St. Ambrose, and used only at Milan, of which city he was bishop; the Gallic mass, used by the ancient Gauls; and the Roman mass, used by almost all the churches in the Romish communion. The mass of the presanctified (missa presanctification) is a mass peculiar not only to the Roman, but also to the Greek Church. In the latter country, it is performed by the celebration of the eucharist; but, in the Greek Church, after singing some hymns, the bread and wine, which were consecrated on the preceding day, are partaken of. This mass is performed in the Greek Church not only on Good Friday, but on every day during all Lent, except on Saturdays, Sundays, and the Annunciation. The priest counts upon his fingers the days of the ensuing week on which it is to be celebrated, and cuts off as many pieces of bread at the altar as he is to say masses, and, after having consecrated them, steeps them in wine and puts them in a box, out of which, upon every occasion, he takes one with a spoon, and, putting it on a dish, sets it on the altar.

Ceremony.—The following office of the mass is extracted from the Garden of the Soul, prepared by the late bishop Challoner, and may be accepted, therefore, as the authorized rites of the English Roman Catholics: "At the beginning of the mass, the priest at the foot of the altar makes the sign of the cross, 'In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; amen,' and then recites with the clerk the 42d Psalm—'Judica me, Deus,' etc. Then the priest, bowing down, says the Collect, 'by way of general petition to God, to the whole court of heaven, and to all the faithful there present, of his sins and unworthiness, and to beg their prayers for God to him. And the clerk, in the name of the people, prays for the priest, that God would have mercy..." upon all Sundays, and many other festival days, standing in the middle of the altar, he recites the Nicene Creed: "And in one and the same Jesus Christ..." in reversion to the great mystery of our Lord’s incarnation.

Then the priest turns about to the people and says, ‘Dominus vobiscum’ (The Lord be with you). Having read in the book a verse or sentence of the Scripture, which is called the epistle, and is every day different, he upowers the chalice, and, taking in his hand the paten, or little plate, offers up the bread to God; then, going to the corner of the altar, he takes the wine and pours it into the chalice, and mingles with it a small quantity of water, in remembrance of the blood and body of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ; after which he returns to the middle of the altar and offers up the chalice. Then, bowing down, he begs that this sacrifice, which he desires to offer with a contrite and humble heart, may find acceptance with God; and, blessing the bread and wine with the sign of the cross, he invokes the host of all sanctity to sanctify this offering. At the end of the epistle, the priest goes to the corner of the altar and washes the tips of his fingers, to denote the cleanliness and purity of soul with which we ought to approach to these divine mysteries, saying, ‘Lavabo,’ etc. (I will wash my hands among the innocents, etc.) as in the latter part of the 26th Psalm. Then returning to the middle of the altar, and there bowing down, he begs of the blessed Trinity to receive this oblation in memory of the Passion, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord Jesus Christ, and for the souls of all the blessed Virgin and of all the saints, that they may intercede for us in heaven, whose memory we celebrate upon earth. Then the priest, kissing the altar, turns to the people and says, ‘Orate fratres,’ etc. (Brethren, pray that my sacrifice and yours may be acceptable to God the Father Almighty). Then the priest says in a low voice the prayers called secreta, which correspond to the collective of the day, and are different every day. The priest concludes the secreta by saying aloud, ‘Per omniam secula secundum,’ etc. (World without end). Answer: Amen. Priests: ‘Dominus vobiscum’ (The Lord be with you). Answer: ‘Et cum spiritu tuo’ (And with thy spirit). Priests: ‘Surrsum corda’ (Lift up your hearts). Answer: ‘Habemus ad Dominum’ (We have them lifted up to the Lord). Priests: ‘Gratias agamus Domino Deo nostro’ (Let us give thanks to the Lord our God). Then follow the public prayers, and the Sacred Meal, and the celebration of the Eucharist.”

V.—28

secrected species. Then covering the chalice, he goes to the book and reads a verse of holy Scripture, called the act of consecration; after which he turns about to the people with the usual salutation, Dominius vobiscum; and, returning to the book, reads the collects or prayers called the post-communion. After which he again greets the people with Dominius vobiscum, and gives them leave to depart. At the mental prayer, order to the priest may feel morally sure that he is in a state of grace, since for the recovery of that state by such as have once fallen from it, confession, or contrition, if confession cannot be obtained, is absolutely necessary. Confession is unattainable when there is no contrition, but when there is none but an excommunicated person, or one whose powers have expired, or whose powers do not extend to absolution from the particular sins of which the penitent is guilty, or one who is justly suspected of having betrayed the secrets of confession, or who requires an interpreter, or when it is impossible to go to confession without manifest inconvenience from distance, badness of the road, inclemency of the season, or the murmur of the congregation impatient for mass. Even if any of these reasons can be pleaded, no unconfessed priest ought to give the holy communion to a penitent in danger of death, or through fear that a sick person may die without receiving the eucharist, or to avoid scandal when a congregation is sitting, or to finish a mass in which another priest has been accidentally interrupted. If a priest, during the celebration of mass, should recall to the memory of the people who it is, that he struck his head, even if he has been excommunicated or suspended, or that the place in which he is celebrating it is interdicted, he must quit the altar, unless he has already consecrated the host; and even if he has done so, or any fear of scandal induces him to proceed (as it is morally impossible but that some such fear must arise), he must perform an act of contrition, and make a firm resolution to confess, if in his power, on the very same day. No priest, without committing venial or perhaps mortal sin, can celebrate mass before he has recited salutatins andlaus, unless from the necessity of administering the eucharist to the dying, or of excusing such a one during the night, from pressure of confessions on a holiday, or to quiet murmurs among the congregation. It is a mortal sin for a priest intending to say mass to taste food, drink, or medicine after the preceding midnight. Even an involuntary transgression of such rules is a mortal sin; so that a priest offended in that degree if he celebrates mass after having been forced to eat or drink the smallest morsel or drop while the hour of midnight is striking, or a single moment afterwards. The exceptions are—1. To save the prostration, the moment of death, the all-consuming passion of the host, and there be no one else by who can otherwise prevent it, a priest, although not fasting, may swallow it without sin. 2. When a priest has so far proceeded in mass that he cannot stop, as when water has been accidentally put into the chalice instead of wine, and he does not perceive it till he has swallowed it, or when he recollects after consecration that he is not fasting. 3. When, after having performed the lauda, he perceives any scattered fragments of hosts, provided he be still at the altar, these he may eat. 4. To prevent scandal, such as a suspicion that he had committed a crime the night before. 5. To administer the eucharist. 6. To finish a mass commenced by another priest, and accidentally interrupted. 7. When he is dispensed. It is very probably a mortal sin, by authorities, to celebrate mass before dawn. So also the mass must not be celebrated after noon, and never, unless for the dying, on Good Friday. It is a mortal sin to celebrate mass without the necessary vestments and ornaments, or with unsecrected vestments, etc., unless in cases of the uttermost necessity. These vestments lose their consecration if any portion has been torn or cut out of them. However, if they are repaired before absolute disjunction, even if it be by a downright patch. No worn-out consecrated vestment should be applied to any other purpose; but it should be buried, and the ashes thrown in some place in which they will not be trampled on. But, on the other hand, with a very wise distinction, the precocious mass, which is one of the most solemn and important services of the Church, is not expressly prohibited to sacred purposes, after having been passed through the fire, which changes their very nature by fusion. No dispensation has ever yet been granted by any pope to qualify the rigid precept enjoining the necessity of an altar for masses; and this must have been consecrated by a bishop, not by a simple priest, unless through dispensation from the holy father himself. Three napkins are strictly necessary; two may suffice if such be the common usage of the country—one in very urgent cases; and even that, provided it be whole and clean, may be unsullied. But those tapes of any account be dispensed with, even to secure the receipt of the exuvium by a dying man. Mass must stop if the taper be extinguished and another cannot be obtained. On that account a lamp should be kept burning day and night before every altar on which the host is deposited; and those to whom the care of this lamp appertains commit a mortal sin if they neglect it for one whole day. In no case must a woman be allowed to assist a priest at the altar. Certain prevalent superstitions during the celebration of mass are forbidden—such as picking up fragments of the sacred Host, consecrated by the priest. On Sundays only, the Mass of the Passion is celebrated; on other days, the boxwood consecrated on that day, infusing it for three quarters of an hour, neither more nor less, in spring water, and drinking the water as a cure for the colic; keeping the mouth open during the sancus in the mass for the dead, as a charm against mad dogs; writing the sancus on a piece of virgin parchment, and wearing it as an amulet; saying mass for twenty Fridays running as a security against dying without confession, contrition, full satisfaction, and communion, and in order to obtain admission into heaven thirty days after death; ordering the mass of the Holy Ghost to be said in certain churches by way of divination. If a fly or a spider fall into the cup before consecration, a fresh cup should be provided; if after consecration, it should be swallowed, that if can be done without repugnance or danger, otherwise it should be removed, washed with wine, burned after mass, and its ashes thrown into the sacristy. There are some nice precautions to be observed in case of the accidental fall of a host among the clothes of a female communicant; if the wafier fall on a napkin, it suffices that the napkin be washed by a subdeacon or deacon by no means consecrated; if a single drop of wine, the office must be performed by a priest. In the celebration of the mass the priest wears peculiar vestments, five in number—two of linen, called “amice” and “albs;” and three of silk or precious stuffs, called “maniple,” “stole,” and “chasuble,” the albs being girt with a cincture of silk or satin silk or velvet. Too, of these vestments varies with the occasion, five colors being employed on different occasions—white, red, green, purple or violet, and black; and they are often richly embroidered with silk or thread of the precious metals, and occasionally with ermine in stripes. The priest is only allowed to celebrate the mass fasting, and, unless by special dispensation, is only permitted to offer it once in the day, except on Christmas day, when three masses may be celebrated. In the Greek and Oriental churches, the Eucharistic service, called in Greek Τελειωτής Λειτουργία (The Divine Liturgy), differs in the order of its parts, in the wording of most of its prayers, and in its accompanying ceremonial, from the mass of the Latin Church [see Liturgy]; but the only differences which have any importance as bearing on the question of its being a Mass have to do with its being a re-sacrament, or re-sacralized, which is called a Liturgy. The Holy Communion was celebrated at first at night, or, as Pliny says, before daybreak, and Tertullian calls the meeting the Night Convocation, or that before light. But in time the Church prescribed the mass to be said in tierce of festivals, but of the Lenten and of the Eastern and Western Easts at sexta; in Lent and on fasts at none, or 8 P.M. In the Middle Ages the nightly celebrations were permitted on Christmas eve, on Easter eve, on St. John's Eve, and on All Saints' Day. In France, on Ember weeks, when ordinations were held; and at Easter and Pentecost on the hallowing of the candle. In 1i488 archbishop Bourchier, from regard to his infirmity, received permission to celebrate in the afternoon. Belith says that “it was daily of old, and even on Sundays, if none of those of Holy Trinity, Charity, Wisdom, the Holy Ghost, Angels, Holy Cross, and St. Mary, and that at Rome. In the province of Ravenna the mass of Easter eve was not said until after midnight. He adds that the Greek Church excommunicated all who failed to partake of the Eucharist on the Sundays. See LEV.; Gen. 4:15.

Mass Penny, a conventional name for the offering made by a chief mourner at a funeral.

Mass Priests, mercenaries hired at a certain sum, who undertook an immediate number of annals or trelents, and were unable to say them, and sold them to be offered by others. This abuse was forbidden in 1286 by archbishop Edmund's Constitutions (2). In 1360 the mass priest was the secular, and the minister priest the conventual, and this is the earliest meaning of the term.

Ma'ssa (Heb. Massah', מַסָּה, a lifting up, as often; Sept. Massi), one of the sons of Ithmael (B.C. post 2061), who became the progenitor of an Arabian clan (Gen. xxvi, 14; 1 Chron. i, 39). The tribe is usually, and not improbably, compared with the Masa' (Mas-sa'ow, Ptol. v, 19, 2), inhabiting the Arabian desert towards BABYLONIA, doubtless the same as the Massa', a nomad tribe of Mesopotamia (Plyn, H. viii, 30). This would confirm Forster's theory that the twelve sons of Ishmael peopled the west of the Arabian peninsula (Geog. of Arabia, i, 284). As Duhm is named in connection with Seir (Isa. xxi, 11), there is some foundation for the opinion that Massa was a kingdom of considerable size, possibly reigned over by king LEMUEL (Prov. xxx, 1, מַסָּה, "the prophecy"). See LEMUEL. Hitzig arbitrarily locates Duhmah in wady el-Kora, among the ruins of the south of Asahel, and then places Massah between it and Mount Seir (Zeller's Jahrbuch, 1844, p. 288). See DUMAH.

Massiarius, a chamberlain of the massa communis, which was the common fund of a cathedral.

Masuri (Masuri v. v. 'Asuray), given (1 Esdr. ix, 22) in place of the Masseriai (q. v.) of the Heb. Estra (x, 22).

Massie, James William, D.D., LL.D., a minister of the English Independents, for some time engaged in the ministry, was born in Ireland in 1799. He was educated for the ministry by Dr. Bogue, and went out as a missionary to India. After laboring there a few years he returned to Great Britain, was pastor for a time at Perth, Scotland, and subsequently at Dublin, Ireland, and Salford, England, from which latter place he moved to London, to act as secretary of the Home Missionary Society. Deeply interested in all the public movements of the day, he took a prominent part in the anti-slavery movement, and was an active member of the Union and Emancipation societies formed during the latter part of the last century. He visited this country several times, and was twice delegated from the Independents to our Congregationalists and Presbyterians. He died at Kingston, Ireland, May 8, 1869. Dr. Massie was the author of several works, among which were Continental India (1815, 2 vols. 8vo; 1840, 2 vols. 8vo); Theologia Palestina, illustrating the History (2 vols. 8vo).—The Nonconformist's Plea for Freedom of Education (1817).—The Evangelical Alliance, its Origin and Development (1817).—Liberty of Conscience illustrated, etc. (1847).—Social Improvement among the Working Classes, affecting the entire community (1843).—The Contrast—War and Christianity: Martial Evils and their Remedy (1855).—Christ a Learner (1856).—Revivals in Ireland: Facts, Documents, and Correspondence (1850-60).—Revival Work (1860).—The American Crisis in Relation to the Anti-Slavery Cause (1862).—America, the Origin of her present Conflict; her Prospect for the Slave, and her Claim for Anti-slavery Sympathy, illustrated by Incidents of Travel during a Tour in the Summer of 1863 throughout the United States (1864) etc.

Massieu, Guillaume, a learned French writer, was born April 13, 1665, at Caen, where he finished his classical studies. At sixteen he began a course of philosophy at the college of the Jesuits. As he proved himself an apt pupil, the Jesuits desired to attach him to their college at Reims to teach rhetoric; resigning himself ultimately for the professorship of theology; but his studies were not congenial to his tastes, and his love for belles-lettres far exceeding that for theology, he forsook the society after he had actually joined it, and returned to the world. His remarkable gifts soon gained him friends; and he formed a work as an instructor. While at Paris he made the acquaintance of the abbé De Taurreil, whom he aided in translating the works of Demosthenes; through his influence also he became a pensioner of the Academy of Inscriptions in 1705, and in the same year was professor of the Greek language in the College of France, where he distinguished himself during the twelve years that he held the position by his profound knowledge and a pure and delicate taste. In 1714 the French Academy was opened to him. His oration delivered on this occasion is printed in the collections of the academy. Having translated Pindar, he naturally defended the writers of antiquity against the attacks of Perrault and of La Motte. The mémoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions (vol. i, ii, and iii) contain a great number of dissertations from the year 1701 to 1741. They are still read with pleasure, although they are more distinguished for delineation of finial than for profound erudition; the principal are, Les Grèces, Les Hoplites, Les Bouchers voleurs, Les Serments des Anciens, and a Périlable entre Romers et Platon. He also published a work on the Poésie François, à partir du onzième siècle. Massieu was one of the many distinguished literary men who are obliged all through life to maintain an incessant struggle with poverty. In his old age he suffered many bodily grievances, and two cataracts deprived him of his sight. He rendered valuable service to Biblical literature by his edition of the New Testament in Greek (printed at Paris, 1715, in 2 vols. 12mo). He died Sept. 26, 1722, at Paris. —Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, vol. xxxiv, s. v.

Massillians, a school of theologians in Southern Gaul, who, about the year 425, with John Cassian of Marseilleis (Massilia), a pupil of Chrysostom, at their head, asserted the necessity of the co-operation of divine grace and the human will, maintained that God works differently in different men, and rejected the doctrine of predestination as a vain speculation of mischievous tendency. They were called at first Massilians; afterwards, by scholastic writers, Semi-Pelagians; although, far from taking that name themselves, they rejected all connection with Pelagianism. Cassian recognised the universal corruption of human nature as a consequence of the first transgression, and recognised grace as well as justification in the sense of St. Augustine, whom he opposed on the question of election. See Chrysostom, On Chron.; Eilen, Theol. Dict.; Neander, Hist. of the Christian Religion and Church, ii. 261, 637-638; Schaff, Ch. Massillon, Jean Baptiste, prominent among the most eloquent divines of the French Roman Catholic Church, was born at Hières, in Provence, June 24, 1668. His father was a notary in moderate circumstances, and at first intended his son for the same profession, but subsequently allowed him to receive the instructions of the Fathers of the Oratory, and when eighteen years of age the young man joined that order. Soon after, forsaking the world altogether, he entered an abbey under the rule of La Trappe. Here, however, his talents attracted the attention of the bishop, afterwards cardinal de Noailles, who induced him to re-enter the Oratorian Church in which he had been educated. Yet his success was more the fruit of labor than of spontaneous genius, and his last efforts are much superior to his first. In 1696 he went to Paris as principal of the Seminary of St. Magloire, the renowned school of the Orators. Here, in the strict discipline, the harsh manners, he continued his career as a pulpit orator, the delivery of his "Ecclesiastical conferences" to ecclesiastical students affording him an opportunity of developing his talent. He admired the saintly eloquence of Bourdaloue, but chose for himself a different style, characterized by profound pathos, and an insight into the most secret motives of the human heart. He was shorty noted as the preacher of repentance and penitence; and it was declared by able contemporaries of his sermons that "they reach the heart, and produce their due effects with more certainty than the logic of Bourdaloue." He delivered the customary Lent sermons at Montpellier in 1698, and the following year at Paris. The latter were warmly applauded, and induced the king to invite Massillon to preach the "Advent" at court. On this occasion king Louis XIV paid him the highest compliment. He declaimed, "I have heard many talented preachers in my chapel before, and was much pleased with them; but every time I hear you, I feel much displesed with myself."

He again preached the Lent sermons before the court during the years 1701 to 1704, but afterwards he retired no farther to bear the miseries of the king: so fearless and plain-spoken a preacher would have been ill suited to the gallant and prolix gentle court of "the great king." At the death of Louis XIV, Massillon was requested to preach his funeral sermon; in other words, to pronounce a eulogy of this prince. This was an arduous task for the uncutlurée preacher; yet he undertook it, and in his discourse lauded the fame and piety of the king, yet deplored the disasters caused by the wars in consequence of the wars and the looseness of morals. Invited now to preach the Lent sermons before the young king, Louis XV, then but eight years of age, he took advantage of the occasion to censure the manners of the court; and morality, rather than the passion of Christ, formed the subject of his sermons. These are in number, and being short, to accommodate them to the youth of his royal hearer, are known under the name of Le petite carême. In 1717 Massillon became bishop of Clermont, and in 1719 member of the French Academy. Two years after he preached at St. Denis the funeral sermon of the duchess Elizabeth Charlotte of Orleans, daughter of the elector of Palatinate, and mother of the regent. This is considered one of the best of his six Orations Funèbres. Thereafter he remained quietly in his diocese, diligently fulfilling his pastoral duties until his death. Louis XV. was less than fifteen when he died; he did not wish to remain connected with the court, or in any way to take part in temporal affairs. His life was a model of Christian virtue and gentleness; he never disputed against any but infidels, and the Roman Catholics will not forgive him for his eulogy of Louis XIV. Better preserved this monarch for his efforts to destroy heresy, alluded to the massacre of St. Bartholomew's eve and pronounced it a bloody wrong, to be ever condemned in the name of religion as well as of humanity. Preaching from the fulness of his heart, he did not consider the rank of those he addressed, but spoke to them with nobleness of purpose in all simplicity and fervor. He carefully instructed the clergy of his diocese by holding numerous conferences and by synodal discourses. He died Sept. 18, 1742. D'Alembert pronounced his eulogy before the French Academy.

The fame of this celebrated man stands perhaps higher than that of any preacher who has preceded or followed him, by the number, variety, and excellence of his productions, and their eloquent and harmonious style. Grace, dignity, and force, and an inexhaustible fecundity of resources, particularly characterize his works. His Avent et Carême, consisting of six volumes, may be justly considered as so many "chef-d'oeuvres." His mode of delivery contributed not a little to his success. "We seem to behold him still in imagination," said they who had been fortunate enough to attend his discourses; "his delivered speech, that simple, that unaffected carriage, those eyes so humbly directed downwards, that unstudied gesture, that touching tone of voice, that look of a man fully impressed with the truths which he enforced, conveying the most brilliant instruction to the mind, and the most pathetic movements to the heart." The famous actor, Baron, after hearing him, told him to continue as he had begun. "You," said he, "have a manner of your own; leave the rules to others." At another time he said to an actor who was with him, "My friend, this is the true orator; we are mere players." The reader is said to have kept a volume of Massillon's sermons constantly on his desk, as a model of eloquence. He thought him "the preacher who best understood the world—whose eloquence savored of the courtier, the academician, the wit, and the philosopher." Massillon's works, consisting mainly of sermons, have been collected and published under the title (Euvres complètes (Paris, 1776, 15 vols. 12mo). In English we have, Sermons on the Duties of the Great, translated from the French; preached before Louis XV during his minority; by William Dodd, LL.D. (Lond. 1776, 2d ed. 1809); Sermons, selected and translated by William Dickson (Lond. 1826, 8vo):—Charges, with two Essays, translated by Theophilus St. John (the Rev. S. MASSON, John, a minister of the Reformed Church, who was a native of France, whence he emigrated to England after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He returned to Holland, and assisted in a religious journal entitled Histoire Critique de la République de Lettres from 1712 to 1721. He also wrote Lives of Horace, Ovid, and Pliny the Younger, in Latin; and Histoire de Pierre Hugel et de ses Oeuvres (12mo). He died in England about 1760.

MASSON, Philip, relative of the preceding, who assisted in the same journal, and was also the author of a critical dissertation designed to show the utility of the Chinese language in explaining various passages of the Old Testament.

MASSON, Samuel, brother of John, was pastor of the English Church at Dort, and conductor of the above journal.

MASSuet, Révé, a French Benedictine monk of the Congregation of St. Maur, was born at St. Ouen, in Normandy, in 1665. He studied philosophy and theology in different Benedictine convents; was made licentiate juris at Caen; and came to the abbey of St. Germain des Prés, at Paris, in 1708. Here he commenced his scientific labors, which secured him a distinguished place in that learned congregation. After the death of Renard, Massuet was interrupted with the continuation of the annals of the order, and he furnished the fifth volume. The principal work from his pen is an edition of the works of Irenaeus, published under the title Simplici Irenaei... (Paris, 1710, fol.); considered as having been the best edition of this Church father that had appeared up to Massuet's time. He prefaced the works of Irenaeus by three dissertations, which give good proof of the editor's penetration and judgment. In the first dissertation the person, character, and condition of Irenaeus are considered, setting forth particularly the writings and heresies he encountered; in the second, the life, actions, martyrdom, and writings of this saint are treated of; and in the third his sentiments and doctrines are reviewed. Massuet traveled with the monks in the Jansenist part of France. Having undertaken to defend the edition of the works of St. Augustine against the attacks of the Jesuit Langlois, he wrote Lettre d'un Ecclesiastique au R. P. E. L. sur celle qu'il a écrite aux R. P. Bénédictins de la Cong. de Saint-Maur (Osnabruck, 1692). He is also the author of a Lettre a M. l'Enquéte de Bretonne, sur son academe du 5 Mai 1707 (La Haye, 1708, 12mo), and a book entitled Aquitanum Graecum, in which he defends the opinions of his order on grace and free agency, but which was never published. He died at Paris, Jan. 11, 1716. See Hist. Litt. de la Cong. de St. Maur, p. 372; Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, xxxiv, 217; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. ix, 145.

MAST is the rendering in the Auth. Ver. of two Heb. words: מַעֲשׂ (chibbel, so called from the ropes and stays with which it is fastened), occurs only in Prov. xxiii, 34, "Thou (that Artiest long at the wine) shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of the mast (Sept. וַעֲשָׂר כְּעֻפָּנוֹ כְּעָל רָגָע, Vulg. longissimo gubernatis amans clano), doubtless correctly as referring to an intoxicated sailor falling asleep at the mast-head in a storm at sea. אֲמֵנָּה (Shosan, prob. l. אָמְנָה, a pine-tree). the mast of a ship (Isa. xxiii, 28; Ezek. xxvii, 5; Sept. ieroc Vulg. mala, see note on p. 274) was a real pole set up on mountains for an ensign (Isa. xxx, 17; Sept. ierou Vulg. mal-aus, Auth. Ver. "beacon"). Ancient vessels had often two or three masts (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. a.

Master is the rendering in the A. V. of the following Heb. and Greek words: τάξις, adom, εὐγιον, prop-perly lord, as usually rendered; βασιλεύς, an owner, hence master in the prevalent sense, διοικητής; also τάξις, rob, great or chief, usually in combination; κατά σαρ, prince or captain, ἵππωρτος; finally διοικάνος, teacher. On "masters of assemblies" (Eccl. xii, 11), see Assembly. For master of the feast, see ARCHITECTU-RIST.

MASTERY, in a Christian point of view, is a person who has servants under him; a ruler or instructor.
The duties of masters relate, 1. To the civil concerns of the family. They are to arrange the several businesses required of servants; to give particular instructions for what is to be done, and how it is to be done; to take care that no more is required of servants than they are equal to; to be gentle in their deportment towards them; not to reprove them when they do wrong, to commiserate them when they do right; to make them an adequate recompense for their services, as to protection, maintenance, and wages, and character. 2. As to the morals of servants.
Masters must look well to their servants' characters before they hire them; instruct them in the principles and conform them in the habits of virtue; watch over their moral, and set them good examples. 3. As to their religious interests. They should instruct them in the knowledge of divine things (Gen. xiv, 14; xviii, 19), pray with them and for them (Josh. xxiv, 15); allow them time and leisure for religious services, etc. (Eph. v, 9). See Stennett, On Domestic Duties, ser. 8; Palev-off, Manual of Moral Philosophy, i, 233, 293; Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, i, 150, 158; Duddridge's Lectures, ii, Masters of the Church, a name given (1) to the learned clergy who sat as advisers of the bishops in syn-obis; (2) also to the residuaryists in a minister, as master of the laymen, or the head of the choralists, master of the common hall, callifactory, or parlor; master of converts, the superintendent of lay-brothers; the master of the novices, always an elderly monk; master of the song-school, master of the shrine, masters of the order or custodes, the great officers of the monastery.

Master, Caspar Anton von, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Bonn, Germany, March 3, 1766.
He became a canon at Augsburg in 1786, and was ordained to the priesthood, and appointed preacher at the cathedral of Augsburg, three years later. After filling several subordinate positions, he was made privy-coun-ciller to the king of Bavaria in 1806. He received the degree of master of philosophy in 1784, doctor of laws in 1786, doctor of divinity in 1790, and was admitted as an honorary member to several academies and learned societies. His published works embrace De veterum Bipinarum statu cyclic et ecclesiasticum commentario historico (Bonn, 1784);—A Historical and Geographical Description of the Archibishopric of Cologne:—On the neg-atives Character of Religious Principle among the Modern French,—A Sketch of Borrowed, Archbishop of Milan and Cologne in the Roman Church.—The Passion-week, according to the Ritual of the Roman Church:—An Essay on Chorals and Hymns for the Church:—Several Collections of Hymns, and of Ancient and Modern Tunes: —A number of Sermons, and of miscellaneous Speeches in German and Latin. He served for a time as editor of Folters' Literaturzeitung, for a short time was a Roman Catholic faith, and was noted for his pointed and satirical style. The year of his death, which occurred at Munich, is not exactly known; it is supposed to have been 1828. —Wetzer und Welte, Kirchen-Lex. vi, 271.

Mastic (στικτής), Vulg. lenticula, A. Ver. "masticktree" occurs but once, and that in the Apocalypse (San-san, v, 54), where there is a happy play upon the word.
"Under what tree sawest thou them? ... under a mastic-tree (στικτής στυγνών)." And Daniel said . . . the angel of God hath received the sentence of God to cut thee in two (στικτής καὶ μισοῦ)." This is unfortunately lost in our version; but it is preserved by the Vulgate, "sub schino ... sciadet te;" and by Luther, "Linde ... findet." A similar play occurs in ver. 58, 59, between στικτής and πωροσ στ. For the bearing of these and similar characteristics on the date and origin of the book, see supra.

There is no doubt that the Greek word is correctly rendered, as is evident from the description of it by Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. i, § 2, 4, § 7, etc.), Pliny (N. H. iii, 36; xxiv, 26), Dioscorides (i, 90), and other writers. Herodotus (i, 177) compares the fruit of the lotus (the Rhamus lotus, Linn., not the Egyptian Nelumbum speciosum) in size with the mastic berry, and Balbus (§, 5) says its leaves are browsed by goats.
The fragrant resin known in the arts as "mastic," and which is obtained by incisions made in the trunk in the month of August, is the produce of this tree, whose scientific name is Pistacia lenticulosa. It is used with us to strengthen the teeth and gums, and was so applied by the ancients, by whom it was much prized on this account, and for its many supposed medicinal virtues. Lucian (Leniad, 12) uses the term στικτής στυγνών of one who chews mastic wood in order to whiten his teeth.
Mastic (Στ. xiv, 22) recommends a mastic toothpick (den-ticalipsium). Pliny (xxiv, 7) speaks of the leaves of this tree being rubbed on the teeth for toothache. Di-scorides (i, 90) says the resin is often mixed with other materials and used as tooth-powder, and that, if chewed, it imparts a sweet odor to the breath. It is from this use as chewing-gum that we have the derivation of mastic, from ἀρίστης, the gum of the εὐχιον, and μα-ταξ, πωροσ, μισοῦν, "to chew," "to masticate."

Both Pliny and Dioscorides state that the best mastic comes from Chios, and to this day the Arabs prefer that which is imported from that island (comp. Niebuhr, Tournemont (Fougges, ii, 58-61, transd. 1741) has given a full and very interesting account of the Lentisks or Mastic plants of Scio (Chios): he says that "the towns of the island are distinguished into three classes, those del Campo, those of Apanomeria, and those where they plant Lentisk-trees, whence the mastic in tears is produced." Tournemont enumerates several lentisk-tree villages. Of the trees he says, "These trees are very wide spread and circular, ten or twelve feet tall, consisting of several branchy stalks which in time grow crooked. The biggest trunks are a foot diameter, covered with a bark, grayish, rugged, chapt... the leaves are disposed in three or four couples on each side, about an inch long, narrow at the beginning, pointed at their exception, the mode in which the mastie. From the junctures of the leaves grow flowers in bunches like grapes; the fruit, too, grows like bunches of grapes, in each berry whereof is contained a white kernel. These trees blow in May; the fruit does not ripen but in autumn and winter. This writer gives the following description of the mode in which the mastie is procured. "They begin to make incisions in these trees in Scio the first of August, cutting the bark crosways with huge knives, without touching the younger branches; next day the nutritious juice distils in small teats, which by little and little form the mastic grains; they harden on the ground, and are carefully swept up from under the trees. The height of the crop is about the middle of August, if it be dry, serene weather, but if it be rainy the teats are all lost. Likewise towards the end of September the same incisions furnish mastic, but in lesser quantities." Behind is the uses to which reference has been made above, the people of Scio put grains of this resin in perfumes, and in their bread before it goes to the oven. Mastic is one of the most important products of the East, being extensively used in the preparation of perfumes, as juniper berries are with us, as a sweetmeat, as a masticatory for preserving the gums and teeth, as an antispasmodic in medicine, and as an ingredient in varnishes. The hardened mastic, in the form of roundish straw-colored teats, is much chewed by Turkish women. It consists of resin, with a minute portion of volatile oil. The Greek writers occasionally use the word ἕλασις for an entirely different plant, viz. the Squill (Scilla maritima) (see Aristoph. Plut. 715; Sprengel, Flor. Hippoc. 41; Theophr. Hist. Plant. v, 6, § 10). The Pistacia lentiscus is common on the shores of the Mediterranean. According to Strain (Flor. Paed. No. 55); it has been observed at Joppa, both by Rauwolf and Pococke. The mastic-tree belongs to the natural order Acanthaceae.—Smith, s. v. See Tristram, Nat. Hist. of Bible, p. 362; Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. col. 1250; Belon, Observ. ii, 61.

Masudi, Abu'l-Habah (Ali ben-Husein benAli), one of the most celebrated Arabian savants, an early writer in the department of comparative religion, from the Musulman stand-point, was born, according to his own statement, at Bagdad in the 8t century of the Hege- ria, or the 9th of the Christian Era. He was the descendant of an illustrious family, who were among the early and devout followers of the Prophet of Mecca. Masudi was gifted with great talents, which he applied at an early age to learned pursuits. He gathered an immense stock of knowledge in all branches of science; and his learning was not mere book learning, but he improved it in his long travels through all parts of the East, Turkey, Eastern Russia, and Spain. In A.H. 803 he visited India, Ceylon, and the coast of China, where the Arabs had founded numerous small colonies; thence he went to Madagascar and Southern Arabia; thence through Persia to the Caspian; he also visited the Rumania in Southern Russia. In A.H. 314 he was in Palestine; from 832 to 834 in Syria and Egypt; and he says in 845, when he wrote his last book, the second edition of his Golden Meadows, he was in Egypt, and had been a long time absent from his native country, Irak. He says he travelled so far to the west (Morocco and Spain) that he forgot the east, and so far east that he forgot the west. Masudi died probably at Kahirah (Cairo), A.H. 845 (A.D. 956); and, since he visited India as early as A.H. 803, it is evident that those who say he died young are mistaken.

No Arabian writer is quoted so often, and spoken with so much universal admiration. The variety of subjects on which he wrote astonishes even the learned, and the philosopher is surprised to see this Arab of the Middle Age resolving questions which remained problems to Europeans for many centuries after him. Masudi knew not only the history of the Eastern nations, but also ancient history, and that of the Europeans of his time. He had thoroughly studied the different religions of mankind—Mohammedanism, Christianity, the doctrines of Zoroaster and Confucius, and the idolatry of barbarous nations. No Arabian writer can boast, like him, of learning at once profound and almost universal. Unfortunately, however, Masudi wanted method in arranging the prodigious number of facts which a rare memory never failed to supply him with while he was writing. He illustrates the history of the geography of the West with analogies or contrasts taken from China or Arabia; he avails himself of his knowledge of Christianity to elucidate the creeds of the different Mohammedan sects; and, while he informs the reader of the mysteries of the extreme North, he will at once forget his subject, and transfer him into the Desert of Sahara. For a list of his works, which are mostly extant only in MS., see the English Cyclopaedia, s. v.

Mater Dolorosa, or Lady of Sorrow, is the technical term given to such portraits of the Virgin Mary as represent her alone, weeping or holding the crown of thorns. "She appears alone," says Mrs. Jameson (Legends of the Madonnas, p. 86), "a seated or standing figure, often the head or half-length only, the hands clasped, the head bowed in sorrow, tears streaming from the heavy eyes, and the whole expression intensely mournful. The features are properly those of a woman in middle age; but in later times the sentiment of beauty predominated over that of the mother's agony, and I have seen the sublime Mater Dolorosa transformed into a merely beautiful and youthful maiden, with such an air of sentimental grief as might be felt for the loss of a sparrow. It is common also to represent the Virgin with a sword in her bosom, and even with seven swords, in allusion to the seven sorrows (Luke ii, 35)—a version of the allegorical prophecy which the Romanists have found quite profitable for the interests of the hierarchy. There are few Roman Catholic churches without this representation of Mary. See STABAT MATER.

Materialism may be defined as that system of philosophy which considers matter as the fundamental principle of all things, and consequently denies absolutely the independence and autonomy of the spirit. It Materialism is sometimes considered synonymous with Naturalism, but this is erroneous; for there is a difference between the notions of nature and matter. It is also called by some Sennism, which is more correct, yet only expresses one of the characteristics of the theory of materialism. In a more extended sense, the expression materialism is made to signify the whole of the practical results which have, and are continually being, drawn from the study of such philosophy, and whose final object, although sometimes restrained by considerations of prudence or expediency, is sensual enjoyment in its fullest sense.

Materialism, strictly viewed, is the doctrine that all spirit, so called, is material in its substance, and is subject to the same laws, as well as the material particles and the activity of material forces. Strictly construed, it is a psychological doctrine or theory; but, as it implies certain philosophical assumptions or principles, it makes a place for itself in the domain of speculative philosophy. Its assumptions and conclusions are also fundamental to theology. If its positions are tenable, theology is impossible. If the human soul is but another name for an aggregation of material particles, it cannot exist when those particles are surd. Although it is conceivable that those particles may be so moving as to constitute a body, the dissolution of the larger particles which constitute the body, yet this is too improbable to relieve the materialistic theory from the charge of being inconsistent with the possibility of a future life. The moral relations of the soul, therefore, require the introduction of an essential difference in the laws which govern matter and its activities, and these moral relations give to theology—a certain to Christian theology—all its interest. If the assumptions of materialism are correct, there can be no intelligent and personal Creator. Creation itself is conceivable, and therefore impossible.

A significant fact, which strikes one at first on the study of the history of materialism, is that it never appears as a power among the masses in the early stages of civilization. On the contrary, we find that in all nations a more or less perfect spiritual contemplation of nature forms the first step towards religious consciousness. This fact is a sufficient answer in itself to the assertion that materialism is the original and true form of human consciousness. On the other hand, we find materialism spreading among the masses in the nations which have submerged the contemplation of nature by the system of sublimation. It becomes, then, the premonitory sign of their downfall, being already an evidence of their moral and spiritual decay.

The materialistic theory was in some sense sanctioned by the Greek philosophers who refer the origin of all things—the spirit of man included—to some attenuated form of matter, as water, air, or fire. From these rude speculations philosophy emerged by successive efforts, till in the Socratic school the soul of man was held to be distinct in its essence from matter, to be superior to matter, and indestructible by the dissolution of the body. The Socratic school also emphasized the doctrine that mind has infused order into the universe. The Platonic philosophy enforced these doctrines with glowing appeals to the nobler sentiments, and embalmed them with a great variety of mythological representations. Aristotle, more cautious and exact in his statements, asserted for the higher forms of intellectual activity an essence distinct from matter. The philosophers of the Epicurean school were avowed materialists, they taught explicitly and earnestly the doctrine that what is called the soul is composed of atoms, and necessarily dissipated at death. The universe itself likewise consists of atoms, and all its phenomena are the results of fortuitous combinations of atoms. Sensation, intelligence, and desire are the effects of the action and reaction of the atoms within and the atoms without the body. These doctrines are elaborately set forth by the celebrated Lucretius (B.C. 95-44) in his poem De rerum natura. The Atomic Materialism of Epicurus, and the Imaginative and Rational Spiritualism of Plato and Aristotle, separated the Greek philosophers into two leading divisions, with various important subdivisions.

Among the Jews, the Sadducees denied that there was either angel or spirit, or existence after death; but there is no evidence that they supported these doctrines by any philosophical materialistic theories. The philosophy which grew from materialism. With the revival of learning and of the ancient philosophies, the Epicurean materialism found many adherents, against whose influence the pronounced materialism of Descartes furnished a positive and most efficient check. Hobbes was the opponent of Descartes, and all his attempts to defend the original philosophy and its activity are materialistic, reducing all spiritual phenomena to bodily motions. Spinoza made spiritual beings to be modes of the universal substance which is God—every spiritual operation being the necessary counterpart of some materialistic phenomenon. But the rise of the mechanical or new philosophy of nature, to which Descartes incidentally contributed, and which Sir Isaac Newton so triumphantly established, had no little influence in developing the materialism of modern philosophy. The speculations of Locke indirectly furthered this tendency, although with the dissipation of the larger particles which constitute the body, yet this is too improbable to relieve the materialistic theory from the charge of being inconsistent with the possibility of a future life. The moral relations of the soul, therefore, require the introduction of an essential difference in the laws which govern matter and its activities, and these moral relations give to theology—a certain to Christian theology—all its interest. If the assumptions of materialism are correct, there can be no intelligent and personal Creator. Creation itself is conceivable, and therefore impossible.

In more recent times, materialism has been both metaphorical and physiological. Metaphysical materialism has resulted in some cases by logical deduction, or, rather, a logical tendency, from the idealistic assumption that matter and spirit are identical. The argument which seeks to make matter and spirit one, lends plausibility to the conclusion that it is indifferent whether matter should be resolved into spirit, or spirit resolved into matter. The extreme idealism of some of the German schools has prepared the way for the materialism with which they would seem to have had the least possible sympathy. The real pantheism of Spinoza and the logical pantheism of Hegel have furnished axioms and a method, which have been applied in the service of materialism. It is in physiology, however, that modern materialism has found its most efficient ally. Physiology has renewed the previously-exploited doctrine of vibrations, which again has found confirmation in that view of the correlated activity of every agency of nature into some mode of motion. If heat, light, and electricity are but modes of motion, why not nervous activity? and if nervous activity, why not vital energy? and if vital energy, why not spiritual judgments and emotions? This argument has been urged with great earnestness and pertinacity by certain physiologists both of the German and English schools. Conspicuous among them are Carl Vogt, Physiologische Briefe für Gebildete; Köhler-Glaube und Wissenschaft, 1855; J. Molders, Psychologie, 1852; L. Krüdener, Leben, etc.; Louis Büchner, Kraft und Stoff (1855); Natur u. Geist, etc.; Haeckel, Natür- schaftspychologie; Uber die Entstehung und den Staatsum des Menschengeistes, etc. T. H. Huxley, On the External Sources of Life. edit. by J. H. H. Sterling. As regards Protoklos, etc., edit. 1860-72, and H. Maudsley, Physiological and Psychology of the Human Mind (Lond. and N.Y. 1867), approximate to the same opinions among the English. Alexander Bain (The Senses and the Intellect, Lond. 1853, 1864); The Emotions and the Will, 2d ed. 1865; Mental and Moral Science, Lond. 1867) sympathizes with these tendencies, treating the soul in the main as though it were but a capacity in the nervous system for special functions which obey physiological laws. The doctrine of evolutionist is thus reduced to a necessary conception, which has been derived by the celebrated Darwin from a limited cycle of physiological facts, and extended by him to explain the production of all complex forms of being, inorganic and organic, is materialistic in its assumptions and its conclusions, even if neither of these and all the theories of its advocates. The metaphysical doctrine of development by successive processes of differentiation and integration, which has been hardened into an axiom by Herbert Spencer, and applied to the explanation of all forms of being, and even of the primordial truths of metaphysical science itself, can lead to no other than a materialistic psychology. The doctrine of unconscious cerebration, which is taught more or less explicitly by Dr. W. B. Carpenter and other eminent physiologists, though not necessarily involving the materialistic hypothesis, is yet materialistic in its tendencies and associations. The positive school of Comte teaches directly that the brain is the only substance of the soul, and that what are usually called spiritual activities are simply biological phenomena. J. S. Mill, though not avowedly a materialist, follows Hume in reducing matter and mind to idealistic formulae, which, as conceived by him, are not distinguishable from physiological phenomena or products.

According to the materialistic philosophy, as developed by whatever writer, but especially in its once popular form of Epicureanism, the perception of our senses is only a reflex action of the human organism. The remembrance of many previous perceptions of the same nature gives rise to general views, and the comparison of these to judgments. Ethica are thus but the doctrine of happiness, and its highest maxim: Seek Joy, avoid pain! Yet Epicurus sought to give a certain moral tendency to this fundamental axiom of his system, by declaring every pleasure objectionable which is followed by a greater unpleasantness, and every pain is desirable which is followed by a greater pleasure; according to which principle freedom from care and insensibility become the chief aim of man. See Lutteroth, Neureutestamentliche Lexebegräbn (Mainz, 1852), i, 38-58; H. Ritter, Gesch. d. Philosophie; Fries, Gesch. d. Philosophie, vol. i. See EPICUREAN PHILOSOPHY. In Boston a paper entitled The Investigator, is now published in the interests of materialism. The German-Americans are also quite active in this work. They have two papers—the Pioneer (Boston) and the Neue Zeit (New York). The editor of the former, Carl Heinen, is frequently before the public all over the country to press the interests of his abominable work. Edward Feinhold, of New York, published a pamphlet entitled Naturwissenschaft gegen Philosophie (New York, Schmidt, 1871, 2dmo) to controvert Hurtmann's Philosophy of the Unknown.

The defects of the materialistic hypothesis are manifold. It considers only the similarities, and overlooks the differences of two classes of actual phenomena. Though its overweening desire of unity, it becomes one-sided and imperfect in all its conceptions and conclusions, and fails to do justice to the peculiarities of spiritual experiences, which are as real as the more obtrusive and palpable ones of sense. Moreover, it fails to discern that the intellectual and moral function of the soul is not only have a right to be recognised in their full import, but that they have a certain supremacy and authority over all others, inasmuch as the agent which knows must furnish the principles and axioms which all science assumes and on which all science must rest. If the soul is only a function of matter, then to know one is of the functions of matter. It follows that the authority of knowledge may be as changeable and uncertain as the changes of form, the varieties of motion, the manifold chemical combinations, or the more or less complex developments of which matter is capable. The materialistic hypothesis not only overlooks and does injustice to the facts which are open to common apprehension, but is a suicidal theory, which destroys, by its own positions and its method, the very foundations on which its own coherence stand—cf. the scientific theory of materialism itself. Mather, Alexander, one of Mr. Wesley's most useful preachers, was born at Brechin, North Britain, in Feb. 1738. When a boy he had some instruction at a Latin school, and afterwards ran away with the rebels, and was in the battle of Culloden. On account of this he was treated with great harshness, was finally discharged, and deprived of all educational advantages. In 1751 he left home and went to Perth, and in 1752 to London, to earn his living as a mechanic. Here, in 1758, he married. He had been religiously inclined from boyhood, and had long followed his convictions with great faith and perseverance, and in the means of grace; finally converted under a sermon of John Wesley's, April 14, 1754, he soon became very useful as a band and class leader and local preacher. In 1757 he began itinerating under Mr. Wesley, and with Mather, Cotton, a very celebrated American divine of colonial days, the most noted of the Mather family, the grandson of Richard Mather and son of Increase, is one of the trio spoken of in the old doggerel tombstone inscription:

"Under this stone lies Richard Mather, Who had a son greater than his father,
And a grandam greater than either."

Cotton Mather was born at Boston Feb. 12, 1662-63. His early education he received under the eye of his father, and as a lad of twelve he entered at Harvard. At this time he is spoken of as a fine classical scholar. Four years afterwards, when he graduated, Dr. Oakes, the president, addressed him in glowing terms his past conduct and attainments, and predicting a glorious future. But it was not in worldly knowledge only that he was so advanced a student. The descendant of a line of ministers, he seemed to be himself, by his aptness in learning and early seriousness, specially marked out for the ministry. When only in his fourteenth year, Cotton Mather's mind had begun to be greatly exercised with religious thoughts. He at this time laid down a system of rigid fidelity, which he continued to practice monthly or weekly, as a fast, the days of fasting being the result of his life, of strict and regular self-examination, and of prolonged times of prayer, to which he afterwards added frequent nightly vigils. It is necessary to mention these things in order to understand some points in his character and conduct in future years. For awhile he was diverted from his purpose of becoming a minister by a growing impediment in his speech, and he began to study medicine. But being shown how by a "dilated deliberation" of speech he might avoid stammering, he returned to his theological studies, and commenced preaching when scarcely sixteen years of age. In 1681, the year of his father's congregation, the largest in Boston, to become assistant pastor, and in January, 1682, was settled as a colleague of his father. His labors in the ministry were characterized by great zeal and earnestness, and he soon came to be considered a prodigy of learning and ability. He was not only a most attentive pastor, but a superior preacher, and withal found time for a large amount of literary labors: he published three hundred and eighty-two distinct works, most of them of course small, consisting, besides his sermons, of devotional works, and other contributions to practical religion. In addition to all these labors he was engaged in the accumulation of material for greater works. Nor did he any more than his father shrink from the political duties which the ministerial office had been supposed to cast upon those who held it. "New "England," he wrote, "being a country whose interests are remarkably inwrought in ecclesiastical circumstances, ministers ought to concern themselves in politics." When, therefore, his father was sent to England to seek relief from the arbitrary proceedings of Charles II and James II, Cotton Mather was ordered to remain with the temporal affairs of the church, as leader of the citizens, and on their seizing and imprisoning the obnoxious governor, he drew up their declaration justifying that extreme measure.

The freedom of thought in politics, however, made no inroads into the Church of England, and fearing a falling away from the purity of the old faith, and fancying that he saw the evil one busy in turning away the hearts of the people, he was led to a life of asceticism, which involved him in religious controversies.

The daughter of one Goodwin, a respectable mechanic of Boston, accused a laundress of having stolen some of the family linen. The mother of the suspected person, an Irish emigrant, expostulated in no very gentle terms against such a charge, and, as was averred, not content with abuse, cast a spell over the accuser. The younger children soon began to suffer similarly, and the poor Irishwoman was denounced as a witch. Cotton Mather, fearing that the excesses of superstition would have a still more derogatory effect on the religious life of the colonists, determined to investigate this case of witchcraft. He took the eldest girl, then about sixteen years old, into his house; and in a very short time she confessed, with great contrition, that she was really under the influence of an evil spirit. The poor Irishwoman was tried, condemned, and executed; and Mather printed a relation of the circumstances, and an account of such influences in other places. The book, which was published with the recommendation of all the ministers of Boston and Charlestown, was entitled Memorables Provincials relating to Witchcraft and Possessions, with Discoveries and Appendices (London and Boston, 1699, 8vo; 2nd ed. 1719, 12mo; Edinb. 1697, 12mo). Both in the colony and in England the book met with little success; but in the opinion of many it had the honor to be introduced by the eminent divine, Dr. Richard Baxter, who wrote a preface for the work, and argued that it was "sufficient to convince all but the most obstinate Sadducees." The question here arises whether or not Cotton Mather was himself a believer in witchcraft, and whether or not he wrote the book simply to explode the "delusion" which was fast making converts, especially in and about Massachusetts.

Even to our day this question has not been satisfactorily solved.

Mr. Bancroft, our great historian, has treated Cotton Mather as guilty of having provoked the excitement known as the "Saleme witchcraft delusion." Within the last few years, however, one of our ablest writers, Mr. Poole, formerly librarian of the "Boston Library," has come forward to clear Cotton Mather of any and all imputations, holding that "the opportune" of what is generally charged against Mr. Mather "is the truth." "His gentler treatment," we are told, "cured and Christianized them [the believers of witchcraft]." He opposed, with his father and the rest of the clergy—with but three exceptions of the court—he opposed every possessed person guilty, the ministry holding that the devil might enter innocent persons, and that the fact of their improper conduct was no ground for adjudging them criminals. He also opposed taking spectral testimony, or the words of a spectre as proved or makes it quite credible that it was Mather and not Mr. Willard who wrote the most vigorous tract of the times against the Salem movements, and who made the Boston and Salem treatment noted for their difference even at that day. See Salem; Witchcraft." MATHER 878

There can hardly be any question about the fact that Cotton Mather is, in a measure at least, responsible for the blood that was shed at Salem between 1692 and 1693. But it is fully acknowledged that he never denied his connection with his persecutors, and that he never did anything to mitigate their severity; because of his fanatical treatment of the deluded Salemites. We need only remember that even the very men who built up the Church of Protestantism in the 18th century were entirely free from mistakes, and failed in a manner very much like their good Puritan descendant. Sublimely ridiculous, then, appears the judgment pronounced by a writer in a late number of Zion's Herald (May 20, 1809): "At twenty-three he was in the midst of this terrific panic of mortal fear and its fatal consequences; at this impose, he bore himself with such manly courage, prudence, and coolness that he was the only minister, and even the only person, except his father, who may have been said to have stood solidly on his feet, and who won from his contemporary the praise that 'had his honors been heard to and followed, these troubles would never have grown unto that height which they now have.'" The quotation is from Pook's article in the North American Review of April, 1809. While we would not forget the merits of our ancestors, but would rather extol them and laud them, we cannot but be blind to their faults and mistakes. Salem witchcraft persecution certainly must not find an advocate in the present century, surely not at the expense of the truths of history. But to turn to the brighter side of Mather's life. Such was his delineating character, while acknowledging the failing we have felt constrained to condemn: "It was the great ambition of his whole life to do good. His heart was set upon it; he did not therefore content himself with merely embracing opportunities of doing good that occasionally offered themselves, but he very frequently set apart much time on purpose to devise good; and he seldom came into any company without having this directly in his view. It was constantly one of his first thoughts in the morning, What good may I do this day? And that he might more certainly attend to the various branches of so large and comprehensive a duty, he resolved this general question, What good shall I do? into several particulars, one of which he took into consideration while he was dressing himself every morning, and as soon as he came into his study he set down some brief hints of his meditations upon it. He was thus unfixed to any distinct time for each morning in the week. His question for the Lord's-day morning constantly was, What shall I do, as pastor of a Church, for the good of the flock under my care? Upon this he considered what subjects were most suitable and seasonable for him to preach on; what families of his flock were to be visited, and with what particular view; and how he might make his ministry still more acceptable and useful." He died Feb. 13, 1728.

Though many of Cotton Mather's productions are indeed but small volumes, as single Sermons, Essays, etc., yet there are several among them of a much larger size. As his Magnalia Christi Americana, or the Ecclesiastical History of New England from its first Planting in 1620 to 1698 (London, 1702, folio; Hartford, Conn., 1820, 2 vols. 8vo); his Christian Philosopher (London, 1721, 12mo); his Ratio Disciplinum Pratum Non-Anglorum; his Directions to a Candidate for the Ministry, a work which brought him as many letters of thanks as would fill a volume. Besides all these, the doctor left behind him several books in manuscript; one of which, viz. his Biblia Americana, or Illustrations of the Sacred Scriptures, was proposed for the press in three volumes; a work which brought him many letters of thanks as would fill a volume. Of these books, one appeared from the motto that he wrote on the outside of the catalogue which he kept of his own works, viz. John xv. 8, "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit." Dr. Mather was one of the most learned men America had produced. He doubtless possessed larger learning than any other minister of his time, but his mind was better adapted to acquire than to create. He lacked in strong judgment, in original genius, and in sustained power. He had no ability to generalize, no wide and penetrating vision. The most noted benefaction of his life to the country was introducing vaccination for small-pox, which proved a great blessing. Mather, Eleazer, a Puritan minister of New England, son of Richard, and brother of Increase Mather, was born at Dorchester May 18, 1657; graduated at Harvard in 1656; was ordained pastor of the Church at Northampton in 1661; and there died, July 24, 1699. He was a fine scholar, a sound thinker, and a devoted and evangelical minister. Many souls were converted through his labors, and his early death was lamented by all the churches.—Sherman, New England Divines, p. 107; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 159; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. a. v.

Mather, Increase, D.D., an eminent American divine, was born at Dorchester, Mass., June 21, 1669. His father, Richard Mather (q. v.), had emigrated from England and settled in Boston. In early childhood Increase exhibited signs of unusual mental endowments; he entered Harvard College at the age of twelve, and graduated with the class of 1656. Shortly after this he was converted, and determined to devote his life to the ministry. In the year following that of his graduation he went to Dublin, where his brother was preaching. There he entered Trinity College, and, after securing the degree of M.A., was chosen a fellow of the college, an honor, however, which he declined. The climate of Ireland being unfavorable to his health, he removed to England, and preached there for a while. At the time of the Restoration he was residing in the island of Guernsey, as chaplain to an English regiment; but when, as a commissioned officer, he was required to sign a paper declaring "that the times then were and would be happy," he refused to do it, and was dismissed. Soon after this he returned to his native country, and was called and settled as pastor of the North Church in Boston. In this city he married, in 1662, a daughter of the Rev. John Cotton, and from this marriage sprang Cotton's five sons, of the most celebrated of whose was Increase. In the controversy as to "who are the legitimate subjects of baptism," he opposed his father, and likewise the decision of the synod of 1662, until caused to change his views by the arguments of Mr. Mitchell, of Cambridge. Largely by his instrumentalities the government was induced to call the general synod of 1673 from the whole colony, for the purpose of "correcting the evils that had provoked God to send judgment on New England." The synod had its second session the following year, and Mr. Mather acted as moderator. At this meeting the Confession of Faith was adopted, and he became general face to face. On the death of President Oakes of Harvard University, Mather temporarily supplied the place. By the sudden death of the appointive, president Rogers, Mather was, in 1684, again called to the head of the college. This time he accepted the appointment and remained president for thirty-nine years. The trust of his pastoral. In 1692 he was presented with a diploma of doctor of divinity, "the first instance in which such a degree was conferred in British America." On the accession of Charles II Massachusetts was thrown into trouble. His majesty required full securities of the charter to his pleasure, on pain, in case of refusal, of having a quo warranto issued against it. To this op-prestation Mather was staunch in his opposition, and before an assembly in Boston dissuaded his countrymen from yielding their liberties tamely. As a result of their resistance, judgment was entered against the charter of the Massachusetts colony. About this time Charles died, and James II, being his successor, published his specious declaration for liberty of conscience.

This dissipated temporary relief, and Mather was delegated to convey to his majesty in England the grateful acknowledgment of the churches, and to sue for a further redress of their wrongs. James received him kindly, and promised him more than he ever granted. Mather remained, however, until the close of the revolution of 1688, which deposed James and placed William and Mary on the throne of England. After much diplomacy with the prince of Orange, a new charter was at length procured in lieu of the old one, and Mather himself was allowed the privilege of nominating the governor, lieutenant governor, and board of council. After four years thus spent among the nobility at Whitehall, Dr. Mather returned to Boston with the consciousness of having faithfully discharged his duty and rendered his country an important service. He found the Church in great excitement about witchcraft, which called forth his work entitled "Concerning Witchcraft." He retained his natural bodily and mental vigor until past his eightieth birthday. After this he endured great bodily and consequent mental derangements for four years, during all of which time his great burden seemed to be to bear suffering, but the patience of his inactivity to labor. At last, on Aug. 23, 1723, he died peacefully in the arms of his eldest son. His loss was deeply mourned by those for whom he had spent his long and laborious life. According to Sprague, "he was the last of more than twenty-two hundred ministers who had been ejected and silenced on the restoration of Charles II and on the Act of Uniformity." He was an industrious student, and published ninety-two separate works, most of which are now very scarce. A noted writer thus comments upon him in the North Amer. Rev. 1840 (July), p. 5: "Increase Mather not only stood most conspicuous among the scholars and divines of New England, as president of Harvard College and pastor of a church in Boston, but by his political influence was supposed at times to have controlled the administration of the government." He was a learned, earnest, and devoted man in whose piety was mingled profound and full of love. His sermons were elaborate and powerful, and many souls were converted by his labors. He studied earnestly for sixty years, and was regarded as the most learned American minister of his day. —Sherman, New Eng. Divines, vol. 57; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Mather, Moses, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Lyme, Connecticut, March 6, 1719; graduated at Yale College in 1739, and soon after was licensed to preach by the New London Association. In 1742 he commenced preaching in a Congregational church in Middletown, now Darien, Connecticut, and in 1744 was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church, and this position he held until his death in 1806. Dr. Mather was a fellow of Yale College from 1777 to 1790. He warmly espoused the cause of the Colonies in the Revolutionary War, and was twice taken by the British and Tories, carried to New York, and confined in the provost prison. He published a Reply to Dr. Bellamy on the Half-way Covenant: -Infant Baptism Defended (1759) -- A Sermon, entitled Divine Sovereignty displayed in the Death of Dr. Bellamy (1763) -- and was described as a most posthumous work, A Systematic View of Divinity (1813, 12mo). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 425, s. v.

