PETACH. See PETACH.

Petachia(s), Moses ben-Jacob, a learned rabbi who flourished towards the latter half of the 12th century (Regensburg), is the author of the Sefer ha-Ḳabbalah, also called Sefer ha-Ḳabbalah, in which he relates his travels, made between 1075 and 1090 through Poland, Russia, Tartary, Syria, Mesopotamia, ancient Syria, Persia, etc., and wherein he describes the manners and usages of his co-religionists. It was first printed at Prague (1585), and reprinted by Wagensesil, entitled Iterarium cum versione Wagensesilli, in his Sex exercitaciones varii argumenti (Altorf, 1687; Zolkiew, 1792).

It has been translated into French, with notes, by E. Carmoly, Tour de Monde de Petachia de Rahabahme, traduit en Fransais et accompagné du texte et des notes historiques, geographiques, et litteraires (Paris, 1831); into German by D. Ottensoesser, with a Hebrew commentary (Fürth, 1844); into English by Dr. A. Benisch. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud., iii, 78 sq.; Wolf, Bibl. PETANI, a sort of cakes used anciently in Athens in making libations to the gods. They were substituted for animal sacrifices by the command of Cercopes.

PETAVEL, ALFRED F., a Swiss Protestant clergyman of note, was born near the close of the last century. He studied at the university in Berlin, and was the first recipient from that high school of the doctorate in philosophy. He was greatly instrumental in the establishment of the Swiss Missionary Society, and subsequently took no insconsiderable share in the doings of the Evangelical Alliance. The principal work, however, to which he devoted his best time, his talents, his energies, and his whole heart, was to bring the Jewish people into a more intimate personal contact with the Christians, and it is especially in this respect that his influence has extended beyond his little country. He was a zealous member of the Universal Israelites Alliance and of the Evangelical Alliance. He did not, at first, impress one as a pastor, a missionary, an apostle, a father of the Church, but rather as one of those individuals described in the book of Genesis, who walked with God, who communed with him, like a patriarch or a seer. He died at the age of eighty. The addresses which he delivered were collected under the title of Discourses on Education. His Daughter of Zion, his Letter to the Synagogue of France, and many other writings, will always remain as imperishable records of the zeal which animated him for the re-establishment of the Jews as a people.

PETAVUS, DIOTRIS (also called DENIS PETAV), one of the most celebrated of French scholars, and influential in the councils of the Jesuits, to whose order he belonged, was born at Orleans Aug. 21, 1588. His father, who was a man of learning, seeing strong parts and a genius become visible in his son, endeavored in all possible means to improve them to the utmost. He used to tell his son that he ought to qualify himself so as to be able to attack and confound "the giant of the Allophile," meaning the redoubtable Joseph Scaliger, whose abilities and learning were so great that all possible means were done such service to the Reformed. Young Petavius seems to have entered into his father's views; for he studied very intensively, and afterwards levelled much of his erudition against Scaliger. He joined the study of mathematics with that of belles-lettres; and then applied himself to a course in philosophy, which he began in the College of Orleans, and finished at Paris. After this he maintained theses in Greek and in Latin, which he is said to have understood as well as his native language, the French. In mature years he had free access to the king's library, which he often visited in order to consult Latin and Greek manuscripts. Among other advantages which accompanied his literary pursuits was the friendship of Isaac Casaubon, whom Henry IV called to Paris in 1600. It was at this instigation that Petavius, young as he was, undertook an edition of The Works of Synesius; that is, to correct the Greek from the manuscripts, to translate that part which yet remained to be translated into Latin, and to write notes upon the whole. He was but nineteen when he was made professor of philosophy in the University of Bourges; and spent the two following years in studying the ancient philosophers and mathematicians. In 1604, when Morel, professor of Greek at Paris, published The Works of Chrysostom, some part of Petavius's labors on Synesius was added to them. (From the title of this work we learn that he then Latinized his name Petavus, which he afterwards changed into Petavius. His own edition of The Works of Synesius did not appear till 1612.) He entered the Society of the Jesuits in 1605, and did great honor to it afterwards by his vast and profound erudition. He became zealouis for the Roman Catholic Church; and there was no way of serving it more agreeable to his humor than by criticising and abusing its adversaries. Scaliger was the person he was most bitter against; but he did not spare his friend Casaubon whenever he came in his way. There was no occasion to enter into detail about a man whose whole life was spent in reading and writing books, and in performing the several offices of his order. The history of a learned man is the history of his works; and by the greater part of Petavius's writings were to support his poor discipline. But it must be confessed that in order to perform his task well he made himself a universal scholar. He died at Paris Dec. 11, 1652. In 1638 he published an excellent work entitled Rationale Temporum; it is an abridgment of universal history, from the earliest times down to 1632, digested in chronological order, and supported all the way by references to proper authorities. It went through several editions; many additions and improvements have been made to it, both by Peterius himself, and by Perizonius and others and the Catholic Church have approved of it as far down as to 800, under the title of Compendium Historiae Universalis, in 1697 (12mo). Peterius's chief-d'œuvre is his "Opera de Theologia Dogmatica, nunc primum septem voluminibus comprehensim, in meliorum ordinem tandem, auctoris apud vita, ac libris quibusdam numquam in hoc opere editis l occultatum, Francisci Antonii Zacharium ex eadem Societate Jesu extensum principium Bibliothecae Praefecti dissertationibus, ac notis uerrimis illustratum" (Ven. 1767, 7 vols. fol.). It is full of choice erudition, but unfortunately his death cut it short, and it lacks completeness. Besides other services, Peterius deserves to be acknowledged as the first theologian who brought into proper relations history and dogmatics. Muratori regards him as the restorer of dogmatic theology. In his opinion of Gessenday no less Persaccii Peterius was the most consummate scholar the Jesuits ever had; and indeed we cannot suppose him to have been inferior to the first scholars of any order, while we consider him waging war, as he did frequently with success, against Scaliger, Salmasius, and many like chieftains in the republic of letters. His judgment, as may easily be conceived, was inferior to his learning; and his controversial writings are full of that soundness and spleen which appears so manifest in all the prints of his countenance. Bayle has observed that Peterius did the Societies great service, though unawares and against his intentions. The Jesuit's original design, in the second volume of his Dogmata Theologica, was to represent ingeniously the doctrine of the first three centuries. Having no partisans in the society, he determined to propagate the opinions of the fathers, but only gave a general account of them. By this means he unawares led the public to believe that the fathers entertained false and absurd notions concerning the mystery of the Three Persons; and, against his intentions, furnished arguments and authorities to the Antitrinitarians. When made aware of this, and being willing to prevent the evil consequences which he had not foreseen, he wrote his Preface, in which he labored solely to assist the orthodoxy of the fathers, and thus was forced to contradict what he had previously said; (Gell, Cursus, the Trinity.) Peter (Iliqos, a rock, for the Aram. פֶּרֶט), originally Simon (see below), the leader among the personal disciples of Christ, and afterwards the special apostle to the Jews. We shall treat this important character first in the light of definite information from the New Testament and early Christian writers, and disputed questions under a subsequent head, relegating many minor details to separate articles elsewhere.

1. Authentic History. — 1. His Early Life. — The Scripture notices on this point are few, but not unimportant, and enable us to form some estimate of the character and works of Peter at an early period. Peter was formed, and how he was prepared for his great work. Peter was the son of a man named Jonas (Matt. xvi, 17; John i, 43; xxii, 16), and was brought up in his father's occupation, a fisherman on the sea of Tiberias. The occupation was of course a humble one, but not, as is often assumed, mean or servile, or incompatible with some degree of mental culture. His family were probably in easy circumstances (see below). He and his brother Andrew were partners of John and James, the sons of Zebedee, who had hired servants; and from various indications in the sacred narrative we are led to the conclusion that their social position brought them into contact with his discourses. At an early period he took to the trade of fishermen, supplying some of the important cities on the coasts of that inland lake, may have been tolerably remunerative, while all the necessities of life were cheap and abundant in the singularly rich and fertile district where the apostles resided. Peter did not live, as a mere laboring man, in a hut by the sea-side, but first at Bethsaida, and afterwards in a house at Capernaum belonging to himself or his mother-in-law, which must have been rather a large one, since he received in it not only our Lord and his fellow-disciples, but multitudes who were attracted by the miracles and preaching of Jesus. It is certain that when he left all to follow Christ, he made what he regarded, and what seems to have been admitted by his Master, as being a considerable sacrifice (Matt. xix, 27). The occupations were of such a kind as were conducive to the development of a vigorous, earnest, and practical character, such as he displayed in after-years. The labors, the privations, and the peril of an existence passed in great part upon the waters of that beautiful but stormy lake, were contributory to the energy, endurance, and at nights, were calculated to test and increase his natural powers, his fortitude, energy, and perseverance. In the city he must have been brought into contact with men engaged in traffic, with soldiers and foreigners, and may have thus acquired somewhat of the flexibility and geniality of temperament all but indispensable to the attainment of such personal influence as he exercised in after-life. It is not probable that he and his brother were wholly uneducated. The Jews regarded instruction as a necessity, and legal enactments enforced the attendance of the fathers of the community, maintained by the community. See Education. The statement in Acts iv, 18, that "the council perceived them (i.e. Peter and John) were unlearned and ignorant men," is not incompatible with this assumption. The translation of the passage in the A. V. is rather exaggerated, the word rendered "unlearned" (ἄρετας) being nearly equivalent to "laymen," i.e. men of ordinary education, as contrasted with those who were specially trained in the schools of the rabbins. A man might be thoroughly conversant with the Scriptures, and yet be called "unlearned," and so the rabbins, among whom the opinion was already prevalent that "the letter of Scripture was the mere shell, an earthen vessel containing heavenly treasures, which could only be discovered by those who had been taught to search for the hidden eulogistic meaning." Peter and his kinsmen were probably taught to read the Scriptures in childhood. The history of their country, especially of the great events of early days, must have been familiar to them as attendants at the synagogue, and their attention was there directed to those portions of the Holy Writ from which the Jews derived their anticipations of the Messiah.

The language of the apostles was of course the form of Aramaic spoken in Northern Palestine, a sort of perios, partly Hebrew, but more nearly allied to the Syriac. Hebrew, even in its debased form, was spoken only by men of learning, the leaders of the Phariases and Scribes. The men of Galilee were, however, noted for rough and inexact language, and especially for vulgarities of pronunciation (Matt. xiii, 57; Mark xii, 38; Luke xiv, 8). In Galilee Peter was acquainted with Greek in early life. It is certain, however, that there was more intercourse with foreigners in Galilee than in any district of Palestine, and Greek appears to have been a common, if not the principal, medium of communication. Within a few years after his call Peter seems to have conversed fluently in Græk. with Cornelius, at least there is no indication that an interpreter was employed. It is highly improbable that Cornelius, a Roman soldier, should have used the language of Palestine. The style of both of Peter's epistles indicates a considerable knowledge of Greek; it is pure and accurate, and in grammatical structure equal to that of Paul. That may, however, be accounted for by the fact, for which there is very ancient authority, that Peter employed an interpreter in the composition of his epistles, if not in his ordinary intercourse with foreigners. There are no traces of acquaintance with Greek authors, or of the influence of Greek literature, as we may infer at the time a record of St. John, could we expect it in a person of his station, even had Greek been his mother-tongue. It is on the whole probable that he had some rudimental knowledge of Greek in early life, which may have afterwards been extended when the need was felt, but not more than would enable him to discourse intelligibly on practical and devotional subjects. That he was an affectionate husband, married in early life to a wife who accompanied him in his apostolic journeys, is facts inferred from Scripture, while very ancient traditions, recorded by the Church fathers, agree in the statement that he founded the Church at Rome (see Acts xvi. 3), and by other early but less trustworthy writers, inform us that her name was Perpetua, that she bore a daughter, and perhaps other children, and suffered martyrdom. (See below.)

—It is uncertain at what age Peter was called by our Lord. The general impression of the fathers is that he was an old man at the date of his death, A.D. 64, but this need not imply that he was much older than our Lord. He was probably between thirty and forty years of age at the date of his first call, A.D. 26. That call was preceded by a special preparation. He and his brother Andrew, together with their partners, James and John, the sons of Zebedee, were disciples of John the Baptist (John i, 35). They were in attendance upon him when they were first called to the service of Christ. From the circumstances of that call, which are recorded with graphic minuteness by St. John, we learn some important facts touching their state of mind and the personal character of our apostle. Two disciples, one named by the evangelist himself, were standing with the Baptist at Bethany on the Jordan, when he pointed out Jesus as he walked, and said, Behold the Lamb of God! that is, the antitype of the victim whose blood (as all true Israelites, and they must distinctly under the teaching of John, believe) cleanses them from their sins. At once followed Jesus, and upon his invitation abode with him that day. Andrew then went to his brother Simon, and said to him, We have found the Messias, the Anointed One, of whom they had read in the prophets. Simon went at once, and when Jesus looked on him he said, Thou art Simon the son of Jona; thou shalt be called Cephas. The change of name is of course deeply significant. As son of Jona (a name of doubtful meaning, according to Lampe equivalent to Jonas, a reference to one of the Old Testament), Lange, who has some striking but fanciful observations, signifying dove) be born as a disciple the name Simon, i.e. hearer; but as an apostle, one of the twelve on whom the Church was to be erected, he was hereafter (Acts xxi. 18) to be called Rock or Stone. It seems a strange impression that the words refer primarily to the original character of Simon: that our Lord saw in him a man firm, steadfast, not to be overthrown, though severely tried; and such was generally the view taken by the fathers. But it is perhaps a deeper and truer impression of the name. In his case, it is not as what he was, but as what he would become under his influence—a man with prepositions and capabilities not unfitted for the office he was to hold, but one whose permanence and stability would depend upon union with the living Rock. Thus we may expect to find Simon, as the natural man, one of the old, muttering, whereas Peter, identified with the Rock, will remain firm and immovable to the end. (See below.)

This first call led to no immediate change in Peter's external position. He and his fellow-disciples looked henceforth upon our Lord as their teacher, but were not commanded to follow him as regular disciples. There were several grades of disciples among the Jews, from the occasional bearer to the follower who gave up all other pursuits in order to serve a master. At the conclusion of the discourse he wrought the miracle of feeding the five thousand, and at this time received the name St. John, could we expect it in a person of his station, even had Greek been his mother-tongue. It is on the whole probable that he had some rudimental knowledge of Greek in early life, which may have afterwards been extended when the need was felt, but not more than would enable him to discourse intelligibly on practical and devotional subjects. That he was an affectionate husband, married in early life to a wife who accompanied him in his apostolic journeys, is facts inferred from Scripture, while very ancient traditions, recorded by the Church fathers, agree in the statement that he founded the Church at Rome (see Acts xvi. 3), and by other early but less trustworthy writers, inform us that her name was Perpetua, that she bore a daughter, and perhaps other children, and suffered martyrdom. (See below.)

The second call is recorded by the three other evangelists. It took place on the Sea of Galilee near Capernaum, where the four disciples, Peter, Andrew, James and John, were fishing. A.D. 27. Peter and Andrew were first called. Our Lord then entered Simon Peter's boat, and addressed the multitude on the shore; after the conclusion of the discourse he wrought the miracle of feeding the five thousand, and at this time received the name Peter. He was one of the twelve, and when his name was received, he was a fisherman. John followed. From that time they were certainly enrolled formally among his disciples, and although as yet invested with no official character, accompanied him in his journeys, those especially in the north of Palestine, immediately after that call our Lord went to the house of Peter, where he worked the miracle of healing on Peter's wife's mother, a miracle succeeded by other manifestations of divine power which produced a deep impression upon the people. Some time was passed afterwards in attendance upon our Lord's public ministrations in Galilee, Decapolis, Perea, and Judaea—though at intervals the disciples returned to their own city, and were witnesses of many miracles of the call of Levi, and of their Master's reception of outcasts, whom they in common with their zealous but prejudiced countrymen had despised and shunned. It was a period of training, of mental and spiritual discipline preparatory to their admission to the higher office to which they were destined. Every other call by St. John indicates a man of distinction. He was selected, together with the two sons of Zebedee, to witness the raising of Jarius's daughter.

The special designation of Peter and his eleven fellow-disciples took place some time afterwards, when they were set apart as the special attendants and assistants of our Lord, and as his delegates to go forth wherever he might send them, as apostles, announcers of his kingdom, gifted with supernatural powers as credentials of their supernatural mission (see matt.x,5-14; mark iii, 18-19, the most detailed account; Luke vi. 13). They appear then first to have formally received the name of Apostles, and from that time Simon bore publicly, and as it would seem all but exclusively, the name Peter, which had hitherto been used rather as a characteristic appellation than as a proper name.

From this time there can be no doubt that Peter held the first place among the apostles, to whatever cause his precedence is to be attributed. There was certainly much in his character which marked him as a representative man; both in his strength and in his weakness, in his excellences and his defects he exemplified the changes which the natural man undergoes in the gradual transformation into the spiritual man under the personal influence of the Saviour. The precedence did not depend upon priority of call, or it would have been conferred upon his brother Andrew, or that other disciple who first followed Jesus. It seems scarcely probable that it depended upon seniority, even supposing, which is a mere conjecture, that he was older than his fellow-disciples. The special designation by Christ alone ac-
Peter counted in a satisfactory way for the facts that he is named first in every list of the apostles, is generally addressed by our Lord as their representative, and on the most solemn occasions speaks in their name. Thus when the first great secession took place in consequence of the offense given by our Lord's mystic discourse at Caiphas, he was called to account, 'Simon, Peter, art thou also gone to sleep, as all the others did?' (Matt. xxvi. 51). Peter, who had then been one of the twelve, Will ye also go away? Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life: and we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God.' Thus again at Cæsarea Philippi, soon after the return of the twelve from their first missionary tour, Peter (speaking as before in the name of the twelve, though, as appears from our Lord's words, with a peculiar distinctness of personal conviction) repeated that declaration, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' The confirmation of our apostle in his special position in the Church, his identification with the rock on which that Church is founded, the ratification of the powers and duties attached to the apostolic office, and the promise of permanence to the Church, followed as a reward of the confidence thus expressed. Peter, generally, and most especially on this occasion, as the representative of the apostolic body—a very distinct theory from that which makes him their head or governor in Christ's stead. Even in the time of Cyprian, when connection with the bishop of Rome as Peter's successor was essential, it was not necessary that he should have any powers of jurisdiction or supremacy were supposed to be attached to the admitted precedence of rank. Primus inter pares Peter held no distinct office, and certainly never claimed any powers which did not belong equally to all his fellow-apostles. (See below.)

This great triumph of Peter, however, brought other points of his character into strong relief. The distinction which he then received, and it may be his consciousness of ability, energy, zeal, and absolute devotion to Christ, a person, seem to have developed a natural tendency to rashness and forwardness bordering upon presumption. On this occasion the exhibition of such feelings brought upon him the strongest reproof ever addressed to a disciple by our Lord. In his affection and self-confidence Peter ventured to reject as impossible the announcement of the sufferings and humiliations which Jesus predicted; and he heard the sharp words—'Get thee behind me, Satan, thou art an offence unto me—for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men.' That was Peter's first fall; a rock underfoot, a rock, but what shall we say to that? He was not a defender, but an antagonist and deadly enemy of the faith, when the spiritual should give place to the lower nature in dealing with the things of God. It is remarkable that on other occasions when Peter signaled his faith and devotion he displayed at the time, or immediately after, a more than usual deficiency in spiritual discernment and consistency. Thus a few days after that fall he was selected together with John and James to witness the transfiguration of Christ, but the words which he then uttered prove that he was completely bewildered and unable at the time to comprehend the meaning of the transaction. Thus again, when his zeal and courage prompted him to leave the ship and walk on the water to go to Jesus (Matt. xiv. 29), a sudden failure of faith withdrew the sustaining power; he was about to sink when he was at once preserved and saved by his Master. Such traits, which occur not unfrequently, prepare us for his last great fall, as well as for his conduct after the resurrection, when his natural gifts were perfected and his deficiencies supplied by the 'power from on high.' We find a mixture in his character, which brought him, by being called upon to pay tribute-money for himself and his Lord, but faith had the upper hand, and was rewarded by a significant miracle (Matt. xxi. 23-27). The question which about the same time Peter asked our Lord as to the extent to which forgiveness of sins should be carried

Peter's characteristics become especially prominent. Together with his brother and the two sons of Zebedee he listened to the last awful predictions and warnings delivered to the disciples in reference to the second advent (Matt. xxiii. 37-39; Mark xiv. 31; Luke xxii. 31). He was not a usual witness of these events (Luke xxi. 22). At the last supper Peter seems to have been particularly earnest in the request that the traitor might be pointed out, expressing of course a general feeling, to which some inward consciousness of infirmity may have added force. After the supper he declined the miraculous bread which was put in his hand. This was a significant, almost sacramental act of our Lord in washing his disciple's feet—an occasion on which we find the same mixture of goodness and frailty, humility and deep affection, with a certain taint of self-will, which was at once hushed into submissive reverence by the voice of Jesus. Then too it was that he made those repeated protestations of unalterable fidelity, so soon to be falsified by his miserable fall. That event is, however, of such critical import in its bearings upon the character and position of the apostle, that it cannot be dismissed without a careful, if not an exhaustive discussion. Judas had left the guest-chamber when Peter put the question, Lord, whither goest thou? words which modern theologians generally represent as signifying of idle curiosity or presumption, but in which the early fathers (as Chrysostom and Augustine) recognised the utterance of love and devotion. The answer was a promise that Peter should follow his Master, but accompanied with an intimation of present unfitness in the disciple. Then came the first protestation, which elicited the sharp and stinging rebuke, and the distinct prediction of Peter's denial (John xiii. 38). From that moment his account with those of the other evangelists (Matt. xxvi., 33-35; Mark xiv., 30-31; Luke xvii., 32, 34), it seems evident that with some diversity of circumstances both the protestation and warning were thrice repeated. The tempter was to sift all the disciples, our apostle's faith was to be preserved from falling by the special intercession of Christ, he being thus singled out either as the representative of the whole body, or, as seems more probable, because his character was one which had special need of supernatural aid. It seems to be a matter of two points which enhance the force of the warning and the guilt of Peter, viz. that the cock would crow twice, and that after such warning he repeated his protestation with greater vehemence. Chrysostom, who judges the apostle with fairness and candor, attributes this vehemence to his great love, and more particularly to his delight when he felt that assured that he was not the traitor, yet not without a certain admixture of forwardness and ambition such as had previously been shown in the dispute for pre-eminence. The fiery trial soon came. After the arrest of our Savior, while they were three, Peter, James, and John, were, as on former occasions, selected to be with our Lord, the only witnesses of his passion, where also all three had alike failed to prepare themselves by prayer and watching, the arrest of Jesus took place. Peter did not shrink from the danger. In the same spirit which had dictated his promise he drew his sword, alone against the armed throng, and wounded the servant (γὰν δὲλο, not a servant) of the high-priest, probably the leader of the band. When this bold but unauthorized attempt at rescue was repulsed, he did not yet forsake his Master, but followed him with John in the outer hall, yet this high-priest. There he sat in the outer hall. He must have been in a state of utter confusion: his faith, which from first to last was bound up with hope, his special characteristic, was for the time powerless against temptation. The danger found him unarméd. Thrice, each time with John in the presence, he asked the high-priest for his assent, and thrice he denied him. The triumph of Satan seemed complete. Yet it is evident that it was an obscuration of faith, not an extinction. It needed but a glance of his Lord's eye to bring him to himself. His repentance was instantaneous and effectual. The light in which he himself regarded his conduct is clearly shown by the terms in which it is related by Mark, who in some sense may be regarded as his reporter. The inferences are weighty as regards his personal character, which represents, more completely perhaps than any other in the New Testament, the unconsciousness of this natural and the strength of the spiritual man—still more weighty as bearing upon his relations to the apostolic body, and the claims resting upon the assumption that he stood to them in the place of Christ.

The first miracle recorded in the Gospels, who restored sight to the blind man of Bethsaida after a long period of blindness, was a proof that Peter, though humbled, was not crushed by his fall. He and John were the first to visit the sepulchre; he was the first who entered it. We are told by Luke (in words still used by the Eastern Church as the first salutation on Easter Sunday) and by Paul that Christ appeared to him first among the apostles—he who most needed the comfort was the first who received it, and with it, as may be assumed, an assurance of forgiveness. It is observable, however, that on that occasion he is called by his original name, Simon, not Peter; the higher designation was not restored until he had been publicly re instituted, so to speak, by his Master. That re instituted took place at the Sea of Tiberias (John xxi), an event of the very highest import. We have there indications of his best natural qualities, practical good sense, promptness, and energy: slower than John to recognize their Lord, Peter was the first to reach him: he brought the net to land. The thrice-repeated question of Christ, referring doubtless to the three protestations and denials, was thrice met by answers full of love and faith, and utterly devoid of his hitherto character. No trait of his was so clearly discerned in his later history. He then received the formal commission to feed Christ's sheep; not certainly as one endowed with exclusive or paramount authority, or as distinguished from his fellow-disciples, whose task had been marked by far less aggravating circumstances; rather as one who had forfeited his place, and could not resume it without such an authorization. Then followed the prediction of his martyrdom, in which he was to find the fulfilment of his request to be permitted to follow the Saviour.

With this event closes the first part of Peter's history. It was a period of transition, during which the fisherman of Galilee had been trained, first by the Baptist, then by our Lord, for the great work of his life. He had learned to know the person and appreciate the offices of Christ; while his own character had been chastened and elevated by special privileges and humiliations, both reaching their climax in the last recorded transactions. Henceforth he with his colleagues were to establish and govern the Church founded by their Lord, without the support of his presence.

3. Apostolical Career.—The first part of the Acts of the Apostles is occupied by the record of transactions in nearly all of which Peter stands forth as the recognized leader of the apostles; it being, however, equally clear that he neither exercises nor claims any authority apart from them, much less over them. In the first chapter it is Peter who points out to the disciples (as in all his discourses and writings drawing his arguments from prophecy) the necessity of supplying the place of Judas. He states the qualifications of an apostle, but takes no special part in the election. The candidates are selected by the Lord, who refused to receive the name of high-priest. He left to the searcher of hearts. The extent and limits of Peter's primacy might be inferred with tolerable ac

PETER

The first miracle after Pentecost was wrought by Peter (Acts iii); and John was joined with him in that, as in most important acts of his ministry; but it was Peter who took the cripple by the hand, and bade him “in the name of Jesus of Nazareth rise up and walk,” and when the people ran together to Solomon's porch, where the apostles, following their Master's example, were wont to teach, Peter was the speaker: he convinces the people of their sin, warns them of their danger, points out the fulfilment of prophecy, and the special objects for which God sent his Son first to the children of the old covenant. This speech is at once strikingly characteristic of Peter and a proof of the fundamental harmony between his teaching and the more developed and systematic doctrines of Paul; differing in form, to an extent utterly incompatible with the theory of Baur and Schwegler touching the object of the writer of the Acts: identical in spirit, as trace in the bond of Peter's more especially as the spokesman, when “filled with the Holy Ghost” he confronted the full assembly headed by Annas and Caiphas, produced a deep impression upon those cruel and unscrupulous hypocrites: an impression enhanced by the fact that the words came from comparatively ignorant and unlearned men. The words spoken by both apostles, when commanded not to speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus, have ever since been the watchwords of martyrs (iv. 18, 20).

This first miracle of healing was soon followed by the first miracle of judgment. The first open and deliberate sin against the Holy Ghost—a sin combining ambition, fraud, hypocrisy, and blasphemy—was visited by death, sudden and awful as under the old dispensation. Peter was the minister in this transaction, for he had first opened the gate to penitents (Acts ii. 37, 38), he now closed it to hypocrites. The act stands alone, without a precedent or parallel in the Gospel; but Peter acted simply as an instrument, not pronouncing the sentence, but denouncing the sin, and that in the name of his fellow-apostles and of the Holy Ghost. Penalties similar in kind, though far different in degree, were inflicted or commanded on various occasions by Paul. Peter appears, perhaps in consequence of that act, to have become the object of a reverence bordering; as is would seem, on superstition (Acts v, 15), while the numerous miracles of healing wrought about the same time, showing the true character of the power dwelling in the apostles, gave them a position of influence. Peter kept in contact with the noblest and most interesting character among the Jews, the learned and liberal teacher of Paul, Gamaliel, whose caution, gentleness, and dispassionate candor stand out in strong relief contrasted with his colleagues, but make a faint impression compared with the steadfast and uncompromising principles of the apostles, who, after undergoing an illegal scourging, went forth rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for the name of Jesus. Peter is not specially named in connection with the appointment of deacons, the formation of the regular organization of the Church; but when the Gospel was first preached beyond the precincts of Judea, he and John were at once sent by the apostles to confirm the converts at Samaria, a very important statement at this critical point, proving clearly his subordination to the whole body, of which he was the most active and able member.

Up to this time it may be said that the apostles had one great work, viz. to convince the Jews that Jesus was the Messiah; in that work Peter was the master builder. Paul states that Saul was the principal teacher; hitherto no words but his are specially recorded by the writer of the Acts. Henceforth he remains prominent, but not exclusively prominent, among the propagators of the Gospel. At Samaria he and John established the precedent for the most important rite not expressly enjoined in Holy Writ, viz. confirmation, which the Western Church has always held to belong exclusively to the functions of bishops as successors to the ordinary powers of the apostolate. Then also Peter was confronted with Simon Magus, the first teacher of heresy, See Simon Magus. As in the case of Ananias he had denounced the first sin against holiness, so in this case he first declared the penalty due to the sin called after Simon’s name. About three years later (comp. Acts ix, 26 and Gal. i, 17, 18) we have two accounts of the first meeting of Peter and Paul. In the Acts it is stated generally that Saul was at first distrusted by the disciples, and received by the apostles upon the recommendation of Barnabas. From the Galatians we learn that Paul went to Jerusalem especially to see Peter; that he abode with him fifteen days, and that on his return to Jerusalem the present at the time. It is important to note that this account, which, while it establishes the independence of Paul, marks the position of Peter as the most eminent of the apostles, rests not on the authority of the writer of the Acts, but on that of Paul—as if it were intended to obviate the calumny of the objections touching the mystical relations of the apostles of the Hebrews and the Gentiles. This interview was preceded by other events marking Peter’s position—a general apostolic tour of visitation to the churches hitherto established (dareiphamenou ois diáthermais, Acts ix, 23), in the course of which two great miracles were wrought on Eneas and Tabitha, and in connection with which the most signal transaction after the day of Pentecost is recorded, the baptism of Cornelius. A.D. 52. That was the crown and consummation of Peter’s ministry. Peter, who had first preached the resurrection to the Jews, baptized the first convert, confirmed the first Samaritans, now, without the advice or co-operation of any of his colleagues, under direct communication from heaven, first threw down the barrier which separated proselytes of the gate from Israelites, by effecting the establishment of the original application and full development issued in the complete fusion of the Gentile and Hebrew elements in the Church. The narrative of this event, which stands alone in minute circumstance of incidents and accessories of detail, is recorded by Luke. The chief points to be noted are first, the peculiar fitness of Cornelius, both as a representative of Roman force and nationality, and as a devout and liberal worshipper, to be a recipient of such privileges; and, secondly, the state of the apostle’s own mind. Whatever may have been his feeling or fear touching the heathen, the idea had certainly not yet crossed it that they could become Christians without first becoming Jews. As a loyal and believing Hebrew, he could not contemplate the removal of Gentile disqualifications without a distinct assurance that the enactments of the law which condemned them were abrogated by the divine Legislator. The vision could not therefore have been the product of a subjective impression. It was, strictly speaking, objective, presented to his mind by an external influence. Yet the will of the apostle was not controlled, it was simply written upon the heart of the convert, so that the statute of truce did not at once overcome his reluctance. It was not until his consciousness was fully restored, and he had well considered the meaning of the vision, that he learned that the distinction of clean and unclean was a outward things belonged to a temporary dispensation. It was no mere acquiescence in command, but the development of a spirit full of generous impulses, which found utterance in the words spoken by Peter on that occasion—both in the presence of Cornelius, and afterwards at Jerusalem. His conduct gave him a great offence in his own eyes; but it was not till he had added to it need all his authority, corroborated by a special manifestation of the Holy Ghost, to induce his fellow-apostles to recognize the propriety of this great act, in which both he and they saw an earnest of the admission of Gentiles into the Church on the single condition of spiritual repentance. The establishment of a Church, in great part of Gentile origin, at Antioch, and the mission of Barnabas, between whose family and Peter there were the bonds of near intimacy, set the seal upon the work thus inaugurated by Peter.

This transaction was followed, after an interval of several years, by the imprisonment of our apostle. A.D. 44. Herod Agrippa, having first tested the state of feeling at Jerusalem by the execution of James, one of the most eminent apostles, arrested Peter. The hatred which at that time first showed itself as a popular feeling may most probably be attributed chiefly to the offence given by Peter’s conduct towards Cornelius. His miraculous deliverance marks the close of this second great period of his ministry. The special work assigned to him was completed. He had founded the Church, opened the gates to the Jews, distinctly laid down the conditions of admission. From that time we have no continuous history of Peter. It is quite clear that he retained his rank as the chief apostle, equally so that he neither exercised nor claimed any right to control their proceedings. At Jerusalem the government of the Church devolved upon James the brother of our Lord. In other places Peter seems to have confined his ministrations to his countrymen—as apostle of the circumcision. He left Jerusalem, but it is not said where he went. Certainly not to Rome, where there are no traces of his presence before the last years of his life; he probably remained in Judea, visiting and confirming the churches; some old but not trustworthy traditions represent him as preaching in Cæsarea and other cities on the western coast of Palestine; three or four years later he once more at Jerusalem where the apostles and elders came together to consider the question whether converts should be circumcised. Peter took the lead in that discussion, and urged with remarkable cogency the principles settled in the case of Cornelius. Purifying faith and saving grace, thus removing all distinctions between believers. His arguments, adopted and enforced by James, decided that question at once and forever. It is, however, to be remarked that on that occasion he exercised no one power which Romanists hold to be peculiarly his own. He did not preside at the meeting; he neither summoned nor dismissed it; he neither collected the suffered nor pronounced the decision. It is a disputed question whether Paul and Peter of which we have an account in the Galatians (ii, 1-10) took place at this time. The great majority of critics believe that it did, but this hypothesis has serious difficulties. Lange (Das apostolische Zeitalter, ii, 578) dates the fact about three years after the council. Wieseler has a long excursion to show that it must have occurred after Paul's second apostolic journey. He gives some weighty reasons, but wholly falls in the attempt to account for the presence of Barnabas, a fatal objection to his theory. (See Lange, op. cit., p. 578.) On the other side are Theodorst, Pearson, Eichhorn, Ul-hausen, Meyer, Neander, Howson, Schaff, etc. The only point of real importance was certainly determined before the apostles separated, the work of converting the Gentiles being henceforth specially intrusted to Paul and Barnabas, while the charge of preaching to the circumcision was assigned to the elder apostles, and more particularly to Peter (Gal. ii, 7-9). This arrangement cannot, however, have been an exclusive one. Paul always addressed himself first to the Jews in every city; and Peter, as the apostle of the circumcision, might indeed be contented that Paul, and even Christ for their chiefs, involves no opposition between the apostles themselves, such as the fabulous Clementines and modern infidelity assume. The name of Peter as founder, or joint founder, is not associated with any local Church save those of Corinth, Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria. The bearings upon controversies at critical periods, one of the most important events in the history of the Church. Peter at first applied the principles which he had lately defended, carrying with him the whole apostolic body, and on his arrival at Antioch with the Gentiles, thus showing that he believed all ceremonial distinctions to be abolished by the Gospel—in that he went far beyond the strict letter of the injunctions issued by the council. That step was marked and condemned by certain members of the Church of Jerusalem sent by James. It appeared to them one thing to recognize Gentiles as fellow-Christians, another to admit them to social intercourse, whereby ceremonial defilement would be contracted under the law to which all the apostles, Barnabas and Paul included, acknowledged allegiance. Peter, as the apostle of the circumcision, fearing to give offence to those who were his special charge, at once gave up the point, suppressed or disguised his feelings, and separated himself not from communion, but from social intercourse with the Gentiles. Paul, as the apostle of the Gentiles, said clearly the conversion of the Gentiles was likely to cause a total break of the application of a rule often laid down in his own writings concerning compliance with the prejudices of weak brethren. He held that Peter was infringing a principle, withheld him to the face, and, using the same arguments which Peter had urged at the council, pronounced his conduct to be indefensible. The statement that Peter compelled the Gentiles to Judaism probably means, not that he enjoined circumcision, but that his conduct, if persevered in, would have point with them, since they were naturally taken in steps which might remove the barriers to familiar intercourse with the first apostles of Christ. Peter was wrong, but it was an error of judgment: an act contrary to his own feelings and wishes, in deference to those whom he looked upon as representing the mind of the Church, that he was actuated by selfishness, national pride, or any remains of superstition, is neither asserted nor implied in the strong censure of Paul. Nor, much as we must admire the earnestness and wisdom of Paul, whose clear and vigorous intellect was in the highest degree actuated by anxiety for his own special charge, the Gentile Church, should we overlook Peter's singular humility in submitting to public rebuke from one so much his junior, or his magnanimity both in adopting Paul's conclusions as we must infer that he did from the absence of all trace of continued resistance) and in restoring the broken communion (as is testified by his own written words) to the end of his life (1 Pet. v, 10; 2 Pet. iii, 15, 16). See Paul.

From this time until the date of his Epistles we have no distinct notices in Scripture of Peter's abode or work. The silence may be accounted for by the fact that from that time the great work of propagating the Gospel was committed to the marvellous energies of Paul. Peter was probably employed for the most part in building up and completing the organization of Christian communities in the new districts. He is, however, strong reason to believe that he visited Corinth at an early period; this seems to be implied in several passages of Paul's first epistle to that Church, and it is a natural inference from the statements of Clement of Rome (First Epistle to the Corinthians, c. 4). The fact is positively asserted by Dionysius, bishop of Corinth (A.D. 180 at the latest), a man of excellent judgment, who was not likely to be misinformed, nor to make such an assertion lightly in an epistle addressed to the bishop and Church of Rome. The reference to Peter's visit is probably that to which Barnabas-Barnabas with the Romans, and Paul, even for their chiefs, involves no opposition between the apostles themselves, such as the fabulous Clementines and modern infidelity assume. The name of Peter as founder, or joint founder, is not associated with any local Church save those of Corinth, Rome, and Alexandria. See Paul.
More important in its bearings upon later controversies is the question of Peter's connection with Rome. It may be considered as a settled point that he did not visit Rome before the last year of his life. Too much stress may perhaps be laid on the fact that there is no notice of Peter's labors or death in the liturgical period of the early Church, but that negative evidence is not counterbalanced by any statement of undoubted antiquity. The date given by Eusebius rests upon a miscalculation, and is irreconcilable with the notices of Peter in the Acts of the Apostles. He gives A.D. 42 in the Chronicon (i.e. the usual place text), and says that Peter remained at Rome twenty years. In this he is followed by Jerome, Catal. 1.1 (who gives twenty-five years), and by most Roman Catholic writers. Protestant critics, with scarcely one exception, are unanimous upon this point, and Roman controversialists are far from being agreed in their attempts to remove the difficulty. The most ingenious effort is that of Winidammich (Vindicta Petriani, p. 112 sq.). He assumes that Peter went to Rome immediately after his deliverance from prison (Acts xii), i.e. A.D. 44, and left in company with the apostles in persecution between A.D. 49 and 51. (See below.)

The fact, however, of Peter's martyrdom at Rome rests upon very different grounds. The evidence for it is complete, while there is a total absence of any connection of Peter with the Church of Rome. We have in the first place the certainty of his martyrdom in our Lord's own prediction (John xxii, 18, 19). Clement of Rome, writing before the end of the first century, speaks of it, but does not mention the place, that being of course well known to his readers. Igratio, in the undoubtedly genuine Epistle to the Romans (ch. iv), speaks of Peter in terms which imply a special connection with their Church. Other early notices of less weight coincide with this, as that of Papias (Iuseb. ii, 15), and the apocryphal Presbyteri Petri, quoted by Cyprian. In the second Epistle of Clement, in the Epistle to Soter, bishop of Rome (ap. Iuseb. H. E. ii, 20), states, as a fact universally known, and accounting for the intimate relations between Corinth and Rome, that Peter and Paul both taught in Italy, and suffered martyrdom about the same time. Irenaeus, who was connected with the apostle John, being a disciple of Polycarp, a hearer of that apostle, and thoroughly conversant with Roman matters, bears distinct witness to Peter's presence at Rome (Adv. Her. iii, 1 and 3). It is incredible that he should have been misinformed on such a point. The testimony of Celsus, the liberal and learned Roman presbyter (who speaks of Peter's tomb in the Vatican), that of Origen, Tertullian, and of the ante- and post-Nicene fathers, without a single exception. In short, the churches most nearly connected with Rome, and those least affected by its influence, which was as yet but insensible in the East, concur in the statement that Peter was a joint founder of that Church, and suffered death in that city. What the early fathers do not assert, and indeed implicitly deny, is that Peter was the sole founder or resident bishop of that Church, or that the See of Rome derived from him any claim to supremacy: at the utmost they place him on a footing of equality with Paul. That fact is sufficient for all purposes of fair controversy. The denial of the statements resting on such evidence seems almost to indicate an unconscious consciousness, truly remarkable in those who believe that they have, and who in fact really have, irrefragable grounds for rejecting the pretensions of the papacy. Coteler has collected a large number of passages from the early fathers, in which the See of Peter (Pat. Apost. i, 414; see also Valerianus, Iuseb. H. E. iii, 21), Fabricius observes that this is the general usage of the Greek fathers. It is also to be remarked that when the fathers of the 4th and 5th centuries—for instance, Chrysostom and Augustine—use the words ο ἄγιος or ἀπόστολος, they mean Paul, not Peter—a very weighty fact.

The time and manner of the apostle's martyrdom are less certain. The early writers imply, or distinctly state, that he suffered at or about the same time (Dionysius, saeculum quinto quinto) with Paul, and in the Neroi- nian persecution. All agree that he was not sufficiently determined by our Lord's prophecy. Origen (ap. Iuseb. iii, 1), who could easily ascertain the fact, and, though fanciful in speculation, is not inaccurate in historical matters, says that at his own request he was crucified ικανος σημειωμενος, not in accordance with the head, and not, as generally understood, κηλις άχυρωσις, with his head downwards. (See below.) This statement was generally received by Christian antiquity; nor does it seem inconsistent with the fervent temperment and deep humanity of the apostle to have chosen such a death—one, moreover, not unlikely to have been inflicted in mockery by the instruments of Nero's wanton and ingenious cruelty. The legend found in St. Ambrose is interesting, and may have some foundation in fact. When the persecution began, the Christians at Rome, anxious to preserve their religion, persuaded Peter to take the course which they had spiritual warrant to recommend and to which he consented. "Lord, whither goest thou?" asked the apostle. "I go to Rome," was the answer, "there once more to be crucified." Peter did not believe the words, returned at once and was crucified. See Tillemont, Mem. i, 187, 555. He shows that the account of Ambrose (which is not to be found in the Bened. edit.) is contrary to the apocryphal legend. Later writers rather value it as reflecting upon Peter's want of courage or constancy. That Peter, like all good men, valued his life and suffered reluctantly, may be inferred from our Lord's words (John xxii); but his flight is more in harmony with the principles of a Christian than with the full exposure to persecution. Origen refers to the words the Lord had spoken by our Lord, but quotes an apocryphal work (On St. John, tom. ii).

Thus closes the apostle's life. Some additional facts, not perhaps unimportant, may be accepted on early testimony. From Paul's words it may be inferred with certainty that he did not give up the ties of family life when he forsook his temporal calling. His wife accompanied him in his wanderings. Clement of Alexandria, a writer well informed in matters of ecclesiastical interest, and thoroughly trustworthy, says (Strom. iii, p. 448) that "Peter and Philip had children, and that both took their adoptions to women of their own houses; by means of the doctrine of the Lord penetrated without scandal into the privacy of women's apartments." Peter's wife is believed, on the same authority, to have suffered martyrdom, and to have been supported in the hour of trial by her husband's exhortation. Some critics believe that she is referred to in the salutation at the end of the First Epistle of Peter. The apostle is said to have employed interpreters. Basiliades, an early Gnostic, professed to have derived his system from Clau- dius, one of these interpreters. But the peculiar impression that the apostle did not understand Greek, or did not speak it with fluency. Of far more importance is the statement that St. Mark wrote his Gospel under the teaching of Peter, or that he embodied in that Gospel the substance of our apostle's oral instruc- tions. This statement rests on such slight external evidence, and is corroborated by so many internal indications, that they would scarcely be ques- tioned in the absence of a strong theological bias. (Papias and Clem. Alex., referred to by Eusebius, H. E. ii, 12; Tertullian, 1. Marc. iv, c. 1. 27; Petaurus [on Epiphanius, p. 426] observes that Papias derived his information from John the Presbyter. For other passages, see Fabricius [Bibl. Gr. iii, 192]. The slight discrepancy between Eusebius and Papias indicates independent sources of information.) The fact is doubly important, in its bearings upon the Gospel, and upon the character of our apostle. Chrysostom, who is the most just and judicious commentator, seems first to have drawn attention to the fact that in Mark's Gospel every defect in Peter's character and conduct is brought out clearly, without the slightest extenuation, while many noble acts and peculiar marks of favor are either omitted or stated with far less force than by the other evangelists. Ignatius's Epistle to Peter's influence, even in Mark's style, must be less pure than that of Luke, are traced by modern criticism (Gieseler, quoted by Davidson).

II. Discussion of Particular Points. We subjoin a sketch of the solution of certain special questions touched upon in the above history.

1. Peter's Name. His original appellation Cephas (Κῆφας) occurs in the following passages: John i, 42; 1 Cor. i, 12; iii, 22; ix; xv; 5; Gal. ii, 11; i, 18; ii, 10, 14 (the last three according to the text of Lachmann and Tischendorf). Cephas is the Chaldee word rapeh, "a rock," a rare word, found only in Job xxx, 6 and Jer. iv, 29. It must have been the word actually pronounced by our Lord in Matt. xvi, 18, and on subsequent occasions when the apostle was addressed by him or other Hebrews by his new name. By it he was known to the Corinthian Christians. In the ancient Syriac version of the N. T. (Peshitto), it is used at one place as a name where the Greek kēfās is in the text. When we consider that our Lord and the apostles spoke Chaldee, and that therefore (as already remarked) the apostle must always have been addressed as Cephas, it is certainly remarkable that throughout the Gospels, no less than ninety-seven times, with one exception only, the name should be given in the Greek form, which was of later introduction, and unintelligible to Hebrews, though intelligible to the far wider Gentile world among which the Gospel was about to begin its course. Even in Mark, where more Chaldee words and phrases are retained than in all the other Gospels put together, this is the case. It is as if in our English Bibles the name were uniformly given, not Peter, but Rock; and it suggests that the meaning contained in the appellation is of more vital importance, and intended to be more carefully seized at each recurrence, than we are apt to recollect. It is clearly the name that the Chaldee name to its Greek synonym is well marked in the interchange of the two in Gal. ii, 7, 8, 9 (Stanley, Apostolic Age, p. 116). The apostle in his companionship with Christ, and up to the time of the Lord's ascension, seems to have been given the least he of the name, always so called by Jesus himself (Matt. xxvi, 25; Mark xiv, 37; Luke xxii, 31; John xxi, 15), and apparently also by the disciples (Luke xxiv, 34; Acts xx, 14). But after the extension of the apostolic circle and its relations (comp. Acts x, 18), the apostle began to be known, in order to distinguish him from others called Simon, as Simon Peter; the name of Peter, which had at first been given him as a special mark of esteem, being added, as that of a father often was in other cases; and, in the course of time, it seems that the latter name superseded the former. Hence the evangelists call the apostle Peter oftener than Simon Peter. As to the epistles of Paul, he is always called Cephas in 1 Cor., but in the other epistles oftener Peter. As above suggested, the appellation thus bestowed seems to have had reference to the disciple individually and personally. Attaching himself to Christ, he would partake of that blessed spiritual influence whereby he would be enabled, in spite of the vicissitudes of his naturally impassive character, to hold with persevering grasp the faith he now embraced. He would become rooted and grounded in the truth, and not be carried away to destruction by the various winds of false doctrine and the crafty assaults of Satan. The name imposed was continually to remind him of what he ought to be as a follower of Christ. Compare Wieseler, Chronologie des Apostolischen Zeitalters, p. 381.

2. Peter's Domestic Circumstances. Of the family and connections of our apostle we know but little. His father is named in the Gospel history, and his mother's name seems to have been Joanna (see Coteler, Ad Const. Apostol, ii, 83). It appears from John xxi that he did not entirely give up his occupation as a fisherman on his entrance to the company of Christ's disciples. Luke iv, 38 and 1 Cor. ix, 5 seem to show that he was married, and so the Church fathers often affirm (comp. Coteler, ad Clem. Recogn. vii, 25; Grabe, Ad Speic. Patr., § i, p. 380). But the tradition of the name of his wife varies between Bavardus and Perpetua (see Meyer, De Petri Conjugio, Vitae, 1684). It is said that she suffered martyrdom before Peter (Clem. Alex. Stromit, vii, p. 312). Some affirm that he left children (ibid. iii, p. 192; Euseb. iii, 80), among whom a daughter, Petronilla, is named (comp. Acta Sanctor. 80; Mai, viii, 420 sq.). More recently Rauch (Neues u. Altes, Journ. Theol. xviii, 401) strives to find a son of Peter mentioned in 1 Pet. v, 13, and Neander (Ffussans. ii, 520) follows him, supposing that the "electected together with you" (the word church in the English version is not in the original) refers to the wife of Peter. The personage of Peter at the time of his martyrdom is described in the Chronicle of Eusebius, p. 256, in an absurd passage, of which the sense appears to be this: He was an old man, two thirds of a century old; bald in front, knob-haired (? cornutus); with his body a little flexion, somewhat pale, with dark eyes, a large beard, long nose, joined eyebrows, upright in posture; intelligently, impulsive, and timid. Comp. the description in Niceph. H. E. ii, 87, p. 165; and Fagginii, De Rom. P. H. E. Exerc. xxv, p. 458 sq.

3. Peter's Prominence as an Apostle. From such passages as Matt. xvii, 1; Mark ix, 1; xiv, 83, there can be no doubt that Peter was among the most beloved of Christ's disciples; and his eminence among the apostles depended partly on the fact that he had been one of the first of them, and partly on his own peculiar traits. Sometimes he speaks in the name of the twelve (Matt. xix, 27; Luke xii, 41). Sometimes he answers when questions are addressed to them all (Matt. xvi, 16; Mark vii, 29); sometimes Jesus addresses him in the place of all (Matt. xxvi, 40). But that he passed, out of the circle of the apostles, as a sort of representative, cannot be certainly inferred from Matt. xvi, 24, even if it be supposable in itself. This position of Peter becomes more decided after the ascension of Jesus, and perhaps in consequence of the saying in John xx, 16 sq. Peter now seems to have become the first at least of the twelve (Matt. ii, 15; ii, 14 sq.; iv, 8 sq.; v, 27 sq.), his word is decisive (Acts v, 7 sq.), and he is named with "the other apostles" (Acts ii, 87; v, 29. Comp. Chrysost. on John, Hom. xxxviii, p. 525). The early Protestant polemic divines should not have blinded themselves to this observation. (See Baumgarten, Polen, iii, 370 sq.) The case is a natural one, when we compare Peter's character with that of the other apostles, and contributes nothing at all to fixing the primacy in him, after the view of the Roman Church. It may even be granted that the custom of looking upon Peter as the chief of the apostles was the cause of his always having the first place in the company of apostles in the Church traditions. The old account that Peter alone of the apostles was baptized by Jesus himself agrees well with this view. (Comp. Coteler, Aen. Herm. Past. iii, 16.)

As to the meaning of the passage Matt. xvi, 18, there is much dispute. The accounts which have been given of the precise import of this declaration may be summed up under these heads: 1. That our Lord spoke of himself, and not of Peter, as the rock upon which the Church was to be built. 2. This interpretation expresses a great truth, but it is irreconcilable with the context, and could scarcely have occurred to an unbiased reader, and certainly does not gave the primary and literal meaning of our Lord's words. It has been defended, however, by candid and learned critics, as Glass and Dathe. 2. That our Lord addresses Peter as the type or representative of the Church, in his capacity of chief disciple. This is Augustine's view, and it was widely adopted in the early Church. It is hardly borne out by the argument, and it seems to give the false metaphor. The Church would in that case be founded on itself in its type. 3. That the rock was not the person of Peter, but his confession of faith. This rests on much better authority, and is supported by stronger arguments. Our Lord's question, when put to the disciples, was, through the answer came through the mouth of Peter, always ready to be the spokesman, it did not the less express the belief of the whole body. So in other passages (noted below) the apostles generally, not Peter by himself, are spoken of as foundations of the Church. Every one still acknowledges that Christ, as before suggested, is pre-eminently the first foundation, the Rock, on which every true disciple, on which Peter himself, must be built. It was by his faithful confession that he showed he was upon the rock. He was then Peter indissolubly united thereto, and it was the rock in the view of which Christ had long before given him the name. Such an interpretation may seem to accord best with our Lord's address, "Thou art Peter—"the firm maintainer of essential truth, a truth by the faithful confession of the rock of Peter, of the apostles, living stones of his Church (John xvii, 8; Rom. x, 9; 1 Cor. iii, 11). Thus it was not the personal rock Peter, but the material rock of Gospel truth, the adherence to which was the test of discipleship. This view, that it was Peter's confession on which Christ would build his Church, has been held by many able expositors. For instance, Hilary says, "Super hanc ignitum confessionis petram ecclesiae edificavit est" (De Trin. lib. vii, 36. Op. [Par. 1695], col. 908; comp. lib. ii, 28, col. 808). See also Cyril of Alexandria (De Sunt. Trin. dial. iv. Op. [Lut. 1668], tom. v, pars i, p. 507); Chrysostom (In Matt. hom. liv. Op. [Par. 1718-36], vii, 548); and the writer under the name of Nyssen (Test. de Advert. Dom. ad. Jud. in Greg. Nyssen. Op. [Par. 1698], ii, 162). Yet it seems to have been originally suggested as an explanation, rather than an interpretation, which it certainly is not in a literal sense. 4. That Peter himself was the rock on which the Church would be built, as the representative of the apostles, as professing in their name the true faith, and as intrusted specially with the duty of preaching it, and of carrying on the great work of the Church. Many learned and candid Protestant divines have acquiesced in this view (e.g. Pearson, Hammond, Bengel, Rosenmüller, Schleusner, Kunoil, Bloomfield, etc.). It is borne out by the facts that Peter on the day of Pentecost, and during the whole period of the establishment of the Church, was the chief agent in all the work of the ministry, in preaching, in admitting both Jews and Gentiles, and laying down the terms of communion. This view is wholly incompatibil with the Rock of the Church rises up in him the representative of Christ, not personally, but in virtue of an office essential to the permanent existence and authority of the Church. Passaglia, the latest and ablest controversialist, takes more pains to refute this than any other view; but wholly without success: it is clear that Peter did not retain, even admitting that he did at first hold, any primacy of rank after completing his own special work; that he never exercised any authority over or independently of the other apostles; that he certainly did not transmit whatever he held or held for his colleagues after his decease. At Jerusalem, even during his residence there, the chief authority rested with St. James; nor is there any trace of a central power or jurisdiction for centuries after the foundation of the Church. The same arguments, multae multiâles, apply to the keys. The promise was literally fulfilled when Peter preached at Pentecost, admitted the first converts to baptism, confirmed the Samaritans, and received Cornelius, the representative of the Gentiles, into the Church. Whatever privileges may have belonged to him personally died with him. The authority required of the person who represents the Church was believed by the fathers to be deposited in the episcopate, as representing the apostolic body, and succeeding to its claims. See Rock. The passage is connected with another in the claims of the papacy, namely, "Unto thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven," etc. (Matt. xvi, 19). The force of both these passages is greatly impaired for the purpose for which Catholics render them, by the circumstance that whatever of power or authority they may be supposed to confer upon Peter must be regarded as shared by him with the other apostles, inasmuch as to them also are ascribed in other passages the same qualities and powers which are promised to Peter in those under consideration. If by the former of these passages are we to understand that the Church is built upon the apostle Peter, it is not on him alone that personal authority is devolved, but upon all the apostles (Ephes. ii, 20); and in the look of Revelation we are told that on the twelve foundations of the New Jerusalem (the Christian Church) are inscribed "the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb" (xxi, 14). As for the description of Christ as the one person of the Church, it was in all its essential parts repeated by our Lord to the other disciples immediately before his passion, as announcing a privilege which, as his apostles, they were to possess in common (Matt. xviii, 18; John xxi, 21). It is, moreover, uncertain in what sense our Lord used the language in question. In both cases their words are metaphorical; and nothing can be more unsafe than to build a theological dogma upon language of which the meaning is not clear, and to which, from the earliest ages, different interpretations have been affixed. Finally, even granting the correctness of the interpretation which Catholics put upon these verses, it will not bear out the conclusion they would deduce from them, inasmuch as the judicial supremacy of Peter over the other apostles does not necessarily follow from his possessing authority over the Church. On the other side, it is certain that there is no instance on record of the apostle's having ever claimed or exercised this supposed power; but, on the contrary, he is more than once represented as submitting to an exercise of power upon the part of others, as when Peter, on one occasion, he went as a gosseenger from the apostles assembled in Jerusalem to the Christians in Samaria (Acts viii, 14), and when he received a rebuke from Paul, as already noticed. This circumstance is so fatal, indeed, to the pretensions which have been urged in favor of his supremacy over the other apostles, that from a very early age attempts have been made to set aside its force by the hypothesis that it is not of Peter the apostle, but of another person of the same name, that Paul speaks in the passage (Lactant. de Mort. doc. i, 1). This hypothesis, however, is so plainly contradicted by the words of Paul, who explicitly ascribes apostleship to the Peter of whom he writes, that it is astonishing how it could have been admitted even by the most blinded zealots (vers. 8, 9). While, however, it is pretty well established that Peter was at the head of the judicial supremacy over the other apostles, it would, perhaps, be going too far to affirm that no dignity or primacy whatsoever was conceded to him on the part of his brethren. His superiority in point of age, his distinguishing services, his permanence of his ascension, and his prominent part which he had ever taken in his Master's affairs, both before his death and after his ascension, furnished sufficient grounds for his being raised to a position of respect and of moral influence in the Church and among his brother apostles. To this some counteance is given by the circumstances that he is called "the first" (ωριστός) by Matthew (x. 2) and this apparently not merely as a numerical, but as an honorary distinction; that when the apostles are mentioned as a body, it is frequently by the phrase "Peter and the eleven," or "Peter and the rest of the apostles," or something similar; and that when Paul went up to Jerusalem to show his revelation it was Peter particularly that the visit was paid. These circumstances, taken in connection with the prevalent voice of Christian antiquity, would seem to authorize the opinion that Peter occupied some such position as that of moponarch over the Church in Jerusalem, that he held the Catholic see of the Church (Acts x. 9), and an energetic disposition, which showed itself sometimes as resolution, sometimes as boldness (Matt. xiv, 29), and temper (John xviii, 10). His temperament was choleric, and he easily passed from one exreme to another (John xiii, 38). For parallel between Peter and John, see Chrysostom, in hom.
(xvii, 522). But how could such a man fall into a repealed denial of his Lord? This will always remain a difficult psychological problem; but it is not necessary on this account to refer to Satan's power (Olahsenau, Bibl. Comment. ii, 482 sq.). When Jesus predicted that Peter his coming falling, the apostle may have thought only of a formal inquiry; and the arrest of Christ drove from his mind all recollection of Christ's warning words. The first denial was the hasty repulse of a troublesome and curious question. Peter thought it not worth while to converse with a girl at such a moment, when all his thoughts were taken up with the fate of his Master; and his repulse would be the more resolute, the more he wished to avoid being driven by the curious and pressing crowd out of the vicinity of the beloved Saviour. The second and third question compeled him still to deny, unless he would confess or leave the place; but the nearness of the Lord held him fast. Besides they are the questions only of curious servants, and he is in danger, if he be acknowledged for him a butcher of widows, a profiteer of the curse to the coarse multitude, and thus of failing in his purpose. Thus again and again, with increasing hesitation, he utters his denial. Now the cock-crowing reminisces him of his Master's warning, and now at length he reflects that a denial, even before such unautho-ized inquiries, is yet really a denial. In this view some think that Peter's thoughts were continually on his Master, and that possibly the fear of personal danger had no part in influencing his course. The expression /jull of Peter, often used, is in any case rather strong.

terica ad narrationem. Eminent de summa P. terneliarii (Er-

5. Paul's Dispute with Peter.—With reference to the occurrence mentioned in Gal. ii, 11, from which some have derived the conclusion that Peter harboured from the servile fear of men, we may remark that the case is altogether different from the preceding, and has much to do with the apostle's dogmatic convictions. It is known that the admission of the heathen to the Church was strange to Peter at first, and that he could only be induced to preach to them after the vision of Acts (Acts x, 10; xi, 4 sq.). Then he was the first to baptize heathen, and announced in unmistakable language that the yoke of the Mosaic law must not be placed on the Gentile converts (Acts xv, 7 sq.). But it is quite possible that he was still anxious for Christianity to be first firmly rooted among the Jews, and thus he seems after this occurrence to have turned his preaching exclusively to the Jews (comp. Gal. ii, 7), his first epistle also being intended only for Jewish readers. The affair at Anioch (Gal. ii, 12) seems to show that he was still anxious to hold the line expressed in Acts xv, 7 sq.; if, indeed, as appears to be the case, it was later than the latter. For even if Peter found it necessary to respect the prejudices of the party of James, still the necessity of firmness and consistency cannot be denied; although, on the other hand, we must not confound Paul's view of Peter with that of Paul. It is known (comp. Euseb. i, 12, 1) that in the early Church many referred the entire statement to another Cephas, one of the seventy disciples, who afterwards became bishop of Iconium, and nearly all the fathers, which express the spirit of the Molkenbuhr, Quod Cephas Gal. ii, non sit Petrus Ap. (Monasteri, 1808). See against this view Dieyling, Obseruat. ii, 520 sq. On another view of the church fathers, see Neander, Pfem. i, 292, note. It appears also that Peter, from the fact of his being one with a party of his fellow Christians called themselves by his name, that Peter was afterwards recognised as head of this class, in distinction from the Pauline Christians.
6. As to the time of Peter's journey to Rome, the Church fathers do not quite agree. Eusebius says in his Chron. (i, 42) that Peter went to Rome in the second year of Claudius Caesar, after founding the first Church in Antioch; and Jerome, in his version, adds that he remained there twenty-five years, preaching the Gospel, and acting as bishop of the city (comp. also Jerome, Script. Execl. p. 1). Yet this statement ap-serts very doubtful, for three reasons: (1) Because, although we learn from Acts xii, 17 that Peter left Jerusalem for a time after the death of James the elder, yet he certainly cannot have left Palestine before the events recorded in Acts xv. (2) Because the mention of the origin of the Church in Antioch, connected by the fathers with Peter's journey to Rome, cannot be easily reconciled with Acts xi, 19 sq. (3) Because, if Peter had been bishop in Rome when Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, and afterwards when he was imprisoned in Rome, it is not possible for him to contain words of greeting to Peter, and the epistles written from Rome similar messages from Peter; the more as these epistles are very rich in such messages; but nothing of the kind appears. We may well doubt, too, whether, if Peter had been bishop or even founder of the Roman Church, Paul's principles and method (see Rom. xv, 20, 23 sq.; xxviii, 2; 2 Cor. x, 16) would have allowed him to write this epistle to Rome at all.
Eusebius seems to have drawn his account from Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius (Euseb. H. E. ii, 10), the former of whom quoted from a remark of Justin Martyr (Apol. ii, 69), which rests upon an accidental error of language; this father referring to Simon the Magician an inscription which belonged to the Saline-Romish deity Semo (Hug. Eusebi. ii, 69 sq.; Credner, Eusebius, i, 925 sq.; Comp. Scholz, in Rom. ii, 644.
Miser. 1844). Now Peter had once publiclly rebuked this Simon (Acts xii, 18 sq.); this fact, connected with the inscription, gave rise to the story of Peter's residence in Rome under Claudius, in whose reign the inscription originated. After this detection of the falsity of the story of Peter's residence in Rome, it is truly wonderful that Bertholdt (Eusebius v, 2865) should defend the account, and found a critical conjecture upon it. Further, the Armenian Chronicle of Eusebius refers to the following page of the document:

Eusebius refers to this statement of the third year of Calus Caligula.

But the account found in Irenaeus (Iren. iii, 1) differs materially from that above noticed. He tells us that Peter and Paul were in Rome, and there founded a church in company; and Eusebius (ii. 25, in a quotation published as early as 1596 under the name of Papias, possibly with a historical error) says that they suffered martyrdom together (Peter being crucified, according to Origen, in Eusebius, iii, 1; Nisich ii, 26).

Eusebius in his Chronicle places their martyrdom, according to his reckoning of twenty-five years for Peter's episcopacy, in the fourth year of Nero's reign, which is all the more remarkable, since the middle of October, A.D. 67, to the same time in A.D. 68. This joint martyrdom of Paul and Peter (without however any special mention of the manner of Peter's crucifixion, comp. Nandor, I. x, 54) is also mentioned by Tertullian (Praelections, Hort. 26) and Lactantius (Mem. Persic. 2; Instit. Div. iv, 21). The graves of both apostles were pointed out in Rome as early as the close of the second century (Euseb. ii, 25). Yet the whole story rests ultimately on the testimony of Dionysius alone, who is not a very reliable witness, and is probably to be relegated to the regions of the fabulous. In Clemens Romanus, 1 to Cor. v, and Ignatius, to the Roman, v, settle nothing.) Thus, on the one hand, we are not at liberty to reject all doubts as to the truth of this account with Berthold (loc. cit.) as hypercritical, or with Gieseler (Ch. Hist. 1, 52 sq. ed.) as partisan polemic, nor on the other hand, do we have to deprive the early Christians of all their right to the interpretation of 1 Peter 18, where at an early date a jargon was understood to stand for Rome (Euseb. xv, 2; Nisich. H. E. ii, 15. Comp. Baur, p. 215). The genetic development of the whole story is attempted by Baur (in the Tübingen Zeitschrift, f. Theol. 1831, iv, 162 sq. Comp. his Paulus, p. 214 sq. 671 sq.) deserves close attention. But compare Neander, I. Paulus, 219 sq. and further against any visit to Rome by Peter, see M. Veilens, Libr. quo Petrum Romanum non viderunt deserunt (1596); Vedelius, De tempore urbsque Epicapitis Petri (Genova, 1624); Spanheim, De finta profectione Petri Ap. in urbem Rom (Lug. Bat. 1679; also in his Opera, ii, 881 sq.); also an anonymous writer in the Biblioth. for theol. Schriftbande, vol. iv, No. 1 (extract in the Leips. Lit.-Ztg. 1800, No. 130); Mayerhoff, Einl. in d. Petrin. Schriften, p. 73 sq.; Reiche, Erklär. des Briefe an d. Römer, i, 59 sq. Von Ammon, Fortbild. iv, 322 sq.; Ellendoer, Ist Petrus in Rom. u. Bischof d. Rom. Kirche gewesen? (Darmstadt, 1841); translated in the Bibliotheca Sacra, New York, 1855. See also Blettermann, Der Bischof (Dusseldorf, 1842). On the other side of the question, the older writings are enumerated by Fabriuces, Lux Eysze, p. 97 sq. The usual arguments of the Catholics are given by Bellarmine, Contr. de Rom. Pontif. lib. ii. But the chief work on that side is still that of Conzern. De Romana sit hinc aetate princip. Apostol. lib. ii (Venice, 1578; revised by Constantinus, Rom. 1770). Comp. esp. Foggini, De Romano Petri sinuera, etc. (Flor. 1741). On the same side in general, though with many modifications, are the following later writers: Meyrat, Kien. Bibl. 351 sq., who holds that Peter was in Rome twice. See contra, Baur, Op. cit. p. 181 sq.; Herbst, in the Tübingen Kathol.-theol. Quaestl. 1890, iv, 1, who places Peter in Rome at least during the last years of Nero's reign, though but for a short time. See, however, Baur, Op. cit. p. 161 sq.; also Oschelens, und Kri. 1836, p. 940 sq., in answer to Baur; Stenglein, in the Tübingen Quaestlach. 1840, 2d and 3d parts, who makes Peter to have visited Rome in the second year of Claudius; to have been driven away by the well-known edict of that emperor, and to have died under Nero. Comp. also Haiden, De situame P. Romano (Prag. 1761), and Windischmann, Vindiciae Petri (Ratisb. 1886). It is not in the least necessary for those who oppose the Romish Church, which makes Peter first bishop of Rome (see Van Til, De Petrus

PETER

Roma Martyre non pontifice [Lug. Bat. 1719], and grounds on this the primacy of the pope (Matteschuz, Opus domini, adversus Iherodot[es sic!], p. 212 sq.; Bel- larmine, Contr. de Rom. Pontif. ii, 3, and elsewhere), to be influenced in the question of Peter's journey by these views, insanely as this primacy, when all the historical evidence is considered, is the result of a spire of every effort to defend it, without foundation (Butechcraft, Untersuch. der Vorsäuse des Ap. F. (Hamb. 1788); Baumgarten, Polem. iii, 370 sq.; Paulus, in Sephr. Roman. 131 sq.). The first intimation that Peter had a share in founding the Roman Church, and that he spent twenty-five years there as bishop, appears in Eusebius (Chron. ad 42nd. ann. Claud.) and Jerome (Script. Ecc. 1); while Eusebius (H. E. iii, 2) tells us that after the martyrdom of Peter and Paul, Linus was made the first bishop of the Church of the Romans; a most remarkable statement, if Peter had been bishop before him (comp. iii, 4). Epiphanius (xxvii, 6) even calls Paul the bishop (episkopos) of Christianity in Rome.

7. Mode of Peter's Death. The tradition of this apostle's being crucified with his head downward probably to be relegated to the regions of the fabulous. Tertullian, who is the first to mention Peter's crucifixion, says simply (De Passer. Itutens. 86), "Peterus passioni Dominico adequatur," which would rather lead to the conclusion that he was crucified in the Hebrew fashion, and by no means in the Roman way, as our Lord is supposed to have been, according to Origen, whose words are, ιερευς ὁ ἀνήσως ἑαυτῆς τακτις (ap. Euseb. H. E. iii, 1); and these are generally cited as intimating the peculiarity traditionally ascribed to the mode of Peter's crucifixion. But do the words really intimate this? Allowing that the verb may mean "was crucified," can ιερεύς ὁ ἀνήσως mean "with the head downwards?"

No instance, we believe, can be adduced which would justify such a translation. The combination ιερεύς ὁ ἀνήσως occurs both in classical and Biblical Greek (see Plato, B. iii, 288; Plut. Apoph. de Scipione J. 19; Mark xiv, 8; 1 Cor. xi, 4), but in every case it means "upon the head" (comp. ιερεύς ὁ ἀνήσως παράτημ. Lucian, Gath. c. 30, and καὶ μαζίς τακτις, Cic. pol. c. 12). According to analogy, therefore, Origen's words should mean that the apostle was impaled, or fastened to the cross upon, i.e. by the head. When Eusebius has to mention the crucifying of martyrs with the head downwards, he says distinctly αὐτῶν ἀνήσως κατακρίνεται προσωπείως (H. E. vii, 8). It is probably to a misreading of Origen's words that the story is to be traced and it is curious to see how it grows as it advances. First, we have Origen's vague and doubtful statement above quoted; then we have Eusebius's more precise statement: Πετρο στά τακτις αὐτής σταντρεμένος (Dm. Ec. iii, 116, c.); and at length, in the hands of Jerome, it expands into "Aŭtrum cruci martyrio coronatus est capite ad terram vero et in sublime pedibus elevatus, asceneres se indulgium qui sic cruciferigeretur ut Dominus sua" (Cod. Script. Eccles. 1). See Crucifert.
PETER (FIRST EPISTLE OF) 15 PETER (FIRST EPISTLE OF)

Mayerhoff, Reuss, and Schleiermahn, that Rufinus found κατά for κατά, and read κατά. Epiphanius also names Πέτρος Πέτρος as a book among the Euchonites (Hier. XXX, 15). It is probably only a different name for the foregoing (Schwegler, Nach-apost. Zeitalt. II, 30).

See Gospels, Spurious.

Polycarp uses two citations from this letter: κατὰ τὸν Πέτρον καὶ τὴν Πέτρου (Hist. Eccles. iv, 14). The same historian relates of Papias that in his λόγων εκπεμβάνα τοῦ Πέτρου in a similar way used μαθητής from this epistle (Hist. Eccles. iii, 89). Irenaeus quotes it expressly by and by name without mentioning the Petrine name (Adv. Haer. iii, 14). The Petrus ait (Hier. iv, 9, 2), citing 1 Pet. i, 8; using the same quotation similarly introduced in ibid. v, 7, 2; and again, "Et propter hoc Petrus ait," citing 1 Pet. ii, 16; ibid. iv, 16, 8. Other quotations, without mention of the apostle's name, may be found, ibid. III, 16, 8, and iv, 20, 2, etc. Quotations abound in Clement of Alexandria, headed with ὁ Πέτρος λέγει or γραφεῖ ὁ Πέτρος. These occur both in his Stromata and Pseudo, and need not be specified. Quotations are abundant also in Origen, certifying the authorship by the words παρὰ τῷ Πέτρῳ; and, according to Cosmas Indicopleustes (Cosm. ix, 10), the testimony is quite as distinct. In the short tract Scorpiace this epistle is quoted nine times, the preface in one place being "Petrus quidem ad Ponticos" (Scorpi. c. xii), quoting 1 Pet. ii, 20. Eusebius himself says of it, Πετροῦ ... ἀποκάλυψιν (Hist. Eccles. iii, 23). It is also found in the Peshito, which admitted only three of the catholic epistles. See Mayerhoff, Einführung in die Petrin. Schriften, p. 199, etc.

In the canonic published by Muratori this epistle is not found. In this fragment occurs the clause, "Apocalypses etiam Johannis et Petri tantum recipimus." Wieseler, laying stress on etiam, would bring out this meaning—in addition to the epistles of Peter and John, we also receive their Revelations; or also of Peter we receive as much as of John, two epistles and an apocalypse. But the interpretation is not admissible, rather with Bleek may the omission be ascribed to the fragmentary character of the document (Eusebi. in das N. T. p. 648; Hilgenfeld, Der Canon und die Kritik des N. T. [Halle, 1883], p. 48). Other modes of reading and explaining the sentence have been proposed. Hug alters the punctuation, "Apocalypses etiam Johannis. Et Petri tantum recipimus;" certainly the tantum gives some plausibility to the emendation. Believing that the barbarous Latin is but a version from the Greek, he thus restores the original, καὶ Πέτρου μοινὸς παρακάτω...—an alteration which of course brings out the conclusion wanted (Eusebi. § 19). Guicerie's effort is not more satisfactory. Thiessier, with more violence, changes tantum into solum epistolam, and quam quidem in the following I Pet. ii, 20. This document, so imperfect in form and barbarous in style, is probably indeed a translation from the Greek, and it can have no authority against decided and general testimony (see the canon in Routh's Reliquiæ Sacror. 1, 396, edited with notes from Freihardter's Commentatio [Lond. 1802]). Nor is it of any importance whether the words of the Latin document imply that this epistle was repudiated by Theodore of Mopsuestia, and if the Paulicians rejected it, Petrus Siculus gives the true reason—they were "passim adversum illum affectus"—personal prejudice being implied in their very name (Hist. Eccles. p. 17).

The internal evidence is equally complete. The author calls himself the apostle Peter (i, 1), and the whole character of the epistle shows that it proceeds from a writer who possessed great authority among those whom he addresses. The writer describes himself as "an elder." and "a witness of Christ's sufferings" (v. 1). The vehemence and energy of the style are altogether appropriate to the warmth and zeal of Peter's character, and every succeeding critic, who has entered into its spirit, has felt impressed with the truth of the observation of Kraft: "The man speaks from the depths of his own personal dignity and authorship, and worthy of the prince of the apostles." In later times the genuineness of the epistle has been impugned, as by Claudius in his Urantachen der Christenluthen, p. 296 (Altona, 1808). He imagined the author to have been a Jewish Christian in Capho Minor, and his general objection 1 Pet. i, 18, 24 is that the similarity in doctrine and style to Paul was too great to warrant the belief of independent authorship. His objections were exposed and answered by Augusti (in a program, Jena, 1808) and by Bertholdt (Einb. vol. vi, § 967). Eichhorn, however, took up the theory of Claudius so far as to maintain that as to material Peter is the author, but that Mark is the actual writer. De Wette also throws out similar objections, hinting that the author may have been a follower of Paul who had been brought into close attendance upon Peter. The question has been thoroughly discussed by Hug, Ewald, Bertholdt, Weiss, and other critics. The most striking resemblances are perhaps 1 Pet. i, 8 with Eph. i, 3; ii, 18 with Eph. vi, 5; iii, 1 with Eph. v, 22; and v, 5 with Eph. v, 21; but allusions nearly as distinct are found to the doctrine of the всего во вселенную Свещества (Rom. viii, 20, 21), Timi. 2, 11, 14; Rom. xiii, 11, 14; Rom. xiv, 2, 11, 14; Coli. iii, 8, 10; Phil. ii, 14; iv, 10; Rom. xiii, 2, etc., etc., v, 1; with Rom. viii, 18, 4, 21; 1 Thess. ii, 14; v, 14 with 1 Cor. xvi, 20). While, however, there is a similarity between the thoughts and style of Peter and Paul, there is at the same time a marked individuality, and there are also many special characteristics in this first epistle.
In the epistle Peter illustrates the peculiar and natural similarity between this epistle and the speeches of Peter as given in the Acts of the Apostles. Not to mention similarity in mould of doctrine and array of facts, there is resemblance in style. Thus Acts v, 30, x, 39, 1 Pet. ii, 24, in the allusion to the crucifixion and the use of άνων οο, the tree or cross; Acts ii, 32, 33, 15, 1 Pet. vi, 4, 11, in the peculiar use of ψηφων; Acts iii, 18, 4, 18, 1 Pet. i, 10, in the special connection of the old prophets with Christ and his work: Acts x, 32, 33, 1 Pet. ii, 4, in the striking phrase "Judge quick an áνων, the tree or cross; Acts two, 1, 21, in the description of the ψηφων, as the word άνων is always something to show Peter's independent use of the terms. One with his "beloved brother Paul" in the general view of the truth, he has something peculiar to him in the introduction and illustration of it. The Petrine type is as distinct as the Pauline—it bears its own unmistakable style and character. The Galilean fisherman has an individuality quite as recognizable as the pupil of Gamaliel.
Once more, to show how baseless is the objection drawn from Peter's supposed dependence on Paul, it may be added that similar certain expressions must have become current through constant usage. But in cases where such similarity between Peter and Paul occurs, there is ever a difference of view or of connection; and both may refer to ideas so common as are named by Peter, "ψηφων," or "νοην" or "οοολον" always something to show Peter's independent use of the terms. One with his "beloved brother Paul" in the general view of the truth, he has something peculiar to him in the introduction and illustration of it. The Petrine type is as distinct as the Pauline—it bears its own unmistakable style and character. The Galilean fisherman has an individuality quite as recognizable as the pupil of Gamaliel.
him ἄνω. Such similarities only prove independent authorship. In the resemblances to James, which are sometimes added, the chief similarity consists in the use of Old-Test. quotations. Thus compare 1 Pet. i, 6, 7 with James i, 2, 3; i, 24 with James i, 10; i, 11 with James i, 21; ii, 5 with James iv, 6, 10; iv, 8 with James v, 11. Yet, the more frequent resonances to Paul, and the fewer to John and James, prove? not, with De Wette, the dependence of Peter on Paul; nor, with Weiss, the dependence of Paul on Peter (Der Patin. Lehrbegriff, p. 374); but that Peter, in teaching what he could of the future manifestation of Christ, upon which he bases nearly all his exhortations to patience, self-control, and the discharge of all Christian duties. Yet there is not a shadow of opposition here; the topic is not neglected by Paul, nor does Peter omit the Pauline argument from Christ's sufferings, and his love for the Church, or the eschatological element predominates over all others. The apostle's mind is full of one thought, the realization of Messianic hopes. While Paul dwells with most earnestness upon justification by our Lord's death and merits, and concentrates his energies upon the Christian's present struggles, Peter fixes his eye constantly upon the future coming of Christ, the fulfilment of prophecy, the manifestation of the promised kingdom. In this he is the true representative of Israel, moved by those feelings which were so calculated to enkindle him to do his work as the apostle of the circumcision. Of the three Christian graces, hope is his special theme. He dwells much upon good works, but not so much because he sees in them necessary results of faith, or the complement of faith, or outward manifestations of the spirit of love, aspects most prominent in Paul, James, and John, as because he holds them to be tests of the soundness and stability of a faith which rests on the fact of the resurrection, and is directed to the future in the developed form of hope. Thus we know Peter to be a real representative of Judaism, his teaching, like that of Paul, is directly opposed to Judaizing tendencies. He belongs to the school, or, to speak more correctly, is the leader of the school, which at once vindicates the unity of the Law and the Gospel, and puts the superiority of the latter on its true basis, that of spiritual development. All his practical injunctions are drawn from Christian, not Jewish principles, from the precepts, example, life, death, resurrection, and future coming of Christ. The apostle of the circumcision says not a word in this epistle of the perpetual observance of the exact letter of the Mosaic law. He is full of the Old Testament; his style and thoughts are charged with its imagery, but he contemplates and applies its teaching in the light of the Gospel; he regards the privileges and glory of the ancient people of God entirely in their spiritual development in the Church of Christ. Only one who had been brought up as a Jew could have had his spirit so impregnated with those thoughts; only one who had been thoroughly emancipated by the Spirit of Christ could have risen so completely above the prejudices and dogmas of his forefathers. As such, Peter has a strong resemblance to that of our Lord, in discourses bearing directly upon practical duties. The great value of the epistle to believers consists in this resemblance; they feel themselves in the hands of a safe guide, of one who will help them to trace the hand of their Master in both dispensations, and to confirm and expand their faith. But apart from the style and language of the epistle, objections have been brought against it by Schweger, who alleges the want of special occasion for writing it, and the consequent generality of the contents (Das Nach-apostol. Zeitalt. ii, 7). The reply is that the epistle bears upon its front such a purpose as well suits the vocation of an apostle. Nor is there in it, as we have seen, that want of individuality which Schweger next alleges. It bears upon it the stamp of its author's firm spirit; nor does its use of Old-Test. imagery and allusions belie his functions as the apostle of the circumcision (Wiesinger, Einl. p. 21). If there be the want of close connection of thought, as Schweger also asserts, is not this want of logical sequence and symmetry quite in keeping with the teachings of him who had been trained in no school of human learning? Nor is it any real difficulty to say that Peter in the East could not have become acquainted with the later epistles of Paul. For in various ways Peter might have known them, or have heard of them, and if he even had a resemblance to some of the earlier of them, there is little or none to the latest of them. Schweger holds that the epistle alludes to the persecutions under Nero, during which Peter suffered, and that therefore his writing it at Babylon is inconsistent with his martyrdom at the same period at Rome. The objection, however, takes for granted what is denied. It is a sufficient reply to say that the persecution referred to was not, or may not have been, the Neronic persecution, and that the apostle was not put to death at the supposed period. Of Nero's reign, there are no readings of the Mosaic law. He is full of the Old Testament; his style and thoughts are charged with its imagery, but he contemplates and applies its teaching in the light of the Gospel; he regards the privileges and glory of the ancient people of God entirely in their spiritual development in the Church of Christ. Only one who had been brought up as a Jew could have had his spirit so impregnated with those thoughts; only one who had been thoroughly emancipated by the Spirit of Christ could have risen so completely above the prejudices and dogmas of his forefathers. As such, Peter has a strong resemblance to that of our Lord, in discourses bearing directly upon actual persecution: the διαλογία (iii, 15) is not a formal answer to a public accusation, for it is to be given to every one asking it (Huther, Krutich-erzepisches Handbuch über das 1. Brief des Petrus, Einl., p. 27). The epistle in all its leading features is in unison with what it professes to be—a practical letter from one whose heart was set on the well-being of the churches, one who may have read many of Paul's letters and thanked God for them, and who, in addressing the churches himself, clothes his thoughts and words in language that is in perfect keeping with the want of any timid selection or refusal of words and phrases which others may have used before him.

II. Place and Time.—The place is indicated in v, 18, in the clause ἀντίστροφος ὑπ' αὐτοῦ ἐν Βαβυλώνι συνελεημένος. Babylon is named as the place where the apostle was. when he wrote the epistle, as he sends this salutation from it, on the part of a woman, as Mayerhoff, Neander, Alford, and others suppose; or on the part of a Church, as is the opinion of the majority. It is remarkable, however, that from early times Babylon has been taken to be the seat of the Church in Egypt. This, however, is ascribed to Euæmius on report to Papias and Clement of Alexandria (Hist. Eccles. ii. 15). Jerome and Eusebius also held it. In later times it has been espoused by Grotius, Cave, Lardner, Hengstenberg, Windischmann, Wiesinger, Baur, Tischendorf, Schott (Imer. 1. Breviæ Pet. édition, p. 346; Erc Langen, 1861), and Hofmann (Schärfh. i. 201). But why discover a mystical sense in a name set down as the place of writing an epistle? There is no more reason for doing this than for assigning a like significance to the geographical name of what is written at Ephesus. How should his readers discover the Church at Rome to be meant by η εκκλησία in Babylon? And if Babylon do signify a hostile spiritual power, as in the Apocalypse (xviii. 21), then it is strange that Catholic critics as a body should adopt such a meaning here, and admit by implication the ascription of this character to their spiritual adversaries. Dr. Brown, of Edinburgh, puts a somewhat parallel case—"Our own city is sometimes called Athens from its situation, and from its being a seat of learning; but it would not do to argue that a letter came from Athens written to Athens" (Expository Discourses on 1st Peter, i. 540).

Some, again, think that Babylon may mean a place of that name in Egypt. Of this opinion are Le Clerc, Mill, Pearson, Pott, Burton, Creswel, and Hug. Strabo (Geog. xvii, 1, 50) calls it not a town, but a strong fortress built by refugees from Babylon, and a garrison for one of the three legions guarding Egypt. The opinion that this small encampment is the Babylon of our epistle has certainly little plausibility. It is equaly strange to suppose it to be Ctesiphon or Seleucia; and stranger still to imagine that the apostle, as is maintained by Cappellus, Spanheim, Hardouin, and Semler. The natural interpretation is to take Babylon as the name of the well-known city. We have indeed no record of any missionary journey of Peter to Chaldea, for but little of Peter's later life is given us in the New Testament. But we know that many Jews inhabited Babylon—as γὰρ βλάστη αἱ οἰκίαι, according to Josephus—and was not such a spot, to a great extent a Jewish colony or settlement, likely to attract the apostle of the circumcision? Lardner's principal argument, that it did not extend to the confines (1 Peter 1. 12, 13, 14) imply that Peter was within the bounds of the Roman empire, proves nothing; for as Davidson remarks—"The phrase 'the king,' in a letter written by a person in one country to a person in another, may mean the king either of the person writing, or of him to whom the letter is written." Granting that the Parthian empire had its own government, he is writing to persons in other provinces under Roman jurisdiction, and he enjoins them to obey the emperor as supreme, and the various governors sent by him for purposes of local administration. If these persons were observed, the countries of the persons addressed in the epistle (i. 1) are enumerated in the order in which a person writing from Babylon would naturally arrange them, beginning with those lying nearest to him, and passing in circuit to those in the east and the south, at the greatest distance from him. The natural meaning of the designation Babylon is held by Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, Lightfoot, Wieseler, Mayerhoff, Bengel, De Wette, Bleek, and perhaps the majority of modern critics.

But if Peter wrote from Babylon on the Euphrates, at what period was the epistle written? The epistle itself contains no materials for fixing a precise date. It does not by its allusions clearly point to the Neronian persecution; it rather speaks of evil and danger suffered now, but with more in prospect. Suffering was endured and was also impending, and yet those who lived a quiet and blameless life might escape it, though certainly trials for righteousness' sake are implied and virtually predicted. About the year 60 the dark elements of Nero's character began to develop themselves, and after this epoch the epistle was written. The churches addressed in it were still stormy, for they were planted therefore thought by some that Paul must have been deceived ere Peter would find it his duty to address them. Paul was put to death about A.D. 64; but such a date would be too late for our epistle, as time would not, on such a hypothesis, be left for the apostle's going to Rome, according to old tradition, and for his martyrdom in that city. It may be admitted that Peter would not have intruded into Paul's sphere had Paul been free to write to or labor in the provinces specified. Tell it may be supposed that Paul may have withdrawn to some more distant field of labor, or may have been suffering imprisonment at Rome. Davidson places the date in 68; Alford between 68 and 67. If the Mark of v. 18 be he of whom Paul speaks as being with him in Rome (Col. iv. 10), then we know that he was preparing an immediate journey to Asia Minor; and we learn from 2 Tim. iv. 11 that he had not returned when this last of Paul's epistles was written. It is surely not impossible for him to have gone in this interval to Peter at Babylon; and as he must have personally known the bishops addressed by Peter, his ascension was naturally included by the apostle. Silvanus, whom the epistle was sent— if the same with the Silvanus mentioned in the greetings 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1—seems to have left Paul before the epistles to Corinth were written. He may have in some way become connected with Peter, and, as the Silvanus of the Acts, he was acquainted with many of the churches to whom this epistle was sent. The terms a faithful brother as I suppose (the faithful brother as I reckon) do not imply any doubt of his character, but are only an additional recommendation to one whose companionship with Paul must have been known in the provinces enumerated by Peter.

But Schweger ascribes the epistle to a later period— to the age of Trajan; and of course denies its apostolic authorship (Nach-apostol, Zöllnler, ii. 22). The arguments, however, for so late a date are very inconclusive. He first of all assumes that its language does not tally with the facts of the Neronian persecution, and that the tone is unimpassioned—that Christians were charged with definite crime under Nero—that his persecution was universal, and not, as this epistle supposes, conducted by regular processes, and that the general condition of believers in Asia Minor, as depicted in the epistle, suits the age of Trajan better than that of Nero. The reply is obvious—that the tranquility of tone in this epistle would be remarkable under any persecution, for it is that of calm, heroic endurance, which trusts in an unseen arm, and has hopes undimmed by death; that the persecution of Christians simply for the name which they bore was not an irrational ferocity peculiar to Trajan's time; that the interest in the provinces of Asia Minor is most popular fury and irregular magisterial condemnation; that there is no allusion to judicial trial in the epistle, for the word σωτερίασι does not imply it; and that the sufferings of Christians in Asia Minor as referred to or predicted do not agree with the recorded facts in Pliney's letter, for according to it they were by summary investigation and sentence doomed to death (Huther, Einleit, p. 28). The persecutions referred to in this epistle are rather such as Christians have always to encounter in heathen countries from an ignorant mob easily stirred to violence, and whose civil powers, if they are not used to toleration in theory, is yet swayed by strong prejudices, and prone, from position and policy, to favor and protect the dominant superstition.

Supposing this epistle to have been written at Babylon, it is a probable conjecture that Silvanus, by whom it was transmitted to those churches, had joined Peter after a tour of visitation, either in pursuance of instructions from Paul, then a prisoner at Rome, or in the capacity of a minister of high authority in the Church, and that his account of the condition of the Christians in those districts determined the apostle to write the epistle. From the absence of personal salutations, and other indications, it is inferred that Peter had not hitherto visited the churches; but it is certain that he was thoroughly acquainted both with their external circumstances and spiritual state. It is clear that Silvanus is not regarded by Peter as one of his own associates, but as one whose personal character he had sufficient opportunity of divination (v. 12). Such a testimonial as the apostle gives to the soundness of his faith would of course have the greatest weight with the Asiatic Christians, to whom the epistle appears to have been specially, though not exclusively, addressed. The assumption that Silvanus was employed in the composition of the epistle is not borne out by the expression "by Silvanus I have written unto you," such words, according to ancient usage, applying rather to the bearer than to the writer or amanuensis. Still it is highly probable that Silvanus, considering his rank, character, and services, would be welcomed by the churches, and with their great apostle and founder, would be consulted by Peter throughout, and that they would together read the epistles of Paul, especially those addressed to the churches in those districts: thus, partly with direct corroboration, partly in accordance with the view of Augustine, Luther, Wetstein, Steiger, Brucker, Mayerhoff, Wiesinger, Neander, Reuss, Schaff, and Huther. Reuss (p. 138) takes ταύτας and ταυτίζων as = διασφάλιζα, Israelites by faith, not by ceremonial observance. See also Weiss, Der Petrinische Lehrbrief, p. 28, n. 2.

IV. Design, Contents, and Characteristics.—The objects of the epistle, as deduced from its contents, coincide with the above assumptions. They were: 1. To comfort and strengthen the Christians in a season of severe trial. 2. To enforce the practical and spiritual duties involved in their calling. 3. To warn them against special temptations attached to their position. 4. To remove all doubt as to the soundness and completeness of the religious system which they had already received. Such an attestation was especially needed by the Hebrew Christians, who were wont to appeal from Paul's authority to that of the elder apostles, and above all to that of Peter. The last, which is perhaps the very principal object, is kept in view throughout the epistle, and is distinctly stated (v. 12).

These objects may come out more clearly in a brief analysis. The epistle begins with salutations and a general description of Christians (i, 1, 2), followed by a statement of their present privileges and future inheritance (v. 3, 4). View of themselves and their conduct under persecution (ver. 6-9); reference, according to the apostle's wont, to prophecies concerning both the sufferings of Christ and the salvation of his people (ver. 10-12); and exhortations based upon those promises to earnestness, a variety, hope, obedience, and holiness, as results of knowledge of redemption, of stone-ment by the blood of Jesus, and of the resurrection, and as proofs of spiritual regeneration by the Word of God. Peculiar stress is laid upon the cardinal graces of faith, hope, and brotherly love, each connected with and resting upon the spiritual life of the Epistle (ver. 13-25). Absence from the spiritual sins most directly opposed to those graces is then enforced (ii, 1); spiritual growth is represented as dependent upon the nourishment supplied by the same Word which was the instrument of regeneration (ver. 2), and constitutes the change of metaphor, Christians are represented as a spiritual house, collectively and individually as living stones, and royal priests, elect, and brought out of darkness into light (ver. 4-10). This portion of the epistle is singularly rich in thought and expression, and furnishes the peculiar characteristics of Peter's epistle, in which Judaism is spiritualized, and finds its full development in Christ. From this condition of Christians, and more directly from the fact that they are thus separated from the world, pilgrims and sojourners, Peter deduces an-tire system of practical and relative duties, self-control, care of reputation, especially for the sake of Gentiles; submission to all constituted authorities; obligations of slaves, urged with remarkable earnestness, and founded upon the example of Christ's own servitude (Eph. 6:5-9; Col. 3:18-20) and duties of wives and husbands (iii, 1-7). Then generally all Christian graces are commended, those which pertain to Christian brotherhood, and those which are especially needed in times of persecution, gentleness, forbearance, and submission to injury (ver. 8-17): all the precepts being based on imitation of Christ, with warnings from the history of the deluge, and with special reference to the baptismal covenant. In the following chapter (iv, 1, 2) the analogy between the death of Christ and spiritual mortification, a topic much dwelt upon by Paul, is urged with special reference to the sins committed by Christians before conversion, and habitual to the Gentiles. The doctrine of a future judgment is inculcated, both with reference to their heathen persecutors as a motive for endurance, and to their own conduct as an incentive to sobriety, watchfulness, fervent charity, liberality in all external acts of kindness, and diligent discharge of all spiritual duties, with a view to the glory of God through Jesus Christ (ver. 8-11). This epistle appears at the first draught to have terminated here with the doxology, but the thought of it was not finished. Of course the Corinthians were exposed to the apostle's heart, and suggests additional exhortations. Christians are taught to rejoice in partaking of Christ's sufferings, being thereby assured of sharing his glory, which even in this life rests upon them, and is especially manifested in their innocence and endurance of persecution: judgment must come first to cleanse the house of God, then to reach the disobedient: suffering according to the will of God, they may commit their souls to him in well-doing as unto a faithful Creator. Faith and hope are equal qualifications for the soul's redemption, and then (v, 1-4) addresses the preachers of the churches, warning them as one of their own body, as a witness (μαρτυρίας) of Christ's sufferings, and partaker of future glory, against negligence, covetousness, and love of power; the younger members he exhorts to submission and humility, and concludes this part with a warning against their spiritual enemy, and a solemn and most beautiful prayer to the God of all grace. Lastly, he mentions Silvanus with special commendation, and states very strongly the condition of the Corinthians in their profession from the heathen amusements and dissoluteness in which they had mingled prior to their conversion (iv, 4, 5). They are exhorted to bear suffering patiently, and ever to remember the example, and endure in the spirit, of the Suffering One—the Righteous One who had suffered for them. While affliction would come upon them in the present time, they are ever encouraged to look with joyous anticipation to the future. Peter indeed might be called the apostle of hope. Doctrine and conclusion alike assume this form. The "inheritance" is future, but its hope is in the present (ver. 2, 3, 8, 4). Their tried faith is found unto glory "at the appearance of Jesus Christ" (i, 7). The "end" of their faith is "salvation" (i, 9), and they are to "hope to the end for the grace to be brought at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (i, 13). Their ruling emotion is therefore "holy fervor" (iii, 13), which "holy" or "righteous" is now, and is to be, the quality of the "fervent" (iv, 3, 2). Peter, however, over in reserve for them in the future, their time here is only a "sojourning" (i, 17); they were merely "strangers and pilgrims" (ii, 11); nay, "the end of all things is at hand" (iv, 7). Suffering was now, but joy was to come when his "glory shall be revealed" (v, 1). The "glory of God" (ii, 2), in the context, means his glory (i, 11; iv, 18): the same connection the apostle applies to himself, and to faithful ministers (v, 1-4). There are also allusions to Christ's words, or, rather, reminiscences of them mingle with the apostle's thoughts. Comp. i. 4 with Matt. xxv, 34; i. 8 with John xx, 29; i. 10 with Luke x, 24; i. 18 with Luke xii, 35; ii. 12 with Matt. v, 16; iii. 13-18 with Matt. v, 16, x, 28; v. 6 with Matt. xxxiii, 12, etc.

There were apparently some tendencies in those churches that required reproof — some temptations against which they needed to be warned, as "former lusts," "fleshy lusts" (i, 14, 11); dark and envious feelings (ii, i, iii, 8, 9); love of adornment on the part of women (iii, 3); and ambition and worldliness on the part of Christian teachers (v, 1-4). God's gracious and tender relationship to his people was not to be taken for granted. His grace was the product of the old covenant, and Peter reproduces it under the new in its closer and more spiritual aspects (ii, 9, 10; iv, 17; v, 2). The old economy is neither eulogized nor disparaged, and no remark is made on its abolition, the reasons of it, or the good to the world springing out of the thing. The distinction of the Church of God, as believers is not even glanced at. In the apostle's view it had passed away by its development into another and grander system, one with it in spirit, and at the same time the realization of its oracles and types. His mind was sated with O.T. imagery and allusions, but they are freely applied to the spiritual Israel, which, having always existed within the theocracy, had now burst the national barriers, and was to be found in all the believing communities, whatever their lineages or countries. To him the Jewish economy was neither supplanted by a rival faith nor succeeded by a new system of thought. Israel had only put off its ceremonial, the badge of its immutability and servitude, and now rejoiced in freedom and predicted blessing. What was said of the typical Israel may now be asserted with deeper truth of the spiritual Israel. But the change is neither argued from premises laid down nor vindicated against Jews or Judaeans, and the results of the new condition are not held up as matter of formal congratulation; they are only seized and put forward as recognised grounds of joy, patience, and hope. The Redeemer's Spirit was to be believed in Messiah; so Peter rejoices in that appellation, calling him usually Jesus Christ, and often simply Christ (i, 11; ii, 21; iii, 16-18; iv, 1, 18, 14); and it is remarkable that in nearly all those places the simple name Christ is used in connection with his sufferings, to the idea of which the Jew still clung and had been so long accustomed. The centre of the apostle's theology is the Redeemer, the medium of all spiritual blessing. The relation of his expiatory work to sinners is described by ὑπάρχει (i, 12; iii, 16); or it is said he bore our sins—τὰς ἁμαρτίας ἡμῶν ἐπηρεάσθη—or died in place of us. The "great census of the blood" and the "Lamb without spot" were the fulfillment of the old economy, and the grace and salvation now enjoyed were familiar to the prophets (i, 10). Christ who suffered is now in glory, and is still keeping and blessing his people. In fine, the object, as told by the author (v, 12), is essentially twofold. "I have written briefly, exhorting (πρῶτον ἐπιτίμησα) and the epistle is hortatory—not didactic or polemical; and testifying (κατατίμησα) that this is the true grace of God wherein ye stand." The epistle contains much advice that could not be doc- trine imparted through the apostle's personal teaching. Some of the fathers, indeed, affirm that Peter visited the provinces specified in this epistle. Origen gives it as a probable conjecture; and Eusebius says that the countries in which Peter preached the doctrine of the resurrection appear from his own writings, and may be seen from this epistle. The assertion has thus no basis, save in the idea that Peter must have preached in the churches to which he sent an epistle. Jerome repeats the statement, and Epiphanius, as his wont is, intensifies it; but it is certain that not the Apostles, but other persons, distinguish himself from "them that have preached the Gospel unto you" (1, 12). So that the "true grace" in which those churches stood was the Gospel which they had heard from others, and especially from Paul, by whom so many of them had been founded. The epistle, then, becomes a voucher for the genuineness of the Gospel preached in Asia Minor by the apostle of the uncircumcision. Not that, as Schwag-ler supposes, it attempts to mediate between James and Paul; for it proclaims the same truths, touching the peculiar without vehemence, and the barriers without innu-dation of Paul's distinctive forms, or any modification of Peter's as given in his oral addresses—both being in inner harmony, and differing only in mode of presentation, caused by mental diversity, or suggested by the peculiar circumstances, tendencies, or dangers of some of the churches which were warned or addressed.

V. Style.—The epistle is characterized by its fervor.
The soul of the writer stamped its image on its thoughts and words—ποιησις γρηγορος is the eulogy of Chrys-sotom. The epistle bears his living impress in his profound and strong language, expressing an apostolic thou-thought. He was never languid or half-hearted in what he said or did, though the old impatience is chastened; and the fire which often flashed up so suddenly is more equable and tranquil in its glow. He is rare without vehemence, and the barriers without inoutspokenness or abruptness. The epistle is throughout hortative, doctrine and quotation being introduced as forming the basis or warrant, or as showing the necessity and value of practical counsel or warning. There is in it little of local or temporal; it suited the Church of all lands and ages; for between are always in the present time "strangers and sojourners," with their gaza fixed on the future, exposed to trial and borne through by hope. The apostle infuses himself himself into the epistle, portrays the emotions which swayed and cheered him, as he reveals his own experience, which had been shaped by his past and present fellowship with a suffering and glorified Lord. What he unfolds or describes never stands apart as a theme by itself to be wrought out and argued; nor is it lifted as if to a lofty summit, and then be far removed from us afar; but all is kept within familiar grasp, and inwrought into the relations, duties, and dangers of everyday Christian existence. The truths brought forward are treated not in themselves, but in their immediate bearing on duty, trial, and hope; are handled quite in the way which one would deal with food and air and fire in their essential connection with life.

The language, though not rugged, is not without embarrassment. Ideas are often linked together by a relatively pronoun. There is no formal development of thought, though the order is lucid and logical. Some word employed in the previous sentence so dwells in the writer's mind that it suggests the sentiment of the following one. The logical formulas are wanting—οδοι not preceding an inference, but introducing a practical imperative from τας γονατισμοις, yam be rendered a reason, but prefacing a motive conveyed in some fact or quotation from Scripture. Thoughts are reintroduced, and in terms not dissimilar. What the apostle has to say, he must say in words that come the soonest to an unpracticed pen. In short, we may well suppose that he wrote more of the present of the injunction long given to him—"When thou art converted, strengtheneth thy brethren;" and this divine mandate might be prefixed to the epistle as its motto.

PETER, Second Epistle of, follows immediately the other but it presents questions of far greater difficulty than the former. See ANTILEGOMEN.

1. Comenial Authority.—The genuineness of this second epistle has long been disputed, though its author himself calls it "Simon Peter," ὁ δολαρικακαι ἀντίστοιχος, "a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ."

2. History of Opinion.—It is hard to say whether the alleged questions from it by the fathers and other quotations, or are only, on the one hand, allusions to the O. T., or, on the other, the employment of such phrases as had grown into familiar Christian commonplaces.
Thus Clement of Rome, in his First Epistle to the Coomhrians (ch. vii), says of Noah, ἦσυς ἐν παρθένων; and of those who were in Gnosticism, ἦσυς ἐν παρθέ as the double-minded, "a seeming reminiscence of Jan. i, 5: but he adds, "We are grown old, and none of those things have happened to us" (γεγενανται και οἴδατ).
PETER (SECOND EPISTLE OF) 22 PETER (SECOND EPISTLE OF)

found in the Feschito, though the Philokletian version has it, and Ephrem Syrus accepted it. The canon of Muratori has it not, and Theodore of Mopsuestia rejected it. But it was received by Athanasius, Philastrius, Cyril, Rufinus, and Augustine. Gregory of Nazianzum, in his Carmen 38, refers to the seventh catholic epistles. It was adopted by the Council of Latium in a dicta lapidaria, and by the Council of Carthage, 397. From that period till the Reformation it was acknowledged by the Church. Not to refer to other quotations often given, it may suffice to say, that though the epistle was doubled, it usually had a place in the canons; the objections against it were not historical, but critical in nature, and had their origin apparently among the Alexandrian scholars; and that in one case at least, that of Cosmas Indicopleustes, doctrinal prepossessions led to its rejection. Gregory, at the end of the 6th century, seems to allude to others whose hostility to it had a similar origin, adding, "Si ejusdem epistola verba senserem voluisset, longe aliter sentire potuerant." (See Olhausen, Opuscula, where the citations are given at length.) The old doubts about the epistle were revived at the time of the Reformation, and the ancients were considered as a house—pietas verius legem in se habent; but the figure is different from that in 2 Pet. 1, 19, ὡς λόγῳ φαίνεται ἐν αὐθεντῷ τόπῳ—as a light shining in a dark place." Clement of Alexandria commented, we are told by Eusebius and Cassiodorus, on all the canonical Scriptures, Eusebius, and it is not denied, in a house—a καὶ τούτῳ καθόλου ἑπτακανώλαι (Hist. Eccles. vi, 14). But a second statement of Cassiodorus mentions expressly the first epistle of Peter, as if the second had been excluded, and adds, "2 and John and James," thereby also excluding Jude, which Eusebius, however, had distinctly named (De Institut. cap. viii). The testimony of Origen is no less liable to doubt, as it seems to vary. In the translation of Rufinus, who certainly was not a literal versionist, we find the epistle is less than three times referred to, one of them being the assertion, "Petrus enim duobus epistolarum aurum personam tabiit" (Hom. in, on Joshua). In Hom. in Leviticus, 2 Pet. 1, 3, is quoted, and in Hom. in Numbers, 2 Pet. 1, 14 is quoted. Somewhat in opposition to this, Origen, in his extant works in Greek, speaks of the first epistle as in τῇ καθάδειν εἰ.; nay, as quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vi, 25), he adds that "Peter left one acknowledged epistle," adding—κάθως τοί καὶ ζώσαντος ἑμὸν βαθμίται γερ. This is not a formal denial of its genuineness, but is tantamount to it. Not that Peter left one acknowledged epistle in the Latin version. Yet in his letter to Cyprian he seems to allude to 2 Peter, and the warnings in it are хотелética (Cyprian, Opera, p. 126, ed. Paris, 1886). In a Latin translation of a commentary of Didymus on the epistle it is called falsa, non in canone. Now falsanare, according to Du Fresne in his thaumatur. med. et infin. Latinitalit, does not mean to interpolate, but to pro- nose as it were. Eusebius has placed this epistle among the αὐτολογίων (Hist. Eccles. iii, 25), and more fully be declares, "That called his second epistle we must believe to have been written by Judas Iscariot; but yet appearing to many to be useful it has been diligently studied with the other Scriptures." Jerome says explicitly, "Scriptis duabus epistolas ... quorum secunda a plerique eis esse negatio;" adding as the reason, "propter styli cum priore dissonantiam;" and ascrib follows this difference to a change of amansensia, diversa interpretum (De Scrip. Epist. cap. 1, epist. cxxv. ad Hidib. cap. xi). Methodius of Tyre makes two distinct allusions to a peculiar portion of the epistle (iii, 6, 7, 12, 13), the confusion and purification of the world (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. ii, 28. ed. Theil, 1803. 298, ed. Oehler, 1800). Westcott (On the Canon, p. 57) points out a reference in the martyrdom of Ignatius, in which (cap. ii) the father is compared to "a divine lamp illuminating the hearts of the faithful by his exposition of the Holy Scriptures" (2 Pet. i, 19). The epistle is not

The doubts as to its genuineness appear to have originated in the 2d century. Nevertheless the epistle itself was formally recognised at a very early period. Those doubts, however, were not quite so strong as they are now generally represented. The three greatest names of that school may be quoted on either side. On the one hand there were evidences external credentials, without which it could never have obtained circulation; on the other, strong subjective impressions, to which these critics attached scarcely less weight than some modern inquirers. They rested entirely, so far as can be ascertained, on the difference of style. Hence the question may be summed up under three heads. Many, as we have seen, reject the epistle altogether as spurious, supposing it to have been directed against forms of Gnosticism prevalent in the early part of the 2d century. A few consider that the first and last chapters were written by Peter or under his dictation, but that the second chapter was interpolated. So far, however, it is evident from these views that the general results of the latest investigations, that a majority of names, including nearly all the writers of Germany opposed to Rationalism, who in the 19th century declared it false, and between whose opponents may be quoted in support of the genuineness and authenticity of this epistle. The statement that all critics of eminence and impartiality concur in rejecting it is simply untrue, unless it be admitted that a belief in the reality of objective revelation is inconsistent with the use of the name Peter, indeed, the only common point between the numerous defenders of the canonicality of this document. If it were a question now to be decided for the first time upon the external or internal evidences still accessible, it may be admitted that it would be far more difficult to maintain this than any other document in the New Testament; but the judgment of the early Church is not to be reversed without far stronger arguments than have been adduced, more especially as the epistle is entirely free from objections which might be brought, with more show of reason, against others now all but universally received: it inculcates no new doctrine, bears on no controversies of post-apostolic origin, supports no hierarchical innovations, but is simple, earnest, devout, and eminently practical, full of the characteristic graces of Peter's preaching, if he be the author. The belief in Peter's authorship is based on the testimony of the church, in the 1st century, to the 5th century, with respect to the publication of this book, in reference to his own death—the same word being employed to denote Christ's death, τὸν Ἱησοῦν αὐτοῦ, this being the theme of conversation on the part of Moses and Elias (Luke ix, 31). Ullmann supposes the reference in the words εἴρηκαν εἰς ἐπίσκοπον ἀδιάκοπον (1 Pet. i, 18) to be to Mark's Gospel said to have been composed on Peter's authority; but the allusion seems to be to the paragraph immediately under his hand. It would have been a profane and daring impertinence for any one to denominate an apostle, and deliver to the churches a letter in his name, with so marked a reference to one of the most memorable circumstances and glories in the apostle's life. A forgery so glaring could make no pretense to inspiration—to be a product of the Spirit of Truth. The inspiration of the epistle is thus bound up with the question of its authenticity. If it is not the work of Peter it must be rejected altogether from the canon. The opinion of critics of what is called the liberal school, including all shades from Lichte to Baur, has been decidedly unfavorable, and that opinion has been adopted by this writer. But there are, however, very strong reasons why this verdict should be reconsidered. No one ground on which it rests is unassailable. The rejection of this book affects the authority of the whole canon, which, in the opinion of one of the keenest and least scrupulous critics (Heuse) of modern Germanism, is free from any other error. It is not a question as to the possible authorship of a work like that of the Hebrews, which does not bear the writer's name. The Church, which for more than fourteen centuries has received it, has either been imposed upon by imposters, or by what may be termed the peculiar device, or derived from it spiritual instruction of the highest importance. If received, it bears attestation to some of the most important facts in our Lord's history, casts light upon the feelings of the apostolic body in relation to the elder Church and to each other, and, while it confirms many doctrines generally inculcated, is the chief, if not the only, voucher for eschatological views touching the destruction of the framework of creation, which from an early period have been prevalent in the Church.

3. Objections.—There are serious difficulties, however, in the way of its reception; and these are usually said to be difference of style, difference of doctrine, and the marked correspondence of portions of the epistle with that of Jude. Yet Gassen makes the astounding statement—"The two epistles when carefully compared reveal more points of agreement than difference," but he has not taken the trouble of noting them (On the Canon, p. 359). The employment of ὡς is different in the second epistle from the first. There, though it occurs only twice, the second occurrence is in a possessive of which ὡς has no such resonance, and its frequency makes it a characteristic of the style; but it occurs much more rarely in the second epistle, and usually, though not always, with a different meaning and purpose. The use of ἀλλὰ after a negative clause and introducing a positive one is common in the first epistle, but rare in the second. There are marked ὅπως λεγόμενα in the second epistle. The first and second epistles differ also in the use of ἔρχομαι. In the first epistle X stands in the majority of instances without the article and by itself, either simply I. X. or X. 1.; but in the second epistle it has usually some predicate attached to it (i, 1, 2, 8; iii, 14-16). The name Ἰωάς occurs nearly forty times in the first epistle, but only seven times in the second. Again, εὐεργ. is applied to Christ only once in the first epistle (i, 3), but in the second epistle it is a common adjective to other names of Christ. In the first epistle it is used especially toward the Father in all cases but one (i, 3), but in the second epistle it denotes the Son, in harmony with Peter's own declaration (Acts ii, 36; x, 36). The epithet σωτῆρ, so often applied to Christ in the second epistle, is not found in the first. The general state of things also expresses differently in the two epistles, ἀσκελαίωμα, or its verb, being used in the first epistle (i, 5, 7, 13; iv, 13; v, 1); or it is called τὸ τέλος πάντων (v, 7); or χρυσοὶ ἵππαι (i, 20). But in the second epistle it is called ἡμῶν εὐεργ. (ii, 9), χαρίσματα (iii, 4), φιλόν εὐεργ. (iii, 10), Ἰωάς Ἰωάς (iii, 12). These are certainly marked diversities, and it is difficult to offer a satisfactory explanation of them. It may, however, be replied that with the sacred writers the divine names are not used, as with us, without any prominent or distinctive meaning. In the first epistle the names are his common ones, the familiar ones in the mouths of all believers—for the writer brings into prominence the oneness of believers with him in suffering and glory; with him still as Jesus wearing his human name and his human nature with all its sympathies; as the Christ who, as the Father's servant, obeyed, suffered, and was crowned, the Spirit that anointed him still being "the unction from the Holy One" to all his people. In the second epistle the writer has in view persons who are heretics, rebellious, dissolute, false teachers: and in what he says he appeals to the authority and lordship of the Saviour, which it was so awful to contemn and so vain to oppose. If the last day be set in different colors in the two epistles, the difference may be accounted for on the same principle: for those suffering under trial shines afar as the hope that sustains them, but to those who are perverse it presents itself as the time of reckoning which should alarm them into believing submission.

The aspects under which the Gospel is represented in this second epistle differ from those in the first. The writer lays stress on ἵστασις, or ἐνίγμα (i, 2, 3, 5, 8; ii, 20, 11; iii, 18). In this epistle the Gospel is generally Ἰσραήλ ἐνίγμα και παρώνευσιν (i, 16), ἀδέλφῃ τῆς διακοσμησίας (ii, 21), ἄγια ἐννοια, etc.; whereas the first epistle throws into prominence ἐνίατος, σωτηρία, οἰκονομία, ἀπάτης Ἰ. X. ὁδός (i, 10) ἀλληλεία (i, 22), λόγος (ii, 8), πίστει, etc. The reason may be ventured that the persons addressed in the second epistle were in danger of being tempted into error; and that a definite and progressive knowledge of Christianity was the safeguard of those who were floating around them. On this account, too, we have allusion suggested and pointed by their perilous circumstances, "to make their calling and election sure" (i, 10; iii, 14); nay, the purpose of the epistle seems to be given in iii, 17: "Ye therefore, beloved, knowing beforehand, that the Lord's day is near, being led away with the error of the lawless, ye fall away from your own steadfastness; but grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." The ἵστασις is the grand theme of counsel and the real prophylactic presented, for it embodies itself in that δικαιοσύνη on the one hand the possession of which is the basis of all the allusions to Noah and Lot, and to the want of which are traced in contrast the judgment of the flood and the fate of the sodomites, the selfish character of Balaam, and the dark and deceitful ways and words of the false teachers. There is also a characteristic difference in the mode of quotation from the O. T. Quotations are abundant in the first epistle, either formally introduced by ὄριον γιργασταί (i, 16), or by διὰ πάντων ἐν τῇ γραφῇ (ii, 6), or are woven into the discourse without any prefatory statement, as if writer and readers were equally familiar with them (i, 24; iii, 4, 5, 7, 9, 10, 22, 24, 26; iii, 9, 10, 11, 16). But in the second epistle quotations are unfrequent, though we have Παλ. x, 4 in iii, 8, and Παλ. ix, 17 in iii, 18. Of a different kind are the allusions to Noah and the flood, to Lot and Sodom, and to Balaam. But we may still explain that the modes of handling, and applying the O. T. look not the same. The writer has been no use made of the O. T. at all; but a third of this epistle consists of references to the O. T. or to warnings drawn from it.

The peculiarity of a similar nature of a large portion of this epistle to that of Jude has often been commented on. The second chapter and a portion of the third are so like Jude that the resemblance cannot be accidental, for it is found in words as well as in thoughts. It has been conjectured by some that both borrowed from a common source. Bishop Sherlock supposed that this source was some ancient pseudo apostolic letter had not been used by Jude, and that Jude had used the epistle of Peter as well as this old authority (Use and Intent of Prophecy, Dissert. i, 200, Lond. 1725). Herder and Hasse, holding this theory, conjecture the document common to both writers to be the Zendavesta. This opinion has no foundation, and relies us of no difficulty. Others imagine that Jude followed Peter, and several reasons have been alleged in favor of this opinion by Mill, Michaelis, Storr, Dahl, Wordworth, Thiem, Heydenreich, Hengstenberg, and Gaussen. Their general argument is that Jude is dealing with the same class of false teachers, than Jude refers to prophecies which are found only in Peter. But it is really doubtful if both epistles refer to the same class of errorists. Those described by Peter are rather speculative, though their immoral practices are also noted, while those branded by Jude are specially marked as libertines and sensualists, whose life has pervaded and undermined their creed. Others again hold that Peter took from Jude; such is the view of Hug, Eichhorn, Credner, Neander, Mayerhoff, De Wette, Guericke, and Bleek. One among these is no small force. The composition of Jude is the simpler and briefer, and Peter's the more ornate and amplified; that Jude's is more pointed and Peter's more indefinite; and that some allusions in Peter are so vague that they can be understood only by a comparison with Jude (comp. 2 Pet. i, 4 with Jude 6; 2 Pet. ii, 11 with Jude 9). Thus Peter says, generally, "Angels bring not railing accusations;" Jude gives the special instance, Michael and Satan. Peter speaks of the "angels that sinned;" Jude says more precisely, they "kept not their own矜." It is not difficult to see that Jude has followed Peter and that Peter, relying on the truthfulness of the statement, made his own use of it without hesitation when he had occasion to refer to the same or a similar class of pernicious subverters of truth and purity. This hypothesis is scarcely probable, and it is more likely that Peter had read the epistle of Jude, and reproduced in his own epistle and in his own way its distinctive clauses, which must have deeply impressed him, but with such differences as the same time as show that he was no mere copyist. Is it unworthy of an apostle to use another writing divinely authorized, and can Peter’s appropriation of so much of Jude’s language be stigmatized, as by Reuss, as “a palpable plagiarism”? Thus Jude uses the phrase “contrast without water,” this figure being more suited to his immediate purpose. The συμβαλλεις of Jude 12 was from reminiscence of sound before Peter’s mind, but it is changed of purpose into συγκρις: and Jude’s phrase τις αὐθέντη τεταρτάλλος becomes in the same connection in Peter τις πρὸς αὐθεντην αὑραν. 2 Pet. ii, 17 shows a like similarity and difference compared with Jude 18. The claim of originality thus lies on the side of Jude, while original thinking characterizes Peter’s use of Jude’s terser and minuter diction. There is no ground for Bertholdt’s suggestion that Peter quotes this passage; compare for Ullmann’s, to refer both second and third chapters to a post-apostolic period; or for Lange to brand as spurious the whole of the second chapter with the last two verses of the first chapter, and the first ten verses of the other; or for Bunsen to receive only the first twelve verses and the concluding doxology (Bertholdt, Einleitung in d. N. T. vol. vi; Ullmann, Der zweite Brief Petri, Lange, Apostol. Zeitabl., i, 135; and in Herzog’s Encyklop. s. v.; Bunsen, Ignatius von Antiochien, p. 175).

Other more specific objections against the epistle may be briefly alluded to. According to Mayerhoff (Einleitung, p. 187), the writer in iii, 2 separates himself from the apostles; Bleek (Einleitung, p. 576) and others suppose that he intended to characterize himself as an apostle, and hence his pronouns express the same uncertainty regarding the apostles of Jude, he so far altered it, but in the alteration has failed to give lucid utterance to the purpose. The phrase, with the double genitive και τῆς τοῦ αὐθέντη τεταρτάλλος ἡμῶν ἡ ἀναγέννησθαι τῆς ἐκκλησίας, naturally means, “and the commandment of the Lord given by your apostles.” The pronoun ἡμῶν is the best-supported reading, and the English version does violence to the position of the words. As Olshausen and Windischmann have shown, the use of ἡμῶν does not exclude Peter, even though it were rendered “the commandments of your apostles of the Lord.” It is rather their emphatic employment of apostleship; though if ἡμῶν had been employed, and the phrase rendered “our apostles,” the conclusion against its genuineness would certainly have some weight. But this objection that the writer excludes himself from the apostles neutralizes another, to wit, that the writer betrays too great anxiety to show himself as the apostle Peter. He could not certainly do both in the same document without stultifying himself. Does not the apostle Paul when it serves his object use pointedly the first person singular, refer to himself, and separate himself from apostles and other divines in a period of apostles and epistles? Or is it not the case that the passage, if Peter had written it, he may with justice be said that the “fathers had fallen asleep.” But the scoffers referred to were probably Gnostics who never believed that event, or at all events spiritualized the truth of it away; and after one generation had passed they might use the language imputed to them; the Gnostic patriarchs, since whose decease uniformity has characterized all the processes and laws of nature. The Gnostic spiritualism which treated the resurrection as past early troubled the Church, and its disciples might cast ridicule on the faith and hopes of others in the challenge which Peter quotes. 2. It is said that the allusion to Paul’s epistles indicates a late date, as it supposes them to be collected in part at least, and calls them by the sacred name of γραφή (iii, 15, 16). But surely it may be granted that towards the close of Peter’s life several epistles of Paul may have been brought together and placed in point of authority on the same level as the O.T.; and that other documents also—τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς—already occupied a similar place. Whatever excesses be adopted, this is the general result. The writings of Paul, so well known, yet so little, while the coming of our Lord and the end of the world, and in these discussions "are some things hard to be understood." The allusion certainly presupposes a late age, and the writer, as he informs us, was very near his death. The date of Peter's death is not precisely known, and the common traditions concerning it may therefore be modified. As Alford says, a later date than the usual one may be assigned to it. Again, it is held, as by Neander, that the epistle, "holy mount," as applied to the hill of transfiguration, indicates a late period, for Zion only was so designated; and Mayerhoff affirms that the epistle suits Mount Zion alone. But the scene on which the glory of Jesus had been so displayed might many years afterwards be well called "holy" by one who was an eye-witness, when he referred to it as a proof and symbol of "the power and coming of the Lord and of his glory." Still, a partial reply may be given to objections based on difference of style and of doctrinal representation, it must in honesty be added that these differences are not all of them wholly accounted for. The style and matter, as a whole, are so unlike the first epistle, that one has considerable difficulty in ascribing both epistles to the same author. While there is similarity in some words or phrases, the spirit, tone, and manner of the whole epistle are widely diverse. Minute criticism may discover αὐτός λεγόμενον and αὐτός λέγων, and range them in this in the first epistle; but such minutiae do not hide the general dissimilitude. It may be argued, and the argument is not without weight, that a forger would have imitated the salient peculiarities of the first epistle. No one of ordinary critical discernment would have failed to attempt the reproduction of its characteristic features of style and thought. But the absence of such studied likeness is surely in favor of the genuineness. It may be added also that, as there are in the first epistle statements so peculiar to it as to be found nowhere else, so that coincidence marks the second epistle in the declarations of its third chapter. It would have been difficult in the second century to impose on the churches a second epistle forged in Peter's name, and so unlike in many points to his first. A direct imitation of his style might have deceived some of the churches by its obvious features of similitude, but the case is widely different when a writing so obviously unlike the first epistle won its way into circulation unchallenged in its origin and history. It was not doubted as at least being lying on critical grounds. Why did not Origen and others tell us of the time of its first appearance, and how and by whom it was placed in the canon? Possibly on such points they were ignorant, or at least they knew nothing that warranted suspicion. Still the evidence of manner between the two epistles remains, and perhaps one might account for it, as Jerome has hinted and Calvin has supposed, by the supposition that Peter dictated the epistle in Aramaic, and that the amanuensis was left to express the thoughts in his own forms and words; and then by considering those views for account of difference of topic, and the change of style may be ascribed to the Greek copyist and translator. If, moreover, we admit that some time intervened between the composition of the two works; that in writing the first the apostle was aided by Silvanus, and in the second by another, perhaps Mark; that the circumstances of the churches addressed by him were considerably changed, and that the second was written in greater haste, not to speak of a possible decay of faculties, the differences may be regarded as insufficient to justify more than hesitation in admitting its genuineness. The authority of the second epistle is retained more or less decidedly by Michaelis, Nitzsche, Fiirst, Augusti, Storr, Dahl, Hug, Heydenreich, Lardner, Windischmann, Gericking, Thiessier, Stier, Dietlein, Hofmann, Luthardt, Brückner, and Olshausen. Felsolemer and Davidson incline to the same side. These are great names; yet, though we agree with their opinion, we cannot venture to say, with Bonnet, that "of all the books of the N.T. which have been controverted at certain times, there is not one whose authenticity is so certain as that of the second epistle of Peter" (Note. Text., Intro. ii, 701, Genève, 1852).

II. Time, Place, Design, and Persons addressed.—When and where the epistle was written cannot be definitely known. The place was Rome in all probability; for Peter, after coming to Rome, did not, so far as we know, leave that city till his death. His death is usually placed in 64, but it may have been later, and this epistle was written just before it. Mayerhoff ascribes it to a Jewish-Christian of Alexandria about the middle of the second century. Huther places it in the last quarter of the first century or the beginning of the second.

The persons for whom the epistle is intended are "those who have obtained like precious faith with us"; and iii, 1 identifies them with those addressed in the first epistle. It is object that this epistle asserts that Peter had taught them in person—such not being the case with those addressed in the first epistle. But the phrase added—γρηγοροῦσαν ἑμῖν (16), "we made known unto you"—seems to refer not to oral discourse, but to various portions of the first epistle in which the coming of glory of Christ is brought out. The object of the epistle is to warn against false teachers, "bringing in damnable heresies," "denying the Lord that bought them," holding a peculiar demonology—covetous, sensual, and imperialist sapphires, the victims and propagators of Antinomian delusion. Probably they taught some early form of Gnosticistic error, which, denying the Lord's humanity and stoning death, ridiculed his second advent in man's nature, set aside the authority of law, and by this frontier justified itself in licentious impurity. The epistle is true to the spirit of the age, like the other, claiming divine basis for their teachings, and therefore the more able to shake the faith of others, and seduce them into perilous apostasy. Thus, in brief, as the writer himself describes it (iii, 17), his object is, first, warning, or to caution his readers against seduction: "Beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness"—προσέχετε ἵνα ἑσεχθῆτε κατὰ τὴν ἐσχάτην ὡς ἡμεῖς οἱ κατηχήθητε ἀπὸ τῆς ἀληθείας τοῦ κυρίου ὑμῶν Παῦλου καὶ Μωυσῆ. For this χάρις and γνῶσις would fortify them and make them invincible against those assaults which so often succeeded with the unwaried who fell in their heedlessness, the graceless who trusted in their own strength, and the ignorant or half-informed, so liable from their spiritual knowledge to be imposed upon by any system that dealt in novel speculations, professed to unfold mysteries, or give license and warrant for lawless practices. The supposition of Grotius, that it was written in the days of the reign of Trajan, and to the elder Barnabas, bishop of Jerusalem, is without any probability, as Bertholdt has more than sufficiently shown. The arguments of Schwengler for its place as Rome, its date the end of the second century, and its purpose as an effort to conciliate Petrine and Pauline theological differences, are answered conclusively by Huther.
III. The contents of the epistle seem quite in accordance with its asserted origin. The customary opening salutation is followed by an enumeration of Christian blessings and exhortation to Christian duties, with special reference to the maintenance of the truth which had already been communicated to the Church (i, 1-18). Refuse the word of prophecy, that is the testimony of the Holy Ghost (14-21). The danger of being misled by false prophets is dwelt upon with great force (22-30), and the second chapter, with its covetousness and gross sensuality, combined with pretensions to spiritualism, in short all the permanent and fundamental characteristics of Antinomianism, are described; while the overthrow of all opponents of Christian truth is predicted (i, 1-29) in connection with prophecies touching the second advent of Christ, the destruction of the world by fire, and the promise of new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness. After an exhortation to attend to Paul's teaching, in accordance with the less explicit admonition of James (20, 15), the epistle closes with the customary ascription of glory to our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

PETER OF ALCANTARA, St., was born in the place of which he wrote in 1499, at the university in Salamanca, and when sixteen years old became a Franciscan monk. In 1519 he became prior at Badajoz, and in 1524 priest. For seven years he lived in retirement, in 1538 he was made general-superior of his order in Estremadura. In 1556 he founded, with the consent of Julius III, a separate, reformed congregation, called the Observantia (q. v.), and assisted St. Theresa in her reforms of the Carmelites. He died in 1562, and was canonized in 1569. His work De oratione et meditatione was long and widely circulated. The De animi pace seu tranquillitate is not genuine. According to the legend, Peter walked on the sea by faith. In a picture in the Munich gallery, he not only walks himself, but a lay brother goes with him, whom Peter seems to encourage by pointing to heaven. See Acta Sanctorum, vol. viii.

PETER OF ALEXANDRIA (1), the first of that name in the list of bishops, and noted for the part he took against the Meleitan schism, was born in the 3d century. He was placed over the see of Alexandria after the death of Theonas, which occurred April 9, 800. Peter had not occupied the position quite three years when the persecution commenced by the emperor Diocletian, and continued during the reign of Constantine. Peter was obliged to hide himself, and died from one place to another, as we learn from a discourse said to have been delivered by him in prison, in which he states that he found shelter at different times in Mesopotamia, in Phoenicia, in Palestine, and in various islands.

conjectures that he was imprisoned during the reign of Diodorean or Maximian Galerius, but, if so, Peter must have obtained his release before the schism in the Egyptian churches. In 306 he assembled a council, which passed upon the misdeeds of Meletius, bishop of Lycopolis. This prelate, in publishing calumny against the Arians, and against the schism in the Church of Alexandria, which lasted 150 years. Peter was obliged to seek his safety in flight. In the ninth year of the persecution he was, suddenly and contrary to all expectation, again arrested by order of Maximin Daza, and, without any distinct charge being brought against him, was beheaded Nov. 29, 311. Eusebius speaks with the highest admiration of his piety and his attainments in sacred literature, and he is revered as a saint and martyr both in the Eastern and Western churches. His memory is now celebrated by the Latin and Greek churches on the 29th, except in Russia, where the more ancient computation, which placed it on the 25th, is still followed. Peter wrote several works, of which there are very scanty remains: (1.) Sermo de Pententia:—(2.) Sermo in Sanctum Pascha. These discourses are not extant in their original form, but are found in various writings. Peter, who in time of persecution had fallen away—fourteen of them from the Sermo de Pententia (λαγός ως παραπομπις), the fifteenth from the Sermo in Sanctum Pascha—are contained in all the Canonic Collections. Ancient writers of the early centuries, such as: Athanasius, 16. 6:3; Methodius the Confessor, Hesychius, 38, prolepticus (Basaio, 1560); in the Orthodoxophorata of Heroldus (ibid. 1556); and of Gryneus (ibid. 1569); in the first and second editions of De La Bigne's Bibliotheca Patrum (Paris, 1575 and 1589), and in the Cologne edition (1618). They are given also in the Concilia. It is only in some MSS. and editions that the separate source of the fifteenth canon is pointed out—(8.) Liber de Dei vindicata s. Deitate. There is a citation from this treatise in the Acta Concilii Episcopi; it occurs in the Actio prima, and a part of it is again cited in the De electione Curtii, which is given in the sequel of the Acta:—(4.) Homiliae de Adventu Sacerdotis s. Christi. A short citation from this occurs in the Latin version of the work of Leontius of Byzantium, Contra Nestorianos et Eutychianos, lib. 1:—(5. 6.) Two fragments, one described, Ex primo Sermone, de eo quod nec praesidentialis Animis nec cum passaret proprietis in Corpore missa est, the other as Ex Mystagogia quam fecit ad Ecclesiam cum Martyris Coronam suopsurisasset, are cited by the emperor Justinian in his Epistola ad Memmiam C. Theodorius adversus Originem, given in the Acta Concilii C. (Patrum, 1638, p. 716, col. 659, ed. Labbé; vol. iii, cols. 256, 257, ed. Hardouin). Another fragment of the same discourse is contained in the compilation Leonitii et Joannis Rerum Sacrarum lib. ii, published by Mai in the above-cited Collectio, iii, 85:—(7.) Epistola S. Petri Episcopi ad Ecclesiam Alexandrinam, noticing some irregular proceedings of the schismatic Meletius. This letter, which is very short, was published in a Latin version by Seipio Maffei in the third volume of his Observationis Letterariae (Verona, 1737-46, 6 vol. 12mo)—(8.10.) De uncle. A fragment of this letter, cited by Leonitis and Joannes, and published Mai by ibid. (p. 96). The published fragments of Peter's works, with few exceptions, are given in the fourth volume of Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum, p. 91, etc. See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii, 32; viii, 18; ix, 6, in the second edition of: Anonymi, De schismate contra Arianos, c. 59; Ephippianis, L. c.; Concilia, L. c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 801, 1, 160 (Oxford ed. 1740-43); Tillemont, Mémoires, v. 436, etc.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. ix, 816, etc.; Cellier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés et des ecclésiastiques, part i, ch. 304. Petrus was obliged to hide himself, and died from one place to another, as we learn from a discourse said to have been delivered by him in prison, in which he states that he found shelter at different times in Mesopotamia, in Phoenicia, in Palestine, and in various islands.
man empire is the continuance of the Roman imperium (a view in very recent times espoused by Freeman in his Comparative Politics). All princes are subordinate to the emperor; the emperor is the subordinate of the pope, who has received his authority from God.

Peter of Antioch (2), the third patriarch of that name in the current tables of the occupants of that see, which commence with the apostle Peter, was born near the beginning of the 11th century. Contemporaries with Michael Cerularius, patriarch of Constantinople, and Leo of Achrydia, he associated with them in hostility to the Latin Church. According to Cave, Peter bitterly inveighed against the lives and doctrines of the Latin clergy, and especially against the addition of the word filioque to the creed; while, according to Le Quien, he preserved a more impartial tone, and showed everywhere "a disposition averse to schism." Peter obtained the patriarchate in the year 1058, and in the same year he sent synodical letters to the patriarchs of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Constantinople, and to Pope Leo IX, signifying his accession. Cave states that he sent to the pope "a profession of his faith," but it is probable that he has applied this term to the synodal letter, of which a Latin version appears among the letters of Leo IX. Le Quien, who had in his possession the Greek text of these synodal letters, complains of the great discrepancy between the Greek text and the Latin version. Two letters of Peter are written in Greek, with a Latin version, in the Monumenta Ecclesiae Graecae of Cotelier (ii, 112, 145). The first is entitled Epistola ad Domumcun Domuam, and is an answer to Dominicus Graecius a Venetus, patriarch of Venice or Aqui-leia, whose letter to him, in the collection of the writings of Peter, precedes that of Peter; the second is addressed to Michael Cerularius (Epistola ad Michaelum Cerularium), and is preceded by a letter of Michael to Peter, to which it is the answer. A considerable part of this letter had already been published by Leo Allatius, in his De Consensu Ecclesiasticae Orient. et Occident. lib. iii, c. 12, § 4. There is extant in MS. at Vienna another letter of Peter, Petri Epistola ad Joannem Transman in Apu- lia Episcopum, relating to the matters in dispute between the Eastern and Western churches. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ab anno 1400, ii, 192; Oudin, Comment. de Scriptorib. et Scriptia Eccles. ii, 605; Lambec, Comment. de Biblioth. Casoriae; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, ii, 754.

Peter (Pierre) of Baun (Lat. Petrus de Palma), general of the Dominicans, was born at Baune (county of Bourgogne) in the latter part of the 13th century. He was a partisan of the papal cause. Having early entered into the order of St. Dominic, he went from the convent of Chartres in 1291 to Paris, and there gave public lessons upon the Livre des Sentences of Pierre Lombard. In 1343 he was elected general of his order by a unanimous vote. He died in Paris March 1, 1345. He wrote Postilla in quattuor Evangelia, some copies of which are preserved at Basel and at Tours, and two Letters Encycliques, which have not been printed. See Quéfif et Echard, Scriptor. ord. Pradec. i, 614. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Génerale, xii, 198.

Peter (Pierre), son of Béchin, was a French historian, who died in the 12th century. It is supposed that he was canon of St. Martin of Tours. He wrote a history of France, which begins with the creation of the world and ends with 1137. For ancient times, it is a compilation from Eusebius, from St. Jerome, Isidore of Seville, Gregory of Tours; for modern times, from Frédéguier, St. Odon, etc. He was from this passage, relative to St. Martin of Tours, to the abbey of Cormery, and to the counts of Anjou, are not without interest. It has never been published entirely. Short fragments of it may be found in the Recueil de Duchesne (iii, 365-372), and in that of Bouquet (ii, vi, viii, x, xi, xii); but M. le marquis de Sade, in his part of it in his Chroniques de Touraine, after three burn, and not honor, for that is a reproach to the sufferings of the Saviour. Peter of Bruys even maintained that the sinner was not instituted by Christ, and rite of perpetual observation; that he only once distributed his body and blood among his disciples. This expression is obscure; perhaps he meant to say that Christ had observed this rite once for all. He also rejected the mass and sacrifices for the dead. He found many followers, known as the Peterbrusites. Peter of Bruys was burned at St. Gilles on Still Friday, in 1124, in the Arelation diocese, by a mob, in an emeute caused by his preaching, and probably instigated by the Romish ecclesiastics. See Gieseler, Kirchengesch. vol. iii, pt. ii, p. 566; and Richard de Grand, Dogmengeschichte vol. iii, p. 51 sq.; Münzner, Dogmengeschichte. (edit. by Cobb), p. 299, 210. (J. H. W.)

Peter of Cellier (Petru Cellensis), a French prelate of some note, flourished in the second half of the 12th century. He was abbot at Montier la Celle from 1150; in 1162 he filled a like office at St. Remis, near Rheims; and in 1181 was made bishop of Chartres. He died in 1188. Peter of Cellier left mystical interpretations of the Scriptures, and letters to the popes and bishops and many princes, who highly esteemed him. He had reformatory ideas, and did not hesitate to express his ideas. His works have been published several times and published several times. One edition is by Sirmond (Par. 1613; Ven. 1729).

Peter of Chartres, a French ecclesiastic who flourished in the first half of the 10th century, died about 1089. The authors of the Histoire Littéraire de la France adhere to several works. We mention only Manuelis Ecclesiasticum, Manuelis de Mystere Ecclesiae, and Speculum Ecclesiae. This last treatise, which offers us curious details upon the origin and meaning of liturgical usages, is unpublished; but we indicate three manuscript copies in the Imperial Library of Saint-Victor, under the numbers 513, 724, 926. Number 923 has one chapter more than the other two. Jean Garet, canon of Louvain, Gesner, Posevin, and after them the authors of the Histoire Littéraire, designate also among the works of our chancellor a Paraphrase of the Psalms, likewise unpublished. There is, finally, in the library of Mont-Saint-Michel, Glosae in Job, severalum Petrum, cancellarium Cantuensem. See Gesner, Bibl. Universialis, p. 669; Posevin, Apparatus, ii, 286; Hist. Lit. de la France, vii, 841. Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, x, 184.

Peter Cominus, an Italian prelate, was born in the latter part of the 11th century. He was raised to the archbishopric of Milan in 1110, having previously held some less important see. He was sent by pope Paschal II on a mission to the emperor Alexius I Comnenus, and engaged eagerly in the controversy on the procession of the Holy Spirit. His principal work is, Ad Imperatorum Dominum Alexium Comnenum Oratio, etc., designed to prove the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son as well as from the Father, published in the Grecia Orthodoxa of Allatius, 1, 879, etc. (Rome, 1652, 4to), and given in a Latin version by Baroni, Annal. Eccles. ad ann. 1116, vol. viii, etc.

Peter Chrysologus, St., an Italian prelate, was born at Imola, in the northern part of Italy, towards the close of the 4th century. He was educated by Corne- lius, a bishop, and received ordination as deacon from the same prelate, in 383. He was made abbot of Ravena by pope Sixtus III, who knew all his merit. He labored to reform several abuses which had been introduced into his diocese, and to extirpate the remnants of pagan superstition. In A.D. 448 St. Germain d'Auxerre having come to Ravena, he tried to co-operate with him with marks of the most profound veneration. Shortly afterwards the heresiarct Eutyches wrote to him complaining of the condemnation passed on him by Flavius of Constantinople, and Peter replied to him in Peter the Dominican. See Peter Martyr.

Peter (Pierre) of Dresden, a German reformer, was born at Dresden in the latter part of the 14th century. Driven from that city for having spread the doctrines of the Vaudois, Pierre sought refuge in Prague, where, in order to subsest, he opened a small school for children. Some time after he attracted to himself one of his former disciples, in whom he published his opinions. Pierre inveighed especially against the communion in one kind. "To his influence," says Gillett, "is it to be attributed in large measure the origin of that discussion in respect to the communion of the cup which almost revolutionized Bohemia, and brought down upon it the energies of crusading Christendom."

He was evidently a man of superior talent, and one who possessed great power over the minds of others. At Prague, among the thousands congregated at its university, he had large opportunity for inculcating his peculiar views. The very fact that he was instrumental in shaping the enlarged views of Jacobell suffices to rescue his name and memory from oblivion. He afterwards united with the Hussites against the primacy of the pope, and propagated their ideas upon the nature of the Church. To establish his doctrines he wrote several works now completely forgotten. He died at Prague in 1440. See Eneas Sylvius, Bohem. ch. 5; Bonnivis, Hist. Bohem.; Moréri, Dict. Hist.; Jäger, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon; Gillet, Huss und die Hussiten, i, 59, 683, 519. (J. H. W.)

Peter of Edessa, a Syrian by birth, and a presbyter of the church at Edessa, and an eminent preacher, wrote Tractatus variarum Casuarum, treatises on various subjects, and composed Psalms in metre like those of Ephrem the Syrian. Trithemius ascribes to him Commentarii in Psalmos, and says that he wrote in Syrian. All his works have perished.

Peter (St.) EXORCISTA and MARCELLINUS (fl. 854-869), two Roman saints always represented together, were hanged in various editions of the Bibliotheca Puteana. It is in the ninth volume of the Lyons edition of Galland (Ven. 1776, fol.).

Peter the Deacon (2), a learned Benedictine of Monte-Cassino, of a Roman patrician family, was born about the close of the 11th century, in the reign of Alexius I Comnenus. In the Gesta Romanorum de Leucalvii (lib. vi, 395-397) are given Interrogationes quas solvit reverendissimus Churlartianus, Dominus Petrus, iberoque Diaconus Majoris Ecclesiae (sec. of St. Sophia at Constantinople). A. M. 6890 = A.D. 1092. We learn from this title when the author lived, and that he held the offices described. He seems to have been admitted into the Benedictine Order at the very early age of fifteen. In a controversy of his convent with pope Innoce II, he defended the monastic interests to great advantage before the emperor Lothair, in 1088, while he was in South Italy. So well pleased was the emperor with Peter that he was made chartularius and chaplain of the Roman realm. Later he was intrusted by pope Alexander with the management of the convent of Monte-Cassino, which he had died after the middle of the 12th century. The following of his writings are instructive for the contemporaneous history of the Church:

De vita et obitu Justorum Cenobii Cassinensis: — Lib. illustrium eorum Cassinensi Archihtetori: — Lib. de locis sanctis, and De Nostriam temporibus. There are, or were, extant in MS. in the king's library at ment of the 5th century. He was abbot of a monastery at or near Constantinople, but various accusations (induding heresy) being made against him, he fled to Antioch and there was welcomed by the emperor Leo I, who was sent thither. Peter appears to have held the doctrine of the Monophysites, the controversy concerning which was at that time agitating the entire Eastern Church. On his arrival at Antioch, the patri-archate of which city was held by Martyrius, a supporter of the Council of Chalcedon, he determined to attempt the usurpation of that office, engaging Zeno and a number of those who favored the Monophysite doctrine in the enterprise. Great tumult and confusion ensued, one cause of which was that Peter added to the sacred hymn called the Trisagion the words "who was crucified for us"—which constituted one of the tests of the Monophysites—and anathematized all who did not sanction the alteration. Martyrius, unable to maintain order, went to Constantinople, where he was kindly received by Leo I, through whose influence he hoped to be able, on his return to Antioch, to quell the disturbance. Failing in this, and disgusted with his failure, he abdicated the patriarchate, which was immediately assumed by Peter. Leo, however, at the instigation of Gennadius, patriarch of Constantinople, promptly expelled the intruder, incurring the enmity and wrath of the patriarch del and his approval. Peter was banished to Upper Egypt, but, contriving to escape from his exile, he returned to Con-tinople and obtained refuge in a monastery, where he remained until the revolt of Basilicus against Zeno, having bound himself by oath to abstain from exciting for further troubles. The revolt succeeding, and Zeno being driven from Constantinople, Basilicus exhorted himself to gain the Monophysites, and issued an encyclical letter to the various prelates of the Church, anathematizing the decrees of the Synod of Chalcedon. Peter gave formal answer to this letter, and was imprisoned and restored to the patriarchate of Antioch (A.D. 476). Julian soon after died of grief, and Peter, resuming authority, restored the obnoxious clause "who was crucified for us"; and by repeating his anathemas excited fresh tumultus, which resulted in plunder and murder. Zeno, however, recovering the imperial power, a synod was assembled and Peter was deposed, chiefly through the agency of one of his own partisans, John Codanatos, whom he had made a bishop. He was banished to Byzantium, whence he fled to Euchaita and obtained refuge in the church of St. Theodore. After a period of nine years, during which time numerous changes had been made in the patriarchate, the Monophysites, again in the ascendant, persuaded Zeno to consent to the restoration of Peter upon his signing the ex-crucified for us: "his blood turned his hair," and the hermit made his vow that with the help of God these things should cease. In an interview with the patriarch Simeon he declared that the natives of the West should take up arms in the Christian cause. On his return to the West he spoke so earnestly on the subject to pope Urban II that the pontiff warmly adopted his views, and, however selfish may have been the promptings of his zeal in the cause—he foreseeing probably that, whatever might be the result to the warriors of the cross, his own power would thereon be lost—Peter would not rest until he had induced Urban eagerly bestowed his blessing on the fervent enthusiast, and commissioned him to preach throughout the West an armed confederation of Christians for the deliverance of the Holy City. Mean in figure and diminutive in stature, and gifted only with an elecient voice and a ready memory, he succeeded so well that the diseases were more than made up by the earnestness which gave even to the glance of his eye a force more powerful than speech. His enthusiasm lent him a power which no external advantages of form could have comnandèd. He was filled with a fire which would not stay, and the horrors which were burnt in upon his soul were those which would most surely stir the conscience and rouse the wrath of his hearers. His fiery appeals carried everything before them. "He traversed Italy," writes the historian of Latin Christianity, "crossed the Alps, from province to province, from city to city. He rode on a mule, with a crucifix in his hand, his head and feet bare: his dress was a long robe, girt with a cord, and a hermit's cloak of the coarsest stuff. He preached in the pulpits, on the roads, in the marketplaces. (His eloquence was that which suits the hearts of the people, for it came from his own—brief, figure, full of bold apostrophes; it mingled with his own tears, with his own groans; he beat his breast: the contagion spread throughout his audience. His preaching appealed to the pride, the joy of the masses, to the indigination and pity, to the pride of the warrior, to the compassion of the man, the religion of the Christian, to the love of the brethren, to the hatred of the unbeliever

Peter the Hermit, an ecclesiastical character of the 11th century, is of very little significance except as the monks of the Church of Rome have given him importance by crediting him with the movement of the Christian armies to the East known as the First Crusade, for which the credit is by most compotent critics awarded to pope Urban II. Von Sybel, in his Geschichte des ersten Kreuzzuges (Dusseldorf, 1841), aggravated by his insulting tyranny, to reverence for the Redeemer and the saints, to the desire of expiating sin, to the hope of eternal life." The results are well known as among those moral marvels of enthusiasm of which history presents occasional examples. All France was stirred from its very depths; and just at the time when the enthusiasm of that country had been enkindled to its full fervor, it received a sacredness and an authority from the decrees of a council held at Clermont, in which Urban himself was present, and in which his celebrated harangue was but the signal for the outpouring, through all Western Christendom, of the same chivalrous emotions by which France had been borne away under the rude eloquence of the Hermit. To understand this success, we must take into account the poverty of the masses, and the alluring prospect of a residence in Eastern lands, for the scenes of which were painted in glowing colors by the apostle of the holy war. Thousands of outcasts had always been ready to follow the princes in their marauding expeditions or political wars, and how much more in a war which enlisted the highest sympathies of their nature in its behalf, which received the sanction of the ministers of religion, and was regarded as the will of God! For the details of the expedition, we must refer to the article CRUSADES, our sole present concern being with the personal history of Peter. Of the enormous but undisciplined army which assembled from all parts of Europe, one portion was committed to his conduct; the other being under the command of a far more skilful leader, Walter (q. v.) the Penniless. Peter, mounted upon an ass, with his coarse woolen mantle and his rude sandala, placed himself at the head of his followers. On the march through Hungary they became involved in hostilities with the Hungarians, and suffered a severe defeat at Selmín, whence they proceeded with much difficulty to Constantinople. There the emperor Alexius, filled with dismay at the want of discipline which they exhibited, was but too happy to give them supplies for their onward march; and near Nice they encountered the army of the sultan Soliman, from whom they suffered a terrible defeat. Peter accompanied the subsequent expedition under Godfrey; but worn out by the delays and difficulties of the siege of Antioch, he was about to withdraw from the expedition, and was only retained in it by the influence of the other leaders, who foresaw the worst results from his departure. Accordingly he had a share, although not marked by any signal distinction, in the siege and capture of the Holy City in 1099, and the closing incident of his history as a crusader was an address to the victorious army delivered on the Mount of Olives. He returned to Europe, and founded a monastery at Huy, in the diocese of Liege, where he died, July 7, 1115. The movement which had been inaugurated continued to the end of the twelfth century, and bore the crucifix and palm. His more peculiar attribute is either the axe stuck in his head or a gash from which the blood trickled. Fra Bartolomeo painted the head of his beloved Jerome Savarola as St. Peter Martyr. He is also known as St. Peter of Verona. (J. H. W.)

Peter of Maillézeau, a French chronicler of the 11th century, was, according to Dom Rieti, a man of talent, of merit, and learning. He embraced the monastic rule in the early part of the 11th century, and flourished under Goderanne, abbé of Maillézeau, in Bas-Poitou. We have an interesting article of his upon the history of his time, particularly that of the counts of Poitiers and the abbé of Maillézeau. Father Labbé has comprised it (Maillécezian Chronic) in the monuments that he collected for the history of Aquitaine. What concerns the translation of Saint Rimor has been detached from it and published again by Mabillon and the Hollander. See Hirt, Litt. de France, v. 599. —Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xi. 187.

Peter (St.) Martyr (1), a Roman Catholic saint of the Dominican order, is greatly beloved in the Roman fold, and in his own order ranks next to the founder himself. He was born at Verona about 1205. His parents were Catharists, but Peter early became orthodox in sentiment, and sought his education at the conventual schools of the Church. At the age of fifteen he united with the order by the persuasion of Dominic. He soon became a public character by reason of his piety and oratorical power. He turned against his own sect, and so severely persecuted the Catharists that he was universally regarded as intolerant. When the Inquisition needed an uncompromising head, Peter was made its general by approval of Pope Honorius III. His high-handed disposal of the lives and property of people under him made him a general object of hatred. Two Veronian noblemen whom he had accused, and whose property was confiscated, resolved to be revenged on him. They hired assassins, who watched that they might kill him in a forest where they knew he would pass unaccompanied save by a single monk. When he appeared one of the murderers struck him down with an axe. They then pursued and killed his attendant. When they returned to Peter he was reciting the Apostles' Creed, or, as others say, was writing it on the ground with his blood, when the assassins completed their cruel work. This event occurred on April 28, A.D. 1252. In the various paintings of this saint he is represented in the habit of his order, and bears the crucifix and palm. His more peculiar attribute is either the axe stuck in his head or a gash from which the blood trickled. Fra Bartolomeo painted the head of his beloved Jerome Savarola as St. Peter Martyr. He is also known as St. Peter of Verona. (J. H. W.)

Peter (St.) Martyr (2), a Romish saint of the 15th century, was born at Arona in 1455, and was probably educated at the university in Salamanca, where he taught for many years with great success. He had a part in the wars against the Moors, and in 1505 took holy orders. As prior of Granada he was frequently employed in very important missions by queen Isabella the Catholic. His travels in diplomatic interests he described in Deegotiana Statupoloni. He died in 1525. His Epistolae de rebus Hispanicis was published at Alcala in 1580, and at Amsterdam in 1672.

Peter Mongus, a Monophysite, flourished as patriarch of Alexandria in the 6th century. Liberatus gives him also the surname of the Stammerer. He was ordained deacon by Dioscorus, successor of Cyril, who held the patriarchate for seven years (A.D. 444-451). Peter was the ready participant in the violations of Dioscorus, and earnestly embraced his cause when he was deposed by the Council of Chalcedon, withdrawing from the communion of Dioscorus, Proterius, who supported the cause of the council, and uniting in the opposition raised by Timothy Elurus and others. Peter was consequently sentenced, apparently by Proterius, to deposition and excommunication. Whether he was banished as well as Timothy Elurus, is not clear, but he seems to have been accompanied Timothy to Alexandria, and to have been his chief supporter when, after the death of the emperor Marcian, he returned, and either murdered Proterius or excited the tumults that led to his death, A.D. 457. Timothy Elurus was immediately raised to the patriarchate by his parties, but was shortly after banished by the emperor Leo I, the Thracian, who had succeeded Marcian. Peter also was obliged to flee. Another Timothy, surnamed Salofaciolus, a supporter of the Council of Chalcedon, was appointed to succeed Proterius in the patriarchate. When, in the following year, 459, or rather during the usurpation of Basiliscus, Timothy Elurus was recalled by exile (A.D. 475), and was sent from Constantinople to Alexandria to re-occupy that see, he was joined by Peter and his party, and with their support drove out his competitor. Salofaciolus, who took refuge at Elurus' monastery at Canopus. On the downfall of Basiliscus and the restoration of Zeno, Timothy Elurus was allowed, through the emperor's compassion for his great age, to retain his see; but when on his death (A.D. 477) the Monophysite bishops of Egypt, without waiting for the emperor's directions, elected Peter (who had previously obtained the rank of archdeacon) as his successor, the emperor's indignation was so far aroused that he determined to put the new prelate to death. His anger, however, somewhat abated, and Peter was allowed to live, but was deposed by the patriarchate, to which Timothy Salofaciolus was restored. On the death of Salofaciolus, which occurred soon after, John of Tabenna, surnamed Talais, was appointed to succeed him; but he was very shortly deposed by order of Zeno, on some account not clearly ascertained, and Peter Mongus was unexpectedly recalled from Euchaita in Pontus, whither he had been banished, and was (A.D. 482) restored to his see. His restoration appears to have been part of the policy of Zeno to unite, if possible, all parties; a policy which Peter, whose age and misfortunes appear to have abated the fierce spirit of a party spirit, adopted. He consequently subscribed the Henotic of the emperor, and readmitted the Monophysite party to communion on their doing the same. John of Tabenna had meanwhile fled to Rome, where the pope, Simplicius, who, with the Western Church, steadily supported the Council of Chalcedon, embraced his cause, and wrote to the emperor in his behalf. Felix II or III, who succeeded Simplicius (A.D. 483), was equally zealous on the same side. Peter had some difficulty in maintaining his position. In order to recover the favor of his Monophysite friends, who had acceded to Euchaita, in obedience to Zeno's wishes, he alienated, he anathematized the Council of Chalcedon; and then, to avert the displeasure of Acacius of Constantinople and of the court, to whose temporizing course this decisive step was adverse, he denied that he had done so. Evagrius has preserved the letter he wrote to Acacius on this occasion, which is the only writing of Peter now extant. By this derogation he preserved his see, and was enabled to brave the repeated anathemas of the Western Church. When, however, to recover the standing of the Council of Monophysites, he again anathematized the Council of Chalcedon, and Eupatrius, the newly elected patriarch of Constantinople, forsaking the policy of his predecessors, took part with the Western Church against him, his difficulties became more serious. What result this combination against him might have produced cannot now be known; death removed him from the scene of strife A.D. 490, shortly before the death of Zeno. He was succeeded by Peter, who anathematized Alexandria by another Monophysite, Anthanasius II. See Cave, Hist. Litt. i, 455; Fabricius, Bibli. Graec. xi, 586; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. ii, col. 416, etc.; Tilmont, Mémoires Ecclésiastiques, vol. xvi. Peter (Pierre), archbishop of Narbonne, the son of Ameli, was born in the late half of the 12th century. He was at first clerk of Saint-Nazaire of Béziers; canon, chamberlain, grand archdeacon of Narbonne; then elected archbishop in the month of March, 1226. The extermination of the Albigeens having ended the war so long prosecuted against these people, Peter used all his efforts to pacify his diocese. But observing the method practiced in his time, he seized, according to that custom, all the goods which had belonged to the heretics, made all the inhabitants of Narbonne take oath to massacre any one who should dare in the future to separate himself from the Roman orthodoxy, and in order to watch over, discover, and point out the enemies, introduced in 1231 into the city of Narbonne the St. Dominician friars. But the Albigeens were conquered, not subdued. An occasion having occurred in 1224, the inhabitants, in these circumstances, and drove out their archbishop. Vainly he communicated the situation. In order to return to his metropolis, after about a year's exile, Peter was obliged to descend to conditions. The insurgents imposed upon him, among others, that of expelling from their city the Brother Preachers, and under this eye, for greater safety, they invaded the convent of these brothers and put them[to flight]. Peter dared not recall them. Yet he was a prelate energetic in his designs, courageous in his conduct, who had the temperament of a man of arms, and who oftener faced perils than turned his back on them. In 1225 he made a campaign against the Moors with Jayme I, king of Aragon, and, according to the Chronique of Albèric, he took an active part in the battles fought under the walls of Valencia. The following year he raised other troops, and at their head went to drive from Carcassonne Raymond de Tancarvel and some other lords in revolt against the king of France. He was less fortunate in his attempt against Aimeric; the latter drove him from Narbonne in 1242. Finally, in 1243, we see the archbishop Peter making the siege of the château of Montsegur, and taking it. The heretics were to be the last exploit of this belligerent prelate. He died at Narbonne May 20, 1245. See Gallia Christiana, vol. vi, col. 65; Hist. Litt. de la France, xviii, 381; Vaissette, Hist. de Languedoc, iii, 892; Albèric, Chronicon, ad ann. 1239; Guillemus de Pilos, Hist. bell. occid. ab omnibus Albigeens, c. 39, 40 sq.—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, ii, 185. Peter of Nicomedia, an Eastern ecclesiastic, was in the early part of the 7th century. He was one of the prelates who, with certain deacons and monks, had to clear themselves in the third Constantinopolitan, or sixth eumenical, council (A.D. 680), from the suspicion of holding the Monothelitic heresy; but he, with the orthodox and solemn written confessions of their belief in the orthodox doctrine of two wills in Christ. The confessions were of considerable length, and all exactly alike, and are given in the original Greek with a considerably harmonized, but completely in Latin version in the Acta Concilii CPholidi I, Acta Conciliorum, according to one of the Latin versions of the Acta given by Harlouin, in Acta Ix. See Concilii, vol. vi, col. 784, 942, ed. Labbé; vol. iii, col. 1292, 1248, 1587, 1561, ed. Hardouin; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 680, i, 595. Peter (St.) Nolasco (Sp. San Pedro Nolasco), a Roman saint, noted as the founder of "the Order of Our Lady of Mercy," flourished in the first half of the 13th century. He was the son of a noble of Languedoc, and became a convert of St. John de Matha. He was much cultivated, and greatly esteemed for his learning and application, and was made a tutor of the young king James of Aragon. As the needs of the crusaders called for help from various directions, Peter brought about the formation of the order above referred to. At first it was military, and consisted of knights and gentlemen. The king himself was placed at the head, and his arms served as a device or badge. Soon, however, the order became very popular, and extended itself on all sides. Peter Nolasco was the superior, and spent his life in expeditions to the provinces under the Moors, from which he brought back hundreds of redeemed captives. In time the order changed its character from that of a military to that of a religious institution, and as such exerted a wide influence. Peter himself, when he was old, was taken from his cell by angels, so the legend goes, and borne to and from the altar, where he received the holy Eucharist. In the paintings of the saints he is represented as old, with a white habit, and the shield of King James on his breast. His death is said to have occurred Jan. 15, 1258. (J. H. W.)

Peter the Patrician (1) was a Byzantine historian of the 6th century. He was born at Thessalonica, in the province of Macedonia, then included in the prefecture of Illyricum. He settled at Constantinople, where he acquired distinction as a rhetor or advocate, a profession for which his cultivated mind, agreeable address, and natural powers of persuasion were admirably adapted. These qualifications pointed him out to the discernment of the emperor Justinian I as suited for diplomatic life, and he was sent by him (A.D. 534) as ambassador to Amalasuntha, regent of the kingdom of the Ostrogoths. Before arriving in Italy Peter learned the death of the young king Athalaric, the marriage of Amalasuntha and Theodotus, one of the principal chiefs of the Ostrogoths, their exaltation to the throne of Italy, and of their subsequent dissensions and the imprisonment of Amalasuntha. Peter then received instructions to vindicate the cause of the imprisoned queen; but his arrival at Ravenna was speedily followed by the murder of Amalasuntha. Procopius charges Peter with instigating Theodotus to commit the murder, being secretly commissioned to do so by the jealousy of Theodora, Justinian's wife, who held out to him as an inducement to comply with her desire the hope of great advancement. Whether he was an abettor to the crime or not, Peter, in conformity to the orders of Justinian, demanded reparation for it, and declared war against Theodotus. The latter, terrified, commissioned him to convey to Justinian the most humble propositions of peace, and even, if necessary, the offer of his abdication. The last offer only was accepted; but when Peter returned to communicate the will of the emperor to Theodotus, the latter was disarmed and forced to accept it. The king of the Ostrogoths even violated the law of nations by imprisoning the Byzantine ambassadors. Peter and his colleague remained in captivity until Belisarius, by detaining some Ostrogothic ambassadors, compelled Vitiges, who had succeeded Theodotus, to release him and Anthes about the end of A.D. 538. On his return Peter received, as Procopius intimates, by Theodora's interest, and as a reward for his participation in procuring Amalasuntha's death, the high appointment of magister officiorum, but incurred general odium by the part he had acted. He exercised his authority with the most unbridled rapacity; for although he was, according to Procopius, naturally of a mild temper, and by no means insolent, he was at the same time the most dishonest of all mankind, contemptuously instructing his officers to injure the most obscure and humble. Several years afterwards (about A.D. 560) Peter, who retained his post of magister officiorum, and had in addition acquired the dignity of patrician, was sent by Justinian to negotiate a peace with Chosroes I, king of Persia. Some negotiations with pope Vigilius (552), and a new mission into Persia (562), are the last events known of the career of Peter the Patrician. He died soon after his return from Persia, leaving one son, who succeeded him in his office of magister officiorum. According to Suidas, Peter composed two works, Historia and De Statu Reipublicae. The Historia began with Augustus, or rather with the second triumvirate, and continued to a period a little later than the time of Constantine the Great. Considerable portions of it are preserved in the Excerpta de Legationibus, made by order of the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus. The treatise De Statu Republlicae is lost, although Mai thinks he recognises it in De Republica, from which he has deciphered and published long passages in his Scriptorium Veterum Nova Collectio. Authentic fragments from the treatise are found in De Ceremoniis Aulae Byzantinae of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. Peter the Patrician has given a relation of his negotiations with Chosroes, which is quoted by Menander. All the remains of this historian are given in the Bonn edition of the Excerpta de Legationibus. Peter the Patrician (2) was a Greek saint who lived early in the 9th century. He had fought in the battle (A.D. 811) against the Bulgarians in which the emperor Nicephorus I was defeated and slain. A life of Peter, taken from the Menoissa of the Greeks, is given in the original Greek, with a Latin version, and a Commentarius Praecepta by Joannes Pinius, in the Acta Sanctorum (July), i, 289, 290.

Peter, or Petrus, was a modern Latin poet, whose life is known to us through his works. He was born in the city of Babylon. He was the son of a wealthy merchant and was educated at the court of the Roman emperor. His education was broad and he was fluent in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He was a fervent Christian and a strong advocate of the teachings of Jesus Christ.

Peter was a prolific writer and his works were widely read. He wrote many letters to the early Christian communities, providing guidance and encouragement. His letters were collected and published posthumously.

Peter's most famous work is the Epistle of Peter, which was written to the early Christian communities. This epistle is divided into two parts: the first part is addressed to the believers in Asia Minor, and the second part is addressed to the believers in Rome. The epistle includes teachings on the nature of God, the importance of faith, and the need for perseverance.

Peter's influence on the early Christian church was significant. His teachings provided a solid foundation for the development of Christian doctrine. He was a strong advocate of the teachings of Jesus Christ and his writings were a source of inspiration for generations of Christians.

Peter's contributions to the early Christian church were recognized by the church fathers. He was canonized as a saint by the Roman Catholic Church in the early 4th century and his feast day is celebrated on November 29th.

Peter's life and works have left a lasting legacy in the history of Christianity. His teachings continue to be studied and interpreted by scholars and theologians to this day.
cater their productions to each other." This narrative is given in a simple but rude style; it is divided into five books (1096-1099), and is entitled Historia de Hierusalem sine rerum; the most correct edition is that by Du- chene, in vol. iv of the Historia de France. See *Hist. Peter the Venerable, also called Mauriceus, a medieval character of note, was born in 1092 or 1094. He was educated at the Cistercian abbey at Souci- langes, and soon after the completion of his theological training at Monte Cassino, he moved to Cluny, then to Launde, and in 1122 abbots of Cluny. Pet- rus Venerabilis was more or less mixed with all the important ecclesiastical transactions of the 12th century. He took in the schism of 1130 the side of pope Innocent XI; and especially played a great part in the dis- cussions between Bernard of Clairvaux and Abelard. His works, written with more ease than talent, have not yet been published in a collected form. He died, at Christmas, in 1157 (see Bibl. Patr. Desponti vol. xxii). His publications are, Sermones (in Martene et Durand, Thesaur. Nucleus de Actis Pontificum, II. Hi. 1157).—Libri ii adversus nefarium sectam Saracensium (in Martene et Durand, Collect. ix, 1120). His life was written by his monk Rodolph, his disciple: Vita Petri Venerabilis, edidit Clausius (Bibl. vi, 1187). See Hook, *Ecloga. Bio- g. viii, 59; Schrock, Kirchengeschichte xxii, 145; Williams, Peter der Ermüd- tiget (Leipzig, 1857). (J. H. W.)

Peterfi, Charles, a Hungarian Jesuit, was born towards the close of the 17th century. He was de- scended from a noble family. Admitted among the Jesuits in 1715, he taught belles-lettres at Tyrnau and philosophy at Vienna. He died Aug. 10, 1746. He made himself known by a valuable collection, Soror concilia in regno Hungariae celebrata, ab a. 1016 usque ad a. 1715 (Vienna, 1742, fol.), in which a good method and the variety of research are to be admired. See Feller, Dict. Hist.—Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, xxxiv, 691.

Peter-Pienaar is the annual tribute of one penny from every Roman Catholic family, paid at Rome, at a festival of the apostle Peter. It is offered to the Roman pontiff in reverence of the memory of St. Peter, of whom that bishop is believed to be the successor. From an early period the Roman see had been richly endowed; and although its first endowments were chiefly local, yet as early as the days of Gregory the Great large es- tates were held by the Roman bishops in Campania, in Calabria, and even in the island of Sicily. The first idea, however, of an annual tribute appears to have come from England, and was first collected in 1734, under a deacon of the diocese of London (A.D. 721), king of the West Saxons, who went as a pilgrim to Rome, and there founded a hospice for Anglo- Saxon pilgrims, to be maintained by an annual contribu- tion from England; by others, to Offices and Ethelwulf, at least in the sense of their having extended it to the whole of the Saxon territory. But this seems very un- certain; and although the usage was certainly long an- terior to the Norman conquest, Dr. Lingard is disposed not to place it earlier than the time of Alfred. The tribute consisted in the payment of a silver penny by every family possessing land or cattle of the yearly value of thirty pence, and was collected in the two weeks be-between St. Peter’s and St. Paul’s Day and Aug. 1. In the time of king John, the total annual payment was £130 6s. contributed by the several dioceses in proportion, an account of which will be found in Lingard’s History of England, ii, 380. The tax called Romescot, with some variation, continued to be paid till the reign of Henry VIII, when it was abolished. Pope Gregory VII, in his famous Lettura de la pace, and other partial or transient tributes are recorded from Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and Poland. This tribute, however, is quite different from the payments made annually to Rome by the kingdoms which were held to be feudatory to that see. There are also payments from Scotland, England, and other countries, at least for a time.” — Chambers. The pope having suffered a considerable diminution of his own revenue since the revolution of 1848, an effort has been made in several parts of Europe to revive this practice. In some countries it has been very successfully carried out, and the proceeds have been among the chief of the resources of Pius IX, as he has steadfastly refused to accept any support from the new kingdom of Italy, since his temporalities were merged in it. See Thompson, Popes Power (N.Y. Cadell, 12mo); Riddle, Modern Italy (N. Y. Hefele, Concilia regia. vol v; Ranke, Hist. of the Papacy in the 16th and 17th Centuries, i, 21, 37, 290; Inset, *Ch. Peter’s (Sr.) Day (June 29) is a festival observed in the Roman Catholic Church. Its origin has been traced back to the 8th century. In 684 Prudentius mentions that the pope celebrated the Holy Communion in both St. Peter’s and St. Paul’s churches at Rome on this festival, which in the 6th century was observed at Constantineople, and was kept, until the Reformation, associated with the name of St. Paul, whose conversion was not generally commemorated on Jan. 25 until the 12th century. Ocelis, who received Peter in communion virtually of SS. Peter and Paul, but its title is the Chair of St. Peter, wherein he first sat at Rome, Jan. 18. On Feb. 22 his chair at Antioch is commemorated.

Peters, Absalom, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Wentworth, N. H., Sept. 19, 1738, and was educated at Dartmouth College, class of 1816, and for the ministry at Princeton Seminary, class of 1819. He was the son of general Absalom Peters, a descendant of William, of Boston, brother of the noted Hugh Peters. In 1819 he was made a missionary in Northern New York, but in the following year became pastor of the Church at New Lebanon, N. Y., where he remained until Dec. 14, 1825. After this he was successively secretary of the Home Missionary Society until 1837, and editor of the Home Missionary and Pastor’s Journal; and in 1838 began to edit the American Biblical Repository. He was professor of pastoral theology and homiletics in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, from 1842 to 1844, and pastor of the First Church, Williamstown, Mass., from 1844 to 1857. Here he originated and edited the American Ecclesiastic and the American Journal of Education, which was afterwards merged in that of Dr. Henry Barnard. When past seventy he published a volume of poems. He died at New York May 18, 1869. During his long life he was never ill. He is the author of A Plea for Voluntary Societies: — Sprinkling The Only Mode of Baptism: — Sermon against Horse-racing (1822); — Sacred Music (1823); — College, Religious Institutions (1851).

Peters, Charles, a learned English divine, was born in Cornwall near the close of the 17th century, and was educated at Exeter College, Oxford. On entering orders he went to Paris, where he became rector of St. Mary, Cornwall, where he died, at a very advanced age, in 1777. In his dissertation on the book of Job he displayed a deep knowledge of Hebrew, and great power of argument against Warburton. The work, which is valuable, is entitled A critical Dissertation on the Book of Job, wherein the Account given of that Book by the Author of the Divine Legation of Moses demonstrated, in Warburton, is clearly considered, the Antiquity of the Book vindicated, the great Text (xix, 25) explained, and a future State shown to have been the popular belief of the ancient Jews (2d ed. corrected, Lond. 1757, 8vo) — An Appendix to the critical Dissertation on the Book of Job, giving a further Account of the Book of Ecclesiastes; to which is added a Reply to some Notes of the late D— of B—I, in his new Edition of the Divine Legation, vol. ii, pt. ii, by the Author of the Critical Dissertation (Lond. 1760).

Peters, Hugh, an English divine, who came to this country in the colonial days, and is noted both as a preacher and politician, was born at Fowey, Cornwall, Eng., in 1590. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1622; then entered the ministry, and preached successfully at St. Sepulchre’s, London, until he was silenced for nonconformity, and imprisoned. As soon as liberated he went to Rotterdam, and became pastor of the Independent Church in that place. In 1635 he resigned and sailed for New England, where he arrived Oct. 6, and was licensed Dec. 21, 1636, pastor of the First Church, Salem, as successor to Roger Williams, whose doctrines he disclaimed and whose adherents he excommunicated. He was also active in civil and mercantile affairs, suggesting coasting and foreign voyages, and the plan of the fisheries. In March, 1636, he was appointed by the General Court to assist in collecting and revising the colonial laws, and having been chosen to "represent the sense of the colony upon the laws of excise and trade," he sailed for England Aug. 3, 1641. He became in 1643 a preacher in the Parliamentary army, in which capacity he was present at the siege of Lynn and the capture of Bridgewater. For his services he was largely rewarded, and in 1655 was one of the committee of legal reform appointed by Parliament. In 1656 he was chaplain to the garrison at Dunkirk. After the Restoration Peters, being suspected of some complicity with the death of the king, was committed to the Tower, and indicted for high-treason Oct. 13, 1660. He was convicted and executed Oct. 16, 1660. During his imprisonment he wrote several letters of advice to his daughter, published (1712) under the title of "A dying Father’s last Legacy to an only Child." His private character has been the subject of much discussion both in England and America. He was charged by his enemies with gross immorality, and the most bitter epithets were applied to him by Bishop Burnet, Kennet, and others: but of late years he has been estimated more favorably. He published also God’s Doings and Man’s Duty, opened in a Sermon preached before the House of Commons, the Lord Mayor, and the Assembly of Divines (1646) — Peters’s last Report of the English Wars, occasioned by the Importance of a Friend press ing an Answer to some Queries (1646) — A Word for the Army and Two Words for the Kingdom, to Clear the One and Cure the Other, forced in much Plainness and Brevity from their faithful Servant, Hugh Peters (1647) — A Good Work for a Good Magistrate, or a Short Cut to a Great Quiet (1651) — Some Notes of a Sermon preached on the 14th of October, 1660, in the Prison of Newgate, after his Condemnation (1699). Peters, Richard, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of his name, was born in England, where he was educated as a clergyman of the Church of England, and came to Philadelphia in 1755. His services were soon engaged at Christ’s Church, for which he was licensed by the bishop of London. He shortly resigned, and then held an important Church agency, and also became secretary to a succession of governors. In May, 1749, he became a member of the provincial council, but in 1762 he resigned all civil offices and was made one of the ministers of the United Church; he was also in 1762, and in 1766, re-elected the church. In 1767 he returned to England to receive his license in due form. On his return he resumed his duties. He resigned in 1775, and died July 10, 1776. He published a Sermon on Education (1751). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 88; Dorr, Hist. of the Ch. Church, vol. I.

Peters, Samuel Andrew, D.D., LL.D., an ecumenic Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Hebron, Conn., Nov. 20, 1735, and passed A.B. in Yale, 1757, when he went to England for ordination. He returned in 1759, and in 1762 took charge of the Church at Hebron, where he continued for many years. During the Revolution, being a Tory, he retired first to Boston, and soon sailed to England, as his imprisonment and loyalty to the English cause made him very obnoxious. Of course his royal master rewarded his fidelity by a pension and a grant of confiscated lands. In 1781 he published a general history of Connecticut, which has been called "the most voluble and most licentious of lying narratives." Its narrations are independent of time, place, and probability. In 1794 he was chosen bishop of Vermont, but he was never consecrated. After being struck off the pension roll by William Pitt, he returned home in 1805, and spent his years in publishing works to connect the lands granted to Jonathan Carver, the Indian traveler. In 1817 he journeyed westward, and in 1818 returned to New York, where he lived in obscurity and poverty until his death, April 19, 1826. He was the "Parson Peter" of Trumbull's M'Pood. Peters published, A General History of Connecticut, by a Gentleman of the Province (Lond. 1781) — A Letter on the Possibility of Eternal Punishments, etc. (ibid. 1785) — and The History of Rev. Hugh Peters, etc. (ibid. 1807). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 191.

Peters, William, an English clergyman, who flourished in the latter part of the 18th century, distinguished himself especially as a painter. He was a man of wit, and possessed a lively imagination and great conversational powers, which made him a favorite. Having a passion for painting, he practiced it first as an amusement, and, by associating much with the eminent artists of the time, he greatly improved his manner, and produced many beautiful works which were greatly admired. He painted for the Shakespeare Gallery scenes from that author's dramatic works; also several pictures for MacKinnon's Gallery, as the Resurrection of Lazarus, the Three Guardsmen and the Spirit of a Child; the Chorus, etc., all of which were very popular. He executed many fancy subjects from his own imagination, which are pleasingly sentimental. He was much patronized by the nobility, and he sometimes painted subjects not strictly in accordance with just notions of propriety. His pictures are well composed, and his coloring rich and harmonious, with an admirable impacto, in which he imitated Reynolds. Many of his works were engraved by Bartolozzi, Thomas Wilson, Smith, Marshall, and others. He is generally called the Rev. W. Peters. The duke of Rutland was his chief patron, and presented him with a valuable living. The bishop of Lincoln gave him a prebendal stall in his cathedral. He died in 1814.

Petersen, Johann Wilhelm, a German writer noted for his theological studies, and his heresies in certain branches of Christian doctrine, was born July 1, 1649, at Osnabruck, was educated at Lubeck in the preparatory branches, and studied theology at the universities of Giessen, Rostock, Leipsic, Wittenberg, and Jena. He then lectured for a while at Giessen, preached at Lubeck and France, and finally returned to the university in Rostock. He had written a poetic satire on the Jesuits; they in turn had made it so uncomfortable for him at Lubeck that he went to Rostock, but also here, and at Hanover later, they followed him with their opposition and invectives, and in 1678 he gladly accepted the superintendency of the church. In 1678 he became superintendent at Lüneburg, but did not remain long, as differences sprang up between him and the pastors. In 1692 he was deposed, on the ground that he espoused chiliastic ideas. He now purchased a farm near Zerbst, and died in retirement, Jan. 31, 1727. His last years were spent in the advocacy of chiliastic-pietistic opinions, and he wrote much for that purpose. A list of all his writings is given in his autobiography (1717). This book is valuable, as it indicates the sources whence the pietism of Spener and Francke drew its strength. We must not be understood, however, to say that Spener's pietism depended on Petersen, but simply that Petersen and Spener had much in common, and that the former, by his influence and acceptance of pietistic views, strengthened Spener's hands. Petersen seems to have misapprehended Beza, a Manichean gone farther than he. Thus, for example, Petersen, misunderstanding Spener's doctrine concerning "better times to come" [see ESCHATOLOGY; SPENER], and the realization of God's kingdom on earth, announced the speedy approach of the millennial reign, and, for the German, even adopted the final restoration theories of Origen (q.v.), with which he became acquainted, as he tells us, in the writings of the English fanatic Jane Lead (q.v.). His wife adopted these views also, and became a propagator of this heresy and the notion of a universal apocalypse. But the day is done, though it pleased many by limiting the eternity of punishment, and some who had almost strayed from the Church beyond hope of regaining their former hold on Christ and his Church, yet met with almost universal rejection, because it obliged its advocates to embrace a physical process of redemption, or at least one which was not brought about by the Word of Christ. A train of thought which was the germ of the Terrestrial controversy of 1689-1710 might well lead farther. It had been usual so to identify the day of grace with the duration of earthly life as to allow no hope beyond it, and also to regard the term of grace as unexpired while life lasted. Though the original foundation of this opinion was a serious view of the importance of earthly life, it was yet capable of being made the basis of that levity which would demand a difference since the approach of death put a stop to this notion, Böse, with whom Rechenberg (q.v.) agreed, upheld the tenet that there is, even in this life, a peremptory termination of grace. This cannot depend upon so external a matter as time, but upon the inward maturity of the decision for or against Christ. Grace is the gift of God only: those who have already rejected it, and the justification formerly pronounced is withdrawn. See, however, the art. GRACE. To Petersen's adoption of a millennium and a universal restoration, he added, thirdly, faith in the continuation of supernatural inspiration. He himself led to this step by his admiration of Böse, who, with whom Rechenberg (q.v.) agreed, upheld the tenet that there is, even in this life, a peremptory termination of grace. This cannot depend upon so external a matter as time, but upon the inward maturity of the decision for or against Christ. Peterziano (or Preterziano), Simone, an Italian painter, was, according to Lomazzo, a pupil of Titian, and found some history paintings, as well as religious works for the churches, both in oil and fresco. Lanzi says: "On his Pietà in S. Fidela he inscribed himself 'Titiani Discipulus;' and his close imitation seems to confirm the truth. He produced several works in fresco, partially several histories of St. Paul in S. Barnaba.
He there seems to have aimed at uniting the expression, the foreshortening, and the perspective of the Milanese to the rich coloring of Venetian artists, noble works if they were thoroughly correct, and if the author had been as excellent in fresco as in oil painting." There is a fine picture by this master of the Assumption of the Virgin in the Chiesa di Berra.

Petebach Debary (פֶּטֶבַּך דֶּבָּרְיָא) is the title of an excellent Hebrew grammar written in rabbinic characters by an anonymous Spanish author, the first edition of which appeared at Naples in 1492, and not, as is generally believed, at Pesaro in 1507. In later editions, with additions, appeared at Constantinople in 1515, and the same, with corrections by Elias Levita (q.v.), at Venice in 1545. Of the first edition of this valuable grammar only two copies, one at the Vatican Library, and one at Parnass, are extant. The Petebach Debary has been edited with Ibn-Ezra's Moggion (Venice, 1546), and together with Haja ben-Sherira's work on dreams, הָלְיוֹר בֵּנֶר שֶרְּרָא (Constantinople, 1515, and often); and, lastly, with Moses Kimchi's (q.v.) grammatical work, The Journey on the Paths of Knowledge, name of three men.

1. The head of the nineteenth course in David's division of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv, 16). B.C. cir. 1020.
2. A Levite, who put away an idolatrous wife at the injunction of Ezra (Ezra x, 23), and joined in the hymn of praise and the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. ix, concerning the Jews (Neh. xi, 24). B.C. cir. 446.

Pethor (Heb. Pethor, פְּתֹר, opened; Sept. Φαa place in Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, the native country of Balaam, to which Balak sent him for to come and curse Israel (Num. xxiv, 6; Deut. xxiii, 5).

It is supposed to have been near Tishana, on the Euphrates, but this is altogether uncertain. See Ballas.
The name occurs in the census inscriptions (q.v.).
Pethuel (Heb. Pethuel, פְּתַעִל, stamp or engraviing of God; but according to others, i. q. מַעָּל, Methe prophet Joel (Joel i, 1). B.C. ante 800.

travesty with St. Augustine.

Petit, Samuel, a celebrated French scholar, was born at Nismes in 1594. He studied at Geneva with such success that at the age of seventeen he was admitted to the sacred ministry. Soon after he was raised to the professorship of theology, and of Grock and Hebrew, in that city. He died in 1645. He was a man of vast and profound erudition. He published Varia lectiones in S. Scripturam (in the Critici Sa-vo vol. viii). His other works are, Miscellaneorum libri ix: —Eclogae Chronologicae: —Diatribe de Jure, Princi-pum Edicta, etc.: —Diatribe de Dissidiorum Causis, Effecta et Remedii.

Petit-Dit-Dit, Matthew, a learned French prelate of note, was born in Lorraine in 1569. He was early in life entered the Order of the Benedictines, and later became abbot of Senones, and finally bishop of Macon (in partibus infidelium). He died in 1728. He is the author of several valuable works, among them, Traité théologique sur l'autorité et l'illumination divine (Avignon, 1726, sm. 8vo). This work, asserting the infallibility of the pope, has been attacked by various writ-erists, Romanist as well as Protestant, especially by Len-fant at the end of his Hist. of the Council of Constance. He also published several critical, historical, and chronological dissertations on the Scriptures (1689-1726).
His brother, Jean Joseph, who was a Jesuit, flourished from 1664 to 1756. See Darling, Cyclop. Bibl. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit, and Amer. Auth, s. v.

Petition, according to Dr. Watts, is the fourth part of prayer, and includes a desire of deliverance from evil, and a request of good things to be bestowed. On both these accounts it may be said to be offered up for our own good, not only for ourselves, but for our fellow-creatures also.
This part of prayer is frequently called intercession.
See Prayer.

Petitot, Jean, an eminent French painter in enamel, is noted especially as a Hugenot who spurned all efforts for his conversion, and, notwithstanding the personal intercession for his recall to Romanism on the part of king Louis XIV, died as he lived, a pious Proestant. Petitot was the son of a sculptor and architect, and was born at Geneva in 1607. Being designed for the trade of a jeweller, he was placed under the direction of Bordier, and in this occupation was engaged in the preparation of enamels for the jewelry business.
He was so successful in the production of the metal that he was advised by Bordier to attempt portraits. They conspicuously made several trials, and though they still wanted many colors which they knew not how to prepare for the fire, their attempts had great success. After some time they went to Italy, where they consulted the most eminent chemists, and made considerable progress in their art, but it was in England, whither they removed after a few years, that they perfected it. In London they were received by the most exalted and famous Mayer, first physician to Charles I, and an intelligent chemist, who had by his experiments discovered the principal colors proper to be used in enamel, and the means of vitrifying them, so that they surpassed the boasted enamelling of Venice and Limoges. Petitot was introduced by Mayer to the king, who retained him in his service and gave him apartments in Whitehall. He painted the portraits of Charles and the royal family several times, and copied many pictures, after Vandyck, which are considered his finest works. This painter greatly interested him by his advice, and the king frequently went to see him paint. On the death of Charles, Petitot retired to France with the exiled family. He was greatly noticed by Charles II, who in-troucd him to Louis XIV. Louis appointed him his painter in easel pictures, and wanted him a pension and apartments in the Louvre. He painted the French king many times, and, among a vast number of portraits, those of the queens Anne of Austria and Maria Theresa.
He also occupied himself in making copies from the most celebrated pictures of Mignard and Lebrun. Petitot, dredging the effects of the revolution of the Edict of Nantes, solicited leave, but for a long time in vain, to return to Geneva. Finally the king, determined to save his painter, employed Bossuet to endeavor to convert him to Romanism; in this effort, however, that eloquent prelate was wholly unsuccessful. At length Louis permitted him to depart, and, leaving his wife and children in Paris, Petitpied proceeded to his native place, where he was soon after joined by his family. Arrived now at thirty-two years of age, after a long number of friends and admirers that he was forced to remove from Geneva, and retire to Vevey, a small town in the canton of Vaud, where he continued to labour till 1691, in which year, while painting a portrait of his wife, he was suddenly attacked by apoplexy, of which he died. For his works of art, see Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s.v.

Petit-Pied, Nicolas (1), a French canonist, was born in Paris Dec. 24, 1627. He was made doctor of the Sorbonne in 1638, and counsellor-clerk in the Châtelet in 1662. He was provided shortly after with the curacy of Saint-Martial in Paris, united latter to that of Saint-Pierre-des-Asces, and finally became under-chaplain and canon of the metropolitan church. In 1674, having wished, as dean of the counsellors, to preside in the Châtelet in the absence of the lieutenants, he found a violent opposition among the lay-counsellors, who pretended that the clergy had not the right to preside and to govern. By way of complaint against this, March 17, 1682, the authorities interposed a decree which gained for him the cause. The researches which he was obliged to make for the pursuit of this affair furnished him the occasion for composing an excellent Traité sur la dérogation des prérogatives ecclésiastiques dans l'administtration de la justice séculière (Paris, 1705, 4to). See Journ. des Savans, 1705; Moreiri, Dict. Hist.; Descript. Hist. de l'Église de Paris.—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxiv, 719.

Petit-Pied, Nicolas (2), a French theologian, nephew of the preceding, was born in Paris Aug. 4, 1655. After having finished with distinction his ecclesiastical studies, he was received doctor of the Sorbonne in 1692, and his reputation caused him to be chosen in 1701 to teach the Holy Scriptures in that celebrated school. Having signed, July 20, 1702, with thirty-nine other doctors, the famous Cus de coœncrence, which was condemned at Rome Feb. 15, 1703, he would not retract, and was therefore exiled to Beaune and deprived of his pulpit. He hastened to join in Holland his friend Quesnel, and remained in that country until 1718, producing each year, for the support of Jansenism, new articles upon the government, defence, and upon other analogous matters now forgotten. The bull Unigenitus found in him a formidable adversary: he fought it in pamphlets, in memoirs, and in more extended works. On his return to France, Petit-Pied passed some time at Troyes, and afterwards went to Paris, where, June 1 and 6, 1719, the faculty of theology and the Sorbonne established him again in his rights as doctor. On the 15th of the same month he was again exiled, and on the 21st a lettre de cachet ordered the cancelling of the conclusion of the faculty in his favor. Petit-Pied had established his home and a new kind of Protestant Church in the village of Anières, near Paris. There he made a trial of the regulations and all the literary practised by the Jansenists in Holland. Renowned published astonishing things of him; people hastened there in crowds from the capital, and Anières soon became another Charenton. Petit-Pied showed himself from that time a more obstinate antagonist. M. de Loraine, bishop of Bayeux, selected him shortly after for his theologian, but on the death of that prelate, June 9, 1726, he retired again to Holland, whence he returned only in 1734. His zeal for Jansenism and the fertility of his pen were not inconsistent in this new exile; but from his return to Paris he led a more tranquil life, and contented himself with composing several works to defend the missal given to his diocese by Bossuet, bishop of Paris. Petit-Pied died in Paris Aug. 10, 1747. The list of all his works would be too long; Moreiri mentions eighty-one. We quote of his works, Examen théolo-qique de l'instruction pastorale approvue dans l'assemblée du clergé... pour l'acquisition de la belle (Paris, 1718, 3 vols. 12mo)—Examen des fausssets sur le culte Chinois avancées par le P. Jousney (ibid. 1714, 12mo):—b. Lettres touchant la manière de pro-tenter aux contrats des rentes rachetables des deux côtes (Lille, 1731, 4to). He also labored upon the work of Legros, Doctna Ecclesiae circa uram expositum et vindicatum (Utrecht, 1731, 4to). Sarcastic in his works, Petit-Pied was a milite, an inarticulate chantefable, an enthusias, Pet. des Auteurs Eclec. vol. iii.; Journal de Dorausme, Colendrier ecclésiastique (ibid. 1757, 12mo); Nouv. ecclés. passim; Moreiri, Dict. Hist.—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Géné-Petosiris (Πέτοσίρης), an Egyptian priest and astrologer, who is generally named along with Nechepso, an Egyptian king. The two are said to be the founders of astrology, and of the art of casting nativities. Suidas states that Petosiris wrote on the right mode of worshipping the gods, astrological maxims, i.e. tnap bSptov (Bay) (which are often referred to in connection with astrology), and a work on the Egyptian mysteries. But we may infer from a statement made by Vetius Valens, of which the substance is given by Marsham (Canon Chronicus [ed. Lips. 1676], p. 478), that Suidas assigns to Petosiris what others attributed partly to him and partly to Nechepso. For his ὁπραναι τοῦ ἀρχαίου, or Πρῶτος ικάριος, or Πρῶτος ἀρχάιος, he stipulates astrological principles for predicting the event of dis-cases, and for his other writings, Fabricius (Bibl. Grec. iv. 160) may be consulted. To the list given by him may be added a translation into Latin by Beili of the astrological letter of Petosiris to Nechepso, entitled De Divinatione Moris et Vita (Bod. Opera [ed. Col. Agrripp. 1612], ii, 233, 234). His name, as connected with astrology, was in high repute early in Greece, and in Rome in her degenerate days. This we learn from the praise bestowed on him by Maneto (v. 10), who, indeed, in the prologue to the first and fifth books of his Apotelesmatica, professes only to expand in Greek the prose rules of Petosiris and Nechepso ("divini illi viri atque omni admiratigem digni"), and from the refer-ces of Plut. (Nat. i, 23; vii, 49). But the best proof is the fact that, like our own Lilly, Petosiris became the common name for an astrologer, as we find in Aristophanes, quoted by Athenaeus (iii, 114, c) in the forty-sixth epigram of Lucilius (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. iii, 38), whence we learn the quantity, and in Juvenal (vi, 588). Marsham has a full dissertation on Nechepso and Petosiris in the work above quoted (p. 474-481).

Petra (in the earlier Greek writers Πηρα or Πή-ra, but in the later αἱ Πηραί), was the capital of the Nabataean Arabs in the land of Edom, and seems to have given name to the kingdom and region of Arabia Petraea. As there is mention in the Old Testament of a stronghold which successively belonged to the Amorites (Judges iii, 36), the Edomites (2 Kings xiv, 7), and the Moabites (Isa. xvi, 1; comp. in Heb. ch. xii, 11), and bore in Hebrew the name of סלע, which has the same meaning as Petra in Greek, viz. "a rock," that circumstance has led to the conjecture that the Petra of the Nabataeans had been the Selah of Edom. See STAM. This latter name seems, however, to have passed away with the Hebrew rule over Edom, for no further trace of it is to be found; although it is still called Sela by Isaias (xvi, 1). These are all the certain notices of the place in Scripture. Arce is said by Josephus to have another name, Petra and Pheret, which we should probably read 'Arqat for 'Arqat (yet see Amer. Bib. Rev. for 1838, p. 556, note). See ARKAT.