Mather, Nathaniel, an English minister, a brother of Increase Mather, was born in Lancashire in 1680; graduated at Harvard College, 1647, and spent his ministerial labors in England and Holland. He died in 1697. He published Two Sermons (Oxon. 1660, 4to; Lond. 1718, 12mo) -- A Discussion on the Lawfulness of a Pastor's Officiating in Another Church: -- A True Sermon: -- and Sermons preached at Pinner's Hall and Lime Street (1701). "In his public discourses there was neither a lack of depth nor an inferiority of ecclesiastical excellence, while the dignity of his subjects surpassed the necessity of rhetorical embellishments." -- Calamy, Continuation of the Nonconformists' Memorial; Wilson, Dissenters; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth., s. v.

Mather, Richard, an Episcopalian and later a Puritan minister, was born at Lawtown, Lancashire, Eng., in 1566; was converted when a young man; spent two years at Oxford; entered the ministry in 1618, near Liverpool, and at the end of fifteen years of devoted and successful labor was suspended for nonconformity. He then emigrated to Massachusetts, and became pastor of a congregation at Dorchester. There he died, April 22, 1669. He was a sound and earnest preacher, not captivating, but solid, pious, and very useful. He was an active theologian, and a member of every synod in New England after his arrival. He was staidus, a good scholar, and a very able writer. Richard Mather emulated Eliot in the New England version of the Psalms, and furnished the synod of 1648 a model of Church Discipline. He published a discourse on the Church Covenant (1639), a treatise on Justification (1652), and an elaborate defense of the churches of New England. Mather, Samuel (1), brother of Increase Mather, was born in Lancashire, England, May 13, 1626; graduated at Harvard College in 1644, was for some time assistant pastor to Rev. Mr. Rogers, in Bowly, and was pastor of the North Church, Boston, in 1649. In 1660 he returned to England, and was appointed chaplain of Magdalen College, Oxford; preached in Scotland and Ireland; went to Dublin in 1655, and became senior fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, and minister of the Church of St. Nicholas. Soon after the Restoration he was suspended on a charge of sedition, but afterwards continued to preach to a small congregation privately. He died Oct. 29, 1671. Mr. Mather held the first rank as a preacher. He published Sermons and Tracts: -- Old Testament Explained and Improved (1654, 4to); rewritten by Caroline Fry, as Gospel of the Old Testament (1833, 1851) -- Life of Nathaniel Mather (1688). See Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog., s. v.; Darling; Cyclop. Bibliog., vol. ii, s. v.

Mather, Samuel (2), D.D., minister of the Trinitarian Congregational Church, son of Cotton Mather, was born in Boston, Oct. 30, 1706, graduated at Harvard College in 1723, having studied theology probably under the direction of his father; was licensed to preach, and in 1728 became colleague-pastor with the Rev. Mr. Gee, of the Second Church in Boston, and was ordained the same year. In 1741 much dissatisfaction was brought against him in this church, partly from the charge of looseness of doctrine, and also of improwetry of conduct, and he, with the smaller part of his membership, withdrew, and established a separate Church in Hanover Street, on the corner of North Bremen. The fact," says Robbins, in his History of the Church, "that the pious society of good character supported Mr. Mather, affords good reason to doubt whether the charges of improperity were well founded." He sustained his relation as pastor of Hanover Street Church until his death, June 27, 1783. Dr. Mather's Sermon on the Death of Cotton Mather (1729) -- Life of Cotton Mather (1729) -- An Essay concerning Gratitude (1732) -- Vita A. H. Mathesius, Johann, a German Protestant theologian, was a native of Saxony. He studied at Wittenberg in 1526, and was there for a while Luther's fellow learner. He was appointed rector of the Weimar school in 1532, pastor in 1545, and died in 1564. He had witnessed many abuses resulting from the misconception of the doctrine of salvation by grace: we learn from him that there were parties in the Church who claimed, on the strength of it, that faith alone was necessary, and that works were of no importance whatever, so that it did not matter whether the actions of believers were good or bad. Mathesius strongly opposed such heretical views, and thus became involved in controversies which embittered the end of his life. He is especially known for seventeen sermons on the doctrine, the confession, and the death of Luther (Nuremberg, 1588; in recent times the biographical portions were collected and published under the title, J. Mathesius, d. Leben d. Dr. Martin Luthcr, mit einer Vorrede von G. H. v. Schubert, Stuttgart, 1859). He wrote also various sermons on the law of justification, a catechism, and several hymns. His biography was published by Balthasar Mathesius in 1705. Mathëtës (Μαθηταί, disciples) is one of the names by which the early followers of our Lord were known among their contemporaries. All the common appellations of the professors of the Christian religion which occur in the N. T. were expressive of certain dispositions and privileges belonging to the sincere professor of the Gospel. See CHRISTIANS; DISCIPLE.

Mathew, Father Thorhall's, the celebrated apostle of temperance, a Catholic priest, was born in the county of Tipperary, Ireland, Oct. 10, 1790; was educated at the Roman Catholic seminary in Maynooth; was appointed, after hisordination, to a missionary charge at Cork, was subsequently attached to a mission on the model of that of St. Vincent de Paul. About 1838 he became president of a temperance society, and in a few months administered the pledge to 150,000 persons in Cork alone. He afterwards visited different parts of Ireland, the cities of London, Manchester, and Liverpool, and the United States of America, and was everywhere received with enthusiasm. For these eminent services in the cause of religion and morality, queen Victoria bestowed upon father Mathew an annuity of £200. He died Dec. 6, 1856, at Queenstown, Ireland. Mathews, James M., D.D., a minister of the (Dutch) Reformed Church, was born in Salem, N. Y., in 1785; graduated at Union College in 1803; at the Seminary of the Associate Reformed Church in 1807; was licensed to preach the Gospel by the Associate Reformed Presbytery in New York in 1807; became assistant professor and a summer missionary of his great predecessor Rev. Dr. John M. Mason, in 1809, and continued there until 1818. After supplying the South Dutch Church in Garden Street, New York, for one year, he became its pastor in 1812, and retained that relation until 1840. Thereafter he never again took a pastoral charge. He was the principal founder of the University of the City of New York, and was its first chancellor—1831 to 1838. The elegant marble edifice of the university and the adjoining Reformed church on Washington Square are monuments of his architectural taste and liberal projects. Dr. Mathews published, in addition to various occasional pamphlets, a book of Autobiographical Recollections, a volume of lectures On the Relations of Science to Christianity, and another on The Bible and Men of Learning (1835). He was a man of noble presence and courteous manners, scholarly in his tastes and habits, a powerful preacher, and fertile in large prophetic visions of Christian usefulness. His last labors were given for many months before his decease to preparations for an evangelical council, held in New York, composed of representatives from most of the American churches, and over which he presided. In October, 1842. He was a zealous advocate of the Evangelical Alliance, and of other forms of Christian union; and it is believed that his latest efforts in this cause exhausted his strength and hastened his end. Dr. Mathews was naturally a leader of men. His learning was extensive, his tact and skill were great, and his zeal was ardent. Associated with prominent men and events for more than three-score years, he bore an active part in nearly all of the great religious and philanthropic movements of our country during this period. He died January, 1870, after a brief illness, in the city of New York, where his life was spent. (W. J. R. T.)

Mathilda, a Roman Catholic saint, and queen of Germany, was born at Westphalia, towards the close of the 9th century. She was the daughter of the Thuringian count of Oldenburg, a descendant of the famed Wittikind, and of a princess of Denmark. She was educated by her grandmother, abbess of the convent of Herwold. In 909 she was married to Henry, afterwards king of Germany. On the throne she preserved the piety and simplicity which distinguished her from her youth. A great part of her time was spent in prayer. She gave liberally to the poor, whom she often nursed herself. She had three sons: the emperor Otto the Great; Henry, duke of Bavaria; and Bruno, archbishop of Cologne. One of her daughters, Hedwig, was married to Hugh the Great, duke of France, and became mother of Hugh Capet. After the death of her husband, Otto and Henry of Bavaria quarrelled concerning the crown of Germany. Henry, for whom his mother showed great partiality on this occasion, having subsequently been reconciled with Otto, joined him in despoothing Mathilda of her dowry and of all her possessions, under pretense that she was squandering the money of the state in giving alms to the poor. Her property was, however, subsequently returned to her through the intercession of her son, Otto the Great. The remainder of her life was passed in meditation and works of charity. She founded several convents, and died at Quedlinburg, March 14, 968. Mathilda, countess of Tuscany, well known in history through her close political connection with pope Gregory VII (q. v.), was a daughter of Boniface, count of Tuscany, and was born in 1046. She is said to have married Godfrey (surnamed Il Gobbo, or the "Hunchback"), duke of Lorraine, in 1069, by procuration; but, if so, her marriage did not make his appearance in Italy until four years after the wedding certificate, and if the two, if they were ever united, soon afterwards separated. Godfrey went back to his duchy, and became a supporter of the emperor Henry IV, while Mathilda made herself conspicuous by the zealous with which she espoused the cause of Gregory VII. She became his inseparable se sociate, was ever ready to assist him in all he undertook, and to share every danger from which he could not protect him. In 1777, when Henry had suddenly made his appearance in Italy, and Gregory was fearing for his safety, she gave the pontiff shelter in her own castle. This intimacy of Mathilda with the pope has given rise to much scandal, though every unprejudiced man will see that the guilt itself is far enough from the goodness of the two. Both the countess and the vicar were pure in character, if their correspondence may serve as an index of their thoughts. (See on this point Neander, Ch. Hist. iv. 118, 86.) In 1769 Mathilda made a gift of all her goods and possessions to the Church. In 1691 she alone stood by Henry when Henry promised his troops into Italy, burning to avenge his humiliation at Canossa; she supported him with money when he was besieged in Rome; and after his death at Salerno boldly carried on the war against the emperor. She died at the Benedentine monastery of Polironne in 1115. Her death gave rise to new feuds between the emperor and pope Paschal III on account of her gift to the Church, which finally resulted in the former wresting from the latter a portion of Mathilda’s possessions, but even what remained constituted nearly the whole of the subsequent “Patrimony of Peter” See the mouth of Pern.”

Matthursins, or Brethren of the Holy Trinity, an order of monks which arose at the end of the 12th century, and got this name from having a church at Paris which claims St. Matthurin for its patron saint. All their churches were dedicated to the Holy Trinity. Some of the brethren are called Brothers of the Union of Cypriote, because, originating at the period of the Crusades, they gave their labor and a third of their revenue to liberate Christian captives from Mohammedan masters. Their foundress were two French recluse in the diocese of Meaux—Jean de Mattia and Felix de Valois. By some they seem to have been called the Order of Aces, as they were permitted to use those animals only, and were debarred from riding on horses. A similar order was founded in Spain in 1228, and there called the Order of St. Mary. See also Trinitarians.

Matina, or Matutina, the “new morning service,” or the first of the morning services, and so called in contradistinction from the “old morning service,” which was before day, whereas this was after day began. Cassian says this was first set up in Bethlehem, for till that time the old morning service was used to end with the nocturnal prayer, and then they used to betake themselves to rest till the third hour, which was the first hour of diurnal prayer. The name for morning prayer, in more modern Church-language, is matina. Before the Reformation the hours of prayer were seven in number, namely, matins, the first or prime, the third, sext, and ninth hours, and vespers, and compline. The office of matins in the Church of England is an abridgment of her ancient services for matins, lauds, and prime. Ritualists divide the office of matins, or morning prayers, into three parts: first, the introduction, which extends from the beginning of the office to the end of the Lord’s Prayer; secondly, the psalmody and lessons, extending to the end of the Apostles’ Creed; thirdly, the prayers and collects, which occupy the remainder of the service. See Farrar, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Eadie, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Neale, Intro. East. Churc.). See also How, Canon of Christ’s Church.

and not a future consent. There are others who would make the words of the priest the essential element whereby the marriage union is created, "Ego vos in matrimonium conjungeo," etc.; in the English office, "I tie you together," superstitiously. Who married whom was never considered. It was "familiar suander," followed by the declaration of complete union, "I pronounce that they be man and wife together, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." If the previous consent had made the two persons man and wife, these words on the priest's lips would seem to be strictly speaking, superstitious. From primitive times it has been the custom to acquaint the Church beforehand with an intended marriage, which is evident from the passages above quoted. The object was to prevent unlawful marriage; not that the Church claimed any power to prevent a "greater" from leave to marry, but that in case a person was about to marry a Jew, or a heathen, or a heretic, or one within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity, etc., the marriage might be prevented, or at least not obtain the sanction of the Church.

The earliest allusion to the necessity of such notice in England is contained in the eleventh canon of the Synod of Westminster (A.D. 1200), which enacts that no marriage shall be contracted without banns thrice published in church (Johnson, Cemona, ii. 91). See Banns. The existing law of the Church of England is expressed in the following words: "No minister of any persuasion or denomination, without the special licence of the proper Bishop, shall celebrate marriage between any persons, without a faculty or license granted by some of the persons in our constitutions expressed, except the banns of marriage have been first published three several Sundays or holydays in the time of divine service in the parish churches and chapels where the said parties dwell, according to the book of Common Prayer." The only substitute for banns recognised by the Church of England is an ordinary or special license. The power of granting the former has belonged to English bishops since very early date, but the latter is in the hands of the Pope (25 Henry VIII. c. 21).

The right to grant special licenses, which are free from all restrictions as to time or place, was originally a privilege of the archbishop of Canterbury, as "legatus manus". The ritual of the Church of Rome teaches that "the end of the sacrament of marriage is that man and wife may mutually help and comfort each other, in order that they may spend this life in a holy manner, and thereby gain a blessed immortality; and to contribute to the edification of the Church by the lawful procreation of children, and by the care of procuring them a moral education and an education on the latter". Every person, before entering into wedlock, is required to beseech God to join them with such a person as he may work out his salvation with, and examine whether or not the person he has fixed his affections on has the fear of God before his eyes; is prudent, discreet, and able to take a care of a family.

The Council of Trent, at its twenty-fourth session, held Nov. 11, 1668, legislated upon the subject of matrimony in twelve canons, as follows:

1. Whoever shall affirm that marriage is not truly by the form of the evangelical law, instituted by Christ our Lord, but that it is a human invention, introduced into the Church, and does not obtain the indifference of grace; let him be accursed.

2. Whoever shall affirm that Christians may have more wives than one, and that this is prohibited by no divine law; let him be accursed.

3. Whoever shall affirm that only those degrees of consanguinity which are mentioned in the book of Leviticus can hinder or disannul the marriage contract; and that the Church has no power to dispense with some of them, or to consider moral hindrances or reasons for disannulling the contract; let him be accursed.

4. Whoever shall affirm that the Church cannot constitute any impediments, with power to disannul matrimonial contracts; in constituting them she has erred; let him be accursed.

5. Whoever shall affirm that the marriage-bond may be broken by death of one, or by voluntary absence from the husband or wife; let him be accursed.

6. Whoever shall affirm that a marriage solemnised but not consummated is not disannulled if one of the parties enters into a religious order; let him be accursed.

7. Whoever shall affirm that the Church is in teaching, according to the evangelical and apostolic doctrine, that the marriage-bond cannot be dissolved by the minister of one, the party of the other, or of them, even the innocent party, who has given no occasion for the divorce; and shall proceed to disannul another, while the other party lives; and that the husband who puts away his adulterous wife, and marries another, commits adultery, as if he were the wife, who puts away her unfaithful husband, and marries another (whoever shall affirm that the Church has erred in maltreating these sentiments); let him be accursed.

8. Whoever shall affirm that the Church has erred in decreeing that such persons as marry may be separated, as far as regards actual cohabitation, either for a certain or an uncertain time; let him be accursed.

9. Whoever shall affirm that persons not in religious orders, who have made a solemn profession of charity, may contract marriage, and that the contract is valid, notwithstanding any ecclesiastical law or law; and that to maintain the contrary is nothing less than to condemn marriage; and that all persons may marry who feel that, though they should make a vow of chastity, they have not the gift thereof; let him be accursed; for God does not deny his gifts to those who ask and seek, and when he suffers us to be tempted above as we are able.

10. Whoever shall affirm that the conjugal state is to be and is only valid to a life of virginity, or of marriage, and that it is not better and more conducive to happiness to remain in virginity, or celibacy, than to be married; let him be accursed.

11. Whoever shall affirm that to prohibit the solemnisation of marriage with persons subject to ecclesiastical supervision, borrowed from the superstition of the pagans; or to condemn the benevolence and other ceremonies used by the Church at those times, let him be accursed.

12. Whoever shall affirm that matrimonial causes do not belong to the ecclesiastical judges; let him be accursed.

"Marriage as a Sacrament unbidical. 1. In many most important points respecting marriage, Protestants and Roman Catholics agree; yet, when the Church of Rome advances marriage to a sacrament instituted by Christ, and endows it with sacramental qualities, there are several points of consideration of importance to Christianity in which Protestant and Romanist must disagree. The latter asserts that marriage as a sacrament was instituted by Christ, and confers grace, and supports this dogma by quoting Ephesians v. 2: 'This is a great mystery: but I speak concerning Christ and the Church,' where the Douay translation renders by sacrament the word μυστήριον, which we Protestants prefer to translate mystery. 'Or, indeed, if we render the word 'sacrament,' still they have no advantage, inasmuch as the original word μυστήριον, 'mystery,' which they read as 'sacrament,' signifies nothing more than a secret, or a mystery of godliness' (1 Tim. iii. 16), 'a mystery, Babylon the great' (Rev. xvii. 6). Papists must know that there is no force in their argument. The text, as found in their version, can only influence the minds of ignorant persons, who are not versed in the Scriptures. The answer is, not say that marriage is a mystery, for he speaks concerning Christ and the Church. It is acknowledged that marriage is instituted in God, and is a sign of a holy thing, yet it is no sacrament; the Sabbath was ordained of God, and signified the rest in Christ (Heb. iv. 9), yet it was not a sacrament. All significant and mystic signs are not necessarily sacraments" (Elliot, Romanism, p. 428). "Romanists," says the same able polemic whom we have just had occasion to cite, "further quote the following passage to support their doctrine: 'She shall be as naked as she was clothed, as 'faith and love' (1 Tim. ii. 15), inferring that the grace of sanctification is given to the parties married. To this we answer: (1) We deny that any sacraments give or confer grace; they are only means or instruments of its communication. (2) It is allowed that God does give to persons married persons grace to live in piety and holiness; but it is unnecessary to constitute marriage into a sacrament for this purpose. (3) Those who are not married may possess the sanctifying grace of God, which is sufficient to preserve all in a state of inward as well as outward holiness.
MATRIMONY

2. That marriage is no sacrament of the Gospel, speaking of such an institution in its proper scriptural acceptance, may be proved by the following arguments: (1) Matrimony was instituted in Paradise long before sin had entered, therefore it cannot be a sacrament of the Gospel; marriage is observed among infidels and wicked people, and is incapable of revealing worthily the sacraments of the Church. (2) Papists are inconsistent with themselves in calling marriage a profanation of orders; some with consummate effrontery assert that to live in a state of concubinage is more tolerable for a priest than to marry. Can they really believe marriage to be a sin, which is so offensive to God, yet accept it as the end and perpetual purpose? Pope Siricius applied the words of St. Paul, "They that are in the flesh cannot please God," in favor of the celibacy of the clergy—thus proving that this pope, in common with many other pontiffs, knew but little of scriptural interpretation, seeing the reference is plainly to deep human depravity and wickedness, but not to the marriage state. (3) In every sacrament there must be an external sensible sign as the matter, and an appropriate order of words as the form; but in matrimony there is neither, therefore it is no sacrament. (4) All persons of a good and discreet mind can receive the sacraments of the Church; but piety is not a necessary condition of marriage, therefore marriage is not a sacrament. The conditions of confession and absolution, which are sometimes enjoined in the Church of Rome, cannot be considered as teaching that piety is required of those who are to be married; for confession and absolution are not proper concomitants of true piety, seeing the greatest part of those who confess and receive absolution are not otherwise religious than as members of the Church of Rome, and membership in that community is rather a presumption against, than in favor of true religion. It does not alter the case to introduce the distinctions which have been made by their theologians, namely, that marriage is often a civil or natural contract, and not a sacrament. This distinction is founded on mere technicalities, and not on any scriptural authority, either direct or inferential.

3. It is necessary, as they acknowledge, that a sacrament should be instituted by Christ; but matrimony was not instituted by him, therefore, according to their own rule, it is no sacrament. It is in vain for them to say that Christ instituted the sacrament of marriage, when they are unable to produce the words of institution, or to adduce a single circumstance connected with its institution. It is true, the Council of Trent most positively, in their first canon, affirm that Christ did institute the sacrament of matrimony; but then neither chapter nor canon is given to prove it, and indeed, so divided among themselves they are respecting the time in which Christ converted marriage into a sacrament, that the most discordant opinions exist. Let the Roman Catholic Divus speak on the subject: "Some," says he, "say that it was instituted when Christ was present at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, which he is said to honor with his presence and bless it (John ii): according to others, when Christ, revoking matrimony to its primordial unity and indissolubleness, rejecting the bill of divorce, said, 'What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder' (Matt. vii); but others refer its institution to the time of the forty days between the resurrection and ascension, during which Christ often taugh his apostles concerning the kingdom of God, or his Church; others say the time is uncertain." Thus the institution of marriage as a sacrament cannot be discovered by their ablest divines. The reason is evident; it is unable to find the place where Christ established it; the Roman Catechism adroitly evade this point, and leave the matter in the same uncertainty as it found it. We therefore hesitate not to affirm that, although marriage was originally instituted by Almighty God, recognised by Christ, and its duties enforced by the apostles, nevertheless its institution as a sacrament cannot be found in any part of the New Testament.

1. (Sept. Mattaw, Masawaw v. r. Mašawaw and Mašawaw.) The priest of Baal alone before his idolatrous altar during the reformation instituted by Jehoiada (2 Kings xi, 18; 2 Chron. xxii, 17). B.C. 876. "He probably accompanied Athaliah from Samaria, and would thus be the first priest of the Babylonian worship which Jehoram, king of Judah, following in the steps of his father-in-law Ahaz, established at Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxii, 6, 13). Josephus (Ant. ix, 7, 3) calls him Mašawaw ("Smith")."

2. (Sept. Našawaw v. r. Mašawaw.) The father of the Shephatiah who was one of the nobles that charged Jeremiah with treason (Jer. xxxvii, 1). B.C. ante 589.

3. (Masaewaw, Auth. Vers. "Matthew.") The son of Eleazar and father of Jacob, who last was father of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary (Matt. i, 15). According to tradition he was a priest (which disagrees with his tribe aren's), and father of Anna, the mother of the same Mary (Nicæan. Hist. Ec. ii, 3). B.C. considerably ante 40. See GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

Matanah (Heb. 'Matanah,' מָטַן, a gift, as in Gen. xxv, 6, etc.; Sept. 'Mattanathasivev'), the fifty-third station of the Israelites on the south-eastern edge of Palestine, between the well (Beer) in the desert and Nahalbed (Num. xxi, 18, 19). It was no doubt a Moabitisb, or rather Ammonitis city, and is placed by Eusebius and Jerome ("Germ. in loc." in the region of Hesbon) v. i. In the years nine miles eastward of Medeba, which Hengstenberg corrects to "southward" ("Bibleam," p. 240), i.e. apparently in the plain of Ar Ramdan, perhaps between the branches of wady Wilal. Lelccere (ad loc.) suggests that Mattanah may be identified with the mysterious word Jotub (ver. 14; A. V. "what he desired"), since the meaning of that word in Arabic is the same as that of Mattanah in Hebrew. This is nearly the same with the explanation of the Targums of Onkelos and Pseudo-Jonathan, which make it an appellation for the well or Beer just mentioned, as being a gift of God (see Kennicott, Remarks on O. T. p. 60). See EXOD.

Bani, who acted similarly (Exra x, 37). B.C. 459.
8. A descendant of Asaph (but named as one of "the priests' sons," i.e. perhaps assistants, for Asaph was only a Levite), and great-grandfather of the Zechariah who assisted in celebrating upon trumpets the completion of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii, 35). B.C. much ante 446. His father's name, Michaiah, and grandfather's, but in other respects the notices are different. Some interpreters suspect a corruption of the text, and in that case all discrepancies may be removed.

9. A Levite, son of Micah, of the family of Asaph, resident in the neighborhood of Jerusalem after the exile (1 Chron. ix, 15). B.C. cir. 440. He is evidently the same as the Levite mentioned in Nos. 3, 5, and 8, who was praised in the Temple after the captivity (Neh. xi, 17; xii, 8), and also guarded the gates (Neh. xii, 25). He also appears to be the same with the father of Hashaiah and great-grandfather of Uzzai, mentioned as one of the chief Levites in the same connection (Neh. xii, 22), but in that case he must have been a very aged man at the time. See also No. 8.
10. A Levite, father of Zacur, and grandfather of the Hanun whom Nehemiah set over the distribution of the tithes (Neh. xii, 13). B.C. considerably ante 410.

3. The son of Absalom and brother of the Maccabean Jonathan, the high-priest (1 Macc. xi, 70; xiii, 11). In the battle fought by the latter with the forces of Demes-trius on the plain of Naor (the old Hazor), his two generals Mattathias andudas alone stood by him when his army was seized with a panic and fled, and with their assistance the fortunes of the day were restored.

Mattati, MARIUS, a noted Roman Catholic prelate, lately the presiding officer of the College of Cardinals at Rome, and in ecclesiastical dignity ranked next to the pope himself, was born at Pergola, States of the Church, Sept. 6, 1792: was educated at Rome, and entered the priesthood in 1814. In 1822 he received his appointment as cardinal. In December, 1860, he became the bishop of Ostia and legate of Velletri. Among other eminent distinctions, he held the post of "archpriest" to the Church of the Vatican, and was the prefect of the com-mision for the preservation of St. Peter's Church. He died Oct. 8, 1870. Cardinal Mattaei was a great favorite of pope Pius IX, and owed most of his distinctions to his friend "the infallible."

Matter, as used to signify "mind or spirit (q. v.), is that which occupies space, and with which we become acquainted by means of our bodily senses or organs.
Everything of which we have any knowledge is either matter or mind, i. e. spirit. Mind is that which know and thinks. Matter is that which makes itself known to mind by certain properties. "The first form which matter assumes is extension, or length, breadth, and thickness; it then becomes body. If body were infinite there could be no figure, which is body bounded. But body is not physical body, unless it partake of or is constituted of one or more of the elements, fire, air, earth, or water" (Menabde, Ancient Metaphysics, b. ii, c. 2).
According to Des Cartes the essence of mind is thought, and the essence of matter is extension. He said, Give me extension and motion, and I shall make the world.
Leibnitz said the essence of all being, whether mind or matter, is an assembly of material, celestial forces or monads. His system of physics may be called dynamical, in opposition to that of Newton, which may be called mecanical; because Leibnitz held that the monads possessed a vital or living energy. We may explain the phenomena of matter by the movements of either, by gravity and electricity; but the ultimate reason of all movement is a force primitively communicated at creation, a force which is everywhere, but which, while it is present in all bodies, is differently limited; and this force, this virtue or power of action, is inherent in all substantial matter, spiritual and material. Created substances received from the creative substance not only the faculty to act, but also to exercise their activity each after its own manner. See Leibnitz, De Primo Philosophio Ennennandae et de Notione Substantivae, or Nouveau Systeme de la Nature et de la Communication des Substances, or Journal des Sceux, 1685. There are various hypotheses to explain the activity of matter, see Stewart (Outline, pt. ii, ch. ii, sect. 1, and Art. and Mor.
Poe. last edit., vol. ii, note A). See also PERCEPTION.
The properties which have been predicated as essential to body, consist in extensibility, extensity, invisibility, inertia, weight. To the senses it manifests color, sound, smell, taste, heat, and motion; and by observation it is discovered to possess elasticity, electricity, magnetism, etc. Metaphysicians have distinguished the qualities of matter into primary and secondary, and have said that our knowledge of the former, as of impenetrability and extension, is clear and absolute; while our knowledge of the latter, as of sound and smell, is obscure and relative. This distinction taken by Des Cartes, adopted by Locke and also by Reid and Stewart, is rejected by Kant, as already stated, as not making any new discovery. Others who do not doubt the objective reality of matter, hold that our knowledge of all its qualities is the same in kind. See the distinctions precisely stated and strenuously upheld by Sir William Hamilton (Reid's "Words, note B"); and ingeniously controverted by Mme. Emilie Saisset, in Dict. des Sciences Philosoph. art. "Matière." See MATERIALISM.

The metaphysical history of this term, like that of most others, begins with Aristotle; its theological significance may be said to begin with the first two verses of Genesis. Three questions of theological as well as philosophical interest grow out of this subject.

I. Popular language, in spite of Berkeley's own appeal to popular opinion, must be admitted to be framed on the hypothesis that matter exists in itself, independently of any mind perceiving it; and theologians have in general been content to accept popular language on the point, so that the language of theologians represents the popular opinion. But as Berkeley's system does not, when understood, contradict any of the ordinary facts of experience, so the language of theologians, like that of other men, necessarily comes into frequent use in ordinary conversation, and in the sequence of the system being accepted. For a system invented or advanced from a theological motive, it affects theology singularly little.

It can hardly be denied, that a belief in the reality of matter, however relative this may be defined, is necessary to orthodox Christianity. The narrative of the Creation becomes meaningless, or at least deceptive, if the things created be no more than "permanent possibilities of sensation," things that would be perceived, or rather groups of phenomena that would make impressions, if there were any minds placed ready to observe them, which there are not; and, to tell the truth, even Berkeley's system confuses or obscures the notion of creation. The existence of a material substance means, according to him, that some mind or minds are affected with certain sensations, from a cause external to themselves. Now in this there is nothing to conflict with Christian doctrine; when we say that God created all material substances, we shall mean, on this hypothesis, that he is the sole and ultimate cause of the laws, external to created minds, whereby their consciousness is modified in the various ways which we ascribe to the presence of matter.

So far, then, all is clear. If Berkeley has not yet given any support to the doctrines of religion, he certainly has not assailed them. But when we come to the part of his theory which was to confute atheism, it is more possible to bring him into collision with that Revelation which he undertakes to defend. Matter, it is said, exists in virtue of being perceived by a mind: e.g., "my inkstand exists," means "my mind has a group of sensations, simultaneous or successive, which I describe by a glass of water, a cup, and a table, in which I hear it ring when struck or thrown down, etc., or otherwise as being conscious of the presence of a hard, smooth, round, hollow body, of a heavy, greyish, transparent substance." But if I go out of the room, I believe that my inkstand still exists, though no longer perceived by me. What do I mean by the "believe" in this case?

We have rejected the answer, "You mean that you believe that, if you went into the room again, you would again experience the same sensations." In the first place, I do mean more than that, though I am unable to prove that anything more than that is true. And further, as has been said above, unless the inkstand exists when not seen, how is it true that the Creator caused the flint, sand, alkalii, copper and zinc ore, etc., of which it is made, to exist ages before they were discovered and used, and sustains the manufactured product of his works in being now?

To these objections the sensationalist has no answer, the Berkeleyan has. "When you say that the inkstand exists in your absence, you mean that when it is not perceived by you, it is perceived by somebody else. You only refer to existence (except the existence of a mind, a conscious subject) of existence as the object of consciousness of a mind. If you believe, as you doubtless do, that matter exists absolutely, not only in relation to the finite minds that perceive it, but are bound to admit that there is an infinite mind, which always perceives all matter existent, even what is perceived by no other mind."

Injustice is done to Berkeley by a sensationalist philosopher, if he regards the negative part of his system, the denial of an objective substratum to material phenomena, as separate from this, its positive part. Berkeley was a real idealist, not a mutilated or inconsistent sensationalist; and any one who denies an objective substratum to matter, but does not recognize its absolute existence as an object of consciousness to a necessarily existing mind, is not taking half Berkeley's system and leaving the other half, but framing a new one, suggested, it may be, by Berkeley's, but essentially different from it. His religious philosophy was not an amiable excrescence on his metaphysical, but an essential correlative to it; and therefore his system has no sceptical tendency. The system does not, in other words, lead to a sceptical tendency to pantheism (Mansel's "Prolegomena Logica", App. B); for God is distinguished adequately, on the one hand, from the created objects, i.e., groups of ideas, which he perceives; on the other, from the created minds in which he chooses to perceive certain ideas as real. Now this is almost shockingly contrary to the generally-received notion of an eternal present in the divine mind; and it is hard to see that it does not contradict the doctrines of his eternal foreknowledge and immutability. Doubtless God began (on this hypothesis) to be conscious of the world at his first creation; wherewith and not otherwise, from an external cause. But his nature seems lowered, if we confess that by his creating we mean that he caused certain ideas to become present to his mind, which therefore were not present to it before. We have, in fact, a curious conveyance of pantheism. Pantheism (as the term is commonly used) merges the personal God in union with the universe, a universe consisting of matter, or spirit, or both. Here the personality as well as the spirituality of the Eternal is preserved; but instead of his being so merged in the world as to deify it, the world is described as a glass, invented to introduce its own finite and mutable qualities into his nature.

Creation is a mystery on any hypothesis. On any hypothesis, God, at some finite time, came into new relations with things that are not God. He assumed new characters (as those of Creator, Preserver, Ruler, Judge) which he had not before; and he was then to be without any change in his nature, or even in his purpose. Whether this necessary difficulty is aggravated by the above form of stating it; whether the theory of creation in the divine mind implies more of a change of a nature than that of a creation of things outside it, may be a question. It is one that at least deserves to be stated. If it be admitted that idealism is not logically opposed to Christianity on this ground, there remain only two slighter objections to it.
Existence has, on this hypothesis, a twofold aspect. Things material exist, absolutely as being perceived by God, relatively as being caused by God to be perceived by his sensitive creatures. Now if, to avoid the objection above stated, it be said that while creation existed eternally in the person of God, so the works were always known by him, yet it may be said that creation had a beginning in time, when God first made it known to other intelligences than his own. In itself, no doubt, this would be inadequate as an account of creation, however fair a defence it might be against the charge of introducing an absurdity into the divine purpose or thought. And it just stops short of making the world eternal, though it comes dangerously near to it. It may be added that the hypothesis of a subjective creation is not invented on behalf of this system. One of the recognised explanations of the double account, the creation in Genesis is that the former or Elohist narrative describes the order in which God's purpose was made known to the holy angels, the second that in which it was executed.

But the reality (in whatever sense) of the material universe is presupposed, not only in the doctrine of the creation, but in that of the sacraments, inasmuch that "matter" is used as a technical term in relation to them, describing one of their essential requisites. Speaking generally, any hypothesis that allows the reality of matter would be sufficient, and therefore the idealistic, since it is not necessarily an intelligible modal. The command to use certain material substances, and the promise of certain spiritual effects to follow on their use, is not eradicated if we describe their use as "taking the known means to occasion, to our own mind and others, including the divine, certain states of consciousness." But it seems hard to see how the theory can fail to affect the doctrine of the holy Eucharist. If the presence of a body means the fact that its bodily properties are manifest to all intelligences capable of observing them, then a presence of a body, real but not sensible, becomes self-contradictory. If, however, the point be urged with sufficient boldness, that absolute truth is not "truth relative to all intelligences," but truth relative to the Infinite intelligence, then it is of course possible to believe that God regards as that present which does not recognise as present by the ordinary test of manifesting the properties, in manifesting which bodily presence consists; and this will, by an adherent of the system, be regarded as constituting a real but not sensible presence.

II. Whether matter exists only in virtue of minds to which it is self-evident, or whether it exists in itself, the source of its being must be determined. For not even, if it be said that matter is a mode of the mind of a spirit, it is yet proved that matter is not self-caused or eternal: it might be a necessary mode of an eternal Spirit's thought, and so coeternal with his being. However, the motives that have led to the belief in the eternity of matter have been, in general, such as would involve a belief in its independence. It is conceding either too much or too little to make matter merely the thought of God, yet a thought which he never was with which he could not have existed. Eternal matter was usually conceived as an antithetic power, whether active or passive; sometimes so passive as to be no more than an imperfect medium for the divine operation. It is hardly worth while to frame a system in which matter should have a subjective eternity, if the system has been to secularise it. It has already been pointed out, however, that such a system is a conceivable corollary of Berkeley's. But, supposing matter to be something external to the divine mind which (all theists will probably admit) knows or contemplates it, what is the relation between the two? Is one the work of the other, or are they both independent?

Strictly speaking, there are three possible answers to this question, viz., that matter is the product of mind, that mind is the product of matter, and that the two are independent. But the second, in this exact form, has probably never been maintained. Matter, being inactive, cannot be conceived as producing, unless it be first personified. Materialism, however, or regarding mind as a mode of matter, is a fair representative of this view. Setting this on one side, we come to the two alternatives, that matter is the work of mind, and that it is coeternal with mind—between theism and dualism.

The Jewish and Christian religions are theistic; most other religions of any claim to such speculative value are dualistic. Attempts to import dualism into Christianity have been numerous, but it has in every age been so obvious that the hybrid system was inconsistent—for if Christianity was a coherent system, its authorities and documents denounced dualism, and its instinctive consciousness rejected it—that it is unnecessary to reopen a question which is practically closed. All who claim to be, strictly speaking, theists, would now admit the prerogative of creation to belong to God in the fullest sense. It will be enough here to classify the forms of dualism which have either been opposed to the theistic doctrine of Christianity, or which it has been sought to amalgamate with it, as they refer to the subject before us, all of them being separately and fully noticed elsewhere. See DUALISM.

1. The Buddhist dualism assumes two eternal and impersonal, finite and (eminent) human nature exists in virtue of the union or collision of the two; they are not only the good and evil, but the positive and negative elements of existence: existence consists in partaking of both, as the Hegelian system makes it consist in the union of being and nothing. The victory of the human spirit is to be free from matter, and one with all pure spirit; but since matter as well as spirit is necessary to existence, this pure being, though not conceived as nothingness, is unconditionally from it.

2. The Manichean dualism (to use the name of its most famous and permanently vital form, for a system not confined to the Manichean sect, or those affiliated to it) assumes two eternal principles, matter and spirit, of which both are more or less distinctly personified. The strange and grotesque mythology by which the Manicheans (in the stricter sense) accounted for the intermixture of good and evil in the world, may have been meant to be understood allegorically; but this is hardly likely—the allegory is too vivid to have been less than a myth, in the minds of its hearers, if not of its inventors. Two systems which make war on each other, exclude and devour and assimilate from each other's substance, or create and beget from their own, are strangely personal if regarded as abstractions: indeed, the best reason for thinking them so is that, if the Manichean cosmogony be taken literally, the eternal Spirit is entirely carnal. But because the system is unphilosophical or inconsistent, if understood in the natural way, it does not follow that it ought to be understood otherwise: there being such things as inconsistent systems. It, however, is to be remembered that Manicheanism always maintained a Manichaean doctrine, which may have allegorized the known good of being. 3. The Platonistic dualism (if one may take a title from a single enunciation of it—it does not appear to have been a consistent or permanent conviction with Plato) assumes an eternal personal Spirit, acting on an eternal impersonal matter, and vice versa. Out of this, the material universe is supposed to be formed, which that is: not deriving them from his own being, lest he should impoverish himself, yet being in a real sense their author. Matter is conceived as negatively but not positively evil—unable to be made entirely good, even by a good spirit—and passively but not actively resisting his will.

4. The general character of Gnostic systems was not strictly dualistic. They assumed two eternal principles of spirit and matter, of which the first at least was conceived, more or less distinctly, as personal: but matter was made into finite beings, not by the action of the eternal Spirit, but of a created or generated one; who, though the eternal, held a place so exalted as to be technically a third God; and usurped, more or less, the bad eminence of the eternal matter, since, in opposition to orthodox Christians, it was necessary to distinguish him from the eternal Spirit. See DEMIURGUS.

The term of dualism, as the Perianian, does not come in for consideration here, as its antithesis is not between spirit and matter, but between light and darkness. Owing to its antiquity, the distinction between personal and impersonal principles is not formulated in it.

III. Has matter ever existed abstracted from those conditions of concrete form in which we meet with it? The third and fourth of the forms of dualism just enumerated make their cosmogony depend on the distinction devised by Anaxagoras, and formulated by Aristotle, between matter and form. If matter be conceived as eternal, and yet a creation by a spiritual Being be in some sense admitted, this is necessary. If matter be believed to be itself the work of a Spirit, it is possible, but by no means necessary, still to believe that he first created matter, and then formed it. Such was, perhaps, the general notion of the scholastic period; but in the widest sense of the term: the belief recognised absolute creation by God out of nothing, while it left a meaning for the Aristotelian distinction which was familiar. It seemed to derive direct support from the narrative of the creation in Gen. i. 2. But it is evident that the word "formless" is used in this passage not to be presented in so strict a philosophical sense: if the meaning of the word were less general, it would still follow from the fact that the "formless" matter is already called (not the universe merely, but) "the earth." It therefore follows that the scriptural or Aristotelian doctrine of creation admits, but does not require, the complication of this intermediate step. It probably is ignored by almost all modern thought on the subject: in the last age of scholasticism, Sir Thomas Browne still continued to assume it, and his critic Digby thought it needless. See Creation.

Matter, Jacques, a noted French historian and philosopher, was born in Alt-Eckendorf, Alsace, May 81, 1791. His parents were Germans, and, though living under French rule, remained true to the fatherland. Jacques, however, was taught French from his childhood, and used to take a part in the discussions on matters of state under the French government. He was intended for the legal profession, and, after receiving the highest educational advantages of private instructors, was sent to the gymnasium at Strasbourg, and then entered as a student at the University of Göttingen, Germany, where he enjoyed the instruction and association of Herren, the noted historian, and Eichborn, the celebrated Orientalist. He removed to Paris with a diplomatic career in view, attended the lectures of the Faculty of Letters, and wrote his Essai historique sur l'école d'Alexandrie (published in 1820), which, crowned by the academy in 1816, gave him a reputation among those French scholars who were interested in German erudition. By favor of Royer-Collard and Guizot, he received in 1819 a professorship in the College of Strasbourg, which he exchanged two years afterwards for the directorship of the gymnasium and the professorship of ecclesiastical history in the Protestant academy of the same city. Applying himself to the study of ecclesiastical history and philosophy, he wrote Histoire critique du Gnosticisme (Paris, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed. 1845-46, 3 vols. 8vo), and Histoire universelle de la philosophie chrétienne (Paris, 1832; 3d edit. 1838). In 1829 he was appointed inspector of the academy of Strasbourg, and, in 1831, corresponding member of the Academy of Inscriptions. His treatise De l'influence des mouvres sur les lois et des mouvres sur les mouvres (Paris, 1833) was received from the academy the extraordinary prize of 10,000 francs. In 1829 he was appointed by Guizot general inspector of the University of Paris, and removed to that city. Among his later productions are, Histoire des doctrines morales et politiques des trois derniers siècles (1836-37, 3 vols.); De l'influence, bientôt de se fait, des idées et des études morales (1841); Schelling et la philosophie de la nature (1842); De l'état moral et politique de l'Allemagne (1847, 2 vols.); Histoire de la philosophie de l'état politique et de la nature des sciences (1849).—Kantius, philos. innocens (1862);—Emmanuel de Swedenberg (1865);—Le Mystique en Francs au temps de Fenelon (1864). He has also written occasional treatises concerning schools and education, and numerous articles in the Dictionnaire de la connaissance humaine and other cyclopaedia. He died at Strasbourg June 23, 1864.

Matthi, Christian Friedrich von, a noted German theologian, was born in Thuringia in 1744; was educated at the University of Leipsic, and immediately upon the completion of his studies became rector of the Gymnasium at Moscow. While here he devoted himself to a critical study of the Greek fathers of the Church, and published editions of the writings of Chrysostom, Basil the Great, and others. He was promoted to a professorship in the university about 1776, but in 1785 gladly accepted the position of rector at Meissen,—this affording him the opportunity to return to his beloved land. In 1789 he was called to the University of Wittenberg, whence he again returned to Moscow in 1805. He died in Russia Sept. 26, 1811. Matthi, besides patriotic studies, devoted himself largely to exegesis. He edited the commentary of Euthymius Zigabenus on the Gospels, with notes, and Nemesius of Enessa on the Nature of Man. But his most celebrated critical labor is his edition of the Greek Testament, for which he made an extensive collation of manuscripts; though, as he chiefly followed the authority of one class, the Byzantine, his edition is less valuable in itself than as a collection of materials for the further labors of the critical editor. A second edition of this Testament appeared in 1803-7, in 3 vols. 8vo. The work is entitled Novum Test. Graec. et Lat. : Textum demum recognovit, varias Lectiones nuncupavit antea vulgatae colligit, scholia Graeca addidit, annotations crit. adjectae, &c. (Rige, 1782-98, 12 vols. 8vo). The competent judgment of Michaelis pronounces its great value in few words. He says: "He has made his collection of various readings with great labor and diligence; he found in his MSS. a confirmation of many passages, which he should have passed by, if they are not found in MSS. of a different kind and of a different country from those which he used; many, even those of the Western edition, of which he speaks with the utmost contempt, he has corroborated by the evidence of MSS. This edition is, however, absolutely necessary for every man who is engaged in the criticism of the Greek Testament." See Döring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands d. 18. u. 19. Jahrh., vol. ii, s. v.; Horne, Introd. to the Crit. Study of the Scriptures; Kitto, Cyclop. Bib. Lit. vol. iii, s. v.

Matthæus, Constantinus, co-emperor of Constantinople, was the eldest son of the far-more illustrious John V Constantinou (Johns VI). At twenty-one, four years before he was of age, he was associated by his father in the supreme government as a means of checking the rebellion of John Palaeologus. This measure of Constantine's father boiled down to the situation of Palaeologus, failed in its design, and in 1355 the associate emperors, father and son, were compelled to abdicate the throne in favor of their rival. Matthæus now retired with his father to a monastic life in the convents of Mount Athos. He married Irene Palaeologina, and became the father of six children. His father, according that of his father, occurred towards the end of the 14th century. He was a man of much learning, and the author of various works, mostly Biblical commentaries, several of which are still extant in MS. The one enti- titled Commentarius in Cantica Cantorum has been pubfished. See Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology, s. v.

Matthæus, Karl, a Lutheran minister in the duchy of Altenburg, in Germany, was born Dec. 26, 1811, at Eisenberg. His early studies were pursued at the lyceum of his native town, and in 1830 he entered the University of Jena as a student of theology. After completing his studies in 1835, he spent several years in the capacity of family tutor and as a teacher, and finally, in 1843, became the pastor of Ober-Armendorf. In 1864 he was transferred to Bornhain, where he died suddenly July 3, 1865. Matthæus possessed in a rare degree the love and esteem of his acquaintances, who applied to him the saying of Luther, "He lived what we preach." His ripe culture, theological knowledge, and penetrating judgment find expression in his works, which comprise a Leben Philipp Melanchthons (of which a second edition appeared in 1846) and a Vergleichende Symbolik (published in 1854). In the latter year he assumed the publication of the Deutsche Kirchenchrönik, a brief but comprehensive annual, reviewing important matters in the field of Church and theology.

Matthæus (Marcus v. a. Matthes), one of the apostles and evangelists. In the following account of him and his Gospel we have endeavored to collect and arrange all that is definitely known on the subject.

I. His Name. — According to Genesis, the names Matthew and Matthias are both contractions of Matthias (םתתא, "gift of Jehovah; τεθησομενος, θεησεν), a common Jewish name after the exile. See Matthew. Matthew had also the name of Levi (Mark ii, 14; Luke xi, 27). In the catalogues—Mark iii, 18; Luke vi, 15—he is coupled with Thomas, which has given rise to the conjecture that Matthew was the twin brother of Thomas (Σωτερ, a twin), whose real name, according to Eusebius, II. E. ii, 13, was Judas, and that they were both "brethren of our Lord" (Donatison, Januar, p. 10; comp. Matt. xiii, 55; Mark vi, 3). This last supposition would account for Matthew's immediate obedience to the call of Christ, but is hardly consistent with the indefiniteness of the words with which he is introduced—"δια θω σω τιμος τουτον τουτοματαλεον (Matt. ix, 9)—"τιλανων ιηματα λυκον (Luke v, 27)—or the unbelief of our Lord's brothers (John vi, 5). However, as quoted by Clem. Alex. Strom. iv, 11, mentions Levi as well as Matthew among the early teachers who did not suffer martyrdom. Origen also (Contr. Cels. i, sec. 02 [48]) speaks of ου λεγεθ υπολεγεν ζησαι ανδρον ζησας τυ ιηματολατου, together with "Matthew the publican;" but the names Léb'ath and Léth'ath are by no means identical, and there is a hesitation about his language which shows that the truth the tradition was highly trustworthy. The attempt of Theod. Hase (Hild. Brev., v, 475) to identify Levi with the apostle Lebbeus is an example of misspelled ingenuity which deserves little attention (comp. Woll. Curt. ad Marc. ii, 14). The distinction between Levi and Matthew has, however, been maintained by Grothius (though he acknowledges that the voice of antiquity is against him, "et saepe congruentiae..."), Michaelis, De Wette, Sieffert, Ewald, etc. But it is unnecessary. The name is a maternal one, and it was the custom for such names to be borne by women as well as men; and at the same time the names are not infrequent in the New Testament. In the apocryphal works of Sieffert (Ueber d. erst. Kom. Ex., p. 59) and Ewald (Drit. Erst. Ex., p. 344: Christs, p. 289, 321) that the name "Matthew" is due to the Greek editor of Matthew's Gospel, who substituted it by an error in the narrative of the call of Levi. On the other hand, their identity was assumed by Wachter, Conybeare, and Jerome, and has been accepted by the most important commentators (Tischendorf, Meyer, Neander, Lardner, Eicso, etc.). The double name only supplies a difficulty to those who are resolved to find such everywhere in the Gospel narrative. It is analogous to what we find in the case of Simon Peter, John Mark, Paul, Jude, etc., which may all admit of the same explanation, and be regarded as indicating a crisis in the spiritual life of the individual, and his passing into new external relations. He was no longer "τους την λεγενην", not Levi but Theodore—one who might well deem both himself and all his future a "gift of God" (Eicso, Hist. Ind., p. 172: comp. Harnack, Meyer, Curt., ex. eis, etc. v. α. Mattathius, Name). See Michaelis, Einl. ii, 934; Kraft, Matt. Oec. s. v.; Breda, in the Bibl. Brem. vi, 1038; Heumann, Ekkir. d. N. T., 1, 538; Frisch, Dias, de Levi s. v. Matth. non confundendo (Leips. 1746); Thiess, Kris. Comm. i, 90; Sieffert, Ueber d. Kom. Exeg. p. 54. See Name.

II. Scripture Statements respecting him. — His father's name was Alpheus (Mark ii, 14), probably different from the father of James the son of Mary, the wife of Clopas, which was a "sister of the mother of Jesus" (John xiii, 25). Matthew was called an apostle (A.D. 27) is related by all three evangelists in the same words, except that Matthew (ix, 9) gives the usual name, and Mark (ii, 14) and Luke (v, 27) that of Levi. Matthew's special occupation was probably the collection of dues and customs from persons who crossed the Lake of Geneva. It was while he was actually engaged in his duties ηπιημαν προ τοι τολων, that he received the call, which he obeyed without delay. Our Lord was then invited by him to a "great feast" (Luke v, 28), to which perhaps, as Neander has said (Life of Christ, p. 290), there was an allusion in the Blunt, Undes. Coincid. p. 257), by way of farewell, his old associates, ιηματα τοιων τοιων, were summoned. The publicans, properly so called (publicani), were persons who farmed the Roman taxes, and they were usually, in later times, knaves, and persons of wealth and credit. They employed under them inferior officers, natives of the province where the taxes were collected, called properly porities, to which class Matthew no doubt belonged. These latter were notorious for impudent exactions everywhere (Plautus, Menec. i, 2, 5; Cic. ad Quint. Fr. 1, 1; Plut. De Curiosis, p. 518 e); but to the Jews they were especially odious, for they were the very spot where the Roman chain gall them, the visible proof of the degraded state of their nation. As a rule, none but the lowest would accept such an unprivileged office, and thus the class became more worthy of the hatred with which in any case the Jews would have regarded it. The readiness, however, with which Matthew obeyed the call of Jesus seems to show that his heart was still open to religious impressions. We find in Luke vi, 13, that when Jesus, before delivering the Sermon on the Mount, selected twelve disciples, who were to form the circle of his more intimate associates, Matthew was one of them. On a subsequent occasion (Luke vi, 26), Matthew gave the partake entertainment to his friends. After this event he is mentioned only in Mark i, 18, A.D. 30.

III. Traditionary Notices. — According to a statement in Clemens Alexandrinus (Pædagog. ii. 3), Matthew abstained from animal food. Hence some writers have rather hastily concluded that he belonged to the sect of the Essenes. It is true that the Essenes practiced abstinance in a high degree, but it is not true that they rejected animal food altogether. Admitting the account in Clemens Alexandrinus to be correct, it proves only that Matthew possessed the Essene abstinence, of which the occurrence of vestiges in the habits of other Jews (comp. Josephus, "Life," 2 and 3). Some interpreters find also in Rom. xiv. an allusion to Jews of ascetic principles.

According to another account, which is as old as the first century, and which occurs in the Kýrýpus Hýbris in Clemens Alexandrinus (Hist. Ecles. vi. 15), Matthew, after the death of Jesus, remained about fifteen years in Jerusalem. This agrees with the statement in Eusebius (Hist. Ecles. iii. 24), that Matthew preached to his own nation before he went to foreign countries. Buxinus (Hist. Ecles. x. 9) and Socrates (Hist. Ecles. i. 19) state that he afterwards went into Ethiopia (Meroë); but Ambrose says that God opened to him the country of the Persians (Ps. 85); Isodore, the Macedonians (Isodore Hist. De Sanct. 77); and others the Parthians, the Maccabees, and Ephraim of Edessa. Florinius Exercit. hist. phil. p. 29; Credner, "Jesu. ins. N. T. 1. i. 58." There also he probably preached specially to the Jews. See Abride, Histor. Aporit. vii. in Fabriici Cod. apocr. i. 686; Perizonii Vit. p. 114; comp. Martyr. Rom. Sept. 21. According to Hæraclean (about A. D. 202), and Eusebius, who showed him the churches of Thrace (Hist. Ecles. i. 19), Matthew was one of those apostles who did not suffer martyrdom, which Clement, Origen, and Tertullian seem to accept: the tradition that he died a martyr, be it true or false, came in afterwards (Niceph. H. E. ii. 41). Tischendorf has published the apocryphal "Acts and Martyrdom of Matthew" (Acta Apocrypha, Lips., 1841). See Acts, SPODVS.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL of, the first of the four memoirs of our Lord in all the arrangements. See New Testament.

I. Author.—There is no ancient book with regard to the authorship of which we have earlier, fuller, and more unanimous testimony. From Papias, almost if not quite contemporary with the apostles, downwards, we have a stream of unimpeachable witnesses to the fact that Matthew was the author of a gospel; while the quotations which abound in the works of the fathers prove that at least as early as Ireneus—if we may not also add Justin, whose "Memorabilia of Christ" we cannot but identify with the "Gospels" he speaks of as in public use—the Gospel received by the Church under the direct inspiration of those who therefrom, and that these events to times in which they did not happen; for instance, the rejection at Nazareth, mentioned in Luke iv. 14–30, must have happened at the commencement of Christ's public career, but Matthew relates it as late as xii. 38. But, on the other hand, there is no reason to suppose that the evangelists intended to write a chronological biography. On the contrary, we learn from Luke i. 4, and John xx. 31, that their object was of a more practical and apologetic tendency. With the exception of John, the evangelists have grouped their communications more according to subjects than according to chronological succession. This fact is now generally admitted. As to the particular event above referred to, namely, the rejection of Christ at Nazareth, it appears to have occurred twice; Luke (iv. 14–31) giving the earlier, and Matthew (xxi. 23–31) the later instance. See Strong's Harmony of the Gospels, § 32, 60, and notes.

II. (4th.) He embodies in one discourse several sayings of Christ which, according to Luke, were pronounced at different times (comp. Matt. v.–vii., and xxii.). But if the evangelist arranged his utterances as subjects, and not chronologically, we must not be surprised that he connects similar sayings of Christ, inserting them in the longer discourses after analogous topics had example, Matt. iv. 18 with Luke v. 1 sq.; Matt. viii. 5 sq. with Luke vii. 1 sq. This is most striking in the history of his own call, where we should expect a clearer representation. To this it may be replied that the gift of narrating luminously is a personal qualification of which even an apostle might be desirous, and which is rarely found among the lower orders of people; this argument is strengthened, too, by the occurrence of vestiges in the habits of other Jews (comp. Josephus, "Life," 2 and 3). Some interpreters find also in Rom. xiv. an allusion to Jews of ascetic principles. According to another account, which is as old as the first century, and which occurs in the Kýrýpus Hýbris in Clemens Alexandrinus (Hist. Ecles. vi. 15), Matthew, after the death of Jesus, remained about fifteen years in Jerusalem. This agrees with the statement in Eusebius (Hist. De Sanct. 77); and others the Parthians, the Maccabees, and Ephraim of Edessa. Florinius Exercit. hist. phil. p. 29; Credner, "Jesu. ins. N. T. 1. i. 58." There also he probably preached specially to the Jews. See Abride, Histor. Aporit. vii. in Fabriici Cod. apocr. i. 686; Perizonii Vit. p. 114; comp. Martyr. Rom. Sept. 21. MATTHEW, GOSPEL of, the first of the four memoirs of our Lord in all the arrangements. See New Testament.

I. Author.—There is no ancient book with regard to the authorship of which we have earlier, fuller, and more unanimous testimony. From Papias, almost if not quite contemporary with the apostles, downwards, we have a stream of unimpeachable witnesses to the fact that Matthew was the author of a gospel; while the quotations which abound in the works of the fathers prove that at least as early as Ireneus—if we may not also add Justin, whose "Memorabilia of Christ" we cannot but identify with the "Gospels" he speaks of as in public use—the Gospel received by the Church under the direct inspiration of those who therefrom, and that these been mentioned. These discourses are not, in fact, compiled by the evangelist, but always form the fundamental framework to which sometimes analogous subjects are attached. Moreover, it can be proved that several sayings are more correctly placed by Matthew than by Luke (compare especially Matt. xxii. 8-37 with Luke xii. 35-38). (6th) He falls, it is asserted, into positive errors. In ch. i. and ii he seems not to know that the real dwelling-place of the parents of Jesus was at Nazareth, and that their abode at Bethlehem was only temporary (compare Matt. ii. 1, 23; 23 with Luke ii. 4, 39). According to Mark xi. 20, 21, the temple was in ruins when the day after it was cursed; but according to Matt. xxv. 19, it was withdrawn immediately. Accordingly to Matt. xxii. 12, Christ purified the Temple immediately after his entrance into Jerusalem; but according to Mark he on that day went out to Bethany, and purified the Temple on the day following (Mark xi. 11-15). Matthew says (xxii. 7) that Christ rode on a she-ass and on a colt, which is impossible; the other Gospels speak only of a she-ass. But it depends entirely upon the mode of interpretation whether such positive errors as are alleged to exist are really characterized as such. The controversies, for instance, between the narrative of the birth of Christ, as severally recorded by Matthew and Luke, may easily be solved without questioning the correctness of either, if we suppose that each of them narrates what he knows from his individual sources of information. The history of Joseph's childhood does not appear in Luke, but it is the same story as that of the Hebrews, when he was about to go to others also, he committed to writing in his native tongue his Gospel (vó eur' aútov t' inýýkōlon), so filled up by his writing that which was lacking of his presence to whom whom he was departing from" (Eusebius, H. E. iii. 34). The text of Matthew can, therefore, conclude that it was derived from the acquaintance of Mary, while the statements in Matthew seem to be derived from the friends of Joseph. As to the transaction recorded in Matt. xxii. 18-22, and Mark xi. 11, 15, 20, 21, it appears that Mark describes what occurred most accurately; and yet there is nothing in Matthew's account really inconsistent with the true order of events.

On the other hand, some of the most beautiful and most important sayings of our Lord, the historical creditability of which no sceptic can attack, have been preserved by Matthew alone (Matt. xi. 28-30; xvi. 16-18; xxviii. 20; compare also xi. 2-21; xii. 3-5, 23-29; xvii. 12, 25, 26; xxvi. 18). Above all, the Sermon on the Mount, although containing some things apparently not coincident in time (for instance, the Lord's prayer), is yet far more complete and systematic than the comparatively meagre report of Luke. It may also be proved that in many particulars the reports of several discourses in Matthew are more exact than in the other evangelists, as may be seen by comparing Matt. xxiii with the various references in Luke and by the concordance "Ueber den Ursprung des Evangelium Mattheus" (Tübingen, 1834); Obhausen, Drei Programme, 1855; and the two Lucubrations of Harles, 1840 and 1843.

II. Time and Place of Its Composition. There is little in the Gospel itself to throw any light on the date of its composition. In xxvii. 7, 8; xxviii. 15, we have evidence of a date some years subsequent to the resurrection; but these may well be additions of a later hand, and prove nothing as to the age of the substance of the Gospel. Little trust can be placed in the dates given by some late writers — e. g. Theophylact, Euthymius Zigabenus, Eusebius's Chron., eight years after the Ascension; Niceph., Callist., and the Chron. Pasch., A.D. 45. The only early testimony is that of Ireneaus (Her. iii. 1, p. 174), that it was written "when Peter and Paul were preaching in Rome, and founding the Church." This would bring it down to about A.D. 63 — probably somewhat earlier, as this is the latest date assigned for Luke's Gospel; and we have the authority of a tradition, accepted by Origen, for the priority of that of Matthew (νυ πατριας μίν . . . ἔτοι πρῶτον μίν γίγνεται το εὐαγγελίον τοι Ἰησοῦ τοῦ Κυρίου, Eusebius, H. E. vi. 12). This or that event happening, in order that a particular prophecy might be fulfilled (τὸ καὶ προφητεύων ἐκ τοῦ Κυρίου [οὐ θεοῦ] καὶ τοῦ προφητεύοντος, i. 22; ii. 15; xxi. 4; xxvii. 56; comp. ii. 17; iii. 3; iv. 14; viii. 17, etc.), while his whole Gospel is full of allusions to those passages and sayings of the O. T. recorded in the Gospels, no trace of which is detected and foreshadowed. As Da Costa has remarked (Four Witnesses, p. 20), he regards the events he narrates as "realized prophecy," and everything is recorded with after the Ascension — i. e. about A.D. 51; and then the present Greek edition may have been issued not much later, or shortly before Matthew's removal from Judea, i.e. about A.D. 47. Tilleman maintains A.D. 33; Townsend, A.D. 37; Owen and Tomline, A.D. 38; David- son, Introd. N. T., inclines to A.D. 41-45; while Hug, Eichhorn, and others, in considering the evidence, considering the faith of Zacharias the son of Baruch, whose murder is recorded by Josephus (War, iv. 6, 4), place its composition shortly after the fall of Jerusalem, a theory which is rejected by De Wette and Meyer, and may safely be dismissed as untenable.

With regard to the place, there is no difference of opinion. All ancient authorities agree that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Palestine, and this has been as unanimously received by modern critics.

III. For what Readers was it Written? — The concordant testimony of the early Church that Matthew drew up his Gospel for the benefit of the Jewish Christians of Palestine (τοις ἀχικούσις παιδευόμενοι, Orig. ap. Eusebius, H. E. vi. 25), has been accepted without question, and may be regarded as a settled point. The statement of Matthew as to the first readers, that he wrote it "to the Hebrews, when he was about to go to others also," is committed to writing in his native tongue his Gospel (τὸ καὶ προφητεύων ἐκ τοῦ Κυρίου [οὐ θεοῦ] καὶ τοῦ προφητεύοντος, i. 22; ii. 15; xxi. 4; xxvii. 56; comp. ii. 17; iii. 3; iv. 14; viii. 17, etc.), while his whole Gospel is full of allusions to those passages and sayings of the O. T. recorded in the Gospels, no trace of which is detected and foreshadowed. As Da Costa has remarked (Four Witnesses, p. 20), he regards the events he narrates as "realized prophecy," and everything is recorded with this view, that he may lead his countrymen to recognise in Jesus their promised Deliverer and King.

It is in keeping with the destination of his Gospel that we find in Matthew less frequent explanations of Jewish customs, laws, and localities than in the other Gospels. Knowledge of these is presupposed in the readers (Matt. xxv. 1, 2 with Mark vii, 1-4; Matt. xxvii. 66, and xxviii. 17; Mark xiv. 11, 22, 26, 30, xxi, 2, and other places). Jerusalem is the holy city (see below, Style and Diction). Jesus is of the elect line (i. 1; ix. 27; xii. 22; xxv. 22; xx. 39; xxi. 9, 15); is to be born of a virgin in David's place, Bethlehem (i. 22; llii. v. 49); must sit in the midst of the altar (i. 19); must have a forerunner, John the Baptist (iii. 3; xii. 19); to labor in the east out Galilee that sat in darkness (iv. 14-16); his healing was a promised mark of his office (vii. 17; xii. 17), and so was his mode of teaching by parables (xiii. 14); he entered the holy city as Messiah (xxvi. 5-16); was rejected by the people, in fulfillment of a prophecy (xxxi. 42), and deserted by his disciples in the same way (xxxi. 31, 56). The Gospel is pervaded by one principle, the fulfillment of the law and of the Messianic prophecies in the person of Jesus. This sets it in opposition to the Judaism of the time, for it refused to make Pharisaic interpretation of the law (v, xxiii), and proclaimed Jesus as the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world through his blood, ideas which were strange to the cramped and limited Judaism of the Christian era. In the Sermon on the Mount (v. 3-21) he was scattering fire over the defiler but the fullifier of the Mosaic law. When the twelve are sent forth they are forbidden to go "into the way of the Gentiles" (x. 5; comp. xv. 24). In the same passage—the only one in which the Samaritans are mentioned—that abhorred race is put on a level with the heathen, not at once to be gladdened with the Gospel message.

But while we keep this in view, as the evangelist's first object, we must not strain it too narrowly, as if he had no other purpose than to combat the objections and to satisfy the prepossessions of the Jews. No evangelist expresses with greater distinctness the universality of Christ's mission, or does more to break down the narrow notion of a Messiah for Israel who was not one also for the whole world; none delivers stronger warnings against trusting to an Abrahamic descent for acceptance in Christ, and none shows more clearly the visit of the magi (i. 1 sq.), symbolizing the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles; it is he that speaks of the fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy, when "the nations that sat in darkness saw a great light" (iv. 15, 16), and when the sum of the law of the centurion is the servant what is wanting to the universalistic Luke, that "many should come from the East and West," etc. (vii. 11). The narrative of the Syro-Phoenician woman, omitted by Luke, is given by Matthew, in whom alone we also find the command to "make disciples of all nations" (xxxi. 19), and the unrestricted invitation to "all that labor and are heavy laden" (xi. 28). Nowhere are we made more conscious of the deep contrast between the spiritual teaching of Christ and the formal teaching of the rulers of the Jewish Church. We see also that others besides Jewish readers were contemplated, from the interpretations and explanations occasionally added, e.g. Immanuel, i. 33; Golgotha, xxvii. 38; Eli, lama sabbachthani, ver. 46.

IV. Original Language.—While there is absolutely nothing in the Gospel itself to lead us to imagine that it is a translation, and, on the contrary, everything favors the view that in the present Greek text, with its perpetual verbal correspondence with the other synoptists, we have the original composition of the author himself; yet the unanimous testimony of all antiquity affirms that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew, i.e. the Aramaic or Syro- Chaldaic dialect, which was the vernacular tongue of the then inhabitants of Palestine. The internal evidence, therefore, is at variance with the external, and it is by no means easy to adjust the claims of the two.

1. External Evidence.—The unanimity of all ancient authorities as to the Hebrew origin of this Gospel is complete. In the words of the late canon Cureton (Syrac. Recension, p. lxxviii), "no fact relating to the history of the Gospel is more fully and satisfactorily established. From the days of the apostles down to the end of the 4th century, every writer who had occasion to refer to this matter has testified the same thing. Papias, Irenaeus, Pantasius, Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, Epiphanius, Jerome, all with one consent confirm this. In the chain of traditions which it behooves us to be amply sufficient to establish the fact that Matthew wrote his Gospel originally in the Hebrew dialect of that time, for the benefit of Jews who understood and spoke the language. To look at the evidence more particularly.—(1) The earliest witness is Papias, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, in the beginning of the 2d century; a hearer of the apostle, or more probably of the presbyter John, and a companion of Polycarp (Irenaeus, Haer. v. 38, 4). Eusebius describes him (H. E. iii. 86) as "a man of the widest general information, and well acquainted with the Scriptures" (ἀνωφή τοῦ συναγωνίου ἔχασαν καὶ τοῦ νόημας τῶν μάρτυρων, H. E. iii. 89), this unfavorable view seems chiefly to have reference to his millenarian views (comp. Irenaeus, Haer. v. 38, 4), and can hardly involve any doubt of his testimony. Papias says, it would seem on the authority of John the Presbyter, "Matthew compiled his Gospel (or the oracles) in the Hebrew dialect; while each interpreted them accordingly to his ability." (Mαθητος καὶ οἱ των Ἱβραϊκήν διαλέκτου τῆς λόγου συναγωνίου εἰς τοὺς τοῦ τῆς λόγου τοῦ Παπίαν οὖν καὶ τῆς γλώσσας τῆς λόγου, H. E. iii. 89). In estimating the value of this testimony, two important points have to be considered—the meaning of the term λόγος, and whether Papias is speaking of the present or the past. On the latter point there can be little doubt. His use of the aorist, ἀποκαλύφθη, not ἀπεκαλύφθη, evidently shows that the state of things to which he or his original authority referred had passed away, and that individual translation was no longer necessary. It would seem, therefore, to follow, that "an authorized Greek representative of the Hebrew Matthew" had come into use (comp. ib. p. 207, note). The signification of λόγος has been much controverted. Schleiermacher (Stud. u. Krit. 1832, p. 785) was the first to explain the term of a supposed "collection of discourses" which is held to have been the basis that, by gradual addition of historical information, was transformed into the existing Gospel (Meyer, Comm. i. 19). This view has found wide acceptance, and has been strenuously maintained by Lachmann (Stud. u. Krit. 1885), Meyer, De Wette, Creuzer, Weizsäcker, Lobeck, Hug, Ebrard, Balz, Delitzsch, Hilgenfeld, Thiersch, Alford, Westcott, etc. But λόγος, in the N. T., signifies the whole revelation made by God, rather than the mere words in which that revelation is contained (Acts vii. 58; Rom. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12; 1 Pet. iv. 11); and, as has been convincingly shown by Hug and Ebrard, the passage in which the word is used confirms the opinion that, as used by Papias, both in this passage and in the title of his own work (λόγων εκείνων έχθροφρος), it implies a combined record of facts and discourses corresponding to the latter use of the word gospel. (2.) The next witness is Irenaeus, who, as quoted by Eusebius (H. E. v. 8), says that "Matthew among the Hebrews published also a written Gospel in their own language" (τῷ ἱδίῳ αὐτῶν έξηγήσεως), it implies a combined record of facts and discourses corresponding to the latter use of the word gospel. (3.) The next witness is Irenaeus, who, as quoted by Eusebius (H. E. v. 8), says that "Matthew among the Hebrews published also a written Gospel in their own language." Hug and Ebrard have attempted to invalidate this testimony, as a mere repetition of that of Papias, whose discourse corresponding to the latter use of the word gospel; but the more safely accept it as independent evidence. (3.) Pantanasmus, the next witness, cannot be considered as strengthening the case for the Hebrew original much; though, as far as it goes, his evidence is definite enough. His story, as reported by Eusebius, is that "he is said to have gone to the Indians (probably in the south of Arabia), where it is reported that the Gospel of Matthew had preceded him among some who had ther acknowledged Christ, to whom it is said that he taught the doctrines and habits of the Sermon on the Mount. And left with them the writing of Matthew in Hebrew letters (Ἑβραϊκα γραμματα την τον Ματθαιου καταληψις γραφην), and that it was preserved to the time mentioned." Jerome tells the same tale, with the same result. The apostle Barnabas had preached there, and had left with them the writing of Matthew in Hebrew letters (Ἑβραϊκα γραμματα την τον Ματθαιου καταληψις γραφην), and that it was preserved to the time mentioned. Jerome says: "I believe the same relates, with the same result, even by Eusebius. (4) The testimony of Origen has already been referred to. It is equally definite with those quoted above on the fact that the Gospel was "published for Hebrew believers, and composed in Hebrew letters" (εις διδακτην αυτο δοσος τοις απο του αυτοιν καταληπτον γραμματην αναπτυγμαν Εβραιους ουσιων αναπτυγμενον), whereas the testimony for questioning the independence of Origen's evidence, or for tracing it back to Papia. He clearly states what was the belief of the Church at that time, and without a doubt as to its correctness. (For a refutation of the objections brought against it by Masch and Hug, etc., see Benade, "De Vir. Ill. 20, 196, p. 941) in which he ascribes the words ψηφι τω συμβατου to the translator (παρα του επεξεργασαι της γραφης), adding: "For the evangelists Matthew delivered his Gospel in the Hebrew tongue." This is very important evidence as to the belief of Eusebius, which was clearly that of the Church generally, that the Gospel was originally composed in Hebrew. (6) Ephraimus (Harr. xxi., p. 124) states the same fact without the shadow of a doubt, adding that Matthew was the only evangelist who wrote Εβραϊκα και Εβραιους γραμματην. The value of his evidence, however, is impaired by his identification of the Hebrew original with that employed by the Nazarenes and Ebionites, by whom he asserts it was still preserved (της αυτης ειρήνης). (7) The same observation may also be made concerning the testimony of Jerome, whose references to this subject are very frequent, and who is the only one of the fathers that appears to have actually seen the supposed Hebrew archetype (Pref. ad Matt.; De Vir. Ill. 8 and 86; In Gospels, xvi. 1; Pfaff, Comment. in Evangel. Hedii, quod. v.; Comm. in Hosa, v.) A perusal of these passages shows that there was a book preserved in the library collected by Pamphilus at Cesarea, which was supposed to be the Hebrew original ("ipsem Hebraicam"), and was as such transcribed and translated into Greek and Latin by Jerome, about A.D. 892, from a copy obtained from the Nazarenes at the Syrian city of Berœa. Afterwards, about A.D. 898 (Comm. in Matt. xxi, 13), he speaks more emphatically of it, "quod vocatur a plerique Matt. authenticum." Later on, on A.D. 416 (Contra Polagr., ii. 9), the same opinion is still held, and he must have received the book used by the Nazarenes, and preserved in the library at Cesarea, as "Ev. juxta Hebraeos. . . sequendum Apostolos, sive ut plerique autumant juxta Mattheum" (comp. Edib. Rev. July, 1861, p. 39; De Wette, Eclog. p. 10). While, then, we may safely accept Jerome as an additional witness to the belief of the early Church that Matthew's Gospel was originally composed in Hebrew (Aramaic), which he mentions as something universally recognised without a hint of a doubt, we may reasonably question whether the book he translated had any sound claim to be considered the genuine work of Matthew. The evidence of Jerome himself is not unreasonably discovered, though he be shrunk from openly confessing it. We may remark, in confirmation of this, that the Aramaic book had suffered considerably from the Greek Gospel. Jerome would hardly have taken the trouble to translate it; and that while, whenever he refers to Matthew, he cites it according to the present text, he never quotes the Nazarene Gospel as a work of canonical authority, but only in such terms as "quo stument Nazareni," "quod lectionis Nazareni," "quod inter Genuites, sub Ille Hes. Nazar.," and "subtilior," doubtfully, "qui crediderit evangelum, quod secundum Hebreosedition eorum translatum," language inconsistent with his having regarded it as canonical Scripture. (9) The statements of later writers, Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, Eusebius, Gregory Nazianzen, etc., merely echo the same testimony, and need not be more particularly referred to.

An impartial survey of the above evidence leads to the conclusion that, in the face of so many independent witnesses, we should be violating the first principles of historical criticism if we refused to accept the fact that Matthew wrote his Gospel originally in Hebrew. But whether this original was ever seen by Jerome or Ephraimus is more than questionable.

2. Internal Evidence.—What, then, is the origin of our present text? It is generally supposed to have been brought by the Hebrew Gospel to the Gentiles through the labours of Jerome, and through a series of joint translators, from the Greek text of the Old Testament, which is generally regarded as its source. (2) The existing form and language? What is its authority? These are the questions which now meet us, and to which it must be confessed it is not easy to give a satisfactory answer. We may at the outset lay down as indisputable, in opposition to Cureton (who asserts, ut supra, the text of the Greek New Testament is the text of the Hebrew original), that the phenomena of the Greek text as we have it—its language, its coincidences with and divergences from the other synoptists, the quotations from the Old Testament, etc., and the citations made from it by ancient writers, all oppose the notion of the present Greek text being a translation, and support its canonical authority. (1) An important argument may be drawn from the use made of the existing Greek text by all ancient writers. As Olshausen remarks (Clark's ed., i. xxvii), while all the fathers of the Church assert the Hebrew origin of the Gospel, they without exception make use of the existing Greek text as canonical Scripture, and that without doubt or question, or anything that would lead to the belief that they regarded it as of less authority than the original Hebrew, or possessed it in any other form than that in which we now have it. (3) Another argument in favor of the authoritative character of our present Gospel arises from its universal diffusion and general acceptance, both in the Church and among her adversaries. Had the Hebrew Gospel been the original, the Church, as theology and a profane science, would hardly have been so much in debt to the existing form of the Greek text, and our Greek Gospel been a mere translation, executed, as Jerome asserts, by some unknown individual ("quid postea in Grecum translatetur non satis certum est," De Vir. Ill. 8), would not, as Olshausen remarks, ut supra, objections to it have been urged in some quarter or other, particularly in the country where Matthew himself labored, and for whose inhabitants the Hebrew was written? Would its statements have been accepted without a cavil by the opponents of the Church? No trace of such opposition is, however, to be found, and it may be fairly doubted whether the Greek text has any canonical authority. (4) Again, the text itself bears no marks of a translation. This is especially evident in the mode of dealing with the citations from the Old Testament. These are of two kinds: (a) those standing in the discourse of our Lord himself, and the interlocutors; and (b) those inserted by the compiler as proofs of our Lord's Messiahship. Now if we assume, as is certainly most probable (though the contrary has been maintained by Hug, the late duke of Manchester, and more recently by the Rev. Alexander Roberts, whose learned and able "Discourse" work on the Greek text merits the attentive consideration from every Biblical student), that Aramaic, not Greek, was the language ordinarly used by our Lord and his Jewish contemporaries, we should certainly expect that any citations from the Old Test., made by them in ordinary discourse, would be from the original Hebrew or its Aramaic counterpart, not from the deformed version, and would stand as such in the Aramaic record; while it would argue more than the ordinary license of a mere translator to substitute the Sept. renderings, even when at variance with the Hebrew before him. Yet what is the case? While in the class (b), our canonicity, which may be assumed to have had no representative in the current Greek oral tradition which we assume as the basis of the synoptical Gospels, we find original renderings of the Hebrew text; in the class (a), on the other hand, where we might, a priori, have looked for an even closer connection, Asiatic tradition exists from the time of the Sept., even where it deviates from the Hebrew. In (a) we may reckon iii, 8; iv, 4, 6, 7, 10; xv, 4, 8, 9, xix, 5, 18; xxi, 18, 42; xxxii, 59, 44; xxxiii, 89; xxiv, 16, xxxvi, 51; xxvii, 46. In (b), called by Westcott (Introd. p. 206, note 1) "Cyproc quotations," i, 20; ii, 6, 15, 18; iv, 15, 16; vii, 17; xii, 16 sq.; xxxii, 85; xxxv, 5; xxvii, 9, 10). In two cases Matthew's citations agree with the synoptic parallels in a derivation from the Sept., all being drawn from the same oral groundwork. Matthew's quotations have been examined by Codriner, one of the ablest modern scholars who profess to decide for their derivation from the Greek (Kinloch, p. 94.; comp. De Wette, Eiat. p. 198). We may therefore not unreasonably find here additional evidence that in the existing Greek text we have the work, not of a mere translator, but of an independent and authoritative writer. (4.) The verbal correspondences between Matthew and the other synoptists in their narratives, and especially in the report of the speeches of our Lord and others, are difficult to account for if we regard it as a translation. As Alford remarks (Gr. Text. Proleg. i, 28), "The translator must have been either acquainted with the other two Gospels, in which case it is inconceivable that, in the midst of the present coincidences in many passages, such divergences should have occurred, or unacquainted with them, in which case the identity itself would be altogether inexplicable." Indeed, in the words of Codriner (Kinloch, p. 94, 85), "the Greek original of this Gospel is affirmed by its continual correspondence with those of Mark and Luke, and that not only in general and important facts, but in particulars and minute details, in the general plan, in entire clauses, and in separates; and phenomena which admit of no explanation under the hypothesis of a translation from the Hebrew." (5.) This inference in favor of an original Greek Gospel is strongly confirmed by the fact that all versions, even the Peshito Syriac, the language in which the Gospel is said to have been originally written, are taken from the Greek text. The first of the three canon Cureton (Syriac Recens., p. lxx sq.) argues with much ability against this, and expends much learning and skill in proof of his hypothesis that the Syriac version of Matthew published by him is more ancient than the Peshito, and may be regarded, as in the main, identical with the Aramaic Gospel of Matthew; which he also considers to have been identical with the Gospel according to the Hebrews, used by the Nazarenes and Ebionites, "modified by some additions, interpolations, and perhaps some omissions." His statement (p. xiii) that "there is a manifest difference between the recension of Matthew and that of the other Gospels, proving that they are by different hands—the former showing no signs, as the others do, of translation from the Greek"—demands the respect due to so careful a scholar; but he fails entirely to explain the extraordinary fact that, in the very country where Matthew published his Gospel, and within a comparatively short period, a version from the Greek was substituted for the authentic original; nor have his views met with general acceptance among scholars.

So far as Matthew stated the arguments in favor of a Hebrew and Greek original respectively, it remains for us to inquire whether there is any way of adjusting the claims of the two. Were there no explanation of this inconsistency between the external assertions and the internal facts, it would be hard to doubt the correctness of testimony of so many old writers, whose belief in it is shown by the tenacity with which they held it in spite of their own experience.

(1.) But it is certain that a Gospel, not the same as ours, may have been the basis of the Apocryphal Gospels mentioned above; and some of the witnesses we have quoted appear to have referred to this in one or other of its various forms or names. The Christians in Palestine still held that the Mosaic ritual was binding on them, even after the destruction of Jerusalem. At the close of the first century, Christianity existed from the spiritual law was only binding on Jewish converts; this was the Nazarenes. Another, the Ebionites, held that it was of universal obligation on Christians, and rejected Paul's Epistles as teaching the opposite doctrine. These two sects, who differed also in the most important tenets to our Lord's person, possessed each a modification of the same Gospel, which no doubt each altered more and more, as their tenets diverged, and which bore various names—the Gospel of the twelve Apostles, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the Gospel of Peter, or the Gospel according to Matthew. The question now is to decide that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was not identical with our Gospel of Matthew; but it had many points of resemblance to the synoptical Gospels, and especially to Matthew. What was its origin it is impossible to say; it may have been a description of the oral teaching of the apostles, especially Peter, and may have come in its early and pure form from the hand of Matthew, or it may have been a version of the Greek Gospel of Matthew, as the evangelist who wrote especially for Hebrews. Now this Gospel, "the Proteus of criticism" (Thiersch), did exist, it is impossible that when the Hebrew Matthew is spoken of, this questionable document, the Gospel of the Hebrews, was really referred to? Observe that all accounts of it are at second hand (with a notable exception); no one quotes it; in cases of doubt about the text, Origen even does not appeal from the Greek to the Hebrew. All that is certain is, that Nazarenes or Ebionites, or both, boasted that they possessed the original Gospel of Matthew. Jerome is the exception, and him we can convict of the very mistake of confusing the two, and almost on his own confession. As first brought before the world by an anonymous writer (Edinburgh Review, 1801, July, p. 39), "that it was the authentic Matthew, and translated it into both Greek and Latin from a copy which he obtained at Berea, in Syria. This appears from his De Vir. Ill., written in the year 892. Six years later, in his Commentaries on the Pentateuch, he says that it is the same which he has quoted in his other works—"Vocatur a pluribus Mercatius authenticum. Later still, in his book on the Pelagian heresy, written in the year 415, he modifies his account still further, describing the work as the Evangelium Iuxta Hebrom, quod Chaldaice uidem Syro-Necensarum, sed Hebraicis literis coniecturam est, quo unutur usque hodie Nazareneri secundum Apostolos, sive ut plerique autem iuxta Matthewum, quod et in Casariensi habetur Bibliotheca." There have pronounced for a Greek original—Erasmus, Calvin, Lefebvre, Fabricius, Lightfoot, Wetstein, Paulus, Lardner, Hey, Hales, Hug. Schott, De Wette, Moses Stuart, Frischathe, Credner, Thiersch, and many others. Great names are ranged also on the other side, as Simon, Mill, Michaelis, Marsh, Eichhorn, Storr, Osnabrun, and others. May not the truth be that Paul, knowing more of one than any Greek Gospel in use among the Judaic sects, may have assumed the existence of a Hebrew original from which these were supposed to be taken, and knowing also the genuine Greek Gospel may have looked on all these, in the loose, uncrirical way which seems for him so convenient, as the various "interpolations" to which he alludes? It is by no means improbable that after several inaccurate and imperfect translations of the Aramaic original came into circulation, Matthew himself was prompted by this circumstance to publish a Greek translation, or to have his Gospel translated under his own supervision. It is very likely that this Greek translation did not soon come into general circulation, so that it is even possible that Papen may have remained ignorant of its existence, and not to the last sentence. Stuart, in the Amer. Bibl. Repos. 1838, p. 130-179, 815-356.

(2.) We think that Mr. Westcott—to whom the study of the Gospels owes so much—has pointed out the road to a still better solution. Not that the difficulties which beset this matter can be regarded as cleared up, or the question finally and satisfactorily settled, but a mode of reconciling the inconsistency between testimony and fact has been indicated, which, if pursued, may, we think, lead to a decision. “It has been shown,” says Mr. Westcott (Intro. p. 206, note), “that the oral Gospel probably existed from the first both in Aramaic and in Greek, and in this way a preparation for a fresh representation of the Hebrew Gospel was at once found. The parts of the Aramaic oral Gospels which were adopted by Matthew already existed in the Greek counterpart. The change was not so much a version as a substitution; and frequent coincidence with common parts of Mark and Luke, which were derived from the same oral Greek Gospel, was a necessary consequence. Yet it may have happened that, as long as the Hebrew and Greek churches were in close communion, perhaps till the time of the Barbabastican or of the death of Jesus (c. 30), no Gospel of Matthew—i.e. such a version of the Greek oral Gospel as would exactly answer to Matthew's version of the Aramaic—was committed to writing. When, however, the separation between the two sections grew more marked, the Greek Gospel was written, not indeed as a translation, but as a representation of the original, as a Greek oral counterpart was already current.”

This theory of the origin of the Greek Gospel, it appears to us, meets the facts of the case, and satisfies its requirements more fully than any other. We have seen above that the language of Papias indicates that, even in his day, the Gospel of Matthew existed substantially in Greek, and its universal diffusion and general authority in the earliest ages of the Church prove that its composition cannot be placed much after the times of the apostles. May it not have been then that the two—the Aramaic and the Greek Gospel—existed for some time in their most important portions as an old tradition side by side—that the Aramaic was the first to be committed to writing, and gained a wide though temporary circulation among the Hebrew Christians of Syria and Palestine, as would accord with the want of a Greek Gospel for the use of the Hellenistic Jews was felt, this also was published in its written form, either by Matthew himself (as is maintained by Thiersch, Olshausen, and Lee), or by those to whom, from constant repetition, the main portions were familiar; perhaps under the apostle's eye, and with the virtual, if not the formal sanction of the Church at Jerusalem? As it supplied a need widely felt by the Gentile Christians, it would at once obtain currency, and as the Gentile Church rapidly extended her borders, while that of the Hebrews was confined within narrower limits, this Greek Gospel would speedily supplant its Hebrew predecessor, and thus furnish a fresh and most striking example of what Mr. Westcott, in his excellent work on The Bible in the Church (Intro. p. viii), calls “that doctrine of a divine providence separating (as it were) and preserving special books for the perpetual instruction of the Church, which is the true correlative and complement of every sound and reverend theory of inspiration.” No other hypothesis, as Dr. Lee has satisfactorily shown (Inspr. of H., Sec. Appendix M.), than the Greek Gospel being either actually or substantially the production of Matthew himself, accounts for the profound silence of ancient writers respecting the translation, or for the absence of the least trace of any other Greek translation of the Hebrew original.” The hypotheses which assign the translation to Barnabas (Isid. Hispel, Chron. p. 272), John (Theophyl. Euthym. Zigab.) Mark (Greswell), Luke and Paul conjointly (Anastas. Sinaiai), or James the brother of our Lord (Syn. Sacr. Scr. apud Athanass. ii. 295), are mere arbitrary assertions without any foundation in tradition. “The last mentioned are ingenious, as we may reasonably suppose that the bishop of Jerusalem would feel solicitude for the spiritual wants of the Hellenistic Christians of that city.

Those who desire to pursue the investigation of this subject will find ample material for doing so in the Introductions of Hug, De Wette, Credner, etc.; Marsh's Michaelis, vol. iii. pt. i. where the patristic authorities are fully discussed; and they will be found, for the most part, in Kirchhofer, Quellen- und sammlung, where there will also be found the passages referring to the Gospel of the Hebrews, p. 448; also in most of the commentaries. The following have written monographs on this point: Sonntag (Allor, 1696), Schröder (Viteb. 1699, 1702), Masch (Halle, 1755), Williams (London. 1790), Elenner (F. v. 1781), Bualav (Vratsal. 1826), Stuart (Bibl. Repos. 1838), Harless (Erlang, 1841, also 1842, the latter tr. in Bibl. Repos. 1844), Tregelles (Kitto's Journals. 1850, and separately), Alexander (Bibl. 1850), Roberts (London. 1864). More general discussions may be found in Lardner's Credibility, vol. v.; Reuss's Geschi. d. Kains; Tregelles on The Original Language of St. Matthew; Herr. A. Robert's Der Herr und seine eigentliche Offenbarung—etc. Of Olshausen, Meyer, Alford, Wetstein, Kuinol, Fritzsche, Lange, etc.; and the works on the Gospels of Norton (Credibility), Westcott, Baur, Giseler (Entstehung), Hillefledt, etc.; Cureton's Syriac Recension Preface; and Dr. W. Lee on Inspiration, Appendix M.; Jeremiah Jones's Vindication of St. Matthew; Ewald, Die drei Erst. Er., and Jaboobch d. Bibl. Wissemack. 1848-49.

V. Characteristics.—Matthew's emphatically is the Gospel of the Kingdom. The main object of the evangelist is to portray the kingly character of Christ, and to show that in him the ideal of the King reigning in righteousness, the true Heir of David's throne, was fulfilled (comp. Augustine, De Consens. Ev. passim). Thus the tone throughout is majestic and kingly. He views things in the grand general aspect, and, indifferent to the details in which Matthew labors so much to dwell, he gathers up all in the great result. His narrative proceeds with a majesty and simplicity, regardless of time and place, according to another and deeper order, ready to sacrifice mere chronology or locality to the development of this idea. Thus he brings together events separated by many years, connected in the case, the unity of their nature or purpose, and with a grand but simple power accumulates in groups the discourses, parables, and miracles of our Lord (I. Williams, Study of Gospels, p. 26). From the formation and objects of the Gospels, we should expect that their prevailing characteristic would be marked not by a general tone and spirit than by minute peculiarities. Not, however, that these latter are wanting. It has already been remarked how the genealogy with which Matthew's Gospel opens sets our Lord forth in his kingly character, as a king destined to reign over a new秦国 the royal line of which he was the true successor and fulfillment. As we advance we find his birth hailed, not by lowly shepherds as in Luke, but by wise men coming to wait on him with royal gifts, inquiring, “Where is he that is born king of the Jews?” and when they, on the Mount the same majesty and authority appear. We hear the Judge himself delivering his sentence; the King laying down the laws of his kingdom, “I say unto you,” and astonish his hearers with the “authority” with which he speaks. The awful majesty of our Lord's supreme power in his teaching and Gospel being illustrated by the narrations of the Scribes and Pharisees, also evidence the authority of a king and lawgiver—“one who knew the mind of God and could reveal it;” which may also be noticed in the lengthened discourses that mark the close of his ministry, in which "the king" and "the kingdom of heaven" come forward with so much frequency (xxi, 8, 15, 22; xxii, 2; xxiii, 14; xxiv, 14; xxv, 1, 9, 44, 49). Nor can we overlook the remarkable circumstance that, in the parable of the marriage-feast, so similar in its general circumstances with that in Luke (xv, 16), instead of "a certain man," it is "a king" making a marriage for his son; and inquiringly speaking for both his armies and binding the unworthy guest. The addition of the doxology also to the Lord's Prayer, with its ascription of "the kingdom, the power, and the glory," is in such true harmony with the same prevailing tone as to lead one to see this fact alone the strongest argument in its genuineness.

But we must not in this, or in any of the Gospels, direct our attention too exclusively to any one side of our Lord's character. "The King is one and the same in all, and so is the Son of Man and the Priest. . . . He who is the King is also the Sacrifice" (Williamson, pp. 82).

The Gospel is that of the King, but it is the King "meek" (xxi, 5), "meek and lowly of heart" (xi, 29); the kingdom is that of "the poor in spirit," "the persecuted for righteousness' sake" (ver. 8, 10), into which "the weary and heavy laden are invited, and which they shall inherit together with its king" (ver. 8). He tells us, was to be one of ourselves, "whose brotherhood with man answered all the anticipations the Jewish prophets had formed of their king, and whose power to relieve the woes of humanity could not be separated from his participation in them, who himself took our infirmities and bore our sicknesses" (viii, 17) (Maurice, Unity of N. T. p. 190).

As the son of David and the son of Abraham, he was the partaker of the sorrows as well as the glories of the throne—the heir of the curse as well as the blessing. The source of all blessings to mankind, fulfilling all the promises to Abraham, the curse due to man's sin meets and centres in him, and is transformed into a blessing when the cross becomes his kingly throne; and from the lowest point of his degradation he reappears, in his resurrection, as the Lord and King to whom "all power is given in heaven and earth." He fulfils the promise, "in thy seed shall all families of the earth be blessed"; in the command to "go and make disciples of all nations," he "expands the I AM, which was the ground of the national polity, into the name of 'the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost'" (Maurice, at p. 280).

Once more, the kingdom he came to establish was to be a fatherly kingdom. The King he made known was one reigning in God's name, and as his representative. That God was the father of his people, as of himself, and through whom human beings were to be adopted as the children of God, the visit of the magi to Abraham, the return thence, the massacre of the innocents, and the reason of the settlement at Nazareth, are given by Matthew alone. To him we owe the notice that "the Pharisées and Sadducees" came to John's baptism (iii, 7); that John was unwilling to baptize our Lord, and the words in which Jesus satisfied his scruples (ver. 13-15); the Sermon on the Mount in its fullest form (ch. vi, vii); the prediction of the call of the Gentiles, appended to the miracle of the centurion's servant (viii, 11, 12); the cure of the two blind men (ix, 25-30); and that memorable passage by which, if by nothing else, Matthew will forever be remembered with thankfulness—which, as perhaps the fullest exposition of the spirit of the Gospel anywhere to be found in Holy Scripture, taught Augustine the difference between the teaching of Christ and that of the best philosophers (xi, 28-30); the sermons of the best writers about the Scriptures, and the most profound commentaries. Four of the parables in ch. xiii, the tares, the bad husbandmen, the pearl, and the draw-net; several incidents relating to Peter, his walking on the water (xix, 28, 31), the blessing pronounced upon him (xvi, 17-19), the tribute-money (xvii, 24, 57); nearly the whole of ch. xxiii, with its lessons of humility and forgiveness, and the parable of the unmerciful servant; the lessons on voluntary continence (xix, 10, 12); the promise to the twelve (ver. 38); the parables of the laborers in the vineyard (xx, 1-16), the two sons (xxii, 28, 32); the transference of the kingdom to the Gentiles (ver. 43); the parable of the marriage of the king's son (xxii, 1-14); nearly the whole of the denunciations against the Scribes and Pharisees in ch. xxiii; the parables of the last things in ch. xxiv. In the history of the passion the peculiarities are numerous and uniform in character, tending to show how deeply the events foretold of his death, our Lord's Messiahship was attested. It is in Matthew alone that we read of the covenant with Judas for "thirty pieces of silver" (xxvi, 15); his inquiry "Is it I?" (xxvi, 25), as well as the restoration of the money in his despair of its ultimate recovery; a signalistic fulness of prophecy (xxvii, 3-10); the cup "for the remission of sins" (xxvi, 28); the mention of the "twelve legions of angels" (ver. 52-54). Filate's wife's vision (xxvi, 19), his washing his hands (ver. 24), and the impression "His blood be on us, etc." (verse 25); the opening of the graves (ver. 53, 59), and the watch placed at the sepulchre (ver. 62-66). In the account of the resurrection we find only in Matthew the great earthquake, the descent of the angel, the glorious appearance striking terror into the guards (vers 2-4), their flight, and the falsehood spread by them at the instigation of the priests (ver. 11-15); our Lord's appearance to the women (ver. 9, 10); the adoration and doubting of the apostles (ver. 17); and finally, the parting commission and promise of his ever-abiding presence (ver. 18-20).

This review of the Gospel will show us that of the matter peculiar to Matthew, the larger part consists of parables and discourses, and that he adds comparatively little to the narrative. Of thirty-three recorded miracles eighteen are given by Matthew, but only two, the cure of the blind men (ix, 27-30) and the tribute money (xxvii. 27-29), are peculiar to him. Of twenty-nine parables Matthew records fifteen; ten, as noticed above, being peculiar to him. Reums, dividing the matter contained in the synoptical Gospels into 100 sections, finds 78 of them in Matthew, 68 in Mark, in Luke, the richest of all, 82. Of these, 49 are common to all three; 9 common to Matthew and Mark; 8 to Matthew and Luke; 3 to Mark and Luke. Only 7 of these are peculiar to the Gospel of Matthew; 2 to Mark; while Luke contains no less than 22.

Matthew's narrative, as a rule, is the least graphic. The great features of the history which bring into prominence our Lord's character as teacher and prophet, the sublimity of his teaching, the Messianic king, are traced with broad outline, without minute or circumstantial details. We are conscious of a want of that pictur-esque power and vivid painting which delight us in the other Gospels, especially in that of Mark. This deficiency, however, is more than compensated for by the grand simplicity of the narrative, in which everything is secondary to the evangelist's great object. The facts which prove the Messianic dignity of our Lord are all in all with him, the circumstantial almost nothing; while he portrays the earthly form and theocratic glory of the new dispensation, and unfolds the glorious con

VII. Arrangement and Contents. — Matthew's order, we have already seen, is according to subject-matter rather than chronological sequence, which in the first half is completely disregarded. More attention is paid to the relation of the matter he has arranged, and agreement agrees with that of Mark. The main body of his Gospel divides itself into groups of discourses collected according to their leading tendency, and separated from each other by groups of anecdotes and miracles. We may distinguish seven such collections of discourses—(1) The Sermon on the Mount, a specimen of our Lord's ordinary didactic instruction (ch. v. vii.); divided by a group of works of healing, comprising no less than ten out of eighteen recorded miracles, from (2) the commission of the twelve (ch. x.). The following chapters (ch. xii. xlii.) give the tradition of the church as to the baptism of Jesus, his miraculous works, the introduction of a change of feeling towards him, prepare us for (3) his first open denunciation of his enemies (xiv. 23, 45), and pave the way for (4), the group of parables, including seven out of fifteen recorded by him (ch. xiii.). The next four chapters, containing the culminating point of our Lord's public ministry, the confessions of the blind and the transfiguration (ch. xvi. 23, 27, 31; xvi. 12), are bound together by historical sequence. In (5), comprising ch. xxviii., we have a complete treatise in itself, made up of fragments on humility and brotherly love, the divine confession, in x., 1-xx., 16, are followed by the disputes with the Scribes and Pharisees (xxxi. 28-33, 46), which supply the ground for (6), the solemn denunciations of the hypocrites and sophists by which they nullified the spirit of the law (ch. xxiii.).

More particularly its principal divisions are—1. The introduction to the ministry (ch. i. iv.). 2. The laying down of the new law for the Church in the Sermon on the Mount (ch. v. vii.). 3. Events in historical order, showing the development of the work of redemption (ch. viii. xii.). 4. The appointment of apostles to preach the kingdom (ch. x.). 5. The doubts and opposition excited by his activity in diverse minds—John's disciples, in sunry cities, in the Pharisees (ch. x. xii.). 6. VIII. The Language of the Gospels. — The language of Matthew is less characteristic than that of the other evangelists. Of the three synoptic Gospels it is the most decidedly Hebrewistic, both in diction and construction, but less so than that of John. Cremer and others have remarked the following: (1.) ἐκαθορίζεται ὁ άνθρωπος, which occurs thirty-two times in Matthew and not once in the other evangelists, who use instead ἐκαθορίζεται ἐν τῇ ἐνεργείᾳ τοῦ άνθρώπου, which occurs forty times; (2.) ὁ νομός ὁ ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ ἐνεργείᾳ (ὁ οὐρανός, four times), sixteen times, only twice in Mark, not at all in Luke. (3.) τὸ ἄνω οὖν, seven times; (4.) ἐν ὅλης ἀνάπτυξις, three times each in Matthew and in Luke. (5.) ἢ ἁγία πώλης, and ὁ δύναμις τῶν, for Jerusalem, three times; not in the other evangelists. (6.) ἡ συνέλευσις τοῦ αἰῶνος, "the consummation of the age"—"the end of the world," is found five times in Matthew, nowhere else in the New Test. except Heb. ix. 26, in the plural, αἰώνων. (7.) τοῖς ἐν οὐρανοῖς πληρωθήτω τὸ μάθημα, eight times, nowhere else in the New Test. John uses ἐν οὐρανοῖς πληρωθήτω τὸ μάθημα, τὸ μάθημα ὑπό του θεοῦ τὸ ἐν οὐρανοῖς πληρωθήτω τὸ μάθημα (τό ἐν οὐρανόις, τό μάθημα, τὸ μάθημα ὑπό του θεοῦ), (v. xix. 14), nine times. Mark uses ἐν οὐρανοῖς τὸ μάθημα, (v. xiv. 14), nine times. Mark uses ἐν οὐρανοῖς τὸ μάθημα, (v. xiv. 14), nine times; nowhere else in the New Test. (v. xiv. 14) ἐν οὐρανοῖς, seven times; (10.) ἐν οὐρανοῖς, in narrative, twenty-three times; in Luke sixteen times; not in Mark. ἐν οὐρανοῖς, after a genitive absolute, nine times. (11.) κοπιῶντες καὶ πολιτευόμενοι, continually used to give a pictorial coloring to the narrative (e. g. i. 4; viii. 5, 19, 29; ix. 14, 20; x. 14, 32, 42, etc.; li. 15, etc.), absolutely, without the dative of the person (e. g. i. 20; iii. 2, 13, 20; iii. 2, 14, 17; v. 2; vi. 81, etc.). (12.) ἐν οὐρανοῖς, the name of the holy city with Matthew always, except xxi. 37. It is the same in Mark, with one (doubtful) exception (xii. 1). (13.) θεοσφορεῖν, used absolutely, ten times. Other peculiarities, establishing the unity of authorship, may be noticed: (1.) The use of ῥόις, as the ordinary particle of transition, ninety times; six times in Mark, and fourteen in Luke. (2.) καὶ ἐγένετο ὁ ωρός, five times; Luke uses ὁ ωρός ἐγένετο, five times. (3.) ἐχωρίων, seven times. (4.) ἐν ἑτέρον τοῦ καθὼς, in ἑτέρον χρόνον, and ἐν τῷ δόξῳ, etc., scarcely found in Mark or Luke. (5.) ἄνωθεν, "to retire," ten times. (6.) κατῴκησε, six times. (7.) ποιοῦντι ῥήτορα, καθώς, The page contains a continuation of the text from the previous page, discussing the apostolic antiquity of the Gospel of Matthew. It mentions the Church's adoption of the Gospel and its resistance to changes that arose from different translations or versions. The text argues for the importance of maintaining the original form of the Gospel.

References:

1. Some critics, admitting the apostolic antiquity of a part of the Gospel, apply to Matthew, as they do to Luke, the gratuitous supposition of a later editor or compiler, who, by augmenting and altering the earlier text, made it as it now stands. The curious features of Matthew, arising from style and diction, are entirely in favor of the whole having substantially proceeded from one hand. Other supposed internal evidence varies so much, according to the subjective position of critics, that nothing can be inferred from it that is of consistent value.

2. On the other hand, the alterations which are made in the text by the differences between the various readings (the text is given, as far as possible, in the usual manner), are not always to be interpreted in a manner which upholds the theory of an earlier Gospel.

To these may be added (28), "He shall be called a Nazarene," and the appeal to the words of the prophet generally (xxvi, 54, 56).
Matthew 886

Septuagint. He transposes words, brings separate passages together, attributes the words of one prophet to another, and even quotes the Pentateuch for facts not recorded in it. Many of the quotations from the Septuagint are indeed precise, but these are chiefly in the Dialogue with Trypho, where, reasoning with a Jew on the 2nd and 3d centuries, Irenaeus, Clem. Alex., etc., and are referred to by Celsus (Orig. C. Cels. i. 38; ii. 92). (b) The facts they record are perfectly in keeping with a Gospel for Jewish Christians (3). The opening of chap. iii, tvroi raqt guk, i.e., refers back, by its construction, to the close of chap. ii; and iv, 13 would be unintelligible without ii, 23. (4) There is no difference between the diction and constructions and those in the other parts of the Gospel.

Matthew 1 (fig. 2x): Tyndale's chapt. rest chiefly on their alleged absence from the Gospel of the Hebrews in use among the Ebionites (Epiphanius, Har. xxxix. 18). But Epiphanius describes that book as "incomplete, adulterated, and mutilated;" and as the Ebionites regarded the human body as co-ordinate with Adam and Moses, the absence of the two chapters may readily be accounted for on doctrinal grounds. The same explanation may be given for the alleged absence from the Diatessaron of Tatian of these chapters, and the corresponding parts of Luke containing the genealogy, and all the other passages which show that the Lord was born of the seed of David "according to the flesh" (Theodoret, Har. fab. i. 20). The case must be a weak one which requires us to appeal to acknowledged heretics for the correction of our canon. The supposed discrepancy between the opening chapters of Matthew and Luke, which has led even professor Norton to follow Strauss, Paulus, Schleiermacher, etc., in rejecting them, has been abundantly discussed in all recent commentaries, and by Wieseler (Synopsis), Neander (Life of Christ), Mill (Pistischristian), Kern (Uebrigung d. Ev. Matt.), etc., as well as in the various answers to Strauss. It is sufficient here to note the following points in reply: (1.) Such questions are by no means confined to those chapters, but are found in places of which the apostolic origin is admitted. (2.) The treatment of Luke's Gospel by Marcion suggests how the Jewish Christians dropped out of the canon as soon as the new dispensation was accepted. (3.) Prof. Norton stands alone, among those who object to the two chapters, in assigning the genealogy to the same author as the rest of the chapters (Hilgenfeld, p. 46, 47). (4.) The difficulties in the harmony are all reconcilable, and the case has passed, that the MSS. and the testimony of early writers, for subjective impressions about its contents. XI. Matthew (Matthew) of Paris, an English monk, of great celebrity as a chronicler of England's early history, was born about the end of the 12th century. He took the religious habit in the Benedictine monastery of St. Albans in 1157. About the only event of his life that has been recorded is a journey he made to Norway, by command of the pope, to introduce some reforms into the monastic establishments of that country, which mission he has the credit of having executed with great ability and success. He is said to have stored up in the faveur of the king and the abbots of St. Albans, and to have obtained various privileges for the University of Oxford through his influence with that king. His acquisitions embraced all the learning and science of his age; besides theology and history; oratory, poetry, painting, architecture, and a practical knowledge of mechanics, are reckoned among his accomplishments by his biographers or panegyrists. His memory is preserved mainly by his history of England, entitled Historia Major, really a continuation of a work begun at St. Albans by Roger of Wendover (who died in May, 1296), and who subsequently entitled his work Historia Minor, or Chronica Majora Sanci Albani. Roger's name, however, was obscured by that of our subject, Matthew of Paris, who, though he adopted the plan of Roger's work, really furnished a most valuable chronicle, especially of mediæval history. In the British Museum, and in the libraries of Corpus Christi and Beneficents colleges, Cambridge, there are manuscripts of an epitome, by Matthew of Paris himself, of his history, generally referred to by the names of the Historia Minor, or the Chronicum, which, bishop Nicholson says, contains several particulars of notes omitted in the larger history. This smaller work was for a long time ascribed to a Matthew of Westminster (q. v.). Of late, however, the question of authorship has been fairly settled by Sir Frederick Madden, who edited and published these chronicles. He pronounced the Westminster Matthew "a phantom who never existed," and observes that even the late Mr. Buckle was so deceived by the general tone of confidence manifested in quoting this writer that he characterized him as, after Frouard, the most celebrated historian of the 14th century. "The mystery of the Westminster Matthew," says his Life of Becket (Rev., Oct., 1860, p. 288), "has been happily unveiled by Sir Frederick Madden, whose correct anticipation is unexpectedly confirmed by his discovery of the original copy of the work, now in the Chetham Library at Manchester. This manuscript establishes beyond all doubt that the largest portion of the Flores Historiarum has been attributed to the pseudo Matthew of Westminster, was written at St. Albans, under the eye and by direction of Matthew of Paris, as an abridgment of his greater chronicle; and the text from the close of the year 1241 to about two years prior to the date of the original manuscript, after the death of the pseudo Matthew, was composed by a Westminster monk, that the entire work commences with the year 1140, the period about the time of the appearance of a papal schism, and the year in which the schism, though never formally recognised by the popes, was a matter of public talk, and the appearance of Matthew's work. The first portion of the manuscript, it is probable, was written at the request of a person of influence in the court of the church. was afterwards attributed to a Matthew of Westminster, for the name of Matthew really belonged to Matthew of Paris, whilst the affix of Westminster was supplied by conjecture; and this pseudonym having been recognised by Bale and Joscelin, and adopted by archbishop Parker, the error has been perpetuated to our own times. The first editor of the work under this title is Matthew Parisiensis, Monachi Sancti Albani, Historia Anglicorum, sive ut vulgo dicitur, Historia Minor, item, ejusdem abbreviatio Chronicorum Angliae (published by the authority of the lords commissioners of her majesty's treasury, 1641, London, Longman, 1740, London, 1741). He was the first to have one of the manuscripts of bishop Parker (London, 1571, folio; reprinted at Lugur, Zürich, 1606; London, 1640 [or in some copies 1641], fol., by Dr. William Watte; Par. 1644, fol.; Lond. 1684, fol.). Watte's edition, which is sometimes divided into two volumes, contains, besides various readings and corrections, a work or works of the author never before printed, namely, his Duorum Officiorum Mercuriorum Regum (S. Albani Fundatorum) Vita, and his Vignati Trium Abbatum S. Albani Vitae, together with what he calls his Adhæcium to those treatises. "Matthew of Paris writes with considerable spirit and rhetorical display, a notable freedom of speech; and his work, which is continued to the death of Henry III (1272) by William Rahanger, another monk of the same abbey, has been the chief authority commonly relied upon for the history of that reign. Its spirit, however, is besmirched by that freeness and naughtiness in English; and from the freedom with which it inveighs against what he regards as the usurpations of the papal see, Romanist writers have always expressed strong dissatisfaction especially with his accounts of ecclesiastical affairs. With Prossean critics, on the other hand, Matthew of Paris has been a favorite in proportion to the dislike he has incurred from their opponents. At one time it was used to be affirmed by the Roman Catholics that the printed Matthew of Paris was in many things a mere modern fabrication of the Reformers; but Watte, by collating all the manuscript copies he could find, and noting the various readings, proved that there was no foundation for this charge" (Engl. Cyclop. s. v.). A translation of the History of Matthew of Paris, by Dr. Giles, forms a volume of Bohn's "Antiquarian Library," and the Flower of History of Roger of Wenvoe forms two volumes of the same series. Matthew of Westminster, an early English chronicler, flourished in the reign of Edward II. Nothing whatever is known of his personal history except that he was a monk of the Benedictine Abbey of Westminster. He is supposed to have died about 1267 or 1337. His chronicle, written in Latin, is entitled Flores Historiarum, pum Matthaeum Westmonasteriensem collecti, precipue de Rebus Britannie, ab Eboraco Mundi, usque ad annum 1307 (Lond. 1567; with additions, Prkk. 1911). Bohn has published an English version (Lond. 1852, 2 vols. 8vo.). Another work formerly ascribed to him is now definitely settled to be the production of Matthew of Paris (q. v.).

Matthew of York (Tobias), a noted English prelate, was born in Bristol in 1546. In childhood he manifested unusual talent, and was prepared for Oxford when only thirteen years of age. He took the bachelor's degree in 1563, and three years later, as master of a monastery, and immediately entered into "holy orders"—a young man much respected for his great learning, eloquence, sweet conversation, friendly disposition, and the sharpness of his wit. In 1568 he was made university orator; in 1570, canon of Christ Church and dean of Bath; in 1572, prebendary of Sarum and president of St. John's College, Oxford, and one of the queen's chaplains in ordinary. In 1588 he was installed dean of Durham, in 1595 he was created bishop of Durham, and in 1606 archbishop of York. He died at Cawood Castle March 29, 1628. The learning and piety of archbishop Matthew have been warmly eulogised by Camden. It is to be much lamented that his sermons, which are said to have been superior productions, were not preserved to us in print. The only publication of his is entitled Concilia Apostolicae (Oct. 1571, 1606; 1572, 1606), in which was there converted and joined the Missionary Baptist Church. In the winter of 1682-83 he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, after advising with his pastor and members of his own Church. Soon after he received license to preach. In the spring of 1864, the health of the pastor of the Buda Circuit failing, the circuit was vacated, and Matthew was appointed his successor. At the close of the year he was admitted on trial into the Illinois Conference, and returned to the Buda charge. From the Conference of 1866 to that of 1885 he was in charge of the Buda Station. At the Conference of 1886 he was appointed to Chillicothe, and there he labored most acceptably to the people and most successfully for the cause to which he gave his life. He died quite suddenly at this place, Aug. 1, 1889. "From his boyhood days he was a diligent student; from his esposure of the Talmud; and the Christ, a devoted and untiring friend from the time he received license to preach, a very zealous and successful minister of the Gospel. At Buda, his first charge, he sought and found the blessing of perfect love, and lived in the enjoyment of the blessing until the day of his death." See Conf. Minutes, 1889, p. 241.

Matthew, Henry, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Prince George County, Md. Blessed with pious and good parents, he was early led to Christ, and connected himself with Asbury Church, in Howard County. In 1849 he moved to Baltimore, and joined the Sharp Street Church. In 1851 he was licensed to preach, and in 1857 was ordained a local deacon. In 1864 he joined the Washington Conference, just then organizing, and was appointed to Gunpowder Circuit, where he labored with great zeal for three years; was then appointed to West River Circuit, and in 1870 was stationed at Andrews Monastery; but his health suddenly failed, and he was compelled to relinquish his arduous labors. He died Dec. 31, 1870. "Brother Matthew was a faithful, patient, and dependent minister. Wherever he went his solidity of character was acknowledged; and the firm faith which he himself was disposed in the doctrines he preached, and his prayerful reliance on God, stamped on his efforts an unsurpassed success." See Conf. Minutes, 1871, p. 28.

Matthew, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Beaver Co., Pa., Feb. 7, 1778. He enjoyed the advantages of a good parental training, graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., in 1795, and took theology under Rev. Dr. John McMillan. He was licensed in 1809, and in 1810 ordained pastor of Gravel Run and Waterford churches; in 1817 he became an itinerating missionary, and took charge of the Church at Louisiana, Pike Co., Mo., where he continued itinerating, especially among the Missouri Indians until 1825, when he settled at Apple Creek Church, in Cape Girardeau Co., Mo.; in 1827 he took charge of the Church at Kaskaskia, Ill., thence went to Missouri, where he labored till his health failed, and then removed to George Town, Ill., where he died May 12, 1861. Mr. Matthew was characterized by a cheerful and warm-hearted disposition. As a pastor he was faithful and zealous; as a friend, kind and affectionate. See Wilson, Prefi. Hist. Amealas, 1862, p. 102.
MATTHEWS

William, a Quaker preacher, was born in Stafford Co., Va., in 1732. His parents died when he was quite young. He entered the ministry at twenty-three years of age, and gave convincing evidence of sound judgment and great Christian piety. He spent several years in ministerial work in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. The exact date of his death is not known. See Jenney, Hist. of Friends, iii, 398.

Matthew's Day. A festal day observed in the Roman Catholic and the Anglican churches on Sept. 21, and in the Greek churches on Nov. 16, mentioned in St. Jerome's Cateches, and was first generally observed in the 11th century.—Walcott, Sac. Archæol. s. v.