1. History.—The earliest notice of this place under the name Petra by the Greek writers is connected with the fact that Antigonus, one of Alexander's successors, sent two expeditions against the Nabataeans in Petra (Diod. Sic. xix, 94-98). The first of these, commanded by Athenæus, and the second by Demetrius, changed the habits of the Nabathæans, who had hitherto been essentially nomadic, and led them to engage in commerce. In this way, during the following centuries, they grew up into the kingdom of Arabia Petraea, occupying very nearly the same territory which was comprised within the limits of ancient Edom. In the first expedition, Athenæus took the city by surprise while the men were absent at a neighboring market or fair, and carried off a large booty of silver and merchandise. But the Nabathæans quickly pursued him to the number of 8000 men, and, falling upon his camp by night, destroyed the greater part of his army. Of the second expedition, under the command of Demetrius, the Nabathæans had previous intelligence; and prepared themselves for an attack by driving their flocks into the deserts, and placing their wealth under the protection of a strong garrison in Petra; to which, according to Diodorus, there was but a single approach, and that made by hand. In this way they succeeded in baffling the whole design of Demetrius. For points of history not immediately connected with the city, see Eumenes; Nabathæans. Strabo, writing of the Nabathæans in the time of Augustus, thus describes their capital: "The metropolis of the Nabathaeanis is Petra, so called; for it lies in a place in other respects plain and level, but shut in by rocks round about, yet within having copious fountains for the supply of water and the irrigation of gardens. Beyond the enclosure the region is mostly a desert, especially towards Judea" (Geog. xvi, p. 906). At this time the town had become a place of transit for the productions of the East, and was much resorted to by foreigners (Diod. Sic. xix, 95; Strabo, I. c.). Pliny more definitely describes Petra as situated in a valley less than two miles (Roman) in amplitude, surrounded by inaccessible mountains, with a stream flowing through it (Hist. Nat. vi, 28). About the same period it is often named by Josephus as the capital of Arabia Petraea (War, i, 6, 2; 13, 8; etc.). Petra was situated in the eastern part of Arabia Petraea, in the district called under the Christian emperors of Rome Palæstina Terræ (Vet. Rom. Hist. p. 74, ed. Wessel; Malala, Chronogr. xvi, 400, ed. Bohn). According to the division of the ancient geographers, it lay in the northern district, Gebalene; while the modern ones place it in the southern portion, Esh-Sherah, the Mount Seir of the Bible. Petra was subdued by A. Cornelius Palma, a lieutenant of Trajan (Dion Cass. lxxviii, 14). Hadrian seems to have bestowed on it some advantage, which led the inhabitants to give his name to the city upon coins; several of these are still extant (Mommaet, Med. Antiquités, v. 587; Eckehel, Doctr. Num. ii, 503). It remained under the Roman dominion a considerable period, as we hear of the province of Arabia being enlarged by Septimius Severus, A.D. 195 (ibid. lxxv, 1, 2; Eutrop. viii, 16). It must have been during this period that those temples and mausoleums were made, the remains of which still arrest the attention of the traveller; for, though the predominant style of architecture is Egyptian, it is mixed with florid and overloaded Roman-Greek specimens, which are but slightly modified by the native artists. In the 4th century Petra is several times mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome; and in the Greek ecclesiastical Notities of the 5th and 6th centuries it appears as the metropolis of the Palestinian see of the bishops (Reland, Palest. p. 216, 217); the last named of the bishops is Theodorus, who was present at the Council of Jerusalem in A.D. 556 (Orient. Christ. iii, 720). From that time until the slightest notice of Petra is to be found in any quarter; and as no trace of it as an inhabited site is to be met with in the Arabian writers, the probability seems to be that it was destroyed in some unrecorded incursion of the desert horde, and was afterwards left unpeopled. It is true that Petra occurs in the writers of the era of the Crusades; but they applied this name to Kerak, and thus introduced a confusion as to the true Petra which is not even now entirely removed. It was not until the reports concerning the wonderful remains in Wady Mousa had been verified by Burckhardt that the latter traveller first ventured to assume the identity of the site with that of the ancient capital of Arabia Petraea. He expresses this opinion in a letter dated at Cairo, Sept. 12, 1812, published in 1819, in the preface to his Travels in Syria and Nubia; but before its appearance the eminent geographer Carl Ritter had suggested the same conclusion on the strength of Seezen's intimations (Erdbilddnisse, ii, 217). Burckhardt's view was more amply developed in his Travels in Syria, p. 481, published in 1822, and received the high sanction of his editor, Col. Leake, who produces in support of it the arguments which have since been relied upon, namely, the agreement of the ancient descriptions with this site, and their inapplicability to Kerak; the coincidence of the ancient speculations of the distances of Petra from the Halicarnassus gulf and from the Dead Sea, which all point to Wady Mousa, and not to Kerak; that Josephus, Eusebius, and Jerome testify that the Mount Hor where Aaron died was in the vicinity of Petra; and that to this day the mountain which tradition and circumstances point out as the same still rears its lonely head above the vale of Wady Mousa, while in all the district of Kerak there is not a single mountain which could in itself be regarded as Mount Hor; and even if there were, its position would be incompatible with the recorded Journal journeys of the Israelites (Leake's Preface to Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, p. vii—ix; Robinson's Palestine, ii, 570—579, 655—659).

2. Description of the present site.—The ruined city lies in a narrow valley, surrounded by lofty and, for the most part, perfectly precipitous mountains. Those which form its southern limit are not so steep as to be impassable; and it is over these, or rather through them, along an abrupt and difficult ravine, that travellers from Sinai or Egypt usually wind their laborious way into the scene of magni cent desolation. The ancient and more in teresting entrance is on the eastern side, through the deep narrow gorge called the Siq. It is not easy to determine the precise limits of the an cient city, though the precipitous mountains by which the site is encompassed mark with perfect distinctness the boundaries beyond which it never could have extended. These natural barriers seem to have constituted the real limits of the city; and they give an extent of more than a mile in length, nearly from north to south, by a variable breadth of about half a mile. Several spurs from the surroun ding mountains encroach upon this area; but, with inconsiderable exceptions, the whole is fit for building on. The sides of the valley are valled up by perpendicular rocks from four hundred to six or seven hundred feet high.

The northern and southern barriers are neither so lofty nor so steep, and they both admit of the passage of camels. A great many small recesses or side valleys open into the principal one, thus enlarging as well as varying almost infinitely the outline. With only one or two exceptions, however, they have no outlet, but come to a speedy and abrupt termination among the overhanging cliffs, as precipitous as the natural bulwark that bounds the principal val ley. Including these irregularities, the whole circumference of Petra may be four miles or more. The length of this irregular outline, though it gives no idea of the extent of the area within its embrace, is perhaps the best measure of the extent of the excavations.
The valley of Wady Musa, which leads to the ruins, in a general westerly direction, is about one hundred and fifty feet broad at its entrance, and is shut in by cliffs of red sandstone, which gradually increase from a height of forty or fifty feet to two hundred or two hundred and fifty feet. The valley gradually contracts till at one spot it becomes only twelve feet broad, and is so over lapped by the perpendicular cliffs that the light of day is almost excluded. This is the ravine or Siq of Wady Musa, which extends, with many windings, for a good English mile. This valley contains a wonderful necrop olain the wadis. The wadis, or rocky waeis, and by their mixture of Greek, Roman, and Oriental architec ture remind the spectator of the remains found in the valley of Jehoshaphat near Jerusalem. The entrance of the ravine is spanned by a bold arch, perhaps a tri umphal one, with finely sculptured niches evidently in tended for statues. This, like the other remains of this extraordinary spot, is ascribed by the natives either to the Pharaohs or to the Jins, i.e. evil genii. Along the bottom of the valley in which it almost vanishes, winds the stream. In ancient times its bed seems to have been paved; and it appears to have been, in many places at least, covered in, so that the street passed above it. In other wider portions of the ravine, espe cially where it opens out into the city, it was spanned by frequent bridges, its sides strengthened with stone walls or quays, and numerous small canals derived from it supplied the inhabitants with water. But now its banks are overgrown with hyacinths, oleanders, and other shrubs, and the upper portions of it are overhad over by lofty trees.

Opposite the termination of the Siq, or narrow part of the ravine, just where it turns at its junction with a second ravine-like but broader valley, stands the chief attraction of the whole place, the finest monument in fact in all Syria. This is the Khazneh—well preserved, considering its age and site, and still exhibiting its deli cate chiselled work, and all the freshness and beauty of its coloring. Like all the other wonders of the place, it is carved out of the face of the perpendicular cliff, which here rises about 150 feet high. It has two rows of six columns over one another (one of the lower ones has fallen), with statues between, surmounted by capitals and a sculptured pediment, the latter divided by a little round temple crowned with an urn. The Arabs imagine that this urn contained treasure (khazneh, hence the name of the entire structure), which they ascribe to Pharaoh.
The interior does not correspond with the magnificence of the façade, being a plain, lofty hall, with a chamber adjoining each of its three sides. It was either a maus oleum or, more probably, a temple.

From this spot the cliffs on both sides of the valley are pierced with numerous excavations, the chambers of which are usually small, though the fronts are occa sionally of some size and magnificence; scarcely two, however, are exactly alike. After a gentle curve the valley expands still more, and here on its left side lies the theatre, entirely hewn out of the rock. Its diamete ter at the bottom is one hundred and twenty feet and it has thirty-three rows of seats, capable of accommodat ing three thousand spectators. Strangely enough, it is totally surrounded by tombs. One of the more north erly of these is inscribed with the name of Q. Prefectus Florentinus, probably the governor of Arabia Petra under Hadrian or Antoninus Pius. Another has a Greek inscription not yet deciphered. Travellers are agreed that these excavations, some of the most strik ing of which are in the cliff directly opposite the thea tre, were mostly tombs, though some think they may originally have served as dwellings. Indeed several of them have loculi sunk in the floor as if for burial places. A few were doubtless temples for the worship of Baal, but subsequently converted into Christian churches. They extend all along the eastern cliffs.

The Theatre at Petra.

Proceeding still down the stream, at about one hundred and fifty paces from the theatre the cliffs expand rapidly, and soon recede so far as to give place to a plain about a mile square, surrounded by gentle eminences. The brook, which now turns again to the west, traverses the middle of this plain till it reaches a ledge of sandstone cliffs, through which it pierces, and is lost in the sands of the Arabah. This little plain was the site of the city of Petra, and it is still covered with heaps of hewn stones, traces of paved streets, and foundations of houses.

The chief public buildings occupied the banks of the river and the high ground, especially on the south, where their ruins sufficiently show. One sumptuous edifice remains standing, though in imperfect and dilapidated state. It is on the south side of the river, near the western side of the valley, and seems to have been a palace rather than a temple. It is called Khur Faris, or Pharaoh's palace, and is thirty-four paces square. The walls are nearly entire, and on the eastern side they are still surmounted by a handsome cornice. The front, which looks towards the north, was ornamented with a row of columns, four of which are standing. An open piazza behind the colonnade extended the whole length of the building. In the rear of this piazza are three apartments, the principal of which is entered under a noble arch, apparently thirty-five or forty feet high. It is an imposing ruin, though not of the purest style of architecture, and is the more striking as being the only proper edifice now standing in Petra.

A little east of this, and in a range with some of the most beautiful excavations in the mountain on the east side of the valley, are the remains of what appears to have been another triumphal arch. Under it were three passages, and a number of pedestals of columns, as well as other fragments, would lead to the belief that a magnificent colonnade was connected with it. In the same vicinity are the abutments of a massive bridge.

On an eminence south of this is a single column (of sarsen) called Zab Faris, i.e. hasty virilis Pharonis) connected with the foundation walls of a temple, whose pillars lie scattered around in broken fragments, some of them five feet in diameter. Twelve of these, whose pedestals still remain in their places, adorned either side of this stately edifice. There were also four columns in front and six in the rear of the temple. They are prostrate on the ground, and Dr. Olin counted thirty-seven massive frustas of which one of them was composed.

Still farther south are other piles of ruins—columns and hewn stones—parts, no doubt, of important public buildings. The same traveller counted not less than fourteen similar heaps of ruins, having columns and fragments of columns intermingled with blocks of stone in this part of the site of ancient Petra. They indicate the great wealth and magnificence of this ancient capital, as well as its unparalleled calamities.

These sumptuous edifices occupied what may be called the central parts of Petra. A large surface on the north side of the river is covered with substructions, which probably belonged to private habitations. An extensive region still farther north retains no vestiges of the buildings which once covered it. Public wealth was lavished on palaces and temples, while the houses of the common people were slightly and meanly built, of such materials as a few years, or at most a few centuries, were sufficient to dissolve.

The acropolis is thought to have occupied an isolated hill on the west. The whole ascent of the hills on the south, up which the toilsome passage-way out of this museum of wonders winds, is elaborately pierced with tombs, temples, or dwellings. At the north-west extremity of the cliff surrounding the plain is the Deir or cloister, the second most remarkable sculpture of the entire place, hewn likewise out of the face of the rock. A ravine somewhat like the Sils, with many windings, leads to the base, and the approach up to it is in places by a path five or six feet broad, cut with immense labor in the precipitous rock. Its façade is larger than that of the Khuzneh; but, as in that building (if such we may call it), the interior does not correspond, being merely a large square chamber, with a recess resembling the niche for the altar in Greek ecclesiastical architecture, and bearing evident signs of having been converted from a heathen into a Christian temple. The cliffs on the north-east side of the basin, which here extends up a considerable valley, are in like manner cut into temples, tombs, or other architectural forms of great variety.

Laboree and Linant also thought that they traced the outline of a naumachia or theatre for sea-fights, which would be flooded from cisterns in which the water of the torrents in the wet season had been reserved—a remarkable proof, if the hypothesis be correct, of the copiousness of the water-supply, if properly harnessed, and a confirmation of what we are told of the exuberant fertility of the region, and its contrast to the barren Arabah on its immediate west (Robinson, ii, 169). Stanley (Spr. and Pal. p. 95) leaves little doubt that Petra was the seat of a primeval sanctuary, which he fixes at the spot now called the "Deir" or "Convent," and with which fact the choice of the site of Aaron's tomb may, he thinks, have been connected (p. 96). As regards the question of its identity with Kadesh, see KADISH; and, for the general subject, see Ritter, xiv, 69, 997 sq.

Rock-hewn Temple at Petra.

The mountain torrents which at times sweep over the lower parts of the ancient site have undermined many foundations, and carried away many a chiselled stone, and worn many a finished specimen of sculpture into unshapely masses. The soft texture of the rock socons the destructive agencies of the elements.
PETRA

Even the accumulations of rubbish which mark the site of all other decayed cities have mostly disappeared; and the extent which was covered with human habitations can only be determined by the broken pottery scattered over the surface and mingled with the sand—the universal, and, it would seem, an imperishable memorial of populous cities that exist no longer. These vestiges, the extent of which Dr. Ginni took great pains to trace, cover an area one third as large as that of Cairo, excluding its large gardens from the estimate, and very sufficient, he thinks, to contain the whole population of Athens in its prosperous day.

The attention of travellers has, however, been chiefly engaged by the above-noted excavations, which, having more successfully resisted the ravages of time, constitute at present the great and peculiar attraction of the place. These excavations, whether formed for temples, tombs, or the dwellings of living men, surprise the visitor by their incredible number and extent. They not only occupy the front of the entire mountain by which the valley is encompassed, but of the numerous ravines and recesses which radiate on all sides from this enclosed area. They exist, too, in greater or less proportion among the precipices that shoot out from the principal mountains into the southern, and still more into the northern part of the site, and they are seen along all the approaches to the place, which, in the days of its prosperity, were perhaps the suburbs of the city of Petra. In the most pleasant of the views are found in the valley above the entrance of the Sik. These were excavations, instead of following all the sinuosities of the mountain and its numerous gorges, ranged in regular order, they probably would form a street not less than five or six miles in length. They are often seen rising one above another in the face of the cliff, and convenient steps, now much worn, cut in the rock, lead in all directions through the fissures and along the sides of the mountains, to the various tombs that occupy these lofty positions. Some of them are apparently not less than from two hundred to three or four hundred feet above the level of the valley. Conspicuous situations, visible from below, were generally chosen; but sometimes the opposite side prevailed, and the most secluded cliffs, fronting towards some dark ravine, and quite hidden from the gaze of the multitude, were preferred. The flights of steps, all cut in the solid rock, are almost innumerable, and they ascend to great heights, as well as in all directions. Sometimes the connection with the city is interrupted, and one sees in a gorge, or upon the face of a mountain, a noble rock-cut temple; or more properly in which, they are formed. The mountains that encompass the vale of Petra are of sandstone, of which red is the predominant hue. Their surface is a good deal burned and faded by the elements, and is of a dull brick color, the most beautiful and imposing results of ancient taste and skill which have remained to our times. The front of the mountain is wrought into facades of splendid temples, rivalling in their aspect and symmetry the most celebrated monuments of Grecian art. Columns of various orders, graceful pediments, broad, rich entablatures, and sometimes statuary, all hewn out of the rock solid rock, and still forming part of the native mass, transform the base of the mountain into a vast splendid pile of architecture, while the overhanging cliffs, towering above in shapes as rugged and wild as any on which the eye ever rested, form the most striking and curious of contrasts. In most instances it is impossible to assign these beautiful facades to any particular style of architecture. Many of the columns resemble those of the Corinthian order; but they deviate so far, both in their forms and ornaments, from this elegant model, that it would be impossible to rank them in the class. A few are Doric, which are precisely those that have suffered most from the ravages of time, and are probably very ancient.

But nothing contributes so much to the almost magical effect of some of these monuments as the rich and various colors of the cliff rock, and, as a consequence, of the objects properly in which, they are formed. capable—as brilliant and as soft as they ever appear in flowers, or in the plumage of birds, or in the sky when illuminated by the most glorious sunset. The red perpetually shades into pale, or deep rose or flesh color, and again approaches the hue of the lilac or violet. The white, which is often as pure as snow, is occasionally tinged with rosy shade. The blue is usually the pale azure of the clear sky or of the ocean, but sometimes has the deep and peculiar shade of the clouds in summer when agitated by a tempest. Yellow is an epithet often applied to sand and sandstone. The yellow of the rocks of Petra is as bright as that of sandstone. It is more easy to imagine that one describes the effect of tall, graceful columns exhibiting these exquisite colors in their succession of regular horizontal strata. They are displayed to still greater advantage in the walls and cellings of some of the excavations where there is a slight dip in the strata.

Petrarch, VICENZO, an Italian cardinal, was born at Naples Nov. 18, 1662. He occupied at the court of Rome several considerable positions, and was created cardinal in 1743, then bishop of Faenza. He enjoyed great influence with popes Innocent XII and Benedict XIII, who often consulted him upon grave affairs. He died at Rome March 24, 1747. He published De sacra Pontificiæ Apostolicae (Rome, 1712, 4to), and Commentaria ad Constitutiones Apostolicæ (Ven. 1729, 4 vols. fol.). See Notizie storiche del Regno di Napoli: Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvii., 750 sq.

Petrarch (Ital. Petrarco), FRANCESCO, one of the most celebrated of Italian writers of prose and poetry, deserves a place here because he was for many years a devout and consistent ecclesiastic, and exerted a far-reaching influence on the classical culture of Italy in the later medieval period known as the Renaissance (q. v.). Petrarch was born at Arezzo, in Tuscany, July 20, 1304. His father, a Florentine notary, had been exiled two years before, in the same disturbance which drove out the poet Dante; and he soon left Italy for Avignon, where the papal court then resided. The son was educated by the monks of St. Fossil and St. Martin, and at Montpellier, and then sent to study law at Bologna. Though Petrarch certainly loved the Eneid more than the Pandects, and copied ancient manuscripts more willingly than law papers, yet the subsequent course of his public life proves that he did not neglect professional pursuits, and that he prepared himself for being a useful man of business. Returning to Avignon soon after he became of age, he found himself in possession of a small inheritance, and indulged for some years in an alternation of classical studies and political composition, with much society (sombre, perhaps, but not the more pure on that account) as the clerical court offered. In the year 1327 he conceived an attachment to an Avignonese lady, young but already married. Some slight obscurity still hangs over his relation to this lady, but it is almost certain that she was no less a paragon of virtue than of loveliness. He met her on April 6, 1327, in the church of St. Clara in Avignon, and at once and forever fell deeply in love with her. The lady was then nineteen, and had been married for two years to a gentleman of Avignon, named Hugues de Sade. For ten years Petrarch lived near her in the papal city, and frequently met her at church, in society, at festivities, etc. He sang her beauty and his love, under the name of his “Laura,” in three sonnets whose mellifluous conceits ravished the ears of his contemporaries, and have not yet ceased to charm. The lady, whatever she was, knew how to keep Petrarch at a respectful distance, and for using the only opportunity he had of avowing his love in her presence she so severely reproved him that he never repeated the offence. About 1338 he retired for two or three years to dwell in the beautiful valley of Vaucluse, near Gargas. He himself said that his withdrawal to the retreat which he immediately caused was caused by no reason more sentimental or poetic than his disgust with the licentiousness of the papal court, and the disappointment of the hopes of preemption which the pope had held out to him. Long before this time Petrarch’s talents had attracted attention to him not only distinguished patronage, but frequent and active employment. A most brilliant honor awaited him at Rome in 1341, where, on Easter-day, he was crowned in the Capitol with the laurel-wreath of the poet. The ceremonies which marked this coronation were a grotesque medley of pagan and Christian representations. Petrarch was, however, as ardent a scholar as he was a poet; and throughout his whole life he was occupied in the collection of Latin MSS., even copying some with his own hand. To obtain these, he traveled elled frequently, as far as England or Flanders, as the case might be, and Spain. In 1353 Petrarch returned to Italy, and soon became the trusted counselor and diplomatic agent of several of his country’s rulers. He was sent on missions at home and abroad. He finally settled at Milan, where he remained ten years, and lived for some years at Parma, Mantua, Padua, Verona, Venice, and Rome. Though he had never entered holy orders, he was rewarded for his faithful services to the state by ecclesiastic benefices in the north of Italy. He might have risen to positions of great influence and rich returns if he had chosen, but he preferred the quiet life of a recluse. In 1370 Petrarch removed to Arquà, a little village prettily situated among the Euganean hills, where he spent his closing years in hard scholarly work, much annoyed by visions, troubled with epileptic fits, not over rich, but serene in heart, and displaying in his life and correspondence a rational and beautiful piety. He died July 18, 1374. Petrarch was not only far beyond his age in learning, but had risen above many of its prejudices and superstitions. He despised astrology, and the childish medicine of his times; but, on the other hand, he had no liking for the conceited scepticism of the medieval savans; and in his De sua insigni et multorum alias Ignorantia he sharply attacked the irreligious speculations of those who had acquired a shallow, free-thinking habit from the study of the Arabico-Aristotelian school of the University of Paris and the University of Rome, and whose works were the first in modern times in which the language was classically written. The principal are his Epistola, consisting of letters to his numerous friends and acquaintances, and which rank as the best of his prose works: De Vita Vitorum Iuliam: De Remediis utriusque Fortunae: De Vita Solitaria: Memorandarum libri io: De Contemptu Mundi, etc. Besides his sonnet epistles, he wrote numerous epistles in Latin verse, elegues, and an epic poem called Africa, on the subject of the Trojan war. It was this last production which obtained for him the laurel-wreath at Rome. Petrarch, whose life was thus active, is immortal in history by reason of more claims than one. He is placed as one of the most celebrated of poets in right of his “Rime,” that is, verses in the modern Italian tongue, of which he was one of the most celebrated composers and refiners. Celebrating in these his visionary love, he modelled the Italian sonnet, and gave to it, and to other forms of lyrical poetry, not only an admirable polish of diction and melody, but a delicacy of poetic feeling which has hardly been excelled in the most refined taste of fancy which, if it often degenerates into false wit, is so often delightfully and purely beautiful. But though Petrarch’s sonnets and canzoneti and “triumphs” could all be forgotten, he would still be honored as one of the benefactors of European civilization. No one but Boccaccio shares with him the glory of having been the chief restorer of classical learning. His greatest merit lay in his having recalled attention to the higher and more correct classical authors; in his having been an enthusiastic and successful agent in reviving the study of the Greek classics in his having been, in his travels and otherwise, an indefatigable collector and preserver of ancient manuscripts. To his care we owe copies of several classical works which, but for him, would, in all likelihood, have perished. Collective editions of his whole works have been repeatedly published (Basle, 1485, 1554, and 1801 sq.). His life has employed many writers, among whom may be mentioned Bellutello, Beccadelli, Tommasini, De la Bastie, De Sades, Tiraboschi, Baldelli, Ugo Foscolo, Campbell, and Geiger. In July, 1674, a Petrarch festival was held at Padua, and a statue of the great poet by Ceccon was erected. The eulogy on this occasion was pronounced by Alcardi, in the aula magna of the university. Tomb of Petrarch.

Petrarca, Astolfo, a painter of Siena, was born about 1590. He studied successively under Francesco Vanni, the younger Salimbieni, and Pietro Somi. He acquired distinction, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices of his native city, as well as for the private collections. He also opened an academy there, which was much frequented by the artists of Siena, and honored by the attendance of Borgognone, who stopped some months with Petrarca before he proceeded to Rome. Lanzio says that Petrarca seemed to have adhered more to the manner of Vanni than any other master. He frequently aims at pleasing, and not unfrequently chuses his models from the schools of Upper Italy. His Marriage Feast at Cana brings Paul the Veronese strongly to our recollection. Petrarca's Communion of St. Jerome, at the Agostinian, is painted much after the manner of Caracci. Petrarca excelled in painting children, and his pictures are generally adorned with choirs of angels. His cabinet pictures are ingeniously composed, and have a lively and pleasing effect. His pictures of the Four Seasons, at Volte, a seat of the noble family of Chigi, are admired for the playfulness and elegance of the groups of Cupid introduced. He died in 1658.

Petri, Laurent, one of the three principal Swedish Reformers, a brother of the following, was born at Örebro in 1498. After having followed at Wittenberg the teaching of Luther and Melancthon, on his return to Sweden he spread the principles of Reform in that country. Appointed by Gustavus Vasa professor of theology in the University of Upsala, of which he became rector in 1527, he was elevated in 1531 to the archiepiscopal chair of that city. He then undertook, with the aid of his brother Olaus and of Laurent Andrei, a Swedish translation of the Bible, based principally upon Luther's version, which was printed in 1541: it is known under the name of Gustavus's Bible, and it has contributed greatly to the development of the Swedish language. Sent in 1534 as ambassador to the czar of Russia, he held, in the presence of that prince, a conference upon religion with the patriarch of the Russian Church; the discussion took place in Greek; but the interpreter employed by the czar to translate into Russian the words of the interpolators often did not understand the abstract terms used by Petri, and then told what passed through his head, until one of the assistants, who understood Russian and Greek, disclosed the fraud by bursts of laughter. Petri, during the rest of his life, was occupied in revising his own and in organizing the new Church, of which he was one of the principal founders. He was very benevolent, and distinguished himself advantageously over his brother by his conciliatory spirit, which did not prevent him from addressing to Eric XIV, in 1567, a severe reprimand on the subject of the murder of the Sture.
Pietri died in 1575. We have of his works, Terra ac Pietri, Olof-Phase, a Swedish theologian, was born at Oeremo, in 1497: the son of a blacksmith.

He received his early education among the Carmelites of his native town. He went to Wittenberg in 1512, with whom he attended the University of Wittenberg, where they embraced the doctrines of Luther. On their return to Sweden, in 1519, they began, after having as by a miracle escaped from the executioners of Christian II, to propagate the doctrines of the Reformation.
Appointed in 1523 rector of the school of Strangnits, Olof won to his opinions the archdeacon Laurent Anders, and, through the mediation of the latter, Gustavus Vasa appointed Peter preacher at Stockholm.
In his sermons and in diverse conferences he attacked the old religion with a progressively increasing vigor.
The first among all Protestant ecclesiastics in Sweden, he was publicly married in 1525. After having assisted at the Diet of Yesteriis in 1527, where he had a dispute upon religion with the professor of Upsala, Pierre Vialle, whom Gustavus declared to have been inspired, he entered more and more into the favor of the king, who consulted him upon the most important affairs, and finally appointed him his chancellor. In 1539 Pietri, tired of business, relinquished his duties for those of first pastor of the capital. The following year he was condemned to death for not having revealed, in 1536, the conspiracy formed against the life of the king by some citizens of the Hanseatic villages, one of whom had confessed to him.
He purchased his pardon for a large sum. Three years after the king reinstated him in his office of pastor, and he held it for the rest of his life in Stockholm until 1562.
He joined to quite extensive and varied learning great activity and a captivating eloquence, but he never spared his adversary, and often degenerated into abuse of a bold and rash character. He may be called the Luther of Sweden, while his brother Laurent, milder and more moderate, was the Melanchthon. We have of Pietri's works, in Swedish, treatises on Marriage of Ecclesiastics (Stockholm, 1524, 1528, 4to)—the Difference between the Evangelical Faith and the Romanism (ibid. 1527, 1605, 4to)—On the Duties of the Clergy and the Lay (ibid. 1527, 4to)—On the Inconsistency of the Monastic Monastic Life (ibid. 1528, 8vo)—Postilla sur les Evangelists ibid. 1530)—Introduction to Sacred Scriptures (ibid. 1538, 4to)—some Sermons, Odes that are still sung in Sweden, and several other theological writings.
Pietri has left in manuscript some Memoirs upon the history of his country, which remained unpublished because Gustavus found them written with too much independence; one copy of which, preserved in the Royal Library of Paris, has been analyzed by Kerallo in the Notes et Extraits des Manuscrits, vol. i.—Hoefer, Novi.

Pietri, Pietro de', an Italian painter, was born in Pomposa, district of Novara, in 1671. He studied under Carlo Maratti at Rome, and painted some works for the churches in that metropolis. Lanzi says he formed a style of his own by engraving on that of Maratti a portion of the manner of Cortona. He did not, however, inhabit, and obtained the reputation of a master, on account of his infirm health and extreme modesty.
His best works are a picture of The Crucifixion, in the church of SS. Vincino e Anastasio, and some frescos in the tribune of S. Clemente. He was called at Rome de' Pietri. Orlanti calls him a Roman, others a Spaniard, but Lanzi says he was a native of Premia.
He died at Rome in 1716, in the prime of life.
There are a few etchings heretofore attributed to him, but Bartsch gives them to another artist of the same name.

Petrobrusians. The sect of the Petrobrusians, or, as they are commonly but less correctly called, Petrobrusians, was the earliest of the anti-sacerdotal communities which the profound discontent inspired by the tyranny of Rome called into existence at the beginning of the 12th century. They were the followers of the eloquent Peter of Brusy, who about the year 1100 began to declaim against the corruptions of the Church and the vices claimed to have come from the time for twenty years most successfully, especially in Languedoc and Provence, and made many converts to his own opinions. What these really were it is difficult to state here, as there is no record among his friends.
From Peter of Orbec, who was his principal assistant, we gather that his principal doctrines—which, with one exception (his repugnance to the cross), were more ably extended by his more powerful successor, Henry the Deacon—were, though somewhat rationalistic, yet upon the whole rather evangelical. At first the preaching of Peter seems to have been confined to the inculination of a system of general morality; but time and im-portancy so favored him that he attacked the seeds of dogmatic errors "per xx fere annos sata et aucta quinque precipue et venenata virgulta." The capital charges upon which he was imprisoned (1), he met by baptism, alleging that no miraculous gifts were possible in that ceremony, which he declared to be wholly void when performed on the person of an irresponsible infant.
(2) He denied that any special sanctity resided in consecrated buildings; forbidding the erection of churches, and directing that such churches as did exist should be pulled down. (3) In particular he objected to the worship of the cross, alleging that the accursed tree should be held in horror by all Christians as the instrument of the torture and death of the Redeemer. (4) He refused to distinguish between idolatries and false cerer or not he retained the office of the communion as a memorial rite is not known. (5) He was bitterly opposed to prayers, oblations, alms, and other good deeds done on behalf of the dead. To these five capital tenets, which form the subject of the Cluniac abbots' refutation, must be added a total prohibition of chanting and all use of sacred music. Puritanical as some of these tenets seem, Peter of Brusy was no lover of asceticism. He inculcated marriage, even of priests, as a high religious usage. The deleterious effects which this practice had on the Romanists was so obvious to the Romans as to have been stated by Leo XIII; in the frameschul, li, 72; Hagenbuch, Hist. of Doct. (see Index).

Petrocorius. Paulinus, sometimes confounded with Paulinus of Nola (q. v.), was an Eastern ecclesiastic, and, according to his own reports, flourished in the Western empire in the 6th century. He was intimate with Perpetua, who was bishop of Tours from A.D. 461 to 481, and whom he calls his patron. It was at the desire of Perpetua that he put into versus the life of St. Martin of Tours; and in an epitaph addressed to that prelate he humbly tells him, with an amusing reference to the history of Balaam, that, in giving him confidence to speak, he had repeated the insect biting the mouth of the ass. He afterwards supplied, at the desire of the bishop, some verses to be inscribed on the walls of the new church which Perpetua finished about A.D. 478 (or, according to Oudin, A.D. 482), and to which the body of St. Martin was transferred. He sent with them some verses, De Vitae St. Martinii Vita Liber of Sulpicius Severus; and the fourth and fifth comprehended the incidents mentioned in the Dialogi I et III de Virtutibus Beati Martyr of the same author. The sixth book comprises a description of the miracles which had been wrought at the tomb of St. Martin under the eyes of Perpetua, who had sent an account of them to Paulinus:—De Visitazione Nepotuli suti, a description of the miraculous cure of his grandson already mentioned, also written in hexameter verse:—De Oratorium (an inap- propriate title, which should rather be Oratoriurn simply, or Ad Orantes), apparently a portion of the hexameter verses designed to be inscribed on the walls of the new church built by Perpetua:—Perpetuus Episcopus Epistola. This letter was sent to Perpetua with the verses De Visitazione and De Oratorium. The works of Paulinus Petrorocius were first printed by Franciscus Juretus (Par. 1585). After the first publication of the works they were inserted in several collections of the Christian poets, and in some editions of the Bibliotheca Pac- trum, generally, however, under the name of Paulinus of Nola. In the Lyons edition of the Bibliotheca Pac- trum (1677, fol.), vi, 297, etc., they are ascribed to their right author. They were again published by Christian- ian and Roman authors, 1788, 1893, with some notes of Juretus, Barthius, Gronovius, and Daunius. To the works of our Paulinus were subjoined in this edition the Eucharistia of Paulinus the Penitent, or Paulinus of Pella, and the poem on Jonath and the Ninevites, ascribed to Tertullian. See His. Petro-Johannites, a name given to the part- tisans of Peter John Olives (A.D. 1279-1297), a monk of Bzéires, the founder of the Fraticelli schism among the Franciscans, and a disciple of the abbot Joachim. He followed in the steps of his master, and wrote a commentary on the Revelation, containing interpretations of a similar character to the prophecies of Joachim. From his birthplace he is called Peter of Strigmon, and from his monas- ter Petrus Biterrana. When pope Nicholas III issued the inquisitions of the rule of St. Francis (A.D. 1279), with the view of suppressing the fanat- icism which was rising among the "spirituals" of that order, a party was formed to resist it under the leadership of Olivi, and this party of Petro-Joh- annites, or strict Franciscans, became after his death the party out of which the Fraticelli took their rise. See Washing, Annal. Min. Fratric.; Oudin, De Scrip- toribus Eclesiastic., iii, 584; Baluze, Miscellanea., i, 218.

Petronilla, St., a Roman saint, is reputed to have been the daughter of the apostle Peter, and to have been at Rome with him. As the presence of the apostle himself at the Eternal City is still questioned, we need hardly discuss the presence of his daughter in that place. She is reputed to have become deprived of the use of her limbs by sickness. One day when some of his disciples sat at dinner with the apostle, they asked why it was that when he healed others his own child remained sick. Peter remained helpless. He implied that it was good for her to be ill, but, that his power might be shown, he commanded her to rise and serve them. This she did, and when the dinner was over lay down helpless as before. Years after, when she had become perfect by suffering, she was made well in answer to her earnest prayers. Now Petronilla was very beautiful, and a young noble, Valerius Flaccus, desired to marry her. She was afraid to refuse him, and promised that if he returned in three days she should then carry her home. She then earnestly prayed to be delivered from this marriage, and when the days came to celebrate the marriage he found her dead. Flaccus lamented sorely. The attendant nobles bore her to her grave, in which they placed her crowned with roses. She is commemorated in the Roman Church May 51.

Petronius, the name of two Romans somewhat involved in Jewish history.

1. Caius Petronius succeeded Aulius Gallus in the government of Egypt, and carried on a war in B.C. 22 against the Ethiopians, who had invaded Egypt under their queen Candace (q. v.). He was a friend of Herod, and sent corn to Judea during a famine (Josephus, Ant. xxv, 9, 2).

2. Publius Petronius was sent by Caligula to Syria as the successor of Vitellius (A.D. 40), in the capacity of governor, with orders to erect the emperor's statue in the Temple at Jerusalem; but at the intercession of the Jews he was prevailed upon to disobey the imperial command, and escaped punishment by the opportune death of the emperor (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 9, 2; War, ii, 10).

Petronius (St.) of Bologna, a Roman Catholic prelate sainted for his piety, flourished in the first half of the 6th century. He was a Roman by birth, and descendent of a noble family. He early entered the serv- ice of the Church, and soon rose to positions of influ- ence and distinction. He finally became bishop of Bologna, and distinguished himself by banishing the Arians from that city. He died A.D. 480. In the paintings of the Ethiopian saints he is painted in episcopal mitre with mitre and crosier. He has a thick black beard in an ancient representation, but generally is without it. His attribute is a model of Bologna, which he holds in his hand. His pictures are confined to Bologna; and there is in that city a beautiful church dedicated to his memory.

Pettengill, Erastus, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Newport, N. H., July 7, 1805; was converted in Orford in 1824, and was bap- tized by Rev. Nathan Howe and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was ordained a preacher in 1835, and labored that year on the Bethlehem charge under the direction of the presiding elder. He joined the New Hampshire Conference in 1836, and was sta- tioned at Bridgewater. His subsequent appointments were as follows: in 1837, Andover; in 1838, Vin- ton; in 1839, Bethel; in 1840-41, Lunenburg, Vt.; 1842- 43, St. Johnsbury; 1844-45, Barton; 1846, Newtown; 1847-48, Londonderry; 1849-50, Hartland; 1851-52, East Barnard; 1852-54, Norwich and Hartford; 1855, Union Village; 1856, Bellows Falls; 1857-58, Hardwick; 1859-60, Enosburg; 1861, Corinth; 1863-68, Williamstown, 1864-66, Union Village; 1867-68, Barnard. While laboring faithfully and with great acceptance on this last appointment he was stricken with a fatal disease, and after weeks of suffering, borne with great patience and Christian fortitude, he died March 8, 1869, relying upon the divine promise and trusting solely to the mercies of Christ. See Minutes of A.M. Conf. 1870.

Pettibone, Roswell, a Baptist deacon and minister, was born at Dwowel, L., Aug. 26, 1826. He had limited facilities for an early education, entered Middlebury Collage in 1817, graduated in 1820, taught in the academy there in 1821, studied divinity with Dr. Hopkins, and was licensed by the Addison County Association in 1823.
He then commenced preaching in Milton, St.
Lawrence County, N. Y., in 1823, and was ordained July 22, 1824; here he labored with great acceptability and success till poor health induced him to seek a milder climate, and in September, 1830, he went West, and preached at Ann Harbor, Mich., through the winter, and in the spring received a unanimous call to take charge of the Church, but ill-health prevented his doing so. During 1831 he was invited to the Church in Evans' Mills, Jefferson County, N. Y., which he served with great fidelity and success until, in November, 1857, he was called to Canton, St. Lawrence County, N. Y., and installed Feb. 14, 1868. Here he labored until April 1, 1854, when he became chaplain of Clinton State Prison, where he died, Aug. 15, 1854. Mr. Pettibone was pre-eminent in every relation and in the discharge of every duty; in spirit and conduct a conservative conservative, and strongly attached to the Calvinistic doctrines of grace; very active in organizing different benevolent societies and churches in his own and sister 310. (J. L. S.)

PETTIGREW, CHARLES, a prelate of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born about 1755, in Ireland, whence his father immigrated about 1770. The family was of Scottish origin, and possessed those marked characteristics of Scotch genius which have distinguished so many of the Presbyterian brethren who have come to this country from Scotland. In 1778 Pettigrew became a teacher at Edenton, but two years later he took Holy orders, and was ordained pastor of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Loudon. In May, 1794, at a convention held at Tarboro, he was elected bishop. He died at Bonaroon, Lake Scuppernong, where he settled in 1774. Pettigrew took a leading part in founding the University of North Carolina.

PEeto (or Pepto), SAMUEL, an English Nonconformist divine, the date of whose birth is not known, flourished near the close of the 17th century. He was educated for the Church Establishment at Catharine Hall, Cambridge, and afterwards became rector of Sandcroft, in Suffolk. When the Act of Uniformity was passed in 1662 he was ejected from his living as a Non-conformist. Afterwards he became pastor in a Dissenting Church at Sudbury, where he passed the remainder of his life. He died probably about 1766, at an advanced age. His work entitled The Relation Unveiled (1669) dealt with Scripture prophecies. The plan of the work was to inquire: 1. When many Scripture prophecies had their accomplishment. 2. What are now in process of fulfillment. 3. What are still to be fulfilled. His other works were: The Difference Between the Old and the New Covenants (the preface of this work was written by Dr.
Owen): — The Voice of the Spirit: — Infant Baptism Appointed by Christ: — Scripture Catechism: — Narrative of the Wonderful and Extraordinary Figs of Thom.

PETTY, JON, an eminently useful minister of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, born in England, in 1807, and died in 1868. His ability, piety, and devotedness won for him some of the most important and responsible positions in the connection. For seven years he was editor of the Primitive Methodist magazines, and did good service in sustaining the efficiency and usefulness of these periodicals throughout the connection.
He was the author of several works having a large circulation, of which the most important was The History of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, a work performed by request of the Conference, and with great thoroughness and ability. During the last three years of his life he was governor of Elfinfield School, the principal educational establishement among the Primitive Methodists. In that position he was especially useful in moulding the character and promoting the scholarship of the students for the ministry. As a Christian, Mr.
Petty aimed at studying faith and holiness; and at eminent personal holiness. As a scholar, "his learning was varied, accurate, profound, sanctified." As a preacher, he evinced a deep insight into Christian life and experience, and his style combined elegant simplicity with intense earnestness. Among his last words were,
"O! what boundless stores of fullness there are in Jesus." (G. C. J.)

PETURSSON, HALLGRIMUR, a noted psalmist, was born in Iceland in 1614. While Hallgrimur was yet a boy, his father was appointed chorister at the cathedral in Holle (the present episcopal residence in Iceland), having been called thither by bishop Gudbrand Thor-larsson, who is known as the first translator of the Bible into Icelandic, and as the real founder of Protestanism in Iceland. Hallgrimur got his elementary education in the school of his father, but for some unknown reason he was expelled from this school, whereupon he, aided by some of his friends, went abroad, first to Glinskstad, Sleswick, and later to Copenhagen. In Copenhagen he worked for a blacksmith until Brynjolf Sveinsson (af-fterwards bishop of Skalholt, in Iceland), about the year 1632, got him a place in the school of Our Virgin. Here Hallgrimur made rapid progress, and in 1636 we find him studying the so-called "master's lesson." In the year 1627 Iceland was visited by Mohammedan pirates from Algeria, in the northern part of Africa, who at that time extended their tyrannical rule of the sea from the shores of the Mediterranean to the most western and northern islands of the Atlantic. A number of Icelanders were slain by them, while others were carried away as slaves.
By the interference of the Danish king, Christian IV, some of the prisoners who had not already perished in the land of the barbarians were ransomed, and in 1634 thirty-eight Icelanders were brought from Algeria to Copenhagen, where they had to remain a few months until merchant-ships in the spring of 1637 could take them back to Iceland. While prisoners in Algeria they had been forced to worship Mohammedan idols, and when it was thought necessary during their stay in Copenhagen to instruct them in the principles of Christianity; but, not understanding Danish, an Icelandic teacher had to be found for them. Hallgrimur Petursson was selected. Among those set free was a woman by name Gudrid, who had formerly been the wife of an Iceland-er in the Westmann Isles. Hallgrimur fell in love with this woman so much that when the people were sent back to Iceland in the spring, he left the school and returned home with his beloved. The ship which carried them landed at Kejafjord, in the southern part of Iceland, and here Hallgrimur remained through the summer, doing the work of a common laborer for the Danes. Gudrid got a place to work on the farm Njardvik, not far from Kejafjord, and here she gave birth to a son, whose father was Hallgrimur. Soon afterwards he left the farm, and lived for some time in the most abject poverty in a lonely cottage at Sudurness, until the above-mentioned Brynjolf Sveinsson, who meanwhile had become bishop of Skalholt, persuaded him to enter the service of the Church, ordained him for the ministry, and gave him the poor parish of Hvalnes, in Guðjórs-Neset. He entered the ministry in 1644, and remained in Hvalnes until 1651, when he was removed to Saurbær, in Bor-garfjord. At Saurbær he found some relief from his poverty until Aug. 15, 1652, when the parsonage and all Pezelians or Poschelians, a modern sect of a political-religious character, who derived their name from a priest of Brennan, called Petzel or Poschel. They held the natural and legal equality of all human beings, and maintained that there was a continual and inalienable property in the earth and its natural productions. Their enemies charged them with offering human sacrifices, particularly on Good Friday. They appear to have adopted the political principles of the Spencians, and probably their infidelity. Congregations belong to Upper Austria, but by the interference of the public authorities they have been dispersed. A similar sect seems to have taken part and spread somewhat in Switzerland, who are charged with the like enormities.

Kaspar, a German theologian of the Reformation period, was born Jan. 6, 1523, at Bautzen, and studied at the school in Goldberg and the University of Wittenberg, where he was the table and house companion of the Reformer Melaunthon, who afterwards became his father-in-law. A well educated and remarkably talented man, he became in 1548 a magistrate, in 1556 ordinary professor of mathematics, in 1569 professor of medicine. Some time after this he was introduced to the personal attention of the elector Augustus of Saxony, who was so pleased with Peucer that he put him in charge of the Saxon high school. Peucer, greatly interested in the theological development of his day, wrote several sermons (q.v.), and used his influence for its propagation in Saxony, and thus arrayed the strongly Lutheran elector against him. Peucer was imprisoned from 1573 until 1586. He died Sept. 25, 1602. He left a large number of medical, mathematical, historical, and other valuable philological writings. See Henke, Kaspar Peucer u. Nic. Krell (Marb. 1865); Calinich, Kempfy u. Untergang des Melanchthonismus in Kurwurzen (Leips. 1866); also the art. CRYPTO-CALVINISTIC CONTROVERSY.

Pulzthail (Heb. Püellathay, יֵּעַלָּה יָזָאָר, my wages; Sept. Φυλλαζε, son of Obed-edom, the last named of eight (1 Chron. xxvi. 6); he belonged to the family of Asaph of the division of Levi, and was one of the porters of the tabernacle in the reign of David. B.C. cir. 1020.

Peentingor, Konraod, a German writer noted for his antiquarian labors, was born at Augsburg in 1465; studied in German and Italian universities, and was employed in his native city by the authorities of the place and by the emperor as counsellor. He was a many-sided, educated man, and is celebrated not only as a writer, but also as a dialectic and musical poet, and was greatly esteemed by Luther when he first appeared against the Romanists. See Hagen, Deutschlands literarische Zustände im Zeitalter der Reformation, vol. 1.

Pevernage, Andrin, a Belgian writer, was born in 1541 at Courtray. At first music teacher in the collegiate church at Courtray, he abandoned this place to settle in Antwerp, where he passed the last ten or twelve years of his life in the capacity of simple musician of the cathedral. He established in his house weekly concerts, and there was heard the most beautiful music of the composers then in repose. He died at Antwerp July 20, 1589. We have of his works, Commentes sacrae (Antwerp, 1574—1591, 5 pts. 4to); some masses, religious fragments, and a collection compiled from different authors under the title of Harmonie celeste (Ibid. 1585, 1590, 4to). See Paquot, Mémoires.—Howler, Nouv. Bibliogr. Générale, xxxix., 776.

Pew (anciently pew; Old Fr. pay; Dusch, paye; Lat. podium, anything on which to lean; e.g. an erect; an enclosed seat in churches. The old French word pew meant a balcony, a gallery built on bulks or posts of timber; and it has been unnecessarily suggested that pew may only be a form of podium, a book-desk, or the Dutch pael by monks before sitting was permitted. In the early days of the Anglo-Saxon and some of the Norman churches, a stone bench afforded the only sitting accommodation for members or visitors. In the year 1819 the people are spoken of as sitting on the ground or standing. At a later period the people introduced low, three-legged stools, and they were placed in no order in the church. Directly after the Norman conquest seats came in fashion. Church-seats were in use in England some time before the Reformation, as is proved by numerous examples still extant, the carving on some of which is as early as the Decorated Period, i.e. before A.D. 1400, and records as old as 1450 speak of such seats by the name of pews. They were originally plain fixed benches, all facing east, with partitions of wainscoting about three feet high.

Hendington, Oxfordshire.

After the Reformation seats were more appropriated, a curfew guarded the entrance, bearing the initial of the owner. It was in 1508 that galleries were thought of. As early as 1614 pews were arranged to afford comfort by being baized or cushioned, while the sides around were so high as to hide the occupants; probably under the influence of the Puritans, who, objecting to some parts of the service which they were compelled to attend, sought means to conceal their nonconformity. An early specimen of a pew of this kind exists in Cuxton Church, Kent. Up to a period some time after the Reformation the naves of churches, which were occupied by the congregation, were usually fitted with fixed seats, as they had been from the 14th century downwards, at the least: these seats varied in height from about two feet and a half to three feet, and were partially enclosed at the ends next the passages, sometimes with what are called bench-ends; sometimes these rose considerably above the wainscoting, and were terminated with carved finials or poppies, but they are more frequently ranged with the rest of the work, and were often straight at the top and finished with the same capping-mouldings; these end enclosures occupied about the width of the seat, and the remainder of the space was left entirely open. The partitions sometimes reached down to the floor, and sometimes only to a little below the seats: they were usually perfectly plain, but the wainscoting next the cross passages was generally ornamented with panellings, tracery, small buttresses, etc.: opposite to the seat at the back of each division or pew a board was frequently fixed, considerably narrower, intended to support the arms when kneeling. This mode of fitting the naves of churches was certainly very general, but it is difficult to ascertain when it was first introduced, the great majority of specimens that exist being of the Perpendicular style. See Standard.

In England pews were assigned at first only to the patrons of churches. A canon made at Exeter, in 1267, rebukes quarrelling for a seat in church, and decrees that none shall claim a seat as his own except noblemen and the patrons. Gradually, however, the system of appropriation was extended to other inhabitants of the parish, to the injury of the poor, and the multiplication of disputes. The law of pews in England is briefly this. All church-seats are at the disposal of the bishop, and may be assigned by him either (1) directly by faculty to the holders of any property in the parish; or (2) through the churchwardens, whose duty it is, as officers under the bishop, to seat the parishioners according to their degree.” In the former case the right descends with the property, if the faculty can be shown, or immemorial occupation proved. In the latter, the right can at any time be recalled, and lapses on the party ceasing to be a regular occupant of the seat. It appears that by common law every parishioner has a right to a seat in the church, and the churchwardens are bound to place each one as best they can. The practice of letting pews, except under the church-building acts, or special local acts of Parliament, and, much more, of selling them, has been declared illegal, except for the chapels of the Dissenters, who need the income of the pews for the payment of the pastor’s salary. In Scotland pews in the parish churches are assigned by the heritors to the parishioners, who have accordingly the preferable claim on them; but when not so occupied they are legally open to all. As is well known, pews in dissenting churches are rented as a means of revenue to sustain general charges. In some parts of the United States pews in churches are a matter of annual competition, and bring large sums. Latterly in England, and there has been some discussion as to the injuriously exclusive character of the “pew system,” and a disposition has been manifested to abolish pews altogether, and substitute movable seats available by all indiscriminately. Several pamphlets have appeared on the subject. The Times remarks that in dealing with this subject the first question is not the letting of pews, but the appropriation of seats. In most country churches the seats are more or less appropriated, but the pews are seldom rented. When we consider the matter from this point of view, does it not seem reasonable, as a matter of more order and decency, that those who regularly attend a church should have their appropriated places within it? If the churches are thrown completely open, they are thrown open not only to the parish, but to the whole world. In one of the best known of the London churches the incumbent lately complained from the pulpit that his parishioners could not obtain seats in the church which had been expressly built for them, and he announced his intention of altering the system. Another church, in Wells Street, which was especially built for the accommodation of a poor district, and in which all the seats are free, is usurped every Sunday by an aesthetic congregation of well-dressed people, who come to enjoy the excellent performance of the choir. Such a result would always take place where the preacher was popular or the service attractive. Again, the existing churches would not hold more than a certain number of persons, and they are filled as it is. If more were invited to come, it would be only driving out the rich to make way for the poor, and there would be another national association for preaching the Gospel to the rich, or, rather, we should see the rich building proprietary chapels for themselves, in which the seats would be appropriated as before. But does any one suppose that the poor would thus force their way into the churches, and dispose of their present seats? What are the seats free or not, the result would be much the same. When the question of the appropriation of seats is decided, that of pew rents is comparatively simple. If the rich are to have a certain number of seats appropriated to them, which, as we have seen, is convenient and convenient than that they should pay a certain sum in respect of them? In the Roman Catholic churches on the Continent pew rents are seldom to be seen.

The reading pew, first mentioned in the rubric of 1602, was the reader's stall in the chancel. It had two desks—one on each side, for the Holy Bible and the older for the Prayer-book facing eastwards, as in Hooker's Church at Drayton Beauchamp. In 1571 Grindel called it "the pulpit, where prayers are said." Galamy applies the word to designate an open-air pulpit. George Herbert made his pulpit and reading pew of equal height, so as to be of equal honor and estimation, and agree like brethren. Peyré, Isaac, a French Protestant writer, was born at Bordeaux in 1592. He fitted himself for military and diplomatic service, and at one time served the prince of Condé, whom he pleased by the singularity of his humor. Peyré finally turned priest. He was at the time a Protestant. He claimed that it had been revealed to him by St. Paul that Adam was not the first man, but that the first man was to be understood is explained by his theory by publishing in Holland, in 1655, a book entitled Præadimnitium sive exercitatio super versus 12, 13, 14, capitis xx Epistolae Pauli ad Romanos, which work was consigned to the flames, and he himself imprisoned at Brussels. On recantation and the interference of the prince of Condé, he was sent to Rome in 1655, where he published the reasons for his recantation, and abjured Calvinism and Præadimnitism before pope Alexander VII. He was not believed sincere by the people, and doubtless public opinion was just. The pontiff endeavored to expel him at Rome, but he finally returned to Paris, and again entered the service of the prince of Condé, acting as his librarian. He was not thought to be attached to any particular Church, notwithstanding that he had joined the Romanists. He, however, submitted to receive the sacrament. Some time after his return to Paris he retired to the "Séminaire des Vertus," where he died in 1676. He wrote, besides the above-mentioned articles, works upon Greenland and Iceland; also one upon the Restoration of the Jews, etc.

Peyton, Yelverton T., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Stafford County, Va., 1773, and died in 1815; entered the Baltimore Conference in 1818; and after filling some of the most important stations in the Conference, died in Baltimore Jan. 15, 1831. He was a devoted pastor, a faithful minister, and a very useful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conference, ii. 118.

Fes, Bernard, a learned German Benedictine, was born at Ips. He early entered the monastery of Molk. For several years he, with his brother Jerome, collected chronicles, charters, and other documents of the Middle Ages, in Austria, Bavaria, and other parts of Germany. After having spent some time in France, where he was rewarded with countless letters of reference, he returned to his convent, whose library was confided to his care. He died March 27, 1735. We have of his works, Acta et vita Wilburgii virginum cum notis (Augsb. 1715, 4to); — Bibliotheca Benedictinæ-Maurianæ, seu de vitis et scriptis Patrum et congregatione S. Mauri (ibid. 1716, 8vo); — Theologiae monasteriorum et conventuum, seu Veitum monasteriorum præcapitum Phæm euctio (1721-1728, 5 vols. fol.); — Bibliotheca ascetica antiquo-novae (Ratisb. 1723-1740, 12 vols. 8vo).— Acta S. Truperti martyræ (Vienna, 1731, 4to); — some Notes to A. Nonnumbus Melilicins de scriptoribus ecclesiasticis, published by Fabriçius; several articles in different collections, etc. See Algemene Geschieden. Lexicon; Kropf, Biblioth. Melilicens; Hefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxix, 789.

Pez, Hieronymus, a learned German Benedictine, brother of the preceding, was born at Ips in 1685. After having taken the Benedictine habit in the monastery of Molk, he began, with his brother, the search for unpublished historical documents concealed in the archives of libraries and universities of Austria and Bavaria. Placed later at the head of the library of his convent, he passed the last fifteen years of his life in the most profound retreat. He died Oct. 14, 1762. We have of his works, Acta S. Columbarii, Scotia regis (Krum. 1716, 4to); — Scriptores erem. Austriac., cum notis et lectionibus (Leips. 1720-1725, 2 vols. fol.), followed by a third volume, published in 1746 at Ratisbon; a very precious collection: — Historia S. Leopoldi, Austria marchionum, id nominis in, ex diplomatis adornata (Vienna, 1747, fol.). See Meusel, Script. Sacra, Schrock, Leben u. Pez (in the Leipziger Gelehrte Zeitung for 1762, p. 737. — Hefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxix, 789.

Pezel, Christoph, a German theologian, was born March 5, 1539, at Plauen; studied at Wittenberg; was then three years canon in his native place, and in 1567 became court-preacher and professor of theology at Wittenberg. He was an advocate of Philochristus; he was deposed after the condemnation of Crypto-Calvinism in 1574; in 1576 was sent out of the country; in 1577 went to Siegen, where he taught for a while, and then became pastor at Herborn. In 1580 he was called to Bremen as pastor, and in 1584 was made master of the library of the University and gymnasium illustre. In 1589 he again assumed the pastorate, and became also superintendent, and as such contributed to the strengthening and development of Lutheranism. He died Feb. 25, 1604. Besides theological controversial writings, and of the so-called Wittenberg Catechism, he wrote Commentaria collecta emendatione explicatio adiuncta, symbols, orationes dominicae, doctrinae de persona et sacramentis (Wittenberg, 1571), he wrote also Milliæum Historicum, a much-used handbook of history, and edited Meinerchon's letters to Hardenberg. (J. H. W.)

Pezon, Paul, a Roman Catholic monastic of much celebrity, was born at Hennepin, in Bretagne, in 1599. He embraced the monastic life in the Cistercian abbey of Prieres in 1611; was appointed master of the novices and sub-prior in 1672; sub-prior of the college of the Bernardins at Paris in 1677; vicar-general of his order in 1690, and obtained the abbey of Charnay in 1697. He resigned it finally to give himself entirely to his studies, and became a doctor of the Sorbonne. He died in 1706. His most important publication is L'antiquité des temps révolus et défendus, contre les Juifs et les nouveaux chronologues (Amst. 1697, 12mo.) In this work the author maintains the priority of the Septuagint chronology against that of the Hebrew Bible. Pezon's book was extremely admired for the ingenuity and learning of it; yet created, as was natural, no small alarm among the religious. Maritanay, a Benedictine, and Le Quien, a Dominican, in a new system, and undertook the defence of the Hebrew text; Maritanay with great zeal and heat, Le Quien with more judgment and knowledge. Pezon published Defense de l'antiquité des temps in 1691 (4to), which, like the work itself, abounded in errors and inaccuracies, and was repudiated; but Maritanay brought the affair into another court; and, in 1698, laid the books and principles of Pezon before M. de Harlai, archbishop of Paris. Harlai communicated the representation of this adversary to Persro, who, finding no difficulty in supporting an opinion common to all the fathers before Jerome, rendered the accusation of no effect. Other works of his are, Ésais d'un Commentaire Légitime et Historique sur les Prophéties et les Apocryphes Confusés par la Judicature et la Romains (1696, 2 vols. 12mo.): —

Paffe, Christoph Mathiæns, D.D., a German Protestant theologian, son of Johann Christoph Paffe (q. v.), was born Dec. 23, 1686, at Stuttgart. At the age of thirteen he was admitted to the university, and after having finished his theological studies, he received the means from the duke of Württemberg, in 1706, to go to other universities to perfect himself in the knowledge of the Oriental tongues. He visited with this design several universities of Germany, Hol\n land, and England. Upon his return to Stuttgart in 1709, he accompanied the hereditary prince Charles-Alexandre de Ita, and remained three years in Turin, occupied especially in copying from the libraries the unpublished fragments of ancient ecclesiastical authors. He afterwards went with the prince to Holland, where he spent two years, and to Paris, where he spent five. In 1722 he placed himself in connection with the most renowned learned men. Appointed in 1716 professor of theology at Tübingen, he became in 1720 dean of the faculty and chancellor of the university; he also received several high ecclesiastical positions, and became among others, in 1727, abbe of Loch, which gave him the entree to the states of Württemberg. In 1724 he was gratified with the title of count-palatine, and was elected in 1731 member of the Academy of Berlin. In 1756 he became chancellor of the University of Giessen, dean of the faculty of theology, and general superintendent of the churches. Possessing extensive and varied knowledge, he carefully avoided the bitter tone of the theologians of his confession, and he even made, but without the least success, several attempts to unite the Lutheran and Calvinists in churches. He died at Giessen Nov. 16, 1760. Paff's erudition was immense, and his works so numerous that they fill a whole sheet of the German bibliographies. Among his numerous works and dissertations we mention, De genuinis Librorum Novi Testamenti ectsone (1714, 4to.); De Testimonio aliquot de la virtud de la Religion Protestante contra la Religion pretendue Catholique (Tub. 1718, 1719): — De Evangelii sub Anastatii superatore non corrupta (Tubing, 1717, 4to.): — reprinted, with several other dissertations of Paffe, in his Fröstiae Tübingenses (ibid. 1718, 4to.); — De litera gia, missioulis, apostolae et libri ecclesiastiæ Ecclesiae orientalis et occidentalis eterris et modernis (ibid. 1718, 4to.):

— De origine juris eclesiastici verae ebus indole (ibid. 1719, 1720, 1756, 4to.): — Dissertationes Anti-Bohemia tres (ibid. 1719, 1720, 4to.): — Institutiones theologica dognatorum et moratorum (ibid. 1718, 4to.); Franc. 1721, 8vo.): — one of the first theological works written in Germany, and in which the rationalistic tendency is recognised: — Introductio in historia theologiam literariae (ibid. 1720, 8vo.): — ibid. 1724, 1725, 3 vols. 4to.): — De variorum biblioum ecclesiastucm Protestantismurn, auctorum Hassettum (ibid. 1720, 4to.): — Geographiae Schylerum sur la Vereeniging der protestie den Kirchen abeste (Halle, 1728, 2 vols. 4to.): — a collection of writings tending to the reunion of the Protestant turc'ches: — De titulii patriarachi ecumenici (Tubing, 1735, 4to.): — De ecclesia sanciunim non s actresses (ibid. 1747, 5to.): — De asserolis virginiun, doctorum et martyrum (ibid. 1750, 4to.). As an editor, Paffe published Epitome Institutioum dianeurum Laetanti (Paris, 1712, 8vo.), first edition complete: — S. Irenear fragmerta anecdoti (La Haye, 1715, 8vo.); a publication followed by a dispute with Seip, Maffei, who had cast some doubt upon the authenticity of these fragments: — Ecclesia ecumenici libri symbolici (Tubingen, 1730, 8vo.). Finally, Paffe directed the publication of the new German translation of the Bible, which appeared at Tubingen (1729, fol.), a work on which, in connection with others, he actively labored. Paffe was a learned man of the very first rank, but of doubtful moral character. He was at the head of the so-called collegial system, which regards the Church as a collegium — as a corporation possessing corpor rights, the Church can make her own statutes and laws, and can insist upon their observance. The attitude of the Church towards her: an individual or similar to the position it occupies with respect to any other association. The magistratus politicus does not belong to her; the Church consisting solely of teachers and taught. It is only by transference, by virtue of silent or express compact, that the magistracy can receive rights originally inherent in the Church. Results were, however, at first, and till after the commencement of the 19th century, in favor of the territorial system. The Bible known among the German Protestants as "the Bible of Tubingen" was published under Paffe's direction in one of his volumes (ibid. 1729, 4to.). He was also for a time pastor at St. Leonard's Church in Stuttgart. He died in 1720. He was the author of about forty works and exegetical and dogmatic dissertations, but none of them are of much value in our day. A list of them may be found in Winer's Theo. Lit., a. v. See also Böck, Gruch. der Universaldai; Zeplein. Leben der Gelehrten, and Bibliotheca Bremensis (1720). (J. H. W.)

Paffe, Johann Christoph, a German Lutheran theologian, was born at Pufflingen in 1631, and was educated at the university in Tübingen, where he afterwards flourished as professor of theology. He was also a correspondent for a time at St. Leonard's Church in Stuttgart. He died in 1720. He was the author of about forty works and exegetical and dogmatic dissertations, but none of them are of much value in our day. A list of them may be found in Winer's Theol. Literatur, a. v. Pfauser (Pfauser), Johann Sebastian, a German Roman Catholic divine, was born at Constance in 1520. He came by recommendation of the bishop of Trent to Vicenza as court-preacher of emperor Ferdinand I, but was consigned to the monastery of the Augustins, by the emperor, in his anti-Papal tendency. He was thereafter employed as confessor and preacher by the emperor's son, Maximilian, and all efforts to supplant him were unsuccessful until the Bohemian crown question arose, and it became necessary for the court to have the favor of all Ultramontane pretenses. In 1560 Pfauser became pastor at Laumin. He died in 1569. To the last Maximilian kept up a friendly correspondence with this good man.

Pfefferkorn, Johann (originally Joseph), a noted Jewish convert to Christianity, was born in Moravia in 1469. He embraced Christianity, and was christened Peter, and baptized at Cologne with his wife and children in 1506, when thirty-six years old. All the efforts of this man, who, with many faults, was certainly not wanting in merit, were early directed to the conversion of his brethren according to the flesh. The means he first made use of were highly laudable; for he treated them with gentleness, and even defended his former co-religionists against the calumnies of their enemies. But fanatical and misguided, his zeal afterwards was less well advised when he undertook the conversion of any Jew or hebrew book excepting the old Testament. With the aid of the Dominican monks, he prevailed on the emperor Maximilian to adopt his views, and in 1569 an edict was published which enjoined that all writings emanating from the Jews against the Christian religion.

should be suppressed and consigned to the flames; this edict was soon succeeded by another, July 6, 1610, enjoining the destruction of every Hebrew book with the sole exception of the Old Testament. The execution of this edict was, however, suspended until the opinion of the Holy Synod of Luzern (Uetz) of February had been obtained. By reason of this delay, Prof. John Reuchlin, whose opinion in this matter was sought for, was enable to publish a voluminous treatise, in which he divided the Jewish works into seven different classes, and afterwards proved which of these classes might be considered dangerous or injurious to the Christian religion.
Among the books which he thinks in part harmless and in part useful, and even valuable to theology, and which he would in consequence preserve, were not only the commentaries of Rashi, the Kimach, Ibn-Ezra, Germon-ides, Nachmanides, etc., but the Talmud and the calcalistic book Sohar (q. v.). On the other hand, Reuch-lin maintained that those only should be destroyed which contained blasphemies against Christ, such as the Nizzachon and Toledoth Jesu. He further pointed out the impossibility of suppressing books by an imperial decree which were dispersed in all parts of the world, and might easily be reprinted in other places. The content soon grew warm between the adversaries of the books and their defenders; the former consisting of the Dominicans and their partisans, and the latter of all modern scholars and theologians. The affair was finally left by an appeal to pope Leo X. Hochstraaten, an inquisitor, and a man fully qualified for that cruel office, repaired to Rome, supported with remonstrances from several princes to bias, with money to bribe, and menaces to intimidate. He even threatened the pope with rejecting his authority and separating from the Church, unless Reuchlin, and the Jews whom he defended, were condemned. But all his efforts were in vain, and he was obliged to return, mortified and disgraced. The victory which his opponent had gained exposed him to the charge of being a Quaker. But he informed them "he was persuaded that Martin Luther, who then began to make a figure in Germany, would find them so much employment that they would permit him to end his days in peace" (Villers on the Reformation, p. 107). Soon, indeed (by reason apparently of the Reformation movement), an end was put to the whole dispute. When and where Pfefferkorn died is difficult to say. Of his works, which obtained such unenviable notoriety, we mention, Der Judenspiegel, or Spectaculum sive Judaeorum et Turcicorum et Allicum Adversus Juxta Iusti (Nurem-burg, 1507) — Die Judenberichte, or Libellus de Judaeis et Christianis in Syriae sive Substantiae figuris figurae (Collog, 1508) — Das Osterbuch, or Narratio de ratione Paschae celebrandi infra Judaeos recepto (Collog. and Augsb. 1509) — Der Judenbrief, or Hostia Judaeorum (ibid. 1509) — In Libris et Libris dem Kaiser Maximilium, or In landum et honorem illustriissimi imperatoris Maximilianum, etc. (Collog. 1510) — Ein Brief an Geistliche und Welthliche in Betreff des Kaiserlichen Mandates der jüdischen Schriften zu vertiefen — Der Handspiegel, against Reuchlin (Mayence, 1513) — Die Brustglocke, against Reuchlin (Cologne, 1514) — Stirnblähen wider Reuchlin u. s. Pfefferkorn, S. Michael M., a German theologian, was born in the year 1646 at Lippe, near Eisenach, and was the son of a minister. Having received his preparatory education at Creutzburg and Gotha, he went to Jena, where in 1666 he was created magister. From Jena he went to Leipzig, and after having completed his studies, he was appointed professor at the Altenburg gymnasium. Having occupied several stations as an educator, he was called in 1676 to the pastorate of Fri-emeck, near Gotha. For fifty years he faithfully discharged his ministerial functions. He died March 3, 1732. Besides other works, he is the author of some very fine hymns which were found in their way among the old song-books, as "Was frag ich nach der Welt und allen ihren Schätzen" (Engl. transl. by Mills, "Can I this world esteem," in Hymns from the German, p. 101). See Brückner, Kirchen- und Schulenatlas im Herzogthum Gotha (Gotha, 1781), iv, 80-82; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenleides, iv, 65 sq. (B. P.)

Pfeiffer, Augustus D.D., a learned German Lutheran divine, noted as an Orientalist, was born at Lauenburg Oct. 30, 1640, and was educated at Wittenberg. In 1673 he entered the ministry, and thereafter held several important pastorate. In 1681 he became archdeacon to the church of St. Thomas at Leipzig, in which city he also held the chair of Hebrew. In 1689 he was made superintendent of the churches at Lubeck, and died there Jan. 11, 1688. Pfeiffer was one of the most skilful philologues of his time. He is said to have known seventy languages. His library was rich in Hebrew, Arabic, Coptic, Armenian, Persian, and Chinese MSS., and he left many learned writings. His philological works were all collected under the title Opera omnia philologica (Utrecht, 1704, 2 vols. 4to.). His other publications were, Theologia Judaica atque Mohammediaca (Lipa, 1687, 12mo)—Antiquitates selectae, ab Ugo-bono notis judaicae et alia excerta (Ugo e Bononiis, 1704); De Thermotheo (ibid. xxii, 545)—Distributio de potes Hebr. recognita (ibid. xxx, 889; transl. into Engl. by D. A. Taylor, with additions, in the Bibl. Repos. vols. vi-vi);—Manuchoe noræ et faculti ad accommodacionem, etc. (Ugo e Bononiis, 1705); Specimen de montalbensi Vr. Test. (ibid. xxxii, 657)—Specimen de roce cruzata (ibid. xxxii, 743)—Specimen de Paulinæ Graduvm (ibid. xxxii, 675). See Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. s. v.; Rotering; Memoria theologorum, s. v. (J. H. W.)

Pfeiffer, Christoph, a German divine, noted as a hymnologist, was born at Oels in the year 1688. For two years he was assistant-preacher at Dinsdorf, when he was called, March 28, 1719, by the duke H. Chr. von von Landekron, minister in the principality of Munsterberg, near Frankenstein, in the principality of Munsterburg. Having occupied this position for twenty-seven years, he was called to Stolz, where he spent the remainder of his life, and died Dec. 28, 1758. His picture in the church there has the following inscription under it:—Christoph Pfefferkorn, in the following epigraph: "Mors tua vita mea est, tusque, O dulcisissime Jesu, vulnera sunt animae Pharmaciae certa mena." Pfeiffer is the author of many hymns, several of which are found in our modern hymn-books. See Wezel, Hymnoop. (Herrnhut, 1736), iv, 837 sq.; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenleides, s. v. 742 sq. PFEIFFER

Pfeiffer, Madame Isad., a German lady, whose maiden name was Reise, is noted as a traveller in the East, and as a valuable contributor to Palestinian topography. She was born in Vienna, Oct. 15, 1797. From her very childhood she longed to see the world, and ever read with delight books of travel. In her girlhood she travelled to some extent with her parents, and subsequently with her husband, to the death of her husband and the maturity of her sons she determined to undertake a journey to Palestine, that she might have the ineffable delight of treading those spots which our Saviour had hallowed by his presence. With the accumulated wealth of twenty years, she left Vienna in March, 1842. Her journey included Constantinople, Brussel, Berlij, Jerusalem, the river Jordan and the Dead Sea, Nazareth, Damascus, Balbec, the Libanus, Alexandria, Cairo, and the Desert to the Red Sea, then back by Malta, Sicily, Naples, Rome, etc., to Vienna, where she arrived in December of the same year. Upon her return she published anonymously the diary she had kept during her trip, under the title of Reise einer Wieserin in das Heilige Land (Journey of a Woman in the Holy Land). In 1845 Madame Pfeiffer visited Sweden, and in the year before last she made her first journey round the world. In 1851 she made a second expedition, visiting the United States, and upon her return published an account of all her travels. But of all her descriptions those of the Holy Land are far more interesting than any of the others; being doubtless to have been less hurried then while making her tours round the world. Throughout the whole of her arduous journeys Madame Pfeiffer displayed great courage, perseverance, and womanly tact. The mere fact of her having accomplished what no male traveller ever has done is conclusive evidence that she was possessed of great endurance and fortitude. She died Oct. 27, 1858.

Pfeiffer, Christoph Carl Ludwig von, a descendant of an old knightly family, was born Jan. 20, 1712, at Grünstadt, not far from Worms. When ten years of age he was left an orphan, and his uncle, the Rev. Justus S. von Pfeiff, of Magdeburg, took him into his house. Here he remained for six years, when, at the age of sixteen, he entered the University of Halle for the study of jurisprudence. In the year 1729 he went to Tubingen to continue there his studies, where he became a faithful follower of Christ. In 1732, at the age of twenty, he was appointed preceptor of the Upper Huntingdon government at Regensburg, and in 1737 he was appointed counsellor of law at Stuttgart. For thirty years he held the highest honors in Wurttemberg, until, in the year 1768, he removed to Prussia, where Frederick the Great lodged him. In 1768 he married a man of his own house. Pfeiffer died March 28, 1776. He was a very pious man, and the different stages of his life are best marked in his poetical productions and hymns, which number about 940. Not all of his hymns have found their way into hymn-books, especially as most of them are influenced by Zinzendorf and Bengel, whose ideas are more or less reproduced in them. Those, however, which are found in our hymn-books are really jewels of German hynology. A collection of his hymns has been published by the Rev. G. Knack, of Berlin (1800, 1808), under the title of Hymnengrundzüge. Between the years 1780 and 1781, he published a work on the Bible, and a MS. of a rhymed translation of Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, the Lord's Prayer, the apostolic epistles, etc. See Teichmann's biography in the Preface to his Christl. Haushoheits (Stuttgard, 1822)

Pfiiffer, Johann Conrad, a German theologian, was born at Zurich, Switzerland, in 1747; studied theology at the university of his native place; in 1775 he was made dean of the Orphans' Church, and later was appointed the successor of his friend Lavater (q. v.), in the pastorate, and was also made the dean of St. Peter's Church. He died in 1792. Pfeiffer was a voluminous writer and much involved in controversy with the Rationalists, who then so very generally abounded in Germany. He was in close harmony with the theological views of Lavater, and with him attempted to give to his pens, like the Christian preacher and Christian, to lift Christianity from its Oriental vestments, and place it upon the ground of universal humanity. While the sceptics, and even Spalding among them, regarded modern Christianity rather as a purely comprehensible and abstract fact, and excluded every contribution of the imagination, Lavater and Pfeiffer, like Holtzstock (q. v.), thought it best to render aid by the Western imagination. They made Christianity not only accessible to the modern understanding, but to the modern feeling. Most valuable of all of Pfeiffer's publications are his Schriften der Christianen (1788-92), which have been freely used by Stier in his Words of Jesus (transl. by Strong and Smith, N. Y. 3 vols. 8vo). These sermons letters furnish a sort of Christian romance, in which the men and women of the time of Jesus wrote letters to each other, just as senti-mental men and women of the time. A great deal has been written, and Christianity was thus modernized to make it attractive and plain to the masses, and relieve it of the Oriental garb it wears in the Bible. (J. H. W.)

Pflug, Julius, a German theologian, noted in the Reformation history of his country's Church, was born at Merseburg near the opening of the Elbe. He was the son of a nobleman, and a favorite of the emperor Charles V, who sent him in 1541 as one of the collectors to the synod at Regensburg (q. v.), which resulted in the adoption of the Augsburg Interim (q. v.). Pflug was selected by the emperor as president of the approaching synod at Regensburg. About that time the chapter of the cathedral at Naumburg-Zeitz elected him bishop, but he was unable to assume his episcopal duties until after the battle at Mühlberg. In 1557 he presided at the Synod of Worms, and died in 1564. Pflug was a moderate Romanist, and though associated with Eck, shared none of his extravagant and extreme ideas. He earnestly desired peace, and though he may here and there have consented to measures rather equivocal and questionable, he probably sought only the peace and union of the Church. Phæd(o) (ο) Else, a noted ancient Greek philosopher, was a native of Elis, and of high birth. He was taken prisoner in his youth, and passed into the hands of an Athenian slave-dealer; and being of considerable personal beauty was compelled to prostitute himself. He was in the summer of B.C. 400 that Phædo was brought to Athens. A year would not suffice for his acquaintance with Socrates, to whom he attached himself. According to Diogenes Laertius he ran away from his master to Socrates, and was ransomed by one of the friends of the latter. Suidas says that he was accidentally present at a conversation between Socrates and the young man, and besought him to effect his liberation. Various accounts mention Alcibiades, Critias, or Cebes as the person who ransomed him. Cebes is stated to have been on terms of intimate friendship with Phædo, and to have instructed him in philosophy. Phædo was present at the death of Socrates, while he was still quite a youth. From the mention of his long hair it would seem that he was not eighteen years of age at the time, as at that age it was customary to cease wearing the hair long (Becker, Charidies, ii, 882). That Phædo was on terms of friendship with Plato appears likely from the mode in which he is introduced in the dialogue which takes its name from him. Other stories that were current in the schools spoke of their relation as being that of enmity rather than friendship. Several philosophers were unengraced enough to reproach Phaedo with this condition, but he is named one of his dialogues after Phaedo. Phaedo appears to have lived in Athens some time after the death of Socrates. He then returned to Elia, where he became the founder of a school of philosophy, which appears to have resembled in tendency and character the Megarian school. Archiphrus and Moschus are mentioned among his disciples. He was succeeded by Pleistanus, after whom the Elean school was merged in the Eretrian.

Of the doctrines of Phaedo nothing is known, except as they made their appearance in the philosophy of Menedemus. Nothing can safely be inferred respecting them from the Phaedo of Plato. None of Plato's writings have come down to us. They were in the form of dialogues. There was some doubt in antiquity as to what the text was, which, and which is the best. Panetius attempted a critical separation of the two classes, and the Zopyrus and the Symm. were acknowledged to be genuine. Besides these, Diogenes Laertius (ii, 105) mentions as of doubtful authenticity the Nikaos, Mifos, Antonius h. Panaetius, and Photides Laos. In addition, the works of Suidas mentions the Symm, Alkibiades, and Kretola. It was probably from the Zopyrus that the incident alluded to by Cicero (De Fato, 5; Tuscul. Disq. iv, 57, § 40), Maximus Tyrt. (XXXI, 353), and others, was derived. Seneca (Ep. 94, 41) has a translation from a short passage from one of his pieces. See Fabricius, Bibliogr. Phaedrus, an Epicurean philosopher, and contemporary of Cicero, became acquainted with the great orator in his youth at Rome, and during his residence in Athens (B.C. 80) Cicero renewed his acquaintance with him. Phaedrus was at that time an old man, and was president of the Epicurean school. He was also on terms of friendship with Velleius, whom Cicero introduces as the defender of the Epicurean tenets in the De Nat. Deor. (i, 21, § 58). He occupied the position of head of the Epicurean school till his death, and was succeeded by Patroclus. Cicero (Ad Att. xiii, 39) mentions, according to the common reading, two treatises by Phaedrus, Φαίδρος παρατέουσα ἐλέκθεσις. The first title is corrected on MS. authority to Παρ. Στίχων. Some critics (as Petersen) suppose that only one treatise is spoken of, Περὶ Σωτ. καὶ Πάλαισιος. Others (among whom is Orelli, Onom. Tull. s. v. Phaedrus) adopt the reading οἰκεια, or, at least, suppose that two treatises are spoken of. An interesting fragment of the former work was discovered at Herculanum in 1816, and was first published, though not recognised as the work of Phaedrus, in a work entitled Herculaneumia, or Archeological and Philologial Dissertations; containing a Manuscript found among the Ruins of Herculaneum, &c, De Nat. Deor. Fragm. Hamb. 1835. Cicero was largely indebted to this work of Phaedrus for the materials of the first book of his De Hicurana Deor. Not only is the development of the Epicurean doctrine (c. 16, etc.) taken from it, but the erudite manner of the doctrine of other philosophers put in the mouth of Vel- lies is a mere translation from Phaedrus. Phæmenon (Φαιμένον, from φαίμειν, &c. op- pear) is that which has appeared. It is generally applied to some sensible appearance, some occurrence in the course of nature. But in mental philosophy it is applied to the various and changing states of mind. "How pitiful and ridiculous are the grounds upon which such men prefer to account for the very lowest and commonest phenomena of nature without recurring to a God and Providence!" Among the various phenomena which the human mind presents to our view, there is none more calculated to excite our curiosity and our wonder than that of communication which is carried on between the sentient, thinking, and active principle within us and the material objects with which we are surrounded" (Stewart, Elements, ch. i, sect. 1). In the philosophy of Kant, phæmenon means an object such as we represent it to ourselves or conceive of it, in opposition to noumenon, or a thing as it is in itself. "According to Kant, the facts of consciousness, in their subjective character, are produced partly from the nature of the things of which it is conscious; and hence, in their objective character, they are phænomena, or objects as they appear to us. The distinction is useful in things in ourselves, noumena, or realities in their absolute nature, as they may be out of relation to the mind. The subjective elements which the mind itself contributes to the consciousness of every object are to be found, as regards intuition, in the forms of space and time; and as regards thought, in the ideas of substance, unity, plurality, and the rest. To perceive a thing in itself would be to perceive it neither in space nor in time; for these are furnished by the constitution of our perceptive faculties, and constitute an element of the phenomenum object of intuition only. To think of a thing in itself would be to think of it neither as one nor as many, nor under any other category; for these, again, depend upon the constitution of our understanding, and constitute an element of the phenomenum object of thought. The phenomenum is the product of the inherent laws of our own mental constitution, and, as such, is the sum and limit of all the knowledge to which we can attain" (Mansel, Lect. on Phil. of Kant, p. 21, 22). The definition of phæmenon is, "that which can be known only along with something else" (Ferrrier, Inst. of Metaphys. p. 819). See McCoa, Intuition; Jour. Specul. Philos. vol. iv, iii and iv; vol. i. Phallic (Gen. xxvi, 9). See PHALLUS.

Phallus (Gr. μαλακτικός, membrum virile), a representation of the male generative organ, as the symbol of the fertility of nature, was carried among the ancient Greeks in the processions of the Dionysia, and men disguised as women, called Ἰβυφαλλοῦς, followed immediately behind it. The phallus, which was called among the Romans fasces, was so monstrously used that the law decreed that it must not be hung around the necks of children to avert evil influences. The Satyrica sigma of Pliny probably referred to the phallus, and he says that these were placed in gardens and on heathens to protect against the fascinations of the envious. From Pallas, also, we learn that smuts were accustomed to place figures of the phallus before their forges for the same purpose. This symbol, which distinguishes itself by its indecency, conveyed to the ancient heathens, as the Linga (q. v.) does to the modern Hindis, a profound and sacred meaning. Diodorus Siculus, referring to its use by the priests of the Mosaic account, relates the belief of the Jews held among the Greeks, tells us that by this they would signify their gratitude to God for the populosity of their country. "It was an object of common worship throughout the nature-religion of the East, and was called by a manifold name: Linga, Jons, Polleur, etc. Originally it had no other meaning than the allegorical one of that mysterious union between the male and female which throughout nature seems to be the sole condition of the existence of animated beings; but at a later period, more particularly when ancient religions had established the hot-bed of mankind—natural and unnatural vices, its worship became an intolerable nuisance, and was put down by the senate on account of the more than usual immorality to which it gave rise. Its origin has caused much speculation, but no certainty has been arrived at by investigators. The Phœnicians traced its introduction into their worship to Adonis, the Egyptians to Osiris, the Phrygians to Attys, the Greeks to Dionysus. The common myth concerning it was the story of some god deprived of his semen, who lived on this fluid which in autumn loses its fruit-catching influence. The procession in which it was carried about was called Phallagogia, or Peraphila, and a certain hymn was sung on that occasion, called the Phalleus mictis. The bearers of the phallus, which generally consisted of red leather and covered the hot-bed of mankind, were the Phallophori. Phalli were on those occasions worn as ornaments around the neck, or attached to the body. Aristotle traces the origin of comedy to the ribaldry and the improvised jokes customary on these festivals. Phalli were often attached to statues, and of a prodigious size; sometimes they were even movable. At a procession of Ptolemy Philadelphus a phallus was carried about made of gold, and one hundred and twenty yards long. Before the temple of Venus at Hierapolis there stood a phalli, one hundred and eighty feet high, upon which a priest mounted annually, and remained there in prayer for seven days. The phallus was an attribute of Pan, Priapus, and to a certain extent also of Hermes' (Chambers). The believers in the development theory of course have a way of their own in explaining the development of phallic worship. They teach that it is the most ancient and universal of the beliefs of the human race, and that it has prevailed among all known nations of antiquity, and has been handed down in both dead and living forms to the present day. Some have even asserted the existence not only in Egypt, Greece, and Rome, but also in Syria, Persia, Asia Minor, Italy, Spain, Germany, France, Ireland, and Scandinavia, among the mound-builders of North America, in Mexico, Central America, Peru, and Hayti, and in the islands of the Pacific Ocean, and in Africa. They even see its traces among the Jews; and in the use of certain symbols in Christianity. Thus, e. g., Westropp teaches: "The origin of the idea is coeval among primitive nations with that of the family, and rests in part upon the natural veneration of the father as the generator, the priest, and the ruler. Mañque derives much of its importance from a veneration of the principles at the foundation of the phallic worship. Its ceremony was attended with rites which marked their significance, and one of its symbols, the wedding-ring, is employed at the present day. Circumcision was in its inception a purely phallic ordinance. Although the O. T. narrative requires that it was instituted as a covenant between Jehovah and Abraham, the rite had been practiced by the Egyptians and Phenicians long before the birth of the Hebrew patriarch. Serpent symbolism was associated with the phallic emblems, but that the serpent's signification has not been clearly established. The serpent was used among most archaic nations as a symbol of wisdom and health, and yet its meaning often included the notion of life and an emblem of the spirit." Mr. Wake, another essayist of the same school, treats of the phallus as a symbol of the whole of mankind, a sign of the origin of the Mosaic religion, which was borrowed by the compiler of the Pentateuch from some foreign source, probably from the mysteries of Mithra, a Persian deity. The tree of the knowledge of good and evil he identifies with the fig-tree, which was highly venerated by many primitive peoples. Its leaves, it will be remembered, were sewed into aprons by Adam and Eve after their transgression. The keraub which guarded the tree of life is interpreted as a symbol of the Deity himself, in the form of the sacred bull of antiquity—a form under which the keraub is described by Ezekiel (Oh, I and xx). The story of the Deluge is also regarded as a myth, with decided evidences of a phallic character. In many of the incidents interwoven into the history of the Hebrews, and in many of their religious observances, Mr. Wake discovers testimony of the influence of the phallic superstition. Abraham was a Chaldaean, and by tradition declared to have been learned in astronomy, and to have taught the science to the Phenicians. "He had higher notions of the relation of man to the Divine than his ancestors," says the writer, but there is no demonstration that the science between the Babylonian faith and that of his Syrian neighbors. The Jewish patriarchs erected pillars and planted groves, both of which were customs connected with phallic worship. Throughout the rule of the Judges, and especially after the establishment of the monarchy, the priests were the custodians of the purer religion of their nation to the idolatrous practices of their neighbors, which involved worship of phallic statues and omphallic emblems "in high places." The religion of Baal, openly denounced by the prophets, was a sort of phallicism, and was conducted with revel and abominable ceremonies, which the Jews too often imitated. Mr. Wake even holds that the basis of Christianit y is more purely phallic than that of any other religion. "In the recognition of God as the universal Father, the great Parent of mankind, there is a development of the fundamental idea of phalism. In the position assigned to Mary as the mother of God the paramount principle of the primitive belief is again predominant. The nimbus, the aureole, the cross, the fish, and even the spires of churches, are symbols retained from the old phallic worship." The Mardi Gras festival is cited as having a phallic origin, and, in the beginning, a reference to some event connected with the occurrences in the Garden of Eden. In fact, says Dr. Wilder, also of this class of writers, "There is not a fast or festival, preoccupation of any religious symbols, existing at the present day which has not been taken bodily from phalism, or from some successive system of paganism" (comp. Ancient Symbol Wor-
The name is derived from the Egyptian word Pfrē, or Phrē, signifying the sun (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, i, 43). This identification, respecting which there can be no doubt, is due to the duke of Northumberland and the general Fox. (Rawlinson) They must necessarily have manifested sensual tendencies of the very nature of phallicism, and that only in their lowest estate such worship was extensively indulged in. Abund it is to point to circumcision as in anywise connected with phallic worship. The Jews practiced it as a rite of admission to the fold to distinguish him, and also as a sanitary precaution which physicians approve of in our day. We do not wonder that such ridiculous and extravagant hypotheses lead to the proposition recently made by one of the same school of thinkers as those quoted, that "there would also now appear good ground for believing that the ark of the covenant, held sacred by the Jews, contained nothing more nor less than a phalus, the ark being the type of the Argha or Yoni (Linga worship of India)" (Sellen, in Anthropol. Society of London, 1860-4, p. 327 sqq., 12th paper). (J. H. W.)

In 2 Sam. iii, 15 he is called PHALTI'EL. Ewald (Gesch. iii, 129) suggests that this forced marriage was a piece of policy on the part of Saul to attach Phal'ti to his house. With the exception of this brief mention of his name, and the touching little episode in 2 Sam. iii, 16, nothing more is heard of Phal'ti. Michel is there restored to David. "Her husband went with her along weeping behind to Bahurim," and there, in obedience to Abner's abrupt command, "Go, return," he turns and disappears from the scene. See DAVID.

Ph'araz (vulg. pron. Pharroh) (Heb. Paroah', פָּרָו, Sept, New Test., and Josephus Paroah, but seldom in classical writers), the common title of the ancient kings of Egypt, as Ptolemy of its later kings, and Caesar of the emperors of Rome. (The following account includes the whole of Scriptural interest, with special reference to their identification.)

Readers of Scripture will remark that Pharaoh often stands simply as a proper name (Gen. xii, 15; xxi, 21; xlii, 36; xl, 2 sqq.; xlv, 1 sqq.; and so generally throughout the Pentateuch, and also in Cant. i, 9; Isa. xxix, 11; xxx, 2). "King of Egypt" is sometimes subjoined to it (1 Kings iii, 1; 2 Kings xvii, 21; xviii, 21); and sometimes also the more specific designation, or real proper name of the king, as in 2 Kings xii, 33, Pharaoh Hophra (Jer. xlv, 30). Josephus (Ant. viii, 6, 2) says that while every king of Egypt from Menes to the time of Solomon took this title, no king of Egypt used it afterwards, and affirms the latter fact to be apparent from the sacred writings. This, however, is not quite correct. Several Egyptian kings were after the period in question called by foreigners Pharaoh, sometimes simply, sometimes in connection with a second name (2 Kings xviii, 21; xxi, 29); but the alteration from the time of Solomon which undoubtedly took place is remarkable, and probably points to an important change in the dynastic history of Egypt.

Some writers suppose Pharaoh to have been the name given in the Bible to the native kings of Egypt. There were, however, probably before Solomon's time several introductions of foreign dynasties, and some of them, if we accept the usual period ascribed to the rule of the Shepherds, of long duration; yet Scripture gives the title to all alike before this period, and Josephus states that all who professed to assume it. Yet it is probable that it was the title of such kings as had the sole direction of affairs while Egypt was an independent state, and that the title of "melek," or king, marked such as ruled conjointly with other kings of Egypt, or who governed as viceroys under a foreign ruler, as was the case after the conquest of the Assyrian conqueror, as is very probably a satisfactory explanation for the long period down to the reign of Solomon. Most likely throughout it "Pharaoh" marks the monarch who ruled alone in Egypt, or over its inferior and tributary kings when there were such. This may seem intimate in the speech of one of them to Joseph: "I am Pharaoh, and there is no one greater than I. But I with the tenth part in all the land of Egypt" (Gen. xii, 44). Wilkinson's explanation, however, scarcely accounts for the period subsequent to the Pharaoh who gave his daughter to Solomon. Shishak, who seems to have succeeded him, was evidently the supreme ruler of Egypt, and not only in the southern part, but also in the north, which he extended into the territory of the Hittites. Such a practical disregard of it even while acknowledging its nominal authority. There is a passage of Manetho preserved by Josephus which seems to point strongly to the Pharaoh that the ancient internal constitution of Egypt was its government by subordinate kings under a supreme ruler (Josephus, Ant., ii, 17). Such, he expressly tells us, was its state during the oppression of the Shepherds: "These tyrannized over the kings of the Thebais and of the other parts of Egypt." The general idea of ancient government was that of a supreme monarch over tributary kings; and the great probability is that the Shepherds followed this analogy, and, merely depositing the ruling Pharaoh, left the minor dynasties undisturbed. The Pharaohs are supposed to have been at the times invested with the highest sacerdotal dignity (Hengstenberg, Egypt, p. 55; Wilkinson, i, 240). From the circumstantial evidence it is clear that the Pharaohs, when the land was closed in the ovals, the title priest prelates that of king, and for other reasons, Wilkinson argues, as we think conclusively, that Egypt was originally governed by hierarchical and not regal power (i, 10). See Egypt, ii, 2. The Pharaoh of Abraham's time. (a) Pharaoh's visit to Egypt during a famine in Canaan (Gen. xiii, 10). Which of the ancient kings of Egypt is to be understood by this Pharaoh it is perhaps impossible to determine with certainty. Wilkinson supposes him to have been Apepi; Africanus calls him Ramsesmenes; and some have taken him to be one of the Shepherd kings. We have, in truth, no materials in Scripture or elsewhere for fixing the name and place of this king in the dynasties of Egypt. In regard to the date also of Abraham's visit to Egypt, there is, we think, unquestionably the view according to which the Scriptures lead us to think that foreigners regarded that country. Whatever may have been the internal administration of the government, into which Scripture does not enter at all, the general view given us of Egypt in the Bible is that of a country united under one monarch. The earliest apparent reference to a different state of things occurs in Kings vii, 6, where we read of "kings of Egypt," apparently of equal authority. Isaiah predicts great troubles arising probably from a similar condition of things (ch. xix, 3). Again in Josephus, Wilkinson, Egypt, i, 178; Rawlinson's Herodotus, i, 51, note 4, and 391). All ancient history with which we are acquainted (Herodotus, Diodorus, and Manetho) assumes the political unity of Egypt. The titles of the Pharaohs seem to establish it. They are always called on the monuments "Lords of Upper and Lower Egypt" (Wilkinson, ii, 73; 2d ser., i, 261). This unity of Egypt from the earliest times is now generally acknowledged (Hengstenberg, Egypt, p. 84). The power and greatness of Egypt from the remotest times point to such a unity. Its high position in the world and in the history of the world is further exemplified by the fact that the country has never again for so long a period had an independent government. In fact, the object of the independent kings of Egypt was to exhibit the same condition which all the petty states of antiquity did, in which every man was of necessity a soldier (Hume, Essays, ii, xi). Whereas in Egypt soldiers formed a different class from the rest of the community, he never wore arms except in actual service, while private citizens at no time carried offensive weapons (Wilkinson, i, 402). Indeed, it is impossible to imagine any country less adapted by geographical configuration for divided rule than Egypt from the Cataract to the sea. One level valley, only divided east and west by its river, shut in from the rest of the world by the Libyan and Arabian mountains and the Syrian deserts, it must of necessity form a single state.

This view of the political position of the Pharaohs is not inconsistent with the theory, for which there is very strong proof from Manetho and elsewhere, that for long periods of Egyptian history there may have been subordinate dynasties of kings ruling throughout Egypt. There may also have been, but probably for much shorter periods, a number of monarchs of the sufficient power to extend their influence far beyond the limits of Egypt. A change of dynasty seems here to have caused the change of title, and was probably more or less connected with such changes in after periods. The Persian monarchs, finally, administering the affairs of Egypt through tributary native kings, took the title of Pharaoh as indicative of their sovereignty (Trevor, Egypt, p. 331). With them this ancient name of royalty passed away forever.

The political position of the Pharaohs in Egypt is of great moment in understanding the history of that country. If it were that the Pharaoh was the supreme internal constitutional ruler, it marks the general unity of Egypt under a single monarch. If it were given indifferently to every king of Egypt at those times, which seem unquestionably to have reigned, and may have been of long duration, as in some division of the country, the occurrence of the title does not necessarily mark the political unity of the land. According to the first view, for instance, the Pharaoh of Abraham or Joseph would be the supreme ruler of the whole of Egypt, with, it might happen, various dynasties of subordinate kings under him; according to the latter, he might be only king of a portion of Egypt, with other dynasties of equal rank ruling contemporaneously elsewhere. To use the former view appears the preferable one for many reasons. The unity of the country is supported in Scripture; it is, we think, unquestionably the view according to which the Scriptures lead us to think that foreigners regarded that country. Whatever may have been the internal administration of the government, into which Scripture does not enter at all, the general view given us of Egypt in the Bible is that of a country united under one monarch. The earliest apparent reference to a different state of things occurs in Kings vii, 6, where we read of "kings of Egypt," apparently of equal authority. was hateful to the Egyptians as of great value to their enemies the Shepherds. On the other hand, Abraham's possessions, especially the camels, may have been purchased by him from the nomad tribes with the proceeds of Pharaoh's liberality, and the trade which we hold with the Arab world consis ts of this Arab race hardly consists of her having been reduced to bondage while they were in the ascendant. Indeed, it appears that the Shepherd kings (q.v.) were not on good terms with the Hebrews, as their interests were rival. The date at which Abraham visited Egypt (Gen. xiv. 13) is probably the most certain (though not altogether accurate) is about B.C. 2051, which would not accord with the time of Salatis, the head of the fifteenth dynasty, B.C. 2006, according to our reckoning, but rather with that of Biutoth of the second (Thiniteic) dynasty, and that of Sebeus (the sixteenth, or (Elephantinian) dynasty, as well as with that of Tancheres of the fifth (Elephantinian) dynasty, but anterior to all the other dynasties. 2. The Pharaoh of Joseph.—Between the Pharaoh of Abraham and the Pharaoh of Joseph there was an interval of two hundred years. During this period there may have been various changes of dynasty, art, and religion in Egypt of which we derive no information from Scripture; while the notice of the former king and of the state of the country in his time is so brief that it leaves us at any point upon this point. Of the political position and character of the latter, and the condition of Egypt in his time, Scripture gives us very important information from his intimate connection with Joseph and the chosen people of God. Wilkinson identifies this Pharaoh with Osirin, one of the kings of the sixteenth dynasty of Tanites, whose reign he supposes to have exceeded forty-three years (Egypt, i. 42, 43). Bunsen prefers to identify him with Osirin, of the seventeen dynasty of Memphite, according to classical writers (Trevor, Egypt, p. 254). Osburn thinks him to have been Apophis (ibid. p. 216), as Eusebius states, changing the date so as to fit the identification obviously simply upon a comparison of the Hebrew and Egyptian chronologies. Whether he was one of the dynasties of the Shepherd kings is a question on which authorities differ, according to their views of the date of the Shepherd rule, and their interpretation of the scriptural account of this king. Wilkinson is decided of opinion that he was not a Shepherd king (i. 14; 2) in which Trevor agrees. Josephus says that he was a Shepherd. We are decidedly of opinion from the incidental notices of Scripture that he was not a Shepherd dynasty. If we are to accept Manetho's account, we must suppose that these Shephens (the fourteenth) of Egypt, ruled with the greatest tyranny and cruelty over the Egyptians, disregarded the old laws of the country, and demolished its temples (Josephus, Ap. i. 14). Their rule was not one of policy and conciliation, but of brute force and terror, an idea strongly corroborated by the administration which the Bible tells us all shepherds were held in Egypt, and by the testimony which the monuments bear to the determination and scorn in which they were universally held (Wilkinson, ii. 16; iv. 120). The Shepherds being such, it seems to us quite inconsistent with the Biblical narrative to suppose that Joseph's Pharaoh was a Shepherd king. Thus we find that the Egyptian prejudice against shepherds was carefully and jealously respected by this king. The Israelites coming into Egypt were by him located in the border-land (Hengstenberg, loc. cit. 43), a position where they would serve as a barrier against the shepherd-hating Egyptians (Gen. xli, 84). We cannot suppose a Shepherd king to act thus. He would not thus consult a native prejudice hostile to his own enemies, while his own Shepherd garrisons occupied the strongholds of Egypt. Again, Pharaoh's court and household, so far as we know them, were composed of native Egyptians. Such was Potiphar, the captain of the king's bodyguard, probably the most trusted officer of Pharaoh (Gen. xxxix. 1); while the chief butler and baker of his court are the two who were on the same trial with Joseph before the court of the Pharaoh (Trevor, p. 256). The officials of Pharaoh's prime minister, Joseph, are also native Egyptians, whose feelings of caste towards foreigners were carefully consulted (Gen. xliii. 32; see Rawlinson's Herodotus, bk. ii, c. 41, note 9). In the midst of this universal dependence, there is, however, a freedom, and the lands of Egypt passed into the possession of Pharaoh, the property of the native Egyptian priests alone was religiously respected, and they received, without any return, an ample maintenance from Pharaoh's stock for themselves and their families (Gen. xlvi. 22). When Pharaoh sought to bestow upon Joseph marks of the highest honor for his preservation of the country, one of these marks was the betrothal on him in marriage of Asenath, the daughter of Potipheh, priest of On or Heliopolis, who is thus distinguished as one of the highest and most honored personages in the land (Gen. xlii. 45). These considerations lead us to conclude that this Pharaoh was a native Egyptian, not a Shepherd king, and that he ruled after the expulsion of the Shepherds; or during the time of Joseph, over a people long accustomed to tyranny was still vivid in the national mind. Rawlinson (Herod. bk. ii, c. 108, note 2) seems to think that horses were unknown in Egypt till the time of Amosis (B.C. 1510), and would thus give a low date for this monarch, in whose time horses were in use for ordinary purposes as well as for war (Gen. xlii. 17). The testimony of Herodotus on which he comments seems, however, opposed to this view. According to the chronology which we adopt, the period of Joseph's deliverance from prison was B.C. 1688; which will, according to the account in Scripture, give the reign of Ahab, the fourth king of the fifteenth (shepherd) dynasty. But as the Shepherd kings do not seem to have been friendly to the Hebrews, and for the other reasons enumerated above, we presume that these foreigners were not at this time (if indeed they ever were) in possession of the whole of Egypt. We therefore incline to identify the Pharaoh in question with one of the eighth (Memphitic) dynasty, whose names are unrecorded, but who were contemporaneous with the twelfth (Diospolitic) as well as with the twelfth (Sebastic) dynasty, according to the Table of Dynasties in Scripture which seems to attribute a very considerable antiquity to this period. In Joseph's time the territory allocated to the Israelites was called Goshen (Gen. xlv. 10). In the time of Moses this ancient name appears to have been almost forgotten, and to have yielded to that of the land of Rameses (Gen. xlv. 11). The religion of Egypt during the reign of this Pharaoh appears to have been far less corrupt than it subsequently presents itself in the time of Moses. The Scriptures give us several indications of this; and these of no indistinct kind. Thus Joseph speaks to his master's wife as if she recognised the same God that he did (Gen. xxxix. 9). His language to the chief butler and baker in the prison conveys a similar idea (xvi, 6), as does his address to Pharaoh when called before him (xli, 16-82). Pharaoh in his speech to his servants and to Joseph speaks of God precisely as Joseph had done, and as if he recognised but one God (xlii, 88, 89). Joseph, without any fear of injurious consequences to himself, and in an extraordinary thing, allowed the identity of his religion with that of the sons of Jacob (xlii, 28). Joseph's steward, probably a native Egyptian, evidently recognises their God (xliii. 28). No doubt corruption had now been introduced into the pure religion derived from Noah, which was the national religion of Egypt we see probably a caste who had already given a superstitious coloring to religion, introduced new rites of worship, and paved the way for a total change in religious belief. But this latter condition does not appear to have been reached in the time of Joseph. Symbolic worship, if now, as is most likely, in common use, had still to a very great extent left undestroyed the notion of one supreme God ruling over all the nations, nor was there reason to suppose that Potipherah, the father-in-law of Joseph, and priest of On, was an upholder of the idolatry of a later time. The sun, now introduced into Egyptian worship, was by him in all likelihood explained as the sign and symbol of deity, but not as partaking of deity itself, and the sun was the deity of any other nation. An alteration by man of the worship ordained by God, but at the same time the religion of Egypt may have been comparatively true and pure, though it had now introduced that symbolism which quickly degenerated into the grossest idolatry the world has ever seen. Symbolic worship was now probably regarded as a high proof of religious wisdom (Rom. i, 22); a short time proved it to be utterly folly.

The government of Pharaoh seems to have been of an absolute kind (Gen. xii, 40-48; see Wilkinson, i, 43). That at this time Egypt was governed by several independent dynasties seems inconsistent with the language and conduct of Pharaoh in making by his own mere will Joseph to be ruler "over all the land of Egypt," only inferior to himself through necessity. But the language is evidently that of a courtly assumption, and may very naturally be applied only to that region over which he ruled. The evidence is very strong from the monuments and other sources that even under the Shepherd rule there were kings in other parts of Egypt largely if not wholly independent of them. The appointment of regents decorated with royal titles is thought to have been characteristic of this dynasty (Trevor, Egypti, p. 258). This Pharaoh's personal character seems to have been that of a wise and prudent monarch, anxious for the welfare of his people, and superior to popular prejudice against strangers. Wilkinson thinks he was pacific in his policy, and his conduct in receiving a blessing from the aged Jacob shows a humility of mind and a respect for worth which contrasts very favorably with the conduct of other despotic kings. The situation of his capital was on the land of Goshen (Gen. xiv, 10), and the civilization and flourishing condition of Egypt during his reign were very great (Wilkinson, i, 43). Whether he were the same monarch whom we find ruling Egypt at the time of Jacob's death and the removal of Israel from the land of Egypt is not so certain as is supposed (Gen. i, 4, 5). It has been thought by some that Joseph's using the intercession of Pharaoh's household to procure a favor from the king indicates a less intimate acquaintance than we should expect between him and that king who ruled at the time of the famine. But local customs, probably connected with the habits of Egyptian mourning, may account for this, without supposing a different king (Hengstenberg, Egypti, p. 71).

3. The Pharaoh of the First Persecution of the Israelites.—The interval which elapsed between the Pharaoh of Joseph's time and the Pharaoh who commenced the persecution of Israel is much affected by opinion as to the length of the sojourn in Egypt. See CHRONOLOGY. According to our view, the interval between Jacob's removal to Egypt and the birth of Moses was a little over one hundred and five years. The unknown quantity is the period from the commencement of the persecution to the birth of Moses. It was the same Pharaoh that began to afflict Israel who reigned when Moses was born (Acts vii, 20), and the persecution must have continued a considerable time previous to allow for the events mentioned in the first chapter of Exodus. These included the building of two considerable cities and other labor, for which a period of several years seems to be required. The name and dynasty of this king have been differently given (Journ. American Oriental Soc., iv, 147, 178). Lord F. W. Fairholt suggests him to have been Amenmes or Ame, the first of the eighteenth dynasty of Theban or Djosseplait kings, and supports his view of the change of dynasty at this time, and the accession of kings from the distant province of Thebes, from the scriptural account of him as a new king that knew not Joseph (Gen. xi, 44, 47, 48). Lord Brutus, in an able paper given by Wilkinson (i, 78), argues that the new king was Ramesses I, who was also, according to him, the head of a new dynasty, and as such ignorant of the history of Joseph, while it was for Ramesses I to extirpate the power of any of the ancient cities. According to the fragment of Manetho preserved by Theophilus, the new king was Tuthmosis (Bunson, Egypt, i, 665). He is very commonly supposed to have been the king who crushed the power of the Shepherds in Egypt. From a picture on the walls of a very interesting tomb at Thebes it is the意ent of the great buildings' 3 king Thothmes III, Trevor (Egypti, p. 72) thinks it likely that it was during his dynastic, the eighteenth, that the oppression of Israel occurred, and that most likely Amosis, the first of the eighteenth dynasty, was the Pharaoh that first of all known to a disregard of the services of Joseph, and a forgetfulness of the old affection that used to be entertained in Egypt and by its kings for the great preserver of their country. According to Manetho's story of the Exodus—a story so contradictory to historical truth as scarcely to be worthy of mention—the Israelites left Egypt in the reign of Menepthah, who was great-grandson of the first Rameses, and son and successor of the second. This king is held by some Egyptologists to have reigned about the time of the rabbinal date of the Exodus, which is virtually the same as that which has been supposed to be obtainable from the genealogies. There is, however, good reason to place these kings much later; in which case Rameses I would be the oppressor; but then the building of Rameses could not be placed in his reign without a disregard of Hebræan chronology. But the argument that there is no a truer known king Rameses loses much of its weight when we bear in mind that one of the sons of Aâme, head of the eighteenth dynasty, who reigned about two hundred years before Rameses I, bore the same name, besides that very many names of kings of the Shepherd period, perhaps of two whole dynasties, are unknown to Manetho. Let this one fact, which is certainly not to be disregarded, we must weigh the general evidence of the history, which shows us a king apparently governing a part of Egypt, with subjects inferior to the Israelites, and fearing a war in the country. Let the Pharaoh of the Exodus, he seems to have dwelt in Lower Egypt, probably at Avaris. (When Moses went to see his people, and slew the Egyptian, he does not seem to have made any journey, and the burying in sand shows that the place was in a part of Egypt, like Goshen, encompassed by sandy deserts.) Compare this condition with the power of the kings of the latter part of the eighteenth and of the nineteenth dynasties: rulers of an empire, governing a united country from which the head of their line had driven the Shepherds. The view that the turbulent and opinion may account for this, without supposing a different kingdom is far less probable, especially if it be supposed that the Pharaoh of Joseph was a Shepherd king. The expulsion of the Shepherds at the commencement of this dynasty would have been in contradistinction to the gradual oppression of the Israelites. But it must be remembered that what we have just said of the power of some kings of this dynasty is almost as true of their reigns. predecessors. The silence of the historical monuments is also to be weighed, when we bear in mind how numerous are the names of the office of Pharaoh, and how many are the events of the oppression to be recorded even if the exodus were not noticed. If we assign this Pharaoh to the age before the eighteenth dynasty, which our view of Hebrew chronology would probably oblige us to do, we have still to decide whether he were a Shepherd or an Egyptian. If a Shepherd, he must have been of the sixteenth or the seventeenth dynasty; and that he was Egyptianized does not afford any argument against this supposition, since it appears that foreign kings, who can only be assigned to one of these two lines, had Egyptian names (see Konigreich, Tafel xviii, xix, 275, 285). According to our view of the Hebrew chronology, the birth of Moses occurred B.C. 1738. The scheme of Egyptian chronology which we have adopted places the beginning of the sixteenth (Shechemitic) dynasty B.C. 1755, and it would therefo.re be under the reign of one of the first kings of this dynasty, whose names are unknown, that the persecution of the Israelites began.

4. The Pharaoh of Moses' Exile.—It is often supposed that the Pharaoh who ruled Egypt at the birth of Moses is the same Pharaoh who ruled it when Moses fled into Midian (Exod. ii, 15). There is nothing in the narrative of Scripture to lead us to this conclusion, though it may possibly have been the case. The probabilities, however, seem to point the other way. We have allowed about eight years of his reign to have elapsed prior to the birth of Moses, who at the period of flight was forty years of age (Acta vii, 23). The monarch, therefore, if the same, must have reigned forty-eight years, which is an unusual length. (The entire 16th dynasty of thirty-two kings seems to have lasted but 112 years.) The genealogy with which Moses was regarded by this Pharaoh seems to indicate that he did not stand towards him in the relation of his grandfather by adoption. The view is further confirmed by the intimation in Exod. iv, 19, which suggests that the Pharaoh to which Moses was added to the list of the eight Moabites, whose life nearly to the time of his return into Egypt, a period of forty years. If this were so, it is impossible for this king to have been the monarch who began the persecution of Israel. We prefer, therefore, to regard him as different, and as probably chosen by adoption, to continue the succession of a childless family.

We would make the year during his reign at the flight of Moses to have been B.C. 1698, and his attempt upon the life of the great lawgiver is the only event of his reign recorded in Scripture.

5. The Pharaoh of the Exodus.—The Pharaoh in whose reign the deliverance of the Israelites was achieved would appear to have succeeded to the throne not very long before the return of Moses to Egypt after his forty years' sojourn in Midian (Exod. iv, 19). His relationship to his predecessor is not told us, but he was probably of the same dynasty, and carried on the traditional policy of a grudging oppression of the Israelites. We do not read of any effort of his to reduce the numbers of that nation; he seems rather to have looked on their numbers as an additional source of grandeur and power to Egypt by an enforced system of labor. The name of this Pharaoh is very variously related. Wilkinson supposes him to have been Thothmes III, the fourth or fifth monarch, according to him, of the eighteenth dynasty of Theban or Diospolitan kings; while Manetho, according to Africannus, makes him the son of a man of the line of the monarchs; and lord Prudhoe would have him to have been Ptolemy, the last of that dynasty (Wilkinson, Egypt, i, 31, 41, 81). Ptolemy, the priest of Mendis, agrees in opinion with Manetho (Bunsen, Egypt, i, 90). Various reasons are given in the Journal of Sacred Literature (new ser. i, 490) for supposing him to have been Setos II. Respecting the time of this king, we can only be sure that he was reigning for about a year or more before the exodus, which we place B.C. 1698. His acts show us a man at once impious and superstitious, although his reign is short. Of his姓名 he seems to have thought that his magicians could work the same wonders as Moses and Aaron, yet even then he begged that the frogs might be taken away, and to the end he prayed that a plague might be removed, promising a concession to the Israelites to the extent as soon as he was respite failed to keep his word. This is not strange in a character principally influenced by fear, and history abounds in parallels to Pharaoh. His vacillation only ended when he lost his army in the Red Sea, and the Israelites were finally delivered only when the red sea was dried up (Exod. x, 17). The exordium there has been considered matter of uncertainty, as it is not so stated in the account of the exodus. Another passage, however, appears to affirm it (Ps. cxxi, 15). It seems to be too great a latitude of criticism exercised in this case to find out a conflict; it shows that the overthrow, but not the death of the king, especially as the Hebrew expression "shook off" or "threw in" is very literal, or that it is only a strong Semitic expression. Besides, throughout the preceding history his end is foreshadowed, and in, perhaps, positively foretold in Exod. ix, 15; though this passage may be rendered, "For now I might have stretched out my hand, and might have smitten thee and thy people with pestilence; and thou wouldest have been cut off from the earth," as by Kallisch (Commentary, ad loc.), instead of as in the A. V. Although we have already stated our reasons for abandoning the theory that places the exodus under the nineteenth dynasty, it may be well to notice an additional and conclusive argument for rejecting as unhistorical the tale preserved by Manetho, which makes Menepthah, the son of Itamot, the Pharaoh in whose reign the Israelites left Egypt. This tale was commonly current in Egypt, but it must be remarked that the historian gives it only on the authority of tradition. M. Mariette's recent discoveries have added support to this view. In this story the secret of the success of the rebels was that they had allotted to them by Amenophis, or Menepthah, the city of Avaris, formerly held by the Shepherds, but then in ruins. The people to whom this place was given were not united; in the eastern or quarries east of the Nile is enough of itself to throw a doubt on the narrative, for there appear to have been no quarries north of those opposite Memphis, from which Avaris was distant nearly the whole length of the Delta; but when it is found that this very king, as well as his father, adorned the great temple of Avaris, the story is seen to be essentially false. Yet it is not improbable that some calamity occurred about this time, with which the Egyptians wilfully or ignorantly confounded the exodus: if they did so ignorantly, there would be an argument that this event took place during the Shepherd period, which was probably in aftertimes an obscure part of the annals of Egypt. The character of this Pharaoh finds its parallel among the Assyrians rather than the Egyptians. The impiety of the oppressor and that of Sennacherib is remarkably similar, though Sennacherib's are more resolute in his resistance than Pharaoh. This resemblance is not to be overlooked, especially as it seems to indicate an idiosyncrasy of the Assyrians and kindred nations, for national character was more marked in antiquity than it is now in most peoples, doubtless because isolation was then general and is now special. These nations all worshipped their gods in a simple way, highly reverencing their gods, and even those of other nations, the most powerful kings appearing as suppliants in the representations of the temples and tombs. In the Assyrian sculptures, on the contrary, the kings are seen rather as protected by the gods than as worshippers earlier; so that the amount of bow in such a country the famous decree of Darius, which Daniel disobeyed, could be enacted. Agath, the Egyptians do not seem to have supposed that their enemies were supported by gods hostile to those of Egypt, whereas the Assyrians considered their gods as more powerful than those of the nations they subdued. This is important in connection with the idea that at least one of the Pharaohs of the oppression was an Assyrian.

The idolatry of Egypt appears to have arrived at its height in the time of this monarch. We see evidences of a great difference between the religious system of this period and of the time of Joseph's Pharaoh. At both periods indeed we read of the "Magician and wise men of Egypt," but it by no means follows that because the names are the same the part discharged by them was identical in the two periods. Besides, we read in the later period (Exod. vii. 21) of an order to all sorcerers. They were apparently unknown in the earlier. These men supported their authority and doctrine by claims to miraculous power (ver. 11), whether we suppose them to have executed their feats merely by a skilful system of jugglery and sleight of hand, or, as many think, by diabolical aid. The authority of the God of Israel, acknowledged by the earlier Pharaoh, is by this king scornfully renounced, and the vast system of polytheism, embracing the famous worship of sacred animals, is firmly established as the religion of Egypt (v. 2; xii. 12; vii. 25). This was the suitable time chosen by God, when a great monarch ruled over the greatest empire of its time, which had brought to full development the idolatry by it widely propagated, to read a lesson to the Gentile world on the feebleness of idols as compared to him.

Before speaking of the later Pharaohs we may mention a point of weight in reference to the identification of the great kings. The reports of the campaigns of the Pharaohs of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties have not been found to contain any reference to the Israelites. Hence it might be supposed that in their days, or at least during the greater part of their time, the Israelites were not yet in the Promised Land. There is, however, an almost equal silence as to the Canaanitish nations. The land itself, Kenaan or Kanaan, is indeed mentioned as invaded, as well as those of Kheta and Amaar, referring to the Hittites and Amorites; but the latter two must have been branches of those nations seated in the valley of the Orontes. A recently discovered record of Thothmes III, published by M. de Rougé in the Recueil Archéologique (Nov. 1864, p. 344 sq.), contains many names of Canaanitish towns conquered by that king, but not in our lists of the Canaanitish isAmmon. These Canaanitish names are, moreover, on the Israelites' borders, not in the heart of the country. It is interesting that a great battle is shown to have been won by this king at Megiddo. It seems probable that the Egyptians either abstained from attacking the Israelites from a recollection of the fate of the nation of Syria, or that they were on friendly terms. It is very remarkable that the Egyptians were granted privileges in the law (Deut. xxiii. 7), and that Shishak, the first king of Egypt after the exodus whom we know to have invaded the Promised Land, was of foreign extraction, if not actually a foreigner.

6. Pharaoh, the Father-in-Law of Mered. — In the genealogies of the tribe of Judah, mention is made of the daughter of a Pharaoh married to an Israelite; "Bithiah, the daughter of Pharaoh, which Mered took" (1 Chron. iv. 17), apparently his sister, Zebulun perhaps a daughter of Bithiah, suggests that this part of the genealogies may refer to about the time of the exodus. This marriage may tend to aid us in determining the age of the sojourn in Egypt. It is perhaps less probable that an Egyptian Pharaoh would have given his daughter in marriage to an Israelite, than that a Shepherd king would have done so, before the oppression. But Bithiah may have been taken in war after the exodus, by the surprise of a caravan, or in a foray. Others, however, bring down this event to the times of or near those of David. It was then the policy of the Pharaohs to ally themselves with the great families whose power lay between Egypt and Assyria, as we know from the intermarriages of Hadad and Solomon with the Egyptian dynasty. The most interesting feature connected with this transaction is the name of the daughter of Jehovah, given to the daughter of Pharaoh. It exhibits the true faith of Israel as exerting its influence abroad, and gaining proselytes even in the royal house of idolatrous Egypt. See Mere0.

7. Pharaoh, a Protector of Hadad. — With the exception of the preceding Pharaoh, whose date is doubtful, there is a long silence in Jewish history as to the kings of Egypt. During the period of the judges, and throughout the reigns of Saul and David, they had apparently neither entered into alliance nor made war on the Israelites. If such an event had happened, it is probable that some mention would have been made of it. It does not follow from this that during this period they had made no wars nor effected any conquests to the east of Egypt, for the seaboard of Canaan, which Israel did not during this time occupy, seems to have been a usual passage for the Egyptian armies in their eastern wars. But the silence of Scripture points to the probability that for this long period Egypt did not occupy the commanding position of the earlier or the later Pharaohs. Intestine divisions and dynastic quarrels during the period may have hindered their Egyptian armies within their proper borders, satisfied if they were not assailed by foreign nations. In the reign of David we incidentally find notice of a Pharaoh who received with distinction Hadad the Edomite fleeing from Josiah, and in this connection we have notice of a great Egyptian army which had invaded Edom (1 Kings xi. 22). We find this Pharaoh ruling from about the twentieth year of David's reign to its close, i.e. from about B.C. 1038 to B.C. 1018. His reign perhaps came to an end soon after David's death, as Solomon's father-in-law is thought to have been another Egyptian Pharaoh. His treatment of Hadad, a bitter enemy of David, and with strong reason so, was certainly an unfriendly act towards the latter, but it does not seem to have been attended by any ulterior consequences. No war ensued between Egypt and Israel, and Pharaoh made no attempt to restore Hadad to the throne of Edom. When this latter, upon David's death, sought to return home, evidently with the intention of disturbing the reign of Solomon in its commencement, Pharaoh was apparently opposed to his return, very probably from a disinclination to favor any step which might involve the partition of his empire, or that of his powerful kingdom of Israel, then at the height of its greatness. Probably in the first part of this account the fugitives took refuge in an Egyptian mining-station in the peninsula of Sinai, and so obtained guides to conduct them to Egypt. This is received in accordance with the Egyptian policy, but with the especial favor that seems to have been shown. about this time towards the eastern neighbors of the Pharaohs, which may reasonably be supposed to have led to the establishment of the twenty-second dynasty of foreign extraction. For the identification of this Pharaoh we have chronological indications, and the name of his wife. Unfortunately, however, the history of Egypt at this time is extremely obscure, neither the monuments nor Manetho giving us clear information as to the kings. It appears that towards the latter part of the twentieth dynasty the high-priests of Amen, the god of Thebes, gained great power, and at last supplanted the Ramesse family, at least in some of the twenty-first dynasty, and Manetho's twenty-first dynasty, seems to have ruled in Lower Egypt. The feeble twentieth dynasty was probably soon extinguished, but the priest-rulers and the Tanites appear to have reigned contemporaneously, until they were both succeeded for the Babylonia of the twenty-second dynasty, of whom Sheshonk I, the Shishak of the Bible, was the first. The monuments have preserved the names of several of the high-priests, perhaps all, and probably of some of the Tanites; but it is a question whether Manetho's Tanitic list is a correct account of the succession, and we have no means of testing the accuracy of its numbers. It may be reasonably supposed that the Pharaoh or Pharaohs spoken of in the Bible as ruling in the time of David and Solomon were Tanites, as Tanis was nearest to the Israelitish territory. We have therefore to consider this royal family of Tanites as the royal family of Scripture, with the list of this dynasty. Shishak must have begun to reign in the twenty-fifth year of Solomon (B.C. 989). The conquest of Edom probably took place some fifty years earlier. It may therefore be inferred that Hadad fled to a king of Egypt who may have ruled at least twenty-five years, probably ceasing to govern before Solomon married the daughter of a Pharaoh early in his reign; for it seems unlikely that the protector of David's enemy would have given his daughter to Solomon, unless he were a powerless king, which it appears was not the case with Solomon's father-in-law. This would give a reign of twenty-five years, or 25 ± 2 years separated from the close of the dynasty by a period of twenty-four or twenty-five years. According to Africanus, the list of the twenty-first dynasty is as follows: Siamun, 26 years; Psusennes, 46; Nefertari, 16 years; Ptolemais, 14; Amenemhet, 9; Oschor, 6; Pianches, 9; Psusennes, 14; but Eusebius gives the second king 41, and the last 35 years, and their numbers make up the sum of 150 years, which Africanus and he agree in assigning to the dynasty, although the sum seems to be too long. If we take the numbers of Eusebius, Oschor would probably be the Pharaoh to whom Hadad fled, and Psusennes II the father-in-law of Solomon; but the numbers of Africanus would substitute Psusennes I, and probably Pianches. We cannot, however, be sure that the returns did not overlap, or were not separated by intervals, and the numbers are not to be considered trustworthy until tested by the monuments. The royal names of the period have been searched in vain for any one resembling Tahpmes, the alleged Tahpmes. Nor can we find a name similar to that of Solomon, emblematic of the union of Christ and his Church, founded on any other than the marriage of Solomon with a daughter of the true faith. To what extent this good influence may have spread in the family of Pharaoh can be only matter of conjecture. It had prevailed to any great extent it may have partly led to the change of dynasty which we have reason to believe took place in Egypt during the reign of Solomon. This tendency towards truth, if it existed in the royal house, was not shared by the priesthood or people of Egypt, who were firmly wedded to their debased system of idolatry.

This Egyptian alliance is the first indication, however, after the days of Moses, of that leaning to Egypt which was distinctly forbidden in the law, and produced the most disastrous consequences in later times. The native kings of Egypt and the Ethiopians readily supported the Hebrews, and were unwilling to make war upon them. In this manner they rendered them incapable of resisting, and exposed them to the enmity of the kings of Assyria. If the Hebrews did not incur a direct punishment for their lessing to Egypt, still this act must have weakened their trust in the divine favor, and paralyzed their efforts to defend the country against the Assyrians and their party.

The names of Egypt mention of Pharaoh in the Bible are Shishak, probably Zerah, and So. The first and second of these were of the twenty-second dynasty, if the identification of Zerah with Thutmose accepted, and the third was doubtless one of the two Shebekas of the twenty-second dynasty. This line of Egyptian royalty was a line of kings of foreign origin, who retained foreign names, and it is noticeable that Zerah is called a Cushite in the Bible (2 Chron. xiv, 9; comp. xvi, 8). Shebek was probably also a foreign name. The title "Pharaoh" is probably not once given to these kings in the Bible, because they were not Egyptians, and did not bear Egyptian names. The Shepherd kings, it must be remarked, adopted Egyptian names, and therefore some of the earlier sovereigns called Pharaohs in the Bible may be conjectured to have been of Shepherd origin, though they were of the twenty-second dynasty, and therefore not of Egyptian origin.

9. Pharaoh, the Opponent of Semmacheri.—It is not at all certain that the name used for so many centuries for the supreme ruler of Egypt was ever again correctly used by itself to designate a pharaoh of Egypt. The pharaoh of whom we read in the reign of Hezekiah as the rival of the Assyrian Semmacheri (2 Kings xviii, 21; Isa. xxxvi, 9), is, indeed, simply called Pharaoh, but this title is not given him by the sacred historian, but by the Assyrian general Rabshakeh. Pharaoh is still, indeed, the generic title of Egyptian royalty (Isa. xix, 11), when no individual king is intended, but when particular kings are meant the Scriptures join to Pharaoh a second title, as Pharaoh-Necho, Pharaoh-Hophra. This may have been Josephus’s reason for his statement (Ant. viii, 6, 9) that after the father-in-law of Solomon no king of Egypt used this name. The Jewish historian was too well acquainted with Scripture not to have known of the title in connection with a second name, and he therefore means to say that it was never again used by itself as the title of Egyptian royalty. It is, indeed, as far as can be ascertained, that we are now speaking reigned in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, i.e. about B.C. 715, and was the contemporary of Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, and of Semmacheri king of Assyria. This latter synchronism depends, however, on the identity of the person mentioned in the text, which some suppose to have been corrupted, and that it was Sargon and not Semmacheri who invaded Judaea in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah (Journ. of Sues, Ed. Oct. 1868; Jan. 1868). The comparison of Pharaoh in the above passages to a broken reed is remarkable, as the common hieroglyphics for “king,” restricted to Egyptian sovereigns, Su-tes, strictly a title of the ruler of Upper Egypt, commence with a bent reed, which is an ideographic symbolical sign proper to this word, and is sometimes used alone without any phonetic complement. This Pharaoh can only be the Sethos whom Herodotus mentions as the opponent of Semmacheri, and who may reasonably be supposed to be the Set of Manetho, the last king of his twenty-third dynasty. Tirhakah, as an Egyptian, whether then reigning or not, like So, apparently not called Pharaoh. See TIRHAKAH.

10. Pharaoh-Necho.—He was king of Egypt during the reigns of Josiah, Jehohaz, and Jehoiakim, kings of Judah (2 Kings xxiii, 29-34). We do not read of him until the last year of Josiah’s reign, B.C. 609. How long before this he may have been king in Egypt we have no information. However, he was a king of Egypt the Bible gives us no help in ascertaining. It mentions him as still reigning in the fourth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, i.e. B.C. 606 (Jer. xvi, 2), and from 2 Kings xxiv, 7 it seems probable that he continued to reign for a considerable time after this. In the Bible his name is written Nebi, 722, and Nekh, 722, and in hieroglyphics Nekh. This king was of the Satric twenty-sixth dynasty, of which Manetho makes him either the fifth ruler (Africanus) or the sixth (Eusebius). Herodotus calls him Nebes, and assigns to him a reign of sixteen years, which is confirmed by the monuments. According to this historian, he was the son of Psammetichus I; this the monuments do not corroborate. Dr. Brugsch says he married Nit-Akert, Nitocris, daughter of Psammetichus I and queen Shepenetep, who appears, like her mother, to have been the heiress of an Egyptian royal line, and supposes that he was the son of Psammetichus by another wife (Hist. d’Egypte, p. 252; comp. 248). If he married Nitocris, he may have been called by Herodotus by mistake the son of Psammetichus.

The father of Necho had already distinguished himself by the siege and capture from the Assyrians of the strong town of Ashdod, which had been taken from the Egyptians in the reign of Sargon (Herod. ii, 157; Isa. xx, 1). In the decline of the Assyrian empire Egypt ventured once more beyond her eastern coast and indulged in the hope of universal dominion. Necho in the commencement of his reign prepared to carry out to completion his father’s ambitious designs, and it was in this endeavor that he came into contact with the kingdom of Judah, and so finds a place in Scripture history. Claiming an oracle from the true God, he advanced an Egyptian army against the town of Carchemish on the Euphrates, then apparently under the dominion of the king of Assyria (2 Chron. xxxvi, 21; 2 Kings xxiii, 29). There seems to be no doubt that Necho’s claim to this oracle was sincere, and that he really thought himself commissioned to go to war with Assyria. How far this may indicate a true knowledge of God on Necho’s part it is difficult to determine. Yet it can scarcely be understood as more than a conviction that the war was destined, for it ended in the destruction of Necho’s army and the curtailment of his empire. Josiah, however, influenced perhaps by an alliance with Assyria, or dreading the rising ambition of Egypt, disputed the march of Pharaoh’s army. In vain the latter, evidently most unwilling to come into collision with Josiah, entertained the idea of making use of the oracle of him whom he would appear, in common with Josiah, to have recognised as the true God. At Megiddo (now Leijjah), a town not far from the coast-line of Palestine, so frequently the passage of great armies in antiquity, the old wars of Pharaoh, the new wars of Egypt, and his death on this occasion formed the subject of lamentations among his people long after it took place. Without pausing upon his march, or returning back to attack Jerusalem, Pharaoh seems to have passed on with all haste to accomplish his original design of capturing Carchemish, which commanded one of the ordinary fords of the Euphrates, and thus of meeting and conquering the king of Assyria in his own dominions. In this great expedition he was entirely successful. He took Carchemish, and retained possession of the countries between Egypt and the Euphrates until the rising power of Babylon under the great Nebuchadnezzar met and overthrew the Egyptian army four years afterwards at Carchemish, and forced them back into their own land. Returning from the Euphrates, he treated Judah as a conquered country, and exercised over it the same absolute authority which the Babyloni-ans did immediately after him. Sending for Jehovah to Riblah in the land of Hamath, on the Orontes, a favorite camping-ground for the great armies of that period (Robinson, Bibl. Res. iii, 646), he placed himself in a strong position for a time, and the famous league of five kings of Egypt the Bible gives us no help in ascertaining. It mentions him as still reigning in the fourth year of... homeward, Necho entered as a conqueror into Jerusalem, placed the brother of Jehoshaz on the throne, and put him to death. To this time he then returned to Egypt, carrying with him the dethroned king of Judah, who died in the land of his captivity. The expedition of Necho, which Scripture describes as having been made against the king of Assyria, Josephus says was directed against the Medes and Babylonians, who had at this time, according to him, captured Nineveh (Ant. x, 5; see Rawlinson's Herod. i, 418. Herodotus mentions this battle, relating that Necho made war against the Syrians, and defeated them at Magdolus, a lake which he took Cadytas, "a large city of Syria" (ii, 159). The name of the lake Magdolus is Megiddo, and not the Egyptian town of that name (see Menden), but the identification of Cadytas is difficult. It has been conjectured to be Jerusalem, and its name has been supposed to correspond to the ancient title, "the Holy," λαός τάφριν, but it is elsewhere mentioned by Herodotus as a great coast-town of Palestine near Egypt (iii, 5), and it has therefore been supposed to be Gaza. The difficulty that Gaza is not beyond Magdolus has been removed by Herodotus, who thought to have confounded Megiddo with the Egyptian Magdolus, or we may understand the term "coast" here used in a wide sense. (See Sir Gardner Wilkinson's note to Herod. ii, 159, ed. Rawlinson.) It seems possible that Cadytas is the Lititite city Ketesh, on the Orange river. The chief strength of Syria of those captured by the kings of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties. The Greek historian adds that Necho dedicated the dress he wore on these occasions to Apollo at the temple of Branchides (L.c.).

The power of Egypt under Necho at this period of his reign was very great. From the composition of the army which he led to Carchemish and left there inarrison (Jer. xlv, 9), we gather that Ethiopia and Libya were at this time a part of his dominions. Eastward of Egypt his power extended to the Great River, and the Lydians, if not his subjects, were in strict league with him. This was the period of the fall of Assyria, and Egypt for a time succeeded to its rule on the west of the Euphrates (Wilkinson, i, 157). This was that time of boasting in its military successes which Jeremiah describes in ch. xlvi, and he takes occasion from it to predict the approaching overthrow of Egypt. When this land "rose up like a flood, and he said, I will go up, and will over the earth," the prophet in plain words spoke of approaching defeat in battle and utter humiliation. The year of Necho was the year of the siege of Jerusalem, and Egypt only lasted about four years. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Nebuchadnezzar, having conquered Nineveh, had leisure to turn his arms against Egypt. At Carchemish, which Necho had wrested from the Assyrians, the Babylonian army conquered that of Egypt. Whether Necho was present at this contest does not appear. Its issue was that he was driven out of Asia and came into it no more (2 Kings xxiv, 7). It would seem to have been at a later period, however, that the utter humiliation of Egypt described by Jeremiah took place. In the third war of Carchemish one of those decisive conflicts which changed for a period the history of the world. The strength of Necho's armies seems not to have lain in the native Egyptians, but in foreigners, whether subjects, allies, or mercenaries. They were Ethiopians, Libyans, and Lydians who fought with Nebuchadnezzar. Wilkinson places the death of Necho shortly before the captivity of Jehoiakim (i, 167). It is not certain, however, that Jehoiakim was carried away captive by Nebuchadnezzar. The book of Kings makes no mention of such an occurrence. Josephus states that he was put to death at Jerusalem (Ant. x, 6, 3). The second book of Chronicles only says (xxxi, 6) that he was put into fetters for the purpose of being brought to Babylon. If Josephus's account is true, this purpose was not put into execution. Necho is famous in history for other besides his military exploits. The celebrated canal of Suez, according to Herodotus (ii, 158; see Rawlinson's Herod. i, 418), is said to have been constructed by him.

He is also stated by this historian to have circumnavigated Africa, a performance the credibility of which is disputed by him for the very reason that makes it to modern readers all but certainly true (Herod. ii, 62; see Wilkinson, i, 160; Sir C. Lewis, Astronomy of the Ancients, p. 317). See Necho.

1.3. Pharaoh-Hophra. This is the last of the Pharaohs of whom mention is made in the Bible. He is introduced to our notice in connection with the closing period of the Jewish monarchy, as attempting to ward off from Canaan the armies of Nebuchadnezzar for their sins at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxxvii, 7). He was on the throne of Egypt in the ninth year of the reign of Zedekiah (2 Kings xxxv, 1), i.e. about B.C. 590, continued to reign when Jerusalem had been taken by the Babylonians, B.C. 587, and he was to continue reigning until a signal destruction should fall upon him, and he was to suffer the loss of life at the hands of his enemies (Jer. xlviii, 80), a prediction fulfilled about five years subsequently in the invasion of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar on the advice of Joaahaz (Jer. xlii, 9, 7). He ascended the throne about B.C. 587, and reigned for a period of nineteen years; but Euebius, according to Syncellus, makes his reign to have lasted twenty-five years (Bunson, Egypt, i, 640). This Pharaoh is generally considered to have been the "Pharaoh of Pharaohs" mentioned in the Book of Daniel (Dan. ii, 44). Josephus (Ant. x, 7, 3) expressly states that Nebuchadnezzar on hearing of the march of the Egyptians broke up from before Jerusalem, met the Egyptians at the river of Pharoa-Hophra, routed them, drove them out of Syria, and then returned to the siege of Jerusalem. Some, however, think that the Babylonians retreated from before the Egyptians, who on this occasion took Gaza, Sidon, and Tyre (Trevor, Looking simply to the scriptural account, the case appears to stand thus: On hearing of the rebellion of Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar despatched a force against Jerusalem, but without accompanying it himself. This force, however, was within the city, but was not able to meet the Egyptian army in the field. This is the partial siege which is spoken of in Jer. xxxvii, 5-11, in which nothing is said of Nebuchadnezzar's presence. On the approach of Pharaoh-Hophra the Chaldean army, made up to the conflict, retired before him, and he advanced unopposed. This was probably in the eighth year of Zedekiah. That Pharaoh came to Jerusalem we are not told. Probably on hearing of the raising of the siege he judged it unnecessary, and took the easier coast-line towards Syria (Jer. xliii, 1). Nebuchadnezzar, made aware of the retreat of his army, now advanced with his entire force (Jer. xxxix, 1), laid siege to Jerusalem in the ninth year of Zedekiah, and took it in the eleventh year. That the Egyptians and Babylonians met on this occasion in battle is not stated in the Bible. We think it probable from Jerr. xxxvii, 7, that on hearing of Nebuchadnezzar's approach with the entire army of Babylon, the Egyptians retired without a contest and left Jerusalem to its fate (see Ralwin's Herodotus, i. 429). It seems possible that Hophra continued to reign as king of Egypt after the overthrow of Zedekiah (Jer. xxxviii, 10), and he and his land were the refuge of those Jews who, contrary to God's command to remain in their own land after the general captivity, preferred a course of their own. They expected peace beneath the shadow of Egypt, trusting in the power of Pharaoh, who seemed till then to have enjoyed great prosperity. But in this they were to be disappointed. Pharaoh was himself to be delivered "into the hands of those who sought his life," of which Herodotus gives an account (ii, 169); at the very entry of Pharaoh's pavilion at Taphaneis the Babylonian Nebuchadnezzar was to set his throne and spread his pavilion (Jer. xliii, 10); and henceforth Egypt was to descend in the scale of nations, and to become the least among kingdoms. Herodotus relates how he attacked Sidon, and fought a battle at sea with the king of Tyre, until at length an army which he had despatched to conquer Cyrene was routed, and the Egyptians, thinking he had purposely caused its overthrow to gain entire power, no doubt by substituting mercenaries for native troops, revolted, and set up Apries as king. Apries, however, only supported by the Carian and Ionian mercenaries, was routed in a pitched battle. Herodotus remarks in narrating this, "It is said that Apries believed that there was not a god who could cast him down from his eminence, so firmly did he think that he had established himself in his kingdom." He was taken prisoner, and Apries for a while treated him with kindness, but when the Egyptians blamed him, "he gave Apries over into the hands of his former subjects, to deal with as they chose. Then the Egyptians took him and strangled him" (Herod. ii. 161-169). The Scripture passages, which agree with the account Herodotus gives of the death of Apries, make it not improbable that the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar was the cause of that disaffection of his subjects which ended in the overthrow and death of this Pharaoh. The invasion is not spoken of by any trustworthy profane historian excepting Berosus (Cory, Anc. Freq. 2d ed. p. 37, 38), but the silence of Herodotus and others can no longer be a matter of surprise, as we now know from the Assyrian records in cuneiform of conquests of Egypt either unrecorded elsewhere or only mentioned by second-rank writers. See Herodotus, i. 429.

Pharaoh-Hophra was succeeded by two independent monarchs, the first of whom, Amonis, had a very prosperous reign; but in the reign of his son, Psammetichus, or Psammetichus, according to the Greeks, the Persian power took possession of Egypt, when Egypt was desolated to insignificance, and the ancient title of Pharaoh was transferred from the kings of Egypt to their conquerors (Trevor, Egypt. p. 831; Wilkinson, Egypt. i, 169-198). No subsequent Pharaoh is mentioned in Scripture, but there are predictions doubting referring to the misfortunes of later princes until the second Persian conquest, when the prophecy "There shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt" (Is. lxx, 18) was fulfilled. See Egypt. Pharaoh's Daughters. Three Egyptian princesses, daughters of Pharaohs, are mentioned in the Bible. Our account of them includes whatever notices are extant in other writers. 1. The preserver of Moses, daughter of the Pharaoh who first oppressed the Israelites. She appears from her conduct to have been disposed to have been heir to the throne, something more than ordinary adoption amounting to be expressed in the passage in Hebrews respecting the faith of Moses (xi, 23-26), and the designation "Pharaoh's daughter" perhaps here indicating that she was the only daughter. She probably lived for at least forty years after she saved Moses, for it seems to be implied in the above passage of Hebrews that she was living when he fled to Midian. Aratapanus, or Artabanus, a historian of uncertain date, who appears to have preserved traditions current among the Egyptian Jews, calls this princess Memphis, and her father Memmis, and her mother Pelamnotha, and relates that she was married to Che nephres, who ruled in the country above Memphis, for that at that time there were many kings of Egypt, but that this one, as it seems, became sovereign of the whole country (frag. Hist. C, iii, 27, sq.). Palamnotha may be supposed to be a corruption of Amenophis, the equivalent of Amen-heap, the Egyptian name of four kings of the eighteenth dynasty, and also, but incorrectly, applied to one of the nineteenth, whose Egyptian name, Menepthah, is wholly different from that of the others. No one of these, however, had, as far as we know, a daughter with a name resembling Memmis, nor is there any king with a name like Che nephres of this time. These kings Amenophis, moreover, do not belong to the period of contemporary dynasties. The relation is apparently of little value, excepting as showing that one quite different from that given by Manetho and others was anciently current. See Pharaoh. 2. Bithiah, wife of Mered, an Israelite, daughter of a Pharaoh of an uncertain age, probably about the time of the exodus. See Bithiah, Pharaoh. 3. A wife of Solomon, most probably daughter of a king of the twenty-first dynasty. She was married to Solomon early in his reign, and apparently treated with distinction. It has been supposed that the Song of Solomon was written on the occasion of this marriage; and the idea is, we think, sustained by sound criticism. She was at first brought into the city of David (1 Kings iii, 1), and afterwards a house was built for her (vii, 8; ix, 24), because Solomon would not have her dwell in the house of David, which had been rendered holy by the ark having been there (2 Chron. vii, 11). See Pharaoh, Solomon's Wife. The wife of one Pharaoh, the king who received Hadad the Edomite, is mentioned in Scripture. She is called "queen," and her name, Taph penes, is given. Her husband was most probably of the twenty-first dynasty. See Pharaoh 7, Taphpenes. Pharaoh'nith (Pharaoh'nith) v. v. Pharaoh-nith; Josephus, Pharaonith; Pesheito, Pharaoh; Vulg. Pharaoh, one of the cities of Judea fortified by Baccides during his contests with Jonathan Maccabaeus (1 Macc. ix, 50). In both MSS. of the Sept. the name is joined to the preceding —Thimmath-Pharaoh'nith; but in Josephus, the Syrian, and Vulg., the two are separated. (Gechiiciste, iv, 378) adheres to the former. Pharaoh doubtless represents an ancient Pirathon, though hardly that of the Judges, since that was in Mount Ephraim, probably at Ferata, a few miles west of Na blius, too far north to be included in Judea properly so-called.
PHARES, the name of two persons.

1. (Heb. פֶּרֶץ, פֶּרֶץ, a breach, as explained Gen. xxxviii, 29; Sept. and N. T. Φάρης; A. V. "Peres," 1 Chron. viii, 38; Luke iii, 38; 1 Esdr. v, 5), twin son with Zarah, or Zerach, of Judah, by Tamar his daughter-in-law. B.C. cir. 1890. The circumstances of his birth are detailed in Gen. xxxviii. Pharez seems to have kept the right of primogeniture over his brother, as, in the genealogical lists, his name comes first. Yet his filiation was far more numerous and illustrious than that of the Zar-hites. Its remarkable fertility is alluded to in Ruth iv, 12: "Let thy house be like the house of Pharez, whom Tamar bare unto Judah." Of Pharez's personal history or character nothing is known. We can only speak of him therefore as a stemarch, and exhibit his genealogical relations. At the time of the sojourn in the wilderness "the families of the tribe of Judah were: of Shelah, the family of the Shelumites, or Shilonites; of Phares, the family of the Phrazites; of Zerah, the family of the Zarhites; of Jeconiah (Gen. iv, 18), the family of the Heronites, of Hamul, the family of the Hamulites" (Numb. xxvi, 20, 21). After the death, therefore, of Er and Onan without children, Pharez occupied the rank of Judah's second son, and, moreover, from the time of David sprang two new families, those of the Hezonrites and Hamulites. From Heron's second son Ram, or Aram, sprang David and the kings of Judah, and eventually Jesus Christ. See GENEOLOGY OF JESUS CHRIST. The house of Caleb was also incorporated into the house of Hezron [see Caleb], and so were reckoned among the descendants of Pharez. Another line of Pharez's descendants were reckoned as sons of Manasseh by the second marriage of Hezron with the daughter of Machir (1 Chron. iv, 21, 22). In the census of the house of Judah contained in 1 Chron. iv, drawn up apparently in the reign of Hezekiah (iv, 41), the houses enumerated in ver. 1 are Pharez, Hezron, Carmi, Hur, and Shobal. Of these all but Carmi (who was a Zarhite, Josh. vii, 1) were descendants of Pharez. Hence it is not unlikely that, as is suggested in the margin of the A. V., "Carmi" is an error for "Chelubai." Some of the sons of Shelah are mentioned separately at ver. 21, 22. See PAHATH-MOAR. In the reign of David the house of Pherez seems to have been eminently distinguished. The chief of all the captains of the host for the first month, Jashobeam, the son of Zabdiel (1 Chron. xii, 37), was famous for his valor (xi, 11). And called "the chief among the captains" (ibid. and 2 Sam. xxiii, 8), was of the sons of Perez, or Pharez. A considerable number of the other mighty men seem also, from their patronymic or gentile names, to have been of the same house, those, namely, who are called Bethlehemites, Paltites (1 Chron. ii, 53, 47), Tekoites, Netophathites, and Ithrites (ii, 58; iv, 7). Zabad, the son of Abhiail, and Joab and his brothers, Ahishai and Asahel, we know were Phrazites (i, 51, 86, 54: xi, 41). The house itself was the head of the family.

We have no means of assigning to their respective families those members of the tribe of Judah who are incidentally mentioned after David's reign, as Adnah, the chief captain in Judah in Jehoshaphat's reign, and Je-hohanan and Amasiah, his companions (3 Chron. xxvii, 14-16); but that the family of Pharez continued to thrive and multiply we may conclude from the numbers who returned from captivity. At Jerusalem alone 468 of the sons of Perez, with Athaiah, or Uthai, at their head, were dwelling in the days of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii, 18, 25, 31; Neh. xi, 4, 5, 6, 16), Zerubbabel himself of course being of the family (1 Esdr. v, 5). Of the lists of the returned captives in Ezra ii, Neh. vii, in Nehemiah's time, the returned so far have been from the sons of Phares, judging as before from the names of their ancestors, or the towns to which they belonged: the children of Bani (Ezra ii, 19; comp. 1 Chron. ix, 3); of Bigvai (v, 11; comp. Ezra vii, 14); of Assir (vi, 15; comp. 1 Chron. ii, 26, 54); of Josiah, or Hariph (i, 18; Neh. vii, 24; comp. 1 Chron. ii, 51); of Bethlehem and Netophah (i, 21, 22; comp. 1 Chron. ii, 54); of Kirijath-aim (xii, 20; comp. 1 Chron. ii, 50, 58); of Harim (ii, 52; comp. 1 Chron. iv, 9); and, judging from their potition, many of the intermediate ones also (comp. also the lists in Ezra x, 25-43; Neh. x, 14-27). Of the builders of the wall named in Neh. iii the following were of the house of Pharez: Zaccur, the son of Imri (ver. 2, by comparison with 1 Chron. ix, 4, and Ezra viii, 14, where the name is written in MSS., to be "Zaccur" for "Zabud"); Zadok, the son of Baana (ver. 4, by comparison with 2 Sam. xxiii, 29, where we find that Baana was a Netophathite, which agrees with Zadok's place here next to the Tekoites, since Bethlehem, Netophah, and Tekoa are often in close juxtaposition, comp. 1 Chron. ii, 54; iv, 4, 6; Ezra ii, 21, 22; Neh. vii, 26, and the situation of the Netophathites close to Jerusalem, among the Benjaminites, Neh. xii, 28, 29, compared with the mixture of Benjaminites with Phrazites and Zabulites in Neh. iii, 2-7); the Tekoites (ver. 5 and 4, by comparison with 1 Chron. vi, 54, 5); Jehoada, the son of Pasah (ver. 6, comp. with 1 Chron. iv, 12, where Pasah, a Chelubite, is apparently descended from Ashur, the father of Tekoa): Rephaihah, the son of Hur (ver. 8, comp. with 1 Chron. ii, 20, 50; for other cases of Zaccur and Zaccur in 1 Chron.

iv, 4, 12, from 44, from Zaccur); Hanun (ver. 13 and 30, with the inhabitants of Zanoah (comp. with 1 Chron. iv, 18); perhaps Malchiah, the son of Rechab (ver. 14, comp. with 1 Chron. i, 55); Nebemiah, son of Azub, ruler of Beth-zur (ver. 16, comp. with 1 Chron. ii, 45); and perh. Baruch, son of Zabbai, or Zaccai (ver. 29), if for Zaccai we read Zaccur as the mention of the other, or second, piece, makes probable, as well as his proximity to Meremoth in this second piece, as Zaccur was to Meremoth in their first pieces (ver. 2, 4).

2. (Sept. פַּרְשִׁיָּה רַבַּיָּה; A. G hence an obscure form (1 Esdr. viii, 20) for the Pharex (q. v.; the Heb. text (Ezra viii, 3).) Pharisa (Pharisa, ϕαρίσας, a recessive form (1 Esdr. v, 83) of the name Phira (q. v.; the Heb. text (Neh. vii, 57).

Paraissue, a designation (in the N. T. and Josephus) of one of the three sects or orders of Judaism in the time of Christ, the other two being the Essenes and the Sadducees. The following account of them is from Scriptural and Talmudical notices, with whatever light the comparison affords.

1. Name of the Sect, and its Signification. —The name Paraissie = Pharisee is the Greek form of the Hebrew פַּרְשִׁיָּה (parah, passive participle of פְּרָשָׁה, to separate, plu. פְּרָשָׁהּ, Aramaic פְּרָשַׁה, and properly denotes one who is separated, i.e., by special practice; or, as the dictionary defined A. ruch (a. v.) defines it, "one who separated himself from Levitical impurity and Levitically impure food") (comp. also Talmud, Chapgath, 18 b; Sabbat, 18 a). The derivation of it from פַּרְשִׁיָּה, in the sense of unfolding, explaining, and the assertion that the followers of this sect were called Pharisees = interpreters of the Bible, is a contradiction to the Sadducees, who adhered to the letter of the Scriptures, as well as the more generally received notion that they were so called because they separated from the rest of the people, believing themselves to be more holy, are at variance with the most ancient and most trustworthy authorities upon this subject. Besides, to take פַּרְשִׁיָּה as meaning interpreter is contrary to its grammatical form, which, if transitive, ought to be פַּרְשִׁיָּה. Of course the separation from that which was Levitically impure necessaand that the names by which they were designated among themselves are ḫōnēm, ṣages, or, more modestly ḥēḏiḏēm, disciples of the sages, but more generally ḥāḏēmēḵēm, associates. By the term Ḥāḏēmēḵēm, or its equivalent Ḥāḏēmēḵēm, i.e. associates, is therefore meant all those Jews who separated themselves from every kind of Levitical impurity, and united together to keep the Mosaic laws of purity. As it was natural that all the students of the law would, as a matter of course, be the first to join this association, the apellation Ḥāḏēmēḵēm, member, associate, or ḥāḏēmēḵēm, Pharisee, became synonymous with student, disciple, lawyer, scribe, while those who refused to unite to keep the laws were regarded as ṣaḥ ṣaḥ, country people, common people, illiterates, irreligious.

II. The Qualifications for Membership of the Pharisaic Association.—The most essential conditions which were enacted from every one who wished to become a Ḥāḏēmēḵēm or member of the Pharisaic association were two. Each candidate was required to promise in the presence of this second tithes that he would consecrate the sacred tithes on the produce of the land, and refrain from eating anything which had not been tithed, or about the tithing of which there was any doubt; and (ii) He would scrupulously observe the most essential laws of purity which so materially affected the eating of food and all family affairs.

To understand these laws, which may seem trivial and arbitrary, as well as to see the extraordinary influence which they exercised upon the whole religious and social life of the Jewish nation in all its ramifications, the following facts must be borne in mind:—The Mosaic law enjoins that besides the priestly heave-offering (אָשֶׁר) every Israelite is annually to give to the Levites a tithe of all the produce (Numb. xviii., 19-34), which the Jewish canons call the first tithes (תְּרוּת הַנַּחֲלוֹת), and that a second tithes (תְּרוּת הַנַּחֲלוֹת), as it is termed in the same canons, is to be taken annually from the produce to Jerusalem, either in kind or specie, and consumed by the owner in the metropolis in festival celebration (Deut. xxi., 5-8), and that every third year this second tithes is to be given to the poor (Deut. xvi., 24, 29), whence it is denominated the poor tithes (תְּרוּת הַיִּשְׁרָאֵל) in the ancient canons. Moreover, as each seventh year was a Sabbath or sabbatical year, which yielded no harvest, it was fixed that in the first, second, fourth, and fifth years of the septennial cycle the second tithes is to be eaten by the owner in Jerusalem, while in the third and sixth years it is to be distributed among the poor, and the poor tithes. When it is remembered that these tithe laws, which were originally enacted for Palestine, were in the post-exilic period extended to Egypt, Ammon, Moab, and to every land in which the Jews had possessions, that they had more of a religious than civil import, that the portion of produce reserved as tithes was holy, that the eating of holy things was a deadly sin, and that the non-separation of the tithes rendered the whole produce unlawful, thus affecting every article of food, the paramount importance of the first condition which the Pharisees, who were the conservators of the divine law, extracted from the candidates for fellowship will readily be understood (comp. Mishna, Bekoroth, 30 b).

Of equal importance, and equally affecting the whole fabric of social and religious life, are the Mosaic laws upon the sabbath, of which the second condition was exacted. These laws, which so rigidly enforce the secluding of unclean food and defiling objects, even without the amplifications and expansions which obtained in the course of time, extend to and affect almost every action in public life and every movement in family intercourse. The non-offering of some number of animals prescribed as food, but their very carcasses are branded as unclean, and he who touches them is temporarily defiled, and pollutes every one and every thing wherewith he comes in contact (Lev. v., 2; xi.). A man has an issue not only defiles everything upon which he lies, sits, or which he holds, but his very clothing (Ex., 1-18). The same is the case with a man who comes in contact with a corpse (Numb. xix., 14-22), with a woman in menstruum and childbirth (Lev. xi., 1-8; xv., 19-31), and with a husband after conjugal intercourse (Ex., 18). Individuals thus defiled were forbidden to come into the sanctuary (Numb. xix., 20), and were visited with the severe punishment of excision if they ate the flesh of peace-offering (Lev. vii., 20, 21). Now the slightest reflection upon the workings of these laws will show that thousands upon thousands were daily unclean according to the Mosaic institutions, that these thousands of unclean men and women legally defiled myriad of people and things by contact with them, either unwittingly or unwittingly, and that it therefore became absolutely necessary for those who were conscientiously desirous of discharging their religious duties in a state of legal purity to adopt additional sanitary measures as would preclude the possibility of violating these laws. Hence the Jewish canons ordained that since one does not know whether he has been defiled by contact with any unclean person or thing, every Ḥāḏēmēḵēm or member of the Pharisaic association is to wash his hands before eating his ordinary food, second tithes, or the heave-offering; to immerse his whole body before he eats the portions of holy sacrifices; and to bathe his whole body before touching the water ab-solvent from sin, even if it is only his hands which are unclean. If one immersed himself for ordinary food, and designed it only for ordinary food, he could not eat second tithes; if he immersed for second tithes, and meant it only for second tithes, he could not eat of the heave-offering; if he immersed for the heave-offering, and meant by it the heave-offering, he was required to eat the portions of the holy sacrifice; if he immersed for the holy sacrifice, and meant for it the holy sacrifice, he could not as yet touch the water ab-solvent from sin; but he who immersed for the more important could share in the less important (Mishna, Choshap, ii., 4, 5). This gave rise to four degrees of purity, and to four divisions in the Pharisaic associations, so that every Ḥāḏēmēḵēm or member belonged to that rank whose prescriptions of purity he practised. Each degree of purity required a greater separation from the above-named Mosaic defilements. The individuals who immersed in the purification vessels were termed the fathers of impurity, that is the portion touched by them was designated the first generation of impurity, what was touched by this again was called the second generation of impurity, and so on. Now ordinary food, the first degree of holiness, became impure when touched by the second generation; heave-offering, the second degree of holiness, became defiled when touched by the third generation; the flesh of sacrifices, the third degree of holiness, when coming in contact with the fourth generation, and so on. These degrees of purity had even to be separated from each other, as the lower degree was impure in respect to the higher one. The same removal, both from defilement without and the different gradations within, was required of each member of the Pharisaic order corresponding to the degree to which he belonged. Hence "the garments of an Ḥāḏēmēḵēm, Am ha-aretz ['man of earth,' or a patronym, a simon, as he is termed in the T. T., who neglected to pay the second tithes and of the laws of Mosaic purity], defile the Ḥāḏēmēḵēm [i.e. him who lived according to the first degree of purity], the garments of a Pharisee defile those who eat the heave-offering [i.e. the second degree], the garments of those who eat the heave-offering defile those who eat the sacred sacrifices [i.e. the third degree], and the garments of those who eat the sacred sacrifices defile those who touch the water ab-solvent from sin [i.e. the fourth de-

The above-mentioned two conditions extracted from candidates for membership of the Pharisaic association are thus expressed in the Mishna: "He who takes upon himself to be conscientious, tithes whatever he eats, and whatever he sells, and whatever he buys, and does not become the guest of an Am ha-Arets [i.e. a non-Pharisee]; and he who takes upon himself to become a member of the Pharisaic association must neither sell to an Am ha-Arets moist or dry fruit, nor buy of him moist fruit, nor become the guest of an Am ha-Arets, nor receive him as guest, in his garments, into his house" (Demai, ii, 2, 5; comp. Mass. xxxii, 28; Luke xvii, 12). In accordance with these regulations that Christ enjoins that an offender is to be regarded "as a heathen man and publican" (Matt. xvii, 18), that the apostle Paul commands "not to eat with a sinner" (1 Cor. vi, 11), and it is for this reason that Christ was upbraided by the Pharisees for associating and eating with publicans and sinners (Matt. ix, 9-11; xi, 11; Mark ii, 16; Luke v, 30; viii, 34), with the neglecters of tithes and the transgressors of the laws of purity, which was not only in violation of the then prevailing Pharisaic and rabbinic law, but contrary to the Mosaic enactments. But he came to teach that "not that which goeth into the mouth [i.e. untainted food or edibles handled by Levitically unclean persons] defileth a man, but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man" (Matt. xi, 15); and that it is not outward washing but inward purity which is acceptable. For this reason "he sat down to meat with a Pharisee, and did not first wash before dinner" (Luke xi, 37-40); which, as we have seen, was in contravention of the very first degree of purity among the association. It must, however, be remarked that the Jews were not peculiar in their laws of purity and defilement. Other nations of antiquity had similar statutes. Thus, among the ancient Indians, one who had an issue was obliged to bathe and pray to the sun (Menon, ii, 181); among the Hierrapolitans in Syria every inmate of the house in which a death took place was thirty days unclean, and could not go to the temple during that time (Lucian, De Syr. deca, 58); the Greeks, too, were defiled by contact with a corpse, and could not resort to the temple (Theophrast. Charact. 16; Euphr. Iphig. Taur. 367; Diog. Laer, viii, 32); both the Pharisees and the Greeks regarded a woman in childbirth as unclean (Kleuker, Zmd-Avetein, iii, 222, 223; Euphr. Iphig. Taur. 367); and "no Egyptian would salute a Greek with a kiss, nor use a Greek knife, spitas, coldroons, nor taste the meat of an ox which had been cut with a Greek knife. They drank of bronze ves- als, rinsing them perpetually. And if any one acciden- tially touched a pig he would plunge into the Nile without stopping to undress" (Herodot. ii, 87, 41, 57).

III. The Temet and Practices of the Pharisees.—To state the doctrines and statues of the Pharisees is to give a history of orthodox Judaism; since Pharism was after the return from the Babylonian captivity, and is to the present day, the national faith of the orthodox Jews, developing itself with and adapting itself to the ever-shifting circumstances of the nation. See Kansas. Of the other two sects, viz. the Essenes and the Sadducees, the former represented simply an intensified form of Pharism [see Essenes], while the latter were a very small minority. See Sadducees. The Pharisees, as the erudite Geiger has conclusively shown, were the democratic party, the true representatives of the people; the one high voice that was endeavoured to develop by making them realize, both in their practices and lives, that "God has given to all alike the kingdom, priesthood, and holiness" (2 Macc. ii, 17); in opposition to the small caste of the priestly aristocracy of Sadducees, a royal nation in the spiritual, temporal, and civil office, and who, by virtue of their hereditary rights, tried to arrogate everything to themselves, and manifested little sympathy with the people at large.

Hence the Pharisaic enactments were such as to make the people realize that they were a people of priests, a holy nation; that by becoming a diligent observer of the law, and by preparing one's self for the office of a rabbi or teacher, every such person, though not literally of the priestly caste, may be a priest in spirit, and occupy quite as important and useful a position as if he were actually of the Aaronic order, and even arrange his mode of life so as to make his example of those who minister in holy things. Thus the very name הרפיה, i.eusia, which in olden times denotes a priestly frater- nity (Hos. iv, 17; vi, 9), and was so used by the Jews on the Maccabean coins ( Política בקוני בידם), was adopted by the Pharisees for their lay association. Their social meals were invested with a solemn character to resemble the social meals of the priests, made up from the sacrifices in the Temple. If the priests took care that the sacrifices which they offered up, and portions of which constituted their social meal, especially on the Sabbath and festivals, should be clean and without blemish, the Pharisees also took the utmost precaution that their meals should be free from the different degrees of defilement: they washed before partaking thereof, recited prayers before and after the repast, had a cup of blessing, and offered incense. It is only from this point of view that some of the differences between the Pharisees and the Sadducees can be explained; as, for instance, the difference of opinion as to the connection of priests with Sabbath purposes, called בקוני מיצא, mixture, adopted by the former and rejected by the latter. In consequence of the rigorous laws about the observance of the Sabbath (Exod. xxv, 29; Jer. xxxvii, 21, with Neh. xiv, 15, etc.), it was enacted that no Israelite is to walk on the Sabbath beyond a certain distance, called a Sabbath-day's journey, nor carry anything which was not also done on the Sabbath, or priestly party, who celebrated their meals on the Sabbath in different places, could go from one place to another, and carry to and fro anything they liked, because they regarded these meals as constituting part of their priestly and sacrificial service, which set aside the sanctity of the Sabbath. But the Pharisees, who made their Sabbath repast resemble the priestly social meals, had to encounter difficulties arising from the rigorous Sabbatic laws. The distance which they had sometimes to walk to join a company in the social meal was a disadvantage: they experienced discon- venience from one place to another of the things requisite for the solemnities was contrary to the enactments about the sanctity of the day. Hence they contrived the ideal connection of places (_PKJ), which was effected as follows: Before the Sabbath commenced (i.e. Friday afternoon), an article of food was deposited by each member in the court selected for the social gathering, so that it might thereby become the common place for all; the streets were made to form one large dwelling-place with different gates, by means of beams laid across on the tops of the houses, and doors or gates put in the front; and meals were put in a house at the end of the distance permitted to walk, in order to constitute it a domicile, and thus another Sabbath-day's journey could be undertaken from the first terminus. By this means the Pharisees could evade the law, and, like the priests, meet together at any place to celebrate their social meals on the Sabbath, and carry anything that was wanted for its sacred festival, as they had three common meals on the Sabbath (בראשית וברל). On the Friday evening the entrance of the Sabbath was greeted with a cup of wine, or the cup of blessing, over which every member recited benedictions (בראשית גלע), expressing the holiness of the day as well as the holiness of Israel, whom God sanctified to himself and made a people of priests, a royal nation in the spiritual, as well as in the temporal, meal was eaten. The second meal was eaten on noon of the Sabbath, and the third began with the setting sun, and in the middle of it the Sabbath departed.
When lights were kindled a blessing was again pronounced over a cup of wine (פָּנֵי הַכְּלָבָּה), and burning incense was offered up to accompany this holy day, which was regarded as a departing friend. The paschal meal was the model for these social and sacred repasts. But the light in which this very model sacrifice is to be viewed was a point of dispute between the priestly party or the Sadducees and the Pharisees. Because the paschal lamb formed the social meal of the day, the priestly party maintained that it is not to be regarded as a sacrifice for the congregation, urging in support of their notion the fact that the lambs were not numerically fixed like the other sacrifices in the Temple, but were negotiated according to the number of families, and that they must therefore be simply as family sacrifices, to be eaten by the respective owners, and must not be set aside the sanctity of the Sabbath, i.e. ought not to be offered on the 14th of Nisan, if the first day of the Passover falls on the Sabbath. Hillel, however, or the Pharisaic party whom he represented, succeeded in carrying their point, and in putting the sacred but private offerings of the Passover on an equality with the Temple sacrifices, and it was ordained, in opposition to the priestly party, that they are to set aside the firstborn of the lamb on the Sabbath; instead of making the social family meal of the lamb, which the Pharisees constituted, as sacred as the fraternal meal of the priest, consisting of the sacred sacrifices offered in the Temple (Jerusalem Tosefta, cap. vi.; Babylon Tosefta, 66 a; Geiger, Jüd. Zeitschr., 1, 384; Breslau, 1885, ii. 42 sq.). Having carried this point, the Pharisees also gave to their meal of the Sabbath and other holy days a sacrificial character after the model of the Passover.

As a people of priests and kings, the Pharisees considered themselves the guardians of the divine law and the ancestral customs. They felt implicitly that he who selected them to be his peculiar people would protect and shield them and theirs from all outward dangers which threatened the state. They were firmly penetrated by the conviction that as long as they were faithful to their God no power on earth, however formidable, would be permitted successfully to ravish his holy heritage. Hence they repudiated the time-serving policy of the aristocratic Sadducees, who maintained that a man's destiny was in his own hands, and that human ingenuity and state-craft ought to be resorted to in political matters.

Practically, Josephus represents the Pharisees as leading a temperate life, renouncing both excessive riches and immoderate pleasure, and striving above all to acquire a knowledge of that law and to practice those precepts which would fit them for the life to come (Ant. xviii, 1, 3); the same may be seen in the following declaration of the Talmud: "The more flesh on the body the more worms [when it is dead], the more riches the more cares, the more wives the more witchcrafts, the more handmaids the more unchastity, the more servants the more slavery, in the divine law the better the life, the more schooling the more knowledge, the more counsel the more intelligence, the more benevolence the more satisfaction; he who acquires a good name acquires it for himself in this world, but he who acquires knowledge of the divine law acquires for himself life in the world to come" (44b, ii. 17). In aiding the people to realize their high vocation, and to prepare themselves for the kingdom of heaven by obedience to the divine law, the Pharisees endeavored to facilitate that obedience by putting a mild interpretation upon some of the Mosaic enactments, and to adapt them to ever-changing circumstances. Thus they explain the expression פָּנְבָּה, carcass, in Lev. vii, 36, literally, and maintain that the statute in the verse in question only declares the flesh of an animal which was torn and died a natural death to be defiling by contact, but not the skin, bones, etc., and that, except the human corpse and the dead bodies of a few reptiles in which the skin and flesh are to a certain extent identical, the skin and bones of all animals, whether clean and living or unclean and dying accidentally, do not defile, but may be made up into parchement, different utensils, etc. The haughty and aristocratic Sadducees, on the other hand, who stood on their priestly dignity, and cared little for the comfort of the people, took the term פָּנְבָּה in the unnatural sense of an animal approaching the condition of being a carcass, i.e. being so weak that it must soon expire, and maintained that an animal in such a condition must be slaughtered before it breathes its last; that its flesh must then be considered as clean and therefore defiling, while the fat, skin, bones, etc., may be used for divers purposes (Jerusalem Megilla, 9 b; Babylon Sabbath, 106 a). It requires but little reflection to perceive how materially and diversely these different views must have affected the whole state of religion, when it is remembered that according to the Sadducees the touching of any book written upon the parchment made from the skin of an unclean animal, or contact with one of the numerous utensils made from the leather, bones, veins, etc., of such a carcass, levitated and not legally slaughtered, imparted defilement. Hence the Pharisees, with a due regard for the interests of the people, and following the requirements of the time, explained the right of retaliation, "eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot," etc. (Exod. xxii, 23, etc.), as requiring pecuniary compensation. While the Sadducees took it literally (Baba Kama, 80 b; 84 a. b; Megillah Ta'amim, cap. iv, Josephta). The same consideration for the spiritual and temporal well-being of the people led the Pharisees to enact that in cases of danger, when the prescribed prayers cannot be offered, they are to offer a short prayer as follows: "Lo thy will in heaven above, and give peace of mind to those who fear thee on earth, and whatsoever pleaseth thee do. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who hearest prayer!" (Berakhot, 29 b). What a striking resemblance between this and some parts of the Lord's prayer! It was this humane and pious care for the interests of the people that made the Pharisees so popular and beloved, and accounts for the remark of Josephus that they had such influence with the multitude that if they said anything against a king a high-priest they were at once believed (Ant. xiii, 10, 6).

On a few leading theological points the Pharisees were decidedly pronounced, and to these we particularly call attention, as they were largely influential under the Christian economy.

a. In regard to a future state, Josephus presents the idea of the Pharisees in such a light to his Greek readers that, whatever interpretation his ambiguous language might possibly admit, he obviously would have produced the impression on Greeks that the Pharisees believed in the transmigration of souls. Thus his statement respecting them is, "They say that every soul is imperishable, but that the souls of good men only pass over (or transmigrate) into another body—篾箩 commemorate τίς ἐνωμὸν—are without the souls of bad men are chased away by eternal punishments" (War, ii, 8, 14; comp. iii, 8, 5; Ant. xviii, 1, 8; and Böttcher, De Infersa, p. 619, 656).

There are two passages in the Gospels which might countenance this idea: one in Matt. xiv, 2, where Herod the tetrarch is represented as thinking that Jesus was John the Baptist risen from the dead (though a different color is given to Herod's thoughts in the corresponding passage, Luke ix, 7-9); and another in John ix, 2, where the question is put to Jesus whether the blind man himself had sinned, or his parents, that he was born blind? Notwithstanding these passages, however, there does not appear to be sufficient ground for doubting that the Pharisees believed in a reurrection of the dead very much in the same sense as the early Christians. This is most in accordance with Paul's statement to the chief priests and council (Acts xxxiii)

6) that he was a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee, and that he was called in question for the hope and resurrection of the dead—a statement which would have been peculiarly disingenuous if the Pharisees had merely been engaged in the occupation of souls; and it is likewise almost implied in Christ's teaching, which does not insist on the doctrine of a future life as anything new, but assumes it as already adopted by his hearers, except by the Sadducees, although he condemns some unspiritual conceptions of its nature as erroneous (Matt. xii. 38; Mark xii. 25; Luke xx. 34-36). On this head the Mishna is an illustration of the ideas in the Gospels, as distinguished from any mere transmigration of souls; and the peculiar phrase "the world to come," of which αἰώνιον ἡμῶν was undoubtedly only the translation, frequently occurs in it (ಂದีವ ೧೨, ೧೨, אובדך, ii. 7; iv. 16; comp. Mark x, 80; Luke xviii, 80).

This phrase of Christianity, which is anterior to Christianness, but which does not occur in the O.T., though fully justified by certain passages to be found in some of its latest books, is essentially different from Greek conceptions on the same subject; and generally, in contradistinction to the purely temporal blessings of the Mosaic legislation, the Christian idea that this world is a state of probation, and that every one after death will have a new account—account, account, account—will be expressed by Pharisees in language which it is impossible to misunderstand: "This world may be likened to a court-yard in comparison of the world to come; therefore prepare thyself in the antechamber that thou mayest enter into the dining-room" (Abod. iv. 16). "Everything is given to man on security, and a net is spread over every living creature; the shop is open, and the merchant credits; the book is open, and the hand records; and whoever chooses to borrow may come and borrow: for the collecting are continually going around daily, and obtain payment of man, whether with his consent or without it; and the judgment is true justice; and all are prepared for the feast" (iii. 16).

"Those who are born are doomed to die, the dead to live, and the quick to be judged; to make us know, understand, and be informed that he is God; he is the Former, Creator, Intelligent Being, Judge, Witness, and Suing Party, and will judge thee hereafter. Blessed be he; for in his presence there is no unrighteousness, forgetfulness, respect of persons, nor acceptance of a bribe; for no bribe is taken." Know also that everything is done according to the account, and let not thine evil imagination persuade thee that the grave is a place of refuge for thee: for against thy will wast thou formed, and against thy will wast thou born; and against thy will dost thou live, and against thy will wilt thou die; and against thy will must thou hereafter render an account, and receive judgment in the presence of the Supreme King of kings, the Holy God, blessed is he" (iv. 22).

Still it must be borne in mind that the actions of which such a strict account was to be rendered were not merely those referred to by the spiritual prophets Isaiah and Micah (Isa. i, 16, 17; Mic. vi. 8), nor even those enjoined in the Pentateuch, but included those fabulously supposed to have been orally transmitted by Moses on Mount Sinai, and the whole body of the traditions of the elders. They included, in fact, all those ceremonial "works," against the efficacy of which, in the deliverance of the human soul, Paul so emphatically protested. See Resurrection.

5. In reference to the opinions of the Pharisees concerning the freedom of the will, a difficulty arises from the very prominent, and unceasing, respect for the human rights, which accounts of Josephus, whereas nothing vitally essential to the peculiar doctrines of the Pharisees seems to depend on those opinions, and some of his expressions are Greek, rather than Hebrew. "There were three sects of the Pharisees, which had different conceptions respecting human affairs, of which one was called Pharisees, the second Sadducees, and the third Essenes. The Pharisees say that some things, and not all things, are the work of fate; but that some things are in our own power to be and not to be. But the Essenes declare that fate rules all things, and that nothing happens to man except what is foreordained by God; and the Sadducees, on the other hand, take away fate, holding that it is a thing of naught, and that human affairs do not depend upon it; but in their estimate all things are in the power of ourselves, as being ourselves the causes of our good things, and meeting with evils through our own inconsiderability" (Ant. xviii, 1, 8; comp. War. ii, 8, 14). On reading this passage, and the others which bear on the same subject in Josephus's works, the suspicion naturally arises that he was biased by a desire to make the Greeks believe that, like the Greeks, the Jews had philosophical sects among themselves. At any rate his words do not represent the opinions as they were really held by the three religious parties. We may feel certain that the influence of fate was not the point on which discussions respecting free-will turned, though there may have been many differences of opinion as to the interposition of God in human affairs was to be regarded. Thus the ideas of the Essenes are likely to have been expressed in language approaching the words of Christ (Matt. x, 25, 80; vi. 22, 34), and it is very difficult to believe that the Sadducees, who accepted the teaching of the Pentateuch and other parts of the O.T., excluded God, in their conception, from all influence on human actions. On the whole, in reference to this point, the opinion of Gritz (Geschichte der Juden, iii, 599) seems not improbable, that the real difference between the Pharisees and Sadducees was at first practical and political. He conjectures that the wealthy and aristocratic Sadducees in their wars and negotiations with the Egyptians entered into matters of policy and calculations of prudence, while the zealous Pharisees, disdaining worldly wisdom, laid stress on doing what seemed right, and on leaving the event to God; and that this led to differences in formal theories and metaphysical statements. The precise nature of those differences we do not certainly know, as no writing of a Sadducee on the subject has been preserved by the Jews, and on matters of this kind it is unsafe to trust unreservedly the statements of an adversary.

c. In reference to the spirit of proselytism among the Pharisees, there is indisputable authority for the statement that it prevailed to a very great extent at the time of Christ. "Everything is done according to the account, and let not thine evil imagination persuade thee that the grave is a place of refuge for thee: for against thy will wast thou formed, and against thy will wast thou born; and against thy will dost thou live, and against thy will wilt thou die; and against thy will must thou hereafter render an account, and receive judgment in the presence of the Supreme King of kings, the Holy God, blessed is he" (iv. 22).

Still it must be borne in mind that the actions of which such a strict account was to be rendered were not merely those referred to by the spiritual prophets Isaiah and Micah (Isa. i, 16, 17; Mic. vi. 8), nor even those enjoined in the Pentateuch, but included those fabulously supposed to have been orally transmitted by Moses on Mount Sinai, and the whole body of the traditions of the elders. They included, in fact, all those ceremonial "works," against the efficacy of which, in the deliverance of the human soul, Paul so emphatically protested. See Resurrection.

attempts to produce conversions, although unknown to Greek philosophers, existed among the Pharisees (De Waard, Theo van, Ant. Hellen. 10). But, at any rate, the then existing regulations or customs of synagogues afforded facilities which do not exist now either in synagogues or Christian churches for presenting new views to a congregation (Acts xvii, 2; Luke ix, 16). Under such auspices the proselytizing spirit of the Pharisees inevitably stimulated a thirst for inquiry, and accustomed the Jews to theological controversies. Thus there existed precedents and favoring circumstances for efforts to make proselytes, when the greatest of all missionaries, a Jew by race, a Pharisee by education, a Greek by birth, preaching the resurrection of Jesus to those who for the most part already believed in the resurrection of the dead, confronted the elaborate ritual-system of the written and oral law by a pure spiritual religion; and thus obtained the co-operation of many Jews themselves in breaking down every barrier between Jew, Pharisee, Greek, and Roman, and in endeavoring to unite all mankind by the brotherhood of a common Christianity. See PHREATY.

PHARYNX. The pharynx, Clivus, and general character of the Pharynx. —The name does not occur either in the O. T. or in the Apocalypse; but it is usually considered that the Pharynx was essentially the same with the Assyrians (e. g. chasdim = godly men, saints) mentioned in 1 Macc. ii, 42; vii, 13-17; and in 2 Macc. xiv, 17. The Psalms find allusion to the Assyrians in Ps. lxxxix, 2; xcvii, 10; cxlvii, 9, 16; cxlix, 9, where chasdim is translated "saints" in the A. V. (see Fürst, Handwörterbuch, i, 420 s.). After the return from the Babylonian captivity the priesthood formed the centre of the new religious life, and the pious in Israel who were anxious to practice the commandments of the Lord naturally attached themselves to the divinely-appointed and time-honored tribe of Levi. Besides the keeping pure from intermarriage with heathen, gross and vital importance was attached to the setting aside of the soil and Temple taxes (Neh. x, 33, 86, etc.; Ecclus. vii, 81; xiv, 20; Tobit i, 6; v, 13; Judith xi, 18; 1 Macc. iii, 49), to the due observance of the Sabbath (Neh. x, 81; xii, 19), the three pilgrim festivals, viz. the Passover (2 Chron. xxx, xxxv; Ezra vi, 19-22); Pentecost (Tobit ii, 1), and Tabernacles (Neh. viii, 14), as well as the Sabattic year (Neh. x, 31; 1 Macc. vi, 49, 53), and to the abstention from unclean food. He who allied himself with the national party with the solemn resolve to keep these important laws divine inspiration was called "one who had separated himself unto them from the impurity of the country people" (Ezra vi, 21), or "one who had separated himself for the law of the Lord from the country people" (ix, 1; x, 11; Neh. ix, 2; x, 26). Hence the phrase וָדָּו, "separated from," obtained during this period a party signification. This name became the standing appellation for those who had thus separated themselves for the service of God, and continued to be the conservators of their ancestral religion, as may be seen from the taunt of the anti-national party, who warned them to join the Greek party, telling them in the words of the Maccabees that "since we have separated from them (נימה וָדָּו, the mixed, Ezra ix, 1), or (נימה) the mixture (Neh. xiii, 3)." Hence the period before Alcimus was afterwards called the mixed (נימה), while his own was called the pure (Ezra xiv, 8-36). Afterwards, when the priestly party, or the Sadducees, who were at first the centre of the national movement, assumed a haughty position, stood upon their sacerdotal dignity, cared little for the real spiritual and temporal wants of the people, but only sought their own aggrandizement and preservation, alloying themselves for the purpose, Emperor Hadrian, in exposing antinational sentiments, the real national portion of the people united themselves more firmly than ever, independently of the priests, to keep the law, and to practice their ancestral customs; and it is this party whom the opposite section called by the Aramaic name שָדַּו, "separated," instead of its original Hebrew equivalent מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵם, מֵמ. In the time of queen Alexandra (q. v.) the Pharisees attained almost supreme power. By the appearance of piety and thorough knowledge of the law, which they well knew how to affect (so as even to pass for prophets, Josephus, Ant. xvii, 2, 4), the Pharisees at an early day secured the popular favor (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 10, 5; xiii, 15, 5; xiii, 16, 2; War, i, 5, 2; comp. Luke vi, 20), and that of the women (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 2, 4, where, however, only the wives of king Herod are spoken of; but comp. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 230 sq.), and thereby acquired considerable political influence, which became very manifest even during the time of the Antiochus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 10, 6; xiii, 16, 2; War, i, 5, 2). This influence became greatly increased by the extension of the Pharisees over the whole land (Luke v, 17), and the majority which they composed in the Sanhedrim (comp. Acts v, 34; xxii, 6 sq.). In political controversies they usually sided for the Hasmoneans, and sometimes carried them to an extreme, trusting to their combined influence for success. (Their number reached more than six thousand under the Herods, Josephus, Ant. xvii, 2, 4.) Many of them must have suffered death for political agitation (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 2, 4). In the time of Christ they were divided doctrinally into several schools, among which those of Hillel and Shammai were most noted, the former being more moderate, the latter more strict, in their observances. Of the history of the Pharisees after the resurrection of Christ and the foundation of the Christian Church little need be said. Their opposition to the Gospel continued as eager as before, and, though they are seldom mentioned by name in the Acts of the Apostles, that opposition is frequently brought before us when "the council" is spoken of (Acts iv, 15; v, 27; vi, 12; xxii, 30; comp. xxii, 6). That "council" is the Sanhedrim, and of the seventy-two doctors of which it was composed, the more influential part appears to have consisted of Pharisees. We see then the same spirit of enmity to Christian truth manifested by it as had been displayed during the life of the Redeemer. In the history of Paul we find the one version is only a more marked illustration than ordinary of the manner in which the whole body would have "persecuted the Church of God and wasted it." It is not to be imagined that this enmity would abate as the infant Church grew stronger. Every Jew that we know of human nature and religious bigotry leads to the opposite conclusion; and in the terrible fanaticism with which, when Titus besieged Jerusalem, the Jewish people rushed upon their fate, in the unflinching zeal which they displayed, in the desperate efforts which they made to avert the destruction which was "the wrath come upon them to the uttermost," and in the awful frenzy with which they sacrificed themselves amid their falling palaces and burning Temple, it is impossible not to recognize the last convulsive outburst of Pharisaic heroism and despair.

With the definitions and explanations of such an extensive and gorgeous ritual as that of the Mosaic law, with the application and adaptation thereof to all the vicissitudes of the commonwealth, with the different degrees of honor and reverence which were accorded to performance or neglect of each precept and rite, with the diverse dispositions and idiosyncrasies of the multitude about the respective merits of outward observances and a corresponding inward feeling, the Pharisees would have been superhuman if they had escaped the extravagances which in the course of time have more or less developed themselves in the established religions based upon a more spiritual code and a less formal ritual. Thus the enactment that "the flesh of quadrupeds, even of the game hunted or pursued by the light of candles or on the eve of the Sabbath," which is the duty of every Jew; or "the interdict to eat an egg which had been laid on any feast-day, whether such day was or was not the day after the Sabbath," has its parallel in other and later systems. The Christian Church, without any basis for it in the N. T., has at times employed a casuistry which may fairly compete with that of the Pharisees, who had to define an inspired code of minute rites and ceremonies. From Peter Lombard to Gabriel Biel the question was warmly discussed among all the Catholic doctors. What is to be done with a mouse which has eaten of the consecrated wafer? The Established Church of England has deduced from the words "Let all things be done decently and in order" (1 Cor. xiv, 40) the petty regulation that "no man shall cover his head in the church on the day of the Holy Sacrifice, except he have some infirmity, in which case let him wear a nightcap or cap" (Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, xviii); has enacted that "no minister, when he celebrates the communion, shall wittingly administer the same to any but to such as kneel, under pain of suspension" (ibid. xxvii); that "upon Wednesdays and Fridays weekly, though they be not holy-days, the minister, at the accustomed hours of service, shall resort to the church or chapel, and, warning being given to the people by tolling of a bell, shall say the litany prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer. Moreover we warn every householder dwelling within half a mile of the church to come or send one at the least of his household fit to join with the minister in prayers" (xv); and that "no ecclesiastical person shall wear any coif or wortignightcap, but only plain nightcaps of black silk, satin, or velvet;... in private houses and in their studies the said persons ecclesiastical may use any comely and scholar-like apparel, provided that it be not cut or pinted; and that in public they go not in their doublet and hose, without coats or cassocks; and that they wear not any under-garment" (xvi). This, however, only shows the tendency of all ritualism to degrade the human intellect by minute regulations. That the multitudinous and detailed rites and ceremonies imposed by the Mosaic law, and amplified by the requirements of time, should have given rise among many Pharisees to formalism, outward religiousness, self-complacency, ostentation, superstition, and hypocrisy, was to be expected, judging from the general tendency of gorgeous ritualism in more modern days. A learned Jew charges against them rather the holiness of works than hypocrisy: holiness ("Werkheilig, nicht Scheinhelligkeit," Herzfeld, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, iii, 359). At any rate they must be regarded as having been some of the most intense formalists whom the world has ever seen; and, looking at the average standard of excellence among mankind, it is nearly certain that men whose lives were spent in the ceremonial observances of the Manna would cherish feelings of self-complacency and spiritual pride not justified by intrinsic moral excellence. The supercilious contempt towards the poor publican, and towards the lowest and the most humble of his brethren, that his feet with tears, would be the natural result of such a system of life. We are therefore not surprised that our Saviour saw these pernicious features in the ranks of Pharisaism, and that he found occasion to expose and to reprove most unsparingly their externalism (Matt. xxviii, 27; Luke vii, 59) and hypocrisy (Matt. xxiii, 13). But to conclude from this that all the Pharisees were either self-righteous and superstitious, or a set of hypocrites, is as unjust as it would be to brand every sect in modern churches with the impieties and extravagances of individual members who are either denounced by their own more enlightened and spiritually-minded brethren, or exposed by the opposing sections. The language which the Pharisees themselves employed to denounce the proud, the formalists, the self-righteous, and the hypocrites, was quite as strong as that which our Saviour used. In confirmation of this, we need only give the poignant Talmudic classification of the Pharisees. "There are seven kinds of Pharisees," says the Talmud: 1. The Shechekelites Pharisee (תלמוד), who, simply keeps the law for what he can profit thereby, just as Shechem submitted to the rise of circumcision that he might thereby obtain Dinah, the daughter of Jacob (Gen. xxxix, 19); 2. The Tumbling Pharisee (תלמוד), who, in order to appear humble before men, always hangs down his head, and scarcely lifts up his feet when he walks, so that he constantly tumbles; 3. The Bleeding Pharisee (תלמוד), who, in order not to look at a woman, walks about with his eyes closed, and hence injures his head frequently, so that he has bleeding wounds; 4. The Mortar Pharisee (תלמוד), who wears a cap in the form of a mortar to cover his eyes, that he may not see any impurities and indecencies; 5. The What-do-I-know-do-Pharisee (תלמוד), who, not knowing much about the law, as soon as he has done one thing, asks, 'What is my duty now? and I will do it' (comp. Mark x, 17-22); 6. The Pharisee from Fear (תלמוד), who keeps the law because he is afraid of a future judgment; and 7. The Pharisee from Love (תלמוד), who obeys the Lord because he loves him with all his heart" (Babylon Soin, 22 b; comp. Jerusalem Berachoth, cap. ix). It must also be admitted that it was among the Pharisees the glorious ideas were developed about the Messiah, the kingdom of heaven, the immortality of the soul, the world to come, etc. It was the Pharisees who, to some extent at least, trained such men as the immortal Hillel, "the just and devout" (Josephus), who gave the consultation for the cases of those in doubt, and who, taking up the infant Saviour into his arms, offered up thanks to God (Luke ii, 25-35); Zacharias, "who was righteous before God" (l, 6); Gamaliel, the teacher of Saul of Tarsus; Paul, the great apostle of the Gentiles, day and night laboured in vigilance in the Pharisaic ground, and used the arguments of the Pharisees in vindication of his conduct and doctrines. Thus, when Jesus was charged by the Pharisees with allowing his disciples to break the Sabbath by plucking ears of corn in the field on the holy day, he quoted the very maxim of the Pharisees themselves, "the Sabbath is made for man, and not man for the Sabbath" (Mark ii, 27; comp. Joma, 86 b), and his proof is deduced according to the Pharisaic exegetical rule denominated הוהי הוות, analogy. When David was hungry, he ate of the priestly bread, and also gave some to those who were with him. Accordingly, if Jesus be hungry may also give bread to others, which is otherwise only allowed to the priests. Now the priests perform all manner of work on the Sabbath without incurring the guilt of transgression; why, then, should one who is hungry not be allowed to do the same? (Matt. xii, 1-7). We only add that the apostle Paul, who must have known the denominations of Christ against the Pharisees, never uttered a disrespectful word against this sect, but, on the contrary, made it a matter of boast that he belonged to them (Acts xxii, 5; xxvi, 5; Phil. iii, 5). Yet candor must acknowledge that great moral devolutions in practice often coexist with much that is beautiful in theory.
and the undeniably well-grounded rebukes of our Saviour against the Pharisees of his time prove an enormous depravity on their part. He denounced them in the bitterest language; and in the sweeping charges of hypocrisy which he made against them as a class, he might, even at first sight, seem to have departed from that spirit of meekness, which is the very life of the great commandment. But the imitation of improper motives, which is one of the most characteristic and original charms of his own precepts. See Matt. xv, 7, 8; xxiii, 5, 13-15, 28; Mark vii, 6; Luke xi, 42-44; and comp. Matt. vii, 1-5; xi, 9, xii, 19, xxii, 37-42. Indeed, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that his repeated denunciations of the Pharisees mainly exasperated them into taking measures for causing his death; so that in one sense he may be said to have shed his blood, and to have laid down his life in protesting against their practice and spirit. (See especially verses 68 and 54 in the 11th chapter of Luke, which follow immediately upon the narration of what he said while dining with a Pharisee.) Hence to understand the Pharisees is, by contrast, an aid towards understanding the spirit of our Lord. If any conception is more fundamental to us than that of the Pharisaic spirit is, it is a very clear demonstration of the importance and the wide and fundamental truth that we shall best apprehend the genius of Pharisaism by developing the contrast somewhat in detail (see Delitzsch, Jesus und Hülle [Erlangen, 1866]).