Matthiæ, Johann, a noted Swedish prelate, was born in Ostrogotia in 1592, and after enjoying the best educational advantages of his country, entered the ministry. After filling several important positions, he became court preacher and almoner to Gustavus Adolphus. He was next appointed preceptor to Christina, the daughter of that monarch, and was created bishop of Strängnäs in 1643. He died in 1670. Matthiæ wrote several moral and theological works, the most important of which are, Opuscula Theologica (Strängnäs, 1661, 8vo), Disquisitiones Theologicae, re Disputationum, athenæ et suacentiis (Stockholm, 1668, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gèn. vol. xxxiii., s. v.

Matthias (MarSiæq) a contraction of Matthew or Mathew, a form frequently met with in Josephus [see below], one of the constant attendants from the first upon our Lord's ministry, who was chosen by lot, in preference to Joseph Barnabas, into the number of the apostles, to supply the vacancy caused by the treachery and suicide of Judas (Acts i, 23-26). A.D. 29. We may accept as probable the opinion which is shared by Eusebius (H. E. lib. i, 19) and Ephraimanius (i, 20) that he was one of the seventy disciples whom our Lord is said to have preached the Gospel in Ethiopia (Niceph, ii, 40; accord. to Sophronius, "in altera Ethiopia," i. e. Colchis; comp. Collar. Notit. ii, 809), or Cappadocia accord. to Cave, and to have at last suffered martyrdom (comp. Menæoly. Græc. iii, 198). According to another tradition, he preached in Judæa, and was stoned to death by the Jews (see Pionii Via Apostol. p. 178; Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 24; comp. Augustini, Denkewürdigk. iii, 241). There was early an apocryphal gospel bearing his name (Eusebius, H. E. iii, 25, 3; Clemens Alex. Strom. i, 16, vii, 318; Græcilis, Apologet. patr. ii, 1, p. 117; Fauber Cod. cod. N. T. i, 260). Different opinions have prevailed as to the manner of the election of Matthias. The most natural construction of the words of Scripture seems to be this: After the address of Peter, the whole assembled body of the brethren, amounting to number to about 120 (Acts i, 15), proceeded to nominate two, namely, Joseph, sur-named Barnabas, and Matthias, who answered the requirements of an apostle: the subsequent selection between the two was referred in prayer to him who, knowing the hearts of men, knew which of them was the fitter to be his witness and apostle. The brethren then, under the heavenly guidance which they had invoked, proceeded to give forth their lots, probably by each writing the name of one of the candidates on a tablet, and casting it into the urn. The urn was then shaken, and its contents were cast from it, that first came out determined the election. Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. Luc. i, 9) describes another way of casting lots which was used in assigning to the priests their several parts in the service of the Temple. The apostles, it will be remembered, had not yet received the gift of the Holy Ghost, and this solemn mode of casting the lots, in accordance with a practice enjoined in the Levitical law (Lev. xvi, 8), is to be regarded as a way of referring the decision to God (comp. Prov. xvi, 33). Chrysostom remarks that it was never repeated after the descent of the Holy Spirit. The election of Matthias is discussed by bishop Beveridge (Works, vol. i, serm. 2). It would seem, however, that Paul was the divine appointee to fill the vacancy in the college of the apostles. Monographs in Latin on his election have been written by Scharff (Viteb, 1652), Bittel-mair (III, 1670), and Honour maschmuid (Prag, 1760).

MATTHIAS is likewise the name of one person mentioned in the Apocalypse (MarSiæq) and of several in Josephus (MarSiæg), especially as Jewish high-priests.

2. Given (1 Esdr. ix, 38) in place of the Heb. Mat-tathiah (Ezra x, 38).

2. A son of Ananus, made high-priest by Agrippa (soon after the appointment of Petronius as president of Syria), in place of Simon Cantharos, after that honor had been declined by Jonathan as a second term (Josephus, Antiq. xix, 4).

3. Son of Theophilus of Jerusalem, made high-priest by Herod in place of Simon, son of Boethius (Ant. xviii, 4, 2); removed again by Herod to make room for Joaaz (ib. 6, 4, where Josephus relates his temporary disqualification on the day of annual atonement), and again reinstated by Agrippa in place of Jesus, son of Gamaliel (ib. xx, 9, 7).

Josephus likewise mentions Matthias, son of Boethius, as "one of the high-priests" betrayed by Simon during the last siege of Jerusalem (War, v, 8, 1), but it does not appear whether he was one of the above. See High-priests.

Matthias, a religious impostor whose real name was Robert Matthews, was born in Washington County, N. Y., about 1700. He kept a country store, but failed in 1816, and went to New York City. In 1827 he removed to Albany, where he became much excited by the preaching of Moses Kirk and Finney; made himself active in the temperance cause; claimed to have received a revelation, and began street-preaching; failing to convert Albany, he prophesied its destruction, and fled secretly to New York City, where he was tried and acquitted on the charge of poisoning a wealthy disciple in whose family he had lived. His impostures exposed, he soon disappeared from public view. See Matthews and his Impostures, by W. L. Stone (New York, 1835).

Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, second son of John Hunyadi (q. v.), was born in 1443, and came to the throne in 1448. His accession was hailed with the utmost enthusiasm over the whole country. But the Hungarian crown at this time was no cheaper than roses; open warfare was the order of the day, and the Turks, who had ravaged the country as far as Temesvár, inflicted upon them a bloody defeat, pursued them as far as Bos-nia, took the stronghold Szeja, there liberated 10,000 Christian prisoners, and then returned to Weisenberg, to be crowned with the sacred crown of St. Stephen, in 1456. He next suppressed the disorders of Wallachia and Moldavia; but feeling that his plans were counteracted by the intrigues of the emperor Frederick III to gain possession of Hungary, Matthias besought the assistance of pope Pius II, but to no purpose. After a second successful campaign against the Turks, he next turned his attention to the encouragement of arts and letters, and adorned his capital with the works of renowned sculptors, in addition to a library of 50,000 volumes. He sent a large staff of literary men to Italy for the purpose of obtaining copies of valuable MSS. (even now the Codex Petropolitanus, which was celebrated), and adorned his court by the presence of the most eminent men of Italy and Germany. He was himself an author of no mean ability, and possessed a delicate appreciation of the fine arts. At the same time the affairs of government were not neglected. The finances were brought into a flour-Matthias was also influenced especially by pope Pius II and his successor, Paul II. See HUSSEK, vol. 1, especially p. 424, col. 2. After a bloody contest of seven years' duration between these kings, the greatest generals of the age, the Hungarian power prevailed, and Moravia, Silesia, and Lusatia were wrested from Bohemia. A third war with the Turks closed as successfully as the former two. The emperor also was humiliated by Matthias, and expiated his guilt in poverty and disgrace. Matthias was suddenly cut down in the midst of his successes at Vienna, April 5, 1490. See Butler, Eccles. Hist. iii; 370 sqq. See LABIEBAS OF POLAND: PIUS II.

Matthias of Kunwald, one of the first ministers of the Ancient Moravian Brethren (q. v.), flourished in the 16th century. He was appointed at the Synod of Lhotá, in Bohemia, in 1467. On that occasion nine men, of high repute for piety, were elected by ballot. Three were prepared, nine were blank, and three inscribed with the Bohemian word Jest (He is). Thereupon a fervent prayer was offered up beseeching God to designate of these nine nominees, either one, or two, or three, as the ministers of the Church; but, if this should not be the time which he had ordained for such a consummation, to cause all the nine to receive blank cards. In this event the Brethren would have deferred further action to some future period. Nine lots having been drawn singly from a vase and given to the nominees, it appeared that Matthias of Kunwald, Thomas of Preuß, and Elias of Chrenovic, had each received one marked Jest. The synod rose to its feet, sang a thanksgiving hymn, composed for the occasion, and accepted these three men as the future ministers of the Church. In the same year, after the episcopacy had been secured, Matthias, although only twenty-five years of age, was consecrated a bishop, and, upon the resignation of bishop Michael, became president of the Church Council. He administered its affairs, according to the extreme views of discipline entertained by Gregory (q. v.), until 1494, when he resigned his presidency and returned to the liberal party. While on his way to a synod in Moravia, he died at Leipzig, after having, in his last will and testament, which he addressed to the Brethren, exhorted them to avoid schisms, and to preserve the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace. He was buried at Praha. (E. de S.) Matthias I, emperor of Germany, son of Maximilian II and Mary, daughter of Charles V, deserves a place here because of his relation to one of the most eventful periods in the earliest stages of modern history. He was born in 1557. In 1578 he was invited by the Romanists of the Netherlands to assume the government of that country, but he held the position only a short time. He was appointed stadtholder of Austria in 1585, and in 1611 was invited by the Bohemians to become their ruler. On the death of his brother Rudolf, emperor of Germany, in 1612, he succeeded to the throne, and was called upon to sit in judgment between Protestant and Romanist in the ensuing contest between these two great sects of the Christian Church; but the proceedings of his policy, and, while striving to direct, made himself distrusted by both. He concluded a disadvantageous treaty with the Turks, then in possession of Hungary (1615), and soon after caused his cousin Ferdinando to be proclaimed king of Bohemia and Hungary. In the midst of the disturbed conditions which prevailed during the Thirty Years' War he died, in 1619. See Kuehnebultler, Anales Ferdinandi; P. Santorius, Vite di Ridolfo e Mattia Imperatori (1664); Vehse, Memoire of the Court of Austr. Bernhurst, i, 1688, ii, 66 sq.; Kohlrauch, Hist. of Germany, p. 311 sqq. See also Thirty Years' War.

Matthias, John B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Germantown, Pa., Jan. 1, 1767; was converted while residing in New York, after his majority; was there licensed to preach in 1788; preached much and with excellent success as a local deacon until 1811, when he joined the itinerancy. Thereafter he labored very usefully until 1841, when, because of infirmities and the constant necessity of extra work, he retired to his pastoral charge of Williamsville, New York, and there labored very usefully until 1843. He lived in great godliness and usefulness, and was held in great esteem. In 1843, he removed to the Oriskany District, but lived there only a short time. He died, Oct. 27, 1843.

Matthias, John J., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at New York Jan. 17, 1796. His childhood home was near by, and nearly all youth were spent among the Methodists at Greenwich, etc. He came to New York in 1825 and entered upon the ministry when twenty-one years old, in the New York Conference at Gothenburg. In 1818 he was appointed to Pittsfield Circuit; in 1819 to Stockton; in 1820 to Leyden; in 1821 and 1822 to Cortlandt; in 1823 to Middlebury, Vt.; in 1824 to St. Albans; in 1825 to Pittsfield; in 1826 to Cortlandt. He was stationed in the city of New York in 1827 and 1828, and in the city of Albany in 1829 and 1830; was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference in 1831, and stationed in the city of New York. In 1835, 1838, and 1839 he travelled the East Jersey District; in 1836 he was stationed at the Nazareth Church, in the city of Philadelphia. His health failing, he took a superannuated relation, and continued to hold it until 1841.

While sustaining this relation to his Conference, the Pennsylvania and New York Colonization Societies appointed him governor of Massas GG (then called) West Coast of Africa, and in 1841 he was appointed to the colony of African about a year, but, subject to severe suffering by the African fever, he returned to the States. In 1842 he was reappointed to the New York Conference, and stationed at Flushing, L. I.; in 1848 at Rockaway; in 1844 to the charge of the Governor of the New York District, and stationed at Flushing, L. I.; in 1848 and 1849 was stationed in Williamsburg; in 1850 and 1851 in the Twenty-seventh Street Church, New York; in 1852 was superannuated at Hempstead, L. I.; but was given an effective relation in 1853, and stationed at Jamaica. In 1854 he was obliged again to superannuate, but his relation was changed to effective at the ensuing Conference, and in 1851 to 1857 served as chaplain to the Seamen's Friend Retreat on Staten Island. "He was held in high esteem by the managers and officers of that institution. At the bedside of the sick and in his chapel services he was found to be well adapted to the duties of his office." The tax upon his sympathies and the labors of the position were more than his enfeebled health could sustain, and in 1858 he resigned the chaplaincy, and received a superannuated relation. He retired to a quiet and comfortable residence near by, and there spent his declining years. He died at the age of eighty-five years, in 1861, and was buried at the Klunk Street Cemetery. Few ministers have a longer or more worthy record than this. Some of these fields of labor were very arduous, others of them very responsible. In all of them he was faithful and usefulness. He was a high-minded, intelligent, and honorable man. His tastes were refined, his feelings delicate, his conversation chaste, and his manners dignified but affable. His Christian Restoration is without blemish. He possessed the disciplinary attributes of a minister—"gifts, grace, and usefulness." His preaching was practical and experimental. He sought his audience and succeeded in leading the members of his Church to a higher spiritual state, and a holy, active, religious life. As a pastor he had few superiors. Gentle, affectionate, and sympatetic in his manners, his pastoral visits were highly praised by his flock. He was a man of the people. He was the head and the heart of the school and the church, and the backbone of the church. He was the leader of the church, and the backbone of the nation. His publications embraced a range from the little Sunday-school card to the stately volume, all intended to aid the public movement in favor of temperance, and in opposition to slavery and Romanism. He was too much the life of the world to admit of a summing up in the space allotted to this brief sketch. We need only say that to know him, especially to know him well, was to admire, esteem, and love him as a man, a friend, a scholar, a minister, a hero, a Christian. Bishop Thomson, in his introduction to the writer's life and works, says: "Matthew's life is the very epitome of the Baptist, and delineates him: "Before the world he stood as the able preacher, the gifted writer, the stern controversialist, the unsparring antagonist; but he was not without the gentler and more attractive elements of character. He was an able, communicative, emotional companion, a generous friend, and loving husband and father."

From his rough heart a babe could press Soft milk of human tenderness.

On all the storms of his life were rainbows, but only his intimate friends were in position to see them." His first book, "The Original Defence of the Doctrines of the Trinity," a small volume issued in 1848, and to which saulum in parco was peculiarly applicable. In the same year he began his publication of Tracts for the Times, which at length grew into a small but piquant monthly, called after the Museums, and afterwards the Primitive Christians. In 1866 he published a work on Astronomy, with large astronomical maps—a work of rare merit and popularity. Soon after he issued his Elementary Astronomy, and in 1850 edited a new and improved edition of Barrett's Geography of the Heavens, for which he is spoken of as one of the most competent astronomers in the country." In 1858 he published his High-School Astronomy, and the same year was associated with Prof. J. B. Woodbury in bringing out a music-book, The Lute of Zion, which, becoming widely popular, led in a short time to an enlarged edition under the title of New Lute of Zion. The next year his work on Spiritual Rappings was issued, and bad a large circulation. In 1856 his celebrated controversy with Dr. J. H. Perry, on the Wesleyan Doctrine of Christian Perfection, was published in successive pamphlets. Three years later he published a book which was elevated to the rank of a classic, and for use on all occasions of public worship; and the same year also sent forth his Impending Crisis, a stout pamphlet of pungent facts and impassioned appeals on the slavery question. In 1864 his Minister's Pocket Manual was published, and within the next two years followed (in 1866, with the aid of R. B. Smith) the compilation of his famous work, Immortality of the Soul, and Resurrection of the Body, books of superior and permanent value. During 1866 he published Select Lessons from the Holy Scriptures, and his Defence of American Methodism, and in the next year a timely treatise on Forgivness and the Resurrection of the Dead. The year 1868, the last of his life, was perhaps the busiest, and the most prolific of result in the line of authorship. Besides editing and bringing through the press the work on Perfect Love, he wrote and published Mary Ann Smith, and a surprising number of other works on Romanism, from the tract of a few pages to the heavy pamphlet. He left an unfinished treatise on Depravity in its Relation to Entire Sanctification, and the outlines of several other theological works. His contributions to the periodical press were abundant and able. He was the most prolific writer of a series of articles and notes, and among his issues from the press were various Church and Sunday-school requisites. He composed with remarkable ease and rapidity, and seldom rewrote a sentence or even a word. His busy life suddenly closed at his residence, Jersey City, N.J., in a signal proclaim death, February 3rd, 1886, aged 67 years. His life and work are described in the Spurgeon of May 5th; also Work Here, Rest Hereafter, or the Life

Mattison, Seth, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Shaftesbury, Vt., Feb. 22, 1788; joined the Methodist Church in 1865; entered the Genesee Conference in 1810; and died Oct. 18, 1845, having preached with eminent usefulness and great holiness the Gospel of Christ for thirty-four years. Minutes of Conferences, iii, 645.

Mattison, Spencer, A.M., a Methodist Episcopal minister and educator, was born at Plainfield, N. Y., Aug. 2, 1806; was converted in 1825; graduated, with first honors, at Middlebury College, Vt., in 1835; joined Troy Conference the same year, but on his second charge his health failed, and he went to Georgia. On recovery he spent five years there as principal of Vineville Academy, and then rejoined the Troy Conference in 1842. In 1846 he was elected professor of ancient languages and literature in M'Kendree College, Illinois, where he spent six years, and then resigned and re-entered the regular work of the ministry, but at the close of a year he accepted the principalship of Rock River Seminary, Mount Morris, Ill. His health again failed, and he died Nov. 5, 1858. Professor Mattison was an excellent linguist and instructor, and greatly beloved by his pupils. He was a minister of fine talents and uniform piety, and a most accomplished Christian gentleman. Minutes of Conferences, v, 465. (G. L. T.)

Mattithi'ah (Heb. Mattityah'; מַטְתִּיָּהוּ, gift of Jehovah; compare τόδετος, Theodore; also in the prolonged form Mattia'has, מַטְתִּיָּחַס, 1 Chron. xv, 21; xxiv, 3, 31; Sept. Mattasia, but in Ezra x, 48 Mattasias v. Mattasia; so also Mattasia, i Macc. ii, 1; Luke iii, 25, 26) the name of three or four men in the Old Testament and of one or two (Auth. Vers. "Matthaius") in the New. See also Mattathiah; Matthew; Matthias, etc.; and especially Mattathiah.

1. One of the sons of the Levite Jeduthun, appointed by David chief of the fourteenth section of the Temple musicians (1 Chron. xxv, 3, 21). B.C. 1014. He is probably the same with one of the Levitical wardens who were assigned to the performance of the sacred anthems on the removal of the sacred ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xvi, 21; xvi, 5). B.C. cir. 1048.

2. An Israelite of the "sons" (residents) of Nebo, who divorced his Gentile wife after the Babylonian exile (Ezra x, 48). B.C. 459. He was possibly identical with No. 4.

3. The eldest son of Shallum, a Levite of the family of Korah, who had charge of the baked offerings of the Temple on the re-establishment after the exile (1 Chron. ix, 81). B.C. cir. 440.

4. One of those (apparently chief Israelites) who supported Ezra on the right hand while reading the law to the people after the captivity (Neh. viii, 4). B.C. cir. 410.

5. A person named in Luke iii, 26 as the son of Semel, among the maternal ancestors of Jesus; but as no such name appears in the parallel passages of the Old Testament and would here unduly protract the interval limited by other intimations of the generations, it is probably interpolated from No. 6. (See Strong's H.'arm. and Expos. of the Gospels, p. 16.)

Mattock, an old English name for an agricultural implement like a pickaxe with a wide point, for grubbing up and digging out roots and stones, is the rendering adopted in the Auth. Ver. for three Hebrew words. מַדֶּר (mader', an instrument for dressing or pruning a vineyard; occurs only in Isa. vii, 25) denotes a weed-elected prior (Nov., 1500), then regular abbot by the resignation of Nicholas de Haequeville in his favor (Jan., 1602). The zeal of Maulburm was not confined to his own order; he was interested in the Benedictine, and labored much for the reformation of the congregation of Chézal, which served as a model to the houses of Saint-Vanne and Saint-Maur. Taken ill in consequence of the fatigue caused by his religious labors, he was carried to Paris, and died there about the beginning of the month of June. He included among his works "Sancta Francisci de Paule, Geoffroi de Bousard, chancellor of Notre-Dame of Paris; the bishop Louis Pinel, Pierre de Bruges, and probably Erasmus, who addressed several letters to him. His principal works are, Rosarium exercitium (Maulbronn, margrave of Baden and hessians [Bale, 1491, et al.]). "This book," says Gene, "is the first where some passages of the Imitation have been introduced and given under the name of Kemps. -- Venatorio investigatatorium sanctorum omnium ordinis, a historical manuscript which appears to be an abridgment of that of Bischies, and in which Maulburm again attributes to Kemps the book Qui sequiut me of the Imitation. We find in the ancient Gallia Christiana (vii, col. 281-282) two letters addressed to this priest by Erasmus, and written at Paris. Maulbronn, a learned French theologian, was born at Vire, Normandy, in 1644. While still young he entered the brotherhood of the Oratorians, where for a long time he studied the classics; then he devoted himself to preaching, and instructing the country people. The study of the Bible occupied the remainder of his life. He possessed a great variety of knowledge, understood Greek well, also Hebrew and Latin, and obtained many prizes in the academic competitions of Rouen and Caen. He died at Paris January 19, 1706. Of Maulbronn's works we have Traité de religion contre les Athées, Les Deistes et les nouveaux Pyrhomians (Paris, 1677, 12mo); the 2d edition (1698) has been greatly enlarged: -- Milanges de diverses pieces; discours en IV lieux (Lyons; the edition of 1725, 12mo, is preferable on account of the additions to it). We find in this a well-written preface on the good use of poetry: -- Dissertation sur le sujet de la goutte, with the moyens de l'en garer (Paris, 1687, 1689, 12mo) -- Analyse des Épitres de Saint Paul et des Épitres canoniques, with Des dissertation sur les endroits difficiles (Paris, 1691, 2 vols. 12mo; reprinted in 1702). -- Analyse de l'Esquifon selon l'ordre historique de la concorde (Paris, 1695, 3 vols. 12mo, et al.). This work, to which the author devoted nearly all his life, has had many editions (later editions, Malines, 1821, 7 vol. 12mo; Paris, 1843-44, 4 vol. 8vo): -- Analyse des Actes des Apotres (Paris, 1657, 2 vol. 12mo) -- Méditations sur une retraite ecclésiastique de dix jours (Lyons, 1729, 12mo). Maulbronn also left in M.S., Analyse de l'Aposcalypse and Traduction complète du Nouveau Testament. See Mercure de France, May, 1709; Moret, Dict. Hist. s. v.; Hoeser, Nouvelle Biog. Genev., s. v.

Mauermann, Franz Lauf, a German Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Neunelle in 1789; entered the priesthood in 1797, and, after filling various positions, was in 1825 made chaplain to the royal house of Saxony, and in 1827 presbyer of the Roman Catholic Consistory of the kingdom. In 1842 he was made bishop of Eisleben and confessor of the royal house of Saxony. Later he became apostolic vicar. He died in October, 1845. -- Regensburger Recht-Encyklopädie, s. v.

Maul or Mall is an old name for a hammer or mallet, and stands in the Auth. Vers. for the Heb. יָּחַל (mephit), only occurs in Prov. xxv, 18; but kindred is יָּחַל, mappetis, "battle-axe," Jer. ii, 39; both from יָּחַל, or יָּחַל, to break in pieces, a war-club, such as was ancient in common use, and even in the Middle Ages, the memory of which is still preserved in the modern mace as a sign of authority. "Probably such was that which is said to have suggested the name of Charles Martel. The mace is frequently mentioned in the accounts of the wars of the Europeans with Saracens, Turks, and other Orientals, and several kinds are still in use among the Bedouin Arabs of remoter parts (Burckhardt, Notes on Bedouins, i, 55). In their European wars the Turks were notorious for the use they made of the mace (Knollys, Hist. of the Turks) (Smith). Various kinds of maces were used by the ancient Egyptians, either with or without a ball at the end to give weight to the blow, and generally with a guard at the handle. The curved club or throw-stick, the Arabian hadis or "tonguey" is a very general Oriental weapon.

Ancient Throw-sticks: 1, Egyptian; 2, Assyrian.

Among the Australians, this implement is yet a formidable one, called the boomerang. Unmistakable traces of its use occur on the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Eng. i, 365; Bonomi, Nissoch, p. 134-6). See Armor.

Maulbronn, originally a Cistercian convent in the bishopric of Speier, was founded by bishop Gunther of Speier, on a tract of land given him by Walther von Lomersheim in 1148, previously infested with robbers. The convent soon became very rich, partly through donations, and partly by the zeal and activity of the monks. It was at first placed under the jurisdiction of the empire, by Frederick I and other emperors, but in the 14th century was placed under that of the Palatinate. In 1604 it was conquered by duke Ulrich of Württemberg, and when the Reformation commenced, it was appointed by him for the monks of his province who wished to remain Roman Catholics; duke Christopher, in 1657, took this also from them, appointed an evangelical abbot, and established a school in it. It is yet the seat of one of the four minor theological seminaries. The remaining portions of the building, i.e., the church, cloisters, entrance-hall, and refectory, are considered among the finest specimens of German Gothic architecture. The place has become renowned in the annals of Protestantism by its connection with two important transactions, the Collegium Maulbronnense, in 1564, and the Formula Maulbronnensis, in 1576. (1) The introduction of Calvinism into the Palatinate by duke Frederick III after 1560, and in particular the publication of the Heidelberg Catechism in 1563, provoked great opposition on the part of the Lutherans. The authorities, and especially duke Christopher of Württemberg, Wolfgang of Pfalzneuburg, and margrave Charles of Baden, mainly endeavored to heal the dissension by means of a colloquy held between the theologians of the Palatinate and Württemberg at Maulbronn in 1564. The elector of the Palatinate was accompanied by his court preacher, M. Michael Diller, and the theologians Dr. Peter Boquin, Caspar Olevian, Zacharias Ursinus, and Peter Dathenus; also the church counselor Thomas Erastus, chancellor Dr. Eheim, and notary Wilhelm Xylader, professor of Greek at Heidelberg. The representatives of Württemberg were Valentin Vannius, abbot of Maulbronn, Johannes Brenz, provost of Stuttgart, Jacob Andreis, provost and chancellor of the University of Tubingen, Dietrich Schnepf, professor at Tubingen, and the court preacher Balthasar Bidebend; also as notary, Lucas Osianer, then preacher at Stuttgart, and as civil counselor and chancellor of the county of Heilbronn, Johann Fries, canon of St. Mary's Church. The colloquy lasted from April 10th to April 16th. Chancellor Eheimm, in his opening speech, invited the theologians, since the object of the conference was to heal their dissensions, to avoid all merely human views and arguments, and to confine themselves to the positive testimony of Scripture on the points of controversy. Yet, instead of treating of the doctrine of the Eucharist, which was their chief point of difference, the theologians at once launched into arguments concerning the ubiquity, or, as Andreis termed it, the majestasnullo loco circumspecta, of the body of Christ. Thus all possibility of harmony was at once destroyed. During eight sessions this same question was discussed without either party coming any nearer to the views of the other. The theologians of the Palatinate, and in particular Boquin, Olevian, and Ursin, partly denied the importance of the doctrine of the ubiquity of the body of Christ, and partly refuted their opponents by the Scriptures, the articles of faith, and by an exposi of the errors into which these principles must lead. Those of Wurtemberg tried especially to defend the idea of the ubiquity of Christ's body from mere human representation and to treat it as a necessary consequence of unio personalis and the communicatio idiomatum; they rejected the accusation of mixing up the two natures, and accused their opponents of making a mere man of Christ. As the others said when, in their view, the body of Christ was considered as omnipresent even in the womb, Andreis, who was spokesman of the Wurtemberg party, drew a distinction between the possession and the use of the attribute, and asserted that Christ could not have been omnipresent in the womb, but only became so actually after his ascension—a view which the Heidelberg theologians rejected as contrary to reason and unsupported by Scripture.

At the last two sessions, finally, the question of the Eucharist was discussed, as the princes wished that the two parties should seek to arrive at some understanding concerning this important point, leaving aside all Christological questions. Yet, after a few very speeches, the question of ubiquity was again started, this time by the Reformed theologians, and the discussion receded to its original ground. The colloquy now came to a close. The parties agreed and separated, and the two parties separated, each holding as firmly to its own views as previously to the meeting, and considering itself as having obtained the advantage. In spite of the promise of secrecy, the Heidelberg theologians boasted of having silenced their opponents, claiming even that Duke Christoper himself was now more inclined to their doctrines. The Wurtemberg party would not brook this, and Brenz wrote an account of the colloquy, denying the statements of the Heidelbergians, which was at first circulated privately, and was finally printed in 1565, under the title of Maulbronnensis inter theologos Heidelbergenses et Wurtembergenses de Cena Domini et Majestate Christi, and also in Wahrhaftiger u. gründlicher Bericht v. d. Ge spräch, etc. gestellt durch d. Württembergischen Theol ogen (Frankfort, 1564, 4to); in these works he accused his opponent of having had recourse to sophistry, and, when they found it impossible longer to defend their views, to have caused the colloquy to be brought to a close. Heidelberg answered by the Epitome collog. Maulbr., cum responsione Palatinorum ad epi. Würt temberg. (4to), and published the same year the time of the protocol of the conference, which was followed up by the opposite party with a new edition of the protocols, "without changes or additions" (Tubingen, 1565, 4to). Both parties now accused each other of interposing the protocols. The theologians of Wittenberg were also drawn into the quarrel, as duke Christopher submitted them to the protocols of Maulbronn and the De Majestate Christi of Andreis and Brenz, both of which they severely condemned. The dispute lasted for several years, finally at rest by the wise and Christian efforts of elector Frederick the Wise of Sax onburg in 1566. (3.) Another conference, held twelve years later at Maulbronn, between theologians from Wurtemberg, Baden, and Heumenne, secured a better result. The theologians were L. Osianer, Balthasar, Bidebend, provost of Stuttgart, Abel Scherdinger, court preacher of Heumenne, Peter Streckor, pastor at Suhl, and some others. The object of the conference was to discuss a formula of union drawn up by Osianer and Bidebend. The meeting took place Jan. 19, 1576, and the formula itself, which may be considered as a forerunner of the Formula Conciliari, received the name of Formula Maulbronnensis. At the conclusion of the meeting the two parties sent, together with an address by count George Ernest of Heumenne, to the elector August of Saxony, who received also about the same time the so-called Saxon and Formula of duke Julius of Brunswick. The elector submitted them both to Andreis, who declared that, in his opinion, the formula of Maulbronn was the most serviceable for the purpose of uniting the different parties. Yet in the conference held at Torgau, May 29, Andreis consented to use nominally the other formula as a basis, but took good care to include all the principal points of the Maulbronn formula into the so-called Book of Torgau. See Hutter, Concord. conc. p. 305 sq.; Osian er, Hist. Ecccl. cent. xvi, lib. iv, pt. iii, p. 806; Planck, Gesch. d. protest. Lehrbegr. vi, 428; Hepe, Gesch. d. thuth. Concordienformel, 1858, p. 78 sq.

(3.) In September of the same year (1556), still another meeting was held at Maulbronn, in which Heerbrand, Schneip, Magirus, Bidebend, L. Osianer, Dietz, Scherdinger, and Strecker took part. Its object was to discuss the Book of Torgau, and it ended in expressing its approbation of it as a whole. See Hepe, Gesch. d. thuth. Concordienformel, p. 78 sq.—Hertzog, Reis.-Encyklop. ix, 178 sq. Maulmont (or Malmont), Jean de, a learned Frenchman, was born in Limousin, in the 16th century, of an ancient noble family, which possessed one of the baronies of Limousin, the chateau of Maulmont. Of his personal history but little is known except that he was principal of the College of Saint-Michel, otherwise called Chanac, which had been founded in 1530 by the Pompadour house for the Limousin students. According to La Croix du Maine, "Maulmont was a very learned writer under the title of many laquers as a Greek, a great theologian, and a prolific orator." He was an intimate friend of Julius Scaliger. Many of his contemporaries have pretended that he was the true author of the translation of Plutarch which bears the name of Amyot; this assertion is testified to by La Monnoye in a note on L'Ame-Beaute de Menage. We have of Maulmont's works, Les Oeuvres de Saint Justin, philosophe et martyr (Paris, 1588, fol.):—Les Histories et Chroniques du monde, factes tant du gros volume de Jean Zonare, auteur Dyonisien, que de plusieurs autres (Tours, 1568, fol.);—Les annales de l'empe- reur Ferdinand au Pape Pie IV sur le Concile de Trente (Paris, 1568, 8vo);—Rememoires Chretiens en forme d'Epitre a la reine d'Angleterre, trad. du Lat.
MAUR de Histoire des Oeuvres, époque portugaise (Paris, 1688, 8vo). The same author has written in Italian a life of René de Birague, chancellor of France, who died in 1588, and the Gallia Christiana quotes it as a correct and useful work. See La Croix du Maine et Du Verdier, Bibliothèque Française; Goujet, Bibliothèque Française, vol. xii: Gallia Christiana, vi, 571.—Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, vol. xxxiv, 6 v.

MAURANDY, also known under the term DIES CENA DOMINICE (q.v.), is the name given to the Thursday before Easter. The origin of this name is Dies mandatu —madiate Thursday; either from the commandment which our Saviour gave to his disciples to commemorate the sacrifice of his supper, which he instituted on this day (hence dies mensis, day of bread; and dies lucis, day of light); or because on this day our Saviour washed his disciples' feet, and gave them commandment to follow his example. Others derive it from the Saxon mand, which means a basket, and subsequently any gift or offering contained in the basket. On this day penitents who had been put out of the Church on Ash-Wednesday were readmitted. There was also a general celebration of the Lord's Supper, with which the ceremony of washing the feet was connected.

Candidates for baptism publicly recited the Creed. The origin of this practice is generally put to the 7th century, but Riddle (Christian Antiquités, p. 669) contends that "it appears to have been of much earlier institution." See Pediatum.

Maunoir, Joliffe, a learned French ecclesiastic, was born Oct. 1, 1606, in the province of Saint-Georges de Reinhembault, diocese of Rennes. At the age of twenty he entered the Order of the Jesuits at Paris, and finished his studies at La Flèche. A professorship in the College of Quimper was offered him, but he preferred to preach, and accordingly entered the ministry. He studied the dialect of Brittany, began to travel over the country, and displayed so much zeal in his preaching that his health became impaired, and he was obliged to resume the career of teaching, which he followed at Tours. After having been ordained at Nevers, he consecrated the remainder of his life, according to a vow that he had made, to the evangelization of Brittany. For forty-two consecutive years Maunoir labored for the accomplishment of his project. Unmoved by the injury and violence with which his devotion was often repaid, accepting or imposing on himself the rudest privations, travelling on foot, with a wallet on his shoulders, and carrying only the clothing and nourishment absolutely indispensable, he visited successively and repeatedly nearly all the parishes in the dioceses of Cornouaille and Léon, the islands of Ouessant, of Molène, of Sizène, etc., mentioning a great number of localities in the other dioceses of Brittany, and everywhere his preaching was attended with success. He died Jan. 29, 1683, at Plein, near Guincamp. In accordance with his expressed desire, he was buried like a pauper, but later a site was erected to him in the church of Plein. With the triple object in view of understanding thoroughly a language so indispensable to him, of partaking of it from the mixed dialect used by the people, and of generalizing the learning of the language, Maunoir aided in the promotion of the colleges of Quimper and of Morlaix, where the language of Brittany was generally used. The same motives actuated him in the composition of the following works, in which he has been the chief benefactor of ecclesiastics of the country: Caution spirituel hanc instructionem profestab eur quiquis in hac et vostra aur baronum (Quimper) — Vita S. Cornutii, Armoarcii; Casoocii (Quimper, 1685, 12mo, et al.); far from being written in Breton, as is often stated. Le Temple consacré à la passion de Jésus-Christ, in Breton, prose and verse (Quimper, 1679, 1686, 8vo) — Le sacré College de Jésus décrit en cinq classes, où l'on enseigne en langue Armorique les leges Christianae, avec les trois clés pour y entrer. These and other works of this character are curious in a philological point of view as monuments of the changes in the Breton language. A very competent judge, M. de la Villermarqué, has given the following opinion: "Born in the French part of Brit- tany, father and son, he was shocked by the idea of certain sounds in the Breton language. In order to soften them, he suppressed or modified certain signs necessary for preserving the primitive signification of the words, and for showing their etymology, derivation, and affinities. The expressions thus disfigured, of which he has written, are called by his contemporaries the 19th century, and he left an orthography without fixed principles or method, an orthography ad libitum, which has very properly been abandoned, since Le Pelléart has substituted the ancient Breton orthography in his Dictionnaire. Maupas du Tourn, Henri Cauhoff de, a French prelate, was born in 1600 at the chateau of Cosson, near Rheims. Descended from an ancient family of Champagne, he had for his godfather king Henry IV, and was scarcely sixteen years of age when he was elected abbot of Saint-Denis of Rheims, with a regular benefice. In 1626 he founded there the society of Saint Geneviève. He next became chief vicar of the diocese of Rheims, then first chaplain to the queen, Anne of Austria, and in 1641 was finally elected bishop of Puy, whence he was transferred in 1601 to the see of Evreux. In the following year, being called to Puy to settle a lawsuit originating in François de Sales, he was chosen assistant prelate to the pontifical throne. January 14, 1667, he founded a seminary at Evreux, resigned his bishopric in 1680, and died at Evreux August 12 of the same year. Of his works we have Vie de Mme de Chantal (Paris, 1644, 4to) — Vie de saint François de Sales (Paris, 1657, 4to): —Oraison funèbre de saint Vincent de Paul (Paris, 1661, 4to): —Statuts d'égodous (Evreux, 1664, 1665, 8vo). Maupeul, Milton, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Campbell County, Tennessee, Dec. 24, 1829. He was educated at Emory and Henry College, Virginia; was licensed to preach about the year 1849; and was engaged for two or three years teaching school and preaching in the local relation. He went to California in 1852, and in 1853 joined the Pacific Conference, California. In 1856 he returned to Tennessee; in 1859 joined the Holston Conference, and was appointed to Grayson Circuit, in Western Virginia; in 1860 to Newport Circuit; in 1861 to Maynardsville Circuit. In 1862 he was appointed to the Conference as a missionary and member of the regiment in the Confederate States army; but, as the regiment was disbanded before the close of the year, he returned home, and was without regular work until 1866, when he was appointed to Knox and Maynardsville Circuit. In 1867 he was transferred to the Conference in Texas, and in 1869 to Gainesville Circuit; in 1871 to Decatur Mission, where he finished his life and ministry, April 1, 1871. He was faithful to his calling while his strength lasted. "He left the aroma of a good name, and the assurance that he went to his rest." Minutes of the M. E. Church South, 1871.

Maur (St.), Congregation of. The Benedictines afford the only example of a monastic order which, after declining from an originally high position, and after remaining, so to speak, dead for two centuries, revived and took again a leading place in the Church by its activity and learning.

As early as the latter part of the Middle Ages the Order of Benedectines had lost much of their influence. The convents had become too wealthy, and the monks, instead of being used to their religious exercises, were entirely given up to idleness and worldly enjoyments. This state of things continued through the 16th century. In the early part of the 17th a reform took place in the Convent of St. Vannes, near Verdun, under the influence of Didier de la Cour, but it was soon imitated by the formerly renowned convents of Moyenmoutier and Sénonais. Clement VIII confirmed the organization of this Congrégation de St. Vannes, which produced some distinguished men, among them Dom Calmet and Dom Cellier. In 1614 the assembly of the French clergy, understanding the necessity of united action, began to examine the cloistered convents throughout the country should connect themselves with St. Vannes; the general chapter of the congregation, however, was afraid of the consequences which might result from such extended power. In 1618, however, Dom Bénard, one of the monks of St. Vannes who had been employed in reforming other convents, obtained from Louis XIII authority to establish a congregation, which when organized took the name of St. Maur, for fear of awakening jealousy if it took that of any particular convent. This congregation was confirmed by Gregory XV in 1621, and by Urban VIII in 1627. The first procession celebrated by Bénard in July, 1620, according to the regulations that of the Blanes-Mantes at Paris. Soon a number of others joined it. In 1622 they counted forty convents; in the beginning of the 18th century their number reached 168, divided into six provinces. The most important of all these establishments was the convent of St. Germain des Prés, near Paris. It was the residence of the general of the order, was endowed with episcopal authority, and possessed a library particularly rich in ancient MSS. Its statutes, drawn up according to the spirit of the times, the strict morality, intellectual pursuits, and general influence of its members, gained universal respect for the congregation. Amid the looseness of morals which then prevailed among the French clergy, the Congregation of St. Maur belongs to the few exceptions which reflect honor on the Church of Rome. According to the confession of a Romanist writer, they are perhaps the only order in the history of convents of which this can be said. It is also to be remembered that, conscious of serving higher and universal interests, they remained entirely strangers to all persecutions both of the Jesuits and the Gallican clergy.

The first officers among the Congregation, the first general, Dom Tarife, carefully prepared a scheme of studies; and as early as the 17th and 18th centuries the congregation counted a large number of distinguished men. Their labors were promptly directed to the gathering of materials for the history of the converts belonging to the congregation, and to that of the saints. These researches soon led them into paleological and diplomatic works. The finished education given to the novices required a large number of new books or improved reprints of old ones, which were prepared by subscriptions by members of the congregation. Thus arose a large number of very important and valuable works. They treat of a great variety of subjects, but especially of the history of France and of the Church. The most distinguished among the men of letters interested in the editorship, and the others were employed in gathering the materials, or making up some particular part of it: if one of them died before his task was complete, another took his place, and continued it in the same spirit and with the same learning. No other order ever made the same use of its riches: they bought the materials of MSS. and books, made journeys to visit foreign libraries and to establish relations with foreign savans. Their publications also possessed an outward finish previously unknown in typography. Their religious independence is shown in the fact that they remained in friendly relation with the representatives of the Papal See (q. v.), and suffered persecution for their refusal to endorse the bull Unigenitus (q. v.), and they were often and severely attacked by the Jesuits. The order continued in existence until the French Revolution.

The historical works of the Congregation of St. Maur are numerous, and embrace an extensive field. Dom Mabillon may be considered as the founder of diplomacy, of which he established the basis in his De re diplomatica (1691, 6 vols. 4to); this was followed by a supplement in 1704, in consequence of the attacks of the Jesuit Germot. As these works related almost exclusively to France, a general work on the same subject was published by Dom Toussain and Dom Tassin, under the title Nouveau traité de diplomatie (1750-65, 6 vols. 4to), which is now the most perfect of the kind. To these must be added Montauperné's Paléographie Grecque (1708, fol.), which, however, has been surpassed by subsequent publications. Chronology may almost be said to have been created by them. The Art de vérifier les dates, commenced by Dantion and finished by Clémen cet (1756, 2 vols. 4to), is well known to every student of history. A second edition was published by Clement (1770, fol.), and then a third (1783-92, 3 vols. fol.), each time with numerous additions. The fourth, much enlarged edition, due also to Clement, appeared first in 1818 (5 vols. 8vo), and was often reprinted; there are also an American edition, and one in Latin. The following has justly been called the most important monument of French learning in the 18th century. Montaupernes's Antiquités expliquées en figures (1719, 10 vols. fol.) has now become somewhat antiquated in consequence of the new sources discovered since. In the domain of philology, the congregation took an active part in a yet unper cessed work, the Glossarium mediae et infimae Latinitatis of Dufresne Ducange (1678), which, if it did not originate with them, was at least increased one half by Dom Dantion and Dom Charpentier (1738-86, 9 vols. fol., with an appendix by D. Bernard, 1767, 4 vols. fol.), and acquired its full importance by their labors. This work is not only important for its philological value, but also for the information it contains on the literature, laws, and civil and ecclesiastical customs of the Middle Ages. Charpentier is also the author of the Alphabetorum typogra corum (1747, fol.). They published the sources of the history of France. Such as had been furnished by Pi ton and Duchesne were insufficient, and Colbert and Louvois vainly sought to have the work continued; but D'Agenau finally succeeded in inducing the Benedic tines to undertake it, and to this task, which had been taken into the hands of Dom Bouquet, who completed the first eight volumes of the Scriptores rerum Gallicarum et Franciarum; Dom J. B. Haudiguier and C. Hau diguier accomplished the xth, xth, and xth; Dom Clé tin the xth and xvth, and Dom Brial, the last of the Benedicines of St. Maur, the xvth and xvth (1738-1818, fol.). The work has since been continued by the Académie des Inscriptions, which published the xst volume in 1855. To this class of works belongs the edition of the writings of Grégoire de Tours, published by Dom Bourret (1759, 4 vols. fol.), and a complete history of France, but only the beginning of it, and the history of particular parts. Dom Martin wrote La Religion des Gaulois (1727, 2 vols. 4to), and Dom de Breteuil Histoire des Gaules et des Conquêtes des Gaulois (1752, 2 vols. 4to), both of little importance, their histories of particular provinces are more valuable. The most important are Histoire générale du Languedoc, by Vaimette and De Vic (1730-45) 5 vols. fol.; Histoire de Bretagne, by Veissiere (who subsequently became a Protestant) and Lobineau (1707, 2 vols. fol.). This was afterwards entirely remade, and completed by Maurice de Beaufort (1742, 8 vols. fol., and 2 vols. 4to); Histoire de Bourgogne, by Blancher (1789 sq. 8 vols. fol.); Histoire de la Ville de Paris, by Flébillien and Lobineau (1785, 8 vols. fol.). Finally, the Histoire Littéraire MAUR 907 MAUR
de la France (1788–88, 12 vols. 4to), inaugurated by Dom Rivet and others, and continued by the order till 1814, when it was taken up by the Académie des Inscriptions; the xxth volume was published in 1842. It is a very valuable collection of documents, not only for the history of French literature, but also for the history of the order. Generally, the collection is a rich storehouse in the libraries of the convents, also the journeys, principally in Italy, Germany, and the Netherlands, gave occasion to publish extensive catalogues and descriptions of them. Among these we notice the Speculum veterum aliquot scriptorum of D'Acchery (1610, 17 vols. of which 6 vols. are written in Middle Age Latin and 12 vols. in Latin), and the Venera Alsecta, by Mabillon (1675–85, 4 vols. 4to); Collectio nova veterum scriptorum, by Martène (1700, 4to); Theuarum nouarum Anecdotorum, by Martène and Durand (1717, 5 vols. fol.); Voyage littéraire de deux religieux Basiliens, by the same (1724, 4to); Dissertations Italiens (1732, 4to), and Bibliotheca bibliothecarum manuscriptorum nova (1739, 2 vols. fol.), both by Montfaucon. In Church history, their most important works are their revision of the Gallia Christiana of the brothers De Sainte-Marthe (1655, 4 vols. fol.). The new work was authorized by the distinguished family, Dom Denis de Sainte-Marthe. It was intended as an introduction to a contemplated Orbis Christianus, for which a large amount of documents were collected, yet this work was never completed. The first volume of this Orm Christianus appeared in 1730. Sainte-Marthe died on the completion of the third volume, in 1725. The order continued the work until the thirteenth volume, which appeared in 1785. It was then interrupted, until of late years Hauréau, the author of the Histoire de la Philosophie scholastique (1850, 2 vols.), took it up again, and in 1846 he published his continuation. The Gallia Christiana was used as a model for other similar works, such as the Italie sacrée, the Espagne sagrada, the Italiens sacrés, etc. It also gave rise to numerous histories of special convents by others of the congregation; the greater part of them, however, remain unpublished. The only two which appear as the Histoire de l'Abbaye de St. Denis de FelbienJou (1705, fol.) and the Histoire de l'Abbaye de St. Germain des Prés de Bossart (1724, fol.). The collection of the French councils, commenced by Dom de Coniac, and afterwards continued by Dom Labat, was to be appended to the Gallia Christiana. The first volume appeared in 1789, at the moment of the outbreak of the French Revolution, and the congregation was dispersed before the second was complete. The history of martyrs was treated by Dom Batut in his Acta primorum martyrum (1869, 4to). Of greater interest in these papers are the old liturgies and convent customs, some of which are among the earliest works of the congregation. Menard published the Sacramentarium of Gregory the Great (1842, 4to), Mabillon the Liturgia Gallica (1645, 4to), Martine his Libri V de antiquis monachorum ritibus (1690, 2 vols. 4to), and his De antiquis ecclesiae ritibus (1700, 4 vols. 4to; 2d edit. 1736, 4 vols. fol.); finally, among the most renowned works in that line, we must mention the Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti, compiled by Mabillon and Ruinart (1668, etc., 9 vols. fol.; the tenth remained unpublished); the Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, the celebrated work of Mabillon, compiled by Massuet (1703, etc., 6 vols. fol.). The same congregation wrote also a history of their own order, which formed 3 vols. fol. in MS., but the superiors refused permission for publication. Dom Tassin published, however, an abstract from it, down to 1765. Dom Clémence wrote a history of Port Royal, of which the first part alone appeared (1755, 10 vols. 12mo); the second part remained in MS., as being too favorable to the Jesuits.

The studia humanitatis of the Benedictines of St. Maur to the gratitude of theologians lies in their editions of the works of the fathers. They had at first contemplated only publishing the complete works of authors of their own order; but the favor with which their productions were received, as also the requirements of their schools, induced them to publish first the works of the Latin fathers, and afterwards of the Greek also. For this purpose they compared the various texts of the different works existing in France, Italy, England, Holland, Germany, etc. The result was, except generally in the libraries of the convents, also the journeys, principally in Italy, Germany, and the Netherlands, gave occasion to publish extensive catalogues and descriptions of them. Among these we notice the Speculum veterum aliquot scriptorum of D'Acchery (1610–1617, 18 vols. in Middle Age Latin and 6 vols. in Latin), 3 vols of which were included in St. 4th vol. His views afforded them powerful weapons in the Janissarian controversy. The edition was commenced by Dom Delfau, and continued by Blampin and Constant (1678–1706, 11 vols. fol.); Garet published Cassiodor (1679, 2 vols. fol.). Du Fréche and Le Nourri, Ambrosius (1658–90, 2 vols. fol.); Constant, Hilarius of Poitiers (1698, fol.); Martianus, Jerome (1668–1706, 5 vols. fol.). The works of Cyprynus, commenced by Baluze, who was not of St. Maur, were completed by Dom Maran (1726, fol.). In 1645 the Benedictines published the Ephet de l'ordre de Benoit (4 to), a work in the close of the 17th century that they seriously applied themselves to this branch of ancient ecclesiastical literature. Montfaucon published the works of Athanasius (1698, 3 vols. fol.); this was followed by his Collectio nova et nova patrum patrum de 16 vols. fol. Maran published the works of Athanasius; the works of Eusebius of Caesarea, and the Topography of Cosmas. Massuet published Irenæus (1710, fol.); Montfaucon, Chrysostom (1718–38, 13 vols. fol.); Tousée, Cyril of Jerusalem (1720, fol.); Garnier, Basil the Great (1731–30, 5 vols. fol.); Charles de la Rue and his nephew Vincent de la Rue, Origen (1728–29, 4 vols. fol.); Maran, Justin and the other apologists (1742, fol.). Maran commenced an edition of the works of Gregory of Nazianzus, which was commenced by Clémence, but the breaking out of the French Revolution prevented the publication of any but the first volume (1788, fol.). Among the works of writers of their order and others of the Middle Ages which they published, we notice the rule of St. Benedict of Aniane, Concordia regulorum, published by Menard (1628, 4to); Lombraye, by D'Acchery (1648, fol.); and Guibert of Nogent, by the same (1611, fol.); St. Bernard, by Mabillon (1667, fol.; 2d ed. 1690, 2 vols. fol.; 3d ed. 1719, 2 vols. fol.); Anselm of Canterbury, by Gerberon (1675, fol.; 2d ed. 1721); Gregory the Great, by Denis de Sainte-Marthe (1705, 4 vols. fol.); Hibault de Main, by Beaupendre (1706, fol.). Dom Constant published the letters and works of the popes, only the first volume of which appeared (1721, fol.). To aid in the use of the Bibliothèque maxima of Lyon, Le Nourri wrote his Apparatus (1708, fol.), which, however, does not extend further than the 4th century; it consists of biographical, historical, and literary notices of the writers whose works are contained in the Bibliothèque. Finally, among their most valuable publications are those relating to the ancient translations of the Bible. Such are the Hexapla of Origen, by Montfaucon (1718, 2 vols. fol.); the Bible of Jerome, by Mariani (1685, 1 vol. of the works of Jerome), and the Latina versione antiquae, by Sabatier, Boulard, and Vincent de la Rue (1749–49, 3 vols. fol.). Their zeal and the liberal views could not fail to involve them in numerous and bitter controversies; yet even then they generally pursued a middle course, whilst their greater learning often gave them the advantage over their adversaries. Perhaps the weakest contest they ever engaged in was their defence of the claims of their fellow Benedictine abbots Ceremon as the author of the Instructio Christi, against the attacks of the Augustinian canon regulars (see Kämmerer). They ably defended themselves against the insinuations of De Rancé, founder of La Trappe, who accused them of worldliness on account of their studies. Mabillon was thus provoked to publish his renowned Tracté des études Monastiques (1591, 4to, and 1692, 2 vols. 12mo; it was translated into Latin and Italian). They also got into difficulties with the Jesuits, who accused them of Jansenism on account of their edition of St. Augustine, and other books; but they were never in the French Church. During this controversy they published very important essays against the bull Unigenitus. Gerberon published the Histoire générale du Jansénisme (1700, 3 vols. 12mo), and Le Cist the Histoire de la Constitution Unigenitus en ce qui regarde la Congrégation de St. Maur. The French Revolution, in forbidding the existence of convents, dispersed also the Benedictines. Several of the works they had then on hand remained incomplete.
The Académie des Inscriptions undertook to finish such as related to the history of France. The last of the Benedictines of St. Maur, Dom Brial, died a member of the French Academy in 1833. In later times an attempt was made to revive the order. La Menais (q.v.) with some of his friends bought the abbey of Solesmes, formerly occupied by the Benedictines of St. Maur. The pope made it the regular abbey of the restored Order of Benedictines Sept. 1, 1837, and Geranger (afterwards called Guéranger), a German professor, formerly a Protestant, was made superior-general of the order. Yet so far, the attempts of the new monks to rival the fame of their predecessors have proved unsuccessful; the ultramontane party in the French Church is not favorable to profound studies. Its first work gave evidence of the spirit which now animates the institution: Origines catholiques, origines de l'Église Romaine (Paris, 1836, 4to; vol. i only has appeared). By its Institutions liturgiques (Paris, 1846) Guéranger helped to introduce the use of the Roman liturgy in the French dioceses, in spite of the remonstrances of the Gallican clergy.
The most eminent of the new Benedictines is Piria, yet even his works will prove of more value to the papacy than to science. In an article published in the Correspondant of the 30th May 1854, he directed attention to the papal Brief in which the Church's position was stated and asserted that the making of the pseudo-decreets (q. v.) affects the purity of the See of Rome which was then already recognised by all. Piria has published a Histoire de St. Léger et de l'Église de France au 7e siècle (Paris, 1848):—Études sur la Collection des Actes des Saints par les Hollandais (Paris, 1850), a valuable work.
Since 1852 he has been working at a Speculum Solesmens, of which three volumes have been published (Paris, royal 8vo). They do not continue the important works commenced by the old order, leaving even that restoration unfinished. Benedicto-Maurand (or Mauran), Pierre, the first leader of the Albigenses in Southern France, was born at Toulouse, of a noted family, in the early part of the 12th century. From his youth he gave himself entirely in spreading the doctrines of the Albigenses (q. v.) throughout Languedoc. Rich and learned, preaching incessantly, travelling barefooted, sleeping on the ground, living in the midst of danger, he strongly impressed the southern mind, always easily excited, and in short time made a great number of converts, whom he assembled in two of his mansions, one in the city, the other in the country. Maurand said boldly "that the clergy performed their ecclesiastical duties without learning, without morals, and without capacity; that usually their names were known in many places, and this all was venal, the sacraments and the benefices; that the clerks, the priests, the canons, and even the bishops, associated publicly with abandoned women; that if the same vices were remarked in the lords and laity, it was owing to the general ignorance, an excuse which the clergy could not plead." As for his belief, he admitted two grand directing principles, independent and uncreated; good and evil; light and darkness. He did not consider almsgiving a means of salvation; and life should not be an incessant commerce. He did not admit that a priest could, by a few words on the lips, and wax into the body and blood of Christ, and persisted in seeing in the mass and sacrifice only a commemoration, a symbol. He rejected all the ceremonial service of the Church as an abuse which should be destroyed. He led, however, the most regular and sober life, prayed on his knees seven times a day and seven times each night.

He did not acknowledge the remission of sins on the earth, not being able to believe that a mere mortal, a priest "all covered with the leprosy of vice," could absolve that of which he himself knowingly guilty each day. For as the members of the clergy, he calcelled them not pastors, but ravishing wolves, etc. The court of Rome was not slow in being roused, and the number of heretics multiplied so prodigiously that an appeal was made to the secular arm. After having condemned the sectarians in several methods, the archbishops of Narbonne and Lyons made some arrests, and burnt alive those who would not recant. After the action of the Council of Albi in 1176, pope Alexander III himself in-agurated a crusade against the heretics, who were particularly strong in the dominion of Raymond V of Toulouse. Maurand and the Albigenses resisted the invasion of the invading clanners of the people. One of the prelates however preached, and attempted to resume the doctrines of the Albigenses; the latter, apparently convinced not so much by his reasoning as by the fear of the count of Toulouse, did not dare to be seen or to speak in public. The legate, not contented with this success, caused the Roman Catholics to promise with an oath to denounce and deliver up all the heretics they knew. Pierre Maurand was one of the first reached by this measure. They induced him by caresses and promises to agree to the legate's terms. Maurand, to which he was obliged to submit, declared that the bread was not the body of Christ. The inquisitors asked nothing more; they delivered him to the count of Toulouse, who immediately imprisoned him, ordering that his goods should be forthwith confiscated and his mansions demolished, whilst other punishment was yet to follow. Pierre Maurand, seeing himself on the verge of an ignominious death, promised to abjure his faith. They then brought him out of prison, and on the public square, before the assembled people, he bowed down before the Holy Cross, asked the pope to grant him pardon, and promised to submit to their orders.
The next day the bishop of Toulouse and the abbot of Saint-Sernin took Maurand from his prison, naked and barefooted, and led him through the city, flogging him from time to time to the crying and neighing of the horse. A heavy fine, renewed the abjuration of his faith, and heard the sentence which condemned him to start with in forty days for Jerusalem, and remain there three years in the service of the poor; his goods were confiscated, half to the profit of Raymond V, half to the profit of the clergy. He was also obliged to pay a fine of five hundred pounds' weight of silver to the count of Toulouse, to make numerous gifts to religious establishments, to the poor, etc. However, when Maurand returned from Palestine, he recovered the greater part of his estates.

Maurice, St. See MAURITIUS.
Maurice (duke and afterwards elector) of SAXONY, one of the most prominent characters in the history of the Reformation in the Church of Germany, a celebrated MAURICE

general and champion of the Protestant cause, was the eldest son of duke Henry of the Albertine line and nephew of duke George the Bearded, the most bitter opponent of the Reformation. Maurice was born at Freiburg March 21, 1521; he espoused in 1541 Agnes, daughter of the landgrave Philip of Hesse; and later in the same year succeeded his father in the duchy of Saxony and its dependencies. He was hardly well established in his dominion when a dispute arose between him and his cousin, the elector of Saxony, John Frederick, regarding their respective rights over the bishopric of Meissen, which was the common property of the Ernestine and Albertine lines; but by the influence of Luther and of the landgrave Philip a temporary reconciliation was effected; but the Turks, who had distinguished himself as a soldier, and became the favourite of Charles V. Whether, however, Maurice was at this time the sincere friend of the emperor is a question that has never yet been determined. This much is certain that Maurice was selfish by nature, and sought rather the furtherance of his own interests than the welfare of his associates and those who befriended him. A professed Protestant, he took part in the deliberations at Smalcald (q. v.; see also Holy League), but refused to become a member of the league for the safety of the empire; and, finding no chance to co-operate at that time to secure the protectorate of the bishoprics of Magdeburg and Halberstadt. No sooner had the emperor bestowed upon him this much-coveted favor, and honored him with the title of elector (June 19, 1540), than Maurice deserted the Protestant camp, and played the part of a most devoted adherent of the emperor's cause. In consequence of this unexpected hostility to the Protestants the imperial army gained a decisive victory at Mühlberg in April, 1547, wellnigh proving the death-stroke of the Protestant cause. By this defeat of the Protestants, and the imprisonment of his rival, John Frederick, Maurice, according to a previous understanding with the emperor, became himself the ruler of all Saxony. Thus gratified in all the ambitious desires in which he could expect aid from Charles V, Maurice became quite uneasy in his present relation, and hesitated not to embrace the very first opportunity to seek anew the favor of the leaders he had so basely deserted. It is true as late as 1547 Maurice was still found on the side of the imperialists, for he this year supported the Interim (q. v.) of Augsburg; but gradually he lessened his support and by 1551 we find him a party to a secret treaty of the Protestant princes with Henry II of France, at the very time that he was professing to besiege the rebellious city of Magdeburg. As treacherously and unhesitatingly as he had abandoned the cause of the Reformers he now forsook the imperial cause and became as it were in building up vast schemes of ambition, little dreaming of the mine which the man who had assembled all of confided in was preparing to spring under his feet. When suddenly the word came to him that he must release Henry Philip of Hesse whom he had imprisoned for his opposition to the imperial cause, even before he had time to decide the case, news came to him that Maurice of Saxony was marching against him. Without money, without troops, without allies, Charles was compelled to yield to the demands of the man whom he had himself made powerful. On April 18, by the mediation of Ferdinand, king of the Romans, a treaty was concluded at Lina granting the demands of the Protestants; but as it was not to take effect till May 26, Maurice employed himself in attacking (May 11) the fortress of Heilin, in which soldiers were assembling for the emperor's service. He expected, no doubt, to terrify the imperialists, and advanced on Innsbruck with the view of taking Charles captive. Had it not been that a mutiny stopped his progress, the emperor would have been rudely handled, as Maurice knew his antagonist, and was uncertain of the consequences of his attack. Baffled, Maurice also was frightened. His advance on Innsbruck so alarmed the members of the Council of Trent, then in session there, that they fled from the town, and the sittings were thenceforth suspended for some years. Finally came the conclusion of the Peace of Passau; Maurice directing the cause of the Protestants, and Ferdinand attending to the imperial interests. To the Protestants this meeting must ever be memorable. It was here that a treaty of peace was established which secured to Protestants free exercise of worship; and it was by the Passau treaty that the Romanists of Germany agreed that the imperial chamber, from which Lutherans were not to be excluded, should render justice irrespective of religion; and that the Aulic Council should be composed exclusively of the Romanists. As a result of this treaty in political matters secured "Germany for the Germans," and in religious affairs permanently established the principles of toleration, were embodied in the agreement called the Peace of Passau (Aug. 22, 1552). Charles, though he professed reconciliation, never lost an opportunity to wreck his vengeance on the elector. The latter, with his usual subtlety and address, patched up a reconciliation with the emperor, and engaged in the campaign of 1553 against the Turks, who were gradually gaining ground in Hungary. Returning soon, he found the former emperor in the midst of Kulmbach, had refused to accede to the treaty of Passau, and continued the war on his own account, making raids on the ecclesiastical princes of the Rhine and Franconia. Maurice also speedily discovered that behind the margrave stood the emperor, who had secured the services of the margrave because he had found in him a general and an army capable of wreaking his vengeance on the perfidious Saxon prince. But Maurice was equal to the occasion. Putting himself at the head of 20,000 men, he marched to protect his bishopric of Magdeburg against the attacks of the emperor, and, falling in with him at Sievershausen, completely defeated him (July 9, 1558), but fell himself in the conflict, mortally wounded, and died July 11, 1553. "So thoughtful and reticent, so enterprising and energetic, so correct in judgment and unfailing in action, and at the same time wholly devoid of moral sentiment, he is one of the most prominent instances of power without principle which the world's history has ever presented." Kohlrausch has perhaps furnished the most moderate comment on the perjured life of Maurice of Saxony. "The final efforts he so patriotically made for the promotion and establishment of a German empire, to have for peace and order, which he sealed with his own blood, have in a great degree served to throw the mantle of oblivion over his earlier proceedings, and conciliated the critical voice of public opinion" (Hist. Germany, p. 290). Robertson failed to be conviction as to the last act of Maurice, and to let it stand forth only as the life-work of this faithless prince. He excuses him on the ground that "his long and intimate union with the emperor had afforded him many opportunities of observing narrowly the dangerous tendency of that monarch's (Charles) schemes. He saw the yoke that was preparing for his country, and was convinced that but a few steps more remained to be taken in order to render Charles as absolute a monarch in Germany as he had become in Spain. At the same time he perceived that Charles was bent on exacting a rigid conformity to the doctrines and rites of the Romish Church, instead of allowing liberty of conscience, the promise of which had allured several Protestant princes to assist him in the war against the confederates of Smalcald. As he himself, notwithstanding all the compliances which he had made from the outset, and the excess of confidence in the emperor, was sincerely attached to the Lutheran tenets, he determined not to be a tame spectator of the overthrow of a system which he believed to be founded in truth" (p. 866). Though we would gladly like to come out at this point, truly anxious to lend the last from the opinion of the noted historian. We doubt very much whether Maurice of Saxonify, in any period of his life be either 'Belgium Protestantism' "to be founded in truth," or doubt even that he ever believed himself "to be founded in truth." Let us say, rather, that he was possessed of an ambition which knew no bounds, and that, seeking honor for himself, he reapplied all the glory of having converted and completed that universe to the Pietists which closed the Imperial authority of the religious and absolute and hereditary in his family; and established the Protestant Church, which had hitherto subsisted precariously in Germany, through conjunction or by expedients, upon a firm and secure basis" (p. 416; comp. p. 424, 425). It is indeed a singular circumstance that the Reformation should be indebted for its security and full establishment in Germany to the same hand which had brought it to the brink of destruction, and that both events should have been accompanied by the same acts of dissimulation. Maurice, Antoine (1), a French Protestant theologian, was born at Lausanne, in Provençal, Sept. 27, 1679. He belonged to a Provençal family which had embraced the Reformed religion in the 16th century, and furnished many pastors to the churches of the south. When the revocation of the Edict of Nantes forced his father to retire to Geneva, he was not permitted to follow him, and remained for some time in the hands of priests, who hoped to educate him to the service of the Church of Rome. Two officers, friends of his family, coming to his aid, he succeeded finally in escaping the vigilance of his guardians and arrived at Venice; being denounced during a hal, fled along the coast, landed on foot at Bourg in Bresme (1666). Although it was in the middle of winter, he resumed his route with a faithful servant, and, after having wandered in the mountains of Jura, he succeeded in reaching Basle, from whence he was conducted to Geneva in a pillage, 1680. He was then only 11 years old. Consecrated to the ministry, he entered it in 1697, at Geneva, where, in 1704, he assumed pastoral duty. Gifted with a happy memory and great talent for the study of languages, he learned the greater part of the Oriental tongues, and perfected himself by speaking fluently with a rabbi and priest from the Levant whom he had invited to his house. He was also fond of the sciences, and abandoned the system of Des Cartes for that of Newton, of whom he became a zealous partisan. In 1710 he was elected professor of belles-lettres and of history in the Academy of Geneva, later he taught the Oriental languages, and after 1724 theology. He was twice called to the rectoryship. In 1718 he was made a member of the Royal Society of the Sciences of Berlin, on the proposition of Leibnitz. Maurice died in Geneva Aug. 20, 1766. Maurice, Antoine (2), a Swiss theologian, was born at Geneva April 11, 1718. He showed at an early age a decided talent for the physical sciences; at the age of sixteen he maintained before the celebrated professors Caumes and Calendrini some theses, De Actione Solis et Luna in atrium et aquam (Geneva, 1732, 4to.), which were then considered very remarkable. He became pastor in 1748, and in 1756 succeeded his father in the chair of Divinity in the Theological Faculty of Geneva. He has left some dissertations on philosophical and theological points: De Musica in Sacris (Geneva, 1717, 4to.); De Fide et Jus Jus Canondarum circa futurum post hanc vitam statum (ibid. 1780, 8vo.): De Toleran- tiea aephsico (ibid. 1781): De Slavica Erassios (ibid. 1782): De Concordia ecclesiastica. Maurice, Frederick Denison, a very celebrated English divine of our day, the successor of Dr. Arnold as leader of the "Broad Church" party of the Anglican clergy, was born in 1805, the son of a Unitarian minister of high reputation for intelligence and philanthropic zeal. Young Maurice at an early age entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he formed an intimate friendship with the Rev. Dr. George Adams (q.v.), a friendship which lasted through the whole of Sterling's life, and which was made closer in the end by the marriage of the friends to two sisters. From Trinity College both Maurice and Sterling removed to the smaller corporation of Trinity Hall; and here early in life they began to display a talent partly intellectual and partly moral, upon all who came near him, which accompanied him throughout his whole career. His examinations at college were passed with such great distinction that he was recommended for a fellowship over the whole of the country with such a prospect, he would be subjecting his intellectual independence to the risk of a temptation, and bribing his conscience. Accordingly, quitting Cambridge without a degree, he removed to London, where for some time he devoted himself to literature. With his friend Sterling he became connected with the "Athenaeum," then just starting, and opened a literary career that lasted for a period of forty-four years, within which "the ink of his pen was seldom dry." Experiencing a change in his religious sentiments, he finally decided to enter the ministry of the Established Church, but, lest his motives should be questioned, he was then only 11 years old. Consecrated to the ministry, he entered it in 1897, at Cambridge, where, in 1704, he assumed pastoral duty. Gifted with a happy memory and great talent for the study of languages, he learned the greater part of the Oriental tongues, and perfected himself by speaking fluently with a rabbi and priest from the Levant whom he had invited to his house. this man is impossible without a glance at his works, we proceed to a hasty consideration of his written productions in the field of theology and philosophy. Omitting numerous separate sermons and occasional tracts, we note his Doctrine of Sacrifice deduced from the Scripturæ.—Lectures on the Ecclesiastical History of the First and Second Centuries.—Lectures on the Epistles of the New Testament.—Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament.—The Unity of the New Testament.—Christmas Day and other Sermons.—On the Religions of the World.—On the Prayer-book.—The Church a Family.—On the Lord's Prayer: —On the Sabbath.—On the Law before the Failure of the Law. To the "Encyclopedia Britannica" he contributed History of Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy, in ancient and in mediæval times, which was afterwards collected into book form and republished (2 vols. 8vo). He also published a reply to Mansel's "Bampton Lectures" in 1853. Particularly noteworthy among all these productions are his Theological Essays (Lond, 1853, 8vo; N.Y. 1854). A Unitarian by birth and education, Mr. Maurice had imbued much of the humanitarian principles. In these essays he proposed for himself the task of influencing the Church of England of his time to see that it was a faithful ambassador of its Saviour, to meet the actual wants of the disturbed and reluctantly sceptical age in which he lived. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Maurice had failed to make due allowance for the moderate degree of tolerance that was in vogue twenty years ago, which has since in fact grown to act as a revolutionizing and theoreti cally a logical reformer, and for the ignorance that prevailed among his fellow-men concerning the man who sought to do this work. Now that careful inquiry and inves tigation have clearly revealed his character, even the most orthodox of all orthodox Christians need not hesitate to speak in terms of highest commendation of the labors and services of Frederick Denison Maurice. But not so in the days of his travails. "It was the specialty of his position," says a writer in the British Quart. Rev. (Jan. 1857, p. 80), "that he stood midway, as it were, between the professors of the Christian faith, as commonly received, and the modern sceptical and rationalizing spirit which attracted his sympathies, in so far as it was a spirit of free and earnest inquiry, aiming sincerely at the attainment of the truth. Thus he came to be considered by many as affording a sort of half-way house of shelter to those who did not or could not accept the ordinary orthodoxy, and who were yet too much in earnest about life and destiny to be satisfied with the cheerless negations of atheism or the cold comforts of a provisional scepticism. It was natural that he should meet them; and yet he seemed to recede the more that they were owned by orthodoxy—which is no matter for wonder—he was rejected and often also despised by scepticism. By the one party he was charged with unsitting the faith of ingenious youth, while the others accused him of paling in words in a double sense, and seeking to reconcile things really irreconcilable." The Letters of the English Church, he held many views akin with the great German writer. Seeking, like the latter, to spread truth by giving it a fair test, Mr. Maurice often went beyond reasonable limits, and unknowingly en dangered the interests of the cause he so unhesitatingly served; his language respecting both the atonement and the question of eternal punishment was made the text of many attacks, the most noted of which was that by Dr. Candish of the Scottish Church, in a sermon entitled Examination of Mr. Maurice's "Theological Essays.
MAURICE 910 MAURICE

Starting from the divine centre as the root and source of all, religion is to Mr. Maurice a mode of life conditioned and determined on all sides by dependence upon God—the human personality upon the divine Person. "As the life come forth from the experiences through which man is acted upon by God, so as to be filled full out of the Infinite fulness. But how shall there be a communion between God and man? In order to the revealing of God, there must be a revelation. This reve- lation must be able to manifest forth what is in God, who is the Father universal, and to do this by such means that man may thereby know him as his Father. A mediator between God and man is essential to the satisfying and fulfilling of human wants. Only one who was himself God could adequately unfold the Eternal. And he must be able by man to be unfolded through the human, otherwise man could not apprehend the revelation; the light would continue shining in darkness without being comprehended of the latter. . . . The Father has shown us what he is by an actual man like ourselves, who told us that he came forth from the Father, and that he knew him. . . . He could reveal God to men because, having been ever with the Father, he had also been near to all men from their beginning, as the Light lightening every man coming into the world. He was the Root, and because he was the Root, he was also the Head of humanity. He could redeem humanity, and he alone could, because it was his own: because he was in some way already one with it; because in its deepest roots the human personality was bound to him. He did not, therefore, first become a Rev erend, but came to us to teach us his Fatherhood; he could redeem in time, because he had been the Deliverer before his incarnation—because it was his nature to be so." So far so well. There is, however, one great as pect of the work and mission of Christ which Mr. Mau rice ignored, that brought the charge of heterodoxy to his door. The necessity of an atonement and the identification of a broken law, the obligation from which even God himself could not escape of only pardoning when justice had been satisfied, and which, therefore, magnified and made honorable the law that man had disowned and the au thority he had imposed were altogether to be set aside by Mr. Maurice. According to him, it is the sin, and not alone, if at all, the penalty of the sin of the world that Christ takes away. The penalty is and must always be borne by those against whom it is di rected, and cannot be endured by any at second hand. Need we wonder that this view of the atonement exposed Mr. Maurice to much obloquy? "He transforms the atonement," says the writer already quoted, "into a mere means of reconciling man to God by a process of education. The subjective influence of the sacrifice of Christ—its effects, that is, upon the souls of men, ethically and spiritually—was alone emphasized by him. And whatever benefits may have been wrought by bringing this aspect of the atonement into prominence, obviously it is not the whole scriptural doctrine of sac rifice, as unfolded in the work in which he seeks to declare it, but a part of it. The authoritative atonement of this one great doctrine of Christianity, there are yet others in which its influence was mainly pernicious. "Grateful to him as we are for the power with which he vindicated that great truth on which Christianity rests—the incarnation of God in the man Jesus—it is not evident that he was apt to resolve this, and with it the whole work of Christ, into the fulfillment of a merely naturalistic order? . . . He clung to the indefinite, afraid of losing hold of the reality by putting thoughts in the place of things—opinions, theories, and speculations about the real, for true contact with and genuine apprehension (or laying hold and grasping) of it. He would not let go his hold upon reality, which somehow was brought near by being revealed to man; but he was satisfied with the somehow." And yet, while there are some points like those mentioned above on which theological differ ences from the writings of Mr. Maurice, we must concede that, in face of a rationalism which menaces the foundations of Christianity, Mr. Maurice might well be counted, even by the most orthodox, "a champion of revelation." We do not so much refer to his influence upon those accepting his teachings and ideas, which in its entirety, may be called his disciples, as to the far more diffused influence exercised by him upon the general religious thought of England. The very corner stone of this influence lies in his vivid and unflagging apprehension of the revelation of God in Christ as a present reality, exactly fitted to accomplish all that the world needs.

Mr. Maurice held for many years the professorship of divinity in King's College. The peculiar views advanced in his Theological Essays deprived him of his position, and he was thereafter confined to the office of chaplain to Lincoln's Inn. In 1800 the queen, in addition, appointed him incumbent of the district church of Vere Street, Marylebone, and in 1866 he was honored with a call to the chair of moral philosophy at Cambridge. He died at his residence in London, April 1, 1872, the object of universal admiration. "By not a few he was 'worshipped on this side idolatry,' while by a large number of outsiders he was regarded with affectionate veneration. These feelings culminated at his death in a display of feeling such as it is given to every one to call forth. The unanimity of the testimony borne to his character and work by the many journals, secular and religious, that chronicled his decease, was an index of the general sentiment. It was felt everywhere that England had lost a veritable hero in the battle for truth, and the Church a bright ornament and exemplar of the practical graces of the Christian life."

It must not be believed that Mr. Maurice's labors were confined to the theological or philosophical arena. It had been his function in the Athenaeum to "witness during his allotted term the lives of many men." He was the originator, or one of the originators, of the Christian socialistic movement, the design of which was to break down the system of competitive labor, and elevate the working classes by teaching them to associate in little companies, undertaking work in common, and sharing the proceeds. With a view to preparing working-men for such a task, he founded a working-men's college in London, to which in his last years he devoted much of his time and attention. He also took a prominent part in the cause of adult education. Indeed, there are few social questions of any importance to which his sympathies did not extend. See

MAURICE, Thomas, an English divine and scholar, noted particularly for his studies of the antiquities of India, was born about 1755 at Hertford, where his father was then the head-master of the Christ's Hospital school. After his father's death the family was im-poveryed by an unfortunate marriage of the widow, and his education proceeded irregularly till Dr. Parr, on opening his school at Stanmore, was prevailed on to receive him as a pupil, and treated him with great generosity and kindness. Destined for the Church, he entered at nineteen St. John's College, Oxford, whence he removed next year to University College. After taking his degree of B.A., he was ordained by bishop Lowth, and held for some time the curacy of the large parish of Woodford, in Essex, which in 1765 he resigned in order to be ordained for a chapel at Epping, in order to obtain greater leisure for study. His turn for historical studies had been fas-terized at University College by his distinguished tutor Lord Stowell, and he now began to concentrate his attention on the history of India, for treating upon which he made proposals in 1790 in a published letter addressed to the East India directors. The irriguous spirit of the French Revolution, alarming Mr. Maurice's mind, induced him to remodel his first work after it was nearly completed, and to devote a considerable proportion of it to a vindication of the Hindu policy of the government. In 1791 he came before the public with two volumes of his Indian Antiquities: the rest were brought out at intervals, the completion of the work being mainly owing to the liberality of the earl of Harborough; and the sev-eenth and last volume appeared in 1797. This work remains to our day a trustworthy book of reference.

Meaning time he had undertaken a History of Hindostan, the three volumes of which, in quarto, were published in 1798, 1798, 1799, and a second edition appeared in 1821.

In 1796 Earl Spencer presented him to the vicarage of Wormleighton, in Warwickshire; next year he was appointed assistant librarian in the British Museum; in 1800 bishop Tomline obtained for him the pension that had been held by the poet Cowper; and in 1804 he received from the lord chancellor the vicarage of Cudham, in Kent. His Modern History of Hindostan, in two volumes, appeared in 1802 and 1804. Several other volumes on Eastern history and theology, and attempts in verse, succeeded this work; and one of his last undertakings was his Memoirs, comprehending the History of the Progress of Indian Literature, and Anecdotes of Literary Characters in the 17th and 18th Centuries. Years.

Of this work the three volumes appeared in 1819, 1820, and 1822. He died March 30, 1824. See English Cyclopaedia, s. v.; Allibone, MAURITIUS and the THEOBATIC LEGION. The legend concerning St. Mauritius and his follow-soldiers originated with Eucherius, bishop of Lyons († about 430), and was first published in A.D. 1662, by the Jesuit Francis Chiffletus, from an old martyrology in the Abbey of St. Claude, in the Jura. A recension of this legend was admitted into the martyrology of the Legion, which is drawn from martyrologies of a later date, and was composed by a monk connected with the cloister of St. Maurice, who bore the same name as the bishop, but flourished nearly a century later. Much has been written for and against the authenticity of the legend, but the results of modern criticism seem to indicate that basis of truth underlies the story. The evidence in its favor reaches to the 4th century, while the adverse proof rests chiefly on the improbability of the events narrated.

It relates that during the wars of the emperor Maximian with Diocletian, two legions, known as the legio II.

Thracica, were ordered from the East to reinforce his army. It was composed entirely of Christians, and was led by Mauritius. While the emperor rested at Octodurum (now Martigny, at the foot of Mount St. Bernard), the bulk of this legion fled to St. Maurice, in the present canton of Wallis, excepting two cohorts, which were sent to Tréves.

The army was at this time employed in persecuting Christians, in which service the Theobatic legion was ordered to co-operate. They refused to obey, and the emperor, in a rage, commanded the decimation of the legion. As they remained firm, even after a second decimation, Maximian ordered the massacre of the entire body. Eucherius states that at this period a legion numbered 6000 men, and clearly asserts that the greater portion of this legion perished at St. Maurice, while the martyrrology of St. Mauritius adds that of-cers were sent to Tréves to execute a similar punisment on the two cohorts stationed there. A similar leg-den occurs in Simeon Metaphrastes, according to which a St. Mauritius with seventy of his soldiers was executed by order of Maximian; but this was probably a Greek adaptation of the Latin story. Grave doubts are cast upon the legend by the great number of fugitives from this massacre which constantly meet us, and by the improbability of the sacrifice of so large a body of troops in time of war. See De Lisle, De la Virté du Martyre de la Legion Théobienne (1787); the Acta SS.

MAURY

MAURUS, a pupil of Benedict of Nursia, is chiefly known by the account given of him by the monks of the Congregation of St. Maur (q. v.). His history is mainly legendary. He is said to have been the first to introduce the Benedictine rule into France; to have founded its first convent in France at Glenfeul, in the province of Anjou, and to have died in 684, after having performed a great number of miracles. Such at least are the main points to be gathered from his biography, much mixed up indeed in regard to dates, which appeared ed in the 9th century. Gregory of Tours makes no mention of him whatever. This, however, appears certain, that France was the field of his labors, for his name was known there before his biography appeared. Yet all the Mauromonasteris do not lead us back to him; thus, for instance, that at the foot of the Vosges is named after an abbot of the 8th century. Mabillon and Ruinart vainly tried to prove the correctness of the old biography (Acta Sanctorum. ord. S. Bened. sec. i, 274 sq. ; Annales ord. S. Bened. sec. i, 107 sq. ; 629 sq.) which held that he was a Protestant. Many Catholic writers have found ample reason to doubt its genuineness.—Herzog, Recht-Eckleyp., ix, 201. (J. N. P.)

MAURUS, RABANUS. See RABANUS.

MAURY, JOHN SIFFREIN, a French prelate, and noted also as a pulpit orator, was born June 26, 1746, at Vau- reas, in the Venaissin, of poor but respectable parents. He displayed at a very early age great eagerness for learning, and being destined by his parents for the ecclesiastical profession, he was placed at the Seminary of St. Gerde, at Avignon, to pursue his theological studies. About 1766 he proceeded to Paris, in the expectation of earning a subsistence by the cultivation of his talents. Though he was without friends in that city, his first publication attracted considerable notice. Encouraged by this early success he took orders, and devoted himself to the study of pulpit eloquence. In 1772 an Eloge on Fénelon, which he published, was favorably received by the French Academy, and caused him to be appointed vicar-general of the bishop of Lombez. He had not proceeded far in his new career than he became very popular as a preacher. A panegyric of St. Louis, which he delivered before the French Academy, and one of St. Augustine before an assembly of the clergy, met with so much success that king Louis XVI appointed him preacher to the court, and presented him with the living of the small farm of Freneval, in the diocese of Bayeux. In 1785 he delivered his panegyric on St. Vincent de Paul, which is esteemed a masterpiece; shortly after he had the honor to be chosen a member of the Academy in the place of the lyric poet Le Franc de Pomponian, and the following year the valuable benefice of the priory of Lioris was conferred upon him. At the assembly of the States-General in 1789 he was named deputy of the clergy for the bailiwick of Péronne, and soon took a prominent part in the debates. From the first he enlisted himself on the aristocratic side, where his energy, eloquence, and peculiar talent at reply rendered him a formidable antagonist to Mirabeau. His imposing and impassioned oratory, though it expressed opinions hostile to the great majority of the assembly, was often listened to with admiration and greeted with applause, not only by the forces on his side, but also by the of the ancient régime, and by the witty frequenter of the Parisian salons, who styled them archi-priestly despatches, in allusion to their military tone, and their imitation of the style and manner of Napoleon's bulletins. After the capitulation of Paris in November, the 5th of March, 1795, he was deprived of the Bourbons of the administration of his diocese; and, in their to maintain all his power the new constitution; and, in case of any priest's refusal, it was declared that he should be held to have renounced his benefices. To this constitution the pope had refused his assent, on account of its hostility to the interests of the Church, and the oath was indignantly refused by the great majority of the clergy. When the day arrived for the taking it by the bishops and clergy of the Assembly, an infuriated mob surrounded the hall, threatening death to all who should refuse. On this occasion also Maury displayed his usual intrepidity, and boldly advocated the independence of his order. "Strike, but hear me," was his exclamation, when the last efforts of his impiation eloquence in that Assembly were interrupted by the increased tumult, and political antipathy that closed the stormy session of the National Assembly, Maury, who could lend no further aid to the prostrate cause of royalty and religion, quitted his native country, and, at the invitation of Pius VI, took up his residence at Rome. He was there received with the highest distinction, and the loss of his benefices in France was more than compensated by his speedy elevation to the highest positions in the gift of the Roman Church. In 1792 he was named archbishop of Nicaea "in partibus infidelium," and afterwards appointed apostolic nunus to the Kingdom of France, in the effort for the restoration of emperor Francis II. This mission accomplished, in 1794 he was elevated to the dignity of a cardinal, and was made a cardinal of the church of Rome with the government of France under Napoleon (1804); thereafter he embraced the cause of the first consul, and was permitted to return to France. This position, which was deemed not to be in union with the tenor of his former conduct, subjected him in after times to the reproaches and persecutions of the party whom he had served with so much personal hazard. Napoleon gladly received the approaches of so distinguished a member of a Church whose establishment he was restoring in France; an interview with his successor at Paris, on the 1st of December, became the prelude to the fall of Maury and the fall of Pius VI. After Napoleon there had arisen much disagreement. Cardinal Maury was a warm and sincere admirer of the emperor, and he not only espoused his cause in the disputes with the head of the Church, but took every occasion, which the frequent victories of this chief afforded him, of testifying his gratitude for the expressions of admiration in his mandates to the clergy of his diocese. These mandates, written in a style of the most florid eloquence, do not remind us of the imposing and energetic orator of the National Assembly; they were written at a period when the ideas of the ancient régime, and by the witty frequenter of the Parisian salons, who styled them archi-priestly despatches, in allusion to their military tone, and their imitation of the style and manner of Napoleon's bulletins. After the capitulation of Paris in November, the 5th of March, 1795, he was deprived of the sentiment for his adherence to Napoleon's fortunes, for they forgot his former daring and powerful support of the rising of 1813. He then returned to Rome, where he was imprisoned during one year by the orders of the pope; he was afterwards allowed to live in retirement on a pension which was given to him in compensation for his resignation of the see of Monte Fiasco in the following year. He retired in deep contempt by the ingratitude of his former party, and that of the pontifi-cate, to whose elevation he had been instrumental, he died on the 11th of May, 1817. "Notwithstanding his extraordinary eloquence," says the duke of Abrantes, who knew him intimately, "the abbe Maury had been be-omerly, that is to say, in the condition that he continued under the empire, a man of talent rather than a man of sense, and a curate of the time of the League, rather than an abbe of the reign of Louis XIV." She adds that his figure was in the highest degree disagreeable, but the description she gives of it appears rather a caricature than a portrait. His principal work, Essais sur l'Eloquence de la Chaire (8 vols. 8vo), published after his death by his nephew, Louis Siffrein Maury, still maintains its well-merited popularity. His mind was formed to appreciate the eloquence of Masoli-dol, Renouard, and Bounie, and his criticisms on the other French divines are in general as correct as they are temperate. In his review, however, of English pulpit oratory, he manifests a want of acquaintance with the writings of its most celebrated preachers, such as Jenkin and Sherlock, and Bowdler. He selected Blair as the best model of English eloquence, and the comparison which he draws between him and Masolindo is necessary most unfavorable to Blair. His own paneugy of St. Augustine is esteemed one of the finest pieces of French pulpit eloquence. He is also supposed, conjointly with the abbé de Berthomont, to be the author of a work entitled Lettres sur l'Etat actuel de la Religion de l'Eglise en France. See Vie du Cardinal Maury Mathis'zim (CZ. Sept. Maiuzs, v. r. Mazsz, Vulg. Maiuzioni). The marginal note to the A. V. of Dan. xi, 38, "the God of forces," gives, as the equivacent of the last word, "Mauziz, or gods protectors, or munitions." The Geneva version renders the Hebrew as a proper name both in Dan. xi, 38 and 39, where the word occurs again (marg. of A. V. "munitions"). In the Greek version of Theodotion, given above, it is treated as a proper name, as well as in the Vulgate. The Sept., as at present printed, is evidently corrupt in this passage, but ἐγραφα (ver. 37) appears to represent the word in question. In Jerome's time the reading was different, and he gives "Deum fortissimum" for the Latin translation of it, and "Deum fortissimum" for that of Aquila. He ridicules the interpretation of Porphyry, who, ignorant of Hebrew, understood by "the god of Mauziz" the statue of Jupiter set up in Modin, the city of Mattathias and his sons, by the generals of Antiochus, who compelled the Jews to sacrifice to it, "the god of Modin." Theodoret retains the reading of Theodotion (Μαυςίς being evidently for Μαυζίς), and explains it of Antichrist, "a god strong and powerful." The Pesbho-Syriac has "the strong god," and Junius and Tremellius render it "Deum summi roboris," considering the Hebrew plural as intensive, and interpreting it of the God of Israel. There can be little doubt that "Mauziz" is to be taken in its literal sense of "fortresses," just as in Dan. xi, 19, 38, "the god of fortresses" being then the deity who presided over strongholds. But beyond this it is scarcely possible to connect an appellation so general with any special object of idolatrous worship. Grotius conjectured that Mauziz was a modification of the name ΑΛΛΟς, the war-god of the Phoenicians, mentioned in Julian's hymn

The sun (Reyow, Addit. ad Seidenlin "De Dea Syria," p. 276). Can we suggested without quoting "money," the name of a mere Roman god, all powerful. By others it has been interpreted to be Mars, the tutelary deity of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is the subject of allusion. The only authority for this supposition exists in two coins struck at Leodecis, which are believed to have on the obverse the head of Antiochus, deeply impressed by the ingratitude of his former party, and that of the pontificate, to whose elevation he had been instrumental, he died on the 11th of May, 1817. "Notwithstanding his extraordinary eloquence," says the duke of Abrantes, who knew him intimately, "the abbe Maury had been beat least as well founded as any already mentioned.

Mawmoulaine or Malvouline, William de, a Scottish cathedral prelate, supposed to be from France, flourished in Scotland about the opening of the 18th century. He was made bishop of St. Andrews in 1692; established many monasteries in that country, and was active in promoting a crusade to the Holy Land.

He was on the same day also elected both a trustee and professor of divinity in the college, and in July, 1792, became president. His pastoral relations he severed September 8, 1792. In 1802 he accepted the presidfirst president, he needed the call, in the hope that a become much impaired. Over this institution he con-continued to preside, with almost unprecedented popularity, until his death, June 4, 1520. Dr. Maxey was one of the most accomplished pupil orators and scholars of his time, distanced by few. He was well versed in philosophy, criticism, metaphysics, logic, politics, morals, and philosophy. His character was very amiable and his piety sincere. His death was that of the believer in Jesus, and his memory is widely revered. He published a large number of works, including addresses, sermons, etc., which after his death were gathered in a volume, entitled The Literary Remains of the Rev. Jonathan Maxey, D.D., with a Memoir of his Life, by Romeo Elton, D.D. The most valued of his publications were his sermons on the existence of God, frequently republished. Maxfield, Thomas, a noted early Methodist lay-preacher, flourished in the latter part of the 18th century. He was one of Wesley's converts at Bristol, and was appointed to pray and expound the Scriptures, but not to preach, at the Foundery, in London, during Mr. Wesley's absence. Maxfield, however, being a young man of spirit, accepted of the invitation to expound the Scriptures, from the young people of the Foundery. He was greatly respected by the people, who, assembling in vast crowds, and listening with earnest attention, insensibly led him to deviate from this restriction and begin to preach. Wesley was informed of this irregularity and came to the Foundery, and accused him of his prejudices for "Church order" being still strong. The mother of Wesley counselled him to hear Maxfield preach before reproving him, adding, "But take care what you do respecting that young man; he is as surely called of God to preach as you are." Wesley heard him, and, after some hesitation, and in the power of truth, he objected no longer. Thus Maxfield became the first of the innumerable itinerant lay-preachers, who have spread the Gospel throughout the world more successfully than any other class of the Christian community. Wesley promoted his welfare in every way, introduced him in London to a social position superior to his birth, by which he was enabled to make an advantageous marriage, and obtained ordination for him in Ireland from the bishop of Londonderry, who favored Wesley in that country.

Maxfield was present at the first Methodist Conference held at London, England, June 26, 1774. Maxfield also attended the third Conference assembled at Bristol, May, 1776. He shared the persecution to which the followers of Wesley were subjected; was at one time seized and imprisoned for the king's service, thrown into a dungeon, and offered to the committee of a shutting them out. This being a revival in London, great excitement was produced by an honest madman, Bell, formerly a life-guardman, who had become a local preacher, and supposed that he had performed a miraculous cure. Possessing more enthusiasm than judgment, he became fanatic in public meetings, and greatly excited his hearers. He unfortunately obtained much influence over Maxfield—the latter was not naturally an enthusiast—and made him a companion in his fanaticism. Both the Wesleys conversed with Maxfield on the subject, telling him what they disliked in his conduct. In some matters he had been unjustly blamed, in others he promised to change; the evil, however, was not remedied, but seemed rather to increase. Then Mr. Wesley wrote a long letter to Maxfield, plainly telling him of the errors of his teaching and conduct, and of his tendency to separation from the Wesleys. The doctrines advocated by Maxfield and Bell were erroneous, inasmuch as they taught that a person saved from sin need not examine himself, need not pray in private, need only believe; that believing makes man perfect, and that the power of the Holy Spirit would find no one, thus saved could be taught by any one who was not.
Augustine friar, Maximilian addressed the Roman pontiff, and entreated him to heed this difficulty as "a question which was dividing Germany." But in the very year in which the discussion at Leipzig came off Maximilian died (1519), and left it for his successor Charles V to further the cause of Protestantism by a blind obedience to the dictates of an incompetent Roman pontiff. His men, liberal in notion, learned and much read, and the learned men were greatly encouraged by him. Indeed he himself was an author, producing several works in prose and verse. See Hegewisch, Gesch. d. Regierung Maximilian II, emperor of Austria, son of emperor Ferdinand I, and of Anna of Hungary, was born at Vienna Aug. 1, 1527. He was educated in Spain by Charles V; took part in the war of Smalcald (1544-48) against the French; became viceroy of Spain in 1549; on his return to Germany, about 1551, he made the two-League alliance; in 1552 became governor of Hungary. In September, 1562, he was crowned king of Bohemia; elected king of Rome at Frankfurt in November of the same year; king of Hungary at Presburg in 1563; and finally succeeded his father as emperor of Germany in July, 1564. He made war against the Turks until 1567, but their arms reigned in peace. During his youth his preceptor, Wolfgang Stiefel, had made him acquainted with the Protestant tenets, and he showed himself favorable to the Reformation, living on very friendly terms with the Protestant princes (Fischer, Hist. of the Reformation [N. Y. 1878, 8vo, p. 420]). Yet he did not allow their doctrines free scope throughout his empire, as the majority in the states was opposed to it, and the Protestants themselves, divided into Lutherans and Calvinists, were engaged in strife with each other. From the manner in which he sought the friendship and alliance of Roman princes, it must appear that Maximilian II never allowed his pri-ivate convictions to rule him as a monarch, but that all was made subservient to the interests of the empire.

Some will even have it, as Vehe (see below), that he was at one time a convert to the Protestant religion (Fischer, Hist. of the Reformation, i, 211). He, however, granted the Protestants in 1568 liberty to worship God according to their conscience throughout Austria, and commissioned D. Chrytus to draw up a Protestant liturgy for Austria. Although he was opposed to the Jesuits, and subjected to many restrictions, he yet, by his toleration, permitted them access and great influence in his own family. He died Oct. 12, 1576. See J. F. Miller, Epistola

Maximilian I, Julius VEBUS, Roman emperor, was a native of Thrace, and a shepherd in his youth. He fine figure, great height, and strength attracted the notice of the emperor Severus, who enrolled him in his guards. Maximian advanced rapidly, but did not serve under either Marcianus or Heliogabalus. During the reign of Alexander Severus he came to Rome, was made senator and chief of a newly-formed legion, took an active part in the wars against the Persians and Alamans, and soon gained great influence over the soldiers. When Alexander Severus was killed at Mayence, March 19, 235, the groups appointed Maximian his successor, and the senate, frightened, confirmed the election. He remained, however, with the army, and made several expeditions into Germany. His disposition was naturally cruel, and he gave full scope to it when on the throne. Two conspiracies against him which were discovered led to fearful massacres; in the first, it is said, over four thousand persons were executed. He also opposed Christianity, and particularly persecuted the bishops who had been most favored by Alexander. About the same time some earthquakes occurred in the empire, particularly in Cappadocia, and the people became enraged against the Christians, whom they accused of being the cause of all the evils which befell them, and the emperor allowed free scope to all barbarities the people chose to inflict on them. The persecution, indeed, broke out only in some parts of the empire, so that Christians could flee before it; but as the Christians had of late become used to toleration, this sudden visitation of persecution fell severely upon their heads, and caused much suffering (comp. Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. vi, 28; Firmianus, in Cyrill.
Ep. 75; Origen, Comment. in Mott. xxvi, 9). Finally his soldiers, tired of his tyranny and cruelty, murdered him, with his son, at Aquileia, March 8, 286. Max-imian was only regretted by the inhabitants of Thrace and Pannonia, who were proud of having an emperor of their own; the other parts of the empire rejoiced over his death. The legendary poet of the 10th century assigned to the reign of Maximian the fabulous partydom of St. Ursula, a British princess, and her company of eleven thousand (according to others, ten thousand) virgins, who, on their return from a pilgrimage to Rome, were murdered by heathens in the neighborhood of Cologne. This incredible number has probably arisen from the misinterpretation of an inscription, like "Ursula et Undecimilla" (which occurs in an old missal of the Sorbonne), or "Ursula et XI M. V., i. e. Martyres Virgines, which, by substituting militia for martyris, was increased from eleven martyrs to eleven thousand vir-gins. Some historians place the fact, which seems to form the basis of this legend, in connection with the retreat of the Huns after the battle of Chalons, 451th (Schaff). See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. ix, 207; Smith, COST OF Maximilian I.

Maximilian II, DAKA, Roman emperor, was originally an Illyrian peasant, who served in the Roman armies, and was raised by Galerus, who was his relative, to the rank of military tribune, and lastly, A.D. 303, at the time of the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian, to the dignity of Caesar, receiving for his share the government of Syria and Egypt. After the death of Galerus, in 311, Maximian and Licinius divided his dominions between them, and Maximian obtained the whole of the Asiatic provinces. Both he and Licinius behaved ungrate-fully towards the family of Galerus, their common benefactor. Valeria, the daughter of Diocletian and widow of Galerus, having escaped from Licinius into the deominations of Maximian, the latter offered to marry her, and on her refusal banished her with her mother into the deserts of Syria. He gained unenviable notoriety by his severity towards his Christian subjects, and made war against the Armenians. A new war having broken out between Licinius and Maximin, the latter advanced as far as Adrianople, but was defeated, fled into Asia, and died of poison at Tarsum in 313. — English Cyclopedia, a. v.

Col. of Maximin II.

Maximus Alexander, called also the Cynic Philosopher, was born in the fourth century, in Alexandria, of Christian parents of rank. He united the faith of an orthodox believer with the appearance and conduct of a cynic philosopher, and was greatly respected by the leading theologians of the orthodox party. Athanasius, in a letter written about A.D. 371 (Epist. ad Maxim. Philosoph. in Opp. i, 917, etc., ed. Benedict.), compliments him on a work written in defence of the orthodox faith. Tillemont and the Benedictine editor of the works of St. Augustine (Steele, in Orig. Christiana, zxx), misled by the virulent invectives of that father, attempt to distinguish between this Maximus and the one to whom Athanasius wrote, for the reason that Athanasius could never have approved of so worthless a character. They also distinguish him from the Maximus to whom Basil the Great addressed a letter (Ep. 41, Paris, 1839) in terms of great respect, discussing some points of doctrine, and soliciting a visit from him; but they are not successful in either case. The Maximus Scholasticus, however, to whom Basil also wrote (Ep. 49), was a different person. In A.D. 374, during the reign of the emperor Valens, in the persecution carried on by Lucius, Arian patriarch of Alexandria, Maximus was barbarously scourged and banished to the Oasis, on account of his zeal for orthodoxy, and the acrracity with which he aided those enduring the same persecutions (Gregory Nazianzen, Orat. zxx, c. 13, 14). He was released at the end of four years, probably on the death of Valens; and it was soon after this event that he presented to the emperor Gratian at Milan his work De Fide, written against the Arians (compare Jerome, De Viris Illustribus, c. 127), and which was not rejected by the emperor. It was, however, not published; but what in the same work or in another is not certainly known; and he disputed ably against the heathens. He appears to have returned from Milan and visited Constantinople, where Gregory Nazianzen had just been made patriarch, A.D. 379. Gregory received him with the greatest honor, and pronounced an oration (Orat. zxxv) in his praise, where his warm panegyric cause the commendations of Athanasius and Basil to seem exceedingly tame. He welcomed him at his table, treated him with much confidence and regard, but was subsequently grievously disappointed in him. Whether in the succeeding events Maximus was himself ambitious or merely the tool of others, does not appear. Profiting by the sickness of Gregory, and supported by some Egyptian ecclesiastics, sent by Peter, patriarch of Alexandria, under whose guidance they professed to act, Maximus was ordained, during the night, patriarch of Constantinople, in the place of Gregory, whose election had not been perfectly canonical. This bold proceeding greatly excited the indignation of the people, with whom Gregory was popular. The emperor Theodosius, whom they generally applied, showed him no favor, the latter withdrew to Alexandria, from whence he was speedily expelled by his patron Peter (see Gregory Nazianzen, Carmen de Vita sua, vv. 760-1029). The resignation of Gregory did not benefit Maximus, whose consecration was challenged by a peace or concord, the second general council, and the presbyters whom he had ordained declared not to be presbyters (Concil. Constantinopol. can. 8, sec. Dionys. Exiguum; Cepiola. 6, sec. Isidor. Mercat; apud Concil. vol. i, col. 609, 810, ed. Hardouin. Maximianus, and Successores, I, 9). The patriarch was sent to the patriarchate; but, though the Italian bishops seemed inclined for a time to second his efforts, he met with no permanent success. The invectives of Gregory Nazianzen against Maximus (Curmius, sec. De Vita sua, l. c. In Iesu, vs. 18, etc.; In Maximi) were written after their struggle for the patriarchate, and contrast strongly with his former praises in his twenty-fifth Oration, to which some of Gregory's admirers, to conceal the inconsistency, prefixed the name of Heron or Hero (In Laudem Herois; Jerome, De Viris Illustr. l. c.), which the friend of Maximus, the work of Gregory, De Fide, which is well spoken of by Jerome, is lost. (See Athanas, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Jerome, l. ; Soso- men, H. E. vii. 9, cum not. Vale; Tillemont, Mémoires, iv. 443, etc.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ed ann. 388, l. 276, ed. Ox- ford, 1740-42; Fabricius, Bibl. Graecos, iii. 520.)—Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. s. v.

Maximus Confessor, a leading champion of orthodoxy in the Monothelite controversy (q. v.), was born at Constantinople in 680. At an early age he became private secretary to the emperor Heracleius, but, deciding for the ecclesiastical state, he resigned his position, and, in 710, became the archdeacon of Chrysosipilas (Scutari), near Constantinople, and in a short time became its abbot. The dangers which threatened the state at the time induced the emperor to attempt a reconciliation between the parties engaged in the Mon- othletic controversy (q. v.), by means of a compromise, which declared that Christ had accomplished the work of redemption by one manifestation of his will as the God-man, (μιαν θρησκευτικὴν ἰσπραγγίαν). The patriarchs Sergius, of Constantinople, and Cyrus, of Alexandria, as heads of the controversy parties, agreed in 689 to unite in this formula, and many of the Monophysite faction returned to the Church; but several of the orthodox opposed the compromise strongly, as practically endorsing Monophysite views. With a view to put an end to these troubles, the emperor in 693 published an edict, known as the Euthanas (q. v.), which prohibited all controversies on the question whether in Christ were one or two operations, but which itself plainly inculcated the doctrine of one will. Maximus, who had in the mean time removed to Africa, now entered the lists in defence of the orthodox view, and unequivocally re- nounced all the arguments hitherto used against the Church. His course was favored by Gregorius (or Georgius), the prefect of North Africa, who sought an opportunity to renounce his allegiance to the Byzantine court; and under his protection Maximus exerted himself to the utmost to carry on the Monothelitic cause, manifesting a special zeal against the Monophysite Severians in Egypt and Crete, and against the Mono- thelites. His discussion with Pyrrhus, the patriarch of Constantinople, who had fled to Gregorius on being charged with complicity in the murder of the emperor Constantine, was held in July, A.D. 645, and resulted in the signum triumph of Maximus. The records of this disputation belong to the most interesting writings of the Monothelite controversy. In the following year the bishops of Africa and the neighboring isles, influenced by Maximus, held a number of synods which condemned Monothelitism, and called on Theodore, bishop of Rome, to support their views with his authority. Maximus now went to Rome, accompanied by Pyrrhus, who formally recanted his late opinions, and was recognised by the pope as the rightful patriarch of Constantinople; and thus the influence of orthodoxy was formed which promised a complete triumph. But Maximus was the only disinterested party to the agreement. Gregorius fell in a battle with the Saracens in A.D. 647; Pyrrhus hastened to take back his renunciation, and was made a bishop of Cyzicus; and the pope disappointed in the hope of seeing his supremacy recognised in the East as well as in the West, anathematized him. Maximus was again compelled to counter the labor of controversial writings. He was now recognized at the imperial court as the soul of the opposition; and when he resisted the edict of Constans II, promulgated in A.D. 648, and known as the Typus (q. v.), Gregorius, an envoy of the Byzantine court, did not hesitate to put him in his cell, and attempt to shake his firmness. The monk, however, refused to make any concessions, since he regarded that edict as dechristizing Caesar to the level of a being without will or energy, and denied the right of the emperor to inter-fer in dogmatic questions. On the 1st of May, Maximus, more than any others, induced that pope to convalesce the first synod of the Lateran (in 649); and there can be no doubt that he originated the resolutions there adopted, which condemned Monothelitism and the imperial edict. Thereafter Maximus entered a cloister, and was lose to the detailed record of his life. We meet him again when apprehended, under orders from Constantinople, perhaps at the same time as pope Martin I, and brought to trial in 655. The proceedings (of which the records are quite full) show that the aim of the emperor was simply to secure his appellation as a menace to the interests of peace; but the monk remained firm, and declared with tears that the only means of securing peace was the recall of that instrument. Hence the treatment he received became harsher; and when, after his third trial, he was arrested in maintaining his synod convened by the patriarchs of Constantinople and of Antioch advised the emperor to banish him, and he was taken to the castle of Bizya, in Thrace, later to the monastery of St. Theodore, near Rhegium, and finally to Perberis. His exile was protracted more than a year, during which period frequent attempts were made by bishop Theodosius of Cassarea, and by special agents of the emperor to induce him to recant, but always without success. He was finally condemned to be scourged, and to lose his tongue and his right hand, that he might no longer be able either to speak or write, and afterwards to be incarcerated in the castle of Shenmarti, in the country of the Lacinians, where he died, Aug. 13, 652. His influence, however, continued to be felt. A few years later the emperor Constans II fell a victim to the homicide he had aroused chiefly by his persecution of this faithful champion of the Church, and in A.D. 690 the church gave her sanction to the doctrines so heroically defended by this monk in the first Trullan council (q. v.).

As a writer Maximus is distinguished by a rare combination of dialectic power with mystical profundity.
His mind was receptive rather than creative, and in his writings, which are Eustratian and Arisotelian, Chalcedonian orthodoxy, the theology of the Greek fathers, and the ideas of a Christian mysticism, which includes both the subjective asceticism of the Egyptian monks and the hierrarchical tendencies of the Areopagite system, all meet and coalesce. The mysticism of the Pseudo-Dionysius exerted the greatest influence over him, and from it he derived his principal thoughts; and it is chiefly because of his authority that the wide-spread influence of this system upon the theology of the Middle Ages was possible. The influence exerted on Scotus Eriugena by the writings of Maximus was extremely important; Baur asserts that Eriugena merely developed the ideas of Maximus, and commented on them; and other writers have shown in detail that the essential features of the system of Eriugena are drawn from Maximus, and mediately through him from the Areopagite. This monk thus becomes important as a connecting link between the ideas of the East and West, between the early fathers and the Middle Ages, and as a forerunner of scholasticism; and in his genius, character, piety, learning, literary and ecclesiastical influence, as well as in his eventful life, he appears one of the most remarkable Christian thinkers and martyrs. His works have been largely transcribed and read, but there is no complete edition. Combes has published a collection in two volumes, folio (Paris, 1875). Catalogues have recorded the titles of fifty-three, his letters being mentioned as one work. Of these, forty-eight have been printed.
They may be classed as exegetical, which treat the Scriptures in allegorical style; commentaries on the Church fathers; dogmatico-polemical; moral and ascetiçal; epistolary; and theological, and were written in the Latin Church Aug. 13; by the Greek Church

Maximus the Greek, a celebrated personage in Russian Church history, was born at Arta, in Albania, towards the end of the 16th century. After studying at Paris, Florence, and other cities then distinguished as seats of learning, he took the monastic vows at the church of Mount Athos. The grand duke Vassili I tavoitch, having requested the patriarch of Constantinople to send two persons to arrange and describe a vast number of Greek manuscripts and books that had recently been discovered in some part of the palace, Maximus was selected, and accordingly set out for Moscow. He was directed by Vassili to examine the books, and to select such as were most deserving of publication; but as he was then wholly ignorant of the Slavonic tongue, he had first to prepare a Latin version, which was afterwards rendered into Slavonic by the monks of the Palex. He used the translations of a Paslair with a commentary, and Chrysostom's Homilies on St. John, were produced.
Desirous of returning to his convent, it was only at the instances of the Czar, who wished him to revise the ear-er translated books of the Greek Church, that he decided to remain, and he then undertook this task, for which he was now qualified by a successful mastery of the Slavonic. The diligence with which he executed it, resulting in many corrections, tended however only to raise up numerous enemies against him, among the rest Daniel the metropolitan. But what more immediately endangered his safety was the commission which he opposed Vassili's divorce from his first wife, Salome (on account of barrenness), and his marriage with the princess Helena Glinsk (comp. Duncan, Hist. of Russia, p. 450). Maximus was condemned by a synod, excommunicated, and imprisoned in the Greek monastery at Tver in 1525. In this confinement he was for some time treated with great rigor, though the bishop of Tver interceded for him. At length removed to the Monastery of St. Sergius, he died there in 1536.
A great number of works by him are extant, chiefly in manuscript, on a variety of subjects—dogmatical, polemic, philosophical, etc., from which considerable information has been derived with regard to the opinions and prejudices of the clergy and people in that age; nor was he at all timid in reproving the abuses and vices of the times. This alone would account for the persecution which he drew down upon himself; but after his death even those who had been among the more violent against him admitted his innocence, nor was it long before his memory came to be regarded as that of a holy man and a martyr. — English Cyclop. s. v.; Rose, New Maximus of Jerusalem (Hierotheoumonos), a Greek ecclesiastical writer, flourished in the latter part of the 24th century. Jerome (De Viris Illustr. c. 47) speaks of Maximus as writing on the questions of the origin of evil and the creation of matter, and as having lived under the emperors Commodus (A.D. 180-192) and Severus (A.D. 192-211), but he does not state that office he held in the Church, or whether he held any; nor does he connect him with any locality. Honorius of Autun (De Scripture. Eccles. i, 47), extracting from Jerome, mentions the name of Maximus; and Rufinus, translating from Eusebius, who has a brief passage relating to the same writer (H. E., xvi, 27), gives the name in the same form; but it is probably incorrect. A Maximus, bishop of Jerusalem, lived in the reign of Antonius Pius or Marcus Aurelius, or the early part of that of Commodus, somewhere between A.D. 156 and 163; and it is possible, though both Eusebius and Jerome mention the bishop (Eusebius, Chronic. and Jerome, Euseb. Chronic. Interp.), they do not either of them identify the writer with him; and it is remarkable that in the last given by Eusebius of the bishops of Jerusalem, in his Histor. Eccles. (v, 27), the names of the second, and his successor Antoninus do not appear. It is uncertain, therefore, whether the writer and the bishop are the same, though it is extremely probable they were.

The title of the work of Maximus noticed by Jerome and Eusebius (for the two questions of the origin of evil and the cause of matter appear to be comprehended in one treatise) was De Materia. Eusebius has given a long extract from it (Prop. Evang. vii, 21, 22). A portion of the same extract is inserted, without acknowledgment, in the Dialoga Aetiamonti de recta Deum Fide, or Contra Marcionem, sec. iv, commonly ascribed to Irenaeus, but in reality, and only after his time. It is also quoted in the Philocalia, c. 24, compiled by Gregory Nazianzen and Basil the Great almost entirely from the works of Origen. In the inscription to the chapter they are said to be from the Preparatio Evangelica of Eusebius; and their being contained also in the supposed work of Origen, De Recta Fide, is affirmed in a probably interpolated sentence of the concluding paragraph of the chapter (Delaune, Opera Origina, i, 800 sq.). This passage, apparently the only part of Maximus's work which has come down to us, is given in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland (ii, 146), who identifies the author with the bishop, and gives his reasons for so doing in the Prolegomena to the volume, c. 6; see also Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 196, 93; Tillemont, Memoires, ii, 706, note xiii on Origen.

There was a third bishop of Jerusalem of this name, besides the two previously mentioned, who lived in the reign of Constantine the Great and his sons. He suffered in one of the later persecution of the heathen emperors, apparently under Maximian Galerius (Philostor., H. C. iii, 13). His sufferings in the cause of Christianity, and the influence of his position, led him to excommunicate the people of Jerusalem, among whom he officiated as priest, that when he was appointed by Macarius, bishop of that city, to the vacant bishopric of Diocletianopolis, the multitude would not permit his departure, and Macarius was forced to nominate another in his place. According to some accounts, Macarius repeated almost immediately of the nomination of Maximus to Diospolis, and readily acquiesced in his remaining in Jerusalem, taking him for his assistant in the duties of the episcopal office (Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. ii, 28). Upon the death of Macarius (some time between A.D. 331 and 335), Maximus succeeded him, and was present at the Council of Tyre, A.D. 335, when Athanasius was condemned. Sozomen records (Hist. Eccles. ii, 25) that at this council Paphnutius, a bishop of the Thebae or Upper Egypt, and himself a confessor, took Maximus by the hand and said to him, "You are the place; for," said he, "it does not become us, who have lost our eyes and been humbled for the sake of religion, to join the council of the wicked." This appeal was in vain, and Maximus was induced, but unwillingly, to subscribe to the decree condemning Athanasius. The same Maximus, who had acceded to this step, and, at a synod of sixteen bishops of Palestine, joyfully admitted Athanasius to communion when returning from the Council of Sardica, through Asia, to Alexandria. Sozomen relates (Hist. Eccles. iv, 20) that Maximus was deposed by the influence of Acacius of Cesarea and Patrophilus (A.D. 849 or 850), and Cyril (St. Cyrilus of Jerusalem) appointed in his place; but if there is any truth in this statement, the death of Maximus must have very shortly followed his deposition (Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. ii, 25, 185, 186; xi, 9, 6; Thaon, Lc. i, c. 144, iii, 6; Theodoret, Lc. i, Philosophiag, Lc. i, Le Clerc, Origs. Christian., vol. iii, col. 156).—Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. vol. ii, s. v.

Maximus. Philosopher. Different parties of that name are known in ancient history.

1. A heathen eclectic-Platonic philosopher and conjuror, who was teacher to the emperor Julian, and had great influence over him.

2. A heathen, of Madaura, in Africa, is known to us by an interesting letter to Augustine. In consequence of his consciousness of the downfall of heathenism, he seeks to uphold a philosophical but impotent monotheism, which, in the worship of several deities, sees only the adoration of a higher of supreme deity who imparts to them their power; but he reproaches the Christians with wishing to have that God all to themselves, and visiting the graves of the dead (martys). Regardless of the new life which Christianity awakened, or of the divine energy of its exclusiveness, he finally exclaims, characteristically, "Trabam solumque vulnera." The answer of Augustine is somewhat haughty and ironical (August. Opp. ii, 25 sq., ed. Venet.).

3. Eusebius mentions a Christian philosopher of that name in the 2nd century, giving an interesting fragment of a work of his on the question, then much discussed, of the origin of evil (Prop. Evang. vii, 21 fin., 22; Hist. Eccles. vii, 27). He has been by some considered as the author of the Dialoga c. Marcionem, formerly and erroneously attributed to Origen; but Gieseler (Stud. u. Krit. 1880-92, p. 380) successfully opposed this view.

4. Another Maximus, who represented himself both as a philosopher (cynic) and a Christian, and gave much trouble to Gregory of Nazianzus, at Constantinople.

Hertzog, Real-Encyklop. xii, 208.