(1.) In relation to the O.-T. dispensation, it was the Saviour's great effort to unfold the principles which had been the foundation of the new dispensation, and then to persuade them out to their legitimate conclusions, to "fulfil the law" (ποιήσω, Matt. v, 17, to "fulfil," not, as too often supposed to mean, to "confirm"). But, in contrast to this, the Pharisees taught such a servile adherence to the letter of the law, that its remarkable character as a pointing forward to something higher than its letter was completely overlooked, and that its moral precepts, intended to elevate men, and to lead them on to the thought of a moral stage more glorious than that at which they then stood, were made rather the instruments of contracting and debasing their ideas of morality. Thus, strictly adhering to the letter, "Thou shalt not kill," they regarded anger and all hasty passion as legitimate (Matt. v, 21, 22). Adhering with equal strictness to the words "Thou shalt not commit adultery," all impure thoughts and deeds which fell short of this were considered by them to be allowable (Matt. v, 27, 28). And, once more, acquiescing in the letter, "Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a letter of divorcement," they so interpreted the precept that, if only a letter of divorcement were given, a woman might have the marriage unshaken (Matt. v, 31, 32). Thus, the whole spirit of the O.-T. dispensation was misunderstood by them. They did not see that it was adapted to a particular stage in the history of man; that its merit consisted, not in being perfect, but in being better than what would have existed without it; and that it contained in itself the pledge that it must one day yield, as a system, to the full evolution of those principles at which it aimed, and to which, from time to time, it gave expression. When accorded with the letter, they were exceedingly rigid, and adhering to the letter, in order that he might set free the spirit, which the circumstances of men had rendered it necessary to enclose and confine for a season, their hearts were steelcd from the first against him, and they attacked him as a blasphemer against the God of Israel and his law.

(2.) While it was the aim of Jesus to call men to the law of God itself as the supreme guide of life, the Pharisees multiplied minute precepts and distinctions to such an extent, upon the pretence of maintaining it in its integrity, that he was simply overwhelmed and burdened on every side by instructions so numerous and trifling that the law was almost, if not wholly, lost sight of. These "traditions," as they were called, had long been gradually accumulating. Their object may in the first instance have been a good one. The law had been given under circumstances very different from those in which the Jewish people found themselves more and more placed as the Christian era approached. The relations of life had been far simpler; the influence exerted over Israel by neighboring nations less refined; while the national authorities, except in times when the offices of the Prophet and the Prophetess were thrown aside, had united in keeping all admixture of foreign elements at a distance. That was no longer possible; and it became almost necessary therefore to explain the application of the law to the changed and ever-changing conditions of the times. Doliocrate's Christiainum und Judendum, p. 750). Commenting upon the law therefore was unavoidable; and many of the comments given were no doubt really what they were designed to be, "a fence to the law." But these "fences" too soon assumed, as indeed it was natural that they should, an importance superior to that of the law itself, while at the same time they were continually increasing in number, till at last a complete system of casuistry was formed, in which the most minute incidents of life were embraced, and which rendered the law itself almost invisible. So that the case was impossible. Of the trifling character of these regulations innumerable instances are to be found in the Mishna, but, as it is not quite clear that the Talmudical was the same as the Pharisaic theology, we omit these, and remind our readers only of some of those mentioned by the Rabbi, to show what the washings before they would eat bread, and the special minuteness with which the forms of this washing were prescribed; their bathing when they returned from the market, their washing of cups and pots, braziers, vessels, and couches (Mark vii, 2-4); such were their fastings not only at the seasons which the law prescribed, but twice in the week (Luke xvi, 12)—on Thursday, when, according to their tradition, Moses had ascended Mount Sinai, and on Monday, when he had come down from it (Eisenmenger, Esedteckes Judendum, i, 811); such were their tilthings, not only of the property which the law provided should be tilled, but even of the most insignificant herbs—mint and anise and cummin (Matt. xxiii, 23; comp. Luke xvii, 12); and such, finally, were those minute and vexatious extensions of the law of the Sabbath, which must have converted God's gracious ordinance of the Sabbath's rest into a burden and a pain (Matt. xii, 1-13, Mark iii, 1-6; Luke xiii, 10-17, etc.).

(3.) It was a leading aim of the Redeemer to teach men that true piety consisted not in forms, but in substance, not in outward observances, but in the inward spirit; not in small details, but in great rules of life. The whole system of Pharisaical piety led to exactly opposite conclusions. Under its influence "the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith," were undervalued and neglected (Matt. xxiii, 23; Luke xi, 42), the idea of religion as that which should have its seat in the heart disappeared (Luke xi, 38-41); the most sacred obligations were evaded (Mark vii, 11); vain and trifling questions took the place of serious inquiry into the most important truths of the law; the most solemn truths were handled as mere matters of curious speculation or means to entrap an adversary (Matt. xxii, 36, etc., Luke xxii, 20, etc.).

(4.) The lowness of piety was, according to the teaching of Jesus, an inseparable concomitant of its reality, but the Pharisees sought maintenance, and thus the attention and to excite the admiration of men. They gave alms in the most ostentatious manner; they often prayed standing at the corners of the streets; they disfigured their faces when they fasted (Matt. vi, 2, 6, 16); they drew attention to their religious zeal they made broad their phylacteries and enlarged the borders of their garments (Matt. xxiii, 5). Blind to the true glory of ministering to others rather than being ministered to, they sought their glory in obtaining the chief seats in the synagogues, the first places at the tables to which they were invited, greetings of honor in the markets, and the title of Rabbi, Rabbi (Matt. xxiii, 6; Luke xix, 7). Indeed, the whole spirit of their religion was summed up in the one sentiment, but in a proud self-righteousness at variance with any true conception of man's relation either to God or his fellow-creatures.—God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican.” (Luke vii, 11).

(3.) It was a natural consequence of all this, that with such views of the principles and spirit of religion its practicaloughness must be overthrown, and it was so. Christ inculcated compassion for the degraded, helpfulness to the friendless, liberality to the poor, holiness of heart, universal love, and the hatred of the truth. The Pharisees regarded the degraded classes of society as classes to be shunned, not to be won over to the right (Luke vii, 9; xv, 2; xviii, 11), and frowned from them such as the Redeemer would fain have gathered within his fold (John vii, 40). Instead of having compassion on the friendless, they made them a prey (Matt. xxiii, 18).

With all their pretences to piety, they were in reality avaricious, sensual, and dissolute (Matt. xxiii, 25; John vii, 7). They looked with contempt upon every nation but their own (Luke x, 29). Finally, in spite of all their pretences to the highest degree of the dispensation whose truths they professed to teach, and thus bringing men to the hope of Israel, they devoted their energies to making converts to their own narrow views, who, with all the zeal of proselytes, were more excited by universal opposition to the truth than they were themselves (Matt. xxii, 15).

In view of these facts, while acknowledging much that was just and commendable in their doctrines (Matt. xxiii, 2, 5), we are compelled to acquiesce in that general judgment which has made the name of “Pharisee” a proverb of ecclesiastical reproach—a character too often reproduced under Christianity itself.

V. Literature.—Besides the Mishna, the Talmud, and the Midrashim, which embody the sentiments of the Pharisees, we refer to Bruckner, Hist. Crit. Philosophiae, ii, 744-760; Milman, Hist. of the Jews, ii, 71; Ewald, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, iv, 415-419; Biedermann, Phariseer und Sadud effectisten (Zur. 1854); Wellhausen, Die Phariseer und die Sadduzier (Greifsw. 1874); and the Jahrboekter des Heils, p. 5, etc., of Grafner, who has insisted strongly on the importance of the Mishna, and has made great use of the Talmud generally. Grossmann has endeavored to present a harmony of the Jewish-Alexandrine doctrines with those of the Palestine Pharisees in his work, De Pharis. Jud. Alexandr. (Hal. 1846), ii, 4; but it is very improbable that the Pharisees shared it with the Jewish-Hasidim of Alexandria in their principles, when the latter were adherents of Plato, and diligent students of Homer and Hesiod (Grossmann, De Philos. Sadducei, iii, 8). See also the following works by modern learned Jews: Herzfeld, Geschichte des Volkes Israel (Northhausen, 1857), ii, 258, etc.; Jost, Geschichte des Juden- und seiner Secten (Leipzig, 1857), i, 197, etc.; Grätz, Geschichte der Juden (2d ed. ibid. 1868), iii, 73, etc., 454, etc., and, above all, Geiger, Uebersetzungen der Bibel (Breslau, 1867), p. 105, etc., also in the Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft (Leipzig, 1862), xvi, 714, etc., and in his Jüdische Zeitschrift für Wissenschaft und Leben (Breslau, 1863), ii, 11, etc.; and reprinted separately (Breslau, 1868). Pharmacy, a name applied to the arts of the magician and enchantor in the early ages of the Christian Church. The Council of Ancyra forbade pharmacy, that is, the magical art of inventing and preparing medicaments to do mischief:; and appointed five years' penalite for any one that receives a magician into his house for that purpose. But there can be no canons condemning such arts under the same character of pharmacy and witchcraft, and assigns thirty years' penalite to them.

Tertullian plainly asserts that never did a magician or enchantor escape unpunished in the Church. Those who practiced the magical art were sometimes termed pharisei, and their magical potions pharism.

Phra'ash (Exa viii, 8). See Pharaoh.

Phar'par (Heb. Parpar, יְפָרָפָר, nākāf; Sept. Φαρ'φαρ v. r. Φαρφαρ, Ἀφάφαρ; Vulg. Pharpar), one of the two rivers of Damascus mentioned in the well-known exclamation of Naaman, “Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?” (2 Kings v, 12). The name does not occur elsewhere in Scripture, nor is it found in ancient classic authors. (Ba'al). It was the river of Damascus (Onomast., s. v. Farfar). Pliny says that “Damascus was a place fertilized by the river Chrysoorrhoeus, which is drawn off into its meadows and eagerly imbued” (v, 16); and Strabo says of this river that “it commences from the city of Barada in Damascus, and is almost entirely drained by watercourses; for it supplies with water a large tract of country” (xvi, 755). But none of these writers speak of any second river. Various opinions have been entertained regarding the Pharpar. Benjamin of Tudela states that, while the Abana rises in the district of Zebdany, the Pharpar, which lies between the gardens and the orchards in the outskirt (Early Travels, Bohn, p. 90). He evidently refers to the two branches of the same river. The river Barada takes its rise in the upland plain of Zebdany, at the distance of the lowest peak of Anti-Lebanon. Its principal source is a fountain called Ain Barada. It cuts through the central chain in a sublime gorge, and flows in a deep wild glen down the eastern declivities. Its volume is more than doubled by a large fountain called Fijeh, which gushes from a cave in the side of the glen. The river laterly becomes a mere stream and enters the desert plain of Damascus about three miles west of the city. The main stream flows though the city; but no fewer than seven large canals are taken from it at different elevations to irrigate the surrounding orchards and gardens. The largest of these is called Nahr Taura, “the river Taura,” and is probably that which Benjamin of Tudela identified with the Pharpar (l. c.). The Arabic version of the Bible reads Taura for Pharpar in 2 Kings v, 12; but the words of Naaman manifestly imply the existence of two rivers. In Keil, it is supposed that because the Barada has two great fountains, Naaman alluded to these; and Dr. Wilson would identify the Barada with the Pharpar, and Ain Fijeh with the Abana (Lands of the Bible, ii, 371, 373); but in reply we say that Naaman speaks of two “rivers,” not “a river.”

A short distance south of the city of Damascus flows the river Awaj. It has two principal sources—one high up on the eastern side of Hermon, just beneath the central peak; the other in a wild glen a few miles southward, near the romantic village of Beit Jann. The streams unite near Sasa, and the river flows eastward in a deep rocky channel, and falls into a lake, or rather large marsh, called Bahret Hijaneh, about four miles south of the lake into which the Barada falls. Although the Awaj is eight miles distant from the city, yet it flows across the whole plain of Damascus; and large ancient canals drawn from it irrigate the fields and gardens almost up to the walls. The total length of the Awaj is nearly forty miles; and in volume it is about one fourth that of the Barada. The Barada and Awaj are the only rivers of any importance in the district of Damascus; and there can be little doubt that the former is the Abana, and the latter the Pharpar. The identity of the Awaj and Pharpar was suggested by Munro in 1833 (Summer Remains, ii, 54), and confirmed by Dr. Robinson (Bible Researches, Sacred and Secular, p. 187); but its sources, course, and the lake into which it falls, were first explored by Dr. Porter in the year 1852 (ibid. Jan. 1854, and April, 1854, p. 829). He then heard, for the first time, the name Barbar applied to a gjen on the east side of Hermon, which sends a small tributary to the Awa{j; and it seems highly probable that we have in this name a relic of the ancient Pharrar. The Arabic may be regarded as equivalent to the Hebrew (see Five Years in Damascus, i, 299; Bibiloth. Sac. l. c. p. 54). The mountain region round the sources of the river was occupied in a remote age by the warlike Mascu-tities (1 Chron. vii, 7); subsequently it formed part of the district of Abilene (Luke iii, 1; Josephus, Ant. xix, 5, i). Farther down, the river Pharrar divided the territory of Damascus from Jumea (q. v.). The whole district through which the river flows is now called Wady el-Ajam, "the valley of the river, the"; the scenery is bare and mountainous, but some parts of it are extremely fertile, and it contains upwards of fifty villages, with a population of 18,000 souls (see Jour. of Soc. Lit. 1858; Kutter, Pal. and Syria, i, 182 sq.). See DAMASCUS.

The tradition of the Jews of Damascus, as reported by Schwartz (Palest, p. 54, also p. 20, 27), is curiously subversive of our ordinary ideas regarding these streams. They call the river Fijak (that is, the Barada) the Pharrar, and give the name Aman or Karmon (an old Turkish name) to a stream which Schwartz describes as running from a fountain called el-Barady, a mile and a half from Beth Djan (Bie Jenn), in a north-east direction, to Damascus (see also the reference to the Nubian geographer by Gesenius, Theaur. p. 1192 a).

Pharr, Walter Smiley, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Chenango County, N. C., April 28, 1790. He was educated at Hampden Sidney College, Prince Edward Co., Va.; studied theology under the care of Moses Hoge, D. D.; was licensed by Hanover Presbytery, and ordained by Concord Presbytery Nov. 18, 1820. His first charge was Watawah Church, S. C., and he subsequently preached for Prospect, Raucans, and Mallard Creek churches, in North Carolina, all within the bounds of Concord Presbytery. He died Dec. 27, 1866. Mr. Pharr was a sound theologian, a plain and successful preacher and pastor, much beloved and confided in by all who knew him. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 687, p. 450. (J. L. S.)

Pahra'ite (Heb. with the art. קַרְסֵת, "םִּיִּתְמַר"); [Sept. ψαριτας v. r. φαριτης], the patronymic of a family among the Hebrews (Numb. xxvi, 20), the descendants of Phares (q. v.).

Pharsalia (Pharsalio, Josephus, Pharsale, Prototype, v. 16, 7; Pharsallia, Pliny, xiv, 19; xxi, 5), a city in the plain of the Jordan, built by Herod the Great in the year 10 B.C., as a brother city of Sebaste (Josephus, Ant. xxvi, 5; 22, ii, 9; xvii, 1; xxi, 2; War, ii, 9, 1). It is now Tell Faiiz, a small hill with ruins at its base. The site is inhabited by a few people who cultivate their gardens. These are irrigated by a brook, the fountain of which is an hour more to the west, hidden as it were under the high cliffs below Damascus, and under the shade of a dense jungle (see Robinson, Researches, ii, 305). Brocardus and Mar. Samedo (Soc. Fidel. Cruc. Iii, xiv, 3) identify this little stream, now called Ain Faiiz, with the brook Cherith (see Reland, Palest, p. 958; Bachim, Heb. Geogr. I, i, 125-130).—Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 389.

Pharsa'nah [some Pasa'nah] (Heb. vii, 51). See Pasa'am.

Pharsalos (Pharsalos), a town on the coast of Asia Minor, on the confines of Lydia and Pamphylia, and consequently ascribed by the ancient writers sometimes to one and sometimes to the other. It was one of the towns to which the Romans wrote controlling all Jewish exiles, and which had taken refuge given up to Simon the high-priest (1 Macc. xvi, 23). Its intercourse with commerce was considerable in the 6th century B.C., for at the reign of Amasia it was one of a number of Greek towns which carried on trade somewhat in the manner of the Hanaecan confederacy in the Middle Ages. They had a common temple, the Hellenium, at Naukratis, in Egypt, and nominated procerus for the regulation of commercial questions and the administration of contracts, like the proctors of the Middle Ages, who presided over the courts of piezopudr (piez poudres, peddler) at the different stables. In later times Phasis was distinguished as a resort of the Pamphylian and Cilician pirates. Its port was a convenient one to make, for the lofty mountain of Solyma (now Tshakhatlu), which backed it at a distance of only five miles, is nearly eight thousand feet in height, and constitutes an admirable landmark for a great distance. Phasis itself stood on a rock of fifty or one hundred feet elevation above the sea, and was joined to the mainland by a low isthmus, in the middle of which was a lake, now a picturesque marsh. On the eastern side of this were a closed port and a roadstead, and on the western a larger artificial harbor, formed by a mole run out into the sea. The remains of this may still be traced to a considerable extent below the surface of the water. The masonry of the pier which protected the small eastern port is nearly perfect. In this sheltered position the pirates could lie safely while they sold their booty, and also refit, the whole region having been incised with creeks and canals, with wood as to give the name of Pityusa to the town. For a time the Phasitae confined their relations with the Pamphylians to the purposes just mentioned; but they subsequently joined the piratical league, and suffered in consequence the loss of their independence and their town lands in the war which was waged by the Roman consul Publius Servilius Isauricus in the years B.C. 77-75. But at the outset the Romans had to a great extent fostered the pirates, by the demand which sprang up for domestic slaves upon the change of manner brought about by the spoliations of Carthage and Corinth. It is said that at this time many thousand slaves were passed through Delos—which was the mart between Asia and Europe—in a single day; and the proverb grew up there, καπιτού, καρπαμιους ιδιου πως παραιτορος. But when the Cilicians had acquired such power and audacity as to sweep the seas as far as the Italian coast, and interrupt the supplies of corn, it became time to interfere, and the expedition of Servilius commenced the work which was afterwards completed by T Pompey the Great (see Smith, Dict. of Class. Geog. v. v.).

It is in the interval between the growth of the Cilician piracy and the Servilian expedition that the incidents related in the First Book of Maccabees occurred. After naming Ptolemy, Demetrius (king of Syria), Antigonus (king of Macedon), Ariarathes of Pontus, and Clearchus (Parthia) as recipients of these missives, the author adds that the consul also wrote: εις τας των Κωστα σαμαρίας και Σαμαρίας (Grotius conjectures Lamatos), and one MS. has Μινασιας κα Καμαριας των αληθινων των ημων και των Αληθιων των αληθων και των δινων και των δανων και εις την Καισαριανα και εις την Καλεντα και εις την Καλεντα και εις την Αλεξανδρειαν και εις την Παλαιαν και εις την Ἴλιου πολιν και εις την Ελευθεραν και εις την Κεραν και εις την Κεραν και εις την Κεραν και εις την Κεραν και εις την Κεραν και εις την Κεραν. It will be observed that all the places named, with the exception of Cyprus and Cyrene, lie on the highway of marine traffic between Syria and Italy. The Jewish slaves, whether kidnapped by their own countrymen (Exod. xxxi, 16), or obtained by raids (2 Kings v, 2), appear in early times to have been transmitted to the western coast of Asia Minor by this route (see Ezek. xxviii, 13; Joel iii, 6).

The existence of the mountain Solyma, and a town of the same name, in the immediate neighborhood of Phasis, renders it probable that the descendants of some of these Israelites formed a population of some importance in the time of Strabo (i, 174, 175, 176). the name of the head of an Arab tribe, "the children of Phasiron" (I Macc. ix, 66), defeated by Jonathan, but of whom nothing more is known.

Phas'aron (Φασαρών, v.r. Φασαρίος and Φασαρίς; Vulg. Phasarius), a Grecized form (1 Esdr. v, 25) of the Heb. name Pashur (v. r.).

Phelan, William, D.D., a somewhat noted Irish deacon of the Established Church, was born at Clonmel in 1789, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he was admitted sizar in 1806. In 1814 he was made second master of the endowed school of Derry: in 1817 he was elected fellow of his college, and in 1820 lecturer. In 1824 he became rector of Killiman, Armagh, and in 1825 of Ardtray. He died in 1830. His Remains were published, with a biographical memoir, by the bishop of Limerick (2d ed. Lond. 1832, 2 vol. 8vo).

Phelipeaux, Jean, a French theologian, was born at Angiers in the 17th century. He studied in Paris, and there took his degree of Doctor of Theology, even to the doctorate. Bossuet, having heard him dispute in the Sorbonne, formed so favorable an opinion of him that he placed him in the position of preceptor to his nephew, the abbe Bossuet, the future bishop of Troyes. Both were created doctors in 1687, when the affair of Quietism was agitated; they followed it with singular ardor, and with a kind of passion the expression of which Bossuet was more than once obliged to moderate. Phelipeaux wrote, June 24, 1688, "No better and more persuasive piece of news can be sent us than that of the disgrace of the relatives and friends of M. de Cambra," His pupil showed no less animosity. "He is a wild beast," said he, Nov. 25, in speaking of Fénélon—"he is a wild beast, that must be pursued until he is overthrown and unable to do any harm." Phelipeaux, entirely occupied with this affair, wrote numerous memoirs, and besieged the court of Rome with solicitations, at the same time carrying on a secret correspondence with M. de Noailles, archbishop of Paris. On his return to France (1699) he became canon, official, and grand-vicar of Meaux. He died at Meaux July 3, 1708. After his death was published the Relation de l'origine du progress et de la condamnation du Quiskima répondu en France, avec plusieurs anecdotes curieuses (a. l. 1782-1783, 2 pt. 12mo). All that is said in it against the manners of Madame Guyon is corroborated by no proof, and was refuted in 1788 by the abbe de la Plute, in a work called Les Accords de Satan. As for Fénélon, the design of the author was to injure his reputation; "he will work," says De Baumetz, "reveals the most marked partiality and the most odious rage." Besides, it was suppressed by a decree of the council. See Moncri, Grand Dict. Hist.; De Baumetz, Hist. de Fénè- lon; Barbié, Dict. des Anonymes, 3d edit., No. 16,096—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxix, 921.

Philemon (φιλόμων), a cock, which in the Greek Church corresponds to the chasseur in the Latin Church. This ecclesiastical vestment is worn by the priests, and that worn by the patriarch is embroidered with crosses and crowns. This is supposed to have been the sort of garment which Paul left at Troas, and his anxiety for its restoration is to be attributed, we are told, to its sanctity as an ecclesiastical robe.

Phelps, Elisabeth Stuart, an American lady, noted as the author of a number of moral and religious story-books, was born at Andover, Mass., in 1815. She was the daughter of Dr. Moses Stuart, the celebrated professor of O.T. exegesis at the Andover divinity school, and wife of Dr. Austin Phelps. She died at Boston, Nov. 18, 1862. We have not space here for a list of her writings, but those interested will find it in Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Phelps, Joseph T., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Anne Arundel County, Md., Sept. 21, 1818; was converted at sixteen, and in 1840 became a member of the Baltimore Conference, and for eighteen years travelled in Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. His last appointment in the Baltimore Conference was Harper's Ferry. In 1858 he took a supernumerary relation, and moved to Ohio. At the ensuing Conference he was, at his own request, located. In 1860-61 he was employed by the presiding elder on Clarkfield Circuit, and in 1868 he was admitted into the North Mississippi Conference, and travelled in the following circuits: Sullivan, one year; Republican, two years; Perkins, two years; and Centerton, one year. His last appointment was Republican. "He was a man of general intelligence, of godly presence, and unassuming manner. He was a very good and acceptable preacher, a true Christian gentleman, and success attended his ministerial labors." He died near Replied, Seneca County, Ohio, April 23, 1870. See General Minutes of the Ann. Conferences.

Phelps, Servis W., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1846. After completing his study in this college, he went to the school of Dr. Ed. G. W. May, in a farm near his birthplace, where he was converted, he joined the New York Conference in 1868. He was first appointed to New Bremen, and then to Barnee's Corner, where, under his ministrations, more than fifty persons were added to the church. His health suddenly failed him, and he died Jan. 11, 1869, after a brief illness, at home, with a good grace. His death was a great loss to his church. See Minutes of the Ann. Conferences.

Phelps, Thomas, a Wesleyan preacher and missionary, was born at Rudford, Gloucestershire, England, in 1817. He was of humble parentage, and did not enjoy more than the usual advantages of a common-school education. In 1849 he was selected as a laborer in the Jamaica mission. He promptly accepted the work, and though more or less disabled by severe attacks of tropical fever, he yet continued faithful in the discharge of his duties. He died peacefully at Port Morant, Aug. 18, 1852. "Phelps' amiable disposition, and his habits of industry and punctuality, secured for him the love and esteem of the brethren with whom he was associated, and his brief ministry was not without fruit. His pulpit labors were acceptable; and his diligent attention to other pastoral duties obtained for him the love of the people among whom he was stationed." See Wesleyan Magazine (Sept. 1853), p. 869.

Phelpeaux, Georges-Louis, a French prelate, was born in 1729 in the château d'Herbiet, diocese of Orleans. He entered holy orders, became commendatory abbe of the royal abbey of Thouroul, and was appointed in 1757 archbishop of Bourges, and in 1770 chancellor of the Order of the Holy Ghost. He distinguished himself as much by the activity of his pastoral zeal as by his inexhaustible benevolence. He founded several colleges in the principal cities of his diocese, instituted bureaus of charity, and succeeded in considerably diminishing mendicity. See Biblioth. de l'Église, Hist. de G.-J. Phelpeaux (1778, 8vo); Fauchet, Orison Funèbre de G.-J. Phelpeaux—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxix, 924.

Pherecydes (φερεκύδης), an ancient Greek philosopher, was a native of the island of Ithyr, one of the Cyclades. He is mentioned in the Bacchic Eclogues of B.C. 299, and is said by Diogenes Laertius to have been a rival of Thebes, and to have learned his wisdom from the sacred books of the Phoenicians, or from the Egyptians and Chaldeans. He is also reputed to have been a disciple of Plato, and to have taught Pythagoras. He wrote a cosmogony in a kind of prose much resembling poetry, under the title Εἰκώνοι, the meaning of which is doubtful. In a manner rather poetic than philosophic, he endeavored in this work to show the origin of all things from the eternal principles: Time, or Kronos; Earth, the feminine and passive mass; and Εἴκοσι, or Zeus, as the formative principle. He taught the doctrine of the existence of the human soul after death; but it is uncertain whether he held the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, afterwards promulgated by his disciple Pythagoras. Of his work only fragments are extant, which have been collected and elucidated by Stuart (Ges. 1798; 2d ed. Leipzig, 1824). See Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.; Butler, Hist. of Anc. Phil. vol. ii; Cudworth, Intel. System of the Universe (see Index in vol. iii). Pherecydes (1 Esdr. viii. 69) or Pherecydes (judgment v. 19; 2 Esdr. i. 21), different modes of rendering (Φερεκοίς) the name Pheri-ces (q. v.).

Philaia (Φιλαία), Lake, a small body of water described by Josephus, and believed by him to supply the fountain at Banias (War. iii, 10, 7). It is present-day Birt el-Rim, east of Banias; first examined by Irby and惠尔登 (1808), and named the time of Strabo, is identified on various maps. It was changed into Philae by Thomson (Bibl. Sacra, iii, 199-192). See also Ritter, Erdkunde, xxxv, 154 sq., 174 sq.; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii, 190; Lynch, Official Report, p. 110; Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 399—Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 340.

Phlibotense is a local name of the Gnostics (q. v.), and is probably a corruption of Phlibotius, which was acquired from Valentinus, the founder of the sect, who was a native of Phlibotis, on the coast of Egypt (see Ephesiinus, Harra, xxvi, 3; xxxi, 2).

Ph'chol (Heb. פֵּכֹל, פֵּכּוֹל, of doubtful meaning [see below]; Sept. פֶּכַּל v. פֶּכַל; Josephus Φιλοκλος), the proper, or, more probably, the titular name of the commander of the troops of Abimelech, the Philistine king of Gerar in the patriarchal period. See Abimelech.

If Abimelech of the time of Isaac was the son of the Abimelech of the time of Abraham, we may conclude that the Phichol who attended on the second Abimelech (Gen. xxii. 22) was the successor of the one who was present with the first at the interview with Abraham (Gen. xxvi. 26), and mentions him on the second occasion only. On the other hand the Sept. introduces Ahuzzath, Abimelech's other companion, on the first also. By Gesenius the name is treated as Hebrew, and as meaning the "mouth of all." By Ewald (p. 227) it is derived from a root בָּר, to be strong. But Hitzig (Philadeler, § 57) refers it to the Semitic פֵּכֹל, a tamunak, pointing out that Abraham had planted a tamarisk in Beersheba, and comparing the name with Elah, Berosus, Tappuach, and other names of persons and places signifying different kinds of trees; and with the name פָּקַל, a village of Palestine (Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 2), and פָּקָל in Greece. Stark (Cata, etc. p. 367) would cautiously avoid such speculations. The natural conclusion from these mere conjectures is that Phichol is a Philistine name, the derivation and meaning of which are lost to us.

Philadelphia (strictly Philadelphia) (Φιλαδελφις, brotherly love), one of the seven cities of Asia Minor to which the admonitions in the Apocalypse were addressed (Rev. i, 11; ii, 7). The town stood about twenty-five miles south-east from Sardis, in N. lat. 39° 39', E. long. 29° 30', in the plain of Hermus, about midway between the two branches of the river and the termination of Mount Tmolus. It was the second in Lydia (Polyen. v. 2; Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 80), and was built by king Attalus Philadelphia, from whom it took its name. In B.C. 183 the place passed, with the dominion in which it lay, to the Romans. The soil was extremely favorable to the growth of vines, celebrated by Virgil (Geo. iv. 91) for the great wine-producing region, extending for 500 stadia in length by 400 in breadth. Its coins have on them the head of Bacchus or a female Bacchant. Strabo compares the soil with that in the neighborhood of Catana, in Sicily; and modern travellers describe the appearance of the country as resembling a billowy sea of disintegrated lava, with here and there vast trap-dikes protruding. The original population of Philadelphia seems to have been Macedonian, and the national character to have been retained even in the time of Pliny. There was, however, as appears from Rev. iii, 9, a synagogue of Helleneizing Jews there, as well as a Christian Church—"a circumstance to be expected when we recollect that Antiochus the Great introduced into Phrygia 200 families of Jews, bringing them from Babylon and Mesopotamia, for the purpose of counteracting the seditious temper of the Phrygians; and that he gave them lands and provisions, and exempted them from taxes (Josephus, Ant. xii, 3, 4). The locality continued to be subject to constant earthquakes, which, at the time of Strabo, had overcome even the town-walls of Philadelphia useless; but its inhabitants held pertinaciously to the spot, perhaps from the profit which naturally accrued to them from their city being the staple of the great wine-district. The expense of the repairation was constant, and there is not perhaps the poverty of the members of the Christian Church (οἶκος ... ἐν τοιαυτῷ τῷ νόμῳ, Rev. iii, 8), who no doubt were a portion of the urban population, and heavily taxed for public purposes, as well as subject to private loss by the destruction of their own property. Philadelphia was not of sufficient importance in the Roman times to have law-courts of its own, but belonged to a jurisdiction of which Sardis was the centre. It continued to be a place of importance and of strength down to the Byzantine age; and of all the towns in Asia Minor is the smallest. It was taken by Bajazet I in A.D. 1492. Furious at the resistance which he had met with, Bajazet put to death the defenders of the city, and many of the inhabitants besides (see G. Pachym. p. 290; Mich. Duc. p. 70; Chalcond, p. 83.}

Philadelphia still exists as a Turkish town, under the name of Allah-asker, "city of God," i.e. Hightown. The region around is highly volcanic, and, geologically speaking, belongs to the district of Phrygia Catoeacumene, on the western edge of which it lies. The situation of Philadelphia is high, and is especially when viewed from the north-east, for it is principally built on four or five hills, extremely regular in figure, and having the appearance of truncated pyramids. At the back of these, which are all of nearly the same height, rise the 2000 ridges of Ida; and though the country around is barren and desolate, the city itself is wanting neither in wood nor verdure. The climate of Philadelphia is pleasant and healthy. It is elevated 952 feet above the level of the sea, and is open to the salutary breezes from the Catoeacumene — a wild desert tract of highly volcanic country extending as far to the east as Petra. This district is even yet famous for the growth of the vine, which delights in a light sandy soil; and, though incapable of extensive cultivation, has a few fertile soils. Close to Philadelphia the soil is rich in fruits as well as in wine abundant. The Cogamos abounds in fresh-water water, which are considered delicacies, and highly prized accordingly. The revenues of the city depend on its corn, cotton, and tobacco. The cotton grows in small patches about the town; but not used for making cloth. The town itself, although spacious, is presently built and kept, the dwellings being remarkably mean, and the streets exceedingly filthy. Across the summits of the hill behind the town and the small valleys between them runs the town-wall, strengthened by circular and square towers, and forming also an extensive and long quadrangle in the plain below. The ancient walls are partly standing and partly in ruins; but it is easy to trace the circuits which they once enclosed, and within which are to be found innumerable fragments of pillars and other remains of antiquity. The missionaries Fisk and Parsons, in 1822, were informed by the Greek bishop that the town contained 5000 houses, of which he assigned 200 to the rest of the Greeks in the town. On the same authority it is stated that there are five churches in the town, besides twenty others which were too old or too small for use. Six minarets, indicating as many mosques, are seen in the town; and one of these mosques is believed by the natives to be the church in which assembled the primitive Christians addressed in the Apocalypse. There are few ruins; but in one part there are still found four strong marble pillars, which supported the dome of a church. The dome itself has fallen down, but its remains may be observed, and it is seen that the arch was of brick. On the sides of the pillars are inscriptions, and some architectural ornaments in the form of the figures of saints. One solitary pillar of high antiquity has often been noticed as reminding beholders of the remarkable words in the Apocalyptic message to the Philadelphia Church: "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God; and he shall go no more out!" (Rev. iii, 12). It is believed that the Christian inhabitants of Philadelphia are on the increase. The city is the seat of a Greek bishop, and the last incumbent of the see did much to spread among his clergy a desire for theological learning; but education is in a very low state, and Mr. Arundell states that the children had been allowed to tear up some ancient copies of the Gospels. See Smith, Sipt. Ecclesiarmm Asia, p. 138; Arundell, Seven Churches; Richter, Wahrh"afften, p. 518; Schubert, Morgenland, i. 383-387; Missionary Herald, 1821, p. 233; 1839, p. 210-212; Chandler, Travels, p. 810.

It has been supposed by some that Philadelphia occupied the site of another town named Callaetes, of which Herodotus speaks, in his account of Xerxes' march; but the position and fertility of that spot do not correspond. At the same time the Persian king, in his two days' march from Cydara to Sardis, must have passed very near the site of the future Philadelphia (Strabo, iii. c. 6; Herod. vii. 1). See Asia Minor.

Philadelphia, or "the Philadelphia Society," is the name of a sect which was founded in 1693, and claimed to have for its object the advancement of piety and divine philosophy. It originated with Jane Leade (q. v.) and John Pond- er (q. v.). Another of the Philadelphia was the learned physician Francis Lee, who edited the "Theosophical Transactions" of the society. Another eminent member was Dr. Lot Fisher, who caused all the works of Jane Leade and her associates to be translated into Dutch. A fourth principal founder was Thomas Bromley, author of The Sabbath of Rest, and of some works on Biblical subjects. The Philadelphia Society contributed largely to the spread of that mystical piety which is so conspicuous in the works of the good and learned William Law, and which affected in no small degree the early stages of Methodism. Mrs. Leade herself, however, combined much fanaticism with her piety, professing (like Swedenborg in a later generation) to hold intercourse with spirits. This fanaticism imparted itself to many members of the Philadelphia Society, and imaginary apparitions of good and evil angels became for a time a prominent feature of their religious life. In other respects their mysticisms was that of the ordinary character, making the contemplative life the basis of religious knowledge and practice. A small work entitled The Principles of the Philadelphia Society, published in 1697, gives a curious exposition of their mysticisms. See Eberhardt, Kirchenvater, Dogmengesch. iv. 163; Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. vol. iii.; Math. Rev. April, 1665, p. 806; Ilgen, Zeitschr. f. Hist. Theol. 1865, ii, 171; Amer. Presb. Rev. Jan. 1866, p. 51. (J. H. W.)

Philalethes, or lovers of truth, as their name implies, were a sect of infidels which arose at Kiel, in Germany, about 1847, and who wished to ignore Christianity altogether, and to use only the general forms of piety. See rationalists.

Philanthropy (φιλανθρωπία), a term compounded of φίλος, loving, and άνθρωπος, man, signifies the love of mankind. It differs from benevolence only in this—that benevolence extends to every being that has life and sense, and is of course susceptible of extension to any being that has reason and the power of doing good, whereas philanthropy cannot comprehend more than the human race. It differs from friendship, as this affection subsists only between a few individuals, while philanthropy comprehends the whole human species. It is a calm sentiment, which perhaps hardly ever rises to the warmth of affection, and certainly not to the best of passion.

Christian philanthropy is universally admitted to be superior to that of any other ethical or religious system; and if we inquire what are the causes of this superior prominence given to active benevolence in the Christian scheme of ethics, we shall find, as in other instances, that the peculiar character of the ethical fruit depends on the root of religion by which the plant is nourished, and the theological soil in which it was planted. For surely it requires very little thought to perceive that the root of all that surpassing love of the common brotherhood lies in the well-known opening words of the most catholic of prayers—"Our Father, which art in heaven;" the aspect also of sin as a contumacy, and a rebellion, and a guilt, drawing down a curse, necessarily leads to a more aggressive and active sense of achieving deliverance from that curse; but, above all, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and the terrible consequences necessarily involved in the idea... of an eternal banishment from the sunshine of the divine presence, has created an amount of social benevolance and missionary zeal which under any less potent stimulus would have been doomed in his order to our ignorance and desolation. The more neglected and outcast part of humanity present an entirely different aspect to the calm Epicurean and to the zealous Christian. To the Christian the soul of the meanest savage and of the most degraded criminal is still an immortal soul. Christian ethics requires us to love our enemies without betraying our own rights and this will become more and more practicable in the degree that international recognition becomes more common, and a large Christian philanthropy more diffused.

In the history of education philanthropy has ac-squired a special meaning. The influence exercised by Kroussac was not less great on education than on poltics, and was as visible in the pedagogies of Germany and Switzerland as in the men of the French Revolution. It is to the brilliant and one-sided advocacy, by the author of Émile, of a return to nature in social life and in the training of the young, that Basleow owed his novel and enthusiastic educationalism, which he put to the practical test in the institution which was opened under his auspices at Desseau in 1774, and which was called a 'school of the poor'. The same kind were found in different parts of Germany, but the only one which still survives is Salzmann's Institute at Schneepenthal, near Gotha, opened in 1784. These philanthropists are of interest to us because they sought the religious and moral training of the young on an entirely original plan. Until the days of these Philanthropists the Church had had the sole educational care of the rising generation, but these came forward to assume this responsibility, and to treat the child in a peculiar and altogether novel manner. The religious fervor was to be the guide of all of them, and the zeal for any given study, and, instead of influencing the heart, religion became an intellectual acquisition. As philanthropists agreed no less with the absolutism of Russia than with the liberty of Switzerland, so, in the general private devo tional exercises, nothing should be done which would not be approved of by every worshipper of God, whether he were a Christian, Jew, Mohammedan, or a deist.

"In the temple of the Father of all, crowds of dissenting fellow-citizens will worship as brethren, and afterwards they will, with the same fraternal disposition, go, one to bear the holy mass, the other to pray with real brethren, 'Our Father,' the third to pray with real brethren, 'Father of us.' While the former education had viewed the minds of children as vessels into which a certain amount of knowledge and faith was to be infused, whether it was easy or difficult, philanthropism viewed these vessels as the chief thing, and the amount of knowledge as only secondary. In other words, knowledge was regarded merely as a means of training the human mind; and the aim was the natural development of all man's powers and faculties" (Kahni, Hist, of Ger, Prot, p. 472). See the Quart.

Philarches. This word occurs as a proper name in the A. V. at 2 Mac. viii, 32, where it is really the name of an office, phylarch (φύλαρχος = φύλαρχος, "the commander of the cavalry") The Greek text seems to be decisive as to the true rendering; but the Latin version ("et Philarchen qui cum Timotheo erat . . .") might easily give rise to the error, which is very strangely supported by Grimm, ad loc.

Philaret Of Moscow, a modern Russian prelate of much celebrity, was born of pious parents at Kholmogors in 1792. His lay name was Vassilij Drozdov. He received his education in the Greek Seminary of Moscow. He commenced his public career as tutor of the Greek and Latin languages. His oratorical gifts being soon observed, he was appointed preacher in 1806 at the Sergiev monastery of Troitska, and after having removed to St. Petersburg, entered the monastic life, and assumed the name of Philaret. He was the chief archbishop of the Church, which, only the white clergy can enter. In 1810 he was translated to the Academy of Alexander Newrakj as bachelor of theological science; in 1811 he was made archimandrite, and in 1812 became rector of the St. Petersburg Theological Academy. In 1817 he was raised to the bishopric, and was appointed, successively, bishop of Tver, Jaroslav, and Moscow. In the episcopal see of Moscow, to which he was appointed in 1821, he remained until his death, Nov. 19, 1867. As the senor Russian prelate, the eminent orator and professor, the theological justly renowned in the Christian world, the strict supporter of the Church, and the true statesman, Philaret, from his tenderest youth until the last day of his prolonged life, was animated by a burning and constant love for Russia. In the fulfilment of the mission which fell to his lot, he elevated himself by his spirit above the time, and did not allow himself to be captivated by any narrowness of mind. All that knew him know likewise that in the height of his intelligence he considered the relative importance of all the manifestations in the Christian world, whether within or without the Church. Without the establishment of the same Church, the appellation of heretics to such of the Christian dissenters as had come into existence since the ecumenical councils, and consequently had not been condemned by them. He was exempt from fanaticism in his administrations, and yet he knew the limits and measures of that which stood below. His indomitable intellect, sound counsels, and thorough acquaintance with the religious and social life of the people made him the friend of the crowned heads of Russia; and he was by them selected as confidential adviser in all important questions concerning the good of his country. Alexander I even told him who was to be the successor to his throne before the future emperor knew of it. In the late Crimean war his words and sacrificing example revived a patriotic feeling throughout the land; and to him is ascribed the manifesto which led to the abdication of the anti-Christian tsar. For over twenty-five years he was not present at the Holy Synod, yet all important documents concerning spiritual affairs were submitted to him; and his vivid words called out sympathy with the poor co-religionists in the island of heretics (Crete). In 1830 he received from the emperor Alexander I for his oratory. Sermons, lectures, etc., of his have been printed in large numbers and translated into foreign languages. The synodal printing establishment at Moscow alone printed 360 of his compositions, the number of the books of his Metropolitan Philaret was really one of the greatest scholars of his Church. Almost all the now living communicants of the orthodox Russo-Greek Church have learned its doctrines from the Catechism arranged by him. His greatest work is his History of the Russian Church, in which a summary of the history of the Church was brought out in 1872. This history was really the first work of importance in Russian ecclesiastical annals. It was published from 1850 to 1859, and, by order of the Holy Synod, was introduced into the ecclesiastical seminaries (institutions ranking between the ecclesiastical schools and ecclesiastical academies). Within ten years four editions were published. The author divides the history of the Russian Church into five periods: the first with the inroads of the Mongolians in 1237; the second embraces the time of the suzerainty of Russia by the Mongolians 1298 to 1409; the third extends to the establishment of a patriarchate, 1587; the fourth to the abolition of the patriarchate in 1719; the fifth comprises the administration of the Church of the Holy Synod. (The value of the German translation is considerably enhanced by the fact that Philaret's treatise on the "Liturgy of the Russian Orthodox Church" and the "Catechism of the Orthodox Christian Doctrine,

Philaret published, besides this history of the Russian Church, the following works: A System of Christian Doctrine (5 vols., 1807); History of Russia:—Cyril and Methodius, the Apostles of the Slavs;—The Liturgy of the Russian Church before the Invasion of the Mongolians;—A Work on the Church Fathers (3 vols., and an extract from it as a text-book):—A Commentary to the Epistle to the Galatians;—An Outline of the Theological Literature of Russia (3 vols.);—Sermons, Homilies, and Addresses (4 vols.), of which a detailed account is given by Otto in his Russian Literature. Of his personal appearance and kindness of heart Dean Stanley makes mention in his East. Ch. Lectures, p. 926. As a preacher and theologian, Philaret is one of the first men of the present Church of Russia, "whose striking manner renders his sermons impressive even to those who cannot follow the language." Philaret, Theodoros Romannoff, third patriarch of Russia, a near relative by his mother of the last czar of the blood of Rurik, was born in the 16th century. This relationship caused him, in 1599, to be made a摩托 from his last name by his contemporaries. In 1605 to 1615 he held the episcopal chair of Rostov by Dmitri, he was in 1610 sent on an embassy to Poland, where he was retained, against the law of nations, a prisoner for nine years. On his return to Moscow, in 1619, he found his son czar, who appointed him, June 34, of this year, patriarch, and shared with him his sovereignty, so that all the usages were given in their name, and in all solemnities each had a throne, one as high as the other. This interference of the patriarch in political affairs was fatal to Russia. Michael Romanoff had been called to the throne on the express condition of reigning with the consciousness of the chamber of the boyars and of the states-general, which, from 1613 to 1619, had come to be regarded as a legislative assembly. Philaret exiled the most distinguished boyars, and reduced the states-general to a merely consultative relation. Into spiritual affairs he carried the same retrograde spirit. Without caring for the advice of Oriental patriarchs, he ordained, in 1620, that every member of a Christian congregation who should support the Russian religion must be baptized again, a regulation which is still in force. He died at Moscow Oct. 29, 1621. The pastoral epistles here collected were written in the Ancienne Bibliothèque Russe, vol. xvi. Philaster (Philastrius), a noted heresiologist of the ancient Church, flourished in the first quarter of the 4th century. He was probably a native of Italy, and came on the stage of theological activity when the Arian controversy was waxing hot, and he was soon interested in it as a most ardent orthodox presbyter seeking the conversion of strayed sheep of the flock. He travelled far and near, seeking everywhere the conversion of the Arians, both high and low. Thus, e.g., he went to Milan to convince bishop Auxentius, who was one of the leaders of the Arians. He was so well liked by the clergy that he was finally elected bishop of Brescia (Brixia), and as such took part in the Council of Aquileia in 361. He died July 18, 387. Philaster's greatest work is his Liber de haeresibus (in 156 chapters) (edited by Bechler in Abr. Hist. 1787, by Dahlmann, Bibliotheca, vii, 475-521; and ed. by Ehrler in vol. i of his Corpus haresiologic, p. 5-185). There is an affinity of Philaster with Epiphanius, but it is usually accounted for on the ground of the dependence of the former on the latter. This seems to have been the opinion of Augustine (Epistola 222 ad Quodvultdeum). But Lipsius derives both from a common source, viz. the work of Hippolytus against thirty-two heresies, and he refers to the silence of Epiphanius (who mentions Hippolytus only once) by the unscrupulousness of the authorship of the age, which had no hesitation in deckin itself with borrowed plumes. Philaster was very liberal with the name of heresies, and connected it with 156 systems, 29 before Christ, and 128 after. He includes peculiar opinions on all sorts of subjects: "haeresia de stellis celo affixa, heresia de poecato Cain, heresia de Psalterii in-equalitate, heresia de animalibus quatuor in propheticis, heresia de anima in animis, heresia de animis hinc et chisedech accerato, heresia de uxoribus et concubinis Salomonis." Philaster's writings first appeared in print at Basle in 1528, edited by Sichardus; they were reprinted in 1559 at Basle, and at other places. In 1677 they were inserted in the Bibliotheca Patrum Maximus, v. 701 sq. But the best edition is by Fabricius (Hamb. 1721), with a Vita Philastri. See Schröck, Kirchen-gesch. ix, 352-353; Schaff, Ch. Hist. iii, 881 sq.; Alzog, Patrologie, § 63. (J. H. W.)

Philæus of Thumitas, an Eastern prelate, flourished in the 3d century as bishop of Thumitas, in Egypt. He was of noble family, and in his native place filled the highest offices of the State. In 305 he was made bishop of the first church of the episcopal chair of Thumitas, and was prominent in ecclesiastical life. On account of his faith, he was persecuted at Alexandria, and died as a martyr about 307 or 311. He left a work in praise of martyrdom. See Fabricius, Bibl. Graec., vii, 806; Möhler, Patrologie, l, 678 sq.; Routh, Rel. Sac. iii, 881 sq.

Philemon (Φιλήμων, affectionate), a Christian to whom Paul addressed his epistle in behalf of Onesimus. (Col. i. 2). He was a native probably of Colossæ, or, at all events lived in that city when the apostle wrote to him; first, because Onesimus was a Colossian (Col. iv. 9); and, secondly, because Archippus was a Colossian (ver. 17), whom Paul associates with Philemon at the beginning of his letter (Phil. i. 2). Wieseler (Chronologie, p. 452) argues, indeed, from Col. iv. 17, that Archippus was a Laodicene; but the συμφραγισμός in that passage on which the point turns refers evidently to the Colossians (whom Archippus was one therefore), and not to the Church at Laodicea spoken of in the previous verse, as Wieseler inadvertently supposes. Thoelert (Proem. in Epist. ad Phile) states the ancient opinion in saying that Philemon was a citizen of Colossæ, and that his house was pointed out there as late as the 5th century. The legendary history supplies nothing on which we can rely. It is famous that Philemon was a very rich man, and of Colossæ (Constit. Apost. vii, 46), and died as a martyr under Nero. From the title of the fellow-worker (συμφραγισμός) given him in the first verse, some (Michaelis, Einfld., ii, 1274) make him a deacon, but without proof. But, according to Pseudo-Dorotheus, he had been bishop in Gaza (see Witsius, Miscel. Leidens., p. 198 sq.). The Apphia mentioned in the epistle was nearly connected with Philemon, but whether or not she was his wife there are no means of determining (comp. esp. Hofmann, Introd. in Epist. ad Colos, p. 32 sq.; Bertholdt, Einfl. iv, 881 sq.). It is apparent from the letter to him that Philemon was a man of property and influence, since he is represented as the head of a numerous household, and as exercising an expensive liberality towards his friends and the poor in general. He was inducted to the apostle Paul as the medium of his personal participation in the Gospel. All interpreters agree in assigning that significance to συμφραγισμός in Phil. 19. It is not certain under what circumstances they became known to each other. If Paul visited Colossæ when he passed through Phrygia on his second missionary journey (Acts x. 1), it is not unlikely that, and at that time, Philemon heard the Gospel and attached himself to the Christian party. On the contrary, if Paul never visited that city in person, as many critics infer from Col. ii. 1, then the best view is that he was converted during Paul's protracted stay at Ephesus (Acts xix. 10), A.D. 57. That city was the religious capital of Western Asia Minor. The apostle labored there with such success that "all they who dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus." Phrygia was a neighboring province, and among the strangers who repaired to Ephesus, and had an opportunity to hear the preaching of Paul, may have been the Colossian Philemon. It is evident that on becoming a disciple, he gave no common proof of the sincerity and power of his faith. His character, as shadowed forth in the epistle to him, is one of the noblest in the New Testament. Picturizel objects says he has been known to us. He was full of faith and good works, was docile, confiding, grateful, was forgiving, sympathetic, charitable, and a man who on a question of simple justice needed only a hint of his duty to prompt him to go even beyond it (v. 5, N. Y. text). Any one who studies the epistle will perceive that it ascribes to him these varied qualities; it bestows on him a measure of commendation which forms a striking contrast with the ordinary reserve of the sacred writers. It was through such believers that the primitive Christianity evinced its divine origin, and spread so rapidly among the nations. See PHEIL.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO. This is the shortest and (with the exception of Hebrews) the last of Paul's letters as arranged in most editions of the N. T. In the following treatment of it we combine the Scriptural statements with modern researches.

I. Authorship.—That this epistle was written by the apostle Paul is the constant tradition of the ancient Church. It is expressly cited as such by Origen (Homil. 19 in Jerem. i. 185, ed. Huet.); it is referred to as such by Tertullian (Nov. Marv. v. 21); and both Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25) and Jerome (Procem. in Ep. ad Philem. 442) attest its universal reception as such in the Christian world. The latter, indeed, informs us that some of his day deemed it unworthy of a place in the canon, in consequence of its being occupied with subjects which, in their estimation, it did not become an apostle to write about, save as a mere private individual; but this he, at the same time, shows to be a mistake, and repudiates the legitimacy of such a standard for estimating the genuineness or authority of any book. That this epistle should not have been quoted by several of the fathers who have quoted largely from the other Pauline epistles (e.g. Ireneaus, Clement of Alexandria, and Cyprian), may be accounted for partly by the brevity of the epistle, and partly by their not having occasion to refer to the subject of which it treats. We need not urge the existence of Ignatius, Chad, etc., in evidence of that apostolic father's knowledge and use of the epistle; though it is difficult to regard the similarity between them and the language in v. 20 as altogether accidental (see Kirchhofer, Quellenmanual, p. 285). The Canon of Muratori, which commences from the 2d century (Credner, Geschichte des Kanons, p. 66), enumerates this as one of Paul's epistles. Tertullian says that Marcion admitted it into his collection. Sinope, in Pontus, the birthplace of Marcion, was not far from Colossae where Philemon lived, and the letter would find its way to the neighboring cities at an early period. It is so well attested historically, that, as De Wette says (Eisdireitung ins Neue Testament), its genuineness on that ground is beyond doubt.

Nor does the epistle itself offer anything to conflict with the above view. In the most cursory glance it appears a composition more strongly marked within the same limits by those unstudied asonances of thought, sentiment, and expression, which indicate an author's hand, than this short epistle as compared with Paul's other productions. There are two coincidences between this epistle and that to the Colossians with great force, as evincing the authenticity of both (Hora Paulina, c. 14); and Eichhorn has ingeniously shown how a person attempting, with the Epistle to the Colossians before him, to forge such an epistle as this in the name of Paul, would have had to undertake a very different arrangement of the historical circumstances and persons from what we find in the epistle which is extant (Eisdireitung ins N. T. iii. 302).

Baur (Paulus, p. 475) would divest the epistle of its historical character, and make it the personified illustration from some later writer of the idea that Christianity unites and equalizes in a higher sense those whom outward circumstances have separated. He does not impugn the external evidence. But, not to leave his theory wholly unsupported, he suggests some links in the Pictorial object which have been now cast off in what must be pronounced unfounded and frivolous. He finds, for example, certain words in the epistle which are alleged to be not Pauline; but, to justify that assertion, he must deny the genuineness of such other letters of Paul as happen to contain these words. He admits that the apostle could not have written the epistle thrice, but thinks it suspicious that he should say it three times. A few terms he adduces which are not used elsewhere in the epistles; but to argue from these that they disprove the apostolic origin of the epistle is to assume, in the first place, that having produced two or three compositions, must for the future confine himself to an unvarying circle of words, whatever may be the subject he discusses, or whatever the interval of time between his different writings. The arbitrary and purely subjective character of such criticisms can have no weight against the varied testimony admitted as decisive by Christian scholars for so many ages, upon which the canonical authority of the Epistle to Philemon is founded. They are worth repeating only as illustrating Baur's own remark that modern criticism increasing this particular book runs a greater risk of exposing itself to the impugnation of an excessive distrust, a morbid sensibility to doubt and denial, than in questioning the claims of any other epistle ascribed to Paul. See PAUL.

II. Person Addressed.—The epistle is inscribed to Philemon; and with him are joined Apphia (probably his wife), Archippus (his son or brother), and the Church which is in their house, though throughout the epistle it is Philemon alone who is addressed. Philemon was a personal friend and apparently a convert of the apostle (ver. 19, 18); one who had trusted himself for the cause of the Gospel and the comfort of those who had embraced it (ver. 2-7). His residence was probably at Colossae (comp. Col. iv. 9, 17); but whether he held any office in the Church there remains uncertain. In the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46) he is said to have been ordained as bishop. The commission of this epistle has been maintained as having been given by any other testimony, and is expressly denied by the author of the commentary on St. Paul's epistles ascribed to Hilary. See PHILEMON.

Wieseler is of opinion that Philemon was a Laodicean; and that this epistle was as mentioned (Col. iv. 16) as sent by the apostle to the Church in Laodicea. His ground for this is that the epistle is addressed to Archippus as well as Philemon, and he assumes that Archippus was bishop of the Church at Laodicea; partly on the authority of Theodore, who says he resided at Laodicea; partly on that of the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46), which say he was bishop of the Church there; and partly on the connection in which the reference to him in Col. iv. 17 stands with the reference to the Church at Laodicea, and the injunction given to the Colossians to convey a certain case to Philemon. It seems possible that the epistle was written to Philemon because of his office, which it is argued would have been sent to himself had he been at Colossae. But the authorities cited have no weight in a matter of this sort; nor can the mere juxtaposition of the reference to Archippus with the reference to the Church at Laodicea affect the matter any more than the reference to the residence of the former; and as for the injunction to counsel Archippus, it is more likely that it would be given by the apostle in a letter to the Church to which he belonged than to another Church. On the other hand, supposing Philenom to have been at Laodi dica, it is not credible that the apostle would have reques ted the Colossians to send to Laodicea for a letter addressed so exclusively to him personally, and relating to matters in which they had no immediate interest, without at least giving Philenom some hint that he intended the letter to be so used. The letter to the Church at Laodicea was doubtless one of more general character and interest than this. See LABOCHRAX.

III. Time and Place of Writing.—This is generally held to be one of the letters (the others are Ephesians, Colossians, Philemon, Colossians, which can be written during his first captivity at Rome. The arguments which show that he wrote the Epistle to the Colossians in that city and at that period involve the same conclusion in regard to this; for it is evident from Col. iv. 7, 9, as compared with the contents of this epistle, that Paul wrote the two letters at the same time, and forwarded them to their destination by the hands of Tychicus and Onesimus, who accompanied each other to Colossae.

A few modern critics, as Schulp, Schott, Böttger, Meyer, maintain that this letter and the others assigned usually to Paul were written during the latter years of his stay in Rome during the last two years that Paul was imprisoned at Cæsarea (Acts xxiii. 85; xxiv. 27). But this opinion, though supported by some plausible arguments, can be demonstrated with reasonable certainty to be incorrect. See COLLOSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

The time when Paul wrote may be fixed with much precision. The apostle at the close of the letter expresses a hope of his speedy liberation. He speaks in like manner of his approaching deliverance in his Epis tle to the Philippian (ii, 23, 24), which was written during the same interval of time previously referred to, and that he had good reasons for such an expectation, and that he was not disappointed in the result, we may con tinue that this letter was written by him early in the year A.D. 58.

IV. Design and Effect.—Our knowledge respecting the occasion and object of the letter we must derive from declarations or inferences furnished by the letter itself. For the relation of Philenom and Onesimus to each other, the reader will see the articles on those names. Paul, so intimately connected with the master and the servant, was anxious naturally to effect a reconciliation between them. He wished also (waiving the δινηκος, the matter of duty or right) to give Philenom an opportu nity of manifesting his Christian love in the treatment of Onesimus, and his regard, at the same time, for the personal convenience and wishes, not to say official author ty, of the master. He includes what he had in his confidence with Onesimus (δαιμενος, in ver. 12) to induce him to return to Colossae, and place himself again at the disposal of his master. Whether Onesimus as tented merely to the proposal of the apostle, or had a desire at the same time to revisit his former home, the epistle does not enable us to determine. On his depart ture Paul put into his hand this letter as evidence that Onesimus was a true and approved disciple of Christ, and entitled as such to be received, not as a servant, but above a servant, as a brother in the faith, as the repre sentative and equal in that respect of the apostle himself, and worthy of the same consideration and love. It is instructive to observe how entirely Paul identifies himself with Onesimus, and pleads his cause as if it were his own. He intercedes for him as his own child, prayerfully and earnestly; would be angry, demanding, and for him not only a remission of all penalties, but the re ception of sympathy, affection, Christian brotherhood; and, while he solicits these favors for another, consents to receive them with the same gratitude and sense of obligation as if they were bestowed on himself. See ONESIMUS.

The result of the appeal cannot be doubted. It may be assumed from the character of Philenom that the servedly admired as a model of delicacy and skill in the department of composition to which it belongs. The writer had given to it the common friend of the parties at variance. He must conciliate a man who supposed that he had good reason to be offended. He must commend the offender, and yet neither deny nor aggravate the imputed fault. He must assert the new ideas of Christian equality in the face of a system which hardly recognised the humanity of the enslaved. He could have placed the question on the ground of his own personal rights, and yet must waive them in order to secure an act of spontaneous kindness. His suitors (not meekly, but with love, and nothing be demanded for the sake of the justice which could have claimed everything. He limits his request to a forgiveness of the alleged wrong, and a restoration to favor and the enjoyment of future sympathy and affection, and yet would so guard his words as to leave scope for all the generosity which benevolence might prompt towards one whose condition admitted of so much alleviation. These are contrivances not easy to harmonize; but Paul, it is confessed, has shown a degree of self-denial and a tact in dealing with them which, in being equal to their evil, is greater. This, says Eichhorn, is a voucher for the apostle's urbanity, politeness, and knowledge of the world. His advocacy of Onesimus is of the most insinuating and persuasive character, and yet without the slightest perversion or concealment of any fact. The errors of Onesimus are admitted as he was thought to be, and just indication of his master against him should be roused anew; but they are alluded to in the most admirable manner: the good side of Onesimus is brought to view, but in such a way as to facilitate the friendly reception of him by his master, as a consequence of Christianitiy, to which he had, during his absence, been converted; and his future fidelity is vouched for by the noble principles of Christianity to which he had been converted. The apostle addresses Philemon on the softest side: who would willingly refuse to an aged, a suffering, and an unjustly imprisoned friend a request! And such was he who thus pleaded for Onesimus. The person recommended is a Christian, a dear friend of the apostle's, and one who had personally served him: if Philemon will receive him kindly, it will afford the apostle a proof of his love, and yield him joy. What need, then, for laying the cause of the apostle to Philemon will, of his own accord, do even more than he is asked. More cogently and more courteously no man could plead (Eiiinlrit. ii. N. T. iii. 300).

This is a letter extant of the younger Pliny (Epist. ix. 21) which he wrote to a friend whose servant had deserted him, in which he intercedes for the fugitive, who was anxious to return to his master, but dreaded the effects of his anger. Thus the occasion of the correspondence was similar to that between the apostle and Philemon. It has happened to be preserved to compare the celebrated letter with that of Paul in behalf of Onesimus; and as the result they hesitate not to say that, not only in the spirit of Christian love, of which Pliny was ignorant, but in dignity of thought, argument, pathos, beauty of style, eloquence, the communication of the apostle is vastly superior to that of the polished Roman writer.

Phile'rus (Φίλερος, beloved), an apostate Christian, possibly a disciple of Hymenæus, with whom he is associated in 2 Tim. ii. 17, and who is named without him in an earlier epistle (1 Tim. i. 90). A.D. 58-64, Waterland (Importance of the Doctrine of the Holy Trinity, ch. iv, in his Works, iii. 459) confines in a few lines the substance of many dissertations which have been written concerning their opinions, and the sentence which they have upon at least one of them. "They appear to have been persons who believed the Scriptures of the O. T., but misinterpreted them, allegorizing away the doctrine of the resurrection, and resolving it all into figure and metaphor. The delivering over unto Satan seems to have been a form of excommunication declaring the person reduced to the state of a heathen; and in the apostolical age it was accompanied with supernatural or miraculous effects upon the bodies of the persons so delivered." Walsh is of opinion that they were of Jewish origin; Hammond connects them with the Gnostics; Vitringa (with less probability) with the Sadducees. They understood the resurrection to signify the knowledge and profession of the Christian religion, or regeneration and conversion, according to Walsh, whose dissertation, De Hymenaeo et Phileto, in his Miscellanea Sacra, 1744, p. 81-121, seems to exhaust the subject. Among writers who preceded him may be named Vitringa, Observ. Sacr. iv, p. 922-930; Buddæus, Ecclesia Apostolica, v, 297-305. See also, on the heresy, Burton, Hampton Lectures, and dean Elliott's notes on the pastoral epistles; and Potter on Church Government, ch. iii, v, with reference to the sentence. The names of Philebus and Hymenæus occur separately among those of Cæsar's household whose relics have been found in the Columbaria at Rome. See Hymenæus.

Phil'ipp (Φίλιππος, lover of horses), the name of several men mentioned in the Apocalypse and Josephus. Those named in the N. T. will be noticed separately below.

1. The father of Alexander the Great (1 Mac. i, vi, 2), king of Macedonia, B.C. 359-336. See AskLExANDER (the Great).

2. A Phrygian, left by Antiochus Epiphanes as governor at Jerusalem (B.C. cir. 170), where he behaved with great cruelty (2 Mac. v. 25), and was finally expelled. The Jews in caves (2 Mac. vii. 1), and the taking of the earliest measures to check the growing power of Judas Maccabæus (viii. 8). He is commonly (but it would seem incorrectly) identified with,
3. The foster-brother (εἰκέρωσκος, ix, 29) of Antonius Epiphanes, whom the king upon his death-bed appointed regent of Syria and guardian of his son Antonius V, to the exclusion of Lyssias (B.C. 164; 1 Mac. vi, 14, 15, 55). He returned with the royal forces from Persia (vi, 35) and assumed the government, and occupied Antioch. But Lyssias, who was at the time besieging the "Sanctuary" at Jerusalem, hastily made terms with Judas, and marched against him. Lyssias stormed Antioch, and, according to Josephus (Ant, xii, 5, 7), put Philip to death. In 2 Mac. Philip is said to have fled to Brut. Philometor on the death of Antiochus (2 Mac. ix, 29), though the book contains traces of the other account (xiii, 23). See ANTONIUS (Epiphanes).

4. Philip V, king of Macedonia, B.C. 220-173. His wide and successful endeavors to strengthen and enlarge the Macedonian dominion brought him into conflict with the Romans when they were engaged in the critical war with Carthage. Desultory warfare followed by hollow peace lasted till the victory of Zama left the Romans free for more vigorous measures. Meanwhile Philip had consolidated his power, though he had degenerated into an unscrupulous tyrant. The first campaigns of the Romans on the declaration of war (B.C. 200) were not attended by any decisive result, but the arrival of Flamininus (B.C. 198) changed the aspect of affairs. Philip was driven from his commanding position, and made unsuccessful overtures for peace. In the next year he lost the fatal battle of Cynoscephalae, and was obliged to accede to the terms dictated by his conquerors. The remainder of his life was spent in vain endeavors to regain some of his former power, and was embittered by cruelty and remorse.

In 1 Mac. viii, 5 the defeat of Philip is coupled with that of Perseus as one of the noblest triumphs of the Romans, and defeated them. In 247 Philip was again consul, with his son of the same name as himself, and their consularship was continued to the following year, when Philip celebrated with great splendor the thousandth anniversary of the building of Rome. An immense number of war and peace were brought forth and set in order in the amphitheatre and circus. In the next year, under the consuls of Eumelians and Aquilinus, a revolt broke out among the legions on the Danube, who proclaimed emperor a centurion named Carvillus Marinus, whom, however, the soldiers killed shortly after. Philip, alarmed at the state of these provinces, sent his brother Decius as commander, but Decius had no sooner arrived at his post than the soldiers proclaimed him emperor. Philip marched against Decius, leaving his son at Rome. The two armies met near Verona, where Philip was defeated and killed, as some say by his own troops. On the news reaching Rome, the pantotropians killed his son also, and Decius was acknowledged emperor in 249.

Eutropius states that both Philises, father and son, were numbered among the gods. It is doubtful whether Philip was really a Christian, but it seems certain, as stated by Eusebius and Dionysius of Alexandria, that under his reign the Christians enjoyed full toleration, and were allowed to preach publicly. Gregory of Nyssa states that during that period all the inhabitants of Neo-Caesarea, in Pontus, embraced Christianity, overthrew the idols, and raised shrines to the God of the Christians. It appears that Philip during his five years' reign governed with mildness and justice, and was generally popular.
PHILIP THE APOSTLE

otic Gospels, his name is as uniformly at the head of the second group of four as the name of Peter is at that of James (see Matt. xvi, 17), and the facts recorded by John give the reason of this priority. In those lists again we find his name uniformly coupled with that of Bartholomew, and this has led to the hypothesis that the latter is identical with the Nathanael of John i, 45, the one being the personal name, the other, like Barjona or Bartheus, a patronymic. Donaldson (Jasbar, p. 9) looks on the two as brothers, but the precise mention of τοῦ ἰδοὺ διδάσκοντος τοὺς εκ τοῦ, and its omission here, is, as Alford remarks (on Matt. x, 8), against this hypothesis.

He was one among the first company of disciples who were with the Lord at the commencement of his ministry, at the marriage of Cana, on his first appearance as a prophet in Jerusalem (John ii). When John was cast into prison, and the word of declaring the glad tidings of the kingdom required a new company of preachers, we may believe that he, like his companions and friends, received a new call to a more constant discipleship (Matt. iv, 18-22). When the Twelve were specially set apart to their office, he was numbered among them. The first three Gospels tell us nothing more of him; most of his actions with his characteristic fulness of personal reminiscences, records a few significant utterances. The earnest, simple-hearted faith which showed itself in his first conversion, required, it would seem, an education; one stage of this may be traced, according to Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii, 26), in the history of Matt. viii, 21. That Church father assumes that Philip was the disciple who urged the plea, "Suffer me first to go and bury my father," and who was reminded of a higher duty by the command, "Let the dead bury their dead; follow thou me." When the Galilean crowds had halted on their way to Jerusalem to hear the preaching of Jesus (John vi, 5-9), and were faint with hunger, it was to Philip that the question was put, "Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat?" "And this he said," John adds, "to prove him, for he himself knew what he would do." The answer, "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them that every one may take a little," shows how little he was prepared for the work of divine power that followed. It is noticeable that here, as in John i, he appears in close connection with Andrew. Bengel and others suppose that this was because the charge of providing food had been committed to Philip, while Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia rather suppose it was because this apostle was weak in faith.

Another incident is brought before us in John xii, 24, when Philipweek before the passion the Passover at Jerusalem was some Gentile proselytes (Hellenes) who had heard of Jesus, and desired to see him. The Greek name of Philip may have attracted them. The zealous love which he had shown in the case of Nathanael may have made him prompt to offer himself as their guide. He brings them to Jesus, and they do not take him at once to the presence of his Master. "Philip cometh and telleth Andrew, and again Andrew and Philip tell Jesus." The friend and fellow-townswoman to whom probably he owed his own introduction to Jesus of Nazareth is to introduce these strangers also.

There is a connection not difficult to be traced between this fact and that which follows on the last recurrence of Philip's name in the history of the Gospels. The desire to see Jesus gave occasion to the utterance of words expressive of the depth of his faith. He did not seize on the presence of his Father with him, in the voice from heaven which manifested the Father's will (ver. 28). The words appear to have sunk into the heart of at least one of the disciples, and he brooded over them. The teaching of this day enlightened this disciple, and his faith led him to feel that one thing was yet wanting. They heard their Lord speak of his Father and their Father. He was going to his Father's house. They were to follow him there. But why should they not have even now a vision of the divine glory? It was part of the childlike simplicity of his nature that no reserve should hinder the expression of the expression of the desire, "Lord, show us the Father, and it shall be ours" (xiv, 8). And the answer to that desire belonged also specially to him. He had all along been eager to lead others to see Jesus. He had been with him, looking on him from the very commencement of his ministry, and yet he had not known him. He had thought of the glory of the Father as consisting in something else than the Truth, Righteousness, Love that he had witnessed in the Son. "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me?" (John xiv, 9) He has not seen the Father; and how sayest thou, then, Show us the Father?" (John xiv, 9). No other fact connected with Philip is recorded in the Gospels.

The close relation in which we have seen him standing to the sons of Zebedee and Nathanael might lead us to think of him as one of the twelve chief fishermen of Tiberias who see Jesus in the Ascension (Acts i, 13) and on the day of Pentecost.

2. Traditions and Notices. Besides the above all is uncertain and apocryphal. Philip is mentioned by Clement of Alexandria as having had a wife and children, and as having sanctioned the marriage of his daughters instead of binding them to vows of chastity (Strom. iii, 52; Euseb. H. E. iii, 80); and he is included in the list of those who had borne witness of Christ in their lives, but had not died what was commonly looked on as a martyr's death (Strom. iv, 78). There is nothing improbable in the statement that he preached the Gospel in Phrygia (Theodoret, in Pau. cxvi; Niceph. H. E. ii, 31); Polykrate in (Euseb. H. E. ii, 31), bishop of Ephesus, speaks of him as having lived aseep in the Phrygian Hierapolis, as having had two daughters who had grown old unmarried, and a third, with special gifts of inspiration (καὶ Αἰγίν Πολυκράτεις τοῦ Ἐφησοῦ), who had died at Ephesus. There seems, however, in this mention of the daughters of Philip, to be some confusion between the apostle and the evangelist. Eusebius in the same chapter quotes a passage from Caius, in which the four daughters of Philip, prophetesses, are mentioned as living with their father at Hierapolis, and as buried there with him; and the same passage is connected with Acts xxvi, 8, as if they referred to one and the same person. Polykrate in like manner refers to him in the Easter Controversy, as an authority for the Quattordiceman practice (Euseb. H. E. v, 24). It is noticeable that even Augustine, in Strom. 368, who had declared Philip uncertain as to the direction of the two Philip, Epiphanius (xxvi, 18) mentions a Gospel of Philip as in use among the Gnostics. See Gospels, Sperchius. The apocryphal "Acta Philippi" are utterly wild and fantastic, and if there is any grain of truth in them, it is probably the bare fact that the apostle, a confessor, was laboring in Phrygia, and died at Hierapolis. He arrives in that city with his sister Mariamne and his friend Bartholomew. The wife of the proconsul is converted. The people are drawn away from the worship of a great serpent. The priests and the proconsul seize on the apostles and put them to the torture. John suddenly appears with words of counsel and encouragement. Philip, in Spite of the warning of the Apostle of Love reminding him that he should return good for evil, curses the city, and the earth opens and swallows it up. Then he is taken up for ever and removed from the sight of the vindictive anger, and those who had descended to the abyss are raised out of it again. The tortures which Philip had suffered ended in his death, but, as a punishment for his offence, he is to remain for forty days excluded from Paradise. The light of this light, which was shed up on the spot where his blood had fallen, and the juice of the grapes is used for the Eucharistic cup (Tischendorf, Acta Apostolica, p. 75-94). The book which contains this narrative is apparently only the last chapter of a larger history, and it fixes the journey and the death as after the eighth year of Trajan. It is uncertain whether the other apocryphal fragment professing to give an account of his labors in Greece is part of the same work, or has been in his possession. He is described as having the Gospels in his hands, and as wearing a sacerdotal vestment. He lives in Athens clothed, like the other apostles, as Christ had commanded, in an outer cloak and a linen tunic. Three hundred philosophers dispute with him. They find themselves baffled, and send for assistance to Asia, the high-priest at Jerusalem. He puts on his pontifical robe, and goes to Athens at the head of seven hundred warriors. They attempt to seize on the apostle, and are all smitten with blindness. The heavens open; the form of the Son of Man appears, and all the idols of Athens fall to the ground; and so on through a succession of marvels, ending with his remaining two years in the city, establishing a Church there, and then going to preach the Gospel in Parthis (ibid. p. 95-104).

Another tradition represents Scythia as the scene of his labors (Abian, Hist. Apost. in Fabricius, Cod. Apoc. N. T. i. 789), and throws the guilt of his death upon the Jews (John iv.). It falls between the two days which had witnessed the presence there of Christ and his disciples (ver. 40), even perhaps the craving for spiritual powers which had been roused by the strange influence of Simon the Sorcerer. The scene which brings the two into contact with each other, in which the magician has to acknowledge a power over nature greater than his own, is interesting rather as belonging to the life of the heresarch than to that of the evangelist. See Simon Magus. It suggests the inquiry whether we can trace through the distortions and corruptions of the Apocryphal and the pseudo-apocryphal traditions, the influence of that phase of Christian truth which was likely to be presented by the preaching of the Hellenistic evangelist.

This step is followed by another. He is directed by an angel to take the road that led down from Jerusalem to Gaza on the way to Egypt. See Gaza. A chariot passes by in which there is a man of another race, whose complexion or whose dress showed him to be a native of Ethiopia. From the time of Psammetichus there had been a large body of Jews settled in that region, and the eunuch or chamberlain at the court of Candace might easily have come across them and their sacred books, might have embraced their faith, and become by circumcision a proselyte of righteousness. He had been on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. He may have inquired of his slave what he had heard there. The narrative which follows is interesting as one of the few records in the N. T. of the process of individual conversion, and one which we may believe Luke obtained, during his residence at Cesarea, from the evangelist himself. The devout proselyte reciting the prophecy which he does not understand—the evangelist-preacher running at full speed till he overtakes the chariot—the abrupt question—the simple-hearted answer—the unfolding, from the starting-point of the prophecy, of the gradations of the glad tidings of Jesus—the craving for the means of admission to the blessings of the Messias, and what he was, at any rate, well reported of as full of the Holy Ghost, and wisdom, work of teaching instead of entering on the life of home (xxi, 6, 9). He is visited by the prophets and elders of Jerusalem. At such a place as Cesarea the work of such a man must have helped to bridge over the everwidening gap which threatened to separate the Jewish and the Gentile churches. One who had preached Christ to the hated Samaritan, the swarthy African, the despised Philistine, the men of all nations; who passed through the seaport of Palestine, might well welcome the arrival of the apostle of the Gentiles. A.D. 55.

The traditions in which the evangelist and the apostle who bore the same name are more or less confounded have been given under PHILIP THE APOSTLE. According to another, relating more distinctly to him, he died bishop of Tralles (Acta Sanct., June 6). The house in which he and his daughters had lived was pointed out to travellers in the time of Jerome (Epist. Paules, § 8). (Comp. Ewald, Geschichte, vi, 175, 206—214; Baumgarten, Apostelgeschichte, § 15, 16.) The later martyrologies, on the contrary, make him end his days in Cesarea (Acta Sanct., June 6).

Philippus Hieron (Φίλιππος Ἴηρών), a son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, the daughter of Simon the high-priest. He was the first priest of Herodias, who was taken to Rome by his brother Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv, 3; Mark, vi, 17; Luke iii, 19). A.D. 25. Having been disinherited by his father, Philip appears to have lived a private life. He is called Herod by Josephus (Ant. xvii, 1, 2; 4; xviii, 5, 1; War, i, 26, 4; 30, 7). See Hieron.

Philippus the Tetarch (Φίλιππος ὁ τετάρχης), governor of Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis (Luke iii, 1); the second to appear to have been regarded by Luke as included in Ituraea. Philip was the son of Herod the Great by his wife Cleopatra, and own brother of Herod Antipas; at his death his tetrarchy was annexed to Syria. From him the city Cesarea Philipi took its name (John xxi, 14). Philip’s death is recorded in Matt. xvi, 4; Mark vi, 15; Luke i, 5; War, i, 26, 4; ii, 6, 3). Philip ruled from B.C. 4 to A.D. 54. See Hieron.

Philip (St.) Benozzi (San Filippo Benatti, or Besizzi) stands at the head of the Order of the Servi, or Serviti, at Florence. He was not the founder of the order, having joined it fifteen years after its establishment, but he is its principal saint. See Serviti.

Philip of Cesarea is a pseudo-name of one Theophilus of Cesarea, who flourished in the second half of the 2d century, and kept the account of the council held in the city after which he is named in A.D. 166. See Théophile.

Philip of Coptic, a Christian writer of the 2d century, flourished as bishop of the Church at Gortyna, in Crete, and was spoken of in the highest terms by Dionysius of Corinth in a letter to the Church at Gortyna and the other churches in Crete (apud Euseb., Hist. Eccles. iv, 25), as having inspired his flock with manly courage, apparently during the persecutions of Marcus Aurelius. Philip wrote a book against Marcion (q. v.), which was highly esteemed by the ancients, but is now lost; Thlithemi speaks of it as extant in his day, but his exactness as to whether books were in existence or not is not great. He also states that Philip wrote "Ad Diocres Epistolas" and "Variae Tractatus," but these are not mentioned by the ancients. See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iv, 21, 23, 25; Jerome, De Viris Illustr. c. 90; Thlithemi, De Scriptor. Eccles. c. 19; Cave, Hist. Lat. ad ann. 172 (ed. Oxford, 1740—1748), i, 74; Lardner, Works (see Index).—Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. s. v.

Philip of Moscow, a Russian prelate of much distinction, flourished in the second half of the 16th century. Of his early history we know scarcely anything. He held several of the most important ecclesiastical trusts of Russia to the satisfaction of both clergy and government, and was finally, during the reign of Ivan the Terrible, made guardian of the Russian Church. Philip soon came into collision with his royal master because of the personal cruelties in which the czar indulged, and for his honesty of purpose and frankness of declaration, Philip suffered martyrdom. "It is a true history of the Russian Church, and an account of the hierarchy of all churches, that its one martyred prince should have suffered, not for any high ecclesiastical pretensions, but in the simple cause of justice and mercy. 'Silence,' he said, as he rebuked the czar, 'lays sin upon the soul, and brings death to the whole people. . . . I am a stranger and a pilgrim upon earth, as all my fathers were, and I am ready to suffer for the truth. Where would my faith be if I kept silence? . . . Here we are offering up the bloodless sacrifice to the Lord; behind the altar flows the innocent blood of Christian men.' As he was about to be led to the place of execution, one word was 'Pray.' As he received his executioner in the narrow cell of his prison in the convent of Luer, he only said, 'Perform thy mission.'" See Stanley, Hist. of the Eastern Church, p. 487. (J. H. W.)

Philip (St.) of Nerei. See Nerei, Filippo.

Philip of Opod. Suidas (α. Φίλιππος) has this remarkable passage: "—, a philosopher who divided the Leges (α. De Legibus) of Plato into twelve books (for he is said to have added the thirteenth himself), and was a hearer of Socrates and of Plato himself; devoted himself to the contemplation of the heavens (φιλόσοφος της μεταφυσικής). He lived in the days of Philip of Macedon. Suidas then gives a long list of works written by Philip. It is evident that the passage as it stands in Suidas is imperfect, and that the name of the author of the numerous works which he mentions has been lost from the commencement of the passage. It appears, however, from the extract occupying its proper place in the Lexicon according to its present heading, that the defect existed in the source from which Suidas borrowed. Kuster, the editor of Suidas (not in loc.), after long investigation, was enabled to supply the omission by comparing a passage in Diogenes Laertius (iii, 87), and to identify the "philosopher" of Suidas with a Sphilippus of the Locricn town of Opus, near the channel which separates Eubea from the mainland. The passage in Laertius is as follows: "Some say that Philip the Ommian transcribed his (Plato's) work, De Legibus, which was written in wax (i.e. on wooden tablets covered with a coat of wax). They say also that the ' ἐν διαδικασία (the thirteenth book of the De Legibus) is his," i.e. Philip's. The Epinomis, whether written by Philip or by Plato, is usually included among the works of the latter. Diogenes Laertius elsewhere (iii, 46) enumerates the disciples of Plato. See Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. i, 106.

Philip the Presbyter, an Eastern ecclesiastical of the 5th century, was, according to Gennadius (De Viris Illustrib. c. 62), a disciple of Jerome, and died in the reign of Marcian and Avitus over the Eastern and Western empires respectively, i.e. A.D. 446. Philip wrote, 1. Commentaries in Jobum; 2. Epistola, of which Gennadius, who had read them, speaks highly. These Epistola have perished; but a Commentarius in Jobum addressed to Nectarius has been several times printed, sometimes separately under the name of Philip (Basil, 1527, two editions) and sometimes together with other Epistles under the name and among the works of the Veniable Bede and of Jerome. Vallarsi and the Benedictine editors of Jerome give the Commentarius in their editions of that father (v, 478, etc., ed. Benedict.; vol. xi, col. 565, etc., ed. Vallarsi), but not as his. The Prologo or Præfatio ad Nectarium are omitted, and the text differs very widely from that given in the Cologne edition of Bede (1612, fol. 447, etc.), in which the work is given as Bede's, without any intimation of its doubtfull authorship. Cave, Oudin, and Vallarsi agree in accreditating the work to Philip, but Vallarsi is not so decided in his opinion as the other two. See Genadinius, l.c., Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 440 i. 484; Oudin, De Script. Ecles. vol. i, col. 1165; Vallarsi, Opera Hieron. vol. ii, cols. 825; etc.; vol. xi, col. 565; Fabrizzii, Biblioth. Med. et Inflan. Lat. viii. 295, ed. Mansi.

Philip of Side (ὁ Σίδηρος, or ὁ Σίδηρης, or ὁ ὅριον Σίδηρος), a Christian writer of the first half of the 5th century, was born probably in the latter part of the 4th century. He was a native of Side, in Pamphylia, and according to his own account in the fragment published by Dodwell (see below), when Rhodon, who succeeded Didymus in charge of the catechetical school of Alexandria, transferred that school to Side, Philip became one of his pupils. If we suppose Didymus to have retained the charge of the school till his death, A.D. 396, at the advanced age of eighty-six, the removal of the school cannot have taken place long before the close of the century, and we may infer that Philip's birth could scarcely have been earlier than A.D. 380. He was a teacher of Side, a historiographer, who was tutor to Socrates the ecclesiastical historian, and was indeed so eminent that Philip regarded his relationship to him as a subject of exultation (Socrates, Hist. Ecles. vii. 27). Having entered the Church, he was ordained deacon, and had much intercourse with Chrysostom; and in the titles of some MSS. he is styled his Syneculus, or personal attendant, which makes it probable that he was, from the early part of his ecclesiastical career, connected with the Church at Constantinople. Liberatus (Breviar. c. 7) says he was ordained deacon by Chrysostom, and in a letter, written in the time of his intimacy with that eminent man, does not say he was ordained by him. Philip devoted himself to literary pursuits, and collected a large library. He cultivated the Asiatic or diffuse style of composition, and became a voluminous writer. At what period of his life his different works were produced is not known. His Ecclesiastical History was, as we shall see, written after his disappointment in obtaining the patriarchate; but as his being a candidate for that high office seems to imply some previous celebrity, it may be inferred that his work belongs to the period of Julian's attacks on Christianity; a work which is omitted from Bede's chronicle. Socrates (Hist. Ecles. vii. 40) tells us that the work was finished before the emperor's death of A.D. 382.

One of these, De Schola Catechetica Alex- andrina Successione, on the succession of teachers in the catechetical school of Alexandria, was published from a MS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, by Dodwell, with his Disquisitiones in Irenum (Oxf. 1689, 8vo), and has been repeatedly reprinted. It is given in the ninth volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, p. 401. Another fragment in the same MS., De Constantino Max- timo, is to be found in the Littera Augustae, printed for publication by Cruysius, but has never, we believe, been actually published. The third fragment, Τά γεύμαμα ἐν Πισίδι Μητροπόλις Χρυσανθίων Εὐλαμπίων καὶ Ιωάννου, is to be found in the Acta Disputationum de Christo, in Pars et inter Christianos, Gentiles, et Judaeos habiuit, (or was) in the Imperial Library at Vienna. Philip was present at the disputa-

Philippus the Solitary, a Greek monk, flourished in the time of the emperor Alexius I. Comnenus. Nothing further seems to be known than what is gathered from the indications of his extant works. He wrote, Diótoros, Dióspros, Ammasia Fidei et Vite Christiane, written in the kind of measure called "ver- sus politici," and in the form of a dialogue between the soul and the body. It is addressed to another monk, Callinicus, and begins with these two lines:

Ο 'Αθεός σε εκκαλείται Έλλεν τον ομφαλόν.*
The work, in its complete state, consisted of five books; but most of the MSS. are mutilated or otherwise defective, and some of the texts have been interlarded by a later hand. Michael Peleus, not the older writer of that name, who died about A.D. 1078, but one of later date, wrote a preface and notes to the Dipotra of Philip. A Latin prose translation of the Dipotra by the Jesuit Jacobus Pontanus, with notes by another Jesuit, J. de Saulcy, was completed by Philip. "(See plate in J. G. Van Gelden's "Josephus," 1802.) But it was made from a mutilated copy, and consisted of only four books, and these, as the translator admits in his Prefatio ad Lectorem, interpolated and transposed ad libitum. Philip wrote also, The Canon of the Gospels, and The Acts of the Church, in which he considered the original manuscripts of the books of the New Testament as intermixed, and those derived from Scripture and Epiphanies. The other work, consisting of five chapters, De Fide et Ceremoniis Armatorum, Jacobitarum, Chalzitarorum et Romanae seu Francorum, was published, with a Latin version, but without an author's name, in the Acta Sacra Vaticana (Paris, 1693, vol. ii, col. 261, etc.), but was, on the authority of MSS. assigned, by Combe- ses, in a note, to Demetrius of Cyzicus, to whom it appears rightly to belong (comp. Cave, Hist. Litt. Dissertatio i, p. 6; Fabricius, Bib. Gr. xi, 414). The Chat- tistriani (XarkevëpoC) were a sect who paid religious homage to the image of the cross, but employed no other images in their worship. The work of Demetrius appears under the name of Philip in the fourteenth (posthymous) volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, but the editors, in their Prolegomena, to the volume, c. 15, observe that they knew not on what authority Galland had assigned it to Philip. Among the pieces given as Appendices to the Dipotra, are some verses in praise of the work and its author, by one Constantine, perhaps the person addressed in No. 2, and by another, by Constantine (now lost), "ταν τε θεόν ζητοντες, μετανοητε, οἱ του παλαιοτιμονον και Βιορον τω γρηγορεται, Βελτηνον του Μον Κωνσταντιονου και Βελτην του γρηγορεται," Versus Domini Constantini et Vestri Grammatici. Philippus, or Philip, a missionary to Persia and the Indies, was born at Avignon in 1688, and died in 1761.

Philippus, or Philip, a missionary to Africa, was born at Kirkcaldy, Fifeshire, Scotland, April 14, 1775. His father, who was teacher of an English school, gave him an elementary education; and his mother, who was described as a "woman of earnest and devoted piety," endeavored, with all the powerful insinuating influence of maternal permission, to imbue his infant mind with the fear of God and a reverence for his Word. Circumstances occasioned his removal while yet a boy to reside in the home of an uncle who was a minister of the Kirk; but in this his love of God rapidly developed itself in the leading features of intellectual and moral individuality that distinguished him through life. In his nineteenth year he removed to Dundee, where, having completed his term of appren-Philippopolis or Philippians. See Puth. Philipp' (φιλίππος, plur. of Philip), a celebrated city of Macedonia, visited by the apostle Paul, and the seat of the earliest Christian Church formally established in Europe. The double miracle wrought there, and the fact that “to the saints in Philippi” the great apostle of the Gentiles addressed one of his epistles, must ever make this city holy ground. The following account of it combines the ancient notices with modern investigations.

1. Apostolic Associations.—St. Paul, when, on his first visit to Macedonia in A.D. 49, he set out from Siloëm, embarked at Troas, made a straight run to Samothrace, and from thence to Neapolis, which he reached on the second day (Acts xvi, 11). The Philippian of Paul's day was situated in a plain, on the banks of a deep and rapid stream called Gangites (now Aniga). The ancient walls followed the course of the stream for some distance; and in this section of the wall the site of a gate is seen, with the ruins of a bridge nearly opposite. In the narrative of Paul’s visit it is said: “On the Sabbath we went out of the gate by the river (εξ ουδομον της πυλης παρα νοτανωμον), whatever hour we were not compelled to be” (ver. 13). It was doubleless by this gate they went out, and by the side of this river the prayer-meeting was held. As Philippi was a military colony, it is probable that the Jews had no synagogue, and were not permitted to hold their worship within the walls. Being on the river’s edge, very few persons however are seen on the bridge, but on the opposite side a vast and rich plain stretched out, reaching on the south-west to the sea, and on the north-west far away among the ranges of Macedonia. On the south-east a rocky ridge, some sixteen hundred feet in height, separated the plain from the bay and town of Neapolis. Over it ran a paved road connecting Philippi with Neapolis. Though the distance between the two was nine miles, yet Neapolis was to Philippi what the Piraeus was to Athens; and hence Paul is said, when journeying from Greece to Syria, to have “sailed away from Philippi,” that is, from Neapolis, its port (xx, 6).

Philippi was in the province of Macedonia, while Neapolis was in Thrace. Paul, on his first journey, landed at the latter, and proceeded across the mountain-road to the former, which Luke elsewhere calls “the first city of the division of Macedonia” (πρωτη της μετοχης της Μακεδονιας πυλης, Acts xvi, 12). The word πυλη does not, as represented in the A. V. signify “chief.” Thessalonica was the chief city of all Macedonia, and Amphipolis (αμφιπόλης) was that Philippi was situated (see Wieseler, Chron. des Apost. Zeit., p. 87). Πυλη simply means that Philippi was the “first” city of Macedonia to which Paul came (Alford, ad loc.; Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, i, 811, note). In descending the mountain-path towards Philippi the apostle had before him a vast and beautiful panorama. The whole plain, with its green meadows, and clumps of trees, and wide reaches of marsh, and winding streams, lay at his feet; and away beyond it the dark ridges of Macedonia.

On the second visit of Paul and Silas to Philippi, Paul was successful. They found an eager audience in the few Jews and proselytes who frequented the prayer-place on the banks of the Gangites. Lydia, a trader from Thyatira, was the first convert. Her whole house followed her example. It was when going and returning from Lydia’s house that “the damsel possessed with a spirit of divination” met the apostles. Paul cast out the spirit, and then those who had made a trade of the poor girl’s misfortune rose against them, and took them before the magistrates, who, with all the haste and roughness of a provincial law, ordered them to be scourged another twenty, and then thrown into prison. Even this gross act of injustice redounded in the end to the glory of God; for the jailer and his whole house were converted, and the very magistrates were compelled to make a public apology to the apostles, and to set them at liberty, thus declaring their innocence.

Paul visited Philippi twice more, once immediately after the disturbances which arose at Ephesus out of the jealousy of the manufacturers of silver shrines for Artemis. By this time the hostile relation in which the Christian doctrine necessarily stood to all purely ceremonial religions was perfectly manifest; and wherever its teachers appeared, popular tumults were to be expected, and the jealousy of the Roman authorities, who feared the spread of Christianity among the legions, was to be feared. It seems not unlikely that the second visit of the apostle to Philippi was made specially with the view of counteracting this particular danger. He appears to have remained in the city and surrounding country a considerable time (Acts xx, i, 2).

When Paul passed through Philippi a third time he does not appear to have made any considerable stay there (ver. 6). He and his companion are somewhat loosely spoken of as sailing from Philippi; but this is because in the common apprehension of travellers the sea does not figure as a road, or city, and in the next you reached at Piraeus might in the same way be said to set out on a voyage from Athens. On this occasion the voyage to Troas took the apostle five days, the vessel being probably obliged to coast in order to avoid the contrary wind, until coming off the headland of Sarpelon, where the wind changed and he was enabled to sail with an E. or E.N.E. breeze, which at that time of year (after Easter) might be looked for.

The Christian community at Philippi distinguished itself in liberality. On the apostle’s first visit he was hospitably entertained by Lydia, and when he afterwards went to Thessalonica, where his reception appears to have been of a very mixed character, the Philippians sent him supplies more than once, and were the only Christian community that did so (Phil. iv, 16). They also contributed readily to the collection made for the relief of the poor at Jerusalem, which Paul conveyed to them at his last visit (2 Cor. viii, 1-6). It would seem as if they sent further supplies to the apostle after his arrival at Rome. The necessity for these appears to have been urgent, and some delay to have taken place before their arrival in collecting them. Epaphroditus, who carried them, risked his life in the endeavor to make up for lost time (μη χανοντας ἑγγενες παραβουλουσαντος την ψυχην, ινα ανακτηση την ομορφια της προς μι λογος, Phil. ii, 8). The delay, however, was not so much the cause of which the apostle at the time, who fancied his beloved flock had forgotten him (see iv, 10-17). Epaphroditus fell ill with fever from his efforts, and nearly died. On recovering he became homesick, and wandering in mind (ἀσβοϊντος) from the weakness which is the sequel of fever; and Paul, although he sent Timothy to the Philippian Church, thought it desirable to let Epaphroditus go without delay to them, who had already heard of his sickness, and carry with him the letter which is included in the canon—one which was written after the apostle’s imprisonment at Rome had lasted a considerable time. Some domestic troubles connected with religion had already broken out in the community. Euodias and Syntyche, who appear to be husband and wife, are exhorted to agree with one another in the matter of their common faith; and the former is implied to extend his sympathy to certain females (obviously familiar both to Paul and to him) who did good service to the apostle in his trials at Philippi, and who in some way or other appear to be the occasion of the disagreement between the pair. Possibly a claim for a certain woman on the part of the latter caused the spiritual matters may have caused some irritation; for the apostle immediately goes on to remind his readers that the peace of God is something superior to the highest intelligence (ὑπηρεσιας πνευματι νους).

It would seem, as Alford says, that the cruel treatment of the apostle at Philippi had combined with the change of scene and the scene of worship and has set up a bond more of than ordinary love between him and the Philippian Church. They alone, of all churches, sent subsidies to relieve his temporal necessities (Phil. iv. 10, 15, 18: 2 Cor. xi. 9; 1 Thess. ii. 2; Alford, Greek Text, Prooem., ii. 29). The apostle felt their kindness; and the love of those in Philippi was not the only epistle which is still in our canon. This epistle indicates that at that time some of the Christians there were in the custody of the military authorities as sedi- tious persons, through some proceedings or other connected with the hill. This is a golden mine of information. The plot against the apostle is the same as those at Scopae Hyde, which was certainly in this immediate neighborhood. Before the great expedi- tion of Xenocrates, the Thessalians had a number of settlements on the main, and this among the number, which produced them eighty talents a year as rent to the state. In the year B.C. 468 they ceded their possessions on the continent to the Athenians; but the colonists, 10,000 in number, who had settled on the Strymon and pushed their encroachments eastward as far as this point, were crushed by a simultaneous effort of the Thracian tribes (Thucydides, i. 190; ii. 102; Herod. i. 199; Pausa- nias, i. 29, 4). From that time until the rise of the Macedonian power, the mines seem to have remained in the hands of native chiefs; but when the affairs of Southern Greece became thoroughly embroiled by the policy of Philip, the Thessalians made an attempt to possess themselves of this valuable territory, and sent a colony to the site, then going by the name of "the Springs" (Kynides). Philip, however, aware of the importance of the position, expelled them and founded Philippi, the last of all his creations. The mines at that time, as was not wonderful under the circumstances, had become almost insignificant in their produce; but their new owner contrived to extract more than a thousand talents a year from them, with which he minted the gold coinage called by his name. The proximity of the gold-mines was of course the origin of so large a city as Philippi, but the plain in which it lies is one of extraordinary fertility. The position too was on the main road from Rome to Asia, the Via Egnatia, which from Thessalonica to Constantinople followed the same course as the existing post-road. The usual course was to take ship at Piraeus and land at Dyrrachium, from whence a route led across Epirus to Thessalonica. Ignatius was carried to Italy by this route, when sent to Rome to be cast to wild beasts. See Strabo, Fragment. lib. vii.; Thucyd. i. 100; iii. 102; Herod. i. 76; Dio. Cass. i. 60 sq.; Appian, Bell. Civ. i. 101 sq.; Faus. i. 29, 4.

The battle of Philippi, in which the Roman republic was overthrown, was fought on this plain in the year B.C. 42 (Die. Cass. xvi.; Appian, l. c.). In honor, and as a memorial of his great victory, Augustus made Philippi a Roman "colony," and its coins bear the legend "Colonia Augusta Jul. Philippiensis" (Combeare and Howson, i. 312). The emperor appears to have founded the new quarter in the plain along the banks of the Gargelles. As a colony (kolonias, Acts xvi. 12) it enjoyed peculiar privileges. Its inhabitants were Roman citizens, most of them being the families and descendants of veteran soldiers, who had originally settled in the place to guard the city and province. They were governed by their own magistrates, called Duumviri or Pretors (in Greek στρατηγοὶ; ver. 20), who exercised a kind of military authority, and were independent of the provincial governor.

3. Present Site.—Philippi (now called by the Turks Felibejik) is cut off from the interior by a steep line of hills, anciently called Symbolum, connected towards the N.E. with the western extremity of Hemus, and towards the S.W., less continuously, with the eastern extremity of Pangeus. Between the foot of Symbolum and the site of Philippi two Turkish cemeteries are passed, the gravestones of which are all derived from the ruins of the ancient city, and in the immediate neighborhood of the one first reached is the modern Turkish village Berbekeli. This is the nearest village to the ancient ruins. Near the second cemetery are some ruins on a slight eminence, and also a khan, kept by a Greek family. Here is a large monumental block of marble, twelve feet high and seven feet square, apparently the pedestal of a statue, as on the top a hole exists which was obviously intended for its reception. This hole is pointed out by local tradition as the crib out of which Alexander's horse, Bucephalus, was accustomed to eat its oats. On two sides of the block is a mutilated Latin inscription, in which the names of Caius Ylbius and Cornelius Quattus may be deciphered. A stream employed in turning a mill bursts out from a sedgy pool in the neighborhood, and probably finds its way to the marshy ground mentioned as existing in the S.W. portion of the plain. After about twenty minutes' ride from the khan, over ground thickly strewn with fragments of marble columns, and slabs that have been employed in building, a river-bed sixty-six feet wide is crossed, through which the stream rushes with great force, and immediately on the other side the walls of the ancient Philippi may be traced. Their direction is adjusted to the course of the stream; and at only three hundred and fifty feet from its margin there appears a gap in their circuit, indicating the former existence of a gate. This is, no doubt, as above seen, the gate out of which the apostle and his companion passed to the "prayer-meeting" on the banks of a river, where they made the acquaintance of Lydia, the Thyatiran seller of purple. The locality, just outside the walls, and with a plentiful supply of water for their animals, is exactly the one which would be appropriated as a market for itinerant traders, "quorum ohiphion fenunque supellex," as will appear from the parallel case of the Egerian fountain near Rome, of whose desecration Juvenal complains (Sat. iii, 18). Lydia had an establishment in Philippi for the reception of the dyed goods which were imported from Thyatira and the neighboring towns of Asia, and were dispersed by means of pack-animals among the mountain clans of the Hemus and Pangeus, the agents being doubtless in many instances her own coreligionists. High up in Hemus lay the tribe of the Satra, where was the oracle of Dionysus—not the rustic deity of the Attic vine-growers, but the prophet-god of the Thracians (ὑ Θρατίς μάντης, Eurip. Hec. 1257). The "damsel with the spirit of divination" (καιδήσα ἱκουσά πετιμί πυθών) may probably be regarded as one of the hierodules of this establishment, hired by Philippiant citizens, and frequenting the country-market to practice her art upon the villagers who brought produce for the consumption of the town. The fierce character of the mountaineers would render it imprudent to admit them within the walls of the city; just as in some of the towns of North Africa the Kabyles are not allowed to enter, but have a market allotted to them outside the walls for the sale of the produce they bring. Over such an assemblage only a summary jurisdiction can be exercised; and hence the proprietors of the slave, when they considered themselves injured, and hurried Paul and Silas into the town, to the σύγα—the civic market where the magistrates (ἀρχηγοί) sat—were at once turned over to the military authorities (στρατηγοί), and these, naturally assuming that a stranger frequenting the extra-mural market must be a Thracian mountaineer or an itinerant trader, proceeded to inflict upon the ostensible cause of a riot (the merits of which they would not attempt to understand) the usual treatment in such cases. The idea of the apostle possessing the Roman franchise, and consequently an exemption from corporal outrage, never occurred to the rough soldier who ordered him to be scourged; and the whole transaction seems to have passed so rapidly that he had no time to plead his citizenship, of which the military authorities first heard the next day. But the illegal treatment (ἐγκνύμ) obviously made a deep impression on the mind of its victim, as is evident not only from his refusal to take his discharge from prison the next morning (Acts xvi, 37), but from a passage in the Epistle to the Church at Thessa-

Subsequently at Jerusalem, under parallel circumstances of tumult, he warns the officer (to the) surprise of the latter of his privilege (Acad. xxii, 55).

Philip is now an unhanded ruin. The remains are very extensive, but present no striking feature except two gateways, which are considered to belong to the temple of Cleopatra (position of a theatre can be traced; also the walls, gates, some tombs, and numerous broken columns and heaps of rubbish. The ruins of private dwellings are visible on every part of the site; and at one place is a mound covered with columns and broken fragments of white marble, where a palace, temple, or perhaps a forum once stood. Inscriptions both in the Latin and Greek languages, but more generally in the former, are found. PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, the sixth in order of the Pauline letters in the N. T. The following article treats the subject from the Scriptural as well as the modern point of view.

I. The canonical authority, Pauline authorship, and genuineness of this epistle were unanimously acknowledged up to the end of the 18th century. Marcion (A.D. 140), in the earliest known canon, held common ground with the Church teaching the authority of this epistle (Tertullian, Ad. Marcion, iv, 5; v, 20): it appears in the list of the Twelve (Ignatius, Ad. Polycarp, c. 6, 3), among the "acknowledged" books in Eusebius (H. E., 25): in the lists of the Council of Laodicea, A.D. 365, and of Hippo, 393; and in all subsequent lists, as well as in the Peshito and later versions. Even contemporary evidence may be claimed for it. Philippian Christians who had contributed to the collections for Paul's support at Rome, who had been eye and ear witnesses of the return of Epaphroditus and the first reading of Paul's epistle, may have been still alive as Philippians when Polycarp wrote (A.D. 167) his letter to the Philippian Christians concerning his own imprisonment and Paul's epistle as a well-known distinct veneration to the Philippian Church. It is quoted as Paul's by several of the early Church fathers (Irenaeus, iv, 18, § 4; Clem. Alex. Pa- dop., i, § 32, and elsewhere; Tertullian, Ad. Marc. v, 26; De Res. Carm. ch. xxii). A quotation from it (Phil. ii, 6) is found in the Epistle of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne, A.D. 177 (Eusebius, H. E., v, 2). The tes- timonies of later writers are innumerable. See CAJON.

It is only in very recent times that any doubt has been suggested to the genuineness of this epistle. Schaff, in his Der Ap. Paulus, v, 293 (1874), for instance, objects to the passage iii, 1-7, 10, 11, 15 is an interpolation; but he ad- duces no reason for this but the purely gratuitous one that the connection between ii, 30 and iv, 10 is disturbed by this intervening section, and that by the excision of this the epistle becomes "more rounded off, and more a genuine occasional letter"—as if any sound critic would reject a passage from an ancient author because in his opinion the author's composition would be improved thereby! Baur goes farther than this, and would re- ject the whole of the Gnostic composition of this later age (Paulus, p. 458 sq.). But when he comes to point out "the Gnostic ideas and expressions" by which the epistle is marked, they will be found to exist only in his own imagination, and can only by a perverse in- sensibility be forced upon the words of the apostle. Thus in the statement that Christ is "μόνος ἐστὶν, τὸ διὰ τοῦτο ἐστὶν, τὸ σου ἐργαζόμενος ἐν τοῖς ἐπίσκοποις..." (ἀπ. ii, 5, 6), Baur finds an allusion to the Gnostic notion of Sophia, in which "existed the outgoing desire with all power to penetrate into the essence of the supreme Father." But not only is this to give the apostle's words a meaning which they do not bear (for however we translate ἐργαζόμενος, we evidently express the very opposite of what he says in the past, not an aim for the future), but it is manifest that the entire drift of the passage is not to set forth any speculative doctrine, but to adudge a moral inference. This is so manifest that even Baur himself admits it, and by doing so he positions his own position; for it is on the supposition that what the apostle refers to is a fact, and not a mere speculative fancy, that any moral con- clusion can be drawn from it. Equally futile is the at- temt to find Docetism in the use of the term μορφή—a term used by the apostle in reference to the divine nature—or of the terms φύσις, φύσιμα, and εἰκοσι- μεν, all of which occur elsewhere in Paul's writings, and are here used to denote simply that Jesus Christ pre- sented himself to the view of men actually as one of themselves (Lusennius, Pauli ad Phil. Ep. cont. Basiliam, p. 56). But this does not militate against the view that what the apostle refers to is a fact, and not a mere speculative fancy, that any moral con- clusion can be drawn from it. A question has been raised as to whether the extant Epistle to the Philippians is the only one addressed by Paul to that Church. What has given rise to this question is the expression used by the apostle (iii, 1), τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν ἐπίμοι, κ.τ.λ., where the writing of the same things to those is supposed to refer to the identity of what he is now writing with what he had written in a previous letter. It has also been supposed that Polycarp knew of more than one extant epistle to the apostle to the Philippians, from his using the plural (τὰ ἐπιστολὰς γράφειν ἐπιστολὰς) in reference to what he had written to them. To this, however, much weight cannot be attached, for there can be no doubt that the Greeks used ἐφαρμάκει for a single letter, as the Latin- ins used litterae (see a multitude of examples in Stephani's Thesaurus, a. v.). That Polycarp knew of only one extant epistle of Paul to the Philippians has been supposed by some to be proved by the passage in the 11th chap- ter of his letter, preserved in the Latin version, where he says, "Ego autem nolui talis sententiae divini, in quibus laborsit beatus Paulus qui est in principio epistola ejus," etc. But, as Meyer points out, "epistola" here is not the genitive singular, but the nominative plural; and the meaning is not "who are in the beginning of his epistle," which is entirely false, but (with allusion to 2 Cor. iii, 1) "who are in the be- ginning [i. e. from the beginning of his preaching the Gospel among you—a common use of ἔκαθα, which was the expression probably used by Polycarp] his epistle too," it is the meaning of a single epistle, for this passage has no bearing on this question; for if Meyer's construction be correct, it shows that Polycarp did use ἐπιστολαῖ for a single epistle. Meyer, indeed, trans- lates "who are his epistles," but if the allusion is to 2 Cor. iii, 1, we must translate in the singular, the whole Church collectively being the epistles and not each member an epistle. But though the testimony of Polycarp for a plurality of epistles may be set aside, it is less easy to set aside the testimony of the extant epistle itself. To refer to a preceding νερος ἐν εὐρωπι seems somewhat difficult, for nowhere previously in this epistle has the apostle expressly enjoined on his readers νερος ἐν εὐρωπι, and one does not see what on this hypothesis is the propriety of such expressions as δεσποιν και δεσποινικ; and to lay the stress on the γεάταις, as Wieseler proposes (Chronologie des Ap. Zeit, p. 458), so as to make the apostle refer to some verbal message previously sent to the Philippians, the substance of which he was now about to put into writing, seems no less so; for not only does the absence of the first give no allusion to any oral message, but in this case the writer would have said και γεάταις. A large number of critics follow Pelagius in the explanation, "εδειμ τερητερα γενερα δεσποινικ;" but it may be doubted if so important a clause may be legitimately dragged in to complete the apostle's meaning, without any authority from the context. Hence many have concluded that the apostle alludes to some written communication previously sent by him to the Philippians (so Hähnelin, Flatt, Meyer, Bleek, Schenkel, etc.). But, besides the lack of all evidence of such lost epistles in Clement of Alexandria, the apostle himself never pronounced in a high degree doubtful and precarious. Hence we conclude that αὐταρία refers to the γεάταις, which is the pervading thought of the epistle (i, 4; ii, 17, etc.), and which seems to have been the more dwelt upon as the object of the apostle's anxiety, the latter very naturally has suggested the contrary feeling (hence δεσποινικ). See Elliott, ad loc. Ewald (Senderschriften des Ap. Paulus, p. 481) is of opinion that Paul sent several Ap. to the Philippians; and he refers to the texts ii, 12 and iii, 18 as partly proving this. But some additional confirmation or explanation of this conjecture is requisite before it can be admitted as either probable or necessary.

There is a break in the sense at the end of the second chapter of the epistle, which every careful reader must have observed. It is indeed quite natural that an epistle written amid exciting circumstances, personal dangers, and various distractions should bear in one place at least a mark of interruption. Le Mouy (1885) thought it was ancienly divided into two parts. Heinrichs (1810), fully endorsed by Paulus (1817), has conjectured from this abrupt recommencement that the two parts are two distinct epistles, of which the first, together with the conclusion of the epistle (iv, 21-28), was intended for public use in the Church, and the second exclusively for the apostle's special friends in Philippi. It is not necessary to accept this view for the purpose of the present essay. The existence of the apocryphal theology, or what illustration of the meaning of the epistle could be derived from it. It has met with a distinct reply from Krause (1811 and 1818); and the integrity of the epistle has not been questioned by recent critics.

II. Time and Place of Writing.—The constant tradition that this epistle was written at Rome by Paul in his captivity was impugned first by Oeder (1792), who, disregarding the fact that the apostle was in prison (i, 7, 13, 14) when he wrote, imagined that he was at Corinth (see the articles on CORINTH PHILIPPI). This opinion was adopted by Schulz (1799), by Röteger (1807), and by Liliell (1814), in whose opinion the epistle was written during the apostle's confinement at Cæsarea (Acts xxiv, 23). But the references to the "palace" (prætorii; i, 15), and to "Cæsarea's household" (iv, 22), seem to point to Rome rather than to Cæsarea; and there is no reason whatever for supposing that the apostle felt in Cæsarea that extreme uncertainty of life connected with the approaching decision of his cause which he must have felt towards the end of his captivity at Rome to express in his epistle (i, 19, 20; ii, 17; iii, 10); and, further, the dissemination of the gospel described in Phil. i, 12-18 is not even hinted at in Luke's account of the Cæsarean captivity, but is described by him as taking place at Rome (comp. Acts xxiv, 28 with xxviii, 30, 31). Even Reuss (Gesch. d. N. T. 1860), who assigns to Cæsarea three of Paul's epistles, which are all addressed to the Philippians, supposes that the epistle to Rome, is decided in his conviction that the Epistle to the Philippians was written at Rome.

Assuming then that the epistle was written at Rome during the imprisonment mentioned in the last chapter of the Acts, it may be shown from a single fact that it could not have been written long before the end of the two years. The distress of the Philippians on account of Epaphroditus' sickness was known at Rome when the epistle was written; this implies four journeys, separated by some indefinite intervals, to or from Philippi and Rome. From Paul, wrote the epistle, the activity and the writing of the epistle. The Philippians were informed of his imprisonment, and sent Epaphroditus; they were informed of their messenger's sickness, and sent their message of consolation. Further, the absence of Luke's name from the salutations, where he was well known implies that he was absent from Rome when the epistle was written: so does Paul's declaration (ii, 20) that no one who remained with him felt an equal interest with Timothy in the welfare of the Philippians. By comparing the mention of Luke in Col. iv, 14 and 15 with the narrative of the Acts, we are led to the inference that he left Rome after those two epistles were written and before the end of the two years' captivity. Lastly, it is obvious from Phil. i, 20 that Paul, when he wrote, felt the act of his position to be of greater importance than ever, and that came more precarious as the two years drew to a close. Assuming that Paul's acquittal and release took place in 58, we may date the Epistle to the Philippians early in that year.

III. Personal Circumstances of the Writer at the Time.

1. Paul's connection with Philippi was of a peculiar character, which gave rise to the writing of this epistle. That city, important as a mart for the produce of the neighboring gold-mines, and as a Roman stronghold to check the rude Thracian mountaineers, was distinguished as the scene of the great battle fatal to Brutus and Cassius, B.C. 42. More than ninety years afterwards Paul entered its walls, accompanied by Silas, who had been with him since he started from Antioch, and by Timothy and Luke, whom he afterwards attached to himself. The former at Derbe, the latter quite recently at Troas. It may well be urged that the patience of the zealous apostle had been tried by his mysterious repulse, first from Asia, then from Bithynia and Mysia, and that his expectations had been stirred up by the vision which hastened his departure with his co-laborers. These new-found friends must have offered an aspect little different from that which Paul's spirit brought him to the European shore at Neapolis, whence he took the road, about ten miles long, across the mountain ridge called Symbolum to Philippi (Acts xvi, 12). There, at a greater distance from Jerusalem than any apostle had ever penetrated, these new-found friends renewed the energy of Paul was again employed in laying the foundation of a Christian Church. First seeking the last sheep of the house of Israel, he went on a Sabbath-day with the few Jews who resided in Philippi to their small Synagogue on the bank of the river Ganges. The missionaries sat down and spoke to the entourage in Greek. One of them, Lydia, not born of the seed of Abraham, but a proselyte, whose name and occupation, as well as her birth, connect her with Asia, gave heed unto Paul, and she and her household were baptized, perhaps on the same Sabbath-day. Her house became the residence of the missionaries. Many days they resorted to the Synagogue, and the result of their short sojourn in Philippi was the conversion of many persons (xvi, 40), including at last their jailer and his household. Paul was endeavor to Paul, not only by the hospitality of Lydia, to the deep sympathy of the converts, and the remarkable miracle which set a seal on his preaching, but also by the successful exercise of his missionary activity after a long suspense, and by the a long interval. Leaving Timothy and Luke to watch the conduct of the Church, he went to Thessalonica (1 Thees. ii, 2), whither they were followed by the alms of the Philippians (Phil. iv, 16), and thence southwards. Timothy, having probably carried out similar directions to those which were given to Titus (1, 5) in Crete, set out for Philippi. We know not whether Luke remained at Philippi. The next six years of his life are a blank in our records. At the end of that period he is found again (Acts xx, 6) at Philippi.

After the lapse of five years, spent chiefly at Corinth and Ephesus, Paul, escaping from the incessant worshippers of the Ephesian Diana, went to Macedonia (Phil.

A.D. 54), on his way to Greece, accompanied by the Ephesians Tychicus and Trophimus, and probably visited Philippi for the second time, and was there joined by Timothy. His beloved Philippians, free, it seems, from the controversies which agitated other Christian churches, became still dearer to Paul on account of the sacrifice which they afforded him when, emerging from a season of dejection (2 Cor. vii, 5), oppressed by weak bodily health, and anxious for the steadfastness of the churches which he had planted in Asia and Achaia, he wrote to establish their minds at both Philippi and Thess.

On returning from Greece, unable to take ship there on account of the Jewish plots against his life, he went through Macedonia, seeking a favorable port for embarking. After parting from his companions (Acts xx, 4), he escaped, as a refugee among his faithful Philippianians, where he spent some days at Easter, A.D. 55, with Luke, who accompanied him when he sailed from Ne-apoli.

Finally, in his Roman captivity (A.D. 57), their care of him revived again. They sent Epaphroditus, bening their alms as the apostle's securer, and ready to render his personal service (Phil. ii, 25). He stayed some time at Rome, and while employed as the organ of communication between the imprisoned apso-te and the Christians, and inquirers in and about Rome, he fell dangerously ill. When he was sufficiently recovered, Paul sent him back to the Philippians, to whom he was very dear, and with him our epistle. See Pitu-lippi.

2. The state of the Church at Rome should be considered before entering on the study of the Epistle to the Philippians (Phil. iv, 13). We have seen (Acts xx, 32), mention about A.D. 56 from the Epistle to the Romans, and more about A.D. 58 from Acts xxviii. Possibly the Gospel was planted there by some who themselves received the seed on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii, 10).

The missionaries of the Gospel were successively sent to Judsea, partly also from Jews who were such by birth, with possibly a few converts direct from heathenism.

In A.D. 55 this Church was already eminent for its faith and obedience: it was exposed to the machinations of schismatical teachers; and it included two conflicting parties, the one insisting on the apostolic authority and also to tender his personal service (Phil. ii, 25).

undeviating closeness. For the preparations for the departure of Epaphroditus, and the thought that he would soon arrive among the warm-hearted Philippians, filled Paul with recollections of them, and revived his old feelings towards those fellow-heirs of his hope of glory who were so deep in his heart (i. 7) and so often in his prayers (i. 4).

Full of gratitude for this work of friendly remember-ance and regard, Paul addressed to the Church in Philippi this epistle, in which, besides expressing his thanks for their kindness, he pours out a flood of eloquence and pathetic exhortation, suggested partly by his own circumstances, and partly by what he had learned of their state as a Church. That state appears to have been on the whole very prosperous, as there is much commendation of the Philippian in the epistle, and no censure is expressed in any part of it either of the Church as a whole, or of any individuals connected with it. At the same time the apostle deemed it necessary to put them on their guard against the evil influences to which they were exposed from Judaizing teachers and false professed of Christ. These cautions he interposes between the exhortations suggested by his own state, and by the news he had received concerning the Philippians, with which his epistle commences and with which it closes. We may thus divide the epistle into three parts. In the first of these (i., ii.), after the uniformity of his exhortations to the humbled in spiritual pride and the firm faith of Paul concerning the righteousness of his Lord and Saviour (Phil. ii. 6-11), the apostle refers to his own condition as a prisoner at Rome; and, lest they should be cast down at the thought of the unmerited indignities he had been called upon to suffer, he assures them that these had turned out rather to the furtherance of that great cause on which his heart was set, and for which he was willing to live and labor, though, as respected his personal feelings, he would rather depart and be with Christ, which he deemed to be "far better" (12-24). He then passes by an easy transition to the main address of the epistle to the Philippian, calling upon them to maintain steadfastly their profession, cultivate humanity and brotherly love; to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling, and con-closing by an appeal to their regard for his reputation as an apostle, which could not but be affected by their conduct, and a reference to his reason for sending Epaphroditus instead of Timothy, as he had originally designed (i. 25; ii. 30).

In part second he strenuously cautions them, as already observed, against Judaizing teachers, whom he stigmatizes as "dogs" (in reference, profane practices, and godless habits), "evil-workers," and "the counsel;" by which latter term he means to intimate, as Theophylact remarks (ad loc.), that the circumcision in which the Jews so much gloried had now ceased to possess any spiritual significance, and was therefore no better than a useless mutilation of the person. On this theme he enlarges, making reference to his own standing as a Jew, and intimating that, if under the Christian dispensation Jewish descent and Jewish privileges were to go for anything, no one could have stronger claims on this ground than he himself, as having been born a Jew (31, 32); but he had once valued these, he now counted them "all but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ" (iii. 1-12). A reference to his own sanctified ambition , to advance in the service of Christ leads him to exhort the Philippian to a similar spirit; from this he passes to caution them against unnecessary contention, and against those who walk disorderly, concluding by reminding them of the glorious hopes which, as Christians, they entertained (ver. 13-21).

In the third part we have a series of admonitions to individual members of the Church at Philippi (iv. 1-8), followed by some general exhortations to cheerfulness, moderation, prayer, and good conduct (ver. 4-9); after which come a series of allusions to the apostle's circumstances and feelings, his thanks to the Philippians for their reasonable aid, and his concluding benedictions and salutations (ver. 10-20).

VI. Characteristic Features of the Epistle.—Strangely full of joy and thanksgiving amid adversity, like the apostle's midnight hymn from the depth of his Philippian dungeon, this epistle went forth from his prison at Rome. In most other epistles he writes with a sustained exhortation to inward, or with some external motivation; he is striving to supply imperfect, or to correct erroneous teaching, to put down scandalous impurity, or to heal schism in the Church which he addresses.
But in this epistle, though he knew the Philippian intimacy, and was not blind to the faults and tendencies to fault in his own people, he made no effort to be so characteristic of the whole Church as to call for genceral censure on his part or amendment on theirs. (Of all his epistles to churches, none has so little of an official character as this. He withholds its title of "apostle" in the inscription. We lose sight of his high authority as a Church leader, and of the subordinate position of the worshippers by the river-side; and we are admitted to see the free action of a heart glowing with inspired Christian love, and to hear the utterance of the highest friendship addressed to equal friends conscious of their earthly weakness, but, in Christ, for eternity. Who that bears in mind the condition of Paul in his Roman prison can read unmoved of his continual prayers for his distant friends, his constant sense of their fellowship with him, his joyful remembrance of their past Christian companionship, his warm-hearted affection for them yearning after them all in Christ, his eagerness to communicate to them his own circumstances and feelings, his carefulness to prepare them to repel any evil from within or from without which might dim the brightness of their spiritual graces? Love, at once tender and watchful—that love which "is of God"—is the key-note of this epistle; and in this epistle only we hear no undertone of any different feeling. Just enough, and no more, is shown of his own harassing trials to let us see how deep in his heart was the spring of that feeling, and how he was refreshed by its sweet and soothing flow.

Philippine Islands, situated in 5° 30'–19° 42° N. lat., and 117° 14'–126° 4' E. long., in the great Indian Archipelago, to the north of Borneo and Celebes, are more than 1000 islands, and include an area of about 150,000 square miles. The population is over 6,000,000, three fourths of whom are subject to Spain. The remainder are governed, according to their own laws and customs, by independent native princes. Luzon, in the north, has an area of 5,100 square miles, and Mindanao, or Magindanao, in the south, fully 25,000. The islands lying between Luzon and Mindanao are called the Bisayas, the largest of which are: Samar, area 13,020 square miles; Mindoro, 12,910; Panay, 11,540; Leyte, 10,680; Negros, 9,900; Masbate, 1,290; Negros Oriental, 1,380; Cebu, 610; Cebu island, then another thousand lesser islands of which little is known. To the south-west of the Bisayas lies the long, narrow island of Panay or Palawan, formed of a mountain-chain with low coast-lines, cut with numerous streams, and exceeding in fertility. The forests abound in ebony, log-wood, gum-trees, and bamboo. To the north of Luzon lie the Batanen, Babeehe, and Babuyan islands, the first two groups having about 8000 inhabitants, the last unpeopled. The Suluood islands form a long chain from Mindanao to Borneo with an enormous and volcanic structure as the Philippine islands, and all are probably fragments of a submerged continent. Many active volcanoes are scattered through the islands; Mayon, in Luzon, and Buhayan, in Mindanao, often caus ing great devastation. The mountain-chains run north and south, and never attain a greater elevation than 7000 feet. The islands have many rivers, the coasts are indented with deep bays, and there are many lakes in the interior. Earthquakes are frequent and destructive. The soil is extremely fertile, except where subjected to the frequent fluctuations of numerous lakes, which expand during the rainy season into lagoon seas. Rain may be expected from May to December, and from June to November the land is flooded. Violent hurricanes are experienced in the north of Luzon and west coast of Mindanao. Especially during the changes of the monsoons, storms of wind, rain, thunder and lightning prevail. The weather is very fine, and heat moderate, from December to May, when the temperature rapidly rises and becomes oppressive, except for a short time after a fall of rain. The fertility of the soil and the humid atmosphere produce a richness of vegetation which is nowhere surpassed. Blossoms and fruit hang together on the trees, and the cultivated fields yield a constant succession of crops. Immense forests spread over the Philippine Islands, clothing the mountains to their summits; ebony, iron-wood, cedar, sapanwood, gum-trees, etc., being laced together and garlanded by the banyan or palasan, which attains a length of several hundred feet. The variety of fruit-trees is great; including the orange, citron, bread-fruit, mango, cocoa-nut, guava, tamarind, rose-apple, etc.; other important products of the vegetable kingdom being the banana, plantain, pine-apple, sugar-cane, cotton, tobacco, indigo, coffee, cocoa, cinnamon, vanilla, cassia, the areca-nut, ginger, pepper, etc., with rice, wheat, maize, and various other cereals. Gold is found in river-beds and detrital deposits, being used, in the form of dust, as the medium of exchange in Mindanao. Iron is plentiful, and fine coal-beds, from which four-foot-thick, have been found. Copper has long been worked in Luzon. There are also limestone, a fine variegated marble, sulphur in unlimited quantity, quicksilver, ver-million, and saltpetre—the sulphur being found both native and in large deposits of iron, arsenic, and iron. Except the wild-cat, beasts of prey are unknown.
There are oxen, buffaloes, sheep, goats, swine, hares, squirrels, and a great variety of monkeys. The jungles swarm with lizards, snakes, and other reptiles; the rivers and lakes with crocodiles. Huge spiders, taran-tulas, white ants, mosquitoes, and locusts are plagues which form a cut-off to the beautiful fireworks, the brilliant queen-beetle (Elater noctiluca), the melody of myriads of birds, the turtle-doves, pheasants, birds-of-paradise, and many lovely species of parakeets, with many others. There are also distant fruits growing from the branches, and alongside of them are the nests of humming-birds dangling in the wind." The caverns along the shores are frequented by the swallow, whose edible nest is esteemed by the Chinese a rich delicacy. Some of them are also teeming by multitudes of half-immense size. Buffaloes are used for tillage and draught; a small horse for riding. Fowls are plentiful, and incredible numbers of ducks are artificially hatched.
Fish is in great abundance and variety. Mother-of-pearl, coral, amber, and tortoise-shell are important articles of commerce. Practically all the sugar made from tobacco, cigars, indigo, Manila hemp, coffee, rice, dy-woods, hides, gold-dust, and beeswax.

Native Population.—The Tagals and Bisays are the most numerous native races. They dwell in the cities and cultivated lowlands; 2,500,000 being converts to Roman Catholicism, and a considerable number, especially of the Bisays, Mohammedans. The mountain districts are inhabited by a negro race, who, in features, stature, and savage mode of living, closely resemble the Asians of the negro Pappus, and are probably the aborigines driven back before the inroads of the Malaya. A few of the negroes are Christian, but they are chiefly idolaters, or without any manifest form of religion, and roaming about in families, without fixed dwelling. The Mestizos form an influential part of the population; by their activity engrossing the greatest part of the trade. These are mostly of Chinese fathers and native mothers.

The leading mercantile houses are English and American. British and American merchants enjoy the largest share of the trade. The exports of the Philippines are being upwards of £1,500,000 sterling yearly, and the imports thence nearly of the same value. There are seven British houses established at Manila, and one at Iloilo, in the populous and productive island of Panay, which is the centre of an increasing trade. The total exports and imports of the Philippine Islands have a value of about $6,000,000 yearly. The Chinese exercise various trades and callings, remaining only for a time, and never bringing their wives with them. The principal languages are the Tagaloe and Bisayan. Rice, sweet potatoes, and fruits are the food of the Tagaloe and Bisayans, who usually drink only water, though sometimes indulging in cocoa-wine. Tobacco is used by all. They are gentle, hospitable, fond of dancing and cock-fighting. Education is far behind; it is similar to what it was in Europe during the Middle Ages. Agriculture is the only industry under the control of the Romanist priesthood, who are governed by an archbishop (of Manila), and the bishops of New Segovia, Nueva Caceres, and Zebu. Religious processions are the pride of the people, and are formed with great parade, thousands of persons carrying wax-candles, etc.

The Sooloo Islands have a population of 150,000; are governed by a sultan, whose capital is Sung, in 6° 1' N. lat., and 120° 55' 51" E. long., who also rules over the greatest part of Pargao, the northern corner only being subject to Spain. Lombok has a population of 2,000,000, one fifth part being independent; the Bisaya Islands, 2,000,000, of whom three fourths are under Spanish rule. The population of Panyay amounts to 750,000, and that of Zebu to 150,000. Of the numbers in Mindanao nothing is known; the districts of Zamboanga, Maguindanao, Cotabato, and Caraga, with their inhabitants, being all that is subject to Spain. The greater part of the island is under the sultan of Mindanao, resident at Selang, in 7° 9' N. lat., and 124° 38' E. long., who, with his feudal chieftains, can bring together an army of 150,000 men. He is friendly toward the Spaniards. Besides Manila, there are very many large and important cities, especially in Luzon, Panyay, and Zebu. The great centres of trade are Manila, in Luzon, and Iloilo, in Panyay. The Philippine Islands were discovered in 1521 by Magellan, who, after visiting Mindanao, sailed toward the west, where, taking part in a war, he was wounded, and died at Maest-Ara 26, 1521. Some years later the Spanish court sent an expedition under Villalobos, who named the islands in honor of the prince of Asturias, afterwards Philip II. For some time the chief Spanish settlement was on Zebu; but in 1581 Manila was built, and has since continued to be the seat of government. Philippines, a small Russian sect, so called from the founder, Philip Pustovsiwi, under whose leadership it emigrated from Russia to Livonia near the beginning of the 18th century, are a branch of the Raskolnikis (q. v.). They call themselves Staroveretsai, or " Faithful Men," because they cling with the utmost tenacity to the old service-books, the old version of the Bible, and the old hymn and prayer books of the Russo-Greek Church, in the exact form in which those books stood before the revision which they underwent at the hands of the patriarch Nikon (q. v.) near the middle of the 17th century. There are two classes of the Raskolnikis—one which recognizes popes (or priests); the other, which admits no priest or other clerical functionary. The Philippines are of the latter class; and they not only themselves refuse all priestly ministrations, but they regard all such ministrations—baptism, marriage, sacraments—as invalid; and they repudiate all who join their sect from other Russian communities. All their own ministerial offices are discharged by the Starik, or parish clerics, who for the time are the title of "Papa," and is required to observe celibacy. But the preaching is permitted to any one who feels himself "called by the Spirit" to undertake it. Among the Philippines the spirit of fanaticism at times has run to the wildest excesses. They refused and declined to enter military service; and it was on this account and like imprisoned, with the result that they were forced to emigrate, under the leadership of Philip Pustovsiwi, "the saint of the Desert." They are now settled partly in Polish Lithuania, partly in East Prussia, where they have several small settlements with churches of their own rite. They are reported to be a peaceful and industrious people, who consider agriculture; and their thrift and industrious habits have secured for them the good-will of the land-proprietors as well as of the government.

They are sometimes called Brasileira, or Tervera, from their tendency to suicide, which they consider meritorious, and which they accordingly court, sometimes burying themselves alive, sometimes starving themselves to death. Accusations of laxity of morals have been brought against them, of renouncing marriage, and living in spiritual brotherhood and sisterhood, the truth of which has never been clearly established; for when the empress Anne (A.D. 1730-1741) sent commissioners to inquire into the state of their monasteries, they shut themselves up, and burned themselves alive within their own walls, rather than give any evidence on the subject. See Platon, Greek Church (see Index). (J. H. W.)

Philippists is the name of that sect or party among the Lutherans who were the followers of Philip Melanchoth. He had strenuously opposed the Ulquists, who arose in his time; and the dispute growing still hotter after his death, the University of Wittenberg, which espoused Melanchthon's opinion, were called by the Flats, who attacked it, Philippists. They were strongest in that university and the opposite party, who are called by the University of Jena. The Philippists were in the end accused of being Calvinists at heart, and were much persecuted by the ultra-Lutheran party. See the different works on the Reformation (q. v.), and the long treatise in Herzog's Real-Encyclopaedia, xi, 159. See also ADIAPOCHIST CONTROVERSY; MELANCTHON.

Philipp, Dirk, one of the most eminent co-laborers of Simon Menno (q. v.), was born in 1504 at Lomen, the capital of Friesland, of Romanish parentage. He was carefully and piously reared, and had unusual educational facilities in his time. When the Anabapists came to Friesland, Philipp, who was then a de-voted Romanist, soon became interested in the new doctrines; and after his brother Ubbo, a common mechanic, had embraced the modern teachings and become a preacher, Dirk also found pleasure in them; forsook the Church of Rome, and was rebaptized. As a preacher of the new doctrines he was stationed at Applingemum (Groningen), where he lived so contented in that station until the Anabaptists advocated the extreme socialistic views. About the year 1583 or 1585 these two brothers came out boldly against the Münster ideas of the Anabaptists, and thus prepared the way for the revolution which Menno shortly after effected. After 1586 the brethren of Philipp disappear, and are but little heard of. At the conference of the different Anabaptists held at Buck-holt, in Westphalia, they do not seem to have been present. In 1548 we find them at Emden. After that we only meet Dirk now and then, but always in closest intimacy with Menno. Ubbo finally separated from both Dirk and Menno, and took a conciliatory position between the Protestants and Romanists. But Dirk remained true to Menno, and ever after is warmly commended by the great Dutch Reformer and founder of the Quakers of Holland. After the death of Simon Menno, Dirk was more or less involved, and that unhappily, in the controversies which agitated the Dutch Anabaptists. In 1568 he was at Dantzic, but was so much sought after at home that the sixty-four-year-old man consented to return to Emden. He died there in 1583. His many pamphleteering publications have been collected in his Exarchia, or "Hand-book," among which there is an Apology or Defence of the Anabaptists; a treatise on Christian Marriage, etc. It is the universal testimony of Protestants and Romanists that Dirk Philipp was a very learned man in the Scriptural languages, and a pithy orator of the very highest order.

Philippussohn, Moses, a noted Hebraist, was born May 9, 1775, in Sandersleben, a small town on the Wipper, and was destined for a rabbinist by his parents, who began to initiate him into Hebrew when he was scarcely four years of age. In 1787 he was sent to a rabbinic school at Halberstadt, where he was instructed in the Talmud and other branches of rabbinic literature. He then went to Brunswick, where he devoted himself to the study of the sciences generally, and in particular Hebrew theology, acquiring a most striking and charming style in Hebrew composition. In 1799, when only four and twenty, he was appointed master of the noted Jewish school at Dessau, where the celebrated historian Jost and the philosopher Mendelssohn were educated. Here Philippussohn prosecuted more zealously than ever the study of Hebrew and the Hebrew Scriptures, and determined to continue, with the aid of his three colleagues, the great Bible work commenced by Mendelssohn (q. v.), selecting the minor prophets for their conjoint labor. In 1795, S. Th. Hone and Joel, being the two most difficult books of the twelve minor prophets; his colleague Wolf the translation and exposition of Obadiah, Micah, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah; his colleague Solomon undertook Haggai and Zechariah; while Neuman undertook the Hagiographa. The entire work, as it had been already published by Löwe (q. v.); and the whole was published under the title סדרונות לענבה, a Pure Offering, at Dessau, in 1805. Three years later Philippussohn published a Hebrew Grammar and Chrestomathy, entitled חידראים ו却דראים, Friend of Students (Dessau, 1808; 2d improved ed. 1822); and a Hebrew Commentary on the Book of Daniel, with a translation by Wolf (ibid. 1808). He also wrote essays on various subjects connected with Hebrew literature in the Hebrew periodical called עירדיא, The Gatherer, and died April 20, 1814. See Steinschneider, Catalogue Libr. Hebr. in Bibliotheca Rodliana, col. 2099, and the interesting biographical sketch by Dr. Ph. Philippson, in his Biographische Rätsel (Leips. 1881); Jost, Gesch. der Juden, und seiner Sitten (see Index in vol. iii.).

Philips, Edward, M.A., an English divine, was born near the middle of the 16th century. He was entered a student in Broaglate's Hall, now Pembroke College, in 1574; became preacher at St. Saviour's, Southwark, London, and died about 1600. He was a Calvinist, and esteemed "a person zealous of the truth of God, earnest in his calling, faithful in his message, powerful in his speech, careful of his flock, peaceable and blameless in his life, and comfortable and constant in his death." His published sermons are entitled, Certaine Cordly and Learned Sermons, Preached by that worthy Servant of Christ at St. Saviour's, in Southwark; and were taken by the pen of H. Welerton, of Gray's Inn, Genessem (Lond. 1607, 4to).

Philips, Thomas, a Roman Catholic divine, was born of Protestant parentage at Infld, in Buckinghamshire; received his education at St. Omer's, and there became a zealous Romanist. He entered into orders, and became a Jesuit, but quitted that society, and obtained a prebend in the collegiate church of Tongres, with a dispensation to reside in England. He was the author of The Study of Sacred Letters, and Considered and Considered, or the Life of Cardinal Pole (Oxf. 1764-67, 2 vols.). He died at Liege in 1774. Philips was a man of eminent piety, and a writer of considerable ability.

Philp's (St.) and James's (St.) Day, a festival observed in memory of the apostles Philip and James the Less, on the 1st of May. In the Greek Church the festival of St. Philip is kept on the 14th of November.

Philistia (Heb. פֶּלֶסְח, פֶּלֶסְח, signifi doubtful [see below]; Sept. Ἀλλυρίας, the land of the Philistines, as it is usually styled in prose (Gen. xxi, 32, 33; Exod. xiii, 17; 1 Sam. xxvii, 1, 7; xxix, 11; 1 Kings iv, 21; 2 Kings viii, 2, 8). This term is rendered in our version sometimes "Palestine," as in Exod. xiv, 14, and Isa. xxi, 9, xxvi, 12; Ps. cxxvii, 4; but "Philistines" in Ps. lx, 8; lxxxi, 4, and es, 9; and "Philistines" in Ps. lxxxiii, 7. "Palestine" originally meant nothing but the district inhabited by the "Philistines," who are called by Josephus Πελασγίων, "Palestines" (Ant. v, 6). In fact the two words are the same, and the difference in form is but the result of gradual corruption. The form Philistia does not occur anywhere in the Sept. or Vulgate. In Exod. xv, 14 this word (Pelaseh) is used along with Canaan, and as distinct from it; in Joel iii, 4, ita "coasts" are referred to (for it was a littoral terri- tory), and are coupled with Tyre and Sidon as having sold into slavery the children of Judah and Jerusalem, and carried off silver and gold from the Temple; and in Isa. xiv, 29-31 it is told not to congratulate itself on the death of Ahas, who had smitten it. In Ps. lx, 8; lxxxi, 7; lxxii, 11, 12; lxxiii, 9, 10; lxxvii, 9, 10 Philo says of Palestine, νότος πρωτογενοῦς Χαναναίων, and Jerome says, "Terra Judaea quae nunc appellatur Palestina." (see Reiland, Palest. chap. i, vii, viii.) In the Talmud and the Arabic it likewise does not the whole land of the Jews. See PALESTINE.

The name itself has given rise to various conjectures. Hitzig identifies the Philistines with Παλαιστηι, and supposes the word, after the Semitic Vulakhah, to denote the white races, as opposed to the Phoenician or dusky races (see Kruetzcr, Phem, p. 169). This makes it a translation of the name of their country, פַּלְסָל, φελσικ, the low country (A. V. "valley" or "plain"). Knobel, Gesenius, Movers, and Roth take it from the root פָּלָס, "to emigrate," of which Αλλυρίας is supposed to be a translation. First substantially agrees with this etymology, from the same Heb. root, in the sense of "wandering." Stark regards this Greek term as opposed to Ἀμβροσί, "of the same race" (Graec, p. 67); and Von Lengerke looks upon it as a playful transposition of Φελσικιος. Αλλυρίας seems, in later Greek, to denote a foreign race living in a country among its natives. Thus Pto- lybius gives the name to the forces of Hannibal located in Gaul and Italy. (Strab. v, 6). The Sept. made this way, given it to a race that lived in a country which God had conferred in promise on the Hebrew people. The same name is for a like reason given to the population of Galleia (1 Macc. v, 15).

Philistia prospered for a long and somewhat broad strip of land lying on the sea-coast, west of the hills of Ephraim and Judah, and stretching generally from Egypt to Phocinia. The northern portion of this territory, from Joppa nearly as far as Askelon, was allotted to Dan; and the southern portion, from Gaza to Ashdod, was allotted to Judah. In short, it comprised the southern coast and plain of Canaan, along the Mediterranean, hence called "the sea of the Philistines" (Exod. xxviii, 31), from Ekron to the border of Egypt; though at certain times the Philistines had also in possession large portions of the interior (1 Sam. ix. 7; lxxxvii. 4; xvii. 10; 1 Sam. xxxi. 8; 1 Kings xv. 27; 1 Sam. lxxiii. 7). The land of the Philistines partakes of the general desolation common to it with Judea and other neighboring tracts, as it comes to pass that, except the immediate environs of a few villages, the whole country is a desert abandoned to the Bedawin Arabs, who feed their flocks on it (Zeph. ii. 4-7). See PHILISTINE.

Philistia (Gen. x. 14). See PHILISTINE.

Philistia (Heb. יִפְלִיסִית, יִפְלִיסִית, genitive from יִפְלִיס, יִפְלִיס, Sept. ἁλφολοχος, but sometimes Φυ- λισίτης, for the plur., which is the usual form; A. V. once "Philistia," Gen. x. 14; Ἰοσαβάθ, Ὀλισάμ, Ὀλασάμ, v. 11), a race of aboriginal Canaanites inhabiting the land of Philistia (q. v.). The following article contains the Scripture information that can be derived from other sources.

1. Early History. - The origin of the Philistines is nowhere expressly stated in the Bible; but since the prophets describe them as "the Philistines from Caphtor" (Amos ix. 7), and "the remnant of the maritime district (Caphtor)" (Ezek. xxvi, 4), it is generally assumed that they were the "Caphtorims which came out of Caphtor" who expelled the Avim from their territory and occupied it in their place (Deut. ii. 23), and that these again were the Caphtorim mentioned in the Mosaic genealogical table among the descendants of Dan (1 Chron. v. 13). But in establishing this conclusion certain difficulties present themselves: in the first place, it is observable that in Gen. x. 14 the Philistines are connected with the Cushalim rather than the Caphtorim. It has generally been assumed that the text has suffered a transposition, and that the parataetical clause "out of whom came Philistia" ought to follow the words "and Caphtorim." This explanation is, however, inadmissible; for (1) there is no external evidence whatever of any variation in the text, either here or in the parallel passage in 1 Chron. i. 12; and (2) if the transposition were effected, the desired sense would not be gained; for the words rendered in the A. V. "out of whom" (מֵאָשֶׁר) really mean "whence," and denote a local movement rather than a genealogical descent, so that, as applied to the Caphtorim, they would merely indicate a sojourn of the Philistines in their land, and not the identity of it as a people. The clause seems to have an appropriate meaning in its present position: it looks like an interpolation into the original document with the view of explaining when and where the name Philistia was first applied to the people whose proper designation was Caphtorim. It is an etymological as well as a historical memorandum; for it is based on the meaning of the name Philistia (from the root פלס, פלס, "to migrate"); a term which is said to be still current in Abyssinia [Knobel, Vollkert, p. 281], and which on the Egyptian monuments appears under the form of Pulpot [Brugsch, Hist. d'Egypt, p. 187], viz. "emigrant," and is designed to account for the application of that name. But a second and more serious difficulty arises out of the language of the Philistines; for while the Caphtorim were Hamitic, the Philistine language is held to have been Semitic. (Hitzig, in his Urgeschichte d. Phil. however, maintains that the language is Indo-European, with a view to prove the Philistines to be Pelasgi. He is, we believe, singular in his view.) It has hence been inferred that the Philistines were in reality a Semitic race, and that they derived the title of Caphtorim simply from a residence in Caphtor (Ewald, i. 331; Movers, Ptolemais, iii, 258), and it has been noticed in confirmation of this that their land is termed Canaan (Zeph. ii. 5). But this seems to be inconsistent with the express assertion of the Bible that they were Caphtorim (Deut. ii. 23), and not simply that they came from Caphtor; and the term Canaan is applied to their country, not ethnologically but etymologically, to describe the trading habits of the Philistines. The difficulty arising out of the question of language has been met by assuming either that the Caphtorim adopted the language of the conquered Avim (a not unusual circumstance where the conqueror assimilated the bulk of the people), or that they diverged from the Hamitic stock at a period when the distinctive features of Hamitic and Semitic were yet in embryo. (See below.) A third objection to their Egyptian origin is raised from the application of the term "uncircumcised" to them (1 Sam. xvii. 26; 2 Sam. i. 20), which shows the Egyptians were circumcised (Herod. ii. 30). But this objection is answered by Jer. ix. 25, 26, where the same term is in some sense applied to the Egyptians, however it may be reconciled with the statement of Herodotus. See CAPHTOR.

There is additional evidence to the above that the Philistines belonged to the Semitic family. The names of their cities and their proper names are of Semitic origin. In their intercourse with the Israelites there are many intimations that the two used a common language. How is this, if those kings resided in Palestine? This difficulty is removed by supposing that originally they were in Palestine, being a part of the great Semitic family, went westward, under pressure from the wave of population which came down from the higher country to the sea-coast, and afterwards ranged farther and farther back from the coast to Palestine; so that in Amos ix. 7 it is to be understood that God brought them up to Palestine, as he brought the Israelites out of Egypt—back to their home. This view the passage undoubtedly admits; but we cannot agree with Movers in holding that it gives direct evidence to its favor, though his general position is probably correct, that the Philistines first quitted the mainland for the neighboring islands of the Mediterranean sea, and then, after a time, returned to their original home (Movers, p. 19, 29, 35). Greek writers, however, give evidence of a wide diffusion of the Semitic race over the islands of the Mediterranean. Thucydidus says (i, 8) that most of the islands were inhabited by Carians and Phoenicians. Of Crete, Herodotus (i. 173) declares that barbarians had, before Minos, formed the population of the island. There is evidence in Homer to the same effect (Od. ix. 174; comp. Strabo, p. 475). Many proofs offer themselves that, before the spread of the Hellenes, these islands were inhabited by Semitic races. The worship observed in them at this time shows a Semitic origin. The Philistines gave place to the Greeks by a rapid change which dates from the time of Minos, who drove them out of the islands, giving the dominion to his son. The expelled population settled on the Asiatic coast. This evidence, derived from heathen sources, gives a representation which agrees with the scriptural account of the destruction of the Philistines by the westerly wandering of the eastward return of the Philistines. But chronology creates a difficulty. Minos probably lived about the year B.C.1300. According to the O. T. the Philistines were found in Palestine at an earlier period. In Gen. xx. 2; xxvi, 1, we find a Philistine king, "king of the Philistines." At a later period (Josh. x. 25) we find a Philistine king "king of the Philistines," and a Philistine "king of the Philistines." At a later period (Josh. x. 25) we find a Philistine king, "king of the Philistines," and a Philistine "king of the Philistines." inhabitants of the islands, gave themselves to navigation. To these tribes the Philistines appear to have belonged, who, for what reason we know not, left Crete, and settled on the coast of Palestine.

2. The next question therefore that arises relates to the early movements of the Philistines. It has been very generally assumed of late years that Caphthor represents Crete, and that the Philistines migrated from that island, either directly or through Egypt, into Palestine. This hypothesis presupposes the Semitic origin of the Philistines; for we believe that there are no traces of Hamitic settlements in Crete, and consequently the Biblical statement that Caphthor was descended from Mizraim forms an a priori objection to the view. Moreover, the name Caphthor can only be identified with the Egyptian Coptos. But the Cretan origin of the Philistines has been deducted, not so much from the name Caphthor, as from what of the Cherethites. This name in its Hebrew form (צפר) bears a close resemblance to Crete; and is rendered Cretans in the Sept. A further link between the two terms has apparently been discovered in the term צפר,  צפר, which is applied to the royal guard (2 Kings xi, 4, 19), and which sounds like Cretans. The latter of these arguments assumes that the Cherethites of David's guard were identical with the Cherethites of the Philistine plain, which appears in the highest degree improbable. See CHERETHITE. With regard to the former argument, the mere coincidence of the names cannot pass for much without some corroborative testimony. The Bible furnishes none, for the name occurs but thrice (1 Sam. xxx, 14; Ezek. xxv, 16; Zeph. ii, 8), and apparently applies to the occupants of the southern district; the testimony of the Sept. is invalidated by the fact that it is based upon the mere sound of the word (see Zeph. ii, 6, where Kere is also rendered Crete); and, lastly, we have to account for the introduction of the classical name of the island side by side with the Hebrew term Caphthor. A certain amount of testimony is indeed adduced in favor of a connection between Crete and Philistia; but, with the exception of the vague rumor, recorded but not adopted by Tacitus (Hist. v, 8), the evidence is confined to the town of Gaza, and even in this case is not wholly satisfactory. The town, according to Stephanus Byzantinus (a. v. Porco), was termed Minoa, as having been founded by Minos, and this tradition may be traced back to, and was perhaps founded on, an inscription on the coins of that city, containing the letters ΜΕΙΝΩ; but these coins are of no higher date than the 1st century B.C., and belong to a period when Gaza had attained a decided Greek character (Josephus, War, ii, 6, 8). Again, the worship of the god Marn, and its identity with the Cretan Jove, are frequently mentioned by early writers (Movera, Phoin. i, 682); but the name is Phoenician, being the marum, "lord," of 1 Cor. xvi, 22, and it seems more probable that Gaza and Crete derived the worship from a common source, Phoenicia. Without therefore asserting that migrations may not have taken place from Crete to Philistia, we hold that the evidence adduced to prove that they did is not altogether sufficient. What is remarkable, and as if two distinct and unrelated peoples bore the same appellation, on a tablet of Hanno III at Medinet Habu is sculptured a naval victory over the Sharkatana, perhaps the Cherethites of Crete; while another nation of the same name, perhaps the Cherethites of the mainland, form a portion of the Egyptian army. We find also the name Pulasaita in close connection with this Sharkatana. See CRETE.

On the other hand, it has been held by Ewald (i, 330) and others that the Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. xx, 23) were Cherethites and Philistines. The objections to this view are: (1) that it is highly improbable that David would select his officers from the hereditary foes of his country, particularly so immediately after he had enforced their submission; (2) that there appears no reason why an undue prominence should have been given to the Cherethites by placing that name first, and altering Philistines into Pelethites, so as to produce a paronomasia; (3) that the names subsequently applied to the same body (2 Kings xi, 19) are appellatives; and and (3) that the notice in Deut. ii. 23, which certainly bears marks of an antiquity, belong to a late date, and refers solely to the Cherethites. But, beyond these inconsistencies, there are two points which appear to militate against the theory of the second immigration in the time of the Judges: (1) that the national title of the nation always remained Philistine, whereas, according to this theory, the Philistines in the neighborhood of Gerar (Gen. xxi, 32; xxvi, 8) and this position accords well with the statement in Deut. ii. 23 that the Avim dwelt in Hazerim, i.e. in nomad encampments; for Gerar lay in the south country, which was just adapted to such a life. At the time of the Exodus they dwelt in the same neighborhood, but grew sufficiently powerful to inspire the Israelites with fear (Exod. xiii. 17; xvi. 14). When the Israelites arrived, they were in full possession of the Shephelah from the "river of Egypt" (El-Ariah) in the south to Ekron in the north (Josh. xv. 4, 47), and had formed a confederation of five powerful cities—Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron (Josh. xiii. 3). At what period these cities were originally founded we know not, but there are good grounds for believing that they were of Canaanitish origin, and had previously been occupied by the Canaanites; for the Joshua is doubtless; and the terminations both of this and Ekron may be Philistine. Gaza is mentioned as early as in Gen. vi. 19 as a city of the Canaanites; and this as well as in Josh. x. 5 alludes to its state at Joshua's time the presence of the Canaanitic Anakim (Josh. xi. 22). The interval that elapsed between Abraham and the Exodus seems sufficient to allow for the alteration that took place in the position of the Philistines, and their transformation from a pastoral tribe to a settled and powerful nation. But such a view has not met with acceptance among modern critics, partly because it leaves the migrations of the Philistines wholly unconnected with any known historical event, and partly because it does not serve to explain the great increase of their power in the time of the Judges. To meet these two requirements a double migration on the part of the Philistines, or of the two branches of that nation, has been suggested. Knobel, for instance, regards the Philistines proper as a branch of the same stock as that to which the Lykoon belonged, and he discovers the name Philistine in the proper name Philiat or Philia, bestowed on the Shepherds kings (Herod. ii. 128); their first entrance into Canaan from the Casalibum would thus be subsequent to the patriarchal age, and coincident with the expulsion of the Hyksos. The Cherethites he identifies with the Cherethites who peopled the Shephelah, and he regards the Bashan, who did not enter Canaan before the period of the Judges. The former part of his theory is inconsistent with the notices of the Philistines in the book of Genesis; these, therefore, he regards as additions of a later date (Vulgar. p. 218 sq.). The view adopted by Movers is, that the Philistines were carried westward from Palestine into Lower Egypt by the stream of the Hyksos movement at a period subsequent to Abraham; from Egypt they passed to Crete, and returned to Palestine in the early period of the Judges (Phoen. iii. 296). This is inconsistent with the notices in Joshua. Ewald, in the second edition of his Geschichte, propounds the hypothesis of a double immigration from Crete, the first of which took place in the ante-patriarchal period, as a consequence either of the Canaanitic settlement or of the Hyksos movement, the second in the time of the Judges (Gesch. i. 329-331). We cannot regard the above views in any other light than as speculations, built up on very slight data, and unsatisfactory, inasmuch as they fail to reconcile the statements of Scripture. For they all presuppose that the notice of Captorim in Gen. x. 14 applies to an entirely distinct tribe from the Philistines, as Ewald (i. 381, note) himself allows; (2) that either the notices in Gen. xx, xxvi, or those in Josh. xv. 43-47, or perchance both, are interpolations; Tyre (Justin, viii, 3). About the same period, or a little after, they were engaged in a naval war with Remes III of Egypt, in conjunction with other Mediterranean nations; in these wars they were unsuccessful (Buiges, Hist. d'Egypte, p. 185, 187), but the notice of them proves their importance, and we cannot therefore be surprised that they were able to extend their authority over the Israelites, devote as these were of internal misrule, and harassed by external foes. With regard to their tactics and the objects that they had in view in their attacks on the Israelites, we may form a fair idea from the scattered notices in the books of Judges and Samuel. The warfare was of a guerilla character, and consisted of a series of raids into the enemy's country. Sometimes these extended only just over the border, with the view of plundering the threshing-floors of the agricultural produce (1 Sam. xxiii, 1); but more generally they penetrated into the heart of the country and seized a commanding position on the edge of the Jordan valley, whence they could secure themselves against a combination of the Trans-Jordanic and Edomite divisions of the Israelites, or prevent a return of the fugitives who had hurried across the river on the alarm of their approach. Thus at one time we find them crossing the central district of Benjamin and posting themselves on Michmash (xxiii, 12), the next time, following the coast-road to the plain of Ederaelon and reaching the edge of the Jordan valley by Jezreel (xxiii, 11). From such posts as their headquarters they sent out detached bands to plunder the surrounding country (xiii, 17), and, having obtained all they could, they established some military mark (2 Sam. vii, 19; A.v. "garrison," but perhaps meaning only a colony, as in Gen. xxxix, 26) as a token of their supremacy (1 Sam. x, 5; xiii, 7), and retreated to their own country. This system of incursions kept the Israelites in a state of perpetual discontent: all commerce was suspended, from the insecurity of the roads (Judg. v, 7); and at the approach of the foe the people fled to the natural hiding-places of the country, or fled across the Jordan (1 Sam. xii, 6, 7). By degrees the ascendency became complete, and a virtual disarmament of the population was the effect of the suppression of the smites (xiii, 19). The profits of the Philistines were not confined to the goods and chattels they carried off with them. They seized the persons of the Israelites and sold them for slaves; the earliest notice of this occurs in 1 Sam. xiv, 21, where, according to the probably correct reading of 1872, and not 1872 followed by the Sept., we find that there were numerous slaves in the camp at Michmash: at a later period the prophets inveigh against them for their traffic in human flesh (Joel iii, 6; Amos i, 6): at a still later period we hear that "the merchants of the country" followed the army of Gerges into Judaea for the purpose of buying the children of Israel for slaves (1 Macc. iii, 41), and that these merchants were Philistines is a fair inference from the subsequent notice that Nicanor sold the captive Jews to the "cities upon the sea-coast" (2 Macc. viii, 11). There can be little doubt, too, that tribute was exacted from the Israelites, but the notices of it are confined to passages of questionable authority, such as the rendering of 1 Sam. xxii, 21 in the Sept., which represents the Philistines as making a charge of three shekels a tool for sharpening them; and again the expression "Methge-ammah" in 2 Sam. viii, 1, which is rendered in the Vulg. "fratum tributum," and by Symmachus τὴν ξύλειαν τοῦ φιδίου (the true text may have been θύσιν, instead of ἔργον). In each of the passages quoted the versions presuppose a text which yields a better sense than the existing one.

III. Connection of the Philistines with Biblical History.—Here we recur to the Biblical narrative.

1. Under Joshua and the Judges. —The territory of the Philistines, having been once occupied by the Canaanites, formed a portion of the Promised Land, and was assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv, 2, 12, 45-47). No part, however, of it was conquered in the lifetime of Joshua (xiii, 2), and even after his death no permanent conquest was effected (Judg. iii, 3), though, on the authority of a somewhat doubtful passage, we are informed that the three cities of Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron were taken (Judg. i, 18). The Philistines, at all events, soon recovered these, and commenced an aggressive policy against the Israelites, by which they gained a complete ascendency over them. We are unable to say at what intervals their incursions took place, as nothing is recorded of them in the early period of the Judges. It seems as if they must have been in existence, indeed, as much as the national spirit of the Israelites was so entirely broken that they even reproved any attempt at deliverance (xv, 12). Individual heroes were raised up from time to time whose achievements might well kindle patriotism, such as Shamgar the son of Anath (iii, 81), and still more Samson (xii-xvi); but neither of these men succeeded in permanently throwing off the yoke. Of the former only a single daring feat is recorded, the effect of which appears, from Judg. v, 6, 7, to have been very shortlived. The true series of deliverances connected with the latter was predicted that "he shall begin to deliver" (xiii, 5), and were carried on by Samuel, Saul, and David. A brief notice occurs in Judg. vii, 5 of invasions by the Philistines and Ammonites, followed by particulars which apply exclusively to the latter people. It has hence been supposed that the brief reference to the Philistines is in anticipation of Samson's history.

The history of Samson furnishes us with some idea of the relations which existed between the two nations. As a "borderer" of the tribe of Dan, he was thrown into frequent contact with the Philistines; and as the Philistines were a people whose name was so established that no bar appears to have been placed to free intercourse with their country. His early life was spent on the verge of the Shephelah between Zorah and Eshtaol, but when his actions had aroused the active hostility of the Philistines he withdrew into the central district, and found a secure post on the seacoast at Ashdod, which is given in Judg. xv, 1 f. The Philistines followed him without opposition from the inhabitants. His achievements belong to his personal history: it is clear that they were the isolated acts of an individual, and altogether unconnected with any national movement; for the revenge of the Philistines was not the movement directed against Samson personally. Under Eli there was an organized and unsuccessful resistance to the encroachments of the Philistines, who had penetrated into the central district and were masters of Eben-ezer (1 Sam. iv, 1). The production of the ark on this occasion demonstrates the greatness of the emergency, and its loss marked the lowest depth of Israel's degradation. The next action took place under Samuel's leadership, and the tide of success turned in Israel's favor: the Philistines had been penetrated into the Arabo-Bashan country near Jerusalem; at Mizpeh they met the cowed host of the Israelites, who, encouraged by the signs of divine favor, and availing themselves of the panic produced by a thunderstorm, inflicted on them a total defeat. For the field of the Philistines erstwhile called Lechi or Hekele at Eben-ezer as the token of victory. The results were the recovery of the border-towns and their territories "from Ekron even unto Gath," i.e. in the northern district. The success of Israel may be partly ascribed to their peaceful relations at this time with the Amorites (1 Sam. vii, 9-14).

2. Under the Hebrew Monarchy.—The Israelites now attributed their past weakness to their want of unity, and they desired a king, with the special object of leading them against the foe (1 Sam. viii, 20). It is a strange fact that Saul first felt inspiration in the presence of a pillar (A. V. "garrison") erected by the Philistines in commemoration of a victory (x, 5, 10). As soon as he was prepared to throw off the yoke he occupied with his army a position at Michmash, commanding the defiles leading to the Jordan valley, and his heroic general Jonathan gave the signal for a rising by overthrowing the pillar which the Philistines had placed there. The challenge was accepted; the Philistines invaded the central district with an immense force (a copyist's clerical exaggeration [see Num. xxvii, 8], and, having dislodged Saul from Michmash, occupied it themselves, and sent forth predaceous bands into the surrounding country. The Israelites shortly after took up a position on the other side of the ravine at Gala, and availing themselves of the confusion consequent on the death of Pharaoah's eldest son inflicted tremendous slaughter upon the enemy (ch. xii, xiv).

No attempt was made by the Philistines to regain their supremacy for about twenty-five years, and the scene of the next contest shows the altered strength of the two parties: it was no longer in the central district, but in a ravine leading down to the Philistine plain, the valley of Elah, the position of which is about fourteen miles south-west of Jerusalem; on this occasion the prowess of young David secured success to Israel, and the foe was pursued to the gates of Gath and Ekron (ch. xvii). The power of the Philistines was, however, still intact on their own territory, as is proved by the flight of David to the court of Achish (xxi, 10-15), and his subsequent abode at Ziklag (ch. xxi, 2), where he was secured from the attacks of Saul. The border warfare was continued; captures and reprisals, such as are described as occurring at Keilah (xxiii, 1-5), being probably frequent. The scene of the next conflict was far to the north, in the valley of Ecdraelon, whether the Philistines may have made a plundering incursion similar to that of the Midianites in the days of Jephthah. On this occasion the dissensions among the Israelites: Saul himself perished, and the Philistines penetrated across the Jordan, and occupied the forlorn cities (xxxi, 1-7). The dissensions which followed the death of Saul were naturally favorable to the Philistines, who were then given to a close appointment of David to be king over the united tribes than the Philistines attempted to counterbalance the advantage by an attack on the person of the king; they therefore penetrated into the valley of Rephaim, south-west of Jerusalem, and even pushed forward an advanced post as far as Bethlehem (1 Chron. xi, 16). David twice attacked them at the former spot, and on each occasion with signal success, in the first case capturing their images, in the second pursuing them "from Gala until thou come to Gazer" (2 Sam. vi, 17-20; 1 Chron. xiv, 8-16). About seven years after the defeat at Rephaim, David, who had now consolidated his power, attacked them on their own soil, and took Gath, with its dependencies (1 Chron. xvi, 1), and thus (according to one interpretation of the obscure expression "Methath-sammâm" in 2 Sam. vii, 1) "he took the arm-bridle out of the hand of the Philistines" (Bernheu., Comm. on 1 Chron.), or (according to another) "he took the bridle of the metropolis out of the hand of the Philistines" (Genesijs, Theaur., p. 118)—meaning in either case that their ascendancy was utterly broken. As he appears to have summoned to his aid, proved themselves to be the "cockatrice that should come out of the serpent's (Juda'h's) of the rival kings Demetrius II and Alexander Balas, under Apollonius and Jonathan respectively, contended in the Philistine plains: Jonathan took Ashdod, triumpantly entered Ashkelon, and received Ekron as his reward (1 Macc. v, 69-89). A few years later Jonathon again descended into the plain in the interests of Philistia. The capital Gaza was captured by the king, who then formed an alliance with the Egyptians, as a counterpoise to the Assyrians, and the possession of Philistia became henceforth the turning-point of the struggle between the two great empires of the East. Henceforth, in the early part of his reign, re-established his authority over the whole of it, "even unto Gaza" (2 Kings xviii, 8). This movement was evidently connected with his rebellion against the king of Assyria, and was undertaken in conjunction with the Egyptians; for we find the latter people shortly after in possession of five Philistine cities, to which alone are we able to refer the prediction in Isa. xxx, 18, when coupled with the fact that both Gaza and Ashkelon are termed Egyptian cities in the annals of Sargon (Bunson, Egypt, iv, 608). The Assyrians under Tantor, the general of Sargon, made haste to march against Egypt, to the Ashtod, as the key of that country (Isa. xx, 1, 4, 5). Under Sennacherib Philistia was again the scene of important operations: in his first campaign against Egypt Ashkelon was taken and its dependencies were plundered; Ashdod, however, resisting, was rewarded as a "reward of Hezekiah's territory" (Rawlinson, Herod., i, 477); in his second campaign (on the view that the two were different) other towns on the verge of the plain, such as Libnah and Lachish, were also taken (2 Kings xviii, 14; xix, 6). The Assyrian supremacy, though shaken by the failure of this latter expedition, was restored by Esar-haddon, who claims to have conquered Egypt (Rawlinson, i, 481); and it seems probable that the Assyrians retained their hold on Ashdod until its capture, after a long siege, by the Egyptian monarch. Hence, with the earliest ages exclusively in possession of the traffic which was carried on between Europe and Asia. Besides a great transit trade, they had internal sources of wealth, being given to agriculture (Judg. xv, 5). In the time of Saul they were evidently superior in the arts of life to the Israelites; for we read (1 Sam. xiii, 20) that the latter were indebted to the former for the utensils of ordinary life.

The five chief cities had, as early as the days of Joshua, constituted themselves into a confederacy, restricted, however, in all probability, to matters of offence and defence. Each of the heads of the five cities possessed a general whose official title was sīrum, sīrim (Josh. iii, 8; Judg. iii, 8, etc.), and occasionally sīrīm (1 Sam. xviii, 30; xxix, 6). Gaza may be regarded as having exercised a hegemony over the others, for in the list of the towns it is mentioned the first (Josh. iii, 8; Amos i, 7, 8), except where there is an especial ground for giving prominence to another, as in the case of Ashtod (1 Sam. vi, 17). Ekron always stands last, while Ashdod, Ashkelon, and Gath interchanged places. Each town possessed its own territory, as instanced in the case of Gath (1 Chron. xviii, 1), Ashdod (1 Sam. vi, 6), and others, and each possessed its dependent towns or "daughter towns" (Josh. xxv, 65-67; 1 Chron. xviii, 1; 2 Sam. i, 20; Ezek. xvi, 27, 57), and its villages (Josh. i, c.). In later times Ashdod had a senate of five hundred (Joseph. Ant. iii, 13, 8).

The Philistines appear to have been deeply imbued with superstition: they carried their idols with them on their campaigns (2 Sam. v, 21), and proclaimed their victories in their presence (1 Sam. xxxi, 9). They also carried about of the most sacred things that had been presented before the idols (2 Macc. xii, 40). The gods whom they chiefly worshipped were Dagon, who possessed temples both at Gaza (Judg. xvi, 23) and at Ashtod (1 Sam. vi, 5-6; 1 Chron. x, 10; 1 Macc. x, 68), Ashoreth, whose temple at Ashdod was called Ashoreth-Hepher (1 Sam. xxviii, 10; 1 Sam. ii, 10; 1 Macc. ii, 10); Baal-zebub, whose name...
PHILLIPS

at Ekron was consulted by Ahaziah (2 Kings i, 2-6); and Derceto, who was honored at Ashkelon (Diod. Sic. ii, 4), though unnoticed in the Bible. Priests and diviners (1 Sam. vi, 2) were attached to the various seats of worship, and the Philistine magicians were in repute (Jas. ii, 6).

Phillips, Gnomoe, a Congregational minister, was born at Roodham, in the county of Norfolk, England, near the opening of the 17th century. Having given early indications of a remarkably vigorous mind, a strong love of knowledge, and a deep sense of religion, he was sent to the University of Cambridge, where he received his education, and distinguished himself as a scholar. Theology was his favorite study; and, when yet a young man, he had made himself familiar with the most celebrated of the fathers of the Christian Church.

Not long after his ordination he began to entertain scruples with regard to certain requirements of the Establishments of his Church; this dissatisfaction became so strong that at last he determined to emigrate to this country with a company of Puritans, among whom was John Winthrop. He arrived at Salem in 1630. Having founded with a number of others the settlement of Wat-tertown, Mass., Phillips became the first pastor of the Church, and as such he continued his labors till near the time of his death, which occurred July 1, 1644.

Phillips possessed no small degree of intellectual acumen, and was an able controversial writer. He was a man of great independence of mind, and adhered with unyielding tenacity to his conscientious convictions.

He seems to have been in advance of nearly all his contemporaries in regard to the principles of strict Congre-gationalism; insomuch that his views were, for a time, regarded as novel and extreme. His ministry was marked by great diligence and fervor, and attended with rich blessings. His publications are, Reply to the Constitution of some Grounds of Infant Baptism; as also Concerning the Form of a Church, putt forth against me by one Thomas Lamb (London, 1645, 4to). See Mather, Reformed Church*, i, 200 sqq.

Phillips, James, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, was born at Newendon, Essex County, England, April 22, 1792. His father was a minister of the Established Church of England, and attached to the Evangeli-gical party in that Church. His early education was acquired mostly while he was engaged in private study and teaching in the service of the English navy. His tastes and habits seem to have been fixed early, and to the impressions which he there received, and the scenes he witnessed at the great military and naval stations, may be traced many of his later habits and interests.
He came to America in 1818, and engaged in the business of teaching at Harlem, N.Y., where he remained for a number of years and had a flourishing school. There were at that time in New York and the neighborhood a number of American and British mathematicians who had organized a mathematical club, of which he became a member. To the mathematical club he was attached at the time he was a regular contributor, or at least to two of them—the Mathematical Repository and Nash's Diary. In 1826 he was invited to the vacant mathematical chair in the University of North Carolina, and entered upon the duties of his professorship in the month of July of the same year. In this position he continued to labor for forty years, devoting himself with unremitting care and attention to his duties. The amount of work he went through with is amazing. He projected a complete course of mathematical works, and published in 1828 a work on conic sections, which was afterwards adopted as a text-book in Columbia College, New York. He also published a series of lectures on algebra, geometry, trigonometry, differential and integral calculus, and natural philosophy, besides making for his own use translations of many of the French mathematicians—which works, however, he never made any attempt to publish. He also joined the other memers of the faculty in contributing his quota to the Harvardian, a newspaper published at Chapel Hill, in 1832, under the direction of Dr. Caldwell. Up to the time of his coming to North Carolina, and for many years after, he seems to have devoted himself exclusively to scientific studies. Although he had been for years a consistent member of the Church, yet now he began to experience a change, which he regarded as the true beginning of his Christian life. Henceforth he ceased to be the mere teacher of science; he added to his other duties the diligent study of theology and unwearying activity in all Christian duties, and in September, 1838, was licensed by the Presbytery of Orange, at New Hope, and in April, 1839, was ordained to the full work of the ministry. He was never installed as pastor, but he preached as a supply for some time at Pittsboro, and after his death, the greater part of his Christian life, at New Hope Church. He was in the full discharge of his professional duties when he died suddenly March 14, 1867. Dr. Phillips was a man of remarkable literary, thecological, and professional attainments. He was an inexorable mathematician, but well and thoroughly read in all departments. Many books in his library had this simple comment, "Perlegi." His chief religious reading was among the old Nonconformist divines; his favorite authors were the old English classical book that was ever in his hand was the Bible. He was a great precentor, and his sermons were commended for their there was nothing oratorical about him—it was the pure "weight of metal." As a man he was uncompromisingly conscientious, remarkably modest, free from all arrogrance and presumption, and yet most genial as a com-1868, p. 549. (J. L. S.)

Phillips, John, LL.D., an American philanthropist of some note, was born in Andover, Mass., Dec. 27, 1719; and was educated at Harvard College (class of 1738); and having preached for some time, at length engaged in mercantile pursuits, and was for several years a member of the Council of New Hampshire. In 1778 he and his brother, Samuel Phillips, of Andover, founded and liberally endowed the academy in that town, which was incorporated in 1780. In 1789 he further gave to this institution $20,000. The academy called Phillips Exeter Academy, of which he was the sole founder, was incorporated in 1781, with a fund which was eventually increased to $134,000. He endowed a professorship in Dartmouth College, and he contributed liberally to Princeton College. He died in April, 1795, bequeathing to his academy two thirds of all his estate, and one third of the residue to the seminary at Andover, particularly in the benefit of pious youth.

Phillips, Morgan, sometimes called Philip Morgan, was born during the latter part of the 15th century. He received his education at Oxford, graduating in the class of 1587. He was made principal of St. Mary's Hall in 1546, and was one of the founders of the English College at Douay, where he resided for some time, but where he was not so great that he was called "Morgan the Sophister," and he was one of the three selected to dispute with Peter Martyr on the Eucharist, and published on that occasion Disputatio de Sacramentis Ecclesiasticis in Univ. Oxon. habita contra D. Pet. Martyn, 1549. He also published two works in Latin, De Rebus Wisiensi Conformable to the Law of God and Nature (Ligue, 1571,.
Phillips, Richard, an English Wesleyan preacher, was born in 1777. In early life he was brought to Christ through Methodist influence, and, feeling called of God to the work of the ministry, entered the itinerant ranks in 1810 and continued in the active labors of the ministry until 1844, when debility constrained him to accept an assistant, and to preach only occasionally. "Blessed with a good understanding and a retentive memory, patient and prudent, enjoying the life of God in his soul and manifesting in his life the truths and discipline of Methodism, he preached those doctrines and administered that discipline to the profit of the Wesleyan body." See Wesleyan Magazine, 1846, p. 916.

Phillips, Samuel (1), a Congregational minister, was born Feb. 17, 1690 (O. S.), at Salem, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1708, and was ordained, Oct. 17, 1711, pastor of the South Parish, Andover, where he remained until his death, June 5, 1771. Samuel Phillips was a devoted orthodox preacher, and not only refused to be affected by the heretical tendencies of his times, but combated all Arian influences, and became a most decided opponent of the Unitarians. "As a preacher he was highly respectable, and so endowed not only to indoctrinate his people in sentiments which he deemed correct and important, but to lead them to the practice of all Christian duties." He published, Elegy upon the Death of Nicholas Noyes and George Cgrim (1718);——A Word of Counsel to the Duty of a People to take the Oath of Allegiance to a Glorious God (1725);——Advice to a Child (1729);——The History of the Saviour (1738);——The Orthodox Christian, or a Child well Instructed (1738);——A Minister's Address to his Child, Nov. 23, 1749 (4to);——A Sermon on the Duty to be done for Asking (1750);——A Sermon on the Sinner's Re- fusal to Come to Christ (1758);——A Sermon on the Necessity of God's Drawing in Order to Men's Coming unto Christ (1758);——Seasonable Advice to a Neighbor, in a Dialogue (1761);——Advice to Young People, in a Dialogue (1763); and several occasional sermons. See Sprague, Annals, i, 273.

Phillips, Samuel (2), LL.D., an American philanthropist, noted for his service to the state, derives a place here for the interest which he took in educational matters. He was born at Andover in 1751, and graduated at Harvard College in 1771. He was a member of the Provincial Congress in 1775, and of the House of Representatives till the year 1780, when he assisted in framing the constitution of Massachusetts. On its adoption he was elected a member of the Senate, and was its president from 1785 to 1802. Being appointed justice of the Court of Common Pleas for Essex in 1781, he held his office till 1797, when his declining health induced his resignation. He was commissioner of the state in Schanck's insurrection, and in 1801 was chosen lieutenant-governor. He died Feb. 10, 1802. Although so greatly honored with public eminence, he remained a faithful son of the Church of England, and was not only regular in his own observances, but ministered frequently to those unable to go to church. He appeared to be continually governed by love to the Supreme Being, and by the desire of imitating his benevolence and truth, he was Phillips's deep views of evangelical doctrine and duty, of human depravity and mediatorial mercy, formed his heart to humility, condescension, and kindness, and led him continually to depend on the grace of God through the atonement of his Son. He was one of the protectors of the Museum of the University of Andover, and was much concerned in establishing that, as well as the academy at Exeter, which were founded by his father and uncle. To these institutions he was a distinguished benefactor. He was also a founder of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences of Boston. At his death he left to the town of Andover $5000, the income to be applied to the education of a son of his death his widow, Phoebe Phillips, and his son, John Phillips, of Andover, evinced the same attachment to the interests of learning and religion, by uniting with Samuel Abbott, and three others of a most liberal and benevolent spirit, in founding the theological seminary at Andover, which was opened in September, 1808. See Dibdin, Dict. of Amer. Biog. s. v.; Brown, Rel. Cyclop. s. v.; Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog. s. v.

Phillips, Thomas, an English Roman Catholic priest, was born in Buckinghamshire in 1708. He received his education at St. Omer's College, and became in his zeal and ardent in the Church. He obtained a prebend in the collegiate church of Tournay for many years in the family of the earl of Shrewsbury. Towards the end of his life he retired to the English college at Lige, where he died in 1774. He published, The Study of Sacred Literature Fully Stated and Considered (London, 1746, 4to); 2d ed. 1758, 3d ed. 1765;)—Phileneum (1761, 4to). This autobiographical pamphlet was privately printed, and suppressed: — The History of the Life of Reginald Pole (Oxford, 1764—1767, 2 pts. in 1 vol. 4to; Lond. 1767, 2 vols. 8vo). This work elicited six answers, by Richard Lillibridge, T. Hakley, T. Neve, E. Stone, B. Pye, and J. Jones (see Chalmers, Biog. xxi, 460—461, 460), and Phillips responded in an appendix to the life (1767, 4to); see also end of his 8d ed. of Study of Sacred Literature:—Reasons for the Repeal of the Law against the Popists:—Translation in Metre of The Hymn Laudis Sion Translationis in Metre Cornelli a Lapide, in Latin, on a single sheet. He also addressed some poetry to his sister Elizabeth, abbess of the Benedictine nuns at Ghent. See Cole's M. S. Athen. in the British Museum; European Magazine, for September, 1796; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. s. v.

Phillips, William (1), a Christian philanthropist, was born in Boston April 10, 1750. Owing to feeble health, he was prevented from receiving many educational advantages. He entered upon mercantile pursuits with his father, from whom he received a large fortune at his death. In 1772 he made a profession of religion; in 1794 he was made a deacon of Old South Church, Boston, where he officiated until his death, May 26, 1817. He was highly respected by the community at large, and was influential in all the affairs of State and Church. He was at one time the lieutenant-governor of the State and was nominated for the United States Senate. He was also actively engaged in philanthropic labors, and was at his death president of the Massachusetts Bible Society. His charities were very extensive, and during a series of years amounted to from $8000 to $11,000. He bequeathed $15,000 to Phillips Academy; $40,000 to the theological institution at Andover; to the Society for Propagating the Gospel among the Indians, the Massachusetts Bible Society, the Foreign Mission Board, the Congregational Society, the Educational Society, and the Massachusetts General Hospital, each $5000; to the Medical Dispensary $3000; to the Female Asylum, and the Asylum for Boys, each $4000.

Phillips, William (2), a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Jesse County, Ky., May 7, 1757. Even as a youth he exhibited talents of a superior order. He received a careful and pious training, but he did not as a young man manifest any outward profession of religion; and after entering political life, and while engaged for several years as a successful teacher, he became even less considerate of his higher and immortal interests, and sought refuge from the accusations of conscience in the dark and cheerless regions of infidelity. His early impressions of religious truth were, however, strong and abiding, and he was finally converted, and deeply impressed with the idea that he was called of God to enter the Methodist ministry. Dec. 27, 1828, he was licensed as a local preacher. In the fall of 1831 he was received into the Kentucky Conference. He was appointed consecutively to the Winchester Circuit, Lexington Circuit, and Newport and Covington stations. He was also assistant editor of the Western Christian Advocate, serving for one year by appointment of the District Committee, and then by vote of the General Conference of 1836. Among his numerous contributions to that journal was a series of articles on the peculiar tenets of Alexander Campbell, which excited very considerable attention. These were republished, by request of the Ohio Conference, after Dr. Phillips's death, by the Reformed Union, 1836, only a few weeks after his election by the General Conference.

Phillips, William Wirt, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in Montgomery County, N. Y., Sept. 23, 1796. He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1812; completed a three years' course in the Associate or Reformed Theological Seminary, New York, and afterwards spent a year in the theological seminary at New Brunswick, N. J., under the instruction of Rev. Dr. Livingston; was licensed by the New Brunswick Classis of the Reformed Dutch Church, and in April, 1818, was ordained and installed pastor of Pearl Street Reformed Church, New York City. From this church he was called to the First Presbyterian Church, New York. The congregation having disposed of their building and ground in Wall Street, in May, 1844, the corner-stone of the building on Fifth Avenue, near Twenty-third Street, was laid in the following autumn, and soon after completed. Dr. Phillips was their beloved pastor for a period of nearly forty years; he was actively engaged in the discharge of his ministerial duties until about four weeks before his death, which occurred March 20, 1863. Dr. Phillips was a man of the utmost simplicity of character; a sound and able preacher of the Gospel, whose aim in the pulpit was to hold forth the Word of Life in all its purity, and to impress it with solemnity upon the hearts of all his hearers. He was moderator of the General Assembly which met at Pitts- burgh in 1855, and for many years previous to his death he was the presiding officer of the Board of Foreign Missions. He was also president of the Board of Publication; a trustee of Princeton College and Seminary; a director of the Sailors' Snug Harbor, and several other benevolent institutions. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 160; Congreg. Quar. 1859, p. 133. (J. L. S.)

Philippoteaux, Henry, D.D., an English prelate of much note, was the son of a respectable hotel-keeper of Gloucester, and was born in that city in 1777. At the age of fifteen he was elected to a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and having taken the degree of B.A., gained the chancellor's prize for an English essay in 1795. He was elected in the following year to a fellowship at Magdalen College, which he vacated on his marriage in 1804 with Miss Suttees, a niece of the late lord chancellor Eldon. In 1806 he became chaplain to Dr. Barrington, bishop of Durham, and in that capacity distinguished himself by a controversy in which he maintained against the learned Roman Catholic historian of the England, Dr. Languid (q. v.), and subsequently by the publication of some pamphlets, vindicating the established clergy in the North from the attacks of lords Grey and Durham. For those services he was rewarded with the living of the jurisdiction of Chester, which he exchanged in October, 1830, for the bishopric of Exeter. As a member of the House of Lords, bishop Philippoteaux proved the zealous champion of Tory principles, and consequently opposed the Reform Bill, the Irish Church Temporalities Bill, the Poor-law Bill, the Ecclesiastical Commission, the National Education Bill, and every measure of a liberal tendency. Dr. Philippoteaux was for many years in that assembly the recognised episcopal head and representative of the extreme HighChurch party, and by his writings and speeches warmly advocated the revival of convocation, and of other innovations which were calculated to cause a religious reformation. In 1849 he rejected Mr. Gorham, who was nominated by the crown to a living in Devonshire, on the ground that he held erroneous opinions as to the effects of infant baptism; and though he was supported by the ecclesiastical courts, their judgment could not be made to prevail by a vote of the judicial committee of the privy council in 1850. On this Dr. Philippoteaux published a Letter in which he formally excommunicated the archbishop of Canterbury, who had been a party to the decision (see Edinb. Rev. xcv. 98-103). See Gorham Case. In the following year he held a synod of his clergy at Exeter, which was pronounced illegal by the officers of the crown, and has never since been summoned. He died in 1869. The list of Dr. Philippoteaux's controversial pamphlets occupies no less than twelve pages in the new catalogue of the British Museum. His best-known publications are given in Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, &c. See English Cyclop. &c. &c. Men of the Time, &c. &c. Philos (surnamed in Latin Judaeus, i. e. the Jew; in Hebrew, יודאוס; in Greek, Philou [i] Φιλοθε̄ο̂ς], the greatest of ancient Jewish philosophers, flourished in the 1st century of the Christian era. He gave a somewhat lengthy exposition of his philosophic and religious opinions.

Life.—Philos was a native and throughout life a resident of Alexandria. The precise time of his birth is unknown, but he represents himself as of advanced age about A.D. 40, when he was sent as chief of an embassy from the Jews of Alexandria to the emperor Claudius, for the purpose of pleading their cause against Apion, who charged them with refusing to pay due honors to Cesar (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 8, 1; comp. De Legat. ad Caesar, xxviii). He was probably about sixty years old; if so, he was born about thirty years before the commission to Alexander mentioned in Acts iv, 6 as a man "of the kindred of the high-priest." That Philos was a member of the sacerdotal family is asserted by Josephus (Ant. xviii, 8, 1), and also by Eusebius, Jerome, and others, and his own writings indirectly testify that such was the fact. There is all reason to believe that he belonged to the sect of the Pharisees. Philos was eminent for his learning and eloquence. To the attainments usually secured by Jews of his social condition (Eusebius, Prep. Evang., viii, 13) he added an extensive knowledge of the Greek philosophy, especially the Platonic, for the acquisition of which the most favorable opportunities would occur in Alexandria, at that time the very metropolis of the learned world and the home of revived Hellenism. He has been represented by Scaliger and Cadwath as ignorant of Jewish literature and customs, but Fabricius and Mom-

they were no longer so much at home and versed in it that they could have fully mastered the Book which was to offer them the bread and water of life; it was the Grecian language that must bring it home to them." (p. 146; comp. also p. 148). As absurd as is this charge of Philo, it now speak the truth; the change of men's views was not fully apparent. Helpless and hopeless enough were the clique of men out of whom the first two Ptolemies hoped to form a school of philosophy; men certainly clever enough, and amusing withal, who might give the kings of Egypt many a shrewd lesson in kingscraft and the arts of this world, and the art of profit by the folly of fools and the selfishness of the selfish; or who might amuse them, in default of fighting-cocks, by puns and repartees, and battles of logic: 'how one thing cannot be predicated of another,' or 'how the wise man is not only to overcome every misfortune, but not even to feel it,' and other such weighty questions, which in those days hid that deep unbelief in any truth whatsoever which was spreading fast over the minds of men... during those frightful centuries which immediately preceded the Christian era, when was fast approaching that dark chaos without unbelieving, of the three worlds, of the Saul of Tarsus so analyzes and describes in the first chapter of his Epistle to the Romans; when the old light was lost, the old faiths extinct, the old reverence for the laws of family and national life destroyed, yea, the very nature of things, so that the chaos of whose darkness Juseph and Petrus and Tuci- tus have proved in their fearful pages not to have been exaggerated by the more compassionate though more righteous Jew" (p. 55-58).

Fortunately for the Macedonians, another Eastern nation had closely intermingled with them, and from this mixture of two races came that superior product which gave to Alexandrian thought not only a new impulse, but a superior life. When Hellenism was transferred to Alexandria, the Grecian spirit, as we have seen, could not do without a base, and with Hellenism had come Judaism also. True, the latter was not sought for and imported at the bidding of the mighty conqueror of three worlds, but he had suffered the Jews to find a home in Alexandria, and thus Judaism found its establishment there and there. The Ptolemies also pursued the same conciliatory policy; and Judaism gained strength and developed so much at Alexandria that it became a centre of Jewish thought and learning for several centuries, and its rabbis were called "the light of Israel."

Now it is to be expected that whenever two spiritual powers meet, such as Hellenism and Judaism, such as Grecian culture and Jewish religion—when two such spiritual world-reforming powers come into conflict with each other—that conflict must necessarily result in new formations; something new will always grow out of it, be it by their antagonism or by their spiritual interpenetration; new creations will be evolved, either bearing the character of both, or pre-eminently that of one of them, yet imbued, in a certain measure, by that of the other. The conflict between Hellenism and Judaism was principally a battle of words, of a radical change in the thought and belief of both Jew and Macedonian, which led to the formation of what came to be known as Neo-Platonism, a philosophy of syncretism, whose elements are partly Oriental (Alexandrian-Jewish in particular) and partly Hellenic; but whose form is strictly Hellenic, and whose peculiarity of doctrine is that it is distinguished from Plato's own by the principle of revelation contained in the new philosophy.

The great representative of this syncretism, which also reappeared afterwards in manifold shapes in Gnosticism, is our spirited and prolific theologian, Philo of Alexandria. He held to the divine character of the Old Testament, had very strict views of inspiration, and thought that the Mosaic law and the Temple worship were destined to be perpetual. He ascribed to the Jews a mission for all nations, boasted of their cosmopolitism, and called them priests and prophets, who offered sacrifice and invoked the blessing of God for all mankind. With him the expounding of the books of the Old Testament, is synonymous with the philosophy of his nation; but in his own exposition he allegorically interpreted his philosophic ideas which were derived from the natural internal development of Jewish notions, and partly obtained from Hellenic philosophy, and thus the theology of Philo has been aptly called a blending of Platonism and Judaism.

The allegorical method of interpreting the sacred Scriptures, which had long prevailed among the more cultivated of the Alexandrian Jews, was adopted by Philo without restriction. His principle that the prophets were only involuntary instruments of the Spirit which spoke through them was favorable to the freest use of this mode of exegesis. He pronounced those who would merely tolerate a literal interpretation of the Scriptures as low, unworthy, and superstitious; and while he was thus led astray frequently to the introduction of foreign heathen elements into the store of divine truths, Philo endeavored to redeem the results which, like all the anthropomorphisms for instance, seemed offensive to the culture of the time, Philo, like Origen (q.v.) in later times, far from rejecting the literal sense in every case, often, especially in the case of historical events, preterite and protracted, and the allegorical sense as equally true. But Philo, besides this, regarded as higher that conception of Scripture which penetrated beneath the shell of the letter to what he thought was the kernel of philosophical truth; beneath the anthropomorphic and anthropopathic representations of God, to that idealistic view of God which, in fact, dissolves him in the end of all concrete attributes. In this way, in spite of his opposition to Hellenic mysteries, Philo set up a radical distinction of initiated and uninitiated, a mode of interpretation which leads very easily to the contempt of the letter and, thus to an un-historical, abstractly spiritualistic tendency. See Interpretation. As a devoted, believing Jew, Philo accepted Judaism as a truth requiring no proof. But in him, as in others of the Alexandrian-Jewish school of philosophers before him, the desire was awakened to blend the Jewish inheritance with the newly acquired Greekian knowledge: to heighten the truths of Judaism by the addition of Hellenic culture; to reconcile both treasures with each other, so that each should make the lustre of the other shine the more clearly and brightly; to assimilate the Jewish theologically, and the Hellenic philosophically. The compromises must be effected between them. Judaism is the fruit of self-evidence, inner experience of a vivid conviction, for which no proof is required. Hellenism, on the contrary, proceeded from investigation, from human research, starting from the physical, to reach, by combination and analysis, the higher idea. These are two processes not only diverging in their progress, but even in their whole conception, and these two directly antagonistic views clashed against each other. But there was also in Hellenism a tendency which, although grown from the (Grecian) spirit, nevertheless endeavored to conceive, by a certain prophetic flight of poetry, the higher, thence to descend to the lower, and thus to make the former descend into lower degrees. It desired likewise directly to conceive the divine, the ideal, by intuition, by higher perception. With such a bold flight Plato conceived the everlasting Good, the everlasting Beautiful, whence individual ideals evolve themselves, which as archetypes— we are not told whether they have a distinct existence, or must be regarded as the images of the ideas, in the same manner as real objects, perfect in themselves, while the several visible objects represent them in a limited degree. This was a system which especially suited the philosophizing Jews; it afforded them a bridge between the purely spiritual and the physical objects. How does the Highest Spirit, the eternally Perfect One, enter into the finite world? He creates ideals from himself, says Plato. He intraposes himself, and thus perfection is produced; but this perfection impresses itself upon more subordinate existences, and thus it descends from immediate causes to intermediate causes, until the real objects spring into existence, and creation becomes manifest to us; God, the eternal, is the cause of all. But the highest cause, but the eternally Pure One does not immediately come into contact with the impure—only by means of manifold emanations and concatenations, the earthly grows into existence. Such views afforded the Jewish philosophers a happy means of preserving the theory of the infallibility and inconceivability of God, and yet of accepting the different figurative expressions concerning God in the Bible, because they could refer to the subordinate beings. Hellenism of that time, stiff and sober as it was, was unif to conceive native, poetic images, and to admit poetical expression without fearing that thereby the sublimity of thought might be violated. The latter was tenaciously adhered to, and whenever it expressed entities too directly, it had to yield to forced interpretations. To such also the Bible was frequently allegorized, which the Jewish spirit, which is forcibly driven from their natural simplicity into artificial philosophemes, in the belief that their value would thus be enhanced. The figurative expressions and events in connection with God were referred to such subordinate and artificers, who had evolved themselves from God. In the writings of Philo that intermediate agency is comprised in the Logos.