Maximus, a bishop of Turin, was born towards the close of the 4th century, and early in the 5th was elevated to the episcopate. But little is known of his life. His signature is affixed to a document expressing the approval by the bishops of Northern Italy of pope Leo's letter to Flavian on Eutychianism (Leo, Opp. ed. Quesnel, p. 291). Among the signatures to the acts of a synod held at Rome in A.D. 405, his name appears immediately below that of pope Hilarius, the successor of Leo, a circumstance which marks him as the oldest bishop of the assembly. His writings, chiefly homilies, are rich in descriptions of the life of the Christians, at a time when paganism, although tolerating to its fall, was still powerful among the rural population, and when the empire was trembling before the power of the invading hordes of barbarians. During the irruption of Attila he displayed a lofty faith in God, and succeeded in arousing his people from their despair, which had determined them to forsake their homes and seek safety in flight. The people of Turin obeyed his counsel, and their city was spared. But when the Huns departed from Italy, and the citizens purchased a share of their spoil, including slaves, he did not hesitate to condemn their conduct, and even compared them to wolves following in the track of lions, in order to gorge themselves on the flesh torn from the fallen prey. His efforts to cure the still prevailing idolatry, particularly the cultus Diana aevorum numinis, the practice of the priests in inflicting wounds on themselves to do honor to their goddess, etc., and also defended the orthodox doctrines of the Church against Eutychians, Nestorians, Pelagians, and Manicheans. The best edition of his works is that published at Rome in 1784, found in Migne, vol. lxi. See also Schönemann, Bihl. Hist. Lit. (Leips. 1794), ii, 607 sq.; Acta Sacnt. June 25th; Biogra-

Maximus of Tyre, a Neo-Platonic philosopher, author of which place of his abode, flourished in the 2d century as teacher of philosophy and rhetoric, first in Greece and afterwards in Rome, whither he made two journeys, one under the reign of Antoninus, another un-der that of Commodus. He may be ranked with Plineus, Quintus Curtius, and others of whom we shall have contemporary mention, and therefore of whom very little is known. We have extant of his works or dissertations, upon various arguments, a MS. copy of which was first brought out of Greece into Italy by Janus Lacarsi, and presented to Lauresiaci. From this copy a Latin translation was made, and published by Cosmus Paccius, ar-" archbishop of Florence, in 1519; then in Greek by Henry Stephens in 1557; then in Greek and Latin by Daniel Hein us in 1697; by J. Davis in 1703; by Reiske in 1774, and since, in 4to. These dissertations are entertaining, curious, and instructive, and have gained the author high encomiums among the learned. The following examples will give some idea of the subject of Maximus's dissertations: "On Plato's Opinion respecting the Deity;" "Whether we ought to return Injuries done to us as an Active or contemplative Life is to be preferred;" "Whether Soldiers or Husband-men are more useful in a State;" "On the Daumenion of Socrates;" "Whether Prayers should be addressed to the Deity," etc. The dissertations have been translated into French by Morel (Paris, 1607), by Fornay (1764), and by Dumas (1802); into Italian by Petro de Bardi (Venice, 1642); and into German by C. T. Damm (Berlin, 1764). There is, we believe, no English translation of this author. Isaac Casaubon, in the epistle dedicatory of his Commentaries upon Persica, calls him "mel-ritisimus Platonicensim;" and Peter Petit represents him as "auctorim ipsi velimim eleemosynam in philosophia ad spectrum" (Misc. Observat., li. e. 20). He has spoken a good deal of himself in his thirty-seven dissertation, and seemingly in a style of panegyric, for which his editor Davis has accused him of indecency and vanity; but Fabricius (Bib. Graec. lib. iv. c. 23) has defended him very well upon this head by observing that Davis did not sufficiently attend to Maximus's purpose in speaking thus of himself; "which was," he says, "not at all with a view of praising himself, but to encourage and promote the knowledge of those lessons in philosophy which they heard from him with so much applause." Some have confounded Maximus of Tyre with Maximus Ephe-bus, the preceptor of Julian the Apostate. See Gen.

Maxwell, Lady Darcy, an eminently pious Methodist, who by birth and rank belonged to the nobility of Scotland, is noted for her great works of philanthropy.
She was the youngest daughter of Thomas Brisbane, County of Ayr, and was born about the year 1742.
In her own home she received the rudiments of an education, but subsequently completed it in the city of Edinburgh. At the age of sixteen she resolved for a time in London with her uncle and aunt, lord and lady Lothian, to enjoy the advantages of being presented at court.
In 1759, soon after her return from London, she married Sir Walter Maxwell. This union seemed to open before her a bewildering vista of future joys and happiness; but it was by no means all that she had bright expectations; at the end of that period her husband and child were taken from her, and she was left a widow at nineteen. When tidings of her little one's death, with in six weeks after that of her husband, were conveyed to her, without any outbreak of grief, or even a murmur, she expressed a desire to be of use to God and her heart, and she shall have it!" "God brought me to myself by afflic-tion," she frequently said. It was while overwhelmed by these heavy trials that she became acquainted with the Methodists. The early ministry of John Wesley and George Whitefield was generally respected in Scott-land. Many of the higher classes approved their labors; ministers of the Establishment, members of the university, and persons of rank and title mingled in their audi-cences. It is supposed that some of the ministers of Wesley and Whitefield, first induced lady Maxwell to hear them. However that may be, it is certain that on June 16, 1764, Mr. Wesley preached to a large congregation in Edinburgh, and from that time corresponded with her ladyship, his influence aiding greatly in removing her views, and guiding her determinations through life. From the time of her husband's death she had resided in Edinburgh or the vicinity.
Her benevolence here was unusually great. Seeking to relieve misery in every form, there was scarcely a public or private charity for the repose of age, the suport of youth, the relief of the poor, the care of the sick, or the spread of the Gospel, to which she did not contribute. In 1770 she established a school in Edinburgh for the purpose of affording education and Christian instruction to poor children—this school was always the objects, but they were successful; its entire management and superintendence remained with herself, and, as the benefits flowing from it became manifest, pecuniary aid was furnished by others. At the time of her death her husband children had profited by this praiseworthy charity, and it is still in active operation. The school's embraces each day was exceedingly exemplary; she usually rose at four o'clock, and attended the Wesleyan chapel at five, morning preaching being then customary; after breakfast she discharged the duties of the head of a family in her own house; from eleven to twelve she spent the time in interceding with God for her friends, the Church, and the world; the remaining hours of the day she devoted to reading, writing, exercising, and acts of benevolence. Her evenings, when alone, were occupied with reading, chiefly divin-y; and, after an early supper, and committing her family to the care of the great Father who was over all, and spending some time in praising God for his mercies, she retired to rest. In this manner, for nearly fifty years, she walked with her God. Her outward religious life had its varieties, but they were the varieties of advance; her inner religious life also had its those of the beautiful morning, which shines brighter and brighter unto the perfect day. In person, lady Maxwell was above the medium height, exceedingly straight and well proported; her features quite feminine, but strongly intelligent; her voice very soon and penetrating, and her tender. She died July 2, 1810, passing away as peacefully and joyfully as she had lived: the society to which she belonged losing its oldest member, the world one of its best habitants, and the Church universal one of its brightest ornaments. See Lancaster, Life of Lady Maxwell (N. Y. 1849, 12mo); Colens, Heroes of Methodism,
p. 76.

Maxwell, Robert, one of the Scottish lords of the regency during the absence of James V in France, deserves a place here for his action in the first Parlia-mament of Mary queen of Scots (1548), where he introduced a bill to allow the reading of the Bible, and vigorously pressed in spite of the opposition of the lord chancellor, the bishops, and priests. He died in 1546.

Maxwell, Samuel, an American divine and educator, was born in Berkshire County, Mass., about 1805; was educated at Amherst College (class of 1829); subsequently became principal of the preparatory department of Marietta College, Ohio, and later a professor in the collegiate department of the same institution, and remained there until his death, which occurred January 24, 1867. He was also in the employ of the American Missionary Association in his last years.

May, B. H., a Dutch Reformed minister, was born at Lynn, Norfolk, England, Jan. 29, 1735. He received a good preparatory education, and studied for the ministry at Hoxton College, near London; was ordained in 1815 over the Independent Church at Bury, Lancashire, and subsequently preached in Rochford, in the south of England, and Croydon, Surrey. In 1814 he came to America, and in 1855 became a member of the Classis of Washington, and pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church in Northumberland; in 1856, pastor of the Church in Schuylerville; in 1859, of the Twenty-first Street Church, New York; in 1884 accepted the appointment of secretary to the Pennsylvania Colonization Society; and in 1889 became secretary of the Pennsylvania Seamen's Friend Society, in which connection he served until near his death, August, 1898. Mr. May was an instructive and evangelical preacher, a man of refined taste and correct judgment, and a frank, open-hearted Christian. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1800, p. 209.

May, James, D.D., an Episcopalian, was born at Chester County, Pa., Oct. 1, 1805. He entered Jefferson College, Pa., in 1822; graduated with distinction; commenced the study of law, but finally entered the theological seminary at Alexandria, Va. He was ordained by bishop White in 1827, and first settled in Wilkesbarre, Pa., where he remained ten years. In 1836 he became rector of St. Paul's parish, Philadelphia. While there he was engaged with Dr. Clark, then rector of St. Andrew's Church, Dr. Tyng, then rector of the Church of the Epiphany, and with Dr. Sudards, then and still rector of Grace Church, in the editorial management of the Episcopal Recorder. His position at this time, he says, was a very hard one, and he was week by week restricted in foreign travel. Two years were thus spent abroad. After his return, he accepted the position of professor of pastoral theology and ecclesiastical history in the Alexandria Seminary, his alma mater. The outbreak of the rebellion in 1861 closing the operations of that school, he removed to Philadelphia, and became professor of ecclesiastical history and systematic theology in the divinity school just organized. He remained there until his death, Dec. 18, 1863. But few men have so thoroughly won the affections of those with whom they came in contact. Always an impulsive man, he was by no means a person of cold and unimpassive temper, but full of deep feeling. He has influenced the training of hundreds now in the ministry, who will greatly miss his counsel, and the encouragement and sympathy and personal sentiments gave them. He was remarkable for the unvarying symmetry and depth of his Christian character, and seemed like one inspired by Gospel principles, rather than controlled by them, so perfectly natural and habitual was his manifestation of them. See Am. Ch. Rec. 1804, p. 150.

May, Samuel Joseph, an eminent Unitarian minister, was born at Burlington, Mass., in 1817, and, after preaching several years as a Unitarian minister at Brooklyn, Conn., became general agent of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society. Afterwards he assumed a pastorate at South Boston, Mass.; from 1842 to 1845 was principal of the Lexington Normal school; and finally, in 1845, settled in the Unitarian ministry at Syracuse, New York. There the remainder of his life was passed, and he was identified with every movement for the moral, intellectual, and social improvement of the people, and came to be regarded as the leading spirit in every measure of benevolence. In all matters of education he was very active, and to him, as much as to any man in Syracuse, it is due that its public schools are so successful and maintain such high character. He resigned the pastorate July 1, 1871. Mr. May devoted his energies especially to the anti-slavery cause for many years. He was one of the first members of the New England Society in 1832, and a member of the Philadelphia Convention of 1833 which formed the Anti-Slavery Society. He was author of Recollections of Amen. Anti-slavery (1869). See Drake, Dict. Amer. Biog. s.v.; New Amer. Cyclop. 1871, p. 496.

Maya (Sanskrit, Illusion) is a term applied by the Hindoos, in a philosophical or mystical sense, to that power which caused or created the visible phenomena of the universe. The Hindoos, like Berkeley and other European philosophers, assumes that external objects have no absolute existence, but that they are mere impressions of the mind. The Maya, in Hindu cosmology, is, according to some, that mighty goddess the wife or consort of Brahman. See Moor, Hindu Mythology, s.v.; Wilson, Sanscrit Dictionary, s.v.; Thomas, Dict. Biog. and Mythol. s.v.

Mayence, a German town, beautifully situated on a sloping hill on the left bank of the River Rhine, is analyzed in ecclesiatical history as the seat of an archiepiscopal see, and as the seat of several important Church councils. See Mayence, COUNCILS OF.

Mayence as an Archbishopric and Bishopric.—We have no trustworthy information as to the early history of this archbishopric. Attempts have been made to prove that the Christian Church was established there by St. Crescent, based on the passage in 2 Tim. iv, 10, "Crescent (is departed to Galatia)"; and Jerome and other writers also favor the opinion of Gaul having been Christianized by Crescent. Ado, however, in his Mergamopium, written about 560, is the first to refer to the action of Crescen at Vienna. Still as no documents referring to it until the 10th century, which may, however, be accounted for by the fact that the city was three times destroyed by fire up to that period. According to the ecclesiastical tradition, Crescen, a pupil of the apostle Paul, came to preach the gospel there as early as the year 82, became the first bishop of Mayence, and died a martyr in 103. The list of bishops up to the 6th century is all of later origin; according to it, Crescen was succeeded by Aureus, who was murdered by the Vandals when they took the city in 451. Sidonius, about 466, began the restoration of the town and of the church; Sigbert then became bishop about 589, and is said to have received from king Childerich the oxyn bearing a likeness of that prince and of his wife, which is still retained among the jewels of Mayence. In 612 Leonius (Leutigaus) caused war between Theodorek and Thoedebek. We then find in the list Ruthelmas (Rudulin), Landwald, Lupoald (Leowald), Higbert (Hichbert, f. 712), Gerold, who died at the hands of the Saxons in 748. He was succeeded by his son Gerwilo or Ge-wilbe, who in 744 marched with Carismian against the Saxons, and was defeated on the field of Haver. In 745 he was deposed, Bonifacius appointed in his place, and the bishopric transformed into an archbishopric, with the sanction of pope Zachary, in 749. In 755 or 754 Bonifacius resigned in favor of his pupil Lul-ius, who, however, did not reside long on the see; in 769 he was deposed, Bonifacius replaced him on the see; in 790; he labored diligently for the interest of the arch-adoption of the tithing system in 778. He died Oct. 16, 796. His successor was Riculf, who founded the school of the Church of St. Alban at Mayence, and died Aug. 9, 818, the very year in which Constantine called a council at Mayence (see below). Haïsulf, Jan. 28, 827, introduced canonical life in the abbascopie; yet the manner in which he conducted his reforms was by far more liberal according to canonical rules, but by the king, with the consent of the clergy and people. This was the case with Otgar, 826-47; Rabanus Maurus, 847-56 (who called a council, by order of Louis of Germany, in the year of his ascension to the archbishops chair); Charles, son of king Pepin I of Aquitania, and nephew of Louis the German, 868-83, who was also arch chancellor of the empire, a dignity which was retained by his successors; Liutbert, who marched against the Bohemians in 872, and against the Sobrians in 874; defeated the Normans, who had ascended the Rhine, in 898, and died Feb. 17, 895. Sunzo (Sunderbold) fell fighting against the Normans in 891. Hatto I played an important part in the history of Germany during the reign of Louis the Infant and Conrad I, and died Jan. 18, 913. His successor, Henger, died in 927. Hildibrand, who successfully disputed against Cologne and Trier the right to crown the king, and crowned Otto I at Aix-la-Chapelle in 936, died in 937. Friedrich was exiled to Hambig or Fulda by the emperor Otto I, as a rebel; was recalled in 954, but repeatedly accused of treason, and executed by his successor; was afterwards buried in 954. He was succeeded by Wilhelm, a natural son of Otto, who died in 968. Of Hatto II (968-70), the tradition says that he was devoured by mice. Ruprecht died in 974. Willigis received the pallium from pope Benedict VII, together with the privileges of the archbishopric at all the German councils and of crowning the king. To remind him always of his low origin (his father was said to have been a wagoner), he caused a wheel to be erected on the walls of his palace, and this is said to be the origin of the wheel on the arms of the archbishops of Mayence. In 978 he laid the foundations of the new cathedral (which, however, was burned down on the day of its consecration in 1009), and died in 1011. Next follow Archibald (Erkenbald), 1011-21; Aribon, 1021-81; Barlo of Oppershofen, 1031-51, who finished the new cathedral, and consecrated it Nov. 19, 1037. He received on this occasion the pallium from pope John XIX, and the right to act as papal legate whenever no other person appeared invested with that authority in his diocese. The succeeding incumbent was Leopold (Laitpold), count of Bogen, 1051-59. Sigfrid I, count of Luxemburg, was made bishop in 1059, but he died, but in vain, to procure a divorce between Henry IV and Bertha, and proclaimed—yet without effect—in 1075 the edict of celibacy of Gregory VII. After 1077 he took the part of the anti-kings, and crowned Rudolf of Swabia and Hermann of Luxembourg. He died in 1084. Wezilo (1084-98) was deposed of at the Council of Hallerstadt, and put under ban for maintaining that those of the secular clergy who lost their estates were no longer subject to ecclesiastical jurisdiction; he subsequently receded from this position. Under Ruther (1098-1100), a revolution broke out against the Jews in Mayence, and the archbishop, fearing the anger of the emperor for having taken an active part in it, fled to Thuringia, whence he returned only after a lapse of eight years. Adelbert I, count of Saarbruck (1109-37), was elected by Henry V, yet sided against him in 1120, and put in prison; he died in 1136, having been deposed and excommunicated for his opposition, and only released in 1115, when the people of Mayence rose in arms to secure his liberation. Adelbert showed his gratitude by granting the citizens of Mayence the charter (releasing them from the jurisdiction of the imperial treasury, and from the badge of service), which was inscribed on the door of the cathedral in 1125. In 1120 he fled again before the emperor, after whose death, in 1125, he assembled a diet for the election of a king. This is the first instance of the appearance in the history of Germany of the electors, among whom the archbishop of Mayence held the first place. Adelbert II, brother of the preceding, held the office 1138-41. Mar- culf, 1141-42, was the first archbishop elected according to canonical rules, with the concurrence of the people. Henry I, 1142-55, was appointed by Conrad III, supported by his son, and crowned by emperor; he was hated by the clergy for his severity, and they accused him before the pope of squandering the funds of the Church and of immorality. He was deposed in 1158. Under Arnold I, of Seelenbownen (1153-60), the partisans of his predecessors, newcomers Hermann, count of the Palatinate, invaded the diocese and laid the land waste. Arnold retaliated, and peace was only restored at the emperor's return from Italy in 1156. Arnold having promised the emperor to accompany him in his next journey to Rome, and to employ his influence to settle the difficulty then existing between him and the pope, he sought to levy a tax on the diocese to defray his expenses; but the citizens resisted, and the emperor refusing to take the part of the citizens, they murdered the archbishop in 1160. The emperor now appointed Conrad I, in spite of the opposition of the chapter; the new archbishop, however, on being requested to recognize the anti-pope, Pascal, fled to Alexander at Rome, and was made archbishop of Salzburg. His place was filled in 1165 by Christian I, count of Buch, chancellor of the emperor Fredric I. He proved true to that office in his part in the battle of Mauterndorf, when he was arrested there in 1180 by the count of Monte Ferrara, remained a prisoner until 1181, and died in the neighborhood of Rome in 1183. The title of arch chancellor of the empire, which the archbishops of Mayence had often received in the 10th century, became permanent now. After the decease of Christian, Conrad I became again archbishop of Mayence. The late prelate had already set up a claim on the estates of the extinct house of Franconia in Thuringia and Hesse; Conrad brought it forward again in 1184, but was opposed by the landgrave Lewis III, and a lengthy strife ensued. In 1197 Conrad took part in a crusade, and died in 1200. Sigfrid II, the elder, count of Eppstein (1200-30), obtained in 1208 the direction of the bishopric of Worms, and in 1228 the right to crown the kings of Bohemia (which was exercised by his followers until 1345). Sigfrid III, of Eppstein, nephew of the preceding (1290-49), finding the finances in very bad condition, levied, with the assent of the chapter, on all benefits a tax amounting to one twentieth of their income. On the other hand, it was enacted that the archbishop was to be chosen by the chancellor and the other members of the chapter, and that every future archbishop should be strictly held to submit to that rule. In 1232 Sigfrid obtained from the king the abbey of Lorch, and restored the cathedral, which was consecrated in 1239. He favored the deposition of emperor Frederic II, and supported Henry Raspe, and afterwards William of Holland (this is commemorated by three statues to be seen in the cathedral of Mayence, the centre one representing the archbishop, the one on his right Henry Raspe, and the other William of Hol- land). He died in 1258. Sigfrid IV, taking advantage of the death of his predecessor, attempted to annex his possessions to Thuringia, but was opposed by landgrave Henry and Sophia of Brabant, and the dispute lasted seven years. Sigfrid died in 1259, and was succeeded by Christian II, of Bolanden, who resigned in 1261. Gerhard I (1251-59), was imprisoned for ten years, and only restored to his position because he is alleged in 1257 by king Richard of England, whom he afterwards supported as a candidate to the imperial crown. Under him the cathedral canons of Mayence ceased to lead the communitar life. Werner of Eppstein, nephew of Sigfrid III, (1259-1268), confided the see of Mayence to a chapter of chaplains, and from 1269 to 1271, he signed with the title of arch-bishop of Mayence and then concluded a treaty with the duchess Sophia of Brabant in 1268, by which he obtained Grunberg and Frankenbourg; in 1271 he bought WILDEBERG, AMORBACH, SCHNEEBERG, and WILBACH from Ulrich of Deren, and in 1278 the castle of Bockenheim from count Henry of Sponheim; he took an active part in the election of Rudolph of Hapsburg as emperor of Germany. After a vacancy of two years, Henry II was appointed archbishop in 1286; he was disliked by the clergy for his strictness, and died in 1288. Gerhard II, of Eppestein (1295–1305), was elected emperor, but afterwards sided in his deposition, and in the election of Albrecht of Austria: he used his influence with both emperors for the aggrandizement of his archbishopric. He was also somewhat distinguished as a legislator; his decrees for the Count-Gerhard Gedlohs, his chancellor, are copied; King Albert hired him not assigning him the second rank among the electors, he protested, and obtained an imperial decree, under date of Sept. 28, 1298, placing him and his successors in the first rank; the same decree confirmed them also in the title of archbishop of Mainz. In the death of Albrecht (1296–20) improved greatly the finances of the diocese by his economy, and was a strict promoter of ecclesiastical discipline. Matthias, count of Bubeck and landgrave of Burgundy (1221–28), first sided with emperor Louis of Bavaria, but afterwards with the pope, and enlarged the estates of his see; after his death, which occurred in 1228, pope John XXII appointed Henry III, count of Burenburg, but the chapter elected archbishop Baldwin of Tieve; the latter governed the diocese during the difficulty, and added to it a part of the village of Birkenfeld, and the manors of Botzwangen, Eisheim, and Odenheim. On Nov. 12, 1286, Baldwin voluntarily surrendered his claim, and Henry was now accepted by the chapter, after promising to take sides with Louis of Bavaria, and to surrender the strong places of the diocese into the hands of the chapter. In 1292 he engaged not to tax the inhabitants of Mayence, or those of the suburbs, without their consent; in 1330 he released them from the ecclesiastical punishments they had incurred for injuring the clergy, and in 1331 absolved them from their promise to repay the Jews sums advanced by them to the city. He obtained jurisdiction over Eschel, Duderstadt, and Gimboldhausen; on the other hand, Olmütz and Prague were detached from Mayence, and, in consequence, the archbishops of Mayence lost the right to crown the kings of Hungary. He finally got into difficulties by his fidelity to emperor Lewis, and was deposed by pope Clement VI in 1346, yet continued to exercise his functions until his death in 1353. Gerlach, who had been appointed by the pope in 1346, was now recognized by all as archbishop. The difficulties between him and his predecessor had greatly injured the diocese: the funds had been exhausted; the monasteries and abbeys had become much relaxed, and the respect of the people had diminished in consequence; Gerlach, however, added to the diocese the castles of Itter and Altenfels, Baltenburg, the village of Badenheim, and the half of Geismar. At this time the Golden Bull, in which the high position of the archbishop of Mayence as dean of the electoral college was officially recognized, was given to the public. Gerlach died Feb. 12, 1371. His successor, John I, duke of Luxemburg, died in 1373. Louis, son of margrave Frederick the Ernest, was now appointed by both the pope and the emperor, while the chapter elected Adolph I, of Nassau, bishop of Spire, who took up his residence at Erfurt; the difficulty lasted until 1380; Adolph remained archbishop of Mayence, while Louis was made archbishop of Magdeburg, and retained the regalia until his death. Adolph was long at war with the English, and the possession of his possessions in that province; he founded the University of Erfurt, and died in 1390. His successor, Conrad II, of Weinsberg, persecuted the Waldenses, of whom there were a number in his diocese, and entered into a league with the emperor, Henry V. The emperor sent the Flagellants. He died Oct. 19, 1396. John II, count of Nassau, brother of Adolph I (1386–1419), took part in the deposition of emperor Wenzel, and, in consequence of being suspected of having had a share in the murder of the emperor elect, duke Frederick of Brunswick, as he sheltered the murderer, he became involved in a war with Brunswick and Hesse, which lasted until 1401: he added to his diocese Wetterau and Ardeck, besides several villages. Conrad III, count of Stein, was in 1422 appointed with the consent of the emperor to succeed his brother, but, being opposed by Louis of Heidelberg, he resigned that office in 1423: he added to the diocese the city of Steinheim, and enacted strict regulations for the conduct of the clergy. Under him the citizens of Mayence continued to complain of the exemption from taxes enjoyed by the clergy; he persevered in setting the question. He died in 1434. His successor, Dietrich I, of Erbach, was more fortunate, and put an end to the troubles in 1488, with the aid of two commissioners of the Council of Basle. His whole time was taken up in quarrels with the pope and emperor; the Pragmatic Sanction of Mayence, of which he was the author, and in which he recognized the Council of Basle, the suppression of the annates, and the general restoration of canonical election, was rejected, while the Concordat of Aachaffenburg, which held the contrary views, was accepted. Dietrich died in 1493, and was succeeded by Diether (Dietrich II), count of Isenburg-Budingen; the latter, however, found a rival in count Adolph of Nassau, whom Frederick, elector of the Palatinate, supported by force of arms; Diether was besieged in Heidelberg July 4, 1461, and obliged to flee. In 1462 he was deprived of the see, pope Pius II, for receiving money from the annates (which the pope had arbitrarily raised from 10,000 to 21,000 florins). Adolph II, count of Nassau, was now made archbishop, and a war commenced between Diether, supported by Bavaria and the Palatinate, and Adolph, upheld by Bavaria and Wurttemberg; a treaty was finally concluded, Oct. 25, 1463, Diether renouncing his claims. The city of Mayence, which was stormed by Adolph in 1462, lost all privileges. After the death of Adolph, Sept. 6, 1475, Diether was again appointed archbishop; but now commenced a strife about the city of Mayence: the cathedral chapter claimed it for its own, while the citizens demanded their liberty, and rebelled against the chapter; they were finally defeated, and the city remained subject to the archbishop, who made it his residence; he built the palace of Martinsburg, and founded the University of Mayence, which was opened in 1477; he also restored to the diocese the estates of Algesheim and Olm, and died May 7, 1482. Albert I, duke of Saxony, was son of the elector Ernst (1482–84). His successor, Berthold, count of Henneberg, accompanied emperor Maximilian as arch-chancellor of the empire, but he took the side of the empire against the peace throughout the country, and in the institution of the imperial chamber of justice; he also introduced great improvements in the ecclesiastical and conventual discipline, and laid the grievances of the Germans with regard to ecclesiastical affairs before the court of Rome. He died Dec. 21, 1504. Jacob of Liebenstein (1504–8) added Koetheim and part of Klingenfurst to the diocese. Uriel of Genimengen (1508–14) ordered the examination of the clergy, and strictly opposed concubinage among them. Albrecht of Brandenburg, archbishop of Magdeburg, was made archbishop of Mayence in 1514; he loved grandeur, wasted the funds of the diocese, and abused the sale of indulgences; he took part in the league against the Protestant princes; being attacked by the landgrave of Hesse, he purchased peace at the expense of 40,000 thalers. In 1529 he originated the Edict of Ferrara, and in a league against the emperor; afterwards sought to restore peace among the different religious parties, and was one of the principal promoters of the peace of Nuremberg. He died Sept. 24, 1545, highly respected both by the Roman Catholics and the Lutherans, and not only in Germany, but in other parts of Christendom. Sebastian of Heusenstam (1545–55) labored to improve the administration of the diocese, and also to restore the influence of Romanism; he subscribed to the Interim of 1548. During his reign Albrecht Alcibiades of Brandenburg invaded the diocese, and took Mayence; he made the citizens swear allegiance to the king of France, demanded a contribution of 600,000 ducats from the archbishop and chapter, and, as they were unable to pay that amount by the time stipulated, he burnt down the archiepiscopal palace and several churches; the archbishop himself fled to Eislefeld, where he died in 1555. His successor, Daniel of Homburg, endeavored to restore the archiepiscopal glory and former splendor; he introduced the Jesuits into Mayence and in Eichsfeld, and surrendered education into their hands; he took part also in the attempts of reconciliation between the Protestants and Romanists, added his diocese the county of Lahr (Rieneck), the county of Kusel, and all the Bassebaviasean territory to the Electorate of Mayence. He died March 22, 1582. He was succeed—ed by Wolfgang of Dalberg (1582 to April 5, 1601). John Adam, of Bicken (1601 to Jan. 10, 1604), and John Suicard, of Kronberg, strictly enforced all the old ecclesiastical rules, and restrained the Protestants. Under Suicard the diocese began to feel the effects of the Thirty Years' War, which was then raging; it suffered especially from the inroads of Mansfeld and Christian of Brunswick, against whom he called for the assistance of the Spaniards. He died July 6, 1629. Anselm Casimir of Eichstät was proclaimed bishop from Mayence when that city was taken by Gustavus Adolphus, Dec. 23, 1638; he retired to Cologne, and the diocese was, until the Treaty of Prague, in 1635, occupied by Swedish and French troops, who greatly impoverished the country— not only by burning, but in the imperial forces. In 1685 the archbishop returned to Mayence, but the diocese became again the theatre of war in 1685, he fled again before the French armies, and in 1647 made a treaty with Turenne. Mayence remained in the possession of the French, and the archbishop went to reside at Frankfort, where he died, Oct. 9, 1647. His successor, John Philip, of Schönborn, prince bishop of Würzburg, resigned soon after his election, for the Swedes, after the expiration of the peace of Westphalia, expelled themselves for the secularization of the diocese, and the archbishop was only maintained through the intervention of Saxony; it lasted, however, by exemption, the archbishop of Verden and Halberstadt. On the occasion of the coronation of Ferdinand IV at Regensburg, John Philip came in conflict with the archbishop of Cologne over their respective prerogatives. He was also in difficulty with the Elector of Mayence, and finally took the city by force in 1664. Philip also quarrelled with Saxony about the town of Erfurt, which was finally added to his diocese in 1665. He then devoted all his attention to internal improvements; he gave regulations to the country, Mayence in 1659; in 1661 he established a theological seminary; an 1663 was also made bishop of Worms. In 1667 he joined the league against France. By a treaty concluded Aug. 24, 1692 with Brunswick, he gave up the district of Eichsfeld, with the exception of Duderstadt, Giebolsdáh, and Herleshausen. He died, June 3, 1678. Dom. Damian Hartard, of Leyen, died Dec. 6, 1678. Charles Henry, duke of Metternich-Winneburg, was elected in 1679, and died on Sept. 27 of the same year. Anselm Franz, of Ingelheim, surrendered Mayence to the French in 1688, and took up his residence at Erfurt; but the marshal of Uxelles had to return to Mayence to the duke of Lorraine, Sept. 8, 1698, the archbishop returned to it. In 1691 he joined a league against France. By a treaty concluded Aug. 24, 1692 with Brunswick, he gave up the district of Eichsfeld, with the exception of Duderstadt, Giebolsdah, and Herleshausen. He died, Jan. 10, 1702. John Philip, nephew of John Philip, took the part of Austria against Spain in the War of Succession. In 1704 the diocese of Kronberg was joined to the diocese by succession. In 1714 the strife between the archbishop and the Palatinate was brought to a close by the former giving up his claim to Böckelnheim, and receiving in exchange New Bamberg. He died Jan. 30, 1729. Francis Louis, count of Neuburg, bishop of Breslau and Worms, and also archbishop of Trèves, died April 19, 1732. Under Philip Charles, of Ellte-Kemenpehn, Alten- nau, together with five vilages, was added to the diocese. He died March 21, 1743. John Frederick Charles, count of Ostein, remained neutral in the Austrian War of Succession, and his diocese suffered severely from the French in consequence; in 1746 the grand duke of Tuscany, with his armies, took possession of the whole town of Mayence. In 1752 the two other ecclesiastical electors in trying to emancipate the German episcopacy from the dominion of Rome; by a decree of Dec. 23, 1768, he abolished a number of festivals, and by another of July 30, 1771, he enacted several reforms in the diocese. He encouraged industry and agriculture, founded charitable institutions, and established the administration of the diocese on a regular basis; on Jan. 30, 1778, he entered into an agreement with Saxony concerning Trefurt and Mulhouse, by which he surrendered the jurisdiction of Protestant districts to that state. On July 16, 1778, Saxony took possession of Joseph, of Eichthal, who became also bishop of Worms, followed in the footsteps of his predecessor, introducing many reforms in the Church; he endowed the University of Mayence with the convents of Karthaus, Alten- münster, and Reichenklaren in 1781, when he died Oct. 15, 1784, he had added seventeen prebends, and also directed that theological studies should no longer be pursued in convents, but only in the University of Mayence. The archbishop had heretofore been partisans of Austria, but he sided with Prussia when Frederick the Great opposed the plan of equipping France with armies. He died July 25, 1782. He was succeeded by Count Theodor of Dalberg, as archbishop, metropolitan, and primate of Germany. The see was transferred to the cathedral of Regensburg, and received jurisdiction over the whole of the former ecclesiastical provinces of Mayence, Trèves, and Cologne, lying on the right shore of the Rhine, with the exception of the part belonging to Prussia, and also over the whole province of Salzburg, in Bavaria. The archiepiscopal of Mayence became the simple bishopric, subject to the archbishop of Mechlin, and including only the territory of the old archiepiscopal on the left shore of the Rhine. The first bishop was Joseph Louis Colmar, appointed Oct. 3, 1802, who governed his diocese exclusively under French inspiration. Mayence was taken by the allies May 17, 1814; Colmar died Dec. 15 of the same year. A vicar-general was then appointed. In 1829 the bishopric of Mayence was, by a papal decree, detached from Mechlin and subjected to Freiburg. Joseph Vitus Burg was appointed bishop Jan. 12, 1830; he divided the diocese into deaneries, and died March 3, 1851. His successor was Count Charles H. of Bucquoi, general, John Jacob Humann, died Aug. 19, 1834. Peter Leopold Kaiser issued complete diocesan statutes in 1837, and died Dec. 80, 1848. Leopold Schmid, pre- fessor of theology and philosophy at the University of Giessen, was appointed bishop of Mayence by pope Pius IX, Feb. 22, 1849, but he was not confirmed.
Schmid, Ub. d. jüngste Maimer Biechevski, Giessen, 1850); and William Emanuel von Ketteler was made bishop in his place, March 29, 1850. Since Ketteler's accession, the bishopric of Mayence is noted as the gathering-place of all Jesuit ultramontanists. How this Roman see in Germany will continue its opposition to all order of state rule, now that the Jesuits have been expelled, is holding a long and heated debate. (2) The most important council was held at Mayence in 1225, called by emperor Frederick II. It is by some called "a synod of Germany." Forty-seven canons were published, which relate to the incontinence of the clergy, and simony. The sixth declaration that ex-communicated priests who dare to perform any clerical function while under excommunication shall be deposed and excommunicated, both from ecclesiastical and civil life, without hope of being ever restored, shall be treated as infamous, deprived of the power of leaving their property by will, and never again permitted to hold any kind of ecclesiastical benefice. (Not to be found).

Another very large body assembled in council at Mayence in 1548, called together by Sebastian Heusden, archbishop of Mayence, with the deputies of the bishops of his province and the principal of his clergy. Forty-seven canons were published concerning the faith, and fifty-seven canons of discipline. Among the first canons which we find are those which attempt to establish any kind of discipline or order, according to the faith of the Church; it is further stated that man was created with righteousness and endowed with grace, but that he was possessed of free-will; afterwards the fall of man and his justification are spoken of, and it is declared that this justification proceeds from the grace of God; that it is given before any merit; that this justification is given when man receives the Holy Spirit, with faith, hope, and charity, which gifts it declares to be inherent in him, and not merely imputed, so that man is not only accounted righteous, but is so in reality, without any merit, but by God's grace and righteousness communicated to him; that the charity which justifies must be accompanied by good works, of which grace is the source and principle (canons 7 and 8). The council, moreover, in the canons of faith, set forth the doctrine of the sacraments, and decided, against the heretics, that they are not bare ceremonies, but effectual signs of grace, which they are, by divine operation, the means of conveying to those who receive them worthily.

With regard to ceremonies, it is decreed that such ought to be retained as are of the order and rite of the Lord's Supper, which is the Lord's Supper; among these are reckoned the sacraments, churches, altars, images, holy vestments, banners, etc.

As to images, the council decrees that the people should be taught that they are not set up to be worshiped, and that none ought to be set up in churches which are not in worship. It is declared that the goods of this life are nothing in comparison with the life to come, and that piety. Curates are also enjoined to remove the image of any saint to which the people flocked, as if attributing some sort of divinity to the image itself, or as supposing that God or the saints would perform what they prayed for, in favor of that particular image, and not otherwise. Afterwards the following matters are treated of: devout pilgrimages, worship of saints, prayers for the dead, and the law of fasting.

Among the fifty-six canons of discipline and morality, we find it ruled (in canon 61) that when the lesser festivals fall on a Sunday, they shall be kept on some day following or preceding; that apostate monks, upon their return to his convent without the bishop's permission; that preaching shall not be allowed; and that monks shall not be admitted to private houses; that care shall be taken that all schoolmasters be sound Catholics, etc. Finally, it is declared that the council received the acts of the holy canonical councils, and yielded entire submission to the catholic, apostolic, Roman Church in all things (Conc. vii. 1, and Leand. Mon. 18, Isid. 11, and 12).
Mayer, John, D.D., an English divine, flourished in the early part of the 17th century. But few memoirs have been discovered to furnish any satisfactory account of his personal history. It appears from his preface that he was ordained to the minor order of the clergy, and afterwards employed him for public services as a clergyman for many years. In 1634 he became minister of Reydon, in Suffolk. He published Theological Treatises and Commentaries on the English Catechism (Lond. 1621, 4to):—A Commentary on the Old and New Testaments (rare; 6 vols. fol., and 1 vol. 4to, 1561, 47, '92, 53). Mayer, Lewis, D.D., a noted American divine of that branch of the Christian Church denominated the German Reformed, was born at Lancaster, Pa., March 26, 1783. On receiving a liberal education in his native place, he removed to Frederick, Md., where he devoted his attention for some time to a secular calling. He was fond of reading and study. Having become conscious of a call to the holy ministry, he pursued his theological studies with great zeal and success, under the direction of the Rev. Mr. Wagner, of Frederick, Md. He was licensed and ordained in 1807, and became pastor of a church in Shepherdstown, Va., where he labored till 1821. In that year he was called as pastor to York, Pa. In 1825 he resigned his charge, having been called by the Synod of the German Reformed Church to assume the presidency of the theological seminary then established at Carlisle, Pa., and afterwards located at York, Pa. In this position he labored with great zeal till 1855. His health giving way he retired to private life, and lived in York, Pa. He devoted his remaining strength to the preparation of a History of the German Reformed Church, only the first volume of which, however, has been published. This volume is chiefly occupied with an account of the Reformation in Switzerland. His labors were brought down to 1770. Dr. Mayer published also a Treatise on the Sin against the Holy Ghost, and Lutheran Subjects. With regard to his theological works he also edited for some years the Magazine and the Messenger of the German Reformed Church. He died Aug. 25, 1849. See biographical sketch by the Rev. E. Heimer, prefixed to Dr. Mayer's History (Phil. 1850, 8vo, pp. 477).

Mayer, Philip Frederick, D.D., a distinguished American Lutheran minister, was born April 1, 1781, in the city of New York, where he continued to reside till he reached his majority. His earlier years were spent at the German school attached to the Lutheran Church. His preparation for college was made under the direction of Mr. Davis. He graduated with the first honors of his class at Columbia College, New York, in 1799, then under the administration of Dr. W. S. Johnson. He spent three years in the prosecution of his theological studies, under the instruction of the Rev. Dr. Kunse, one of the most learned men of his day. He was licensed to preach the Gospel in 1802, and soon after took charge of the Lutheran Church at Lunenburg (now Athens), N.Y. In 1806 he resigned this position, and accepted a call as pastor of St. John's (Lutheran) Church, Phila- delphia. This was the first exclusively English Lutheran congregation formed in this discharge of his duties Dr. Mayer devoted himself with conscientious fidelity and uniring zeal. He was unwearied in his efforts to promote the good of his own flock, as well as faithful and constant in his aims to advance the welfare of the whole community. He never withheld his influence from any object which met his deliberate and cordial approval. In 1808 he was associated with bishop White, Dr. Green, Dr. Rush, and others in the formation of the society of the immediate ancestors, the first institution of the kind organized in the United States, of which he continued to be an active and efficient manager, and was at the time of his death the presiding officer. He was also the senior member of the board of trustees of the University of Pennsylvania. He was a member of the board of trustees of the Pennsylvania Hospital, the Deaf and Dumb Asylum and of the Philadelphia Dispensary, and was actively connected with other ecclesiastical institutions. Liberal and enlarged in his views, he was at some time identified, either as a patron or director, with every philanthropic enterprise of a catholic spirit in his adopted city. He retained his pastoral connection with the Church till his death, which occurred April 16, 1858. Dr. Mayer was no ordinary man, or he could never have so successfully sustained himself for so long a period among the same people, and enjoyed in so eminent a degree the regard and confidence of the whole community. He was a man of clear intellect and quick perceptions, united with great delicacy of taste and keen discernment. He was a ripe scholar, thoroughly acquainted with the whole range of English literature, and in the department of the Holy Scriptures, he was altogether master. He received his D.D. from Columbia College, New York, and the University of Pennsylvania. (M. L. S.)

Mayhew, Experience, a noted American divine for years actively engaged in missionary labors among the Indians, was born Jan. 27, 1678. His father, grandfather, and great-grandfather were all most successfully engaged as missionaries to the Indians before him. In March, 1694, about five years after the death of his father, he began to preach to the Indians, taking the oversight of five or six of their assemblies. The Indian language had been familiar to him from infancy, and he was employed by the commissioners of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in New England to make a new version of the Psalms and John, which work he executed with great accuracy in 1709. He died Nov. 29, 1758, aged eighty-five. He published a sermon entitled All Mankind by Nature equally under Sin (1724): — Found and saved (1729), in which he gives an account of the lives of thirty Indian ministers, and about eighty Indian men, women, and youth, worthy of remembrance on account of their piety: — Letter on the Lord's Supper (1741): — Grace Defended (1744), in which he contends that the offer of salvation made to sinners in the Gospel contains the most important promise of the grace given in regeneration. In this he says he differs from most Calvinists; yet he supports the doctrines of original sin, of eternal decrees, and of the sovereignty of God in the salvation of man. His son Zechariah succeeded him in the missionary field, making five generations thus engaged. The age attained by the Mayhews is remarkable: the first, Thomas, died aged ninety; Experience, eighty-four; John, grandson of the first John, eighty-nine; his brother Jeremiah, eighty-five; Dr. Matthew, eighty-five; Zechariah, seventy-nine. — Indian Comp. Mayhew, Jonathan, D.D., a celebrated American divine, was born at Martha's Vineyard Oct. 8, 1720. He was a descendant of Thomas Mayhew, the first English settler of that island. In early childhood Jonathan gave indications of great vigor of mind and a strong will. He was fitted for college by his father, who was a very correct man. During his course at Harvard he was distinguished not only as a fine classical scholar, but also for his skill in dialectics and his attainments in ethical science. He graduated with great honor in 1744. Three years later he received a call from West Church, in Boston, and continued in this station for the remainder of his life. On the day first appointed for his ordination only two clergymen of those invited were in attendance, owing, no doubt, to his extreme rationalism; and even these two refused to act, other ministers in the city considering the whole proceeding a mistake. But the call was not withdrawn, and had to be convoked, June 17, after which the new candidate was duly installed in office. Mr. Mayhew's liberal opinions were so unpopular in Boston that he was for some time excluded from membership of the Boston Association of Congregational Ministers. In 1750 the degree of doctor honoris causa conferred upon him by the University of Aberdeen. His publications excited great attention not only in this country, but also in England. In 1755 he published a volume of sermons on the Doctrine of Grace. At the close of one of these sermons there is a note on the Divinity of the Trinity, which was offensive alike to those who did and did not endorse his general views. Subsequently the doctor himself appears to have regretted having written it, and he unsuccessfully endeavored to prevent its being published in the London edition. Dr. Mayhew was at this time scribe of the Massachusetts Convention of Congregational Ministers. In 1763 the Rev. East Arthur published a pamphlet entitled Considerations on the Institution and Conduct of the Society for Propagating the Gospel, occasioning a violent controversy, in which Dr. Mayhew bore a prominent part. Dr. Mayhew was extensively known throughout Great Britain and many foreign countries, and received addresses from such men as Lardner, Benson, Kippis, Blackburn, and Hollis. He died July 9, 1766. Dr. Mayhew possessed a mind of great acuteness and energy, and in his principles was a determined republican. He had no little influence in producing the American Revolution. Among his best-known publications are the following: Seven Sermons (1749, 8vo) — A Discourse concerning Unlimited Submission and Non-resistance to the Higher Powers (1750, 8vo). See Mr. Bancroft's notice of this sermon, and his eloquent tribute to Mayhew, in his Hist. of the United States, iv, 60-62. — Thanksgiving Sermons for the R e a l l e a m o t, 1766: — Sermons to Young Men (1767, 2 vols. 12mo). See Memoir of the Life and Writings of the Rev. Jonathan Mayhew, by Alden Bradford (1836); Riche, Bibl. Amer. N o r a , i, 140, 145, 158; Allibone, Dict. Eng. and Amer. Mayhew, Thomas, a Trinitarian Congregational minister, son of Thomas Mayhew, the governor of Martha's Vineyard, was born in Southampton, England, about 1621; emigrated with his father to New England in 1631; resided for a few years in Watertown, Mass.; and in 1645 was given the ministry in establisht at Edgartown, Martha's Vineyard. Being deeply affected by the intellectual and moral degradation of the Indians, and possessing good natural talents, and a considerable knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, he determined to devote himself to preaching to the natives of the island. He soon acquired their language, commenced his pulpit ministrations in 1646, and labored among them so faithfully that in 1650 he had 100 converts, and in 1662, 282, among whom were eight pastors or priests. In 1657 he sailed for England to obtain aid from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel; but the ship in which he had taken passage was lost at sea, and never heard of. Cotton Mather says that " he was so affectionately esteemed by the Indians that many years afterwards he was seldom named without tears." He wrote, in connection with the Rev. John Eliot, a Discourse, or a Reply to Mr. Greford's Progress of the Gospel among the Indians in New England; — Sprague, Amasa American Pulpit, i, 181; Drake, Dict. American Biography, a v.

Mayne, James S., a Presbyterian minister, was born in R availgh, near Coleraine, Antrim County, Ireland, in 1826. He received a careful academic education.
tion in his native country, and in 1853 came to America; graduated at Princeton College with honor in 1857; studied divinity at the theological seminary at Princeton, N.J.; was licensed in 1859, and in 1860 commenced his labors at May's Landing, Atlantic City, and Abeccon, N.J., where he died Aug. 30, 1860. Mr. Mayne was one of the four outstanding divines in the Episcopal Church and a noted painter. See Wilson, Prob. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 108.

Mayne, Jasper, an English divine and poet, was born in Devonshire in 1654. At the age of nineteen he entered Christ-church College, Oxford, and in 1671 secured the degree of M.A. He took holy orders, became a popular preacher, was presented by his college to two neighboring livings, and continued at the same time his residence at Oxford. He was ordained a D.D. in 1686. At the time of Cromwell's usurpation, being firmly devoted to the cause of Charles I., he was deprived of his student's place, and soon lost both of his vicarages. His spirit, however, remained unbroken, and in 1652 we hear of his holding a public disputation with a noted Anabaptist preacher. Subsequently he retired, until the Restoration, as chaplain in the family of the earl of Devonshire; in 1660 he was restored again to his living, was made chaplain in ordinary to the king, a canon of Christ Church, and archdeacon of Chichester. He died in 1692. Dr. Mayne published in 1665 a translation of a part of Lucia's Dialogues, also several sermons and scattered poems.

Maynooth College. In consequence of the English Reformation, the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland lost all its rights and possessions. At the Synod of Dublin, in 1654, seventeen bishops out of nineteen endorsed the Act of Uniformity, and, upon the principle that "ubi episcopus ibi ecclesia," the English Reformed Church was declared the only legal Church in Ireland. The Roman Catholics were therefore compelled to worship in private, and to get their priests educated abroad. With the assistance of foreign princes they established, during the years 1542-1556, a number of seminaries in Spain, Italy, and the Netherlands (namely, at Salamanca, Alcalá, Lisbon, Evora, Décas, Antwerp, Tourmey, Lille, Rome, Praga, Carpanica, Toulouse, Bordeaux, Potsiers, Nantes, Bouley, and Paris). As most of the students were poor and dependent on the ariostocracy of Ireland, a great attachment grew up between them and the class by whom they were patronized. But in consequence of the French Revolution intercourse between Ireland and the Continent became more difficult. The Irish colleges of France and Brabant were closed, and the Jesuits, who were the apportioned of organizing a seminary at home. The most opposite political parties agreed in supporting this measure: the aristocracy from fear that the young priests might imbib the democratic ideas abroad, and the democrats from the hope of gaining over to their views the priests, who had hitherto always sided with their patrons. The middle classes especially thought to find in home-bred priests useful auxiliaries to their emancipation. When therefore the Roman Catholic prelates submitted to the lord lieutenant of Ireland their plan of establishing a college, he immediately approved; the Irish Parliament, composed of Protestants, sanctioned it, voted an appropriation of £20,000, and readily obtained the approbation of the Parliament of England in 1785. A board of trustees was organized, consisting of four Protestants, the Irish lord chancellor, three chief justices, six Roman Catholics, and ten bishops. Hickey, who had been eminently active in organizing the whole affair, was elected president of the college. The whole care and management of the college was vested in this board of managers. The four Protestant members were changed every five years (being replaced by election of the abbots and, and, together with three Roman Catholics, fulfilled the duties of inspectors, yet without the power of interfering with either the doctrines or the discipline of the college. The most liberal among the Roman Catholics wished the college to be established at Dublin, the seat of the University, and where members of the different denominations were already studying harmoniously together. But the Roman Catholic bishops opposed this, as they desired their priests to be educated under stricter discipline. The board of managers therefore chose the place of Maynooth, eleven miles from Dublin, and commenced building a seminary for fifty students on a piece of land purchased from the duke of Leinster. When the Irish Parliament was incorporated with the English, in 1801, an appropriation was made to the College of Maynooth amounting to £20,000 a year for the next twenty years. In 1808 some £18,000 more was voted for the purpose of enlarging the seminary, as it was inadequate to educating the number of priests required. Indeed in that year there were 478 obliged to study abroad, chiefly in France, while there were only 200 to 250 attending at Maynooth. The seminary continued a long time without attracting much attention; even the report of the board of trustees, presented in 1836 to Parliament, did not throw much light on the real character of the institution; in fact, the true state of things was rather covered up, and in 1840 in a meeting of the college. But when O'Connell's agitation broke out, it became apparent that its principal champions were priests educated in Maynooth College. It was also found that the alumni of Maynooth took an active part in the Roman Catholic emancipation in 1829 by unfavouring the election. The institution was now re-instituted for the purpose of suppressing democratic ideas, seems thus to have become a centre of political as well as religious agitation. But the interior workings of the institution remained hidden from the public gaze until a zealous Protestant minister, McGhee, procured the theological textbook of Peter Deen, used at Maynooth, which was published to the extent of three thousand copies in 1804; another edition of the same number appeared in 1832. This work, which breathes to the utmost the Roman Catholic spirit of aggression and persecution, and upholds the most offensive doctrines of that Church, was considered there as the highest authority, and gives a striking contradiction to the statement so often made by interested parties that the Roman Catholicism of the 19th century is animated by an entirely different spirit from that of former times. These revelations provoked much opposition to Romanism, and a growing desire to abrogate the privileges of the Romanists. June 28, 1835, a great meeting was held at Exeter Hall, which was followed by others in various cities of England and Scotland. It was proved that the Roman Catholic college was religious, had the implication of heresies, still claimed to relieve from oaths, retained auricular confession, with all its attendant evils, and all from unequivocal passages in the aforesaid textbook. Numberless pamphlets were published on this occasion; Protestant associations were formed in Ireland to defend evangelical freedom, and chief among these were found the Orangemen. The old hatred between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants was thus revived, and trouble with Ireland seemed imminent. On the side of the Roman Church the "liberator of Ireland" gained credit for his action by his fiery denunciations of the English; his attitude became so threatening that the government was obliged to prosecute him for high treason. This repressed the rebellion in its very infancy, but at the same time embittered the feelings of the Roman Catholic population. Previous experience had shown that persecution could indeed weaken, and almost destroy, but never conquer Ireland; and this was still more the case with regard to their Church, which the Roman Catholic Irish clung to the more as it was weaker and more oppressed. The attempt was, therefore, made to try whether the kindred would succeed where harshness had failed. The occasion was favorable, the insurrection was suppressed, and, if the victors met the vanquished as friends, much might be gained. This Irish question proved almost insurmountable to the English government. Cabinet after cabinet were wrecked upon it, without arriving at any result. And this is not to be wondered at, for the civil as well as religious relations in Ireland had for a long time been in so abnormal a state that all attempts at reform seemed either inefficient or dangerous. Every effort to improve the condition of the peasantry, and the mitigation of the excess of mortality, while every assistance rendered to the weak and oppressed, but de facto national Church of Ireland, exasperated the Protestant element of the population. The passage of any bill concerning Ireland was a most complicated affair, for the government of the Roman Catholic prelates had assured Peel that the passage of his new bill would be thankfully received by the Roman Catholics as a pledge of conciliation. But hardly had the bill been presented to the House of Commons when a storm of opposition arose. The Protestants felt the additions undue, and the Catholic leaders demanded a modification of it, and to petition against a bill which would modify the Protestant character of the administration. A large meeting, chiefly of Dissenters, was held at Exeter Hall, March 18, 1845, and a Central Anti-Maynooth Committee organized to oppose the bill, and to overwhelm the Parliament with petitions. On April 3 Peel presented the bill to the House of Commons. He attempted to prove that there were but three ways of acting: to maintain things as they were, to suppress the usual appropriation, or to increase it. The first he declared impracticable, as insufficient a sum for the purpose could not gain much gratitude for the donors; the second, he said, was still less advisable, as the withdrawal of assistance to which they had been accustomed for fifty years would not fail to exasperate the Irish; but the third he looked upon as a certain remedy. He therefore proposed to raise the annual appropriation for Maynooth to £80,000, making it a part of the regular budget, and thus transforming the grant into a donation; he moreover proposed to incorporate the board of trustees, and to vote a special grant of £20,000 for building purposes. Besides, the Roman Catholics were pressed by the king to appoint five inspectors appointed by the crown, who, however, would leave the control of the doctrines and discipline to the three Roman Catholic inspectors. The opposition was headed by Sir R. Inglis. He attacked the bill on religious ground, as opposed to Protestant principles. He did not mean to withdraw the usual appropriation, but wanted Roman Catholics, like Dissenters, to educate their ministers at their own expense. All those opposed to the Established Church sided with him. The bill received 216 votes against 114 at the first reading. This, however, was but the prelude. At the second reading the struggle commenced in earnest and lasted through six sittings. They first argued about the new principle, which converted a yearly grant into a donation, for this gave to the previously ignored Roman Catholic Church a legal existence and official recognition. The friends of the bill sought to defend this principle in various ways. Some claimed that it was the duty of the Parliament to care for Maynooth, either because, by uniting with itself the Irish Parliament, it had assumed its charges, or as a sort of restitution for the former possession of the very Church in Rome has been deprived. Yet the assumption of the liabilities of the Irish Parliament did not guarantee the continuance of the grant longer than twenty years more, and, on the other hand, calling £36,000 a restitution, when the yearly income from the confiscated Church land amounted to over £600,000, sounded like bitter mockery. Others preferred to take the broader ground of moral obligation, claiming that it was necessary to aid oppressed and impoverished Ireland. Others again, leaving the past to consider only the future, argued from the point of view of a conciliatory and, if possible, conciliatory measure, and the better education of the priests, would open a new era to Ireland. None of these views satisfied Gladstone, who, after criticizing them all, finally arrived at the negative principle that the support granted to Maynooth should only be withdrawn at the last extremity, as it would have the effect of consequences on the relation existing between England and Ireland. Some even sought to treat it as a mere educational question. Still the majority could not blind themselves to the fact that it really involved the weighty and difficult question of the relation between the English government and the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. The opponents of the bill had an easier task. They could readily attack it from an abstract religious standpoint. They divided themselves, however, into two groups, sections, according to the ground they took. The Churchmen and some of the people did not oppose the continuation of the former support, but its increase; the Dissenters, as a body, opposed this, like all other government support towards churches. Both parties clamored loudly against the abuses of the Church of Rome, its papal influence on the people, its particularity the Jesuitical spirit insinuated at Maynooth. Yet Parliament perceived that something must be done to allay the hostile feelings in Ireland, and the bill passed the second reading with 233 votes against 176. After another protracted and severe struggle, it received the third reading by 217 votes against 149. The discussion of the bill in the House of Lords was a repetition of that in the House of Commons. The most eminent jurists decided in favor of the bill. Brougham established a precedent in bringing forward a previous act in which the principle of dotation was clearly expressed. On the bench of bishops, six voted in favor of the bill; among them the archbishop of Armagh and the bishops of Norwich and St. David. The bill finally went through with 181 votes against 50, and received the royal sanction on June 80, 1845. While the bill was under discussion in Parliament, the Church in Ireland was very explosive. A large meeting was held on April 18 at Covent Garden, in which both Churchmen and Dissenters took part. Other meetings were also held in the principal cities. The Dissenters were especially active. The Churchmen asserted their opposition: 1, that by increasing the grant to the seminary, the papacy would be legally recognized in Ireland; 2, that the practice of employing government funds for the support of religion is wrong in principle; 3, that there were special objections to the bill under consideration, namely, the Jesuitical tendencies of Maynooth, the danger of the influence over the masses of a more thoroughly-educated clergy, the evil of binding the clergy to the support of the government, leading them to oppose the progressive social tendencies of the people; and, finally, the spirit of aggression inherent to the papacy. Some of the Dissenters, however, who criticized this platform too indelicate; they wanted the bill rejected wholly on anti-State-Church principles, and on May 2 formed a special committee at Salter’s Hall, distinct from the original Central Anti-Maynooth Committee. On May 10 they held a meeting at Crosby Hall, in which 300 ministers and 400 laymen (principally Baptists, Presbyterians, Independents, and Calvinistic and Arminian Methodists of the new connection) took part. They urged the Roman Catholics to decline the assistance of the government to their Church for their own sake and that of their institution. Sir Culling Earlely, president of the Central Committee, spoke in a quite different tone in a letter to O’Connell. He accused the Roman Catholic leader of inconsistency if he accepted the new grant, and threatened to use every means in his power to gain his end. An Anti-Maynooth Committee was also organized at Dublin, and in a meeting held on June 5 an address to the House of Lords was drawn up, which received 867 signatures. A petition for the emancipation of the clergy was also submitted. In the whole there were some 10,000 petitions drawn up against the bill, which received about 1,130,000 signatures. The government, however, remained unmoved, and the excitement gradually subsided. It was thought that now the Roman Catholic party would rest satisfied, and be truly reconciled; yet at one of the very first synods held by them the royal colleges were excommunicated and the national school condemned. The Roman Catholic prelates in Ireland—Cullen, Slattery, and M'Hale—had already attracted considerable attention by their Ultramontane views, but at this last outrage the old opposition spirit kindled again into a flame. Spooner provoked a visitation of Maynooth College by a bill he proposed May 11, 1852. Yet more moderate advice prevailed: it was claimed that the papal aggression in no wise affected Ireland, but rather England, and that the most Ultramontane among the Irish prelates, Cullen, was educated at Rome, not at Maynooth. Spooner finally withdrew his motion. Yet every year, for some time after, the proposition of stopping the appropriation was renewed; and was not dropped until quiet had been fully restored in Ireland, and general harmony re-established.