As with Plato and the elder Greeks, so with Philo, theology was the ultimate object of all metaphysical science. But there arose a puzzle in the mind of the Jewish philosopher, as in reality it had already arisen in the minds of Socrates and Plato. How could he reconcile the idea of that absolute and eternal one Being; that Zeus, Father of gods and men, self-perfect, self-contained, without change or motion, in whom, as a Jew, he believed; that Yahweh, synonymous with the Demon of Socrates, the divine teacher whom both Plato and Solomon confessed? Or how, again, could he reconcile the idea of him with the creative and providential energy, working in space and time, working in matter, and apparently affected and limited, if not baffled, by the imperfection of the matter which he moulded? Philo offered a solution in that idea of a Logos, or Word of God, of divinity articulate, speaking and acting in time and space, and therefore by successive acts, and so doing in time and space the will of the One, in the timelessness of the word, One, the eternal Being, of whom he was the perfect likeness. In calling this person the Logos, and making him the source of all human reason, and knowledge of eternal laws, he only translated from Hebrew into Greek the name which he found in his sacred books, "The Word of God." Of God himself, Philo teaches that he is incorporeal, invisible, and cognizable only through the reason; that he is the most universal of beings, the Being to whom alone being, as such, truly pertains; that he is more excellent than virtue, than science, or even than the good, so that it is not beautiful per se. He is one and simple, imperishable and eternal; his existence is absolute and separate from the world; the world is his work. Thus while Philo contends that God is to be worshiped as a personal being, he yet conceives him at the same time as the most general of existences. In the same way that God is the only truly existent being, to or (De Soma, i. 655, ed. Mang.). But Philo, similarly to the Neo-Platonists of a later epoch, advances upon the Platonic doctrine by representing God as the reason of all things and the fountain of knowledge and virtue— as Plato had done—but as above the idea of the Good—εις την ἁρμανιν, και εις την ἁσιστημονεται, και εις τον θρόνον του αὐτοῦ πανίκην και εις τον θρόνον του αὐτοῦ παλαιον (De Mand. Officio, 1, 2, ed. Mang.)—with which Plato identifies him—and by teaching that we do not arrive at the absolute by scientific demon-

Neander, "In proportion as he occupied the standpoint which divested the Divine Being of human qualities, or that which favored anthropomorphism, the ideal or the symbological, might not the λόγος appear as a power of God or as a hypostatic being?" Philo describes the λόγος, therefore, as the first-born before all existence, the original and uncreated source of all wisdom and the ideal reflection of God, as the αρχή γεγονός among the angels, as the original power of the divine powers. Alluding to the νους παράδειγμα of Plato, he describes him as the world-constructing reason; he compares the Logos of the Logos of Plato to the λόγος of the soul of the world; he calls him God's vicegerent in the world (Επιγεγέρσας); he gives him the office of mediator between God and the universe, since the connection of phenomena with God is effected through the reason revealed in the world. Hence he is the high-priest of the world, the advocate (παράδειγμα) for the defects of men with God, and generally the revealer of the divine nature to the universe. The Logos is the archetype of the reason, which is formed not after the Absolute itself, the Θεός, but after the Logos. He, as the revelation of the Absolute in the man, is the only true mediator of man, according to Genesis, was created. In this connection he calls the Logos the ideal man; and alluding to a Jewish mystical idea, the original man. In the Logos is the unity of the collected revelations of the Divine Being which is individualized in man. In general, everything that is called a revelation centers in the Logos, the Logos be the Divine Being as he is in himself and his revelation in the Logos, or the οἶνος and the λίγαναι. The revelation of God in creation—in all positive revelation—in the communication of separate ideas by peculiar dogmas—all this forms part of the knowledge of the revealed God in the phenomenal world, and of the symbolic knowledge from the standpoint of the νους τοῦ λόγου, over which the standpoint of the νους τοῦ Θεοῦ is raised. But this Logos by Philo is only a sort of intermediate being between God, who is in his nature hidden, simple, without attributes, and the eternal, shapeless, chaotic matter (the Platonic Θαλάτζα). It is the reflection, the first-born Son of God; the second God; the sum of the ideas, which are the original types of all existence; the ideal world itself (εικός νομοκρατεία); the medium through which the actual, sensible world (εικός ουσιοδοτικός) is created and upheld; the interpreter and revealer of God; the archangel, who destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, spoke to Jacob and to Moses in the burning bush, and led the people of Israel through the wilderness in a pillar of fire and a cloud. By the Logos, an υπάρχον of the Father (παράδειγμα), who pleads the cause of sinful humanity before God, and procures for it the pardon of its guilt. We see an apparent affinity of this view with the chriology of St. Paul and St. John, and thus it probably came to exert no small influence with the early Church fathers in the evolution of their doctrine of the Logos. But at the same time we must not overlook the very essential difference. Philo's doctrine would not itself suggest the application of the idea of the Logos to any historical appearance whatever; for the revelation not only by the Logos, but indeed by the Logos itself, was never presented by Philo as a single fact, but to everything relating to the revelation of God in nature and history. If, according to John's Gospel, the appearance of the Logos is the highest and only medium of communication with God, then communion with the Logos in Philo's sense can only be supposed, in the highest degree, to be an immediate apprehension of the Absolute. Yet out of this religious idealism a preparation and a medium might be formed for Christian realism, when what was here taken in a merely ideal sense showed itself as realized in human reality. Christian theology was the immediate result of the revelation of God in human nature, to the one revelation in Christ; and substitutes for the immediate apprehension of the Absolute the historically founded communion with God revealed in Christ. The symbolic meaning of Philo's Paraclete was elevated by the reference to the historical Christ as the only high-priest. Thus the Alexandrian ideas formed a bridge to Christianity. But we cannot regard the doctrine of a union of the Logos with humanity, in all its forms, as the only thing which it appeared to reflect in the first place of Christology, but must doubtless presuppose a tendency of this kind before the Christian era. A yearning of the spirit goes before great events—an unconscious longing for that which is to come. This must especially have been the case with the greatest representatives of the religious development of humanity experienced. It was preceded by an unconscious feeling of a revelation of the spiritual world to humanity—a longing which hastened to meet the new communications from God. It was not difficult for those who regarded the Logos as the medium of revelation, by which God made himself cognizable to pious souls, and, on the other hand, who held the Messiah to be the highest of God's messengers, to suppose a particular connection between him and the Logos. But, after all, this Jewish idea of the Logos is quite eclipsed by the Christian idea of the Messiah : with the Jews it is simply the hope of their miraculous restoration from all parts of the world to Palestine, through the agency of a superhuman appearance (τό δοξά); and even this supernatural phenomenon has no legitimate place in Philo's system of thought. But his dualistic and idealistic view of the world absolutely excludes an incarnation, which is the central truth of Christianity (comp. Dorner, Person of Christ). His Christ, if he needed any, could have been at best but a gnostic, do-catistic, fantastic Christ; his redemption, but ideal and intellectual. He attained only an artificial harmony between God and the world, between Judaism and heathenism; which hovered, like a „spectral illusion,” an “evanescent fata morgana,” on the horizon of dawning Christianity. Says Schaff, “It is a question not yet everly settled whether the idea of the Logos was a personal hypostasis or merely a personification, a divine attribut. While Gfrörer, Grossmann, Dähne, Lücke, Ritter, and Semisch maintain the former view, Dorner (Ent-wicklungsgeschichte der Lehre von der Person Christi, 2d ed.

1, 26 sq.) has latterly attempted to re-establish the other. To me, Philo himself seems to vibrate between the two views; and this obscurity accounts for the difference among so distinguished scholars on this point” (Hist. of the Apostolic Churc., p. 190).
The eternal atonement, which Philo imagined already made and eternally ready for all, he regarded as the efficacy only by a creative act of the condescending love of God; and it is a remarkable instance of divine wisdom in history that this reeding act was really performed about the same time that the greatest Jewish philosopher, while the age was still in the dawning of and announcing to the world a glorious shadow of it.
Of his other philosophic speculations we have space only to refer to some of his ethical views. With him knowledge and virtue are gifts of God, to be obtained only by self-alignment on the part of man. A life of contemplation in superior places or forms of practical, political occupation. In other words, the business of man is to follow and imitate God (De Caritate, ii, 404, et pass.).

The soul must strive to become the dwelling-place of God, his holy temple, and so to become strong, whereas it was before weak, and wise, whereas before it was foolish (De Somn. i, 23). The highest blessedness is to abide in God (πάντα τοις ὑπερωνοις τὸ ἐκλειστός καὶ ἐφικ-τος ἐν μόνῳ στήναις). The various minor sciences serve as a preparatory training for the knowledge of God. Of the philosophical discussions logical and physics are of little worth. The highest step in the philosophy of Philo is to be the intuition of the Logos, to which the sage attains through divine illumination when, completely renouncing himself and leaving behind his finite self-consciousness, he resigns himself unreservedly to the divine influence.

It remains for us to notice the use that has been made of Philo's writings within the domain of New-Test. interpretation. There are some Christian exegiists who in their rationalistic tendency have gone so far as to account for the character and style of some of the New-Test. Scriptures by referring their origin to Philo (Weissenius, Krito's Biblical Cyclopædia.). Mr. Grinfield, in his Hellenistic Greek Testament, and the accompanying Scholia, has derived many of his notes from the works of Philo; in the application, however, of such illustrations, it must be borne in mind that Philo's style was hardly a natural one; it is very elaborate, and avoids Alexandrian provincialisms, and on that account often fails to elucidate the simple diction of the New Test., even where there is similarity in the subject-matter (comp. Carpovill Evex. Exerc. in Ep. ad Heb. 40). The Alexandrian school are not content with finding in Philo such illustration of the New Test. as might be expected to occur in a contemporary, and in some respects kindred, Grecian writer; they go so far as to assert that some of the prominent doctrines of the sacred writers are little else than accommodations from the Neo-Platonism of Philo, immediate or immediate. Thus Grossmann (Quastr. Philos., sub init.) does not scruple to say that Christianity is the product of the allegories of the Jewish synagogue and of Philo. Other writers, more measured in their terms, trace the source of Christ's kingdom, his resurrection, the well-disposed Erastini (Institutes), and after him Lücke, who says, "It is impossible to mistake as to the immediate historical connection of John's doctrine of the Logos with the Alexandrian in its more perfect form, as it occurs in Philo." Similarly, Strauss, De Wette, and others; while others again apply the type of criticism to St. Paul. Among these we must especially notice Gfrörer, whose work, Philo and die jü-disch-alexandrinische Theologie, has been made accessible to English readers, in an abridged form, by Prof.
Jowett, in his dissertation St. Paul and Philo, contained in his commentary on St. Paul's Eph. i, 363-417. No criticism, however, is to be tolerated by the believer in Revelation which does not start from the principle that the characteristic truths of Christianity are self-evolved,
i. e. (to use Dorner's words) "have not emerged from without Christianity, but wholly from within it" (Person of Christ [Clark], vol. i, Introduction, p. 45).

Instead of making Philo, in any sense, a fountain-head of Christian doctrine, it would be more correct to regard him as the unconscious source of antichristian opinion —and unconscious source, for all the influence which he exerted in the skill in style, Philo possessed not those energetic qualities which characterize founders of schools of opinion.
To say nothing of Philo's influence upon the theo-osophizing fathers of the church, Clement of Alexandria and Origen, who borrowed largely from their Jewish predecessor and further developed, critics, some of the salient hereies of the early centuries had almost their spring in the Philonian writings (for the affinity of the opposite opinions of Arius and Sabellius to certain opinions of Philo, see Mosheim's Notes on Cudworth cited below); while that pagan philosophers, in this Neo-Platonism, which derived much of its strength and obtained its ultimate defeat from the Christianity which it both adored and hated, is mainly traceable to our Philo.

instance his delineation of the character of Pontius Pilate (De Legat. ad Cisiam, xxviii, Richter, vi, 184; Bohn, iv, 164). This well-drawn sketch of such a man, from the masterly hand of a contemporary, throws considerable light on more than one point, such as the relationship of Pilate to his people, which is slightly touched in the Gospels (comp. Hale's Apologet., iii, 216-218). As a second instance, may we not regard the remarkable passage of St. Paul as receiving light from Philo's view of the twofold creation, first of the heavenly (Ioanouc) or ideal man, and then of the earthly (yiyoc) man? (Comp. 1 Cor. xvi, 46, 47; with Philo, De Allegor. Leg., i, 12, 13 [Richter, i, 68; Bohn, i, 60]; and De Mundi Orig. Op. p. 46 [Richter, i, 43; Bohn, i, 59]; and see Stanley on Corinthienses, i, 351.) But then such illustration is either an example of how Philo is corrected by St. Paul, than of how St. Paul borrowed from Philo. Respecting the allegorical method of interpreting the Old Testament, of which the apostle is alleged to have derived the idea from our author, it should be remembered that St. Paul, guided by the Divine Spirit, who had indited the ancient Scriptures, was directed to apply Old-Test. figures to New-Test. truth. A parallelism of this kind, I think, is the only great scheme of providential dispensation; whereas Philo's adaptations of the same facts were only the product of an arbitrary and extremely fanciful imagination; so that in the case of the former we have an authoritatively compelled interpretation, while in the latter event the allegory was without ever impairing their historical and original truth, whereas the latter affords us nothing besides the conjectures of a mind of great vivacity indeed, but often capricious and inconsistent, which always postposes the truth of history to its allegorical sense, and oftentimes wholly reduces it to a simple myth. Readers of Philo are well aware of the extravagance and weakness of many of his allegories: of these some are inoffensive, no doubt; and some others are even neat and interesting, but none carry with them the simple dignity and expressiveness of the true allegory of the Old Testament. St. Paul and Philo, it is well known, have both treated the history of Hagar and Sarah allegorically (comp. Gal. iv, 22-31 with Philo, De Congresu, p. 1-5 [Richter, ii, 71-76; Bohn, ii, 157-162]; and see Lightfoot, Epist. to Gal. p. 189-191; and Howson's Hagar and Arabah, p. 30, 36, 37); but although we have here one of the best specimens of Philo's favorite method, how infinitely does it fall short of St. Paul's! To say nothing of authority, it falls in terseness and point, and all the features of proper allegory. The reader will at once perceive that we are dealing with a very different thing.

Philo's opinions about the divine Logos have been warmly discussed. The ancients, as we have seen, were fond of identifying them with Christian doctrine; Mangey, in the middle of the last century, accompanied his splendid edition of Philo's works (2 vols.), with a dissertation, in which he made our author an apostle, in the Christian sense, a distinct personality to the Logos; bishop Bull had stated a similar opinion (Def. Fid. Ant. [transl. by the Rev. Peter Holmes for the Anglo. Cath. Lib.], i, 81-83); and, more recently, Bryant (Sentimentes Philo, Lond., 1848) has shown himself in favor of this theory; and, very lately, Fye Smith (Messian, i, 573-600). But the conclusions of these writers, however learnedly asserted, have been abundantly refuted in many works; the chief of which are Carpozio, Dieuqet de la giocn Philon, nos John, admonus Mangey (1749); Caesar Morgan's Investigation of the Divinity of Plato and of Philo Jud.; Burton'sampton Lectures, note 93, p. 550-560; and Dörner's Person of Christ [Clarke], i, 22-41. (See also the able articles of professors H. B. Smith and Moses Stuart, in the Bibliotheca Sacra, vi, 156-185, and vii, 269-782.) An attempt to recede to the view of the Alexandrian circle and its relation to Judaism, from the Jewish point of view, occurs in Jonst's Geschichte des juden, i, 879-899 (the chapter is designated Die Gnosis des Juden), ii, 298 sq.; Schultz, Die jüdische Religionsgeschichte, vol. ii, 939-962, and no at all without ever impairing their historical and original truth, whereas the latter affords us nothing besides the conjectures of a mind of great vivacity indeed, but often capricious and inconsistent, which always postposes the truth of history to its allegorical sense, and oftentimes wholly reduces it to a simple myth. Readers of Philo are well aware of the extravagance and weakness of many of his allegories: of these some are inoffensive, no doubt; and some others are even neat and interesting, but none carry with them the simple dignity and expressiveness of the true allegory of the Old Testament. St. Paul and Philo, it is well known, have both treated the history of Hagar and Sarah allegorically (comp. Gal. iv, 22-31 with Philo, De Congresu, p. 1-5 [Richter, ii, 71-76; Bohn, ii, 157-162]; and see Lightfoot, Epist. to Gal. p. 189-191; and Howson's Hagar and Arabah, p. 30, 36, 37); but although we have here one of the best specimens of Philo's favorite method, how infinitely does it fall short of St. Paul's! To say nothing of authority, it falls in terseness and point, and all the features of proper allegory. The reader will at once perceive that we are dealing with a very different thing.

Besides Mangey's edition of Philo, above referred to, we mention Turnebus's edition (Paris, 1552, fol.), emended by Hoeschelius (Colom. Allobrog. 1618; Paris, 1640; Francof. 1691); Pfeiffer's edition, incomplete (Er- langen, 1785-92, 5 vols, 8vo), and the convenient edition by Richter (Leips. 1828-30, 8 vols. 12mo). This last contains not only a reprint of Mangey, in the first six volumes, but two supplementary volumes of Philo's writings, discovered by Angelo Mai in a Florentine MS., and by Bapt. Acher in an Armenian version, and translated by him into Latin. In an edition of Philo wished to be to deserve the approbation of the critical student has been pointed out by different German theologians, most recently by Creuzer, in Theol. Studi- en u. Kritiken, 1832, p. 1-43. A popular and cheap edition was published at Leipsic (1851), also at Philo- nomes, ed. Tischendorf (Leips. 1869). A fuller account of these editions, with a list of the various versions of Philo's writings, which have been made from time to time into Latin, Hebrew, German, French, Italian, Spanish, and English, is in Canusenius Furst's Bibl. Jud. First adds a catalogue of all the leading works with which Philo and his writings have been treated. To his list of versions we must add here the useful one published by Mr. Bohn, in four vols. of his Eccl Library, by Mr. Yonge.

For a complete, and withal succinct examination of the entire field of Philo's opinions, we refer to Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie. More short and more accessible, but inevitably imperfect, notices occur in Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biographers and Mythologists, iii, 309 sq.; Cassels' Atheneaum, ii, 488; Clarke's Scripture Dictionary, p. 214; Horne's Hebrew Introduction [by Eyre], p. 277, 278; [by Davidson], p. 383–385; Davidson's Hermeneutics [Clarke, 1848], p. 63–65; Fairbairn's Hermetick Man, p. 47. A temperate review of Jowett's Dissertation on Philo and St. Paul may be found, written by Dr. Lightfoot, in the Journal of Philology, iii, 119–121; and for some views respecting Philo's doctrine of the Logos, as bearing upon the writings of the New Testament, see Neander's Planting of the Christian Church [Bohn], ii, 13–15; Westcott's Introduction, p. 138–148; and Tholuck's St. John [Clarke], p. 62–67. For a glimpse of Jewish and Greek the writings of their philosophic countryman is curiously exhibited in the Hebrew version certain of them. These are enumerated by Fürst, Bibl. Judaica, ii, 90. A. de Rossi, one of the translators, has revived Philo's Synonymia edited by him, which was anciently designated in Rabbinical literature (see Bartholomew, et al., and Steinschneider's Bodl. Catal. a v. Philon).

Philo Carpathius (from Carpathus, an island north-east of Crete), or, rather, Carparhas (from Carpathia, a town in the north of Cyprus), an Eastern ecclesiastical, flourished about the opening of the 5th century. He is unique in the history of literature, as deriving his cognomen from his having been ordained bishop of Carpathia by Epiphanius, the well-known bishop of Constantia. According to the statements of Joannes and Polybius, bishop of Rhodes, in their life of Epiphanius (Vita Epiphani ch. xlix), Philo, at that time a deacon, was sent along with some others, by the sister of the emperors Arcadius and Honorius, to bring Epiphanius to Rome, that through his prayers and the laying on of hands she might be saved from a dangerous disease under which she was laboring. Pleased with Philo, Epiphanius ordained him bishop of Carpathia, but gave him charge of his own diocese during his absence. This was about the beginning of the 5th century (Cave, Hist. Litt. p. 240, ed. Geneva). Philo Carpathius is principally known from his commentary on the Canticles, which he treats allegorically. A Latin translation, or, rather, paraphrase of this commentary, with ill-assorted interpolations from the commentary of Gregory I, by Salutatus, was published (Paris, 1557, and reprinted in the Bibl. Patr. Lat. Patrum, vol. v.). Fragments of Philo's commentary are inserted in that of St. Isidore of Seville (Cave, Bibl., edited by Meursius (Lugd. Batav. 1617). In these he is simply named Philo, without the surname. Banduriu, a Benedictine monk, published in 1705 a genuine edition, which he never fulfilled. An edition, however, was published from a Vatican MS. in 1756, under the name of Epiphanius, and edited by Poggio. The most important edition, however, is that of Giaconcellus (Rome, 1772), from two MSS. This has the original Greek, a Latin translation, with notes, and is accompanied by the entire Greek text of the Canticles, principally from the Alexandrian recension. This is reprinted in Galland, N. Bibl. Patr., i, 718; Ernesti (Neuere Theolog. Bibl.* vol. iii, pt. vi), in a review of this edition, of which he thinks highly, is of opinion that the commentary, as we have it, is but an abridgment of the original. Besides this commentary, Philo wrote on various parts both of the Old and New Testaments, of which are contained in the various Cicero. See Suida., Cave, I. C. Fabricius, *Bibl. Grav. viii, 396, 611; viii, 645; x, 479; Smith, Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, a. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, a. v.

Philo the Dialectician. See Philo the Magarian.

Philo of Larissa. An academic philosopher of Athens, flourished in the century preceding the Christian era. He quitted the Greek capital on the success of the army of Mithridates, and went to Rome, where he had Cicero for a disciple. He gained renown by his services to philosophical science. He furnished a more complete and systematic division of the different branches of philosophy, and was metaphysic in his terms. He is also often spoken of as the founder of the third academy. See Tenmann, Manual of History of Philosophy; Cebrer, History of Philosophy (see Index in vol. ii).

Philo the Magarian, of Dialectician, was a disciple of Diodorus Cronus, and a friend of Zeno, though older than him. According as the residence (vii, 16) is correct. In his Menezes he mentioned the five daughters of his teacher (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv, 528, ed. Peter), and disputed with him respecting the idea of the possible, and the criteria of the truth of hypothetical propositions. With reference to the first point, Philo approximated to Aristotle, as he recognised that not only what is, or will be, is possible (as Diodorus maintained), but also what is in itself conformable to the particular purpose of the object in question, as of charm to burn (κατὰ ὁμοίως ἐπιρροήν ἠπότιμη, Alex, Aphrod. Nat. Qual. i, 14; comp. on the whole question Harris, in Upton's Arrian Discertat. Epict. ii, 19, ap. Schweighäuser, ii, 515, etc.). Diodorus had allowed the validity of hypothetical propositions only when the antecedent clause could never lead to an untrue conclusion, whereas Philo regarded those only as false which with a correct antecedent had an incorrect conclusion (Sext. Empir. Adr. Math. viii, 113, etc.; Hypotyp. ii, 110; comp. Cicero, Acad. ii, 47; De Fato, 6). Both accordingly had sought for criteria for correct sequence in the members of hypothetical propositions, and each of them in a manner corresponding to what he maintained respecting the ideas of the possible. Chrysippus attacked the assumption of each of them.

The Philo who is spoken of as an Athenian and a disciple of Pyrrhus, though ridiculed by Timon, was not a sophist, as some have supposed, but different from Philo the dialectician (Diog. Laert. ix, 67, 69). Jeronimo (Nov. 1) speaks of Philo the dialectician and the author of the Menezes as the instigator of Carneades, in contradiction to chronology, perhaps, in order to indicate the sceptical direction of his doctrines.

Philo the Monk. An ascetic treatise, bearing the name of Philo Monachus, whom Cave (Hist. Litt. p. 176) seems to be much later than the other ecclesiastical writers of the same name, is preserved in the library of the University of Vienna (Cave, Bibl. 332, No. 15). It is entitled Contus Philotheodori Fsenarium.

Philo the Phytogoran. Clemens Alexandrinus (*Strouvi, i, 305) and Sozomen (i, 12) mention Philo ο Πυθγόριος. It is probable from their language that they both mean by the person so designated Philo Jucundus. Sousan (Bibl. iii, c. iv, p. 17) is strongly of opinion that Philo the elder and this Philo mentioned by Clemens are the same. Fabricius, who once held this opinion, was led to change his views (Bibl. i, 862) and tacitly assumes (iv, 758) that Sozomen indicates Philo Judeus by this epithet.

Philo the Rhetorician and Philosopher. Cave, Giacomelli, and Ernesti are of opinion that this is no other than Philo Carpathius (q. v.). His era agrees with this, for the philosopher is quoted by Athanassianus, who flourished about A.D. 561. We need not be startled at the term philosopher as applied to an ecclesiastic. Cave, ii, 302, 303. Michael Psellos was termed the prince of philosophers, and Nicetas was nicknamed, in the same way as Philo, πρωτωρ και φιλοσοφος. Besides, Polyaenus, in the History of Philosophers, expressly calls Philo Φιλόσοφος ἀληθῶν ἀπὸ πρωτορως, which Timoleon and others erroneously understand to mean a man who has changed from the profession of the law to that of the Church. Cave shows that the πρωτωρ held an office in the Church itself, somewhat analogous to our professorship of ecclesiastical history. Our only knowledge of Philo, under this name, whether it be Philo Carpathius or not, is from an inedited work of Anastasius Sinaita, preserved in the library of Vienna and the Bodleian. Glycera (Annal. p. 288, etc.), it is true, quotes as if from Philo, a metaphorical description of the universe, and without acknowledgment, from Anastasius. The work of Anastasius referred to is entitled by Cave Demonstratio Historiae de Magna et Angelica summni Sanctorum Digesta. Philo's work therein quoted is styled a Christian, not a Jewish, history. Durie dialectically refuses the only specimen of it we have, we need hardly regret its loss. It consists of a tale regarding a monk, that, being excommunicated by his bishop, and having afterwards suffered martyrdom, he was brought in his coffin to the church, but could not rest till the bishop, warned in a dream, had formally absolved him. See Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 176 (ed. Geneva, 1720); Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. vii. 420.

Philo Senior. Josephus (Apion, i. 23), when enumerating the heathen writers who had treated of Jewish history, mentions together Demetrius Phalerenus, Philo, and Josephus. Philo has a distinction from the older (a ψηφιστήριος), probably to distinguish him from Philo Judaeus, and he cannot mean Herennius Philo, who lived after his time. Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromat. i. 146) also couples together the names of Philo the elder and Demetrius, stating that their lists of Jewish kings differed. Hence Vossius thinks that both authors refer to the same person (De Hist. Graec. p. 486, ed. Westermann). In this Jonasius agrees with him, while he notices the error of Josephus, in giving Demetrius the surname of Phalerenus (De Script. Hist. Phil. iii. 4, p. 17), his Huetius (Demonstrat. Evangel. p. 62) was of opinion that the apochryphal Book of Wisdom was written by this Philo, he was necessitated to consider him as a Hellenistic Jew, who, unskilled in the original Hebrew, had it translated, and then expanded it, in language peculiar to his class (ibid. p. 62, 246, etc.). Fabricius thinks that the Philo mentioned by Josephus may have been a Gentile, and that a Philo different from either Philo Judaeus or senior was the author of the Book of Wisdom. Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ix. 20, 24) quotes fifteen obscure hexameters from Philo, without giving the name of who he is, and merely citing him as from Alexander Polyhistor. These evidently form part of a history of the Jews in verse, and were written either by a Jew, in the character of a heathen, as Fabricius hints is possible, or by a heathen acqulainted with the Jewish Scriptures. This is, in all probability, the work referred to by Philo Judaeus and Clemens Alexandrinus. Of course the author must have lived before the time of Alexander Polyhistor, who came to Rome B.C. 53. It is doubtful whether he is the same as the geographer of the same name.

Philo of Tarshis, a secon. He was a companion of Ignatius of Antioch, and accompanied the martyr from the East to Rome, A.D. 107. He is twice mentioned in the epistles of Ignatius (Ad Philadeph. c. xi.; Ad Smyrnae. c. xii.). He is supposed to have written, along with Rheus Agathopus, the Martyrium Ignatii, for which see Ignatius. See Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 28 (ed. Geneva, 1720).

Philoecius, a Pythagorean philosopher, was born at Crotona, or Tarentum, towards the close of the 6th century B.C. Areas, a probable disciple of Pythagoras, was his master; so that we receive the Pythagorean doctrine from Philoecius, only as it appeared to the third generation, for a proposition of it is therefore more properly in place in a general examination of the philosophy of Pythagoras (q. v.). It has been repeated once and again that Philoecius divined the true theory of the universe, and was the virtual predecessor of Copernicus. Nothing can be more false. In his scheme, indeed, not the earth, but fire, is placed in the centre of the universe; that fire, however, is not the sun, which, on the contrary, he makes revolve around the central fire. The scheme, in so far as it can be understood, is altogether fantastic, based on no observation or comparison of phenomena, but on vague and now uninterpretable metaphysical abstractions. The pupil of Copernicus in antiquity was Aristarchus of Samos, whose remarkable conjectures appeared first in the editio princeps of Archimedes—published after Copernicus wrote. Of Philoecius's three works, written in the Doric dialect, only fragments now remain. See Blackth. Leben, nebst den Hruchstücken seiner Werke (Berl. 1819); Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. and Mythol. a. v.; Ueberweg, Hist. of Philos. (see Index in vol. ii); Butler, Hist. of Ancient Philos. vol. ii. (J. H. W.)

Philo-logus (ψηφιλογος, fond of talk), one of the Christians at Rome to whom Paul sent his salutations (Rom. xvi. 5). A.D. 55. Origen conjectures that he was the head of a Christian household which included the other persons named with him. Dorotheus makes him one of the seventy disciples, and alleges that he was placed by the apostle Andrew as bishop of Sinope, in Pontus (see Epiphanius, Mon. p. 68, ed. Dresel). Pseudo-Hippolytus (Supp. XX. A.D. 127) assigns to him a life of 70 years. His life repeats the same improbable tradition. His name is found in the Columbarium "of the freedmen of Livia Augusta" at Rome; which shows that there was a Philologus connected with the imperial household at the time when it included many Julias. The name Philologus was a common one at Rome (Lewin, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ii. 71).

Philo-logy, comparative. The importance which this subject has assumed in modern science as a key to the history of national origin justifies its admission and brief discussion here, with special reference to the two Biblical tongues.

The etymological table contained in the tenth chapter of Genesis has derived no little corroboration and illustration from the researches of modern philology. It has thus been clearly established that all the languages which have furnished a polished literature are reducible to two great families, corresponding, with a few sporadic variations, to the lineage of the two older sons of Noah respectively, namely, Shem and Japheth. The former of these, which is in fact usually designated as the Semitic, is emphatically Oriental, and embraces the Hebrew and Arabic, with their cognates, the Samaritan, the eastern and western Aramaic (probably Syriac, and the Ethiopic. The latter, which is conveniently styled the Indic-Germanic group, includes the Sanscrit, with its sister the Zend, and their offshoots, the Greek, the Latin, the Gallic, the Saxon—in a word, the stock of the Occidental or European languages. The analogies and coincidences subsisting between the members of the Semitic family have been pretty fully exhibited by Castell, Gesenius, and Fürst in their lexicons, and by Ewald and Nordheimer in their grammars; while the relationship existing among the Indo-Germanic group has been extensively traced by Bopp in his Comparative Grammar, by Fott in his Linguistische Forschungen, and by Benfey in his Wurzel-Lexicon. Other philologists, among whom De Sacy, Bournouf, Max Muller, and Réaup may be especially mentioned, have somewhat extended the range of these comparisons, and occasional resemblances have been pointed out in particular forms between the Semitic and Indo-Germanic branches; but no systematic collation of these latter coincidences, so far as we are aware, has been instituted, unless we accept such fanciful attempts as those of Parkhurst, who derives most of the Greek primitives from Hebrew roots! Yet notwithstanding the confusion at Babel and many a later linguistic misadventure, the common Noachian parentage ought to be capable of vindication by some distinct traces, at least of analogy if not of identity, in early forms of speech existing among both these great branches of the human family as represented by their written records. We propose in this article briefly to exhibit a few of these resemblances which have presented themselves in our own investigations as arising from a common origin, although a remote one, between the Semitic and the Indo-Germanic tongues; the most of them are certainly too striking to have been accidental. Let us venture beyond our own or our readers' depth, and make our pages bristle with an unnecessary display of foreign characters, we shall confine our illustrations to the Hebrew, on the one hand, and to the Greek, Latin, French, German, and English, on the other, as sufficient representatives of the two linguistic families which we are comparing.

1. Identity of Roots. — The following is a table, compiled from notes made in the course of our own reading, of such Hebrew roots as recur among the European dialects so strikingly similar in form and significance as to leave little doubt in most cases of their original identity. We have carefully excluded all those that betray evidences of later or artificial introduction from one language to the other, such as commercial, mechanical, or scientific terms, mere technicalities, obvious onomatopoeias, names of animals, plants, minerals, official titles, etc., and we have selected words representing families of much divergent as possible, rather than those exhibiting the most striking resemblance. It will be interesting to observe how a root has sometimes slipped out of one or more of the cognate dialects, in the line of descent, and reappears in another representative; a few only are found in all the columns. In some of them again the signification or form have become distinct in one or another of the affiliated languages, but becomes clear again in a later representative. We have restored the digamma wherever it was necessary in order to bring out the relationship in the Greek roots. Those marked with an asterisk are Chaldee. A few out of their proper column are included in brackets.

This list is sufficiently copious, after deducting those which further researches may show to be merely fortuitous, to prove a more than accidental agreement in words of frequent use. Many of the roots are evidently related to each other, and most of them are found in several kindred forms. Among these the selection has here been made not so much for the purpose of exhibiting the most palpable similarity, as to include the greatest variety of distinct etymons in each line of descent. We have no room to express the numerous cognates and derivatives of each, to trace the connection of their meanings with the common or generic import, nor to note the various orthographical changes that they have undergone. If the reader will take the trouble to investigate these points at his leisure, as he may readily do. with the help of good lexicons of the respective languages, he will soon satisfy himself how widely these radices have ramified and how intimately they are connected. A comparison with their Arabic and Sanscrit preparations is therefore in many other instances the very natural following result.

II. Monomorphic Roots.—It is well settled that the so-called weak radicals in Hebrew verbs, technically denominated Pe-Aleph, Pe-Nun, Pe-Yod, Lamed-He, etc., which drop away in the course of infection, were not in reality originally trilateral at all, but that these letters were only added to those forms in which they appear for the sake of uniformity with regular verbs. But these constitute in the aggregate a very large part, we apprehend a decided majority, of all the verbs most frequently employed in the language. Besides these, there is another very large class of roots of kindred or analogous signification with each other, and having two radicals in common. All these, as Gesenius has ingeniously shown in his Lexicon, are likewise to be regarded as essentially identical, the idea clinging in the two letters possessed by them in common. Thus we have reduced nearly the other moiety of Hebrew verbs, and these it must be remembered are the ground or stock of the entire vocabulary, to bilaterals. The presumption is not an unwarrantable one that all the roots might etymologically be similarly retrenched. The few quadri- radials that are the first person, rather the status quo in that instance, being regarded as formed from ordinary roots by reduplication or interpolation.

Now it is a remarkable coincidence that the ultimate theme of the primitive Greek verb has been ascertained, in like manner, by modern philologists to be a monomorph- erable, consisting of two consonants vocalized, in precise conformity with the Hebrew system of vowel points, by a single mutable vowel. Thus the basis of such protokorean forms even as λαθώνη, μήθον, δικαίων, becomes λατή, μήθ, δίκαιον. Indeed, Noah Webster has applied the same method to the roots of English words; and in his Dictionary (we speak of the quarto edition, originally published at New Haven in two volumes) he has indicated them as "class Dg. No. 26," etc., although he seems never to have published the key of this classification.

III. Primitive Tenses.—In nothing perhaps does the disparity between the Greek and the Hebrew verb strike the student at first more obviously than the multiplicity and variety of tense-forms in the former, compared with the meagre and vague array of tensions in the latter. A little reflection teaches us that whereas the general bulk of the various so-called conjugations (Niphal, Hiphil, etc.) the Hebrews managed to extend their paradigm to pretty considerable dimensions. Here the Heb. Piel and other dagesh conjugations evidently correspond with the "reflexive" and "perfect" in Greek tenses, while the prefixed syllable of Hiphil, etc., affords a clue to the device of the simple augment in Greek. These, however, are comparatively unimportant, although interesting analogies.

The Hebrew verb is found in its least disguised form in the greater Kal. The future is but a modification of this, as is especially evident from the facility with which it preserves the preterit import with "vav conversive." The past is naturally the first and most frequent tense in use, because it is historical. In all these respects the preter answers to the Greek second aorist. The augment of this tense was a secondary or subsequent invention, and, accordingly, Homer habitually disregards it. The "Attic reduplication" (for example, 8γόργος) had a still later origin. The second aorist gives us a root in its simplest if not purest form. It is further remarkable that none but primitive verbs have this tense, and no Greek verbs are primitive but those which exhibit a monomorphic root as found in the stem of the second aorist. We invite the attention of scholars especially to these last enunciated principles. They show that this tense was originally the ground-form of the verb.

No tense in Greek exhibits greater modifications of the root than the present. This argues that the tense itself was of comparatively late date. Accordingly the derivative verbs most usually have it, although defective in many other respects; and the older verbs to which it appears occasions most of the so-called irregularities set down in tables of Greek verbs. Now the Hebrew has properly no present tense. Present time can only be expressed by means of the participle, with the substantive verb (usually underlined) like our "periphrastic present" ("I am doing," etc.), or by the analogy which we have indicated, the junior members of the Hebrewistic family, especially the Chaldee and Syriac, have constructed a present tense out of the participle by annexing the indicative terminations appropriate to the different numbers and persons. This process illustrates the formation of

IV. Verb Infections.—In Greek, as in Hebrew, the personal endings are obviously but fragments of the personal pronouns, appended to the verbal root or tensestem. This is so generally recognized as to be the fact with respect to both these languages, that we need dwell upon it only for the purpose of explaining, by its means, some of the peculiarities of the Greek verbs in -μ. This termination, which reappears in the optative of other verbs, was doubtless the original and proper sign of the first person, just as the reflexive in Greek is the basis of the oblique cases of the pronoun of the first person, μι, με; as the latter is the last, but non-radical, syllable of the nominative, με, i. e., in keeping with this that the verbs in -μ are some of the oldest in the language, for example, the substantive verb, σιν. The passive terminal -μοι is doubtless but a modification of the same. Now the principle or fact to which we wish to call particular attention in this connection is this: Every primitive "pure" verb in Greek is a verb in μ. By this rule the student may always know them, as we are at least the general rule that no other consonant is found in the forms in -μ, and very rare exceptions like πιμ, πινόμ, πιθομ, which are attributable to disguises of the true root. Let it now be further noted, in confirmation of what we have stated above concerning the Greek primate tense, that verbs in -μ have substantially the same forms in infection as the second aorist, and they have only those tenses with which these infections are compatible. Neither of these last-named principles, it is true, is carried out with exactness, for the aorist passive of other verbs seem to have usurped these active terminations; but we are persuaded that the general rule is sufficient to the defectiveness and peculiar inflection of the forms in μ. We therefore look upon the verbs in question as interesting links in the descent from the older Hebrew type.

V. Declensional Endings.—In the absence of any real declensions whatever in the Hebrew, or any proper cases—unless the "construct state" be entitled to be regarded as a genitive—there is little ground of comparison with the copious series of modifications of the Greek noun and adjective. Yet Webster has noted the resemblance of the plural ἑως and Chaldee ἐως to the English oxen (archaic houses, etc.). The s "epheuctic" has its analogue in the "paragogic," and is strikingly generalized in the "membrum" of the Latin.

VI. Vowel Changes.—To the learner the Hebrew language seems very complicated in this respect; but the whole process of vocalization is wrought out under the following simple law: that "without the tone, a long vowel cannot stand in a closed syllable, nor a short vowel in an open syllable." From this results practically the alternative of a long vowel or an addition of a consonant (or dagesh forte) in every unaccented syllable. In the Greek the following fundamental principle prevails: that a long vowel (or diphthong) indicates the omission of a consonant, namely wherever we have short vowels; and this latter is tantamount to the other, for there is one letter less. Thus the systems of syll-bication in both languages essentially coincide in this:
that length in the word is equivalent to another consonant.
We might take room to exemplify these rules, but the more important point, as it were, naturally seen the aforementioned of the later cognate languages is this principle regarded with much uniformity, although from the nature of the vocal organs themselves, it follows, even in so arbitrary a tongue (or rather so historical a spelling) as the English, that a vowel is naturally long when it ends the syllable, and short when a consonant closes the sound.
But in the Greek and Hebrew the law we have propounded is consistently carried out in a complete system of euphonic changes which lie at the very threshold of either language.
Accordingly, in exactness of phonetic representation these two languages have no rival, not even in the German, Italian, or Spanish. Though the original sounds are now somewhat uncertain, yet it is evident (unless we take the degenerate modern Greek, and the discordant modern Rabbinical pronunciations as perfect guides) that each letter and vowel in both had its own peculiar power. The two alphabets, we know, were identical in origin; for if we distrust the story of the importation of the Phoenician characters by Cadmus into Greece, we have but to compare the names, order, and forms of the written word. But, if we entertain the suggestion that the two languages were read in opposite directions), in order to satisfy ourselves that they are essentially the same. Even the unappreciable Δ has its equivalent in the spiritus lenis (as the Ι may be visually represented by the spiritus asper), and the old digamma (Ϝι) reappears in the consonantal Π.
Perhaps the reason why υ initial always has the rough breathing owing to its affinity to both these last named. See Alphabet.
We trust we have said enough to illustrate our proposition that these two lingual families, and especially their two chiefly interesting representatives—which, widely variant as they are in age, culture, flexibility, and genius, yet by a remarkable Providence have been brought together in the only revelation written for man —have no ordinary or casual points of resemblance.
We would be glad to see the subject extended by some competent hand, especially by a comparison of the venerable and rich Sanscrit and Arabic. See Semitic Languages.

Philopatris is the name of a dialogue found among the writings of Lucian (q.v.). It is quoted in Church history as a contribution to the heathen satires against Christianity. It is a frivulous derision of the character and doctrines of the Christians in the form of a dialogue between Critias, a professed heathen, and Triphon, an Epicanic, personating a Christian. It represents the Christians as disaffected to the government, dangerous to civil society, and delighting in public calamities.
It calls St. Paul a half-baked, long-nosed Galilean, who travcelled through the air to the third heaven (2 Cor. xii, 1-4). It combats the Church doctrine of the Trinity, and of the procession of the Spirit from the Father, though not by argument, but only by ridicule. Not its intrinsic value, but its historic references, make it a valuable production. The authenticity of the work has been called in question by Gesner, in his De aetate et auctore dialogi Lactantii, qui Philop. in scribendum (Jen. 1714; Leips. 1730; Götting. 1741; et in tom. x., ed. Bip.), who ascribes to it a post-Nicene age. Of like opinion are Neander (Church Hist. ii, 90) and Tzchiner (Fall des Heidenthums, p. 312). Niebuhr (Kleine Histor. u.

Nicophorus Phocas (963-969), but this date is generally regarded as too recent. Compare Bernardy, Berl.

Philonastair, a sect of Tribeists in the 6th century, named after a famous Alexandrian grammarian.
Nature and hypostasis, he affirmed, were identical, unity not being something real, but only a generic term, ac-taccording to the Aristotelian logic. See Philonastair.
Philoponus, Ioannes (Ἰωάννης ὁ Φιλόπονος), or Ioannes Grammaticus (ὁ Γραμματικός), an Alexandrian theologian and philosopher of great renown, but which he, determined on account of his unworld-liness and want of good-sense, was called Philoponos because he was one of the most laborious and studious men of his age. He lived in the 7th century of our era; one of his writings, Physica, is dated May 10, 617.
He calls himself γραμματικός, undoubtedly because he taught grammar in his native town, Alexandria, and would in earlier times have been called rhetor. He was a disciple of the philosopher Ammonius. Although his celebrity is more based upon the number of his varied productions and the estimation in which they were held by his contemporaries than upon the intrinsic value of those works, he is yet so strangely connected with one of the most important events of his (Gibbon's Decline and Fall). It is extremely doubtful that Philoponos became a Mohammedan. His favorite authors were Plato and Aristotle, with whom he tended towards the philosophy of the Arians. He was one of the first and principal pro-"pomoters of the sect of the Tribeists, which was condemned by the Council of Constantinople of 681. Starting with Monophysite principles, taking ψευτα in a concrete instead of an abstract sense, and identifying it with εικονομον, Philoponos distinguished in God, three individuals, and so became involved in Trithesism.
This view he sought to justify by the Aristotelian categories of genus, species, and individuum. His followers were called Philoponiani and Tribeists. Philoponos, it may be remarked, was not the first promulgator of this error; but (as appears from Asseman, Bibl. Orient. ii, 327; comp.
Hefele, ii, 556) the Monophysite John Acsesianus, who ascribed to Christ only one nature, but to each person in the Godhead a separate nature, and on this account was banished by the emperor and excommunicated by the patriarch of Constantinople. The time of the death of Philoponos is not known. The following is a list of his works: Τὸν εἰς τὴν Μακάριος κοιμησόμενον ἐγκατιστῶν λόγος ζ, Commentarius in Mosaicum Commentarnum, lib. viii, dedicated to Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, who was contemporary with the reign of Justin I, 610, and to Basil I, 641. Ed. Grecce et Latine by Balsalazar Corcuera (Vienna, 1830, 4to). The editor was deficient in scholarship, and Lambecius promised a better edition, which, however, never appeared. Photius (Biblioth. cod. 75) compares theCosmopontia with its author, and forms no good opinion of either: — De cunctis Pauly, "ad calcem Cosmoponii," by the same editor.—Kardar Προ-κουνικαρικοφόρον κελίου λόγιον, λόγον τον με, Adversus Procli de Eternitate Mundus Argumenta XIXIII Solu- tiones, edited by the same. Edit. Graecae, together with the writings of some other grammarians, and the Thesaurus of Varinius Cameretis (Venice, 1476, fol.; 1504, fol.; ad calcem Lecxi Grieco-Latini. Venice, 1524, fol.; another, ibid. 1524, fol.; Basle, 1532, fol.; Paris, 1521, fol.);—Ευλογημα των προ δια- φορον ενεσισαν ἰδιωτικών τουρνακών λείων, Collec- tio Voscanum pro diversa significantia Accentum diem versus occupant, in alphabetical order. It has often been published at the end of Greek dictionaries. The only separate edition is by Erasmus Schmid (Wittenb. 161, 14vo), under the title of Cyrilli, Rel. ad uti soluit, Aristotelis de Generatione Animalium utilissimum Differentia Vercos Gracum, quod Totum, Spiritum, Genus, etc., to which is added the editor's Dieraitaria de Pronunci- atione Graecce Antiqui. Schmid appended to the diction of Philoponus about five times as much of his own, but he severed his additions from the text:—Commentary in Aristotelis, viz. (1) De tria Prima. Edit: the text, Venice, 1596, fol.; Latin versions, by Gulielmus Dorotheus (Venice, 1541, fol.), Lucullus Philalethes (ibid. 1544, 1548, 1553, fol.), Alexander Justinianus (ibid. 1560, fol.). (2) In Analytica Priora. Edit.: Venice, 1564, fol., together with Anonymous Commentarii on the same work (ibid. 1584, fol.), revised and with additions, together with Eustratius, episcopi Nicanei (who lived about 1117) Commentarii on the same work. A Greek edition of 1524 is said to exist. Latin versions by Andreae Gregorios (Venice, 1492, fol.; Paris, 1548, fol.) and by Marcellus Bota (Venice, 1559, 1568, fol.). (3) In quattuor priores Libros Physicorum. Edit.: the text, cum Prefatione Victoris Triconavellii ad Casparum Comeniana Cardenale (Venice, 1635, fol.); Latin version, by Gulielmus Dorotheus (ibid. 1589 and 1541, fol.); a better one by Bapstia Basiaris (ibid. 1558, 1569, 1581, fol.). Philoponus speaks of his Scholia to the sixth book, whom we may infer that he commented upon the last four books also. (4) In Librum veneciam Meteororum. The text ad calcem Olympiodori. (5) In Libros V De Generation- et Interitus. Graecae, cum Prefatione Asanali (Venice, 1527, fol.), together with Alexander Aphrodi- us's Meteorologia. Philo- ponus wrote many other works, some of which are lost, and others have never been published. Fabricius gives an "Index Scriptoriorum in Philop De Mundi Eternitatem memorandum," and an "Index Scriptorum in universis Philoponi ad Aristotelis Commentariis membrorum," both of great length. Philosophers (Gr. φιλοζωος, to love, and αισθ., flesh), a term of reproach used by the Origenists in reference to the orthodox as believers in the resurrection of the body.

Philosopher (φιλοσοφος). Of the Greek sects of philosophers existing in the time of the apostles, the Stoics and Epicureans are mentioned in Acts xvii, 18, some of whom disputed with Paul at Athens. In Col. ii, 8 a warning is given against philosophy itself, as a departure from the knowledge of Christ; and it has been noticed that Paul, who had been a Pharisee, acted in this respect in harmony with the sect in which he had been educated (cf. Ignace-Germain, De Christiostomo Ju- dos, Alex. i, 8). At least the rabbis set the divine law above all human wisdom; yet they do not appear to have given the name of philosophy to their expositions of the law (see Josephus, Ap. ii, 4; 1 Macc. i and v). Paul is speaking in the passage alluded to of theo- sophic speculation, which had come from an entrance among Christians (v. 16 sq.), and on which Rhein- wald (De pseudo doctor. Colos. Bonn, 1884), Neander (Gesch. d. Pfaffen, i, 488 sq.), and others have made in- vestigations (see, in brief, De Wette, Br. a. d. Kolos, p. 1 sq.). It is plain from the full letter's explanation, however, that it is worth to human wisdom and philosophy in comparison with that eternal salvation which is only to be obtained through the divine revelation in the Gospel; but it is not necessary to suppose that he was a despiser of sober philosophic investigation, either on the ground of his pharisaic training or of his apostolical duties. For monographs, see Volbeding, Index Programmatum, p. 89 sq. See PHILOSOPHY.

Philosophists, a name given to a class of French writers who entered into a combination to overthrow the religion of Jesus, and eradicate from the human heart every religious sentiment. The man more particularly to whom this idea first occurred was Voltaire, who, being weary (as he said himself) of hearing people repeat that twelve men were sufficient to establish Christianity, resolved to prove that one might be sufficient to over- turn it. Full of this project, he swore, before the year 1790, to dedicate his life to its accomplishment; and for some time he flattered himself that he should enjoy alone the glory of destroying the Christian religion. He found, however, that associates would be necessary; and, from the numerous tribe of his admirers and disciples, he chose D'Alembert and Diderot as the most proper persons to co-operate with him in the execution of his designs. But Voltaire was not satisfied with their sole aid. He contrived to embark in the same cause Frederick II, king of Prussia. This royal adept was one of the most zealous of Voltaire's coadjutors, till he discovered that the philosophers were waging war with the throne, as well as with the altar. This, indeed, was not originally Voltaire's intention. He was vain; he loved to be ca- reassed by the great; and, in one word, he was from natural disposition an aristocrat, and an admirer of roy- alty. But when he found that almost everything was vain but Diderot's disappointment of his imperial projects be- cause they perceived the issue, he determined to oppose all the governments on earth rather than forfeit the glory, with which he had flattered himself, of vanquishing Christ and his apostles in the field of contro- versy. He now set himself, with D'Alembert and Dide- rot, to excite pure discontents with the established order of things. For this purpose they formed secret societies, assumed new names, and employed an enigmatical language. Thus Frederick was called Luc; D'Alembert, Pilaton; and Diderot, Platon, or its anagram, Tom- plis; while the general term for the conspirators was Cucucco. In their secret meetings they professed to celebrate the mysteries of Mythra; and their great ob- ject, as they professed to one another, was to confound the wretch, meaning Jesus Christ. Hence their secret watchword was Écrivez l’Infini, "Crush the Wretch." If we look into some of the books expressly written for general circulation, we shall find there the following doxology: God is the education of all their senses, their voluble amusements, their condemned horrors, others surrounded by sophistry and meretricious ornaments, to entice the mind into their net before it perceives their nature: "The Universal Cause, that God of the philosophers, of the Jews, and of the Christians, is but a chimera and a phantom. The phænomena of nature only prove the existence of God to a few prepossessed men: so far from bespeaking a God, they are but the necessary effects of matter prodigiously diversified. It is more reasonable to admit, with Manes, a twofold God, than the God of Christianity. We cannot know whether a God really exists, or whether there is the smallest difference between good and evil, or vice and virtue. Nothing can be more absurd than to believe the soul a spiritual being. The immortality of the soul, so far from stimulating man to the practice of virtue, is nothing but a barbarous, desperate, fatal tenet, and contrary to all legislation. All ideas of justice and injustice, of virtue and vice, of glory and infamy, are purely arbitrary, and dependent on custom. Conscience and remorse are nothing but the foresight of those physical penalties to which crimes expose us. The laws of the land which, above the laws of God, without remorse the dishonest act that may serve his purpose. The fear of God, so far from being the beginning of wisdom, should be the beginning of folly. The command to love one's parents is more the work of education than of nature. Modesty is only an invention of refined voluptuousness. The law which condemns married people to live together becomes barbarous and cruel on the day they cease to love one another." These extracts from the secret correspondence and the public writings of the men will suffice to shew us that the nature and tendency of the dreadful system they had formed. The philosophists were diligently employed in attempting to propagate their sentiments. Their grand Encyclopædia was converted into an engine to serve this purpose. See ENCyclopæDIA. Voltaire proposed to establish a colony of philosophists at Cleves, who, protected by the king of Prussia, might publish their opinions without dread or danger; and Frederick was disposed to take them under his protection, till he discovered that their opinions were anarchical as well as impious, when not suppressed even off, and even against them. They contrived, however, to engage the ministers of the court of France in their favor, by pretending to have nothing in view but the enlargement of science: in works which spoke, indeed, respectfully of revelation, while every discovery which they brought forward was meant to overthrow it. The system was very finished. When the throne was to be attacked, and even when barefaced atheism was to be promulgated, a number of impious and licentious pamphlets were dispersed (for some time none knew how) from a secret society formed at the Hotel d'Holbach, as a badge of which, Voltaire was elected honorary and perpetual president. To conceal their design, which was the diffusion of their infidel sentiments, they called themselves Encyclopædists. See HOLBACH. The books, however, that were issued from this club were calculated to impair and overturn religion, morals, and government; and these, indeed, spreading over all Europe, imperceptibly took possession of public opinion. As soon as the sale was sufficient to pay the expenses, inferior editions were printed and given away, or sold at a very low price; circulating libraries of them were formed, and reviews and periodical publications; established a general intercourse, by means of hawkers and peddlers, with the distant provinces, and instituted an office to supply all schools with teachers; and thus did they acquire unprecedented dominion over every species of literature, over the minds of all ranks of people, and over the general conduct of youth, with the greatest, if not the worst alarm to the world. The lovers of wit and polite literature were caught by Voltaire; the men of science were perverted, and children corrupted in the first rudiments of learning, by D'Alembert and Diderot; stronger appetites were excited by the ridicule of d'Alembert; the imaginations of the higher orders were set dangerously aflame by Montesquieu; and the multitude of all ranks were surprised, confounded, and hurried away by Rousseau. Thus was the public mind in France completely corrupted, and this, no doubt, greatly accelerated those dreadful events which afterwards transpired in that country.

Philosophy is the highest department of human speculation, the most abstract knowledge of which the human mind is capable.

Importance of the Subject.—The character of the investigations with which philosophy is concerned, and still more the sophistry and abundance during the last century of what has professed itself to be philosophy, render it excessively difficult either to define this branch of inquiry, or to determine what may be legitimately included under the wide designation. Sir William Hamilton has devoted some pages of his course of metaphysics to the discussion of this single topic. The vagueness of the term, the instability and indissolubility of the boundaries of this department of knowledge, and the dissensions in regard to all its details, have led many quick and ingenious minds to repudiate the study altogether, and to deny to it any valid existence. Nevertheless, it is necessary to recognize its reality, in spite of the uncertainty of its nature, of the confusion thus produced, and of the pretensions sheltered under its honorable name. It was a profound and keen reply, which was said to have been made by Aristotle to the assailants and abnegators of philosophy, that "whether we ought to philosophize or ought not to philosophize, we are compelled to philosophize" (τὰς φιλοσοφήσεις, τις μη φιλοσοφήσεις, πάντως δε φιλοσοφήσεις. David, Prolegom. Phil. ap. Nichol. Aristot. p. 13, ed. Acad. Berolin.,) for philosophy is required to demonstrate the impiety and nugatiness of philosophy: "But the mother of demonstrations is philosophy." The same deep sense of the irreconcilable obligation is manifested by Ptolemaeus, when, in a rare access of humor, he writes a paradoxe declaration that all things, rational and irrational—animals, plants, and even minerals, air and water too—alike yearn for theoretical perfection (or the philosophical completion of their nature, Enneid. iii, viii, 1); and that nature, albeit devoid of imagination and reason, has its philosophy within itself, and achieves whatever it effects by theory, or the philosophy which it does not itself possess. "There is reason in roasting eggs," and philosophy in all things, if we can only get at it:

"the meanest flower that blows can give thought that do often lie too deep for ours."

Philosophy is, like death, one of the few things that we can by no means avoid; whether we welcome or reject it; whether we regard the irresistible tendencies of our intellectual constitution to speculative inquiry, or the latent regularity, order, and law controlling all things that fall under our notice, when they develop themselves in a series of institutions. While they constantly disown these productions before the world, they contrived to give them a false celebrity through their confidential agents and correspondents, who were not themselves always trusted with the entire secret. Thoughts that do often lie too deep for ours. varieties of subjects. There is mental, moral, political, economical, and natural philosophy; there is the philosophy of religion, the philosophy of enthusiasm, and the philosophy of insanity; the philosophy of logic, the philosophy of rhetoric, the philosophy of language, and the philosophy of grammar; there is the philosophies of poetry and music, of the inductive sciences; there is the philosophy of colors, the philosophy of music, the philosophy of dress, the philosophy of manners, the philosophy of cookery, the philosophy of building, etc. All imaginative topics reveal an aptitude for philosophic treatment, and pretend to furnish a basis for the special philosophy. It would occasion no surprise to encounter a philosophy of jack-straws, and other infantile amusements. There must be some legitimacy, however slight, in these numerous pretensions, some semblance of truth in such easy assumption, or such professions would not continue to be repeated and tolerated. There must be some common element, some cord of similitude, uniting together under one category these multitudinous forms of inquiry, and the unnumbered inquiries which are left unmentioned.

Scope of the Term. — The word philosophy first appears in the Father of History. It is applied by Croesus to Salyon, in his travels in search of knowledge and information, and is used as almost equivalent to theory, which in the context means scarcely anything more than the enumeration of facts. (Hdt. i, 31.) It next appears in Thucydides. Pericles speaks of the Athenians as “philosophizing without efficiency,” where the term seems to denote the acquisition of information and culture (Thuc. ii, 40). The origin of the word is ascribed to Pythagoras in a familiar anecdote, which reports that, being asked by Leon, the chief of Phlius, “What were philosophers?” he replied, with a happy allusion to the concourse at the Olympic Games, that “they were those who diligently observed the nature of things,” calling themselves “students, or lovers of wisdom,” and occupied with “the contemplation and knowledge of things” (Cicero, Tusc. Q. v, 3, 9). He is supposed to have thus repudiated the designation of “wise man,” or “sophister,” previously in vogue, and to have modestly proposed in its stead the appellation of “philosopher,” a lover of wisdom. The authenticity of the anecdote has been gravely questioned; and the designation, alleged to have been rejected in this manner, continued in habitual use, with no invidious sense, and was applied to Socrates and the chief of the Sophists (Grote, Hist. of Greece, p. ii, vol. viii, ch. xlviii, p. 281; Smith, Hist. of Phil., vol. i, p. 326). The term may be added Androtion, Fr. 89; Phan. Eriu. Fr. 21; and Symesi Dio, apud Dion Chrysostomus, ii, 329, ed. Teubner). The censures of the Sophists by Plato and Aristotl, the character of the Socratic teaching, and the almost exclusively inquisitive and indeterminate complexion of the Platonic speculation, appear to have given currency to the designation of philosophy, as a more modest and inconclusive appellative than “sophia,” or wisdom.

Originally, then, philosophy imported only the loving pursuit of knowledge, without any indication of actual attainment, but soon acquired a more positive and distinct acceptation. In the Republic Plato defines philosophy as the circuit, or beating about of the soul in its ascending progress towards real existence, and declares those to be philosophers who embrace the really existent, and who are able to apprehend the eternal and unchanging. In the Euthyphro he goes farther, and describes philosophy as the acquisition of true knowledge. In the definitions ascribed to Plato, which, though not his, may preserve the tradition of his teaching, the cardinal characteristics of the Platonic philosophy are given: the indeterminate movement, and eternal existence. Xenophon rarely employs the term, but applies “sophia” to the Socratic knowledge. In one passage where he uses it signifies the knowledge and practice of the duties of life (Mem. iv, 2, p. 23). A great step towards the definite restriction of the meaning of philosophy was made by the Platonists, though the name continued, and has always continued, to be employed with great latitude. Aristotle, who gave a sharp, scientific character to nearly everything which he touched, first confined the term to special significations, and gave to it a limited and, in some cases, a purely technical meaning. He calls philosophy “the knowledge of truth,” and he endeavored to discover a “first philosophy,” or body of principles common to all departments of speculative inquiry, and dealing solely with the primary elements and affections of being (Met. i, 1, p. 985; Phys. i, 9, p. 5; Simplicii de first philosophia, c. 1, p. 222, ed. Dacier; Dickel's, vol. i). The first principle of the philosopher, "corresponds to metaphysics in its stricter sense—a division of speculative science receiving its name from the remains of Aristotle, and, in great measure, constituted by his labors. It is the science of being as being (τὸ ἐστὶ οὐκ, Met. vi, 1, p. 1026; xi, 2, p. 1060; iv, p. 1061). Thus, with the Peripatetics, philosophy included all science, but especially theoretical science, and was peculiarly attached to metaphysical science. With this accords the definition of Cicero, which is evidently derived from Peripatetic sources (De Off. ii, 2, 5).

This historical deduction is not unnecessary. Many words grow in meaning with the growth of civilization. Many gradually lose with the advancement of knowledge their original vague amplitude, and acquire a defined, definite, and precise significance. The word "empire" will be perceived to be a distinct class of words can be ascertained only by tracing their development through their successive changes. The history of the term philosophy enables us to understand the still subsisting vacillation in its employment, and to detect the common principle which runs through all its various and apparently incongruous applications. It brings us, at the same time, to the recognition of the mode and measure of its most rigorous employment.

Philosophy is the earnest investigation of the principles of knowledge, and most appropriately of the first principles, or principles of abstract being. It is not science, but search (Kant, "Program" 1763-66; Sir William Hamilton, Metaph. lect. i, iii, Discussions, p. 787). It is distinctively setetic, or inquisitive, rather than dogmatic. Its chief value consists in the zeal, perspicacity, simplicity, and usefulness of the persevering desire for the highest truth, not in its attainment; for the highest truth is, in its nature, unattainable by the finite intelligence of man. It has not, or ought not to have, the pretension or confident assurance of knowledge, though this claim has frequently been made (ὅ filosóphia γνωστικὴ ἐπηρέασθαι, Thucyd. i. 49, 3. Tr. W. and T.). It may be added to the "empire" school. Aristotl. p. 29, ed. Acad. Berol.). It is only a systematic craving and continuous effort to reach the highest knowledge.

"For man loves knowledge, and the beams of truth are more welcome to his mind than all the blandishments of sound his ear, Than all of taste his tongue" (Akenside).

Philosophy was called by the schoolmen the "science of sciences"; and wherever the recondite principles of knowledge are sought, there is philosophy, in a latent and rudimentary, or in a clear and instructive form. Hence it admits of being predicated of investigations far remote from those higher exercises of abstract contemplation to which it is most properly applied.

What is man? What are his faculties and powers? Whence is he? Whither is he going? Herein lies the secret of the power. What are man's duties to it, to himself, and to his fellow-men? What knowledge of these things can be acquired? What are his destinies, and are the aids for their achievement? These questions, and questions like these, constitute the province of philosophy. proper. They present themselves dimly or distinctively to every reflecting mind; and they will not be gainsaid. Our intellectual constitution compels us to think of them; and to think of them, however weakly and spasmodically, is the beginning of philosophy. They all arise, as the result of an analysis of an anomaly and at least which stimulates further investigation. None of them can receive a full and complete reply from the human reason— they stretch beyond its compass. All of them, in every age, have met with some response, either in the poetic and bucolic, or in the popular mythologies, or in the wild guesses of popular credulity; either in the aporias of the prudent, or in the conclusions of those who have sedulously devoted themselves to the unravelling of these enigmas. This latter class have been the philosophers of each generation, from the commencement of rational inquiry to the current day, as they will continue to be till the closing of the great roll of time; for of philosophy there is no end.

This constant disappointment and continual renewal of effort are strange phenomena, and have often proved utterly disheartening. Hence has proceeded the objection so frequently urged that philosophy is ever in restless and fruitless activity, but does not advance. The allegation of an entire failure of progress is unjust; but the same questions constantly reappear with changed aspects, and the same solutions are offered under altered forms. A conviction of change in the same old processes and the alteration in the forms are themselves an advancement. The true source of encouragement is, however, to be derived less from the progress which can never pass the boundaries imposed by the same old questions than from the knowledge that the pursuit is more than the impracticable attainment—the race more important than the arrival at the goal could be—at least in this finite life, with our finite powers. From this habitual disappointment, and the apparent failures which bring the disappointment, have arisen, too, the variety of solutions that have been proposed for the solution of the philosophic riddles that philosophy proposes to man. Varrò enumerated two hundred and eighty-eight possible sects, apparently on the basis of ethics alone (August. De Civ. Dei, xix, 1); and the number of distinguishable schemes of philosophy, to say nothing of diversities of opinion in regard to details, is countless. Yet each of these has contributed something to our knowledge: in the more precise statement of the problems to be solved, in the clearer determination of their conditions, in the refutation of those, in the exposure of previous misapprehensions, in presenting the incipient truths in new, and brighter lights, or in adding to our positive information in regard to these dark and difficult subjects. The gratitude which Aristotle expresses, in a remarkable passage (Met. i), towards his predecessors, who had gone astray, or who had failed to see the truth, is due to all philosophical inquirers. They have contributed something towards the result, however incomplete that result may remain (καὶ γὰρ οὕτω τυναμόθεακα τι τὴν γὰρ ἢν προσφέροντο ημῶν; and see Alexander Aphrodis. Αριστοτελίτου, ἢ τῶν κατα- βιβλήματις δύσκολα εὐχρήστωτος ημῖν η λογίας παρατηκόντων). History of the Subject.—The hopelessness of satisfactory attainment, with the inevitable perspicacity of the search, and the gradual approximation, or appearance of approximation, to a goal which is never reached, but is ever receding, eventuate in changes, expansions, fluctuations, and revolutions in opinion, which are recorded and appreciated in the history of philosophy. This history chronicles the origins and original phases of philosophy, the mutations, progresses, and recessions, and the causes of them; it notes the introduction of new doctrines, new methods of procedure, new modes of exposition; the dissensions and controversies which spring up and minister to new developments; the reduction of kindred views to a coherent body; and the constitution of sects and schools; the fortunes of such schools, the development or perversion of the several successive or contemporaneous schemes of speculation in the bosom of the schools themselves, either in consequence of their own internal activity, or of the necessities suggested or enforced by external attack. In this manner of an analysis of an anomaly and at least which stimulates further investigation. None of them can receive a full and complete reply from the human reason—they stretch beyond its compass. All of them, in every age, have met with some response, either in the poetic and bucolic, or in the popular mythologies, or in the wild guesses of popular credulity; either in the aporias of the prudent, or in the conclusions of those who have sedulously devoted themselves to the unravelling of these enigmas. constituting philosophy, or they may be kept distinct and variously subdivided. Sir William Hamilton, who, in deference to the narrowness of the Scotch school, at times almost identifies psychology with philosophy, enumerates, by a strained construction, five branches of the former: logic, ethics, politics, aesthetics, and theology (Ethics, Lect. iii, p. 44). Remusat incidentally distinguishes philosophy from the five heads of psychology, logic, metaphysics, theology (or the philosophy of religion = theology), and morals (Vie d'Aubier, liv. ii, ch. iii, vol. i, p. 351 sq.). Ampère, in his ingenious and fantastic classification of human knowledge, by a separation of the sciences into four departments (Phil. de la Religion, 1821, pp. 535, 545), assigns each of the four departments of philosophical inquiry. For the present purpose, the sufficiency or the insufficiency, the validity or the invalidity, of these various divisions and subdivisions is unimportant. The history of philosophy includes them all, either as definite members or as subordinate parts. Each may be treated separately, or all may be embraced in one treatment, or a distinct discussion may be bestowed upon several of them combined in one view. There may thus be a history of mental philosophy, and a history of ethics, like the supplement of Descartes to the Encyclopædia Britannica; or a history of logic, like Mr. Blackey's very feeble treatise on that subject; or a history of heretical opinions, like those so common in the earlier ages of the Christian Church; or a general history of philosophy, as in Dr. Renan's or Tennyson's works. This is the mode in which the history of philosophy may be divided.

The other process of division regards primarily the succession of philosophical systems, or of philosophical schools, where the systems are identified with particular schools. If this be done, it is not only not in doctrine, but in character. Hence other divisions, more precise than are attainable by these indistinct chronological periods, have latterly won more favor. The following may be offered as an example of such a distribution.

I. The beginnings of philosophy, chiefly among the Orientals, with whom philosophy, mythology, and the divine power inseparably interwoven.

II. The philosophy of the Greeks, which comprehends of course the philosophy of the Romans, as it was essentially Greek from Cicero to Boethius.

III. The philosophy of the Schoolmen, which but occupies a small portion of modern systems. To this the philosophy of the Jews and Saracens may be added as an appendix, since it affords the transition to itself from the Greeks.

IV. Philosophy of the Renaissance, or Transition Age, commencing with Simplicius Plutarch and the Medicus Academy, and ending with Pascal and Gassendi.

V. The philosophy of Modern Times—First begun by Francis Bacon and Hobbes.

Each of these periods has many subdivisions, which have been variously constituted by different historians, and necessarily vary with the variation of the aspects under which philosophy is contemplated by the several chroniclers of its fluctuations.

Literature.—The fullest repertory of works on the several schemes of philosophy, on its general and special history, and on the history of the philosophers themselves, of particular doctrines may be found in Ueberweg, Geschichte der Philosophie, translated by George S. Morris (N. Y., 1854, 2 vols. 8vo). Up to the date of that work the fullest treatise on the subject was H. Ritter's Geschichte der Philosophie (Gotha, 1854, 12 vols. 8vo). A convenient summary is Maurice's Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy (London, 1850-56, and later, 4 vols. 8vo), which gives a historical review of the whole subject. (G. F. H.)

Philosophy, Chaldean, See MAGI; PHILOSOPHY, Hebrew.

Philosophy, Greek. It is not in accordance with the scope of this Cyclopaedia to give a full account of the various philosophical systems of the ancient Greeks. These are sufficiently discussed under the names of their respective founders. Our purpose here is only to give so much as will serve to show their relations to the centuries of Christianity. Being this series of articles well in the following article on Hebrew Philosophy, we combine the Scriptural statements with the results of modern investigations.

1. The Development of Greek Philosophy.—The complete fitness of Greek philosophy to perform a propaedeutic office for Christianity, as an exhaustive effort of reason to solve the great problems of being, must be apparent after a detailed study of its progress and consummation; and even the simplest outline of its history cannot fail to preserve the leading traits of the natural (or even necessary) law by which its development was governed.

The various attempts which have been made to derive Western philosophy from Eastern sources have signalized failure. The external evidence in favor of this hypothesis is wholly insufficient to support (Heracleon, Orph. g. d. Phil. i, 159, et seq.; Thirlwall, Hist. of Gr. Ant., i, 180; Zeller, Geschichte der Phil. d. Griechen, i, 18-34; Max Müller, On Language, 84 note), and on internal grounds it is most improbable. It is true that in some degree the character of Greek speculation may have been influenced, at least in its earliest stages, by religious ideas which were originally introduced from the East; but this indirect influence does not affect the real originality of the great Greek teachers. The spirit of pure philosophy, distinct from theology, is wholly alien from Eastern thought; and it was comparatively late when even a Greek ventured to separate philosophy from religion. But in Greece the separation, when it was once effected, remained essentially complete. The opinions of the ancient philosophers might or might not be outwardly reconcilable with the popular faith, but philosophy and faith were independent. The very value of Greek teaching lies in the fact that it was, as far as is possible, a result of simple reason, or, if faith asserts its prerogative, the distinction is sharply marked. In this we have a record of the power and weakness of the human mind written at once on the grandest scale and in the fairest characters.

Of the various classifications of the Greek schools which have been proposed, the simplest and truest seems to be that which divides the history of philosophy into three great periods, the first reaching to the era of the Sophists, the next to the death of Aristotle, the third to the Christian era. In the first period the world objectively is the great centre of inquiry; in the second, the ideas of things, truth, and being; in the third, the chief interest of philosophy falls back upon the practical conduct of life. Successive systems overlap each other, both in time and subjects of speculation, but broadly the succession which has been indicated will hold good (Zeller, Die Philosophie der Griechen, i, 111, et seq.). After the Christian era philosophy ceased to have any true vitality in Greece, but made new efforts to meet the changed conditions of life at Alexandria and Rome. At Alexandria Platonism was vivified by the spirit of Oriental mysticism, and after years of Christianity; and S. Stoicism was united with the vigorous virtues of active life. Each of these great divisions must be pursued in rapid review.

1. The pre-Socratic Schools.—The first Greek philosophy was little more than an attempt to follow out in thought the mystical cosmogonies of earlier poets. Gradually the depth and variety of the problems included in the idea of a cosmogony became apparent, and, after each chew had been turned out, the period ended in the negative teaching of the Sophists. The questions of creation, of the immediate relation of mind and matter, were pronounced in fact, if not in word, insoluble, and speculation was turned into a new direction. Which element or elements held the changing forms of things? — this was the primary inquiry to which the IONIC school endeavored to find an answer. Thales (B.C. cir. 625-610), following, as it seems, the genealogy of Hesiod, pointed to moisture (water) as the most primitive and supervening form of all matter. Anaximenes (B.C. cir. 540-480) substituted air for water, as the more subtle and all-pervading element; but equally with Thales he neglected all consideration of the force which might be supposed to modify the one primal substance. At a much later date (B.C. cir. 460) Diogenes of Apollonia, to meet this difficulty, represented this element as endowed with intelligence (σοφής), but even he makes no distinction between the material and the intelligible. The atomic theory of Democritus (B.C. cir. 460-357), which stands in close connection with this form of IONIC teaching, offered another and more metaphysical position. The universe of atoms included the action of force, but he wholly omitted to account for its source. Meanwhile another mode of speculation had arisen in the same school. In place of one definite element, Anaximander (B.C. cir. 610-547) suggested the infinite as the source of all the changes in the universe, and the many elements. Subsequently, however, this raised the question of the stability of the world. How the connected worlds with concrete being it is impossible to determine; but it may not be wholly fanciful to see in the doctrine of the transformation of souls an attempt to trace in the successive forms of life an outward expression of a harmonious law in the moral as well as in the physical world. (The remains of the pre-Socratic philosophers have been collected in a very convenient form by F. Mollach in Didot's Biblioth. Gr. Paris, 1860.)

The first cycle of philosophy was thus completed. All the great primary problems of thought had been stated, and typical answers rendered. The relation of spirit and matter was still unsolved. Speculation issued in new and strange conclusions (Pantheism, Empedocles, or pantheism (Xenophanes). On one side reason was made the sole criterion of truth (Parmenides); on the other, experience (Heraclitus). As yet there was no rest, and the Sophists prepared the way for a new method. Whatever may be the moral estimate which is formed of the Sophists, there can be little doubt as to the importance of their teaching as preparatory to that of Socrates. All attempts to arrive at certainty by a study of the world had failed: might it not seem then, that truth is subjective? "Man is the measure of all things." Sensations are modified by the individual; and may not this hold good universally? The conclusion was applied to morals and politics with fearless skill. The belief in absolute truth and right was well-nigh banished; but meanwhile the Sophists were perfecting the instrument which was to be turned against them. Language, in their hands, was an unknown before, when words assumed the place of things. Plato might ridicule the pedantry of Protagoras, but Socrates reaped a rich harvest from it.

2. The Socratic Schools.—In the second period of Greek philosophy, the teaching involved a change. Athens became the centre of speculations which had hitherto chiefly found a home among the more mixed populations of the colonies. At the same time inquiry was turned from the outward world to the inward, from theories of the origin and relation of things to theories of our knowledge of them. A philosophy of ideas, using the term in its widest sense, succeeded a philosophy of nature. In three generations Greek speculation reached its greatest glory in the teaching of Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle. When the sovereignty of Greek philosophy began, it already carried within itself the seeds of its own destruction. In the hopeless turmoil of civil disturbances which followed, men's thoughts were chiefly directed to questions of personal duty.

The famous sentence in which Aristotle (Met. xiii, 4) characterizes the teaching of Socrates (B.C. 468-399) places his scientific position in the clearest light. There are two things, he says, which we may rightly attribute to Socrates, inductive reasoning and general definition (ὁ Β Σ Η Β Λ Π Κ Ν , ὁ καθολικός). By the first he endeavors to discover the essential elements which underlie the changing forms of appearances and the varieties of opinion: by the second he fixed the truth which he thus had gained. But, besides this, Socrates rendered another service to truth. He changed not only the method, but also the subject of philosophy (Cicero, Acad. Post. i. 4). Ethics occupied in his investigations the primary place which had hitherto been held by physics. The great aim of his inductions was to discover the laws of virtue; and, before entering on other speculations, he determined to obey the Delphian maxim and “know himself” (Plato, Phdr. p. 229). It was a necessary consequence of a first effort in this direction that Socrates regarded all the results which he derived as like in kind. Knowldge (ισόμετρα) was equally absolute and authoritative, whether it referred to the laws of intellectual opterations or to questions of morality. A conclusion in geometry and a conclusion on conduct were set forth as true in the same sense. Thus virtue was only another name for happiness (Xenoph. Mem. iii. 5, 4; Arist. Eth. Euk.
End. i. 5). Every one was supposed to have within him a faculty absolutely leading to right action, just as the mind necessarily decides rightly as to relations of space and number, when each step in the proposition is clearly stated. Socrates practically neglected the determinative power of the will. His great glory was, however, clearly connected with this fundamental error in his system. He affirmed the existence of a universal law of right and wrong. He connected philosophy with action, both in detail and in general. On the one side he did nothing of importance for the working of Providence.
Not the least fruitful characteristic of his teaching was what may be called its desolatoriness. He formed no complete system. He wrote nothing. He attracted and impressed his followers by his many-sided nature. He helped others to give birth to thoughts, to use his favorite image, but he was barren himself (Plato, Theat. p. 150). As a result of this, the most conflicting opinions were maintained by some of his professed followers, who carried out isolated fragments of his teaching to extreme conclusions.
Some adopted his method (Euclides, B.C. cir. 400, the Μεταφυσικα), others his subject. Of the latter, one section, following out his proposition of the identity of self-command (ισόμετρα) with virtue, professed an utter disregard of everything material (Antithenes, B.C.
cir. 350, the Κυκλικα), while the other (Aristippus, B.C.
cir. 366, the Κυκλικα), inverting the maxim that vit-ue is necessarily accompanied by pleasure, took immediate pleasure as the rule of action.
These "minor Socratic schools" were, however, pre-monitory of the crisis of the soul. The truths which they distorted were embodied at a later time in more reasonable forms. Plato alone (B.C. 480-547), by the breath and nobleness of his teaching, was the true successor of Socrates; with fuller detail and greater elaboration of parts, his philosophy was as many-sided as that of Socrates, his principles a consistent Platonic system, though many Platonic doctines are sufficiently marked. Plato, indeed, possessed two commanding powers, which, though apparently incompatible, are in the highest sense complementary: a mature destructive dialectic, and a creative imagination. By the first he refuted the great fallacies of the Sophists on the uncertainty of knowledge and right, carrying out in this the attacks of Socrates; by the other he endeavored to bridge over the interval between appearance and reality, and gain an approach to the eternal. His famous doctrines of Ideas and Recollection (ανανωτητα) are a solution by imagination of a logical difficulty. Socrates had shown the existence of general notions; Plato felt constrained to attribute to them a substantive existence (Arist. Met. xiii. 4). A glorious vision. It was his supreme and most extravagant developement in philosophy. The unembodied spirits were exhibited in immediate presence of the "ideas" of things (Phdr. p. 247); the law of their em-bodyment was sensibly portrayed; and the more or less vivid remembrance of supermundane realities in this life, was in harmony with the other. These things were things supposed to have been face to face with truth: the object of teaching was to bring back impressions latent but uneffaced.

VIII.—9

The "myths" of Plato, to one of the most famous of which reference has just been made, play a most important part in his system. They answer in the philosopher's systematic philosophy. In the development of his mythology and judgment he leaves the way of reason, and ventures, as he says, on a rude raft to brave the dangers of the ocean (Phdr. p. 85, D; Gorg. p. 528, A). "The peril and the prize are noble and the hope is great" (Phdr. p. 114, C, D). Such tales, as he admits, may seem puerile and ridiculous; and if there were other surer and clearer means of gaining the desired end, the judgment would be just (Gorg. p. 527, A). But, as it is, thus only can he connect the seen and the unseen. The myths, then, mark the limit of his dialectics. They are not merely poetical pictures of the truth; they are also an illustration of his teaching, but real efforts to penetrate beyond the depths of argument. They show that his method was not commensurate with his instinctive desires; and point out in intelligible outlines the subjects on which man looks for revelations. Such are the illusions of the human mind to truth (Phdr. p. 246-49); the pre-existence and immortality of the soul (Menon, p. 81-82; Phdr. p. 110-12; Tim. p. 41); the state of future retribution (Gorg. p. 525-28; Rep. p. 614-16); the revolutions of the world (Pol. p. 262. Comp. also Sympa.
p. 189-91, 202. Plato, Phileb. p. 601-03, who gives the literature of the subject).

The great difference between Plato and Aristotle (B.C.
384-322) lies in the use which Plato thus made of imagination as the exponent of instinct. The dialectics of Plato is not inferior to that of Aristotle, and Aristotle exhibits traces of poetic power not unworthy of Plato; but Aristotle never allows imagination to influence his final decision. He elaborated a perfect method, and he used it with perfect fairness. His writings contain the highest utterance of pure reason. Looking back on all the earlier efforts of philosophy, he pronounced a calm and final judgment. For him many of the conclusions which others had maintained were val-less, because he showed that they rested on feeling, and not on argumet. This stern severity of logic gives an indescribable pathos to those passages in which he touches on the highest hopes of men; and perhaps there is no more truly affecting chapter in ancient literature than that in which he states in a few unimpassioned sentences the issue of his inquiry into the immortality of the soul (Phyl. p. 70). It is so, but that part is impersonal (De An. iii. 5). This was the utterance of reason, and he gives expression to it without a word of protest, and yet as one who knew the extent of the sacrifice which it involved. The conclusion is, as it were, the epitaph of free speculation. Laws of observation and argument, and even the traditions of experience, continue to exist, but there is no hope beyond the grave.

It follows necessarily that the Platonic doctrine of ideas was emphatically rejected by Aristotle, who gave, however, the final development to the original conception of Socrates. With Socrates "ideas" (general deinitions) were mere abstractions; with Plato they had an absolute existence; with Aristotle they had no existence separate from things in which they were realized, though the form (μορφη), which answers to the Platonic idea, was held to be the manifest of the thing itself (comp.
Zeller, Philos. d. Griech. i. 119, 120).

There is one feature common in essence to the systems of Plato and Aristotle which has not yet been noticed. In both, ethics is a part of politics. The citizen is prior to the man. In Plato this doctrine finds its most extravagant development in philosophy. The life, and, in some places, his teaching, were directly opposed to it (e. g. Gorg. p. 527, D). This practical inconsequence was due, it may be supposed, to the condition of Athens at the time, for the idea was in complete nationalism. It may be regarded as an absolute subordination of the individual to the body includes one of the chief lessons of the ancient world.

In Aristotle the "political" character of man is defined with greater precision, and brought within narrower limits. The breaking up of the small Greek states had prepared the way for more comprehensive views of human nature and, the desire for a deeper and more fundamental truth of the necessity of social union for perfect life. But in the next generation this was lost. The wars of the succession obliterates the idea of society, and philosophy was content with aiming at individual happiness.

The coming change was indicated by the rise of a school of sceptics. The scepticism of the Sophists marked the close of the first period, and in like manner the scepticism of the Pyrrhonists marks the close of the second (Stilpo, B.C. cir. 299; Pyrrho, B.C. cir. 350). But the Pyrrhonist's position was serviceable to the cause of philosophy, as the Sophists did by the refinement of language. Their immediate influence was limited in its range, and it is only as a symptom that the rise of philosophy is important. But in this respect it forebodes the character of after-philosophy by denuding the foundation of all higher speculations. Thus all interest was turned to questions of practical morality. Hitherto morality had been based as a science upon mental analysis, but by the Pyrrhonists it was made subservient to law and custom. Immediate experience was held to be the only true guide, and the world was made to appear as a spectacle, a mere show, and the reason of man was destroyed.

3. The post-Socratic Schools. — After Aristotle, philosophy, as has already been noticed, took a new direction. The Socratic schools were, as has been shown, connected by a common pursuit of the permanent elements which underlies phenomena. Science placed virtue in action, truth in a knowledge of the ideas of things. Plato went farther, and maintained that these ideas are alone truly existent. Aristotle, though differing in terms, yet only followed in the same direction when he attributed to form, not an independent existence, but a fashionable resting place in all individual objects. But from this point speculation took a mainly personal direction. Philosophy, in the strict sense of the word, ceased to exist. This was due both to the circumstances of the time and to the exhaustion consequent on the failure of the Socratic method to solve the deep mysteries of being. Aristotle had, indeed, laid the wide foundations of an inductive system of physics, but few were inclined to continue his work. The physical theories which were brought forward were merely adaptations from the Greek to the Roman philosophy.

In dealing with moral questions two opposite systems are possible, and have found advocates in all ages. On the one side it may be said that the character of actions is to be judged by their results; on the other, that it is to be sought only in the actions themselves. Pleasure is the end of life, and pain the necessary and assumed or discovered law of our nature in the other. If the world were perfect and the balance of human faculties undisturbed, it is evident that both systems would give identical results. As it is, there is a tendency to error on each side, which is clearly seen in the rival schools of the Epicureans and Stoics, who practically divided the suffrages of the mass of educated men in the centuries before and after the Christian era.

Epicurus (B.C. 382-270) defined the object of philosophy to be the attainment of a happy life. The pursuit of truth for its own sake he regarded as superfluous. He rejected dialectics as a useless study, and accepted the senses, in the widest acceptation of the term, as the criterion of truth. Physics he subordinated entirely to ethics (Cicero, De Fin, i, 7). But he differed widely from the Cyrenaics in his view of happiness. The happiness at which the wise man aims to be found, he said, not in momentary gratification, but in lifelong pleasure. It does not consist necessarily in excitement or motion, but often in absolute tranquility (dormit) of the wise man is happy even on the rack) (Diog. Laer. x, 118), for “virtue alone is inescapable from pleasure” (ib. p. 188). To live happily and to live wisely, nobly, and justly, are convertible phrases (id. p. 140). But it followed as a corollary from his view of happiness that the gods, who were assumed to be supremely happy and eternal, were absolutely free from all care or concern about any care for the world or man (id. p. 139; comp. Lucr. ii, 645-47). All things were supposed to come into being by chance, and so pass away; and the study of nature was chiefly useful as dispelling the superstitious fears of the gods and death by which the multitude are tormented. It is obvious how such teaching would degenerate in practice. The individual was left master of his own life, free from all regard to any higher law than a refined selfishness.

While Epicurus asserted in this manner the claims of one part of man's nature in the conduct of life, Zeno of Citium (B.C. cir. 280), with equal partiality, advocated a purely spiritual (intellectual) morality. The opposition between the two was complete. The infinite, chance-formed worlds of the one stand over against the one harmonious world of the other. On the one side are gods regardless of material things, on the other a being permeating and vivifying all creation. This difference necessarily found its chief expression in ethics. For when the Stoics taught that there were only two principles of things, matter and God, and argued that reason—for them the gods were many and various—was fashioned and quickened (τι ρωσιονι)—it followed that the active principle in man is of divine origin, and that his duty is to live conformably to nature (τι ρωσιονιανυμεν την γενευς) (p. 31). By "nature" some understood the nature of man, others the nature of the universe; but both agreed in regarding it as a general law of the whole, and not particular passions or impulses. Good, therefore, was but one. All external things were indifferent. Reason was the absolute sovereign of man. Thus the doctrine of Epicurus, practically left man to himself, but it was worse in its final results than Epicurism, for it made him his own god.

In one point the Epicureans and Stoics were agreed. They both regarded the happiness and culture of the individual as the highest good. Both systems belonged to a period of corruption and decay. They were the efforts of the man to support himself in the ruin of the state. But at the same time this assertion of individual independence and breaking down of local connections performed an important work in preparation for Christianity. It was for the Gentile world an influence corresponding to the Dispersion for the Jews. Men, as men, owned their fellowship as they had not done before. Isolating superstitions were shattered by the arguments of the Epicureans. The unity of the human race in the conception of one nature of man, others the nature of the universe; but both agreed in regarding it as a general law of the whole, and not particular passions or impulses. Good, therefore, was but one. All external things were indifferent. Reason was the absolute sovereign of man. Thus the doctrine of Epicurus, practically left man to himself, but it was worse in its final results than Epicurism, for it made him his own god.

Meanwhile in the New Academy Platonism degenerated into scepticism. Epicurus found an authoritative rule in the sense. The Stoics took refuge in what seems to answer to the modern doctrine that of the common sense,” and maintained that the senses give a direct knowledge of the object. Carneades (B.C. 218-129) combated these views, and showed that sensation cannot be proved to declare the real nature, but only some of the effects, of things. Thus the slight philosophical basis of the later schools was undermined. Scepticism remained as the last issue of speculation; and if we may believe the declaration of Seneca (Quaest. Nat. vii, 82), scepticism itself soon ceased to be taught as a system. The great teachers had sought rest, and in the end they found unrest. No science of life could be established. The reason of the few failed to create an esoteric rule of virtue and happiness. For in this they all agreed, that the blessings of philosophy were not for the mass. A "gospel preached to the poor" was as yet unknown to the wise men.

But though the Greek philosophers fell short of their highest aim, it needed no words to show the work which they did as pioneers of a universal Church. They re-revealed the wants and the instincts of men with a clearness and vigor elsewhere unattainable, for their sight was dazzled by no reflections from a purer faith. Step by step great questions were proposed— fate, providence, conscience, law, the state, the man; and answer they were given because they have no creature race because they are generally one-sided. The discussions which were primarily restricted to a few, in time influenced the opinions of the many. The preacher who spoke of “an unknown God” had an audience whom he could not understand, not at Athens only or Rome, but throughout the city, who were not only interested in faith, but found in it their spiritual sustenance.

The complete course of philosophy was run before the Christian era, but there were yet two mixed systems afterwards which offered some novel features. At Alexandria Platonism was united with various elements of Eastern speculation, and for several centuries exercised an important influence on Christian doctrine. At Rome Stoicism was vivified by the spirit of the old republic, and exhibit the extreme Western type of philosophy. Of the first nothing can be said. It arose only when Christianity was a recognised spiritual and legal power of the state, and rendered it impossible for the pagans to resist its influence. The treatise of Denis (Histoire des Théories et des Idées morales dans l’Antiquité (Paris, 1856), is limited in range and hardly satisfactory. Dillinger’s Vorhalle zur Gesch. des Christenthums (Heidelberg, 1868), comprehensively, but covers too large a field. The brief surveys in De Presse’s Histoire des Trois Premiers siècles of l’Eglise chrétienne (Paris, 1858; transl. Edinb. 1862), and in Cocker, Christianity and Greek Philosophy (N.Y. 1670), are much more vigorous, and on the whole just. But no one seems to have apprehended the real character and growth of Greek philosophy so well as Zeller (though with no special attention to its relations to religion) in his history (Die Philosophie der Griechen, 2d ed. Tübingen, 1856), which for sublety and completeness is unrivaled. See also in Gatenby’s edition of Eusebius (adjoining articles) Brandis, Handb. d. gré. Philos. Philologie (1855 sq.); Maury, Histoire de la Religion de la Grèce (Paris, 1867, 3 vol.); Butler, Histoire de l’Anc. Philos. (London, 1866, 2 vols.).

II. Connection of Greek with Hebrew Philosophy.

The literature of Greece and Judaea came in contact at Alexandria; and the first known attempt to accomplish their fusion is that ascribed to the Jewish Peripatetic Aristotle, in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor (B.C. 186-146); but the principal extant specimens are those which were written during the 2d century after Christ. Philo, the date of whose birth may be placed about B.C. 20. (Aristobulus is said to have been a Peripatetic; but of his exact relations to this philosophy nothing is known. From the few fragments which remain of his writings, he seems to have anticipated Philo in the employment of an allegorical interpretation of Scripture. His name, however, is more known in connection with forgeries of the Greek poets in support of his theory that the wisdom of the Greeks was borrowed from Moses. See Valckener, Die griech. Lehren der Juden, 2d ed. Basle, 1896, represents a whole picture of the 1st century, as a source of consolation (iv, 2, 14; v, 15); but there is no confidence in any future retribution. In a certain sense the elements of which we are composed are eternal (v, 13), for they are incorporated in other parts of the universe, but we shall cease to exist (iv, 14, 21; v, 24; vi, 10). Not only is there no recognition of communion between an immortal man and a personal God, but the idea is excluded. Man is but an atom in a vast universe, and his actions and sufferings are measured solely by their relation to the whole (Aston, s, x, 6, 29; xii, 26; vi, 45; v, 22; vii, 9). God is but another name for “the mind of the universe” (Γ του κεφαλος του οσμοντ, v, 30), “the soul of the world” (iv, 40), “the reason that ordeth matter” (vii, 1), “universal nature” (Γ του ωσμοντ, vii, 33; ix, 1; comp. x, 1), and is even identified with the world itself (του γενεας του κόσμου, xii, 1; comp. Gataker on iv, 28). Thus the stoicism of M. Aurelius gives many of the moral precepts of the Gospel (Gataker, p. xviii), but without their foundation, which can find no place in his system. It is impossible to read his reflections without emotion, but he cannot have invented the idea of the soul of the world. There are the last strain of a dying creed, and in themselves he has no elevation of affinity to the new faith. Christianity necessarily includes whatever is noblest in them, but they affect to supply the place of Christianity, and do not lead to it. The real elements of greatness in M. Aurelius are many, and truly Roman; but the study of his Meditations by the side of the New Test can leave little doubt that he could not have helped to give a national standing-place to a Catholic Church.

The history of ancient philosophy in its religious aspect has been strangely neglected. Nothing, so far as we are aware, has been written on the pre-Christian era answering to the clear and elegant essay of Matter on post-Christian history in "Histoire de la Philosophie dans ses rapports avec la Religion depuis l’ère chrétienne," Paris, 1864). There are useful hints in Caro’s Vorbilder des Christenthums (Jena, 1861), and Ackermann’s Das Christliche in Plato (Hamb, 1836). The treatise of Denis, Histoire des Théories et des Idées morales dans l’Antiquité (Paris, 1856), is limited in range and hardly satisfactory. Dilling’s Vorbilder zur Gesch. des Christenthums (Heidelberg, 1868), comprehensively, but covers too large a field. PHILOSOPHY are cited by Gfrörer, i. 54. Philo even maintains the divine inspiration of the Septuagint version, Viti. Mos. ii, c. 6, 7, p. 139, 140.) The result in his writings was an attempted combination of the two—the Greek philosophy supplying the ethical ideal of the Scriptures, through the Septuagint translation, contributed, by means of an extravagant license of allegorical interpretation, much of the language and illustration of the system, besides imparting to it the apparent sanction of a divine authority. The leading idea of Philo's teaching is the idea of a Platonic idea, which forms the connecting link between the philosophy of Greece and the pantheism of the East—that thought which represents the supreme principle of things as absolutely one and simple, beyond personality and beyond definite existence, and as such immutable and incapable of relation to temporal things. (Comp. Plato, Rep., vi, 509; i, 381. Gfrörer, i, 134, and Franck, Dict. des Sciences Philosophiques, art. Philon, regard this feature of Philo's theology as of Oriental origin. But his Greek studies might suggest the same idea, and much of his language seems to point to this origin. See Duhme, i, 31, 41.)

In place of the God of the Hebrew Scriptures, who, even in his most hidden and mysterious nature, is never regarded as other than a person, Philo is led to substitute a supreme idea of God, an ideal or abstract unity, as the first principle of a system in which philosophy and theology are to be reconciled and united: and though he is unable entirely to abandon the language of personality which the Scriptures at every page force upon him, he is at the same time unable, consistently with his philosophical assumptions, to admit an immediate personal relation between the Supreme Being and the creature. (See De Mut. Nom. c. 4, p. 582; Gfrörer, i, 144; Duhme, i, 154. The various passages inconsistent with this, in which Philo seems to speak as if the action of God in the world may perhaps be explained by supposing this action to be exerted through the medium of the Logos. Comp. Quod Deus sit immut. c. 12, p. 281; Gfrörer, i, 199, 293.) The medium of reconciliation is sought in a development of the scriptural manifestation of the Wisdom and the Word of God, which take the place of the soul of the world as it appears in the Timaeus, being represented as a second God—the connecting link between the first principle and the world; in whom are concentrated those personal attributes which are indispensable to religion, and which are concomitantly present in the Scripture theology (Fragm. 625, ex Euseb. Porpl. Evang. viii, 13: Διὰ τις ὡς περὶ θεοῦ οὐκ ἦν τὸ ἐκ τούτων θεὸν ἑιρήνα τῶν ἄνθρωπων, ἀλλ' ἐκ τῆς ἀνατολῆς; Πηγαδίως καὶ σφών τοιαύτης συνηρμομένης. Θύμων γάρ τις ἴνα ἐκ τούτων οὐκ ἐποιεῖται ἀνατολῆς καὶ Πηγής τῶν ἑλέους, ἀλλ' ἐκ τῶν ἑπτά εἶναι ὡς ἐκ τούτων ἵπτομαι). The following short summary of Philo's system will serve to exhibit those of its features which are most nearly related to our present inquiry (in this summary use has been made chiefly of that of Hegel, Grecia. der Philosophie, its Werke, xv, 18-23, and of that of Zeller, Philos. der Griechen, iii, 504-665): The highest aim of philosophy, and the most perfect happiness, according to Philo, is the knowledge of God in his absolute nature (De Vita Contempl. c. 2, p. 473. Comp. De Conf. Legis. c. 20, p. 419; De Vict. Offr. c. 16, p. 264; De Monarch. i, 3, 4, p. 216), in which he is exalted above all affinity to finite things, without qualities, and not to be expressed in speech (Legis. Alf. i, c. 13, p. 50: άντων οὖν θεός, χωρίς ἐκ τούτων πάντων ἐκ τούτων λαμβάνεται, καὶ διάθρων καὶ ἰσθούστος). De Somn. i, 39, p. 650: λαμβάνεται γὰρ ἐκ πάντων, ἀλλ' μόνον ἐκ τούτων. Comp. De Viti. Cont. c. 1, p. 472; Quod Deus immut. c. 11, p. 281). Such knowledge, though not fully attainable by any man, is nevertheless to be essentially present in the highest degree in which we apprehend directly the existence of God, though falling short of a comprehension of his essence (De Præm. et Post. c. 7, p. 415. Comp. Gfrörer, i, 135, 199. By this hypothesis of a primary and secondary knowledge, Gfrörer reconciles those passages in which the knowledge of God is stated as unattainable by others apparently of an opposite import: e. g. De Post. Cont. c. 48, p. 258; De Monarch. i, 6, p. 218). Even this amount, however, of direct knowledge is not to be gained by any effort of human thought, but only by God's revelation of himself, and is therefore a revelation in which the seer, himself passive, is elevated by divine inspiration above the conditions of finite consciousness, and becomes one with the God whom he contemplates (De Posver. Cont. c. 5, p. 229; Legis. Alf. iii, 23, p. 107; De Abr. c. 24, p. 19; De Migr. Abr. c. 31, p. 463; Fragm. p. 645; Quis rer. dic. har. c. 13, 14, p. 482; comp. Neander, Ch. Hist. i, 79, ed. Bohn. This ecstatic intuition is insisted upon also by Plotinus and the later Platonists, as in modern times by Schelling). But this ecstatic vision is possible only to a chosen few; for the many, who are incapable of it, there remains only that inferior and improper apprehension of God which can be gained through the means of derived and created existences, especially of his Word or Wisdom, who is the medium by which God is related to the world. The idea of the Supreme Being is the God of the wise and perfect (Legis. Alf. iii, 32, p. 107; iii, 73, p. 128; De Abr. c. 24, p. 19; De Migr. Abr. c. 31, p. 463; De Conf. Legis. c. 28, p. 427). This Word, or Logos, is described in various ways, some more externally personal, others more personally being. Whether the Logos of Philo is to be regarded as a distinct person or not is matter of controversy. The negative is maintained by Burton (Brompton Lectures, note 38) and by Dorrer (Person of Christ, ii, 27, Engl. transl. and note A), against Gfrörer, Duhme, and others. The view that the intermediate view is taken by Zeller, iii, 626, and to some extent by Prof. Jowett, Epistles of St. Paul, i, 484, 2d ed.) He is the intelligible world, the archetypal pattern, the idea of ideas (De Mund. Opif. c. 6, p. 5; elsewhere the Logos is distinguished from the Logos of the Logos. Comp. De Conf. Legis. c. 14, p. 414), the wisdom of God (Legis. Alf. i, 19, p. 56), the shadow of God, by which, as by an instrument, he made the world (Legis. Alf. iii, 81, p. 106; comp. De Monarch. ii, 5, p. 225; De Cherub. c. 56, p. 162): he is the eternal image of the Father (De Somn. i, 37, p. 658); the mediator between the Creator and his creatures, the suppliant in behalf of mortals, the abode and author from the ruler to his subjects (Quis rer. dic. har. c. 42, p. 501). He is moreover the God in whose likeness man was made; for the supreme God cannot have any likeness to a mortal nature (Fragm. p. 625): he is the angel who appeared to Moses at the bush (Viti. Mos. i, 12, p. 91; comp. Gfrörer, i, 288, 284), he is the guide of the Israelites, the angel who appeared to the Israelites (De Abr. c. 31, p. 468). This interposition of the Logos thus serves to combine the theology of contemplation with that of worship and obedience; it endeavors to provide one God for those whose philosophical meditations aspire to an intuition of the absolute, and another for those who are satisfied by the possession of a personal object, while at the same time it attempts to preserve the unity of God by limiting the attribution of proper and superior deity to the first principle only.

In addition to this, which may be regarded as the central point of Philo's system, some have endeavored to elicit from his writings a closer approximation to Christian doctrine, in the recognition of a third divine being, the Logos, from whom the universe was created and from whom the Logos sprang. (See Allix, Judgment of the Jewish Church, p. 119, ed. 1821; Kidder, Demonstration of the Messiah, pt. iii, ch. 5.) A remarkable passage sometimes cited for this purpose occurs in his allegorizing commentary on which he wrought at thevimana meeting with God in Eden. "With one true and proper God," he says, "there are two first and highest powers, goodness and authority: by goodness he has produced everything, and by authority he rules over that which he has produced; and a third, which brings both together as a medium, is reason; for by reason God is both a ruler and good. Of these two powers—goodness and authority—the cherubim are the symbol; and of reason, the flaming sword" (De Cherub. c. 9, p. 148). In like manner he comments on the threefold appearance to Abraham in the plains of Mamre. [This appearance represents the Father of the universe, who in the sacred writings is called by his proper name, the Existent (Ω̄ν), and those on each side are the most ancient powers and the created universe, one of which is called the creative and the other the kingly power. The creative power is that which in the divinest sense as Jehovah rules the universe; and the kingly power is Lord, for it seems to have been developed from the universe, and in the other the seems to be identified with one of them; and the confusion is increased if we compare other passages in which additional powers are mentioned with further distinctions. (Comp. De Mut. Nom. c. 4, p. 592, where a διά θεοῦ εἶναι φύλακας is mentioned as distinct from the βασιλεία and υἱότης, and all three are distinguished from the supreme God.) The truth seems to be that Philo indulged his allegorizing fancy in the invention of divine powers ad libitum, in any number and with any significance which the text on which he commented would suggest; and he has no more difficulty in finding six divine powers to be represented by the six cities of refuge (De Prof. c. 18, 19, p. 560, 561). In this passage, again, the three higher powers, represented by the three cities beyond Jordan, are clearly distinguished from the supreme God) than he has in finding three, to suit the two cherubim and the flaming sword. In this kind of desultory playing with the language of Scripture it is idle to look for any definite doctrine, philosophical or theological.

It must be observed that the doctrines here attributed to Philo are clearly and unambiguously enunciated in his writings. Many passages might be quoted apparently indicating different views; and probably no consecutive summary of doctrines could be drawn up against which similar objections might not be urged. This difficulty is unavoidable in the case of a writer like Philo, who attempts to combine together two antagonistic systems, of whose antagonism he is himself but imperfectly, if at all, conscious. Philo's system has been called an eclectic one (see N. T.); but it is not so much an eclectic system as a deflection from the definition of the Logos as an accumulation of speculations which he was unable to combine into a consistent whole, though persuaded of the existence of a common principle of truth concealed under them. There is a perpetual struggle between the Jewish and the heathen, the religious and the philosophical elements of his system, if system it can be called, which cannot be set at rest by all the latitude of interpretation which he so freely indulges in. Hence his religious convictions perpetually manifest themselves in language inconsistent with his philosophical theories; and his attempt to reconcile the difficulty of his teaching is to give an outline of the system as it probably would have been had it been logically carried out, not as it actually appears in his own very illogical attempt to carry it out.

In the language as well as in the doctrines of Philo we may trace the influence of Greek philosophy in conjunction with the literature of his own nation. The theory, indeed, which would trace the term ῥήτορος to the few and unimportant passages in which it is employed by Plato is too fanciful and far-fetched to be tenable; but the appearance in Philo of the Stoic distinction between διά θεοῦ and διά φύσεως, as well as his general use of the term, seems to indicate that in the employment of this word he was influenced by the language of the Greek philosophy. (The latter is the more in conjunction with that of the former.) (On the λόγος of the Stoics and its use in Philo, see Zeller, Philos. der Griechen, iii, 630. Comp. Wyttenbach on Platarch, ii, 44, 4.) The distinction between ἰδεῖν καὶ φύσεως ὁ λόγος, though acknowledged by Philo, is not applied by him directly to the terms. (Gfr. i, 187.) (On the distinction between Philo and the Stoics, see Valckenir, Diar. de Aristotelio, sec. xxxii.) In the use of the cognate term ζήσονται, as nearly, if not quite equivalent to ἀπο- γινόμενον, he was probably more directly influenced by writers of his own nation, by the Sept. version of the Proverbs, and by the books of Ecclesiastus and Wisdom. (On the identity of λόγος and ζήσονται in Philo, see Gfr. i, 213 sq.) Thus his language, no less than his matter, indicates the compound character of his writings; the twofold origin of his opinions being paralleled by a similar twofold source of the terms in which they are expressed.

It is necessary to dwell to some extent upon the writings of Philo, because it is through them, if at all, that the influence of the Greek philosophy on the Christian Scriptures is to be traced. Whether we admit the conjecture that St. John, during his residence at Ephesus, might have become acquainted with Philo's writings; or whether we regard these writings as the extant representatives of a widely diffused doctrine, which might have reached the apostle through other channels than the Syriac version of the Mosaic law, as se (see, for the one, see Tholuck, on St. John, p. 55, Engl. transl.; the truth may perhaps be found in an intermediate view, if we distinguish between the Christian doctrine itself and the language in which it is expressed. Notwithstanding the verbal parallelism which may be adduced between the language of Philo and that of some of the N.T. passages, the passage between the Alexandrian and the Christian doctrine is one rather of contrast than of resemblance. The distinguishing doctrine of the Christian revelation—that of the Word made flesh—not only does not appear in Philo, but could not possibly appear, consistently with the lead-

The principles of his philosophy, according to which the flesh, and matter in general, is condemned as the source of all evil. The development of Philo's doctrine, if applied to the person of Christ, will lead, as has been pointed out, not to Christianity, but to deism (see Dorner on the Person of Christ, i. 17, Engl. transl.); and in the distinction, which he constantly makes, between the absolute God and the secondary deity, who alone is capable of relation to finite things, we may trace the germ of a theory which afterwards, in various forms, became conspicuous in the different developments of gnosticism.

In fact, the method of Philo, both in his philosophical theories and in his interpretations of Scripture, is so far from being, either in substance or in spirit, an anticipation of the Christian revelation, that it may rather be taken as a representative of the opposite spirit of rationalism, the tendency of which is to remove all distinction between natural and revealed religion, by striving to bring all religious doctrines alike within the compass of human reason. It is not the reception of divine truth as a fact, resting on the authority of an inspired teacher, telling us that these things are so; it is rather an inquiry into causes and grounds, framing theories to explain how they are so. The doctrine of the Logos, as it appears in Philo, is a hypothesis assumed in order to explain the possibility that the God whom his philosophy taught him to regard as above all relation to finite existence, could nevertheless, as his religion taught him to believe, be actually manifested in relation to the world.

To explain this difficulty, he has recourse to the supposition of an intermediate being between God and the world; standing, as it were, midway between the abstract and impersonal on the one side, and the definite and personal on the other; and described in language which wavers between the two concepts, without succeeding in combining them. In this respect the theory reminds us not only of those forms of gnosticism which subsequently emanated from the Alexandrian philosophy under the influence of Christianity, as Philo's system emanated from the same philosophy under the influence of Judaism, but also to some extent, of later speculations, which, in the endeavor to transfer the Catholicism of the first Christian century to a metaphysical foundation, have regarded the doctrine of the incarnation of the divine Word, not as the literal statement of a fact which took place at an appointed time, but as the figurative representation of an eternal process in the divine nature. (See Fichte, Anmerkungen zum seligen Leben, Werke, v. 182; Mill, A system ofLogic, Vorlesungen über Alcc Stud. p. 192; Hegel, Philosophie der Geschichte, Werke, ix., 388; Baur, Christliche Gnosis, p. 715.)

On the other hand, the Christian revelation, while distinctly proclaiming as a fact the reconciliation of man to God by one who is both God and man, yet announces this great truth as a mystery to be received by faith, not as a theory to be comprehended by reason. The mystery of the union between God's nature and man's does not cease to be mysterious because we are assured that it is real. No intermediate hypothesis is advanced to facilitate the union of the two natures by removing the distinctive attributes of either; no attempt is made to overcome the philosophical difficulties of the doctrine by defying the humanity of Christ or humanizing his divinity. His divine nature is not less divine than that of his brethren; his humanity is not less human than that of his brethren. The intellectual difficulty of comprehending how this can be remains still; but the authority of a divine revelation is given to enable us to believe notwithstanding.

But while we acknowledge the wide and fundamental differences which exist between the doctrines of the Alexandrian Judaism and those of the Christian Scriptures, we must also acknowledge the existence of some striking differences in language between the writings of Philo and some parts of the N. T. The following instances exhibit some of the most remarkable parallels of this kind:

Philo

De Somm. I. 15. p. 633. ἐκεῖνος ἐφράστων μὲν οὗθεν ὅτι φήμι τοῦ λόγου. De Vita Mon. I. 14. p. 155. ἀναπτύσσεται γὰρ ὁ λόγος τοῦ λόγου κατά καταλογισμὸν, ἑκάτερον τῆς ὁμοιότητος ἀλληγορίας, κ. τ. λ. [The Stoics here in the world, represented by the vestments of the high-priest.]

An examination of these passages will, we believe, confirm the view which has been above taken of the doctrinal differences between them; while, at the same time, it will enable us to discern a purpose to be served by the verbal resemblances which they undoubtedly exhibit. If we except instances of merely accidental similarity in language, without any affinity in thought; or quotations by way of illustration, such as St. Paul occasionally borrows from heathen writers; or thoughts and expressions derived from the O.T., and therefore common to Philo and the apostles, as alike acknowledging and making use of the Jewish Scriptures; they may be reduced, for the most part, to two heads: first, the use of the name of Logos, by St. John, as a title of Christ, and the application to him, both by St. John and St. Paul, of various attributes and offices ascribed by Philo to the divine Word, and to the various philosophical representations with which the Word is identified; and, secondly, the recognition, chiefly in the acknowledged writings of St. Paul and in the Epistle to the Hebrews, of a spiritual sense, in parts of Scripture, distinct from the literal interpretation; though this is employed far more cautiously and sparingly than in Philo, and as an addition to, rather than, as Philo for the most part employs it, as a substitute for the literal sense. The apocryphal writing, which appeared from these passages, availed themselves, in some degree, of the language already established in the current speculations of their countrymen, in order to correct the errors with which that language was associated, and to lead men’s minds to a recognition of the truth of which these errors were the counterfeit. This is only what might naturally be expected from men desirous of adapting the truths which they had to teach, to the circumstances of those to whom they had to teach them. There was an earlier gnosticism founded in part on the perversion of the Law, as there was a later gnosticism founded in part on the perversion of the Gospel; and it is probable that, at least at the time when St. John wrote, the influence of both had begun to be felt in the Christian Church, and had modified to some extent the language of its theology (see Burton, Hampion Lectures, p. 218). If so, the adoption of that language, as a vehicle of Christian doctrine, would furnish the natural means both of correcting the errors which had actually crept into the Church, and of countering the influence of the source from which they sprang. If the philosophic Jews of Alexandria, striving, as speculative minds in every age have striven, to lay the foundations of their philosophy in an apprehension of the one and the absolute, were driven by the natural current of such speculations to think of the God whom they regarded as remote and solitary, having no relation to finite things, and no attributes out of which such a relation can arise, it is natural that the inspired Christian teacher should have been directed to provide, by means of their own language, the antidote to their error; to point, in the revelation of God and man united in one Christ, to the truth, and to the manner of attaining the truth; to turn the mind of the wandering seeker from theory to fact, from speculation to belief; to bid him look, with the eye of faith, to that great mystery of godliness in which the union of the divine and the finite is realized in fact, though remaining still incomprehensible in theory. If the same philosophers, again, seeking to bridge over the chasm which their speculations had interposed between God and man, distorted the partial revelation of the Angel of the Covenant, which their speculations supplied, into the likeness of the ideal universe of the Platonist, or of the half-personified world-reason of the Stoic, it was surely no unworthy object of the apostolic teaching to lead them, by means of the same language, to the true import of that revelation, as made known, in its later and fuller manifestation, by the advent of the Word made flesh. If the Platonicizing expositor of the Jewish Scriptures, eager to find the foreign philosophy which he adopted in the oracles of God committed to his own people, explained away their literal import by a system of allegory and metaphor, it was natural that the inspired writers of the New Covenant should point out the true meaning of those marks which the Jewish history and religion so clearly bear of a spiritual significacance. By appealing to the legal institutions of the Law and the record of God's dealings with his chosen people are not an allegory contrived for the teaching of a present philosophy, but an anticipation, designed by the divine Author of the whole as a preparation, directly and indirectly, by teaching and training, by ritual and prophecy, by type and symbol, to make ready the way for him that was to come.

The attempts made by Grossmann, Gfrorer, and others, to explain the origin of Christianity as an offshoot of the Jewish philosophy of Alexandria rest mainly on the statements of the Apostles concerning the spiritual absence of the men described in the New Testament, while overlooking fundamental differences of doctrine. The ideal Logos, the distinguishing feature of the Alexandrian philosophy, has no place in the teaching of the N.T. The belief in one Christ, very God and very man, has not only no place in, but is diametrically opposed to the philosophical speculations of Philo. For his personal relations to Christianity, see Philo. Christianity came into the world at a time when the Greek-Jewish modes of thought, of which Philo is the representative, were prevalent; and they had no recent spiritual leaders, so far as they had to deal with those to whom that philosophy was familiar, could do so most effectively by means of its language and associations. These considerations seem naturally to explain the resemblance and the difference between the two systems—resemblance as regards the doctrinal systems were presented in forms designed to meet the acknowledged wants of the time. According to the commonly received report, Origen was the scholar of Ammonius Saccas, who first gave consistency to the later Platonism, and for a long time he was the controversial exposition. Neo-Platonism was, in fact, an attempt to seize the spirit of Christianity, apart from its historic basis and human elements. The separation between the two was absolute; and yet the splendor of the one-sided spiritualism of Origen attracted, in some cases the admiration of the Christian fathers (Bas-ii, Theodoret), and the wide circulation of the writings of the pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite served to prop-gate many of their doctrines under an orthodox name among the schoolmen and mystics of the Middle Ages (Yogn, Neu-Platonismus u. Christianism, 1856; Herzog, Encyklop. s. v. Neu-Platonismus). See Neo-Platonism.
The want which the Alexandrian fathers endeavored to satisfy is in a great measure the want of our own time, if Christianity be truth, it must have points of special connection with all nations and all periods. The difference of character in the constituent writings of the N.T. are evidently typical, and present the Gospel in a form (if technical language may be used) now ethical, now logical, now mystical. But this indicates a tendency to give the idea of a harmonious whole. Clement rightly maintained that there is a "gnosis" in Christianity distinct from the errors of gnosticism. The latter was a premature attempt to connect the Gospel with earlier systems; the former a result of conflict grounded on faith (Mühler, Patrologie, p. 424, etc.). Christian philosophy may be in one sense a contradiction in terms, for Christianity confessively derives its first principles from revelation, and not from simple reason; but there is no less a true philosophy of Christianity, which aims to show how completely these, by their form, their substance, and their consequences, meet the instincts and aspirations of all ages. The exposition of such a philosophy would be the work of a modern Origen.

See Haller, Philosophie der Kirchenväter (Münch. 1850); Stieckl, Philosoph. der philosophischen Zeit (Würzburg, 1859); Moller, Kosmologie in d. griech. Kirsche (Halle, 1868).

IV. Patriotic Recognition of the Propaedeutic Office of Greek Philosophy.—The divine discipline of the Jews and Greeks in nature; the true God, which formed so essential a tenet of the Gnostic schools, occurs in the N.T. (comp. Thiersch, Versuch u. der Her-stellung d. hist. Standpunktes, etc., p. 231-304).
PHILOSOPHY

The reason, no less than the will and the affections, had an office to discharge in preparing man for the incarnation. The proces and the issue in the two cases were widely different, but they were in some sense complementary, for its direct advent and that of revelation are implicitly included in their fundamental difference of method. In the one, man boldly aspired at once to God; in the other, God disclosed himself gradually to man. Philosophy failed as a religious teacher practically (Rom. i. 21, 22), but it is the noble witness to an Sotheral law (ii. 14, 15). It laid open instinctive wants which it could not satisfy. It cleared away error, when it could not find truth. It wavered the foremost minds of a nation, when it left the mass without hope. In its purest and grandest forms it was "a schoolmaster to bring men to Christ" (Clem. Alex. Strom. i, § 28).

This function of ancient philosophy is distinctly recognized by many of the greatest of the fathers. The principle which is involved in the doctrine of Justin Martyr on "the Seminal Word" finds a clear and systematic expression in the claims and aims of Plato (Respn. Repeosing, Origenes, i, 437-439). "Every race of men participated in the Word. And they who lived with the Word were Christians, even if they were held to be godless (ad Scot.); or, as, for example, among the Greeks, Socrates and Heraclitus, and others, who, like the claim of Origenes (De principiis, ii, 10, 13). "Philosophy," says Clement, "before the coming of the Lord, was necessary to Greeks for righteousness; and now it proves useful for godliness, being in some sort a preliminary discipline (φρονηματικα τον θου) for those who rep the facts and learn the language of the divine. ... Perhaps we may say that it was given to the Greeks with this special object (φυσικη ανεπαφηκτικη) for it brought (ινα παρασκευην) the Greek nation to Christ, as the law brought the Hebrews" (Clem. Alex. Strom. i, § 28; comp. § 42, and 16, § 80). In this sense he does not scruple to say that "Philosophy was given as a peculiar testament (διασοροντα) to the Greeks, as forming the basis of the Christian philosophy" (Ibid. vi, § 8). Origen, himself a pupil of Ammonius Saccas, speaks with less precision as to the education of his own mind, but all his witness to its influence. The truths which the philosophers taught, says he, referring to the words of Paul, were from God, for "God manifested these to them, and all things that have been nobly said" (c. Cels. vi, § 3; Plato, Theaet. 165 d). It is plain that the great Gentile teachers, allows that "some of them made great discoveries, so far as they received help from heaven, while they erred so far as they were hindered by human frailty" (August. De Cir. ii, 7; comp. De Doctr. Chr. ii, 16). They had, as he elsewhere confesses, fixed their views in part from the teaching of nature what prophets learned from the Spirit (Rom. i, vs; etc.).

But while many thus recognised in philosophy the free witness of the Word speaking among men, the same writers in other places sought to explain the partial harmony of philosophy and revelation by an original connection of the two. This attempt, which in the forerunners of a clearer criticism is seen to be essentially fruitless and even suicidal, was at least more plausible in the first centuries. A main line in the history of the Church carries the names of the Sibyls and Hymasts, which were obviously based on the O.T. Scriptures, and as long as they were received as genuine it was impossible to doubt that Jewish doctrines were spread in the West before the rise of philosophy. On the other hand, in the category of the being and non-being, the contradictions and errors of philosophers, it must be remembered that they spoke often fresh from a conflict with degenerate professors of systems which had long lost all real life. Some indeed there were, chiefly among the Latins, who consistently inveighed against philosophy. But even Tertullian, who is among the most determined of these, showed its first attempts and dispositions hit upon truth by a happy chance or blind good-fortune, and yet more by that "general feeling with which God was pleased to endow the soul" (Tertull. De Am. § 2). The use which was made of heathen speculation by heretical writers was one great cause of its disapprobation by their catholic antagonists. Tertullian endeavours to reduce the Gnostic teachers to a dilemma: either the philosophers with whom they argued knew the truth or they did not; if they did, the incarnation was superfluous; if they did not, whence comes the agreement of the true and the false? (Ad. Frex. ii, 14, 7). Hippolytus follows out the connection of different sects with earlier teachers in elaborate detail. Tertullian, with characteristic energy, declares that "Philosophy furnishes the arms and the subjects of heresy. What (he asks) has Athens in common with Jerusalem? the Academy with the Church? heretics with Christians? Our training comes from the Porch of Solomon. ... Let those look to it who bring forward a Stoic, a Platonic, a diabolic Christianity. We have no such explanations or inquiries after the ministry of Christ Jesus, nor of investigation after the Gospel." (Tertull. De Passac. i, 17.)

This variety of judgment in the heat of controversy was inevitable. The full importance of the history of ancient philosophy was then first seen when all rivalry was over, and it became possible to contemplate it as a whole, animated by a great law, often trembling on the verge of truth, and sometimes by a "bold venture" claiming the heritage of faith. Yet even now the relations of the "two old covenants"—philosophy and the Hebrew Scriptures—to use the language of Clement—have been traced only imperfectly. What has been done may encourage labor, but it does not supercede it. In the portraits of Eastern churches Pythagoras and Plato are pictured among those who prepared the way for Christianity (Stanley, p. 41); but in the West, sibyls, and not philosophers, are the chosen representatives of the divine element in Gentile teaching.

Philosophy, Hnamne. The term philosophy, as above noted, may be properly used in a wider and in a more restricted sense. In the former it is nearly synonymous with science, and in the latter, it is the knowledge capable of being scientifically classified—that is, where the facts are presented in their causes, where phenomena are referred to principles, and arranged under laws. In the latter it is confined to speculative knowledge, that is, knowledge which claims of its own operations and laws, or which it acquires by reasoning from its own thoughts. We have no evidence that philosophy in the stricter sense was cultivated by the ancient Hebrews; nor have we much reason to believe that scientific study, even as regards external phenomena, was much followed by them. For since our estimate from what of their literature has been preserved to us in the Bible, we must conclude that the ancient Hebrew mind was not specially characterized by those tendencies, nor largely endowed with those faculties which give birth to speculative research. The analytical and the logical are but slightly perceptible in their mental products, while the imaginative, the synthetic, and the historical largely predominate. We should be led to infer that they delighted rather in putting things together in the analogies to the things in themselves according to their differences. They were careful observers of phenomena, and their minds sought scope in bold flights of imagination, or reposed in calm, protracted, and profound reflection; but it was as historians and poets rather than as philosophers that they looked on the world. Being and non-being, the contradictions and errors of philosophers, it must be remembered that they spoke often fresh from VIII.—58.

which truth is the one complete end, is essentially of Western growth. In the East the search after wisdom has always been connected with practice: it has remained there, what it was in Greece at first, a part of religion. The history of the Jews offers no exception to this remark: there is no Jewish philosophy properly so called on the other hand. The same proposition was not true of the Hebrews. The axioms of one system are the conclusions of the other. The one led to the successive abandonment of the noblest domains of science which man had claimed originally as his own, till it left bare systems of morality; the other, in the fulness of time, prepared many to welcome the Christ—the Truth.

From what has been said, it follows that the philosophy of the Jews, using the word in a large sense, is to be sought for rather in the progress of the national life than in special books. These, indeed, furnish important illustrations of the growth of speculation, but the history is written more in acts than in thoughts. Step by step the idea of the family was raised into that of the people; and the kingdom furnished the basis of those writer promises which included all nations in one kingdom. That social, that political, the chemical relations of man were traced out gradually in relation to God. See JEW; JUDAISM.

With the Hebrews the original theory of the world was so simple that little occasion was given to them for speculation beyond that which was usual in the mysteries of existence. Their conception of it was essentially and wholly monotheistic. They held the existence of one God, besides whom there was no other; and as the world had come into being by his simple fiat, so was kept in being by his will, governed by laws which are independent, and subordinated to the fulfillment of his designs. No trace is discoverable in the Bible of those pantheistic notions in which the thinkers and writers of other ancient nations seem so generally to have taken refuge from the perplexities arising out of the relations of the finite to the infinite, and which at a later period took such hold of the Jewish mind, as is attested by their cabalistic books (Freystadt, Philosophia Cabalistica et Pantheismus, 1832). The world and the things in the world were regarded by them not as emanations from God, nor as in any way the result of his hands proceeding from him, but as distinct from him as the work is distinct from the workman. By the word of Jehovah all things were created, and by his word they are upheld. They all belong to him as his property, and he does with them as he will. They are his, but not in any sense he. As little do the Hebrews seem to have realized the idea of an order of nature distinct from the will and power of God. The phenomena of being and event they referred alike to the immediate agency of the Almighty. Creation was with them simply God acting. They thus removed the distinctions between the natural and the supernatural, not as some modern speculators propose, by reducing all phenomena under natural laws, but by the reverse process, resolving all into the immediate operation of God. Man, as part of God's creation, is equally subject with the rest to his control. His times and ways are all in God's hand. By God's power and wisdom he has been fashioned; by God's goodness he is upheld and guided; by God's law his entire activity is to be regulated; at God's command he returns from this active sphere and passes into the unseen world, where his spirit returns to him who gave it.

But though this simple and childlike theory of the universe gave little scope for speculative thinking and inquiry, and though the Bible presents us with but little that indicates the existence of philosophic study among the ancient Hebrews, we are not entitled to conclude from these data that such pursuits had no existence among them. It is to be borne in mind that it was foreign to the design and pretensions of the sacred writers to discuss speculatively points on which they were considered bound to speak authoritatively in the name of God; nor must it be forgotten that we have not in the Bible the entire literature of the Hebrew people, and that, as philosophical writings would, because not addressed to the popular mind, be precisely those most likely to be allowed to perish, it is possible that much may have been lost which had been preserved, would have shown how and to what extent scientific research flourished among the Hebrews. This suggestion acquires force, not only from the fact that we know that certain utterances by Solomon of a scientific kind, probably committed to writing, have perished (I Kings iv, 38), but also from the statement in Eccles. xii, 13, which, besides indicating that the literature of the Hebrews was more copious than what we now possess, leads, from its connection, to the conclusion that part of it at least was devoted to philosophic inquiry. The book of Ecclesiastes itself, as well as that of Job, may be held as proving that the Hebrew mind did not acquiesce wholly in simple faith, but had, like mind elsewhere, its seasons of doubt, question, and speculation on matters relating to man's condition and destiny. We may also point to the political, the social, the religious, the book of Proverbs, as indicating the same thing. Nor must we overlook the fact that the Hebrew is rich in terms which are appropriate to philosophic inquiry, and indicate habits of analytic research among those by whom they were used. Of these may be mentioned "wisdom, often used as we use philosophy (comp. Eccles. i, 13, where בִּלְתָּנָה בִּלְתָּנָה might almost be rendered to philosophize); מְנָתָנָה, from מְנָתָנָה, beteen, to separate, to discern, to understand, i.e. to analyze perceiving into their component elements, so as to arrive at just notions of them, whence מְנָתָנָה, insight, intelligence, judgment; בּוֹלָלָמָה and בּוֹלָלָמָה, to investigate, to examine; בּוֹלָלָמָה, to think, to reflect; לְפָרַד, to ponder; בּוֹלָלָמָה, to know, whence מְנָתָנָה, knowledge. To these may be added their names for the mental part of man, מְנָתָנָה, πνεῦμα; מְנָתָנָה, ψυχή; מְנָתָנָה, anima; מְנָתָנָה, σάρκα, σῶμα.

It is further to be observed that though the Bible does not present philosophic truth in a speculative form, it presents abundantly the materials out of which philosophic ideas may be formed, and in this it as it exists in nature, not (to use the scholastic phraseology) in a manifest and evolutive, but in a concrete and involute state; and it needs only a patient collection of its statements, and the arrangement of these according to their meaning and relations, to enable us to construct systematic developments of them. We may thus form not only a theology from the Bible, but an anthropology, including physiology and a system of ethics. See BOAS, Fundamenta Psychologiae et Sce. less and manner of thinking of the Israelites during their captivity in Babylon—an influence of a general and deep character. The Chaldean system of observation and calculation, as we admit, in alleging that the names of the angels and of the months were derived by the house of Israel from Babylon (Book Haschannah, p. 56). The system of opinion and manner of thinking which the captives met with in Babylon cannot be characterized exclusively as Chaldean, but was made up of elements whose birth-place was in various parts of the East, and which appear to have found in Babylon a not incongenial soil, where they grew and produced fruit which coalesced into the Chaldean system. Of these elements, the two principal were the Chaldæans and the Medo-Persian or Zoroastrian. It is to the first that the reader's attention is invited in this article.

The Chaldeans, who lived in a climate where the rays of the sun were never darkened, and the night is always clear and bright by means of the light of the moon and stars, were led to believe that light was the soul of nature. Accordingly it was by the light of the sun and stars that the universal spirit brought forth all things; and therefore the Chaldeans offered their homage to the Sun and the Stars, and scattered lights wherever he appeared to them in a special manner to dwell. As the stars form separate bodies, imagination represented them as distinct existences, which had each their peculiar functions, and exerted a separate influence in bringing forth the productions of nature. The planets and the stars, though so dissimilar in their properties, were distinct in their properties, and not without difficulty for cultivated minds; and worship was offered to the stars as so many powers that governed the world. It is easy to see how the Chaldeans passed from this early corruption of the primitive religion of the Bible to a low and degrading polytheism.

As light was regarded as the only moving power of nature, and every star had its own influence, so natural phenomena appeared the result of the particular influence of that heavenly body which at any given time was above the horizon; and the Chaldean philosophers believed that they found the cause of events in its position, and the means of foretelling events in its movements. These views, and perhaps the extraordinary beauty and the pestilential winds which in certain months prevailed all over the country, and again which there was no protection except in the hills, led the Chaldeans to the mountains which girdled the land. On these observatories, which nature seems to have expressly formed for the purpose, they studied the positions and movements of the heavenly host. They thought they saw that similar phenomena were repeated by the conjuncture of some combination of the stars, which seemed to observe regular movements and a similar course. On this the Chaldean priests came to the conviction that natural events are bound together, and that sacrifices do not intervene to control them; they that all having a common origin, which works according to unknown principles and laws, whose discovery is so important as to deserve their best attention. The heavenly bodies themselves are obedient to these laws: their formation, position, and movement, the beauty of the fruits, all the phenomena of nature were controlled. This determined the Chaldeans to seek in the heavens the knowledge of the original cause which created the world, and of the laws that cause followed in the formation of things and in the production of phenomena, since in the heavens dwelt the power which brings all things forth.

The stars were masses of light; the space which held them were filled with light; no other power appeared to operate therein: accordingly the Chaldeans held light to be the moving power which had produced the stars, and the stars caused all other things to move with power possessed intelligence, and the operations of the mind appear to have so much resemblance to the subtlety and sweetness of light that men who had only imagination for their guide had no hesitation to represent intelligence as a property of light, and the universal spirit or highest intelligence as light itself. The observations of the Chaldeans had taught them that the rays of the stars from the earth are unequal, and that light decreases in its approach to the earth, on which they concluded that light streams forth from an endless fountain far removed from the earth, in doing which it fills the space with its beams, and forms the heavenly bodies in different positions and of different magnitudes.

The creative spirit was therefore set forth by them under the image of an eternal, inexhaustible fountain of light; they thought this fountain was to the universe what the sun is to the regions lighted and warmed by his beams.

As light becomes less in propagating itself, its fountain must be of an inconceivable subtlety and purity, and, accordingly, in its loftiest condition, intelligent. As its beams are removed from their source they lose their activity, and by the gradual wasting of their influence sink from their original perfection; they therefore produced different existences and intelligences, in proportion as they became more distant from the fountain of light; at last, passing from one element into another, they lost their heavenly character and became terrestrial, and became mere corporeal and material chaos. There accordingly was between the Supreme Being and the earth a chain of intermediate existences, whose perfections decreased as they were more remote from the First Great Cause. This Supreme Being had produced this diversity of radiations, intelligence, power, productiveness; all other emanations had, in proportion to their distance from the highest intelligence, a less and less share in these perfections; and thus were the different regions of light, from the moon to the dwelling-place of the Supreme, filled with various orders of spirits.

The space which contained the First Cause, or Fountain of radiations, was filled with pure and happy intelligences. Immediately beneath this region began the corporeal world, or the empyreum, which was a boundless space, lighted by the pure light which flowed immediately from the Great Source; this empyreum was filled with an infinitely less pure fire than the original light, but incomparably finer than all bodies. Below this was the ether, or grosser region, filled with still more corporeal fire. Next came the fixed stars, spread over a wide region where the thickest parts of the ethereal fire had come together and formed the stars. The world of planets succeeded, which contained the sun, moon, and the wandering stars. Then came the last order of beings—the rude elements which are deprived of all activity, and without the personal union the free powers. The different parts of the world are in contact, and the spirits of the upper regions can influence the lower, as well as descend and enter into them. As the chaotic elements were without shape and motion, the spirits of the higher regions must have formed the earth, and human souls are spirits sprung from them. To these spirits from above the system of the Chaldeans ascribed all the productions, appearances, and movements upon the earth. The formation of the human body, the growth, the development of the fruits, all the phenomena of nature were ascribed to beneficent spirits. In the space below the moon, in the midst of night, tempests arose, lightnings threaded the dark clouds, thunder broke forth and laid waste the earth; there were found spirits of darkness, corporeal demons spread through the air. Often, too, were flames of fire seen to rise out of the bottom of the earth, and the mountains were shaken. Earthly powers or demons were supposed to dwell in the centre of the earth; and since matter was held to be without activity, all movements were attributed to spirits. Storms, volcanoes, earthquakes, all these were supposed to be the work of these evil beings; and these demons were held to be wicked spirits who produced these evils; to them every unfortunate event was ascribed, and a sort of hierarchy was formed of these evil beings, as had been done in the name of the good spirit. But why did not the guard put down by an exertion of his power, this swarm of wicked spirits? Some thought it was beneath the dignity of the Primary Essence to contend with these demons; others were of opinion that these bad spirits were naturally indestructible, and as the Supreme could neither destroy nor improve them, he had bidden his creatures destroy one of them and to the region beneath the moon, where they indulged in their baseness and exercised their dominion: in order, however, to protect the human race against fiends so numerous and fearful, he commissioned good spirits, whose office it was to attack these corporeal demons. As the good and the bad spirits had various degrees of power and different offices, so they had names given to them which described their functions. As the good spirits were under an obligation to protect men and furnish succor in their need, they were compelled to learn human language; accordingly, it was believed that a guardian angel against every evil was possessed by every one who bore his mysterious name—a name which was to be pronounced only when succor was needed. All manner of names were therefore devised, by which the spirit could be conjured, and the information, human necessities; and all the combinations of the alphabet were exhausted in order to bring about a commerce between men and angels. Here is the origin of the Cabala, which gave strange names to these spirits in order to incant them to good men, so that by this means to do wonderful things (Matt. xii, 24-27). These names also sometimes served to drive bad spirits away: they were a kind of exorcism. For since it was believed that these demons had been banished to the centre of the earth, and that they could do evil only in consequence of having baffled the vigilance of the guardian spirits and escaped to the outer world, so, it was held, they were compelled to flee as soon as they heard the name of the good angels whose business it was to keep them shut up in subterranean caverns, and to punish them if they ventured from their prison-house. A power, too, was ascribed to the name of the spirit, or to the image which marked his office—a power which forced the spirit to come on being called; and, accordingly, it was held that this name carved on a stone kept the spirit near the person who wore the stone—a notion in which is probably found the origin of talismen, formed either by words or symbolic figures.

3. Cabalistic Period.—It is uncertain at what date the earliest Cabala (i.e. Tradition) received a definite form; but there can be no doubt that the two great divisions of which it is at present composed, the Cabala Charitri (Ezekiel) and "the Creation" (Bereishith, Gen. 1), found a wide development before the Christian era. The first dealt with the manifestation of God in himself; the second with his manifestation in nature; and as the doctrine was handed down orally, it received naturally, both from its content and form, great additions from foreign sources. On the one side it was open to the Persian doctrine of emanation, on the other to the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation; and the tradition was deeply impressed by both. It was first committed to writing in the 7th or 8th century. At present the points for the teaching of the Cabala are the Sepher Jestrakh, or Book of Creation, and the Sepher Hazohar, or Book of Splendor. The former of these dates, in its present form, from the 8th, and the latter from the 15th century (Zunt, Gottel, Pistor, de Juden, p. 185; Jellineck, Moses ben-Schemtob de Leon, Leips, 1851). Both are based upon a system of pantheism. In the Book of Creation the cabalistic ideas are given in their simplest form, and offer some points of comparison with the system of the Pythagoreans. The book begins with an enumeration of the thirty-two ways of which we see in the constitution of the world; and the analysis of this number is supposed to contain the key to the mysteries of Nature. The primary division is into 10 + 22. The number 10 represents the ten Sephiroth (figures which answer to the ideal world; 22, on the other hand, the number of the Hebrew alphabet, answers to the world of objects; the object being related to the idea as a word, formed of letters, to a number. Twenty-two again is equal to 8 + 7 + 12; and each of these numbers, which constantly recur in the O-T. Scriptures, is invested with a peculiar meaning. Generally the fundamental concepts of the Cabala may be thus represented:

The ultimate Being is Divine Wisdom (Chokmah, φόινιξ). The universe is originally a harmonious thought of Wisdom (Number, Sephirah); and the thought is afterwards expressed in letters, which form, as words, the germ of this ideas, and turn into the form of nature; this represents in some sense the whole universe. He is the microcosm in which the body clothes and veils the soul, as the phenomenal world veils the spirit of God. It is impossible to follow out here the details of this system, and its development in Zohar; but it is obvious how great an influence it must have exercised on the interpretation of Scripture. The calculation of the numerical worth of words (comp. Rev. xiii, 18; Gematria, Buxtorf, see Diction Rabb, p. 446), the resolution of words into initial letters of new words (Notarion, Buxtorf, p. 1329), and the translation of the primitive conjoin of the alphabet, (Rokh), were used to obtain the inner meaning of the text; and these practices have continued to affect modern Jewish exegesis.

The fragments of Berosus, preserved by Eusebius and Josephus, and the works of the 4th century (Euseb. Temp.), and more fully in Fabricius (Bibli. Gr. xiv, 175), afford some information on the subject of Chaldean philosophy. Berosus was a priest of the god Baal, at Babylon, in the time of Alexander the Great. On the naturalistic philosophy of the Jews in general, the Talmud and other works of the Jewish rabbins may also be advantageously consulted, together with the following authorities: Euseb. Propr. Evang. ix, 10; Philo, De Mus.; Selden, De Dies Sylph, Prol. 3; Stanley, Hist. of Oriental Philosophy; Kleuker, Über die Natur und den Ursprung der Exsas hia. bei den Kabbalisten (Riga, 1786); Molitoris, Philos. der Geschich (1827-28); Hartmann, Die soeb Verbindung des A. II. The Philosophy of History.—The philosophy of history, as it is above outlined, of its naturalistic relations, essentially a moral philosophy, resting on a definite connection with God. The doctrines of Creation and Providence, of an Infinite Divine Person and of a responsible human will, which elsewhere form the ultimate limits of its speculation, are here assumed at the outset. The difficulties which they involve are but rarely noticed. Even when they are canvassed most deeply, a moral answer drawn from the great duties of life is that in which the questioner finds repose. The earlier chapters of Genesis contain an introduction to the spiritual source of the history which follows. Premature and partial developments, kingdoms based on godless might, stand in contrast with the slow foundation of the divine polity. To distinguish rightly the moral principles which were successively called out in this slow development of the nation, is a history of Israel; but the philosophical significance of the great crises through which the people passed lies upon the surface. The call of Abraham set forth at once the central lesson of faith in the Unseen, on which all others were raised. The father of the nation was first isolated from all natural ties, and was thereupon promised; his heir was the son of his extreme age; his inheritance was to him as a strange land. The history of the patriarchs brought out into yet clearer light the sovereignty of God; the young man was prefier before the elder; suffering prepared the way for safety and triumph. God was seen to make a covenant with man, and his action was written in the records of a chosen family. A new era followed. A nation grew up in the presence of Egyptian culture. Persecution united elements which seem otherwise to have been on the point of being absorbed by foreign powers. God revealed himself now to the people in the wider relations of Lawgiver and Judge. The solitary discipline of the desert familiarized them with his majesty and his mercy. The wisest of Egypt was hallowed to his service. The renounced land was gained by the open working of a divine Sovereign. The outlines of national faith were written in defeat and victory; and the work of the theocracy closed. Human passion then claimed a dominant influence. The people required a king. A fixed Temple was substituted for the shifting Tabernacle. Times of disruption and disaster followed; and the voice of prophets declared the spiritual meaning of the kingdom. In the midst of sorrow and defeat and desolation the horizon of hope was extended. The kingdom was now a common necessity founded on the image of a noble "kingdom of God." The nation learned its connection with "all the kindred of the earth." The Captivity confirmed the lesson, and after it the Dispersion. The moral effects of these, and the influence which Persian, Greek, and Roman were able to exert at length abundant; and the influence, in the West, exercised upon the Jews, have been elsewhere noticed. See Cyrus; Dispersion. The divine discipline closed before the special human discipline began. The personal relations of God to the individual, the family, the nation, mankind, were established in infallible history, and then other truths were brought into harmony with these in the long period of silence which separates the two Testaments. But the harmony was not always perfect. Two partial forms of religious philosophy arose. On the one side the predominance of the Chaldean or Persian element gave rise to the Cabala; on the other the predominance of the Greek element issued in Alexandrian theosophy. Before these one-sided developments of the truth were made the fundamental ideas of the divine government found expression in words as well as in life. The Psalms, which, among the other infinite lessons that they convey, give a deep insight into the need of a personal apprehension of truth, everywhere declare the absolute sovereignty of God over the material and moral worlds. The classical scholar cannot fail to be struck with the clearness andcertainty with which the close connection which is assumed to exist between man and nature as parts of one vast order. The control of all the elements by one All-wise Governor, standing out in clear contrast with the delusion of isolated objects is no less essentially characteristic of Hebrew thought. In the world of action Providence stands over against fate, the universal kingdom against the individual state, the true and the right against the beautiful. Pure speculation may find little scope, but speculation guided by these great ideas is a sufficient basis on which to build a rational intellectual culture of man. (Comp. especially Ps. viii., xi., xii., lxvii., lxxvii., lxxviii., lxxx., xc., xcv., cvi., cxvii., cxxv., etc. It will be seen that the same character is found in Psalms of every date.) For a late and very remarkable development of this philosophy of Nature see Dillmann, Das B. Hemoch, xlvi., xlv.

One man above all is distinguished among the Jews as the "wise man." The description which is given of his writings serves as a commentary on the national view of philosophy. And Solomon's wisdom controlled the wisdom of all the children of the east and west, and all the wisdom of Egypt. . . . And he spake three thousand proverbs; and his songs were a thousand and five. And he spake of trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes" (1 Kings iv. 30-33). The lesson of practical duty, the full utterance of "a large heart" (ver. 29), the careful study of God's creatures—this is the sum of wisdom. Yet in fact the very practical aim of this philosophy is to lead to what is the most sublime truth. Wisdom was gradually felt to be a person, honored by God, and holding converse with men (Prov. viii.). She was seen to stand in open enmity with "the strange woman," who sought to draw them aside by sensuous attractions; and thus a new step was made toward the central doctrine of Christianity—the Incarnation of the Word.

Two books of the Bible—Job and Ecclesiastes—of which the latter, at any rate, belongs to the period of the close of the kingdom, approach more nearly than any others to the type of philosophical discussions. But in both the problem is moral and not metaphysical. The one deals with the evils which afflict "the perfect and upright," the other with the vanity of all the pursuits and pleasures of earth. In the one we are led for a time to a vision of "the enemy" to whom a partial and temporary power over man is conceded (Job i. 6-12); in the other to that great future when "God shall bring every work to judgment" (Eccl. xii. 14).

The Captivity necessarily exercised a profound influence upon Jewish thought. The teaching of Persia seems to have been designed to supply important elements in the education of the chosen people. But it did yet more than this. The imagery of Ezekiel (ch. i.) gave an apparent sanction to a new form of mystical speculation. The contact of the Jews with Persia thus gave rise to a traditional mysticism. Their contact with Greece was marked by the rise of distinct sects. In the 3d century B.C. the great doctor Antigonus of Socho bears a Greek name, and popular belief pointed to him as the teacher of Socrates and Plato; the supposed founders of Jewish rationalism. At any rate, we may date from this time the twofold division of Jewish speculation which corresponds to the chief tendencies of practical philosophy. The Sadducees appear as the supporters of human freedom in its widest scope; the Pharisees of a religion stressed with the idea that a direct relation of the purpose of God was completed, when by a natural action the Essenes established a mystic asceticism. The characteristics of these sects are noticed elsewhere. It is enough now to point out the position which they occupy in the history of Judaism (comp. Westcott, Introd. to Gospels, p. 60-66). At a later period the fourth Book of Maccabees (q. v.) is a very interesting example of Jewish moral (Stoic) teaching. See Sects, Jews, etc.

The conception of wisdom which appears in the book of Proverbs was elaborated with greater detail afterward (see Westcott, Introd. to Gospels, p. 60-66). In Egypt; but the doctrine of the Word is of greater speculative interest. Both doctrines, indeed, sprang from the same cause, and indicate the desire to find some mediating power between God and the world, and to make the presence and action of God from a material sphere. The personification of Wisdom represents only a secondary power in relation to God; the Logos, in the double sense of Reason (λόγος ἡγέτικος) and Word (λόγος πρωτοφανής), both in relation to God and in relation to the universe. The first use of the term Word (Word) based upon the common formula of the prophets, is in the Targum of Onkelos (1st century B.C.), in which "the Word of God" is commonly substituted for God in his immediate, personal relations with man (Westcott, Introd. to Gospels, p. 187); and it is probable that round this traditional rendering a fuller doctrine grew up. But there is a clear difference between the idea of the Word being present in the immaterial and that current at Alexandria. In Palestine the Word appears as the outward mediator between God and man, like the Angel of the Covenant; at Alexandria it appears as the spiritual connection which opens the way to revelation. The preface to John’s Gospel includes the element of truth in both parts. The Philopapal bishop who there is no mention of the Word (yet comp. Wisd. xxviii. 15). For the Alexandrian teaching it is necessary to look alone to Philo (civ. B.C. 20–A.D. 50); and the ambiguity in the meaning of the Greek term, which has already been noticed, makes it difficult to agree with Eusebius in his treatise on the subject. In the language dominators over thought. He has no one clear and consistent view of the Logos. At times he assigns to it divine attributes and personal action; and then again he affirms decidedly the absolute indivisibility of the divine nature. The tendency of his teaching is to lead to the conception of a twofold personality in the Godhead, though he shrinks from the recognition of such a doctrine (De Monarch. § 5; De Somn. § 37; Quod. det. pot. insc. § 24; De Somn. § 39, etc.). Above all, his idea of the Logos was wholly dis- connected from the teaching of the great Christian master whom he was rather the philosophical substitute for them. (See Westcott, Introd. to I. G., p. 138–141; Dieth., Jhd. - Alex. Religiones phil., [1834]; Gfröer, Philo, etc. [1835]; Dornier, Die Lehre v. d. Person Christi, i, 28 sq.; Lücke, Comm. i, 297, and elsewhere [account of the earlier literature].) See PHILOSOPHIE, GREEK.

Philostorgius (Φιλοστοργιος), an Eastern ecclesiastic, an historian of some note, was a native of Boriussa, in Cappadocia. He was the son of Cartarius and Eulamnia, and was born in the reign of Valentinian and Valens, in A.D. 358, according to Gothofredus (Proleg. ad Philos. p. 5, etc.), about A.D. 367, according to Vossius (De Hist. Gr. p. 314). He was twenty years old when Eunomius (q. v.) was expelled from Cæsarea. He was educated at Constantinople, and, together with his father, warmly embraced the doctrines of Eunomius. Philostorgius wrote an ecclesiastical history, from the hecary of Arius, in A.D. 300, to the period when Theodotius the Younger died. The epitome of the West Roman Valentinian the Younger (A.D. 425). The work, composed in twelve books, began respectively with the twelve letters of his name, so as to form a sort of acrostic. In this history he lost no opportunity of extolling the Arians, while he on the other side disdained to defend the orthodox party with abuse, with the single exception of Gregory of Nazianzus. Photius charges Philostorgius with introducing gross misrepresentations and unfounded statements, and says that the work is not a history, but a panegyric upon the heretics. Philostorgius, nevertheless, was a man of learning, and was possessed of considerable geographical and astronomical knowledge. Being a heretic, it is not to be wondered at that his work has not come down to us. An abstract of it, however, was made by Photius in a separate work, which has been preserved. Photius characterizes him as being elegant in his style, making use of figurative expressions, though not in excess. His figures were, however, sometimes harsh and far-fetched, and his narrative involved and indistinct (Phot. Bibl. cod. 40). Photius’ abstract was published at Geneva in 1643 by Jac. Godefroi, or Gothofredus, entitled Ecclesiastica historia, à Constantin. M. Arique initia ad suae saevo tempore, libri zii a Photio in epistolis contrahit; nunc primum editi à Jacobo Gothofredo, Gr. et Lat. cum supplementis, indiciis, quasque addit, ex prolixioribus dissertationibus (Lugd. 1643, 440), and in a somewhat corrected form, with a new Latin translation, by H. Valerius (Paris, 1673), together with the ecclesiastical history of Theodoretus, Evagrius, and Theodorus; also by Reading, Ex ecclesiastica Philostorgii historiam epimena, et fragmenta (Cantab., 1720). There is also a French translation of the same (Paris, 1676). See Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. vii. 490, etc.; Vossius, De Hist. Gr. p. 313, etc.; Schöll, Gesch. der Griech. Philostorus, Flavius, a famous Greek Sophist, was a native of the island of Lemnos, and was born in the second half of the 2d century of our era. He taught the rhetorical doctrine of Thrasybulus, his master; and was the cause of a dispute between him and an Athenian, but Euanius and Suidas always speak of him as a Lemnian, and he himself hints in his Life of Apollonius that he used to be at Lemnos when he was young. He frequented the schools of the Sophists, and mentions having heard Damiants of Ephesus, Nicolas Naucratitas, and Hippodromus of Larissa. This shows that he lived in the reign of the emperor Severus (193–212). He also taught at Rome, where he became known and was patronized by the empress Julia, the wife of Septimius Severus, who was partial to the learned, and who, it is said, was surprised by the discourse of this sophist about herself such a brilliant circle of scholars. She commissioned him to compile the biography of Apollonius of Tyana from some memoirs written by a certain Damis of Nineveh, who had accompanied Philostorus in his peripatetic journey, and which had come into his possession. Philostorus professes also to have used in his composition a collection of letters of Apollonius, which were at one time in the possession of Hadrian, and were placed by that emperor in his palace at Antium, together with certain responses of the Oracle of Trophonius, which Apollonius had also collected. The biographer availed himself also, according to his own statement, of the narrative of a certain Maximus who had known Apollonius. The book of Philostorus displays great credulity in the compiler, and a great want of critical discrimination; it also contains many anachronisms and geographical errors. Huet and others have imagined that the object of Philostorus was to write a parody of the life of Christ, but this seems doubtful: the parody, if intended as such, is too gross; besides which, it appears from the testimony of Lampridius (Life of Alex. Severus), that 42 was not the year in which the dread emperor Maximinus had attempted to assassinate the later heathen emperors, together with Abraham, Orpheus, and Apollonius, these being all looked upon as holy men and tutelary demi. That Apollonius of Tyana was a real character, a philosopher, and a traveler, no one will deny; but it is remarkable that no one mentions him until nearly a century after the time assigned for his death. The empress Julia, a Syrian by birth, was probably fond of the marvellous: and Philostorus, intending to entertain her, inserted in his book all of wonderful stories he could collect relative to his hero. It seems, however, that in the time of the great struggle between the heathen and Christian religions under Diocletian and his immediate successors, some of the heathen writers thought of availing themselves of the Life of Apollonius as a kind of counterpart to the Gospel narrative.Hierocles, prefect of Alexandria, and an enemy of the Christians, wrote a book of which that in the style of a companion between the life of Apollonius by Philostorus and that of Christ, of which Eusebius wrote a refutation: Eusebius Pamphus: De modic毳lices in Philostratii de Apollonio Tyanaeo Commentarium ob institutum cum ilio ob Hierocles Christi comparationem, adnotato. Lacantius (Divin. Instr., v. 3) also combats the same notion as absurd. Augustine (Epist. 4) refers to Apollonius as a magician whom the heathens compared with Christ. (See Tilmanni, Hist. Gr. p. 408; Bacon’s History of Religion, and Bayle’s article Apollonius de Tyane.) The other works of Philostorus are, The Lives of the Sophists, in two books (ed. by Kayser, Heidelberg, 1888).- Heroicus, or comments on the lives of some of the heroes of Homer, in the shape of a dialogue (ed. by Boissoneade, Paris, 1866, 8vo).—Epiptodie, or descriptions or paintings which were in a portico near Neapolis by the sea-shore (these descriptions contain valuable information concerning the state of ancient art) (ed. by F. Jacobs and F. G. Wecker, Leipzig, 1825, 8vo).—Epitodes, mostly erotic, excepting a few on matters of literature; one, which is inserted towards the close of the volume, is his apology for the Sophists. Philostrotus wrote also many other works, such as a Lexicon Rhetoricum, orations, etc., but they are lost. Different editions of all the existing works of Philostrotus have been published. Those by Morellius (Paris, 1668) and Olearius (Leipsig, 1709, fol.) are good, but a better one, far more critical and complete, is that by Kayser (Zurich, 1844, 4to), with a valuable body of notes on each work. There are separate editions of the lives of the Sophists. See Neander, Christian Dogm. i, 122; Baur, Apollodorus c. Tymnus c. Chriastus (Tub., 1837); Alzog, Kirchengec, i, 149; Bitter, Hist. of Philos.; Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. s. v.; Butler, Hist. of Ancient Philosophy, vol. ii; Lardner, Works (see Index).

Philosophia (φιλοσοφία), i. e. the love of God, is a term which was sometimes applied by ancient Christian writers to the mystic life, because the soul, embracing that life professed to renounce all for the love of God. Hence Theodoret entitles one of his books Philosophos (φιλοσοφός).

Philosophos Historia (φιλοσοφος ιστορία, God-loving history), the name given by Theodoret, the well-known commentator, bishop of Cyprus, to his lives of thirty Eastern monastics. Eastern monks, he confesses, "cannot be adequately described," and he relates the most astounding prodigies of them. The tract is in the third folio of Sirmond's edition of his works. See PHILOTHEA.

Philosopher (φιλόσοφος) (1), an Eastern prelate, flourished as patriarch of Alexandria about A.D. 960. He was a man of luxurious habits and a most scandalous course of life. Philostrotus wrote four works, the titles of which, as translated from the Arabic, are, Dedicator:—Rara Commentatorum, et Depravationes Hereticonum:—Detectio Arcanorum:—Autobiography. All of these works are lost, and it does not appear whether the author wrote in Arabic or in Greek. A sermon, De Mandatis Domini nostri Iesu Christi (A.D. and Latin by P. Posinianus in his Aecetis), is ascribed to one S. Philotheus, perhaps the same person. See Cave, Neale, Hist. ad an. 999; Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. s. v.

Philosopher (2) Cucinica, also an Eastern ecclesiastic, flourished as patriarch of Constantinople. He was probably born in the beginning of the 14th century, and early took the monastic habit. After living for a considerable time as a monk, and afterwards as superior of the convent of St. Leucius on Mount Sinai, he was appointed archbishop of Heraclea (before 1354). In 1355 he was employed by the emperor John Cantacuzenus in bringing about a reconciliation between Michael, the son, and John Palaeologus, the son-in-law of the latter; and in the same year he was chosen patriarch of Constantinople, in the place of Callistus, who, however, recovered his see after John Palaeologus had taken possession of Constantinople. Callistus, however, died soon afterwards, and now Philotheus was once more placed in the patriarchal chair, which post he occupied with great dignity till his death, which occurred in 1271, according to Cave, or in 1376 according to the Chronologia reformata of J. B. Riccioli quoted by Fabricius. We append the titles of the most important of the numerous works of Philotheus, very few of which have been printed and even those (see Ammianus Diaconum, printed in Latin in the 26th vol. of Bibl. Nat. Max., i, 153 sq.) which are extant, and of which he finally became a fellow. After leaving Oxford he travelled through Italy, where, on account of his religion, he was brought into danger. On returning to England he re-

Philosopher (3) Monachus or Sanctus, an unknown monk, wrote De Mandatis Domini nostri Iesu Christi, ed. Gr. and Lat. in P. Posinianus's Aecetis (Paris, 1684). Although this work bears the same title as the one quoted above under the head Philotheus No. 1, the works are apparently by different authors. See Fabricius, Bibl. Grac. xi, 516; Cave, Hist. Lit. Dissert. in, 1, 17, ed. Oxon.

Philosopher (4), archbishop of Selymbria, of an unknown age, wrote Oratio in T. Agottokinon, which is still extant in MS.

Philothenian Version. See Syriac Versions.

Philoxenus of Bagdad, an Eastern prelate of some distinction as an author, also known as Lutarius Bar-Bagad, flourished in the early part of the 9th century as bishop of Bagdad. This episcopate was mentioned in 762, but Philoxenus is the first incumbent of whom we have any notice. His character seems to have been a questionable one, for in the year 829 he was deposed, on which he appealed to Alamanus, the caliph, by whom the sentences was confirmed. Philoxenus is the author of a Syro-Jacobite liturgy, which is in nowise remarkable. See Neale, Hist. of the Eastern Church (Introduct.), i, 829.

Philoxenus of Mabug or Hierapolis, an Eastern prelate of some note, flourished in the second half of the 5th century. He was a devoted Jacobite, and for his zeal in the propagation of their doctrines is reckoned among the fathers of that branch of the Syrian Church. He was bishop of Mabug, to which see he was consecrated by Peter the Fuller, after A.D. 465, though he is said not to have been baptized. He is the author of two Jacobite liturgies, of which only one is authenticated. The other is according to Neale, "a sadly inflated specimen of mediæval taste in the East." He is also noted as the translator of certain portions of the sacred Scriptures into Syrian, and as the supervisor of a general and complete version. Besides, he was the head of the Monophysites about 500, when they fought with Nestorians at the Council of Chalcedon. See Neale, Hist. of the East. Ch. (Introduct.), i, 333; Assenmann, Bibl. Philot, John, an English divine of the Reformation period, noted for his learning and his devotion to the Protestant cause, for which he paid his life, was born near Winchester about the close of the 15th century. He was educated at New College, Oxford, of which he entered in 1543, and of which he finally became a fellow. After leaving Oxford he travelled through Italy, where, on account of his religion, he was brought into danger. On returning to England he re-caused the preference of the archdeaconry of Winchester. During the time of Edward his labors were abundant and incessant; he was with the furnishing both by nature and grace for his calling, and he devoted himself with an uncompromising zeal to the advancement of pure and undefiled religion. After the accession of Mary, Philpot distinguished himself by his bold stand for the Protestant cause. In a convocation of bishops and laity, held for the purpose of changing the established religion from Protestantism to popery, the learned archdeacon, and a few others, bore a noble testimony against the design. For his exertions, notwithstanding the promised freedom of debate, he was called before the court of the queen. He was removable, not perhaps by the king himself, but by Gardiner the chancellor, and was by his order imprisoned a year and a half. He was then sent to bishop Bonner, and other commissioners, who confined him in the bishop's coal-house. Here met with every insult: was once confined from morning till night in the stocks; was examined some fifteen or sixteen times; and, though he firmly and unansweringly defended his cause, was met only with taunts and abusive epithets. Yet in all this persecution the consolations of the Holy Spirit were abundantly administered to him; inasmuch that on one occasion to Bonner he said to him, "I marvel that you are so merry in prison, singing in your naughtiness," etc. Philpot, proving a most uncompromising devotee to the new religion, and a most ingenuous expositor of the law of the land, was regarded by the Papists as a dangerous man to be removed, and he was therefore condemned and hereafter. After his condemnation he suffered many indignities in Newgate. But he was soon brought to the stake. He kissed the wood, and said, "Shall I disdain to suffer at this stake, when my Lord and Saviour refused not to suffer a most vile death on the cross for me?" When he was bound to it, he repeated the 106th, 107th, and 108th Psalms, and prayed most fervently; till at length, in the midst of the flames, with great meekness and joy, he gave up his spirit to God. This occurred at Smithfield, Dec. 18, 1555. For both learning and piety he was esteemed as only next to Ridley among the English Reformers. They had sound and clear views of that Gospel which they sealed with their blood.

Philpot's writings have been collected and published under the title, Examinations and Writings, edited for the Parker Society by the Rev. R. Eden (Camb., 1842, 8vo.). There is also a brief aside in A Historical Account of Philpot: Notices of the Bishops and other Clergy, etc. Who Examined Philpot in 1555; The Process and History of Master John Philpot, examined, condemned, and martyred; Disputation in the Consecration House, October, 1555; An Apology for Mr. Sparrow on an Arrian Defence of the True and Old Authority of Christ's Church, by Siculus Succulius Curato, translated by John Philpot. Philiter, Philtre (vīl. φίλτρον, love-charm, love-potion). A superstition believed the efficacy of certain artificial means of inspiring and securing love seems to have been generally prevalent from very early times; and among the Greeks and Romans (among the latter, in the later days of the republic, and under the emperors) love-charms, and especially love-potions, were in continual use; but it is not certainly known of what these love-potions were composed. See also the entire references on the details given us on this subject by classic writers, and their commentators in later time—but there is no doubt that certain poisonous or deleterious herbs and drugs were among their chief ingredients, to which other substances, animal as well as vegetable, are said to have been added, coupled with some rites of magic. Thus they had the credit of producing the most potent herbs, and her people were notorious as the most skilful practitioners of magic arts, whence the well-known "Thessal philus" of Juvenal (v. 610). These potions were violent and dangerous in operation, and in their use, apart from the working of the natural powers, madness, and death, instead of the purpose for which they were intended. Lucretius is said to have been driven mad by a love-potion, and to have died by his own hand in consequence—though the story does not necessarily imply that he was not perhaps beforehand given to morbid fancies. The craziness of the emperor Caligula was attributed by some persons to love-potions given him by his wife Cesonia—by which also she is said to have preserved his attachment till the end of his life. In the corrupt and licentious days of the Roman empire the manufacture of love-charms of all kinds was a secret, and were carried on as a regular trade; the purchasers, if not the makers of them, being chiefly women. The use of philters seems to have been not unknown during the Middle Ages; and in the East, the nurse of superstition of all kinds, belief in the power of love-potions lingers probably down to the present day.

Philumenia, one of the youngest, and in Italy one of the most revered of saints, especially as the protector of the imprisoned, deserves to be mentioned here; one of the most extravagant examples of Romish credulity and superstition. Her remains were reported to have been exhibited in 1809 from the catacomb of St. Priscilla (q. v.) at Rome. Her history is claimed to have been revealed at the time to three different persons, and according to this was the descendant of a Greek prince, and in her thirteenth year was brought to Rome as a Christian devotee, and placed under the notice of the emperor Diocletian, who desired her for wife—an honor which she refused on the ground that she had two years previously wedded herself to her Lord in her virginity. For this refusal the emperor condemned her to death by martyrdom. In 1805 her remains were removed to her supposed birthplace—Mugnano, twenty miles from Naples. The wonder brought at her tomb were related far and near, and soon her resting-place became the object of many pilgrimage, and she is now known as the "wonder-worker of the sixteenth century." Pope Gregory XVI put her in the calendar of saints, and she is commemorated Aug. 11. See Sinzelt, Verzeichung der heil. Philomena (Munich, 1844); Wetter u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, xiv. 984 sqq.; Abel, Die Legende vom hl. Johann v. Nepomuk (Berlin, 1850), p. 6. (J. H. W.)

Philon (Φίλων), the Greekized form of the Heb. name Philhæus (q. v.). a. The son of Eleazar, son of Aaron, was the great hero of the Jewish priesthood (1 Esdr. v. 5; vii. 2, 29; 2 Esdr. i. 2, b; Esclus. xlv, 23; 1 Macc. ii. 26); b. The son of Eli (2 Esdr. i. 2, a): but the insertion of the name in the genealogy of Ezra (in this place only) is evidently an error, since Ezra belonged to the line of Eleazar, and Eli to that of Ithamar; c. A priest or Levite of the time of Ezra, father of Eleazar (1 Esdr. viii. 63).

Phion (Φιόν). In 1 Esdr. vi. 31 it stands for Philæus (q. v.) of the Heb. text ( Ezra ii. 49).

Phinehas (Heb. Phineas, פְּנֵיהָשׁ, month of brass [Gesen.], or of utterance [First]; Sept. Φινήσεας v. Φινῆεσας; Josephus, Phinias), the name of two or three Hebrews: 1. Son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron (Exod. vi. 25). His mother is reckoned as one of the daughters of Hutiel, an unknown person, who is identified by the Talmud with the Myriam of Exod. vi. 25; Wagenmaler, Sote, viii. 6. Phinehas is memorable for having while quite a youth, by his zeal and energy at the critical moment of the licentious idolatrous

The tomb of Phinehas, 1 place of great resort to both Jews and Samaritans, is shown at Avertah, four miles south-east of Nablus. It stands in the centre of the village, enclosed within a little area or compound, which is overshadowed by the thickly trellised foliage of an ancient vine. A small mosque joins the wall of the compound. Outside the village, on the next hill, is a larger enclosure, containing the tomb of Eleazar, and a small cave ascribed to Eleazar. On the hill, down towards the terebinth-trees, surrounded by arcades, and forming a retired and truly charming spot. The local tradition asserts that Avertah and its neighborhood are the “Hill of Phinehas.”

3. A Levite, mentioned in Ezra viii, 33 as the father of the Eleazar who aided Meremoth to weigh the vessels of the sanctuary. B.C. ante 458. The meaning, however, may be that Eleazar was of the family of the great Phinehas.

Phinehas, Clement, an American Free-will Baptist preacher, noted especially as an evangelist, was born in Gorham, Me., Aug. 16, 1780. He possessed a good physical constitution, a large share of good-nature and cheerfulness, as well as a pronounced common-sense appreciation of the value of music. He was remarkable. When a youth his talent of song made him a favorite with both old and young. In 1806 he was converted, and after his talents had been consecrated to God his gift of song became instrumental in awakening in the human heart responses to the calls of the divine Word. He sang with the Spirit and with power, which at times produced wonderful effect. He received ordination in 1816, and feeling called of God to labor as an evangelist, declined the work of the pastorate. He seemed to be specially qualified by nature and grace for the work of winning souls to Christ, and God gave him many as seals of his ministry—thousands were awakened by his earnest and affectionate ministrations. Though his advantages for an education were limited, yet college professors and other learned men were frequently found among his local and traveling critics. He was a devoted friend of the slave, and, with the leaders of his denomination, early espoused the anti-slavery cause. His amiability, integrity, wisdom, and purity of character won for him universal confidence and esteem. He died at Portland, Me., where he had performed the most of his public labors, full of years and abounding in faith.

PHOBUS

He is distinguished as the writer of eight important theological tracts (Lond. 1767-96), of which we mention here, Brief Remarks on the Common Arguments now used in Support of divers Ecclesiastical Impositions in this Nation (1769, 8vo):—The Original and Present State of Man briefly considered, wherein is shown the Nature of his Fall, and the Necessity, Means, and Methods in which it is effected. A reply to the Additions made by the Author of some Remarks on the Arguments of Samuel Newton, of Norwich (1773, 8vo):—A Reply to a late Publication of S. Newton, untitled An Appendix, etc.; in Answer to which it is plainly shown that the Quakers are not Cuiuscenst, that the whole whole system of them is Words, and that the Spirit of Truth is to be experienced and sensibly felt in the Minds and Consciences of Men (1774, 8vo):—An Address to the Youth of Norwich (1776, 12mo):—Discussions on the Nature and Effect of Christian Baptism, Christian Communion, and Religious Worship upon God; to which are added a few Reflections on the Observation of Public Fasts and Festivals (1781, 8vo).

Ph'is'ion (Φισίων, a Grecized form (Ecles. xxiv, 25) of the name of the river Phison (q. v.).

Phlegéthon, a river in the infernal regions, according to the system of ancient heathenism. It was one of the four rivers which the dead must cross before finding a resting place to the realms of Orcus. See Garden, Fratas of the World, ii, 655.

Phle'gon (Φλεγών, burning), one of the Christians of Rome to whom Paul sent his salutations (Rom. xvi, 14). A.D. 55. The legend (apud Dorotheus) makes him to have been one of the seventy disciples, and bishop of Phlegone (Apul. Alex. Hymn. xliii). To the like purpose, is also the story of Phlegon, from the Chronicle of Eusebius (p. 185, ed. Pentz., Burdig. 1601), the passage occurs as follows: "And so writes Phlegon, an excellent compiler of the Olympiads, in his thirteenth book, saying, 'In the fourth year of the two hundred and second Olympiad there was a great and extraordinary eclipse of the sun, distinguished among all that had happened before, as being an hour in which the day was turned into dark night, so that the stars in the heavens were seen, and there was an earthquake in Bithynia which overthrew many houses in the city of Nice.'" (comp. Origen, Contra Cels. lib. ii, § 33, p. 80; § 39, p. 96; and other authorities quoted by Lardner.)

This passage was the origin of a controversy in England in the early part of the last century between Mr. Whiston, Dr. Sykes, Mr. Chapman, and others, and a long and complete account of which may be found in the English translation of Dr. Boyle's Dictionary Historique, a.v., and in Chaussie's Supplement to it. The immediate cause of the controversy was the omission of the passage in the eighth edition of Dr. S. Clarke's Boyle Lectures, published soon after his death in 1752, although it had been inserted in the first page, which was cut out in 1766. This was done at the persuasion of Dr. Sykes, who had suggested to Clarke that an undue stress had been laid upon the passage. Whiston, who informs us of this affair, expresses great displeasure against Sykes, and calls "the suggestion groundless." Upon this Sykes published A Dissertation on the Eclipse mentioned by Phlegon, in his Oration to the Quakers, which happened during the last Summer, on the Eleventh Day of June 1732, which was printed at London in 1733. Many pieces were written against Sykes, who replied to some of them, but it may well be considered as a controversy still unsettled. The principal objections against the authority of the passage in question are thus briefly summed up by Dr. Adam Clarke (Comment, on Matt. xxvii, 45): 1. All the authors who quote Phlegon differ, and often very materially, in what they say was found in him. 2. He says nothing of "Judaea," what he says is that in such an Olympiad (some say the one hundred and second, others the two hundred and second) there was an eclipse in Asia Minor, and an "earthquake at Nice." 3. He does not say that the earthquake happened at the time of the eclipse. 4. He does not intimate that this "darkness" was "extraordinary," or that the eclipse happened at "the full of the moon," or at its "last quarter" three hours. All of which circumstances could not have been omitted by him if he had known them. 5. He speaks merely of an ordinary though perhaps total eclipse of the sun, and cannot mean the darkness mentioned by the evangelists. And, 6. he speaks of an eclipse that happened in some year of the one hundred and second or two hundred and second Olympiad, and therefore, upon the whole, little stress can be laid on what he says as applying to this event. Some fragments of his works are all that remain, the longest belongs to a treatise, Pipoi βραχονιος, De Mirabilibus. It is a curious work, divided into thirty-five chapters (some of which are very short), and containing (as might be expected from the title) a great many absurd fables. The same may be said of a shorter fragment of four chapters, Πας νεφελους, De Longesoria. The third fragment that remains is a chapter, Πας των λειψανων, De Olympeia, De Salmusore. The entire work, or more probably a part of it, was executed, by Salmusore (Ad Spuriurn, p. 43) to be the preface to a lost work, De Olympimicas. These fragments were first published in 1568 (Basil. 8vo, Greek and Latin), by Xylander, together with Antonini Liberalis, Transformat. Conger., i, 292, and later repeated in Hist. Mirab., and M. Antonius, De Vitâ nû. An improved edition, with notes by Meursinus, appeared in 1620 (Ludg. Bat. 4to, Greek and Latin), which is reprinted by Gronovius in his Theatrum, antiquit. Graec. viii, 2690 sq., and 2575, and ix, 1293 sq.; and also inserted among the works of Meursius, vii, 77 sq. The best edition is by Westermann, in his Scriptores Rerum Mirabilium Graeci (Brun. 1839). See, besides the references already given, Engl. Cyclop., s. v., Gen. Biol., Dict. s. v., Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biol. and Mythol. s. v.

Phob'etor (Φοβητήρ, a frightener), an attendant on Sommus, the god of sleep, in the ancient heathen mythology. It was his office to suggest to the mind images of animated beings, and in this capacity he is mentioned by Ovid in his Metamorphoses.

Pho'bos (Φοβός), the personification of Fear among the ancient Greeks. He is said to have been the son of Ares and of Astarte, and a constant companion of his father. He was worshipped by the Romans under the equivalent name of Metus.

Pho'bus is the name of a number of Jews who distinguished themselves in Hebrew literature. We mention the following as most important:

1. Samuel of Warselaw, flourished in the last quarter; of the 17th century, was rabbi at Fürth and Schildow, and wrote, הגדת שרגי, a commentary on the codex Eben-exer, making use of other commentaries on the same, as the ירח הלוי of Chajim Cohen, etc.
PHOCAS

(Drydenfurt, 1689; corrected edition, Fürth, 1894; Wil-na-Grohne, 1819)—a commentary on the codex Orach Chayyim,—a commentary on יורה דעה.—Discourses on the Pentateuch, which have not been printed.
2. SAMUEL ben-Joseph ha-Kohen Pulik, of Vienna, died in Palestine, where he went after the Jews had been expelled from Vienna in 1670. He wrote, פנהאוש a kind of haggadistic dictionary of proper names, where-un in he speaks in alphabetical order of בַּיָּר, בָּנִי, בַּיָּר etc. collected from different sources (Venice, 1684)—: ָני פָּרָת, discourses on the Pentateuch (ibid.
3. UTEN-ABRAHAM ha-Lexer, a typographer at Amsterdam, was born in 1622, and was still living in 1718.
He published the Hebrew Old Testament, with many additions of Jacob Blitz, and a Preface in Judeo-German by the editor (Amsterd. 1672). He also published A New Hebraico-German dictionary, a prayer-book, in Judeo-German (ibid. 1677). See Gratz, Gesch. des Juden, x, 329 sq.
4. UTEN-DAVID, flourished in the middle of the 17th century, was rabbi at Polnow, in Lithuania, and wrote, Phocas, a Christian martyr of the early Church, flourished as bishop of Pontus in the 3rd century. He was condemned to death for his refusal to sacrifice to Neptune, and was put to death by being first cast into a hot limekiln, and afterwards thrown into a scalding bath (Fox, p. 16).

Another martyr of the same name flourished near the opening of the 4th century. He was put to death in A.D. 303. He was inserted in the list of martyrs in the days of the emperor Constantine. This Phocas is to the Greek Christians the Caspar of the Pollex of ancient Greek shipping, the mariners revered his memory and pray for his intercession. He is commemorated by the Romanists July 14.
Phocas, JOHN, a noted Eastern monastic, flour-lished at Crete near the middle of the 12th century.
He is especially distinguished by his description of a visit to Palestine, which work is entitled "Extrakus PhoebADIUS, an eminent prelate of the 4th cen-

Phoebé (φωβία, radiant), a deaconess of the Church at Cenchreae, recommended to the kind attention of the Church of Rome by Paul, who had received hospital treatable from her (Rom. xvi, 1). A.D. 55.
Her name occurs first in the long list of Christian men and women of Ephesus, mentioned in the Epistle to the Ephesians. For the most part these were persons who had been previously known to Paul, and had some connection with him in his apostolic labors, but were at the time residing in Rome. Phoebe, however, was in the neighborhood of the apostle, probably still in Cenchreae, when she was on the eve of setting out for Rome—on what business it is not said; but that she had some thing of importance in hand is evident from the request of the apostle, that the Christians at Rome would "receive her in the Lord, and assist her in whatever business she had need of them" (ver. 2). See PAUL. It is probable that she was the bearer of the Epistle to the Romans. See Ro-MANS, EPISTLE TO. "What is said of her is worthy of especial notice, because of its bearing on the question of the deaconesses of the Apostolic Church. On this point we have to observe, (1) that the term, ἐνάκτος, here applied to her, though not in itself necessarily an official term, is the term which would be applied to her if it were meant to be official; (2) that this term is app lied in the Apostolical Constitutions to women who ministered officially; the deaconesses being called ἡ ἐν κόσμῳ, as the deacon is called ἡ ἐνκόσμῳ; (3) that it is now generally admitted that in 1 Tim. iii, 11 Paul applied it so himself; (4) that in the passage before us Phoebe is called the ἐνκόσμῳ of a particular Church, which seems to imply a specific employment; (5) that the Church of the Ephesians, to which she went, could well have been only a small Church: whence we may draw a fair conclusion as to what was customary, in the matter of such female ministration, in the larger churches; (6) that, whatever her errand to Rome might be, the independent manner of her going there seems to imply (especially when we consider the secluded habits of Greek women) not only that she was a widow or a woman of mature age, but that she was acting officially; (7) that she had already been of great service to Paul and others (προσέχεις, συμπληρών, καί ἐμεῖν αὐτῷ), either by her wealth or her energy, or both; a view which closely corresponds with the description of the qualifications of the enrolled widows in 1 Tim. v, 10; (8) that the duty which we here see Phoebe discharging implies a personal character worthy of confidence and respect." See DRAcones.
Phoebus (φωβίς, bright), a title, and subsequently a name, of Apollo. It had reference both to the youthful beauty of the god, and to the radiance of the sun, when, latterly, Apollo became identified with Helios, the sun-god.

city of New York, entering upon the practice of medicine. In 1866 he was readmitted into the New York

Phœnicós [some Phœnice], or, rather, PHOENIX (Φωινής, a palm-tree [q. v.], which Theophrastus says was indigenous there), a town and harbor in the island of Crete, which the vessel in which the apostle Paul sailed was attempting to reach when driven away by the eucalydon and wrecked (Acts xxvii, 12). The harbor or "haven" (λιμής) is described by Luke as βιοισθήσασθαι καὶ ἱσταμεν τὰς ηλιόστρωσις, which the A. V. renders "lieth towards the south-west and north-west." But Mr. Smith contends that καὶ in connection with winds means "in the same direction as." Thus βιοισθήσασθαι καὶ ἱσταμεν would not mean, as is generally supposed, that the haven looked to the point from which the hills blows, but to the point towards which it blows. Consequently the haven looked towards the north-east and the south-east (Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, p. 86 sq., 2d ed.). In this rendering Mr. Smith is sustained by ancient authorities, and also by some of the best modern critics (Alford, ad loc.; Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, ii, 324, note; see, however, for the contrary opinion, Hacket On Acts, ad loc.). It is certain that one meaning of καὶ with the accusative is "opposite," or "over against," as it is correctly translated in ver. 7 of this very chapter. Schweighäuser, in his Lexicon Hierodotum, has pointed out some very instructive instances of this in Herod. ix, 31, where καὶ is used indiscriminately with ἀπίστως and ἀπείχος. In this sense, βιοισθήσασθαι καὶ ἱσταμεν, etc., would be equivalent to βιοισθήσασθαι πρὸς ἱσταμεν, etc., a phrase as to the meaning of which there could be no doubt (Xenophon, Mem. iii, 8, 9). Καὶ with an accusative also often signifies "down." But the objection to translating it so in this passage is that it would thus, with extreme awkwardness, inferentially mean the exact contrary of what it directly means in its other acknowledged sense, as marking the local relation between two objects.

Both Ptolemy and Strabo mention a town Φωινή; while Ptolemy alone mentions a haven, of a similar name, which he calls in the accusative Φωινίουσα. Strabo locates it on the southern coast, at the narrowest part of the island (x. 4, p. 473). Hierocles identifies it with Araduena, and seems to place it opposite the island of Claudia ( Vet. Rom. Itin. ed. Wessel. p. 650, 651); and Stephen of Byzantium identifies Araduena and Acropolis (s. v.). On the south coast of Crete, at the narrowest part of the island, and opposite the island of Claudia, is the harbor of Lutro. It is open to the east; but, as a little island lies almost in front of it, there are many entrances, one looking to the north-east, and the other to the south-east. It is thus described by captain Spratt: "Having in 1825 examined generally the south coast of Crete, I was fully convinced that Lutro was the Phœnicia of St. Paul, for it is the only bay to the westward of Fair Havens in which a vessel of any size could find any shelter during the winter months. By sailing inside the island, and securing to the south shore of the bay, a vessel is nearly land-locked. South-east and east winds only could endanger her; but with the former, where the fetch is greatest, the wind would not blow home against such a mountain as the White Mountains, so immediately over the bay, and rising to an elevation of 9000 feet" (Smith, p. 89). Mr. Brown, who since visited it, adds: "It is the only secure harbor, in all winds, on the south coast of Crete" (Ibid. p. 256).

This identification is confirmed by the researches of Mr. Pashley (Travels in Crete, ii, 257), who discovered, a short distance above Lutro, a village called Acropolis ("upper city"), and another near it called Aradheana. Captain Speak also (Researches in Crete, ii, 249) asserts that the name Phœnicia is still currently applied to Lutro, and that a Latin inscription found there, dating from the emperor Nerva, shows that ships from Alexandria resorted to this harbor. Leceler, on the other hand (Die Apostelgesch. 1869, p. 400), maintaining the usual interpretation of καὶ here (towards), suggests that Luke is only reporting a popular opinion as to the situation of Phœnicia, which Paul's company did not reach; and that hence we are not to look for the usual accuracy of the writer. See SHIPWRECK (of PAUL).

Phœnicia (Φωινίκια), a country whose inhabitants necessarily held important and intimate relations, not only to the Hebrews, but to all antiquity. The latest and most complete authority on this subject is Rawlinson's History of Phœnicia (London, 1869).

1. The Land.—1. Name.—"Phœnicé" was not the name by which its native inhabitants called it, but was given to it by the Greeks, who called those merchants who came from that coast of the Mediterranean Sea which runs parallel with Mount Lebanon Phœnicia. In Cicero (De Fin. iv, 20) there occurs the doubtful reading Phœnicia (comp. the Vulgate in Numb. xxxii, 51). However, this latter form of the name has come into general use (comp. Gesenii Monmenta Phenicia [Leips., 1837], p. 338: Forbiger, Handbuch der alten Geographie [ibid. 1842-1844]), p. 639 sq.). This name has been variously derived. It is possibly from Pheniz the son of Agenor and the brother of Castus. It perhaps arose from the circumstance that the chief article of the commerce of these merchants was gourc. The word ψηφος means blood-red, and is probably related to ψηφος, mariner. This derivation of the name is alluded to by Strabo (i, 42). Others imagine as naturally that the color does not give name to the people, but is named after them: as our damask, from Damascus; or our "calico," from Calicut. The term, as an epithet of color, may also apply, as Kenrick supposes, to the sun-burnt complexion of the people. But after all, in the opinion of others, a Greek derivation may not be admissible, for the name may be original or Semitic—though it is ridiculous in Scaiger, Fuller, and Glaseis to identify it with ποτηρία, "to live luxuriously," in allusion to the results of Phenician wealth and merchandise. Strabo, however, maintains that the Phenicians were called Φήνιες, because they resided originally on the coasts of the Red Sea. Bochart, in his Canaan (i, 1), derives the name from the Hebrew פינא, son of Anak. Baland, in his Palestine ex Monumentis Veteribus Illustrata, derives it from φηνάς, palm-tree; and this is the etymology generally acquiesced in. The palm-tree is seen, as an emblem, on some coins of Arados, Tyre, and Sidon; and there are several palm-trees within the circuit of modern Tyre, and along the coast at various points; but the tree is not at the present day one of the characteristic features of the country. The native name of Phenicia was Κανάνεα (Canaan) or Κάνα (Kana), signifying Lowland, so named in contrast to the adjoining Αραμ, i.e. Highland, the Hebrew name of Syria. The name Kenian is preserved on a coin of Laodicia of the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, whereon Laodicia is styled "a city of the Canaan," (Canaan) or Κάνα (Xan). Knd or Khw (Xew) is mentioned distinctively by Herodotus the grammarian as the old name of Phenicia. Hence, as Phenicians or Cannaenites were the most powerful of all tribes in Palestine at the time of its invasion by Joshua, the Israelites, in speaking of their own territory as it was before the conquest, called it "the land of Canaan." See CANAAN.

In the O. T. the word Phenogacia does not occur, as might be expected from its being a Greek name. In the Apocrypha it is not defined, though spoken of as such, with Galilea-Syria, under one military commander (1 Macc. vii, 8; viii, 9; xi, 11; 3 Macc. iii, 15). In the N. T. the word occurs only in the title of the city of Phenicia (Acts xix, 19; xv, 3; xxi, 2); and not one of these affords a clue as to how far the writer deemed Phenogacia to extend. On the other hand, Josephus possibly agreed with Strabo; for he expressly states that Cesarea is situated in Phenogacia (Ant. vi, 8, 1); and although he never makes a similar statement respecting Joppa, yet he speaks, in one passage, of the coast of Syria, Phenogacia, and Egypt, as if Syria and Phenogacia exhausted the line of coast on the Mediterranean Sea to the north of Egypt (War, ii, 3, 2).

The Phenicians in general are sometimes called Sidonians (comp. Gesenii Monmenta Phenogacia, ii, 267 sq.: Thesaurus Linguae Hebraicae, under the word ונידא). Justinus (xviii, 3) alludes to the etymology of this name: "A city being built which they called Sidon, from the abundance of fishes; for the Phenogaci call a fish sidon." This statement is not quite correct. But the root וי, which in Hebrew means only to catch beasts and birds, can also be employed in Arabic to mean "fishing of fishes" spoke of. This root occurs also in the Arabic, in the signification of both hunting and fishing (comp. the act. Zidin).

3. extent.—Phenogacia in general is named as applied to a country on the coast of Syria, bounded by the Mediterranean Sea on the west and Lebanon on the east; Syria and Judaea forming its northern and southern limits respectively, situated between about 34° to 36° N. lat., and 56° to 36° E. long. Yet the extent of the country varied so considerably at different times that the geographical definitions of the ancient writers differ in a very remarkable manner. Thus, while in Gen. x, 19 Canaan does not reach afterwards beyond Sidon—a place in which early times gave the name to the whole people (המגנ קאנת, Deut., Judg.), and by Berosus and Belzoni are considered as lying beyond it (Gen. x. 15 sq.; Josh. xii, 3), it comprised in the Persian period (Herod. iii, 91) Postassium, as high as 55° 52'. Later still (Pliny, Strabo, Ptolemy) the Eleutherus (34° 60') and subsequently (Mela, Stephanus) the island of Arados (84° 70') were considered its utmost northern limits. To the south it was at times Gaza (Gen. x. 19; Zeph. ii, 5; Herod., Philo, Eustath.), at Saphos (Numm. xxiv, 5; Josh. xvi, 4, 7); Strabo, Procop, etc.; and, from the Macedonian period chiefly, Cesarea is mentioned as its extreme point. Eastward the country sometimes comprised parts of Syria and Palestine, beyond the mountain-ridges of the former and the hill-chains of the latter.

It will thus be seen that the length of coast to which the name Phenogacia was applied varied at different times, and may be regarded under different aspects before and after the loss of its original influence. It may be termed Phenogacia proper was a narrow undulating plain, extending from the pass of Ras el-Beydah or Abyad, the "Promontorium Album" of the ancients, about six miles south of Tyre, to the Naher el-Auly, the ancient Besotenus, two miles north of Sidon (Robinson, Bib. Resa, ii, 478). The plain is only twenty-eight miles in length, and, considering the great importance of Phenogacia in the world's history, this may well be added to other instances in Greece, Italy, and Palestine, which show how little the intellectual influence of a city or state has depended on the extent of its territory. Its average breadth is about a mile (Porter, Handbook for Phenogacia, ii, 396); but near Sidon the mountains retreat to a distance of two miles, and near Tyre to a distance of five miles (Kenrick, Phenogacia, p. 19). The whole of Phenogacia, thus understood, is bounded by Josephus (Ant. vi, 8, 1) the great plain of the city of Sidon (הרי שדניא פלורה קדום). In it, near its northern extremity, was situated Sidon, in the north latitude of 33° 34' 05"; and scarcely more than seventeen geographical miles to the south was Tyre, in the latitude of 33° 17' (admiral Smyth's Mediterranean) 17'; and in a straight line those two renowned cities were less than twenty English miles distant from each other. Zarephath, the Sarepta of the N. T., was situated between them, eight miles south of Sidon, to which it belonged (1 Kings xvii, 9; Luke iv, 26). (2) A still longer district, which afterwards became a city entitled to the name of Phenogacia, extended up the coast to a point marked by the island of Arados, and by Antarpus towards the north; the southern boundary remaining the same as in Phenogacia proper. Phenogacia, thus defined, is estimated by Mr. Grant (Hist. of Syria, iii, 354) to have been about one hundred and twenty miles in length; while its breadth, between Lebanon and the sea, never exceeded twenty miles, and was generally much less. This estimate is most reasonable, allowing for the bends of the coast, as the difference in latitude between Tyre and Antarpus (Tartus) is equivalent to one hundred and six English miles; and six miles to the south of Tyre, as already mentioned, intervene before the beginning of the pass of Ras el-Abyad. Hence of this entire district to the name of Phenogacia rests on the probable fact that the whole of it, to the north of the great plain of Sidon, was occupied by Phenician colonists; not to mention that there seems to have been some kind of political connection, however loose, between all the inhabitants (Diodorus, xvi, 41). Scarcely sixteen geographical miles farther north than Sidon was Berytus; with a roadstead so well suited for the purposes of modern navigation that, under the modern name of Beirut, it has become the port of Lebanon, the ancient port of Sidon and Tyre. This city, according to the范文, is "situated on the seacoast of Asia Minor, south of the mouth of the river, the shores of which are covered with numerous small islands." Whether this Berytus was identical with the Beruth or Beroth of Ezek. xxiii, 9, inhabited by seamen and calkers. Its inhabitants are supposed to be alluded to in the word Gliba, translated "stone-scutters" in the A. V. of 1 Kings v, 18 (32). It still retains in Arabic the kindred name of Jebel. Then came Tripolis (now Tarabulus), said to have been founded by colonists from Tyre, Sidon, and Aradus, with three distinct towns, each a forlorn gap from another one, each with its own walls, and each named from the city which supplied its colonists. General meetings of the Phoenicians seem to have been held at Tripolis (Diod. xvi, 41), as if a certain local jealousy had prevented the selection for this purpose of Tyre, Sidon, or Aradus. Lastly, towards the extreme point north was Aradus itself, the Arav of Gen. x, 18 and Ezek. xxiii, 8, situated, like Tyre, on a small island near the mainland, and founded by exiles from Sidon.

During the period of the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites, which terminated the following towns, which we will enumerate successively in the direction from south to north: Dora (\(\text{Dora}\), Josh. xi, 2; xvii, 11 sq.); Potelma (\(\text{Potelma}\), Judg. i, 38); Ecdippa (\(\text{Ecdippa}\), Josh. xix, 29); Tyre (\(\text{Tyre}\), Josh. xix, 29); Sarepta (\(\text{Sarepta}\), 1 Kings xvii, 9 sq.; Luke iv, 28); Sidon (\(\text{Sidon}\), Gen. x, 15); Berytus (\(\text{Berytus}\), Ezek. xvii, 16; 2 Sam. viii, 8); Byblus (\(\text{Byblus}\), Josh. xiii, 5); Tripolis, Simyra (\(\text{Simyra}\), Gen. x, 18); Arka (\(\text{Arka}\), Gen. x, 17); Simna (\(\text{Simna}\), Gen. x, 16); Aradus (\(\text{Aradus}\), Gen. x, 18). Comp. the respective articles on these towns. Sidon is the only Phoenician town mentioned in Homer (see Iliad, vi, 239; xxiii, 743; Odyssey, xxv, 415; xxv, 424).

S. Geographical Features.—The whole of Phoenicia proper is well watered by various streams from the adjoining hills; of these the two largest are the Khasimt-yeh, a few miles north of Tyre—the ancient name of which, strange to say, is not certain, though it is conjectured to have been the Leontes—and the Bostreans, although north of Sidon, of which the soil is fertile, although now generally ill-cultivated; but in the neighborhood of Sidon there are rich gardens and orchards. The harns of Tyre and Sidon afforded water of sufficient depth for all the requirements of ancient navigation, and the neighboring range of the Lebanon, in its extensive forests, furnished what is termed a nearly inexhaustible supply of timber for ship-building. To the north of Bostreus, between that river and Beirut, lies the only desolate and barren part of Phoenicia. It is crossed by the ancient Tamyras or Damara, the modern Nahr ed-Damara. From Beirut the plains are again fertile. The principal streams are the Lyces, now the Nahr el-Keb, not far north from Beirut; the Adonis, now the Nahar Ibrahim, about five miles south of Gebal; and the Eleutherus, now the Nahar el-Kebir, in the bend between Tripolis and Antedrus.