The agitation of the Irish population in late years, provoked, no doubt, in a great measure in Ireland, as in Poland, by the immaculate emigrations of the pontiffs of Rome, has led the government of England to consider the propriety of granting the three millions of Irish Romanists such liberty in worship and education as should make them as fit subjects as the other twenty millions of the northern isles who enjoy the protection of the British crown, and worthy associates of their English-speaking neighbors. In 1868 Mr. Gladstone, whose very earliest work had been "marked by a plain inclination to elevate the Church above the State," and "the very maiden-days of his political career, had "exhibited an unflagging tenacity for the whims, the complaints," and the growing claims of his friends the papal prelates," was called to the premiership of Great Britain, to establish, if possible, perfect accord between the English and Irish people. Almost the sole aim of the policy which the new premier inaugurated was the conciliation of the Romanists of Ireland. For this one purpose was broadened until the sooner had he succeeded Mr. Disraeli than he urged the disestablishment of the Church of England principles as the ecclesiastical principles of Ireland. His success in this attempt is now a matter of history. See IRELAND. Flattered by the easy victory gained in his first effort, Mr. Gladstone followed it by a proposal for the establishment of compulsory education and denominational schools. Herein, also, he succeeded, but only measurably. Encouraged by these repeated successes, he has lately come forward with a scheme which only a few days after his return from Italy, in April (1870), thwarted him in, and even now holds him in suspense. His new scheme now on foot is a proposition to dismantle Trinity College, long the eyesore of Romanists, and to found an immense educational establishment, called the Irish University, in which Catholics shall study only their own history and philosophy. Provision is made for a different system to be endowed with a vast revenue from the stipulation of Trinity and the wrecks of the Established Church. Both Dissenters and Conformists are alarmed at the step Mr. Gladstone seems determined upon. Even Romanists disfavor the proposal, for if of the three or four millions of Catholic Irish it is probable that not one third of suitable age can read and write. The greatest opposition, however, has come from Rome, and suddenly the premier of Great Britain finds himself confronted by those whom he had always had reason to look upon as his chief supporters. Well has it lately been said that "the policy of Rome knows neither friendship nor gratitude; to serve the Church it strikes indiscriminately at its friends or foes; and the British statesman has shown himself no match for the Italian priests, who have revealed nothing less than the total subjugation of its Protestant population to a priestly despotism." The endowment of Maynooth, and later the establishment of the queen's colleges, and even the open doors of Trinity, cannot and will not pacify Rome. She seeks control of Ireland both in Church and State; and as long as the papacy shall remain tainted by a nest for temporal power, both England and Prussia will find defilement and abasement, aye, not infrequently rebellion in the ranks of those of her subjects who claim fidelity to the hierarchy. The last days certainly are teaching even the most liberal-minded politicians that the Church of Rome is built upon a foundation which is political as well as ecclesiastical, and that the severe measures, as inaugurated by Bismarck, will alone save the Protestant world from ruin and decay.

Mayo, Daniel, a Presbyterian divine of some note, was born at London or on the Scottish border, in 1672. He was educated first at home, then went abroad and studied for some time in Holland under Witsius. On his return to England he preached successively at Totton Fields, Westminster, at Kingston-upon-Thames, and at Hackney, and finally settled permanently at Silver Street, London, where the church he directed was opened in 1738. Mr. Mayo was associated with some of the most eminent men of considerable talents, great zeal and activity, combined with prudence. Besides publishing many sermons, he wrote, in continuation of Henry's Exposition, a Commentary on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. See Albion's, Dictionary of British and Amer. Authors, n. v.; Brown, Cyclop. of Religious Knowledge, n. v.

Mayotta, one of the Comoro Islands in the Indian Ocean, since 1848 under the control of the French, is situated in latitude 12° 34'—18° 4' S., and longitude 44° 59'—15' 43' E., covering some twenty-one miles from north to south, with an average breadth of six or seven miles; if, however, the dangerous coral reefs which surround the island be included, the whole occupies a space of thirty miles north and south, and twenty-four miles east and west, and contains a population of about 8000, mostly Romanists. The surface of this island is very uneven, and is studied with volcanic-looking peaks, some of which exceed 3000 feet in height. Its shores are in some places lined with mangrove swamps, which are uncovered at low water, and are productive of malaria and fever; it is in most parts capable of cultivation, predominantly that of sugar, the only article exported. The French themselves live mainly on the island of Gaomain. Its main source of income is the collection of reefs on the east side of Mayotta. A governor and colonial officer are residents, and some 100 French soldiers, besides some natives, were stationed there. The Roman Catholic Church alone has a hold here.

Mayow, Robert Wynn, an English divine, was born at Saltash, in the latter half of the 17th century (17??); was educated at Eton College; and, after serving several curacies in succession, removed to Arundel, near Manchester, but there he died, only three months after removal, in 1817. Mr. Mayow is highly spoken of as a pulpit orator. A noted English writer has observed that he was "one of his order for great humor and strong feeling, which the two possessed in common. He published Plain Preaching, or Sermons for the Poor and for People of all Ranks (Lond. 1816, 12mo);—Sermons and Miscellaneous Pieces, to which is prefixed a Memoir" of his Life (1822, 12mo).—Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. s. v.

Mayr, Beda, a Benedictine monk, was born at Duittingen, in Bavaria, in 1742. He entered the cloister at Donauwörth in his twentieth year. Finely cultivated, and classed with the best talent of his day, he sought relief from the dulness of convent life by teaching matematics, poetry, rhetoric, philosophy, canon law, and theology. He was charged with being liberal to excess, and from his supposed and distrustful manner of the Roman Catholic Church. His principal work, Defence of the Natural, Christian, and Catholic Religion, according to the Necessities of our Time, was published at Augsburg in 1787, and is still mentioned. He died April 28, 1794. A list of his works is given by Düring, Gelehrte Theol. Deutschlands, vol. ii, s. v.; see also Weisg und Welte, Kirchen-Lexicon, vi, 955. (G. M.)

Mayr, Cölestin, a German theologian, was born April 21, 1679, at Donauwörth. In 1696 he entered the Benedictine Order at Augsburg; later he became a student at the University of Salzburg, where in 1711 he was appointed professor of philosophy. In 1718 he obtained the professorship of polemical theology, and the inspection of the Salzburg schools. About this time he was made doctor of divinity. In 1714 he was appointed ecclesiastical counsellor of the duke of Salzburg, and at the same time became professor of scholastic theology.
In 1726 he was appointed vicar-apostolic in Kufstein, in 1719 pro-chancellor, and in 1728 chief rector.
In 1731 he retired from academic life, and thereafter held an official relation to the cloister Linzheim, in Neuburg, where he died, March 19, 1753. Mayr enjoyed great prestige as a writer of theology, but his productions have never been collected in book form. They consist mainly of dissertations and contributions to different journals. For a list of his writings, see Düring, Gelehrte Mazarin, Jules (properly Guillo Mazarino), cardinal, the celebrated prime-minister of king Louis XIV of France, the successor of cardinal Richelieu, and inaugu-ratior of a reign noted for attainments in arms, language, fine arts, literature, industry, and a superior degree of splendor, was born of a noble Sicilian family July 14, 1602, most probably at Pescina, near the lake of Celano, in Abruzzo Città, though in the letters of naturalization he pretended he was born in France in 1602. It is stated that he was born at Rome. It is certain, however, that he received his education at the Eternal City, and hence, no doubt, the mistake as to his native place. In 1619 Mazarin went to Spain to pursue the study of jurispublicum, probably at the Parliaments of Seville; he prosessed, but returning to Rome in 1622, a little later he entered the military service, and was given a captain's commission in 1625. Soon after this he entered the service of the Church, and was employed as companion of the papal legate to France, and in this mission displayed great political talents. In the difficulties arising out of the contested succession to the duchy of Mantua, in which France supported the pretensions of the count De Nevers, while the emperor of Germany, the king of Spain, and the duke of Savoy supported those of the duke of Guastalla, Mazarin was sent by pope Urban to Turin as the assistant of cardinal Sacchetti. The latter at once perceived his talent, gave him his entire confidence, and in fact devolved upon him the entire management of the negotiation. It was not immediately successful, for in 1629 Louis XIII in person invaded Savoy, took Sevres, and placed the pretensions of the king of Spain. Mazarin was selected by Moreau in the Bibliographie des Mazarinades [Paris, 1860-51, 3 vol, 2 vol, 8vo]; a selection of them was published by Moreau under the title Choix des Mazarinades [ibid. 1864, 2 vol, 8vo]. After the revolution of 1830, Mazarin was banished from the court, but Paris making his removal a condition of its submission, he retired again from the court, and it was not till Feb. 3, 1658 that he made a triumphant entry into the capital, where he was received with significant silence. Yet after a time the skill, patience, and perseverance of Mazrani triumphed, and he regained his former popularity and acquired his former power. See here article Louis XIV, p. 526, col. 1. After governing France with great energy and success, Louis XIV was arriving at an age when he felt the capacity and desire to sway the sceptre himself, Mazrani died, March 9, 1661. In 1690 some letters, written by Mazrani during the negotiation of the peace of the Pyrenees, were published; additional letters were published in 1693, and in 1745 others were added, the whole arranged under the title of Lettres du Cardinal Mazrani, où l'on voit le secret de négociation de la Paix des Pyrénées. "They were written for the information and instruction of the young king, and form useful examples of clearness and precision in diplomatic writings." His person was remarkably handsome, and his manners fascinating, and from an opponent he turned Anne of Austria, the queen-regent during Louis XIV's minority, into his friend, if not secretly affianced companion, as has been asserted with much appearance of truth. "Mazarin," says Mignet (Mém. relatifs à la succession d'Espagne), "is the most active and inventive mind, a character rather supple than feeble. His device was 'ça Temps et moi.'" Under his administration the influence of France among the nations was increased, and in the internal government of the kingdom the principles of despotism were established on which Louis XIV afterwards acted. The administration of justice, however, became very corrupt, and the commerce and finances of the country sank into deep depression. It is admitted that as a financial administrator he was far inferior to Richelieu. Mazrani was very industrious and very avaricious, and had acquired in various ways, fair and foul, an immense fortune, amounting to 12,000,000 livres, which he offered to the king shortly before he died; afraid, it is thought, that it might be rudely seized from his heirs. Louis declined the restitution, which was perhaps what the wily minister expected. In his will Mazrani made many and large bequests to students and literary enterprises; indeed, he had always proved himself the friend and patron of learning. The College Mazrani was founded at his wish, to receive students from the provinces acquired by the "peace of the Pyrenees," and to this same institution he presented his library, of immense value and size. Mazdak (Mazdeka), a Persian religious enthusiast, flourished towards the close of the 5th century (he is believed to have been born about a.D. 470). He professed to be a prophet, and, securing many followers, declared for a community of property. Gaining in strength among the people, he found favor finally also in the eyes of his ruler, king Kobra, and the system of communism was adopted, effecting great changes in the social order. The revolution, however, lasted only a short time, and gradually the old order of things was restored.

Mazel, Abraham, a leader of the French Carmaïsards, was born at Saint-Jean-du-Gard some time about the middle of the 17th century. After the insurrection of the Cévennes in 1702 he was imprisoned, but, escaping from his captors, he determined to bring the people to a more determined stand, and while engaged in this work was killed in a skirmish near Uzès in 1710. See Court, Histoire des Carmaïsards. See CARMASARDS.

Masxiz (Maszip, r. d. Ziriac), given by erroneous Greek writers, is in place of the Hebrew Mattathiah (Exx x, 43).

Masolin, Silvestro, an Italian theologian, is usually known by the surname Prioris (after the name of his birthplace, Prierio). See PRIERIA.

Mâzor (Heb. Mozaor), יָּשָׁר, a name occurring only in the original, and which the translators of the A. V. ("beasieged places," 2 Kings xiv. 24; Isa. xxxvii. 26; "fortified cities," Micah vii. 12; "defense," Isa. xix. 6) have confounded with a word of the same form signifying a fortress (as in Ps. xxxi. 22; Hab. ii, 1, etc.). Gesenius, however (Thesaur. Heb. p. 815), regards it as the title of a Egypt, and apparently Lower Egypt, as, in three out of the four passages where it occurs, it is in the phrase יָשָׁר אֵרָם, the streams or canals of Egypt, i.e. the branches of the Nile (Isa. xix. 6; xxxvii. 26; 2 Kings xiv. 24; and that it comes from the Egyptian word meduru, a kingdom; perhaps the sign. of the dual form Mirizmar, מִרְצִים, q. d. double Egypt (comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 6, 2). Others (see Bochard, Phaleg, iv, 24), as probably the Hebrews themselves, considered Egypt to be so called as being strongly fortified (see Deod. Sic. i, 81). See EGYPT; FORTRESS.

Maszaroth (Heb. Masszaroth), מַסָּרָה, a word found only in the plural, and occurring but once, Job xxxviii. 32, probably by an interchange of liquids for "פָּרָה, plancts," 2 Kings xxiii., 5), an astronomical term, probably meaning the twelve signs of the Zodiac (see Hirzel, Delitzsch, and Conant, severally, ad loc.). See ASTRONOMY. "The Peshto-Syriac renders it by igalato, the Wain, or Great Bear; and J. D. Michaelis (Suppl. ad Lex. Heb. No. 1891) is followed by Ewald in applying it to the stars of the northern crown (Ewald adds the southern), deriving the word from מֶשֶׁר, a crown. First (Hanan, s. v.) understands by Massaroth the planet Jupiter, the same as the star of A莫斯 v. 26. But the interpretation given in the margin of our version is supported by the authority of Gesenius (Thes. p. 669). On referring to 2 Kings xxiii., 5, we find the word מַסָּרָה, massaroth (A. V. the planets), differing only from mazzaroth in having the liquid i for yod, and in the massaroth the twelve signs, as in the Vulgate. The Sept. there also has מַסָּרָה, which points to the same reading in both passages, and is by Suidas explained as the 'Zodiac,' but by Procopius of Gaza as probably 'Lucifer, the morning star,' following the Vulgate of Job xxxviii. 32. In later Jewish writings massaroth are the signs of the Zodiac, and the singular, massar, is used to denote the single signs as well as the planets, and also the influence which they were believed to exercise upon human destiny (Selden, De Die Syr. Syn. i. c. 1). In consequence of this, Jarchi, the most ancient commentator, and the remaining commentators, have confounded mazzaroth and massaroth, though their interpretations vary. Aben Ezra understands 'stars' generally; but R. Levi ben-Geeshon, 'a northern constellation.' Gesenius himself is in favor of regarding mazzaroth as the older form, signifying strictly 'preeminences, and in the concrete sense, 'stars that give warnings or premonitions,' from the usage of the root יָּשָׁר, massar, in Arabic. He deciphered, as he believed, the same words on some Cilician coins in the inscription יָּשָׁר, יָּשָׁר, which he renders as a prayer, 'my thy pure star (shine) over us') (Mon. Phoena. p. 279, tab. 86). Mazzocchi (or Mazzocco), Alessio Simmaco, an Italian antiquary and Orientalist, was born at Santa Maria di Capua in 1684, and afterwards flourished as professor of Greek and Hebrew at Naples. He died in 1771. Mazzocchi was celebrated for his learning far beyond the borders of his native land. His many treatises (written in Latin and Italian) were elaborate and scholarly. The Papal Academy of Inscriptions recognised his services to the world by making him a member of its body. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Mazzola, Girolamo Bedolo, an Italian painter, pronounced the most distinguished pupil of Parmigianino, whose works he painted for about 1568. He excelled as colorist and in perspective. Among his most valuable productions are those falling within the domain of sacred art. The most worthy of notice are his Madonna with St. Catherine and Miracle of the Multiplication of the Loaves. See Vasari, Lives of the Painters; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Mazzola (or Mazzuola), Girolamo Francesco Maria, an eminent Italian painter, surmounted Il Parmigianino, the Parmesan, born at Parma in 1568. He visited Rome in 1582, and was employed by Clement VII to execute a number of works in that city. His style, formed on that of Correggio and Raphael, is characterised by exceeding grace of form and softness of coloring. It was said by Mazzola's admirers that "the spirit of Raphael had passed into him." Mazzola was the first Italian artist who engraved with aqua fortis. He died in 1640. Among his masterpieces are the Madonna della Rosa, in the gallery of Dresden; an Annunciation, in the principal church of Vaduz; the Madonna with St. Margaret, St. Jerome, etc., in the Museum at Bologna; the Madonna dello Lungo Coll, at Florence; and the Vision of St. Jerome, in the National Gallery, London. Mazzola (1844); Morlarta, Memoria della Vita di F. Mazzola (1846).—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, vol. xxxiv, s. v.

McAdam, Thomas, a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, was born April 10, 1777, near Ballymena, Ireland. Being an ardent friend of liberty, the oppressive measures of the British government led him to take an active part in the efforts made to obtain freedom in Ireland; in consequence of which he incurred the suspicion of the officers of the law, and being in danger of losing his life by a summary arrest in 1787 he left his native land for America. He was subsequently engaged in teaching in Philadelphia; was for a considerable time at the head of the mathematical and English school connected with the University of Pennsylvania; was for many years an elder in the Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia; and in 1858 was licensed by the Western Reserve Conference, and ordained by Washtenow Presbytery; in 1855 accepted a call to the Church in Howell, Mich., where he labored until his death, Sept. 12, 1860. Mr. McAdam was a man of noble and generous impulses, dignified in manners, intelligent, and truthful. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 176.

McArthur, James P., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Jackson, N. Y., October 22, 1827; graduated at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y.; studied theology, first in the Associate Seminary, Canonsburg, Pa., and afterwards in the seminary at Xenia, Ohio; was licensed by the Presbytery of Alleghany in 1851, and for many years treasurer of the Board of Missions of the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. He died Nov. 16, 1844. Mr. McAdam was a man of noble and generous impulses, dignified in manners, intelligent, and truthful. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 159.

McAuley, William, an Associate Reformed Presbyterian minister, was born in the north of Ireland about 1780. He was an eldership, and a disinterested, churchman, of the highest order, as he was intended for some literary profession, and when about fifteen years old he was entered as student at the University of Glasgow, where he gained high distinctions. Both students and professors regarded him as a youth of singular promise. Upon graduation he at once entered upon the study of theology, under the well-known and venerable John Brown of Haddington, the professor of theology to the Associate Burgher Synod of Scotland, and was one of the last class of students taught by that great and good man. William McAuley was licensed to preach in 1794; ordained by the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church and was ordained by that body in 1796, as minister of the Associate congregation of Tulliallan, and there he labored acceptably until 1794, when he emigrated to the United States. Here he was received by the Presbytery of Washington (Synod of New York), and was installed in charge of the Associate congregation of Kortright, Harpersfield, and Stamford, Delaware County, N. Y. As the country developed, his churches grew in power, and divisions becoming necessary, he was finally confined in his labors to Kortright alone. He held his post for over half a century, and died in the harness March 24, 1851. Mr. McAuley deserves to be remembered as one of the pioneers of American Protestantism. His task was one requiring energy and perseverance, and both these qualities he possessed in an eminent degree. Though frequently left to struggle against poverty and sickness, and burdened with the care of a large family, he never faltered, and unhesitatingly pressed forward to advance the interests of his Master's cause. Says Dr. John For- snyth (in Sprague's Annales of the American Pulpit, ix, 78): "That he was not an ordinary man, all, I think, will admit, who knew him. His single fact that as a preacher 'force' as a preacher was considered as 'unfaltering' by the grandchildren and great-grandchildren of those who seventy years ago or more settled in a wilderness, which, through their instrumentality, has been made to blossom as the rose... In the central portions of Dela- ware County there are thousands who, though they never saw him, yet, from what their fathers have told them, will cherish with affectionate veneration the name of William McAuley."

McBride, Matthew, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia April 27, 1800; graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1821, and studied in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church; was licensed in 1855 by the Philadelphia Presbytery, and became a pastor in Mount Vernon, Iowa, where he remained until 1861, when, compelled by impaired health to resign, he returned to Philadelphia. He next became the archdeacon of the diocese of New York, and in 1868 was licensed by the Western Reserve Conference, and ordained by Washtenow Presbytery; in 1855 accepted a call to the Church in Howell, Mich., where he labored until his death, Sept. 12, 1860. Mr. McBride was a man of much devotional piety, and labored zealously in building up the Church. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 191.

McBride, Robert, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Franklin Mills, Ohio, in May, 1825; graduated with honor at Oberlin College, Ohio; subsequent- ly studied at the Presbyterian Theological Seminary, and in 1858 was licensed by the Western Reserve Conference, and ordained by Washtenow Presbytery; in 1855 accepted a call to the Church in Howell, Mich., where he labored until his death, Sept. 12, 1860. Mr. McBride was a man of much devotional piety, and labored zealously in building up the Church. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 191.

McBryde, Thomas Livingston, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Abbeville District, S. C., Feb. 28, 1817; pursued his literary course in Franklin College, Athens, Ga., graduating in 1837; entered the theological seminary in Columbia, S. C.; and in 1859 was licensed to preach by Harmony Presbytery. He was appointed missionary to China in 1839, and sailed for Singapore in March, 1840; in 1843 returned to this country on account of failing health; and afterwards became pastor successively of Providence and Rocky River Churches in Abbeville District, S. C., and Hopewell Church, Pendleton, S. C., in which latter place helabored till he died, April 15, 1863. He received the degree of D.D. from Erskine College, S. C. Dr. McBryde was an able minister, a sound divine, and a wise counselor. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 655. (J. L. S.) McCaine, Alexander, an American divine of note, was born in Tipperary, Ireland, in the year 1768. He was educated in England, and was called for the ministry of the Church of England; but, enlisting to the United States in 1791, he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in 1797 entered the itinerant ministry, and filled several important pulpits until 1821, when he became one of the highly-spirited and important men of the movement which so lately has been successfully carried—lay representation. In reply to the adverse decision of the General Conference of 1824, he published the somewhat elaborate History and Mystery of Primogeniture Company (1825), a work displaying rare ability. When the Methodist Episcopal Church was started, he became one of its zealous promoters, and was regarded as one of the most able and influential ministers of that body. He died June 1, 1856. He was particularly noted with the pen, and distinguished for his rare talents in the pulpit.

McCall, John A., a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Athens, Ohio, Feb. 23, 1854; graduated at Franklin College, New Athens, in 1859; studied theology in the seminary at Xenia, Ohio; was licensed by the Wheeling Presbytery in 1862, and in 1863 was ordained by the Xenia Presbytery, and had just accepted a call to Sillville, Ohio, when he was killed by a train, Oct. 25, 1863. Mr. McCall was a man of more than ordinary talents, and remarkable for his sober and studious habits. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 351.

McCall, Joseph Pinckney, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Mississippi; professed religion while young; joined the Methodist Church at eleven years old, and was licensed to preach. The war breaking out soon after, he went out as a volunteer in the Southern army. After the war he was received into the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and in due course was recommended to the Quarterly Conference and licensed to preach. In 1866 he was received into the Memphis Annual Conference, and was stationed at Wesley College, Rev. A. R. Wilson as preacher in charge. In 1867 and 1868 he served at the Tennessee State. His last appointment was Hickman Station, in Kentucky, where he labored faithfully until his death, April 8, 1870. Mr. McCall was an able and faithful minister of the Gospel, and the Church greatly mourned his early loss.—Minutes of the M. E. Church South, 1870, s.v.

McCalla, Daniel, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Newburyham, Pa., in 1748; graduated at Princeton College, N.J., in 1760; studied divinity in Boston; was licensed to preach July 20, 1772; taught an academy in Philadelphia; was ordained pastor of New Providence and Charleston, Pa., in 1774; acted as chaplain in the Revolutionary War; taught afterwards an academy in Hanover County, Va.; and was finally twenty-one years minister at Wappesaw, S. C. He died April 6, 1809. See Hollinghead, Sermons and Essays of D. McCalla (1810, 3 vols.); also Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog. s.v.

McCalla, William Latta, a Presbyterian minister, was born near Lexington, Ky., Nov. 25, 1788. He received his preparatory education under the supervision of his parents; graduated with honors at the Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky.; afterwards studied theology privately; was licensed in 1816, and afterwards ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Augusta, Ky.; in 1823 he went to Philadelphia, and was installed pastor of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, where he continued to labor until 1833, when impaired health prompted him to resign. Subsequently he took charge of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and under his pulpit ministration the Church became large and influential. In 1859 he resigned this charge, and spent some time as an itinerant minister in Texas; on his return to Philadelphia, he successively filled the Middletown and Ridley charges, in the vicinity of Philadelphia, and Union Church, on Thirteenth Street.

In 1858 he removed to St. Louis, Mo., and after preaching there some time became connected with the Female Seminary at St. Charles, Mo. In 1859 he assumed the pastorate of a Church in Louisiana, where he labored until his death, Oct. 12, 1859. Mr. McCalla possessed excellent pulpit talents; his expository style was rich and absorbing, his preaching close and pungent. He was the author of a number of pamphlets and papers; also Discourses with Alexander Campbell on Baptism; with Kneeland on Universalism; with Barker on Infallibility; a small volume on the Doctorate of Divinity; and Travel in Texas. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 99.

McCamber, John D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Rockbridge County, Va., April 9, 1781; graduated at Washington College, Lexington, Va.; subsequently studied theology with Isaac Anderson, D.D., at Maryville, Tenn.; was licensed in 1805, ordained by the Union Presbytery in 1807, and preached successively to the Strawberry Plains, Hopewell, and New Market churches, within the bounds of French Broad Presbytery. He died Sept. 28, 1859. Dr. McCormell was a faithful minister, a good preacher, and an earnest pastor. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 191.

McCarroll, Thomas, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Newlin, Pa., August 12, 1800, and entered the itinerancy in 1834 at the Philadelphia Conference, and in 1835 the New Jersey Conference. He labored as an effective minister for thirty-one years. He was three times appointed presiding elder, and was a member of the General Conference of 1852. A thorough student, an eloquent preacher, a faithful pastor, a gentle ruler, he was greatly beloved and esteemed in all his appointments. He died in East Newark, N.J., May 9, 1860.

McCarron, Michael, D.D., a Roman Catholic theologian of note, was born in the County of Monaghan, Ireland, in the year 1804. He received his early education in his native place, after the completion of which he entered Maynooth College to pursue his theological studies, and on graduation was ordained to the ministry. Soon after this he came to the United States. He was placed at St. James's Church (now the cathedral), in Brooklyn. Subsequently he was transferred to St. James's Church, New York, but very soon afterwards was appointed pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Sixth Avenue, where he remained several years. About the year 1857 the late archbishop Hughes conferred on him the pastorate of the large congregation of St. Mary's Church, No. Sixth Street, where he remained until his death, Feb. 23, 1867. At the time when Father McCarron arrived in this country, archbishop Hughes had been actively engaged in the work of education, and had succeeded in exciting a deep interest among the Catholics on the subject. Father McCarron, then in the vigor and prime of life, entered upon this work with the greatest zeal, and the results of his efforts in that noble cause were soon apparent, and are felt at the present time. Father McCarron received evidences of the respect and esteem of his associates by his advancement to the archiepiscopate of the archdiocese of New York. The date of this appointment is not known to us.

McCarron, Robert, D.D., an American Presbyterian minister, was born in New York City Sept. 30, 1791, and was educated at Columbia College. He chose the legal profession, and was engaged in his studies of jurisprudence, with the intention of devoting himself to the sacred ministry. He therefore entered the Theological Seminary of the Associate Reformed Church at New York, and pursued a theological course of study, and was licensed to preach in 1816. He was immediately called to the pulpit, but remained several years; then returned to New York to take charge of the Orange Street Church, which had at that time but thirty members. While he was the pastor of this Church it was removed to Canal Street. When his connection ceased, in 1836, it numbered eight hundred members. In 1836 he accepted a call to the Church at Fort Carbon, Pa., and remained there four years. In 1840 he became the pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Goshen, N. Y.; in 1849 of the Union Church at Newburg, and in 1856 of the Westminster Church in Twenty-second Street (with which the Twenty- second Street Reformed Church was a united Church in New York City. This was his last pastoral charge. In 1862 his health, which for some time had been enfeebled, failing still more, he resigned his charge. He died at Yonkers, N. Y., March 12, 1865. "All who have known Dr. McCr- teer will remember him as one possessed of a genial nature, an easy, spontaneous hearted friendliness, in finding the most fitting expression in words and acts; as a sim- ple-minded, fervent Christian, whose love for the Sav- iour and his blessed Gospel was never concealed; and as an able minister of the New Testament, whose fervid eloquence when proclaiming the glad tidings of salva- tion, and in urging them upon the acceptance of persev- ring men, was seldom equalled. We have often listened with wrapt attention to his solemn appeals, while the tears which were flowing down his cheeks, and his tender words, were answered by the tears of his hearers. But at other times, when his words "were entered into rest" (The Observer, N. Y. March, 1865). The degree of D.D. was bestowed on Mr. McCratee by Columbia College in 1881. See New Amer. Cyclop. 1865, p. 586; Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 132.

McCrartey, John B., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Apollo, Armstrong Co., Pa., June 21, 1822; graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa.; and in 1856, at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa.; was licensed in 1857, and in 1858 was ordained and installed pastor of the churches at Mount Washing- ton and Temperanceville, in the vicinity of Pittsburgh, Pa. In 1861 he accepted a call from the Twelfth Presby- terian Church, Baltimore, Md., and was installed its pastor May 2, 1865, where he labored until he died, May 14, 1865. Mr. McCratey was a man of superior abili- ties, a close student, and an excellent scholar. See Wil- son, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 165.

McCrartey, William D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Columbia Co., Pa., in 1806; graduated at Washington College, Washington, Pa., in 1823; studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, Al- legany City, Pa.; was licensed in 1883, and in 1855 was ordained pastor of West Liberty Church, Pa.; afterwards labored in the latter church, Madison, and Harmony churches, Ohio, within the bounds of Steubenville and New Lisbon Presbyteries, and died July 27, 1883. Mr. Mc- Cratey was gifted with superior intellectual powers, logical and discriminating in his theological views, an ex- cellent scholar, and a successful minister. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 175.

McCaul, Alexander, an eminent Anglican divine, was born about the opening of this century, and was educated at King's College, London, where he afterwards became professor of divinity. He was also prebend of St. Paul's, London, since 1845. He is noted, however, not so much on account of the high positions he filled as an ecclesiastic, as for his missionary labors among the Jews, a task for which his great erudition and un- common familiarity with the Hebrew language and litera- ture particularly fitted him. He died in 1863. Dr. McCaul's works besides Sketches of Modern Jewish and the Jews (London, 1838), Sketches of The Old Paths, or a Comparison of Mod. Judaism with the Rel. of Moses and the Prophets (2d ed. 1866, 12mo); a lot of minor theological works, and a host of sermons; for a list of which see Darling. Cyclop. Bibl. ii. 1902.

McCullie, Thomas Harrin, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near the middle of last century; graduated at Princeton College, N. J., in 1774; was ordi- nated minister in the western county of North Caro-lia; was several years president of a college at Waynes- borough, S. C.; and died in Savannah, Ga., about 1800.

McCay, David, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Lewiston, Pa., Feb. 17, 1816; was educated at Jeff-erson College (1839); studied theology at the Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed by Hunting- ton Presbyterian in 1841; and in 1842 was ordained, and installed pastor of the united churches of Bethesda, Concord, and Callensburg, Pa., where he continued to labor for more than twenty years. In 1864 he was installed the chaplaincy of the 103d Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, in which position he labored until his death, June 4, 1862. Mr. McCay possessed an intellect of high order, clear, comprehensive, and eminently practical: his attainments in science and literature were varied and exact; his piety deep, constant, and heartfelt. See Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 191.

McCheyne, Robert Murray, a celebrated Scotch preacher and evangelist, was born in Edinburgh, Scot- land, May 21, 1815. At five years of age he was quite proficient in English. When eight years old he entered the high-school, where for six years he maintained high rank in his classes. In November, 1827, he entered the University of Edinburgh and gained prizes in various departments of study. He studied modern languages privately; was proficient in gymnastic exercises, and in music and drawing. This last acquisition was advantageous to him afterwards in sketching scenes in the Holy Land. The death of his eldest brother, David, led to his conversion, or was the beginning of the great change in his life, and brought him to study for the ministry. In 1831 he entered upon his studies in theology and Church history in Divinity Hall, under the late Professor Dr. Welsh. In 1835 he removed to the Presbyterian of Arian, and was licensed to preach July 1. November 7 he began his labors at Larbert, a parish containing six thousand people, to whom he was a devoted pastor. He was also an intense student of the Bible, reading it in both the Hebrew and the Greek. In 1836 he was called to St. Peter's Church, Dundee, and was ordained there Nov. 24. This charge was large, and his labors were so constant that his health failed, and he was obliged to retire for a season of rest. During this vacation he went, with three other ministers, to the "missionary inquiry to the Jews." His health improved by his travels, and on his return he resumed his work at St. Peter's, where he remained until 1842, when his health again failed. He now undertook a preaching tour, with other ministers, through the north of England, preaching in the open air and in different denominations. On returning from England, he was obliged by failing health to have an assistant in his labors at Dundee. In Feb- ruary, 1843, he went on his last tour as an evangelist; on his return from which he was attacked by a fever, and died March 25, 1843. His death was a loss not to his own congregation but to denominational only, but to the whole Christian world. Mr. McCheyne was one of the most beautiful examples of the true Gospel minister. Whether among his own congregation, or in Palestine, or travelling as an evangelist, he was always preaching by his works and his holy and holy and his doctrine. It was pre-eminent as a preacher, as a pastor, and as a Christian, and did a great work not merely by the great number of conversions which took place directly or indirectly through his instru- mentality, but by the zealous spirit which he influ- enced into every department of Christian work. He had also fine talent for literary and scholastic pursuits. He wrote a number of pieces showing a taste for poetry, one of which—Grecian, but living Greece no more—was written at the age of seventeen. His letters from Palest- ine, his lectures, sermons, and letters, show an ability for which he was surpassed; but he had the full use of all his talents and powers to the service of Christ, and lived only for the salvation of men. His name will long be McClanahan, Alexander W., a Presbyterian minister, was born near West Union, Adams County, Ohio, Nov. 29, 1821; graduated with honor at Miami University, Cincinnati, in 1844; and theology in the theological seminary at Oxford; was licensed in 1847 by the Chillicothe Presbytery; and in 1848 ordained. His first and only charge was at Decatur, Ohio. He died Oct. 29, 1862. Mr. McClanahan was noted for his great energy of mind. The spirit of prayer that he had a massive intellect, capable of broad and comprehensive views, and, when aroused to high mental activity, he wrote and spoke with rare power. See Wilson, Presb. Hist., Almanac, 1863, p. 359.

McClakey, John, an eminent Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born in Derry County, Ireland, Jan. 2, 1756. His parents, who were members of the Established Church of England, in 1772 emigrated to New Jersey; here John was converted in 1782, and, feeling that he was called of God to preach the Gospel, took the necessary steps to enter the ministry, and in 1786 became a member of the Conference as an itinerant; in 1787 was elected elder presiding in the Virginia District; in 1787-94, to Baltimore; in 1796, to Philadelphia; in 1796-99, presiding elder on New Jersey District; in 1799-1801, to New York City; in 1802, to Philadelphia; in 1812-15, presiding elder on Chesapeake District, and died at Chestertown, Md., Sept. 2, 1814. Mr. McClaconkey was a man of deep and earnest piety; versed in the Scriptures; and thousands of souls were converted through his efforts during a long and useful ministry. Conference Minutes, i, 257; Sprague, A Monograph of the American Psalms, vii, 125.

McClelland, Alexander, D.D., a noted (Dutch) Reformed preacher and educator, was born at Schenectady, N. Y., in 1754; graduated at Union College in 1809; studied theology with Rev. John Anderson, D.D., in Western Pennsylvania, and afterwards with Rev. John M. Mason, D.D.; was licensed by the Associate Reformed Presbytery, New York, in 1815; and, when nineteen years only, was elected pastor of Rutgers Street Presbyterian Church, New York, as successor of Dr. Milledoler. Here he remained seven years, and established his great reputation as a pulpit orator among the foremost men of his day. In 1822 he became professor of rhetoric, logic, and metaphysics in Dickinson College, Pa.; removed in 1829 to New Brunswick, N. J., as professor of languages in Rutgers College; and in 1829 was elected professor of Oriental literature and Biblical criticism in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church. He continued, however, to give instruction in rhetorical and belles-lettres in the college for several years. He resigned his place in the theological seminary in 1857; and, after a tour in Europe, returned to New Brunswick, where he lived in retirement until his death, Dec. 19, 1864. His published works consist of a few occasional sermons and pamphlets, and a volume on the Canon and Interpretation of Scripture (New York, 1860, pp. 229, 12mo). Dr. McClelland was in almost every respect a man sui generis. He was original in thought, in style of expression, in oratory, and in the professor's chair. He was humorous and witty, keen and strong, robust and masculine in all the attributes of manhood, and exacting to the last degree as a teacher. Inspiring his pupils with his own enthusiasm, he taught them to study and to think accurately for themselves. He gave very short lessons in Hebrew, and in all the grammar in which they were always in use, and he required critical accuracy in recitations. His written lectures on the Epistles to the Romans and Hebrews, and his oral criticisms on Isaiah and the Psalms; his condensed Hebrew Grammar, and his lectures on the Canon and interpretation of Script-change of this Church expiring by limitation in 1800, he accepted the appointment of pastor of the American church in Paris, then and now under the care of the American and Foreign Christian Union. While holding this position the great American civil war broke out, and Dr. McClintock was not a man to be idle in the time of his country's peril. Appreciating the value to the friend of the free world of the first inhabitants of Europe, he exerted himself to the utmost in diffusing a right knowledge of the merits of the controversy in which the American Union was involved. In these labors he availed himself of the aid of the count De Gasparin and the Rev. E. P. Austin of England. During the entire war his pen was never idle, and from the platform, whenever it was practicable, he made eloquent pleas for the national cause. During the period of his residence abroad, he was also corresponding editor of the Methodist, a paper established in 1809 in the city of New York. His letters kept the American public well advised of the fluctuations of European opinion in relation to the war. Upon his return home, in 1864, he was for a second time appointed to the pastorate of St. Paul's Church, but, finding his health unequal to the duties of the office, he resigned at the end of a year. In 1866 he was made chairman of the Central Centenary Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to which was given the work of organizing the commemoration of the introduction of 1746, of Methodism into the United States. Mr. Daniel Drew, of Boston, Mass., having secured his health, resigned his office of founding, in connection with this centennial commemoration, a Biblical and Theological School, Dr. McClintock was chosen its first president. The school was opened in the year 1867, at Madison, New Jersey, under the most flattering circumstances. It has been from the beginning an entire success. Dr. McClintock's health had, prior to his election to the presidency of Drew, shown symptoms of decline. Since 1848 he had been frequently prostrated by attacks of illness. From 1867 to 1870 a great decay of vitality was perceptible, and on March 4 of the latter year the "wheels of life stood still at last."

To the preparation of this Cyclopædia, Dr. McClintock had, in company with his co-editor, Dr. Strong, devoted many laborious years. To theology and its kindred studies his attention had through life been chiefly directed. He lived to see three volumes completed, and the fourth a state of forwardness. In the year 1847 he translated, with Prof. C. E. Blumenthal, Neander's Life of Christ, published by Harper and Brothers. In 1851 he prepared an essay on the Temporal Power of the Pope, which was at that time a political question of some importance. He contributed to the United States Theological Institutes, by Watson, Dr. McClintock supplied with an analysis, which is considered a model work of its kind. He was also a frequent contributor to the Methodist Quarterly Review, and an occasional one to several other periodicals. Since his death a volume of his sermons has been collected and published under the title Life-Writing Words (N. Y. 1871, 12mo). Dr. McClintock's versatility of talent is apparent even from this slight sketch. He was truly a manly-sided man. Yet his attainments were solid: an imperfect understanding of any subject he could not tolerate. The facility of acquiring knowledge he was very remarkable. He could track a subject, never losing the clue, through a labyrinth of books, until he came into full possession of it, both as a whole and in its details. The critical faculty was dominant in him. To systematize knowledge, to reduce it to form and completeness, was his delight. At the same time the fervor which makes the orator. His eloquence was of the highest order; in power to sway an audience he had few if any superiors. He was probably the most complete scholar that his Church has produced in the United States. His style of a writer was remarkable for clearness, precision, directness, and condensation. His personal qualities endeared him to hosts of friends; his death, in the midst of his years, has been deplored as a great loss to the cause of religion and learning in our country. (G. R. C.)

McCLURE, JOHN ALEXANDER, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington, Ky., Sept. 25, 1804. His education was received at a private school at Brick Pond, Woodford County, KY., his instructors being Messrs. Thompson and Daly, from the University of Dublin, Ireland. In 1828 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and in 1828 was licensed to preach. Subsequently he became a skillful archivist in determining the authenticity of some of the books of the Old Testament and one or two of the Epistles, he gave up preaching and entered upon the study of law. During this stage of his life he wrote Sketches of Western Adventurers, and otherwise contributed to the press of the day. He was admitted to the bar in 1839, and became a regular practitioner until 1849, when, his religious principles being revived, he was again, in 1851, licensed and ordained, and was called to the First Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, Ind.; during his pastorate there he was elected president of Hanover College, Ind. In 1857 he accepted a call to Maysville, Ky., where he labored until the summer of 1859, when he was drowned. Dr. McClung was a man of brilliant intellect and rare eloquence; he was a polished scholar, a generous friend, and an humble Christian. See Wilson, Pred. Hist. Alumnus, 1861, p. 100.

McCLURE, Alexander Wilson, D.D., an American divine, was born in Boston, Mass., Oct. 14, 1808. He was educated at Yale and Amherst colleges and Andover Theological Seminary (class of 1880); was settled at Malden, Mass., 1880-41; then at St. Augustine, Fla., 1841-44; editor of the Christian Observer from 1844 to 1847; and pastor at Malden from 1848 to 1852. Leaving the Congregational body, he accepted a call to the First Reformed Church, Jersey City, N. J., and remained there three years (1852-55), when he became corresponding secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, 1865. His health having been impaired, he was sent in 1866 as chaplain of the union at Rome, Italy. In 1868, broken down by bronchial disease, he retired from public service, and lingered a great sufferer until his death, Sept. 20, 1865. The American Chapel in Paris was erected largely by funds which Dr. McClure secured with his own purse. Dr. McClure's contributions to the periodical press were of the most popular, including valuable articles for the Observer, the New Brunswick Review, and the Literary and Theological Review. He also published The Life-Boat, on Allegory:—Four Lectures on Ultra-Urbanism, a Series of Letters upon the Bible in the Public Schools, written in controversy with a Roman priest in Jersey City;—Lectures of the Chief Fathers of New England (2 vols.) and—The Translators Rewired, or Biographical Articles on the History of the Translators of the English Bible (New York, 1856, 12mo). The title is somewhat unfortunate, but the work is invaluable, the materials being drawn from the best sources in Great Britain and America, and with the utmost care for many years, to secure accuracy and fulness. Dr. McClure was a truly learned man engaged in genuine diachriatics, and a practical controversialist. Ardent and honest as the sunlight, abounding in good feeling, and simple in manners as a child, he was a man of positive convictions, fearless of consequences in the advocacy of truth and in assailing popular errors. Yet, with all his earnestness, the sweetest music of the world, Dr. McClure remained pre-eminently a devout and humble Christian minister. Chastened by many providential trials, his piety grew more serene, and beautiful, and deep with advancing infirmities and years. His prayers and preaching were solemn, tender, clear, serene. His thoughts were seen and felt by him as eternal realities, and his hearers often wereushed and melted under his reverential appeals. His death was triumphant. See Corwin, Man-McClure, Arthur, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in East Tennessee, Feb. 16, 1801; was converted about 1819; entered the Tennessee Conference in 1822, and died Sept. 26, 1825. He was a young man of much promise, excellent in abilities and grace, and an eloquent and successful minister.—Conference Minutes, i, 650.

McClure, David, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born Nov. 18, 1748, in Newport, R.I.; graduated at Yale College in 1769; was ordained missionary to the Indians near Pittsburgh, Pa., May 20, 1772. The mission was broken up by the troubles with England, and McClure became pastor in Northampton, Mass., Nov. 13, 1776; at East Windsor, Conn., June 11, 1776, and died June 25, 1820. He was chosen trustee of Dartmouth College in 1778, and made D.D. by the same in 1800. Dr. McClure published Sermons on the Moral Law (1795, Svo).—Memoir of the Rev. Eleazar Wheelock, D.D., in connection with the Rev. Dr. Parish (1810):— and a number of occasional sermons and addresses, and magazine contributions. See Sprague, Amasa, ii, 7.

McCombs (or McCoombs), Lawrrence, an early Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Kent County, in the State of Delaware, on the 11th of March, 1769. Little is known of his early education, but it is presumed, from the easy circumstances of his father, who was a man of wealth, and the high character of the schools and academies of the district in which he lived, that he early attainted to a good degree of intellectual culture. In 1792 he was admitted to the Philadelphia Conference on probation, and his first appointment was to the Newburgh Circuit, in the State of New York; two years later he was appointed to Long Island; in 1795, to New London; in 1796, to Middletown; in 1797 and 1798, to Poland; in 1799, to New London; in 1800, to Baltimore; in 1801, to Baltimore City; in 1802, to Baltimore City and Fell's Point; in 1804, to the Baltimore Circuit. In 1806 he asked and obtained a location, and selected a residence on the eastern shore of Maryland, near the head of the Chesapeake Bay. In this location he is said to have labored with unabated industry and devotion. In 1815 he re-entered the itinerancy, and took his place in the Philadelphia Conference; at that and in the following year he was appointed to Smyrna; in 1817, to Queen Anne's; and in 1818, to Kent. From 1819 to 1822 he was presiding elder of the Jersey District; in 1822 he was appointed to West and Salem Islands; in 1824 and 1825, to St. John, Charlotte, Philadelphia; and in 1826, to Wilmington. In 1827 and 1828 he was presiding elder of the East Jersey District; from 1829 to 1832, of the Chesapeake Bay; and in 1838, of the South Philadelphia District. In 1834 he was appointed to St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia; in this year, however, he was constrained, by his rapidly-failing health, to relinquish his active position and become a supernumerary. In 1835 he took his place among the retired and infirm, after having performed an unprecedented amount of labor, and left the impress of his energetic character wherever he went. He closed his useful and eventful life June 11, 1836. An intimate friend, also a minister, the Rev. J. Kennaday, has left this beautiful tribute to his memory: "In his religious character Mr. McCombs blended great zeal and fidelity with a very unmortified spirit. No hazardous venture, which he estimated in the course of duty, nor could any provocation betray him into petulance or resentment. Meek in spirit, intrepid in purpose, gentle and social in manner, he was greatly respected in the pulpit, and ever welcome to the hospitality of the numerous circles which he respected as the man of God. He was strong in faith, much in prayer, and a great reader of the Bible. His intellectual character was developed more in the uniform strength of his faculties than in the marked prominence of any one or more of them. His perceptions were quick and clear, and his judgment sober and impartial. He had a fine imagination, which, being restrained and regulated by his admirable taste, gave beauty and warmth, as the artists say, to all his pictures. In union with these traits, there were some physical qualities which contributed largely to his power and success. His personal appearance was very attractive. In stature he was full six feet in height, with a finely-developed form; though not corpulent, the breadth of his chest indicated the prodigious strength which enabled him to perform his almost gigantic labors. The general expression of his countenance betokened intelligence, gentleness, and energy, while his full, frank face was illumined by his ever-kindling eye. His voice was full, clear, and of great flexibility, sweeping from the lowest to the highest tone, and modulated in the most delicate manner, in beautiful harmony with his subject. In preaching in the field, which was his favorite arena, I used to think he was quite an approach to Whitfield. Such was his known power at camp-meetings that the announcement that he was to be present on such an occasion would draw a multitude of people from great distances. . . . I have thought that in some respects there was a striking resemblance between him and the late distinguished Dr. John M. Mason, of New York, whom I often heard in my boyhood." McConaughy, David, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Menalien township, York County, Pa., Sept. 29, 1774, and graduated at Princeton College, Carlisle, in 1796; studied theology for two years; was licensed in 1797, and preached frequently as a missionary in Philadelphia and New York; accepted a call from the United Christians of Upper Marsh Creek and Conewago in 1800, and remained pastor till 1822. During this connection he visited Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York in behalf of the Gettysburg Church, and as a minister and a teacher rendered important services. At an early period he interested himself much in the cause of temperance by appointing meetings, preaching, and forming a society of which he himself was president. He removed to Washington in 1832 to the presidency of the college, which he resigned in 1849. He died Jan. 29, 1852. Dr. McConaughy published A Brief Summary and Outline of Moral Science (1838).—Discourses, chiefly Biographical, of Persons connected with Historical Information (1850).—Three Discourses on the Doctrine of the Trinity and on Infant Baptism. — See Sprague, Amasa, Amer. Preachers, iv, 199.

McConnell, William L., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Canonsburg, Pa., Sept. 19, 1829; graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa.; studied theology in the Associate Reformed Seminary, Alleghany, Pa., and was licensed and ordained by Alleghany Reformed Presbyterian in 1885. He accepted a call to Hanover Church, and subsequently to West Newton, Pa., where he labored until failing health compelled him to resign. He died July 18, 1866. See Wilson, Proc. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 663.

McCook, Robert J., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in South Carolina in 1818. He was educated at the Lander College, S.C., and was licensed and ordained by the South Carolina Conference in 1836. He was a man of large intellect, with marked ability in the classics, but he was not a suitable subject for college work. He was a man of very modest habits, and was not disposed to take part in intellectual discussions. He was a man of great energy, and was always ready to take his part in any undertaking that was of public utility. He was a man of great piety, and was always ready to take his part in any undertaking that was of public utility. He was a man of great piety, and was always ready to take his part in any undertaking that was of public utility.

McCorkle, Samuel Eubulus, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Harris Ferry, Lancaster County, Pa., Aug. 28, 1746, and graduated at New Jersey College in 1772; was licensed in 1774, and, after laboring for two years in Virginia, accepted a call from the congregation of Tazewata in 1777. About 1785 he opened a classical school named Zion Parnassus, which he continued ten or twelve years. He died Jan. 21, 1811. Dr. McCorkle published Four Discourses on the great First Principles of Deism and Revelation contrasted (1797)—Three Discourses on the Terms of Christian Communion—Two Occasional Sermons. See Sprague, Annals, iii. 846.

McCoy, Isaac, a Baptist minister, was born in Fayette County, Pa., June 13, 1784; was licensed to preach in 1805, and began work as a missionary. Oct. 15, 1810, he was ordained pastor of the Church at Maria Creek, in Clark County, Ind., where he remained some eight years, making occasional missionary tours in the surrounding country. In 1818 he was appointed a missionary to the Indians, and in May, 1820, removed to Fort Wayne, where he established a church; in the fall of the same year he removed to Carey, on the St. Joseph River, in 1829, to the Indian country, now Kansas. In 1842 he became the first corresponding secretary and general agent of the American Indian Mission Association, at Louisville, Ky. He died June 21, 1846. He published a History of Baptist Indian Missions, embracing remarks on the former, present condition, and future prospects of the aboriginal tribes (1840, 8vo). See Sprague, Annals, vi. 541.

McCracken, John Steele, a Presbyterian minister, was born near Cincinnati, Ohio, April 25, 1804. His opportunities in early life for acquiring knowledge were poor. In 1833 he entered the preparatory department of Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, and graduated in 1836; studied theology under the care of the first Presbytery of Ohio of the Associate Reformed Church, and subsequently attended the theological seminary at Alleghany City, Pa., and the seminary at Oxford; was licensed in 1841, and then went out as a missionary among the Indians in eastern Iowa; in 1843 he accepted a call from the Church at Kenton, Ohio, where he labored until his health gave way. He died April 1, 1863. Mr. McCracken was an able exponent and a sound theologian; his judgment was eminently just and critical; his disposition charitable and liberal. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 392. (J. L. S.)

McCracken, Samuel W., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Lexington, Ky., Jan. 12, 1800; was educated at Miami University (class of 1831); studied theology at Maryville, Tenn., and was elected professor of mathematics in the college at Maryville; was afterwards chosen professor of mathematics in Miami University; was licensed by Ohio First Presbytery in 1835, and in 1836 was ordained; in 1839 accepted a call to Hopewell Church, Ohio, and resigned his professorship in the university; here he continued to labor until his death, Oct. 10, 1859. Mr. McCracken maintained a high reputation for talent; prudent and far-sighted, his counsels were always worthy of consideration; opposed to all expediency, he made experience the basis of action. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 209. (J. L. S.)

McCrary, W. H., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Tennessee Jan. 17, 1821; was educated at Bethel College, and licensed in 1849, after teaching school for several years; was ordained in 1854. He died Sept. 14, 1858. Mr. McCrary was a good preacher, a successful teacher, and a fine theologian. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 286.

McCreary, Jonathan Sharp, a Presbyterian minister, was born near New Galilee, Pa., April 15, 1828; enjoyed in early life the advantage of religious instruction, discipline, and example; graduated at Franklin College in 1852; studied theology in the Associate Seminary at Canonsburg (class of 1855); was licensed by the Associate Presbytery of Ohio in October of the same year; was ordained and installed pastor of the Associate congregation of Cadiz, and there continued to labor until 1862, when he volunteered in the service of the government. While in the army he continued to preach, and perform every other ministerial duty as occasion offered, until he was killed, Sept. 7, 1864. Mr. McCreary was endued with a clear and penetrating intellect; his education was comprehensive, his style logical and energetic, his manner positive and emphatic. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 255.

McCrie, Thomas, D.D., a noted Scotch divine, celebrated as a writer on ecclesiastical history and polemics, was born at Dunse, in Berwickshire, in November, 1772. "Dr. McCrie's parents," says his biographer, "being connected with that branch of the secession usually termed Anti-Burghers, he was brought up under . . . the primitive strictness of that communion . . . and received his early religious training under the importance of which he was ever afterwards so strenuous an advocate, and of the success of which he was himself a striking example." After securing the rudiments of education at the parish school of his native place, he entered the University of Edinburgh, and in 1791 commenced his theological studies. In 1796 he was licensed to preach by the Associate Presbytery of Kelso, and he immediately afterwards was chosen pastor of a congregation of the same body in Edinburgh, where he served the following ten years, applying himself with great assiduity to the discharge of his professional duties, and occasionally publishing able pamphlets on some of the gravest and most difficult subjects of theological inquiry. The differences of opinion, and the appearance of New-Lights with peculiar doctrines quite unknown to the primitive belief of the "Secession Church," caused McCrie in 1800, with five friends, among them the celebrated Bruce, to separate from the "General Associated Synod," and to form the "Constitutional Associate Presbytery," avowing "strict adherence to the principles of the original secession." (Here compare Hist. Sketch of the Origin of the Secession Church, by the Rev. A. Thomson, and the History of the Rise of the Relief Church, by the Rev. Gavin Struthers [Edinburgh, 1856, 12mo].) During the controversy which this change provoked he gave himself largely to the study of history, and carried on not a little of his great countryman, John Knox, that zealously applied himself to the composition of a Life of John Knox (Edinb. 1812, 8vo, and often), a masterly work, that combines the highest excellences of which biography is capable, and was by his contemporaries regarded as "a literary phenomenon." It placed the name of McCrie at once in the foremost ranks of living historians. His last literary honors were conferred on him (compare Hetherington, Hist. Ch. of Scotland, ii. 399). He received from the University of Edinburgh the honorary title of D.D., being the first Dissenter to whom that honor was awarded; and his book, besides passing through several editions in Scotland, was translated into most of the languages of Europe. Encouraged by the success of his first literary effort, Dr. McCrie published, as the fruits of his researches, regarding a later period of ecclesiastical history, the Biography of Andrew Melville, a celebrated champion of Presbyterianism in the reign of James VI of Scotland. This work, composed on the same principle of combining the memoirs of an individuform piety. He lived above reproach, and died honored by all who knew him." —Conference Minutes M. E. Ch. South, 1870, s. v.

McCutch en, James B., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born near Murfreesboro, Tenn., Aug. 26, 1829; professed religion in his fourteenth year, and joined the Methodist Church; was licensed to preach, and joined the Memphis Annual Conference in 1852; was appointed to Camleau Circuit in 1853; Mount Pinson in 1854; Tashomingo in 1855; Clinton Circuit in 1857; Paducah Circuit in 1858; Murray Circuit in 1860; and Tashomingo Circuit in 1861. During this year he was elected chaplain of the 7th Kentucky Regiment C. S. A. In this service he continued till the close of the war, when he resumed his place as a travelling preacher, and was appointed in 1866 to Cageville Circuit; in 1868 to Trenton Circuit, and again to Cageville Circuit. He died Aug. 26, 1870. "Brother McCutch en was a self-made man, having received but a limited education in his youth, but by industry and hard study he had acquired a very good foundation of education, and no mean acquaintance with the Latin and Greek languages. His preaching was a plain, plain introduction, exhibiting a large acquaintance with the sacred Scriptures, and with the standard literature of the Church. He was not of a polemical turn of mind, but when our causes were attacked, he always showed himself a fearless champion and a trusty, worthy defender. But few men ever prepared to defend our doctrines than he was, and yet he cherished a noble catholicity of sentiment and feeling that did credit at once to his head and heart. He was not merely acceptable, but popular and useful, making many friends wherever he went." —Conference Minutes M. E. Ch. South, 1870, s. v.

McDer m on, James C., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Amelia County, Va., April 1, 1799; was educated in what were known as the Old Fields Schools of Virginia; was early made a ruling elder in the Church, and at once identified himself with the cause of temperance. He was licensed in 1823, and in 1825 was ordained and installed pastor over the New Market and Missouri churches, in Campbell County, Va. He died Sept. 15, 1867. Mr. McDer m on was a good and useful man, and an earnest apostle of temperance in his region. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 347.