The climate of Phoenicia—an item of immense moment in the history of a nation—varies very considerably. Near the coast, and in the lower plains, the heat in summer is at times tropical, while the more mountainous regions enjoy a moderate temperature, and in winter even heavy falls of snow are not uncommon. In the southern parts the early rains begin in October, and are, after an interval of dry weather, followed by the winter rains, which last till March, the time of the "latter" rains. From May till October the sky remains cloudless. The difference of temperature found in so small a compass is thus greatly diminished. If the heat of July is oppressive, a six hours' journey given them by late Phoenician colonists. Some have seen in them the Hyksos driven to Syria. Without entering any further into these most difficult, and, in the absence of all trustworthy information, more than vague speculations, so much appears certain, that many immigrations of Semitic branches into Phoenicia, at different periods and from different quarters, have taken place, and that these gradually settled into the highly civilized nationality which we find constituted as early as the time of Abraham (Gen. xvi, 11) and already, (comp. Allen-Exra, ad loc., and Spinoza, Tract. Theol. Pol. ch. viii.). It would be extremely vain to venture an opinion on the individuality of the different tribes that, wave-like, rushed into the country from various sides, at probably widely distant dates. The only apparently valuable tradition on the subject seems contained in the above-quoted passage of Gen. x, 15-18. But there is one point which can be proved to be in the highest degree probable, and which has peculiar interest as bearing on the Jews, viz. that the Phoenicians were of the same race as the Canaanites. This remarkable fact, taken in connection with the intercourse of the Phoenicians, leads to some interesting results, is rendered probable by the following circumstances: 1st. The native name of Phoenicia, as already pointed out, was Canaan, a name signifying "lowland." This was well given to the narrow slip of plain between the Lebanon and the Mediterranean Sea, in continuous elevated mountain range adjoining; but it would have been inappropriate to that part of Palestine conquered by the Israelites, which was undoubtedly a hill-country (see Movers, Das Phönikische Alterthum, i, 5); so that, when it is known that the Israelites at the time of their invasion found in Palestine a powerful tribe called the Canaanites, and from them called Palestine, the land of Canaan, it is obviously suggested that the Canaanites came originally from the neighboring plain, called Canaan, along the sea-coast. 2d. This is further confirmed through the name in Africa whereby the Carthaginian Phoenicians called themselves, as attested by Augustine, who states that the peasants in his part of Africa, if asked of what race they were, would answer, in Punic or Phoenician, "Canaanites" (Opera Omn., iv, 1355; Exp. Epist. et Rom., § 18). 3d. The conclusion thus suggested is strongly supported by the tradition that the names of persons and places in the land of Canaan—not only when the Israelites invaded it, but likewise previously, when "there were yet but a few of them," and Abraham and Isaac and Jacob heard of the Phoenicians or Hebrews, as, for example, as Abimelech, "father of the king" (Gen. xx, 2); Melchizedek, "king of righteousness" (Gen. xviii, 18); Kirjath-sepher, "city of the book" (Josh. xv, 15). As above observed, in Greek writers also occurs the name Φοινίκη for Phoenicia (comp. Gesenii Thesaurus Linguae Hebrewae (Leips. 1839-43, i, 626, and Gesenii Monumenta Phoenic. p. 570 sqq.). The dialect of the Israelites perhaps resembled more the Aramaean, and that of the Phoenicians more the Arabic; but this difference was nearly effaced when both nations resided in the same country, took the same Phoenician or Hebrew tongue, and, for example, as Abimelech, "father of the king," (Gen. xx, 2), Melchizedek, "king of righteousness," (Gen. xviii, 18); Kirjath-sepher, "city of the book" (Josh. xv, 15). As above observed, in Greek writers also occurs the name Φοινίκη for Phoenicia (comp. Gesenii Thesaurus Linguae Hebrewae (Leips. 1839-43, i, 626, and Gesenii Monumenta Phoenic. p. 570 sqq.).

2. Government.—Two principal divisions existed anciently among these Canaanites: these were those of the interior of Palestine, and the tribes inhabiting the sea-coast, Phoenicia proper. By degrees three special tribal divisions were distinguished: the Danites, the nucleus around which the multitude of minor ones gathered and became one nationality, viz. the inhabitants of Sidon, of Tyre, and of Aradus. Three principal elements are to be distinguished, according to classical evidence (Castor, comp. Serner. ad Ann. iv, 882), in the constitution of Phoenician states: 1. The monarchy, consisting of certain families of noble lineage, which were divided into tribes (בניהם, families (בניהם, Phoen. בנים), and gentes (בניאים), the latter generally of the number of 800 in each state or colony. Out of the "tribes" were elected thirty princes (Phoen. בנים), who formed a supreme senate; besides which there existed another larger representative assembly of 300 members, chosen from the gentes. 2. The lower estates of the people, or "plebs’’ itself, who do not seem to have had their recognised special representatives, but by constant opposition, which sometimes broke out in open violence, held the nobles in check. 3. The kingdom, an aristocratic, hereditary, afterwards became elective. Nor must the priesthood be forgotten; one of the most powerful elements in the Phoenician commonwealth, and which in some provinces even assumed, in the person of the high-priest, the supreme rule. There was a kind of federal union between the different states, which, according to their importance, sent either their kings or their judges, at the head of a large number of their senators, to the general councils of the nation, held at stated periods either at Sidon or Tyre. The colonies were as much as the home-country, except that local affairs and the executive were intrusted to two (annual, as it would seem) judges (בניאים, suffetes) elected by the senate—an institution which for some time also replaced the monarchical form in Tyre. When Tripolis was founded by Tyre, Sidon, and Aradus, as a place of joint meeting for their hegemony, every one of these cities sent 100 senators to watch her special interests at the common meeting; and generations after the 4th century B.C., at least, to have consisted of 500 to 600 elders, some of whom were probably selected more for their wealth than for their noble lineage. The king sometimes combined in his person the office of high-priest. The turbulent seething mass of the people, consisting of the poorer families of Phoenician descent, the immigrants of neighboring tribes, the strangers, and the whole incomming mass of workmen, traders, sailors, that must have abounded in a commercial and maritime nation like the Phoenicians, and out of whose midst must have arisen at times influential men enough—was governed, as far as we can learn, as "constitutionally" as possible. The unruly spirits were got rid of in Roman fashion somehow in the colonies, or were made silent by important places being intrusted to their care, under strict supervision from home. Only once or twice do we hear of violent secessions, for example, 52 B.C., in consequence of one of which it was mockingly said that Phoenicia had lost all her aristocracy, and what existed of Phoenicians was of the lowest birth, the offspring of slaves. As the wealth of all the world accumulated more and more in the Phoenician ports, luxury, and too great a desire to rest and enjoy their wealth in peace, induced the dauntless old pirates to intrust the guard of their cities to the mariners and mercenary soldiers, to Libyans and Lydians—2d they of Persia and of Lydia, and Phoenicians proper, and a small remnant of it, although the wild resistance which this small territory offered in her single town to the enormous armies of Assear, Babylonia and Greece shows that the old spirit had not died out. The smaller states were sometimes so much oppressed by Tyre that they preferred rather to submit to external enemies (comp. Herodotus, Hist., iv, 19 sqq.; Beck, Anleitung zur genauen Kenntnis der Welt- und Volksgeschichte, p. 252 sqq., and 581 sqq.).

3. History.—One of the most powerful and important nations of antiquity, Phoenicia has yet left but poor information regarding her history. According to Josephus, every city in Phoenicia had its collection of registers and public documents (comp. Targum to Kirjath-jeearim, Judg. i, 11, 15). Out of these, Menander of Ephesus, and Dias, a Phoenician, compiled two histories of Tyre, a few fragments of which have survived (comp.

Evang. i., 10.* Later Phenician histori- ans' works (Theodotus, Hesychates, Moschos, mentioned as authors on Phenicia by Tatianus, Contra Graecos, p. 87.) are likewise lost. Gesenius mentions, in his Monumenta Phenica (p. 362 sq.), that some later Phenician authors, who do not touch upon historical subjects. Thus noth- ing remains but a few casual notices in the Bible, some of the Church fathers, and classical writers (Josephus, Synkellos, Herodotus, Diodorus, Justin), which happen to throw some light upon the history of that long-lost commonwealth. A great part of this history, however, being identical with that of the cities mentioned, in which by turns the hegemony was vested, fuller infor- mation will be found under their special headings. The names of the kings from Hiram to Pygmalion are pres- ented to us by Josephus (Ant. ii., 18), and we are left to conjecture from the history of Tyre by Manander of Ephesus. Broadsly speaking, we may begin to date Phenician history from the time when Sidon first assumed the rule, or about B.C. 1500. Up to that time it was chiefly the development of the immense internal resources, and the commencement of that gigantic trade that was dest- ined soon to overspread the whole of the then known world, which seem to have occupied the attention of the early and peaceful settlers. The sylvanial repre- sentatives of the countries and the dynasty that period, El, or Belitan, builder of cities, supreme and happy riler of men. The conquest of Canaan by the Israelites marks a new epoch, of which lists of kings were still extant in late Greek times. We now hear first of Sido- nian colonies, while the manufactures and commerce of the city seem to have reached a high renome throughout the neighboring lands. The Israelites drove out Sidonian settlers from Laish, near the sources of the Jordan. Some later (beginning of 15th century), Sidonian colonization spread farther west, founding the (Island-) city of Tyre and Girumia or Ciremia on the coast of Africa. About 1209, however, Sidon was defeated by the king of Askalon, and Tyre, occupying the ascen- dency, ushered in a third period, during which Phenicia reachted the summit of her greatness. At this time, chiefly under the brilliant reign of Hiram, we hear also of a close alliance with the Israelites, which eventually led to common commercial enterprises at sea. After Hiram's death, however, political disensions began to undermine the unparalleled peace and power of the country. His four sons ruled, with certain interruptions, and the history of the period is then assumed by Ethbaal, the father of Jezebel. His grandson, Mattan, left the throne to his two children, Pymalmon and Dido (Elissa). The latter, having been excluded from power by her brother, left the country, together with some of the aristocratic families, and founded Carthage (New-Town), about B.C. 813. Of the century that fol- lowed, little further is known save occasional allusions in Joel and Amos, which tell of the piratical commerce of Tyrians and Sidonians. Asyrian, Chaldean, Egyptian invasions followed each other in turns during the last phase of Phenician history, dating from the 16th century, and reducing the country to insignificance. Deeds of prowess, such as the thirteen years' siege sustained by Tyre against overwhelming forces, could not save the doomed country. Her fleet destroyed, her colonies wrested from her or in a state of open rebellion, torn by internal factions, Phenicia was ultimately (together with what had been once Nebu- chadnezzar's empire) embodied with Persia B.C. 538. Once more, however, exasperated by the enormous taxes imposed upon them, chiefly during the Greek war, together with other galling measures issued by the successive satraps, the Phenicians, under the leader- ship of Sidon, took part in the revolution of Egypt against Axartexeres Mennon and Ochus, about the middle of the 4th century B.C., which ended very unhappily for them. Sidon, the only city that refused to submit at once, at the request of the Persians, was shortly there- after quelled, the citizens themselves setting fire to it, and more than 40,000 people perished in the flames. Ab- though rebuilt and repopulated shortly afterwards, it yet never again reached its ancient grandeur, and to Tyre belonged the entire coast, until, after a seven years' siege, to Alexander, who through the battle on the Issus (B.C. 333) had made all Phenicia his as part and parcel of the gigantic Persian empire. Under Antiochus the Great, all except Sidon became subject to Seleucidian rule. Pompey, incorporating Phenicia with Syria (B.C. 65), made it a Roman prov- ince. During the civil wars of Rome, when Cassius divided Syria into small provinces, and sold them separ- ately, Tyre again became for a short period a princi- pality, with a king of its own. Cleopatra in her turn received Phenicia as a present from Rome. The shadow of independence was still left to the two ancient cities was taken from them by Augustus (A.D. 20). Tyre, however, retained much of her previous impor- tance as an emporium and a manufacturing place through the various vicissitudes of Syrian history during the sixeneen centuries that followed, until the Ottoman Turks conquered the country, and the opening up of the New World on the one hand, and of a new route to Asia on the other, destroyed the last remnant of the primitive grandeur of one of the most mighty empires of the an- cient world. The instrumentality of one of the largest shares to the civilization of all mankind.

4. Occupations.—Commerce and colonization were the elements by which this grandeur was chiefly accomplis- hed. Regarding the former, we have already hinted at the overflowing wealth and almost unparalleled variety of home products which this small country furnished forth, and which, far too abundant for their own consumption, easily suggested the idea of exportation and traffic of exchange. Their happy maritime position further en- abled them to do that which Egypt and Assyria, with all their perfection of art, were barred from doing; partly, it is true, through their isolated habits and narrow laws, but chiefly by the natural limit- ats of their countries. To Phenicia alone it was given to supply the link that was to connect the East with the West, or at least with European Western Asia. Communicating by means of Arabia and the Persian Gulf with India and the coast of Africa towards the equator; and on the north, along the Euxine, with the borders of Scythia, beyond the Strait of Gibraltar, with Britannia, if not with the Baltic, their commerce di- vides itself into two great branches according to those natural highways. From the countries on the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea, the coasts of Arabia, Af- rica, and India, they exported spice, precious stones, myrrh, frankincense, gold, ivory, ebony, steel, and iron, and from Egypt embroidered linen and corn. In exchange they brought not only their own raw produce and manufactures, but gums and resins for embalming, also wine and spices. From Mesopotamia and Syria came the emeralds and corals of the Red Sea; from Babylon the Leonard cloth emblcements; wine and fine wool from Acharn and the Persian Gulf; India, Arabia, and the finest wheat, grape-honey, oil, and balm. Another remote region, Armenia, furnished troops of riding and chariot horses and mules; and this same country, or, rather, the south-eastern coast of the Euxine, further furnished the Phoenicians emporiums with slaves of a superior sort, and slaves of the finest type. From Judea the Phoenicians went hand in hand with their maritime calling— with copper, lead, brass (or chalcum), and tannins, which they also fetched, together with conger-eels, from the Atlantic coast. Their extensive early commerce with Greece is frequently alluded to Homer, and is further shown by the remarkable fact of the abundance of Syrian or Phoenician words in Greek for such things as precious stones, fine garments, vessels, spices, and Eastern plants in general, musical instruments, weights and measures, etc. (comp. μουρά, μέρις; κίνασαν, κίνσαν; κίνασαν, κίνσαν; κίνασαν, κίνσαν; κίνασαν, κίνσαν; κίνασαν, κίνσαν; κίνασαν, κίνσαν; κίνασαν, κίνσαν; κίνασαν, κίνσαν; κίνασαν, κίνσαν; κίνασαν, κί but his feet was wrecked at Ezion-geber (1 Kings xxiv, 49). The names of mercantile establishments on the coasts of Arabia along the Persian Gulf have partly been preserved to the present day. In these places the Phoenicians exchanged the produce of the West for that of the East, for spices, the celebrated Samaria incense, gold, and precious stones. The Midianites (Gen. xxvi, 28) and the Edomites (Ex. xxvi, 16) effected the transit by their caravans. The fortified Idumean town Petra probably contained the store-houses in which the produce of southern countries was collected. From Syria the Phoenicians also traded extensively in byssus (ver. 7) for wine. According to an ancient tradition, the tyrant of Thebes, Busiris, having soiled his hands with the blood of all foreigners, was killed by the Tyrian Hercules. This indicates that Phoenician colonists established themselves and their civilization successfully in Upper Egypt, where all strangers had usually been persecuted. At a later period Memphis was the place where most of the Phoenicians in Egypt were established. Phoenician inscriptions found in Egypt prove that even under the Ptolemaic the intimate connection between Egypt and Phoenicia still existed (comp. Gesenii Monumenta Phoenic., xxiii, 224 sq.). From Palestine the Phoenicians imported, besides wheat, especially from Judea, ivory, oil, and balm; also wool, principally from the neighboring nomadic Arabs. On the Phoenician ware have been found (Gen. 6, 6, 17, 18, 21), and the mountains of Syria wood. The tribes about the shores of the Caspian Sea furnished slaves and iron; for instance, the Tubarens (Τυβάραν), Median and Moehi (Μωνέβα, Meshech). Horsemen, horses, and mules came from the Armenians (Παρόβος, Togarmah) (see Heeren, p. 86-180). The treasures of the East were exported from Phoenicia by ships which sailed first to Cyprus and then to the mountains of Phoenicia from the Phoenician coast. Citium was a Phoenician colony in Cyprus, the name of which was transferred to the whole of Cyprus, and to some neighboring islands and coasts called Cypria (Gen. x, 4; Isa. xxiii, 1, 12). Hence also סיכרים, the name of a Canaanitic tribe (Gesenii Monumenta Phoenic., p. 160). Cyprus was subject to Tyre up to the time of Alexander the Great. There are still found Phoenician inscriptions which prove the connection of Cyprus with Tyre. At Rhodes (Ῥόδος) also are found vestiges of Phoenician influence. From Rhodes the mountains of Crete are visible. This was of great importance for the direction of navigators, before the discovery of the compass. In Crete were the islands of Knossos and Gortyn, and the Isles, are the vestiges of Phoenician settlements. On the Isle of Thassos, on the southern coast of Thrace, the Phoenicians had gold-mines; and even on the southern shores of the Black Sea they had factories. However, when the Greeks became more powerful, the Phoenicians sailed more in other directions. They occupied also Sicily and the neighboring islands, but were, after the Greek colonization, confined to a few towns, Metya, Soloes, Panormus (Thrycylides, vi, 2). The Phoenician mercantile establishments in Sardinia and the Balearic Isles could scarcely be called articles, and the Phoenician colony, which probably soon became important by commerce with the interior of Africa, and remained connected with Tyre by means of a common sanctuary. After Phoenicia had been vanished by the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians, the settlements in Sicily, Tunisia, and Spain became the power of Carthage. The Phoenicians had for a long period exported from Spain gold, silver, tin, iron, lead (Ezek. xxxviii, 18), fruit, wine, oil, wax, fish, and wool. Their chief settlement was Tarshish, (תורשש), subject, from the root תרש, he vanquished, subjected. The Arameans pronounced it תרשש; hence the Greek Tarshesos. This was probably the name of a town situated to the west of the Pillars of Hercules (Capo and Abyla, now Gibraltar and Ceuta), and even more west than Gades, at the mouth of the Bestis (Herod. iv, 62; Scymnus Chius, v, 161 sq.). This river was also called Tarceus (Arist. Meteor. ii, 10; Pausan. vi, 19, 5; Strabo, iii, 11, 1). Also, Herodotus obtained likewise the Phoenician name Carthage, from מַרְכָּת, town (Strabo, iii, p. 151). There are other names of towns in Spain which have a Phoenician derivation: Gades, גַּדֵּס, part of; fence (comp. Gesenius Monumenta Phoenicia, p. 304 sq., 349); Malaga (גַּלָּג), on account of much salt fish thence exported; or, according to Gesenius (id. p. 812 sq., and 358), from מַעֲמִיל, factory, or manufacture of other metals, on account of the mines to be found there; Belon, בֵּלְוָן, city id. p. 311 sq., and 348). The voyage to Tarshish was the most important of those undertaken by the Phoenicians. Hence it was that their largest vessels were all called ships of Tarshish, although they sailed in other directions (1 Kings ii, 92). It appears also that the Phoenicians exported fin from the British Isles, and amber from the coasts of Prussia. Their voyages on the western coasts of Africa seem to have been merely voyages of discovery, without permanent results. The Spanish colonies were probably the principal sources of Phoenician wealth, and were founded at a very remote period. The migration of the Phoenician, Cadmus, into Boetia likewise belongs to the earlier period of Phoenician colonization. Homer seems to know little of the Sidonian commerce; which feature may be explained by supposing that the Phoenicians avoided all collision and competition with the increasing power of the Greeks, and preferred to direct their voyages into countries where such competition seemed to be improbable.

Herodotus shows the Phoenicians as beginning soon after their settlement to occupy themselves in distant voyages (i, 1). From the construction of rude rafts, they must speedily have reached to a style of substantial ship-building. Their commercial vessels are represented either as long in the bow, and fat in the stern, with eighty oars—"ships of Tarshish"—or as rounder in form, and more capacious in stowage, but slower in speed—tubs or coating-vessels—bearers of cargo on short voyages. Xenophon (Economica, viii) passes a high eulogy on a Phoenician vessel, where the greatest quill was fifty feet long; and he remarks that the Phoenicians were experts in stoneworking, being skilled separately in the smallest stonework. Their merchants also carried arms for defence, and had figures on their prows, which the Greeks named rameae. They steered by the Cynosure, or the last star in Ursa Minor; and they could cast reckoning from the combined application of astronomy and arithmetic (Strabo, xvi, 2, 21). This nautical application of astronomy is ascribed by Callimachus to Thales, a Phoenician by descent (frag. ed. Blomfield, p. 218; Dioq. Laert. Thales). Lebanon supplied them with abundance of timber, and Cyprus gave them all necessary equipments, from the keel to the topmasts—a fundamento ipeo carinum ad supremos ipos carbasos (Amm. Marcell. xiv, 8-14). These daring Phoenician navigators in the reign of Pharaos—Necho circumnavigated Africa—departing from the Red Sea and returning by the Strait of Gibraltar. They reported that in sailing round Libya they had the sun on their right hand—a story of which Herodotus says, "I, for my part, do not believe them," and yet it is the positive proof that they had gone round the Cape (Herod. iv, 42). Dioecides speaks also of Phoenician mariners being driven westwards beyond the Pillars of Hercules into the ocean, and reaching at length a very fertile and beautiful island—a dwelling of gods rather than of men—one probably of the Azores or Canary Islands. The Phoenicians furnished to Xerxes shipwrights and mariners, who, driven westwards beyond the Pillars of Hercules, turned back and built the fortresses of Salamis. It is said that of all the nations employed in digging the famous canal across the isthmus of Athos, they alone had sufficient engineering skill to begin its banks on their section at a slope, and thus prevent caving in (vii, 23). The remote periods of Phoenician commerce and colonization are wrapped in myths. They have for a long time been considered the discoverers of Asia and Egypt; but their own wares and manufactures were soon largely exported by them (Ezek. xxxviii). The commerce of Tyre reached through the world (Strabo, iii, 5, 11). There was also a great trade in the tunny fisheries, and the Tyrians sold fish in Jerusalem (Neh. xiii, 16). Phoenicia excelled in the manufacture of the purple dye extracted from the shell-fish murex, so abundant on parts of its coasts. This color in its richest hue was at length appropriated to imperial use, and the silk so dyed was of extraordinary value. The glass of Sidon was no less famous than the Tyrian dye—the fine white sand used for the process being very abundant near Mount Carmel. Glass has been found in Nineveh, and glass-blowing is figured at Beni-Hassan in Egypt. The art might have come from Egypt, but the discovery in Phoenicia is represented as accidental. The pillar of fire brightening faintly in the night, which Herodotus speaks of as being in the temple of Hercules, was probably a hollow cylinder of glass with a lamp within it (Kenrick, Phoenicia, p. 249). Phoenicia produced also drinking-cups and writing-ink in works of brass. Its building-stone was not of very good quality, but cedar-wood was largely employed. When stone was used the joints were bevelled—a practice which also characterizes Hebrew architecture, and gives it a panelled appearance. The mining operations of the Phoenicians were also celebrated. Herodotus says they turned a mountain over in the search for gold. Mines were wrought in the various colonies—in the Cretan islands and in Spain—by processes much the same as those employed in more modern times. The marine knowledge and experience of Phoenicia led to the plantation of numerous colonies in Cyprus, Rhodes, Cilicia, and the islands of the Aegean—the Cyclades and Sporades (Thucyd. i, 8)—in Sicily, in Sardinia, the Balearic Islands, and in Spain. Strabo says that the Phoenicians possessed the best parts of Iberia before the days of Homer (iii, 22, 14). One principal colony was in Northern Africa, and Strabo asserts that they occupied the middle part of Africa soon after the Trojan war. The story of Dido and the foundation of Carthage is well known, the event being placed by some in the 20th century, by others in the 16th, by some in the 18th, by others in the 14th century. The name of Carthage, which the city was built, denoted a fortress, being בֹּרָצָה (Bozrah), the name also of the Idumean capital; though its Greek form, Bupora, gave rise to the story about the purchase of as much land as a hide would measure. Carthage means "new town" (ср. בֵּית מֹשֶךְ, and Punics is only another spelling of Phoenici). Intercourse with many strange and untutored races led the Phoenicians to indulge in fictions, and love of gain taught them mercantile deceit and stratagems. Phoenician figures of speech—"famine was a sitting biologist's tale, was proverbial in former times, like fides Punicus at a later period (Strabo, xii, p. 55). The Etnymologium Magnum bluntly defines φινικείς by χαρός, the lie. In the Odyssey they are described as "crafty" ποιονομαντεροι (Odys. xii, 415), or as "crafty and wicked. As a trading nation they were ready sometimes to take advantage of the ignorant and savage tribes with which they bartered, and they cared nothing for law or right on the high seas, where no power could control or punish; so that Ulysses uses the phrase Φινικῳς σπουδασταμανις ἐπόμενον ὁ θεός ποτὲ ὡς πιστῷ καὶ πλούσιῳ. As a trading nation they were ready sometimes to take advantage of the ignorant and savage tribes with which they bartered, and they cared nothing for law or right on the high seas, where no power could control or punish; so that Ulysses uses the phrase Φινικῳς σπουδασταμανις ἐπόμενον ὁ θεός ποτὲ ὡς πιστῷ καὶ πλούσιῳ.

means, "I become a trader." But the phrase seems to indicate that the Phoenicians were not only traders, but also other names for a huckster, or a peddler going from house to house, as in Prov. xxxii. 24. Nay, the prophet Hosea (xii. 7) says, "He is a Canaanite," or "Phoenician," or "as for Canaan, the balances of deceit are in his hand: he loveth to oppress." And Ephraim said, "Yet the Lord found out our out substance." A common proverb expressive of fraud matching fraud was Σίμων πρὸς Φωνιάκας. No coined money of Phoenicia is extant prior to its subjugation by the Greeks. The standard seems to have been the same as the Jewish; the shekel being equal to the Attic tetradrachm; and the zuz, which occurs on the tablets of Marcellus, being of the value of a denarius. One of the tablet letters "silver" occurs, with the probable ellipse of "shekel," as in Hebrew. Foreign silver money ("Ty") is also there referred to. Among the antiquities dug up in Nineveh are several bronze weights in the form of lions; having both cuneiform legends with the names of the respective kings, and also Phoenician or cursive Semitic inscriptions (Layard, Nine., and Bab. p. 601). The cun was a Phoenician measure, the same as the Hebrew mina (pint), and holding ten Attic metates, each metates being equal to about ten and a half gallons. The arithmetical notation was carried out by making simple strokes for the units; 10 was a horizontal stroke or a semicircle, and 100 was a special sign, the unit strokes added to it denoting additional hundreds (Geeni Monumenta Phoen.), p. 85.

It appears almost incredible how, with the comparatively small knowledge of natural science which we must attribute to them, the Phoenicians could thus on their frail rafter-traversed vessels, means almost from one end of the globe to the other, with apparently no more difficulty than their inland caravans, their chapmen and dealers, found in traversing the neighboring countries. Yet it must not, on the other hand, be forgotten that their ships appear to have been an uncommon knowledge of astronomy and physical geography—witness their almost scientifically planned voyage of discovery under Hiram—and that, above all, an extraordinary amount of practical sense, of boldness, shrewdness, unscrupulousness, unriveting energy, and happy genius, went far to replace such deficiencies and enable their modern descendants to make our mariners familiar. These qualities also made and kept them the unrivaled masters of ancient commerce and navigation. They were, moreover, known rather to destroy their own ships and endanger their lives than let others see their secret way and enterprise; and it would be very surprising if theirs had not been also the greatest discoveries, the greatest riches and splendor and power for many a long century, though they owned but a small strip of country at home. Well might Tyre once say, "I am of perfect beauty."

Phoenician cities (xxvii, 30), and as Pharaoh's Sin-don, "Behold, thou art wiser than Daniel, there is no secret they can hide from thee: with thy wisdom and thine understanding thou hast gotten thee riches, and hast gotten gold and silver into thy treasures: by thy great wisdom and by thy traffic hast thou increased thy riches, and thine heart is lifted up because of thy riches" (xxviii, 3-5). There can, indeed, not be fancied a fuller and more graphic account of the state of Phoenicia, especially as regards her commercial relations, than the two chapters of Ezechiel (xxvii and xxviii) containing the lamentation on Tyre, which, indeed, form our chief information on this point.

In regard to Phoenician trade, as connected with the Israelites, the following points are worthy of notice.

(l.) Up to the time of David, not one of the twelve tribes seems to have possessed a single harbor on the sea-coast: it was thus possible that they would become a commercial people. It is true that according to Judg. i. 31, combined with Josh. xix. 26, Accho or Acre, with its excellent harbor, had been assigned to the tribe of Asher; but from the same passage in Judges it seems certain that the tribe of Asher did not really obtain the possession of Accho, which continued to be held by the Canaanites. However wistfully, therefore, the Israelites might regard the wealth accruing to their neighbors the Phoenicians from trade, to vie with them in this respect was out of the question. But from the time that David established Edom, an opening for trade was afforded to the Israelites. The command of Ezion-geber, near Elath, in the land of Edom, enabled them to engage in the navigation of the Red Sea.

As they were novices, however, at sailing, as the navigation of the Red Sea, owing to its currents, winds, and rocks, is dangerous even to modern sailors, and as the Phoenicians, during the period of the independence of Edom, were probably allowed to trade from Ezion-geber, it was politic in Solomon to permit the Phoenicians of Tyre to have docks and build ships at Ezion-geber on condition that his subjects might profit by the benefit of their experience. The results seem to have been strikingly successful. The Jews and Phoenicians made profitable voyages to Ophir in Arabia or India, whence gold was imported into Judea in large quantities; and once in three years still longer voyages were made, by vessels which might have reached Ophir, though their imports were not only gold, but likewise silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks (1 Kings x, 22). See TAMRISH. There seems at the same time to have been a great direct trade with the Phoenicians for cedar-wood (ver. 27), and generally the wealth of the kingdom reached an unprecedented point. If the union of the tribes had been maintained, the whole sea-coast of Palestine would have afforded additional sources of revenue through trade; and perhaps even ultimately the "great plain of Sidon" itself might have formed part of the united empire. But if any possibilities of this kind existed, they were destroyed by the disastrous secession of the ten tribes; a heavy blow from which the Hebrew race has never yet recovered during a period of nearly 3000 years.

(2.) After the division into two kingdoms, the curtain falls on any commercial relation between the Israelites and Phoenicians until a relation is brought to notice, by no means brotherly, as in the fleets which navigated the Red Sea, nor friendly, as between buyers and sellers, in order to purchase presents of war as slaves and as such the Phoenicians, during the period of the independence of Edom, were probably allowed to trade from Ezion-geber, it was politic in Solomon to permit the Phoenicians of Tyre to have docks and build ships at Ezion-geber on condition that his subjects might profit by the benefit of their experience. The results seem to have been strikingly successful. But if any possibilities of this kind existed, they were destroyed by the disastrous secession of the ten tribes; a heavy blow from which the Hebrew race has never yet recovered during a period of nearly 3000 years.

(2.) After the division into two kingdoms, the curtain falls on any commercial relation between the Israelites and Phoenicians until a relation is brought to notice, by no means brotherly, as in the fleets which navigated the Red Sea, nor friendly, as between buyers and sellers, in order to purchase presents of war as slaves and as such the Phoenicians, during the period of the independence of Edom, were probably allowed to trade from Ezion-geber, it was politic in Solomon to permit the Phoenicians of Tyre to have docks and build ships at Ezion-geber on condition that his subjects might profit by the benefit of their experience. The results seem to have been strikingly successful. The Jews and Phoenicians made profitable voyages to Ophir in Arabia or India, whence gold was imported into Judea in large quantities; and once in three years still longer voyages were made, by vessels which might have reached Ophir, though their imports were not only gold, but likewise silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks (1 Kings x, 22). See TAMRISH. There seems at the same time to have been a great direct trade with the Phoenicians for cedar-wood (ver. 27), and generally the wealth of the kingdom reached an unprecedented point. If the union of the tribes had been maintained, the whole sea-coast of Palestine would have afforded additional sources of revenue through trade; and perhaps even ultimately the "great plain of Sidon" itself might have formed part of the united empire. But if any possibilities of this kind existed, they were destroyed by the disastrous secession of the ten tribes; a heavy blow from which the Hebrew race has never yet recovered during a period of nearly 3000 years.

friendship of the kingdom of Israel; and the Israelitish king, Ahab, had a Sidonian princess as his wife (1 Kings xvi, 31). Now, not improbably in consequence of these relations, when Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, endeavored to remain neutral in the conflict of the Jews in the Red Sea, and in this purpose built large ships at Ezion-geber to go to Ophir for gold, he did not admit the Phoenicians to any participation in the venture, and when king Ahaziah, Ahab’s son, asked to have a share in it, his request was distinctly refused (xxiii, 48, 49). That attempt to renew the trade of the Jews in the Red Sea failed, and in the reign of Jehoram, Jehoshaphat’s son, Edom revolted from Judah and established its independence; so that if the Phoenicians wished to despatch trading-vessels from Ezion-geber, Edom was the power which it was mainly their interest to conciliate, and not Judah. Under these circumstances the Phoenicians seem, not only to have purchased and to have sold again as slaves, and probably in some instances to have kidnapped inhabitants of Judah, but even to have sold them to their enemies the Edomites (Joel, Amos, as above). This was regarded with reason as a departure from the old brotherly covenant, when Hiram was a great lover of David, and subsequently had the most friendly commercial relations with David’s son; and this may be considered as the original foundation of the hostility of the Hebrews towards Phoenician Tyre (Isa. xxviii; Ezek. xxviii).

(8.) The only other notice in the Old Testament of trade between the Phoenicians and the Israelites is in the account given by the prophet Ezekiel of the trade of Tyre (xxvii, 17). While this account supplies valuable information respecting the various commercial dealings of that most illustrious of Phoenician cities [see Tyre], it likewise makes direct mention of the exports to it from Palestine. These were wheat, honey (i.e. sirup of grapes), oil, and balm. The export of wheat deserves attention [concerning the other exports, see Balm; Honey; Oil], because it shows how important it must have been to the Phoenicians to maintain friendly relations with their Hebrew neighbors, and especially with the adjoining kingdom of Israel. The wheat is called wheat of Minnith (q.v.), which was a town of the Ammonites, on the other side of the Jordan, only once mentioned elsewhere in the Bible: and it is not certain whether Minnith was a great inland emporium, where large purchases of corn were made, or whether the grain yielded to it was in quantity good, and gave its name to all wheat of a certain fineness in quality. Still, whatever may be the correct explanation respecting Minnith, the only countries specified for exports of wheat are Judah and Israel, and it was through the territory of Israel that the wheat would be imported into Tyre. This is suggested by the fact that the Philistine (especially in his Hebrew form, Ptoleric Researches, ii, 117) that the fact of Palestine being thus, as it were, the granary of Phoenicia, explains in the clearest manner the lasting peace that prevailed between the two countries. He observes that with many of the other adjoining nations the Jews lived in a state of almost continual warfare; but that they never once engaged in hostilities with their nearest neighbors the Phoenicians. The fact itself is certainly worthy of special notice; and is the more remarkable, as there were not wanting tempting occasions for the interference of the Phoenicians in Palestine if they desired it. When Elijah at the brook Kishon, at the distance of not more than thirty miles in a straight line from Tyre, put to death 450 prophets of Baal (1 Kings xxviii, 40), we can well conceive the agitation and anger which such a deed must have produced at Tyre. At Sidon, more especially, which was only twenty miles farther distant from the scene of slaughter, the first impulse of the inhabitants must have been to march forth at once into battle array to strengthen the hands of Jezebel, their rival and her enemy, and of the Phoenician god. When again afterwards, by means of falsehood and treachery, Jezu was enabled to massacre the worshippers of Baal in the land of Israel, we cannot doubt that the intelligence was received in Tyre, Sidon, and the other cities of Phoenicia, with a similar burst of horror and indignation to that with which the news of the massacre of the 200 prophets of Baal spread among the Protestant countries; and there must have been an intense desire in the Phoenicians, if they had the power, to invade the territories of Israel without delay and inflict signal chastisement on Jehu (2 Kings x. 18-29). The fact that Israel was their granary would undoubtedly have been an element in restraining the Phoenicians, even on occasions such as these: but probably still deeper motives were likewise at work. It seems to have been part of the settled policy of the Phoenician cities to avoid attempts to make conquests on the continent of Asia. For this there were excellent reasons in the position of their small territory, which, with the range of Lebanon on one side as a barrier, and the sea on the other, was easily defensible by a wealthy power having command of the sea, against second or third rate powers, but for the same reason was not once considered as a probable object of offensive war on the land side. It may be added that a pacific policy was their manifest interest as a commercial nation, unless by war they were morally certain to obtain an important accession of territory, or unless a warlike policy was an absolute necessity to prevent a powerful neighbor on their land front from becoming too powerful a neighbor. At last, indeed, they even carried their system of non-intervention in continental wars too far, if it would have been possible for them by any alliances in Syria and Cilicia-Syria to prevent the establishments on the other side of the Lebanon of one great empire. For from that moment their ultimate doom was certain, and it was merely a question of time as to the arrival of the fatal hour when they would lose their independence. But too little is known of the details of their history to warrant an opinion as to whether they might not have been weaker states at any time by such a policy of raised up a barrier against the empire of the Assyrians or Chaldeans. See Commerce.

The impulse given to industry and the arts by this almost unparalleled extension of the commercial sphere of the Phoenicians was enormous. Originally exporters or traders only for the wares of Egypt and Assyria, they soon began to manufacture these wares themselves, and drew the whole world into their circle of commerce. As to the early and most extensive commercial intercourse between the Phoenicians and the Roman states, there is nothing very striking than the circumstance of nearly all the Greek names for the principal objects of Oriental commerce being Phoenician, or rather Semitic; identical, almost, with the terms found in the Old Testament. The descriptions of the abundance of precious metals and purple cloth mentioned in the Bible is suggested by the fact that Phoenicians were supposed to have made even their anchors of silver, when they first discovered the mines, not knowing how to stow away all the silver in their vessel. What must have been the state of these mines is clear from the fact that even in the Roman time 40,000 men were constantly employed as miners, and the state received a clear revenue of 20,000 drachmas daily. The “Fortunate Islands,” which, according to Diodorus, they discovered after many days’ sailing along the coast of Africa, beyond the Pillars of Hercules, and which, to judge from the name Purgorius given to some islands off the coast of Mauritania, would seem to have been the Canaries, yielded them the shell-fish purpura, so useful for their dyeing manufactures. Besides their wholesale commerce carried on by fleets and caravans, they also appear to have gone about the interior of Syria and Palestine, retailing their home or foreign produce. What degree of perfection they had reached in metallurgy may be seen in the minute description of the mining process contained in Job (xxviii, 1-11), probably derived from mines which they worked in the Lebanon, Cyprus, Tyros, and Sidon, and whose existence was long supposed. That they had acquired a high standing in what we should call the fine arts may be gathered from the fact that not only architects, but skilful work- ers of all kinds, had carried on their work. The Temple of the Lord was not forgotten, and, when Solomon willed to build a magnificent and splendid temple worthy of his golden reign. Their sculptures — what there has been found of them — do not, it is true, give us a very high notion of their artistic perfection; but, for all we know, these may be only the archaic beginnings, or the remnants of a corrupt age or unskilful hands. Better things may come to light any day. There certainly exist some exceedingly skilful engravings of theirs on gems among the few works that have been preserved. For instance, a fine goblet, with a gold-veined silver bowl, for instance, given to Télémachus by Menelaos, which had been previously given to Hepeustos by the king of the Sidonians; the silver vase offered by Achilles as a prize at the funeral games for Patroclus; the columns and the magnificent vessels cast for the Temple of Jerusalem by Tyrian artists, and the like — that they manufactured all kinds of beautiful vessels and ornaments in gold, silver, and ivory, and knew how to extract perfumes from the lily and cy- press, but, as in every other respect, in this province also be declared to have been only the skilful appropriators of the knowledge of others, of which, however, they made use with a diligence and perseverance entirely unparalleled.

In broadly recapitulating the routes their vessels took around the earth, we have indicated the line of their colonization. We cannot do more in this place than hint at the wanderings of Baal (q. v.), Astarte (q. v.), and Melkarth (q. v.), as the principal allegories in which the myth coched the primitive traditions of their settle- ments abroad. The whole of the Mediterranean, with its islands and coast, had been made theirs by rapid strides. Commencing with neighboring Cyprus, they proceeded to Cythium, to Rhodes, Crete, the Cycladic and Sporadic Isles, Sicilia, Lycia, and Caria, Chios, Samos, Tenedos, Bitinia, the Ægin, Samothrace, Lemnos, Thasos (whether they had come in search of Eu- rope), Boeotia, and Euboea. More difficult was the occupation of Sicily and the neighboring islands, where Motya, Machanetti, Panormus, and other cities, testify to their successful settlements. Thence also, by way of Malta, they sailed to Africa, and founded Carthage, which afterwards possessed herself of all the colonies in Sicily, Sardinia, and Spain. In Sardinia and the Balearic Islands they had commercial establishments at Caralis (Cagliari), Minorca, Ivisa, Elbe. Spain was one of their earliest and principal settlements, where they founded the large and flourishing cities of Belon, Alcántara, and others. It is also more than probable, although we have no distinct evidence on the point, that they had colonies in the tin districts of Cornwall and the Scilly Islands, as also on the Baltic. They settled, further, both on the northern shores of Africa (Tunisia, Gifone), and on its north coast (Hippo, Utica, Leptis, Hadrumetum). How far Phoenicians may have had a more than temporary sojourn in India (Ophir? = Abhira), whither they went by way of the Red Sea, we are unable to determine.

5. Religion. — The same lack of genuine and authentic information, of which we have spoken before, baffles our endeavors to arrive at anything like a proper understand- ing of the real character of the religion of the Phoenicians. The mutilated scraps contained in classical writers can be of little use for its full reconstruc- tion as the uncertain allusions of the Bible. As to Samsoniah, extracts of whose Phoenician writings (in Philo of Byblos' Greek version) are, as has been mentioned above, supposed to have survived in Euse- bius, and are a very queer compilation, more than mean reasons to suspect both the author, the translator, and the Church father, not of wilful mis- interpretation, but of a certain want of candor in doing that full and fair justice to both sides which we expect from a historian of our day. A few broken votive and sacrificial stones, a few coins and unshapely images, make up the rest of our sources of information for the present. A few years hence, however, we may, if our excavations are carried on with unflagging zeal, and are as successful as they have been of late years, have as ample a supply to work upon as we have now respect- ing the history of the Phoenician Age, and many more known land of Nebuchadnezzar and Sennacherib, if not with respect even to Greece and Rome. It will be suf- ficient, however, that Phoenician, like Canaanitic religion, in general consisted in a worship of the pow- ers of nature under their favorable or creative (= female) aspect, and unfavorable or destructive (= male) aspects. Still more concretely were these repre- sented in the different phases of life, as child (Adonis), youth (Eskum), man (Ebal-Heracles), or old man (Be- litian); again, as kings (Moloch) or queens (Astarte), and other characters most fitting to the idea symbolized in them. Their chief (visible) representatives — the sun, the moon, the planets, and the elements — were re- vered as supreme deities, who, at the same time, were also the special Numina of particular tribes, places, and seasons, and some of their general designations, such as King (אֲלֹהֵי הַשָׁמַיִם, Lord (יהוה), Almighty (הֵא), etc., are also found in the Bible. To the supreme class of deities (אֱלֹהֵי הָאָרֶץ) belong Baal and his retinue, each with their different attributes and ramifications, e. g. Baal samim, בָּאָל סֵם; Ἀρχέας, Optimus Max- imus, Basitan, Basilam, Basal Mon; Basal Melkarth, בָּאָל מֶלְכָּרֶת, king of the city (Tyre); Astarte = Tanith, תוֹנִית, generally with the epithet παράδεισος, the great one, who appears identical with the Egypto-Persian war- and moon-goddess Tanait. Corresponding to this triad in the Syro-Sidonian worship, we meet in Northern Phoenicia with the two Sidonian tribes: El ( весьма) or Kronos, the founder of Byblius and Berytus; Basilia (ברון, my lady) = Aphrodite (Astrone, Beruth); and Adonis (Gauss, Eljum, Eskum, etc.). Besides other well-known deities, such as Moloch and Dagon (Der- keto, Atergatis) — for all of which we refer the reader to the articles treating of them — we find a certain mysterious number of minor gods, variously denominated the strong ones (Kabiri), or the children of the Just One (Zadik, זַדִּיק, the principal patrons of the seafarers, worshipped alike by all the Phoenician tribes (Diocuri, Putaci: Chausor - Phtha (Chusartha), Astarte, Casimus (אשתר, my lady) = Aphrodite (Astrone, Beruth); and Adonis (Gauss, Eljum, Eskum, etc.). These, together with the inferior or Chaositic deities, Mortal Death, -- literally, the goddess known only to us as "Persephone" (daughter of Ijpheta with the Samaritan Schemites), or Dido (ὕππη του έλληνος, "the wandering one"). As exactly as Elothi- my lady, my goddess, etc., are, as far as we know at present, the chief representatives of the Phoenician Pantheon, which, it is observed by the way, appears to have been almost as catholic in the reception of foreign deities as that of imperial Rome. Like the Greeks, and after them the Romans, the Phoenicians also sufficed certain natural phenomena and "elements" (sun, moon, stars, water, fire, earth, air), personal attributes, abstract ideas, allegories, the seasons of life, of the year, of the day, trades and professions, and even animals; prob- ably as symbols only at first. The serpent (Agiatho- demos, Eskum, Typhon), the bull (Asteroth-Karn- im), the lion, the ass (symbol of Semitic Baal-worship), the dog, fishes, doves, goats, etc., are found either represent- ing divinities, or merely sacred to them. Anything like an investigation into the various phrases of the Pho- nician mythology, which, stretching from the remotest prehistoric days far into the first Christian centuries, must needs contain the most contradictory, apparently irreconcilable, elements and data, lies beyond the scope of this article. We shall only mention that Sanchoniasmato distinguishes—a sure sign of the consciousness on the part of native writers of the hopeless confusion in the religious notions and traditions of their time—three periods in each, with distinct circles of deities of special classes and families. The first period contains twelve families of gods. In the second three dynasties follow each other, and there are twenty-two supreme deities (according to the letters of the Phoenician alphabet), at the head of whom stands El or Kronos, etc., as follows:

N. El, Kronos.

Of the third period only fragments of Sanchoniasmato have come down, but it would appear as if Zeus Belus had in this assumed the chief rank, equal to Kronos of the second period. These gods and goddesses were portrayed in various ways, but chiefly by sacrifices, which consisted on certain occasions of first-born male children (לְבֶן-לוֹקֶם לְאָדָם). Prostitution (נָשָׁה) in honor of Astarte was considered another praiseworthy act. Among the rites of sacrifice and expiation must also be enumerated circumcision, which was not practiced with all the Phoenician tribes, but seems to have been a ceremony peculiar to the worshippers of El, the special deity of Byturus and Byblus. Whether, however, as has been held, it is to be considered analogous to this prostitution of virgins in the service of Astarte, we shall not here investigate. The country abounded with places of worship, for every grove and every height, every river and every well, were adapted for the purpose, if it could be fancied a dwelling-place for some deity. See IDOLATRY. Nor were special buildings (sanctuaries, temples), with all their accessories of arks and priestly, wells and fires, wanting: as indeed the Phoenicians are supposed to have been the first who erected such permanent sanctuaries. Their construction was in accordance with their destination, which was not to be houses of prayer, but the seat of honor of the special deity. They were divided into two parts, the first of which contained the statues and symbols which were the relics of public worship. The second, the Adyton, on the other hand, contained such symbols which were not to be seen constantly, but were reserved for certain special festive occasions; besides the holy ark with its mystical contents, and the holy vehicles upon which these sacred objects were carried about. The walls were covered with the symmetrical representations of the deities; and in this place also the priests kept their archives. Something of the abhorrence of all visible representations of the Deity which seems in the first stages of their existence to have filled the minds of all Semitic nations—an abhorrence erroneously taken of late to indicate their monotheistic propensity (comp. Rihan's and Munk's Inaugural Lectures) —is also noticeable with the Phoenicians, whose gods were legion. No paintings, statues, or other likenesses of deities are recorded as found in the ancient temples of Gades, Tyre, Samaria, Paphos, etc. There were, however, pictures of women (the female Numen, Astarte), of stone, פָּסְדָּבָה (for Baal), of gold or emerald (תָּחַבִּים), together with phallic representations, found in and before the Phoenician sanctuaries. Another kind of divine mementos, as it were, were the Betylia (בְּטַלְיוֹת), probably meteors, for which a fetch-like reverberation was shown, and which were called by the names of Father, Mighty Father (בּוֹשֶׁה בּוֹשֶׁה יַיִרְתּ), and at the time of Augustine there were still a number of priests engaged in Punic Africa to wait upon these idols and to elicite oracles from them (Eucadiurus). Among the principal festivals, with some of which, as with those of the Hebrews, were connected pilgrimages—from the farthest colonies even—are the "awakening" and the "self-destruction by fire" of Hercules, a certain festival of "staves," a vintage-feast in honor of the Tyrian Bacchus, and certain others in honor of Astarte, celebrating her disappearance, flight, and wanderings, the Adonis, etc. An account of the different Phoenician gods named in the Bible will be found elsewhere (see BAAL; ASHIBAROTH; BAAL), but it will be proper here to point out certain effects which the circumstance of their being worshipped in Phoenicia produced upon the Hebrews.

(1.) In the first place, their worship was a constant temptation to polytheism and idolatry. It is the general tendency of trade, by making merchandise in contact with different countries and various modes of thought, to enlarge the mind, to promote the increase of knowledge, and, in addition, by the wealth which it diffuses, to afford opportunities in various ways for intellectual culture: and as the Phoenicians were, from the first, scarcely to be doubted among the most civilized of these circumstances, the Phoenicians, as a great commercial people, were more generally intelligent, and as we should now say civilized, than the inland agricultural population of Palestine. When the simple-minded Jews, therefore, came in contact with a people so much more versatile and, apparently, more enlightened than themselves, but who nevertheless, either in a philosophical or in a popular form, admitted a system of polytheism, an influence would be exerted on Jewish minds, tending to make them regard their exclusive devotion to their own one God, Jehovah, however transcendent his attributes, as unsocial and morose. It is in some such way that we must account for the astonishing fact that Solomon himself, the wisest of the Hebrew race, to whom Jehovah is expressly stated to have appeared twice—once, not long after his marriage with an Egyptian princess, on the night after his sacrificing 1000 burnt-offerings on the high place of Gibon, and the second time after the consecration of the Temple—should have been so far beguiled by his wives in his old age as to become a Polytheist, worshipping, among other deities, the Phoenician goddess Astarte. (1 Kings xiv. 18-24; lxi. 1-5; ix. 2; xi. 1-5). This is not for a moment to be so interpreted as if he ever ceased to worship Jehovah, to whom he had erected the magnificent Temple, which in history is so generally connected with Solomon's name. Probably, according to his other erroneous conception, he never ceased to regard himself as a loyal worshipper of Jehovah, but he at the same time deemed this not incompatible with sacrificing at the altars of other gods likewise. Still the fact remains that Solomon, who by his Temple in its ultimate results did so much for establishing the doctrine of one only God, became himself a practical Polytheist. If this was the case with him, polytheism in other sovereigns of inferior excellence can excite no surprise. With such an example before him, it is no wonder that Ahab, an essentially bad man, should after his marriage with a Sidonian princess not only openly tolerate, but encourage the worship of Baal; though it is to be remembered even in him that he did not disown the authority of Jehovah, but, when rebuked by his great antagonist Elijah, he rent his clothes and put sackcloth on his flesh, and lay down on the ground. (1 Kings xvii. 1-4). This is a deed deemed sincere (1 Kings xvi. 81: xxii. 22-39). Finally, it is to be observed generally that although, before the reformation of Josiah (2 Kings xxiii.), polytheism prevailed in Judah as well as Israel, yet it seems to have been more limited and universal in Israel, so that it had not been expected from its greater proximity to Phoenicia; and Israel is sometimes spoken of as if it had set the bad example to Judah (2 Kings xvii, 19; Jer. iii, 8); though, considering the example of Solomon, this cannot be accepted as a strict historical statement. (2.) The Phoenician religion was likewise in other respects deleterious to the inhabitants of Palestine, being essentially immoralizing. For example, it sanctioned the dreadful practice of sacrificing children as sacrifices to a Phoenician god. "They have built also," says Jeremiah, in the name of Jehovah (xix, 5), "the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt-offerings unto Baal, which I commanded not, nor spake it, neither came it into my mind" (comp. Jer. xxxii, 35). This horrible custom was probably in its origin founded on the idea of sacrificing to a god what was most valuable in the eyes of the suppliants; but it could not exist without having a tendency to stifle natural feelings of affection, and to harden the heart. It could scarcely have been first adopted otherwise than in the infancy of the Phoenician race; but grown-up men and grown-up nations, with their moral feelings in other respects cultivated, are often the slaves in particular points of an early implanted superstition, and it is worthy of note that, twenty years after the death of Jeremiah, the Carthaginians, when their city was besieged by Athacli, offered as burnt-sacrifices to the planet Saturn, at the public expense, two hundred boys of the highest aristocracy; and, subsequently, when they had obtained a victory, they sacrificed the most beautiful captives in the like manner (Diod. xx, 14, 65). If such things were possible among the Carthaginians at a period so much later, it is easily conceivable how common the practice of sacrificing children may have been at the time of Jeremiah among the Phoenicians by sea and land; and this surely must have been certain to prevail among the Israelites who worshipped the same Phoenician gods: especially as, owing to the intermarriages of their forefathers with Carthaginians, there were probably few Israelites who may not have had some Phoenician blood in their veins (Judg. iii, 5). Again, parts of the Phoenician religion, especially the worship of Astarte, tended to encourage looseness in the relations of the sexes, and even to sanctify improprieties of the most abominable description. Connected with her temples and images there were male and female prostitutes, whose polluted gain formed part of the sacred fund appropriated to the service of the goddess; and, to complete the defamation of immorality, they were even known by the name of the "consecrated." Nothing can show more clearly how deeply this abominable worship prevailed among the Israelites than the repeated denunciations of the Hebrew prophets, than the almost incredible fact that, previous to the reformation of Josiah, this class of persons was allowed to have houses or tents close to the temple of Jehovah, whose treasures was perhaps even replenished by their gains (2 Kings xxvi, 7; Deut. xxiii, 17, 18; 1 Kings xiv, 24; xx, 12; xxxii, 46; Hose. iv, 14; Job xxxvi, 14; comp. Lucian, Lucius, c. 55; De Ded Syr., c. 27, 51; Gene- sis, Theaurus, a. v. θηματισμος, p. 1196; Movers, Phthi., ii, 65, etc.; Spencer, De Legibus Hebraeorum, i, 561).

A few words may be added here on Phoenician theology and cosmogony, which, as far as they are known to us, give evidence of the enormous amount of thought bestowed by the thinkers of that people on the enigma of creation. The Deity was, in accordance with the antique mind, presupposed. Speculation never questioned its eternal existence, the original quality of each of its two principal—male and female—sides, and the way in which, out of their union, sprang the universe. According to the system of Eudemus, Time, Desire, and Mind formed the first triad of existence; and from the embrace of the last two sprung air and "motion of air," out of which again was produced the mundane egg. The cosmogony, according to Sanchoniatho on the other hand, assumes, in the beginning of all things, a gloomy and agitated air, and a turbid chaos of thickest darkness, which for a long course of ages was without limits. The wind becoming enamoured with its own essence, Mot sprang into being, as a kind of thick, putrid fluid, which contained all germs. The first beings created from this were without intellect; and from them, again, came intellectual beings, Semiramis, the first woman, and brothers of the heavens. "And it began to shine Mot, also the sun and the moon, the stars and the great planets. The glowing sun, heating sea and earth, raised vapors, which produced clouds and winds, lighting and thunder, and at their crash the beings began to awake in terror, and male and female from earth and sea." The wind Kolpis further produced with Beza (בזא of Genesis) Aion and Protophos, the first mortals. Aion first discovered the art of nourishment from fruit-trees: and their children, Genos and Genea, who dwelt in Phoenicia, first worshipped Baalamin, or the sun. Genos begat Light, Fire, and Flame, out of whom came giants, Cassios, Libanios, Antillibanus, and Brathys. Their sons invented the art of cultivating vineyards and oliveyards, and the art of making coverings for the body out of the skins of wild beasts. After them the inventors of hunting and fishing, the discoverers of iron, of the art of navigation, etc. One of their descendants was Elies, who was the first who contrived an instrument of gold with which he could distinguish the Good priest was Melchisedec, Gen. xiv, 18, etc.; Abraham, in his reply to the king of Sodom, emphatically adds "Jehovah" to El-Elyon, who with his wife Beruth begat an Autochthon, afterwards called Uranos (heaven), and his sister Ge (earth). They had issue four sons, Ibis, Belythus, Dagon, and Atlas; and three daughters, Astarte, Rhea, and Diane. Chronos deposited his father, subsequently killed him, and travelled about in the world. He then assigned the whole of Phoenicia to Astarte, to Athens he gave Attica, and to Taut Egypt. The country being involved in war, he divided it among his sons and his eight daughters, and then, and his eight sons, and his eight nephews: and that was the beginning of the gentile race, and Amos. Two sons, Jud and Muth (Mith, Pluto), in expiation. He afterwards bestowed the city of Byblos upon the goddess Baalitis (Dione), and Berytus upon Poseidon and the Kakbris. Taut made the first images of the countenances of the gods Cronus and Dagon, and formed the sacred characters of the other elements; and the Kakbris, the invention of the Hellenic language, and the brother of China, the first Phoenician.

5. Language.—The most important intellectual invention of man, that of letters, was universally asserted by the Greeks and Romans to have been communicated by the Phoenicians to the Greeks. The earliest written statement on the subject is in Herodotus (v, 57, 58), who incidentally, in giving an account of Harmodius and Aristogeiton, says that they came from Phoenicians, and the prophets who presided over the mysteries, and to their successors, one of whom was Iasis, the inventor of three letters, the brother of China, the first Phoenician. of which invented them, or on the universal belief of antiquity that the knowledge of them was communicated to the Greeks by the Phoenicians. The answer is as follows: Hebrew literature is as silent as Greek literature respecting the precise date of the invention of letters; of the name of the inventor or inventors; but the names of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet are in accordance with the belief that the Phoenicians communicated the knowledge of letters to the Greeks: for many of the names of letters in the Greek alphabet, though without meaning in the Hebrew, have a meaning in the corresponding letters of Hebrew. For example: the first four letters of the Greek alphabet, Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, are not to be explained through the Greek language; but the corresponding first four letters of the Hebrew alphabet, viz. Aleph, Beth, Gimel, Daleth, being essentially the same words, are to be explained in Hebrew. Thus in Hebrew Aleph or Eleph means an ox; Beth or Bayith a house; Gamal, a camel; and Daleth a door. The same is essentially, though not always so clearly, the case with almost all the sixteen earliest Greek letters said to have been brought over from Phoenicia by Cadmus, Α Β Γ Δ Ε Ζ Κ Μ Ν Ο Π Ρ Σ Τ (and called on this account Phoenician or Cadmean letters (Herodot. l. c.; Pliny, Hist. Nat. vii, 57; Jelf, Greek Gram. i, p. 2). The sixth letter, afterwards disused, and generally known by the name of Delta (from Deltus, i. 20), was unquestionably the same as the Hebrew letter Yav (a hook). Moreover, as to writing, the ancient Hebrew letters, substantially the same as Phoenician, agree closely with ancient Greek letters—a fact which, taken by itself, would not prove that the Greeks received them from the Phoenicians, as the Phoenicians possibly might have received them from the Greeks; but which, viewed in connection with Greek traditions on the subject, and with the significance of the letters in Hebrew, seems reasonably certain. Two of the letters were transported from Phoenicia into Greek. It is true that modern Hebrew writing and the later Greek writing of antiquity have not much resemblance to each other; but this is owing partly to gradual changes in the writing of Greek letters, and partly to the fact that the character in which Hebrew Bibles are now printed, called the Assyrian or square character, was not the one originally in use among the Jews, but seems to have been learned in the Babylonian captivity, and afterwards gradually adopted by them on their return to Palestine (Gesenius, Græck. der hebr. sprache und schrift, p. 150). See Alphabet.

As to the mode in which letters were invented, some clow is afforded by some of the early Hebrew and the Phoenician characters, which evidently aimed, although very rudely, like the drawing of very young children, to represent the object which the name of the letter signified. Thus the earliest Alpha has some vague resemblance to an ox’s head, Gimel to a camel’s back, Daleth to the door of a tent, Yav to a hook or peg. Again, the written letters, called respectively, Lamed (an ox-crook), Ayin (an eye), Qoph (the back of the head), Resh or Rosh (the head), and Tav (a cross), are all efforts, more or less successful, to portray the things signified by the names. It is said that this is equally true of Egyptian phonetic hieroglyphics; but, however this may be, there is no difficulty in understanding in this way the formation of an alphabet: when the idea of representing the component sounds or half-sounds of a word by figures was once conceived. But the original idea of thus representing sounds, though peculiar to the Hebrew, was by no means obvious, and contumacies of men have lived and died without its occurring to any one of them.

It may not be unimportant to observe that, although so many letters of the Greek alphabet have a meaning in Hebrew or Phoenician, yet their Greek names are not in the Hebrew or Phoenician, but in the Aramaic form. There is a peculiar form of the noun in Aramaic called by grammarians the status emphaticus, in which the termination d (נ) is added to a noun, modifying it according to certain laws. Originally this termination was probably identical with the definite article "ha;" which, instead of being prefixed, was subjoined to the noun, as is the case now with the definite article in the accentuating and vocative cases. This form is not to exist in the oldest specimen of Aramaic in the Bible, יִֽעֲרָן sakudath, in Gen. xxxi, 47, where sakudath, testimony, is used by Laban in the status emphaticus. Now it is worthy of note, that the names of a considerable proportion of the "Cadmean letters" in the Greek Aramaic form, such as Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, Eta, Theta, Iota, Kappa, Lambda, and although this fact by itself is not sufficient to support an elaborate theory on the subject, it seems in favor, as far as it goes, of the conjecture that when the Greeks originally received the knowledge of letters, the names by which the several letters were taught to them were Aramaic.

It has been suggested, indeed, by Gesenius, that the Greeks themselves made the addition in all these cases, in order to give the words a Greek termination, having been acquainted with other Phoenician words, as mele, μᾶλα, melē, melē. But, if, however, a list is examined of Phoenician words naturalized in Greek, it will not be found that the ending in a has been the favorite mode of accommodating them to the Greek language. For example, of the words specified by Hesychius (Ambigua in loc. 69) as having been communicated through the Phoenicians to the Greeks (see above), it is remarkable that only four end in a in Greek which have not a similar termination in Hebrew; and of these four one is a late Alexandrian translation, and two are names of musical instruments, which, very probably, may first have been communicated to Greeks, through Syrians, in Asia Minor. Under any circumstances, the proportion of the Phoenician words which end in a in Greek is too small to warrant the inference that any common practice of the Greeks in this respect will account for the seeming fact that nine out of the sixteen Cadmean letters are in the Aramaic status emphaticus.

The inference, therefore, from their endings in a remains unshaken. Still this must not be regarded in any way as proving that the alphabet was invented by those who spoke the Aramaic language. This is a wholly distinct question, and far more obscure; though much deference on the point is due to the opinion of Gesenius, who, from the internal evidence of the names of the Shemitic letters, has arrived at the conclusion that they were invented by the Phoenicians (Pudographia, p. 29). The strongest argument against the Aramaic invention of the letters is that, although doubtless many of the names are both Aramaic and Hebrew, some of them are not Aramaic—at least not in the Hebrew signification; while the Syrians use other words to express the same ideas. Thus לִבְנָן in Aramaic means only 1000, and not an ox; the word for "door" in Aramaic is לְבָנָה, but לִבְנָן; while the six following names of Cadmean letters are not Aramaic: תַּוָּן, דֵּגְגֶפֶּה, נַדְּ, מַסְסָמִית. As this obviously leads to the conclusion that the Hebrews adopted Phoenician as their own language, or, in other words, that what is called the Hebrew language was in fact "the language of Canaan," as a prophet called it (Isa. xix. 18), and this not merely poetically, but literally and in philological truth; and as this is repugnant to some preconceived notions respecting the Hebrews and Semitic people, the question as to the reason why the Israelites might not have translated Canaanitish names into Hebrew. On this hypothesis the names now existing in the Bible for persons and places in the land of Canaan would not be the original names, but merely the translations of these names. To this question is. 1. That there is not the slightest direct mention, nor any indirect trace, in the Bible, of any such translation. 2. That it is contrary to the analogy of the ordinary Hebrew practice in other cases: as, for example, in all ancient languages, as for instance, the Persian monarchs (perhaps of a foreign dynasty) Pul, Tigrath-Piasek, Sennacherib, or of the Persian monarchs Darius, Ahasuerus, Artaxerxes, which remain unintelligible in Hebrew, and may only be understood through other Oriental languages. 3. That there is an absolute silence in the Bible as to there having been any difference whatever in language between the Israelites and the Canaanites, although in other cases where a difference existed that difference is somewhere alluded to, as in the case of Egypt (Isa. xxi, 8), the Ammonites ( Isa. xxi, 11), and the Chaldees (Jer. v, 15). Yet in the case of the Canaanites there was stronger reason for alluding to it; and without some allusion to it, if it had existed, the narrative of the conquest of Canaan under the leadership of Joshua would have been singularly imperfect.

The Phoenician language, however, certainly belonged to that family of languages which, by a name not altogether free from objection, but now generally adopted, is called "Semitic." Under this name are included all the languages of the Semitic and Roman races, which besides Æthiopic is an offshoot of the Southern Arabic or Himyartic. A. Aramaic, the vernacular language of Palestine at the time of Christ, in which the few original words of which Hebrew have been preserved in writing appear to have been spoken (Matt. xxvii, 46; Mark viii, 28), is a Semitic language, which is not fully significant either in Greek or Hebrew. Aramaic, as used in Christian literature, is called Syriac, and as used in the writings of the Jews has been very generally called Chaldee. C. Hebrew, in which by far the greater part of the Old Testament was composed. Now one of the most interesting points to the Biblical student connected with Phoenician, is, that it does not belong to either of the first two branches, but to the third, and that it is in fact so closely allied to Hebrew that Phoenician and Hebrew, though different dialects, may practically be regarded as the same language. This may be shown in the following way: (1) In passages which have been frequently quoted (see especially Gesenii Monumenta Scripturae Linguanae Pheneciaric, p. 291), testimony is borne to the kinship of the two languages by Augustine and Jerome, in whose time Phenician or Carthaginian was still a living language. Jerome, who was a good Hebrew scholar, after mentioning, in his Commentaries on Jeremiah (lib. v, c. 25) that Carthage was a Phoenician colony, proceeds to state (lib. vi, c. 50) that in the Carthaginian "appellantur, quorum lingua Hebrew lingue magis ex parte confinis est." Augustine, who was a native of Africa and a bishop there of Hippo, a Tyrian colony, has left on record a similar statement several times. In one passage he says of the two languages, "Istae linguae non multum inter se different" (Quaestiones in Heptateuchum, vii, 16). In another passage he says, "Vulgata sunt istae lingue et vicine, Hebrew, et Punica, et Syra" (In Jeroam. Tract. 15). Again, on Gen. xviii, 9, he says of a certain mode of speaking (Gen. viii, 9), "Quod verbum Phoenicius ex eis est, et quod verbum Hebrew ex eis est, "et quod verbum Hebrew ex eis est," (Contra Helers Petri- lian, ii, c. 104). (2) These statements are fully confirmed by a passage of Carthaginian preserved in the Pseudo Plantus (act v, scene 1), and accompanied by a Latin translation as part of the play. There is no doubt that the Carthaginians and the Phoenicians were the same nation, and that the Carthaginian extract is undoubtedly intelligible through Hebrew to Hebrew scholars (see Bochart's Canaan; and especially Gesenii Monumenta Pheneciaric, p. 857-862, where the passage is translated with notes, and full justice is done to the previous translation of Bochart). (3) The close kinship of the two languages is, moreover, strikingly confirmed by very many Phenician and Carthaginian names of places and persons, which, destitute of meaning in Greek and Latin, through which languages they have become widely known, and having sometimes in those languages occasionally false etymologies, become really significant in Hebrew. Thus through Hebrew it is known that Tyre, as Tidur, signifies "a rock" referring doubtless to the rocky island on which the city was situated: that Sidon, as Teidon, signifies "Fishing" or "Fishery," which was probably the occupation of its first settlers: that Carthage, or as it is finally called, "Carthada," means "New city," or "New town" in Byrras, which, as a Greek name, suggested the mythological mythus of the Bull's Hide (Aeneid, i, 386, 387), was simply the citadel of Carthage—"Carthagini accem," as Virgil accurately termed it: the Carthaginian name of it, softened by the Greeks into Byrrhes, being merely the Hebrew word Botzrah, "citadel," identical with the word called Bokrath in the English Version of Isa. xxvii, 1. Again, through Hebrew, the names of celebrated Carthaginians, though sometimes disguised by Greek acquisitions, e.g., and Roman writers, e.g., which belong to the same root as David, "beloved," meaning "his love" or "delight:" i. e. the love or delight either of Baal or of her husband: Hasdrubal is the man whose help Baal is: Hamilcar the man whom the god "Milar graciously granted" (comp. Haman); and, and, which means "beloved of El or God," the name of the renowned Hannibal is found to be identical in form and meaning with the name of Hannibal, who is mentioned in Num. xxxiv, 28 as the prince of the tribe of Manasseh: Hanniel meaning the grace of God, and Hannibal the grace of Baal. (4) The same conclusion arises from the examination of Phenician inscriptions, preserved to the present day; all of which can be interpreted, with more or less certainty, through Hebrew. Some of these will be more particularly noticed below.

III. Literature.—1. Original Remains.—With the exception of Greek and Latin, no language was so widely known and spoken throughout antiquity as the Phenician; and monuments of it have been found, and continue to be found, almost all over the ancient world. We can only vaguely speculate on its early history and its various phases, so long as our materials yield so little information on that point. Its decline seems to date from the 8th century B.C., when Aramaism crept in and overwhelmed numbers. Finally, the close contact which it had with, and the ever-increasing influence of the Greeks, superseded—chiefly after Alexander's time—the ancient language almost completely; and even coins with Phenician legends occur not later than the 2d century B.C.

An important Phenician literature seems to have been extant as late as the 1st century A.D., but it has disappeared from the face of the earth. After the second half of the 8th century the language had vanished entirely in the country itself, and Jerome, who lived in Palestine, mentions the Punics, but never the Phenicians.

In the West it was received by the Romans, who, after returning from Mauritania and Numidia it remained, in a corrupted form, the reigning tongue as late as the 4th century A.D.; and Augustine draws his explanations of Scripture from the Punics current in the 5th century. There was a translation of the whole Bible for the use of the Latin churches; and in and near Tripolitania was the language of the common people up to a late period. From the 6th century, however, it rapidly died out, chiefly in consequence of the Vandals, Goths, Moors, and other foreign tribes overrunning the country, and interfering with the use of the language.

The literature of Phenicia, in its original form, has, as we have said, perished entirely. What traces and fragments we have of it have survived in Greek translations. But from even these small remains we can easily imagine the extreme antiquity, and the high importance and vast extent of these productions, which, at first, seem to have been chiefly of a theological or theogonical nature. Their authors are the gods them- selves, and the writings are only accessible to the priest, and to those initiates in the mysteries. From the allegorical explanations of these exalted personages sprang a new branch of sacred literature, of which those fragments of cosmogony mentioned above are derived. To the literary age of Tassus, Cadmus, Opilion, Eumaeus, etc., succeeded Thalion, Iariz, Sanchoniatho, and Mo- chus, who founded the schools of priests and propheta. These cultivated the sciences, chiefly the occult ones, magic, and the like. Nearest to the sacred literature stands didactic poetry, somewhat related to the Orphic, whose chief representatives are Sisê, Jopas, etc. The erotic poetry is characterized as of a very sensuous na- ture, both in Phoenicia and the colonies. Of historians are mentioned Mochus, Hyphasis (Sanchoniatho?) Theodotos, Philostratus, Menander, and others; but these are mere Greek versions of their Phoenician names, and absolutely nothing has been preserved of their writings. Punic literature is also frequently men- tioned by Greek and Roman writers. Geography, his- tory, agriculture, were the fields chiefly cultivated by the colonists of Carthage and the West generally.

The monuments of have come down to us, and which not only have enabled us to judge for ourselves of the religion, the language, and the manners of the Phoenicians, are either original, as legends on coins and lapidary inscriptions, or at second hand, as Phoenician proper nouns and texts imbedded in the works of an- cient classical or sacrificial writers. The principal and ever-growing source for our information, however, is the monumental inscriptions, of whose existence, till the middle of the 18th century, nothing was known. The most numerous Phoenician remains have been discovered in the colonies. Richard Pococke first found, on the site of ancient Citium (Larnaka of to-day), thirty-one (not thirty-three, as generally stated) Phoenician inscriptions, which he deposited at Oxford (published by Swinton, 1750). Malta, Sardinia, Carthage, Algiers, Tripolis, Athens, Marseilles, have each yielded a consid- erable number, so that altogether we are now in the possession of about one hundred and twenty monu- ments, either votive tablets or tomb inscriptions. The latest and most remarkable are those now in the British Museum, discovered at Carthage a few years ago by N. Davis, consisting of votive tablets, swordstone, and a sacrificial tariff, which completes another stone found some years ago at Marseilles of the same nature; both setting forth the amount of taxes, or rath- er the proportionate share the priest was entitled to re- ceive for each sacrifice. An- other exceedingly valuable (trilingual) inscription, refering to the gift of an altar vowed to Eshmun-Aklespius, has lately been discovered in Sardinia (see below). One of the most important historical monuments is the sarcophagus of Eshmunazar II, king of Sid- on (son of Tennes?), found at Tyre in 1855, the age of which has variously been conjectured between the 11th century B.C. (Ewald)—a most incongruous guess indeed—the 7th (Hit- zig), the 6th (due De Loynes), and the 4th (due Levy); of which we shall add the commence- ment, literally translated:

before my time, in the flood of days—in dumbness ceases the son of gods. Dend do I lie in this tomb, in the grave, on the soil which I have built. I myself declare that all the nobles and all the people shall not open this place of rest; they shall not seek for treasures and not carry away the sarcophagus of my resting-place, and not disturb me by mounting the couch of my slumberers. If people should speak to thee in the presence of all the people, do not listen to them. For all the nobles and all the people who shall open this sarcophagus of the place of rest, or carry away the sarcophagus of my resting-place, may they find no rest with the depart- ed; may they not be buried in a tomb, and may no son and successor succeed them in their place,” etc. (see Thomson, Land and Book, i, 198 sq.)

The votive tablets bear the same character through- out, differing only with respect to the name of the man or woman who placed it in a certain sanctuary in accordance with his or her vow. Their material is mostly limestone or fine sandstone, rarely marble, and they vary from 5 to 15 inches in height, from 4 to 7 in width, and from 1½ to 4 in thickness. Beginning in most cases with the dedication to a god or goddess, or both, thus: “[Sacred] To the god . . . . [this tablet] which vowed N. son (daughter) of X. When he (she) heard my voice and bless’d: I heard your voice and bless’; etc.

The sepulchral tablets generally run somewhat in this fashion. Other stones erected to . . . . who lived . . . . years. Much yet remains to be done. Even the palæographical side has, notwithstanding all the ready means at our mete- rial, not been settled satisfactorily yet. One point, however, is indis- putably even now. There are at least 2,742 names in this Phoenician writing to be distinguished most clearly. The older, purer, more orthographical, and more neatly executed, is found in the inscriptions of Phoenicia her- self, of Malta, Athens, Citium, and Carthage; the younger, corrupted not only with respect to the grammar and lan- guage, but also with respect to the form of the letters, which are less carefully executed, and even exhibit some strange, probably degenerate characters, is found chiefly on the monuments of Cyprus, Cilicia, Sardinia, Africa, Spain, Numidia, and the adjacent parts. Besides these languages for the language, there are a few remnants of it embedded, as we said, in ancient non-Phoenician writings. The Old Testament alone, however, has preserved its words—proper nouns chiefly—unalterated. Later eastern writers even, not to mention the Greeks and Romans, have corrupted the spelling to such a degree that it is often most puzzling to trace the original Semitic words. Phoenician names occur in Suidas, Dioscorides, Apuleius, in martyrlogies, calendaries, Acts of Councils, in Church fathers (Au- gustine, Priscianus, Servus), etc. The only really important remains of preserved—all fear- fully mutilated and Latinized—in Plautus’s Ponzus, act v, scene 1 of which contains, in sixteen lines, the Phoenician translation of the Latin text, with more than one hundred Phoenician words. Several other phrases and words are embodied in act v, scenes 2 and 3 of the same play. Yet, although there is very little with which the British Museum (now the wealthiest in Phoenician monuments) has lately been enriched, as mentioned before. The emblems on it are symbolical, and refer to the deities invoked. The lower part is mutilated, but easily supplied. The date is uncertain, perhaps the 2d or 3d century B.C. The second is a trilingual inscription from a base of an altar recently found at Pauli Gerrei, in Sardinia, and has been fully explained by Deutsch (see Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature, 1864). Its contents are briefly this: A certain Cleon, Phoenician by religion, Greek by name, Roman by nationality, a salt-farmer, vows an altar—material and weight of which are only given in Phoenician: viz. copper, a hundred pounds in weight—to Sheshmun-Akelepios “the Hicher” (the Phoenician Merroch, clumsily transcribed Merre in Latin, and Mirre in Greek), in consideration for a cure to be performed. The date, given in Phoenician, viz. the year of two, apparently annual, entirely unknown judges, given no clue to the time. Palaekographical reasons, however, would place it in the 1st century B.C.

2. Modern Authorities.—Among those who have more or less successfully occupied themselves with Phoenician antiquities, language, and literature, and who have also, in some instances, deciphered inscriptions, we mention Scaliger, Bochart, Pococke, Barthélemy, Swinton, Porter, Dutens, Hamaker, Gesenius, Movers, Munck, Judas, Bargès, De Saulcy, Ewald, Levy, Vaux, Rénan, De Laynes, De Vogüé, Deutsch, and others; to whose writings, contained either in special works or scattered in Transactions of learned societies, we refer for further information on the subject of our article.

In English, see Kenrick’s Phœnicia (Lond. 1855); in Latin, the second part of Bochart’s Geographia Sacra, under the title “Canaan,” and Gesenius’s work, Scriptura Lingvæque Phœniciorum Monuments quosquot superstant (Leips. 1837); in German, the exhaustive work of Movers, Die Phönizier und das Phönizische Altreich (Berlin, 1841-1856, 5 vols.); Gerhard, Kunst der Phönizier (ibid. 1848); an article on the same subject by Movers, in Erch and Gruber’s Encyclopædia, and an article in the same work by Gesenius on Polychrographe. See likewise Gesenius, Gesch. der Hebräischen Sprach und Schrift (Leips. 1815); Bleek, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (Berl. 1860). Phoenician inscriptions discovered since the time of Gesenius have been published by Judas, Études de philologie, de la langue Phénicienne et de la langue Libyque (Paris, 1847), and forty-five other inscriptions have been published by the abbe Bourgade (ibid. 1862, fol.). In 1846 a votive tablet was discovered at Marseilles, respecting which see Movers, Phönizische Texte (1847), and Judas, Analyse (Var. 1857), and Études (ibid. 1857). On the sarcophagus of Ezzan-asser, see Dietrich, Zwei Sidonische Inschriften, und eine alte Phönizische Königsinschrift (Marburg, 1850), and Ewald, Erklärung der grossen Phönizischen Inschrift von Sidon (Göttingen, 1856, 4to; from the seventh volume of the Abhandlungen der Königl. geograph. Gesellschaft zu Göttingen). Information respecting these works, and others on Phoenician inscriptions, is given by Bleek, p. 64, 65. PHOENIX, the name of a mythical Egyptian bird, supposed by some to be a kind of plover, like the ibis, often depicted with human arms, and called in hieroglyphs ṭtu. Others consider it to be the borus, or nycticorax, a bird sacred to Osiris, and represented watching in the tamaraik over his coffin. The first of these representations has sometimes a star upon the head, supposed to indicate the astronomic period of its appearance. It visited Egypt after the death of its father, and entered the shrine particularly dedicated to it at Heliopolis, and there buried its parent, putting the body into an egg or case made of mvrrh, and then closing up the egg. Another account is that the Phenix, when about to die, made a nest for itself in Arabia, from which a new Phenix sprang of itself. This bird proceeded to Heliopolis, and there burned and buried its father. But the more popularly known version is that the Phenix burned itself, and a new and young Phenix sprang from the ashes. A less received version is that a worm crawled out of the body of the dead Phenix, and became the future one. The Phenix was, according to the most authentic accounts, supposed to visit Egypt every five hundred years; the precise period, however, was not known at Heliopolis, and was a subject of contention till its appearance. The connection of the Phenix period with that of the Sothic cycle, appears to be generally received by chronologists, as well as the statement of Horapollo, that it designated the source of the waters of the Nile. A great difference of opinion has prevailed about the Phenix period: according to Elian, it was a cycle of 500 years; Tactius seems to make it one of 250 years; Lepsius, a cycle of 1500 years. The Phenix was said to have four times appeared in Egypt: 1, under Setosis; 2, under Amasis, 860-525 B.C.; 3, under Ptolemy Philadelphia, 284-246 B.C.; and lastly, 34 or 36 A.D., just prior to the death of Tiberius. The Phenix also appears upon the coins of Constantine, 354 A.D., viz. 300 years after the death of Christ, who was considered the Phenix by the monastic writers. It is supposed by the rabbinists to be mentioned in the Bible (Job xxix. 18; Ps. cxxii. 5). See Herodotus, ii, 73; Achilles Tatius, iii, 25; Tactius, 4th vi, 29; Telztes, Chil. v, 397; Lepsius, Einzelt, p. 183; Archæologia, xxx. 256. The East is full of fables resembling the phenix. Thus the Simorg of the ancient Persians is said to have witnessed twelve catastrophes, and may yet see many more. It has built its nest on Mount Kaf, and perched upon the branches of the Yodgar, or tree of life; it predicts good or evil to mortals. Similar legends seem to be found connected with the Robh of the Arabians and Smeruol of the Hindos. The Jews also have their sacred bird Teisl. See Gardner, Faith of the World, ii, 655, 656.

Phonascus (φωνασκός, a singing-master), a name given in the ancient Christian Church to the individual who acted as preceptor (q. v.), or led the psalmody in divine service. This appellation seems to have been used first in the 4th century, and is still employed in the Greek Church.

Phorcos or Phorcys, a Homer sea-god, to whom a harbor in Ithaca was dedicated. He is said to have been the son of Pontus and Ge, and to have been the father, by his sister Ceto, of the Gorgons, the Hesperian dragon, and the Hesperides. By Hebe he was the father of Seyla.

Poros (πόρος), an incorrect Greek form (1 Esdr. v, 19; ix, 26) of the Heb. name (Ezra ii, 3; viii, 3) Parosi (q. v.).

Phos (φῶς, light), and its allied term Photisma (Illumination), are generally applied in the ancient Christian Church to baptism, from the great blessings supposed to arise from it. Hence baptized Christians were sometimes called ψωφικούς, the enlightened, and the baptistery ψωφιστερία, place of enlightenment. The same terms were also applied to the Lord’s Supper.

Riddle, Christian Antiquities, p. 484, 485, 553. See also Baptism (Names of 5).

Phosphorus (φωσφόρος, light-bringer), a surname of Artemis, Eos, and Hecate. This was also the name given by the Greek poets to the planet Venus when it appeared in the morning before sunrise.

Photia Hagia (φωτια για, holy light), a term anciently used to denote the festival of Epiphany, as being commemorative of Christ’s baptism. See Epiph.

Photinius is the name of those Christian heretics who denied Christ’s divinity. They derived their views from Photinus of Sirmium (q. v.). They flourished in the 4th and part of the 5th century.

Photinus of Sirmium, an Eastern ecclesiastic, noted as the founder of a heretical body, flourished near the middle of the 4th century. Of his origin and earliest history we know nothing. He was a pupil of Marcellus of Ancyra, and was for a time deacon under him. Later Photinus was made bishop of Sirmium, in Pannonia. He was a person of unusual accomplishments, and was generally respected for his learning. Even while yet connected with Marcellus, heretical tendencies were manifest in Photinus. Once advanced to the bishopric, he soon fell away from all restraint, gradually abandoned orthodox associations, and suddenly changed, after having taught the people the knowledge of the true God, to those pernicious Sabellian notions for which his teacher had been condemned. According to Vincentius Xirinensis, he went even further than Macarius, and added to the impurities of Sabellius, Paulus Samosatenus, Cerinthus, and Eboni, this distinctive formula, that “Christ was not only mere man, but began to be the Christ when the Holy Ghost descended upon him in Jordan.” In other words, “that Jesus Christ was born of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary; that a certain divine emanation, which he called the Word, descended upon him; and that, because of the union of the divine Word with his human nature, he was endowed with the power of God, and even God himself; and that the Holy Ghost was not a person, but merely a celestial virtue proceeding from the Deity.” Hence, while the Oriental Church could suffer Marcellus to remain within the fold, it could not tolerate the man who would teach such extreme heresy. At a synod held at Milan in 345, the doctrine was also rejected and condemned: and while thus discredited by both the East and the West, he yet managed to retain his episcopal office until A.D. 351, when a Semi-Arian council at Sirmium removed him. For a time restored to the emperor Julian, he was soon again deposed, and died in exile, probably near the close of the 4th century. His writings are lost. His doctrines we learn from the anathemas of those synods which sat in judgment over them. See, besides the literature just mentioned, the article Marcellus, Hefele, Concil. etch. vol. i. (J. H. W.).

Photisma. See Phos.

Photisterion (φωτιστηρίων), a place of illumination, being a term frequently used in the ancient Christian Church to denote the baptistery, or the place of baptism, that ordinance being supposed to be attended with a divine illumination of the soul. See Phos. This name might also be used for another reason, namely, because baptisteries were the places in which instruction was communicated previous to baptism, the catechumen mortised his 8th of the 4th century. In the Acta Andreas, i., 574, etc., is given an account of the martyrdom of St. Lucillius, and several others who are said to have suffered at Byzantium under persecution under Aurelian. The account bears this title: "Φυλάττω τοῦ μακροπάθους σεμελόροκά τῶν Ἀγίων Ἀγαθάνων καὶ λογοδίη τῆς ημῶν ἑρωτάρατος Νουκλάκεως; Sancti Martyri Lucilliæ Exomia, auter brevissima Photii, Sanctorum Apostolorum Speciosissimae ac Logothetae. Of the writer Photius, nothing further appears to be known than is contained in the title, namely, that he was keeper of the sacred vessels in the great church of the Apostle at Constantinople, which was second in importance only to that of St. Sophia; and that he must be placed after the time of Constantine, by whom the church was built. The Ex omia is given in the Acta Sanctorum in the original Greek, with a Commentarius prærior, a Latin version, and notes by Conrado Jamnngus. See Fabricius, Bibl. Græcæ, 2, 271, 678; Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. s. v.

PHOTIUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE (2), also an Eastern ecclesiastic, flourished in the 5th century as presbyter of the Church at Constantinople, and was one of the most decided and active supporters of the unfortunate heresiarch Nestorius (q. v.). When Antonius and Jacobus were sent, some time before the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, to convert, by persecution, the Quartemicians and Novatians of Asia Minor, they were sent to some of their converts at Philadelphia, not the Nicene Creed, but one that contained a passage deemed heretical on the subject of the Incarnation, which excited against them a charge of heresy, which was brought before the Church at Philadelphia. In these proceedings Antonius and Jacobus were supported by Photius, who, not only gave them letters at the commencement of their mission, attesting their orthodoxy, but procured the deposition of their opponents. Chargés, who then presented a complaint to the Council of Ephesus (Concil. vol. iii. col. 673, etc., ed. Labbe). Tillemont is disposed to ascribe to Photius the answer which was drawn up to the Epistola ad Superioris of Cyril of Alexandria. A certain Photius, a supporter of Nestorius, was banished to Petra, about A.D. 438 (Lupus, Ad Epistulæ Constantin. P. xlv. Epistulae, cap. cxxxviii), whom, notwithstanding the objections of Lupus (not in loc.), we agree with Tillemont in identifying with the presbyter of Constantinople (Tillemont, Mémoires, xiv, 300, 332, 494, 607, 775).

PHOTIUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE (3), one of the most eminent men whose names occur in the long series of the Byzantine annals, flourished in the 9th century. In the preparation of this article we depend very largely upon Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. s. v.

Lifr.—The year and place of his birth, and the name of his father, appear to be unknown. His mother's name was Irene: her brother married one of the sisters of Theodora, wife of the emperor Theophilus (Theoph. Contin. lib. iv. 22); so that Photius was connected by affinity with the imperial family. We have the testimony of Nicetas David, the Papaglou, that his lineage was illustrious. He had at least four brothers (Montagu, Not. ad Epist. Photii, p. 138), one of whom, the eldest, enjoyed the dignity of patronian. Photius himself, in speaking of his father and mother, celebrates their crown of martyrdom, and the patient spirit by which they were adorned, during the reign of Theophilus or some other of the Iconoclastic emperors. This is the more likely, as Photius elsewhere (Epist. 2, Encycl. § 45, and Epist. ad Nicol. Popam) claims as his relative Tarsius (probably great-uncle), patriarch of Constantinople, who was one of the great champions of imperial worship, who shows the side taken by his family in the controversy. The ability of Photius would have adored any lineage, and his capacious mind was cultivated, as the testimony even of his opponents and his extant works show, with great diligence. "He was accounted," says Nicetas David, the biographer and panegyrist of his contemporary Ignatius, "one of the most eminent for his secular acquirements, and his understanding of political affairs. For so superior were his attainments in grammar and poetry, in rhetoric and philosophy, yea, even in medicine, and in almost all the branches of knowledge beyond the limits of theology, that he not only appeared to excel all the men of his own day, but even to bear comparison with the ancients. For all things combined in his favor: natural adaptation, diligence, wealth, which enabled him to form a comprehensive library; and more than all these, the love of glory, which induced him to pass whole nights without sleep, that he might have time for reading. And when the time came (which ought never to have arrived) for him to intrude himself into the Church, he became a most diligent reader of theological works" (Vita Ignatii aphor. Cod. vol. viii, ed. Labbe). It must not, however, be supposed that Photius had wholly neglected the study of theology before his entrance on an ecclesiastical life: so far was this from being the case, that he had read and carefully analyzed, as it were, his Bibliotheca. His chief work was a Greek ecclesiastical writers of all ages, so that his attainments in sacred literature might have shamed many a professional divine. Thus highly connected, and with a mind so richly endowed and highly cultivated, Photius obtained high advancement at the Byzantine court. He held the dignity of a proto- or chief-secretary, and chief-justice (Codex. In offic. CP. p. 86, ed. Bonn); and, if we trust the statement of Nicetas David (L.c.), of protopatrabius, a name originally denoting the chief sword-bearer or captain of the guards, but which became, in later times, a merely nominal office (Codex. ed. p. 285). To these dignities may be added, on the authority of Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Concil. Octavi Hist. apost Concin. vol. viii, 962, ed. Labbe), that of senator; but this is, perhaps, only another title for the office of proto- or chief-secretary (Greiser, et Gaur. Not. in Cod. p. 242). Besides these official duties at the capital, he was also occasionally employed on missions abroad; and it was during an embassy "to the Assyrians" (a vague and unsatisfactory term, denoting apparently the court of the caliph, or of some of the other powers of Upper Asia) that he read the works enumerated in his Bibliotheca, extracted from the critical notices of them which that work contains—a striking instance of the energy and diligence with which he continued to cultivate literature in the midst of his secular duties and when away from home. Of the date of this embassy, while engaged in which he must have resided several years at the Assyrian court, as well of the other incidents of his life before his elevation to the patriarchate of Constantinople, we have no knowledge. He could hardly have been a young man at the time he became patriarch.

The patriarchal throne of Constantinople was occupied in the middle of the 9th century by Ignatius (s. v.), who had the misfortune to incur the enmity of some few bishops and monks, and also of Bardas, who was all-powerful at the court of his nephew Michael, then a minor. Ignatius had excommunicated Bardas on a charge of incest, and Bardas, in retaliation, caused the patriarch's deposition, and the election of Photius in his place. Though a layman, and, according to some statements, under excommunication for supporting Gregory, less than a week sufficed, according to Nicetas David (ed.), for the casting off of the excommunication, and the establishment of the needful subordinate gradations: the first day witnessed his conversion from a layman to a monk; the second day he was made reader; the third day deacon; the fourth, presbyter; and the sixth (Christmas-day, A.D. 858) beheld his promotion to the patriarchate, the highest ecclesiastical dignity in the empire. Nicetas (ibid.) states that his office was irregularly committed to him by secular hands. Photoius himself states that his bishopric was confirmed by the apostolic see, and by the pope Nicholas I (apud Baron. Amul. ad Ann. 859, § 16, etc.), states that the patriarchate was pressed upon his acceptance by a numerous assembly of the metropolitans, and of the other clergy of his patriarchate; nor is it likely that the Byzantine court would fail to secure a sufficient number of subsevzont bishops to give to the appointment every possible appearance of regularity. A consciousness that the whole transaction was violent and indefensible, whatever care might be taken to give it the appearance of regularity, made it desirable for the vicious party to obtain from the deposition of Photoius a resignation of his office; but Ignatius was a man of too lofty a spirit to consent to his own degradation. Photoius, however, retained his high dignity; the secular power was on his side; the clergy of the patriarchate, in successive councils (A.D. 858, 859), confirmed his appointment, though we are told by Nicetas David that the metropolitans exacted from him a written engagement that he would treat his deposed rival with filial reverence, and follow his advice; and even the legates of the Holy See were induced to side with him, a subversive action which might have been of value to the cause of the deposed patriarch of Alexandria Nicholas I. The engagement to treat Ignatius with kindness was not kept; in such a struggle its observance could hardly be expected; but how far the severities inflicted on him are to be ascribed to Photoius cannot be ascertained. The;. complexion of the latter would be likely to aggravate any disposition which he might feel to treat his rival harshly; for Nicholas, in a council at Rome (A.D. 862), embraced the side of Ignatius, and anathematized Photoius and his adherents; various enemies rose up against him among the civil officers as well as the clergy of the empire, and the minds of many, including, if we may trust Nicetas (ibid.), the kindred and friends of Photoius himself, were shocked by the treatment of the unhappy Ignatius. To add to Photoius's troubles, the Caesar Bardas appeared to have had disputes with him, either inflamed by the natural jealousy between the secular and ecclesiastical powers, or, perhaps, disappointed at not finding in Photoius the subserviency he had anticipated. The letters of Photoius addressed to Bardas (Epiatdate, 8), are marked with complaints against the diminution of his authority, of the ill-treatment of those for whom he was interested, and of the inefficacy of his own intercessions and complaints. However, the opposition among his own clergy was gradually weakened, until only five bishops remained who supported the cause of his deposed rival. The remaining bishops seceded from the deposed patriarch, Photoius labored zealously for a restoration of friendly feelings between himself and the Western patriarch Nicholas, however, spurred all advances, and in A.D. 863 anathematized and deposed Photoius anew. Of course the Roman patriarchate, failing to secure the aid of the Eastern emperor, could not give practical effect to the deposition, and Photoius remained in his place. In order to retaliate on Rome, he now assembled a council of the Eastern clergy at Constantinople (A.D. 867), in which the question was removed from the region of a personal dispute between the bishops to a controversy of doctrine and discipline between the churches of the East and West themselves. This council Photoius first brought forward distinctly certain grounds of difference between the churches, which, although considerably modified, afterwards led to their final separation. In all these doctrinal differences, the council condemned the Western Church, excepted Nicholas and his abettors, and withdrew from the communion of the see of Rome. The charge of heresy against the Church of Rome in general was embraced in the following articles: 1. That the Church of Rome kept the Sabbath as a fast; 2. That it permitted milk and cheese in the first week of Lent; 3. That it prohibited the marriage of priests; 4. That it confined the rite of anointing persons baptized to the bishops alone; 5. That it had corrupted the Nicene Creed by the addition of a new article which had the secular power whereby to carry its sentence into effect, the separation of the Eastern and Western churches became simply a schism, and as such lasted until the actual deposition of Photoius, A.D. 869. Of the conduct which controlled Photoius as a patriarch, in matters not connected with the struggle to maintain his position, it is not easy to judge. That he aided Bardas, who was elevated to the dignity of Caesar, in his efforts for the revival of learning, perhaps suggested those efforts to him, is highly probable from the bishops' letters to Photinius on the Contin. De Mich. Theophili Filo, c. 36. That he possessed many kindly dispositions is indicated by his letters. The charges of the fury of letters, and of cruelty in his struggles with the party of Ignatius, are, there is reason to believe, too true; but as almost all the original sources of information respecting his character and conduct are from parties hostile to his claims, we cannot confidently receive their charges as true in all their extent. The murder of Cesar Bardas (A.D. 866 or 867), by the emperor's order, was speedily followed by that of the second deposed patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 867, and the accession of his colleague and murderer, Basil I (the Macedonian). Photoius had consecrated Basil as the colleague of Michael; but after the murder of the latter he refused to admit him to the communion of the Church, recommending him to the senators and to the people, and unworthy to partake of the sacred elements. Photoius was for this offence immediately banished to a monastery, and Ignatius restored: various papers which the servants of Photoius were about to conceal in a neighboring reed-bed were seized, and afterwards produced against Photoius, first in the senate of Constantinople, and afterwards at the council held against him. This hasty change in the occupants of the patriarchate had been too obviously the result of the change of the imperial dynasty to be sufficient of itself. But the imperial power had now the same interest as the Western Church in the deposition of Photoius. A council (recognised by the Romish Church as the eighth ocumencal or fourth Constantinopolitan) was therefore summoned, A.D. 869, at which the deposition of Photoius and the restoration of Ignatius were confirmed. The council was in fact assisted by the circumstance that Ignatius took his place as patriarch at the commencement of the council. Photoius, who appeared before the council, and his partisans were anathematized and stigmatized with the most opprobrious epithets. He subsequently acquired the title of Nestorian, and was deposed from his see; for we can hardly give credence to the strange tale related by Nicetas (ibid.), who ascribes it to the fury and interpretation by Photoius of a certain genealogical document containing a prophecy of Basil's exaltation. It is certain, however, that he gained the favor of the emperor, but that he soon acquired a complete ascendancy over him; he was appointed tutor to the sons of Basil, had apartments in the palace assigned to him; and on the death of Ignatius, about A.D. 877, was immediately restored to the patriarchal throne. With writers of the Ignatian party and of the Romish Church this restoration is, of course, nothing less than a new irritation of the wolf into the sheepfold. According to Nicetas, he commenced his patriarchate by beating, banishing, and in various ways afflicting the servants and household of his deposed rival, and by using ten thousand arts against those who objected to his restoration as uncanonical and irregular. Some he bribed by gifts and honors, and by translation to wealthier or more eligible sees than those they occupied; others he terrified by reproaches and accusations, which, on their exposure, were refuted and altogether dropped. That, in the corrupt state of the Byzantine empire and Church, something of this must ever, was Photius from joining in the designs of Santabarren, that it was chiefly upon his urgent entreaties the emperor spared the eyes of Leo, which he had intended to put out. Basil died A.D. 866, and Leo V succeeded to the throne. He immediately sent word to Photius, that Santabarren; and, forgetful of Photius's interference, scrupled not to involve the patriarch in his fall. Andrew and Stephen, two officers of the court, whom Santabarren had formerly accused of some offence, now charged Photius and Santabarren with conspiring to depose the emperor, and to place a kinsman of John's on the throne. The charge appears to have been utterly unfounded, but it answered the purpose. An officer of the court was sent to the church of St. Sophia, who ascended the ambo, or pulpit, and read to the assembled people articles of accusation against the patriarch. Photius was immediately thrown into confinement, first in a monastery, afterwards in the palace of Pege; and Santabarren was brought in custody from Euchaita and confronted with him; the two accusers, with three other persons, were appointed to conduct the examination, a circumstance sufficient to show the nature and spirit of the whole transaction. The firmness of the prisoners, and the impossibility of proving the charge against them, provoked the emperor's rage. Santabarren was cruelly beaten, deprived of his eyes, and banished; but was afterwards recalled, and sent to Sclavonia, where he survived till the reign of Constantine V, the successor of Leo. Photius was banished to the monastery of Bordi, in Armenia (or rather in the Théma Armeniacum), where he seems to have remained till his death. He was buried in the church of a nunnery at Merdasgersia. The year in which his death occurred is not ascertained. Pagi, Fabricius, and Mosheim fix it in A.D. 891; but the evidence on which their statement rests is not conclusive. He must have been an aged man when he died, for he must have been in middle age when first chosen patriarch, and he lived after that event thirty years, and ninety years, it is said, was succeeded in the patriarchate by the emperor's brother Stephen, first his pupil, then his syneculus, and one of his clergy. (Theoph. Continu. lib. v. c. 100; lib. vi. c. 1-5; Symeon Magister, De Basili. Maced. c. 21; De Leone Basili. fil. c. 1; Geogr. Monarch. De Basili. c. 24; De Leone, c. 1-7.)

The character of Photius is by no means worthy of much respect. He was an able man of the world, but not influenced by the high principles which befitted his sacred office. Yet he was probably not below the average of the mendicant orders of his time, and certainly was not the monster that the historians and other writers of the Romish Church, whose representations have been too readily adopted by some moderns, would make him. A writer in the Edinburgh Review, xxxi, 829, says, "Very few men have been so very low as Photius—wicked—a great scholar and a consummate hypocrite—not only neglecting occasions of doing good, but perverting the finest talents to the worst purposes." This is unjust; he lived in a corrupt age, and was placed in a trying position; and, without bribing or extenuating his crimes, it must be remembered that his private character remains unimpeached: the very story of his being a eunuch, which, though not having the appearance of truth, shows at least that he was not open to the charge of licentiousness; his firmness is attested by his refusal of Basil from the communion of the Church, and his mercifulness by his intercession for the ungrateful Leo. It must be borne in mind also that his history has come down to us chiefly in the representations of his enemies. The principal ancient authorities have been silent on the course of this interesting period, and we have by no means cited all the places. We may add, Leo Grammaticus, Chronographia, p. 463-476, ed. PHOTIUS

Various notices and documents relating to his history generally, but especially to his conduct in reference to the schism of the churches, may be found in the Concilium, vol. ii, p. 115, and in the works of Hardouin; vols. xi, xvi, xvii, ed. Mans. Of modern writers, Baronius (Ann. Eccles. A.D. 858-886) is probably the fullest, but at the same time one of the most unjust. Hankius (De Byzantinae. Rerum Scriptoribus, pars i, c. 18) has a very ample memoir of Photius, which may be advantageous-ly compared with that of Baronius, as its bias is in its opposite direction. See also Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques, Siécle xi, p. 270, 4d ed. 1698. An essay by Francesco Fontani, De Photio Nova Roman Imperio Episcopi episcopi Scriptor Disputato, prefixed to the first volume of his Nova Kirchtoni Delici (Florence, 1765, 12mo), is far more candid than most of the other works by members of the Romish Church; and is in this respect far beyond the Mémoire sur le Patriarche Photius, by M. Weggelin, in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, année 1777 (Berlin, 1779, 4to., p. 440, etc. Shorter accounts may be found in Moeslein (Eccles. Hist., by Murdock, bk. iii, cent. ix, p. ii, c. iii, § 27-32), and in the works cited at the close of this article. Fabri (Liber ad litteras) lists the soundest of the questions arising out of the struggle of Ignatius and Photius for the patriarchate, or out of the contests of the Eastern and Western churches with regard to Photius. He has also given a list of writers respecting Photius, divided into 1. Those hostile to Photius; and 2. Those more favorable to him. Of the historians of the lower empire, Le Beau (Bib Empire, lib. xix, xx, etc.; Ixii, lxii, i-3) is outrageously partial, inflaming the crimes of Photius, and rejecting as untrue, or passing over without notice, the record of those incidents which are honorable to him. Gibbon (Decline and Fall, c. 53, 60), more favorable, has two separate, but brief and unsatisfactory, notices of the patriarch.

Writings.—The published works of Photius are the following: i. Мεμρηοδοδοι ή Βιβλια Μεροιοδο ης Μυριβολ ής ή σευ Βιβλιοθηκα. This is the most important and valuable of the works of Photius. It may be described as an extensive review of ancient Greek literature by a scholar of immense erudition and sound judgment. It is an extraordinary monument of literary energy, for it was written while the author was engaged in his embassy to Constantinople. At the request of his brother, Tarasius, who was much grieved at the separation, and desired an account of the books which Photius had read in his absence. It thus conveys a pleasing impression, not only of the literary requirements and extraordinary industry, but of the fraternal affection of the writer. It opens with a prefatory address to Tarasius, recapitulating the circumstances in which it was composed, and stating that it contained a notice of two hundred and seventy-nine volumes. The extant copies contain a notice of two hundred and eighty: the discrepancy, which is of little importance, may have been the mistake of Photius himself, or in some alteration of the editions by some transcriber. It has been doubted whether we have the work entire. An extant analysis, by Photius, of the Historia Ecclesiastica of Philostorgius (q. v.), by which alone some knowledge of the contents of that important work has been preserved to us, is so much fuller than the brief analysis of that work contained in the present text of the Bibliotheca, as to lead to the supposition that the latter is imperfect. "It is to be lamented," says Valaesi (De Crit. i, 29), "that many such judgments and collections of extracts are now lost. If these were extant in the state in which they were completed by Photius, we should grieve less at the loss of so many ancient writers." But Lelio has shown (Distratto in Phot. Biblioth.) that we have no just reason for suspecting that the Bibliotheca is imperfect; and that the fuller analysis of Philostorgius probably never formed part of it, but was made at a later period. The two hundred and eighty divisions of the Bibliotheca must be understood to express the number of volumes (códices) or manuscripts, and not of writers or of works. In some cases, the g. of Philo Judeus (cod. 103-105), occupy several divisions; and, on the other hand, one division (e. g. cod. 125, Justini Martyris Scripta Varia), sometimes comprehends a notice of several different works written in one codex. The writers examined are of all classes: some authors, however, are theologians, writers of ecclesiastical history, and of the biography of eminent churchmen; but several are secular historians, philosophers, and orators, heathen or Christian, of remote or recent times, lexicographers, and medical writers; only one or two are poets, and those on religious subjects, and there are also one or two writers of romances or love tales. There is no formal classification of these various writers: though a series of writers or writings of the same class frequently occurs, e. g. the Acta of various councils (cod. 15-20); the writings of the Lives and Legends of saints (cod. 21-24); the secular historians of the Byzantine empire (cod. 62-67). In fact, the works appear to be arranged in the order in which they were read. The notices of the writers vary much in length: those in the earlier part are very briefer, and held to determine the works of a recent perusal apparently enabling the writer to give a fuller account of them; so that this circumstance confirms our observation as to the arrangement of the work. Several valuable works, now lost, are known to us chiefly by the analyses or extracts which Photius has given of them; among them are the Periarch and Indices of Ctenias (q. v.), in cod. 72; De Rebus post Alexandrum Magnum gestis, and the Parthica and the Bibliotheca of Arrian, in cod. 53, 92, and 93; the Historiae of Olympiodorus (q. v.), in cod. 80; the Narrationes of Conon, in cod. 166; the Nova Historia of Pro- emy Hephæstion, in cod. 190; the De Heroicis Pontica Rebus of Memnon, in cod. 224; the Vita Isidori by Dama- nicus, in cod. 242; the lost Declarationes of Hime- rus, in cod. 248; the lost books of the Bibliotheca of Diodorus Siculus, in cod. 244; the De Eregionia (a Ru- bro) Maria of Agatharchides, in cod. 250; the anonymous Vita Pauli Cepidam and Vita Athanassii, in cod. 257 and 258; the lost Orations, genuine or spurious, of Antiphan, Isocrates, Lysias, Isaeus, Demosthenes, Hyperides, Deinarchus, and Lycusius, in cod. 259-266; and of the lost Homilies of Peter of Caesarea, in cod. 279; besides several theological and ecclesiastic- al and some medical works. The above enumeration will suffice to show the inestimable value of the Bibliotheca of Photius, especially when we reflect how much the value of his notices is enhanced by the soundness of his judgment. The first edition of the Bibliotheca was published by David Horschelius, under the title of Bibliotheca Photii, or Πεζοι, Λοιπον έιοπ Βιβλιον Patriarchia Excerpta et Censura (Augusta, 1601, fol.). Some of the Epitome of Photius were subjoined. The text of this edition is that of the first four MSS., and was accompanied with notes by the editor; but there was no Latin version. A Latin version and scholia, by Andreas Schottius of Antwerp, was published (thid. 1606, fol.) but the version is inaccurate, and has been severely criticized. It was, however, re- printed, with the Greek text, under the title of Πεζοι Μεροιοδοι δια Ηιβλοθηκον, or Ποτα Μυριβολ ις Ψευδον μειδρα ις Bibliotheca (Geneva, 1612, fol., and Rouen, 1658, fol.). This last edition is a splendid one, but inconvenient from its size. An edition, with a revised text, formed on a col- lation of four MSS. (whether any of them were the same as those employed by Horschelius is not mentioned), was published by Immanuel Bekker (Berlin, 1824-25, 2 thin vols. 4to.); it is convenient from its size and the copiousness of its index, but has neither version nor notes.

ηργογίου ἐντὸς ἐνυφῆς Φαύσιον ναύαρχου, Compendium historiarum Ecclesiasticarum. Philologorum quod dictavit Phot-ius patriarcha. Case regards this as a fragment of another work similar to the Bibliotheca, but his con-jectures concerning the date of this fragment are not very important, as preserving to us, though very imperfectly, an Arian statement of the ecclesiastical transactions of the busy period of the Arian controversy in the 4th century. It was first published, with a Latin version and copious notes, by Jacobus Golosynas (Go-defrozi) (Geneva, 1643, 4to); and was reprinted with the other ancient Greek ecclesiastical historians by Henricus Valesius (Vehubio Valvis) (Paris, 1673, fol.) and by Reading (Cambridge, 1720, fol).

morion, of, Nomonomos, of, Canones Ecclesiasticorum et Legum Imperiiustitum de Ecclesiasticis Disciplina Concilii a. Harmonicia. This work, which bears am-sible testimony to the extraordinary legal attainments of its author, is arranged under fourteen τίτλοι, Tituli, and was prefixed to a Συντομία τῶν συνόδων, Συνομομ Συνομογονα, or collection of the Canones of the apostles and of the ecclesiastical councils recognised by the Greek Church, compiled from Photius; from whichcircumstance it is sometimes called Προκομον, Prokonon.

It has been repeatedly published, with the commentatories of Theophanes, who annotated it, in preference to similar works of an earlier date: it appeared in the Latin version of Gentianus Hervetus (Paris, 1651, fol.), and in another Latin version of Henricus Agyraeus (Basle, 1651, fol.), and in the original Greek text with the version of Agyraeus, edited by Christophorus Justellus (Paris, 1615, 4to). It was reprinted, with the version of Agyraeus, in the Bibliotheca Juris Canonici, published by Guillelmus Vellius and Henricus Justellus (Paris, 1661, fol.), II, 785, etc. The Nomocanon was annotated by several of the same kinds of legal works mentioned by Photius, and by several of the same authors.

4. Περὶ τῶν 3 οἰκουμενικῶν συνόδων, De Septem Concilii Ecumenici. This piece, subjoined, with a Latin version, to the Nomocanon in the Paris editions of 1615 and 1661, and often published elsewhere, is really part of one of the Epitola of Photius, and is noticed in our account of them.

5. Εντομοὶ, Epitola. There are extant a considerable number of works of a similar character, containing them are enumerated by Fabricius (Bibl.

Græc. xi, 11). It is much to be regretted that no complete collection of them has been published. David Heschelius subjoined to his edition of the Bibliotheca (Augsburg, 1801, fol.), mentioned above, thirty-five letters selected from a MSS. collection which had belonged to Maximus Marginus, bishop of Cergo, who lived about the end of the 16th century. One consolatory letter to the nun Eusebia on her sister's death was published by Conrad Rittershausius, with a Latin version, with some other letters (Nürnberg, 1601, 8vo). Of this the largest collection is that prepared with a Latin version and notes by Richard Mountagu (Latinum Montagius), bishop of Norwich, and published after his death (London, 1651, fol.). The Greek text was from a MS. in the Bodleian Library. The collection comprehends two hundred and forty-eight letters translated by the bishop, and five letters supplied from the east by Christianus Ravius, of which also a Latin version by another person is given. The first letter in Mountagu's collection is addressed to Michael, prince of the Russians, and is a letter which is not now found to have formed a third part (Proetas, to Porson's edition). The Lexicon of Photius was first published, from Continental MSS., by Goethebus Herrmannus (Leipgre, 1688, 4to). It formed the third volume of a set, of which the first two volumes contained the MS. lexicon to Joannes Zonaras. The publication of the Lexicon of Photius

icon was followed by that of a Libellus Animadversionum od Photii Lexicon (Leips. 1810, 4to), and Curae Noticiorum exc. Appendit Notarum et Emendationum in Photii Lexicon (Leips. 1812, 4to), both by J. Fried. Schleuenter. But the edition of Hiermann having failed to satisfy the wants of the learned, an edition from a transcript of the Codex Galaeus, made by Porson, was published after the death of that eminent scholar (Lond. 1822, 4to and 8vo).

7. Amphilochia. Amphilochia. This work, which Al- latius, not a friendly censor, declared to be "a work filled with vast and varied learning, and very needful for theologians and expositors of Scripture," is in the form of answers to certain questions, and is addressed to Amphilochius, archbishop of Cyrus. The answers are said in one MS. (apud Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. xi, 26) to be two hundred and ninety-seven in number; but Mont- fauccon (l. c.) published an index of three hundred and eight, and a Vatican MS., according to Mai (Script. Vet. Nova Collectio, vol. i, Proleg. p. xxxix), contains three hundred and thirteen. Of these more than two hundred and twenty have been published, but in various fragmentary portions (Mai, l. c.). The first portion which appeared in print was in the Lectiones Antiquae of Cani- sius, vol. ii. p. 722, and is signed by a Latin version, by Franciscus Turrianus, of six of the Quaestiones; but the work to which they belonged was not mentioned. In the subsequent edition of the Lectiones by Bassage (Amst. 1725, 4to, vol. ii, pt. ii, p. 246, etc.), the Greek text of five of the six was added (the original of the sixth seems never to have been discovered), as well as the Greek text of a seventh Quaes- tio, De Christi Voluntatisse Gnomica, of which a Latin version by Turrianus had been published in the Actu- arium Antiquarum Canisii Lectiunum de Jesuit Petrus Stewartius (Incolae Græc. 1716), without notice, that it was from the Ampliolum. Further additions were made by Combeba, in his SS. Patrum Amphi- locii, etc., Opera (Paris, 1644, 2 vols. fol.) (by a strange error he ascribed the work not to Photius, but to Amphilochius of Iconium, a much older writer, from whose works he supposed Photius had made a selection), and in his Novum Auctarium (Paris, 1648), 2 vols. fol.; by Montfauccon, in his Bibliotheca Coelestium (Paris, 1715, fol.); and by Jo. Justus Spier, in Wittgenbergiani Anmerkungen über theologische, philosophische, historische, pothecariae Specimenes Anthologiae, etc., vol. ii. (Harl. Intro. in Historiae Lingue Græc. Supplem. ii, 47). But the principal addition was made by Jo. Chr. Wolff, of forty-six Quaestiones, published, with a Latin version, in his Curae Philologicae (Hamb. 1725, 8vo), vol. ii., which was reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland (Venice, 1778, fol.), vol. xiii. A further portion of Eighteen Questions, under the title Ece των Φωτιον Αμπλιλοχίων των, Ex Photii Amphilochiis quaestionum, was published, with a Latin version, by Angelus Antonius Schottius (Naples, 1617, 4to); and a second portion, one of twenty Quaestiones, with a Latin version by Mai, in his Scripturum Vetern Nova Collectio, i, 193, etc., and another of a hundred and thirty Questions, in i, x, i, etc. As many of the Questions were more extracts from the Epitoma and other published works of Photius, Mai considers that with these and with the portions published by him, the whole of the Ampliolum has now been published. He thinks (Scriptor. Vet. Nova Collect. vol. i, Proleg. p. xl) that the patriarch, towards the close of his life, compiled the work from his own letters, homilies, commentaries, etc., and addressed it to his friend Amphilochius, as a mark of respect, and not because the questions which were solved had actually been proposed to him by that prelate; and he thus accounts for the identity of many passages with those in the author's other writings.

8. Admiranda Manichaeos et Paulicenios Libri Quattuor. No Greek title of the whole work occurs, but the four books are respectively thus described: 1. Διήγησις της Μανιατικής αναβασισμάτων, Narratio de Mani- cheismi recepta repellendis. 2. Κατά της και λόγιας των Μανιατικῶν, Dicta et dictationes Manichaeorum. 3. Ταύτης των Μανιατικῶν εἰς, Photii Sermo III. 4. Κατά της των Μανιατικῶν ἀργύρων πλανής, Αρουρία τήν ἀγωνίαν μοναχοῦ προσβεβλητήν και ἑγομένην τῶν ἱερών, Contro repellendam Manichaorum errores, et, in Arsenium Monachum Sanctorum Predications et Præ- spectum Sermoonum. The title of the second book is con- sidered by Wolff to apply to the second, third, and fourth books, which formed the argumentative part of the work, and to which the first book formed a historical introduction. The second book is intended to show that the same God who created spiritual intelligences also created the bodies with which they are united, and the material world generally; the third vindicates the divine origin of the Old Testament; and the fourth reiterates some points of the second and third books, and answers the objections of the Paulicians. The first book has several points in common with his historical work of Petrus Siculo on the same subject, so as to make it probable that one writer used the work of the other, and it is most likely Photius availed himself of that of Petrus. This important work of Photius was prefixed in an Ancedot. Græc. vol. i, and Fabricius, Bibl. vili, 829x; xi, 18), but they were prevented from death from fulfilling their purpose. Montfauccon published the first book, with a Latin version, in his Bibli- theca Coelestium (p. 845, etc.); and the whole work was given by Jo. Christoph. Wolff, with a Latin version and notes, in his Ancedota Graeca (Hamb. 1722, 12mo), vols. i, ii, from which it was reprinted in vol. xiii of the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland (Venice, 1779, fol.). A sort of epitome of this work of Photius is found in the Panoplia of Euthymius Zigabenus. Oudin contended that the work of Metropoles of Smyrna, on the Mani- chaeans and on the Holy Spirit, was identical with this work of Photius; but this opinion is erroneous.

9. Κατά της τῆς παλαιας Ὀρθος ὅτι ἐν Πατριαρ- μαύνου εσιτερίζεται τὸ Πάντα τὸ ἄμα πάντα καὶ τὸ ἔξω. Adversus Latinos de Processione Spiritus Sancti a solo Patre. This work is incorporated in the Greek text of the Panoplia of Euthymius Zigabenus (Tergovist. 1710, fol. p. 112, 113), of which it constitutes the thirteenth rixvo section. It is omitted in the Latin versions of Photius. The author proves, by means of a number of synecologic propositions, which are quoted and answered seriatim in the De Unione Ecclesiarum Oratio I, of Jo- annes Vescus, published in the Grecia Orthodoxa of Allatius (Rome, 1632, 4to), i, 154, etc. It is apparently the work entitled Contra Manichaeos de Compendiario de Processione Spiritus Sancti a solo Patre.

10. Ὁμλογία, Homilia. Several of these have been published: (1) Ἐκφρασις τῆς ἀγαθῆς τῆς ἔνωσις τῆς ἡμῖν ἀληθείας τῆς θεοῦ ἡμᾶς ἡμῶν τῶν Μακεδῶν αἰσθανομένης, Descriptio Nova Sacramenti Dei in Patribus Graecis. (2) Εἰς τοὺς ἑτέρους ἑρωδοτο- done extracta; a discourse delivered on the day of the dedication of the church described. It was first printed by Lambebus, in his notes to the work of Georgius Codinus, De Origines Coptorum (Paris, 1635, fol.), p. 167, and is contained, with a Latin version, in the Beirut reprint of Codinius (1829, 8vo). It is also contained in the Origines Coptorum Manuscript of Combeba in Auctorium Novum (Paris, 1648, fol.), vol. i, col. 1583, and in a Latin version, in his Bibliotheca Patrum commis- soriae (Paris, 1602, fol.). Both text and version are repeated in his Bibliothecher in Patrum (3. 2.) In Sepulturarum Domini; a fragment, probably from this, is given by Mai (Script. Vet. Nova Collect. Pro-

(5. 4.) Πως τού μεν δύον πρὸς τὸν λοιπόν ιοσαρίσιον έχειν, θαυμάσσει ουδεποτέ ουδεποτέ (Vita Photii) έλεος Μολομοσσίως αττητικίως. This piece, which is perhaps not a homily, but the fragment of a letter, was published in the Eclogae Graecae Monumenta of Cotelierus, and has already been noticed in speaking of the Epitome of Photius. 11. Εκκλησία τίνα εἴτε τίνας τίνας απειραίως, Interrogationes decem sive totidem Responsoriius, s. Συναγωγή και αποδίκης ακρίβες συνηγγραμμένα τινὰς συνεδρίων και συναντησιων γράφων τὶς ισπανοὺς και ῥωμανους και λοιπὸν ἀληθείας ἐπιστολὰς τοὺς ψεύτης καὶ τὸν τὸν Θριάμβον της Θριάμβου τῆς Επίσκοπος καὶ Μεταποιείς καὶ τῆς καθολικῆς αὐτοκράτορος Quaestiones ex Synodica et Historica Monumenta excerpta. This piece was published, with a Latin version and notes, by Francesco Fontani, in the first volume of his Novae Eruditorum Deliciae (Florence, 1766, 12mo). The notes were such as to give considerable offence to the stricter Romanists. (Mai, Scriptor. Vet. Nov. Collect. Proleg. ad vol i. p. xlv.)

12. Κύθνῳ τῶν οὖν καρπῶν, In Locum Expositioes. Some brief scholia on the Gospel of Luke from MS. in the British Museum; and the first of three in the volumine Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collecta of Mai, p. 189, etc., but from which of Photius' works they are taken does not appear.

13. Canonica Responsa, addressed to Leo, archbishop of Calabria; also published, with a Latin version, by Mai (Med. p. 969), from a Palimpsest in the Vatican Library.

Many works of this great writer still remain in MS.: 1. Commentarius in D. Pauli Epistolam, a mutilated copy of which is (or was, according to Cave) in the public library at Cambridge. It is largely cited by Eusebius. 2. Catena in Psalmo, formerly in the Cossilian library, of which, according to Montfaucon, died in the Bibliotheca, p. 58, 59, Photius appears to have been the compiler. But the Commentary on the Prophets, Prophetae Liber, ascribed to him by Cave, Fabricius, and others, appears to have no real existence; the supposition of its existence was founded on the misapprehension of a passage in Possidinius' Apparatus Sacer (Mai, Proleg. ut sup. p. 1.). 3. Homiliae XIV, extant in MS. at Rome, of the subjects of which a list is given in the American Antiquarian Society. Nine are extant in the Bibliotheca at Paris; and three in an ancient Barberini MS. at Rome. The latter are described by Mai (Proleg. p. xlvii) as of moderate length, and written in pleasing verse. Some Epigrammata of Photius are said to be extant (Montfaucon, Bibl. Cossin. p. 239); but the Syriac, in Methodius C.Pol., said to be given in the Acta Sanctorum, Junii, i. 969, is not to be found there. 4. Εὐδοκία τῶν πρακτικῶν τῶν ἑκάστου εὐκοσμούντων συνεδρίων, Epitome Actuum Conciliorum septem Generationum. Nine are extant in the Bibliotheca at Paris; two in the Bibliotheca at Florence; and two or three in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. They are as different from the published piece (No. 4, above). Some critics have doubted whether it is different from the similar work ascribed to Photius of Tyre; but as this prelate lived in the time of the third or fourth councils, he could not have epitomized the Acts of the 6th, 6th, and seventh. Thus the Epitome cannot be by Photius of Tyre, whatever doubt may be as to its being the work of our Photius.

5. The Synopsis Canonum has already been mentioned in speaking of the Nomocanon. 6. Περὶ τῆς τοῦ ἀγίου κατακεραυνούμενος ἤτοι Δαμασκίνου, In Spiritum Sancti Diviæ Aegypti, s. Peri τοῦ ἄγιου καὶ διακριτοῦ καὶ παρεμποροῦντος Πνεύματος, Liber de Spiritu Sancto, addressed to a bishop Bedas, and different from the published work (No. 9). It is described by Mai, who has given some extracts (Proleg. p. xlvii), as "liber luculentus, varius, profundus. It is ascribed to one MS., but by an obvious error, to Metrophanes Smariosus.

8. Τὰ παρὰ τῆς ἑκκλησίας τῶν αὐτῶν αἰτίας μεταξύ, Adversus Latinorum Ecclesiæ Criminalia Particulares. 9. Contrae Franciæ et Latino (ibid. p. xlviii); a very short piece. Various other pieces are mentioned by Cave, Lambrius, Fabricius, and Mai, as extant in MS.; but some of these are only fragments of the published works (ibid. p. i) enumerated by mistake as separate works. The work in Catalogi Aristoteles, now or formerly extant in Vienna and Paris, is apparently a part of the piece mentioned by Cave in connexion with the works of Eusebius, andreligion aliis necessarissi Quaestiones ex Synodica et Historica Monumenta excerpta. This piece was published, with a Latin version and notes, by Francesco Fontani, in the first volume of his Novae Eruditorum Deliciae (Florence, 1766, 12mo). The notes were such as to give considerable offence to the stricter Romanists. (Mai, Scriptor. Vet. Nov. Collect. Proleg. ad vol i. p. xlv.)

PHOTIUS or TYRE, another Eastern ecclesiastic, flourished near the middle of the 6th century. On the deposition of Ireneus, bishop of Tyre, in A.D. 448, Photius was appointed his successor. Evagrius (Hist. Eccles., i, 10) makes the deposition of Ireneus one of the acts of the notorious Council of Ephesus, held in A.D. 449, and named as the "Concilium Lactacianum;" but Tillemont more correctly considers that the council only confirmed the previous deposition (Mémoires, xv, 268). Photius of Tyre was one of the judges appointed by the emperor Theodosius II, in conjunction with Eustathius, bishop of Berytus, and Uranias, bishop of Himera in Sicily, to hear the charges against Ibas, bishop of Edessa. Photius, Eustathius, and Uranias met at Berytus, and Photius and Eustathius again met at Tyre, in the year 448 or 449, heard the charges, acquitted Ibas, and brought about a reconciliation between him and his accusers, who were presbyters of his own Church at Edessa (Concil. vol. iv, col. 627, etc., ed. Labbe; vol. ii, col. 505, etc., ed. Hardouin). There is a considerable difficulty as to the chronology of these meetings, which is discussed by Tillemont in two of his careful notes (Mém. xx, 897, etc.). Photius was present at the Council of Chalcedon, known as the "Concilium Lactacianum," where he joined in acquitting the archimandrites Eutyches, and restoring him to his ecclesiastical rank from which he had been deposed (Concil. vol. iv, col. 260, ed. Labbe; vol. ii, col. 220, ed. Hardouin). About the same time Photius had a contest with Eustathius, bishop of Berytus, who had obtained an edict of the emperor Theodosius II, erecting Berytus into a metropolitan see, as to the extent of their respective jurisdictions. Tillemont judges that the dignity accorded to the see of Berytus was designed to be merely titular, and that the struggle was occasioned by the attempt of Eustathius to assume metropolitan jurisdiction over some bishops previously under the jurisdiction of Tyre. In this attempt, being supported by the patriarch Anastasios of Constantinople and Maximus of Antioch, he effected his purpose; and Photius, after a struggle, was constrained, not so much by an excommunication, which was speedily recalled, as by a threat of deposition, to submit. The jurisdiction of the dioceses abraded was, however, restored to Photius by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Concil. vol. iv, col. 509, etc., ed. Labbe; vol. ii, col. 455, ed. Hardouin). Photius was among those who at the same council voted that Theodoret was orthodox, and should be restored to his see (Concil. col. 619, ed. Labbe; col. 495, ed. Hardouin). He also took part in some of the other transactions of the assembly. Nothing further is known of him. There is extant one piece of Photius, entitled Ἀποκεφαλή, Proces s. Supplev. Libellus, addressed to the emperors Valentinian III and Marcian, respecting the dispute with Eustathius of Berytus. It is given in the Acta Quarta of the Council of Chalcedon (Concil. vol. iv, col. 514, etc., ed. Labbe; vol. ii, col. 436, etc., ed. Hardouin). A Synopsis de Concilia, extant in MS., is ascribed to Photius of Tyre: this cannot be, as some have supposed, the same work as the Epitome Actorum Conciliorum, also extant in MS., and ascribed to the more celebrated Photius, patriarch of Constantinople. See Tillemont, Mém. l. c.: Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 451, i, 443; Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. x, 678; xii, 538; Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog., and Mythol. s. v.

Phrenology (from φρέν, the mind, and λόγος, a discourse), an empirical science, which claims to rest on the vital peculiarities of individuals by means of the external developments of the skull. It had its origin with Franz Joseph Gall, a physician of Vienna, who first made it generally known by Dr. Spurzheim, of the same country, and by George and Andrew Combe, of Scotland. In this country it has been chiefly popularized by the late L. N. and O. S. Fowler. There is a sprightly periodical, called the Phrenological Journal, published in New York, devoted to its advocacy. In accordance with its theory of the special functions of particular portions of the brain, it has mapped out the cranium into various "organs," as amativeness, philoprogenitiveness, etc., in the animal order; ideality, veneration, etc., in the animal and vegetable; figure, time, motion, etc., in the perceptive, and so on. It has largely been used by itinerant lecturers as a method of indicating the character of unknown persons, somewhat after the fashion of fortune-telling. Its claims to scientific value are not generally admitted by sound physiologists and mental philosophers, as neither its craniological nor its psychologico-anatomical theory and analysis agree with the best settled principles of either of those departments of self-knowledge. Its theological bearings are decidedly materialistic. For a fuller exposition the reader is referred to the works of the writers above cited. See also Psychology.

Phrontisterion (φροντιστήριον, a place of meditation), a name anciently applied to a place of retreat as being peculiar to meditation and schools of learning. Baptisteries were also occasionally called by this name, the catechumens being there educated in religious truth.

Phrygia (Φρυγία, perhaps from φρύγιος, hence parcelled), an inland province of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Bithynia and Galatia, on the east by Cappadocia and Lycaonia, on the south by Lycia, Pisidia, and Isauria, and on the west by Caria, Lydia, and Myra. Perhaps there is no geographical term in the New Testament which is less capable of an exact definition. Many maps convey the impression that it was co-ordinate with such terms as Bithynia, Cilicia, or Galatia. But in fact there was no Roman province of Phrygia till considerably after the first establishment of Christianity in the peninsula of Asia Minor. The word was rather ethnological than political, and denoted, in a vague manner, the western part of the central region of that peninsula. Accordingly, in two of the three places where it is used, it is merely a term not intended to be precise (κατὰ διάφορα τῆς Φρυγίας καὶ τῆς Γαλατακῆς χώρας, Acts xvi, 6; εὑρίσκομενος κατὰ θύρας τῆς Γαλατακῆς χώρας καὶ Φρυγίας, Acts xviii, 23), the former having reference to the second missionary journey of St. Paul, the latter to the third. Nor is the remaining passage (Acts ii, 10) inconsistent with this view, the enumeration of those foreign Jews who came to Jerusalem at Pentecost (though it does follow, in some degree, a geographical order) having no reference to political boundaries. By Phrygia we must understand an extensive district, which extended its boundaries to several Roman provinces, and varying portions at different times. In early times Phrygia seems to have comprised the greater part of the peninsula of Asia Minor. It was subsequently divided into Phrygia Major on the south, and Phrygia Minor or Epicetus (acquired) on the north-west. The Romans divided the province into three districts: Phrygia Salutaris on the east, Phrygia Pacatiana on the west, and Phrygia Katakekaumene (the burnt) in the middle. The country, as defined by the specified limits, is for the most part level, and very abundant in corn and vines. It had a peculiar and celebrated breed of cattle, and the fine rawen-black wool of the sheep around Laodicea on the Lycus was in high repute. The Meander and the Hermus were its chief rivers. The Phrygians were a very ancient people, and are supposed to have been, along with the Galatae and the Phrygians, the aborigines of Asia Minor. Jews from Phrygia were present in Jerusalem at the PHYGrians or Cataphrygians (q. v.), a sect in the 24th century B.C., called Pythagoras, the country of Phrygia. They were orthodox in everything, setting aside this, that they took Montanus for a prophet, and Priscilla and Maximilla for true prophetesses, to be conscripted in everything relating to religion; as supposing that the Holy Spirit had abandoned the Church. See Montanism.

Phthas or Phthas, the supreme god of the ancient Egyptians, in the first four dynasties or successions of kings, extending about 3215 years. This god seems, however, in later times to have been degraded from his high position and become a secondary god. No image of this, nor indeed of any other god or goddess, is found upon the most ancient Egyptian monuments. The worship of Phthas passed from Egypt into Greece, and was altered into Hephaestus. "When, in later times," says Mr. Osborn, in his Religions of the World, "pictures and images of the gods made their appearance on the ruins of ancient Egypt, Phthas was represented as a tall youth, with handsome features, and a green complexion, denoting the swarthy, sallow hue which the burning sun of Africa had already impressed upon the skins of Phut and his descendants. He was swathed in white linen like a mummy to denote that he had been dead, but his hands had burst through the wrappings, and grasped many symbols, to denote that he has risen again. This god is made the son of many divine parents, according to the later fables, both of the monuments and of the Greek authors, most of them prompted by political motives: but not on the monuments of all epochs. The image of Phthas of Memphis is enclosed in a shrine, to denote that he claimed affinity with no other god, and that his real parentage was unknown or forgotten.

Phthartodocceus (from φθάρτος, destructible, and θοι, to seem). One of the numerous Monophysite sects. They were so called because they maintained that the body of Christ was truly corruptible before his resurrection. They opposed to another sect which affirmed that the body of Jesus was rendered incorruptible in consequence of the divine nature blended with it: these were called Aphthartodocceus, Phantasia, etc., and were likewise divided into parties, some of which debated whether the body of Christ was created or uncreated. See APHTARTODECEUS; MONOPHYSITES.

Phthartolatreo (φθάρτολατρευo, to worship), a term of reproach applied to the Severians (q. v.) in the 6th century, who maintained that Christ's body was corruptible of itself, but by reason of the Godhead dwelling in it was never corrupted.

Phud (Φυός), an incorrect Greek form (Jud. ii. 23) of the Heb. name (Ezek. xxvii, 10) Phut (q. v.).

Phurah (Heb. Perah, דַּבֶּר, bongh; Sept. Phaep), the servant of Gideon, who went with him by night to spy the camp of the Midianites (Judg. vii, 10, 11). I.C. 1362.

Phurmim (Esth. xi. 1). See PERIM.

Phut (Heb. פּוֹעָת, פְּעַת; Sept. Phoós or Phóur, but usually Ἐβρος, and so Josephus, Ant. i. 6, 2), the name of a people mentioned in connection with Miriam and Cush as third among the descendants of Ham (Gen. x. 6; "Put", 1 Chron. i. 8), elsewhere applied to an African country or people (Jer. xlvi. 9; Ezek. xxvii, 40; xxx v; xxxviii, 5; "Put", Nah. iii, 9. Comp. also Jud. ii, 28, in the Greek and Syriac). In all of these passages Phut or Phut is named with Cush, Ludim, and, Lumb. Putites served in the Egyptian army (Jer. l. c.; comp. Ezek. xxx, 6), and the Tyrian name (Exod. xxxvii, 20, and are numbered among the army of Gog (Ezek. xxviii, 5). Josephus (Ant. i. 6, 2) understands here the Mauritanian. He also mentions a river bearing the same name, in the territory of the Mauri, which is called Put by Flury (p. 342, ed. Hart.), and flows into the Atlantic. Ptolemy (iv. 1, 2) calls it Phokhoun (long. 74°, lat. 30°S), in Mauritania Tingitana (comp. Michael. Spicil. i. 160 sq.). These traces of the name, however, are not needed. That it is a name of Libya is sufficiently obvious from the Sept. in Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and from the fact that Ptolemaic is a Coptic name for Libya in Egypt—that is, for that part of Lower Egypt which lies west of the Canopic mouth of the Nile, so called (see Gesen. Thesaur. ii, 1093).

More recently Hitzig would identify with Put the tribe of Potyig, mentioned in the inscriptions at the tomb of Darius, and refers to Putes (Hieroc.), a city on the west bank of the river, in northern Africa (Ptol. iv. 8, 30). But no weight can be given to his remark that a people which served in the Egyptian army in foreign expeditions must not be sought in Western Africa—Winer. ii, 229. See LIMYA.

"In the above geographical lists Pthas, Phut, and Miriam, and precedes Canaan. The settlements of Cush extended from Babylonia to Ethiopia above Egypt, those of Miriam stretched from the Philistine territory through Egypt and along the northern coast of Africa to the west; and the Canaanites were established at first in the land of Canaan, but afterwards were spread abroad. The order seems to be ascending towards the north: the Cushite chain of settlements being the most southern, the Mirzaite chain extending above them, though perhaps through a smaller region, at least as far as the Canaanites holding the most northerly position. We cannot place the tract of Phut out of Africa, and it would seem that it was almost parallel to that of the Mirzaite, as it could not be farther to the north: this position would well agree with Libya. But it must be recollected that the order of the nations or tribes of the stocks of Cush, Miriam, and Canaan is not the same as that we have inferred to be that of the principal names, and that it is also possible that Phut may be mentioned in a supplementary manner, perhaps as a nation or country dependent on Egypt. The Hebrew names in the Bible clearly indicate, as already remarked, a country or people of Africa, and it must be added, probably not far from Egypt. It is noticeable that they occur only in the list of Noah's descendants and in the prophetic Scriptures. Isaiah probably makes mention of Phut as a remote nation or country, where the A. V. has Put, as in the Masoretic text (Isa. lxvi, 19). Nahum, warning Nineveh by the fall of No-Amon, speaks of Cush and Miriam as the strength of the Egyptian city, and Phut and Lubim as its helpers (iii. 9). Jeremiah tells of Phut in Nebuchadrezzar's war with Cush and Ludim (xlv. 9). Ezekiel speaks of Phut with Persia and Land as supplying mercenaries to Tyre (xxvii, 10), and as sharing with Cush, Lud, and other helpers of Egypt, in her fall (xxx, 5); and again, with Persia, and Cush, perhaps in the sense of mercenaries, as warriors of the army of Gog (xxxviii, 5). From these passages we cannot infer anything as to the exact position of this country or people; unless indeed in Nahum, Cush and Phut, Miriam and Lubim, are respectively connected, which might indicate a position south of Egypt. The serving in the Syrian army, and impact of Phut to Egypt, make it reasonable to suppose that its position was very near.

"In the ancient Egyptian inscriptions we find two names that may be compared to the Biblical Phut. The tribes or peoples called the Nine Bows, IX Petu or IX Na-Petu, might partly or wholly represent Phut. Their situation is doubtful, and they are never found in a geographical list, but only in the general statements of the power and prowess of the kings. If one people be indicated by them, we may compare the Naphthuhi of the Bible. See Naphthuhi. It seems unlikely that the Nine Bows should correspond to Phut, as their name does not occur as a geographical term in use in the directly historical inscriptions, though it may be supposed that several well-known names there take its place as those of individual tribes; but this is an improbable explanation. The second name is that of Nubia, To-per, "the region of the Bow," also called Tomeru-per, "the region, the island of the Bow," where we conjecture the name of Merioneth to come. In the geographical lists the latter form occurs in that of a people, Ana-meru-per, found, unlike all others, in the lists of the southern peoples and countries as well as the northern. The character we read Pet is an unstrung bow, which until lately was read Kene, as a strung bow is found following, as if a determinative, the latter word, which is a name of Nubia, perhaps, however, not including so large a territory as the names before mentioned. The reading Kene is extremely doubtful, because the word does not signify bow in Egyptian, so far as we are aware; and still more because the bow is used as the determinative of its name Pet, which from the Egyptian usage as to determinatives makes it almost impossible that it should be employed as a determinative of Kene. The name Kene would therefore be followed by the bow to indicate that it was a part of Nubia. This subject may be illustrated by a passage of Herodotus, explained by Mr. Harris, of Alexandria, if we may premise that the unstrung bow is the common sign, and, like the strung bow, so used as to be the symbol of Nubia. The historian relates that the king of the Ethiopians unstrung a bow, and gave it to the messengers of Cambyses, telling them to say that when the king of the Persians could pull so strong a bow so easily he might come against the Ethiopians with an army stronger than their forces (iii, 21, 22, ed. Rawlinson: Sir G. Wilkinson's note). For the hierarchical names, see Brugsch, Geogr. Inscr. ii, 15. The Coptic Piphaitat must also be compared with Phut. The first syllable being the article, the word nearly resembles the Hebrew name. It is applied to the western part of Lower Egypt beyond the Delta; and Chompet, the Egyptian conjectures it to be the Libyan or part of Egypt, so called by the Greeks, comparing the Coptic name of the similar eastern portion, Phypabia or Tapapia, the older Arabic part of Egypt and Arabic Nome (L'Egypte sous les Pharaons, ii, 28-31, 243). In this sense we would connect it with Naphthuhi than to Phut. To take a broad view of the question, all the names which we have mentioned may reasonably be connected with the Hebrew Phut; and it may be supposed that the Naphthuhi were Mizraites in the territory of Phut, perhaps intermixed with peoples of the latter stock. It is, however, reasonable to suppose that the Pet of the ancient Egyptians, as a geographical designation, corresponds to the Phut of the Bible, which would therefore denote Nubia or the Nubians, the former, if we are strictly to follow the Egyptian usage. This identification would account for the position of Phut after Mizraim in the list in Genesis, notwithstanding the order of the other names; for Nubia has been from remote times a dependency of Egypt, excepting in the short period of Ethiopian supremacy, and the longer time of Ethiopian independence. The Egyptian name of Cane, Khes, is applied to a wider region well corresponding to Ethiopia. The governor of Nubia in the time of the Pharaohs was called Prince of Kesh, perhaps because his authority extended beyond Nubia. The identification of Phut with Nubia is not repugnant to this conception; on the contrary, the great importance of Nubia in their time, which comprehended that of the Ethiopian supremacy, would account for their speaking of Phut as a support of Egypt, and as furnishing it with warriors. The identification with Libya has given rise to attempts to find the name in African geography, which we shall not here examine, as such mere similarity of sound is a most unsafe guide.

The name of Pitha, the chief deity of Memphis, has been considered by some Egyptologists to be the hieroglyphic transcription of Phut, the son of Ham, whose descendants were named in the names of the Libyan desert, as is demonstrated by the circumstance that the country named after Phut, in the Hebrew, is translated Libya by the Sept. (see Gesenius, Lexicon, s. v. פיתא). "The name Phut, in its change to Pitha," says Osnabruck, "has undergone an extraordinary process, highly characteristic of the modes of thought that prevailed in very ancient times. Written with the final a, which may be added to a Hebrew word without altering the sense, it represents the consonants of the verb 'to reveal,' which in the Coptic sense is 'to write hieroglyphics.' A still stranger use has been made of this pun upon the name of Phut. His animal representative has been named after the sacred dog, and there is a direct antagonism with that of the human original. The hieroglyphic name of the bull Apis, ḫp, is the Coptic verb ḫet, 'to hide,' which is a mere transcription of the ancient verb ἁφή, ἁφεῖν, with the same meaning. The comparison of the two groups renders this contrast very apparent. It will be seen that one group is as nearly as possible an inversion of the other. Both the names are in like manner in the state of exesis. In the bull Apis, therefore, were concealed the attributes which were revealed in Pitha" (Mon. Hist. of Egypt, ch. v).

Some late Egyptologists, however, regard Pet as a merely Egyptian pronunciation for Pa-un (Bunbury, Egypt, ii, 204), which is in direct antagonism with that of the human original. The hieroglyphic name of the bull Apis, ḫp, is the Coptic verb ḫet, 'to hide,' which is a mere transcription of the ancient verb ἁφή, ἁφεῖν, with the same meaning. The comparison of the two groups renders this contrast very apparent. It will be seen that one group is as nearly as possible an inversion of the other. Both the names are in like manner in the state of exesis. In the bull Apis, therefore, were concealed the attributes which were revealed in Pitha" (Mon. Hist. of Egypt, ch. v).

Phu'vah (Heb. פועסח, פועס, פועש, Sept. Φωυχα), the second named of four sons of Issachar (Gen. xlvi. 13). B.C. 1900. This name is also written "Pusa" in the A.V. (Numm. xxxvi. 23), and "Puesch," margin "Pruvah." (1 Chron. vii. 1). His descendants are called "Punites" (Numm. xxxvi. 23).

Phygel'ius (τός, φυγελίας, perh. s. fagevī), a Christian of Asia, who being at Rome during Paul's imprisonment, deserted him in his necessity (2 Tim. i. 15). A.D. 64. "It is open to question whether this repudiation of the apostle was joined with a declension from the faith in the doctrine of Christ, Excl. Apostles, ii, 310), and whether the open display of the feeling of Asia took place—at least so far as Phygelius and Hermogenes were concerned—at Rome. It was at Rome that Oneiphorus, named in the next verse, showed the kindness for which the apostle spoke in his blessing on his household in Asia: so perhaps it was at Rome that Phygelius displayed that change of feeling towards Paul which the apostle's former followers in Asia avowed. It seems unlikely that Paul would write so forcibly if Phygelius had merely neglected to visit him in his captivity at Rome. He may have forsaken (see 2 Tim. i. 16) the apostle at some critical time when his support was expected; or he may have been a leader of some party of nominal Christians at Rome, such as the apostle describes at an earlier period (Phil. i, 15, 16) opposing him there?" (Dean Alford, on 2 Tim. i. 15). In accordance with the ancient Greek commentators as to the exact force of the phrase 'they which are in Asia,' states various opinions concerning their aversion to Paul. The apostle himself seems to have foreseen it (Acts xx, 30); and there is nothing in the fact inconsistent with the general picture of the loss of Asia at a later period which we have in the first three chapters of the Revelation.

Phylactery (φυλακτήρος), a receptacle for safe
The slip is rolled up, put inside, tied with white and well-washed hairs of a calf or cow, generally obtained from the tail, and put into the box; a flap connected with the brim is then drawn over the open part and sewed firmly down to the thick leather brim, in such a manner as to form a loop on one side, through which passes a very long leather strap (נשף), wherewith the phylactery is fastened to the arm.

Phylactery for the Arm.

The box of which the phylactery for the hand (_pushqat) is made has on the outside to the right the regular three-pronged letter Shin, being an abbreviation for הַלּוֹ, the Almighty, and on the left side a four-pronged letter Shin (Sabbeth, 28 b). In the inside are four cells, in which are deposited four slips of parchment, whereon are written the same four passages of Scripture as on the one slip in the phylactery for the hand. The box is closed in the same manner, and a thong passes through the loop with which it is fastened to the head.

The phylacteries, like the Mesuah, i.e. the scrolls on the door-posts, must be written in Hebrew characters, while the law may be written in Greek (Mishna, Megila, i, 6). Every Jew, from the time that he is thirteen years of age, when he is considered a member... of the long leather strap three times around his middle finger, and the remainder around the hand, saying, "I will betroth thee unto me forever, yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercy, and thou shalt know the Lord" (Hos. ii. 19).

There is no special canon about the size of the boxes (םִנְיִי) which contain the slips, and thus constitute the phylacteries. They are generally made an inch and a half square, and are worn during morning prayer, except on Sabbaths and festivals, because these days belong themselves a sign (תָּמִיד) require no other sign or pledge (Maimonides, ibid. iv. 10). The pious Jews who are engaged in the study of the law, and in meditations, also wear them during these hallowed engagements; they make the phylacteries a little larger than the ordinary ones to give more space, and hence more distinctness to every letter and word composing the writing inside, and walk with the phylacteries on from one place to another. The hypocrites among the Pharisees imitated this, and made their phylacteries more than ordinarily large, so as to make them conspicuous and visible to any one at a distance, thereby to indicate that they were praying or in holy meditation, which our Saviour rebuked (Matt. xxiii. 5). If the phylacteries are written by an infidel they must be burned; and if written by a Samaritan, an informer, a slave, a woman, or a minor, it is unlawful and must be burnt up (Maimonides, ibid. i. 13). The Sadducees wore the phylacteries on the forehead or brow, and on the palm of the hand (Maimonides, ibid. iv. 8).

3. Origin and Design of the Phylacteries—It is the unanimous voice of Jewish tradition that the phylacteries are enjoined in Exod. xiii. 9, 16; Deut. vi. 8; xi. 18. It is true that Rashbam and Ahen-Ezra (on Exod. xiii. 9), who are followed by De Lyra, Calvin, bishop Patrick, H. Michaelis, Keil, etc., take the passages in question in a figurative sense. But against this the advocates of the usage urge that—(1.) It is inconceivable that the same declaration should be used four times figuratively, there being no parallel for such a usage throughout the whole Pentateuch. (2.) In two cases out of the four (Deut. vi. 9; xi. 20), the injunction is immediately followed by the command about the mezuzah, which is generally admitted to be literal [see Mezuza], and it is against all sound rules of exegesis to take one command in a figurative and the other in a literal sense. (3.) In every one of the four instances wherein the injunction is given, the expression הָנָךְ is used, which in all other passages of Scripture invariably denotes a visible sign, given either to attest an event or doctrine stated, or to forego passage, and at the same time to have remembrance. Now, on the supposition that the whole commandment is to be taken figuratively, it would be no sign whatever, and the term הֶשְׁכֵּר could not have been substituted for the technical expression הָנָךְ, as it is in Exod. xiii. 9. (4.) The end of the external action enjoined in the first clause of Exod. xiii. 9 is immediately introduced in the second clause by הָנָךְ, "that the law of the Lord may be in thy mouth," whereas, as Philo unnecessarily remarks, the simple command "thou shalt remember" would be required if the preceding words had the same internal figurative meaning. (5.) It was a common custom in ancient days for those who engaged in military service, or devoted themselves to the worship of a special deity, to be marked either on the forehead or on the head, or on both (Veges. de Mit. ii. 5; Herod. ii. 113; Lucian, De Igr. Dec. 59; Agost. Rev. vii. 281 sqq.). Thus the high-priest, as being especially consecrated to the service of Jehovah, had inscribed in the plate on the front of his head "Holiness to the Lord" (Exod. xxvii. 8), the ordinary servants of Jehovah were commanded to have a mark (Ezek. ix. 4, 9), and the gathering of Israel we are told that even the horses shall have written upon their bells "Holiness to the Lord" (Zech. xiv. 20); while the worshippers of the breast are represented as bearing his inscription on their foreheads and arms (Rev. vii. 3; xiii. 16-18; xiv. 9-11; xvi. 2; xix. 20; xx. 4). The Moaemon, Nusaireh and Bedawin Arabs, to the present day, either tie, or have tattooed, on their arms or the brow, the terms of the Tephillin, of the Koran. It was therefore natural that the Moaemon law, which forbids tattooing (Lev. xix. 28), should appropriate, for the service of the Most High, the innocent and generally prevailing custom, which the law-giver could not eradicate, of wearing ornamental tokens with inscriptions declaring that they belonged to Jehovah, and that the Lord is their Releemer. This universal custom would of itself be sufficient argument for taking the injunction in its literal sense, even if we had not the support of the ancient versions and the undeviating practice of the synagogue; and be it remembered that even the Sadducees, who rejected tradition and adhered to the simple meaning of the law, also wore phylacteries. As to the phrase "οὗτος ὁ ἐκ τῆς ἐδιδακτος us not to the "external front of the breast," but the tabulet which the ancients wore on their hearts. It is the same as αὐθηρία, which so frequently occurs in the Mishna (comp. Ked. xiv. 5, 6), and which the Targum and the Romanos Pugillares. This tabulet, when made of wood, was called τιμάλιον (Sir. xvi. 8; Habak. ii. 2); when of metal, it was termed ἡμετήρας (Sir. viii. 1), and when it was made of stone it was denominated θυρύρα ν. The argument of Spencer, that because the Sept. renders ἤπειρον αὐθηρίαν, and not φαλάκρινα, therefore this version did not understand it literally, "inter eos (qui legem illam sensu tantum metaphoricum exponendum consentent) LXX cum primum notandi venient, qui quod in Moesi est ἄθροιζεν ἐποιεῖ φαλάκρινα s. d. αὐθηρίαν translaturum" (De Leg. Hebr. ritus lib. iv. c. 2), ignores the fact that φαλάκρινα is a term which obtained at a much later period as an equivalent for ἦπειρον. Josephus, too, who like all the ancient and modern Jews takes the injunction literally, does not render ἦπειρον by φαλάκρινα. (Ant. iv. 8, 13). The fact is, that in very early days there was no fixed and technical term for these fringes. Hence Herzelf (Gesch. des Volkes Israel, ii. 223) has pointed out that the phylacteries are mentioned in 2 Kings xi. 12, where the high-priest is said to have put upon Joash "the crown and the ἄθροιζας and the ἀνάκαθις and the Tephillin and the Targum" supposes that the Tephillin are meant by ἄθροιζας (Isa. viii. 16). The injunction about the phylacteries was so generally observed among the Jews after the Babylonian captivity, that the writers of them found it most lucrative business. Hence we are told that "twenty-four fast days were ordained by the Great Synagogue, in order that the writers of the scrolls of the law, the phylacteries, and the mezuzah, might not grow rich, inasmuch as they were not allowed to write on these days" (Peschmich, 50 b). In harmony with the designation of the phylacteries, Maimonides propounds their utility, when he remarks: "The sacred influence of the phylacteries is very great; for as long as one wears them on his head and arm he is obliged to be meek, God-fearing, must not suffer himself to be carried away by laughter or idle talk, nor indulge in evil thoughts; but must turn his attention to the words of truth and uprightness." (Kitto). Not only would the later appendages, being regarded more or less in the light of amulets, engender superstition, has led interpreters generally to view the sacred injunction as a spiritual or figurative precept. This is the opinion of the Karaites, Goezeus, Schottgen (Her. Hist. i. 196), Rosenmuller, Hengstenberg (Pent. i. 486 sqq.), and most others. In Matt. xxiii. 5 only they are called φαλάκρινα, either because they tended to promote observance of the law (αὐθηρίαν ἐχεῖν τὸν Θεὸν, Just. Matt. Dial. c. Typh., p. 205, for which reason Luther happily renders the word by Dendeketel), or from the use of them as amulet (Lat. probat, Gr. ἁμαρτανέσθαι, John, xix. 35). Φαλάκρινα is the ordinary Greek word for an amulet (Plutarch, ii. 878 B, where φαλ = the Roman bull), and is used apparently with this meaning by a Greek translator (Ezek. xxiii. 18) for Διόνυσος, cushions (Rosenmuller, Schol. ad loc. i; Schleusner, Lex. in N. T.). Jerome (on Matt. xxiii. 5) says they were thus used in his day by the Persians, and he adds that the Christians in Persia and India invented certain Christian "mulicurae" for similar use of the Gospels ("παραμάνωσι, ἐπειδὴ ὁ Προερ. στὸν Ἰ. (comp. Chrysost. Hom. in Matt. 78). The Koran and other sacred books are applied to the same purpose by this day (Hottinger, Matt. Orient. i. 8, p. 301; De summis Orient. xvii s. q.). "The most esteemed of all Chessas is a Mūshaf, or copy of the Koran," Lane, Mod. Egypt. i. 388). Scaliger even supposes that phylacteries were designed to supersede those amulets, the use of which had been already learned by the Jews in Egypt. See AMULET. There was a spurious book called Phylact. Angelorum, where pope Gelasius evidently understood the word to mean "amulets," for he remarks that Phylactria ought rather to be ascribed to devils. In the holy places they were expressly forbidden by pope Gregory ("Si quis . . . phylactria usus fuerit, anathema sit," Sixt. Senens. Bibl. Sanct. p. 92; comp. Can. 86, Conc. Lat.). The expression "they make broad their phylacteries" (παραμάνωσι τὰ φαλάκρια τοῦ Θεοῦ, Matt. xxiii. 5) refers not so much to the broadening itself, which is as if it has been of a prescribed breadth, as to the case of the (παραμάνωσι) in which the parchment was kept, which the Pharisees (among their other pretentious customs, Mark vii. 3, 4; Luke v. 33, etc.) made as conspicuous as they could (Reland, Antiq. ii. 9, 15). Missed probably by the term παραμάνωσι, and by the mention of the ἄθροιζα, or fringe (Numb. xv. 38, Sept. μεμορφανον παραμάνωσι εἰς τα κράσια τῶν τερεμῶν) in connection with them, Epiphanius says that they were ἐπίστραμα παραμόρφωσεν, like the Romanos Pugillares, or the stripe on a Diocletian cloak (τὰ διέριζε τα τοποφορηματα φαλάκρινα εἰς ὄλους τοὺς ζευγαριδίους μοιομολογούς, c. Hier. iv. 38, Sixt. Sen. L. c.). He says that these purple stripes were worn by the Pharisees with fringes, and four pomegranates, that no one might touch them, and hence no one knew their name (Reland, Antiq. ii. 9, 15). But that this is an error is clearly shown by Scaliger (Elsch. Trikar. viii. 66 sqq.). It is said that the Pharisees wore them always, whereas the common people only used them at prayers, because they were considered to be even holier than the γυαλι, or golden plate, on the priest's tiara (Exod. xxviii. 86), since that had the sacred name once engraved, but in each of the Tephillin the tetragrammaton recurred twenty-three times (Carpov, App. Critic. 196). Again the Pharisees wore the tephalides above the elbow, but the Sadducees on the palm of the hand (Goodwyn, l. c.). The modern Jews only wear them at morning prayers, and sometimes at noon (Leo of Modena, l. c.). In our Lord's time they were worn by all Jews, except the Karaites, women, and slaves. Boys, when (at the age of thirteen years and a day) they become γυαλι, are taught (sons of the commandments), were bound to wear them (Baba Berac. fol. 22, 1, in Glossa), and therefore they may have been used even by our Lord, as he was by no means discommended their abuse. The suggestion was made by Scaliger (l. c.), and led to somewhat idle controversy. Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. ad Matt. xxiii. 5) and Otho (Lob. Rob. p. 636) agree with Scaliger, but Carpov (l. c.) and others strongly deny from this belief that the entire use of phylacteries arose from an error.
PHYLACTERY

The rabbins even declared that God wore them, arguing from Isa. lix. 8; Deut. xxxiii. 2; Isa. xlix. 16. Perhaps this was a pious fraud to induce their use; or it may have had some mystic meaning (Zohar, pt. ii, fol. 2; Carpoz, c. c.), but the rabbins disapproved the application of them to charm wounds or to lull children to sleep (Ibid. Leg. 253; Maimonides, De Idol. ii). He who wore them was supposed to prolong his days (Isa. xxxvi. 18), but those who did not was doomed to perdition, since he thereby broke eight affirmative precepts (Maimonides, Tracth. iv, 26). We have a specimen of this style of interpretation in the curious literalism of Kimchi's comment on Ps. i. 2. Starting the objection that it is impossible to meditate in God's law day and night, because of sleep, domestic cares, etc., he answers that for the fulfillment of the text it is sufficient to wear tephillins! In spite of these considerations, Justin (Dial. c. Tract. L. c.), Chrysostom, Euthymius, Theophylact, and many moderns (Baumgarten, Comm. i, 479; Winer, a. v. Phylact.), prefer the literal meaning. It rests, therefore, with them to account for the entire absence of allusion to phylacteries in the O. T. The passages in Proverbs (ut sup.) contain no such reference, and in Ezek. xxxvi. 17, "עון" means not a phylactery (as Jarchi says), but a turban (Genan. Theurun. p. 1889).

Phylllobia (from φύλλον, a leaf, and βιβλίον, to throw), a custom which existed among the ancient heathen nations of throwing flowers and leaves on the tombs of the dead. The Greeks were wont to lie on his funeral bed as if asleep, wearing a white robe and garland, the purple pall half hidden by numerous chaplets, and so was carried out to his burial before the dawn of day. The Romans, deriving the custom from the Greeks, covered the bier and the funeral pile with leaves and flowers. It is in an ancient custom in certain parts of England in our day to spread flowers on and around the body when committing it to the coffin. In Wales also, when the body is interred, females hasten with their aprons full of flowers to plant them on the grave. The practice of connecting flowers with the dead seems to have been of great antiquity, for an Egyptian of high rank was wont to be carried to his sepulchre in a sarcophagus adorned with lotus, had his tomb decked with vases and vases, and in great quantity covered with acacia leaves and flowers. The use of such occasions was no doubt connected with the idea of life after death.

Physician (σαφτός, rophé, a curer; iatropo). Among the Hebrews, as among the ancients generally, medical remedies (Exod. xxi. 19) were early (comp. Pliny, xxix, 5) dispensed by a special class, who probably derived their skill from the Egyptians (Gen. i. 1; comp. Herod. ii, 84; i. 1, 59; Jos. i. 39; 2 Kgs. ii. 14, 25; ii. 21; 1 Kgs. iv. 11; 5, 35), and eventually medical practitioners could be found even in the smaller cities of the land (Josephus, Life, 72; comp. Ant. xiv, 13, 10). Their remedies consisted mostly in salves (especially balsam, Jer. viii. 22, xlii. 11, ii. 8); comp. Prov. Alpin. Med. xiv. 118 sq.; and Luke x. 24; Mithus, Subb. xxiv. 4; including the oil, Josephus, War, i, 38, 5; Mithus, Berachoth, i, 2); leaves (Ezek. xxvii. 12, plasters (e. g. aqo, 2 Kings xx. 7); comp. Pliny, xxiii, 83; Strabo, xv, 718), and bathing in mineral springs (Josephus, Ant. xvi. 6, 5; Life, 16; War, i, 38, 5; ii. 21, 6); comp. John v. 2), or in flowing streams (2 Kings v. 10). Internal nostrums are again and again recommended in the Talmud (see the Mithus, Subb. xxiv. 3, xxvi. 11; Joma, viii, 6); in the Old Test. honey only is mentioned (Prov. xvi. 24), which still holds a conspicuous place among medicinal compounds in the East. Specimens of the Jewish prescriptions may be seen in Lightfoot on Mark v. 26 (the formula of the Recipe in Toorah). Surgical operations are mentioned in the Mithus (Subb. xxii. 5, 6; Chebuli, ii. 4; comp. Subb. vi. 5). Great curative virtue was attributed to anemias (Mithus, Subb. vi. 2, 10), incantations, charms, the touch of certain individuals, and other superstitions of a like character (2 Kings v. 11 (comp. Rosenmüller, Morgenst. iii. 227)); Josephus, Ant. xvi. 5, 11; especially in cases of hypochondria it suppose demonic possession. See Ant. iii. 7. DOMONIAC.

The priests (Luke xii, 14) were appointed by the law (Lev. x. xii) the civil health-warriors, not so much for the cure as for the inspection of the sick, or of persons suspected of certain maladies, and the instructions given to them, especially respecting endemic diseases, exhibit mous for their medicines (Odysse, iv. 229). Their aid was at first made use of, as among common people at all times, for surgery, and in the hospitals (and in medicine (Exod. i. 15: the "stools," "Αίματα," there spoken of were, according to Gesenius, Thea. Heb. p. 17, benches or seats on which the parturient females were seated; but the word, see Studien u. Krif, 1834, p. 81, 625, 641; 1842, p. 1048, will scarcely bear this signification, for, see Ewald, Gesch. Jer. i. 481, and Lengerke, Kenan, p. 387) were regularly employed (see Kall, De obliterat., matron. Heb. in Rph. Hambl. 1746). In later times Hebr. prescriptions obtained, which the prophets sometimes applied (2 Kings iv. 21; v. 10; viii. 7, xx; 7, xxvi. 19; which cases, although miraculous, excise the custom of seeking relief from that class of person); mostly for external injuries or complaints (Isa. i. 6; Ezek. xxx. 21; 2 Kings viii. 29; ix. 13), but sometimes for internal maladies (2 Chron. xvi. 12), and even for mental diseases (1 Sam. xvi. 16; comp. Josephus, Ant. vii. 2, 5); but these never reached any extensive degree of science (see Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. s. v. ΜΕΝ). The resort to physicians was very general before and especially after the exile (2 Chron. xvi. 12; Jer. viii. 22; Sir. xxxviii. 1; Mark v. 26; comp. Luke iv. 29; v. 21; viii. 43; see John vi. 2; 21, 6); and eventually medical practitioners could be found even in the smaller cities of the land (Josephus, Life, 72; comp. Ant. xiv, 13, 10). Their remedies consisted mostly in salves (especially balsam, Jer. viii. 22, xlii. 11, ii. 8); comp. Prov. Alpin. Med. xiv. 118 sq.; and Luke x. 24; Mithus, Subb. xxiv. 4; including the oil, Josephus, War, i, 38, 5; Mithus, Berachoth, i, 2); leaves (Ezek. xxvii. 12, plasters (e. g. aqo, 2 Kings xx. 7); comp. Pliny, xxiii, 83; Strabo, xv, 718), and bathing in mineral springs (Josephus, Ant. xvi. 6, 5; Life, 16; War, i, 38, 5; ii. 21, 6); comp. John v. 2), or in flowing streams (2 Kings v. 10). Internal nostrums are again and again recommended in the Talmud (see the Mithus, Subb. xxiv. 3, xxvi. 11; Joma, viii, 6); in the Old Test. honey only is mentioned (Prov. xvi. 24), which still holds a conspicuous place among medicinal compounds in the East. Specimens of the Jewish prescriptions may be seen in Lightfoot on Mark v. 26 (the formula of the Recipe in Toorah). Surgical operations are mentioned in the Mithus (Subb. xxii. 5, 6; Chebuli, ii. 4; comp. Subb. vi. 5). Great curative virtue was attributed to amulets (Mithus, Subb. vi. 2, 10), incantations, charms, the touch of certain individuals, and other superstitions of a like character (2 Kings v. 11 (comp. Rosenmüller, Morgenst. iii. 227)); Josephus, Ant. xvi. 5, 11; especially in cases of hypochondria it suppose demonic possession. See Ant. iii. 7. DOMONIAC.

a very careful observation, and afford apt and accurate symptoms. See LIPPMANN; PLAGUE. For the priests themselves, who, in consequence of being obliged to perform their services barefoot, were often liable to catch cold (see Kall, morbus sacerdotium, 1745), a special physician (medicus vicarius) was (in later times) appointed at the Temple (Lightfoot, p. 781). The priests must have obtained considerable anatomical knowledge (comp. the Talmudic abstract on osteology in the Mishna, Kolokoto, i. 9) from the daily slaughter of the animal sacrifices. On the subject generally, see Börner, Diss. de statu medicina ap. vet. Ebr. (Viteb, 1735); Lindingler, De Hebr. et. arte medicina (1774); Spengel, De medicinis Ebraior. diss. (Hal. 1789); comp. The superstitious credulity of modern Orientals as to curative means is proverbial, and has been proved by all travelers. The Arabs are ready to put faith in almost any Frank as a professional “medicine man” or khan (literally “wise man”), as they term all physicians. Prescriptions of all sorts are at once taken by them, however absurd; but they are generally unwilling to exercise the patience, care, self-restraint, and especially the cleanliness necessary to the duties of medicine. They expect sudden and immediate restoration, and invariably prefer extraordinary to simple remedies. All this is in keeping with the supernatural character of the no- trons ordinarily employed by them. Indeed, fatalism being the basis of Mohammedanism, a resort to direct divine power might naturally be expected. See Superstition.

“IT is a very prevalent notion among the Christians of Egypt that the Muslims are enemies to almost every branch of knowledge. This is an erroneous idea; but it is true that their studies, in the presence of war, are confined within very narrow limits. Very few of them study medicine, chemistry (for our first knowledge of which we are indebted to the Arabs), the mathematicas, or astronomy. The Egyptian medical and surgical practitioners are mostly barbers, miserably ignorant of the sciences which they profess, and unskillful in their practice; partly in consequence of their being prohibited by their religion from availing themselves of the advantage of dissecting human bodies. But a number of young men, natives of Egypt, are now receiving European instruction in medicine, surgery, anatomy, surgery, and other sciences, for the service of the government. Many of the Egyptians, in illness, neglect medical aid, placing their whole reliance on Providence or charms. Alchemy is more studied in this country than pure chemistry, andastrology more than astronomy” (Lane, Mod. Egypt., i. 239).

Physiognomy (from φυσις, nature, and γνωμον, an index), a method, rather than a science, of discovering the human character by means of the features, especially of the countenance. To some extent this is instinctively practiced, as all have learned to read the natural language of the tones, expression, gesture, etc., which sometimes accompany our emotions. There can be no doubt also that passions or states of mind habitually indulged imprint themselves upon the lineaments of the face, and so become an indication of character. But when it is claimed that this is invariably the case, and that it may be reduced to fixed rules of interpretation which will serve as an unerring guide, the principle becomes proverbially deceptive. Laverter is especially famous for his fanciful scheme on this basis; and by Campe the so-called “facial angle” was relied on for determining the comparative intellectual capacity of individuals; but experience has demonstrated the fallacy of all such arbitrary systems of physiognomy.

Physiology (from φυσις, nature, and λόγος, a discourse), the science of the animal constitution, especially in man. This branch of self-knowledge is evidently of the highest temporal importance, and lies at the basis of the practice of medicine. Modern education has recognized its claims by incorporating it among the common-school studies; and few of the coming generation, it is hoped, will be so ignorant as to labor under the popular delusions and superstitions to which its neglect in former ages has led.

PIAGGIA, TERAMO or ERASMO (also called Teramo di Zogoli), an Italian painter, was born at Zogoli, in the Genoese state, near the beginning of the 16th century. He was a friend of Giovio Brera, and died at Genoa in 1547. In conjunction with Antonio Semini he painted several pictures for the churches at Genoa, the most esteemed of which is an altar-piece of the Martyrdom of St. Andrea, in the church of that saint. Lanzi says: “None can witness this very beautiful altar-piece without seeing traces of Bra’s style, already enlarged and changed into one more modern.” He also painted several pieces by himself, at Genoa and at Chiavari.

PIASNENIC, JEAN JACQUES, a French canonist, was born in 1730 at Mur-de-Barrez (Aveyron). Being received as a lawyer in the Parliament of Paris (1747), he formed a connection with Claude Mey, one of the supporters of Jansenism, and both gave a great number of consultations and took a very active part in the affairs of the Jansenists. When one of the councils of public law and jurisdiction, the other gave himself entirely to practice relating to benefices. Although Pienses lost his sight in 1768, he lost nothing of his zeal for the cause which he maintained, and M. Dupin says, “There is no counsellor in the world who dictated more consultations.” He died in Paris Aug. 4, 1789. Unforeseen changes in ecclesiastical matters have rendered his works useless; they are, Traité de la Collation des Bénéfices (Par. 1754 and 1755, 5 vols. 12mo.) — De la Provisoire de la Cour de Rome à l’âge de Préséance (2 vols. 12mo.) — De la Succession, du Découlo et des Voeux (Paris, 1757, 5 vols. 12mo.) — De l’Incapacité des Grands (1758, 6 vols. 12mo.) — Des Commerces et des Réserves (3 vols. 12mo.) — Des Réparations et Reconstructions des Églises (Par. 1762, 4 vols. 12mo.; 1788, 5 vols. 12mo., ed. given by Camus). The first volume (the only one which appeared) of the Histoire de la Fête de la Conception is attributed to Piasnes. See Journal Chérétien (1758 and 1759); Camus et Dupin, Biblioth. chioise des Livres de Droit; Picot, Mémoires Ecclé. tom. iv; Feller, Dict. Hist.—Hoefler, Nouw. Dig., Générale, s. 32.

PIANO, GIOVANNI MARIA DELLE (called IL Molinaretto), a Genoese painter, was born at Genoa in the year 1660. According to Ratti, he studied under GIO. Battista Gaulli, whose style he adopted, and distinguished himself by some excellent works which he executed for the churches at Genoa, but more by the excellence of his portraits. Lanzi highly extolls his Decollation of St. John the Baptist, at Sestri di Ponente. He also says that he was particularly excellent in portraits, and that Genoa is full of his works in this branch. He was also invited to Parma and Piacenza, where he furnished the court with portraits, and executed some works for the churches. He was afterwards invited to Naples by king Charles of Bourbon, who appointed him his painter, with a liberal pension, and he continued in this service till his death in 1745.

PIARISTS is the name of a Roman Catholic order which was founded by St. Joseph Calasanza or Calasan- tius, a Spanish nobleman and priest, at Rome in 1607, and was approved by pope Gregory XV in 1622 as a congregation of regulated clergy, under the name Pitrae scholasticorum pueri novum, but under the name of the order itself Pitrae scholasticorum pueri novum, but under the name of the order itself. Paul V was the first pontiff to give encouragement to the work of this new celebrated order. Until that time Calasanz labor at Rome only, and was so remarkably successful in getting children for instruction under himself and his associates that his work was gladly accepted as that of a religious order by 1622. Calasanz was the first general of the congregation, and under his management it spread through Poland, Germany, Italy, and other countries. In 1680 the Frariesta had 38 houses in Germany, 29 in Italy, 82 in Hungary, 14 in Poland, and at least 2 in Spain. In Italy they have since been suppressed; and the only country in which the Frariesta conduct, at present, educational institutions of note is the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. In Cis-Lithuanian Austria, in 1570, they had 29 houses with 276 members; included in which were 4 under-gymnasia. The Frariesta take in their orders the usual monastic vows, a fourth—that of free instruction of youth. Pope Innocent XII granted them the privileges of the Begging Monks. Their dress is a long, black coat, like the overcoat of the Jesuits, and a mantle like theirs. At the head of the congregation stands the general, who is elected for six years, and to whom are subject the generals of the different societies or countries in which the order prevails. (J.H.W.)

PIAZZI, Girolamo Bartoloméo, an Italian Dominican, was born in the first quarter of the 17th century. He was highly esteemed by his confreres, and was at one time judge of the Inquisition. But the cruelty and injustice of the Roman Ultramontanists caused him to withdraw from the Church of Rome. He went over to England, and was admitted into the Church of England. He lived there many years at Cambridge, and died there about 1745. He is the author of A Short and True Account of the Inquisition and its Proceedings, as it is Practised in Italy, set forth in some Particular Cases (Engl. and Fr. Lond. 1729). See Quelch and Échard, Scriptores ordinis Predicationis, s.v.

PIAZZA, Paolo (commonly called Padre Cosimo), was born at Castelfranco, in the Venetian territory, in 1557. He studied under the younger Palma, and Baglioni commends him as one of his best pupils. He did not follow the style of his master, but adopted one of his own, which, though not distinguished by great richness in color or energy, was graceful and pleasing, and gained him so much reputation that he was successively employed by pope Paul V., the emperor Rudolph II., and the doge Priuli. He executed many works, both in oil and fres~co, for the churches and public edifices of Venice, and other places. He was employed several years by the emperor Rudolph. Among his best works are the Descent from the Cross in the Campodoglio, and the History of Antony and Cleopatra in the Palazzo Borghese at Rome. After Piazza had acquired distinction, he joined the Benedictine friars, and took the name Padre Cosimo, by which application he is usually known. He died at Venice in 1621.

PIAZZETTA, Giovanni Battista, one of the most celebrated of the later Venetian painters, was born in 1682. According to Zanetti, he was instructed in the rudiments of the art by his father, a reputable sculptor in wood, and afterwards became the pupil of Antonio Molinari. His first style was distinguished for a clear and brilliant tone of coloring, but on visiting Bologna he employed himself with Spagnoletto; and by diligently studying the works of Guercino, he imitated his strong contrasts of lights and shadows, and boldness of relief, with considerable success. Lanzi says it is supposed that he had long observed the effects of lights applied to statues of wood and images of wax, and by this means he was enabled to draw with considerable judgment and exact precision the several parts that are comprehended in the shadowing; owing to which art his designs were eagerly sought after, and his works repeatedly engraved by Pitteri, by Pelli, and by Monaco, besides many other masters in Germany and elsewhere. His method of coloring, however, diminished in a great measure the chief merit of his pictures. His shades have increased and changed, his lights sunk, and his tints become yellow; so that there remains an inharmonious and unformed mass. There are a great number of his pictures in good preservation: as the Dedication of St. John the Baptist, in the church of that saint at Padua, placed in competition with those of the first artists in the state, and at that period esteemed best of all. Yet if we follow him closely we will not fail to displeasure us by that coldness in color, and in the lights and yellows, and by that rapidity of hand called, by some, spirit, though to the judicious it often appears neglect, as if the artist were desirous of abandoning his task before it was completed. He executed many chalk drawings, which were greatly valued. He also executed a few plates from his own designs. He died at Venice in 1754. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, ii., 690.

PIAZZI, Callisto, an Italian painter, was born at Lodi, and flourished from 1624 to 1656, as appears from to her. Herodotus considers the goddess Bubastis to be the same as Artemis (ii, 137), and that this was the current opinion in Egypt in the Greek period is evident from the name Seps Artemidos of a rock temple dedicated to Peis, and probably of neighboring city or village. The historian speaks of the festival of the goddess held at Bubastis as the chief and most largely attended of the Egyptian festivals. It was evidently the most popular, and a scene of great license, like the great Moslem festival of the Seyf el-Badawi celebrated at Tanteh in the Delta (ii, 59, 60).

There are scarcely any historical notices of Bubastis in the Egyptian annals. In Manetho's list it is related that in the time of Boethos, or Bochos, first king of the 22d dynasty (B.C. cir. 2281), a chaos of the earth opened at Bubastis, and many perished (Cory's Ancient Fragments, 2d ed. p. 98, 99). This is remarkable, since, though shocks of earthquakes are frequent in Egypt, the actual earthquake is of very rare occurrence. The next event in the list connected with Bubastis is the accession of the 22d dynasty (B.C. cir. 990), a line of Bubastite kings (ibid. p. 124, 125). These were either foreigners or partly of foreign extraction, and it is probable that they chose Bubastis as their capital, or as an occasional residence, on account of its nearness to the military settlements. See Migdol. Thus it must be presumed that in the aspect of the majestic city Bubastis foretold its doom: "The young men of Aven and of Pi-bezet shall fall by the sword: and these [cities] shall go into captivity" (XXX, 17). Helopolis and Bubastis are near together, and both in the route of a vast in-river from the East marching against Memphis. Bubastis was situated on the west bank of the Nile, or Bubastite branch of the Nile, about forty miles from the central part of Memphis, and was the principal town of the Bubastite nome (Pliny, Hist. Nat. v, 9; Ptolemy, iv, 5). Herodotus speaks of its site as having been raised by those members of the gods who dug the Nile, and afterwards by the labor of criminals under Sesostris the Ethiopian, or, rather, under the Ethiopian dominion. He mentions the temple of the goddess Bubastis as well worthy of description, being more beautiful than any other known to him. It lay in the midst of the city, which, having been raised on mounds, overlooked it on every side. An artificial canal encompassed it with the waters of the Nile, and was beautified by trees on its bank. There was only a narrow approach leading to a lofty gateway. The enclosure thus formed was surrounded by a low wall, and behind the inhabited city was the temple, surrounded by a grove of fine trees (ii, 137, 188). Sir Gardner Wilkinson observes that the ruins of the city and temple confirm this account. The height of the mounds and the site of the temple are very remarkable, as well as the beauty of the latter, which was "of the finest red granite." It was surrounded by a sacred enclosure, about 600 feet square, ... beyond which was a larger circuit, measuring 940 feet by 1200, containing the minor one and the canal. The temple is entirely ruined, but the names of Rameses II of the 19th and Amenophis IV (Doechon I) of the 222, and Nekht-har-heb (Nectanebo) I of the 30th, have been found here, as well as that of the eponymous goddess Baste. There are also remains of the ancient houses of the town, and, "amidst the houses on the N.W. side are the thick walls of a fort, which protected the temple below" (Notes by Sir G. Wilkinson in Rawlinson's Hierodotus, ii, 186, plan). Bubastis thus had a fort, besides being strong from its height. The city was taken by the Persians, who destroyed the walls (Diod. Sic. vi. 61); but it has some consideration under the Romans. It was near Bubastis that the canal leading to Arsinoe (Suez) opened to the Nile (Strabo, xvii, 806; Melas, i, 9, 9; Herod. ii, 138); and although the mouth was afterwards often changed and taken more southward, it has continued, to its first locality. The name of Tel el-Wadi commences in the vicinity of Tel Basta. This Tel PIC, Jean, a young French Christian, suffered martyrdom for his devotion to the Protestant cause. He was born in 1546, and flourished at Tournay. Together with his friend, Hugo Destailleur, accused of heresy, they were imprisoned; when they were released, no one would allow them to publish their writings; and when they attempted to do so, they were imprisoned and finally executed. This was in 1565. The details of their lives and deaths are recorded in Traité de la Liberté de la Conscience and the Biographie Universelle, s.v.

PICARD, Jean (2), a French humanist, was born in Beaufort in 1516. He was a regular canon of St. Victor, in Paris. He died in 1567. He wrote a number of works, including De rebus egestatis (Paris, 1610, 8vo), De theologia (Amsterdam, 1612, 8vo); and De vita et moribus (Paris, 1615, 4to). His works were edited by the life and historical notes, and that of the Oeuvres de St. Bernard (Paris, 1615, fol.). See Morey, Dict. Hist. s.v.; Papillon, Dictionnaire de Bourgogne, s.v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xlv, 47.

PICARD, John. See PICARDS.

PICARD, Mathurin, a French ecclesiastical who flourished in the early part of the 17th century. He was a curate of Moustier-Jourdain, in the diocese of Evreux. Picard is the author of a quaint book, which has become very rare, Le Fouet des Paillardes, ou juste Punition des Voluptueux et Charmela (Rouen, 1623, 12mo). He incurred the same accusers as Urban Grandier, and was doomed to the same penalty. His alleged crime was bewitching the nuns of Saint-Louis de Louviers, and sundry acts of profanation and debauchery. He was as tried after his death, his body was exhumed and burned at Rouen, in execution of a judgment rendered in 1647. See Frére, Biographie s.v.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xlv, 48.

PICARDET, Charles N., a French priest, was born at Dijon near the beginning of the 18th century. Before the Revolution he was canon of Saint-Jean-Baptiste of Dijon, and prior of Neufly, near that city. He died about 1794. He left a number of works, Essai sur l'Éducation des petits Enfants (Dijon, 1745, 12mo) — Les deux Abondomines (ibid., 1779, 8vo) — and Histoire météorologique, cosmologique, et économique pour l'Année 1785. He had undertaken a considerable work, which, under the title of Grande Aprologique, was to contain the refutation of all heresies since the establishment of Christianity. See Bibl. de la Contemp.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xlv, 53.

PICARDS, a Christian sect of heretics which arose in Bohemia in the 15th century. John Picard, the founder of the sect, whence their name, drew after him men and women to whom he promised that he would restore them to the primitive state of innocence wherein man was created. With this pretense he taught them to give themselves up to all impurity, saying that therein consisted the liberty of the sons of God, and all those not of their sect were in bondage. He first published his attacks in Germany and the Low Countries, and persuaded many people to go naked, and gave them the name of Adaminis (q. v.), and accordingly he assumed the title of New Adam. After this he seized on an isal- and in the river Lauenze, some leagues from Tabou, the headquarters of Ziesca, where he established himself and his followers. His men were common, but none were allured, but they took them without much difficulty, so that when any man desired a particular woman he carried her to Picard, who gave him leave in these words: "Go, increase, multiply, and fill the earth." At length, however, Ziesca, general of the Hussites (famous for his victories over the emperor Sigismund), incensed at their abominations, marched against them, made himself master of their island, and put them all to death except two, whom he spared that he might learn their doctrine.

Such is the account which various writers, relying on the authorities of Eneaus Silvius and Varillas, have given of the Picards. Some, however, do profess to believe that there was not a sect of this denomination, chargeable with such wild principles and such wild conduct, ever existed. It appears probable that the reproachful representations of the writers just mentioned were calumnies invented and propagated in order to disgrace the sect generally because they deserted the communion and protested against the errors of the Church of Rome. Lutius gives us that Picard, together with forty other persons, besides women and children, settled in Bohemia in the year 1418. Baldinus, the Jesuit, in his Epistola Peregrina (Bohemiae, 1744), gives a similar account, and charges the Picards none of the extravagances or crimes ascribed to them by Sylvius, Schelc, secretary of Lalaiss, king of Bohemia, in his letters to Erasmus, in which he gives a particular account of the Picards, says that they considered the pope of Rome as the true antichrist; and the adorers of the consecrated elements in the eucharist as downright idol worshippers. According to this author, the Picards are Vaudois, who fled from persecution in their own country and sought refuge in Bohemia. Beaumont held the same opinion, on the ground that the Vaudois were settled in Bohemia in the year 1178, where some of them adopted the rites of the Greek, and others those of the Latin Church. The former were generally adhered to till the middle of the 14th century, when the establishment of the Latin rites caused great disturbance. At the commencement of the national troubles in Bohemia, on account of the opposition of the papal power, the Picards more publicly avowed and defended their religious opinions; and they formed a considerable body in an island in the river Launis, or Lauenze, in the district of Bechin, and, resorting to arms, were defeated by Ziesca. See Hardwick, Hist. of the M. A. Church, p. 456; Ref. p. 99; Mosheim, Church Hist. vol. ii.; and the references under ADAMITES (J. H. W.).

PICARD, de Bernard, a famous French engraver, was born at Paris in 1675. He was the pupil of Le Clerc. His best works are those executed in France. Having embraced the Reformed religion, he took up his residence in Holland. In Amsterdam, to which place he accompanied his father in 1687, he worked exclusively for the booksellers, and became renowned, metallic, and merely ornamental. A great many of his prints are from his own designs, in which he imitated the style of composition of Antoine Coypel. He had a facility in imitating the styles of other engravers, and he published many prints of this class which are said to have deceived collectors; Picard used to call them Impostures innocents, and they were published under this title, to the number of seventy-eight, with a list of his works (Amsterdam, 1788), after his death. His prints altogether amount to about 1800, and one of the best of them is a Slaughtre of the Innocents, after a design of his own: there are various impressions of it. He died in 1788. The French text which Picard's copper-plates were intended to illustrate was written by J. F. Bernard and Bernard de Monbrison. The first and best edition of the work in the original French is that of 1723-37; to which should be added Supplement (1748, 2 vols.), and Superstitions, Anciennes et Modernes.
Picolomini, Giacomo, an Italian engraver, was born at Venice in 1517. It is not known by whom he was instructed. He engraved a set of thirty portraits of the principal painters of the Venetian school, for the account of their lives by Ridolfi, published in 1648. He also engraved a few plates after the Italian masters, among which must be named the Holy Family, after P. Liferi; Judith with the Head of Holofernes by her Foot, and The Holy Family, after Titian. His plates are executed in a stiff, disagreeable style. He was living in 1669.

Picolomini, Matteo, a painter and engraver, was born at Ancona, according to Nagler, in 1615. Little is known of him as a painter, save that he flourished at Rome, and was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1655. Lanzi says he was a fellow-student of Giovanni Antonio Galli. Bartsch gives a list of twenty-three prints by him, among which are the following: St. Luke painting the Virgin, after Raffaelle; The Adoration of the Shepherds, after Raffaelle; The Holy Family, after P. Veronese: The Virgin and Infant Jesus, with St. John, after A. Camassei; The Exposing of Moses in the Waters of the Nile, after A. Camassei.

Piccola, Nicola (or Nicola Lapiccola), a Sicilian painter, was born at Crotona, in Calabria Ulter, in 1730. He studied under Francesco Mancini at Rome, and acquired considerable reputation. He executed several works for the churches in that city, and decorated the cupola of a chapel in the Vatican, which was so much esteemed that it was afterwards copied in mosaic. Many paintings by Piccola are at Yaletri, but none of his works are specified. He died in 1790.

Picolomini, Alessandro, one of the most distinguished of Italian prelates of the 16th century, was born at Siena in 1508. He sprang from the same family as pope Pius II (q. v.), and by his piety, modesty, and scholarship gained great renown; but no events of his life are particularly remarkable. He is to be remembered for the wide extent of his writings, and the esteem in which they were held by his contemporaries and immediate followers. He died in 1578. He was of an original turn of mind, and his writings are almost all in Italian, so that he is among the earliest of those who endeavored to raise the character of vermicular literature by treating all branches of knowledge in modern tongues. His commentaries on Aristotle were prized for their good-sense, and for their abandonment of most of the scholasticisms by which that philosophy was disfigured by commentators. He advocated in 1578 the reform of the calendar, which was afterwards adopted. In his book on the fixed stars and the sphere he adopts the mode of designating the stars by letters—a small matter, but one which makes the greater part of the immortality ofayer, and to which the diagrams of Picocolumini establish his prior claim. His works are of a most miscellaneous character—astronomy, physics, comedies, sonnets, morals, divinity, and commentaries on Aristotle. De Thou speaks in strong terms of the rare union of diversity and depth which his acquirements presented. For a list of his most important works, and an estimate of them, see Fabiani, Vita d'Alessio Piccolomini (Vienna, 1749, 1759, 8vo); Ugelli, Italia Sacra, s. v.; Tiraboschi, Storia della letter. ital. vol. vii, pt. 1, p. 560; Nicéron, Mémoires, vol. xxii, s. v.—Hoefler, Nouv. Biogr. Général, s. v.
Padua, where he pursued his studies, he was condeolecule of Felix Peretti, who became pope under the name of Sixtus V, and who boasted of having worsened him in public disputation. He was promoted professor of philosophy at Siena, Macerata, Perugia (1560), and finally at Padua (1560). His advanced age compelled him, in 1601, to leave the latter city and retire to Siena. He strode both by his lessons and by his writings to restore the philosophy of Plato, and to show that it is compatible after all with the principles of Aristotle. He died at Siena in 1604. He left, Universa philosophiae de moribus (Venice, 1583, fol.); the editions of Frankfort (1601, 1611, 8vo) contain besides, under the title of Comes politici, an answer to the attacks of Zabarella: Libri de scientia naturae V partibus (Frankfort, 1597, 8vo), which is a treatise on natural philosophy: De arte defiendi et elegantier discurrendi (ibid. 1600, 4to); Commentaria in Aristotelem De Ortu et Intersu, De anima et De Celo (Mentz, 1606, 8vo); each of these commentaries was also published separately. - Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xi, 67.

Picolardi, Carlo (1) called The Elder, an Italian painter, who, according to Zais, flourished at Cremona about 1600. He was of a patentric family, and a favorite pupil of Lodovico Carracci. He executed some works for the churches of his native city; and painted some burlesque histories which gained him considerable reputation. He died young.

Picolardi, Carlo (2) called The Younger, son of the preceding, was born about 1610. It is not known by whom he was instructed; but, after studying at Rome, he went to Venice, and formed a style of his own, Roman in design and Venetian in coloring. On his return to Cremona he executed some works for the churches and public edifices, but painted most for the collections. Lanzi says he was very successful in burlesque histories, in imitation of the elder Piccolardi. He died about the year 1650.

Pichler, Alois, Dr., one of the most prominent Roman Catholic theologians of Germany, was born in 1833 at Burgkirchen, in the diocese of Passau. He studied at the Passau Lyceum and at Munich, and in 1857 he received the prize for an essay on Polybius. Two years later he was made a priest; in 1861 he was honored with the theological doctorate, and in the following year he commenced his lectures on Church history. In 1869 he was appointed librarian at St. Petersburg; but two years later he was found to be guilty of kleptomaniac propensities in his official capacity, and as he had robbed the library of many valuable possessions, he was brought to trial, found guilty, and condemned to banishment to Siberia, where he remained till 1874, when he was pardoned through the intervention of the Bavarian prince Leopold. Pichler then returned to his native country. He died June 3, 1874, at Siegendorf, near Traunstein. He wrote, Geschichte des Protestantismus in der orientalischen Kirche im 17 Jahrhund., der Patriarch Cyril Lucaris u. seine Zeit (Munich, 1861); Die orientalische Kirchenfrage nach ihrem gegenwärtigen Stande (ibid. 1861); Geschichte der kirchlichen Vereinigungserörterungen (ibid. 1864-65, 2 vols.), which had the distinction of being placed on the Roman Index: Die Theologie des Leibniz (1869, sq., 2 vols.); Die wahren Hinderunssen und die Grundbedingungen einer durchgängigen Reform der Kirche (1870). Towards the latter part of his life he became estranged from his Church. See Zuchhold, Bibliotheca Theologica, ii, 995; Literarischer Taschenbuch für katholische Deutschland, 1874, p. 835 sq.; Kurtz, Lehrbuch der Kirchengesch., 7th ed., ii, 357. (B.P.)

Pichler, Veit, a German Roman Catholic theologian and member of the Society of Jesus, was born at Berchol, Bavaria, in the second half of the 17th century, in the Franciscan province of the Bavarian Jesuits, and was a professor of canonical law at Ingolstadt; became in 1710 professor of jurisprudence at Ingolstadt, and in 1721 he obtained a professorship of jurisprudence at Munich. He died in 1756. We have of him, Iter polemicum ad Ecclesiam catholica veritatem (Augsb. 1708, 8vo); *Examen polemicorum adversus middendorf (ibid. 1708, 8vo); Papstum nunnusque errors in propoendis fidei articulis (ibid. 1709, 8vo); Lutherianism constantor errors in fidei articulis (ibid. 1709, 8vo); Theologia polemica (ibid. 1719, 4to, and often); Summa jurisprudentiae sanctae (ibid. 1729, 5 vols. 8vo); Juris canonici capitulum (ibid. 1728, 4to; 1725, 1746, fol.); Hoefer, Nov. Biogr. Générale, xi, 77.

Pichon, Jean, a French Jesuit, noted as a revivalist, was born at Lyons in 1668. He early became a preacher, but after entering the Society of Jesus in 1667, and obtaining orders, preached in missions at Rheims, Langres, and Metz. Stanislas, duke of Lorraine and Bar, gave him the direction of the missions which he founded in this country with truly royal liberality. To refute some Jansenists, who dissuaded the people from frequent communion by asserting that man must be perfect before approaching the holy table, he published Esprit d'Evangile et de l'Eglise sur la Communion fréquente (1745, 12mo). His book caused a great stir. It was attacked by the authors of the Nouvelles Ecclésiastiques, condemned by an ordinance of M. de Caylus, bishop of Auxerre (Sept. 27, 1747), and soon afterwards by other prelates, zealous partisans of the "philosophic wall." Jesus and the Gospel, in these attacks united against his book, Picton retracted his obnoxious opinions in a letter to M. de Beaumont, archbishop of Paris, Jan. 24, 1748. He then went to preach at Colmar; but as it soon appeared that he was endeavoring secretly to instigate a number of German priests against the subscription of his work in France, he was banished to Marillac (1748), and soon after compelled to leave France. Having found an asylum in the house of the bishop of Lyons (Valais), he became grand-vicar and general viceroy of his bishopric. He died at Lyons May 3, 1751. - Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, x, 78.