McDer m o tt, Thomas, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Monmouth County, N. J., in 1819; was educated in the Lawrenceville High School, N. J.; studied divinity in the theological seminary at Princeton (class of 1833), and was licensed and ordained by New Brunswick Presbytery as pastor of the Church in Stillwell, N. J.; in 1838, removed to Ohio as pastor of Hubbard and Unity churches; in 1844 accepted a call to Clarksville Church; and in 1846 resigned to become pastor of Chippewa Church, where he remained until compelled to resign because of failing health. He died June 6, 1861. Mr. McDer m o tt was a devoted preacher; earnest in his work, and industrious in his efforts. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 109.

McDonald, Andrew, a Scotch minister, was born at Leith in 1757; was educated at the University of Edinburgh; was ordained deacon in 1775; pastor of a congregation at Glasgow in 1777; subsequently removed to London, and devoted himself to the authorship of light literature, and died in the great English metropolis, "a victim to sickness, disappointment, and misfortune," in 1780. A list of his works is given by Albion, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Authors, ii, 1165.

McDonald, Daniel, D.D., an Episcopal minister in America, was born near Bedford, Westchester County, N. Y., about 1787, and was educated at Middlebury College. Having taught for some time, he was ordained in 1810, and became rector of St. Peter's, Auburn, N. Y. He subsequently took charge of the academy in Fairfield, Herkimer Co., where he superintended the preparation of candidates for holy orders. In 1821 he was made D.D. by Columbia College; removed to Geneva, and served for many years as missionary in the village of Waterloo. He became professor in the College of Geneva in 1825, and continued so until his death, March 24, 1851. He published works as _A Sermon in the Churchman's Magazine, and A Series of Articles in the Gospel Messenger_, signed P. See Sprague, Annu., v, 529.

McDonald, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Broome County, Va., July 25, 1754; was educated in Ohio University, Athens, Ohio; was licensed and ordained as a Presbyterian in 1786 and, installed pastor of the Church in Burlington, Ohio. He was subsequently served as missionary in Kentucky; in 1832 labored in Manchester and Huntington churches, Ohio; and from 1856 in the Pleasant Prairie Church, Ill., until his death, Aug. 15, 1866. Mr. McDonald was possessed of rare mental strength and discriminating powers; extensive religious and literary acquirements; sterling piety, and unassuming humility. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 184.

McDonogh, John, an American philanthropist, a merchant of New Orleans, was born at Baltimore in 1782, and in 1800 removed to the Southern city, where, after having by hard labor and strict economy amassed an immense fortune, he delighted to serve the cause of humanity. He founded free schools and asylums for orphans, and also aided greatly the cause of the "American Colonization Society." He established himself a considerable time in the Southern States, and sent thither many of his own negroes, after having previously provided them with a thorough education and a trade. He died Oct. 26, 1850. See Drake, Dict. Amer. Biog., s. v.

McDowell, Alexander, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland, and came to this country in 1778, and was licensed in 1779, and afterward itinerated through portions of Maryland and Virginia, until, in 1741, he was ordained as an evangelist to Virginia, and subsequently to itinerate in New Castle Presbytery; in 1748 took charge of White Clay and Elk River churches; in 1752 was appointed principal of the Synod's school, which he afterwards removed to Elkhorn, Md., and in 1767 to Newark, Del. He continued to labor as a teacher and preacher until his death, Jan. 12, 1792. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 48. (J. L. S.) McDowell, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister (O.S.), was born in Belminster, Somerset County, N.J., Sept. 3, 1812. He was educated at Princeton College, where he graduated A.B. in 1831; studied theology with Dr. Woodthull, of Freehold; and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1804. In December of that year he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Elizabethville, where he remained until 1833. During his ministry there 1144 persons were added to the church. In May, 1833, he became pastor of the Central Church, Philadelphia, which, from small beginnings, grew to be a strong church under his ministry. In 1846 he accepted a call to the new Spring-garden Street Church, where again his talent for organizing and establishing a society was very successfully employed. He remained in this parish till his death, February, 1863. He published a _System of Theology_ (2 vols.); _Bible Class Manual_ (2 vols.); _Bible Questions_; etc. For nearly fifty years he was a trustee of Princeton College, and was largely connected with the theology of the church from its foundation. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Alm., 1864, p. 186.

McDowell, William Anderson, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born May 15, 1789, at Lamington, Somerset Co., N. J.; in 1809 graduated at Princeton, where he acted as tutor for several months; completed his theological course in 1818; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and ordained and installed pastor at Bound Brook. In 1814 he became pastor of the Church of Morrisville, N. J.; but after a residence of nine years his health obliged him to resign; in 1823 he was installed by the Charleston Union Presbytery, served for several years, and in 1832 became moderator of the General Assembly, and secretary of the "Board of Domestic Missions of the Presbyterian Church" (Phila.). He subsequently visited the South; and preached occasionally in New Jersey, where he died, Sept. 17, 1851. See Sprague, Annu., iv, 495; Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864.

McElhany, William G., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Huntingdon, Pa.; graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1847; studied theology in the Associate Reformed Seminary at Canonsburg, Pa.; and in 1850 was licensed by Charleroi Presbytery; in 1855 was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Holoben, N. J., which he had served until his death, May 29, 1860. Mr. McElhany was a sound evangelical preacher. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Alm., 1861, p. 209.

McFarland, James, a Presbyterian divine, was born in March, 1800, at Dunbarton, within the present limits of the city of Glasgow, Scotland. He entered the grammar school in Glasgow when seven years old. He next passed to St. Andrew's College, and afterwards to the divinity school of the Established Church, and was licensed to preach the Gospel at the age of twenty-one. During his college course he served as private tutor to an only son of a branch of the great family of Argyle. At the age of twenty-six he became the assistant and successor of the Rev. Dr. Musshet, at Shettleston, a suburb of Glasgow. Soon after he was called to the largest and most numerous congregation in the whole of Scotland at Aberbrothick, a seaport and manufacturing town between Montrose and Aberdeen, situated on the German Ocean. In the year 1835 Mr. McFarland came to New York, and a little later went to Delaware County, settled by Scotch people, many of whom were the associates and schoolmates of his boyhood. After a few years he removed to Ulster County, and in 1838 was called to be the pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church of Bloomingdale. During his ministry in that place the church was erected in the neighboring village of Rosendale, principally through his personal efforts. Unusual accessed were made to the membership, and he continued as pastor of the united congregations until the year 1844, when he was called to a large and flourishing congregation at Canajoharie. In 1848 he became the pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church of English Neighborhood, where he remained seven years. After a brief visit to Canada, he returned to Ulster County as pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church of Exous and St. Remy Chapel. In 1861 he relinquished his charge of St. Remy, and the next year became minister of a Presbyterian congregation in Galway, Fulton County. From this date until his death his ecclesiastical relations were with the Presbyterian body. In 1866 he left Galway, and became pastor of a congregation at Port Washington, a pleasant summer retreat on the Narrows River, Montauk County, N. J. He died March 26, 1870. Mr. McFarland was distinguished for his scholarship. He was an excellent linguist. "As a preacher, Mr. McFarland was careful in his preparations, which he delighted in making even to the last. There was the care in language, both correctness in treatment, and such use and application of the truth as was suited to excite the spirit of devotion, to awaken love and reverence, and to administer satisfying consolation to the penitent and mourner. His positions McFarland, James Hunter, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Harriusburg, Pa., March 10, 1809; was converted in 1827, and soon after licensed to preach. He was admitted to the presiding elder of the Franklin Circuit in 1839. His ministerial charges were Trenton Circuit, Essex, Bergen Neck Mission, Plainfield, Westchester, Bristolton, Dover, Elkon, Agency for Dickinson College, Westminster, Columbia, Eighth Street, Philadelphia, presiding elder of Reading District, Frankford, Bordentown, and Paterson Associations. In 1835 he was appointed to the New Jersey Conference, his health failed, and he was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference as a supernumerary. In June, 1862, he was appointed chaplain of the United States Hospital in Philadelphia, and in this relation he prosecuted his ministry to the close of his life, March 25, 1863. His last words were addressed to his wife: "Mother, I am dying! Lord Jesus, take me!" McFarland was for more than twenty years a corresponding member of the Academy of Natural Sciences in Philadelphia, and was also a member of the Eastern State Historical Society. He was a faithful and devoted minister of Christ, and did the work of an evangelist successfully. He was warm in his friendship, faithful to the demands of duty, and above everything that looked like a compromise of Christian principle."—Cygert.

McFarlane, Jesse, a female preacher of the Society of Friends, was born about the year 1842; commenced preaching at seventeen, at first to girls and women, but later also to men. After eight years of this service, she became the wife of Dr. Brodie, of Edinburgh, and spent the remainder of her life in more private activity, for the cause of her Master. She died about 1869. Her preaching was impressive, her life one of uncommon purity and devotion, her death triumphant. She wrote a paper on the scriptural authority for the preaching of women, which is inserted in a memoir of her life, in a Memoriam Jessie McFarlane, by J. G. (1882. 12mo). See Friends Review (Phila.), Oct. 12, 1872.

McFerrin, James, a distinguished minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Washington County, Va., March 25, 1784. His ancestors emigrated from Ireland to this country about the year 1740. His father was a farmer, his mother a strict observer of the Lord's day, and esteemed for his sobriety, good judgement, and intelligence. Mr. McFerrin's educational advantages were very limited, the years of his minority being passed on his father's farm, where, however, he acquired habits of industry, sobriety, and enterprise. On his twentieth birthday he was married to Jane Campbell Berry; shortly after which event he removed from Virginia to Rutherford County, Tenn. The country was new, the settlements exposed to depredations by the Indians; hardships and dangers were consequently inseparable from such a condition of things. Mr. McFerrin gave great attention to military tactics, in which he became thoroughly skilled, and, on the breaking out of the war with Great Britain in 1812, he was called into service, and, as captain of a company of volunteers, was engaged in a campaign against the Creek Indians under that renowned man, general Jackson. On account of his brave conduct at the battle in which the Indians were defeated, Mr. McFerrin was elected colonel. In his thirty-sixth year his whole course of life was changed, the result of which was that he thenceforth devoted the rest of the world to the ministry. In 1829 he became a member of the Tennessee Annual Conference, and was appointed to the Jackson Circuit, in the northern part of Alabama. He had charge of this circuit two years. The two subsequent years (1828 and 1829) he travelled the Limestone Circuit, and at the close of this period removed to the vicinity of Courtland, Ala., where he purchased a farm, and remained for several years. This was in the Franklin Circuit, which he travelled in the years 1828 and 1829. During this period he attended the General Conference held in Pittsburg in 1828. He was appointed to the General Conference held in Philadelphia in 1832, held in Philadelphia. At the close of his labors on the Franklin Circuit he was made presiding elder of the Richland District, which he travelled four years. In the year 1838, having determined to remove to Western Tennessee, he deemed it proper to locate for one year, till he should be settled in his new home. In 1838 he was returned to the conference, and appointed to the Wesley Circuit, which he travelled two years. His next appointment was to Randolph and Harmony, for one year; and to the Wesley Circuit for one year (1839), which proved to be the last of his itinerant life. Among his papers is the following record, made in 1839: "Since I joined Conference, Nov. 25, 1823, I have preached 2068 times, baptized 575 adults and 813 infants, and have taken into society 8963 members." Mr. McFerrin died Sept. 4, 1840.

McGaughey, William G., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Bedford County, Tenn., Jan. 12, 1813. He was a gentlemanly and0 able man, and devoted minister of Christ, and did the work of an evangelist successfully. He was warm in his friendship, faithful to the demands of duty, and above everything that looked like a compromise of Christian principle."—Cygert.

McGavin, William, a celebrated Scotish layman and writer, was born in the parish of Auchinleck, Ayrshire, Aug. 12, 1778. His parents were in very moderate circumstances, and young McGavin therefore enjoyed but slender educational advantages. While yet a boy he was apprenticed to a bookseller's shop in Edinburgh, but soon made himself a host of friends by the great literary talent he displayed in frequent contributions to the local newspapers. He was intrusted with the care of an elementary school, which he conducted with skill, though he hated the drudgery of teaching. He took an early opportunity to quit the rostrum, and to seek a livelihood in the counting-house. He became the agent of the British Linen Company's banking establishment in Glasgow. Although this business connection gave him great care and responsibility, McGavin's fondness of writing would not allow him to withdraw altogether from literary labors, and, by habits of unwarried industry, he was enabled to command leisure for the publication of many valuable religious tracts. An ardent opponent of Romanism, he attacked it in a series of papers entitled the "Protestant" (1806-18), which Dr. Robert Hall (Review of Birt's Popery) pronounced "the fullest delineation of the papist system, and the most powerful confutation of its principles, in a popular style." McGavin also edited John Howie's Scotch Worthies, and John Knox's Hist. of the Reformation, and frequently preached to the poor and the humble in the suburbs of Glasgow. He died in 1832. See Chambers's and Thomson's Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen (1865), vol. iii., s. v.; Jamieson, Dict. of Belg. Biog. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brt. and Amer. Authors, vol. ii, s. v. 1840.

McGee, William C., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Paterson, N. J., Aug. 15, 1816, and was educated McGILVARY, Archibald B., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in the Isle of Skye, coast of Scotland, towards the close of the last century. He came to this country in 1806, joined the South Carolina Conference in 1832, and died at Greenville, S. C., June 5, 1863. Before the war he was prominent, modest, and agreeable, a man, a faithful, and good citizen. As a minister of Christ, he was holy, laborious, and useful. — Conference Minutes of the M. E. Church South, ii, 445.

McGlashan, Alexander, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Queenston, Canada, Feb. 25, 1812; pursued his preparatory studies in Geneva, N. Y.; graduated at Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., and in 1840 at the theological seminary in Auburn, N. Y. He was licensed and ordained as an evangelist in 1843, and afterwards commissioned by the American Tract Society as a general agent to the Southern States. While in this employ he built a mariner's church in Mobile, Ala.; subsequently his services were transferred from the tract and colportage efforts to the cause of the Seaman's Friend Society. In 1859 he again removed to the North, and in 1868 commenced work for the cause of the sailor in New York City, where he established a new church, called the Church of the Sea and Land. In 1866 he removed to St. Catharine's, Canada, where he remained until his death, Sept. 9, 1867. Mr. McGlashan was a man of extraordinary Christian zeal, peculiar talents, and marked success. See Wilson, Preach. Hist. Almanac, 1840, p. 378.

McGorral, Bernard, a Roman Catholic priest, was born in Ireland in 1818; went to Paris to pursue an academic course, and there also studied theology; emigrated to this country early in 1842; was engaged for several months as professor of French at St. John's College (Fordham, N. Y.); afterwards became a missionary priest to the West, where he labored for nearly eighteen years, building fifteen or sixteen churches. About 1860 he removed to Brooklyn, where he built the present church of St. Vincent de Paul. He died Oct. 25, 1865. — New Amer. Cyclop. 1866, p. 654.

McHenry, barnabas, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in one of the eastern counties of Virginia Dec. 10, 1767; was converted when only fifteen years of age, and shortly after joined the Church. Called to preach the Gospel, he entered the itineracy in May, 1787, and was appointed to Yadkin Circuit. Thereafter he successively served the cause of his Master in the following appointments: in 1788 at Cumber-land Circuit; in 1789 at Danville; in 1790 at Madison; in 1791 at Cumberlaid; was placed in charge of the district in 1792, and in 1798 of an enlarged number of circuits; in 1794 he was sent to Salt River Circuit; in 1795 was located on account of impaired health; in 1819 was readmitted, and appointed presiding elder of Salt River District, Tennessee Conference, but his health again failed him, and he was finally obliged to retire from active work, and take the place of a supernumerary. He died at Mount Pleasant, near Springfield, Ky., June 16, 1833. "Barnabas McHenry," is the testimony of one, "was a man of strong mind and able in argument. He stood upon the walls of our Zion and defended her bulwarks. In the all was his ministry." Bishop Bacon says, "Of the early years of his ministry little is known, except vague yet cherished traditions of the beauty, unction, and eloquence of his preaching, together with the dangers and hardships to which he was exposed as a pioneer missionary in the wilderness of the South." McHenry led the West Virginia Conference, where a single community produces few such men as Barnabas McHenry and Valentine Cook. They were men by themselves, and their memory would adorn the history of any Church or age. — See Sprague, Annals of the American Church, i, 40, sq.; Finley, Sketches of the M. E. Church South; Minutes of Conference, 1854, 1855, 1856.

McIlvaine (or McIlvain), Charles Pettry, D.D., an eminent divine of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Burlington, New Jersey, June 16, 1799. His father, Joseph McIlvaine, was a leading lawyer and United States senator from New Jersey at the time of his death, in 1826. Charles graduated in 1816 at Princeton; was admitted to deacon's orders July 4, 1820, by bishop White, and, having labored in Christ Church, Georgetown, Md., he received two years later priest's orders from bishop Kemp of Maryland. In 1825 he was consecrated bishop of the episcopal diocese of the United States Military Academy at West Point. In 1837 he became rector of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., where he remained until 1882, when he was consecrated bishop of Ohio. While rector at Brooklyn, he also held the office of president of the society for the purchase of evidences of religion and sacred antiquities in the University of the City of New York. In the episcopacy, Dr. McIlvaine quickly made a name for himself as a man of learning, and of unusual kindness of disposition, not only in his own Church, but among all Christians, both in this country and in Europe. For the last ten years or more he was looked upon as the representative of the Low Churchmen of the Protestant Episcopal Church. In his death (which occurred at Florence, Italy, while on a journey for recreation, March 14, 1873), irenic theology has lost one of its ablest advocates, and the Evangelical Association one of its most active promoters. Bishop McIlvaine was a large contributor to theological literature. His Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity (9th ed. 1857, 12mo, reprinted in England and Scotland), delivered in New York University in 1851, were published by subscription of the Council, and have gone through many editions. During the early part of the controversy arising out of the Oxford tracts, appeared his Oxford Divinity Compared with that of the Romish and Anglican Churches (Phila. 1841, 8vo; Lond. 1841, 8vo), which the Edinburgh Review pronounced "as one of the most indispensable contributions of the Oxford school." In 1856 he published a volume of sermons entitled The Truth and the Life. He also compiled two volumes of Select Family and Parish Sermons (Columbus, Ohio, 1863, 2 vols. 8vo). His other works of a minor character are, The Sinner's Justification before God (N. Y. 1850; Lond. 1851, 12mo). — The Holy Catholic Church (Phila. 1850; Lond. 1844, 16mo). — No Priest, no Alter, no Sacrifice, but Christ (N. Y. 12mo). — Lond. 12mo. — Valedictory Offering; Five Sermons (1859, 12mo) — A Word in Season to Candidates for Confirmation: — The doctrines of the Prot. Episc. Church, as to Confirmation: — Chief Denyer of the Church: — The Truth and the Life; a Series of Twenty-two Discourses (N. Y. 1855, 8vo; Lond. 1855, 8vo); this volume was published at the request of the Convention of the Diocese of Ohio, together with A Memoir of the Rev.Cha. Simon, both published in New York; and contributed articles to the N. Y. (quarterly) Review, the Episcopal (monthly) Observer, the London (monthly) Christian Observer, the Protestant Churchman (New York), the Episcopal Recorder (Phila.), and the Western Episcopalian (Gainesville, Ohio). In 1857 L.L.D. was conferred on him by the University of Oxford, and in 1888 that of L.L.D. by the University of Cambridge. He was distinguished for the soundness and clearness.
McIVER, J. W., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born Sept. 19, 1835; professor of religion in 1858; joined the Memphis Conference in 1861, and filled the Chulahoma and Good Springs circuits. He joined the Confederate army in the late civil war. In 1865 and 1866 he was appointed to the Richland and Cassida circuits; and in 1867 to the Iuka Circuit. He died suddenly, of illness on his way to an appointment, Jan. 17, 1868. "Brother McIvor was a very promising young preacher, much beloved by all the people where he preached, and it is with feelings of deepest sadness that we record his early death." See Conference Minutes of the M. E. Church South, iii, 246.

McKay, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Columbiana County, Ohio, July 7, 1825; pursued his academic course at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa.; studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, Alleghany City, Pa.; was licensed by the Presbytery of Alleghany, and immediately took temporary charge of the Church at Yellow Creek; but, owing to ill-health and other causes, had to give up his labors. He died Jan. 19, 1863. Mr. McKay possessed an extensive knowledge of the Scriptures, and was well versed in theology. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 187.

McKean, James W., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Lawrence County, Pa., April 30, 1833; was educated at Richmond College and Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa. (class of 1859), and at the Western Theological Seminary; in 1862 was licensed and ordained by the Ohio Presbytery, with a view to labor among a domestic missionary in the Lake Superior region; in 1863 was elected principal of the Synodical School at Hopkinton, Iowa, where he continued to labor until May, 1861, when he enlisted in the service of his country. He died while in camp, July 9, 1864. Mr. McKean was an accurate scholar, a good teacher, and a model of Christian piety. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 137.

McKean, Joseph, D.D., LL.D., a Congregational minister, was born April 19, 1776, in Ipswich, Mas.; graduated at Harvard College in 1794; entered the ministry, and was ordained pastor in Milton, Mass., Nov. 17, 1797; resigned Oct. 3, 1804; was elected professor of mathematics in Harvard College in 1806, but declined, and was chosen Boylston professor of rhetoric in 1809. He remained in this position until his health failed. He died in Boston, March 17, 1819, and published a Memoir of the Rev. John Eliot, S.T.D., in the Hist. Coll., and several occasional sermons and addresses. See Sprague, Amals, ii, 414.

McKern, Richard, a Baptist minister, was born in Rawdon, Ireland, Aug. 22, 1804, and emigrated with his parents, while yet a youth, to the British possessions in the West Indies. In 1812 he was appointed superintendent of schools by the government of New England. In 1820 he was converted under the preaching of elder James Munro, a Baptist evangelist, and in 1821 finally joined the Baptists; he began preaching in 1826, and March 10, 1828, became the pastor of a congregation at Rowdon. In May 1829, he was called upon to assume the pastorate of a Baptist congregation at Windsor also, and he thereafter preached both at Rowdon and Windsor until about 1856, when ill health compelled him to withdraw from the ministry. Deprived of the advantages of academic training, he had prepared for himself a course of study while in the ministry, and in 1839 matriculated at King's College, and there graduated in due course of time, and took his degree of B.A. In 1842, his health still too feeble to enter the ministry, he removed to Dartmouth, and established himself in business. He died Aug. 17, 1860, acknowledged by all who knew him to have been "a conspicuous example of unbending Christian integrity, and earnest, steadfast devotion to the cause of Christ." "As a preacher," says one of his contemporaries and associates, "Mr. McKern commanded the full attention of his audience. His manner was earnest and energetic; his subjects practical, and treated with clearness and precision. Their application to the heart and conscience was with great power. His language was free and copious, his voice excellent, and capable of great modulation. As his subject required, he was earnestly winning and persuasive, or denounced with fearful energy the corruptions of the ungodly." See The Christian Messenger (Hali fax), Oct. 17, 1860.

McKendree, Benjamin, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Boston, Mass., Nov. 28, 1783. He was graduated at Williams College in 1804, and at the Union Theological Seminary in 1808, and was ordained in 1807. He was married in 1813 to Miss Sarah H. Jones, of Cairo, Mass., who died in 1829. In 1818 he was installed as minister of the New Church in Fitchburg, Mass., and in 1823 to the First Church of that city. He died Sept. 30, 1842. He was the author of several works on theology and religion.

McKendree, Joseph, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in King William County, Va., July 6, 1757. He was the subject of frequent religious impressions in youth, but he failed to find peace. He was an adjutant and commandant in Washington's army for several years, and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, Sept. 19, 1781; in 1783 he was converted, during the great revival that occurred under the labors of the Rev. John Easter; and entered the itinerancy June 17, 1786. In 1796 he was made presiding elder; in 1801 was sent by the bishops to preside over Kentucky District, and to have general superintendence of the Western Conference, then embracing Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Western Virginia, and part of Illinois; and in 1806 was presiding elder on Cumberland District, with the same supervision of the Conference. At the General Conference in Baltimore, May, 1808, McKendree was finally passed by the highest office in the church—the episcopacy. He died March 5, 1835, at his brother's, near Nashville, Tenn., having preached faithfully almost fifty years, been twelve years a presiding elder, and nearly twenty-seven years a bishop in the Church. Bishop McKendree was one of the last among the preachers and pastors of his age. From the time of his first efforts he was marked as a man of the most vigorous genius, the most genuine modesty, and the most devoted piety. Although not classically educated, his broad and grasping mind went on acquiring and growing in depth and strength, till it had deepened with all that could yield at will a vast and varied knowledge. His imagination was grand and fervid, but always healthy; and could give to his knowledge the freshness of romance, or to his judgment the spell of prophecy. His utterance was copious and forcible, and his voice rich, deep, and flexible. These elements of mind and means, employed by a man of the sanctest heart and the purest faith, and the Holy Ghost, made him not only the most truly eloquent bishop that his Church has ever possessed, but one of the best preachers of any Church or age. As a pastor, his administrative abilities were unrivaled. He found the economical methods of the Church crude and indefinité, and improved them to a systematic vigor; and he was a distinguished promoter of her benevolent institutions. As a man and a Christian he was honored by every class of society. His labors were mighty in laying the deep foundations of evangelical religion in the Mission of the Valley, and his efforts to this end are still a power in the churches, and his memory is blessed. McKENNAN, James William, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington, Pa., Sept. 3, 1804; graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1822, and then studied law at Millersville, Pa.; subsequentiy commenced the study of theology with Dr. John Anderson, of Upper Buffalo Church, Pa.; was licensed by Washington Presbytery in 1828, and in 1829 was ordained and installed pastor of the United churches of Lower Buffalo and West lineage, Pa. In 1835 he accepted a call to Indianapolis, but owing to infirm health he had to resign. He was afterwards engaged in teaching in Wheeling, and at Moundsville, Va., and also as rector in the preparatory department, and adjunct professor of languages in Washington College. He died July 29, 1861. Dr. McKenzie's character was truly remarkable in candor, benevolence, and meekness; in simplicity and directness of purpose; in strength of faith and zeal. His sermons were characterized by plainness and directness of style. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 192.

McKINLEY, John, a minister of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., July 18, 1815. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, which institution he entered when not quite fourteen years of age, and there he graduated with the first honor of his class in 1838. From his very childhood he was deeply versed and looked to the profession of his life, and he therefore, immediately upon the completion of his college course, entered upon the study of theology at the theological seminary of his Church, then under the care of Dr. Samuel B. Wylie. In 1835 Mr. McKinnie was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia. After filling various minor appointments, he was in 1838 called to the pastorate of the Reformed Presbyterian Church at Milton, Pa. Here he labored acceptably and successfully until 1841, when failing health compelled him to withdraw from active work. His labors had been too long, for he failed rapidly, and died Oct. 5 of the same year. All who knew him recognized in his death the extinction of one of the bright lights of the Church." (His only publication is a series of articles on the Slave Trade, which appeared in a weekly periodical at Milton, Pa.) "He was a man of cultivated intellect, of sound and discriminating judgment, of generous sympathies and noble impulses, and fervent piety." See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ix, 57 sq.

McKINLEY, Calvin, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wallkill, Orange County, N. Y., Jan. 12, 1819. He received a good academic education, afterwards studied divinity in the Associate Reformed Seminary at Newbury, N. Y., and was licensed and ordained in 1856. He labored successively at Millport, McKen-Kinney never was exceeded in the boldness of its outline and in the distinctness and prominence of its features. His eloquence was in perfect character. His habit, associated with the name of the Church of Jesus, was ever set upon its recommendation and enforcement; and it was when descending upon the grand Gospel theme of a crucified Saviour or asserting the Church's rights or, when with well-sustained pathos, he mourned the wrongs of Zion, that his mind assumed a gigantic and astonishing form. His discourses, clear, copious, strong, and full of pertinent and often brilliant figures. He has frequently, in his public discourses, caught a flame from the working of his judgment, imagination, and feelings; and then his conception, riveted in the simplicity, energy, and vividity of his language, and the breadth of his allusions, produced an astonishing effect. In America, whose republican institutions he had long loved, the land of enterprise and freedom, was the field which just suited the genius of McKinney; there his powers had full scope for development and exercise.

McKinney, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Bellefonte, Pa., Aug. 26, 1797; graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., in 1817; studied theology in the seminary at Princeton, N. J., and was licensed by Philadelphia Presbytery in 1824; was ordained and became pastor of the Church at Wisconsin, Ohio, in 1829; subsequently became pastor of the Church at Alexandria, Pa., and still later a supply at Oswego, Ill. He died in 1867. Mr. McKinney's life was one of real sacrifice and great usefulness; he was mild, affectionate, trustworthy, and eminently righteous. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 181.

McKinnon, J. M., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Esqueguing, C. W. His early education was commenced at Oneida Institute, in N. Y., in 1837; in 1838 he placed himself under the tuition of Dr. Rae, in Hamilton, C. W. His collegiate studies were pursued in Queen's College, Kingston, C. W., and Knox College, Toronto. In 1844 he was licensed, and became pastor successively of the St. Thomas, Owen Sound, and Beckwith churches. He died Dec. 24, 1865. Mr. McKinnon was a man of sterling integrity and conscientious fidelity; he possessed a competent knowledge of the languages, but excelled in the logical and mathematical faculties. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 478.

McLachlan, James, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1797; was educated in the Glasgow University, and studied divinity in the theological seminary of the Old Burgher section of the Scottish Church. He graduated in 1827, and continued in that denomination; as a missionary to Southern Africa, under the patronage of the London Missionary Society, but after two years' residence at the Cape of Good Hope he was compelled by ill-health to return. In 1830 he was made chaplain of the Seamen's Chapel in the city of Glasgow; but, becoming dissatisfied with his ecclesiastical connection, he joined the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and in 1838 was sent by the Scottish Synod of the Church to Canada West as their missionary. Subsequently he accepted a call from the congregation at Lisbon, N. Y., where he labored for the next six years, Nov. 19, 1834. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 292.

McLain, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born near Bloomsburg, Ohio, April 2, 1824; was educated at the South Salem Academy, Ohio, and studied theology with Dr. Carothers and Rev. H. S. Fullerton, and for a short time under the mind assumed a gigantic and astonishing form. His discourses, clear, copious, strong, and full of pertinent and often brilliant figures. He has frequently, in his public discourses, caught a flame from the working of his judgment, imagination, and feelings; and then his conception, riveted in the simplicity, energy, and vividness of his language, and the breadth of his allusions, produced an astonishing effect. In America, whose republican institutions he had long loved, the land of enterprise and freedom, was the field which just suited the genius of McKinney; there his powers had full scope for development and exercise.

McLane, James Woods, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in Charlestown, N. C., in 1794; received his preparatory training in Phillips' Academy, Andover, Mass.; graduated with high honor at Yale College in 1828, and in 1834 at Andover Theological Seminary; was licensed by the Andover Congregational Association in 1835; was shortly afterward ordained pastor of the Madison Church, Presbyterian Church in New York, and labored there until 1856, when he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Williamsburg, L. I. There he labored with untried zeal until 1863, when he resigned on account of failing health. During his ministry Dr. McLane contributed frequently to the religious press; was for many years director of the American Bible Society, and prepared for this society an improved standard edition of the Bible. He was also for many years collector of the Union Theological Seminary, and secretary of the Church Erection Fund. He died at Brooklyn, N. Y., Feb. 26, 1868. Dr. McLane was a man of fine talents and scholarship; as a preacher, earnest and practical; as a writer, bold and uncompromising. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 168; Appleton, New Amer. Cyclop., 1864, p. 595.

McLaurin, James, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Perthshire, Scotland, in 1796; graduated at the University of Edinburgh; and became pastor of Glascow Church, in 1824. He was licensed and ordained by the presbytery of the Church of Scotland. In 1840 he emigrated to the United States, became pastor successively of the Plainfield and Paw Paw churches, within the bounds of Kalamazoo Presbytery, Mich., and subsequently preached at Birmingham and Fentonville, Mich. He died May 11, 1860. Mr. McLaurin was an able and learned minister. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 161.

McLean, Alexander, a Presbyterian minister, was born in the Island of North Uist, Scotland, in March, 1827. His early advantages were poor—his boyhood being constant a battle for existence against the strong arm of Romanism. He graduated at the Edinburgh University, and afterwards studied theology; while thus engaged he was associated with the Rev. Mr. Hall in the Glasgow Home Mission work. In 1855 he came to Canada, and in 1856 was ordained pastor of the East Puslinch congregation, where he remained till his death, May 25, 1864. Mr. McLean was an effective minister, and an ardent laborer in the mission work. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 872.

McLean, Charles G., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Armagh County, Ireland, March 17, 1797; was educated at the Belfast Grammar School, and studied theology under the Rev. Dr. John M. Mason, of the Associate Reformed Church; was licensed in 1812, and ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church near Gettyburg, Pa., during which period he became an Independent. In 1844 he accepted a call from the Reformed Dutch Church at Fort Plain, N. Y., and in 1852 emigrated to the West, and, in connection with his son-in-law, established a female seminary at Indianapo-lis, Ind. He died July 4, 1860. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 101.

McLeod, Alexander, D.D., a minister of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, was born in the Island of Mull June 12, 1774. His father and grandfather were ministers of the Church of Scotland. In 1792 he came to America and entered Union College, where he graduated in 1798. He was licensed by the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of New York, and in 1802 was ordained pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church. His first publication was Negro Slavery Unjustifiable (N. Y. 1802). In 1803 appeared Menscheg governing the Na- tions; in 1816, Ecclesiastical Catechism: —The Gospel Ministry: —Lectures on the Prophecies of the Old and New Testa- ment: —Life, Labors, and Principles of True Godliness. He was the chief organizer of the American Colonization Soci-McLeod, Cornelius, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born about 1820; joined the Church when but a boy; entered the South Carolina Conference in 1837, and for nearly thirty years labored faithfully and zealously for the cause of the Redeemer. His last appointment was Richland Fork Mission. He died April 3, 1866. "McLeod was a successful laborer, and his name is still beloved by those for whom he labored. Remarkably amiable, he won without effort the affections of those with whom he was associated; and now, though he has passed away, he lives in the hearts of his people."—Conference Minutes of the M. E. Church South, III, 17.

McLeod, Norman, D.D., one of the most noted Scotsmen, was born in Crumplehamp, Argyllshire, June 3, 1812. He was early destined for the ministry by his father, who was at the time of Norman's birth parish minister of Campbeltown, and Norman was to make the fourth generation of the McLeods in the ministry of the Scotch Kirk. To fit him properly for the religious work he was to occupy, he was sent, in the near future, his father accepted a parish near Glasgow, and Norman made his preparatory studies for college at Glasgow. His academic education he obtained at Edinburgh, and he then travelled for some time in Germany and the northern countries of Europe. On his return to Scotland he studied theology at Edinburgh, enjoying especially the counsel and instruction of the celebrated Dr. Chalmers. He was licensed to preach in 1888, and "with the Norse tongue in him, and a vigorous Celtic imagination," he soon found a parish ready to receive him, and was ordained pastor of Loudon, in Ayrshire. Here he labored faithfully until 1843, the year so eventful to the Scotch Kirk. See SCOTLAND. Though Norman McLeod had been a pupil of Dr. Chalmers, and greatly esteemed the doctor, he refused to leave the establishment, and even opposed the Free Church movement. In consequence of this decision to remain a Churchman, many offers of promotion came to his door, and he finally accepted the parish of Dalkeith, where he resided until 1851, when he was called to the Barony Church of Glasgow, whither he removed, and "substantially began the career of his life," among a congregation of from eleven to twelve hundred adults, who, by his guidance not only walked themselves in the path of righteousness, but were the means of promoting Christian holiness and ameliorating the condition of the poor and the forsaken. "Commonly," says his biographer, Dr. Walter G. Smith (in Good Words, Aug. 1873, p. 513), "he preached thrice every Sabbath, besides conducting a large class of his own; and his preaching was no mere stringing together of theological commonplaces, but the expression of earnest thought about the highest things, filled with the wisdom and counsel of God. He had the body of men whom he had to lead unto every good work." Aside from his parish work, extended as it was far beyond the labor usually performed by three ministers, he edited for ten years the Edinburgh Christian Magazine, a periodical of the old religious type, which, while it existed, did much good to the people who read it, but proved a heavy loss both to publisher and editor. In spite of McLeod's connection with this literary venture, Mr. Strahan, the well-known British publisher, had not to court the services of Dr. McLeod when in 1860 the publication of Good Words was projected. The manner in which the doctor replied to the invitation is well worthy of the Christian minister of Glasgow (comp. Contemporary Review, 1872, July, p. 29 sq.). The success of Good Words as a literary venture has been almost unprecedented in the annals of magazine literature. "Wherever the English language is read it has familiarized the people with the great leaders of theological thought; has brought into the cottage specimen of the council of the eminent artists; has diffused information on secular truth; and has been the means of introducing to the poor, poets of eminence and writers of wholesome fiction. Its pages, too, were often graced with the kindly productions of the editor's own pen. Many of the works, now published, which were, and of deservedly popular industry, first appeared in Good Words." A recognition of his able services came to Dr. McLeod in his later years from a quarter where, as a member of the Church outside the Anglican establishment, he could hardly have expected so much—we refer to his appointment, upon the death of Dr. Robert Lee, to the chaplaincy to the queen of England, a honor which never before fell to the lot of any Scotch minister except William Carstairs. In the midst of these varied labors, while still in fullest sympathy with the great work, out of his heart, of the Church, and its progress, and doing its full share of the task, death came upon him, June 16, 1872, causing a loss deeply felt not only by his own Church, but by all evangelical denominations, by the rich and the poor, the high and the low; for it must be borne in mind that his genius, his influence, was great, not only through the door of the Church, but "he considered no work foreign to him if it could be called his Master's business." "Perhaps no other minister of the Church of Scotland was so generally beloved as Mr. McLeod in the days of his usefulness, and of hope for its progress, and of deservedly high popularity, first appeared in Good Words." His death came at an age when it was thought that there could be a successor. Glasgow had known him for many a year as a most unpretentious and yet most indefatigable worker for his brethren's weal in this life and beyond this life; and money-making Glasgow struck work in the middle of the week to show that it had lost its best citizen. It should not be omitted here that Dr. McLeod strove hard to advance the cause of the Indian Mission scheme of the Church of Scotland by not only obtaining for it the contributions of the Church, but by inducing men and women of both high and low degree and education to take the work of preaching the Gospel to the people of India. He himself visited India only a short time before his death to inquire into the success of the Mission and to advance its interests more ably. His latest speech before the last Assembly he attended was to revive the mission at the Edinburgh Church. See SCOTLAND.

McLeod, Xavier Donald, a Roman Catholic priest, was born in New York about 1821, and was the son of the celebrated Presbyterian divine, Dr. Alexander McLeod. He was educated at Columbia College; studied theology; took orders in the Episcopal Church in 1845; sailed for Europe in 1850, and while abroad embraced Roman Catholicism. After his return to this country he devoted himself to the publication of several works of a secular nature, besides a Life of Mary Queen of McLoughlin, F. T., a Roman Catholic priest, was born in the parish of Aglais, Upper Canada, in 1836; was educated at the College of St. Michael, Toronto; studied in the Theological Seminary in the State of New York, and was ordained priest in Brooklyn for that diocese; died in New York Aug. 3, 1868. "He won, by his attention to the best interests of his people, the sincere admiration of all."—New Amer. Cyclop. 1865, p. 550.

McLure, Daniel Milton, a Presbyterian minister, was born near Flat Rock, S. C., Dec. 385; pursued his studies at Davidson College, N.C., and subsequently at Oglesby University, Ga. (class of 1858); studied divinity in the theological seminary at Columbia, S.C.; and in 1861 was licensed to preach, and supplied a Church in Alabama. In 1864 he was regularly ordained and installed pastor of Williamsburg Church, and died Oct. 25, 1865. Mr. McLure's mind was of more than ordinary strength; independence and clearness characterized his thoughts, deliberation and study formed his opinions. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 447.

McMahon, William, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Dumfries, Prince William County, Va., about 1785; was converted at a camp-meeting held near Oldtown, Md.; was appointed class-leader by Peter Cartwright, and afterwards licensed to exhort by the Rev. James Quinn, and soon after to preach, and was received into the travelling connection in 1811. His first appointment was Silver Creek, in the territory of Indiana; in 1812 he was sent to Kentucky, where he remained four years, and travelled the Lexington, Shelby, Jefferson, and Fleming circuits. Under the influence of this ministry thousands were awakened and converted. In 1816 he was transferred to the Mississippi Conference to take charge of a district. He started on his journey with bishop Roberts, but was taken sick at Nashville, and there transferred by bishop McKendree to the Tennessee Conference, and was appointed to Nashville Circuit. After that time he became one of the leading minds of the Tennessee and Memphis Conferences. His health having failed, he located, and removed from North Alabama to De Soto County, Miss., in December, 1864; was readmitted into the Conference at the Conference held at the Memphis Conference, held in the fall of 1841, and was appointed to Holly Springs District, where he remained four years. He continued in the regular work, preaching with a power and success such as but few men ever had, until his health gave way. For several years before his death he sustained either a supernumerary or a superannuated relation. He died about 1867 or 1868.

"Few men, during the present century, have exerted a greater influence upon Methodism in the South. For fifty years he held up the cross and preached the doctrines of Christianity in Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, leaving holy foot-prints, and winning votaries to Christ. He was in many respects a most remarkable man. No one ever had the reputation that he had in North Alabama and Mississippi."—Conference Minutes of the Miss. E. Church South, 1870, s. v.; McCormick, Methodism in Tennessee, ii, 426; Bedford, Hist. Meth. in Kentucky, i, 252.

McMaster, Erasmus D., a noted Presbyterian divine, was born in Pennsylvania, Feb. 4, 1806; graduated at Union College, N.Y., in 1827; was licensed to preach in 1829; was ordained in 1831, and made pastor at the South Hanover Presbyterian Church in Pittsburgh, Pa.; was president of the South Hanover College, Indiana, from 1838 to 1845; and of Miami University, Ohio, from 1845 to 1849; was professor of systematic theology in the New Albany Theological Seminary from 1849 to 1866; and was then appointed to the same chair in the theological seminary of the Northwest. He died at Chicago, Illinois, Dec. 10, 1866. Possessed of a vigorous and thoroughly cultured mind and a well-balanced judgment, McMaster succeeded in all he attempted. "His expositions of Scripture and his religious addresses and sermons were exceedingly rich and instructive, and held the attention of all his hearers; while his influence over his students was unbounded." He published several sermons and addresses, and minor theological treatises. See Drake, Dict. Amer. Biog. s. v.; New Amer. Cyclop. 1866, p. 663.

McMaster, Gilbert, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland, Feb. 13, 1778; came to this country when yet a child, and was educated at Jefferson College, Pa., where he graduated in 1803; was ordained August 8, 1808, and was pastor of Duquesne Church, N. Y., from 1808 to 1846, and of the Church at Princeton, Ind., from 1846 to 1848. He died at New Albany, Ind., March 15, 1854. His works are: An Essay in Defence of Some Fundamental Doctrines of Christianity:—An Analysis of the Shorter Catechism (1815):—An Apology for the Book of Psalms:—The Moral Character of Civil Government considered (1829):—Thoughts on the Church Union of 1846 (1847):—Practical Religion, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 368; Sprague, Annals Amer. Pulps, ix, 46 sq.; Drake, Dict. Amer. Biog. s. v.

McMillan, Edward, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Cumberland County, N. C., Sept. 2, 1804; was educated under Rev. Samuel Doanell and Rev. J. R. Bain, Tenn.; was licensed by Shikellamy's Association in 1827, and ordained in 1828; labored in 1829 in Moulton, Ala.; in 1835, in Bethany, Tenn.; in 1849, in Gallatin, Tenn.; in 1856, in Carlinville, Ill.; and in 1862 became chaplain in the army, in which service he died, Aug. 27, 1864. Mr. McMillan as a preacher was clear and analytical; he was a Christian, comforting, prayerful, as a man naturally kind, noble, and generous. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 220.

McMillan, Gavin, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Antrim County, Ireland, Feb. 6, 1787, and was brought to Charleston, S. C, in August of the same year. He began his education under Rev. John Kel, and pursued his classical studies under the care successively of John Orr, Rev. Thomas Donnelly, Rev. E. Newton, and Mr. Campbell; in 1817 he graduated with honor at the South Carolina College, S.C.; afterwards studied divinity in the Reformed Presbyterian Seminary in Philadelphia, Pa.; was licensed by the Reformed Philadelphia Presbytery at the session of 1821, and in 1822 was installed pastor of Beech Woods Church, at Morning Sun, Ohio, where he labored for fifty years. In 1839 and 1861 he was moderator of the Synod. He died Jan. 25, 1867. Mr. McMillan was eminent as a scholar and theologian; clear and instructive as a preacher; wise and trustful as a counselor. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 590.

McMillan, Gavin Riley, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Fairfield District, S. C., Dec. 24, 1824; was educated in Miami University, Athens, Ohio; graduated in 1848, at the University of the South, any of the two Presbyterian Churches in Philadelphia, Pa.; was licensed in 1850, and in 1851 was ordained pastor of the Neshannock and Hermon churches, in Pennsylvania. In 1859 he accepted a call to the First Reformed Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, but owing to failing health resigned in 1860. Since he settled in the city of his birth, he became president of the Union Female Seminary at Xenia, Ohio. He died Jan. 9, 1865. Mr. McMillan was a man of good talents—the judgment predominating over the imaginative, the practical over the speculative; truthfulness, simplicity, and humility were the principal traits of his character. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 895.

McMillan, Hugh, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Chester District, S. C., February, 1794; pursued his collegiate studies at the University of Penn-sylva, and graduated with the highest honor: was soon after elected professor of languages in Columbia College; but, determining to consecrate himself to the ministry, he entered the theological seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., and in 1828 was licensed to preach. In 1821 he was ordained to the Gospel ministry in the Rock Creek Church, Chester District, S. C. His reputation as a profound linguist being now well established, at the public solicitation he founded an academy at the Brick Church for the primary education of young men. In 1828 he accepted a call to become pastor of the united congregations of Cross-Creek, Warren, and Pine Run, Pa., where he labored for thirty years with great acceptance. Subsequently he studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary in Allegheny City; was licensed in 1852, and ordained and installed pastor of the congregations of Warren and Pine Run, Pa., where he labored until his death, Aug. 1, 1864. Mr. McMillan possessed a clear mind, a warm heart, and a most unassuming spirit; his talents were of a high order; cultivated by thorough education; his sermons were of the richest ingredients and finest mould. See Wilson, Prefab. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 218. (J. L. S.)

McMullen, James Porter, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Abbeville District, S. C., July 21, 1811; graduated at Franklin College, Athens, Georgia, in 1838; studied theology privately, under the direction of his brother, Rev. Dr. McMullen, and in 1841 was licensed and ordained pastor of the United Churches of Mt. Zion, Concord, and Carthage, Ala., and afterwards took charge of Pleasant Ridge and Bethsaida churches, in Greene and Pickens counties, Ala. In 1866 he was appointed by the Executive Committee of Domestic Missions of the General Assembly of the Church south to labor in the Army of Tennessee, in which service he was killed in battle, May 16, 1864. Mr. McMullen was a man of exalted mind and great force of character. See Wilson, Prefab. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 341.

McMurray, William, D.D., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born in Salem, N. Y., in 1784; graduated at Union College in 1804; was tutor in same in 1806-7; was licensed to preach by the Associate Reformed Church in 1808; settled at Lansingburg, N. Y., in 1808-9; entered the Reformed Church as pastor at Rhinebeck Flats, N. Y., in 1812-20; then removed to Market Street Reformed Dutch Church, New York, and died in 1837. His character was distinguished for its beautiful balance and harmony of excellent and gentle qualities. His ministry was remarkable for its fervor, diligence, and uniform success. His Church in New York grew from very small and humble beginnings, and chiefly among a poor people in the Dutch suburbs, to a membership of between five and six hundred communicants. Besides frequent contributions to the periodical press, Dr. McMurray published several valuable occasional discourses (1825, 1833).—Sprague, Annuals, vol. ix.; Corwin, Manual (Dutch) Reformed Church, s. v. (W. D. R. T.)

McNair, John, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born near New Market, Pa., May 28, 1806. He was reared with an earnest regard to his spiritual welfare, and at an early age made a profession of religion. He was educated at Newton Academy, then at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., graduating in 1839; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, N. J.; was licensed in 1841, and ordained in 1843. He labored for several years as a missionary in Pennsylvania, Indiana, and New Jersey; but subsequently he was called to Lancaster, Pa., where he continued to labor for eleven years. During the re- sulting scandal and trial on the anti-masonic war was over returned and took charge of the Church in Strasburg, Pa. He died Jan. 27, 1867. Dr. McNair was retiring in his manner and deportment, possessing, however, a firmness and integrity of purpose which made itself felt in his expressed opinions. His sermons evidenced a high order of talent, being eloquent, yet plain and easily comprehended. See Wilson, Prefab. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 132.

McNeil, Angus Currie, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Robeson County, N. C., May 4, 1812. He early exhibited an intense fondness for learning, and, though he had to struggle against adverse influences, managed to secure a good primary education; his final preparation for college was received in the Donaldson Academy in Fayetteville, N. C., where he discharged the twofold duties of teacher and pupil until 1858, when he entered the University of North Carolina, where he engaged in the study of theology. He was ordained in the Union Seminary at Prince Edward, Va., was licensed in 1845, and ordained and installed pastor of Carthage, Union, and Cypress churches in North Carolina. In 1852 he accepted a call to the pastorate of Centre Ridge Church, Ala., which relation existed until his death in 1889. Mr. McNeil was an able minister, an eloquent orator, and a fine scholar. See Wilson, Prefab. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 110.

McNeil, James E., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Fayetteville, N. C., May 28, 1825; entered North Carolina University at Chapel Hill, N. C.; after one year went to Yale College, New Haven, and subsequently graduated at Doughton College, Newark, N. J., in 1844; studied divinity in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, for two years, and afterwards graduated at Princeton, N. J.; was licensed in 1848, and in 1849 ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Pittsborough, in Chatham County, N. C.; was master of the corresponding secretaries of the American Bible Society at New York in 1858; in 1861 was elected associate editor of the North Carolina Presbyterian, which position he held until 1862, when he entered the Confederate army. He was killed in battle, March 31, 1865. Mr. McNeil was a man of strong will, and greatness in the evidence of thought and action; his distinct individuality was indicative of the highest executive ability; his earnestness and vigor made him effective in every sphere. See Wilson, Prefab. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 356.

McNeil, David, a minister of the (Dutch) Reformed Church, was born in Scotland in 1829; came to this country while yet a youth; graduated at Rutgers College in 1841, and at the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1844. He consecrated himself to the work of domestic missions, for which he was peculiarly fitted by his constitutional vigor and enthusiasm, by his unusual gifts as a public speaker, and by the depth and activity of his piety. He combined the "ingrumin per- servidum Scotorum" with a truly American practicality, and with a consuming zeal which dared all difficulties and endured all trials "for Jesus's sake." Few preachers could be more intensely earnest and solemn in dealing with the higher themes of the Gospel. His ministry appeals to the consciences and the hearts of his hearers. One of his sermons on the last judgment seemed to the writer of this notice as if it were almost inspired. Its realizing power was awful and sublime. But he was equally at home in appealing to the tenderest sensibilities of the tenderest and most masterful music, so deep in all the chords of his mighty harp at will. His devotion to his missionary work in Michigan and Indiana, where all of his ministry was spent, was self-consuming. He lived for the Church of God until his earthly career closed in 1854. His great thought and last uttered wish was in full accordance with his high theological belief and experience. "Oh, that I may be made perfectly holy!"

He was settled successively at Centreville and Constantine, Mich. (1849-52); at South Bend, Ind. (1852-54), and at Constantine (1854-52). But his influence was powerful in all the Reformed churches of the Western States, among which he was a pioneer and a master builder. (W. J. K. T.)

McNelly, George, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born on Drake's Creek, Davidson (now Sumner) County, then territory south of Ohio, now State of Tennessee; was licensed to preach in August, 1814; entered the traveling connection in the autumn of the same year; was ordained deacon in 1816, and elder in 1818, by bishop McKendree. His ministerial life was spent in Tennessee, Ohio, and Kentucky. His educational opportunities were limited, but by hard study, pursued in the midst of the abundant labors of a Methodist itinerant, he obtained a good knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and also of the sciences. He stood quite high, not only as a preacher, but also as a theologian. See McFerrin, Methodism in Tennessee, ii, 384.

McNulty, John, a Presbytery minister, was born at Killala, Ireland, in June, 1829; was educated at Belfast, Ireland, and, after reaching the United States, in the Associate Reformed Seminary at Newburg, N. Y., Union Theological Seminary, New York City, and the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J. In 1858 he was licensed, and in 1854 was ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Richland City, Wisc.; in 1856 accepted a call from the Church of Caldonia in De Korte, Wisc., where he labored zealously until he died, May 15, 1861. Mr. McNulty was a devoted and zealous worker in the cause of Christ. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 111.

McPheters, William D.D., a Presbytery minister, was born in Augusta County, Va., Sept. 28, 1778; was educated at Liberty Hall, Lexington, and was licensed in 1802. Soon after he preached in various parts of Kentucky, extended his labors to Ohio, and took charge of the Church at Danville, Ky., and of a male school. In 1804 he visited the counties of Greenbriar and Monroe. Subsequently he served at New Lebanon and Winding Cove, and was employed as a steward and superintend of Bethel Church. He wasordained in 1806, and took charge of the academy and congregation in Raleigh, N. C., where he remained several years. In 1808 he was principal of a school in Fayetteville, and was afterwards agent of the Domestic Mission Assembly. He died Nov. 7, 1842.—Sprague, Am. salts, iv, 504.

McPherson, John Brakine, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Iredell County, N. C., Aug. 17, 1806; was educated at the academy at Beattie's Ford, N. C.; spent one year in the Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, and finished his studies privately under the Rev. E. H. Morrison, of Davidson College, N. C.; was licensed in 1836, and for several months labored as a missionary in North Carolina. In 1842 he was ordained, but for ten years more continued to labor in the mission work; in 1852 he was called to Prospect Church, in Rowan County, N. C.; in 1855 removed to Cherokee County, and labored there until 1859. He died April 9, 1860. Mr. McPherson was characterized by a patient perseverance and devotion to duty, indicative of the highest grade of spiritual life. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 102.

McPherson, Joseph A., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in West El- ciania Parish, La., Dec. 19, 1835; was educated at the Centenary College, Jackson, La. (class of 1858); spent several years in teaching; entered the Mississippi Conference in 1859; and was appointed to Bolivar Circuit; in 1860 he was transferred to Fort Adams Circuit, and died June 18, 1861. He was a faithful and able minister of the Gospel, and the Church greatly lamented his early loss.—Conference Minutes of the M. E. Ch. South, ii, 917.

McQueen, George, Jr., a Presbyterian missionary, was born in Schenectady, N. Y., in 1826; graduated at Union College, N. Y. in 1849; studied at the seminary at Princeton, N. J.; was licensed and ordained by the presbytery of Albany in 1852, and soon after sailed for Africa, as a member of the Corisco Mission, where he labored until he died, March 25, 1859. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 75.

McReynolds, Robert Young, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Allen County, Kentucky, in 1818; was converted in his sixteenth year; was licensed to preach in his nineteenth year, and joined the Kentucky Conference in 1825. In 1842 he transferred to the Rock River Conference, and was stationed at Galena; in 1843 he was transferred back to the Kentucky Conference, and continued in the regular work until 1845, when he located until 1867. He was next readmitted to the Louisville Conference, and appointed to Portland; in 1868 to Shepherdsville Circuit, and in 1869 to Litchfield Circuit. He died Aug. 25, 1877. Mr. McReynolds was "a bountiful, happy, cheerful, happy, Christian, very zealous and useful in the ministry."—Conference Minutes of the M. E. Ch. Church South, 1870, n. v.

McSwain, William Adney, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Montgomery (now Jasper) County, N. C., Nov. 5, 1814; was converted and joined the Church in 1831; was licensed to preach in 1836, and entered the South Carolina Conference in 1838. He served on the following circuits: Pleasant Grove in 1848; Rutherford in 1844-45; Union in 1846-47, and again in 1854; Neuberry in 1848, and again in 1833-34; Black Swamp in 1849-50. In 1851-52 he was pastor of Trinity Church, Charleston; in 1853 of Spartanburg station; in 1857 tract agent of his Conference; from 1859-62 presiding elder on the Cokesbury District; in 1863-64 pastor of Ninety-six, and in 1865 Lawrence Circuit. He died Jan. 7, 1866. Besides the trustworthiness indicated in his appointments, he served as a delegate to the last two sessions of the Southern General Conference, and was elected to that which was to meet in 1862, and was at the time of his death president of the Sunday-school Society of the South Carolina Conference. A man of rare and varied abilities, ever attained that measure of ability, degree of eminence, and width of popularity which constituted that honor which was so cheerfully and universally awarded by the Church and world to this self-made man. Possessed of great versatility of genius, gifted with all social and conversational powers, and blessed with a singular descriptive faculty, he was well qualified, from his vast fund of general information, to give life, interest, and information to the fireside or social circle. His appearance in the pulpit, his engaging address, flow of language, and tone of voice, and ease and naturalness of manner, his own interest in the subject, with the general persuasiveness of his style, gave to his sermons, which evinced much thought and research, an effectiveness which was only equaled by the great popularity of the preacher himself. He was a favorite divine with all sects of Christians and all classes of people. See Conference Minutes of the M. E. Church South, iii, 17.

McVeagh, Daniel Cleghorn, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Caledonia, Livingston County, N. Y., Oct. 10, 1818; graduated at Union College in 1844; pursued his theological studies in the Seminary of the Associate Reformed Synod of New York; and in 1847 was licensed to preach. He travelled for two or three years as a probationer, and in 1850 was ordained and installed pastor of the Associate Reformed Church of Lyndon, where he labored for sixteen years. He died Sept. 7, 1868. Mr. McVeagh was a faithful pastor, McVickar, John, D.D., an eminent clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at New York in 1787, and was educated at Columbia College (class of 1804), and at Cambridge University, England. He entered the ministry in 1811 as rector at Hyde Park, N.Y., and remained there until 1817, when he was appointed professor of moral philosophy, rhetoric, and belles-lettres in Columbia College. The duties of this position he discharged until 1857, when ill-health obliged him to retire from active duties. In recognition of his services he was created Emeritus professor. He also acted as chaplain on Governor's Island. He died at Bloomingdale, N.Y., Oct. 29, 1868. Dr. McVickar was the author of several valuable works; among them the following deserve our notice: Early Years of Bishop Hobart (1834) — The Professional Years of Bishop Hobart (1836) — A Memoir of the Rev. Edmund D. Griffin, appended to the "Remains of the Rev. E. D. Griffin" (1831, 2 vols. 8vo). See Life of the Rev. John McVickar, D.D., by W. A. McVickar (N.Y. 1871); New Amer. Cyclop. 1868; Drake, Dict. Amer. Biog. a.v.; Allibone, Dict. Brul. and Amer. Authors, ii, 1198.