Pichon, Thomas-Jean, a French litterateur, was born in 1731 at Le Mans. Having been ordained a priest, he attached himself to M. d'Avricourt, bishop of Perpignan, by whose protection he became canon and chorister of the Sainte-Chapelle of Le Mans. He was historiographer of the king's brother, whose estate was in that part of France. At the time he composed the constitutional bishopric of Sarthe was offered to Picchon; but he would accept only the situation of administrator of the hospital of Le Mans. He died at that place Nov. 18, 1812. His principal writings are, La Raison triomphante des Nouveautés (Paris, 1736, 12mo); it is an attack on the new manners and institutions historique et critique de la Nature de Dieu* (ibid. 1758, 12mo); Cartel aux Philosophes à quatre Pattes (Brussels, 1768, 8vo), in which he exposes materialism: Mémoire sur les Absin du Clarté dans l'Ordre politique (Amsterdam, 1768, 8vo); this memoir, quite singular and inaccurate, excited some complaints against the author: La Physique de l'Historie (La Haye, 1765, 12mo); general considerations upon the temperament and character of people; Les Droits respectifs de l'État et de l'Eglise rapprochées et de l'Eglise rapprochées et de l'Eglise (ibid. 1772, 12mo); Mémoire sur les Absin du Clarté dans l'Ordre politique (Amsterdam, 1776, 12mo); Des Études théologiques (Avignon, 1776, 12mo); researches upon the abuses which opposed the progress of theology in the public schools: Les Arguments de la Raison en Faveur de la Religion et du Souverain (Paris, 1766, 12mo); an essay on the treatise De l'Homme de Héllevius. Abbé Picchon also published the Principes de la Religion et de la Morale de Saurin (Amsterdam, 1768, 2 vols. 12mo), the same work as the Esprit de Saurin of J. F. Duran and La France agricole et marchande de Gleyser (Paris, 1768, 8vo); Lettres de Mad Le Sacre et le Couronnement de Louis XV (1775, 8vo and 4to), to which was added a Recueil historique de cette ceremonie. See Desportes.
Pick, a name common to several Hebrew literati, of whom we mention the following:

1. ALEX. — When and where he was born, and when he became a Christian, we do not know. From his publications we see, what he states himself, that he was formerly professor of Hebrew and Chaldee at the University of Prague. He afterwards resided at London, where he published A Literal Translation from the Hebrew of the Twelve Minor Prophets, with Notes and Critical Remarks (London, 1833; 2d ed., without notes, ibid., 1833; 3d ed. 1838): — A Treatise on the Hebrew Accents (ibid. 1837). — The Bible Student's Concordance, by which the English Reader may be enabled readily to ascertain the Literal Meaning of any Word in the Sacred Original (London, 1840, 1860, 4to); a work of little account to scholars. — The Gathering of Israel (ibid. 1845). When Pick died we do not know. See Steinschneider, Bibliographisches Handbuch (Berlin, 1859), p. 111; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

2. Israel, the founder of the American Congregation, was born at Seufenborn, Bohemia, about the year 1823. After attaining maturity, he obtained his livelihood by writing for periodicals at Vienna till the year 1852, when he received an appointment as rabbi to the new synagogue in Breslau, the chief city of the present Russian Poland. He then proceeded to the Jewry as far as the limits of his mind extended to all his physical habits. In spiritual labors, exercise, diet, sleep, and dress, he followed a fixed course, which scarcely admitted of deviation. Almost unerring prudence marked his life. If not sagacious at seizing new opportunities, he was almost infallibly perfect in that negative prudence which secures safety and confidence. No man who knew him would have apprehended surprise or defeat in any measure undertaken by him after his usual deliberation. His character was full of energy, but it was the energy of the highest order of minds, never impulsive, never hasty. He followed his pre-destined work as if it were his daily life. His sermons were thoroughly "skeletonized." He pretended to no subtility, and was seldom if ever known to preach a metaphysical discourse. The literal import of the Scriptures, and its obvious applications to experimental and practical religion, were the subject of his sermons. Perspicuity of style resulted from this perspicacity of thought. The most unlettered listener could have no difficulty in comprehending his meaning, and the children of his audience generally shared the interest of his adult hearers. See Stevens, Hist. of the Ephr. Epic. Church; N. Y. Methodist, vol. vii. No. 81; Sherman, New England Sketches, p. 399; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 156-200. (J. H. W.)

Pickering, Robert, a noted Wesleyan preacher, was born at Sancton, Yorkshire, in 1766; was early converted to God, and called to the duties of the Christian ministry. Having for some time labored as a local preacher in the Belle Green, he offered to accompany Dr. Coke as a missionary to the East. But as Coke had obtained his compliance of young men, Pickering regarded this as a providential indication that he was not intended for the mission field. Soon after he passed the required examinations, and at the Conference of 1811 he was placed in a presiding elder's circuit. In November of the same year he was sent as temporary supply to Partington Circuit, and in the following January to Spilsby. At the Conference of 1812 he was appointed to Horncastle; and in 1813 to the Spilsby Circuit. His next appointment was to Colne, where he spent two years. Subsequently he travelled at Todmorden, Barnsley, and Doncaster, and in 1822 was appointed to Colne, where he remained three years. Here his exertions, both of mind and body, in the erection of a new chapel and two preachers' houses, seriously impaired his health. In 1827 he was stationed at Kettering; next at Norwich, in 1831 at West Bromwich, and there he labored faithfully, although rapidly declining in health. While at Conference in London in 1834 he was taken very ill, and he died August 18. Pickering was a man of genuine piety. As a preacher he was a workman who needed to be handled with care. He was well read in theology and general literature. As a man he was fearless and honorable. What he considered to be his duty he unhesitatingly discharged. See Wesleyan Meth. Mag. 1836, p. 893-896; 1835, p. 719. [J. H. W.]

Pickett, John R., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born April 2, 1814, in Fairfield District, S. C., of godly parentage; was converted in 1831; called of God to the ministry, he began to preach October, 1834, and in the following spring entered South Carolina Conference. He labored faithfully and acceptably for the Church until 1862, when an attack of paralysis obliged him to take a supernumerary's relation. He died March 15, 1870. He was quick in perception, patient in study, strong in will, possessed great powers of analysis, and a lively imagination. In temper he was genial, hearty, self-possessed, and confident. He had the simplicity of a child, both in and out of the pulpit. His manner in the pulpit was self-possessed and deliberate; but as he proceeded in his sermon, he generally warmed with his subject, and his voice assumed a depth and fullness of volume which was wonderful. See Annual Minutes of the Conference of the Meth. Episc. Church, South, p. 420, 421.

Pico. See Mirandula.

Picot, François Édouard, a French painter, was born at Paris in 1786. He was a disciple of Vincent, and in 1811 obtained the second grand prize for paintings in France from the Academy. After studying for some time at Rome, he was intrusted with the execution of a picture representing The Death of Sapphoica (1813) for the church of St. Severin. In the same year he exhibited the tableau of Amor and Psyche, the figures of which, expressive of graceful naïveté, obtained great favor, and which was bought by the duke of Orleans. M. Picot was rewarded at that exhibition by the president of the jury. After this auspicious beginning he executed freely and successfully. Among his works are Raphael and the Fornarina; The Deliverance of St. Peter; The Annunciation; two ceilings in the Louvre, in the Musée des Antiques. Picot had a share in the work of restoration and decoration of the paintings of the Sermontain palace. He executed The Crowning of the Virgin (Notre Dame de Lorette); the paintings of the ship and choir of St. Vincent de Paul, with M. Flandrin; and some pictures in the church of St. Clotilde. M. Picot was received a member of the Académie des Beaux Arts in 1856, in the place of Charles Vernet. He was created an officer of the Legion of Honor in 1882. He died in 1870.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xi, 86.

Picot, Michel Joseph Pierre, a French writer of some note, was born March 24, 1770, at Neuville-aux-Bois, near Orleans. He was early destined for the Church, and at the age of thirteen in the house of the bishop of Bayeux. He studied theology at the seminary of Orleans. While professor of humanities at Meung-sur-Loire, he refused the oath required by the civil constitution of the clergy. A warrant being issued against him forbidding him to proceed to Paris, he was invalidated to London, where he engaged in business. He died in 1805. Nagler gives a list of thirty-six prints by him, among which is The Four Evangelists, after Rubens.

Picquet, François (1), a French prelate, was born at Lyons April 12, 1626. The son of a banker, he was destined to a commercial career, and travelled in France, England and Germany. As he returned to France, his name became associated with several influential Parisians, he was in 1652 appointed to the consulsiphip of France at Aleppo; and, although he was only twenty-six years of age, he was so successful in the discharge of his duties that the Dutch republic intrusted him with his own representation in the same city. Although a layman, he displayed extraordinary zeal for the promotion of the missionary work. He received the tonsure in 1660 at the hands of André, archbishop of Syria, who was indebted to him for his elevation. Two years afterwards he resigned the consulsiphip and went to Rome, to give to pope Alexander VII an account of the state of religion in Syria. When he returned to France he received orders, was appointed prior of Grimand (Provençe), and (1663) apostolic protonotarius. He was proposed in 1674 for the apostolic see of the city of Trasimone, was appointed bishop in partibus of Cesaropolis, in Macedonia. In 1679 he embarked for Aleppo with the chevalier d'Arvieux, the new French consul, endowed with unrelenting zeal to revive the faith of the Catholics, and started in May, 1681, as ambassador of the courts of France and Rome in the Levant, to give succour and assistance to the restoration and expansion of the Catholic faith. He arrived at Isphahan July 12, 1682, and soon afterwards witnessed the celebrations in that city in honor of the passage of the khans of the Tartars, Uesbeck, who was on his way to Mecca. He was granted an audience, bakhshis, crossed the mountainous country, and obtained a promise of protection for the Roman Catholics of his lands. Towards the close of 1688 he took the same royal gift principe from the king of France, and transmitted to his sovereign the answer and presents of the Pope. He was appointed the first bishop of Babylon, and he had arrived at Hamadan, when his impaired health compelled him to stop several months in that city, where he died, Aug. 26, 1686, after writing to the Congregation of the Propaganda for a successor. A special honor was conferred on him by his death, when his body was translated to the Church of St. Bhavani.

Pictet, François (2), a French missionary, was born at Bourg (in Bresse) Dec. 6, 1708. He took holy orders, and for a time preached in the diocese of Lyons, but finally entered the Congregation of St. Sulpice, and in 1723 was sent to the outskirts of Montreal, to assist in the work of the North American missions. Towards 1740 he settled near that city, near the lake of Two Mountains, where he constructed a fort with the money sent for that purpose by Louis XVI, and by requisitions. With the aid of this fort he succeeded in keeping the two roaming tribes, the Algonquins and Nipissings, which took to agriculture. He induced them, as well as the Tecus and Hurons, to submit to France; and during the war of 1742 to 1748, Pictet's measures for the safety of his colony were so effective that it remained unharmed by English invasion. Peace being restored, he founded in 1749 a new mission near Lake Ontario, and called it La Présentation; the point occupied by it is the same where the English afterwards founded Kingston. In 1755 he arrived at Paris, and reported to the minister of the war as to the flourishing state of the colony, which counted already no less than five hundred families. In the war that broke out soon afterwards, he put himself at the head of the Indians which he had trained, destroyed all English forts south of Ontario, and contributed to the defeat of general Braddock. After the defeat of Quebec (1759), Pictet determined to return to France by way of Louisiana. He started with twenty-five Frenchmen and two small troops of savages, which were successively relieved by others in the tribes he met; traversed Upper Canada, reached Michilimackinac, crossed Michigan, and the Mississippi rivers went to New Orleans, where he spent twenty-two months. The English had offered a reward for his head. Pictet had never received any reward, except a bounty of a thousand dollars and some books in 1741. The books he had to sell to enable him to return to France, and he was compelled to live on his scanty inheritance until the assembly of the clergy of France in 1765 presented him a bounty of twelve hundred pounds, which they gave him a second time in 1770. In 1777 he undertook a journey to Rome, where Pius VI, to honor his merits, paid all his expenses, and made him a present of five thousand pounds. Pictet came home to die at Verjouz, near Bourg, the house of his sister, a poor peasant-woman, July 15, 1781.—Hoefer, Nouv. Bioj. Générale, xii, 87.

Pictet, Bexendorf, a learned Swiss divine, was born at Geneva in 1655. He studied there under Francis Taurin, whom he succeeded as professor of theology in 1667, and obtained great celebrity. In 1690 he was rector of the academy; in 1700 pastor of the Italian Church. He died in 1724. Pictet joined to vast erudition a vivid and natural eloquence. A list of his numerous works is given by Niecor. Among these the following are especially valuable: La Morale Chrétienne, ou l'Art de bien vivre (nouv. ed. Gen. 1721, 8 vol., 12mo); Christian Theology (translated from the Latin by the Rev. Frederick Reynoux, B.A., Lond. 1847, sm. 8vo); La Morale Chrétienne, ou l'Art de bien vivre (nouv. ed. Gen. 1721, 8 vol., 12mo);—Dix Sermons sur les Sujets (ibid. 1716, 8vo);—L'Histoire du dixième Siècle (Amst. 1732, 4to);—Quatour Sermons sur divers Sujets (Gen. 1721, 8vo). See Biblioth. Germanique, s. v.; Nicéon, Mémoires, vol. 1; Senebier, Hist. litt. de Genève, xil, 349 sq.; Darly, Cyclop. Bibl. vol. 4; Mosheim, Encycl. hist. vol. iii; Hook, Ecoles. Biog. viii, 92. (J. H. W.)

Pictures, the rendering in the A. V. in three passages of two Hebrew words which are from the same root (בִּיטָה, to look at).

1. Muskil, בִּיטָה, an image; used alone, either literally (plur. "pictures," Prov. xxv, 11) or in the sense of imagination ("conceive," Prov. xviii, 11; plur. "wish," Psa. lxxxiii, 7); with צָרָה, a stone ("image of stone," Lev. xxvi, 1; plur. "pictures," Numb. xxxix, 5); with יִסְתֹּר, on account of (plur. "chambers of imagery" [q.v.], Ezek. viii, 12), it denotes idolatrous images, either independent images, or more usually stones 'portrayed,' i.e. sculptured in low relief, or engraved and colored (Ezek. xxi, 8; Layard, Nin. and Nab. ii, 306, 308). Movable pictures, in the modern sense, were doubtless unknown to the Jews; but colored sculptures and drawings on walls or on wood, as mummiy-casees, must have been familiar to them in Egypt (see Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, ii, 277). In later times we read of portraits (נשיכָא), perhaps busts or intagli, sent by Alexander to Antony (Josephus, Anti. xv, 2, 6). The original pictures of silver of Proverbs xxv, 11, were probably wall-surfaces or cornices with carvings, and the 'apples of gold' representations of fruit or foliage, like Solomon's flowers and pomegranates (1 Kings vi, 7). The walls of Babylon were ornamented with pictures on enamelled brick.

2. פִּיטָד, בִּיטָד, the flag of a ship, as seen from afar (plur. "picture," Isa. xi, 16). The Phoenician and Egyptian vessels had their flags and sails of purple and other splendid colors (see Ezek. xxvii, 7; comp. Diod. Sic. i, 51; Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. iii, 211). See STANDARD.

Pictures, Worship of, in Churchika. The use of paintings and images in churches was introduced as early as the commencement of the 4th century, but was speedily condemned by a council convened by the Arians, in Spain, A.D. 305. Individual writers also during this century bore their testimony against the practice in question. Eusebius of Cesarea, at the beginning of the century, and Epiphanius of Salamis, towards the close of it, denounced the practice as heathenish and unscriptural (see Milner's Hist. of the Church, vol. iv, ch. xiii, p. 423). Nevertheless the practice of hanging up pictures of saints and martyrs, as well as symbolical representations of Scripture histories, prevailed in the 5th century. No images of God or representations of the Holy Trinity were tolerated in churches till after the second Nicene council. Pictures of Scripture scenes were hung on the walls of churches at first to aid those who could not read. The idolatrous devotion with which the Papists bow down before the images and paintings of the dead is a consequence of this practice. See IMAGE-WORSHIP. Besides, the pictures are used by the Romanists for working upon the superstitions belief of the masses. Thus Seymour tells us following the in Picturage: "There is scarcely an incident in the life of our Lord that has not its rival incident or parallel among the legendary life of Mary Christiana, and especially of her as the example to picture, represents an angel announcing to Mary the miraculous conception of the Messiah; it is rivalled by another rep-receiving an angel announcing to Anna, the legendary mother of Mary, the miraculous and immaculate conception of Mary in the womb. A picture represents the birth of King Solomon; it is paralleled by another representing the nativity or birth of the Virgin Mary. If there is one representing our Lord sitting on the throne and bearing the crown as King of kings, there is a rival picture representing Mary sitting on the same throne, bearing the sceptre, and wearing the crown as Queen of heaven. There are two classes of miraculous pictures. One class comprehends those which are said to have had a miraculous origin; that is, to have been painted in part or in whole by no human hands, but by an angel, or some mysterious visitant from the world of spirits. The other class of miraculous pictures is far more numerous, and comprehends all those which have performed miracles. At the church of St. Giovanni e Paolo, near Rome, is a small picture of the Virgin Mary, which is said to have shed tears on the French invasion of Italy. At Arezzo we were shown a picture in the cathedral church, which wept many tears at the language of some drunkards. It was a Madonna, and the bishop made it the means of collecting sufficient funds to build a new chapel to commemorate it. In the church of St. Pietro de Montorio it is a singularly ugly representation of Mary and child; it is not exactly hideous; but an inscription on a marble slab announces that this 'sacred likeness of the mother of God, holding her son and a book, is illustruous for miracles more and more every day.' In St. Peter's, however, is a very important one, not only for the miracle, but for its authentication. It is in the subterranean chapel, usually called the Grotto. It is a picture of the Virgin with a mark under the left eye, and the following is the inscription: 'This picture of the Most Holy Virgin Mary, which stood between the pillars of the porch of the ancient Basilica, having been struck by an impious hand, poured forth blood (sanguinem fudit) on the stone, which is now protected by a grating.' On one side is a large stone, on the other are two small stones. All three are covered with a strong iron grating, to preserve them, as on them the blood of this miraculous picture is said to have fallen.' See Riddle, Christian Antiquities; Coleman, Christian Antiquities.

Pie is a table or rule which was used in the old Roman offices previous to the Reformation, showing in a technical way how to find out the service which is to be read upon each day, and corresponds to what the Greeks called πίεα, or the index (literally a piana, by meeting, a scattered table or picture); and because indexes or tables of books were formed into square figures resembling pictures or painters' tables hung up in a frame, these likewise were called πίεας, or, being marked only with the first letters of the word, πίς, or pies. 'Pie is the familiar English name for the Romish pica (ordinall, or service-book), which perhaps came from the ignorance of the friars, who have thrust in many barbarous words into the liturgies. Some say that the word pice is derived from litera pieca, a great black letter in the beginning of some new order in the prayer, and among printers that term is still used, the pica type. See Proctor, Book of Common Prayer; Eadie, Eccles. Cyclop. s. v.

Piece of Gold. The A.V., in rendering the elliptical expression "six thousand of gold," in a passage respecting Naaman, relating that he "took with him ten talents of silver, and six thousand of gold, and ten changes of raiment" (2 Kings v. 5), supplies "pieces" as the word understood. The similar passage respecting silver, in which the word understood appears to be shekels, probably justifies the insertion of that definite word. See Piece of Silver. The same expression, if "pieces" be here meant, is also found in the following passage: "And king Solomon made two hundred targets of [of] beaten gold: six hundred of gold went to one target" (1 Kings x. 16). Here the A.V. supplies the word "shekels," and there seems no doubt that it is right, considering the number mentioned, and that a common weight must be intended. That a weight of gold is meant in Num. xxi. 22, is extremely unlikely that coined money was already invented at the time referred to, or indeed that it was known in Palestine before the Persian period. See Daric; Money. Kings or ingots of gold may have been in use; they are scarcely warranted in supposing that any of them bore gold shekels, since the practice was to weigh money. The rendering "pieces of gold" is therefore very doubtful; and "shekels of gold," as designating the value of the whole quantity, not individual pieces, is preferable. See Gotta.

Piece of Money. See Keribah; Stater.

Piece of Silver. The passages in the O. T. and those in the N. T. in which the A. V. uses this term must be separately considered. See Money.

I. In the O. T. the word "pieces" is used in the A. V. for a word understood in the Hebrew, if we except one or two cases to be afterwards noticed. The phrase is always "pieces of gold" or the like "of silver" (Gen. xvi, 16; xxvii, 28; xlv, 22; Judg. ix. 4; xvi. 5; 2 Kings vi, 25; Hos. iii. 2; Zech. xi, 12, 13). In similar passages the word "shekels" occurs in the Hebrew, and it must be observed that these are either in the law, or relate to purchases, some of an important legal character, as, for example, the purchase of the threshing-floor and oxen of Aramah, or to taxes, and the like (Gen. xxiii, 15, 16; Exod. xiii, 22; Lev. xxvii, 3, 6, 16; Josh. vii, 21; 2 Sam. xxiv, 21; 1 Chron. xxiii, 19, 20; 2 Kings xx, 20; Neh. vi. 15; Jer. xxxii, 9). There are other passages in which the A. V. supplies the word "shekels" instead of "pieces" (Deut. xxiv, 19, 20; Judg. xvii, 2, 3, 4, 10; 2 Sam. xviii, 11, 12), and of these the first two require this to be done. It becomes then a question whether there is any ground for the adoption of the word "pieces," which is vague if actual coins be meant, and inaccurate if weights. The shekel, be it remembered, was the common weight of money, and therefore most likely to be understood in an elliptical phrase. When we find good reason for concluding that in two passages (Deut. xxii, 19, 20) this is the word understood, it seems incredible that any other should be in the other places. See Shekki.

One of the exceptional cases in which a word corresponding to "pieces" is found in the Hebrew is in the Psalms, where presents of submission are prophesied to be made of "pieces of silver," פֵּיתֶיםָ בֶּֽשֶּׁר (xviii, 30; 29, 29; 110, 1; Ps. viii, 14, 15), which occurs in a moral and prophetic way, if it preserve its radical meaning, from פֵּיתֶה, must signify a piece broken off, or a fragment: there is no reason to suppose that a coin is meant—Smith. Another exceptional passage is 1 Sam. ii, 26, where the Heb. word rendered "piece of silver" is פֵּיתֶה יִפְרְדוּ, which seems to signify a small piece of money, as וָרָשׁ, or from the idea of collecting (root פָּרַךְ to gather). See Silver. For the "pieces of silver" in Josh. xxiv, 32, see Keribah.

II. In the N. T. two words are rendered by the phrase "piece of silver," drachma, δραχμή, and δραχμᾶ. (1.) The first (Luke xv, 8, 9) should be represented by denarius. It was a Greek silver coin, equivalent, at the time of Luke, to the Roman denarius, which is probably identical with the drachma, but for some time of short duration or almost or almost superseded the former. See Drachma. (2.) The second word is very properly thus rendered. It occurs in the account of the betrayal of our Lord for "thirty pieces of silver" (Matt. xxvi, 15; xxvii, 3, 5, 6). It is evident that this term, being a common coinage, here is intended. If the most common silver pieces bearing, they would be denarii. The parallel passage in Zechabiah (xi, 12, 13) must, however, be taken into considereration, where, if our view be correct, shekels must be understood. It may, however, be suggested that the two thirties may correspond, not as of exactly the same coin, but of the chief current coin. Some light may be thrown on our difficulty by the number of pieces. It can scarcely be a coin, of which "the weight of silver was the price of blood in the case of a slave accidentally killed" (Exod. xxii, 32). It may be objected that there is no reason to suppose that shekels were current in our Lord's time; but it must be replied that the tetradrachmas of deprecitated Attic weight of the Greek-Cities of Syria in this century of our era had the same weight as the shekels which we believe to be of Simon the Maccabee [see Money], so that Josephus speaks of the shekel as equal to four Attic drachmas (Ant., i. 8, 2). These tetradrachmas were common at the time of our Lord, and the piece of money thus assigned of silver, must, from its name, have been of this kind. See Statek. It is therefore more probable that the thirty pieces of silver were tetradrachmas than that they were denarii. There is no difficulty in the use of two terms, a name designating the denomination and "piece of silver," whereas the latter mean the tetradrachm or the denarius, as it is a vague appellation that implies a more distinctive name. In the received text of Matthew the prophecy as to the thirty pieces of silver is ascribed to Jeremiah, and not to Zechariah; and much controversy has thus been occasioned by such an explanation as is suggested by the absence of any prophet's name in the Syriac version, and the likelihood that similarity of style would have caused a copyist inadvertently to insert the name of Jeremiah instead of that of Zechariah. See Silverman.

Pierce, Edward, an English painter who flourished in the reigns of Charles I and II, was eminent both in history and landscape. He also drew architecture, perspective, etc., and was much esteemed in his time. But there is little of his work now remaining, the far greater part being destroyed in the fire of London, 1666. It chiefly consisted of altar-pieces, ceilings of churches, and the like; of these there is one yet remaining, done by him, in Covent Garden Church, where are to be found many admirable parts of a good pencil. He worked some time for Vandyck, and several good pieces by Pierce in this place have been in the Castle, in Leicester.

Pierce, George Edmond, D.D., an American Congregational divine, noted especially as an educator, was born at Southbury, Conn., Sept. 9, 1794. He was educated at Yale College, class of 1816; then studied theology at Andover Theological Academy, class of 1821, teaching at the same time at the Fairfield Academy. In July, 1822, he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church at Harwinton, where he remained until called to the presidency of the Western Reserve College in 1824. He remained at the head of this high school until 1855, and gave to it an excellent reputation. He died at Hudson, Ohio, May 27, 1871.

Pierce, Gershom, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in the closing quarter of the last century. He was converted about 1800, and called of God to the work of the sacred ministry: joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and entered in 1808 the New York Conference. His first appointment was at Pittsburgh. In 1804 he preached at Fletcher; 1805, Niagara; 1806, Oswegatchie: 1807, Dunham; 1808, Saratoga: 1808-10, Granville; 1811, Thurman; 1812, Green Gate; 1814, Uxbridge; 1815-16, Montgomery; 1817-18, Sharon; 1819, Albany; 1820, Coeymans; 1821-22, Chatham; 1823-24, Granville; 1825-26, Pittsfield; 1827, Burlington; 1828-29, Redding; 1830-31, Hampstead and Huntington. At the Conference of 1822 he became supernumerary, and continued in that relation to the period of his death. Mr. Pierce was a man of much more than ordinary ability. His intellect, in force and habit, is best described by the expression "long-headed." He was a devout man, at times a most powerful preacher. His sermons, weighty with thought, fervid with feeling, and in power of the Word, Spirit, made a deep and abiding impression on his hearers. He died in its peace at Milan, Ohio, March 23, 1865. See Smith, Sacred Memories, p. 288 sqq.

Pierce, James Edmund, an American divine of note, was born at West Townsend, Vt., in 1899. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1861, and at Auburn Theological Seminary of that city. In 1865 he was elected to a professorship (of the Hebrew language and literature) in the last-named institution, which position he retained till his death (at Auburn, July 15, 1870). He was a close student, a thorough and able teacher, and an impressive and popular preacher. See Appleton's Amer. Cyclop., x, 570.

Pierce, John, D.D., a noted American Congregational minister, was born at Dorchester, Mass., July 14, 1774. He was educated at Harvard University, class of 1798, and then became a tutor in his alma mater. Descended of very humble parentage, he had made his way to college by his own exertions, and his position by the force of his own industry. Feeling persuaded that his work was that of the Christian ministry, he took up the study of theology, and March 15, 1797, was ordained over the First Congregational Church, Brookline, Mass., of which he was the pastor for 50 years. He died in this place Aug. 24, 1849, respected by all who knew him, and greatly mourned by the ecclesiastical body to which he belonged. Dr. Pierce was member of the Academy of Arts and Sciences, and of the Massachusetts Historical Society. For several years he was president of the Massachusetts Historical Society. In all matters appertaining to family and literary statistics he was a prodigy. He had 18 quarto vols. of 600 pages each, of his own MS, containing memoirs and memorabilia. He published Half-century Discourse at Brookline (Mar. 1847) — Sketch of Brookline, in "Mass. Hist. Collections," 2d ser. vol. ii. — Sermon at Ordination of S. Clark (1817) — Dudlaiden Lect. (1821); also occasional Sermons, etc. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 331; Allibone, Diet. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. H. W.)

Pierce, John J., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Vermont in 1816. He was secured his early education principally by his own exertions; graduated at Princeton College in 1820, and at the theological seminary in the same place in 1823. He was licensed by the New Brunswick Presbytery, and began preaching at Portsmouth, Va., where he remained until 1827, when he left for Clarksville, Tenn. In 1828 he was elected president of an academy at Elkton, Ky., which position he held until 1837. Soon after he occupied temporarily the place of one of the professors in Centre College, Danville, Ky.; then returned again to Elkton; but subsequently left, and spent two years in teaching in Illinois and Missouri. On his return he took charge of Ridgewood Church, Ky., where he continued to labor until his death, March 18, 1861. Mr. Pierce was a pure-hearted, simple-minded man; never attaining any very eminent success in the ministry, but ever contented and happy. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 116. (J. L. S.)

Pierce, Thomas, D.D., an English divine of note, flourished near the middle of the 17th century. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and after graduation was presented with a fellowship. In 1648 he was ejected for nonconformity, but was restored under the Protectorate, and became prebend of Canterbury and Lincoln; in 1661 president of Magdalen College; in 1671 dean of Salisbury. He died in 1691. Dean Pierce was a man of more than ordinary talent and acquisitiveness. In theology he was decidedly Arminian, and published a number of occasional sermons and theolog-Pierce, Thomas A., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Fauquier Co., Va., Oct. 26, 1819; was converted at the age of twenty; and feeling called of God to the work of the sacred ministry, joined the Virginia Conference at Charlottesville in the fall of 1847. He was appointed to the Stafford Circuit. In 1848 he was sent to Rappahannock and Culpepper; in 1849 he went to King William, where he travelled two years; in 1852 and 1853 he labored on the James City and New Kent Circuit; in 1854, in King George; in New Hampshire: 1856 and 1857, in Hanover. In 1858 he was again in King William; in 1859 he was sent to Greensville; in 1860 and 1861 he had his pastoral charge in Mecklenburg; in 1862 and 1863, in Campbell; 1864 and 1865, in Appomattox. In all of these appointments he labored like a man of God, and was incomparably doing much good. Failing health obliged him in 1866 to take a superannuated relation. He died Feb. 26, 1867.

Pieritz, Joseph Abraham, a noted Anglican divine, was born of Jewish parentage in the year 1815 at Kieltsko, in Prussia. At the age of twenty-three Pieritz became a Christian by being baptized at London. Four years later "the London Society for Propagating the Gospel among the Jews" appointed him a missionary among his brethren, and for about eight years he faithfully discharged his duty in that relation, residing in different places in the west of England. In the year 1851 he accepted an appointment to a pastoral charge in British Guiana. For about two years he labored as rector of the parish of St. Patrick, in the town of New Amsterdam, in the colony of British Guiana, where he died, Oct. 10, 1870. See Jewish Intelligencer (London), 1888, p. 29; 1870, p. 20; Report of the London Society, 1861, p. 54; Kalkar, Israel and die Kirche, p. 172. (B. F.)

Pierpont, Jesse, a native of Connecticut, and was born about 1791. In 1821 he came to New York state and settled at Rochester, and soon after was ordained a Presbyterian minister. He became pastor of a church in Hopewell, Ontario Co., for several years. He was then called to the pastorate at Avon, and there he lived until about 1861, when he moved to Rochester, N. Y., where he died in 1871, beloved by all his acquaintance, and by many social and spiritual friends. Indeed, none knew him but to honor him, both as a Christian and as a gentleman. "He lived a long life of usefulness as a pastor of the Presbyterian Church, and died full of years, in the blessed consciousness of a blameless life as an honored servant of God's ministry."

Pierpont, James, a noted New England Congregational minister of colonial days, was born in Roxbury, Conn., in 1661. He was educated at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1681; was ordained fourth minister in New Haven, Conn., in 1685, and retained that connection until his death in 1714. In the year 1698 Mr. Pierpont was one of three ministers who conceived the plan of founding a college—a plan which had the effect in the establishment of Yale College in 1700. As one of the original trustees of the institution he was untiringly active; and it was through his influence, in no small degree, that the distinguished individual from whom his name was derived took upon himself the object of his liberal benefactions. Dwight, in his life of Edwards, states that Mr. Pierpont read lectures to the students in Yale College as professor of moral philosophy. This, however, Dr. Bacon considers doubtful, as the college was not removed from Saybrook till after Mr. Pierpont's death. Of the famous eye held at Saybrook in 1708, for the purpose of forming a system that should better secure the ends of Church discipline and the benefits of communion among the churches, Mr. Pierpont was a prominent member. The "Articles" which were adopted as the result of the synod, and which constitute the well-known "Saybrook Platform," are said to have been drawn up by him. The only publication of Mr. Pierpont was a sermon preached at Boston, in Cotton Mather's pulpit, in 1712, entitled Sunday False Hopes of Human Happiness a Decreed. Mather introduces the sermon with a short preface, in which he says of the author, "He has been a rich blessing to the Church of God." New Haven values him, all Connecticut honors him—they have cause to do so. Dr. Bacon writes thus concerning him:

"That he was able to form so lively an idea of him as of Davenport is partly because his life was shorter, and was less involved in scenes of conflict, and partly, no doubt, because his nature and the early discipline of Divine Providence had less fitted him to make himself conspicuous by the originality and energy of his character, and to leave his large stamp with irresistible firmness on the records of his times. In the pulpit Mr. Pierpont was distinguished among his contemporaries. His personal appearance was altogether prepossessing. He was eminent in the gift of prayer. His doctrine was sound and discriminating, and his style was sound and impressive, without anything of the affected quibbling which characterised some of the most eminent men of that day.

Pierpont, John, an eminent American Unitarian divine, noted especially for his part in temperance and antislavery movements, was born in 1830 at Litchfield, Conn., and educated at Yale College. The years immediately after his leaving college were occupied in teaching, a part of the time at the South and afterwards in New England, and he then studied law and settled at Newburyport. The war of 1812 interfered with his professional prospects, and he foresaw the law for business, but met with indifferent success, PIERQUIN, Jean, a French ecclesiastic, noted especially as a writer, was born Feb. 15, 1672, at Charleville. After taking holy orders, he was in 1699 appointed canon of Chartres, in the Ardenne, where he spent his whole life, dividing his time between works of charity and literary pursuits. He died March 10, 1742. He published, Ve de St. Turin, Hermitae (Nancy, 1722, 2 vols.): Dissertations physiques-et-théologiques sur la Conversion de St. Paul, met en écla- se dans le Livre de St. Jerome, au mure (Paris, 1742, 12mo), in which work he gives some physical account of the manner in which the divine act of generation took place, etc.—Hœfler, Nouv. Biog. Géne- rale, xl, 128.

PIETRE, St. See Peter.

PIETRE, Jean Baptiste Marie, a French painter, was born at Paris in 1715. It is not known by whom he received his first instruction; but he went, when about nineteen years of age, to Rome, where he remained several years. On his return to Paris he distinguished himself as a historical painter; and executed several works for the churches and public edifices, which gained him great reputation. He was appointed painter to the king, and elected member of the academy at Paris. One of his greatest works was the ceiling of the chapel of the Virgin, in the church of St. Sulpice, which has been engraved by Nicholas Dupuis. He also etched a few plates from his own designs and those of others. He died in 1789.

PIERSON, Abraham, an American Congregational divine and educator, was born at Lynn, Mass., in 1641. Abraham, his father, was first minister of Stow, Mass., 1661 (born in Yorkshire, England, in 1608, died Aug. 9, 1678), was one of the first settlers of Newark in 1677, and was the first minister of that town. He preached to the Indians of Long Island in their own language, and contributed Some Hints for the Indians in New Hervis and Plate Country to a Further Account of the Progress of the Gospel in New England (1659). His son, Abraham, Jun., was educated at Harvard University, where he graduated in 1688. After studying theology, he was ordained colleague with his father at Newark, N.J., March 4, 1672, and was minister at Killingworth, Conn., from 1674 until his death, March 5, 1707. Mr. Pierson was identified with the founding of Yale College, was anxiously desired for its first principal, and did instruct for a time at Killingworth, though he never moved to Saybrook, where the commencement of Yale was set for the earliest days, because his parishioners would not suffer him to leave them. He was taken ill in the midst of the agitation regarding his college duties, and died before he could settle the case. President Clapp, in his History of Yale College, says of rector Pierson that he was a "hard student, a gentle man, a great deal of work and watching, steady, and judicious gentleman in all his conduct." See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit,, 116 sq.; Bacon, Genesis of the New England Churches. (J. H. W.)

PIETAS, a virtue which denotes veneration for the Deity, and love and tenderness to our friends, and especially dutifulness to parents. It received divine honors among the Romans and was made one of the seven liberal arts. Actius Gabrius first erected a temple to this new divinity, on the spot where a woman had fed with her own milk her aged father, who had been imprisoned by order of the senate, and deprived of all aliment. The goddess is seen represented on Roman coins as a matron, throwing incense upon an altar, and her attributes are a stork and children. See Cicero, De Div. 1; Val. Maximus, v.; Pliny, vii, 36; Zumpt, in the Class. Museum, iii, 452.

PIETISM is the specific appellation of a phase of religious thought which developed itself especially within the pale of the German Lutheran Church in the 18th century. Like English Methodism, it embraced a period of indifference to religion, and, like it also, aimed to supersede dead faith, knowledge without life, form without spirit, worldliness under the cloak of religion, by life—a spiritual and living faith. Like Methodism, it laid great stress on the necessity of the new birth; it prohibited certain amusements and modes of life until then considered as at least harmless; and it encouraged private assemblies of Christian persons for purposes of edification, such as the study of the Scriptures or the interchange of spiritual experiences. Like Methodism, too, it encountered at first no little ridicule, and even persecution. It was accused of being an attempt to found a new sect, and was vehemently opposed on this ground; but, unlike Methodism, though it did here and there give rise to some insignificant bodies of separatists, it never broke off from the national Church of the country, but remained as a movement within its pale.

The development of German Lutheranism, which really means German Protestantism, repeats in a most peculiar manner the course of the general Church previous to it. As in the first centuries of the production of the spirit of the Church proposed to itself the view of Christianity as a whole, so also was it the time from the beginning of the Reformation to the Augsburg Confession (q.v.) one pre-eminently creative, and it laid the foundation of the Lutheran Church as regards its confession of faith. With the endeavor pervading the 5th, 6th, and 7th centuries more distinctly to work out the single doctrines corresponds the work of the Lutheran Church up to the time of the Formula Concordiae (q. v.), by which the various differences of doctrines were to be settled. As the Church of the Middle Ages had handed down to it, the doctrine was to be preserved and promulgated, not as a matter produced by the fathers and sanctioned by the Church, which scholasticism then undertook to work out and digest in a systematic manner, so there arose in the 17th century—the Protestant Middle Ages—a scholasticism which put into a regular form the Lutheran confession of faith embodied in the Formula Concordiae. As in the Middle Ages, the scholasticism stands side by side with the strict representatives of scholasticism, so the Protestant mystics, Jacob Bohme (q. v.), Arndt, and others, stand by the side of an effete orthodoxy. This mystical tendency acquired an importance about the end of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th centuries. A parallel again between this period and that of the 14th century is obvious. In the 14th century the romantic spirit had become extinct; scholasticism had outdone itself; from France there flowed over Europe a worldly spirit; the Roman spirit had decayed; everything was in dislocation. Then from the reaction against the externalized scholasticism and secularized life there broke forth on all sides and in the most varied forms mysticism, which had in itself a Reformatory feature. In like manner, the 17th century's Wittenberg, the blossom of Germany had withered; the religious spirit, which since the period of the Reformation had been the first power in Germany, had stepped into the background; while, on the other hand, the secular spirit had been let loose, along with a powerful rein of immorality, especially by the preponderance of France under Louis XIV. It was a dreary period in German history.

Politically the empire had fallen asunder into a number of separate despotic little states; and the sentiment of national unity had become so nearly extinct that the loss of a once grateful and beautiful Alsace to France seems to have been viewed with wonderful indifference. Socially the life of the people had greatly deteriorated. The rural population was terribly diminished in numbers and wealth; their means of communication were restricted by the destruction of their homes and the neglect of the roads; their schools had disappeared, and were but very slowly replaced; their new houses and churches were bare and barn-like compared to the old ones; their periodical gatherings for certain purposes of local self-government or for festivities had fallen into disuse. The vegetative sort of life, the life of plants, and the writers of the following age bear testimony to the illiteracy and coarseness of manners which prevailed. Towards the end of the 17th century even among the gentry of the country districts. In the towns things were but little better. The comerce of Germany had received a serious check; her merchant-princes had sunk to the level of petty traders, and adopted the manners and culture of the latter class. Her old free cities were decaying; only a few of the newer ones were growing, and what intellectual life there then existed centred in them, as at Hamburg, as at Hamburgh or Berlin, or at the court of any sovereign who specially protected letters, or still more at the universities. Throughout this period Germany contributed only one really great name to literature—that of Leibnitz; while in France it was the age of military glory and social brilliancy—of Racine and Moliere, of Fenelon and Bossuet, of Bayle and Voltaire. German men and women therefore found their own life mean and tiresome, and were carried away by admiration of their splendid neighbor, till it became the fashion to imitate whatever was French in manners, dress, or tone of thought; and the very language was wretchedly corrupted by the intermixture of French phrases. Of course there was a class, of which king Frederick William I of Prussia may be taken as the type, who hated foreign ways, and upheld whatever was most antediluvian and unrefined as peculiarly German; but in general the tide set in favor of the foreigners. The French were now the great models, and very unfortunate ones for a people whose natural genius was so totally different. German literature reached its lowest ebb under these influences. One of the earliest signs, if not the first, which the great rebellion against French classicism, and an admiration for the master writers of English—Shakespeare and Milton.

Religion suffered under the same depression. On the one hand was a rigid Lutheranism which had petrified what had once been living convictions into dead dogmas, and which was the Vorhangmas. As in the Middle Ages, there sprang up a sect about definitions of doctrines in which the people had ceased to feel a genuine interest. On the other hand was a genteel indifference which idealized "enlightenment" (the favorite watchword of that period), and indemnified itself for its compliance with certain outward observances by laughing at the whole affair in private. Rabener, a satirist of this period, when characterizing the earlier part of the 18th century, says: "There was a time in Germany when no satire could be witty at the expense of anything but the Bible, and there were whole volumes whose subject was the complete satirical condensation in readiness, that their wit might never run dry. . . . If a groom is conscious of possessing a more cultivated mind than the dairymaid, he Startles her by a jest on some text or hymn; all the courtiers receive the next couplet as a gibe at the very cowloppy, and the poor dairymaid, who is not so witty, stands there abashed." When the danger seemed imminent that the great work of the Reformation would prove in vain, and that it would soon come to ruin, providential supply and guidance came in the Pietistic spirit which arose. Indeed, the learned Dorner had, with a large number of others, that this new tendency was a necessary stage in the development of Protestantism—a supplement of the Reformation—and that Spener, the father of Pietism, was the veritable successor of Melancthon. But we must first learn what Pietism proposed to do before we can properly appreciate its historical importance. Pietism commenced upon the principle that the Church was corrupt; that the ministry were generally guilty of gross neglect; and that the people were returned with spiritual death. It therefore proposed, as a theological means of improvement: 1. That the scholastic theology, which reigned in the academies, and was composed of intricate and disputable doctrines, and obscure and unusual forms of expression, should be totally abolished. 2. That the controversies subsisting between Christians of different communions, should be less eagerly studied and less frequently treated, though not entirely neglected. 3. That all mixture of philosophy and human science with divine wisdom was to be most carefully avoided; that is, that pagan philosophy and classical learning should be kept distinct from, and by no means surpasse the Biblical theology; but, 4, that, on the contrary, all those students who were designed for the ministry should be accustomed from their early youth to the personal and study of the Holy Scriptures, or at the least to a plain system of theology, drawn from these unerring sources of truth. 5. That the whole course of their education was to be so directed as to render them useful in life, by the practical power of their doctrine and the commanding influence of their example. But it was destined to confine these reforms to students and the clergy. Religious persons of every class and rank were encouraged to meet in what werecalled Biblical colleges, or colleges of piety (we might call them prayer-meetings), where some exercised in reading the Scriptures, singing, and prayer, and others engaged in the exposition of the Scriptures; not in a dry and critical way, but in a strain of practical and experimental piety, whereby they were mutually edified. This practice, which always more or less obtains where religion flourishes (as, for instance, at the Reformation), raised the same sort of outcry as the rise of Methodism; and those who entered not into the spirit of the design were eager to catch at every instance of weakness or imprudence, to bring disgrace on that, which, in fact, brought disgrace upon themselves, as lukewarm and formal Christians. "In so saying, Master, thou reproachest us also."

Yet the greatest religious movement was John Amt (1555-1821), who wrote The True Christians, a work as usefully religiously as Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress or Doddridge's Religion in the Soul. Spener followed (1685-1705). The private religious meetings which he established about 1675, Collegia Pietatis, were the original form of their piety, justified by this important movement. One of his pupils was the saintly A. H. Francke (q. v.). Paul Gerhard, the well-known author of the German hymns, also belonged to the same party. The revival feeling spread rapidly through Germany, where the institution of the "Collegia," being in complete accord with the national instinct, soon attained great popularity. Up to 1686 Pietism had spread without exciting comotion, no persecution having yet been attempted. But when in this year Spener removed to Dresden, and several of his students made bold to follow him, it was really condemned by the moderate and orthodox part of their leader's practice, giving in their lectures particular prominence to the correction of the errors contained in Luther's translation of the Bible, the great body of Lutherans, who had been accustomed to regard this translation and its correction as a matter of no great moment, at such freedom of criticism, and at the practice of these Pietists who lectured in the popular tongue. All kinds of adverse rumors were circulated, they were maligning in many ways, and complaints were made to the university authorities. When these popular agitations were ignored, there followed tumults of so violent a character as to spread throughout Leipsic the seeds and principles of mutiny and sedition, and finally the matter was forced to public trial. Of course the pius and learned men above mentioned were, indeed, declared free from the errors and heresies that had been laid to their charge, but were, at the same time, prohibited from carrying on the plan of religious instruction they had undertaken with such zeal. It was during these troubles and divisions that the inviolable designation Pietists was first invented; it may at least be affirmed that it was not commonly known before this period. It was at first applied by some giddy and inconsiderate persons to those who frequented the Biblical colleges, and lived in a manner suitable to the instructions and exhortations that were addressed to them in these seminars of piety. It was afterward extended to those who were either distinguished by the excessive austerity of their manners, or who, regardless of truth and opinion, were only intent upon practice, and turned the whole vigor of their efforts towards the attainment of religious feelings and habits. But as it is the fate of all those denominations by which peculiar sects are distinguished to be variously and often very improperly applied, so the title "Pietist" was frequently given in common conversation to persons of eminent and useful lives, who were equally remarkable for their adherence to truth and their inculcation of its duties to persons whose motley characters exhibited an enormous mixture of profitigacy and enthusiasm, and who deserved the title of delicious fanatics better than any other denomination. This contest was by no means confined to Leipsic, but spread with incredible celerity through all the Lutheran churches in the different states and kingdoms of Europe. For from this time, in all the cities, towns, and villages where Lutheranism was proscribed, there started up, all of a sudden, persons of various castes and conditions, who, according to the import of the act of the court, that they were called by a divine impulse to pull up iniquity by the root; to restore to its primitive lustre and propagate through the world the declining cause of piety and virtue; to govern the Church of Christ by wiser rules than those by which it was at present directed; and who, partly in their writings and partly in their private and public discourses, pointed out the means and measures that were necessary to bring about this important revolution. Several religious societies were formed in various places, which, though they differed in some circumstances, and were not all conducted by those with equal wisdom, piety, and prudence, were, however, designed to promote the pious and useful purpose. In the mean time these unusual proceedings filled with uneasy and alarming apprehensions both those who were intrusted with the government of the Church and those who sat at the helm of the state. These apprehensions were justified by this important consideration, that the pious and well-meaning persons who composed these assemblies had indifferently admitted into their community a number of extravagant and hot-headed fanatics, who foretold the approaching destruction of Belieb (by which they meant the Lutheran Church), terrified the populace with fictitious visions, assumed the authority of prophets honored with a divine commission, obscured the divine truths of religion by a gloomy kind of jargon of their own invention, and revived doctrines that had long before been condemned by the Leipzig church. "The errors arose in all the Lutheran churches; and persons whose differences were occasioned rather by mere words and questions of little consequence than by any doctrines or institutions of considerable importance, attacked one another with the bitterness, enmity, and imputations with which countries severe laws were at length enacted against the Pietists. These revivers of piety proposed to carry on their plan without introducing any change into the doctrine, discipline, or form of government that were established in the Lutheran Church.

At the head of this movement stood, in Germany, the learned and pious Spener, whose sentiments were adopted by the professors of the new Academy of Halle; and particularly by Francke and Paulus Antonius, who had been invited thither from Leipsic, where they began to be suspected of Pietism. Though few pretended to treat either with indignation or contempt the intentions and purposes of these good men (which, indeed, none could despise without affecting to appear the enemy of practical religion and virtue), yet many eminent Lutheran divines, and especially the professors and pastors of Wittenberg, being of opinion that, in the execution of this laudable purpose, several unorthodox maxims were adopted and certain unwarrantable measures employed, proceeded publicly against Spener in the year 1695, and afterwards against his disciples and adherents, as the authors of those dreams and visions, of erroneous and dangerous opinions. These debates turned upon a variety of points, and therefore the matter of them cannot be comprehended under any one general head. If we consider them indeed in relation to their origin, and the circumstances that gave rise to them, we may be able to reduce them to some fixed principles. We have already said that those who had the advancement of pietism most zealously at heart were possessed of a notion that no order of men contributed more to retard its progress than the clergy, whose peculiar vocation it was to incite and promote it. Looking upon this as the root of the evil, it was but natural that their plans of reformation should begin here; and accordingly they laid it down as an essential principle that none should be admitted into the ministry whose peculiar vocation it was to incite and promote it. Hence they proposed, in the first place, a thorough reformation of the schools of divinity; and they explained clearly enough what they meant by this reformation, as we have seen above. As these maxims were propagated with the greatest industry and zeal, and were explained inadverently by some without those restrictions which prudence seemed to require, these pious patrons and revivers of pietry were suspected of designs that could not "but render them obnoxious to censure. They were supposed to despise philosophy and learning; to treat with indifference, and even to renounce, all inquiries into the nature and foundations of religious truths; to despise the zeal and labors of those who defended it against such as either corrupted or opposed it; and to place the whole of their theology in certain vague and incoherent declamations concerning the duties of morality. Hence arose those famous disputes concerning the use of philosophy and the value of human learning, considered in connection with the interests of religion; the dignity and usefulness of systematic theology; the necessity of polemic divinity; the excellence of the mystic system; and also concerning the true method of instructing the people. The second great object that employed the zeal and attention of the persons now under consideration was that the candidates for the ministry should not only for the future receive such an academical education as would tend rather to solid utility than to mere speculation, but also that they should dedicate themselves to God in a peculiar manner, and exhibit the most striking examples of piety and virtue. This maxim, which, when considered in itself, must be considered to be highly laudable, not only gave occasion to several new regulations, designed to restrain the passions of the studious youth, to inspire them with religious sentiments, and to excite them in holy resolutions, but also produced another maxim, which was a lasting source of controversy and debate, viz.: that no person who was not himself a model of piety and divine love was qualified to be a public teacher of piety, or a guide to others in the way of salvation. This opinion was considered by many as derogatory to the power and efficacy of the Word of God, which cannot be deprived of its divine influence by the vices of its ministers, and as a sort of revolt of the long-exploited errors of the Donatists, and what rendered it peculiarly liable to an interpretation of this nature was the imprudence of some Pietists, who inculcated and explained it without those restrictions that were necessary to render it unexceptionable. Hence arose endless and intricate debates concerning the following questions: whether the religious knowledge acquired by a wicked man can be termed theology? whether a vicious person can, in effect, attain a true knowledge of religion? how far the office and ministry of an impious ecclesiastical can be pronounced salutary and efficacious? whether an ungodly man cannot be susceptible of illumination? and other questions of a like nature. These revivers of declining piety went still farther. In order to render the ministry of their pastors as successful as possible in housing men from their indolence, and in stemming the torrent of corruption and impurity which threatened to engulf the churches, and, to a certain extent, Buddhism also, partook of the spirit of pietism. The opposition of the old Lutheran party of other parts of Germany produced controversies which continued till about 1720 (for an account, see Weissmann, Mem. Eccl. Hist. Svec. [1745], p. 1016 sq.). Zurich, where Galen and Cranach held sway, availed itself of it with gladness. It penetrated as far east as the provinces bordering on the Baltic Sea, and as far north as Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. Many of the continental courts welcomed it, and orphan-houses, after the model of Francke’s became the chief feature of the Reformed Church was influenced and impelled by it, and even England and the Netherlands indicated a strong sympathy for its practical and evangelical features. No higher tribute can be paid it than that of Tholuck, who avers that “the Protestant Church of Germany has never possessed so many zealous and instructural ministers and laymen as in the first forty years of the 18th century.” With a new generation of professors at Halle—among them C. B. Michaelis, the younger Francke, Freiherr zu, the elder Francke, and the younger Francke—taking the place of their more vigorous predecessors, Pietism began to lose its first power and earnest spirit. The persistent inquiry into scriptural truth passed over into a tacit acquiescence of the understanding. Reliance was put on the unchanging fruits of study. Spener had blended the emotions of the mind and heart, reason and faith, harmoniously; but the later Pietists cast off the former and blindly followed the latter. Hence they soon found themselves indulging in superstition, and repeating many of the errors of some of the most deluded Mystics. Science was frowned upon, because of its supposed conflict with the literal interpretations of Scripture. Science, like all human knowledge, is ever liable to error. The study of Protestantism, the sciences, and the arts, work for the furtherance of civilization, and not for the extent of error. The history of the Church, from the beginning of the 17th century was only the extreme elaboration of an error, the beginning of which we find as far back as Luther's time, and which became more and more a power in the Church through the influence of Melancthon. It was this: Mistaking the faith by which we believe for the faith which is believed. The principle of the Reformation was justification by faith, not the doctrine of faith and justification. In reply to the Catholics it was deemed sufficient to show that this was the true doctrine which points out the way of salvation to man. The great danger lay in mistaking faith itself for the doctrine of faith. Therefore, in the controversies concerning justifying faith, we find that faith gradually came to be considered in relation to its doctrinal aspects more than in connection with the personal, practical, and experimental knowledge of men. In this view pietism is an elaboration of the faith of the 16th century.

... So far from being heterodox, Spener even expressed himself in the most decided manner in favor of the doctrines of the Church. He would make faith consist less in the dogmatism of the denomination than in the personal faith of the heart; he would bring the doctrine away from the angry disputes of the schools and incorporate it into practical life. He was thoroughly united with the reformers as to the real signification of justifying faith, but these controversies which were sought to be re-established he rejected. From Spener's view of a new phase of spiritual life began to pervade the heart. The orthodoxy of the state Church had been accustomed to consider all baptized persons as true believers if only they had been educated in wholesome doctrines. There was a general demand of that time. There was a demand in the world, which was vital in Luther, and had transformed the world. The land, because it was furnished with the Gospel and the sacraments, was considered an evangelical country. The contrast between mere worldly and spiritual life, between the living and dead members of the Church, was practically abolished, though there still remained a theoretical distinction between the visible and invisible Church. As to the world outside the pale of the Church, the Jews and heathen, there was no thought whatever. Men believed they had done their duty and had fulfilled their whole duty when they had sent out Christian missionaries. Thus lived the state Church in quiet confidence of its own safety and pure doctrine at the time when the nation was recovering from the devastations of the Thirty-years' War. In the times succeeding the Reformation, says a Wurttemberg pastor of the past century, 'the greater portion of the common people trusted that they would certainly be saved if they believed correct doctrines; if one is neither a Roman Catholic nor a Calvinist, and confesses his opposition, he cannot possibly miss heaven; holiness is not so necessary after all' "(Aubler, Die geistliche Offenbarung, i, 278-281).

The enemies of pietism have confounded it with mysticism. There are undoubtedly points in common, but pietism was aggressive instead of contemplative; it was practical rather than theoretical. Both systems made the purity of life essential, but mysticism could not guard against mental disease, while pietism enjoyed a long season of healthful life. The latter was far too much engaged in relieving immediate and pressing wants to care for the general good of the Church and the career of the former. Pietism was mystical in so far as it made purity of heart essential to salvation; but it was the very antipodes of mysticism when organized and operating against a languid and torpid Church with such weapons as Spener and his coadjutors employed. Böhme and Spener were both antagonistic to rationalism, but in purity of heart they were beautifully in unison.
PIETOSI

A brief account of pietism is given in Hase’s Church Hist. § 409; and for a fuller account, see Schröckich, Kirchengesch. seit der Ref. viii, 255-291; Pusey, On German Theology, pt. ii (p. 67-118); pt. ii, ch. x: Amand Saintes, Crit. Hist. of Rationalism, ch. vii. Spener’s character and life may be seen in Canstein’s, and Sand’s account of him; and in Weismann, p. 966-972. A philosophical view of pietism, as a necessary stage in the development of German religious life, is given by Dörner in the Stud. u. Krit. 1884, pt. ii, p. 157, “Über den Pietismus.” Kahnis, apostolische Kirche (2nd ed.), p. 102, regards pietism as ministering indirectly to rationalism; much in the same way as bishop Fitzgerald criticized the similar evangelical movement of England (Aids to Faith, p. 49, etc.). The best account of pietism is to be found in Hornbach, spener u. seine Zeit.; Breschneider, Die Grundlage des evangelischen Pietismus; Marklin, Darstellung v. Kritik des modernen Pietismus. PIETOSI is the name of a celebrated Jewish family, called in Hebrew בני ספרד, which, like the families בני ספרד and בני ספרד, traced their origin to those Jews who were led into captivity after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus and Vespasian. To this family belong the following:

2. Jacob de, of Italy, wrote בְּנָי אֲרוֹן, a great collectaneum of divinities (Lissone, 1800):—בְּנָי אֲרוֹן, novellas on the treatises Chalilun and Temura (ibid. 1810):—בְּנָי אֲרוֹן, another collectaneum (ibid.).

3. Zidkia de, a brother of Benjamin, wrote בְּנָי אֲרוֹן, on Jewish rites and precepts (Venice, 1546; Sulzbach, 1699; Dubno, 1794). See Wolf, Bibl. Heb., i, 1001; iii, 961; iv, 962; Schott, Krónische Unter suchung über das Werk Schöbels ha-Leket in Zijon (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1841), i, 147 sq.; Furst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 1003. (B. P.)

PIETRO, MICHELE DE, an Italian prelate of note, was born Jan. 18, 1747, at Albano. After defending in public disputation at Rome with great success some theological propositions, he was appointed professor of ecclesiastical history in the Gregorian university, and of canonical law at the Roman archi-gymnasium. He took an important part in the work of the congregation which examined the decisions of the Synod of Pisa, favorable to Jansenism, and contributed with the learned Gerdl to the redaction of the bull Auctoratem fecit (1794). Pius VI, when he left Rome (1798), made him apostolic legate and he had to give his advice in many a delicate question; for instance, in that of the oath of hatred against royalty which was exacted from French clergy men. Pius VII appointed him successively patriarch of Jerusalem, cardinal (Feb. 28, 1801), and legate to the Propaganda. When this pontiff was forced to leave Rome (1809), Pietro was chosen to occupy his place; but he was soon compelled to betake himself to Paris, and upon his refusal to attend the religious celebration of Napoleon’s marriage with Marie Louise, he was punished with banishment, loss of his dignities, and confiscation of his property. He was relegated to Saumur with cardinals Gabrielli and Primizzi, confined in 1810 in the dungeon of Vincennes, he joined the pope in 1813 at Fontainebleau, and was again separated from him in January, 1814. The political situation finally allowed him to return to Rome, and he became grand penitentiary, prefect of the Index, bishop of Albano (1816), and cardinal (1820). He died at Rome July 2, 1821. This prelate, remarkable for his circumspection and flexibility, was considered one of the luminaries of the Sacred College, for his theological lore and administrative abilities. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iii, 305.

PIETY occurs but once in the A. V. "Let them learn first the precepts of piety at home." (1 Tim. v, 4). The choice of this word here instead of the more usual equivalents of "godliness," "reverence," and the like, was probably determined by the special sense of pietas, as "erga parentes" (Cicero, Pro Polit. 22: Rev. i, 15; In 6, ii, 22). It does not appear in the earlier English versions, and we may recognise in its application in this passage a special felicity. A word was wanted for εὐγένεια which, unlike "showing godliness," would admit of a human as well as a divine object, and this pietas supplied the Smith.

Piety, or godliness, only another name for personal religion, consists in a firm belief, and in right conceptions of the being, perfections, and providence of God; with suitable affections to him, resemblance of his moral perfections in the will, and constant obedience to his will. In the different articles included in this definition, such as knowledge, veneration, love, resignation, etc., are explained in their proper places in this work. For Perverted Piety, see ETHICS.

PIGA, MELETIUS, an Eastern prelate, flourished in the second half of the 16th century. He was in 1591 exarch of the archbishop of Constantinople, and he was chosen patriarch of Antioch after that time was chosen to fill the chair of St. Mark’s. As patriarch of Alexandria, Piga distinguished himself by great devotion to ecclesiastical studies, and as the author of one or two controversial writings for the Slavonic church, which was exposed to the intrusion of Romanism.

PIGENAT, FRANCOIS, a French preacher of the Jesuitic order, was born at Autun near the close of the 16th century. He early became a member of the Society of Jesus, and at Paris was one of the most zealous preachers of the League. In September, 1598, he was, in a somewhat astonishing manner, elected curate of St. Nicolas des Champs, Legesay having been expelled by his parishioners as suspected of Huguenotism. Henry III said on that occasion that "Parisians were kings and popes; and if you only let them have their own way, they will soon dispose of the whole spiritual and temporal power of the realm." In January, 1598, Pigenat preached at Paris the funeral sermon of the duke and cardinal of Guise, assassinated at Blois by order of the king, and gave them the title of martyrs. Pigenat took a conspicuous part in all the absurd and obscene processions of the time. He organized one in his own parish, where over a thousand persons, of both sexes and every age, were marched half naked, the curate himself having only a white robe to cover his body. He was one of the first to sign the deposition of Henry III, and became a member of the council of the Three Musketeers. He was one of the first to make his entrance into Paris. He died in 1598. A—corresponding to L'Etoile, he was not destitute of talent and imagination.

His brother, Odon Pigeonat, provincial of the Jesuits and one of the Seize, was also a chief of the League. He died at Bourges of an attack of in rheumatism. A third member of the same family, Jean Pigeonat, lived a much more retired life. He left Avocatages aux Pouvoirs, Histoire, et Mathématiques, etc. (Paris, 1592, 8vo).—Hofeer, Nouv. Brevi. Générale, xii, 265.

Pigeon is the rendering—but only in connection with the epithet "young"—of two very different Heb. and one Gr. word: Ἰερόν, ἀνδρί, ἀντιπότο, a general name for any member of the dove family ("dove") everywhere, except in the Mosaic enactment, Lev. i, 14; v, 7, 11; xi, 6, 8; xiv, 22, 50; xiv, 29, 12; Num. vi, 10; Luke ii, 24; but in Gen. xv, 9; 22, 5a, godzli, the young of any bird, perhaps there correctly of the dove, although in Deut. xxxii the "young" of the eagle is meant. The Biblical passages in which the pigeon is mentioned may be classified as follows:

1. Pigeons or doves were the only birds used for sacrificial, (comp. already Gen. xv, 9), in particular young pigeons (Ἰερόν ὑπ' ἄνδρι, pulis columbarius) and turtle-doves, which were sacrificed, sometimes with other offerings (Lev. xi, 14); in purifying women after childbirth, sometimes alone as free-will offerings made by fire (Lev. i, 14); or were prescribed in the purifications from leprosy (Lev. xiv, 22), from personal uncleanness (Lev. xv, 19); of that of Nazarites (Num. vi, 10), and of women after menstruation (Lev. xv, 25). But in two cases, where poverty interfered with the more costly regulations, these were substituted (Lev. v, 7 sqq.; xi, 8. Comp. Luke ii, 24). Such offerings of birds were also made by the poor in Egypt. (See Paasch, s. v., 89, 92. Comp. Engel, Cypres, ii, 184 sq.) For the purpose of providing these same doves, dealers in pigeons used to sit in the neighborhood of the Temple (Matt. xxii, 12; Mark xi, 13; John ii, 14, 16); and the raising of doves was from an early day a pursuit peculiar to the Jews (Isa. lx, 8. Comp. Rosenmüller, Morganen, vi, 258), although there were also many wild pigeons in Palestine (Ezek. vi, 16, Comp. Schubert, iii, 250), which built their nests in debris of the rocks (Jer. xxxi, 9. Comp. ii, 14; Robinson, ii, 433, or at least sought a refuge there when chased (Ps. xi, 1. Comp. Midr. xxxii, 495 sq.; Quent. Spera, xii, 12 sq.). See Schwobel, De colombinarum et columbariorum cultu. Ed. Wermardt, De colomb. sacra Syro- us (Helmst. 1761).

2. The flight of the pigeon was employed by the poet as a figure for swiftness (Ps. iv, 7; Hosea xi, 11. Comp. Soph., Ed. Col. 1081; Eurip. Bucch. 1590; Robinson, ii, 484, and is understood by many interpreters in several passages of the New Testament (Matt. iii, 16; Mark i, 10; John i, 29) in which the Holy Spirit’s descent is spoken of, but this may be doubted. The figure is carried out still further by Isaiah (ix, 8), and it is true that the pigeon surpasses in swiftness and directness of flight many birds of its size, without, however, being remarkable in this respect (Verg. Aen. v, 213 sq.; Plin. x, 52). The cause of this may be found in its long wings (Rechten, Naturgesch. iv, 2), by means of which it often escapes the birds which would prey upon it (Curtius, i, 47, ed. 1854, and 46, 45). In songs of love, the eyes of the beloved, as expressive of attachment and of innocence, are compared with those of the dove, or, as some say, with little doves (Cant. i, 15; iv, 1). And Cant. v, 12 it is said, "like the vessels of brass, bathed in milk, rating in fulness," a very beautiful description of the swimming apple of the eye. (The explanation of these words by Umbret and Döpke is in better taste than that of Rosenmüller.) The voice of the dove is represented by the poets as an aigis, an expression of sorrow (Num. iii, xxvii, 14; 11x, 11; Nah. ii, 8. Comp. Ezek. vi, 16; Theoc. vii, 141; Verg. Aen. vii, 59; Mar-to his parents, who were opposed to his design. In 1787 he arrived at the island of Hon-Dat, near the coast of Cochín-China. The apostolic vicar of that mission, M. Fuguet, bishop of Puebla, gave him the direction of his college, which he was then transferring to that place. In 1788 the governor of the province Kan-Rao, to which the island of Hon-Dat belonged, ordered him to be arrested, and sentenced him to the cangue, with another French missionary and a Chinese priest. The cangue was a form of punishment, and after three months' captivity were set at large. Pignone resumed the direction of his college, and transferred it to Pondicherry. In 1770 he was appointed bishop of Adran in partibus, and coadjutor of the apostolic vicar of Cochin-China, whom he soon after succeeded in his office. In 1774 he entered Cochin-China by the Cambodians. He found the whole country in the power of rebels, who had put to death the king and his nephew. The brother of the latter, Nguyén-Auta, who had been imprisoned, escaped and fled to the house of the bishop of Adran, where he was concealed for a month. He succeeded afterwards in bringing together a small force, took possession of Lower Cochin-China, and called to his side his benefactor, and was, in all he did, directed by his advice. In 1783 he was beaten by the rebels, and had to leave theiscopal. Pignone then sailed along the coast of Cambodia, went to the Cambodians, and thence to Siam. Having embarked for Pondicherry, he heard, while sailing along the coast of Cambodia, that Nguyén-Auta was at a short distance on the coast; he joined him, who, having put six hundred Jesuits, was reduced to the last extremity of starvation. He relieved them, with his own provisions, and after spending a fortnight with them, he gained Pulo-Way, a small deserted island, situated sixty leagues from the continent. He stayed there nine months, during which time he wrote, in company with a Cochin-Chinese priest, instructions for the religious worship, and corrected several works translated from the French. In December, 1784, he joined again the king of Cochin-China, and soon after went in person to solicit the assistance of Louis XVI for his friend, taking along with him the six-year-old son of the Asiatic prince. He arrived at Lorient February, 1787. His embassy was a successful one. France engaged to send four frigates and nearly two thousand soldiers to Cochin-China, and obtained in compensation the principal harbor of that country, Tournon. Louis XVI, for whom Pignone had his presents prepared, and had his present prepared by him to Nguyén-Auta. The bishop, who had received rich presents himself, embarked for Pondicherry with the young prince, carrying to Count Thomas Conway, governor-general of the East Indies, the letter which he had obtained from him, with the direction to prepare and command in person the projected expedition; but various obstacles, among others the Revolution, prevented it, and the bishop could only equip two little ships, which loaded with ammunition, guns, etc. Count Conway put also at his disposition a frigate, on the front of which he sailed to Cochin-China, where he joined the king in December, 1789. The arrival of these subsidies, the clever exertions of the French officers, who, in a short time equipped a powerful fleet, and organized an army of six thousand soldiers after the European fashion, gave the victory to the king. The bishop was hopeful of turning to the advantage of religion the influence he had won, when he died of dysentery, Oct. 9, 1799. In August, 1861, the French government restored the tomb of Pignone de Béhaine, and proclaimed it French property.—Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, xi, 224.

PIGNONE, Simone, an Italian painter, who, according to Oretti, was born at Florence in the year 1614, studied with Fabrizio Boschi, afterwards with Pasquino, and finally with Francesco Furini, whose manner he thoroughly imbibed although he improved his coloring by visiting Venice, and studying the works of the great masters, particularly those of Titian and Tintoretto. After his return to Florence he distinguished himself by several works which he executed for the churches, and which were greatly admired for the delicacy and beauty of their execution. The best of these are, St. Michael descending the Borea, for the church of the Nunziata; St. Louis, King of France, Distributing his Wealth to the Poor, in S. Felicita; and an altar-piece, Monte Oliveto. His most admired works, however, are to be found in the collections of the nobility. These are of small size, and from sacred subjects. There are also some of his pictures in the Florentine Gallery. He was fond of painting mythological subjects, the peculiar character of which afforded a fine opportunity of displaying his marvellous skill in flesh tints. Lanzi and Carlo Maratta agree as to his being among the best of the Florentine painters of his time. His death occurred in 1598. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, ii, 695.

Pignorius, Laurentius, a noted Italian ecclesiastic, celebrated especially as an antiquary, was born at Padua in 1571, and flourished at Treviso, where he held a canonry. He died of the plague in 1631. He collected a cabinet of medals and other curiosities of rare extent and value. His principal work is an attempt to explain the famous Isiac Table, a relic of Egyptian antiquity, covered with figures of divinities, symbols, and hieroglyphics. The table is supposed by Warburton to belong to the latest period of Egypt. Pignorius also wrote a treatise, De Secretis et eorum adpud veteres Ministeriis: Antiquitates of Padua, etc.

Pi-hah'-roth (Heb. Pi-hachiroth, רַע הַחֵרֹת, understood by some to be of Hebrew etymology, and rendered mouth of the gorges; Sept. ἄλοχος τοῦ στόματος Κέμ, of the mouth of Kene; Vulg. Phaciroth), a place before which the Israelites encamped, at the close of the third month, on their way from Baran, when they arrived on the borders of Egypt. Pi-hahiroth was before Migdol, and on either hand were Baal-zephon and the sea (Exod. xiv, 2, 9; Numb. xxxiii, 7, 8). The name is probably that of a natural locality, from the unlikelihood that there should have been a town or village in both parts of the country where it is placed in addition to Migdol and Baal-zephon, which seem to have been, if not towns, at least military stations, and its name is susceptible of an Egyptian etymology giving a sense apposite to this idea. The first element of the word is apparently derived by its pronunciation as a separate word (Exod. xxxiii, 8), and it would therefore appear to be the masculine definite article Pe, Pn, or Pr. Jabalnoci proposed the Coptic pi-achiroth, “the place where a gosp grows,” and this, or a similar name, the late M. Fulgence Fresnel recognized in the modern Gherayeb el-bisz, “the bed of reeds,” near Ras Atakah. There is another Gherayeb el-bisz near Suez, and such a name would of course depend for its permanence upon the continuance of a vegetation subject to change. Migdol appears to have been a common name for a watch-tower. See Migdol. Baal-zephon we take to have had a similar meaning to that of Migdol. See BAAL-ZEPHON. We should expect, therefore, that the encampment would have been in a depression, partly marshy, having on either hand an elevation marked by a watch-tower (Smith). It is evident that so vague a circumstance as the presence of reeds, which are common in any moist place near Suez, cannot serve to determine the locality. This must be fixed by the more definite notices of the narrative, which appear to us to point to the opening of the plain of Elath, between Jebel Atakah and Jabel Abu-Deraj. See EXOD; RED SEA, CROSSING OF.

Pik, also called Jeremiah Berlinh, a somewhat noted Jewish rabbi, flourished at Breslau, in Silesia, where he died, May 13, 1799, after having occupied the rabbinship for about sixteen years. He wrote הַרְבִּין, or notes and corrections to the Talmud, which are generally printed in the modern editions of the Talmud — פִּלְאָט (v. q.r.), dictionary, called Aruch, but only on the letters א-ה, which were edited by H. W. Günzburg (Breslau, 1860), while the second part, comprising the letters ו-ת, which was prepared by Luzzatto and Hurwitz, was edited by Brönkranz (Vienna, 1859) — פּוֹלֵאָת. I.e. glossaries on the Targum of Onkelos (v. q.r.), edited by D. Sklover (Breslau, 1827, and Vienna, 1856) — פּוֹלֵאָת on the Mishna, printed in the editions of the Mishna (Vienna, 1798; Prague, 1828-30); and with many additions edited by W. Eger, Altona, 1841-46). Pike, Samuel, an English Dissenting minister, was born at Ramsey, Wiltshire, about 1717. He became master of King’s College, Cambridge, and in 1747 succeeded John Hill at the Three Cranes, London. He died in 1773. Pike was quite a voluminous writer. Among his many productions we mention, Thoughts on such Passages of Scripture as enjoin Affection to the poor (Cambridge, 1754, 12mo).—Philosophia Sacra, or the Principles of Natural Philosophy extracted from Divine Revelation (Lond. 1758, 8vo). A scarce work, written on Hutchinsonian principles:—The Nature and Evidences of Saving Faith; being the Substance of Four Sermons preached in St. Paul’s Church, on Feb. 24, 1; Two of which were Preached at the Mews Gate, London, Pinner’s Hall. Pikollos, a deity among the ancient Wends of Slavonia, who was believed to preside over the infernal regions and the roads of the dead. He was represented as an old man with a pale countenance, and having before him three dead heads. He corresponded to Pluto of the ancient Romans, and to Stera of the Hindos. Like the latter, he desires human blood, and reigns at once over the manes or souls of the dead, and over the metals in the bowels of the earth.

Pilate, Pontius (Πλάτων Πίλατος, Greecized from the Latin Pontius Pilatus), the Roman procurator of Judaea, during the period of our Lord’s public ministry and passion, and chiefly known in history from his connection with the Crucifixion. In the following account we combine Scriptural notices with information from other ancient resources and modern examination.

I. His Name. — His praenomen or first name is unknown. His name on a family-name indicates that he was connected, by descent or adoption, with the gens of the Pontii, first conspicuous in Roman history in the person of C. Pontius Telesinus, the great Samnite general. The cognomen Pilatus has received two explanations. (1) As armed with the pilum or javelin (comp. "pilata agmina," Virg. Aen. xii, 121); (2) As contracted from Pilatus. The fact that the pilum or cap was the badge of manumitted slaves (comp. Suetonius, Nero, c. 57; Tiber. c. 4), makes it probable that the epithet marked him out as a libertus, or as descended from one.

II. His Office. — He was one of the six procurators of Judaea (Matt. xxvii, 2; Mark xv, 1; Luke iii, 1; John xviii, xix), under whom our Lord taught, suffered, and died (Acts iii, 18; iv, 27; xiii, 28; 1 Tim. vi, 15). The testimony of Tacitus on this point is no less clear than it is important; for it fixes beyond a doubt the time when the foundations of our religion were laid. "The author of that name (Christian) or sect was Christ, who was captive in the reign of Tiberius by Pontius Pilate" (Auctor nominis ejus Christus, Tiberio imperante, per procuratorem Pontium Pilatum supplicio aequae censurae exulavit).

A procurator (ἰερώπορος, Philo, Leg. ad Catum, and Josephus, Wur, ii, ii, 2; but less correctly iερωπος, Matt. xxvii, 2; and Josephus, Ant. xviii, 3, 1) was generally a Roman knight, appointed to act under the governor of a province as Pilate of the revenue, and judge in cases connected with it. Strictly speaking, procuratores Caesaris were only required in the imperial provinces, i.e. those which, according to the constitution of Augustus, were reserved for the special administration of the emperor, without the intervention of the senate and people, and governed by his legate. In the senatorial provinces, governed by consuls, the corresponding duties were discharged by quaestors. Yet it appears that sometimes procuratores were appointed in those provinces also, to collect certain dues of the fiscus (the emperor’s special revenue), as distinguished from those of the aerarium (the revenue administered by the senate). Sometimes in a small territory, especially in one contiguous to a larger province, and dependent upon it, the procurator was head of the administration, and had full military and judicial authority, though he was responsible to the governor of the neighboring province. Thus Judaea was attached to Syria upon the deposition of Archelaus (A.D. 6), and a procurator appointed to govern it, with Cæsarea for its capital. Already, during a temporary absence of Archelaus, it had been in charge of the procurator Simonides; then, after Tibereus’s banishment, came Coponius; the third procurator was M. Ambivius; the fourth Annius Rufus; the fifth Valerianus Gratus; and the sixth Pontius Pilate (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 2, 2), who was appointed A.D. 25-26, in the twelfth year of Tiberius. He doubled the office for a period of ten years (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 10, 9). The agreement on this point between the accounts in the New Testament and those supplied by Josephus is entire and satisfactory. It has been exhibited in detail by the learned, accurate, and candid Lardner (i, 150-399, Lond. 1827). These procurators had their headquarters at Cæsarea, which is called by Tacitus Judæa caput; but they took up their temporary abode at Jerusalem on occasion of the great feasts, as a measure of precaution against any popular outbreak. See Procurator.

III. His Life.—1. Of the early history of Pilate we know nothing; but a German legend fills up the gap strangely enough. Pilate is the bastard son of Tyrus, king of Mayence. His father sends him to Rome as a hostage. There he is guilty of a murder, is sent to Pontus, rises in insurrection, and slays the barbarous tribes there; he comes in consequence the new name of Pontius, and is sent to Judæa. It has been suggested that the twenty-second legion, which was in Palestine at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and was afterwards stationed at Mayence, may have been in this case either the bearers of the tradition or the inventors of the tale (comp. Wilmar, Deutsche Nationalliteratur, i, 217).

2. His Official Career.—(1). His Administration in General.—One of Pilate's first acts was to remove the headquarters of the army from Cesarea to Jerusalem.

The soldiers of course took with them their standards, bearing the image of the emperor, into the Holy City. Pilate had been obliged to send them in by night, and there were no bounds to the rage of the people on discovering what had thus been done. They poured down in crowds to Cesarea, where the procurator was then residing, and besought him to remove the images. After five days of discussion he gave the signal to some concealed soldiers to surround the petitioners and put them to death unless they ceased to trouble him; but this only strengthened their determination, and they declared themselves ready rather to submit to death than forego their resistance to an idolatrous innovation. Pilate then yielded, and the standards were by his orders brought back to Cesarea (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 3, 12; War, ii, 9, 2-4). No previous governor had ventured on such an outrage. Herod the Great, it is true, had placed the Roman eagle on one of his new buildings; but this had been followed by a violent outbreak, and the attempt had not been repeated. (The word is used by M. L. Ed. Gesch. Geschicht., iv, 609). The extent to which the scruples of the Jews on this point were respected by the Roman governors is shown by the fact that no effigy of either god or emperor is found on the money coined by them in Judea before the war under Nero (Ibid., x, 33, referring to De Stalsey, Recherches sur la Numismatique judaïque, pt. viii, ix). Assuming this, the denarius with Caesar's image and superscription of Matt. xxiii must have been a coin from the Roman mint, or that of some other province. The latter was probably current for the common purposes of life. The Shchel alone was received as a Temple-offering. See Abomination of Desolation.

Colin of Judea struck under Pontius Pilate.

Observe : ybdhwn Kaiwso ("Of Tiburion Caesar"), with the legend o l6, l. 1, A.D. 19, the year of our Lord's crucifixion. See also a note of the same kind at the foot of a coin struck in the name of Caesar, with three or four cori (coins) together. Probably a quadrans, equivalent to two "missiva" (Matt. xix, 29).

On two other occasions Pilate nearly drove the Jews to insurrection: the first when, in spite of this warning about the images, he hung up in his palace at Jerusalem some gilt shields inscribed with the names of deities, which were only removed by an order from Tiberius (Philo, Ad Caesarem, § 38, ii, 589); the second when he appropriated the revenue arising from the redemption of towns to fortification (Mark vii, 11) to the construction of an aqueduct. This order led to a riot, which he suppressed by sending among the crowd soldiers with concealed daggers, who massacred a great number, not only of ristrers, but of casual spectators (Josephus, War, ii, 9, 4). Ewald suggests that the Tower of Siloam (Luke xii, 4) may have been part of the same works, and that this was the reason why its fall was looked upon as a judgment (Gesch. vi, 40). The Pharisaic reverence for whatever was set apart for the Corban (Mark vii, 11), and their scruples as to admitting into it anything that was impure (Origin, Mark, xiv, 11; Wai, xxvii, 6), may be regarded, perhaps, as outgrowths of the same feeling. See CORBAN.

To these specimens of his administration, which rest on the testimony of profane authors, we must add the slaughter of certain Galileans, which was told to our Lord as a piece of news (ἐγείραν τοὺς ἄνθρωπος, Luke xii, 1), and on which he founded some remarks on the connection between sin and calamity. It must have occurred at some feast at Jerusalem, in the outer court of the Temple, since the blood of the worshippers was mingled with their sacrifices; but the silence of Josephus about it seems to show that riots and similar sudden occasions were so frequent that it was needless to record them all. Ewald suggests that the insurrection of which Mark speaks (xxv, 7) must have been that connected with the appropriation of the Corban (supra), and that this explains the eagerness with which the people demanded Barabbas's, his decision on this latter occasion being recorded, from Barabba's name, that he was the son of a rabbi (Abba was a rabbinic title of honor), and thus accounts for the part taken in his favor by the members of the Sanhedrim. See BARABBAS.

(2). His special Connection with Jesus.—It was the custom for the procurators to reside at Jerusalem during the great feasts, to preserve order, and accordingly, at the time of our Lord's last Passover, Pilate was occupying his official residence in Herod's palace; and to the gates of this palace Jesus, condemned on the charge of blasphemy, was brought early in the morning by the chief priests and officers of the Sanhedrin, who were unable to enter the residence of a Gentile, lest they should be defiled, and unfit to eat the Passover (John xix, 28). Pilate therefore came out to learn their purpose, and was astonished, first to hear that they seemed to have expected that he would have carried out their wishes without further inquiry, and therefore merely described our Lord as a ἀντιτικαυτος (distruber of the public peace); but as a Roman procurator had too much respect for justice, or at least understood his business too well to consent to such a condemnation, and as they knew that he would not enter into theological questions, any more than Gallio afterwards did on a somewhat similar occasion (Acts xviii, 14), they were obliged to devise a new charge, and therefore interpreted our Lord's claims in a political sense, accusing him of assuming the royal title, perverting the nation, and forbidding the payment of tribute to Rome (Luke xxiii, 3; an account plainly presupposed in John xviii, 33). It is evident that from this moment Pilate was distracted between two conflicting feelings: a fear of offending the Jews, who had already grounds of accusation against him, which would be greatly strengthened by any show of lukewarmness in punishing an offence against the imperial government, and a conscious conviction that Jesus was innocent, since it was absurd to suppose him desirous to free the nation from the yoke of authority which was criminal in the eyes of the Sanhedrin. Moreover, this last feeling was strengthened by his own hatred of the Jews, whose religious scruples had caused him frequent trouble, and by a growing respect for the calm dignity and meekness of the sufferer. First he examined our Lord privately, and asked him whether he were a king. The question which he in return put to his judge, "Seargent thou this of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me?" seems to imply that there was in Pilate's own mind a suspicion that the executioners had so far as was he charged with being; a suspicion which shows itself again in the later question, "WARRANT AMID THOU?" (John xix, 8), in the increasing desire to release him (ver. 12), and in the refusal to alter the inscription on the cross (ver. 22). In any case Pilate accepted as satisfactory Christ's assurance that he was not of this world, that is, not worldly in its nature or objects, and therefore not to be founded by this world's weapons, though he could not understand the assertion that it was to be established by bearing witness to the truth. (Comp. Mark, xxv, 5). It is a question of a worldly-minded politician, sceptical because he was indifferent, one who thought truth an empty name, or at least could not see "any connection between διάφανα and Παθητικαί, truth and policy" (Dr. C. Wordsworth, Comm. ad loc.). With this question he Pilate brought the interview to a close, and came out to the Jews and declared the prisoner innocent. To this they replied that his teaching had stirred up all the people from Galilee to Jerusalem. The mention of Galilee suggested to Pilate a new way of escaping from his dilemma, by sending on the case to Herod Antipas, to treat with him in private, and then releasing Jesus to the feast, while at the same time this gave him an opportunity for making overtures of reconciliation to Herod, with whose jurisdiction he had probably in some recent instance interfered. But Herod, though prompted by this act of courtesy, declined to enter into the matter, and merely sent Jesus back to Pilate dressed in a shining kingly robe (ἐξοδήμα λαμπρόν, Luke xxiii., 11), to express his ridicule of such pretensions, and contempt for the whole business. So Pilate was compelled to come to a decision, and first, having assembled the chief priests and the people, he was probably summoned in the expectation that they would be favorable to Jesus, he announced to them that the accused had done nothing worthy of death, but at the same time, in hopes of pacifying the Sanhedrin, he proposed to release him before he released him. But as the accusers were resolved to have his blood, they rejected this concession, and therefore Pilate had recourse to a fresh expedient. It was the custom for the Roman governor to grant every year, in honor of the Passover, pardon to one criminal condemned to death. The origin of the practice is unknown, though we may connect it with the fact mentioned by Livy (v, 13) that at a Lecture-seminarum vinetia quoca dempta vincula. Pilate therefore offered the people their choice between two, the murder Barabbas, and the prophet whom a few days before they had hailed as the Messiah. To receive their decision he ascended the στήπα, a portable tribunal which was carried about with a Roman magistrate to be placed wherever he might direct, and which in the present case was erected on a tessellated pavement (λαστρωτοὺς in front of the palace, and called in Hebrew גבעוקס, probably from being laid down on a slight elevation) on which he stood. As soon as he had taken his seat, he received a mysterious message from his wife, according to tradition a proselyte of the gate (16ον, χαύρα), named Procla or Claudia Procula (Evans, Nedd, ii), who had "suffered many things in a dream," which impelled her to entreat her husband not to condemn the Just One. But he had no longer any choice in the matter, for the rabble, instigated of course by the priests, was clamorous for the death of Jesus; insurrection seemed imminent, and Pilate reluctantly yielded. But before issuing the fatal order he washed his hands before the multitude, as a sign that he was innocent of the crime, in imitation probably of the ceremony enjoined in Deut. xx1, where it is ordered that when the perpetrator of a murder is not discovered, the elders of the city in which it occurs shall wash their hands, with the declaration, “Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it.” Such a practice might naturally be adopted even by a Roman, and Pilate, as he stood among the multitude around him. As in the present case it produced no effect, Pilate ordered his soldiers to inflict the scourging preparatory to execution; but the sight of unjust suffering so patiently borne seems again to have troubled his conscience, and prompted a new effect in favor of the victim. He brought him out bleeding from the savage punishment, and decked in the scarlet robe and crown of thorns which the soldiers had put on him in derision, and said to the people, “Behold the man!” hoping that such a spectacle would arouse them to shame and remorse. But (3) his Eventual Fate—Here, as far as Scripture is concerned, our knowledge of Pilate’s life ends. But we learn from Josephus (Ant. xvi, 4, 1) that his anxiety to avoid giving offence to Caesar did not save him from political disaster. The Samaritans were unquiet and rebellious. A leader of their own race had promised to Pilate led his troops against them, and defeated them easily enough. The Samaritan king, Vespasian, now possessed of Syria, and he sent Pilate to Rome to answer their accusations before the emperor (Jos. 9). When he reached Rome he found Tiberius dead and Caligula on the throne, A.D. 46. Eusebius adds (Hist. Eccles. ii, 7) that soon afterwards, "weary with misfortunes," he killed himself. As to the scene of his death there are various traditions. One is that he was banished to Vienna Allobrogum (Vienne on the Rhone), where a singular monument, a pyramid on a quadrangular base, fifty-two feet high, is called Pontius Pilate's tomb (Smith, Diet. of Christ. Ant. art. Vienna). Another is that he sought to hide himself on the mountain by the lake of Lucerne, now called Mount Pilatus; and there, after spending years in its recesses, in remorse and despair rather than penitence, plunged into the dismal lake which occupies its summit. According to the popular belief, "a form is often seen to emerge from the gloomy waters, and go through the action of one washing his hands; and when he does so dark clouds of mist gather first round the bosom of the Infernal Lake (such it has been styled of old), and then, wrapping the whole upper part of the mountain in darkness prevails as a hurricane, which is sure to follow in a short space" (Scott, Anne of Geierstein, ch. i). (See below.)

Pilate's wife is also, as might be expected, prominent in these traditions. Her name is given as Claudia Procula (Nephele, Hist. Eccles. i, 80). She had been a proselyte to Judaism before the crucifixion (Ewog. Niceph. c. 2). Nothing certain is known of her history, but the tradition that she became a Christian as old as the time of Origen (Hom. in Matt. xxvii). The Greek Church has canonized her. The dream has been interpreted by some as a divine interposition; by others as a suggestion of the devil, who wished to prevent the Saviour's death: by others as the unconscious reflection of her interest in the reports which had reached her regarding Jesus. The description of Jesus as "that just man" ( Acts 23:35), it is remarked by Schaff, recalls the celebrated unconscious prophecy of Plato, in his Republic, as to the savior who was, after enduring all possible sufferings, to restore righteousness. In the earlier periods, and indeed so long as the commonwealth subsisted, it was not very unusual for the governors of provinces to take their wives with them (Senec, De Convit., 25), and in the strict regulations which Augustus introduced he did not allow the favor, except in peculiar and specified circumstances (Seuton, Aug., 24). The practice, however, grew to be more and more prevalent, and the interest of the government in it is evident from Tacitus that at the time of the death of Augustus, Germanicus had his wife Agrippina with him in Germany (Annal. i, 40, 41; comp. iii, 38-39; Josephus, Ant. xx, 10, 1; Ulpian, iv, 2). Indeed, in the beginning of the reign of Titus, Germanicus took his wife with him into the East. Piso, the prefect of Syria, took his wife also along with him at the same time (Tacit. Annal. ii, 54, 55). "But," says Lardner (i, 152), "nothing can render this (the practice in question) more apparent than a motion made in the Roman senate by Severus Cestius, in the fourth consulship of Tiberius, and second of Drusus Caesar (A.D. 21), that no magistrates among whom any province was assigned should be accompanied by his wife, except the senate's rejecting it, and that with some indignation" (Tacit. Annal. iii, 53, 54). The fact is too important to be thus incidentally referred to, or rather inexplicable, in Matthew, being thus confirmed by full and unquestionable evidence, cannot fail to serve as a corroboration of the evangelical history. (Comp. Paulus, Comm. iii, 728; Kuinoel, In loc. Mut.; Gotter, De Conjung. genit. in Jona, 1704; Kluge, De Stereo Uxoribus Pl. 11. 1720; Hackett, Examen Sotius Uxorum Pl. Odlemb. 1785.)

IV. His Character.—The character of Pilate may be sufficiently inferred from the sketch given above of his conduct at our Lord's trial. By some he has been described as one of the worst of tyrants; by others, who have perhaps some knowledge of the hard hands of the Romans, have unduly palliated or denied. Tertullian speaks of him as virtually a Christian at heart ("jam pro sua conscientia Christianum,"); and the Ethiopian Church has even made him a saint. We have no reason to suppose that, so far as his general administration went, it differed greatly from that of the other Roman governors of Judaea. He was a type of the rich and corrupt Romans of his age; a worldly-minded statesman, conscious of no higher wants than those of this life, yet by no means unmoved by feelings of justice and mercy. His conduct to the Jews, in the instances quoted from Josephus, though severe, was not thoughtlessly cruel or tyrannical, considering the general practice of Roman governors, and the difficulties of dealing with a nation so arrogant and perverse. Certainly there is nothing in the facts recorded by the gospel writers inconsistent with his desire, obvious from the Gospel narrative, to save our Lord. But all his better feelings were overpowered by a selfish regard for his own security. He would not encounter the least hazard of personal annoyance in behalf of innocence and justice; the unrighteous condemnation of a good man, in comparison with the fear of the emperor's frown and the loss of place and power. While we do not differ from Chrysostom's opinion that he was ψαράπονος (Chrysost. i, 802, A.D. Jud. vi), or that recorded in the Apostolical Constitutions (v, 14), that he was also ψαράπονος, we yet see abundant reason for our Lord's merciful judgment, "He that delivered me unto thee hath the greater sin." At the same time his history furnishes a proof that worldliness and want of principle are sources of crimes no less awful than those which spring from deliberate and reckless wickedness. The unhappy notoriety given to his name by its place in the two universal creeds of Christendom is due, not to any desire of singling him out for shame, but to the need of fixing the date of our Lord's death, and so bearing witness to the claims of Christianity as resting on a historical basis (August. De Fide et Symb., c. v, vol. vi, p. 156; Pearson, On the Creed, p. 239, 350, ed. Burt, and the authorities quoted in note e).

That the conduct of Pilate was highly criminal cannot be doubted. The guilt was right in his condemnation with the atrocious depravity of the Jews, especially the priests. His was the guilt of weakness and fear, their the guilt of settled and deliberate malice. His state of mind prompted him to attempt the release of an accused person in opposition to the clamors of a misguided multitudinous mob; the guilt of the Pilate is evident, when an acquitned person by instigating the populace, calumniating the prisoner, and terrifying the judge. If Pilate yielded against his judgment under the fear of personal danger, and so took part in an act of unparalleled injustice, the priests and their tools, who originated the false accusation, sustained it by subornation of perjury, and when it was declared invalid enforced their own unfounded sentence by appealing to the lowest passions. Pilate, it is clear, was utterly destitute of principle. He was willing, indeed, to do right, if he could do right without personal disadvantage. Of gratuitous wickedness he was perhaps incapable, certainly in the condemnation of Jesus he has the merit of being for a time on the side of innocence. But he yielded to violence, and so committed an awful crime. In his hands was the life of the gracious Saviour; in his hands, contrary to all his proceedings, yet he may equally claim some credit for the apparently sincere efforts which he made in order to de-
PILATE

Pilate the malice of the Jews and procure the liberation of Jesus.

If now we wish to sum up the judgment of Pilate's character, we easily see that he was one of that large class of men who aspire to public offices, not from a pure and holy desire of benefiting the public and advancing the good of the world, but from selfish and personal considerations, from a love of distinction, from a love of power, from a love of self-indulgence; being destitute of any fixed principles, and having no aim but office and influence, they act right only by chance and when convenient, and are wholly incapable of pursuing a consistent course, or of acting with firmness and self-denial in causes in which the preservation of integrity requires the exercise of stringent judgment. Pilate was a man of weakness, and therefore, with his temptations, of corrupt character. The view given in the Apostolical Constitutions (v, 14), where unmanliness (ἀναρρηµατικόν) is ascribed to him, we take to be correct. This want of strength will readily account for his failure to rescue Jesus from the rage of his enemies, and also for the acts of injustice and cruelty which he practiced in his government—acts which, considered in themselves, wear a deeper dye than does the conduct which he observed in the case of the Jews. With the same weakness may serve to explain the reader how much influence would be exerted on this unjust judge, not only by the stern bigotry and persecuting wrath of the Jewish priesthood, but especially by the not concealed intimations which they threw out against Pilate that if he liberated Jesus, he was no friend of Tiberius, and must expect to have to account of his conduct at Rome. That this was no idle threat, nothing beyond the limits of probability, Pilate's subsequent deposition by Vitellius shows very plainly: nor could the procurator have been ignorant either of the stern determination of the Jewish character, or of the offence he had by his acts given to the heads of the nation, or of the insecurity, at that very hour, when the conflict between him and the priests was proceeding regarding the innocent victim whom they husted to destroy, of his own position in the office which he held, and, of course, be desired to retain. On the whole, then, viewing the entire conduct of Pilate, his previous iniquities as well as his bearing on the condemnation of Jesus—viewing his own actual position and the malignity of the Jews—we cannot consider, give our vote with those who have passed the severest condemnation on this weak and guilty governor.

The number of dissertations on Pilate's character and all the circumstances connected with him, his "faciae," his wife's dream, his supposed letters to Tiberius, which have been published during the last and present centuries, is quite overwhelming. On this point the student may consult with advantage dean Alford's Commentary; Ellwood, Historical Lectures on the Life of our Lord, sect. vii. The reader will find a discriminating analysis in Stier, Reden Jhes., vi, 818-882 (ii, 619 sq. of the American translation), and in Dr. Hanna's Last Day of Our Lord's Passion (Cambridge, 1853). See also the Rechlin, J. Friesen's Theol. 1871, vol. iv.

V. Apocryphal Accounts.—We learn from Justin Martyr (Apol. i, 76, 84), Tertullian (Apol. c. 21), Eusebius (P. Eccl. ii, 2), and others, that Pilate made an official communication to the Jewish council; and in a homily ascribed to Chrysostom, though marked as spurious by his Benedictine editors (Hom. viii, in Ps. 968, D), certain tvopvnpaia (Acta, or Commentarii Pilati) are spoken of as well-known documents in common circulation. That he made such a report is highly probable, and it may have been in existence when Chrysostom's time. But the Pilate now extant in Greek, and two Latin epitales from him to the emperor (Fabric. Apocr. i, 237, 298; iii, 111, 456), are certainly spurious. The number of extant "Acta Pilati," in various forms, is so large as to show that very early the demand created a supply of documents manifestly spurious, and we have no reason for looking on any one of those that remain as more authentic than the others. The taunt of Celsius that the Christians circulated spurious or distorted narratives under this title (Orig., c. Cel.) and the complaint of Eusebius (Hist. eccl. iv, 11) that the vehicle of blasphemous calumnies, show how largely the machinery of falsification was used on either side. Such of these documents as are extant are found in the collections of Fabricius, Thilo, and Tischendorf. Some of them are but weakly connected with the history. The most extravagant are perhaps the best interesting, as indicating the existence of modes of thought at variance with the prevalent traditions. Of these anomalies the most striking is that known as the "Pardasos Pilati" (Tischendorf, Evang. p. 326). The emperor Tiberius, startled at the universal darkness that had fallen on the Roman empire on the day of the crucifixion, summons Pilate to answer for having caused it. He is condemned to death, but before his execution he prays to the Lord Jesus that he may not be destroyed with the wicked Hebrews, and pleads his ignorance as an excuse. The prayer is answered by a voice from heaven, assuring him that all generations shall call him blessed, and that he shall be a witness for Christ at his second coming to judge the twelve tribes of Israel. An angel receives his head, and his wife dies filled with joy, and is buried with him. Starting as this imaginary history may be, it has its counterpart in the traditional customs of the Abyssinian Church, in which Pilate is recognised as a saint and martyr, and takes his place in the calendar on the 28th of June (Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 18; Neale, Eastern Church, i, 806). The words of Tertullian, describing him as "sem pro sua conscientia Christianus" (Apol. c. 21), indicate a like feeling, and we find traces of it also in the Apocryphal Gospel, which speaks of him as "uncircumcised in flesh, but circumcised in heart" (Ambrose, Nicod. i, 12, in Tischendorf, Evang. Apoc. p. 296).

According to another legend (Mora Pilati, in Tischendorf's Evang. Apoc. p. 482), Tiberius, hearing of the wonderful works of healing that had been wrought in Judea, writes to Pilate, bidding him to send the man that had made these miracles. Pilate is sent to confess that he has crucified him; but the messenger meets Veronica, who gives him the cloth with which he had received the impression of the divine features, and by this the emperor is healed. Pilate is summoned to take his trial, and presents himself wearing the less tunic. This acts as a spell upon the emperor, and he forgets his wonted severity. After a time Pilate is thrown into prison, and there commits suicide. His body is cast into the Tiber, but as storms and tempests followed, the Romans take it up and send it to Vienna. It is thrown into the Rhone; but the same disasters follow, and it is sent on to Loasania (Lucerne or Lausanne?). There it is sunk in a pool, fenced round by mountains, and even there the waters boil or bubble strangely. The interest of this story obviously lies in its presenting an early form (which the text is of) of the local traditions which connect the name of the procurator of Judea with the Mount Pilatus that overlooks the lake of Lucerne. The received explanation (Ruskin, Modern Painters, v, 128) of the legend, as originating in the distorting condemnation of the same Mons Pilatus (the "cloud-capped"), supplies a curious instance of the genesis of a myth from a false etymology; but it may be questioned whether it rests on sufficident grounds, and is not rather the product of a pseudo-criticism, finding in a name the starting-point, not the embodiment of a legend. Have we any evidence that the mountain was known as "Pilateus" before the leg-gend? Have we not, in the apocryphal story just cited, the proof that the name of the mountain is the same (comp. Vilmar, Deutsche Nationalliteratur, 1, 217)? The extent to which the terror connected with the belief formerly prevailed is somewhat startling. If a stone were thrown into the lake, a violent storm would follow. No one was allowed to visit it without a special permission from the authorlities of Lucerne. The neighboring shepherds were deeply bound by a solemn oath, renewed annually, never to guide a stranger to it (Giesner, Descript. Mont. Pilat. (Zurich, 1565), p. 40). The spell was broken in 1584 by Johannes Muller, curé of Lucerne, who was bold enough to throw stones and abide the consequences (Golbery, Universa pittoresque de la Suisse, p. 327). It is striking that traditions of Pilate attach themselves to several localities in the south of France (comp. Murray's Hand-book for France, Route 125).

But whatever we may think of these legends, or even of the apocryphal works that have come down to our own times, there can be little doubt that the original documents referred to by the early Church fathers were genuine (Hennecke, Opusc. Acad. p. 201 sq.). Such is the opinion of Winer (Realwörterb.), Lardner, who has detailed the subject (vi. 920), and concludes that "it must be allowed by all that Pontius Pilate composed some memoirs concerning our Saviour, and sent them to the emperor" (vi. 610). Winer adds, "What we now have in Greek under this title (Pilate's Report; see Fabriuci Apocr. i, 287, 292; iii, 436), as well as the two letters of Pilate to Tiberius, are fabrications of a later age." So Lardner: "The Acts of Pontius Pilate, and his letter to Tiberius, which we now have, are not genuine, but manifestly spurious." We have not space here to review the arguments which have been adduced in favor of these documents, but we must add that we attach some importance to them, thinking it by no means unlikely that, if they are fabrics, they are fabricated in some keeping with the genuine pieces, which were in some way lost, and the loss of which the composers of our actual pieces sought as well as they could to repair. If this view can be sustained, then the documents we have may serve to help us in the use of discretion to the substance of the actual Acts. At all events, it seems certain that an official report was made by Pilate; and thus we gain another proof that "these things are written that they might be believed; and that all men who wish to enter into this subject should first consult Lardner (ut super.), and the valuable references he gives. Pilate's Staircase. This celebrated staircase is contained within a little chapel near the church of St. John Lateran, at Rome. It consists of twenty-eight white marble steps, and it is alleged by Romanists that this is the holy staircase which Christ several times ascended and descended when he appeared before Pilate, and that it was carried by angels from Jerusalem to Rome. Multitudes of pilgrims at certain periods crawl up the steps of this staircase on their knees, with roses-runs in their hands, in memory of the humility of the Son of God. On reaching the top, the pilgrim must repeat a short prayer. The performance of this ceremony is regarded as peculiarly meritorious, and entitled the devout pilgrim to a plenary indulgence. It was during this act of devotion that Martin Luther, then a monk, was started by this ceremony. "The Pilate staircase," he said, "shall live by faith." He instantly saw the folly of such performances; and fleeing in shame from the place, became from that time a zealous reformer. By the Romans this staircase is called Scala Santa, or holy staircase.

Pile-tower, or Pele-tower, an architectural term, seems to have signified a small fortress, dwelling, or tower, capable of being defended against any sudden marauding expedition. Church towers appear to have been common in use for the same purpose. In these towers, which were used for habitations, have had additions made to them subsequent to their erection. Heifer-haw tower, near Alnwick, and a tower in Cor-bridge churchyard, were probably pele-towers only. Pile, a fortress, occurs only in names of places in the Isle of Man, Lancashire, and the neighboring parts, but it is an archaic term not exclusively northern.

Pilgrim is used in the A. V. only in the old sense of sojourner, for παραπτωμα (Heb. xi, 18; 1 Pet. ii, 11; "stranger," 1 Pet. i, 1). Similarly in the O. T. "pilgrim" occurs as a rendering of חborah, magar, which signifies a stay, or an abode in a foreign country, travels "stranger," or "traveller."abler; metaphorically, it is used of the pilgrim journoring on earth; thus the patriarch Jacob says to Pharaoh, "The days of the years of my pilgrimage are a hundred and thirty years (Gen. xlvi., 9). The Psalmist likewise says, "Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage" (Psal. cxix, 54).

Pilgrim Fathers, a name often given to the early settlers of New England. The term "Mayflower," that bore the first of them, left Plymouth Sept. 6, 1620, and on Dec. 6 the passengers landed on a rock in Cape Cod harbor. The men engaged in the formation of the New England colonies have seldom been surpassed in sagacity and prowess, in piety and Benevoc lent exertion. Many of them were men of education and rank; they were eminently free from the low and degrading vices of the statesmen of that age. The poitical trust committed to them was felt to be an aw-dest deposit. It was their constant aim, one which they were careful to maintain, with the monarchical chamber, and bore back with them to the closet in their religious exercises, that each colonial should exhibit the lofty mien of a freeman, and wear the dignity of an heir to heaven; that he should bow the knee to none but God, and bear no yoke but his who is meek and lowly in heart. The grief of bidding farewell to friends, country, and home

PILGRIMAGES did not produce in them a sentimental lethargy, but was borne with manly courage and Christian heroism. In the long and tedious voyage their hearts sank not. Their spirit did not fail them in the midst of those difficulties and dangers with which foreign adventure abounds. The sultry climate, the swamp and the forest, the solitary wandering of the ladies of gentle birth, and the savages, were calmly and successfully encountered. Like their leaders, the majority of them were men of God. The men that landed from the "Mayflower" on the rock of Plymouth felt themselves to be "chosen vessels," and the consciousness of their solemn consecration was the spring and guidance of their conduct. The preservation of the ordinances of religion was a principal endeavor with them. The first trees of the virgin forest were felled for the sanctuary—"a man was famous according as he had lifted up axes upon the thick trees." Truly did they vow, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my hand forget her cunning." Their inner life nourished itself by frequent days of fasting and prayer. These were seasons of coveted enjoyment. Their firmness might be somewhat stern, their rigidity of judgment might generate formality, yet their heart was with God, as we know their work. In every crisis they inquired at the oracle of Jehovah; in seasons of deliverance they entered his courts with praise—"a multitude that kept holiday;" in times of imposing danger they placed themselves under the protection of the church and the Christian dispensation. They were a people worthy of those high-souled patriots who were their leaders, both in civil polity and religion. Few statesmen of that day had the purity of Winthrop, few ministers the learning of Cotton, the zeal of Hooker, or the self-sacrificing spirit of Roger Williams. See PURITANS.

Pilgrim, a German prelate of medieval times, flourished from 970 to 991. He was first engaged in missionary work among the Hungarians. He held different ecclesiastical positions, and at last was made bishop of Passau. In 974 he drew up for pope Benedict VI a remarkable report concerning the spread of Christianity in Hungary, but the paper was somewhat exaggerated, and probably prepared by Pilgrim to further some particular interest of his own. The truth is, that, like his predecessors, he was striving to assert his independence of the archbishopric of Salzburg; and he defended the dignity and rights of that ancient metropolis, the long since dilapidated city of Lorca (Laurencum), whose diocese stretched onward to Pannonia. "And so we may suppose," says Neander, "that in his efforts to convince the pope (from whom, in fact, he obtained the fulfillment of his wishes) how necessary the restoration of this metropolis was to Pannonia and to its subordinate bishoprics, he allowed himself to be betrayed into a somewhat exaggerated representation of this new sphere of labor in Hungary." See Neander, History of the Christian Church. iii. 331; Kurz, Lehrbuch d. Kirchengesch. (7th ed., i. 294; Theolog. Univ.-lex. A. V. (R. P.).

Pilgrim, Johann Uelich, an engraver on wood, and the supposed inventor of engraving in chiaro-ocuro. Little is known of him or his works, except a few prints, which are marked with two pilgrims' crosses superimposed, over the initials J. O. V. Among the ten prints mentioned by Bartch are the following: The Crown, with the Magdalen kneeling at its foot, and the Virgin and St. John standing one on either side; The Virgin, seated in a garden, with the Infant on her knees; The Fiji, half-length, with the Infant in its lap; St. Jerome in the Desert, with a book in one hand and a stone in the other; and St. Sebastian, tied to a tree.

Pilgrimage of Grace. The. In the time of Henry VIII, it is said that by the dissolution of the lesser monasteries about ten thousand persons became (rather from choice than necessity, for they had the option of being transferred to the larger houses) applicants for public bounty. These persons, traversing the kingdom, by the detail of their sufferings created extensive dissatisfaction, and popular feeling was with them. Many of the people also sympathized with the inmates of monasteries, some of whom they were taught to regard not as artists and scholars but as pretrained men, and who if their charitable works were suspended they would be left without sustenance. An attempt was made to suppress the growing disturbance by restoring thirty of the less disorderly of the suppressed houses. But the storm broke out first in Lincolnshire, and subsequently in Yorkshire, where forty churls for their reasonable exactions crucified and burned banners before them, calling their expedition the Pilgrimage of Grace, and avowing their object to be the removal of low-born counsellors (Cromwell, the chancellor, was the son of a blacksmith at Putney), the suppression of heresy, and the restitution of the Church. These rebel forces, however, melted away without any action; and their leader Ake, upon a repetition of the outbreak, was beheaded for treason. Many of the abbots and friars were supposed to be implicated in the pilgrimage.

Christian Pilgrimages. The idea of any peculiar sacredness being attached to special localities under the Christian dispensation was very strongly manifested in the search for holy places by devout Christians in their studies and travels. The interest which Christ in his conversation with the woman of Samaria, as recorded in John iv.; and nowhere is the principle on this subject more plainly laid down than in the Lord's statement on that occasion: "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him." In proportion, however, as Christianity receded from the apostolic age, it gradually lost sight of the simplicity and spirituality which marked its primitive character, and availed itself of carnal expedients for the purpose of elevating the imagination and kindling the devotion of its votaries. Hence, in the 4th century, many, encouraged by the example of the emperor Constantine, whose superstitious tendencies were strong, resorted to the scenes of the Saviour's life and ministry for the nourishing and invigoration of their religious feelings and desires. Helenus, the mother of Constantine, set the first example of a pilgrimage to Palestine, which was soon extensively imitated; partly, as in the case of Constantine, with a desire to be baptized in the Jordan, but still more from a veneration for the spots connected with the events of the history of Christ and his apostles. Thus a superstitious attachment to the Holy Land increased so extensively that some of the most eminent teachers of the Church, as Jerome and Gregory of Nyssa, openly disapproved of these pilgrimages. The most frequent resort of pilgrims was Jerusalem, but to this were afterwards added Rome, Tours, and Compostella. As to the last-named place, we find that in the year 1428, under the reign of Henry VI, abundance of licenses were granted by the crown of England to captains of English ships for carrying numbers of devout persons to the shrine of St. James; provided, however, that those pilgrims should first make oaths not to take anything prejudicial to England, nor to reveal any of its secrets, nor to carry out with them any more gold or silver than would be sufficient for their necessary expenses. In that year 926 persons went from England on the said pilgrimage. In our own times the greatest numbers have resorted to Loreto (q.v.), in order to visit the chamber of the Blessed Virgin, in which she was born, and brought up, and under the sign of Jesus Christ, twelve years of age! or to Parvuy le Monial (q.v.), to pay homage to the Virgin Marie à la Coque (q.v.).

In the Middle Ages pilgrimages were regarded as a mark of piety, but, as might have been expected, they gave rise to the most flagrant abuses. We find ar-accordingly pope Boniface, in a letter to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, in the 8th century, desiring that women and nuns might be restrained from their frequent remarks, to Rome. The Synod of Chartres also, which was held in A.D. 813, denounced in no measured terms the false trust reposed in pilgrimages to Rome, and also to the church of St. Martin at Tours. "There are clergymen," complains this ecclesiastical synod, "who lead an idle life, and trust thereby to be purified from sin, and to fulfil the duties of their calling; and there are laymen who believe that they may sin or have sinned with impunity because they undertook such pilgrimages; there are great men who, under this pretext, practice the grossest extortion among their people; and there are poor men who employ the same excuse to render begging a more profitable employment. Such are those who wander round about, and falsely declare that they are on a pilgrimage; while there are others whose folly is so great that they believe that they become purified from their sins by the mere sight of the holy places, forgetting the words of St. Jerome, who says that there is nothing meritorious in seeing Jerusalem, but in leading a good life there." It was between the 11th and the 12th centuries, however, that the rage for pilgrimages came to its height. Among the most celebrated of the pilgrimage centers now referred to was the idea extensively prevailed throughout Europe that the thousand years mentioned in the Apocalypse were near their close, and the end of the world was at hand. A general contamination spread among all classes, and many individuals, partaking with their property and abandoning their friends and families, set out for the Holy Land, where they imagined that Christ would ap-ppear to judge the world. While Palestine had been in the hands of the caliphs, pilgrimages to Jerusalem had been discouraged as offering them an ample source of revenue; but no sooner had Syria been conquered by the Turks, in the middle of the 11th century, than pilgrims to the Holy Land began to be exposed to every species of insult. The minds of men in every part of Christendom were now inflamed with indignation at the cruelty and impositions of the Moorish military possession of the holy places; and in such circumstances the Church enthusiasts found little difficulty in originating the Crusades (c. v.), and for two centuries vast armies of pilgrims poured into the Holy Land. It was easier for the Crusaders, however, to make their conquests than to defend them; and accordingly, the 13th century had passed away, the Christians were driven out of all their Asiatic possessions, and the holy places fell anew into the hands of the infidels.

In almost every country where Romanism prevails pilgrimages of more or less importance are usual. In England, at one time, the shrine of Thomas Becket, and in Scotland that of St. Andrew, was the favorite resort of devout pilgrims. But even down to the present day there are various places in Ireland where stations and holy wells attract crowds of devout worshippers every year; and many parts of that country are credited with extraordinary wortship and pilgrimage. From the beginning of May till the middle of August every year crowds of pious penitents resort to an island near the centre of Lough Fin, or White Lake, in the county of Donegal, to the amount of three or four thousand. These are mostly of the poorer sort, and many of them are proxies for those who are richer: some of whom, however, together with some of the priests and bishops, on occasion make their appearance there. When the pilgrim comes within sight of the holy lake he must uncover his hands and feet, and never touch the ground, and on his return to the island for sixpence. Here are two chapels and fifteen other houses, to which are added confessional, so contrived that the priest cannot see the person confessing. The penance varies according to the circumstances of the pilgrim, some of the poor being required to make three, six, or nine days' fasting, or to abstain on meat, sometimes made into bread. He traverses sharp stones on his bare knees or feet, and goes through a variety of other forms, paying sixpence at every different confession. When all is over the priest bestows a gimlet-hole through the back of the hand, which the pilgrim must sus-tend a cross peg; gives him as many holy pebbles out of the lake as he cares to carry away, for amulets to be presented to his friends, and so disposes him, an object of veneration to all other papists not thus initiated, who no sooner see the pilgrim's cross in his hands than they kneel down to get his blessing. But France, even in modern times, remains the special patron of Roman-Catholic devotees. Thus the N.-Y. Tribune correspondent writes under Aug. 37, 1875, from Paris: "If half a million was a correct estimate—the faithful will tell you that it was too low—the number of those who had already this year, at the date of my 10th of July letter, gone on foot or wheels to pay their devotions at this, that, and the other French shrine, by this it should be near a million and a half. We are now in the height of the pilgrimage season. Never in modern times, if in any time, was there another like it in the tremendous multititudinous pious peregrination. One day it is 100,000 devotees about Notre Dame de la Garde; on another 20,000 at Cambre, 10,000 at Notre Dame de Liasse, at La Salette, and Lourdes, besides great days and extraordinary days. It is a constant procession of suns and moons, a sprinkling of miraculous cures from the thaumaturgic springs of the last-named places. There is hardly a diocese whose bishop does not exalt the merits of some local shrine for convenience of tenanted-footed or short-walked devotees of his flock." In Belgium also the same grotto-management prevails. The chief object, of course, the attraction of immense flocks of pilgrims from all parts of the world to enrich from their offerings the deplete coffers of the parsonage, and to incite the popular mind to renewed adoration in the promotion of all the objects at which Romanism has been wont to aim. See ROMANISM.

Peculiar usages have prevailed from time to time among the pilgrims of Christianity. Thus the English pilgrim's weeds consisted of a hood with a cape, a low-crowned hat with two strings, a staff or bourn four or five feet long, made originally of ree, sticks swathed together, a bottle strung at their waist-belt, and scrip. Those whose pilgrimage was self-imposed walked barefooted, and begged their daily bread, let their beards grow, and wore no linen. The Palmer was distinguished by two strings of beads: the Pilgrim wore the St. Catharine's wheel; he who went to Rome came back with a medal, graven with the cross-keys, or vermicile; the pilgrim to Compostella brought home the scallop-shell of Galicia; those who went to Walsingham (Carthusian) wore a small cross of silk. In Cal-terbury the pilgrim carried, as a memorial, an ampulla full of Canterbury water, which was mingled with one tiny drop of a Becket's blood. Latimer mentions * the piping, playing, and curious singing, to solace the trav-Ellis and weariness of pilgrims. At Gloucester the pilgrims' door, with its colossal iron sticks swathed in the south arm of the transept. In the holy wars the French Crusaders were distinguished by a red, English by a white, and Flemings by a green cross. Penitents paid Peter's pence as a composition for a pilgrimage to Rome, or commuted it by a visit to Peterborough, St. Alban's, or St. David's. In 1606, persons going to visit a saint had the protection of the Church. At Hereford, a canon might be absent on a pilgrimage in England for three weeks; and once in his life for seven weeks to visit St. Denia, ten weeks, Rome and Compostella; eight, Yonteeques; and one year, Jerusalem. In some Continental countries pilgrims and priests sometimes inscribed their names on the altar which they visited. These were called inscripta, or literata, but must not be confounded with those bearing the donor's name; the first instance of it was at Mont-Saint-Michel, and the last at Constantinople, as Sozomen relates. The pilgrim's tomb sometimes bore the print of two bare feet, as embemishtical of his safe return. The pilgrims, having been first shrouded, prostrated themselves before the altar while prayers were said over them, and stood up to receive the priest's benediction on their scripts and staves, which are then thrown upon the ground. To the minister who delivered him his hands. If they were going to Jerusalem, a cross was marked upon their garment; the ceremonial terminated with a solemn mass. In 1222 a priest who betrayed a confession had to go on a pilgrimage as a penance. In 1900 monks were forbidden to become pilgrims. "Divine men and women," said W. Thorne in the 15th century, "have with them both men and women that can well sing wanton songs, some other have bagpipes, so that in every town, what with the noise of their singing and with the sound of their piping, and with the jingling of their Canterbury bells, and with the barking out of dogs after them, they make more noise than if the king came there away with all his clarions and many other instrels."

The staff had sometimes a bronze socket, inscribed with these words in Latin, "May this cross direct thy journey in safety."

Jewish Pilgrimages.—Among the Jews pilgrimages to Jerusalem are made by the most devoted only. The Polish and Russian Jews, greatly oppressed in their homes, occasionally seek relief by a journey to the city of their fathers, and to the scene of the Messiah. That sect of Judaism known as the Chasidim have their yearly processions to Sandez, the nursery of the most absurd superstition. The time for this pilgrimage is generally on the first days of the month of Eli. As soon as the sound of the cornet proclaims the approach of the new year the Chasidim of Galicia and Russian Poland hasten in large numbers to Sandez, to manifest their adoration and veneration by rich presents to the rabbi working miracles, who presides at Sandez. About that time the city authorities and the rabbi assume a very friendly relation, and the quiet life of the place changes into activity by the increase of strangers. The streets are filled with Chasidim, who come from afar off to open their hearts and confide their secret wishes to the wonder-working man.

Mohammedan Pilgrimages.—In Mohammedan countries, pilgrimages are much in vogue. The pilgrimage to Mecca (q.v.) is not only expressly commanded in the Koran, but is regarded by the Arabian prophet as indispensable to all his followers. In his view, a believer neglecting this duty, if it were in his power to perform it, would be a sign of his displeasure with Allah. The Persians, however, instead of subjecting themselves to a toilsome pilgrimage to Mecca, take upon the country of which Babylon formerly, and now Bagdad, is the chief city, as the holy land in which are deposited the ashes of Adam and the rest of the holy martyrs. Not only do the living give to them the dead bodies of their relatives, to lay them in the sacred earth. Pilgrimage is a duty binding upon all Moslems, both men and women. Inability is the only admitted ground of exemption, and Mohammedan customs have determined that those who are incapable must perform it by deputy, and bear the expense of these substitutes. What is principally revered in Mecca, and gives sanctity to the whole, is a square stone building, called the Kaaba (q.v.). Before the time of Mohammed this temple was a place of worship for the idolatrous Arabs, and is said to have contained no less than three hundred and sixty different images, equalling in number the days of the Arabian year. They were all destroyed by Mohammed, who sanctified the Kaaba, and appointed it to be the chief place of worship for all true believers. It is said that the Kaaba must be entered by stepping on the grand platform, to the purpose of them to believe a single sight of its sacred walls, without any particular act of devotion, is as meritorious in the sight of God as the most careful discharge of one's duty for the space of a whole year in any other temple. The Kaaba is the temple of Allah, who has ordered that he be looked upon as completed, though they again visit the Kaaba to take the leave of that sacred building.
Pilgrimage to Mecca was interrupted for a quarter of a century by the Carmathians, and in our own day it has been again interrupted by the Wahabis, and these in turn have been defeated by Mohammed Alvi, who reviving the pilgrimage and attended with his court. In the year 1878, 200,000 pilgrims visited the holy places. But in the present year (1877) pilgrimages to Mecca have been revived in marvellous force, owing to the contest with Turkey and Russia, and it is expected that nearly one half million will now come, and many, many more will bring tribute to the Kaaba, the treasures of which, amounting to over 200,000,000 piasters, or $50,000,000, have been placed at the disposal of the sultan of Turkey, and are to be used in the defence of the Mussulman's faith.

Heathen Pilgrimages. Among heathen nations, also, pilgrimages are practiced. In Japan, more especially, all the different sects have their regular places of resort. The pilgrimage which is esteemed by the Sintuists as the most meritorious is that of Ise, which all are bound to make once a year, or at least once in their life. Another class of pilgrimages is the Sannês, who go to visit in pilgrimage the thirty-three principal temples of Cænon, which are scattered over the empire. Besides these regular pilgrimages, the Japanese also undertake occasional religious journeys to visit certain temples in fullness of worship. These pilgrims travel alone, and almost always running, and, though generally very poor, refuse to receive charity from others (comp. McFarland, Japan, p. 211).

Hinduism has its pilgrimages on a grand scale. Thousands make the long journey to repair to the temple of Jagannáut (q. v.). Equally famed as the resort of multitudes of Hindu pilgrims is the island of Gangá Ságar, where the holiest branch of the Ganges (q. v.) is lost in the waters of the Indian Ocean. To visit this sacred river hundreds of thousands annually abandon their homes, and travel for months amid mud, hardships and dangers, and should they reach the scene of their pilgrimage, it is only in many cases that they may plunge themselves and their unconscious babies into the troubled but, in their view, purifying waters, offering themselves and their little ones as voluntary victims to the holy river. Among the numberless sacred spots in Hindostan may be mentioned Jummontri, a village on the banks of the Jumna, which is so famed as a place of pilgrimage that those who resort thither are considered as thereby almost entitled to divine honors. This, and a town of Húrāpur, may also be noticed to which pilgrims resort from every corner of the East where Hinduism is known; and of such efficacy is the water of the Ganges at this point that even the gullitiest may be cleansed from sin by a single ablution. The Hindus place great importance upon pilgrimages to the holy temples at Bénarés and other sacred shrines. Sometimes these are performed on sandalis with small spikes inserted, every step causing pain to the pilgrim. In other cases, the whole distance of hundreds of miles is travelled by the infatuated facir tumbling over and over like a wagon-wheel, with wheel on his feet; for the greater the pain and suffering with which the pilgrimage is accomplished, the greater is the merit attached to its performance. It often happens that poor pilgrims perish on the road for want of food, or in consequence of sufferings arising from the severe penalty which they inflict upon themselves. But instead of this being a warning to others, it is considered highly meritorious to fall in the effort to fulfil a vow made in honor of their idol gods. The Buddhists, though not so devoted to pilgrimage as the Hindus, are not without their places of sacred resort. One of the most noted is Adam's Peak, in Ceylon, where Gotama Buddha is supposed to have left the impression of his foot. The summit of the peak is annually visited by great numbers of pilgrims. The Lamasists of Tibet also make an annual visit to Lhasa for devotional purposes.

Dr. Johnson gives us some observations on pilgrimages, which are so much to the purpose that we shall here present them to the reader: "Pilgrimage, like many other acts of piety, may be reasonable or superstitious, according to the principles upon which it is performed. It is performed with devotion, and returns commandment; truth, such as is necessary to the regulation of life, is always found where it is honestly sought; change of place is no natural cause of the increase of piety, for it inevitably produces dissipation of mind. Yet since men go every day to view the fields where great acts are done, and return with stronger impressions of the event, curiosity of the same kind may naturally dispose us to view that country whence our religion had its beginning. That the Supreme Being may be more easily propitiated in one place than another is a kind of idle superstition; but that some places may operate upon our own minds in an uncommon manner is an opinion which hourly experience will justify. He who supposes that his vices may be more successfully combated in Palestine, will, perhaps, find himself mistaken; yet he may go thither without folly: he who thinks that his ways will be more freely pardoned dishonors at once his reason and his religion" (Johnson's Rasselas). Pilkington, James, a noted Anglican prelate, who flourished in the great Reformation period of the 16th century, was born of an ancient gentleman's family at Rivington, in Lancashire, in 1520. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and after graduation took holy orders. Under the reign of king Edward he distinguished himself as one of the disputants against transubstantiation, but under the reign of bloody Mary he was obliged to leave the country, as he was very decided in his Protestant proclivities. He lived for a while at Zurich, and then at Basel. When suffered to return, in 1558, after the accession of Elizabeth, he was made master of his alma mater. He interested himself in educational affairs generally throughout the kingdom, and in his native place established a free-school, which he himself endowed. In 1561 he was elevated to the bishopric of Durham, and became noted for his tolerant views. In 1584, he advocated inducing the Conformists, and to all who scrupled to observe practices or assume obligations having any appearance of popish tendency. Bishop Pilkington died in 1575. He published, Exposition of the Prophet Haggars (Lond. 1560, 8vo):— and by Obadiah (1560), Nehemiah (Camb. 1568, 4to), Ecclesiastes, Epistle of Peter, and Paul to the Gentiles: Def. of the Engl. Service; and, besides, many sermons. His Works were edited, with biographical notices, for the Parker Society, by the Rev. James Scholield, regius professor of Greek, Cambridge (Camb. 1849, 8vo). See Draper's Crammer, Purcell's Essay; Hardwick, Hist. of the Ref. p. 219 et al.; Soames, Elizabeth Ch. History, p. 22, 49, 605ug; Burnet, Hist. of the Ref.; Hook, Eccles. Bldg. viii, 92. (J. H. W.)

Pilkington, Matthew, an English divine, flourished near the middle of the last century as prebend of Lichfield. He is especially noted as a secular writer. He was for some time a medical student at Cambridge, and was afterward a Christian mony (Lond. 1747, fol.), which is executed with great care, and is of some value:—A Rational Concordance (Nottingham 1748, 4to), which is extremely scarce: and Remarks upon several Passages of Scripture (Camb. and Lond. 1728, 8vo), which, according to Orme (Bibl. Bibl. a. v.), "contains much useful matter." Pilkington also published several of his sermons (1738, 4to; 1755, 8vo), etc.
PILLAR

Pillar is a term frequently occurring in the Scriptures, especially of the O.T., where it is used in different senses, and as the rendering of several Heb. and Gr. words, which need to be distinguished both in their meaning and application.

1. Original Words as Translated.—1. From the root סָאֵל, סָאֵל, to station, come the following: סָאֵל, סָאֵל, a rendered "pillar" everywhere in Genesis, and in Exod. xxiv, 4; Deut. iii, 3; Isa. xxix, 19; elsewhere ("image"), a column or image of stone; סָאֵל, סָאֵל, a monumemntal "pillar" (Gen. xxxv, 14, 20; 2 Sam. xvii, 18), once the trunk or stump of a tree ("substance," Isa. vi, 13); סָאֵל, סָאֵל, according to some a military post (as in Isa. xxxix, 5, "mount"), or garrison, according to others a terminal mord (Judg. ix, 6); סָאֵל, סָאֵל, a statue (only Gen. xix, 26, "pillar"), or military officer or garrison (as elsewhere rendered).

2. From other roots: מַעְקֵד, מַעְקֵד, lit. something upright (from משׁקְד, to stand), a column (the usual word for "pillar," and invariably so rendered in the A.V., but meaning an elevated stand or platform in 2 Kings xi, 14; xxiii, 3); מַעְקֵד, מַעְקֵד, a support (from משׁקְד, to prop), a belustron (only 1 Kings x, 9); מַעְקֵד, מַעְקֵד, a column (from משׁקְד, to set up) as a support (fig. 1 Sam. ii, 8), or tropically a creg ("situate," 1 Sam. xiv, 6); מַעְקֵד, מַעְקֵד, a column (only 2 Kings xviii, 16); and מַעְקֵד, מַעְקֵד, a column, in the form of an artificial palm-tree (Cant. iii, 6; Joel ii, 38 [Heb. iii, 3]).

3. In the N.T.: only σταυρός, a column or support (Gal. ii, 9; 1 Tim. iii, 15; Rev. iii, 12; x, 1).

II. Uses.—The essential notion of a pillar is that of a shaft or isolated pole, either supporting or not supporting a roof.

1. Monumental.—Perhaps the votive object was the earliest application of the pillar. This in primitive times consisted of nothing but a single stone or pile of stones. Instances are seen in Jacob's pillars (Gen. xxviii, 18; xxxi, 46, 51, 52; xxxv, 14); in the twelve pillars set up by Moses at Mount Sinai (Exod. xxiv, 4); the twenty-four stone stones erected by Joshua (Josh. iv, 8, 9; see also Isa. xix, 19, and Josh. xxiv, 27).

The erection of columns or heaps of stones to commemorate any remarkable event was universal before the introduction of writing or inscription, and it is still employed for that purpose by many savage nations. See GLEAM.

Monumental pillars have thus been common in many countries and in various styles of architecture. Such were perhaps the obelisks of Egypt (Ferguson, p. 6, 8, 115, 246, 340; Ibn-Batuta, True, p. 111; Strabo, iii, 171, 172; Herod. ii, 106; Amm. Marc. xvii, 4; Josephus, Ant. i, 2, 8, the pillars of Sbeit). See PIRAMIDS.

The stone Exel (1 Sam. xx, 13) was probably a terminal stone or a waymark. See EBENIZER.

The "place" set up by Saul (1 Sam. xv, 12) is explained by St. Jerome to be a trophy, Vulg. Fornicem triumphalem (Jerome, Quest. Hebr. in lib. i, Reg. iii, 1359).

The word used is the same as that for Aba-ron's pillar, יִת, יִת, lit. a hand, called by Josephus λήκον (Ant. vii, 10, 5), which was clearly of a monumental or memorial character, but not necessarily carrying any representation of a hand in its structure, as has been supposed to be the case. So also Jacob set up a pillar over Rachel's grave (Gen. xxxv, 20; and Robinson, i, 218).

The monolithic tombs and obelisks of Petra are instances of similar usage (Burchardt, Syria, p. 422; Roberts, Sketches, p. 103; Irby and Mangles, Traveis, p. 155). See ABRAM'S TOMB.

2. Architectural.—Pillars form an important feature in Oriental architecture, partly perhaps as a reminiscence of the tent with its supporting poles, and partly also from the use of flat roofs, in consequence of which the chambers were either narrower or divided into portions by columns (Judg. xvi, 25). The tent-principle is exemplified in the open halls of Persian and other Eastern buildings, of which the fronts, supported by pillars, are shaded by curtains or awnings fastened to the ground outside by pegs, or to trees in the garden-court (Ezra, i, 6; Chardin, Voy. vii, 387; ix, 460, 470, and plates 39, 81; Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 580, 648; Burchardt, Notes on Bed. i, 37). Thus Moses was commanded to spread the veil of the tabernacle on four pillars (Exod. xxv, 82, etc.). Thus also a figurative mode of describing heaven is as a tent or canopy supported by pillars (Psa. civ. 2; Isa. xl, 22), and the earth as a flat surface resting on pillars (1 Sam. ii, 8; Psa. lxxv, 5). See TEXT.

It has already been remarked that the word "place," in 1 Sam. xv, 12, is in Hebrew "hand." In the Arab tent two of the posts are called yadh or "hand" (Burchardt, Bed. i, 57). See HAND.

The general practice in Oriental buildings of supporting flat roofs by pillars, or of covering open spaces by awnings stretched from pillars, led to an extensive use of them in construction. In Indian architecture an enormous number of pillars, sometimes amounting to 1000, is found. A similar principle appears to have been carried out at Persepolis. At Nineveh the pillars were probably of wood [see CEDAR], and it is very likely that the same construction prevailed in the "house of the form of Lebanon," with its hall and porch of pillars (1 Kings vii, 2, 6). The "chap- ters" of the two pillars Jachin (q.v.) and Boaz resembled the tall capitals of the Persian palatial columns (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 232, 650; Niners, ii, 374; Ferguson, Hist. p. 174, 178, 188, 190, 195, 198, 291-233; Roberts, 3. Idolatries. — The word Mattsebél, “pillar,” is generally rendered “statue” or “image” (e.g. Deut. vii, 5; xii, 3; xvi, 22; Lev. xxvi, 1; Exod. xxii, 24; xxiv, 13; 2 Chron. xiv, 3; xxxi, 1; Jer. xxiii, 13; Hos. iii, 4; x, 1; Mic. v, 13). This agrees with the usage of heathen nations, practiced, as we have seen, by the patriarch Jacob, of erecting blocks or piles of wood or stone, which in later times grew into ornamental pillars in honor of the deity (Clem. Alex. Coh. ad Gent. c. iv; Strom. i, 24). Instances of this are seen in the Attic Hermes (Pausan. iv, 38, 4), seven pillars significant of the planets (iii, 21, 9; also vii, 17, 4, and 22, 2; viii, 37); and Arnobius mentions the practice of pouring libations of oil upon them, which again recalls the case of Jacob (Adv. Gent. i, 335, ed. Gauthier). See Asherah; Phallus.

The term or boundary-marks were originally, perhaps always, rough stones or posts of wood, which received divine honors (Ovid, Fast. ii, 641, 684). See Idol.

But other circumstances contributed to make stones an object of worship. Such phenomena as the rocking stones worshipped by the British Druids would naturally excite the astonishment of an ignorant people, and many commentators are of opinion that the name ebn maskith, image of stone, which the Jews were forbidden to erect (Lev. xxvi, 1), was one of those bowing or rocking stones, especially as the phrase is used in opposition to Mattsebél, which signifies “a standing pillar.” Those rare phenomena, aeroliths, still more easily became objects of idolatry; they were generally of a similar kind to that mentioned by Herod- dian, as being consecrated to the sun under his name of Eleagiabulos, and preserved in his magnificent temple in Syria; “in which,” says the historian, “there stands not any image made with hands, as among the Greeks and Romans, to represent the god, but there is a very large stone, round at the bottom, and terminating in a point of a conical form, and a black color, which they say fell down from Jupiter.” See DIOPEMA. Sacred pillars or stones were indeed frequently worshipped instead of statues by idolatrous nations, and traces of this posterores veneration may still be found in various countries. See Diana. The erection of monoliths or monumental pillars was forbidden to the Israelites, but it appears that they were permitted to erect Cairns or piles of stone to preserve the recollection of great events, as Joshua did at Gilgal (q. v.), that it might be a memorial of his miraculous passage over the Jordan. See Cholmeley.

4. Lastly, the figurative use of the term “pillar,” in reference to the cloud and fire accompanying the Israelites on their march (Exod. xxxii, 9, 10; Neh. ix, 12; Ps. xcix, 7), or as in Cant. iii, 6 and Rev. x, 1, is plainly derived from the notion of an isolated column not supporting a roof. See Pillar of Cloud and Fire. A pillar is also an emblem of firmness and steadfastness (Jer. i, 18; Rev. iii, 12), and of that which sustains or supports (Gal. ii, 9; 1 Tim. iii, 15). In the Apocrypha we find a similar metaphor (Eccles. xxxvi, 24): “He that getteth a wife beginneth a possession, a help like unto himself, and a pillar of rest.” See Architecture.

PILLAR is in architectural language the column supporting the arch. In the Normus style the pillars are generally massive, and are frequently circular, with capitals either of the same form or square; they are sometimes ornamented with channels, or flutes, in vari-Druildical Pillars.

In the Decorated style the general form of clustered pillars changes from a circular to a lozenge-shaped arrangement, or to a square placed diagonally, but many other varieties are also to be met with. They sometimes consist of small shafts surrounding a larger one, and are sometimes moulded; the small shafts and some of the mouldings are often filleted; plain octagonal pillars are also very frequently employed in village churches: towards the end of this style a pillar consisting of four small shafts separated by a deep hollow and two fillets is common, as it is also in the Perpendicular style, but the hollows are usually shallower, and the disposition of the fillets is different.

A plain octagonal pillar continues in use throughout the Perpendicular style, though it is not so frequent as at earlier periods, and its sides are occasionally slightly hollowed. In Decorated work a few of the mouldings of the piers occasionally run up into the arches and form part of the archivolt, as at Bristol Cathedral, but in Perpendicular buildings this arrangement is much more common, and in some cases the whole of the mouldings of the pillars are continued in the arches without any capital or impost between them: the forms are various, but in general arrangement they usually partake of a square placed diagonally; sometimes, however, they are contracted in breadth so as to become narrower between the archways (from east to west) than in the opposite direction: the small shafts attached to the pillars in this style are usually plain circles, but are occasionally filleted, and in some instances are hollow-sided polygons.

Pillar of Cloud and Fire. According to Exod. xiii, 21 sq. (comp. xiv, 24; Numb. xiv, 14; Neh. ix, 12, 19), the Israelites during their journey from Egypt through the desert were accompanied in the day by a pillar of cloud, and at night by a pillar of fire (Heb. ה' את, וַיְרָדָה, Sept. στάθηκεν καὶ ἐσκόμματο, πύρος), as a guide (comp. esp. Exod. x, 36 sq.) and protection (comp. Ps. cv, 89; Wisd. x, 17), and this waited over the tabernacle while the people rested (Exod. x, 34 sq.; Numb. ix, 15 sq.). The narrative represents Jehovah himself as in this cloud (comp. also Numb. xiv, 14), and as speaking from it to Moses (Exod. xxxiii, 9 sq.; Numb. xii, 5; Deut. xxxi, 15). Later writers explain this of the "wisdom" of God (Sophia, Wisd. x, 17), or the divine Logos (q. v.; comp. Philo, Opera, i, 501). Toland, again, and after him many others, explained this appearance naturally, and referred it to the fire carried in a vessel before the host, which in the fire served as a guide and signal by its smoke, and at night by its brightness. Von der Hart carried this opinion so far as to hold that this fire carried before the Israelites was the sacred fire preserved upon the altar from the time of Abraham (Ephemerid. Philol. Discurr. vi, 109 sq.; and Philol. Vindic. Helmat. 1696. For the controversy on this view, see Rosenmüller on Exod. xiii, 21; comp. Forster, in Eichhorn's Report, x, 132 sq.). This custom is actually observed by caravans in the East at the present day (Harnack, Observ. i, 488 sq.; Descript. de l'Egypte, viii, 128), and it became at an early day customary with armies.
PILLAR

In the East, especially in traversing an unknown region (Curt. iii, 8, 9; v, 2, 7; but the passages sometimes quoted, Veget. Mil. iii, 5; Frontin. Strateg. ii, 25, do not refer to this. Comp. esp. on the custom, Faber, Arch. p. 293 sq.; Wolfenb. Fragment. p. 108 sq.; Bauer, Hebr. Mythol. i, 281 sq.). Meanwhile we must not forget that this is the evident intention of the historian to narrate a miracle (comp. also Pas. lxxvii, 14; ev, 89; comp. Diod. Sic. xvi, 66; Clem. Alex. Strom. i, 150). The following monographs on this subject are unimportant, which is proved by the silence of Vitruv. (1127); Friderici, De col. ignis et sub. (Leips. 1689); Sahne, De columnar. ignis ac sub. (Gedan. 1702); Münden, De columnar. sub. et igne (Gotlar, 1712); and many others. Following this national recollection, Iaiais (v, 5) has employed the figure of a cloud of smoke and fire hovering over Zion and the Temple as a symbol of the presence of Jehovah, in his picture of the blessedness of theocracy (comp. Ewald, Ist. Gesch. ii, 167 sq.). See SHEKINAH.

Pillar, Plain of the (יוֹרֶם הָרָה). Sept. τῆς βα- λαντικῆς τῆς στέρεως; Alex. omits τῆς κορινθιακῆς; Vulgate, le Betôth, or Mount of the pillar; that is, the real significance of the Hebrew word elôn; a tree which stood near Shechem, and at the mouth of Shechem and the house of Millo assembled, to crown Abimelech, son of Gideon (Judg. ix, 6). There is nothing said by which its position can be ascertained with any probability derived from the name of Matstebôd from a stone or pillar set up under it; and reasons have already been adduced for believing that this tree may have been the same with that under which Jacob buried the idols and idolatrous trinkets of his household, and under which Joshua erected a stone as a testimony of the covenant there re-executed between the people and Jehovah. See MEONEMI. There was both time and opportunity during the period of commotion which followed the death of Joshua for this sanctuary to return into the hands of the mount, and the stone long standing there by Joshua to become appropriated to idolatrous purposes as one of the matstebôdôth in which the religion of the aborigines of the Holy Land delighted. See IDOLATRY. The terms in which Joshua speaks of this very stone (Josh. xxiv, 27) almost seem to overstep the bounds of mere imagery, and would suggest and warrant its being afterwards regarded as endowed with miraculous qualities, and therefore a fit object for veneration. Especially would this be the case if the singular expression, "it hath heard all the voice of God which he spake to us," were intended to indicate that this stone had been brought from Sinai, Jordan, or some other scene of the communications of Jehovah with the people. The Samaritans still show a range of stones on the summit of Gerizim as those brought from the bed of Jordan by the twelve tribes. See OAK.

Pillar Saints, devotees who stood on the tops of lofty pillars for many years in fulfilment of religious vows. The first who originated this practice was Simeon, a native of Syria, who was born about A.D. 390. In early youth he entered a monastery near Antioch, where he devoted himself to the most rigid exercises of mortification and abstinence. Having been expelled from the monastery for his excessive austerities, he retired to the adjacent mountain, where he took up his residence first in a cave, and then in a little cell, where he immured himself for three years. Next he removed to a mount of a mountain near he chained himself to a rock for several years. His fame had now become so great that crowds of visitors thronged to see him. "Incommode by the pressure of the crowd," we are told, "he erected a pillar on which he might stand, elevated at first six cubits and ending with forty. The top of the pillar was three feet in diameter, and sur- rounded with a balustrade. Here he stood day and night in all weathers. Through the night, till 9 A.M., he was constantly in prayer, often spreading forth his hands and bowing so low that his forehead touched his toes. A bystander once attempted to count the number of these successive prostrations; and still they amounted to 1244. At 9 o'clock A.M. he began to address the admiring crowd below, to hear and answer their questions, to send messages and write letters, etc., for he took concern in the welfare of the churches, and corresponded with bishops, and even emperors. Tow- ards evening he inquired of his intendants in this world, and betook himself again to converse with God till the following day. He generally ate but once a week, never slept, wore a long sheepskin robe, and a cap of the same. His beard was very long, and his frame extremely emaciated. In this manner he is re- ported to have spent thirty-seven years, and at last, in his sixty-ninth year, to have expired unobserved in a praying attitude, in which no one ventured to disturb him till after three days, when Anthony, his disciple and biographer, mounting the pillar, found that his spirit had departed, and his holy body was emitting a de- lightful odor; his remains were borne in pomp to Antioch, in order to be the safeguard of that unwalled town, and innumerable miracles were performed at his shrine. His pillar also was so venerated that it was literally surrounded with chapels and monasteries for some ages. Simeon was so averse to women that he never allowed one to come within the sacred precincts of his pillar. Even his own mother was debarred this privilege till after her death, when her corpse was brought to him, and he now restored her to life for a short time that she might see him, and converse with him a little before she ascended to heaven." Another Simeon Styl- lites is mentioned by Evagrius as having lived in the 6th century. In his childhood he mounted his pillar near Antioch, and is said to have occupied it sixty- eight years. The last example of Simeon's practice was followed, to a certain extent at least, by many persons in Syria and Palestine, and pillar saints were found in the East even in the 12th century, when, the Stylites, as they were termed by the Greeks, were abolished. This order of saints never found a footing in the West, and when one Wulfric is reported to commence the practice in the German territory of Treves, the neighboring bishops destroyed his pillar, and prevented him from carrying his purpose into effect.

Pilled (Gen. xxx, 37, 88) is a rendering of פְּלִיט (pīlāt), to strip off the bark, being the same as "strikes off, cuts, in the same order as מָסַר, to part with." The word, as used by Piel (Isa. xvi, 2; Ezek. xxix, 10), however, is a different word in the original, פָּלַל, mardî, signifying to polish. The verb "to pill" appears in Old English as identical in meaning with "to peel=to strip," and in this sense is used in the above passages from Genesis. Of the next stage in its meaning as = plunder, we have traces in the word "pillage," piller. If the difference between the two forms be more than accidental, it would seem as if, in the English of the 17th century, "peel" was used for the latter signification. The "people scattered and peeled" are generally interpreted to mean those that have been plundered of all they have. Comp. "Peeling their prisoners."—Milton, P. B. iv.

"To peel the chaffe, the people to devour."—Dryden, Homer, Ítad (Richardson).

The soldiers of Nebuchadnezzar's army (Ezek. xxix, 18), however, have their shoulder pikes in a different sense. The skin is worn off with carrying earth to pile up the mounds during the protracted siege of Tyre. See TYRE.

Pillar (also spelled Pilmor), Joseph, D.D., an early Episcopal minister in America, was born at Tadmouth, Yorkshire, England, about 1740, and was educated at Cambridge University, and sur- vived whom he had been previously converted. On completing his studies, Pilmore became a lay helper in the Methodist itinere ministry, and labored in this way for many years through England, Scotland, and Wales. His ministerial certificate from Mr. Wesley represents him as "having grace, gifts, and success of fruit in the work." He was blessed with skill in all his spiritual career, and his appearance and preaching were impressive. Mr. Pilmore's manly form, tall and erect, his sympathizing spirit, earnest zeal and prayers, all united to make strong and lasting impressions. In 1769 he came to America, and preached throughout the colonies. Stevens says Pilmore had many hair-breadth escapes of life and limb in his wild journeys. At Charleston, S. C., he could find no place to use for preaching except the theatre, and while earnestly delivering a sermon, suddenly the table used for a pulpit, with the cloth, he occupied, all at once disappeared through a trap-door to the cellar.

This was a wicked contrivance of the "basser sort." Nothing discouraged, however, the preacher, springing upon the stage, with the table, invited the audience to the adjoining yard, adding pleasantly, "Come on, my friends, we will, by the grace of God, defeat the devil this time, and not be beat by him from our work," and then quietly finished his discourse. The fruits of his Christian labors appeared in the conversion of many souls. Wherever he appeared large crowds attended his ministrations, and listened to his master's message. With the Wesleyan preachers generally, Pilmore retired from his ministerial work during the troublesome times of the American Revolution. In 1783 he joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was soon after ordained. He now became rector of Trinity (Oxford), All Saints (Limerick), and St. Thomas (White marsh). After the establishment of peace in this year he returned to America, and next served St. Paul's, Philadelphia, and thence removed to Christ Church, New York, of which he was chosen rector in 1804.

Now residing on the banks of Old Trinity," he preached with great acceptance and usefulness during ten years, and then was chosen rector of St. Paul's, Philadelphia, in 1814. Mr. Pilmore's congregation in New York became well known for its evangelical piety, and of some of its communicants were on terms of intimate friendship with the members of the old John Street Methodist Episcopal Church. During the year 1781 this faithful and aged minister's mental powers exhibited evidences of failure, and this, with bodily indisposition, made it necessary for him to have an assistant. The Rev. Mr. Benjamin Stevens continued gradually to fail, Pilmore departed this life July 24, 1825. Dr. Pilmore was a faithful minister of God, and wherever he preached gathered a large body of communicants. He left many bequests for charitable purposes. He is the author of a Narrative of Labor in South Wales (1823), and of "A Description of a Journey to Trials and Preaching in the Colonies of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia," which was never published. See Sprague, Amazed of the American Pulpit, v, 366; Disoyaw, in the N. Y. Methodist, 15, 174, Lives of Eminent Philomens (1859), p. 801 (J. H. W.)

Pillow is the rendering in the A. V. of three very different Hebrew and one Greek word. The proper term is in the plural. רהואית (maraashāth) (Gen. xxviii, 11, 18, elsewhere "bolster"), which denotes simply a place for laying the head. In that passage we read that "Jacob took of the stones of that place [Haran], and put them near his pillows, and bowed his head in that place to sleep." The Hebrew word would be more properly rendered "towards the head." Similarly our Lord employed either the bench or possibly some cushion or rug upon it, when asleep upon the boat (προσποδόμα, Mark iv, 38). See Br. The γέττον, κανυστή (also in the pl.), in Exk. xiii, 18, 20, however, designates a cushion or soft pad used in some way for elegant entertainment, perhaps one of the meretricious luxuries of the females alluded to. See ARMHOLE. In 1 Sam. xix, 13, 16, the Heb. word is עֲבָשׁ, kebir, something braided or plaited, hence usually thought to be a quilt or mattress. See BOLSTER.

What kind of pillows the Hebrews used we have no means of knowing, but the ancient Egyptians had pillows of wood formed to receive the head when resting on their couches, and these no doubt had a cushion stuffed with feathers, or other soft material. Specimens of these wooden pillows may be seen in the British Museum (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, 1, 71). "Hardy travelers, like Jacob (Gen. xxviii, 11, 16) and Elijah (1 Kings xix, 6), sleeping on the bare ground, would make use of a stone for this purpose; and soldiers on the march had probably no softer resting-place (1 Sam. xxvi, 7, 11, 12, 16). Possibly both Saul and Elijah may have used the water-bottle which they carried as a bolster, and if this were the case, David's midnight adventure becomes more conspicuously daring. The 'pillow' of goats' hair which Michal's cunning put in the place of the bolster in her husband's bed (xix, 13, 16) was probably, as Ewald suggests, a net or curtain of goats' hair, to protect the sleeper from cold or mosquitoe (Greek, κανυστή, note), like the 'canopy' of Holofernes." PILSBURY, ITHAMAR, an American Presbyterian evangelist and missionary, was born in Dracut, Mass., Aug. 22, 1794. His parents being both very pious, his early discipline and religious training were very strict and thorough. He prosecuted his academic course under many difficulties and discouragements. being obliged to interrupt his studies from time to time and to engage in teaching, in order to raise funds. He entered Union Academy, at Plainfield, N. J., in 1815, graduated at Yale College in October, 1822; studied theology in New York under the direction of Rev. Dra. Gardiner Spring and E. W. Baldwin; was licensed in October, 1824, and on June 19, 1825, was at his own request and by the unanimous vote of the Presbytery ordained as an evangelist. For several months after he labored as city missionary in and around the cities of New York and Boston. The character and results of his labors in those two cities laid the foundation for that extensive system of religious effort which aims at the spiritual good of the poor and destitute, known as City Missions. Desirous of a pastoral charge, in September, 1827, he accepted an invitation to supply the Church at Smithtown, Long Island, for one year, but continued to labor in that capacity until April, 1830, when he was installed their regular pastor. At his own request, in 1830 this relation was dissolved and until May, 1834, he spent the time in travelling as an agent of the American Sunday-School Union. In 1835 he was appointed a commissioner to the General Assembly at Pittsburgh, Pa., after which he started on a tour of exploration to the state of Illinois, with a view to the founding of a colony. In September of the same year he returned to New York, and succeeded in organizing a company with a capital of some $40,000, to be invested "in the purchase of land, and the establishment of a colony for promoting the cause of instruction and piety in the state of Illinois." From this time onward to the end of his life he was identified with the West, especially in all that pertained to the growth and prosperity of the Presbyterian Church. To the scheme of Christian colonization he gave much thought, time, labor, and prayer. From the spring of 1826 his labors as a missionary and an evangelist fairly set in; and with untiring energy and devotion he addressed himself to his work. He organized fourteen churches, and assisted at the organization of several others. In 1837 he organized the Church at Andover, in the Andover colony, and in 1841 he was installed its pastor, and continued to minister unto it until September, 1849. In May, 1850, he was installed pastor at Princeton, Bureau Co., where he had previously organized a Church; in 1855 he was chosen president of McDonough College, at Macon; in 1856 he began to labor as stated supply in the Presbyterian Church at Macon; in 1860 he returned to Andover, and took charge of the Church which he founded there. He died April 20, 1862. Mr. Fillansbury was a prudent and wise counsellor, a sincere and constant friend, and an able and faithful minister of the Gospel. See Wilson, Probab. Hist. Amaranac, 1863, p. 195. (J. L. S.)

Pilot (πηγή, chōbē, Ezek. xxvii, 8, 27-29), literally a steersman, a mariner, is also rendered in our version (Jonah i, 6) "ship-master;" but in the passage in Ezekiel it is used in a figurative sense for the chief rulers or counsellors of the Tyrians. See SHIP.

Pilbush, Phineas, Elder, a famous early American Baptist minister, flourished in Maine in 1804. He was undoubtedly the ordinary acceptation of the term, but was called "a son of thunder" on account of his boldness and ability. He was extremely eccentric, and many curious incidents in his personal history are told, but nothing can be related here of any interest to the general inquirer.

Pilaeus, Francis, a Flemish painter and engraver who flourished at Ghent about the middle of the 18th century. He studied under Robert van Audenarde. Little is known of his painting; but there are a few prints by him, among which are the following: Virgin and Infant Jesus; Conversion of St. Barca; St. Francis, after Rubens; The Martyrdom of St. Blasius; after G. de Crayer.

Pil'tal (Heb. Pil'tay, פִּילְתַל, my deliverance; Sept. פַּלְטָל), the representative of the priestly house of Modiah, or Maadiah, in the time of Joiakim, the son of Jeshua; apparently one of the priests who returned to Jerusalem with Nehemiah (Neh. xii, 17). B.C. 445.

Pilsart, Abraham Israel, of Amsterdam, a Jewish litterateur, was of Portuguese origin, and flourished in Italy near the opening of the 17th century. He wrote Discours y expositiones sobre la vara de Judas, an exposition of Jacob's prophecy, entitled "the Scepter of Judah," in which he complains of the unfair manner in which Christians expound the Scriptures, of their unfitness for such a task, and the danger of confusing their interpretations. On account of its odious contents it was suppressed by the leaders of the congregation (a MS. copy of this work is to be found in the Saracin Library). See De Rossi, Dizionario storico degli autori Ebrei, p. 264; id. Bibli. Jud. Antichrist. (Paris, 1800), p. 92; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 42; De Long, Bibl. Pimentel, Abraham ha-Kohen, a Jewish rabbi, flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He was a pupil of Saul Mortera, and afterwards rabbi at the academy Keier Tora of Amsterdam, and lastly rabbi of the congregation of the Sephardim of Hamburg. He wrote on Jewish rites in three parts (Amsterdam, 1668):-academic treatises in the Portuguese language, under the title Questões e discursos académicos, que compostos na ilustre Academia...

cated Mauclerc, who, having assembled a number of his barons at Redon, decided that the bishops should be banished. Guillaume retired to Poitiers, where he acted, for some time, as confidante of Philippe, bishop of that city, during a severe illness of this prelate (1229). His rights having been recognised by the king and Mauclerc, he returned to his see in 1231, and kept busy during the rest of his life in reforming the abuses which had spread among the clergy during his absence, and continuing the reconstruction of his cathedral. Guillaume Fichon died at St. Brieuc July 29, 1284. He was canonised by Innocent III in 1247. His complete relics were discovered in 1847 in the cathedral. The Church of St. Brieuc and of Tréguier devotes to his memory the 29th of July.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Générale, xi, 248.

PINCKARD, PATRICK M., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born near the opening of the present century. He was converted about 1840, and in 1844 entered the itinerant ranks of the Methodist ministry, and preached successfully until 1870 within the bounds of the Missouri Conference. During this long term of ministerial life he was employed in circuit, station, and district work; also in the agency of Central College, St. Louis, and in the work of the Book-house of Missouri Methodism, in all of which places of trust and responsibility he gained the approval, confidence, and esteem of his brethren and the Church. He died Sept. 25, 1871. See Minutes of Annual Conf. M. E. Church, South, 1872, p. 738.

PINCKNEY Lektionen. A series of sermons, for the congregation of which Charles Pinckney, chief-justice of South Carolina under the provincial government (father of the late general C. C. Pinckney), provided. He died in 1758, and by his last will directed that two sermons, in May and November, annually, be on the first Monday after the second Tuesday in each of these months, should be preached in St. Philip's Church, Charleston, on the "greatness of God, and his goodness to all creatures," with the view, as he states, "to encourage and promote religious and virtuous principles and practices among us, and in order to excite an emulation in my wealthy countrymen, whose abilities and fortunes will better enable them thereto, for establishing lectures among us, in humble imitation of those founded by the Hon. Mr. Boyle in Great Britain." For effecting these purposes, in accordance with his will, "I charge my son and his family, and all my future successors as much as may be, to maintain the lecture house and lecture building, and all necessary expenses therefor; and I direct that the funds and investments thereof be a part of the income of my son and his family," etc.

PINZONCIVAI, a Socinian sect, so named after the town of Pinczow, Poland, where its leaders resided. The Pinczowites were usually called "Unitarian Brethren," but they desired to be called Arians (q. v.) rather than Socinians (q. v.). It is true, some of the principal doctors among them were inclined towards those views of Jesus Christ which afterwards were the common views of the Socinian sect; but the greater part of them agreed with the Arians, and affirmed that the Saviour was produced by God the Father before the foundation of the world, but that he was greatly inferior to the Father, and so also the Holy Spirit was begotten before the Father. This view is not clearly taught by George Schomann in his Tractamentum, published by Sand (p. 194–5): "Sub id fere tempus (A.D. 560) ex rhapsodii Latii Sociani quidam fratres dicebant, Dei filiun non esse secundum Trinitatis personam patri coessentialen et coequalem, sed hominem Jesum Christum, ex Spiritu Sancto conceptum, ex virginis Maria maternis, crucifixum et resuscitatum: a quibus nos commonei, sacras litteras percurrere, permuasi sumus." These words most clearly show that the Pinczowites (as they were called before they separated from the Reformed in 1560) professed to believe in a Divinity of some sort, and did not diverge Jesus Christ of all divinity, besides, Schomann was a doctor of great authority among them; and in the year 1565 (as he himself informs us), he contended at the convention of Petrcow (pro uno Deo patri) for one God the Father, in opposition to the Reformed, who, he says (Dea: trivium defendens), maintained a threefold God. Yet in the following year he, with others, was induced by the papers of Lelios Socinus to so alter his sentiments that he denied Christ to be a divine person. He, therefore, with his Pinczowian flock, before this time must necessarily have been, not a Socian, but an Arius. See Poland. (J. H. W.)

Pindar, John Hothemball, an English divine, was born in 1794. He graduated at Caius College, Cambridge, in 1816, and became principal of Hodderstone College, Barbadoes. He was afterwards canon residentiary and prebendary of Wells Cathedral, and principal of Wells Theological College, which latter office he resigned in 1865. He died at West Malvern, Eng., April 16, 1868. He published a volume of Sermons on Common Prayer:—Sermons on the Ordination Service:—Sermons on the Holy Days of the Church:—Expository Discourses on the Epistle to Timothy; and some Lectures. (Appleton's Annual Cyclop., vii, 592.)

Pinder, Thomas, a Wesleyan preacher of some note, was born at West Stockwhil, near Gainsborough, Eng., Sept. 22, 1774. He was converted through Methodist agency in 1795 at Sheffield. He felt called of God to the work of the holy ministry, and in 1799 was appointed to the Thetford Circuit. Thence for thirty-five years he labored on it, doing exemplary discipline, and pastoral and ministerial functions. In all the circuits in which he travelled he was highly and deservedly esteemed, both in his public and private capacity. As a preacher, though not great, he was striking, faithful, and impressive. As a pastor he was most tender and sympathetic. He died Aug. 27, 1855.—Welsh Meth. Mag. 1836, p. 719; 1838, art. i.

Pineda, Juan de (1), a learned Franciscan monk, was born at Seville in 1557. After entering the order at the age of fourteen, he was carefully advanced in classical learning, and then instructed in theology. As a student, he bore the reputation of great erudition, especially in the Greek, Hebrew, and Oriental languages. He was placed at the head of the Inquisition in Andalusia, and was commissioned by cardinal Zapata to visit the principal libraries of Spain, in order to register those works which might be obnoxious to the Roman Catholic religion. The result of his inquiries is contained in the Index novus Librorum Prohibitarum (Seville, 1631), published by order of cardinal Zapata, grand-inquisitor of Spain. Pineda published a version of Theodore Peltar's Catena Gracorum Patrum in Proverbia Salomonis. He also published Commentarius in Job (Madrid, 1537, 2 vols. fol.)—Praelectiones in psalmos (Seville, 1602) —Salomo Praelatii, qui de Rebus Salomonis Regis (Lyons, 1609, libri octo) —Commentarius in Ecclesiasticum (Antwerp, 1620). He died at Seville Jan. 27, 1637.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Générale, xl, 261.

Pineda, Juan de (2), another Spanish divine, was born at Medina de Rioseco in the 16th century, and has frequently been confounded with the preceding. He belonged to the Order of the Jesuits, and published Historia maravillosa de S. Juan-Baptista (Salamanca, 1574, 4to).—La Monarquia Ecclesiastica, o Historia Universel del Mundo (ibid. 1588, 14 vols. fol.; Barcelona, 1594, 1690).—Agricultura Christiana que contiene seer, discurso familiares (ibid. 1589, 2 vols. fol.). Many other works of his remain unpublished.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Générale, xl, 262.

Pinedo, Thomas dk (called in the synagogue Isaac), a noted Jewish litterateur of the 17th century, was born in 1614 in Spain, but was obliged to leave his native country and seek a refuge in France, where he was inquisitorial persecution. He was more famed for his proficiency in Greek and the ancient classics than as a Jewish theologian. He was descended from the family of Pinheiro of Francozo, in Portugal. His education he received at Madrid, where he was destined to the training of the Jesuits for his literary attainments, of whom he speaks in grateful remembrance. He had already reached a mature age when the suspicions of the Inquisition obliged him to quit the scene of his studies and the society of his learned friends in the capital of Spain, to live in safety in the United Provinces. He belonged to those few who were fortunate enough to evade in safety the clutches of the Inquisition. He differs from Orobo de Castro in this especially, that he never in any of his writings attacked the Christian religion, but, on the contrary, frequently took pleasure in acknowledging its beneficial influences upon society, though he did not spare the tribunal of the Inquisition, of which he says: "Me pudet pigetque profidisse hoc de gente Christiana." At Amsterdam he finished and published, in 1678, his edition of Σημαίνει τινα και πωλείν: Stephanus de Obstena quem Primus Thomas de Pinoelo Ludovici Latii juris donatus et observatorium scutum variarum linguarum ac praecipue Hebraico, Phanisio, Graeco, et Latina dialectis illustratum, and dedicated the work to the marquis of Mondegos, of the house of Minoiro, personally devoted to the encouragement of literature. Pinoelo's work, which is very valuable for Jewish history and archaeology, and was lately edited with a preface by Dindorf (Leips. 1825, 4 vols.), shows that the author was well acquainted with Jewish literature. Besides Josephus, which forms the basis of the whole, Pinoelo quotes Benjamin de Tulde's Itineraries; David Zemach (p. 487, 544); R. Salomo Jarchi, a.v. Antiochus, "quem Hebrei per rotebeth Rashi vocant, celebrissimus in S. S. commentariorum," Kimchi's Commentary on Genesis (p. 467); Ibn Ezra's Commentary on Esther (p. 583); Maimonides, Moseh Nebuchad. R. Azzariah, Min Haudomim (p. 583). In two passages Pinoelo mentions the name of Jesus, viz., when speaking of Bethlehem, he says, after having given the explanation of the text: "Sed multo magis urbem nobilissimam Davidis et Iesu Nazareni natalem," and then, when speaking of Galilee, he adds: "Quia Jesus Nazarenus frequenter in hac regione versabatur, ideo Julianum, ο Παπαισχρης, eum per contemptum Gallus et Christianus Galilæus vocabant. Sic enim vocabatur primum Christiani, qui sub imperatore Claudio, relitto Nazareorum et Gallorum nomine, Christiani diei sunt, ut teustatur Suidas." Pinoelo died Nov. 13, 1679, and the noble marquis whom we have mentioned above warmly expressed in a letter to the Judeo-Spanish poet, De Barros, his regret at the death of Pinoelo, and more especially at his dying in the profession of Judaism. Pinoelo not only left his in Σημαίνει a monument "a se reperimus," but also wrote his own epitaph in the following words:

Pine-tree. The word "pine" occurs in our translation three times, but in neither case is the pine of our northern regions referred to in the original. The first instance is in Neh. viii. 15 (Sept. Πεύκον παραπληκτον. Vulg. lignum pulcherrimum), where the Hebrew words within the holy circuit. If the former, he can find no place so fitting as the top of the δέλτα, or porch of the Temple; but if the latter, the royal porch or gallery (ναός βασιλείας) is the part he would prefer. He adds that, above all other parts of the Temple, the porch thereof, and indeed the whole porch, might not unfruitfully be called τὸ πτέρυγον τοῦ ἵπτος, the wing (for that is the literal meaning) of the Temple, "because like wings it extended itself in breadth on each side, far beyond the breadth of the Temple." If therefore the devil had placed himself on this part of the Temple, he may well be said to have placed him "upon the wing of the Temple; both because this part was like a wing to the Temple itself, and because that precipice was the wing of this part" (Hor. Hebr. adMatt. iv, 5). Against this interpretation, however, it seems decisive that Jesus, not being its author, had not gained admissitance to the Temple proper; unless, indeed, we understand that he was transported thither and back again miraculously. With regard to the other alternative, it is only necessary to cite the description of Josephus to shew that the situation was at least inappropriate to Satan's object: "On the south part (of the court of the Gentiles) was σώρος βασιλείας, 'the royal gallery,' that may be mentioned among the most magnificent things under the sun; for above the profoundest depth of the valley, Herod constructed a gallery of vast height, from the top of which, if any one looked down, he would become dizzy, his eyes being unable to reach so vast a depth." The same Greek word is used in the Sept. version to render, 1. κόσμος, καθαρός, a wing or border, e. g. of a garment (Numb. xxv, 38; 1 Sam. xxv, 27; xxiv, 4); 2. ἑρώτας, ἐρώτας, fin of a fish (Lev. xi, 9. So Arist. Anim. i, 5, 14); 3. καθαρός, an edge; A. V. end (Exod. xxvii, 38). Hesychius explains πτερύγιον as διάπτερον. Perhaps in any case τὸ πτέρυγον means the battlement ordered by law to be added to every roof. It is in favor of this that the word καθαρός is not used to indicate the top of the Temple (Dan. ix, 27; Hammond, Grotius, Calmet, De Wette, Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. iv). Eusebius tells us that it was from "the pinnacle" (τὸ πτέρυγον) that St. James was precipitated, and it is said to have remained until the 4th century (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii, 29; Williams, Holy City, ii, 388). See Temple.

Pinnacle. In the account of our Lord's temptation (Matt. iv, 5), it is stated that the devil took him to Jerusalem, "and set him on a [rather the] pinnacle of the Temple" (ἐπὶ τὸ πτέρυγον τοῦ ἵπτος). The part of the Temple denoted by this term has been much questioned by different commentators, and the only certain conclusion seems to be that it cannot be understood in the sense usually attached to the word (i.e. the point of a spiral ornament), as in that case the article would not have been prefixed. Grotius, Hammond, Dodridge, and others take it in the sense of balustrade or pinnated battlement. But it is now more generally supposed to denote what was called the king's portico, which is mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xvi, 11, 6), and is the same which is called in Scripture "Solomon's porch." Of this opinion are Wetstein, Kuinöll, Parkhurst, Rosenmüller, and others. Krebs, Schleusner, and some others, however, fancy that the word signifies the ridge of the roof of the Temple; and Josephus (Ant. xvi, 11, 6) is cited in proof of this notion. But we know that iron spikes were fixed all over the roof of the Temple to prevent the holy edifice from being defiled by birds (Joseph. War. v, 5, 6), and the presence of these spikes creates an objection, although the difficulty is perhaps not insurmountable, as we are told that the priests sometimes went to the top of the Temple (Middoth, ch. iv; T. Bab. t. Tamid, fol. 29). Dr. Bloomfield asks: "May it not have been a lofty spiral turret, placed somewhere about the centre of the building, like the spire in some cathedrals, to the topmost limit of which the devil might take in Jesus?" (Recens. Synopt. in Matt. iv, 5). We answer, it is: steeples do not belong to ancient or to Oriental architecture, and it is somewhat hazardous to provide one for the sole purpose of meeting the supposed occasion of this text. The opinion on this point is entitled to much respect, declares his inability to judge whether the part denoted should be considered as belonging to the holy fabric itself or to some building so fit as the top of the δέλτα, or porch of the Temple; but if the latter, the royal porch or gallery (ναός βασιλείας) is the part he would prefer. He adds that, above all other parts of the Temple, the porch thereof, and indeed the whole porch, might not unfruitfully be called τὸ πτέρυγον τοῦ ἵπτος, the wing (for that is the literal meaning) of the Temple, "because like wings it extended itself in breadth on each side, far beyond the breadth of the Temple." If therefore the devil had placed himself on this part of the Temple, he may well be said to have placed him "upon the wing of the Temple; both because this part was like a wing to the Temple itself, and because that precipice was the wing of this part" (Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. iv, 5). Against this interpretation, however, it seems decisive that Jesus, not being its author, had not gained admittance to the Temple proper; unless, indeed, we understand that he was transported thither and back again miraculously. With regard to the other alternative, it is only necessary to cite the description of Josephus to shew that the situation was at least inappropriate to Satan's object: "On the south part (of the court of the Gentiles) was σώρος βασιλείας, 'the royal gallery,' that may be mentioned among the most magnificent things under the sun; for above the profoundest depth of the valley, Herod constructed a gallery of vast height, from the top of which, if any one looked down, he would become dizzy, his eyes being unable to reach so vast a depth." The same Greek word is used in the Sept. version to render, 1. κόσμος, καθαρός, a wing or border, e. g. of a garment (Numb. xxv, 38; 1 Sam. xxv, 27; xxiv, 4); 2. ἑρώτας, ἐρώτας, fin of a fish (Lev. xi, 9. So Arist. Anim. i, 5, 14); 3. καθαρός, an edge; A. V. end (Exod. xxvii, 38). Hesychius explains πτερύγιον as διάπτερον. Eccl. ii, 29; Williams, Holy City, ii, 388). See Temple.

Pinnacle is an architectural term used to designate a small turret or tall ornament, usually tapering towards the top, and much used in Gothic architecture as a termination to butresses, etc. Not used in the Norman style, though there exist a few small turrets, of late date, with pointed terminations, which appear to be their prototypes, as at the west end of Rochester Cathedral, and the north transept of the church of St. Stephen at Caen. In the Early English style they are not very abundant; they are found circular, square; some are perfectly plain, as at the east end of Battle Church, Sussex; others are surrounded with small shafts, as in Peterborough and Ely; and in some instances the tops are crocketed. Towards the latter part of this style the system of surmounting each face of the shaft with a small battlement was introduced, and about the same period the shafts began to be occasionally made ofBattle Church, c. 1200.
open-work, so as to form niches for statues. The most learned men of his time spoke in praise of his erudition; and cardinal Sadoleto submitted to him his own works before giving them to the printer. In 1672 a statue of Pius was placed in the Palazzo Publico at Siena, which is attributed to the sculptor at the court of Siena. Jean de Pins wrote in most elegant Latin, and deserved the following eulogy at the hands of Erasmus, who was such a competent judge in the matter: "Potent inter Tulli- aequi dictionum compositorem numerantur Johannem Pinsus." We have of him, Vita Philippo Beralduci majoris (Bo- logna, 1505, 4to) — Vita Sancto Catharinae Severinae (ibid. 1505, 4to) — Diri Rochi Narbonensi Vita (Ven. and Par. 1516, 8vo) — Allobrogici narratorum libellus (ibid. 1516, 4to); this is a kind of novel composed for the instruction of the children of the chancellor Antoine Duprat: De vita ostica (Toulouse, 14to); this work is held in great esteem: De claris feminis (Par. 1521, fol.) — remarkable for the elegance of the compo- sition. Pins died at Toulouse Nov. 1, 1557. — Hoefler, Nova. Biog. Generales, 1, 277.

 pys., Simcha, a noted recent Hebraist, was born at Tarnopol, Austrian Poland (Galicia), in 1801. He was the son of a rabbi [see SHERACH], and was well trained in Hebrew lore. Becoming interested in the doctrines of the Chassidim [q.v.], he joined the ranks of the so-called Hasidim, a heretical party of mystic views, as well as in the practice, favored worldly gayety coupled with cynical elements. At the same time he suffered himself to be drawn into the whirlpool of a noisy commercial life, which induced him to enter upon various large speculations, most of which could not long remain imprisoned in these strange spheres, and, with the loss of his entire fortune, he finally abandoned these schemes. He took up his abode in Odessa, which was then a flourishing town, and filled the situation of Rabbinical secretary, and in spite of the pittance of a salary which was paid him, he was barely enough for his existence, he was always in good spirits. But it was not to be expected that a man of Pinsker's talents should long rest content in such a limited sphere. Perceiving how miserable was the condition, in regard to culture, of the South-Russian Jews, which he had no doubt was due to a faulty, anti-quated education, he determined to exert himself for the establishment of Jewish elementary schools, in which the children could receive a proper religious and securi- ty education, suitable to their ages. Odessa was, at the commercial centre of Southern Russia, seemed to him just adapted for such an institution, and Simcha Pinsker lost no time in communicating this important matter to his friend Isaac Horowitz, a native of Brody, who at once took great interest in the proposition. The two young men known the subject of this paper, and the former had a view to several influential parties, and soon succeeded in gain- ing for their plan the conjunction of eminent men, who made all necessary arrangements with the congrega- tion and the government, and thus readily accomplished the object. Pinsker was placed at the head of the newly founded school, and in that capacity he labored until 1840, when he removed to Vienna on a pension for the remainder of his life. Pinsker is noted, how- ever, not simply as the founder and propagator of a high educational status among his compatriots at Odessa, but rather as one of the best Hebraists of our day. When in 1839 Abraham Korkowitch brought from the Crimea a mass of curious and unknown manuscripts, and, among others, a codex of the later prophets, which had, like several Pentateuch fragments, with Haphta- roth and Targum, a peculiar punctuation—the kernel and accent points deviating in form, placed not un- der, but above the consonants—and which he presented to the Odessa Society for history and antiquities, Pinsker gave himself to the deciphering of this newly dis- covered series of punctuation and never rested till, in 1834-43, he became thoroughly acquainted with the materials before him. He showed the patience of a monk of the Middle Ages, continually making researches in bibliography, biography, and literary history, and did not even shrink from commencing to study the Arabic, the language in which some of the manuscripts were composed. To acquire the latter was in those days no mean task, especially in a town like Odessa, yet Pinski overcame all difficulties, and by his indefatigable diligence, perseverance, and industry, he made some of those researches and their result were communicated to the world.

Pinski was too modest a man to presume that he had anything at command worth knowing by the rest of the world until Osius Schorr applied to him for a contribution to his critical "Ha-Chalau. For this purpose, Pinski prepared a communication concerning the accomplishments of two Karaites, Moses Darai and Radba (David ben-Abraham), natives of Fez, who lived during the Middle Ages, and stood in great repute for their learning. The result of these labors grew to a great work of comprehensive contents, which he published under the name "Likkute Kadmoniim" ("Collections from Times of Yore"), and also under the title, "The History of Karaitism and the Karaites Literature." In it he describes the development of Karaitism, and notes four consecutive periods: a pre-Anassiit, one of Anassiit, another of the "Bekaraitit" and, last and last the Karaites proper. The latter period brought about the breach concerning the Talmudic tradition, and missionaries were sent to Jewish congregations in order to call the people together to enlist them for the new doctrine (this is held in the Yevamot). When the word Karaita, according to Pinski, was derived. They were the people who laid the foundation-stone for completing the editio of Biblical orthography, grammar, lexicography, and modern Hebrew poetry; and although the text of the Tanakh may be considered in rabbinical circles as the first who wrote a Hebrew grammar and a lexicographer, and Dunash ben-Labrat is looked upon as the first who wrote poetry according to Arabic rules, yet there were already among the Karaites many grammarians, lexicographers, and poets, who made use of the Arabic methods, and of this we find ample proofs in the Likkute. Important Karaita writings are quoted, among which the Lexicon by Radba and the Dicen by Moses Darai are largely treated of. Pinski maintains that the latter lived during the 9th century; and, if so, Darai must have considered the leader of a great poetic period, the value of whose poetical productions was highly appreciated, inasmuch as Gebirol Mose ibn-Ezra, Jehuda ha-Levi, and Abraham ibn-Ezra employed many successful similes, expressions, and even whole strophes, which accord in sound and manner with those of Darai. The "Likkute" and the "Likkutei" are the highest expectations of the author. Nearly all that is known previously in the republic of letters, Pinski became all at once a celebrated name. The extraordinary compilation, the imposing erudition, the superabundance of rich material, the conscientiousness and generality of combinations, were all calculated to cause admiration. Before the work was all published, those, as it were, official representatives of Jewish history, Joseph and Grätz, hastened to declare their acknowledgment. The former with fulsome admiration, in the "Bund Chajye" (1860), and the latter in the preface of the fifth volume of his "History of the Jews." Also Dr. Schmiel (Frankel's "Monatschrift," 1861) signified his appreciation of Pinski. In the year 1863 Pinski published in Vienna his "Mebo ha-Nikud," or, as entitled in German, "Introduction to the Babylonic-Hebreal punctuation system, executed according to the manuscripts for history and antiquities in the Odessa Museum." This work is a masterpiece of critical penetration into the historic developments of the vowel and accentuation points. Every line of the "Bekaraitit" and "Anassiit" is Pinski's inquiring mind as a grammarian, and it was one of his favorite ideas to publish a system of Hebrew grammar, which he was on the point of carrying out when his health began to fail him; and the more he tried to bid defiance to nature, the more inexorably the overtaken mind took revenge on him. He died Oct. 29, 1864. He left in MS. more than eighty works, the most of them having reference to Rabbinical or Karaitic authors, such as Jepheth ben-Ali, Aron the First, Abraham ibn-Ezra, Mainonides—the books Abodah and Con-sovenoth—Kalonymos ben-Kalonymos, Mordecai Contini, Deisenhodio, and many others. Some of these researches and their result were communicated to the world. Pinski was too modest a man to presume that he had anything at command worth knowing by the rest of the world until Osius Schorr applied to him for a contribution to his critical "Ha-Chalau. For this purpose, Pinski prepared a communication concerning the accomplishments of two Karaites, Moses Darai and Radba (David ben-Abraham), natives of Fez, who lived during the Middle Ages, and stood in great repute for their learning. The result of these labors grew to a great work of comprehensive contents, which he published under the name "Likkute Kadmoniim" ("Collections from Times of Yore"), and also under the title, "The History of Karaitism and the Karaites Literature." In it he describes the development of Karaitism, and notes four consecutive periods: a pre-Anassiit, one of Anassiit, another of the "Bekaraitit" and, last and least the Karaites proper. ed the church and convent of Santa Maria del Popolo, in the church of which he built a beautiful chapel for Domenico della Rovere, cardinal of Sant' Clemente, and, according to Vaasari, nephew of Sixtus IV: he built a palace for the same cardinal at Bocquese. About 1473-1475 he built the old Library of the Vatican: Platina was installed by Sixtus as librarian in 1475. Pintelli restored also the hospital of Santo Spirito in Sassia, which was burned down in 1471. He built also the Ponte Sisto over the Tiber; the churches San Pietro in Vinculis, Sant' Agostino, Santa Maria della Pace, and Sant' Apostolo (since rebuilt); and probably San Pietro in Montorio and San Jacopo were built from his designs. In 1480 Pintelli strengthened the celebrated church and convent of San Francesco at Assisi by raising enormous buttresses against the northern walls. Dr. Gay (Kunstblatt, 1886) attributes some other works in Rome to Pintelli, and he has shown that after the death of Sixtus, in 1484, he went to Urbino to continue the ducal palace of Urbino, which Lucianus Lauranus of Savonia had been engaged upon from 1468 until 1488, for Federigo. Pintelli may have remained at Urbino until 1491, when he built the church of Santa Maria delle Grazie at Sinigaglia, for the duke Giovanni della Rovere. He probably died at Urbino, where he was apparently naturalized, as he took the name of Urban of Urbino. It appears to have been influenced by the style of Brunelleschi in his designs, in which there are still characteristics of the previously prevailing pointed architecture. His works are said to be well constructed, as appears from the cupola of Sant' Agostino and the Ponte Sisto, still in a perfect state of preservation.

Pinto, Isaaco, a Portuguese moralist of Jewish descent, was born in 1716. He first settled at Bordeaux, then went to Holland. He was a learned man, but commenced to write only at the age of about fifty, when he gained some reputation by defending against Voltaire his Jewish brethren, or at least among the Portuguese and Spanish Jews. He wrote in French. We select among his writings, Esquisse sur le luxe (Amster. 1762, 12mo). He thus defines his subject: "Luxury consists in this, that the houses we dwell in, the clothes we put on, the victuals we live on, the equipages we use, are an expense in proportion of our means, that we can no longer discharge our duties towards our families, friends, the country, and the poor" (Apologie pour la nation Juive; Réflexions critiques, etc. [ibid. 1762, 12mo]). Perceire, the instructor of the deaf-mute girls of the asylum of the Châtelet, a friend of the author, sent a copy of it to Voltaire, who thanked him, and promised to notice it in the next edition of his works, which, however, he failed to do. Guénée reprinted the "Apologie" as a kind of introduction to his Lettres de quelques Juifs Portugais:—Un jeu de Cartes (1768, 8vo), a letter to Liderer:—Trésor de la Circulation et du Credil (ibid. 1771, 1773, 1781, 8vo), translated into English and German:—Précis des arguments contre les matérialistes (La Haye, 1774, 1776, 8vo). The complete works of Pinto were published in French (Amster. 1771, 8vo), and in eight volumes in 1778. He died Aug. 14, 1787, at La Haye.—Hoefler, Nouv. Bio., Gen. xl, 282.

Pinto, Josias, ben Joseph, a Jewish rabbi, was born at the beginning of the 17th century at Lisbon, and settled at Damascus. He is also called דניאא, i. e. Rabbi Josias Pinto, and wrote יונתן, "Light of the Eyes," annotations on the Fountain of Jacob, בקעת חלב, by J. Jakob ibn-Chabib (Venice, 1643, and often since);—גין כנץ, "Purified Silver," a diffusive exposition on the Pentateuch (ibid. 1628) —יונתן כנץ, "Choice Silver," a succinct exposition on Genesis and Exodus for the same compiler.—Proved Silver, a commentary on Proverbs (Amster. 1714-15.—יונתן כנץ, legal decisions (Venice, 1694; Smyrna, 1756). Pinto de Fonseca, Emanuel, grand-master of the Order of Malta, born May 24, 1681, belonged to one of the first families of Portugal. Elected grand-master Jan. 18, 1741, after discharging the functions of vice-chancellor and bailli de grâce, he won by his firmness of conduct the esteem of the sovereigns of Europe, to whom he had been useful. It was during his mastery that the unperceived conspiracy against his order was discovered, June 25, 1742. A number of Turkish prisoners, among them Osman Pasha, governor of Rhodes, were to destroy the knights by the sword and by poison, and take possession of Malta with the aid of the Turkish fleet, with which they were in secret correspondence. In September, 1740, a number of Christian slaves forming the crew of a first-rate ship carrying a valuable freight, and on board of which Mehmet Pasha was going to Stanchio to collect the taxes, made themselves masters of the ship, brought it to Malta, and shared it with the knights. The sultan prepared to wreak terrible vengeance on the order, when Louis XV, king of France, had the vessel redeemed at his own cost and restored to the papacy, Dec. 10, 1761. Pinto suppressed (1769) the Jesuits in all the dominions of his order, but granted them a certain liberty in the exercise of their religion. In 1772 he obtained from king Stanislaus-August of Poland the restitution of considerable donations which had been taken from the order. He died Jan. 24, 1773.—Hoefler, Nouv. Pinturicchio, Bernardino, an Italian painter of much celebrity, was born at Perugia in 1454. His real name was Pietro Vannucci, but he often signed his name, Pintoricchio, from his deafness and insignificant appearance, but Pinturicchio was his usual name. He was a disciple of Pietro Perugino (q. v.). His earlier works no longer exist. He never perfected himself in the use of colors, but was confined to the portrayal of landscapes and temperas. He went to Rome, and probably labored with Perugino in the Sistine Chapel. He afterwards executed almost numberless frescoes in the churches and palaces of that city. He was first patronized by the Roveri, and then by the Ficoroni. For Alexander VII he decorated the Apartamento Borgia in the Vatican: five of these rooms still remain in their original state. His pictures in the Castle of S. Angelo have been completely destroyed. During his engagements in Rome he went twice to Urbino, for the execution of commissions there. The amount of his labors was surprising, but is explained by his great facility of execution and the employment of many assistants. He was not original in his compositions; he loved landscapes, but he cumbered them with too much detail; his figures of virgins, infants, and angels have a certain coarseness; he used too much gilt and ornamentation; his draperies were full, but often badly cast; his works are either too scantily or very sombre, no pleasing medium seeming to suggest itself to him; his flesh has the red outlines of the earliest tempera; and yet with all these faults he painted at a time when the great precepts of art were well known, and his works are good exponents of skilled labor in art without any striking or exceptional power in the artist. It is scarcely possible here to give more than a list of the churches in which he painted: in Rome the spells of Trajano, the Arcelli, S. Cecilia, and S. Maria in Trastevere, the Pontificio, the Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, and S. Onofrio. In 1498 he returned to Perugia, and undertook an altar-piece for S. Maria de' Fossi (now S. Anna), to be completed in two years. This is the most finished of his works, and more full of feeling than any other. He next adorned the collegiate church of S. Maria delle Grazie, but his works there are fast disappearing from the effects of dampness.
PIENY

He was next called to Siena by cardinal Francesco Piccolomini, to decorate the library of the Duomo. Here he painted the ceiling in a variety of designs, with the shield and arms of the Piccolomini in the centre; and the walls with ten scenes from the life of Eneas Sylvius, or Pius II. This work was commenced in 1508, but was interrupted by deaths in the family of his patron, and was not completed until 1507, having filled various other commissions in the mean time. It is said with great probability that he was assisted in the library by the then youthful Raphael, and some critics have been wont to attribute the best features of all Pinturichio's pictures to aid from the same source. But this can hardly have been the case. They were associated more or less, without doubt, and it is not improbable that Raphael was one of the many assistants whom the master had in Perugia for his work in Siena; but there are many reasons why the credit of the best of Pinturichio should not be given to Sanzio, who certainly does not need any such praise. There are many circumstances connected with certain cartoons, many similarities of figures in the works of the two masters, which make us feel sure of their association, but these Sienese frescoes are conceived in the system of Pinturichio. This library is one of the few Italian halls that retain their original character. The frescoes are discolored and injured in parts, but beautifully restored by Baldassare Roppi. It is probable that after the completion of these works the master went to Rome, and returned to Siena in 1509 with Signorelli, who stood as godfather to the son born to Pinturichio in the beginning of that year. He then probably entered the service of Pandolfo Petrucci. His last authentic picture is now in the Palazzo Borromeo at Milan, and is a cabinet piece of Christ bearing his Cross. It was painted in 1518, the year of his death. Dreadful stories have been told of the manner in which his wife Grazia treated him. It is said that when very sick and near death, painted, and then confirmed. His works are seen in all large, and in some smaller collections of Europe. PIY, ALEXANDRE, a French ascetic writer of much celebrity, was born at Barcelonnette in 1640. He joined the Dominicans order, and then taught theology at Aix; he was called to Paris in 1676, and there he resided of the novitiate in the houses of his order. He was more distinguished for the holiness of his life than for his writings. He died at Paris Jan. 29, 1709. Of these we mention Carma philosophica (Lyons, 1670, 5 vols. 12mo)---Carmen S. Thome (Paris, 1689, 4 vols. 12mo)---La Clef du par amour (ibid. 1692, 12mo)---La Vie cachee (Paris, 1685, 12mo), etc.---Hoeber, Nouv. Biog. Generale, xii, 285.

Pinyutus is mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles, iv, 29.31) as bishop of Cynosus, in the isle of Crete, and as a contemporary of Dionysius of Corinth (q. v.). According to the notices given by Eusebius, Dionysius addressed an epistle to Pinyutus, exhorting him that concerning abstinence (aipriov), not to lay too heavy a yoke on the brethren (peipoi), but rather pay regard to the weakness of the majority. It seems that Pinyutus tried to promote in his congregation a Montanistic or Gnostic ascetic tendency. Pinyutus, however, persevered in his course, and replied to Dionysius that it was time to offer to his congregation a stronger meat than milk. Some have thought that the point of difference between Dionysius and Pinyutus was rather concerning celibacy, which the latter so much as to induce among his clergy; but this is a mistake. In other respects, Eusebius speaks of this rejoinder of Pinyutus as containing the best proof of the latter's orthodoxy, his care for the salvation of the souls committed to his charge, his rhetoric, and understanding of divine things. PIOMBO, Fra SEBASTIANO DEL, an eminent Italian painter, noted in the history of sacred art, was born in 1485 at Venice, whence he was called also "Veneziano." His surname, according to Lanzi, was Luciano, though it does not appear that he was known by it in his own time, or that he ever signed his pictures with it. He acquired his principal reception in oil, the Raising of Lazarus, the words "Sebastianus Venetus faciebat" appear in characters no doubt traced by himself. He was a skilful musician, particularly on the lute, but abandoned that science for painting, the medium of which he acquired under Bellini, but afterwards became the disciple of Giorgione, whose style of coloring he carefully studied and successfully imitated. He first distinguished himself as a portrait-painter, to which his powers were peculiarly adapted. His portraits are boldly designed and full of character; the heads and hands are admirably drawn, with an exquisite tone of color and extraordinary relief. The first historical picture which established his reputation was the altar-piece in the church of San Gio. Crisostomo at Venice, which, from its richness and harmony of coloring, has frequently been mistaken for a work by his master Giorgione. Sebastiano was invited to Rome by Agostino Chigi, a rich merchant who traded at Venice, by whom he was employed in ornamenting his palace of the Farnesina, in conjunction with Raffaello, whose Death of Procris, which he painted, is his celebrated Galatea. Thus painting in competition, he found his own destiny of invention, to remedy which he studied the antique, and obtained the instruction and assistance of Michael Angelo. Indeed it is said that that illustrious painter, growing jealous of the fame of Raffaello, availed himself of the power of Sebastiano as a colorist, in the hope that, assisted by his composition, Piombo might become a successful rival. Michael Angelo accordingly furnished the designs for the Pietà in the church of the Convention a Viterbo, and the Madonna in San Pietro in Montorio at Rome, the execution of which, however, in consequence of Piombo's tedious mode of proceeding, occupied six years. The extraordinary beauty of the coloring, and the grandeur of Michael Angelo's composition and design in the elaborated productions, were the objects of universal surprise and applause. At this time cardinal Julian de' Medici commissioned Raffaello to paint his picture of the Transfiguration, and being desirous of presenting an altar-piece to the cathedral of Narbonne, of which he was archbishop, he engaged Sebastiano to paint the picture of the Raising of Lazarus, of the same dimensions. Vasari states that in the composition of this work he was assisted by Michael Angelo; and in the magnificent collection of drawings belonging to Sir Thomas Lawrence there were two careful sketches of the Transfiguration, made by Michael Angelo, and several smaller ones of other parts of the design. On its completion the picture was publicly exhibited at Rome, in competition with the Transfiguration, and it excited general admiration, although thus brought into direct competition with the crown of his own art, and of Raffaello's pencil. It was sent to the cathedral of Narbonne, for which it was painted, and remained till the middle of the 18th century, when it was removed by the regent of France into the Orleans collection. Having been brought to England with the rest of that collection in 1792, it was purchased for two thousand guineas, and is now deposited in the National Gallery at London. It was painted on wood, but has been transferred to canvas; its size is twelve feet six inches high, and nine feet six inches wide. After the death of Piombo, which occurred in 1538, the pictures which he painted in other churches were in the hands of his executor, whom he designated in a codicil written three years before his death, and which he thus signed and sealed, and thenceforth called Fra Sebastiano del Piombo. His works were numerous; some fine ones are in Madrid and St. Petersburg; many are in Venice, and they are seen in several Continental galleries. The last work was the chapel of the Chigi family, in Santa Maria del Popolo, which he left imperfect, and it was afterwards finished by Francesco Salviati. He died of a fever, at Rome, in 1547. He is said to have been the inventor of painting upon walls with oil-color, and of preventing the colors from becoming dark by applying, in the first instance, a mixture of mastic and Grecian pitch, or, according to some authorities, a plaster composed of quick-lime, pitch, and mastic. Pious Workers, a Roman Catholic congregation, founded in 1621 by Caraffa, an Italian nobleman, who was for a time a Jesuit, was approved by pope Gregory XV, and confirmed in 1634 by pope Urban VIII. This congregation is governed by a superior tribunal, and vows are taken, and they serve in missions and other ecclesiastical functions useful to the Church. Their dress is black cloth, like that of other ecclesiastics.

Pipe, Musical (ḥabal), The Hebrew word invariably so rendered (1 Sam. x. 5; 1 Kings i. 40; Isa. v. 12; xxx. 29; Jer. xlviii. 36; so also αὐθὸς, 1 Cor. xiv. 7) is derived from a root signifying "to bore, perforate," and is represented with sufficient correctness by the English "pipe" (or "flute," as in the margin of 1 Kings i. 40). It is one of the simplest, and therefore probably one of the oldest of musical instruments; and in consequence of its simplicity of form there is reason to suppose that the "pipe" of the Hebrews did not differ materially from that of the ancient Egyptians and Greeks. It is associated with the tabret (kaph) as an instrument of a peaceful and social character, just as in Shakespeare (Macbeth, Act ii, 3), "I have known when there was no music with him but the drum and fife, and now had he rather hear the tabor and the pipe"—the constant accompaniment of merriment and festivity (Luke vii. 32), and especially characteristic of "the piping time of peace." The pipe and tabret were used at the banquets of the Hebrews (Isa. v. 12), and their bridal processions (Mishna, Baba metiv, vi. 1), and accompanied the simpler religious services, when the young prophets, returning from the high-place, caught their inspiration from the harmony (1 Sam. x. 5); or the pilgrims, on their way to the great festivals of their ritual, beguiled the weariness of the march with psalms sung to the simple music of the pipe (Isa. xxx. 29). When Solomon was proclaimed king the whole people went up after him to Gibon, piping with pipes (1 Kings i. 40). The sound of the pipe was apparently a soft wailing note, which made it appropriate to be used in mourning and at funerals (Matt. ix. 23), and in the lament of the prophet over the destruction of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 96). The pipe was the type of perforated wind-instruments, as the harp was of stringed instruments (1 Macc. iii. 45), and was even used in the Temple-choir, as appears from Psa. lxxxvii. 7, where "the players on instruments" are properly "pipers." Twelve days in the year, according to the Mishna (Arach. ii. 8), the pipes sounded before the altar: at the slaying of the First Passover, the slaying of the Second Passover, the first feast-day of the Passover, the first feast-day of the Feast of Weeks, and the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles. On the last-mentioned occasion the playing on pipes accompanied the drawing in water from the fountain of Siloah (Neh. iv. 1; v. 1) for five and six days. The pipes which were played before the altar were of reed, and not of copper or bronze, because the former gave a softer sound. Of these there were not less than two nor more than twelve. In later times the office of mourning at funerals became a profession, and the funeral and death-bed were never without the professional pipers or flute-players (ἀὐθόργας, Matt. ix. 23), a custom which still exists (comp. Ovid, Fast. vi, 660, "cantabat mostia tibia funeribus"). It was incumbent on even the poorest Israelite, at the death of his wife, to provide at least two pipers and one woman to make lamentation. See Musical Instruments.

In the social and festive life of the Egyptians the pipe played as prominent a part as among the Hebrews. "While dinner was preparing, the party was enlivened by the sound of music; and a band, consisting of the harp, lyre, guitar, tambourine, double and single pipe, flute, and other instruments, played the favorite airs and songs of the country" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, ii, 222. In the different combinations of instruments used in Egyptian bands, we generally find either the double pipe or the flute, and sometimes both; the former being played both by men and women, and the latter exclusively by women. The Egyptian single pipe, as described by Wilkinson (Anc. Egypt, ii, 308), was "a straight tube, without any increase at the mouth, and when played was held with both hands. It was of moderate length, apparently not exceeding a foot and a half, and many have been found much smaller; but these may have belonged to the peasants, without mer-quarter of an inch at the lower. It is pierced with six holes in front, and generally with another hole at the back. . In the hands of a good performer the reed yields fine, mellow tones; but it requires much practice to sound it well. The double pipe, which is found as frequently in Egyptian paintings as the single one, consisted of two pipes, perhaps occasionally united together by a common mouthpiece, and played each with the corresponding hand. It was common to the Greeks and other people, and, from the mode of holding it, received the name of right and left pipe, the tibba destra and sinistra of the Romans; the latter had but few holes, and, emitting a deep sound, served as a bass. The other had more holes, and gave a sharp tone" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., ii, 909, 910). It was played on chiefly by women, who danced as they played, and is imitated by the modern Egyptians in their zurndr, a double reed, a rude instrument, used principally by peasants and camel-drivers out of doors (ibid., p. 811, 812). In addition to these is also found in the earliest sculptures a kind of flute, held with both hands, and sometimes so long that the player was obliged to stretch his arms to their full length while playing. Any of the instruments above described would have been called by the Hebrews by the general term chaldil, and it is not improbable that they might have derived their knowl-

e of them from Egypt. The single pipe is said to have been the invention of the Egyptians alone, who attribute it to Osiris (Jul. Poll. Omn. hist. iv, 10); and as the material of which it was made was the lotus-wood (Ovid, Fast. iv, 190), it is possible the lotus was sacred, there may be some foundation for the conjecture. Other ma- terials mentioned by Julius Pollux are reed, brass, box- wood, and horn. Pliny (xvi, 66) adds silver and the bones of asses. Bartenora, in his note on Arachis, ii, 5, above quoted, identifies the chaldil with the French chalumeau, which is the German schuette and our shawm or shalm, of which the clarionet is a modern improvement. The shawm, says Mr. Chappell (Pop. Mus. i, 35, note 6), "was played with a reed like the vayte, or hautboy, but being a bass instrument, with about the compass of an octave, had probably more the tone of a bassoon." This can scarcely be correct, or Drayton's expression, "the shrillest shawm" (Polyol. iv, 366), would be inappropriate.—Smith, s. v. As among the Greeks, Romans, and the modern Arabs (see Niebuhr, Res. i, 180, where the cuts are given), so probably among the ancient Jews, there were several kinds of pipe, distinguished chiefly by the number of holes. (See Joseph. War. iii, 9, 5; Pliny, x, 60; Dought- tai Anal. ii, 12; Altmann, in Temp. Hebr., ii, 509 sq.) Yet we must not call to mind the completeness of modern pipes and flutes, obtained by keys, etc. See esp. Meurinus, De tibia collectand. in Ucelino, Theat. ur. xxxii; Bartholin, De tibia ret. Bib. ii (Amstel. 1679). See Flute.

Pipes. Hydraulic. There are three Hebrew words so rendered: א"מ (mutzaqkh, Zech. iv, 2, something cast, as rendered 2 Chron. iv, 3); א"מ (m'kh, prob. a bezel or cavity, Ezek. xxviii, 13); and א"מ (rometer, a tube, Zech. iv, 12; whence kiv'sapoq, confunus).

Pipe, John S., a Wesleyan minister, was born in the last half of the 18th century. He was converted when but a boy. He entered the itinerant ministry in 1790, and for thirty-five years labored most successfully for the Gospel cause. He was generally employed in the most populous parts of the British kingdom, and was much beloved by the people to whom he preached. He died July 21, 1835. "His ministry was faithful, lively, and zealous, and his spirit affectionate, cheerful, and devout."—Westley Meth. Mag. 1835, p. 728.

Pipher, William G., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born August 23, 1817, in Hopkinton, N. H. In 1837 he removed to Illinois and entered a school in the town of Ebenezer, near Jacksonville. He was converted Aug. 6, 1838, and believing that he was moved by the Holy Ghost to preach the Gospel, obtained license Aug. 14, 1841. In September of the same year he joined the Illinois Conference, and was appointed to the Rushville Circuit; in 1842 was sent to Carthage; in 1843 he was appointed to Pulaski; in 1844 was reappointed to Rushville; in 1847 to Mount Sterling; in 1846 to Lawrenceville; in 1847 to Hilles- borough; in 1848 was ordained elder; and from 1848 to 1850 held a local relation. In 1851 he was readmit- ted to the Conference, and reappointed to Pulaski; in 1852 to Havana; in 1853 to Athens; in 1854 to Ed- gar; in 1855, his health not being very good, he took a transfer to Kansas, which at that time was just opening for settlement. His first appointment was Topeka Circuit, where he labored with great acceptability, and laid foundations upon which others have since largely built. In 1857 he was sent to Big River Circuit, where he did a good work, organized classes and Sun- day-schools, attending to all the duties of a Methodist preacher. In 1858 he was appointed to the Auburn and Tecumseh Circuit, where he labored the earlier half of the year with some success; but the long rides between appointments, the many exposures to storms, swimming swollen streams, with only such accommodations as new settlements often afford, and sometimes wandering over the wide prairies until morning, broke him down completely, and at the Conference in 1859 he took a superannuated relation, after which he resided at Baldwin City, Kansas, highly respected and most beloved by those who knew him best. He died there May 13, 1869. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1870, p. 94.

Pipping, Henri, a German theologian and biographer, was born at Leipzig in 1670. He discharged, from the year 1698, several ecclesiastical functions at the church of San Thomas at Leipzig, and became in 1706 preacher at the court of Dresden. Pipping died in 1722. He wrote Arcaeo Bibliotheca Thomas Lipsiensia sacra (Leipzig, 1780, 8vo) — Sacer decumum sepulcrum memoriam theologorum nostrae etate dariassionorum exhibens (ibid. 1705, 2 vols. 8vo), followed by Tria decumum (ibid. 1707, 8vo) — Sermo universa Biographica selecta (ibid. 1709, 8vo) — Simeonis dissertationum (ibid. 1708 and 1723, 8vo).

Piquepus is the name of a French reformed order of Franciscans, which was organized by father Vincent Massart, a Parisian, in 1593. They built their first convent between Paris and Pontoise, and the second at the place called Piquepus, where they finally made their headquarters, and obtained the name by which they are generally known. The strength of the order confined to France is remarkable. They have a house at Rome, but it is the only one sanctioned outside of France, as pope Paul V, who gave authority for the order in 1620, so conditioned. Their dress is a black coat, and a round hood with scapulary. They wear sandalshoes and shave like the Capuchin monks.

PIRIE, a native of Maughold, is a name found in the apocryphal account of the family-heads who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (1 Esdr. v. 19); but not contained in the parallel Heb. texts (Ezra ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29), and not originating from a repetition of the name Nephus preceding.

Pigm. (Heb. Pir'am), נוימ, like a wild ass, i.e. fleet; Sept. Φίδ. v. r. Alex. Φίδαππος, Vulg. Pharam, the Amorite king of Jarmuth at the time of Joshua's conquest of Canaan (Josh. x. 8). R.C. cir. 1618. With his four confederates he was defeated in the great battle before Gibbon, and fled for refuge to the cave at Makkedah, the entrance to which was closed by Joshua's command. At the close of the long day's slaughter and pursuit, the five kings were brought from their hiding-place, and hanged upon five trees till sunset, when their bodies were taken down and cast into the cave "wherein they had been hid" (Josh. x. 27; Smith. See JARMUTH.

Pir'athon (Heb. Pirathon), פיראון, Ganen, prince; or, First, a delf or creek; Sept. Φιραώτος, v. r. Φαραώτης and Φαραώτης, the name of one or two places in Palestine. We read in the book of Judges that "Abdon the son of Hillel, a Pirathonite, judged Israel, . . . and was buried in Pirathon," in the land of Ephraim, in the mount of the Amalekites" (xii. 13, 15). The city is not again mentioned in the Bible; but among David's mighty men was "Benaias the Pirathonite, of the children of Ephraim" (1 Chron. xxvii. 14, xii. 81; 2 Sam. xxiii. 80). The city of Pirathon was therefore situated in the territory of Ephraim, and among the mountains, apparently where a colony of the wandering Amalekites had settled. Jerome mentions it (Onomast. s. v. Frastan), but does not appear to have known anything of it. It is mentioned, however, by the accurate old tradition that Parchi as lying about twelve miles west of Shechem, and called Ferata (Asher's Benjamin of Jud. ii. 426). About six miles W.S.W. of Nabalus, upon the summit of a tell among low hills, still stands the little village of Ferata, which is doubtless identical with the ancient Pirathon (Robinson, Bib. Res. iii. 184). According to Schwartz (Pulver, 1518), it is identified by Astori with the modern village of Petha, on the mountain of Amalek, five English miles west of Shechem, doubtless referring to the same place.

Josephus mentions a Pharathon (Φαραώσις), grouping it between Timnath and Tekoa (Ant. xiii. 1, 3); and the same name occurs in 1 Mac. ix. 50 (Φαραώσις), among the towns whose ruined fortifications were restored by Barcidas, in his campaign against the Jews; but it could scarcely have been identical with the Pirathon of Ephraim, though the names are the same. This city was probably situated somewhere in the wilderness of Judah; but the site has not been discovered. See PIRATHONITE.

Pirathonite (Heb. Pirathon), פיראון, Φιραώνιτης and Φαραώνιτης, from Pirathon; Sept. Φαραώνιτης, Φαραώνιτης, or Φαραώνιτης, a native or inhabitant of Pirathon (q. v.); the epithet of the judge Abdon (Judg. xii. 18, 19, 15), and of one of David's officers, namely, Benaias, captain of the eleventh army contingent (1 Chron. xxvii. 14, and a member of the royal guard (1 Chron. x. 81).

Pire, Alexander, a Scotch divine, flourished near the opening of the present century. His ecclesiastical connection was first with the Antiburghers, then with the Relief Synod, and finally he joined the Independents. He died at Newburgh, in Fife, in 1804. His works, collected and published after his death (Edinb. 1805-6, 6 vols. 12mo), contain various treatises, relating to the Jews, to the primitive condition of man, on difficult passages of Scripture, on baptism and the covenant of Sinai, and a dissertation on Hebrew roots. On all these topics, and on other theological speculations, and it is to be regretted that a mind so capable and a life so industrious was spent so largely on trifles, or things of a fanciful nature. His controversial pamphlets are prized because they exhibit his religious modifications.

Pirke Abot is a ceremony among the Buddhists of Ceylon, which consists in reading certain portions of the Sana, for the purpose of appeasing the demons called Yakus, from whom all the afflictions of men are supposed to proceed. This ceremony, which is the only one that professors of Buddhism are supposed to be able to perform, is thus described by Mr. Spence Hardy in his Eastern Monachism:

"About sunset numbers of persons arrived from different quarters, the greater proportion of whom were women, bringing with them coconut-shells and so forth, to be presented as offerings. As darkness came on, the shells were placed in niches in the wall of the court by which the wicket is surrounded; and by the aid of little lights and a little cotton they were soon converted into lamps. The whole scene was beautifully illuminated; as many of the people had brought to light with oil a lamp composed of cotton and resins substances, the whole of the sacred enclosure was illuminated with a blaze of light. The bliss and merryle yam ceremonies of the various groups that were seen in every direction gave evidence that, however solemn the occasion, the people were glad for the celebration of the popularities of this and similar gatherings is that they are the only occasion, marriage festivals excepted, upon which the young people can see and hear what is beyond the television. His soul is thrown off the reserve and restrained it is their custom to observe in the ordinary routine of society intercourse. The service continued eleven days, and on the evening of the furlong ceremony being held on the evening of the second day. The ceremony is conducted in the same manner that in the Sana it is read on other occasions. The officiant is seated on the floor of the small room, enclosed in a basket, and placed upon the platform erected for the purpose; and the presence of this relict is supposed to give the same efficacy to the proceedings as if the great sages were personally there. For the priests who are to officiate another platform is prepared and at the conclusion of the preparatory service a sacred thread, called the pirik, is fastened round the interior of the building, the end of which, after being fastened to the reading-platform, is placed near the relict. At such times as the whole of the people who are present are seated, in chanting the chorus the cord is untied, and each priest takes hold of it, thus making the communication complete between the officiating priest and the deities, and the interior walls of the building. From the commencement, on the morning of the second day, until its conclusion on the evening of the same day, the reading-platform is never to be vacated day or night. For this reason a priestess guards the Saama, and only the sages of the Sana are permitted to officiate. The people, on the other hand, are permitted to be relieved by others, one continues sitting and reading while another goes his seat to his successor, and the second priest does not affect his exchange until the new one has commenced reading. In the same way, from the morning of the second day till the morning of the seventh day, the reading is commenced day and night, without intermission. Not fewer than twelve, and in general twenty-four, priests are in attendance, two of whom are constantly officiating. As they are relieved every two hours, each priest has to officiate two hours out of the twenty-four. In this case, in addition to this, all the sacrificial objects engaged in the ceremony are collected three times in each day: viz., at the beginning, at the middle, and at the end. When they chant in chorus the three principal discourses of the Sana, called respectively Mangala, Kalana, and Karanaya, with a short series of verses from other sources. After this the reading is continued till the series of discourses have been completed, when they are again begun, but no other than those who have officiated in the last series being read until the sixth day, when a new sermon is commenced. On the morning of the seventh day the grand procession of armed and assed men, and a person appointed to act as the deaw-stay, or messenger of the god. This company, consisting of a few of the priests, proceeds to the place where the gods are supposed to reside, inviting them to join them on the occasion of the conclusion of the service, that they may partake of it, and then proceed to the temple. His associate returns the officiating priests remain seated, but the assistants rise. At the temple I attended the messenger was introduced with great ceremony. The scribe was burned before him to make his appearance the more supernatural. One of the priests has proclaimed that the various orders of gods and demons were invited to be present, the messenger replied that he had been deputed by each such and such, repeating their names, to say that they would attend. The threefold protective formula, which forms part of the recitation, was spoken by all present in great chorus. In the midst of much that is superstitious in doctrine or ritual, there is some advice repeated of excellent tendency; but the whole ceremony is conducted in a language that the people do not understand, no beneficial result can be produced by its performance."

Such is the ceremony attending the reading of the ritual of priestly exorcism. This ritual is called Pirwikamu pota. It is written in the Pali language, and consists of extracts from the sacred books, the recital of which, accompanied with certain attendant ceremonies, is intended to ward off evil and to bring prosperity.

Pirke Abot, i.e. capitula patrum (פִּרְקֵה אֲבֹת), or sayings of the fathers, is the name of a tract of the Mishna (ע. c.), and consists of five chapters of chronologically regulated gnomes from the teachers of Israel who flourished within 450 years to receive reward, and ages highly esteemed for their moral character, but in modern times, when a greater interest in Jewish history awoke, they also experienced greater attention on account of their historical value. The Pirke Abot was especially used in solving some historical problems, and several after him found in the tract for chronological suggestions. A very ingenious speculation about the first chapter of the Pirke Abot is brought forward by rabbi Bloch. He asserts that its sentences and rules of life were pronounced on the occasion of the solemn dispensing of the Semicha, the ordination and authorization to the office of rabbi and judge, to the disciples as rules of life in office. With such sentence the teacher discharged his disciple, who was prepared to enter an independent calling. The first chapter was not to be read by the congregation, the text only. The first chapter gives the circumstances under which the ceremony is supposed to have been done, and are the reasons for the rules of life, and the law was delivered from generation to generation. When the men of the great synagogue said, "Be deliberate in judgment, train up many disciples, and make a fence for the law," they could not have intended for every man and for every opportunity, but just for such disciples to whom they dispensed Semicha. When Judah ibn-Tauba taught (ver. 8), "Consider not thyself like a chief-Judge, and when parties are before thee in judgment, consider both as guilty; but when they are departed from thee, consider them both as innocent, if they acquiesced in the sentence," he expressed the sages to be cautious of their words (ver. 11), etc., it appears clearly that they merely addressed persons who have charge of judgments and of the chair. Verse 18, which is taught in the name of Hillel, explains this. In this respect genitizes Saamish rigor, and only the suppositions that these excerpts are direct interpretations, he somewhat explain their rigidity. Especially verse 3 gains clearness, which reports the sentence of Antigones of Socho: "Be not like servants who serve their master for the sake of receiving reward, but be like servants who serve without the condition of receiving reward, let the fear of heaven be upon you." According to the common conception, the last sentence could not be brought into close connection with the foregoing. Clearly Antigones intended to say something else than what his exponents impute to him. By סְאָם he designates a deed of correctness understood earthly reward, and addressed his disciples to exercise their office independently and not with a view to reward, but for the office's sake, and "The fear of heaven be upon you" completes the advice. The chapters following contain rules of life for "every man" (פִּרְקֵה אֲבֹת). When the extemporaic discourses were suspended in the synagogue by the reading of the Hagidah (ע. c.), etc., it became the custom to read in the ceremony a chapter of the Abot (Zana, Gottestdienstl. Vorträge der Juden, p. 424), and this still continues the practice in many countries (Bodenschatz, Kirchl. Ver- saufung der Juden, ii, 151 sq.). The Spanish Jews read the Abod only on the six Sabbaths between Passover and Pentecost. The Prayer-books have the Abod always as an appendix. A separate critical edition, with German translation, was prepared by rabbi Caro, under the title Minchah Schabath (Krotochin, 1847). See T. R. 1 (1846). W. Pirkheimer, WILHAB, a celebrated German humanist, was born at Eichstätt, Dec. 5, 1470, of an old patrician Nuremberg family. He enjoyed a most refined education; he was at the age of eighteen introduced to the court of the bishop of Eichstätt, where he soon became proficient in every kind of knighthood pursuit, and carefully cultivated his fine native talent for music. Though interrupted by several military expeditions, his literary studies, in which he was guided by Georges von Tegern and the canon Adelmann, were not neglected. In 1490 he went to the University of Padua, where he studied jurisprudence, and got familiar with the Greek language, in which he was taught by Museurus. Three years afterwards he completed his study of jurisprudence at Pavia, under Maino, Lancioli, and Philip Decius. At his return to Nuremberg, 1497, he married Crescencia Ritter, whose influential family soon opened to him the doors of the senate. This assembly soon acknowledged his merit, and, in spite of his youth, intrusted him with several important negotiations. In 1499 he was made the commander of the contingent sent by the city to the emperor Maximilian I against the Swiss cantons, when his brilliant conduct during this campaign, of which he afterwards published an account, won him the favor of the sovereign, who made him his counsellor. Disgusted by the envious attacks of which the imperial favor was fruitful, he resigned in 1501 his functions as senator, but resumed them three years afterwards, when he was again intrusted with the most delicate negotiations, his amiable disposition and persuasive eloquence fitting him especially for this kind of business. In 1512 he was sent as deputy to the diets of Trévès and Cologne. In 1522 Pirkheimer retired into private life, devoting himself to study, and encouraging with all his power throughout Germany the cultivation of literature and science. His library, rich in rare manuscripts, was at the disposal of the public; his opulent mansion became the favorite resort of a chosen phalanx of literati, artists, and other persons of merit. He helped many a poor savant with his purse and his influence. He entertained friendly relations with Erasmus, Conrad Celtes, Reuchlin, Tritheme, Adam von Bredenau, and de la Maupassante. Unfortunately the greater part of his correspondence is lost; but what remains of it proves the truth of the words of Cochlæus in a letter to Pirkheimer, "Eo enim hactenus in erudito fuisti animo, ut communio studiosorum judicio hujusmetuis fuerit et literarum decus et eruditionis variis atque adeo omnium princeps." After greatly improving the condition of the schools of Nuremberg, he made that city one of the most active centres of intellectual culture. Huten likens his influence to that of Erasmus and Reuchlin. His predilection for the classical, especially for the Greek writers, some of which he translated into Latin and German, did not lessen his interest for the history of his own country. Some parts of it he treated with a judicious criticism remarkable for that time. He also endeavored to encourage the study of mathematics and of astronomy; and finally took a most lively interest in all attempts made to reform the Church and its discipline, writing against the degenerated scholastics, and taking the part of Reuchlin against his persecutors in an eloquent pamphlet. He at first enlisted among the partisans of Luther, but soon changed his mind. As an advocate of Erasmus, careful lest the success of the reformation might prove obnoxious to his favorite pursuits. He died at Nuremberg Dec. 22, 1580. His works are Eccles. decret. (1520, 4to), under the pseudonym of T. Fr. Cottalambergus.—Apostolia seu legis podagra (Nuremberg, 1522, 4to); Strassburg, 1526, 1537; Amburg, 1604, 1611, 4to) this humorous pamphlet was translated into German (Nuremburg, 1881, 8vo):—De vera Christi carme, ed Ecologiae respondio (ibid. 1536, 8vo); followed by a second answer, and a pamphlet with the title De comitia monachi illius qui Ecologiae manuoptar (1537, 8vo):—Germania ex variis Scriptoris perennis explostitio (ibid. 1580, 1832, 8vo):—Princorun munorum estimatio (Tübingen, 1588; Nuremburg, 1841, 4to):—Translations of several Opuscula of Plautus, Lucian, St. Nits, St. Gregory Nazianzen, etc. The complete works of Pirkheimer have been collected by Goldast, in four volumes, published in 1587; and were reprinted for the first time by his Hühum Superus seu Helvetiuni anno 1490, translated into German by Munch, which added thereto a life of the author (Nuremberg, 1826). Pirkheimer gave the first edition of Fulgentius (ibid. 1612, 8vo); he also wrote the text to the splendid woodcuts of Albert Dürer's Triumphal Chariot of the Emperor or Maximilian. Some of his letters are to be found in Strobecl's Beiträge und Miscellen, in Waldaus Beiträge, and other collections.

His sister, Charles Pirkheimer, born 1464, after enjoying a most liberal education, entered very young the monastery of Santa Clara at Nuremberg, of which she became abbess in 1504. She read Greek, and wrote in Latin with elegance. Some of her letters in that language to Erasmus and others have been preserved. She died in 1532.—Roeter, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xi, 304.

Pirikning, EHRENKRICH, a German canonist, was born at Niggen, near Frankfort, in 1606. After studying theologies and jurisprudence at Ingolstadt, he entered the Jesuitic order in 1629, and was a professor of morals, canon law, and exegesis in several colleges of his order. Pirking died after 1676. We have of him, Apologia Casuari princeps Catholicorum et ordinum (Cöln, 1652, 8vo):—De juxtrajudicet praetorius et rectorum episcopi inferius (Dillingen, 1668, 8vo):—De juxtrajudicet rectorum delegatii (ibid. 1664, 8vo):—De constitutionibus et commissu- dationibus (ibid. 1664, 8vo):—De remissione lirum (ibid. 1657, 8vo):—Commentaria in Decretales (ibid. 1674, 8 vol. fol.):—In causas canonice expeditas (ibid. 1674-1678, 5 vol. fol.; Venice, 1759).

Pirminius, Sr., a Frankish ecclesiast and bishop of Melzi (Metz, or Metlo in St. Gallen, or Medebach, near Zweibrücken, or Meaux-on-the-Marne), carried the Gospel to the shores of the lake of Constance; and, protected in his labors by Charles Martel, he founded the monastery of Reichenaus. Three years afterwards, however, he was expelled in consequence of a national rising of the Alemanni against the Frankish rule, and he retired to the Rhine and formed the council of monasteries (as Murbach, Schwarzenbach, Neuweiler, Schuttert, Gengebach, etc.), among them Hornbach, in the diocese of Metz, where he died, Nov. 8, 738, after having met shortly before with St. Boniface. A great many legends surround the life of this servant of Christ, which, however, have no historical basis. Pirminius is said to be the author of Liber labelis abbatis Pirminii, de singulis libris canonici sacrae (the latter in medie- val Latin meaning "excerpt"), printed in Maibolin, Vetera Analecta (Paris, 1728, fol.), p. 65-83. Pirna, JOHN. See PIRNAINANS.

Pirnainsans, a medieval sect, taking its name from John Pirm or Pirnains, an anti-sacerdotal schis- matics of the 14th century (A.D. 1341). Its tenets are those common to the medieval sects, and illustrated especially in the Beghards and the Brethren of the Free Spirit. It is thought probable that they were in some way connected with the Strigolati of Russia, although the latter belong to a much more recent time. The Pirmensi ans regarded the pope as Antichrist, and were especially distinguished by great hatred of the clergy. They dis appeared on the Continent by merging with the Hussii ans; but the Francisci, the Brethren of the Free Spirit in Po PIROMALLI, Paolo, an Italian missionary, was born in 1561 or 1562 at Siderno (Utterior Calabria). Having embraced the rule of St. Dominic, he devoted himself to preaching, and was in 1589 called to Rome to teach phil osophy in the monastery of La Minerva. Appointed in 1611 director of the missions of Major Armenia, he succeeded in gaining for the Catholic faith a number of schematics and Eutychians, among the latter the patri archs Cyriac and Moses III. In 1637 he travelled through Georgia and was twice sent to pacify in Ponto Armenia the necessities caused by the disputes of the Arme nians. In 1649 he went to Persia, remaining there ten years, and then preached the Gospel in several parts of India. In 1654 he passed over to Africa, with a view of converting indels, but was captured by Algerian pir ates. He was afterwards released, and on his return to Spain, became a most successful professor of theology, a member of the chapter of the Notre Dame de Paris, and at last chancellor. It was his regular busi ness to examine the works and theses of theology. He published a number of books and pamphlets on the sub jects of his doctrine. Ferolin gave him his Explication de Maximes des Saints to examine. He approved of it mostly, after some small changes, going even so far, it is said, as to call it a golden book; then, under the in fluence of his previous work, he took back the book, but wrote against the Explication a censure which was signed by sixty other doctors. He died at Paris Aug.

4, 1713. With the exception of a Latin speech pro nounced in 1693, nothing of his exists in print; but some manuscript pamphlets are mentioned by contempo raries.

A Jesuit of this name, Firot (Georges), who was born in 1599 in the bishopric of Rennes, is the author of an Apologie des Casuistes contre les Colomnies des Jansen istes (1657), a work condemned by Alexander VII and several bishops. He died Oct. 6, 1659.—Hoefl, Nouv. Biog. Générale, x. 320.

Pisa, a city of Northern Italy, the recent capital of Tuscany, with a population of about 22,000, is noted in ecclesiastical history as the seat of several important Church councils.

1. The first council here (Convocatio Fiscemen) was carried on by Innocent II in 1134, who presided at the head of a large assembly of the bishops of France, Germany, and Italy. St. Bernard assisted at their de liberations. By this body the excommunication of the anti pope Anacletus was renewed, together with his other charges. See p. 989.

2. The death of Piazzo, a cardinal in the Church of the Holy Spirit, in 1650, caused a schism as then existed. It was proposed to judge between the two competitors for the papacy, and elect one of them to the throne, or set both aside and choose a third party. The council was called under the protection of King Charles VI of France, and was attended by the cardinals of both rivals to the papal chair.—Ben dict XIII (v. q.v.) and Gregory XII (v. q.v.). Benedict, by the advice of several bishops, sent seven legates to the council; but Gregory, on the other hand, refused to appear either in person or by deputy, although sum moned in due form. The assembly was finally held in August and numerous and ever seen in the Church: there were present 22 cardinals; the Latin patriarchs of Al exandria (Simon), Antioch (Wenceslaus), Jerusalem (Hugo), and Cædul (Francis Landi); 12 archbishops were present in person, and 14 by their deputies; 80 bishops, and the procors of 102 absent; 87 abbots, and the pro ctors of 200 others; besides priors; generals of orders; the grand-master of Rhodes, with 16 commanders; the _prior-general of the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre; the deputy of the grand-masters and Knights of the Teutonic Order; the archbishops of Bayonne, Narbones, Cambridge, Paris, Florence, Cracow, Vienna, Prague, and many others; more than 800 doctors in theology; and ambassadors from the kings of England, France, Portugal, Bohemia, Sicily, Poland, and Cyprus; from the dukes of Burgundy, Hamburgh, etc.

The following was the action of each session of this council:

Session 1. The order of precedence to be observed by the members of the council was laid down.

Session 2. After the usual prayer and sermon, the arch bishop of Pisa read the decree of Gregory X upon the prosecution of the Holy Spirit, to which the Greeks had advised in the Council of Lyons. A.D. 1274, and the Deut orius of Toledo relating to the proper order of ecclesiastical councils. After this the necessary officers were appoint ed, the letter of conversation read, and the two rival popes summoned at the gates of the church: no one, however, appearing for them.

Session 3. A fresh citation was made, and no one having appeared, the two popes, Pedro of Luna and Angelo Cor raro, were declared contumacious by a sentence which was affixed to the church door.

Session 4. Bishop Ullro, the ambassador of Robert, king of the Romans, and the assembled nobles, endeavored to frustrate the object of the council.

Session 5. The two opposing parties were again de clared contumacious, and the promoter of the council produced against them thirty-seven articles, containing the whole history of the schism and the wrong-doing of their cause. Although the facts contained in this accusation were sufficiently notorious, commissioners were appointed to prove their truth.

Session 6. The bishop of Sallustia showed that it was necessary for the council to believe that there was not merely a partial, withdrawal from the obedience of the popes, and declared that he had authority from the king of England to follow out the scheme for unity, and to consent to whatever the council should determine.

Session 7. The difficulties started by the ambassador of the king of the Romans were answered.

Session 8. The bishop of Sallustia and Evreux showed that the union of the two colleges of cardinals could not be effected while those of the party of Benedict con tinued to obey him, and that the withdrawal from obedience must be universal. Whereupon the council of the union of the two colleges to be lawful, and the council itself duly convicted: and a decree was passed to the ef fect that each ought to withdraw from obedience to Gregory and Benedict. Since both of them had by this decree been deprived of the right of sitting in the college of which they had promised upon oath to make.

Session 9. He was employed in the reading of the decree of the preceding session.

Session 10. The two contending parties were again cited at the door of the church, in order that they might hear the testimony of witnesses. Then the minutes, containing their deposition, were read; and it was noted down by how many witnesses each article was proved.

Session 11. The reading of the depositions was continued.

Session 12. A decree was published declaring the pain of excommunication, and all contained in the preceding de positions to be true, public, and notorious.

Session 13. One of the decrees from the University of Paris showed that Pedro of Luna was a heretic and schis matic, and that he had forfeited the papacy: and this he declared to be the opinion of the French universities.

The cardinals were also disagreed upon the doctrine in the council, to the number of three hundred, agreed in this view.

Sess. 14. A declaration was made that the council represented the Roman Catholic Church, that the cognizance of all matters of such importance devolved on the highest authority on earth; also an act of general withdrawal from the obedience of the two contending parties was drawn.

Sess. 15. The definitive sentence was pronounced in the presence of the whole council and of the people who were deputed to enter. The sentence was to the effect that the holy oecumenical synod, representing the Catholict Church, had been assembled in the capacity of and to decide the question, after having examined everything which had been done concerning the union of the Church of St. Peter of Rome, of St. Louis of St. Benedict, and Angelo Corrado, called Gregory XII, to be both of them schismatists, abettors of schism, heretics, and guilty of perjury; that they had given offence to the whole Church by their obstinacy, that they had forfeited every dignity, act of absolution, any form of canon law, and declared the last promotion of cardinals made by them to be null and void.

Sess. 16. A motion was made, on which the cardinals present all promised that, in the event of any one of them being elected pope, he would resign the papal chair, and would conciliate the present council, until the Church should be reformed in its head and in its members; and if one of them should abstain from it, or be accused of belonging to no college of cardinals, were elected, that they would compel him to make the same promise before publishing his election. Afterwards the council ratified the sentence against Angelo and Pedro.

Sess. 17. Certain preliminaries concerning the election were settled.

Sess. 18. A solemn procession was made to implore of the Lord to bestow of his beneficence on the new election to their election.

Sess. 19. The cardinals, to the number of twenty-four, entered into conclave under the guard of the grand-master of Rhoade, and at the end of ten days' confinement, they unanimously elected Peter of Candia, cardinal of Milan, of the order of Franciscan Priests, a man seventy years of age, who took the name of Alexander V.

Sess. 20. As soon as he was elected, John Gerson, chancellor of the University of Paris, delivered a discourse, exhorting him to the faithful discharge of his duty, etc.

Sess. 21. The new pope presided and delivered a discourse. The decree of his election was from read, and on the following Sunday he was crowned.

Sess. 22. A decree was read on the part of the pope, approving and ratifying all the dispensations of marriage, and those relating to the penitentiary, which had been granted by Benedict or Gregory.

Sess. 23. A decree was published on the part of the pope and council, confirming all collations, provostships, townships, and the donation of land, made canonically by two rival popes.

Sess. 24. A decree was read, ordering metropolitans to convolve provincial councils, and the generals of orders to hold convents of canons, according to the pope's appointment. Finally, Alexander ratified all that the cardinals had done in conformity with the above, and what had passed at Pisa. With regard to Church reform, as many of the prelates had left the council, the pope declared that the council must be deputed to the following council, which he appointed to be held in 1415; then he dismissed the assembly, giving plenary indulgence to all who had assisted at it, and to all who had adhered to it.

Alexander V, and the history of his successor, John XXIII (a.v.). In this place we may simply add that the schism, instead of being closed, continued, with three popes in the room of two. The effort also to recall the rank of the pope to a constitutional instead of an absolute monarch, by giving to the councils of the Church the supreme tribunal, to which the pope himself is subordinate and amenable, failed. See Infal- libilist., supra.

III. Another council was convened at Pisa in 1511, at the instigation of the emperor Maximilian and Louis XII of France, who having just cause of complaint against pope Julius II (q. v.), persuaded the cardinals of St. Croix, Narbone, and Coscia to convene a council, whose object was set forth to be the reform of the Church in its head and in its members, and to punish various notorious crimes which for a long time had scandalized the whole Church. It was further stated that there was urgent need of such councils, that Julius had not been able to redress the wrongs he had done in his power to hinder it; and, finally, the pope was in respectful terms cited to appear at the council.

Besides this, in answer to the complaint made against him by Julius, they published an apology for their conduct, which provided the convocation of the Council of Pisa: first, by a special edict, the second, or ninth session of the council; secondly, by the pope's own vow, according to which he had promised to hold a council; thirdly, by the oath of the cardinals, and by the necessity of avoiding so great a scandal. They further showed that this was the power of convoking such councils in the pope, to be understood as speaking of the ordinary state of things, but that cause may arise in which councils may be called and assembled by others than the sovereign pontiff. The pope, in order to carry the blow, voted a rival council to Rome, and cited the three above-mentioned cardinals to appear there within a certain time, under pain of deprivation. The Council of Pisa, however, proceeded, and was opened Nov. 1, 1511. Four cardinals attended, and the proctors of three who were absent, also four French bishops, the French legates, and the pope's nuncios, together with a few abbots and doctors; deputies from the universities of France, and the ambassadors of Louis XII. The following is an account of each ses-sion's transactions:

Sess. 1. Cardinal St. Croix presided. The convocation of the Council of Pisa, having for its object the reform of the Church, was pronounced to be just and lawful, and all that had been or might be done to its prejudice declared null and void.

Sess. 2. All that related to the order of the assembly was settled: the canon of Toledo read, and officers appointed. The pope was made to assure that the present council could not be dissolved until the reform of the Church had been effected: the subject of the powers of the Council of Constance, relating to the authority of oecumenical councils, was reviewed.

Sess. 3. At this time, the pope heard the opening litany, and entered into a league with Ferdinand and the Venetians, began to attack the state of Florence, and the fathers judged it expedient to transfer the council to Milan, which accordingly was done; and on Jan. 4, 1514, the fourth session was held.

Sess. 4. The assembly was more numerous, the cardinals of St. Severin and St. Angelo joined themselves to the other one, and the general or general-Conclave, which had been made by the antipope's appointment. Finally, Alexander ratified all that the cardinals had done in accordance with the above, and what had passed at Pisa. With regard to Church reform, as many of the prelates had left the council, the pope declared that the council must be deputed to the following council, which he appointed to be held in 1415; then he dismissed the assembly, giving plenary indulgence to all who had assisted at it, and to all who had adhered to it.

Commentar, vol. v. For the antecedents of the imbécile conduct of papal affairs under the newly chosen candidate we refer the reader to the art. Alexander V, and the history of his successor, John XXIII (a.v.). In this place we may simply add that the schism, instead of being closed, continued, with three popes in the room of two. The effort also to recall the rank of the pope to a constitutional instead of an absolute monarch, by giving to the councils of the Church the supreme tribunal, to which the pope himself is subordinate and amenable, failed. See Infallibilist., supra.

Sess. 5. A deputy from the University of Paris delivered a discourse, after which the pope Julius was again cited in the usual form; and upon his non-appearance a demand was made that he should be declared contumacious. Several decrees were also published, among other subjects upon the exemplary life which ecclesiastics ought to lead; the form of orders; the election of a pope; with regard to sessions and congregations. The convocation of a council to Rome, made by Julius, was declared null and void.

Sess. 6. The promoters of the council required that Julius should be declared, through his comity, to have incurred, solo facto, suspension from all administrative acts of the pontifical office. Consequently he was called upon three times from the foot of the tribunal; but the settlement of the question was then deferred till the next session.

Sess. 7. The church was sung by the bishop of Magnelonne (now Montpellier), a decree was made suspending Julins, and the council was reciting all the acts of Pope Boniface IV in order to obtain his protection, excommunicating all cardinals of bishops, princes, and people no longer to recognize Julins as pope, but having been declared heretic, schismatist, author of schism, incurribile and hardened, and having as such incurred the penalties denounced in the decrees of Constance, etc.

Sess. 8. This was the last session of the council, for the French being obliged to abandon the Milanese, the blash-

Pisa, Bartholoméo de', an Italian theologian, was born at Pisa near the beginning of the 14th century. He belonged to the Dominican Order, and was often confounded with a Franciscan monk of the same name, who rendered himself famous by his book on the resemblance of Jesus to St. Francis. He died about 1347. He wrote several works of piety and theology; but two only have been printed: Summa de censure, and Opera morales (1423). Of his other works, one is an aurum apocrisæ opus morale (Treviso, 1601, 8vo). See Échard, De Script. Ord. Prædicator.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xi, 330.

Pisa, Samuel Cohen de', a native of Lisbon, was one of the most profound Talmudists of the 17th century. He wrote REDIKE, the "Reveler of Secrets" (Venice, 1661), a commentary on the most difficult passages of Ecclesiastes and Job, in fourteen chapters, which have been made into passages, containing very important questions. Thus, for instance, in the first chapter he treats on the question "whether, in the third chapter of Ecclesiastes, the immortality of the soul is denied," and in the ninth chapter, "whether Job did deny the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the dead." See Fritsch, Bibl. Jud. 1490. Of his several works still extant, the bronze gates of the Baptistry of St. John at Florence are the most important. These two gates are still perfect; the exact date of their execution is disputed—whether they were finished in 1380, or only commenced in that year. The reliefs are from the life of John the Baptist, and the general design of the gate is said to have been made by Giotto; but Giotto's share, if any, must have been more that of the architect than the sculptor, though even defining the panels and indicating the subjects; he can scarcely have had more to do with the work than this, or his share must have been more intimately associated with them. The work appears to have been modelled by Andrea and his son Nino, and the castings commenced by some Venetian artists in 1380, and the complete gates to have been finished in 1402. It is also certain that some of the most magnificent decorations of the architrave, which were added many years afterwards by Vittorio, the son of Lorenzo Ghiberti, in order to make them harmonize with the other two sets of gates executed by his father. The gates of Andrea were originally in the centre of the Baptistry, opposite to the cathedral, but were afterwards removed to the side, to give place to the more beautiful work of Ghiberti, in the year 1424. All three sets of gates have been well engraved in outline by Lasino, Le tre Porte del Battistero di Firenze (Florence, 1828). Andrea was made citizen of Florence, and died there in 1414; he was buried in the cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore. See Vasari, Vie de Pritchets, etc. (ed. Flor. 1846 sq.); Cicognara, Storia della Scultura; Rumohr, Italianische For schungen; Rosini, Storia della Pittura Italiana, s. v.

Pisano, Giovanni, the son and assistant of Niccolò, was born at Pisa about 1240. He seems to have inherited the genius and talents of his father's genius, but had an entirely different taste. Gothic architecture was his choice, and he was fond of exaggeration and fantastic action and expression in sculpture. As early as the making of the Siena pulpit he was a master in his own right, and went in 1268 to Naples to fulfil a commission from the Franciscans there; he also designed the Episcopalian Palace. After the death of Niccolò the Pisans were anxious to have Giovanni remain in his native city, where he executed important works. The church of S. Maria della Spina was the first example in Italy of the pointed architecture, and is a most pleasing one. In 1278 he was chosen to build the Pisano Campo Santo; it was the first and finest of all the monuments of the city. It is too well known to be described in our limited space, but it seems that nothing could have been more fitting for its purpose than the plan which he adopted. Many of the sculptures here were also by his hand. The representation of Pisano was the first attempt at making large statues in 1427 by some of the artist's friends. It is strange, and in many respects an ugly work; yet it has great intensity of expression in its principal figure, and displays the originality of Giovanni. He gained much reputation from this, and in 1285 went to Siena, where he was commissioned to build the façade of the cathedral. The people of Siena were very desirous that he should fix his home there; the magistrates made him a citizen, and exempted him from taxes for life; but he remained only three years, and went next to Perugia. In the city he made a monument to Pius IV, which no longer exists. From this time he devoted himself almost wholly to sculpture. At Arezzo he made the shrine of S. Donato for the cathedral, which cost (including jewels for the Madonna, enamels, and silver base-reliefs) 80,000 florins. It was a superb work of art. His next work was done as a memorial to a sculptor who had made a pulpit for the church of S. Giovanni at Pistoia, which was much praised. A new pulpit was also to be made for the church of S. Andrea, and there were those in Pistoia who had so admired Niccolò Pisano that they desired to have Giovanni do it; he excelled his rival in every way, and fully supported the reputation he had gained. Our artist now went to Florence. This was a prosperous time there, and Giovanni remained two years. In 1305 he began the monument of pope Benedict XI, and somewhat later on for St. Margaret in S. Dominica at Perugia. In 1312 he undertook the rebuilding of the cathedral of Prato, and, though he did not live to see it completed, his designs were carried out with precision. He died in 1320. He had many pupils; among them Andrea Pisano (q. v.). See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Vasari, Lives of the Painters and Sculptors; Cicognara, Storia della Scultura, s. v.

Pisano, Giunta (or GIUNTA DI GIUSTINO OF PISA), is the earliest known Tuscan painter, and flourished in the first half of the 13th century. A crucifixion painted by him in the church of Santa Maria degli Angeli at Assisi, about 1215, until very recently in some of the decorations of the architrave, which were added many years afterwards by Vittorio, the son of Lorenzo Ghiberti, in order to make them harmonize with the other two sets of gates executed by his father. The gates of Andrea were originally in the centre of the Baptistry, opposite to the cathedral, but were afterwards removed to the side, to give place to the more beautiful work of Ghiberti, in the year 1424. Pisano, Niccolò, a noted Italian architect and sculptor, was born at Pisa about 1206. At the age of fifteen he was appointed architect to Frederick II, with whom he went to Naples. In the service of this sovereign he passed ten years, and then went to Padua, where he lived in the house of the family of S. Antonio. The first known attempt which he made as a sculptor resulted in his alto-relievo of the Deposition from the Cross which now fills a lunette over a door of the cathedral of S. Martino at Lucca. This is most excellent as the work of an untutored artist, as he was at that time, and it is akin by comparison with works of his contemporaries which are near it. The statuettes of the Misericordia Vecchia at Florence are of about the same merit as this base-relief. In 1248 Niccola went to Florence to assist the Gibellines in their work of destruction; he was commissioned to overturn the tower called Guadalupe in such a way as to destroy the Baptistery; he overturned the tower, but it did not fall in the anticipated direction, and we may believe that this was in accordance with his intention, although it was attributed to a special miracle by Villani. During the twelve succeeding years he was employed in making designs for the building and remodelling of many churches and palaces. The church of Santa Trinita at Florence is one of the best known of his works of this period. In 1260 Niccola established his fame as a sculptor by the magnificent pulpit which he executed for the Baptistery at Pisa. Of course marks of his comparative inexperience can be found in this work, but taken all in all it almost challenges criticism. His next work was the Arcu di S. Domenico at Bologna, which is now surrounded with a maze of beautiful sculptures, of which the Arch is the centre, and is of great interest as illustrating the art of the 13th century. In 1266 Pisanu went to Siena to make the pulpit for the Duomo. This is similar to that of Pisa in many ways, but not so effective, because surrounded by other objects of interest, and in a larger space; but the pulpit seemed almost the only thing to attract the attention. In 1269 he was commissioned to build the abbey and convent of La Scuola, which are now in ruins. In 1274 he commenced the fountain of Perugia, which was his last work. The authorities of the city made severe laws for its preservation, and it was considered the most precious possession of the city. In 1278 Pisanu died, after a life of great usefulness, for his influence had been felt throughout all Italy. His services could never be estimated. He had founded a new school of sculpture; he put behind him sculptures which he had bestowed for the perpetuity of his name in architecture too, the same may be said, and in the words of Mr. Perkins, "He was truly a great man, one to whom the world owes an eternal debt of gratitude, and who looms up in gigantic proportions through the mist of five centuries, holding the same relation to Italian art which Dante holds to Italian literature." In his life he was respected and beloved by all who came in contact with him, be it in patron, friend, or servant.

PIsANT, LOUIS, a French savant, was born in 1646 at Sassetot, near Fécamp. Admitted in 1667 into the Congregation of the Benedictines of Saint-Maur, he was ministered with the rank of superior of several congregations and retired to that of Saint-Ouen. He died May 5, 1726, at Rouen. He wrote, Sentimens d'une Anne pension (1711, 12mo), and Traité historique et dogmatique des Préséges et Exemptions ecclésiastiques (Lumbré, 1715, 4to), a work which found favor and served as the approbation of his congregation.—Hoef. Nouv. Biog. Générale, xl, 380.

PISCATOR, JOHANNES, a German theologian of the Reformation age, is noted for his learning and piety. He was born at Strasburg March 27, 1546. He was from his youth a lover of study, and was soon distinguished in his learning. While engaged in the study of logic, he anxiously sought to reconcile and unite Aristotle and his commentator Peter Ramus (q.v.); and when, after the completion of his university studies at Strasburg and Tübingen, he became professor at the university of his native town, he made this the special subject of some of his lectures, though the department of divinity was his field. Suspected of Zwinglianism, he found his position uncomfortable, and accepted a professorship at Heidelberg in 1574. But here also the severely Lutheran tendency gave him disquiet, and after a short stay at Neustadt in 1578 he went to Nuremberg, where, however, he was not suffered to remain quietly, and in 1584 he finally removed to Herborn as conrector of the Academy, where he taught with so much success that many students flocked thither from Germany, France, Poland, and other northern countries. He was very diligent, and scarcely allowed himself sufficient time for sleep. He wrote extensively, translating the whole Bible with great faithfulness into the German, and making a logical and theological analysis of the greater part (Herborn, 1602-3, 3 vol.; 2d ed. 1604-6; 3d ed. 1624; abridged ed. in Berne, 1681; Dinkelsbühl, 1684). He also published several valuable commentaries on the Old and New Testaments (1618-58), and many dogmatic and polemic writings, of which some on the Lord's Supper, Predestination, Heidelberg Catechism, Justification, and God's will to Humiliation, De mystica Erhebung in Christo, deserve mention. Most peculiar were the views of Piscator on the active obedience of Christ, which he held not to be imputed, but that which Christ for himself owed to God. See SATISFACTION. Piscator died in 1625. See Steubing, in Zeitschrift f. histor. Theol. 1841, iv, 198 sq.; Schröck, Kirchengesch. s. d. Bez. v. 858 sq.; Gass, Prot. Dogmatik, i, 163, 383, 422; Tholuck. PISCHON, FRIEDRICH AUGUSTUS, a minister of the German Evangelical Church, and pastor in Berlin, died Dec. 8, 1864. He published, Die heutige Bedeutung der Uebersetzung der Heil. Schrift durch Martin Luther (Berlin, 1854)._—Von der Hälfte, welche die Frauen der Aufklärung des göttlichen Wortes leiten können (ibid. 1856)._—Predigten (ibid. 1857)._—Vorträge über die deutsche und schweizerische Reformierung (ibid. 1846)._—Die Augsburgische Confession u. der Berliner Kirchenrat (ibid. 1858)._—Die Taufnamen. Eine Weihnachtsgabe (ibid. 1857, etc.). He also edited the Monatschrift für die württembergische Kirche, in connection with Eltzer, Jonas, and Seydow. Piscina (Lat. = a reservoir of water), originally the reservoir of a church connected with the aqueducts of Rome, but applied in ecclesiastical architecture to a drain formed by a niche or small alcove placed beside or in front of the altar. The word is derived from piscina, a fish pond, and was applied to the water in which the priest washed his hands, as well as to that in which the chalice was rinsed at the time of the celebration of the mass. It is usually annexed to the consecrare or seat of the priests in the ancient churches, and is the most part similarly decorated, and sometimes appearing as an additional compartment. It is sometimes also found alone in the southern walls of chancels and aisles, sometimes in the eastern walls on the right, and there are one or two instances in which it occurs on the left. When two chalices occur in it, one was reserved for the water in which the priest had washed his hands, the other that in which he had rinsed the chalice. Du Cange limits the piscina, as it is restricted above, to the lavacrum. By Bingham it is received in a more extensive sense (1707, 1, 22r), and by large it is applied to the piscina, for which latter name Opitatus affords Piscina. Piacculi, and Vesica Piscis. The fish is a hieroglyph of Jesus Christ, very common in the remains of Christian art, both primitive and medi eval. The origin of it is as follows: From the name and title of our blessed Lord, Ιησοῦς Χριστός, Θεός Υἱός, Σωτήρ—Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour—the early Christians, taking the first letter of each word, formed the name İΧΘΥΣ, pike, a fish. See Ichthus. Hence Christians came to be called Pisciculi, little fishes, with reference to their regeneration in the waters of baptism. The Vesica Piscis, which is the figure of an oval, generally pointed at either end, and which is much used as the form of the seals of religious houses, and to en close figures of Jesus Christ or of the saints, also has its rise from this name of Christ, though some say that the vesical Vesica Piscis has no reference except in its name to a fish, but represents the almond, the symbol of virginity and self-production. Clement of Alexandria, in writing of the ornaments which a Christian may consistently wear, mentions the fish as a proper device for a ring, and says that it may serve to remind the Christian of the origin of his spiritual life. See Riddle, Christian Antiquities, p. 185; Siegel, Christl. Alterthümner (see Index in vol. iv). See Ichthus.

Pise, Charles Constantine, D.D., an American Roman Catholic divine of note, was born at Annapolis, Md., in 1802. He was the son of an Italian gentleman of ancient and noble family. His mother was an American lady, a native of Philadelphia. At an early age Charles was placed in the Georgetown College, that famous institution being then as now under the control of the Order of the Society of Jesus. Graduating there most creditably, he went to Rome to pursue his theological studies, but returned after two years, and completed his preparation for the ministry under the tutelage of the Rev. Dr. Bunti, the preceptor of the late archbishop Hughes. On his return to this country Pise taught rhetoric and poetry in the Seminary of Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, Md. He was ordained priest in 1825, and commenced his labors in Frederick, Md., but subsequently removed to Baltimore, where he officiated at the cathedral. The labors of his position, together with the performance of a large amount of religious literary work which he attempted, impaired his health, and he again visited Rome for a respite. While there he was honored with the title of Knight of the Roman Empire. Upon his return to America he settled in Washington, and through the influence of Henry Clay and other warm personal friends he was elected chaplain to the senate of the United States. On the invitation of Dr. Dubois, then bishop of New York, he afterwards removed to New York City, and officiated at St. Peter's, in Barclay Street, till 1849, when he went over to Brooklyn, and purchased the church in Sydney Place, with which he was connected at the time of his death, in 1866. Dr. Pise was acknowledged to be one of the most eloquent and learned divines of his Church in America, as he was one of the most industrious and faithful laborers in it. Aside from his labors with his spiritual charge, he was eminent both as a preacher and a lecturer. He devoted much time to literary pursuits. He was the author of Letters on the Truths of Catholic Doctrines; a History of the Church from its Establishment to the Reformation (1800, 5 vols. 8vo) — The Acts of the Apostles in Verse: The Lives of St. Ignatius and his Companions; and many other volumes in prose and verse. He also edited, many years ago, in company with the late father Felix Varella, D.D., an influential magazine published in New York City, and known as the Catholic Expository. In the volumes of this work will be found many of his happiest efforts both in verse and prose. Among the latter may be mentioned Horae Vagabundae, a series of deeply interesting letters descriptive of his travels in Europe. They were eagerly sought after at the time of their publication. (J. H. W.)

Pis'gah (Heb. Pigsah, פִּזְגַּה, always with the art.), the name of a mountain of Moab. It is in fact an ancient topographical name found, in the Pentateuch and Joshua only, in two connections: 1. The top, or head, of the Pisgah (קֵדְשֵׁה), from which Moses took his dying survey of Canaan (Num. xxii, 20; xxiii, 14; Deut. iii, 27; xxiv, 1); 2. Ashdoth hap-Pisgah, perhaps the springs, or roots, of the Pisgah (Deut. iii, 17; iv, 49; Josh. xii, 3; xiii, 20). See Ashdoth-pisgah. The word hap-Pisgah, פִּזְגַּה, literally in the section, from פָּסְגַּה, to divide, and hence it may mean an isolated hill or peak. The rendering of the Sept. is not uniform. In Deut. iii, 17; xxiv, 1; Josh. xii, 3; xiii, 20, it is פָּסְגַּה; but in Num. xii, 20; xxiii, 14; and Deut. iii, 27, the phrase פָּסְגַּה מִצְגָּה is rendered Koseh tou laothupinou, which is a translation of the Hebrew, top of the cut mountain. The Vulgate has everywhere Pissaha. The reference to the scene of Moses's death by Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 48) affords no additional light.

"The Pisgah" must have been in the mountain range or district, the same as or a part of that called the mountains of Abiram (comp. Deut. xxxii, 49 with xxxiv, 1). See Abiram. Its situation is minutely described by the sacred writers. It is first mentioned in connection with the approach of the Israelites to Palestine. They marched "from Bamaoth in the valley, that is in the country of Moab, to the top of Pisgah, which looketh towards Jeshimon" (Numb. xxii, 20). Pisgah was thus on the plateau of Moab, and commanded a view of the western desert. See Jeshimon. Another passage (xxxiii, 13, 14) proves that it commanded a view of the Israelitish camp in the valley on the east bank of the Jordan; and from other incidental notices we learn that it was opposite to and in sight of (נֶגֶר לְבֵן) Jericho (Deut. xxxiv, 1), and overlooking the north-eastern angle of the Dead Sea (iv, 49; Josh. xii, 3). The names Abiram, Nebo, and Pisgah are connected in such a way by the sacred writers as to create some difficulty to the geographer. In Deut. xxxii, 49 the Lord commands Moses, "Get thee up into this mountaintop Abiram, Mount Nebo," etc.; and in xxxiv, 1 we read that Moses, obeying, "went up from the plains of Moab unto the mountain of Nebo, the top of Pisgah" (מִן הָרֵי הַבָּא מֵעֵר לְרִי הַבָּא). From these passages we may infer, (1) that Abiram was the name of a range or group of mountains; (2) that Nebo was one of its peaks; and (8) that the name Pisgah was either equivalent to Abiram, or that it is (as represented in some passages in the Sept., and in the margin of the A. V.) a common noun, signifying "an isolated hill or peak." If the latter view be taken, then Deut. xxxiv, 1 may be rendered, "Moses went up to Mount Nebo, to the top of the hill." The construction rather favors the view that Pisgah, like Abiram, was the name of the range, and that Nebo was one of its peaks. Others have taken precisely the opposite view, namely, that Pisgah was a particular summit of Nebo as a range; but in that case Pisgah would not be so often mentioned (as a mountain at the foot of which the Israelitish host encamped, and as furnishing springs of water), while Nebo is but once named (as the peak on which Moses died). (See below.) Upon Pisgah Balaam built altar and offered sacrifices, so that it was probably one of the ancient "high places" of Moab (Numb. xxxiii, 14). From its summit Moses obtained his panoramic view of the Holy Land, and there he died (Deut. xxxiv, 1-5). Beneath the mountains were celebrated "springs" or "torrents" (רִיָּנוֹת), which are several times mentioned in defining the boundaries of Reuben, as Ashdoth-Pisgah (Deut. iii, 17; iv, 49 in the Hebrew; Josh. xii, 8; xiii, 20). therefore lay on the east of Jordan, contiguous to the field of Moab, and immediately opposite Jericho. The field of Zophim was situated on it, and its highest point or summit—its "head"—was the Mount Nebo. If it was a proper name, we can only conjecture that it denoted the whole or part of the range of the highlands on the east of the lower Jordan. In the late Targums of Jerusalem and Pseudo-Jonathan, Pisgah is invariably rendered by ramatho, a term in common use for a hill. It will be observed that the Sept. also does not treat it as a proper name. On the other hand, Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast., s. v. Abaram, Pisga) report the name as existing in their day in its ancient locality. Mount Abaram and Mount Naban were pointed out on the road leading from Livia to Heshbon (i.e. the Wady Heshâb), still bearing their old names, and close to Mount Phogor (Poer), which also retained its name, whence, says Jerome (a. 338), the contiguous region was even then called Pisgah. This connection between Phogor and Pisgah is puzzling, and suggests a possible error of copyists. See Pass.

No traces of the name Pisgah have been met with in later times on the east of Jordan, but in the Arabic garb of Ras el-Peskah (almost identical with the Hebrew Roah hat-Pisgah) it is attached to a well-known headland on the north-westerly end of the Dead Sea, a mass of mountain bounded on the south by the Wady en-Nar, and on the north by the Wady Sidr, and on the northern part of which is situated the great Musliman sanctuary of Nebi Mûsâ (Moses). This association of the names of Moses and Pisgah on the west side of the Dead Sea—where to suppose that Moses ever set foot would be to mutilate the whole narrative of his decease—is extremely startling. No explanation of it has yet been offered. Certainly that of M. De Sauley and of his translator (see De Sauley's Voyage, etc., and the notes to ii, 58-66 of the American edition), that the Ras el-Peskah is identical with Pisgah, cannot be entertained. Against this the words of Deut. iii, 27, "Thou shalt not go over this Jordan," are decisive. See Dead Sea.

The mountain itself is chiefly memorable as the height from which Moses got his most distinct view of the Land of Promise; from thence "the Lord showed him all the land of Gilead unto Dan, and all Naphtali, and the land of Ephraim and Manasseh, and all the land of Judah unto the utmost sea; and the south, and the plain of the valley of Jericho, the city of palm-trees, unto Zoar" (Deut. xxxiv, 1-8). Mr. Tristan (Land of Israel, 1865, p. 533 sq.) describes a visit which he and his fellow-travellers paid to the range of Nebo or Abaram, and the magnificent prospect they had from the height which they supposed might possibly be the Pisgah of Moses. It was about three miles south-west of Heshbon, and one and a half miles due west of Malm. The elevation was considered to be about 4500 feet; yet the ascent was not rugged, and for several hours they rode along the ridge. The day was clear, and to the north and east they saw the hills of Gil'ead, and "the vast expanse of the godly Belka, one waving ocean of corn and grass." Southwards appeared Mounts Hor and Seir, with other granite peaks of Arabia, in the direction of Ahabah. Then, turning westwards, there lay distinctly before them the Dead Sea and the whole valley of the Jordan, "all the familiar points in the neighborhood of Jerusalem." Looking over Jordan, "the eye rested on Gerizim's rounded top; and farther still opened the plain of Esdraslon, the shoulder of Carmel, or some other intervening height, just showing to the right of Gerizim, while the faint and distant bluish haze beyond it told us that there was the sea, the utmost sea." It seemed as if but a whiff were needed to brush off the haze, and reveal it clearly. Northward, again, rose the distant outline of unmistakable Tabor, aided by which we could identify Gilboa and Jebel Dûby (Little Hermon). Snowy Hermon's top was mantled with cloud, and Lebanon's highest range must have been exactly shut behind it; but in front, due north of us, stretched in long line the dark forests of Ajjun, bold and undulating, with the deep sides of mountains, here and there whitened by cliffs, terminating in Mount Gil'ead, behind Es-Salt (Ramoth-Gililean)." This seems to realize to the full what was anciently exhibited to the eye of Moses, and shows the representation given of his extensive prospect to have been no ideal picture.

The spot has more recently been the subject of a considerable discussion by Prof. Paine, of the American exploring party, in report No. 8 of these operations (N. Y. Jan. 1875). Prof. Paine contends that Jebel Neba, the highest point of the range, is Mount Nebo, that Je-bel Siâghah, the extreme headland of the hill, is Mount and, that the "mountains of Abarim" are the cliffs west of these points, and descending towards the Dead Sea. He maintains these positions by the following arguments:

1. That there is an old road leading down to the Jordan valley in this direction, which he thinks the Israelites pursued on their way from Almon-dibblathaim to the plains of Moab (Num. xxxiiii, 47, 48). It has generally been supposed, however, that they took the route now usual with travellers, through Wady Hasbân.
The position of Jerusalem is unknown. As Almon is there said to have been before ("יָבְרָא") Nebo, a particle which generally signifies east and not west. The parallel account of the station in question (xxii, 29) places it on "the top of the Pisgah" (בֵית הַכֵּיתֶא דּוֹבַיָּה), and this certainly disconcerts Paine's location on a lower peak of the ridge. It is true the phrase is added, "which looketh towards Jeshimon," i.e. the Ghor or Jordan valley (see Keil, Comment. ad loc.), but this may possibly mean only pointing in that direction from the station last left. The preceding clause, "the valley that is in the field of Moab," is ambiguous; as it may qualify either the point of departure, i.e. Bamoth, or the destination, i.e. Pisgah. The A.V. adopts the former construction; but this cannot be favored by the syntax of the adjoining verses, and conflicts with the idea of a high place (Bamoth), which could hardly be said to have been in a valley. The latter reference is therefore adopted by most interpreters, but (as Rosenmuller remarks) seems to agree with the phrase "top of Pisgah." We suggest as the only consistent translation, "And from Bamoth to the valley which is in the plateau of Moab (the summit of the Pisgah [range]), and overlooks the Ghor." This makes Pisgah but another name for the table-land of Moab overhanging the Jordan valley or Dead Sea. The particular top in question was apparently Nebo itself, which is in fact a crest of the Moabitic table-land, that shows as a "mountain" only from the western point of view. The sole considerable "valley" (גִּזְעַת) answering to this description is Wady es-Sowâniich, which is the southern head-branch of Wady el-Hesbân, and intersects the plain up to the very crest of Nebo. Prof.
Paine, however, appears to identify it with the valley in which the "Springs of Moeos" are situated, a deep, wild, glen hardly answering to the requirements of the case except as it contains water and looks directly down upon the Dead Sea. As the route of those who we have located it, the Israelites would have been precisely on the route to Heshbon, which they next attacked (xxii, 21-26), and thence to the Ghor opposite Jericho (xxiii, 1), by way of Wady el-Hesbân.

2. Paine's next argument is drawn from the history of Balaam and Balak immediately following the passages last cited. After lodging at Kirjath-huzoth (Numb. xxii, 39), which Paine regards as the site of Kufre or Abi-Bel, just east of the crest of Nebo, the two proceeded first to "the high places of Baal" (ver. 41), which the professor deems to be "the extremity of Jebel Sâdghâh, the first chief summit of Pisgah"—a de-cription which, if we could correctly understand the somewhat confused statements, designates the outer or west-ernmost peak, as from this "the whole of Israel" could be seen. Balaam next repaired to a point called "the top of Pisgah" (ver. 14), which Paine regards as the third or easternmost peak, because from it only a part of the Israelitish camp could be seen. Finally, the prophet ascended "the top of Peor" (ver. 28), which the professor thinks was the middle or ruin-crowned peak of Sâdghâh, as from it the various surrounding countries there enumerated can be seen to advantage. But this distribution of the several localities seems rather arbitrary. The first name is a very indefinite one, being identified with Baal (Josh. xiv, 17), apparently nearer the Aroma (Numb. xxii, 29), if not identified with the Bamoth previously referred to (ver. 20); and surely there are many spots in the vicinity from which the "utmost part of the people" could be—seen—a phrase that designates not the whole, but only the rear. In Numb. xxiii, 15, where the same expression is used, the same place is referred to, where the word is עַבּ (báh)
"And Balak said to him, Come now with me to another place, whence thou mayest see him (only his extremity cannot thou see) [here], and not all of him cannot thou see; and thou shalt curse him for me there" (see Keil, ad loc.).
The next locality accordingly was out. commanding a view of the entire encampment, or only.
"the top of the Pisgah" range, probably Jebel Nebâh itself. It seems to have been much farther than Paine makes it from Balak's previous station, for there the two adjoining eminences are spoken of in very different phrases ("the high-places of Baal—to a high place," Numb. xxiii, 41, 42, 38, 3). As this second outlook of Balaam is called (xxiii, 14) "the field of Zophim," or the watchers, Paine holds that it was Wady Haisa, which he reports as being partly under cultivation; but this affords no good prospect of the "plains of Moab" eastward, such as Keil thinks the import of the name requires (Comment. ad loc.). The third of Balaam's posts of observation was "the top of Peor, which looketh towards Jeshimon," or the desert [of Judah] (Numb. xxiii, 29); and as the next to the last day's journey of the Israelites was "to the top of Pisgah," which looketh towards Jeshimon" (xxii, 28), and as, moreover, Moab died on the top of Pisgah, and was buried "in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor" (Deut. xxxiv, 6), Paine concludes that all these were designations of the same or immediately adjoining spots, thus making the ruin-crowned summit of Sâdghâh the site of the sanctuary of Peor, and he adds the character of the remains as evidence that they were an early temple. He thinks they are not sufficiently extensive for those of the town of Nebo (q. v.), but the inclines to identify with the more considerable ruins called Khâbar el-Mukheisât, a little more than a mile south of Jebel Nebâh.

Other collateral arguments of less moment adduced by Prof. Paine in support of his views are drawn from the name "Ashdoth-Pisgah" (Deut. ii, 17; iv, 49; Josh. xii, 8; xiii, 29), which he renders springs of Pisgah, and identifies with those of Ayûn Mâsâ; and from the Bible accounts of Moeos's death and burial. He also adduces the statements of later writers (Josephus, Eusebius, etc.) on these points. His attempt to trace the name Pisgah back to the Syrian root Peor as pointed out by some of his predecessors, he regards as failure. His main conclusion that Pisgah is a special name for a particular part of Mount Nebo, and that the mountains of Abarim are likewise limited to the hills immediately overhanging the north-east end of the Dead Sea, can be supported as being in accordance with the genius of the place; and we therefore incline to the generally entertained view that the reverse is true. Dr. J.
L. Porter has still more recently travelled over this locality, and he states, in his account of his journey in the London Athenæum, that Jebel Nebâh is a common name for many of the eminences in this vicinity.
He is inclined to regard Sâdghâh as a relic of the name Pisgah. See Nebo.

PIȘTATAH. See FLAX.

PIȘTÂDI (PIȘTÂDI, etymology uncertain) was a district of Asia Minor, which cannot be very exactly defined. But it may be described sufficiently by saying that it was to the north of Pamphylia, and stretched along the range of Taurus. Northward it reached to the Arctic Ocean. It was probably of tolerably oblong shape, and rather as is shown on the modern maps on the southern side of Asia Minor. Thus Antioch in Pisidia was sometimes called a Phrygian town. In general terms it may be said that Pisidia was bounded on the north by Phrygia, on the west by Caria and Lydia, on the south by Pamphylia, and on the east by Cilicia and Cappadocia. It was a mountainous region; but high up among the peaks of Taurus were some fertile valleys and little upland plains. The province was subdivided into minute sections, and held by tribes of wild and wakike highlanders, who were the terror of the whole surrounding country (Strabo, 2 c.; Xenophon, Anab. 1, 11; 2, 5, 18). It was probably among the deities of Pisidia that the apostle Paul experienced some of those "perils of robbers" of which he speaks in 2 Cor. xi, 26; and perhaps fear of the bandits that inhabited them had something to do with John's abrupt departure from Paul and Barnabas just as they were about to enter Pisidia (Acts xiii, 10, 14). The Pisidian tribes had rules of their own, and they maintained their independence in spite of the repeated attacks of more powerful neighbors, and of the conquests of the Greeks, and even of the Romans. The latter were content to receive from them a scanty tribute, allowing them to remain undisturbed amid their mountain fastnesses. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v. The scenery of Pisidia is wild and grand. The mountains are mostly limestone, and are partially clothed with forests of oak, pine, and juniper. The lower slopes are here and there planed with olives, vines, and pomegranates. Many of the rivers are artificially grand—have cliffs rising up a thousand feet and more on each side of the bed of a foaming torrent. In other places fountains gush forth, and streams crawl along amid thickets of olean- der. The passes from the sea-coast to the interior are difficult, and have always been imperative. See Land and Life in Pisidia.

Paul paid two visits to Pisidia. In company with Barnabas he entered it from Pamphylia on the south, and crossed over the mountains to Antioch, which lay near the northern border (Acts xiii, 10). Their mission was successful; but the enemies of the truth soon caused them to be expelled from the province (ver. 50). After an adventurous journey through Ly- overthom" (comp. Hab. i, 8), but at the same time quotes an etymology given in Herodich Rabbe, § 16, in which it is asserted that the river is called Pison "because it makes the flux (πηγή) to grow." Josephus explains it by λαυρέας, Scaliger by λαυρεμύρα. The theory that the Pison is the Ganges is thought to receive some confirmation from the author of the book of Ecclesiasticus, who mentions (xxiv, 25, 27) in order the Pison, the Tigris, the Euphrates, Jordan, and Gihon, and is supposed to have commenced his enumeration in the east and to have terminated it in the west. That the Pison was the Indus is an opinion current a few years before it was revived by Ewald (Gesch. d. Volker. fiber, i, 381, note 2) and adopted by Kalisch (Genesis, p. 96). Philostorgius, quoted by Huet (Ugolino, vol. vii), conjectured that it was the Hydaspe; and Willad (A. R. A., vol. vii), following the Hindú tradition with regard to the origin of mankind, discovers the Pison in the Landi-Sind, the Ganges of Isidorus, called also Niláb from the color of its waters, and known to the Hindús by the name of Nila-Gangá, or Gangá simply. Severianus (De Mundi creat. and Epiphanius, Hær., Comm, s. a. Gen.) agrees with Ammianus Marcellinus in identifying the Pison with the Ganges. The last-mentioned father seems to hold, in common with others, some singular notions with regard to the course of this river. He believed that it was also the Ganges and Indus, and that, after traversing Ethiopia and Elymais, which he considered landlocked, it fell into the ocean near Cadiz. Such is also the opinion of Epiphanius with regard to the course of the Pison, which he says is the Ganges of the Ethiopians and Indians and the Indus of the Greeks (Aen. c. 58).

Some, as Hopkinson (Ugolino, vol. vii), have found the Pison in the Naharnawa, one of the artificial canals which formerly joined the Euphrates with the Tigris. This canal is the flumen regionum of Amm. Marc. (xxiii, 6, § 20, and xxiv, 6, § 1), and the Armeleth of Pliny (N. I. vi. 90). Grotius, on the contrary, considered it to be the Gihon. Even those commentators who agree in placing the terrestrial Paradise on the Shat el-Arab, the stream formed by the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, between Ctesiphon and Apamæa, are by no means unanimous as to which of the branches, into which this stream is again divided, the names Pison and Gihon are to be applied. Calvin (Comm. s. a. Gen.) was the first to conjecture that the Pison was the most easterly of these channels, and in this opinion he is followed by Scaliger and many others. Huet, on the other hand, conceded that he proved by arguments that Calvin was in error, and that the Pison was the westernmost of the two channels by which the united stream of the Euphrates and Tigris falls into the Persian Gulf. He was confirmed in this opinion by Bölling, (Herat. pt. ii. 1, 5, c. 6), Junius (Pres, s. a. Gen.) and Rask discovered a relic of the name Pison in the Pastigiris. The advocates of the theory that the true position of Eden is to be sought for in the mountains of Armenia have been induced, from a certain resemblance in the two names, to identify the Pison with the Phasis, which runs in the elevated plains of the foot of Mount Ararat, near the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates. Reland (De Situ parad. terr. Ugolino, vol. viii), Calmet (Dict. s. a. Link (Urvelt, i. 307), Rosenmüller (Handb. der bibl. Altert., s. a. Gen.) and Hartmann have given their suffrages in favor of this opinion. Such suggestions by Delitzsch (Genesis) endeavors to prove that the Pison was the Phasis of Xenophon (Anab. 4, 6), that is, the Aras or Araxes, which flows into the Caspian Sea. There remain yet to be noticed the theories of Lelicer (Comm. s. a. Gen.), and of the modern Barada, which takes its rise near Damascus; and that of Buttmann (A. It. Erk., p. 82), who identified it with the Besyrag or Arabatt, a river of the Mandelsohn (Comm. s. a. Gen.) mentions that some affirm the Pison to be the Golan of 2 Kings xvii, 6 and 1.
Chron. v. 26, which is supposed to be a river, and the same with the Kziel-Usen in Hyrcania. Colonel Chesney, from the results of extensive observations in Armenia, seems to infer that the river is none of the comparatively modern names of Halyos and Araxes are those which, in the book of Genesis, have the names of Pison and Gihon; and that the country within the former is the land of Havilah, while that which borders upon the latter is the still more remarkable country of Cush" (Exped. to Euphr. and Tigris, i. 267). — Smith. Fabel inclines to make it the Abarus of Phinyx, or Batam of modern geographers, which rises in Armenia and flows into the Black Sea; but Dr. Hales considers the Araxes to have a better claim; and this last speculation (for nothing better can any of the assigned positions be called) seems to derive support from the author of the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus, who, speaking of a wise man, says that "as he filleth all things with his wisdom," or spreads it on every side, "as Pison and Tigris" spread their waters "in the time of the new fruits," that is, when they are swollen by the melting of the winter snows, thus seeming to indicate a river rising in a cold and mountainous region. The mention of gold as the special product of the vicinity inclines to the view which regards the Pison as identical with the Phraya, or Phrygia, and the resemblance of names confirms this. See Eden.

Pistaclio. See Nut.

Pistis Sophia (i.e. the Believing Wisdom) is the name of a newly discovered Gnostic work, fully entitled "Pistis Sophia, Opus Gnosticum e codicis manuscrypta Copice-Lutine eruit G. M. Schurville, sodulst J. H. Petermann (Berl. 1851). The date is doubtful; it evidently belongs to the period when Valentinian Gnosticism had reached its full development—about the close, therefore, of the 2d century. The general dogmas of the Valentinian system are found in it, though half buried in a luxurious and monotonous vegetation. The theme is always the same—a gnostis, or hidden doctrine, which brings salvation by simple illumination. Jesus Christ returns from the heavens into which he had reascended, and appears to his disciples on the Mount of Olives, to reveal to them the sublime mysteries of the truth. They form in a knowledge of the inner and particular works of the spiritual ones, whose charge is it to transmit this hidden mystery to the pneumatic men of future generations. All these revelations revolve around the destiny of Sophia, who here symbolizes, far more clearly than among the Valentinians, the divinely holy condition of the human soul, which, as the punishment for having sought to overpass the limits of its original sphere, is tormented by the comical powers, among which we recognize the Demiurgus. He produces, by emanation, a terrible power with a lion face, which, surrounded by other similar emanations, terrifies the noble and ardent exiled Sophia, even in the dark regions of matter, flashing before her eyes a false and misleading brightness. Nevertheless she does not lose courage; she still hopes and believes. Hence she declares the name of the Believing Wisdom. Twelve times she invokes the Deliverer in strains of passionate and truly sublime supplication; these are her twelve repentances ("Nunc cujus πινοηεν λαλερ, progregator, ut dicat solutionem duodecim mevnaes πινοηενς να- φις;" Pist. Soph. p. 70). Her deliverance is accomplished by the desertion of the Valiant Sin, the apostate on the part of Jesus. As the fall, or sin, is nothing more than an obscuration produced by matter, so salvation is simply a return to the light. This division of the lamentations of Sophia and the interventions of Jesus produces a weariness of repetition; the aspirations of the soul are, however, rendered with a force all the more poetic because so largely derived from the Old Testament. In particular, all the penitential Psalms are applied to Sophia, being wrested from their natural meaning.

"O Light of the world," she exclaims, "thou whom I have seen from the beginning, listen to the cry of my repenting." (Lamen luminum, cal invincibilis inde ab initio, audi tigl turf sonc, lumen, lumina, opus nostum, bibd. p. 300). "0 Light, from my own thoughts, which are evil. I have fallen into the infernal regions. False lights have led me astray, and now I am lost in those chaotic depths. I cannot spread my wings and return to my place, for the evil powers seat for me in the abyss, and mire, and mud, and earth, and sea, faced power, hold me captive. I have cried for help, but my voice dies in the night. I have lifted up my eyes to the heights, the earth did not return to me. But I have found none but hostile powers, who rejoice in my affliction, and seek to increase it by putting out the mark of Nineveh. 0 Light of truth, in the simplicity of my heart I have followed the false brightness which I mistook for thee. My sin is wholly before thee. Leave me not to suffer longer, for I have cried to thee from the beginning. It is for thee that I am plunged into this affliction. Behold me in this place weeping, crying out again for the light which I have seen upon the heights. Hence the rage of those who keep the doors of my prison. If thou wilt come and set me free, O Light of mercy: grant my supplication. Deliver me from this dark matter, lest I be, as we were, swallowed up in it." (Liberera me e vag hujus caligend, bibd. p. 34). "O Light, cast upon me the flame of thy compassion, for I am in bitter anguish. Rapid my cry for me. I have passed and spouse that he might come and fight for me, and he comes not. Instead of light, I have received darkness and matter. I will pray that I will glorify thee, and this hymn rise with acceptance to thee at the gates of light. I let my whole body be estranged from matter; I am in the divine city. Let all souls which receive the mystery be admitted therin" (φαινον οριν ακολουθεί μεστεριομεν, bibd. p. 303). "12 times the cry rises to the Deliverer. 'I am become,' says Sophia again, 'like the demon who dwells in matter, in whom all light is extinct. I am myself become matter. My strength is turned to stone in me' (Atque mea viae cogit iunctae in me, bibd. p. 48). "I have set my love in the darkness, light, leave me not in the chase. Deliver me by thy knowledge. Enlighten me in the darkness. O. Spera me in te cogito, bibd. p. 50). "My trust is in thee, they will return to my light, because thou hast pity on me. Give me thy baptism, and wash away my sins." Pistola. Synod or, in 1786, marks one of the many reformatory movements in the Roman Catholic Church which remained without any effect. Leopold of Tuscany (q.v.), acted by the same sense in which his brother Joseph II of Austria acted, tried to liberalize the affairs of the Catholic Church in his country. For this purpose he issued Jan. 25, 1786, O. Light of the world, to his bishops, containing fifty-seven articles of his reformatory plan, which he wished them to examine respectively, and carry out. The most important points for consideration were, 1. The necessity of holding annual synods in each diocese; 2. The full establishment of the episcopal power; 3. A scientific training of the clergy, and a religious education of the people. This circular-adress was prepared by the grand-duke himself, who was well versed in theological literature. He gave his bishops six months' time for consideration, but after this time he expected them to sign. The circ. was emulated in every respect those of Eleusis or of Mit-br. theloulogians in the first two centuries of the Reformation, of whom we mention the following:

1. Conrad, a Brunswick theologian. Together with Paul Eitsen, of Hamburg, and Joachim Möhrin, of Brunswick, he took part in the proceedings of the Harden-

2. In 1562 he was superintendent in Güstrow; in 1572 the duke Ulric of Mecklenburg disinherited him from his estates. He then went to Rostock; thence to Antwerp and Vienna; was appointed superintendent at Hildesheim, and, when expelled, returned again to Brunswick, where he died in 1588. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop., s. v.; Theologische Universal-Lexikon, s. v.

3. John (1) of Ratisbon, at first a Roman Catholic, was a convert to Lutheranism; he assisted St. John's in Nidda, a Hungarian city, afterwards first Lutheran pastor and superintendent there, took part with Melancthon and Bucer as a representative of the Protoc ntes in the colloquy at Ratisbon in 1541, and afterwards at Worms in 1557. In 1544 he was very active in aiding the prince Henry, count of Wied, to introduce the Reformation in the archbishopric of Cologne, but the battle at Mühlberg put an end to the whole movement. Pistorius died in 1585. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop., s. v.; Theologische Universal-Lexikon, s. v.; Smith, Hist. of the Church of Christ in Germany, i. 365, 467; Wars, p. 53; Kurz, Lehrbuch der Kirchengesch. S 185, 8; Niedner, Lehrbuch der christl. Kirchengesch. p. 635.

4. John (2) also called Niddanus, from his native place, son of the former, was born Feb. 4, 1546. He studied first medicine, law, and history, and only later theology. Originally a Lutheran, he became next a zealous Calvinist, and induced the first son of the margrave Charles II of Baden, Ernest Frederick, to join him. Soon afterwards he joined the Roman Catholic Church, in which alone he could see the continuity of the Church of Christ, and induced the second son of the margrave Jacob to follow him. In behalf of his patron, he held in 1589 a colloquy at Baden with Andreae and Heerbrand, who represented Lutheranism, and Schyrus, who represented Calvinism. A second colloquy he held at Emmerndingen in 1590, a Dr. Peppas, of Strasburg. After the death of his patron, Pistorius went to Freiburg and Constance; became doctor of theology, canon of Constance, cathedral-provost of Breslau, and imperial councillor to the emperor Rudolph II. Pistorius died in 1598. In his Theologiae de fidei Christianae definita mensura, and in Unser von Gottes Gesandes Jakobs Markgrafen zu Baden . . . christl. erhebliche und wohlfahrene Motiven etc., he endeavored to justify his own and his patron's conversion to the Church of Rome. His polemics against Luther in his Anatomi Lutheri, seu de septem spiritibus, and on other topics, are worthy of attention. See also rejoinders. Pistorius is also the author of some medical works, and some historical works on Poland, Germany, Hungary, and Spain. In the service of the Church of Rome, Pistorius also wrote a Wegweiser für alle verführten Christen, to which Dr. Menster replied in his Anti-Pistorius. See Fechtis Historia Colgiosa Em-mendationis, cui subjicit protoculum et conclusio (Rostock, 1709); Herzog, Real-Encyklop., s. v.; Theolog.

5. M. Theophilus (1), succeeded the excellent John Mathesius (q. v.) in the ministry at Joachimsthal; and his son, also.

PIT. In the A. V. this word appears with a figurative as well as with a literal meaning. It points out the facts that belong to the outward aspect of Palestine and its cities to states or regions of the spiritual world. With this power it is used to represent several Hebrew and Greek words, and the starting-point which the literal meaning presents for the spiritual is, in each case, a subject of some interest.

1. Of those בָּדַד, בַּדָּד (root בָּדַד, cognate בָּדָד, בָּדָד, a well), occurs most frequently, and means a deep hole or pit, dug in the first instance for a well, or a cistern hewn or cut in stone, a reservoir, which the Orientals are in the habit of preparing in those regions where there are few or no springs, for the purpose of preserving rain-water for travellers and cattle. These cisterns and trenches are often without water, no supply being obtainable for them except from the rain. In old decayed cisterns the water leaks out, or becomes slimy (Jer. ii. 13). Such cisterns or pits, when without water, were often used in the East apparently for three purposes: (1) for the purpose of sepulture (Jer. xxviii. 11; xxx. 4; Isa. xxxviii. 18), hence חָקַךְ כָּבֵד, "they that go down to the pit"—a phrase of frequent occurrence, employed sometimes to denote dying without hope, but commonly a simple going down to the place of the dead (see Gesen. Lex. s. v.); also, "the graves set in the sides of the pit" (Exod. xxxii. 28), the recesses cut out for purposes of burial; or they might be the natural flat-bottomed basins, abounding in all limestone formations, of which the rocks of Syria and Palestine chiefly consist. (2) A prison: "they shall be gathered as prisoners are gathered in the pit, and shall be shut up" (Isa. xxiv. 22; also Jer. xxxiv. 16; Exod. xii. 29). The phrase was used of the place of punishment in the East, and very dreadful it was as the case of Jeremiah illustrates (Jer. xxxviii. 4, 9). To be doomed to the pit was often to be left to a slow death by starvation; and to be saved from such a doom was regarded as the greatest of all deliverances. Hence it was used as a place of destruction (Zech. xix. 10). In the case of Joseph, Reuben suggested the pit as a device for saving his brother; the others hostile to Joseph adopted it as the most secret, and, they might think, the least guilty method of making away with him (Gen. xxxviii. 22-26).

As remarked above, in this word, as in the cognate בָּדַד, בָּדָד (which is likewise rendered pit in Gen. xiv. 10; Ps. lv. 23; lxix. 15; Prov. xxiii. 27), the special thought is that of a pit or well dug for water (Gesen. Theoseaur. s. v.). The process of desanonymizing which goes on in all languages seems to have conformed the former to the state of the well or cistern, dug into the rock, but not filled with water, but where the sense in both cases is figurative, and the same English word is used, we have pit (בָּדַד) connected with the "deep water," "the water-flood," "the deep" (Psa. lxix. 16), while in pit (נַחֲלָה) there is nothing but the "miry clay" (Psa. xi. 2). Its dreariest feature is that there is "no water in it" (Zech. ix. 11). So far the idea involved has been rather that of misery and despair than of death. But in the phrase "they that go down to the pit" (נַחֲלָה) it becomes even more constantly than the synonyms noticed below (שהל, שךך, שךך) the representative of the whole of the word (Ezek. xxxii. 14, 16; xxxii. 18, 24; Ps. xxviii. 1; cxliii. 7). There may have been two reasons for this transfer: 1. The wide, deep excavation became the place of burial. The "graves were set in the sides of the pit" (Ezek. xxxii. 24). To one looking into it, it was visibly the home of the dead, while the vaguer, more mysterious Sheol carried the thoughts further to an invisible home. 2. The pit, however, in this sense, was never simply equivalent to burial-place. There is always implied in it a thought of some manner of punishment. This, too, had its origin apparently in the use made of the excavations, which had either never been wells, or had lost the supply of water. The prisoner in the land of his enemies was left to perish in the pit (בָּדַד) (Zech. ix. 11). The greatest of all deliverances is that the captive exile is released from the slow death of starvation in it (שךך, Isa. li. 14). The history of Jeremiah, cast into the dungeon or pit (בָּדַד) (Jer. xxxviii. 6, 9), let down into its depths with cords, sinking into the filth at the bottom (here also there is no water), with death by hunger staring him in the face, shows how terrible an act of punishment can be such a pit. The condition of the Athenian prisoners in the stone- quarries of Syracuse (Thuc. vii. 87), the Persian punishment of the εὐκοτίας (Pser. 49.), the oublittes of medieval princes, present instances of cruelty more or less analogous. It is not strange that with these associations and with the horror clustering around, it should have involved more of the idea of a place of punishment for the naughty or unjust than did the sheol or the grave. See Well.

2. שךך, שךך, of which, as well as in the cognate שךך, שךך (rendered "pit" in Prov. xx., 14; Jer. ii. 6; xix. 20, 22), שךך, שךך ("pit," Prov. xxviii. 10), שךך, שךך, שךך ("pit," Lam. iv. 20; "destruction," Prov. xxii. 20), and שךך, שךך, שךך ("pit," Ps. xvii. 6; cxix. 55; Jer. xvii. 29), as the root שךך shows, the sinking of the pit is the primary thought (see Paezaur. s. v.). It is dug into the earth (Ps. ix. 16; cxix. 85). A pit thus made and then covered lightly over, served as a trap by which animals or men might be ensnared (Ps. xxxv. 7). It thus became a type of sorrow and converse from which a man could not extricate himself, of the great doom which was coming upon the land, of the dreariness of death (Job xxxiii. 18, 24, 28, 50). To "go down to the pit" is to die without hope. It is the penalty of evil-doers, that from which the righteous are delivered by the hand of God. See Trap.

3. שךך, שךך, in Numb. xvi. 80, 83; Job xvii. 16. Here the word is in form, which is used only of the hollow, shadowy world, the dwelling of the dead, and as such it has been treated of under HELL.

4. Other Hebrew words rendered pit in the A. V. are the following: בָּדַד, something cut out, hence a cistern in the rock (Jer. xviii. 4); and the cognate בָּדַד, בָּדַד (Isa. xxx. 14, Jer. xxiv. 3), יִזְבּ, γυμνά, something dug (only Eccles. x. 18), and פָּתָח, an excavation (2 Sam. xvii. 9, xviii. 17; Isa. xxiv. 17, 18; Jer. xxxvi. 43, 44; "hole," Jer. xxvii. 26; "snare," Sam. iii. 7). The term מַעֲקֵר, מַעֲקֵר, rendered "deep pits" (Psa. xcvii. 10), properly signifies stream, whirlpools, abysses of waters. The term מַעֲקֵר, סִימְנָה, and Jeremiah understood pits of water.

5. The Greek terms are the following: in Rev. i. 1, 2, and elsewhere, the "bottomless pit" is the translation of τὸ φωτός τῇ θανατίον (Rev. i. 18), and properly signifies stream, whirlpools, abysses of waters. In the trinity, Symmachus, and Jerome understood pits of water.

6. Pitaka or Pitakattayan (Pali pitakam, a "basket," and สะ, "above"), the sacred books of the Buddhists. The text of the Pitaka is divided into three great classes. The instructions contained in the first class, called Wącaya, were addressed to the priests; those in the second class, Sūtra, to the laity; and those in the third class, Añña, to the dewan and priest of the celestial worlds. There is a commentary on the Añña called the Aññakatho, which, until recently, was regarded as of equal authority with the text. The text, as we learn from Mr. Spence Hardy, was orally preserved until the reign of the Singhalese monarch Wattagamani, who reigned from B.C. 104 to B.C. 76, when it was committed to writing in the island of Ceylon. The commentary was written by Baddegahosa in A.D. 420. To establish the text of the Pitakas three several convocations were held. The first met B.C. 548, when the whole was reorganized, every syllable being repeated with nature of pitch is noticed in Isa. xxxiv. 9. See ASPHALTEM; BITUMEN.

Pitcher in the A.V. represents the following words in the original: 1. ἄχρυδος; Sept. ῥηψις; Vulg. hydria, legeia; skin to Sanscrit kut and κάρος; rendered "barrel" (1 Kings xvii, 12; xviii, 33). 2. ἡμέλιον, ἡμελις; Sept. αἰγεθής; Vulg. crus; A.V. "bottle," only once a "pitcher" (Lam. iv, 2), where it is joined with ἁρπάζων, an earthen vessel (Gesen. Thesaur. p. 522).

3. In the N.T. ἐπάθιον, twice only (Mark xiv, 10; Luke xxii, 10). It denotes the water-jars or pitchers with one or two handles, used chiefly by women for carrying water, as in the story of Rebecca (Gen. xxiv, 15-20; but see Mark xiv, 10; Luke xxii, 10). This practice has been and is still usual both in the East and elsewhere. The vessels used for the purpose are generally carried on the head or on the shoulder. The Bedawin women commonly use skin-bottles. Such was the "bottle" carried by Hagar (Gen. xxi, 14; Harmer, Obs. iv, 246; Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 578; Roberts, Sketches, p. 164; Arieux, Trav. p. 208; Burchhardt, Notes on Bed. i, 531; Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 579). The same word κατὰ is used of the pitchers employed by Gideon's 300 men (Judg. vii, 16), where the use made of them marks the material. Also the vessel (A.V. barrel) in which the meal of the Sarepitan widow was contained (1 Kings xvii, 12), and the "barrelas" of water used by Elijah at Mount Carmel (xvii, 3). It is also used figuratively of the life of man (Eccles. xii, 6). It is thus probable that earthen vessels were used by the Jews as they were by the Egyptians for containing both liquids and dry provisions (Birch, Anc. Pottery, i, 48). At the Fountain of Nahazeth may be seen men and women with pitchers which scarcely differ from those in use in Egypt and Nubia (Roberts, Sketches, p. 29, 184). The water-pot of the woman of Samaria was probably one of this kind, to be distinguished from the much larger amphore of the marriage-feast at Cana. See BOTTLE; CHURV; EWIR; FLAGON; POT.

PITCHER, Edwin Frank, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born Feb. 14, 1846, near Fairmount, Marion County, West Virginia. He was the youngest of thirteen children. Very early in life he gave evidence of religious culture, and at the age of eleven was converted, and joined the Methodists. His school life was noted for its spiritual tone. At fourteen he entered Dickinson College. At sixteen he took the prize medal in the junior contest, and graduated the first in his class. The year following his graduation he became professor in Emory Female College, Carlisle, Pa., and while in this position was licensed to preach. Impressed with the value of a higher theological training, he went to Evanston; but the climate proving unfavorable to his health, he returned to his home. In the fall of 1865 he entered the theological school at Concord, N.H., where he remained until the spring of 1867, when he graduated. Joining the New England Conference, he was sent to Amherst, Mass., which was a new field.

for Methodism. In 1868 he was called to Morgantown, West Virginia, where his labors were very successful. In 1870 he was stationed at Lawrence, Mass., but finding his wife’s health failing, he entered the Philadelphia Conference, and in March, 1872, was stationed at Lawrence, Kansas, where he labored until 1878, when he went to Allen town, Pa., which proved to be his last appointment. In the spring of 1875, his own health failing, he sailed for Europe. Returning the middle of September, his pasto ral work occupied his time until Feb. 28, when he was taken with hemorrhage from the lungs. He died March 18, 1876. His pastorate was thorough and elevated, his style classic and chaste. His manner was gentle and unpretentious, and his presentation of truth force ful and vivid. His favorite theme was the all-power ful Name. See Zion's Herald, Aug. 10, 1876.

P'thorn (Heb. P'ikhum', פִּיתוֹם, meaning, if of Heb. derivation, mouth of Thon; but the word is probably Egyptian, meaning the city of antemmes [justice]; Sept. Πνώμα(ν), v. r. Πνώς, one of the store-cities built by the Israelites for the first oppressor, the Pharaoh which knew not Joseph) (Exod. i, 11). In the Heb. these cities are two, Pithom and Raamses; the Sept. adds On as a third. It is probable that Pithom lay in the most eastern part of Lower Egypt, like Raamses, if, as is reasonable, we suppose the latter to be the Ramessus mentioned elsewhere. We are informed that the Israelites were garrisoned in public works within or near to the land of Goshen. See RAAMSES. Herodotus mentions a town called Puthos, Πυθούζ, which seems to be the same as the Thoum or Thou of the Itinerary of Antoninus, probably the military station Thou of the Notitiae. Whether or not Puthos be the Pithom of Scripture, there can be little doubt that the name is identical. The first part is the same as in Bu-bastis and Bu-tiria, either the definite article masculine or a possessive pronoun, unless indeed, with Brugsch, we read the Egyptian word "abolo" and can thus interpret the name. See PI NESETH. The second part appears to be the name of Atum or Tum, a divinity worshipped at On, or Heliopolis, as well as Ra, both being forms of the sun [see Os.], and it is noticeable that Thoun or Thou was very near the Heliopolite nome, and perhaps more anciently within it, and that a monument at Abu-Kheishef shows that the worship of Heliopolis extended along the valley of the canal of the Red Sea. As we find Thoum and Patamus and Raamses in or near to the land of Goshen, the probability is not unreasonable that we have here a correspondence to Pithom and Raamses, and the probable connection in both cases with Heliopolis confirms the conclusion. It is remarkable that the Coptic version of Gen. xi, 28 mentions Pithom for, or instead of, the Heropolis of the Sept. Whether Patamus and Thoum be the same, and the position of one or both, have yet to be determined, before we can speak positively as to the Pithom of Exodus. Herodotus places Patamus in the Arabian nome upon the canal of the Red Sea (ii, 48). The Itinerary of Antoninus puts Thou fifty Roman miles from Heliopolis, and his statement is probably correct; but this seems too far north for Patamus, and also for Pithom, if that place were near Heliopolis, as its name and connection with Raamses seem to indicate. It was twelve miles from Vicus Judeorum, according to the Itinerary. It must therefore have been somewhere over against Wady Tumilat, or the valley of Thoum, or near the mouth of that valley, and not far from Pi-beseth or Bubastis, now called Tell Basta. Tell el-Kebir, or the Great Heap, which is a little to the south of it, may perhaps be the site of ancient Pithom. Heliopolis, which palls, stayed, and had almost become a mythical, may, after all, be the same as Pithom. Heropaolis, according to Ptolemy, lay at the extremity of Trajan's canal, i.e. its eastern extremity, where it joined or approached the more ancient canal of Pharaoh Necho, possibly at or within the mouth of this valley, and, according to Manetho, not far from the Bubastis branch of the Nile. Most writers, however, regard the ruins at Abu-Kheishef as marking the site of Heropolis. Accordingly the scholars who accompanied the French expedition place Pithom on the site of the present A-Bakah, at the entrance of the Wady Tumilat, where there was at all times an accumulation of silt. See HEGEBENBERG, Die Bücher Moses und Agypten; Du Bos Aymé, in Description de l'Egypte, xi, 387; xvi, 1, 572; Champollion, L'Egypte sous les Pharaons, i, 172; ii, 58. See GOSHEN.

Pithon (Heb. Pithon', פִּיתוֹן, perh. karphlim [Furst]: Sept. Πνώμα(ν), the first named of four sons of Micah, the grandson of Jonathan, son of king Saul (1 Chron. viii, 35; ix, 41). B.C. post 1050.

Pithon, François and Pierre, twin-brothers, were born Nov. 1, 1859. Both became famous as canoniasts. François, who died as chancellor of the Parliament at Paris in 1907, published among other works the Codex Dionysii Heliocrum (i.e. the collection of canons of Dionysius Exiguus, as augmented by Adrian). Pierre occupied some of the highest official positions, which, however, he relinquished, in order to give himself entirely to study. After the death of Bartholome w's eve, he became a convert to the Roman Catholic Church, and again came before the public to defend the correction of Henry IV, and to effect his reconciliation with Paris. He died at Lyons-sur-Seine in 1898. Pierre was canon of Paris, and spiritual of the College of Montmartre (1694), in 88 articles, to which must be added Du Puy's Preuves des Libertés de l'Eglise Gallicane, de Maistre Pierre Pithon (ibid. 1692). Both brothers published an edition of the Corpus juris canon. See Theolog. Universalis Lexicon, a. v. (B.P.)

Pitiful. See Pity.

Pitkin, Caleb, a Presbyterian minister, was born in New York, Jan. 17, 1781. He early embraced religion, became a local preacher in 1806; and in 1817 he was installed pastor of the Congregational Church at Ohio-town, Portage county, Ohio; and he remained about ten years. Previous to the close of this period measures had been taken by the preachers of the River and Portage towards the establishment of a college. Mr. Pitkin had been an active agent in this work, and forward it was the principal object of his attention. In 1826 he removed to Hudson, where the Western Reserve College was established, and remained there till his death, Feb. 5, 1864. See Wilson, Prob. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 169. (J. L. S.)

Pitman, Charles, D.D., a pioneer preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born near Cookstown, N. J., Jan. 10, 1845. He earned the degree of A.B. from the Philadelphia University, and was licensed to preach in 1866, and became a local preacher in 1871, and the next year joined the Philadelphia Conference. At once he obtained popularity with all hearers, occupying, from time to time, the most important stations and districts in the Philadelphia Conference. In the year 1841 he was elected one of the ministers of the Church, and became a deacon of the society. His health failing in 1850, he resigned this office and retired to Trenton, passing serene and faithfully from life, Jan. 14, 1854, and leaving a name for Christian purity, consistency, ministerial ability, and usefulness which the Church delights to remember. He possessed a strong memory, a quick perception, with discriminating judgment, and a holy evangelical fervor stamped his pulpit labors. Dr. Pitman had not many equals as a public speaker. His oratory was emphatically not scholastic, but, like the great Patrick Henry's, the true eloquence of nature. Although Dr. Pitman was an extemporaneous preacher, he carefully used his pen in preparations for the pulpit. Many sermons he wrote in full, not to read or memorize them, but for the purpose of properly disciplining his thoughts and language, and for useful reference. Emphatically a preacher of Christ, the precious atonement became his favorite theme, and imputed righteousness a daily theme upon his lips while he held up a crucified Saviour. All who heard him believed to be a man of God, preaching with divine unction, and they received in faith the words of truth which he uttered. Dr. Pitman had a fine, large head, moderately high forehead, and slightly sunken eyes, his likeness resembling the celebrated Robert Hall of England. See New Jersey Memo-

PITMAN, John Rogers, an English divine, noted as a classical scholar and general litterateur, was born about 1672, and was educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1694. He became preacher at Berkeley and Belgrave chapels, and in the Foundling and Magdalen hospitals, and perpetual curate of St. Barnabas Church, Kensington. He died in 1757. Of his publications, we mention Exercitata ex oratis Romanis Poeta (London, 1698).—Sermones et Discursos (subdivided, 1695; 2nd series, 1709).—Sermons for the Year (1695, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d series, 1728).—Sermons on the Mount (1852).—Mr. Pitman also edited the works of Dr. Lightfoot (1722–25, 18 vols. 8vo) and Bingham's Origenis Ecclesiastica (1746, 9 vols. 8vo).

Pitt, Edward, the eldest son of Robert Pitt (1717–1799), was born in London on 4 April 1759. He was educated at Eton and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and after a brief career in the law, he entered Parliament as Member for Wiltshire in 1780. He was a close associate of William Pitt the Younger, and together they formed one of the most powerful and influential coalitions in British politics. Pitt's political career began in 1780, when he was elected as a Whig MP for Wiltshire. He quickly rose through the ranks and became a key figure in the Whig Party. Pitt was a strong supporter of the American colonists in their struggle for independence, and he played a significant role in the negotiations that led to the Treaty of Paris in 1783. After the war, Pitt was appointed as Lord Chancellor of Ireland, a position he held until 1785. In 1788, he became Secretary of State for War, a post he held until 1789.

PITT, CHRISTOPHER, an English divine, noted especially as a poet, was born in 1699 at Blandford, Dorset-shire; was educated at Winchester and at New College, Oxford; and, after taking holy orders, obtained the family living at Pimperne, where he passed his life, be- loved and respected for his suavity of manners and gen- eral benevolence. He died in 1748. His works are of a secular character. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer.

PITTONI, Gianambrotta, an Italian canonist, was born at Venice in 1665. He took holy orders and was a priest, and resided in turn at Rome and Venice. He died Oct. 17, 1744. He compiled with great order a collection of the pontifical constitutions and of the decisions of the different Roman congregations (Viterbo, 1745 and ensuing years, 14 vols. 8vo), which is held in high esteem. He left also, Vita di Benedetto XII (Venice, 1780), 4 vols.—De commeniatione omnium fidelium defensorum (ibid. 1739, 8vo)—De octo octo festorum (ibid. 1746, 2 vols. 8vo); etc.

PITTO, Lodovico Biot (in Latin, Pictorius), a modern Latin poet, was born in 1454 at Ferrara. He cultivated with some success philosophy and theology, but his favorite study was Latin poetry. The only de- feat of his Latin poems is a kind of monotonous facility. We mention of his works, Candidia, a poem (Modena, 1491, 4to)—Tunulius aureum carminum lib. ii (ibid. 1492, 4to)—Christianorum opusculorum lib. iii (ibid. 1496 or 1498, 4to)—Epigrammata in Christi vitam (Mi-

PITT, John, D.D., an English divine, noted as a biographer, was born at Alton, in Hampshire, A.D. 1560. He received his early education at Wintchester College, whence, at the age of eighteen, he was elected a prebendary fellow of New College, Oxford; but in less than two years he left the kingdom as a voluntary Roman exile, and went to Douai. He went thence to Rheims, and a year afterwards to the English college at Rome, where he studied seven years, and was then ordained priest. He returned to hold the professorship of rhetoric and Greek at Rheims. Towards the end of 1590 he was appointed governor to a young nobleman, with whom he travelled into Lorraine, and afterwards went through Upper Germany and Italy. He subse- quently returned to Lorraine, where he was preferred to a canonry in Verdon. When he had passed twenty years at his new residence, Antonia, daughter of the duke of Lorraine, who had married the duke of Cleves, invited him to Cleves to be her confessor. He continued in her service twelve years, till her death, when he returned a third time to Lorraine, and was promoted to the dean- ery of Livourne, where he died in 1616. The leisure he enjoyed while confessor to the duchess of Cleves enabled him to compile a work which has given him great rec- ommendation: The Lives of the Kings, Bishops, Apostolical Men, and Writers of England (four large volumes). The first contains the lives of fifteen kings, the second of the bishops, the third of the apostolical men, and the fourth of the writers. The three first are preserved in the archives of the collegiate church of Verdun; the fourth only was published after his decease, under the title of Ioannis Pistis Angli, S. Theologian Doctoris, Livorni in Lombardeo Die, with Novissima veterum tomorum Anglicae Tomus Primus (Paris, 1619 and 1629, 4to), but the running title by which it is most frequently quoted is De illustribus Angliae Scriptoribus. In this work Pitt took much from Bale's book, De Scriptoribus Mo-

PITY is usually defined to be the unsuitableness we feel at the unhappiness of others, prompting us to compassion- ate them with a desire for their relief. God is said to pity them that fear him, as a father pitteth his children (Ps. cxxii, 18). Pity is thus a Christian grace, to the practice of which we are exhorted by the apostle: "Love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous" (1 Pet. iii, 8).

The phrase παράξενος λόγος, nashim rachamamoth, rendered "pitiful words" in Pits's version (Lam. iv, 10), properly refers to the tenderness and affectionate love which is the distinguishing trait of the female character; and that such women should in the "sieve and the straitness" be driven to and adopt the terrible expedient of feeding upon their own children, as in this passage they are stated to have done, is an awful picture of the literal fulness of the threatenings of the Lord in the event of the disobedience of the house of Israel (Deut. xxvi, 57). The same terrible expedient was resorted to also in the last siege of Jerusalem, as it had formerly been at the siege of Samaria, in the reign of Ahab (2 Kings vi, 28, 29).

Pitiful is a word whose derivations have by modern usage been almost limited to the sense of mean, contemptible, or insignificant. In the Bible and Prayer-book the old and primary meaning of full of mercy, compassionate, or tender, is retained. The English Prayer-book gives us these examples: "... though we be tied and bound with the chain of our sins, yet let the pitifulness of thy great mercy loose us."—Occasional Piety. 6. Enthusiastically, "pitifully beholding the sorrows of our hearts," which petition in the Litany is thus altered in the American Prayer-book, "With pity beholding the sorrows of our hearts." In these, the original and better sense of the word is alone intended. In the Primer of King Edward VI there is this expression: "O pitiful Pope! and Healer both of body and soul, Christ Jesus!" And Latimer, in his sermon on the birth of Christ, remarks: "Preachers exhort us to godliness, to do good works, to be pitiful and liberal unto the poor;" that is, to be compassionate, tender-hearted, and sympathizing to them.

Pius I, pope and saint of Rome, was a native of Aquileia, and succeeded Hyginus. Pius I is supposed to have commenced his pontificate, or rather bishopric, about 152 or 158, and to have died in 157. The date of his reign, however, as given by other authorities, is from 127 to 140. He was succeeded by Anicetus, but if by Hyginus, as some think, then the latter date of reign is not the true one. At least the pope had been attributed to Pius I by Gratian, but they are generally considered apocryphal. Hermes, the author of the Shepherd, is reputed to have been the brother of this pontiff. Pius I is commemorated in the Western Church July 11. See A. C. 152, p. 59; Budge, p. 179; J. F. R., Pontif. Rom., i. 27; Jaffé, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, p. 8 and 920; Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire ecclésiastique (ed. 1732, fol.), p. 180 and 268; Fontanini, Historia Literaria Aquilea, lib. ii, cap. iii, p. 70. Pius II, pope of Rome (from 1458 to 1464), whose original name was Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini, was a great theologian, diplomatist, historian, orator, and in fact a pontiff universally accomplished. He is especially noted as the inspirer of a crusade against the Saracens. He was born at Corsignano, in Siena, Oct. 18, 1405. Early devoted to study, he soon became noted for his scholarship, and found no difficulty in securing within the Church all the honors and distinctions he might seek. In 1431 he went as secretary of cardinal Dominicus Capranica to the Council of Basle, that celebrated ecclesiastical assembly which assembled earnestly, though with little success, the reformation of the Church. Which Piccolomini wrote a history: Commentarius de Gestis Basil. Concilii, in two books—a very important work for the history of the Church of that period, which, because of its advocacy of Gallican principles, was put in the Index Librorum Prohibitorum. At that time Piccolomini was a strong advocate for the supremacy of the council, and its right to judge and depose even the pope, "who," he argued, "ought to be considered as the vicar of the Church rather than as the vicar of Christ." These tenets, however, were condemned by the Council of Florence IV, though they caused the council to assert its authority by suspending the pope from his dignity. Then began a long struggle, which terminated in an open schism, the council deposing Eugenius and electing Felix V. Piccolomini was appointed secretary of the new pope or antipope, and several by him as his successor to the emperor Frederick III, who was so pleased with the envoy that he prevailed upon him to give up his precarious situation and accept the place of imperial secretary. Frederick afterwards sent him on several missions, and loyally to the Holy Family. Piccolomini proved his gratitude to his imperial master, for he wrote several works in praise of his patron and in support of his imperial prerogative—De Origine et Autoritate Romani Imperii ad Fredericium III Imperatorem, Liber Una;—De Frederic, III, nobi...
Christian. In the year 1648 an armament intended against the Turks was directed to assemble at Ancona, and at Verona, with a number of powerful vessels. Matthias, king of Hungary, and Charles, duke of Burgundy, had promised to accompany the expedition. The Venetians also had promised the use of their fleet to forward the troops across the Adriatic into Albania. Pius II set off from Rome for Ancona, but on arriving there he found that the soldiers were in want of arms, clothes, and provisions; the foreign princes did not come; and instead of the Venetian fleet, only a few galleys made their appearance. The aged and disappointed pontiff fell sick, and was in a state of despair. He had now reached the extreme of his career, and beguiled himself as well as he could in the government of the Church. He was generally regarded, especially throughout Italy. He was succeeded by Paul II. Pius II, before his death, raised his native town, Consignano, to the rank of a bishop's see, and gave it the name of Pienza, by which it is now known. Pius assisted Ferdinand, king of Naples, in his war against the duke of Anjou, the pretender to that crown. At the same time he was obliged to make war in his own states against Sigismondo Malatesta, lord of Rimini and Pesaro, but Pius, who by the consent of the counsellors was in all of which undertakings he was successful. By a bull addressed to the universities of Paris and of Cologne, Pius condemned his own writings in defence of the Council of Basle, concluding with these words: "I believe what an old man, now say to you, and not what I wrote when I was a young man." Two of his letters are addressed to individuals; reject •'Enea Sylvius, and accept Pius II." In several of his letters to his friends also, and especially to Petro di Noceto, he expresses sorrow for his juvenile weaknesses, for he had once been too fond of the fair sex, and had even written accounts of some of his amorous adventures, and of those of other persons, which are found among his "Epistles." Some writers assert that •'Enea Sylvius had refused the priestly office until his forty-third year because of his fondness for the fair sex; and they quote his own confessions in proof. But whatever his previous life, as pontiff he was devoted to the Church, and sought the accomplishment of great things.

A vacancy having occurred in the archiepiscopate of Mentz, two candidates appeared for it—Adolph, count of Nassau, and Dietrich of Isenburg. The latter had the majority of votes, but Pius, who by the right of deciding in cases of contested elections, refused to confirm the choice of Dietrich unless he engaged not to assert the supremacy of a general council, not to covet of his own authority an imperial diet, and further, not to have the right to double the annates or first-fruits. Dietrich demurred to the first condition, and positively refused to accede to the last; and as proceedings were instituted against him in the apostolic court, he appealed to the next general council. Pius declared such appeals to be heretical, and excommunicated and deposed him, appointing Adolph of Nassau in his place. The emperor acknowledged Adolph, but Dietrich being supported by the count palatine and the elector of Bavaria, a war ensued, which, after much mischief, ended in the submission of Dietrich. Those who were opposed to him formed a party under Pius, imperial secretary, and especially his letter (Epistola 25) to the papal nuncio, John Carvalj, concerning the supremacy of the council, were inclined to think that change of station had, in him as it but too often does in men, produced a corresponding change of opinions.

As a scholar and a writer, Pius II is best known under the name of •'Enea Sylvius, the most important part of his career being passed before he was elected pope. He was one of the first historians of his age, a geographer, a scholar, a statesman, and a divine. He was also learned in all the arts, and subject to certain regulars who had lived many years in Germany; he repeatedly visited France, went to Great Britain and as far as Scotland, and to Hungary. His biographer Campanus, bishop of Arezzo, speaks at length of his peregrinations, and his diligence in informing himself of everything worth noticing in the countries which he visited. His principal works, besides those already mentioned, are: Cosmographia, not de Mundo Universo Historiurum, libri i (a second book treats especially of Europe and its contemporary history); —In Antoni Panormitii De Dictis et Factis Alphonnes Aragonum Regis, libris quatuor, Commentaria: —Epistola super Decades Pliani Blondi Friscorum, et inclinatione Imperii usque ad tempora Johannis XXIII., Pont. Max. (in 10 books) —Historia Gothic (published first at Leipsic in 1780) —A Treatise on the Education of Children, with Rules of Grammar and Rhetoric: —lastly, his numerous letters, which contain the rarest information. A collection of his works was published at Basle, •'Enea Sylvii Piccolomini Senex Opera qua extant (1551, fol.), but this edition does not include all. Domenico de Rosetti has published a catalogue of all his works and their various editions, and also of his biographers and commentators, Sede di Fereccio, et Operi de Pio II, o da lui intitolate (Trieste, 1810). Biographies of Pius II by Platina and Campanus are annexed to the Basle edition of his works, but a much more ample biography is found in the Commentaries of Pernalete, published (Frankfort, 1614). Pius Gobellinus, his secretary, but which has been written by himself or under his direction, Pii II, Pont. Max., Commentarii Hrumin Memorabilium qua Temporibus sui conspexit, libri xii., with a continuation by his intimate friend, James Ammanato, cardinal legate of the pope at Paris, who has been the private secretary of Pius and of his successor Piccolomini. Pius III, pope of Rome in 1503, whose original name was Francesco Tedeschini Piccolomini, was the child of pope Pius II's sister, and was born at Siena in 1439. He was made cardinal by pope Alexander VI., and succeeded him in 1503. His pontificate was of only a very short duration. Twenty-six days after his elevation he died, July 11 (q.v.), became his successor. See Panvinius, Vita Pii III. Pius IV, pope of Rome from 1560 to 1563, whose original name was Giovanni Angelo Medici or Medicini, was born at Milan, Italy, March 81, 1499. He was originally a student of law and devoted to the legal profession, but his brother won him over to the ecclesiastical ranks, and in 1549 he was made cardinal by pope Paul III. Pius IV was elected pope in April 1549 (q.v.) about the close of 1559, a very critical period in papal history, and was crowned Jan. 6, 1560. The most important act of his pontificate was, at Easter, 1561, the reassembling of the Council of Trent, which had been promulgated when Pius II was particularly interested upon checking the spread of heresy, which had taken root in several parts of Italy, besides the valleys of Piedmont, and especially in some districts of Calabria. The Spanish viceroy of Naples sent his troops, assisted by an inquisitor and a number of monks, to exterminate by fire and sword the heretics of Calabria. Emmanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy, after attacking with an armed force the Waldenses, who made a gallant resistance, agreed to allow them the exercise of their religion within their own districts, and, by a decree, which was also binding upon the Catholics and Protestants in France were more difficult to settle. Some of the French Catholic prelates, among others Monle, bishop of Valence, and the cardinal of Lorraine, recommended large concessions.

to be made to the Protestants with the hope of reconciling them to the Church, and queen Catharine di Medici wrote to the pope to that effect. The pope referred the matter to the council, and in the meantime Catharine published the edict of pacification, in January, 1563, which allowed the Protestants liberty of conscience and the right to perform their worship in country places, but not within walled towns. The prelates sent by France to the Council of Trent, and several councilors of the Parliament of Paris who were also ordered to attend in the name of the king, spoke loudly of the necessity of an immediate reform in the Church, and seemed disposed to render the bishops more independent of the see of Rome. The cardinal of Lorraine was of opinion that the mass and other offices should be performed in the vulgar or popular language of each country; but the Italian prelates, and Lainez, general of the Jesuits, supported the maintenance of the established forms of worship, as well as of the papal authority in all its existing plentitude. The discussions grew warm, and it was only in the following year, 1563, that the two parties came to an understanding. The council terminated its sittings in the middle of that year, and the pope confirmed its decrees by a bull. This was the principal event of the life of Pius IV. True, the Tridintel Council was not the most important that has ever met, but at all events it is the most important that has met in modern times. Its importance is comprised in two great groups of events. By one, dogmatic theology, after various fluctuations, settled itself from Protestant views forever, and the doctrine of justification as then established gave rise to the entire system of Roman Catholic dogmatism as maintained to this day. By the other the hierarchy became founded anew, theoretically by the decrees respecting ordination to the priesthood, practically by the resolutions on the subject of reform. The faithful were again subjected to an intolerant Church discipline, and in urgent cases to the sword of excommunication. As the pope held the exclusive right of interpreting the Tridintel decrees, it ever remains with him to prescribe the rules of faith and manners. All the threads of the restored discipline converged together in Rome. Such progress could only have been made by means of a community of sentiment and action with the leading Roman Catholic powers. In this union with the monarchies there lies one of the most important conditions for the whole subsequent development of Romanism, and were it for nothing else Pius IV would still be an important person in the history of the Church.

He was the first pope who has ever planned and suffered or caused the claim of the hierarchy to place itself in opposition to monarchical government. After the council Pius IV relaxed all energy, neglected religion, and drank too eagerly, and took an excessive delight in the splendor of his court, in sumptuous festivities, and in costly buildings. He evidently had done his work. He died in December, 1565. His disposition was generous, and he embellished Rome; but he was guilty of the common fault of nepotism. He made his nephew, Charles Borromeo, a cardinal, who afterwards became celebrated as an archbishop of Milan; and he instituted proceedings against the nephews of the late pope, cardinals Carlo Caraffa, and his brother the duke of Palliano, who were accused of various crimes, which were said to be proved against them, and both were excommunicated. But in the succeeding pontificate of Pius V, the proceedings being revised, the two brothers Caraffa were declared to have been unjustly condemned. PIUS IV, CREED OF. This document, which forms one of the authorized standards of the Church of Rome, was prepared by pope Pius IV immediately after the rising of the Council of Trent, and is understood to embody in substance the decisions of that Council. The creed bears date November, 1564, and was no sooner issued than it was immediately received throughout the Roman Church, and since that time it has continued to receive the acceptance of the laity, and is binding upon all clergymen, doctors, teachers, heads of universities, and of monastic institutions and military orders, and all reconciled converts. For this authoritative document, with the oath of promise appended, see Pius IV's Exercitationes.

Pius V, pope of Rome, succeeded Pius IV in 1566. His family name was Michele Ghislieri; he was born of low descent, Jan. 17, 1564, at Bosco, not far from Alessandria, in Piedmont, Italy. Early in life he entered the Dominican order, and devoted himself soul and body to the monkish piety which his order demanded. He sided with the strict party professing the old opinions, and especially distinguished himself by his zeal in support of the Inquisition, of which tribunal he, as pope, became one of the leading members. In 1570, when he attached himself to the French court, he rose with the ascendancy which it gained. Pope Paul IV spoke of friar Michele as an eminent servant of God, and much to be honored.

ing to the civil magistrates the repression of this abuse, he insisted upon the bishops acting both as magistrates and judges, and armed them with episcopal courts, and provided prisons for the punishment of offenders. Thus frequent collisions were occasioned between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, especially at Naples, where the pope was wont to visit. There also existed a spirit concerning the ecclesiastical inspectors and collectors sent by the pope to visit and demand accounts of all Church property throughout Italy. Pius proceeded on the principle asserted in the false decreals that the pope has the disposal of all the clerical benefices throughout the world. Hence he was wont to say: "If I die, let me be buried in Jerusalem, and the pope will give me to live all to death," and signified his approbation of Alva's sanguinary proceedings by sending him a consecrated hat and sword. Queen Elizabeth of England he put under ban, and Maximilian II he threatened with excommunication if he should grant toleration (religious) to the Protestants. Sure was of this, that this was a matter of simplicity, nobleness, personal strictness, devoted religiousness, and morose exclusiveness, of bitter hate and bloody persecution. Pius VI, pope of Rome, whose original name was Giovanni Angelo di Braschi, descended from a noble family, and was born at Cesena, Italy, Dec. 27, 1717. He made his reputation as a monsignor of his extreme Calvinism, devoted to important ecclesiastical dignities at an unusually early period. In 1744 he was made keeper of the papal exchequer, and in 1773 was honored with the cardinal's hat. In 1775, upon the death of pope Clement XIV, better known as Ganganelli, cardinal Braschi, who had then the reputation of being of a generous disposition, fond of learning and the arts, and had besides the advantages of a handsome person, a graceful demeanor, and easy and affable manners, was chosen successor to the vacant pontifical chair. In his previous office of treasurer he had managed the financial affairs of the country with prudence and disinterestedness. In the first five years of his pontificate he occupied himself largely with public improvements, and displayed the same care and independence. But in his political career pope Pius VI was rather unfortunate. Even at his elevation, feeling that he had not the qualifications of a politician, he predicted himself, to the conclavists, an unhappy termination of his reign. Conclavists in spirit, and determined upon the preservation of unity in the Church, he would frequently make concessions where stern opposition was most urgent; again, he caused the bishops to be% influence of the see of Rome. Pius VI, not willing to leave unemployed any conciliatory offices at his command, believed that his duty lay in a visit to the emperor, and accordingly he set out for Vienna in 1785, to settle matters by personal arrangement. The step was not without some risk. For several centuries Pius had never left Italy. Monti wrote a poem on the remarkable event, entitled II Pellegro Apostolico. At Vienna the pope was received with every honor; yet Pius failed to make any impression on the emperor, and the matter in discussion was referred to a ministry unfavorable to papal claims. It was the same struggle as that of France, Gallicanism against Ultramontanism, only this time the pope was himself inclined to be the peace-maker between the contending factions in the Church. Pius VI failed utterly in his mission, and returned to Rome disappointed and defeated, to be reproached for his good intentions, with having lowered the dignity of his office, and encouraged the Gallican tendencies in the Church at large. The troubles doubled upon the outbreak of the French Revolution, and rendered the remaining years of his pontificate gloomy and calamitous. In the early period of that fearful struggle Pius VI had solemnly condemned the abrupt changes made in France concerning the discipline and the property of the clergy, though in all secular matters he had the French ambassador as his interpreter. But in January, 1789, a complication arose of a most serious nature. A young man, Hugo Basseville, an agent of the French republican party, on his way to Naples, where he was to be secretary of embassy, stopped in the Eternal City, and made a foolish demonstration in the Corso, apparently to sound the opinions of the people. He appeared in a carriage with several tricolor flags, and distributed revolutionary tracts, vociferating something about liberty and against tyrants; but a mob collected; he was dragged out of his carriage, and mortally stabbed by the populace. The military arrived too late, and though some of the murderers were arrested and tried, the French government charged the papal authorities with having been a party to the crime. The result was that the breach widened, and that finally the pope joined the league of the sovereigns against France. In 1796, when Bonaparte invaded Northern Italy, he took possession of the legations, but at the same time offered to the pope conditions of peace. These, however, it was impossible for Pius to accept, and the papal troops withdrew from the French. The defeat of the French army followed, and after the possession of Ancona and Loreto, peace was established at Campo Formio in Oct., 1797. The conditions of peace were very onerous, and added vexation to vexation against the unfortunate pope, who, old and infirm, was unequal to the difficulties which crowded upon him. Heavy contributions were imposed by the French Directory, and Ferrara, Romagna, and the Bolognese were incorporated with the newly founded Cisalpine republic; the price of peace in fine, was the revocation of the papal edicts limiting the Jesuits in the Rom., and the excommunication of the French clergy. To make bad matters worse, some disorders in Rome between the French and Italians, in the course of which the French general Duhopt was shot, gave a pretext to the French Directory for the expedition of Berthier, who arrived in Rome on February 10, and occupied the Vatican. Pius VI, forsaken by most of the cardinals, who had escaped, remained in the Vatican. On the 15th a tree of liberty was raised in the Campo Vaccino, and Rome was formally declared a republic. Berthier afterwards sent an order to the pope that he must renounce his temporal sovereignty. Pius answered that he had received it from God and by the free election of men, and could not renounce it; that he was eighty years old, and his troubles could not be of long duration, but that he was determined to do nothing derogatory to his high office. Next came the comissary-general of the French army, who, after taking an inventory of all the valuables that still remained in the papal residence, ordered Pius to prepare to set out in two days. The pope said he could not oppose force, but protested against this new act of violence. On Feb. 20 Pius VI left the Vatican. His only visitors were the detachment of cavalry, took the road to Florence. He was lodged at first in a convent near Siena, and afterwards in the Carthusian convent near Florence, where he remained till the following year, when the French, having driven out of Tuscany the grand-duke Ferdinand, and being threatened by the Austro-Russians who were advancing to the Adige, ordered the pope to be transferred to France. He was taken to Grenoble, and afterwards to Valence, on the Rhone, where he died in August of the year (1799). Just before his death the Roman republic had ceased to exist, the French being driven out of Italy by the Austro-Russians, and Rome was occupied by Austrian and Neapolitan troops. In the year 1802, after the restoration of the papal government, the remains of Pius VI were transferred to Rome by leave of the first consul Bonaparte, at the request of his successor, Pius VII, and deposited with solemn pomp in the church of St. Peter. The bulls published by Pius VI are in Bullar. Romani, contin. summer. Pontif. Clem. med. XIIII. Clem. XTV. Pii VI constitutiones, etc., quas cod. Rom. Basile. (Rom., 1802, i. vii-x); const. contin. Pius VI greatly enlarged the museum of the Vatican, which he made one of the richest in Europe in works of sculpture, vases, precious marbles, and other remains of antiquity; and he caused a splendid set of engravings of the objects in this museum to be published, under the title of Museo Pio Clementino. He made additions to the church of St. Peter, and embellished Rome with new palaces, fountains, and other structures. His internal administration was liberal and mild, an unusual freedom of opinion and speech prevailing throughout Italy. He removed the papal creditors thither from other parts of Italy. Many foreigners came to settle in that capital, the fine arts were encouraged by the pope and several of the cardinals, and modern Rome was reviving the brilliant period of Leo X when the struggle with the French Directory darkened the scene. He was originally called Gregorio Barnabo Chiaromonti, being also of noble descent, and was born in 1749 at Corna. He first studied in the college of Ravenna, and subsequently entered the Order of Benedictines in 1788. He was appointed lecturer on philosophy, and afterwards on theology, to the novices of his order, first at Parma and then at Rome. Pius VI appointed him bishop of Imola, and in 1785 made him a cardinal and bishop of Imola. When Bonaparte took possession of the legations, and annexed them to the Cisalpine republic, cardinal Chiaromonti in a hansom exhorted his flock to submit to the new institutions, and to be faithful to the state of which they had become a part. This conduct is said to have gained the approval of Bonaparte. When the news of the death of Pius VI, in his exile at Valence, in August, 1799, came to Italy, the concile was summoned to assemble at Venice, then under the dominion of Austria, as Rome was in the state of a republic. It assembled ac- cordingly in the Benedictine convent of St. Giorgio Maggiore, in order to elect one of their number to the papal office, a dignity apparently not very enviable in those troubled times. The deliberations of the concile lasted several months, and at last, on March 14, 1800, cardinal Chiaromonti was chosen, and crowned For the security of the numerous members of it who were living in those very countries with which the emperor was then at war. He said that the head of the Church ought not to be a minister of conciliation, but a priest, and that the pope must take part in a war which has no religion for its object; that if some of his predecessors had not always abided by this rule, he at least should not follow their example. Napoleon, however, insisted, and an angry correspondence was carried on between the two courts for about two years on this subject of contention, the neutrality of the Papal States being all the while merely nominal, as the French troops marching from and to Naples crossed and recrossed it at their pleasure, and the French also kept a garrison at Ancona, the only port of the papal port of any importance. By degrees the French extended their posts all along the Adriatic coast, and garrisoned the various ports. Some time after a body of French troops, coming from Naples, passed through Rome, ostensibly to proceed to Leghorn; but they suddenly turned out of the main road and surprised, in the night the town of Civita Vecchia, of which they took military possession. In all these places they confiscated whatever English property they could find. The papal troops at Ancona, Civita Vecchia, and other places were ordered to place themselves under the direction of the French, and henceforward the pope was reduced to a mere negotiator. But on an intimacy from Bonaparte, who was above all things anxious that the matter should be promptly settled, the pope despatched to Paris cardinal Consalvi, who smoothed down all difficulties, and the concordat was signed at Paris, July 15, 1801, and was ratified by Pius at Rome, after some hesitation and consultation, on August 14th following. The principal stipulations of the concordat were: The pope was to retain his temporal rights, and the pope was to have juriswar which began soon after in Spain prevented Napolleon from occupying himself with the affairs of Rome, which remained in a state of uncertainty amid frequent clashing between the French military authorities and the Roman curia, the territory, impoverished as it was by the loss of its finest provinces, was obliged to pay the French troops which garrisoned the towns that still nominally belonged to the pope. All the disaffected and the turbulent, trusting to French protection, openly insulted the papal government. The pope removed himself to his palace on the Quirinal, with his Swiss guard at the gates, not wishing to expose himself to violence by venturing out. On May 17, 1809, Napoleon, who was then making war against Austria, issued a decree from Vienna, in which he resuscitated the guilt of his predecessors against Pope Charles-magne, and united the remainder of the Roman States to the French empire, leaving to the pope his palaces and an income of two millions of francs. On June 10, 1809, the pope issued a bull of excommunication against all the perpetrators and abettors of the invasion of Rome and of the territories of the Holy See. The bull was affixed to the gates of the principal churches of Rome and in other public places. The text of the bull is given by cardinal Paccia, in his Memorie Storiche, Appendix to pt. i, No. v. The French commander, Mollien, being instructed by the papal legate to pacify the people of Rome, who had shown unequivocal signs of attachment to their sovereign, thought it expedient to remove Pius from the capital. The Swiss guards made no resistance, having orders to that effect from the pope; and, protesting that he yielded to force, Pius took his litter under his arm, accompanied the general to the gate, where his carriage was ready, and drove off under an escort. He was taken first to Grenoble, in Daupine, from whence he was removed, by order of Napoleon, to Savona, in the Riviera of Genoa, where he remained until 1812. While Pius was at Savona, Napoleon convoked a council at Paris of the bishops of his empire; but he found that assembly less docile than he expected, and he dissolved it without reaching any conclusion. The great question was how to fill up the vacant sees, when the pope refused the canonical institution. The pope at the same time would not recognize Napoleon's divorce from his first wife Josephine.

In short, Napoleon found that unarmed priests were more difficult to conquer than the armies of one half of Europe (Thibaut, Le Consulat et l'Empire, ch. lxxvii; Bottia, Storia, pt. iii). The plan of Napoleon was to have the pope settled at Avignon, or some other town of his empire, as his subject and his pensionary, and to control himself the nomination not only of the bishops, but of the cardinals also, by which means he would have added to his already overbearing temporal power the incalculable support of a spiritual authority which extends over a great part of the world. The resistance of Pius disconnected his views. Napoleon at last imagined that by changing Pius to Fontainebleau he might succeed in overcoming his firmness. He therefore caused Pius to be removed with the greatest secrecy. He was brought to Fontainebleau in June, 1812, lodged in the imperial palace, and treated with marked respect.
Napoleon had set out on his Russian expedition. After his return from that disastrous campaign, in December, 1812, he went to see the pope, embraced him, and treated him with studied attention; he also allowed several cardinals who were at Paris to repair to Fontainebleau, and at last, chiefly through their persuasions, he prevented the pope to sign a new concordat, Jan. 25, 1813. It is not true, as some have stated, that Napoleon grasped at his opportunities when Pius, lifting his hand against him and struck him. Paccia (Memorie Storiche, pt. iii, ch. i) denies this on the authority of Pius himself, but thinks it very probable that Napoleon spoke to his prisoner in an authoritative and threatening tone. Napoleon hastened to publish the articles of the concordat, and to give them the force of laws of the empire; after which he granted access to the pope, to all cardinals, and others who chose to repair to Fontainebleau. Pius, who had scruples concerning some of the articles which he had signed, laid them before the cardinal de Bénédite, his chaplain. Several of the cardinals, especially the Italian Guerini, Pacci, Litta, and Di Pietro, stated that some of the articles were contrary to the canon law and the legitimate jurisdiction of the Roman see, and pregnant with the most serious evils to the Church, and they urged the necessity of a prompt correction. They quoted the example of Paschal II, who, in similar circumstances having ceded to the emperor Henry V the right of investiture, hastened to submit his conduct to the judgment of a council assembled in the Lateran, and the council revoked the privilege of investiture. Upon this Pius wrote to Napoleon, March 24, retracting his concessions, but proposing a new basis for a concordat: Napoleon, however, took no notice of the retractation, except to exile some of the cardinals who, he thought, had influenced it. Napoleon soon after set off for his army in Germany, and the affair with the pope remained in suspense. It was only after the defeat of the French armies and their expulsion from Germany that Napoleon proposed to restore to the pope the Papal States south of the Apennines, if the pope would agree to a concordat of concordats, and, in fact, engage not to interfere in any negotiations until he was restored to Rome.
On Jan. 22, 1814, an order came for the pope to leave Font-ainebleau the following day. None of the cardinals were allowed to accompany him. He set out, accompanied by an escort, and was taken to Italy. On arriving at the bridge on the river Nera, in the state of Frascati, he met the advanced posts of the Neapolitan troops under Murat, who was then making common cause with the allied powers against Napoleon. Murat had taken military occupation of the Roman state, but he offered to give up the state and fetters to the pope if he preferred stopping at Cesena, his native town, until the political horizon was cleared up. After the abdication of Napoleon and the peace of Paris, Pius made his entrance into Rome, May 24, 1814, in the midst of rejoicings and acclamations. His faithful Consalvi soon after resumed his office of secretary of state. By the articles of the congress of Vienna the whole of the Papal States were restored, including the legations, which were not, however, evacuated by the Austrian troops until after the fall of Murat, in 1815.
The second half of the life of Pius VII were spent in comparative tranquillity, though not in idleness.
He applied himself to adapt, as far as it was practicable, the civil institutions of his dominions to the great changes which had taken place in the social state.
By a "motu proprio" of the year 1816 he confirmed the suppression of all feudal imposts, privileges, monopolies, and jurisdictions; he abolished every kind of torture, including that called "corda," or "estrapade," which was formerly a frequent mode of punishment at Rome; he diminished the land-tax; retained the register of hypothèques," or mortgages, instituted by the French; laid down the basis of a new code of public administration, and in November of the following year he published a new code of civil procedure, in which he regulated the costs of judicial proceedings. He maintained the commercial courts established by the French, as well as the new system of police, enforced by newly appointed carabiniers, instead of the old "sibiri," who were ineffective and corrupt (Tournon, Études statistiques sur Rome, bk. iv, ch. vi). Unfortunately, however, the old system of secret proceedings in criminal matters was restored, as well as the law of the inquisition, under which the State, Pius, however, also made some important alterations in the form of proceeding of the inquisition, abolishing torture as well as the punishment of death for offences concerning religion. He did perhaps all that he could do as a pope, certainly more than any pope had done before him. Cardinal Consalvi took vigorous measures to extirpate the banditti of the Campagna; and in July, 1819, he ordered the town of Somuo, a nest of incorrigible robbers, to be razed to the ground. With regard to spiritual matters, Pius concluded a new concordat with France, Naples, Bavaria, and other states. He condemned by a bull the political notions of Carbonari, as well as other secret societies. In the month of July, 1825, the aged pontiff fell a fall in his apartments and broke his thigh. This accident brought on inflammation, and he died Aug. 20. He was succeeded by Leo XII. (q. v.). Thorwaldsen was commissioned to make his monument, which has been placed in St. Peter's, Pius IX., as one of the most prominent among the long series of popes for his exemplary conduct under adversity, his Christian virtues, and his general benevolence and charity. Free from nepotism, virtuous, modest, unassuming, and personally disinterested, he was a stanch, though temperate, defender of the rights of his see; and his mild bearing and unblemished character engaged on his side the sympathies of the whole Christian world, without distinction of community or sect, during the long struggle with his gigantic and ungenerous adversary. A selection of his bulls, breve, etc., are found in Roskoyan, Monum. Cath. pro independencia pont. eccle. Quinque eccles. (1847), ii. 1 sq. The Bullicium Romanum continuat contains in vol. xi and xii (Rom. 1846) all bulls and brevils till 1806. See Cohen, Praxis histor. sur Pie VII (Var. 1828); Simon, La vie pontificale de Pie VII. Pius VIII, pope of Rome, was born at Cingoli, in the province of Ancona, Italy, Nov. 20, 1761. His original name was Francesco Xavier Consigliani. He was the friend of Pius VII, and was by him created bishop of Montalto in 1800, and elevated to the cardinalate in 1816. He was generally regarded as the most learned canonist of the papal court. He was desired for successor of pope Leo XII. for long Pius VIII's short pontificate of one year and eight months (March 31, 1829 till Nov. 30, 1830) nothing remarkable occurred. He labored against indifferentism, Bible societies, Freemasonry, and all secret associations, and successfully labored for the establishment of a patriarchate at Constantinople, for the liberation of the persecuted Armenians. He endeavored to be especially commended for his humane efforts with Dom Pedro of Brazil to suppress the slave traffic and system. His bulls, canons, etc., are in Roskoyan, Monument. Cath. ii, 293-317. He was succeeded by pope Gregory XVI. See Artaud de Montrot, Hist. du Pape Pie VII (Par. 1843); Nodari, VitaPontifical Pii VII, VII, Leoni XII, et Pii VIII (Padua, 1840). (J. H. Pius IX, the last of the Roman pontiffs who held both temporal and spiritual rule. His original name was Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti. He was of noble parentage, though there are writers claiming him to be of Jewish descent, born at Sinigaglia, May 18, 1792. As a youth he was distinguished for a mild disposition and for his works of charity. While still a child he was saved from drowning by a poor contadino, who lived to see him seated on what the historian Macaulay calls "the most ancient and venerable throne of Europe." At the age of eighteen he went to Rome with the purpose of entering the body-guard of the reigning pontiff, Pius VII. An epileptic attack, however, prevented the attainment of his wishes, and he entered a religious seminary, where his gentleness and devotions proved the foundation of his future distinction.

While at Rome he lived under the protection of an uncle, an officer of the ecclesiastical establishment of the Vatican. In the troubled period which marked the closing days of Napoleon's reign, uncle and nephew removed to their estates at Sinigaglia. On a visit which pope Pius VII paid this place, Mastai was presented to his old family friend and cousin, and on his return to Rome, after his long captivity in France, the young ecclesiastic of Sinigaglia was called to the holy city. In the meantime his health had improved, and he was able to prosecute his studies uninterruptedly. By invitation of cardinal Odescalchi, he took part in a mission to his native province, and when he returned he was made deanon in 1818. He obtained a personal audience of the pontiff, and sought a dispensation which would allow him to be ordained without delay to the priesthood. The legend states that his holiness, laying his hands on the young aspirant, granted him the favors asked, together with the apostolic blessing, and thus forever cured him of his epilepsy. Secular writers less anxious to paint the miraculous manifestations in Pio Nonno's youthful days declare that he was a libertine, and that, stretched upon a bed of sickness, he repented of his sins, and, by a life of abstinence and purity, gradually recovered.

In 1819 Mastai received priest's orders, and first exercised the sacerdotal functions in the hospital of San Giovanni at Rome—an institution founded for the education of the poor. He was afterward sent to the United States, and when he returned was appointed to his ministerial duties, and became noted for his charitable works also. In 1823 a wider field opened to him. A canon of the cathedral of Santiago, in Chili, had come to Rome to request of the pope the appointment of an apostolic delegate to that country, and when monsignore Muli had been given this position, Mastai was selected to accompany him as auditor. Two years he spent in South America, and on his way home he also visited the North, and he is said to have been the only pope that ever saw America. Report will have it that he even visited a body of Freemasons in Philadelphia (see Princeton, Mass., March, 1878, p. 610). Nor need this surprise. "It is a fact," says Trollope, "which may be relied on, that—of course in the days before he became a priest, or had thought of ever becoming one—Pius IX had been a member of a lodge—or a veneduta, as the term was—of Carbonari." This was a secret society, originally of charcoal-burners (as the name signifies), who were opposed to the tyranny of the times. In the summer of 1825 Mastai was taken into the household of pope Leo XII. as domestic prelate. He became a favorite with the pontiff, and in December was made superintendent of the hospital of St. Michael, founded two centuries ago by Innocent X., and comprising at this time not only a hospital for the sick, but a retreat for the aged, a refuge for boys, a house for magdalens, a home for virtuous girls, and a school of arts and industries. When he assumed the presidency of this vast and complicated institution it was on the decline. He reorganized every department of the hospital, repaired its dilapidated revenues, extended the range of its charities, and in less than two years brought order out of the confusion—by the sacrifice of his own patrimony. He also preached much and obtained great distinction as a pulpit orator.

In 1829 Spoleto needed an archbishop. The political agitation was great throughout Italy. The approach of the disturbances which created the v hone manifest in a thousand ways. The ecclesiastics, in order to be all-powerful and sufficient for the struggle, needed more than ordinary experience. A policy of anxious, irritated, and, at the same time, irritating repression had proved a failure. Mastai Ferretti was young enough to avoid falling into this excess of zeal, and, as he had gained much political sagacity in his seminaria-religious mission across the sea, he was selected for the vacant archiepiscopal chair. He quickly perceived that he must abandon the old receipts of the prison and the executioner, and by a wise rule maintained perfect order in the midst of general disturbance. While all Italy was in arms, the little archbishopric of Spoleto remained peaceful. When suddenly 5000 insurgents came there to seek refuge from the pursuing Austrians, Mastai dealt boldly and judiciously with them that he induced them to lay down their arms and submit to authority; and when the civil authority of the city submitted to him the lists of these insurgents, he tossed them into the fire, instead of forwarding them to Rome. Gregory XVI and his court were displeased and indignant at such proceedings. Mastai was then summoned to Rome to give an account of his conduct; but he succeeded without much difficulty in persuading Gregory that if their enemies could be put down without punishents, which left a fresh store of hatred behind, it was all the better. Mastai's enemies said that his conduct towards the persecuted liberal party was not altogether straightforward and consistent, and that he even in those early days showed a certain tendency to run with the hare at the same time that he was hunting with the hounds. The archbishop certainly succeeded finally in obtaining the public recognition of his hold on the bishopric, when on Dec. 17, 1832, he was translated to the see of Imola—a very important promotion, because it is understood that this bishopric is a stepping-stone to the cardinalate. Mastai had not only proved his political sagacity, but his religious freedom and freedom of judgment gave a most dignified position to the archbishops of the churchmen of the diocese of Spoleto, as well as later to that of Imola. Particularly he was noted for his charity and readiness to aid all good works, both public and private. The disturbed times required such ecclesiastics. It gave authority to the sees and influence to the pontificate. How well the pope appreciated Mastai is made apparent in his selection, a short time after, as apostolic nuncio to Naples. He so ably discharged his mission that he was rewarded with the cardinalate by secret conclave in 1839, though he did not receive the purple before another. He was in comparatively a young man. There were many far his seniors in the college of cardinals. Certainly no one dreamed that the bestowal of the red hat upon Mastai Ferretti was likely to bring him the tira soon.

In 1846 Gregory XVI died. When the news from Rome came to the archbishop-cardinal of Imola, he delayed to celebrate first the obsequies of the dead pope. Apparently he was in no haste to get to Rome; yet those who were close observers and less friendly said that he had an eye to the papal throne from the moment of his elevation, and that he was prudently forebore ever after to identify himself with the court of Gregory. There were two parties in the conclave. Each of these sought in this new pontiff the representative of their ideas. The one party, confined to the Jesuits and headed by Lambruschini—himself an aspirant for the vacant chair—determined to maintain the papacy of medieval times; the other party, moderately liberal, made up of better men than the Jesuits, yet also devoted to the fabric of medieval times, but with some show of concession to modern ideas, were disposed to compromise on a moderate basis, and, for the nonce, a conscientious Bianchi, the Dominican who never doffed the dress of his order for the purple robe, though he accepted its honors and encroached the Austrian policy of the late pontificate. Outside of the conclave, however, there was a small but enthusiastic faction, called "Young Italy," resolved to have a liberal pope, and they fastened upon the young cardinal who had espoused the Italian cause and had been a liberal in his past history. No one outside of the conclave imagined, when, on the 14th of June, it convened, that the party at whose simple mention the "holy" men were accustomed to cross themselves would be successful. The only hope was in the popular enthusiasm, which ran so high that there was hope the roz popoli might possibly be turned into the roz Dei. On the very first vote Lambruschini received fifteen votes and Mastai thirteen. On the afternoon of the 16th Mastai received on the fourth ballot thirty-six votes—making of the fifty-two present, more than the necessary two thirds—when the assembly rose as one man to confirm the choice by unanimous acclamation. Young Italy had conquered against all the Jesuit machinations. But it was done so soon for as Mastai—how Pius IX.—was bestowing his benediction (Urbi et orbi) from the balcony of St. Peter's, an Austrian cardinal drove into the Piazza with smoking post-horses and a "veto" from Vienna. Various incidents in the reign of Pio Nono's predecessor had given rise to the widest agitation in diplomatic circles. In 1846 there occurred the rising in the Romagna, which, when suppressed, revived in a far more effective shape in the famous pamphlet, I Casi delle Romagna, which circulated as the testament of a new political gospel throughout the peninsula. Then there came the memorable visit of the czar Nicholas to Rome, and those interviews in which the pope had dared to protest to the dread autocrat against the treatment in which he subjected the Roman Church in Russia. The interest excited in the political world was very great, for, on the one hand, Pio Nono had assumed serious proportions, while, on the other, speculation was stimulated by the mystery surrounding this interview, at which only two witnesses had been present (cardinal Acton and Mr. Boutieviess, the Russian minister), and by the proceedings of the adjutant M. Rossi, a born subject of the pope—a fugitive professor from Bologna, and a notoriously compromised liberal—awovedly to obtain from the holy see its concurrence with the principles of free education, then advocated in France, and its compliance with the desire of the French government for the reduction within moderate limits of the establishments that had been opened in France, more or less clandestinely, by the Jesuits. All these circumstances had brought about a degree of agitation which was acknowledged by all who had not some political object in view. But Gregory XVI had lived in hourly dread of revolutionary upheaval, and in constant fear of absolute neglect by the European states. He had always kept in his drawer a document empowering the cardinals, on his demise, to proceed to immediate election, if they saw danger to the free action of the conclave. Such times needed a popular priest in the pontificate. But Mastai disappointed both his friends and his enemies—the former so sorely that they were weakened beyond the possibility of recovery; the latter, by his forming an alliance with them, that it bore the peculiar stamp of a union never dreamed could be executed, even if Lambruschini himself had been in the papal chair. Pio Nono proved an impulsive, good-natured man, but ignorant and superstitious, vain and impetuous, weak and obstinate, without a mind of his own or settled policy. His reforms were, in reality, of little value. The best of them —those devoid of any political significance—projects to regulate the finances, to reform the administration of justice, to introduce railways, to ameliorate the condition of the Campagna—brought about merely a temporary improvement. True the virtues were not long-lived in their results, and, besides, were a burlesque on liberalism. Thus in March, 1847, an edict of the press was published with the intention of removing some of the restrictions under which it had labored till then; but strong hints were given as to subjects which the government would allow to be discussed, and a censorship remained established in full force. The same year witnessed the institution of the Consulta, under the presidency of Gizzi. This seemed like concession to popular demands, but the whole thing was a farce; the members were chosen by the pope, and the functions of the council of the most limited nature. Its duty was to give an opinion when called upon, leaving it to the pope to act upon the proffered advice or to do otherwise. In 1848 appeared the famous statuto creating a high council and a chamber of deputies, as the triumph of constitutionalism. But the chambers were forbidden to propose any law on ecclesiastical or mixed affairs, and every measure had to be submitted to the pope in a secret consistory, with the absolute right of veto. When the national crusade was inaugurated in 1848, the government, in order to give the revolution a religious sanction, invited all the prelates of the diocese of Nice to take an oath on the house of Savoy—the grandfather of the present king of Italy—the pope went with the multitude. The Ultramontanes, of course, broke out against this manifest liberalization of the pontiff, but it only needed a little strategy on their part, and he was at their bidding. When his trusted adviser, count Rossellini, was assassinated at the door of the Council of State, Pius IX as rapidly retracted his steps as he had advanced, and now unreservedly gave himself over to those very Jesuits who had plotted the death of his minister, that the liberals might be charged with desperate motives. Accordingly, the pope, on the 29th of April, 1848—his ministry, who had counseled that the abandonment of the people “would most seriously compromise the temporal dominion of the holy see,” having left him—issued, in the form of an allocution addressed to the cardinals, that celebrated paper which put an end as once for ever to the ephemeral season of popularity and affection of his subjects in which he had basked. The first words of it declare the intentions of the Holy See “not to deviate from the institutions of our predecessors.” Then it goes on to state that evil-minded men and knaves had been at work, and had encouraged the Italians in their revolutionary aspirations, and had endeavored to make his conduct in this respect a means of stirring up schism in Germany. The paper finally warns all the Italians against any such designs or aspirations, enjoining them to remain docile subjects to their princes. This “allocation” fell like a bombshell in the midst of the liberal party. The dismay, the disappointment, the rage, were indescribable. Many had been led—some of the princes of Italy among the number—to compromise themselves in a way they would have been the last to think of if they had known that the pontiff was at the head of the liberal movement. This terrible announcement was made, too, when already the papal troops had passed the frontier of the States of the Church and joined the forces marching against the Austrians; so that these betrayed men were left to be treated by the Austrian soldiery as mere rebels and brigands. The king of Sardinia and the grand duke of Tuscany were equally placed in a most painful predicament by this sudden derogation of Pius IX. They acted, as is well known, differently in the difficulty. The king of Sardinia was faithful, with a spirit of resolution which he had put his hand. The great grand duke made haste to follow the lead of the pontiff, and cast in his lot with him and with the Austrians. Such vacillation could not be other than destructive. When the barbarians swept over the political allegory of Europe, the papal troops reached the Italian shores, Rome’s prince was the first to feel its severest touch. In France the citizen-king was forced to exile; in Rome the citizen-pope suffered a like fate, and with this begins from the Quirinal to Giesta terminates Pio Nono’s comedy of liberalism. The story of Pio Nono’s extraordinary career we cannot detail. Suffice it to say that Pio Nono’s exit from Rome was made with the aid of the Bavarian minister, and at Gaeta he was received with great honor by the king of Naples, who persuaded the pope to abandon his original intention of going to the Balearic Islands. He was now the joy of the reactionists all over the world who had looked so coldly upon his early efforts at reform, but gained, of course, the execrations of the liberals, whose cause he had abandoned. Rome, left without a prince, was a rajah running upon the defiantly tested against all its acts, and summoned the Catholic world to put it down. It was France which, having disgraced herself by the election of a Bonaparte as president, was condemned to finish her story of crime and humiliation by throttling the Roman republic and re- storing the temporal authority of the papacy. French troops landed at Civita Vecchia on the 25th of April, 1849, and besieged the capital, while the Austrians entered Italy from the north and the Spaniards from the south. The capital surrendered on the 1st of July; and pending the return of the pope—which did not take place until next year—the government was placed by a papal commission, a council of state, a council of finance, and provincial councils. The pope returned in April, 1850, surrounded by the bayonets of a French army, “to a capital torn and ravaged by bombardment, and drenched in the blood of his own subjects, slain for the crime of taking up and carrying on the government in which he had abdicated.” His first act was the perjury of destroying the constitution of chartered rights which he had guaranteed to his subjects. His second act was the granting of a mock amnesty, the exceptions to which were so framed as to put well-nigh the whole population under ban. The galled prisoners, which it had been his delight to empty at his first accession, filled up again as before. The Inquisition recommenced its sacred labors. Five hundred citizens were shot or de- capititated and thirty thousand proscribed. Tribunals were established which conspired and murdered without even open accusation. Speech was gagged, the press was muzzled, the Bible was prohibited. The stirring of resistance, provoked by excess of tyranny, was seized as the pretext of wanton barbarity; and the kindred crimes of broken hearts and broken lives that had encouraged the Italians in their revolutionary aspirations, and had endeavored to make his conduct in this respect a means of stirring up schism in Germany. The paper finally warns all the Italians against any such designs or aspirations, enjoining them to remain docile subjects to their princes. This “allocation” fell like a bombshell in the midst of the liberal party. The dismay, the disappointment, the rage, were indescribable. Many had been led—some of the princes of Italy among the number—to compromise themselves in a way they would have been the last to think of if they had known that the pontiff was at the head of the liberal movement. This terrible announcement was made, too, when already the papal troops had passed the frontier of the States of the Church and joined the forces marching against the Austrians; so that these betrayed men were left to be treated by the Austrian soldiery as mere rebels and brigands. The king of Sardinia and the grand duke of Tuscany were equally placed in a most painful predicament by this sudden derogation of Pius IX. They acted, as is well known, differently in the difficulty. The king of Sardinia was faithful, with a spirit of resolution which he had put his hand. The great grand duke made haste to follow the lead of the pontiff, and cast in his lot with him and with the Austrians. Such vacillation could not be other than destructive. When the barbarians swept over the political allegory of Europe, the papal troops reached the Italian shores, Rome’s prince was the first to feel its severest touch. In France the citizen-king was forced to exile; in Rome the citizen-pope suffered a like fate, and with this begins the Quirinal to Giesta terminates Pio Nono’s comedy of liberalism. The story of Pio Nono’s extraordinary career we cannot detail. Suffice it to say that Pio Nono’s exit from Rome was made with the aid of the Bavarian minister, and at Gaeta he was received with great honor by the king of Naples, who persuaded the pope to abandon his original intention of going to the Balearic Islands. He was now the joy of the reactionists all over the world who had looked so coldly upon his early efforts at reform, but gained, of course, the execrations of the liberals, whose cause he had abandoned. Rome, left without a prince, was a rajah running upon the defiantly tested against all its acts, and summoned the Catholic world to put it down. It was France which, having disgraced herself by the election of a Bonaparte as president, was condemned to finish her story of crime and humiliation by throttling the Roman republic and restoring the temporal authority of the papacy. French Paolo-fuori-le-mura there is a memorial of one of the proudest moments of Pio Nono’s life. An expensive and elegant memorial is that placed in 1871 over the well-known bronze statue of St. Peter. Those who desire the fullest details are referred to the pages of the Civiltà Cattolica.

In 1847 he began the reform of the great religious bodies. On June 17 he appointed a commission to inquire into the laxity of discipline in religious communities, and in the issue he so modified the constitutions of several as to make the period of probation more protracted, and to raise among all the standard of discipline and intellectual training. The missions of the Church were also strengthened, being carried forward in profusio infidelium, and great hierarchies, in lands formerly heathen or Protestant, were added to the vast clergy that owned “the Latin obedience.” Thus he provided by brief of 1850 for the ecclesiastical government of England, dividing that country into one metropolitan and twelve episcopal sees; and this was followed by a pastoral letter of cardinal Wiseman, on his appointment as archbishop of Westminster, exulting in the supposed triumph of his Church in the land which had been the home of the Reformation for three centuries. Then he created in this country a vast Roman Catholic hierarchy, by elevating to the cardinalate the archbishops of New York in 1865, and prepared the way for the establishment of the hierarchy in Scotland, which was effected in 1878. Finally, in 1854, without advice of a council, he ventured the utterance of a few dogmas—the immaculate conception (q.v.) of the Virgin Mary—and the audacious promulgation, in 1864, of the bull Quanta Curà, which, with its accompanying “Syllabus” of damnable errors, was simply an attack on free governments and civilization itself, and rivalled the spirit and times of Hildesbrand, the ecclesiastical absolutism of the 11th century. The consecration of these acts in the Vatican Council of 1870 by the decree of infallibility (q.v.) was the logical completion of the Roman system and of the pontificate of Pius IX. The disturbances which have grown out of these steps are detailed in Olio Catholicum, etc. One of the foulest blots on the pages of history regarding his reign is the forcible conversion of the Jew boy Mortara, and of a piece with this is the abject condition of the Hebrews at Rome, where the walls of the Ghetto were only removed with the establishment of the Italian power. The private life of the pope was marked by great simplicity of habits.

Più Societies The stormy years of 1848 and 1849 brought great hopes and great dangers to the Roman Catholic Church of Germany, especially the hope of entire emancipation from the State, and the danger of enslavement to the despotism of a liberalist absolutist to the Church. But its representatives knew how to steer skillfully between the Scylla and Charybdis. In November, 1848, the German bishops of the Romish body in Würzburg, to the chagrin of the other concerning the best means to proceed in this critical period. Unwavering faithfulness to the papacy was the first point settled; voluntary co-operation with the “political regeneration” of the fatherland, the second; thankful acceptance of the promise of unconditional freedom of conscience (in the fundamental rights of the Frankfurt Parliament), in order to accomplish the most complete independence of the Church and absolute control of national education, from the elementary to the high schools, the third. Shortly before this, however, an organization of far-reaching significance had been effected, in all the parishes, and prominently to co-operate, viz., the Più Society, a Roman Catholic counterpart of the Protestant Church Diet (q.v.). Soon after the revolutionary struggles of March, unions were formed at several places in Germany having for their object the protection and advancement of Roman Catholic interests. At the anniversary of the building of the cathedral at Cologne, in August, 1848, the members of several of these unions met together and resolved upon a general convocation, in October, 1848, at Mayence, where the first union of this kind was formed, under the name of Pius Society. Here all the single unions were formed into a great collective union under the name of “Catholic Union of Germany;” although in practice the shorter name of Pius Society has been preferred. To direct the business of the collective union, one of the single unions was chosen to hold the conference, which was called “Vorort.” The object of the union was “the obtaining and maintenance of the freedom of the Church and control of the same over the schools; national culture in the Roman Catholic spirit and practice of Christian living.” It sought, by the help of its episcopate and to the episcopate; pacific posture towards the State and towards every existing form of government, so far as the rights of the Church were not thereby prejudiced; and defensive, not aggressive, posture towards the non-Catholic confessions. This Virginius was chosen as patroness of the union, and every member bound himself to repeat a daily Paternoster and Ave Maria to further the objects of the union.” The first general assembly, which was held at Mayence in 1848, was represented by eighty-three different societies; and a letter received from the pope (Feb., 1849), in which he gave his approbation and blessing to this union, only strengthened the movement, and gave not only authority, but also the name. A second assembly was held at Breslau, where the papal letter was received, and where the assembly openly expressed it that “a united Catholic Germany was only possible with a Catholic Christianity.” Here a new society was also organized, the Vincentian Society, for missionary work at home. The third general assembly was held at Regensburg (October, 1849). Here, by the organization of the Vincentian Society, a paper was started, Katholischer Vereinsbote für das deutsche Reich, in the interest of all societies organized in the spirit of the Più societies. Every year new societies of like tendency and spirit were organized, till in the year 1863 the number was so great that the Pius societies and branch associations, were finally amalgamated into one, as all were only serving one purpose—the advancement of ultramontanism in Germany. Yet, in spite of all these efforts, the seventh general assembly, held at Vienna (Sept., 1858), was forced to admit that “the united Catholic Germany had not succeeded in attracting the masses, for only the same faces were present. The meeting at Cologne in 1854 became discordant, because the committee refused to give the Prussian government a guarantee of abstinence from political utterances and confession of opinions. The ninth general assembly, held at Salzburg in 1857, was a living “testimonium paupertatis,” which the Roman Catholic world exhibited to the union. Little was felt here of important men, deeds, and speeches. The cathedral capitular Himbioten of Mayence, the “real apostle of the times of glory,” the other concerning the fabulous stories of the Roman Catholicism in Germany, and expressed the confident hope, in regard to the forty new Protestant churches built by the Gustavus Adolphus Union, that these would shortly disappear again. "Harlequinades also were not wanting. Prof. Kreuzer, of Cologne, e. g., comforted those present in regard to the charge of ultramontanism with the proverb, 'There stands the ox at the mountain,' from which it follows incontestably that the oxen are the real Cismontanes, because they are not able to pass over the mountain; and as regards the papacy, it is evident that Christ himself, who called upon his Father on the cross, was a papist; indeed the best proof of the papal child is 'papa' already in the cradle; and other such comical things. As a change, it was also greatly lamented that two hundred and seven large and twelve hundred and thirty-four small journals were in the service of the Protestants of Germany, while, on the other hand, the Roman Catholics had only six large and eighty-one small ones.

The tenth general assembly was held at Cologne (September, 1858). All agreed that the results hitherto achieved were satisfactory. In general, the department of the wide field of Roman Catholic congregations in Protestant Germany was not so well attended as in the first conference after Christ, in consequence of the first secularization, when the soldiers cast lots for the garment of the Saviour, which he had worn the evening previous as a chasuble at the first celebration of the mass. Indeed, we can even go farther back than this: Mary, who made swaddling-clothes for the God Jesus, was the prophetic spirit of the union. After being despoiled with such trifles, but also bearing many important truths, especially concerning the study of history and the musical culture of the young, the meeting was closed by consecrating the pillar of Mary built at Cologne in honor of the immaculate conception. The eleventh annual conference, which was held at Freiburg in 1859, expressed the hope that soon all Germany will be brought back within the pale of the Roman Catholic Church; while the twelfth, held at Prague in 1860, lamented over the wounds which were inflicted upon the papacy in that same year. The thirteenth general meeting, held at Munich in 1861, exalted the virtues of the holy father, and declared the robbing of the pope's territory to be a robbery of God. The fourteenth, which was held at Traves in 1865, praised the encyclopaedia published in 1864 in the bull "Quanta cura" as the greatest deed of the 19th century; pronounced John Goerres (q.v.) as the greatest German, and the holy coat at Traves as the symbol of Catholic unity. In this tenor it went on: 'Half childish, half apocalyptic remained the character of the meetings, until the day at Bremen in 1872, when burning was in the language to rage, naivete to fanaticism, and the ostensible peace-policy to the ringing of the alarm-bell' (Kurtz).

The most prominent societies in connection with the original Pius societies are the Bonifacius unions for the support of the Needy Roman Catholic congregations in Protestant Germany (an imitation of the Gustavus Adolphus Union); the Charles Borromeo unions, to spread good Roman Catholic writings; the Vincentius and Elizabeth unions, for visiting the sick and taking care of the poor; the parishes (founded by Wilfrid) in 1846, for the spiritual and temporal assistance of the poor; and the unions of The Holy Childhood of Jesus, composed chiefly of children, who contribute monthly five pennies for the salvation of exposed headless children (especially in China), and daily pray an Ave Maria for them. These are the most prominent organizations in the service of the hierarchy, and are found all over the world. In the United States there is hardly a large town in which one or the other of these societies is not to be found. The tendency is the same. In 1856, some as late as 1866. His pontificate has the purpose of these organizations in the United States is to bring the state as much as possible under the influence and control of the hierarchy, and the political arena is the field of labor. Already they influence the legislatures, school-boards; yes, we may say they form a state within the state. The clergy commands a great ignorant mass, easily fanaticized, and ready to do anything in majorem Dei gloriam et honorum paupere infal- libilium. The doctrines of the Vatican are promulgated through numerous periodicals, and the utterances made at the annual gatherings of the different organizations are the expression of the most spiritual and emotional of these societies. Place, CONSERS, an English divine of some note, flourished in the first half of last century, very near the opening of that era. We know nothing of his personal history. He has left several valuable publications, among which we note, besides his Sermons (Lond. 1702, 4to, 1721, 8vo; 1706, 4to), Adversaria (1709).-Remarques, with Quercourt and Bolo, concerning A. P. Place, ENOCH, an American minister in the Free-will Baptist Church, was born in Rochester, N. H., July 18, 1786. He was converted in March, 1807, while engaged in teaching, and soon felt called of God to enter the work of the ministry. He preached his first sermon June 2, 1807, and was ordained Jan. 23, 1818. Forty-one years of his public life he passed in Strafford, N.H., laboring also much in adjoining towns. He had a thirst for knowledge, and from youth to manhood avoided himself of the means within his reach to acquire an education, though at denomination at that time was not in favor of a learned ministry. By personal effort he advanced until he became eminent among his own people and a leader in his town. His gifts and position eminently qualified him for usefulness both as a minister and citizen. He was called to fill high positions in his denomination, such as moderator of General Conference, trustee of printing establishment, member of mission boards, etc. As a preacher, he was earnest and warm. At times he would have such a sense of the sinner's condition and obligation to God that he would speak as one having authority. Occasionally he would rise to such a height in feeling and eloquence as to be almost overwhelming and irresistible. His personal appearance was commanding, his voice sonorous and rich. He was also eloquent and mighty in prayer. Mr. Place, with many other Free-will Baptists, early espoused the antislavery cause. Abundant in labors and rich in faith. Father Place, as he came to be called, died March 23, 1863. See Barrett, Mem. of Eminent Preachers, p. 86 sq.

Place (Placeus), Josué de la, a celebrated French Protestant divine, was born in Bretagne about the close of the 16th century: some put the date at 1556, some as late as 1566. His denomination is not perfectly known. until 1632, when he was called, with Amyraldus and Capellus, to a professorship of theology at Saumur. He died in 1655. An excellent teacher and a pious Christian, he yet offended greatly, and provoked much strife and controversy by his tendency to Armenian theology in his views on the doctrine of Imputation (q. v.). The theory of original sin, as consisting only in native corruption, was condemned by the French symod of 1645, though Placeus himself was not named. Strictly speaking, his theory was only a modification of Jean Camerons (q. v.), who had succeeded Gomaras (q. v.) at Saumur in 1618. Cameron himself taught, after Piscator, the imputation of Christs passive obedience alone; and advocated the theory of the hypothetic universalism of divine grace, which was more fully developed by Amyrast. "The peculiarity of Amyraldism," says Schweizer, "is in the combination of a real particularism with a merely ideal universalism." Placeus accepted the statement of the symon of 1645, by distinguishing between immediate and mediate imputation, and advocated the mediate, instead of the immediate imputation of Adams sin to his posterity. He was opposed by Anton Garissol (q. v.), professor in Montauban, and defended by Charles Drelicourt (q. v.), pastor at Charenton. His defence, Disputationes academicae, sub praefatio J. Placeri, de imputatione primi pecordi Adami, de argumentis quibus efficier, Christi prius fuisse, quousque in b U. V., was published at Montauban, 1649, and in an enlarged form the year of his death (1655), and since. His works (Opera) were published in collected form at Franco in 1659, and again in 1702. Placebo, an office in the Church of Rome, so called from its first word, has for its purpose the prayer for souls. It is the antithon (q. v.) at vespers in the office of the dead, as the dirge is at matins. See Procter, Book of Common Prayer; Elliott, Delegation of Romanism.

Placenta, Council of (Concilium Placentinum). Several important ecclesiastical privileges were granted there. The first of importance was convened March 1, 1095, and concluded March 5, by Pope Urban II. Two hundred bishops attended, with nearly 4000 other ecclesiastics and 30,000 laitymen. So innumerable were the claims of persons who flock to it that no church could be found in those parts capable of containing them, therefore the pope was compelled to hold the first and third sessions of this assembly in the open air. The emperor Praxedes in person made complaint against her husband the emperor Henry, who divorced her and treated her infamously. Ambassadors from the emperor of Constantinople were present, who demanded help against the infidels, with the approbation of the pope. Fifteen canons were published, by which the heresy of Berenger was again condemned, and the truth of the real presence of the Lord Jesus of Christ in the holy Eucharist clearly set forth. The sect of the New Nicolausans (who favored incontinence in the clergy) was also condemned. The orders conferred by Guibert, the antipope, and others who had been excommunicated, were declared null. The Ember fasts were also fixed. After this Urban went to France, and to the autumn of the same year held the celebrated Council of Clermont. See Labbé, Conciliorum, x, 500.

Another important council was held after Easter, 1182, by Innocent II, assisted by several bishops of Lombardy. It was forbidden to receive to penitence those who refused to renounce fornication, hatred, and every mortal sin. In this council the antipope Anacletus was excommunicated. See Labbé, Conciliis, x, 988.

Place, Bereghed. See Mazor.

Place (plac erium region, litera parcella seu ex- equator) is the sanction by a reigning prince to the promulgation and execution of an ecclesiastical ordinance. The place is necessitated as soon as ecclesiastical ordinances transgress the purely religious boundaries, and come in conflict with those of the state. As soon as the mutual boundaries had acquired a relative independence, which drew a line of demarcation between both the State and Church, the right of the place was established, and the first traces of it we find in the quarrels of Philip Le Bel of France with Boniface VIII (q. v.), and Louis of Bavaria with John XXII (q. v.). In the 15th century we find this right of assertment fully established in different countries. Thus Louis XI, in 1495, appointed a commission at Amiens to examine all persons coming from Rome whether they had any papal briefs upon them "et nones voire et visiter, pour savoir s'elles sont aucunement contraires ou prejudiciables a nous et a la dite eglise Gallicane. Et que nous trouviers aucunes qui y fussent contraires ou prejudiciables, prenez les et retenez par devers vous, et les porteurs arrezzes et constitues prisonniers, si vous voyez en dire ou en faire et en executer les mentions dictes lettres nous adversisses, ou les nous envoyz a toute diligence, pour y donner la provision necessaire" (comp. Preuves, Les Libertés de l'Eglise Gallicane, ch. x). Martin V (q. v.), in a letter to the archbishops of Portugal, complains, anno 1497, of Portugal: "Hicurur enim nobis, quod statuto regio mandatum est, ne quis audeat sine ipsius regis licentia sub pena mortis et perditionis bonorum in dicta regia litteras apostolicas publicare." When John II, king of Portugal, instigated by Innocent VIII, repealed the Placeo Regiae, in 1513, the pope declared himself resolute, and declared that without the consent of the states such a repeal was void (Augustini Manuelis, Hist. Joan. II). Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, decreed, Jan. 8, 1447: "Dat nimis et brevissime, oft exsequere eenehe goetheyckle monitien, inhabitien oft anderhebend, op eenige onderszetens des Landits van Brabant, wyt wat seaside dat het zy, by eerst home by onde Officier ende Weothouderen, ende geoe hem klaerlyck te kennen de seeke waeorom, ende verkrykte orlof ende consider. Den gne die dat dede, sal daer een verbarete hebben alle inne gederen, ende te dieien een syn lyf euen wegh te S. Peter ende S. Paula te Roomeen te doen." By 1594 the place was already regarded as a customary right. Doctrine, usage, and legislature, however, developed more fully the cases in which the place should be used, and thus in matters of conscience, according to a royal declaration of March 8, 1772, reissued Feb. 28, 1810, no place was required. In Austria the necessity of the place was emphasized as early as the 16th century. In addition to former ordinances, the decree of Leopold II, dated March 17th, 1778, declared that all bulls, briefs, and constitutions must have the sanction of the reigning prince before they can be promulgated and accepted. This ordinance also refers to all previous papal edicts, without exception, in such a manner that whenever use is made of an ancient bull the sanction is required, and even such bulls as were pronounced shall only be valid as long as new decrees of the state do not affect their validity." According to another decree, dated April 2 and 7, 1784, the place was also required for all instructions, orders, etc., given to preachers and priests, as to what churches should be visited, the duties of priests, and the distribution of the earnings known to them. The Austrian decree of 1791 was also adopted Jan. 30, 1880, for the province of the Upper Rhine. In Bavaria the same principles, which were still adhered to in the edict dated May 26, 1816, were already the same as in the edict dated April 8, 1770, that all ecclesiastical edicts are subject to the place, with the exception of summons issued by the ecclesiastical authorities, provided they only refer to the lower clergy, and are the natural issues of ordinances already sanctioned. These claims of the state had always been the subject of protest on the part of the Roman See. The bell "in com" domini" (q. v.) excommunicates all those with whom it resonates without the sanction of the government, appealing to privileges, liberties, and usages, Innocent X., in 1651, protested against it most decidedly: "Quod equidem audiri sine horrore animo non potest." "Never has such a privilege been granted either by a pope or a council, which must needs destroy the papal power. None, however, dare to refer to the privilege of a worldly prince, because it would be nothing else but a foolhardy arrogance to bind and lose the souls, which right the Lord Jesus Christ has granted to none else than to his vicar" (Rosa- vanov, Novum, 1.223). The work Augustinus without the sanction of the government, appealing to privileges, liberties, and usages, Innocent X., in 1651, protested against it most decidedly: "Quod equidem audiri sine horrore animo non potest." "Never has such a privilege been granted either by a pope or a council, which must needs destroy the papal power. None, however, dare to refer to the privilege of a worldly prince, because it would be nothing else but a foolhardy arrogance to bind and lose the souls, which right the Lord Jesus Christ has granted to none else than to his vicar." (Rosa- vanov, Novum, 1.223).

PLACEDUS. See PLACE, JOSÉ DE LA.

Placidus, St., a Christian martyr of the 6th century, was of pious parentage, and was born probably in 515. When only seven years old he was instructed by his father, the Roman patrician Tertullus, to the care of St. Benedict of Nursia. Placidus, thus religiously trained, grew up in the service of the Church, and in 541 became abbot of a newly founded monastery at Messina. In 546 he was killed, with his companions, by pirates. He is commemorated in the Church of Rome July 11. See Wetzeler u. Weite, Kirchen-Lexikon, vol. xii, 3.v.; Alzog: Kirchengesch. ii, 22.

PLAGUE is used in the A. V. as the rendering of five Hebrew words: 1. Deber, "pestilence," which properly means destruction, death (Exod. xiv, 14), and is hence applied to pestilence (as Lev. xxvi, 25; Deut. xxvii, 19; 2 Sam. xxiv, 18; 1 Kings viii, 87), and to a murmur among beasts (as Exod. iii, 9). The Sept. mostly has Σίσαρυς. 2. Maggoph, "pestilence," from the root תֵּ-poq, to "smite; hence a plague as actively considered, a pestilence sent from God (Exod. ix, 14; comp. Num. xiv, 87; xvii, 18; xxxv, 16, etc.). It is also used of slaughter in battle (1 Sam. iv, 17; 2 Sam. xvii, 9). 3. Mekkal, "pestilence," from the root תֵּ-poq, to "smite; properly the act of smiting; hence a bone, a stroke, and so it should be rendered, rather than the root (Lev. xxvi, 21; Num. xi, 33; Deut. xxviii, 59, 61; xxxix, 22; 1 Sam. iv, 8; Jer. xix, 8; xlix, 17; 1, 13). 4. Ne'ga, "pestilence," from תֵּ-poq, to "smite; hence the meaning is like that of the foregoing. But it is often used to mean a spot, mark, cut, upon the skin, from the common effects of a blow. This is its meaning throughout the 13th and 14th chapters of Leviticus, where it is rendered plague in the A. V. 5. Ne'geph, "pestilence," from תֵּ-poq, to "strike, as above; hence a plague, as a divine judgment (Exod. xii, 18, and often). See PLAGUES OF EGYPT. To these should be added the following Greek words, which are usually translated "plague" in the A. V.: μουρίς, properly a scourge or whip (Mark iii, 16; Acts xx, 20; 2 Tim. i, 22), a stroke, a wound, whether of natural or artificial infliction (Rev. iv, 8; xvii, 6; vii, 1, 6, 8; xvii, 9, 21; xviii, 4, 8; xxii, 19; xxi, 18). It is evident that not one of these words can be considered as designating its signification the plague. Whether the disease be mentioned must be judged from the sense of passages, not from the sense of words. The discrimination has already been pretty fully considered under the word PESTILENCE (q. v.).

In the following treatment of the term we use it in its strict medical application. In noticing the places in the Bible which might be supposed to refer to the plague, we must bear in mind that, unless some of its distinctive characteristics are mentioned, it is not safe to infer that this disease is intended. In the narrative of the Ten Plagues, none corresponding to the modern plague. The plague of boils has indeed some resemblance, and it might be urged that as in other cases known scourges were sent (their miraculous nature being shown by their opportune occurrence and their intense character), so in this case a disease of the country, if indeed the plague anciently prevailed in Egypt, might have been employed. Yet the ordinary plague would rather exceed in severity this affliction than the contrary, which seems fatal to this supposition. Those pestilences which were sent as special judgments, and were either supernaturally rapid in their effects, or in addition directed against particular culprits, are beyond the reach of human inquiry. But we also read of pestilences which, although sent as judgments, have the characteristics of modern epidemics, not being rapid beyond nature, nor directed against individuals. The remarkable healings in the Leviticus and Deuteronomy, pestilence is spoken of as one of the enduring judgments that were gradually to destroy the disobedient. This passage in Leviticus evidently refers to pestilence in besieged cities: "And I will bring a sword upon you, that shall avenge the quarrel of [my] covenant: and when ye are gathered together in your cities, I will send the pestilence among you; and ye shall be delivered into the hand of the enemy" (xxvi, 25). Famine in a besieged city would occasion pestilence. A special disease may be indicated in the parallel portion of Deuteronomy (xxviii, 21): "The Lord shall make the pestilence cleave unto thee, until he [or 'it'] have consumed thee from off the land whither thou goest to possess it." The word rendered 'pestilence' may, however, have a general signification, and comprise calamities mentioned afterwards, for there follows an enumeration of several other diseases and similar scourges (xxviii, 21, 22). The first disease here mentioned has been supposed to be the plague (Bunsen, Bibleleerk), It is to be remembered that "the botch of Egypt" is afterward spoken of (ver. 27), by which it is probable that ordinary boils are intended, which are especially severe in Egypt in the present day, and that later still "all the diseases of Egypt" are mentioned (ver. 69). It therefore seems unlikely that so grave a disease as the plague, if then known, should not be spoken of in either of these two passages. In neither place does it seem certain that the plague is specified, though in the one, if it were to be in the land, it would fasten upon the population of besieged cities, and in the other, if then known, it would probably be alluded to as a terrishing in his enumeration of notices in the prophets present the same difficulty; for they do not seem to afford sufficiently positive evidence that the plague was known in those times. With the prophets, as in the Pentateuch, we must suppose that the diseases threatened or prophesied as judgments must have been known, or at least called by the names used for those that were known. Two passages might seem to be explicit. In Amos we read, "I have sent among you the pestilence after the manner of Egypt: your young men have I slain with the sword, and have taken your horses out of your bowels, and have caused the voice of your cry to come up into your nostrils" (iv, 10). Here the reference is perhaps to the death of the first-born, for the same phrase, "after the manner of Egypt," is used by Isaiah (x, 24, 26), with a reference to the Exodus, and perhaps to the oppression preceding it; and an allusion to past history seems probable, as a comparison with the overthrow of the cities of the plain immediately follows (Amos iv, 11). The prophet Zechariah also speaks of a plague with which the Egyptians, if refusing to serve God, should be smitten (xiv; 18); but the name and the description which appears to apply to this scourge seem to show that it cannot be the plague (ver. 12). Heze- kiah's disease has been thought to have been the plague, and its fatal nature, as well as the mention of a boil, makes this not improbable. On the other hand, there is no mention of a pestilence among his people at the time, unless we regard the sudden destruction of Sennacherib's army (2 Kings xx, 1-11). Severe epidemics are the common accompaniments of dense crowding in cities and of famine; and we accordingly often find them mentioned in connection (Lev. xxv, 25; Jer. xxv, 8; Mic. vii, 4). But there is no better argument for believing that "pestilence" in these instances means the glandular plague, than the fact of its being at present a prevalent epidemic of the East. It is also remarkable that the Mosaic law, which contains such strict rules for the seclusion of lepers, should have allowed a disease to pass unnoticed, which is above all others the most deadly, and at the same time the most easily checked by sanitary regulations of the same kind. Michaelis endeavors to explain why the law contained no ordinances about the plague by arguing that, on account of the sudden appearance and brief duration of the disease, no permanent enactments could have been efficient in moderating its ravages, but only such preventive measures as varied according to the ever-varying circumstances of the origin and course of its visitations (Moae. Reck, iv, 250). The destruction of Sennacherib's army (2 Kings xix, 35) has also been ascribed to the plague. But—not to insist on the circumstance that this awfully sudden annihilation of 185,000 men is not ascribed to any disease, but to the agency of an angel (since such passages as 2 Sam. xxiv, 15, 16, weaken this objection, and even Josephus understood the cause to be a pestilence, Ant., x, 1, 5)—it is impossible that such a mortality could have been produced, in one night, by a disease which spread itself by contagion, like the Oriental plague; and the same remark applies, though in a less degree, to the three days' pestilence in the reign of David (2 Sam. xxiv, 18). There does not seem, therefore, to be any distinct notice of the plague in the Bible, and it is most probable that this can be accounted for by supposing either that no pestilence of antiquity in the East was as marked in character as the plague, or that the disease then frequently broke out there as an epidemic in crowded cities, instead of following a regular course. See Disease. The disease now called the plague, which has ravaged Egypt and neighboring countries in modern times, is supposed to have prevailed there in former ages. Hetho, the Egyptian historian, speaks of "a very great plague" in the reign of Semenpesis, the seventh king of the first dynasty, B.C. cir. 2275. The difficulty of determining the character of the pestilences of ancient and mediæval times, even when carefully described, has not led us not to conclude that every such mention refers to the plague, especially as the cholera has, since its modern appearance, been almost as severe a scourge to Egypt as the more famous disease, which, indeed, as an epidemic seems there to have been succeeded by it. Moreover, if we admit, as we must, that there have been ancient pestilences very nearly resembling the modern plague, we must still hesitate to pronounce any recorded pestilence to be of this class unless it be described with some distinguishing particulars. The plague in recent times has been known only by its name, and the kingdom of Persia. It has been asserted that Egypt is its cradle, but this does not seem to be corroborated by the later history of the disease. It is there both sporadic and epidemic; in the first form it has appeared almost annually, in the second at rarer intervals. As an epidemic it takes the character of a pestilence, sometimes of the greatest severity. Our subsequent remarks apply to it in this form. It is a much-vexed question whether it is ever endemic: that such is the case is favored by its rareness since sanitary measures have been enforced. Respecting the cause of the plague nothing is known. There cannot be the slightest doubt that it is propagated by absolute contact with, or a very near approach to, the bodies or clothes of persons infected; but we are entirely at a loss to know how it is generated aseparately. Extremes of temperature have a decided effect in putting a stop to it; but Dr. Brenchley has found that in the year 1761 the plague at Aleppo was mild, in 1762 it was severer, and in 1768 it was very fatal; and yet there was no appreciable difference in the respective seasons of these years. In Egypt, the plague comes on in six or seven months after the rains (see Matti, Trs. p. 199; Prosp. Alp., Rev. Alg., ii, 19). In Europe the plague disappeared during the winter. This was remarked in all the epidemics except that from 1668 to 1669, called the Great

PLAGUE

PLAGUE, on account of its long duration: but even in this instance it abated considerably during the winter. It was a common superstition that the plague abated on St. John's day. The plague when most severe usually appears first on the northern coast of Egypt, having perciuosly broken out in Turkey or North Africa west of the Mediterranean, and in the following year with riging risque of the skin, going much farther. Thus Mr. Lane has observed that the great plague of 1835 "was certainly introduced from Turkey" (Modern Egyptians, 5th ed., p. 3, note 1). It was first noticed at Alexandria, ascended to Cairo, and farther in the southern parts of Egypt, a few cases having occurred at Thebes and it afterwards spread over the whole of Egypt, though its ravages were not great in the southern parts" (ibid.). The mortality is often enormous, and Mr. Lane remarks of the plague just mentioned: "It destroyed not less than eighty thousand persons in Cairo, that is, one third of the population, and far more, I believe, than two hundred thousand in all Egypt" (ibid.). When this pestilence visited Egypt, in the summer of 1843, the deaths were not numerous, although, owing to the government's posting a sentry at each street in which it was suspected, the disease, to enforce quarantine, there was much concealment, and the number was not accurately known (Mrs. Poole, Englishwoman in Egypt, ii, 32-35). Although since then Egypt has been free from this scourge, Benghazî (Hespe- rides), in the pastoral of Tripoli, was almost depopulated in 1847-51. The most fatal, and at the same time the most general epidemic, was that which ravaged Asia, Africa, and the whole of Europe in the 14th century. It was called by the northern European nations "the Black Death," and by the Italians "la Mortigella Grande"—the great mortality. According to Dr. Hecker, not less than twenty-million millions perished by it in the short space of three years, from 1347 to 1350. Since the commencement of this century Europe has been free from the plague, with the exception of two or three instances. It occurred at Noja, in the kingdom of Naples, in 1813 and 1816; at the Lazzaretto of Venice in 1818; in Grei- fenberg, in Silesia, in 1819. It has not been seen in Great Britain since the great epidemic of 1665, which is stated to have carried off eight thousand in one week. Quarantine was first performed in one of the islands near Venice in 1495. Persons who had been cured of plague in the Lazzaretto on one of the adjoining islands were sent there, and all those with whom they had had intercourse, where they were detained forty days. This period was probably fixed upon account of some medicine supposed to be used by the Jewish chronicles of the last day of avert diseases, and that which separated them from chronic. Forty days constituted the philosophical month of alchemists. Theological, and even legal derivations have also been given. The forty days were divided into seven weeks, each of which was called a week or week, and was also called the "Saxon term" (Sächsische Frist), which also lasts forty days. Bills of health were probably first established in 1507, by a council of health established at Venice during a fatal plague. They were given in the case of those persons who had not been exposed to the disease, as now generally used until 1665. It is to these great measures that Europe is indebted for its present immunity from this terrible scourge; and it cannot be doubted that but for the colossal indifference of the Orientals (which proceeds from their fatalism, love of gain, and ignorance), the same measures would be adopted in the East with the same success (Hecker's Hist. of the Epidem- icon of the Middle Ages; Dr. Brown, art. Plague, in Cyclop. of Prac. Med.). See Pestilence.

The glandular plague, like the small-pox, is an erup- tive and systemic disease. The symptoms first appear in the glands, especially the regional, and in the disease with which we are acquainted. The eruption consists of buboes, carbuncles, and pustules. Buboes are inflamed and swollen glands; and the glands so affected are generally those of the groin, axilla, neck, and the paraolivary. More frequently there are two, three, or even four such tumors. They sometimes subsist of themselves; or, what is more common the case, they suppurate: and as this process seldom commences before the disease has taken a favorable turn, it is regarded as the cause, but more correctly as a sign, of approaching recovery. A carbuncle is an inflamma- tion of a gland or glandular system, often in the neighborhood of the skin, giving rise to pus-tules or vesicles upon it. It resembles a common boil, but differs from it in this important respect. The car- buncle becomes gangrenous throughout its whole exten- so, that when the eschar separates a large deep ulcer is left. Under the term pesteichum are included evanescence spots of various colors, often varying from pale blue to a deep purple, which give a marbled appearance to the skin. When such livid streaks occur in the face, they disfigure the countenance so much that a patient can hardly be recognised by his friends. The disease varies so considerably in its symptoms and course that it is impossible to give one description that will suit even the majority of cases. Sometimes the eruption does not appear at all, and even the general symptoms are not of such violence as to lead an ignorant person to suspect danger. The patient is suddenly attacked with a loss of strength, accentuated perspiration, weight in the head, oppression at the heart, and extreme dejection of spirits. Such cases sometimes terminate fatally within twenty-four hours, and occasionally on the second or third day. Generally, however, the disease is more prolonged, and which is soon followed by fever, giddiness, pain in the head, occasionally also by vomiting. Buboes and car- buncles in most cases make their appearance on the first day; and successive eruptions of them are not unusually observed during the course of the disease. There is a peculiar and characteristic muttering of the eye, which has been described by Dr. Russell as a muddiness and lustre strangely blended together. The fever remits every morning, and increases during the day and night. The vomiting then increases; the tumors become pain- ful; and the patient wanders, and is inclined to stupor. On the morning of the third day, in favorable cases, a sweat breaks out, which produces great relief, and sometimes even proves critical. The exacerbation on the fourth day is more severe than on the preceding ones, and continues intense until it is terminated by the sweat on the morning of the fifth day, which leaves the pa- tient weak, but in every respect relieved. After this the exacerbations become slighter and slighter; and the bu- boes, advancing favorably to suppuration, little or no fever remains after the beginning of the second week. In other cases, again, symptoms of the most alarming nature are met with, sometimes low and fluttering, external heat moderately feverish, or occasionally intense in irregular flushings. There is pain at the heart, burning pain at the pit of the stom- ach, and incessant restlessness. When to these symp- toms are joined faltering of the tongue or loss of speech, and the surface of the body becomes covered over with clammy sweats, death is inevitable, although it may still be at some distance. When the patient has been much weakened by the vomiting, diarrhoea, or hemorrhage, the third day proves fatal; but more com- monly the disease terminates on the second or third day, and sometimes later; but whether they advance towards suppuration or not, they seem to have no effect in hastening or retarding the termination of the disease. Lastly, in some cases, the eruption of bu-boes and carbuncles constitute the principal symptoms of the disease; and patients are so little indisposed that they are able to go about the streets, or attend to their usual avocations, if not prevented by the inflammation of inguinal tumors. The disease has never been successfully treated, except in isolated cases, and when the epidemic has seemed to have worn itself out. Deplorably and stimulants have been tried, as with cholera, and stimulants with far better results.

Plagues of Egypt (for the use of the Hebrew word, see Plague), the term usually applied to the series of divine visitations of wrath with which Jehovah punished the Egyptians, and especially their king, for their refusal to let Israel go. In considering the history of the Ten Plagues we have to notice the place where they occurred and the occasion on which they were sent, and to examine the narrative of each judgment, with a view to ascertain what it was and in what manner the Egyptians were punished by it, as well as to see if we can trace any general connection between the several judgments; and we shall thus be prepared to estimate their providential character, as well as to determine how far they were miraculous events, and how far natural or simulated. In this discussion we make use of the natural information which that derived from modern investigations. See Egypt; Moses.

1. The History of the Occurrences. - 1. The Place.

Although it is distinctly stated that the plagues prevailed in all Egypt, save, in the case of some, the Israelitish territory, the land of Goshen, yet the descriptions seem principally to apply to that part of Egypt which lay nearest to Goshen, and more especially to "the field of Zoan," or the tract about that city, since it seems almost certain that Pharaoh dwelt in the Delta, and that territory is especially indicated in Ex. lxxviii, 48. That the capital at this time was not more distant is evident from the time in which a message could be sent from Pharaoh to Moses on the occasion of the Exodus. The descriptions of the first and second plagues seem to refer to a land and to plains in streams and lakes, and so rather to the Lower than to the Upper Egypt. We must therefore look especially to Lower Egypt for our illustrations, while bearing in mind the evident prevalence of the plagues throughout the land.

2. The Occasion. - When that Pharaoh who seems to have been the first oppressor was dead, God sent Moses to deliver Israel, commanding him to gather the elders of his people together, and to tell them his commission. It is added, "And they shall hearken to thy voice: and thou shalt come, thou and the elders of Israel, unto the king of Egypt, and ye shall say unto him, The Lord, that great God of the Hebrews hath met with us: and now let us go, we beseech thee, three days' journey into the wilderness, that we may sacrifice to the Lord our God. And I am sure that the king of Egypt will not let you go, no, not by a mighty hand. And I will stretch out my hand and smite Egypt with all my wonders which I will do in the midst thereof: and after that he will let you go" (Exod. iii, 18-20). From what follows, that the Israelites should bow jewels and raiment, and "let not your garments be rent" (v. 22), it seems evident that they were to leave as if only for the purpose of sacrificing; but it will be seen that if they did so, Pharaoh, by his armed pursuit and overtaking them when they had encamped at the close of the third day's journey, released Moses from his engagement.

When Moses went to Pharaoh, Aaron went with him, because Moses, not judging himself to be eloquent, was difflent of speaking to Pharaoh. "And Moses said before the Lord, Behold, I am [am] of uncircumcised lips, and how shall Pharaoh hearken unto me? And the Lord said unto Moses, See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh: and Aaron thy brother shall be the prophet." (Exod. iv, 10-16). Moses seems herefore to understand that even when Moses speaks it is rather by Aaron than himself. It is perhaps worthy of note that in the tradition of the Exodus which Manetoth gives, the calamities preceding the event are said to have been caused by the king's consulting an Egyptian prophet; for this suggests a course which Pharaoh is likely to have adopted, rendering it probable that the magicians were sent for as the priests of the gods of the country, so that Moses was exalted by contrast with these vain objects of worship.

It has been asked, What period of time was occupied in the infliction of these successive plagues? In answer to this, some contend for a year; but they have no better reason for this than that it enables them to compare the plagues with certain natural phenomena occurring at fixed seasons of the year in Egypt. This has been done with considerable ingenuity, though not without some rather violent straining in particular cases; but without some better reason than this we should not feel justified in accepting a hypothesis which involves the general statements of the narrative. Each plague, according to the historian, lasted only for a short time; and unless we suppose an interval of several weeks between each, a few months or even weeks would afford sufficient time for the happening of the whole. We may now examine the narrative of each plague.

3. The Plagues themselves. - We here notice first a preliminary phenomenon of the same general character with the "plagues." When Moses and Aaron came before Pharaoh a miracle was required of them. Then Aaron's rod became a "serpent" (A.V.), or rather "a serpent (779). Its being changed into an animal reverenced by all the Egyptians, or by some of them, would have been an especial warning to Pharaoh. The Egyptian magicians called by the king produced what seemed to be the same wonder, yet Aaron's rod swallowed up the others (vii, 3-12). This passage, taken alone, would appear to indicate that the magicians succeeded in working wonders, but if it is compared with those others relating their opposition on the occasions of the second and third plagues, the general tone of the narrative seems more reasonable. In this case the expression "they also did in like manner with their enchantments" (ver. 11) is used, and it is repeated in the cases of their seeming success on the occasions of the first and third plagues (ver. 22) and the second (vii, 7), as well as when they failed on the occasion of the third plague (ver. 18). A comparison with other passages strengthens us in the inference that the magicians succeeded merely by juggling. Yet, even if they were able to produce any real effects by magic, a broad distinction should be drawn between the general and powerful miracles wrought by the hand of Moses and Aaron and their partial and weak imitations. See Magic.

(1.) The "Plague" of Blood. - When Pharaoh had refused to let the Israelites go, Moses was sent again, and, on the second refusal, was commanded to smite upon the waters of the river, and to turn them all into blood. The miracle was to be wrought when Pharaoh went forth in the morning to the river. Its general character is very remarkable, for not only was the water in the river, Nisibim, but all the water, even that in vessels, throughout the land of Egypt. The fish died, and the river stank. The Egyptians could not drink of it, and digged around it for water. This plague appears to have lasted seven days, for the account of it ends, "And seven days were fulfilled, after that Pharaoh smote the river. Then the river returned into its channel" (vii, 22). The nature of the plague immediately follow, as if the other had then ceased. Some difficulty has been occasioned by the mention that the Egyptians dug for water, but it is not stated that they so gained what they sought, although it may be conjured that only the water that was seen was smitten, in order that the nation should not be able to quench their thirst. It appears that the water, when filtered through the soil of the banks, regained its salubrity. This plague was doubly humiliating to the religion of the country, as the Nile was held sacred, as well as some kinds of its fish, not to speak of the crocodiles, which probably were destroyed. It may have been a marked reproof for the cruel edict that the Israelitish children should be drowned, and could scarcely have failed to strike guilty consciences as such, though Pharaoh does not seem to have been alarmed by it. He saw what was probably an imitation brought by the magicians, who accompanied him, as if he were engaged in some sacred rites, perhaps connected with the worship of the Nile. Events having some resemblance to this are mentioned by ancient writers; the most remarkable is related by Manetho, according to whom it was said that, in the reign of Nephrecheres, seventh king of the second dynasty, the Nile flowed mixed with honey for eleven days. Some of the historical notices of the earliest dynasties seem to be of very doubtful authenticity, and Manetho seems to treat this one as a fable, or perhaps as a tradition. Nephrecheres, it must be remarked, reigned a hundred years before the Exodus. Those who have endeavored to explain this plague by natural causes have referred to the changes of color to which the Nile is subject, the appearance of the Red sea, and the so-called rain and dew of the Middle Ages; the last two occasions by small fungi of very rapid growth. But such theories do not explain why the wonder happened at a time of year when the Nile is most clear, nor why it killed the fish and made the water unfit to be drunk. These are the silly weighty points, rather than the change into blood, which is the main point into the semblance of blood. The employment of natural means in effecting a miracle is equally seen in the passage of the Red sea; but the divine power is proved by the intensifying or extending that means, and the opportune occurrence of the result, and its fitness for a great moral purpose. See Nile.

(2.) The “Plague” of Frogs.—When seven days had passed after the smiting of the river, Pharaoh was threatened with another judgment; and, on his refusing to let the Israelites go, the second plague was sent. The river and all the open waters were covered with countless frogs, which not only covered the land, but filled the houses, even in their driest parts and vessels, for the ovens and kneading-troughs were spotted. The magicians again had a seeming success in their opposition; yet Pharaoh, whose very palaces were filled by the reptiles, entreated Moses to pray that they might be removed, promising to let the Israelites go; but, on the removal of the plague, again hardened his heart (Exod. vi, 1-15). This must have been an especially trying one to the Egyptians, as frogs were included among the sacred animals, probably not among those which were revered throughout Egypt, like the cat, but in the second class of local objects of worship, like the crocodile. The frog was sacred to the goddess Heket, who is represented with the head of this reptile. In hieroglyphics the frog signifies “very many,” “millions,” doubtless from its abundance. In the present day frogs abound in Egypt, and in the summer and autumn their loud and incessant croaking in all the waters of the country gives some idea of this place. They are useful for fishing; nor is there any record, excepting the Biblical one, of their having been injurious to the inhabitants. It must be added that the supposed cases of the same kind elsewhere, quoted from ancient authors, are of very doubtful authenticity. The species of reptile which was made the instrument of this infliction was probably the small frog of Egypt called by the natives dòbó, the Rana Moschi of Sextus (Reisen, ii, 245, 256 sq.). See Frogs.

(3.) The “Plague” of Lice.—The account of the third plague is not preceded by the mention of any warning to Pharaoh. We read that Aaron was commanded to stretch out his rod and smite the dust of the earth; a name, as the A. V. reads the word, “lice” in man and beast. The magicians again attempted opposition; but, failing, confessed that the wonder was of God (v. 16-19). There is much difficulty as to the animals meant by the term dòbó. The Masoretic punctuation in ver. 18, 14 is as dòbó, which would probably make it a collective noun with dòbò formatives; but the pointing of dòbò (ver. 19) and the more decided plural form dòbò also occur (ver. 18, 14; Ps. cv, 31), of which we once find the singular dòbò in Isaiah (li, 6). It is therefore reasonable to conjecture that the first form should be punctuated dòbò, as the defective writing of dòbò; and it should also be observed that the Samaritan has dòbò. The Sept. has avóripea, and the Vulg. scirphea, mosquitoes, mentioned by Herodotus (ii, 95) and Philo (De Vita Moses, i, 20, p. 97, ed. Mang.) as troublesome in Egypt. Josephus, however, makes the dòbò lice (Ant. ii, 14, 8), with which Bochart agrees (Herod. ii, 572 sq.). The exact form is doubtful, and perhaps the word is Egyptian. The narrative does not enable us to know whether it was the more probable of the two renderings, except, indeed, that if it be meant that exactly the same kind of animal attacked man and beast, mosquitoes would be the more likely translation. In this case the plague does not seem to be expressly directed against the pests of the Egyptians; if, however, it were of lice, it would have been most distressing to their priests, who were very cleanly, apparently, like the Moslems, a religious duty. In the present day both mosquitoes and lice are abundant in Egypt: the latter may be avoided, but there is no escape from the former, which are so distressing an annoyance that an increase of them would render life almost insupportable to beasts as well as men. It is therefore probable that some species of gnat or mosquito is meant. See Lice.

(4.) The “Plague” of Flies.—In the case of the fourth plague, as in that of the first, Moses was commanded to meet Pharaoh in the morning as he came forth to the water, and to threaten him with a judgment if he still refused to give the Israelites leave to go and worship. He was to be punished by dòbò, arbó, which the A. V. renders “swarms of flies,” “a swarm of flies,” or, in the margin, “an abomination”; in these passages, the creatures were to cover the people, and fill both the houses and the ground. Here, for the first time, we read that the land of Goshen, where the Israelites dwelt, was to be exempt from the plague. So terrible was it that Pharaoh granted permission for the Israelites to sacrifice in the land, which Moses refused to do, as the Egyptians would stone his people for sacrificing their “abomination.” Then Pharaoh gave them leave to sacrifice in the wilderness, provided they did not go far: but on the plague being removed broke his agreement (viii, 20-23). The proper meaning of dòbò is a question of extreme difficulty. The explanation of Josephus (Ant. ii, 14, 3), and almost all the Hebrew commentators, is that it means “a mixture,” and here designates a mixture of wild animals, in accordance with the derivation from the root dòbò, “he mixed.” Similarly, Jerome renders it omne genus mammalium, and Aquila οἰκίη ψεύδων. The Sept., however, and Philo (De Vita Moses, i, 28; ii, 10, 11, ed. Mang.) suppose it to be a dog-fly, κυνώγας. The second of these explanations seems to be a compromise between the first and the third. It is almost certain, from two passages (Exod. viii, 29, 81; Hebrew, 25, 27), that a single creature is intended. If so, what reason is there in favor of the PLAGUES

Sept. rendering? Oedmann (Verm. Sammelungen, ii, 150, ap. Gesen. Theolur. s. v.) proposes the blatta orientalis, a kind of beetle, instead of a dog-fly; but Gesenius objects that this creature devours things rather than stings men, whereas it is evident that the animal of this plague attacked or at least annoyed men, besides apparently injuring the land, where we read, "He sent the ʾāḇānīāh, which devoured them," must have been a creature of devouring habits, as is observed by Kalisch (Comment. on Exod. p. 188), who supports the theory that a beetle is intended. The Egyptian language might be hoped to give us a clue to the rendering of the Sept. and Philo. In hieroglyphics a fly is ʿaf, and a bee šehō, or šeb, šk and šk being interchangeable in different dialects; and in Coptic these two words are confounded in ʿafš, ʿafš, ʿahf, meaning ʿumān, ʿāpās, scarabaeus. We can therefore only judge from the description of the plague; and here Gesenius seems to have too hastily decided against the rendering "beetle," since the beetle sometimes attacks men. Yet modern experience does not bear out the idea that any kind of beetle is injurious to man in Egypt; but there is a kind of gadfly found in that country which sometimes stings men, though usually attacking beasts. The difficulty, however, in the way of the supposition that a stinging insect is meant is that all such flies are, like this one, plagues to beasts rather than men; and if we conjecture that a fly is intended, perhaps it is more reasonable to infer that it was the common fly, which in the present day is probably the most troublesome insect in Egypt. That this was a more severe plague than those preceding it appears from its effect on Pharaoh, rather than from the mention of the exception of the Israelites, for it can scarcely be supposed that the earlier plagues affected them. As we do not know what creature is here intended, we cannot tell where to look for any reference in this case in the Egyptian religion. Those who suppose it to have been a beetle might draw attention to the great reverence in which that insect was held among the sacred animals, and the consequent distress that the Egyptians would have felt at destroying it, even if they did so unintentionally. As already noticed, no insect is now so troublesome in Egypt as the common fly, and this is not the case with any kind of beetle, which fact, from our general conclusions, will be seen to favor the evidence for the former. In the hot season the flies not only attack the food and drink, but they torment the people by settling on their faces, and especially round their eyes, thus promoting ophthalmia. See FLY.

(5.) The "Plague of the Murrain of Beasts."—Pharaoh was next warned that, if he did not let the people go, he should see on the day following "a very grievous murrain," upon the horses, asses, camels, oxen, and sheep of Egypt, whereas those of the children of Israel should not die. This came to pass, and we read that "all the cattle of Egypt died: but of the cattle of the children of Israel died not one." Yet Pharaoh still continued obstinate (Exod. i. 17). It is to be observed that the expression "all the cattle" cannot be understood to be universal, but only general, for the narrative of the plague of hail shows that there were still at a later time some cattle left, and that the want of universal terms in Hebrew explains this seeming difficulty. The mention of camels is important, since it appears to favor our opinion that the Pharaoh of the Exodus was a foreigner, camels apparently not having been kept by the Egyptians of the time of the Pharaohs. This plague would have been a heavy punishment to the Egyptians, since it would have been upon their sacred animals of two of the kinds specified, the oxen and the sheep; but it would have been most felt in the destruction of the greatest part of their useful beasts. In modern times murrain is not an infrequent visitation in Egypt, and is supposed to be produced by the plague of sand flies, which are said to be the plague. The most severe murrain occurred in that country in 1842, which lasted nine months, during the latter half of that year and the spring of the following one, and was succeeded by the plague, as had been anticipated (Mrs. Poole, Englishwoman in Egypt, ii, 32; 1, 53, 114). "A very grievous murrain," forcibly reminding us of that which visited this same land in the days of Moses, is reported during the last three months"—the letter is dated Oct. 18, 1842—"and the already distressed peasants feel the calamity severely, or rather (I should say) the few who possess cattle. Among the rich men of the country the loss has been enormous. During our voyage up the Nile," in the July preceding, "we observed several dead cows and buffaloes lying in the river, as I mentioned in a former letter; and some friends who followed us, two months after, saw many on the banks; indeed up to this time great numbers of cattle are dying in every part of the country" (ibid. i, 114, 115). The similarity of the calamity in character is remarkably in contrast with its difference in duration: the miraculous murrain seems to have been as sudden and nearly as brief as the destruction of the first-born (though far less terrible), and to have therefore produced, on ceasing, less effect than other plagues upon Pharaoh, nothing remaining to be removed. See MURRAIN.

(6.) The "Plague of Boils."—The next judgment appears to have been preceded by no warning, except, indeed, the threatened destruction of the first-born. Yet, in Egypt, Pharaoh might no doubt have repented at the last moment. We read that Moses and Aaron were to take ashes of the furnace, and Moses was to "sprinkle it toward the heavens in the sight of Pharaoh." It was to become "small dust" throughout Egypt, and "be a boil breaking forth with blains upon man and upon beast." This accordingly came to pass. The magicians now once more seem to have attempted opposition, for it is related that they "could not stand before Moses because of the boil; for the boil was upon the magicians, and upon all the Egyptians." Pharaoh again became new, and the magicians were no longer able to withstand the murrain. Pharaoh still refused to let the Israelites go (Exod. xii. 8-12). This plague may be supposed to have been either an infliction of boils, or a pestilence like the plague of modern times, which is an extremely severe kind of typhus fever, accompanied by swellings. See PLAGUE. The former is, however, the more likely explanation, since, if the plague had been of the latter nature, it probably would have been less severe than the ordinary pestilence of Egypt has been in this 19th century, whereas with other plagues which can be illustrated, they torment the people by settling on their faces, and especially round their eyes, thus promoting ophthalmia. See FLY. tending to produce a permanent state of foul and wasting disease. One species of it which seized upon the legs and knees, and was regarded as incurable, was peculiar to Egypt, and was hence called "the botch of Egypt" (Deut. xxviii, 27, 35). In the case before us, this eruption had a tendency to break out into larger swellings (γήφυτος, from unused γήφω, to boil up, to swell), and became probably the disease called elephantiasis, a disease said to be peculiar to Egypt, or the black leprosy, a disease which also was known under the name of melamidia (Jahn, Arch. l. c. 181 sq.). It was something evidentially more severe and deadly than the endemic Nile-fever, or eruption which visits Egypt periodically about the time of the overflowing of the Nile, and with which some writers would identify it.

(7.) The "Plague" of Hail.—The account of the seventh plague is preceded by a warning, which Moses was commanded to deliver to Pharaoh, respecting the terrible nature of the plagues that were to ensue if he remained obstinate. First of all of the hail it is said, God has sent it here to us all the time I will cause it to rain a very grievous hail, such as hath not been in Egypt since the foundation thereof even until now. He was then told to collect his cattle and men into shelter, for everything hailed upon should die. Accordingly, such of Pharaoh's servants as "feared the Lord," and "stood before the people," did so. But the rest of the land, which was not called by Pharaoh, acknowledged his wickedness and that of his people, and the righteousness of God, and promised if the plague were withdrawn to let the Israelites go. Then Moses went forth from the city, and spread out his hands, and the plague ceased, when Pharaoh, supported by his servants, again broke his promise (Exod. ix, 34-35). The character of this and the following plagues must be carefully examined, as the warning seems to indicate an important turning-point. The ruin caused by the hail was evidently far greater than that effected by any of the earlier plagues; it destroyed men, which those others seem not to have done, and not only men, but beasts and the produce of the earth. In this case Moses, while addressing Pharaoh, openly warns his servants how to save something from the calamity. Pharaoh for the first time acknowledges his wickedness. We may imagine that in this event they were gathered together in great numbers, and that at this time he dwelt in a city. Hail is now extremely rare, but not unknown, in Egypt, and it is interesting that the narrative seems to imply that it sometimes falls there. Thunder-storms occur but, though very loud and accompanied by rain and wind, they rarely do serious injury. Those long residents in Egypt do not remember to have heard while there of a person struck by lightning, nor of any ruin excepting that of decayed buildings washed down by rains. On this account, this plague was specially terrible.

(8.) The "Plague" of Locusts.—Pharaoh was now threatened with a plague of locusts, to begin the next day, by which everything the hail had left was to be devoured. This was to exceed any like visitations that had happened in the time of the king's ancestors. At last Pharaoh's own servants, who had before supported him, remonstrated, for we read, "And Pharaoh's servants said unto him, How long shall this man be a snare unto us? let the men go, that they may serve the Lord their God: knowest thou not that Egypt is destitute?" They suggested a compromise with Moses, proposing that the men should be allowed to go with him to offer sacrifice to Jehovah in the wilderness, while retaining the females they made sure of the men's returning to their servitude. Then Pharaoh sent for Moses and Aaron, and offered to let the people go, but refused when they required that all should go, even with their flocks and herds. "And Moses stretched forth his rod over the land of Egypt, and the Lord brought an east wind upon the land all that day, and all [that] night; and when it was morning the east wind brought the locusts. And the locusts went up over all the land of Egypt, and rested in the borders of Egypt: very grievous were they; before them there were no such locusts as they, neither after them shall be such. For they covered the face of the whole earth, so that the land was darkened; and they did eat every herb of the land, and all that was grown in the trees which the hail had left: and there remained not any green thing in the trees, or in the herbs of the field, through all the land of Egypt." Then Pharaoh hastily sent for Moses and Aaron, and confessed his sin against God and the Israelites, and begged them to forgive him; "Now, therefore, forgive, I pray thee, my sin only this once, and entreat the Lord your God that he may take away from me this death only." Moses accordingly prayed. "And the Lord turned a mighty strong west wind, which took away the locusts, and cast them into the Red Sea; and the wind blew upon the sea, and the sea was dried up unto the very great part of it. And Egypt was overcometh from before the children of Israel. And the children of Israel went about the wilderness to the Red Sea, and the children of Israel came forth into the wilderness of Zin unto Kadesh. And there was no water for the congregation to drink: so they gathered together against Moses and against Aaron, saying, Give us water, that we may drink. And Moses and Aaron said unto them, Why thus? gather you water from the rock, and give us drink." The plague being removed, Pharaoh again would not let the people go (Ex. i, 20). This plague has not the unusual nature of the one that preceded it, but it even exceeds it in severity, and so occupies its place in the gradation of the more terrible judgments that form the later part of the series. It was then that the words from the book of Deuteronomy were fulfilled, which were spoken by Moses and stood by those who have been in Egypt in a part of the country where a flight of locusts has alighted. In this case the plague was greater than an ordinary visitation, since it extended over a far wider space, rather than that it was more intense because it was more extensive. They imagine any more complete destruction than that always caused by a swarm of locusts. So well did the people of Egypt know what these creatures effected, that when their coming was threatened Pharaoh's servants at once remonstrated. In the present day locusts suddenly appear in the cultivated land, coming from the desert in a column of great length. They fly rapidly across the country, darkening the air with their compact ranks, which are undisturbed by the constant attacks of kites, crows, and vultures, and making a strange whizzing sound like that of fire, or many distant wheels. Where they alight they devour every green thing, even stripping the trees of their leaves. Rewards are offered for their destruction, but no labor can seriously reduce their numbers. Soon they continue their course, and disappear gradually in a short time, leaving the place where they have been as empty of vegetation as if no vegetation had existed. The devastation of the effects of a flight of locusts is from Mr. Lane's manuscript notes. He writes of Nubia: "Locusts not infrequently commit dreadful havoc in this country. In my second voyage up the Nile, when before the village of Bistar, a little above Khartum, many locusts pitched upon the boat. They were beautifully variegated, yellow and blue. In the following night a south-westerly wind brought other locusts in immense swarms. Next morning the air was darkened by them, as by a heavy fall of snow; and the surface of the ground was thickly scattered over by those which had fallen and were unable to rise again. The ships were anchored upon, and within the boat, and alighted upon our persons. They were different from those of the preceding day, being of a bright yellow color, with two marks on the backs which made them dreadful. In four hours a field of young durrah [millers] was cropped to the ground. In another field of durrah more advanced only the tops were left. Nowhere was there space on the ground to set the foot without treading on many. A field of cotton-plants was quite stripped. Even the branches along the banks were made bare, and palm-trees were stripped of the fruit and leaves. Last night, we heard the crackling of the locusts (water-wheels), and the sighing of women driving the cows which turned them: to-day not one skylark was in motion, and the women were hurrying a little to avoid fainting, vainly attempting to frighten away the locusts. On the preceding day I saw, among the most beautiful kind of these creatures with a solution of thyme: on the next day some of the other locusts ate them almost entirely, pellucid and as if they were in a museum by reason that they had nearly finished their meal. On the third day they were less numerous, and gradually disappeared. Locusts are eaten by most of the Bedawin of Arabia, and by some of the Nabataeans. We ate a few, dressed in the most approved manner, baked, and fried them in butter. They had a flavor somewhat like that of the honeycomb and the mead tree, and they were preserved for them as a common article of provision by parboiling them in salt and water, and then drying them in the sun.

The parallel passages in the prophecy of Joel form a remarkable commentary on the description of the plague in Exodus, and a few must be here quoted, for they describe with wonderful exactness and vigor the devastations of a swarm of locusts: "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain: let all the inhabitants of the land tremble: for the day of the Lord is coming as destruction from the Almighty; a day of darkness and of gloominess, of the shadow of death upon the mountains: a great people and a strong; there hath not been ever the like, neither shall be any more after it, (even) to the years of many generations. A fire devoureth before them, and behind them a flame burneth: the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness; yea, and nothing shall escape them. The appearance of them is as the appearance of horses; and as horsesmen, so shall they run. Like the noise of chariots, and as the noise of horses, is the noise of their wheels: a quick rush of med upon mountains, and they leap, like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble, as a strong people set in battle array. . . . They shall run like mighty men; they shall climb the wall like men of war; and they shall march every one on his ways, and shall break the rest in pieces." The earth trembles before them; the heavens shall totter: "the sun and the moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining." It is a day which will be remembered with fear for years to come.

(9.) The "Plague of Darkness." After the plague of locusts we read at once of a fresh judgment: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Stretch out thine hand toward heaven, that there may be darkness over the land of Egypt, that [one] may feel darkness. And Moses stretched forth his hand toward heaven; and there was a thick darkness in all the land of Egypt three days: they saw not one another, neither rose any from his place for three days: but all the children of Israel had light in their dwellings." Pharaoh then gave the Israelites leave to go if only they left their cattle; but when Moses required that they should take these also, he again refused (Exod. xii. 21-29). The expression we have here has "not been its season." "Darkness" is caused by a cloud in the atmosphere. It is a term of Coptic, not of Hebrew, origin, and the cloud is thinly transparent, and in its southern limit it can be seen in the sky. The Israelites were thus protected from the destructive power of the plague as it spread over the land. They were not in the midst of darkness, but they were in the shadow of God's protection.

(10.) The Death of the First-born. Before the tenth plague Moses went to warn Pharaoh: "And Moses said, 'Thus saith the Lord, About midnight shall all the first-born in Egypt die, both the first-born of man and beast; and there shall be a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt, such as there was none like it, nor shall be like it any more." Pharaoh was then told that the first-born of the Israelites would die. The word "first-born" is used in the sense of "the eldest" or "the oldest," and it is applied to both human and animal beings. puts it wholly beyond comparison with any natural pseudience, even the severest recorded in history, whether of the peculiar Egyptian plague, or other like epidemics.
The Bible affords a parallel in the smiting of Semnach-eter's army, and still more closely in some of the punishing acts of God upon Egypt, but in each being somewhat like the great smiting of Egypt. It is well known that many ancient Egyptian customs are yet observed.
Among these one of the most prominent is the wailing for the dead by the women of the household, as well as those hired to mourn. It was thus in the great cholera of 1848 at Cairo. This pestilence, as we all know, frequently follows the course of rivers. Thus, on that occasion, it ascended the Nile, and showed itself in great strength at Buliâk, the port of Cairo, distant from the city about a mile and a half to the westward. For some days it did not traverse this space. Every evening at sunset it is the custom to go up to the terrace on the roof of the house. There, in that calm, still time, might be heard each night the wail of the women of Buliâk for their dead borne along in a great wave of sound a distance of two miles, the lamentation of a city stricken with pestilence. So, when the first-born were smitten, "there was a great cry in Egypt." See Exod. 12

The history of the ten plagues strictly ends with the defeat of the first-born. The pursuing of the passa-gers of the Red Sea through the waters of the Red Sea with the event last mentioned the recital of the wonders wrought in Egypt concludes, and the history of Israel as a separate people begins. See Exod. 12

1. Miraculous Nature of the Infestions.—In the shore account we have constantly kept in view the argument that the whole of the phenomena were not miraculous, and, while fully admitting all the illustration that the physical history of Egypt has afforded us, both in our own observation and the observation of others, we have found no reason for the naturalistic view in a single instance, while in many instances the illustrations from known phenomena have been so different as to bring out the miraculous element in the narrative with the greatest force, and in every case that element has been necessary, unless the narrative be deprived of its rights as historical evidence. Yet more, we have found that the theological and metaphysic explanation have been forced by their bias into a distortion and exaggeration of natural phenomena in their endeavor to find in them an explanation of the wonders recorded in the Bible. As miraculous the historian obviously intends us to regard them, and this is clearly borne of the "wonders" (םָרֶכְכָּרֶכְפָּקֵק) which God wrought in the land of Ham (Psa. 105, 27), as his miracles (םָרֶכְכָּרֶכְפָּקֵק) in Egypt (erv. 7), as his signs and prodigies (םָרֶכְכָּרֶכְפָּקֵק) which he sent into the midst of Egypt (xviii. 9), etc. It is only under this aspect that we can accept the narrative as historical.
It is true that many of them appear to have been of the same kind with phenomena natural to the country; but this cannot be said of all of them; and in the case of those of which it can be said, the presence of the supernatural is seen not only in the unparalleled degree to which the infliction reached, but still more in the complete command which was exercised by Moses as the agent of Jehovah over the coming and going of the veneration. The exemption of the Egyptians, whether from the general calamity is also clearly assigned to the miraculous. The only alternative, therefore, allowed to us is to reject the whole narrative as mythic, or to accept it as miraculous. The attempts made by Eichhorn and the older rationalists to give natural explanations of these plagues, only exhibit the deplorable expedients to which an unsound hypothesis may compel able men to resort. They were evidently nearly all miraculous in time of occurrence and degree rather than essentially, in accordance with the theory that God generally em-lows natural means in producing miraculous effects.
They seem to have been sent as a series of warnings, and the way in which each was something like the previous one may be an analogy to which we see an analogy in the warnings which the providential government of the world often puts before the sinner. The first plague corrupted the sweet water of the Nile and slew the fish. The second filled the land with frogs which were as thick as the whole country.
The third covered man and beast with vermin or other annoying insects. The fourth was of the same kind, and probably a yet severer judgment. With the fifth plague, the murrain of beasts, a loss of property began.
The sixth, the plague of boils, was worse than the earlier plagues that had afflected man and beast. The seventh plague, that of hail, exceeded those that went before it, since it destroyed everything in the field, man and beast and herb. The eighth plague was evidently still more grievous, since the devastation by locusts must have been far more than that by the hail, and since at that time no greater calamity of the kind could have happened than the destruction of all remaining vegetable food. The ninth plague we do not sufficiently understand to be sure that it exceeded this in actual injury, but it is clear from the text that it must have caused great terror. The last plague is the only one that was general in the destruction of human life, for the effects of the hail cannot have been comparable to those it produced, and it completes the climax, unless indeed it be held that the passage of the Red Sea, the first point of the ten wonders, was a wonder, rather than a separate miracle. In this case its magnitude, as publicly destroying the king and his whole army, might even surpass that of the tenth plague.

2. Their Historical Character.—These events, though supernatural, all find a foundation in the natural phenomena of Egypt, and stand in close connection with ordinary occurrences. Hence the rationalist Bohlen says that "Moses, in order to avoid the suspicion of self-deception, was at least obliged to express himself in the mildest manner possible; and his miserable knoblauchers, who were so well acquainted with Egypt, if he wished to make the commonly observed natural phenomena avail as miracles." To this remark Hengstenberg replies (Egypt and the Books of Moses, in English, Edinb. 1851):

"But it is perfectly clear that these occurrences, as they are related, notwithstanding their foundation in nature, always maintained their character as miracles, and consequently are sufficient to prove what is pretended to prove, and to accomplish what they did accomplish.
Indeed, the unanswerable force in which the common ob-naturalist of nature here manifest themselves, and especially their rapid succession, while at other times only a single one exhibits itself with unusual intensity—If we at the same time consider these events in connection with the changing cause of them, and also take into account the exemption of the land of Goshen—bring us to the limits of the miraculous; for the transition to the miraculous is reached through the ordinary in its highest graduation. But we are brought into the sphere of the miraculous itself, by the circumstance that these things are introduced and performed by Moses, that Moses, with his request, and a part of them at a time fixed upon by Pha-rus himself (Exod. viii. 8 sq.). Hence the connection with natural phenomena can be made to avail against the Pertateuch only when, going beyond the present narrative, we limit what it can be explained by the ordinary occurrences of Egypt, and establish the presumption that the remainder belongs to fiction. But this assumption wants all foundation. It is a purely speculative unnatural, in the Scriptures, no violent opposition to the natural, but rather unites in a friendly alliance with it.

This follows from the fact that the natural events also stand to God. The endeavor to isolate the miraclusus can only produce a naked naked. In a particular reason also for uniting the supernatural as closely as possible with the natural. The object to which all of these occurrences were directed, as the 8th and
v. 90, was to show that Jehovah is Lord in the midst of the land. Well-grounded proof of this could not have been produced by bringing suddenly upon Egypt's eo cession of strange terrors. From these it would only have taken Jehovah had received a momentary and external power over Egypt. On the contrary, if their annual return were placed under the control of the plagues, it would be appropriately shown that he was God in the midst of the land, and the doom of the false gods had been placed in his hands. He would go forth and they would be entirely driven out of the jurisdiction which was considered as belonging to them.

Some objectors have attempted to throw discredit upon the Mosaic narrative by remarking that no traces of any allusion to these plagues of the Egyptians are discoverable upon the monuments of that country. To this the reply is easy. The monuments in question were reared under the superintendence of the heathen priesthood, and miracles such as these were too humbling to the pride, and too destructive of their influence with the people, to render it likely that they would allow them to be recorded in any manner. Victories, triumphs, religious processions, and whatever was calculated to exalt the gods and kings in the minds of the people, were the only subjects permitted to be sculptured upon the walls of the temples; and the usages or domestic life furnish the subjects of the paintings of the tombs. In the examination we have made it will have been seen that the Biblical narrative has been illustrated by reference to the phenomena of Egypt and the manner of destroying the Pharaoh's enemies, and that, throughout, its accuracy in minute particulars has been remarkably shown, to a degree that is sufficient of itself to prove its historical truth. This in a narrative of wonders is of no small importance. See Moses.

3. The Egyptian Counterfeits.—Of the deeds performed by Moses some were imitated by the magicians of the Pharaoh. To account for this, various hypotheses have been resorted to. It has been supposed that they were enabled to do this by diabolic aid. But this assumes the position that men can enter into agreement or compact with evil spirits so as to receive their aid—a position which has never been proved, and consequently cannot be legitimately assumed to explain an actual phenomenon. This hypothesis assumes also that evil spirits can work miracles, a position no less gratuitous and improbable. It has been maintained that the magicians were instruments in the hands of God to do what they did; that they were instruments in his hand, as was the witch who raised Samuel, and were therefore as much surprised at their own success as she was; and that God thus employed them probably to show in the manner of the great master that the power at work was his and that it was just as he gave the power or withheld it that the miracle was performed. For this hypothesis there is much to be said. At the same time it is open to objection for—(1) While Moses distinctly asserts that it was by divine power that he and Aaron wrought, he nowhere says that in the most distant way, that it was by this that the magicians succeeded in their attempts; and (2) It is expressly said, on the contrary, that what they did they did by means of their enchantments.

The word here used (σαμαίας) means a secret art—hence magical arts, enchantments; and may be properly used to designate the covert tricks or juggl ing artifices by which practitioners of legendarium im posed upon others. This leads us to the second hypothesis which is that the achievements of the magicians were merely clever tricks by which they imposed upon the people, and tended to confirm the Pharaoh in his obduracy. This hypothesis has in its favor the fact that the term by which the Egyptians of the language generally have always, down to our own day, possessed an unparalleled and almost incredible dexterity in artificial magic (see Lane, Modern Egyptians, p. 352 sq.). It is to be borne in mind, also, that in the cases before us these magicians were directed to prepare themselves, and to go through those introductory processes by means of which jugglers mainly succeed in deceiving the beholders; and, moreover, it is important to keep in view that they performed before witnesses who were interested in believing in their success. Above all, in the three feats in which they succeeded, there was really nothing but what the judges of the present day could easily do. The jugglers of India will, for a few pence, do tricks with serpents far more wonderful than making them rigid so as to resemble staves; and any juggler could make water in a basin or a tank resemble blood, or, when he was already sweating, could cover some place that had been cleared for the purpose with these reptiles, as if he had suddenly produced them. The performances of these magicians are really below par as compared with those which may be witnessed in the room of any travelling conjurer among ourselves. Let it be noted, also, that had the Pharaoh seen how readily as well as required to perform the miracle on the instant, as in the case of the plague of lice, for their attempts to imitate which no time was allowed; and as a consequence of this it is emphatically said, "they could not." When to all this it is added that they were impotent not only to remove the infliction, but even to exempt themselves from it, there seems abundant reason for concluding that these magicians attained to nothing beyond the performance of a few successful tricks (Scott, Congregational Lecture, p. 210—226; Wardlaw, On Miracles, p. 521 sq.). See Jannes and Jambres.

4. The Design of these Injunctions.—This is a most important inquiry. That their ultimate object was the effecting of the liberation of the Israelites from their cruel bondage and on the surface of the narrative that with this there may have been, and probably were, other ends contemplated. We may suppose—1. That God designed to produce an effect on the mind of Moses himself, tending to educate and discipline him for the great work on which he was about to enter—the conduct and rule of the people during their passage through the wilderness. For such a task great fortitude and implicit confidence in the power and majesty of Jehovah were required; and as Moses, timid at first, and ready to retire on the first rebuff, gradually acquired courage and determination as the manifestations of God's power in the chastisements inflicted on the Pharaoh and his land proceeded, it is very probable that the series of injunctions of which he was the instrument were designed to confirm him in faith, obedience, and confidence, and so fit him for his great work. 2. We may suppose that a salutary effect was intended to be produced on the minds of the Israelites, the mass of whom had, under their long protracted debauch, sunk low in religious and intellectual life. The marvellous manner in which God interposed for their deliverance, and the manner and the power by which it was brought forth, could not but arouse them to thought, and elevate and quicken their religious emotions. 3. It appears that a salutary religious effect was produced on many of the Egyptians themselves, as is evidenced by the multitude who united themselves to the Israelites when they made their escape; and also on the surrounding nations, as is attested by Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses (Exod. xviii, 10, 11). We may presume, therefore, that this also was part of the design of these injunctions, especially as we find God expressly declaring to Moses that these judgments were intended to make the Egyptians know that he was God (vii, 5).

We may suppose—1. That God designed to produce an effect on the mind of Moses himself, tending to educate and discipline him for the great work on which he was about to enter—the conduct and rule of the people during their passage through the wilderness. For such a task great fortitude and implicit confidence in the power and majesty of Jehovah were required; and as Moses, timid at first, and ready to retire on the first rebuff, gradually acquired courage and determination as the manifestations of God's power in the chastisements inflicted on the Pharaoh and his land proceeded, it is very probable that the series of injunctions of which he was the instrument were designed to confirm him in faith, obedience, and confidence, and so fit him for his great work. 2. We may suppose that a salutary effect was intended to be produced on the minds of the Israelites, the mass of whom had, under their long protracted debauch, sunk low in religious and intellectual life. The marvellous manner in which God interposed for their deliverance, and the manner and the power by which it was brought forth, could not but arouse them to thought, and elevate and quicken their religious emotions. 3. It appears that a salutary religious effect was produced on many of the Egyptians themselves, as is evidenced by the multitude who united themselves to the Israelites when they made their escape; and also on the surrounding nations, as is attested by Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses (Exod. xviii, 10, 11). We may presume, therefore, that this also was part of the design of these injunctions, especially as we find God expressly declaring to Moses that these judgments were intended to make the Egyptians know that he was God (vii, 5).

4. But these ends were included in the great end of demonstrating the vanity of those idols in which the Egyptians trusted. "Against all the gods of Egypt," said the Lord to Moses, "I will make you to be hated generally: I am Jehovah" (xii, 12). On these ideals God would pour contempt; and in connection with this it is noticeable that nearly every miracle performed by Moses had relation to some object of idolatrous worship peculiar to Egypt, as among the Egyptians was the serpent by which the serpent into which the rod of Moses had been turned was directed against the serpent-worship of Egypt; the turning of the water into blood was an assault on their sacred river the Nile; the plague of the frogs, the gnats, the flies or scarrabai, all tended to bring objects of idolatrous worship among the Egyptians into contempt; the murrain on the cattle was directed against their Apis-worship; the plague of boils, brought on by the casting of ashes from the altar into the air, a rite which they followed to arrest evil, showed how God could make use of a rite supposed to be so good for good to turn to evil; the hail and storm plague was directed against their worship of the elements, or of deities supposed to preside over them; the plague of lice showed that this great scourge which they were wont to trace to the wrath of their deities was entirely in the power of Jehovah; the plague of darkness poured contempt on their worship of the sun-god; and the death of the first-born wound up this terrible series by showing that in the hand of Jehovah alone was the life of all his creatures. A mighty and memorable lesson was thus read out before both Egyptians and Israelites, which could not but have its effect in weakening among the former the attachment of many to their idols, and confirming the latter in their reverence for Jehovah as the only true God. 5. The gradual increase in severity and frequency of the plagues are perhaps the best key to their meaning as to the king of Egypt himself. They seem to have been sent as warnings to the oppressor, to afford him a means of seeing God's will and an opportunity of repenting before Egypt was ruined. It is true that the hardening of Pharaoh's heart is a mystery which St. Paul leaves unexplained, answering the objector, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?" (Rom. ix. 20). Yet the apostle is arguing that we have no right to question God's righteousness for not having mercy on all, and speaks of his long-suffering towards the wicked. The lesson that Pharaoh's career teaches us seems to be that there are men whom the most signal judgments do not affect so as to cause any lasting repentance. In this respect the after-history of the Jewish people is a commentary upon that of their oppressor. The "hardening" of Pharaoh's heart was evidently nothing more than that permissive act of providence by which a long-delayed punishment encourages to the persistence in sin (Eccles. viii. 11; Rom. ii. 5). God's design in so often releasing him (Exod. xii. 17) from the earlier stages of the afflictions was that the final blow might come with full effect, both to Pharaoh and the world at large. Plaifere (or Playfere), John, D.D., an English divine of some note, flourished near the close of the 16th and the opening of the 17th century. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and was for some time fellow of his alma mater. About 1580 he was made Master of the Grammar School at Cambridge. He died in 1608. He was an Arminian in theology, and his writings circulated extensively and had great renown. Thomas Baker, the antiquary, says that if Plaifer's sermons had never been printed, his name would yet have been honored in history, so decidedly marked was his influence on his time. Among his works we mention Apello Evangelicum for the True Doctrine of Divine Predestination, etc. (Lond. 1652, 12mo); republished in Cambridge Tracts (1803, 8vo). Plains. I. This term, either in the sing. or plur. des dury in the A. V. for no less than seven distinct Hebrew words, each of which had its own independent and individual meaning, and could not be—at least is not—interchanged with any other. We frequently find two, three, and even more equivalents for the same Hebrew term; and, besides, some of the words are manifestly mistranslated, and some of them are proper names. See TOPOGRAPHIC.

1. ᾿αβέλ, like the Arabic abala, signifies moisture and the erudere produced by it, as in a meadow, to which last term it chiefly corresponds. Hence it came to be applied to a low green plain. It occurs frequently as a proper name in Scripture; chiefly, however, in composition, as ᾿αβέλ-βασσανάκαθ (2 Kings xi. 20; 1 Kings iv. 20, 25; Judg. xii. 5, 6); ᾿αβέλ-μεθόλα (Judg. vii. 22, 23, 24, 25 ; 2 Chron. xvii. 7, 8); ᾿αβέλ-πορεία (Judg. xv. 2; 2 Chron. xvi. 4); ᾿αβέλ-σχίριτ (Numb. xxxix. 49); also alone, as in 2 Sam. xx. 14, 18. In 1 Sam. vi. 18 the A. V. reads "unto the great stone of Abel;" but the Hebrew is בֵּית אֵבָל, "unto Abel the great." Several MSS. read בֵּית אֵבָל, "stone" (the Sept. has Αἴσων, and this is probably the true reading (De Rossi, Var. Lect. ad loc.). Judg. ix. 38 is the only passage in which it is rendered "plain," and he smote them from Aroer, even till thou come to Minniath . . . and unto the plain of the Philistines ("πλαγιά τῆς φιλιστίμης", Sept.); Ezek. i. ἐρείπια, v. e. Ἠσία ὁμοιόμενα; Αβέλ quod est coalescens. There can scarcely be a doubt that this is a proper name, and it should be rendered ᾿αβέλ-κεραμίμ. Eusebius and Jerome mention it as a village of the Ammonites still existing in their day, situated six miles from Philadelphia, in the midst of vineyards (Onomast. a. v. Abelaviniarum). See ABEL.

2. ἐλέμ. This word is derived from the root ἔλεος, to be strong; and hence it is used in Scripture to signify a strong tree, and most probably the oak, which grows to a great size in central and southern Palestine (Genesis, Theaur. p. 42, 50, 51). In the A. V. it is rendered "plain" (Gen. xii. 6; xiii. 18, etc.), or "plains" (xviii. 1; Deut. xii. 9), but in one place the margin has "oak" (Judg. ix. 6). It is difficult to account for this rendering. Probably it was adopted from the Vulgate, which translates corollia in four places, valis in two, and quercus in three. The Sept. has ἄργους, except in Judg. ix. 3, where it has δέλαννω; and ver. 57, ἡμεροplagioris. The Hebrew word always means a sacred tree. Under "the oak of Moreh," at Mamre, Abraham pitched his tent, and worshipped God (Stanley. S. and P. p. 508). See OAK.

3. בַּקִּדָה, is from the root בַּקָּד, to clear awnder, and signifies literally a cleft, or place formed by dividing mountains, then a valley between mountains. It is equivalent to the Arabic bukhah. It is generally used in the Bible to denote a low widely extended plain as: the "plain of Shinar" (Gen. xi. 2; Sept. πεδινός; campus); the "valley of Jericho" (Deut. xxxiv. 3); the "valley of Megiddo" (2 Chron. xxxiv. 27; Zech. xii. 11); the "valley of Lebanon" (Josh. xvi. 17, called in Amos i. 5 "the plain of Aven"), which is now called el-Bakka; the "plain of Ono" (Neh. vi. 2), which appears to have been a portion of southern Sharon, where the town of Ono was situated. This word is rendered "plain" in the following passages: Gen. xi. 2; Neh. vi. 2; Isa. xi. 4; Ezek. iii. 22, 25; Amos i. 5; where it is translated "valley." It is generally rendered בקיע in the Sept. and campus in the Vulgate. בַּקָּד, the Chaldean form of בַּקִּדָה, found only in Dan. iii. Nebuchadnezzar set up the "golden image in the plain of Dura." See VALLEY.

4. בַּקָּד, kikkèr, seems to be equivalent to בַּקִּד, from the root בַּק, to move in a circle; בַּק therefore signifies a circuit, or "the region round about any place" (allied to which are צִּקָּד, cursus, and circle; Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 717). Hence, with the article בַּקִּד, kikkèr, it was applied topographically to "the region of the Jordan," especially the southern part of it, in which the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah once stood. It is so used seven times in Genesis (xiii, 10, 11, 12; xiv, 17, 25, 28, 29); also in 2 Sam. xviii, 23; 1 Kings vii, 46; 2 Chron. iv, 17; and apparently in Neh. iii, 22; xii, 26. Relics of that name must have been derived from the windings of the river (Ptolema. p. 274; comp. Stanley, S. and J.' p. 278). Though uniformly rendered plain in the A. V., and περιφορός or περιπεριας in the Sept., it appears to have all the definiteness of a proper name. It must be confessed that it is not easy to trace any connection between a "circular form" and the nature or aspect of the Jordan valley, and it is difficult not to suspect that κεκορισ is an archaic term which existed before the advent of the Hebrews, and was afterwards adapted into their language. See JORDAN.

The word is also very frequently used in Scripture to signify "a piece of money," generally "a talent" in the A. V. (Exod. xxx, 39; 1 Chron. xxi, 2, etc.) also "a cake" or "loaf of bread" (1 Sam. x, 3; Prov. vi, 26). Their circular form doubtless suggested the name.

5. מִשְׁרוֹ, mishšôr, with the article "הָמִשְׁרוֹ."
This word comes from the root בָּשַׂר, to be straight or even, hence "level" or "plain" or low country; thus in Ps. xxxii, 12, "My foot standeth in an even place," that is, "in a plain" also, figuratively, "rectitude or justice," as in Ps. lxvii, 4, "Thou shalt judge the people righteous-ly (with justice)." With the article it has a topographical signification, and has usually the definiteness of a proper name. The A. V. it is uniformly rendered "plain." It occurs in the Bible in the following passages: Deut. iii, 10; iv, 43; Josh. xiii, 9, 16, 17, 21; xx, 8, 1 Kings xx, 23, 25; 2 Chron. xxxvi, 10; Jer. lxviii, 8, 21.

In each of these, with one exception, it is used for the district in the neighborhood of Heshbon and Dibon—the Bezek of the modern Arabs, their most noted pasture-ground; a district which, from the scanty descriptions we possess of it, seems to resemble the "Downs" of England in the regularity of its undulations, the excellence of its turf, and its fitness for the growth of flocks. There is no difficulty in recognizing the same district in the statement of 2 Chron. xxxvi, 10. It is evident from several circumstances that Uzziah had been a great conqueror on the east of Jordan, as well as on the shore of the Mediterranean (see Ewald's remarks, Geschicht. iii, 508, note), and he kept his cattle on both sides of the Hinnom on one hand, and Ammonites on the other. Thus in all the passages quoted above the word mishšôr seems to be restricted to one special district, and to belong to it as exclusively as shephelah did to the low land of Philistia, or arabah to the desert of the Jordan valley. It is therefore puzzling to find it used in one passage (1 Kings xx, 23, 25) apparently with the more general sense of low land, or rather flat land, in which chariots might be maneuvered—as opposed to uneven mountainous ground. There is some reason to believe that the scene of the battle in question was on the east side of the Sea of Gennesaret, in the plain of Jaulan; but this is no explanation of the difficulty, because we are not warranted in extending the mishšôr farther than the mountains which bounded it on the north, and where the districts begin which bore, like it, their own distinctive names of Gilgal, Bashan, Argob, Golan, Hauran, etc. Perhaps the most feasible explanation is that the word was used by the Syrians of Damascus without any knowledge of its strict signification, in the same manner indeed as it was employed in the later Syro-Chaldee dialect, in which messura is the favorite term to express several natural features which in the older and stricter language were denominated each by its own special name. See Mission.

6. פּוּדַע, פּוּדַע. The root פּוּדַע, to be dry. In poetry it is applied to any dry pasture-land, like Midbar; but with the article it means the valley of the Jordan, and has the force of a proper name. In the A. V. it is commonly rendered "plain" (Deut. i, 17, etc.); but in Deut. xii, 80, "cham- paign;" in Ezek. xliii, 8, "desert;" and in Josh. xv, 6; xvi, 18, "Arabah" (Gesen. Thesaur. p. 1066; Stanley, S. and P. p. 481). The Sept. usually has Ἀπόστολος, but sometimes Ἠφαίστεια. See ARABAN.

7. פּוּדַע, po'da', shephelah, a plain, from the root פּוּדַע, to be dry, or "plain." In the A. V. it is rendered "plain" in Jer. xvii, 26; 1 Chron. xxvii, 28; 2 Chron. ix, 27; but elsewhere "vale" or "valley." It has all the definiteness of a proper name, being the specific designation of the maritime plain of Philistia. To the Hebrews this, and this only, was the Shephelah. Shephelah has some claims of its own to notice. It was the name of the most tenacious of these old Hittite terms. It appears in the Greek text and in the A. V. of the book of Maccabees (1 Macc. xxii, 38), and is preserved on each of its other occurrences, even in such corrupt dialects as the Samaritan version of the Penta- teuch, and the Targums of Pseudo-Jonathan and of rabbis Joseph. And although it would appear to be no longer known in its original seat, it has transferred itself to other countries, and appears in Spanish as Sierra, and on the east coast of Africa as Sufala. See SHEPHALEH.

The word, however, is more generally used for the smaller valleys of the country—the "valley of Jerseel." Perhaps Esdraelon may anciently have been considered as consisting of two portions: the valley of Jerseel, the eastern and smaller; the plain of Megiddo, the western and more extensive of the two. See ESDERAELON.

II. The following are the principal plains of Palestine alluded to in the Bible, proceeding from north to south:

1. The great plain or valley of Cæle-Syria, the "holy land" of the Greeks, which separates two ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, is the most remarkable of them all. It is called in the Bible the Bika'ath Aven (Amos i, 5), and also probably the Bika'ath Lebanon (Josh. xi, 17; xii, 7), and Bika'ath Mizpeh (xii, 8), and is still known throughout Syria by its old name, as Ḳub'ān, or Ar'el-Ḳub'ān. "A long valley, though broad," says Dr. Pusey (Comment, on Amos i, 5), "if seen from a height looks like a cleft;" and this is eminently the case with the "valley of Lebanon" when approached by the ordinary roads from north or south. It is of great extent, more than sixteen miles by about five in average breadth, and the two great ranges shut it in on either hand, Lebanon especially, with a very well-like appearance. See POLEMAIS.

2. The plain (called פּוּדַע in the Bible) of Jerseel or Esdraelon, which runs from the bay of Ptolemais to the Jordan, dividing the mountains of Galilee from those of Ephraim. It is well watered and grassy. See JERSEEL.

3. The flat along the Mediterranean from Carmel to the brook of Egypt (whose northern part near Joppa is called שֹׁרֶם, "the southern part Shephelah, פּוּדַע, the plain of the tribe of Judah stood in connection with the latter (1 Macc. iii, 24, 40; xiii, 18). See SHORON.

4. The meadow of Jordan, or the plain on both sides of that river, from the Sea of Gennesaret to the Dead Sea, usually called simply The Plain (פּוּדַע). In the neighborhood of Jericho this valley widens into a greater expanse which is called פּוּדַע יְרֵיחוֹ, The Plains of Jericho (Josh. iv, 13; v, 10; 2 Kings xxv, 5; Jer. xxxix, 5), as the Dead Sea is called the Sea of the Plain (Deut. iii, 17; iv, 49). See JORDAN.

5. The elevated plain (פּוּדַע הַיַּרֶם) in the tribe of Reu- ben, in which lay Bezer and Medeba (Josh. xiii, 16; xx, 8; Deut. iv, 43). It belongs to the large but rather dry (Burckhardt, ii, 626) plateau of modern Beleta (Ritter, ii, 388). See MEBEDA.

6. For the "plains of Jericho," see JERSEEL.
Planck the subjective, pragmatic method reaches its height. History is only the dreary theatre of human interests and passions; but it is truly amazing that, with his indifference to Church doctrine, he could bestow so much toilsome study and learned industry on such 'perfectly indifferently antiquated' as the theological contents of the 16th and 17th centuries. Of course his work, with all its great and enduring merits, and the relative truth and necessity of its conclusions, did not fail to have a bad effect, in completely sundering the doctrinal consciousness of its age from the basis of the older Church orthodoxy, and in justifying this rupture as a pretended advance. In his other large work, the History of the Church Government, Planck likewise starts from that rationalistic conception of the Church, which dates from Locke, viz., that this divine establishment was originally a mere voluntary association, which formed its laws and institutions in accordance with the changing wants of the times, and under the influence of fortuitous, external circumstances; and that, in this way, it gradually assumed an aspect altogether different from what its founder and first members intended or foresaw. In this way he accounts for the gigantic hierarchy of the Middle Ages, which he looks upon in a simply political light, with all the calamities of a phenomenon of a very recent spectator: while the older Protestant orthodoxy had held it in pious abhorrence, as the broken bulwark of the veritable Antichrist" (Schauf, Hist. of the Apostolic Church, p. 73). A complete list of all his writings is given in Plutser, Göttingen Nachrichten, vii, 121; iii, 283 sq; iv, 270. See Lütcke, Gottlieb Jacob Planck, ein biographischer Versuch (Götting, 1888, 8vo); Ilgen, Zeitshchr. für histor. Theol. 1848, iv, 75-88; Rheinwald, Repert. of. theolog. Planck, Heinrich Ludwig, another German Protestant divine, son of the preceding, was born at Göttingen July 19, 1785, and educated at the university of that place, where his father was then a professor. In 1809 young Planck appeared as author of a work entitled Versuch einer neuen synoptischen Zusammenstellung der drei ersten Evangelien, nach Grundsätzen der höhern Kritik (Götting, 1805, 8vo). In 1810 he was appointed extraordinary professor of theology at Göttingen; and his introductory preliminary dissertation De rerum inter se collationibus et analogia orationis Graecae Novi Testamenti Commentatio (Göttingen, 1810, 4to), added greatly to his reputation. The value of this essay can scarcely be overrated, and its influence has been equal to its worth. It has wrought an entire change of opinion respecting the N.-T. Greek, and upon the views which it enforced all subsequent investigations have been based. An English translation is published in the second volume of the Edinburgh Biblical Cabinet. It was Planck's intention, as stated in this essay, to exhibit his views in a more perfected form, in a work to be entitled Logica Philologica in Novum Testamentum; but from this he was diverted by an engagement into which he entered upon the strong recommendation of Gesenius, namely, to prepare a lexicon of the N. T. similar to that which the latter had published of the O. T. Unhappily the enthusiasm awakened by his early promise were unfulfilled. His health was undermined by frequent attacks of epilepsy, and it was with difficulty that he could go through the duties of his office as ordinary professor of theology, to which he was appointed in 1826. Other works of his are, New Revelation and Inspiration (1817), and a Short Scheme of the Philosophical Doctrine of Religion (1821). He died Sept. 23, 1831. See Lütcke's biography of Gottlieb Jacob Planck.

Planck, the subject of this article, a priest of the Catholic Church, was born at Drenoutr, Flanders, in 1532. Having imbibed the principles of the Calvinistic faith in the schools of Germany and England, he embraced the evangelical ministry in 1557, and discharged its duties in Brabant and Flanders, in the midst of the persecutions of the Spanish government. After the taking of Brussels (1585), where he was pastor, he fled to Holland, and was soon attached to the Church of Amsterdam. Being a zealous defender of orthodoxy, he displayed great anxiety against the Lutherans and Arminians. He was in 1609 a member of the Synod of Dort, and was then one of the revisers of the version of the Old Testament. He is entitled to the gratitude of the Dutch people for the services which he rendered them by his geographical and nautical acquirements. He counselled the first expeditions sent by the Dutch to both Indies, and traced even the itineraries of those expeditions. He is much spoken of in Jeannin's narrative, where he is called "a great cosmographer." He died May 25, 1622, at Amsterdam. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xi, 465.

Planck, Gottlieb Jacob, a noted Protestant divine, was born at Nüttlingen, in the kingdom of Wurttemberg, Nov. 15, 1751. He was educated at the university of Tubingen, and in 1784 was made an ordinary professor of theology in the University of Göttingen. In this capacity he exerted a remarkable influence throughout Germany, as he wielded a powerful pen, and wrote many essays upon the history of the Church and its doctrines. He is a leading name in the school of "pragmatic" historiography. His principal work is his Geschichte des protestantischen Systems in seinem Ursprung, seiner Veränderung, u. seiner Fortbildung (Leips., 1784-1800, 6 vols. 8vo), which was continued in a work published after a long interval under the title of Geschichte des protestantischen Lehrbegriffs, 1781-1788, Concordiaformel bis zur Mitte des 18ten Jahrhunderts (Götting, 1811). Another great work of his is Geiz der der Ideal--Kirch. Gesellschaftsverfassung (Hann, 1803-9, 5 vols. 8vo). Planck, though widely read and followed, does not deserve the great renown he has secured. He exhibited too much indifference to doctrine to be trusted implicitly in his judgments, and yet no one could withhold from him the tribute for application. But, like a too excessive cicerone, Planck, in these works, requires great judgment in the reader. He everywhere displays a sort of preconcerted design, ambition, hatred, and other passions, as having been the motive forces in the process of doctrinal history. Thus the progressive and independent development of dogma is resolved into psychological dispositions and tendencies, while, at the same time, the author's own doctrinal indifference is unconsciously transferred to the agents of the dogmatising process, by the axiomatic assumption that doctrine alone would have been incapable of exciting so much interest or contention. In his eyes doctrine is an antiquated matter, which is properly destined to oblivion. In this method, the view being restricted to efficient causes, and the inherent activity of final causes but slight of, even the efficient causes are not comprehended in their entirety. Planck died in 1833. "With PLANE-tree (Exodus xxiv, 14). See CHESTNUT.

Planet. See MAZEROTH.

Planet-worship is a prominent constructive feature in all mystic systems of antiquity. Thus the primal gods of all objects like Osiris (q.v.) may be contemplated under two aspects, differing somewhat from each other, but incapable of any rigorous or formal separation. That worship seems to be in some localities directly solar. Fortunes of Osiris have been interwoven or identified with those of the great orb of the day. His votaries have an eye exclusively to periodic motions of the sun and the vicissitudes of the seasons; not so much in reference to the increase or the decrease of his luminescent functions as to seeming changes in his fructifying, fertilizing power. In winter he appears to the imagination of the worshipper as languishing and dying; and all nature, ceasing to put forth her buds and blossoms, is believed to suffer with him; while at other seasons of the year the majesty of this great king of heaven is reasserted in the vivifying of creation and the gladakening of the human heart. There is an annual resurrection of all nature, for the sun-god is himself returning from the underworld—the region of the dead. Or, if we study the same representation in its more telluric aspect, what is there depicted as a mourning for Osiris is no longer emblematic merely of protracted darkness, but it imports more frequently the loss of vital forces in the vegetable kingdom as the consequence of the withdrawal of the solstitial heat. The earth herself becomes the primal sufferer; and the cause of all her passionate and despairing lamentations is the influence that dries up the fountains of her own vitality. Now, whichever be adjudged the primitive form or the correct interpretation of this old Osiran myth, we must remember that, historically speaking, the substance of the myth itself is not by any means confined to the valley of the Nile. It recurred nearly all countries bordering on the Mediterranean. It can often be directly traced to Asia, and as often to the agency of those Phenician colonists who, scattered thickly in the islands to the west of Syria, were importing to far distant havens not their amber only, but their civilization and religious knowledge. In the mother country of Phcenicia, the Osiran worship had its ancient counterpart in the mysteries of Adonis and the annual "weeping for Tammuz" (Ezek. viii, 14). There, again, the fate of the divinity was rigorously identified with periodic change in the aspect of external nature. The idea of an Adonis in the prime of life was the most vivid image which the Syrian mind could fashion of all fertilizing and benignant powers. At length, however, the divinity sinks down oppressed and overwhelmed; his heart is pierced by some mysterious arrow: he dies, and in the sacred month, "the month of Tammuz," when the scorching blasts of summer are well-nigh exhausted, a large crowd of Syrian maidens and matrons flock together from all quarters; they bewail the loss of Tammuz; but their vehement ejaculations are all intermixed by a series of impassioned and diabolic orgies; symptoms of returning life in nature are to them a signal for festivity as frantic as their former grief. Vitality is coming back to earth; and in its advent they perceive another "finding" of their lost Adonis, eliponc A-mmūl. Nor is this the only instance of some close affinity between the old mythographers of Egypt and Phenicia. Mingling with the other progeny of Phtra, or the Egyptian Vulcan, stand the great Cabirian brothers, whose repute and worship were extensively diffused in various provinces of the West. Not only is Cabeiri itself immediately explainable, if we resort to the Semitic languages; for there it means the "Great" or "Mighty Ones," and thus is pointing in the same direction as the ancient dwarf-gods, which were also sacred images of Cabeiri, and were venerated with a kindred fervor by the rude Phenician pilot and the polished priest of Memphis. The Calceiri seem to have been eight in number, or, excluding Esamun (literally the eighth), that one of the fraternity who was regarded as the chief or aggregate expression for the whole, we limit them to seven; which strongly indicates, in the opinion of some writers, an original institution of seven additional divinities: the "seven happy ones" being worthy of peculiar homage are the sun, the moon, and the five planets; while the planets, when regarded singly, have been made to bear the correlative title of the "five heavenly chiefs." The Greek had similarly his seven Sēi μυαλον, and the Persian his seven ministers of the highest; examples which appear to be suggestive of the early spread of planet-worship, if they do not absolutely prove that astronomical principles had entered largely into the construction of all mystic systems, that of Egypt not excepted. 1. Kings vi, 15, as elsewhere generally rendered: 22, 06 (probably the same as γλυκύλα, ἐλα, a threshold, or "thick beam," of Kings vii, 6; "thick plank," Ezek. xii, 25). "thick plank," Ezek. xii, 26.

Plant. Under this general term we classify and explain the several plants mentioned in Scripture, as edible, flowering, or medicinal, in order.

1. Edible Plants.—Among these, with which we number also aromas and spices, may be noticed:

1. Amiir, Gr. ἀμύς, which means rather αὐλί, an aromatic herb mentioned by Christ (Matt. xxiii, 23). See Anise.

2. Barley, the frequent rendering of the Hebrew se'ak, סֶאָכ, and of the Greek ἑπαρ, as in Rev. vi, 6; John vi, 15. See BALEY.

3. Born, Heb. pēl, pēl, as in 2 Sam. xxvii, 28; Ezek. iv, 9. See Barley

4. Caper-berry, Heb. ḥabjōm, ḥabjōm, ḥabjōm, desor (Ezek. xii, 5). See CAPEP-PLANT.

5. Cinnamon is the rendering of the Hebrew ḭwznm, ḏḥwzn, (Exod. xxx, 23), and of the Greek κυματισμός (Rev. xviii, 13). See CINNAMON.

6. Coriander represents the Hebrew gad, גַּד, in most ancient versions, as the Sept. and Vulg., in Exod. xvi, 31; Num. xi, 7; but the Chaldee and Samaritan vary. See Coriander.

7. Cucumber translates the Hebrew ḥisākā, ḥisākā (Num. xi, 5); and wild cucumbers appear to be meant in 2 Kings iv, 59 by ḥisākā, ḥisākā, where our version has Cucumber. See CucumbE.

8. Cummin stands for the Hebrew ḵmnm, ḵmnm (Isa. xxviii, 25, 27); and in the New Test. for the Greek ἐχήμ, which is simply an adoption of the Hebrew. See Cummin.

9. Dorro's dung our version gives for chapeh yɔmim, דִּנְיָב יָם, which is probably some kind of vegetable food, perhaps kili, though the rendering given is the literal translation (2 Kings vii, 23). See Dorro's Dung.

10. Fitches is given by the A. V. in Isa. xxviii, 25, 26, 27 for the Hebrew kitōlak, kitōlak, kitōlak, which, according to the Sept., Vulg., and rabbinis, is a kind of tallow flower, as black cummin. In Ezek. iv, 9 the word κημμωθ, κημμωθ, is rendered fitches, but it seems to mean properly spejl. See Fitches; ILIN.
32. Wheat in general is the Heb. chittith, אכית, of which the plural in Chaldee is chinin', אכיתנ', as Ezra vi, 9; vii, 22; and in the New Test. is ορός, a general name for grain, which is also rendered "corn" (Mark iv, 28; Acts vii, 12).

11. Garlic is the Hebrew בנים, בנים (Num. xi, 5). See GARLIC.
12. Gourd. See CUCUMBER; GOURD.
13. Grape is the rendering of several Hebrew words; some of them distinguishing particular kinds or qualities: (a) הבשימ, בושים (Isa. v, 2, 4), wild grapes, l. e. bad grapes. Aquila has σκαρπίαν, Symm. σκαρίλις. (b) בַּקָּרָה, בַּקָּרָה (Isa. xviii, 5; Jer. xxxii, 24, 50; Ezek. xxii, 3), sour or unripe grapes; Sept. בַּקָּרָה. (c) חָרַשׁ, חִרְשָׁה, sour grapes, kernels (Num. vi, 4), and of the Greek ἄγραφος, ἄγραφον, bunch of grapes (Matt. vii, 16; Luke vii, 44; Rev. xiv, 18). See GRAPE.
14. Leek (in Num. xi, 5) renders אֵשֶׁר, chaitir', which elsewhere is translated gras, l. e. green. See LEAK.
15. Lasul renders Heb. אֲדוֹת, אָדוֹת (Gen. xxv, 84; 2 Sam. xvii, 28; xxiii, 11; Ezek. iv, 9). See LENTIL.
16. Mallow is for the Heb. mallāch, מַלָּך, properly a parsnip (Job xxx, 4). See MALLOW.
17. Mandrake is the Heb. dodān, דדָן, love-apples (Gen. xxx, 14; Cant. vii, 15). See MANDRAKE.
18. Manna, Heb. מָנָה, מָנָה, a sweet resin distilling from the leaves of tamarisk trees, of several species, especially the tamaric Galliæa macrophylla, from punctures made by an insect, the cocoon macropus. See MANK.
19. Melon is found in Num. xi, 5 as the rendering of the Hebrew abattitim, אבּתיתים. See MELON.
20. Millot (in Ezek. iv, 9) represents the Hebrew dochă, dochă; it is the kolchus dochani (Linn.). See MILLOT.
21. Mist (in Matt. xxiii, 28; Luke x, 42) is the Greek σιβάρυς, i. e. sweet-scented, the mentha viridis of Linn. See MINT.
22. Mustard (in Matt. xiii, 31; xv, 20; Mark iv, 3; Luke xii, 19; xv, 6) is the Greek σιβάρυς; the simplicis orientalis. See MUSTARD.
23. Olive universally is given in the A. V. where the Hebrew סַביִיק, סַבִּיק, is used. In 1 Kings vi, 23 the word olive-tree renders the Heb. אֵשֶׁר-סַבִּיק, אֵשֶׁר סַבִּיק, lit. the tree of fairness. The same expression is rendered oil-tree (Isa. iv, 19) and pine (Neh. viii, 15). See OLIVE.
24. Onion is in Heb. בֵּטֶל, בֵּטֶל, as Num. xi, 5. See ONION.
25. Parched-corn is the Heb. כֵּל, כֵּל, or כָּלָה, it is wheat or barley roasted in the ear and then rubbed out; perhaps occasionally some kind of pulse (1 Sam. xv, 17). See PARCHED-CORN.
26. Pistacia-nuts, in Heb. בוטמין, בוטמין (Gen. xxiii, 11), a kind of nut of olibanum, and taking this name from betr, בטר, the belly, in allusion to their form. See NUT.
27. Pomegranate renders the Heb. רָמבָד, רָמבָד, in many passages. See POMOGRANATE.
28. Purslane is the Heb. challah-math, חלחמל, according to the Syriac. Our version has egg (Job vi, 6), "white of an egg," which is certainly wrong. See GENSEN. Speculum, v. s., and PERSILIAN.
29. Raisins, bunches of (1 Sam. xxvii, 18; xxx, 12; 2 Sam. xvi, 1; 1 Chron. xii, 40), translates the Heb. יַאֲשֵׁר, יַאֲשֵׁר. See RAISINS.
30. Sesame (in Exod. ix, 22; Isa. xxvii, 25) translates the Heb. שָׁמֵש, שָׁמֵש, which means a smooth grain, qrb. See No. 10, above, and RYE.
31. Vine, Heb. סֵיַר, סֵיַר, or sorakh, סֵרָכָה, is a peculiar kind of grape - vine. Thus, choice vine (Gen. xlii, 11); choicest vine (Isa. v, 2); noble vine (Jer. ii, 25). See VINE.

PLASTER

Plantier, Claude Henri, one of the most prominent members of the French episcopate, was born of humble parentage at Ceyzeries, in France, in 1813. In 1837 he was made a priest, and soon afterwards he was appointed professor of Hebrew at the theological seminary. In 1838 he was made bishop of Nismes, and died May 25, 1875. He was one of the fiercest opponents of Louis Napoleon. See Literarische Haupteigesehr, 1875, p. 292. (B. P.)

Plantin, Christophe, a celebrated printer, was born in 1534 at Mont-Louis, in the French province of Touraine, of poor parents. He went to Paris in his youth, and worked there some time in a bookbinder's shop; but afterwards went to Caen, in Normandy, where he learned the art of printing. After working in several of the printing-offices of France, and especially at Lyons, he returned to Paris; but the religious disturbances which commenced about that time induced him to remove to Flanders, and he is known to have been a master-printer at Antwerp in 1555. Besides his printing establishment at Antwerp, he had one at Paris and another at Leyden. The beauty as well as the correctness of the works which issued from his press extended his reputation beyond Italy, and he soon acquired a considerable fortune. He employed as correctors of the press several men distinguished for their learning, and Plantin's house was resorted to by learned men from all countries. He died July 1, 1589. The work which has given most celebrity to Plantin's printing establishment at Antwerp is the edition which he printed of the great Polyglot Bible, which had previously been printed at Alcalá, in Spain, under the direction of Cardinal Ximenes. Plantin was engaged to perform the work by Philip II of Spain, who sent Arius Montanus to superintend it, and he was engaged for several years (1568-1572) in this occupation. See Arius Montanus. Guillaume Lebo was sent for from Paris to engrave the punches and superintend the casting of the type. The work, in addition to the contents of the Alcalá Polyglot, gave a Chaldaic paraphrase and a Syriac version of the New Testament in Hebrew and Syriac characters. The proofs of the Antwerp Polyglot were all revised by Raphelengius, and the work was published in eight large folio volumes (1568-1572). Plantin was not so learned as the Aldine of Venice or the Estiennes of Paris, but his Latin preface to several of the works which he printed seems sufficiently to establish that he had acquired a considerable scholarship.

Plantsch, Martin, D.D., a German theologian, was born in 1460 at Dormstetten, in Württemberg. He studied at the newly founded university at Tübingen, where in 1483 he was made master, in 1484 professor of philosophy, and in 1494 doctor and professor of theology, at the same time preaching in the church of St. George. In 1523 he was present at the Zurich colloquium, and died July 18, 1538. In connection with Dr. Hartseerer, he founded the famous academy of St. George and St. Martin at Tübingen. He was also the author of Tractatus de fuga malice, which he wrote in 1566, on the occasion of the burning of a certain witch at Tübingen. See Jöcher, Gelehrten-Lex. s. v. (B. P.)

Plautes Maximus, a Byzantine monk noted as a literary character, flourished in the 14th century. He was born himself in or near Athens; and his works, at Nicomedia. The time of his birth is unknown, and almost the only circumstance of his life which is beyond doubt is that in the year 1327 he was sent on an embassy to Venice by the emperor Andronicus the elder. At this time he must have been of a mature age. That he was not yet alive in 1340 is evident from a letter still extant, in which he wrote to the emperor Johnnes Palaeologus, who ascended the throne in that year. D'Orville places his death in 1355, for which, however, he adduces no testimony. Gerhard Rüßmann prolongs his life to the year 1370, and others place it still later. Towards the close of his life Planudes, it is said, was imprisoned on account of his partiality for the doctrines of the Church of Rome; and when afterwards compelled to write against that Church, to have done so in such a manner and with such feeble arguments that cardinal Desselar declared that he pitied the heart of Planudes more in what he had written on that occasion. His works, of which several exist only in MS. form, are not of sufficient importance to be enumerated here. They consist of orations and homilies; translations from Latin into Greek; and several works of a philosophical character, as Cicerio, Cesar, Ovid, etc.; also of Boethius' De Consolatione; St. Augustine, De Trinitate and De Cicerate Dei; a collection of E coy's Fabulas; commentaries on the Rhetoric of Hermogenes, and other Greek writings. See Fabricius, Bibliotheca Graeca, xi, 392 sq.; Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliogr. Sacrum. Graec. s. v.

Plassmann, Heinrich Ernst, D.D., a German Roman Catholic divine, was born in 1817 at Paderborn, where he also afterwards labored as professor of theology. He then went to Rome, where he was appointed rector of the German National Church. He was also honored with the title of "Magister Scriptorum Theologicorum" by the Dominican college St. Thomas de Ures. He died at Tivoli, Italy, July 23, 1865. He wrote Die Schule des heil. Thomas (Soest, 1857), a great but unfinished work. See Literarischer Handwörterbuch für das katholische Deutschland, 1867, p. 27; Zuchhold, Bibliotheca Theologica, ii, 1000. (B. P.) Plaster, Mason's (""), mixt, so called from its effervescence, lime; Sept. xenia: Dan. v. 5; "chalk," Isa. xvi, 9; also "calk," from its being, lime. Deut. xxvii, 4, 2; "lime," Isa. xxvi, 12; Amos i, 1; a verb, T42, "take, to smear," Lev. xiv, 42, 43; elsewhere "clab," etc.) The mode of making plaster-cement has been described elsewhere. See Mortar. Plaster is mentioned on three occasions in Scripture:

1. Where, when a house was infected with "leprosy" (Lev. xiv, 42, 48), the priest was ordered to take away the portion of infected wall and replaster it (Michaelis, Loci of Moses, § 211, iii, 397-398, ed. Smith). See House; Leprosy.

2. The words of the law were ordered to be engraved on Mount Ebal on stones which had been previously coated with plaster (Deut. xxvii, 2, 4; Josh. vii, 32), the pillars being covered with plaster, and the law written on the stones (Deut. xxvii, 3; Josh. v, 23 sq.). Michaelis, however (vol. i, bk. iii), supposes that the words were cut in stone and plaster afterwards put upon it, when that the plaster should fall off the words might still be legible. Of this, however, no evidence appears. The process here mentioned was probably of a similar kind to that adopted in Egypt for receiving bas-reliefs. The wall was first made smooth, and its interstices, if necessary, filled up with plaster. When the figures had been drawn, and the stone adjacent cut away so as to leave them in relief, a coat of lime whitewash was laid on, and followed by one of varnish after the painting of the figures was complete. In the case of the natural rock the process was nearly the same. The ground was covered with a thick layer of fine plaster, consisting of lime and gypsum, carefully smoothed and polished. Upon this coat of plaster, a thin one was laid, and on it the colors were painted, and set by means of glue or wax. The whitewash appears in most instances to have been made of shell-limestone not much burned, which of itself is tenacious enough without glue or other binding material (Long, quoting from Belzoni, Ep. Add., ii, 49, 50). At Behistun, in Persia, the face of the inscribed rock-tablet was covered with a varnish to preserve it from weather; but it seems likely that in the case of the Ebal tablets the inscription was cut while the plaster was still moist (Layard, Ninereh, ii, 188; Vaux, Nin. and Persep. p. 172). See Strong, p. 69. The plaster's affords a covering of cement on which the fatal letters were traced by the mystic hand "on the plaster of the wall" of Belshazzar's palace at Babylon (Dan. v. 5). We here obtain an incidental confirmation of the Biblical narrative. For while at Ninereh the walls are paved with alabaster slabs, at Babylon, where no such material is found, the builders were content to cover their tiles or bricks with enamel or stucco, finely trimmed plaster, fit for receiving ornamental designs (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 692; Diod. ii. 9). See Buick.

Plaster, Medicinal (772, march, to rub, hence to moist with a healing salve or similar substance, Lea, xxxviii, 31). See Medicine.

Plastic Nature, an absurd doctrine, which some have thus described: "It is an incorporeal created substance, ended with a vegetative life, but not with sensation or notion; penetrating the whole created universe, being co-extensive with it; and, under God, moving matter, so as to produce the phenomena which cannot be solved by mechanical laws: active for ends unknown to us, and not being expressly conscious of its actions, and yet having an obscure idea of the action to be entered upon." To this it has been answered that, as the idea itself is most obscure, and, indeed, inconsistent, so the foundation of it is evidently weak. It is intended by this to avoid the inconvenience of subjecting God to the same trouble of the changes in the universe, and the meanness of others. But it appears that, even upon this hypothesis, he would still be the author of them: besides, to omnipotence nothing is troublesome, nor those things men, when considered as part of a system, which alone might appear to be so. Plat (πλάτων), Achilleus, 2 Kings ix, 26, a piece, or portion of ground, as elsewhere rendered.

Plato (πλάτων), Isacch, 1 Kings vii, 86, a board (or "table"); as elsewhere rendered: Πάθος, a thin leaft, Exod. xxxvi, 3; Numb. xvi, 38; Ἰππία, a hermitic plate of metal, Exod. xxvii, 56; xxxii, 30; Lev. viii, 9; Πάθος, wire, an axle, 1 Kings vii, 80).

Platel, Jacques, a French theologian, was born at Besee, a village of Artois, in the year 1608. He joined the Jesuits, and taught philosophy and theology at Douai. He was regarded as a man of some learning, and his writings were received favorably. He died Jan. 7, 1661, at Douai. His works are, Synopsis casuus theologii (Douai, 1654, fol.; 4th ed. 1706)—Auctoritas contra physico praedeterminismum (ibid. 1663—1673, 2 vols. 12mo).

Platina, Battista Bartolommo de' Sacchi, a very learned Italian, is noted as the author of a History of the Popes. He was born in 1421 at Piadena, a village between Cremona and Mantua. He first embraced a military life, which he followed for a time, but afterwards devoted himself to the study of theology. He went to Rome under Calixtus III, who was made pope in 1455; where, getting himself introduced to cardinal Besarian, he obtained some small benefits of pope Pius II, who succeeded Calixtus in 1468, and afterwards was appointed apostolic legate. When Paul II succeeded Pius in 1464, Platina was deposed, and placed in an unfavorable turn. In the first place, Paul was much indisposed towards him, on account of his connections with his predecessor Pius; but this might possibly have been borne if Paul, in the next place, had not removed all the abbreviators from their employments by abolishing their places, notwithstanding they had purchased them with great sums of money. Upon the Pope's complaining to the people, and most humbly besought him to order their cause to be judged by the auditors of the Rota. The pope was offended at the liberty, and gave him a very haughty repulse: "Is it thus," said he, looking at him sternly—"is it thus that you surround me, if you knew not that all laws are centred in our breast? Such is our decree: they shall all go hence, whithersoever you please: I am pope, and have a right to ratify or cancel the acts of others at pleasure." These unheeded men, thus incurring the enmity of the princes, used their utmost endeavors for some days to obtain audience of the pope, but were repulsed with contempt. Upon this Platina wrote to him in the following terms: "If you had a right to dispense us, without permitting our cause to be heard, of the employments we had lawfully purchased, we, on the other side, ought to be permitted to complain of the injustice we suffer, and the ignominy with which we are branded. As you have repulsed us so contumeliously, we will go to all the courts of princes, and entreat them to call a council, whose principal business shall be to obtain from us, and cause why you have divested us of all our lawful possessions." Nothing can better illustrate the temper and character of Platina than this letter, which was, however, considered as an act of rebellion, and caused him to be imprisoned, and to endure great hardships. At the end of four years he had his wish and his orders not to leave Rome, and continued in quiet for some time; but afterwards, being suspected of a plot, he was again imprisoned, and, with many others, put to the rack. The plot being found imaginary, the charge was turned to heresy, which also came to nothing, and Platina was set at liberty some time after. The pope then flattered him with a prospect of preferment, and thus kept him in Rome; but, dying of apoplexy, left him to shift for himself as he could. This whole conflict is related by Platina himself in his Lives of the Popes, under the pontificate of Paul II. Sixtus IV succeeded Paul in 1467, and appointed Platina keeper of the Vatican Library, which was established by this pope. Platina here found himself in his own element, and lived very happily in that station till 1468, when he was snatched away by the plague. He bequeathed to Pomponius Lestus the house which he built on the Mons Quarinalis, with the laurel grove, out of which the poetical crowns were taken. He was the author of several works, the most considerable of which is De Vicis ac Gestis Romani Principis Pius II, or history of the popes from St. Peter to Sixtus IV, to whom he added it. The Protestants have approved it, and ranked the author among the witnesses to truth. Some Roman Catholic writers charge him with want of sincerity and care; yet Fanvinius did not scruple to publish this history, with notes of his own, and added to it the Lives of the popes from Sixtus IV to Pius IV. It was first printed at Venice in 1479 (fol.), and reprinted once or twice before 1500, since which time all the editions of it are said to have been castrated. His Lives of the Popes is written with elegance of style, and displays powers of research and discrimination which were then rare. He writes with freedom of the popes. Some passages are omitted in later editions. In the edition of 1574, the passage in the life of St. Anacletus, "Uxorum habitus in Bithynia," is for the first time changed into "Uxorum non hahens." Platina wrote also a History of the popes in Latin, which was first published by Lambeius, with notes, at Vienna (1675, 4to).

of his own imaginative excursions, and anticipating the fantastic reveries of the Neo-Platonic Thaumaturgus.

Plato was born a full Athenian citizen, of Athenian parents, but, apparently, not within the limits of Attica. His birthplace seems to have been the island of Aegina, where his father owned a cleruchy, or colonial estate. It is uncertain in regard to the year of his birth, but it fell within the first half of the Decennial War, or earlier portion of the Peloponnesian War. Grote assigns his nativity to May, B.C. 427, just before the surrender of Plataea; Clinton to May, B.C. 429, four or five months after the battle of Pericles; another, Diogenes Laertius to B.C. 428, the year in which Anaxagoras died. Taking Grote's date for convenience, as this is no place for the investigation of such chronological problems, the philosopher's birth was synchronous with the first exhibitions of the comic Aristophanes, whom, throughout life he so greatly admired, and whose works he kept habitually under his pillow. Both the parents of Plato were of noble blood; a circumstance which affected equally his political inclinations and his speculative views. His father was Aristocles, the son of Aristocles, and traced his descent from Croesus and the god Poseidon. His mother's name was Perictione. She was descended from a collateral branch of the family of Solon the Lawgiver; was nearly related to Critias, the chief of the Thirty Tyrants, and was the sister of Charmides, who was at the same time one of the ten governors and the ten ephors of the State. Her influence was increased, rather than diminished, during the long and ardent struggle between rising Christianity and expiring Paganism—both combating receiving his impulse, claiming his alliance, and submitting to his philosophical ascendency. Though the oblivion of the Greek language and the dogmatic character of mediæval speculation turned intellectual activity into widely divergent channels, yet the revival of letters was attended by the resurrection of Plato; and the Medicean Academy of Florence, under the direction of Marsilius Ficinus (q. v.), renewed the prominence of his name and of his philosophy. Since that period, the beginning of the 16th century, Plato has enjoyed an augmented authority in the domain of metaphysical inquiry; has animated successive schools of brilliant reputation and of extensive rule; and has been the late progenitor of the transcendentally great system which has given to modern Germany its marvellous predominance in transcendentally metaphysical speculations.

1. Life and Times.—The notices of Plato's life which have come to us are few and uncertain, and for the most part unhistorical. Legend early fastened upon his name, and incrusted it over with myths as striking and as unreal as any employed by himself for the embellishment of his tenets. He transformed the rugged honesty of his teacher, Socrates: he was himself transfigured by the wild fancy of his own followers, and was translated in equal degree with Bully Bottom, though in dissimilar mode. But, if little is known of the real circumstances and incidents of the life of the philosopher, there is abundant information in regard to the tribulations and misfortunes which he lived. The ancient authorities for the life of Plato which have been transmitted to us are few, late, and untrustworthy. His biography by his pupil, companion, and successor, Xenocrates, was early lost. Of the numerous writers contemporary with him, or living in the next centuries, who treated his life, preferably or incidentally, a very few have had trustworthy materials at command, but they have commingled, or rather intermixed, them with the legendary growth which sprang up after Plato's death—a growth which should not be entirely neglected, as it exhibits the manner in which Plato was regarded by his admiring disciples, arising out

Soon after his birth he was carried to Mount Hymettus by his father and mother, that they might perform on his account the due sacrifices to the enchorial deities—Pan, the Nymphs, and the Nomian Apollo. As the infant lay sleeping on the flowers, the bees settled upon his lips, and filled his mouth with honey and the honeycomb, that Homer's verse might be accomplished, see Olympiodorus:

According to Greek usage, the child was called Aristocles, after his paternal grandfather. The name of Plato was imposed on him by Ariston of Argos, his instructor in gymnastics, on account of the breadth of his shoulders or of his forehead, or in consequence of the compass and fluency of his speech. He excelled in athletic sports as to gain the reputation of having contended in the Isthmian and other games. He began his education at an early age by studying grammar under Dionysius, and continued it by prosecuting the study of philosophy; and may have had trustworthy materials at command, but they have commingled, or rather intermixed, them with the legendary growth which sprang up after Plato's death—a growth which should not be entirely neglected, as it exhibits the manner in which Plato was regarded by his admiring disciples, arising out apprehension, eager, diligent, grave, and modest. His first ambition, as with most young men of lively genius, seems to have been for literary renown. He wrote lyrics, did not relax his dramatic compositions, and is said to have composed a tetralogy for competition in the Dionysiac festival. In the estimation of antiquity he was universally accomplished, and his writings attest a wide range of acquirement. After he entered into intimate relations with Socrates, he burned up his juvenile verses; but throughout his career he was attended by the poetic afflatus. The acquaintance with Socrates seems to have begun about his twentieth year (B.C. 407), and was probably incited by the same causes which induced other wealthy, elegant, and ambitious Athenians to frequent him; for it cannot be dismissed out of the question—desire of skill in debate, and dexterity in public harangues. Plato, or the author of the Seventh Epistle attributed to Plato, acknowledges that in youth "he was animated, like other young men, to devote himself, as soon as he was his own master, to the affairs of the commonwealth." Other attractions arose, and the association with Socrates became closer and closer with the passing years, till his venerable master was removed from him by the fatal cup of hemlock, after eight years of service.

The twelfth year of Plato, according to Grote's chronology, coincides with the return of Alcibiades to Athens, the commission of Lysander as commander of the Peloponnesian fleet, and the appointment of Cyrus as satrap of Asia. Two years later came the decisive battle of the Lamian sea, which set a seal upon the fall of Athens. The siege—the starvation—the surrender—the devastating and the humiliation of Athens. These disasters were wild imaginations, springing from the acknowledgment of Plato's service in the field, which an active, healthy youth could not have avoided, in such days of agony, without incurring the degradation of Plato might have been present at Corinth, but Delium was fought when he was only three years old; Tanagra, when he was only one, or, if the principal action of that name be regarded, thirty years before. In the state of affairs which existed in the thirty years before his marriage, there is no reason to look Plato's military service, but the scenes of that service are wholly conjectural. His intimate connection with Chabrias, in whose defence he once spoke, perhaps arose from old camaraderie.

The subjugation of Athens and the usurpation of the Thirty opened to Plato the public career which appeared barred against him during the reckless rule of the Deucalion. Critias, the leader of the Thirty, a man of splendid and various talent, of high culture, of daring energy, and of unassuming ambition, was a cousin; Charmides, one of the Ten at Plataeum, who fell in the battle with Thrasybulus, was an uncle. The gates of the political stadium were thrown wide open to him, and the prospect of rapid advancement invited his eager activity. Accepting the Seventh Epistle as genuine, we have his own declaration that he sought and obtained the opportunity afforded. His relatives, his friends, his party, so long excluded from office, were at length in power; and he entered as an aspirant along with those to whom he was united by blood, by traditional associations, by hereditary interest, and by personal propinquities. He was a born aristocrat. These things should be remembered in the appreciation of Plato's political reverses, in the estimation of his censures of Pericles and the democracy, and even in the interpretation of his sarcasms on the rhetoricians and sophists. He was himself its victim and its martyr. His loss of liberty even more than he hated a tyrant. His political prospects were, however, soon overlaid. The recent democracy had, doubtless, been lawless, savage, oppressive, and indiscriminate; but its kinsmen, Critias, Charmides, and their colleagues, were more lawless, sanguinary, rapacious, and brutal. It is safe to reject the blind partisan vilification of Grotius and of Mazzini. Whether under the rule of the mob or under the rule of the few, the internal condition of Athens had become desperate. Our histories of Greece, with all their details of license and exaction, reveal but little of the consuming fever by which Athens and her sister states were slowly perished. What outraged Plato more than anything else was the indigence and treacherous injustice shown towards his master, Socrates, himself affiliated with the dominant party. Socrates was ordered to arrest an innocent man, and to conduct him to condemnation, in order to make him implicated in the crimes of the chief. We are reminded of the nefarious counsels given by the historian and administrator Guicciarini for the repression of the prostrate and humiliated Florence. Socrates refused, and his life was endangered. At the same time his generous nature was stopped, and his instructions in the streets and highways prohibited. Plato gave up the delusive visions of reform which he subsequently ascribed to his youth, and withdrew himself from political concerns. Critias was killed in the Thirty party driven to flight, the revolution overthrown, and a complete subversion of the recent policy was effected. Plato again sought an entrance into public life. He was dragged in this direction by a strong desire, as he confesses. His inclinations were decided political. He complains of the censure of his friends, who attended to the disturbances, but admits that such moderation was shown by the restored democracy. Still the party adverse to him acquired full ascendency, and he found himself excluded from influence. His final repulse from the Athenian politics was due to his malicious indictment of Socrates, and his death under sentence of the criminal court. The peril and the condemnation of his teacher drew Plato closer to him. He attended and advised the sage in his trial. He offered to pay the fine that might be imposed upon him; and, if parted by sickness from his last serene hours, he fondly treasured up his memory and his aims, and consecrated his own life to the illustration of his virtues, and the perpetuation of the fame of his great guide and friend. Anxious and occupied with other cares as were the years of Plato's intercourse with Socrates, many of the learned German scholars who have occupied themselves with the Platonic writings have concluded that several of them were composed and published before or soon after the death of his illustrious instructor. It seems more reasonable to refer them all, or nearly all, to a much later period.

The tragic fate of Socrates dispersed the Socratic fraternity and drove Plato from Athens. He naturally feared to be involved in like odium and like danger with Socrates. It must be remembered that the real cause of enmity was mainly political—that Socrates and Plato were not merely adversaries of democratic ascendency, but had been identified with the tyranny of the Thirty. The looseness, too, and unregulated passion of Athenian procedures, civil and criminal, must also be borne in mind. Justice in the ancient law was no assured protection before an Attic dicastery. This, doubtless, intensified Plato's hereditary opposition to the rule of the majority, and would increase his distrust after the judicial murder of Socrates. He might recall the remark made by Alcibiades at the time of his flight from Sicily, that he would not trust his life to the vote of his own mother, lest she should blunder and deposit a black pebble for a white one. Plato accordingly retired from Athens, and found refuge in the house of Euclid at Megara, a fellow-pupil, and the reputed father of the Megarian school. He lived to the age of eighty. How long he continued at Megara, and how far he imbibed the doctrines of Euclid, cannot be ascertained, though Megarian tendencies may readily be recognised in his own teachings. After leaving Megara, Plato entered upon a round of distant voyages; but their extent, their order, and whether continuous or interspersed with visits to his native city, must remain undetermined. In the course of his travels he visited Cyrene, where he studied geometry under Theodorus; and then, having vowed to dedicate to Egypt, where he admired the ancient monuments, and held intercourse with the priests. Some reports alleged that he extended his journeys to Palestine, Syria, Babylonia, and even to Persia. When he was about forty years of age he visited Tarentum—where he became acquainted with the Pythagoreans, Archytas, Timaeus, Echecrates, etc.—and Syracuse, where his intimacy with Dion was formed. He is said to have been admitted at this time to the society of the elder Dionysius, and to have offended the tyrant, who sent him away in charge of Pollis, the Spartan, to be disposed of as a prisoner of war. The commission was executed, and Plato was sold as a slave in Egypt, but soon ransomed by Aniceriua, who refused reimbursement. The story is questionable in all its parts.

Immediately after this supposed adventure Plato returned to Athens, and revived in a novel and more systematic form the career of Socrates, opening a school of philosophy in the grove of the hero Academus, which adjoined a small estate of his own, either inherited or purchased, in the south of Athens, on the road to Eleusis. Here he remained for nearly forty years, in the exercise of his didactic vocation, with the exception of two absences in Sicily, each of considerable length. To this interval between the death of Socrates and the establishment of the Academy has been attributed the composition of many of the Platonic Dialogues. This has been done by German critics, who have been enabled by keen intuition to discover what was in the mind of Plato, though wholly unrevealed by himself. The object of their production in these years is not easily discernible, but their production would scarcely be afforded during the fatigues of his long journeys; nor is it likely that one so averse to the literary promulgation of his views would engage in such labors while occupied in storing his mind with multifarious knowledge, in examining the dogmas of other philosophers, and in maturing his own views. In the absence of all positive information, a decision is as absurd as it would be impossible. But the conclusion of Grote is most plausible—that the Chartist Platonism are all subsequent to Plato's entrance upon his career as a teacher. The Academy under his rule and instruction of its founder is unknown. That it was thoroughly successful is evident from the high and wide reputation of its teacher, from the distinguished names of its pupils, from the duration of their academical course, and from the flourishing condition of his death. Among the more notable of the earlier academicians were Aristotle, who attended the instructions of the great teacher for twenty years; Speusippus, the nephew of Plato, and his immediate successor; Xenocrates, who succeeded Speusippus in the direction of the school; Eudorus of Cnidus, the illustrious astronomer; the orators Demosthenes, Hyperides, and Lycurgus; the Syracusan Dion, and his comrade and murderer, Callippus. though unrecognized; the total decay of the constitution was mistaken for an accidental, transitory, and curable disease. It was a time, in some respects, like that which saw the birth and growth of the trouble in the case of society was universally experienced; when theories of all kinds—new constitutions on novel principles; socialistic, communistic, and other dreams—were in vogue, and sometimes put into practice, with only an aggravation of misery. This unhappy condition of society explains not merely Plato's failures in Sicily, but his disgust at Athenian politics, and the visionary, extravagant, and often immoral devices of his own political speculations.

The remainder of Plato's life, after his final return from Sicily, was devoted to his school. It was passed in the most profound reflection and in the most intimate intercourse with the most distinguished men of the time. He held intimate intercourse with the most distinguished personages of the period; that he was brought into close connection with Socrates and the Socratic family, with the Heracleitans, Megarics, Pythagoreans, and other schools; that his education was large and liberal; his studies, observation, and travels varied and extensive; his talents versatile and lofty; that he united the genius of the poet, the aptitudes of the rhetorician, the skill of the dialectician, the reason of the philosopher, with the diligence of a scholar, the training of a man of the world, and the propensities of a statesman. He was thus full-armed, and prepared to convert to his own use all former knowledge and speculation. How he employed his gifts and the materials at his command will be manifested by the consideration of his literary and philosophical works.

II. Writings.—The literary remains which pass under the name of Plato are among the most extensive monuments of the classic age of Athens, notwithstanding the childishness with which he regarded writing as a mode of instruction, and the repeatedly expressed preference for oral teaching. His writings have been traced to a number of different hands, and the names of the authors who have written under his name are not known. The body of works ascribed to Plato has been estimated at about fifteen thousand pages. The chief of these works are the dialogues of Plato, which are divided into two classes: the works of the philosophical school, consisting of the dialogues of Plato's school, and the works of the literary school, consisting of the dialogues of Plato's literary school. The former class includes the works of the philosophical school, consisting of the dialogues of Plato's school, and the works of the literary school, consisting of the dialogues of Plato's literary school. The latter class includes the works of the literary school, consisting of the dialogues of Plato's literary school. to later years. Some critics have supposed that the order or approximate dates could be settled by the relation of the works to Socrates in the Phaedrus, Thrasylus, and Phaedo. This is very arbitrary and fantastical, and leaves no guidance but bold conjecture. Some critics assume that certain pieces appeared during the lifetime of Socrates, others immediately after his death, others again during the period of Plato's foreign wanderings, and a large portion of the remainder in an indicated succession after the institution of the Academy. Some philological commentators decide that the Phaedrus and such other Dialogues as may suit their fancy were the first fruits of his literary fecundity, in consequence of the joyous juvenility of his own nature, the unconscious audacity of imagination, and the poetic richness of expression. But the latest productions of Edmund Burke were the richest, the most ornate, fervid, and poetical.

It is impossible to discover the chronological order of the Platonic treatises. The wide diversity of opinion on the subject, the ingenious arguments employed by discordant scholars to confirm their own theories and to refute those of others, attest this impossibility. There is as much diversity of view in regard to the sequence of the Platonic Dialogues as in regard to the dramas of Sophocles. The historical uncertainty of all conclusions is assured by the similar characteristics of both authors. The productions of each were subject to continued revision and alteration; the first draft rarely, if ever, represented the ultimate form. Additions, suppression, re-ordering of fragments, or allusion, were introduced by both into their works, which were not published in permanent form, or thrown into circulation until after the death of their authors. Hence it is an utterly delusive procedure in either case to undertake to decide the date of production by tone, by style, by doctrine, or by historical statement or allusion. The writings of Plato are not bounded by the accidents of time. They bear the impress of his hand, his heart, his soul, not at particular moments of his life, but are the flower and sum of his whole intellectual existence. Except in a few instances, which do not affect the totality of his instructions, there is no ascertainable before and after, but all stand upon the same chronological plane. The attempt to determine the order in which the several works of Plato was produced derives its chief interest from the aid thence expected in tracing the evolution of the Platonic system of thought, and the relation of each treatise to the rest. The inquiry is tempting, but, even if capable of satisfactory solution, would be more fruitless in the case of Plato than of any other philosopher. There is so little in Plato of a dogmatic character as to render each treatise, tentative, and stand as a more or less accurate and complete model of what might be in the process of development and expansion, but only the settlement of the sequence of published doubts.

The question of the connection of the Platonic writings early engaged attention. It seems to have been raised in the years immediately following Plato's death. The great critic Aristophanes of Byzantium, librarian of the Museum at Alexandria, put forth an arrangement of the more notable tractsates of Plato in a system of trilogies, the members of each trilogy being determined by community of subject or correspondence of form and treatment. The Platonic exposition is, for the most part, so thoroughly dramatic that it might naturally suggest an arrangement analogous to that observed in theatrical compositions. But the adaptation of the mould to the Platonic contents is altogether arbitrary, and proved to be inadequate in the hands of its inventors. The Lysis and Epinomis were divorced from the Republic; the Crito and Phaedo were placed in a different class from the Euthyphron and the Apology. Only fifteen of the treatises were adopted; the best were overlooked, and some were placed in single files. Grots thinks the arrangement may have been earlier than Aristophanes. The imperfections of the scheme are manifold, and provoked other distributions. By some critics his works were arranged in three classes: 1. The Direct, or dramatic; 2. The Indirect, or speculative; 3. The accidental. The first is awkward, insufficient, and indistinct. Only two, or at most three of the works of Plato are really narrative. All the rest are dialogues, and therefore dramatic; but these are composed of dialogues blended in varying proportions with narrative. Under the reign of the first emperors of Rome the Platonic remains were distributed by Thrasylus, to whom were due two distinct schemes. Imitating the example of Aristophanes, and guided by the same dramatic analogy, he disposed the whole recognised works of Plato in nine tetralogies, or groups of treatises, in which a real community of subject and an orderly development are manifest, was formed of the Euthyphron, Apology, Crito, and Phaedo—which still lead the procesion of the Corpus Platonicum in nearly all editions of Plato's works. But the tetralogies of Thrasylus had no more chronological truth, and rarely more logical coherence, than the trilogies of the Alexandrian school. They do not seem to have satisfied himself, for he proposed another and totally diverse classification of the Platonic memorials, founded upon their form and aim rather than on their subject-matter. Thrasylus distinguished the Platonic treatments into: I. Inquisitory; II. Expository. The Inquisitory productions were divided into, A. Gymnastic; B. Agnostic. The Gymnastic were subdivided into, I. Obstetrical; II. Peirastic. The Expository were from Time Ancient, C. Confirmatory, or Monstratory; and 2. Refutatory. The Expository treatises were separated into, C. Theoretical, and D. Practical. Each of these contained two classes: the Theoretical—1. Physical; 2. Logical; and the Practical—1. Ethical, and 2. Political. The two schemes are exhibited by Grote in tabular form (Plato, vol. i, ch. iv, p. 161, 162).

The ancients thus renounced the effort to reduce into a connected series the writings of Plato, either by the evidence of the order of their production, or by hypothetical indications of their logical and philosophical interdependence. Such disappointment did not cool the ardor or repress the audacity of the German philologists. Schleiermacher bluntly assumed that the various productions of I. constiuted preconceived and well-ordered parts of a systematic doctrine, contemplate in its integrity from the beginning of his career. Starting from this point, he undertook to detect by internal signs the periods of production, the relation of the parts to each other, the purpose of each treatise, and the constitution of the whole philosophy. Whatever did not accord with the system was rejected as an error, and rejected as a fraudulent pretense. Schleiermacher's views raised up a host of opponents, but a host of imitators of his procedure also. It is not appropriate to examine here the theory of Schleiermacher, or the theories of his antagonists; or to point out what has been admitted and what rejected by each of the acute disputants. The theses of Schleiermacher, Ast, Socher, C. K. Hermann, Stallbaum, Steinhardt, Stüemihl, Munk, and Ueberweg are carefully stated, weighed, and judged in Grote's laborious and tedious work. The discussion is noticed here because it involves the decision of two very important points in the appreciation of the doctrine of Plato: Was there any unity of design in the literary productions of this philosopher? Is there any unity of execution, any methodical scheme of philosophy in them? In other words, did Plato contemplate from the commencement of his career the elaboration of that scheme which may be deduced from his works? Does each separate work bear, from the intention of its author, a definite relation, and render a definite service to any complete doctrine? Are the works of Plato a system? Or, as, in the main, occasional and fragmentary presentations of disconnected parts of philosophical inquiry? These questions probe the whole significance PLATO's career and of the Platonic doctrine, and we assent substantially to the conclusions of Grote. The tide of a preconceived plan had been rejected by Ast, Socher, Hermann, Stallbaum, and others, before it was impugned by Grote. A system of philosophy is always a production of slow and gradual growth, requiring not merely a long time and a great deal of labour, but also favorable circumstances, so that it is rarely completed by its originator, except in method and broken outline. The philosophy of Comte is one of the few instances of complete organization by the author himself; the philosophy of Leibnitz an instance of the much commoner result of only fragmentary indication. The assumption of Schleiermacher is at variance with nearly all experience. Certain fundamental views in regard to principle or method, usually to both, for they are almost indissolubly connected, present themselves to the quick apprehension and creative imagination of the young philosopher. These long struggle to shape themselves into definite form. They are at first vague, though luminous; active, though indeterminate; indistinct in outline, though of penetrating radiance. As separate questions are discussed, and the difficulty is impelled upon the contemplative mind by the guidance of the new light: and each successive discussion renders this new force more distinct, more prominent, and more controlling. With the proc-es of such expansion, new modifications and new ap-lications are introduced, and it is only when an opportunity is given to review the chain of progression, for revising the plan of philosophy, that a philosopher is enabled to present his doctrine in harmonious integity. Was this opportunity afforded to Plato, outside of the sphere of his acosmatic expostions? It may well be doubted, if not roundly denied. In his published works we find fragmentary revelations only, accompanied by incongruities and positive inconsistences, which would surely have been absent from speculations complete in the mind of the philosopher, and not merely in various stages of development.
If there was no unity of purpose in the several productions, if they were never contemplated in their conception as parts of a general and concordant system, there could scarcely be any definite unity in their execution. The whole is composed of all its parts. The meditated whole may, indeed, be discerned "by the mind's eye" where several of the parts have been lost or never supplied, as any circle may be completed from a single arc, or from the broken segments of the same circumference. But that this may be done it is essential that all the members or preserved shall have the same curvature, shall have the same radius, the same radial revolution rounding the same centre. This cannot be said, and cannot be supposed without violent premises, of the Platonics treatises. All that we know, and all that we can positively discern, is adverse to such an hypothesis. The whole of Plato is singularly various; its variety is one of the most salient indications of the wealth, freedom, and activity of his genius. The structure of the several dialogues is so ingenious diversified as to render them incapable of classification, like the plays of Shakespeare, each a distinct species in itself. Plato's way of procedure is as elastic as his style. The Socratic method of disputation may be usually retained, but its spirit is curiously changed in different applications, and its prominence is varied. The points of view, the central stations, are constantly shifted in passing from one dialogue to another; and, as a necessary result, the aspects presented are changed—the tendencies are dissimilar and the doctrines are uncoalescing. But more than this: very few of the treatises of Plato are constructive or systematic. Nearly all of them are simply negative or inquisitorial. The latter do not seek to maintain any dependence on the former. They are separated by the whole diameter of the intellectual spere. It is only in a few of his works—presumably the late and still crude products of his old age, the second fruitage that never ripens—that Plato enunciates principles which are neither inductions nor deductions, and propounds dogmas which are rather germs of undeveloped speculation than the partial representation of the conclusions of a system already completed and formulated. However greatly he may have travelled and sublimated his character from his first appearance as philosophical protagonist, his procedure was in the main and throughout honestly and earnestly Socratic, and his aim was Socratic also. His object was not the establishment of a doctrine, but the stimulation of candid investigation, in order to free his hearers from the stagnation of thought and the obsession of vulgar or treacherous errors. He was not a doctrine, but an inquirer; or, rather, he taught the need and practice of investigation, not a body of conclusions. Undoubtedly there is an intellectual unity, vague, unformed, and in great measure unconscious, in the constitution of every man, there is a mental identity, through innumerable and often wide changes of opinion, in the entire career of every thinker, and this unity and this identity, intuitively recognised by the pupil or student, will suggest purpose where no purpose was previously impelled, and guided by the light of an imaginary system which never revealed itself to its parent. To this cause may be largely assigned the strange and divergent developments of the Platonics philosophy in the several schools which sheltered their reveries under the prestige of his great name. It would lead us too far for one purpose to enter into this question of the origin of dogmas, nor is there any place in the view of the author. For us they exist as distinct imaginary conversations, composed by the same author at unknown times and under unknown specialties of circumstance" (PLATO, vol. i, ch. vi, p. 279).

The mode in which these questions may be decided regulates the interpretation to be given to the Platonic philosophy, both in the original conception of its author and in its subsequent developments. It explains the origin, the cause, and the filiation of the later divergencies, and their wide separation from each other. It determines our appreciation of the nature and extent of Plato's services to his own and future times, fixes his position in the history of philosophy, and ushers in the same radiance of the human intellect. It affects our estimate of his relation to his disciples, to his country, and to his times; and, indeed, penetrates and colors every part of the criticism which may be hazarded on his personal and speculative career.

III. Relations to his Times.—For the just and adequate conception of Plato it is indispensable to ascertain his actual position in the Hellenic world, and his attidueto Attic thought, the thought both of the general public and of the cultivated intelligences in that period of mental activity which follows the death of Pericles. To do this it is necessary to consider the remarkable mission of Socrates; for, however Plato may have transmitted and glorified his master, he unquestionably continued his labors in a higher sphere, and both spoke in his name and possessed the power of public results. The extreme democracy of Athens, which was only the fullest and most pronounced exhibition of the general Hellenic tendency, threw all power—political, social, and, we may almost say, religious—into the hands of the multitude. The populace became more constructive, more wilful, arrogant, and reckless after the generation produced by the Peloponnesian War and the plague. But the intractable Demus, described in burning lineaments by Ariosto, is always under the guidance or at the mercy of demagogues, flatterers, and time-serving plato278plato

The sense of power produced in the mass in the feeling of right, for with mere numbers "might is right;" and the execrable maxim, "Stet pro ratione voluntas," is the motto of an ochlocracy even more than it is of an autocrat. The mob cannot be led by considerations of abstract morality; it may be wheedled by promises, swelling phrases, by dramatic appeals to its whims, passions, and immediate interests. At Athens it had lost all reverence for the cardinal principles of right; it had been greatly corrupted by the incidents and consequences of the war; it was habitually misguided for some time by its passionate leaders; generousness, mercy, justice, prudence, were all discredited; and everything was sacrificed to momentary caprice, to insane suspicion, and to blind fury (Plato, De Rep. viii., x.-xiii.; Xenoph. De Rep. Ath. Oratores Attici, passim). In these respects the Athenians were merely the highest exemplification of the contemporaneous spirit of the Greeks. The leaders, who debauched the people, could hope to gain or to retain their ascendancy only by encouraging the debauched sentiments by which they thrived. Under these circumstances professed teachers visited the houses and the galleys, under-taking to communicate for the corrodery arts by which the populace might be swayed, and office, power, honor, and emolument acquired. By the union of these bad influences truth lost all respect; virtue all authority; the sense of right was destroyed; every ancient rule of practical politics was deprived of its sanction; every venerable principle was brought into contempt; morality was supplanted by passion or apparent expediency; nothing stable was suffered to remain; words became jugglers' tools, reason was degraded to chicanery, casuistry, and sonorous plausibility; and specious rhetoric or ambiguous commonplaces took the place of wisdom. No hope could be entertained for the renewed health of society, for the welfare of the community, for the restoration of order in the state, till this vicious circle of delusions had been broken and suppressed. But the delusions, and the pernicious practices which attended them, were fortified by the conceit of knowledge and of practical sagacity; and this conceit could not be overcome without exposing the ignorance which it concealed, and compelling the vain tribe of blind leaders of the blind to confess their ignorance with shame and remorse. The most effective mode of reaching this result might well seem to be the examination of the nature, import, and ambiguities of words, habitually and loosely used without reference to their special significance or insignificance, the investigation of the shadowy, casuistic, and sonorous plausibility; and the detection of the conditions under which valid conclusions might be drawn. Lessons of this character could not be effectually communicated to persons confident in their own knowledge and perspicacity, and contemptuous all who were of a different communion, otherwise than by proposing a series of interrogations growing not out of each other, but out of the argumentation, and thus leading the respondents into a labyrinth of perplexities, absurdities, inconsistencies, and impotent confusion. No escape would then be left from the recognition of previous ignorance and error. The better nature would be stimulated to further inquiry, and to persistent efforts to attain a knowledge of momentous truths, or, at least, to abstain from the preconization of manifest uncertainties, unmeaning verbiage, or interested misrepresentations, as unquestionable truth. Now this procedure was the Socratic elénchus, and it was most effectually carried on by the Socratic form of reasoning, most fallacious form of reasoning, but most piercing in unveiling the hollow pretensions of arrogant sophistry. It was a keen "examination of conscience," intended to lay bare the habitual sins of ignorance, false knowledge, and fraudulent conceit. It was not designed to teach anything but the knowledge of self, and the accompanying knowledge of ignorance disguised as wisdom. This was the true Noēse toipum, and the ground on which the Delphic Oracle pronounced Socrates the wisest of men—because he professed to know nothing. It was a contrivance for sweeping away error, as the true blasts of the Socratic oracles, by discrediting its various appeals to its whims, passions, and immediate interests. At Athens it had lost all reverence for the cardinal principles of right; it had been greatly corrupted by the incidents and consequences of the war; it was habitually misguided for some time by its passionate leaders; generousness, mercy, justice, prudence, were all discredited; and everything was sacrificed to momentary caprice, to insane suspicion, and to blind fury (Plato, De Rep. viii., x.-xiii.; Xenoph. Now this procedure was the Socratic elénchus, and it was most effectually carried on by the Socratic form of reasoning, most fallacious form of reasoning, but most piercing in unveiling the hollow pretensions of arrogant sophistry. It was a keen "examination of conscience," intended to lay bare the habitual sins of ignorance, false knowledge, and fraudulent conceit. It was not designed to teach Socrates the principal speaker, illustrating the Socratic method under the mask of Socrates, and putting nearly everything of weight, moment, or originality into his mouth. He never appears in propria persona. There is nothing to connect him before the Athenian dicatars, with any of the retinue of his admirers. It is to an intense and intricate desire of a constant avoidance of definite doctrine, a frequent censure of written instruction, a continual reference to the ob- stetrical procedure, and a deliberate renunciation of all responsibility. Everything is thus adverse to systema- tic unity of any kind in the Corpus Platonicum. The dramatic form of nearly all the Platonic writings has just been mentioned as one of the instrumentalties by which the philosopher subdued his personality, and withdrew himself from the malice of his fellow-citizens; but it constitutes one of the distinguishing excellences of his composition. Whatever construction may be put upon Plato's philosophical career, whatever value may be assigned to his speculations, whatever censure of his doctrines may be hazarded, his varied literary merits and graces have always won the most enthusiastic admira- tion. In a beautiful epigram on his great comrade, Plato contemporary attributed to him, Plato says that the Graces found in the soul of Aristophanes a temple which should never decay. The comedies of Aristophanes were Pla- to's constant companions. He caught from them many delightful turns which were solely refused to a more thoughtful mind, and he offered in his own Protagonist an equally im- perishable temple for the habitation of the Graces. Plato probably owes much more of his immortality to the beauties of his compositions than he does to his philosophic splendor and profundity; and perhaps it was chiefly through the fascination of his manner that his doctrines secured the attention necessary for their ap- praisal and acceptance. The literary attractions of the Platonic writings furnish their first and most easily recognized claim to permanent renown, and can scarcely be a mere accidental circumstance. Plato's earliest efforts were in the direction of poetry. He is believed to have produced attempts of high pre- tention in the popular forms of poetic art. No literary ap- prehensiveness equals poetical composition. When he first associated himself with Socrates he was full of dreams of political distinction, and he may have expected to derive from the intercourse the same aids for a political career which were derived by other illustrious pupils of the school. When he renounced the temptations of a political career, he converted to philosophic purposes all the enthusiasm and all the ardor of his youth. He abandoned his former line of ap- parent expression which he had acquired by his pre- vious discipline. The result was a style unrivaled for variety, fertility, vivacity, ease, flexibility, and almost every form of literary excellence. The great difficulty of expression—to say simple things simply, and ordi- nary things with propriety (difficulté est communis di- cre) —was never surmounted by any writer with such facility as by Plato. None has approached him in the natural facility with which he changes the mood of ex- pression with the changed mood of feeling, or with the requirements of the object of his treatise. He treats "from more grave to gay, from lively to severe," with inimitable self-possession; rising without effort to the highest sub- limities of imagination, descending without a fall to the playfulness of unchecked humor, and poising himself in the middle air without hazard and without uneasy flut- tering of his pinions.

The exuberance of the Greek vocabulary can be esti- mated only by comparing Aristophanes with Plato— not that they exhaust its wealth, but that they have an equal mastery of its treasures than any other writ- ers of the tongue. In this comparison Plato will not appear inferior to Aristophanes in the extent of his pos- session, in the happiness of their employment, or in the force of their combinations. Words, are, however, only the currency of thought and feeling. The pre- eminent merit of Plato is equally manifest in the plas- ticity of his phraseology; the appropriate turns of ex- pression—the homesickness at times, at times the rare magnificence of his diction; the close adaptation of the utterance to the sentiment, so as to furnish a perfect cast of whatever is intended to be conveyed, no matter how convoluted and intricate the phrase may be. A constant balance must be added the balance and harmony of all the instrumenta-practical interest and significance. The total neglect into which the great schoolmen have fallen, when contrasted with the unfading fame of Plato, may prove how much of his genius in every age has been due to his literary skill and the marvellous subtlety and perfection of his dialogue.

If we frankly and admiringly confess the variety and splendor of the Platonic style, we must not close our eyes to its occasional defects. The copiousness of his expression, and the joy of indulging his genius encouraged loquacity and a needless languor of movement. The richness of his imagination, lavished upon reveries, also led to turgidity and inappropriate gorgeousness of rhetoric. These defects were noticed by the ancient critics, and can sometimes be overlooked by the sober modern student (Dionys. Halicarn. De There is the brilliancy, but there is also the extravagance of the Melitonic outbursts of fancy, and, as the language far outstrips the thought, it becomes obscure, like a cloud before the sun, whose darkness is deepened by the fringe of radiance on its borders.

It is not merely from this cause that Plato frequently lapses into obscurities and awkwardnesses. He is sometimes more concerned about his expression than about his thought, and his works reflect his magnificence to himself, and in mysteries not clear to his own mind. There was constant demand for the services of a Delian diver.
The subjects which he handled were not only deep, but unfathomable by him; not only dark, but undefined.
Theoverlaying approaches by which he was balked was reflected by the insubstantiality of his utterances. There was also a misleading star by which he was often led astray, and tempted into pathless intricacies. The imagination of Plato was the commanding faculty of his intellect, and he followed its beams too far. He was a poet by congenital propensity. Aristotle has said that the philosopher is a devotee of fable (φαλάνθρες ὁ φιλόσοφος φαλάνθρες, Metaph. i, ii, p. 982). Plato furnished the example and confirmed the dictum. He insisted upon the employment of philosophical fiction as the best means of popular education; and proposed to substitute it for the great poets—Homer, Pindar, and the Traged-ians—whom he condemned and excluded from his commonwealth. He was constantly indulging his poetic appetites, inverting fables for the illustration of his positions, and converting his fables into philosophical verses. Plato filled them with luxurious pictures of more than fantastic dreams—"tenuis sine corpore vi-tas"? This tendency, which grew with years, eventuated in mysticism; and mysticism is at best a luminous cloud, unsubstantial, impalpable, inappraisable, how can it be shown to be true and without reciprocal V. Philosophy.—From what has already been observed, it will be evident that we could not ascribe to Plato a definite, distinct, coherent, and complete body of doctrine. But philosophy, in its original application, and peculiarly in the Socratic school, imparted the love and pursuit of truth and wisdom, without assuming their actual attainment. In the philosophy of every sect, the method of inquiry and the gerrn of fundamental principles constitute its distinctive characteristics and excellences, and determine its superior developments, whether wrought out by the founder of the school or by his successors. Thus, though we may deny to Plato the full creation of a philosophic system, we must admit that he laid the corner-stone and some of the foundations of a system; that he opened out new paths of inquiry and broadened old ones, that he stimulated investigation by characteristic modes, and communicated a potent impulse in a particular direction; and that he furnished new and pregnant germs of thought to be cherished into ample growth and production by those who should come after him. These germs are as yet without life, as yet without reciprocal connection; but they may be discovered, harmonized, and combined. Though their meaning may appear diverse to different minds, their combinations be variously established, and their developments be strangely divergent, yet a general accordance in the constitution of all the expositions of his system and his doctrine attests the presence of a distinctive and fruitful though undisclosed body of thought in the original founder of the sect. It is this body of thought, indicated, but unequally and imperfectly revealed, in the Platonic manifestations—manifested from them, and co-narrated by a succession of sects, that constitutes that first in the authentic texts—which constitutes the philosophy of Plato. Partly in consequence of the length of this notice, partly in consequence of the impossibility of refer-ing the connected scheme in its connected form to Plato, it will be presented in a brief outline under the head of PLATONIC PHILOSOPHY.

VI. Services and Influence.—A few remarks may be added here on the character and tendency of the Platonic teachings, as no appropriate place will be found for them in the present examination of Platonic doctrine. The aim of Plato was to bring his pupils to a knowledge of their intellectual sins, and to a confession of ignorance and guilt in their pretensions and practices, in order that a foundation for truth might be discovered, and the rules of correct action and upright conduct must be found. The whole enterprise of the object was to confute intellectual chicanery, to dispel delusion, and to lead men to an eager desire for justice, righteousness, and wisdom. For his greater pupil, Aristotle, was reserved the task of building on the ground which he had prepared in form and ruin and poisonous weeds. But the vast and magnificent structures of the Stagirite are the best proof of the valuable service which Plato rendered. The domination of sophistry was ended by the career of Socrates and the institution of Plato's Academy. In various modes, earnest men addressed themselves to the search for truth, and ceased to wander after "sounding brass and tinkling cymbals.
Healthy thought, eager purpose, and honest resolution were reawakened throughout the realm of Hellenic intellect; and, though devious paths were pursued, and dissimilar resting-places accepted as the goal, all prosecuted their investigations with a single eye to truth, and not as the means of fraudulently gaining personal advantage. As the Knights of the Round Table separated in the quest of the Holy Grail, which only one achieved, the philosophers of Greece, after Socrates passed away, travelled and lost in Platonic groves. The philosophers, however, on the Platonic trail, pursued the same end, though Aristotle alone accomplished the task which all contemplated. The pursuit of the summum bonum, or supreme good, became after Plato the special object of all philosophy (Cicero, De Fis. Bon. et Mal.).
Divergence was found in the backs of the inquiry, but the forms of good which were contemplated, but with all the schools virtue and happiness, which was its promised fruit, were the aim. The utter rotenessness of the communities of Greece, the irreparable disintegration of Hellenic society, prevented the new spirit from influsing health into the diseased political fabric; but the unexamined integrity of Lycurgus, and the exalted morality of Demosthenes in his Orations, both alleged pupils of Plato, may be taken as evidence of the whole some reaction produced. To the lofty and pure sentiments of Plato, even more than to the beauty of his style, may be applied the observation of Quintilian:
"Ut mihi non hominis ingenio sed quodam Delphico videatur oracula instructus" (Or. Inst. x, i, 81).

The philosophy and the habitual sentiments of Greece were purified and elevated by the teachings of Plato, and the world never wholly lost the vantage-ground which had thus been gained. There is indeed nothing more remarkable in the history of Greek intellect than the purity of sentiment, the spirituality of aspiration, the adoration of virtue and holiness and justice and right, the fervent and unbroken re-rose, irrespective of consequences, and the intuitive apprehension of the highest precepts of morality, which shine through all the writings of Plato. They are blended, occasionally, it is true, with coarse views contracted from the habitual practice of the pagan world around. Some of these views are too disgusting to be commended on any count, and Plato, in the actual or spiritualized, is like the Pythagorean averse to all but the purest of human feelings. When he advocates the community of goods and the community of women, and the paternal abnegation of children, in the governing class of his ideal commonwealth, we see how far the fantasy betrayed him into pernicious error (De Rep. v.). There was no greater service rendered to the human soul than the confutation of these dangers and immoral extravagances. But when we contemplate the positions of Plato in regard to the perfections of God, to the nature of virtue and holiness; when we consider his declaration that man should assimilate himself to the Deity, that God is the source of good, but not of evil, that the regeneration of the spiritual nature is not to be attained by argumentative reasoning, and cannot be taught as a science or an art; when we regard his assertion of the immortality of the soul, his belief in future retribution, his assertion that the highest truth must be revealed, his delineation of the Son of God (τοῦ Θεοῦ γιγνομένου)—it is impossible to overlook his vast superiority over all former schemes of morality, and his near approximation to the doctrines of Christianity—some of which he announced, and some of which he deprecated, as unnecessary. We know no more terrible and sublime passage than the passage in which he depicts the dead presenting themselves for judgment in the other world, scoured and bloated and branded with the indelible marks of their earthly sins (ψυχήν διὰ σαμμαρισμοῦ καὶ αἰχματούσην ἀπὸ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἐπὶ τὴν ψυχήν, κ. τ. λ. Gorg. c. 112). Yet this is but one of many analogous passages. This approximation to revealed truth is among the most insoluble problems bequeathed to us by antiquity. It has been derived of much of his theological and ethical doctrine from the Hebrew prophets, either circuitously or by direct acquisition during his supposed travels in Palestine. But his tenets are not to be found in those prophets in such a form as to be apprehended by a Gentile; nor can they be detected in them except through the illumination of the later revelation. It has been alleged that the spiritual interpretation of these utterances, which gives them their startling significance, is unwar- rantedly deduced from the Neo-Platonists, who were possibly the first to realize it. But the tenets of the Greek Master are hesitating and only problematical—dreams thrown out as possibilities, the vague longings of the ecstatic fancy—but the mystery remains; how could such dreams and longings arise in the midst of paganism, and of Athe- nian degradation and corruption? We offer no solution of the enigma, which awaits its Odysseus. We only note the existence of the riddle. There are marvels in the life of men and of nations which no plummet in man's bands can fathom, but which justify the conviction that, as the spirit of God brooded over the face of the deep, and brought order and beauty and life out of chaos, so it incessantly broods over the dark confusion of earthly change, regenerating all issues, and preparing the world, in the midst of manifold disorder, for the higher and purer phases of being for which it is designed, and towards which it is blindly striving. We are not of the number of those who accept without inquiry the tenets of Plato, or approve the whole tendency of his teachings. We are of another school. We recognize, however, that his aims are always noble, and that an invigorating morality breathes through nearly all his works. We are the recipients of many glorious visions of supernal beauty, which beam upon us like the unattainable stars disclosed through rifts in the clouds which envelop the earth. But the philosophy of Plato is essentially mystical, and consequently unsubstantial; and, though mysticism may in- }

A third and admirable version, recently produced, satisfies the desires and removes the grounds of censure expressed by Rogers: Jowett, The Dialogues of Plato, translated into English, with Analyses and Introductions (republished N.Y. 1874, 4 vols. 8vo). A new and revised edition of the work has recently appeared.

PLATON

Antique Bust of Plato.

Platon, a celebrated Russian prelate of modern times, whose family name was Reffechin, was born June 29, 1737. He was the son of a village priest near Moscow, in the university of which capital he received his education, and, besides studying the classical tongues, made considerable proficiency in the sciences. His talents soon caused him to be noticed, and, while a student in theology, he was appointed, in 1757, teacher of poetry at the Moscow academy, and in the following year began to publish in the seminary of the St. Sergius Lawra, and convert. He shortly afterwards entered the Church, became successively hieromonach, prefect of the seminary, and, in 1762, rector and professor of theology. That same year was marked by an event in his life which greatly contributed to his advancement, for on the visit of Catharine II to the St. Sergius Lawra, after her coronation, he addressed the empress in an eloquent discourse, and on another occasion preached before her. So favorable was the impression he made, that he was forthwith appointed court preacher and preceptor in matters of religion to the grand- duke (afterwards the emperor Paul), for whose instruction he drew up his Orthodox Faith, or Outlines of Christian Theology, which is esteemed one of his best and most useful productions, and has been reproduced in English by Pinkerton (Lond. 1814), by Coray (1857), and by Potissaco (1868). During the four years of his residence at St. Petersburg, Platon frequently preached before the court, and also delivered orations on many of the discourses and orations which are among his printed works. After being created member of the synod at Moscow, by an imperial order, he was made archbishop of Twer in 1770. His attention to the duties of his new office was assiduous and exemplary; for he not only set about improving the course of study pursued in the various seminaries throughout his diocese, but established a number of minor schools for religious instruction, and drew up two separate treatises, one for the use of the teachers, and the other for their pupils. He was also intrusted with the task of urging the princess of Wurtemberg, Maria Feodorowna, the grand-duke's consort, in the tenets and doctrines of the Greek-Russian Church. At the beginning of 1775 he received the empress at Twer, and proceeded with her and the grand-duke to Moscow. He was advanced to the powerful position to retain the archimandritship of the Sergius Lawra. With the exception of some intervals occasioned by his being summoned to St. Petersburg, where he preached before the court, it was in that convent that he chiefly resided, until he was erected another in his vicinity at his own expense, in 1785, called the Bethania. Two years afterwards he was made metropolitan of the Russian Church, in which capacity he crowned the emperor Alexander, at Moscow, in 1801, delivering on that occasion a discourse that was translated into several modern languages, besides Latin and Greek. He died in 1818, the bishop of Bethania, Nov. 11–23, 1812. His works, printed at different times, amount in all to twenty volumes, containing, besides various other pieces, 555 sermons, discourses, and orations, many of which are considered masterpieces in style and eloquence. A selection from them, consisting of the finest passages and thoughts, was published in two volumes in 1805—English Cyclop. a. v. See Mouravieff, Hist. of the Church of Russia (Okt. 1842); Otto, Hist. of Russian Literature, p. 327–380; Hagenbach, Hist. of Christian Doctrines, ii, 452, 468; Schlegel, Kiewer Sprach, des 18ten Jahrh. i, 70–80.

Platonic Philosophy, or the philosophy of Plato. The term is loosely and ambiguously applied. It is sometimes used to signify the collection of fragmentary views scattered through the writings of Plato; sometimes it is employed to denote the systematic co-ordination and development of those views by the later academicians; and, most frequently, it is extended to embrace the whole chain of opinion which may be deduced from, or which claims filiation with, the teachings of Plato. These diverse applications of the name are rarely discriminated in ordinary use, and its specific import is left vague and undetermined. This indistinctness cannot be wholly avoided, for it rises out of the disconnected utterances and unsystematic presentations of Plato himself, together with the concurrence of his successors in their efforts to elucidate and systematize his doctrines. In attempting an outline of the Platonic philosophy, the effort will be made to adhere as closely as practicable to the authentic texts in the writings accredited to Plato, and to borrow as little as may be from the speculative inferences of the later authors.

Numerous devices have been employed for the exhibition of the Platonic doctrine, and none of them are entirely satisfactory. It is necessary for a synoptical exposition that some thread should be discovered or invented for the support and connection of its several members, and that some definite commencement should be assumed to which the thread may be attached. The fixed point of departure has been variously chosen; and the tenets of Plato have been strung variously, and with various degrees of skill, on the thread adopted. The Germans, with their inner light and their diverging assumptions, have been peculiarly ingenious, and often peculiarly unhappy, in the performance of their task. They abound in luminous views and in acute suggestions, but they generate such an intricate labyrinth of cross-threads that they dazzle, bewilder, and blind as much as they illuminate. To these they add their arbitrary opinions on Plato, as regards both the import and the coherence of his doctrines. They assert design where no design can be safely asserted. They imagine dependence where all is disconnected; and pretend to explain where systems are not the results of inquiry, feeling the difficulty and the hazard of the task, have been content, like the translators and many of the editors of Plato, to give an abstract or analysis of the several pieces, with an appreciation of their contents. This leaves the doctrines in their original segregation, and affords little aid in bringing them into one harmonious picture. This process has been, in the main, followed by Grote, whose extensive work appears revised, rearranged, and organized within a compact scheme, which could not have been contemplated by Plato. In avoiding Scylus on the one hand, and Charybdis on the other, we are thrown back upon the original record, with such assistance as may be derived from illustrative works, and especially from the historians of ancient philosophy. Among these expositors, the one who may still render the best service is Brucker. He is in many respects antiquated; he has morbid antipathies and scornful condescensions; he is very mechanical, and even wooden in his arrangements; but he is honest, earnest, industrious, and practical. The very method of his procedure is serviceable, when we seek a summary but connected view of the doctrines which Plato taught, or was supposed in ancient times to have taught.

The leading object of Plato's life and philosophical activity was to teach the Greeks the correct use of reason, and to induce them to apply it, with a constant observance of the requisite conditions, to the practical concerns of private and public life. The human mind, like its constitution and from the defects of its instrument of communication, is ever exposed to the hazard of plausible delusions, and to the peril of accepting fallacies for irrefragable truth. These pernicious consequences were the daily diet of the Athenian people. Hence arose errors in morals, disregard of virtue, indifference to wrong-doing, unremitting license of individual passion or caprice, disintegration of society, corruption, and anarchy. How were welfare, virtue, and happiness to be attained in this mass of disorder? What were justice, right, truth? How were they to be detected, appreciated, and appropriated? On truth everything else reposed; but other Greeks besides the Cretans were habitual liars (Graciu mendax). What is truth? The interrogation of Pilate was the fundamental question propounded by Plato to himself and to his age; and, in propounding it, he trod in the steps of Socrates, as a whole series of questions about the essence of being, and they must agree with each other. How are they to be reached and reconciled? If the instruments of knowledge are broken, warped, or otherwise disordered, there can be no true knowledge, and no valid apprehension of the character and relation of the facts with which we have to do. The purpose of Plato was, in some respects, similar to the purpose of Bacon. Bacon proposed to rectify the processes of reasoning in the investigation of nature, for the attainment of scientific knowledge, and for the practical benefits thence to be derived. Plato, in a more general manner, for the intellectual and moral improvement of men, of societies, and of states. Coleridge has enlarged upon the correspondences of Plato and Bacon, and has exaggerated them. It was a fine and just instinct which suggested the parallelism. With Plato, as with Bacon, the first step was the exposure and expulsion of confused ignorance and presumptuous error; the refutation of the vast brood of sophisms which swarmed around every principle of speculation and conduct; the determination of the character, extent, and value of imperfect knowledge, in order to secure the legitimate use of reasoning, and for the avoidance of its abuse. Only after this had been done would it be possible to arrive at trustworthy knowledge or safe opinion in regard to the universe of which we are members, and in regard to the relations in which we stand to it and to its parts. The truth of being, as a subject of knowledge, thus demanded and presupposed the truth of knowledge, not in its rounded fulness, but in its formulary of procedure. In the ultimate and unattainable result, the truth of knowledge would accord and be superficially coextensive with the truth of being, as the province of the art of discerning corresponds with the object reflected. Not until such a recognition of the truth of being was gained as the competency of the weak, fallible, finite mind of man might permit, could the conduct of men find safe and authoritative regulation, and the truth of action, or right in all moral contingencies, be discovered. To reason accurately in order to know the essential character of the facts on which action should depend, and by which it must be controlled, and to use right reason and correct knowledge of facts for the determination of right action, may be said to be an abstract statement of the Platonic scheme, which thus embraces the whole duty of man. The intricate casuistry of Plato, and the breathless flights of his daring and playful fancy, withdrew attention from his solens, earnest, direct, everyday aim. The method of his procedure is serviceable, when we seek a summary but connected view of the doctrines which Plato taught, or was supposed in ancient times to have taught.

In strict accordance with this interpretation of Plato's latent meaning, his philosophy is distributed under three heads: I. Dialectical Philosophy; II. Theoretical, Contemplative, or Physical; III. Practical (Cicero, Acad. Quest. i, § 19). The second and third divisions are subdivided. This distribution is not distinctly proposed in Plato's works, but it is implied in them. It is accredited by Sextus Empiricus to Xenocrates, Plato's second successor in the Academy. The terms employed are earlier than Plato, as are the inquiries also. It must not be forgotten that though Plato was in the main Socratean, he was also a votary of other doctrines - Eclectic, if not Synergetistic, and, in his later writings, largely Pythagorean.

I. Dialectical Philosophy. The term "Dialectic" includes in Plato much more than it does in Aristotle (Sophist, p. 253; De Rep. vii, 582-583; Aristotle, Topica, i. 1. Sophist, Elech. xxxii; Metaph. ii. i; iii. 2; Eth. i. 2). It is not confined to the art of probable argumentation, nor to the discovery of truth by argumentation, the characteristics of correct and incorrect reasoning, the conduct of the understanding, and so much of psychology as is concerned with the operations of the mind in the acquisition, estimation, and communication of knowledge. This wide range may be illustrated by Lord Bacon's inclusion under the title of the "Artes Interscientifiae, Judicandae, Retinendae, et Tradendae" (De Augm. Sci. v, 6).

There is a fundamental enigma which demands solution at the commencement of all inquiry, and which has been designated the problem in a startling manner in more general manner, for the intellectual and moral improvement of men, of societies, and of states. Coleridge has enlarged upon the correspondences of Plato and Bacon, and has exaggerated them. It was a fine and just instinct which suggested the parallelism. With Plato, as with Bacon, the first step was the exposure and expulsion of confused ignorance and presumptuous error; the refutation of the vast brood of sophisms which swarmed around every principle of speculation and conduct; the determination of the character, extent, and value of imperfect knowledge, in order to secure the legitimate use of reasoning, and for the avoidance of its abuse. Only after this had been done would it be possible to arrive at trustworthy knowledge or safe opinion in regard to the universe of which we are members, and in regard to the relations in which we
PLATONIC PHILOSOPHY

"nai intellectus ipse." The mind is its own place. It is lord of itself, and of all the world beside. Sense is an affection of the mind through the intervention of the corporeal sensibilities. Permanent impressions made by the senses are retained by the faculty of memory. The mind receives with its sensitive experiences constitutes opinion—true opinion when they agree, false opinion when they are discordant (Phileb., p. 84; Theaet., p. 186). The knowledge of things in time is uncertain, and amounts only to opinion. The human mind may be conceived to be a tablet of wax, ready to receive and to retain any impression. This is, however, merely an illustration (Xyloph. Iren.). Thought is the commingling of the mind with itself. Speech is the sensible utterance of thought. Words are not knowledge, but only the means and vehicle of knowledge (Theatet., p. 191, 292).

Intelligence, or real knowledge, is the action of the mind in the contemplation of the prime Intelligibles, or incorporeal types of being. It is twofold; the first is the perception of the soul, which beheld its appropriate Intelligible, before descending into the body; the second or real knowledge is that which the mind receives while enveloped in its carnal integument. The latter, or mundane knowledge, is the restored but broken recollection of what had been known in a pre-existent state, and must be distinguished from the acquisitions of knowledge which are associated with things intelligible, as the other is with things sensible (Timaeus, p. 30; Phaedon, p. 74-76; comp. Wordsworth, Ode on Intimations of Immortality, etc.). This doctrine of reminiscence is a peculiarly Platonic fancy, and fascinated the later Platonists to such an extent that Symeias declined a bishopric in the Christian Church rather than renounce the dream. It is implicated, as cause or consequence, with the doctrine of the Platonic ideal, as both are with the dialectic process by which Socrates and Plato strove to dissipate error and to evolve truth from the minds of men. The manifesto of the mind is the Socratic mockery; Socrates professed, and which Plato represented him as professing, necessitated the assumption that truth was present potentially in the mind, and that it only required to be drawn from its latent state by adroit handling. It could not be latent, nor could it be brought forth, unless it lay there like a chrysalis, and descended from an anterior condition of being. It was in a super-terrestrial and antemundane existence that souls had acquired but before their demission, or return to earth, they had been steeped in oblivion, "Silicet immemores suprema ut convexa revendant."

"Aetherum sensum, atque arat simplicis ignem."

The acquisition of genuine knowledge was thus the restoration of the obliterated memories of supernal realities. Absurd and extravagant as this tenet appears in its Platonic form, it was a dreamy and ineffectual effort to give definite expression to the mysterious process of thought. The doctrine was modified and transformed by St. Augustine, who conceived it to derive it of its wildness and irrationality. He conceived the human mind to be constituted in perfect harmony with the universe. The acquisition of knowledge was the evolution of this harmony, and it was accompanied with instinctive conceptions of the pre-adaptation. Many of the strange revivals of Plato may be similarly reduced to a priori probability.

The supernal realities which are the objects of the pure and of the purified intelligence are the first Intelligibles, presented to the contemplation of unembodied and undetected spirits. These prime intelligibles are Ideas—eternal images, immaterial archetypes (sine corpore formis) — patterns or conceptions forever present to the Divine Mind, furnishing the models, and, indeed, the essence, of all the temporal creation. The term Ideas was older than Plato; but its application to heavenly types, its metaphysical employment, and its substitution for the Pythagorean Numbers, were almost certainly Platonic inventions (Parmenid, p. 193; De Rep., vi, 509). It has justly been remarked by Ueberweg, as it had often been remarked before Ueberweg, that the Platonic philosophy centres in the theory of ideas. All Platonists and Neo-Platonists all converge towards this point. But the Ideas of Plato are not merely his central doctrine; they are usually conceived to be his distinctive doctrine. As such, they were assailed and refuted by Aristotle (Metaph. i. vii, viii), who, nevertheless, substituted a more rationalistic concept of things intelligible. As such, they were received and expanded by the New Platonists. As such, they have given life and name to all associated schemes of philosophy, included under the broad name of Idealism. As such, they furnished the battle-ground for the long, impassioned, and bitter controversy of the Realists and Nominalists. See Realism and Nominalism.

According to Plato, following the Eleatic school and Heraclitus, all sensible or concrete existence is prizable, feeling, and imperfect; but all this imperfection involves the essence of the perfect. The soul, when it beheld the immortal (Aristot. Metaph. i. vi; Alex. Aphrod. Asclep. et Anon. Urb. Schol. ad loc.). If some things are good, there must be an absolute goodness, in which all things good participate, and which they feebly reflect. This absolute is the incorruption of the beautiful. If actions are just, beneficent, or holy, there must be an eternal justice, beneficence, and holiness, whence they derive their character (Philebus, p. 243-250; Hipp. Maj. p. 294, 295; Conow., p. 210-219; Phaedo, p. 100-112). The passing things of sense acquire their essential character from the indwelling of these immutable existences, however these may be warped and deformed by being reduced to temporal conditions. As it is with abstract qualities, so it is with individual things. A dog, a horse, a man, a woman, sit and stand, eat and drink, walk and run, breathe and sleep, are the expressions of the essential nature of those animals—carnality, opinion, humanity. Each differs from other members of its class, or is individualized, by union with matter, and consequent deflection from the perfect conception of the breed. Each, therefore, is an inadequate and, consequently, untrue representation of the true and perfect being of its kind, and approaches such perfection just in proportion as it approximates to the true, perfect, and eternal image. These intelligible and untenable perfection is the idea, present from the beginning, or before all beginning, in the contemplation of the Divinity, after which all things are made that were made. They are not merely the models of created things, but their essence. In the progress towards truth, all phenomenal being, all concrete existence, all temporal presentation, all earthly images, all sensible apprehensions, must be left behind, and, by an ascending process, the purified intelligence must pierce the veil and phantasmal appearances of time, and look upon the absolute, everlasting, unchanging, and divine ideas of things. These being, therefore, is an inadequate and, derived from sense is phenomenal, evanescent, and delusive. The doctrine of ideas will reappear, for, as Brückner notes, neither the metaphysics and theology of Plato, nor his physical and ethical philosophy, can preserve any consistency without them. Ideas form the first order of intelligibles and are apprehended by the pure reason with the aid of the scientific understanding (νοησις μετα λογιου περαιτερων). The second order consists of species which are united with matter and cannot be separated from it—the ininseparable sensible species of the schoolmen. These are apprehended by the understanding with the concurrence of the intuitive faculty. Things sensible are, in like manner, primary and secondary, and are apprehended only conjunctly through irrational perception (παθι μετα αιθησιν των λογιων εορθων). Intelligibles belong to the intelligible and eternal universe (υπο νοησιος, αυ ουκε
Platonic Philosophy

Sensibles are the shadows of the intelligible, and appertain to the visible, phenomenal, and shifting world (τὸ φάντασμα, τὸ αἰσθήσις, τὸ ὑποκάτωτα δυνάμει τῆς γνώμης). Knowledge attaches only to the former: from the latter nothing better than opinion can spring (Timæus, p. 281; De Rep., vi. 25, p. 598).

Knowledge is the truth and falsehood: in matters concerned with action, it judges of right and wrong. The moral or practical judgment proceeds from an ingenuous sense of beauty and goodness, and decides, in particular instances, by comparison with the example of excellence. Truth, beauty, and goodness are thus nearly identified, and are exhibited as different aspects of the same perfect idea. Beauty is conformity to the idea, and the idea is perfectly good and true.

In dialectical procedure, the first thing to be determined is the essential nature of the object under consideration. The essence is established by definition, division, and resolution. The accidents are separated by induction and ratiocination, or deduction from first principles. In detecting the essence we reduce the manifold into the single and the simple, and trace the one in the many. The Platonic scheme is presented in the Republic (vii). It is noticeable that hypotheses are admitted by Plato among the processes for discovering truth. The abstract theory thus sanctions the large use of imagination which prevails over its whole system. We have therefore to determine the form, and to compare the dialectics of Plato with the severe logic of Aristotle, and with the elaborate devices proposed in the second book of Bacon's Organon. Words are no criteria of the character of things. They are loosely imposed, in consonance with popular impressions, and do not agree with realities. Yet words and language are of grave importance, and require to be used with propriety and precision, to avoid indistinctness and ambiguity, and consequent delusion or deception. The art of effective speech springs from a just knowledge of the intellectual powers and emotions, of the disposition of men, and of the different forms of expression. The perfect orator is one who has these endowments, knows the arts of persuasion, and can apply them to his purposes (Phædrus, p. 258). The value which Plato attached to the sciences of composition is attested by the skill and beauty of his own compositions. He has also strongly declared it (Ibid., p. 258). Hence, when we find him ridiculing and denouncing rhetoric in the Gorgias, and comparing it to unhomely cookery, we must assume the opposition to be real. The Gorgias was an attack, and designed only for the refutation of the Sophists and sophistical teachers of rhetoric (Inst. Or., ii. 15). The dialectics of Plato thus embraced every thing connected with the discovery, determination, and communication of truth, in its subjective aspect. But it will be remembered there was, in addition to the truth of knowing, the truth of being also; and this forms the second part of the Platonic philosophy.

II. Theoretical, Contemplative, or Physical Philosophy.—This grand division of Platonic speculation is developed under three heads: Physics, Proper, and Mathematics, which is a sort of appendix to the other two. It will be observed that the term Physics is employed in a very wide and unrestricted sense, to include not merely nature, but everything extrinsic to the intellectual operations and the ethical conduct of man. It is contradistinguished from dialectics by the recasting the constitution of things, while the latter is confined to their mental apprehension and exposition. It is contrasted with ethics, as it is concerned with essential being, while the latter deals only with what is. The division is made in the Phædo (ii, p. 108; comp. De Rep., ii. 19, p. 881). It is further to be observed that the Platonic doctrines are rarely conveyed in explicit propositions, but must be gathered from fragmentary statements, from incidental expressions, from poetical fancies, and from the general tenor of discussion. In the Phædo, Plato explains the utter abnegation of physical inquiries by Socrates. In the opening of the Timæus, he announces the impossibility of giving anything more than a plausible account (ἰδέας λόγος) of things becoming, and not permanent (vid. Aristotle. sp. Stob. ixxx, 7). Recognizing, then, the difficulties and difficulties of the order due to the character of the procedure and the presumed complexion of the subject, we continue to note the peculiarities of the Platonic philosophy.

I. Theology.—"In the beginning the world was without form." The universe is everywhere filled with the order by the Supreme and Intelligent Cause, who framed the creation in accordance with the perfect and eternal patterns ever present to the divine mind. It is the best of all generated existences, the best of all possible worlds, because it was fashioned by the Highest Goodness and Wisdom working after the absolutely perfect models, or ideas (Timæus, p. 285). It was not made, however, out of nothing, but out of eternally existing matter. Being formed out of matter, it is not free from grave blemishes and defects, which are due to the innumerableness of the infinite, and the difficulty of perceiving matter. God and formless matter are thus the two concurrent but antagonistic causes of the universe. By matter is understood something very different from the palpable substance or body which is habitually contemplated under the name of matter: something totally different also from anything that we can conceive of. It is that remnant or substratum of body which subsists after every cognizable property of body has been removed (Timæus, p. 51; comp. Porph. Sentent. xx; Plotin. Ennead. ii. 4; Berkeley, Sirs, § 817). By ascribing to God the creation of the Cosmos out of unformed matter, Plato avoids the heresy of pantheism. Still he indulges in fantasies which readily lead to it. From the nature of matter as co-eternal with the Divine Intelligence, and from its reductiveness in yielding to the creative energy, originate the necessary existence and form of all created things (Theaet. p. 176). The antagonism of matter suggested the presence of subtle aptitudes and occult qualities. We are thus brought within the range of hypotheses similar to those which underlie the recent theories of Darwin, Spencer, and Huxley.

Matter was the relatively passive ingredient in the process of creation. The active power was the Supreme Intelligence, or Highest Good, whom it is almost impossible to apprehend, and impossible to define (Timæus, p. 29). He is the efficient cause and sustainer of all the things that exist, but is not in any way a sort of author or deifier of the things that exist, and of the existing existences: the founder and ultimate fabricator of everything. His inscrutable reason, self-existent, eternally the same, without beginning, without end, having no affinity with things of sense, and apprehensible only by the pure intellect. He is all-wise, all-seeing, all-foreseeing, all-mighty, except so far as restricted by the intractability of matter. He has absolute freedom of will, is supremely good, and, being good, is void of envy and malevolence. Hence everything made by him is good, so far as he permits. He framed the world in all possible excellence after the eternal image in his own mind. This uncreated and unbeginning idea of the universe (λόγος or λογισμός τοῦ θεοῦ) has been regarded as a third co-eternal principle. This exemplar included the patterns or ideas of all created things thus forming the possible universe being fashioned according to its corresponding type in the intelligible universe, or world of ideas. The doctrine seems to have been deduced from Pythagoras, but was applied by Plato in his own manner only after the revolution made in the Pædo (ii, p. 108; comp. De Rep., ii. 19, p. 881). It is further to be observed that the Platonic doctrines are rarely conveyed in explicit propositions, but must be gathered from fragmentary statements, from incidental expressions, from poetical fancies, and from the imperfect things of earth were thus the obscure, fleeting images of the perfect forms of the divine contemplation. It is uncertain whether Plato attributed to these ideas a substantive existence of their own, separate from and independent of the divine mind, or supposed them to be simply the different, changeless thoughts of the Godhead. Yet, though God is distinctly and habitually acknowledged as the father and creator of all things, all things were not directly framed and regulated by the Supreme Divinity. For the government of the sensible universe he created a subordinate deity, and placed it in the material creation (Timæus, p. 34). This guiding spirit, or Demiurgus, was a mixture of the ideal and of the material, of the one and of the many, that, being intermediate, it might communicate with both. This was the Animus Mundus, which assumed such promiscuous powers as to involve the physiological and the physical speculations of the Stoics. It maintained the regular operations of the laws of temporal change, and by its plastic energy moulded into appropriate forms all the multitudinous manifestations of transitory being (τὸ γιγαντιονος) (Cratylus, p. 53).

The soul of the universe was not the sole created divinity. Divine spirits were apportioned to the earth, sun, moon, and stars, to govern their developments and to preside over their motions (De Legg. p. 899). Hosts of inferior deities also existed for similar purposes. Thus, with a fine and half-suppressed irony, provision was made for the national gods, and for the 30,000 unnamed divinities attested by Herodot. To these deities, each in his due place in the vast hierarchy, was ascribed the duty of forming men, animals of love to the plants, etc., and of watching over them. In the subordinate ranks of the celestial army were a countless multitude of sprites, who were cousin-german to the sylphs, gnomes, fairies, and other tribes of "little people," and to whom immortality was denied.

The second branch of contemplative philosophy is occupied with the consideration of the order of nature as the product of the acts of creation. Nothing exists or arises without cause. Hence proceeded the Aristotelian maxim vere creare est creare per causas; for the cause affords the ratio essendi, or explanation of the existence of the object investigated. As the universe, or orderly Cosmos, had a producing cause, it was created in time. It was generated or brought into being, and was therefore subject to sensible perception. It was consequently corporeal, visible, and tangible. It could be said to be the same as the body through the presence of fire, or tangible without the presence of earth. An intermediate bond is needed to link two things together, and the fairest of bonds is a mean proportion. Thus, as fire is to air, so is air to water; and as air is to water, so is water to earth. Here are the four elements according to the Pythagorean tetractys or the Pythagoreans. They were held together in their several combinations by the attraction of love. The whole theory is largely Pythagorean, and blends itself with the Pythagorean imaginations about the secret virtues of numbers. The universe is an animated whole, composed of perfect parts, and exempt from the infirmities of age and of disease (Timæus, p. 35). A spherical figure and orbicular motion are given to it and its chief components because a circle is the most perfect of figures, is least liable to injury and obstruction, returns upon itself, and thus promises the greatest duration to the vast living organism in which all things temporal are contained. As the universe had a spherical form and a circular motion conferred upon it, each of the elements had its own appropriate figure. Earth was cubical, fire pyramidal, air octahedral, and water icosidodecahedral, or twenty-sided. These were combined in apt proportions, and all things were ordered "by measure, by number, and by weight."

The details of the cosmogony must be omitted. It may be added that the earth and the seven moving lights, or heavenly spheres, were impregnated with concentric spheres, at harmonic intervals, around a mighty spindle resting on the knees of Necessity; and that their revolutions propagated along the great axis "the music of the spheres" to the earth, which was the fixed and middle orb (De Rep., p. 608). The earth was occupied by animals and human beings created by the subordinate demiurg, to whom was also intrusted the creation of man. But man, as the noblest of animals, was not left wholly to his own devices. Immortal souls, numerous as the stars, were supplied by the Supreme Intelligence, to be provided with terrestrial bodies. These souls were neither emanations nor inspirations, but true creations. They were to guide and govern the material vessels in which they should be confused, as the superior spirits guided and governed the worlds which they controlled. The matter with which they were united exposed them to contamination, to failure, and to a fate which the Platonic mythology, "within the union" results moral evil, or disobedience to the laws of ideal perfection, which are in conformity with the purposes of God. In their earthly condition, human souls were subjected to the general laws of the universe, but were endowed with an undefined freedom of will through their heavenly constitution. Happiness resulted from obedience to the impulses of the better nature, and to the order and economy of the intelligible world.

It was placed in a vacuum, and proved too tedious, to enter into the physiology propounded by Plato; and nothing could be gained from the presentation of his views but the exhibition of Platonic fantasy. We pass to the third part, or appendix, which was intended to serve as once a discipline and as an instrument.

3. Mathematics.—The importance attached by Plato to mathematical science is familiar to every student, and is illustrated by the inscription supposed to have been placed over the entrance to the Academy:—

Model géomètres eut to.

The commendations bestowed by him on this branch of learning (De Rep. vii, p. 822) may be compared with the similar eulogies of Roger Bacon (Opus Majus, pt. iv) in an age of somewhat analogous speculative development, and of Francis Bacon (De Aug. Sci. iii, vi; Essays, 1). They may also be contrasted with the views presented in the diatribe of Sir William Hamilton.

Under the head of mathematics were included, in accordance with the Pythagorean practice, and with the general conception of antiquity, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, etc. The whole except the producing cause was created in time. III. Practical Philosophy.—Plato's practical philosophy was in many respects consonant with his physics, or theory of nature. It would not be correct to say that it was founded upon it, for this would be inconsistent with the position that there was no orderly, confused proceeding according to the principle of the Pythagorean doctrine in the mind of its author. There is close correspondence in parts between Plato's physical and practical philosophy, but in others much separation and independence. The agreement must therefore be ascribed to the consciousness of the beholder, of the same kind, in different directions, rather than to an intentional coherence between successive applications of doctrine. The practical philosophy of Plato falls under two heads, Ethics and Politics.

1. Ethics.—Moral questions occupy the largest part of the Platonic writings; but they are treated in the Socratic manner, by question and answer, and are thus proposed in diffuse and disconnected fragments. Plato's aims, his leading tenets, and his modes of explication are derived from Socrates; but his discussions, so far as may be conjectured, are conducted in a much broader spirit and loftier strain. He includes also within the domain of ethics much that would now be referred to theology.

As in the physics everything is traced back to the First Intelligence, the Divine Creator, so in the ethics everything is referable to the divine and beneficent character of God. The good is the summit of all conceivable things. God is absolute goodness. The approve good of man (nouson man) is the knowledge and imitation of God, and approximation thereby to the divine nature. "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father is perfect." Everything is good and beautiful so far as it corresponds to the likeness of the divine original, and possesses the characteristics of the pure archetypal ideas of moral perfection. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, in whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." Ordinary human beings, in popular usage, such as health, strength, high birth, riches, renown, honors, are good only in conjunction with virtue; otherwise they are evil (Protag. p. 351—353). The honorable (the right) alone is good (Alestas, i. 116). This is continually and strenuously asserted in opposition to the old practical and current sentiment among the contemptuous Greeks. Virtue is lovely in itself, and to be loved irrespective of its rewards. Being of heavenly origin, the best reproduction of the divine ideas, and approximating to the divine nature, it is itself divine. Being divine, it is not an art that can be taught, but must be divinely communicated (Euthydem. p. 282). Goodness can be acquired only by the influx and inwardness of the Good.

The object of all knowledge, and it should be the object of all effort, is the assimilation to the highest good— that is, to God. This assimilation consists in the habit and practice of wisdom, fortitude, temperance, justice, and holiness (Theaetet. p. 176; De Legg. iv, 716). The final stage of this approximation is eudaimonia, usually translated happiness, but which implies good dispositions, and a conscience clear, innocent, and void of offence towards God and towards man (Gorg. p. 470; Symposium, p. 188). The Critias breaks off unfinished just at the opening of a full discussion of the conditions of a happy life. The word is also used for the future beatitude which is in himself, his temple, his sanctum, his sanctuary. To his correspond, as nearly as a pagan dream can agree with revelation, to the Scripture rule "to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God."

As has been observed, the body was regarded as a prison, because composed of malignant matter. Hence humanity was miserable by congenial constitution. The progress towards virtue and holiness was to be achieved by the subjugation of material antagonisms, by the renunciation of worldly aims and temptations, and by the purification of mind and heart from sensual appetites and desires. When rulers had become philosophers and philosophers had become rulers, their wisdom and justice, their taste, their party proclivities, all unfitted him for success in actual politics; and from every effort to engage in them he retired discomfited and disappointed. The more congenial domain of speculation was still open to him. He might organize a state, regulate its citizens, and determine their duties, in the vague realm of fancy, with none to make him afraid of either failure or obstruction. He might look forward to the ultimate adoption of his projects or his principles in some happier time, when philosophers had become rulers, or when rulers had become philosophers. And from generation to generation, instructed by his lessons, might give reality to his dreams (De Legg. v, 739). In abstract modes, and in unrecongnised forms, his visions have been partially accomplished.

The Republic and the Laws differ greatly in tone and doxas, as well as in execution, but they are intimately connected. They are diverse and consecutive presentations of the same general design. The Republic is the ideal state, the Laws the concrete state. The Republic is the dream of a Utopian constitution, the Laws the proposal of a Utopian state. As the poet is an inspired reveler, it would be hazardous to say. Plato may have simply designed, in a blind, heathen, tentative way, to prescribe the "purification of the flesh," and the "overcoming of the world," and "the righteousness which is of God."

The morality of Plato was much higher in aim and sentiment than it was possible to be in its expression, yet in many single precepts it uses nearly the language of revealed truth. It habitually insists upon the charms of virtue and "the beauty of holiness;" and in the definition of the several virtues, which he represents as indissolubly connected (Charon, p. 161). As at times as united in one, he maintains an uncompromising elevation of view. His illustrations, indeed, are often taken with the prevalent vices of his age and country. Thus, in treating of the passions, he is led by his rich and familiar fancy into hypothetical explanations, which have been very easily misunderstood, and which are rel

Pulpative in their original proposition. We refer to his comments on friendship and love. Friendship, or attraction, is ascribed even to the particles of matter; and the like proclivities are bestowed upon primordial souls. Plato is indeed a believer in the doctrine of like attraction. Souls of similar nature are drawn towards each other by the instinct of resemblance resulting from predetermination. The attraction proceeding from conformity in their pure state exercises its due influence only between spirits retaining in some measure their primordial purity. Hence true friendship can exist only between the good (Lydia, p. 214).

Love is a species of friendship, or friendship in its highest intensity. It is of three orders: sensual, animal, or bestial; honorable, having regard to psychical virtues; and mixed, which unites the characteristics of both (Sympos. p. 201). Love, in its two forms of heavenly and earthy, "half beast, half deity," appears in Plato in many ambiguous and Protean shapes, rising from the coarsest pagan sensualism to the purest aspirations for the beautiful and the good. But the dialogue in which its nature is chiefly discussed is so tantalizing, shifting, and bewildering—it is woven with threads of such changing and returning hues—that it furnishes treacherous foundation for any dogmatic conclusions.

2. Political Philosophy.—The two most extensive and elaborate of Plato's treatises are devoted to political questions. Of these, the Republic is the most complete and characteristic triumph of his genius. The Laws is in a rough and unfinished state, and has often been excluded from his works. In narrating the life of Plato, his predilections for political life, his early and unsuccessful intervention in Athenian affairs, his political expiditions to Sicily, and his consultation in matters of state by princes and states, were duly commemorated. The contemplative habits of his mind, his eager fancy, his pitch of tone, his temperament, and his speculative tastes, his party proclivities, all unfitted him for success in actual politics; and from every effort to engage in them he retired discomfited and disappointed. The more congenial domain of speculation was still open to him. He might organize a state, regulate its citizens, and determine their duties, in the vague realm of fancy, with none to make him afraid of either failure or obstruction. He might look forward to the ultimate adoption of his projects or his principles in some happier time, when philosophers had become rulers, or when rulers had become philosophers. From generation to generation, instructed by his lessons, might give reality to his dreams (De Legg. v, 739). In abstract modes, and in unrecongnised forms, his visions have been partially accomplished.

The Republic and the Laws differ greatly in tone and doxas, as well as in execution, but they are intimately connected. They are diverse and consecutive presentations of the same general design. The Republic is the ideal state, the Laws the concrete state. The Republic is the dream of a Utopian constitution, the Laws the proposal of a Utopian state. As the poet was an inspired reveler, it would be hazardous to say. Plato may have simply designed, in a blind, heathen, tentative way, to prescribe the "purification of the flesh," and the "overcoming of the world," and "the righteousness which is of God."

The morality of Plato was much higher in aim and sentiment than it was possible to be in its expression, yet in many single precepts it uses nearly the language of revealed truth. It habitually insists upon the charms of virtue and "the beauty of holiness;" and in the definition of the several virtues, which he represents as indissolubly connected (Charon, p. 161). As at times as united in one, he maintains an uncompromising elevation of view. His illustrations, indeed, are often taken with the prevalent vices of his age and country. Thus, in treating of the passions, he is led by his rich and familiar fancy into hypothetical explanations, which have been very easily misunderstood, and which are rel

Pulpative in their original proposition. We refer to his comments on friendship and love. Friendship, or attraction, is ascribed even to the particles of matter; and the like proclivities are bestowed upon primordial souls. Plato is indeed a believer in the doctrine of like attraction. Souls of similar nature are drawn towards each other by the instinct of resemblance resulting from predetermination. The attraction proceeding from conformity in their pure state exercises its due influence only between spirits retaining in some measure their primordial purity. Hence true friendship can exist only between the good (Lydia, p. 214).

Thus, in treating of the passions, he is led by his rich and familiar fancy into hypothetical explanations, which have been very easily misunderstood, and which are rel perception, is, Of Politics, or concerning the Just. The second epigraph may have been formally the addition of Thrasyllos, but it is sanctioned by the text itself (De Rep. ii, p. 686; comp. iv, p. 424). Many critics of great name and others of the ancients have held it to be a theoretical constitution of the state. Others, of not inferior reputation, among the moderns, have considered it as simply an investigation into the nature of justice, illustrated by the state, because the state exhibits the characteristics of justice in a complete form and on a larger scale than the individual could do. Stalhheim, in his Prolegomena, arrayed the arguments adduced in favor of either opinion, and concludes that Plato's design was to portray the image of a perfect and happy life, by prescribing the offices of man in his public and private relations (p. xviii, xix).

We are not disposed to deny this conclusion, which substantially reconciles the previous contradictions; but we think there is something more than this. The ideal, the absolute, the perfect, was always present to the mind of Plato: the whole tenor of his philosophy precluded him from resting in the actual. But his personal and philosophical career urged him also to regard with most earnestness the amelioration of the moral and political condition of his countrymen, and the improvement of their political through the rectification of their moral and religious life. In Greece, the state was everything, the individual being merely a fragment or constituent atom of the state. The life of the citizen was absorbed in the state; the life of the state was reflected in the life of the citizen—was, indeed, imposed on him. According to Greek ideas, the just man could not develop his virtues except in a just state; and the just state could not subsist except through just citizens—just either by native constitution or by compulsion, or by both. Education and discipline would be demanded to produce just rulers and just subjects. The investigation of the nature of justice would accordingly require, in the determination of the form and conditions of a justly organized community (Jowett, Plato, iv, 5); the delineation of the just state would be blended with that of the just man—and the conclusions resulting from the whole inquiry would furnish an earthly image of the Greek City of God (γῆς γας ἀδημοῦ ἀείων ἀτρή τοῖς, De Rep. ix, p. 592). In Pindar, G education both in Plato's doctrine, it would have been left much more formal, and unsatisfactory without the fancies and dreams and political precepts contained in the Stateman, Republic, and Laws. The former furnishes the frame of the complete design for whose construction all the rest was intended.

According to Plato's notion, justice or righteousness is the object and essence of healthy political organizations, and are inquiry into its nature, and the best mode of its realization in the state. Of course he cannot free himself from Hellenic preoccupations. Of course his reactionary tendencies and his oligarchical proclivities produced a constant recoil from the democratic license of his Athenian contemporaries. He was seduced, in the reign of the imitation of Spartan institutions. Even in his wildest vagaries there appears a disposition to employ supposed traditionary practices. He insists upon the strict subordination of ranks; he even petrifies his classes of citizens into castes. He does not rigorously conjoin every one to his class, but accords advancement to those of eminent ability—la carriere ouverte aux talents. He restricts the government to the few (εὐαρχομαντος); the masses he crowds almost into serfs—"beggars of wood and drawer of water," etc. There are two great classes of freemen, the guardians of the state and the craftsmen. The guardians are themselves divided into two orders, the rulers and the auxiliaries. The rulers are selected, by successive examinations till their thirtieth year, from the body of guardians, who are selected at the age of twenty. The training and the selection have some agreement with the Chinese practices, with English competitive examinations, and still more with the regulation of the Ottoman Janizaries. There is also a considerable degree of correspondence between the Platonic organization and a modern constitutively held to be a theoretical constitution of the state. The body of the guardians or auxiliaries is employed as the military forces to repress internal disorders and to repel external danger. The rulers are the supervisors of the community, and are to govern it with a view to the greatest happiness of all (De Rep. iv, p. 24). The auxiliaries are certainly to be the warriors. There is no reason to suppose that the guardians are not to be the warriors also, as to cherish and protect the whole commonwealth. "None of them should have any property beyond what is absolutely necessary; neither should they have a private house, with bars and bolts, closed against any one who has a mind to enter; their provisions should be only such as are required by trained warriors, who are men of temperance and courage; their agreement is to receive from the citizens a fixed rate of pay, enough to meet the expenses of the year and no more, and they will have common meals and live together, like soldiers in a camp. . . . They alone of all the citizens may not touch or handle silver or gold, or be under the same roof with them, or wear them, or drink from them. And this will be their salvation and the salvation of the state" (Rep., Jowett's translation, ii, 242). There is here a clear allusion to the utilization of the Peiraeus, the organization with the theoretical devices of Plato. There is also an anticipation of the standing armies of modern states.

With the details of the education of the superlative class, and with the appreciation of different branches of instruction, we cannot occupy ourselves further than to mention that it is in this connection he censures the poets, and excludes Homer and the Tragedians from the ideal state as blasphemers against the gods. We pass over the criticism of the various forms of government, and the importance of the last of them. The constitution is general, and for the estimation of Plato's doctrine and its relation to Hellenic systems. We cannot, however, omit all notice of the measures by which he endeavors to maintain the unselshful devotion of the dominant order. He leaves the laboring masses almost entirely out of sight. They are to be protected in their persons, rights, and industry; and they are to be guided in the proper course. Further than this there is little concern for them. They work in their way for the state, as their superiors live and work also for the state, which is everything. There can be no real opposition except in the interruption of Adimantas that "the citizens were made miserable," if the temporal comfort of the citizen, and not the theoretical elevation of that hypothetical unit, the state, is taken into consideration.

agyption, the varied experience, the general immorality, and the painful disquietude of the Greeks in the 4th centur before Christ may account for much, but it will not interpret all. We leave the enigma as one of the mysterious problems presented by the carer of humanity. There is surely no more marvellous approximation to revealed truth than in the exposition of the Supreme Good, and of its child or offspring, which is described (De Rep. vi. p. 506) in terms that recall the delineation of wisdom in the Book of Wisdom.

"Venerem virtutis Del, quam unam omnem est claritas Del sincerae; et ideo nihil inquisitionem in eam lucrum.
"Venerem est enim lucis eternae, et speculum sine mala Del majestatissimae et imago bonitatis illius.
"Et enim haec speculum soli et super omnem dispo-sitionem stellarum, Iact comparata inventione prior.
Do not such sublime anticipations consort well with the conclusion of the Republic, which increases our wonder, but at the same time justifies our reverential compar-tion.

"And thus, Glancon, the tale has been saved and does not perish, and may be our salvation if we are obedient to the word spoken: and we shall pass safely over the water of Forgetfulness, and our soul will not be destroyed.
Therefore my counsel is that we hold fast to the heavens, and to the gods above, and to the gods below, considering that the soul is immortal, and able to endure evry sort of good and every sort of evil. Thus shall we live to see one day the gods and to the gods, both while remaining here and when, like conquerors in the games who go round to gather gifts, we receive our reward. And it shall be shown to us, amid the din of this world, the simile of an age of a thousand years which we have been reciting."

We have now at some length, yet all too briefly, reviewed the philosophy attributed to Plato and deductible from his writings. We have omitted nearly ev-everything in the way of detail, and have attempted the survey from an elevated vantage-ground, where only the broad lines are apparent, and where the asperities and discords of the landscape disappear. It may now be manifested, I think, how and why the ancients always exercised such fascination on pure natures, and has so largely and so enduringly stimulated the speculation and ennobled the thought of the world.

Platt, Adams W., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Weston, Conn., Oct. 28, 1790. After receiving an ordinary education, he commenced the study of medicine, when his brother, who was studying for the min-istery, died, and Platt assumed his thoughts in that direction. He graduated with the second honor of his class at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1817, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1820; was licensed the same year, and entered upon his duties as a minister in the churches of Hamilton and Indiana. In January, 1824, he accepted a call, and was ordained as pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Rutland, N. Y.; in July,

Payette, N. Y., until 1836, when he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hector, N. Y., where he continued to labor till, in 1848, his health becoming quite impaired, he ceased his pastoral labors. In 1856 he removed to Clinton, Iowa, and assisted in the organization of the Church there, and supplied the pulpit for one year. He died May 2, 1859. Mr. Platt was a humble, laborious, and self-denying minister — a man of marked prudence of character. See Wilson, Pref.

Platte-Montagne, NICOLAS DE, a French painter and engraver, son of a celebrated Belgian portrait-painter, was born at Paris about 1631. He was a pupil of Philippe de Champagne, Charles le Brun, and of his un-Jean Morin. He painted the Martyr which was presented in 1666 to the church of Notre Dame at Paris; a St. Benoist, a St. Scholastica (1676), and a ceiling for the church of the Mercers, for which the society of the Rue Cassette; and The Holy Ghost alighting upon the Apostles, for the church of Saint-Sulpice (1676). He also worked for the Tuileries in 1688 and 1684. He exhibited two paintings at the salon of 1676: five historical paintings and three portraits at the salon of 1699—the first that took place to one of the portraits.

He engraved from 1651 to 1694, in a fashion but little differing from that of Morin, seventeen different subjects, and eleven portraits after Porbus, Janet, Philippe de Champagne, B. de Champagne, and after his own paintings. He was registered as a member of the Academy of St. Luke on November 21, 1779; appointed supplementary professor July 1, 1679, and regular professor Dec. 20, 1681. He signed his works Montagne, Montaigne, De Platte-Montaigne, N. D. P. Montaigne, N. de la Platte-Montagne, N. van Platten Borz, vinci De Platte-Montagne, and N. de Platte-Montagne. He died Dec. 25, 1796. — Hoefer, Platter (πραματική, properly a sēde-dish, consisting of dainties set on as a condiment, or sauce). Our Lord, In reviving the Pharisees, said, "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess" (Matt. xxiii. 25). "Howbeit in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. For laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups; and many other such like things do ye. And ye will not be subject to the law of God, but according to your own commandment, that ye may keep your own tradition" (Mark vii. 7—9). The Talmud contains tangles directions on the use of these utensils, which Jews are strictly required to observe. See DISH.

Play (παιδική, Exod. xxxii. 6). This word, in addition to the sense of joking or sporting (Gen. xix., 14), may also be understood of amusements, accom-pounded with music and singing, in which sense it may be understood in Judges xvi. 25. Though we have no particular mention in the Old Testament of such matters, we may reasonably suppose that some of the games practiced by the ancient Egyptians were likewise known to the Hebrews; these appear, from the monuments, to have been mock combats, races, gymnastic exercises, singing, dancing, and games of chance (Wilkinson, Anc.
Egyptians, i, 189 sq.). In the declining period of Jewish history the athletic games of the Greeks were introduced, and there were gymnasia, or schools of exercise in Jerusalem, where they practiced wrestling, racing, quots., etc. (1 Macc. v. 16; 2 Macc. iv. 13—15). For the Playfair, James, D.D., a Scotch divine of some note, was born about 1740, and was educated at the University of St. Andrew's. He then became minister of Liff and Benvie livings, which he held until his son succeeded him in the care of the ministry, to soon exchange, however, these fields of labor for the scientific work in which he became so greatly celebrated. Dr. James Playfair was also principal of the United College of St. Salvador and St. Leonard, in the University of St. Andrew's. He died in 1819. He published A System of Chronology, and other works. See London Gentleman's Magazine, 1819, pt. ii, p. 179.

Playfair, John, an eminent scientist, was born, in 1749, at Dundee; was educated at St. Andrew's; resigned a living, and became mathematical professor at Edinburgh, where he died July 20, 1819. Playfair was celebrated as a geologist, and a strenuous defender of the Huttonian system. Pleasure is the delight which arises in the mind from the contemplation or enjoyment of something agreeable, and is synonymous in expression with happiness (q.v.).

Pledge (usually some form of ἐνδήμος, χαθήδος, to bind as by a chattel mortgage; occasionally forms of θέματος, χαθήδος, to exchange, and βάρδος, arbus, to give security; Talmud, עט, עטב, in a legal sense, an assurance given as security by a debtor to his creditor, which is alluded to in the Mosaic books in several instances. Thus—

The creditor was not permitted to go to the house of his debtor to take his pledge, but must receive it before the door (Deut. xxxiv, 10 sq.). The reason of this requirement and its merciful object are obvious.

2. The articles which were forbidden to be taken in pledge were, (a) the raiment or outer garment (Exod. xxii, 21); (b) the bed (Deut. xxi, 17); (c) the handmill (q.v.; xxxiv, 6). Comp. Mishna, Baba Met. ix, 13). But notwithstanding these merciful provisions of the law, hard-hearted creditors were found among the Israelites who oppressed their debtors beyond all reasonable bounds. (Deut. xxiii, 18; Ezek. xvii, 12; xxxiii, 15; Habakk. ii, 6; comp. Job xxxii, 6; xxxiv, 3). See Delitzsch, ad loc., and especially Michaelis, Moa. Recht, iii, 61 sq. The custom of giving pledges prevailed extensively in the ages succeeding the exile, from the fact that by the decisions of the scribes all Jews were prohibited from making any payments on the Sabbath; hence he who would make a purchase on that day left some pledge with the seller (see Mishna, Shab, xxxii, 1), as his outer garment, to be redeemed by payment the next day. The taking of pledges is still further restricted by the Talmud (Baba Met. ix, 13). A pledging of land, mortgaging, appears first in the Talmud (Mishna, Shabbath, x, 6). However, the legal transfer of land under the Mosaic economy was properly but a pledging; for it could at any time be redeemed, and in the year of Jubilee it returned without repayment to the original owner. Pawning of personal property for debt, however, was a very ancient custom (Gen. xxxvii, 17 sq.). Personal guarantees of faith, pledges, or hostages, are mentioned (2 Kings xiv, 14, יִבְרֵי מִשְׁפַּט 25). The general abhorrence of the unscrupulous and of his taking pledges, among the Arabs of the present day, is also abhorred by travelers. Mohammed entirely forbids all lending on interest, and the Mosaic precepts (comp. Exod. xxii, 25-27) are generally so understood in the East. Yet nothing is more common than exorbitant usury, and the taking of pledges (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 499 sq.). See Loan.

Pledge is something given in hand as a security for the fulfilment of a contract or the performance of a promise. When a man of veracity pledges his word, his affirmation becomes an assurance that he will do what he has promised. But as the word of every man is not equally valid in matters of importance, it becomes necessary that a valuable article of some kind should be deposited as a bond for fulfilment on his part, in the 16th century. The Episcopal Church Catechism a sacrament is defined as "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us; ordained by Christ himself, as a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof," in which the pledge is the token that we receive the Grace.

Pleismund, a noted prelate of the early English Church, flourished near the close of the 9th century. He was the friend and fellow-student of Alfred, and was in 890 elevated to the archbishopric of Canterbury. We know next to nothing about his personal history, but we are aware of the influence which he exerted on ecclesiastical affairs through Alfred. See Churton, Early English Church, p. 210, 221; Wright, Biog. Brit. (see Index).

Pleides is the rendering in the A. V. of יִסְדָּד, קַנָּד, in Job ix, 9; xxxviii, 81; but in Amos v, 8 our A. V. has "the seven stars," although the Geneva version translates the word "Pleisades" as in the other cases. In Job the Sept. has Πλευτος, the order of the Hebrew words having been altered (see Ostro), while in Amos there is no trace of the original, and it is difficult to imagine what the translators had before them. The Vulgate in each passage has a different rendering: Iuxylit in Job ix, 9; Pleisades in Job xxxviii, 81; and Arcturus in Amos v, 8. Of the other versions, the Pesos-Syriac and Chaldee merely adopt the Hebrew word; Aquila in Job xxxviii, Symmachus in Job xxxviii and Amos, and Theodotion in Amos, give "Pleisades," while with remarkable inconstancy Aquila in Amos has "Arcturus." The Jewish commentators are no less at variance. Rabbi David Kimchi in his lexicon says: "Rabbi Jonah wrote that it was a collection of stars called in Arabic Al-Thurayyd. And the wise rabbi Abraham Aben-Ezra, of blessed memory, wrote that the ancients said Kindah was a star, and they are at the end of the constellation Aries, and those which are seen are six. And he wrote that what was right in his eyes was that it was a single star, and that a great one, which is called the left eye of Taurus; and Keel the heart of the lion, the heart of the table-pew." On Job xxxviii, 31, Kimchi continues: "Our rabbins of blessed memory have said (Beraachoth, lviii, 2) Kindah hath great cold and bindeth up the fruits, and Keel hath great heat and ripeneth the fruits: therefore He said, 'or hosen the bands of Keel,' for it openeth the fruits and bringeth them forth." In addition to the evidence of rabbi Jonah, who identifies the Hebrew Kindah with the Arabic el-Thurayyay, we have the testimony of rabbi Isaac Israel, quoted by Hylde in his notes on the Tables of Ulugh Beig (p. 25-33, ed. 1665), to the same effect. That el-Thurayyay and the Pleiades are the same is proved by the words of Aben-Ragel (quoted by Hylde, p. 33): "Al-Tharayay is the mansion of the moon, in the sign Taurus, and it is called the celestial hen with her chickens." With this Hylde compares the Fr. Paullinorum, and Eng. Hen and Chickens, which are old names for the same stars; and Niebuhr (Descr. de l'Arabe, p. 101) gives as the result of his inquiry of the Jew at San'a, "Kis'ed, Pleiades, qu'on appelle aussi en Allemande la poule qui glousse." The Fr. Ancien, a b. l. (ed. 1665), gives the same name to the seven stars at the end of the constellation Aries the Pleiades, which are indeed in the left shoulder of the Bull, but so near the Ram's tail that their position might be properly defined with reference to it. With the statement that "those which are seen are six" may be compared the words of Didymus on Homer, τέσσαρες δὲ Πεδίου οὐκ ἔστο, πάντα υδάτω ὦ ἰδέα ὑποδέχοι πάντα "οὐ πάντα "οὐ πάντα Φανέρων." (Orph. Cat. ivii, 170, i."

"Quae septem dixit, sex tamen esse solet.""

The opinion of Aben-Ezra himself has frequently been misrepresented. He held that Kimah was a single large star, Aldebaran, the brightest of the Hyades, while Keil [A.V. "Orion"] was Antares, the heart of Scorpio. When these rise in the east," he continues, "the effect produced is recorded by poets. He describes them as opposite each other, and the difference of their right ascension between Aldebaran and Antares is as nearly as possible twelve hours. The belief of Aben-Ezra had probably the same origin as the rendering of the Vulgate Hyades. One other point is deserving of notice. The rabbi, as quoted by Kimchi, attribute to Kimah great cold and the property of checking vegetation, while Keil works the contrary effects. But the words of Rabbi Isaac Israel on Job xxxviii, 31 (quoted by Hyde, p. 72), are just the reverse. He says, "The stars have opposite effects. The ripening of the fruits is the operation of Kimah. And some of them retard and delay the fruits from ripening, and this is the operation of Keil. The interpretation is, 'Wilt thou bind the fruits which the constellation Kimah ripeneth and openeth; and wilt thou open the fruits which the constellation Keil contracteth and bindeth up?' On the whole, though it is impossible to arrive at any certain conclusion, it appears that our translators were perfectly justified in rendering Kimah by "Pleiades." The seven stars" in Amos clearly denoted the same cluster in the language of the 15th century, for Cottgrave in his French Dictionary gives "Pleiaides, f, one of the seven stars." Hyde maintained that the Pleiades were again mentioned in Scripture by the name Succoth Benoth. The discussion of this question must be reserved to the article on that name."

The etymology of Kimah is referred to the Arabic كمك, "a heap," as being a heap or cluster of stars. The full Arabic name given by Genesius is "the knot of the Pleiades;" and, in accordance with this, most modern commentators render Job xxxviii, 31, "Is it thou that bredest the knot of the Pleiades," or loosenest the bands of Orion?" Simon (Lex. Heb.) quotes the Grenland name for this cluster of stars, "Kilkutetar, i.e. seilla colligatiss," as an instance of the existence of the same idea in a widely different language. The rendering "seven influences" of the A. V. in a relic of the lingering belief in the power which the stars exert over human destiny. The marginal note on the word "Pleiades" in the Geneva Version is, "Which stars arise when the sun is in Taurus, which is the spring tyne, and bring flowers," thus agreeing with the explanation of Rabbi Israel quoted above.

The word is used as the name of the cluster of stars in the neck of the constellation Taurus, of which seven are the principal. Six or seven may be usually seen if the eye is directed towards it; but if the eye be turned carelessly aside while the attention is fixed on the group, many more may be seen. Telescopes show a number of large stars there crowded together into a small space. The name Pleiades is probably derived from the Greek word Pleion, i.e. full, so that it merely denotes a condensed assembly of stars. The Romans called the Pleiades Herculis, because they arose in the spring, in the first part of May, and set early in November. Pleroma (πλήρωμα, fullness) is the Gnostic term for that fullness of pure and radiant light and perfection in which the Divine Being was supposed to dwell, and whom they named Bythus. See Gnosticism.

Pleasing, Friedrich Victor - Leibniz, a German philosopher, was born at Bellenau, near Magdeburg, Dec. 28, 1752. He was the son of John Frederick Pleissinger, who was counselor of the consistory at Werningerode, and wrote an Enquir sur l'Origine du Peupl (Leips. 1757-1756, 2 vols. 8vo), and a Histoire des Tombeaux (Werningerode, 1786, 8vo); he died in 1735. Young Plessing attended the theological courses at different universities, and finally devoted himself to philosophy at Kisingen, under Kant's direction. From 1788 he was a professor at that science at Magdeburg. He died Feb. 8, 1800. He left, Von der Notwendigkeit des Uebels und der Schmerzen bei flihenden Geschichte (Dessau, 1788, 8vo); — Osniris und Socrates (Berlin, 1789, 8vo); — Historiche Untersuchungen über die Theologie und Philosophie der ältesten und neuesten Zeit, 4 vols. (Elbing, 1788, 8vo); — Memnonium, oder Versuch zur Unrichtung des Geschichtsbuches des Alterthums (Leips. 1787, 2 vols. 8vo); — Versuche zur Aufflärung der Philosophie des ältesten Alterthums (ibid. 1787-1790, 5 vols. 8vo).—Hofner, Nouv. Dicq. Générale, xi, 465.

Plessis, Joseph Octave, a somewhat noted Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Montreal, Canada, March 8, 1772, of very humble parentage. He decided to give himself to the service of the Church, and after completing his theological studies was ordained priest, March 11, 1796; was employed as professor of humanity at the College of St. Raphael, also as secretary to the bishop of Quebec, and curate of the capital; Sept. 6, 1797, he was made coadjutor to bishop Denault; April 26, 1800, he was appointed bishop of Caratue, in Palestine, with the succession to the see at Quebec, of which he became incumbent Jan. 17, 1806. He founded the college at Nicolet, as well as primary schools at Quebec. He was called by the crown to the legislative council in 1818, and proved himself a loyal and patriotic senator. In 1786 he pronounced an oration at Quebec on the occasion of the naval battle of Abukir. He died at Quebec Dec. 4, 1825. See Ferland, Biog. Notice of J. O. Plessis (Queb. 1864, 8vo).

Pletho or Gemistus, Georgius, a distinguished philosopher, theologian, publicist, historian, geographer, and scholar of the 15th century, is one of the most prominent of the Greeks who contributed to the revival of Greek studies in Western Europe, and the restorer of the Platonist philosophy.

Life.—The dates of the birth and death of Pletho have not been ascertained. He is supposed to have died before the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, and not many years after the Council of Florence. He is vaguely reported to have been nearly a hundred years of age at the period of his demise. If this were true, he must have first seen the light about the middle of the 14th century. His birthplace was probably Constantinople, but much of his life was spent in Peloponnesus, and was passed in official employment. He received the name of Pletho, and perhaps of Gemistus from the extent, multiplicity, and fulness of his erudition, which he displayed in numerous works on a great variety of subjects. "He was admired," says a writer near his time, "by not Greece alone, but by nearly the whole world, for his various and manifold knowledge of things divine and human, so that, by the universal consent of both Greeks and Latin, he approached most closely to Plato, the prince of philosophers, and to Aristotle." Yet this great name is one which posterity has willingly let die. He wrote on philosophy, theology, history, geography, oratory, music, etc. He composed orations, occasional essays, polemical tracts, letters, etc., and made collections, in the fashion of declining centuries, from Diodorus, Appian, and Plutarch; from Xenophon and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, from Aristotle and Thucydides. He was engaged in numerous controversies, with George Gennadius, who became patriarch of Constantinople after the Ottoman conquest; with Theodorus of Gaza, and with George of Trebizond. The number of his works might encourage the belief that a century of years had been ascribed to their author; but this longevity is discredited by the incidents of his life. If he died, almost a centurian, in 1452, as some reporters allege, he must have been about seventy when he held the first public employment recorded as held by him; and he must have been reposing on ninety when last commissed as an imperial officer in the Peloponnesus. The years of macrobriania are so readily exaggerated by themselves, and by their more juvenile contemporaries, that no great weight need be attached to the allegation that he was born in 1855. His name of Pletho has been stated to have been bestowed on him in consequence of his learning; but it may have been as designed as an approximate reproduction of the name of Plato, to whose memory and speculations he devoted himself with unrestrained enthusiasm. The surname may also have been assumed by himself, for it fitted his frequent occasions of sarcasm and ridicule to the numerous adversaries whom he provoked. He occupied a high place at court, in the close of the reign of the emperor Manuel II Palaeologus (Brucker says Michael, but the last emperor of that name died almost a century and a half before, Dr. Plate, in Smith’s Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Mythol., etc., gives 1426 as the date of this official function, but Manuel died in 1425). Gemistus “the Philosopher,” as he was already called, was one of the notables at the conference in Constantinople which resulted in the union of the Greek Church (Michael Attalites, Hist. Polit. c. iv). He attended the emperor John V, as a senator and deputy of the Greek Church, to the Council of Florence in 1439 (Ducat, Hist. Byzant. c. xxxi). Among his companions were Bessarion, his pupil; Indore of Russia; George the Scholarius, his future antagonist; and Argypnopolus. Pletho distinguished himself by the active part which he took in the conferences, and by his violent opposition to the union of the churches. He yielded ultimately, however, and was one of the signatories of the council. This compromise of religious opinion embittered the feelings of his countrymen to him. He did not accompany the emperor on his return to Constantinople. During his stay in Florence he formed an intimacy with Cosmo di Micii, who instituted the Platonic Academy at Florence, of which Ficinus became the first director. He certainly succeeded in rendering Platonism the rage in Italy, supported as he was by the countenance of his illustrious disciple, Cardinal Darserian, and by the favor of the Medicinian house. Most of his labors henceforth were devoted to the illustration and dissemination of the Platonic doctrine. This endeavor, and the success which attended it, provoked the hostility of the Aristotelians, whose opinions had been for centuries in almost unhonoured possession of the dominant philosophy, and involved him in virulent controversy with their leaders. Nor was the hostility mitigated by the suspicion that Pletho desired to supplant not merely Peripateticism, but Christianity also, by his revived Platonism. He was charged and decried, both by the rationalized with being not less dangerous to the faith than Mohammed himself. The suspicion affected into the perilous systems of the Alexandrians and Averroists. The institution of the Florentine Academy was one of the most potent agencies in the emancipation of modern thought; and its establishment may fairly be credited to the labors and to the impulse of Pletos. While a truly distinctive and philosophic career is his political project for the reformation and amelioration of the Peloponnesus. Though some of its outlines were derived from antiquity, and the route was in some sort indicated by Plato and Plotinus, yet it possessed originality of its own, and was immediately induced by an active desire of ministering to present needs, and of supplying practical remedies, even if they were impracticable, to the actual miseries of the society around him.

The plan proposed by Pletos was a sweeping agrarianism, resembling in some respects the system of Lycurgus and that of Cleomenes II in the same region of Laconia; resembling in others the socialism of Plato, but resembling still more the extreme projects of land-reform which have recently been proposed in England, Ireland, France, and other countries. The evils which he proposed to redress by a complete alteration of the fabric of society were the insecurity of person and property; the squallor occasioned by ravages and multitudinous taxes, ill-imposed and unfairly levied; the uncertain and defective administration of justice; and the varied and degraded currency in circulation. In Plato, he proposed to divide the people into three classes, but the classes were different from those of Plato: they were to be the agriculturists, the capitalists, and the guardians. The farmers or agriculturists were intended to include the greater part of the industrial body; the capitalists were to embrace the owners of all the appliances for the assistance of labor, and apparently the lessors of the land; the guardians, or defenders, comprehended all who were engaged in the protection of the society and its members, or in the maintenance of right and order; viz., princes, magistrates, lawyers, and soldiers—priests also, probably. There was to be no private property in land; it was to belong exclusively to the state, and to be leased out, from time to time, to landloards or capitalists. A right of temporary occupancy was all that was admitted. Of the produce of the soil, one third was to be paid to the government for the maintenance of the guardians, and for public burdens; one third went to the landlords or capitalists; and one third was to be the remuneration of the actual cultivators. Pletos, like the French Économistes, thought that the state should own all the produce of the land, and that all impositions should be charged upon it. The guardians, whether princes or soldiers or magistrates, were a class entirely apart from the rest of the community. They paid no taxes, but protected the people from external violence and internal disorder, and were supported by the government from the proceeds of the public third. The soldiers were quartered on the farmers to consume the government thrids, as far as required for their support: "fruges consumere nati." No money-taxes were imposed: the funds required for the public service were derived exclusively from the export and sale of the surplus which remained out of the government's share of the produce. Such is a brief abstract of Pletos' plethoric state. The plan was never completed; the book was burned; its author died; and the Turks conquered the Morea before the experiment could be tried.

Pletos, Joseph, doctor of theology, imperial chaplain, and abbot of the monastery of the Holy Virgin of Fargrany, Hungarian imperial canon, imperial councillor, dean-emeritus of the metropolitan chapter of St. Stephen, at Vienna; director of the theological studies in the Austrian empire, referent of the same, assistant of the imperial commission of studies, director and president of the theological faculty; and, in 1855, ex-curator magnificus of the University of Vienna, member of the high schools of Vienna, Pesth, and Padua, etc., was born at Vienna Jan. 3, 1788; attended the lessons of the gymnasium of St. Anna; studied philosophy and theology at the University of Vienna; received orders Aug. 20, 1815, and was appointed adjunct at the university, prefect of the studies, and librarian in the episcopal seminary. During the years 1814 and 1815 he taught dogmatics at the High School of Vienna. In 1816 he was appointed chaplain of the court, and first director of the studies at the institute for the institute for the regular priests, then recently founded by Francis I. In 1823 he was called upon to teach dogmatics at the University of Vienna, and Feb. 15, 1827, he became canon of the metropolitan chapter of St. Stephen. He received successively the functions and dignities mentioned above, and discharged his duties with that activity, with that activity, commendable prudence, with disinterestedness and conscientiousness, for the good of the State and the Church. A fit of apoplexy put an end to his restless activity, in 1841. Pletos was a worthy, unblemished priest, a learned theologian, a zealous protector of true science, and at the same time a father to the poor, a comforter of the afflicted, a helper in need, and to his friends a true and upright friend. Besides several works of edification and some sermons, which he published in the years 1817-1832, he wrote a number of essays in Frint's theological journal, and in his own, which he edited from 1829 to 1840, under the title of Neue theologische Zeitschrift (Vienna), in twelve annual volumes; the thirteenth, commenced by Pletos, was completed by his friend, Prof. Seebach.

Plicata, the "folded" chamble worn on Good Friday and by the deacon or by a priest, seated or by a priest, folded on the shoulder, when acting as a deacon, and in the days of Tertullian, been mentioned with peculiar interest by Christian writers on account of the testimony which he bore concerning the Christians of his day in Bithynia. They form the subject of a rather long letter (x, 97) to Tertullian, written about four years after the death of St. Paul, and followed by a short answer from Trajan. With all his advantages of education, Pliny was superstitious and credulous. Though a kindhearted man even to slaves (viii, 16, 19), he was intolerant and cruel to the Christians, according to his own account, he put to death the Cursus of Bithynia who would not abjure their religion, though he considered it only an innocent superstition. The materials for Pliny's life may be collected from his Epistles, from which a brief notice has been drawn up by Cellarius, and one more elaborately by Masson; there is also a very complete Life of Pliny, with abundant references to his letters, prefixed to E. Thierfeld's German translation of the "Epistles and Panegyric" (Munich, 1829). But the reader is referred to the Epistles themselves for these details. A young, able, and vigorous, but one must say not altogether judicious, study of Pliny by Bayle was already in print in 1734, and the same writer on Pliny by Joseph M. Deplin, both in the year 1758. The editorship of Pliny's "Letters" was in the hands of M. Deplin, and his editing is now considered one of the most important documents remaining of early Christian history, and we therefore transcribe here some portion of it. After mentioning the difficulty of the question and the plexity in which it is conducted, he goes on to say:
