"Observe that no one, if at first concealed, but Christian, and afterwards denied it, or said that he had been Christian, but had left them three years ago, some longer, and one or more afterwards. They all wrenched your tombs and the statues of the gods; these also reviled Christ. They affirmed that the whole of their faith or error lay in their belief that they were wrount either on a stated day before it was light, and sing among themselves alternately a hymn to Christ, as to God, and blind themselves by an oath, not to the commission of any wickedness, but not to be guilty of theft, or robbery, or adultery, never to fail in their faith, or deny a place in their company when called upon to return it. When these things were performed, it was their custom to separate, and then to come together again to a meal, which they ate in common without any disorder; but this they had forborne even since the ascension of my master. According to your commands, I prohibit assemblies. After receiving this account, I judged it the more necessary to examine, and that by torture, two maid-servants, who were called mistresses; but I have discovered nothing besides a bad and excessive superstition. Suspending, therefore, all judicial proceedings, I have recourse to you for advice, for it has appeared to me matter highly deserving consideration, especially upon account of the great number of persons who are in danger of suffering, for many of all ages and every rank, of both sexes likewise, are accused, and are brought before you. Now has the censure of this superstition seized cities only, but the lesser towns also, and the open country; nowhere else, however, to me that it may be brought to a conclusion, and corrected. It is certain that the temples which were almost forsaken begin to be more frequented, and the sacred objects after a long interruption are, revived. Victims likewise are everywhere bought, whereas a time there were few purchasers. Whence I think it fit to imagine what numbers of men may be reclaimed if pardon were granted to those who repent.

So few and uncertain are the records left to guide our inquiries through the obscure period which immediately followed the conclusion of the labors of the apostles, that the above testimony to the numbers and virtues of our forefathers in faith becomes indeed invaluable. Plisson, Marie-Prudence, a French female mathematician, celebrated in her time by her eccentricities, was born at Chartres Nov. 27, 1727. Her father was a magistrate. Her taste for learned pursuits kept her aloof from the world, and induced her to prefer single-blessedness and her isolation. Her qualities of mind soon engaged her in disputes with which her sex evidently ought to have nothing to do. She first made herself known by several pieces in prose and in verse, published by the newspapers of the time. In 1764 the question was agitated whether a child born ten months and ten days after the dissolution of the matrimonial tie was legitimate. Mlle. Plisson boldly intervened in this momentous debate, and attacked with no little vivacity the opinion of Lebais, Bertin, Antoine Petit, etc.: many were the epigrams darted at the female philosopher. There was a time when she took to observe with passion the apparent contradiction in the cases, comparing notes with all the naturalists who had written anything about it. She undertook to write the physiology of this interesting animal. "What animal," she says, in one of her pamphlets, "is more common, more at hand to be examined by educated people, than the cat?" Her library was remarkable in every respect. She died Dec. 17, 1788. Mlle. Plisson left, Ode sur la Vie champêtrce (1750):—Projet pour soulager les Pouvoirs de la Cam- pouye (Chartres, 1758):—Recherches sur la Dureté de la Grossece (Amsterdam, 1765):—La Promenarde de Pro- vincers, Nouv. Pluo van Amstel, Cornelius, a celebrated Dutch amateur engraver and designer, was born at Amsterdam in 1728. He is chiefly distinguished for his imitations of the works of old masters, and is considered one of the best collectors known, amounting to five thousand drawings by celebrated Italian, German, French, Flemish, and Dutch masters, from Giotto to his own time. Born of a good and wealthy family, he had many opportunities of improving his taste and advancing his pursuits. Being acquainted with all the principal collectors of Amsterdam, he commenced making his own valuable collection at a very early age. He had likewise a very valuable collection of prints and etchings, especially of the works of Lucas van Leyden, Albert Durér, Goltzius, Cornelius and Jan Visscher, K. Bercham, and especially Rembrandt. Pluo van Amstel's own works consist chiefly of imitations of drawings of old masters, in chalk, washed and colored; the colored imitations were accomplished by printing with several plates. In 1766 he published a collection of forty-six such imitations in various styles, after drawings by A. Vanderwende, Rembrandt, Ostade, Gerard Dow, Backhuysen, Metzu, Berchem, A. Bloemaert, Wouvermann, Miers, Terburg, and others. There are altogether upwards of one hundred imitations of drawings by Pluo van Amstel, and as many as forty-six of his etchings, representing the various stages of progress, but very few impressions were taken of any. They are enumerated and described by Weigel in the Kunst-Katalog, and in Nagel's Künstler-Lexikon. A collection of one hundred of Van Amstel's and some additional similar imitations, with a portrait of Van Amstel, was published by C. Jost (London, 1821, royal folio); but only one hundred copies were printed, and at the enormous price of forty guineas per copy. Pluo van Amstel died at Amsterdam Dec. 20, 1778, and on March 3, 1800, his valuable collection, with the exception of the etchings of Rembrandt, was sold at auction, and realized the large sum of 109,469 florins. Plotinus, the most prominent and celebrated of the Neo-Platonic philosophers, the most elaborate and authoritative system of the school of Antioch, and the most transcendental of the ancient transcendentalists, and was mainly instrumental in transforming into the Pantheism of Lamblichus and Proclus the doctrine deduced through many successive from Plato.

Life.—The outlines of the career of Plotinus have already been given. He is here to be described, with a brief notice of his opinions, under Neo-PLATONISM.
The esteem in which the sage of Lyceopolis was held by his contemporaries is shown by the application to him of the current proverb, "The productions of Egypt are few but they are great." His philosophical temperament is further illustrated by his dying words, addressed to Eustochius: "I am striving to reunite what is divine in me to the pure divinity which reigns throughout the universe." When he expired, a dragon rushed from under his bed, and escaped under the bed of his pupil, not yet entirely drunk. "What has become of him?" and was informed, in a string of loose hexameters, that he dwelt with Minos, Rhadamantus, Abarcas, Pythagoras, and other blessed spirits, in the contemplation of the Deity, to whom he had been conjoined in ecstatic union four times during life. After the biographical notice already given, it only remains to give a somewhat fuller account of his writings, and a more extended and connected exposition of his views.

The Proclus.—The philosophy of the Neo-Platonic school of Alexandria, founded by Ammonius Saccas, was an exclusive cult, designed to be a secret and privileged possession for the training and elevation of an elect body of theorists and enthusiasts. The seal of reverence having been broken by Herennius, his fellow-disciple, Plotinus deemed that there was no longer either obligation or expediency in endeavoring to preserve the secrets of the new speculation, and accordingly promulgated it by oral lectures at Rome, continued for twenty-five years, and by treatises written at various times during this long course of instruction. His exposition was, however, so curt, intricate, and obscure; so full of inapprehensible subtleties and impenetrable distinctions, that he was under the necessity of urging the aid of his pupils to interpret and develop his doctrine. He thus employed his veteran disciple, Amelius, to combat the repugnances and to remove the doubts of the neophyte Porphyry. All the earlier writers who have occasion to mention Plotinus speak of his brief, terse, thought-oppressed, oracular style; and the few among the moderns who have had the misfortune to get a glimpse of the whole of his talismanic compositions must have often re-echoed the ancient censures. The sublimation of the recondite thought is rendered more evident by the dryness of the phraseology and the riggledness of words. The density of the compressed and indiscriminate utterance is made evident through the abounding profusion of the words which the whole of his manifold and variously coloured text, and theletters he wrote under the inspiration of the neophyte Porphyry, he has collected fifty-four essays of various dimensions, which, in imitation of the Platonic Trilogies and Tetralogies, he arranged in six series of nine each, to which he gave the name of Enneads; being guided in their composition and disposition by the agreement or affinity of their topics, and in their succession by the ascending progress from human observation and experience, through the constituent principles of abstract nature, to ontology and theology. This is not the line of systematic exposition, nor is it, in its execution, the exact manner of thought and expression. The whole appears vague and confused; incomplete and often incoherent in its members; undeveloped and fragmentary in the exposition of the several parts. There are a few sufficiently thorough discussions: On Beauty (Enn. i, vi); On Nature and the One (Enn. iii, viii); On the Problems of Existence (Enn. iv, i–iii); and On Unity and Multiformity (Enn. vi, iv–v); to which may be added On the Essential Good (Enn. vii and ix). That there was a definite system in the mind of Plotinus may be readily admitted, for there is a general congruity of thought pervading the whole collection, and his characteristic principles were entertained from the first. This system might possibly be reproduced in its substantial integrity by a liberal employment of conjecture and logical evolution. Such a system may have been preserved by the anecdotes and traditions of his scholars, the cavils of opponents, the apparent urgency of particular questions, as in the papers Against the Gnostics (Enn. ii, ix). Yet even what was written in this disconnected manner was composed at various times, and in various degrees of completion. None of the books can be regarded as a just, rounded, and complete essay. They are, for the most part, a collection of remarks upon discontinuous points, associated with a common subject of inquiry, thus resembling the Pausias, like those of Plato, which, however, for a longer imperfect form of enunciation with French thinkers. This, however, does not exhaust the impediments to any coherent and satisfactory ordination of the productions of Plotinus. There is no reason to suppose that all his written remains were in a condition to be made available. There is reason to believe that other materials besides those employed by Porphyry, either in his form of synoptical abridgments or of formal tracts, were in the hands of other disciples. In view of all the difficulties of his position, as far as they can now be reckoned, one may consider the tolerance of opinion among scholars and critics that the procedure of Porphyry was judicious, and that no better plan of arrangement could have been adopted than the aggregate of the fragmentary materials in accordance with the loose bond of coherence supplied by similarity of subject, although this plan utterly disregards the chronological order of their production, and shuffles confusedly together the writings of very distinct periods. Less inconvenience would result from this disorder, if there were any consistency in the development of his speculation; but in his earlier career Plotinus was much influenced by the tenets of Numenius; in his mature life he acquired greater independence of thought, but inclined most closely to the teachings and tendencies of Plato; and in his later years he was interested in Platonist philosophy. What could be done to correct or compensate for the confusion of the text was supplied by the Sentences of Porphyry, which gave an abstract of the doctrine, but these have come down to us only in a sadly mangled form.

In the arrangement of Porphyry [see Neo-Platonicism] the logical order is disturbed, and in a great measure inverted. The last two Enneads are the most characteristic, and in some respects the most important for the estimation of the philosophy of Plotinus. The first Ennead is noted by Porphyry as pre-eminent in ethical (being occupied with ἀρετή), or ὑστερίτις). The recension of Porphyry was not the only promulgation of the lectures of Plotinus. Three other publications have been specified, and other copies of special parts of his philosophy may have been circulated. As soon as he commenced reducing his views to writing, demands for copies were made upon him by his followers, and these exemplars would naturally be multiplied and disseminated to some extent. With the death of the master, some of his productions were sent in his lifetime from Rome to Syria, to the rhetorician Longinus. These loose and flying sheets would soon be lost after the more complete body of his doctrine became accessible. This, however, is acknowledged to have existed in two forms—that issued with authority by Porphyry, and another presentation by Eustochius, a pupil who attended the death-bed of his teacher. These two versions are alone recognised by Creuzer, the accepted authority for all matters connected with the text and interpretation of Plotinus. These recensions did not agree either in the distribution of the matter or in all the details of doctrine. The Eustochian edition was still in existence in the Byzantine period, but has since perished, and has left the Porphyrian text as the sole representative of Plotinus. This exemplar is, however, believed by Creuzer to have received additions and alterations from the concurrent copy of the Eustochian rolls.

We would remark, before proceeding to the consideration of the peculiar philosophy of Plotinus, that neither he, nor the sect of which he was the exponent, contemplated in a distinct type of speculation. The Neo-Platonists were the continuators of the Platonic Academy—drifted far, it may be, from the ancient shores. Their distinctive purpose was to conciliate Aristotle with Plato, and to harmonise with both the teachings of Pythagoras, and the asceticism which had flowed to Alexandria from Oriental sources. The course of the philosophy of which he was the exponent, and modified doctrine would thus be not equally expounded over all parts of any complete system, but concentrated on the subjects of conciliation, the exposition of those leading principles which furnished the means of reconciliation, and their development in accordance with the scheme of agreement. Aspasius, Alexander, and Adrastus were read in the school and commented upon by Plotinus to the last, in company with Severus, Nemoimus, and other Platonists or Neo-Platonists. Thus is given a further explanation of both the incompleteness and the difficulties of the text, and also of the inevitable difficulty of affording a clear, compact, and methodical exposition of that doctrine.

Philosophy.—The definition of metaphysics by the schoolmen as the branch of knowledge treating of abstract being and its modifications (De Ers, ordinateur et Entium affectibus) is more applicable to the dawning revivies of Plotinus than to any other scheme of speculation. For, whether we regard the term as having been originally invented by Theophrastus to designate incoherent or obscure conceptions, or as a term of abuse, or beyond physics and transcending them, it is almost exclusively in this dim and unbounded region that the reflections and imaginations of Plotinus disport themselves. With the ordinary topics of English-speaking philosophy he scarcely concerns himself. He rises from the earth, and looks beyond the sphere of intellect. What could be done to correct or compensate for the confusion of the text was supplied by the Sentences of Porphyry, which gave an abstract of the doctrine, but these have come down to us only in a sadly mangled form.
cannot, however, be conceived as unity, if the Supreme Mind be excluded, nor can it be thought of as One. Mind cannot form itself the idea of the absolute One, without the original One and the Good; that is, without the author and father of Mind itself, and of all things; that is the God, the Mind of the present exposition. It is due to a logical necessity rather than to a theological presumption that Plotinus asserts being to be posterior to the One, for he attaches being inseparably to the three hypostases of divinity which constitutes his three principles. It is an attempt to derive the entire universe, the Pythagorean doctrine of numbers, and the Platonic thesis of the One and the Many (Euns. vi, vii, 9). The Unum is Ene and summum Ene essential and primordial Being. There is no separation or division between them, but only a theoretical and shadowy antecedence from these intelligences, and so on, and their corresponding qualities, which means essentially the same thing as the One and the Good, the Divine Intelligence, Universal Reason, and the One. The universe is One, not in the vulgar sense of unity, but in the One, the absolute, eternal, unsubstantial One (Euns. vi, i, 3). This is the Absolute Good, and is wholly ineffable, being dimly apprehensible only by the purest and highest efforts of the most depurated intuition (Euns. ii, i, vi, viii, 3; iv, 3, 4; vi, i, 6; ixi, 6). The One and the Good (which are one) is before and above being, and before and above mind, the intelligible (Euns. vi, v, 1; vi, vii, 1; iv, 3, 4; vi, i, 3). That the One is above the Noetic is a fundamental dogma, which, like the soul of the universe, is deduced from Plato. This One and Good is the Father of all things, the universal God, existing in all, moving through all, and embracing all (in Patera, Inquil. Euns. vi, vii, 1; vi, i, 1).

This doctrine unquestionably presents the appearance of Pantheism, and anticipates it, especially when taken in connection with the Scala Intellectibilia in Unum, or progress towards the incommunicable union with the Universal Good. In Proclus it occurs as being distinguishable from Pantheism (Eun. iv, 2, i; ii, 2, 4, 6, 7, 9; Inquil. S. I., vii, i, 3). In Plotinus it is different. He carefully preserves the distinction between the One and the Many, between the Supreme Good and all its immediate and derivative productions. He does not ascribe personality to the Divine One, not by metaphor; but he avoids attributing to the Divine Being either the evolution or the absorption of the universe, and he accords to man personality, free will, and responsibility (Euns. iii, iv, 5-7). He distinguishes between the agents in producing all things, and the whole which is produced (Euns. iii, vii, viii, 9, 5). But there is confusion in his utterances, if not contradiction: though he may be credited with a more earnest anxiety to escape pantetheistic extravagances than can be acceded to his Christian admirer, translator, and paraphrast, Marsilius Ficinus (q.v.). According to Plato, genuine knowledge is intuitive: according to Plotinus, it is immediate—the union of the knowing and the known; and the knowledge of the Godhead is only by direct communion (Eun. vi, vii, 4, 47; iii, i, 3, 5). The soul which is the lower of the two, contemplates the One in the realm of the intelligible, first to the sensible heavens, where they assume corporeal vesture, and thence proceed by successive declensions to lower and lower corporations (Euns. iv, iii, 15). Yet the soul in its separable state retains its immortal essence and divine character (Eun. v, vii, 48; Inquil. iv, 6; ix, 9).

The second principle of Plotinus is Mind—the intelligence per se—the Universal Reason (Noetos). The One or the Good projects a perfect effulgence of itself, without loss of integrity or diminution of total power (Eun. vi, vi, i). The desire ever provokes an incursion in the opposing to itself, to its parent, to the similitude of its exemplar; and this reflection or bending back is itself the Divine Mind, Intelligence, Universal Reason, whence all reason and thought are engendered (Eun. vi, iv, vii, 4). From Mind issues Soul—the spiritual spirit—the soul of the universe, which dwells in the universal reason, as the universal soul dwells in the One (Euns. vi, i, 7). The soul is partly to the Divine Mind whence it proceeds, and imperfectly copies the ideas presented there. It turns partly towards the sensible universe, which it fashioned from the ideas of the One. All souls are not contained in the universal mind—a doctrine espoused by Arnaudin, which amounts to Pantheism. There is a genuine plurality and hierarchy of souls, derived from the soul of the universe, by many separation or division, but by separate and independent production (Euns. iv, ii, 2; iv, iv, 6, 11; Inquil. viii, 9. The One, the Soul—constitute the trinity of Plotinus. These three are one in essence, though distinct in function and in origin, and are all divine. From them, by the inaugurating potency of the first, by the presentations and concurrence of the second, and by the permanent creative energy of the third, all the order and beauty and variety and harmony of the universe are produced.

But the universe is twofold: the intelligible, archetypal and eternal (Eun. vi, vii, 5; iv, 6). And that which is the image and adumbration of the archetype, the Sensible, facilitous and transitory (Eun. vi, vii, 5; vi, 8; comp. v, 6; vi, 9). In the intelligible universe, all incorporeal ideas are incorporeal. It is the ideal world. In the sensible universe, souls are incorporated in bodies, and distributed through them (Euns. iii, iv, i). The term souls is used by Plotinus with much greater latitude than would now be sanctioned, and is extended to irrational animals and plants, and even to the blind motions, chemicals or physical, of organic and inorganic matter, which is referred to by the One through the One, which is the lower of the two, and so on. The realm of the intelligible, first to the sensible heavens, where they assume corporeal vesture, and thence proceed by successive declensions to lower and lower corporations (Euns. iv, iii, 15). Yet the soul in its separable state retains its immortal essence and divine character (Eun. v, vii, 48; Inquil. iv, 6; ix, 9).

PLATO

The descending scale of existence to the last and most rudimentary exhibitions of form. There is a dull, inert antagonism, a sullen insubordination in matter, which resists the process of this perfection; not a decided negation of the beautiful, but a passive negligence which generates physical evil, as moral evil is produced by defect of essential goodness, and by deflection and aberrancy from the good.

All derivative being turns to the superior being whence it proceeds, and to the inferior being which proceeds from it, by a constant and loving libation that directs its attention both to the exemplar above and to the product of imitation below. Hence results the best and the worst part of the One, the Good, and the true or real, from whence they have descended.

The perfection of the good, and every nature undepraved, desires, is this assimilation to the divine. In aesthetics and in the works of art, this gives us the interpretation of beauty and of the beautiful; in life and conduct it explains and prescribes virtue and holiness and sanctification.

The essence of the doctrine of Platonism is contained and charmingly displayed in his theory of beauty (Eum. i, vi), and might be reproduced in its chief lines from it. A sagacious and just instinct has often led to the publication of this beautiful and magnificent vision of the One and the Good.

Descending further, the beauty of form in the One and the Good is imitated throughout every grade in the perfect, beneficent plan of the good, accordant with the absolute excellence of the Divine Being (ὅ ἐστι διὸ ἐξ ἀληθείας ἀληθείας ἀληθείας, Ἐπιμ. vi, vii, 88). As the whole energies of the soul are directed towards the good for which it was constituted (Ἑκ. i, vii, 1; Προτ. Ἰστ. Θεολ. § cxix), its eager appetites are inexcusable love of the beautiful. All these things, indeed, is the essence of beauty becomes both purified and intensified as the intelligent and sympathetic soul ascends nearer to the thought of the divine mind, and to the vision of the excellencies and glories of the Divine (Ἑκ. vi, vi, 6). Thence all ideas proceed: thither all forms aspire; and the power of beauty is the bloom of the universal beauty, which creates all beauty, generating it, and making it more beautiful from the redundance of the beauty in the Divine, which is the beginning and the end of all beauty" (Ἑκ. vi, vii, 82). The whole nature of beauty, therefore, consists in the immediate and loving apprehension of the goodness and wisdom and excellence of the Creator, as imperfectly shown in the incomplete perfections of parts of the creation. Whence is this faculty of recognition derived? It comes from the preserving of all that is beautiful and good and the divine, it is elevated, elevated, and it is enriched by the influx of the beautiful—by the epiphany in the splendor of the splendid and loveliness of God. As the eye sees the sun by the light which proceeds from it, so the soul recognizes goodness by the goodness which God gives and bestows upon us. As the things which are communicated from the source of all beauty—the beautiful in itself (φῶς ἀπὸ φῶς ψυχής, ἀπὸ τῆς Ἀλήθειας, Π. Θεολ. ii, vi, 6, et Μαρα. Φιλοπ. ad loc. τ. v, 7). Thus all things are suspended from the Divine, and are filled with divinity (Phil. Ἰστ. Θεολ. § cxix, cxliv). This explanation may appear vague and visionary; but the philosophy of Plotinus can find no other mode of expression for its transcendent reveries. It is, however, no more indistinct than the language of more profound intellects in regard to the like subjects. It accords with the declarations of Avicenna and Avrevos, of Duns Scotus and S. Thomas Aquinas, of Leibnitz and of Corderige (Socot. In Sentent. ii, xi, i, tom. vi, p. i, ii, p. 229-4; S. Thom. Aquin. Summ. Theol. i, lxxxix; i, lxxxix; iv, lxxxiv; leibn. Phain. Philos. ad Pr. Ex. § 42; Corderige, Aidos to Reflection, p. 242, 264, note).

Beauty thus connects itself immediately with the search after the first or supreme Good (Ἑκ. ii, ix, 8); and it is in the supreme Good that the beautiful and the beautiful is appreciated. "Since all things progress, and all things are in some sort full of delight, all creatures of this sensible world lead the wise and contemplative mind to the Eternal God: they are the shadows, the echoes, and the picture; the traces, the images, and the visions of that effect." (S. Bonaventure, Itin. Minitis ad Deum, c. viii; comp. Eccl. Benton, Prop. Opus Tertium, c. ix, p. 266, note.)

"Ipsa vocat nostrum animos ad sidera mundus" (Marcellus Astronom. iv, 919).

Ugliness is defect of the beautiful, and its inadequate realization. It corresponds to physical and moral evil, and it indicates a falling away (πτωχότερα τῆς ψυχῆς) from the goodness which was designed in the creation (Ἑκ. i, vi, vi, 9; vii, 14). The perfection of every nature is this re-establishment of itself. In the expressions of Plotinus regard to human souls and man’s duties there are frequent echoes of the contemporaneous Christianity which he opposed—exquisite utterances of religious fervor, in which Plotanism seems to lose itself in the beauties of the new religion (Ἑκ. vi, ix; i, ii, 2, 5, 4; Ἐπιμ. i, iv, 6, comp. l. Theop. ii, 18, 18; Rom. viii, 11, 16). For it is "God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure" (Phil. ii, 13). All things frame their height to the lowest turn by native constitution to the most excellent nature whence they are derived, and the love within their souls seek union with their original Above. This universal conversion, permeating all things, binds the soul to the beauty of the Divine, which is the Creator and the desire of all. In the lover of all righteousness, in man spiritualized and filled with the desire of holiness, it becomes ecstatic elevation and intimate communion with the Spirit of the Divine. We worship the God which is separated from God. We breathe the One, whose breath is our life, and we are preserved. This support is not given at one moment, and withdrawn at another, but is ever present for our guidance. Nay, more, we incline to the Good, and to the happiness above. There the soul is at rest and beyond ill, ascending to the true country, to the place which is pure of all evils. For the soul filled with God produces beauty and righteousness and virtue. God is its beginning and its end—its beginning, because it descends from him; its end, because he is the God of which has been raised heavenly Love, and every soul is love. The soul, in its pure nature, is possessed with the love of God, and longs for union with him, as a virgin nurses the love of the beautiful for the beautiful. Thus the life of the soul is good and quietly happy, which is the things of earth—a life uncharmed by things below—the flight of the single and solitary soul to the only One (Ἑκ. vi, ix, 11).

For such sublimities of enthusiasm no language will suffice but the rapt Greek of Plotinus or the fervid Latin of Marcellus Flaccus, and even these faint and fall beneath the divine burden of the thought.

Flouquet, Gottfried, a German philosopher, was born Aug. 28, 1716, at Stuttgart. He came from a Protestant family of French origin; his father was an innkeeper. While he was studying at Tübingen, he was so strongly impressed by Wolf's writings that, without giving up theology altogether, he gave special attention to the study of philosophy and mathematics. This twofold tendency strikingly appears in the theses which he defended in 1740 (Diss. qua Cl. Varigoni demonstratio geometrica possibilitas transubstantiationis enevarvatur, and in which he endeavored to reconcile Wolf's doctrines with the teachings of the Christian faith. After discharging the duties of a minister and tutor, he was appointed in 1746 deacon at Freudenstadt. His memoir on the monads (Prima monadologia capacita [Berlin, 1748, 4to]) opened to him in 1749 the Academy of Sciences of Berlin, which invited him to reside there. He went to Würtemberg, by whose protection he obtained, in 1750, the professorship of logic and metaphysics at Tübingen. He taught political economy at the same university, and was, in 1778, called to Stuttgart to teach this branch at the military school. His faculties having given way in consequence of a stroke of apoplexy, in 1796 he was compelled to abandon teaching. Ploucquet was an honest and open character, and he was gifted by nature with a clear and methodical mind. "A champion of spiritualism," says Mr. Haag, "he combated, with a degree of penetration equalled only by his erudition, the materialistic doctrines professed by the philosophers of the 18th century, and feared not even to enter into contest with Kant. Then, ascending the stream of the centuries, he submitted to strict analysis the systems of ancient philosophy, which he tried to build anew in historical essays, worthy even now of our attention." Ploucquet died at Stuttgart Sept. 13, 1796. He left a number of works, mostly published at Tübingen, and written with great purity, but rather exaggerated concision. The following are the most important: De materiaismo (1750, 4to); --Principia de animato et phénomene (Frankfort, 1758, 8vo); --De Pyrrhoni epocha (1758, 4to); --Fundamenta philosophiae speculative (7th ed. 1759, 8vo); it is an exposition of Leibnitz's system: --De dogmatibus Thales et Anaxagora (1763, 4to); --Methodus calculationi in topocis (1783, 8vo). In this work he represents the syllogisms by geometrical figures and mathematical formulas; these methods, hinted at by Leibnitz, engaged him in discussions with Lambert and others: --ProblHEMA DE Natura hominis ante et post mortem (1786, 4to); --Institutiones philosophiae theoricae (1772, 1782, 8vo); --Elementa philosophiae contemporaneae, sive de scientia rationis et sensus (Stuttgart, 1773, 4to); --Commentationes philosophiae selectiores (Utrecht, 1781, 4to); --Varia questions metaphysico (1782, 4to). --Hoefer, Nouv. Plough (charash, בָּשָׁר, to plough, whence macherekh, בָּשָׁר; and macharashet, בָּשָׁר, 1 Sam. xiii, 20; two instruments used in agriculture. One of these is perhaps the ploughshare, the other the coulter. See also E.A.S.). Egypt, from the earliest times, has laid claim to the honor of the invention of this important implement, and as it was undoubtedly one of the first countries brought under culture by the hand of man after the flood, the claim may be well founded. Agriculture was also early practiced among the Hebrews, and, from their agreement in so many other matters, it is likely that the implements of the two nations were very nearly the same. The ancient Egyptian plough was entirely of wood, and of very simple form, like that point was shod with a metal snect either of bronze or iron. It was drawn by two oxen, and the ploughman guided and drove them with a long goad, without the assistance of reins, which are used by the modern Egyptians. He was sometimes accompanied by another man, who drove the animals, while he managed the two handles of the plough; and sometimes the whip was substituted for the more usual goad. The mode of yoking the beasts was exceedingly simple. Across the extremity of the pole a wooden yoke or cross-bar, about fifty-five inches or five feet in length, was fastened by a strap, lashed backwards and forwards over a prominence projecting from the centre of the yoke, which corresponded to a similar peg or knob at the end of the pole; and occasionally, in addition to these, was a ring passing over them, as in some Greek chariots. At either end of the yoke was a flat or slightly concave projection, of semicircular form, which rested on a pad placed upon the withers of the animal; and through a hole on either side of it passed a thong for suspending the shoulder-pieces, which formed the collar. These were two wooden bars, forked at about half their length, padded so as to protect the shoulder from friction, and connected at the lower end by a strong broad band passing under the throat. See Yoke. Sometimes the draught, instead of being from the shoulder, was from the head, the yoke being tied to the base of the horns; and in religious ceremonies oxen frequently drew the bier, or the sacred shrine, by a rope fastened to the upper part of the horns, without either yoke or pole (Wilkinson, Ant. Egypt., ii, 14 sqq.). According to modern travellers the plough now used in Palestine differs in some respects from the ancient implement above described. It is lightly built, with the least possible skill or expense, consisting of two poles, which cross each other near the ground. That nearest the oxen is fastened to the yoke, while the other serves, the one end as the handle, the other as the ploughshare. It is drawn by oxen, camels, cows, or heifers (Hackett, Script. Illust., p. 158 sq.; Thomson, Land and Book, i, 267 sq.). In Asia Minor substantially the same custom and implements prevail (Van Leenep, Bible Lands, p. 75 sq.). See Agriculture.

still used in Egypt. It consisted of a share, two handles, and the pole or beam, last which was inserted into the lower end of the still, or the base of the handles, and was strengthened by a rope connecting it with the heel. It had no coulter, nor were wheels applied to any Egyptian plough; but it is probable that the Ploughman's Complaint, THE, a remarkable anonymous work, published in England in the year 1552, which severely condemned the practices of popery, especially auricular confession, the celibacy and sedentary life of the clergy, the church's supposed wealth, the carelessness and negligence of the popes, etc. It was one among many means which opened the eyes of the people to the iniquity of the system, and prepared the way for the glorious Reformation.

Plough-Monday, the first Monday after Twelfthday; so called from a diversion called fool-plough, which was kept in the provinces of England on this day, which was transferred to this day. Old ploughs are preserved in the belfries of Bassingbourne and Barrington. Ploughsmen were one penny paid for every plough harnessed between Easter and Pentecost in 676, and in 960 payable on the fifteenth night after Easter.

Ploughshare (Ps. 66, Isa. i, 4). The ploughshare is a piece of iron, broad but not large, which tills the end of the shaft. So much does it resemble the short sword used by the ancient warriors that it may with very little trouble be converted into that deadly weapon, and when the work of destruction is over, re-adopted to plough the land. In 2 Kings xi, 2, it is mentioned for the first time in use on Ash-Wednesday, but afterwards transferred to this day. Old ploughs are preserved in the belfries of Bassingbourne and Barrington. PLURALITIES

Pluralities is a term used in canon law for the possession by one person of two or more ecclesiastical offices, whether of dignity or emolument. This practice, it is held by Non-Episcopalian, was generally forbidden in the Church of England, and they quote for their authority the instructions of the apostle Paul (Titus i, 5). Others contend even that, instead of a plurality of churches to one pastor, we ought to have a plurality of pastors to one church (Acts xiv, 23). Episcopalians contend there is no impropriety in a presbytery holding more than one ecclesiastical benefice. A bishop could not hold two dioceses; a presbytery, however, might officiate in more than one parochial church, but not in two dioceses. In the Church of England pluralities originated in the poverty of many of the livings. Originally a clergyman might hold two or more livings if under the nominal value of £8. The distance between them was fixed by the canon law as not to be greater than thirty miles, but custom now tolerates forty-five. Two thousand parishes, it is said, want in this way a resident pastor. By those who thus evade the Canon, it is held that the prohibition is not absolute, and admits of possible exception, the natural ground of the prohibition being the impossibility, in ordinary cases, of the same individual adequately discharging the duties of more than one office, and that therefore, in cases in which this impossibility will not occur, the union of two or more offices in the hands of one person might, speaking absolutely, be permitted without infringing the divine law. Hence canonists distinguish between "compatible" and "incompatible" benefices or dignities. Two benefices may be incompatible in three ways: 1, If each requires residence (ratiores resideniæ); 2, if the duties of both fall to be discharged at one and the same time (ratiores servitutum); 3, if the revenue of either fully suffices for the becoming maintenance of the incumbent (ratiores sustentationum). In other cases, benefices or dignities are considered compatible, and with that due dispensation may be held by the same person. The rules by which dispensations from the law of residence are to be regulated, as well as the penalties for its violation, whether on the part of the patron or on that of the recipient, have formed the subject of frequent legislation, as in the third and the fourth councils of the Lateran, in the decreets of Innocent III and many other popes, and especially in those of the Council of Trent. In general, it may be said that the canon law regards as incompatible, 1, each having the cure of souls; 2, two "dignities," 3, a "dignity" and a cure of souls; 4, a cure of souls and a simple benefice requiring residence. In other cases than these, the pope is held to have the power of dispensing. There is no department of discipline, however, in which the tendency to relaxation has been more persistent, and in which the magnitude and strength of the abuses of the Church was the prevalence of pluralism of incompatible benefices, even of bishoprics; and although a constant effort was made to prevent this abuse, the evasions of the law were not only frequent, but even screened from punishment. By 13 and 14 Victoria, c. 98, it is provided that no incumbent of a benefice shall take and hold together with it another benefice, unless the churches are within three miles of one another by the nearest road, and the annual value of one of them does not exceed £100. Nor can two benefices be held together if the population of one exceeds 3000, and that of the other exceeds 500. The word benefice, in this sense, includes any perpetual curacy, endowed public chapel, parochial chapel, or district chapelery. But a dispensation or license can be obtained from the bishop to allow two benefices to be held together; and if the archbishop refuse his license, the party may appeal to the Privy Council. A special provision is also contained in the statute whereby the head ruler of any college or hall in the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, or warden of Durham University, is prohibited from taking more than one benefice, or any other benefice. If any spiritual person holding a benefice shall accept another benefice contrary to the statute, the first benefice shall ipso facto become void. At the same time provision is made by statutes for uniting benefices where the aggregate population does not exceed 1000, and the aggregate yearly value does not exceed £500. In Ireland, no faculty or dispensation can be granted to any spiritual person to hold two or more benefices. In Scotland, before the Reformation, pluralities were also common. Abbeys and priories were likewise often centres of benefices. See Congregation (Theology). Of twenty abbots that sat in the Parliament which decreed the Reformation, fourteen were commissaries. Thus speaks the Second Book of Discipline: "Meikle less is it lawfull that any person amang these men sould have fives, six, ten, or twenty kirks, or maes, all having the charge of sanles: and brusk the patrimonie thairof, either be admission of the prince or of the kirk, in this licht of the evangell; for it is but mocketage to crave reformation where sic lyke bes place." The question of pluralities in the Church of Scotland was raised in 1779, renewed in 1818, and the General Assembly decided to set them in 1814 by an act which, however, was repealed in 1816. In 1817 it was enacted that no professor could hold a parish unless it was near the seat of the university. The question was again raised keenly debated in 1824—to wit, the holding of a chair in a university and of a parochial charge at the same time. The university commission soon after disapproved of the practice, but not the General Assembly of that period. The tenure of many benefices by one person was finally abolished in the Church of England by 1 and 2 Victoria, c. 105. In the Roman Catholic Church this practice has been forbidden from a very early period in its history, as by the councils of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) and that of Nice (A.D. 787), and is still prohibited both by the Roman Catholic canon law and by statute law in the Established Church of England. But the prohibition is more hibernal, and so is the exercise of the law, which is often extended to the established churches pluralism, in one form or another, is not uncommon. See Hammond, Canons of the Church, p. 105 sq.

Plüschke, Johann G., an eminent German Oriental scholar, was born Aug. 20, 1780, at Kohnatock, near Schwetinditz, in Silesia. He studied theology and philosophy, and for a number of years held the professorship of philology at Leipsic. In 1818 he was called as doctor and professor ordinarius of theology to Amsterdam, to take the presidency of the Lutheran seminary at Amsterdam, and died between 1857 and 1840. Plüschke wrote, De radicibus lingae Hebraicae natura, comm. critico cum explicatione lectionum (Leips. 1817); De radicibus lingae Medioevales a Cypiano Bugado editi peculiaris inde ejusdemque usu critico in emendanda textu Psalmier Graeci sept. interpretatum (Bonn, 1835);—Lecciones Alexandrianae et Hebraicae, rice de emendanda textu Veteris Testamenti Graeci LXX Interpretationet inde Hebraico (ibid, 1837);—De emendando Pentateucho Graeco LXX Interpretationet inde Hebraico addito cod. Plutarcho, an eminent Greek philosopher, noted also as a biographical and miscellaneous writer, deserves a place here for the moral tendency of all his writings, and the vast influence he has exerted in modern as well as ancient times. The works which are principal which is principally gleaned from his own and others' writings, places him in a high rank as measured by the ethics of society in his time, and sets forth the moral of certain portions of that society itself during the first century of our era, and among so-called heathens, in a land that was almost as civilized as our own, the oft as he wrote might have been written by the most ardent dis-

LIFE—Plutarch, later lived from the reign of Claudius to the time of Hadrian, was born at Chersones, a small city of Boetia in Greece, which had also been the birthplace of Pindar. Plutarch's family was ancient in Chersones: his grandfather, Lamprias, was a man eminent for his learning and as a philosopher, and is often mentioned by Plutarch in his writings, as also is his own father. The time of Plutarch's birth is not known. He was early initiated in study, to which he was naturally inclined, and was placed under Ammonius, an Egyptian, who, having taught philosophy with reputation at Alexandria, thence travelled into Greece, and settled at Athens. Under his instruction, he made great advances in knowledge; and like a thorough philosopher, more apt to regard things than words, he pursued this knowledge to the neglect of languages. The Latin language, at that time, was not only the language of Rome, but the language of all the world; yet he is conversant with it until the decline of life; and though he is supposed to have resided in Rome at different times, yet he never seems to have acquired a competent skill in it at all. He is reputed to have visited Egypt, which was at that time, as formerly it had been, famous for learning; and probably the mysteriousness of their doctrine might tempt him, as it had tempted Pythagoras and others, to go and converse with the priesthood of that country. On his return to Greece he visited the various academies and schools of the philosophers, and was in the company of some of the most celebrated savants, and the most prominent of every city in which he had visited in his travels. He took a particular journey to Sparta, to search the archives of that famous commonwealth, to understand thoroughly the model of their ancient government, the history of their legislators, their kings, and their ephors; and digested all their memorable deeds and sayings. He also visited the Lyceum, where he spent the twenty years that he resided in Greece. He was very much concerned for the safety of his country. In this respect, he was a great patriot.

Writings—The great work of Plutarch is his Parallel Lives (Bioi Parallalaios), which contains the biography of forty-six distinguished Greeks and Romans, besides the lives of Artaxerxes Mmnon, Aratus, Galba, Otho, and Homer, which last is probably not by him. The forty-six lives are divided into two parts, and the first part of which contains a Greek and a Roman, and the two lives in each pair are followed by a comparison of the characters of the two persons. These lives are: Theaetes and Romulus, Lycurgus and Numus, Solon and Varro, Herodes Atticus and Moschus, Timoleon and AmyADIUS, Peter and Philip, Pythagoras and Plato, Cicero and Julius Caesar, Plutarch and Titus, Appius Claudius and Varus, Crassus and Demosthenes, and Cicero, Demetrius Poliorcetes and M. Antonius, Dion and M. Brutus. The biographies of Epaminondas, Scipio, Agustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Vitellius, Heptomerus, Pindar, Crates the Cynic, Dio Chrysostom, Aristides, and the poet Aratus are lost. Plutarch's son, Lamprias, made a list of his father's works, which is partly preserved and printed by Fabricius (Bibliotheca Græca).

In the department of biography, Plutarch is the only writer of antiquity who has given himself up to it with a spirit of combining research and imagination. The plan of his biographies is briefly explained by himself in the introduction to the "Life of Alexander the Great," where he makes an apology for the brevity with which he is compelled to treat of the numerous events in the lives of Alexander and Caesar. "For," he says, "I do not write histories, nor lives; nor do the most conspicuous acts of necessity exhibit a man's virtue or his vice, but oftentimes some slight circumstance, a word or a jest, shows a man's character better than battles, with the slaughter of tens of thousands, and the passion of generals and cities. Now, as painters produce a likeness by a representation of the countenance and the expression of the eyes, without troubling themselves about the other parts of the body, so I must be allowed to look rather into the signs of a man's character, and thus give a portrait of his life, leaving others to describe great events and battles." The object then of Plutarch in his biographies was a moral end, and the exhibition of the principal events of a man's life was subordinate to this main design; and though he may not always have adhered to it, yet it is not certain that he could not be said to have a view of what biography should be much more exact than that of most persons who have attempted this style of composition. The life of a statesman or of a general, when written with the view of giving a complete history of all the public events in which he was engaged, is not biography, but history. This extract from Plutarch will also in some measure be an apology for the want of historical order observable in many of the lives. Though altogether deficient in that critical sagacity which discards truth from poetry, and delights in the nature of confusion and conflicting statements, Plutarch has preserved in his Lives a vast number of facts which would otherwise have been unknown to us. He was a great reader, and must have had access to large libraries. It is said that he quotes two hundred and fifty writers, a great part of whose works are now entirely lost. On the sources of Plutarch's Lives the reader may consult an essay by A. H. Le Heron, De Fontibus et Autoritate Vitrearum Parallelarum Plutarchi Commentationes IV (Got. 1826, 8vo). Besides the Lives, a considerable number of Plutarch's essays may be styled historical. They may all be read with pleasure, and some of them with instruction, not so much for their historical value as for the detached curious facts that are scattered so profusely through Plutarch's writings, and for the picture which they exhibit of the author's own mind. In one of these essays, entitled On the Malignity of Herodotus, he has, unfortunately for his own reputation, attacked the veracity and integrity of the father of history, and with the same success that subsequent imitators and imitators have made their puny attacks on a work the merit of which the closest criticism may enhance but can never depreciate. The Lives of the Ten Orators, which are attributed to Plutarch, are of little value, and may not be his; still they bear internal evidence, at least negatively, of not being of a later age than that of Plutarch. The Lives of Plutarch first appeared in a Latin version by several hands, at Rome, in 2 vols. fol., about 1470. This Latin version formed the basis of various Spanish and Italian translations. The first Greek edition was printed by Philip Guinta (Florence, 1517, fol.). Among more recent editions are those of Bryan (Lond. 1729, 5 vols. 4to), in Greek and Latin, which was completed by Moses du Soul, after Bryan’s death; that of Coray (Par. 1809-1815, 6 vols. 8vo); and that of Schäfer (Leips. 1836, 6 vols. 8vo). The translations are very numerous. The best German translation is said to be by Kaltwasser (Magdeburg, 1799-1800, 10 vols. 8vo). Another German translation appeared at Vienna in 1812. The best Italian translation is by Pompei. The French translation of Amyot, which appeared in 1539, has considerable merit and has been oftentimes reprinted. The English translation of Sir Thomas North (Lond. 1612), which is avowedly made from that of Amyot, is often very happy in point of expression, and is deservedly much esteemed. The Lives were also translated into French by Dacier (Par. 1721, 8 vols. 4to). The translation sometimes called Dryden’s, the first volume of which was published in 1688, was executed by a great number of persons. According to a note by Malone (Dryden’s Prose Works, i, 351), there were forty-one of them. Dryden himself translated nothing, but he wrote the dedication to the duke of Ormond, and the Life of Plutarch which is prefixed to the translation. The translation by John and William Langborne, an insipid and tasteless version, has the merit of being tolerably correct in rendering the meaning of the original. The last and best English translation is that of professor Long, which however only includes the lives of those Romans who were concerned in the Civil Wars of Rome; this translation, which is enriched with a valuable body of notes, formed five volumes of Knight’s “Monthly Volumes” (1830-1831).

The other writings of Plutarch, which consist of about sixty essays, are generally comprehended under the title of The Morals, or Ethical Works, many of them being entirely of an ethical character. The minor historical pieces already referred to, of which that on the Lycurgus is one of the most remarkable, are also comprised in the collection entitled Moralia. Plutarch was fond of the writings of Plato; he was strongly opposed to the Epicureans: if he belonged to any philosophical sect, it was that of the Academicians. But there is nothing like a system of philosophy in his writings, and he is not characterized by depth of thought or originality. He formed for himself a system, if we may so name that which had little of the connected character of a system, out of the writings of various philosophers. But a moral end is always apparent in his Moralia, as well as in his biographies. A kind, humane disposition, and a love of everything that is ennobling and excellent, pervade his writings, and give the reader the same kind of pleasure that he has in the company of an esteemed friend, whose singleness of heart, and the love of truth that is evident in what he says, please him.

Plutarch rightly appreciated the importance of education, and he gives many good precepts for the bringing up of children. His philosophy was practical, and in many of its applications, as for instance his “Letter of Cato to his nephew”, “Letter to his wife,” and his *Marriage Precepts”, he is as felicitous in expression as he is sound in his precepts. Notwithstanding all the deductions that the most fastidious critic may make from Plutarch’s moral writings, it cannot be denied that there is something in them which always pleases, and the more so the better we become acquainted with them; and this is an additional merit. With regard to the purely ethical writings of Plutarch, archdeacon Trend says that they indicate a better state of society than is generally attributed to his age. Plutarch does not speak as one crying in the wilderness, but as to a circle of sympathetic hearers who will answer to his appeal. It may be supposed that his native kindliness of heart would prevent him from taking the full measure of the sin with which he was surrounded. No doubt he was deficient in the fierce indignation which consumed the heart of Tacitus and put alash in the bands of Juvenal. But it is certain from many passages in his writings that he took no rose-colored view of life. Several of his statements almost amount to the confession of original sin. Plutarch’s style bears no resemblance to the simplicity of the Attic writers. It has not the air of being much elaborated, andephirousness flowed easily from him. He is nearly always animated and pleasing, and the epiphithet pictorial may be justly applied to him. Sometimes his sentences are long and ill-constructed, and the order of the words appears not the best suited to the subject. But certainly it is not the order in which the best Greek writers of an earlier age would have arranged their thoughts. Sometimes he is obscure, both from this cause and the kind of illustration in which he abounds. He occasionally uses and perhaps affects poetic words, but they are such as give energy to his thoughts, and are not a necessary part of his expression to his language. Altogether he is real with pleasure in the original by those who are familiar with him, but he is somewhat harsh and crabb’d to a stranger. It is his merit, in the age in which he lived, treating of such subjects as biography and morals, not to have fallen into a merely rhetorical style, to have balanced antitheses, and to have contented himself with the inanity of commonplaces. Whatever he says is manly and invigorating in thought, and clear and forcible in expression.

The first Greek edition of the Moralia, which is exceedingly incorrect, was printed by the elder Ablus, with the following title, *Plutarachi Opuscula, Iezzi, Gt. (Ven. 1509, fol.). It was afterwards printed at Basle by Froben (1542, fol., and 1574, fol.). The only good edition is that of Trend’s Moralia, which was printed and edited by D. Wytenbach, who labored on it twenty-four years. This edition consists of six volumes of text (1795-1800), and two volumes of notes (1810—1821), 4to. There is a print of it which is generally bound in 5 vols. 8vo, with two volumes of notes. The Moralia was also printed at Leipsic in 1774-1785, 12 vols. 8vo, with the name of J. J. Reiske, but Reiske did very little to it, for he died in 1774. An edition by J. C. Hutton appeared at Tübingen (1791—1805, 14 vols. 8vo). A good critical edition of all the works of Plutarch is still wanted. See Math. Qq. Res. July, 1851, vii: 1552; *Christi. Plutus (πλοῦτος, rich), originally simply a name of a Cumaean god of riches, is in the mythology of Greece, the third son of Kronos and Rhea, and the brother of Zeus and Poseidon. On the Plymouth Brethren, or Darbyites, is the name of a religious body which originated almost simultaneously at Plymouth, England, and Dublin, Ireland, about the year 1830. They are most generally called after the name of the place where they first started in England. At the outset they are called after their principal founder, John Darby; at the time a clergyman of the Episcopal Church of Ireland. He himself gave to his adherents the name of Separatists, because they left the Establishment and determined to maintain a separate existence as a Church.

Early History.—John Darby was born in England of a wealthy family. He had early studied jurisprudence and became a lawyer, but, brought into the Church, he was strongly impressed with a call to the ministry, and, though opposed by his father, he took holy orders. Disinherited by the parent for disobedience, Darby found a friend and patron in his uncle, from whom he obtained his deaconry quite an ample fortune. After ordination, Darby became gradually impressed with the idea that there was no ground for the doctrine of apostolical succession, and that any person feeling called to preach should exercise that liberty. He therefore denounced the claim of the Establishment as unwarranted, and finally broke with the Episcopalians. He, however, still held that there was a true Church, and that all who thought as he did should band themselves together and wait until Christ made his personal appearance, which they anticipated would be speedily. There were a few who united themselves together on the strength of these views, in Plymouth, England, and at Dublin, Ireland. At the former place they seemed to meet with most success. There their numbers increased to seven hundred and up to fifteen hundred, and they came to be called "Plymouth Brethren." (They have never taken this name themselves, but they do not seem to object to it.) The work increased, and bands were formed in London, Exeter, and several other places. Among those who united with them were many persons of wealth, who contributed considerable sums of money to spread their views. They established a newspaper, known as the Christian Witness, Mr. Darby being its chief contributor. It was not long before they were violently opposed by the English clergy. This opposition was so great and so violent that the spread of the new faith was not only seriously checked, but their numbers were greatly reduced. In 1838, or near that time, Mr. Darby left England. He first visited Paris, where he remained for a time, and then went to Switzerland, where he found a more inviting field. The Wesleyan Methodists had continued successful operations in Lausanne. Quite a number had withdrawn from the State Church and united with them. This excited the general attention of the people. Among the new proselytes to Methodism were many who, at the same time, were studiously considering and accepting the Wesleyan doctrine of Christian perfection. Those who held the doctrine of predestination were charged by those who had fully discarded it as having received but half the truth. At Vevey similar excitement prevailed. In this state of things, for the purpose of overthrowing the new faith, an influential member of the State Church at Lausanne invited Mr. Darby to come there and fight the Methodists. He went, and by his preaching, and the publication of a book entitled The Doctrine of the Wesleys regarding Perfection, and their Use of the Holy Ghost, and certain facts and motives which he adduced far bewildering them that not long after the greater part of them abandoned their faith, and either returned to the State Church or united with the Dissenters. Mr. Darby, besides, gave a series of lectures on the prophecies, entitled "Views regarding the actual expectation of the Church, and the Prophecies which establish it." They were largely attended by others than Dissenters, and produced a deep impression upon the public mind. They were published in book form, first in French, and subsequently translated into German and English, and may be found in Mr. Darby's published works. In the latest impression of the least of the author they lifted the veil which had long, if not from the beginning, covered the prophecies. Such was Mr. Darby's influence among the people that the regular ministry was almost entirely ignored, and he became the accepted prophet. In fact, his position had the effect directly to turn the people from the min-Istry as a whole. It was his custom to administer the sacrament every Sabbath indiscriminately to Churchmen and Dissenters, which practice earned for him the reputation of being a large-hearted Christian, and also of being the Church one. But really his object was to alienate the people until he could get them under his personal control for "organization, be himself the centre of the organization, as is but too clearly apparent from the fly-sheets or tracts which he published. One of these, entitled Apos/try on the Actual Economy, lays the axe at the root of the tree of the Christian Church, leaving it a shapeless wreck. Another, On the Foundation of the Church, attacks all Dissenters, and denies their right to form any new Church. And still another tract, The Right to preach Jesus possessed by every Christian, denies the existence of any priestly office in the Church, except the universal priesthood of believers. A tract entitled The Promise of the Lord, based on Matt. xviii, 20, gave the shebboleth for the Darbyite gatherings. Another tract, entitled Sosiom, was issued, in which all who hesitated to take part in these gatherings were denominated "aschimismatic." Thus the work of demolition went on. A small seminary was established in which to prepare men for the evangelistic work—that is, to spread their views and make disciples to the result has been a widespread sect, with little or no organic unity.

Later History.—A division took place among the "Brethren," under the leadership of B. W. Newton. It commenced in England and extended to the Continent, Mr. Newton, it is claimed, held with Irving that Christ was not sinless. This notion was repelled by most of the Darbyites, and Newton was subsequently expelled by Mr. Darby. (It might be interesting to inquire how Mr. Darby could consistently expel a man from his society when he ignores all organizations? If there be no organization why is there anything to be expelled from?) The Newton hersely extended to Vevay, where there was much trouble, the "Brethren" splitting into two factions, which was followed soon after by many other societies. Another division took place among them, in which the famous George Müller, of Bristol, England, was the most prominent. Other divisions have occurred, but they are of very little importance. The "Brethren" are more or less numerous in Paris, Lausanne, Holland, Italy, and Belgium, on the Continent; in Plymouth, Exeter, and London, in England; a very few in the West Indies; one in Trinidad; and one in Quebec, Dr. Steele, in the Maritimes. They are an earnest, self-sacrificing people.

Doctrines, etc.—The "Brethren" profess to have no creed but the Bible, and condemn all who avow a creed, as putting human opinions in the place of the Word of God. They seriously doubt there is a Church in the land which has a more clearly defined creed than they have. They denounce all commentaries on the Bible as misleading, and yet Mr. Darby himself has written commentaries quite extensively on the Bible, to say nothing of M'Intosh. In faith they seem to be strongly Antinomian. If once justified, it is their belief that the soul not only can never fall from grace finally, but can never fall into condemnation. The soul's standing remains as pure as Christ himself. In other respects they hold to the greatest and leading doctrines of the Gospel; but as they have no written creed or confession, it is exceedingly difficult to find out exactly what they do hold. Each one is in every respect allowed to hold what he pleases, consistently with continuous practical evidence that he is a real Christian, which includes a belief in the leading doctrines of evangelical Christians. No one pretends in anything to judge for another, or make his convictions obligatory any further than he can, by more perfectly instructing the other, induce him to accept them. Their views of what constitutes worship are also similar. This consists, they say, not in preaching or praying—petitioning—though these exercises may lead to worship, but simply in adoration, praise, and thanksgiving to God for what he is in himself, and what he is for those who render it. Hence worship can only be rendered by true Christians, in the breaking of bread and in the praise of God, and through the call of Christ, and therefore, for believers and for unconverted people are entirely distinct. They hold the obligation of the Church to come together the first day of the week to break bread; hence they observe the Lord's Supper every Sabbath morning, and believers alone are expected to come together. They never preach in the morning, but usually simply exhort, two, or at the most three of them, speaking during the service. In the afternoon or evening of the Sabbath they preach to sinners. The Plymouth Brethren are the opposite extreme to Irvingites and Monomists, and yet resemble these in several respects. They, too, are a protest against the present state of the Church, Protestant as well as Catholic, which they denounce as Babylon, and expect the speedy coming of the Lord. But while the Irvingites and Monomists lay claim to an apostolical hierarchy, the "Brethren," like the Quakers, reject the specific ministry, and all written creeds and outward Church organization. They derive the diuision of the Church from the neglect to recognise the Holy Spirit as Christ's vicar on earth, and the all-sufficient interpreter of the Scriptures. All believers are true spiritual priests, capacitated for worship (Heb. x, 19, 25), and all those who possess the qualifications from these, and not only the laymen from outside the Church, but also the clergy are to spread the Gospel to the whole world and build up the Church, without any ordination of men. This they consider to be the true apostolic mode of worship, according to 1 Cor. xii and xiv. But, unlike the Quakers, they retain the ordinance of baptism, and administer the Lord's Supper every week. As a body they hold to a limited baptism only; but if one comes to them who was baptized in infancy, while they receive him, they generally manage to convince him very soon of the importance of being re baptized. As to the remainder of their creed, they seem to agree most with the Calvinistic system, and are said to be zealous in good works. See Guineas, Who are the Plymouth Brethren? Pneumatology (from πνεύμα, spirit, and λόγος, word) is the doctrine of spiritual existence. Considered as the science of mind or spirit, pneumatology consists of three parts: treating of the divine mind, theology; the angelic mind, angelology; and the human mind. This last is now called psychology. a term to which no competent objection can be made, and which affords us, what the various clumsy paraphrases in use do not, a convenient adjective, psychological (Sir W. Hamilton, Erida's Works, p. 219, note). The belief in a return from the dead in the last investigations, and spirit life incor- porated in the traditions of the Jews, and prevailed almost universally in the scholastic ages. The mystic Jacob Böhme and Emanuel Swedenborg made it a popular phase of belief in Northern Europe, and Marti- nez Pasqualis and his disciple St. Martin is said to it prevalent among the people of France and in Southern Europe. All these teachers have given accounts of the orders of spiritual beings who held communication with the living. In our own day spiritualism has branched out so extensively that it will be treated separately under that heading.

Pneumatomikoi, i. e. adversaries of the Holy Spirit, is a name properly applied to all those who entertain heretical opinions as to the Scripture doctrine of the Holy Ghost, e. g. the Subellions (q. v.). The name originated after the subsidence of the Arian controversy, and was applied to that party, distinguished by the denial of the catholic faith regarding the Third Person of the Holy Trinity; some denying his divinity, others his personality also. The name is, however, more generally applied to the adherents of Macedonius, who, after the death of Eusebius of Nicomedia, was called by the Arian faction to the see of Constantinople, in opposition to the catholic bishop Paul. This led to bloody strife, insomuch as a majority of the citizens were for Paul. The Arians got the better of their catholic opposers with the help of the emperor Constantine, who took the part of Macedonius, and established him in the disputed see by force of arms: three thousand persons perished on that occasion. Macedonius, although called to the bishopric of Constantinople by strict Arians, seems not to have been very much of an Arian himself, but persecuted the catholics after the fashion of other Semi-Arian bishops, and became, with Basiliscus of Ancyra, one of the chiefs of the Semi-Arians. As a natural consequence of the rest of their doctrine, the Arians declared the Holy Ghost, who was little spoken of explicitly at the beginning of the Arian difficulties, to be a mere creature, and most of them held him to be an inferior creature to the Son. Not only the strict Arians, but also the Semi-Arians, who called the Son "God" and θεοφόρος questioned the divinity of the Holy Ghost, but retained the doctrine as to the divinity of the Son. They were consequently opposed both by catholics and Arians, but their true controversy was with the former: their content with the latter (Athenasius urges) could only be pretended, insomuch as both agreed in opposing the doctrine of the Trinity (Ad Serap. i, 1, 2, 9, 82). This class, then, differed from the later Macedonian class: it held Homousian doctrine regarding the Son, whereas the Macedonians were Homoioioumians. Athenasius calls them also Τροπικοι, from their figurative interpretations of Scripture; but this is rather an epithet than a proper name.

In comparison with the Macedonian party, this earlier party can have been but small. It was, however, reinforced a few years later, as we shall show, upon the return of a large portion of the Semi-Arian body to catholicity. The adoption of the truth concerning the Son leads almost necessarily to the adoption of the truth concerning the Holy Spirit. The arguments of Athenasius (Ad Serap. i, 27; iv, 7) show forcibly how untenable a position is that which maintains a duality of persons instead of a trinity. The original Monarchian tenet from which the Arians started is much more easily admissible.

The Pneumatomachii of the Macedonian school were the Semi-Arians left behind in schism when, in the year 366, the majority of the sect gave in their assent to orthodoxy, and were received into the Church. Before this time Macedonius, as we have seen above, had joined the Semi-Arian party, but proving thereby unacceptable to the Arians, was deposed by the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 360 (Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. ii, 6). A council was appointed to mediate between the Macedonians and the Arians, and to effect a reconciliation, but just before the meeting thirty-four Asiatic bishops assembled in Caria refused the Homoeousian; and Valens, at the instigation of the Arian Eudoxius, by whom he had been recently baptized, forbade the council (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. vi, 12). From this time, however, Semi-Arianism disappeared from ecclesiastical history. The controversy regarding Christ's divinity ceased, and the denial of the divinity of the Holy Spirit became the distinguishing tenet of the Semi-Arian party, the tenet thus becoming associated with the name of Macedonius which it of late years had newly received. Of course there were some, as we have already had occasion to state, who called them Marathionians, saying that Marathionius, bishop of Nicomedia, had introduced the term Homoioousian (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. ii, 45).

It is to be noticed here that several writers, when treating of the present heresy, use the word Semi-Arian in another sense than that now given it. Pockels, Carl Friedrich, a German moralist, was born in Würzburg, 1757, and died in Halle, 1800. Having completed his studies at the university in Halle, he was appointed tutor of the princes of Brunswick, and afterwards guardian of one of them, the duke Augustus. When this house lost their estates, he lived as a private citizen at Brunswick. In 1813 he occupied again his former relation to duke Augustus. He died at Brunswick Oct. 29, 1814. Pockels’s works, written in a fluent and elegant style, contain a treasury of sagacious and curious observations on man and society. In his "Beiträge zur Beförderung der Menschenkenntnis" (Berlin, 1788-92, 2 parts, 8vo; followed by Neue Beiträge, etc. (Hamberg, 1798, 8vo)—"Fragmente zur Kenntniss des menschlichen Herzens" (Hanover, 1788-94, 3 vols., 8vo)—"Denkwürdigkeiten zur Besserrung der Charakterzüge" (Halle, 1794, 8vo)—"Versuch einer Charakteristik des westlichen Geschlechts" (Hanover, 1799-1802, 5 vols., 8vo)—formed a work of great value. The author published as a pendant, Der Mann (ibid., 1805-8, 4 vols., 8vo)—Karl Wilhelm Ferdinand von Braunschweig (Stuttgart, 1809, 8vo)—"Über den Umgang mit Kindern" (1811)—"Über Gesellschaft, Geselligkeit und Umgang" (Hanover, 1813, 3 vols., 8vo)—"The Tauchbuch, as keepsake, for the years 1803 and 1804; and, in common with Ch. Ph. Moritz, the Denkwürdigkeiten zur Beförderung des Edlen und Schönem (Berlin, 1786-88, 2 vols., 8vo), some articles in the Magazin zur Erklärungswissensch., and in the Braunschweigisches Magazin (1786-1792)."

Pocklington, John, D.D., an English divine, noted also as an educator, flourished near the middle of the 17th century. He was at one time president of Pembroke Hall and Sidney College, Cambridge. He published Sermons (Lond. 1636)—Allure Christianum (1651, 4to), in answer to William's Holy Table. See Williams, John.

Pococke, Edward (1), an English Orientalist and theologian of great note, not only in his own times, but one whose scholarly acquisitions are gladly acknowledged even in our day, was born Nov. 8, 1604. He studied in Oxford, his native place, at the university, and devoted himself especially to the Oriental tongues, the Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldean, and Syriac, first under the direction of Matthew Pason, and afterwards under that of William Bedwell. Pococke took his bachelor of arts' degree in 1622, and his master's in 1626. Lud. de Dieu publishing a Syriac version of the Apocalypse at Leyden the following year, our author set about the task of preparing those four epistles which were still wanting to a complete edition of the New Testament in that language. These epistles were the second of Peter, the second and third of John, and that of Jude. All the other books, except these five, had been well printed by Albertus Widmanstadius, at Vienna, in 1565, who was sent into the West for that purpose by Ignatius, the Jacobite patriarch of Antioch, in the 16th century. Having met with a manuscript in the Bodleian Library proper to his purpose, Pococke engaged in this work and finished it; but laid it by, not having the courage to publish it, till the death of the bishop of Walmis, in 1654. He then took the acquaintance of Gerard Vossius, who, being then at Oxford, obtained his consent to carry it to Leyden, where it was printed that year, in 4to, under the immediate care and inspection of Lud. de Dieu. In 1628 Pococke had been received a fellow of the principal college of Oxford; but having decided to enter the priesthood, he was ordained priest in 1629, having entered into deacon's orders some time before, and he was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo, by the interest of Selden, as appears very probable. He arrived at that place, after a long voyage, Oct. 17, 1630. His residence in the East for six years furnished an opportunity of further study in the Oriental tongues. He acquired great skill in the Arabic tongue, and he likewise endeavored to get a further insight, if possible, into the Hebrew; but, through the fault of himself, he found it fruitless from his being very illiterate. He also improved himself in the Ethiopic and Syriac, of which last he made a grammar, with a praxis, for his own use. On Oct. 30, 1631, he received a commission from Land, then bishop of London, to buy for him such ancient Greek coins and such manuscripts, even of Greek or the Oriental Greek or the Oriental, as he should judge most proper for a university library—which commission Pococke executed to the best of his power. He also translated a number of historical works from the Arabic, collected a great quantity of Oriental manuscripts, which he sent to England, and made a careful study of the environs of Aleppo, with respect to natural history: the result of the latter study was intended to furnish a desirable addition to the commentaries of the Old Testament. In 1654 the plague raged furiously at Aleppo; many of the merchants fixed two days' journey from the city, and dwelt in tents upon the mountains: Pococke did not stir, yet neither he nor any of the English caught the infection. In 1656 he received a letter from Laud, then archbishop of Canterbury, informing him of his design to found an Arabic lecture at Oxford, and of naming him to the university as the professor; upon which agreeable news he presently settled his affairs at Aleppo, and took the first opportunity of returning home. On his arrival at Oxford this year, he took the degree of bachelor of divinity in July, and entered on the professorship of Arabic; however he died, the next year, when his friend Mr. John Greaves concerted his voyage to Egypt, it was thought expedient by Laud that Pococke should attend him to Constantinople, in order to perfect himself in the Arabic language, and to purchase more manuscripts. During his absence there, he was for some time chaplain to Sir Peter Wych, then the English ambassador to the Porte, and who became Pococke's most zealous protector. He collected during his stay in that city a number of Oriental manuscripts. In 1659 he received several letters from his friends at home, particularly from a friend of the bishop, pressing him to return home; and accordingly, embarking in August, 1640, he landed in Italy, and passed thence to Paris. Here he met with Grotius, who was then ambassador at the court of France from Sweden, and acquainted him with a project he had to translate his treatise De enviro Christianae Religionis in Arabic, in order to promote the conversion of some of the Mohammedans. Grotius was pleased with and encouraged the proposal, while Pocock did not scruple to observe to him some things towards the end of his book which had not been mentioned by our author. Pococke began a translation, and adding a great many improving opinions which, though commonly charged by Christians upon Mohammedans, yet had no foundation in any of their authentic writings, and were such as they themselves were ready to disclaim. Grotius was so far from being displeased that he heartily thanked Moses, being six preatory discourses of Moses Maimonides's "Commentary upon the Mishna," written in Arabic, but with the Hebrew letters. This work, which was the first production of the Hebrew press at Oxford, appeared in 1656, together with a Latin translation and a number of notices on the design of the work, and giving the names of some of the persons to whom it would be of use. On his return to England, in 1640, Pocock found himself in very difficult circumstances. His chair of Arabic had been stippeded by archbishop Laud, but after the death of that prelate the revenues had been seized upon. Pocock now devoted himself entirely to study, and escaped by his retreat, as well as by the friendship of John Selden, who enjoyed a great influence in the republican party, the revolutions, if not dangers, which his royalist opinions would have been sure to bring upon him. In 1648 he was presented by his college with the living of Childrey, in Berkshire, and in 1647, in consequence of the exertions of John Selden, he was reinstated in his Oxford chair, and two years later he was appointed professor of Hebrew. The king, who was at that time a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, also bestowed on him a rich canonry. An act of Parliament confirmed the gift; but the canonry thus assigned to him being different from that originally annexed to the professorship, Pocock entered a protest against receiving benefices profanes. In the meantime he composed his Specimen Historiarum Arabum, being extracts from the work of Abul Faraj in the original Arabic, together with a Latin translation and copious notes. This work, which was printed at Oxford in 1646 and 1650 (4to), was reprinted in 1806 by White, with some additions by Sylvestre de Sacy. In November, 1650, about a year after publishing the preceding work, Pocock was ejected from his canonry, and it was intended to deprive him of the Hebrew and Arabic professorships; but, thanks to a petition signed by all the doctors of the university, the master of Oxford at the instance of Pocock, Pocock was suffered to enjoy both places. In 1655 he was on the point of being deprived of his living, on the ground of "ignorance and insufficiency," at least such were the charges preferred against him by Cromwell's committee. Some of his Oxford friends, however, wisely prevented the disgrace to the Roundhead party which would have followed the ejection, upon such grounds, of so eminent a scholar as Pocock. The most determined against this measure was Dr. John Owen (himself one of the Parliamentary commissioners), Seth Ward, and John Walsh, who disliked the stupid and bigoted creatures to their face, and made them sensible of "the infinite contempt and reproach which would reward such treatment of a man whom all the learned, not of England only, but of all Europe, so justly admired for his vast knowledge and extraordinary accomplishments." Meanwhile nothing had sufficed to check either his pious care of his parish or his pursuit of sacred and Oriental learning. In Arabic and Hebrew learning he was allowed to be second to none of his age.

From the first Pocock made his Oriental attainments subservient to Biblical illustration; and his contributions, directly and indirectly, to Biblical learning were numerous and extremely valuable. Of his connection with Walton's Polyglot, his biographer says: "From the beginning scarce a step was taken in that work [not excepting even the Prophetae] till communicated to Mr. Pocock, without whose assistance it must have wanted much of its perfection;" he collated the Arabic Pentateuch, with two copies of Saadia's translation; drew up an account of the Arabic versions of the New Testament, with which he was satisfied; and, in the Appendix to the Polyglot, and lent some of his own rich store of MSS. to the conductors of the work, viz. a Syriac MS. of the entire Old Testament, an Ethiopic MS. of the Psalms, two Syriac MSS. of the Psalms, and a Persian MS. of the Gospels. Soon after his escape from the commission's purposes, Pocock published his Panteac usciousness of Moses Maimonides's "Commentary upon the Mishna," written in Arabic, but with the Hebrew letters. This work, which was the first production of the Hebrew press at Oxford, appeared in 1656, together with a Latin translation and a number of notices on the design of the work, and giving the names of some of the persons to whom it would be of use. On his return to England, in 1640, Pocock found himself in very difficult circumstances. His chair of Arabic had been stippeded by archbishop Laud, but after the death of that prelate the revenues had been seized upon. Pocock now devoted himself entirely to study, and escaped by his retreat, as well as by the friendship of John Selden, who enjoyed a great influence in the republican party, the revolutions, if not dangers, which his royalist opinions would have been sure to bring upon him. In 1648 he was presented by his college with the living of Childrey, in Berkshire, and in 1647, in consequence of the exertions of John Selden, he was reinstated in his Oxford chair, and two years later he was appointed professor of Hebrew. The king, who was at that time a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, also bestowed on him a rich canonry. An act of Parliament confirmed the gift; but the canonry thus assigned to him being different from that originally annexed to the professorship, Pocock entered a protest against receiving benefices profanes. In the meantime he composed his Specimen Historiarum Arabum, being extracts from the work of Abul Faraj in the original Arabic, together with a Latin translation and copious notes. This work, which was printed at Oxford in 1646 and 1650 (4to), was reprinted in 1806 by White, with some additions by Sylvestre de Sacy. In November, 1650, about a year after publishing the preceding work, Pocock was ejected from his canonry, and it was intended to deprive him of the Hebrew and Arabic professorships; but, thanks to a petition signed by all the doctors of the university, the master of Oxford at the instance of Pocock, Pocock was suffered to enjoy both places. Podicco, John Dr. (also called John de Vallatololid or John Corderus), a convert from Judaism and noted as a writer, was born about the year 1635. He is the author of two anti-Jewish works, viz. Cordusius bipae, cited very often by Alfonso de Spina in his Fortalitium fidei (p. 117, 155, 169, 170 sq.), and Declaratio super Aben Eranam in decem procerpia; also quoted by Alfonso de Spina. He was permitted by the king, Don Henry, to hold religious disputations with Jews, and in 1755 such a disputatio took place in the cathedral of Avila, where Moses Cohen de Tordesillas was the spokesman of the Jews. The main points to be discussed were the dogmas of Christianity, the Messiahship of Jesus, his divinity and incarnation, the Trinity, and the virginity of Mary. Four discussions were held, the first of which was published by Tordesillas in his Liber Guerra, or examination of one hundred and twenty-five passages of Scripture usually urged by Christians in favor of their religion. This book, which he designated “The Stronghold of the Faith,” he presented to the synagogue of Avila and Toledo. See Förster, Bibl. Podoniptae (i.e. Feet-washers) is one of the names by which that branch of the Memnonites, otherwise known as Flemings, are sometimes designated. They maintain that the example of Christ, which has in this instance the force of a law, requires his disciples to wash the feet of their guests in token of their love; and for this reason they have been called Podoniptae. But others deny that this rite was enjoined by Christ. See MEMNONITAE.

Poo, Adam, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, noted for his devotion to its interests, literary, social, and religious, was born in Columbiana County, Ohio, July 21, 1804. Such limited advantages as the times and the means of his parents afforded him for acquiring an education were eagerly embraced, and in the schools and by private tuition he secured the elements of a good English education and some knowledge of the classics, and formed a taste for reading and study which he continued throughout life. He received his early Christian training in the Presbyterian Church, and ever cherished for it a profound respect; but its distinctive doctrines did not find a response in his heart, and after careful examination and many severe spiritual conflicts he preferred the doctrines of religion as taught by the Methodist Episcopal Church. Having decided to give himself to the work of the ministry, to which he felt called of God, he was licensed to preach, and in 1826 became a travelling preacher in the Ohio Annual Conference. He was effective from that date to the time of the illness which resulted in his death; and as a pastor, and in the other capacities in which he served the Church and her cause, he was a most efficient laborer of the Master. Dr. Poe entered the travelling ministry when the work involved sacrifices and demanded labors of no ordinary character. The circuits were of vast extent. An absence from home of twenty-eight days, with a sermon and a class or prayer meeting for each evening, and a horseback ride of six hundred miles through the forests and the rough roads of the border settlements to complete a single round, was common. Unchecked by heat or cold, through drenching rains or chilling sleet or snow, along miry ways, and for unëmerced reaches of distance, wading the rapids and cross- ing the ranges of the cross-country way, the Christ-loving itinerant pressed forward in his tireless rounds, hunting up the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and gathering them into the fold of the great Shepherd. No man ever entered the cause with firmer faith, with greater singleness of purpose, or with more unreserved devotion than did Adam Poe. As he began, so he continued to the end. His whole being was rooted and grounded in God. His pastoral appointments were as follows: 1827, on Brunswick Circuit; 1828, on Huron Circuit; 1829, in charge of Wayne Circuit; 1830, on Columbus Circuit; 1831, on Deer Creek Circuit! 1832-3, on Miami Circuit; 1834, Marietta. In 1835 Dr. Poe succeeded the celebrated William B. Christie as presiding elder of Wooster District, and continued on that and the Tiffin District some five years, when his impaired health demanded relief from such exhausting labors. In 1839 he was stationed in Mansfield; in 1840-41, in Delaware; in 1842, presiding elder on Norwalk District; in 1843 in Delaware a second time; in 1844, agent for the Ohio Wesleyan University; 1846, again in Mansfield; 1847-9, on Norwalk Circuit again; lastly, in 1850. From 1850 to the spring of 1852, he was presiding elder of Mansfield District. At the General Conference of 1852 he was, in a manner highly creditable to himself, elected assistant agent of the Western Book Concern. To this office he was re-elected in 1856. Upon the failure of the health of the Rev. L. Swormstedt in 1840, he was elected principal agent. To this office he was re-elected in 1864. The General Conference of 1868 would have gladly continued him in this relation had it not found him hovering between life and death. He died June 26, 1868. Dr. Poe was a sound thinker, safe rather than brilliant in his theological views, colloquial rather than oratorical in his style of speech, ever interesting and instructive in the pulpit and on the platform. His life was genial and Christian. A man of sterling integrity of character and honesty of purpose, of sound and godly judgment, he enjoyed the confidence of the Church to a degree rarely awarded to living men. Travelling the circuit, laboring in the station, charged with the anxious administration of the expansive district, or managing the vast interests of the Western Book Concern, he was a man to whom one single purpose, to do well the work committed to him by the Church. This was the grand secret of his success. Dr. Poe had a commanding presence. The spirit of benevolence ruled in his heart, and its winning sunshine beamed in his countenance. He was frank almost to bluntness, but this could manifest no unhappiness. He was fearless, but his courage was tempered with wisdom. He was social in a high degree; his winning smile, his genial spirit, and the facility and effectiveness with which he drew upon the rich storehouse of anecdotes or bits never soon forgotten by his intimate friends. Dr. Poe was greatly interested in the educational advantages of the Methodist Episcopal Church, but particularly the Ohio Wesleyan University, of which he may almost be said to have been the founder. His faith in the enterprise, and his devotion to it, were truly heroic. From its inception down to the hour of his death no personal or family interest was dearer to his heart than this grand, central educational institution of the Church in the state of Ohio. He was a member of the board of trustees from the time of its establishment. See Advocate, in the Western Christian Advocate, July 8, 1868; Minutes of the North Ohio Conference, p. 34 sq.; N. Y. Christian Advocate, July 4, 1868. (J. H. W.)

Poe, Daniel, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and brother of the noted poet, born in Columbiana County, Ohio, Oct. 12, 1806. In August, 1822, he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. Young as he was, he was soon appointed a class-leader, and was licensed to exhort. He prepared at an academy for college, and studied at Augusta College, Kentucky. He was licensed to preach, and was soon called into the Ohio Conference, and appointed to travel the Lesart Falls Circuit, where he labored acceptably and successfully. The next year he was appointed to the Eaton Circuit, and the year following to the Hamilton Circuit, and in 1855 to the Oxford Circuit. In May, 1856, he was sent to the Oneida and Menomonee Mission, west of Green Bay. He commenced a school among the Oneida Indians, and extended his visits to those at Brothertown, and other fragments of tribes scattered through the Wisconsin Territory, and finally succeeded in building up a flourishing Mission, which continues to this day to exert a most salutary influence among this reclaimed savage tribe. In the autumn of 1858 Mr. Poe travelled on horseback, through an almost unbroken wilderness, from Green Bay to Ashland, Ill., to attend the Illinois Conference. He was then transferred back to the Ohio Conference, but he could not get to Ohio in time to receive an appointment that year. In January, 1859, his brother, who was presiding elder of the Tiffin District, employed him on the Northern Circuit, where he labored till the session of his Conference. In 1861 he was appointed to the M'Arthus town Circuit. The next two years he was appointed to Tariton. In September, 1842, he was transferred to the Texas Conference. On his arrival there he addressed himself with his accustomed simple and energy to his work, but one of the greatest needs of the country that first impressed him was the need of schools and teachers. In view of this destination he returned to Ohio, in order to secure a corps of teachers. After a few months he returned to Texas, and shortly after commenced laying the foundations of an institution of learning at San Augustine. The next Conference resolved to adopt it and give it its patronage. But, besides this educational work, Mr. Poe served the San Augustine Circuit, which subjected him to the necessity of travelling some three hundred miles every four weeks. He kept up his engagements with regularity, and to the satisfaction of all concerned, but the exertion necessary to this end proved too much, and in 1844 he fell a prey to disease, and died after a very short illness. His last words were a testimony of the happy servant to whom the Master bade a hearty welcome, as he laid his head upon the breast of Daniel Poe. "As a man of intellect," says bishop Morris, "I should place Poe considerably above the medium, though his mind was sober and practical rather than striking or brilliant. His perceptions were quick and clear, and he had that strong foundation and sound judgment which the generous and most judicious gave great weight to his counsels and great efficiency to his movements. In his moral constitution he was distinguished chiefly for the resolute and the heroic. He had a naturally kind and amiable spirit. He was far from being in petulant in his movements or betrayed in his decisions; but when his purpose was once deliberately and conscientiously formed, it was impossible to divert him from the course of his sober convictions. With the highest degree of physical courage, he united that higher courage which has its foundation in principle and in faith. The sentiment of fear, except as it had respect to God, never found a lodgment in his bosom." His preaching was such as might have been expected from his solid and well-disciplined mind, and his earnest, resolute, and eminently Christian spirit. He spoke with great simplicity and plainness, and was a model of Christian modesty and oratory. His discourses were well-considered, well-disseminated expositions of divine truth. The same apostle gives a pagan poet the name of prophet (Tit. i, 12, "One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said, etc."); because, among the heathen, poets were thought to be inspired by Apollo. They spoke by enthusiasm. Oracles were publicly delivered in verse. Poets were interpreters of the will of the gods. The poet quoted by Paul is Epimenides, whom the ancients esteemed to be inspired and favored by the gods. See EPIMEMIDES.

The son of Sirech, intent on praising eminent men, enumerates bards or poets; who were, he says, "Leaders of the people by their counsels, and by their knowledge of learning meet for the people; wise and eloquent in their instructions: such as found out musical tunes, and recited verses in writing" (Eccles. xlii, 4). It is evident that he considered them as of great importance to the community; and we know that they were of great antiquity, for Moses, himself a poet, refers to those who spoke in proverbs (Numb. xxii, 27), of which he inserts a specimen. Jacob was a poet, as appears from his farewell benediction on his sons. It appears extremely probable that the honorable appellation Nebi equally denoted a prophet, a poet, and a musician, as the poets principally were. See POETRY.

Poetry, Hebrew. We propose here to discuss only the poetical elements of the Bible, or ancient Hebrew poetry. For the present, we shall treat this subject under the distinct heads of the character of Hebrew poetry, its existing remains, its classification, its history, and its literature. In doing this we treat the subject from a modern scientific point of view.

1. The Essential Character of Ancient Hebrew Poetry.—Poetry is in its nature the language of the imagination stimulated by the passions. While prose expresses the calm statements of memory and observation, or the deliberate conclusions of the judgment, poetry gives utterance to the impulsive exactions of the soul, the taste, the emotions and the aspirations of the heart. History can only appear in poetry in the guise of legend, and reasoning only in the form of animated colloquy. The phraseology is in keeping with the difference in spirit. Poetry tends to a more exact and elaborate style of language in accordance with the fervid state of the mind. Hence the invention—spontaneous in most instances—of measure, whether of simple numbers or rhyme, to meet this overwrought state of the mental faculties. Biblical poetry parries these characteristics. It is distinguished from the prose compositions of the same book by its peculiarities of diction, as marked as those of other languages, although not so prosodically. The reader is at once made aware of entering the poetical domain by a certain elevation of style, and by the employment of more frequent and extended tropes, as well as by greater abruptness and more decided energy in the phraseology. The formal rhythm consists not—as in Greek and Latin, or even in the modern tongues,—in a measured quantity of syllables of a particular length in utterance, but in a peculiar balance and analogism of the clauses, constituting what is known as a parallelism. Each of these peculiar traits of Hebrew poetry we take space to develop somewhat in detail.

One characteristic of Hebrew poetry, not indeed peculiar to it, but shared by it in common with the literature of other nations, is its intensely national and local coloring. The writers were Hebrews of the Hebrews, drawing their inspiration from the mountains and rivers of Palestine, which they have immortalized in their poetic figures, and even while uttering the sublime and most universal truths never forgetting their own nationality in its narrower and more restricted form. Their images and metaphors, says Munk (Palestine, p. 444 a), are taken chiefly from nature and the phenomena of Palestine and the surrounding countries, from the pastoral life, from agriculture and the national history. The stars of heaven, the sand of the seashore, are the images and symbols of the abstract.

invading the country, they are the swift torrents or the roaring waves of the sea, or the clouds that bring on a tempest; the war-chariots advance swiftly like lighting or the whirlwinds. Happiness rises as the dawn and shines like the daylight; the blessing of God describes a law as the beautiful morning; the angel of Heaven is a devouring fire that annihilates the wicked
as the flame which devours the stubble. Unhappiness is likened to days of clouds and darkness; at times of great catastrophes the sun sets in broad day, the hearcens are shaken, the earth trembles, the stars disappear, the sun is changed into darkness and the moon into blood, and so on. The cedar of Lebanon, the oak of Bashan, are the image of the mighty man, the palm and the reed of the great and the humble, briers and thorns of the wicked; the pious man is an olive ever green, or a tree planted by the water-side. The animal kingdom furnished equally a large number of images:
the lion, the image of power, is also, like the wolf, bear,
etc., that of tyrants and violent and rapacious men;
and the pious who suffers is a feeble sheep led to the slaughter. The strong and powerful man is compared to the he-goat or the bull of Bashan: the kine of Bashan figure, in the discourses of Amos, as the image of rich and voluptuous women; the people who rebel against the divine will are a refractory heifer. Other images are borrowed from the country life, and from the life there is a quotation, that the chastisement of God shall fall upon Israel like a wagon laden with sheaves; the dead cover the earth as the dung which covers the surface of the fields. The impious man sows crime and reaps misery, or he sows the wind and reaps the tempest.
The people yielding to the blows of their enemies are like the corn crushed beneath the threshing instrument.
God tramples the wine in the wine-press when he chas-tises the impious and sheds their blood. The wrath of Jehovah is often represented as an intoxicating cup, which he has filled to make those to empty who have merited his chastisement: terrors ascend and anguish go to the pangs of childbirth. Peoples, towns, and states are represented by the Hebrew poets under the image of daughters or wives; in their impiety they are courtesans or adulteresses. The historical allusions of most frequent occurrence are taken from the catastrophe of Sodom and Gomorrah, the miracles of the departure from Egypt, and the appearance of Jehovah on Sinai." Examples might easily be multiplied in illustration of this remarkable characteristic of the Hebrew poets:
the metaphor is upon every page of their writings, and in striking contrast to the vague generalities of the Indian philosophic poetry. There is accordingly no poetry which bears a deeper or broader stamp of the peculiar influences under which it was produced. It never ceases to be Hebrew in order to become universal, and yet it is universal while it is Hebrew. The country, the climate, the institutions, the very peculiar religious institutions, rites, and observances, the very singular religious history of the Israelites, are all faithfully and vividly reflected in the Hebrew muse, so that nothing can ever be mistaken for a poem of any other people. Still it remains true that the heart of man, at least the heart of all the most civilized nations of the earth, has been moved and swayed, and is still pleasingly and most beneficially moved and swayed by the strains of Biblical poetry.

There is no ancient poetic age that can be put into comparison with that of the Hebrews but that of the two classic nations, Greece and Rome, and that of India.
In form and variety we grant that the poetry of these nations surpasses that of the Hebrews. Epic poetry and the two highest forms so far as mere art and the highest possible qualities of style, the Hebrew literature is somewhat inferior. But the thought is more than the expression; the kernel than the shell;
and in substance the Hebrew poetry far surpasses every other. In truth, it dwells in a region to which other ancient literatures did not and could not attain—a pure, serene, moral, and religious atmosphere; thus dealing with man in his highest relations, first anticipating, and then fulfilling all that is best in man; the image of Heaven shall presently be more fully, is the great characteristic of Hebrew poetry; it is also the highest merit of any literature, a merit in which that of the Hebrews is unapproached. To this high quality it is owing that the poetry of the Bible has exerted on the loftiest interests and productions of the human mind, for three thousand years, the most decided and the most beneficial influence. Moral and religious truth is deathless and undecaying; and so the griefs and the joys of David, or the far-seeing warnings and brilliant portrayings of Isaiah, repeat themselves in the heart of each successive generation, and become existent with the race of man. Thus all moral treasures the Bible is incomparably the richest. Even for forms of poetry, in which it is defective, or altogether fails, it presents the richest materials. Moses has not, as some have dreamed, left us an epic poem, but he has supplied the materials out of which the Paradise Lost was created. The sternly sublime dramas of Samuel Agonistes is constructed from a few materials found in a chapter or two which relate to the least cultivated period of the history of the Hebrew commonwealth. The thought of modern days, from Tasso down to Byron, all the great musicians, and nearly all the great painters, have drawn their best and highest inspiration from the Bible.

It may have struck the reader as somewhat curious that the poetical pieces of which we spoke above should,
in the common version of the Bible, be scarcely, if at all, distinguishable from prose. We do not know whether there is anything extraordinary in this. Much of classical poetry, if turned into English prose, would lose most of its power; and with the Hebrew poetry suffers less than perhaps any other by transfusion into a prosaic element: to which fact it is owing that the book of Psalms, in the English version, is, notwithstanding its form, eminently poetic. There are, however, cases in which only the experienced eye can trace the poetic in and under the prosaic attire in which it appears in the vulgar translation. Nor until the subject of Hebrew poetry had been long and well studied did the learned succeed in detecting many a poetic gem contained in the Bible. In truth, poetry and prose were as one with them in the earlier stages of their existence, and in the earlier stages of their existence are discriminated only by faint and vanishing lines. If we regard the thought, prose sometimes even now rises to the loftiness of poetry. If we regard the clothing,

the simpler form of poetry is scarcely more than prose;
and rhetorical or measured prose passes into the domain of poetry. A sonnet of Wordsworth could be converted into prose with a very few changes; a fable of Krummacher requires only to be distributed into lines in order to make blank verse. Now in translations the form is for the most part reserved for poetry, the substance, and poetic sentiment ranges from the humblest to the loftiest topics. So with the Hebrew poetry in its original and native state. Whether in its case poetry sprang from prose, or prose from poetry, they are both branches of one tree, and bear in their earlier or later stages a very close resemblance. The similarity is the greater in the literature of the Hebrews, because their poetic forms are less determinate than those of other nations: they had, indeed, a rhythm; but so had their prose, and their poetic rhythm was more like that of our blank verse than of our rhymed verse. Of poetical feet they appear to have known nothing, and in consequence their verse must be less measured and less strict. Its melody was rather that of thought than of art and skill—spontaneous, like their religious feelings, and therefore deep and impressive, but less subject to law, and escaping from the hard limits of exact definition. Hayne, properly so called, is disposed as well as metre. Yet Hebrew verse, as it had a kind of measured tread, so had it a jingle in its feet, for several lines are sometimes found terminating with the same letter. In the main, however, its essential form was in the thought. Ideas with metaphors recur so that the substance itself marks the form, and the two are so blended into one that their union is essential to constitute poetry. It is, indeed, incorrect to say that "the Hebrew poetry is characterized by the recurrence of similar ideas" (Cattalina's "Hebrew Language," p. 372), if by this it is intended to intimate that such a peculiarity is the sole characteristic of Hebrew poetry. One, and that the chief, characteristic of that poetry is such recurrence; but there are also characteristics in form as well as in thought. Of these it may be sufficient to mention the following:
POETRY

1. There is a verbal rhythm, in which a harmony is found beyond what prose ordinarily presents; but as the true pronunciation of the Hebrew has long been lost, this quality can only be imperfectly appreciated.

2. There is a correspondence of words, i.e., the words in one verse, or member, answer to the words in another; for as the sense in the one echoes the sense in the other, so also form corresponds with form, and word with word. This correspondence in form will fully appear when we give instances (see below) of the parallelism in sentiment; mean while the idea of it may be formed from these specimens:

"Why art thou cast down, O my soul? And why art thou disquieted in me?" (Psa. xiii, 5).

"The memory of the just is a blessing: But the name of the wicked shall rot." (Prov. x, 7).

"He turneth rivers into a desert, And water-springs into dry ground." (Psa. civ, 32).

In the original this similarity in construction is more exact and more apparent. At the same time it is a free and not a strict correspondence that prevails; a correspondence to be caught and recognised by the ear in the general progress of the poem, or the general structure of a couplet or a triplet, but which is not of a nature to be exactly measured or set forth by such aids as counting with the fingers will afford.

3. Inversion holds a distinguished place in the structure of Hebrew poetry, as in that of every other; yet here again the remark already made holds good; it is only a modified inversion that prevails, by no means (in general) in sentiment; in that of the Greeks and Romans in balance, decision, and prevalence. Every one will, however, recognise this inversion in the following instances, as distinguishing the passages from ordinary prose:

"A mid thought in visions of the night, When deep sleep falleth upon man, Fear and horror came upon me." (Job iv, 13).

"To me men gave ear and waited, To my words they made no reply." (Job xxxii, 21).

"For three transgressions of Damascus, And for four will I turn away its punishment." (Amos 1, 3).

His grave was appointed with the wicked, And with the rich man was his sepulchre." (Isa. lxi, 9).

4. The chief characteristics, however, of Hebrew poetry are found in the peculiar form in which it gives utterance to its ideas. This form has received the name of "parallelism." Ewald justly prefers the term "thought-rhythm," since the rhythm, the music, the peculiar flow and harmony of the verse and of the poem, lie in the distribution of the sentiment in such a manner that the whole import does not come out in lesser than a distich. The leading principle is that a simple verse or distich consists, both in regard to form and substance, of two corresponding members: this has been termed Hebrew rhythm, or parallelismus membrorum. Three kinds may be specified:

(1.) There is, first, the synonymous parallelism, which consists in this, that the two members express the same thought in different words, so that sometimes word answers to word; for example:

"What is man that thou art mindful of him, And the son of man that thou carreat for him!" (Psa. viii, 4).

There is in some cases an inversion in the second line:

"The heavens relate the glory of God, And the work of his hands the firmament declares." (Psa. xix, 7).

"He maketh his messengers winds, His ministers the flaming lightning." (Psa. cvi, 4).

Very often the second member repeats only a part of the first:

"Woe to them that join house to house, That field to field unite!" (Isa. vi, 7).

Sometimes the verb which stands in the first member is omitted in the second:

"O God, thy justice give the king, And thy righteousness to the king's son." (Psa. lxix, 1).

Or the verb may be in the second member:

"With the jawbone of an ass, heaps upon heaps, With the jawbone of an ass have I slain a thousand men." (Judg. li, 16).

The second member may contain an expansion of the first:

"Give to Jehovah, ye sons of God, Give to Jehovah glory and praise." (Psa. xxix, 1).

Indeed the varieties are numerous, since the synonymous parallelism is very frequent.

(2.) The second kind is the antithetic, in which the first member is illustrated by some opposition of thought contained in the second. This less customary kind of parallelism is found mostly in the Proverbs:

"The full man treadeth the honeycomb under foot, To the hungry every bitter thing is sweet." (Prov. xxvii, 7).

Under this head comes the following, with other similar examples:

"Day to day uttereth Instruction, And night to night showeth knowledge." (Psa. xxi, 2).

(3.) The third kind is denominated the synthetic: probably the term peculiar would be more appropriate, since the second member not being a mere echo of the first, subjoins something new to it, while the same structure of the verse is preserved; thus:

"He appointed the moon for seasons, The sun knoweth his going down;" (Psa. cv, 19).

"The law of Jehovah is perfect, reviving the soul; The precepts of Jehovah are sure, instructing the simple." (Psa. xix, 7).

5. Intimately connected with the parallelistic structure is the strophic arrangement of Hebrew poetry. Usually the parallelism itself furnishes the basis of the versification. This correspondence in thought is not, however, of universal occurrence. We find a merely rhythmical parallelism in which the thought is not repeated, but goes forward throughout the verse, which is divided midway into two halves or a distich:

"The word is not upon the tongue, Jehovah thou knowest it altogether." (Psa. cxxix, 4).

"Gird as a man thy loins, I will ask thee; inform thou me." (Job xxxix, 3).

Here poetry distinguishes itself from prose chiefly by the division into two short equal parts. This peculiarity of poetic diction is expressed by the word שִׁירָה, to sing (strictly to play), which properly denotes dividing the matter, and so speaking or singing in separated portions. Among the Arabians, who, however, have syllabic measure, each verse is divided into two hemistiches by a caesura in the middle. The simple two-membered rhythm hitherto described prevailed especially in the book of Job, the Proverbs, and a portion of the Psalms; but in the last, and still more in the Prophets, there are numerous verses with three, four, or yet more members. In the ordinary course of three members (tristichs) sometimes all three are parallel:

"Happy the man who walketh not in the paths of the unrighteous,
Nor sitteth in the way of sinners,
But sitteth in the seat of seers" (Ps. 1, 1).

Sometimes two of the members stand opposed to the third:

"To all the world goes forth their sound,
To all the ends of the world their words;
For the sun he places a tabernacle in them"

(Psa. xix. 6).

Verses of four members contain either two simple parallels:

"With righteousness shall he judge the poor,
And decide with equity for the afflicted of the people:
He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth;
With the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked" (Isa. xi, 4).

Or the first and third answer to each other; also the second and fourth:

"That smote the people in anger
With a continual stroke;"

"That laid it over the nations in wrath
With unmeasured oppression" (Isa. xvi, 6).

If the members are more numerous or disproportionate (Isa. xi, 11), or if the parallelistism is important or irregular, the dictation of poetry is lost and prose ensues; as is the case in Isa. v, 1-6, and frequently in the later prophets, as Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The strophe, however, is frequently preserved in a quite extended form with several subdivisions, and the parallelistism is often carried out in subordinate clauses; instances of this are very common, especially in the book of Ecclesiastes. (See § 4, below.)

It is not to be supposed that each poem consists exclusively of one set of verse; for though this feature does present itself, yet frequently several kinds are found together in one composition, so as to give great ease, freedom, and capability to the style. We select the following beautiful specimen, because a chorus is introduced:

DAVID'S LAMENT OVER SAUL AND JONATHAN.

The Gazette, O Israel, has been cut down on thy heights!

Chorus. How are the mighty fallen!

Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Ascalon.
Lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, Lest daughters of the uncircumcised exult.
Hills of Gilboa, no dew nor rain come upon you, devoted fields!
For there was slain the heroes' bow.
Saul's bow, never anointed with oil.
From the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, The bow of Jonathan turned not back, And the sword of Saul came not idle home.
Saul and Jonathan! lovely and pleasant in life! And in death ye were not divided. Swifter than eagles, stronger than lions! Ye daughters of Israel! weep for Saul! He clothed you delicately in purple, He put ornaments of gold on your apparel.

Chorus. How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle!

O Jonathan, slain in thy high places! I am distressed for thee, brother Jonathan, Very pleasant wast thou to me, Wonderful was thy love, more than the love of woman.

Chorus. How are the mighty fallen, As the weapons of war perished!

We have chosen this ode not only for its singular beauty, but also because it presents another quality of Hebrew poetry—the strophe. In this poem there are three strophes marked by the recurrence three times of the urgent sung by the chorus. The chorus appears to have composed of three parts, corresponding with the parties more immediately addressed in the three several portions of the poem. The first choral song is sung by the entire body of singers, representing Israel; the second song is sung by a chorus of maidens; the third, by first a chorus of youths in a soft and mournful strain, and then by all the choir in full and swelling chorus. But in contrast to the reader's fully understanding the noble effect these "songs of Zion" came on the souls of their hearers, an accurate idea must be formed of the music of the Hebrews. See Music. Referring to the articles which bear on the subject, we merely remark that both music and dancing were connected with sacred song in its earliest manifestations, though it was only at a comparatively late period, when David and Solomon had given their master-powers to the grand performances of the Temple-service, that poetry came forth in all its excellence, and music lent its full aid to its solemn and sublime sentiments.

6. In Hebrew, as in other languages, there is a peculiarity about the diction used in poetry—a kind of poetical dialect, characterized by archaic and irregular forms of words, abrupt constructions, and unusual inflections, which distinguish it from the contemporaneous prose of historical style. It is universally observed that archaic forms and usages of words linger in the poetry of a language after they have fallen out of ordinary use. A few of these forms and usages are here given from Gesenius's Lehrgebände. The Joel and Hiphil voices are used in a transferential sense (Jer. ii. 56; Ezek. x, 7; Job xx. 21; Ps. cx. 4); the apocopated future is used as a present (Job xv. 33; Ps. xv. 6; Isa. xliii. 6). The termination ה is found for the ordinary feminine ו (Exod. xv. 2; Gen. xxii. 22; Psa. cxxxvi. 4); and for the plural ר we have ר (Job xv. 13; Ezek. xxvi. 18) and ר (Jer. xxii. 14; Amos vii. 1). The verbal suffixes יי, יי, יי, and יי (Exod. xix. 9) and the pronominal suffixes to nouns יי, יי, and יי for יי (Hab. iii. 10), are peculiar to the poetical books; as are יי (Psa. cxxvi. 12), יי (Deut. xxxii. 37; Ps. xii. 7), and the more unusual forms יי (Ezek. xi. 16), יי (Ezek. xi. 1), יי (Ezek. xxiii. 20). In poetical language also we find יי for יי or יי for יי for יי for יי for יי for יי; the plural forms of the prepositions יי for יי, יי for יי, יי for יי; and the peculiar forms of the nouns יי for יי, יי for יי, ו for יי, יי for יי, and so on.

II. Existing Remains of Ancient Hebrew Poetry.—The poetry which is found in the Bible, rich and multifarious as it is, appears to be only a remnant of a still wider and fuller sphere of Semitic literature. The New Testament is in fact comprised in our definition, for, besides scattered portions, which, under a promise for a poetic thought, the entire book of the Apocalypse abounds in poetry. In no nation was the union of the requisites of which we have spoken above found in fuller measure than among the Hebrews. Theirs was eminently a poetic temperament; their earliest history was a heroic without reading to be a historic age, while the loftiest of all truths circulated in their souls, and glowed on and started from their lips. Hence their language, in its earliest stages, is surpassingly poetic. In sense the Bible is full of poetry; for very much of its contents, which is merely prosaic in form, rises, by force of the noble sentiments which it enunciates, and the striking or splendid imagery with which these sentiments are adorned, into the sphere of real poetry. Independently of this poetic prose, there is in the Bible much writing which has all the ordinary characteristics of prose. Even the unlearned reader is hardly fast to recognise at once the essence of poetry in various parts of the Bible. It is no slight attestation to the essentially poetic character of Hebrew poetry that its poetical qualities shine through the distorting coverings of a prose style. In the main part of the Biblical poetry is indeed hidden from the ordinary reader by its prose ac-companions, standing, as it does, undistinguished in the midst of historical narrations.

It is a phenomenon which is universally observed in the literature of all nations, that the earliest form in which the thoughts and feelings of a people find utterance is the poetic. Prose is an aftergrowth, the vehicle of less spontaneity, of less passion and of less freedom. Snatches of poetry are discovered in the oldest prose compositions. Even in Gen. iv, 22 sq. are found a few lines of poetry, which Herder incorrectly terms "the song of the sword," thinking it commemorative of the first sin. To us it appears to be a fragment of a larger poem, uttered in lamentation for a homicide committed by Lamech, probably in self-defense. See LAMECH. Herder finds in this piece all the characteristics of Hebrew poetry. It is, he says, lyrical, has a proportion between its several lines, and even assonance; in the original the first four lines terminate with the same letter, making a single or semi-rhyme.

Another poetic scrap is found in Exod. xxxii, 18. Being told by Joshua, on occasion of descending from the mount, when the people had made the golden calf, and were tumultuously offering it their worship—

"The sound of war is in the camp;"

Moses said:

"Not the sound of a shout for victory,
Nor the sound of a shout for falling;
The sound of a shout for rejoicing do I hear."
The correspondence in form in the original is here very exact and striking, so that it is difficult to deny that the piece is poetic. If so, are we to conclude that the temperament of the Israelites was so deeply poetical that Moses and Joshua should find the excitement of this occasion sufficient to strike improvisator verses from their lips? Or have we here a quotation from some still older song, which occurred to the minds of the speakers by the force of resemblance? Other instances of scattered poetic pieces may be found in Num. xxi, 14, 15; also ver. 16 and 27; in which passages evidence may be found that we are not in possession of the entire mass of Hebrew, or, at least, Semitic literature.

Further specimens of very early poetry are found in Num. xxxiii, 7 sq.; xxiv, 8, 15. The ordinary train of thought and feeling presented in Hebrew poetry is entirely of a moral or religious kind; but there are occasional pieces on other topics, often from Joel, 2, 15. The entire Song of Solomon many regard as purely an erotic sym, and considered as such it possesses excellences of a very high description. In Amos vi, 5 sq. may be seen a fine passage of satire in a denunciation of the luxuriant extravagance of the rich courts. Subjects of a similar secular kind may be found treated, yet never without a moral or religious aim, in Isa. ix, 3; Jer. xxv, 10; xliii, 33; Rev. xviii, 22 sq. But, independently of the Song of Solomon, the most sensuous ode is perhaps the 45th Psalm, which Herder and Ewald consider an epiphalamium. Further illustrations of this part of the subject appear under the next division.

The poetical character of the Revelation of John is evident to every attentive reader. Many parts are professedly songs, formal expressions of praise, triumph, or mourning. The language is not only highly figurative, but it everywhere abounds with the most poetical images and modes of expression. Bishop Jebb has presented some of the songs in the form of Hebrew poetry: and Prof. Stuart has made the metrical arrangement of a few other portions; he has also expressed his conviction that the form of poetry, as well as its spirit, prevails to a great extent throughout the work. The references to the Old Test. in this book are much more numerous than in any other book of the New Test.; only they are not simple quotations, nor the transference of thoughts to a less poetic style of expression; but they are imitations, in general more poetic than the original. That they are presented in the form of Hebrew, and not of Grecian poetry, can occasion no surprise. No other poetry would accord, either with the habit of the apostle, or with the general character and design of the Bible. But this form of poetry would perfectly harmonize with both. The poetry of the Revelation of John appears to consist of the same description of parallelisms, with those intercalary lines and other irregularities which are found in the larger specimens of Hebrew poetry. The species of which most prevails is the synthetic or constructive; the others being otherwise less suitable to the subject of the composition. There are, however, instances of every kind. Indeed, this book not only possesses the form and the spirit of Hebrew poetry, but is handled as much regularly in its parallelisms as any Hebrew poetry with which it can be justly compared. We give the following passages (Rev. i, 5, 6; xxi, 22):

"The revelation of Jesus Christ, Which God hath prepared before in His New Testament, to give unto His saints, What must come to pass after these things. To the angel of the church in Sardis, To him that hath the key of David, who openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth. Amen! And the angel said unto me, These words are faithful and true: and the Lord of the spirits in heaven, and of the earth, and of the sea, and of the fountains which are under the earth. Amen. The mystery of the seven stars which thou seekest to find, and the seven golden lampstands, which thou seest are the seven churches."

II. Classification of Poetic Styles.—I. According to the Ancient Hebrew Designations.—These appear to have special, if not exclusive reference to what is now known as lyric poetry. The terms are of two classes. See PSALMS.

a. General titles, referring apparently to the musical form or purpose of the compositions.

(2.) מִיסְרָאֵל, mizmôr, which Ewald considers a lyric song, properly so called, but which rather seems to correspond with the Greek ἱαλύς, a psalm, or song to be sung with any instrumental accompaniment. See Psalm.

(3.) נִפְגָּד, niphgad, which Ewald is of opinion is equivalent to the Greek ἱαλύς, is more probably a melody expressly adapted for stringed instruments.

(4.) מַסְקִיל, maskil, of which it may be said that if Ewald's suggestion be not correct, that it denotes a lyrical song requiring nice musical skill, it is difficult to give any more probable explanation. See Mascil.

(6.) שִׁגְגוֹדָן, shiggoyon, Psalms vii, 1, a wild, irregular, dithyrambic song, as the word appears to denote; or, according to some, a song to be sung with variations. The former is the more probable meaning. The plural occurs in Hab. iii, 1. See Shiggoyon.

b. But, besides these, there are other divisions of lyrical poetry of great importance, which have regard rather to the subject of the poems than to their form or adaptation for musical accomplishments. Of these we notice:

(1.) מִפְיוֹלָה, tehillah, a hymn of praise. The plural tehillim is the title of the book of Psalms in Hebrew. The 146th Psalm is entitled "David's (Psalms) of praise;" and the subject of the psalm is in accordance with its title, which is suggested by the concluding verse, "The praise of Jehovah shall be upon His holy name." This to class belong the songs which relate to extraordinary deliverances, such as the songs of Moses (Exod. xv) and of Deborah (Judg. v), and the Psalms xixi and xlix, which have all the air of chants to be sung in triumphal processions. Such were the hymns sung in the Temple-services, and by a bold figure the Almighty is apostrophized as "Thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel," which were in the holy place with the fragrant clouds of incense (Ps. xxii, 8). To the same class also Ewald refers the shorter poems of the like kind with those already quoted, such as Ps. xxx, xxxii, cxxxvi, cxxxi, and Isa. xxxvii, which relate to less general occasions, and commemorate more special duties. The songs of victory sung by the congregation in the Temple, as Ps. xlv, xlvii, xxvii, 7-10, which is a short triumphal ode, and Ps. cxxxix, which praises Jehovah on the occasion of a great natural phenomenon, are likewise all to be classed in this division of lyric poetry. See Hymn.

(2) נֶאֶם, קָנָה, the lament, or dirge, of which there are many examples, whether uttered over an individual or as an outburst of grief for the calamities of the land. The most touchingly pathetic of all is perhaps the lament of David for the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i, 19-27), in which passionate emotion is blended with touches of tenderness of which only a strong nature is capable. Compare with this the lament for Abner (2 Sam. iii, 33, 34) and for Absalom (xxviii, 38). Of the same character also, doubtless, were the songs which the singing men and singing women spoke over Josiah at his death (2 Chron. xxxv, 25), and the songs of mourning for the disasters which befell the helpless land of Judah, of which Psalms xlix, lx, cxlii, cxxxvii are examples (comp. Jer. vii, 29; ix, 10 [9]), and the Lamentations of Jeremiah the most memorable instances. See LAMENTATION.

(3) רַעֵשׁ, שִׁיר יִלְדֵיָה, a love-song (Psa. xxxi, 1) in its external form least so. See Canticles.

(4) מַעֲשֵׂה, עָפֶלִיתָה, prayer, is the title of Psa. xvii, lxxxi, xvi, xlii, cxl, and Hab. iii. All these are strictly lyrical compositions, and the title may have been assigned to them either as denoting the object with which they were written, or the use to which they were applied. As Ewald justly observes, all lyric poetry of an elevated kind, in so far as it reveals the soul of the poet, is essentially lyrical in its nature as a prayer; and hence the term “prayer” was applied to a collection of David’s songs, of which Psa. cxlii formed the conclusion. See PRAYER.

Other kinds of poetry there are which occupy the middle ground between the lyric and gnomic, being lyrical in form and spirit, but gnomic in subject. These may be classed as—

(5) מֵרָעָה, מַזָּחִית, properly a similitude, and then a parable, or sententious saying, couched in poetic language. Such are the songs of Balaam (Num. xxiii, 7, 18; xxiv, 15, 20, 21, 25), which are eminently lyrical in their thought; the mocking harp in Num. xxiv, 27-30, which has been conjectured to be a fragment of an old Amoritis harp-song; and the apologue of Jotham (Judg. ix, 7-20), both which last are strongly satirical in tone. But the finest of all is the magnificent prophetic song of triumph over the fall of Babylon (Isa. xiv, 4-27).

(6) מַעֲשֵׂה, chiddah, an enigma (like the riddle of Samson, Judg. xiv, 14), or “dark saying,” as the A. V. has it in Psa. xlix, 5; lxx, 2. The former passage illustrates the musical, and therefore lyrical character of these “dark sayings”: “I will incline mine ear to a parable, I will open my dark sayings upon the harp.” Mazāḥi and chiddah are used as convertible terms in Ezek. xvii, 2.

(7) Lastly, to this class belongs מַעֲשֵׂה, melodah, a mocking, ironical poem (Hab. ii, 6).

2. The Masoretic Distribution.—The Jewish grammarians have attached the poetic accentuation only to the Psalms, Job, and a few passages of Proverbs. The grammarians are no doubt that the Song of Solomon is also poetical; and with these the book of Ecclesiastes was anciently, as it is still usually, conjointed, though the form of composition is less decidedly poetical. To these five are to be added the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and the smaller pieces scattered over the historical and prophetic writings. Keeping these latter out of view, we may say that the Hebrew poetical books are six in number; and these six may be divided into two groups of three, according to the class of poetical composition to which each belongs, viz.: (1) Psalms, Song of Solomon, and Lamentations, which are prose or dramatic poetry, and are the principal work of a single character; and (2) Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes, which are predominantly didactic. In the former the leading aim of the poet is not to instruct, but to give free utterance to the feelings of his own heart; in the latter the instruction of others is the object that is principally aimed at; though neither is the lyrical element altogether excluded from the latter, nor the didactic from the former. Of the more sustained and elaborately epic and dramatic poetry—which was alike alien to the character of the Hebrew mind, and also in a certain measure inconsistent with the purposes of the poet’s writings as a divine revelation—we have no examples, though some have applied the term “dramatic” in a loose sense to the book of Job, and in a more strict sense to the Song of Solomon.

3. Modern Terminology.—For epic poetry the constituent elements do not appear to have existed during the classic period of the Hebrew muse, since epic poetry requires a heroic age—an age, that is, of fabulous wonders, and falsely so-called divine interpositions. But among the Israelites the patriarchal, which might have been an age of myth and reality; and it much raises the religious and historical value of the Biblical literature that neither the singular events of the age of the Judges, ever degenerated into mythology, nor passed from the reality, which was its essence, into the noble fictions into which the imagination, if unchastened and unchecked by religion, might have wrought them; but they retained through all periods their own essential character of Estáas and reality. In the later period, when the religion of Moses had, during the Babylonian captivity, been lowered by the corruptions of the religion of Zoroaster, and an entirely new world of thought introduced, based not on reality but fancy, emanating not from the pure light of heaven, but from the mingled lights and shadows of primitive tradition and human speculation—then there came into existence among the Jews the elements necessary for epic poetry; but the days were gone in which the mind of the nation by its equative strength and absolute subjection to them into a great, uniform, and mere structure; and if we can allow that the Hebrews possessed the rudimental outlines of the epic, we must seek for them not in the canonical, but in the apocryphal books; and while we deny with emphasis that the term Epos can be applied, as some German critics have applied it, to the Pentateuch, we can find only in the book of Judith, and with rather more reason in that of Tobit, anything which approaches to epic poetry. Indeed fiction, which, if it is not the essence, enters for a very large share into both epic and dramatic poetry, was wholly alien from the genius of the Hebrew muse, whose high and noble function was not to invent, but to celebrate the goodness of God; not to indulge the fancy, but to express the deepest feelings of the soul; not to play with words and feign emotions, but to utter profound truth and commemorate great events, and pour forth living sentiments. Of the three kinds of poetry which are illustrated by the Hebrew literature, the lyric occupies the foremost place, commencing, as we have seen, in the pre-Mosaic times, flourishing in rude vigor during the earlier periods of the Hebrew muse, and particularly in the Proverbs. This poetry goes on growing with the nation’s growth and strengthening with its strength, till it reached its highest excellence in David, the warrior-poet, and thenceforth began slowly to decline. In this period art, though subordinate, was not neglected, as indeed is proved by the noble lyrics which have come down to us, and in which the art is only relatively small and low—that is, the art is inconsiderable and secondary—merely because the topics are so august, the sentiments so grand, the religious impression so profound and sacred. At later periods, when the first glory of the Exile was lost, when the Chaldean name had ceased, art in Hebrew, as is the case in all other poetry, began to claim a larger share of attention, and stands in the poems for a greater portion of their merit. Then the play of the imagination grew predominant over the spontaneous outpourings of the soul, and among other creations of the formal genius which the muse had ceased, art in Hebrew, in which the matter is artistically distributed sometimes under two-and-twenty heads or divisions, corresponding with the number of the Hebrew letters.

Gnomic poetry is the product of a more advanced age than the lyric. It gives expression to the desire felt by the poet to express the results of the accumulated experiences of life in a form of beauty and permanence. Its thoughtful character requires for its development a time of peacefulness and leisure; for it gives expression, not like the lyric to the sudden and impassioned feelings of the moment, but to calm and philosophic reflection. Being less spontaneous in its origin, its form is of necessity more artificial. The gnomic poetry of the Hebrews has not its measured flow disturbed by the shock of arms or the tumult of camps; it rises silently, like the traditions and proverbs a period of ages, and the ground, the ground is the home life of the nation. The period during which it flourished corresponds to its domestic and settled character. From the time of David onwards through the reigns of the earlier kings, when the nation was quiet and at peace, or, if not at peace, at least so firmly fixed in its acquired territory that its wars were no struggle for existence, gnomic poetry blossomed and bore fruit. We meet with it at intervals up to the time of the Captivity, and, as it is chiefly characteristic of the age of the monarchy, Ewald has appropriated it as one of the "archaistic peddlers" of Hebrew poetry. From the end of the 8th century B.C. the decline of the nation was rapid, and with its glory departed the chief glory of its literature. The poems of this period are distinguished by a smoothness of diction and an external polish which betray tokens of labor and art; the style is less flowing and easy, and, except in rare instances, there is no dash of the ancient vigor. After the Captivity we have nothing but the poems which formed part of the liturgical serices of the Temple.

Whether dramatic poetry, properly so called, ever existed among the Hebrews, is, to say the least, extremely doubtful. In the opinion of some writers the Song of Songs, in its external form, is a rude drama, designed for a simple stage. But the evidence for this view is altogether negative and the expansion of dramatic form, and no good and sufficient reasons have been adduced which would lead us to conclude that the amount of dramatic action exhibited in that poem is more than would be involved in an animated poetic dialogue in which more than two persons take part. Philosophy and the drama appear alike to have been peculiar to the other Semitic nations, and to have manifested themselves among the Semitic tribes only in their crudest and most simple form.

Each of these forms of poetry, as they appear in the Bible, requires a more distinct notice separately.

(1.) Lyrical Poetry.—The literature of the Hebrews abounds with illustrations of all forms of lyrical poetry, in its most manifold and wide-embracing compass, from such short ejaculations as the songs of the two Lamecha, and Psa. xxv. cxvii, and others, to the longer chants of victory and thanksgiving, like the songs of Deborah and David (Judg. v. and xvii), the thoroughly national character of all lyrical poetry has already been alluded to. It is the utterance of the people's life in all its varied phases, and expresses all its most earnest feelings and impulses. In proportion as this expressive vigor was manifested, the individuality embodied in lyrical poetry was in the most case nation red or rather exaggerated.

One truth, and even one side of a truth, is for the time invested with the greatest prominence. All those characteristics will be found in perfection in the lyric poetry of the Hebrews. One other feature which distinguishes it is its form and musical accompaniment. The names by which the various kinds of song were known among the Hebrews will supply some illustration of this. (See above.)

(2.) Gnomic Poetry.—The second grand division of Hebrew poetry is occupied by a class of poems which are peculiarly Semitic and the results of the nearest approaches made by the people of that race to anything like philosophic thought. Reasoning there is none: we have only results, and these rather the product of observation and reflection than of induction or argumentation. As lyric poetry is the expression of the poet's own feelings and impulses, so gnomic poetry is the form in which the desire of communicating knowledge to others finds vent. There might possibly be an intermediate stage in which the poets gave out their experiences for their own pleasure merely, and afterwards applied them to the instruction of others, but this could scarcely have been of long continuance. The impulse to teach makes the teacher, and the teacher must have an audience. It has already been remarked that gnomic poetry, as a whole, requires for its development a period of ages. The period of the floating proverbs which pass current in the mouths of the people, and embody the experiences of many with the wit of one. From this small beginning it arises, at a time when the experience of the nation has become matured, and the mass of truths which are the result of such experience have passed into circulation. The name of Solomon's wisdom was so great that no less than three thousand proverbs are attributed to him, this being the form in which the Hebrew mind found its most congenial utterance. The sayer of sententious sayings was to the Hebrew mind the wise one of the people, the earlier isolated proverbs but few examples remain. One of the earliest occurs in the mouth of David, and in his time it was the proverb of the ancients, "From the wicked cometh wickedness" (1 Sam. xxiv, 18 [14]). Later on, when the fortunes of the nation were waxing, their experience was embodied in terms of sadness and despondency: "The days are prolonged, and every vision faieth," became a saying and a byword (Ezek. xii, 22); and the feeling that the people were suffering for the sins of their fathers took the form of a sentence, "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge" (Ezek. xviii, 2). Such were the models which the gnomic poet had before him for imitation. These detached sentences may fairly be assumed to be the earliest form, of which the fuller apothegm was the expansion, swelling into sustained exhortations, and even dramatic dialogues. See Proverbs.

(3.) Dramatic Poetry.—The drama, in the sense in which the phrase is applicable to productions such as those of Euripides, Shakespeare, or Schiller, had no place in the literature of the Hebrews. This defect may be owing to a want of the requisite literary culture. Yet we are not willing to assign this as the cause, when we call to mind the high intellectual culture which the Hebrews evinced in lyric and didactic poetry, out of which the drama seems naturally to spring. We rather look for the cause of this in the earnest nature of the Hebrews, and in the solemnity of the subjects with which they had to do in their literary productions. Nor is it any objection to this hypothesis that the drama of modern times had its birth in the religious mysteries of the Middle Ages, since those ages were only secondary in regard to religious truth, standing as a distance from the great realities which they believed and dramatized; whereas the objects of faith with the Israelites were held in all the fresh viviness of primitive facts and newly recognised truths. It is impossible, however, to assert that no forms of the drama existed among the Hebrew people; the most that can be done is to examine such portions of their literature as have come down to us, for the purpose of ascertaining how far any traces of the drama proper are discernible, and what inferences may be made from them. It is unquestionably true, as Ewald observes, that the Arab reciters of romances will make the people present at their performance act the parts in the drama in recitation, changing their voice and gestures with the change of person and subject. Something of this kind may possibly have existed among the Hebrews; but there is no evidence that it did exist, nor any grounds for making even a probable conjecture with regard to it. A rude kind of farce is described by Mr. Lane (Mod. Egypt, ii, ch. vii.), the players of which "are called Mohababzain. These frequently perform at the festivals prior to weddings and circumcisions at the time of the great; and sometimes attract rings of auditors and spectators in the public places in Cairo. Their performances are scarcely worthy of description: it is chiefly by vulgar gestures and indecent actions that they amuse and obtain applause. The actors are—only men and boys, the part of a woman being always performed by a man or boy in female attire." Then follows a description of one of these plays, the plot of which was extremely simple. But the mere fact of the existence of these rude exhibitions among the Arabs and Egyptians of the present day is of no weight when the point to be decided is whether the Song of Songs was designed to be so represented, as a simple, pastoral drama. Of course, in considering such a question, reference is made only to the external form of the poem, and, in order to prove it, it must be shown that the dramatic is the only form of representation which it could assume, and not that, by the help of two actors and a chorus, it is capable of being exhibited in a dramatic form. All that has been done, in our opinion, is the latter. It is but fair, however, to give the views of those who hold the opposite. Ewald maintains that the Song of Songs is designed for a simple stage, because it develops a complete action and admits of definite pauses in the action, which are only suited to the drama. He distinguishes it in this respect from the book of Job, which is dramatic in form only, though, as it is occupied with a sublime subject, he compares it with tragedy, while the Song of Songs, being taken from the common life of the nation, may be compared to comedy. But M. Réin, who is compelled, in accordance with his own theory of the mission of the Shemitic races, to admit that no trace of anything approaching tragedy in Egypt has ever been discovered, regards the Song of Songs as a drama in the same sense as the products of the Greek and Roman theatres, but as dramatic poetry in the widest application of the term, to designate any composition conducted in dialogue and corresponding to an action. The absence of the regular drama in Egypt is attributed to the want of a complicated mythology, analogous to that possessed by the Indo-European peoples. Monotheism, the characteristic religious belief of the Shemitic races, stifled the growth of a mythology and checked the development of the drama. Be this as it may, some of the most striking representations are to be found among the Hebrews, and are not regarded as having been in Egypt. This is the least trace of a drama at Jerusalem, whatever other foreign innovations may have been adopted; and the burst of indignation which the high priest Jason incurred for attempting to establish a gymnasiun and to introduce the Greek games is a significant symptom of the repugnance which the people felt for such spectacles. The same apathy remains to the present day among the Arabs, and the attempts to introduce theatres and scenes in Algeria have invariably failed. But says M. Réin, the Song of Songs is a dramatic poem: there were no public performances in Palestine, therefore it must have been represented in private; and he is compelled to frame the following hypothesis concerning the matter: that it is a Libretto intended to be completed by the play of the actors and by music, as represented in private families, probably at marriage-feasts, the representation being extended over the several days of the feast. The last supposition removes a difficulty which has been felt to be almost fatal to the idea that the poem is a continuous and developed drama. Each act is complete in itself, but out of a suspended interest, and the structure of the poem is obvious and natural if we regard each act as a separate drama intended for one of the days of the feast. We must look for a parallel to it in the Middle Ages, when, besides the mystery plays, there were scenic representations sufficiently developed. See CANTICLES.

It is scarcely necessary after this to discuss the question whether the book of Job is a dramatic poem or not. Inasmuch as it represents an action and a progress, it is also a drama; and a truly and real drama can only be which develops the working of passion, and the alternations of faith, hope, distrust, triumphant confidence, and black despair, in the struggle which it depicts the human mind as engaged in, while attempting to solve one of the most intricate problems it can be called upon to regard. It is a drama as life is a drama, the most powerful of all tragedies; but that it is a dramatic poem, intended to be represented upon a stage, or capable of being so represented, may be confidently denied. See JOB, BOOK OF.

(4.) It only remains to notice that there are twelve poems in which the letters beginning each verse or couplet or stanza are arranged in alphabetical order. These are seven Psalms (viz. xxxi., xxxii., xxxiii., cxxi., cxxii., cxxix., cxix.), Prov. xxxi., 30-31, and the first four chapters of the book of Lamentations. The device is a very simple one, and was probably adopted for the purpose of assisting the memory, and to make up for the want of a logical connection and progress in the thought. The more sublime poetry does not admit of being thus fettered. The Psalms in which we make no mention of the alphabet are very simple, either, usually didactic. Yet even in these the alphabetical arrangement is seldom quite exact, usually one or two letters are omitted or repeated or transposed. In some of the alphabetic poems the strophical arrangement is marked more distinctly than in any other of the Hebrew poetical compositions; for example, in Ps. cxix., which consists of twenty-two stanzas of eight lines each; and Lam. iii., in which the stanza is of three lines. See PSALMS, BOOK OF.

IV. History of the Treatment of Hebrew Poetry.—In the 18th century among them, does not the influence of critical studies upon the minds of the learned was so great as to imbue them with the belief that the writers of Greece and Rome were the models of all excellence; and consequently, when their learning and critical acumen were directed to the records of another literature, they were unable to divest themselves of the prejudices of early study and habits, and sought for the same excellences which they admired in their favorite models. That this has been the case with regard to most of the speculations on the poetry of the Hebrews, and that the failure of these attempts has been due to the adoration of the Greeks, will be abundantly manifest to any one who is acquainted with the literature of the subject. But, however barren of results, the history of the various theories which have been framed with regard to the external form of Hebrew poetry is a necessary part of the present article.

The form of Hebrew poetry is its distinguishing characteristic, and what this form is has been a vexed question for many ages. The Therapeutae, as described by Philo (De Vitae Contempt. § 8, vol. ii, p. 475, ed. Mangenot), imagined that the Hebrews were under a curious obligation to God, in divers measures and strains; and these were either new or ancient ones composed by the old poets, who had left behind them measures and melodies of trimeter verses, of processional songs, of hymns, of songs sung at the offering of libations or before the altar, of continuous choral songs, beautifully measured and in strophe of intricate character (§ 10, p. 484). The value of Philo's testimony on this point may be estimated by another passage in his works, in which he claims for Moses a knowledge of numbers and geometry, the theory of rhythm, harmony, and metre, and the whole science of poetry (De Conf. i, 5, vol. ii, p. 84). The evidence of Josephus is as little to be relied upon. Both these writers labored to magnify the greatness of their own nation, and to show that in literature and philosophy the Greeks had been anticipated by the Hebrew barbarians. This idea pervades all their writings, and it must always be borne in mind as the key-note of their testimony on this or any other point. According to Josephus (Ant. ii, 16, 4), the Song of Moses at the Red Sea (Exod. xivy) was composed in the hexameter measure (τὸ ἕξαμετρὸν τερτον); and again (Ant. iv, 8, 44), the song in Deut. xxxii is described as a hexameter poem. The Psalms of David were in various metres, some trimeters and some pentameters (Ant. vii, 12, 3). Eusebius (De Prep. Evang. xi, 3, p. 314, ed. Col. 1668) characterizes the great Song of Moses and the 118th (119th) Psalm as metrical compositions, in what the Greeks call the heroic metre. They are said to be hexameters of sixteen syllables. The other verse compositions of the Hebrews are said to be in trimeters. This saying of Eusebius is attacked by Julian (Civit. Cath. vii, 20) and others, who are wont to change the Hebrews devoid of all culture. Jerome (Pref. in Hlob) appeals to Philo, Josephus, Origen, and Eusebius, for proof that the Psalter, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and almost all the songs of Scripture, are composed in metre, like the odes of Horace, Pindar, Alc- areus, and Sappho. Again, he says that the book of Job from iii, 8 to xili, 6 is in hexameters, with dactyls and spondees, and frequently, on account of the peculiarity of the Hebrew language, other feet which have not the same syllables but the same time. In Epist. ad Phil. vi, 3 of the same, he speaks of the verses in the psalms which shows in some measure how far we are to understand literally the terms which Jerome has borrowed from the verse literature of Greece and Rome, and applied to the poetry of the Hebrews. The conclusion seems inevitable that these terms are employed simply to denote a general external resemblance, and by no means to indicate the existence among the poets of the Old Testament of a knowledge of the laws of metre, as we are accustomed to understand the term. There are, says Jerome, four alphabetical Psalms, the 111th (112th), 112nd (113rd), and the 118th (119th) and the 144th (145th). In the first two, one letter corresponds to each clause or verse, which is written in trimeter iambics. The others are in tetrameter iambics, like the song in Deuteronomy. In Psal. exviii (exix) eight verses follow of Moses and David; the letter corresponds to a verse. In Lamentations we have four alphabetical acrostics, the first two of which are written in a kind of Sapphic metre; for three clauses which are connected together and begin with one letter (i.e. in the first clause) close with a period in heroic measure (Heroici comma). The choice of his verses in threes each begin with the same letter. The fourth is like the first and second. The Proverbs end with an alphabetical poem in tetrameter iambics, beginning, "A virtuous woman who can find?" In the Pref. in Chron, Exod. Jerome compares the metres of the Psalms to those of Horace and Pindar, now running in iambics, now ringing with Alcaics, now swelling with Sapphics, now beginning with a half foot. What he asks, is more beautiful than the song of Deuteronomy? What more perfect than Job? All these, as Josephus and Origen testify, are composed in hexameters and pentameters. There can be little doubt that these terms are mere generalities, and express no more than a certain rough resemblance, so that the metres of Moses and David, Horace and Pindar, Alcaics and Sapphics, hexameters and pentameters with as much propriety as the first and second chapters of Lamentations may be compared to Sapphic odes. The resemblance of the Hebrew verse composition to the classic metres is expressly denied by Gregory of Nyssa (1 Tract. in Psalms. cap. iv). Augustine (Ep. 151 ad Numerium) confesses his ignorance of Hebrew metrical terms, but adds the Polyaenus, which language believed the Psalms of David to be written in metre. Isidore of Seville (Orig. i, 18) claims for the heroic metre the highest antiquity, inasmuch as the Song of Moses was composed in it, and the book of Job, who was contemporary with Moses, long before the times of Pherecydes and Homer, is written in dactyls and spondees. Joseph Scaliger (Animad. ad Eus. Chron. p. 6 b, etc.) was one of the first to point out the fallacy of Jerome's statement with regard to the metres of the Psalter and the Lamentations, and to assert that these books contained no verse bound by metrical laws, but that their language was merely prose, animated by a poetic spirit. He admitted the Song of Moses in Deuteronomy, the Proverbs, and Job to be the only books in which there was necessarily any trace of rhythm, and this rhythm he compares to that of two dimeter iambics, sometimes of more, sometimes of fewer syllables, as the sense required. Gerhard Vossius (De Nat. et Const. Artis Poet. lib. i, c. 13, § 2) says that in Job and the Proverbs there is rhythm but no metre; that is, regard is had to the number of syllables, but not to their quantity. In the Psalms and Lamentations not even rhythm is observed. But in spite of the opinions pronounced by these high authorities, there were still many who believed in the existence of a Hebrew metre, and in the possibility of recovering it. The theories proposed for this purpose were various. Gomar, professor at Groningen (Davide Lyna, Lugd. Bat. 1687), advocated both rhymes and metre; for the latter he laid down the following rules. The vowel alone, as it is long or short, determines the length of the syllable. Of the same syllable, the period or versicle of the Hebrew poems never contain less than a distich, or two verses, but in proportion as the periods are longer they contain more verses. The last syllable of a verse is indifferently long or short. This system, if it may be called (for it is equally adapted for prose), was supported by many men of note; among others by the younger Buxtorf, Heinsius, L de Dieu, Constant L'Empereur, and Hottinger. On the other hand, it was vigorously attacked by L. Cappelius, Calovius, Danhauser, Pfeiffer, and Sol-Raphael. Towards the middle of the eighteenth century Marcus Meibomius announced to the world, with an amount of pompous assurance which is charming, that he had discovered the lost metrical system of the Hebrews. By the help of this mysterious secret, he was able to translate the Psalms and the Proverbs into Greek verse, not only the Psalms, but the whole Hebrew Scriptures, to their pristine condition, and thus confer upon the world a knowledge of Hebrew greater than any which had existed since the ages which preceded the Alexandrine translators. But Meibomius did not allow his enthusiasm to get the better of his prudence, and the condition on which this portentous secret was to be made public was that six thousand curious men should contribute £5 sterling apiece for a copy of his book, which was to be printed in two volumes folio. It is at almost needless to add that his promise fell to the ground. He published some specimens of his restoration of ten Psalms and six entire chapters of the Old Test. in 1690. The glimpses which he gives of his grand secret are not such as would make us regret that the knowledge of it perished with his life. That whole book, as Meibomius says, is written in distichs, except the first Psalm, which is in a different metre, and serves as an introduction to the rest. They were therefore intended to be sung, not by one priest, or by one chorus, but by two. Meibomius "was severely chastised by J. M. H. Faber, Gellhards and J. Zentner (Hist. der Hebräischen V. poesie in Lxv, 11). In the last century the learned Francis Hare, bishops of Chichester, published an edition of the Hebrew Psalms, metrically divided, to which he prefixed a dissertation on the ancient poetry of the Hebrews (Psalm. lib. in versiculosis metrice divisi, etc., Lond.
1766). His dissertation was criticized for being too short; one; every consonant, whether single or double, has one more. Shekh simple or composite is not reckoned. The quiescent letters have no more.
Digonos forte compensative has one; so has metely.
The vowels, if not specified as long or short, or having the accent on the last syllable, will thus form iambics and anapaests. But as many have the accent on the penultimate, these will form trochees. The most common kinds of feet are iambics and anapaests, interchanging with trochees and tribrachs. Of verses composed of these feet, though not uniform in respect of the numbers of the feet, consist, according to Bellerman,
the poems of the Hebrew Scriptures.
Among those who believed in the existence of a Hebrew metre, but in the impossibility of recovering it, were Carpaev, Louth, Pfeiffer, Herder to a certain extent, Jahn, Bauer, and Buxtorf. The opinions of Louth, with regard to Hebrew metre, are summed up by Jubb (Suct. Litt. p. 16) as follows: He begins by asserting that certain of the Hebrew writings are not only animated with the true poetic spirit, but are in some degree couched in poetic numbers; yet he allows that the quantity, the rhythm, or modulation of Hebrew poetry,
not only is unknown, but admits of no investigation
by human art or industry; he states, after Abarbanel, that the Jews themselves disclaim the very memory of metrical composition. He terms the conformation of the sentences the sole indication of metre in these poems; he barely maintains the credibility of attention having been paid to numbers or feet
in their compositions; and at the same time he confesses the utter impossibility of determining whether Hebrew poetry was modulated by the ear alone, or according to any definite and settled rules of prosody.
The opinions of Scaliger and Vossius have already been referred to. Vitringa allows to Isaiah a kind of orato-rial measure, but adds that it could not on this account be right either of strophes, antistrophes, epodes, and the like; but his method is as arbitrary as Hare’s. The theory of Lautwein (Versuch einer richti-gen Theorie von der bibl. Verkünb. Tüb. 1773) is an improvement upon those of his predecessors, inasmuch as he rejects the measurement of verse by long and short syllables, and marks the scanzom by the tonal accent.
He assumes little more than a free rhythm: the verses are distinguished by a certain relation in their contents, and connected by a poetic euphony. Sir W. Jones (Comment. Poet. Asiat. 1774) attempted to apply the rules of English metre to Hebrew. He regards each as long syllable one which terminated in a consonant or quiescent letter (N, P, *); but he did not develop any system. The present Arabic prosody, however, is of comparatively modern invention; and it is not consistent with probability that there could be any system of versification among the Hebrews like that imagined by Sir W. Jones, when in the example he quotes of Cant.
1, 5 he refers the first clause of the verse to the second, and the last to the fifteenth kind of Arabic metre.
Greve (Ultima Capita Jobi, etc., 1791) believed that in Hebrew, as in Arabic and Syriac, there was a metre,
but that it was obscured by the false orthography of the Massorets. He therefore assumed for the Hebrew an Arabic vocalization, and with this modification he found iambic trimeters, dimeters, and tetrameters to be the most common forms of verse, and lays down the laws of versification accordingly. Bellermann (Versuch über die Metrik der Hebroider, 1813) was the last who attempted to apply to the old Hebrew metres. He adopted the Massoretic orthography and determined the quantity of syllables by the accentuation, and what he termed the “Moresystem,” denoting by moren the compass of a single syllable. Each syllable which has not the tone accent must have three syllables available which has the tone accent must have either four or two, but generally three. The moren are reckoned as follows: a long vowel has two; a short vowel, one; every consonant, whether single or double, has one more. Shekh simple or composite is not reckoned. The quiescent letters have no more.
Digonos forte compensative has one; so has metely.
*When no accent is specified, the accent will be placed on the last syllable of the word. If the accent is on the penult, then in Hebrew poetry
the accent on the last syllable, will thus form iambics
and anapaests. But as many have the accent on the penultimate, these will form trochees. The most common kinds of feet are iambics and anapaests,
interchanging with trochees and tribrachs. Of verses composed of these feet, though not uniform in respect of
the numbers of the feet, consist according to Bellerman,
the poems of the Hebrew Scriptures.
some of them into another language, that they still keep and retain their measure, if not wholly, at least in part, which cannot be the case unless the measures of which it arises from a certain quantity and number of syllables. Louth expresses his general agreement with R. Azariah's exposition of the rhythm of things; but instead of regarding terms or phrases or sentences in single lines, as measures, he considered only that relation and proportion of terms in one line to another which arises from the correspondence of terms and from the form of construction; whence results a rhythm of propositions, and a harmony of sentences.

But Louth's system of parallelism was more completely anticipated by Schlosser in his Dialectic of the existence of which the bishop does not appear to have been aware. It is found in his Horae Heliotriacae, i, 1249-1248, dis. vi, "de Exergasia Sacra." This exergasia he defines to be the conjunction of entire sentences signifying the same thing; so that exergasia bears the same relation to sentences that synonymy does to words. It is only found in those Hebrew writings which rise above the level of historical narrative and the ordinary kind of speech. Ten canons are then laid down, each illustrated by three examples, from which it will be seen how Schlosser corresponded with Louth's.

1. (Perfect) Exergasia is when the members of the two clauses correspond, each to each, as in Ps. xxxiii, 7; Num. xxiv, 17; Luke i, 47. 2. Sometimes in the second clause the subject is omitted, as in Psa. vii, 19; Prov. ii, 11. 3. Sometimes part of the subject is omitted, as in Psa. xxxviii, 30; cii, 28; Isa. liii, 5. 4. The predicate is sometimes omitted in the second clause, as in Num. xxxiv, 5; Psa. xxxiii, 12; cxxix, 6. 5. Sometimes part only of the predicate is omitted, as in Psa. lvi, 30; cii, 1; cxxix, 7. 6. Words are added in one member which are omitted in the other, as in Num. xxxiii, 18; Psa. cii, 29; Dan. xii, 3. 7. Sometimes two propositions will occur, treating of different things, but referring to one general proposition, as in Psa. xxiv, 9; cxxviii, 3; Wnd. iii, 16. 8. Cases occur, in which the second proposition is the contrary of the first, as in Prov. xv, 8; xiv, 1, 11. 9. Entire propositions answer each to each, although the subject and predicate are not the same, as in Psa. li, 7; cxxix, 168; Jer. viii, 22. 10. Exergasia is found with three members, as in Psa. i, 1; cxxix, 3. 11. These canons Schlosser applied to the interpretation of Scripture, all of which he gives examples in the remainder of that and the following Dissertation.

But whatever may have been achieved by his predecessors, there can be no question that the delivery of Louth's lectures on Hebrew poetry, and the subsequent publication of his translation of Isaiah, formed an era in the literature of the subject more marked than any that had preceded it. Of his system we have already given (§ 3) a somewhat detailed account, which we here slightly expand; for whatever may have been done since his time, and whatever modifications of his arrangement may have been introduced, all subsequent writers have confessed their obligations to the two works above mentioned, and have drawn their inspiration from them. Starting with the alphabetical poems as the basis of his investigation, because in them the verses or stanzas were more distinctly marked, Louth came to the conclusion that they consist of verses properly so called, "of verses regulated by some observation of harmony or cadence; of measure, numbers, or rhythm," and that this harmony does not arise from rhyme, but from what he denominates parallelism. Parallelism he defines to be the correspondence of one verse or line with another, and divides it into three classes—synonymous, antithetic, and symmetrical.

(22) Parallel lines, which consist of two lines, as correspond to each other by expressing the same sense in different but equivalent terms, as in the following examples, which are only two of the many given by Louth:...
POETRY

"O Jehovah, in thy strength the king shall rejoice;
And with thy glory how greatly shall he exult!
The desire of his heart thou hast granted unto him;
And the request of his lips thou hast denied no more" (Psa. xxi, 1, 9).

"For the moth shall consume them like a garment;
And the worm shall eat them like wool;
Those that dwell in these shall endure for ever;
And my salvation to the age of ages." (Isa. ii, 1, 8).

It will be observed from the examples which Lowth gives that the parallel lines sometimes consist of three or more synonymous terms, sometimes of two, sometimes only of one. Sometimes the lines consist each of a double member, or two propositions, as Psa. cxliv, 5, 6; Isa. lxv, 21, 22. Parallels are formed also by a repetition of part of the first sentence (Psa. lxxixv, 1, 11, 16; Isa. xxxvi, 5, 6; Hos. vi, 4); and sometimes a part has to be supplied from the former to complete the sentence (2 Sam. xxii, 41; Job xxvi, 5; Isa. xii, 3; Joel iii, 26). In periods of five lines the odd line sometimes comes in between two distichs, as in Job viii, 5, 6; Isa. xlii, 7; Hosea iv, 9; Joel iii, 16 or after two distichs closure the stanza, as in Isa. xlv, 24. Alternate parallelism in stanzas of a four lines is found in Psa. ciii, 11, 12; Isa. xxx, 16; but the following examples of the alternate quatrains are Deut. xxxii, 25, 42, the first line forming a continuous sense with the third, and the second with the fourth (comp. Isa. xxxiv, 6; Gen. xlil, 6). In Isa. 1, 10 we find an alternate quatrains followed by a fifth line. To this first division of Lowth's Jebb objects that the name synonymous is inappropriate, for the second clause, with few exceptions, "diverted the preceding clause, and generally so as to rise above it, forming a sort of climax in the sense." This peculiarity was recognized itself in his 4th Preface, where he says, "item iterant, variant, augent," thus marking a cumulative force in this kind of parallelism.

The same was observed by Apb. Newcome in his Preface to Ezekiel, where examples are given in which the "following clauses so diversify the preceding ones as to rise above them" (Isa. xxxii, 7; xxxii, 16; Psa. xxv, 2; civ, 1). Jebb, in support of his own opinion, appeals to the passages quoted by Lowth (Psa. xxii, 12; evil, 18; Isa. iv, 6, 7), and suggests as a more appropriate name for parallelism of this kind, cognate parallelism (Sacr. Lit. p. 58).

(b.) Lowth's second division is antithetic parallelism; when two lines correspond with each other by an opposition of terms and sentiments; when the second is construed the first, sometimes in expressions, sometimes in sense only, so that the degrees of antithesis are various. As for example:

"A wise son rejoiceth his father;
But a foolish son is the grief of his mother." (Prov. x, 1).

"The memory of the just is a blessing;
But the name of the wicked shall rot." (Prov. x, 7).

The gnomic poetry of the Hebrews abounds with illustrations of antithetic parallelism. Other examples are Psa. xx, 7, 8;

"These are chariots, and those in horse:
But we in the name of Jehovah our God will be strong.
They are bowed down, and fallen;
But we are risen, and maintain ourselves firm." (Comp. also Psa. xxx, 5; xxxvii, 10, 11; Isa. lv, 10; ix, 10. On these two kinds of parallelism Jebb appropriately remarks: "The antithetic parallelism serves to mark the broad distinctions between truth and falsehood, and good and evil; the cognate parallelism charges the more difficult and more critical function of discriminating between different degrees of truth and good on the one hand, of falsehood and evil on the other." (Sacr. Lit. p. 59).

(c.) Synthetic or constructive parallelism, where the parallel "consists only in the similar form of construction; in which word does not answer to word and sentence to sentence, as equivalent or opposite; but there is a corresponding idiom and equality between different propositions, in respect of the shape and turn of the whole sentence, and of the constructive parts—such as noun answering to noun, verb to verb, member to member, negative to negative, interrogative to interrogative." One of the examples of constructive parallels given by Lowth is Isa. l, 5, 6.

"The Lord Jehovah hath opened mine ear,
And I was not rebellious;
Neither did I withdraw myself backward—
I gave my back to the smiters,
And my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair:
For the Lord of hosts girded me with a belt,
That I should not be ashamed and splitting." (Jebb gives as an illustration Psa. xix, 7–10.)

The law of Jehovah is perfect, converting the soul. The testimony of Jehovah is sure, making wise the simple, etc.

It is instructive, as showing how difficult, if not impossible, it is to make any strict classification of Hebrew poetry, to observe that this very passage is given by Gesenius as an example of synonymous parallelism, while De Wette calls it synthetic. The illustration of synthetic parallelism quoted by Gesenius is Psa. xxiv, 4.

"One thing I ask from Jehovah."

It is my dwelling in the house of Jehovah all the days of my life.
To behold the beauty of Jehovah,
And to inquire in his temple.

In this kind of parallelism, as Nordheimer (Gram. Anal. p. 87) observes, "an idea is neither repeated nor followed by its opposite, but is kept in view by the writer, while he proceeds to develop and enforce his meaning by accessory ideas and modifications."

(d.) To the three kinds of parallelism above described, Jebb adds a fourth, which seems rather to be an unnecessary refinement than a true parallelism. He denominates it circumlocutory parallelism, in which he says, "there are stanzas so constructed that, whatever the number of lines, the first line shall be parallel with the last; the second with the penultimate; and so throughout in an order that looks inward, or, to borrow a military phrase, from flanks to centre" (Sacr. Lit. p. 58). Thus:

"My son, if thine heart be wise,
My heart also shall rejoice;
Thy lips shall speak right things." (Prov. xxiii, 15, 10.)

"Unto Thee do I lift up mine eyes, O Thou that dwellest in the heavens, Behold as the eyes of servants to the hand of their master:
As the eyes of a maiden to the hands of her mistress:
Even so look our eyes to Jehovah our God, until he have mercy upon us." (Psa. cxii, 1, 9).

Upon examining these and the other examples quoted by bishop Jebb in support of his new division, to which he attaches great importance, it will be seen that the peculiarity consists in the structure of the stanza, and not in the nature of the parallelism; and any one who reads Ewald's elaborate treatise on this part of the subject will rise from the reading with the conviction that to attempt to classify Hebrew poetry according to the character of the stanzas employed will be labor lost and in vain, resulting only in a system which is no system, and in rules to which the exceptions are more numerous than the instances.

A few words may now be added with respect to the classification proposed by De Wette, in which more regard was had to the rhythm. The four kinds of parallelism are: 1. That which consists in an equal number of words, phrases, or members, as in Gen. iv. 23. This he calls the original and perfect kind of parallelism of members, which corresponds with metre and rhyme, without being identical with them (Die Paulinen, Einl. §7). Under this head are many minor divisions. 2. Unequal parallelism, in which the number of words in the members is not the same. This again is divided into a. The simple, as Psa. lxxxv, 38. b. The composite, consisting of the synonymous (Job x, 1; Psa. xxxvi, 7), the antithetic (Psa. xv, 4), and the synthetic (xv, 5). c. That in which its form is the opposite of the subject, or is composed of four, or smaller (xx, 10). d. Where the composite member grows up into three or more sentences (i, 8; lv, 10). e. Instead of the close parenthesis there sometimes occurs a short additional clause, as in Psa. xxxii, 8. f. Out of the parenthesis, which sometimes is composed of the composite character of one member, another is developed, so that both members are composite (xxxii, 11). This kind of parenthesis again admits of three subdivisions. 4. Rhythmic parenthesis, which lies merely in the external form of the dictum. Thus in Psa. xix, 11 there is nearly an equal number of words; when the thought trails through two members of a verse, as in Psa. cx, 5, it gives rise to a less animated rhythm (comp. also cxxi, 10). 5. Two sentences may be brought together as antithesis and apodosis, or simply to form one compound thought; the external parenthesis may be dispensed with, but the harmony of thought remains. This may be called the intermediate rhythm.

The forms of structure assumed by the verse are many.
(1) There is the single member, which occurs at the commencement of a series in Psa. xvii, 2; xxiii, 1; at the end of a series in Exod. xv, 18; Psa. xxii, 9; and in the middle, after a short pause, in Psa. xxxiv, 7. (2) The binominal verse is most frequently found, consisting of two members of nearly equal weight. (3) Verses of more than two members are formed either by increasing the number of members from two to three, so that the complete fall may be reserved for the third, all three possessing the same power; or by combining four members two and two, as in Psa. xvii, 7; xxvii, 1.

The varieties of this structure of verse are too numerous to be recounted, and the last noticed in Hebrew poetry are so free that of necessity the varieties of verse-structure must be manifold. The gnostic or sententious rhythm, Ewald remarks, is the one which is perfectly symmetrical. Two members of seven or eight syllables, corresponding to the lengths of rise and fall, contain a thesis and antithesis, a subject and its image. This is the constant form of genuine gnostic sentences of the best period. Those of a later date have many members or trails themselves through many verses. The animation of the lyrical rhythm makes it break through all such restraints, and leads to an amplification or reduplication of the normal form; or the passionate rapidity of the thoughts may disturb the simple concord of the members, so that the unequal structure of verse intrudes with all its varieties. To show how impossible it is to attempt a classification of verse uttered under such circumstances, it will be only necessary to quote Ewald's own words: "All these varieties of rhythm, however, exert a perfectly free influence upon every lyrical song, just according as it suits the mood of the moment to vary the simple rhythm. The most beautiful songs of the flourishing period of poetry allow, in fact, the verse of many members to predominate whenever the diction rises with any sublimity; nevertheless, the standard rhythm still returns in each when the diction flags, and the different kinds of the more complex rhythm are essentially subordinated to equal freedom and ease of variation, just as they severally accord with the fluctuating hues of the mood of emotion and of the sense of the diction. The late alphabetical songs are the first in which the fixed choice of a particular versification—a change made with designed art—establishes itself firmly, and maintains itself symmetrical throughout all the verses" (Dichter d. Alteren Bundes, i, 83; translat. in Kittel's Journal, i, 818). It may, however, be generally observed that the older rhythms are the most animated, as if accompanied by the hands and feet of the singer (Num. xi: Exod. xv; Judg. v), and that in the time of David the rhythm had attained its most perfect development. By the end of the 8th century B.C. the decay of versification begins, and to this period belong the artificial forms of verse.

It remains now only to notice the rules of Hebrew poetry as laid down by the Jewish grammarians, to which reference was made in remarking upon the system of R. Azariah. They have the merit of being extremely simple, and are to be found at length, illustrated by many examples, in Mason and Bernard's Heb. Gram. (vol. ii, No. 67), and accompanied by an interesting account of modern Hebrew versification. The rules are briefer than: 1. That a sentence may be divided into members, some of which contain two, three, or even four words, and are accordingly termed binary, ternary, and quaternary members respectively. 2. The sentences are composed either of binary, ternary, or quaternary members entirely, or of these different members intermixed.

3. That in two consecutive members it is an elegance to express the same idea in different words.

4. That a word expressed in either of these parallel members, is generally found in the same sense in the other member.

5. That a word without an accent, being joined to another word by Makkês, is generally (though not always) reckoned with that second word as one. It will be seen that these rules are essentially the same with those of Lowth, De Wette, and other writers on parallelism, and from their simplicity are less open to objection than any others that have been given.

In conclusion, after reviewing the various theories which have been framed with regard to the structure of Hebrew poetry, it must be confessed that beyond the discovery of very broad general laws, little has been done towards elaborating a satisfactory system. Probably this want of success is due to the fact that there is no system to discover, and that Hebrew poetry, while possessed in the highest degree of all sweetness and variety of rhythm and melody, is not fettered by laws of versification as we understand the term. Some advance is made by Delitzsch in his Commentaries; but the whole subject admits of a more careful and minute examination of the clauses and phrases than has yet been achieved.

Modern Hebrew poetry, although tolerably copious, is altogether cast in the mould of the poems of the several European nations among whom the Jews are scattered, and is therefore stiffly artificial, generally with rhyme, etc. It is of little value theologically. A very fair collection of specimens may be seen in Martinei's Hebräische Christomathie (Bamburg, 1837).

W. Literature.—England has the credit of opening a new path in this branch by the above-noticed publication of bishop Lowth's elegant and learned Prolectiones de Sura Poeti Hebraorum (Oxon. 1753, which may be found also in Ugolini, Theaur. vol. xxxi; the editors having Michaelis's Nota et Epimenora are to be preferred; that of Oxon, 1810, is good: the work was translated into English by Gregor). On the didactic poetry of the Hebrews the reader may consult Umbreit, Sprach Sack, Einleitung; Rhode, De Vet. Poëtar. Sapi-entia Gnom. Hebraeo, imp. et Graeco. (Havn. 1800); Unger, Of Paralost, Jacob natura, etc. (Leipzig. 1829).
Leiden, Biblica Utriusque, etc. 1829, 92 sq. has given what is worth attention; see also Hist. abrégée de la Poésie chez les Hebr. in the "History of the Academy of Inscriptions," xiii, 94 sq.
The book which has, next to that of Lowth, exerted the greatest influence, is the one just mentioned, and that of the celebrated Heider, which has treated the subject with extraordinary eloquence and learning, Von Geist der Ebräischen Poesie (1782, to be found in his collected writings; also Tübingen, 1805; and Carlshagen, 1828); see also Gügler, Die Heiligkeit der Hebräer (Leipzig, 1814); and Guttenberg, Die poet. Litter. der alten Israelt (Mannh.
1835).
The subject of metre has been skilfully handled by Bellemann, Versuch über d. Metrik der Hebräer (Berl. 1813). Much useful information may be found in De Wette's Einleitung in d. A. Test. (ibid. 1840; traslated into English by Theodore Parker, Boston, 1843).
In Bellows's Bible translations of the poetical portions may be found, in which regard is paid to rhythm and poetical form; a very valuable guide in Hebrew poetry, both for form and substance, may be found in Noyes's Translation of Job (Cambridge, 1827); of the Psalms (Boston, 1831); and of the Prophets (ibid.
1833); but the best, fullest, and most satisfactory work on the subject is by Ewald, Die poet. Bücher des Alten Bundes in (Gottingen, 1835-6, 9 vols. 8vo). See also Critics Biblic, i, 111 sqq.; Carpzov, Introd, ad Libr. Can.

POETRY, Hebrew (Post-Biblical).—In speaking of post-Biblical poetry, we mean those poetical productions which have come down to us from the so-called Sophistic Age, i.e. from about B.C. 500 to A.D. 70. Productions written after this period are properly designated by the name Neo-Hebre Poetry.

The divine service of the second Temple, under Ezra and his successor, was mainly a restoration, rather than a new institute; but the inspired material for liturgy was now more copious. The Psalms, several of which,
like the melodious swan-song of a departing inspiration, were written in the Ezra-Nehelemiah time, formed of themselves a primary element. So, at the Feast of Tabernacles, the Asaphites chanted the Confession of the 118th Psalms (Exzra ii, 10, 11; comp. Neh. xi, 24, 1 Chron.
xxvii, 19, 20), and the Psalms given to some Psalteres of the great Synagogue indicate a stated use of them at various periods of week-day and Sabbath worship (comp.
Mishna, Taamid, ad fin.; Sopherim, sect. 18; and the inscriptions for the Psalms in the Septuagint, evidently rendered from Hebrew ones). Thus Ps. xxviii is called ψελλος ... της μιας σαββάτου; xxlv, Ευρωπα σαββάτου; xxvi, περιδε σάββατου; xxix, Χρυσίν ουράνιον;
xviii, πνευμ απαθος; cxviii, πνευμα απαθος; cxvθάνους, πνευμα απαθος; cxvii, Ἀλλαξαυα. The "fifteen Songs of Degrees" (תהלים עשרים ושלושה פסוקים לヶ月 ושלושה פסוקים), i. e. "the hymn which was said upon the steps of the abyss" were evidently liturgical, and probably derive their name from the fifteen semicircular steps at the Nicanor gate of the great court of the Temple, on which the Levites stood while singing them.

So the Mishna (Soccah, v, 4): "On the fifteen steps which led into the women's court, corresponding with the fifteen songs of degrees, stood the Levites with their instruments of music.
and of anger, and of great Hatred (q. v.) and certain verses of Psalms were also used, as may be seen from the treatise Soccah, iv, 5.

The poetry of this period is preserved in four forms:
of Tephillah, Berakah, Shir, and Meshal.

I. P BALLAD FORM. In this form we have the four collected offered by the high-priest on the Day of Atonement (q. v.), as preserved in the Jerusalem Gemara and Midrash Jeladenu, and which run thus: 1. For Himself and his Family: "Lord, I have committed iniquity, I have transgressed, I have sinned, I and my house. Pardon, O Lord, the iniquities and transgressions and the sins which I have committed and sinned before thee, I and my house, as it is written in the law of Moses, thy servant: for on that day will be atone for you to make you clean, from all your transgressions shall be forgiven thee, and from all the iniquities of the sons of Aaron, thy consecrated people. I beseech thee, Lord, to pardon the iniquities, transgressions and sins of the house of Jehovah be escaped." (Yomaq, iii, 7). 2. For Himself and the Priesthood: "Lord, I have committed iniquity, I have transgressed, I have sinned, I and my house, and the sons of Aaron, thy consecrated people.
I beseech thee, Lord, to pardon the iniquities, transgressions and sins of the sons of Aaron, thy consecrated people, who have perversely committed, as it is written in the law of Moses, thy servant: for on that day, etc. (ibid. iv, 2). 3. For the People at large: "Lord, thy people, the house of Israel, have done perversely; they have transgressed, they have sinned before thee, I and my house. Pardon, O Lord, the iniquities, transgressions, and sins which thy people, the house of Israel, have perversely committed, and by which they have sinned and transgressed; as it is written in the law of Moses, thy servant: for on that day," etc.

4. When he came out from the Holy of Holies: "May it please thee, O Lord our God, and the God of our fathers, that neither this day nor during this year any captivity come upon us; yet if captivity befal us this day or this year, let it be to a place where the law is cultivated. May it please thee, O Lord our God, and the God of our fathers, that no want come upon us either this day or this year; but if want visit us this day or this year, let it be due to the liberality of our charitable deeds. May it please thee, O Lord our God, and the God of our fathers, that this year may become a year of cheapness, of fulness, of intercourse, and of trade: a year with abundance of rain, of sunshine, and of dew: one in which thy people Israel shall not require assistance one from another. And listen not to the prayers of those who go forth on a journey. And as to thy people Israel, may no enemy exalt himself against them. May it please thee, O Lord our God, and the God of our fathers, that the houses of the men of Saron may not become their graves.

The Berakhah, or benediction.—The benedictory formula of the name and dominion of God is a most proper and all-pervading element in the Hebrew liturgy. Many of their prayers begin and end with it. The Berakhah at the close of several of the Psalms (Psa. xlvi. 12; xcvii. 18; lxgxxv. 53; cxi. 49) are probably added by Ezra, or the prophetical men of his time, to the final arrangement of the canonical Psalm (comp. on these doxologies Grätz, in Monatsschrift für d. Judenken, 1872, xxi. 481 sq). Those which accompany the prayers of the Shemoneh Eshah, or eighteen benedictions (comp. the art. lutheri), are believed to be of the same period. Thos Maimonides: "These benedictions were appointed by Ezra the sopher, and the betheda: and no man hath power to diminish from or add to them" (Hitlchtori Keritha Shenot, i, 7; and Hitlch. Tiflía, i 11). "In the innumerable instances where, in the Mishna and Aboda, this form occurs, in which the everlasting name is hallowed, and the truth of the divine dominion is reverently confessed, it appears to have been the pious desire of the institutions of the synagogue ritual that supplication, with prayer and thanksgiving, should give a spirit and tone to the entire life of the people. Indeed, almost all the affairs of Hebrew life have the prescription of their appropriate benedictions" (comp. Berachot, ch. vix; Rosh ha-Shanah, iv; Toseft, ii, 2, etc.).

III. The Shir, or Song, Chant (from šeôr, יַֽעַר).—"A song," the Arab. sabara, i. q. nasaara, whence zabor, like the Hebrew msoran, of the same meaning, is a metrical composition, designed for chanting, and consisting generally of the strophe, antistrophe, and epode. We have a fine Biblical model in the fifteenth chapter of Exodus, on which see Kennicott and Lowth. Apart from the divine poetry of the Scriptures, there are but scanty remains of Hebrew songs of a date prior to the destruction of Jerusalem. In the Mishna and Gemara we come upon a few reminiscences of them, as in the treatise Sukkah, fol. 53, col. 1, where, in connection with the solemnities of the Feast of Tabernacles, we find the following chant:

THE PIQNEH AND THE MEN OF RENOWN.

"O happy youth, devoted sage, Who will not put to shame our age!" The Penitents.

"O happy, also, is our age, Which now shines for youth, not sage!" Oaths.

"O happy be on whom no guilt doth rest, And he who sinned with pardon shall be blest."

These songs were accompanied by the musical instruments of the Levites, who stood on the fifteen steps which led to the court of the women. Here is another, a sort of confession made by the Levites at the same feast. "When the Levites," says the Mishna, "reached the gate that leads out to the east, they turned westward, their faces being towards the Temple, and employed these words:"

"Our fathers, here established by thy grace, Had turned their backs upon thy holy place, And to the rising sun they set their face. But we will turn to thee, Jehovah God; Our eyes are set on thee, Jehovah God."

Another fragment of a song has been preserved in the Mishna (Tosafiuth, ad fin.), and was sung on the first day of Ab, when the collection of wood required in the sanctuary was finished. Then the maidens all went forth, arrayed in white garments specially lent them, that so rich and poor might be on an equality, into the vineyards around Jerusalem, where they danced and sung:

"Around in circle gay the Hebrew maidens see, From them the happy youth their partners choose; Remember beauty soon its charm must lose, And seek to win a maid of fair degree."

"When fading grace and beauty low are laid, Yet her who fears the Lord shall praise awalt; God blessed her and her works: 'Her works have followed her,' it shall be said." The Mashiach.—This word, according to its Sanscrit-Shemitic root, denotes comparison or resemblance. "In the older Hebrew writings the word is applied to prophecy, to doctrine, to history in the loftier style, and to instruction given in a kind of poetical form, sometimes with the accompaniment of the harp or other music; because, in these various manners of instruction, material things are employed in the way of parallel or comparison, to illustrate those which are supereminal or spiritual. Hence mashiach became a general name for all poetry which relates to the ordinary or every-day economy of life, with a still more specific application to a distinct epigrammatic saying, proverb, maxim, or reflection, carrying in itself some important principle or rule of conduct. The mashiach, then, may be said to consist commonly of two elements: the thesis, principal fact or lesson, and the type, emblem, or allusion by which it is explained or enunciated. The latter may be one of the phenomena of nature, or an imaginary transaction in common life (parable); or an emblematic group of human agents (apodologie); or of agents non-human, with an understood designation (tafel). Sometimes the mashiach takes a mathematical cast; and the doctrine or principle is laid down after a certain arithmetical proportion or canon, malkah (Prov. vi, 16; xxx, 15, 18, 21; Eccles. xi, 1, 8; xx; xxxvi, 5, 26; i, 27, 28). When there is no image or allusion of these kinds used, the mashiach becomes sometimes an acute, recendite, yet generally pleasant assertion or problem—graphos, the 'riddle,' or 'enigma;' in Hebrew, chidah, קִדָּה (Judg. xiv, 12); and sometimes an axiom or oracle of practical wisdom—massa, מַסָּה, a 'burden,' a weighty saying, from massa, 'to bear;' and when conveyed in a brilliant, sparkling style of speaking it becomes melakhah, מְלָכָה, the pleasant witicism or the pungent reproof. The remaining form of the mashiach is the motto (apophthegm), where some moral is sententiously expressed without a simple, and generally without the parallelism, as we see in the mottoes of the Hebrew sages in the book Abodah. Of such mottoes, we mention the following of Hillel:

"The more flesh, the more worms; The more riches, the more care; The more wites, the more witchcraft," etc.; or:

"Because thou madest float, They made thee float: In turn, who made thee float Shall also float!"—this having reference to a skull floating on the water; or:

"Each one who seeks a name, Shall only lose his fame;"
POGGIO, BRACCIOLONI GIOVANNI - FRANCESCO, a celebrated Italian humanist, who contributed richly to the revival of classical studies in the period of the Italian Renaissance, and did much to encourage scholarship in the Church of Rome, was born at Terranova, near Florence, in 1380. He was the grandson of a notary, and studied the Latin language under the direction of Giovanni da Ravenna, the Greek under Emanuelli Chrysoloras, and applied himself also to the Hebrew, a fact which gave rise to the opinions of Huculius and others, who have said that this language was not cultivated in Italy till after the 14th and 15th centuries. After the completion of his education he went to Rome, and was for some time a canon, and finally entered the service of the cardinal di Bari. In 1418 Poggio was appointed apostolic secretary, a poorly paid charge, which he occupied forty years. Thus he spent a large part of his life in brilliant surroundings. Eight popes bequeathed him to another, as if he had belonged to the chancellors of St. Peter. The life which he led in the court was comfortable and friendly. He devoted much of it to inquiries into antiquity. His great title to the esteem of posterity is the zeal he displayed in the search for the monuments of Roman literature. He made his most important discoveries during a protracted stay in Switzerland, whether he repaired in 1414 to attend the Council of Constance. He visited the library of the monastery of St. Gall, which he found in a kind of dungeon. Here he discovered a copy, almost complete, of Quintilian's Institutiones Oratoriae, of which fragments only were known at the time; four books of the Argyrologia of Valerius Flaccus, and the Commentaries of Aesonius Pedianus. Afterwards he found, in divers places, the History of Ammianus Marcellinus and Frontinus's Treatise on Aqueducts. The searches which he caused to be made in the monasteries of France and Germany brought to light the works of Manlius, of Vitruvius, of Columella, of Priscianus, of Nonius Marcellus, a considerable portion of the poems of Lucretius and Silius Italicus, eight orations of Cicero, twelve comedies of Plautus, etc. In the year 1455, with which Poggio criticised several acts of the Council of Constance, especially in the affair of Jerome of Prague, was punished with a short disgrace, during which he visited England. Beauport, bishop of Winchester, received him with distinction. But as little effect followed the brilliant promises of the prelate, and as the English libraries offered no temptation to a man of Poggio's propensities, he left a country the inhabitants of which he describes as plunged in the grossest sensuality, and returned to Rome at the close of 1420. He was reinstated into his former charge. The calm which the pontifical court enjoyed for some years gave him full leisure to correspond with his friends, Leonardo d'Arezzo, Francesco, etc., and to write several dialogues and philosophical treatises, in which he exposes without mercy the fallings of monks and priests, which Poggio was most competent to describe, as he had himself at the time three sons by a mistress, and his own course he excuses in the following pleasantry, in one of his letters to cardinal Julian of St. Angelo: "You say that I have sons, which is not lawful for a clerics; and without a wife, which does not become a laic. I may answer that I have sons, which is fitting for laic; and without a wife, which from the beginning of the world has been the custom of clerics: but I will not defend my failings by any excuse." When, after the accession of Eugenius IV, in 1443, a sedition compelled the pope to retire to Florence, Poggio set out with the same way to join his master. He was taken by soldiers of Piccinino, and given his liberty only after a heavy ransom paid by his friends. In Florence he met Filelfo, against whom he had long entertained a secret jealousy, which changed into actual hatred when he had generated and beloved Niccolò was the object of a violent attack from Filelfo. He launched against his enemy a libel, in which he heaped up all the most injurious and obscene expressions which the Latin language would afford. Filelfo answered him in the same style; whereupon Poggio replied in a still more insulting strain. After a truce of four years this edifying dispute between two of the most distinguished men of their time recommenced: Poggio wrote against Filippo a libel full of the most atrocious accusations, almost all of his own invention. Filelfo again returned the blow, and neither had damaged himself in the eyes of their contemporaries, who enjoyed these invectives as literary dainties. Meanwhile Poggio had bought a villa in the vicinity of Florence, and formed there a museum of sculptures, medals, and other objects of art. Towards the close of 1445 he had married the young and beautiful Vagga di Bondelmonti. He was poor and on the decline of life; but the young heiress of an illustrious and ancient family was in love with his literary fame, which had induced the senate of Florence to grant immunity from taxes for forty years to him and his descendants. His married life was a happy one. He returned to Rome with the papal court, after a sojourn of ten years at Florence. During this period he had published a choice selection of letters, and composed two dialogues, full of the most curious remarks on the manners of his time (On Nobility and On the Misfortunes of Princes). He had, besides, written the panegyrics of Niccolò, Lorenzo di Medici, of the cardinal Albergati, and of Leonardo d'Arezzo. At the request of pope Nicholas V, with whom he was in great favor, he translated into Latin the first five books of Diodorus Siculus; about the same time he dedicated his version of Xenophon's Cyropedia to 'Alfonso, king of Naples, and compelled the king, by the sarcastic remarks with which he filled his letters to his friends, to reward him with a present of six hundred ducats, whereupon he chanted, in the most pompous strain, the encomiums of the king. To please pope Nicholas, he wrote a violent invective against the antipope, Felix V. He wrote also, under the same pope's auspices, an interesting dialogue of which many curious incidents in the history of Italy in the 14th and 15th centuries, contains an account of the journey of the Venetian Niccolo Conti into India and Persia, and a precious description of the monuments of Rome as they were at that time. During the plague which broke out in Rome in 1450, he retired to his birthplace.
where he published his famous Faecitio, a collection of tales, partly borrowed from the French fabliaux, and excessively licentious. This book was eagerly read throughout Europe. Soon afterwards he published his Historia Severalziana Chretiense, a dialogue full of satiric humor. He returned to Rome in 1451, but in 1458 he was offered the position of chancellor of the republic of Florence, and a month after his removal to that city was in addition made prior of the arts. In the latter capacity he had to look to the maintenance of good order and to the public libraries. He has been described as more of a scholar than of his functions: young and beautiful, crowned with blue flowers, blue wings on his shoulders, clothed in a blue garment interwoven with silver, stretched on a bed of flowers resting quietly in the bright air. It is not likely that the Slaves one thousand years ago could have drawn such beauty.

Pohiman, William John, a missionary of the Reformed (Dutch) church, was born at Albany, N. Y., in 1812, of pious parents who belonged to the Lutheran Church. His father was of German descent. Converted at the age of sixteen, he united with the First Reformed Church of Albany, under the care of Dr. John Ludlow. Devoting himself to the Christian ministry, Pohiman studied three years at the Albany Academy, entered Rutgers College in 1842, graduated in 1884, and then entered the theological seminary at New Brunswick, N. J. A student in this institution he consecrated himself to the foreign missionary work. In August, 1886, he offered himself to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in a memorable letter, which concluded with these sentences: "I wish to enrol my name on the list for life. If in the future I cannot nay all your feet. Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee." Send me abroad to publish glad tidings to the idol-serving nations. Send me to the most desert part of all the howling wildernesses of heathenism, to the most barbarous climes, or to more civilized regions. Send me to the missions of pagans, to the followers of the false prophet, to the Jews or the Gentiles, to Catholics or Protestants. Send me, in fine, whereward God opens an effectual door. Send me—for necessity is laid upon me; yes, woe is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel; though written in an easy, witty, and sometimes elegant manner, they are full of solemnisms, Italicisms, and even barbarisms. His letters are altogether neglected. But the rest of his writings are still read, owing to their variety of subjects, to some ingenious ideas, and to the freedom of speech, sometimes the grace, by which they are characterized. His Works were published at Strasburg (1510, fol.; 1518, 4to), at Paris (1551, 4to; 1515, fol.), and at Basle (1558, fol.). The latter edition, by Hebel, is the best; but it is still incom- plete. Some of his sermons are also preserved; afterwards published apart: De Hypocrisie (Lyons, 1679, 4to), a violent pamphlet against the clergy:—Historia Florentina (Venet. 1716, 4to; and in tom. xx of the Scriptores of Muratori), translated into Italian by Giacomo, the third of the five sons whom Poggio had by his legitimate wife (Venet. 1745, fol.; Florence, 1492 and 1598, 4to):—De Variatiba Fortuna (Par. 1728, 4to), with fifty-seven unpublished Letters of Poggio. The Fascices have often been printed apart (1470, 4to; Ferrara, 1471; Nuremb. 1505; Milan, 1577; Paris, 1478, 4to; Utrecht, 1757, 4to; and Colonia, 1760, 4to). The translation of Diodorus Siculus was published at Venice (1673, 1746, fol.) and at Basle (1580, 1578, fol.). See Thormeis, Vita Poggia (Wittemburg, 1713); Reecanate, Vio (Venet. 1715); Lenfant, Poggiana (1785), and enlarged (1791); Nucetor, Memoires, vol. ix; Shepherd, Life of Poggio (Lond. 1802, 8vo); Niard, Les Grandes Cures de la Republique des Lettres, vol. i; Trollope, History of Florence (see Index in vol. v); Hallam, Literary Hist. of Europe (Harper's edition), 1. 64, 92; id., Middle Ages (2nd ed., ii, 805-310); Piper, Monumental Theologoe, § 148, 150, 153, 214; Milman, Latin Christianity, viii, 123; Edinb. Poggoda is in Slavonic mythology the name of a god of the spring and of fine weather. Pogoda is a pure Slavic word, and means weather. He is supposed to have been of a kind and amiable disposition—the god of shady weather, of clear skies, of smiling springs; yet the qualification of dobra (good) would seem to be necessary in such a case. The description given of his exterior appearance is more authentic than that of his functions: young and beautiful, crowned with blue flowers, blue wings on his shoulders, clothed in a blue garment interwoven with silver, stretched on a bed of flowers resting quietly in the bright air. It is not likely that the Slaves one thousand years ago could have drawn such beauty.

The strictly missionary work in Amoy is now at an end; and the churches there would doubtless live and grow and propagate Christianity, like those of ancient times, even if all American missionaries were withdrawn from them. Such is the fruit of the labors of Mr. Pohlman and his associates and successors. His valuable life and labors were suddenly ended at Breker's Point by shipwreck of the vessel on which he was bound from Hong Kong to Amoy, Jan. 5, 1843. Pirates attacked the sinking ship, but "Mr. Pohlman sprang from the ship and was drowned." The ruling principle of Mr. Pohl-man's life was his consecration to God. He gave himself and all to Christ, and to the world for Christ's sake.
He spared nothing. He was "totius illius." He was always, buoyant, frank, earnest, enthusiastic, and taciturn to the last degree in prosecuting his good purposes. His disposition was very cheerful. He had no crotchets. But with practical common-sense and intense energy and zeal, he lived and labored for the kingdom of Christ. His preaching, correspondence, and public services glowed with this one spirit, which has left its permanent impress upon the mission and Church of which he was so conspicuous a servant.

Poilly, François de, a French engraver, was born at Abbeville in 1622 or 1623. His father was a goldsmith. After working for three years in the studio of Pierre Daret, he went to Rome in 1649, and remained there until 1656. He engraved during his stay in Italy some drawings in a manner which resembles that of Bloemaert. On his return to France, he engraved with equality portraits and historic subjects. His portraits are sought for even now, perhaps less on account of the merits of an art which must be confessed to be somewhat cold and monotonous, than of the persons they represent. Poilly was honored with the title of ordinary engraver to the king. He reproduced the works of Raffaello, Giulio Romano, Guido, Carraccio, Le Brun, Mignard, Le Sueur, Poussin, Ph. de Champagne, etc. The great reputation he enjoyed in his time attracted to his studio a number of pupils, among them Gerard Edelineck, Nicolas de Poilly, his brother, Sauveur Boullet, etc. Poilly and his brother lived together with the Mariette family, for whom Gerard worked. Poilly died at Paris, March, 1693. Though Poilly's style is very laborious, there are about four hundred prints which bear his name, in which however he was of course assisted by his pupils. His masterpiece is the print from Mignard's celebrated picture, now lost, of San Carlo Borromeo administrating the Sacramento to the Milanese attacked with the Plague.
A catalogue of his prints was published by R. Hequet in 1787, which, Noue, Histoire, General, etc., v.; Mrs.
Clement, Handbook of Painters, Sculptors, Architects, and Engravers, etc., v.

Poinen (poupi), i.e. pastor, is a name given to ministers of the Gospel in the New-Testament writings and by the early Church. It is a term recommend-based by the circumstance that Christ had compared him-selves to a shepherd and his people to a flock; and the apostle Peter had called him the Chief Shepherd. See PASTOR.

Pointed. In the English Prayer-book the Psalter, Venire, Te Deum, etc., are punctuated throughout in a peculiar manner by the insertion of a colon in or near the middle of each verse without regard to grammatical rules. This is done with the design of facilitating the chanting by presenting to the eye the most natural division of the verse, or that which will most readily correspond with the movement of the chanttune. In allusion to this, the title of the English Psalter, unto which states that the Psalms of David are "pointed (or punctuated) as they are to be sung or said in churches." In the American editions the grammatic-ical punctuation has been restored, and the above portion of the title omitted.

Pointed Style, especially applied to the Pointed arch and architectural term first used in the 14th century. The Pointed style is used in Egypt, Italy, Greece, and Mexico in ancient buildings, merely as a freak of the architect, an accident, or irregularity.
Some authors have traced its origin to the avenues of a forest; others have seen it in the palm, in the wooden churches of an earlier period, or the intersecting arcade.
Some refer it to the Goths, Wre Warburton; or to the Saracens, like Christopher Wren. See Gothic Archi-ecture.

Pointer, John, an English divine of some note, flourished in the first half of the 18th century as chaplain of Merton College, Oxford, where he was probably educated, and as rector of Sipton. He published, besides sermons, works of an altogether peculiar character, Ozomienes Academicae (Lond. 1749, 12mo). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, etc.

Points, Hebrew. See MABORAH.

Points, Robert, an English theologian of some repute, flourished near the middle of the 16th century.
He was educated at Oxford University, and was made permanent fellow of New College in 1564. He was obliged to go abroad after the accession of queen Mary,
he having embraced the Reformed doctrines, and preferring exile to abnegation of his religious convictions.
He went to Louvain, and settled there as pastor of a Protestant congregation. He wrote several controversial tracts against the Romanists, examining their different characteristic doctrines. Among these are,
Testimonies for the Real Presence (Lond. 1566, 1600): — Miracles performed by the Eucharist (1570). See Wood, Athenae Ozomeniæ, iii, 715.

Poiret, Pierre, a French philosopher of mystical tendency, and a writer whose works are of great importance to the students of French theological thought, was born at Metz April 16, 1646. He lost his father, a mechanic, when but six years of age. As he showed some disposition for the fine arts, he entered as an apprentice the studio of a sculptor, where he learned the elementary principles of drawing. As thirteen year-old, he began to turn his thoughts towards philanetics and humanities, and from 1661 to 1663 he was tutor at Baile, and there studied at the same time philosophy and theology. He finally entered the evangelical ministry, and after reading for a while at Hauuc, was called as pastor to Heidelberg in 1667; married, and acquired the reputation of a good preacher. In 1673 he was appointed pastor at Anweiler, in the duchy of Zweibrücken. Here he familiarized himself with the writings of the philosopher Descartes, and of the mystics Kempis, Tauler, and Antoinette Bourguin, and commenced to turn his thoughts towards the spiritual life. In 1673 a dangerous illness converted him fully to mysticism. The war having disturbed his peaceful studies, he first took refuge in Holland, then at Hamburg, in the house of Mlle. Bourignon, to whom he was married, and after his death attached by feeling for and admiration. In 1690 he established himself at Amsterdam. Speaking of his exemplary life there, Bayle says that "from a great Cartesian he had become so pious that, in order to apply himself the better to the things of heaven, he had broken off almost every intercourse with the earth." In order to live in more complete se-cision, he retired in 1698 to Rheinsberg, near Leyden, where he spent more than thirty years in the exercise of piety, and in the composition of spiritual and ascet-ic works. He died there May 21, 1719. Poiret is not the founder of a sect; he established no conveniencies, because he attached no importance whatever to dog-matical questions. His theological system lacked speculative clearness and consistency, and was rather a subjective theology of the adoring heart and year-
ing for the assurance of the seeing intelligence; it rested upon the forms and rules of any particular Church, and placed the ideal of the Christian life in retired, uninterrupted communion with self and with God. For him, morals were the essence of religion.
Hence there was never a more tolerant theologian.
If he had been at all interested in the Church, it was to preserve the integrity of his conscience. Far from being indifferent, he was full of zeal for the Christian religion, which he defended on several occasions, especially against Spinoza. All those who were acquainted with him agree in the praise of his meekness, his modesty, the purity of his life, the kindness of his heart. It would be unjust to deny that there are excellence. A human work of the kind, published before by Cassiel, had been published in 1676. Poiret accompanied it with a Letter on the mystical authors; the latter are 180 in number, and Poiret gives most curious details about their characters, principle, life, and works.—Theologie Mystique (ibid. 1702, 12mo).—Poiret etratio adversus Principias J. Locoki (ibid. 1703, 8vo).—Poliotica Mysteriost (ibid. 1708, 8vo).—Posthumae (ibid. 1721, 4to). Poiret translated The Imitation of Jesus Christ (ibid. 1688, 12mo, sep. ed.), which he paraphrased partly according to the interior sense; the works of St. Catherine of Genoa (1691, 12mo), and those of Angele de Foligni (1696, 12mo). He edited the Oeuvres d'Antoines Courton (Amsterdam, 1679 and following, 19 vols. 12mo), with a most circumstantial Life, which was reprinted apart (1698, 2 vols. 12mo), and followed by an apologetic Memoir, inserted in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (1699), against the attacks of Sckendorf (Monumentum Necassarium, 1686, 4to): several mystical Oeuvres; and after having published several of the writings of Mme. Guyon, among others, Le Nouveau et Ancien Traitemont (Amsterdam, 1715-1715, 20 vols. 12mo); he gave (1720, 3 vols. 12mo); and her Peupes (1722, 12mo), brought out a complete edition with great care, in 39 vols., furnishing them with elaborate introductions, prefaces, and apologies, sufficient to make several volumes in themselves. In all this there is manifest, as in the editing of Mlle. Bourignon's works, a remarkable willingness to hide himself entirely behind the beloved objects upon which he spends his toil; so that now in many instances it is impossible to tell just how much of the worth and beauty of whole volumes is to be assigned to himself rather than to the reputed authors. Nearly all of Poiret's writings have been translated into Latin, Dutch, and German. See Walch, Religionsmirbeiten ausser der evangel-luther Kirche, liv, 911 sq.; Nicerin, Hist. des Hommes Illustres, iv, 144 sq.; x, 149 sq.; Grisse, Liturgiograph, vol. iii, pt. iii, p. 479 sq.; Erdmann, Versuch einer gesch. d. neueren Philosophie, vol. i, pt. ii, p. 217 sq.; Bibliotheca Ere- mensis, Theol. Poiyre, François, a French Jesuit, was born in 1584 at Versal. He entered the Society of Jesus at the age of seventeen years; was a successful teacher of humanities, rhetorics, philosophy, and Holy Writ, and was appointed superior of a house of his order at Nancy; rector of the college of Lyons, and of that of Dôle. He left, Igna Hubacq, Histoire de Monseigneur la Marquise de Deuzer a bien mourir (Douai, 1638, 16mo).—Le bon Pasteur (Pont-a-Mousson, 1830, 12mo).—Le Côme des Saints (Par. 1684, 4to, etc.). He died at Dôle Nov. 25, 1687.—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Poirier, Germain, Dom, a learned French Benedictine, was born Jan. 8, 1724, at Paris. He was not at the fifteen years of age when he entered the Congregation of Saint-Maur. After teaching philosophy and theology in the houses of his order, he was appointed secretary to the visitor-general of France, and resigned this place for another which was more congenial to his tastes, that of guardian of the archives of Saint-Denis. In 1762 he published in the Nouvelle Collection des Historiens de la France, vol. xi, which contains the reign of Henry I, an excellent Preface, which forms the fourth part of it, and in accordance to Dacier, the most substantial and best work ever written on the first Capetian kings. Tired of the troubles by which his congregation was agitated, he left it in 1765, but re-entered it two years later, and was intrusted with the archives of Saint-Germain-des-Pres. In 1775 he was admitted as free associate of the Academicians. During the Revolution he was a member of the commission of monuments, and exerted himself actively in preserving from destruction a number of valuable manuscripts. In 1796 he was appointed librarian of the Arsenal, and in 1800 he succeeded Legrand d'Aussy in the National Institute.

He united to a rare erudition a no less rare modesty: he worked for the pleasure he found in the work; hence his easy willingness to communicate the fruit of his researches to any one who recurred to him. His death revealed the secret of his virtues and of his benevolence; the blessings of the poor, their testimonies of gratitude—written testimonies, found, with a few pieces of money, in his bureau—were his whole treasure. He wore cheap clothes, and condemned himself to privations, to be able to give food and clothing to the poor. He lived as poor as a beggar. Besides what has been mentioned, he wrote several historical Mémoires, which were read in the academy of which he was a member, etc. See Dacier, Éloge de Dom Poitier (Paris, 1804, 8vo).—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Poison

in the A.V. of the Bible of two Hebrew and two Greek terms, but they are so general as to throw little light upon the knowledge and practice of poisons among the Hebrews.

1. מִשְׂמַך (from the root signifying “to be hot,” is used of the heat produced by wine (Hos. vii, 5), and the hot passion of anger (Deut. xxix, 27, etc.), as well as of the burning venom of poisonous serpents (Deut. xxix, 25, 29; Isa. lvi, 4; 44, 1), in all cases where this denotes animal poison, and not vegetable or mineral. The only allusion to its application is in Job vi, 4, where reference seems to be made to the custom of anointing arrows with the venom of a snake, a practice the origin of which is of very remote antiquity (comp. Homer, Iliad ix, 4).—Ovid, Fast. iv, 386, etc.—Pliny, xviii, 1). The Soanes, a Caucaian race mentioned by Strabo (xi, 499), were especially skilled in the art. Pliny (vi, 34) mentions a tribe of Arab pirates who infested the Red Sea, and were armed with poisons, which made the Malay of the coast of Borneo. For this purpose the berries of the yew-tree (Pliny, xvi, 20) were employed. The Gauls (Pliny, xxxvii, 76) used a poisonous herb, lirium, supposed by some to be the “leopard’s bane,” and the Scythians dipped their arrow-points in vipers’ venom mixed with human blood. These were so deadly that a slight scratch inflicted by them was fatal (Pliny, xii, 115). The practice was so common that the name rokoos, originally a poison in which arrows were dipped, was applied to poison generally. See Aeneas. In Palestine and the countries adjacent were many venomous snakes as well as insects, such as the scorpion and the scolopendra; but no such practice obtained among the Jews. Poisonous plants were as well known as in other countries, and we have an instance of a miracle wrought by Elisha (2 Kings iv, 38), to prevent mischief by the accidental shedding of oil into a mortar, so prepared for the sons of the prophets. This fruit or vegetable was probably the colocynth; and when those who were about to partake of it were repelled by its nauseous bitterness, the prophet commanded a handful of meal to be thrown into the pot, and thus rendered its contents fit for human food. See Garum.

2. ποιος (once ποίος, Deut. xxxii, 32, roō, if a poison at all, denotes a vegetable poison primarily, and is only twice (Deut. xxxii, 33; Job xx, 16) used of the venom of a serpent. In other passages where it occurs it is translated “gall” in the A.V., except in Hos. x, 4, where it is rendered “hemlock.” In the margin of the A.V. Deut. xxxii, 33, 34 is inserted, “the most subtle and most insidious word in the language.” The use of hemlock in the sense of the word, gave as an alternative “roak, or a poisonous herb.” Beyond the fact that, whether poisonous or not, it was a plant of bitter taste, nothing can be inferred. That bitterness was its prevailing characteristic is evident from its being associated with wormwood (Deut. xxxii, 18 [17]; Num. iii, 10; Amos vi, 13), and from the allusions to “water of roak” in Jer. viii, 14, 15; xxiii, 15. It was not a juice or liquid (Ps. lxix, 21 [22]; comp. Mark xvi, 23), but probably a bitter berry, in which case the expression in Deut. xxxii, 32, “grapes of roak,” may be taken literally. It grew in the fields (Hos. x, 4), was bitter to the taste (Jer. xxiii, 15; Ps. lix, 22; comp. Lam. iii, 5), and bore clusters, perhaps something like the belladonna (Deut. xxxii, 32. Yet here the words ποιος might also be rendered poisoned grapes, carrying out the figure of the vine, without special allusion to the poison plant). Any special rendering which would suit all the passages is uncertain, since all the old translators have used general expressions (Sept. χαλλ., Vulg. ācul., or else some word like aquam), and the words are not necessarily meant to define the poison. The colchicum is άρώσις, Vent. MS. ṛāṣāṅkłośā, and there is no kindred word found in the other dialects to compare. Oed. (iv, 83 sq.) referred the word to the poisonous colchicum (Cucumis colchicu, Linn.), which grows almost everywhere in Arabia and Palestine; a plant with a creeping stem, bright green leaves, and bears a fruit with a strangely bitter juice (Fabri Exogast., ii, 417 sq.). But this fruit is not a berry, but an apple, of the size of a closed hand; nor does the colchicum shoot up among the grain. Michaelis (Rysoms, et c. p. 14) would understand the word to mean the hysaeryuma or the darmen (cf. Neh. xii., 22). But this means something quite different from the ordinary. It is therefore the unknown, and perhaps something like the poopy in which the heads in which its seeds are contained, and from which the Orientals have extracted the opium (cf. Ps. cxxxix, 19), the word being applied to the fruit or to the pulp or the stem. This opium is said by the ancients to be poisonous, when taken in excess (Pliny, xx, 76). But it may be doubted whether the poppy could be so directly and pre-eminently styled the poison plant (it was even placed on the table as a side-dish, Pliny, xix, 53), and if roak had denoted a plant so well known, surely one of the old interpreters would have discovered it. “Water of roak” would thus be simply “opium”; but it must be admitted that there appears in none of the above passages to be any allusion to the characteristic effects of opium. The effects of the roak are simply nausea and loathing. It was probably a general term for any bitter or nauseous plant, whether poisonous or not, and became afterwards applied to the venom of snakes, as the corresponding word in Chaldee is frequently so used. See Hemlock. 3. ποιος is strictly speaking, something emitted, something vomited; hence the venom of a serpent (James iii, 8; Rom. iii, 13). See Serpent. 4. Φωμαχον, prop. medicin., hence often a deadly poison. There is a clear case of suicide by poison related in 2 Macc. x, 13, where the Macchanes Philonos is said to have destroyed himself by this means. But we do not find a trace of it among the Jews, and certainly poisoning in any form was not in favor with them. Nor is there any reference to it in the N.T., though the practice was finally common at that time in Rome (Sueton., Nem., 33, 34, 35; Tobb. 73; Claud. 1). It has been suggested, indeed, that the

of Gal. v, 20 (A.V.
"witchcraft") looked very favorably upon the idea of a set-

ment consistent with the usage of the word in the Sept. (comp. Exod. vii, 11; viii, 7, 8, etc.) and with its currence in Rev. x, 21, where it denotes a crime

distantly distinguished from murder (see Rev. xxii, 18; xii, 17). It more probably refers to the conception of mariage amongst the Huguenots.

The reference in Mark xvi, 18 seems to be to the custom of condemnation to death by means of

(serpent, Plato, Lys. 219; Plutarch, Phoc. c. 36; Diog.

Lecrt. ii, 42; Aet. V. ii, 1, 16; ix, 21; comp. J. Jac. Bose,

De cosmographia mortis praet. Lips. 1786). We read in 2 Macc. x. 13 of an example of suicide by poison (comp.

Bose, Hist. p. 25 sq.).

The administration of poisons seems to have been no unusual crime in the days of the (see Winer, Ad Galat. p. 120; comp. Philo, Op. ii.

215 sq.), and the Arabian women were especially noted for their skill in preparing them (Joseph, Ant.

xxi, 4, 1; comp. Rein, Rom. Criminalrecht, p. 427 sq.).

But in the New Testament the words

gypania
do not refer to this, but to necromancy

(q.v.). On poisoned arrows, see Bow. Swords were sometimes also dipped in poison (Curt. ix, 8, 20).

POISSON, NICOLAS-JOSEPH, a French ecclesiastic, tated as a writer of philosophy, was born in 1637 at Paris. He entered the Congregation of the Oratory at the age of twenty-three (1660), and undertook to deprive the principles of Descartes by writing a general criticism on all the works of that philosopher. But after publishing the Traité de la Mécanique amoulo

(Pet. 1669, 4to), and Remarques sur la Méthode

(Vendôme, 1671, 4to), he gave up the project for fear of compromising his congregation, whom their zeal for the new philosophy exposed to the resentment of the folners of Aristotle. The same fear prevented him from complying with the solicitations of Clerisler and of the queen Christina, who promised him ample materials for a Life of Descartes. In 1677 he went to Rome, and entered secretly to pope Innocent XI, in the name of the queen of Peru and Saint-Pons, composed by Nicolos, and thus obtained the condemnation of sixty-five propositions of lax morals which were then in vogue in the schools of theology. The real object of his journey being discovered, he was recalled by order of Pope Lachaise (1679), and relegated to Nevers,

where bishop Valdier made him a vicar and gave him

the direction of the diocesan seminary. After the death of this prelate, Poisson retired to a house of his order at

Lyons (1705). But he died, May 3, 1710. He published, besides, Acta Ecclesiae Mediolanensis sub senatu

Cardo (Lyons, 1688-89, 2 vols. fol.), valuable for the number of documents translated by the author from

Italian into Latin:—Delectus actorum Ecclesiae Universae (Ibid. 1706, 2 vols. fol.). This summary of the church is the most extensive abridgment which we have on the subject. He left a number of manuscripts about them, Vie de Charlotte de Harley-Sancy:—La Description de Rome moderne:—A Relation of his journey to Rome, etc. See Salmon, Traité de l'Étoile des Conclaves, POISSY, CONFERENCE OF, an ecclesiastical colloquy held September, 1681, of great importance in the reformatory history of the French Church. It has been somewhat spoken of in the article HUGUENOTS

(q.v.). It was called by Catharine de Melitii, and was composed of all bishops and archbishops, and the representatives of the absent prelates of France. It was intended that the conference should prepare partly for the anticipated renewal of the Tridéntiais (q.v.); and partly as a sort of national council, to effect the reformation of the French Church; and partly to help reduce the debt of the kingdom by the treasures of the Church. But however friendly the prelates were to the state, they did not go very far with the plan of reform of the Church, though all classes of society were then anxiously discussing not only reform of abuses but of doctrine.

Reformed preachers were invited to participate, and even Catharine wrote in favor of the project of keeping the Huguenots within the pale of the Church, and to facilitate a reconciliation by tolerating a difference of sen-tment. Pius IV, then the Roman pontiff, objected to the conference, on the ground that "if every prince were to take upon himself to bold councils in his own dominions, the Church would soon become a scene of universal confusion." (Pna Plao, Hist. del Concilio de Trento, liv. v, § 58, 72.)

The colloquy was opened Sept. 9, in presence of the young king, the queen-mother, the princes of the blood,

the great officers of the crown, and a brilliant audience.

Cardinal de Bourg was presiding. The Reformers were represented by twelve of their most eminent ministers, headed by Theodore Beza, the favorite disciple and confidential friend of Calvin. Peter Martyr, who was reckoned the ablest theologian of the party, was likewise present. The proceedings were opened with a speech

by chancellor Lhermitte, in favor of this great council, and its advantages over an ecumenical synod. Beza spoke next in elaborate exposition of the doctrinal system of the Reformers as set forth in the "Institutions" of Calvin. Beza's tone was calm, conciliatory, and impressive. In treating of the Eucharist, he employed language which at first seemed almost tantamount to the Catholic terminology on that vital point. But on further explanation it appeared that the presence which he recognised was subjective only; depending not on the sacrament of the wine of that party, but on the power of faith; to be sought not in any external substance, but in the heart of the devout communicant. Beza repudiated both transubstantization (q. v.) and consubstantiation (q. v.).

Cardinal de Bourg objected to Beza's speech, and in a trembling voice prayed for its interruption on the ground that the young monarch's mind would be poisoned. Beza, however, managed to conclude, when, after a few hasty words of rude remonstrance from the cardinal,

the assembly separated in a state of agitation (De Thos,

Hist. Univ. liv. xxvii: La Place, Commentaire de l'État de Religion, liv. vi). At the second meeting, several days afterwards, the cardinal of Lorraine replied to Beza in a very able discourse. The doctrine of the real presence, as held in the Church of Rome, he proceeded to establish by proofs drawn with great skill from the Holy Bible and the Church fathers. (The speech is given at full length in the Collection des Procès-verbaux des Assemblées générales du Clerc de France, vol. i, "Pièces justifications," No. 2.) The sitting was then adjourned. The sessions which followed did not hold in the royal presence, and were comparatively private. Though it was clear that there could be no successful settlement by the conference, it was resolved by all parties to make a final effort for approximation, and for this purpose a select committee of ten persons was named from among the moderate members of each party. After several days of negotiation, these divines drew up a formulary upon the doctrine of the Eucharist, in the terms of which it was hoped that all sincere friends of peace in the moral communions might be induced to concur. Its language was so general, and so purely negative in its tone, that it was at first difficult to construe it in accordance with their own propositions. The following was the draft agreed upon:

"We confess that Jesus Christ, in his Holy Supper, presents, gives, and exhibits to us the true substance of his body and blood by the operation of his Holy Spirit and that we receive and eat sacramentally, spiritually, and by faith the very body which died for us, that we may be bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh; and inasmuch as faith, resting on the Word of God, makes perfect, which is promised, so that thereby we receive actually the true and natural body and blood of our Lord by the power of the Holy Ghost, in that sense we acknowledge the real presence of Christ in the Holy Supper” (Beza, Hist. des Eglises Ref., 1668; Contin. de Flandres, liv. xlvii, 24). Of course such evasion could not prove satisfactory. The doctors of the Sorbonne being appealed to, rejected the formulary as “capacious, insufficient, and heretical;” and then the prelates put forth a counter-statement, asserting the real presence by transubstantiation of the elements, according to the ancient and undoubted traditions of the Church. This they forwarded to the queen, with a request that Beza and his associates might be ordered to signify their acceptance of it without further demur, under pain of being proscribed as heretics and banished from the kingdom.

This peremptory demand was equivalent to a rupture of the negotiations; and the conference of Poissy terminated without satisfactory result.

The actions of the conference were therefore of very little advantage. Several regulations relating to discipline were issued. Concerning the election of bishops, it was ordered that the names of persons nominated by the king to a bishopric should be posted at the cathedral doors, and in other public places, that all persons may have the opportunity of objecting to him if they know anything against him. The following is a summary of the important actions of the synod:

Archbishops and bishops are forbidden to absent themselves from their dioceses for more than three months; are exhorted to apply themselves to preaching and visiting the sick; and to hold annual synods.

Archbishops are directed to summon provincial councils every three years, according to the decrees of the Council of Basle. Excommunications, save for weighty reasons, are forbidden. Curates not to be admitted to the spiritual charges have until they have been examined by the bishop: they are ordered to proceed to priests’ orders within a year from their admission; to reside constantly; to explain the Gospel to their people, and to teach them to pray. Private masses are forbidden to be said while solemn mass is celebrated.

Priests are enjoined to prepare themselves carefully before approaching the holy altar; to pronounce the words distinctly; to do all with decency and gravity; not to suffer any airs, save those of hymns and canticles, to be played upon the organ; to correct the church books; to try to abolish all superfluous practices; to instruct the people that images are exposed to view in the churches for the purpose of reminding them of Jesus Christ and the salut. It is further directed that all images which are in any way indelicate, or which merely illustrate frivolous and ridiculous tales, shall be entirely removed.

These regulations are closed by a profession of faith, in which both Luther and Calvin, and other sects, are specially rejected.

Pottier, Pierre-Louis, a French religious writer, was born in 1743 at Havre. As soon as he had taken holy orders, he was appointed superior of the seminary of Rouen, by cardinal La Rochefoucauld, archbishop of that city. After submitting to the law which exacted the constitutional oath of clergymen, he recalled it, and retired to the seminary of St. Firmin, at Paris. There, he was afterwards, Sept. 2, 1792, with almost all his companions. He left some works of edification, which had several editions.—Hoefey, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xli, 582.

Pottiers (earlier Pottieres), a corruption of the Latin Pictorium, so called by the Gallic tribe, the Picti, (who inhabited the district in Caesar’s time) is one of the oldest towns in France. It is the capital of the department of Vienne, and is situated on an eminence near the river Charente. Its population is now about 31,034, and it possesses many churches, chapels, and monasteries. Its cathedral, named St. Pierre, is one of the finest in France, and belongs to the 12th century. It contains the ashes of Richard Cœur de Lion, and of Isabella of Aragon, in its present condition, or in the older edifice that occupied its site, of twenty-three ecclesiastical councils.

Potiers, Councils of (Concilium Pictorium), were convened here at different times in the Middle Ages.

1. The first of these was held in 583, and was provoked by a rebellion of monks, under the leadership of Chroidelela, a Frankish princess and nun at Poitiers, who had rebelled against Leobouva, abbess of St. Croix. She was here called to account for leaving her nunnery, and for the violence which she had committed against Godegeist and other bishops; also for the acts of rebellion which she, in concert with Besina, another nun, had committed against their abbess. Being exhorted to ask forgiveness of the abbess, she boldly refused, and threatened to kill her. The bishops, after consulting the council, declared her to be excommunicated, and ordered that she should remain until she should have done penance. They then re-established the abbess, Leobouva, in the government of the monastery. See Labbé, Concil. v, 1593; Gregor, Turon. Hist. d. France, ix, 4; x, 16, 19; Mansi, Concil. i, 1011; x, 455, 456; Hartlib, Concil. iii, 490, 527, 581; Hefele, Concilienw. ii, 51.

2. Another council was held Jan. 13, 1004, convoked by William V, count of Poitiers and duke of Aquitaine. Five bishops were present, who published three canons:

1. Pronounces those persons to be under anathema who pillage the churches, rob the poor, or strike the clergy; and further declares that if they rebel against this sentence the bishops and barons shall assemble and march against them, ravaging all around them until they submit.

The other two canons forbid bishops to take any fees for penance and confirmation; and priests and deacons to retain women in their houses.

See Labbé, Concil. i, 780.

3. The third council was held in 1078, before cardinal Gerard, the Roman legate, against Berenger. The question of the Holy Eucharist was discussed, and the minds of men were so exasperated against Berenger, that he narrowly escaped with his life. See Labbé, Concil. x, 346.

IV. The fourth was held in 1078, by the legate Hugo, bishop of Die, who, by the account which he gave of this council to pope Gregory VII, seems to have encountered the opposition of his plenary. It is supposed that the king of France had forbidden the count of Poitiers to allow the council to be held within his states: that the archbishop of Tours and the bishop of Rennes had rendered themselves almost complete masters of the council, and that the assembly had been disturbed by the armed followers of these prelates. Some attribute to this council, and others to the following one, ten canons, of which these are the most worthy of note:

1. Forbids to receive investitures at the hands of kings and other princes, even in cases of appeals to the Holy See.

2. Forbids simony and pluralities.

3. Forbids bishops to receive any present for consecrating churches, or for giving any benediction.

4. Forbids monks and canons to purchase churches without the assent of the council.

5. Forbids the ordinance of the children of priests, and of bastard, except they be canons or regular monks.

6. Excommunicates clerics who carry arms, or who deal in arms, shall be excommunicated.

See Labbé, Concil. x, 566.

V. The last council convened at Poitiers was held Nov. 11, 1331. In the order of John and Benedict, the two legates of the holy see, who presided in the place of Pascal II. About eighty bishops and abbots were present.

Noricuscius, bishop of Autun, having been found guilty of simony, was condemned to give up his stole and pastoral ring. Upon his refusal to do so, he was further deposed from his bishopric and from the priesthood, and sentence of excommunication was denounced against him by the legates, as a member of the opposition of many of the bishops and of William, duke of Aquitaine. Lastly, sixteen canons were published:

1. Declares that it is lawful for bishops only to give the teneure (columbar benedictum) to the clergy, and for abbots to do so to monks.
2. Forbids them to require any fee for performing the operation, or even the expenses paid by the layman.
3. Reserves to the bishop the beneficence of the sacred vestments, and of all the vessels, etc., of the altar.
4. Forbids, under excommunication, to buy or sell pews, and to require any allowance (postas) for having given one.
5. Gives permission to regular canons to baptise, preach, administer the sacrament of penance, and bury the dead during their bishop's pleasure.
6. Forbids to allow to three priests who carry about the reliques of saints for the sake of gain.

The pope also nullified the act that the pope had enacted in the Council of Clermont.

See Labbé, Concil. x. 729; Hefele, Conciliengesch. vols. iv and v.

Poix, Louis, A French monastic, was born Oct. 18, 1714, at Croixraut (diocese of Amiens). He devoted himself to the study of the Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac languages, and conceived the design of a Polyglot Bible, to the redaction of which several of his confraterrity (the Capuchin monks) promised to lend a hand. In 1744 the abbot Villery, professor at the College of France, took the direction of this enterprise; but the Bible impatiently expected by the learned world, and in regard to which Benedict XIV addressed a brief of felicitation to Louis de Poix, April 3, 1756, was not published, owing to divers contrarieties which at that time befell the Capuchins. In 1754 Poix wrote a Memorium, in which he advocated the foundation of an institution, without which being a burden to the State, would be of invaluable service to the Church, useful to the learned and men of letters, and honorable to the nation. He proposed the name of "Société Asiatique." During the plan, suggested by him was founded, April 1, 1822, the "Société Asiatique." Louis de Poix died at Paris in 1782.

He published, with the collaboration of several other Capuchins, the following works: Prières que Nercess, Prémontré, donne à la Glive de Russie, pour toutes les âmes fidèles à Jésus-Christ (1770); Propriétés de l'Intelligence des Lières prophétiques (Paris, 1755-56, 16 vols. 12mo.), the fruit of twenty years' labor: Nouvelle Version des Psaumes (ibid. 1762, 2 vols. 12mo.): a Translation of Ecclesiastics (1771, 12mo.): Propriétés de l'Intelligence des Lières prophétiques (Paris, 1755-56, 16 vols. 12mo.); Traité de la Poësie (1764, 12mo.); Traité de la Poësie (1768, 12mo.). He left in manuscript a Dictionnaire Arménien, Latins, Italiens, et Français; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, ii. 585.

Polki, Jehuda, ben-Eliyahu, a Jewish writer of some note, who belonged to the sect of the Karaites, was born and educated at Constantinople in the first half of the 16th century. He made extensive travels through Palestine, Egypt, Iraq, and Persia, and became acquainted with the Karaites. But having no knowledge of the Arabic, he was unable to make use of a large portion of Karaitic literature, as he himself confessed in the preface of his work. In the year 1571 he was at Karah, where he resided, and in the house of the Nasî or head of the Karaites, where he also resided, and was told that all congregations were in possession of such collections, which, however, were very often burned or plundered. He was told that the year before (1570) three hundred very valuable and interesting works of the Karaites had been taken from the synagogue at Karah and burned in the bazaar. Polki finished his work "Hillel we-Yishmael," about 1573, and died in 1575 in his native place. The above-named work, which was published by his son and brother at Constantinople in 1581, treats in a very elaborate way on the laws of incest, the preface of which has been reprinted by Wolf in his Bibl. Hebr. iii. 292 sq. See first, Gesch. des Karaitischen Fusses, 9 sq. (Berlin, 1865), ii. 322 sq. id. Bibl. Polak, Jacob, a Jewish savant, one of the greatest Talmudic authorities in his time, was born about 1460, and died about 1500 at Prague, where under his lead a great Talmudic school had flourished. Polak was a pupil of Jacob Marpola of Nuremberg, from whom he learned a new method of Talmudic casuistry, known as the "Pilpul," in which the time which was disastrous and troublesome to the Jews the study of the Talmud was left to itself, and, guided by no general scientific knowledge, it unavoidably degenerated into a method repulsive to the few who were really profound scholars, or whose minds were less distorted. The transition from the short exposition of words and things which were the timbrel which was to serve the Jews in the study of the Talmud was left to itself, and, guided by no general scientific knowledge, it unavoidably degenerated into a method repulsive to the few who were really profound scholars, or whose minds were less distorted. Polallion, Marie de L'amage, Dame de, a French lady renowned for her piety, and the founder of a religious order, was born Nov. 29, 1599, at Paris. Belonging to a noble and rich family, and having enjoyed a brilliant education, she was wooed by several gentlemen of high standing, but remaining a virgin up to the close of her earthly existence, gave the preference to a life of monastic quiet. At the instigation of Lebrun, a Dominican who directed her conscience, she entered a monastery of the Capuchins. But as the weakness of her health did not suffer her to submit to the austere rules of the order, she was free to leave the monastery, and in 1617 she was married to François de Polallion. Her husband died about a year after, and from this time she lived in retirement as tutor of one of the daughters of the duchess of Orleans. Madame de Polallion, in the midst of the most brilliant court of Europe, remained true to her early monastic habits, and when relieved of her duties sought again her former retreat. According to St. Vincent de Paul, she founded the "Institut des Filles de la Providence" in 1609: the members of this sisterhood undertook to educate the children of the poor in the country. She directly that they should be thirty-three in number, and distributed them in the villages of the environs of Paris. Her own means were soon exhausted by the enterprise, but private charity came to the rescue, and Anne of Austria, taking the institution under her protection, presented it in 1651 with a mansion in the suburb of Saint-Marceau. She also helped in the founding of the "Maison des Nouvelles Catholiques," which was liberally endowed by marshal Turenne. The life of Madame de Polallion has frequently been written. She died Dec. 4, 1657.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xli, 587.

Polanco is the name of three brothers, esteemed Spanish painters of the 16th century, natives of Seville. Francisco Zurbaran was their master, and they were so proficient in art that even in their own time their works were confounded with those of their master. This mistake, says Quillet, has been quite frequent with those who beheld the paintings of San-Esteban at Seville, where Zurbaran painted St. Peter and St. Stephen, but where the Martyrdom of the patron, the Nativity, which is below, St. Hermengild, and St. Hernan, are works of Polanco. They always worked and lived together. Their great paintings adorn the monuments of Seville. At San-Paolo we find the Apparition of the Angels to Abraham; Tobias the Younger guided by an Angel; Jacob Wrestling; Joseph's Dreams; and in the church of the Guardian Angels, St. Theresa in Ecstasy (1649). The last work of Carlo Polanco, who seems to have been the most celebrated of the brothers, bears the date of 1696.—Hoefer, Nouvelles Biographies Générale, xli, 588.

Poland. Ecclesiastical History of. The Polish historians Narusewicz, Friese, Lelewel, and others assert that Christianity was introduced into the Slavic countries at a very early period by some disciples of St. Peter. In Moravia, Lelewel, in his very accurate researches, admits a bishopric of Posen anterior to the time of king Mieszko I. According to Thietmar of Merseburg, the latter, under the influence of his wife Dambrowska, daughter of the Bohemian duke Boleslas, established the Christian religion in Poland in 965, prevailed upon his subjects to destroy the idols, and founded as early as 966, with the assistance of the German emperor Otto the Great, the bishopric of Posen (Posnani), over which, together with the bishoprics of Czestochova, Miastom, Merseburg, Brandenburg, and Havelberg, etc., the jurisdiction was given to the archbishop of Magdeburg, at the Council of Ravneta, in 967. It follows that the year of foundation, 968, given by Boguchalski and the Annales Posnani, has been accepted erroneously. The diocese of the bishop of Posen extended over the dominions of duke Boleslas, the boundaries of which cannot be ascertained for want of documents. Posen was the only Polish bishopric up to the year 1000, when the emperor Otto III, at the time of a pilgrimage to the tomb of St. Adalbert at Gnesen, founded the archiepiscopate of Gnesen (Gdansk), and ordered to it the bishoprics of Kolobrzeg (Kolberg), Czwartan, and Breslau, all then situated in the duchy of Poland. Stanislas Lubianski's assertion that Crakow was the seat of the oldest Polish bishopric is thus proved to be erroneous, as it could not, as an archbishopric, have been a dependence of Gnesen.

Earliest Years.—The history of the ecclesiastical development of Poland in its first Christian century. Pope Gregory VII complained in 1075 of the small number of the bishops in proportion to the population; the dioceses were too large, and the bishops had not enough time to visit their districts. All this was decided about the limits of the diocese of Gnesen and its dependent bishoprics, among which was then counted the bishopric of Liboss, founded by Miechow in 966; but as the city passed continually from Poland to Germany, and vice versa, its existence was a precarious one. It was lost in 1028, and in 1123, it was found that it had been founded a second time in 1123, and subordinated it to Gnesen; documents relating to it date only from 1133. Another episcopal see dependent upon Gnesen was the bishopric of Plock, whose foundation is referred to Boleslas the Great. It was formerly called Ep. Mazoviorum. Gallus (Chron. Pol. ad ann. 1110) mentions a bishop Simeon: he seems to have been ordained in 1107, and to have died in 1129. A great victory of the Poles over the Prussians and Pomeranians is attributed to his intercession. And still another dependent episcopate was that of Leszno, which was founded by Mieszko II (1025-34), on the banks of the Sila, by Boleslas II, son of Boleslas the Great, and originally called Episcopatus Civitatis, because it was intended for the province of Cujavia; extended afterwards over the largest part of Western Prussia, on the left bank of the Vistula; reached from Gnesen to the Vistula; and was bounded west by the archbishopric of Gnesen, which it also incircled on the south. Gallus (Chron. Polonicus) mentions bishop Paulus, who died in 1110. The bishopric of Ermeland, founded in 1243, came to Poland only in 1466. After the reign of Miezko II (1025-34), general anarchy ensued, and at the same time a general apostacy from the Christian faith. Bishops and priests were without authority, some were killed, and external and civil wars robbed Poland of its wealth, and of a considerable part of its population. In 1089 the Bohemian destroyed Posen and Gnesen, and took away the body of St. Adalbert. A multitude of Poles crossed the Vistula and took refuge in Masovia; wild beasts established their lairs in the churches of St. Adalbert and St. Peter. Kazimierz (Casimir) in that great distress arrived with a body of five hundred soldiers from Germany, and by his bravery and intelligence freed the country from foreign occupation. He retained the power until his death, which occurred in 1058. He promoted the interests of Christianity by all the means in his power. He was succeeded by his son, Boleslas II, whose reign was inferior to his army une: he raised his ambition and pride caused his ruin. At Christmas, 1076, he put the diadem on his head, and was anointed by the bishops of the kingdom. About the same time Gregory VII sent a legate to Poland. A few years afterwards, in 1079, the king, being put under interdict by St. Stanislas, bishop of Cracow, avenged himself by the murder of the prelate. Heretupon the nobility expelled him, and he was obliged to take refuge in Hungary, where he died. He was succeeded by his younger brother, Boleslas Wladislas Hermann, who lived in peace with his neighbors and the clergy, to whom he granted rights and privileges. Having lived many years in childless matrimony with the Bohemian princess Judith, a son was granted him, in consequence of the intercession, it was believed, of St. Agnus. This son was afterwards Boleslas, called Boleslas the Great. At the time Otto, afterwards the apostle of Pomerania, lived at the Polish court. He was instrumental in bringing about Wladislas Herrmann's second marriage with Judith, the widowed sister of the emperor Henry IV. In 1099 the Polish archbishop Czeslaw (Kazimierz) and bishops were exiled, and Boleslas, with permission of the king, dieted his states during his lifetime between Boleslas and Boleslas Wladislas Hermann, who lived in peace with his neighbors and the clergy, to whom he granted rights and privileges. Having lived many years in childless matrimony with the Bohemian princess Judith, a son was granted him, in consequence of the intercession, it was believed, of St. Agnus. This son was afterwards Boleslas, called Boleslas the Great. At the time Otto, afterwards the apostle of Pomerania, lived at the Polish court. He was instrumental in bringing about Wladislas Herrmann's second marriage with Judith, the widowed sister of the emperor Henry IV. In 1099 the Polish archbishop Czeslaw (Kazimierz) and bishops were exiled, and Boleslas, with permission of the king, and another illegitimate son, Zbiigniew. The latter had lived a few years before, and was pardoned at the intercession of the bishops. Wladislaus died in 1192, at Panshel, the Pope calling the son of the heir, Mieszko III, the future Boleslas II. He married a Russian princess, and undertook expeditions, considered in the light of crusades, against the pagan Pomeranians. In 1103 Walo, chosen bishop of Beuvaus, and, after his return, bishop of Paris, came to Poland as the legate of pope Paschal II, and in his zeal for justice deposed two bishops—"nullo vel precce vel pretio subvenientes." In 1109 Boleslas reported such a complete victory over the Pomeranians that, of their 40,000 warriors, 10,000 only escaped; he took the stronghold of Nakel, thus preparing the way for the spiritual expedition under the imperial banner; and in the last years of the great king were less successful. In 1135 Boleslas recognised at Merseburg the emperor Lothair as his liege lord for Pomerania and Rügen; promised a tribute for twelve years, and carried the sword of the emperor to the imperial cathedral church. In 1139 he divided his dominions among the four oldest of his sons, and died Oct. 28, 1139. In 1128 the papal legate Egidius, bishop of Tuscenum, sent by Calixtus II, had to establish more distinctly the limits between the dioceses, and this division greatly increased the temporal sovereignty in nowise affected the Church. But the Church was far from enjoying in Poland the privileges she possessed in other parts of Christian Europe. Her goods and subjects stood under the secular laws; there was no immunity from taxes, and the bishops were altogether dependent on the princes. Still at the beginning of the 13th century the princes disposed of the prebends of the cathedrals, and took hold of the goods of the bishops at their demise, as the patrons did of the heritage of curates. A number of priests lived in concubines. There were considerable charges at the elections of bishops, which had become, in some sense, the possession of certain families. The disensions of the successors of Boleslas, as was to be expected, dismembered the empire after a century of bloodshed. Prussians, Lithuanians, Mongols, and other tribes devastated the country. The authority of the Church, already undermined by the papacy, appeared more frequently, synods became more frequent too, and altogether the Church sought for herself the rights she had long attained elsewhere. The Templars, assisted by Crusaders from the West, attacked the pa gans of the country, and the Latin Church, as it were, the Western Christians to arms against the barbarians. In 1157 the emperor Frederick I indicted a crusade of the Germans against Poland, to re-establish the tie of vassalage that once united the land with Germany. The Poles were defeated, and Boleslas appeared at Krynówko before the emperor barefooted, and with a naked sword tied around his neck. Wladislaus died in Germany, and was succeeded by Boleslas IV, who died in 1173, leaving an only son, Leszek; but it was his brother Mieszko who succeeded him. The people, led by the bishop of Kraków, invoked against Mieszko, and his younger brother, Casimir Sprawiedliwy (the Just), was put in his place. In 1180 there was a synod of Polish bishops. They threatened with indiget whoever should rob the peasants of their stores, appropriate the heritage of an ecclesiastic, or refuse to marry within a certain wherewithal. Church property had been taken. At Cracow, who died May 4, 1194, at table, while talking with the bishops about salvation—"non sine venenii suspicioe." Fulko assembled the prelates, and prevailed upon them to recognise the sons of Casimir. Helena, Casimir's widow, made arrangements with the Poles; the minor sons, recognised him as archduke, and left him Cracow: her son Leszek was to be his successor. This Mieszko II, who died 1202 at Kalisch, and Leszek waived in favor of his son Wladislaus his own rights to Cracow. In these years the endeavors of the popes for the reformation of the Polish Church were crowned with some success. Clement III sent in 1189 cardinal Giovanni Malabranca to collect contributions for a crusade, and reform the clergy of Poland; several regulations for that purpose were agreed upon at the Synod of Cracow. Cardinal Peter canet came there in 1192; but it was not until 1197, when the Pope and the King were in Prague, that the edict against the matrimony of clergy was confirmed, the wrath of the clergy so great that his life was put in danger. He held another synod at Cracow, where he insisted on the same views; journeyed through the bishoprics, giving his attention to a dereliction of moral morals more deplorable than the marriage of ecclesiastics, and traditional with the Poles: for he besought the laymen to seek some consecration for their wild copulations. He made slow work of it, and it required all the energies of archbishop Henry Kemelius to establish, little by little, a more Christian spirit in the Polish clergy. A last cardinal, Peter, bishop of Poznan, was freely elected by the chapter of Posen. The dukes at that time promised to touch nothing of the heritage of prelates save gold, silver, etc., and waived their judicary rights on clergymen and their subjects. In 1231 Wladislaus, the Good, became the only Elector of Great Poland. At this epoch some crusades against the Prussians took place, and the Poles, though slowly and reluctantly, had a part in them. We find the same bishoprics in the 13th and 14th centuries, but not in those dim metaphors by which the interest of the Church required (see Gregory VII, Epist. ad Bo delaum, Pol. regem, lxxiii)). The first bishop of Posen, Jordan, and the duke Boleslas Chrobry distinguished themselves by their successful attempts to expand the Christian faith; Bodzants, archbishop of Gnesen, in the 14th century, by the conversion of the barbarians of Lithuania and Samogitia. This prelate extended his diocese, augmented by a half, over Pomerollia and Neringa, and added Silesia to his spiritual dominions: in one word, the country between the Netze River, the Vistula, the sources of the Vistula, the Koire, the Samb, and the Golen, constituted the territory of his arch episcopal see. In consequence of these aggressions the new bishoprics of Wilna, in the grand-duchy of Lithuania, and of Wornie and Mienikli, in the duchy of Samogitia, were established—the first in 1187, the latter in 1417. The Reformation Period and Since.—In order to make clear the history of the Polish Church in the Reformation period, it is necessary to retrace our steps to the 11th century. The Reformation Period and Since.—In order to make clear the history of the Polish Church in the Reformation period, it is necessary to retrace our steps to the 11th century. It was then that the neighboring churches of Germany acquired a great influence over the Poles, while particularly from Germany, to Poland, built everywhere convents and churches, and at the same time used the Romish ritual in opposition to the simple worship of the Polish national churches, which, however, maintained their ground till the 14th century. The Hussites (q. v.) from Bohemia found a favorable field in Poland for the propagation of their peculiar tenets, and the Romish clergy in consequence took active measures for the purpose of checking the spread of the obnoxious doctrines. With this view the parish priests were ordered to seize and bring before the bishops all who were suspected of holding Hussite sentiments. Severe enactments were passed for the punishment of the heretics. But in the face of all opposition the new doctrines were embraced by some of the nobler families in the land, and the refuting party indeed was very numerous when their leader was slain on the field of battle. But although the doctrines of Huss had found many supporters in Poland, the national feeling was still in favor of the dominant Church. We appeal to the account of the progress of Protestantism in Poland dependent largely on Gardiner, "Dictionary of Religion," p. 670 sq.

"In the commencement of the 15th century a powerful impulse was given to the cause of Polish education and literature by the establishment of the University of Cracow, and the encouragement given in that seminary to national literature. Nevertheless, the doctrines of Protestantism spread in all the other parts of his dominions without persecuting those who embraced the new faith. Indeed, even in Dunlop's account of the Reformation, in the course of a few years, began to be again preached openly. The walls were not sufficient to check its progress, so that in the subsequent reign it became the dominant creed of that city, without, however, losing up on the religious liberty of the Roman Catholics.

"The works of Luther found many readers, and even admirers among the nobility and gentry, composed of both clergy and laymen, met frequently to discuss re-ligious questions. The Universities of Cracow, Lemberg, and other places became centers of the Reformation, which the rise of the Reformation brought prominently before the public mind. It was in connection with this period of the history of Poland that the great Reformation of the nation began to be talked of, as a creed by several individuals, and the foundation laid in Poland for that sect whose members were afterwards known by the name of Socinians (q. v.). The spread of this heresy, however, was limited to the upper classes of society. During the middle ages, sectarians and heretics were not permitted to hold public recitations or meetings; and their number was small. The synagogues of the Reformers found ready acceptance; a result in no small degree owing to the arrival of Bohemian Brethren, to the number of about a thousand, who had been driven from their own country, and found a home in the province of Posen. This event happened in 1534, and the public worship of the Brethren being conducted in the Bohemian language, which was intelligible to the Polish people, at once gained many followers. The sympathies of multitudes. The Roman bishop of Posen, alarmed at the influence which the Brethren were exerting, and determined to procure such legislation as would maintain a royal edict for their expulsion from the country. This order they immediately obeyed, and proceeded to Roskow.1095 After the death of Frederick, in 1535, however, some of them returned to Poland, where they remained, and established themselves among the Polish nobility. They refused to follow the law which limited their labors without being molested in any form. Their congregations rapidly increased, and in a short time they reduced to virtual effect many of the principles of Great Poland alone, while many others were formed in different parts of the country.

"A dream of the Poles about this time which was providentially overruled for the still wider diffusion of Protestantism was established at the University of Cracow, having taken offence at some real or imagined affront offered them by the rector, repaired in person to the University, and obtained the resignation of the bishop of Cracow, by which the new majority of them returned home imbued with Protestant principles. The Reformed doctrine now made extraordinary progress, particularly in the province of Cracow. In vain did the Polish clergy denounce the growing heresy; all their remonstrances were unsatisfactory, and at length they convened a general synod in 1551 to consider the whole subject. On this occasion the solid body which had been the subject of all the diocesan orders, and had been presided over by the archbishop, was speedily separated, and the person of the bishop was transferred to the episcopalsee of Cracow, and the title of archbishop was made the exclusive right of the pope. This was the state of affairs in 1552 when the diet was convened; and scarcely had its deliberations been commenced, when a general hostility was excited by the members to the episcopal Inquisition. The result was that at this diet religious liberty for all confessions was virtually established in Poland. At the diet of 1596 the king was earnestly urged to cooperate the national synod with the help of the pope, which was at once called, and the pope gave his assent. It was proposed, also, to invite to this assembly the most distinguished Reformers, such as Calvin, Beza, Melan- chthon, and others. The latter proposal met with the approval of the diet of Prussia, and the Reformers in Poland were chiefly turned towards John a Lasco of the University of Cracow, and some of his colleagues, with the view of publishing the cause of the Reformation in Germany, Switzerland, and England. For a long time he remained within the limits of the province of Prussia and the neighboring States of Austria, and was kept in close contact with many of the Protestant princes in various parts of Europe, several of whom invited him to take up his residence in their dominions to assist them in their enterprises. It was with the object of complete the reformation of the Church in that country, prevailed upon Lasco to allow himself to be nom-
The establishment of a Reformed Polish Church was much impeded by the dissensions which divided the Protestants among themselves. When, however, less than three parties existed in Poland, each adhering to its own denomination. The Waldensian Confession had its own ardent admirers, chiefly in Great Poland; the Genevese or Calvinistic Confession in Lwów, and the Lutheran or Augsburg Confession in towns inhabited by Germans of the Bohemian and Moravian races. The Genevese Confession was received almost at all points, that their respective supporters found no difficulty in forming a union in 1555, not indeed incorporating it in one body, but holding spiritual fellowship, each Church retaining its own separate hierarchy. This union being the first which took place under Henry II, the protector of the Reformation, caused great joy among the Reformers in different parts of Europe. The two churches thus united wished to lucidate also the alliance but the doctrines of the Augsburg Confession on the subject of the Eucharist seemed likely to prove an insuperable obstacle in the way, as the Lutheran churches for an attempt, however, was made to effect so desirable an object. In this effort, the Bohemian and Genevans churches of Poland were convoked in 1557, and presided over by John Asko. At this synod overtures were made by the Bohemians to join the Lutherans, but to no effect, and they still continued to accuse the Bohemian Church of heresy. The obstacles thus thrown in the way of the two churches by the Tartar man and for two centuries the Bohemians to exert themselves still more actively for its attainment. They forwarded copies of their Confession of Faith to the Protestant princes of Germany, and to the chief Reformers, both of that country and of Switzerland, and received strong testimonials of approval—so strong, indeed, as to silence for a time the objections of the Lutherns. Shortly, however, the good understanding between the two churches was interrupted by demands of some Polish Lutheran divines that the other Protestant denominations should subscribe the Confession of Augsburg. The Bohemians, therefore, in 1558, submitted their confession to the University of Wittenberg, which, having received from that learned body a strong expression of their approbation, which so operated upon the minds of the Lutherns that from that time they ceased to charge the Bohemians with heresy and impurity.

The long-desired union was at length effected in 1570, and the treaty of union of Sandomir, in April of that year, finally concluded and signed the terms of union under the name of the Consensus of Sandomir, (q.v.) to which the last act of the utmost alarm among the Romanists, who endeavored to bring it into disharmony, was to union itself to the substantially whole church and perfect.

The confession, which had been effected, differed on a point of vital importance: the power of Christ in the Eucharist. The union, accordingly, was rather nominal than real; and many Lutherans directed their whole efforts towards bringing it about that the disruption of the alliance which had been established at Sandomir. This hostility of the Lutherns to the union, therefore, was very considerable and injurious to the interests of Protestantism in general, and a number of noble families, followed by thousands of the common people, disdained with the bitter contumacies which raged among the Protestants of different denominations, denounced the principles of the Reformation, and returned to the Church of Rome. Another circumstance which tended to weaken the Protestant Church of Poland was the rise of a sect called Socinians, a movement of great numbers of foreigners, who sought an asylum from religious persecution. Among these, besides many Italian and French refugees, there were a good number of Scotch families settled in different parts of Poland, having escaped from the authority of the Church of Rome, but even in the national Church, and in the national Church itself, not only was the prime favorite, but the main portion of the clergy, even of the Inquisitors, and a considerable proportion of the laity, would have welcomed any proposal to correct the flagrant abuses which prevailed, had not the Church of Rome, by the authority of the Church of Rome, and the king gave him a written testimony in favor of that protest.

Henry IV passed the fears of the Protestants were far from being allayed, and they resolved carefully to watch the conduct of the new monarch, who, besides being a Protestant, was a member of the Protestant party, insisted that on that solemn occasion the crown should be kissed, not even in the midst of the ceremony, when the crown was about to be placed on Henry's head, Firly boldly advanced the matter, and, standing, kissing in the name of the Protestants of that, unless the Polish oath was taken, the coronation would not even be allowed, the whole being decided in favor of the king, put into the king's hand as he knelt on the steps of the altar, and taking, the crown, said in the Polish language, "If you shall not swear, you shall not reign."

The Intrepid conduct of the Protestant leader struck the
The assembly with awe, and the king had no alternative but to accept it. The country, with the consent of the Polish nobility, was saved from utter overthrow, and the nation delivered from an impending civil war.

The Polish nobility, in its turn, saw the favor of the monarch, formed projects for extending their influence, and, as a result, the power of the country. Henry had become a ready tool in the hands of the priests. This feeling, combined with distrust, and the desire to replace the Roman Catholic religion, led to the suppression of the Jesuits in Poland.

The queen, who had so much strength, was able to suppress the Jesuits. In 1566, when Sigismund III, in whose reign the Roman party acquired power, and the Jesuits were suppressed, the nobility became disaffected with the general confession, and sought to devise schemes for its suppression. The Jesuits had so much influence in the country that Poland was finally united to the Polish Catholic Church.

Stephen Batory, prince of Transylvania, who had earned so high a reputation, was immediately succeeded by the new monarch. For all opposition from the Roman clergy, he was elected by the diet of the Protestants, and, as a result, the Jesuits were suppressed. The Jesuits were expelled from the country, and all the offices of state and posts of honor were abolished in the country.

The Jesuits were expelled from the country, and all the offices of state and posts of honor were abolished in the country. This action was followed by a general insurrection, which was put down by the Jesuits and other religious bodies. The Jesuits were again suppressed, and all the offices of state and posts of honor were abolished in the country.

abolishing all the restrictions imposed in later times. But such favorable circumstances were of short continuance, as soon as news from his throne by Peter, the czar of Russia, and Augustus II again restored to his kith and kin the fruits of his labors, which were only terminated by the mediation of Peter the Great, who concluded a treaty at Warsaw in 1716, into which the Romanists were introduced, and to get a close inserted into the following effect: That all the Protestant churches which had been built since 1703 should be demolished, and that the Romanists should be permitted to remain except in places where they had churches previously to the above-meantioned laws. Foreign ministers were allowed to have divine service in their dwellings, but the native who should come to them would be subjected to the above-mentioned penalties.

The terms of this treaty excited feelings of discontent and alarm, not only in the minds of the Protestants, but also of the more enlightened portion of the Roman Cathol.

acters of Poland in 1713, which lasted from 1713 to 1723, the Protestant was melancholy in the extreme; and, despairing of relief from every other quarter, they threw themselves under the patronage of foreign preachers, by whose interference they were admitted, in 1717, to equal rights with the Roman Catholics. This was followed by the abolition of the Order of the Jesuits in 1773. Augustus had throughout his reign kept Poland in a state of subservience to Russia, and he added his successor to the Austrian on the throne. When Catherine II, empress of Russia, obtained possession of the Polish Russian province, part of the people accepted the covenant of the Greek Church, and part joined the Russian Church. Even the most bigoted Romanists were galled under this course, so that when, in 1793, the higher clergy of Lithuania and White Russia declared the readiness of their people to join the Russian-Greek Church and, according, these Uniates, or United Greeks, to the number of 2,000,000, were received back into the Muscovite branch of the Eastern Church on their solemn disavowal of the pope's supremacy, and declaration of their belief in the sole Headship of Christ over his Church.

The authorities of the determined to force the infallibility dogma on the Church of Rome has had its damaging consequences on Episcopal Christianity in Poland and Russia. After the encyclical of 1784 the Russian government saw itself forced to urge the union with the Russian Church on the Polish Christians of the Uniate. Several pope has confirmed to the United Greeks the privileges of the use of the vernacular tongue and the marriage of the clergy, and of the protestant movement, which, however, had been introduced by some of the clergy, tending to assimilation to Rome, the government has often been in the habit of thing said to the Vatican. When the encyclical came to the papal, only two ways seemed to be open—either to submit to the new orders or openly defy them. In Sedletz the decision was prompt, and one sixth of the whole population of the government determined to ask the "White Czar" to admit them into his Church. Though the parish priests in no case commenced the movement, when once it had once taken root they joined their forces. The government took no notice of the first petition sent in till convinced that the movement was perfectly spontadaneous and not under the influence of the secular authorities, the emperor authorized the governor-general of Warsaw to admit them into the Russian Church; and on Sunday, Jan. 26, the public ceremony was performed in the square in the town of Sedletz. Of the 50,000 people admitted, 36 were priests. The first part of the ceremony was that of the柴, to which the archbishop of Warsaw proceeded, with all the deferent priests and deacons from the forty-five parishes, and where a sol-den act of consecration was performed in the parish church.

The Berlin correspondent of the London Times, under date of Dec. 22nd, 1825, writes: "The box movement in steady process in Poland, and will very shortly lead to the extinction of the Catholic Church. Nearly 250,000 persons in the provinces of Stedos, Litwini, Suwalki, and Lomza have already embraced the established faith of the empire. The number of Catholics is not less than 30,000, and as the priests who are adverse to the movement are running away to Galicia, the last trace of the sect has disappeared. The political advantage accru-ing to the Russian government from this wholesome conversion of a religious community, half Roman Catholic and half Greek, cannot well be overrated. Not only are they all their adherents, but the emperor empowers them to establish schools in the parishes, and to have in each a schoolmaster, at the expense of the state; but this, in 1824, was followed up by the commencement of a German

POLAND, MISSION AMONG THE JEWS IN. The Polish mission was commenced by the London Society for promoting Christianity among the Jews in 1821. The first missionaries there were the late Dr. A. de Saulcy, a graduate of the University of Leyden, and Dr. Radzyń, of the University of Dublin, and the Rev. W. F. Becker. The centre of their operation was made in Warsaw. For a while all seemed promising, but the missionaries were compelled for a time to quit Warsaw. Early in the year 1822 the missionaries were summoned to appear before the "Commission of the Religious Confession," and had to sign a protocol as to what was their object, of which it was said that it would be sent to St. Petersburg. Learning, however, that the answer which would be given them would be that foreign missions were not permitted in Poland, and that the Jews wished to be converted there were priests enough for that purpose, the missionaries—in order to avoid being sent out of the country, and hoping to get permission from the emperor Alexander—left Warsaw and went to Berlin. The permission was granted for Poland, but also for Russia. The first two missions were now joined by two others, Media, Wends and Hof, and in the winter of 1822 missionary operations were fairly commenced at Warsaw. In the year 1825 a service according to the ritual of the Church of England was established in the Reformed Church of Warsaw, and having received ordination in England; and this, in 1828, was followed up by the commencement of a German mission among the Jews in Poland.

service in the same place in the afternoon. As the labor increased two more missionaries were sent, Messrs. Reichardt and Wermelskirch. Visits were paid to various towns, and for a time Lublin was made the scene of the mission. Chief ware among the "Cherem," or Jewish excommunication, pronounced against those who should have any intercourse with the missionaries, the work went on with great blessings, and in the year 1851 the number of those who were baptized through the mission in Poland was 926, some of which were subsequently received in the Church. We have now brought the history of the Polish mission down to that period when the door was closed against it. The war of England with Russia effected this change, for it could not reasonably be expected, while this war was carried on, that an English mission, however peaceful its object, would be tolerated in the very heart of the Russian empire, and indications were not wanting that soon its work was to cease. Various tracts about to be printed, which had already received the sanction of the Consistory, were unaccountably detained at the censor's office; and in the month of May, 1854, "the missionaries in Warsaw were summoned before the Russian authorities to receive various injunctions and restrictive orders on pain of being expelled from the country. One of these was at first to offer no correspondence with the committee to the Russian government, who promised to forward it to London; and to circulate no books, not even the Bible, among Christians. The letters and journals were from that time submitted as printed, but never reached London. This state of things continued in all the other Polish cities, and the missionaries were again summoned to appear before the Russian authorities to hear an imperial order read, which imposed upon them and their brethren in the country the discontinuance of all missionary work from that day, and to be prepared to leave the country in three weeks, viz. on the 18th of May, the New-year's day of the Russian Church."

Thus closed the Polish mission, just three weeks before the death of the Russian emperor, a mission which had not been in vain, for, besides the 861 members of the house of Israel who were admitted by baptism into the Christian Church, more than 10,000 people of different languages, and upwards of 10,000 New Testament sheets have been circulated, of which many had come into the hands of Jews.

The missionary work which had thus been suspended for over twenty years was again resumed in the year 1877, permission having been granted by the present emperor. To the Rev. J. C. Hartmann, one of the oldest missionaries of the society, was intrusted the temporary charge of the mission-field at Warsaw, where about 100,000 Jews reside, divided between the Talmudists, Chasidim, and Reformers. According to the latest report of 1877, the Warsaw station is now occupied by the Revs. O. J. Ellis and H. H. F. Hartmann, son of the above, N. D. Rapport, A. E. Eiland, and a colporteur. Pole (22), nē, a flagstaff, Numb. xxi. 8, 9; hence the flag or standard itself, "sign," "banner," etc., as elsewhere.

Pole, Reginald, a famous English cardinal, who figures so prominently in the English Reformation period, upon whose character rests the stigma of duplicity and selfishness, and against whom both Protestants and Romanists have written in censure or praise, was descended from royal blood, being a younger son of Sir Richard Pole, lord Mowbray, who was created king's prelate by Henry VII, and Margaret, daughter of George, the duke of Clarence, and younger brother to king Edward IV. Pole was born at Stourton Castle, Staffordshire, in March, 1503. When seven years old he was sent to the Carthusian monks at Sheen for instruction. At twelve he became a student at Magdalen College, Oxford, where the famous Linacre and Will. Latimer, two great masters of Latin and Greek, were his teachers. At fifteen he took the B.A. and entered into deacon's orders, and several years later that Luther began to preach against indulgences, Pole was made prebendar of St. John's priory, to which preferment the deanery of Exeter and others were soon after added by king Henry VIII, who greatly admired Pole, and desired his elevation to the highest ecclesiastical dignity. At the age of nineteen Pole went to Italy, there to continue his studies, and was by the king afforded support suitable to his rank. He visited different universities, and finally rested at Padua, where he entered a distinguished group of scholars, among whom were Leonius, a great philosopher and theologian, Longino, a poet, and Lapset, a learned Englishman. These masters were his constant companions, and they have told us how he became the delight of that part of the world for his learning, politeness, and piety. From Padua he went to Venice, where he continued for some time, and then visited other parts of Italy. Having spent five years abroad, he was recalled home; but being desirous to see the jubilee, which was celebrated this year at Rome, he went to that city: whence, passing by Florence, he returned to England, where he arrived about the end of 1555. He was received by the queen, and, through the influence of the great nobility with great affection and honor, and was highly esteemed, not only on account of his learning, but for the sweetness of his nature and politeness of his manners. Devotion and study, however, being what he so delighted in, he retired to his old habitation among the Carthusian monks at Sheen, and spent the two years in the free enjoyment of them. In 1559, when.
king Harry determined upon his divorce from Catharine of Aragon, Pole, foreseeing the troubles consequent upon this, and how he must needs be involved in them, resolved to withdraw, and obtained leave of his majesty to go to Rome. He proceed to his seat near Rome, prosecuting the affair of the divorce, and sending to the most noted universities in Europe for their opinion upon the illegitimacy of his marriage, commanded him to concourse with his agents in procuring the approval for his contemplated step from the faculty of the University of Paris. Pole left the affair to the commissioners, excusing himself to the king as unfit for the employ, since his studies had lain another way. Henry was angry, upon which Pole returned to England in order to pacify him; but failing in this, and unwilling to make a tool of himself to the king in his questionable designs, Pole returned to Spain, where he continued two years. It has been asserted that scruples of conscience and of religion were not his only motive: that, though a priest, he was not without hope of marrying the princess Mary Tudor, and that it was not without such views that Catharine of Aragon had committed the education of her daughter to his mother, the countess of Salisbury. Henry at length perceiving that the court of Rome resolved to oppose the affair of the divorce by means to shake off their authority, and to rely upon his own subjects. Pole was again pressed, but as steadfastly refused as before, even under the temptation of being made archbishop of York if he should comply with the king's demands. The king having dismissed Pole in anger, he consulted his safety by leaving the kingdom, and resigned the company of the distinguished men he had known abroad. The first year he spent at Avignon; but as his health declined there he went to Padua, making now and then excursions to his friends at Venice. The literary circle in which he moved was formed by Caraffa (Paul IV), Sadoletto, Gilberto, Fregoso, archbishop of Salerno, Bembo, and Contarini. These men even embraced the doctrine of justification, and in their social meetings discussed the means of reforming the papacy—their great principle being to preserve the unity of the Church under the papal government. In Italy, during the reign of Henry VIII, Reginald Pole rose to great distinction, and on the accession of Paul III in 1534 was raised to the cardinalate, as were his friends just mentioned. Thus the days passed very agreeably in Italy, while fresh troubles were arising there. Henry had not only divorced Catharine, but married Anne Boleyn, and resolved to throw off the papal yoke and assert his right to the supremacy, with the title of Supreme Head of the Church. To this end he procured a book to be written in defence of that title by Sampson, bishop of Chichester, which he was ready to fulfill the promises made by him to the pope if Francis assisted him without afterthought. Francis, in his turn, protested his good-will, but, beheld the legate not to enter his states if he did not bring some positive proof of the emperor's sincerity. After carrying on negotiations for several months, Pole came to the conclusion that he was being deluded on both sides, and advised the pope to wait patiently for a better opportunity to turn up in the course of political events. His share in these negotiations proved fatal to his relations. Henry wreaked his savage vengeance on him in person. Pole was not only divorced from Catharine, and his aged mother, lady Salisbury, who was dragged to the scaffold May 17, 1541. The second brother of the cardinal, Sir Geoffrey, saved his life by revealing the secrets of his relations and friends. In 1539 cardinal Pole was sent to Vincenza, where, on the exercise of his ecclesiastical functions, in 1542, he was dispossessed by his piety, the encouragement he gave to letters, and his tolerance towards the Protestants. In 1545 he repaired to Trent, under strong escort, to superintend the works preparatory to the council. After the death of Henry (1547), he wrote to the Privy Council in Rome, with the legislature of the Catholic communion, and to Edward VI in justification of his acts; but his letters were left unopened. Pole's book, De uniate ecclesiastica, was published in Rome in 1556; and though, as Burnet says, "it was more esteemed for the high quality of the author than for any sound reasoning in it," it yet gave most certain proof of his invincible attachment and zeal for the see of Rome, and was therefore sufficient to build the strongest confidence upon. Accordingly Pole was employed in negotiations and transactions of high concernment, was consulted by the pope in all affairs relating to kings and sovereign princes, was made one of his legates at the Council of Trent, and, lastly, his penman when occasion required. Thus, for instance, when the pope's power to remove that council was contested by the emperor, his wishes were consulted, and his name among them Pole, went to represent England. In vain his mother, brothers, and friends tried to dissuade him from going to Rome.

After some wavering, the exhortations of his friend Contarini prevailed over the fears of his family, and he went to Rome in 1586. There he was, against his earnest wish, created cardinal, Dec. 22, 1586. Two months afterward, Feb. 15 (1587) Pope Sixtus V passed the legate on the other side of the Alps, and sent him on a most delicate and dangerous errand. The rebellion of the northern Catholics against Henry VIII seemed to the pope a favorable occasion to attempt the reconciliation of England with the Roman see. The legate's instructions were to promote a good understanding between the emperor and the king of France, to establish himself in the Netherlands, and if circumstances allowed of such a course to pass over to England. Scurrely had he passed, and stood only at Cambrai. The regent here refused to allow him to enter the Netherlands; though he did stay with the prince-bishop of Liège, he was obliged to make his way back to Rome (August, 1587). At the same time Henry VIII set a price of fifty thousand crowns on his head, and promised to the emperor a subsidy of £150,000 a year in consideration of his extrication. If the pope had had up to that time shrunk from extreme measures against the schism of England, it was because he felt powerless to put them into execution. Having succeeded in restoring peace between the two great rulers of the Continent, he at last published his bull of excommunication. Pole was sent in secret mission to the courts of Spain and France; but, forestalled by the English agents, he could only get evasive answers. Charles, at Toledo, declared, that he had more urgent business to attend to, but that he was ready to fulfill the promises made by him to the pope if Francis assisted him without afterthought. Francis, in his turn, protested his good-will, but, beheld the legate not to enter his states if he did not bring some positive proof of the emperor's sincerity.
POLE

We come not to condemn, but reconcile;
We come not to compel, but call again;
We come not to destroy, but edify.

Nor yet to question things already done:
These are forgiven—matters of the past—
And range with justice and with offence thrown Into the blind sea of forgetfulness.

(Queen Mary, act iii, scene iii).

In a later scene he makes bishop Gardiner (q. v.) the persecutor, and Pole the advocate and friend of the heretic:

"Indeed, I cannot follow with your grace;
Rather would say—the shepherd doth not kill
The sheep that wander from his fold, but sends
His careful dog to bring them to the fold."

(Act III, scene iv).

There is somewhat to favor this interpretation of Pole's acts.
After the death of pope Julius, and his successor Marcellus, who rapidly followed him to the grave, the queen recommended Pole to the popedom; but Peter Caraffa, who took the name of Paul IV, was elected before her despatches arrived. This pope, who had never liked our cardinal, was pleased with Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, whose temper exactly tallied with his own; and therefore favored his views and projects, suspecting a design in queen Mary to marry Pole, contrived means to stop his progress; nor did he arrive in England till November, 1554, when his marriage with Philip of Spain was completed. (The English ecclesiastical historian thinks that Pole was delayed by bishop Gardiner, who himself disdained this distinguished post.) On his arrival Pole was conducted to the archbishop's palace at Lambeth, Cranmer being then attainder and imprisoned; and on the 28th went to the Parliament and made a long and grave speech, inviting them to a reconciliation with the apostolic see, for which purpose, he said, he was sent by the common pastor of Christendom. This speech of Pole occasioned some motion in the queen, which she vainly thought was a child quickened within her womb; so that she put forward some resolution, some not scrupling to say that as John the Baptist leaped in his mother's womb at the salutation of the Virgin, so here the like happiness attended the salutation of Christ's vicar. The Parliament being absolved by Pole, all went to the royal chapel, where the Te Deum was sung on the occasion; and thus, the pope's authority being now restored, the cardinal, two days afterwards, made his public entry into London, with all the solemnities of a legate, and presently set about reforming the Church and freeing it from heresy. In convocation assembled, in which by which, 1, churches, hospitals, and schools founded during the schisms should be preserved; 2, persons who had married at unlawful degrees without dispensation should be considered as legitimately united; 5, buyers of ecclesiastical property should not be disturbed in their possession. But such a triumph did not satisfy the fanatics. Encouraged by the chancellor, Gardiner, they filled England during four years with those horrors which left forever a bloody stain on Mary's memory. Pole had formerly been suspected of favoring the Reformation, but was exemplary piety and charity, as well as generosity becoming his birth. Though by nature he was more inclined to study and contemplation than to active life, yet he was prudent and dexterous in business, so that he would have been a finished character had not his superstitious devotion to the see of Rome been from the path his own convictions marked out to him. Burnet, who has drawn Pole in very favorable colors, acknowledges this fault in the great cardinal. Froude's delineation of Pole as a narrow-minded and fanatical bigot is precisely the reverse; for Pole, like his friend Contarini, was a leading member of that moderate party of Romanists who, though they dreaded the disruption of Christendom, desired a reform not only in the discipline but also in the doctrine of the Church. From this position he was only scared by fear of losing his mind. This betrays a weakness, it is true, but..."
rather of ambition than of fanaticism or narrow-mindedness. It is, besides, unjust to make Pole the sole responsible party for the persecutions which were inaugurated; for Fox (vii, 308) has furnished clear evidence against such an insinuation. He even gives two instances in which Pole personally interfering to save Protestants from execution. All that Pole did, even at the work was to suffer the law to take its course, and not preventing what he knew should not have been done. But, of course, this is bad enough; we only desire that it be made no worse. Hook has taken a view very much dependent on Froude. In the instructions which Pole was putting out at the time of his decease for the clergy, and in the devotional books which he was putting together for his people, it is hard to find anything but good-sense, deep piety, and hearty benevolence.

Pole wrote various controversial and theological tracts, besides the work above referred to. Among these publications are: Liber de Concilio (Venet. 1562, 8vo, and elsewhere); Reformatio Anglica ex Decreto Ignatis Sedis Apostolicae Legati anno MDLVI (Rome, 1562, 4to); one of the most elegant pieces of composition in the Latin language, and which, for perspicuity, good-sense, and solid reasoning, is equal to the importance of the occasion on which it was written (Philips, Sacred Literature); De Summo Pontifice Christi in Terris, a discourse on pontifical duties; a Treatise of Justification (London, 1563, 4to); this work is reprinted to have been “found among the writings of cardinal Pole.” See Hume, Hist. of England, ch. xxxvii (very favorable); Froude, Hist. of England, vi, 369 sq.; Collier, Eccles. Hist. of England (see Index in vol. vii); Secker's History of the Church of England, ii, 575 sq.; Soames, Hist. of the Ref., i, 251 sq.; ii, 185 sq., 229 sq., 327 sq., 357 sq.; iv, 66 sq., 77, 238, 495, 545 sq., 577 sq., 595; Foukken, De Chirkidum, i, § 68; Hook, Lives of the Archbishop of Canterbury (Lond. 1689), vol. iii; Hackett, History of the Reformation and Reconciliation of the Church with Christ, bohm. Pole-axes were the ensigns of legates a latere, carried with silver pillars (gal. ii) before cardinals Wolsey and Pole.

Polehampton, Henry Stedman, an English divine, was born in 1524, and educated at Pembroke College, Oxford. He took holy orders, and was ordained deacon in 1548; in the year following became assistant curate of St. Chad's, Shrewsbury; in 1553 chaplain in the service of M. Fitzjames, bishop of Shrewsbury. During the great Sepoy Rebellion he was shot through the body in the insurrection at Lucknow, and died July 20, 1587. He was a good man, and his loss was greatly deplored in all England, as well as among the English of India. See Memoirs, Letters, and Diary of the late Rev. Henry Polehampton, and the Rev. Thomas Stedman Polehampton (Lond. 1858, 8vo, and often); London Atheneum, 1858, pt. ii, 431 sq., 487.

Polehampton, Thomas Stedman, brother of the preceding; of lesser note, died at the controversy. See Polehampton, Henry S.

 Polemics (from polemikos, scolding) is the controversy of scientific theology. It is also sometimes called by German theologians elenchics, and differs from apologetics (q. v.) in that it is not simply intended to defend Christianity in general, but aims to attack a rival or disputed system in particular, and is the discussion of its innermost secrets (q. v.), with the view of establishing peace within the Christian fold. This distinction has not always been observed in Christian theology, but is of rather recent date. As a rule, the theologians of the Church mixed the polemical and apologetical elements in all theological controversy. In our own century, however, and especially since the days of Schleiermacher, theological encyclopedists have insisted upon a strict severance of polemics from apologetics and symbolics (q. v.), and have dealt with it in an independent manner. In theory nothing can be more accurately defined and distinguished than apologetics and polemics; they bear the same relation to each other as inorganic and organic chemistry as in the distinction of operations. In practice, however, it is impossible always to separate the apologetic and the polemical element. See the art. APOLOGY. In the ages of the Church fathers no great difficulty was encountered, because their object was to combat the Jewish or Asiatic systems of religion, and their writings therefore bear a predominant polemical coloring. But it is one thing to combat a single religious system like paganism, and it is quite another to attack heresy within the Church, or to make war on religious systems claiming a like foundation. Polemics, then, narrowed down to its proper sphere, is the controversy within the Christian fold regarding the essentials of the Church faith. In the early Church the polemical activity was confined to heresies and schismaticas. Indeed, from the death of Origen to John of Damascus (A.D. 254-730)—the time which elapsed between the Sabellian and the Monoletheit controversy—the polemics of the Church were developed much more prominently than either the apologetic tendency, as in the preceding period, or the systematic tendency, as in the next period. The heresies which called out the polemics of the Church ran from 300 till the outburst of the Reformation differed in tendency from those of the preceding period in their opposition to the whole ecclesiastical system rather than to any particular doctrines. But with the establishment of Protestantism the polemical activity began in real earnest, and from the time to this has continued to develop and expand in strength both among Romanists and Protestants. Among the former it has been specially cultivated by the Jesuits, who, on account of the many methods which they have proposed for their own defense (see Index, p. 64, et al.), have been investigated in Appendix “Methodists” (comp. Pett, Thol. Encyclopaedia, § 63, p. 386 sq.). They even published large works containing the modus operandi for controversies of a confessional nature, under the title Thesaurus Polemicus (Vitus Fischer, 1753; Gazzaniga, 1778 sq.). The Protestants were not far behind, and provided material under the more appropriate title of a Synopsis Controversiarum (Abraham Calow, 1658; Maseria, 1701), to which may be added Walch, Einleitung in die polemischen Gottesgelehrtheit (Jena, 1732, 8vo), his own method (1711); Schubert, Naturgeschichte der Polemik (1756-58); Baumgarten, Untersuchung theologischer Streitigkeiten (1762-64); Mosheim, Unterrichttheologie (1763 sq.); Bock, Lehrb. für die neueste Polemik (1782). No work of importance on the science of polemics appeared until Schleiermacher treated it in his Darstellung des theol. Studiums (Berlin, 1811); and his ideas found further and fuller elucidation by his disciples Sack in his Christliche Polemik (Bonn, 1838), and by Pelt in his Thol. Encyclopaedia (1843); Hagenbach, Theol. Encyclop. (1864, and since); Hill, System of Divinity (N. Y., 1847, 8vo); McClintock, Encyclop. and Method of Thol. Science (N. Y., 1873). The literature of polemics is divided properly into:

I. Treatises on the Controversy between Protestants and Romanists.
   1. General Treatises by writers of the Church of Rome.
      a. General Treatises against Popery by Protestant Divines.
   2. Treatises on the Arian Controversy.
   3. Treatises on the Socinian Controversy.
   4. Treatises occasioned by the Controversies of the Church of England and Dissenters.
      1. The Anglian Controversy.
      2. Treatises on the 89 Articles.
   4. Controversial Treatises on Dissent.
   5. Treatises on Berengarius.

The various publications on these divisions must be sought for under their respective headings. We will refer the reader here for general treatises to the works.
POLEMICS

died by Werner, Gesch. der apologet. u. polemischen Lit., and to Spanheim, Controversiarum de Religione cum Divinitatis Hostie Christiana Prorake et cum Judaica Eclesiae Historico Theologica, and Hornsch. Summa Controversiarum: Clarim. Encyclopaedia Theologiae Epitome (Lugd. 1835, 8vo), § 91, p. 499 sqq. See, too, Mohler's Symbolik; Piper, Monumental-Theologiae, § 153 sq.

1. The principles which should govern the Christian theologian are those of an honest offensive warfare. They may be condensed into the following points: (1) The question is not about persons, but about things. Only when both stand and fall together may personalities be allowed. (2) The attack must be directed at the Scriptures, because they are the only divine witness. The polemic is most formidable: as soon as the principles of the adversary have been refuted the hostility must cease.

2. We must not impede to the adversary more wrong than he is really guilty of; or else the attack itself assumes the appearance of a wrong, and will be considered in that light by every third party, even if successful. Polemics, then, must take the cause of the adversary just as it is; they must not attribute to him any opinions which can only be made his own by exaggerating his expressions, or even by putting into his own mouth statements which he has never really made. It is impudent to think too little of an adversary. The reasons given by him must be recognized in all their force, and on the basis of full acknowledgment the proof must be given that they are not convincing. (5) A struggle with unequal forces is not honorable. The polemic, then, will have to prove either that the weapons of his adversary are illegal, or, if this cannot be done, to inquire into his standpoint and his reasons, and to prove in error the cause in its very principles. (6) If the polemic thus succeeds in reducing his adversary ad absurdum, i.e. to an illogical condition, which, by reason of its untenability, forces him hors de combat, the vanquished is turned into a friend and convert, and the truth has indeed triumphed, as God would have it.

POLEMICS, JEWISH. The friendly relation which existed at first between the Church and the Synagogue could not always last, and a separation became a matter of necessity. The result was that the non-identification of Christianity with Judaism gave rise to bitterness and enmity, and some excommunications were instigated and encouraged by the Jews. The Christians were no more called so, but "Minim," or heretics. So great became at last the enmity, that a celebrated Jewish sage (Tarphon) declared that, although the Christians were the only callers of the Minim, they contained the sacred names of the Deity which ought to be burned; that heathenism was less dangerous than Christianity; that heathens offended from ignorance, while Christians did so with full knowledge; and that he would prefer seeking shelter in a heathen temple rather than in a meeting-place of the "Minim" (Targ. Sabbath 116 a). Another and more moderate rabbi (Jahnel) also recommended the burning of every copy of the Gospels, as in his opinion inciting to rebellion against God, and to hatred against the commonwealth of Israel (Mekh. S. 101 b). By and by all friendly relations between the two parties entirely ceased, and the mutual estrangement was such that the ordinary civilities of life were not to be exchanged, and the bread, wine, oil, and meat used by Christians were declared polluted.

One of the earliest polemics against Christianity is that of R. Simlai, of the 3rd century, who became famous for his virulent opposition to Christianity. His polemics were especially directed against the doctrine of the Trinity (comp. Genesis Rabba, c. 8; Jerus. Berach. ix, 11 & 12 a). It has been suggested, and with apparent probability, that the failure of this attack was in store for the controversy with Origen. Another polemic was R. Abba, of the 4th century, who likewise attacked the Trinity and the ascension of Christ (Jerus. Taumith, ii, 259; Genesis Rabba, c. 29; Exodus Rabba, c. 29). Of this R. Abbahu, we also read (Abodah Zarah, ed. 4 a) that he recommended a certain R. Saphra to a noble Christian. At this recommendation the Christian permitted R. Saphra an exemption for thirteen years. When the Christian asked R. Saphra about the meaning of the passage in Amos iii. 2, and perceived his ignorance, he asked R. Abbahu about its meaning. Having received a satisfactory answer, the Christian asked, "Why is R. Saphra, whom you recommended to me as a great man, so ignorant in the Scriptures, which thou didst explain right away?" To this R. Abbahu answered, "We, who come in contact with you Christians, are obliged, for our self-preservation, to study the Scriptures, because you dispute so often with us from the Scriptures, and because we know that you study the Scriptures: but the other Jews, who live among Gentiles, have no need of that, since they do not dispute with them concerning the Scriptures." What a gloomy picture! The Jews read the Bible, not only, because they are concerned about the "one thing needful," but only for the sake of controversy! Next in order are those passages of the Talmud which speak of Jesus and of Hulyus, and have been expurgated in the earliest editions. Eisenmenger has collected a great many of these passages in his Neu-entdeckte Judenthum and has brought together, in his Jesus in Talmude (Altorf, 1699, 2 vols.

We now give an alphabetical list of such as were against Christianity, and who, for the most part, have been treated upon in this Cyclopaedia, to which reference is made: Abenduos, Jacob (q. v.), carried on a controversy with Hulyus, 1699, and translated the Cussari into Spanish.

Abrahanel, Isaac (q. v.), whose commentaries contain the strongest invectives against Christianity; and so likewise his son Jacob, and Jacob ben Joseph, and Jacob ben Isaac, and Jacob ben Judah.

Abba, Joseph, who died in 1444, took part in the conference held with Jerome de Santa Maria, which place at Tortosa in 1414-14 under the presidency of Peter de Luna, afterwards Benedict XIII. He is the author of the Sermon Ikarim, or the Book of Principles. "This book," says R. Wise, "was the first, and for a long time the only one which attacked the dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church. His opponents spoke, wrote, and argued so much against him that he became quite popular in Christian circles, and thus also a forerunner of the Reformation." This effusion of the Cincinnati rabbi is of course only to be taken cum grano salis, for a personal acquaintance with the work would have told him that only the last division contains what is called anti-Christianism. Arama, Isaac, one of the Spanish exiles, impugns Christianity in his Kabbalah, i.e. "the Heavy Vision."

Bechach ben Asher's attacks upon Christianity can only be found in the earliest editions of his commentary on the Pentateuch.

Farrissol, Abraham (q. v.), the author of a few works, i.e. "the Shield of Abraham," written against Christianity.

Isaac-Jacob ben-Saul, of the 18th century, wrote his Buch der Verzeichnung, Eine Unterweisung wie man seine Religion gegen die Angriffe des Christenthums, and wie man ihn gegen die Einfuhrung der Polnisch autoren soll (Amsterdam, 1699).

Jechiel ben Joseph (q. v.), author of Rabbi, was a member of the conference held at Paris between Nicolo Donin and some Jewish savans. Jechiel would not admit that the Jesus mentioned in the Talmud is Jesus of Nazareth, but another, a discovery which was copied by later writers. But Jews themselves acknowledge this as the failure of the sect of antichristians, for Dr. Levin, in his prize essay, Die Religionsparoditung des R. Jechiel von Paris, (published in Gritti's Monatschrift, 1869, p. 183), "We must regard the attempt of R. Jechiel Polêmô, Antonius, a highly celebrated sophist and rhetorician, who flourished under Trajan, Hadrian, and the first Antoninus, and was in high favor with the two first emperors (Suid. a. r. V.; Philostr. p. 532). He is placed at the sixteenth year of Hadrian, A.D. 135, by Eusebius (Chron.). His life is related at considerable length by Philostratus (Vit. Sophist. i. 25, p. 530—544). He was born of a consular family at Laodicea, but spent the greater part of his life at Smyrna. During the later part of his life he was put at a very early age the highest honors, in return for which he did much to promote their prosperity, especially by his influence with the emperors. Nor, in performing these services, did he neglect his native city Laodicea, which was so interested an account of him with the emperors Hadrian and Antoninus is given by Philostratus (p. 533, 534). Among the sophists and rhetoricians whom he heard were Timocrates, Scopelianus, Dion Chrysostomus, and Apollonius. His most celebrated disciple was Aristides. His chief contemporaries were Herodes Atticus, Marcus Byzantinus, Dionysius Milesius, and Favorinus, who was his chief rival. Among his imitators in subsequent times was St. Gregory Nazianzen. His style of oratory was imposing rather than pleasing; and his character was haughty and reserved. During the later part of his life he was sometimes tortured by the gout that he resolved to put an end to his existence: he had himself shut up in the tomb of his ancestors at Laodicea, where he died of hunger, at the age of sixty-five. The exact time of his death is not known, but it must have been some time after A.D. 143, as he was heard in that year by Verus. The only extant work of Polêmô is the funeral orations for Cynegrius and Callimachus, the generals who fell at Marathon, which are supposed to be pronounced by their fathers, each extolling his own son above the other. Philostratus mentions several others of his rhetorical compositions, the subjects of which are chiefly taken from Athenian history, and an oration which he pronounced, by command of Hadrian, at the dedication of the temple of Zeus Olympius at Athens, in A.D. 185. His Astylena were first printed by H. Stephanus, in his collection of the declamations of Polêmô, Himierus, and other rhetoricians (Paris, 1547, 4to; afterwards by themselves in Greek, Paris, 1586, 4to; and in Greek and Latin, Tolome, 1687, 8vo). The latest and best edition of that of Caspar Colosi (Leips. 1819, 8vo). See Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vi. 244; Clinton, Festi Romani, a. s. 188, 185, 143. There is a coin of Hadrian, bearing the inscription ΠΟΛΕΜΟΥ ΑΝΩΝΥΜΟ. ΑΝΘΡΟΠΟΙΟΕΙΝ (Basel, Loric. Rei Num. a. s. v.; Polêmô; Eckhel, Doct. Num. V. ii, 562). This coin is in a class which Eckhel has extolled in a dissertation (vol. iv. c. 19, p. 368—374). There is a question respecting the identity of this sophist with Po lmô, the author of a short Greek work on Physiognomy, who, it is supposed, was a Christian, and must have lived in or before the 3d century. See the discussion on this question by Passow, Uber Polêmôs Zeitsalter, in the Archiv für Philologie und Pädagogie (i. 7—9), 1826.

Polêmô (Πολιμând) of Attirós, (1) an eminent Platonic philosopher; and for some time the head of the Academy, was the son of Philostratus, a man of wealth and political distinction. In his youth Polêmô was extremely prodigal; but one day, when he was about thirty, he broke into the school of Xenocrates at the head of a band of revellers. His attention was so restored by the discourse, which the master continued calmly in spite of the interruption, and which tended to be upon temperance, that he tore off his garland and remained an attentive listener, and from that day he adopted an abstemious course of life, and continued to be the chief teacher at his school, of which, on the death of Xenocrates, he became the head, in Ol. 116, B.C. 815. According to Eusebius (Chron.) he died in Ol. 126, 4, B.C. 273. Diogenes also says that he died at a great age.
and of natural decay. He was a close follower of Xenicratic in all things, and an intimate friend of Crates
and Crantor, who were his disciples, as well as Zeno
and Arcesilaus; Crates was his successor in the Academy. Poleno gave his attention mainly to ethics, and etested the object of philosophy to be to exercise men in courage, virtue, and the science of Socrates. His character was grave and severe, and he took pride in displaying the mastery which he had acquired over emotions of every sort. In literature he was most admired Homer and Sophocles, and he is said to have been the author of the remark that Homer is an epic Sophocles, and Sophocles a tragic Homer. He left, according to Diogenes, several treatises, none of which were extant in the time of Suidas. There is, however, a quotation made by Clemens Alexanderius, either from him or from another philosopher of the same name, in which other works of his (Strom. vii, 117), and another passage (Strom. ii, 410) upon happiness, which agrees precisely with the statement of Cicero (De Fin.
iv, 5), that Poleno placed the summum bonum in living according to the laws of nature. Cicero gives (Acad. iv, 1, 35; 8, 26) the following as Poleno’s definition of happiness: —

"Honeste vivere, frumentum rebus iis, quas primas honimi sunt conciliat." "

(2) Another Platonian philosopher was the disciple of Poleno; but very little is known of him (Porphyry, Pol. V. v.; Fabricius, L. c.; Clinton, Fl. H. sub ann.
B.C. 315, vol. ii, 5d ed.)

(3) Of Athens by citizenship, but by birth either of Ilion or Samos or Scydon, a Stoic philosopher and as an emigrant, surnamed οἰκετήρ, was the son of Eucrates, and a contemporary of Aristophanes of Byzantium, in the time of Poleno Ephiphious, at the beginning of the 2nd century B.C. (Suid.
a. v.; Athen. vi, 224; Clinton, Fl. H. iv vol. iii, sub ann.
B.C. 199.) In philosophy he was a disciple of Pana-tia. He made extensive journeys through Greece, to collect materials for his geographical works, in the course of which he paid particular attention to the inscriptions on the various monuments and other objects of which he obtained the surname of Στρατηγός (Ath. i. c.; Caspar, ad loc.). As the collector of these inscriptions, he was one of the earliest contributors to the Greek Archaeology, and he wrote works on the same subject, chiefly as illustrated by the crowning of the Gordons of the Archaic Age. (Ant.

Anaximenes and other writers make very numerous quotations from his works, the titles of which it is unnecessary to give at length. They are chiefly descriptions of different parts of Greece; some are on the monuments preserved in various places, and several are controversial, among which is one against Eratosthenes. See Fabricius, Bibli. Graec. iii, 184; Voas-Clinton, Fl. H. iii, 524, where a list of his works is given.

Polben, Jonas, a Polish prelate of some note, floursired in the first half of the 16th century. He was of noble parentage, and having decided to give himself to the service of the Church, studied theology in the University of Cracow, and in Germany and other Continental high schools. He also visited Rome. After filling various minor ecclesiastical offices, he was made bishop of Saalrand, a province at that time paying fealty to Poland, but under the secular rule of prince Albrecht of Brandenburg. In 1522 this prince, who had refused homage to the new king Sigismund, went to Germany, in company with John Henry, Elector of Saxony, and Polben, to secure the independence of Poland and to accept the Protestant doctrines at the Diet of Nuremberg, which they finally did in 1524. Bishop Polben died shortly after this event. See Krausse, Sketch of Polhemus, Abraham, D.D., a minister of the (Dutch) Reformed Church in America, was a lineal descendant of the Rev. Johannes T. Polhemus, the first minister of the Dutch Church of Brooklyn, Long Island,

who had previously been a missionary of the Reformed Church of Holland at Itamarac, Brazil. He came to this country in 1854, and died in 1876. But little more is known of him than these few dates and facts of his ministry. The account of his notice of his death in his family, the Rev. C. S. Polhemus, of New York, L. I., in 1872; graduated at Rutgers College in 1831, and at the theological seminary in New Brunswick in 1833. Immediately after his licensure by the classis of New York, in 1835, he settled at Hopewell, Dutchess Co., N. Y., and remained there until 1847, when he removed to New York, N. J., and took charge of the newly organized North Reformed Church in May of that year. In October following he died at Newburgh, N. Y., of fever, after an illness of several weeks. He was a man of majestic physical proportions, tall, broad-shouldered, handsome, of amiable instincts and attractive manners. The attachment of his parishioners and friends to him was almost unbounded. He was modest, yet energetic, frank and cordial, but always digni-died and commanding respect. His pastoral qualifications were finely developed. As a preacher, he was easy, graceful, impressive in manner, solid and instructive in matter, evangelical and Catholic in spirit, and full of "an union from the Holy One" which gave him great acceptance with the people. He was a leading man in the council of the Church and in her benevolent and educational institutions, and, had he lived, would have been eagerly sought for other high positions.
His piety partook of the characteristics to which it gave its own burnedish splendor. His death was a scene of glorious Christian triumph, which reminds one of the experience of a few hours before. A loud exclamation, "I see Jesus! Now that I have seen him, I never can come back again. I see Jesus!
Did I not tell you I should see Jesus? My soul is ravished with the sight." After a while he added, "I have perfect assurance; not a doubt, not a fear." His last sermon was on the death of Stephen, and the subject made a deep impression on his own heart. From the beginning of his sickness he felt that he would never recover, though with occasional encouragements to the contrary, and he prayed that, like Stephen, he might see Jesus. The ambulance came on his dying bed.
A handsome memorial volume has been published, containing his biography and a selection of his sermons.
His memory has been an inspiration to the church whose foundations he laid with faith and prayer, and which, after only the short life of twenty years, he was destined to lead in person to heaven. (W. J. E. T.)

as justice of the peace at Burwash, Sussex. He wrote, ing, and Growth (1675, 12mo)—Speculum Theologiae in Christo, or a View of some Divine Truths (1678, 4to)—Christus in Corde, or Mystical Union between Christ and Believers (considered (1680, sm. 8vo, and often)—: Arma- tura Dei, or a Preparation for Suffering in an Evil Day (1683, sm. 8vo, and 12mo). Several of his works were published in Ward's Library of Standard Divinity. "Everything of Pohill is evangelical and valuable," was the testimony of Cotton Mather; and Williams says: "All the works of this learned layman contain many excellent representations of Christ in his relations; and interested with a train of certain devotion." Of course Arminians fail to see the consistency of his Bible interpretations, but they nevertheless admire his unction and experience, and regard his writings as precious practical religious works. POLIANDER, Johan (originally Grammann), a German theologian of the Reformation period, was born at Neustadt in 1487. He studied at Leipzig, where in 1516 he became magistrate, and in 1520 baccalaureate of theology. When the famous disputation between Dr. Eek and Luther and Carlstadt took place, he was Eek's able advocate, and the disputation exposed him of the truth of the evangelical doctrine, and in 1520 he commenced to preach in accordance with it. The consequence was that he had to leave Leipzig, and in 1522 went to Wittenberg. At the recommendation of Luther, the duke Albrecht of Prussia called Poliander to Königsberg, and in 1523 he became the last of the cloister at St. Blasie, where he remained until his death in 1541. Poliander is the author of the well-known hymn Nun lob'st mein Seel den Herrn (Engl. trans. by Mills, Hymn Germanic, No. 75, p. 139, "Now to the Lord sing praises"). POLIÁS (Πολίας), a surname given by the Athenians to Athena, or Athens, as being the goddess who protected the city.

POLIDORO, CALDARA, called Caravaggio, from his birthplace, was an eminent Italian painter of the Pre-Raphaelites. He was born in 1499, near Milan. He went to Rome at the time when Leo X was raising some new edifices in the Vatican, and not knowing how to get his bread otherwise, for Polidoro was very young, he hired out as a day-laborer to carry stones and mortar, and at last attended services there at work. He detested this way till he was eighteen, when he was led to think of devoting his life to painting. It happened thus: Several young painters were employed by Raffaele in the same place to execute his designs. Polidoro, who often carried them mortar to make their fresco, was touched with the sight of the paintings, and the pleasure he took to see the painters work stirred up the talent which he had for painting. In this disposition, he was very officious and compliant to the young painters, pushed himself into their acquaintance, and opened to them his intention; whereupon they gave him lessons, which emboldened him to proceed. He applied himself with all his might to designing, and advanced so rapidly that Raffaele was astonished, and set him to work with the other young painters; and Polidoro distinguished himself so much from all the rest, that, as he had the greatest facility in executing his most exquisite designs in the Vatican, so he had the greatest glory. The care he had seen Raffaele take in designing the antique sculptures showed him the way to do the like. He spent whole days and nights in designing those beautiful things, and studied antiquity to the nicest exactness. The works with which he enriched the frontispieces of several buildings at Rome are proofs of the pains he took in studying the antique. He did very few easel pieces, most of his productions being in fresco, and of the same color, in imitation of the bas-reliefs. In this way he made use of the manner called scratching, consisting in the preparation of a black ground, on which is placed a white plaster, and where, taking off this white with an iron bodkin, we discover through the holes the black, which serves for shadows. Scratched work lasts longest, but being very rough, is unpleasant to the sight. He associated himself with his friend, and their friendship lasted till the death of the latter, who died of the plague in 1526. After this, Polidoro, having by Raffaele's assistance filled Rome with his pieces, thought to have enjoyed his ease and the fruits of his labors; when the Spaniards in 1537 besieging that city, all the men of art were forced to fly, or were ruined by the miseries of the war. In this exigency Polidoro retired to Naples, where he was obliged to work for ordinary painters, and had no opportunity of making himself noted; for the Neapolitan nobility in those days were more solicitous to get good horses than good pictures. Seeing himself therefore without business, and forced to spend what he had got at Rome, he went to Sicily; and, understanding architecture as well as painting, the citizens of Messina employed him to make the triumphal arches for the reception of Charles V coming from Tunis. This being finished, and finding nothing further, he set out for Rome, but, scarcely out of the place, was murdered by his servant for his money. This happened in 1548. Polidoro's principal work was done at Messina, and represented Christ bearing his Cross. This, with several other portraits of sacred subjects, is now in the Studj Gallery at Naples. His works have power, life, and passion, and he may be said to have originated the style which in later times formed the basis of the Neapolitan school. See Spooner, Biog. POLIGNAC, MELCHIOR DE, Cardinal, was one of the most illustrious scholars and courtiers of France in the latter years of Louis XIV, and in the early reign of Louis XV; an ecclesiastical and high dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church; a distinguished diplomatist, archaeologist, philosopher, and poet. He is in the last place, if those of this profession on whom he has operated, is likely to survive, though with continually fading lustre. The elegant Latinist, whose name was for half a century in the mouths of the fashionable ladies of the court, and of the learned in their staidier re- quests; in whose verses passed current in the gay world for years before they were committed to the press, and continued in circulation for half a century after the death of their author and the oblivion of their source; furnishing to America an inscription in honor of Franklin—

"Erigit fulminque Jovi Pheroequo sagittas,
Whose poem was anxiously and frequently desired by Leibnitz, but who died without seeing it, thirty years before it saw the light—this elegant Latinist is now remembered only by a few, and the work which gave him renown is known to still fewer, being almost as inaccessible as it is unsought. Yet Polignac can never be entirely forgotten, for he linked himself by his poetic labors with Lucretius; and so long as the profound but dreamy philosophy, and the exquisite but melancholy graces of the greatest of Roman poets are admired, so long will Polignac shine in their reflected from the great luminary with which he is in opposition.

LIFE.—Melchior de Polignac, the descendant of one of the oldest houses of Auvergne, was born Oct. 11, 1661, at Puy-en-Velay, then Le Puy, the capital of the present department of Haute-Loire, in France. Puy is in the heart of the mountainous region of Middle France, the region of which Puy-de-Dôme is the centre. It lies at the foot of Mont Anis, in a rugged valley between the great arms of the Cevennes. It is on the left bank of the Upper Loire, and is watered also by its two small tributaries, the Boron and the Délaine. The mountain landscape is wild and romantic, and is consecrated by romantic associations. The ground on which the city stands is so rugged and broken that the streets in the higher town are unfit for wheels, and are often mere stairs, like those of Valetta. The cathedral is encased by an approach of 120 steps. Within a minute or two of the foot of the Virgin Mary, carved by resident Christians of Lebanon from the cedars of that mountain, though sceptically suspected to have been an idol of the Egyptian Isis. In the suburb of L'Àguillette, the church of St. Michel crowns a basaltic rock 265 feet in height, and is gained by a flight of 216 steps hewn out of the rock. In the Dominican church of St. Laurent are the tomb and part of the remains of Bertrand Duguesclin, the great constable of France. Near by, and close to the village of Expaule, are the ruins of the ancient castle of Polignac, supposed to have been erected on the site of the temple of the Celtic Apollo. From this circumstance—the Templum Apollinicum—the family of Polignac claimed to have derived its appellation. The tremendous forces of volcanic action are manifest in the country round about; ancient ruins are parry passed with the volcanic breeca. The race and the birthplace of the future cardinal were thus encompassed with the evidences on which were founded legends and traditions, pagan and Christian—antiquarian, classical, ecclesiastical, chivalrous, and poetic—which might well inspire the quick fancy of the descendant of an ancient family in that marvellous land; and they were ed in scenes of natural beauty or sublimity which feed his imagination in those years of youth which susceptible to all external influences. Who shall say who is favored with whom he had a mind in the circumstances in which infancy and childhood are passed—in that imperishable period of ex- gie life when it is facile to all impressions? There is interesting recollections of Polignac's boyhood. As a cadet of a noble house, he was destined for the church, and was educated at Paris in the colleges of Mont and Harcourt. He completed his courses by study of theology at the Sorbonne, and was early led with a living through the intervention of his father. The young abbe soon attracted attention by attentiveness of his task, the polish of his conversation, and the elegance of his manners. He is said to have added to "a distinct address and personal appearance a sweet and graceful eloquence, which became masculine and pow- ered the close of his baronage," Madame de Sévigné, who bad him in her Letters as "a man of the world, eting sprightliness, knowing all things and all things; yet with all the gentleness, brill- iant complaisance which could be desired in the sense of life" (March 18, 1690). Equally fatter- nesses of his grace, the politeness of his manners, the polish of his conversation, and the elegance of his manners. He is said to have added to "a distinct address and personal appearance a sweet and graceful eloquence, which became masculine and pow- ered the close of his baronage," Madame de Sévigné, who bad him in her Letters as "a man of the world, eting sprightliness, knowing all things and all things; yet with all the gentleness, brill- iant complaisance which could be desired in the sense of life" (March 18, 1690). Equally fatterplenipotentiaries of the Dutch provinces arrogant, exacting, and impracticable. He rebuked their domineering tone by remarking, "It is very evident, gentle men, that you are unused to victory." Nothing was offered, however, towards the peace service, but two years later he was sent to the Congress of Utrecht, where he appeared in the habit of a layman, and under the name of the Comte de Polignac. The Dutch negotiators, suspecting the existence of secret articles between France and England, threatened to expel the French ambassadors from their territory. Hereupon Polignac retorted, "We will not depart: we will treat of you, among you, and without you." He refused, however, to sign the treaty, as it excluded from the English throne the Stuart family, to whose head he was indelibly attached for his nomination to the cardinalate.

Before the negotiations at Utrecht were closed, the promotion of Polignac was promulgated, and he received the cardinal's hat at Antwerp, Feb. 10, 1713. In the summer of the same year the beretta was delivered to him at Versailles by Louis XIV himself. He did not neglect his poetic defence of Christianity even in the perplexity of diplomatic cares. He added new passages to his poem during his sojourn at Utrecht, and read his poetic labors to the eminent and aged scholar Le Clerc. On the return to Paris he received the appointment of master of the Royal Chapel, an office which he resigned after three years' tenure. His influence and acceptability at court declined after the death of the great monarch. His stately manners belonged to the old regime, and were uncongenial to the license of the modern. He was involved in the conspiracy of Cellamare through his attachment to the duke and duchess of Maine, and his opposition to the regent Orleans. He was exiled to his abbey of Anchin, in Flanders; and though his arrival was distasteful to the simple and unenlightened Flemish monks, he won their regard by his gentleness and consideration, by the integrity of his government, and by the decoration of their church. He employed himself here with the continuation of his poem; but after three years returned to Paris on the death of the cardinal Dubois and of the regent. In 1724 he attended the conclave in Rome which resulted in the election of Benedict XIII, and rendered himself singularly acceptable to him and to his successor, Clement XII. He was appointed shortly after his arrival in Rome ambassador of France at the papal court, to which he arranged with a happy termination the long controversy of the Gallican Church on the subject of the bull Unigenitus. He returned to his native land in 1730, "laden with the spoils of Rome"—both the tributes paid to his dexterity, wit, eloquence, and fascination of manner, and the treasures brought from the capital of the ancient world. During his absence he had been appointed, in 1726, archbishop of Auch, and in 1728 Commandeur des Ordres du Roi.

During this long political and diplomatic career there had been many intervals of literary retirement, as we have seen, when he had been successfully employed in the acquisition and application of various knowledge. His poetic taste and his learned labors he never entirely laid aside, but rendered them profitable to himself and attractive to statesmen and courtiers wherever his wanderings led him. His public avocations were thus far from filling up the measure of his distinction. In 1704 he succeeded the illustrious Bossuet as a member of the Royal Academy of France. His inaugural address on this occasion was greatly admired. For more than twenty years after its delivery the marquis de Chastellux, as流入inspired the French, observed during the century in which the Academy had existed, and declared it to be "the most perfect model for those who have a like task to fulfill." In 1715 he was elected an honorary member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1731 a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin. These honors were fairly merited. He had through life been a diligent explorer and collector of antiquities. He gathered a large and valuable cabinet of coins and medals. He brought together at great expense a splendid assemblage of archaic remains, due in great measure to his frequent and long-continued residence at Rome. He instituted and undertook the restoration of the sculptures of the Colosseum and the Pantheon, and discovered and restored the ancient columns of the Temple of Minerva Medica. To the people and to the republic he dedicated at the request of the French government a splendid monument. His诩led and art and character and his munificence to the church and to the state have been acknowledged throughout the whole Christian world. The pope, under whose pontificate Polignac lived, pronounced him a saint. The king of France, on the occasion of his death, devoted an elaborate and eloquent eulogy, a striking expression of the respect in which he was held by the French nation. He was one of the great statesmen of Europe. He died at Paris Nov. 20, 1741, and his collection was scattered at his death. His habits had been elegant and courtly—his living generous—his public employments and his private pursuits expensive—his ample means consumed in costly accumulations. He was buried in the Abbey of St. Denis, and after his decease his books, his gems, his medals, his sculptures, and his numerous articles of virtu were offered for sale. His statues were purchased by Frederick the Great, and were transported to Berlin, where they were destroyed on the capture of that city in the Seven-Years' War. All that remains as a memorial of Polignac is his conflagration of Lutetius.

Even that great work—for it merits the epithet of great both by its design and by its execution—the great Latin poem which preserves his reputation, was left in incomplete state at the time of his decease. It was recovered after the death of Polignac when it was discovered, during the course of the period in which the Academy of Sciences had existed, that it was written on sheets of different papers and had not been published when the Academy was first instituted. These papers were fairly merited. He had through life been a diligent explorer and collector of antiquities. He gathered a large and valuable cabinet of coins and medals. He brought together at great expense a splendid assemblage of archaic remains, due in great measure to his frequent and long-continued residence at Rome. POLIGNAC

abb de Rothelin, appointing him his literary executor, to revise, arrange, connect, complete the scattered leaves, to express the sentiments and the ideas of the author, to give this work a form and a unity. The profound and unerring judgment for the performance of these duties seems to have been early made. The marquis d'Argenson reports it in his Mémoires, published fifteen years before Polignac's death: "A poem against Lucretius, of equal length, equal in design, and divided into nine books, requires the life of a man to carry it to perfection. The cardinal began too late, and cannot flatter himself with the hope of living to finish it. It is said that he means to charge the abbé de Rothelin with the task, who, from vanity, will not refuse it, and will think it an honor to put the work in the shape of his esteemed friend. It may appear before the public. But to this end the aid of some able professor of the university will be necessary: the abbé will never accomplish it of himself. But when, at present, will read a Latin poem entirely philosophical, of five or six thousand lines? Greek is entirely forgotten; it is to be feared that Latin will soon be so, and that the cardinal de Polignac, the abbé de Rothelin, and a certain M. Le Beau, coming up in the university, will be called the last of the Romans." From vanity also, from the love of learning, from zeal for philosophy, or from all these motives, the cardinal proposed the execution of that great and important task intrusted to him was faithfully and creditably discharged by the abbé de Rothelin. With the counsel and assistance of the abbate Cercati, rector of the University of Pisa, he prepared the work for the press. The author wrote it during his stay at Pisa, and it was printed in 1747. He, too, died without seeing the fruit of his labors; and the long expected work, which for forty years had been a mark of polite culture to know (Anti-Lucrétien ou poème éthérique), appeared at Paris under the superintendence of Prof. Le Beau, to whom the charge of editing it had been consigned by Rothelin. It was reissued at London in 1748. D'Argenson thought that translations would be left unread; but translations soon diffused the fame of the work among those who were ignorant of the classic tongues. At the commencement of the century, while the poem was in its crude infancy, a translation was begun by the dukes of Maine and Bourbon. The French version of Bougainville was issued in 1759, and the Italian of Ricci was produced in Spiegel at Verona in 1767 (3 vols. 4to).

The Anti-Lucrétien. — The philosophical poem of cardinal Polignac, as published by Le Beau, and, apparently, as originally designed by its author, consists of nine books; but it closes without epilogue, peroration, or envoy. Notwithstanding its length, its protracted meditation, and its elaborate execution, it ends like that of Gounet (Hervé), it has the grace of a simple and Fiddle, but "breaks off in the middle." It wants simplicity and completion. It is fragmentary and desultory, deficient and redundant. Its arguments are ingenious without being convincing, and its polemics are more dazzling than satisfactory. The blind and fanatical Cartesianism of the poet confines him in a labyrinth of bewildering errors, and conceals from him at once the vagaries and weaknesses of his master, and the strength and profundity of those who had risen up to oppose his philosophic hallucinations. He is dissatisfied by the mortifications in which he has involved himself. He forgets his specific function as the antagonist of Epicurean ethics and physics, and devotes himself with more earnest energy to the refutation of all anti-Cartesians, whom he assimilates to and often identifies with the Epicurean herd. He is in consequence both disconcerted and unjust in the treatment of his brilliant predecessors and contemporaries. The statement and confusion of the doctrines of Spinoza might have been very acceptable to the Cartesian and theologians of his own day, who, with the Anti-Lucrétien, by a harmonious and highly appreciated (iii. 903-872; iv. 1293-1307). It may be highly approved even now by those who still retain the old fanatical delusions and the old anomalies in regard to Spinoza, and who cannot recognise in him Coleridge's "God-intoxicated sage." See Spinoza But surely the language in which the cardinal assails the author of the system, and proceeds to explain Newton himself, does equal discredit to his good sense and to his scientific perspicacity (ii. 905-1006; iv. 903-1124). He does it, it is true, allow a faint echo of the universal admiration for Newton to escape him:

"Dizam
Tantœ pace viri, quo non soliter alter
Naturam rerum ad leges componentes motus,
Ac Mundi partes justas et perpetuae
Et radium solis transvaso praeclatum fracturam Septem in primigenius perennisuroque colores
Solvere (ii. 904-980).

Yet how different is this depreciatory commendation from the enthusiastic eulogy bestowed on Des Cartes! (VIII. 66-69).

This is the manifest reflection of the tribute of Lucretius to the "Graias homo," Epicurus. We may endure with patience Polignac's contempt for the materialistic tendencies of Locke's philosophy, and his omission of his contemporaries, Malebranche and the much greater Leibnitz (an omission which may be explained and excused), but we cannot fail to observe his utter inability to discern the scientific acumen, and the wonderful faculty of logical co-ordination and development, which characterized his chosen antagonist Lucretius. One of the most extraordinary things in the Anti-Lucretius is the opening, in which he announces his subject and its difficulties, and does earnest homage to the exquisite graces of the Latin poet. But this inauguration of his thesis does not prevent him from speaking of the spirit and doctrines of Lucretius in terms which reveal rather the controversialist eager to display his own powers in the best light than the sincere inquirer anxious to discover and to promulgate only the truth. With all our regard for the courtly and clerical poet, we must confess him to be more of a dilettante than a philosopher or adept in science.

But, while thus taking exception to the substance and argumentation of the poem, and to the narrowness and fanaticism inseparable from the advocacy of fantastic and erroneous theories, attention may be justly called to the general execution of the difficult task, and to many episodical disquisitions, which assail by anticipation the speculations of Darwin and the evolutionists, and present many topics and many suggestions which merit careful examination in connection with the scientific controversies that distract our own day by the restatement of the battle of old ages. Whatever deductions may be properly made from the Anti-Lucrétien on the score of scientific superficiality and philosophic aberration, the work merits high praise on account of its design and execution; and still deserves consideration as a memorable and singularly graceful production of the modern Latin muse.

The versification and expression of Polignac have been unfavorably compared with the excellences of some of the earlier Latinists. In making the comparison with Vida, one of the chief of those elders, some advantage may be derived from the directness, the unequal, counterpart to one of his poems. The description of the game of chess in the Anti-Lucrétien may be fairly considered in connection with the Scacchia, Ludus, of the Cremonese poet. The same ingenuity in rendering the stiffness of classic Latinity plastic, for the purpose of describing things and processes entirely unknown to the classical vocabulary, may be admired in both. In the one instance chess is employed only as an illustration, and the description occupies only fifteen lines (Anti-Lucr. iii. 892-906); in the other it constitutes the thesis of a descriptive poem. In a few lines, and in a mere illustration, there is, of course, no opportunity for detail. Nor is there room for such elaborate intricacy of narration—such subtle twisting in and twisting out of facile diction—nor for such surprising felicity of adaptation of old forms to new and undesigned uses, in the later episode as in the earlier poems. There is nothing, however, in the narrower field which, for curious dexterity, admits of being added as a parallel for Vida's marvellous explanation of the diverse movements of the pieces at chess (Souace, 85—185), or for his explanation of the manuveres and fortunes of the game. But it may be permitted to act upon the artist's maxim, "non est posse dicere," and we may discern in the episode of Polignac (notwithstanding the deficiency of materials for an accurate and minute comparison) a command over the resources of the Latin tongue which is not unworthy of Vida, even in such fantastic sports of fancy and event as Polignac's. If the larger factors of the poet are considered, Vida's epic, the Christiad, fails to exhibit such compass of expression, such grace and dignity, and even melody of utterance, or such vigor of imagination, as the Anti-Lucrutius. Both Vida and Polignac, it is true, fall into the unclassical frailty of terminating their hexameters too frequently with monosyllables and enclitics. They are careless of their caesuras, and repeat too often certain easy forms and mannerisms. There may be more liquidity and smoothness in Vida, but there is more elevation and a more masculine gravity in Polignac. If the study of the two poets coincided with unconscious limitation to the transparent fluency of Virgil, the latter with equal success, but with deliberate endeavor, reproduces the peculiarities, and not rarely the splendors, of Lucrutius, in the very diction of the greater Roman poet. But the better judgment may be passed on either the absolute or the relative merit of the Anti-Lucrutius, it remains a very remarkable poem, which deserves to be reclaimed from the oblivion in which it has been suffered to remain so long. It was a praiseworthy and noble effort to repel the advances of scepticism in the day of Spinoza and Locke and Bayle; "to justify the ways of God to man," by explaining the wonder of the universe in consonance with a lively and intelligent faith in a wise, beneficent, and sustaining Creator. Despite of its imperfections, its disconnections, its disorder and incompleteness, the study of the poem may be advantageously renewed after the lapse of a century, though other weapons may be required for the reanimated conflict between faith and science than can thence be drawn, in consequence of the vast changes which have since been made in all the implements of intellectual warfare.

Literature.—It results from the long neglect into which the Anti-Lucrutius had fallen that the bibliographer of the subject is exceedingly scant and unsatisfactory. The histories of philosophy pass it by with little or no notice; the editors of Lucrutius, and the commentators on the De Natura Rerum, have scarcely bestowed more attention upon it. There is very little to assist investigation which is not due to the contemporaries of Polignac. Under these circumstances, the only references which it seems expedient to make are, Bibliographie Universelle, s. v. Polignac; De Boze, Eloge de M. le Cardinal de Polignac, prononcé dans l'Académie Royale des Inscriptions et des Belles-Lettres; De Mairan, Eloge de M. le Cardinal de Polignac, prononcé dans l'Académie Royale des Sciences; Fanchet, Hist. du Cardinal de Polignac (Paris, 1772, 2 vols.); St. Simon, Mémoires; D'Argenson, Mémoires; Anti-Lucrutius, sive de Ivo et Natura Libri Novem (Lond. 1746, 2 vols. 12mo). Politi, Adriano, an Italian writer, was born at Si-ena at the close of the 16th century. He chose the ecclesiastical career, and was attached as secretary to the Cardinal Sermonti in 1566, and private secretary to Cardinal Sermonti in 1575. He died about the middle of the 17th century. Politi edited Opere di C. Tacito (Rome, 1611, 4to), and another and more satisfactory edition (Venice, 1644, 4to):—Dizionario Toscano (ibid. 1615, 8vo): this work, an abridgment of the Dizionario della Crusca or Dictionary of the Tuscan Language, was accused of having with littleness introduced into it some errors and falsehoods, and was thrown into jail:—Ordo Romana historia legenda (ibid. 1627, 4to, and in vol. iii of Roberti's Miscellanea).—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xii, 616.

Politi, Alessandro, an Italian writer, was born July 15, 1725. If he is to be believed, after studying under the Jesuits, he entered at the age of fifteen the Congregation of the Regular Clerks of the Pious Schools, and was conspicuous among its members by his rare endu- tion. He was called upon to teach rhetoric and peri- patetic philosophy at Florence in 1700. Barring a period of about three years, during which he was a pro- fessor of theology at Genoa (1718-18), he spent the greatest part of his life in his native city, availing himself of the manifold resources he could find there to im- prove his knowledge of Greek literature, his favorite study. In 1730 he was called to the chair of theology vacant in the University of Pisa. Accustomed to live among his books, aloof from the world, Politi was of an irritable disposition, and sensitive in the extreme to the slightest criticism. He was fond of displaying his er-udition, and his unforgiving, censorious nature, and his was a most harassing job. He died July 25, 1752. He left, Philosophia Peripatetica, ex mente amici Thomae (Florence, 1708, 12mo):—De patria in tempore condendi potestate, lib. ii (ibid. 1712, 8vo);—Eustachi Commentarii in Homerii Iliadem, with notes and Latin version (ibid. 1730-33, 8 vols. fol.):—Eustachi Commentarii in Dionysium Peripiteum, and Greek and Latin (Col-ogne, 1742, 8vo):—Orationes XII ad Academiam Pia- num (Lucca, 1746, 8vo):—Martyriogogum Romanum caustigatum (vol. i, Florence, 1751, 8vo); and many un- published works. All his orations have been collected (Pisa, 1774, 8vo). See Fabrioni, Vite Italiani, vol. viii; Tiptalp, Biog. degli Ital. illustr., vol. iv.—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xii, 616.

Politi, Giovanni, an Italian canonist, was born June 8, 1738, at Pizzano (Frioul). He studied at Padua, obtained in 1763 the diploma as a doctor of civil and canon law, and was a professor of literature at the catedrario of Portogruaro, and also of ecclesiastical jurisprudence, in which he was remarkably proficient. In 1800 he repaired to Concordia, where the bishop provided him with a canonicate. He published one consider- able work, De pramenti reconditae ecclesiasticae univer- sitatis (Venice, 1787, 9 vols. 4to), which was approved by a brief of Pius VI.—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xii, 617.

Politian or Poliziano, Angelo, a noted scholar of the Renaissance period, flourished in France and Italy, and was the favorite of the Medici at Flo- rence. He was born at Montepulciano, in Tuscany, in 1494, and was the son of Benedetto Arengario, a doctor of law. In 1514 he was appointed his father's heir and assumed that of Poliziano, from his native town Moss Politianus. Lorenzo de Medici took care of his educa- tion, placed him under good preceptors, and provided for all his wants. He afterwards entered into clerical orders, and became a doctor of law, and was made by Lorenzo a canon of the cathedral of Florence. He was also intrusted with the education of the ducal children, as well as with the care of the duke's library and collection of antiquities, and he was his guest and com-panion for the remainder of his life. Poliziano had studied Latin under Cristoforo Landino, Greek under Andronicus of Thessalonica, and philosophy under Fi- cino and Archipollus of Constantinople. He was after- wards appointed professor of Latin and Greek at Flor-en a chair which he filled with great reputation. He wrote scholia and notes on many ancient authors—Ovid, Cautilus, Statius, Suetonius, Pliny the Younger, and the "Scripturae Historiae Augustae"; he translated into Latin the history of Herodotus, the manual of Epictetus, the sphaerium of Hipponocrates, some dialogues of Plato, and other works of Aristotle. His attitude of the Middle Ages of Poliziano, published at Florence in 1489, consist chiefly of observations he had made on the ancient authors, which he arranged for the press at the request of Lorenzo. Merula made an attempt to depreciate this work, which led to an angry controversy between the two scholars, in the midst of which Merula died. Poliziano had also a violent controversy with Bartolomeo Scala. Poliziano was conciliated and vain, and very irritable, and his temper led him into an unbecoming altercation with Madame Clarice, Lorenzo's wife, because she interfered in the education of her children, a thing which Poliziano seemed to think preposterous in a woman; and at last his behavior to her was so impertinent that she turned him out of her house in the country, and wrote to her husband at Florence to inform him of what she had done. The persecution between the offended woman and the irascible scholar was impracticable, gave Poliziano apartments in one of his houses at Fiesole, where he wrote his Latin poem. During Lorenzo's last illness, Poliziano attended at his death-bed of his patron, who gave him to know, by the signs of affection affecting moody on Lorenzo's death, and not long after died himself, in September, 1494, and was buried in the church of San Marco, agreeably to his request. —English Cydes, &c. Polity, Civil, of the Jews. See Government.

Polity (Gr. συνολοσ) is the term generally used to signify government or forms of government and administration in the Christian Church. Church polity may be considered in reference to its historical development during successive centuries, and also in reference to the various systems of government heretofore and now recognized as the churches.

Historical Development. —Nothing is more obvious from the New-Testament record than the simplicity which characterized the primary organization of the Church. In this particular Christianism was in marked contrast with Judaism. Without temple, tabernacle, or altar, without priests or Levites, and almost without ceremonies, it made known at once its character and purposes as spiritual and not carnal, as, in fact, a kingdom of God "not of this world." The first form of Church organization was that in which the Lord Jesus Christ and a group of His disciples were associated together as believers. At this stage the ordinances were established by direct appointment of the Saviour himself, who also gave the great command to His disciples to "Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Following the crucifixion, the resurrection, and ascension of the Lord Jesus, the Church had for a short period a second form of organization, in which the apostles were the only officers to teach and guide the followers of the Lord. The promised gift of the Holy Ghost was miraculously imparted and signalled by a great awakening at Jerusalem, in which the Lord added to the Church daily such as were saved. This period of increase was followed by the appointment of deacons or officers of help, who were especially chosen to relieve the apostles of their minor duties of a semi-secular kind, that they might give themselves "to prayer and the ministry of the Word." Notwithstanding their primary duties, some if not all of the deacons also devoted themselves to the preaching of the Word, as may be seen from the examples of Stephen and Philip. Following there appear to have been no other officers in the Church besides the apostles and deacons. The next phase of Church administration is that in which elders were appointed. As no specific account is given of the mode of their appointment, we are left to infer that it may have occurred as a natural designation of respect for seniority either among the deacons or the influential members of the Church, somewhat after the analogy of eldership among the Jews. Certain it is that as churches multiplied, the apostles recognized, possibly appointed, and actually ordained elders who from the first had greater or less functions of government, and were also active agents of evangelization. Elders were known at Jerusalem about A.D. 41, or eight years after the Pentecost. A few years later they were ordained generally. All the churches at the council at Jerusalem they were associated with the apostles and brethren (xxv, 4, 6, 23). The elders of the New Testament appear to have been evangelists, teachers, and pastors, and in a collective capacity to have ordained ministers of different grades. Near the close of the New Testament period the term bishop is used a few times by the inspired writers Luke and Paul, indicating an additional office growing up out of the presbyterate, somewhat as the latter had done from the diakonos. On questions that have arisen respecting the office of bishop in the New-Testament Church modern controversies in reference to Church polity have largely centred. One theory is that the apostles appointed bishops to be their direct and only official successors having the prerogative of ordaining future ministers of divine right. An opposite theory is that the kuedo and kuedo of the New Testament were absolutely identical in office and order, and, consequently, that every elder was a bishop. The more probable theory lies between these extremes. It is that the episcopate was a natural sequence of the presbyterate, not specifically appointed, but, in fact, recognized by the apostles. Whereas for the work of evangelization not only an elder but elders were ordained in the principal churches, there would exist in every body of elders the necessity of a presiding or primacy for the purpose of policy, administration, or direction. Thus one of the number would be designated, either by seniority or formal choice, as a primus inter pares, who should serve as overseer (muzsbox) of the body and the flock under them. According to this theory, the episcopate was an office of su-preminence rather than a distinct clerical order; and in this respect it was analogous if not identical in its functions with that of such apostolic legates as were Timothy and Titus. Nevertheless, it was an office of such importance in the administration of the affairs of the Church that it was well adapted to the necessities of the times that it soon became general. Nothing in its original character would prevent its being held in rotation by several elders in the same church or diocese, yet a successful administration of it would tend to its perpetuation in the same individual. Hence it soon became an office for life.

The episcopacy of the primitive Church was diocesan, and in many cases dioceses embraced only single churches. But as Christian influences radiated from these churches, and contiguous churches were established, the diocese was expanded to the secular divisions in importance. At this early period an error crept into the Church which had a great influence upon its polity in after-times. It was that of attributing priestly functions to the Christian ministry. Soon after the custom became current of calling presbyters priests, it also became customary to call bishops high-priests, and deacons Levites, and thus a full hierarchical system was initiated in the Church. After the conversion of Constantine this system became gradually expanded, until it exceeded in pomp and detail of ceremony the whole ritual of Judaism, and threw the pontifical rites of Greek and Roman religion into the background. From the Christian bishop as the primitive centre, episcopal councils expanded upwards into archbishops, metropolitan, patriarchs, and episcopacy; downwards into deacon, presbyter, and finally, the bishop himself as the centre of the Church. The bishops' powers were increased by the addition of archbishops, metropolitan, patriarchs, and the patriarchal or archiepiscopal authority. The upper expansion of the episcopate was the bishop's seat, called the patri depos of Christianity, and the Roman Church was content with nothing less than a universal patriarchate or papacy (q.v.).

To state somewhat more fully the organization of the Church in the 4th and 5th centuries, it may be said that the Church of that period consisted of several orders of men. Eusebius reckons three, viz., the ἡγόμενος, πρεσbyteroi, and καθορίζομενοι, i.e., rulers, bishops, and cattacthemenoi. Origen reckons five orders; but then he divides the clergy into three orders, to make up the number of the seven last classes, when compared together, and to the same thing. Under the ἡγόμενος, or bishops, were comprehended the clergy, bishops, priests, and deacons; under the πρεσbyteroi, or bishops, the baptized laity; and under the καθορίζομενοι, or cathach cumens, the candidates for baptism. The believers were called Christian; the catechumen imperfect. The former, having received baptism, were allowed to partake of the Eucharist, to join in all the prayers and the Church, and to hear discourses upon the most profound mysteries of religion; more particularly the use of the Lord's Prayer was the sole prerogative of the believers, whence it was called Ἐκκλησία πιστῶν, the prayer of believers. From all these privileges the catechumen were excluded. See Catechumens. The distinction between the laity and the clergy is by churchmen deduced on the very beginnings of the Christian Church; yet Rigidius, Salmasius, and Salzen insist that there was originally no distinction, but that it is an innovation, and was called forth by the ambition of the clergy of the 3rd century, in which Cyprian and Tertullian are the chief advocates. See Cyprian.

The various orders of the clergy were appointed to their several offices in the Church by solemn forms of consecration or ordination, and had their respective privileges, immunities, and revenues. The unity and worship of the Church were secured by laws both ecclesiastical and civil. The ecclesiastical laws were either the canons of the Church, or orders made by each bishop for the better regulation of his particular diocese, or laws made in provincial synods for the government of all the dioceses of a province; or, lastly, laws respecting the whole Christian Church, made in general councils or assemblies of bishops from all parts of the Christian world. See Synods. The civil laws of the Church were those decrees and edicts made from time to time by the emperors, either restraining the power of the Church, or granting it new privileges, or confirming the old. The breach of these laws was severely punished both by the Church and State. The ecclesiastical councils resolving offenses among the clergy were chiefly suspended from the office and deprivation of the rights and privileges of the order. Those respecting the laity consisted chiefly in excommunication or refraction from the communion of the Church, and penance both public and private. See Ecclesiastical Polity.

The idea of the papacy or spiritual supremacy of Rome was not fully developed before the middle of the 7th century, when Theodore of Rome, not content with the title of ocumenical patriarch, assumed that of sovereign pontiff. From that period the successive claims of the papacy—viz., temporal sovereignty, the viceracy of Peter and Paul, of Christ and of God, the dominion of the kingdom of heaven, and the theocratic monarchy of the world—went on progressively, until in the assumption of infallibility (q.v.). Meantime, as a system of ecclesiasticism, the papacy has retained most of the offices of the ancient Church, and added to them that of cardinal (q.v.), nuncio, chancellor, chamberlain, chancellor, and professor, and the procurator, and numerous others of a political and ceremonial character. Within the sphere of papal authority no serious controversy ever arose on the subject of Church polity. Ceremonial expansion, unchecked by any idea of scriptural example or restraint, was for centuries the order of progress. It was not till the Reformation was so far inaugurated as to feel the necessity of organizing churches after the type of the New Testament that any important discussions took place respecting the principles of Church government. The Reformed churches on the Continent, generally speaking, adhered to the principles of the Reformation and of the Catholic church in the 16th century. The Lutherans practiced the papal office under the title of superintendent. But scarcely any two of the principal Reformed churches agreed in detail as to their plan of organization, nor were these minor differences regarded as of any serious importance. See Church Government.

Systems of Church Government. England is the country that has given birth to the chief controversies concerning Church polity which have prevailed in modern times. As the Reformation in England was largely political in its character, it is not only resulted in the transfer of the cathedrals, churches, colleges, etc., built under Roman supremacy, to the Reformed Church of England, but also many Roman Catholic ceremonies, and usages. Hence from the first that Church was divided into two parties in reference to Church polity. Had they been content with temperate discussion, and with the peaceful separation of those who could not harmonize their views, the result might have been very different. But fortunately both parties had inherited the principle of intolerance, either from the Roman Church or from preceding times, and also the theory of state rule in matters of religious faith and practice. To these false principles may be charged some of the most pitiable and disgraceful facts in the history of Great Britain. The oppressive legislation, the stirs, the persecution, the massacre of the martyrs was in the succession repeated of Henry VIII, of Bloody Mary, of queen Elizabeth, of James I, of Charles I and II, and even under the protectorate of Cromwell, are sufficient to impress any mind with the extent of human misery, and of reproach to the Christian name caused by the errors allowed to. In all history there is not a single more significant commentary upon the sin of constraining men's consciences by the arbitrary standards of human authority. It was not till after more than a hundred and fifty years of party strife and bloodshed that in 1660 the Toleration Act was passed. But the establishment of the Church from the faith and polity of the Established Church was legalized. Even after that it was a long time before many could see, and even yet it does not seem possible for all to understand, that details of Church polity were never appointed by divine authority, but design ably left by the Heven for the guidance and the government on the basis of great principles rather than to be governed by fixed and uniform precepts. Scotland had adopted Presbyterianism from the Reformed churches of the Continent as early as 1550, but even after toleration it was several years before Presbyterianism became popular in England. Independency in various forms seemed to be preferred by the English Nonconformists and Dissenters. Between them and Presbyterians the one hand, and the advocates of prelacy or episcopacy by divine right on the other, controversy has never ceased. But since the controversy has been limited to words it has been an innocent, though often an exciting one, owing to the many phases it has assumed from time to time.

While the Church of England has continually autegnized the Church of Rome on the ground of papal sacraments, it has been consistent in recognizing the dependence on it by the High and Low Church parties within its own pale, and more especially since the period of the Oxford Tracts (q.v.) and the more recent ritualistic discussions. All the English controversies respecting Church polity have found their way to this country, but with greatly altered conditions of the various parties. Independence having escaped from persecution by way of Holland, itself established a species of theoc-ocracy and became a persecutor in New England. But its period of intolerance was brief; and, on the whole, the Church of England and the United States have been remarkably free from the spirit and practice of intolerance. The free institutions of the country and the absolute separation of the State from all the churches have tended to place all on a common level, and to make all alike dependent upon good arguments and good practice as means of securing public respect and increasing strength.

Controversies on Church polity in America have cricket prevailed in the rivalry of denominations. For the past, almost all churches, while considering their own theories of polity, have respected those of others.
Discussions conducted after that manner have greatly extended the feeling of Christian fraternity, and at the same time made almost universal the opinion that particular forms of Church government are of quite inferior importance as compared with the essential elements of Christian faith and practice. On the other hand, pretentious claims and intolerant practice have tended to defeat their own aims and to secure public disapproba-

Notwithstanding numberless varieties in unimportant particulars, the distinctive systems of Church government are few. Designated by the highest au-tority recognized in each, they may be enumerated as the Congregational, the Presbyterian, the Episcopal, the Patriarchal, and the Papal. The details of these systems may be seen by reference to articles on the churches adhering to them severally.

Literature.—The controversial literature of the subject of Church polity is very nearly identical with that of the subject of ordination (q.v.). The general, historical, and didactic literature of Church polity is also quite extensive. The following list of books will at least fairly represent it in its different branches and phases: Migne, Dictionnaire des Cérémonies et des Rites

Polk, Leonidas, a noted American prelate of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and a general in the late war between the Northern and Southern States, was born at Raleigh, N. C., in 1806. He was educated for the army in the United States military academy at West Point, N. Y., but had served only a few months as lieutenant when he determined to take orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was ordained deacon in 1830, and in 1831 he was made a rector of a church at New Orleans. In 1835 he was made the missionary bishop of Arkansas and the Indian Territory, south of 36° 30', and in 1841 bishop of Louisiana. He then took up his residence at Lauperche parish, where he had extensive plantations.
Being a man of wealth and enjoying a life of ease, he never paid very much attention to ecclesiastical labors, and did but little to strengthen the work of the Church within the range of his diocese. At the outbreak of hostilities against the North he was on the side of the planters, and did all in his power to further the secession movement. Not only did he speak upon these subjects, but contributed from his purse, but he offered his services to the Southern Confederacy as soon as established, and was made a general in their army. He early urged upon Jefferson Davis and the other Confederate authorities the importance of fortifying and holding the strategical points of the Mississippi Valley, and in other ways proved himself a far-seeing and skilful adviser of their cause. He took part in several battles, and though not always very prominent in action, was ever indispensable in council, and contributed greatly to whatsoever success the Confederate cause achieved in the years and surroundings. During a reconnaissance near Marietta, Ga., he was killed by a cannon-shot, June 14, 1864.

He had never resigned his episcopal dignity, but was buriel with military honors. Though bishop Polk gave his life in what we consider an unworthy cause, we must revere his memory for his sterling qualities as a man who was not afraid to do what he believed to be his duty. He was noted for his kindness of heart and the most devout Christian life, such as he understood it to be. See Men of the Times, s. v.; American Annual Cyclop., 1860, p. 673; Drake, Dict. of American Biography, s. v.

Poll (pol/o, gulgoleth, Num. 1, 2, 18, 20, 22; iii,

The verb "to poll" in the A. V. is the rendering of pol, pol, or pol, all signifying to shear.

Poliajulo, Antonio, a noted Italian artist of the Florentine school of painters and sculptors, flourished in the second half of the 15th century. He was the pupil of Lorenzo Ghiberti, and assisted this master in the celebrated gates of the Baptistery of San Giovanni. Antonio is said to have been the first artist who studied the dead subject for the purposes of design. In 1484 he was invited to Rome by pope Innocent VIII, to elabo-

Peter's, where is also the monument of Innocent VIII, which he afterwards elaborated. His brother Pietro was likewise an artist of some celebrity. The two brothers wrought many great productions jointly. Their best is the Martirdom of St. Sebastian, painted in 1475, and for some years was considered a masterpiece of the school. It is now in the National Gallery at London, and it is engraved in the Etchings of Lastri. It is a fine work, without being refined or in the least idealistic. See Mrs. Clement, Handbook of Painters, etc., p. 462.

Pollaiole, Simone, a distinguished Italian architect, noted as the builder of many beautiful ecclesiastic buildings. He was born at Bologna in 1454. He was related to Antonio del Pollaiulo, and lived with him some time at Rome. Becoming a devoted follower of Savonarola, he was discarded by the churchmen, and in his later years was obliged to spend his talents in secular labors. He was one of the most prominent architects in the building of the Strozzi Palace. He died in 1529.

Pollard, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Guisborough, in Yorkshire, in 1792. He was converted when but a youth, and soon after felt called of God to preach the Gospel. He prepared himself for the ministry, which he not only enjoyed, but one in which his labors always met with success. He was a man of great piety and sound faith, a faithful dispenser of the Word of Life, and an exemplary teacher. He possessed a strong memory and a cultivated mind, richly stored with divine truth. He died at Newport, Pagnell, April 21, 1833.

Pollinctori, an appellation given by the Romans to those who washed and anointed the dead preparatory to burial.

Pollo, a name common to a number of Lutheran theologians, of whom we mention the following:

1. Joachim, who was born Aug. 26, 1557, at Breslau, in Silesia. He pursued his studies at Leipzig, where he became magister of philosophy in 1577. In 1602 he was pastor at Buntzlau, in 1607 provost of the Church of the Holy Ghost and pastor of St. Bernard in Breslau; in 1615 he was made assessor of the evangelical consistory; in 1618 he was appointed pastor of St. Mary Magdalen. He died July 31, 1683. Lucas Pollio left a number of sermons behind him.

2. Lucas, who was born at Breslau in 1586. He studied at Frankfurt and Wittenberg. In the latter place he especially attended the lectures of Melancthon on the Greek language. In 1582 he was appointed professor of the St. Elizabeth Gymnasium in Breslau; but three years afterwards, in 1585, he went to Leipzig for the study of Hebrew and theology. In the same year he was appointed dean of St. Elizabeth in his native place, and in 1607 he was made pastor of St. Mary Magdalen. He died July 31, 1683. Lucas Pollio left a number of sermons behind him.

3. Lucas, son of Joachim, who was born Aug. 4, 1605, at Breslau. He studied at Leipzig, where he also was archbishop of St. Nicola. He died April 25, 1648. See P. Tafel, "Pastores der Kirche zu St. Elisabeth in Breslau"; the same, "Pastores zu St. Maria Magdalenae; Adami Viri theol. German. eruditiss. in 1, 158; Jocher, "Gelehrten-Lexikon," s. v. (B. P.)

Pollok, Robert, M.A., the noted author of the Course of Time, a Scotch bard of no mean order, and a minister of the Church, was born at Muirhouse, parish of Edinburgh, south-east of Glasgow, on Oct. 14, 1739, and was born to the more part of humble parentage. In his youth he worked on his father's farm, but evincing more than ordinary mental strength and love for study, he was encouraged to prepare for college, and was entered in the University of Glasgow in 1752. He graduated five years after, and determined upon the life of the holy ministry, for which he then began his studies at the seminary of the United Sessions Church. He was ready for ordination in 1827, and was in that year licensed to preach. His first public discourse, which was delivered on May 3, 1827, is spoken of as a most brilliant and interesting effort, and although it was written in one night with the aid of very little power and promise, at the same time gave indications that the Church would too soon be deprived of its service. Such was the fatigue occasioned by this single exertion that he was immediately confined to his bed; and although in a few days he was partially restored, he preached only three times afterwards. Just before he had received his license, Pollok had finished the poem on which his great literary reputation rests, the Course of Time. The object of the poet, whose sentiments are strongly Calvinistic, is that the picture is rather of a gloomy cast, to describe the spiritual life and destiny of man; and he varies his religious speculations with episodical pictures and narrations to illustrate the effects of virtue or vice. A work so ambitious from the hands of a country student, attached to a small body of Dissenters, was not likely to find a patron among publishers. It happened to be shown to Prof. Wilson, of Edinburgh, as a curiosity; but this great man hesitated not to recognise worth even in a young and unknown student, and the work was by him so heartily commended for its great poetical merit that its publication was arranged with Mrs. Blackwood, of Edinburgh. The Course speedily passed through several editions. It was a novelty in the class of evangelical religious literature to which it belonged, and besides pleasing those who are partial to that class of religious literature, it was a boon to many who are inclined to read religious books, but are repelled by their general dryness and insignificance, while it was warmly admired by the literary world at large. Pollok's partial admirers expected for him a place on a level with Milton. After the novelty of such a phenomenon had, however, passed off, the book became neglected by purely literary readers; and at this day it may be said that it is estimated too highly by the religious and perhaps too insignificantly by the literary world. It is certainly a work of great power, however meagre in fancy. There are many flashes of original genius which light up the crude and unwieldy design, and as for the narrow range of thought and knowledge, and as for the still pomposity that pervades the diction. There are in it a few passages which are strikingly and most poetically imaginative, and in some of which are good fashions. It has also, however, a considerable amount of sentiment deeply tinged with religious asceticism, and whole pages of plain and humble prose. These defects, it should be borne in mind, Pollok would in all probability have removed himself, guided by a more ripe judgment, in a careful revision, had Providence been pleased to prolong his life. His mind was evidently imbued with Paradise Lost, and he follows Milton often to the verge of direct imitation; but even as the work stands it is the undoubted production of a poetical genius, and it will always be read with profit and delight. Before the publication of his poem Pollok had undermined his constitution by excessive mental labor, and he scarcely lived to see its success. On the recommendation and through the assistance of the friends his genius had secured him, he was preparing to set out for Italy, when his death was brought on by a number of consumptive tendencies; while but on the eve of leaving Britain he was so greatly reduced that he tarried at Devonshire Place, Shirley Common, near Southampton. He there expired on Sept. 18, 1857.
by a calm faith in that religion he had preached, and a cheerful hope in that redemption which had been the theme of his song. The reception which the Course of Time has met with from the public is a sufficient testimony to the talents of its lamented author. His name is now recorded among the list of those illustrious Cuss-Scotheni who have done honor to their country; who, from obscurity, have secured for themselves an unfading reputation; and who will be remembered by distant generations with enthusiasm and admiration. His earliest publications—Helen of the Ciles, Ralph Carmell, and the Persecuted Family—were in prose, and were issued anonymously. They have been republished, with his name, in one volume, entitled Tales of the Coss/Card, and have passed through several editions. A very inadequate memoir of Robert Pollok, by his brother, with extracts from his correspondence, has been published by Messrs. Blackwood (Edinb. 1842), and there is a short memoir prefixed to the Course of Time.

Pollex, Julius (Τολος Ἡλειας), a celebrated Greek sophist and grammarian, who flourished near the close of the 2d century, was a native of Anacretris, in Egypt, and, after preparatory training under his father, studied at Athens under the rhetorician Adrian. He finally opened a school himself, and was subsequently appointed by the emperor Commodus to the chair of rhetoric. Several of his contemporaries were attacked him, and in many ways aimed to detract from his scholarly repute. He was the author of several works of which Suidas has preserved the titles. None of them are of interest to us except the Ovomastorai, Biaθλος, which has come down to us, and is valuable because it treats in the first part of the gods, and their worship. Polatsk (Polish, Poznoc), Synod op, an important ecclesiastical gathering, was held on Feb. 12, 1839, and was attended by all the Greek Uniate bishops in Russia, assisted by several of the most distinguished of their clergy. Its most important action was a synodal ordinance drawn up and signed by Joseph, bishop of Lithuanus; Basil, bishop of Orsha; Anthony, bishop of Brest, and twenty-one other dignitaries, in which they declare their firm and unalterable decision to acknowledge anew the unity of their Church with the orthodox Catholic Eastern Church; and, consequently, thenceforth, together with the flocks committed to their care, to continue in the same sentiment with the holy Eastern orthodox patriarchs, and in obedience to the holy governing synod of all the Russian." This act was appended the declaration of thirteen hundred and five pariah priests and monastic brethren, which number was afterwards increased to sixteen hundred and seven. Besides their act, a petition was drawn up to the emperor Nicholas, praying him to sanction the union of the Uniate with the Orthodox Church; this, together with the synodal act above, was submitted to the holy governing synod for examination and approval. The synod shortly after issued its decree upon the subject, by which it was ordained:

1. To receive the bishops, clergy, and flocks of the hitherto called Greek Uniate Church into full and complete communion with the holy orthodox Catholic Eastern Church, and so to be hereafter and forever harmoniously incorporated with the Church of all the Russians.

2. To confer the general blessing of the most holy synod on the bishops and clergy of all the participants, to their faith and love to the supreme bishop of our confession, Jesus Christ, that he would confirm them from above in the confession they have made, and that he would directly direct the work of their ministry to the perfecting of the saints.

This decree was signed by Seraphim, metropolitan of Novgorod and St. Petersburg, by Philaret of Kiev, Philaret of Moscow, and three prelates, besides two other ecclesiastics. It was confirmed March 25, 1839, by the emperor's own hand, with these words: "I thank God, and accept it." See Blackmore's Mouraviæ, Russian Church, Append. iv, p. 480.

Polus, a Greek sophist, lived about B.C. 400. He was born in Agistrium (Gygentrai), and studied under the celebrated sophist Gorgias, a Sicilian like himself. In his dialogue Gorgias, or about Rhetoric, Plato introduces Socrates in discussion with some of his disciples, among whom is Polus. The point in contest is at first the nature of rhetoric, but as the debate progresses it expands its limits, and touches the question whether the unrighteous can be happy, and whether it is not preferable to suffer injustice rather than to inflict it. The notoriety of Polus rests exclusively on the part assigned to him by Plato in this dialogue. There remains nothing of his writings, yet he seems to be a true disciple of Gorgias, to have written a rhetorical treatise; for Plato puts the following words in the mouth of Socrates: "To tell you the truth, Polus, I do not consider truth as an art, but only as a thing which you boast of having made an art of, in a writing which I have of late perused."

Polwhele, Richard, an English divine noted as an antiquarian, historian, poet, and miscellaneous writer, whose works are exceedingly voluminous, was born at Truro in 1708, where he was also educated, and where, when a boy, with the assistance of the celebrated Dr. Wolcott, then a physician in that town, he first essayed as a poet. He took holy orders, and finally settled in his native place, where he died in 1838. He is noted rather for his secular productions, though he published also on religious topics. His principal works are The History of Cornwall (7 Vols., 1716); The History of the County of Osbrih (3 Vols.);--Traditions and Recollections (2 Vols.);--The Rural Rector (3 Vols.);--Biographical Sketches in Cornwall (3 Vols.);--Anecdotes of Methodism:--Illustrations of Scriptural Characters:--several volumes of Sermone; with numerous pamphlets, and they constitute part of a miscellaneous character. being chief husband. In the Himalayan and sub-Himalayan regions adjoining and under the influence of Tibet it is of frequent occurrence, in the same form as in the valley of Cashmere, in Ladak, among the Koech, and among the Telengese. Farther south in India it is common among the Males in the islands of the Nicobar and the Ceylon Islands. In Ceylon, and going eastward, it is not uncommon in New Zealand, and in one or two of the Pacific islands. Going northward, it is also common in the Aleutian Islands, and taking the continent to the west and north of the Aleutians, it is found among the Koryaks, to the north of the Okhotsk Sea. Crossing the Russian empire to the west side, we meet it among the Saporogian Cossacks; and thus have traced it at points half round the globe. This is not all, however. It is found in several parts of Africa; and it occurs again in many parts of America among the Red men. We have the authority of Humboldt for its prevalence among the tribes on the Orinoco, and in the same form as in Tibet. Among the Avaroes and the Mayupres, he says, "brothers have often but one wife." Humboldt also vouches for its former prevalence in Lancerota, one of the Canary Islands. Thus polyandry is a phenomenon of human life independent of race and country. See Latham, Journ. Linn. Soc., iv, 1850, i, 24; Sollas, op. cit., ii, 394, 404, 460, 472; Humboldt, Personal Narrative (Williams's translation, 1819), vol. v, p. 549; and vol. i, chap. i, p. 84; Hamilton, New Account of the East Indies (Edinb. 1727), i, 274, 308; Reade, Savage Africa, p. 43; Erman, Travels in Siberia, ii, 381; Seignior Gaya, Marriage Ceremonies (translation (2d ed. Soc. of Bengal, i, 854; Asiat. Soc. Bengal, v, 15.

From ancient history we learn that the area over which polyandry at one time existed was even more extended; while in certain cantons of Media, according to Strabo (ii, 798; and see Goguet, vol. iii, bk. vi, c. i), polygynia was authorized by express law, which ordained every inhabitant to maintain at least seven wives; in other cantons precisely the opposite rule prevailed—a woman was allowed to have many husbands, and they looked with contempt on those who had less than five. The other instance that in his time polyandry of the Tibetan type prevailed among the lower classes in the Laus di Bello Gallico, lib. v, c. xiv. We find direct evidence of its existence among the Pics in the Irish Nennius (App. ii), not to mention the traces of it remaining in the Pictish laws of succession. Indeed, to pass over communities in which something like promiscuity of intercourse between the sexes is said to have prevailed—such as the Massagetes, Agathyrsi, and the ancient Spartans—we find several among which polyandry, or a modified promiscuity, must have been the rule. Assuming that the sexual obligation laid on younger brothers in their turn to marry the wives of their deceased elder brother is a relic of polyandry of the Tibetan type, then we must hold that polyandry prevailed at one time throughout India (Institutes of Menu, ch. iii, § 175, and ch. ix, § 57, 60), among the ancient Hebrews (Deut. xxv, 5-11); in Siam, Burmah, in Syria among the Ostiaks, the But (Bodo), the Kasia, and the Paharies of Gburghal. Traces of it indeed remained in the time of Tacitus among the Germans (Tac. Germ. xx, Latham's edition, p. 67 sq.). In short, polyandry may be considered as one of the most natural forms in the human race, as a distinct advance from a state of promiscuity, on the assumption that pure promiscuity ever existed. Of the origin of this peculiar institution our space forbids us to write; but we believe it to be connected with the want of balance between the numbers of the sexes, due to the practice of female infanticide, which is its almost inviable accompaniment. Tribes of warriors, wholly devoted to a military life, find women an incumbrance rather than a solace; and from this cause, and probably from the difficulties of subsistence, formed the practice of killing their female children, sparing them only when they would be useful. As the practice spread, it would lead to polyandry, and once instituted, the custom would in many cases continue to exist after the habits and necessities which produced it disappeared. In several places, as in Ladak, where polygyny prevails, the sexes are now either equally balanced, or the female sex predominates. In cases polygyny and polyandry are commonly found existing side by side. The subject is one which demands, and as yet has not received, full investigation.—Chambers, s. v. Polycarp (Πολύκαρπος), a distinguished father of the Christian Church, is one of a small number who were distinguished from the rest by the title apostolic fathers, as having been contemporaries of some of the apostles. The period of his death is well ascertained to have been by martyrdom in A.D. 155, in the reign of Antoninus Pius (see Waddington, Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxvi, pt. ii, p. 232 sq.). The period of his birth is not known, and we can only determine his age when he died by the fact that he was 85 years of age when he was declared to have been reputed to have been a Christian eighty-six years, and according to this statement was born probably about A.D. 69. But if with other crises we suppose him to have been converted at a riper age he must be referred to the reign of Nero. However, there seems no reason to doubt that he was contemporary with the apostle John, and known to him, the lengthened period of whose life connects so fortunately the men of the 2d century with those who had been in personal attendance on the Saviour. It is this circumstance that gives to his life its chief importance, and makes one of these persons, and thence arises the main value of the few and in other respects unimportant writings which remain of the apostolic fathers. The lives form links in the chain of Christian tradition; and their compositions recognise by frequent quotations the writings which remain of evangelists and apostles. (In the following account of Polycarp we rely largely upon Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.)

Life.—An ancient life, or rather a fragment of a life of Polycarp, ascribed to Bollandus to a certain Polycarp, is of unknown date, and given in a Latin translation in the Acta Sanctorum Januarii (a. d. 26), ii, 695, et seq., dwells much on the early history of Polycarp, but the record (if indeed it be the work of Pionius) is some centuries later than its subject, and is evidently false in several particulars. We are inclined to think, however, that it embodies some genuine traditions of Polycarp's history. According to this account, the apostle Paul visited Smyrna in his way from Galatia, through the propocultural Asia to Jerusalem (the writer apparently confounding two journeys recorded in Acts xvi, 22 and 23, and having collected the narrators, instructed them in the proper time of keeping Easter. After Paul's departure, his host, Strates, the brother of Timotheus, became bishop of the infant Church; or, for the passage is not clear, Strates became an elder and Bucolus was bishop. It was during the episcopate of Bucolus (whether he was the contemporary or the successor of Strates) that Callisto, a female member of the Church, eminent for riches and works of charity, was warned of God in a dream to go to the gate of the gate of the city of Gathe in the theater gate, where she would find a little boy (pseruleum) named Polycarp, of Eastern origin, who had been reduced to slavery, and was in the hands of two men, from whom she was to redeem him. Callisto, obedient to the vision, rose, went to the gate, found the two men with the child, as it had been revealed to her; and having redeemed the boy, brought him home, educated him with maternal affection in the Christian faith, and, when he attained to manhood, first made him ruler over her house, then adopted him as her son, and finally left him heir to all her wealth. Polycarp had been from childhood distinguished by his benevolence, piety, and self-denial; by the gravity of his deportment. His presence was the terror of the ungodly, the solace of the righteous, the terror and the solace of the Scriptures. These qualities early attracted the notice and regard of the bishop, Bucolus, who loved him with fatherly affection, and was in return regarded by him with filial love. By Bucolus he was ordained first to the office of deacon, in which capacity he labored diligently, confuting heathens, Jews, and heretics; delivering catechetical homilies in the church, and writing epistles, of which that to the Philippians is the only extant specimen. He was subsequently, when of mature age (his hair was already turning gray), and still maturer, a presbyter, ordained by Bucolus, on whose death he was elected and consecrated bishop. We omit to notice the various miracles said to have been wrought by Polycarp, or to have occurred on different occasions in his life.

Such are the leading facts recorded in this ancient narrative, which has been well authenticated by the statements of Tilmont. That it has been interpolated with many fabulous admixtures of a later date is clear; but we think there are some things in it which indicate that it embodies earlier and truer elements. The difficulties in the narrative are sometimes later additions. The chief ground for rejecting the narrative altogether is the supposed difficulty of reconciling them with the more trustworthy statements of Irenæus (Epistolæ ad Florianum, apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles., v. 20), who, in his boyhood, had known, perhaps lived with Polycarp, and of other writers. According to Irenæus (Epistolæ ad Victoriam. Papaum, apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles., v. 24), Polycarp had intercourse with "John and others of the apostles"; or still more expressly (Ad. v. Hæræn, iii. 8, et apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles., iv. 14), he was instructed (perhaps by the mouth of Christ) in Christian doctrine, and conversed familiarly with many who had seen Christ; was by the apostles appointed (cæsaraeæarch) bishop of the Church at Smyrna; and always taught what he had learned from the Apostles. Tertullian (De Præscriptionibus Hereticis, c. 32) and Jerome (De Viris Iustis, c. 17) distinctly mention John as the Apostle by whom Polycarp was ordained. But we question if the expressions of Irenæus, when critically examined and stripped of the rhetorical exaggeration with which his natural reverence for Polycarp has invested them, will prove that such steps had ever been taken by the apostles. This is the case with hearing of some of the apostles; and was, with their sanction, appointed bishop of the Church at Smyrna. That John was one of the apostles referred to by Irenæus is not the slightest reason to doubt; and we are disposed, with Tilmont, to regard Philip, whom Polycrates of Ephesus (apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles., v. 24) states to have ended his days in the Phrygian Hierapolis, as another of those with whom Polycarp had intercourse. We believe that intercourse with these apostles, and perhaps with some other old disciples who had seen Jesus Christ, would be the more probable, and not inconsistent with the general truth of the ancient narrative given by Bollandus. His statement of the ordinance of Polycarp by the apostles may perhaps be reduced to the fact that John, of whom alone Tertullian (l.c.) makes mention, was among "the bishops of the neighboring churches," who came, according to the narrative, to the consecration of Polycarp. This circumstance enables us to fix that consecration in or before A.D. 104, the latest date assigned to the death of the venerable bishop, and which is not inconsistent with the narrative. It may be borne in mind, too, that the whole subject of the ordination of these early bishops is perplexed by ecclesiastical writers utterly neglecting the circumstance that in some of the larger churches there was in the apostolic age a plurality of bishops (comp. Phil. i. 21), not to speak of the grave and much disputed question of the identity of bishops and presbyters. The apostolic ordination mentioned by Irenæus and Tertullian may, therefore, have taken place during the lifetime of Bucolus, and have been antecedent to the precendency which, on his death, Polycarp obtained. We are the more disposed to admit the early origin and the truth of the matter of the ordination, because in the narration, as the natural tendency of a forger of a later age would have been to exaggerate the opportunities of apostolic intercourse, and the sanctions of apostolic authority, which Polycarp certainly possessed.

Polycarp was bishop of Smyrna for some time when Ignatius of Antioch passed through that city on his way to suffer death at Rome, some time between A.D. 107 and 116. Ignatius seems to have enjoyed much this intercourse with Polycarp, whom he had known, apparently, in former days, when they were both hearers of the apostle John ( Martyr. Ignatii, c. 3). The sentiment of esteem was reciprocated by Polycarp (Epistolæ ad Philipp. c. 18), who collected several of the epistles of Ignatius, and sent them to the Church at Philippi, accompanied by an epistle of his own. Polycarp himself had visited Rome, while Antichrist was yet alive, and was well known in the capital, whose episcopate extended, according to Tilmont's calculation, from A.D. 167 to 168. Irenæus has recorded (Epistolæ ad Victor. apud Euseb. H. E. v. 14) the difference of opinion of these two holy men on the existence of the second coming of Christ in the time of one thing; and the second coming of Christ, and three churches in adhesion to the custom of the Asiatic churches, derived, as they affirmed, from the apostles; as well as their mutual kindness and forbearance, notwithstanding this difference. Indeed, the character of Polycarp appears to have attracted general regard: Irenæus retained for him a feeling of deepest reverence (Epistolæ ad Flor. apud Euseb. H. E. v. 21); Jerome speaks of him (De Viris Iustis, c. 17) as "totius Asiae princeps," the most eminent man in all proconsular Asia. A anecdote given elsewhere shows that even reputed heretics, notwithstanding their declared opposition, desisted from their heresies to possess his esteem; and it is not improbable that the reverence excited by his character conducted to his success in restoring them to the communion of the Church. It has been conjectured that he was the angel of the Church at Smyrna to whom Jesus Christ directed the letter in the Apocalypse (ii. 8-11); and also that he was the bishop to whom the apostle John, according to a beautiful anecdote recorded by Clement of Alexandria (Liber "Quis Dives solvit," c. 42), committed the care of a young man, who, forsaking his patron, became a disciple of John, that he might be made a bishop. These are mere conjectures, and of little probability.

The martyrdom of Polycarp occurred, according to Eusebius (H. E. iv. 15), in the persecution under the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus; and is recorded in a letter of the Church at Smyrna to the churches of Philomelium and other places, which is still extant, and of which Eusebius (ibid.) has given the chief part. The persecution began: one Germanicus, an ancient man, was thrown to the wild beasts, and was saved, and several others, including some who were brought from Philadelphia, were put to death at Smyrna. Polycarp had at first intended to remain in the city and brave the danger of martyrdom; but the entreaties of his flock led him to withdraw to a retreat in the adjacent country, where he passed his time in prayer. After the passage of some days before his apprehension, he had a remarkable dream, which his anticipation of his fate led him to interpret as an intimation that he should be burned alive—a foreboding but too exactly verified by the event. Messengers having been sent to apprehend him, he withdrew to another place, but the place was discovered by the confession of a child, who had been forced by torture to make known where he was. Polycarp might still have escaped by leaving the place on the approach of those sent to apprehend him; but he refused, saying, "The will of God be done." His venerable figure and calm and courteous deportment commanded the respect of his captors; and a prayer offered by him affected some of them with remorse for their share in his apprehension. The officer into whose custody he was delivered, with the usual laxity of police procedure, had persuaded him, by adisplay of pity, to offer divine honors and sacrifice to the emperor; but his steady refusal changed their pity into anger, and they violently threw him down from the carriage in which they were conveying him. On entering the assembly place where the procuress, Stratus Quadratus, was, a voice which the excited feelings of the old man and his companions led them to regard as from heaven, exclaimed, "Be strong, O Polycarp! and quit you like a man." The procuress was, like others, moved by his appearance, and exalted him to consider his advanced age, and comply with the requirements of government: "Swear by the fortune of Caesar, recant, and cry 'Away with the godless (τοὺς διασομούς)." Looking first round upon the heathen multitude, and then up to heaven, the old man sighed and said, "Away with the godless." The procuress again urged him, "Swear by Caesar's fortune, and I will release thee." Revile Christ." Eighty and six years have I served him," was the reply, "and he never did me wrong: how then can I revile my King and my Saviour?" Threats of being thrown to wild beasts were offered, but he refused to be moved; and his bold avowal that he was a Christian provoked the wrath of the assembled multitude. "This man," they shouted, "is the teacher of impiety, the father of the Christians, the man that does away with our gods (οἱ θεοτριφθείς Θεοὺς αὐθαίρετος);" who teaches many not to adhere to nor to worship the gods." They demanded that he should be thrown to wild beasts, and when the Asiarch, Philip of Tralles, who presided over the games which were going on, evaded the demand, on the plea that the combatants who were exposed were knotted, they demanded that he should not be burned alive. The demand was complied with; and the populace, in their rage, soon collected from the baths and workshops logs and fagots for the pile. The old man ungirded himself, laid aside his garments, and took his place in the midst of the fuel; and when they would have secured him with nails to the stake, said, "Let me remain as I am; for he that has enabled me to brave the fire will so strengthen me that, without your fastening me with nails, I shall, unmove, endure its fierceness." After he had offered a short but beautiful petition that he might be killed by the high wind driven by the flames on one side, so that he was roasted rather than burned; and the executioner was ordered to despatch him with a sword. On his striking him with it, so great a quantity of blood flowed from the wound as to quench the flames, which were however, resuscitated, in order to consume his lifeless body. His ashes were collected by the pious care of the Christians of his flock, and deposited in a suitable place of interment. The day and year of Polycarp's martyrdom are involved in considerable doubt. Samuel Petis places it in A.D. 175; Usher, Pagl, and Bocchus (Bocchus, A.D. 169; Eusebius (Chronicon) places it earlier, in the seventh year of Marcus Aurelius, who acceded to the throne March 7, A.D. 161; Scaliger, Le Moine, and Cave place it in A.D. 167; Tillemon in 166; the Chronicon Paschale in the consobrini of Eunanus and Pastor, A.D. 163; and Pearson, who differs widely from all other critics, in A.D. 147, in the reign of Titus Antoninus Pius. Pearson brings various reasons in support of his opinion, which reasons are examined by Tillemon in one of his careful and elaborate notes. Polycarp is referenced as a scholar both in the Greek and Roman churches; by the former on Feb. 23, by the latter on Jan. 26, or (at Paris) on April 27. The Greeks of Smyrna, on his festival, used formerly to visit devoutly what is shown as his tomb, near the ruins of an ancient church or chapel, on the hill called Ares against the city of Aristeo. Although the Discovery of Asia Minor, ii, 397 is disposed to think that the tradition as to his place of interment is correct.

The principal authorities for the history of Polycarp have been cited. The account of Eusebius (H. E. iv. 14, 15, and add. iv. 21), and of Eusebius, Anecdot. vi. 15, 19, 20, gives account of the original and modern narrative, and forms the letter of the Church at Smyrna, giving an account of his martyrdom, which will be noticed below. Halloe (Illumin. Eccles. Orientalis Scripturam Videt, Cave (Apostolici, or the Lives, etc., of the Primitive Fathers), and Tillemon (Memorab. vol. ii) have collected the chief notices of the ancients, and emended them in their narrative. Works.—There is extant only one short treatise by this father, Προς Φιλοκαρπιον ιεροσαλημ, Ad Philοκaρpιον Epistola. That he wrote such an epistle, and that it was known in their time, is attested by Irenæus (Ad. Hæres, iii, 5, and Epistol. ad Florum, apud Eusebius, H. E. iv. 14, and v. 20, Eusebius (H. E. iii. 30; iv. 14), Jerome (De Viris Ilustr. c. 17), and later writers who it is needless to enumerate; and, notwithstanding the objections of the Magdeburg Centurions (Cent. ii. c. 14), that the letter is not so old as Cyprian (100 years), it is, however, only denied the genuineness of a part; of Mau- theue de la Roche; and, at a later period, of Semler, our present copies have been received by the great majority of critics as substantially genuine. Some have suspected the text to be interpolated; but the suspicion is perhaps somewhat strengthened by the evident affer- ded by the Syriac version of the epistles of Ignatius, lately published by Mr. Cureton, of the extensive inter- polation of those contemporary and kindred productions. The Epistolae ad Philoepiscopus is extant in the Greek original; it was first published in black letter in the Latin version by Juc. Faber Stapulenaus, with the works of the pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita and of Igni- tius (Paris, 1498, fol.), under the title of Theologia Vi- rificans; and was reprinted at Strasburg in 1501; at Paris, 1515; at Basel, 1522; at Colone, 1526; in- digested, with the Clementina (4to), 1546; at Cologne, with the Latin version of the writings of the pseudo- Dionysius, 1557; and with the Clementina and the Latin version of the Epistle of Ignatius (fol.), 1569. It appeared also in the following collections: the Micropro- baphites (Basel, 1528, fol.); the Orthographiae of Euse- bius (ibid. 1555), the Ordothsographia of Gruenius (ibid. 1569), the Melia Patrum of Francis Bois (Lond. 1650, 8vo), and in the various editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, from its first publication by De la Bigne in 1575. The Greek text was first published by Hallat; subjoined to the life of Polycarp, in his Illustrium Eccles. Orientalis Scripturarum Vitas et Documenta (vol. i, Douai, 1633, fol.); and was again published by Usher, with the Epistle of Ignatius (Oxford, 1644, 4to), not in the Appendix Ignatiana (which came out in 1647, as a separate form of the work of Malposch, who first published the work of Ignatius, who is sub- stitute, 1568); and in the Patris Apostolici of Cotelerius (Paris, 1672, 2 vols. fol.), and Amsterdam, 1724, of Iti- tigius (Leipsic, 1699, 8vo), of Frey (Bazel, 1742), and of Rostell (1746, 2 vols, 8vo). It is given likewise in the ecclesiastical history of Archbishop (Oxford, 1702, and 4to); and Smith (ibid. 1708, 4to). It is contained also in the

Faria Sacra of Le Moyne (vol. i, Leyden, 1668, 4to), and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Gallandius (vol. i, Ven. 1765, 4to). Of more recent editions may be mentioned those of Hornebeck, Scripta Genuina Græca Patrum Apostoliciromaticus (Copenhagen, 1829, 4to); Rouillé, Scriptores Ordinarii Operaethiopiaca quæדram (vol. i, Oxford, 1832, 8vo); and Jacobson, Patrum Apostoliciromaticus quæ supersunt (vol. ii, ibid, 1838, 8vo); and Hefe, Patrum Apostoliciromaticorum Opera (Tubingen, 1839, 8vo). There are English versions of this epistle by Wake and Clements, and one in Cave's Apostolic, or Life of the Primitive Fathers.

That Polycarp wrote other Epistles is attested by Irenæus (Epistol. ad Flor.), one, Ἱππότος Ἀρμενίως, Αδ Αθέναιες, is quoted by St. Maximus in his Prologi ad Libros Dionysi Aretapagitis, and by Joannes Maximus, but is supposed to be spurious; at any rate it is now lost; another, Προς Ἀρσαράγιν, Ἀδ Αἰγυπτίοις, is mentioned by Suidas (s.v. Ἀρσαράγιος), to be supposed is also spurious. The life of Polycarp, ascribed to Pionius, states that he wrote various Tractatus, Homilies, and Epistles, and especially the book De Obitu S. Joannis (Irenæus, Hæres. i, 27, 5). According to Halloix (c.), some extracts from a MS. said to be extant in an abbey in Northern Italy had been given in a Conco de S. Joanne Evangeliata by Francisius Humblot; but even Halloix evidently doubted their genuineness. Some fragments ascribed to Polycarp, cited in a Latin version, in a Catena in Quattuor Evangelia by Victor of Capua, were published by Francisius Feuerlentius subjoined to lib. iii, c. 8 of his Annales ab Exinanu, and were subsequently reprinted by Halloix (c.), Usher (Appendix Ignatiana, p. 81, etc.), Maderus (c.), Cotelerius (c.), Iltigius (c.), and Gallandius (c.), under the title of Fragmenta Quinti e Responsionem Capitula S. Polycarpi adscripta; but their genuineness is very doubtful. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 108, i, 44, etc. (Oxford, 1740, fol.); Iltigius, De Patribus, Patris, etc., passim; Fabricius, Hist. The Τῆς Συμφωνίας εἰσέρχεσθαι πάροι μορφῶν τῶν τοῦ Πολυκάρπου συνταγμάτων εἰκονίζεται is almost entirely incorporated in the Historia Ecclesiastica of Eusebius (iv, 15); it is also extant in its original form, in which it was first published by archbishop Usher, in his Appendix Ignatiana (Lond. 1647, 4to); and was reprinted in the Acta Martyrum Sincera et Selecta of Rainer (Paris, 1668, 4to), and in the Patres Apostolici of Cotelerius (as De Poli, 1672, fol., of which Brabant, [rather Amsterdam], 1658; and Amsterdam, 1724); it was also reprinted by Maderus, in his edition of the Epistolae Polycarpi, already mentioned; it is also in his Bibliotheca Patrum Apostolicherum (Leips., 1839, 8vo); and by Smith, in his edition of the Epistola of Ignatius (reprinted at Beale by Frey, 1742, 8vo); by Russel, in his Patres Apostolici (vol. ii, Lond., 1746, 8vo); and by Gallandus, in his Bibliotheca Patrum (vol. i, Venice, 1765, 8vo); and by Jacobson, in his Patrum Apostolicherum quæ supersunt (vol. iv, 1839, 8vo). There is the ancient Latin version, which is given with the Greek text by Usher; and there are modern Latin versions given by other editors of the Greek text, or in the Acta Sacerdotum Januarii (ad d. 20), i, 720, etc. There are English versions by archbishop Wake (Lond. 1658, 8vo, often reprinted), by Chevalier (Cambridge, 1884, 8vo), and by Dalrymple, in his Remains of Christian Antiquity (Edinburgh, 1776, 8vo). See Cave, C. L. p. 85; Fabricius, L. c. p. 51; Lardner, L. c. c. 7; Ceillier, L. c. p. 695; Iltigius, Gallandius, and Jacobson, l. c.

Polycarp the Ascetic. There is extant in Greek a life of the female saint Synetes, which has been ascribed to various authors. Some MSS. show that the ecclesiastical historian Nicephorus Callistis (H. E. viii, 40) ascribes it to Athanasius; but Montfaucon, though he gives the piece with a Latin version in his edition of the works of Athanasius (ii, 681, etc.), classes it among the spurious works, and declares that the difference of style, and the absence of any external testimony to show whether it was written in the fourth or six centuries after Athanasius, leave no room to doubt its spuriousness. A copy, which was among the papers of Combes, contains a clause, stating that the discourses or sayings of the saint had been reported by "the lesse Angres Arsenius de Pegada;" but this does not seem to describe him as the compiler of the narrative, but only as the author from whom part of the materials were derived. It is then most reasonable to follow the very ancient MS. in the Vatican Library, which ascribes the biography to Polycarp the Ascetic; but where or when this Polycarp lived cannot be determined. The biography was first published in the Latin version of David Colvillis in the Acta Sactorum Januarii, i, 242, etc. The original Greek text is said to have been published with some other pieces (Ingolstadt, 1603, 4to); and it is given with a new translation in Sire, as E. E. viii, 40. See also in the Exegesis Græca Monumenta of Cotelierius (Paris, 1677, 4to), i, 201, etc. The MS. used by Cotelierius contained neither the author's name nor the final clause about Arsenius of Pegada. The title of the piece is Ριβιο και ραββικα της ιερας και ἄνδειου μηνός ἦσσω (in Montfaucon's edition, ἔν της γίγνης και μακρυσις και ἀπανταλακοῦν της Συνετῆς, Ηύη και Άρσης καπελικάς μανιατικῆς κατασκευής μετα πρακτικής (or, according to Montfaucon, μανιατικά ραββικα μενιατικά) Synetes). Polyeuct, the first martyr of Armenia, was a soldier in a Roman legion when he converted to the Christian faith by one of his friends (Neracès). For his faith he was sentenced to be beheaded. His martyrdom took place in 257. The Roman Catholic Church observes his memory on Feb. 13. The French painter Delaunay, made this picture of martyrdom the subject of one of his most beautiful tragedies.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Polygamy was anciently and still is a prevailing custom in the East (comp. of the Persians, Strabo, xv, 733; Herod. i, 135; iii, 88; Rhode, Hist. Socie., p. 445; of the Indians, Strabo, xv, 714; of the Medes, xi, 526; of the Greeks, vii, 297; see also xvii, 885; on the Egyptians, see Herod. ii, 92; comp. Dios. Sic. i, 80; Hengstenberg, Mos. p. 210 sq.), which stands in close connection with the great fruitfulness of Eastern women; and some have tried to show that it is connected with a preponderance of female births (Marit, Reis, p. 14), but this is denied by Burdach (Physiol. i, 408 sq.) and the most recent authorities. Even the Mosaic law did not forbid polygamy (Polygyna), which, indeed, existed among the Israelites from the beginning of their nation (Gen. xxvii, 9; xxix, passim; xxxvii, 2; xlvi, 10), but seems to be expressly permitted (Deut. xxvii, 16 sq.; Exod. xxii, 9 sq.; Lev. xviii, 18), and there are several direct instances under the law (Judg. viii, 30), and more indirect ones (x, 4; xii, 9), of polygamy, or at least bigamy, chiefly in the time of the Judges. Yet the lawgiver had certainly placed difficulties in the way of polygamy by many remarkable directions (comp. the Koran, iv, 3, which allows a Musulman but four wedded wives, without, however, limiting the number of his concubines). The Mosaic law aimed at matrimonial rather than removing evils which were inseparable from The state of society in that day. Its enactments were directed—

(a.) To the discouragement of polygamy; this object was forwarded by the following enactments: (1.) The castration of young men, which is usually associated with marriage, is forbidden (Deut. xxiii, 1), and thus the attendants in the harem were not easily to be obtained; while marriageable women might reasonably expect each to obtain a separate husband. (2.) Every act of sexual intercourse rendered the man unclean for a day (Lev. xv, 18), which, with a considerable number of women, each of them having her peculiar claims upon him, would have been very burdensome. (3.) The favoring of one wife among several was forbidden (Exod. xxi, 8 sq.), and the man was required to perform his marriage obligations in equal measure to every wife. This limitation also would be oppressive to many. Besides all this, the mutual jealousy of the several wives of one man, which is the inevitable consequence of polygamy (1 Sam. i, 2 sq.; 2 Chron. xi, 21), renders home life unpleasant (Niebuhr, Beschreibung, p. 73 sq.). The same reason keeps some Turks from polygamy now (D'Ohsson, ii, 366 sq.; Volney, ii, 360 sq.). The result was that most Israelites contented themselves with a single wife (see Prov. xii, 4; xiii, 11; xxxi, 10 sq.), or at most took one or two concubines in addition. The same aspect appears to have been the case with the ancient Egyptians (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, ii, 62 sq.). In the age before the Captivity monogamy appears to have prevailed (comp. Tobit i, 11; ii, 19; viii, 4, 13; Susan. 29, 63; Matt. xviii, 25; Luke i, 5; Acta v, 1). It became acknowledge, too, as a prescriptive obligation, although the doctors of the law still held to their old canon, that a man might marry wives at pleasure—a hundred if he would—provided that he had means of support for them. Hence we cannot in 1 Tim. iii, 2; Titus i, 6, think of a simultaneous polygamy (comp. Amschler, p. 122 sq.), as, although we must confess that Paul's expressions, taken alone, most naturally bear this interpretation. The Talmudists insist that no Jew can have more than four wives at once, and a king, at most, but eighteen (Otero, Lex. Rubbin, p. 228 sq.; see esp. Selden, Jus Nat. et Gent. v, 6; Buschor, Sponsal. p. 47 sq., in Ugolino, Theaur., vol. xxx; Michaelis, Mos. Ritu. ii, 171 sq.; Jahn, i, ii, 235 sq.; comp. Selden, De Polygamia, bk. vii, in his Otia theolog. p. 349 sq.). According to Deut. xxvi, 17, kings were forbidden to take many wives; but in spite of this prohibition they (as e.g. David, 2 Sam. v, 15; Solomon, 1 Kings xi, 8; Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xvi, 11; Abijah, xiii, 21, and others; and so Herod the Great, Josephus, Ant. xvii, 1, 8) had large harems, for whose service they procured eunuchs in foreign lands. See HAREM.

(b) The second object of the Mosaic regulations on the subject was to obviate the injustice frequently consequent upon the exercise of the rights of a father or a master. This was attained by the humane regulations relative to a captive whom a man might wish to marry (Deut. xxv, 10-14), to a purchased wife (Exod. xxii, 7-11), and to a slave who either was married at the time of his purchase, or who, having since received a wife at the hands of his master, was unwilling to be parted from her (xxi, 2-6), and, lastly, by the law relating to the legal distribution of property among the children of the different wives (Deut. xxv, 15-17). These provisions embrace two quite distinct cases. (1.) The regulations in Exod. xxii, 7-11 deserve a detailed notice, as exhibiting the extent to which the power of the head of a family might be carried. It must be premised that this case was brought about by the Hebrew parents being under age at the time of her sale (otherwise her father would have no power to sell), and that the object of the purchase was that when arrived at puberty she should become the wife of her master, as is implied in the difference in the law relating to her (Exod. xxii, 7) and to a slave purchased for ordinary work (Deut. xv, 12-17), as well as in the term amud, "maid-servant," which is elsewhere used convertible with "concubine" (Judg. ix, 18; comp. viii, 31). With regard to such it is enacted (1) that she is not to "go out as the maidservants" (i.e. be freed after six years' service, or in the year of jubilee; Deut. xxiv, 14), and that the master either already has made, or intends to make her his wife (ver. 7); (2) but, if he has no such intention, he is not entitled to retain her in the event of any other person of the Israelites being willing to purchase her for him for the same purpose (ver. 6); (3) he might, however, assign her to his son, and in this case she was to be treated as a daughter, and not as a slave (ver. 9): (4) if either he or his son, having married her, took another wife, she was still to be treated as a wife in all respects (ver. 10); and, lastly, if neither of the three contingencies took place (i.e. if he neither married her himself, nor gave her to his son, nor had her redeemed), then the maiden was to become absolutely free without waiting for the expiration of the six years or for the year of jubilee (ver. 11). (2) In the other case (Deut. xxii, 10-14) we must assume that the wife was a non-Israelite slave; otherwise the wife would, as a matter of course, be freed along with her husband in the year of jubilee. In this case the law itself speaks of the absolute property of the master, and the position of the wife would be analogous to that of a Roman, the "concubine," who was not considered capable of any connubium. The issue of such a marriage would remain slaves in accordance with the maxim of the Talmudists, that the child is liable to its mother's disqualification (Ammak. i, 12). Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 9) states that in the year of jubilee the slave, having married during service, carried off his wife and children with him: this, however, may refer to an Israelite maid-servant. See Captive.

(c.) The third object of the Mosaic statutes on this subject is to obviate the injustice attending upon a man who is not at liberty, and who was required to be attended to, and this was effected by rendering divorce a formal proceeding, not to be done by word of mouth as heretofore, but by a "bill of divorcement" (Deut. xxiv, 1), which would generally demand time and the intervention of a third party, thus rendering divorce a less easy process, and furnishing the wife in the event of its being carried out, with a legal evidence of her marriageability: we may also notice that Moses wholly prohibited divorce in case the wife had been seduced prior to marriage (xxii, 29), or her chastity had been grievously injured (xxiv, 8). See Divorce.

(d.) The fourth object, which was to enforce purity of life during the maintenance of the matrimonial bond, forms the subject of one of the ten commandments (Exod. xxx, 14), any violation of which was punishable with death (Lev. xv, 10; Deut. xxiii, 22), even in the case of a betrothed person (Deut. xxiii, 23, 24). See Adultery.

The practical results of these regulations may have been very salutary, but on this point we have but small opportunities of judging. The usages themselves, to which we have referred, are full of force to a late period. We have instances of the arbitrary exercise of the paternal authority in the cases of Achan (Judg. i, 12), Izbaz (xii, 9), Samson (xiv, 20; xv, 2), and Michal (1 Sam. xviii, 25). The case of Abishag, and the language of Adonijah in reference to her (1 Kings i, 2; ii, 17), prove that a servant had no protection at the disposal of his or her master. Polygamy also prevailed, as we are expressly informed in reference to Gideon (Judg. viii, 30), Elkanah (1 Sam. i, 2), Saul (2 Sam. xii, 8), David (v, 13), Solomon (1 Kings xi, 3), that there were many marriages in Canaan (viii, 8, 9), Rehoboam (2 Chron. xii, 21), Abijah (xiii, 21), and Joash (xxix, 8); and as we may also infer from the number of children in the cases of Jair, Izbaz, and Abdon (Judg. x, 4; xii, 9, 14). It does not, however, follow that it was the general practice of the country: the inconveniences attendant on polygamy in small houses or with scanty incomes are so great as to put a serious bar to its general adoption, and hence in modern countries where it is fully established the practice is restricted to comparatively few (Niebuhr, Voyag., p. 63; Lane, i, 289). The same rule holds good, and comes immediately before him. The practice of polygamy are exhibited in the jealousies between the wives of Abraham (Gen. xvi, 6), and of Elkanah (1 Sam. i, 6); and the cases cited above rather lead to the inference that it was confined to the wealthy. Meanwhile it may be noted that the theory of monogamy was retained in common practice; and that the picture of domestic bliss portrayed in the poetical writings of this period (Ps. cxviii, 3; Prov. v, 18; xviii, 22; xix, 14; xxxi, 10-29; Eccles. i, 9). The sanctity of the marriage-bond was too frequently violated, as appears from the frequent allusions to the "strange woman" in the book of Proverbs (ii, 16; v, 20, etc), and in the denunciations of the prophets against the prevalence of adultery (Jer. v, 8; Ezek. xviii, 11; xxiii, 11).

In the Coot-Babylonian period monogamy appears to have become more prevalent than at any previous time; indeed, we have no instance of polygamy during this period on record in the Bible, all the marriages noticed being with single wives (Tob. 9, 11; i1; Susan. 29; G. Matt. xviii, 25; Luke i, 5; Acts v, 1). During the Mosaic period the practice had passed away in Ecles. xxvi, 1-27. The practice of polygamy nevertheless still existed; Herod the Great had no less than nine wives at one time (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 1, 8); the Talmudists frequently assume it as a well-known fact (e. g. Lev. xix, 1; Deut. xxii, 29; and the early Christian writers, in their comments on 1 Tim. iii, 2, explain it of polygamy in terms which leave no doubt as to the fact of its prevalence in the apostolic age. Michaelis (Laws of Moses, iii, 5, § 96) asserts that polygamy ceased entirely after the return from the Captivity; Selden, on the contrary, maintains that it remained among the Jews until the time of Honorius and Arcadius (cir. A.D. 400), when it was prohibited by an imperial edict (Ux. Ebr. i, 9). See MARRIAGE.

POLYGAMY, CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE CONCERNING. Jesus does not directly forbid polygamy, nor even revert to the subject, since it had been almost universally given up. No case of polygamy among the Jews is presented in the Gospel narrative; and when a wife is mentioned, it is stated or implied in the account that she is the wife of a man. The special evil of the society was the facility with which a divorce could be obtained by a man for any reason, often a trifling cause. Our Lord, when the Pharisees asked him (Matt. xix, 3-9) whether it was lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause, replied that God at the beginning made them one male and one female (Gen. i, 27), and indirectly condemning polygamy as contrary to the original institution of marriage: with a male and a female only polygamy was impossible. He then declares that the bond of marriage is indissoluble; the husband and wife are no more twain, but one flesh; and what God hath joined together let no man put asunder: and afterwards replies to their question on divorce: "Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so." The practice of polygamy then existed by permission, not by command. It was a positive temporary regulation of Moses as a political governor, not of God as a moral ruler. The Jews had become hardened in their hearts; they were harsh and severe even to their own flesh. Their nearest relatives they treated with the utmost severity. It will not be brought into such a state that they could feel and understand the force of law, it was necessary for their rulers meanwhile to devise prudential regulations for the purpose of checking their lawlessness. All the evils of that early and idolatrous age of the world could not be remedied in a moment; and such was the state of society that not even until the advent of the Saviour was the institution of marriage restored to its primate integrity by revoking the permission of polygamy and divorce. The teaching of the apostle Paul, too, is worthy of most serious attention, as the subject of polygamy must have come immediately before him. The converts in the apostolic age may be divided into three classes: Jews, Romans, and Greeks. Polygamy, though not unknown among the Jews, had fallen, as we have said, into general disuse. It was positively forbidden by the Roman law, though divorce was even more frequent among the Romans than the Jews; but in the Oecumenia was the common usage of the Greeks. Thus Theodoret says: Πάλιν γαί ετώθεναν καὶ Ἑλληνες καὶ Ιουδαῖοι καὶ ἔως καὶ γυναῖκες γυναῖκας γυμνὰ γάμος κατὰ γυμνόν γυναικόν (Com. in 1 Tim. iii, 2). The epistles of Paul were generally addressed to Grecian converts: let us see, then, how he dealt with the question, which must have come directly before him. Two ways were open to the apostle: either a partial or temporary toleration, or an immediate and direct prohibition of the custom. The multitude of Greek converts were undoubtedly polygamists; it must seem a hard necessity, and would produce much domestic discontent and misery, to compel converts to abandon their wives legally married according to the Grecian law. Did, then, the apostle permit the usage temporarily, either till that general permission, or until the converts were willing to conform to the higher Christian standard? We most emphatically reply that the apostle never for even the briefest period tolerated polygamy among baptized or Christian disciples, and that it never existed in the Christian Church at all. Had it been tolerated even temporarily, some notice or reference to it would be found in the apostolic epistles. The sincerity of converts must have been put to a severe test: to give up their wives no doubt often involved a painful sacrifice to Christian duty, yet so emphatic and so absolute was the apostolic prohibition that not a murmur of opposition was heard from Corinth, Ephesus, Philippi, Thessalonica, and other Christian communities. The apostle often censures Grecian converts for their violation of Christian duty; some of them having fallen from their regenerate state, and abandoned themselves to their old sins; but we find no reference to polygamy in his epistles, nothing which implies that it was continued or even known among them. There is no mention, however remote or indirect, of a wife's wife. This silence can only intimate the utter abandonment of that usage among them, as clearly as the most emphatic statement. It could not have been tacitly allowed as indifferent, or permitted even for a brief period; since it must be remembered that the apostle had expressly forbidden polygamy, and if it existed at all in the Christian communities to which he wrote, it could only have been in defiance of his direct prohibition. No language can be plainer than that of 1 Cor. xii, 7: "Let every man have his own wife, and every woman her own husband; let the husband depart from his wife, but a husband put away his wife." Again, the non-existence of polygamy in the apostolic churches is implied in the same apostle's comparison of marriage to the union of Christ and his Church. The apostle says: "The husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the Head of the Church" (Eph. v, 23). But as Christ and Church, as Paul says, is one body (Eph. iv, 4), there would be no meaning in the comparison, no similarity in the things compared, if the husband might have a plurality of wives: the marriage union would not then be the representation of any unity of person with the one body, which is his Church. Taking, again, the testimony of the Catholic Church, the evidence against polygamy will appear most positive and decisive. The mind of the divine Legislator was so clearly and inexpressably stamped on his followers, that the usage in early and later ages of the Church was utterly unknown; there is no instance on record of a baptized polygamist for fifteen hundred years after Christ. Catholic, schismatic, and heretic, amid all their differences, agreed at least on this point. No professing Christian ever entertained the grossest belief or scandalous views on the subject of marriage, even ventured to revive the interdicted usage. The testimony of the Church, clearly brought before us by the consentient practice of Christians in all ages, is too explicit to leave room for further controversy; or any real doubt of the teaching of the New Testament. Besides, the practice in the whole world was strictly uniform, with one exception in the 16th century. In an evil hour Luther unhappily gave permission to one of his followers to marry a second wife during the lifetime of the first—the landgrave of Hesse. He was the first and the only Protestant polygamist of the Christian Church.

In recent times the question of polygamy has re-opened in the Christian Church, and has assumed great importance. Bishop Colenso in Africa, and missionaries of several denominations in India, have deemed it expedient to allow heathen polygamists to retain their wives after baptism; though, on becoming Christians, they are forbidden to add to the number of them. Polygamy converts are not allowed, as being it is supposed in an inferior state, to bear office in the Church. *No expression of the subject and corresponding practice can only be founded on an opinion or theory, which, if true, would render polygamy universally allowable among Christians. Let us ask ourselves the question, Is polygamy, according to the new dispensation, allowable, indifferent, or sinful? If it is indifferent, why should it only be partially concealed, and not permitted at all times? If it be wrong or sinful, how can we be justified in allowing it even during the shortest period? Its temporary permission among heathen converts rests on no authority, scriptural or patristic, or any other place whatever; no authoritative precedent can be quoted, though it is obvious that the same reasons for it might have been alleged in the apostolic age, and also, it may be added, by missionaries in any subsequent period, as in modern times. In truth, its permission under any circumstances can only be logical sequence lead to its full sanction, as in the foul and degraded system of Mormonism. But the defenders of modern polygamy will perhaps say that their strongest argument in its defence has not yet been examined: they lay especial stress on the examples of the Old Testament, which is precisely the real reason why they venture to allow it, maintaining that God would not have permitted it for many ages had it been necessarily immoral or sinful. But are they prepared to say—which is the real question at issue—that in the New Testament there is no positive prohibition on the subject of marriage? If there be, the argument derived from the permitted usage of the old dispensation is of no value whatever, and may thus be stated: there was no positive law on the subject in the old dispensation, and hence many of the Jews were polygamists; there is a direct law or precept in the New Testament, and as such binding on believers, by which the Christian is limited to one wife. But should it be asserted that there is no positive precept on marriage in the New Testament, it will be inconsistent with the old dispensation for instruction and guidance; in which case, why should we permit polygamy only for a time, or in the case of heathen converts, instead of allowing Christians universally to follow, if they please, the example of the patriarchs and saints of the Jewish Church? By polygamy they were permitted to follow the conversions of heathenism, on the ground that there is no positive precept on the subject in the New Testament, and that we may have recourse to the permission of the Jewish law, no reason most assuredly can be given why Christians generally should not be permitted to avail themselves of the sanction given to polygamy in the old dispensation, and by the example of its patriarchs and saints. *"Experience," says Dr. Spring, "has abundantly and painfully proved that polygamy debases and brutalizes both the body and the mind, and renders society incapable of those generous and refined affections which, if duly cultivated, would be found to be the inheritance even of our fallen nature. Where is an instance in which polygamy has not been the source of many and bitter calamities in the domestic circle and in the Church? What has it brought forth, save heaven-taught progeny? Where has it been distinguished for any of the moral virtues; or, rather, where has it not been distinguished for the most fearful degeneracy of mankind? Where has it ever been friendly to posterity? It might be shewn that the number of male infants exceeds that of females in the proportion of nineteen to eighteen, the excess of the males scarcely providing for their greater consumption by war, seafaring, and other dangerous or unhealthy occupations. It seems to have been 'the order of nature and of Providence'; and the practice was the object of modern men. And where has polygamy ever been friendly to the physical and intellectual character of the population? The Turks are polygamists, and so are the Asiatics; but how inferior a people to the ancient Greeks and Romans? The practice of polygamy has sometimes been alleged to originate in the influence of climate, but the fact cannot be denied that in the coldest as well as in the warmest climates it is found to exist. And though it must be admitted to prevail more extensively in regions situated towards the south, the means by which it is supposed to be found in ancient usage or religion. The manners of different countries have varied in nothing more than in their domestic constitutions. Less polished and more luxurious nations have either not perceived the vices or interests of polygamy, or, if they have, have declared that they who in such countries possessed the power of reforming the laws have been unwilling to resign their own gratifications. Polygamy is retained at this day in all Mohammedan countries, and throughout the whole Eastern world (see a recent article on this subject in the Westminster Review, Oct., 1867); and even in countries like Algiers, where the French controlling influence is manifest, the Jews practice polygamy to a large extent. *But among Western, or, better, Christian nations, it is universally prohibited. In Sweden it is punished with death. In England, besides the nullity of the second marriage, it subjects the offender to transportation or imprisonment and branding for the first offence, and to capital punishment for the second. About the middle of the 16th century, Bernardinus Ochinos, general of the Order of Capuchins, in Mercaturas,二人itas Hypotyphsytive, *Diologues in favor of polygamy, to which Theodore Beza wrote a reply. In 1682 a work entitled Polygamy Triumphant appeared under the name of Theophilus

* In 1834 the conference of missionaries of various denominations in Calcutta, including those of the Baptist, the Methodist, the Lourch, and Missiary Societies, the Church of Scotland, and the American Presbyterian Board, after having had the whole subject frequently under discussion, and after much and serious deliberation, unanimously agreed on the following propositions, though, in their expression, has been heretofore a matter of opinion among them on various points: *If a convert before becoming a Christian has married more wives than one, he is not to be permitted to marry again, nor to any office in the Church. In no other case is polygamy to be tolerated among Christians" (Brown, Hist. of Missions, III. 365, 366). If proof of having given that polygamy was allowed in the early Church, all controversy on the subject would have been at an end; its permission in modern times to converts from heathenism might have been allowed, and even in many cases be desirable; but the statement itself is not support whatever either from Scripture or the writings of the fathers, or from reason.
POLYGAMY

Atheism. The true name of the author was Ly-erus, a native of Saxony. In 1780 Martin Madan published Thelphthoria, or a Treatise on Female Ruin, in which he defended polygamy on the part of the man, and was comparatively strong. The monogamous practice occurs among the Mormons. (q. v.) This strange sect teaches that the use and foundation of marriage is to raise up a peculiar, holy people for the kingdom of God the Son, that at the millennium they may be raised to reign with him; and the glory of the man will be in proportion to the size of his household of children, wives, and servants. Quoting the Scripture that "the man is not without the woman, nor the woman without the man," they affirm that it is the duty of every man to marry at least once, and that a woman cannot enter into the heavenly kingdom without a husband to introduce her as belonging to himself. The addition of wives after the first to a man's family is called a "sealing," as a process which constitutes a relation with all the rights and sanctions of marriage. This introduction and continuance of the benevolent and immoral practice of polygamy is likely, sooner or later, to prove destructive to the whole system of Mormonism.

The argument against polygamy from a strictly ethical and social standpoint is thus presented by Paley: "The equality in the character of marriage, and the entrance into the world intimates the intention of God that one woman should be assigned to one man; for if to one man be allowed an exclusive right to five or more women, four or more men must be deprived of the exclusive possession of any; which could never have been the order intended. It seems also a significant indication of the divine will that he at first created only one woman to one man. Had God intended polygamy for the species, it is probable he would have begun with it; especially as he gave to Adam more wives than one, the multiplication of the human race would have proceeded with a quicker progress. Polygamy not only violates the constitution of nature, and the apparent design of the Deity, but produces to the parties themselves, and to the public, the following bad effects: contentions and jealousies among the wives of the same husband; distracted affections, or the loss of all affection in the husband himself; a voluptuousness in the rich which dissolves the vigor of their intellectual as well as active faculties, producing that indolence and imbecility that has been so strongly characterized of the nations of the East; the abatement of one half of the human species, who, in countries where polygamy obtains, are degraded into instruments of physical pleasure to the other half; neglect of children; and the manifold and sometimes unnatural mixtures of the like character in the offspring. In one quarter century of their nation, the French government were compelled to pass a law for the support of orphans. For these evil, polygamy does not offer a single advantage. In the article of population, which it has been thought to promote, the community gain nothing (nothing, I mean, compared with a state in which marriage is nearly universal); for the question is not, whether one man will have more children by five or more wives than by one, but whether these five wives would not bear the same or a greater number of children to five separate husbands. And as to the care of children when produced, and the sending of them into the world in situations in which they may be likely to form and bring up families of their own, upon which the increase and succession of the human species in a great degree depend, this is less provided for and less practicable where twenty or thirty children are to be supported by the attention of one, than if they were divided into five or six families, to each of which were assigned the industry and inheritance (of two parents). Thus far Dr. Paley. We shall close this article with the words of an excellent writer on this subject, Dr. Samuel Richardson, who says, "that the primitive institution of marriage limited it to one man and one woman; that this institution was adhered to by Noah and his sons, amid the degeneracy of the age in which they lived, and in spite of the example of polygamy which the accursed race of Cain had introduced; when we consider how few men of great station (in any degree) examined the effects of polygamy on the faithful; how much it brought its own punishment with it; and how dubious and equivocal those passages are in which it appears to have the sanction of the divine approbation; when to these reflections we add another respecting the limited views and temporary nature of the more ancient dispensations and institutions of religion, how often the imperfections and even vices of the patriarchs and people of God in old time are recorded, without any express notification of their criminality—how much is said to be commanded which our reverence for the holiness of God and his law will only suffer us to suppose were for wise ends permitted; how frequently the messengers of God adapted themselves to the genius of the people to whom they were sent, and the circumstances of the times in which they lived; above all, when we examine the equity, and bENEVOLENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN LAW, THE EXPPLICIT DECLARATIONS OF OUR Lord AND HIS APOSTLE PAUL RESPECTING THE INSTITUTION OF MARRIAGE, ITS DESIGN AND LIMITATION; WHEN WE REFLECT, TOO, ON THE TESTIMONY OF THE MOST ANCIENT FATHERS, WHO COULD NOT POSSIBLY BE IGNORANT OF THE GENERAL AND COMMUNITY PRACTICE OF THE CHURCH; AND, FINALLY, WHEN WE CONSIDER THESE ADDITIONS WHICH ARE MADE ON JUSTICE TO THE FEMALE SEX, AND ALL THE REGULATIONS OF DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND NATIONAL POLICY, WE MUST WHOLLY CONDEMN THE REVIVAL OF POLYGAMY." Polyglot Bibles. Although the earliest specimen of a polyglot was that of a projected work of the celebrated printer Aldus Manutius, of which one page only was published, the first of this kind was the Complutensium Polyglott, entitled Biblia Sacra Polyglotta, completentia Versione Testamentum, Hebraico, Chaldaico, Graeco, et Latino idiomate; Novum Testamentum Graecum et Latinum; et vocabularium Hebraicum et Chaldaeum, cum grammatica Hebraica; necnon dictionario Graeco, De monimentis et miraculis Constantini Porta Ximenes de Cimero (5 vols. fol., in Complutens Universitate, 1514-17). As the title already indicates, we are indebted for this work to the celebrated cardinal, statesman, and general, Francis Ximenes de Cimeros [see XIMENES] who published it at his own expense at the cost of 50,000 ducats or about £15,000, completed in 1517, and published in 1522. The editors were Elius Antonius, Ducas, Fincianus, Stunica, Zamaora, Coronelius, and Johannes de Vergara. The last three were originally Jews. The first four volumes contain the O. T., with the HEBREW, LATIN, and GREEK, in three columns, the TARGUM, and a Latin version of the same. The position of the Latin between the Hebrew and the Greek was to indicate that just as Christ was crucified between two thieves, so the Roman Church, represented by St. Jerome's version, is crucified between the synagoge, represented by the Hebrew text, and the Eastern Church, denoted by the Greek version. The fifth volume contains the Greek Testament, with the Latin Vulgate. The last volume consists of vocabularies, indexes, etc. The Greek Testament was finished in 1517; but the whole work was modern, and not of much critical value (see Dr. Bowring's letter, Monthly Repository for 1827, p. 572). There is little doubt that the celebrated text of the Three Witnesses in this edition was translated from the Latin. There were only 600 copies printed of this splendid work, of which three were on vellum. One of these was sold in England in 1829 for 600 guineas.
The Antwerp Polyglot was published in 1569-72, in 8 vols. fol., at the expense of Philip II, king of Spain, whence it is also called Philipine Bible. It contains, in addition to the Complutensian texts, a Chaldean phrase, the Syriac version, and the Latin translation of Arias Montanus, which was a correction of that of Paginus. It also contains lexicons and grammars of the various languages of the originals and versions. See Arias Montanus.

The Paris Polyglot, in addition to the contents of the former works, has a Syriac and Arabic version of both the O.T. and N.T., with the Samaritan Pentateuch, now published for the first time, and edited by J. Morin, and a Hebrew Bible containing the most ancient transmission of the same. It was published in 1645, in 10 vols. large folio. The editor of this valuable but unwieldy work was Michael le Jay, who was ruined by the publication. See Le Jay.

The London Polyglot, edited by Brian Walton, afterwards bishop of Chester, is much more comprehensive than any of the former. It was published in 1657, in 6 vols. fol. The first volume, besides preludia and a lengthy introduction (published separately by A. Dathie, Lips., 1777), contains the Pentateuch, exhibiting on one page the Hebrew text, with the Samaritan Pentateuch and the Latin Vulgate of the Clementine edition, the Septuagint of the Roman edition, and the various readings of the Cod. Alex., the Latin version of Flaminianus Nobilissimus, the Syriac with a Latin version, the Targum of Jonathan, and the Greek text of Mill of the N.T., together with Luther's German, Diodati's Italian, Ostervald's French, Scio's Spanish, and the English A.V. of the Bible. The prolegomena of S. Lee are a very useful help to the student. The cheapest and most generally useful polyglot is one entitled Polyglotta Bibliae Hebraeae, Vetricae, Samaritanae, Targumicae, Syriacae, Latinae, Aegyptiacae, Arabicae, Septuaginta, Vulgate, et sacri scripturae veteris et novi testamenti originalis, together with the Septuagint, the Syriac (of the New Testament), the Vulgate, the Authorized English and German, and the most approved French Versions, edited by E. De Levante (Lond. 1876, 6 vols. royal 4to).

There are also polyglots of several portions of the Bible, of which one of the most valuable is that published at Constantinople, in Hebrew, Chaldee, Persian, and Arabic, in 1466. The Rabbinical Bibles (q.v.) are in many cases also to some extent polyglot. Polyhistor, Alexander, a Roman writer whose works have been used by the Church fathers, a native of Cyzicus in Phrygia, according to some, and of Mileitus according to others, was a geographer and historian, who lived in the 7th century of Rome, and was taken prisoner by the Romans in the war of Sulla against Mithridates. Being purchased by Cornelius Lentulus, he was intrusted by him with the education of his children, and at last received his freedom. He then assumed the name of Cornelius, after that of his patron. He resided chiefly at Rome, and had a country-house at Laurentum, in which, having taken fire while he was there, he perished in the flames. He is often mentioned and quoted by Pline the Elder, Diogenes Laertius, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, as a man of very extensive learning; in consequence of which he is called Polyhistor. He wrote a work in forty books, each book being the description of a distinct country. Stephanus Byzantinus mentions his account of Bithynia, Caria, Paphlagonia, Syria, Libya, Crete, and other countries. Clemens Alexandrinus quotes his 'Treatise on the Jews,' of which Eusebius has inserted fragments in his 'Church History.' Clemens Alexandrinus mentions another work of Polyhistor, on the Symbol of Pythagoras; and Cyril of Alexandria, in his work against Julian, quotes his authority on the early history of the world. Unfortunately none of Polybius's works have come down to us.

Polyhymnia, a daughter of Zeus, or Jupiter, and one of the nine Muses. She presided over lyric poetry, and was believed to have invented the lyre.

Polynesia, or the region of many islands (παλεῖς, μασος, and φηγοῦσα σε αἰeither the name usually given, which is of origination, to the numerous groups of islands, and some few single islands, scattered throughout the great Pacific Ocean, between the eastern shores of Asia and the western shores of America. In its widest signification, the term Polynesia might be understood as embracing, besides the groups hereafter to be mentioned, the various islands, large and small, of the Indian Archipelago, in one direction, and the vast island of New Holland (q. v.) or Australia, with its dependency of Van Diemen's Land, in another. Including these, the whole region has sometimes been called Oceanica, and sometimes Australasia—generally, however, in modern times, to the exclusion of the islands in the Indian Archipelago, to which certain writers have given the name of Malayasia. In proportion, also, as the area of maritime discovery has become enlarged, it has been thought convenient by some geographers to narrow still further the limits of Polynesia, to the exclusion of Australia and Van Diemen's Land; while others, again, exclude Papua (q. v.) or New Guinea, New Ireland (q. v.), Solomon's Isles (q. v.), the Louisiade group, the New Hebrides (q. v.), and the Fidschi Islands, and retain others of great and single islands, together with New Zealand (q. v.), from the area of Polynesia, and give to these, in union with Australia, the collective designation of Australasia. To all these, with the exception of New Zealand, French writers have given the name of Melanesia, or the Black Islands; while a similar name, Kelenonesia, has been given to them by Prichard and Latham—purely, however, on ethnological grounds, as we shall presently notice. Thus we have the three geographical divisions of Malayasia, Australasia, and Polynesia, the last mentioned of which embraces all the groups and single islands not included under the other two. Accepting this arrangement, still the limits between Australasia and Polynesia have not been very accurately defined; indeed, scarcely any two geographers appear to be quite agreed upon the subject; neither shall we pretend to decide between the classifications. The following list, however, comprises all the principal groups and single islands not previously named as coming under the division of Australasia—viz.: 1. North of the equator—the Ladrones or Marian Islands, the Pamilacan, the Caroline Islands, and the Borneo, Formosa, Leyte, and the Sandwich Islands, Gilbert's or King George's Archipelago, and the Galapagos. 2. South of the equator—the Ellice group, the Phoenix and Union groups, the Fiji Islands, the Friendly Islands, the Navigator's Islands, Cook's or Harvey Islands, the Society Islands, the Dangerous Archipelago, the Marquesas Islands, Kermadec Island, and Easter Island. (In the former part of this article we largely depend upon Chamber's Cyclopedia, and in the latter part upon Gardner's Faiths of all Nations.)

Geographical Description.—These islands, which extend from about 30° north of the equator to about 30° south of it, are some of them volcanic in their origin, and some of them coralline. The volcanic islands generally rise to a considerable height above the level of the ocean, and are therefore called the high islands, in contradistinction to the coralline or low islands. They contain many craters, the igneous fountain of which are the principal the Friendly Islands, one of which, Otaheite or Tahiti, has a mountain rising to the height of 10,000 feet; the Marquesas Islands (q. v.), also very high; the Samoan (q. v.) or Navigator's Islands; and the Sandwich Islands (q. v.), of the latter of the foyers of which possesses several both active and extinct craters, 18,000, 14,000, and even 16,000 feet high. The Gala-to Easter Island, and from the Sandwich Islands to New Zealand, became inhabited by tribes different from, but still related to, the Polynesians. That line, whichever it be, where the continuity of successive islands is the greatest, and whereon the fewest considerable interspaces of ocean are to be found. This is the general answer a priori, subject to modifications from the propensity of the Polynesian nature, and from prodigious effort, he elevated them to the height of a tree called kava-riki, which is as large as the sycamore. By the third attempt he carried them to the summits of the mountains; and, after a long interval of repose, and by a most prodigious effort, he elevated them to the station. This vast undertaking, however, was greatly facilitated by myths of dragon-flies, which with their wings severed the cords that confined the heavens to the earth. Now this individual was deified; and up to the moment that Christianity was embraced, the deified inhabitants were considered as the "smallest of the heavens." The Polynesians had various other gods who were deified men. The chief of these deities, to whom mothers dedicated their children, were Hirn, the god of thieves, and Oro, the god of war. The idols worshipped were different in almost every island and district. Besides the numerous objects of adoration, the islanders generally, and the Samoans in particular, had a vague idea of a Supreme Being, to whom they gave the name of Tangaroa. The mode in which these gods were adored is thus described by Mr. Williams: "The worship presented to their eyes a spectacle of prayers, incantations, and offerings of pigs, fish, vegetable food, native cloth, canoes, and other valuable property. To these must be added human sacrifices, which, at some of the islands, were fearfully common. An idea of their address to their addresses to the gods may be formed of their anguish in the sentence with which they invariably concluded. Having presented the gift, the priest would say, 'Now, if you are a god of mercy, come this way, and be propitious to this offering; but if you are a god of anger, go outside the world, you shall neither have temples, offerings, nor worshippers here.' The infliction of injuries upon themselves was another mode in which they worshipped their gods. It was a frequent practice with the Sandwich Islanders, in performing some of their rites, to knock out their front teeth, and the Friendly Islanders to cut off one or two of the bones of their little fingers. This, indeed, was so common that scarce an adult could be found who had not in this way mutilated his hands. On one occasion, the daughter of a chief, a fine young woman about eighteen years of age, was standing by my side, and as I saw by the state of the wound that she had recently performed the ceremony, I took her hand, and asked her why she had cut off her finger. Her affecting reply was that her mother was ill, and that, fearful lest her mother should die, she had done this to induce the gods to save her. 'Well,' said I, 'how did you do it?' 'I knocked a hole in the shell, and worked it about till the joint was separated, and then I allowed the blood to stream from it.' This was my offering to persuade the gods to restore my mother.' When, at a future period, another offering is required, they sever the second joint of the same finger; and when a third or fourth is demanded, they amputate the same bones of the other little finger; and when they have no more joints which they can conveniently spare, they rub the stumps of their mutilated fingers with rough stones, until the blood again streams from the wound. Thus 'in the sorrows multiplied who hasten after other gods.'

The most affecting of the religious observances of the Polynesians was the sacrifice of human victims. This horrid custom did not prevail at the Navigator Islands; but it was carried to a fearful extent at the Harvey group, and still more at the Tahitian and Hauhau islands. At one ceremony, called the Feast of Restoration, no fewer than seven human beings were offered in sacrifice. On the eve of war, also, it was customary to offer human victims. It may be interesting to notice some of the circumstances in which the last mentioned were offered at Tahiti. "Pomare was about to fight a battle, which would confirm him in, or deprive him of, his dominions. To propitiate the gods, therefore, by the most valuable offerings he could command, was with him an object of the highest concern. For this purpose rolls of native cloth, pigs, fish, and immense quantities of other food were presented at the maraes; but still a tabu, or sacrifice, was demanded. Pomare, therefore, sent two of his messengers to the house of the victim whom he had marked for the occasion. On reaching the house they were received by the wife where her husband was. She replied that he was in such a place, planting bananas. 'Well,' they continued, 'we are thirsty; give us some cocoa-nut water.' She told them that she had no nuts in the house, but that they were at liberty to climb the tree and take as many as they desired. They then requested her to lend them the o, which is a piece of iron-wood, about four feet long and an inch and a half in diameter, with which the natives open the cocoa-nut. She cheerfully complied with their wishes, little imagining that she was giving them the instrument which, in a few moments, was to inflict a fatal blow upon the head of her husband. Upon receiving the o, the men left the house, and went in search of their victim; and the woman, having become rather suspicious, followed them shortly after, and reached the place where the Barotome to see the blow which would fall. She rushed forward to give vent to her agonized feelings and take a last embrace; but she was immediately seized and bound hand and foot, while the body of her murdered husband was placed in a long basket made of cocoa-nut leaves and borne home from her eight days after the act of murder was performed, and afterwards always exercised great care to prevent the wife or daughter, or any female relative, from touching the corpse, for so polluted were females considered that a victim would have been desecrated by a woman's touch or breath to such a degree as to have rendered it unfit for an offering to the gods. While the men were carrying their victim to the maraes, he recovered from the stunning effect of the blow, and, bound as he was in the cocoa-nut leaf basket, he said to his murderers, 'Friends, I know what you intend to do with me; you are about to kill me, and offer me as a tabu to your savage gods; and I also know that it is useless for me to beg for mercy, for you will not spare my life. You may kill my body, but you cannot hurt my soul; for I have begun to pray to Jesus, the knowledge of whom the missionaries have brought to our island: you may kill my body, but you cannot hurt my soul.' Instead of being moved to compassion by his affecting address, they laid him down upon the ground, placed a stone under his head, and with another beat it to pieces. In this state they carried him to their 'savage gods.' Thus passed the last sacrifice offered for so long after Christianity was embraced, and the altars of their gods ceased to be stained with human blood.

The Polynesians, in their heathen state, had very peculiar opinions on the subject of a future world. The Tahitians believed that there were two places for departed spirits. Among the Rarotongans paradise was a very long house encircled with beautiful shrubs and flowers, which never lost their bloom or fragrance. The inmates, enjoying perpetual youth and beauty, spent their days in dancing, festivity, and merriment. The hell of the Rarotongans consisted of a place where the poor souls had to crawl around this house, witnessing the enjoyment of its inmates without the possibility of sharing it. The terms on which any one could find an entrance into paradise, as Mr. Williams informs us, were these: 'In order to secure the admission of a departed spirit to future joys, the corpse was dressed in the best attire the relatives could provide, the head was wreathed with flowers, and other decorations were added. A pig was then baked whole, and placed upon the body of the deceased, surrounded by a pile of vegetable food. After this the corpse was placed in the best attire the relatives could provide, the head was wreathed with flowers, and other decorations were added. A pig was then baked whole, and placed upon the body of the deceased, surrounded by a pile of vegetable food. After this the corpse was placed in the best attire the relatives could provide, the head was wreathed with flowers, and other decorations were added. A pig was then baked whole, and placed upon the body of the deceased, surrounded by a pile of vegetable food.

literally explored." The superstitious of the taboo, the use of kava as an intoxicating drink, cannibalism, infanticide, tattooing, and circumcision are now fast disappearing under the influence of Christianity. Unfortunately, however, the contact of these islanders with civilization has not been always productive of unmixed good; the introduction among them of the use of ardent spirits, and of the vices and diseases of Europeans, having thinned the population to a lamentable extent. Far from artistic in the best sense of the word, the natives of Polynesia will be found in some of our articles on the groups regarded as being the most important. Polypheus, in the Homeric mythology, the son of Poseidon and the nymph Thoosa, the most celebrated of the fabulous Cyclopes who inhabited the island of Sicily. He was of immense size, and had only one eye. When Ulysses landed on that island, he entered the cave of Polypheus with twelve companions, of which number this tremendous cannibal ate six. The others stood expecting the same fate, but their cunning leader made Polypheus drunk, then burned out his single eye with a blazing torch, and so escaped, leaving the giant to die of hunger and thirst.

Polystaurion (many crossed), a name given to the cloak of the Greek patriarchs, on account of the many crosses which ornament it.

Polytheism, a general name for those systems of religion which involve a belief in more deities than one.

I. Name.—Neither this word nor the similar ones, atheism, monotheism, theism, are to be found in the ordinary Greek or Latin vocabularies. Philo the Jew, in his "Legge," employs such words as the neuter adjective πολυθεῖον with the article to express the idea; also the forms πολυθεῖος, and in Philo δειον, with the sense now attached to endings in μόνος. Polytheism denotes the belief that there is a plurality of gods, and for the sake of convenience may include dualism, which, however, can be used also to signify the doctrine of two principles that are not necessarily both divine. If it be asked what is intended by gods, we answer: (1) That in the word polytheism the notion of gods does not include the idea of a demiurge or a creator of the world. The latter idea is conveyed by the term "theism," and is generally supposed to belong to the human mind, not to the fact that the human mind cannot readily admit the idea of more than one such being. While, then, monotheism generally means the doctrine of one absolute infinite being, polytheism is not its exact opposite, except in the sense that it treats of the many deities of the most of the ancient nations as inferior to those of the one. This is an accommodation to the state of facts; but in philosophical writing monotheism may itself be divided into absolute and relative, as Schelling has done, with whom the latter denotes the worship of one being, thought of not as infinite, but as limited in his nature. Atheism, again, denies the real existence of any kind of gods; it is alike opposed to polytheism and to monotheism. The idea of God, the infinite one, is not transferable to gods many, and hence there is a necessary vagueness in the heathen conception of their deities, as it respects power, knowledge, duration, especially a parte ante, and other properties. The question, then, arises as to gradations of gods, and as to the difference between them and demigods, heroes, etc. The worship of the latter was in the past as much as the worship of the gods (Josh. xxxii, 2). Some traces of the worship of the one god appear in the history of Melchisedek and of Balaam. Yet all the nations with whom the Jews came into contact worshipped not only more gods than one, but worshipped them by means of images, with the exception of those addicted to the religion of Zoroaster. And many of the Pantheistic, among heathen nations were the results of philosophical reflection, as in Brahminism, where a pantheistic dootrine of the universe prevailed; or in Iranism, where the reforms attributed to Zoroaster show a progress from the earlier Vedic religion, or from something like it. So much the more wonderful is it that the one simplest people of arts and crafts, and innumerable temptations to idolatry and defections from their ancestral faith, to an exalted monotheistic idea of the Godhead, which has been the origin of all the monotheism now existing in the world. (8) Philosophers are divided on the point of the priority of the two religions, systems, the belief in one god or many gods. Although some deists of a former age regarded monotheism as the earlier of the two, the only consistent ground for those who deny supernatural revelation is that of Mr. Hume. This is, in brief, that the natural progress of human thought is from the less perfect through abstraction to the more perfect; that polytheism was universally diffused, and that monotheism, if earlier, could not have been lost. It is needless to say that a great part of the thinking of the present age runs in the same channel. Man was a savage before he became possessed of arts or settled any of the problems of the universe, just as species are evolved out of earlier less finished forms. The many gods were lost out of popular worship, according to Mr. Hume, by adulation, or the zealous attempt of some worshippers to extil the one God manifesting in a manner which is an unfortunate way of accounting for a result that has never been reached, unless it can be shown that an elimination took place in the Jewish system. Opposite to this is Schelling's view in his lectures on mythology, written after he had left his first philosophical position: this was, in brief, that monotheism was prior in the order of time, but without any dogmatic definition or distinct view of the divine attributes. At the same time man was awake to all impressions from the material world, in which the great objects seemed to him full of power and life. In the vision of a worship of nature, which at length drew a part of men away from the worship of the God above nature. This defection made those who resisted it aware, as they were not before, of the vastness, the absoluteness of the one God. Thus the human mind, in the case of those who adhered to the primeval worship, was enlarged in its religious conceptions: it may even be regarded as a part of the scheme of Providence that the apostasy of some helped the infantile race to take grander views of the Supreme Being. (c) The account given in the Scriptures is that the second Adam, man, who was the creature of the Creation, but, as man fell away from God, he did not like to retain him in his knowledge, and that the teachings of the world itself concerning him were rejected (Rom. i., 19-20). He therefore devised a religion and an idolatry of his own, which were consistent with foul wickedness. As the world became darker in its apprehensions of God, God began a new revelation of himself to Abraham, when primeval monotheism was in danger of utterly fading out of human belief. If now we may suppose that polytheism arose when men were but children in art, and that such religious thoughts which went farthest from the central points of the primeval world would easily fall into barbarism, and their religions might show the influences of their new and less favorable situations. (d) Have any traces remained in the world of this primeval monotheism? A number of Christian writers have given an affirmative answer, but they put their reasons for their opinions on diverse grounds. First, we may notice such writers as Cudworth, who in an uncritical way collect together the expressions of writers of every age, and give as much weight to later philosophers as to earlier authors. There is no doubt that philosophers like Plato reached a first principle of the world, or that, before him, Anaxagoras conceived of mind putting already existing matter into appropriate forms. But their voice is not that of popular religion, and in those may be those who have noticed a subordinate among the objects of worship. The supreme god of Greece is a monarch, father of gods and men, with very great powers, the head of moral order, the chief agent in providence. Some of the poets speak of him in terms truly sublime, as in the Suppliants of Eschylus and in the Agamemnon of Sophocles which breathe the spirit of the Scriptures. But all that can be fairly drawn from such evidence is what Naegelsbach draws from it in his Posthomerische Theologie—that there was in the best age of Grecian authors a certain monotheistic tendency which had no decisive control over Greek faith. "This tendency," to use his words, "was an almost unconscious, a ufrete one, an obscure impulse, a light that shineth in darkness, but the darkness comprehended it not." "The religious consciousness, on the one hand, so to speak, reduced the world of gods to Zeus, but on the other could not shake off the plurality of divine forms which nature first furnished to it." If there was any monotheism in the Greek religion it had its representative in Zeus. But what kind of a representative was he? He was not eternal, but born; he was not a creator, for the Greek theology never embraced a creation. He was not all-powerful, but was generally represented as controlled by fate. He had in the popular faith and mythology attributes most unlike those of a divine being. He was, in short, a monarch or semidivine personage surrounded on all sides from the conception of a holy or an absolute being. How could a holy and absolute being become so completely changed in the faith of a nation as to lose not only his absolute character, but also what ought naturally to be fixed in the minds of men—his purity and holiness? We can conceive of men changing their gods, passing from one to many, or from many to one, but we cannot conceive of one and the same god as undergoing such utter transmutations. Still further it has been urged, with justice, that monotheism and polytheism are different names for the same divinity from nature: the second identifies it with nature, and incorporates it in natural objects. The two are entirely different: how can the one slide into or retain characteristics of the other? This argument, however, does not derive its force from the oneness or manifoldness of the objects of worship, but from their essential relations to the world, so that a passing over from the worship of one not absolute god to that of more than one, also not absolute, is far from being incredible. Hence, if we could accept Schelling's view of the creation, we should have an account of the limit of addition to or subtraction from the number of divinities. Nor can we maintain that traces of a primitive monotheism are certainly preserved in the religions of the other nations of antiquity. The earliest records of the Aruian race, as they appear in the Vedas, give us no indication that one god was of a higher class than the rest. Indra, as Prof. Whitney (Orient. and Ling. Studies, p. 86) remarks, "stands at the head of the Vedic divinities. By this it is not meant, however, that he is king among them, endowed with any authority over the rest, but that his worship system had taken place as should establish a relation of this kind among its gods. They are as independent, each in his own domain, as the natural phenomena of which they are the personifications." And the further remark is made that the nature of Varuna's attributes and of his concern with the affairs of human life place him decidedly above Indra. Further, in the later stages of the Indian religions, a deity, comparatively subordinate, Vishnu, has reached a chief place, while the old gods have fallen more or less out of worship. The Iranian or Persian religions contain very considerable conceptions of its supreme divinity, Ormazd, or Ahura Mazda, i.e. the wise lord—called also Spontomaiyus, or the holy-thinking one—the holy spirit, according to Spiegel, while Haag explains this name as denoting the 'white spirit.' It is a question as to which of these two systems the Parsee professes this religion stands very far above all others of the same race. But if Ormazd is a creator, Ahriman (or Angramainyus), the bad spirit, is a creator also; and while there is an evident effort of philosophical reflection to elevate Ormazd, who perhaps represents Varsevand, the primeval god, or the older faith—such, for instance, as Mithra—the religion has not succeeded in attaining to the position of a pure monotheism, but is a dualism with decided remains of polytheism. Once more the supreme divinity of the Greeks and Romans, Zeus or Jupiter, i.e. Div-o-pater, is now thought by the best etymologists to answer to Dyuaus-pita, a mythological conception of the Vedas, who is spoken of as the father of Indra, but who either dropped out of or never fully entered into the Vedic religious system. If he dropped out, we find him retained by other portions of the Indo-European race; if he had not entered into it, we find other members of the same family bringing forward this personality as their chief god. While the Greek and Italic branches did this, we find in Scandinavian mythology a god Tyr, answering, as Jacob Grimm (Deutsche Mythol. ch. ix) shows, to Ziu or Zio, with a genitive Ziwaus or Ziezws, in Old High-German, and thus standing for the same being as Zeus or Jupiter. How can we believe that the representative of monotheism was thus raised or depressed, that he took places where his supposed supreme god, himself gave way to Odin (Wotan)? The true explanation is that the head of the gods, differing in rank but not in nature from the rest, rose and fell in his station, or even dropped out of worship altogether, owing to changes within a nation or race which we cannot understand. This is one only of the many changes through which polytheism passed. It never had any stability or permanent condition. We only add that if Zeus can be explained, as etymology points out, to be the personification of the bright sky or daylight, this again must be regarded as a secondary explanation such a divinity as handing down the monotheistic idea, because this was only one of the most prominent of visible objects. The same remarks in general may be made in respect to the religions of all cultivated races—the Assyrian and Babylonian, the Egyptian and the Mexican religions, for instance. We do not deny that individual reflection may have risen above the level of the religions themselves, or that philosophical doctrine may have sought to mix itself with the prevailing mythologies, but that the polytheistic religions, including the Vedic mythology, are the only form of religion, the visible luminary itself, was among the first divinities of heathenism. The luminary was considered as alive, and possessed of the power of seeing things upon the earth. When Hades snatched away the virgin Proserpine, and carried her to his realms below through a chasm of the earth to be his wife, no one heard her cries for help except Heleon, son of Hyperion and Hecate. Zeus, to whom she cried for help, "was sitting apart from the gods in a throned temple, and receiving choice offerings from mortal men," so he did not hear her (Hymn. to Demeter, 13). Zeus is the living life of the world. A belief in a living deity is at the bottom of every religion, in which he was by no means a very important deity, are all to be referred to the heavenly body, endowed with perception, and noting as well as hearing what takes place here below. The people believed that the sun was a living being, and the philosophers had the same faith. They had long since have ascribed a fiery body and a vital principle to it, and Anaxagoras so offended the Athenians by his doctrine that the sun was a red-hot stone or mass of metal that he was accused of impiety, and, although defended by Pericles, was fined forty talents and taken away (Plat. Apol. Sect., 26 D: Diog. Laert. ii, § 12 sq.). In the same manner the worship of the sun, as distinguished from the sun-gods, appears in the Vedas, although of less importance than these latter; the Greeks attributed the same worship to this luminary among the Persians; and Plato makes Socrates use the following words: "It seems to me that the earliest inhabitants of Greece held those to be gods whom many of the barbarians now regard as such—sun, moon, stars, and heaven" (Cratyl. 387 C). In the Scriptures the worship of the heavenly bodies is shrouded in mystery, and the sole apostasy from God to which Israel was tempted: "Take ye good heed to yourselves ... lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, and the stars, and the earth, and all the host of heaven, shouldest be driven to worship them, and serve them" (Deut. iv, 16-19). But it is the duty of every one of us, let the world be divided into this kind of worship at an early age, to form their own opinions and form their own conclusions."

the reign of Josiah, who put down "them that burned incense to the sun, and to the moon, and to the pian-etes, and to all the host of heaven." We hardly need to remind the reader of the prevalence of such worsips, in Babylonia and Assyria, nor to the fact that sun-worship was the foundation probably of the honors paid to Baal and Moloch among the Ammonites, in Canaan and in Carthage, nor to the importance of this element in the Egyptian religion. We only add that the religion of Peru—that is, the religion of the Incas, which superseded an older religion—was direct sun-worship, and that the same was spread over a large part of this continent, among the tribes even of the Rockies in North America. The heathen powers of the Dakotahs have their Sun-dance, and the Sun Dance is said to date from 1872 one of their practices was to look steadily many minutes at the blazing orb, as an act, it was understood, of religious worship. This is only one of those objects of nature to which were paid divine honors. The earth, as the general nursing mother, the sea, the sky, the life in the air, in trees, even in animals, all seemed to be divine. The Earth particularly—as the Great Mother, the Syrian goddess Cybele, Demeter, Ceres—although exalted into a person separate from the earth, as the cause and Mother of all things, and ultimately to which man was worshipped, and venerated, in every country, as in Asia Minor, with the most frantic rites.

But polytheism would have been comparatively dead, and possessed of fewer attractions to the religious sentiment of many, if it had stopped short in its development, as heathenism in nature. The next step was to convert these comparatively fixed objects, exhibiting superhuman agency to the eyes of men, into persons separated from the objects themselves. The sun, regarded as a god, in this process became a sun-god; this is, his personality was no longer identified with the sun, and confined to its orb, but he became free to go whithersoever he would, and exercise supernatural powers away from the sun, his proper seat. This was a very great stage through which the religions of all the higher races passed. The spirit of the sun, possessed of will and feelings like a man's, but of more than human power, is now free to move abroad, to mingle in human affairs, and thus to transcend his first agency by a very much wider and more varied new one. It is possible for him thus to become mythologetic and to his effects which he produces become great events in history.

The sun-god's rays to the imagination become darts, and as the rays of the sun in summer cause malignant fevers, so he is conceived of as shooting his arrows at men and beasts, the cause being some offence or disdain done to his sacred rites or to his sercrved. So the sun's burning of the body illustrates what we mean, it being assumed, what is now generally admitted, but what some eminent scholars have denied, that Apollo is indeed a sun-god. This the Greeks of the time of Sophocles and Euripides held, but they held it more as an inference than from any traditional opinion. But, furthermore, the sun-god might become the especial object of worship of a city or a tribe—their tutelary god; and thus he acquired a new character, and stood in new relations to a part of a people. From them his worship might spread over the whole of a tribe or of a race, and his old natural origin would be almost lost out of sight; he would have outgrown, so to speak, his youthful properties. In this way it could happen that a war-god could be developed out of the divinity of a nation of warriors, although his attributes at first might have had no relation to armed strife. Thus the Roman god Mars was the divinity of an agricultural people, it seems probable, a god of spring and of fructification, before he became a god of war. Apollo also, if a god of the sun and of light at first, had from this source naturally the attributes of a destroyer and of a healer (Cf. later as protecting the names Apollo and Pan, the aweter and healer), of a pure one and a purifier; to which were added his connection with music and poetry, as well as his prophetic office of giving forth oracles as a mediator between Zeus and mortals. The relations of Apollo to social life in its various departments may have been manifold, but it is hard to see how this can be done.

We have reached the point where we can state in brief several laws, as they may be called, of polytheism, which might be illustrated by an infinite number of facts, but will, we trust, commend themselves to our readers, after what has been said, without much explanation. (1) To a great extent, the God of the ancients was the Sun, or the creator. (2) To a great extent, the foundation is the worship of nature, i.e. of objects in nature which strike the attention of man, and are important aids to his well-being in the world. (3) These objects are conceived of as living existences, and as having, together with the phenomena of nature, the feelings and the will of men. (4) In the course of time, the living thing or god in the natural object becomes detached from it, is conceived of as an agent in human affairs, and may greatly enlarge its sphere of operations. (4) This process changes the attributes and the relations of the divinities. (5) In the later stages, the mythological processes, the religions of heathenism may for some time be in a constant flux, and this will last as long as faith in the gods and the mythological spirit lasts. (5) Among the changes may be mentioned the fairies, the gods of the country, the district becomes the god of a race; (6) foreign gods are introduced; (c) the same divinity, through the help of a new name, becomes a new personality by the side perhaps of the old one; (d) old divinities drop out of use; (e) the importance of different gods may change; (f) what is called theocratic, that is, a confusion of gods, takes place, but generally this is due to philosophical reflection: this is sometimes a pantheistic process, and in the later stages of Greek history it is carried so far that all the leading gods are considered to be forms or expressions for one and the same power; (g) in the most cultivated nations of heathenism there came on a time when the mythology was rejected as being immoral, or was explained on various principles so as to bring it within the limits of the natural, or the religious, attacks of a scepticism produced by moral feeling or philosophical doctrine, lost its hold on the national mind. This would naturally destroy the life of the nation, unless some new religion should take its place.

To illustrate the changes through which the heathen religions pass, and the influence of the natural objects that appears in the Vedas as a simple worship of the gods of light, fire, etc.; then passes into Brahminism, where Yisnu, an inferior god of the Vedas, and Siva, perhaps the same as the storm-god Rudra of the Vedas, take the principal place, and divide in their manifold mythologies the worship of the nation between their respective religions. A second instance is presented by the religion of Rome, which in its early stage was a punc-tilious, superstitious veneration of certain divinities, somewhat allied to those of Greece, together with other vague, shadowy powers, and in its second stage adopted many of the gods and much of the mythology of Greece, so as to throw its own indigenous religion into the shade. Then, in its third stage, Rome almost entirely lost its old religion, and was a common harbor for all Oriental superstitions—the worship of Cybele and Isis and Mithra, and the Virgo Celestia from Carthage, and the Mo-loch-Jupiters of Syria. A third instance, with less clear outlines, is presented by Mexico, the religion of which seems to be a composite made up of parts from the religion of the Mayas, from that of the Toltecs, from that of the Aztecs, and perhaps from other quarters. (6) From this exposition it would seem safe to affirm that few religions preserve anything more than the spirit of their original form. They continue to be religions of nature, that is, of divine power as it appears in the diversified objects of nature. Hence the philosophy which arises in heathen countries will be apt to be pantheistic, to confound God and nature.

Polytheism, in any true view of it, must be considered in its relation to mythology; but we must speak of that in a more liberal and perhaps in a more native manner, viz., as mythology, for we have already considered mythology by itself. Mythology takes up the raw material, so to speak, furnished by heathen theology, and converts it into history, mingling with it much of poetic invention, but all its elements are in the same order of things that the earliest successors of the mythological age believed in their religion in this shape, as presented to them by the imaginations of a prior age unconsciously coloring what they received for true. Mythology starts with attributing to its divinities human form and feelings (anthropomorphism and anthropopathism); and, of course, from these premises infers in regard to events of life certain specific feelings on the part of the gods, resentful or kindly, out of which the events grew. It attributes sex to the gods on natural principles, for in every other respect they differ from the nature of things.

Not always is the sun masculine nor the moon feminine, but all things are alive, and, according to the especial mode of thinking in each nation, male or female. Causation, again, is conceived of under the image of human life, and the life of the gods is conceived of as coming into being, they themselves were begotten by parents, until the mind landed in a first cause, which was blind and impersonal. Thus theogonies arose, such as we find in Greece, Phoenicia, Scandinavia, and even among the savage races of this continent. See Myths and Laws, A room was thus opened for the impure imagination, which, not content with imputing to the gods love and lust towards each other, without regard to the laws of kindred or wedlock, represented them as enamoured of men or women also, and thus the progenitors of extraordinary persons, demi-gods or heroes. From this conception the way was easy towards attributing to extraordinary persons some divine sire or mother, and of alloying them to the celestials. And as thus the gods were only a little higher than mortals, the distance was bridged over, so that demi-gods were both mortal and divine. Hence it became easier to fall down into the worship of men of great power or skill, until in the old age of some of the religions we find kings receiving divine honors even in their lifetime, and deified after their death. This veneration for the phenomena of dream and the so-called phenomena of dreams. In the human mind, so that a doctrine like that of Euenusmus had easy currency when the divine had sunk so low—the doctrine, namely, that all the gods were originally dead men, and were deified on account of great achievements and services to mankind. This is a wilderness where one is in danger of getting lost, and, if one would attempt explanations, must do so with caution. There are many forms of explanation. There is the physical, where phenomena of nature are turned into gods; or the dream, where the dream-solved, meets us of explaining how an event of nature which happens every day is represented in mythology as a unique occurrence in history. There is, again, historical mythology, that in which some fact is the basis, and the drapery is mythological invention. But in adding this drapery, and in other such inventions, the poets did not feel that they were chargeable with fraud, any more than Milton blamed himself for uniting his own poetical threads with the wool of Scripture truth. There was also a mythology breathing an allegorical meaning into the winds, especially Bora, which was more or less worshipped in Greece; and the same is true of volcanic or other subterranean phenomena. In India, and even among our Red men, a similar kind of nature-worship prevailed; in some of the North American Indian tribes the religious system. We have in Greece a working up of this that goes under the name of Hesiod, and may belong to the 8th century B.C.; and the fragments of another also ascribed to a primitive poet, Orpheus, but later by one or two centuries than that of Hesiod. A comparison of these seems to show that the theological poets were in the habit of changing the myths which they had to deal with, either by altering the persons or drawing their materials from earlier poems where a different religious philosophy was exhibited. The mythology of Greece was fully grown in the age of Homer; it is not true that he and Hesiod created it, but rather that they are the witnesses of faith and gave it a form of greater beauty. Nor is it true, as we think, that a priestly class gave the first form to mythology. More true it is to say that a nation did this, and an age—a very long age, perhaps. We are not to conceive of a body of philosophers teaching in figures, the shadows of things real, those realities that lay in sunshine before their own minds; on the contrary, the mythological spirit was spread over all; it was the way in which all conceived of things supernatural.

A word or two may not be inappropriate here in regard to objects of veneration which the Greeks had, a state of things, that is, such as do not attain to the rank of principal divinities, or even of divinities at all, but still played a not unimportant part in some heathen religions. Among these we name, (1) the representations of the human life of the gods, their actions of coming into being, they themselves were begotten by parents, until the mind landed in a first cause, which was blind and impersonal. Thus theogonies arose, such as we find in Greece, Phoenicia, Scandinavia, and even among the savage races of this continent. In India, and even among our Red men, a similar kind of nature-worship prevailed; in some of the North American Indian tribes the north-west wind attained to a high rank among the divinities, was confounded even with the Great Spirit, and played quite an important role in the mythologies. (6) Evil, that is malevolent, spirits, had a place in some religions of the uncultivated races, but in general not a very important place, nor were they worshipped except by way of propitiation. Such were the Brahmās of India, the daeva of Iran, the god Typhon of Egypt, etc.

We have come in the course of our subject to the religions of the uncultivated races, a department of the religions of mankind, where it is difficult to solve all the problems or to get upon entirely satisfactory grounds. Most of the religions have been divided, as by Wuttke (Gesch. d. Heil. Myst. vol. i.), into fetichism and shamanism; but as authors differ greatly in the meaning which they attach to the first of these words, and as what is called shamanism may be found everywhere, we cannot make much headway in our subject by the help of these words. We shall come upon fetichism again when we speak of worship; at present we content ourselves with saying that a fetich, as first used by Des Brosses in his Essai sur le Culte des Dieux Fétiches (1709), signified any object, however great or small, of which a god or spirit was supposed to have the time to reside, and which might be used as a preservative against evil or malignant influences. The word—in the Portuguese form feticco, connected with the Italian faustico, made by art, from the Latin fausticus—which was the object of worship, or by accident. The fetich-worshipper chooses and discards, according to a freak, the object in which his divinity is supposed to lodge. To use Wuttke's language, while in sun or star worship the heavenly body is the object of worship, in feticco worship, "I am the god," the worships of a fetich says to the worshipped object, "thou mayest be, I will permit thee to be, my god." (U. S. vol. i. § 26). Others, as Meiners (Allg. Gesch. d. Religion [Hanover, 1806], vol. i. bk. ii. and J. G. Müller (Amer. Uebers. p. 74, 75), regard the fetich as in the belief of the worshipper's part, a symbol of divinity, but, like the sun or moon, a god. The fetich-worshipper carries his subdivision of nature, which is divine to the rude heathen, further down than the higher races do; he worships many worthless objects. These definitions are not satisfactory to us, nor do they point out any generic difference between the fetich-worshipper and the worshipper of an image of Athene Polia by a principal artist of Greece. For (1) if the fetich were a precious thing in itself, doubtless the Negrito worships the thing he values, and the reason is that he is paid for it. The selection and rejection need not be accounted for, but the worthlessness of the object must greatly contribute to the inconstancy of the devotee. (2) There are villages as well as house fetiches in Africa, and these seem to have a more fixed hold on the religious feeling. (3) It is a soft feeling, and not essentially like the use of saints' bones for the same purpose, and the feeling is like that of the cultivated heathen towards his graven image. This feeling is to be accounted for in part by a confusion of the subjective and the objective. The sense of necessity, caused by the necessity of the fetich, is attributed to the object itself. (4) Some fetiches have the rude beginnings of kinship to men. Here, certainly, there is image-worship in its infancy. (5) The belief in spirits which—to say the least—very many rude races have, is inconsistent with Müller's view of the fetich as the nature-worship of a detached part of nature. The spirit has the fetich for its house, it dwells there, as the Greek god was conceived by the mass of the people to inhabit the statue, and as the pictures of saints in some Catholic lands wink with their eyes because the saint is there in the belief of the superstitious. The fetich is discarded, perhaps, because it ceases to awaken certain religious feelings which it awakened for some reason at first, and so the Negro looks for some other reminder of the spirit's or the divinity's presence. (6) Some fetiches are living animals, and here the inquiry arises, which we must dismiss for the present, whether these are conceived of as tenanted by higher beings, or as symbols of higher beings. The same answer, as it appears to us, must be given as it regards Egyptian or Indian animal-worship, as it regards that which prevails in Africa or America.

We conclude, then, that fetich-worship is not essentially distinct from idol-worship, and we may find all the characteristics of it in the religions of the cultivated men. Among the Greeks, as belonging to an early period of their religion before sculpture had made much proficiency, we find such memorials of gods as three-cornered pillars in the temples of the Charites at Cyzicus, conical pillars of Apollo, the pillar of Hera at Argos, and a plunk of wood sacred to her at Samos, not too sacred to be cut down, and a stone of the mother of the gods, transferred from Pessinus to Rome, and there venerated and carried about in processions. These were fetiches, and so were wrought images, as long as the faith continued that the god was present in the outward object. The most characteristic mark of fetich-worship—as it seems to us—was that which struck the eyes of the first travelers in Africa—its connection with charms, and in general the prevalence of witchcraft, and of various magic arts. The religions are religions of fear, in which the supernatural is selected at will, and thus stands in the way of the higher religious ideas. This cannot have been coeval with the religions themselves. It must have taken some time, perhaps ages, to develop the system of witchcraft or magic arts as we now know them, and to make them a part of their degradation, by which, according to the natural course of things, their degradation has been increased.

Shamanism may be defined as the worship of spirits, so called from the Shaman or priest-conjurer of many religions in the northern part of the world. The spiritual world seems to embrace all things that have life, and in some parts the spirit detaches itself from the tree or other living thing at will, to return there again. This kind of religion has prevailed, or once prevailed, among the Finns, Huns, ancestors of the Magyars, Mongols, Japanese, Chinese, and in Tibet. Something like it is found among the Red men and other aborigines of this western continent.

Some of the Northern Asiatics make a threefold division of spirits: first, the souls or powers which have been taken from the body; second, the spirits of deceased ancestors; thirdly, spirits, some of which may have been human souls, which have a wider sphere of action, such as have relations to a whole tribe or as protectors in certain undertakings. These may be kindly or malignant.

may have denoted at first place of thunder, heaven, then god of heaven, then god in general. The Lapps of Norway have the same in the air, those in the heavens, and others above the heavens. Among the last is a higher god, who creates everything through his son—which must be a conception borrowed from the Christians in their neighborhood. Among the Tungus, the supreme god is the sphere of operation in the spirit system; but above them all is a god of heaven, Boa, who knows all things, but does not concern himself with what comes to pass, nor punish the wicked; and, besides him, a spirit of the sun, more powerful than the rest, to whom prayers are offered. A spirit of the moon would also have dreams come; spirits of the stars, who are protectors of particular men, etc. (Comp. Castrén's lectures on Finnish mythology, translated from the Swedish.) In the religions of our continent the Great Spirit has been supposed, without reason, to have corresponded with God, the sun, north-west wind, etc. The spirits are supposed to be capable of detaching themselves from their corporeal frame, and of taking various forms as they see fit.

It is a most interesting inquiry, but one in which it is difficult to reach certainty, whether there are in the uncultivated races remembrances of a primary monotheistic faith. The difficulty is due to several causes, the first of which is their reserve, often extreme, in communicating with persons higher in the scale of civilization; and the second, their attachment to what some persons may say. Another circumstance to be considered is the propagation of religious ideas from foreign sources—in Africa on both sides of the continent from the Mohammedan which has long been making progress, and in this continent from Christianity. The Bed men near the whites have forgotten their former human sacrifices and cannibalism, and neglect of parents in extreme old age; and they seem to have imitated some religious notions from the white men which have modified their religions. We find, also, this to be sometimes confused by some tribes in Africa that they believe in a being above all, but neglect him because he is too far off, too high to concern himself with their affairs. This may be an excuse for neglect of worship of such a being, or it may be conformable to a real but obscure tradition. We may say that the supreme god to have been in the primeval religion of their fathers, and to have been thrust out of worship by the spiritual weakness and imbecility of fallen man. In some tribes, again, there appear to be no such faint traces of monotheism as were found in Egypt. In Southern Africa, once told the present writer that he never found any such embers of an early religion among those with whom he was conversant. The question is thus one not so easily settled. We close what we have to say of the brief citation from the important work of Waitz (Anthropol. d. Natureveldt, pt. ii, p. 167). He is speaking of the religion of the Negroes. After denying the justice of imputing to them a peculiar and rude form of polytheism, he adds that "the deeper penetration into their religions, to which of late a number of conscientious investigators have attained, leads to the surprising result that a number of Negro tribes, among whom the influence of nations that stand higher in point of culture cannot be pointed out nor scarcely be suspected, have made greater and greater advances in the development of the religious conceptions than almost all other nations in a state of nature. And this to such a degree that, if we may not call them monotheists, still we may assert of them that they stand on the borders of monotheism; while yet their religion is mingled with a great amount of gross superstition, which in the case of other peoples where it is found seems entirely to cover up with its rank growth the purer religious conceptions."

II. Observations.—We have considered polytheism thus far on the side of its nature and origin. We proceed next to a brief exposition of its practical side, or its outward worship, including prayers, invocations of gods, and temples, liturgical services, and offerings.

(1.) Throughout paganism it has been felt that the gods must be approached in a certain way, and the knowledge of that way has been in the hands of a certain priestly or priest-tain tribe or class of men, and not by general credo songs, or formulae, the knowledge of these preserved to this class alone. Moreover, a method of ascertaining the divine will grew up of which they alone had the knowledge. Whatever rites were necessary to propitiate the anger of the gods, or to secure their favor, they alone could ensue. If any occult science relating to human destiny or the divine will existed, they possessed it exclusively. They had from their position such advantages that they first would have the literature, science, philosophy, and history of the nation in their keeping. Thus to a great extent they controlled the progress of events, stood by the side of rulers to direct their counsels, trained the people, shaped the theory of religion, turned it perhaps into a new direction.

The influence and standing of the priests varied with the freedom of the nation, with the compactness of the priestly order, and with various other causes. In some countries, as in Egypt and in India, they formed one of the leading castes, and all knowledge, secular or religious, was in their hands. In the Persian or Zoroastrian religion the priestly class was in the records, has also in the inscription of Behistun (of the time of Darius Hystaspes), in the Greek and Latin writers, the name of Magi. The Magi, according to Herodotus, were a Median tribe, which, becoming necessary for the offices of religion, was diffused over Persia also, and perhaps over East Iran or Bactria. They resembled the tribe of Levi in their living in villages, and had no great political power, owing perhaps to the almost religious authority of the Persian king. The Avesta consists, to a great degree, of long prayers, of invitations to the gods to be present at acts of worship, and the like, and religion entered into all the important concerns of life. Frequent purifications, and the maintenance also of the sacred fire, fall to their office. It is difficult to explain the connection between these Magi and the practice of magic, for there were Babylonian Magi, but the word was probably indigenous in Iran. Duncker, the historian, finds the connection in the formule of conjuration which they used in order to drive away the devus or deva, the evil-minded spirit-servants of Ahriman, an angel of light who had turned into a demon. As for the spirits, just as prayer in India was conceived of as putting a force on the gods.

Greece differed from the nations already mentioned in having no order of priests: any one might assume the office, and discharge the duties of the priest. Formed, and "there is no trace of a priestly discipline propagated by instruction through generations, nor is there any trace of an abiding connection between the priests of different cities" (K. Ostfried Muller, Proleg. p. 249, 290). At Rome the religious institutions took a stronger root, in conformity with the regard for precedent, the formality and the superstition which characterized the early Roman people. The public priesthoods were originally in patrician hands, and the priests long monopolized the knowledge of the calendar and the legal formulae. Moreover, the private rights of families seem to have been thought of more importance than was the case among the Greeks. But there was no caste, there were no hereditary public priestly offices, and politics, becoming a vastly more inviting field, drew to itself the attention and efforts of all men who aspired to influence. The magistrate observed the signs in the heavens and regulated the meeting of public bodies in accordance with their own wishes, under pretence of religious scruples. North of Rome lay the Etruscans, belonging to another race, who had a gloomy religion, in which the art of divination played a more important part than in that of any other nation of which we have knowledge. Here the leading men held the office of priests and the principal priesthoods were hereditary. Beyond the Alps, in Gaul, the Druids formed a great corporation, at the head of which was a kind of pope; while Julius Caesar was struck by the want of a compact priestly class in Germany, and says that the race was not given to sacrifices. In ancient Greece it was not by this means that the Mexicans had a very numerous body of priests, some five thousand of whom are said to have belonged to the great temple at the capital. Over the hierarchy of priests two chiefs selected from leading families presided, who in the main gave to them a high authority in state affairs. Under these chiefs a third, with his subordinates, had superintendence over the lower priests and the seminaries. There were also monks in Mexico, as well as in other adjoining countries, who have been compared with the similar bodies in Buddhist countries. In Peru, owing to the sacred dignity of the Incas, the priests, unless they permitted to the race of the Children of the Sun, had less independent weight than the similar class in Mexico, and the simplicity of the religion may have conduced to the same result.

A kind of spirit worship is mentioned by Tacitus that the virgins of the sun, who, like the Roman vestals, had to keep alive the sacred symbol of fire.

(2.) The objects of worship were either invisible, or distant and yet visible, or something near at hand, in which a divine power was thought to reside. In the first case especially there was a long ing in the pagan mind for some representation or image which might keep the presence of the deity in mind, and thus give a sense of protection to the worshipper. Image-worship, idolatry, arose from a desire, it seems, of guarding the image in the unseen power, or from conceiving that the divine power is lodged in or belongs to the object present before the eyes as being inherent or represented by it. Image-worship has been diffused over the heathen world, but some nations have rejected it. The religion of Ormuzd rejected images and even temples with a kind of fanatical hatred. We believe that there are no traces of it in the Vedas. The Romans at first had only symbols and not forms in the houses of their gods. The probability is therefore that through the whole of the Indo-European race, idol-worship was not known at first; but in Egypt, in Greece, in the Hamitic and in some of the Semitic peoples, on this continent, in Africa, and over the world, no earlier period can be traced than one in which either image symbol or fetish-worship existed. For the recognition of the divinity of nature, one would suppose that images would not be needed by the pagan religious sentiment. The heavenly bodies especially are so great a part of the time in sight that no memorial of them would be needed. Thus we find that in Babylon and Assyria, where sun and star worship, as already stated, was predominant in the worship of sun and star gods, prevailed, Idols were common. Yet we find images of Bel, Nebel, and Merodach (Mercury and Jupiter, spoken of by the prophets (Isa. xlv, 1 f; Jer. 1, 2), while the Phoenician and Canaanite sun-god Baal is represented by pillars of stone and wood 2 Kings x, 26, 27), and Asherah, probably the same as Ashtar, by wooden posts (groves in our version, pasûm). It seems not unlikely that in proportion to the pagan mind's separation of a divinity from the object out of which it grew, the tendency to represent it by images, and especially "after the figure of man" (Isa. xlv, 13), would become more controlling, but to this there seem to be exceptions. As for the direct worship of other objects of nature, as trees and animals, especially snakes, there is no reason why this kind of worship should need images.

And here we come to the difficulty whether the animal is a symbol or a fetish, that is, a tenement of a god; and we may doubt also whether in different parts of the world, as in Egypt and on this continent, the same conceptions lay under this species of culture.

In Egypt the sacred crocodile and Anubis were certainly regarded as incarnations; but many reptiles cannot have preceded and given rise to this belief? The representations with which the Egyptian religion abounds of gods in a composite form, partly human, partly bestial, hawk- or jackal-headed, etc., show a symbolizing of particular qualities united to the expression of intelligence like that of man. But, on the other hand, the worship of animals elsewhere, the great number of sacred animals in Egypt, which it was a crime to kill, and the mummies of which were preserved, seem to point to a stage of worship in that strange country where the marvellous instincts and powers of animals pointed to a god within them all.

After what has been said in another place we need not speak at length of fetish-worship. The vagueness of the word ought to be cured by definitions, or it ought to be driven out of works on the pagan religions. If a fetish is a material in which a god or spirit is conceived to dwell for the time, a spell-bound protector and coadjutor of those who offer him worship, this is a distinct idea; or if it is a tenement chosen by the gods to become the abode of their worship, the fetish is another thing, but when we find, together with stones, mountains, water, wind and fire, plants, animals, and men, heavily bodies also in a certain stage of human culture reckoned as fetishes, it seems as if fetish-worship might be made to include everything. In Greece the Thessalian sorceresses were thought to be able to bring the moon down out of the skies, and to work magic arts by her help. That is, Hecate, the moon-goddess, was believed to be wandering abroad at night, and, being identified with the moon, was thought to have power over all things. The general notion of power over objects of nature appears in the rude fetish-worship of Africa. A clear line cannot be drawn between the religious conceptions of paganism in the lower and in its higher culture.

We have spoken of mixed human and animal forms, where the symbol was the main idea. The highest attainment of idol-worship is to represent the divinity under the form of man. God made man in his image; the pagan lover of beauty makes his god in the form of a man's likeness, not known as at first; but in Egypt, in Greece, in the Hamitic and in some of the Semitic peoples, on this continent, in Africa, and over the world, no earlier period can be traced than one in which either image symbol or fetish-worship existed. For the recognition of the divinity of nature, one would suppose that images would not be needed by the pagan religious sentiment. The heavenly bodies especially are so great a part of the time in sight that no memorial of them would be needed. Thus we find that in Babylonia and Assyria, where sun and star worship, as already stated, was predominant in the worship of sun and star gods, prevailed, Idols were common. Yet we find images of Bel, Nebel, and Merodach (Mercury and Jupiter, spoken of by the prophets (Isa. xlv, 1 f; Jer. 1, 2), while the Phoenician and Canaanite sun-god Baal is represented by pillars of stone and wood 2 Kings x, 26, 27), and Asherah, probably the same as Ashtar, by wooden posts (groves in our version, pasûm). It seems not unlikely that in proportion to the pagan mind's separation of a divinity from the object out of which it grew, the tendency to represent it by images, and especially "after the figure of man" (Isa. xlv, 13), would become more controlling, but to this there seem to be exceptions. As for the direct worship of other objects of nature, as trees and animals, especially snakes, there is no reason why this kind of worship should need images.

The images of the gods, rather than the desire of shelter for the worshipper, gave rise to the temples, which were houses of a divinity; thus Zeus is a god's dwelling from a room, or the dwelling, and edes, in Latin, in the singular is usually a temple, but in the plural a human abode. But neither image nor temple was as important for worship as the altar, which might stand afar from any temple, or near a temple and outside of it, or, it might be, within the temple, with no roof, or an opening in the roof, for the purpose of giving free passage to incense and the smoke of sacrifices into the upper air. When the altar of the god and his statue generally stood above, that the worshipper might look upwards to the representation of the divinity. The temple as well as the statue, in the progress of refinement and of the ritualistic spirit, gained an importance that did not belong to them in the earlier times. It is in the temple principally that architecture in most heathen lands has found the motive for its cultivation, as it was the images of the gods chiefly which promoted the progress of sculpture. We have already had occasion to say that in the Persian religion there were preparations and ceremonies which were, in some respects, similar to the sacrifice of the ancient Greeks. The rite of Egyptian fire and light was an obstacle in the way of confining religious rites within the walls of temples, and the pure original faith of Iran had little need of altars.

4. Worship, in the narrow sense of the word, may include public and private prayers and other liturgical services, with offerings unbloody or bloody, and their attendant lustrations or purifications. Some of these rites, especially such as symbolized certain mythological events, might be secret, but of these mysteries we have no direct records.

Prayer, the natural voice of the being who realizes his dependence, might be informal in the family religion of the pagan, or attended with formalities; it might need the presence of a priest, especially on certain occasions of family or public life. The head of the household might act as priest. In public worship a class of priests took the lead; it was felt that a certain form of words had a peculiar efficacy, and from this notion perhaps belief in incantations derived its birth. In some religions the liturgical forms have been excessively minute and elaborate. We have already referred to the religion of Iran as an example of this. The Avesta is chiefly liturgical. The first part of the Yasna, and a smaller collection, the Vispered, consist principally of praises, thanksgivings, and invocations addressed to various superior beings, the angels, and to other beings at the offerings of the Haoma and at other celebrations. The Yashta or Yasna, a part of the Khordâ-Avesta (Lesser Avesta), consists of prayers and praises addressed to various objects of veneration, as to Mithras, Vṛthraqna or Behram, and the souls of the good. In the early religion of India the three first Vedas, the Rig-Veda, the Sāman-Veda, and the Yajur-Veda, contain a thousand hymns in ten books, the first seven of which consist of hymns addressed to Agni, the fire-god, to Indra, and others. In the ninth book are classed hymns intended for the ceremonies of initiation and preparation. The Sāman-Veda takes most of its materials from the Rig, and adapts them to the purposes of chanting. The Yajur-Veda consists of formulas proper to accompany the various actions of religious worship, and belongs to a time when the worship had become complicated and the importance of the priest had increased. The Romans were in their early days a devout and reverential, but also a formal people. The same adherence to legal precedent which built up their law appeared in the minute observances of their religion; formulas of words had a certain independent power; a breach of silence at prayer and sacrifice was ominous; the evocations addressed to the divinities of conquered towns that they would leave their old abodes were conceived to have the force of a charm; and they were afraid to let it be known what god was the especial guardian of Rome, lest their enemies should practice the same evocations against them. In India, also, prayer was thought of as having a magical power. The old invocation of the sun, called the Gayatri, is of such potency, it is said, that the Brahmin can obtain happiness by whether he performs other religious services or not. The repeating of it in the morning dawn until the sun appears removes every unperceived fault of the night, and a similar repetition in the evening twillight is equally effectual (Wuthe, U. S. vol. ii, § 106, from Manu, ii, 87, 101, 102).

The offerings and sacrifices of a public nature were usually attended by lustrations, which are not to be confounded with purifications of a propitiatory character practiced by those who sought cleansing from guilt. Both kinds of lustrations, however, had the same moral idea, the necessity of a pure mind, for their foundation. In or near the Greek temples, and marking the division line between profane and sacred ground, stood the vessel of holy water (perirkhanterium), for the uses of those who entered the pure interior. After this preparation came the offerings with prayers and praises. In the Oriental religion these offerings were only unbloody, or at least the bloody offerings or sacrifices played a small part. The institutions of Numa sanctioned only such things as the fruits of the field, and the mola salus, or broken grains of spelt mixed with salt. Not even incense was then used by the simple Romans. The usages changed greatly in this particular at a later time, owing to the influence of the Greek settlements in Southern Italy. Among the Hindu horses and horned cattle were frequent victims in the earlier times, but afterwards became less common. In the books of the Vedas nothing is said of animal sacrifices, but it is prescribed that for certain offences (as a fine or an atonement?) a hundred smaller cattle should be offered up. But in Persian history, whether in accordance with or in violation of the precepts of the religion, many sacrifices were made of animal victims. Xerxes offered on his march towards Greece honored the Trojan Athena by sacrificing a thousand cows. At the Strymon the Magi offered up white horses, and at a spot in Thrace called the Nine Bulls nine boys and nine girls from among the native inhabitants were buried alive. Sacrifices in marks that no pieces of the victim were given, as elsewhere, to the gods, since they had need only of the animal's soul. Instead of victims, the great offering in the Indian religion of the Vedic period was that of the soma, a sacred plant or some other plant of the milk-weed tribe, the stalk of which was crushed between stones, and the narcotic juice, mixed with butter, was left to ferment. This mixture was supposed to nourish, strengthen, and even intoxicate the gods. The most absurd superstitious connections were connected with this sacred substance: it was originally in heaven, and came down with the rain to the earth; it was something that a man might offer to the higher gods only, and could feel that he had rendered a favor by it, and had a right to a return. Finally the soma became identified with the moon-god as the cause of fruitfulness. An analogous name in Iran is the Haoma, and obtained from the same or similar plants, played a great part in the services of the old religion of that country. Similar notions that the divine powers partook of and enjoyed sacrifices which were offered to them may be found elsewhere in many religions, but probably none so extravagant.

Sacrifices of victims, or bloody offerings, were sooner or later almost universal. What victim should be selected depended on a variety of considerations. Sometimes it was an animal that injured the gifts presented to a god, or injured that which he protected, as a goat, the destroyer of the vine, was offered to Dionysus, and a swine, which rooted in the ground, to Demeter. Sometimes it was an animal under the god's protection. Sometimes, again, there was a symbolism in the sacrifice, as when a black-colored animal was offered to the Dii Manes at Rome, or a heifer never yoked to Minerva. In Egypt, notwithstanding that the number of sacred animals was very considerable, other victims were selected for offerings. Thus a pig was presented to the god answering to the Hebrew figure of Aspera; a sheep to the mother of the gods, but not to Isis; a cat to Horus; a cockroach, or some kind of Musca, at least, to the goddess identified with Thetis.
Throughout a large part of the world human beings were offered as sacrifices to the gods of the heathen, and the farther back we penetrate into antiquity the more common is this horrid practice. There are two forms of it, the sacrifice of children, especially of the first-born, in connection with the worship of Moloch—perhaps of Baal and other kindred gods—prevalent, as in Phoenicia, the land of Canaan, Moab, perhaps, and Carthage, and traces of the same may be found in the island of Crete. Also in some parts of this continent the same practice seems to have gained some footing to that of the prophet Micah (vi, 7), the law of Moses (Lev. xx, 2-5), the historical books (2 Kings xvi, 3; comp. Deut. xii, 31), and other parts of the Scriptures refer, unless in some of these passages simple illustration by fire without burning may be intended. But far more common was the sacrifice of grown-up men. As nations grew more humane, this practice was softened down; either men condemned to death, who had to die at any rate, were selected as the victims, or a person was scourged or cut out until the blood ran, or the rite was performed upon an image substituted for a human being. Such substitution can be traced in Egypt, Greece, and Rome. In India human sacrifices were introduced, when the obscene and cruel Siva religion spread among the people, into his worship and that of his wife Durga, or Kali. The Brahmana is by Ward and others as saying that Kali "felt a pleasure for a month in the blood of fish offered to her; for nine months in that of wild animals; for a hundred years in that of a tiger; and in that of a lion, a stag, or a man, for a thousand years. Three men’s blood appeased her for a hundred years, her bounty." The offering of blood is like the drink of the gods (the Soma); Brahma and all the gods assemble at the offering" (Ward, iii, 174; Wutke, ii, 355; Asiatic Res. v, 371). In other countries, as in Gaul, in Mexico, in Peru, above all in Mexico, this practice assembles a people, is a common sight, and even now shows itself debased and made savage by his religion. There is ground for believing that cannibalism may have grown out of the sacrificial feasts after battle, when an enemy was slaughtered to the gods who gave the victory.

We ask at this stage of the subject, what was the meaning of pagan offerings? As they understood their religious rites, the unbloody were expressions of gratitude and acknowledgment for protection. Whatever the form of offering was, the god was conceived of as being pleased with them. How did they account for this? They were based on the idea that the gods enjoyed offerings as we enjoy food. The faith of the Aryan in race in regard to the Soma offering, and the idea that the smoke of burning sacrifices was agreeable to the divinities, show the greater forms of anthropomorphism. Sacrifices of a public nature may be regarded as feasts to which a god or gods were invited; the altar was the public hearth; the victim was partaken of by all the worshippers after due purifications, libations, and other preparations; the god had his share of the meal, which went up to him in the skies. At the bottom of all this, however, was that the worshipper gave up something of value, and thus showed his devotion to his protectors. But this explanation does not exhaust the entire meaning of animal sacrifices. Thus certain animals not used for food, as dogs, horses, wolves, bears, and even asses, were in some Greek rites the appropriate victims, the probable reason for which is given by K. Otfried Müller (Dorier, i, 279) that animals hated by a particular god he would be pleased to see bleeding at his altar. The sacrifice of a dog to Hecate may be accounted for from the dog’s baying at the moon, and of a stag to Artemis because she was a huntress. But there were also propitiatory sacrifices required by a feeling of guilt and of dread. Here life is given for life. It seems impossible to put less meaning into such rite than that the worshipper acknowledged his life to be forfeited, and hoped by something which not only had value but was also a living object, to avert through confession made in this way the divine wrath. Human sacrifices were still more significant. In the case of children, especially of the first-born, the supplication that the child may not die where most frequently a case, as an expression of gratitude, does not seem at all natural. It was, in short, a sacrifice made for the benefit of the family, caused by a painful sense of ill desert; it was giving the fruit of the body for the sin of the soul. The more general sacrifices of human beings, especially of grown-up men, were more frequent, and usually where some great crime had been committed by persons unknown, or when pestilence or defeat by enemies be- tokened the wrath of protecting divinities, must be regarded as an acknowledgment of sin, and a way of transferring and appeasing divine anger. Wrath demanded or exposed to death. The death of one or more freed the rest. In the Greek myths, the self-devotion of an innocent virgin, like Macaria in the Hera- cidae of Euripides, and in Roman history more clearly the act of the two Decii, father and son, their self-consecration, and their death as a base of blunted the power of the hostile army; point to a faith that victory might be secured by voluntary death for others. This is the highest form that human sacrifice took in heathen antiquity.

It remains to give the briefest possible estimate of the heathen religions in their influences on man. With regard to their lower forms, as seen in wild races, they are to a great extent religions of fear; dread of superior powers weighs on the minds even of flight-hearted African negroes. A feeling of sin, and yet a very faint and half-conscious one, must be presupposed in their minds in order that this dread may exist; but the dread is greatly increased by magic practices which are kept up by priestly imposture. In the higher races it would be folly to deny that in the course of time, and of course in the same way, man can be debased and made savage by his religion. There is ground for believing that cannibalism may have grown out of the sacrificial feasts after battle, when an enemy was slaughtered to the gods who gave the victory.
III. Literature. From the immense mass of works relating to the pagan religions we can only make a selection.

2. Explanations of Mythology. — (a.) From the Old Testament, its events and characters, as by Vossius, De hebraeis gentilis (Amsterdam, 1642); De Jandt, Demonstr. evangeli. (Paris, 1762); and others of that school, now nearly forgotten. (b.) K. Ottf. Muller, Prolegomen zu einer wissenchaftl. Mythologie (Gottingen, 1823); Max Muller in his second course of Lectures on Language.

3. General Progymnasmata on Heathen Religion or on Mythologies. — Janier (Paris, 1710-1738) and Jacob Bryant, now forgotten; Creuzer, Symbolik (1st ed. 1819-1821, 4 vols.), with Mone's Heidenth., d. nordl. Europas (Leipsi and Darmstadt, 1822, 1823, 2 vols.); Meiners, Allgemeine Gesch. d. Religionen (Hanover, 1806, 1807, 2 vols.); Stuhr, Relig. Systeme d. Worlds (Berlin, 1826-1828, 2 vols.); Schwenk, Mythologie (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1824-1825, 7 vols.; Eckermann, Lehrb. d. Religionen, etc. (Halle, 1840, 1849, 4 vols.).

4. The Ancient Mythographers. — (a.) Heathen authors, as Hesiod, Theogonie (Heidelberg, 1710, 8 vols.); Orph. Hymn. (Putz, 1782, 2 vols.); (b.) The attacks on heathenism by early Christian writers, as Clement of Alexandria in his Protrept.; and in part of the Stromata; Theodore, De Graeco, affect. cur., with the Latin writers, esp. Arnobius, Augustine in parts of the City of God, Julius Firmicus, Minucius Felix (1789, 3 vols.); etc.

Pomarancio is the surname of Cristoforo Roncalli, a painter of the Florentine school. He was born in 1552 at Pomarancio, and was a pupil of Niccolò Ciregioni, who took him to Rome quite young to assist him in his works. At the same time, under the direction of Ignazio Falda, he studied painting. He was associated with the picture of St. John of Valvano in the cathedral of S. Giovanni in Reggio, the younger Palma, and others, in finishing the logge of Raffael. This work being achieved, he painted, on slate, for Santa Maria degli Angeli at Rome, a Death of Aniasius and Soppahura, a scene described by Erasmus, a mosaic of the basilica of St. Peter. After painting at San Giovanni di Laterano The Baptism of Constantine, at San Giacomo the Resurrection of Christ, at San Gregorio a St. Andreu, one of his best works, he was selected to paint the cupola of the church of Loreto, getting the preference of Guido and Caracciolo. He avenged himself by having his rival's face disfigured by a spadassin. The cupola of Loreto, in the ornamentation of which Roncalli was assisted by Jaconetti, Pietro Lombardo, and Lorenzo Gariberti, offers a great variety and abundance of subjects. Although these paintings have suffered much, some heads of uncommon beauty are still discernible. Some subjects from the life of the Virgin, executed by Pomarancio, were the occasion of his being made a knight of the Order of Christ by Paul V. He worked in divers other places of the Penitenc: there is a Noli me tangere at the Ermitani of San Severino; a St. Francis in Prayers, at San Agostino of Ancona; a St. Paulus at Osimo; and at the Palazzo Galli of the same place is a Judgment of Solomon, which Lanzi ascerts to be his best fresco. During his stay at Genoa his churches and palaces with works fit to compete with the best of the century. We mention further among his paintings The Martyrdom of St. Simon, at the Pinacothek of Munich, and a Virgin shedding Tears over the Body of her Son, at the Museum of Madrid. His life was a remarkable one, and he is considered one of the greatest painters of the Roman, now of the Florentine school; sometimes it comes near to the Venetian school. His colors are brighter and more brilliant in his frescoes than in his oil-paintings. He likes to adorn his subjects with beautiful landscapes of great effect. Unfortunately, however, little is known of his life and works; he was too often assisted by his pupils; hence some weak parts in his works. He is charged also with some errors of perspective. He died at Rome in 1626. See Lanzi, Hist. of Painters (see Index); Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Nonnelli.

Pomarancio is also a surname by which Niccolò Circignani is generally known. He was a painter of the Florentine school of the 16th century, and was born at Pomarancio, near Volterra. He was probably a disciple of Titian, whose assistant he was in his works in the great room of the Belvedere, in the Vatican. He arrived at Rome quite young, and painted there a number of frescoes, among which was the ceiling of the Sala di P. Stucchi, (the Lord surrounded by Angels (tribune of S. Giovanni Paolo), St. John the Baptist (church of the Consolazione), and thirty-two terrible Scenes of Martyrdom (San Stefano Rotondo), vigorous, but executed with little care. It is probable that Pomarancio spent the last years of his life in his native place, where he died after 1591; for the works which must be referred to his last period are all among numerous paintings of his preserved in Volterra. At S. Giusto a Desert from the Cross is signed "Niccolò Circignani di Rimparancio pinxit A.D. 1580;" and at the Battisterio, on an Ascension, one of his best works, we read, "Nicolaus de Ciricignani Voltraenarum pinxit anno 1591." In the cathedral of the same city there remains of the frescoes with which he had adorned the tribune a God-Father; at S. Pietro, in Selci, an Annunciation (oil-painting), and at San Francesco a Pietà. Pomarancio was frequently aided by his pupils, the best known of whom are Cristoforo Roncalli, called also Pomarancio, and his own son, Antonio Circignani, who remained in obscurity during his father's lifetime, and came suddenly into repute by the paintings with which he adorned a chapel of Santa Maria Traspontina at Rome: they exhibit some features successfully borrowed from Barocci. At Florence, under the portico of the hospital of S. Matteo, he painted some frescoes in 1612. He died in 1674. He is divided into two periods, the first of which was occupied by frescoes; the second by oil-paintings. His last book is a painting of St. Michael, in the church of Ognissanti, under the steps of the altar, the work of 1628. It is dedicated to the Duke of Mantua, by whom it was presented to the Duke of Mantua, by whom it was presented to the Duke of Mantua, by whom it was presented to the Duke of Mantua.

Pomegranate, the Punica granatum of Linneus, is by universal consent acknowledged to denote the Heb. rimonnim (תמר), also lera, so called, according to Gesenius, from an Arab. root signifying to cover; but according to Furst, from one signifying to cover. Sept. posa, posa, paralex. lera, Vulg. malum punicum, ma-

lum granatum, molo gramatum), a word which occurs frequently in the O.T., and is used to designate either the pomegranate-tree or its fruit. It is described in the works of Dioscorides by the name pomegranum. The pomegranate is a native of Asia; and we may trace it from Syria, through Persia, even to the mountains of Northern India. It is common in Northern Africa. The pomegranate is not likely to have been a native of Egypt; it must, however, have been cultivated there at a very early period, as the Israelites, when in the desert, lamed the loss of its fruit in the wilderness of Zin (Numb. xx, 5)—this is "no place of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates." The tree, with its characteristic calyx-crowned fruit, is easily recognised on the Egyptian sculptures (Wilkinson, Ant. Egyptians, i, 36, ed. 1854). That it was produced in Palestine during the same early ages is evident from the spires bringing some back when sent into Canaan to see what kind of a land it was; for we are told that they "came unto the brook of Eshcol, and cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes, etc., and they brought of the pomegranates and of the figs of (Numb. xiii, 50; comp. also Deut. viii, 8). The villages or towns of Rimmon (Jossh. xv, 92), Gath-rimmon (xxii, 25), En-rimmon (Neh. xi, 29), possibly derived their names from pomegranate-gardens. The tree grew in their vicinity; the tree suffered occasionally from the devastations of locusts (Joel i, 12; see also Hag. ii, 19). Mention is made of "an orchard of pomegranates" in Cant. iv, 13; and in iv, 8 the cheeks (A.V. "temples") of the Beloved are compared to "a pomegranation in a lattice." In Judg. xxviii, 34; xxxiv, 24. This is explained mystically by Philo (Iphilo, ii, 138, 236), and differently by Meyer (Blattfer, in hohere Wahrheit, x, 65; see also Bahr, Symbolik, i, 128 sq.). The pomegranate seems also to have been used as a holy symbol in heathen religions (see Bahr, Symbol, i, 128). Among the later Jews the pomegranate was used in some cases as a measure (Mishna, Chëm, xvii, 4). Mention is made of "spiced wine of the juice of the pomegranate" in Cant vii, 2; with the word used, compare the pomegranate-grapes (blush grapes) of which Dioscorides speaks (v, 44) speaks, and which is still used in the East. Chari-

then great quantities of it were made in Persia, both for home consumption and for exportation, in his time (Script. Herb. p. 339; Harmer, Obs. i, 377). Being a native of Persia and having been so highly valued in the East, its growth attracted the attention of Eastern nations. In the present day it is highly valued, and travellers describe... used in the manufacture of morocco leather, and, together with the bark, is sometimes used medico-magnetically to expel the tape-worm. Russell (New Shirt of Aleppo, i. 85, 2d ed.) states that "lemons have by no means superseded the pomegranate; the latter is more easily procured through the winter, and is often in cooking preferred to the lemon. The tree is much cultivated in the gardens and orchards of Palestine and Syria. The fruit is seldom ripe earlier than the end of August, when most families lay in a stock for winter consumption. There are three varieties of the fruit— one sweet, another very acid, and a third, in which both qualities are agreeably blended. The juice of the sour fruit is often used as the basis of a vinegar, which is cut open when served up to table; or the grains, taken out and besprinkled with sugar or rose-water, are brought to table in saucers. The grains likewise, fresh as well as dried, make a considerable ingredient in cookery." He adds that the trees are apt to suffer much in severe winters from extraordinary cold. See Celsius, Hierobot, i. 271 sq.; Oken, Lehrbuch der Botanik, ii, 917 sq.; Geiger, Pharmaceutische Botanik, ii, 1417 sq.; Plenk, Plant. Med. Tab. p. 576; Layard, Nisrach, ii, 252. Pomerania, a province of Prussia, situated in the north-east, and bordering on the Baltic, was once the possession of the Slaves and Swedes, and has such a peculiar ecclesiastical record that we here take space to detail it. In the 6th century some Slavic tribes settled in Northern Germany, and calling themselves the Baltic Sea Pomorze, i.e. the sea-coast. The foremost deities of this Wendish people were Belbog, Czernibog, Radogost, Swantewit, Herovit, Gerovit, and Triglav.

I. Introduction of Christianity.—About the year 1000 the bishopric of Colberg was founded as a dependence of the archbishopric of Gnesen, and Reimborn appointed bishop; but Reimborn having gone to Kief to attend the celebration of the nuptials of the daughter of Boleslaus with the son of the czar Vladimir, and stopping at the Russian court, this commencement proved fruitless. The attempt of Bernhard, a Spanish monk, to introduce Christianity, which was made a century afterwards, was equally unsuccessful. But Boleslaus Krzyzouati, king of Poland, having subjected to his rule part of Pomerania, and wishing to make Christians of his new subjects, desired Otto, bishop of Bamberg, to bring those heathens the light of the Gospel. Otto, having obtained the agreement of pope Calixtus II, set on his way, April 19, 1124, over Prague, Breslau, Pozen, and Gnesen, where he stopped seven days and celebrated Whitensu-tide. Wratislaw, the Pomeranian chief, who, as a boy, had been christened at Helsinburg, called on the Amestour to give him two of his warriors to guide him to Pyritz. In this place the pagans were engaged in the celebration of one of their feasts. Otto preached to the 4000 men assembled at that solemnity, and a week had scarcely elapsed, during which he and his associates were busy instructing the daily increasing crowd in the Christian doctrines, when the bishop prescribed a three days' fasting, after which more than 7000 heathens were admitted to baptism. After erecting an altar, and leaving one of the priests, Otto went on sacrifices to Kammin, the residence of the prince. The wife of the latter received the apostle with great joy. He stopped fifty days, converted 8585 persons, laid the foundation of a church, and left a priest, for whose maintenance the prince had granted some lands. Julian, afterwards called Wolin, mostly inhabited by piratical, was not so favorably disposed towards the new religion; but, after more or less persecution, the Christians were permitted to leave the town unscathed and cross the Divenow. Here Otto, after resting a few days, entered upon negotiations with the inhabitants and obtained from the chiefs of the city that they would direct themselves by the example of Stettin, the oldest and noblest city of Pomerania. Thither Otto repaired, crossing the Haff, in company with Redamir, a citizen...
Christian prince, was in 1184 murdered by a heathen at Stolpe, near Anelam. On the spot where the deed had been committed a little church was built, and in 1158 the first monastery was founded there, and occupied by Dominitz, near Magdeburg, near Magdeburg. We mention some other notable monasteries of this time: 1. Kloster Leubnitz, 1165; Belbeuk, 1170; Eldena, 1207; Brudow and Neucamp, 1231; Hiddensee, 1299; Pudagla, 1308; all of which stood under "abates baculati." The following places of pilgrimage were distinguished: 1. The Gollenberg, near Cöslin, celebrated throughout Europe, where the altar was consecrated to the Virgin, the spire of which served as a light-house; 2. The Rekefeld, near Schmelin (circle of Stolpe), a mountain on which a church had been founded in honor of St. Nicholas, the patron of mariners; 3. The Holy Mountain, south of the city of Parnawa, from 1290; 4. Brunswic; 5. Wustrau, near Cöslin, from 1395; 6. Kers, near Barth, from 1405; 7. Werben, from 1474. While the largest part of the duchy of Pomerania, with part of the Uckermark, the Neumark, and of what is now called Western Prussia, was a dependency of the bishopric of Kammin, the western part of the country belonged to the diocese of Schwerin, and the island of Rügen, connected with Pomerania in 1325, was assigned to the Danish bishopric of Røskilde. The names of the bishops of Kammin are as follows: 1. Alblert, 1180-1185; 2. Frankmar, patriarch for four years (1190-1192); 3. Herman, 1192-1196. The seat of the bishops was transferred to Kammin, because Julian was destroyed by the Danes in 1175. 3. Siegfried (1186-1202). Under his administration there was a considerable immigration of Germans, who founded a number of cities. Jacob Beringer, a knight from Bamberg, who settled in Stettin, built in 1187 for the Germans the church of St. Jacob, with 30 altars. 4. Sigwin (1202-1217) preached himself. While he was bishop Stralsund was built, in 1209; and in 1214 the Templars arrived in Pomerania, and, owing to the great expenses of the church, and the ravages of the army, the government. In November, 1216, Christian, the apostle and bishop of Prussia, visited Pomerania, his native country, and dwelt a few days with the old, sickly Sigwin at Kammin. Duke Casimir, in company with a number of Templars, undertook a pilgrimage to Holzseepulcher, where he died, in 1217. 5. Conrad II (1218-1298). Anastasia, the pious widow of Bogislaw I, founded in 1228 the nunnery of the Virgins at Trepow, endowed it, and was buried in it. 6. Conrad III, count of Gútzko (1283-1284). The abbots of Eldena, Wigard, and of others, founded the monastery of the Poor Clares in Parnawa, and the Cistercian settled at Stettin, and in 1244 a nunnery was founded in the same city. 7. Dr. Wilhelm, resigned in the following year. Under his administration the monastery of Marienfels was built by Wratislaw III, whose daughter Barbara was the first abbess. 8. Hermann, count of Gleichen (1249-1298), a relation of the margraves of Brandenburg, promoted German civilization, and preserved a predilection for Brandenburg. In 1268 a chapter composed of twelve canons was erected in the church of St. Mary at Stettin, and confirmed by Urban IV. In 1270 the monks of Stettin found the Benedictine monastery of the black Oder; they were baptized, and promised to protect the Christian faith in their dominions. Otto longed to gain also to Christianity the inhabitants of the island of Rügen, but insuperable obstacles lay in his way. In Stettin, where a very few had remained, the notables had threatened Otto's death; he at once repaired to the church of Paul and Peter, and while the song of hymns filled the vaults of the church, the sound of arms was heard outside. The crowd calmed down by and by, and dispersed; a sermon in the market-place, whither the clergy repaired in procession under the protection of Wirtaka, retained the scattered flock. Julin followed again the example of Stettin. The saint now visited again all the places of Pomerania where he had worked, and, journeying through Poland, reached Bamberg Dec. 20. Though he was unable to save the monasteries he had converted and watched from afar over these young Christian communities to the time of his death, which occurred June 30, 1189. The conversion of Pomerania, and its accession to the German empire in 1181, induced a number of monks from the northern countries to settle in the district of the Wends, depopulated by long wars. Wratialav, the first was intrusted with diplomatic negotiations. 14. John, duke of Saxe-Lauenburg, grandson of Writsahofen IV (1543-1557). In 1546 the collegiate church of St. Otto, with a fair and abundant revenue, was given by the Reformers to the Free Imperial City of Prague. The prince was to accomplish the ecclesiastical revolution, convoked a diet at Treptow Dec. 13, 1584, and invited the chapters thereto, with the threatening remark that, whether they attended or not, the resolutions should be law for them in any case. The bishop, the abbots, prelates, and a considerable part of the nobility, protested against the resolutions of the diet, and retired before its close. The remainder of the assembly declared for the Reformations. Bugenhagen composed a liturgy, and Erasmus was offered, if he would renounce the episcopal dignity and become the chief of the new Church, and to preserve his dignity and the possessions connected with it; but he declined. Only a tenth of the monasteries was spared: the nunneries of Marienfließ, Stolpe, Bergen, Kammin, and Colberg—and these also had to undergo great modifications. Almost all the monks left the country. Care was taken, however, of those whom old age kept back; the younger monks were sent to Wittenberg, to study there at public expense, and those who were willing to marry were similarly assisted. After Erasmus's death, the two dukes did not fail to interdict the game of dice and the sport to his clergy. In 1543 the Hussites, attracted by Bogislaw IX, penetrated as far as Stettin, and plundered Kolbätz. In 1540 the Putzkäßer set afoot near Barth, and subsisted during thirty years. 21. Henning Jven, a very benevolent priest, who obtruded on the independence of Charles V, and obtained, in 1549, in hidden seclusion. Bartholomew in this distress sent a prelate, Martin Weiper, to pope Paul III, in order to obtain the papal confirmation. The bishop's legate came back with letters from the apostolic legate and from the emperor, by means of which the chapter was empowered to elect Martin himself. Weiper was elected, and Julius III confirmed his election by a brief of Oct. 18, 1561. But Oct. 24, 1562, he was inaugurated again, this time according to the Protestant rite. After Martin's death, the princes, to avoid the difficulties resulting from further elections, determined to establish in the episcopal see only members of the ducal house. This noble family (it was five centuries old) was condemned to early extinction: in a period of a few years six princes died without posterity. Bogislaw XIV, the last of them, by his alliance with Gustavus Adolphus, who succeeded in making himself the master of Pomerania, had so exhausted all his resources that his funeral ceremonies could be celebrated only seventeen years after his death, which occurred in 1637. His nephew, son of his sister, Ernst Bogislaw, duke of Lauenburg, had sold the bishopric to William, elector of Brandenburg (1650). But, if we except the episcopal election, everything remained unchanged. See Milman, Mitikus, or the Conversion of Pomerania (1854). The history of Pomerania after this time is clearly Protestant, and will be treated in the art.

POMERANIA See BUKHENAGEN.

Pomerius, Julianus, a noted Spanish prelate, flourished in the latter part of the 7th century as archbishop of Toledo, about A.D. 690-700, while Spain was still under the dominion of the Goths, before the Saracen invasion. That he was of Jewish extraction may be seen from what Mariana (vi, 18) says of him: "Bart Julianus eruditissima laude sae state celebratus, ut ejus libri testantur. Fuit ex Judaeorum sanguine proges tus in natione, Eugenii heri discipulis, Quintii Toledo in Pansulis successor, ingenios facult, copiosa, suavi, probatissimopinione singulari." Great praise is awarded to him by the historians of that period, especially for his writings and labors as a bishop. He took part in the great council of Toledo, about A.D. 589, at which time the bishops of Christ—a question on which this bishop, or rather the Council of Toledo, at which he presided, declared quite independently of the bishop of Rome: "Nobilis
POMERoy, Swan Lyman, D.D., a Congregational minister, and a man of more than ordinary scholarship, was born at Meredith, N. H., Jan. 5, 1799. He was a graduate of Bowdoin College, and of Andover Theological Seminary, where he completed his course in 1824. He was settled for some years as a pastor in Bangor, Me., and was called thence to a secretariery of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions. He displayed great ability and energy in this position for a number of years, but terminated his connection with it about 1860. He did not after that, we believe, have any pastoral charge. He died at Sunderland, Mass., March 17, 1869. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia, ix, 568.

POMFRET, Jonas, an English clergyman, more noted as a poet than as a divine, was the son of Richard Pomfret, who held at the time of John's birth the rectory of Lutton, in Bedfordshire. He was born about 1667, and was educated at a grammar school in the country, and thence sent to Cambridge, but to what college is uncertain. He devoted himself especially to the study of polite literature, and wrote most of his poetical pieces, and took both the degrees in arts. After that he took holy orders, and was presented to the living of Malden, in Bedfordshire. About 1708 he went to London for institution to a larger and very considerable living; but was stopped March 17, 1739. He was a graduate of both University of, and of Andover Theological Seminary, where he completed his course in 1824. He was settled for some years as a pastor in Bangor, Me., and was called thence to a secretariery of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions. He displayed great ability and energy in this position for a number of years, but terminated his connection with it about 1860. He did not after that, we believe, have any pastoral charge. He died at Sunderland, Mass., March 17, 1869. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia, ix, 568.

Pomis, David de, a Jewish savant of note, was born in 1525 at Spoleto, of the celebrated family called in Hebrew פּוֹם פֶּסֶל, which, like the families פּוֹם פֶּסֶל and פּוֹמִי וּפּוֹמִי, traced their origin to those Jews who were led into captivity after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus and Vespasian. His father gave him his first instruction, initiating him in all the cycle of Biblical and Talmudic lore in Meccina. After his father's death De Pomis studied medicine, and greatly distinguished himself in that department. In 1540 he went to Paris, where he remained till 1558, prosecuting his studies in medicine, philosophy, and a little in physiognomy. In 1575 he entered into official service at Magus in Sabionetta till 1558; became physician to count Nicolaus Ursinus (1555-1600); and to prince Sforza (1560-1568); went to Rome, and then to Venice, where he died. Of De Pomis we have the following works: ד' פּוֹמִי, i.e. The Offspring of David, a Hebrew and Talmudic Lexicon in Hebrew, Latin, and Italian (Ven. 1587), dedicated to Sixtus V.; ד' פּוֹמִי, an Italian commentary on Ecclesiastes (ibid. 1571) — ד' פּוֹמִי, be a supplement to the commentary on Ecclesiastes (ibid. 1572) — a commentary on Job and a commentary on Daniel, which is still in MS. See First, Bibl. Jud. iii, 111 sqq.; Hassane, Hist. des Juifs (Engl. trans. by Taylor), p. 724; Kist, Cyclop. s. v.; Jahrbuch der Gesch. d. Pommeil [an old English term, derived from the French pomme, an apple, and signifying anything round, but not necessarily spherical, is applied in English to pulule, a globular or round thing, a bowl, which is signified in Eccles. xii, 6; Zech. iv, 3, the bowl or round ornament on the capital of a column (2 Chron. iv, 12, 13; bowle," 1 Kings vii, 41, 42). See COLUMN.

Pommeraye, Jean-François, a French Benedictine monk, was born in 1617 at Rouen. He entered in 1637 the Congregation of Saint-Maur, made his profession at Tumblou, and renounced voluntarily all charges of his order to devote himself to study. He died at Rouen Oct. 28, 1687. He left several works, more remarkable for erudition than sound criticism. We mention, Hist. de l'Abbaye de Saint-Ouen de Rouen, de Saint-Aumand, et de Sainte-Catherine de la même Ville (Rouen, 1662, fol.) — Hist. des Archevêques de Rouen (ibid. 1667, fol.), the best of his works: — Hist. de la Cathédrale de Rouen (ibid. 1866, 4to). Pommeraye published after the demise of Dom Jean Anger Godin, its true author, a Recueil des Conciles et des Synodes de Rouen (1667, 4to); but this collection was put into the shade by the excellent work Conciles de Normandie, published by Dom Besnin (1717, fol.).—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. Pomona, a female deity among the ancient Romans, who presided over fruit-trees. Her worship was under the supervision of a special priest. Pomorâni. See Pomôryans.

Pomoryans are a small body of Russian Dissenters, so called from their proximity to the Lake Ladoga and the White Sea, or from Pomor, a village in the government of Ononets, where they appear to have originated. They believe that Antichrist has already come; reigned in the world unseen, that is, spiritually; and has put an end in the Church to everything that is holy. This belief they founded upon the assertion by John (1st Epist. iv, 8), "This is that spirit of Antichrist whereby he that is abominable and even now already is in the world." It is probable that Russian Dissenters, as well as others, consider the secular spirit of their Church establishment as the very spirit of Antichrist, blaspheming everything that is truly spiritual and holy. They are zealous in opposing the innovations of Nikon with regard to the Church houola; prefer a life of celibacy and solitude, and rebaptize their converts from other sects. See Pinkerton, Greek Church, p. 580; Platon, Greek Church (see Index).

Pomp, Nicholas, one of the earliest and most prominent ministers of the German Reformed Church in this country, was native of Germany, where he was born Jan. 20, 1734. He prosecuted his studies, classical and theological, in the University of Halle; came to America under the auspices of the Church of Holland in 1769, and took charge of the German Reformed Church at Schneckemump, Montgomery County, Pa., where he labored with much success. In 1782 he received a call to Baltimore, Md., where he exercised his ministry for six years, when he returned again, in 1789, to the scene of his first labors; but in the following year he removed to Indianafield, in Bucks County, Pa., where he continued to discharge the faithful discharge of his pastoral duties up to the close of the last century, when failing health compelled him to retire from the active duties of his office. From that time onwards he resided with his son, the Rev. Thomas Pomp, pastor of the German Reformed Church in Easton, Pa., where he died, Sept. 1, 1819. In the early part of his ministry he published an able little work in reply to a "mischievous book on Universalism" which was circulated among the Germans, entitled The Everlasting Gospel. Father Pomp occupied a prominent position in the Reformed Church of this country. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Ref. Church, i, 131-138. (D. Y. H.)

Pomp, Thomas, an amiable and eminent minister of the German Reformed Church, son of the former, was born in Montgomery County, Pa., Feb. 4, 1778. "His literary and theological studies he pursued principally, if not exclusively, under the supervision of his devoted and accomplished father." He entered the ministry when only twenty years of age. For a short time he was pastor of some congregations in his native county. In 1796, three years after being licensed, he accepted a call from the Reformed Church in Easton, Pa., Here, in connection with some country churches, he labored earnestly and with singular fidelity for considerably more than half a century, up to near the close of his quiet and beautiful life, April 22, 1852, when he was transferred from the Church militant on earth to the blessed "inhabitation in light." Mr. Pomp was naturally gifted; but he was principally distinguished for his singular amiability, gentleness, meekness, and peaceful relations with all mankind. He retained to the last moment of his life the unbeated confidence of his people and the warmest esteem of all who knew him. See Heikeiser, Fathers of the Ref. Church, iv, 15-25. (D. Y. H.)

Pompas, a solemn procession among the ancient heathens, on the occasion of a sacred festival, a funeral, a triumph, or for any special reasons.

Pompas Circonis, the sacred procession with which the Circenian games were introduced. On this occasion the statue of the gods, placed on wooden platoforms, were borne upon the shoulders of men, and when very heavy they were drawn along upon carriage.
POMPÆI (Pompeii), certain gods among the ancient Greeks, who received this name as being conductors by the way; but what gods are specially referred to is uncertain, unless Mercury be meant, whose office it was to conduct souls to Hades. On certain days, called Apoempes, sacrifices were offered to the Pompei.

Pompignan, Jean-Georges le Franc de, a French prelate, brother of the poet Pompignan, was born at Montauban Feb. 22, 1715. After finishing his studies at the College Louis le Grand and at the Seminary of St. Sulpice, he was made canon in his native diocese, but he had scarcely taken his license when he was appointed bishop of La Baume (25 Dec., 1722). In 1745, he obtained in commendam the abbey of St. Chaffre in his diocese, and was sent as a deputy to the assembly of the clergy held in 1755. He sided, in the strife which divided at that time the Church of France, with the party of the Fossierats, so called because they adopted the principles of the cardinal de la Rochefoucauld, the new minister of the portfolio of the prebendaries, in opposition to the party of the Théatins, who sided with the Théatine Boyer, previously bishop of Mirepoix. Pompignan was sent by the assembly to address the pope on the articles drawn up in the letters publics. He was one of the presidents of the assembly of 1760, and the author of the remonstrances to the king in favor of the members of the clergy banished by Parliament. He was uniriting in writing against the vices and incredulity of his epoch—vices which made him many enemies, among whom was Vaugelas. In 1774 Louis XVI appointed him archbishop of Vienne. In 1788 he sided with the tiers-état in the states of the Dauphiné, and this conduct caused him to be deputed to the États Généraux. He was true there to the same line of conduct, and was conspicuous at the head of the members of the clergy, who, June 22, 1789, joined the tiers-état. The consequence was that he became one of the first presidents of the National Assembly. On Aug. 4 of the ensuing year the king intrusted him with the roll of the prebendary, and the following day he was appointed minister of state, and took his seat in the council. Being aware that he could not reside in his diocese, he resigned the episcopal see, and received in exchange the abbey of Buzay. The suspension of the nomination to the prebendaries, Nov. 9, 1789, left him minister without portfolio, and was followed by considerable changes. He was introduced into the Church of France by the decree of July 12, 1790, on the civil constitution of the clergy. Pius VI addressed to Pompignan a bull, in which he condemned the new decrees, and exhorted him to bring his influence into play for the purpose of preventing the law from giving him sanction. This bull was useless, as the king sanctioned the decrees on Aug. 24. Pompignan had nothing to do with this decision of Louis XVI, insomuch as he had not attended the meetings of the council since Aug. 17, suffering already of the disease which sealed at Paris, Dec. 80, 1790. Besides a number of Mandements, pastoral letters, and reports to the assembly of the clergy, he left Questions diverses sur l'incredulité (Paris, 1753, 12mo);—La véritable Causes de l'Assemblé séculaire dans les Matières qui concernent l'Incredulité (1754, 8vo);—L'incredulité concussoire par les Prophètes (1759, 3 vols. 8vo);—La Religion vengé de l'incredulité par l'incredulité même (1772, 12mo);—L'Oraison funèbre de la Dauphine (1747, 4to);—L'Oraison funèbre de la Reine Marie Leszczyńska (1768, 4to);—Lettres à un Évêque sur plusieurs Points de Morale et de Discipline (1809, 3 vols. 8vo). See biographical sketch in his posthumous publications; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jervis, Hist. of the Church of France, ii, 371; Van Laun, Hist. of French Lit. (N. Y. 1867, 3 vols. 8vo).

Pomponiatu, Petre. See PONPONAZEL.

Pomponazzu, Pietro, a famous Italian philosopher, was born at Mantua in 1462, and after studying at the University of Padua became a professor of philosophy in his alma mater. He also taught and wrote at Bologna with the highest distinction. Although small in stature—for he was almost a dwarf—he yet astonished his contemporaries by his remarkable intellectual power, and became one of the most eminent men of his time. He had frequent dealings with the famous Achilleini, whose puzzling objections would have confounded him had it not been for his skill in parrying them by his keen wit as well as by a sharp-cutting logic. He used to apply himself to the solution of difficulties so very intensely that he frequently forgot to eat, drink, sleep, and perform the ordinary functions of nature; nay, it made him almost distracted, and a laughing-stock to every one, as he himself tells us. He died in 1525. He wrote De Immortalitate Animae (1516), in which he maintains that the immortality of the soul cannot be proved by philosophical (or natural) proofs, but depends solely on revelation, which he accepts. This precaution, however, did not save him from attacks, and many adversaries rose up against him who did not scruple to treat him as an atheist; and the monks caused his book, although he wrote several apologies for it, to be burned at Venice. Another work of his on Incantations was also regarded as dangerous. He shows in this that he does not believe in magic and sorcery, and lays a prodigious stress on occult virtues in certain men by which they produced miraculous effects. He gives many examples of the Infractions of his adversaries do not admit them to be true, or free from magic. See Bayle, Dict. Hist. s. v.; Niceron, Mémoires, vol. xxv; Olearis, De Pomponasto (Jena, 1708, 4to); Buhle, Geschichte der neueren Philosophie, vol. ii; Ueberweg, Hist. of Philos. (see Index); Neander, Kirchengeschish (see Index); Lecky, Hist. of Rationalism, i, 870; Fishcr, Hist. of the Reformation, p. 542; Alzog, Kirchen- gesch., ii, 222; Morell, Hist. of Philosophy (see Index); Ranke, Hist. of the Popacy, i, 65, 64, 377.

Pomponia, Grecina, the wife of Plautus, a Roman general who commanded in England in the year 45, is thought, from a sentence in the Annales of Tacitus (xiii, 92), to have been a Christian, and the first in Britain. Tacitus says: "Also Pomponia Grecina, an illustrious woman, married to Plautus (who on his return from Britain entered the city with the pomp of an ovation), but accused of foreign superstition, was left to the decision of her husband." She was tried, according to custom, for her abandonment of the national worship, by her own husband, Plautus, in the presence of her kindred, and was acquitted. She lived to a great age, apparently in sorrow, and wearing "no habit but that of a peasant" in order to prevent asceticism from the fate of Julia, the daughter of Drusus, who was put to death by Messalina fourteen years before the accusation was brought against Pomponia. But this alone would not account for the charge of forsaking the Roman religion; and the supposition that she was a Christian, and that her mode of life grew out of her religious faith, is certainly quite probable. The wife of Plautius and Claudia Ruffina are supposed to be of the saints that were in Cesar's household, mentioned by Paul (Phil. iv, 22). Claudia is celebrated by Martial for her admirable beauty and learning in the following epigram:

"From painted Britons how was Claudia born! The fair barbarian! how do arts adorn!
When Roman charms a Greekian, and commend, Athens and Rome may for the dame contend." Speed, a very ancient British author, says that "Claudia sent Paul's writings, which she calls spiritual manna, unto her children, to feed the Britons, to feed the land of their bread of life; and also the writings of Martial, to instruct their minds with those lessons best fitting to produce moral virtues"—which Speed thinks was the occasion of this line in Martial's works.

"And Britons now, they say, our verses learn to sing." Gildas, the most ancient and authentic British historian, who wrote about A.D. 544, in his book called De Vic.

PONCE, Pedro, a Spanish Benedictine monk in the convent of Oña, in Old Castile, was born about 1530. He is considered the inventor of the art of teaching the dumb to speak, which he carried to considerable perfection. According to Ambrosio Morales (Antiquedades de España [Alcala, 1572], fol. 50), Ponce had to instruct two brothers and one sister of the constable of Castile, and a son of the grand justicia of Aragon, all of whom were born deaf and dumb. These pupils made such progress that, after some time, they not only were able to write correctly, but also to answer any questions put to them. One of them, Don Pedro de Velsaco, who lived to be only twenty years of age, spoke and wrote Latin as well as his mother tongue, and was at the time of his death making considerable progress in the Greek language. Another pupil of Ponce was a publican, a political monk, and was able to mock and confound and explain his creed by word of mouth. These facts are attested by the best Spanish writers of the time, as well as by Sir Kenelm Digby, who, in his Two Treatises concerning theBody and Soul of Man (Paris, 1644, cap. xxviii, note 8), says, "This priest taught the young lord to speak as distinctly as any man whatsoever; and I have often discoursed with him whiles Iwayt upon the prince" de la Fuente, Constantino, a Spanish martyr to the Protestant cause, was a native of San Clemente de la Mancha, in the diocese of Cuenca. Possessing a good taste and a love of genuine knowledge, he evinced an early disgust for the barbarous pedantry of the schools, and an attachment to such of his countrymen as sought to revive the study of polite letters. Being intended for the Church, he made himself master of Greek and Hebrew, but at the same time learned to write and speak his native language with uncommon purity and elegance. Like Erasmus, with whose writings he was early captivated, he was distinguished for his sobriety and temperance; he took great care in indulging at the expense of foolish preachers and hypocritical monks. But he was endowed with greater firmness and decision of character than the philosopher of Rotterdam. During his attendance at the University Ponce's youthful spirit was roused by the irregularities, which his enemies afterwards took an ungenerous advantage of; but these were succeeded by the utmost decorum and correctness of manners, though he always retained his gay temper, and could never deny himself his jest. Notwithstanding the opportunities he had of enriching himself, he was so exempt from avarice that he left his library, which he valued above all his property, never large, his eloquence caused his services in the pulpit to be much sought after; but he was free from vanity, the besetting sin of orators, and seemed to prostitute his talents at the shrine of popularity. He declined the situation of preacher in the cathedral of Cuenca, which was offered him by the unanimous vote of the chapter. When the more honorable and lucrative office of preacher to the metropolitan church of Toledo was afterwards tendered to him, after thanking the chapter for their good opinion of him, he declined it, alleging as a reason "that he would not disturb the bones of his ancestors," alluding to a dispute between them and the archbishop Siliceo, who had insisted that his clergy should prove the purity of their descent. Whether it was the love of learning or the desire of doing great things that induced him at first to fix his residence at Seville is uncertain, but once there we find him co-operating with Egidius in his plans for disseminating scriptural knowledge. The emperor, having heard him preach during a visit to that city, was so much pleased with the sermon that he immediately named Ponce one of his chaplains, to which he added the office of almoner; and he soon after appointed him to accompany his son Philip to Flanders, "to let the Fleming see that Spain was not destitute of polite scholars and orators." Constantino made it a point of honor to obey the orders of his sovereign, and reluctantly quit his residence in Seville, for which he had hitherto rejected the most tempting offers. His journey gave him the opportunity of becoming personally acquainted with some of the Reformers. Among these was Jacob Schopper, a learned man of Biberach, in Swabia, by whose conversation his views of evangelical doctrine were greatly enlarged and confirmed. In 1555 Ponce returned to Seville, and his presence imparted a new impulse to the Protestant cause in that city. A benedict and enlightened individual having founded a pious society in the College of Doctrin, Ponce was appointed to the chair; and by means of the lectures which he read on the Scriptures, together with the instruction of Fernando de San Juan, proved of the institution, the minds of many of the young were opened to the truth. On the first Lent after his return to Seville he was, besides, chosen by the chapter to preach every alternate day in the cathedral church. So great was his popularity that, though the public service did not begin till eight o'clock in the morning, yet, when he was announced to preach the church would be filled by four, and even by three o'clock. Being newly recovered from a severe attack of the flux, it was thought weak that it was necessary for him repeatedly to pause during the sermon, on which account he was allowed to recruit his strength by taking a draught of wine in the pulpit, a permission which had never been granted to any other preacher.

While Constantino was pursuing this career of honor and usefulness, he involved himself in difficulties by coming forward as a candidate for the place of canon magistral in the cathedral of Seville, which had become vacant by the death of Egidius. Ponce did not want the office, but his friends pressed him to lay aside his scruples; and an individual who had great influence over his mind represented so strongly the services which he would be able to render to the cause of truth in so influential a situation, and the hurtful effects which such a recluse, who was so difficult to manage, noisy and ignorant declaimer, that he consented at last to offer himself a candidate. In spite of all manner of accusations and opposition he carried his election, was installed in his new office, and commenced his duty as preacher. But the popular faction, who had opposed his visit abroad Ponce, like many other preachers whom the Spanish Romanists sent to the Netherlands "to give light to others, returned home blind, having followed the example of the heretics" (Juseos, Historia Pontifical, ii, 597, b). In 1555 he had embraced the Protestant faith. Now that he had dared to assume the responsibilities of the Seville cathedral canonate, the envious priests, disappointed in their own seekings, boldly confronted Ponce with his heretical opinions, and loudly urged the Inquisition to take its aim at this new-made cathedral dignitary; and when, in 1555, the familiar were let upon him, the Protestants of Seville, Ponce was among the first who were apprehended. Among his books was found a treatise, in his own handwriting, on the points of controversy between the Church of Rome and the Protestants, and as Ponce had chosen to take sides with Luther and Calvin, and, when shown the work, not only acknowledged its authorship, but added, "you have there a full and candid confession of my belief: I am in your hands—do with me as seemeth to you good," his doom was sealed. Though put to the torture to reveal his associates and fellow-sinners, he maintained the most obstinate resolutions on this subject. He was afterwards condemned, and his books were burnt upon one any else. After two years of imprisonment, oppressed and worn out by a mode of living so different from what he had been used to, he died before his enemies could bring him to public execution. It was slanderingly reported that he had committed suicide and fellow-prisoner denied the calumny. Dec. 22, 1560, his effigy and bones were brought out in the public auto-da-fe, but the people, who had always greatly revered Ponce, rose up in rebellion, and the services were continued in private. In the character of Ponce the emperor was sovereign, and the indications of the excellence of his heart. They were of that kind which were adapted to the spiritual wants of his countrymen, and not calculated to display his own talents, or to acquire for himself a name in the learned world. They were composed in a native spirit, and in a style level to the lowest capacity. Abstract speculations and rhetorical ornaments, in which he was qualified both by nature and education to excel, were rigidly sacrificed to the one object of being understood by all, and useful to all. Among his works were a Collection, in the College of Doctrin, of the tenets of the infantine simplicity; a small treatise on The Doctrine of Christianity, drawn up in the familiar form of a dialogue between a master and his pupil, which, without being deficient in simplicity, is more calculated to interest persons of learning and advanced knowledge; an Exposition of the First Psalm, in four sermons, which show that his pulpit eloquence, exempt from the common extremes, was neither degraded by vulgarity nor rendered disgusting by affectation and effort at display; and the Confession of a Sinner, in which the doctrines of the Gospel, poured from a contrite and humbled spirit, assume the form of the most edifying and devotional piety. See Antonius, Bibl. Hisp. Nov. i, 266. Also Ref. in Speina, p. 154-156, 207 sqq. 262 sq. (J. H. W.)

Poncet, MAURICE, a French prelate of the 16th century, flourished as curate of St. Pierre des Arcis. He was a divine of great eloquence and considerable learning, though not remarkable for refinement of taste or diction. He was a Gallican, and when Henry III. pursued that imbecile policy which finally cost France the loss of her best citizens for conscience sake, Poncet ridiculed the Leaguers [see LEAGUE], and especially visited with the full power of his sarcasm the grotesque proclamations of the Confréries des Pénitents. He made the walls of his church ring with denunciations of these hypocritical devotees, who, after parading the streets, barefoot, arrayed in sackcloth, and displaying ostentatiously the outward signs of austere asceticism, were accustomed to pass the night in riotous feasting and gross debauchery. Henry, resenting the exposure, banished the cardinal to his estates at St. Pére-at-Melun; but he was released after a brief confinement, and returned to Paris by the king's permission, his majesty remarking that "he had always believed the good doctor to have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge; and that there was much excuse for him, since he was not quick enough of apprehension to see through the artifices of those by whom he was instigated. He had plenty of scholarship, but was grievously deficient in judgment." Poncet, unabated by the king's leniency, resumed his attacks in the same incisive style of spirit and sarcasm, and persevered in it till his death, which happened in 1580. See Jervis, Hist. Church of France, i, 181 sq. (J. H. W.)

Poncher, ÉTIENNE, a French prelate, noted also as a diplomatist, was born at Tours in 1446. He was the son of a magistrate, studied law, and while yet a youth was provided with several canonicles. In 1486 he obtained the charge of conciliator-clerk at the Parliament of Paris, and in 1498 he became President aux Enquêtes. He was elected bishop of Paris Feb. 25, 1503, in compliance with the request of king Louis XII, whom he was at that time accompanying to Milan. The same prince intrusted him in 1506 with several diplomatic missions to Germany; and Poncher, in the following year, being again in Italy with the king, was alone bold enough to speak in contradiction to the angry feelings of the king against the Venetians, and to oppose the confederation of Cambrai. Louis XII, who had already appointed Poncher chancellor of the duchy of Milan, bestowed on him in 1509 the abbey of Fleuri, and in 1512 made him the guardian of the seal of France, which office he kept till the death of the king, Jan. 1, 1515. Francis I appointed him, with Arthur Gouffer, one of the plenipotentiaries who signed, Aug. 16, 1517, the treaty of Nancy between Francis and Charles V. The same year Poncher went to Spain as ambassador of France, and in 1518 he was sent to Henry VIII of England, with whom he signed a new treaty of alliance. In virtue of the concordat he was transferred, March 14, 1519, to the archiepiscopal see of Sens. He died at Lyons, Feb. 24, 1524. Poncher published Constitutiones synodo, which are still held in great esteem, especially in regard to the sacraments. See Pofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iv.

Poncher, FRANÇOIS, a French prelate, nephew of the preceding; was born at Tours about 1480. His father, Pierre Poncher, a Commissioner of the general of the finances, was hung for embezzlement. Made counsellor at the Parliament of Paris (1510). François Poncher obtained soon afterwards the curacy of Issy, a canonicate at Notre Dame of Paris, the abbey of St. Maur-les-Fossés, and March 14, 1519, became bishop of Paris. So far from treading in the steps of his uncle, he was a misanthropic and scandalous prelate. He forged documents to get possession of the abbey of Fleury-sur-Loire, but was balked in his design. While the king was a prisoner at Madrid, Poncher fell out with the queen-regent, the duchess of Angoulême, Francis's mother, plotted to deprive her of the regency, and by treacherous negotiations with the Spanish court tried to prolong the captivity of his sovereign. As soon as Francis was free again Poncher was arrested and accused of high treason. While his process was in abeyance he died in the dungeon of Vincennes, Sept. 1, 1522. He wrote some poems on civil and ecclesiastical subjects to his uncle, Étiennes Poncher—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iv.

Pond is the rendering in the A. V. of δφερα, ἀδέλφη (literally a collection of water), in Exodus vii, 19; viii, 15, where it probably denotes the patercent reservoirs or swampy pools left by the inundation of the Nile (Sept. διαφωτισθης, Vulg. paludes). Again, in Isaiah xix, 10, δελφινος, which the A. V. translates as 'ponds for fish,' following the Vulgate. Its meaning at capensis piscibus, see De Dati et Luther, is rendered by the Sept. ρηχνος in vasionam. This rendering is supported by the author of Gesenius, Vatutbus, and Ewald, ale Lohnarbeiter, saying δελφινος = 'they that earn wages,' and כנות, ל回來ה (Job xxx, 25), 'to be fed.' Many interpreters, however, think that it designates fish ponds. We have abundant evidence from the paintings in the tombs that the Egyptians were very fond of fish for their food, and it appears that almost every villa possessed one, where the master of the house occasionally amused himself in fishing. The Jews, it seems, likewise constructed similar ponds, as in describing his bride in the Canticles (vii, 4) Solomon says, 'Thine eyes are like the fish-ponds in Heshbon.' See Frit. The word occurs several times of marshy pools, in contradistinction to the dry sands of the desert (Psa. cvii, 35; cxxvi, 8); 'standing water' (Isa. xxxvii, 7; xii, 18), 'a pool.' Such pools being commonly reedy, it is rendered 'reed' (Jer. ii, 32). See Pool.

Pond, EXODUS, D.D., a noted Congregational minister and writer, was born at Wrentham, Mass., July 29, 1791, and was educated at Brown University, where he graduated in 1813. He then decided to enter the ministry, and began a course in theology with the celebrated Dr. Emmons. June 14, 1814, young Pond was licensed to preach, and in the spring of the following year was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church at Auburnden, Mass. He left this charge in 1828 to become the conductor of the Spirit of the Pilgrims, a monthly publication in Boston. He was made professor of theology in the theological seminary at Bangor in September, 1832, and continued in that responsible position until 1856, when he became president, and changed to the professorship of ecclesiastical history, and lectured on pastoral duties. He died Jan. 21, 1882. Dr. Pond published reviews of such as The Beginnings of Lectures (1824)—Memoir of President Davids (1837)—Memoir of Susanna Anthony (1827)—Memoir of Count Zinzendorf (1839)—Memoir of John Wickliffe (1841)—Morning of the Reformation (1842, 12mo) No Fellowship with Romanism (1843)—The Young Pastor's Guide (Portland, 1844, 12mo) The Mother Family (1844, 12mo) The World's Salvation (1845)—Pope and Pagan, or Middletown's Celebrated Letters (Portland, 1846, 16mo) [see MIDDLETON, COTTER]—Swedenborgianism Reviewed (new ed. 1846)—Swedenborgianism Examined (N. Pone luctum, Magdalena. This is the beginning of a famous Easter hymn of uncertain date. Undoubtedly it belongs to the Middle Ages, for in this hymn, as well as in the Dies Irae (q. v.) and other Latin hymns, the same identification of Mary Magdalene with "the woman that was a sinner" (Luke vii, 57), which runs through the theology of the Middle Ages, is expressed. This hymn may be found in almost all collections of Latin hymns, and the first verse runs thus:

* Pone luctum, Magdalena,
* bit serena lycernas;
* Non est iam Simonis cura,
* Non cur sectum exprimis;
* Cause miles sunt iacendi,
* Cause miles exilantur;
* Alleluja resonat.

Pongilus, Hermannus, an Italian monkish, flourished near the middle of the 13th century at Ferrara. He practised great austerity as one of the Consolators, and died in 1209. Several years after his death (1300) charges of heresy were brought against him, and a judicial process having been declared, his bones were exhumed and burned, and his tomb demolished by order of pope Boniface VIII. His tomb, in the principal church at Ferrara, had been the object of great veneration, and many miracles were said to have been wrought there. Some think that the process was instituted and the tomb demolished to put an end to the extravagant devotion paid to his memory. The Franciscans attribute to Pongilus the origin of the Fraetrucidii (q. v.), but Moesheim considers this an error, and believes him to have been one of the Bogomils. Natalia Alexander (Hist. Eccles. viii, 87) speaks of Pongilus as reviving several vile practices of the Bogomils. See Wadding, Mon. Fratrir, vi, 279; Milman, Hist. of Latin Christianity, vii, 37 sq. (J. H. W.)

Pongol, a Hindu festival in honor of the sun, which is celebrated annually on Jan. 9. The high-caste Brahmins look upon this as a lucky and propitious day, but the Sudras hold it as sacred, and visit one another with presents. They boil rice on this day with milk outside the house, in some place exposed to the sun's rays, and when that luminary withdraws they cry out "Pongol!" and repeat it four times. The rice thus boiled is regarded as very holy, and kept as long as possible. The day after the Pongol the cows and buffaloes are led out early into the country, having their heads adorned with crowns and cakes.

Poniatawa, Christine, a German female visionary, was born in 1610 at Lessen, Western Prussia. Her father, Julian Poniatawa, was a Polish gentleman, who, having escaped from a monastery and embraced the Protestant communion, was at first minister at Dachnick, in Lusatia, then librarian of a nobleman. He probably brought up his daughter in mystical ideas, for he is said to himself the author of a Latin dissertation on the knowledge which the angels may have of God. Christine had been intrusted to the care of the banished Jesuit, who had a strong liking for her, and when, Nov. 12, 1627, after severe pains, she fell into a trance, attended with visions and prophetic utterances relating to the future of the Reformed Church. This strange state returned at regular intervals for a whole year, always attended with the same phenomena, and a number of people testified to its genuineness. Jan. 27, 1628, the young visionary fell into so heavy a lethargy that she passed for dead, but when she finally recovered her senses she declared that her mission was fulfilled, and that she should thenceforth have no more visions. In 1632 she was married to a Moravian minister, Daniel Vetter, and died Dec. 5, 1644, at Lessen, near Posen. Her revelations, written by herself, were translated into Latin, and published by Amos Comenius and Christopher Kotter and Nicolas Drabicki, under the title Luz in Tentoris (1657, 1659, 1665, 4to). They were retranslated into German by Benedict Balsam (Amsterdam, 1664, 8vo). See Feucht, Gymn. fonat. Konst. p. 228 sq.; Witsius, Mystic. Sacra, pt. iii, ch. xxii; Arnold, Kirchen- u. Pons, Jean, a French Protestant writer, was born at Nismes May 15, 1747. He was brother-in-law to Rabaut-Dupuis. Intimately connected with Rabaut St. Etienne, he was the first to escape from the frightful fate he owed his life to the 9th Thermidor. He was afterwards justice of the peace at Nismes, and then director of the post department in the same city. He published Réflexions philosophiques et politiques sur la Fondation de l'empire du monde (Paris, 1808, 8vo), besides Notice biographique sur Paul Rabaut and Notices biographiques sur Rabaut-Dupuis. Pons died at Nismes Jan. 15, 1816. —Hoefcr, Now. Biog. Générale, a.v.

Ponsard de Gisi of Pates, a Crusader of the Order of the Knight Templars, flourished near the opening of the 14th century. He was a most earnest advocate of the Templars, and when, in 1307, they were brought to trial, and the papacy was questioning the feasibility of suffering its existence, Ponsard boldly declared himself ready to undertake its defence. All the enormous charges against the order were utterly, absolutely false; false were all the confessions, extorted by terror and pain, from himself and other brethren before the bishop of Paris. Those tortures had been applied by the swarm and deadly enemies and accusers of the order, by the prior of Montefalcon and William Roberts the monk. He put in another form: "These are the traitors who have falsely and dishonourably accused the religion of the Temple—William Roberts the monk, who had them put to the torture; Esquin de Florian of Beziers, prior of Montefalcon; Bernard Pelet, prior of Maso, Philip's envoy to England; and Gervais Boyol, knight of Gisors." Had Ponsard himself been tortured? He had been tortured before the bishop of Paris three months ere he made confession. He had stood thus in a pit for the space of an hour. He protested that in that state of agony he should confess or deny whatever they would. He was prepared to endure beheading, the stake, or the caldron for the honor of the order; but these slow, excruciating torments he could not bear besides the horrors of his two years' imprisonment. He was asked if he had anything to allege wherefore the court should not proceed. He hoped that the cause would be decided by good men and true. The provost of Poitiers interposed: he produced a schedule of charges advanced by Ponsard himself against the order. "Truth," answered Ponsard, "requires no concealment. I own that in a fit of passion, on account of some centumulc words with the treasurer of the Temple, I did draw up the schedule." Those charges, however, dark as were some of them, were totally unlike those now brought against the brotherhood. Before he left the court, Ponsard expressed the hope that the severity of his imprisonment might have the effect of making those who had undertaken the defence of the order. The court gave instructions to the provost of Poitiers and De Janville that he should not be more harshly treated; but he was finally condemned to death, and was burned at the stake. See Milman, Hist. of Latin Christianity, vi, 429 sq.; Porter, Hist. of the Knights of Malta (see INDEX, J. H. W.).

PONTANO, GIOVANNI-GIOVANO (Lat. Pontanna), a celebrated Italian statesman, noted as a writer on morals, was born December, 1426, in the environs of Cerreto, Umbria. His father having perished in a riot, his mother fled with him to Bologna, where he rec-ceived a careful education. Having in vain asserted his claim to the heritage of his parents, he entered the army of Alfonso, king of Naples, then at war with the Florentines (1447), and followed that king to Naples, where he became acquainted with the celebrated Panormita, who took him along in his embassy to Florence, and had him appointed royal secretary. Pontano's verses, highly esteemed by all competent judges, seemed to entitle him sufficiently to a seat in the academy which Panormita, unter the king's auspices, established at Naples. Ferdinand I, successor of Alfonso (1457), maintained him in his office of secretary, and appointed him tutor of his son Alfonso, duke of Calabria. He followed Ferdinand in his campaign against the duke of Anjou, and distinguished himself by his bravery. Taken captive on different occasions, he was often treated without ransom to the camp of Ferdinand, out of respect for his genius. On his return to Naples the king lavished his favors upon him, bestowed upon him riches dignities, and intrusted him with the conduct of the most important matters of state, as chevalier of a war,
which bade fair to become general, having broken out between the Venetians and the duke of Ferrara. Ponto-ano brought about a reconciliation of the belligerents.
He was equally successful incompounding the difficulties that had arisen between Ferdinand and pope Innocent VIII. But his success was so great in the negotiation of the pope exclaimed, "I treat with Pontano: is it meet that truth and good faith should abandon him who never abandoned them?" He became at that time first minister, and remained in high position under Alfonso II (who erected to him a statue) and Ferdinand II. When Charles VIII of France approached Naples at the head of a French army, Pontano sent him forthwith
the keys of the city, harbaged the king at his coronation,
and disdained himself by the insults and asper-sions which he heard in this speech as the neophyte factors. When Ferdinand returned, he contented himself with depriving Pontano of his offices. The fallen minister found in his retreat more happiness than he had enjoyed in the tumult of public business, and when Louis XII, after the conquest of the kingdom of Naples, offered to give him again at the head of an armament,
this new Doliocletian preferred his hermitage to royal grandeur. It was in his retreat that he wrote most of the works he has left. He died at Naples in August, 1468. Most of his works deal with moral subjects, and abound in sound precepts and judicious reflections.
His history of the Neapolitan war is a masterpiece, sufficient alone to immortalize his author. His Latinity is pure and elegant, his style noble and harmonious.
His poetic works excited envy and conquered it. He announced himself, like Horace, the only Greek in the Roman school, "The remotest posterity," he said, "will speak of Pontano, and celebrate his name." Erasmus, though a par-simonious distributor of praise to the Italians, has ac-nowledged Pontano's merit in his Cereriom. It must be recorded also that Pontano had the merit of correcting the manuscript, then the only one, of Catullus; that we owe to him the discovery of Donat's commentaries on Virgil, and of Rhemnus Palenom's Grammar. In his physical treatises he first signalled the law of continuity, and seems to have been the first among the moderns to have acquainted himself, after Democritus, declared the milk, the way to be composed of an infinity of small stars.
His poems, some of which unfortunately are spoiled by obscenities, were published at Venice (1505-8, 2 vol. 8vo)
and at Florence (1514, 2 vol. 8vo). His prose writings were published at Venice (1518-19, 8 vol. 4to) and at Florence (1520, 4 vol. 8vo). His Works were edited at Naples (1600-12, 6 vol. fol.), and more completely at Basle (1584, 4 vol. 8vo). His prose writings are the following works: De Obediencia: De Fortitudine: De Principis: De Liberalitate: De Benscencia: De Magmfaestitia: De Spendore: De Conveniencia: De Prudencia: De Magnaanimitate: De Fortuna: De Immaculata: De dogmatum: De

Pontanus, GEOXO-BARTHOLD VON BRAYKENBERG, a learned Bohemian philosopher, was born about the middle of the 16th century. He had scarce-ly taken orders when he achieved a reputation by his eloquence in the pulpit, as well as for his remarkable Latin verses, for which last-named attainment he was in 1588 crowned with the poetical laurels by the emperor Rudolph. Appointed canon of the cathedral of Prague in 1589, he afterwards became provost and vicar-general in the same city. He exercised a great and happy influence on the important questions then under debate in Bohemia. He died in 1616. His works are, Der Triumph des Podgrosa (Frankf. 1604, 4to): De certis Podemor in eum, De hominum et nymum (Cologne,
h. 8.; 8. 1608, fol.): Das vonrume Bohenem (Frankf., hol.; 8. 1608, fol.); a selection of some of the most remarkable acts of piety
the princes and prelates of Bohemia: Scandbergers, seu ratus Georgii Castriacii (Hunan, 1609, 8vo): a number of Latin poems; a good edition of the treatise De ge-mia rerrum proprioitatem of Bartholomaeus Anglicus

Pontard, PIERRE, a French prelate, was born at Mussidan Sept. 23, 1749. He was curate of Sarlat when the Revolution broke out. He then embraced the new enlightened spirit which was sweeping over France, and took his appointment as constitutional bishop of the Dordogne in 1791. A few months later he was elected deputy of this department to the Legislative Assembly. He spoke in favor of divorce, attacked the dogmas of the Catholic Church, authorized the marriage of priests, and finally took a wife himself. It was this same Pontard who induced the visionary Suzanne Labrousse to go to Paris.
Under the consulate he kept a boarding-school at Paris, but his institution waned after a few years. He was intimate with Pignaut-Lebrun, and aided him, if the report be true, in the composition of some of his novels.
After the Restoration, the duchess-dowager of Orleans,
to whom he had rendered some services during the Reign of Terror, on hearing of his precarious situation, bestowed on him a life-rent, which enabled him to enter the institution founded at Château-Craon, without apparent contrivance, Jan. 22, 1832. He left, Recueil des Ouvrages de la celebre Mlle. Labrousse (Borde-daux, 1797, 8vo) — Grammaire Mecanique elementaire de l'Orthographe Francaise (Paris, 1815, 8vo).
He is also the author of the Journal prophétique, which was Galerie, n. v.

Pontas, JEAN, a French prelate, was born Dec. 31, 1838, at Saint-Hilaire-du-Harcouet, (diocese of Avran-ches). Brought up by his maternal uncle, M. d'Arqueville, he studied successively under his eyes in his native city, then at the Jesuits’ College of Rennes, finally in Paris at the College de Navarre. In 1668 he received, for reasons unknown, in the space of ten days, all the orders, inclusive of that of priesthood, from the bishop of Toul, with the consent of the bishop of Avranches, at scarcely twenty-four years old. In 1669 he obtained the titles of doctor of canon and of civil law. The archbishop of Paris, Pérégrine, appointed him vicar of the parish of Sainte-Geneviève-des-Ar- dents, an easy place, which left him time enough for his learned pursuits. He next became sub-penitentiary of Nantes, returned to Paris, and retired to the Petit-Augustines of the faubourg Saint-Germain, where he died, April 27, 1728. His principal work is the Dictionnaire des Cas de Con- science (Paris, 1741, 8 vols. fol.). It is the completest on this subject, in the treatment of which Ponsot displays uncommon sagacity and great caution. His decisions, founded on imposing authorities, are equally distant from loose morality and narrow rigorism—a twofold danger which works of this description seldom avoid altogether.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Pont-Audemer, Council of (Concilium Pont- audemarensis), an ecclesiastical council, was held in 1279 by William de Flavescourt, archbishop of Rouen, who presided; twenty-four canons were published. Among these:

5. Recommends the observance of the canons of Lent ("omnes vindiciae sexus") upon confession and communion.

20. Forbids Christians to dwell with Jews.

21. Forbids the keeping of vigils and assemblies, and all dancing, in churches and churchyards.

22. Forbids rural means to deliver any sentence of excommunication or suspension, unless in writing.

23. Forbids all those of the clergy who have taken the crozier and the privileges granted to them. See Labbé, Concil. xi, 1144.

Pontbriant, Henri-Guillaume-Marie, Du BREIL DE, brother of the two following, was born at Rennes in 1709. He was a canon, grand chantor of the cathedral of Rennes, and abbé of Lanvaux, in the diocese of Vannes. He died at Rennes in 1767. He left, Poème sur l’Abus de la Poésie, crowned at the Jeux Floraux in 1722:—"Sermón sur le Sacre du Roy" (Toulouse, 1722, 4to) — Essais de Grammaire Francaise (1784, 8vo) — Projet d’une Histoire de Bretagne depuis 1561 jusqu’à notre Temps (Rennes, 1784, fol.)— Histoire, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Pontbriant, Henri-Marie, Du BREIL DE, brother of the preceding, was born at Vannes in 1711. He was canon of Rennes. He early entered ecclesiastical life, and after several promotions was made bishop of Quebec in April 1741. He set out for Quebec shortly after, and arrived there Aug. 17. He died at Montreal (Canada) June 29, 1760. A pastoral letter which he issued on the approach of the English to Quebec in 1759 is in Smith’s Hist. of Canada.

Pontbriant, René-François, Du BREIL DE, a French priest, was born at Rennes near the opening in the 18th century. Appointed abbé of Saint-Marien-d’Auxerre, he was one of the most zealous promoters of the institution of the Petits-Savoyards. The first idea of that institution is due to the abbé Joly, canon of Dijon, who founded at Paris, towards 1655, in the immediate vicinity of poor children, an establishment which, taken up by Claude Hélyot, could not support itself after his death in 1686. The abbé of Pontbriant, touched with pity at the sight of those misery of poor little Savoyards, came to their help towards 1737, and devoted to them during the remainder of his life his time, his energies, and his fortune. The abbé de Fénelon, who died on the revolutionary scaffold in 1794, succeeded him in this task. Pontbriant died in 1760. He left, Projet d’Établissement déjà commencé pouresser dans la Piété les Petits Savoyards qui sont dans Paris, with several appendices (Paris, 1780-89, 4 pars, 8vo).— Pilgrimage du Calcaire sur la Mont Valérien (ibid. 1745, 12mo; 1751, 16mo; 1816, 12mo) — L’Incendie détruit et le Christ afirma dans la Foi (1792, 8vo), a work which met with uncommon favor.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ponte, Luis DE, a Spanish Jesuit, noted as an ascetic writer, was born at Valladolid Nov. 11, 1554. He belonged to a noble family, but renounced all the advantages the world offered him, and at the age of twenty entered the Society of Jesus. He was during many years a teacher of philosophy and theology, but his failing health compelled him at last to monastical observance. He became sub-penitentiary, and divided his time between prayer, good works, and the composition of pious writings, by which he obtained throughout Europe the reputation of an excellent master of spiritual life. He died Feb. 17, 1624. Most of his numerous writings were translated into Latin by Melchior Trespinus. We mention Meditationes de los Mysterios de nuestra Santa Fe (Valladolid, 1605, 1613, 1618, 2 vols. 4to). This work was translated into several languages: into Arabic by F. Fromaye, and into French by F. Brignon (1618, 3 vols. 4to) — Guida Espiritual de la Oracion, Meditacion y Contemplacion (Mexico, 1622, 4 vols. fol. ; Paris, 1646, fol.) — Directorio Espiritual (Madrid, 1625, 8vo). He also wrote the first part of Vida Moral (Madrid, 1605, fol.) — La Orden de los Jesuitas (ibid. 1665, fol.), which was finished and published by a member of his order, Miguel Orefía.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. See Antonio, Bibliotheca Hispanica Nova, s. v.

Pontius, Sr., a pope of the 3d century, was a native of Rome, and descended from the gens Calpurnia, if we may believe the ancient writers. Under Urban I he was elected in the pontificate in 230. Plautina and others assert that he introduced the singing of psalms into the Church, but this custom must be older. The first years of his pontificate under Alexander Severus were quiet, but the persecutions commenced again under Maximinus, and Pontius, together with a presbyter by the name of Hippolytus, suffered sentence of deportation to the usual place of exile, the island of Tavulato, near Sardinia, where he died from want and exposure, Sept. 28, 255. His body was carried to Rome by order of pope Callistus I, who succeeded him. Two epitaphs are said to have been erected to him. St. Anterus was his successor. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Plautina, Vita Pontificum, s. v.; Montor, Hist. des Popes (see Index); Milman, Hist. of Latin Christendom, i, 80.

Pontier, Grégoire, a French theologian, was born near Dijon, in 1727. For the 18th century. Though brought up in the Protestant communion, he embraced Roman Catholicism, entered the ecclesiastical state, and obtained the title of apostolic protonotary. He died at Paris in 1709, at an advanced age. He left, Le Cabinet, ou la Bibliothèque des Grands (1680-89, 8 vols. 12mo); the last volume contains in addition, Les Questions de la Princesse Henriette de la Guiche, Duchesse d’Angoulême et Comtesse d’Alais, sur toutes Sortes de Sujets, avec les Réponses (1687, 12mo) — Lettre de Sentes, Premier Étqué d’Alais (1698, 12mo), etc. La Bruyère gives a portrait of him, with his "Caractères," under the name of Dioscurus, and makes very much of him.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Pontifex (1). a priest among the ancient Romans. The pontifices were formed into a college, and all matters of religion were placed under its exclusive superintendence. Their functions and duties were minutely detailed in the pontifical books, which were drawn up in the reign of Numa Pompilius, and contained the names of the gods and the various regulations for their worship, as well as a detailed description of the functions, rights, and privileges of the priests. The pontifices were not priests of any particular divinity, but of the worship of the gods generally. Their duties embraced the regulation of all the religious rites and ceremonies (both public and private) of a state—of the worship of the gods should be worshipped, how burials should be conducted, how the souls of the dead (mantes) should be appeased. To them was intrusted the care of the calendar, the proclamation of festival days, etc. They also saw that every religious and every judicial act was performed on the right day. “As they thus had,” says Dr. Mommsen, “an especial supervision of all religious observances, it was to them in case of need (as on occasion of marriage, testament, or arrogoatio) that the preliminary question was addressed, whether the matter proposed did not, in any respect, offend against divine law.” In matters of religion they were the supreme authorities; from their decisions there was no appeal, and they themselves were responsible neither to the senate nor the people; further, they had power to inflict punishment on such priests as dared to disobey their injunctions and deviate into schismatical courses. The words of Festus are: “Rerum quo ad sacra et religiones pertinent, judices et sacerdotum.”

The head of the college was called Pontifex Maximus. The pontiffs, according to Roman tradition, were instituted from the beginning, to whom the origin of nearly all the religious ceremonies of ancient Rome is ascribed. But as they appear in all the Latin communities, they are regarded by Mommsen as a “thoroughly national Italian institution,” and probably found a place in the earliest religious organization of the Latin race. Their number was ten, or perhaps, including the pontifex maximus, five, all of whom were taken from the patricians. In B.C. 300, the Oculinian Law raised the number to nine, four of whom were to be plebeians. The first plebeian, however, who attained the dignity of pontifex maximus was Tiberius Coruncanius, B.C. 254. Sulla, in B.C. 81, again increased the number to fifteen, and Julius Cesar to sixteen. During the empire, the functions of pontifex maximus were generally discharged by the emperors themselves; and when at length the emperors dropped the name, it was picked up by the Christian bishops of Rome; and now this title, borrowed from a pagan cult, forms one of the sacred designations of his holiness the pope.

Pontifex (2) is hence also the title in the Roman Catholic Church of the archbishop or bishop of a diocese. The pope himself is styled the sovereign pontifex, or pontif (q. v.). (J. H. W.)

Pontifex Maximus. Before the time of Constantine the clergy were not recognized as holding any distinct rank in the state; but when Christianity was made the religion of the state, its ministers were considered as occupying the place of those heathen priests whose superstitions had fallen into desuetude. According to Zosimus, Constantine himself, in the year 325, assumed the title of Pontifex Maximus, which the heathen emperors before him had appropriated, because it contributed to exalt at once the imperial and episcopal dignity, and served to justify the interference of the emperor in ecclesiastical councils and in the nomination of bishops. Constantine’s successors followed his example until the days of Gratian, who was the last emperor to whom the title was applied. Some scholars doubt Zosimus’s assertion, notwithstanding the fact that the medals of Constantine and his successors, down to Gratian, and the inscriptions relating to them, give them the title of Pontifex Maximus, on the ground that it may have been one of those additional titles which the power of habit preserved, without any meaning being connected with them. As to the use of the cassadorial garment, Zosimus may not be quite trustworthy in that respect. But even if the emperors had adopted the pontifical robes, brought to them by the pagan priests at their accession, and had not followed that they actually wore them, or even officiated as “Pontifices Maximini.” It has been supposed by some authors that the first Christian emperors adopted this pagan title only as a means of proclaiming themselves the guardians and protectors of the Christian religion. At an early period of his reign Constantine issued edicts in favor of the Christian clergy, by which they were put on a footing, with regard to civil rights, with the heathen priests: these edicts were soon followed by others, which gave to the clergy some special and peculiar privileges. See Bingham, Origines Eclesiae. (Index in vol. II.); Riddle, Christian Antiquities, p. 337; Elliot, Romans, p. 620; Alzog, Kirchengesch. I, 244, 261.

Pontiff, or High-Priest, a person who has the superintendence and direction of divine worship, as the offering of sacrifices, and other religious solemnities.

The Romans had a college of pontiffs, called by them “pontifex.” See Pontifex.

Pontifices Confraternitatis, or, were in the 12th century guilds of associated monks for the building of churches. They appeared first at Chartres, in France, and spread thence throughout that country and England, Switzerland, and Germany. When their Christian character died out they became lodges of Freemasons.

Pontifical (i.e. belonging to a pontiff or bishop) is a book of rites and ceremonies pertaining to the office of a high-priest, pope, or prelate of that grade. There is the name of a book used by a bishop at consecration of churches, etc. Thus the Roman Pontifical (Pontificale Romana) is the book giving directions as to those acts of worship which Roman Catholic bishops exclusively perform or at least are authorized to perform by the pope. Several medieval pontificials are extant, but they have merely a historical value. The edition published Feb. 10, 1596, by pope Clement VIII, has remained up to our day the rule of the Roman Catholic ceremonial. “Statutum” says the pope, “Pontificale praeeditum nullo unquam in toto vel in parte mutatum, vel ei aliquid addendum, aut omnino detrahendum esse, ac quoquoseque qui pontificia munia exerceret, vel alia, que in dicto Pontificale continetur, facere aut ex quibusque eorum regulis que in hoc Pontificale prescriptis et rationibus tenetur, ex eis... nias formulis, que hoc ipso Pontificiali continetur, servatis satisfacere posses.” It may be seen by this quotation how stringent the prescriptions of the Pontifical are. The Pontifical contains the services for ordinations, for religious professions and absolutions of monks and nuns, consecrations, benedictions, etc., as well as of the solemn administration by a bishop of those sacraments which are ordinarily administered by priests. Besides the prayers to be recited, the Pontifical also lays down the ceremonial to be observed. The rules of this ceremonial are of two kinds—prescriptive, the literal observance of which is obligatory; and directive, which admit of a certain interpretation. The ceremonies must be performed as described in the several services without any omission, addition, or modification, whether in the administration of sacraments or the performance of public worship, in which the bishop exclusively, or a priest delegated by the bishop, officiates.

Another of the service-books of bishops is called the Ceremoniale, but it is chiefly confined to a description of the peculiar ceremonial with which bishops are required to celebrate solemnly those offices, as of the mass, vespers, the funeral office, etc., which are common to them with priests. The most prized editions of both these service-books are those published by authority of the learned pope Benedict XIV.

In England the Pontifical is not by authority published separately from the Liturgy, so that it is never called by that name; though the offices of confirmation and ordination, in fact, compose the English Pontifical. For the consecration of churches and churchyards there is no office appointed by sufficiency to the same office as the pontifical and missal. See CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES.

Pontificalia, properly the ensigns of a pontiff’s or bishop’s office, is a term loosely used for any ecclesiasti-Pontificate means the state or dignity of a pontiff, or high-priest; but is more particularly applied in modern times to the reign of a pope.

Pontius, Council of. See Ponton.

Pontius, a deacon of the African Church, the tried friend and constant companion of Cyprian, drew up a narrative of the life and sufferings of the martyred bishop, which is styled an excellent production (Eregium volumen) by Jerome. If the piece extant under the name of Pontius, entitled De Vita et Passione S. Cyriapi, be genuine, it certainly does not merit such high commendation, since it is composed in an ambitious declamatory style, full of affectation and rhetorical ornaments. Perhaps the original work may have formed the basis of what we now possess, which has probably been built up into its present form by the labor of various hands. It will be found attached to all the most important editions of Cyprian, and is contained also in the Acta Primorvm Martyrvm of Ruinart (Paris, 1690, 4to; Amsterdam, 1718, fol). The Acta Pontii are preserved in the Miscellanea of Baluzé (Paris, 1678, 8vo), ii, 124, and in the Acta Sanctorum under March 8, the day marked as his festival in the Roman Martyrology. See Jerome, De Viris Ill. p. 68; Schönebaum, Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. i, c. iii, § 6.

Pontius, Paul, a celebrated Belgian engraver, was born at Antwerp in 1596, according to some accounts, according to others in 1600. He was the pupil of Vos- termann, and is chiefly distinguished for his excellent prints after Rubens, which he executed under that great painter's inspection. He engraved also a celebrated set of portraits after Vandyck, including those of many of the most distinguished Flemish painters. He appears to have been himself wonderfully devoted to whatever art he copied. The date of his death appears not to be known. The Sluagher of the Innocents, after Rubens, one of his principal works, is dated 1653.

Pontius (Pilate). See Pilate.

Pontoppidan, Erik Eriksson, also called Pontoppidan the Elder, a Norwegian prelate, was born in 1616 at Broby (town-bridge = poropippus), in Fyn, in Denmark, from which he took his Latin name. He was for many years minister in Kjöge, but afterwards became bishop of the Trondhjem diocese in Norway. For his many Latin poems he had the honor of being praised by the poet by the old Ethshoff, who had himself been crowned poet in Germany. Pontoppidan's funeral sermons are very famous. But what especially entitles him to an honorable name in history is his Danish Grammar, which was published in 1668, while he was still minister at Kjöge. It was the first Danish grammar ever published. He died in 1678. See Barfod, Fortalinger, p. 542. (R. B. A.)

Pontoppidan, Erik L., son of the nephew of the foregoing, also called Pontoppidan the Younger, was born Aug. 24, 1698, in Aarhus, in Denmark, where his father was dean. He became a student in 1716 at Fredericia, and afterwards at Copenhagen; after this he was tutor in the house of general Lützow, in Norway; travelled in foreign lands with a son of Iver Hvitfeldt, and then became tutor in the family of the last duke of Holstein-Plön. In 1728 he was appointed chaplain of the palace chapel at Nordborg; in 1734 chaplain of the palace chapel at Fredericksborg; and in 1735 he became court-chaplain in Copenhagen. In 1738 he was elected professor of theology in the Copenhagen University; was appointed bishop of Bergen in 1747; received the degree of doctor of theology in 1749; and in 1756 became chancellor of the Copenhagen University. He died Dec. 20, 1764. As a theologian he was semi-pietistic, but not at all fanatical. He was cheerful, and disposed the severe pietistic laws that were enforced by the Danish government in his time. During the reign of Christian VI he had the courage to write, "God never permits the laws of nature to be violated for the sake of advancing the cause of the Church. When the Church of Christ consisted exclusively of volunteers, it had living members." Some fault has been found with him, and perhaps justly, in his direction of the affairs of the university, but at the same time he did much to advance the cause of science, and he was ever on the alert to see that the several professors did not neglect any portion of their duty to the university. As a German, Danish, and Latin author he exercised a great influence, especially in theology, history, natural history, and political economy. Of his numerous works, the following are the ones most known: An Explanation of Luther's Catechism (1737), a book that was for a long time the text-book in Denmark and Norway in the religious education of the children, and is as such used very widely yet. — Marmora Danica (1739-41, 2 vols, fol.), in which he copies a number of inscriptions of various ages which elucidate the history of his country: — Gesta et Vestigia Dunorum extra Daniam (1740-41, 4 vols.) : — Amulet Ecclesiæ Danici (1741-52, 4 vols.), in German; a good history of the Danish church: — Meditations of a Pilgrim that has Traveled around the World in Search of Christians (1742-44, 3 vols.) is a philosophical work, written in Danish, and has been translated into Dutch, German, and other languages; it has recently been reprinted in Denmark by V. Birkedal: — The Power of a Single Word Conquering Infidels (1745): — Cologum Pastorale Pretium (1757): — Origines Hafnienses (1760) : — Danish Atlas (1763-1761, 4 vols.). The fourth volume was completed by his brother-in-law, Hans de Hofman. He also published a Hymn-book, and wrote several short treatises. His History of Norway (1752-54) was translated into English and German. He published Economical Balance in 1759, and a Magazine of Political Economy, from 1757 to 1764. Pontormo, Jacopo Da (or Jacopo Carrucci), a distinguished Florentine painter, was born at Pontormo in 1495. He was a short time the pupil of Leonardo da Vinci, and studied under Albertinelli, Pietro di Cosimo, and Andrea del Sarto. He painted for some time in a similar style to Andrea, and was that painter's rival; but he frequently changed his manner, and three distinct styles are ascribed to him, the last imitated from the works of Albert Dürer. Towards the close of his life he spent ten years in painting some frescoes of the Deluge and the Last Judgment in the church of San Lorenzo, in the manner of the imitators of Michael Angelo, but they have long since been washed over. He died at Florence in 1557.

Pontus (Porrig. the sea), a large district in the north of Asia Minor, extending along the coast of the Pontus Euxinus, from which circumstance the name was derived. It is mentioned in the New Testament as furnishing a portion of that audience which listened to the apostles on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii, 9), as the birthplace of Aquila (xviii. 2), and as one of the districts through which "the strangers" addressed by Peter in his first epistle "were scattered abroad" (1 Pet. i, 1). All these passages agree in showing that there were many Jewish residents in the district. The term Pontus signifies the country of very different peoples at different times, and while the boundaries of all the provinces of Asia Minor were continually shifting, none were more affected by the changes of the times than those of Pontus. In the earlier period of its history it was merely a province of Cappadocia, which then extended from the Black Sea to the Euphrates; and it is clear from the older traditions that the petty kingdoms of which it was composed were subdued and consolidated by Ninus. It then fell under the alternate dominion of the Medes and Persians, the latter of whom divided it into satrapies; and in the reign of Darius Hystaspis the country of Pontus was besought by that prince on Artabazae, a member of his own family, who henceforth assumed the title of king of Pontus, and was the last of princes rescued from oblivion by the genius, the crimes, and the vicissitudes of Mithridates VII, sometimes called "the Great." The kingdom of Artabazae was comprised between 41° and 43° N. lat., and between 35° and 42° E. long.; and was bounded on the north by the Euxine, on the south by Armenia Minor, on the east by Colchis, and on the west by the river Halys. The inhabitants were a bold, active, and warlike race, and in the reign of Ariobarzanes they shook off the yoke of Persia, to whose sovereignty their own had from the time of Artabazae been transferred, and established the independence of their country. From this period the kingdom of Pontus prospered. Its monarchs gradually added to their dominions the whole of Cappadocia and Phrygia, and a large part of Bithynia, thus dividing Asia Minor with the Attalid dynasty, which ruled at Pergamos. Mithridates VI formed an alliance with the Romans, sent a fleet to aid them in their wars against Carthage, and when, on the death of Attalus, who left his kingdom of Pergamos to the Roman people, Aristocrates contested the legacy, and attempted to make himself king of Pergamos, Mithridates espoused the cause of Rome, and aided in driving the usurper out of Asia. The policy of this able prince was reversed by his son and successor. Mithridates VII ascended the throne at the age of eleven years, and early began a career of enmity and treachery, the ulterior object of which was the entire subjugation of the country over which he ruled, and his reduction to the condition of a Roman province. Mithridates did, however, succeed so far as to make himself master of all Lesser Asia and of many of the adjacent islands. At Cos he plundered the Jews of a large sum; but upon their being annexed Armenia to his kingdom, while his son Ariarathes overcame Macedon and Thrace. At this period of his reign he was the master of twenty-five nations; and so great were his accomplishments as a linguist, that he is said to have been able to converse with the natives of all without the aid of an interpreter. He determined utterly to root out the Roman dominion from Asia, and in order to compromise the inhabitants of the country beyond the possibility of return, he issued orders that on a certain day throughout his dominions each Roman citizen should put to death, not excepting even women and children. This atrocious decree, which has covered the name of Mithridates with infamy, was carried out, and the number of persons who perished in the massacre is variously estimated at from eighty to one hundred and sixty thousand. From this time, therefore, he began to decline; and after a romantic series of vicissitudes he was killed at his own request in the seventy-first year of his age, B.C. 64. After the death of Mithridates, his son Pharnaces submitted to the Romans. He was made king of Bithynia, and proclaimed the ally of Rome; but after the return of Pompey he regained his hereditary kingdom, and ventured to oppose the Romans with as much obstinacy as his father, but with less success. Julius Caesar marched against him, and reduced the country to the condition of a province. Marc Antony restored Darius, the son of Pharnaces; and a short line of princes, none of whom require any notice in this place, governed the country till the time of Nero. The last of these, Polio II., was the father of that Berenice who married Herod Agrippa II., before whom Paul pleaded his cause with so much eloquence. From this time Pontus ceased to be an independent state, constituting a province or dependency of the Roman empire. On the east it was bounded by Colchis, on the south by Cappadocia and part of Armenia, and on the west by Phrygia, Bithynia, and Asia Minor; Pontus (Greg. v. 5) and Phrygia (Hist. Nat. vi. 4) regard Pontus and Cappadocia as one province; but Strabo (Greg. xii. 541) rightly distinguishes them, seeing that each formed a distinct government with its own ruler or prince. Poom ery divides what may be called the true Pontus into three districts—Pontus Galaticus, Pontus Cappadocius, and Pontus Polemecus. This last was imagined to be the country of the Amazons.

The climate of Pontus is hot in summer, but severe in winter, especially along the shores of the Euxine. The soil is fertile, but less so than in the more southern parts of Asia Minor; yet it abounds with olives and cherry-trees, and the valleys produce considerable quantities of grain. These advantages it owes to its being watered by many small rivers, while the great river Halys flows far into the interior. The inhabitants are a hardy and industrious race; deriving their origin, according to tradition, from Tubal Cain. They were industrious as well as warlike, and addicted to commerce, and the inhabitants of Pontus Cappadocia were celebrated for their skill in the manufacture of arms, and for working in metal in general. They had many convenient harbors on the Euxine, and abundance of fine timber for ship-building, and of these they seem very early to have taken full advantage. They retained more of the Eastern elements in their language and religion than the inhabitants of Lydia and Pergamos, who were brought more entirely under the influence of Greek art, literature, and philosophy. They spoke a dialect of the Persian, largely corrupted with Greek; and their religion seems to have been a compound of Greek, Scythian, and Persian. Demeter, Zeus, and Poseidon were their chief deities; but this came to us on Greek authority, and is not generally adopted by theologists. The principal towns of Pontus were Amasia, the ancient metropolis, and the birthplace of Strabo, Themiscyra, Cerasus, and Trappaeus; which last is still an important town under the name of Uzun Celbey. Potyoon. Council of (Concilium Postponiense), was held in June and July, 876, by the Caisalpine bishops, the emperor Charles and the Roman legates being present. The pretensions of Anesigius, metropolitan of Sens, whom pope John VIII. at the request of the emperor, had nominated primate vicar apostolic in Gaul and Germany, and who had appointed the princes of the church of Paris (the rights of the metropolitans), were brought before the council, and so resolutely opposed by the bishops that the affair, for the time, came to nothing; i.e., the pontifical rescript in favor of Anesigius remained practically null and void. The archbishop of Sens, however, from that time forward assumed the title of "Primate of Gaul and Germany," but it was a mere nominal distinction, unattended by jurisdiction or authority. The acts of the Synod of Pavia, in the beginning of the year, were confirmed by the Council of Potyoon. Fifty-two bishops and archbishops were subscribed the acts, together with five abbots. See Labbe, Concil. ix. 280; Hefele, Concilien-gesch, vol. i., iv., and v.; Sirmond, Concil. Ant. Gall. vol. iii.; Jervis, Hist. of the Church of France, i. 38 sq.

Pool is the rendering in the A. V. of the following Heb. and Greek words:

1. Usually "בּוּר, be'erlah (Sept. ερήμος or κωπώσσα), or בּוּר, be'erlah (Psa. xxxix. 6, see Behah)

2. "to fall on the knees" (see Judg. vii. 5, 6). This word is akin to the Arabic Bi't, and its Spanish form de Abierro. In the Old Test. it stands for the larger reservoirs of rain or spring water; while bir, "cistern," is used for the smaller domestic tanks, of which every house had one or more. Some are supplied by springs, and some are merely receptacles for rain-water (Burkhardt, Syria, p. 314). It is thus applied to the large public reservoirs, corresponding to the tanks of India, belonging to the towns of Gibeon (2 Sam. ii, 13), Hebron (iv, 12), Samaria (1 Kings xxiii, 28), and Jerusalem; "the upper pool," 2 Kings xviii, 17; Isa. vii, 8; xxxiv, 2 (now the "Birket el-Mamilla"); the lower pool," Isa. xxii, 9, 11 ("Birket es-Sultan"); "Hezekiah's pool," 2 Kings xx, 20 ("Birket el-Hammam"); the king's pool," Neh. ii, 14 ("the fountain of the Virgin"); "the pool of Siloam," Neh. iii, 15 ("Birket Silwan"); and the old pool," Isa. xxii, 11. We read also (Ecc. ii, 6) of the "pools" or cisterns made by Solomon to irrigate his gardens. The importance of these reservoirs in a country possessing scarcely more than one perennial stream, and where wells are few and inconsiderable, can hardly be estimated by those accustomed to an unfailing abundance of the precious fluid. In Jer. xiv, 3 we have a powerful description of the disappointment caused by the failure of the water in the cisterns (םינב; A. V. "pits"; comp. Isa. xiii, 15; Jer. ii, 13). In modern Palestine they are often very filthy, although in constant use (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 316). See Water.

2. ʿAgdām, אֲגָדָּם (Isa. xiv, 28; xxxv, 7; xli, 18; xlii, 15); elsewhere "pond" (q. v.).

3. ʿMikrā, מִקְר (Exod. vii, 19), a gathering together (i. e. of water), as rendered Gen. i, 10.

4. In the New Test. κολυμβησθαι, only in John v, 2; ix, 7.

The following are the principal reservoirs mentioned in the Bible:

a. A pool of Hezekiah, 2 Kings xx, 20 (comp. Sirach, xlviii, 17 [19]). It was a basin which that king had opened in the city, and fed by a watercourse (בְּפָון, "conduit"). In 2 Chron. xxxiii, 30 it is said more definitely that Hezekiah conducted the water from the upper pool of Gibbon in the west of the city. This pool of Hezekiah, called by the Arabs Birket el-Hammam, is pointed out by tradition in the north-western part of the modern city, not far east of the Jaffa gate (Robinson, ii, 134 sq.). And there is no doubt that this is the true location, since the waters of the upper pool of Gibbon (Birket el-Mamilla) flow through small, roughly built aqueducts in the vicinity of the Jaffa gate, and thus reach the Birket el-Hammam (Robinson, i, 396). See Hezekiah's Pool.

b. The upper pool (בְּפָון), and the lower pool (בְּפָון), the former lying near the fuller's field, and on the road to it, outside of the city (Isa. vii, 3; xxxvi, 2; 2 Kings xviii, 17), and connecting with a watercourse. The lower pool is named in Isa. xxii, 9. There still remain in the west of the city two water-basins, an upper and a lower; the one called Birket el-Mamilla, at the head of the valley of Gibon, and the other Birket es-Sultan, somewhat farther down the valley southward, almost in a line with the south wall of the city (Robinson, ii, 129 sq.). They are generally known as the upper and the lower pool of Gibon. It supports the identification of these with "the upper and lower pools" that there are no other similar or corresponding reservoirs in the neighborhood; and the western position of the upper pool suits well the circumstances mentioned in Scripture (see Isa. xxxvi, 2; 2 Kings xviii, 17; comp. Knobel, Int. p. 155, 257). It may be added that a trustworthy tradition places the fuller's field westward of the city (Robinson, op. cit. p. 128). See Gibon.

c. The old pool (.StatusBadRequest), not far from the double wall (בְּפָון, "two walls"), Isa. xxii, 11. This double wall was near the royal garden (2 Kings xxv, 4; Jer. xxxix, 4), which must be sought in the south-east of the city, near the fountain of Siloam (Neh. iii, 15). Near the mouth of the Tyropoeon there are still two reservoirs or cisterns (Robinson, i, 384; ii, 146), a smaller one hollowed out in the rock, and the other, a little larger, lying a short distance to the south of the former, and receiving its water. The water flows from an opening in the rock a few feet north of the lesser basin; i. e. from the fountain of Siloam. The larger of these basins is doubtless the pool of Siloam, and the smaller is possibly the "old pool," and the same with the artificial pool named in Neh. iii, 16 as in this vicinity (Robinson, ii, 146; comp. Thenius, in Illg's Zeit. 1844, i, 22 sq.). Perhaps, however, we may rather understand the passage in Isaiah as referring to a mere demaking up of the Tyropeon itself between the two parallel parts of the old wall lining the sides of the valley, for the purpose of containing (temporarily during the siege) the waters of the then "old" (i.e. superseded) pool of Gihon outside the city, thus diverted into a new channel. See JERUSALEM.

d. The king's pool ( 관한 [ma'nahə], Neh. ii, 14) is probably the basin in the foundation of the Virgin Mary, on the east side of Ophel (Robinson, ii, 109, 149), and is perhaps the same with the pool of Solomon (כֹּלוּמְבַּצְרָה כָּלְוַעֲרָא [kolombarah kolouwar]) mentioned by Josephus as on this side of the city (War, v, 4, 2; comp. Thenius, op. cit. p. 25). With less probability Schultze (Jerus. p. 56) takes the pool which lies south of Siloam, and which is now half choked with earth, for the king's pool. See JERUSALEM.

In Josephus, besides the foregoing, we find the sparoe's pool (רֹעָמִי תָּרְפָּדָו), which may have a different meaning: see Beckman, Jerus. iv, 19, opposite the Castle of Antonia, in the north of the city (War, v, 11, 4), now Birket Islah, or perhaps Birket el-Hajjeh; the pool of almonds (אָפְרָדָדָו), on the east side, at some distance from the city (War, ut sup.; the pool of serpents (כֹּלוּמְבַּצְרָה רּוּמְבַּדְרָה [kolombarah rummardar]), near Herod's monument (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 10, 1), between Susias (a hill seven stadia, or a mile, from the city, Joseph. War, i, 19, 4) and the city, and hence to the north, perhaps near the road to Shechem (Robinson, ii, 400; iii, 45, 189 sqq.). This must, then, be different from the dragon well (כַּפְרַדְרָדָדָו [kapardar]; see Neh. ii, 18, which lay between the dung-gate and the south-eastern side of the valley (comp. Thenius, op. cit. p. 17). There is no trace of it now to be found, for Birket el-Mimilla is to be identified with the upper pool, as above (Schultze, p. 67). See JERUSALEM.

For the pools of Gideon, Hebron, Samaria, Solomon, Bethuel, and Siloam, see those words respectively. See also FOUNTAIN.

Poole, Matthew, an eminent English Nonconformist minister, was born in York in 1824. He received his education and took his degree at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Having attached himself to the Presbyterian, he entered the ministry, and about the year 1648 became pastor of St. Michael's, Querne, in London. In 1657, when Richard Cromwell succeeded his father in the chancellorship at Oxford, Mr. Poole was incorporated master of arts in that university. He soon became famous and of influence among his brethren, especially after 1658, when he published A Model for the Management of a Dissenters' School. Thirteen Scophs (a word meaning the university, and principally in order to the Ministry, which was accompanied with a recommendation from the university, signed by several Cambridge professors and savants, among whom were Cadwworth, Withcott, Withington, Dillingham, etc.) In 1659, after the restoration of Charles II, he published a sermon upon John iv, 23, 24, preached before the mayor of London, against re-establishing the Liturgy of the Church of England; and refusing to comply with the Act of Uniformity, in 1662, he was ejected from his rectory. He published on this occasion For clamantia in desertos, but submitted to the law with a commendable resignation, and retired to his studies at his paternal estate, resolving to employ his pen in the service of religion in general, regardless of the particular disputes among Protestants. He now devoted himself to a laborious and useful work entitled Synopsis Criticorum Bibliicum, which was published in 1669 and the following years. The design was nothing less than to bring into one view whatever had been written by critics of all ages and nations on the books of Holy Scripture. The work when finally brought out was probably as good as any of the kind can be, and few will deny that it is a very valuable and useful abridgment; but synopses and abridgements are rather for the multitude than for scholars, who are rarely satisfied with the opinions of any author which are thus presented to them at second-hand, without the fulness of illustration which the author himself had given; yet being written in Latin, it is manifest that the compiler contemplated a work adapted to the necessities and tastes of Biblical scholars. Its chief use is as a convenient body of exegetical criticism for Biblical students who are placed in situations which cut them off from convenient access to large libraries, and for them it has been rendered to a great extent obsolete by the important results of recent research. But in its day it was a great work. In the midst of this employment he testified his zeal against popery in a number of works, the principal of which is entitled The True and Certain Differences between the Romish Faith concerning the Church's Infallibility (1666, 8vo). When Oates's depositions concerning the Popish plot were printed in 1679, Poole found his name in the list of those that were to be cut off; and an incident befell him soon after which gave him the greatest apprehensions of his danger. Having passed an evening at the house of his friend, alderman Ahurst, he took one Mr. Chorley to bear him company home. When they came to the narrow passage which leads from Clerkenwell to St. John's Court, there were two men standing at the entrance; one of whom, as Poole came along, cried out to the other, "Here he is!" upon which the other replied, "Let him alone, for there is somebody with him." As soon as they had passed, Poole asked his friend if he had heard what those men said; and upon his answering that he had, "I shall be murdered to-night, if you had not been with me." It is said that before this incident, he gave not the least credit to what was said in Oates's deposition; but he soon thought proper to retire to Holland, where he died, in October, 1679, not without a suspicion of being poisoned, as Abington relates. He published several small pieces, besides what has been mentioned; and he also wrote a volume of English Annotations upon the Holy Scriptures, but was prevented by death from going farther than the 56th chapter of Isaiah. That work was completed by others, and published (1688) in two vols. Poole is spoken of as profound in learning, strict in piety, and universal in his charity. He was more especially distinguished as a commentator. Mr. Cecil observes, "Commentators are excellent where there are but few difficulties; but they lose the harder knots still untied; but after all, if we must have commentators, as we certainly must, Poole is incomparable, and I had almost said, abundant of himself." Wood observes that "he left behind him the character of a very celebrated critic and casuist," and Calamy tells us that "he very frequently chanced to be true to his friend, very strict in his piety, and universal in his charity." POOR. This word, in the Scriptures, often denotes not so much a man destitute of the good things of this world, as a man sensible of his spiritual wants. In this sense the greatest and richest men of the world are on a level with the poorest in the eyes of God. In the following treatment of the subject we combine the Scriptural and the Talmudic information.

I. Hebrew and Greek terms so rendered in the A. V. These are: 1. עֲרוֹבָּד (ערובד) [e'robd] (Sept. παρακάτων; Vulg. pauper); 2. בָּלָד (בלש) [balash]; 3. בָּשָּׁב (בשׁב) [bashav]; 4. נִבְאָה (ניבאה) [nivah]; 5. מִשְׁבָּה (משובה) [misbah]; 6. מְשָׁבָה (משובה) [misbah]; 7. נִבְאָה (ניבאה) [nivah]; 8. פָּרָה (פרה) [parah]; 9. פָּרָה (פרה) [parah]. In 2 Sam. xii. 1, בָּשָׁב (בָּשָׁב) [bashav], נִבְאָה (ניבאה) [nivah], נִבְאָה (ניבאה) [nivah], נִבְאָה (ניבאה) [nivah], נִבְאָה (ניבאה) [nivah], נִבְאָה (ניבאה) [nivah].
used in the sense of "afflicted," "humble," etc., e. g. Matt. vi, 3.

11. Jesekh Excitations.—The general kindly spirit of the poor towards the poor is sufficiently shown by such passages as Deut. xv, 7, for the reason that (ver. 11) "the poor shall never cease out of the land;" and a remarkable agreement with some of its directions is expressed in Job xxv, 19; xxiv, 8 sq., where among acts of oppression are particularly mentioned "taking away (a) pledge," and withholding the sheath from the poor (vers. 9, 10; xxi, 12, 16; xxxi, 17), "eating with" the poor (comp. Deut. xxvi, 12, etc.). See also such passages as Ezek. xviii, 12, 16, 17; xxix, 29; Jer. v, 20; xii, 13, 15; Lev. xix, 13, 15; Exod. ii, 24; Zech. vii, 10, and Exod. xxv, 1, 4; xxii, 28; Tobit viii, 29, 8. See ALMS.

Among the special enactments in their favor the following must be mentioned:

1. The right of gleaning. The "corners of the field" were not to be reaped, nor all the grapes of the vineyard to be gathered, the olive-trees not to be beaten a second time, but the stranger, fatherless, and widow to be allowed to gather what was left. So, too, if a sheaf forgotten was left in the field, the owner was not to return for it, but leave it for them (Lev. xix, 9, 10; Deut. xxiv, 19-22). In the times of the Judges the story of Ruth is a striking illustration (Ruth ii, 2, etc.). See CORNER; GLEANING.

2. From the produce of the land in sabbatical years the poor and the stranger were to have their portion (Exod. xxiii, 11; Lev. xxv, 6).

3. The poor in the jubilee year, with the limitation as to town homes (Lev. xxv, 35-38). See JUBILEE.

4. Prohibition of usury, and of retention of pledges, i.e. loans without interest enjoined (Lev. xxv, 33, 37; Exod. xxiii, 23-27; Deut. xxiii, 19-20; xxiv, 10-18). See Loans.

5. Permanent bondage forbidden, and manumission of Hebrew bondmen or bondswomen enjoined in the sabbatical and jubilee years, even when bound to a foreigner, and redemption of such previous to those years (Deut. xv, 12-15; Lev. xxv, 39-47; 43-44). See SLAVERY.

6. Portions from the tithes to be shared by the poor after the Levites (Deut. xiv, 28; xxvi, 12, 13). See TITHES.

7. The poor to partake in entertainments at the feasts of Weeks and Tabernacles (Deut. xvi, 11; 14; see Neh. viii, 10).

8. Daily payment of wages (Lev. xix, 13).

On the other hand, while equal justice was commanded to be done to the poor man, he was not allowed to make himself a judge over his neighbor, or to administer justice (Exod. xix, 11; Lev. xix, 15).

On the law of gleaming the Rabbinical writers founded a variety of definitions and refinements, which, notwithstanding their minute and frivolous character, were on the whole strongly in favor of the poor. They are collected in the treatise of Maimonides' Mishneh Jotim, translated by Prideaux (Ugolino, viii, 721), and specimens of their character will appear in the following titles: There are, he says, thirteen precepts, seven affirmative and six negative, gathered from Lev. xix, 13-19; xxiv, 19; Deut. xiv, xv, xxiv. On these the following questions are raised and answered: What is a "corner," a "handful?" What is to "forget" a sheaf? What is a "stranger?" What is to be done when a field or a single tree belongs to two persons; and further, when one of them is a gentile, or when it is divided by a road or by water; when insects or enemies destroy the crop? How much grain must a man give way by way of alms? Among prohibitions is one forbidding any proprietor to frighten away the poor by a savage beast. An Israelite is forbidden to take alms openly from a gentile. Unwise was it to take an oath to redeem a pledge, expressed in Job xxx, 25. Those who gave less than their due proportion were to be punished. Mendicants are divided into two classes, settled poor and vagrants. The former were to be relieved by the authorized collectors, but all are enjoined to maintain themselves if possible. Lastly, the claim of the poor to the portions prescribed is laid down as a positive right.

Principles similar to those laid down by Moses are inculcated in the N. T., as Luke iii, 11; iv, 18; Acts vi, 1; Gal. ii, 10; Jas. ii, 15. In later times mendicancy, which does not appear to have been contemplated by Moses, became frequent. Instances actual or hypothetical may be seen in the following passages: Mark x, 46; Luke xvi, 20, 21; xviii, 35; John ix, 8; Acts i, 2. See BEGGAR.

But notwithstanding this, the prophets often complain of the profusion of the rich, while the poor are left to perish, and especially of judicial oppression practiced upon them (Isa. x, 2; Amos ii, 7; Jer. v, 28; Ezek. xxii, 29; Zech. vii, 10). Among the later Jewish kindness to the poor was regarded as a prominent virtue (Job xxix, 16; xxx, 25; xxxi, 19 sq.; Tobit ii, 15, iv, 11; xii, 9; Luke xix, 8), and charitable self-denial often took this form (comp. Matt. vi, 2; Otho, Lex. Robb, p. 512). See ALMS. Beggars, in the proper sense, are unknown in the Mosaic economy (Deut. xv, 4; comp. Michaelis, M. Rech. ii, 458 sq.), yet such extremity of want was known in the Psa. of Solomons, and the procedure in such cases is referred to in Ps. cvi, 18. See PLEASMENT from God. In the New Testament, however, they are mentioned, as Mark x, 46; Luke xviii, 35; John ix, 8; Acts iii, 2, but only in the case of infirm persons.

On the whole subject, besides the treatise above named, see Mishna, Peuk. i, 2-8; ii, 7; Peshach. iv, 8; Selden, De jure Hebr. et Rom. ii, 6, p. 273; Archäol. d. Hebr. ii, 256; Michaelis, vol. ii, § 142, p. 248; Otho, Lex. Robb, p. 808. See POVERTY.

POOR, CHRISTIAN CARE OF THE. In the early Church great regard was had for those in want. As early as the Lord's day alms were distributed among the poor, and as soon as they had brought their sacred duties to a close, the lists of orphans, widows, aged, and poor were produced for consideration, and with a donation was ordered out of the funds of the Church. No heart-stirring appeal was necessary to touch the sympathies of the people of God, and no cold calculations of prudence regulated the distribution of alms: wherever there was an object of misery, or a proved necessity, there the treasures of the Church were expended. When the poor in any place were numerous, and the brethren in that place were unable to afford them adequate support, application was made to some richer Church in the neighborhood; and never was it known that the application was fruitlessly received. After the more complete organization of the Church, the poor had one fourth part in the distribution of the funds. They were distributed respectively to the bishop, the clergy, and the maintenance of the edifice. In Antioch, in the time of Chrysostom, three thousand poor people were thus provided for, and half that number were similarly supported at Rome in the days of Cornelius. In times of famine the plate of the church was sometimes melted down to support the poor. How pointedly Ambrose replies to the charge of sacrilege brought against him on this account by the Arians: "Is it not better that the bishop should melt the plate to sustain the poor, when other sustenance cannot be had, than that some sacrilegious enemy should carry it off by spoil and plunder? Will not our Lord expostulate with us on this account? Why did you suffer so many helpless persons to die with famine when you had gold to provide them sustenance? Why were so many captives orphans and widows? Why so many were suffered to be slain by the enemy? It had been better to have preserved the vessels of living men than lifeless metals." What answer can be returned to this? For what shall a man say? I was afraid lest the temple of God should want its ornaments. But Christ will answer, "My sacraments, which are not bought with gold, do not require gold, nor please me the more for being ministered in gold; the ornament of my sacraments is the redemption of believers.
of captives; and those are truly precious vessels which redeem souls from death. The very poor were often placed in the portico of the church to ask alms. Severe censure was also directed against those who permitted the poor to starve, or defrauded the Church of those dues which were set apart to maintain them. Many instances are recorded where churches in the early ages of their existence for the support of the poor, gave them to neighboring and foreign churches in distant parts.

On intelligence of any pressing necessity, ministers and people would hasten with their treasures to the relief of those whom they had never seen, but with whom they were united by the ties of the same faith and hope. Thus when a multitude of Christian men and women in Numidia had been taken captive by a horde of neighboring barbarians, and when the churches to which they belonged were unable to raise the sum demanded for their ransom, they sent deputies to the Church in the metropolis of North Africa, and no sooner had Cyprian, who was at the head of it, heard the statement of distress than he commenced a collection in behalf of the unfortunate slaves, and never relaxed his exertions till he had obtained a sum equivalent to about 20,000. Even the strong cities among the Nomad tribes in the desert contributed to the same end. And thus the Church in Africa, sending deputies all over the world, and meeting together with a letter full of Christian sympathy and tenderness.

"In the Roman Catholic states of Europe at the present day, the Church still remains, to a great extent, the public almoner. In Rome, a Commission of Aid has the general direction and administration of the general charities of the papal public charities. It is composed of a cardinal-president and fifteen members, among whom is the pope's chaplain. The city is divided into twelve districts, over each of which a member of the central council presides. Each parish is represented by its curé and two deputies—a layman and a dame de charité, named for three years—and has a secretary and a steward or treasurer, who are paid. The alms are given in money, tools, and clothes. Requests for assistance are addressed to the parochial body, from which they are sent to the district, and thence to the central council. The more urgent cases are referred to the cardinal-president, or the curé of the parish. Three brotherhoods search out cases of hidden poverty; and not only do all the religious associations, convents, and monasteries distribute relief, but there is hardly a noble or wealthy house which does not take a regular part in the assistance of the poor.

"In Spain, the state supports several asylums for lunatics, the blind, and the deaf-and-dumb. It also distributes a large sum annually among the provinces for the relief of the poor. An amount being bound purport to raise double the amount received from the state. The state also steps in for the relief of great calamities, and devotes a certain sum annually for the assistance of unfortunate Spaniards abroad. A general directory of the charitable and sanitary services superintends the parochial bodies charged with the distribution of assistance to the poor.

"In Austria, each commune is charged with the relief of its poor. All who have legal domicile, or, being unable to prove their domicile, are resident in the commune, are entitled to relief out of the general assessment. There is no special rate, and the administration is strictly municipal. In many provinces private charity is associated with public assistance, administered by the curé, a few chosen inhabitants, who are called 'Fathers of the Poor,' and an officer accountable to the commune. This system is called the 'Poor's Institutes;' and their funds are principally derived from private sources; but they receive a third part of the property of ecclesiastics who die intestate, and certain fines, etc. Applicants are subjected to minute inquiry as to the cause of their poverty, and by the curé. The poor are thus scaled according to age and necessity. The infirm poor, who have no relatives to reside with, are taken into hospitals established in almost every commune, where they receive, besides lodging, fire and light, clothing, medical care, and a small allowance in money to provide for their food and other wants. Children are either provided for in the homes of their parents, put into asylums, or boarded with people of probity, who receive a monthly payment, as in Scotland. The welfare of these children is superintended by the curé, the mayors, and the sanitary officers of the commune. Foundlings, lunatics, the blind, and the deaf-and-dumb are provided for by the commune. Vagrants are punished, and parents permitting children under fourteen to beg are liable to three months' imprisonment. Able-bodied vagrants are sent to houses of correction, and kept to work. Pawnbroking is a charitable institution in Austria, under government control; and many pawnbrokers established on the rest on endowments, and lend without interest. The trade is forbidden to private persons.

"In France, the relief of the poor is not compulsory, in so far as its distributors may, after making inquiry, refuse relief, except in the case of foundlings and lunatics. The minister of the interior has a general superintendence of the machinery of relief, as well as the immediate administration of many large hospitals and asylums. He also assists a great number of private charities. The administration of these charities is placed on the occurrence of great calamities. The departmental funds are called upon for the compulsory relief, but the commune is the main source of public assistance. Its duty is to see that no real suffering remains unrelieved, and that the nature of the relief is such as can most easily be given in the general community. The commune encourages and stimulates voluntary charities, and receives gifts for the benefit of the poor's funds. Except in Paris, the administration of the hospitals, and of the relief given at the houses of the poor, are under different management, the communes only interfering to supplement the funds of the hospitals, when these are insufficient. The mayor is president both of the administration of the hospitals and of the body for giving out-door relief (the bureau de bienfaisance). During industrial calamities the poor are sometimes employed in workshops supported by the public, and in public works. In Paris, since 1849, there has been a responsible director set over all the charities of the city. He manages the out-door relief through the medium of the committees of assistance, formerly called bureaux de bienfaisance, in each arrondissement. He is under the inspection of a council, composed as follows: the prefect of the Seine (president), the prefect of police, two members of the Municipal Council, two maires or deputy-maires, two members of the committees of the religious assistance, the general director of the first chamber, two requests, one physician and one surgeon practising at the hospitals, one professor of medicine, one member of the Chamber of Commerce, one member of the Council of Public, and five members taken from other classes than those above mentioned. Begging is forbidden, and punished, wherever there are establishments for the relief of the poor.

The poor-law of England, and recently of Scotland, too, is a civil enactment. Formerly, in Scotland, many shifts were tried. Beggary was often resorted to, and as often condemned by statute. In Scotland, at the end of the 17th century, Fletcher says, there were 200,000 beggars—more on account of national distress at that time than at other times—but never less, he affirms, than 100,000. Various severe acts had been passed from time to time, and cruel punishments—in such as scourging and branding with a hot iron. The famous act of 1579, in enumerating the various classes of beggars condemned, has the following: "All minstrels, sanguets, and tale-tellers, not avowed in special service, by some of the lords of Parliament or great burrowers; all those who are of the mixed blood, or of a sable race; all those who live by their common minstrelsy; all common labourers, being persons skilled in body, living idle, and fleeing labour; all counterfairets of licences to beg, or using the same, knowing them to be counterfeit; all vagabonds, bound scholars of the universities of Saint Andrews, Glasgow, and Abirdene, not licensed by the rector and deane of facultie of the universities to ask almes; all schollers engaged in their studies to be schipbrokent, without they have sufficient testimonies."

The fines levied for ecclesiastical offences were often given to the poor, as may be seen in the notes to principal Lee's second volume of Church History. In 1645, 1644, and 1646, the general session of Edinburgh gives the following to the poor:

"1645.
Feb. 16.—Penalties and gifts for the use of the poor.
Given by Mr. Robert Smeaton as a voluntary gift... 100 marks. Penalty for Nell Turner and her partie... 16 marks.
Feb. 15.—Given by Geo. Stuart, advocate, for his marriage... 90 marks.
Given by Col. Hume's lady for private marriage with young Craigie... 90 marks.
Given by Sir John Smyth as a yeartie voluntary gift... 100 marks.
Given by Mr. Robt. Smyth for his private marriage... 90 marks.

"1644.
The six sessions ordain the ordinall poor enrolled to be threatened if they learn not the grounds of religion, and to be deprived of their weekly pensions if they cannot answer to the Catholique.
May 9.—By Mr. Lus Stuart and Isbel Allen, for ordination... 81 li. 6s. 6d.
By Robert Martin, for his private marriage... 90 marks.
March 13.—Given for Wm. Salmond, relief in ordination... 35 li. 6s. 6d."

See Farrar.

In the United States, the poor who are members of any ecclesiastical organization are usually provided for by that body. Besides, the churches voluntarily assume very frequently the care of non-believers. In the Protestant Episcopal and in the Methodist Episcopal churches collections for the poor are taken on communion Sundays. Many churches make it the practice to take the poor collection every first Sabbath in the month.

POOR DANIEL, D.D., a Congregational minister and missionary to India, was born June 27, 1789, in Danvers, Mass. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1812; was ordained June 21, 1816, with the intention of becoming a missionary, and sailed Oct. 23 for Ceylon, which he reached March 22, 1816. He commenced to labor at Tillipally, Jaffna, and returned after July, 1827. When he went to Batticaloa, to superintend the missionary work in that country. In 1839 he returned to Madras, the mainland, and returned to Ceylon in 1841. He came home in 1848, and spent about two years in the service of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, visiting various parts of the country, delivering addresses, and otherwise aiding the existing missionary enterprise. He sailed again to Ceylon in 1850, and took his station at Mampy, where he died of cholera, Feb. 2, 1855. He is the author of various publications in the Tamil and English languages. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 107.

POOR CATHOLICS. See WALDENSERS.

POORES is the name of the little town situated near the temples where the Juggernaut worship is performed by the Hindus. It is situated in the province of Orissa (q. v.), in the south-eastern part of India, and is a dirty little town, with a district of about ten miles of like name, within which the temples are located. It constitutes a part of the endowment of the temple, nobody being allowed to enter the territory without paying a prescribed fee. The population of the town is about seventy-five thousand, there being among the number about four thousand priests, who attend daily upon the temple. Here is found probably one of the greatest stores of gold in India, and it might be called the greatest seat of Brahminical power. The stone wall enclosing the great temples is about thirty feet high, and the area forms a rectangle of six hundred and fifty feet by six hundred and sixty. Within this wall are a number of smaller temples. A visit to these temples is enjoined upon a Hindu as one of the most important acts in the ritual of his religion, and year after year the Mussulman is reported to represent his name from every section of the country. See the literature quoted under the article JAGGERNAUT.

POOR MEN'S BOX is a chest put up usually at the church entrance for the deposit of alms (q. v.). It is found on the continent of Europe not only in the churches, but also in the synagogues. The "Poor Men's Box (unamens, porsa or oblationes fiaciens)" is a box affixed near the high-altar, and was introduced there by archbishop Cramner, to serve in lieu of pilgrimage. In 1559 it was enjoined in every church in England. As architectural specimens, many of these "boxes" are a curiosity. Thus there is a curious alms-box in St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, supported by the figure of a mendicant, and another at Outwell, with a grinning mouth. The idea for the style of these boxes was probably derived from such objects as the bracket of the 15th century adjoining the tomb of Edward II at Gloucester, and the oaken box with a slit for alms used at St. Richard's shrine at Chichester, which is of the 16th century, although the iron-work dates back three hundred years earlier. There is a wooden alms-box of the 14th century at Évreux, the town of St. David, at Bridlington. A flasket or box of wood for collecting alms is mentioned in England in the 17th century. At Selby there is a chest made out of the bole of a single tree. In 1292 such hutchs were forbidden at Chichester, as the oblations hitherto made at the altar were placed in them. At St. David's, two centuries ago, old people could remember having seen basins of oblations made by seamen and passengers.

POOR OF LYONS. See WALDENSERS.

POOR PILGRIMS, an order that started up in the year 1500. They came out of Italy into Germany bare-footed and bare-headed, feeding all the week, except on Sundays, upon herbs and roots sprinkled with salt. They remained not above twenty-four hours in a place. They went by couples, begging from door to door. This penance they undertook voluntarily—some for three, others for five or seven years, as they pleased, and then returned home to their callings. See WALDENSERS.

POOR PRIESTS were those of the Lollards who in the 14th and 15th centuries wandered about the country holding what are called in modern times "missions" wherever they pleased, without any cure of souls being given to them, or license by the bishop of the diocese. The name poor seems to show an association of idea with the Pythecrae Catholici (q. v.), or the Poor of Lyons.

POPE. Having treated in the article PAPACY of the rise and development of the papal dignity and power, we shall speak in the present article of the personal attributes of the incumbent of the Roman see.

I. The Title.—The word pope is derived from the Latin papas, Greek πάπας, and means father. While the Greek word was used in the Greek Church to designate both bishops and priests, and has gradually come to be reserved for the priests exclusively, the Latin term was for several centuries a title applied to all bishops, and was finally reserved for the bishops of Rome. As far as is known, bishop Siricius, in the 4th century, was the first who was accorded the title. After the 5th century it came into more general use, and after the 7th it gradually disappeared from ecclesiastical language for every ecclesiastical dignity except that of the bishop of Rome. It was expressly made the exclusive prerogative of that dignitary by Gregory VII. In a like manner several other titles, which at first were applied to the bishops of the principal sees, such as apostolicus, dominus apostolicus, sedes apostolica, were gradually monopolized by the bishops of Rome. The designation servus servorum Dei was first used by Gregory I, and though occasionally also bishops, priests, and emperors adopted it, it likewise remained in the course of time the prerogative of the popes. During the 8th and the following centuries it was common to call the bishop of Rome vicarius Petri. The expression occurs in the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals, in the oath which was taken in 722 by Boniface to Gregory II, in the oath taken by Gregory VII to the king of Germany, in the conclusion of peace between Alexander III and the emperor Frederick Barbarossa; but from the time of Innocent III, when the power of the popes had become more absolute, the vicarius Petri gave way to the vicarius Christi. The title Sanctitas tua or Beatiudu tua, which came into use in the 9th or 4th century, the pope shares even now with the bishops of the Eastern Church. It is accorded to him even by Protestant governments. (See Brit. and For. Rev. Jan. 1866, p. 48 eq.)

II. Rights and Functions.—1. Personal Prerogatives.—The rights claimed by the popes within the Roman Catholic Church, and accorded to them by the bishops, priests, and laity of the Church, have of course greatly varied according to the degrees of power which the incumbents of the Roman see attained in various periods of Church history. For a long time they claimed and received as bishops of Rome and patriarchs of the West only those rights and honors which also belonged to other bishops and patriarchs. See Bishop; Patriarch. When their superiority over other bishops and patriarchs came finally to be recognised and established, the popes were by no means regarded as absolute rulers of the Church, but their rights were limited and circumscribed by general councils and secular princes. While the popes were with an unyielding consistency endeavoring to develop the extreme papal system which now prevails, many of the greatest scholars of the Church defended an episcopal system which assigned to the pope a position similar to that of a constitutional monarch, and, in particular, maintained the superiority of a general council over the pope. At the general councils of Constance and Basel the friends of this view had an undisputed majority; and in the following centuries the history of Gallicanism, of Febriorius, of Joseph II, are some of many proofs that in several countries the episcopal system had numerous adherents, even among bishops. After having been long on the decline, the episcopal system in the Roman Catholic Church was totally extinguished by the Vatican Council, and the extensive rights which the pope, in the course of many centuries, had claimed as their exclusive monopoly, were recognised by the entire Church. A common division of the papal rights is that into jurisdiction and intrinsecum and praesidium et praestigium. The former comprises the sovereign law of legislation, the supreme administration and the final decision on all subjects relating to ecclesiastical offices, especially the right of confirming, consecrating, transferring, and deposing bishops; the regulation of all religious institutions, especially of the religious orders; the supreme ecclesiastical jurisdiction, the supreme right of supervision, and the supreme management of ecclesiastical finances and property; the highest authority in all doctrinal questions. In the decision of doctrinal questions the popes have long claimed infallibility (q.v.), and the Vatican Council has recognised this claim as a doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church. The pope has also the supreme right of regulating the divine worship, of granting indulgences (q.v.), and the sole right of beatifying and canonising deceased members of the Church. See Beatification; Canonization. The primatus honoris comprises the following distinctions: 1. The tiara, also called mitra turbinata cum corona, triregnum, regnum, diadema, phrygium, consisting of the bishop's cap (mitra) ornamented with a triple golden crown. It is for the first time mentioned in the forged donation of Constantine (8th century), and was for the first time used at the coronation of Nicholas II (858). The third crown was added to the mitra by Urban V (1362-1370). The pope receives it on the day of coronation in the loggia of St. Peter's Church from two cardinal deacons, who place it upon his head with the words, "Acipe tiaram tribus coronis ornatum et scias, patrem te esse principum et regum, rectorem orbis in terra, vicarium salvatoris nostri Jesu Christi, cui est honor in secula seculorum. The pope only wears the tiara at great ecclesiastical festivities and processions, but not during the performance of ecclesiastical functions. 2. The so-called pedum rectum, the straight bishop's staff ornamented with a cross, but not the crooked episcopal pastoral staff. 3. The pallium, a vestment having the form of a scarf, composed of white wool, and embroidered with six black silk crosses. The pope sends it as a mark of honor to patriarchs, primates, metropolitanans, and sometimes to bishops, all of whom are only allowed to wear it within their own dioceses and on certain occasions, while the pope wears it always and everywhere on saying mass. 4. The so-called adovaria, a hommage which in the old Oriental Church was shown to bishops and priests generally. It consists in kneeling down and kissing the pope's foot. Gregory VII still demanded it from princes, the Dictatus Gregorii saying on this subject, "Quod solius papae pedes omnes principes deoculcent." The kiss upon the cross on the pope's shoes is still demanded from clergymen and laymen, but an exception is made with princes and personae of higher rank. Sovereign princes only kiss the hand, cardinals the foot and the hand, after which they are admitted to an embrace; archbishops and bishops the foot and the knee. 5. During the Middle Ages the popes received from the princes the officium stippe, the princes holding the stirrups when the pope mounted the horse, and leading the horse for a while. Among the princes who are recorded to have rendered this homage were Louis II, Henry VI, Henry VII, Frederick III, Charles V, and Philip IV of France. Of Frederick Barbarossa, pope Adrian IV complained that he held the left, instead of the right stirrup. 2. Inves, etc.—At home the pope's habit is a white silk cassock, rochet, and scarlet mantle. In winter he wears a fur cap; in summer a satin one. When he celebrates mass, the color of his habit varies according to the so-
The Pope seated in the Pontifical Chair.

The solemnity of the festival. At Whitsuntide, and all festivals of the martyrs, he officiates in red; at Easter, and all festivals of virgins, in white; Lent, Advent, and eves of fasting-days, in violet; and on Easter-eve, and at all masses for the dead, in black. All these colors are said to be typical: the red expresses the clemency of the festival, the blood of the martyrs; the white, the joy caused by our Saviour's resurrection, and the chastity of virgins; the violet, the pale aspect of those who fast; and the black, grief and mourning. The tiara is a cincture, with three coronets, rising one above another, and adorned with jewels. Paul II was the first who added the ornaments of precious stones to his crown. The jewels of Clement VIII's crown were valued, they say, at 500,000 pieces of gold. That of Martin V had five pounds and a half weight of pearls in it. "Nor is there anything unreasonable in this (says Father Bonani), since the pope governs the kingdom of Christ in quality of his vicar: now this kingdom is infinitely superior to all the kingdoms of the universe. The high-priest of the Jews wore on his head and breast the riches which were to represent the majesty of the Supreme God. The pope represents that of the Saviour of the world, and nothing better expresses it than riches." We must not omit that the two strings of the tiara are said to represent the two different manners of interpreting the Scriptures, the mystical and the literal. The pope has two seals. One is called "the fisherman's ring," and is the impression of Peter holding a line with a bait to it in the water. It is used for briefs sealed with wax. The other seal bears the figures of Peter and Paul, with a cross on one side; and on the other an effigy, with the name of the reigning pope. This is used for the bulls, which are sealed with lead. On the decease of a pope these seals are defaced and broken by the cardinal-chamberlain in the presence of three others. When the pope goes in procession to St. Peter's, the cross is carried before him on the end of a pike about ten palms long. "Many reasons," says Father Bonani, "authorize this custom. It is a monument of the sufferings of Jesus Christ, and of the pope's adherence to the Saviour of the world. It is the true mark of the pontifical dignity, and represents the authority of the Church, as the Roman faces did that of the consuls." At the same time two grooms bear two fans on each side of his holiness's chair, to drive away the flies. This (according to the above-cited author) represents the scapulium covering the face of God with their wings.

3. Officers. — The pope has a Vicar who is always a cardinal. He who manages that charge has jurisdiction over the priests and regulars, over the lay-communities, hospitals, places of piety, and Jews. His place may be worth to him two hundred ducats per month. He has two lieutenants, one for civil and the other for criminal affairs, and a vicegerent, who is a bishop, for the exercise of episcopal functions.

The Penitentiary has jurisdiction in cases referred to the pope; and gives to approved confessors power to absolve. At solemn feasts he goes into one of the churches of Rome, where, sitting in a high chair, he has a switch in his hand, and bears the confession of particular cases. This place is worth eight thousand crowns a year.

The Chancellor was properly secretary to the pope, ab initio. This charge is now bestowed upon none but a cardinal, and it may be worth to him fifteen or sixteen thousand crowns a year. His business is to despatch the apostolic letters, except those signed by the pope, which are despatched by a brief ex aequo et consilio episcopiorum. He has under him a regent, and twelve abbreviators di parco maggiore, who are all prelates. The regent has power to commit all causes of appeal to the rota and referendaries. The abbreviators di parco maggiore draw the bulls, and send them when they are written. Besides these, there are abbreviators di parco minor, who are curators, and other officers of the chancery, appointed to receive and sign bulls. The vice-chancellor keeps a register of the collection of titles given to cardinals, and of promotions to bishoprics and consistorial abbey.

The Chamberlain is always a cardinal, and has for substitutes the clerks of the apostolic chamber, a treasurer, and a president. This office is worth to him fourteen thousand crowns a year. He takes cognizance of all causes within the verge of the apostolic chamber, and, besides, judges of appeals from the masters of the streets, bridges, and edifices. When the see is vacant, the chamberlain remains in the palace, in the pope's apartment, goes through the streets with the Swiss guards attending him, coins money with his own arms thereon, and holds a consistory. He is one of the three chief treasurers of the Castle of St. Angelo, whereof the dean is another, and the pope the third.

The Prefect of the signature of justice is also one of the cardinals, and has two hundred ducats in gold per month. His office is to make records of all the petitions and the commissions of causes which are delegated by the court. Every Thursday the signature of justice is held in the palace of the cardinal-prefect, where assist twelve prelates-referendaries, that have votes, and all the other referendaries, with power to propose each two causes; as also an auditor of the rota, and the civil auditor of the cardinal-vicar, having no vote, but only to maintain their jurisdiction in what relates to them. The prefect of the signature of grace signs all the petitions and grants which the pope bestows in the congregations held in his own presence once a week. The prefect of the briefs is always a cardinal; he revises and signs the copies of the briefs.

The General of the Holy Church is created by a brief of the pope, who gives him the staff himself in his chamber, and takes his oath. In time of peace he allowed him a thousand crowns per month, and three thousand in time of war. He commands all the troops and all the governors in the places and fortresses of the ecclesiastical estate. His lieutenant has three thousand crowns a year, and is made also by a brief from the pope, as is the general of the artillery, who has twelve hundred crowns per annum.

The governor of the Castle of St. Angelo has six thousand crowns per annum.
The pope has four Masters of Ceremonies, who are always clad in purple, and have great authority in public affairs. Besides these, there are other masters of the ceremonies, which are in the congregations of privileges invested with the office of secretary, and the other despatches orders.

The Master of the Sacred Palace is always a Dominican. He reviews and approves all the books that are printed, being assisted by two priests of the same order. The palace, besides a table, allows him a coach.

The Chancellor for the commissary and household of the pope, is always a prelate. The chamberlains of honor are persons of quality, who come to the palace when they please.

The Master of the Stables is a gentleman who has the office of master of the horse, without the title of it; for the pope bestows no such upon any person. He is sword-bearer, and sometimes one of the greatest lords in Rome, as was Pompey Frangipani under Leo II.

The Vestry-keeper is an Augustine monk, who has the same allowance as the master of the palace. He takes care of all the riches in the pope's vestry. He goes like a prelate; and if he be a titular bishop, takes place among the assistant bishops.

The pope's Secretary is always a cardinal, and very often his nephew. This place is united to that of superior of the cardinal house in several envoys who write and subscribe all the letters sent to the princes and nuncios. All ambassadors and all ministers at Rome, after having negotiated with the pope, are obliged to give him an account of their negotiations. The secretaries of state are subject to the secretary superintendent, or cardinal-patron, whose orders they receive, and to whom they sent their letters to be subscribed. They live in the palace, and are prelates clad in purple.

There are twenty-four Secretaries of Briefs, the chief of whose lives in the palace. Their business is to subscribe and dispatch the briefs that the cardinal-prefect of the briefs. The secretary of the secret briefs takes care to prepare them when the cardinal-patron or some one of the secretaries of state commands him. These briefs are shown to nobody, nor signed by the prefect of the briefs, except when they are sealed sub anno piscesaria, and accompanied with a letter from the cardinal-patron. The copies of these briefs are carefully kept; and, when the pope is dead, they are carried to the Castle of St. Angelo.

The pope of Rome has from two civil judges, one of whom is called the first collateral judge, and the other the second collateral, a judge for criminal affairs. He, together with these judges, takes cognizance of matters between the citizens and inhabitants of Rome. He is always a foreigner, and lives in the palace, while in the disbursements in his office he appears clad like an old senator, having a robe of cloth of gold that hangs down to the earth, with large sleeves to it lined with red taffeta.

A. Official Power.——As we have seen above, the pope of Rome is now the supreme head of what is known as the Roman Catholic world. Held to be the successor of the apostle Peter, the pope is claimed to be Christ's vicar on earth. The Council of Florence, 1439, says: —"Definition, Sanctum apostolicam Sedem et Romanum Pontificem in universum orbem tenere primatum, et ipsum Pontificem Romanum successorum esse Petri principis apostolorum, et verum Christi vicariam, totiusque Ecclesiae caput et omnium Christianorum patrem ac doctorem existere, et ipsi in B. Romanam Ecclesiam omnium Ecclesiarum matrem et magistram agnoscere; Romanoque Pontifici, beati Petri apostolorum principis successoris ac Jesu Christi vicario, veram omniesiam spondendo ac juro." As such he is to invest with the benefices invested by the law necessary for the government of the Universal Church. This embraces authority to examine and decide authoritatively all controversies, to convolve councils, to revise and confirm their decrees, to issue general decrees, whether upon discipline and morals or upon doctrine, to appoint bishops in all parts of the Church; and upon the confirmation of the pope, by the clergy or by the civil authorities, no matter how it may have been made; he can also depose bishops, and set others in their place, and even, in cases of great emergency, suppress bishoprics, and change their ecclesiastical limits according to his judgment of the existing requirements of the Church; he is also to judge of the doctrines taught in particular books or by particular individuals, and to pronounce infallibly as to their conformity with the Catholic faith, or the contrary. In addition to these powers, it is still further claimed for him by the Ultramontanes, as we have seen above and in the article Infallibility, that he is endowed by God with infallibility; so that what he says ex cathedra, i.e. officially and as pope, is of divine authority, and cannot be questioned or denied; and that also, as the representative of God, he has the right by virtue of his office to exercise over the civil rulers and civil jurisdiction, the allegiance of all the faithful to him being superior to that which is due to their respective governments. See PRIMACY.

The principal scriptural authority for the papacy relied upon by Catholics is Isaiah xi. 2. (The sceptre shall not depart from the house of David, nor the throne of Jacob, and from his feet, until he come and be anointed with the oil of gladness.) Again, vii. 18, 19. Without entering into a discussion of the meaning of this famous passage, we may here quote from Abbott's Commentary on the New Testament, a statement of the Roman Catholic interpretation, and the ground on which that view is rejected by all Protestants:

"The ordinary rule of the Roman Catholic Church is that Christ declared his purpose to found a great ecclesiastical organization; that this organization was to be built upon Peter and his successors as its true foundation; that they were to represent to all time the authority of God upon the earth, being clothed in the authority of their office, with a continuous inspiration, and authorized by the Word, and fitted by the indwelling Spirit of God, to guide, direct, illumine, and command; and that the chief officers of Christ, with the same force and effect as Christ himself (see Phillips, Kirchenrecht, i. 146). See art. Peter. This view is supported by the following remarks of the Roman Catholic commentator, who does not, as we have seen, refer to a definite ecclesiastical organization by the word church, and would not be so understood by the Ultramontanes. 2. Peter is to be a rock-like; he was, on the contrary, characteristically imitative and human; also, he was of little importance save for other distinguishing words (see 'Thou art a rock' which the Roman Catholic interpretation bases. 3. Neither he nor the other apostles understood that they were invested him with any such authority and position. He did not occupy any such place in the Church while he lived. In the first council at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 7-11) he was simply an adviser, the office of chief or president being apparently held by James; Paul withstood Peter to his face, as no disciple ever withstood Christ, or would have withstood his acknowledged representative (Gal. ii. 11-14); and throughout the N.T. the apostles are all treated as co-equals (Matt. xviii. 1; xix. 8, 9; xxiii. 8; John xv. 1-5; Rev. xxi. 14). 4. There is neither here nor anywhere else in the N.T. any mention of a successor to Peter's authority in him to appoint a successor, or of any such authority vested in any of the apostles, or supposed to be assumed to be exercised, by any of them. 5. The N.T. throughout, and the O.T. in all its prophecies, recognizes Christ as the chief corner-stone, the foundation on which the kingdom of God can alone be built. 6. Mark and Luke omit from their account this utterance of Christ; if it really existed, as it is the foundation of the Roman Catholic Church, and was thus essential and not incidental to the right understanding of the whole incident, it would not be omitted from their accounts." See ROOS.

Few Christian governments have ever been willing to recognise to their full extent the rights claimed by and for the Roman popes. The placet (q.v.) was introduced in the Middle Ages by most of the states, and without its consent, it is stated, no treaty by the pope. It was found necessary to consent to the conclusion of special concordats (q.v.) or conventions, which, in the way of compromise, regulated the papal rights which a state government bound itself to recognise.

Many popes in the Middle Ages also claimed the power of deposing kings, of abolishing the subjects of certain princes, and of taking away their allegiance, and, in general, an unlimited power over temporal as well as spiritual affairs. That a number of popes assumed this right is a fact admitted on all sides; but it is quite common among Roman Catholics to deny that this is a right in the sense in which the papacy, and also that they were claimed by the popes as a right belonging to them in virtue of their office. A few samples of pontifical arrogance may suffice for illustration here:

 Pope Pachom I., In 1096, deposed Henry IV., and excited enemies to persecute him; telling them that they could not offer a more acceptable sacrifice to God than by impounding him who endeavored to take the kingdom from God's Church. "For thy

Fealty and defence of God's holy Church, in the name of Almighty God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I depose from imperial and papal administration king Henry, son of Henry sometime emperor, who too boldly and rashly hath laid hands on thy Church; and I assign unto me the empire from that city whereunto they were wont to plight their faith unto true kings; for it is right and seemly that they doth en deer to diminish the majesty of the Church. Go to, therefore, most holy princes of the apostles, and what I say is to thee, so far is thy authority, that all may now at length understand, if ye can blind and lose in heaven, that ye also can upon earth take away and give, enfeoff and enfeoff, and whatsoever ye will, and whatsoever ye have; for ye can judge things belonging unto God, what is to be done or omitted, and that ye have the power of life and death, 7 and to sentence, and to sentence, and to sentence, is to be done and done. For it is thy part to judge angels, who govern proud princes, what becometh it you to do towards their service. All secular now, and all secular powers, learn from this man's example what ye can do in heaven, and in what esteem ye are with God; and let them henceforth fear to slight commandments, because they cannot do as suddenly he judged, that all men may understand that not caste, but by your means, this son of iniquity deth fallen from his kingdom." Pope Boniface VIII., in 1305, has a decree extant in the canon law running thus: "We declare, say, define, pronounce it to be the duty and obligation of every human creature to be subject to the Roman pontiff. One soul must be under another, and the temporal authority must be subject to the spiritual power, whence, if the earthly power doth so straitly, it must be judged by the spiritual power." Before him, pope Innocent III. affirmed "the pontifical authority so much to exceed the royal power, as the sun doth the moon; and supplies to the former the words of the prophet Jeremiah, Boon, constitui super gentes et regnas. See, I have set thee over the nations and kingdoms, to pull down, and to tread with the heel under mischief; to destroy and to throw down." Of this power that pope made especial use by deposing the emperor Richelieu, and compelling him to abdicate. "As he believed to the apostolical see, he first did strike with an anathema; then him persevering in his obstinacy, did, in a second edict, Rome's temporal power depose from empire." This monstrous authority was avowed by that great council under this pope; according to the council, he did represent or constitute the Church, when it was ordained that if a "temporal lord, being re olled and admonished by the Church, should neglect to purge his territory from heretical thity, he should, by the metropolitan and the other comprovincial bishops, be removed in the band of excommunication; and that if he should slight to make satisfaction within a year, it should be signified to the pope, that he might from that time, pronounce the subjects absolved from their fealty to him, and expose the territory to be seized on by Catholics." Pope Urban II., in his time, begins his homily on Queen Elizabeth in these words: "He that reigneth on high, to whom is given all power in heaven and in earth, hath committed the keys of the kingdom of heaven to the Church, and of whom there is no satiation, to one alone, on earth, namely, to Peter, prince of the apostles, and to his successors, the Roman pontiff, appointed to be an apostolic successor of Peter to be governed with a plenteous power. This one he hath constituted prince over all nations, king over all Rome, that he may, as the chief to all dominion, dignity, and privilege whatsoever; and absolves all the nobles, subjects, and people, of the earth, and wheresoever they live, from their oath, and all duty whatsoever, in regard of dominion, fidelity, and obedience." The pope who had to take the crown of君, king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, begins thus: "The au thority given to St. Peter and his successors, by the imperial power of the Eternal King, is the power of earthly kings and princes. It passes uncontrollable sentence upon them all; and if it find any of them resisting God's ordinance, it takes more severe vengeance of them, casting them down from their thrones, though never so pleasant, and trembling them down to the lowest parts of the earth, and by degrees doth then proceed to thunder against them. "We deprive them and their posterity forever of the dominion and kingdom." And accordingly he deprives those princes of their kingdoms and dominions, absoles their subjects from their allegiance, and obliges all to pay any obedience to them. "By the authority of these presents, we do absole and set free all persons, as well jointly as severally, every one of them, and all their natal family, and all their kin that are whatsoever in regard of dominion, fidelity, and obedience; and do charge and forbid all and every of them that they do not dare to act, or, any of their ordinances, laws, and commands." III. The Election of the Pope.—In the 2d and 3d centuries the bishops of Rome were, like all the bishops of the ancient Church, elected by the clergy and the people. When Christianity was declared to be the state religion, the emperors claimed a share in the election of the pope. The clergy of Rome greatly disliked the interference of the emperors in the election of their bishops, and, after the destruction of the Western Roman empire in 476, they endeavored to deprive the emperor of the right to elect the bishop. This machiavellian indication to the Roman clergy the exclusive right of electing the bishop. Three years later, 502, the Roman synod declared a decree issued by Odoacer, who as successor of the Roman emperor demanded that no bishop of Rome should be elected "nine months after the death of an emperor," as a violation of the rights of the Church. That Odoacer paid no attention to these resolutions is proved by the fact that in 514 he had a share in the election of Felix III. The Gothic kings Theodoric and his successors, as well as Justinian I and the Byzantine emperors, likewise disregarded the rights of the Church. They are known to have appointed or confirmed several popes—as Vigilius, Pelagius I., and Pelagius II. The so-called Liber diurnus, a collection of formulas of the councils of Carthage, which relates to the time from the 6th to the 8th century, and received its present shape in the 8th century, expressly mentions that the Roman bishops elected by the clergy and the people were confirmed by the Greek emperor, or his representative, the exarch of Ravenna. The weak rule of the last Longobardian kings, and the imposition of the emperors in Constantinople, greatly favored the endeavors of the popes to exclude altogether the influence of princes from the papal elections. During the reign of Pepin the Short and Charlemagne the elections were entirely free, and the report that a Roman synod held at Rome in 774, had no influence upon Charlemagne in the right of confirming the elected pope is a forgery. The popes of this time only notified Pepin and Charles of the result of the elections. The beneficent influence which was soon after obtained by the Roman nobility upon the elections of the popes induced again an interference of the temporal power, and in 824 Lothair, the son of Louis le Debonnaire, entered into an agreement with Eugenius II., according to which the consecration of a newly elected pope was not to take place without the concurrence of an imperial delegate. This agreement remained in force throughout the following century. In the 10th century Otto the Great rescued the Church from the most disgraceful condition in which it had yet found itself, and rid it of some of the most wicked popes which have ever disgraced the see of Rome. It was quite common in those days to look upon the emperor as the chief pillar of reform, and it is therefore not to be wondered at that a greater influence was accorded to him than had been possessed by any of his predecessors. When he entered the city of Rome, the people, according to Luitprand, answered, "O God, give the emperor a substitute, motordoc praetor consensum atque electionem domini imperatoris Ottomis Cesaribus Augusti filiique regis Otto Ottokar." After the Synod of Sutri had, in 1046, deposed all the three popes, the Roman people conferred upon Henry III, for himself and his successors, the right "in electione semper ordinandi pontificis principatum." Henry III, as the successor of the German popes Clement II, Leo IX, and Victor II, for which he consulted only his German advisers, as if it had been an affair of the German empire. After the death of Henry III, the influence of Hildebrand upon the popes of that time soon brought on the beginning of a new era in the history of the papacy. One of the events which mark the beginning of this new era is the radical change which was made in the papal elections by the famous decree of Nicholas II and the Lateran Synod in 1059. The essential point of the decree was the substitution of the papal election to the cardinal-bishops, the total abolition of the former concurrence of the Roman people and nobility, and the virtual abolition of the former imperial right; for the words "salvo debo honore et reverentia" do not appear to imply more than the right of the emperor to demand a notification of the result of the election. The emperors were to possess the insignificant rights which were left to them only as a personal privilege, for the conferring of which every new emperor had to make an application. The decree of Nicholas II was confirmed by that of Alexander III and the Lateran Synod of 1178, which made the validity of the papal election contingent upon a two-thirds vote of the cardinals. The defeat of the emperor Frederick Barbarossa in his struggle with the papacy put an end forever to even the nominal rights of the imperial right. The first provisions concerning the conclave were made by Gregory X and the Council of Lyons in 1274. The town for holding the conclave (c. v.) was not to be exclusively Rome, but the city in which the pope died; and in case he stayed under an adjacent city, the place for the conclave was the episcopal palace. The provisions of the decree of Gregory X were somewhat, though not essentially, modified by Clement V (1305-1314) and Clement VI (1352-1355). The councils of Pisa, Constance, and Baele elected new popes, without binding themselves to the papal provisions concerning the conclave; but in this as in many other respects their proceedings were of an exceptional character, and were without abiding consequences in the law of the Church. In 1621 Gregory XV issued the constitution Etsur Petri filiis, which contained all the principal provisions in regard to the conclave that are now in use. In a few points only it was supplemented by bulls of Urban VIII (1625) and Clement XII (1732).

The present mode of electing a pope has been fully described in the article CONCLAVE. The right of voting is limited to the cardinals who have been ordained deacons. The lack of this ordination may, however, be supplied by a special privilege of the pope. The cardinals do not lose their right of voting even by excommunication, but they can cast their votes only if they are personally present in the conclave. Those who live outside of the city of Rome are not specially invited. Since Boniface IX (1389) all the popes have been taken from the College of Cardinals, but in a legal point of view the eligibility of the pope is not conditioned by his being a cardinal. The decree of Nicholas II abolished a former provision by a Roman synod which demanded it, and since then a number of popes have been elected who were not cardinals. Urban III, elected in 1185, was only archbishop of Milan; Urban IV (1261) was patriarch of Jerusalem; Clement V (1305), archbishop of Bordeaux; Urban VI, with whose election in 1378 the papal schism began, was archbishop of Bari. Celestine V (1294) was an eremite, who after a long conclave was agreed upon by two contending parties as a mere figurehead. Urban V (1366) was elected at the third transon of pope Pius IX, the empire of Germany will claim this right, in order to prevent the election of the candidate of the Jesuits. Long usage causes the selection of the candidate from the Italian cardinals. Several popes, like Celestine V, have been elected on a very small number, in the course of the Middle Ages, have been deposed by the emperors; and in the 15th century the councils of Pisa, Constance, and Baele claimed and exercised the right of deposing the pope. The principle, first enounced by the Council of Trent, that the Pseudo-Lawrence Declaratory, the act obtained by the advocates of the extreme papal system, that the apostolic see is not judged by any one ("apostolica sedes a nemine judicatur"), has more and more been accepted by the Church; and after the Vatican Council it would appear to be impossible that the Catholic world would again recognize the right of the papal see except those caused by the voluntary resignation or the death of the incumbent.

The coronation and consecration ceremonies attending the inauguration of the pope are of a very solemn and impressive character, and it is necessary to give a description in the words of an eye-witness:

"About eleven o'clock the procession began to arrive from the Quirinal Palace. It was immensely long. The cardinals were in their state carriages, and each was accompanied by several carriages full of attendants. The senator and governor of Rome formed part of the train. The pope was in a state coach drawn by six black horses, and preceded by a procession on foot, consisting of a large cross. The procession went round by the back of St. Peter's, and the pope went up to the Sixtine Chapel, where various ceremonies were performed which I did not see. In about half an hour the procession entered the central portion of the church, and on its arrival the lowest orders of the clergy came first, then bishops, archbishops, cardinals, and, lastly, the pope. He was borne aloft on a throne, carried by six or eight men. The choir singing, Ecce suus esperans—"Behold the great priest!" At the chapel of the Salvatoris he stopped and addressed the host assembled, and then borne forward to the area of the altar, and, passing by the side of it, alighted in a space enclosed by the space of the pope was set on the east side. He walked up to the altar, prayed at the foot of it, ascended the steps, and seated himself on the middle of the altar, on the very spot where the chas- trium or pyx, containing the host, usually stands. The cardinals in succession went through the ceremony of adoration. This ceremony is performed after quitting the conclave, secundus, in the Sixtine Chapel before the procession comes into St. Peter's; and now, for the third time, each cardinal prostrated himself before the pope, then kissed his toe, or rather his slipper, next kissed his hand, which was not bare, but enveloped in the robe of his robes; and, lastly, the pope embraced each twice, and when all had gone through this ceremony, the pope rose and blessed his blessing on his head. He then sat down, and retired in a sedan chair, on the back of which there is embroidered in gold a dove, to represent the Holy Spirit." On the Sabbath after his solemn installation his holiness performs mass at an altar of the richest decoration, the pontifical mantle and tiara adorned with the greatest cardinal-deacon, who addresses him thus: "Receive the holy mantle, the plenitude of the pontifical office, to the honor of Almighty God, and of the blessed Virgin Mary, his mother, and of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul, and of all the holy patriarchs and of the holy church in general. Receive the public coronation on the balcony above the great door of St. Peter's. His mantle as a priest is taken off, and the tiara is placed on his head. The words: "Receive the tiara adorned with three crowns, and know that thou art the father of princes and kings, the shepherd, on the throne of the fourth of the great year of our Lord, the son of the everlasting God, Christ, to whom is honor and glory for ever and ever."
Pope 409 POPE

Amen." His holiness then pronounces this prayer: "May the great Paul, in whose power and authority we confide, intercede for us with the Lord. By the prayers and merits of the blessed Mary, always a virgin, Michael, Archangel, and of the holy souls of the faithful departed, John the Baptist, and the holy apostles Peter and Paul, and all the saints: may Almighty God have mercy upon you, and may the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, grant you according to the abatement of all your sins, space for true and fruitful repentance, a heart always penitent, and amendment of life, that you may be found fitting for the Kingdom of the Holy Spirit, and Napes, and the rest of your good works." Two keys are also given him in the church of St. Peter Lateran.

IV. List of the Popes of Rome. To the above article, we have referred the uncertainty prevailing in regard to the first bishops of Rome. Roman Catholic writers themselves quite generally admit that the statements of ancient Church-writers on the subject are entirely irreconcilable; but it has been impossible to establish with any degree of certainty the order in which they followed each other, the years of their accession to the see of Rome, and the year of their death. The following table is given from the Roman laminate entitled Gerruchus Cattaneo (with the original names of the popes and not of antipopes, from other sources), and although it is so uncertain in its first part that even the Roman historians do not adopt it, it is of some value, as presenting the claims of the Church of Rome:

From 1791 to 1870 occurs the great Western Schism, during which a rival line of popes was set up in the papal see. A rival line of popes occurred in the papal see, in conflict with each other. The Council of Pisa, 1128, deposed both rival popes; but Benedict XIII remained in schism till his death in 1417.
the clergy and laity in opposition to Cornelius; the last, Felix V, who was elected in opposition to Eugenius IV. Sometimes the whole Church was for a number of years divided by the rival claims of two popes, and in one instance this division continued for thirty-nine years (1578-1617), under a papal antipope.

The story that at one time, in the 9th century, the papal chair was filled by a woman, the popess Joan, was quite generally credited from the latter part of the 11th until the opening of the 16th century, but it is now admitted by nearly all writers to be a false statement.

POPE The term pope is derived from the Greek word bishop (papax), a title given in the early Church to the secular clergy, and corresponds in import to the Latin curate used in the English Church. We find full information about Russian curates or popes in the earliest times. A passage of Nikon (i, 198) shows plainly that about the year 1094, when the Bulgars, there were priests in Russia. They formed, with the deacons, subdeacons, and the persons belonging to an inferior degree of the ecclesiastical order, what was called the secular clergy, the highest office of it being that of archpriest or protopope. The verger, the bell-ringer, those who were not counted in the ecclesiastical order, and formed together a special class, distinguished from the regular and secular clergy as well by their cloth as by their peculiar privileges. The conditions required for admission into the ecclesiasticate had been set among others, by the metropolitan Cyril (1774) at the Synod of Vladimir on the Kietama, celebrated in Russian history. It was decreed there: "If the bishops wish to ordain a pope, let them first examine his life from his childhood; only he who has lived temperately and chastely, who has married a virgins, who is proficient in the art of reading and writing, who is neither a gambler nor a cheat, who is not addicted to drinking, swearing, or cursing, who is not quarrelsome, shall receive the consecration." The right to appoint a pope belonged to the bishop in his diocese, and the community seem to have had originally no share whatever in the choice of their pastor. But it was one of the directions of the Stoglownik (of the year 1551) that the parishioners should elect their pastors and deacons themselves. As the revenue of the popes accrued either from special properties or from the voluntary contributions of the parishioners, it is natural to see that in the first case the right of nomination was exercised by the bishop, and in the other case by the people. The pope was chosen from the deacons, the deacons from the subdeacons, and the latter were taken from among the secular clergy. The pope was endowed by the bishop, who received as a compensation the so-called ordination money. This practice was opposed in Novgorod and Pakow, and occasioned the formation of the sect called Strigolniks (q. v.). At the present time the priests are appointed by the bishop, archbishop, or metropolitan to whose eparchy they belong. Yet the right of the bishop is not of a quite unlimited description: he has to make sure of the consent of the church patron, i.e., the proprietor of the ground on which the church stands, or of the colonel, the preacher, who presides in the officium in a regiment. The lower servants of the Church are appointed by the priest or the patron, seldom by the higher dignitaries.

The official duties of the Greek popes are the following: Every Sunday and holyday, and at least three times in the week, they officiate mechanically and distribute the Eucharist; they give their blessing to confined wives, christen new-born children, administer confession, marry betrothed couples, recite their prayers in uninterrupted series before the bodies of the deceased until they are under ground, and visit from time to time their parishioners in their houses for the purpose of bestowing their benediction, etc. Extemporaneous preaching is severely prohibited. Once in a while they read for the assembled people after worship a homily of the father which is printed and sent to the priests. Many liturgical acts cannot be done by the pope alone without the assistance of the deacon. Every pope must have married already as subdeacon, and the reputation of his bride must have been unblemished. If his wife dies, his usefulness as a pastor comes to an end, and, as a rule, he retires to some monastery, where, as a priest-monk, he enjoys special honors. But, according to more modern rules, popes of good repute are allowed to remain in office after the death of their wives; but a second marriage is entirely out of the question. If the widowed priest marries again, he renounces popes for bishops of the ecclesiastical state, for one marriage only is allowed and prescribed to him.

The honors paid to the secular priests do not follow them into private life. Their religious duties performed, the borrowed nimbus falls, and the boyar who devoutly kissed their hand at the altar ignores them in the street. The cause thereof is mostly to be found in their licentious conduct, their coarseness, their ignorance of worldly and spiritual things—in short, in their vices, against which the metropolitan, bishops, and even the council, are powerless in vain. The council prohibited prohibitory measures. Witnesses relate that the ignorance of the Greek clergy is indescribable; that out of a thousand priests, scarcely ten are able to sign their names, and that he who can do it can pass himself off for a scholar: it is impossible for him to lay claim to a much higher degree of consideration. Most of those who are destined to the Church belong to the lowest class of the population—they are generally the sons of the lower clergy. The sad predicament of the district schools and colleges allows of an inference as to the studies preparatory to the priesthood. The financial aspect of a pope belongs by law to the clerical career; and if the necessities of the Church require it, two of his children receive orders. The embryo pastor gets his first education in the church, where he performs the lower church duties, and in the ecclesiastical schools of the district. Then he spends two years in a clerical seminary, where he learns reading, writing, elementary arithmetic, and the ritual: at this stage of his development the black cloak is thrown on his shoulders, and the priest is made. Now he has to marry; if he does not cherish the idea of retiring to a monastery. He has not the least smattering of Latin or Greek, nor indeed any kind of knowledge. The sum of his acquirements is the ability to read and write the liturgy of the Church. Even the little he has learned in school is slowly obliterated by the frequent mistakes in the ceremonies and the toils of agriculture, to which he must devote his spare time to avoid starvation.

The income of the pope and inferior ecclesiastics is very scanty. As a rule they dwell in a house belonging to the parish, till with their own hands the land conceded to them for their maintenance, and have mostly to depend on their casual income. It follows that everything—baptism, blessings, exorcisms, visits to the sick, celebration of the Eucharist, even confessions—must be paid for according to the rank and wealth of the parishians, else the pope could not maintain himself and his family. If the pope comes to a place, where his family lives, he is expected to officiate in a church. The lower servants of the Church are appointed by the priest or the patron, seldom by the higher dignitaries.

The ordination of popes (hierys, presbyters, priests) is observed in the following way: The bishop makes the sign of the cross over the head of the candidate, while the latter kisses the bishop's knees. He then, with the other ecclesiastics, walks three times processionally around the altar, kneels down before the same, and lays his forehead between his hands, which he rests on the altar. The bishop places his right hand on the head of the young priest, and says, "The divine grace promotes the most pious deacon to the order of priesthood." Then the ordained youth receives the benediction, and kisses the hand of the bishop. As to priestly garments, he receives, instead of the crenion, a similar strip, four inches wide and four feet long, around the neck: this ornament is called epibrachelion; further, a belt and a round cloak, the great phelonion (the casula of the Latins), which reaches to his feet.

The secular clergy stand under the control of the diocesan bishop, but are in many respects also amenable to the worldly authorities. See for literature the art. RUSSIA.

Pope, Alexander, the celebrated English poet of the 18th century, deserves a place here as the writer of poems of a decidedly religious cast, for the speculative character of some of his productions, and their peculiar philosophical tendency. Pope was born May 21, 1688, in London, of rather humble parentage, of the Romish communion. A sickly child, Alexander's early educational advantages were limited, and his pecuniary deficiencies his poetic talent was manifest at a most tender age, though it is true that his celebrity is chiefly due to his satirical power, which was displayed in the writings of his mature years. We would not, however, be understood as underrating the poet's qualifications; for, although he confined himself to the didactic style—leaving untouched the two higher orders of poetry, the epic and dramatic—he was yet in this department the master unsurpassed. No other English poet, not even Cowper, has combined such powers of reasoning with such peep-hole decorations of fancy; and Pope's works have been more frequently edited than those of any other British poet except Shakespeare. When but fifteen years old, Pope prepared poetical translations of several Latin poets, and thereby proved his attainments in the classical languages. From the age of twelve he had himself formed a plan of study, to which he rigidly adhered, and completed with little other incitement than the desire of excellence. His general reading, too, was uncommonly extensive and various, and at twenty-five he was one of the best-informed men of his generation. When only eighteen years old he produced his Messiah, a sacred eclogue in imitation of Virgil's Dido. Pollio was a Roman senator in the time of Augustus, and celebrated not only as a general, but as a patron of letters and the fine arts. Virgil, it is said, used to till his vineyard at Civitavecchia (B.C. 40) when Augustus and Antony had ratified a league of peace, and thus, as it was thought, ca-established the tranquillity of the empire, as in the times of the "golden age." In this eclogue Virgil is most eloquent in the praise of peace, and in some of his figures and similes, words to which Steevens thought he might be imitated in the prophecies of Isaiah, which he had possibly read in the Greek Septuagint. But, however this may be as regards Virgil, Roscoe well remarks of this production of Pope, that "the idea of uniting the sacred prophecies and grand imagery of Isaiah with the mysterious veiled and pomp of imagery used in the Pollio, thereby combining both sacred and heathen mythology in predicting the coming of the Messiah, is one of the happiest subjects for producing emotions of sublimity that ever occurred to the mind of a poet. Pope's poetic workable was his Essay on Criticism (written in 1709), which displays such extent of comprehension, such nicety of distinction, such acquaintance with mankind, and such knowledge both of ancient and modern learning, as are not often attained by the mature age and longest experience. About 1713 he set about a translation of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, which he published from 1715 to 1720, and secured by it a world-wide renown. It was received with admiration, and well deserved the praises of his contemporaries. But the work which gives him special interest in our line of study is his Essay on Criticism (1713), a philosophical didactic poem in vindication of the ways of Providence, in which the poet proposes to prove that, of all possible systems, Infinite Wisdom has formed the best; that in such a system coherences, union, subordinates it necessary; that it is a strange thing that we should not be able to discover perfection and order in every instance; because, in an infinity of things mutually relative, a mind which sees not infinitely can see nothing fully. Thus we see Pope setting forth, after Bolingbroke, a theory of optimism (q.v.), the consequences of which he probably did not fully understand. The Essay aspires to be, like Leibnitz's celebrated work, a theology, and is really a poetical version of the religious creed of Pope's age—of that system which took various shapes with Clarke, Tindal, and Shaftesbury, and which Bolingbroke seems to have more or less put into shape to be celebrated in poetry by his friends. The poem is didactic, and not only didactic, butratioinative. The emotion is always checked by the sense that the Deity whose ways are indicated is after all but a barren abstraction, in no particular relation to our race or its history. He never touches the circle of human interests. Considered as a whole, this production, though Pope's most ambitious, remains radically unsatisfactory; yet there are, it must be granted, many brief passages marked by Pope's special felicities of language; many in which the moral sentiment is true and tender; many in which he forgets for a moment the danger of open heterodoxy, and utters with genuine force some of the deeper sentiments that haunt us in this mysterious universe. Of his other works, none interest us here. One of the most admirable of Pope's religious poems is "The Universal Prayer," beginning with "Father of all! In every age,

In every clime adored."
The bread in the Eucharist has been worshipped as it were the eternal God. From the doctrine of purgatory has sprung that of indulgences, and the practice of persons paying sums of money to the Romish bishop and clergy to release the souls of their friends from the fabulous fire of purgatory.

We append a list of these principal heresies of the Church of Rome, and the time at which they were introduced:

Injunction of saints first taught with authority by a Council of Constantinople, A.D. 784.

A time of innocence is a religious worship first publicly affirmed and sanctioned in the Council of Nicaea, A.D. 321.

Sacramental efficacy of the clergy first enjoined publicly at the first Council of Lateran, A.D. 1123.

Papal supremacy first publicly asserted by the fourth Council of Lateran, A.D. 1215.

Arbitrary confession first enjoined by Innocent III, at the fourth Council of Lateran, A.D. 1215.

Prayers in a foreign tongue first deliberately sanctioned by the Council of Trent, A.D. 1562.

Premunire of the seculars first publicly insulata on by the fourth Council of Lateran, A.D. 1215.

Purgatory and indulgences first set forth by the Council of Florence, A.D. 1439.

Institution of benefices as a canonical at the Council of Trent, A.D. 1547.

Communion in one kind only, first authoritatively sanctioned by the Council of Constance, A.D. 1414.

The formula of the sacraments first settled by the Council of Trent, A.D. 1548.

This system of doctrine will be best understood by a reading of the creed of popery as adopted by pope Pius IV (q.v.), and published in 1564. See also PROFESSIO FIDIC.

It embodies the decisions of the Council of Trent. Every Roman Catholic is bound by it, and Romish officials swear to it. After repeating the Apostles' Creed, the form of the oath goes on:

"I most firmly admit and embrace apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions, and all other constitutions and observances of the Church. I subscribe to, confess, and profess the Holy Scriptures according to the sense which the holy mother Church has held and does hold, to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures; nor will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the fathers.

I profess, also, that there are truly and properly seven sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and for the salvation of men. The number of seven is not imposed on me by compulsion, but is a very powerful testimony for a Jew to make of an apostate. See Jewish Inteligener, 1870; Missionblatt für Israel, 1870; Döbrich Emeth (Breslaus, 1870). (B. P.)"

Popeish View of Christianity. The supporters of this view regard the Church as the mediator between God and the individual: the Church (by which some of them seem to mean "the clergy") is a sort of chartered corporation, by belonging to or by being attached to which any given individual acquires certain privileges. The opponents of such a view regard it as a priesthood, because it lays the stress not on the relations of a man's heart towards God and Christ, as the Gospel does, but on something wholly artificial and formal—his belonging to a certain so-called Society; and thus, whether the Society be alive or dead, whether it really exists or not, the man is ipso facto himself and team itself, as the channel of grace and salvation, when it certainly is not the channel of salvation, because it is visibly and notoriously no sure channel of grace. The opponents of the popish views acknowledge the Pope as the head of the Church; but it is so great a means of grace that its benefits are of the highest value; yet they regard relation to any Church as a thing quite subordinate and secondary; the salvation of a man's soul being effected by the change in his heart and life wrought by Christ's Spirit; and because all who go straight to Christ (their known communion of the Church being assumed) do "manifestly and visibly receive grace, and have the seal of his Spirit, and therefore are certainly heirs of salvation." They adopt this view of Christianity because it seems "simple and scriptural," while any other is complex in its character and human in its source. According to this view, all seems plain: "we are not to derive our salvation through or from the Church, but to be kept or strengthened in the way of salvation by the aid or example of our fellow-Christians, who are formed into societies for this very reason that they might help one another, and not leave each man to fight his own fight alone; the Scripture notion of the Church being that religious society should help a man to become better and holier, just as civil society helps us in civilization.

Popkin, John Smelling, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born June 19, 1771, in Boston, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1792, and held the office of tutor of Greek from 1795 to 1798. Having entered the ministry, he was ordained pastor of the Federal Street Church, Boston, July 16, 1799, which charge he resigned in 1802, and became pastor of the First Parish in Newbury Sept. 19, 1804. In 1815 he was elected professor of Greek in Harvard College, and served until 1826, when he accepted the professorship of Greek literature. He resigned in 1838, and lived in entire retirement, and died, March 2, 1852. Dr. Popkin published Three Lectures on Liberal Education (1836), and a number of occasional sermons. Some of his lectures and sermons, with a Life by Prof. Felton, were published in 1852. See Sprague, Amasa, ii, 454; North Amer. Rev. 1875, p. 470; Christian Examiner, vol. iii.

Poplar (πάπυρος, Papyrus), Sept. σπώραξ, in Gen. xxx, 27; λάστιγος, in Hos. iv. 18; Vulg. populus, the rendering of the above-named Hebrew Hebrew, which occurs only in the two places cited. Peeled rods of the πάπυρος were put by Jacob before Laban's ring-streaked sheep. This tree is mentioned with the oak and the terebinth, by Hosea, as one under which idolatrous Israel used to sacrifice. Several ancient writers, Celsius among the number (Hierok. i. 292), are in favor of the rendering of the A. V., and think the "white poplar," (Populus alba) is the tree denoted. The Hebrew name lāmēc, being supposed to be derived from לָמֶךְ (to white), has been considered identical with the Greek λάμης, which both signifies "white" and also the "white poplar." This poplar is said to be called white, not on account of the whiteness of its bark, but of that of the under surface of its leaves. It may perhaps be so designated from the whiteness of its inner branches, which has a remarkable appearance when the seed-covering first bursts. The poplar is certainly common in the countries where the scenes are laid of the transactions related in the above passages of Scripture (comp. Belon, Obs. ii, 106). Rauwolf also mentions the white poplar as abundant about Aleppo and Tripoli, and still called by the ancient Arabic name ḥawr or ḥor, which is the word used in the Arabic translation of Hosea.

Others, however, have been of opinion that lāmēc denotes the storax-tree rather than the white poplar. Thus, in Galat. iv. 1, the time of Christ's ascension is referred to the Populus, on which occurs the word στέφανος, a rod of storax; and the Greek translation of the Pentateuch, according to Rosenmuller, is more ancient and of far greater authority than that of Hosea. So R. Jonah, as translated by Celsius, says of lāmēc, "Dictor Idummæae, et ait hic inquit Horeum, quod nomen is lāmēc, "a rod of storax;" and the Greek translation of Genesis lubën is employed as the representative of the Hebrew lāmēc. Lubën, both in Arabic and in Persian, is the name of a tree, and of the fragrant resin employed for fumigating, which exudes from it, which is commonly known by the name of storax. This resin was well known in the ancients, and is mentioned by Hippocrates and Theophrastus. Dioscorides, (i, 79) and Pliny (Nat. Hist. xii, 17 and 25) both speak of the storax. Pliny says, "That part of Syria which adjoins Judea above Phenicia produces storax, which is found in the neighborhood of Gabala (Jebel) and Marathus, as also of Casius, a mountain of Seleucia. . . . That which comes from the mountain of Amanus, in Syria, is highly esteemed for medicinal purposes, and even more so by the perfumers." Dioscorides describes several kinds, all of which were obtained from Asia Minor; and all that is now imported is believed to be the produce of that country. But the tree is cultivated in the south of Europe, though it does not there yield any storax. It is found in Greece, and is supposed to be a native of Asia Minor, whence it extends into Syria, and probably from thence to Egypt. It is therefore the country which was the scene of the transaction related in the above passage of Genesis. From the description of Dioscorides, and his comparing the leaves of the storax to those of the quince, there is no doubt of the same tree being intended: especially as in early times, as at the present day, it yielded a highly fragrant balsamic substance which was esteemed as a medicine, and employed in fumigation. From the similarity of the Hebrew name lāmēc to the Arabic lab₂n, and from the Sept., having in Genesis translated the former by storax, it seems most probable that this was the tree intended. It is capable of yielding white wands as well as the poplar; and it also well qualified to afford complete shade under its ample foliage, as in the passage of Hose. iv. 13. We may also suppose it to have been more particularly alluded to from its being a tree yielding incense. "They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under the terebinth and the storax trees, because the shadow thereof is good." Storax (στράξ) is mentioned in Ecelus, xxiv, 15, together with other aromatic substances. The modern Greek name of the tree, as we learn from Sibthorpe (Flor. Græc.). It is στράξ, and is a common wild shrub in Greece and in most parts of the Levant. The resin exudes either spontaneously or after incision. This property, however, it would seem, is only for the most part possessed by trees which grow in a warm country; for English specimens, though they flower profusely, do not produce the drug. Mr. Daniel Hanbury, who has discussed the whole subject of the storax planta with much care (see the Pharmaceutical Journal and Transactions for Feb., 1857), tells us that a friend of his quite failed to obtain any exudation from Styrax officinalis, by incisions made in the hottest part of the summer of 1856, on specimens growing in the botanic garden at Montpellier. "The experiment was quite unsuccessful; neither aqueous sap nor resinous juice flowed from the incisions." Still Mr. Hanbury quotes two authorities to show that under certain favorable circumstances the tree may exude a fragrant resin even in France and Italy. The Styrax officinalis is a shrub from nine to twelve feet high, with ovate leaves, which are white underneath; the flowers are in racemes, and are white or cream-colored. The white appearance agrees with the etymology of the Hebrew libnah. The liquid storax of commerce is the product of the Liquidambar Orientalis, Mill. (see a fig. in Mr. Hanbury's communication), an entirely different plant, whose resin was probably unknown to the ancients. See Stacte.

Styrax Officinalis.

Poplicani, a name applied to the Algibeenses (q.v.).

Poppiæ. See Sabina.

Popotchis,* or Popovačchins,* a name given to the different sects of Russian dissenters who recognize the validity of ordination as given in the Established Church, and receive most of their popes (q.v.), i.e., priests, from that communion. The Popotchis are divided into five principal sects: the Starobertz, or Old Ceremonialists, the Diaconoffitchis, the Peremayanoffitchis, the Epiffanoffitchis, and the Tschernabalti. Those who have no priests at all, or who do not acknowledge the validity of Church ordination, are termed Bez-Popotchitchis, or No-Priesters. See Mosheim, Eccles. History, vol. iii.; Plato, Greek Church (see Index).

Popogano is the name by which the primitive inhabitants of Virginia designated hell, which they imagined floating in the air between heaven and earth.

Popple, Poppy, Poppy-head (from Fr. poupple = a doll, or Lat. puppis = the "poop" of a ship), an architectural term designating an elevated ornament often used on the tops of the upright ends, or elbows, which terminate seats, etc., in churches; they are sometimes merely cut into plain feur de lis or other simple forms, with the edges chamfered or slightly hollowed, but are frequently carved with leaves, like finials, and in rich work are sculptured into animals and figures, and are often extremely elaborate. No examples are known to exist of earlier date than the Decorated style, and but few so early; of Perpendicular date specimens are to be found in very many churches, especially in the cathedrals and old abbey churches. See Stall; Standard.

Ordinary Popple. Kiddleston, c. 1450.

Poppy-head. See Poppit.

Populonis,* a surname of Juno (q.v.) among the ancient Romans, as being the protectress of the whole Roman people.

Porch is the rendering in the A. V. of the following words:

1. לֶ֔דּוֹן or לֱדוֹן, udam (from לָדוֹן, before), a vestibule or hall (Sept. aôla; Vulg. porticus [1 Chron. xxviii. 11]; vncos; porticus). It is used of the entrance-hall of a building (Ezek. xli. 7, 48); of the place where the throne was placed, and where judgment was administered (1 Kings vii. 7 [see Palace]); and of the veranda surrounding a court (Ezek. xli. 10). It is especially applied to the vestibule of the Temple (1 Kings vii. 17; Joel ii. 17). See Temple. "The porch of the Lord" (2 Chron. xv. 8; xxix. 17) seems to stand for the Temple itself.

2. בֵּן־פְּרֵיָד, miserdon, a sort of colonnade or balcony with pillars (Jugd. iii. 28); probably a corridor connecting the principal rooms of the house (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i. 11). It may have been a sort of veranda chamber in the works of Solomon, open in front and at the sides, but capable of being enclosed with awnings or curtains, like that of the royal palace at Isphahan described by Chardin (vii, 386, and pl. 39). The word is used in the Talmud (Middeoth, iii. 7).

3. Πύληος (Matt. xxvi. 71), probably the passage from the street into the first court of the house, in which, in Eastern houses, is the maastibah, or stone bench for the porter or persons waiting, and where also the master of the house often receives visitors and transacts business (Lam. Mod. Ep. i. 82; Shaw, Tyr. p. 207). The word rendered "porch" in the parallel passage (Mark xiv. 68) is proaspelion, the outer court. The scene therefore of the denial of our Lord took place either in that court or in the passage from it to the house-door. See House.

4. The term eroys is used for the colonnade or portico of Bethesda, and also for that of the Temple called Solomon's porch (John v, 2; x, 23; Acts iii, 11; v, 19). Josephus describes the poricci or porticoes which surrounded the Temple of Solomon, and also the royal porch (4 Macc. 2, 3; 9. 4). These poricci are described by Tacitus as forming an important line of defence during the siege (Hist. v, 12). See Solomon's Porch.

PORCH (Lat. porticus) is the term applied in ecclesiastical architecture to the adjunctive erection placed over the doorway of a church. In the early ecclesiastical structures, raised after infant baptism became prevalent in the West, and the discipline of the catechumens (q.v.) had fallen into desuetude, the narthex (q.v.) was given the form of a vestibule, frequently closed, and sufficiently capacious to contain a large number of persons and permit the celebration of different ceremonies. This was really what we now understand by porch. Few churches, cathedrals, conventual or parochial, were, until the middle of the 12th century, unprovided with a central porch in front of the principal entrance; but after the 13th century they were not so common.

The earliest porches in the West, dating from the 8th to the 11th century, are shallow, and extended across the church front, as at Clermont. One of the earliest is at St. Poix, Périgord. In some cases they were recessed under the tower, as at St. Germain-des-Prés (Paris), Limoges, Poissy, of the 9th or 10th century, St. Benet-sur-Loire, Alençon, and St. Savin. During the 11th century this became the rule; in the 13th it was rare, but at a later date it reappeared at Caen, Fribourg, and Cranbrook. At St. Savin the porch is defended and protected by a ditch, just as the castellated palaces stood in front of the western entrance of Canterbury Cathedral. The giant porch of Aachen, imposing as it is, is far exceeded by the three magnificent Early English porches of Peterborough, which accord with the entire work, those of many of the great French cathedrals are mere afterthoughts, noble but accidental additions. At Fribourg, Rheims, and Chartres (1200–80) the porches are covered with statuary.

Towards the close of the 12th century the ceremonies performed within them fell into desuetude, and they in consequence dwindled into a mere appendage of the main structure; and from that cause their use was restricted to western doors; large lateral porches, usually in cathedrals, as at Chartres, Sens, Bayeux, Puy-en-Velay, Chalon-sur-Marne, Wells, Salisbury, Lincoln, and Hereford, were built for the convenience of worshippers when entering or leaving the church, for benefactions, and the preliminaries of baptism; and in cathedrals and in the cathedrals of minor sees. The monastic churches in towns imitated the arrangement. These porches were usually closed at the sides, as in the Norman examples of Kelso, Selby, Southwell, Sherborne, and Malmsbury, although that of Alençon is open. At Hereford the great porch (cir. 1513) is open, but the inner Decorated porch is closed. Until the close of the 14th century porches, generally of open form, were commonly built. The lateral porch fronted the side which faced the more populous portion of the city—at Gloucester, Canterbury, Malmsbury, Chester, and St. David's, on the south; at Durham, Hereford, Exeter, Christchurch (Hants), and Selby, on the north. At Chichester it is on the south side, opening on the cloister to admit procession to the shrine; at Westminster (called from its beauty Solomon's Porch) it stood in advance of the north front of the transept; at Lincoln the bishop's porch is in the presbytery. There are Early English porches at St. Alban's and Barnack, the latter, like All Saints', Stamford, Albury, and St. Mary's, Nottingham, having external and internal stone roofs. From the 14th century onwards we have a large number of examples in England, France, and Germany. In the 15th and 16th centuries the arcing were used as channels, fenced in with an iron screen; and at Chichester there are still lateral examples.

tombs. Gradually incense was used and litanies were chanted in porches. Fonts and basins for the ablutions of the faithful before entering the church were erected, and exhibitions of relics and sacred images were made. Markets were permitted, just as objects of piety are still sold in foreign porches on festival days. Feudal and other courts were held. At Sandwich a school was taught and books sold, and even, in 1519, peddlers hawked their wares at Riccall. Chapters and religious bodies appealed to the civil power to put an end to such irregularities, and the great abbeys of Clugny, Maulbronn, and Citeaux, about the beginning of the 12th century, began to erect large enclosed porches in front of their churches. The Clugnians built large ante-churches of two stories, as at Lewes; at Tours, near the close of the 11th century. At the latter place they consisted of a nave and aisles of thirteen bays, with an upper chapel of St. Michael, in which the altar was used for a mass attended by penitents. At Clugny in the 13th century an altar and pulpit adjoined the church door. Their influence is perceptible in the large upper chapel over the porch at Puy-en-Velay and Autun, and the tribune for an altar at Chartres, etc.

The Cistercians built western porches deep and longitudinal, in imitation of the narthex, according to the desire of St. Bernard, at Toury, Moissac, Chartres, and Beaujeu. At Vezelay, in the 13th century, the porch, of two bays in length, forms a nave with aisles, lateral galleries, and a tribune for an altar over the minister door. In many French parish churches this plan was followed in order to accommodate mourners at funerals. In England an upper chamber sometimes occurs over porches, as at Southwell, Christchurch (Hants), and in parish churches used as a school-room or a chapel's or watchers' dormitory. Placentia, Farma, and Modena have porches of two stories.

In the foreign examples pilgrims or penitents were marshalled on the ground-floor in order to hear an address from the pulpit, or mass said at the upper altar, while those who came from a distance found shelter in these vaulted porches, just as the country people on the eves of great festivals pass the night under the porticoes of St. Peter's at Rome. At Paulinville, cir. 1150, there is, and at Sherborne there was, a large parochial ante-church. At Glastonbury and Durham the Lady-chapel was placed in a similar position.

It is possible that these outer buildings served the same purpose of a place of previous assembly, just as the great western transept of Ely or Lincoln church. Sometimes it was occupied on occasions when large multitudes flocked to the church. In some monastic churches it served as the fore-sic parlor for conversation with persons inadmissible within the inner portions. The children of the abbey serfs were baptized and the office at which their domestic servants and laborers attended was said. In all large churches the processions were arranged in the porch on Palm-Sunday, on Holy-cross Day, and in Rogation. Sometimes it formed a sanctuary, containing a ring in the door to which the fugitive clung, as at Durham, and at Cologne there was an inscription to this effect, "Here sits the great criminal."—Walpole, Sacred Architecture, a. v.; Parker, Glossary of Architecture, a. v.

Porchat. Joseph, a converted Jew, flourished in the 14th century in Spain, and by his learning rendered great service to the Church of Christ in that day. He was associated with Martini (q. v.), the author of Pugio Fidei, and transcribed a great part of it into a work which he himself composed under the title of Victoria adversus Hebreos (1520), and which is one of the ablest polemics of the Christian Church against Judaism. See McCrie, Hist. of the Reformation in Spain, p. 56.

Porcq, Jean Le, a French Oratorian, was born near Bologna-sur-Mer in 1536. Professor of theology for fifty years at the school founded at Sauzon by the Oratorians, he was one of the most active adversaries of the Jansenists, and published against them Les Sentiments de Saint-Augustine sur la Grâce (Lyons, 1682, 1706, 4to). Although he abstains from all personalities, his adversaries spoke of it with the utmost contempt. Abbé Goujet acknowledges Porcq's piety, and says that he always carefully avoided anything that was akin to sectarianism, but that he wrote against Jansenism because he considered it wrong. He wrote as a true polemic against doctrinal and not persons. See Dupin, Bibl. des Aut. Ecclés., du 18ème Siècle, i, 365.

Porridge. John, an English mystic, who, with Jane Lead and Thomas Bromley, founded the so-called "Philadelphia" society, was born in London in 1698. He studied theology and medicine at Oxford, and became a curate at Reading; but, after a short pastorate, was settled at Bradford, in Berkshire. From the works of Böhme, which Charles I had caused to be published in English, Porridge derived the germs of his strange and incoherent mysticism. A time of such sudden veering from the extreme of churchliness to the mildest independentism as was the case under Charles I and Cromwell is very favorable to sporadic outbursts of fanaticism. Hence, as Porridge was very susceptible in this direction, it was not long until he found himself the centre of a group of disciples. The effect of association was to intensify his delusion and to brighten his imagination. This culminated in a series of the wildest ostensibly supernatural visions. In the night of Jan. 3, 1651, he assumed to have had three of these. The first was that of a being with clothes, beard, and hat, who drew back his bed-curtains, and then mysteriously vanished. Hardly had Porridge fallen asleep again when he saw a giant with an uprooted tree on his shoulder and a sword in his hand, seeing the tree to the earth, and then began to wrestle with Porridge, but was successfully resisted by the latter with spiritual weapons. The third vision was that of an immense dragon, which vomited fire upon him, and left him exclaiming in the terms of the "Vision of Saint Malachy," a session of the "Philadelphians" was held. Those in attendance also now fell into a state of ecstasy, and had visions of the heavenly and of the infernal world. As these visions continued for a period of three weeks, day and night, Pordage affirmed that they could not be mere fanciful imaginations, but were a heavenly admonition to them to break off from the world, and to enter upon a life of complete devotion to God. But their meetings called for the intervention of the police. The matter was investigated, but led to no other serious results. Finally, in a human manner, he is not by any means to be confused with Titian, from whom he is to be separated by a whole lifetime. Certainly the saints and virgins of Pordenone, which hang in the gallery of Venice beside the works of Titian, do not look as if they had the latter much trouble to distance his competitor. As Pordenone principally painted frescos in North or Upper Italy, he was known in Lower Italy only by his fine oil-paintings. His most splendid work in oil is the altar-piece of Santa Maria dell'Orto at Venice, representing a San Lorenzo Giustini, a landscape on the grandest scale. There are St. John the Baptist and St. Augustine. The frescos of Pordenone are spread over the towns and castles of Friuli; some are at Genoa, Mantua, and Venice, but the best-preserved are on N.-T. the towns of Piacenza, and especially in the cathedral of Cremona. He was highly esteemed by the Emperor Charles V., who enabled him to paint Hercules II., duke of Mantua, called him to Mantua to paint cartoons for tapestry to be made in Flanders, but he soon afterwards died (1539), as it was suspected, of poison. We have very few exact copies of Pordenone, and of his works which have been preserved. Moreover, his frescos are oftentimes proved not to be his, or are under so much doubt that it is unsafe to risk a list of them. The Glory of S. Lorenzo Giustini, in the Academy of Venice, is one of his finest works. Much has been said of The Woman taken in Adultery, in the Berlin Museum, but it is so repainted (the heads of the Saviour and the woman being almost new) that it can do little honor to any artist of the 16th century. Several of Pordenone's pictures are in England. In the National Gallery is a colossal figure of An Apostle. Porrée, Charles, a noted French Jesuit, was born in 1673. He became a member of the Society of Jesus in 1692, and flourished as a trainer of youth all his life, and it is presumed that no man ever exceeded him in this work. Vutale says of him that "he was eloquent after the style and taste of Seneca, a very beautiful poet; but that his greatest merit consisted in inspiring his pupils with the love of learning as to virtue." He died in 1741. His writings are of a secular character.

Porodakhta is a personage of the Persian mythology, the father of the famous hero Ahemard. He is to be one of the assistants of Siosiah, son of Zoroaster, in his great work, the resurrection of the dead.

Porphyrians was the name given to the Arians in an edict of the emperor Constantine issued in the year 325, the reason stated being that, as they had emulated the impiety of the Nestorians, they were to be named after him (Socrat. Hist. Eccles., i, 6). This decree was afterwards quoted as a precedent by Theodosius the Younger, who ordered that the Nestorians should, in a similar manner, be called Simionians. It may be doubted whether either name extended much beyond the four corners of the edicts in which they were given. See Baronius, "Annales," ad ann. 325, vol. lxxxiv, lxxxv.
Porphyry (Πορφύριος), a celebrated heathen philosopher, the oldest expounder and defender of Neo-Platonism as taught by Plotinus (q. v.), and one of the most sagacious and learned antagonists of Christianity under the Roman empire, flourished in the second half of the 3d century.

Porphyry was born A.D. 233. Eunapius and Suidas (following, no doubt, Porphyry himself, Vitr. Plot. viii., 107) in their biographies call him a Tyrian; but both St. Jerome (Prof. Epist. ad Gal.) and St. Chrysostom (Homil. vi. in ad Corinth. p. 58) term him Baraswòry, a word on the fancied correction of which a good deal of ingenuity has been unnecessarily expended; some imagining that it is a corruption of some term of reproach (such as βαρασιωρς, herb-eater, βοδαρανωρς, or βαρανατωρ). The more reasonable view is that the word is correct enough, and describes more accurately the birthplace of Porphyry—Bataanes, the Bashan of Scripture. To account for his being called a Tyrian some have supposed that he was originally of Jewish origin, and having first embraced, and afterwards renounced Christianity, called himself a Tyrian to mislead those who were looking for a slighter alteration in the text of Chrysostom, supposed that Porphyry falsely assumed the epithet Baraswòry, to induce the belief that he was of Jewish origin, so that his statements with regard to the Jewish Scriptures might have the more weight. None of these conjectures secures any definite results. The least inoffensive view is that of Jounis, who is followed by Fabricius, Brucker, and others, that there was a Tyrian settlement in the district of Bataanes, and that Porphyry was born there, but, from the neighborhood of the more important place, called himself, and was called by others, a Tyrian (Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil. ii., 240; Harless, Ad Fabricius Bibli. Gr. vi., 725).

The original name of Porphyry was Malæirus (Μαλαρίως, the Greek form of the Syro-Phoenician Melék), a word, as he himself tells us, which signifies King. His father bore the same name, and was a man of distinguished family (Porph. Vitr. Plot. c. xvi). Aurelius, in dedicating a work to him, styled him Basileia. The more euphonic name Πορφύριος (in allusion to the usual color of royal robes) was subsequently devised for him by his preceptor, Longinus (Eunapius, Porph. p. 121; Suidas, s. v.). Suidas states that he lived in the reign of Aurelian, and died in that of Diocletian. Eunapius says, more explicitly, that he lived in the reigns of Galienus, Claudius, Tacitus, Aurelian, and Probus. Porphyry states that he was born when he first became the pupil of Plotinus, which was in the tenth year of the reign of Gallienus (Vitr. Plot. iv., 99); the date of his birth was, therefore, A.D. 233.

Exhibiting in his earliest youth a thirst for knowledge, a quickness of mental perception, combined with indications of intellectual vigor, his father provided the very best instruction for him, especially in philosophy and literature. From Porphyry himself, as quoted by Eusebius (Hist. iii., 19; comp. Proclus, in Tim. i., p. 20), it appears that when very young he was placed under the instruction of Theon. This could not have been, as some have imagined, at Alexandria, for about the time of the birth of Porphyry Origen quitted Alexandria, and did not return to it. It was most likely at Cæsarea that Porphyry attended the instructions of Origen. Eunapius has been charged with a gross blunder in making Origen the fellow-student of Porphyry; but it does not seem necessary to suppose that he meant the celebrated Church father of that name. Porphyry next removed to Athens, and became the pupil of Apollonius (Porph. Quest. Hum. 25), and of the much-celebrated Longinus (q. v.). For reputation for wisdom and skill in instruction brought him scholars from all parts of the then civilized world. Under his tuition he received that early moulding which subsequently secured such vigor of thought and elegance of style, and the tutor was so much pleased with his scholar that he not only warmly commended him, but applied the name to him by which alone posterity has known him. At the age of twenty he went to Rome to study under Plotinus (q. v.), but as that philosopher was not then teaching, Porphyry returned to the care of his former preceptor. At the age of thirty he again went to Rome, this time in the company of Ammonius Saccas, and he studied with the great exponent of Neo-Platonism, and with Plotinus's oldest disciple, Amelius (Vitr. Plot. c. iv.).

Porphyry remained six years, and became thoroughly attached to his master—a man endowed with an extraordinary understanding and vigorous imagination, who as a teacher of the eclectic philosophy capable of felicitously unfolding the sublime ideas of Plato had obtained a great reputation. Under such guidance the pupil, by nature well endowed for study, and led on by his zeal for distinction and acquirements, very soon came to be regarded as one of the chief ornaments of the school. He wrote and disputed with great freedom and masterly ability. Thus, e. g., when having some doubts respecting a dogma which Plotinus had inculcated, Porphyry hesitated not to call the philosopher's dicta in question, and a long and sharp dispute ensued in reply to those who disputed with him, hoping to get a rejoinder, which Amelius wrote by request of Plotinus. Porphyry, still unsatisfied, again wrote, and was once more replied to by Amelius, who this time succeeded in pacifying the inquisitive pupil. Porphyry now evidently saw this man of the Papriques was mistaken in his erroneous criticisms. This generous action gained so thoroughly the approval and confidence of Plotinus that he was admitted by him to terms of close intimacy, and frequently had assigned to him the task of refuting opponents, and was besides intrusted with the still more difficult and delicate duty of correcting and arranging the writings of Plotinus (Vitr. Plot. vii., 107; xiii., 115; xv., 117; xxiv., 189).

So closely did Porphyry apply himself to these studies that his health became impaired, and, naturally of hypochondriacal disposition, a cloud, settling into confirmed melancholy, was cast over his mind. While in this state he formed a resolution of putting an end to his life, hoping by this method, according to the Platonic teaching, to release the soul from the prison of the body. From this mad design, however, he was dissuaded by his master, who advised a voyage to Sicily. Complying with this advice, Porphyry recovered his bodily vigor and serenity of mind, and devoted himself to authorship. He then wrote, according to Eusebius (Hist. vi. 19) and St. Jerome (Chron. 153), six years of age, about the time of the death of Constantian, his Christian teacher; according to Christian legend, he retired to a monastery at Athens after the death of Plotinus has been inferred (by Holstenius) from a passage quoted by Eusebius, where, as the text stands, Porphyry is made to speak of celebrating the birthday of Plotinus at Athens with Longinus. There can be little doubt whatever the reading should be, as Brucker (l. c. p. 148) suggests, πανανατωρ, and that the incident refers to the earlier part of the life of Porphyry, otherwise the allusion will not accord with the history either of Porphyry or Longinus.

Of the remainder of the life of Porphyry we know very little. According to Eunapius he returned to Rome, where he taught, and gave frequent public exhibitions of his acquirements and talents as a speaker, and was held in high honor by the senate and people till he died. But his mind again lost its balance, for he pretended to be not only a philosopher "endued with superior wisdom, but a divine person, favored with supernatural communications from heaven." He avers that in the sixty-eighth year of his age (Vit. Plot. c. xxiii) he had a vision of the Supreme Intelligence, the (Vit. Plot. c. xxvi), and Augustine thought, of the agency of evil spirits, but more probably an entire fiction, employed to offset the supernatural elements of Christianity, or a mere phan-tasm of an overwrought brain. When probably at a somewhat advanced period of his life, he married Mar-cella, the widow of one of his friends, and the mother of seven children (Ad Marc. 1), with the view, as he avowed, of superintending their education. About ten months after his marriage he had occasion to leave her and go on a journey; and to console her for his absence he wrote to her an epistle, which is still extant. The date of his death cannot be fixed with any exact-ness; it was probably about A.D. 305 or 306.

His Philosophy.—It appears from the testimony even of antagonists, and from what we have left of Porphyry's writings, that he was a man of great abilities and very extensive learning. Eusebius speaks of him as one τῶν μᾶλλα ἐξισορροπητῶν καὶ πάσιν γνωριμῶν, κλητὸς τοῦ συμμονήμερος πρὸς Ἑλληνίδας ἀντιπροσώπους (Prop. Ep. iii. 9); and Augustine styles him "hominem non fictum, sed verum, quem scribitur in saeculum putant " (De nat. rerum iv. 30, c. xix, 22). The philosophical doctrines of Porphyry were in all essential respects the same as those of his master, Plotinus. To that system he was ardently attached, and proved himself one of its most ener-getic defenders. His writings were all designed directly or indirectly to illustrate, commend, or establish it. His rhetorical training, extensive learning, and comparative clearness of style, no doubt did good service in the cause of his school. Thus Eunapius (Vita Porph. p. 8, Bois) ascribes to Porphyry as his principal merit that by his writings, by his disputations, he brought within the range of the understanding of all men the doctrine of Plotinus, which in the language of its author had seemed difficult and obscure. Indeed, Porphyry lays himself less claim to originality than to the merit of an expositor and defender of the doctrine of Plotinus, which he regarded as identical with that of Plato, and sub-stantially also with that of Aristotle. Porphyry is, nevertheless, charged with inconsistencies and contra-dictions; his later views being frequently at variance with his earlier ones (Eunapius, Vit. Porph. fin.; Rose-lanx, Echat. I, 233.). The reason of this may probably be found in the vacillation of his views with respect to theurgy and philosoph-ogy—a vacillation which would doubtless attract the greater attention, as it was in opposition to the general tenor of his master's school, that he ranked philosop-hy higher than theurgical superstitions which were connected with the popular polytheism. With the latter, some features of his doctrine had considerable affinity. He insisted strongly on the contrast between the corporeal and the incorporeal, and the power of the latter over the former. This may have been, as in his view, unrestricted by the limits of space, and independent of the accident of contiguity. When free from intermixture with matter, it is omnipresent, and its power unlimited. His doctrine with regard to da-mons, pointed in the same direction. Over both them and the souls of the dead power could be obtained by enchantments (De Abst. ii. 38, 39, 41, 43, 47). Yet these notions seem to have been taken up by him rather in deference to the prevalent opinion of his times than as forming an essential part of his philosophy. Though at first he considered the incorporeal as the true method of safety consisted in the purification of the soul and the contemplation of the eternal Deity. The increasing value set upon theurgy, and the endeavors to raise it to the philosophy it was, perhaps produced something like a reaction in his mind, and strengthened the doubts which he entertained with regard to the popular superstition. These doubts he set forth in a letter to the Egyptian prophet Anoebo, in a series of questions. The distrust there expressed respecting the popular notions of the gods, divinations, incarnations, and other theurgic arts. "Ut videamus intro vitium sacrilegium curiositatem et philosophiae professionem fluctuassit, et nunc hanc artem tamquam failaceam, et in ipsa actione periculosam, et legibus prohibitam, carentiam monere, nunc autem velut ejus laudatorius cedemem, ut eum dicere easque souterissime partam animae, non quidem intellec-tualis qua rerum intelligibilium perciptioni veritas, vel habentium similitudines corporum, sed spiritualis, qua rerum corporalium capiantur imagines." The letter to Anoebo called forth a reply, which is still extant, and known under the title Pari Mortuarius, and is the production probably of Lamiulhus (q.v.).

So many are the variations of Porphyry in his philo-sophic views from those of Plotinus, that Porphyry must really be assigned to a class of his own rather than called an exponent of Plotinus. Not only did Porphyry popu-lize the teaching of Plotinus, which he had learned, by popularizing it by the more practical and religious charac-ter which he gave to the system. Understanding the power of the Christian religion, which was fast superstitioning the national credos, he felt the necessity for anta-gonizing it. He therefore undertook to spiritualize the old creeds, and to harmonize them with philosophy by treating them as symbolic. He perceived the national craving for a theology (Farrar, p. 57) which rested on some divine authority, or revelation from the world invisible (comp. Augustine's criticism on him in De Cret. xxx. x. 1, 9, 93). He even so far effaced the character of his master as to pretend that he claimed the title of Pope. He also identified the Deity with the manifested or the real or pretended oracles in his περὶ τῆς λειτουργίας, of which fragments exist in Eusebius and Augustine (Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. v. 744). Heathens, it would seem, had consulted oracles on this very subject of Christianity; and it is these, the genuineness of which may be doubted, that he uses.

The end of philosophizing, according to Porphyry, is the salvation of the soul (ἡ τῆς ψυχῆς σωτηρία). The cause of evil is to be found in the soul, in its desires after the low and base, and not in the body as such (Ad Marc. 29). The man who considers that the soul is immortal (καταμωμισθείσα) through asceticism and the philos-ophical contemplation of God. To divination and theurgic initiations Porphyry conceded only a subordinate signif-icance; in his later years, especially, he was in danger of sinking into a kind of paganism. In particular, his epistle to Anoebo, the Egyptian priest. He acknowledged one absolute, supreme Deity, who is to be worshipped with pure words and thoughts (Ad Marc. 18). He also, however, distinguished two classes of visible and invisible gods, the former being composed of body and soul, and the latter, neither eternal nor immutable (De Abst. ii. 34, 36, 37-39). He also distin-guished between good and evil demons, and held that the latter ought to be appeased, but that it should be the object of the philosopher to free himself as much as possible from everything placed under the power of evil demons. For that reason, among others, he rejected all animal sacrifices (De Abst. ii. 38, 39, 48). The ascetic tendency of his philosophy, as connected with his ex-alted ideas of the power of reason, which is superior to nature and the influence of demons, conduced to raise him above the superstitions and tendencies of his age and the spirit of the philosopher being, in his view, superior to all impressions from without. The object of the philos-opher should be to free himself as much as possible from all desires or of dependence on that which is exterior, such appetites being to him the principal tares, from which we should be glad to be set free, or with the loss of the whole body (Ad Marc. 84). We should, therefore, restrain our sensual desires as much as possible. It was mainly in this point of view that he rejected all six books of Platonism in the second world of Socr. über Freiheit, mit krit. u. erw. Bermerk. zu Porphy. Socr. über Enthaltsamkeit, p. 4-38). Though bad genii have some power over us, yet through abstinence and the steady resistance of all disturbing influences we can pursue the good in spite of them. If we could abstain from vegetable as well as animal food, he thought we should become still more like the gods (De Ast. iii, 27). It is by means of reason only that we are exalted to the supreme God, to whom nothing material should be offered, for everything material is unclean (De Ast. i, 39, 57; ii, 94, Ad Marc. 84). He distinguishes four degrees of virtues, the lowest being political virtue, the virtue of a good man who moderates his passions. Superior to this is purging virtue, which completely sets the soul free from affections. Its object is to make us resemble God, and by it we become domestic men or good demons. In the higher grade, when entirely given up to knowledge and the soul, man becomes a god, till at last he lives only for reason, and so becomes the father of gods, one with the one Supreme Being (Serm. 94).

Porphyry appears to be more distinct from Plotinus than Plotinus's doctrine of the emanation of matter from the super-sensible, and proximately from the soul (Proc. in Tim. p. 109, 188, 189). The doctrine that the world is without beginning in time was defended by Porphyry against the objections of Aviceus and Plutarch (Proc. in Tim. p. 119).

His Attacks against Christianity.—Porphyry has especial interest for us, however, not so much as a philosopher of the New-Platonic school, great as he was so much, but as the constructor of a new philosophy, the aim of which was not merely speculation and the enchantment of reason, but its acceptance as a national creed, and its dethronement of Christianity. When made aware that his system could not of itself accomplish all that he desired, he left the apologetic domain, and became the most determined of heathen polonies the world ever beheld or Christianity ever encountered. Lucian and Celsus, a hundred years earlier, had vainly striven to stay the rising fortunes of the Gospel. He now came forward to attempt the death-grapple, and it must be confessed that he made a most vigorous effort to retrieve a sinking cause, to turn back the tide of new ideas, and to re-instate in the minds of the people of the Roman empire the principles of an ineffable religious system, of a waning and insufficient philosophy. As already indicated above, Porphyry was a man of remarkable learning. He wrote books both in prose and verse, as well as works on the vulgar greeks and ribald remarks of Thomas Paine. In his attacks on the Gospel, often reminds us of the vulgar gibes of ribald remarks of Thomas Paine.

Speaking in the name of philosophy, he assumes a dignity, an elevation of tone, an apparent candor in the treatment of his subject, akin to that of the judge, who is supposed impartially to survey the whole field of evidence, and to give weight to no doubtful statements, to no suspicious arguments. Undoubtedly his honesty in his convictions and in his attack to his philosophy of his master, he brought the resources of a great, a cultured mind to bear against the more vulnerable points of the Christian system, testing it by weapons of the highest temper. Porphyry certainly enjoyed a vantage-ground in the school of philosophy to which he belonged. Platonism, as already suggested, approximated more nearly than any of the other philosophical systems of antiquity to the elevated teachings of the Gospel. But during the period which, while spreading through the Roman world, this philosophy, under the teachings of Plotinus, had been drawing nearer to the doctrines of the New Testament, inso-
of the Jewish Church. It is traceable to a more limited extent in the inspired writers of the New Testament, and in most of the fathers; but in the school of Alexandria it was as a system of interpretation. It is this allegorical system which Porphyry attacked. He assassinated the writings of those who had fanatically allegorized the Old Testament in the pious desire of finding Christianity in every part of it, in spite of historic conditions; and he hastily drew the inference, with a transparent disregard of doubt which rash interpretations of prophecy are in danger of producing at this day, that no consistent sense can be put upon the Old Testament. His fourth book was a criticism on the Mosaic history, and on Jewish antiquities. But the most important books in his work were the twelfth and thirteenth, which were devoted to an examination of the prophecies of Daniel; and in these he detected some of those peculiarities on which modern criticism has employed itself, and arrived at the conclusions in reference to their date revived by the English deists Collins in the last century, and by many German critics in the present. It is well known that half of the book of Daniel is historic, half prophetic. Each of these parts is distinguished from similar portions of the Old Testament by some peculiarities. Porphyry is not right in regarding it as a historic part, unless we may conjecture, from his theory of the book being originally written in Greek, that he detected the presence of those Greek words in Nebuchadnezzar's edicts which many modern critics have connected, and thus decreed into the prophetic part, and consequently into the Macedonian conquest. The peculiarity alleged to belong to the prophetic part is its apocalyptic tone. It looks, it has been said, historical rather than prophetic. Definite events, and these in a distinct chain, are predicted with the precision of historical narrative; whereas most prophecy is a moral sermon, in which general moral predictions are given, with specific historic ones interspersed. Nor is it, which is shared in a less degree by occasional prophecies elsewhere, the only peculiarity alleged, but it is affirmed also that the definite character ceases at a particular period of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, down to which the very campaigns of the Seleucid and Ptolemaic dynasties are noted, but subsequently to which the prophetic tone becomes more vague and indefinite. Hence the conjecture has been hazarded that it was written during the time of Palestine. A Jewish, who gathered up the traditions of Daniel's life and wrote the recent history of his country in eloquent language in an apocalyptic form, which, after the literary fashion of his age, he imitated to an ancient seer, Daedalus, predicted a comet as composed of it, indefinite as he gazed on the future. It was this peculiarity, the supposed ceasing of the prophecies in the book of Daniel at a definite date, which was noticed by Porphyry, and led him to suggest the theory of his authorship just named. He seems also to have entered into some examination of the specific prophecies, for he attacks objects to the application of the words "the abomination of desolation" to other objects than that to which he considers its original meaning (see Jerome on Matt. xxiv. 15). These remarks will give an idea of the critical acuteness of Porphyry. A few other traces of Porphyry's views remain, which are of less importance, and are levelled against parts of the New Testament: e.g. the change of purpose in our blessed Lord (John vii), [Jerome, vol. iv, pt. ii, p. 521 (Hist. adscr. Pelagius); Ep. (184) in Pli.], several of which are given by Holsten. (Vid. Porphyry, p. 86), the reason given by the Old E overlooks was abrogated if divine [August. Epist. (102, olm 49, Benedict. ed. 1689), ii, 274, where six questions are named, some of which come from Porphyry]; the question what became of the generations which lived before the destruction of Jerusalem was the only way of salvation; objections to the severity of Peter in the death of Ananias; and the inscrutable mystery of an infinite punishment in retribution for finite sin (August. Retract. bk. ii, c. 31, vol. i, p. 58, concerning Matt. vii, 2). His objections are not, it will be observed, founded on quibbles like those of Celsius, but on inductive literary characteristics, many of which are greatly exaggerated or grossly misrepresented, but still are real, and suggest difficulties or inquiries which the best modern theological critics have honorably felt to demand candid examination and explanation. It was by no means an easy matter to reply to such a critique as Porphyry adopted, and it may be said that he never was answered as he should have been. The reply which Origen made to Celsius set aside all the objections of the heathen disputant, but the thirty separate replies to Porphyry, among which he used, were the same, but elaborated by Methodius, Eusebius, and Apollinarius, very insufficiently solve the intricate and deep problems proposed by the most successful exponent of Neo-Platonism. That he made a profound impression on the Church is seen in the fact that to all Christians his name became hateful, odious, the synonym for all pernicious systems or dangerous in unbelief, like that of Turk or Moslem or Papist in later ages. When Constantine wished to blacken the reputation of the Arians, he only had to add to them the epithet of Porphyrian. That name was carried in it again to the new heresy, invoked to sink irretrievable infamy on any individual or sect who bore it. A great deal of discussion has taken place respecting the assertion of Socrates (H. E. iii, 29), that in his earlier years Porphyry was a Christian, and that, when he had been instructed by Origen, he was converted to the Gnostics, and this is referred to as the evidence of Manetho, he apostatized, and revenged himself by writing against them. The authority is so slight, and the improbability of the story so great (for it does not appear that any of his antagonists charged him with apostasy, unless it was Eusebius), while it may so easily have arisen from the fact that in his early youth Porphyry was instructed by Origen, that it may confidently be rejected. Anable summary of the arguments on both sides is given by Brucker (ii, 251, etc.). A doubt has been raised as to the identity of the assailant of Christianity with the Neo-Platonic philosopher, but it is totally without foundation.

Other Works.—Of the very numerous writings of Porphyry the following are extant: 1. Πίστις καὶ ζωή; supposing by many to be a fragment of his larger history of philosophers. 2. Περὶ Πλωτινοῦ οἰκείου καὶ τῶν τάξεων τῶν Βιβλίων. 3. Περὶ μηθύσεως τῶν ιεροτρόπων, in four books, dedicated to his friend and fellow-disciple Firmus Caecilius. 4. Fragmenta of his epistle Πρὸς Ανδρόνικον τῶν Ἀγάσιτων. Large quotations from this work are made by Eusebius in his Prae. 5. Περὶ τὴν τὸν ὄμερον ἔνδοξην τοῦ ὁμολογητοῦ, addressed to Anatolius. 7. Περὶ τοῦ Τύσιθαμα τῶν ἄνωθεν ἐπτροπῆς, a fanciful allegorical interpretation of the description of the cave of the nympha in the Odyssey, showing both the ingenuity and the recklessness with which Porphyry and other writers of his stamp pressed writers and authorities of all kinds into their service, as holders of the doctrines of their school. 8. A fragment from a treatise Περὶ ζωής, preserved by Stobæus. 9. Βιογραφία, or Περὶ τῶν κυρίων φιλοσόφων, addressed to Chrysasorus, and written by Porphyry while in Sicily. It is commonly prefixed to the Organon of Aristotle. 10. A commentary on the Categories of Aristotle, in questions and answers. 11. Some fragments of a commentary on Aristotle's books Περὶ φυσικῆς ἀρχῶν. 12. A commentary on the Harmonica of Porphyry, coming off at the seventh chapter of the writing of the Catholic bishops: see Williamson, Anecd. Graec., ii, 108-118). 14. Scholia on the Iliad, preserved at Leyden among the books and papers of I. Vossius. A portion of them was published by Valckenier, in an appendix to Urrinius's Virgil, with a copious appendix by the learned Clemens Chersius, of the Iliad, preserved in the Vatican library, were published by Villoison (Anecd. Graec., ii, 266, etc.), and Porreà, Gilbert De la. See Porreàni.

Porreàni, Margarétta, one of the numerous victims of religious persecution in the Middle Ages, was born in Hainault, and published at Paris a book which, according to the decision of the theologians who examined it, contained a number of errors and heresies, "et inter cetera (hæreses) quod anima annihilata in amore condicio sine reprehensione conscientiae vel remorum poeset et defert naturam, quasi aquae appetit et desiderat ponent." These errors the foolish woman refused to retract, and as she also scorned the excommunication visited upon her by the Inquisition, the Church delivered her up to the secular arm for execution. At the stake she is said to have confessed to her error, and to have given all the signs of repentance; but for this we have only the testimony of the priests who attended her in her last hours as her persecutors.

Porreàni, a name for the followers of GILBERT DE LA PORREÀ, bishop of Poitiers, a metaphysical divinity of the 12th century, who held opinions respecting the personality and the essence of the Holy Trinity analogical to those of the Lutrelians or Damasitans of the 6th century. Porreànius attempted to distinguish the divine essence from the Deity, and the properties of the three divine Persons from the Persons themselves, not in reality, but in distinction. In contradiction to certain defects of the Lutrelians, he denied the incarnation of the divine nature, respecting which he ventured to set forth the proposition, "Quod Divina natura non esse incarnata." Porreànius was accused by two of his clergy of teaching bisphathy, and at their instigation St. Bernard brought the matter before Eugenius III, the successor, who was then in France. The case was discussed first in the Council of Paris in A.D. 1147, and then in the Council of Rheims, which was held in the following year. To put an end to the contest, Porreànius yielded his own judgment to that of the council and the papacy. It does not appear that any large party was formed by Porreànius, but some are spoken of under his name as his followers. See Gallus Christianus, ii. 1175; Harduin, Concili. VI, ii. 1297; Mansi, Concili. XXI, 712.

Porst, Johann, a Lutheran minister, was born Dec. 11, 1668, at Oberkrotzau, not far from Hof. In 1691 he went to Leipzig to study theology (30th of June, 1698, he was appointed pastor at Malchow, near Berlin: in 1704 he was called to Berlin as preacher at Friedrichswerder and Dorotheenstadt; in 1709 he was made court-preacher, and in 1712 provost of St. Nicola, pastor pri¬mary, and inspector of the time. He occupied since 1717 the position as councilor of consistory. Of his many writings, none is so well known as his hymn-book, published in 1718, and which is still in use in some churches at Berlin. See Jöcher, Gelehrten-

PORTA
The rendering in Neh. ii, 13 of the Heb.
sha'ar, "גֶּשֶׁר," elsewhere rendered "gate" (q. v.), as twice in the same verse. These gates of the cities, and the unoccupied spaces on which they opened, served as a typical Hebrew antiquity for places of public assembling of the citizens (comp. the forum, ayōp, of the Greeks and Romans). In the East this is still the custom, the gates taking the place of the coffee-houses and other places of resort among the Western nations (Gen. xix, 1; 1 Sam.
v, 16); ix, 18; Job xxi, 7; Jer. xxxvi, 7). There the people came together in great numbers when any public calamity occurred (2 Macc. iii, 19), there the judges heard causes and complaints (Deut. xxvi, 19 sq.; xxii, 13 sq.; Isa. xxii, 21; Job xxxi, 21; Ps. cxviii, 5; Amos v, 15; Zechar. viii, 16; Jer. xxxii, 22), and there deeds which required legal sanction, especially important contracts, were performed (Gen. xxiii, 10, 18;
Deut. xxx, 7; Ruth iv, 11; comp. the early German,
Griam, Deutsche Rechtsverhältnisse, p. 104 sq.; and see Host, Maroko, p. 239). These gates had no doors to receive honorable visitors (2 Kings ii, 11, 8; but see below), or for discussion of public important affairs (1 Kings xxii, 10), and markets were held in the vicinity (2 Kings vii, 1; Arvieux, Nachr. v, 186; Rosenmüller, Morgenl. vi, 273; Jacobi, De foro in porto [Leips. 1714], in Ugelino, Thes.
vol. xxv). At the gate public announcements were made (Jer. xvii, 19; Prov. i, 21; viii, 3). Idolatries, too, were sometimes practiced here (2 Kings xxii, 8),
just as in Catholic cities altars are placed at the gates.
On the whole, we must consider the gate, not as a mere port or entrance, but as a strong offence, and as connected with an open place within; perhaps even with beneath (Host, Maroko, ut sup.). They were barred with strong bolts and posts [see Citt.], and often built over (2 Sam. xviii, 33) with watch-towers (ver. 24 sq.).
Gate-keepers are mentioned, at least in Jerusalem, with some political duties and powers (Jer. xxivv, 15; Neh.
xxii, 19). On the other hand, in 2 Sam. xv, 2 (and perhaps in xix, 8), the allusion is not to a city gate, but to that of a palace in the royal city; and in Esth. iii, 2;
Dan. ii, 49, the word is used, according to a usage still current in Persia; for the king's gate (ašu regaṇa) in Latin, is a similar synonyme; comp. also the Arabic Gate of Raskid for court, in Elmacin, Hist. Sasan. p. 120; see Lüdeke, Türk. Reich, i, 281). To sit at the palace door or gate (Esth. ii, 19, 21; iv, 2; v, 9, 13 sq.; vi, 10), among the Persians, was to wait in the hall or vestibule of the king. Not only courtiers and attendants, but even high officers of the government were found there (Herod. iii, 20). See Door.
PORTA, Baccio della, more generally known as Fra Bartolomeo, an Italian monastic of the Dominican order, distinguished as a painter of the Florentine school, and to be noted for his intimate relations with Raffaello and the other Umbrian painters of his time, was born at Savignano, not far from Florence, in 1469. He was a pu-pill of Cosimo Roselli in Florence, and lived near the gate of St. Piero, from which circumstance his name of "Della Porta" was derived. We have no detailed narrative of his life, except that he was early brought under Roselli's tuition, where he formed a close friendship with Mariotta Albertinelli, his associate student, and showed such natural and artistic propenencies towards "sweetness and light" that the beauty of his Madonna faces and the sublime force of his colorings won the approbation even of the critical Florentines. He acquired such great fame that he was commissioned to execute a fresco of the time when Savonarola went to Florence to preach against the sinfulness of the city. Bartolomeo became the earnest preacher, and left his unfinished pictures to be completed by Albertinelli.

During four years he led a most austere life, never touching his pencil. His superior finally commanded his practice of the art, and he resumed it with language and energy unprecedented in his lifetime. About 1509 he arrived in Florence. He was then but twenty-one years old, yet was already noted as a great painter. He vis-ted the friar's cell, and the consequence was a deep friendship between the two, to which the world owes the afterworks of Fra Bartolomeo. Raffaello instructed his monastic friend in perspective, and his turn gave new ideas of drapery to Raffaello. Fra Bartolomeo was the first to employ lay figures in the study of drapery; he also imparted to Raffaello his mode of coloring. The examination of the works of these painters will prove that from the works of both of these masters we have more exa-lent pictures than they had done before; the friar has caught an intellectual grace from his young friend, and Raffaello had advanced in color and drapery. About 1508 Fra Bartolomeo was allowed to go to Venice, where his coloring was greatly admired. There he finished his masterpiece (1510). This visit was doubtless a deep joy to him, but the beauties of what he saw so far exceeded his imagination that he seemed to have been stupefied;
he made no attempt to equal or excel the artists about him, and only commenced two figures of SS. Peter and Paul, which Raffaello finished after his return to Florence. When once more in his convent, Bartolomeo showed the benefit he had received, and executed some of his most important works, among which are a Muriage of St. Catharina, now hanging in the Louvre, and the unfinished Concepcion of the Valti. But it is in his later days, when his mind had broadened and strengthened and his touch grown firm, that we find such masterpieces as the Pitti of the Piti— the most purely beautiful Pietà ever painted; The Presentation in the Temple, at Vienna; and The Madonna della Minervi-cordia, most famous of them, and considered by many as his most important work. It had been said that he could do nothing grand; he now painted the St. Mark, which is in the Pitti Palace, and is so simply grand as to be comparable to the remains of Greekian art. He lived only four years after going to Rome, and during that short time with a shrinking of his powers, but not a failing in energy. His character was impressed on all his works.
When Savonarola was seized, Porta hid himself, and vowed that if he escaped he would become a monk. This want of courage and energy in his nature we must admit; but he was enthusiastic, devout, and loving. His sainls and virgins are tender, mild, and full of sweet dignity, and if we characterized his pictures in one word, holiness is what we should use, for it is that which they most express. His boy-angels were beautifully painted, and his representations of architecture were rich and grand. His works are rare. The Louvre has two of his pictures, and the Berlin Museum one; but he is best studied in Florence, where the larger number of his works remain. See Mrs.

drafted as deacon of St. Nicolai; in 1578, pastor of SS. Peter and Paul and assessor of the consistory, at the same time serving the spiritual wants of the Church of the Holy Ghost and lecturing at the Gymnasium. When in 1572 the Flaeck controversy took place, he sided with the Eisleben theologians against Spaenberg. Porta died in 1585. He wrote, Pastorale Luth. r. (1565); Orationes, etc. (1585); — Regensburger lectiones, operum Lutheri (ibid., etc. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Literatur, ii, 29; Jocher, Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Porta, Sigismondo di, a Roman Catholic monastic, flourished in the period of the great Reformation movement of the 16th century. He had early taken the black cloak of the Augustinians; his chief work was the monument to Paul III in the tribune of St. Peter's. Two statues, of Peace and Abundance, which formerly made a part of this work, are now in the Farnese Palace.

Porta, Simon, an Italian philosopher of the first half of the 16th century, was a pupil of Pomponazzi, and is celebrated especially as the author of Magia Naturalis (Naples, 1586, and since). In 1512 the Lateran Council condemned both those who taught that the human soul was not immortal and those who asserted that the soul is one and identical in all men. It condemned also the scholastics who affirmed these opinions, although contrary to faith, were philosophically true. It enjoined professors of philosophy to refute all heretical doctrines to which they might allude, and prohibited the clergy from studying philosophy for a course longer than five years. Indeed, Averroism as early as the 13th century had become hostile to the doctrines of the Church, and in 1271, and again in 1277, it was condemned by Stephen Tempier, archbishop of Paris, who caused its principles to be embodied in distinct propositions. Among these were the following: "Quod sermone theologice sunt fundati in falsis, quod nihil plus scire theologice. Quod fabulae et falsa sunt in leges Christianas, sicut et in aliis. Quod lex Christiana impedit addiscere. Quod sapientes mundi sunt philosophico tantum. Notwithstanding the condemnation of the Church, these ideas seemed to have taken hold of the philosophical mind of the age, and long continued to find favor among teachers and students. Like his preceptor, Pomponazzi, Porta wrote, in agreement with the Alexandrians on the question of immortality, a work entitled De rerum naturalibvs principiis, de anima et mente humana (Flo. 1551). Among other works of Porta, we mention De humana mente disputatio (1551): — De dolore: — An homo bonus vel malus vel naturalis (1551). He died in 1555. See Uebert, Hist. der Philos., ii, 14, 467.

Porta-Leonc (πορταλέονκι), Abraham, also called Arjé Abraham, a Jewish savant, was born in the year 1612, the son of a family who excelled in medical science to such a degree that one of the members of the family was employed as physician in the service of king Ferdinand I of Naples and duke Galeazzo Maria Sforza of Mailand. Abraham received an excellent education, and attended the lectures at the University of Padua, where he espoused the philosophy of Aristotle and submitted himself to the study of Aristotle, Hippocrates, Galenus, and the Arabic writers. In the year 1653 he received the doctorate and became a member of the medical college at Mantua. He died in the year 1612. Porta-Leone takes a prominent place in Jewish literature, as he is the author of the ΠορταΛήΟνκι, an extensive work on Jewish antiquities, in which he minutely treats of the Temple and its structures, the structure of the altar, the candlestick, table, music, etc. The whole is divided into ninety sections, to which is appended a list of ninety-eight works, which he perused for his work, and an essay on the use of the Hebrew language, etc. This excellent work, which is now very scarce, was first published in the year 1612. A Latin translation, which Wagenseil pronounced "is in the highest degree interesting," was published by Uglione in his Thesaurus antiquitatum sacrarum (vol. i. iii. xiii. xxxii.), 1664. Iken used Leone's work in his antiquities to a great extent, and he promised a translation of the whole, which never appeared. See Furt, Bibl. Jud. et. iii. 114 sq., De Rossi, Dizionario storico de' Autori Ebrei (German transl.), p. 268 sq.; Wolf, Bibl. Portable Altars (creticae, gestatorum, itineraria). During the Crusades the bishops and ecclesiastics who took part in them carried an "itinerant altar." The portable altar was a table used for consecrating altars in private chapels. Bede mentions a consecrated table in lieu of an altar. The monks of St. Denis carried a table of wood, covered with a linen cloth, in Charlemagne's campaign against the Saxons. There were examples also of stone, metal, and terra-cotta. The repository is used in the street to rest the Sacrament on in the procession of the Fête Dieu in France. One is preserved at Santa Maria, in the portico d'Campitelli; and another, of carved porphyry, at Conques, cir. 1106. See Altar.

Portable Bells. Hand-bells were of Celtic origin, and were used in Britain, in St. Patrick's time in Ireland, and in that of St. Bello in Wales. Unlike the small altar-bells, which were square, these were hexagonal or oval, without clappers, like the original cloch, usually of bronze, and sometimes jewelled, being regarded as specially sacred, and possessed of miraculous powers, as St. Hilya's, the bell of Armagh of the close of the 11th century, the golden bell of St. Senanus, St. Ewin's at Monasteren, which was tied with a chain to prevent its automatic flight, and used as an ordeal for swearing criminals by the justices of Munster. The clocis was cylindrical, and in the 8th, 9th, and 10th centuries often gemmed. At Carlowdon, in Wales, the hangi was used at a funeral recently. Hand-bells are preserved at Perton, Guirc and St. Symphorian's, Côtes-du-Nord. See Bell.

Portail, Antoine, a French priest noted for his relation to the "Congregation of Priests of the Mission," which body he joined immediately after their institution by Vincent de Paul, flourished in the first half of the 17th century. Nothing is known of his personal history, but he is reputed to have been not only Paul's first companion, but also his most devoted coadjutor. See Jervis, Hist. of the Church of France, i. 320 sq.

Portail (πορταλί), an architectural term, designates an external porch, that is, the principal doors of a church by way of shelter, whereas a porch is a projecting outwork independent of the door. See Porton. There are fine examples of portals in the cathedrals of Rheims, Paris, St. Ouen's, and Rouen, Amiens, Sens, Senlis, and Bourges, Westminster, etc. In medieval Italy, of smaller dimensions, he appears richly decorated, with cornice, field, and Verona and other Italian towns. "Pennisile porch," the resort of beggars, was the local name of the cemetery-gate of Wells.
Portas vestrās aeternałēs. This is the beginning of one of the few Ascension hymns which we have in the Latin language. "Nothing is poorer," says Trench, "throughout the whole Christian Church than the hymnology of the Ascension. It is bowed to the ground. Even the best man in any Protestant hymn-book, so incomparably rich in Passion and Resurrection and Pentecost hymns, is singularly ill-furnished with these. ... The Latin forms no exception; it does not possess a single first-rate hymn on the Ascension." This hymn, which strangely enough has never found its way into any of the more modern collections of Latin hymns, runs thus:

"Portas vestrās aeternałēs, Triumphales, principałēs, Angēllā, satillitā, Fās, tollite acutum, Vеuít Dominus virtutām, Flux aeterna gloria."

An English translation is given by Benedict in The Hymns of Hildibrand, etc., p. 81 (N. Y. 1867); for the original, see Trench, Sacred Latin Poetry, p. 172 sq.

Portatīlē Altāre is the name of a square portable stone framed in wood, at the angles and in the middle of which there is a cross, and the cavity of which receives some pomegranate stands by a mark impressed by the bishop, and can be used after this ceremony for the purpose of saying mass in private chapels. See Portable Altars.

Portatives is the technical term applied to candlesticks used in churches and carried by hand.

Porteaus Mōb. This tragic incident is introduced here from its connection with the ecclesiastical history of Scotland. Some new customs were felt to be odious and galling in Scotland, and revenue-officers were specially obnoxious in some of the seaports. Two men, named Wilson and Robertson, who had robbed the collector of Pittenweem, in Fife, were apprehended and brought to the court. Attempts were made to break out of jail after sentence had been passed upon them, had proved abortive. On the Sabbath before the execution the criminals, as usual, were taken to church, under custody of four soldiers of the city guard, when, as the congregation was dismissing, Wilson, laying hold of two of the soldiers, one in each hand, and seizing the third with his teeth, called on Robertson to run. The latter at once knocked down the remaining guard and fled, without any one trying to arrest him. The romantic pity of Wilson for his junior accomplice, and his successful delusion of the interpreter, were great assets for him. At his execution, April 14, 1736, the mob became unruly, rushed to the scaffold, and cut down the dead man. Captain Porteous, of the city guard, who was at that time surly and excited, ordered his men to fire—saw, fired a musket-shot of each man, and seven persons were killed by the first volley, and more by the second. Some respectable citizens were shot as they were looking out from their windows. Captain Porteous was tried before the High Court of Justiciary, and condemned to death. Queen Caroline, in the absence of George II. on the Continent, sent down a reprieve. The populace were filled with terrible indignation, and resolved to take the law into their own hands. On Sept. 7 a crowd assembled under some unknown command, secured all the military posts, locked the gates, opened the prison, took out captain Porteous, entered a shop, brought away a halter, leaving a guinea on the counter to pay for it, and hung him on a dyer's pole. The mob dispersed with perfect order, and did no other violence. The riot is enveloped in mystery—no one of the parties ever apprehended. But a bill of great and vitriolic personal abuse, which was prepared by some of the original agents in passing through Parliament it contained the enactment that every minister in the Church of Scotland was to read a proclamation against the rioters from the pulpit, during public worship, on the second Saturday of each month during a whole year. If any minister refused, he was, for the first offence, to be declared incapable of sitting and voting in any Church court, and, for the second, he was pronounced incapable of "taking, holding, or enjoying any ecclesiastical benefit in Scotland." The majority of the ministers complied with the edict. Some, however, refused. Some, with the enactment ratified commotion in many parishes, and aided the spread of the first Secession. The seceders were accused of disloyalty, because they unanimously, and without hesitation, refused to read the edict. In Carlyle's History of Schism will be found a graphic account. Carlyle saw the rescue and witnessed the execution.—Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian.

Porter. This word, when used in the A. V., does not bear its modern signification of a carrier of burdens, but denotes in every case a gate-keeper, from the Latin portaritis, the man who attended to the porta. In the original the word is מֶשְׁכָּה or מָשְׁכָה, shōr, from מָשָׁךְ, shār, a gate or postern, is guarded by a porter. This is the same (Sept. φύλακας and πύλος; Vulg. porta- rius and janitor). This meaning is evidently implied in 1 Chron. ix. 21; 2 Chron. xxiii, 13; xxxv, 15; John x, 8. It is generally employed in reference to the Levites who had charge of the entrances to the sanctuary, but is used also in other connections in 2 Sam. viii, 16; 2 Kings vii, 10, 11; Mark xiii, 84; John x, 8; xviii, 16, 17. In two passages (1 Chron. xxv, 23, 24) the Hebrew word is rendered "doorkeeper," and in John xviii, 16, 17, θύραμας is "a she that kept the door." Thus, in 2 Kings vii, 10, 11, and 2 Sam. viii, 26, we meet with the porter at the gates of a town. In the palace of the high-priest (John xviii, 17) the porter was a female, θυραρία, θύρωρας. See also Acts xxii, 13. A porter seems to have been usually stationed at the doors of sheepfolds (John x, 5). According to Stier and others, this θύραμας corresponds to the Holy Spirit, who opens the way for the true Ministers of Christ. See Door.

The porters of the Temple, who were guards as well as porters, were very numerous in David's time; for in 1 Chron. xxxii, 5 no less than 4000 are mentioned. They were divided into courses (1 Chron. xxvi, 1-19), and had their keepers appointed to them by David. Besides attending to the gates and keeping order there, they seem, as Lightfoot says, to have had charge of certain treasures (ver. 15, comp. with 2 Chron. xxv, 24, and Lightfoot's Prospect of the Temple, c. v, § 6). Properly speaking, their office was in some respects that of a heri- son. They were the soldiers of Jehovah, and the guards of his Temple. The stations that were guarded were not all occupied by the same number—some being guarded by six, some by four, and others by two persons only. They were relieved every Sabbath-day by others who took their places (2 Kings xi, 5; 1 Chron. ix, 17-29; xvi, 42; 2 Chron. vii, 14; xxxii, 4; xxxiv, 14; xxxv, 15). Their service was required by night as well as by day, and a man called "the Man of the Mountain of the House" went round every night to see that all were in their places, and that none of them slept. If he found any one asleep he struck him, and had liberty to burn his clothes. To this Lightfoot thinks there is a reference in Rev. xv, 16: "Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments" (Temple Service, c. vii, § 1). See Temple.

Porter, David, D.D., a Congregational minister of some note, was a native of Hebron, Conn., where he was born May 27, 1761. He was educated at Dartmouth College, class of 1784, and, having been duly ordained, became pastor of the Congregational Church at Springfield, N. Y., in 1787. In 1803 he removed to Catskill, N. Y., as pastor of the Presbyterian church, and founded his relation to the Church until 1831. He died in that place Jan. 7, 1851. He served nearly a year in the Revolutionary army. He published Dissertation on Baptism (1809), and some Sermons. He was, after his discharge, agent of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and, though eccentric, a man of great influence. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 496-506.

Porter, Ebenezer, D.D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born Oct. 5, 1772, in Cornwall, Conn. After graduating at Dartmouth College in 1792, he taught school some months; then studied divinity, and entered the ministry in 1794, and was ordained pastor at Washington, Conn., Sept. 6, 1796, where he remained until April 1, 1812, when, his health becoming impaired, he removed to Andover to take the Pasteur professorship of pulpit eloquence in the theological seminary. In 1817 he was chosen professor of divinity in Yale College, but did not accept, and during the same year refused successively the presidency of Hamilton College, of Middlebury College, and of the University of Georgia. In 1827 he was made president of the seminary, and held that office until his death, April 8, 1834. As a theological instructor, Dr. Porter had few equals. He was remarkably well endowed for the training of young men intended for the holy ministry. Thus Dr. Dewey writes: "A friend of mine attended service in the (Andover) seminary one morning some years after I left it, and heard one of Dr. Porter's grand discourses; and, as the audience was leaving the chapel, professor Stuart in his deep tone said, 'This is the majesty of the Gospel.' It was indeed the majesty of the Gospel." Dr. Porter published, The Young Preacher's Manual (1819; 2d ed. 1829); A Lecture on the Analysis of Vocal Injections (1824); An Analysis of the Principles of Rhetorical Delivery as applied in Reading and Speaking (1827); The Rhetorical Reader (1831); Lectures on Revivals of Religion (1822); A Lecture on the Cultivation of Spiritual Habits and Progress in Study (1838); Lectures on Homiletics, Preaching, and Public Prayer (1834); and a large number of occasional Sermons. Since his death the Biblical Reader and Lectures on Eloquence and Style have also been published. Dr. Porter was a contributor to the Quarterly Register, and the translator of many sacred German poems. See notices of this excellent man and eloquent preacher in Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, ii, 851; Rev. Lyman Matthews, Memoir of E. Porter, D.D. (Boston, 1835); D. C. Glass, *W. H. Porter, Eliphalet, D.D., a Congregational minister of Unitarian tendency, was born at North Bridgewater, Mass., June 11, 1758. He was educated at Harvard University, class of 1779, and, after studying theology with his father, Rev. John Porter, minister of North Bridgewater from 1740 till 1802, he was ordained Oct. 2, 1782, over the Congregational Society of Roxbury, and there continued fifty-one years. In 1802 he was chosen as colleague. He died in that place Dec. 7, 1833. He was a member of the Academy of Arts and Sciences. He published A Eulogy of Washington (1800), and nine single Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, viii, 157.

Porter, George D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newbury, Me., Mar. 1, 1803. He was educated for the medical profession, but subsequently fill called to the ministry. He graduated at the Western Theological Seminary at Alleghany, Pa., was licensed in 1832, and for a time preached in Monongahela City, Pa., but afterwards removed to Newburg and Rockport, Pa., and was ordained by Huntington Presbytery in Nov., 1833. annual Conference, from which time till his death, in 1832, he labored in that and other fields, chiefly in the Middle States. For two years of this time he was principal of the academy at Cazenovia, giving great satisfaction. Mr. Porter was an excellent preacher, and a zealous and consistent Christian. See Minutes of Conferences, ii, 161.

Porter, Samuel, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland in 1760, came to this country in 1790, and accepted a pastorate in Hone Rite, in 1796, and in 1798, at College, Pennsylvania. He published several Sermons (1798, 1803, 1811), which were reprinted with two Dialogues in 1858, with a biographical sketch of the author by Rev. David Elliott, D.D. He was also contributor to several periodicals. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 539–550.

Porter, Thomas, an English dissenting divine, flourished in the second half of the last century. Scarcely anything is known of his personal history. He published, A Defence of Unitarianism; intended as an Answer to Dr. Haeker on his Reply (1738, 8vo):—Serious Thoughts on the Birth of a Child (1805).

Porter, Walter, an English musician of some note, flourished in the first half of the 18th century as gentleman of the Chapel Royal of Charles I. He was one of the choristers of Westminster. He was killed during the civil war. He published, Musurgia and Aires (Lond. 1632):—Aires and Madrigals (1689).

Porter, William Henry, an American divine of some note, was born at Rye, New Hampshire, in 1817, and was educated at Yale College, class of 1841. After having studied theology he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Litchfield, N. J., in 1845. In 1851 he united with the Swedenborgians, and took a pastorate at Boston, Mass. He died at Roxbury, Mass., in 1861. He published, Common and Scriptural Providence Compared (Bost. 1845, 12mo):—The Jesuitic Union, or, New Jerusalem on Earth (1850, 12mo).

Portasce, Portasce, Portoeus, or Portorium, are technical terms applied to the brewery, or a portable book of prayer used in the Church of Rome, and containing the mass and the other parts of the Church service to be said through the year at canonical hours, with the exception of the marriage service. The terms are derived from the Latin portorium (a portando forae), through the French portier-hors, hence portasce, portoeus. The foreign breviaries were divided according to the four seasons, but in England into winter and summer parts.

Porteus, Bekly, an eminent English prelate, was born at York in 1731. He passed several years at a small school in his native city, and at the age of thirteen he was sent to a school at Ripon, and entered at an earlier age than usual Cambridge University, where he was admitted a sizar of Christ's College. His personal worth, united with his superior attainments, both classical and mathematical, soon procured for him a fellowship in his college, and by the exertions of his friends he was made esquire-beadle of the university. This office he did not long retain, but chose rather to give his undivided attention to private pupils. In 1757, at the age of twenty-six, he was ordained deacon, and soon after priest; and only a little while later was appointed lecturer at Whitbale. He first became known as a writer by obtaining Seaton's prize for the best English poem on a sacred subject. On the occasion this topic was "Death," and the production of Mr. Porteus was universally regarded as one of great merit. In 1761 his fame was still further increased by a sermon which he preached before his alma mater on the character of David, king of Israel. Archbishop Secker was so much pleased with Porteus that he made him in 1763 his chaplain. Porteus's first preferences were two small livings in Kent, which he held a while and then took the rectory of Hunton in the same county. Hunton was his favorite residence. He delighted in the quiet of that rural retirement, and still more in exercising the duties of the ministry among its simple and attached people. He was most indefatigable in performing all the services of pastoral satisfaction. In some district of it daily; and by his pastoral visits to the poor, as well as to the rich, secured the affections and esteem of all his parishioners. His high character for propriety and talents brought him into general notice, and he was soon appointed prebendary of Peterborough, and not long afterwards, in 1767, he became rector of Lambeth. In the same year he took the degree of D.D. at Cambridge, and in 1769 was made chaplain to king George III, and master of the hospital of St. Cross, near Winchester. In 1773 Dr. Porteus, with a few other clergymen, joined in an unauspicious application to the bishops, requesting that they would review the Liturgy and Articles for the purpose of making some slight alterations. In 1776 Dr. Porteus, without any solicitation on his part, was made bishop of Chester; and in 1776, on the death of bishop Lewish, he was promoted to the diocese of London, over which he presided till his death. This appointment, with the new duties to which it called his attention, put a temporary stop to the immediate prosecution of several important undertakings he had contemplated; but they were resumed shortly after. The bishop immediately published an excellent Summary of the Principal Events of the Truth and Divine Origin of the Christian Revelation, designed chiefly for the instruction of young persons. Besides, as a member of the Legislature, he pursued a long-formed plan for improving the condition of the negro slaves in the West Indian islands, and particularly for their instruction in religious knowledge. He was for many years one of the vice-presidents of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and took a lively interest, as well as an active part, in the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. In short, his public influence, as well as private patronage, were constantly exerted in devising or supporting measures for the diffusion of pure and undefiled religion. In 1798 he began a course of lectures on St. Matthew's Gospel, which he delivered at St. James's Church on the Fridays in Lent. Those lectures, which he afterwards published, have been among the most popular of all his works. He died May 14, 1808. Though bishop Porteus cannot be called a profound scholar or divine, he was a man of considerable learning and ability; and he pursued through life a steady course of useful exertion for the benefit of his fellow-creatures, which procured him a high reputation among men of all parties. He was a prelate of liberal and enlarged views, one proof of which may be adduced in the fact that when a bill was introduced into Parliament for the abolition of the existing miseries of the negroes, he pronounced it "a measure no less consonant to the principles of sound policy than to the genuine spirit of the Gospel." He was in private life distinguished by a cheerful disposition, affable manners, great benevolence, and deep and unaffected piety. As a preacher, few in his day surpassed him in eloquence or pathos. He is conscious for sound judgment, solid argument, great knowledge of the human heart, accurate observation of the world, an unshrinking reproof of vice, the most persuasive exhortations to piety, and an unqualified avowal of all the essential, fundamental truths and doctrines of the Gospel. His works, consisting of sermons and tracts, with a Life of Archbishop Secker, and the poems and lectures already mentioned, were collected and published, with his Life, making another volume, by his nephew, the Rev. Robert Hodgson, who died dean of Christchurch in 1805 (8vo, and often). There are a few letters, sermons, etc., not included in this collection (see Darling, Cyclop. Bibliogr. i, 2425). Besides Hodgson's Life of Bishop Porteus (also published separately, 1810, 8vo), see Churchman's Magazine, iv. No. 203, 231, 319; Bicknell, Lamps of the Church, p. 69 sq.; Chambers, Cyclop. Engl.

He mixed in the disorders of the League, which conducted he expiated subsequendy by public penance. After the rendition of Paris he went to Saumur, solicited from Duplessis-Mornay the pardon of his past errors, and obtained permission to celebrate in the church of St. Peter the virtues of the king against whom he had uttered such violent imprecations. Portico is an architectural term designating a range of columns in the front of a building. When of four columns it is called tetra styie; when of six, hexa styie; of eight, octa styie; of ten, deca styie. The Latin porticus, however, from which the Italian portico and the French portique are derived, has a more extended significance in medieval writers; comprehending, in fact, every kind of covered ambulatory of which one or more sides are opened to the air, by rows of columns or arches, whether it be attached to the front of a building or to its sides, or to the inner sides of an area, so as to form a cloister in the strict sense of the word. In an ancient church the porticoes were the cloisters about the area, otherwise called the exterior northex (q. v.), and the place of the mourners. See PORCH.

Portier, Michael, D.D., an American Roman Catholic prelate, was born near the opening of our century, and was of French descent. He was educated in this country and at the Propaganda at Rome, and was consecrated to the priesthood Nov. 5, 1826. After holding various ecclesiastical appointments, he was made bishop of Mobile. He died May 14, 1859. As an ecclesiastic he was greatly beloved by his own denomination, and as a citizen he was highly respected by all classes. He was more solicitous towards those who differed from him in religious belief than is apt to be the case among Romanists.

book of rubrical directions to instruct the clergy as to the due performance of divine service and the administration of the sacraments. Sometimes, however, the word "Portion" has been used in reference to the financial support of religious institutions, including monasteries, convents, and the clergy. The Portion of a religious community was often a significant source of income, providing support for the maintenance of the community and the performance of their religious duties.

Portia, the name given in the canon law to the suitable salary which was anciently allotted to the priest or minister of a parish. The term "Portion" (Italian: "Portione") refers to a fixed salary or stipend provided to a priest or minister, which was a significant part of their income and a basic requirement for their professional role. The amount and type of portion could vary depending on the jurisdiction and the status of the parish.

Portion (Porsele, chelch). In addition to the sense of dividing or allotting, this word is used in reference to a part of the flock going to pasture. Portioning was an important aspect of pastoral care, ensuring that the sheep or cattle were distributed evenly and provided with adequate grazing.

Portion (Parochial). The mediety of a parish was divided into several vicarages or parishes. The Portion (Parochial) was essentially a fraction of the territory of a parish that was assigned to a particular priest or minister. This division was important for the administration of the sacraments and the distribution of religious services. The size and number of portions could vary, depending on the needs and size of the parish.

mother, five of her sisters, and six nieces became her spiritual children. Mère Angélique's change of such pious devotion was said to have been occasioned by a sudden and mysterious offering made by a wandering Capuchin friar, father Basil, who had learned the truth of the Gospel of Christ, and had resolved formally to quit the communion of Rome, and, in passing the convent of Port-Royal while on his journey to the Protestant countries of the North, had secured permission to address the nuns. With love and kindness, but with unyielding firmness and great wisdom, the converted young woman restored the rule of the order in all its severity—as the strict observance of religious poverty, abstinence from meat, complete seclusion, and the daily attendance in the choir. The abbey of Port-Royal des Champs had been erected for but a small number of nuns; in consequence, however, of the celebrity which it attained through the reforms and guidance of Mère Angélique, the number increased greatly, so that, instead of twelve, there were more than eighty; and thus the buildings of the abbey became overcrowded and unhealthy. In 1626 it was found necessary to make additional provisions. A house was purchased in Paris in the Faubourg St. Jacques (in great part at the expense of the Arnauld family), to which the nuns were removed. This they were able to do by permission of the Port-Royal des Champs. In 1633 more spacious quarters were secured in the Rue de Bouloi, near the Rue Coquillière, where they also owned a church, which was dedicated with great solemnity by the archbishop of Paris.

In 1629 the nuns had exercised the right of affording an asylum to such lay penitents as the world disdained, with being their own masters, should wish to live in monastic seclusion without binding themselves by permanent monastic vows. This privilege has not withdrawn the Port-Royalists much until now. But the gradual transformation of Mère Angélique, under the influence of St. Francis de Sales, whom she had been brought in contact, and who led her to accept the doctrine of perfection in the form of the possibilities of a complete transformation of the human heart in the years before death, had so benefitted her that in her influence over her nuns and the severity they reached, that, inspired by this example, a number of learned and pious men, desirous of living in religious retirement, sought in 1638 the privilege of occupying the desecrated establishment of the Port-Royal des Champs. The leading minister of this new movement was the indefatigable St. Cyprian, who had been first an examiner and later the spiritual director of the nuns of Port-Royal. See Du Verger de Hachane. He was a Jansenist, and a most intimate friend of the founder of these doctrines, and as the head of this new group, he established, in 1639, the Port-Royal des Champs, the home of Jansenism in France.

A whole colony of illustrious penitents joined him: the three brothers of La Mère Angélique; her nephew, the celebrated advocate La Maitre, and her brothers Serinourt and De Sève; Pierre Nicole; Claude Lancelot, the grammarian; Tillemont, the historian; Pascal, the philosopher; Racine, the poet, and Antoine Arnauld (q. v.), the great Arnauld, the youngest brother of the abbess, the learned and impetuous Doctor of the Sorbonne, whose condemnation by that body occasioned Pascals' Proverbes.

This religious movement of the 17th century in France is as remarkable as the philosophical for which that era is noted. Jansenists and Jesuits undertook the re-establishment of that spiritual power which had been lost since the Reformation, and which the Jesuits had neglected. With this major work, the Jesuits had taken hold of—the social and political side of Catholicism—they clung to its personal, mystical, and ascetic side. They did not quarrel with the Church; they desired to remain Catholic in spite of the pope, believing in the priesthood and the sacraments. They arrived at a metaphorical separation from Rome, in the same way that St. Paul and St. Augustine were their inspirers. The Jesuits adopted directly antagonistic views on grace and predestination, and proclaimed the opinions of the Spanish Molina, who had undertaken, in his De Concordia Gratiae et Libertatis in Dre Domini, to reconcile free-will and predestination. The solitaires of Port-Royal now became the Jansenists of France, insisted upon predestination, and taught that good works were without merit; that grace alone, arbitrarily given or refused, made saints—a Christianity as terrible as the Fates of the ancients. They pursued human nature, interpreted the actions of the abbey, implacably hatred, and the logical conclusion of such a doctrine was the salvation of the few—i.e. the Church of Jansenism became an aristocracy of grace. See Jansenism. However much we may find in Jansenism to take exception to, the men who espoused its tenets were actuated by the noblest of motives, and deserved success in their undertaking, which aimed principally at the freedom of France from the trammels of the papal devotions—the Jesuits—and the spread of practical piety among the French people.

The Jesuits moved to a more prominent at this time in the Church of France, and effectively controlled the court, obtained under the ministry of Richelieu, and especially of Mazarin, repeated condemnatory acts against the teachings of the Jansenists in general, and of Port-Royal in particular. This persecution, however, only stimulated the growth of the new opinions. Duverger, a Port-Royalist, was thrown into prison, and kept there until the death of Richelieu, in 1642.

But the very time of his liberation was marked by a most noteworthy production. Antoine Arnauld, better known as St. Grand Arnauld, then wrote his Frequent Communion, the first work of that scientific school of religious philosophy of which Port-Royal was the focus and Pascal the principal exponent. Indeed, the best claim which the community of Port-Royal has upon our notice is this literary war which it waged against the scholastic theology, and against the Jesuits in particular. The Society of Jesus had, ever be it said to its credit, devoted itself to the education of youth; but whatever danger there was in their general teaching was mitigated by the discerning eye of the Jesuits of Anti-Jesuits, the confessional; for the integrity and piety which characterized the Port-Royalists caused them to be much sought after as confessors. They discovered and maintained the famous distinction of god and devil in respect to papal infallibility. As more and more of the Jesuits came to be convinced of the truth of this doctrine, the pope could not err: as to facts he might. See Gallicanism; Infallibility. When required, they were willing to condemn, as doctrines, the five propositions which were said to comprise the Jansenistic heresy; but they denied that these conclusions were to be found in or inferred from Jansen's Augustines. No papal bulls or persecution could make them recede from this position. In their maintenance of Jansen's real doctrines, in their refusal to acknowledge papal infallibility as to facts, in their continual warfare against the Jesuits, they were exposed to constant persecution. For the Jesuits were not inert in the face of this opposition and defiance. They plotted incessantly at Rome, in order to bring the thunders of the Holy See to bear upon the over-bold Jansenists.

The persecution thrived about a result the Jesuits hardly anticipated. Blaise Pascal was induced to step into the arena in defence of the Port-Royalists. One of the most independent minds of his age, Pascal had never yet up to this point submitted himself to the actual guidance of Jansen, any more than he had frankly accepted the logical consequences of the discoveries of Descartes. He had felt the force of both these powerful influences; but a third feeling had asserted authority over his unwilling mind: he had been swayed by the sceptical influence of Montaigne. As a sort of refuge from the yawning abyss which had thus threatened to drown him, this staunch and devoted spirit threw him, as by a sudden and irresistible impulse, into the arms of the Jansenists, and he became a recluse at Port-Royal, and its champion against the world. See PASCAL.

In the meantime the number of nuns and novices of Port-Royal de Paris having greatly increased, the abbess Angélique Arnaudt determined in 1648 to transfer part of them to Port-Royal des Champs. The school of Port-Royal was therefore removed from the latter place to Paris, Rue St. Dominique, Faubourg St. Jacques, but after three years the teachers were restored to Port-Royal des Champs, where they no longer occupied the monastic building, but a farm-house, called Les Granges, on the neighboring hill. In 1658, pope Innocent X having condemned five propositions in the book of Jansenius, Arnaudt wrote to prove that these propositions did not exist in the book of Jansenius, at least not in the sense attributed to him by Arnaudt, was accused of Jansenism. The nuns of Port-Royal, with their abbess Angélique, having refused to sign the formulary acknowledging that the five alleged heretical propositions were contained in the work of Jansenius, preparations were begun by the Jesuits for scattering the community of Port-Royal, and placing them in close captivity, so as to bring them to submission. It seemed a strange spectacle that a body of women, and a few others who agreed with them in sentiment, should withstand the power of the decrees of Home and all the pertinacity of the Jesuit in carrying out those decrees. On March 80, 1656, two months after the condemnation of Dr. Arnaudt, the civil authorities proceeded to carry out an order in council that every scholar, postulant, and novice should be removed from Port-Royal. But, for some unknown reasons, the execution was suddenly interrupted and delayed several years. It is said that Mazarin's unpleasant relations with the papacy were the principal cause of this sudden suspension of procedure against the recluses. In 1660 the king himself ordered the school to be broken up. The nuns still continuing refusatory, Péreixac, archbishop of Paris, sent a party of police-officers in 1664, who arrested the abbess, her niece Angélique Arnaudt the Younger, or Angélique de St. Jean, the mistress of the novices, and other nuns, and distributed them among several monasteries, but they were kept in a state of confinement. See ARNAUDT, ANGÉLIQUE.

Previously some of the nuns who had remained at Port-Royal de Paris intrigued with the government in order to become independent of Port-Royal des Champs, and Louis XIV appointed a separate abbess to Port-Royal de Paris. In 1669 a compromise was made between the pope and the defenders of Jansenius, which was called "the Peace of Clement IX." The nuns of Port-Royal des Champs with their own abbess were then restored to their convent, but Port-Royal de Paris was not restored to them; a division of property was effected between the two communities, by order of the king, which was confirmed by a bull of Clement X dated 1671. Each convent retained its own abbess. Several disputes took place between the two communities, in which the adherents of the Jesuits and the Jansenists were active parties. At last, in March, 1708, a bull of pope Clement XI suppressed the convent of Port-Royal des Champs, and gave the property to Port-Royal de Paris. In 1708 Le Tellier had obtained from king Louis XIV a decree for the execution of the papal bull, and D'Argenson, the lieutenant-general of police, put an end to the meeting of Port-Royal des Champs, and he removed from thence the nuns, who were distributed among several convents. The convent and church of Port-Royal des Champs were stripped of all their valuables, which were transferred to Port-Royal de Paris, and the former building was levelled with the ground, by order of Louis XIV, as a nest of Jansenists and heretics. The sacred relics of the Church were borne from the altar, the bodies disinterred from the cemetery, and every trace of the establishment destroyed, the very soil being abandoned to the plough.

Literature.—Besoin, Racine (1767, 2 vols.), Clemencet, Du Fosse, Fontaine (Col. 1788, 2 vols.), and others have written of Port-Royal. Dr. Reuchlin has published one of the most elaborate treatises, entitled Geschichte von Port-Royal (Hamb. 1689-44, 2 vols.); and other and more recent works to be consulted are: Saint-Duver, Hist. de Port-Royal (Paris, 1840-58, 4 vols.); Beurd, Port-Royal (Lond. 1868, 2 vols.); Schimmelpenning, Memoiren von Port-Royal (Ibid. 1855). PORTUGAL, the most westerly kingdom of Europe, a part of the great Spanish peninsula, lies in 36° 55'-42° 8' N. lat. and 6° 15'-30° W. long. Its greatest length from north to south is 988 miles, and its average breadth from east to west is about 100 miles. The kingdom of Portugal proper is bounded by the Atlantic on the S. and W., and by Spain on the N. and E. Its distinctive subdivisions, with their several areas and populations, are given in the following table:

Christianity was established in this country at the same time as in Spain, from which it is only politically separated: it therefore had its share of the misfortunes which, at the time of the great barbarian invasions, under the Alani, Suevos, Westgoths, and afterwards under the Arabs, came over the Christian Church. The weight of these calamities was made lighter for Portugal by the circumstance that, partly through the influence of the Roman bishops Anaelicus and Anicetus, partly through the decrees of Constantine, which made metropolitan seats of the chief cities of the provinces, the diocesan system had been developed at an early period. In the country now called Portugal, in the province of Galicia, Bracara, now Braga, was the metropolis. We learn from Garcia Louisa, in his remarks on the Council of Luco, that the bishops of Astorica, Portucal (Porto), Colmbrinia (Coimbra), Egitania (Idania), Eminium (Ermesinde), Lamego, and other bishops on the Douro, Loco (Lugo, on the sources of the Minho), Trias (El Padrón, in Galicia), Veso (Viseu), Auria (Orense), Tude (Tuy), Magneto or Britonia (Mondoeiro), and Dimio, near Braga, were suffragans of Bracara. At the Council of Luco, A.D. 305, a second council was established at Loco, but it remained dependent on Bracara. Veso, Colmbrinia, Egitania, Lamego, and Magneto were then suffragan seats of Bracara, and Trias, Auria, Tude, Astorica, and Britonia formed the ecclesiastical province of Luco: it ceased to exist when the domination of the Suevos, in 615, was overthrown by the Westgoths. In Lusitania, Merida, on the Guadiana, was the metropolis; the ecclesiastical province included Numanzia, Pax Tullia, Ososoma, Olyaequa, Cauro, Avila, and Elbora. Calixtus II transferred the metropolis of the bishop of Compostella. In the 7th century some changes appear to have taken place. The beginning of the 8th century saw the downfall of the Westgothic empire, and the invasion of the Arabs, invited by the sons of the expelled king, and by their uncle, Oppas, archbishop of Hispalis, for the purpose of driving from the throne their king, Rechcal. The land between the Douro and the Pyrenees, a small portion of the peninsula, remained under Christian rule. Ferdinand II (1038-65) wrenched from the Arabs Lamego, Veso, Coimbra, etc. Though the Arabs had allowed the inhabitants of these places to maintain their churches, many of them passed over to Mohammedanism, and thus, by degrees, bishoprics and monasteries disappeared. Even Bracara lost her metropolitan dignity; and when, in 1083, Alphonso VI took Toledo, which under the Arabian rule had continued still during two centuries to be the residence of an archbishop, there was scarcely a Christian to be found in the city. In the consideration of these circumstances, and with the consent of pope John VIII, Ovetum, in Galicia, was made a metropolis, including the bishoprics Anca, Legio, Astorica, Salmantiva, Cauro, Coimbra, Lamego, Veso, Portucal, Bracara, Tude, Auria, Trias, Loco, Britonia, and Cesar Augusta. Oviedo was the city of the bishops in partibus infidelium; but the former suffragans of Tarragona did not acknowledge the archbishop of Ovetum, but that of Narbonne as their metropolis. The dignity of the bishop of Ovetum expired in 1088. Alphonse VI took Toledo and Castile, the old ecclesiastical provinces of Toledo, Braga, and Tarragona being then established anew by Gregory VII and Urban II. The long time during which the Spanish peninsula had been reduced to unity being obliterated everywhere, justified, in the ideas of these times, the measures taken by the Church for the purpose of securing the rule and purity of the Roman Catholic religion. The complete expulsion of Mohammedans and Jews seemed commanded by the circumstances, and it was executed without delay. In the year 1249 an inquisition was established in Lisbon, and special severity was displayed against the Jews accused of practicing their old worship under the garb of Christianity. They formed, under the name of New-Christians (q.v.), a suspicious class, and many of them, in 1506, had been victims to the severe decrees of the council of Trent. The power of the Church increased rapidly, and with it the pride of some of the bishops, for there soon arose between the crown and the clergy difficulties greatly detrimental to the influence of the latter, as it gave occasion to the people to get an insight into and speak freely of its sad condition, as well as of that of the Roman court. By the laws of 1822-28 every naturalized foreigner was granted civil and political rights regardless of his religion; they authorized every kind of private worship, and prohibited every religious persecution. The Catholic clergy were treated with the greatest distinction, and their incomes were seized upon to fill the treasury of the state. It was not until 1848 that the government was reconciled with the pope, and the wounds of the Roman Church were long in healing even after that. The Pope through his nuncios in Portugal declared the inquisition a diocesan patriarch, who is always a cardinal, and who is, to some extent, independent of Rome. Portugal is divided into three dioceses, which are presided over by the cardinal-patriarch of Lisbon. His suffragan sees are Castelo-Branco, Guarda, Lamego, Leiria, and Portoalegre. There are several colonial bishoprics in Madeira, the Azores, and other islands. Besides the patriarchate or archbishopric of Lisbon, there is the archbishopric of Braga, who is primate of the kingdom, and whose suffragan sees are Porto, Viseu, Coimbra, Bragança-Miranda, Aveiro, and Vila Velha; and the archbishopric of Evora, with the bishoprics Elvas, Beja, and Algarve. The archbishops have the rank of a marquis, the bishops of a count. They all belong to the grandezza, or higher nobility. The bishops are appointed by the king, and confirmed by the pope. No bull can be published without the agreement of the king. The number of clergy holding cure is given at 18,000. The total number of parishes is 4086. The monasteries were dissolved in 1834, but a few religious establishments still exist. At the time of the dissolution Portugal was possessed of 90,000 monasteries, with 7500 monks, and 129 nunneries, with 2725 nuns.

There are six orders of knighthood, viz., the Order of Christ, founded in 1119; St. Benedit of Avis; the Tower and Sword, founded in 1438, and reorganized in 1888; Our Lady of Mount Carmel, founded in 1819; and the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, which was separated in 1802 from that of Malta. In addition to these, there is one civil-service order, founded in 1288. Portugal stands below the other countries of Europe in regard to education. There is one university at Coimbra; there are military, naval, trade, and navigation schools, and many classical and higher schools; and in 1861 there were 1788 public schools, with 79,172 pupils, uncontrolled by the Church. There is an Academy of Sciences and a School of Arts at Lisbon, the former of which has a library of 56,000 volumes. The other public libraries are the Central Library, with 300,000 volumes; various royal libraries, as that of Lisbon, with 86,000 badly preserved volumes and 8000 MSS.; that at the Neocesidales Palace, with 28,000 volumes; and that at the Ajuda Palace, with 20,000 volumes; and the University Library of Coimbra, with 70,000 volumes. The administration of the management of general education is conducted by a superior council of education at Coimbra, under the supervision of the ministry of the Home Department. PORTUGUESE VERSION

The oldest known Portuguese version is that of the Psalms, which was published at Oxford in 1655, together with a translation of the English liturgy, under the title, O Lívro da Oratóriacomum administrado aos Sacramentos e outros Ritos e Ceremonias da Igreja, conforme o uso da Igreja de Inglaterra, compilado com o Salario ou Salmo de David (Oxford, na estampa do Teatro, anno de Christo, 1655).

This translation is said to be very defective. Next in chronological order is the New Testament, or O Novo Testamento, 1702, todos os sacros Santos Lírios e Exércitos espirituais e apostólicos do novo Concilio de Nice Fam. Senhor Redentor e Redemptor Jesus Christo traduzido em Portuguez pelo Padre Joam Ferreira a d'Almeida, Ministro Preceptor da Santo Evangelho. Com todas as Licenças necessarias (em Amsterdam, por Joam Crelina, 1712, 8vo). Seven years later, the first part of the Old Testament, or the Pentateuch, was published under the title, Os cinco livros de Moyses, chamados: 1. Genesis; 2. Exodo; 3. Levítico; 4. Números; 5. Deuteronomio (com privilegio real; Translueber, em India Oriental, na costa do Coromandel, em uma estampa da Real Mission de Denemark, anno de 1719, 4to). Um ano depois, O Livro da Oratória de Davi, com toda diligentia traduzido de Texto original na Lingua Portuguez, segundo o uso da tradução com muitos passos dedicado pelo Padre Benjamin Schultz, Missionário do Rey de Dinamarca e Ministro da Palavra de Deus (Trangambar, em India Oriental, na costa de Coromandel, em uma estampa da Real Mission, anno de 1721, 12mo); Os doce Prophetas Menores, comem a semana, Hoseas, Joel, Amos, Obadias, Jonas, Micah, Nahum, Habacuc, Sophonias, Haggo, Zacharias, Malachias (com toda diligentia traduzido na lingua Portuguez com os Padres Missionarios de Trangambar). O Livro dos Profetas, comem a semana, O Livro de Jozef, O Livro dos Juizes, O livro de Ruth, o primeiro Livro dos Reis, o segundo Livro dos Reis, o primeiro Livro dos Cronicaes, o segundo Livro dos Cronicaes, o Livro de Ezequiel, o Livro de Neemias, o Livro de Ester, traduzido na Lingua Portuguez, pelo Reverendo Padre Joam Ferreira d'Almeida, Ministro Preceptor do Santo Evangelho na Cidade de D. Março, conforme o texto original em que os Padres Missionarios de Trangambar, na officina da Real Mission de Dinamarca, anno de 1728, 4to); and Os Livros historicos do Velho Testamento, comem a semana, O Livro de Josue, o Livro dos Juizes, o Livro de Ruth, o primeiro Livro dos Reis, o segundo Livro dos Reis, o primeiro Livro dos Cronicaes, o segundo Livro dos Cronicaes, o Livro de Ezequiel, o Livro de Neemias, e o Livro de Ester, traduzido na Lingua Portuguez, pelo Reverendo Padre Joam Ferreira d'Almeida, Ministro Preceptor do Santo Evangelho na Cidade de D. Março, conforme o texto original em que os Padres Missionarios de Trangambar, na officina da Real Mission de Dinamarca, anno de 1738, 4to). In the preface to these historical books, which is dated April 21, 1738, we are told that the ministers of Batavia sent this translation of Job. For some years, when the Dutch naturalized to mysticism. When, in 1809, Brauana passed from Austria to Bavaria, Pischel was placed under the dependency of the bishop of Salzburg; and in 1815, when the city became Austrian again, he returned to the diocese of Linz. Soon afterwards, he was sent to China to transmit the doctrine of the Dutch government, and to preach his "new revelation." Christ, he says, dwells in the hearts of such as are pure, and directs all their actions. To them appear God and the Virgin, and make them the recipients of their revelation. He who does not get purified incurs damnation, and deserves death, which alone can purify him. This doctrine must be obeyed even if it should exact the sacrifice of life itself, if the fruit of the new revelation is not to be lost and given to the Jews. God has determined that the Jews shall be converted. Judaism and Christianity melted together into one general, catholic religion, the millennial kingdom is to commence when these events have taken place. The new doctrine found proselytes not only in Ambrosianism and other sects. The editorship of R. Holten and the Rev. R.C. Bridger was issued in 1876 (see the "784 Report of the British and Foreign Bible Society" [Lond. 1877], p. 89 sq.). Complete editions of the Bible in the Portuguese language were published by the American and British and Foreign Bible Societies, the German Gesellschaft für die Erforschung der Mediävistik (Handbuch der biblischen Literatur, iv, 298 sq. [1876]).
bead confessions and gave absolution. They are said to have committed most indecencies in their assemblies. The ceremony of purification preceded the admission of new members: a kind of oil or a powder which the proselyte was made to swallow produced dreadful convulsions, while a crowd of maddened females performed a savage dance around the sufferer, to eject the devil from his body. This was the initiation of the new member. The escape of Napoleon from Elba strengthened the belief that he was the Antichrist, and that, as a consequence, the millennium was at hand. Disorderly tramps roamed about, prophesying and preaching, and themselves for chosen members of the kingdom of God, and resisted both the ecclesiastical and civil authorities. At last government took the matter in hand, nightly raids were made upon their assemblies, their doings were investigated, and Pöschel was put into custody at Salzburg. This intervention of the police did not appease the fanaticism of the sectarians, who were misled several times even to sanguinary excesses. A mother tried to torture her child to death, to honor the Lord; a father to kill his child in prison. The insanity of these people reached its pitch in the House of the Holy Shitt. In the night the then Emperor Paul I. Sunday it was resolved, in a meeting held near Ampelwang, to offer a sacrifice to the Lord. A peasant, of the name of Haas, was to be the victim. His mother and an old man were dragged to the scene of the holocaust. The beast was killed and eaten. While the peasant lived only a few days afterwards of his wound, the ceremony becoming by this postponement devoid of effect. Haas prevailed on his adopted daughter, a girl of nineteen years, to give her life for him. The monster killed her most cruelly, and are even said to have drunk her blood, as being the blood of Christ. The scene of these horrors was on the ensuing day occupied by the militia and the actors arrested, but only six of the leaders were kept in custody. The sect, which did not count over 125 members, thereafter disappeared rapidly. Pöschel, who had always condemned the horrors committed by his disciples, was transferred to Vienna, where, his insanity being clearly demonstrated, he was placed under severe ecclesiastical custody. He died in 1837. In a wider sense, the name of Pöschelians was for some time used to designate fanatics of Pöschel's and the Pöschelians' description. See Althof, Kirchengesch. ii, 689; Giesebrecht, Kirchengesch. der neuesten Zeit (Bonn, 1855), p. 338 sq. (J. H. W.)

Poseidon, the god who was considered among the ancient Greeks as presiding over the sea. He was the son of Cronos and Rhea, and had his palace at the bottom of the sea, where the monsters of the deep play around his dwelling. This deity was believed to be the author of storms, and to shake the earth with his trident or the son of Poseidon. His wife was Amphitrite. When the universe was divided between the brothers, the sea was given to Poseidon. He was equal to Zeus in dignity, but not in power. He once conspired with Hera (Juno) and Athena (Minerva) to put Zeus in chains but the more powerful god. He rides over the waves in a chariot drawn by horses with brazen hoofs and golden manes, and the sea becomes smooth at his appearance, while the monsters of the deep gambol and play around him. Herodotus affirms that the Greeks derived the worship of Poseidon from Libya; but, from whatever quarter it was received, it spread all over Greece and Southern Italy. It prevailed more especially in the Peloponnesus. The usual sacrifices offered to this god were black and white bulls, and also wild bears and rams. At Corinth his image was held in his honor. The Pantheon, or festival of all the Ionians, was celebrated also in honor of Poseidon. The Romans identified him with their own sea-god Neptune. Troy was called Neptunia Pergina, because Poseidon assisted Apollo to surround it with walls for king Laomedon, who refused to give them the promise of reward. Poseidon sent a sea-monster to ravage the country, which was killed by Hercules. He always hated the Trojans, and assisted the Greeks against them. He prevented the return of Ulysses, in revenge for his having blinded Polyphemus, the son of Poseidon. In art he is easily recognized by his trident and his chariot with which are the trident, horses, and dolphins. See Neptune.

Poseidonia, a festival celebrated annually among the ancient Greeks in honor of Poseidon. It was kept chiefly in the island of Aegina.

Posen, a Polish province, that portion of ancient Poland which fell to Prussia in the partition of the kingdom, has an area of 11,260 square miles, and a population (close of 1871) of 1,568,684. The territory is divided into two departments, that of Posen and Bromberg, and its principal cities are, besides the respective capitals named after the departments, Gnesen, Liess, and Inowroclaw. The principal river is the Wartha, which is navigable, but the commerce of the province is very light. For education little has been done as yet. The Prussian government is determined to force German culture. There are six gymnasia, several normal and training schools, a seminary for the training of priests, and about two-thirds of the burgher of the province. Nearly half the population belong to the Roman Catholic Church, which is under the spiritual jurisdiction of the archbishop of Gnesen and Posen, while 74,000 of the remainder are Jews. The inhabitants may still be said to be Poles, more than 800,000 persons employing Polish as their mother-tongue.

Posen formed an integral part of Poland till 1772, when, at the first partition of the Polish territory, the districts north of the Netze were given to Prussia. At the second and third partitions, which were made twenty years later, the remainder was incorporated in the Prussian kingdom under the name of South Prussia. In 1807 Posen was included in the duchy of Warsaw; but by the act of the Congress of Vienna it was separated in 1815 from Poland and reassigned to Prussia under the title of the Grand Duchy of Posen. In 1848 the Poles, who had never amalgamated with their new German compatriots, took advantage of the general political excitement of that period to organize an open rebellion, which gave the Prussian government considerable trouble, and was put down with much cruelty that has been spilled on both sides. On the cessation of disturbances, the German citizens of the province demanded the incorporation of Posen with those Prussian states which were members of the German Confederation, and the Berlin Chambers gave their approval of the proposed measure in 1851. But on the subsidence of revolutionary sentiment in Germany the subject was dropped, and Posen returned to its former condition of an extra-German province of the Prussian monarchy. For the ecclesiastical history, see Poland; see also Prussia.

Poser, the term applied to the bishop's examining chaplain. The annual examiner at Winchester and Eton still bears this name.

Posey, Alexander, a colored minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born about the year 1814. He came from the Africola Methodist Episcopal Church March 29, 1834, at Winchester, Va., where the Western Conference was being in Winchester, Va. He was received into full connection, and the same year (1869) was appointed to Johnmann Street Chapel, Winchester, Va. He was reappointed to 1870 to Winchester, Va.; in 1871 to Harrisonburgh, Va., and in 1872-73 to Lexington, Va. In 1874 he was appointed to Abingdon, Va., but did not reach his work, he being sick at the time he received his appointment. He never recovered, but died Aug. 1, 1874. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 14.
POSEY 457  POSITIVISM

Posey, John Henderson, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born Sept. 17, 1819, in Breckinridge County, Ky.; emigrated with his parents in early life to Illinois, and settled in Morgan County, Ill. He was licensed to preach July 16, 1858, and retained the local relation for some time. In 1866 he joined the Illinois Conference, and was appointed to Barry Circuit. In 1878 he was appointed to Lima Circuit. Shortly after the next year's Conference his health failed, and he died Nov. 18, 1869. He ever regarded the ministry as the most sacred vocation on earth. His high appreciation of its sacredness and responsibility was such at times as almost to overpower his own spirit. He was a true itinerant in heart and practice. See Minutes of the Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 518, 519.

Posidonius (Ποσιδώνιος), an envoy of the Syrian general Nicoran to Judas Maccabaeus (2 Macc. xiv, 19).

Posidonius (Ποσιδώνιος), a distinguished Greek Stoic philosopher, was a native of Apameia in Syria, but a citizen of Rhodes, where he resided the greater part of his life (A.D. 70-120). The dates of his birth and death are unknown; but he must have been born during the latter half of the 2nd century before the Christian era, as he was a disciple of Panetius, who probably died about B.C. 100, and whom he succeeded as the head of the Stoic school. He removed to Rome in the consulship of Marcus Murelius (Suidas, Posidon.), B.C. 51, and probably died soon after. He lived, according to Lucian (Macrob. c. 20), to the age of eighty-four, and was one of the most celebrated philosophers of his day. Cicero, who had received instruction from him (Cic. Decr. 3; De Fis. i, 2), frequently speaks of him in the highest terms. Pompey also appears to have had a very high opinion of him, as we read of his visiting him at Rhodes shortly before the war against the pirates, B.C. 67 (Strabo, xi, 492), and again in B.C. 62, after the termination of the Mithridatic war (Plutarch, Pompe. c. 42; Pliny, Hist. Nat., vii, 80). He must have been a man of very extensive and varied information in almost all the departments of human knowledge. Strabo calls him, ὁδιω τῶν καὶ ἢμοις φιλοσοφός πολυσμηνικός. Besides his philosophy, he was an excellent orator, a master of history, and astronomy; but none of them have come down to us, with the exception of their titles, and a few sentences quoted by Cicero, Diogenes Laertius, Strabo, and others. He seems to have travelled in different parts of the world for the purpose of collecting information. We learn incidentally from Strabo (xii, 614; iii, 163: iv, 197) that he had been in Spain, Liguria, and Gaul. Plutarch was also indebted to Posidonius, among others, for the materials of several of his lives. This is the case in the Lives of Marcellus, Paulus Emilius, the Gracchi, and others; but particularly in the Life of Murius, with whom Posidonius had been personally acquainted (Plut. Marius, c. 45). Posidonius wrote Meteorologica. Cicero mentions (Nat. Deor. ii, 84) his artificial spheres, which represented the motions of the heavens. Posidonius was a much stricter Stoic than his master Panetius. He maintained that pain was not an evil, as we learn from an anecdote which Posidonius frequently related respecting his visit to the philosopher at Rhodes (Cic. Tuscul. Disput. ii, 25). As a physical investigator he was greatly superior to the Stoics generally, attaching himself in this respect rather to Aristotle. Indeed, although attached to the Stoic system, he was far less dogmatical and obstinate than the majority of that school, refusing to admit a dogma because it was one of the school if it did not commend itself to him for its own sake. His treatment of divination, the nature of the gods referred to by Cicero, who probably made use of them in his works on the same subject (Cic. De Div. i, 3, 30, 64; De Nat. Deor. i, 44). Strabo says (xi, 492) that Posidonius wrote an account of the wars of Pompey, but did not pay much attention to accounts of his later career at about the age of seventeen. When he attained to the years of manhood he came to Missouri, and there connected himself with the Methodist Church. He was licensed to preach July 16, 1858, and retained the local relation for some time. In 1866 he joined the Illinois Conference, and was appointed to Barry Circuit. In 1878 he was appointed to Lima Circuit. Shortly after the next year's Conference his health failed, and he died Nov. 18, 1869. He ever regarded the ministry as the most sacred vocation on earth. His high appreciation of its sacredness and responsibility was such at times as almost to overpower his own spirit. He was a true itinerant in heart and practice. Positive Philosophy, a recent scheme of philosophy, on the basis of materialism, founded by Auguste Comte de Paris. See Comte; Positivism.

Positivism, a distinct, scientific habit of mind, regulated by a characteristic principle, which was made the basis of an entirely new system of philosophy by Auguste Comte (see Comte), and which has matured, according to the intention of its author, into a sect, a creed, and a church, since the article on Comte was written. The term is applied to the intellectual habit, the characteristic principle, the philosophical procedure, and the consequent body of doctrine. The English Positivists, who have latterly been the most zealous propagators of the positive philosophy, and have very recently issued a complete translation of the Système de la Politique Positive, revolt from some of the conceptions of the later speculation of Comte, respecting his theological and ecclesiastical reconstructions, and all the sentimental mimicry of the papal organization, which was elaborated under the quasi influence of Mme. Chlotilde de Vaux. They adhere rigidly to the distinctive principle of the positive philosophy, which constitutes its sole rationale and determines its consistent developments and applications. It is the first duty, then, to ascertain what this principle is.

The epithet Positive has been employed in various significations in the history of philosophy, as will be shown at the time. The method of investigation which is employed by the school of the Positivists and by its founder to denote the strict confinement of speculation and the rigorous limitation of knowledge to observed facts, and to their habitual antecedences, concomitances, and sequences. It excludes all laws but those of recognized association. It involves the exclusion of causes and effects: of supernatural, spiritual, or metaphysical agencies; of hidden forces, latent qualities, and immaterial essences. It contracts the intelligible universe within the sphere of the phenomenal. It refrains from investigating the intrinsic constitution of things, and prohibits any expatiation beyond the reach of purely scientific analysis and construction. It does not deny, but it ignores, extrudes, and repudiates as inaccessible and imaginary whatever transcends the observed facts and the logical deductions therefrom. It is the pure method of inductive science, accepted as practically sufficient and complete, though without asserting that it is necessarily exhaustive. Whatever lies beyond this circle is not only unknown, but inconceivable and inapprehensible—not merely imperfect and uncertain, but impossibly palpable and determinate to human apprehension.

It is impossible to give a sharp, precise, and formal definition of Positivism, because it is chiefly discriminated from other philosophical schemes by what it excludes, by its limitations rather than by its comprehension. One of the most eminent and earnest of living Positivists has within the last few years given an explation of the character of the doctrine, which it may be to cite as an authoritative testimony:

"Suffice it that we mean by the positivist method of thought the use of the senses (in a sense not limited to the social construction of Comte) that method which would base life and conduct, upon such evidence as can be referred to logical canons of proof, which would place all that occupies man in a homogeneous scheme of life. On this method this method turns aside from hypotheses, not to be tested by any known logical canon familiar to science, whether the hypothesis claimed be one of deduction, intuition, aspiration, or general plausibility. And again, this method turns aside from ideal standards which give themselves the lie, as by professedly to transform and control the field of law. We say, life and conduct shall stand for us wholly on a basis of law, and must prove the arch-structure of science (not physical, but moral and social science) where we are free to use our intelligence in the methods known to us as intelligible logic, methods which the intellect can analyze" (Frederic

Harrison, The Soul and Future Life, In The Nineteenth Century, No. 4, June, 1877, art. vii, p. 624, 625).

Mr. Harrison's contemplation is here, as will be readily conjectured, directed specially to the ethical developments of Positivism; but such language so applied reveals the severity with which everything but the processes and products of scientific observation and logical conclusion is excluded from the arena of the Positivist.

This accords perfectly with the determination of the dogma itself. In this chapter he first formulated in the Philosophie Positive ( tome i, p. 4, 5).

"In fine, in the Positive state the human mind, recognizing the impossibility of obtaining absolute notions, re-ounces the fiction of the absolute destination of the universe, and inquiry into the intrinsic causes of phenomena, and attaches itself instead solely to the discovery, by judicious combination of reasoning and observation, of their effective laws—that is, to the discovery of their invariable relations of succession and resemblance. Thus, the idea of a final and revealed purpose of the universe, its all-inclusive facts that sooner or later and terms is, there is no more than the connection established between diverse phenomena and certain general facts whose number tends to be constantly diminished by the progress of science."

This procedure has long been regarded as alone ap-cerception in the domain of physical science, and as equi-

lively applicable, within the limits of its applicability, in speculative science. It forms what is commonly regarded as the Baconian philosophy or the Baconian redintegration of philosophy. Positivism, however, both in the conception of the father of the system and in the doctrine and practice of his followers, extends its range so as to embrace all the departments of knowledge and action, to profess itself the sole and exclusive method, and to stigmatize and repudiate whatever will not submit to its jurisdiction or remains beyond its reach. Indeed, in the elaboration of the system by Comte all its applications to the exact sciences

were mere preliminary steps in social reconstruction, and to the establishment of a comprehensive and diversified ethical doctrine for public and private authority. In this light it is still viewed by the existing school of Positivists, notwithstanding their rejection of much of the theological reverence of Comte.

It will readily be recognized that Positivism, as so understood, revives under strangely modernized aspects

the old dogma of Protagoras that man is the measure of the universe. The ancient contrast and analogy of the great and the microscopic have been reproduced in quaint disguise and more plausible form by limiting the intelligible universe (mundus intelligibilis) to its reflection from the mirror of the human mind so far, and so far only, as an image of it can be formed through the instrumentality of the bodily senses and of reaning on the phenomena observed thereby. We will not be tempted into the easy misrepresentation of alleging that all is denied which is not so reflected, but the practical effect is nearly the same; for it is ignored, censured, and extruded from the field of speculation. On the other hand all its absurdities, the mind of man and its measureless potencies, the heart of man

with its boundless duties, its multidimensional aspirations

and its unfathomable mysteries, are shrivelled up into the narrow dimensions of the science of the day. Surely we require a philosophy of the unknown as well as of the known.

"Vere scire est scire per causas," said Aristotle, and the schoolmen after him. The maxim was unquestion-ably pressed by the latter to hazardous uses, and employed to authenticate hallucinations which obstructed

science for centuries. "Vere scire est scire apparentibus"—

true knowledge is the knowledge of appearances—is the shibboleth of the Positivists, and is even more dangerous than the misapprehension which it has undertaken to dethrone. It results in pure phenomenism, and renders man and the universe alike hollow, deceptive, and empty, a mere shadow. The more universal and the length to which it may be and has been carried, are well illustrated by the remarkable and exquisitely written article of Mr. Frederic Harrison on "The Soul and Future Life," from which we have already made a citation, and by the very recent discussions provoked by

it. Mr. Harrison, like his Cerephus, still more severe

"thoughts that wander through eternity," except it be a human eternity. He will not suffer them to travel

"extra flammantia memia mundi." He compresses

those flaming walls to the limits of the earth's horizon.

He does not imagine the existence of "the Positivist's heaven," but only stars it out and dissipates it into a technical ab-

traction. "The combined activity of the human powers," he says, "organized around the highest of them we call the soul." Again, "the consensus of human faculties, which we call the soul, comprises all sides of human nature according to the homogenized theory."

"She, musing with the dull earth's moldering sod,

Tumult tenfold in solemn shame,

Lay there, exiled from eternal God,

Lest to her place some other be den-derer.

The future life is still more vacant, unreal, and inap-prehensible than even the subdued soul. It is in deed the shadow of a shade. Mr. Harrison does not give such distinct utterance to his conception of the post-mortem existence as to enable us to grasp it firmly.

He employs phrases which indicate his acceptance of the Panhumanistic immortality, by absorption into the aggregate humanity of subsequent generations, if he refuses to adore with Comte le Nouveau Grand-Etre—

the New Supreme God—humanity itself. But the abstract term—the unsubstantial and unessential conception of humanity—is less a real being—a more capable receptacle of souls or extinct consciences of human powers—by being stripped of the tawdry trappings

and tinsel fringes with which Comte had decorated it, to set it up as an idol in place of Jehovah. Strange that the Positivist should reject as unphilosophical and invalid all that religion teaches as true, and as true, and should recur to such a factitious and fictitious abstraction as this humanity must be! Waiving

the divine attributes of creation, ordination, and government, and regarding only the functions of the Divinity as a moral influence exerted over men as "the warder of them that diligently seek him"—it may well be asked what restraint or encouragement could a de-

ified and posthumous humanity exercise retrospectively

on the conduct of men in society or as individuals.

The fancy is as futile as it is absurd. Roche Boyle's comic exclamations would recur to every transgressor—"What has posterity done for us!" It may be frankly conceded that the ideas of duty, of obligation, of justice, of temporal responsibility—perhaps even of right and wrong, of righteousness and sin, of beauty and of aesthetic emotion—may be translated from the language of religious belief into the language of Positivism. M. Comte made a travesty of the rites and ceremonial of Catholic Christianity, and commended

it to his devotees as the Positive religion. This invention has been accepted by his followers, and by a few, but it is a similar procedure by which Mr. Harrison and the rest profess and hope to retain the esential characteristics of a divine creed, after excluding from the universe all recognition of divinity. It is mistaking the shell for the organism, after the substance and life, which were enclosed by the shell, and which informed the shell, have perished out. We can see the very nice distinction demanded by Positivism between the universe of divinity and the universe of divinity and the supernatural and the mere declaration of its incoginitability, and of its consequent elimination from the domain of faith, as of knowledge. But the practical effect in both cases will be nearly the same. The discrimination is very refined and theoretical, and may be perfectly valid in almost all the cases. But it is only the purest art of most intellectual natures which can perceive it and act upon it, and even they will forget it or lose their hold upon it in moments of passion and temptation. It cannot be adequately apprehended by dull minds, coarse temperaments, and undisciplined characters, and will consequently be wholly inoperative where most required. The defect—the fatal defect—is the absence of any imperative and extrinsic authority to secure effective responsibility and obedience to right. The injury to humanity thus rendered is very evident; the advantage to be anticipated is indubitable.

This notice proceeds on the same plane with that adopted by the Positivists, and the discussion of their principles does not travel beyond the domain of the human understanding. The danger of Positivism springs from the recognition of divinity, of the danger of so many kinds of schemes of philosophy in our day—the disposition to regard a partial truth as the complete body of truth—to make one principle the sufficient explanation of all things, and to render human knowledge co-extensive with all knowledge, and, practically, with all truth. The unknown must always transcend the known: it must remain higher in dignity and influence, as well as incomprehensible in all dimensions. The necessary principle, however, is to humanize the universe—to restrict all valid knowledge to purely scientific knowledge, and to keep the realm of the altogether apprehensible within the narrow mould of the demonstrable. Positivism is true in its place and in its degree, as evolution is true under the like limitations, but it is not all-comprehending. It does not include all truth, and is far from embracing all reality. Its error and its pernicious consequences arise from the attempt to make it all-sufficient and exclusive. As a method of science it is true and valuable in all the applications of physical science, and of ethical science too, so far as the latter can appropriately employ observation and induction. But beyond this the difficulties and consequences of these unknown, including that which is known only by its effects; and we cannot wisely or safely leave this vast enclosing sphere out of our contemplation, for it is the main regulator of our conduct, by constant appeal to our highest sensibilities. If the hypothesis of the astronomer be true, that there is a mighty central sun in the unsounded depths of heaviness space, round which our sun, with all its attendant planets, revolves in a regular but measureless orbit, it would be neither logical nor prudent to deny the existence of such a centre of attraction, because it remains, and may forever remain, unattainable by human sense. It seems even more illogical and indirect to repudiate a moral centre of the universe, attracting and governing all things, and radiating its influences over the whole physical and rational world, because it lies beyond the limits of scientific observation, and cannot be measured, analyzed, or determined by the forms of science.

The factitious blindness or wilful shortsightedness of the Positive dogma is strangely illustrated by the history of the organism, and of the philosophy which has been employed to designate it. St. Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theol. ii, 67) employs Positive in accordance with its juridical usage as opposed to Natural—"jus naturale et jus positivum." Accordingly, he uses it to denote that which is commanded, assumed, laid down, posted, taken for granted; hence, arbitrary, not in the sense of wilful or fantastic, but of determined as a condition precedent. "Illud dictur esse positivum quod ex voluntate humana procedit," etc. This meaning is frequently given to it by others of the schoolmen, and is sufficiently accordant with its etymology, the word positi means to put or to place, and the superlative is ad adversum non negatur" (Cicero, Pro Cæc. xii). As in the scholastic reasoning the most absolutely determined principles—the starting-points of speculation—were the dogmas of revealed truth, the positions formulated and with the superlative was supposed to ensue ab adversario non negatur" (Cicero, Pro Cæc. xii). impassable to human faculties, if duly prepared by familiarity with previous links, we are far from regarding the ultimate reality of phenomena and experiences, satisfactorily expressed by declaring it to consist in the discovery and generalization of laws” (Edinb. POSER, AUGUSTUS SIGMUND (formerly Sinis, a German minister of the Lutheran Church, a convert from Judaism, was born May 19, 1805, at Auras, in Lower Silesia. His early education he received at the public schools of Breslau. When seventeen years of age, he went to Berlin to continue his studies. There he became acquainted with a Hebrew Christian, who received the first seed of the Gospel. In the year 1828 he re- ceived public baptism, assuming the name of Augustus Siegmund. He betook himself to the study of theology, and upon its completion filled several situations as tutor in private families. In the year 1830 he received a call to be Professor of Hebrew at the University of Halle, and set out for Berlin to prepare for his journey. On the road his intention became the subject of conversation with a fellow-traveller, a gentleman holding a high situation under government, and to his no small surprise he was informed by the latter that he must relinquish the intention of becoming a missionary, as he had just been appointed by the government chaplain of the Penitentiary at Sagan (in Silesia), and the necessary documents respecting it were nearly completed. In Sep- tember he received this new charge, which he did not disclaim as becoming a faithful disciple of Christ. In addition to the discharge of his heavy duties, Posner edited a monthly publication under the title The Prophet, Son, which became a great blessing to many readers. In the year 1840 he was formally ordained by the consistory. Seeing that his duties at Sagan were far be- yond his strength, the government made the offer to him of another ministerial charge at Lebenthal—adding, however, that if it were practicable his remaining at his present post would be regarded with great satisfaction. The expression of such a wish was sufficient to lead Pos- ner to consider it his duty to remain. Thus he labored and suffered on. In the beginning of the year 1846 Pos- ner was invited by the congregation of a newly erected church in Berlin to become their pastor; but the consistory refusing to comply with Posner’s wishes to adhere to the formula of the Lutheran Church instead of those of the Prussian National Church, Posner had to relinquish the appointment. Broke health, in connection with domestic afflictions, hastened his end, and on Monday, Jan. 22, 1849, he was called to his eternal rest, enquiring with a wonderful magical force the words “Bach, am ende, make an end, O Lord! Come, Lord Jesus!—come, come, come quickly! Lead my soul out of darkness.” See A.S. Posner, Der treue Zeuge Gottes, weiland Pastor an der königl. Strafanstalt zu Sagan; Von einem Freund (Schreibershaus, 1851, 2d ed.); and the biography prepared by a brother of the deceased in the Sonntags-Blu-}

Biothek, vol. iv, pt. iii (Bielefeld, 1850); Jewish Intelli- gencer (Lond. 1858); Zuchold, Bibliotheca Theologica, ii, 120. (B. P.)

POSELLE, AUGUSTUS, a German Lutheran theologian, was born Jan. 6, 1654, at Zittau, in the Oberlausitz. He studied at Wittenberg, Kiel, and Jena, and for a long time he preached at Hamburg. In 1688 he was appointed zum Pastoralzelle in Hamburg, where he remained for some time; in 1714 he was made archdeacon, and in 1718 pastor primarius of St. John, in which position he died, Nov. 23, 1728. He wrote, Richtige Erklärung der Fülle der St. Pauli an die Römer:—Nachricht von dem in Inhaber bestehenden biblischen Exemplaren. See Jocher, Gehrent- Lexikon, s. a.

Possessed with Devils, the usual rendering in the A. V. of the Greek ἐπανομοσύνης (but also ἐπανομοσύνης, Mark v, 18; ἐπέναμος ἤτοι, Luke viii, 27; ἐπέναμος ἢ τόκον ἐκάθισεν ἤτοι, iv, 33), Matt. iv, 24; ivii, 16; xx, 22; Acts vii, 7; Luke vii, 2. These were persons afflicted with disease, as epilepsy (Matt. xxi, 18; Luke ix, 22; Math. x, 16), dumbness (Matt. ix, 32; xii, 22), and especially with melancholy and insanity (Matt. viii, 28; Mark v, 2 sq.; Luke vii, 27 sq.; whence the healed are said to be of sound mind (σωφρόνων ἄνως, Mark v, 15; Luke viii, 35). It is not necessary to suppose that the epilepsy or the dumbness of these persons was the case, was complicated with peculiar physical disorders, although epilepsy is very commonly connected with something of the kind (see Farmer, Ferz. p. 89; Hippocra- tis, Visc. Morb. c. i; Esquier, Path. u. Thérap. d. Scle- rotèmes; Leips. 1857, p. 78; comp. p. 585). Indeed, while these special disabilities of men in other respects in sound and vigorous health were naturally referred to a supernatural cause, this would be especially the case with the sudden attacks of epilepsy, falling at irregular intervals and without premonition. Everything of this kind is called the Devil, in the Greeks and Romans, the evil spirits taking possession of men (see Acts x, 18; Luke xiii, 16; comp. Josephus, Ant. vi, 8, 2, in 1 Sam. xvi, 14, 23; see also Lightfoot, p. 388; Eisenmenger, Enzyklopädie Judenth. ii, 404; Maimonides, Schob. ii, 5; Erub. iii, 4; Crozier, Symbof. ii, 34 sq.). The case was the same among the ancients with those extraordinary events and achievements, accomplished by men, which seemed too great to proceed from the natural human powers—they were referred to the operation of a di- vine spirit. Not only hallucinations, which are the most frequent symptom of epilepsy (called by Herodotus the sacred disease, iii, 35), but also the ravings of Bechamites and Corybantes were viewed as proceeding from superhuman inspiration (Herod. iv, 79; Eurip. Medec. 298 sq.; Diod. Hal. De Demon. c. xxii; see also Herod. iii, 33; Heliod. Eld. iv, 10; Dos. Exercit. Phil. p. 62 sq.). Hence to demonize (ζα- μωσύνη) is the common Greek expression meaning to be insane (Euch. Chor. 564; Sept. c. Theb. 1008; Eurip. Phem. 899; Aristoph. Themorph. 1060; Plutarch, Marv. 20; Lucian, Philopater. c. xvi; and Wetst. i, 261; comp. Aretaeus, Saurous Med., dist. i, 4 sq.). These cases were generally viewed as the spirits of the deceased (Philostr. Apoll. iii, 38; Horace, Epod. v, 91; comp. Josephus, War, vii, 6, 3; and on exorcising them, see Plutarch, Sympos. vii, 5; Lucian, Philopater. c. xvi; on the Syriac and Arabic usage of speech, see John, Apskr. p. 173 sq.). The practice of exorcism upon such men, for the purpose of driving out the devils, was very common (comp. Lucian, Philopater. c. xvi; and see Matt. xii, 37; Luke ix, 49; Acts xiii, 18 sq.; comp. Justin Mart. Apol. ii, 7). The exorcists made use of certain magical formulae, which are preserved (Josephus, Ant. viii, 2, 5), in connection with certain roots, stones, etc. (id. War, vii, 6, 6; Mishna, Gitten, lxvii, 2; Plutarch, De Flur. vi, 2). Afterwards these men were found also in other countries (Lucian, Philopater. c. xvi). Many suppose that Jesus simply adopted the popular mode of speech in his age in speaking of cemoniac possession, and healed the unfortunate sufferers without sharing in the view commonly taken of their disease (F. von Hennert, Accomodat, in N. T. p. 81 sq.; Hase, Leben Jesu, p. 72 sq.; Juvenal, Sat. xiv. 179 sq.; Just, in the time of Orig. Gen. De spir. mal. III, 33 sq.; many of the physicians and of the people. Where prayer and fasting are recommended to the apostles as means of exorcism, Porphyry (Apob. ii. 204, 417 sq.) may be compared. It was very natural that the sufferers, when healed, wished to remain in the vicinity of the Physician (Luke viii, 58; comp. viii, 2); and it is supposed, as just the fancied enemies most safe against the return of the demons.

The symptoms recorded of individual demonsiacs agree with those which are noticed in diseases of the kinds mentioned above. (a) On Matt. xxvii. 10, comp. Paul. Epist. iii, 18, where he speaks of a morbus comitatus, in which the whole body is convulsed; which affects chiefly boys, sometimes young men; and in which the convulsion is accompanied with a sudden inarticulate cry. The chief distinguishing mark, however, is a foaming at the mouth (comp. Luke ix. 37; I. Mack. Chron. ii. 4). Cynicus (Mark. Chron. i, 4) speaks of a class of diseased persons, epileptics, who fell in public places (from which the disease is still sometimes called falling-sickness, and in German Fallsucht; comp. Rabb. יָפָּחָה or יָפָּחָה, an epileptic, or even into rivers or the sea. Aretaeus (De Morbo Epil. 5) speaks of some who fell in weakness into the river. It was early observed that this affliction seemed to have some connection with the changes of the moon (Doug. Ael. vii. 5; Bartholin, Morb. Bibl. c. xviii.; comp. Aret. Morb. Chron. i, 4; Origen, in Matt. iii. 577; Lucian, Tox. c. xxiv.; Isidor. Orig. iv. 7). Hence the use of the word σκυλατος in Matt. iv. 24; xvii. 15; comp. Suicer, Theatr. ii. 946. In Latin, too, epileptics were called lanuvici, or monstrostrum. Again, epilepsy, in connection with partial insanity, was the disease of the man mentioned in Mark i., 23 sq.; Luke iv. 33 sq.; comp. esp. Mark i., 26. (b) On Matt. viii, 28, comp. Wetstein, 153 sq. The proofs of vast strength, and of a violent rage against himself (Mark v. 4, 5; comp. Acts xix, 16), leave no doubt that this was a maniac. The fact that he avoided society, and wished to dwell alone among tombs, point to the peculiar mania which Sauvages calls Mania mecanthropica, or that which Keil (in the article Manie, in the Dictionary of the Hebrew and Greek, 2d ed., p. 508; and in the Hist. de l'espr. 1803, p. 365) calls Mania errabunda. Yet his mania was but temporary, though the delusion which it accompanied was permanent, showing itself in settled ideas (Mark v, 9; Luke viii, 39). Thus, according to the principles of Heinroth (Lehrbuch der Seelestörungen, i, 360 sq.), the case is one of delusion joined with melancholy, and sometimes heightened to mania. Mental as well as physical diseases are often thus complicated with each other (Esquirol, p. 78); comp. further, Tauryn. Jeros. Termin. xl, 2, where an insane man (παρθηκη) is thus described: "He goes forth and spends the night in the tombs and destroys whatever is offered him." The leaping down of the swine, a part of the fruit of the herd, was produced, as some think, by the violent running towards them of the demonsiacs, under the fixed impression that the demons could not leave them save by finding another dwelling-place in the unclean beasts (comp. Josephus, Ant. vii. 5, 5; comp. esp. Eichhorn, Bibl. vii, 855 sq.; Grimm, E. A. J. 132 sq.; Schmidt, Erzr. Brüü. ii. 88 sq.; Geiling, in Henke, Mus. i. 260 sq.; Friedl. S. r. einer literaturgesch. d. The view of the earlier theologians and physicians was that in the case of the demonsiac healed by Jesus there had been an actual bodily indwelling of evil spirits. From this view (set forth by J. Possessio, a terrastico, a celebrated Italian Jesuit, noted for the diplomatic services he rendered the Church of Rome, was born at Mantova in 1584. He belonged to a noble but poor family. Sent to Rome at the age of sixteen, he was in a short time proficient in the classical languages and literature, and cardinal Ercole di Gonzaga made him his amanuensis, and instructed to his hands the education of his nephews, Francis and Scipio di Gonzaga. Possessio followed his patron to Ferrara, then to Padua, and gained by his merit the esteem of Paolo Manucci, Bartolomeo Ricci, and Sigonio. Although he had been rewarded by the Gonzagas with the donation of the rich commandery of Possano, in Piedmont, he preferred to join the Jesuits. He had not finished his novitiate when he was sent on a very delicate errand to the duke of Savoy, Emanuel Philibert (1560), to be the object of this mission was to stop the progress of heresy, which, coming from France, threatened to invade Italy through Savoy and Piedmont. The Roman court, either to reward his services or to give full scope to his talents, employed him in several negotiations. The first of these missions was to Sweden. He was sent to Stockholm in the spring of 1628. The king received him with great favor, abjured severally all his heresies, made a general confession, and promised obedience to the apostolic see. The ensuing day, May 17, 1578, the mass was celebrated after the Roman rite in presence of the king. Possessio returned to Rome, and the queries and propositions of the king were examined by an ecclesiastical commission. The mass in the vulgar tongue, the chalice for the laymen, the marriage of priests, the omission of the invocation of saints and of the prayers for the dead, the suppression of holy water and other ceremonies were rejected; seven other proposals were accepted. On Possessio's return to Stockholm (July, 1579), the king, who was of a very fickle disposition, showed great dissatisfaction at the negative answer he had met with on the five points above mentioned, broke up all negotiations, and would not even consent to the establishment of a Church for Romanists. In February, 1580, the regnad of Wadstena, at which Possesino was present, took a threatening attitude, and King John was compelled to publish an edict against such Romanists. In summer, the king's depredations, and to promise to promote only Protestants to the professorships. In the same year Possesino returned to Rome. King John, having lost his wife Catharine in

Soon afterwards Possévino was sent on a similar errand to Poland and Russia. The czar, Ivan Vassili-vitch II (1583–1584), called the Terrible, had vastly aggrandized his empire in all directions. In 1580 he had received the submission of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In 1582 he met Stephen Bathori, king of Poland (1575–1586), who defeated him and compelled him to retreat. To stop the Polish invasion the czar invoked the mediation of pope Gregory XIII. Possévino was sent to the headquarters of the king of Poland at Wilna. Bathori consented to retract the order in which he had issued his edict on the Jesuits, but kept his conditions. Hereupon Possévino set on his way to the interior of Russia under an escort of Cossacks. The czar received him at Staciža, and gave him a solemn audience, Aug. 8. Ivan sat on his throne, surrounded with Oriental pomp, dressed in a long robe interwoven with golden threads and covered with pearls and jewels; he bore a kind of tiara on his head, and held a golden sceptre in his left hand. Senators, bojars, and army-officers filled the rooms; gold and precious stones glittered everywhere. The rest was in accordance. After five days' negotiation, during which the whole proceedings the czar gave frequent evidence of astuteness and duplicity. Possévino subordinated his intervention to the following conditions: free passage through Russia for the apostolic nuncios and representatives, the protection of the Catholic worship for foreign merchants, and admission of Catholic priests to administer to the sacred rites. Finally, as the czar himself had proposed an alliance against the Turks, the papal envoy hinted at the fusion of the two churches as being the best means to bring it to pass. Possévino was hopeful of hope, while the czar gave only evasive answers. Thus a month elapsed in fruitless debate, when the news of the siege of Pleskau (Pokov), the possession of which city would have opened Russia to the Poles, brought matters to a rapid conclusion. Ivan consented to the admission of Roman Catholic merchants, and Possévino repaired to the Polish camp. Through his exertions a congress of plenipotentiaries of both belligerents was held at Porchau, in which the mediator presided. Bathori demanded the cession of the whole of Wiliczi, and as Possévino knew that the king of Poland would not swerve from his purpose, he prevailed on the Russians to consent. But when the Poles demanded also the town of Weliki, and the life of the Russian envoy was at stake, the papal legate had to pledge his own life to obtain their signature. At last the treaty was signed, Jan. 15.

Armored, Possévino, after a truly triumphal journey, reached Moscow, where he found the court in consternation and the czar beside himself: he had killed his son with a blow of his golden sceptre. Five weeks after the conclusion of the peace a conference was held in the Kremlin, when the czar declined the proposal of a fusion of the churches, but consented to the passage of the missionaries, and granted religious freedom to foreign merchants and priests. During these latter negotiations Ivan at one time had lifted his sceptre, still red with his son's blood, against the Jesuit. Failing to intimidate Possévino, he laid a snare for him, trying to prevail on him to kiss the hand of the patriarch: his purpose was to make believe that the pope had submitted to the patriarch. But the clerical diplomatist remained faithful to his task, and succeeded.

He was scarcely returned when he was sent to Livonia and Transylvania to combat Protestantism, which was fast gaining ground in those provinces. Possévino held a conference with the sectarians at Herrmannstadt. On the same occasion he increased the importance of the colleges of his order in those parts, and founded a seminary at Clausenburg. In 1588 he took his seat, in his quality of a papal nuncio, at the great Diet of Warsaw. As Possévino several times interposed his mediation between Poland and the German empire, he was, as could be expected, accused of partiality by both parties. The general inquirer, Albert, who had persisted on his being recalled, and Gregory XIII complied with the demand. Possévino was glad to leave his political toils. He journeyed about as a simple missionary in Livonia, Bohemia, Saxony, and Upper Hungary. In 1590 the nuncio of the pope's legation was sent to hold lectures: there he became acquainted with the young count of Sales, whom he prevailed upon to leave the law for the church, and who became St. Francis de Sales. After four years spent at Padua, he was called to Rome, where he took some pains in trying to reconcile Henry IV with the papal court; this displeased the Spanish party and his superior, and he was sent to Bologna as rector of the college. He was at Venice when Paul V put the city under interdict; and here was a new case of mediation for the old man. He died at Ferrara Feb. 26, 1611. Among his works are, Del Sacrifìcio dell' Altare (Lyons, 1585, 8vo); Il Soldato Cristiano (Rome, 1569, 12mo), written at Pius V's request, when this pontiff sent troops to Charles IX against the Huguenots; — Moscovita, seu de rebus Moscovitica (Wilna, 1586, 6to; Cologne, 1587–85, fol.; later trans. 1596, 4to; see selecta de ratione Studiorum (Rome, 1592, 12mo; Lyons, 1595, 8vo). The four authors are Le Noue, Jean Bodin, Duplessis-Mornay, and Machiavelli. Possévino was here misled by his zeal against the Protestants; and as to Machiavelli, he is referred to as a heretic. This papal envoy was the author of a vast and selecta de ratione Studiorum (Rome, 1592, 2 vols. fol.; new ed. with correct. and addit., Cologne, 1607, 2 vols. fol.— Apparatus auctor (Venice, 1603–6, 3 vols. fol.; Cologne, 1607, 2 vols. fol.); this is the greatest catalogue of ancient and modern authors that had been seen at that time. Although he had especially in view the interest of the Roman Catholic Church, yet he did not, like Bellarmin, Sixtus of Siena, and others, confine his task to the enumeration of ecclesiastical writers—his plan includes the profane too. He treats of nearly eight thousand writers—their lives, works, influence, editions: — Vita di Ludovico Gossaga, Duce di Nerro, di Eleonora, Duchessa di Mantova (1604, 4to). Possidius, Sr., a prelate of the early Eastern Church, flourished at the close of the 4th and the commencement of the 5th century. He was a disciple of St. Augustine, and lived on intimate terms with him all his life. On being raised in 397 to the episcopal see of Ocriculum, a town near Pula, when Possidius, after a truly triumphal journey, reached Moscow, he found the court in consternation and the czar beside himself: he had killed his son with a blow of his golden sceptre. Five weeks after the conclusion of the peace a conference was held in the Kremlin, when the czar declined the proposal of a fusion of the churches, but consented to the passage of the missionaries, and granted religious freedom to foreign merchants and priests. Post (courant) is the rendering of ἐφέλλω, σφάλας (Sept. ἐσπάρήλωρος, Vulg. cursor, 2 Chron. xxx, 6, 10; Ezech. iii, 13, 15; viii, 10, 14; Job ix, 25; Jer. ii, 31, a runner, or "guard," as elsewhere rendered; a courier or carrier of messages, such as is common in Oriental countries. See Angarevo. The term post is used to indicate primarily the person who conveyed with speed any message; and subsequently the means of regular postal communications. Some writers have thought that the use of posts as a system originated with the Persians. Diodoros Siculus observes that the kings of Persia, in order to have intelligence of what was passing through all the provinces of their vast dominions, placed sentinels at eminences at convenient distances, where towers were built. These sentinels gave notice of public occurrences from one to another, with a very loud and shrill voice, by which news was transmitted from one extremity of the kingdom to another with great expedition. But as this could not be practiced except in the case of general news, which it was expedient that the whole nation should be acquainted with, Cyrus, as Xenophon relates, appointed couriers and places for post-horses, building for the purpose on all the high-roads houses for the reception of the couriers, where they were to deliver their packets to the next, and so on. This they did night and day, so that no incontinency of weather was to stop them; and they are represented as moving with astonishing speed. Herodotus owns that nothing swifter was known for a journey by land. Xerxes, in his famous expedition against Greece, planted posts from the Ξγεαν Sea to Shushan or Susa, to send notice thither of what might happen to his army; he placed also messengers from station to station, to convey his packets, at such distances from each other as a horse might easily travel. The regularity and swiftness of the Roman posts were likewise admirable. Gibbon observes, "The advantage of receiving the earliest intelligence, and of conveying their orders with celerity, induced the emperors to establish throughout their extensive dominions the regular institution of posts. Houses were everywhere erected at the distance only of five or six miles; each of them was constantly provided with forty horses; and by the help of these relays it was easy to travel a hundred miles a day along the Roman roads. In the time of a theodotion or postmaster of a Roman road went by post from Antioch to Constantinople. He began his journey at night, was in Cappadocia (163 miles from Antioch) the ensuing evening, and arrived at Constantinople the sixth day about noon. The whole distance was 725 Roman, or 605 English miles. This service seems to have lasted very laxly performed till the time of Trajan, previous to whose reign the Roman messengers were in the habit of seizing for the public service any horses that came in their way. Some regularity was observed from this time forward, as in the Theodosian code mention is made of post-horses, and orders given for their regulation. Throughout all this period posts were only used on special occasions. Letters from private persons were conveyed by private hands, and were confined for the most part to business of sufficient urgency. Yet the correspondence of ancient times, if we may judge from the immense number of Egyptian, Babylonian, and Persian seals still in existence, must have been far from inconsiderable. The institution of posts disappeared from Europe with the breaking up of the Roman empire, and its re-establishment is generally attributed to Louis XI of France, in the middle of the 15th century.

Post (stationary) is the rendering in the A. V. of the following words:

1. ἄνω, ἄνω (Sept. τὸ ἄνωθεν, Vulg. from), properly a ram (as in Gen. xxv, 9, and often); hence perhaps a pillar or buttress (Ezek. xi, 9-49; xiii, 1, 3; "lintel," 1 Kings vi, 31). In the Sept. it is sometimes left untranslated (אֵל, אֵלָה, אֵלָד); and in the Chaldee version it is represented by a modification of itself. Throughout the passages of Ezekiel in which the Sept. renders the Vulg. uniformly renders it by from: which Gesenius quotes as favorable to his own view, provided that by from be understood the projections in front of the building. The A. V. of 1 Kings vi, 31, "lintel," is supported by the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion of Ezek. xi, 21; while Kimchi explains it generally by "post." The Peshito-Syriac uniformly renders the word by a modification of the Greek παραστάτης, "pillars." Jarchi understands by ἀνω a round column like a large tree; Aquila (Ezek. xii, 1) has, having in view the meaning "ram," which the word elsewhere bears, renders it εἴρημα, apparently intending thereby to denote the volutes of columns curved like rams' horns. J. D. Michaelis (Stepp. ad Lev. s. v.) considers it to be the tympanum or triangular area of the entablature above a gate supported by columns. Gesenius himself, after reviewing the passages in which the word occurs, arrives at the conclusion that in the singular it denotes the whole projecting framework of a door or gateway, including the jambs on either side, the lintel, and architrave, with frieze and cornice. In the plural it is applied to denote the projections along the front of an edifice ornamented with columns or palm-trees, and with recesses or intercolumniations between them sometimes filled up by windows. Under the former head he places 1 Kings vi, 31; Ezek. xi, 9, 21, 24, 26, 29, 31, 33, 34, 36-41, 49; xii, 9, 10, 14, 16; xiii, 1. Another explanation still is that of Böttcher (quoted by Winer, Realbe. ii, 575), who says that αἰσθήσεως is the projecting entrance and passage-wall—which might appropriately be divided into compartments by pilasters: and this view is adopted by Frits (Handb. s. v.). Akin to this is ζύλων, καλλίτον, "an arch," only used in the plur. (Ezek. xi, 16, etc.), probably a portico, and so rendery by Symmachus and Syriac versions (Gesen. Thesaur. p. 48). 2. μηδή, ammdh (Sept. ὠνίστροφον, Vulg. superliminare), literally, mother, or cubit, as the fundamental re- lance in the Temple worship (Isa. vi. 4). 3. μετά, metad (Sept. ἀπ' ἑλίαν, φιλα; Vulg. post- tio), the door-post (the usual term). See Mizuzah. The ceremony of boring the ear of a voluntary bond- man was performed by placing the ear against the door- post of the house (Exod. xxxi. 6); see Juven. Sat. i. 103, and Plaut. Pun. v. 2, 21). The posts of the doors of the Temple were of olive-wood (1 Kings vi. 28). 4. ραφθ, ῥαφθ (Sept. φιλα, πρωτολογος; Vulg. lineam, super- liminare), the threshold (2 Chron. iii. 7; Ezek. xlii. 16; Amos ix. 1; elsewhere "threshold," "door," or "gate"). See Door.

Post, Christian Frederick, a distinguished but somewhat erratic Moravian missionary, was born in 1710 at Conitz, in Polish Prussia. He immigrated to America in 1742. He preached, after his arrival in this country, among the Indians, with whom he was con- nected by marriage, his first wife, Rachel, having been a baptized Wompanoag, and his second wife, Agnes, a baptized Delaware. His earliest missionary labors ex- tended over parts of New England and New York. In 1748 he was one of the Mohawks, and he was arrested on the false charge of being a French spy, sent to New York, and there confined for seven weeks in the jail of the City Hall. His companion, David Zeisberger (q.v.), shared the same lot. The protest of Governor Thomas and other influential Pennsylvanians at last secured their release. After the death of his second Indian wife—his third wife was a white woman—he returned to Europe, and thence, in 1752, sailed to Lab- rador, attempting to bring the Gospel to the Equi- maux. Having come back to Pennsylvania in 1754, he established himself in the Wyo Valley, where he instructed the Indians and entertained travelling missionaries until the breaking out of the French and Indian War. In the course of this war, in the summer of 1758, at the instance of the government of Pennsyl- vania, he undertook a perilous journey through the Indian country as far as Ohio, inducing the Western tribes which were in league with France to bury the hatchet and send deputies to a congress at Easton. This congress resulted in a general pacification, which embraced all the nations except the Twightees. Un- dertaking the business of his first tour, he thereupon visited the Indian country a second time, and induced the Twightees also to conclude peace. Post thus conferred an incalculable benefit upon the colonies, and indirectly helped to bring the North American continent under the sway of the Anglo-Saxon race. The journal of his first tour, which caused a great sensation at the time, was published in London in 1759, in a work entitled An Enquiry into the Causes of the Alienation of the Delaware and Shawnee Indians from the British Interest, etc. It is also found in the Penn. Archives, iii. 520-544. After the war Post began (1761) an in- dependent mission on the Tuscarawas, Ohio. The breaking out of the Pontiac conspiracy compelled him to retire. He went to the South, and in the beginning of 1764 sailed from Charleston to Mosquitia, where he preached to the natives. In 1767 he visited the colo- nies, but returned again to Mosquitia. After that we lose sight of him until 1784, when he is found residing in Germantown, Pa. There he died, April 29, 1785, and was buried in the Lower Graveyard of that place by the Rev. William White (afterwards bishop White), rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia. (E. de S.)

Post, Henry Albertson, a Presbyterian minis- ter, was born in Browning, N. Y., Sept. 2, 1835. He received a careful parental training, enjoyed all the ad- vantages of the academies of New England, and gradu- ated at the New York Free Academy. He studied theology in the Union Seminary, New York, and sub- sequently in the Princeton Seminary, N. J., where he graduated in 1861, and was licensed as a minister of the Church in Warrensburgh, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1860: this was his only charge, for he died Nov. 12, 1861. Mr. Post died in the very midst of his active work; still his short ministry gave full proof of his calling, and many souls were added to the Church. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 306. (J. L. S.)

Post, Reuben, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Lorneville, N. Y., in 1792. He received classical training, and graduated with honor at Middlebury College, Vt., in 1814, and at the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., in 1818. On leaving the seminary, he spent some time as a missionary in Virginia, then accepted a call from the First Presbyterian Church, D. C., and was ordained in 1818. In 1836 he accepted a call from the Circular Church, Charleston, S. C., where he labored faithfully for twenty-three years, when he was taken ill, and died Sept. 24, 1858. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 77. (J. L. S.)

Postel, Guillaume, one of the most learned Frenchmen of his time, is celebrated especially as one of the fathers of the modernius as the true architect of the scriptural chronology. He was born May 28, 1505 (according to some historians, 1510), at Dolerie, near Barenton, in Normandy. He lost his parents early, and poverty compelled him to leave his country. At the age of thirteen years he found at Sacy, near Pontoise, a modest situation in the library of a learned master. He saved his remnant. He went to Paris to pursue his studies. There he was the victim of a robbery, which reduced him to extreme mis- ery, and he was confined by sickness to a hospital for two years. When he was restored to health, his por- verty and the high price of living compelled him to leave Paris, and to support himself by cleaning in the Beauce. Afterwards he entered the College of Sainte-Barbe in the quality of a servant; there he became by private study one of the most learned Hebraists of his time. No less remarkable was his proficiency in the Greek language. He lived successively in Amiens and Rouen, and then went back to Paris to become a tutor. He accompanied La Forest to Constantinople to transact some political business. He went a second time to the capital of Turkey with the heir of a citizen of Tours, who had died leaving 200,000 ducats as a deposit in the hands of Ibrahim Pasha. Postel improved these occasions to study the Arabic language, and brought back with him a number of manuscripts in Arabic and Syriac. The New Testament in Syriac, which he was the first to translate into Latin, was presented by order of the emperor Ferdinand I. Shortly after this Postel published an alphabet in twelve languages, and some other writings. His learning was now acknowledged by king Francis I, and he was given in 1539 a professor- ship of mathematics and Oriental languages, with a salary of 200 ducats, which allowed him much leisure to devote himself to linguistic studies; but he lost his chair when chancellor Poyet, his benefactor, fell into disgrace. Postel thereupon repaired to Vienna, where he helped Job. Alb. Widmanstadt in the publica- tion of his Hebrew treatise in Syriac-Gyrycko. Compelled to leave that city for motives unknown, he was mistaken for a murderer who had some likeness to him, and arrested on the frontier of the Venetian terri- tory. He succeeded in escaping his captors, and went to Rome in 1544. He there made the acquaintance of Ignatius de Loyola and determined to enter the Order of the Jesuits. But the head of the neophyte was full of fantastic ideas, due to the study of the rabbins, and also to the study of the stars. After a two-years' novici- tiate he was expelled from the order, and Ignatius pro- hibited him to inturrupt his studies. Postel, himself, pos- sess in some writings his mystical ideas, he was im- prisoned. Escaping to Venice, he was denounced to the Inquisition, but was dismissed by that tribunal, being considered more a fool than a heretic. He afterwards lived in Genoa and Baze. Beza asserts that Postel offered to abjure his errors and to enter one of the Protestant communities, which seems doubtful. It appears that in 1553 he was a teacher of mathematics at Dijon, when his opinions compelled him again to resign. He lived for some time at the court of the emperor Ferdinand I, whence, after a public abjuration of his opinions, he was recalled to his former situation at the College of France by Francis I, but soon lost it again, and spent the last eighteen years of his life in the monastery of Saint-Martin des Champs. In his old age, says a contemporary, "princes and men of science paid their visits to the venerable recluse at Saint-Martin des Champs, where he lived. He sat there in his chair, his white beard falling down to his girdle; and in his deportment was such a majesty, such gravity in everything he said, that no one ever left him without a wish to see him again, and without astonishment at what he had heard." He died Sept. 6, 1561. It was during his life at the monastery that Postel published in 1572 his ideas about the comet which appeared in them from the direction of the constellation of Orion. The end of the work, he says, was written "Postellus restitutus;" he also maintained that women shall have the dominion over men, and that his writings were revealed to him by Jesus Christ. He was therefore confident of being able to explain by reason and philosophy all Christian dogmas, inclusive of the mysteries, his personal reason having become so superior to that of other men that by its means he would convert all nations to the Christian faith. "Christ has given," he said, "the excellence of faith to the apostles; but faith being now almost extinct, he gave us, and especially to the Catholics, the faith of reason, so powerful and victorious, as never did the apostles have it. And thus innumerable things in the Scripture and in nature, which never were understood, by said victorious reason will be understood." He asserted that the human soul of Christ was created and united with the eternal Word before the creation of the world. He affirmed that everything that was in nature was described in the heavens in Hebrew characters, formed by the arrangement of the stars. The world was to subsist only for 6000 years, an opinion he had taken from the Hebrew sages. The end of the world will be preceded by the restoration of all things into the state they were in before the fall of Adam. He dreamed of the fusion of all religions into one creed; and in his desire to reconcile Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans, undertook to explain the most extravagant opinions. But, whatever judgment we may pronounce on his opinions, justice compels us to recognise that all historians commend the purity of his life, the wisdom of his conduct, and the benevolence of his character; he often neglected his own interests to take care of others. He left, Linguarum XI, libri, alphabetum introductio ac legendi methodos (Paris, 1588, 4to);—De originalibus seu de Hebraicis linguis et gentibus antiquatate aliqua variarum linguarum officiante (ibid. 1588, 4to);—Grammatica Arvica (ibid. 1588, 4to);—Syriae descriptio (ibid. 1540, 8vo);—De magnificatus Atheniensium (Baze. 1543, 8vo);—Leipsic, 1581, 12mo, with the notes of John Frederick Heikelsius:—Alcorami seu legis Mahometi et evangelistarum concordiae liber (Paris, 1548, 8vo);—Sacrorum apodeoron, seu Excidium Christiani libri ii (ibid. 1548);—IV librorum de orbis terrarum concordia prima (ibid. 1548);—Epistolarum Sacram (ibid. 1548, 8vo); in this work Postel endeavored to prove that there is nothing in religion that is not in accordance with nature and reason:—De orbis terrarum concordiae libri ii (Bazeil, 1544, 4vo), it is the best of Postel's works, and expounds with much talent his favorite ideas about the unity of all the nations of the world:—De nativitate Mediatoris ulimo, nunc futura et toti orbis terrarum in singulari ratione pridend manifestanda opus (ibid. 1547, 8vo);—Abecedariorum a constitutione mundi clarus, qua mens humana lata in divini quas in humana rectis ad interiorum eterna veritatis (ibid. 1610; and with appendix, Amat. 1641, 16mo);—Candelabrum typici in Mosis tabernaculo jusue divino expressi interpretatio (Venice, 1548—Hebrew, Latin, and French):—De Etrursa regnima, qua prima in orbe Europae habebat est, originibus, institutis, religionibus, et moribus, quae situ ad mediam Lituorum, ad Monarchiam, et quela Moyena sunt necessariae pro parte (Paris, 1551, 8vo):—Abrahami patriarcarum liber Jebrar, sive formaciones mundi, patribus quidem Abrahami tempora preecessionibus relinquit, etc. (ibid. 1552, 16mo):—De naturali sua orbe natura urbisque (ibid. 1552, 16mo):—Eclaresi futilorum Aristotelis dogmarum (ibid. 1552, 16mo):—L'Histoire mémorable des Expéditions depuis le Déluge, faites par les Gaulois ou Français depuis la France jusques en Asie, ou en Thessalie, et en orientale Partie de l'Europe (ibid. 1562, 16mo):—De Phænomeni liquei, seu de prisci Latini et Graeci liqueo charactere (ibid. 1562, 8vo):—Tabula in astronomiam, in arithmeticum theoriam et in musucum theoriam (ibid. 1552):—La Loi Saliq, lettre de la première humaine Vériq (ibid. 1552, 16mo);—Protophylacus in Atheniis et potissimum orbis Latinlo ad hunc diec incognita aut inconsiderata historia (ibid. 1553, 8vo):—Descriprio Domini (Bazeil, 1582, 8vo):—De Originalis, seu de varia des Gauda (Paris, 1558, fol.):—Signorum celestium vera configuratio et significacionum expositioni (ibid. 1558, 8vo):—La Doctrice du Sàcre dure, ou de l'Églajique or de Sauc Ces de Boros (ibid. 1561, 16mo). Postil

Postil (Latin postilla) originally designated in the ecclesiastical language of mediaeval explanation remarks accompanying the text of the Bible, mostly in the form of words or homilies. The name sprang from the fact that these were usually delivered immediately after the reading of the Gospel, and were explanatory of it. Its etymology is to be found in the words "post illa verba textus" or "sacrum scriptum," the first two words being combined in one, which is used as noun and verb (postilla, postillare). Charlemagne ordered a homiliarium to be composed for the clergy of his empire, in which the pericopes or texts of the Sundays and holydays are followed by a homily from one of the celebrated ancient preachers. This collection was long in use in the German empire, and was often called "Postilla." But the meaning of the word became more comprehensive in the latter part of the Middle Ages, when a running commentary of Scripture was called "Postilla," because the text was first exhibited, and post illa verba textus of the text the comments of the writer. Thus we find "Postillavit evangelia, epistolae Pauli," etc. The most remarkable of these postillas is that of the celebrated exegete Nicolas de Lyra (q. v.), under the title "Postilla perpetua in Biblia," or "Postilla in universa Biblia." Luther, by his well-known "Postilla," introduced a word among the Protestant communions. It is still, but less frequently, employed, and only in the Church of Rome or of England, for collections of sermons connected with the pericopes of Sundays and holydays. See Siegel, Christliche Lehrbucher (see Index in vol. iv); Whedon, On the Book of Common Prayer, p. 272.

Post-Millenialists, the name applied to the large body of Christians belonging to all denominations who believe that the second coming of Christ will not precede, as the Pre-Millenialists allege, but follow after the Millennium (q. v.).

Post-Pride (or the Collectio Post Mysterium or Post Sancta, as it is called in the Gallican office) is the prayer of the Asaphorum (q. v.) of the Mozarab liturgy. Various opinions are entertained regarding the belief of the Eastern Church on the doctrine of the Invocation of the Holy Ghost (q. v.) in the consecration of the Hosts. These opinions are summarized in the following three: (1) That the Eastern Church gives it no effect in the act of consecration, believing that to take place solely, entirely, and properly in the words of institution. (2) That it believes both the words of institution and those of invocation to be coordinate and efficacious to the same end. (3) That the whole force of the consecration is vested in the invocation. (For the history of the controversy, see Neale, Introd. i, 493 sq.). Neale, than whom there is no better authority on the subject, believes "that the sense of the Eastern Church must be thus expressed: The bread and wine offered on the altar are transmuted into the body and blood of Christ by the words of institution, and by the invocation of the Holy Ghost by the Church; and if either of these things be wanting, the Eucharist, so far forth as the orthodox Eastern Church is concerned, is altogether wanton. If, however, the limitation because the Oriental Church has not condemned her Roman sister for the omission of the invocation" (Introd. i, 496).

The Post-Pride varies with the festival on which it is used. Thus, e.g., the prayer said on the first Sunday after Christmas is as follows: "Mindful, O Lord, of thy precepts, we earnestly pray thee that thou wouldst pour forth on these sacrifices the plenitude of thy Holy Ghost, that while we receive them blessed of thee, we may in all ways rejoice that we are filled with all the gifts of benediction, that we have freed from the bonds of our sins. Amen. Through thy gift, holy Lord, forthy word, and the like of all these that they may serve us, thy unworthy servants, sanctify them and quicken them, and bless them, and grant to us that they may be consecrated and offered to thee, the God, to ages of ages, and to God the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, One God, for ever and ever. Amen."

terata error, though he denies it to be more than an opinion held by some members of the Eastern Church, is rather baffled by the Mozarabic office. He tries to prove that it is only to be taken relatively to the receiver, and quotes the Mass for the first Sunday after Christmas: "Be pleased to bless and sanctify to us the gifts," etc. By parity of reasoning it might be argued that the Roman Church only believes in a relative change, because the prayer in the canon runs, respecting the yet unconsecrated bread and wine, "that to us they may become the body and blood of Jesus Christ." The Post-Pride in the Gothic-Hispanic rite seems always to have contained this invocation; but in the mutilation and changes to which that office has been subjected comparatively few masses have retained it in direct terms. The Post-Pride for Easter-day, though not contained in the Hortulanus, has a most remarkable prayer for change: "Ut hic tibi panis cum hoc calice oblatus in Fili in tuus Corpus et Sanguinem, te beneficente, dicescat." This may be profitably compared with the Ximenesan Post-Pride for Corpus Christi: "Omnis tibi reverentia est autem transmutatus in Carmelo, et calix transformatus in, Sanguinium," etc. In some instances the prayer for the descent of the Holy Ghost is changed into a prayer for the descent of Christ; as, for example, in the first (= second) Sunday after Easter: "Christe ... his sacrificis propitiis illibare, bisque beneficentis descende." The corruption sometimes takes a curious turn: thus on July 25 the Post-Pride prays that by the intercession of St. Christopher the offerers may be filled with the Holy Ghost. We may gather on the whole that Ximenes, who (like Bona) must have considered the prayer for any change after the words of institution a detestable error, softened the expression in many cases, and omitted it in many others; though enough is still left to show us what the original design of the prayer was. See Litturgy. (J. H. W.)

Postulate (alrjna, postulatum, that which is asked or assumed to prove something else). "According to some, the difference between axioms and postulates is analogous to that between theorems and corollaries. The former expressing truths which are self-evident, and from which other propositions may be deduced; the latter, operations which may easily be performed, and by the help of which more difficult constructions may be effected." There is a difference between a postulate and a hypothesis. When you lay down something which may be, although you have not proved it, and which is admitted by the learner or the disputant, you make a hypothesis. The postulate, not being assented to, may be contested during the discussion, and is only established by its conformity with all other ideas on the subject.

Postulation (Lat. i. e. an asking) is a term in ecclesiastical law designating a presentation or recommendation addressed to the superior to whom the right of appointment to any dignity belongs, in favor of one who has not a strict title to the appointment. Thus, a chapter elect for bishop a person who was not one of the canonical requirements, or if there is a canonical impediment, the act of the chapter is not properly an election, but a request to the pope for dispensation and admission. It can only take place when the wanted requirements are of a trivial description. It is also used in the case of the presentation of candidates for the episcopacy as it exists in the Roman Catholic Church.
POSTURES are the bodily attitudes assumed in the various parts of divine worship, whether public or private. No act whatever can be performed without the body taking some posture. This is the case in divine worship as well as in matters of less consequence. The one question, therefore, in which all postures are equally appropriate in that worship and in its different departments, is whether all possible postures are equally consistent with the posture: not that the posture of the body be noted, but that the posture of the heart. It was necessary first to work the clay with the feet, to make it plastic (Isa. xi., 25), and then to shape it with the hand (Jer. xvii., 4, 6; Sirach xxxiii., 10; xxxviii., 80) and the Oriental potter’s wheel (חַנֵךְ, Jer. xviii.; see Gesenius, Thesaur., i., 16). The vessels were glazed (Sirach xxxviii., 31; Prov. xxvi., 23), and then burned in the oven (ἐρυθρός, Sirach, i. c.). Bähr (Symbolik, ii., 288) and Sommer (Bild. Abhandl., i., 210) assume, indeed, that the Hebrews were ignorant of glazing, and explain the passages (Lev. vi. 21; xi., 33; xv., 12) which command the breaking of earthen vessels made unclean by this want of glazing. There are, indeed, no pots extant from Egyptian antiquity, but earthen figures show a glazing upon them; and it would be unreasonable to suppose that the Egyptians had failed to apply the art to their vessels. There is nothing inexplicable in the command to break the defiled vessels, insasmuch as they were of little value; and any of them might easily have lost part of its glazing, and so taken in some of the vernacular substance; so that breaking was the safest method of disposing of them. Such a command would also produce more care in housekeeping to avoid uncleanness (comp. Descript. de l’Egypte, vol. ii., pl. 87 sq.; v., pl. 75; Wilkinson, i., 114). See Pottery.

The following are the words so rendered in the English Bible:

1. בִּשְׁנֵה, בֵּן (Sept. Ἰάγγειος), applied to holding oil (2 Kings iv., 2), probably was an earthen jar, deep and narrow, without handles, apparently like the Roman and Egyptian amphora, inserted in a stand of wood or stone (see Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., i., 47; Sandys, Tract. p. 150). See Pitcher.

2. פַּחַת, פַּח (Sept. πότηραυς, Vulg. ephesyus, Jer. xxxx., 5; elsewhere “bowl” or “cup”), probably a bulging jar or bowl for liquids. See Bowl.

3. דַּד, דָּד (Sept. diophos, Job xlii., 20; Ps. li., 6; elsewhere “basket,” “caldron,” “kettle”), a vessel for culinary purposes, mentioned (1 Sam. ii., 14) in conjunction with “caldron” and “kettle,” and so perhaps of smaller size. See Kettle.

4. בֵּית, בֵּית ("potsherds," Job ii., 8; Ps. xxvi., 15; Prov. xxxvi., 23; Isa. xlv., 9; elsewhere “earthen,” etc.), an earthen vessel for stewing or scorching. Such a vessel was used for baking (Exek. iv., 9). It is contrasted in the same passage (Lev. vi., 28) with a metal vessel for the same purpose. See Pottery.

5. כָּלִים, כָּלִים (Sept. coxelos, Lev. vi., 28), a vessel of any kind (as usually elsewhere rendered). See Vessel.

6. כּוֹר, כּוֹר (only once and in the dual, Lev. xii., 35, “ranges for pots”). See Range.

7. מְדִים, מְדִים (Sept. χαλέπιον, Vulg. olea, the most usual and appropriate word, Exod. xxxviii., 3; 2 Kings iv., 38-41; xxv., 14; 2 Chron. iv., 11, 16; xxxvii., 13; Job xlii., 31; Ps. lvii., 9; Eccles. viii. 7; Jer. ii., 13; Ezek. xxiv., 3, 6; Min. iii., 3; Zech. xiv., 10, 21). It is also used, combined with other words, to denote special uses, as with מְדוֹן (Jer. i., 18), “a seething-pot;” with מְדִים, “flesh” (Exod. xvi., 5); מְדִים, “washing” (Ps. ix., 8); מְדִים, “fining-pot” (Prov. xxvii., 21). The blackness which such vessels would contract is added to Joel iii., 6. See Caldron.

8. לוֹעֵפָה, לוֹעֵפָה (Sept. χαλέπιον, Vulg. cocubes, Judg. vi., 19; Sam. ii., 14; “pan,” Numb. xi., 8), apparently an open flat vessel. See Pan.

POTAMIANA

10. Ἀρδή, Ἀρδή, Ἀρδή, Ἀρδή (Sept. Ἀρδής, Πα. lxi, 18; "hooks," Ezek. xi, 45), opposite rows, as of sheeps- folds.
11. Ἐστίας (Mark vii, 8, 9), properly a sextarius or sixteenth part of the medius or "bushel," nearly one pint English; hence a cup generally. See MEASUR. 12. στράγγα (Heb. ix, 4), an earthen jug or jar; = No. 9 above.
13. ἔσωτα (John ii, 6, 7; iv, 28), a "water-pot" for any liquid. The water-pots of Cana appear to have been large amphorae, such as are in use at the present day in Syria (Fischer, Poesis, p. 10; Jolliffe, i, 60). These were of stone or of earthenware but gold, silver, bronze, or copper was also used for vessels both for domestic and also, with marked preference, for ritual use (1 Kings vii, 45; x, 21; 2 Chron. iv, 16; ix, 20; Mark vii, 4; Michaelis, Lives of Moses, § 217, iii, 385, ed. Smith). The water-pot of the Samaritan woman may have been a leather bucket, such as Bedawin women use (Burckhardt, Notes, i, 45). See WATR-POT.

POT, "HOLY-WATER POT" or "HOLY-WATER VASE," and Sprinkle (= sprinkling-brush), are implements used in Roman Catholic churches for sprinkling the altar and priest and any other place with the holy water on Sunday. Holy-water pots, such as is represented in the cut, are from five and a quarter to seven and a half inches in diameter.

Potamiana, a Christian martyr in the time of Severus, in the beginning of the 3d century, was a slave of rare personal beauty; for not reciprocating the passion of her master she was given up as a Christian to the prefect of Egypt. She was scourged; and, unmoved by threats, was led to the fire and burned, together with her mother, Marcella. Scalding pitch was poured upon her body, which she bore with great patience. Balsam, her executioner, embraced Christianity, and suffered martyrdom. See Schaff, Church History, i, 169.

Potamias, an ecclesiastic of Spanish birth, flourished as bishop of Lisbon in the middle of the 4th century; and if the first of the pieces mentioned below be genuine, he must, in the early part of his career, have been a champion of the Catholic faith. Subsequently, however, he was a zealous Arius, and it is believed that he drew up the document known to ecclesiastical history as The Second Sirmian Creed. The writings usually ascribed to Potamias are, Epistola ad Athanasiam Episcopum Alexandrinum de Consolamentuille Filiis Dei, in some MSS. entitled Epistola Potamii ad Atha- nasiuni ab Artonio (impeptum?) posticum in Concilio Ariminensi subreipublici, composed in the year A.D. 355, while the opinions of the author were yet orthodox. The authenticity of this piece, however, which is char- acterized by great obscurity of thought and of expression, and often half barbarous in phraseology, is very doubtful. It was first published by the Benedicite D'Achery, in his Spicilegium rectorum aliquot Scripto- rum (Paris, 1661, 4to), ii, 366, or iii. 299 of the new edition by Baluze (1717, fol.), and will be found in its best form in Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum (Venice, 1769, fol.), v. 12, f. 339. Sermo de Martyrio Episco- Prophetarum. These are two discourses resembling in style the epistle to Athanasius, long attributed to Zeno, bishop of Verona, and published, without suspicion, among his works, until the brothers Belleriuni (S. Zeno- nius Sermones [ibid. 1739, fol.], p. 297). They proved that they must be assigned to Potamias, whom, however, they supposed to be a person altogether different from the bishop of Lisbon, and belonging to a different age. The arguments which they employ to demonstra- te this last position are founded upon the second title of the Epistola ad Athanasianum as given above, but this title is not Schleierm. and others to be the blunder of an ignorant transcriber. THe Sermones will be found in Galland, and the discussions with regard to the real author in the Prolegomena to the volume, ch. x, p. xvii. See Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.; Umbelvsew, Hist. of Philosophy, vol. i; Hinsch, Gesch. der Philosophie, vol. i.

Potamo (Ποτάμω), a Greek philosopher of the Alexandrian school, lived in the 5th century of the Christian era, and was a native of Alexandria. According to Suidas, under Ποτάμως and Ποτάμων, he was a con- temporary of the emperor Augustus; but Porphyry, in his life of Plotinus, states positively that Plotinus del- ighted in listening to Potamo's exposition of a new philosophy, of which he was laying the foundations. What was the purport of this new philosophy? It was developed in two treatises, one of which was a commentary on Plato's Theaicus, the other a treatise on the first principles. See POTAMIANA. Both works are lost; but something is known of the second by a passage of Diogenes Laertius in the introduction to his book On the Life and Doctrines of Illustrious Philosophers. "Of late," says the biographer, "an eclectic school, οἱ εἰκετε-Ποταμίων, are required to discern the truth: that which judges, reason (τὸ γνῶσις), and that by the means of which we judge, i.e. the accurate representation of the objects of our judgments. As to the principles of things, he recognizes four of them- matter, quality, action, and place (ἐντὸς τοῦ ἐν, καὶ τὸ ποιημένον, ποιημένον τι, καὶ τὸ που). In other words, out of what, and by whom, how, and where a thing is done (ἐν τινὶ ποιημένον, ποιημένον τι, καὶ τὸ που, οὕτω τι, καὶ ποιημένον τι), towards which everything should tend, according to him, is a life perfect in virtues, without discarding, how- ever, the good of the body, nor general material inter- ests." It follows from this passage of Diogenes Laertius, combined with the testimony of Porphyry, i.e. that Potamo was the founder of the eclectic school at Rome; 2d, that he combined the doctrines of Plato with the Stoical and Aristotelian, and was not without original views of his own; 3d, that in ethics he attempted a kind of conciliation of Stoicism and Epicureism.—Hoe- fer. But it must be noted that the few followers he had under his rule were his pupils. They were supplanted by the school that endeavored to engratify Christianity upon the older sys- tem of philosophy. See Porphyry, Vita Plotini, e. g. in Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. ii, 109; Diogenes Laertius, Proem. § 21; but especially Brucker, Historia Christianæ Philosophiae, ii, 193 sq.; Glöckner, De Potamiana Acker. Philosophia Ecletica, recensitorum Platonicerum Disciplinæ admodum disiniuti. Disput. (Leips. 1745, 4to), an abstract of which is in Fabricius, iii, 184 sq. For the statement that there were two or three Potamos there is no ground. See the examination of this point in Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. ii, 513.

Potent. Cross, in heraldry, a cross crutch-shaped at each extremity. It is also called a Jerusalem cross, from its occurrence in the insignia of the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem, which are, Argent a cross potent between four crescents or. This coat is re- markable as being a departure from the usual heraldic rule which prohi- bits the placing of metal upon metal.

Potential. Opposed to actual. This antithesis is a fundamental doctrine of the Peripatetic philosophy. "Aristotle saith that divided they (i.e. bodies) be in infinitum potentially, but actually not" (Holland's Ple-Potipherah (Heb. Potiph'rah, פֹּטִיפֶרָה, or Potiph'har, פֹּטִיפֶּרָה, "guardian of wine"; Sept. Ποτιφραθής), an officer of Pharaoh, probably the chief of his body-guard (Gen. xxxix. 1). B.C. c. 1800. Of the Midianitish merchant he purchased Joseph. The keeper of the prison into which the son of Jacob was eventually cast treated him with kindness and confidence in the management of the prison (Gen. xxvii, 36; xxxix, 1); and this confidence was afterwards sanctioned by the "captain of the guard" himself, as the officer responsible for the safe custody of prisoners of state (Gen. xi, 5, 4). It is sometimes denied, but more usually maintained, that this "captain of the guard" was the same with the Potipher who is before designated by the same title. It is possible that this "captain of the guard" and Joseph's master were the same person. It would be in accordance with Oriental usage that offenders against the court, and the third persons of officers of state, should be in custody of the captain of the guard; and that Potipher should have treated Joseph well after having cast him into prison is not irreconcilable with the facts of the case. After having imprisoned Joseph in the first transport of his choler, he might possibly discover circumstances which led him to doubt his guilt, if not to be convinced of his innocence. The mantle left in the hands of his mistress, and so triumphantly produced against him, would, when calmly considered, seem a stronger proof of guilt against her than against him; yet still, to avoid the dishonor of exposing the presence of the Antichrist. In 1802 he published in Latin an Explanation of the Psalms of David (Augsburg, 1860). Under the empire two of his pamphlets against the four articles of the Gallican Council were confiscated by the police. Pothier died at Rheims June 23, 1812.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog., Générale, v.

Pothinus, Sr., a prelate of the Church in the 2nd century, who died a martyr, was probably born at Smyrna in A.D. 67. He was a disciple neither of Peter nor of John, as some writers have asserted, but of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna. He went to Rome with the latter and was admitted into the company of Anicetus (whom he succeeded as bishop in 158) and was sent by that pontiff to evangelize the Gauls. Pothinus established himself at Lyons, and founded there a flourishing Church. He had presided over twenty years when, in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, the persecutions against the Christians broke out with renewed fury. His extreme age did not protect the bishop from persecution. He was brought before the governor, and was asked who was the God of the Christians. "If you are worthy," said the old bishop, "you will know him." He was severely beaten, and dragged, half dead, to a dismal dungeon, where he died two days afterwards, June 2, 177. At the same time with the apostle of Lyons, forty-seven faithful sealed their faith with their blood. These were the first martyrs of the Gauls: their remains were buried beneath the altar of a church built under the invocation of the holy apostles, now consecrated to St. Niixer. The Church celebrates on June 2 the memory of the martyrs of Lyons. Their history was written in Greek, in the name of the faithful of the churches of Lyons, and attributed to Irenæus, successor of Pothinus. It is one of the most precious monuments of the first centuries of Christianity. We owe its preservation to Eusebius, who inserted it partly in his Hist. Eccles. (lib. v, cap. i).—Hoefer, Nouv. Pothos (Ποθός), a personification among the ancient Greeks of love or desire, and usually regarded as a companion of Aphrodite.
Potrimpos is the name of an important deity of the Lithuanian and ancient Prussians previous to the conquest of their country by the Teutonic Order; the second person in the Northern trial—Perkunas, Potrimpos, and Tautie—was he who granted the blessing of victory in war and fertility in time of peace; he also dispensed the biles of domestic happiness. His image stood in a cavity of the holy oak at Romowe; it looked smilingly at Perkunas, and represented, as far as the rough art of those times would allow, the features of a cheerful youth. It was the sight of this image of victory in stroying fire, Potrimpos was the god of the feeculating and devastating water. Corn and incense were the offerings he preferred; a wreath of ears adored his head. But he was not always content with these unlooby sacrifices: sometimes children had to be immolated in his honor, and reduced to ashes in burning wax. A snake was kept in his honor in an urn of clay, fed with milk, and always covered with ears of corn. For this reason the snake was a holy animal among the ancient Prussians. Warriors, marching to the bloody encounter, if they chanced to meet a serpent, fancying they beheld in it Potrimpos himself, were hopeful of his assistance, and thought themselves invincible. When a solemn sacrifice was to be offered to him, the priests remained three days stretched on the ground, fasting, and at intervals throwing little rice into the fire, the smoke of which did not appear that particular places, lakes and woods, were consecrated to him, nor can any trace of the expansion of his worship into other countries be ascertained, unless we admit with Mone that he is one person with the phallic field-god Priag worshipped at Upsala; but this is very doubtful. Some modern historians assert that it was a female deity, the wife of the thunder-god; they assimilate him with the mother of the gods mentioned by Tacitus as solemnly worshipped by the Eastians. See Anderson, Northern Mythology, a. v.

Potsherd (παρθήρδη, cheres, from the root παρθείνειν, to scrape or scratch; Sept. παρθείνειν; Vulg. testa, ras feriali; "sherd" in two places, once "stone," often "earth vessel"); a bit of potter's ware (Job li. 8), is figuratively used in Scripture to denote a thing worthless and insignificant (Psa. xxii, 15; Prov. xxvi, 23; Is. xlv, 9). It may illustrate some of these allusions to remind the reader of the fact that the sites of ancient towns are often covered at the same time with quantities of broken pottery, usually of coarse texture, but coated and protected with a strong and bright-colored glaze, mostly bluish-green, and sometimes yellow. These fragments give some to of the most venerable spots of the ancient world the appearance of a deserted pottery rather than of a town. The fact is, however, that they occur only upon the sites of towns which were built with crude brick; and this suggests that the heaps of ruin into which these had fallen being disintegrated, and worn at the surface by the action of the weather, bring to view and leave exposed the broken pottery, which is not liable to be thus dissolved and washed away. It is certainly remarkable that of the more mighty cities of old time, nothing but potsherds now remain visible at the surface of the ground. Towns built with kiln-burnt bricks do not exhibit this form of ruin, which is therefore not usually met with in Palestine. See Potsherd.

Pott, David Julius, D.D., a German theologian, was born at Embeckhausen, in Hanover, in 1760. In 1787 he was appointed professor of theology at Helmstedt, from which place he removed to occupy the same chair at Halle. Here he, with Ruperti, edited the Syllage Commentationum Theologicarum (8 vols. 1800-7), and afterwards at Gottingen undertook, as joint continuator with Heinrich, an edition of Koppe's Testamentum Novum, a commentary on the Catholic epistles (1810-10). He died about 1826. See Ilgen, Zeitschrift für historische Theologie, 1868, p. 568.
Pott, Joseph Holden, an English divine, noted especially as a Biblical scholar, was born about 1759, and was educated at Eton and at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1780, M.A. in 1783; was made prebendary of Lincoln in 1786; rector of St. Olave, Jewry, and St. Martin, Frommougers Lane, in 1787; archdeacon of St. Albans in 1789; rector of Little Burstead, Essex, in 1797; rector of Northall, Middlesex, in 1806; vicar of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields in 1813; archdeacon of London in 1813; prebendary of London in 1822; vicar of Kensington in 1824, and chancellor of Essex in 1826. He died in 1847. This exemplary divine published many separate sermons, collections of sermons, charges, theological treatises, and in early life some poems, etc., for a list of which we refer the reader to the Lmd. Gent. Mag. Aug. 1847, p. 210-12, see also p. 635. Pottage (יוֹטָר, nāzīd, something boiled; Gen. xxv. 29, 84). The red pottage for which Esau profanely bartered his birthright was prepared, as we learn from this chapter, by seething lentils in water [see Lustil]; but the common pottage in the East, at the present day, is made by cutting their meat into little pieces, and boiling them with flour, rice, and parsley, all which is afterwards poured into a proper vessel. See Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 397.

Potter (יוֹטָר, yôtér, a fashioner; Chald. pēcher, ἔσσημα). This artificer, and the produce of his labour, are often alluded to in the Scriptures. The fragility of his ware, and the ease with which they are destroyed, supply apt emblems of the facility with which human life and power may be broken and destroyed. It is in this figurative use that the vessels are most frequently noticed in Scripture (Psa. ii, 9; Isa. xxxi, 14; Jer. xix, 11; Rev. i, 27). In one place, the power of the potter to form with his clay, by the impulse of his will and hand, vessels either for honorable or for mean uses, is employed with great force by the apostle to illustrate the absolute power of God in moulding the destinies of men according to his pleasure (Rom. ix, 21). The first distinct mention of earthenware vessels is in the case of the pitchers in which Gideon's men concealed their lamps, and which they broke in pieces when they withdrew their lamps from them (Judg. vii, 16, 19). Pitchers and bottles are indeed mentioned earlier; but the "bottle" which contained Hagar's water (Gen. xxi, 14, 15) was undoubtedly of skin; and although Rebekah's pitcher was possibly of earthenware (xxiv, 14, 15), we cannot be certain that it was so. The potter's wheel is mentioned only once in the Bible (Jer. xviii, 2); but it must have been in use among the Hebrews long before the time of that allusion; for we now know that it existed in Egypt before the Israelites took refuge in that country (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, iii, 165, large ed.). The art of pottery is one of the most common and most ancient of all manufactures. The modern Arab culinary vessels are chiefly of wood or copper (Niebuhr, Jog., i, 180). The processes employed by the Hebrews were probably not in any way dissimilar to those of the Egyptians, from whom the use of the wheel may be supposed to have been adopted. They had themselves been concerned in the potter's trade in Egypt (Psa. lxxxi, 6). The clay, when dug, was trodden by men's feet so as to form a paste (Isa. xxii, 25; Wisd. xv, 7) [see Barck]; then placed by the potter on the wheel beside which he sat, and shaped by him with his hands. It consisted of a wooden disk placed on another larger one, and turned by the hand by an attendant, or worked by a troddle (Isa. xlv, 2; Jer. xviii, 18; Ecclus. xxxviii, 23, 30; see Tenant, Ceylon, i, 492). The vessel was then smoothed and coated with a glaze, and finally burned in a furnace (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, ii, 108). We find allusions to the potsherds, i.e. broken pieces of vessels used as crucibles, or burnt by the furnace, and to the necessity of keeping the latter clean (Isa. xxx, 14; xlv, 9; Job ii, 8; Psa. xxii, 16; Prov. xxxvi, 23; Ecclus. xxxviii, 29). The materials, forms, and manufacture of earthenware vessels are still very similar throughout Western Asia, and are also the same which were ancietly in use. This we know from the comparison of ancient paintings and sculptures with modern manufactures, as well as from the vast quantities of broken pottery which are found upon the sites of ancient cities. The ancient potters "frequently kneaded the clay with their feet, and after it had been properly worked up, they formed it into a mass of convenient size with the hand, and placed it on the wheel, which, to judge from that represented in the paintings, was of very simple construction, and turned with the hand. The various forms of the vases were made by the finger during the revolution; the handles, if they had any, were afterwards affixed to them; and the devices and other ornamental parts were traced with a wooden or metal instrument, previously to their being baked. They were then suffred to dry, and for this purpose were placed on planks of wood; they were afterwards arranged with great care on trays, and carried, by means of the usual yoke, borne on men's shoulders, to the oven" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, ii, 107 sq.; Birch, Hist. of Pottery, i, 152; Sandlschitz, Archäol., c. Hebr., i, 14, 11). For a description of pottery as now, and from ancient times, practiced in Palestine, see Thomson, Land and People, ii, 291 sq. Earthen vessels were used, both by Egyptians and Jews, for various purposes besides culinary. Dregs were kept in them (Jer. xxxiii, 14). Tiles with patterns and writing were common both in Egypt and Assyria, and were also in use in Palestine (Ezek. iv, 1). There was at Jerusalem a royal establishment of potters (1 Chron. iv, 33), from whose employment, and from the fragments cast away in the process, the Potter's Field perhaps received its name (Isa. xxx, 14). Whether the term "potter" (Zech. xi, 18) is to be so interpreted may be doubted, as it may be taken for "artificer" in general, and also "treasurer," as if the coin mentioned were to be weighed, and perhaps melted down to be recoined (Geisen. Theur. p. 619). See CLAY.

POTTER, Alonso, D.D., LL.D., bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in the town of Bleeckman (now La Grange), Dutchess County, N. Y., July 10, 1800. His parents, who belonged to the Society of Friends, were country-people of good blood, honestly devoted to the best interests of home and friends. They were remarkably well educated for their times and surroundings, and highly esteemed in the vicinity. After securing a good elementary training at the district school, Alonso went, at twelve years of age, to an academy in Poughkeepsie, and three years after was admitted to Union College, where he at once took the highest rank in his class. Upon the completion of his college course he connected himself with the Episcopal Church, and soon after decided to prepare for holy orders in that communion. He commenced his theological studies under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Samuel H. Turner, but before Potter was one-and-twenty years old he reluctantly accepted the appointment of tutor in his alma mater. Within a twelvemonth he was promoted to the professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy, and at the age of twenty-three first appeared in print as the author of a treatise on Logarithms, which is said to have been a highly creditable performance. In 1827, after a three years' tour in Europe, in which his studies for the ministry, was admitted to deacon's orders by bishop Hobart, and was advanced to the priesthood by bishop Brownell in 1824. In the year 1826 he quitted the college to become rector of St. Paul's Church, Boston, a position in which he gained a wide influence by the simplicity and earnestness of his character, the fidelity of his ministrations, and the contagious fervor of his religious sympathies. The preaching of Dr. Potter opened a new era. With no spirit of dogmatism or controversy, he set forth the cardinal doctrines of the Church, appealing more to the intellect and the heart, and drawing many within a new circle of religious associations. "He was always ready," says his biographer, "to aid in promoting the interests of education and sound learning. He was an advocate of scientific pursuits. He gave his influence both by precept and example to the cause of temperance. Each of these subjects he advanced with great ability, sometimes by a course of public lectures, sometimes by a written discourse, but more frequently in an expository sermon on all which may be employed with apparent success. His engagements in these various departments, with his incessant parochial duties, constituted a vast amount of labor too great to be borne for a long time. Exhustion from this amount of work, together with other causes not under his control, compelled him to resign his rectory in 1831. No man more deeply loved by the people of his charge, or mourned with a deeper sorrow when he left them. Taken in all its aspects, his ministry in Boston was a marked success. It gave an impetus to vital religion which is still felt and will extend to the distant future." In 1831 Dr. Potter accepted the chair of moral and intellectual philosophy in Union College, which was urged upon him as soon as it was known that he would consent to sever his pastoral relations. He at once identified himself with the college as one who looked for nothing beyond it. He applied himself to study and instruction with the cheerful earnestness which was an attribute of his nature. He was eminently a teacher, calling out the power of thought and language in his pupils and exciting their own. He was distinguished for his rare power of analysis, and the fidelity of reasoning which it was rare to find in expression. He had a wonderful power of impressing himself upon those with whom he had to do. He trans fused himself into their nature, took possession of their minds and wills, and imbued them with his own ideas and principles of action. In 1838 was appointed vice-president of the college, and, with the advanced age of Dr. Nott, who had become his father-in-law, Dr.
Potter naturally took a leading share in the administration. He had an inborn aptitude for government, and, though more rigid and uncompromising in his measures than President Nott, understood the art of graciously blending suavity with decision. On the suspension of Bishop H. U. Underdonk (q. v.) in 1844, and after a protracted controversy, the support of the Baptist press, the influence of Dra. Bowman and Tyng, Dr. Potter was elected bishop of Pennsylvania on May 23, and consecrated in the month of September of the same year. Henceforth his life is thoroughly identified with the interests of the Church he served. Says Bishop Stevens:

"His ideas of the office and work of a bishop was very high: regarding him not merely as an ecclesiastical officer, but as one who, from his position and opportunities and his work as a whole, was fitted to guide and surround him, of guarding that Church and shaping great institutions of charity or learning, moulding the clergy and being a leader of the laity of God in its attacks upon the stronghold of sin, Satan, and death. Few men cared less for the honors of the episcopate; few read the office more as an instrument of largest good, and, as a necessary consequence following the divine law of God, who has said, "Thee have I made a little lower than the angels, but crown him with glory and honor." He made no show of power; it rather emanated from him than was wielded by him." —Funeral oration.

By his prudence and discretion he fused together elements which were in conflict with each other. He inaugurated great schemes of Christian benevolence and education, and carried them forward to almost complete success. He was diligent in cultivating all portions of the diocese, laboring when he should have been resting, and not sparing himself when the peculiar exigencies of the church called on him to pause and recruit. Although endowed with an admirable physical constitution, he was at length compelled to abstain entirely from intellectual exertion, and decided to accept an invitation from the Pacific Steamship Co. to take passage on one of their vessels and visit St. Francisco by the way of the Strait of Magellan. He arrived in the harbor of that city on the 1st of July, 1865, but was already prostrate with a fever which he had contracted by landing on the Isthmus and passing a night at Aspinwall, and was too weak to be removed from the ship. He died July 4th.

Sincerely attached to the Church in which he held a position of eminent honor and dignity, bishop Alonso Potter was singularly free from ecclesiastical prejudice and narrowness. He was a man of no less conspicuous mark as a churchman than as a scholar. He was a friend of wholesome reforms, without the tenacious adherence to the past which dreads the progress of light in novel manifestations. He was a patriot of the purest type, a man of the antique virtue which seasoned our republic with salt in the days of her noblest development. In the darkest hours of our great national struggle he was always decided and hopeful. He took strong ground in behalf of the government, and never cherished a doubt of the justice or the success of the national cause. From his youth he took a lively interest in the welfare of the African race, and was a minister to recognize the manhood of the negro and his claims to advancement to a higher sphere, and he was forced to a public declaration of these principles in order to silence the pro-slavery assumptions of bishop Hopkins of Vermont. The zeal, however, with which he labored in these observations for the extension of equal rights to all orders and conditions of men, was no sudden impulse of feeling, but a conviction which was formed in his early days, and strengthened by subsequent experience and reflection. His friends, which extended to a large circle, was due, in a great measure, to his weight of character, rather than to any extraordinary brilliancy of intellectual endowment. He possessed talents of a solid and masculine line. His mind was eminently discriminating, clear in its perceptions, and sound in its deductions. He had great powers of reasoning, his judgment was always unerring, and his habits of thought remarkable for justness and accuracy. His gifts of imagination were subordinate to the intuitive and logical faculty. He never sought to produce illusions by the pomp of words, but to generate convictions by the power of argument and illustration. But it was the singular prolixity of his nature, the temperate candor of his judgment, and the purity and elevation of his purposes which inspired such universal confidence in his character, and gave him such marked eminence among the eminent men of his day. Bishop Potter was especially identified with the organization of the Episcopal hospital of the Episcopal Church and the establishment of the Divinity School of the Church in Philadelphia. He published, The Principles of Science applied to the Domestic and Mechanic Arts (1841): Political Economy (1841) — Hand-Book for Readers and Students (1847) — Resources, Changes, Addresses, etc. (1858) — Religious Philo-sophy (1870)—Plan of Temperance Organization for Cities: and, with Geo. B. Emerson, The School and Schoolmaster (1844), which was widely distributed, especially in New York and Massachusetts, and greatly aided the cause of popular education. He edited six vols. of Harper's "Family Library.": Wilks's Christian Essays (1825); Maria James's Poems (1839), and Fifteen Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity by Clergy-men of the Protestant Episcopal Church (1835, 8vo).

Between his death and the last week in February, "Lowell Institute Lectures" on subjects connected with natural theology. Of these efforts bishop Stevens takes occasion to say:

"As a philosopher he would have been known with a European reputation had he published but one of the unprinted sermons of his. But this is not the case. I refer to his 'Lowell Institute Lectures.' These lectures showed that he had studied deeply the physiology and psychology of man, that he comprehended the forms of philosophy, and the profound ethics of the old masters of the art. They evinced the depth and comprehensiveness of his knowledge, and his ability in grappling with the great questions that grow out of man's relations to God, to men, and to a fallen world. They were full of thought, calm and logical reasoning, expressed with most aphoristic terseness, illuminated by the most apt and forcible illustrations, and rose at times to a degree of eloquence which, even as read in the printed pages of a newspaper report, makes the mind glow and tingle with delight. These sixty lectures, ranking in the public mind as among the best of the many good ones which that infatuation has poured forth, were delivered from a written page, and only occasionally did he use brief notes to guide his course."

Potter, Barnabas, an English divine of note, was born in Westmoreland in 1578. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he was first chosen a scholar, then a fellow, and afterwards provost. After leaving college, he was for a time lecturer at Abington and at Totnes, in Devonshire. In the following year he determined to emigrate to Virginia to be a minister of the gospel and the pastor at Devonshire. He was next unanimously elected provost of Queen's College, and also made chaplain-in-ordinary to prince Charles, and was called at court "the penitential preacher." He held this position for ten years, and was then called to the former charge at Devonshire. King Charles, who held him in high esteem, promptly nominated him bishop of Carlisle, in 1628. In the episcopate he was a man of few words, and a very affecting preacher; his custom was to write his sermons in parts and commit them to memory. He was a close student, and possessed a remarkable memory. He became very proficient in the Hebrew language. He preached at Westminster, and so strongly did he attack the corruptions which had sprung into the Church that he was censured as popeish; and this accusation, it is said, he took so much to heart that he fell sick and died, in 1642. He published, The Baronel's Burial (Oxford, 1618), a sermon — Easter Tu-day, another sermon: — Lectures on some Chapters of Genesis. See Wood, Athenae Oxoni.; Fuller, Worthies of

Potter, Christopher, D.D., a learned English Arminian divine, nephew of the preceding, was born in Westmoreland about 1591. He was admitted to Queen's College, Oxford, in 1606, where he took, in due time, both the degrees in arts and divinity. He was first made fellow of the college in 1626 successively on his uncle's in the provostship of his college. Though a zealous puritanic preacher, he became at length an adherent of Laud.
In 1628 he preached a sermon at Ely House upon the consecration of his uncle, who, "tho' a thorough-paced Calvinist," says Wood (Athen. Oxoni.), was made bishop of Carlisle by the endeavors of Laud. In 1633 Christopher Potter published, An Answer to a late Popish Pamphlet entitled Charity Mistaken," which he wrote
by the special order of Charles I, whose chaplain he was.
In 1636 he was promoted to the deanery of Worcester, and in 1640 became the vicar-chancellor of Oxford, in the execution of which office he met with some trouble from the members of the Long Parliament. Upon the break-ning-out of the civil wars he sent all his plate to the king, and declared that he would rather, like Diogenes, drink out of his hat than that his majesty should want; and he afterwards suffered much for the royal cause. He was nominated to the deanery of Durham January, 1646; but was prevented from being installed by his death, which happened at his college in the March following. He was learned, and of exemplary life and conversation. He published, Father Paul's Hist. of the Quarrels of Pope Paul V with the State of Venice (Lond. 1626, 4to.); — Sermons (1629, 8vo.); — Want of Charity (Oxf. 1635, 12mo.); to this publication refrence was made above: — Indication of Myself touching the Doctrine of Predestination (1651, 12mo, and often since). See Hook, Eccles. Bioq. viii, 135; Fuller, Worthies of Westmoreland; Allibone, Dict. of Brit, and Amer.
Authors, s. v. (J.H.W.)

Potter, Francis, an English divine, was born in 1594 at Myre, in Wilts, and was educated at Trinity College, Oxford. He took holy orders, and, after successively holding various preferments in 1627 was rector of Kilmington. He died in 1678. He was a man of learning and mechanical ingenuity. He published, An Interpretation of the Number 666, etc. (Oxf. 1642, 4to.; lat in, translated by Thomas Gibbet and others, 1668, 8vo.; also translated into French and Dutch).
It was attacked by Rev. Lambert Morehouse, to whom Potter wrote a reply; but neither the attack nor reply was ever published. A great authority (Joseph Mede) thus commends Potter's Interpretation:
"This discourse of the Number of the Beast is the happiest that ever yet came into the world, and such as cannot be read (save of those that perhaps will not be believe it) without much admiration." See Athen. Oxoni.; Aubrey's MSS., in Letters of Eminent Persons (1813, 3 vols.)—General Dictionary; Walker, Sufferings of the Clergy.

Potter, Isaiah, a Congregational minister, was born at Plymouth, Conn., in 1746. He was educated at Yale College, class of 1767, studied theology with Dr.
Smalley, of Berlin, Conn., and was the first settled minister at Lebanon, N. H., from July 6, 1772, to his death, July 2, 1817. He published some occasional Sermons.

Potter, John, an Anglican prelate of much note, was born in 1574 of very humble parentage. He was,
however, given all the educational facilities as if of superior rank, and, manifesting a more than usual aptitude for study, was sent at fourteen to the University College of Oxford; took the degree of B.A. in 1602, and in 1609, of A.M. In his college days he made great attainsments in classical learning, and, though still very young, was encouraged by Dr. Char-leste, the master of University College, to publish in 1604 a collection which he had made of various readings and notes on Plutarch's treatise De Ambitione Poetis, a work which he followed soon after by various readings and notes on an octavo (J.H.W.)

Potter's greater works appeared soon after: his edition of Ly-cophron, and his Archiologia Graecae (1697), the former gaining him a world-wide reputation. In 1638 he entered into holy orders, and from that time his studies appear to have been almost exclusively of a professional kind, and he passed from one preferment in the Church to other, till at last he reached the highest dignity. Archibishop Tenison made him his chaplain, and gave him
the living of Great Mongeham in Kent, and subsequently other preferment in Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire. He became chaplain to Queen Anne and regius professor of divinity in the University of Oxford in 1708. In the same year he published an excellent edition of the works of Clemens Alexandrinus (2 vols. fol.). His other publications were Sermonata and Chragges, and A Subsequent Discourse on the Nation of Basii. In 1718
he was made bishop of Oxford, and in 1737 archbishop of Canterbury, which high station he supported with much dignity to the time of his death, Oct. 21, 1747. His theological works were published at Oxford (1753, 8 vols. 8vo.). Bishop Potter was a man of the highest industry, but hardly a great scholar: a compiler rather than an original investigator, and hence his works are of little value in our day. As an ecclesiastical he was haughty and overzealous, as well as excessively narrow.

Potter, John W., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Beaver Co., Pa., July 30, 1802. He was the child of pious parents, and early made a profession of religion. He graduated in Jefferson College, Camen-bor, Pa., in 1859; studied divinity at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa.; was licensed by Allegheny City Presbytery; and, after supplying some churches for a time, he accepted a call to the Church of Plains, Pa., and was ordained and installed Sept. 8, 1863. Subsequently he was earnestly solicited, and, after prayerful consideration, consented to take charge of Fairmount Church, Pa., in connection with that of Plains, which relation existed till he died, June 10, 1886. Mr. Potter was a favorite pastor and an excel-ent preacher; his preaching was powerfully scriptural.
He always carefully prepared his sermons. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 191. (J.L.S.)

Potter, Robert, an Anglican divine, noted somewhat as a poet, was born in 1721; was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and was for some years
vicar of Scarning, after which he obtained the livings of Lowestoft and Keswick, and a prebend in the Cathedral of Norwich. He died in 1804. His original poetry consists of a volume of Poems, and two Odes from Isaiah (a translation of The Oracle concerning Babylon and The Song of Exultation), and is much above mediocity. But he is best known by his spirited versions of Kekulychus, of Arion and Euripides. He is noted for A Sermon on the Thanksgiving for the Peace (1802).

Potter's Field (πυρες τοιον εκποµενων; Vulg. ope figulis), a piece of ground which, according to the statement of Matthew (xxvii, 7), was purchased by the priests with the thirty pieces of silver rejected by Judas, and converted into a burial-place for sinners coming to the city. In the narrative of the Acts (i, 18, 19) the purchase is made by Judas himself, and neither the potter's field, its connection with the priests, nor its ultimate application is mentioned. That Matthew was well assured of the accuracy of his version of the Biblical history, the occurrence of the potter's field is given as a fulfillment of an ancient prediction. What that predic-

Potter, Francois, a French missionary, was born at Loche in 1718. He was educated at Paris in the Seminary of Saint-Ésprit. In 1758 he was sent as a missionary to the countries of Western China. His zeal was rewarded with the apostolic vicariate of Tsz-chouan, and subsequently honored with the title of bishop in 1783. He visited the Chen-si (more to the north), and there made more than sixty thousand proselytes. He died Sept. 28, 1792.

Potter wrote several letters on his peregrinations in the Celestial Empire. They abound in curious information about the principal Chinese provinces, about Southern Tartary, and even Tibet. He describes the mountain-ranges of Sine-Ling, in which he often found a refuge in times of persecution. There is little flattery for the Chinese in his account of their manners, but he thinks that they are not incorrigible. It is to be regretted that Potter neglected altogether to give information about the natural history of those countries. His purpose was to write a journal of his life and of the progress of Romanism, rather than a work useful to the learned.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. See Saint-Martin, Éloge de M. F. Potter: Nouvelles Lettres édifiantes, vol. iii.

Potts, George, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., March 15, 1802. In his father's family he enjoyed some of the best opportunities for forming his mind and heart. These were derived not only from parental counsels and instructions, but also from the frequent presence in his father's hospitable dwelling of refined Christian society. He had a good training for college, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1819. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed even before graduation in 1823, and ordained as an evangelist Oct. 7, 1828; was pastor of a Church in Natchez, Miss., 1823-85; of the Duane Street Church, New York, 1836-44; and of the University Place Church from 1845 till his death, Sept. 15, 1864. Dr. Potts was an eminent preacher. He was a man of fine presence, and possessed of great oratorical abilities. But his aim in preaching was practical rather than doctrinal; his style full, and bordering on the figurative; his executive ability was remarkable. He engaged at one time in a controversy with the Rev. Dr. Wainwright, on the rites and discipline of the Episcopal Church, in a pamphlet entitled No Church But a Bishop. Strongly argued, the doctrines of his own Church, and laboring zealously for the promotion of its interests, yet he ever cherished the most kindly and fraternal feelings for the followers of Christ in every communion. He was, during his ministry, connected with various literary, scientific, and religious institutions, and rendered efficient service in the cause of humanity. He published single Sermons, Addresses, Letters, etc. (1826-54), and contributed two Discourses to The National Preacher, The Character of Jesus to Dr. Wainwright's Women of the Bible, and Introductions to Potts's Mary, Nos. 1 and 2. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1886, p. 161; Appleton's Ann. Cyclop., 1864, p. 680; Wainwright, Women of the Bible: Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. s. v. (J. L. S.)

Potts, John, an eminent minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, flourished near the opening of this century. He began to preach in 1812 within the bounds of the Philadelphia Annual Conference, of which body he became a member in the following year. For a quarter of a century he continued in this connection, filling many of the most important posts, and always giving great satisfaction. He died Sept. 22, 1837, after a long and very painful illness. Mr. Potts was a man of varied talent, an efficient business man, an able and dignified presiding officer, a useful pastor, and a successful preacher.—Minutes of Conference, ii. 577.

POU DE LOGOI

Oct. 13, 1802. His early education was limited. After learning the printer's trade in Philadelphia, he finally, in 1825, entered the Princeton Theological Seminary, which ill-health, the result of too close application to his studies, compelled him to leave in November, 1827. He returned to Philadelphia in 1828, and went to St. Louis, laboring on the way as opportunity offered, and was finally ordained and installed pastor of the only Presbyterian Church then in St. Louis, Oct. 26, 1828. Here he labored faithfully and successfully for the extension of the Church until, Mar. 12, 1830, on account of ill-health, he was elected president of that institution by the trustees in 1835, and entered at once upon this new field of labor. After four years of intense labor, the success of the enterprise not being equal to his expectations, he accepted another call to St. Louis. In 1841 his health obliged him to travel, and he went to Europe, whence he returned in October of the same year, greatly invigorated. Early in 1852 sickness compelled him to discontinue his labors, and he died March 26, 1852. He published a large number of occasional Sermons, Addresses, and controversial pamphlets. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 723.

POU de logoi (Ποῦ δὲ λόγοι τριτέροτες) is the beginning of one of Gregory of Nazianzen's (q. v.) hymns, which he probably composed during the eight years that he spent in retirement. "When his work was done, he went into the Church of the Apostles to rest. And father, mother, brother, and sister, all were dead. In the depths of its natural fears, and the firmness of the hope to which at last it rises, it tells the history of those solitary years, and echoes well the music of those ancient psalms which soar so often "out of the depths" into the light of God." (Mrs. Charles H. Du Bose.) The text does not allow us to give this beautiful hymn, of which the first stanza runs thus in Mrs. Charles's translation:

"Where are the winged words? Lost in the air.
Where the fresh flower of youth and glory lie?
That which is now well-knit limbs? Wilt thou bow by care.
Wealth? Plunder'd; none possess but God alone.
Where those dear parents who my life first gav'e
And where that holy twain, brother and sister? In the grave."

Fouquet, Antoine, a French Benedictine monk, was born in 1550 in the diocese of Béziers. He entered the Congregation of St. Maur in 1764, and devoted himself to the study of mathematics, in which he is said to have been very proficient, although he published nothing about that science. He was a professor of the Sacred Scripture, and taught distinguished pupils, among others Dom Guiraud. While teaching this language, he composed a very easy method, under the title Institutiones linguae Hebrewae. The work was not printed, but there are numerous copies of it. Fouquet published in collaboration with Mfonçois, the Latin translation of a volume of Analecta Graeca (1688, 4to). He made, together with Dom Martianay, an edition of the works of Jerome, called the edition of the Benedictines (Paris, 1592-1706, 5 vols. fol.), of which he directed alone the fifteen volumes. He died at Bordeaux Oct. 14, 1709.—Hoef. Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. a. See Le Cerf, Bibl. des Auteurs de la Congrég. de St. Maur; Fisquet, Biog. (éditée) de l'Hérault.

Fouquet, Bertrand de, a French cardinal, was born in 1280 at Le Pouget, now the commune of Aynac. If we may believe Villani and Petrarch, it was rumored in 1307 that he was the son of John XXII, who was born in the same diocese (Cabos); others affirm that the pope was his uncle. A simple deacon of Castelnaud Montranet and canon of Saint-Sauveur d'Aix, he was comprised in the first promotion of canons, made Dec. 17, 1316, by John XXII, who, three years afterwards, sent him to Italy with the most unlimited powers for the purpose of retrieving the dominions of the Church. At the head of a small army, Bertrand, together with Philip of Valois, who afterwards became king of France, directed his first blows against Matteo Viscconti, the nominal chief of the Lombard League, who was considerably assisted by the Provengal and Provençal.Ordered to resort to the anathemas of the Church, and to preach a crusade against Matteo. This attempt being unsuccessful also, he determined to unite with the Guelphs and oppose Galea Viscconti, who had succeeded his father. Genoa and Piacenza took his part, Milan and Venice as well, and the Pope was revolting, and he was elected, Oct. 29, 1322, president of that institution by the trustees in 1385, and entered at once upon this new field of labor. After four years of intense labor, the success of the enterprise not being equal to his expectations, he accepted another call to St. Louis. In 1841 his health obliged him to travel, and he went to Europe, whence he returned in October of the same year, greatly invigorated. Early in 1852 sickness compelled him to discontinue his labors, and he died March 26, 1852. He published a large number of occasional Sermons, Addresses, and controversial pamphlets. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 723.

Fouquet, François-Alain, a French theologian, was born at Montpellier Aug. 29, 1666. Almost immediately after his ordination he was appointed vicar of Saint-Roché at Paris, and it was in this capacity that he administered the last sacraments to La Fontaine (see his account in the Mem. de Litt. of the P. Desmolets, vol. i, pt. ii). He was made doctor, and entered in 1698 the Congregation of the Oratory. On the death of M. de Montpellier, gave him the direction of his seminary. He returned to Paris, and held at the Seminary of Saint-Magloire public lectures on the conscience. He was appointed member of the commission charged with the liturgical reform of the diocese of Paris. The Constitution de Montpellier, the principal work of Pouget, was published at Paris in 1702 (4to, or 5 vols. 12mo); it was at once adopted in all parts of France, has gone through many editions, and has been translated into several languages. At the time of his death Pouget was publishing a Latin edition of it, in which the passages merely indicated in the French work were extensively filled out. This edition, when in the printing-office, was seized at the request of cardinal de Biissy, and was published after examination by doctor Clavel, with his comments. The work was completed by the P. Desmolets, and published under the title of Institutiones Catholicæ (1725, 2 vols. fol., and Ven. 1768). There are few works of this kind in which the Christian dogmas, the religious morals, the sacraments, prayers, ceremonies, and customs of the Roman Church are set forth in a manner so simple and explicit. The other writings of Pouget are some Letters to Colbert and to cardinal Noailles, Instructions sur les principaux Devoirs des Chevaliers de Malte (Paris, 1712, 12mo), and various manuscripts, especially a work on the Breviary of Notre Dame, part of which had been printed in 1798. Pouget died at Paris April 4, 1723.
Poulard, Thomas Just, a French prelate, was born at Dieppe Sept. 1, 1754. He was ordained priest, and enjoyed an early renown as a preacher. His talents were rewarded by the Church with several preferments, and a curacy in the diocese of Lisieux. Attached to the clergy of Saint-Roch, he submitted in 1791 to the law that exacted the oath to the civil constitution, and became episcopal vicar of the Orne. On the 27th of July, 1793, he renounced the Catholic faith in the presence of the Convention; but in spite of this abjuration he was, after the Reign of Terror, appointed constitutional curate of the parish of Aubervilliers, near Paris, and took his seat as a deputy of the Haute-Marne in the council held at Paris in 1797. The Constitutionalists made him bishop of Saint- et-Loire June 14, 1801, but he lost his see by the Concordat, and retired to Paris. Shortly before the Revolu- tion of July he published a pamphlet under the title "Moyens de nationaliser le Clergé de France" (Paris, 1800, 8vo.), in which he attacked the clergy of the Revolution epoch he condemned the young men, and on three in 1801. Poulard persevered in his opinions, and chose to die un vrai constitutionnel. He declined the assistance of the curate of his parish, and his body was carried directly to the cemetery. Poulard died March 9, 1820. The following books have been most plausibly attributed to his au thorship: Épithématiques religieuses pour servir à l'His- torie ecclésiastique de la France (1801).—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Poullaouen, Nicolas de Louis, a French painter, was born Feb. 10, 1703, at Avignon. He was destined to the magistracy, and studied law. But he did not allow those grave pursuits to interfere with his poetical tastes, and presented at the Jeux Floraux several poems which were crowned. Towards 1735 he received orders, and from that time devoted himself entirely to oratory. Encouraged by the favor some of his panegyrists and sermons had met with at the hands of his countrymen, he repaired to Paris in 1738, and preached in nearly all the great pulpits. In 1745 a life-rent of a thousand francs was granted by the abbé of Angers to bestow on him; and in 1748 he was nominated a companion of the Nobel of Nôtre- gent-sous-Coney, after pronouncing the panegyric of Saint-Louis before the French Academy. He was sub sequently honored with the titles of ordinary preacher of the king and grand vicar of Lyon. Some writers have supposed that the abbé Poulette was mistaken in this relation: such a parallel can only be made by those who mistake brilliancy of style for eloquence. He might be more properly compared with the abbé De Boismont, his contempor ary; they have the same qualities and the same defects. The abbé Poulette did not aspire to the honors of authorship: he was not in the habit of writing his sermons. In 1776, complying with the wishes of his nephew, Louis Poulette, grand vicar of Saint-Malo, he dictated to him eleven sermons which he had preserved in his memory for forty years, and these sermons were published, after he had corrected them himself, in Paris in 1778, 1781, 1818, 1821 (2 vols. 12mo). This edition con tains also his Panégyrique de Saint-Louis (1748, 4to) and a Discours pour la Prise d'habit de Mme. de Ruel meau-monde aux Comtesse (1749, 12mo). The Bibliothèque des Écrivains édités a volume of Œuvres Choisies of the abbé Poulette (1828, 18mo), preceded by a biographical notice. He died at Avignon Nov. 8, 1781.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. See De Sainte- Croix, Éloge de Poulette (Avignon, 1788, 8vo).

Pound (weight) is the rendering of one Heb. and one Greek word in the A. V.

1. מזון, mazón (2 Kings x, 17; Ezra ii, 60; Neh. vii, 71, 72). See MASEH.

2. Ἁρπα, ἀρπα (John xii, 8; xix, 8, 89), is a Roman pound of twelve ounces, a libra. This pound, as used in trade and authorized by the Roman government, contained 6156 Paris grains, according to Boeckh (Metallurg. Unters. p. 160 sqq.). The word ARPA was adopted in the Armenian dialect, ԱՐՓԱ (Buxtorf, Lex. Robb. col. 1186). See Weight.

Pound (money), a value (pāvā, minā) mentioned in the parable of the Ten Pounds (Luke xix, 12-27), as the talent is in the parable of the Talents (Matt. xxv, 14-30), the comparison of the Saviour to a master who intrusted money to his servants wherewith to trade in his absence being probably a frequent lesson in our Lord's teaching (comp. Mark xiii, 28-37). The reference appears to be to a Greek pound, a weight used as a money of account, of which sixty went to the talent, the weight depending upon the weight of the talent. At this time the Attic talent, reduced to the weight of the earlier Phoenician, which was the same as the He broew, prevailed in Palestine, though other systems must have been occasionally used. The Greek name doubt less came either from the Hebrew shekel which has a common origin; but it must be remembered that the Hebrew talent contained but fifty manehs, and that we have no authority for supposing that the maneh was called in Palestine by the Greek name, so that it is most reasonable to consider the Greek weight to be meant. See Ninth.

Pounds, John, an English philanthropist, flourished in the second half of last century. He was born at Portsmouth in 1766 of very humble parentage, and enjoyed himself no educational advantages worth mention ing. But, endowed with a remarkably active mind and generous disposition, he used his leisure hours from the busy trade he plied as a shoemaker for the amelioration of the poor children of his surroundings. He collected a number of them in his shop, and there taught them the elements of education he had been able to master successfully, and thus became the founder of what are now called the Ragged Schools. He died Jan. 1, 1839.

Pouchot, Edmond, a French philosopher of some note, was born at Poilly, near Sins, in 1851. About 1678 he became professor of philosophy in the University of Paris, of which he was chosen rector seven times. He was a friend of Racine and Boileau. He died in 1734. He wrote Institutiones Politicae (1730), which was highly esteemed by his contemporaries. Pouchot was really the first of modern philosophers who taught by a rational method.

Pousain, Nicolas, a French painter of great cel ebrity, was born near Le Grand-Andely, in Normandy, in 1556 or 1594; was first a pupil of Quintin Varin, then painting pictures for the Church of Grand-Andely, but at the age of eighteen went to Paris, studied under Ferdinand Elle, the Flemish painter, and others; but chiefly improved himself by drawing from casts and drawings and prints after Raffaello and Julio Romano in the collection of M. de Courtois, who gave access to them. After a long and hard struggle, he at tained the object of his desire—namely, the means of visiting Rome. He was thirty years of age when he arrived there, and a considerable period elapsed after that before he obtained much employment. At length, however, he received several important commissions from the cardinal Barberini, which he executed so success fully that he afterwards rapidly acquired fame and fortune. After an absence of sixteen years he returned to Paris with M. de Chantelou, and was introduced by cardinal Richelieu to Louis XIII, who appointed him his painter in ordinary, and gave him apartments in the Tuileries. But while away at Rome, preparatory to re moval to Paris, the king died, and Pousain abandoned the proposed return to France. He died at Rome in 1666, after a most successful career. His pictures have been compared with colored bas-reliefs, a term not inexpressive of his style. His peculiar leaning to this sculptural treatment may in some measure be explained by his close intimacy with his friend Duquesnay, the sculptor, known as Flamingo: they lived in the same house, and were, together at Rouen, of the same coloring, compared with his drawing, is inferior and mannered, which is somewhat remarkable, considering that he studied in the school of Domenichino at Rome, whom he regarded as the best painter of his time. The Sken Sacraments, painted twice by Poussin, are among his most celebrated works, and both are now in England—one at Belvoir Castle, the other in the Bridgewater Gallery, London. His works are very numerous; the prints that have been engraved after his principal pictures only amount to upwards of two hundred. Some of his best works are in the British National gallery, as, The Hague among the Philistines at Ashdon, The Rachaelinius Festival, No. 42, finely engraved by Doo, which constitutes an excellent exponent of his style, with all his merits and peculiarities in perfection. He was especially remarkable as a skillful landscape-painter. His most drawing entitled The Finding of Moses has been made popular by autotype, but it is by no means one of his best productions. Poussin has been called a classical painter by Sir Joshua Reynolds, so successful did he imitate the works of antiquity. See Mrs. Clement, Painter, Sculptor, Architecture, etc., p. 50; Gombrich, p. 49; Bellori, Vita di Nicolò Poussino, etc. (Rome, 1672); Wor-num, Descriptive and Historical Catalogue of the National Gallery, etc.

His brother-in-law, Gaspar Poussin, also quite a celebrated painter, was born in 1613, and was a pupil of Nicolas. Poussin devoted himself principally to secular art, but his Sacrifice of Isaac is a notable production. He died in 1657. (J. H. W.)

Poussines, Pierre, a French Jesuit, was born in 1609 at Lauroc (diocese of Narbonne). After studying at Rome, he went to the University of Louvain in 1624, and was in the latter city and at Montpellier professor of humanities, of rhetoric, and of theology. Called to Rome in 1664 to continue The History of the Society, interrupted by the death of Sacchini, he devoted several years to that work, and was subsequently professor of exegetical theology at the Roman College. Many illustrious personages honored him with proofs of their esteem, among others queen Christina of Sweden and cardinal Barberini, who committed to him the interpretation of the works of Pachymers. Poussines was a good friend of the young prince of Orsini and to the abbé Albani, who afterwards became pope under the name of Clement XI. He returned to Toulouse towards the end of 1682, and continued his literary activity in spite of his failing health. He died at Toulouse Feb. 2, 1696. He left, Nouvelles Mémorialités de l'Académie, etc. (Paris, 1677, 1680).—Polemism, Socium, Orationes (ibid., 1657, 1680).—Anna Commena Porphyrogenita Alexias (Paris, 1651, fol.).—Sancti Nili Opera quondam (ibid., 1654, 4to).—Nouvelles Mémentos de la République Paganisme (ibid., 1661, fol.).—Georgii Pacchymers Michael Paliologus (Rome, 1666, fol.).—G. Ricini, Andromanceri Palaologisi (Ibid., 1697, fol.).—Sancti Methodii Convinimum Virginum (Paris, 1657, fol.).—Catenar Gregorii Politianae in Evangelium secundum Marcum (Rome, 1673, fol.).—Theotheodori Actores (Paris, 1698, 4to).—Theophylacti Instiut Regum (ibid., 1641, 4to). All these editions are accompanied with commentaries and notes full of erudition. Poussines is the author of a considerable number of lives of saints of Greece, of Languedoc, and these are known in the Bel-landistas; of a Latin translation of the letters of St. Francis Xavier, and of a number of other works, the list of which is given in the Biblioth. Soc. Jesu. See Lombard, Elogia hist. P. Poussines, in the Mémoires de Trévoux (Nov. 1756), and in the Dict. de Moreri (ed. 1709); De Bocccher, Bibliothe, des Ecrivains de la Com-

the greater part of the riches of the kingdom; their possessions were so vast that the monopoly became the occasion to enact laws preventing the increase of their wealth or depriving them of that portion of it which was held in trust for the public welfare. In the United States the monasteries of Rome threaten to become the most powerful possessors of wealth. In New York they own property mounting up to several millions, and even in smaller cities are fast accumulating immense possessions. How admirably their rules are adapted to fastening upon individuals and to transfer to them so rich a fraction! Already in several states civil enactments have become necessary in order to restrain the inordinate acquisition of landed and other property by Roman Catholic institutions and to prevent undue interference by priests in the bequests of the sick.

The Fakirs and Dervishes of Mohammedan countries are under a vow of poverty, and go about asking alms in the name of God, being wholly dependent for their support upon the charity of the faithful. The Mohammedan monks trace their origin to the first year of the Hegira; and it is said that there are no fewer than thirty-two different orders existing in the Turkish empire, all of them grounding their preference of the ascetic life upon a saying of Mohammed, "Poverty is my passion; I can live no other way." Internal accessions to the numbers of the Fakirs, or Beggars, are not allowed to partake of a single morsel of food not received by them in alms, unless it be water or some substance used for the purpose of cleaning the teeth. Hence the Buddhist monk is seen daily carrying his alms-bowl from house to house, in the village near which he may happen to reside. The "Agyrs" of the ancient Greeks were mendicant priests of Cybele, and their origin is supposed to have been Eastern. The same priests among the Romans went their daily rounds to receive alms with the astra in their hands. The institutes of Manu laws have explicit rules for the Brahmin mendicant: "Every day must a Brahmin student receive his food by begging, with due care, from the houses of persons renowned for discharging their duties. If none of those houses can be found, let him go begging through the whole district around the village, keeping his organs in subjection and remaining silent; but let him turn away from such as have committed any deadly sin .... Let the student persist constantly in such begging; but let him not eat the food of one person only; the subsistence of a student by begging is held to be less than that of his master. This done, if the student is wise, he must ask for a Brahmin only; but no such act is appointed for a warrior or a merchant." In the same sacred book the householder is enjoined to make gifts according to his ability to the religious mendicant, who is described as the "light of the world." Powell, Baden. An Anglican divine, noted rather as a scientific student than as a theologian, was the son of a London merchant, and was born at Stamford Hill, near London, Aug. 22, 1796. He studied at Oriel College, Oxford, where he graduated M.A., with first-class mathematical honors, in 1817; took holy orders in 1820, and was appointed vicar of Plumstead, in Kent, in 1821. In 1824 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society; and three years later was appointed Savilian professor of geometry, a chair which he held till his death, which took place in London June 11, 1860. Baden's great aim was to bring about a larger recognition of the importance of physical and mathematical science in the curriculum of learned study at Oxford. To the "Philosophical Transactions," the "Reports" of the British Association, and other vehicles of scientific instruction, he contributed numerous valuable papers; and he pursued his strenuous exertions to obtain for modern science the right of modifying the views of nature and the origin of the world, regardless of the views expounded in the O.T. Scriptures, especially in "The Study on Evidence of Christianity in Essays and Reviews" (1860). In this perilous task his ill success. He delayed great learning, logical power, moderation of tone, and philosophic urbanity; but his conclusions were too unmistakably rationalistic to be acceptable to orthodox Christianity. Powell does not exactly place himself on the same theoretical ground with Hume and Spinoza, but the moral effect of his work is to adduce evidence of Christianity is not less antagonistic than the theories of either of these authors. "Spinoza's" says Dr. Hurst ("Hist. of Rationalism," p. 487 sq.), "held that miracles are impossible, because it would be derogatory to God to depart from the established laws of the universe, and one of Hume's objections to them was their incapability of being proved from testimony ("Rep. to Essays and Reviews," p. 185). Prof. Powell objects to them because they bear no analogy to the harmony of God's dealings in the material world; and insists that they are not to be credited, since they are a violation of the laws of matter, or an interruption of the course of physical causes. The orthodox portion of the Church are laboring under the egregious error of making them an essential doctrine, when they are really mere exception to the law. External accessions to the numbers of the Fakirs must come to our aid in all examination of them. The key-note to Prof. Powell's opposition is contained in the following statement: 'From the nature of our antecedent convictions, the probability of some kind of mistake or deception somewhere, though we know not where, is greater than the probability of the event really happening in the way and from the causes assigned' ("Essays and Reviews," p. 120). The inductive philosophy, to which great respect must be paid, is enlisted against miracles. If we only knew all about those alleged and held as such, we should have found them too involved into natural phenomena, just as the 'angel at Milan was the aerial reflection of an image on a church; the balls of fire at Plaucas were electrical; the sea-serpent was a basking shark on a stem of sea-weed. A committee of the French Academy of Sciences, with Lavoisier at its head, after a grave investigation, pronounced the alleged fall of aerolites to be a supernatural fable' (ibid. p. 155). The two theories against the reality of miracles in their received sense are, first, that they are attributable to natural causes; and, second, that they may involve more or less of the supernatural or the miraculous. This is the natural assumption do away with any real admission of miracles even on religious grounds." The animus of the whole essay may be determined by the following treatment of testimony and reason: "Testimony, after all, is but one form of a second-hand account; and it is by the testimony of miracles alone that Christianity can avail nothing against reason. The essential question of miracles stands quite apart from any consideration of testimony: the question would remain the same if we had the evidence of our own senses to an alleged miracle; that is, to an extraordinary or inexplicable fact. It is not the mere fact, but the cause or explanation of it, which is the point at issue" (ibid. p. 158). This means far more than Spinoza, Hume, or any other opponent of miracles, except the radical Rationalists of Germany, has claimed—that we must not believe a miracle, though actually witnessed. The different replies which this Essay on the Study of the Evidence of Christianity (in Essays and Reviews) elicited are: No Antecedent Impossibility in Miracles—some Remarks on the Essay of the late Rev. Baden Powell, etc. (1861, 8vo); A Rejoinder to Mr. Bacon's Essay on the Improbability of Miracles, etc., by William Lee, D.D. (1861, 8vo); Examination of Mr. Baden Powell's Treatise on Miracles (1861, 12mo); and are defended in, A Few Words of Apology for the late Prof. Baden Powell's Essay, etc., by a Lay Graduate (1861, 8vo); The late Prof. Powell and Bishop Thirlwell on the Improbability of Miracles, etc., by the Rev. R. B. Tindal (1864, 8vo). See also Farrar, Crit. Hist. of Free Thought, lect. iv; Moberley, Sermons on the Bodii

POWELL, Howell, a Welsh Presbyterian minister, was born about 1839, and was a native of Glamorgan, South Wales, where he was educated for the ministry. He came to this country with his wife, and, settling in Ohio, began preaching. In 1851 he became pastor of the Welsh Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he labored prosperously for nineteen years. Accepting the call of the American Board, he arrived in New York on the Thirteenth Street, New York, he came to that city in 1870, and was actively engaged in the duties of his pastorate until his death in 1875. He was greatly beloved by his Welsh coreligionists both in this country and at home. He discharged his pastoral duties with zeal and diligence, and did many generous acts for the humble members of his flock.

POWELL, Thomas, an Anglican divine, flourished in the 17th century. He was born about 1608, and after taking holy orders was canon of St. David's, London. He died in 1660. His publications are of a secular character.

POWELL, Wavasor, a Welsh Puritan preacher, who was born in 1617, was educated at Jesus College, Oxford, but left the Establishment and became an itinerating minister. He was very zealous for the Church of God, was very outspoken and gave much annoyance to Churchmen and was often in trouble. He was imprisoned at Oxford Prison, London, in 1671. He published a number of Sermons, Theological Treatises, etc. (between 1646 and 171), for lists of which and notices of his author, see Sermons Vavasor (1654), Vavasor Exam'd and Purged (1654, 4to), and Life and Death of Powell Wavasor (1671, 8vo). His Concordance to the Bible, completed by N. P. and J. F., etc., was published in 1671 (8vo).

POWELL, William Samuel, an English divine of remarkable ability, was born at Colchester Sept. 27, 1717; was admitted to St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1734; and, having taken the degree of bachelor of arts in 1736, was elected fellow of it in March 1737. In 1741 he was taken into the family of lord Townshend as private tutor to his second son, Charles, afterwards chancellor of the Exchequer; was ordained deacon and priest at the end of the year, and instituted to the rectory of Colkirk, in Norfolk, on lord Townshend's presentation. He returned to college the year after, began to read lectures as an assistant to the principal tutor; but became himself principal tutor in 1744. He took the degree of bachelor of divinity in 1749, and of doctor in 1756. In 1765 he was elected master of his college; obtained the archdeaconry of Colchester the year after, and in 1768 was instituted to the rectory of Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight. He died Jan. 19, 1775. He published, Defence of the Subscriptions required in the Church of England (London, 1757, 4to);—Observations on Miscellaneous Subjects (1750) on Sermons on 1 Cor. 6, 23, 24 (1767, 4to);—Observations on Various Subjects (published with Life by Thomas Bulgy, D.D., 1776, 8vo). Dr. Powell's and Thomas Fawcett's Discourses, thirty-four in all, delivered before the University of Cambridge, were published in 1728 in the deaneries of the archdeaconry of Colchester, and in the sermons and charges of Dr. Powell; of whom, indeed, on every account, the whole society over which he presided might justly join with me in saying, 'Semper honos, nomenque tuum, laudesque manebunt' (Prof. Mainwaring). Powell's discourse are also highly commended by Matthew (See Parvilia Historiae Anglicae lin. 1822), p. 225, 371; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Gen. Biol. Dict. s. v.

Power, or the ability of performing, is in an essential degree an attribute of Deity: God is emphatically styled All-powerful. Power signifies sometimes a right, privilege, or dignity (John i, 12); sometimes absolute authority of power (Matt. xxviii, 18); sometimes the exertion or act of power, as of the Holy Spirit (Ephes. i, 19), of angels, or of human governments, etc. (Rom. xi, 34); and perhaps it generally includes the idea of dignity and superiority. So, the body "is sown in weakness, it is raised in power" (1 Cor. xv, 43).
The "prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii, 2) is a figurative representation of Satan (q. v.). See AIR.

Power. Francis Herron, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Allegheny County, Pa., July 14, 1829.
Born on the 14th of July. He had no academic training; graduated at Washington College, Washington, Pa.; studied theology
in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny City, Pa., and was licensed by Redstone Presbytery. Being deeply interested in the efforts of the government to suppress the rebellion, he became a delegate of the United States Christian Commission. Joining the "Army of the Cumberland," he was zealous in his efforts in the hospitals and in the field to administer to the personal and spiritual wants of the sick and wounded of the public; but the excess of exposure which he subjected himself broke down his system, and he died in the hospital at Nashville, Tenn., Oct. 17, 1863.
Mr. Power was never ordained, but he was an earnest and faithful missionary. Forgetful of self, in his zeal for the good of others he sacrificed even his life to a work, as "this man returned unto his whole
(J. L. S.)

Power. John H., D.D., a noted minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Montgomery Co., Ky., March 15, 1798; was converted at a very early age; united with the Methodists in 1819; was licensed to preach two years after, and joined the Kentucky Conference, where his appointments were, Mount Sterling and Hinkaton circuits, in Kentucky; Little Kanawha, Charleston, and Parkersburgh, in Virginia; Columbus, Salt Creek, Brush Creek, Chillicothe, and Deer Creek, in Ohio; Burlington Circuit, Old Zion, Mount Vernon, and South. Burlington—embracing a period of eighteen years. As presiding elder, he served on Norwalk, Wooster, Mount Vernon, Delaware, and Mansfield districts, in Ohio; Burlington, Muscatine, and Keokuk districts, in Iowa—filling up twenty-eight years. In 1848 he was chosen the general agent of the Western Book Concern, where he remained until 1852. Failing health then necessitated rest, and he maintained a superannuity relation until 1856, when he resumed the pastoral work by transfer to the Iowa Conference, and there held appointments (as above mentioned) until his death, which occurred Jan. 10, 1873. In manner Dr. Power was reserved. He shrank instinctively from that general acquaintance and noternity in which persons differently constituted find pleasure. His friendship, though not demonstrative, was strong and enduring. As a preacher he was successful: enlightening the mind, directing the judgment, and influencing the will of his auditors—thereby win-ing souls to Christ. He was a prudent legislator, and as an administrator of discipline he had but few equals.
Notwithstanding the exhaustive labors of an itinerant fifty years ago, at the age of forty-two he had acquired a liberal education, including Greek and Hebrew, so as to make the original available in the literal rendering of the Word of Life. He had also completed a course in law, with the view of meeting every demand that might be made upon him as a servant of the Church.
As an author he holds a reputable place. His writings
(On Universalism:—Doctipte and Power: a discussion on the same subject:—Domestic Piety:—and Letters to Dr. Smith on Slavery) are all attractive in style, and are meet of practical cleanliness. See Annals of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 103, 104. (J. H. W.)

POWERS OF THE MIND are those faculties by which we think, reason, judge, etc. See God; Soul. "They are so various," says Dr. Reid, "so many, so connected and complicated in most of their operations, that there never has been any division of them proposed which is not liable to considerable objections. The most common division is that of senses, and imagination, and under the will we comprehend our active powers, and all that lead to action, or influence the mind to act—such as ap-etions, passions, affections. The understanding comprehends our contemplative powers, by which we perceive objects; by which we conceive or remember them; by which we analyze or compound them; and by which we judge and reason concerning them. Or, the intellectual powers are commonly divided into simple apprehension, judgment, and reasoning."—Locke divides powers into those "able to make, or able to receive, any actual action; the one may be called active, and the other passive power" (Essay on Human Understanding, bk. ii, ch. xxii). But Reid takes exception to this division, and passes the following sentence upon it:
"Whereas he (Locke) distinguishes power into active and passive. I conceive powers must be of no power at all. He means by it the possibility of being changed. To call this power seems to be a misaplication of the word. I do not remember to have met with the phrase passive power in any other good author.
Mr. Locke seems to have been unlucky in inventing it;
and it deserves not to be retained in the language."—
"This paragraph," says Sir W. Hamilton (Reid's Works,
p. 519, note), "is erroneous in almost all its statements."
The distinction between power as active and passive is clearly taken by Aristotle. But he says that in one point of view it is true that but one power (his, v.
c. 12), while in another they are two (obd. lib. ix,
c. 1). He also distinguishes powers into rational and irrational—into those which we have by nature, and those which we acquire by repetition of acts. These distinctions have been generally admitted by subsequent philosophers. Dr. Reid, however, only used the word power to signify active power. That we have the idea of power, and how we come by it, he shows in opposition to Hume. (Act. Pow. cas. i, ch. ii, iv.)
According to Hume, we have no proper notion of power. It is a mere relation which the mind conceives to exist between one thing going before and another thing coming after. All that we observe is antecedtent and consequent. Neither sensation nor reflection furnishes us with any idea of power or efficacy in the antecedent to produce the consequent. The views of Dr. Berkeley are somewhat similar. It is when the succession is constant—when the antecedent is uniformally followed by the consequent—that we call the one cause and the other effect; but we have no ground for believing that there is any other relation between them or any virtue in one to originate or produce the other, but that is, that we have no proper idea of power. Now, that our idea of power cannot be explained by the philosophy which derives all our ideas from sensation and reflection is true. Power is not an object of sense. All that we observe is an effect. In all that we observe invariably succeeded by another, we not only connect the one as effect and the other as cause, and view them
under that relation, but we frame the idea of power, and conclude that there is a virtue, an efficacy, a force in the one thing to originate or produce the other, when in truth there is no other connection or relation between the two. This is the common idea of power, and that there is such an idea framed and entertained by the human mind cannot be denied. The legitimacy and validity of the idea can be fully vindicated.

"In the strict sense, power and agency are attributes of mind only; and I think that mind only can be a cause in the strict sense. This power, indeed, may be where it is not exerted, and so may be without agency or causation; but mind can be no agent without power to act and to produce the effect. As far as I can judge, to every thing we call a cause we ascribe power to produce the effect. In intelligent causes, the POWER may be without being exerted; so I have power to run while I sit still or walk. But in inanimate causes we never think of power, nor what is exerted, and, therefore, measure the power of the cause by the effect which it actually produces. The power of an acid to dissolve iron is measured by what it actually dissolves. We get the notion of active power, as well as of cause and effect, as I feel in myself, and feel in ourselves a power to move our limbs, and to produce certain effects when we choose. Hence we get the notion of power, agency, and causation in the strict and philosophical sense; and this I take to be our first notion of these three things" (Reid, Correspondence, p. 774).

"The liability of a thing to be influenced by a cause is called passive power, or more properly susceptibility; while the efficacy of the cause is called active power. Heat has the power of melting wax; and, in the language of some, ice has the power of being melted" (Day, On the Will, p. 33). See CAUSE.

It is usual to speak of a power of resistance in matter, and of a power of endurance in mind. Both these are passive power. Active power is the principle of action, whether of the object or of the agent. Passive power is the principle of bearing or receiving. See Reid, On the Active Powers; Id. On the Human Mind, and the Intellectual Powers; Locke, On the Understanding; Stewart, Brown, and Abercrombie. See also MIND.

POWERS, Grant, a Congregational clergyman, was born at Hollis, N. H., May 31, 1784; was educated at Dartmouth College, class of 1810; studied theology, was a minister at Haverhill in 1815-18, and at Goshen from Aug. 27, 1829, to his death, April, 1841. He is the author of an Essay Upon the Influence of the Imagination on the Nervous System, contributing to False Hopes in Religion:—History of the Coa Country (1841, 12mo).—Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. s. v.

POWERS, Hiriam, an American sculptor, son of a farmer, and the eighth of nine children, was born at Woodstock, Vt., July 29, 1803, and acquired the rudiments of education at a free district school. While still a boy, he went to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he became an apprentice to a clock-maker, and about the same time formed the acquaintance of a German sculptor, who taught him to model in plaster. Subsequently he was employed for several years making wax-figures, and fitting them with machinery, for the Cincinnati Museum, where his Infernal Regions horrified thousands of visitors. It is a hideous scene representing hell filled with terrible figures, moved by machinery, and acting the supposed agonies of the damned. In 1835 he went to Washington, where he executed the busts of several distinguished persons. By the aid of Mr. Nicholas Longworth, he went to Florence, Italy, in 1837, to continue his art-studies. He resided in that country until his death, which took place at Rome, June 27, 1873. In 1888 Powers produced his statue of Erie, which excited the admiration of Thorwaldsen. His other works were of a secular character, but they gave him great renown. See H. F. Lee, Familiar Sketches of Sculpture and Sculptors (Boston, 1854, 2 vols. 12mo), vol. ii, ch. xxvii; Tuckerman, Book of the Artists, s. v.; Living Age, Oct. 1847.

POWERS, Jesse K., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in the county of Albemarle, Va., June 8, 1801. In May, 1826, while engaged in teaching a classical school, he was converted, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. Shortly after he joined the travelling connection, at the session of the Virginia Conference (held at Raleigh in February, 1829). In 1829 he was admitted into full connection and ordained deacon, and in 1832 was ordained elder. He was a plain, faithful, earnest minister of the Gospel, always conscientiously discharging the duties of a Methodist preacher. Being unencumbered with a family, he readily and cheerfully entered on whatever field of labor was assigned him, and everywhere endeared himself to the people whom he served by his unaffected and consistent piety. For upwards of twocentury years he gave full proof of his ministry. In the latter part of his life, through affectionate regard for his welfare, and in consideration of his infirmities, his brethren of the Conference placed him on the list of supernumeraries; but so anxious was he to be in the regular pastoral work that he appealed to the Conference to place him among the effective men, and he was appointed to the New Kent Circuit; but the work was beyond his strength; he soon began to fail in health, and died March 1, 1869. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1869, p. 303.

POWERS, John B., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born May 16, 1814, in Union District, S. C.; as a boy, removed to Alabama, and shortly after was converted; and, feeling called of God to preach the Gospel, accepted license in 1845. In 1856 he entered the itinerant ranks of the Alabama Conference, and was appointed to the Weewakalee Circuit. He filled successively the Harpersville and the Mount Vernon circuits. In 1861 he entered the Confederate army in command of a company. His health failed, however, and in 1863 he was mustered out. He was present at the Jasper Conference in 1867, and served the Elyton Circuit, 1868-69, the Murfree's Valley Circuit, 1870, the Joleneboro Circuit. In 1871 he was appointed to the Monticello Circuit, but died March 30. He was a conscientious and pious man. His administration as presiding elder was marked by promptness and great faithfulness in the discharge of all the duties pertaining to his office. His broad common-sense and acquaintance with men gave him wisdom in council. As a preacher, he had great control over the emotions of men, and was eminently successful in seasons of revival. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1871, p. 565.

POWATI is the name of a Chinese divinity signifying contentment.
four poya days in each month. 1. The day of the new moon. 2. The eighth day from the time of the new moon. 3. The day of the full moon. 4. The eighth day from the time of the full moon. It is said by Prof. H. Wilson that the days of the full moon are sacred and full secrets of the Hindus; but according to the institutes of Manu the sacred books are not to be read upon these days.

Poydras, Julien, an American philanthropist of French descent, who flourished in the early days of our republic, and was first delegate to Congress from the territory of Orleans (1809-12), gave $20,000 for the founding of a French orphan asylum, and left $20,000 for a college at Point Coupée, La. He died there Jan. 25, 1824.

Poynet (or Pouet), John, an English prelate of the Reformation period, was born about 1516 in Kent- shire. He enjoyed a distinguished education, learned Italian and Flemish, was proficient in mathematics, and constructed in his youth a clock the complicated machi- ney of which was the admiration of Henry VIII's court. He graduated at King's College, Cambridge; was made doctor of theology and chaplain of archbishop Cranmer. At the age of thirty-three he was appointed bishop of Rochester (1549). In 1551 he succeeded at Winchester the deposed Gardiner, and was appointed to take a share in the redaction of the new code of ecclesi- astical laws. He was indebted for these distinctions to his zeal for the cause of reform; he defended it in the pulpit and in his books, and explained its doctrines in his Catechism, adopted under the name of "King Edward's Catechism." At Mary Tudor's accession to the throne he repaired to foreign parts, either dreading perse- cution for having had a share in Wyatt's Rebellion, or because he had been deprived of his see for having married. He died April 11, 1556, at Strasburg. He is spoken of as a man of great erudition and eminent piety. In his theology he was a decided Calvinist. Other works of his are, Defence for Marriage of Priests (1550, 8vo);—Short Treatise of Polite Power (1556, 8vo; reprinted 1639 and 1642)—and De Eucharistia (1557, 8vo). See Strype, Life of Cranmer; Dod, Church History; Fuller, Worthies of England; Milner, History of Winchester, i, 346; Lecky, History of Rationalism, ii, 174; Hook, Eccles. Biography, viii, 158; Col- lins, Hist. of England (see Index in vol. viii).

Poszi, Giovanni Battista, a Milanese painter who flourished in the latter part of the 16th century, was employed by Sixtus V in the palace of St. John of Lateran and in the library of the Vatican. In the Sistine Chapel he painted the Visitation of the Virgin and the Angel appearing to St. Joseph in his dream; in 11 Gesi, a Choir of Angels. He died in the pontificate of Sixtus V, aged twenty-eight, deeply lamented as the most promising young artist of his time. He was considered the Guido of his day; and had he survived to the time of the Caracci, it is impossible to say what degree of perfection he might have attained.

Poszi, Stefano, an Italian painter, born at Rome in the 18th century, studied first under Carlo Maratti and afterwards with Agostino Masucci. Lanzi says he was more noble in his design than Masucci, and more natural and vigorous in his coloring. He acquired considerable distinction, and executed several works for the churches at Rome, one of which, an altar-piece, repre- senting the Death of St. Joseph. In the pontifical palace of Monte Carlo is a fine picture by him representing St. Gregory. He died in 1768.

Porso, Andrea, an eminent painter and architect, was born at Trent in 1642. While studying at Milan he fell into company and became extremely dis- solute, until, disgusted by his course of life, he joined the Society of the Jesuits, who placed him under the instruction of Scaramuccia. Afterwards, at Rome and Venice, he studied design and color, and the works of Raffaelle and other great masters. His oil and fresco works at Rome, Genoa, and other places gained him the reputation of one of the ablest artists of his time. His pictures are composed in grand style, and he is excelled by few artists in perspective and architecture, the principles of which he perfectly understood, and published a treatise on them. Among his best works in oils are, St. Francesca Borghia, in the church of Il Gesu at Rome; the Wise Men's Offering, at Vieno, and four pictures from the life of Christ, in the church at Genoa. The ceiling of the church of St. Ignazio at Rome is regarded as one of the ablest productions of his time, be- cause of its animated execution. As an architect he gained some distinction, and executed, among other works, the altar of St. Ignazio in the church of Il Gesu at Rome, which is said to be the richest altar in all Eu- rope. He died at Venice in 1702.

Pracrat, in the Indian mythology, one of the revelations of divinity as the supreme original being, and especially as the cause of all phenomena of change in the visible world. Hence Pracrat is the essence of the three gods Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; he is three- colored, because he is creative like Brahma (red); conser- vative like Vishnu (white); and destructive like Siva (black). Pracrat, in consequence, is also the being which unites and separates these three divinities, as through him there is a perpetual vicissitude of life and death, of birth and annihilation.

Pracriti is the by-name of Parvati, the wife of the Indian god Siva; it means Nature. The Hindus make of her the wife of the destroyer, because, according to them, all life originates in death, there being no destruction, no. annihilation, in the universe. The word: matter only describes, in the course of its dura- tion, an eternal circle, in which it undergoes a perpetual change of forms, while its substance remains the same.

Practical Religion is that department of practi- cal theology which aims at the promotion of Christian practice, and the writings which are brought out to contribute to such an end are called Practical Works. They are from their very nature of a more temporary character than any other theological productions. Gen- erally speaking, they are, and must be, adapted to the peculiar circumstances of their own age; they must be specially addressed to correct its present infirmi- ties; they must pre-eminently promote those parts of the Christian character which are least cultivated. Such as are founded on a deep knowledge of human nature, and animated with genuine piety, must indeed benefit other ages, since human nature remains essentially the same; but their most direct influence belongs to the age in which they are written. Subsequently they may often form individuals: transfigured into their minds, they are reproduced in other shapes, but are themselves withdrawn from circulation. Their body perishes; while the soul which gave it life migrates into another and an- other frame, and thus continues often to diffuse an ex- tensive blessing, when the very name under which they originally appeared is forgotten. See Pusey, Historical Inquiry, p. 11-180. See also Practical THEOLOGY; RELIGION; THEOLOGY. (J. H. W.)

Practical Theology is one of the departments of theology, and aims principally at the treatment of the functions of Church life. For centuries the term was abused and confused, and the sphere of practical theology in the organism of theological science was an ill-understood question until the proper conception of its nature and life was given by that master-mind of German theology, Schleiermacher; and, thanks to his clear-sightedness, practical theology is no longer to be conformed with a dilated, popularized edition of scientific theology "for students incompetent to learn the theoretical core" (Pius IX). But, if it any longer unite a synonym of Christian ethics or pastoral theology, but it has taken its place in the circle of theological sciences as an independent department, co-ordinate with exegetical, historical, and systematic theology.

The Church religion presents itself to the student under four aspects—as a divine revelation, as a history, as a system of doctrines and duties, and, finally, as a corporate life. As now the department of exegetical theology embraces all those sciences which in any way treat of the Holy Scriptures; that of historical theology, at any wish of sacred or Church history; that of systematic theology, all which set forth the doctrinal and ethical systems of Christianity; so practical theology comprehends all the practices and hourly needs of the Church, and as such this department embraces the subordinate sciences of Church government, edification, and worship. It includes and covers such special branches as Pastoral Theology, Homiletics, Catechetics, Christian Pedagogics, etc. Being the science of the collective functions of the Church regarded in its unity, it is able to give due attention and prominence to each of those functions—the regulative, the educational, and the edifying, a thing impossible, under the old-fashioned arrangement [see THEOLOGY], to compass within the limits of a Pastoral Theology (q.v.). Says Dorn, "It is since the idea of the Church, and of her relations and institutions, has been most clearly recognised that practical theology, which was formerly for the most part an aggregate of rules and regulations without any organic connection between its several precepts, has been reconstructed. Nitzsch's practical theology, in particular, brings forward its connection with the other branches of theology. Systematic theology, which is based upon exegetic theology and faith, and developed by the history of doctrines, exhibits Christian truth in the abstract, and therefore the idea of faith and practice. Historical theology, finishing with the constitution of the present state of the Church, sets the empirical reality and its defects over against this ideal. The contrast between the two, the variance between the ideal and the real, produces the effort to reconcile this opposition by means of theological usages, in conformity with the requirements of the age. Thus practical theology, as a science, owes its origin to the ecclesiastical procedure of the times; and, as this is necessarily technical, practical theology is also a technical study." Schleiermacher called practical theology the crown of a theological course of study, and, as we have already said, was the first to bestow upon it a scientific organization. In this labor he was laudably followed by theologians of the most diverse schools, as, e.g., Roman Catholic Von Drey, Protestant Nitzsch, Hegelian Marheineke, etc. The newly emerging Hegelianism, painted by Herder, and such other noted men as Ehrenfeuchter, Mo1, Palmer, and Schweitzer. Most are agreed in describing practical theology as a science for the clergy, and thus not doing full justice to the vocation of the believing laity in Church work. Their rights in this respect have chiefly been made apparent by the hitherto much neglected theory of Church government, and by voluntary associations for domestic missions. On the other hand, the just notion that, since the Church's existence and increase are brought about by constant reproduction, it is necessary to start from the origin of the Church in individuals, to proceed to their gathering together, and thence to the Church, may be designated as the prevailing tendency in the construction of a practical theology. Hence the theory of missions (called also Hütten) and especially the aim of which is a preparation for confirmation, form the first or main division. The second embraces the doctrine of worship, or of the construction of the public services of the Church (liturgies, with hymnology and sacred music and homiletic), the superintendence of the spiritual interests of individual members, the organization of the Church (the pastoral office); while the organization of the Church, and the entire system of Church law, by which the activity, whether of the individual or of the community, must be limited, form a third division. See Nitzsch, Praktische Theologie; Dornier, Geschichte der protestantischen Systematik. Christiane's Biblical Assistant, p. 498; and especially Moll, Das System der praktischen Theologie (Halle, 1864, 8vo), which is a compendious but very systematic and thorough treatise, covering the whole field of practical theology as now understood. See also M'Clintock, Encyclopaedia and Methods of Church History, 2nd ed. (London, 1864, 8vo), p. 159 sq. The German support a Zeitschrift für praktische Theologie, which is printed at Leipsic and has a wide circulation.

Prades, Jean Martin de, a French theologian, was born about the year 1720 at Castel-Sarrasin. He was destined to the ecclesiastical career, studied first in the country, then went to Paris and lived there in several seminaries, among others in that of Saint-Sulpice. He became acquainted with the authors of the Encyclopédie, and furnished several articles to their work. He came into repute by a thesis which he defended at the Sorbonne for the doctorate of theology (Nov. 18, 1751). It contained the boldest assertions concerning the nature of the soul, the origin of good and evil, the origin of society, natural and revealed religion, the miracles, etc. His parallel of the cures performed by Jesus and those of Escorial was chiefly noticed particularly because this thesis was condemned forthwith by several prelates and by pope Benedict XIV. The Sorbonne, after having at first approved it, reconsidered its action, and declared it impious. Parliament ordered the arrest of the author at the request of the advocate-general, M. d'Ormesson, whereupon De Prades fled to Holland (1752), and there published his Apology (1752, 3 pts. 8vo), to which Diderot added a reiteration of a mandement of the bishop of Auxerre. Voltaire recommended Prades to the king of Prussia, who appointed him his lector, and bestowed upon him the order of merit and two cannons, one of them the other at Glogau. The bishop of Breslau finally prevailed upon him to retract solemnly the principles he had defended (April 6, 1754). He became archdeacon of the chapter of Glogau. He died in 1782. Prades left, besides, an Abrégé de l'histoire ecclésiastique de France (Berlin, 1767, 2 vols. small 8vo), supposed to be translated from the English, and to which Frederick II wrote a preface.—Hoefel, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. See Brotier, Examen de l'Apologie de l'Abbé de Prades (1755); Fellner, Diet. Hist. s. v.; Jervis, Hist. of the Church of France, vol. i, p. 329-334.

Pradler, Jacques, a Swiss artist of note, was born at Geneva in May, 1792; went as a youth to Paris, and finally to Rome, where he studied for over five years, especially under Canova. He devoted himself principally to sculpture, and produced some remarkable works. In 1819 he settled at Paris, and died there in 1858. Satyrs, Bacchantes, Venuses, and the like, make up principally the list of his works; but he also devoted himself to sacred subjects, and produced, among others, a colossal figure of Christ on the Cross, a Pietà (now at Toulon), a Marriage of the Virgin (for the Madeleine, Paris), a Sainte Marie, a Virgin (for the Church of Avignon), etc. One of his greatest works is the tomb of Napoleon I at the Hôtel des Invalides in Paris. See Mrs. Clement, Handbook of Sculptors, Painters, etc., s. v.

Prado, Blas de, a Spanish painter, was born at Toledo in 1854. He was a pupil of Francisco Comontes. Philip II sent him to Morocco, where he painted the emperor Malay-Abdallah, his favorites, his children, and principal officers. He returned to Spain a wealthy man. But, after the abolition of the feud customs, and showed himself in public dressed in the Moorish attire, the Inquisition summoned him before his tribunal. He was discharged on condition of painting exclusively religious subjects. He died about 1605. Prado is distinctively gifted by the purity of his design and the majesty of his compositions, which are simple, but carefully worked out. He was a favorite of the Spanish court. He died at Madrid, in the royal palace, an Assumption; A Virgin with the Child; St. Anthony; St. Blasius; St. Maurice; A Dancer from the Cross; St. Catharina. Praetorius (i.e. preferred), in the larger sense of the word, is the name of all higher officers of the Church with whose functions is connected a jurisdiction in their own name—jure ordinario—i.e. a jurisdiction belonging essentially to the office, not conferred by a higher dignitary of the Church. In this meaning of the word we distinguish between prælati primi generis and second-

Praetorius de, a German prelate and diplomatist, was born at Weissenburg, in Bavaria, January 30, 1747. He entered the monastery of St. Gall, and was ordained a priesthood in April 1768. He proceeded to Rome, and was made a canon of the church of St. Peter's in 1770. He was consecrated bishop of Salzburg in 1785. He died at Munich, October 21, 1809. He was a learned man, and wrote a great many works on various subjects. He was a close friend of Mozart, and was one of the founders of the Academy of Sciences at Vienna. He was also a great patron of the arts, and was one of the most influential men of his time. His name is commemorated in many streets and squares throughout Europe. His works include a great many on music, and he is remembered as a great patron of the arts. He is also remembered for his great kindness to the poor, and for his efforts to promote education. He was a man of great character, and his influence was felt throughout Europe. His name is remembered as a great example of kindness and generosity.
In a more restricted sense, praestat is the name given to the local superiors or deans of the congregations and abbeys of many ecclesiastical orders, especially to those who enjoy, either by privilege or tradition, the right of wearing the pontifical insignia.

_Praestitutus_ nullius dioeceseos, Cima titolo di abbati o altri dignitari che non sono ammissibili alla giurisdizione di un vescovo, e quindi non sono autorizzati a detenere i privilegi della giurisdizione, che i vescovi o papi concesionano loro in virtù di un decreto pontificio. Il termine è usato quando un vescovo o un papa concede una certa autorità a un suo rappresentante, come un vescovo o un abate, per esercitare una certa responsabilità ecclesiastica. Il termine è stato sovente usato in letterature storiche e canoniche.

Prepositus is a term used in English canon law as well as British common law to designate a species of offence of the nature of a contempt of the ruling power, for which encausation was passed, and was called from the mandamus rules with which the writ directing an officer to perform his duty is analogous.

The different statutes of premonstrates were originally framed in order to restrain the encroachments of the papal power. They begin with the 27 Edward III, st. 1, c. 1, and continue from that period down to the reign of Henry VIII, when the kingdom entirely renounced the authority of the Roman pontiff. The exorbitant powers exercised by the pope in presenting to benefices and in other ecclesiastical matters, and the privileges claimed by the clergy, who resisted the authority of the king’s courts, and recognized no jurisdiction but that of the court of Rome, rendered some enactments absolutely necessary to uphold the law of the country and the independence of the nation. This, then, is the original meaning of the offence termed premonstrata—viz., introducing a foreign power into the land, and creating an imperium in imperio by paying that obedience to the papal process which constitutionally belonged to the king alone. Its penalties have been subsequently applied to other heinous offences, some of which bear more and some less relation to this original offence, and some no relation at all, as a chapter refusing to elect as bishop the person nominated by the sovereign, neglecting to take the oath of allegiance, transgressing the statute of habes corpus (by 6 Anne, c. 7), the asserting by preaching, teaching, or advisedly speaking that any person other than according to the Acts of Settlement and Union has any right to the British throne, or that the sovereign and parliament cannot make laws to limit the descent of the crown.

The knowledge and willfully solemnizing, assisting, or being present at any marriage forbidden by the Royal Marriage Act is declared by 12 George III, c. 11, to infer a praestitutio. The penalties for the offence are no less than the following, as shortly summed up by Sir E. Coke (1 Inst. p. 129): "That from the conviction the defendant shall be out of the king’s protection, and his lands and tenements, goods and chattels, forfeited to the king, and that his body shall remain in prison during the king’s pleasure, or (as others have it) during life."

The offender can bring no action nor recover damages for the most atrocious injuries, and no man can safely give him comfort, aid, or relief. (See Baxter, Ch. Hist. p. 291; Hartlib, Hist. of the Ref. p. 187, 361.)

In very recent times the dissenters have laboured for the abolition of the statute of premonstrare (see London Globe, Nov. 1869).

expressly says that the palace, which had lighthore been Herod's, was named the "Exaiaia" or "the house of the praetors" (Legat. ad Caes. [ed. Franc.], p. 1083). It was situated on the western or more elevated hill of Jerusalem, overlooking the Temple (Josephus, Ant. xx, 8, 11), and was connected with a system of fortifications the aggregate of which constituted the moxxvii, 27 the common version renders the same word common koll; in Phil. i, 13, palace; in John xviii, 28, koll of judgment; and elsewhere, once in the same verse in Acts xix, 35, judgment koll. It is plainly one of the many Latin words to be found in the New Testament [see Latinisms], being the word praetorium in a Greek dress, a derivative from praetor; which latter, from prose, "to go before," was originally applied by the Romans to a military officer;
but because the Romans subdued many countries and reduced them to provinces, and governed them afterwards, at first by the generals who subdued them, or by some other military commanders, the word praetor came ultimately to be used for any civil governor of a province, or even the governor in the Antonian period; not; and who acted in the capacity of chief-justice, having a council associated with him (Acts xxv, 12).
Accordingly the word praetorium, also, which originally signified the general's tent in a camp, came at length to be applied, as a praetor's residence, to the public places in pro-cities and cities (Cicero, Verr. ii, v, 12); and being property an adjective, as also is its Greek representative, it was used to signify whatever appertained to the praetor or governor; for instance, his residence, either the whole or any part of it, as his dwelling-house, or the place where he administered justice, or even the large enclosed court at the entrance to the praetorium residence (Bynes, De Morte Juei Christi [Amsterd. 16956], ii, 407).
There dwelt not only the commandant and his family (Josephus, Ant. xx, 10, 1), but a division of the troops occupied barracks there; and the prisoners who awaited hearing and judgment from the chief were there detained (Acts xxiii, 35).

The praetorium in the capital of a province was usually a large palace; and we see by Josephus (War, ii, 14, 8; comp. xv, 6; Philo, Opp. ii, 281) that the procurators of Judaea, when in Jerusalem, occupied a praetorium near the palace of King Herod, or a former royal residence served the same purpose.

The rendering of the Latin praetorium in general by the word palace (by Schleusner and Wahl) is wrong. The places in Susetinae misquoted refer only to the imperial praetorium, the residence of the emperor, and resided in the domus praetoria, which belonged to king Hiero (Cicero, Verr. ii, 5; xii, 31). See JERUSALEM.

1. As to the passages in the Gospels referred to above, tradition distinguishes the judgment-hall of Pilate,
which is pointed out in the lower city (Korte, Reisen,
p. 71; Troilo, p. 112), from the palace of king Hiero and others have believed (as Rosenmüller, Alterth. ii, 229) that the procurator took up his quarters in Jerusalem in the tower of Antonia, and set in judgment there.
The tradition has no weight; yet on general grounds we may believe, since the palace of Herod stood vacant and was rooney and suitable, that the procurators usually resided there, surrounded by a body-guard, while the troops with their officers occupied the tower of Antonia (comp. Faber, Aeham-bogey, i, 281 sq.). A description of that marble palace of justice, which joined the north wall of the upper city, and was so well enclosed and well forti-sed, is given by Josephus (War, v, 4, 4; comp. Ant. xv, 6, 3). The Roman procurators, whose ordinary residence was at Cæsarea (Acts xxiii, 25, etc.; xxv, 1, etc.), took up their residence in this palace when they visited Jerusalem, or at least when on the road, or in the area or before. Thus Josephus states that Florus took up his quarters at the palace (iv ruris bæxovii

when the despotic authority of the Roman officers might be exercised with moderation. But such a state of things also afforded constant opportunities to an unprincipled officer to extort money under the pretense of a loan, as the price of exemption from personal services which he was competent to insist upon, or as a bribe to buy off the prosecution of some vexatious charge before a military tribunal (Matt. v. 42; Luke iii, 14). See ANAN.

The relation of the military to the civil authorities in Jerusalem came out very clearly from the history of the Crucifixion. When Judas first makes his proposition to betray Jesus to the chief-priests, a conference is held between them and the στρατηγοὶ as to the mode of effecting the object (Luke xxii, 4). The plan involved the assembling of a large number of the Jews by night, and Roman jealousy forbade such a thing, except under the surveillance of a military officer. An arrangement was accordingly made for a military force, which would naturally be drawn from the Antonia. At the appointed hour Judas comes and takes with him "the troops" (called τὴν στρατιάν, although of course only a detachment from the cohort), together with a number of police (στρατιέραι) under the orders of the high-priests and Pharisees (John xviii, 8). When the apprehension of Jesus was at hand, they furnished any reference to the presence of the military. Matthew and Mark altogether ignore their taking any part in the proceeding. From Luke's account one is led to suppose that the military commander posted his men outside the palace, that he accompanied himself with the Jewish authorities (xxii, 52). This is exactly what might be expected under the circumstances. It was the business of the Jewish authorities to apprehend a Jewish offender, and of the Roman officer to take care that the proceeding led to no breach of the public peace. But when apprehended, the Roman officer became responsible for the custody of the offender, and accordingly he would at once chain him by the wrists to two soldiers (Acts xxii, 86) and carry him off. Here John accordingly gave another glimpse of the presence of the military: "the troops then, and the chiefarch and the officers of the Jews, apprehended Jesus, and put him in bonds, and led him away, first of all to Anna's" (xxvii, 12). The insults which Luke mentions (xxvii, 63) are apparently the barbarous sport of the ruffianly soldiers and police while waiting with their prisoner for the assembling of the Sanhedrin. The details that are the most striking are those with the vine-stick, which the centurions carried, and with which they struck the soldiers on the head and face (Juvénal, Sat. vii, 247), not a flagellation by the hands of lictors. When Jesus was conveyed from the Antonia to the Praetorium, and Pilate, the Jewish officials certainly expected that no inquiry would be made into the merits of the case, but that Jesus would be simply received as a convict on the authority of his own countrymen's tribunal, thrown through into a dungeon, and on the first convenient opportunity executed. They were and were assured at the question, "What accusation bring ye against this man?" and at the apparition of the governor himself outside the precinct of the praetorium. The cheapness in which he had held the life of the native population on a former occasion (Luke xiii, 1) must have led them to expect a totally different course from him. His scrupulousness, most extraordinary in any Roman, stands in striking contrast with the recklessness of the commander who proceeded at once to put St. Paul to torture, simply to ascertain why it was that so violent an attack was made on him by the crowd (Acts xxvi, 24). Yet this latter is undoubtedly a typical specimen of the feeling which prevailed among the conquerors of Judea in reference to the conquered. The order for the execution of a native criminal would in ninety-nine instances out of a hundred have been given by a Roman officer, not a military act—wherein it is a common objection by the advocates of the crucifixion that the sentence was executed at any rate, such an explanation is more in accordance with what we know of the feeling prevalent among his class in that age. When at last Pilate's effort to save Jesus was defeated by the determination of the Jews to claim Barabbas, and he had testified, by washing his hands in the sight of the presence of the people, that he did not consent to the judgment passed on the prisoner by the Sanhedrin, but must be regarded as performing a merely ministerial act, he proceeded at once to the formal imposition of the appropriate penalty. His lictors took Jesus and inflicted the punishment of scourging upon him in the presence of all (Matt. xxi, 26). This, in the Roman idea, was the necessary preliminary to capital punishment, and had Jesus not been an alien his head would have been struck off by the lictors immediately afterwards. But crucifixion being the customary punishment in that case, a different course was necessary. The execution must take place by the hands of the military, and Jesus is handed over from the lictors to these. They take him into the praetorium, and muster the whole cohort—not merely that portion which is actually present, but the whole body on duty at the time. While a centurion's guard is told off for the purpose of executing Jesus and the two criminals, the rest of the soldiers divert themselves by mocking the reputed king of the Jews (Matt. xxvii, 28-30; Mark xv, 17-19; John xix, 2, 9). Pilate, who in the meantime has gone in, is being probably a witness of the pitiable spectacle. His wife's dream still haunts him, and although he has already delivered Jesus over to execution, and what is taking place is merely the ordinary course, he comes out again to the people to protest that He is passive in the matter, and that they must take the prisoner, there before their eyes in the garb of mockery, and crucify him (John xix, 4-6). On their reply that Jesus had asserted himself to be the Son of God, Pilate's fears are still more roused, and at last he is only induced to go on with the military execution, for which he is himself responsible, by the threat of a charge of treason against Caesar in the event of his not doing so (John xix, 7-18). Sitting, then, solemnly on the bema, and producing Jesus, who in the meantime has had his own clothes put upon him, he formally delivers him up to be crucified in such a manner as would be an act of mockery, an act of rule in the discharge of his duty to the emperor (John xix, 13-16). The centurion's guard now proceed with the prisoners to Golgotha. Jesus himself carrying the cross-piece of wood to which his hands were to be nailed. When they were, accordingly, sent to the execution, scourging, he is unable to proceed; but just as they are leaving the gate they meet Simon the Cyrenian, and at once use the military right of pressing (ἀγγαπάω) him for the public service. Arrived at the spot, four soldiers are told off for the business of the executioner, who, the remainder remaining with the crowd to be required to hold the hands, and a third the feet, while the fourth drove in the nails. Hence the distribution of the garments into four parts. The centurion in command, the principal Jewish officials and their acquaintances (hence probably John [John xviii, 15]), and the nearest relatives of Jesus (xix, 26, 27), might naturally be admitted within the corona—a square of perhaps one hundred yards. The people would be kept outside of this, but the distance would not be too great to read the title, "Jesus the Nazarene, the King of the Jews," at any rate to gather its general meaning. The whole acquaintance of Jesus, and the women who had followed him from Galilee—too much afflicted to mix with the crowd in the immediate vicinity, and too numerous to obtain admission inside the corona—looked on from a distance. However, from the corona a small vanguard (John xix, 29) was set within the corona for the benefit of the soldiers, whose duty it was to remain undes arms (Matt. xxvii, 38) until the death of the prisoners, the centurion in command being responsible for their not being taken down alive. Had the Jews not been anxious for the removal of the bodies, in order not to shock the eyes of the people coming in from the country on the following day, the troops would have left the prisoners under simple supervision. As their place was supplied by others until death took place. The jealousy with which any interference with the regular course of a military execution was regarded appears from the application of the Jews to Pilate—not to the centurion—to have the prisoners despatched by breaking their legs. For the performance of this duty other soldiers were detailed (John xix, 32), not merely permission given to the Jews to have the operation performed. Even for the watching of the sepulchre recourse is had to Pilate, who bids the applicants “take a guard” (Matt. xxvii, 65), which they do, and put a seal on the stone in the presence of the soldiers, in a way exactly analogous to that practiced in the custody of the sacred robes of the high-priest in the Antonia (Josephus, Ant. xv, 11, 4). See Crucifixion.

2. The prætorium in Rome, mentioned in Phil. i, 13, where Paul lay imprisoned, has occasioned much discussion among the interpreters, and formed the theme of a learned dispute between Jac. Perizonius and Ulrich Huber (see Perizonius Cum U. Hubero Disquisitio de Praetorio [Lugd. Bat. 1595]). It was not the imperial palace of Rome, nor was it, as some think, the residence of the praetorius, the imperial body-guard, the prætorius cohors, which had been built for it by Tiberius, under the advice of Sejanus (Sueton. Tib. 37). Before that time the guards were billeted in different parts of the city. It stood outside the walls, at some distance short of the fourth milestone, and near either to the Salarian or the Numantian road that Nero, in his flight by one or the other of them to the house of his freedman Phaon, which was situated between the two, heard the cheers of the soldiers within for Galba. In the time of Vespasian the houses seem to have extended so far as to reach it (Tacitus, Ann. iv, 2; Sueton. Ner. 48; Pliny, H. N. iii, 5). From the first, buildings must have sprung up near it for quarters and other purposes. An opinion well deserving consideration has been advanced by Wieseler, and by Conybeare and Howson (Life of St. Paul, ch. xxvii), to the effect that the prætorium in which Paul was imprisoned was a part of that detachment of the Praetorian Guards which was in immediate attendance upon the emperor, and had barracks in Mount Palatine. Thither, wherever the place was, Paul was brought as a prisoner of the emperor, and delivered to the effect of the imperial custom (Acts xxviii, 16; see Pliny, Ep. x, 65; Philostr. Soph. ii, 32), as the younger Agrippa was once imprisoned by this officer at the express command of the emperor Tiberius (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 6). This office was then filled by Aurelius Burchus Afrasianus, Annal. xiii, 42; see Anger, Temp. Act. Ap. p. 100 sqq.). Paul appears to have been permitted for the space of two years to lodge, so to speak, “within the rules” of the prætorium (Acts xxviii, 30), although still under the custody of a soldier. Pragmatic Sanction was a general term from poiyona, business) for all important ordinances of Church of State—those perhaps more properly which were enacted in public assemblies with the counsel of eminent jurists or pragmatickis. The term originated in the Byzantine empire, and signified there a public and solemn decree by a prince, as distinguished from the ordinary simple rescript or放过 which was the answer to a question propounded by an individual. But the most familiar application of the term is to the important articles decided on by the great assembly held at Bourges (q. v.) in 1438, convoked and presided over by Charles VII. These articles have been regarded as the great bulwark of the French Church against the encroachments of the Roman Church and of the pope. King Louis IX had drawn up a pragmatic sanction in 1268 against the encroachments of the Church and court of Rome. It related chiefly to the right of the Gallican Church with reference to the selections of bishops and clergy. But the great articles of 1438 entirely superseded those of Louis IX; for though they reasserted the rights and privileges claimed by the Gallican Church under that monarch, the articles were chiefly founded on the decrees of the Council of Basle. Some of them relate to the periodical assembling and superior authority of the gallican councils, and to the celebration of divine offices and other matters not connected with papal prerogation; but of the rest it has been truly said that the abuses of the papal prerogation against which they were directed were chiefly connected with the invocation of the holy see, and was at the bottom of more than half the grievances which alienated its children from it. Pope Pius II succeeded in obtaining the abrogation of this sanction for a time; but the Parliament of Paris refused to sanction the ignominious conduct of Louis XI in setting aside, and he was compelled to restore it to its original influence position. Accordingly the pragmatic sanction continued in force till Francis I concluded in 1516 supplanted it. Although by the concordat privileges were given and received on both sides, yet the real advantages were on the side of Rome, which advantages it has ever since been her constant aim to improve. Prague. COUNCIL OR (Concilium Propositis), an important ecclesiastical gathering, was convened by archbishop Ernest of Prague in 1346, and passed among other regulations one relating to the proper observance of the Christian faith, the abuses arising from the use of rescripta from Rome, the impropriety of allowing strange priests to assist at cominations without letters from their own bishop, the rights of Roman delegates upon subjects of interdicts, and the private life and morals of the clergy. (See Mann, Concil. iii, col. 548 sqq.; Heffele, Concilienkunde, vol. vi.) How little these efforts for the purifying of the Church and strengthening of the Christian observances were at the time proposed is but too well known to the historical student of the Hussite movement which followed in the next century and finally brought about many strong reforms in Bohemia, besides preparing the way for the great Reformation. Praise, an acknowledgment made of the excellency or perfection of any person or action, with a commendation of the same as of some excellence. In the elegant writer, "is generally connected with all the finer sensibilities of human nature. It affords a ground on which exhortation, counsel, and reproof can work a proper effect. To be entirely destitute of this passion betokens an ignoble mind on which no moral impression.

is easily made, for where there is no desire of praise there will also be no sense of reproach; but while it is admitted to be a natural and in many respects a useful principle of action, we are to observe that it is entitled to no more than our secondary regard. It has its benefits, but it must have a building up, a strengthening, a sanctification, if it is to be transformed from an innocent into a most dangerous passion. When, passing its natural line, it becomes the ruling spring of conduct: when the regard which we pay to the opinions of men encroaches on that reverence which we owe to the voice of conscience and the sense of duty, the love of praise, having got out of its proper place, instead of improving, corrupts, and instead of elevating, debases our nature.” See Young, Love of Fame; Blair, Sermons, vol. ii, ser. 6; Jortin, *Diss. Praise of God is a reverent acknowledgment of the perfectness, works, and benefits of God, and of the blessings flowing from them to mankind, usually expressed in hymns of gratitude and thanksgiving, and especially in the reception of the Holy Eucharist, that “sacrifice of spiritual fruit” of our joyful works, and which has received the name (συγκατάστασις) because it is the highest instance of thanksgiving in which Christians can be engaged. Praise and thanksgiving are generally considered as synonymous, yet some distinguish them thus: “Praise properly terminates in God, on account of his own excellencies and our own perfection, and is that act of devotion by which we confess and admire his several attributes; but thanksgiving is a more contracted duty, and imports only a grateful sense and acknowledgment of past mercies. We praise God for all his glorious acts of every kind that regard either us or other men—for his very vengeance, and those judgments which he sometimes sends abroad in the earth; but we thank him, properly speaking, for the instances of his goodness alone, and for such only of these as we ourselves are some way concerned in.” — Buck, Theol. Dict. See Atterbury, Sermon on Psalms li, 14; Saurin, Sermons, vol. i, ser. 14; Tillotson, Sermons, ser. 146 (conclusion). See Thanksgiving.

Pray Mogla is, in the mythology of the Siamese, a celebrated disciple of Sommacodon, their great saint and protector. His statue, which represents two bodies, is often found beside the statue of his master. He was so compassionate and benevolent that he attempted to extinguish the fire of hell by turning the earth upside down, and gathering in his hand all burning things he found; but the fire destined to punish the lost for their sins was so violent that it burned to ashes everything that was near, and dried up rivers and seas. In his distress Pra Mogla recurred to his master and himself. The saint could easily have fulfilled his wishes, but he feared lest mankind, free from that satanic terror, should fall into greater depravity, and the fire was suffered to keep burning. The wisdom of the god was admired, but the love of the disciple was memorialized by numberless images and statues.

Pra Nas, in Hindo mythology, the breath, the vital principle, which dwells in every man, and has its seat in the heart; it is the divine principle of motion that spreads everywhere life and activity, through which alone the whole nature can subsist, and which manifests itself in the animal world by the act of breathing.

Pra Nasla, a sect among the Hindoos which was originated by Pra Nas, who, being versed in Mohammedan as well as Hindo learning, endeavored to reconcile the two religions. With this view he composed a work called The Mahajiridgul, in which texts from the Koran and the Vedas are brought together, and shown not to be essentially different from each other. Bundelkund is the chief seat of the sect, and in Panina they have a building for the propagation of their sect, and the ancestors of this sect are buried under a great tree covered with gold cloth, lies the volume of the founder. “As a test of the disciple’s consent,” says Prof. H. H. Wilson, “to the real identity of the essence of the Hindo and Mohammedan creeds, the ceremony of the initiation consists of eating in the society of members of both communities.” The ceremony, however, in the love of the general principle, it does not appear that there are two classes confound their civil or even religious distinctions; they continue to observe the practices and ritual of their forefathers, whether Mussulman or Hindo, and the union, beyond that of community or that of eating, is no more than any rational individual of either sect is fully prepared for, or the admission that the God of both and all religions is one and the same.”

Pra Nasla, a name for driving among the Lithuanians, which, according to immutable laws, directs the gods, nature, and men, and whose power knows no limit.

Pra Rasi, in the mythology of the Siamese, hermits who live in complete seclusion, and, by many years of a contemplative existence, have acquired a knowledge of the most remarkable mysteries of nature. Those mysteries are described on the wall which encircles the world, and hence the name Rasi is derived, their knowledge. Thus they possess the secret of flying, of assuming any form at their pleasure, of making precious metals, etc. As they know also the means of giving their body indefinite duration, they could enjoy eternal life; yet every thousand years they undergo the sacrifice of their life by burning themselves on a heap of wood, with the exception of one, who awakens the saints again to renewed life. There are religious writings which indicate the means of getting to these hermits, but it is said to be a very dangerous enterprise.

Pratenia, Felix, is noted as the famous editor of the editio princeps of Bomberg’s Rabbinc Bible. Little is known of his personal history beyond that he was born a Jew, was corrector of the press in Bomberg’s famous printing-office, embraced Christianity in Rome in 1518, was a Benedictine, master theologian, and died in Venice in 1589. The Rabbinc Bible, which immortalized him, was published in four parts (Venice, 1516–17) four years after his embracing Christianity; and, besides the Hebrew text, contains as follows: 1. In The Pontifex, the Chaldee paraphrase of Onias. 2. In The Commentaries of the Recepta. 2. In The Prophecy, the Chaldee paraphrase and the commentaries of Kimchi. 3. In The Hagiographa, the Chaldee paraphrase and Kimchi’s commentary on The Psalms, the Chaldee paraphrase and the Chaldee paraphrase and Kimchi’s commentaries on Job; the reputed Chaldee paraphrases of Joseph the Blind and Rashi’s commentary on The Fire Megiloth; Levi ben-Gershom’s commentary on Daniel; Rashi’s and Simon Darshan’s (יוסף ירושמוי) commentary on Exodus, Nehemiah, and Chronicles, the latter consisting of excerpts from the Jalkut Shimoni. See Cara, Midrash, Appendix to the volume, the Targum Jerusalem on the Pentateuch, the Targum on Esther, the variations between Ben-Asher and Ben-Nachthali, the differences between the Eastern and Western Codes, Aaron b.-Asher’s Dissertation on the Accents, Maimonides’s thirteen articles of faith [see Mishneh Torah], six hundred and thirteen precepts [see Precepts], a Table of the Parboth and Hapharthoth, both according to the Spanish and German ritual. Considering that this was the first effort to give some of the Masoretic apparatus, it is no wonder that the work is imperfect, and that it contains many blunders. Pratenia also published a Latin translation of the Psalms, with annotations, first printed at Venice in 1515, then at Hazenau in 1522, and at Basel in 1526. See Wolf, Biblio-theke Hebraica, ii, 383, iii, 393 sqq.; Masch's ed. of

Praet, Francisco-Maria, an Italian ecclesiastic, noted especially as an antiquarian, was born November, 1689, at Capua. He received holy orders, and was at once provided with a canonry at the Cathedral of Capua.
He died at Naples Nov. 29, 1705. Among his archaeological works was a description of the Appia riconstruita et descritta da Roma a Brindisi (Naples, 1745, 4to); this work is ornamented with plans and maps, and is full of varied erudition:—Di una Moneta singolare del Tiranno Giovanni (ibid. 1748, 8vo); explanation of a medal, the only one of its kind, of a usurper who was proclaimed emperor in 423.—De La Origine della Metropoli ecclesi-astica di Capua (ibid. 1758, 4to). Praetii published an edition, enriched with unpublished documents, dissertations, and a life of the author, of the History Principium 4to). He also wrote De la Vita di S. Gregorio, Princes, in 6 vols. See Nomi illustri del Regno di Na-

Praetorius, Abdiades, a German theologian of some renown, was born in 1524 in the Brandenburg territory.
He was master of many languages, and especially noted as a Greek scholar. He was at first rector of a school at Martenburg, and then at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, where he was called in 1569 to the electoral court of Brandenburg, and died in 1573 as professor of philosophy at Wittenberg. He attacked the Lutheran distinction between law and Gospel, and the definition of the latter as an unconditional message of grace. The most distinguished of his adversaries was Andrew Musculus, one of the authors of The Formula of Concord.

Praetorius, Stephen, a German minister, flourished at Salzwedel towards the close of the 16th century. He was involved in various disputes in consequence of some doctrines professed or approved by Luther, or which seemed to him logical conclusions to be drawn from Luther's theory of justification. He asserted that between righteousness and beatitude there was no difference; that every man who received baptism and believed in Christ was saved, and could dispense with seeking the means to be saved; that the law was useless; that faith and justification obtained by it could be darkened and blemished by sin, but never lost. John Arnd, the Fénélon of the Lutheran Church, published a collection of the writings of Praetorius, and Martin Statius (1655), minister at Dantzig, edited extracts from them under the title Geistliche Schatzkammer der Glaubigen.

Pratt, Albert L., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Wilmington, Vt., in 1828, and was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1851. He was licensed as a local preacher in 1853. In 1855 he was received into what was then the Oneida but is now the Central N. Y. Conference, and was stationed successively at Union Village, Bellawa Falls, Brattleborough, Guilford, Woodstock, Bradford, Rochester, Windsor, and Colchester, where he finished his earthly work. Though constitutionally frail, his pastoral labors were prosecuted with great diligence until his death occurred (July 17, 1876), at Gor-chester, Vt. He was a good man, and succeeded well in the cause of his master.

Pratt, Almon Bradley, a Congregational minister, was born in North Cornwall, Conn., June 8, 1812, receiving his preparatory training at South Cornwall, Conn., and then entered Yale College. He was not, however, able to complete his collegiate studies, as his health failed him. From 1839 to 1841 he was at the Union Theological Seminary in New York City. April 13, 1852, he was ordained as evangelist at Geneseo, Mich., and acted in that place as pastor until 1865, when he removed to Flint, Mich. In 1868 he was called again to the work, and accepted the pastorate at Berea, Ohio. In 1878 he was made districting pastor at Camp Creek, Nebraska, and there he died, Dec. 28, 1875. See The Con-

Pratt, Enoch, a Congregational minister of some note, was born at Middleborough, Mass., in 1781, and was educated at Brown University, where he graduated in 1803. He taught for a while and studied theology, and was finally called to the pastorate of the Congregational Church at West Barnstable, Mass., and held this position until 1837. He never took another pastorate, but preached and wrote occasionally. He devoted himself principally to secular historical studies, especially local subjects, and published in 1844 a Complete History, Ecclesiastical and Civil, of Eastham, Wellfleet, and Orleans, Massachusetts (Yarmouth, 8vo). He died at Brewster
Feb. 2, 1860.

Pratt, James C., an Irish Wesleyan minister of some note, was born in Queen's County, Ireland, in 1780.
His parents were respectable members of the Church of England, and he was in 1806 converted, and joined the Wesleyans. He was licensed to preach in 1804, and four years later was accepted by the Conference as a travelling preacher and appointed to the Ballinafemail Circuit, in 1809 to Lisburn, in 1810 to Carrickfergus, and in 1811 to the city of Armagh, etc.
He continued to travel regularly as a preacher, with "zeal, acceptation, and usefulness," until 1842, when he took a supernumerary relation and settled in Emniskillen, where he had been twice before stationed. In 1846
he removed to Wexford; but as several of his children had settled in New York, he decided to retire to this country, and obtained full permission from his Conference, held in Dublin in 1848, to emigrate. He came here in the fall of that year, and for nearly twenty-two years resided in different places in this country, adorning by his holy life the religion of his country, and loved so well to preach. He died at Jersey City March 11, 1875.

Pratt, Job, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born about 1790, and was admitted in 1814
a member of the New England Annual Conference. At the organization of the Maine Conference he joined that body, and served as its secretary until his death, which occurred at Rumford Feb. 22, 1838. Mr. Pratt was a generally acceptable preacher.—Minutes of Conferences, n.ii, 216.

Pratt, John Bennett, LL.D., a Scottish Episcoopal clergyman, antiquarian, and author, was born in the parish of New Deer in 1791. He took the degree of M.A. at Aberdeen, and, after his ordination as deacon in 1821, was sent to Stuartsfield, where he served with acceptance four years, and was then chosen as pastor of St. James's Church, Cruden. There he became widely known for his theological learning, literary accomplishments, and professional zeal, and received from bishop Skinner the appointment of examining chaplain. He was a writer of several volumes, among which are,
Old Paths—Where is the Good Way? (Oxford, 1840)— Buchan, with illustrations (Aberdeen, 1856)——The Dranice (London, 1861)——Letters on the Scandinavian Churches, their Doctrine, Worship, and Polity, and several Sermons.

PraxeanS is the name of a sect of Monarchians, so called after PraxeanS, the originator of their views. The heretical tenet that there is no distinction of persons in the Godhead, coupled with the acknowledgment of a divine nature in Jesus, leads logically to the conclusion that the Father was incarnate and suffered. Hence, although he himself shrank from the inference, Praxeas is reckoned with the Patrarians. He did not form a schismatical party. Philaster states that the Sabellians, called also Patrarians and Praxeans, were cast out of the church by Victor, but what is the Holy Gospels in all this from this that Praxeas himself was excommunicated.

Our knowledge of Praxeas is derived almost entirely from Tertullian's treatise against him. Augustine, as well as Philaster, names him and his followers under the heresy of Sabellius and, excepting from Tertullian, we have only the bare mention of his name as a heretic. From Tertullian it appears that he went to Rome from Asia, and the words of Tertullian, "oconomiai intelligere nousant etiam Graeci," appear to contain reference to his nation. It is probable that he learned his heresy from a school in Proconsular Asia which produced Noetus (q. v.). If Praxeas held his heresy while in Asia, he can scarcely have been, as he is often said to have been, a Montanist. There was a connection between the later Montanists and the Sabellians; but the earlier Montanists were free from Sabellianism. Tertullian's words imply no more than that Praxeas had in Asia become acquainted with the character of Montanist pretensions and doctrine. See Montanism. In Asia Praxeas had suffered imprisonment ("de justificatione martyrii infanis, ob solum et simplex et breve careceris tanta punitione,"--Tertull., Adv. Marci, c. 17), and with the credit attaching to a confessor he preached his false doctrine at Rome. Whether the doctrine met with resistance, toleration, or favor is not told, but that Praxeas's endeavors to propagate it had but little effect we are entitled to infer from the silence of Hippolytus. There is, however, very great difference of opinion regarding this point: Gieseler says that Praxeas appears to have been unmolested in Rome on account of his doctrine (Compendi, i, 218); Newman, that he met with the determined resistance which honorably distinguishes the primitive Romans (The Ante-Nicene Fathers, ii, p. 313); and Millam, that the indignation of Tertullian at the rejection of his Montanist opinions urged him to array the pope, with what justice, to what extent, we know not, as having embraced the Patrarian opinions of Praxeas (Hist. of Lat. Christianity, 1, 49 [ed. 1867]). The two latter mention, as if inclined to the former, Beausobre's supposition that, in the words of the continuator of the De Prasc. Haret., "Praxeas quidem herearim introduxit, quam Victorinus corruere curavit, sed redit Vincit, Praxeas Victoria in vitam". One may be rather inclined to substitute Zeuxippos. The Refutation of Heresies was called forth by this very controversy, and Hippolytus details carefully the tenets of Noetus, and the action of the bishop of Rome with regard to them. Had Praxeas prepared the way the way for Noetus and the Church for Noetus, his influence would surely have been given, whereas all that can be said is, that in the separate tract against Noetus the opening words will include, but without naming, disciples of Praxeas joining Noetus. It is easy to suppose that Victor, discovering the heresy of Prax ea, and not wishing, for his own sake, to disgrace one upon whose information he had acted, and by whom perhaps he had been influenced in the matter of the Montanists, quietly sent Praxeas from Rome. From Rome Praxeas went into Africa. (We take "hic quoque" in Tertullian's "Herculeavget avenae Praxenae; hic quoque superemine," etc., to mean Carthage; and that Tertullian speaks of himself in "per quem traducet," etc.) The date at which Praxeas arrived at Rome, and the length of his stay there, are not accurately known, but was probably after 201. Before Tertullian became a Montanist (Tertull., Adv. Prax. c. 1). Different dates, from A.D. 199 to 205, are assigned for this latter event. The history of the Montanists is best understood by supposing Praxeas to have been at Rome in Victor's time, and the date of Tertullian's Montanism to have been some time after 205. In such a case there is no dispute, probably with Tertullian, acknowledged his error, and delivered to the Church a formal recantation. But he returned again to his errors, and Tertullian, now a Montanist, wrote his tract in confusion of them.

Praxeas taught that there is only one divine Person, that the Church is the Holy Ghost in person, by concealing the Holy Ghost in person, as the Church is the Holy Ghost in person. He applied the titles which in Holy Scripture are descriptive of deity to the Father alone; and urged particularly the words from the Old Testament, "I am God, and before me there is no god," and from the New Testament the expressions, "I and my Father are one," "He who hath seen me hath seen the Father," "I am in my Father, and my Father in me." While Tertullian unhesitatingly charges Praxeas with holding Patrarian tenets as necessarily following from his principles, Praxeas himself appears not to have gone so far. "Ergo nec compassus est Pater Filii; sic enim directam blasphemam in Patrem ventrit, diminui carnem modo sperant, concedendo et velut duos esse; si Filii quidem patitur, Pater vero comparrit. Stulti et in hoc. Quid est enim compati, quum cum alio pati? Porro, si impassibilia Pater, utique et incompassibilia. Aut si compassibilia, utique passibilia" (Tertull., Adv. Prax., c. xxix). The complicity of the Church in the matter is apparent, in the example of the Praxeans, the second and altered position which Monarchians are obliged to assume when pressed by the difficulties of their original position. It is shown, as Tertullian remarks, that they are driven to conclusions involving the elements of Gnosticism. The Prax ea, when confronted on all sides on the distinction between the Father and the Son, distinguished the Person of Jesus from the Christ. They understood "the Son to be flesh—that is, man—that is, Jesus; and the Father to be spirit—that is, God—that is, Christ." Thus Tertullian testifies that the Father and the Son are one and the same do in fact now begin to divide them rather than to unite them. Such a monarchy as this they learned, it may be, in the school of the Valentinian (ibid. c. xxix). Now this separation of Jesus from Christ was common to all the Gnostics. They were unanimous in denying that Christ was born. Jesus and Christ were to them two separate beings, and the son Christ descended upon Jesus at his baptism. The difference between them and the Praxeans appears to be that they would not say that Jesus is the Son of God, whereas the Gnostics are represented as arguing from the angel's words to Mary that the holy thing born of her was the flesh, and that therefore the flesh was the Son of God. Tertullian shows in opposition to them that the Word was incarnate. In the second stage, we have Jesus called the Son of God, solely, it will follow, on account of a miraculous birth: Christ, or the presence of the Father, residing in Jesus: Jesus suffering, and Christ (=the Father) impassibilia et compasstibilia. In ecclesiastical language the Gnost ic doctrine is easily bridged over; and we have the cause of the comparisons and identifications that are often made of Sabellianism with Gnosticism. See Monarchians.

The heresy of the Praxeans, as distinguished from that of Noetus, did not make much progress. It was almost unknown in Africa before the time of Optatus (i, 37). Prazenes, Sr., was an early convert to Christianity, according to some accounts, of the apostle Peter; but this is, of course, very doubtful, since we do not even know whether Peter was ever at Rome. The acts of his life are so surrounded by traditions as to be almost entirely devoid of trustworthiness; but from these we learn that she was the daughter of St. Pudentianus, a Roman senator, and sister of St. Pudentiana (q. v.). According to the legendary account, Prazenes, with her sister Pudentiana, devoted herself, after Peter had suffered martyrdom, to the relief and care of the suffering Christians, and to the burying of the bodies that were slain in the persecutions. They had the assistance of a holy man named Pastorus, who was devoted in their service. They shrank from nothing that came in the way of their self-imposed duties. They sought out and received into their houses such as were torn and mutilated by tortures. They visited and fed such as were in prison. They took up the bodies of the martyred ones which were cast out without burial, and, carefully washing and shrouding them, they laid them reverently in the caves beneath their houses. All the blood they collected with sponges, and deposited in a certain well. Thus boldly they showed forth the fact that they were in them, and yet, according to the most trustworthy accounts, they escaped persecution and martyrdom, and died peacefully and were buried in the cemetery of Priscilla. Pastorus wrote a history of their deeds and virtues. Their house, in which the apostle is reported to have preached, was consecrated as a place of Christian worship by pope Pius I. Their churches are among the interesting remains of ancient Rome. In the nave of the church of Santa Prassede is a well, in which she is said to have put the blood of those who suffered on the altar of Sulpicius, while the holy sponges were placed in silver shrine in the sacristy. In the church of St. Pudentiana there is a well, said to contain the relics of 800 martyrs. In Christian art they have frequently been made the subject of the painter's brush, and the two sisters are usually represented together, richly draped. The sponge and cup are their especial attributes. They are commemorated on the days on which they are supposed to have died—July 21 and May 19, A.D. 148. See Schiff, Church History, vol. ii; Butler, Lives of the Saints. (J. H. W.)

Praxidice, a surname of Persephone among the Greeks. For a later period she was accounted a goddess who was concerned with the jurisdiction of justice to the human family. The daughters of Ogyges received the name of Praxidice, and were worshipped under the figure of heads of animals.

Praxiphanes (Πραξιφάνης), a Periatic philosopher, was a native either of Mytilene (Clem. Alex. i, 365, ed. Pottier) or of Rhodes (Strabo, xiv, 655). He lived in the time of Demetrius Poliorcetes and Ptolemy Lagi, and was a pupil of Theophratus, about B.C. 892 (Proclus, i, in Timaeum; Thesprot, Ad Iesiod. Op. et Dea, 1). He subsequently opened a school himself, in which Epicurus is said to have been one of his pupils (Diog. Laert. x, 13). Praxiphanes paid special attention to grammatical studies, and is hence named along with Aristotle as the founder and creator of the science of grammar (Clem. Alex. L. c.; Bekker, Anecdota, ii, 229, where Πραξιφάνης should be read instead of Τέλεμαρχος, ib.). The writings of Praxiphanes appear to have been lost, but have no historical interest today. See Preller, De disputato Praxiphanei Periatici inter antiquissimos grammaticos nobilis (Dorpat, 1842).

Pray, George, a Hungarian Jesuit, noted as a historian, was born at Pressburg in 1724. In 1740 he entered the Society of Jesus, taught in several of their schools, and bore an important part in all the suppression of his order, historiographer of the kingdom of Hungary, and conservator of the library of Buda. In 1790 he obtained a canonry at Grosswardein. He died near the close of the 18th century. Pray wrote, Annales veteres Hungariorum, Avarorum et Hungarorum ad annum Christi, MDCXCVII (Vienna, 1761, fol., followed by Supplements, ibid. 1762, fol.).—Annales veterum Hungarorum ad annum Chr. Prayer. The words generally used in the O. T. are יְדַעַת, ἐπιθυμία (from the root תָּפֵּס, "to incline," "to be gracious," whence in Hiph. "to entreat grace or mercy;" Sept. generally, ἐπιθυμεῖ, Vulg. "deprecatio"); and יְפַלָּת, ἐπιθύμητα (from the root תָּפֵּס, "to judge," whence in Hiph. "to seek judgment;" Sept. προσέρχεται; Vulg. nortio). The latter is also used to express intercessory prayer. The two words point to the two chief objects sought in prayer, viz. the prevalence of right and truth, and the gift of mercy. A very frequent formula for prayer in the O. T. is the phrase יְדַעַת לְנָשֶׁגְתָה, סְבָלָה נִשְׁגְּתָה; to call upon the name of Jehovah. The usual Greek term is ἐπιθυμεῖ, which originally signified only a wish; but ἐπιθυμεῖ, to beg (properly to want), is a frequent expression for prayer.

1. Scriptural History of the Subject.—1. That prayer was coeval with the fallen race we cannot doubt, and it was in all probability associated with the first sacrifice. The first definite account of its public observance occurs in the remarkably expressive recorded in the lifetime of Enos, the son of Seth: "Then began men to call upon the name of the Lord." (Gen. iv, 26). From that time a life of prayer evidently marked the distinction between the pious and the wicked. The habit was maintained in the chosen family of Abraham, as is evident from frequent instances in the history of the Hebrew patriarchs. Moses, however, received no specific commands with reference to this part of religious service (comp. Spanheim, Ad Callimich. Pallad. p. 189; Creuzer, Symboli i, 164 sq.), and prayer was not by law interwoven with the public worship of God among the Hebrews (but comp. Deut. xxvi, 10, 18, and the prayer of atonement offered by the high-priest, Lev. xvi, 23). We do not know whether, before the exile, prayer was customarily joined with sacrificial offerings (Habid, i, 490 sq.; Odyg. xiv, 428; Lucian, Dea Syr. 57; Curtius, iv, 18, 15; Pliny, H. N. xxi, 8; see lambich, Mystere, v. 38). Yet, at the return from the Babylonian captivity, those prayers in which the Lord had appeared in Mount Moriah, or those prayers addressed to the Lord in the wilderness, or of which Moses was a special medium, were not recognized (comp. Otho, Lex. Rab. p. 164). An extraordinary instance of public prayer occurs in 1 Kings viii, 22. We see that prayer as a religious exercise, in the outer court of the sanctuary, though not expressly commanded, was yet supposed and expected. (Psa. cxii, 2; Rev. vii, 9; Psal. xxvi, 4, 6, 12, 17; Jer. xxiii, 1; see also Bähr, Symbolik, i, 461 sq.) As private devotion prayer was always in general use (comp. Isa, i, 15; Credner, On Joel, p. 192, supposes from Joel ii, 16, and Matt. xviii, 8; xix, 14; Psa. viii, 9, that especial virtue PRAYER was ascribed to the prayers of innocent children; but without ground). After the time of the exile prayer came gradually to be viewed as a meritorious work, an opus operatum. Prayer and fasting were considered the two great divisions of personal piety (Tob. xii, 9; Jud. iv, 12). It was customary to offer prayer before eating meals (Exod. xix, 1; 2 Chron. ix, 40; Hiad. ix, 172; xxiv, 308; Pythag. Carmen Astr. 48); as in war before a battle (1 Macc. v, 38; xi, 71; 2 Macc. xxv, 26; comp. viii, 29). Three times a day prayer was repeated (Dan. vi, 11; comp. Psal. iv, 18; Tom. ix, 4, in Schöttgen, § 47, 419); namely, at the third hour (9 A.M., Acts ii, 15, the time of the morning sacrifice in the Temple); at mid-day, the sixth hour (12 M., x, 9); and in the afternoon, at the ninth hour (3 P.M., the time of the evening sacrifice in the Temple); comp. Dan. ix, 21; Josephus, Ant. xiv, 4, 8; see also Acts iii, 1; x, 80; Thilo, Apocr. i, 826; Schöttgen, Op. cit. p. 418 sq.; Wettstein, ii, 471). Compare the three or four fold repetition of songs of praise by the Egyptian priests each day (Porphy. Arg. iv, 8). The Mohammedans, too, are well known to have daily hours of prayer, either usual, too, before or after eating. The utter form of prayer or thanks (Matt. xi, 36; John vi, 11; Acts xxvii, 35; Philo, opp. ii, 481; Porphyry. Abstinent. iv, 12; see Kunoir, De precum ante et post comedam op. Judeos et Christ. faciendum venere, antiquitate, etc. [Lips. 1764]). The Pharaonic and Egyptian saves to this day. The formers, indeed, made a display of this form of devotion (Matt. vi, 5, and humored their own conceit by making their prayers very long. See Pharaonic. Permanent forms of prayer were already customary in the time of Christ (Luke xii, 1), perhaps chiefly the same which are contained in the Mishna, Berachoth (comp. Pirke Aboth, ii, 13). The Lord's Prayer, too, has several, though not very important, agreements with the forms in the Talmud (see Schöttgen, i, 180 sq.; Vir- tingers, De Synagog. vi. p. 302; Otho, Lex. Jud. p. 582; Tholuck, Brengprecht, p. 387 sq.). Private prayer was practiced by the Israelites chiefly in retired chambers in their houses (Matt. vi, 6), especially in the "upper room" (Dan. vi, 11; Judith viii, 5; Tob. iii, 12; Acts i, 18; x, 9), and on the roof. If in the open air, an emi- nence was sought for (Matt. xvi, 22; Mark vi, 46; Luke vi, 12; comp. 1 Kings xvi, 42). The inhabitants of Jerusalem were fondest of going to the court of the Temple (Luke xviii, 10; Acts iii, 1; comp. Isa. iv, 7; see Amos. Adu. Gen. vi. 4; Lakemacher, Antiq. Gr. Sacramentum, 255, by that hour of prayer in the street stood there and said prayer on the spot. In every case the face was turned towards the holy hill of the Temple (Dan. vii, 2; 2 Chron. vii, 4; 5 Esdr. iv, 58; Mishna, Berach. iv, 5), but by the Samaritans to Gerizim. In the court of the Temple the face was turned to the Temple Habitat (1 Kings viii, 38), to the Holy of Holies (Psal. vi, 8; see Thilo, Apocr. i, 29). Thus the Jews praying then faced the west, while the modern Jews in Europe and America face the east in prayer. It was an early custom among Christians, too, to turn the face to the east in praying (Orig., Hom. 5, in Num., in Op. ii, 284; Clem. Alex. Strom. vii, 724; comp. Tertul. Apol. xvi). The Mohammedans turn the face towards Mecca (Rosen- miller, Morgen. 11, 501). The usual posture in prayer was standing (1 Sam. i, 26; 1 kings vii, 22; 2 Kings, xx, 20; Matt. vi, 5; Mark xi, 25; Luke xvi, 11; comp. Hiad. xxiv, 308 sq.; Martail, xii, 77, 2; Al Koran, v, 8; Mishna, Berach. v, 1; Philo, opp. ii, 481; Wettstein, i, 821). But in earnest devotion, bending the knee, or actual kneeling, was practiced (2 Chron. xi, 18; 1 Kings xvi, 39; 2 Kings v, 2; Josh. xi, 40; the body was even thrown to the ground (Gen. xxiv, 26; Neh. viii, 6; Judith ii, 1; Matt. xxi, 89). The hands before prayer must be made clean. Says the Mishna, He that prays with unclewed hands commits deadly sin (Sokar Deut. f. 101, 427; comp. 1 Tim. ii, 8; Odys. ii, 261; Clem. Alex. Strom. iv, 581; Chrysost. Hom. 48, in 1 Cor.). The hands were then, in standing, often lifted up towards heaven (1 Kings viii, 22; Neh. viii, 7; Lam. ii, 19; iii, 41; Psal. xxxvii, 2; cxxxviii, 2; 2 Macc. iii, 20; 1 Tim. ii, 8; Philo, opp. ii, 481, 534; Hiad. i, 409; Virgil, Aen. iii, 38; Horace, Od. viii, 29, 13; 1 Cor. x, 10; 2 Cor. vii, 14); comp. Senec. Ep. 41; Wettstein, ii, 528; Doughtaiy. Anec. iii, 185); sometimes were spread out (Ios. i, 15; Ezra ix, 5); and in humble prayers of penitence were laid meekly on the breast, or sometimes the breast was struck with them (Luke xviii, 13). It was peculiar to prayer that was dropping the head beneath the breast (Psal. xxxvii, 18), or between the knees (1 Kings xvii, 42). This was done in great sorrow. The former is still customary among the Mohammedans (see the figs. in Reland's De Relig. Mus. p. 87). See Attitude. Extensive treatises on the kinds of prayer, and their order and conduct, are given in the Mishna (treatise Berachoth) and the double Gemara (in German by Rabe [Halle, 1777]; see also Otho. Lex. Rab. p. 537 sq.). One species of prayer was intercession. Almost infallible virtue was ascribed to it when offered to it with great fervor, and the Song comp. Dioec. Sic. iv, 61; Apollod. iii, 12, 6; Gen. xx, 7; Exod. xxxii, 11 sq.; 1 Kings xviii, 20 sq.; Josephus, Ant. xiv, 2, 1; 2 Cor. i, 11; 1 Tim. ii, 1 sq.; Phil. i, 19). Hence it was common to request the prayers of others (1 Thees. ii, 25; 2 Thes. iii, 1; Heb. xii, 18; comp. Deelyng, Opp. vii, 25; Phil. ii, 1). See Prayer. The formers, indeed, made a display of this form of devotion (Matt. vi, 5, and humored their own conceit by making their prayers very long. See Pharaonic. Permanent forms of prayer were already customary in the time of Christ (Luke xii, 1), perhaps chiefly the same which are contained in the Mishna, Berachoth (comp. Pirke Aboth, ii, 13). The Lord's Prayer, too, has several, though not very important, agreements with the forms in the Talmud (see Schöttgen, i, 180 sq.; Vit-
The latter contains a recital of all God's blessings to the children of Israel from Abraham to the captivity, a confession of their continual sins, and a fresh dedication of themselves to the covenant. It is clear that both are likely to have exercised a strong liturgical influence, and accordingly we find that the public prayer in the Mosaic period was: 'The Lord be gracious unto thee, etc.' closed this service. Afterwards, at the offering of the meat-offering, there followed the singing of psalms, regularly fixed for each day of the week, or specially appointed for the great festivals (see Bingham, bk. xiii, ch. v, § 4). A somewhat similar liturgy formed a regular part of the synagogue worship, in which there was a regular minister, as the leader of prayer (Ῥόμπτερ Βασίλειον), and public prayer, as well as private, was the special object of the Proseuche. It appears, also, from the question of the disciples in Luke xi, 1, and from Jewish tradition, that the chief teachers of the day gave special formal prayers to their disciples, as the badge of their discipleship and best fruits of their learning. See Forms of Prayer.

All Christian prayer is, of course, based on the Lord's Prayer; but its spirit is also guided by that of his prayer in Gethsemane, and of the prayer recorded by St. John (ch. xvii), the beginning of his great work of intercession. The first is the comprehensive type of the simplest and most universal prayer; the second justifies prayers for special blessings of this life, while it limits them by perfect resignation to God's will; the last, dwelling as it does on the knowledge and glorification of God, and the communion of love between himself and his people as the one object of prayer and life, is the type of the highest and most spiritual devotion. The Lord's Prayer has given the form and tone of all ordinary Christian prayer; it has fixed, as its leading principles, simplicity and confidence in our Father, community of sympathy with all men, and practical reference to our own life; it has shown, as its true objects, first the glory of God, and next the needs of man. To the intercessory prayer we may trace up its transcendental element, its desire of that communion through love with the nature of God which is the secret of all individual holiness and of all community with men.

The influence of these prayers is more distinctly traced in the prayers contained in the Epistles (see Eph. iii, 14-21; Rom. xvi, 25-27; Phil. i, 3-11; Col. i, 9-13; Heb. xiii, 20-21, 1 Pet. v, 10, 11, etc.) than in those recorded in the Acts. The public prayer, which from the beginning became the principle of life and unity in the Church (see Acts ii, 42; and comp. i, 24, 25; iv, 24-30; vi, 6; xii, 5; xiii, 2, 8; xvii, 25, xx, 36; xxii, 5), probably in the first instance took much of its form and style from the prayers of the synagogues. The only form given (besides the very short one of Acts i, 24, 25), dwelling as it does (Acts iv, 24-30) on the Scriptures of the O.T. in their application to our Lord, seems to mark this connection. It was probably by degrees that they assumed the distinctively Christian character.

Lastly, in the record of prayers accepted and granted by God, we observe, as always, a special adaptation to the period of his dispensation to which they belong. In the patriarchal period they have the simple and childlike tone of domestic supplication for the simple and apparently trivial incidence of life: 'pray for us.' Intercession for the welfare of Abraham for children (Gen. xv, 2, 8); for Ishmael (xvii, 18); of Isaac for Rebekah (xxv, 21); of Abraham's servant in Mesopotamia (xxvii, 12-14); although sometimes they take a wider range in intercession, as with Abraham for Sodom (Gen. xviii, 20-33), and for Abimelech (xx, 7, 17). In the Mosaic period they assume a more solemn tone and a national bearing, chiefly that of direct intercession for the chosen people, as by Moses (Num. xii, 2; xiii, 18; xxvi, 7); by Samuel (1 Sam. vii, 5, 19, 28); by David (2 Sam. xxiv, 17, 18); by Hezekiah (2 Kings xiv, 15-19); by Isaiah (2 Kings xix, 1, 2); by Daniel (Dan. x, 20, 21); or of prayer for national victory, as by Asa (2 Chron. xiv, 11): Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx, 6-12). More rarely are they for individuals, as in the prayer of Hannah (1 Sam. i, 12); in that of Hezekiah in his sickness (2 Kings xx, 2); the intercession of Samuel for Saul (1 Sam. xvi, 11, 25), etc. A special class are those which precede and refer to the exercise of miraculous power, as by Moses (Exod. viii, 12, 30, xv, 25); by Elijah at Zarephath (1 Kings xvii, 20) and Carmel (1 Kings xviii, 36, 37); by Elijah at Shunem (2 Kings iv, 38) and Dothan (vi, 17, 18); by Isaiah (2 Kings xx, 11); by St. Peter for Tabitha (Acts ix, 40); by the elders of the Church (James v, 14-16). In the New Testament they have a more directly spiritual bearing, such as the prayer of the Church for protection and grace (Acts iv, 28-30); of the Apostles for their converts (viii, 15); of Cornelius for guidance (x, 31); of the Church of St. Peter (xvi, 5); of St. Paul at Philippi (xvi, 25); of St. Paul against the thorn in the flesh answered, although not granted (2 Cor. xii, 7-9), etc. It would seem the intention of Holy Scripture to encourage all prayer more generally, especially intercession, for all relations and for all righteous objects. See Lord's Prayer.

II. Christian Doctrine on the Subject.—1. Prayer is a request or petition for mercies; or it is "an offering-up of our desires to God, for things agreeable to his will; or the name of Christ, by the help of his Spirit, with con-fession of our sins, and thankful acknowledgment of his mercies." Nothing can be more rational or consistent than the exercise of this duty. It is a divine injunction, so that men should always pray, and not fail (Luke xviii, 1). It is highly proper we should acknowledge the obligations we are under to the Divine Being, and supplicate his throne for the blessings we stand in need of. It is essential to our peace and felicity, and is the happy means of our carrying on and enjoying fellowship with God. It has an influence on our tempers and conduct, and evinces our subjection and obedience to God.

2. The object of prayer is God alone, through Jesus Christ as the Mediator. All supplications, therefore, to saints or angels are not only useless, but blasphemous. All worship of the nature of nature, however appropriate it may, is, idolatry, and is strictly prohibited in the sacred law of God. Nor are we to pray to the Trinity as three distinct Gods; for though the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost be addressed in various parts of the Scripture (2 Cor. xiii, 14; 2 Thess. ii, 16, 17), yet never as three Gods, for that would lead us directly to the doctrine of polytheism: the more ordinary mode the Scripture points out is to address the Father through the Son, depending on the Spirit to help our infirmities (Eph. ii, 18; Rom. viii, 28).

3. As to the nature of this duty, it must be observed that it does not consist in the elevation of the voice, the posture of the body, the use of a form, or the mere temporary use of words, nor, properly speaking, in anything of an exterior nature; but simply the offering up of our desires to God (Matt. xvi, 8). (See the definition above.) It has generally been divided into adoration, by which we express our sense of the goodness and greatness of God (Dan. iv, 85, 85); confession, by which we acknowledge our unworthiness (1 John i, 9); supplication, by which we pray for pardon, grace, or any special blessings we want (1 Pet. v, 7); intercession, by which we pray for others (James v, 15); and thanksgiving, by which we express our gratitude to God (Phil. iv, 6). To these some add invocation, a making mention of one or more of the names of God; pleading, arguing our case with God in a humble and fervent manner; dedi-

oration, or surrendering ourselves to God; deprecation, by which we desire that evils may be averted; blessing, in which we express our joy in God, and gratitude for his mercies; but as all these appear to be included in the first five parts of prayer, they need not be insisted on. 4. The different kinds of prayer are, (1.) Ejaculatory, by which the mind is directed to God on any emergency. It is derived from the word ejaculare, to dart or shoot out suddenly, and is therefore appropriated to describe this kind of prayer, which is made up of short sentences, spontaneously springing from the mind. The Scriptures afford us many instances of ejaculatory prayer (Exod. xiv. 15; 1 Sam. i. 18; Rom. vii, 24, 25; Gen. xxiii, 29; Judges xi, 28; Luke xxi, 42, 43). It is one of the principal excellences of this kind of prayer that it can be practiced at all times, and in all places; in the public ordinances of religion; in all our ordinary and extraordinary undertakings; in times of affliction, temptation, and danger; in seasons of social intercourse; in worldly business; in travelling; in sickness and pain. In fact, everything around us, and every event that occurs, is an occasion for the ejaculation. It is worthy, therefore, of our practice, especially when we consider that it is a species of devotion that can receive no impediment from any external circumstances, that it has a tendency to support the mind, and keep it in a state of attention; that it is of great importance, in the salutary effects of the tempers and doctrines of the world; elevates our affections to God; directs the mind into a spiritual channel; and has a tendency to excite trust and dependence on Divine Providence.

(2.) Secret or closet prayer is another kind of prayer to which we should attend. It has its name from the manner in which Christ recommended it (Matt. vi. 6). He himself set us an example of it (Luke vi. 12); and it has been the practice of the saints in every age (Gen. xxviii, xxxii; Dan. vi, 10; Acts x, 9). There are some snares and dangers with the practice of this devotion, which may be practiced to advantage, as when we are entering into any important situation; undertaking anything of consequence; before we go into the world; when calamities surround us (Isa. xxxvi, 20); or when ease and prosperity attend us. As closet prayer is calculated to inspire us with peace, defend us from our spiritual enemies, excite us to obedience, and promote our real happiness, we should be watchful lest the stupidity of our frame, the intrusion of company, the cares of the world, the insinuations of Satan, the indulgence of sensual objects, prevent us from the constant exercise of this necessary and important duty.

(3.) Family prayer is also another part not to be neglected. It is true there is no absolute command for this In God's Word; yet, from hints, allusions, and examples we may learn that it was the practice of ancient saints—Abraham (Gen. xvii, 19), David (2 Sam. vi, 20), Solomon (Prov. xxii, 6), Job (i, 4, 5), Joshua (xxiv, 15). (See also Eph. vi, 4; Prov. vi, 20; Jer. x, 25; Acts x, 2, 50; xv, 15.) Family prayer, indeed, may not be essential to the character of a true Christian, but it is surely no honor to heads of families to have it said that they have no religion in their houses. If we consider what a blessing it is likely to prove to our children and our domestics; what comfort it must afford to ourselves; of what utility it may prove to the community at large; how it sanctifies domestic comforts and crosses; and what a tendency it has to promote order, decency, sobriety, and religion in general, we must at once see the propriety of attending to it. The objection often made that family prayer is a waste of time; but this is a very frivolous and silly objection to the time allowed for this purpose; need be but short, and may easily be redeemed from sleep or business. Others say they have no gifts; where this is the case, a form may soon be procured and used, but it should be remembered that gifts increase by exercise, and no man can properly decide unless he make repeated trials. Others are deterred through shame, or the fear of man: in answer to such, we refer them to the declarations of our Lord (Matt. x, 37, 88; Mark viii, 88). As to the season for family prayer, every family must determine for itself; but before breakfast every morning, and before supper at night, seems most proper. A quarter of an hour or twenty minutes may be sufficient as to the time.

(4.) Social prayer is another kind Christians are called upon to attend to. It is denominated social because it is offered by a society of Christians in their collective capacity, convened for that particular purpose, either on some peculiar occasion, or at stated and regular seasons. Special prayer-meetings are as such as are held at the meeting and parting of intimate friends, especially churches and ministers: when the Church is in a state of unusual deadness and barrenness; when ministers are sick, or taken away by death; in times of public calamity and distress, etc. Stated meetings for social prayer are such as are held weekly in some places which have a special regard to the state of the nation and churches; missionary prayer-meetings for the spread of the Gospel; weekly meetings held separately for the exclusive purposes of the congregation, at more particular reference to their own churches, ministers, the sick, feeble, and weak of the flock. Christians are greatly encouraged to this kind of prayer from the consideration of the promise (Matt. xxi, 20), the benevolence of the highest power. No people has more eminent primitive saints (Mal. iii, 16; Acts xii, 12), the answers given to prayer (Acts xi, 1-12; Josh. x; Isa. xxxvi, etc.), and the signal blessing they are to the churches (Phil. i, 19; 2 Cor. i, 11). These meetings should be attended with regularity; those who engage should study simplicity, brevity, Scripture language, seriousness of spirit, and everything that has a tendency to edification. We now come, lastly, to take notice of public prayer, or that in which the whole congregation is engaged, either in repeating a set form or acquiescing in the prayers of others to lead their devotions. This is both an ancient and important part of religious exercise; it was a part of the patriarchal worship (Gen. iv, 26); it was also carried on by the Jews (Exod. xxix, 48; Luke i, 10). It was a part of the Temple-service (Isa. lvi, 7; 1 Kings viii, 59). Jesus Christ recommended it both by his example and instruction (Matt. xxvii, 20; Luke iv, 16). The disciples also attended to it (Acts ii, 41, 42), and the Scriptures in many places countenance it (Exod. xx, 24; Psal. lxxi, 2, 11; Mal. i, 11; xxvi, 4, 11; xxvii, 4). III. Philosophical Difficulties.—1. Scripture does not give any theoretical explanation of the mystery which attaches to prayer. The difficulty of understanding its real efficacy arises chiefly from two sources: from the belief that man lives under general laws, which in all cases must be fulfilled unalterably; and the opposing belief that he is master of his own destiny, and need pray for no external blessing. The first difficulty is even increased when we substitute the belief in a personal God for the sense of an impersonal destiny; since not only does the predestination of God seem to render prayer useless, but his wisdom and love, giving freely to man all that is good for him, appear to make it needless.

The difficulty is familiar to all philosophy, the former element being far the most important: the logical inference from it is the belief in the absolute uselessness of prayer. But the universal instinct of prayer, being too strong for such reasoning, generally exacted as a compromise the use of prayer for general things (the "men sana in corpore sano"); a compromise the-

If we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us; and if we know that he heareth us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him.

It is also implied that the key to the mystery lies in the fact of man's spiritual unity with God in Christ, and of the consequent gift of the Holy Spirit. All true and prevailing prayer is to be offered "in the name of Christ" (John xiv, 13; xv, 16; xxvi, 23-27), that is, not only for the sake of his atonement, but also in dependence on his intercession; which is therefore as a central influence, acting on all prayers offered, to throw off whatever in them is evil, and give efficacy to all that is in accordance with the divine will. So also is it said of the spiritual influence of the Holy Ghost on each individual mind, that while "we know not what to pray for," the indwelling "Spirit makes intercession for the saints, according to the will of God" (Rom. viii, 26, 27). Here, as probably in all other cases, the action of the Holy Spirit on the soul is to free agents what the laws of nature are to things inanimate, and is the power which harmonizes free individual action with the universal will of God. The mystery of prayer, therefore, like all others, is seen to be resolved into that great central mystery of the Gospel, the communion of man with God in the incarnation of Christ. Beyond this we cannot go. See PRAYER.

2. The discussion provoked by Prof. Tyndall's so-called "Prayer-test" (q.v.) has given a fresh interest to the question, How far are we entitled to expect the divine interference with the ordinary course of nature in answer to prayer? The question practically resolves itself into another and simpler one, Have miracles ceased in the present age of the Church? This latter is properly a question of fact; and it is very generally answered in the affirmative. The modern instances of miracle-working are too few and uncertain to warrant any other conclusion. And we have the objective evidence that, when we turn outward with claims to the power have sooner or later proved themselves miserable pretenders, and hence the world has justly abandoned all hope in this direction. Whether the power of working miracles was intended to be only a temporary grant to the apostolic age, and whether therefore it need have been lost out of the Church, is an entirely different question. For aught we can see, there is no limit set in the N. T. for its possession and exercise, save the implied one of its necessity; and whether this condition has yet wholly passed away admits of dispute. We are, however, persuaded that the fact that large portions of the earth are yet unchristianized. But it would be of little avail to argue this abstract question. Unless we can bring recent and well-authenticated cases of miracles wrought publicly and indisputably, few, if any, will believe that we have now the power. This, we apprehend, is really the settled and universal conviction of Christian people of the present day—of Protestants at least. Hence to Prof. Tyndall's challenge that we should test the efficacy of prayer by a miraculous answer, we simply reply that we do not expect any such thing, nor do we feel ourselves authorized to pray for it. This is not now the legitimate scope or province of Christian prayer.

We are well aware that a certain class of well-attested and indeed not infrequent facts is commonly appealed to in order to maintain at least the vestiges of this power as still extant in the Church. Most striking, perhaps, among these occurrences are the remarkable cases of recovery from an apparently incurable sickness, some of which have transpired within the knowledge of almost every one. These have sometimes taken place in a very marked manner in answer to the prayers of friends and congregations. Far be it from us to deny the efficacy of prayer in such cases, or to say a word that would discourage prayer in other like cases. But none of these cases—we mean those of which we have sufficient details and full authority—are any evidence to the idea and definition of a proper miracle. They all lack at least three of the essential circumstances of such an event: 1st. They are not obvious, palpable, direct, and instantaneous reversals of the established laws of nature. Many persons have been raised from a seeming deadness or were restored to a state of life by various means of restoration had been abandoned, and yet no one thought of a miracle; perhaps no one had even prayed for recovery. The cases are not clearly supernatural. 2d. These cures are not effected by any individual consciously and avowedly authorized to exercise the divine power in the case. In a miracle there must be no misgiving, no hesitation, no shifting of responsibility on the part of the operator. He must positively know and explicitly assert that he is "the finger of God;" otherwise his act becomes the most blasphemous assumption. 3d. Genuine miracles have only been wrought as an ocular demonstration of the commission of a divine messenger or teacher; they have in all instances been resorted to solely in personal attestation of sacred truth. No new doctrine or fresh communication from Heaven purports to be made in connection with the remarkable cases under consideration. The cures are besought as a personal favor, out of regard for private feeling or public usefulness. But these were not the motives which induced our Lord or his apostles to work miracles. The object of them was to prove the truth of Christianity. Just here, if anywhere, may doubtless be discovered the reason why miracles have not been perpetuated. There remains no longer any fresh revelation of God's will to man; no new dispensation or even agencies are to be established on the divine part; and therefore no such special credentials are issued from the court of heaven. Its ambassadors have only the common seal of the Gospel—the fruits of their ministry.

The same kind of argument disposes of all the other special providences often cited in proof of a divine intervention in answer to prayer. These likewise are not miracles, nor are they commonly so regarded. There is, however, much of valuable truth in the assumption of their pertinency here, namely, that they are really and purposely interferences of God on behalf of those interested, and at the request of the petitioners. That God is able to introduce himself at any and every point in mundane affairs, whether great or small, is one of the clearest doctrines of the Bible; in fact, it is a necessary supposition in any religion. But that he is able to change the character of the universe, or to confound government with revolution, to destroy a universal and immemorial order, to suspend the "laws of nature" with equal certainty his prerogative as Creator and Preserver of all. To argue otherwise is either to dethrone him from the dominion of the universe, or to confound government with revolution. For God is both immanent and transcendent, it is extraordinary, but it is not therefore out of or contrary to fixed rule. Just here, on the other hand, we must be permitted to enter our protest against the specious reasoning in Bushnell's Nature and the Supernatural, which, in our judgment, virtually does away with all miracle by reducing it to an imaginary, higher, and hitherto unknown law of divine establishment, called "moral," so as to save it from the odium of conflict with nature. A miracle, by its very definition, must be a supersEDURE—or a temporary violation, if you please—of a well-known and fixed law of nature. It is upon precisely this point that its whole significance depends. Eliminate this element, and you destroy its entire moral force. That the laws of physical nature are administered in ultimate subservience to those of the moral universe is the economy approved no less by reason than by fact. But these must not be merged the one in the other, even if they should be imagined in any case to collide. Especially must we not assume the intrusion of a superior moral law into the domain of nature, supplanting it in that sphere, and so divesting a miracle of all its peculiarities. For God works a miracle be set aside, we must suppose, a certain law or series of laws of nature for the time being, and in that particular respect, by virtue of his own superior right as creator. It is not merely the spontaneous super- vention of a mightier overturning law up to that time held in abeyance for such conjunctions. The latter assumption is but the crudest base of a religious un- rationalism, which would fain, at all hazard, divest the miracles of the Bible of their supernatural character. We must never forget that a miracle is a physical fact, but one in its very nature abnormal from a scientific point of view.

Nor do we overlook the argument derived from the moral change effected by the Holy Spirit in regeneration and sanctification. These are often claimed as miracles of grace. That they are supernatural, in the sense of being wrought by a power beyond and superior to human nature, is certainly true; but the fact that they are specially, or even immediately, the work of God does not prove them to be properly miraculous. For, in the first place, in this respect they are merely analogous to any act of particular divine providence, and in like manner they lack all the characteristics of a miracle, namely, a point-blank contradiction of natural law, the authoritative behest of an operator, and a moral truth to be sanctioned. They are answers to prayer which await the divine pleasure, on the performance of which the performance in question is dependent, under fixed conditions. They are in no sense special or arbitrary. On the contrary, they are most fully under the dominion of law, and can be counted upon with the most invariable certainty. They are as sure to follow the diligent use of the appointed means as any other effect is to flow from its appropriate cause. Indeed, all the healful and legitimate influences of the Spirit are normal and in the regular line of our own mental action (John iii, 8). Even the afflatus of inspiration is no exception to this rule (I Cor. xiv, 23). But, in the second place, the spiritual character of the revolution at conversion places it altogether outside the category of miraculous events. These latter always have reference, more or less intimately, to the realm of physics; they appeal to the senses; they must be susceptible of ocular, audible, tangible proof. This is their only security against imposture or self-delusion. If in any case, as in the instance of the miraculous "gift of unknown tongues" in the early Church, and the expulsion of demons from the possessed, they have their seat in the mind, yet they exhibit palpable evidences through the organs and senses of the impressed subject, he is not the endowed, and the rational behavior of the dispossessed. In short, miracles are material evidences of a supernatural authority.

In the discussion of this whole question we would do well to see to our fundamental, or even extraordinary, but it is not therefore out of or contrary to fixed rule. Just here, on the other hand, we must be permitted to enter our protest against the specious reasoning in Bushnell's Nature and the Supernatural, which, in our judgment, virtually does away with all miracle by reducing it to an imaginary, higher, and hitherto unknown law of divine establishment, called "moral," so as to save it from the odium of conflict with nature. A miracle, by its very definition, must be a supersEDURE—or a temporary violation, if you please—of a well-known and fixed law of nature. It is upon precisely this point that its whole significance depends. Eliminate this element, and you destroy its entire moral force. That the laws of physical nature are administered in ultimate subservience to those of the moral universe is the economy approved no less by reason than by fact. But these must not be merged the one in the other, even if they should be imagined in any case to collide. Especially must we not assume the intrusion of a superior moral law into the domain of nature, supplanting it in that sphere, and so divesting a miracle of all its peculiarities. For God works a miracle be set aside, we must suppose, a certain law or series of laws of nature for the time being, and in Christian teachers in the apostolic age. It is true there is nothing in the language that thus limits them, but it is claimed that the fact of the cessation of the miracle-working power proves that such was the intention of the Grantor. We suggest the query whether this very interpretation has not clipped the wings of that faith upon which the believer is here authorized to soar into the higher region of Christian privilege. For aught that legitimately appears to the contrary, if the grant has been revoked, it has been precisely and solely in consequence of unbelief in these identical promises. But, be that as it may, in point of fact, we repeat, few if any sane and orthodox Christians nowadays profess to have the requisite faith to venture upon such acts; and therefore the question is narrowed down, whether rightly or wrongly, to the commonplace sphere of non-miraculous subjects of prayer.

There is one passage of Scripture, however, that appears to have escaped the general attention of writers and speakers on this topic, but which is, as it seems to us, peculiarly apposite, if not conclusive of the whole ground of controversy. It is as follows in the ordinary English version: "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much" (James v. 16). The context shows that this language bears most appropriately to the situation before the Sanhedrin. In the Greek, the apostle had just been speaking of the prayer of the united Church on behalf of the sick, assuring them that these would be efficacious; and he goes on immediately to speak of the miracle-working prayers of Elias, taking care to observe that this noted prophet was after all only "a man subject to like passions as we are," and hence obviously inferring that prayer was still as available as it had been in his case. Unfortunately the common rendering of the passage as above has confused, if not wholly perverted, its real meaning. As it now stands it contains a double implication, for "effectual prayer," of course, "availeth much," and the epithet "fervent" likewise becomes superfluous, as well as the qualification of "a righteous man." The single Greek word translated by "effectual fervent" (λατρευτός) literally means imprecation. The only question among interpreters is whether it may be reflexive (middle voice), and thus signify imprecation itself, that is operative or effective. This was evidently the view of our authorized translators, and they have been followed by many scholars, including Robinson (Lexicon of the NT), Fenton (Commentary on the Acts), etc., who renders the passage after the order of the Greek words, "The supplication of the righteous man availeth much in its working," that is, as he explains it from Luther, "The prayer of the righteous can do much in its effecting the desired end," but this is not the same. Lange's note (Commentary, ad loc.), after reviewing the other instances of the use of the word in the N.T., accepts the true idea, "The full tension of the praying spirit under its absolute yielding to the divine impulse"; but Mombert's gloss (in the American edition), " Absence of opposition to the will of God," completely neutralizes its meaning. The passive sense of the participle is required by its grammatical form, and is justified by every passage where this form occurs: e.g. sinful passions are inwrought (Rom. vii. 19); salvation is inwrought by endurance (2 Cor. iii. 6); death is inwrought (2 Cor. iv. 12); faith is inwrought by love (Gal. v. 6); God's power is inwrought (Eph. iii. 20, precisely parallel with our text, as also in Col. i. 29), and similarly his word (1 Thess. ii. 13). On the other hand the "mystery of iniquity" (2 Thess. ii. 7). The thought of the apostle James, therefore, is, as Michaelis (after the Greek fathers) interprets, that the saint's prayer prevails 'when its earnestness is divinely inspired. To this sense the illustration of Elijah is most apt, as we may see by referring especially to the history alluded to (1 Kings xix. 14, ff.). The physical asceticism described by Stanley (Lectures on Jewish History, 2d series, p. 397, Amer, ed.), but as usual he misses the spiritual import. The seven-times bent form of the prophet, with his head between his knees, was not merely "the Oriental attitude of entire abstraction;" it denoted the intense struggle of his soul after the boon which Jehovah inwardly urged him to ask. Even this was an agony of prayer that would not be denied, similar, though less exhaustive, to that of our Saviour in the garden, which we learn (Heb. iv. 17) was effectual as to its main object (Luke xxii. 42). Another example of the same energized prayer is given us when Elijah is summoned by the apostle occurs earlier in the account of the raising to life of the son of the widow of Zarephath, where the praying prophet "stretched himself upon the child three times" (1 Kings xviii. 21), as if he would infuse his own ardent soul into the lifeless form (compare the more detailed narrative in the parallel case of Elisha and the Shunammite's son, 2 Kings iv. 24). He has had a very shallow experience of "the deep things of God" (2 Cor. iii. 10, the passage having reference to this very point) who has not felt "the Spirit itself making intercession with groanings which cannot be uttered" (Rom. viii. 26). At such times the veil between the natural and the miraculous becomes thin indeed. See Cocker, Thesm. (N.Y. 1876, 12mo); Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 96; Farrar, Crit. PRAYER, Christian Attitudes of. 1. The first Christians prayed standing, with hands outstretched and raised towards heaven. Then the face was turned towards the east. The proof of this appears everywhere in the primitive monuments. The frescos, sarcophagi, tombstones (especially those of the Roman catacomb), the painted glasses which are found there in abundance, the old mosaics with which the old basilicas were ornamented, etc., represent both sexes, especially women, in that attitude (Aringhi, passim, and especially ii, 285). These figures are generally called orantes. They are distinguished by the rich elegance of their garments; they wear long tunics or damaskes with wide folding sleeves, trimmed with embroidery and emblems of the trade or profession to which they are adorned with collars, bracelets, and other jewelry (Bottari, tav. 19, 158). These splendid garments might at first seem in contradiction with the well-known modesty of the women of the early Church; but in itself female clothing is not altogether incompatible with a desire to show what they had been in life, but what glory surrounded them in heaven. In the sepulchres of all kinds, the orante, generally standing between two trees—the emblem of Paradise—was the symbol of the soul who had become the bride of Jesus Christ, and as such was admitted to the celestial banquet. This explains the magnificence of the garment of St. Priscilla, represented as an orante in the cemetery of her name (Perret, Catacombes, vol. iii, tab. 3). Thus we find St. Praxeides, in a beautiful Roman mosaic, covered from head to foot with precious stones (Campani, Not. Monum. vol. i, tab. 47). In a celebrated vision St. Agnes had appeared to her parents, a week after her martyrdom, clothed in precious robes, and, to use the Bollandists' expression, uxor textis cyclopiads induit. This text became the type of most of the images of the young martyr: the most beautiful specimen is a gilded glass, published by Boldetti (Cimat. tab. 3, fig. 3, p. 194). Several of these female orantes, who were probably noble Roman matrons, as if fatigued by a prolonged prayer, have their arms supported by men, who, by their garments, must be supported by the faithful; thus (in Aringhi, ii, 17), which reminds us of Moses supported by Aaron and Hur in a similar manner (Exod. xviii, 12),
PRA\YER

We know this custom not only by the pictures, but also by the written monuments of Christian antiquity. The Christians, says Tertullian (Apol. xxx), while praying, raise their eyes to heaven, stretch out their hands, because they are innocents; they pray bareheaded, because we have not to blush—"Ille suscipientes (in cause) Christiani manibus expansis, quia innocuis, capite nudo, quia non erubescimus." To pray with uplifted hands is an attitude natural in the man who addresses himself to the Deity; it is a supplicatory posture which is found in all nations, even pagans, as among the Egyptians, where we meet it in funerary monuments; among the Etruscans there are in the Museo Campana two statues of Chiusi in terra-cotta, which have the arms raised in that way; among the Romans, as we see by the reverse of a number of imperial medals, especially those of Trebonianus Gallus, the praying figure is accompanied with the legend "Pietas Augg." (Miomnet, Rare des Medailles Romans, ii, 18). But Tertullian remarks that the attitude as well as intention of the faithful was quite different from those of the pagans.

"As to us," says this father, "we do not content ourselves with raising our hands, we stretch them in memory of the passion of our Lord." They meant to imitate the posture of Christ on the cross, as did several martyrs at their death. Thus St. Natale (Sancta Natale), disciple of St. Cyprianus (Ruiniart, p. 285), and SS. Fructuosus, Augurinus, and Eulogius (Usuardi, xii. Kal. Febr.): "Manibus in modum crucis expansa orantes." Several other fathers gave expression to the same idea. It is therefore easy to tell the Christian orantes from similar pagan pictures. The latter raise their hands vertically, the curve of the elbow forming a right angle, while the arms of the Christians are almost in a horizontal position.

Tertullian (De Ora to. xiii) describes this difference most minutely, to remove all idea of idolatrous imitation: "We do not raise our hands with ostentation, but with modesty, with moderation." Now, the priest alone observes at mass this rite of venerable antiquity, which has preserved its primitive character in the liturgy of the Church of Lyons, for there the priest expands completely his arms in the form of a cross while reciting the oration which immediately precedes the elevation. It is to be observed that in the primitive Church the catechumens prayed standing like the rest of the congregation, with this difference, that the latter held their face somewhat raised to heaven (Tertull. De Coron, iii), while the catechumen inclined slightly his head, not having obtained yet, by baptism, the divine adoption, the title of children of the Father who is in heaven.

2. The practice of standing erect in prayer was not exclusive, and the first Christians sometimes prayed kneeling. We have an example of this in the Acts (xxi. 5): "And we knelt down on the shore and prayed;" and another in the life of St. James Major, whose knees, by dint of prolonged praying, had become as callous as those of a camel; and another, of great celebrity, in the acts of the martyrdom of St. Ignatius (Ruiniart, vii, 10, ed. Vercaut). In less ancient times this custom becomes more frequent. We know by the testimony of Eusebius (Vit. Constant. iv, 21, 61) that Constantine often bowed his knees to offer his prayer to God. St. Jerome writes to the virgin Demetrias, "Frequently the solicitude of thy soul prompted thee to bend thy knees," and to Marcella (Epist. xxiiii, De agrot. Blesillie), "She bends her knees on the naked soil." It is likely that the custom of kneeling was borrowed by the Christians from the Hebrews. We read in the Scripture that Solomon, while dedicating his Temple to God, knelt down on both knees (1 Kings viii, 54), and that Daniel thrice a day knelt down in prayer (Dan. vi, 10). It is said also that St. Stephen, while suffering martyrdom (Acts vii, 59), knelt down and prayed for his murderers. St. Luke tells us that our Redeemer in the garden of Gethemani knelt down and prayed "three times with prayer and supplication" (Lukx xxii, 45). It is natural that, in conformity with this divine example, the Christians should have adopted this way of praying as a mark of affliction, a demonstration of sadness and sorrow. This is what we are led to conclude from these lines of Prudentius, one of the most trustworthy interpreters of Christian antiquity (Cuius. hymn. ii, 56):

This is also shown by the custom of the primitive Church in the liturgical practice. The Church had directed from the earliest time that prayers should be said standing on Sundays and during the paschal period, in sign of joy, and kneeling all the rest of the year in sign of penitence. This rule was already in force at the time of Justin (Quast. ad orthodox. resp. 110); it is mentioned by Tertullian (De Coron, miliit, iii), and stated by St. Jerome in that curious passage where he speaks of St. Paul (Comment. Epist. ad Ephe. Procem.): "St. Paul stayed at Ephesus until Pentecost, that time of joy and victory when we bend not our knees, nor bow to the ground; but, when, remissed by the Lord, we raise ourselves to heaven." The same custom became a canonical law at the Council of Nicaea (Can. ult.). It is interesting to read what Pamphilus, in his notes on the treatise of Tertullian (De Coron, c. ii, n. 38), and Augustine (Ep. liii. 172, Suetorii), make of this manner of praying common to the Jews and Christians. We have no pictures at all representing Christians on their knees, which speaks in favor of those who assert that the orantes are images of the glorified soul. In conformity with the apostolic precept, the churches bareheaded, the priests bareheaded, the fathers endeavored, with all their might, to exclude from the prayers of the faithful all gestures and exterior practices bearing some strong features of paganism. Thus Tertullian (De Ora to. xii) blames sternly such Christians as, in imitation of the pagans, thought fit to make their prayers acceptable to God by putting down their penits.

Prayer-book. Since the article on this subject was written (vol. ii) the Church of England has considered the propriety of purging the Book of Common Prayer of the Athenasian Creed, which the American Church rejected. The Protestant Episcopal Church (Presbyter) has recently disestablished, the Athenasian Creed is purged of the damnable clauses, and retained in that modified form. Since the organization of the Reformed Protestant Episcopal Church, the Prayer-book originally framed for the (American) Protestant Episcopal Church was made the basis of another Book of Common Prayer from which all language that seems to justify the ritualism of the High-Church party has been carefully expunged. Recent literature on this subject may be found in the Edeos, Rec. Oct. 1874, art. vi; Brit. Qurr. Jan. 1876, p. 144; Church Journal (N. Y.), June 17, 1875; Blunt, Key to the Knowledge and Use of the Book of Common Prayer (Lond. 1869); Contemporay Rev. Dec. 1872, artv. vii. See COMMON PRAYER.

Prayer of Consecration is offered in the communion service for the elements served to the people as memorials of Christ's crucifixion. In the Church of Rome and other ritualistic bodies, this prayer is accompanied with much ceremony. In other Christian churches the form prescribed or adopted is in harmony with the grave occasion which it commemorates. See LORD'S SUPPER.

Prayer-days. There can be no doubt that the service in the Book of Common Prayer is intended to be repeated daily; yet the emergence of Luct xxii, 4 (other) passage come to prevail. As a substitute for this, and the nearest approximation the times will allow to the original

PRAYER-TEST. This was a proposal anonymously put forth in the name of science in the Contemporaneous Review for July, 1872, with the strong endorsement of Prof. Tyndall, and couched in the following terms:

"I ask that one single ward or hospital, under the care of first-rate physicians and surgeons, containing certain numbers of patients afflicted with those diseases which have been best studied, and of which the mortality rates are best known, whether the diseases are those which are treated by medical or by surgical remedies, should be, during the coming year, treated according to a new plan. New methods to be mechanical. The ends in view are that at the end of the year mortality rates should be compared with the past rates, and also with the rates of other leading hospitals similarly well managed during the same period."

This proposal is open to several grave objections.

1. It is not warranted by the Scriptures nor by the nature of prayer. Neither religion nor science is under any obligation to accept all challenges. No system of truth does that. The true man of science comes to nature, not as a dictator, but as the humblest of learners. He does not invent tests and demand that she shall accept them; he ingeniously finds out what tests she pro-"potes to him. It is his office, not to alter nor to criticise, but to interpret her hieroglyphics.

In the same spirit we must study Christianity. The Bible is a collection of trigger words and hints with each other, and the whole with human consciousness and experience. We come to the book as learners. We are to accept and try the tests it offers, and not to set up tests of our own. It teaches a doctrine of prayer; it makes prayer to be a real and mighty power—a power produc-"ing physical results—but efficient only under prescribed conditions. These conditions, so far as they relate to the special case before us, are sufficiently indicated in these words: "The fervent, effectual prayer of a righte-"ous man availeth much;" "the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; if this be not, in the name of the Lord he shall be loosed from his bed;" "let the priests, earnest, important supplication of a righteous man, offered with full faith in God. The prayer proposed to he vacates the essential conditions of prayer. It aims not directly at the result it asks, but indirectly to test God. It says, "Will he?" Faith says, "He will." The thing it seeks is not really the healing of the sick, but to confer quantitative precision on the action of the supernatural in nature."

This sort of challenge is not new in substance, if it is in form. How do the Scriptures treat it? On a cert-"ain occasion, a large intelligence conducted the perfect man to a precipitous height, and challenged him to prove his claims by casting himself down, trusting to be borne up on angels' wings; and he quoted Scripture to enforce the test. The reply was simply, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." When that perfect and divine man hung on the cross the minions of the arch-temptor pro-"posed another test, "Let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe in him!" but he came not down. When once a miracle was demanded of Jesus he said, "Ye have not that spirit which makes you-ready more convincing proofs than suffered for the Nineties and for the queen of Sheba; an evil and an adulterous generation seeketh after a sign." A lost spirit, himself convinced at last by the re-"sistance argument of hell-torment, prayed for the resurrec-"tion of a dead man to convince his brothers, but was assured on the highest authority, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

2. The test proposed would be nugatory. Suppose it were admissible, and that the Christian world should gladly accept it, it is certain the results should be all that believers could desire. The hospital is in Ireland, Luke's, the west wing; one hundred patients of the kinds indicated are entered. The same surgeons, physi-"cians, and nurses have charge of both wings; the temper-ature, treatment, and diet are the same; there is per-"fect scientific exactness in all the conditions, except that the patients in the west wing are made the subjects of daily prayer wherever prayer to the God of the Bible is offered. After three or five years the hospital records are inspected and compared with other records, and it is found that twenty-nine and a half per cent. more recoveries have taken place in the wards which prayer has overshadowed than in, similar cases, anywhere else in the world.

Now, what will the sceptical men of science say? "The Lord, he is the God; prayer is vindicated forever; for we have found a new method of increasing the rate of recovery."

We could hear such suggestions as these: "It may be the morning sun is bad, or the clatter of wheels and hoofs on the avenue has injured the patients in the east wing;" "We more than suspect some of the nurses and physicians in the west wing have been killing them with kindness;" "Probably some new remedy has been secretly used; at all events, though there is something mysterious about it, this we know, nothing can constrain the laws of nature." Let not such a supposition be thought slanderous. The prototypes of such men were not convinced by miracles. Some of the persons who witnessed the resurrection of Lazarus went about from that very day to kill Jesus—yes, and to kill Lazarus too, lest the sight of him might convince others.

The test proposed would be nugatory for another reason—prayer could not be so offered. It is impossible to dam up Christian sympathy. It would burst over all such artificial banks like a spring freshet. Such forms of prayer would be mere magical incantations, impious shams, which would either be dinned over with no thought of their scope, or else would paralyze the lips that uttered them. Imagine the whole Church on earth thus to pray, "Grant, O Lord, thy special mercy to the one hundred sick persons in the west wing of St. Luke's Hospital. New York, U. S. of America." If any influence could move the Church to begin a three years' course of prayer thus before the time was up the Spirit of God would be searching many hearts with questions like this: "Who taught you so to limit your petitions?" "Professor Tyndall," "Why do you confine such supplications to one hundred of my needy millions, individ-"ually towards whom you have no reasons for special sympa-"thy?" "To prove thee, Lord, whether thine nearest prayers for the sick." "If you doubt it, you cannot offer such prayers acceptably; and if you believe it, why test me thus at the dictation of unbelievers? Thou shall not tempt the Lord thy God." Answers are promised on occasion to sincere, single-minded prayer, which looks simply for the object it asks. Such prayer must be double-minded—one eye resting faintly on the hospital, the other intently scanning the scientific world. Under such circumstances faith would be impossible; for faith rests solely on God's promise, and God has nowhere promised to answer any prayer offered as a test of himself.

3. Our final objection to the proposition before us is that it proposes an unnecessary test. There are allow-"able experiments which afford abundant proof of the truth of Christianity. There are many more convincing proofs than afforded by the Word of God and the experience of praying men. For a scientific atheist, or pantheist, or deist, or mere nominal Christian to insist on other tests is as unsci-"entific—we say not as irreverential, but as unscientific—as it would be for us to say, "If electricity be so powerful a you assert, let it run along this hempen cord as you claim it does along the telegraphic wires," or, "Make your magnet attract copper." The prompt reply would be, "The laws of nature forbid." Our reply is, "The economy of grape soda." We can conceive of a strictly scientific test which might have been proposed by the author of this inadmissible, nugatory test. He might have sent out a circular letter to ten thousand of the ablest, most experienced, and most devout ministers of the Gospel and other Christians in all lands, explaining his object, and inviting careful answers to these questions: How many cases have you ever known of persons desperately sick who were made the subjects of fervent, importunate prayer? What were the particulars, and what the results? The candid and unbiased collation of the facts so obtained from witnesses whose capacity and honesty would give their testimony on all other matters the highest credit, might or might not cast some light upon the subject. But it would not convince unbelievers, for unbelief is a matter of the heart more than of the intellect; and very probably the secret and unsearchable workings of the divine providence would remove the whole business beyond the range of the laws of induction. The scientists discard faith, while the Bible tells us that only by faith can we know either the ends or the person or the Lord, the God of God. A scientific test, in whatever pertains to the divine action, is impossible and absurd—a truth that Christians need to understand scarcely less than sceptics. See Prayer; Providence.

Preachers, Local. See Local Preachers.

Preaching is usually and with literal correctness defined as the act of delivering religious discourses. But this definition fails to suggest the most significant insinuation: that in any case it can be restricted by considering it as designing the objective idea of a great and peculiar appointment of the Lord Jesus Christ. In this broad but legitimate sense, preaching means more than an individual act or series of acts. It represents an institution of Christianity which has been in existence some nineteen centuries, and an agency of religious influence destined to continue in action throughout the whole period of human affairs.

I. The Proper Character and Design of Preaching.—As Christ himself was the Divine Word made flesh, so, desiring to embody his humanity and mission to the hyperbolical extent of his kingdom among men, he made a special appropriation of man's distinguishing faculty of speech by appointing it as the primary and principal means of diffusing God's word of truth and message of salvation throughout the world. He chose from among his earliest hearers, "he ordained twelve, that they should be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach" (Mark iii, 14). To those disciples he said, "What I tell you in darkness that speak ye in light: and what ye hear in the ear that preach ye upon the house-tops" (Matt. x, 22). As had been fore-shadowed in prophecy, so Christ represented the preaching of the Gospel to the poor as the distinguishing characteristic of his kingdom. The great Preacher himself, having completed his earthly mission, crowned it with the ever-lasting command given to his disciples, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature" (Mark xvi, 15). Christian preaching, therefore, implies not only preachers, but hearers. It presupposes a personal conviction and a deep sense of truth in the mind of the preacher, accompanied by a purpose to transmit to the minds of his hearers the message of God. Although preaching is designed to embody an important element of instruction, yet, if properly executed, it rises in character superior to lecturing, or any of the forms of didactic discourse. It resembles the best forms of oratory, modifying it, but ascending all secular or-atory in the moral grandeur of its themes, and especially in its specific design of enlightening and quickening the consciences of men as a means of affecting their earthly character and their eternal destiny.

II. Historical Development.—Prior to Christ, preaching was known only among the Jews and among the Gentiles. It had been to some extent anticipated by several of the prophets, the greatest and last of whom was John the Baptist; but, from the time that Christ began his public ministry, preaching became common and constant. Following our Lord's ascension, the apostolic ministry of preaching was elevated and glorified by the gift of the Holy Ghost. The gift of tongues and the manifestation of the tongues of fire were alike designed to aid and encourage them in their work of evangelization. Hence, whether in the Temple, in synagogues, or in prisons, they preached Christ and him crucified as the power of God and the wisdom of God; and, when scattered abroad by persecution, "they went everywhere preaching the Word" (Acts vii, 4).

It was thus that the Gospel became rapidly diffused throughout the Roman empire; which, in an almost literal sense, represented "all the world" of that period.

It seems safe to believe, that had the apostolic zeal and fidelity in preaching been maintained without interruption, the triumphs of the Gospel would have been continuous, and perhaps even more extensixe with the habitable world. But the present century, and the latter part of the second; centuries witnessed the introduction into the Church of two classes of influences which had a tendency to reduce the number of preachers and limit the work and influence of preaching. The first was that of asceticism (q. v.); the second, by powerful but mistaken impulse, sent into deserts and caves, and afterwards into monasteries, thousands of earnest men, whose lives were thus withdrawn from evangelical activity and wasted in penances and self-torture. The second was that of ceremonialism (see CEREMONY), by which the preaching office was taken away from the lower clergy and for the greater part limited to bishops. Bingham states the limitation in these words:

"Preaching anciently was one of the chief offices of a bishop; insomuch that in the African churches a presbyter was never known to preach before a bishop in his cathedral church till Austin's time, and St. Austin was the first presbyter in that part of the world who was allowed to preach in the presence of his bishop. . . . It is true, in the Eastern churches presbyters were sometimes allowed to preach in the great church before the bishop: but that was not to discharge him of the duty, for still he preached a sermon at the same time. In lesser churches, in the city and country about, this office was devolved upon presbyters as the bishop's proper assistants. But in sermons of descent, except in special cases (of reading the homilies of the fathers, and when the presbyter was sick or infirm), were not authorized to deliver the sermon. The Christian Church, by ch. iv, 26, 27, not only gave the freedom of preaching to the bishop, but even to the deacons; and that more especially when the bishop was absent.

Not only was preaching shorn of its aggressive power by being thus limited and subordinated under the influence of a growing ceremonialism, but in some places it was for long periods scandalously neglected. Sozomen, the historian, "relates of the Church of Rome in his time that they had no sermons either by the bishop or any other." Sozomen himself had made a mistake; but Cassiodorus, who was a senator and consul at Rome, quotes the same out of Sozomen in his Historia Tripartita, without correction, and further says that no one can produce any sermons preached to the people by any bishop of Rome between the years 318 and 457. Instead of preaching by Leo appears to have been but temporary; for, according to Suriani, a Roman writer, it was afterwards discontinued for five hundred years together, till Pius Quintus, like another Leo, revived the practice. Not merely at Rome, but through large portions both of the Orient and Gauls and Celts of the West, as a consequence of there being a constant custom, was rare and exceptional during the long period between the 8th and 16th centuries. It ceased to be a regular part of the services of the Sabbath, although it was retained as a part of the ceremonial service of the church. In some places, the form of panegyrics or eulogies upon the Virgin and the saints.
The preaching of the Crusades (q.v.) by Peter the Hermit, St. Bernard, and others, and the organization of the Dominicans (q.v.) as a preaching order of monks, may be considered as exceptional to the usual practice of the Middle Ages. The chief medium of religious education, however, was by sympathetic preaching to the laity. It was chiefly upon the preaching of the Crusades that the discourses of some of the more venerable and eloquent preachers that ready writers were employed to report the words they uttered. Copies of reported discourses were circulated among those who prized them, and were held for reading to other assemblies. In this way the homilies of the fathers selected to represent them, when they could be better preserved and more rapidly multiplied by printing. During the medieval period, where preaching was not wholly abandoned, sermons and homilies were to a great extent substituted by postils (q.v.), which were very brief addresses delivered at the conclusion of the mass, and holding about the same relation to the preceding ceremonies of worship that a postscript holds to a letter, or a marginal note to the text of a book.

The preaching customs of modern times differ in minor particulars somewhat with reference to differences of national habits, but more with reference to the pre-eminence of the idea of worship or of religious address. In a certain class of churches the service is conducted with primary reference to forms of worship. In churches in that class, by matter of course, the sermon is made subordinate. In other churches the leading idea of a Sabbath assembly is that of an audience gathered together to receive instruction from the Word of God, both as read from the sacred page and as declared by his appointed messengers. In the latter, preaching is regarded as of principal importance, prayer and psalmody being auxiliary to it.

The principal places for preaching in modern times are churches constructed with primary reference to that object. It may be here remarked that even in Europe modern church architecture has been modified since the period of the Reformation, in a perhaps unconscious adaptation to the more general practice of preaching. Few large cathedrals have been built, but many churches of smaller proportions, and more available as auditoriums. Protestant churches in all countries are supplied with permanent seats for audiences, and, with rare exceptions, the pulpit occupies the central position allotted in Roman Catholic countries to the principal altar. On the continent of Europe movable seats only are used in Roman Catholic churches. In distinctly Protestant churches, pews or fixed sittings are generally introduced to accommodate hearers during the preaching services. But preaching, especially among Protestants, has by no means been limited to churches. While maintained with regularity in them, it has been extended as a matter of importance to highways and market-places, to public commons, to natural amphitheatres, to groves, to ship's decks, to extemporized tabernacles, and even to music-halls and theatres. In short, zealous evangelists show themselves ready, both in civilized and heathen countries, to preach wherever and whenever their fellow-men can be gathered to hear them.

IV. Literature.—The literature of preaching may be divided into two classes—the first embracing publications relating to the art and science of preaching; and the second embracing the printed products of preaching, whether postils, homilies, or sermons. Of the first class, an extensive list is given in connection with the article on homiletics (q.v.). Of the second, it would be easy to enumerate authors and books by hundreds. For select and classified lists, see arts.富丽 eloquence; sermons. Of recent books of the first class, the following may be named: Molois (M. L'Abbé Isidore; translated by George Percy Badger), The Clergy and the Pulpi in their Relations to the People (N.Y. 1867, 12mo); Hood, Lamps, Pitches, and Trumpets: Lectures on the Voice of the Preacher (1st and 2nd editions, 12mo); Parker, A Sermon: Advice to a Young Preacher (Boston, 1871, 12mo); Brooks, Preparation and PREDAMITE. Under this head we propose to consider, first, the question of the existence of men older than the Biblical Adam; second, Prehistoric tribes in India; and, third, the Prehistoric Era in Europe.

1. Prehistoric Men. — Whether men existed upon the earth before Adam is a question first made prominent in Europe by Isaac Peyreuru (La Peyrère). His reasoning in support of the affirmative is embodied in a work published anonymously in Paris, in 1655, and entitled Preamenita: sive Exercitatio super verbis duodecim, decimoterio et decimoguarto capitis quinta Epistolae S. Pauli ad Romanos, quibus inducantur Primi homines ante Adamum conditioni. Very soon afterwards appeared, from the same author, the following: Systema theologiæ sive Hypotheseis Principes Pars prima. Both works are now very rare (see Solger, Biblii. ii, 94; Freytag, AnaI. p. 671; Bibl. Feuerlin, p. 588; Brunet, Manuel, et al.). The most accessible edition embraces the two works bound in one volume, in 8vo, and published, without place, in 1690, under the title: Preamenita, Anno salutaris MDCXV. A work appeared in English the next year with the following title: Man before Adam, or a Discourse upon the Twelfth, Thirteenth, and Fourteenth Verses of the Fifth Chapter of the Epistle of Paul to the Romans: by which are proved that the First Men were created before the creation of the world (ibid. 1691, 12mo). It appears to be a "First Part". The novel teaching of Peyreuru was at once bitterly denounced, and a considerable number of treatises were written in opposition. A list of these has been compiled by Ebert (Dictiomaire, No. 16, 555). The following are the most important: Animadversiones in Librum Preamenitum in quibus: confutation superbus scriptor, et primum omnium fuisse, Adamum defenditur, authore Evarbio Romulo (Phil. Priorio, Paris, 1656, 8vo, and in Holland in the same year, sm. 12mo); Non ens Preamenitarum: sive Conjugiae Apologeticae in quantum Scripturae, quatuor praeocte incipientur super imponere composita est qui:dam anonymus fugiens, ante Adamum primun fuisse hominae in mundo; authore An. Hiulso (Lugd. Bat. apud Joan. Elzevir. 1656, sm. 12mo); Responso ecretae et superbissimae Regiae Praesidii, apud Ioann. L. Proctor, adv. et act. J. Pathoio (Lugd. Batavor. apud Johan. Elzivirium, 1656, 12mo). The argument on both sides, as might be supposed, was almost wholly Biblical and dialectical. The nature of the proofs employed by Peyreuru, and of his "theological system" built upon the fundamental doctrine of prelastic men, may be condensed in the following propositions: 1. The "one man" (Rom. v. 12) by whom "sin entered into the world" was Adam, as in ver. 14 that sin is called "the transgression." 2. "Transgression" is a violation of "law," therefore "the law" (ver. 18) signifies the law given to Adam—natural law, not that given to Moses. 3. The phrase "until the law" (ver. 18) implies a time before the law—that is, before Adam; and as "sin was in the world" during that time, there must have been men in existence to commit sin. 4. The sin committed before the enactment of the natural law was "material," "actual"; the sin existing after Adam, and through him, was "imputed," "formal," "legal," "adventitious," and "after the similitude of Adam's transgression." 5. Death entered into the world before Adam, but it was in connection with the "one man." And, Adam's prospective sin—"peccatum Adami fuisse recto intumatis prsimi hominibus ante Adamum conditioni; and this was necessary, that all men might partake of the salvation provided in Christ—"opporoerat prsimi illos homines peccavius in Adamo, ut sanctificarentur in Christo" (Rom. v. 19). Before Adam did not "reign." "Pecatum tune temporis erat mortuum; mora erat mortuus, etnullus erat sepulchri aculeus" (ibid. cap. xii). 6. Adam was the "first man" only in the same sense as Christ was the "second Adam," for Adam was the "image of God" (Gen. i, 26, 27). 7. All men are of one blood in the sense of one substance—one "matter," one "earth." The Jews are descened from Adam, the Gentiles from Preachamites (System. Thel. II. cap. vii-xi). The first chapter of Genesis treats of the origin of the Gentiles, the third of the origin of the Jews (ibid. lib. iii, cap. i-i). The Gentiles were created aborigines in the beginning, by the "word" of God, in all lands; Adam, the father of the Jews, was formed of "clay" by the "hand" of God (ibid. lib. ii, cap. xi). Genesis, after chap. i, is a history, not of the first men, but of the first Jews (ibid. lib. ii, cap. i). 8. The existence of Preachamites is also indicated in the Biblical account of Adam's family, especially of Cain (ibid. lib. ii, cap. iv). 9. Proved, also, by the "monuments" of Egypt and Chaldea, and by the history of the astronomy, astrology, theology, etc., of the Gentiles (ibid. lib. ii, cap. xii, 14). As well as by the racial features of remote and savage tribes, and by the recently discovered parts of the terrestrial structure (ibid. Proem.). 10. Hence the epoch of the creation of the world does not date from that "beginning" commonly figured in the beginning of the "book" of Genesis: "et die sequentes ad consummationem, nam omnium rerum temporum a die Creationis annorum MCM. LXXXV". A work appeared in English the next year with the following title: Man before Adam, or a Discourse upon the Twelfth, Thirteenth, and Fourteenth Verses of the Fifth Chapter of the Epistle of Paul to the Romans: by which are proved that the First Men were created before the creation of the world (ibid. 1691, 12mo). moreover, as he went out from his native country, found other nations already in existence. The natural inference from these considerations would be that the Black Races existed before Adam.* Such a conclusion is sustained by other anthropological considerations.

The Black Races—a term used only for present convenience—may be regarded as the (1) Hamites and Hot-tentots and Bushmen, (2) Papuans, (4) Australians. They possess in common a dark or black skin and a marked degree of dolichocephalism, as well as much greater prognathism than the White and Dusky races. They are further characterized by long thighs-bones, sometimes long arms, lean shanks, oblique pupils, and deficiency of secondary sexual characters. The Negroes are distinguished generally by short crisped hair, with a flattened section, scanty or absent beards, thick lips, flattened nose, retracting forehead, and projecting jaws; and they inhabit Africa from the southern border of the Sahara to the territory of the Hot-tentots and Bushmen, stretching from ocean to ocean save where the Hamites have intruded on the extreme east. The Bantu or southern Negroes embrace the Zanijibar and Mozambique nations, and the well-known Betchuans and Kafirs. The South or northeastern tribes speaking a variety of languages, and stretching from the coast well into the interior. The Hot-tentots and Bushmen occupy the southern parts of Africa nearer the Atlantic Ocean, and are characterized by the tufted head hair, white hair, and the peculiar formation known as eutypoggy. The Bushmen have a leathery-brown skin, which becomes much wrinkled with age. The Ko-Koin (Hot-tentot) language possesses great ethnological interest, as it has been thought by Mooff, Lepuis, Pruner Bay, Max Müller, Whitney, and Bleek to possess affinities with the ancient Egyptian. Though some authorities have pronounced against any relationship, it is certain that we find among these savage linguistic elements which belong to a refined civilization, and which leave the question open whether they have lived in contact with the Egyptians or have descended from them, or from some common stock not very remotely removed. But even if it should appear probable that the Hot-tentots (and, inferentially, the Bushmen) are descended from the Hamitic Egyptians, we are not in possession of evidence indicating any immediate relationship between the other black races and the Adamites; so that the residual probability remains that these races are more ancient than the (perhaps Adamic) father of the White and Dusky races. The Papuans are intermingled with the population of Australia, the Polynesians, the Pelew Islands, New Hebrides, New Caledonia, the Loyalty Islands, and the Fiji Archipelago. They possess peculiarly flattened, abundant long hair, which grows in tufts surrounding the head like a crown eight inches high. The beard is abundant, the skin very dark, varying to chocolate color in New Guinea and blue-black in Fiji. The jaws are less projecting than in Negroes, and the nose is broad and aquiline, giving the features a Jewish cast. The Australians occupy the continent of Australia and the islands contiguous, including Tasmania. Their body is thickly pilose; the hair of the head is black, elliptical in section, and stands out around the head in a shaggy crown less striking than that of the Papuans. Though less gifted than the

* We call the attention of the reader to the fact that the positions of our respected contributor are purely inferences from the presumption that the ethnographical list in Gen. 10:13 was intended to represent the posterity of Noah or historically known to exist on the earth, whereas it is evidently meant only as a catalogue of those tribes to which the Hebrews were related or less remote. Therefore the black races were certainly included under the Cushites (p. 9), and this discussion is not. It may also be noted that Noah is the progenitor of the whites only. Indeed, if anything is to be inferred from the meaning of the name Adum, it would go to make him the parent, not of the Caucasian, but of the copper-colored or Tartar tribes. —Ed.
Papuans, they are higher in the psychic scale than formerly represented. They were, indeed, found living in the age of rude stone implements, and used simple tree-trunks for boats; but their language reflects a considerable degree of refinement and grammatical perfection. We regard the Black races from either a psychic, a zoological, or an archeological standpoint, we discover evidence that they diverged from the White and Dusky races at a period which, compared with the epoch of Egyptian and Assyrian civilization, must be exceedingly remote. The conclusion is indicated, therefore, that the common progenitor of the Black and the other races was placed too far back in time to answer for the Biblical Adam. This view has been maintained by McCausland (Adam and the Adamite [London 1872]; The Builders of Israel, ch. v), and was recently favoured by Dr. Wharton (Math. Quar. Rev. Jan. 1871, p. 158, and July, 1872, p. 526). See also an article entitled Was Adam the First Man? in Scriber's Monthly, Oct. 1871; and Pozzy, La Terre et le Récit Biblique de la Création, liv. iii, c. xii.*

To those who think the language of the Bible contemplates Adam as "the first being who could be called a man"—not alone the progenitor of the races which figure in Biblical history—it may be conceded that such is its meaning, in case it shall appear allowable, on Biblical grounds, to carry back the advent of man as far as the ancient knowledge of the Jews, and, in fact, having the complex which seems to be indicated by the term Adam can be reasonably regarded as the progenitor also of races of black color, and seemingly much lower in the organic and intellectual scale than the father of Seth and his civilized posterity not far removed.† The time-question involved is admittedly serious. In reference to the difficulty presented by the color of Adam's skin, it will be borne in mind that color alone is one of the most untrustworthy of ethnological characters (Peschel, Races of Man, p. 88). In reference to the inequalities generally endowed by the racial stocks of the Black races, it may also be observed that degeneration and deterioration of tribes are phenomena familiar to ethnology. But there are strong objections to the assumption that the Black races represent, in general, a degeneracy. We have no knowledge of the degeneracy of entire races, but only of tribes and fragments of tribes. Nor has tribal degeneracy taken place, except where the oppression of superior tribes has driven the weaker into the midst of natural conditions unfriendly to existence. But the Black races have been free to roam over entire and large areas, in the search of the most congenial conditions. Yet, on the healthful and luxuriant table-lands of Central Africa the black man is marked by an inferiority as real and almost as great as along the penitential borders of the west coast, or in the least favored regions of New Guinea. The structural peculiarities of the Black races, moreover, are inheritances of lower grade rather than reminiscences of a higher. The black man is not on a descending grade, but is ascending, according to the organic and psychic law of existence. His remotest progenitor was lower rather than higher. All these considerations militate against the idea that Adam, the father of the Noochian races, was low enough in the scale of organization, and remote enough in the genealogical line, to be the father also of the Melanic races. Thus, while the conflicting nature of the insufficient evidences forbids our dogmatism, the balance of proof seems rather to sustain the opinion that the Melanic races are descendants of real Preadamites.‡

* Such a conclusion, however, has in our judgment a very slender foundation, and cannot for a moment stand in the face of the complex which seems to be indicated by the term Adam. The origin of man is a question of the most complex, and the statements of Scripture must stand or fall by themselves, when fairly exposed by the usual laws of etymology, and we have no way to make them accord with any accommodation with discoveries in other fields. —En.

Rivers-drifts. — These are thick beds of sand and gravel lining the valleys of certain rivers, and containing a great variety of stone implements, chiefly of flint, with occasional occurrences of human bones, and more abundant remains of extinct quadrupeds of the species just cited, together with a small proportion of living mammals; and, along the valley of the Somme, of fresh-water and marine shells, of species still living in France and along the contiguous coast. The river-valleys most celebrated for such discoveries are those of the Somme, the Loire, and the Thames, Ouse, and Avon in England. The facts respecting the valley of the Somme have been chiefly developed by M. Boucher de Perthes (Antiquités Cébètes et Antédiluviennes [1847]), MM. Rigolot, Pouthet, Gau- dry, Helbert, and the English savans Falconer, Fretw, Evans, and Lyell. We should mention here the delta of the Tinière on the Lake of Geneva, investigated and described by Morlot, and more lately by Dr. Andrews of Chicago (Amer. Jour. Sci. [2] xlv. 180). In the deeper parts of these deposits remain of extinct quadrupeds predominate; at higher levels, those of living quadrupeds. Rude flint implements abound below, improved forms above, and still higher occur sometimes relics of Gallo-Roman times.

Loess and Moraines. — In the loess or loam, as it is termed in France, and elsewhere, have been found occasional remains of men—as at Labir, near Strasburg; at Maestricht, where human bones were associated with those of the mammoth and other extinct animals; at Kreuzberg, in the suburbs of Berlin; at Bournemouth, England, on the top of a sea-cliff one hundred feet high, where flints occur in gravel; in the drift-covered cliffs of Hampshire, and many other localities. At the bottom of an ancient glacier-moraine at Ravensburg, near Lake Constance, was found, in 1866, a great quantity of bones and broken instruments. Of these, eight hundred were incidentally, and four others, the remains of eight extinct animals, including the cave-lion. At Salzgirim, three to twelve feet, and enclosing only bones of the cave-bear; 6. Cave-earth, known as “breccia”—being a dark-red sandy loam, and containing bear’s bones. These flint implements and one flint chip have been found also in the lowest layer. Another example may be taken from the rock-shelter of Aurignac, a shallow grotto opening on a hill-side, which seems to have been employed for burial. Until 1832 the opening was concealed by materials washed down the hill-slope. When uncovered, fourteen skeletons of seventeen human beings. In 1860 M. Lartet discovered outside of the grotto, underneath the sloping talus, a layer containing the remains of extinct animals and some works of art; and beneath this, resting on a sloping terrace, a layer of bones and charcoal, about six inches thick, covering an area of six or seven square yards, and terminating at the entrance of the grotto. In the midst of this were fragments of a sandstone redened by heat, and resting on a levelled surface of lime- stone, which appears to have been used as a hearth. From the ashes of this hearth was obtained a great variety of bones and implements, including two hundred flint articles—knives, projectile points, and chips, as well as a curious tool for working flints. The bone instruments embraced arrows without barbs, other tools of reindeer’s horn, and a bolekin of the same.

In the stratum overlying the ashes were found numerous bones of carnivora, also of reindeer, ox, rhinoceros, one hundred and sixty-eight human bones, and many fragments of sun-dried or half-baked and hand-made pottery. The extinct species found there were the cave- bear, cave-lion, cave-hyena, mammoth, two-horned rhinoeeros, and stag; but the remains of living species, especially of the fox, horse, reindeer, and aurochs, were much more abundant. Within the grotto, after the removal of the skelets, there remained only about two feet above the surface of the grotto, a bed of small stone of lighter tint, and a bottom layer of yellowish color.

Fret Dogs. — The pest dogs of Denmark, ranging from ten to thirty feet in depth, have afforded a large quantity of human remains, mingled with those of animals contemporary with man (Morlot, Études Geologique archéologiques en Danemark et en Suise). In the lowest portion of the dogs are found remains of the Scythian frit, a tree no longer growing in Denmark; and with these are associated implements of flint. Above are found remains of the common oak, now very rare in Denmark, and associated therewith implements and ornaments of bronze, as well as stone; while in the still newer pest occur remains of the existing beech forest, mingled with relics of an age of iron. The dogs of Ireland have been similarly productive, affording, among other things, many skeletons of the great Irish elk. From the dogs of the Somme, newer than the river-drifts, many human relics have been exhumed, as well as those from the neighborhoods of Brussels and Antwerp.

Kitchen middens (Danish kjukkenmøddinger). — These are heaps of earth and human relics occurring along the Baltic shore of Denmark. They vary in height from three to ten feet, and some are 150 to 200 feet long. The feet long, the face of the grotto was made up of the shells of the oyster, cockle, and other edible mollusks, but plentifully mixed with the bones of various quadrupeds, birds, and fish, which seem to have served as food for rude sea-side inhabitants. Interspersed with the animal remains are flint knives, hatchets, and other implements of stone of lighter tint, and bone, with fragments of coarse pottery, mixed with charcoal and cinders, but never with implements of bronze or iron. The stone hatchets and knives, nevertheless, have been polished and sharpened by grinding, and are thus less rude than those of the river-drifts and mountains of the cavern. Kitchen-middens also occur in England, Scotland, France, the United States, and other countries.

Very similar are the refuse-heaps ("*terramares") farther inland, accumulated (according to a custom still prevailing in Ecuador, Mexico, and other Spanish countries) upon the outskirts of ancient palustrine villages in the north of Italy. They embrace, naturally, relics of everything pertaining to the life of the ancient villagers, including implements for weaving, mill-stones, and spear-heads, hatchets, and ornaments of bronze. They occur especially over the plain bounded by the Po, the Apennines, the Adda, and the Reno (Sirobel and Pigorini, Les Terramares et les Pilotes du Parmeisum, Milan, 1864). Similar palustrine settlements have recently been discovered in Moravia and Mecklenburg. They are said to exist also on the coasts of Africa and Brazil. Certain mounds along the coasts of Holland, containing Roman and Cathaginian antiquities, seem to have served as earthworks, or places of refuge.

(3) Megaliths and Tombs.—Rude structures of huge rough stones, whose origin is fixed in the night of prehistoric times, are known to exist in nearly all the countries of Europe, and even of Asia, and were long regarded as druidical remains. Those called "dolmens" consist of a huge more or less fastened rock, resting on stones planted upright in the ground—the supposed stone-altars of the Gauls. Sometimes a series of massive slabs rests on two lines of upright stones, so arranged as to form a covered passage. In other cases the entire dolmen is covered to the depth of several feet by earth, which becomes a tumulus-dolmen. Some tumuli enclose two or more stone-covered passages. The passages seem to have been burial-crypts, for we often find within them human skeletons placed originally in a sitting posture. In one tomb hundreds of skeletons were discovered. Sometimes the crypts are divided into numerous compartments, each containing a skeleton. With the skeletons were deposited weapons and implements (generally of stone) and earthen vessels. The pottery was of a finer character than that of the kitchen-middens (Leguay, Sépultures de la France, 1865). The tumulus-dolmens attain colossal proportions. That of Silbury Hill, England, is nearly 200 feet high. The Egyptian pyramids belong properly in this connection. See STONE.

The structure known as a "cromlech" is a dolmen surrounded by one or more circles of stones planted like posts in the ground. Cromlechs occur singly or in groups. These erect, roughly hewn stones are known as "menhirs," and also occur either singly or in long parallel ranges, as at Carnac, in Brittany. Thousands of the various sorts of megalithic structures are known in Brittany and the south and south-west of France, in England, in Denmark, and, in less abundance, in all the other countries of Europe, except Southern Germany, Spain, Italy, Greece, the Danubian principalities, and Russia.

(8) Lake-dwellings.—The pile-habitations (Pylaètes, Fjshlubauten) were catkins erected on piles in the bottoms of lakes. First discovered and most abundant in the lakes of Switzerland (Desor, Pylaètes, ou Constructions Lacustres, 1859), they are now known in the existing and the peat-filled lakes of several other countries (the Italian lakes Varese and Mercurago are especially rich); and Herodotus (lib. iv, cap. 16) states that such habitations were anciently erected in Egypt, as part of the pharaohs of Lower Roumelia. By dredging the lakes which contained the Swiss lake-dwellings an enormous quantity of relics has been brought to light, embracing the different varieties of stone weapons and implements, industrial and ornamental articles in bronze, remains of plated cloth, stores of wheat and barley—in one instance baked into flat, round cakes—and metals of Greek production, and some iron swords, but all of pre-Roman origin. The bones of twenty-four species of wild mammals have been dredged up, besides eighteen species of birds, three of reptiles, and nine of fish, all of which have lived in historic times (Rütimeyer, Die Fauna der Fjshlubauten in der Schweiz, Basel, 1861).

In some instances, as on the north bank of Lake Neuchâtel, where the bottom was rocky, heaps of stones were thrown down, among which piles were fixed. The piles thus served to retain further supplies of stones, and by this means artificial islands were formed. Superstructures were built on these islands. They are now sometimes covered with peat, as in the Drumkellin bog, to the depth of fourteen feet. The Irish cromlechs have afforded vast quantities of bones of domestic animals, and works of human industry in stone, bronze, and iron.

(9) Modern Saracens.—Since, beyond controversy, prehistoric man existed in a condition similar to that of rude and primitive peoples of historic times, it appears likely that the study of modern pagans should afford important aids in the interpretation of prehistoric monuments, and the determination of the condition and capacities of prehistoric peoples. For instance, the flint arrow-heads of the American Indian are fashioned precisely like some of those found in European caverns and lake-habitations. To understand the ancient lake-dwellings and their occupants, we have not only the historical account of Herodotus, but D'Urville's narrative of the lake-dwellers of New Guinea. As illustrative of the kitchen-middens, we may turn to the modern shell-heaps on the south coast of England, or to the city-border offal-heaps of Guayaquil and Mexico. In India some of the hill-tribes still erect cromlechs. Prehistoric monuments even receive a light shed from the accounts of early historic times. Thus "Jacob took a stone and set it up for a pillar" (Gen. xxxi, 45; see further, chaps. 46-52). At Mount Sinai, Moses erected twelve pillars—menhirs (Exod. xxiv, 4; see also Josh. vii, 21, 22). In connection with tumuli, it may be remembered that Semiramis raised a mound over her husband; stones were piled up over the remains of Lactus; Achilles raised to Patroclus a mound of stones 100 feet in diameter; Alexander erected one over the ashes of Hephaestio which cost $1,200,000; and in Roman history we meet with several similar instances. So, finally, the small bronze chariot exhumed from a tumulus of Mecklenburg revives the wheeled structures fabricated for Solomon by Hiram of Tyre (1 Kings vii, 27-37).

2. Interpretation of the Facts.—(1) Divisions of Prehistoric Time.—The voice of all civilized nations has given expression to the belief in the existence of three great ages in the unwritten history of mankind: the ages of Stone, Bronze, and Iron. This division and the most modern indications from the relics of prehistoric times sustain this belief. In the Age of Stone the metals were unknown, and all implements, weapons, utensils, and ornaments were of stone, bone, horn, shells, or moulded and unbaked clay. In the Age of Bronze cutting instruments were made largely of that alloy, though stone continued long in use. In the Age of Iron that metal had superseded bronze for arms, axes, and knives, though bronze continued in use for ornaments, and often for the handles of weapons. This succession, which is confidently traced for European populations of early times, is due to various circumstances, for mankind at large. It must not by any means be supposed, however, that the social condition implied by the Stone Age, or either of the others, answers to any particular period of absolute time in the history of the world. One race or nation has emerged from the condition of its Stone Age at a much earlier period than another, and some races and tribes still remain in their Stone Age. These three conditions of society are generally regarded as prehistoric, and it is certain that bronze and iron were already known to the northern nations of Europe when the Roman armies invaded them; but it appears also that the weapons used in the Trojan War, at the dawn of history, were mostly of bronze, though iron was beginning to appear, and that in the time of Joshua knives of stone were in use. A closer examination of the relics of the Stone Age indicates a division into three epochs. In the Palaeolithic, or Rude Stone Epoch, all implements were of stone, and shaped by chipping, without grinding. In the Reindeer Epoch, bone and reindeer's horn displaced flint to a large extent; while in the Neolithic, or Polished Stone Epoch, multitudes of implements were ground to an edge ("culta"). Mortillets makes the following classification, based on implements from the cairns of France: A. Flint implements predominant (Palaeolithic). (a.) Epoch of Mouster— the flints chipped only on one side, and having somewhat an almond shape. (b.) Epoch of Solntré— the flints chipped on both sides, and the extremities brought to a good point. The almond shapes wanting. B. Bone implements predominant, (c.) Epoch of Aurignac (Early Reindeer)— the lance- and arrow-heads slat at the base, so that the quiver shaft enters the bone. (d.) Epoch of the Madeleine (Late Reindeer)— the lower extremity of the lance- or arrow-head enters the shaft. Many implements of flint still remain. Some recognise three divisions of Palaeolithic flints: (a) the type of St. Acheul—large, thick, oval, roughly chipped on both sides; (b) the type of Mouster—thinner, and wrought on one side; (c) the type of Solntré—smaller, finely wrought, with thin borders and symmetrical form.

The Palaeolithic Epoch is further characterized by a marked step in the powers of attempts at or ornamentation or artistic delineation, as also by the contemporaneous existence of several quadrupeds now extinct—especially the cave-bear, the cave-hyena, cave-lion, tichorne, and hairy elephant, or mammoth. The Reindeer Epoch, with a colder climate, is distinguished by the advent of several species now native in the north of Europe or at Alpine elevations—such especially as the reindeer, musk-ox, elk, chamois, ibex, hamster-rat, lemmeing, grouse, and snowy owl. With them existed the horse, the near-horse, and various rodents. The Neolithic Epoch was marked by the presence of many species of domesticated animals—especially the dog, sheep, goat, ox, horse, and hog. The domestic cat and fowl, and the crooked-horned sheep, did not appear till the epoch of the very latest lake-dwellings (Noville and Chavannes), generally referred to the 6th century.

The Palaeolithic Epoch is illustrated chiefly by the finds of the river-gravels, the cavers of Belgium and England, the volcanic tuff of Denize, and a few of the cavers and rock-shelters of France; the Reindeer Epoch by a majority of the rock-shelters of France, and the Neolithic Epoch by a few cavers in the south of France, the kitchen-middens, crannoges, dolmens, the lowest portion of the Danish bogs, and the lake-dwellings of Western Switzerland. The Bronze Age by the finds of the lake-dwellings of Western Switzerland, many of the tumuli and the middle portion of the Danish bogs; and the Iron Age by the upper portion of the Danish bogs, and some of the latest Swiss lakes (as Bienne and Neuchâtel).

(2.) Geological Conditions. The physical conditions of Europe have changed to a remarkable extent since the first known epoch of human occupation; some finds indicate that Europe was just emerging from a secular winter which had buried all the mountains and plains beneath a mantle of glacier material, as far south, probably, as the Pyrenees. England and Scandinavia had been connected with the Continent; the English Channel and the German Ocean had been dry land, and the Thames had been a tributary of the Rhine. A subsidence now took place, which made Great Britain an island. An amelioration of the climate caused a rapid melting of the glaciers; the land was extensively flooded, and the drainage of the Continent now began to mark out and excavate the river-valleys of the modern epoch. The cave-bear, mammoth, and other quadrupeds of Pliocene time still survived; and now men appeared in Europe to dispute with them the possession of the forests and the caverns. The swollen rivers filled elevations of twenty to fifty feet above their present levels, and the relics of the stone-folk were mingled with the deposits along their borders. The Reindeer Epoch witnessed another elevation, and a new invasion of cold. England was again joined to the Continent. The cave-bear and mammoth being the implement. A new subsidence took place, and the other northern quadrupeds were driven south over the plains of Languedoc and through the valleys of Perigord. The hyena went over to England and took possession of the caverns. But the men of Europe had made a slight advance in their industries. Next, another subsidence resulted in the isolation of England and the Scandinavian peninsula; the climate was again ameliorated, and the reindeer and other arctic species retreated to Alpine elevations and northern latitudes. Now the modern aspects of the surface of the land began to appear. Various species of mammals destined to domestication—or, more probably, already domesticated in their Oriental home. The ages of Bronze, Iron, and authentic history succeeded.

(3.) Character of Prehistoric Europeans. Physically, the men of the Palaeolithic Epoch, judging from the few skeletons and skulls discovered in Belgium and England, were of rather short stature, and of a Mongoloid type, like modern Finns and Lapps. In the Reindeer Epoch, the remains of Southern Europe indicate that the men near the North were larger than those of the Mediterranean type. The skulls of Belgians were still small and round-headed, and such they continued to be to the end of the Stone Age. The Neolithic men of the Swiss lakes were much like the modern Swiss. The Palaeolithic men were not decidedly different from the Caucasians, but a jaw now found at Nautile shows remarkable marks of inferiority, being somewhat thick and small in height, and having molar teeth increasing in size backwards, the wisdom teeth being largest instead of smallest, and having, moreover, five fangs instead of two, while the chin also is deficient in prominence. The famous Neanderthal skull has a low forehead and prominent brow-ridges; but the cranial capacity was seventy-five cubic inches—about the average of modern races, and "in no sense," as Huxley says, "to be regarded as the remains of a human being intermediate between man and the apes." The English skull exhibits no special marks of inferiority. The Cro-Magnon skull of the Reindeer Epoch had a capacity of ninety-seven cubic inches—the human average. There was no prominence of the jaws or the cheek-bones, but the tibia was much flattened (platy-gramic), as in most prominent men. The Neolithic Dorbeys belonged to the type of Neanderthal. Socially and intellectually, Palaeolithic man, in the regions in question, seems to have existed in a most primitive condition. Dwelling in wild caverns, he hunted the beasts with the rudest stone implements, and clothed himself in their skins. We find no evidence of the use of fire, though probably known; and there are some indications that he made food of his own species (on anthropophagy, see Congrès International d’Anthropologie et d’Archéologie Préhistoriques, 1867, p. 138; Fliegerer, Zur Frühgeschichtlichen Ethnologie Italica, Wien, 1877, pp. 7, 8). Few attempts at pottery have been discovered, and in these the product was rude, hand-made, and simply sun-dried. In the Reindeer Epoch fire was in general use, and it was employed in baking (imperfectly) a better style of hand-made pottery, and in cooking food employed in funeral, and quite possibly human, balistic, feasts. Many pieces of highly ornamented reindeer’s horn, pierced with one, two, or three holes, discovered in Périgord, are regarded as staves of authority, either civil or priestly. Here also occur numerous phalangial bones of the deer so pierced with a hole as to serve for whistles. Bone and reindeer’s horn were now wrought into barbed harpoons and arrow-heads. On one of the bones from the cavern of La Vache (Ariège) were graven some peculiar characters, which, as suggested, may have been a first attempt at writing, though perhaps distinguishable. In the Neolithic Epoch cereals were cultivated, and ground into flour for cakes; cloth was formed for clothing, and bone combs for the hair; stores of fruits were preserved for winter’s use; garden-tills were fashioned from stag’s horn; log-canoes were employed in navigation; planks and timbers of oak were made by splitting tree-trunks with stone wedges; log cabins were constructed on piles or artificial islands; fortifications were employed in war; fish-nets, well made from flaxen cords, have been dredged at Robenhausen, and the abundant debris of numerous flint-workshops, showing a degree of division of labour, have been discovered at Grand-Presigny and other places in Belgium and France. As to intelligence and manual dexterity, a surprising amount is developed in the working of flint Implements, especially in the north of Europe.

Esthetically, Paleolithic man had advanced no further than the use of necklaces formed of natural beads, consisting of fossil foraminifaera from the chalk. Some flints from the river-drift of St. Acheul present rough sketches which, it has been conjectured, may have been prehistoric efforts at drawing. Some of them bear remote resemblances to the human head, in profile, three-quarter view, and full face; also to animals, such as the rhinoceros and mammoth. If the cavern of Massat (Ariège) is Paleolithic, it affords us the most ancient attempt at portrait, the engraving designed for St. Acheul woman has found there a stone on which was graven a wonderfully expressive outline of the cave-bear. In the Reindeer Epoch the taste for personal adornment had become considerably developed. They manufactured necklaces, bracelets, and pendants, piercing for these purposes both shells and teeth, and the bone part of the ear of the horse. Amber also came into use. The aesthetic feeling was specially developed in the south. Some of the curious pieces of reindeer’s horn supposed to be staves of authority are handsomely engraved. Some remarkable illustrations of premeval art belonging to this epoch are the following: (a.) Sculptures.—Handsomely wrought spoons of reindeer’s horn; hilt of a dagger carved in the form of a reindeer; two ivory daggers, artistically executed, representing reindeer; a harpoon in the shape of an animal’s head; the head of a staff of authority, consisting of reindeer’s horn carved into a faithfull representation of a pair of steers; another representing the head of a mammoth; a pair of pieces representing the chase of the aurochs.—On one a rude aurochs fleeing from a man casting a lance (remarkably well executed), and on the other a figure of a bovine animal different from the first; a serpent in relief on reindeer’s horn. Many of these from Laugerie-Basse. (b.)

Carvings on slate, ivory, horn, and bone.—A staff of authority, with representations of a man, two horses, and a fish; a stag graven on reindeer’s horn; part of a large herbivorous animal; no evidence of a staff of authority; reindeer-fight on slate; heads of a fish on reindeer’s horn; slates bearing other unknown animals; a young reindeer at full gallop; a hare; a curious animal with fetal characteristics; a spirited profile of a horse on bone; human head in profile on a bone spatula, in the style of a stag’s work; finally, the entire outline of a mammoth on ivory (Madeleine), and another on reindeer’s horn, forming the hilt of a poniard (Bruniquel). Most of these from Laugerie-Basse. The Neolithic Epoch seems to have been marked by a decline of the artistic feeling. The ornamentation of the pottery is more elaborate, and the finish of the stone and bone implements more symmetrical and neat, but we discover few relics of carving and engraving.

Religiously, there is little to be affirmed or inferred of the Paleolithic tribes. Some of the curiously wrought flints may have served for amulets; and occasional discovery of deposits of food near the body of the dead may very naturally be regarded as evidence of a belief in the future life. In the Reindeer Epoch this class of evidences becomes very greatly augmented, as shown in a tomb in Brittany; and in the Neolithic periods in some of the tumulus-dolmens, and in the traces of funeral remains in those and the rock-shelters of Aurignac, Bruniquel, and Furioux. The numerous specimens of bright and shining minerals found about many settlements—as of hydrated oxide of iron, carbonate of copper, fluor spar—may have been used as amulets, and thus testify to the vague sense of the supernatural which characterizes the infancy of human society. The Neolithic people add to such indications the erection of megalithic structures, some of which, surrounded by their cemeteries, are so large and sacred, must naturally be considered as their sacred temples.

Prehistoric man, in brief, represented, in Europe, the infancy of his race. All his powers were undeveloped and uneducated. Every evidence sustains us in the conclusion that he was not inferior in psychic endowments to the average man of the highest races; but he was lacking in acquired skill, and in the results of experience accumulated through a long series of generations, and preserved from forgetfulness by the blessings of a written language.

(4.) Art and Industry in Prehistoric Europe.—In debating this question, social and intellectual considerations signify nothing, since all conditions have existed in all ages. As to the geological antiquity of European man, we have stated that he dates from some part—accidental and human—that of the Natufian culture, for St. Acheul woman has been earnestly maintained, however, and is still believed by some, that man appeared in Europe before the epoch of the last general glaciation. The following are the grounds on which the opinion has been based: (a.) Regional remains erroneously supposed human.—Some bones found at Saint-Prest (Loire-Cher), near Bourges, a fossiled bones of an extinct species of deer, and of certain cetaceans and chelonians, which bear marks appearing to have been made by human implements. The manatee in question is of Miocene age. But in the same deposits occur the remains of a carnivorous bear._ (b.)

bones of Pourçé (Maine-et-Loire), as well as the notched and scratched bones of a cetacean (Balaenoptera) described from Piolenc deposits in Tuscany by Prof. Capestrani (Le piolenc pelagico in Toscana, 1876). Finally, at Thenay (Loir-et-Cher) occur flints in certain Lower Miocene limestones which were at first declared to be the works of human hands (Congrès International [1867], p. 67); but that opinion is scarcely entertained at present. (H.) Human remains erroneously supposed present.—A human skeleton found in volcanic breccia near the town of Le Puy-en-Velay, in Central France, was for a time supposed to have been enclosed by the same eruption that buried, in the same neighborhood, the remains of the Pliocene Elephas meridianus. The elephant-bearing lava, nevertheless, was of a different character; and exactly the same lava as that containing human remains was subsequently observed at another point. This enclosed the bones of the mammoth and other animals of the Champlain period, and thus demonstrated that the "man of dennece" was post-glacial. Again, the river-drifts of the Somme have been set down as glacial or preglacial; but that opinion is now almost wholly abandoned, for abundant localities are known in which it appears to a demonstration that the river-valley was excavated after the glacial drift was laid down. The Sinian beds of the time have been subsequently deposited along the chalk-slopes of the valley. Examples are seen in the sections at Menche-court and other places; and the same is shown in England at Biddenden and Summerborn Hill, in the valley of the Ouse, and at Icklingham, in the valley of the Lark. In 1859 a human skull and numerous bones of the same skeleton were exhumed (but now mostly lost) from the Colle del Vento, in Liguria (Issel, Congrès International [1867], p. 76, 156), said to be associated with extinct species of oyster of the Pliocene age. The age of the bones is disputed by Trumbull, Beys; and as no naturalist saw the remains in situ, we must candidly await further investigation. Similarly, the celebrated pelvic bone of Natches, in Mississippi, once thought to have been derived from a preglacial deposit, is now generally believed to have fallen down the bluff from an Indian grave at the surface; and the human remains of California reported to have come from beneath a bed of Tertiary lave are perhaps not sufficiently well authenticated to form the subject of speculation (Blake, Congrès International [1867], p. 101; Whitney, Geological Survey of the U. S., 1860). Other historic men in America were non-Caucasian, and therefore probably of prehistoric origin; we must expect to find their remains attaining a much higher antiquity than those of Europe.

As a measure of the time which separates Paleolithic man from the present, it is likely that a medium judgment will be reached at last. (Consult on this question Southall, The Recent Origin of Man [1873]; and Andrews, Amer. Jour. of Science [2], xiv, 188; Trans. of the Chicago Acad. of Sciences, ii, 1; Meth. Quart. Regia, Dec. 1873.) The impression of his high antiquity has been derived from the magnitude of the geological changes which have transpired since his advent. But the time required for these, in the judgment of the writer, has by some been greatly exaggerated. The contemporaneous existence of man with animals now extinct has little bearing on the question, since it has been ascertained that extinctions have been occurring throughout historic periods, even down to the present century. The disappearance of the glaciers does not seem remotely remote when we remember that their stumps are still visible in the valleys of the Alps, in the gulches of the Sierra Nevada, and even in the ice-wells of Vermont and Wisconsin. The elevation requisite to join England to the Continent cannot be thought to require a vast period after learning in what directions the glaciers moved in actual advance upon various shores, and the enormous changes in the geographical features of China within 8000 years (Pumelly, Smithonian Contributions to Knowledge, vol. xv, art. iv). The calculations based on the rate of erosion of modern river-valleys, and the growth of sphenous peat, are very misleading, since it is certain that these processes have proceeded with indefinitely greater rapidity in the pluvial and palustrine conditions of the Champlain period. (For the results of sundry calculations, see Le Hon, L'Homme Fossilé, p. 247.) Furthermore, the extreme opinions entertained within a few years on all these points have more recently been greatly modified (see King, Catastrophism and Evolution, in the Amer. Naturalist, Aug. 1877). At the same time, the evidences seem to tend towards the conclusion that the advent of man in Europe occurred from 5000 to 7000 years ago; still more, that the Oriental stock from which he had descended came first into existence more than 6000 years ago. * Such a conclusion would not be alarming on Biblical grounds, since it does not appear that the absolute age of Adam is stated either directly or by clear inference; and there is room to suspect that, in those singular cases in which the names of the patriarchs as given in the Hebrew text differ as they do from the Septuagint, the integrity of the Greek text has been better preserved than that of the Hebrew, since the Jews had a direct interest in the abbreviation of the time-table. For all this epoch always assigned by their rabbins for the advent of the Messiah had not yet arrived;† Moreover, there are some indications that a Paleolithic man in Europe was not of the Adamic (Caucasian) type, though it is pretty certain that he was succeeded, probably as early as the Reindeer Epoch, by an Eastern tide of Caucasian immigration.

We must remind the reader, in conclusion, that our condensed discussion of prehistoric peoples relates only to the European continent, and that the primitive history of the men of other quarters of the world may have differed in some important respects; while it is certain, since European man seems to have immigrated from the east, that the first appearance of his Oriental ancestors must have been considerably more remote; and still further, in view of the probable common origin of the Adamic and the other races of man, the antiquity of the human species upon the earth must have taken place at an epoch removed perhaps into the Tertiary age of the world's history. [See, however, Geology.]

man race, but only of the Jewish nation; and that other nations of men inhabited our world long before Adam. His views were espoused by many people, especially at Groningen and other places in Holland. At Brussels, however, he was seized as a heretic, and only escaped punishment by renouncing the Reformed opinions and embracing the Roman Catholic faith. In the same time he, of course, also retracted his Predestination views. See PREDESTINATION.

Prebend (from the Lat. prebendus, proceeds, i.e. an allowance of food, from prebend, to furnish), in its common acceptation signifies an allowance or provision of any sort. As an ecclesiastical term it denoted originally any stipend or reward given out of the ecclesiastical revenues to a person who had not attached himself to any particular religious establishment. It was a system which was derived from the revenues procured by the See of Benefices. When, in the course of the 10th century, the cathedral churches—having then become well endowed—left off receiving the income of their lands into one common bank, and the members of most cathedral and collegiate churches ceased living in common and separated from the episcopal mensal property, certain shares or portions fell to all those so entitled. Besides, the lands were parceled out in shares, and the income thus obtained was used for the support of the clergymen within the cathedral territory. After the definite constitution of chapters for the maintenance of the daily religious services in the bishop's church, or in other churches similarly established, endowments were assigned to them, which were to be distributed (prebenda) in fixed proportions among the members. These portions were called positions canonicae or prebenda. Hence arose the difference between a prebend and a canonry (q. v.).

A canonry was a right which a person had in a church to be deemed a member thereof, to have the right of a stall thereto, and of giving a vote in the chapter; but a prebend was a right of income, and was independent of the chapter, and was not connected with the office. The number of prebends in the several cathedral churches was increased by the benefit of the revenues of the rural clergy, and oftentimes by exchanging the lands of prebends from paying tithes to the ministers of the parishes where they lay. To the prebend was commonly attached a residence; and when an insufficient number of houses existed, the oldest prebendaries enjoyed their advantages in exchange for a fixed tax, until it became the practice to pay a fixed tax, and the clergymen had the option of living in the bishop's house or in the chapter house, and these payments were called distributions.

In England there is a trace, previous to the arrival of William I, of the tenure of distinct lands, afterwards made prebendal, at St. Paul's; but the definite name of prebend is not much earlier than the time of Edward I. In the time of Henry II, the bishop's bursaries, prebendaries, and exchequer of the bishop's purse, were reconstituted at Lichfield, and endowed with lands. It is a separate endowment appropriated, as distinguished from the commune, manors or revenues appropriated to maintain all the capitular members. At Lincoln, in the 13th century, forty-two prebends were founded; in the 12th century, at Wells, the prebends were formally distinguished and the dignities founded; in the 13th century fourteen prebends were founded at Llandaff. At York archbishop Thomas divided the lands of the common fund into separate prebends; these were augmented by archbishops Grey and Romaine, who added the last stall in the 13th century. In the 16th century bishop Sherborne founded four stalls at Chichester, the latest endowed in England. The prebends were divided into stalls of priests, deans, and canons, a certain number coming up to reside in stated courses; but in 1343 all the stalls of York were declared to be sacerdotal. Dignities almost invariably held a prebend attached to their stall.

Presbendarie is the name applied to a clergyman who is attached to a cathedral or collegiate church and enjoys a prebend (q. v.), in consideration of his officiating at stated times in the church. See Dean and Chapter.

Precarium (from the Lat. precari, to request, beseech), in the language of civil law, is a right by which one leaves to another by request the use of a thing, or the exercise of a right, without compensation, but the grantor reserving to himself the power of a reversion. The receiver, as a rule, obtains thus the judicial use of the object in question; but the giver can regain possession at any time; and he can in the surrender be refused, recur to the interdict De precario, or to the Actio proscripta verbis. Hence the expression, Precarium possidere, to possess precariously. In canonical law, precarium has not exactly the same meaning. Here the word is in genitive (precarius), and it is not applied to movable goods, but always to real estate, which is not necessarily bestowed gratuitously, but generally for the obligation of paying certain taxes, or rendering certain services, and as a consequence it cannot be taken away at pleasure. The origin of the ecclesiastical precarium is found in the 6th century, when the custom began to prevail, especially in the country, of giving the priests the use of portions of land. Pope Gelasius, in 496, had disapproved of this custom, yet a few years afterwards we find it widely spread. This transfer of real property, dependent on the priest, was continued on the bishop, and was entirely personal, not essentially connected with the office. The ecclesiastical ususfructuary had sometimes to recognise its revocability by a special deed, this declaration being accompanied with the promise of paying interest. But little by little the Frankish legislation made these cessions permanent, and the possession of the land was so intimately connected with the performance of duties that it passed uninterruptedly from every occupant to his successor. Thus in the precarium to the course of time the character of real benefices. See Ecclesia.

It was not so rare an occurrence that ecclesiastical property of that kind was given for services rendered, or to be rendered, or against payment of a tax, even to laymen. These possessions also were called precaria, for not only did their collation depend on the bishop, but the deed had to be renewed every five years. But this also took in course of time the character of a real lease. Still another meaning given to the word precaria is that of deed—an instrument donating property to the Church, but stipulating for the grantee the undertaking of the religious life. The deed of consent given by the other side was called praxaria. Formularies of precaria and prebendalities may be found in Marculi Formul. lib. ii, no. 5, 40, and in the Append. Formul. no. 27, 28, and 41, 42. See Walter, Corp. Jur. Germ. antiq. vol. iii.

Precedence, a recognition of superiority in certain acts due to one person over another. Thus in the ecclesiastical order recognised in the hierarchies of Rome, England, and Russia, or wherever such distinctions of clergy exist, priests precede deacons; and rec- tors, vicars; and vicars, perpetual curates; and incumbents, assistant-stipendiary curates. Rectors rank with each other according to the size and importance of their livings or the date of their induction; bishops according to the precedence of their sees, as in the Anglican establishment, e.g. in the case of London, Durham, and Winchester, and of Meath in Ireland, where the incumbent bears the title of Most Reverend; or, otherwise, of the date of consecration, by Bishop Mili of Milevi (416), Braga (573), Toledo (630), and London (1075), unless their sees were privileged by ancient custom. Priests and deacons rank according to the date of their ordination. For a cathedral of the old foundation in England, there are deanons—dean, proctor, chancellor, treasurer, archdeacons, canons residentiary (subdean, subchancellor of canons), and canons non-resident. In chapter the bishop sits with the dean, chancellor, archdeacon, and residentiaries on the right, and the proctor, treasurer, archdeacon, and residentiaries on the left; the rest of the canons in order of installation. At Salisbury two extra archdeacons sat on either side of the entrance. In all processions the members walked two and two, at regular distances—dignitaries in copes, canons priests in choasules, canons, deacons, and subdeacons in purple, canons in purple and dalmatic, and threepacesthererank; juniors first and seniors last in going, but in reverse order on their return; the right-hand side is the place of honor. At St. Paul's the dean walked last, between two dignitaries. The parish clergy go first, then follow vicars, canons, dignitaries, the dean, the bishop, and last the lay persons. Each parish had its cross or banner. Abbotts took precedence according to the date of their beneficent; Glastonbury, St. Alban's, and Westminster at various times challenged the first place among those who were mitred. Rural deans and honorary canons have only local precedence in a rudimentary meeting or cathedral respectively.

Precentor (Gr. πρωτοφάλης, κανώναρχος; Lat. domesticus cantorum; Fr. grand chanteur; Sp. cantor, or capo de.) was in the ancient and medieval churches the person who led the singing. He generally commenced the verse of the psalm, and the people joined him in the close. The verses were divided into two parts, and sung alternately, the singers answering to one another; but ordinarily the precentor commenced, and the people joined in the middle, the precentor finishing in the end of the verse. This was called singing acrostics. See ACROSTICS. The precentor was the dignitary collated by the diocesan and charged with the conduct of the musical portion of divine service, and required on great festivals and Sundays to commence the responses, hymns, etc., to regulate processions, to distribute the cope, to correct offences in choir, and to direct the singers. In France, England, Germany, and Spain he ranked next to the dean. He gave the signal note to the bishop, and was the successor to the canons and clerks. He supervised the admission of members of the choir and tabled their names for the weekly course on waxen tablets. He corrected and had charge of the choir books. In England when he ruled the choir he wore a rochet, cantolet, or cantor's cope, ring, and gloves, and carried a staff, and the rectors followed him in soutanes (often of red color), surplices, and cope. He installed canons at Exeter, York the dean and dignitaries, and at Lichfield the bishop and dignitaries. He attended the bishop when, as the dean, he walked on the prelate's right hand. At Paris he exercised jurisdiction over all the schools and teachers in the city and respondents in the universities. In French cathedrals, upon high festivals he presides over the choir at the lectern, and carries a baton of silver as the ensign of his dignity. At Rouen, Pau, and Brindisi he, like the other canons, wears a mitre at high mass, and at Cologne was known as chorepiscopus. At Chartres during Easter week all the capitular clergy go to the font, with the subchanter preceding the junior canons, carrying white wands, in allusion to the white robes of the baptized. At Rouen the chanter carries a white wand in certain processions, and no one without his leave could open a song-school in the city. In England his staff faces the dean, being on the north-west. In foreign cathedrals he occupied either the same position or sat next to the dean. The Greek precentor at Christmas wore white, and the singers violet. The exact was the imperial protospatulæ. The dignity of precentor was founded at Amiens in 1219; at Rouen in 1110; at Exeter, Salisbury, York, Lincoln, in the 11th century; at Wells, Chichester, Durham, Wells, Lincoln, and at St. Paul's in the 13th century. The precentor was required to be always resident, and usually held a prebend with his dignity. The Cluniac precentor was called armarius because he was also librarian, the treasurer being procurator. The singers of the primitive Church were regarded as a minor order by pope Innocent III, by the Council of Laodicea (360), and by that of Trullo. When the service of song was intrusted to lay persons in course of time, the title of chanter was preserved in cathedral chapters and collegiate churches as that of a capellan dignitary, having precedence in order of rank and duty in the church.

In modern times the name is applied to those who, in non-ritualistic churches, lead the congregation in singing. This office, lately revived, appears, from Bingham's Antiquities, to be of a very early date; the precentor, or phoinikios, was called in the early Church, either leading the congregation, or singing one part of the verse, the other part being sung by the congregation in response. See Music. In the medieval churches the precentor was one of the officers belonging to the old religious houses, whose office was afterwards continued in collegiate and cathedral churches in the capacity above first referred to. In Scotland the duties of the precentor have been greatly curtailed. He seems to have succeeded to the reader (q.v.) of earlier times. It was the habit of the precentor to repair to church about half an hour before the minister came, and read to the people several passages of Scripture. When the minister entered the precentor gave out a psalm and led the singing. After the beginning of last century he ceased by degrees either to read the Scriptures or prescribe the psalm. But his desk is still, from its original use, called the precentorial desk, and by the old people the precentor's desk. —Walcott, Sacred Archaeology, s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Earle, Eccles. Dict. s. v. See Desk; Lectern; Singing; Staff; Worship.

Precept is a direction, command, or rule enjoined by a superior. Religious precepts are divided into moral and positive. The precepts of religion, says Saunin, are an essential as the doctrines; and religion will as certainly sink if the morality be subverted, as if the theology be undermined. The doctrines are only proposed to us as the ground of our duty. A moral precept derives its force from its intrinsic fitness; a positive precept from the authority which enjoins it. Moral precepts are commanded because they are right; positive are right because commanded. The duty of honoring our parents and of observing the Sabbath are instances, respectively, of each kind of precept. See Law.

Preceptories (or Commanderies) are estates or benefices anciently possessed by the Knight Templars. On the destruction of the Templars they erected religious and service and convenient houses for habitation, and placed some of their fraternity, under the government of one of those more eminent Templars who had been by the grand-master created preceptors templi, to take care of the lands and rents in that neighborhood. All the preceptors of a province were subject to a provincial superior, called Grand Preceptor; and there were three of these who held rank above all the rest—the grand preceptors of Jerusalem, Tripolis, and Antioch. Other houses of the order were usually called commanderies.

Precepts, the Six Hundred and Thirteen, or פרקטיים. In the preface to his Heb Pictures (fol. 2, col. 2), Moses Maimonides (q.v.) writes thus: "The number of the precepts of the law is 613, of which there are 248 affirmative precepts, or precepts of commission, במשרשים וברויאים, corresponding to the 248 members of the human body, and 365 negative precepts, or precepts of omission, בטלנין וברויאים, corresponding to the number of days of the solar year." The rabbis assert that the multiplicity of precepts which God has given to the nation of Israel in preference to all others is a sign of his predilection for them, for, says rabbi Chanaan ben-Akashia, "The Holy One (blessed be he) has been pleased to render Israel meritorious; therefore he multiplied them to the law and the commandments, as it is said, 'The Lord is well pleased for his righteous one's sake'; he will magnify the law, and make it honorable" (Isa. xiii, 21). If we may believe Jewish notions, we also learn that the patriarchs already fulfilled the 613 precepts. The Jewish commentator Rashī (q. v.) thus comments very gravely on Gen. xxxii, 5: "ז"ע רבי רש"י עִבְּרֵי רֵעֲרוּ וְאֵּלִ֑י, יִהְבוּ שֵֽׁנֵים עִמָּ֖ם לָבֳנָֽא׃" The word רֵעֲרוּ, according to the Gemara (comp. the art. כֶּלֶּל, vol. ii, p. 4.), amounts to 619 (i. e. 10 × 61, 6000 = 600, 205, or 10 + 400 + 200 + 48 = 618), by which he (i. e. Jacob) wished to communicate (to his brother Esau). It is true I have sojourned with the wicked Laban, but still I observed the 613 precepts, and I have not been infected with his evil deeds; or, as the original reads, יִהְבוּ שֵֽׁנֵים עִמָּ֖ם לָבֳנָֽא׃", the same is the remark of Boal Halutrin, ad loc. Strictly orthodox Jews make their children commit to memory all the 613 precepts, as they consider a thorough knowledge of them to be a key to the oral law, though in their youth they are unintelligible to a child. Rabbi Gedaliah, of Amsterdam, published a catalogue of them in 1745, which he designated תְּרוּתָת קַאֲטָו, or The Law in Miniature. He says in his preface, "Which children are to learn in their infancy, to know them off by heart; which will be a great introduction for them to learn the oral law; and which, at the same time, they have learned in their youthful days they may remember in their old age; that they may know to do them, and live by them in this world and in the world to come." The arrangement of these precepts is different. Some, as Maimonides, arrange them according to the matter, and the same has been followed by Jon. Ebyensschtz, who put them in verse (Prague, 1765). Another is that by Gedaliah, of Amsterdam, who gives them according to the order of the Pentateuch, which is by far more preferable. As it would be tedious and fruitless to enumerate them, we will refer the reader who may feel interested to Jost, Geschichtc d. Juden u. s. Secten, i, 451 sq.; Bodenachts, Kirchliche Verfassung d. heutigen Juden (Erlangen, 1748), iv, 181 sq. Preces (i. e. prayers) are the verses and responses said in the Roman Catholic, English, and other churches at the beginning of matins and even-song.

Preces Dominicales feriales. The preces Dominicales, so called from the Dominica or Lord's Day, when they are usually recited, are those prayers which are added as a complement to the Matins and complinetorium, after the regular psalms. These preces are not recited at all duplices (double feasts), nor within the octaves, nor in the vigil of Epiphany, in the feria sexa, nor in subбота, after the octave of Ascension. The preces feriales take place in penitential times, and on the days of penitence. They are prayed kneeling at laudes, and at every single hora (time of the day) at all offices in Advent, in the forty days of Lent, in the Ember days, and vigils connected with a day of fast; with the exception of the vigil of Christmas, the vigil of Pentecost, and the ensuing Ember days. These preces are also omitted in the vigils of Epiphany and Ascension, as these feasts have no day of fast. The preces feriales begin with the "Kyrie eleison" and a whispered "Pater-noster," then, at laudes and evens, follow, "in versicles" and "responsories," prayers for the clergy, sovereigns, and people, for the community, for the deceased, for the absent brethren, the oppressed, and prisoners. Then follows the psalm "De profundis," so full of abnegation and contrition (at laudes, or "misericordiae," with some suitable final verses and the oration of the day.

Pretchtl, Maximilian, a German Benedictine, noted as a theologian and renowned as a student of canon law, was born Aug. 29, 1577, at Hahnbach, in the Bavarian Palatinate; he studied first under the Jesuits at Amberg, and was at the age of eighteen years admitted to the college of the Benedictines at Michaelfeld, where he received a philosophical and theological education, and was consecrated in 1781. In 1782 his monastery sent him to Salzburg, where he acquired a knowledge of the law, which served in good stead to his congregation in several lawsuits. He was then a professor of dogmatics and morals; in 1790 he was called to Amberg as teacher of dogmatic and ecclesiastical history, and in 1796 he was rector in the same city. Jan. 14, 1800, he was elected abbot of the monastery of Michaelfeld. After the suppression of his monastery he lived at Vilsbek, entirely devoted to study and to acts of benevolence. He died Jan. 13, 1832. The following are his works: Possédences juridiques ecclésiastiques universelles, Germanicarum ac Helveticae accommodati (Amberg, 1807); Succincta serie theologiarum theoreticarum, quam in monasterio Michaelfeldiense defen- dent, etc. (ibid. 1811); Historia Monasteriorum Michaelfeldensis; Tractatus de usu satisfactorio et absolutione, datis an preconial odors:—Wie sind die oberpfälzischen Abteien im Jahre 1695 aberal an die geistlichen Ordensstände gekommen? (1802); Friedenssoworte an die katholische und protestantische Kirche für ihre Wiedereinigung (Salzburg, 1810); Seelensätze zur Weihsel Dr. Martin Luthers an den neuen Kirchen, und der neuen Strafe in den Papstum zu Rom vom Tenfel gestiftet (ibid. 1817); Abgedrungene Antwort auf das zweite Sendeschreiben Dr. Martin Luthers an den Herausgeber, etc. (ibid. 1818):—Kritischer Rückblick auf Brm. Chr. Robert's kritische Belehrung der Seelensätze zur Weihsel Dr. M. Luthers (ibid. 1818). Pretchtl, it will be noticed from the list of his works, entered into a controversy on the questions at issue between Romanists and Protestants. His own desire was a union of all Christians, and he first wrote for this, but was unsuccessful; but, like all Romanists, he was unwilling to acknowledge the ecclesiastical condition of his own ecclesiastical body, and was therefore assailed by the Lutherans. The result was a decided polemical cast in his later writings, and a proportionate decline of scholarship and increase of haste and acrimony. (J. H. W.)

Precipiano, Humbert William, Count of, a Spanish prelate of French birth, was a native of Besançon, where he was born in 1626. He came from an ancient family, originally from Genoa. He was canon at Besançon, and archdeacon at the Paroisse de Dole and abbot of Bellevaux in 1649. In 1661 he was elected high-dean of the chapter, but the validity of his election was contested by the Holy See. He found a compensation in the confidence of king Philip IV of Spain. In 1667 he was created bishop of Urgel, and in 1671 with his brother Prosper-Ambroise, to the Diet of Ratisbon. The talents which he displayed on that occasion were rewarded five years later by his nomination to the dignity of supreme councillor of Charles II for the affairs of Burgundy and the Netherlands. His nomination to the episcopal see of Bruges in 1689, where he passed in 1689 to the archiepiscopal see of Mechlin, was the reward of his devotion to Don Juan of Austria. His zeal for the consolidation of the ultramontane doctrines was so great that he imagined a formulary more exacting than that of Alexander VII. Two decrees of the Inquisition (Jan. 28 and Feb. 6, 1694) condemned the new formulary. The prelate refused to submit to the decrees. Innocent XII joined all bishops of Belgium to abandon those quarrels, which had already lasted too long, and which the fanaticism of Precipiano endeavoured to revive. In 1696 he recantated somewhat harshly, a little more moderation to the archbishop of Mechlin. The great blot in Precipiano's life is his consent to the Jesuits for the arrest of Quemel (q. v.), May 30, 1703, at Malines. The cities of Bruges, Besançon, Brussels, Malines, and the abbey of St. Hubert passed into possession of monuments of the magnificence and piety of this prelate. He died at Brussels June 9, 1711.
Precisians, one of the names given to the Puritans, or those who, about the time of the Commonwealth, erudite men, who conducted that the king be earned on the subject of religion. They were called précieux because they condemned swearing, plays, gaming, drinking, dancing, and other worldly recreations on the Lord's day, as well as the time-serving, careless, and corrupt religion which was then in fashion.

Precisians procured his condemnation and his transmission as a prisoner to Hinckmar, archbishop of Rheims, to whose jurisdiction he properly belonged. On the arrival of Gottschalk, Hinckmar summoned a council at Quiercy, in A.D. 845, which was, however, in the end, decided by the learned Ratzmannus, as well as by Remigius, archbishop of Lyons, he was deprived of his priestly office, ordered to be whipped, and afterwards to be imprisoned. Worn out with such treatment, and after languishing for some years in the solitude of a prison, this learned and thoughtful man died under excommunication, but maintaining his opinions to the last While Gottschalk was shut up within the narrow walls of a prison his doctrines were the subject of a keen and bitter controversy in the Latin Church. Ratzmannus and Remigius on the one side, and Scottus Eriugena on the other, conducted the argument with great ability.

The contention was every day increasing in violence, and Charles the Bald found it necessary to summon another council at Quiercy, in A.D. 865, when, through the influence of Hincmar, the decision of the former council was repeated, and Gottschalk again condemned as a heretic. But in A.D. 865 the three provinces of Lyons, Vienne, and Arles met in council at Valence, under the presidency of Remigius, when the opinions of Gottschalk were approved, and those of the two councils of Quiercy were reversed. Of the twenty-three canons of the Council of Valence, five contain the doctrinal views of the friends and defenders of Gottschalk. Thus in the third canon they declare, "We confidently profess a predestination of the elect unto life, and a predestination of the wicked unto death. But in the election of those to be saved, the mercy of God precedes their good deeds; and in the condemnation of those who are to perish, their ill-deeds precede the righteous judgment of God. In his predestination God only determines with his will, what he should do, either in his grace or mercy or in his righteous judgment." "In the wicked he foresaw their wickedness, because it is from themselves; he did not predestine it, because it is not from him. The punishment, indeed, consequent upon their ill-desert he foresaw—being God, he foresees all things—and also predestined, because he is a just God, with whom, as St. Augustine says, there is both a fixed purpose and a certain foreknowledge in regard to all things whatever.” “But that some are predestinated to wickedness by a divine power, so that they cannot choose another character, and that the same believes, but if there are those who will believe so great a wrong, we, as well as the Council of Orange, with all detestation, declare them anathema.” The five doctrinal canons of the Council of Valence were adopted without alteration by the Council of Touli, in A.D. 865, which last council re-established the power of the bishops in the episcopal provinces. But on the death of Gottschalk, which happened in A.D. 868, the contention terminated. See PREDESTINATION.

Predestination, a doctrine upon which great division of opinion prevails among Christians.

1. Definition.—The word predestinate properly signifies to destine (i.e. to set apart, or devote to a particular use, condition, or end) beforehand. It therefore denotes a mere act of the will, and should be carefully distinguished from that exercise of power by which volitions are actualized or carried into effect. Etymologically it would be proper to say that God before the foundation of the world predestinated the sun to be luminous, the loadstone to attract, the atmosphere to perform its varied ministries. In theological language, however, God would be said to predestinate, not just the sun, but the destinatio late dicta, or predestination in its wider signification. The former was God's decree to save all persevering believers in Christ; the latter was that original redemptive volition in which he "will have all men to be saved" (1 Tim. ii. 4). In the Reformed Church the word has sometimes been employed as synonymous with election (q. v.), sometimes as covering both election and reprobation (q. v.). Arminius, in his 15th Pub. Disputat., sect. 3, sought to distinguish between these two terms. His ideas were not more scriptural, but he is not followed in this respect by his remonstrant successors. Calvin and most of his followers employ the term as applying to the repulsive decree of God as much as to the elective (see this point discussed under Calvinism, vol. ii., p. 48, col. 29).

II. Is Predestination Absolute or Conditional? - The central point of the predestination controversy has always been this question: Are the decrees by which certain individuals are elected to eternal life and others decreed to everlasting misery respective or irrespective—that is, were these decrees based upon God's foreknowledge (q. v.) of the different use individuals would make of their moral agency, or were they not? The Arminian takes the affirmative, the Calvinist the negative. The former reasons in this wise: Divine predestination, regarded as the complete, all-embracing plan of God, was objectively absolute; it is obvious that the various individual decrees which are conceived of as components of that plan must mutually limit and condition each other. Thus the divine determination that "while the earth and harvest shall not cease" was not an absolute decree, but one conditioned upon the divine determination, antecedent to it in the order of nature, that there should be an earth with planetary motion, etc. Were not each decree adjusted to every other they could not compass the attainment of its common end. Instead of being integrating elements of one wise and self-consistent plan, some might be found superfluous, some perhaps in direct collision. Hence no individual decree can be regarded as irrespective or unconditioned; each is conditioned on the succeeding, and on the whole system of divine pre-volitions of which it forms a part. Now an absolute, irreversible decree, continues the Arminian, either electing an individual to eternal life or dooming him to everlasting death, fails to answer to either of these essential conditions or characteristics of a divine decree. It would be palpably inconsistent with the divine perfections on the one hand, and absolutely irreconcilable with known determinations of God on the other. Such an elective decree would be incompatible with God's rationality and impenetrability. To those who believe in a conflict not only with his benevolence, but even with his justice. Both would be at open war with the known design of the Creator that men should enjoy the enjoyment of moral agency and shape their own eternal destinies. Hence an unconditional, irrespective election of some unto life, and an unconditional, irrespective reprobation of others unto death, cannot be maintained. If any are individually elected or rehorted, they must have been elected or rehorted with reference to the foreseen use they would make of their moral agency, for only in this principle can the determinations be constructed which shall not compromise the divine character or conflict with known determinations respecting man.

So just and conclusive is this reasoning that the long task of the absolute predestinarians has been to devise some expedient by which unconditional election and reprobation may be shown to be compatible with the divine attributes and with all known divine decrees. Several have been tried. (1) Perhaps the most legitimate of them all is that adopted by those divines who consider the divine will the ground of all rational and moral qualities. If that will affirms, nothing is rational or irrational, just or unjust, right or wrong, except that for the time being it is God's will that it should be so, then evidently an arbitrary damnation of innocent beings may be just as right and proper an act as any other. If he wills it to be right, then it is right; however it may seem to us. Hence, on this scheme, we have only to suppose that God wills an act to be right to render it perfectly proper and consistent for him to perform it. Only on this hypothesis can irrevocable predestination be successfully defended. (2) Another class of divines, unable to adopt this bold principle (according to which God is able to abrogate the moral law as easily as the old ceremonial one of the Jews), yet forced to mitigate in some way the revolting horrors of an irrevocable predestination, have sought relief in the fiction, a posteriori, on the spurious foreknowledge. Calvinists, in themselves only, were incapable of anything supernatural. Only by the aid of supernatural and divine grace could their nature be conformed and strengthened if it should remain in its integrity, they're restored if it should then, as the means to produce a true understanding, God determined by an immutable decree to elect certain men, so viewed, to participation in his grace and glory. To show his sovereign freedom, he determined to pass by the remainder (pretitition), and not communicate to them that divine aid requisite to keep them from sin; then, when the persons passed by become sinners, he proposes to demonstrate his justice by their damnation. How much real relief this device affords may be seen by consulting Arminius, Declaration of Sentiments, or Watson, Institutes, pt. ii., ch. xviii. (8.) Another expedient sometimes employed in the reconciliation of a predestinarian theodicy is to regard sin as a mere negation. As brought forward by Dr. Chalmers (Institutes, pt. iii, ch. v), it might be viewed as a modification of the last-mentioned. Both fail to vindicate even the justice of God, since in each case the finally damned are damned solely for failing to do what they have no ability, natural or vouchsafed, to perform. (4) A fourth scheme is called sublaptoriasion. In this the fall of man was antecedent in the order of the divine decrees to election and reprobation. All men are viewed as personally great and powerful and Adam and Eve with him to eternal death. From this mass God sovereignly and graciously elected some unto life for a demonstration of his mercy; the rest he reprobated to everlasting woe for a demonstration of his justice. In all this it is claimed that there was nothing inconsistent with God's character, since all might justly have been damned. It happens, however, that few are ready to acquiesce in this all-important premise, to wit, that all the descendants of Adam are justly obnoxious to eternal death on account of his sin, hence the conclusion avoids nothing, is most obvious. For these ingenious contrivances to harmonize unconditional predestination with God's known attributes and principles of administration as moral governor, the abettors of the doctrine usually come finally (5) to bare assertion. They maintain the unconditionality of election and reprobation on the one hand, and on the other the perfect justice and benevolence of God and adequate agency of man, without attempting to reconcile the two. They resolve the palpable contradiction into a mere "mystery," and imperiously shut every opponent's mouth with the misquoted Scripture, "Who art thou that repliest against God?"

As our limits do not admit of a methodical examination of the various passages of Scripture in which Calvinists find their doctrine asserted or assumed, we shall be obliged to refer the reader to Watson, and to those commentators who have not devoted themselves to Biblical interpretation merely as an advantageous polemical agency. We only remark, in passing, that no fact is more striking or significant in the whole history of Scripture than the steady preoccupation of all sound expositors to the exegetical views of the early Remonstrants. Tholuck gratefully acknowledges his obligation to them, and even Prof. Stuart quite as often follows Grotius as Calvijn. Indeed, he confesses that he cannot find irrespective election in Rom. viii, 26-30, nor can he "show how the fathers are to be made to stand," nor can he "square" or rationalize the views of the early Remonstrants. (Com. Exe. x, 347.) In like manner he adopts the interpretation of Rom. vii, 5-25, which it cost Arminius so much to establish, and believes the time is coming "when there will be but one opinion among intelligent Christians about the passage in question, as there was but one before the dispute of Augustine with Pelagius." (Exe. vii, 7.)

III. History of the Doctrine.—The unanimous and unquestioned doctrine of the Church on this point for more than four hundred years was, so far as developed into distinctness, precisely identical with that which owes its scientific form and name to Arminius (q. v.). The early fathers often expressed themselves unguardedly, and, in so doing, sometimes laid themselves open to the charge of a leaning towards the erroneous views and dogma of Pelagianism (q. v.) and his cypher, [Pele.]; but their general sentiment was soundly evangelical and capable of an enunciation entirely free from every suspicion of consanguinity with that heresy. "In respect to predestination," says Wiggers, "the fathers before Augustine differed entirely from them.... They had predestination upon presence. Hence the Massilians were entirely right when they maintained that Augustine's doctrine of predestination was contrary to the opinion of the fathers and the sense of the Church" (A. Aquas. and Pelagianism, p. 425). Justin, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Chrysostom—all in clear and decisive statements—gave their adherence to the theory of conditional predestination, rejecting the opposite as false, dangerous, and utterly subversive of the divine glory. It is evident that they did not investigate the subject to the depth to which it is requisite for the full discussion of it to go, and that various questions, which must be put before it can be brought completely before us, they either did not put or hastily regarded as of very little moment; but it is enough to do so, and not to lack others in the same line of thought, if they did express themselves upon it, and have so expressed themselves as to leave no doubt of the light in which it was contemplated by them. Justin, in his dialogue with Trypho, remarks, that "they who were foreknown as to become wicked, were such overlords of their own bodies that they did not commit any faults of God, aitir tou Theou, but from their own blame," by which observation he shows that it was his opinion that God foresaw in what manner his intelligent creatures would act, but that this did not affect their liberty, and did not diminish their guilt. A little after he says more that God has assigned the last name among the angels and men free to the practice of righteousness, having planted in them reason, through which they knew by whom they were created and through whom they existed, when before they were not, and prescribed to them a law by which they were to be judged, if they acted contrary to right reason. Wherefore we, angels and men, are through ourselves convicted as being wicked, if we do not lay hold of repentance. But if the Logos of God foretells that some angels and men would go to be punished, he does so because he foreknew that they would certainly become wicked by no means, however, because God made them such." Justin thus admits that man is wholly dependent upon God, deriving existence and everything which he has from the Almighty; but he is persuaded that we were perfectly able to retain our freedom, that, although it were preordained that we should not do so, this did not diminish our moral power, or fix any imputation on the Deity in consequence of our transgression. Tatian, in his oration against the Greeks—an excellent work, which, although composed after the death of Justin, was written, in all probability, before its date—had already stated all that he desired towards the conclusion of his life—expresses very much the same sentiments avowed by Justin. He says, "Both men and angels were created free, so that man becoming wicked through his own fault may be deservedly punished, while a good man, who, from the right exaltation of which it was given him to possess the law of the God, is entitled to praise; that the power of the divine Logos, having in him the knowledge of what was to happen, not through fate or unavoidable necessity, but from free choice, predicted future things, condemning the wicked and praising the righteous." Irenæus, in the third book of his work against heresies, has taken an opportunity to state his notions about the origin of evil. The seventy-first chapter of that book is entitled, "A proof that man is free, and has power to the extent, that of himself he can choose what is good or the contrary." In illustration of this he remarks, "God gave to man the power of election, as he did to the angels. They, therefore, who do not obey are justly not found with the good, and receive deserved punishment, because God, having given them the power of election, did not give them the riches of the divine mercy." The next chapter is entitled, "A proof that some men are not good by nature and others wicked, and that what is good is within the choice of man. In treating on this subject, Irenæus observes that, if the reverse were the case, the good would not merit praise nor the wicked blame, because, being merely what, without any will of theirs, they had been made, they could not be considered as voluntary agents. But," he adds, "since all have the same nature, and are able to retain and to do what is good, and not to do it, it is not only that they see men, even in the sight of men, and much more in that of God, deservedly praised and others blamed." In support of this he introduces a great variety of passages from Scripture. It appears, however, that the real difficulty attending the subject had suggested itself to his mind, for he inquires in the seventy-second chapter why God had not from the beginning made man perfect, all things being possible to him. He gives to this question a metaphysical and unsatisfactory answer, but it so far satisfied himself as to convince him that there could not exist any other thing, not, on the contrary, those who did not love God, those who did not love the perfections of the Almighty, and that, consequently, a sufficient explanation of the origin of evil and of the justice of punishing it was to be found in the nature of man as a free agent, or in the abuse of that liberty with which God endowed (see Irenæus, iv, 392; Justin, c. Trypho, c. 140.)

In the Western Church all the early theologians and teachers were equally unanimous. While the Alexandrian theologians laid special stress on free will, those of the West dwelt more on amara depravity and on the necessity of grace of God, and made the two points so far all agreed. It was conceded that it was conditioned by free will. Unconditional predestination they all denied. This stage of Church doctrine is represented by Hilary of Poitiers and Ambrose of Milan, as well as by Tertullian (A. dc. Marcion, ii, 6), who, much as he sometimes needed the doctrine of irresistible grace, would never so much as adopt an unconditional election, much less an unconditional repubration. Tertullian had also speculated upon the moral condition of man, and has recorded his sentiments with respect to it. He explicitly asserts the freedom of the will, and says that, if it can be denied, there can be neither reward nor punishment; and in answer to an objection that since free will has been productive of such melancholy consequences it would have been better that it had not been bestowed, he enters into a long and rationally pertinent argument. In reply to another suggestion that God be made predestination to depend on prescience (De Fide, lib. v, § 83). In other places, however, his language approaches more nearly to that of Augustine (see Hase, Dogmatik, § 162; Gieseler, Dogmengeschichte, § 39; Neander, History of Dogmas, i, 348, 544). To quote Neander again: "Although the freedom and the creative agency of grace are made particularly prominent in these passages, still they do not imply any necessary exclusion of the state of reciprocity in the individual as a condition, and accordingly this assertion of Ambrose does not really reconcile with the assertion first quoted. In another place, at least (De Fide, lib. v, § 88), he expressly supposes that predestination is conditioned by foreknowledge (ibid., ii, 564)."

The substantial doctrines of the fathers as to the extent of grace before Augustine was that Christ died, not for an elect portion of mankind, but for all men, and that if men are not saved the guilt and the fault are their own (Gieseler, Dogmengeschichte, § 72).

Thus we see that for more than four hundred years not a single voice was heard, either in the Eastern or Western Church, in advocacy of the notion of an unconditional divine predestination. At this point Augustine, already in very advanced old age, and under controversial pressure, took the first step towards Calvinism by pronouncing the decree of election unconditional. In explaining the relation between man's activity and decision, he did not forget the necessity of a free will in man, and he maintained that, although God gives man the power to do good, the will and the act are man's. He denied that there was any divine energy in grace that could impair the operations of free will. Augustine, on the other hand, maintained that grace is an internal operation of God upon those whom he designs to save, imparting not only the power, but also the will to do good. The fact that some are saved and others lost he attributed to the will of God. Hence his doctrines of unconditional predestination, of particular redemption, and of the necessity of grace as a free gift of God, was based upon foreseen guilt, but apparently unconscious of the inconsistency, he denied the applicability of the same principle to election. In 529 the system of Augustine was established as Church doctrine by the Council of Arausio (Orange), but the reaction against the strictly logical yet essentially immoral nature of his dogma has been perpetually manifested. See Augustine.

Four hundred years more passed away before a man could be found bold enough to adopt a theory by declaring that, as God has sovereignly and immutably elected whosoever he pleased unto life, without any foresight of faith and obedience, so he has of his own good pleasure freely and unchangeably predestinated whosoever he pleased unto everlasting misery, without any reference to foreknown sin and guilt on their part. This anticipator of Calvin was a Saxon monk named Gottschalk (Godschals)us). His novel view brought down upon him not merely ecclesiastical censure, but even persecution. His doctrine was condemned by a council which Anselm of H Maurus had called at Mayence, A.D. 848 (Mansi, Concilii, iv, 914), and Gottschalk, who was then travelling, was sent to his metropolitan, archbishop Hincmar of Rheims, who called another council at Quierzy in 849. Here he was defended by Ratraminus, the opponent of Paschasius Radbertus in the Eucharistic controversy, and also by Remigius, afterwards archbishop of Lyons; but notwithstanding these powerful supporters, he was condemned a second time, and ordered to undergo the penitence of flogging, which the rule of St. Benedict imposed upon monks who troubled the Church. After this condemnation he was imprisoned in the monastery of Hautville, where he died, without having rescinded his opinions, about the year 868. See Gottschalk.

While the friends of Gottschalk were endeavoring to obtain his absolution and release, Hincmar put forward Johannes Scotus Erigena (q. v.) to answer his predestination theory, which Erigena did in 851, in his treatise De Prædestinazione, in which he raised up a cloud of adversaries by the freedom with which he contradicted the established doctrines of the Church as to the natural condition of human nature being thus aroused. Hincmar summoned a second council at Quiercy in 858, which confirmed the decision as to the real doctrine of the Church arrived at by the previous council (Mansi, Concil. xiv. 905). A rival council was called by the opposite party from the provinces of Lorraine, Namur, Liége, and Artois, which met at Aachen in 855, but instead of fully confirming the opinion of Gottschalk, this council considerably modified it by declaring that although sin is foreknown by God, it is not so predestined as to make it necessarily inevitable that it should be committed (ibid. xiv. 1). Hincmar now wrote two works on the subject, one of which is not extant; the other is entitled De Prædestinatione Dei et Libero Arbitrio adversus Gottschalcum et ceteris Prædestinationibus. Having thus explained his views at length, they were substantially accepted, in the form of six doctrinal canons, by the Synod of Langres, and by that of Tournai (A.D. 859), held at Savonnières a few days afterwards (Mansi, Concil. xv. 525-27), and thus the controversy terminated. See Manguin, Collect. auct. de Prædest. et Gratia (1650); Ussher, Gottschalchi et Prædest. Controvers. Hist. Epochr (1654). No authoritative or influential teacher appeared to support Gottschalk's views for seven hundred years. The most conspicuous of those who did was Thomas Bradwardine (A.D. 1290-1349), warden of Merton College, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. His work on the subject is entitled De Causa Dei contra Pelagium et de Virtute causarum ad nos Mertonenses, and in this he gave free will so low a place that he may be almost called a necessitarian. Thomas Aquinas, who flourished during the 13th century, wrote largely upon the nature of free will and predestination and upon these subjects were nearly the same as those of Augustine; and so much, indeed, was he conceived to resemble in genius and understanding that distinguished prelate, that it was asserted the soul of Augustine had been sent into the body of Aquinas. He taught that God from all eternity, and without any regard to their works, predestinated a certain number to life and happiness; but he found great delight in endeavoring to reconcile this position with the freedom of the human will. His celebrated antagonist, John Duns Scotus, an inquirer par excellence, in his Quaestiones and Difficile directed his attention in the following century to the same thorny speculations, but he took a different view of them from Aquinas; and we find in the works of these two brilliant lights of the theol. ages upon this subject, the most learned in the dark ages thought upon this question.

In the midst of the ferment of the Reformation, the subject of predestination was revived by a controversy between Erasmus and Luther, the former writing an able Disputatio de Libero Arbitrio in 1524, and Luther following it up with his halting treatise De Servo Arbitrio, in which he went so near to the predestinarians as to deny that any free will can exist in man before he has received the gift of faith. But at this stage stepped forth John Calvin (q. v.) as the champion of predestination. He found the Reformed churches in a perfectly chaotic state as respects doctrines. They possessed no coherent creed or system. They were held together by agreement in mere negations. They needed nothing so much as a positive system. Calvin, a stripping off of the human mind of all the false notions of the ancient and best divines in the land wore in the chiefest points in opinion against the heads and their resolutions. Another letter he sent to the heads themselves, telling them that they had enjoined Barret to affirm that which was contrary to the doctrine held and expressed in the first two articles of the Confession of Faith, the Predestination of the Church of England, and in other churches likewise men...

of best account; and that which for his own part be thought to be false and contrary to the Scriptures; for the Scriptures are plain that God by his absolute will did not hate and reject any man. There might be impiety in believing the one, and, therefore, no impiety in believing the other. The question is not about any man's private opinion, but about the doctrine of the Church; and supposing the archbishop to be a Calvinist, as he seems to have been at least in some points, this only adds the greater weight to his testimony, that the English Church has nowhere declared in favor of that scheme. The archbishop descended to the particulars charged against Barret, asking the heads what article of the Church was contradicted by this or that notion of his; and Whitaker in his reply does not appeal to one of the articles as against Barret, but forms his plea upon the doctrines which then generally obtained in pulpits. His words are, "We are fully persuaded that Mr. Barret hath taught untruth, if not against the articles, yet against the religion of our Church, publicly received, and always held in majesty, established in all consistory, disputation, and lectures." But even this pretense of his, weak as it would have been though true, is utterly false, directly contrary, not only to what has been already shown to be the facts of the case, but also to what the archbishop affirmed, and that too, as must be supposed, upon his own knowledge. As to Dr. Barret, he met with many friends who espoused his cause. Mr. Smythe particularly mentions four—Mr. Overal, Dr. Clayton, Mr. Harriet, Dr. Andrews—all of them great and learned men, men of renown, and famous in their several parts of the kingdom for their great worth, and none of them, by any means, ready to afford the pillory. The heads in their letter to lord Burleigh do not pretend that the preaching against Calvinism gave a general offence, but that it offended many—which implies that there were many others on the opposite side; and they expressly say there were divers in the anti-Calvinistic scheme, whom they represent as maintaining it with great boldness. But what put a stop to this prosecution against Barret was a reprimand from their chancellor, the lord Burleigh, who wrote to the heads that as good and as ancient were of another judgment, and that the heads which most parts of him, and so his well-doing. But Dr. Whitaker, regius professor of divinity in Cambridge, could not endure the further prevalence of the doctrines of general redemption in that university; he therefore, in 1589, drew up nine affirmations, elements of doctrine of predestination, and obtained for them the sanction of several Calvinistic heads of houses, with whom he repaired to the archbishop Whitgift. Having heard their ex parte statement, his grace summoned bishops Fletcher and Vaughan, and Dr. Tindal, dean of Ely, to meet Dr. Whitaker and the Cambridge divines; and, in his grace's presence, the authors met him, the 23rd of November, 1593; where, after much polishing and altering, they produced Whitaker's affirmation, called the "Lambeth Articles" (q. v.). Dr. Whitaker died a few days after his return from Lambeth with the nine articles to which he had procured the patronage of the prime. After his demise, two competitors appeared for the vacant king's professorship—Dr. Wotton, of King's College, a professor Calvinist, and Dr. Overal of Trinity College, "almost as far," says Heylin, "from the Calvinist doctrine in the main platform of predestination as Barret, his chief antagonist, proved to be. But when it came to the vote of the university, the place was carried for Overal by the major part: which plainly shows that though the doctrines of Calvin were so hotly stuckle here by most of the heads, yet the greater part of the laymen, namely, the called themselves. "The Lambeth Articles," it is well observed, "are no part of the doctrine of the Church of England, having never had any of the least sanction either from the parliament or the convocation. They were drawn up by Prof. Whitaker; and though they were afterwards approved by the archbishop Whitgift, and six or eight of the inferior clergy, in the manner of articles, they had a judgment yet that meeting was only in a private manner, and without any authority from the queen; who was so far from approving of their proceedings that she did not only order the articles to be suppressed, but was resolutely bent for some time to bring the bishop and his articles under a praemunire, for presuming to make them without any warrant or legal authority." Such, in brief, was the origin and such the fate of the Lambeth Articles, without the countenance of which the defenders of Calvinism in the Church of England could not find any semblance of support for their manifold affirmations on predestination and its kindred topics. At the census of 1651 two congregations calling themselves "Predestinarians" were returned. Through the Puritans the Calvinistic notions were spread all over New England, and by the Reformed Dutch and other Presbyterian bodies carried through most of the Middle and Western States of America. In some quarters they have been either outgrown [see ONEKIN THEOLOGY] or so modified by outside Arminian influence as to lose all the marks of the original creed and standards of several large denominations of the world the peculiar doctrines of Calvinism are unequivocally enunciated. From that celebrated synod known as the Westminster Assembly came forth the Calvinistic Confession and its catechisms, and its form of Church government. These wonderful documents have been preserved unchanged to the present time. The formula of the Presbyterian Church of America at this time are essentially the same that were promulgated by the Westminster Assembly of Divines more than two hundred years ago. They have been revised and sanctioned by the members of the Church. They must be distinctly professed by all its ministers and office-bearers. They are taught from the chairs of its theological schools, and they are elaborately systematized and ably defended in its able-bodied divines—of which the best and ablest, by Dr. Hodge, of Princeton, has recently been issued. That these teach the doctrines of predestination nobody denies; that to unsophisticated minds they exalt the divine sovereignty at the expense of his justice and his grace is often contended, that this has seemed to be a hold that, to make them agree with the language of Holy Scripture, entirely illegitimate methods of accommodation have had to be resorted to. See ARMINIANISM; CALVINISM.

IV. Connection of Predestination with other Doctrines.

—Much confusion and obscurity has arisen in the progress of the predestinarian controversy from failing to keep the real issue always distinctly in view. The point in controversy is not whether or not God had a plan when he entered upon creation. See FOREKNOCKING; PROVIDENCE. Whether is it whether or not that plan embraced a positive preappointment of every individual event in the whole range of futurity. Nor yet is it whether or not an exercise of divine energy is inerably connected with any or all of God's predeterminations so that they are "effectual" decrees. See CALLING; GRACE. The real question is: Has God by an immutable and eternal decree predestinated some of the human family unto eternal life, and all the others unto everlasting destruction, without any reference whatever to the way they may make of their moral agency? This is the Calvinistic point. This point turns solely on what he regards as Scripture authority, and often admitting that the human mind cannot reconcile it with the character of God or the dictates of human reason. Among the denominations some have repudiated the "support of the predestinarian decrees". "The Lambeth Articles," it is well observed, "are no part of the believeth shall be saved, he that believeth not, etc. Others allow an individual or personal election, but, like Watson, understand by it "an act of God done in the foreknowledge even to the foreordination of the means of salvation" (Inst. ii. 338). Others, as the older Arminians generally, suppose that specific individuals were eternally predestinated to life and death, but strictly according to their foreknown obedience or disobedience to the Gospel.

V. Literature.—The bibliography of this subject is blended with that of ARMINIANISM, ELECTION, FREEDOM, WILL, GRACE, REMONSTRANTS, REPORROBATION, and will be found under these titles. In addition to the works there cited, the following may be referred to as treating of the point of discord: the views of the Reformers, consult the symbolic writings of Möhler and Buchmann; Staudenmayer, In Behalf of the Religious Peace of the Future (Freib. im Br. 1846, 1st pt. 1 vol.); id. A curiosity of the subject is Henry Brey's Script. Predelat, not Futurist; Two Conversations on Rom. viii. 29, 30, and Ephes. i. 5, designed to show that the Predestination of the Bible refers chiefly and primarily to the Restoration and Perfection of the Physical Nature of the Saints at the Last Day (ibid. 1855, 16mo). The best exposition of Calvinitic predestination is of course by Dr. Hodges, the Nestor of American theology of that type. See, therefore, his Systematic Theology, and compare Pope, General Theology. There is a divinity of persons, of human bodies, dos not indicate that a doctrine could be maintained by any more than pecytable in the foregoing. Classification, and not predication, is the ruling idea in each.

Pre-emminence of Christianity, i.e. the higher power and honor due to Jesus the Christ. This doctrine is laid down in Colossians i. 18. In all things in nature, in person, in office, work, power, and honor, Christ has the pre-eminence above angels and men, or any other creature. But a man has no pre-eminence above a beast as to his body; he is liable to the same diseases and death (Eccles. iii. 15). See Bibliotheca Sacra, 1863, p. 281; Church Remembrancer, Jan. 1850, p. 103 sq.

Pre-established Harmony. See Leibnitz.

Pre-existence of Jesus Christ is his existence before he was born of the Virgin Mary. That he really did exist is taught plainly in John iii. 18; vi. 50, 62, etc.; viii. 58; xvi. 5; 1 John i. 2; but there are various opinions respecting this existence. Some, acknowledging, with the orthodox, that in Jesus Christ there was a divine person, and a human body, go into an opinion peculiar to themselves. His body was formed in the Virgin's womb; but his human soul—the first and most excellent of all the works of God—they suppose was brought into existence before the creation of the world, and subsisted in happy union in heaven with the second Person of the Godhead until his incarnation. The doctrine is thus clearly set forth by bishop Bull in his Defence of the Nicene Creed: "All the Catholic orators of the first three centuries taught that Jesus Christ, he who was afterwards so called, existed before he became man, or before he was born, according to the flesh, of the Blessed Virgin, in another nature far more excellent than the human nature; that he appeared to holy men, giving them an earnest, as it were, of his incarnation; that he always prevailed over and provided for the salvation of his people in time to come he would redeem with his own blood, and of consequence that, from the beginning, the whole order or thread of the divine dispensation, as Terrallican speaks, ran through him; further yet, that he was with the Father before the foundation of the world, and that by himself all things were made. Those who advocate this doctrine differ in their chirostological views from those called Arians, for the latter ascribe to Christ only a created deity, whereas the former hold his true and proper divinity. They differ from the Socinians, who believe no existence of Jesus Christ before his incarnation; they differ from the Sabelians, who only own a trinity of names; they differ also from the generally received opinion, which is, that Christ was made in the likeness of Adam. He was born of a mother, in exact conformity to that likeness unto his brethren of which St. Paul speaks (Heb. ii. 17). The writers in favor of the pre-existence of Christ's human soul recommend their opinion by these arguments: 1. Christ is represented as his Father's messenger, or agent, being distinct from his Father, sent by his Father, long before his incarnation, to perform actions which seem to be too low for the dignity of pure Godhead. The appearances of Christ to the patriarchs are described like the appearance of an angel, or man really distinct from God; yet one in whom God, or Jehovah, had a peculiar indwelling, or with whom the divine nature had a personal union. 2. Christ, when he came into the world, is said in several passages of Scripture, to have divested himself of some glory which he had before his incarnation. Now if there had existed before this time nothing but his divine nature, this divine nature, it is argued, could not properly have divested itself of any glory (John xvii, 4, 5; 2 Cor. viii. 9). It cannot be said of God that he became poor: he is infinitely self-sufficient; he is necessarily and eternally rich in himself. Neither can it be said of Christ, as he was, that he was rich, if he were never in a richer state before than while he was on earth. 3. It seems needful, say those who embrace this opinion, that the soul of Jesus Christ should pre-exist, that it might have an opportunity to give its previous actual consent to the great and painful undertaking of making atonement for man's sins. It was the human soul of Christ that endured the weakness and pain of his infant state, all the labors and fatigues of life, the reproaches of men, and the sufferings of death. The divine nature is incapable of suffering; it is indifferent to and out of all relation with the Father and the Son is therefore represented as being made before the foundation of the world. To suppose that simple Deity, or the Divine Essence, which is the same in all the three Personals, should make a covenant with itself, is inconsistent.

Dr. Watts, moreover, supposes that the doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul of Christ explains dark and difficult Scriptures, and discovers many beauties and proprieties of expression in the Word of God, which on another view, as in Watts, works, v. 274, 385; Gill, Body of Divinity, i. 51; Robinson, Plea, p. 140; Fleming, Christology; Simpson, Apology for the Trinity, p. 190; Hawker, Sermon on the Divinity of Christ, p. 44, 45; Haag, Histoire des Dogmes Chrétien; Martensen, Dogmatik; Müller, Doctrine of Sin; Lindsay, Divinity of Christ; Hagenbach, Hist. of Dog-trines; Studier u. Kräiken, 1860, No. 3, Comp. Indwelling Scheme; Jesus Christ.

Pre-existents (or Preexisttials) is the name given to those who hold the hypothesis of the pre-existence of souls, the doctrine of the human soul of Christ, as well as that he bore something of the image and resemblance of the divine nature. Dr. Samuel Clarke, it will be borne in mind by the well-read student of Christology, did not accept the general orthodoxy view of the Trinity doctrine, but endeavored to form a theory holding an intermediate place between the Arian and orthodox systems, neither allowing Jesus to be called a creature nor admitting his equality with the Father. He held that from the beginning there existed along with the Father a second Person, called the Word in the Womb of Adam. Nor can it be said of Adam that he was an angelic spirit at first. Because of their apostasy in the angelic sphere, they were transferred, as a punishment for their sin, into material bodies in this mundane sphere, and are now passing through a disciplinary process, in order to be restored, all of them, without the aid of the divine and superstitious, and the powers from the Father. The Jews uniformly maintained the pre-existence of the Messiah. In English theology, Dr. Watts was the ablest exponent of this doctrine. In American theology the Rev. Noah Worcester advocated Dr. Watts's theory, but with modified modifications founded on the title "Son of God," which is so frequently applied to Christ in the N. T., and which Worcester alleged "must import that Jesus Christ is the Son of the Father as truly as Isaac was the son of Abraham; not that he is a created intelligent being, but a being who properly derived his existence and nature from God and the Father. Without disowning the doctrine of the pre-existence of Jesus Christ is a not self-existent being, for it is impossible even for God to produce a self-existent son; but as Christ derived his existence from the Father, he is as truly the image of the invisible God as Seth was the likeness of Adam. He is therefore a person of divine dignity, constituted as the creator of the world, the angel of God's presence, or the medium by which God manifested himself to the ancient patriarchs. According to this theory the Son of God became man, or the Son of man, by becoming the soul of a human body. Those who object to the doctrine of the pre-existence of the human soul of Christ do so on the principle that such a doctrine weakens and subverts that of his divine personalty, and assigns as grounds for such a position that—1. A pure intelligent spirit, the first, the most ancient, and the most excellent of creatures, created before the foundation of the world, so exactly resembles the second Person of the Arian Trinity that it is impossible to show the least difference except in name. 2. This pre-existent Intelligence, supposed in this doctrine, is so confused with those other intelligences called angels that we are not sure how to distinguish between the Risen Christ and the angel. 3. He is the Son of man, by making the person of Christ to consist of three natures. 8. If Jesus Christ had nothing in common like the rest of mankind except a body, how could this semi-conformity make him a real man? 4. The passages quoted in proof of the pre-existence of the human soul of Jesus Christ are of the same sort with those which others allege in proof of the pre-existence of all human souls. 5. This opinion, by ascribing the dignity of the work of redemption to this sublime human soul, detracts from the deity of Christ, and renders the last as passive as the first is active. 6. This notion is contrary to the Scripture. St. Paul says, "In all things he behoved him to be made like unto his brethren" (Heb. ii, 17): he partook of all our infirmities except sin. St. Luke says, "He increased in stature and wisdom" (Luke ii, 50). Upon the whole, this scheme, adopted to relieve the difficulties which must always surround mysteries so great, only creates new ones. This is the usual fate of similar speculations, and shows the wisdom of resting in the plain interpretation of the Word of God.
The doctrine of pre-existence first found its advocates in the Christian Church in the 2d century. The fathers Justin Martyr, Origen, and others espoused it, particularly Origen, who became its principal expositor and advocate. It was a belief very prevalent anciently, and is still widely spread throughout the East. The Greek philosophers, too, especially those who held the doctrine of transmigration (q. v.), as the Pythagoreans, Empedocles, Plato—although with him pre-existence is not simply a symbolical myth—were familiar with the conception; and so were the Jews, especially the cabalists. It is generally received by the modern Jews, and is frequently taught in the writings of the rabbinists. One declares that "the soul of man had an existence before its formation;" another that "the universe was there existing before the creation of man;" another says that "the soul of man is a particle of the Deity from above, and is eternal like the heavenly nature." A similar doctrine is believed by the Persian Sofia (q. v.). With the pre-existents should also be classed the metempsychosists, for pre-existence is connected with the idea of metempsychosis (q. v.), according to which doctrine the soul was, in a former life, in punishment for sin, united with a human body, in order to expiate, by the sorrows of earthly existence, anterior transgressions. Therefore, according to Augustine of Hippo, "as the authority of Socrates states (Contra Julianum, iv, 15): "Ex quibus humanae vitae erroribus et aerumnis fit, ut interdum veteres illi sive rates sive in sacris initiaque tradendis divine mentis interpretes, qui nos ab aliquo sceleras suspicatis, post mortem in frigore caelorum esse natos dixerunt, alicuius vidisse videantur." Nemesius, as a philosopher, and Prudentius, as a poet, seem to have been the only defenders of the pre-existence theory, which was condemned formally in the Council of Constantinople in 381, A.D. 540. Hence the doctrine has been embraced by mystics (q. v.) generally, both in ancient and modern times; and has since been revived, in a modified form, in German theology, by Julius Müller, and forms the basis of his work on The Christian Doctrine of Sin, one of the deepest works in modern theology. In American theology it has its able advocate in Dr. Edward Beecher (The Conflict of Ages), but the Christian Church generally has thus far failed to give its assent to it. In the domain of philosophy, direct intellectual interest in this doctrine has nearly ceased in modern times; yet the dream—for, whether true or false, it is and can be nothing but a dream in our present state, and with our present capacities of knowledge—has again and again haunted individual thinkers. Wordsworth has given poetical expression to it in his famous "Initiations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood":

"Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting,
The soul that rises with us—our life's star, Hath had elsewhere its setting, And cometh from afar. Not in entire forgetfulness, And not in entire shallowing Of bint trailing clouds of glory do we come From God, who is our home."

The latest philosophy of Germany—that of Hegel and of the younger Fichte (Psychologie [1804]—has moderately revived the doctrine; and, with the alliance of such theologians as Müller, may crowd it into prominent consideration upon the Church. It remains for us to say here that the name Predestination was given to the advocates of this belief to distinguish them from the Creationists, those who hold to the immediate creation of the human soul at the moment of the production of the body; and to distinguish them from the Traduciansists, who held that children received soul as well as body from their parents. Prefaces (Immolation; the Gallican Controversies; the priest's witness to the veneration of the people; the Monarchic and Gallican State or Talde). It is certain and well-known that pre-existence is generally received by the Catholic Church, and that on certain occasions, particularly Christmas-day, the priest, having said "It is very meet, right, and our bounden duty that we should at all times, and in all places, give thanks unto thee, O Lord [Holy Father] Almighty, everlasting God," adds the proper preface which assigns the reason for peculiar thanksgivings on that particular day, viz.: Because thou didst give Jesus Christ, thine only Son, to be born as at this time for us; who, by the operation of the Holy Ghost, was made very man, of the Virgin Mary his mother, and that without spot or blemish, so that we, made clean from all sin; therefore, with angels, we worship thee. The antiquity of such prefaces may be estimated from the fact that they are mentioned and enjoined by the l30d canon of the African code, which code was formed of the decisions of many councils prior to the time of the Council of Constantinople, held in the year of 381. Pre-existence is not a peculiarly and primitive use of daily and weekly communications, and the people in the later ages did not receive but at the greater festivals; upon which custom there were added to the general preface mentioned before some special prefaces relating to the great mercy of that feast on which they did communicate, the Church thinking that, since every festival was instituted to remember some great mercy, therefore they who received on such a day, besides the general prayers offered for all God's mercies, should at the Lord's table make a special memorial of the mercy proper to that festival; and this seemed so rational to our reformers that they have retained those proper prefaces which relate to Christmas, Easter, Ascension-day, Whit-Sunday, and Trinity-Sunday; so as to praise God for the mercies of Christ's birth, resurrection, and ascension, and of the Holy Ghost, and for the true faith of the holy Trinity. On the greater festivals there are proper prefaces appointed, which are also to be repeated, in case there be a communion, for seven days after the festivals themselves (excepting that for Whit-Sunday, which is to be repeated only 6 days), because Trinity-Sunday, as the seventh, hath a preface peculiar to itself); to the end that the mercies may be the better remembered by often repetition, and also that all the people (who in most places cannot communicate all in one day) may have other opportunities, with those eight days, to join in praising God for such great blessings.

"The reason," says bishop Sparrow, of the Church's lengthening out these high feasts for several days is plain; the subject-matter of them is of so high a nature, and so nearly concerns our salvation, that one day would be too little to meditate upon them, and praise God for them as we ought. A bodily deliverance may justly require one day of thanksgiving and joy; but the deliverance of the soul by the blessings commemorated on those times deserves a much longer time of praise and acknowledgement. Since, therefore, it would be injurious to Christians to have their joy and thankfulness for such mercies confined to one day, the Church, upon the times when these unspeechable blessings were wrought for us, invites us, by her most reasonable commands and persuasions, to meditate on them, and so be thankful and happy. But those who would not meditate on the mercy, let them overleap eight days together.

"The reason of their being fixed to eight days," says Wheatley (Book of Common Prayer), is taken from the practice of the Jews, who by God's appointment observed their greater festivals, some of them for seven, and one—namely, the Feast of Tabernacles—for eight days. And therefore the primitive Church, thinking that the observance of Christian festivals (of which the Jews' were only types and shadows) ought not to come short of them, lengthened out their higher fasts to eight days."

These prefaces are very ancient, though there were some of them as they stood in the Latin service of later date. For as there are ten in that service, whereof the last, concerning the Virgin Mary, was added by pope Urban (1095), so it follows that the rest must be of a more remote antiquity. The Church of Rome holds that they were composed by Gelasius in memory of Christ's singing a hymn with his disciples after the Last Supper, the Jews at their Paschal supper singing seven Psalms (Ps. cxiii–cxiv). Pope Sixtus added to them the Ter Sanctus. Pope Victor calls them caputula. From the 6th to the 11th century the Western Church had prefaces for every festival, but after that date they were reduced to nine, and are enumerated by pope Pelagius and Alexander as Easter, the Ascension, Pentecost, Christmas, the Apparition of Christ (Epiphany), the Apostles, Holy Trinity, Cross, and Quadragesima. The eucharist of Paul (1 Cor. xiv, 16) and St. Justin is probably the germ of the Western preface and the long thanksgiving over the consecrated gifts. It was due to the Greek Church. The Greeks, by the way, use only one preface. The Church of England has retained five, and those upon the principal festivals of the year, which relate only to the Persons of the Trinity, and not to any saint. "In this preface a distinction is made between ceremonies which were introduced with a good design, and in process of time abused, and those which had a corrupt origin, and were at the beginning vain and insignificant. The last kind the Reformers entirely rejected, but the first were still used for devotion and edification. Some well-disposed Christians were so attached to ancient forms that they would, on no account, suffer the least deviation from them; others were fond of innovation in everything. Between these extremes a middle way had been carefully observed by the Reformers. Many ceremonies had been so grossly abused by superstition and avarice that it was necessary to remove them altogether; but since it was fit to use some ceremonies for the sake of decency and order, it seemed better to retain those which were old than to invent new. Still, the eucharist was remembered that those which were kept rested not on the same foundation as the law of God, and might be altered for reasonable causes; and the English Reformers, in keeping them, neither condemned those nations which thought them inexpedient, nor promised them to any other nation than their own" (Carwithen, Hist. of the Church of England). Preissler, Johann Martin, an engraver, brother of the preceding, was born at Nuremberg March 14, 1715. After learning, under the direction of his father and his brothers, the arts of drawing and engraving, he went to Paris in 1738, where he made several engravers and models for the vast building the Temple de Vincennes. He was also as professor of the art of engraving to Copenhagen, was subsequently honored with the title of engraver to the court, and received other honorable distinctions. Among his numerous and much esteemed engravings we mention, of sacred subjects and ecclesiastical history, interest, the Cardinal of Bouillon; J. Andrewe Crasmer; Bald, Muster; Struensee; M. Luther; Gellert; Jul's Kloostack; Raffaello's Madonna of the Chair, a work in which we find in the highest degree all the excellent qualities of Preissler; Paul Veronese's Carrying of the Cross; Rosa's Jonah preaching to the Ninivites; Guido's Ninus and Semiramis; Rubens's Mary, Mother of Grace, and St. Cecilia; the Adoration of the Shepherds, after Vanlo; the Judgment of Solomon and the Happy Meeting, after his own sketches; the Inoculation of the Country of Bernardo; Moses, after Michael Angelo. Preissler made several engravings for the Museum of Florence and for the antique marts of Dresden. He died at Copenhagen Nov. 17, 1794. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v. Preiswerk, Samuel Dr., a Swiss theologian, was born Sept. 19, 1759, at Rümlingen, Switzerland. After having completed his theological studies at Basle, he was appointed in 1824 a minister at the Orphan-house, and in 1826 he succeeded R. Stier (q. v.) as professor at the Mission-house. He had hardly entered upon a new field of ministerial labors in 1830 at Muttenz, when the revolution broke out, which compelled him to leave the place, and two years afterwards he was appointed professor of Old-Testament exegesis and Oriental languages at the École de Théologie of the Evangelical Society at Geneva. In 1867 he returned to Basle, was appointed deacon in 1840, and in 1845 pastor of St. Leonhard, occupying at the same time the chair for Old-Testament exegesis at the university. From 1859 he occupied the position as antisite, or superintendent, of the Church at Basle, till he was called to his rest in 1879. Preiswerk was an excellent preacher and poet, and his fine missionary hymn, "Die ist der Gemeinde Stärke," has been translated into English by Mrs. Winkworth (Lyra Germ. ii, 88 — "Hark! the Church proclaims her honor"). He also published, Das elige und neu erfinden für Preisscher Schrifft (Basle, 1834–40): —Die Nötérerster oder die 10 Stämme Israel (ibid. 1843): this is a translation of The Nortowirs, or the Lost Tribes, by A. Prejudice (prejüd', to judge before inquiry) is a prejudice, that is, forming or adopting an opinion concerning anything before the grounds of it have been fairly or fully considered. The opinion may be true or false; but in so far as the grounds of it have not been examined, it is erroneous and without proper evidence. In most cases prejudice is the last to be known; in some cases, account, men are pleased with, independently of any conviction of their truth; and which, therefore, they are afraid to examine, lest they should find them to be false. Prejudices, then, are unreasonable judgments, formed or held under the influence of some other motive than the love of truth. They may therefore be classed according to the nature of the motives from which they result. These motives are either, 1, pleasurable, innocent, and social; or, 2, they are malignant" (Taylor, Elements of Thought). Dr. Beil (Intel. Fovera, essay vi, ch. iii) has treated of prejudices, or the causes of error, according to the classification given of them by lord Bacon, under the name of idola. Locke (Essay on the Human Understanding, bk. iv, ch. xx) has treated of the causes of error. Some excellent observations on the prejudices peculiar to men of study may be seen in Malebranche (Search after Truth). See Christian Examiner and Gen. Rev. iv (1830), 280.

Prelacy. The organization of the Christian Church was in the beginning eminently simple, free, and popular. The government of the Church was at first purely democratic. All its controversies were settled by a voluntary and uncontrolled freedom of voluntary religious association. Prelacy takes its name and character from the assumed prerogatives of the bishop as a distinct order or rank—prae- lath, preferred, promoted over others. It began in the 2nd century with the distinction between presbyter and bishop, which were originally identical, merely different names for the same office. In the New Test. the appellations as titles of bishops and presbyters are the same. They are required to possess the same qualifications and to perform the same official duties. Neither was there in the apostolic churches any order or permanent class of officers superior to the presbyters.

I. In the Early Church.—Various circumstances conspired to give certain of the clergy influence and distinction over others. The pastors of churches founded by the apostles were, in the first instance, the elders of certain congregations of Christians and, when the number of converts increased, the more prominent of these elder leaders were constituted bishops. This was the beginning of the episcopacy, or the prelacy of a single individual, who was the spiritual head of the church under his care. The more advanced churches, such as those of Jerusalem, Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth, etc., became central points of influence which gave importance to their incumbents. They were the principal agents in appointing new stations for the extension of the Christian Church and in the organization of new churches dependent on the parent institution. With the increase of these churches a parochial system of churches arose, more or less relying on the central Church for support and spiritual instructors—all of which gave to the prelate of the metropolitan importance and pre-eminence over his subordinate presbyters.

In their persecutions the feeble churches relied for relief and protection on the parent Church. In their ecclesiastical assemblies the bishop of the metropolitan Church was of course the leader in all the deliberations of the assembly, giving direction to their deliberations and the results of the council. He was still only primus inter parres, foremost among his equals in rank in the ministry. Prelacy had not yet taken form and caratter by the exercise of the rights and prerogatives of the bishop, but the spiritual domination of the Church was increased in time to be claimed as an official right. Baptism was one of the rights of the bishop in the 2nd century (“Dandi baptismum quidem habet summus sacerdos qui est episcopus,” Tertullian, De Corp., § 7). The imposition of hands by the bishop in baptism and ordination soon followed as a prescriptive right of the bishop. This right was soon accorded to the presbyters and deacons by the authority of the bishop—non tamen sine episcopi auscultatione. In the unity of the Church and its officers Cyprian sought safety and defence both from the schismatic efforts of Pelagius and Novatian and the persecution of Decius, A.D. 251. "No safety but in the Church"—extra ecclesiam nulla situs. As is the branch to the tree, the stream to the fountain, and the members to the body; so is the constituency to the Church. Moreover, the bishop is the embodiment of the Church, and there can be no Church without a bishop (Cyprian, De Unit. Eccles. op. 4, 5). The bishop is appointed of God and invested with inviolable authority to rule over the Church. Such are the divine rights which were assumed to invest the prelate of the Church, invested with divine authority and power over the Church of Christ. The bishop now claimed affinity with the Jewish priesthood, a daysman of the laity, the medium of grace from God to man, and the recipient of illumination and divine guidance. The symmetrical order of the Council of Carthage contains similar pretensions to the spirit of the ancient law ("Plautus praeceptor, ut episcopus preceptorum," "Spiritus Domini praecepta, ut spiritus sacerdotalis et dominus no verba praecepta attinet""). A sacerdotal caste was formed by Cyprian about A.D. 250, who claimed the prerogative of a distinct order of the priesthood, separate from and superior to the presbyters. Prelates, bishops, diocesan bishops were the titles designating the assumed prerogatives.

Provincial synods began now to be held, in which the presbyters were for a time admitted, but the predominant influence of the bishops directed the deliberations and enacted the laws of the synod. Thus they became the heads of all the churches by the constitution of their prelatical authority under the guidance of the Divine Spirit—Spiritus Divino sacerdote. Gradually they constituted themselves at once the enactors and the executors of the ordinances of the Church. The rule of the priesthood was made more stringent over private members of the Church. In their travels they were required to have letters of recommendation—letters formatae, clerica, canonicae—from the bishop of the diocese. A long course of catechetical instruction and prayer were prescribed for admission to holy orders. Rigorous and relentless was the discipline of offending constituents. Subordinate orders of the clergy were created—subdeacons, acolytes, readers, exorcists, doorkeepers, etc.—all having the effect to exalt the rank of the prelate as prominent above all. But the prelatical position was sustained by the continuing influence which the laity still retained over the elections of the Church. This was gradually restricted by a crafty policy of having the candidates nominated by the subordinate clergy and their election confirmed by the bishop.

But a master stroke of policy was requisite to obtain control of the revenues of the Church. It was accomplished by successive expedients through a period of considerable time. The apostolic injunction was carefully urged on the Church to lay aside for charitable purposes "on the first day of the week or of the month a store as God had prospered them" (1 Cor. xvi, 2). At their love-feasts and sacramental seasons contributions were required as voluntary offerings—indeed, as late as Tertullian ("Nam nemo compellatur, sed sponte confert," Apol, § 89). This practice was not only urged upon the members of the Church as early as the 3rd century, but to the honor of the Church the offerings and contributions continued to be voluntary on the part of its members. Whatever taxes were imposed in later times for the maintenance of public worship and of the clergy were effected by those who were granted the title of ruler under the Christian emperors. On the rules of the Church requiring the gratuitous performance of religious offices the following references may be consulted: Concil. Hibier. c. 48; Gelasian, Epist. 1, al. 9, c. 6; Gregorius Naz. Orat. 81; Gel. Hist. Eccl. i. 20, q. i. c. 8; Concil. Trullan. ii. c. 23; Jerome, Quad. Hibr. in Gen. 23.

The Council of Blaga, in Portugal, A.D. 563, ordered a tripartite division of the property of the Church—one for the bishop, one for the other clergy, and the third for the lighting and repairs of the church. According to another authority four divisions were made, of which one portion was for the poor.

II. Under the Emperors.—When Christianity was the religion of the State, various other revenues accrued to the Church and the bishop. Upon the abolition of the heathen rites, under Theodosius the Great and his sons, the property of the heathen temples and priests which fell to the State was delivered over to the Christian clergy, or at least was appropriated to ecclesiastical uses (Cod. Theodos. lib. 19, c. 21; temp. Sutum. Hist. Eccl. lib. v, c. 7, 16). On the same principle the ecclesiastical property of heretics was confiscated and made over to the Catholic Church, as, for instance, in the case of the Novatians (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi, tit. 5, leg. 52; Socrat. Hist. Eccl. lib. vii, c. 7).

It was also enacted that the property of such of the clergy as died without heirs, and of those who had relinquished their duties without sufficient cause, should lapse to the Church (Cod. 5, leg. 50; Cod. Justin. lib. x, tit. 5, leg. 20, 53; Cod. Nov. 5, c. 4; 123, c. 42). The Church was also made the heir of all martyrs and confessors who died without leaving any near relatives (Euseb. Vict. Const. lib. ii, c. 50).

The clergy enjoyed many privileges by which on the one hand they were in a measure shielded from the operations of the law, and on the other were intrusted with civil and judicial authority over the laity. Three particulars are stated by Planck: 1. In certain civil cases they exercised a direct jurisdiction over the laity. 2. The State submitted entirely to them the adjudication of all offences of the laity of a religious nature. 3. Certain other cases, styled ecclesiastical, causa ecclesiastica, were tried before them exclusively. The practical influence of these arrangements and their effects upon the clergy and the laity are detailed by the same author, to whom we must refer the reader (Gesell.-Verfass. i, 308 sq.). The laity were ultimately separated from the control of the revenues which they contributed for the maintenance of the government of the Church and for the distribution of the religious charity; instead of originating with the people, as in all popular governments, began and ended with the priesthood (Conc. Gang. Can. 7, 8; Hraccar. xi, c. 7; the canons alleged to clearly indicate the unjust and oppressive operations of this system). The wealth of the laity was now made to flow in streams into the Church. New expedients were devised to draw money from them. (It was a law of the Church in the 4th century that the laity should every Sabbath partake of the sacrament, the effect of which law was to augment the revenues of the Church above all others, being reserved to bring his offering to the altar. Afterwards, when this custom was discontinued, the offering was still claimed (Cong. Apoll. A.D. 585, c. 4).)

Constantine himself contributed large sums to enrich the coffers of the Church, which he also authorized, A.D. 321, to inherit property by will (Cod. Theod. 4, 16, tit. 2, leg. 4; Euseb. lib. x, c. 6; Sozomen. lib. i, c. 8; lib. v, c. 5). This permission opened new sources of wealth to the bishops, while it presented equal incentives to their cupidity. With what address they employed their newly acquired rights is a subject by itself, which was formerly treated "in the space of ten years every man at his decease left a legacy to the Church, and within fifty years the clergy in the several provinces, under the color of the Church, held in their possessions one-tenth part of the entire property of the province. By the end of the 4th century the emperors themselves were obliged to interpose to check the accumulation of these immense revenues—a measure which Jerome said "he could not regret, but he could only regret that his brethren had made it necessary" (Planck, Gesell.-Verfass. i, 281; comp. Pertch. Kirchengesch. c. 8, 111).}

Prelacy also gained great power from the Church by controlling the elections of the clergy. The sovereign rights of the people in their free elective franchise began at an early period to be invaded. The final result of these changes was a total disfranchisement of the laity and the substitution of an ecclesiastical despotism in the place of the elective government of the primitive Church. Of these changes one of the most effective was the attempt, by means of correspondence and ecclesiastical synods, to consolidate the churches into one Church by an usurpation of the Roman code of laws, and establish an ecclesiastical police administered by the clergy. The idea of a holy catholic Church and of an ecclesiastical hierarchy tor the government of the same was wholly a conception of the priesthood. What they may have been in the motive with which this doctrine of the unity of the Church was first promulgated, it prepared the way for the overthrow of the popular government of the Church.

Above all, the doctrine of the divine right of the priesthood aimed a fatal blow at the liberties of the people. The clergy were no longer the servants of the people, chosen by the people, but they were to be the masters of the people, an independent and privileged order, like the Levitical priesthood, and, like them, by divine right invested with peculiar prerogatives. This independence they began by degrees to assert and to exercise. The bishop began in the 3d century to appoint at pleasure his own deacons and other inferior orders of the clergy, but other appointments, also, he endeavored to disturb the freedom of the elections and to direct them agreeably to his own will (Pertsch, Kirchengesch. der ardt. Jahrhundr. p. 499-454; Planck, Gesell.-Verfass. i, 183). Against these encroachments of ecclesiastical ambition and power the people continued to oppose a firm but ineffectual resistance. They asserted, and in a measure maintained, their primitive right of choosing their own spiritual teachers (Gieseler, i, 272; for a more full and detailed account of these changes of ecclesiastical policy and of the means by which they were introduced, the reader is referred to the volume of J. G. Planck, Gesch. der christl.-Kirchl. Gesellschaftsverfassung, i, 149-212, 433 sq.). There are on record instances in the 4th, and probably more frequent in the 5th, century, where the appointment of a bishop was effected by the emperor ordering the people to ratify the nomination of the candidate to a vacant see (Gregorius Naz. Orat. 10; comp. Ort. 19, p. 808; 21, p. 877; Bingham, bk. iv, ch. 5, § 3; Planck, i, 440, n. 10). The rule had been established by decree of councils, and often repeated, requiring the presence and unanimous concurrence of all the provincial bishops in the election and ordination of one to the office of bishop. This afforded them a convenient means of defeating any popular election by an affected disagreement among their number, which was now the case. The ecclesiastical authority had made the concurrence of the metropolitan necessary to the validity of any appointment. His veto was accordingly another efficient expedient by which to baffle the suffrages of the people and to constrain them into a reluctant acquiescence in the will of the clergy (Cong. Nic. c. 4; Conc. Antioch. c. 16; Curt. A.D. 390, c. 12; Planck, i, 483-452).

Elections to ecclesiastical offices were also disturbed by the interference of secular influence from without, in consequence of that disastrous union of Church and State which the schism between the West and the East caused. During this century (1) the emperors converted and presided in general councils; (2) confirmed their decrees; (3) enacted laws relative to ecclesiastical matters by their own authority; (4) pronounced decisions concerning heresies and controversies; (5) appointed bishops; (6) inflicted punishment on ecclesiastical persons. Agitated and harassed by the conflict of these discordant elements, the popular assemblies for the election of men to fill the highest offices of the holy ministry became scenes of tumult and disorder that would disgrace a modern political careers.

To correct these disorders various but ineffectual expedients were adopted at different times and places. The Council of Laodicea (A.D. 361, c. 13) denied to the multitude—raic blyay; the rubble—all vote in the choice of persons for the sacred office. Justinian in the 6th century sought, with no better success, to remove the evils in question by limiting the elective franchise to a mixed aristocracy composed of the clergy and the chief men of the city. These were jointly to nominate three candidates, declaring under oath that in making the selection they were not influenced by the personal merit of the persons. From these three the ordaining person was to ordain the one whom he judged best qualified (Justin. Novell. 123, c. 1; 137, c. 2; Cod. lib. 1, tit. 3; De Episcop. leg. 42). The Council of Arles (A.D. 452, c. 54) in like manner ordered the bishops to nominate three candidates, from whom the clergy and the people should make the election; and that of Barcelona (A.D. 599, c. 3) ordered the clergy and people to make the nomination, and the metropolitan and bishops were to determine the election. But these ineffectual efforts to restore measurably the right of the people to show to what extent it was already lost.

The doctrine that to the clergy was promised a divine guidance from the Spirit of God had its influence also in completing the subjugation of the people. Resistance to the authority under the influence of God's Spirit was rebellion against High Heaven, which the laity had not the impurity to maintain. The government and discipline of the Church by the priesthood was but the natural result of their control of the elective franchise. It established and organized the independence, the supremacy of prelacy. The bishops, no longer the ministers and representatives of the Church, are the priests of God to dictate the laws and administer the discipline of the Church (Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. sec. i, § 20). By the middle of the 4th century prelacy, by various expedients, acquired the control of the whole penal jurisdiction of the laity, opening and closing at pleasure the doors of the Church, inflicting sentence of excommunication, prescribing penances, absolving penitents, and restoring them to the Church by arbitrary clemency (Planck, Glossar, ii, 500).

III. Under the Popes. — Such are the various causes — influential in different degrees, perhaps, in the several organizations — in supplanting the popular government of the primitive Church and substituting in its place prelacy, which, under different forms and neutralizations, finally culminated in the pope of Rome. This culmination, and the craft by which it was accomplished, require a fuller detail than our limits will allow. We can only affirm that this important period in history, when the foundation was laid for rendering the hierarchy independent both of clerical and secular power, has not been noticed by historians so particularly as its importance requires. They seem not to have noted the fact that Hildebrand, who A.D. 1073 became Gregory VII, concerted measures for the independence of the Church.

"It was the deep design of Hildebrand, which he for a long time prosecuted with unwearied zeal, to bring the pope wholly within the pale of the Church, and to prevent the interference in his election of all secular influence and arbitrary power. And that measure of the council which wrested from the emperor a right of long usage, and which has never been called in question, may deservedly be regarded as the masterpiece of popish intrigue, or rather of Hildebrand's cunning. The concession which disguised this crafty design of his was expressed as follows: That the emperor should crown him as he ever had held, this instead of confirming the election of the pope derived from him. The covert design of this clause was not perceived, but it expressed nothing less than that the emperor should ever receive and hold from the pope himself the right of the appointment of the pope" (Voigt, Hildebrand [Weim. 1818, 8vo], p. 54, cited by Augusti, i, 269).

As might have been expected, the lofty claim of the pope was resisted; but he had the address to defend his usurped authority against all opposition, and proudly proclaimed himself "the successor of St. Peter, set up by God to govern, not only the Church, but the whole world." The gradations of ecclesiastical organization through which prelacy has passed are from congregational to parochial, parochial to dioecesan, dioecesan to metropolitan, metropolitan to patriarchal, patriarchal to papal — from the humble pastor of a little flock to the pope of Rome, the supreme and universal prelate of the Church of Christ on earth. See Coleman, Prelacy and Ritualism; National Repository, Feb. 1878 (Ex Cathedra). (L. C.)

Prelate (Lat., prælatu, i. e. promoted) is an ecclesiastic who has direct authority over other ecclesiastics. The term is a general one, and includes not merely bishops of various degrees, but also in Roman Catholic countries the heads of religious houses or orders and other similar ecclesiastical dignitaries. These, for the most part, are privileged to wear the insignia of the episcopal or subepiscopal rank. But these inchoate offices, although not possessing episcopal or quasi-episcopal jurisdiction, have the insignia and the title of prelate. They are of two classes — the higher, called del mandaletto ("of the little mantle"), and the secondary, called del mantellato ("of the great mantle"), from the robe which they respectively bear. The same root underlies other ecclesiastical terms in which all the clergy are on an equality, and are governed by a representative body or by the local church; prelati and prelati- cal, i. e. pertaining to a prelacy or a prelate, as pre- latical authorities are confined to those churches which recognize in the bishop (q. v.) a distinct and superior order of clergy. See Prelacy.

Prémare, Joseph-Henri, a French Jesuit, was born about 1670 in Normandy. March 7, 1698, he embarked with several other Jesuits at La Rochelle to preach the Gospel in China. He arrived Oct. 6 at Suneian, and addressed Feb. 17, 1699, a relation of his journey to pope La Chaise, with a descriptive notice of the countries he had visited. As soon as he had mastered the Chinese language he made a careful study of the antiquities and literature of the country. Though he expressed some strange ideas, it cannot be denied that his enterprise was considerable, as few Europeans thoroughly knew the philosophical works of the Chinese. He died at Peking about 1735. He left, Recherches sur les Tempa antérieures à ceux dont parle le Chou-King et sur la Mythologie Chinoise, published by Deguignes in the translation of the Chou-King, by pope Gauthier, in the form of a preliminary discourse (Paris, 1770, 4to) — a number of other works, three of them in Chinese: — The Life of St. Joseph, the Lou-chou-chi, or true sense of the six classes of characters, and a small treatise on the attributes of God, inserted in the Notices des sarees, which is the best of all those composed hitherto by Europeans on this subject: — several other treatises in Latin and in French, preserved among the manuscripts of the National Library of Paris, where we find also the originals of several letters of pope Pre- mare. Three letters of his mission are published in the Lettres édifiantes, and a fourth in the Annales encyclopédiques of Klaproth. He translated also a drama, Tchao chi Kou-cui (the Orphan of the House of Chao), which furnished to Voltaire some ideas for his Orphelin de la Chine. Prelate (primi or prima massio) is the first mass celebrated by the newly ordained priest (suo- myto), with the help of an assistant. The solemnity begins thus: the new priest sings on the steps of the altar "Veni Sancte Spiritus." performs the corresponding ovation, and then distributes the holy water, if this is prescribed by the rubrics of the day. It is an open question among the rubricists if at a preface the mass of the day or a votive mass is to be read. The probable solution of the difficulty is that, on simple Sundays and ordinary "festa duplicitas," a votive mass may be said, such a mass being permitted on such days pro gratia et publica, to which a preface solemnity may be said to belong; but the mass of the day must be preserved on high feasts, and on such Sundays on which votive masses are never admissible. The solemnity ends with the sacred benediction given by the new priest to the people by the imposition of hands (Lohner, Instructio practica de SS. Missae sacrificio, pt. iv., tit. v.; and Volti, Instructio practica de Missarvotiosa, p. 157 sq.). The festivities connected with a preface, and not belonging to the ecclesiastical order, vary with the customs of countries and places, and are not seldom regulated by special prescriptions of the ecclesiastical authorities.
PREMICE SERMONS

PREMICE SERMONS are discourses preached on the occasion of the first mass of an incurring priest. Their aim is to call the attention of both ecclesiastics and laymen to the dignity and importance of the sacerdotal state, and the duties which it imposes on both classes. Therefore the object of the sermon can only be some truth which relates to the clerical state: e.g., the dignity, the importance, of the priestly career; the priesthood of the Romish Church, its destination, or the duties arising from it, etc. According to the theme chosen, the sermon enlarges upon the object of the priestly functions, or the qualities, conditions, mode of action of the priesthood, or its duties and beneficial influences, etc. At the end of the sermon there may be a prayer, or an exhortation to prayer.

PREMONSTRATENSIANS or PREMONSTRANTS is the name of a monastic order which was founded at Premontre (Lat. Prémontré), in the diocese of Laon, France, about 1120, by St. Norbert of Cleves, afterwards archbishop of Magdeburg, with a view to restore the discipline of the regular canons, which had greatly deteriorated. The order followed the rule of St. Augustine, and was confirmed by popes Honorius II and Innocent III. The ground on which the order was established was given to St. Norbert by the bishop of Laon, with the approbation of Louis the Gross, king of France, who gave the Premonstratensians a charter of privileges. The place was called Prémontré, because it was pretended that the Blessed Virgin herself pointed out (prémonstratus) beforehand the site for the principal house of the order. According to these legendary authorities, the members of the order were at the same time commanded to wear a white habit, and consequently the White Canons wore a white cassock and rochet and a long white cloak. The abbots never wore pontificals, and any member promoted to the cardinalate or popedom retained his habit. At the time of the founding of the order St. Norbert had thirteen companions, but as the popes and kings of France granted it many privileges, and were very liberal to the Premonstratensians, they rapidly increased, and counted among their number many persons of distinguished birth, deep piety, and great scholarship. In the early history of the order there was such strict adherence to the rule of poverty that they had nothing they could call their own but one ass, which served them to carry wood, cut down by them every morning and sent to Laon, where it was sold to purchase bread; but in a short time they received so many donations, and built so many monasteries, that thirty years after the foundation of this order they had above a hundred abbey in France and Germany. The order has likewise given the Church a great number of archbishops and bishops. It once had 1000 abbeys and 500 nunneries (until 1273 their monasteries were double, a house of women always adjoinig the community), but it is now the mere skeleton of what it was. Of the sixty-five abbeys which they had in Italy not one now remains. These monks, vulgarly called White Canons, went first to England in the year 1146, where the first monastery, called Newhouse, was built in Lincolnshire by Peter de Saulus, and dedicated to St. Martin. In the reign of Edward I, when that king granted his protection to the monasteries, the Premonstratensians had twenty-seven houses in different parts of the country. They were commonly called "White Friars." They had six monasteries in Scotland—four in Galloway, one at Dryburgh, and one at Ferno, in Ross-shire. They had also several possessions in Ireland. In England their churches and conventual buildings were at Easby, Leiston, Bayham, Wendling, and Eggleston. They were very irregular in plan, the greater portion of the minster being aisleless and the transept unused, as they eschewed the sites. There is a fine ruin at Ardaines, near Casen, which gives a vivid illustration of the farming arrangements of the order—holy men and retired lovers of the country, and enterprising farmers. The principal houses were Torre, East Dereham, and Bawdeswell. They owned the manor of Torre over the right arm; the Canons of St. Victor wore it like a tippet round the neck. See Fosbrooke, Anci. PÉROM. CHARLES-LEONARD, a French priest, was born at Honfleur July 30, 1760. He obtained in 1790 a canonry in the college of St. Honoré at Paris. Deprived of it soon afterwards, he returned to England, where he began by giving French lessons. Madame de Lévis-Mirepoix went with some French Benedictine nuns to establish herself at Cannington Court, and in trusted Pérom with the spiritual direction of the community. In 1816 he established himself at Paris, where cardinal Talleyrand-Perigord appointed him honorary canon of Notre Dame and chaplain of Charles X (1825). Pérom was also appointed vicar-general of Strasburg and of Quimper. After the Revolution of July he returned to England and rejoined his Benedictine community which he had so long directed. He left an English edition of Rules of a Christian Life, and a publication of the (Evêques choisis de M. Aeslin, critique de Roullongue (Paris, 1823, 6 vols. 12mo), accompanied with an incomplete notice. He died Aug. 26, 1857, at Colwich, Staffordshire. See L'ami de la Religion, 1837.—Hoefer, Nouv. PREMONSTRATE ORDER. In a large class of English ecclesiastical structures reared anterior to the Norman invasion the style is so peculiar that it should be classified as distinctively Premonstrat. The walls are of rag or rubble, frequently of herring-bone work, and unbutteressed; the quoin present long and short work; strips of stone or pilasters bisect or relieve the towers; the imposts of the shafts are rude, massive, and ornamented either with classical mouldings or rude carvings; the arches are round or angled, and sometimes constructed of bricks; and baluster-like pillars are introduced into the windows, which are often deeply splashed within and without. Two pillars from Reculver Basilica are standing in the Green Court of Canterbury. The churches of Lyminge, Barnack, Bosham, Bradford (Wiltz), Brixworth (the oldest remaining church in England), and proceeding a basilican type by Lincoln, Lacy, Dover Castle, Bryford, Corhampton, Dunham Magna, Caversfield, and part of the crypt of York, those of Ripon and Hexham, the towers of Deerhurst, Barton, St. Benet's (Cambridge and Lincoln), Cholsey, St. Mary (York), Bolton, Brigstock, Earl's Barton, and the steeles of Bosham and Somerton, and portions of many other churches, exhibit some or other of these peculiar Prepont, an early Marcionite, was a native of Assyria, and flourished at the close of the 2d century. The Marcionites were then divided into several factions, some of which admitted two original principles, as Politus and Basilicas; others three (Rhodon, in Essebium, 7th, Eusebius, xvi, 13). To the latter belong the Prepont, who held that, besides what is good and evil, there is what constitutes a third principle, viz. what is just.

Preebresbyter (Gr. πρεεβρεσβύτερος) is the title of an office or dignity in the Jewish synagogue (721). It was introduced into the Christian Church, and designated an officer whose functions in the apostolic period are disputed by different ecclesiastical bodies. In the Roman Catholic and in the English hierarchy, the title has been the occasion of a protracted controversy as to the respective claims of the bishop (q. v.) and the presbyter. Those who maintain the presbyter as on equality with the episcopate are considered by the papal legate cardinal Gentili, of Hungary. Nine canons of discipline were published, of which the eighth forbids Christian women to marry infidels, heretics, or schismatics. See Labbé, Concil. ix, 2458.

Presbytery is the title of an office or dignity in the Jewish synagogue (721). inspired writers were not true, or that it was incumbent at all times, and upon all Christians, to disregard them. It has been strenuously contended that there were such bishops in the infancy of the Church, and that allusion is made to them in Scripture; but, without directly opposing the assertion, this must be said that the proof of it is less clear than that bishops and presbyters were represented as the same in rank and in authority. Indeed, there does not appear to have been any occasion for this higher order. To presbyters was actually committed the most important charge of feeding the Church of God, that is, of promoting the spiritual improvement of mankind; and it is remarkable that their privilege of separating from the people by ordination the ministers of religion is explicitly acknowledged in the case of Timothy, whom the apostle admonishes not to neglect the gift that was in him, and which had been given by prophecy, and by the laying-on of the hands of the presbytery; by which can be meant only the imposition of the hands of those who were denominated presbyters or bishops. But although all the parts of the ministerial duty had been intrusted to presbyters, it is still contended that the New Testament indicates the existence of bishops as a higher order. There has, however, been much diversity of opinion in relation to this point by those who contend for the divine institution of EPISCOPACY (q. v.). Some of them maintain that the apostolic word, while it is applicable to the Christian Church; but this, and upon irrefragable grounds, is denied by others. Some urge that Timothy and Titus were, in what they call the true sense of the term, bishops; but many deny this, founding their denial upon the fact that these evangelists did not reside within the bounds, and were not limited to the administration, of any one church, but were sent wherever it was resolved to bring men to the knowledge of divine truth. Many conceive that the question is settled by the epistles in which the apostle addressed letters to the elders of the church, to the angels of the respective churches named by the apostle. But it is far from being obvious what is implied under the appellation angel. There has been much dispute about this point, and it is certainly a deviation from all the usual rules by which we are guided in interpreting Scripture to bring an obscure and doubtful passage in illustration of one about the import of which, if we attend to the language used, there can be no doubt. It may, therefore, be safely affirmed that there is nothing clear and specific in the writings of the New Testament to give to bishops or presbyters the special character which under most particular and affecting circumstances, he had received from the Lord after the Resurrection, and which includes in it the perfection of everything requisite for the comfort and the edification of Christians; and be accordingly expresses this by the word ιερουργος, being bishops of it, not by constraint, but willingly (1 Pet. v. 1, 2). This passage is a very strong one. The apostle speaks of himself in his extraordinary capacity, a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and in his ordinary capacity as a teacher; showing, by the use of a very significant term, that as to it he was on a footing of equality with the other pastors or presbyters. He gives it in charge to the presbyters to feed the flock of which Christ is among you, taking the oversight of it, ιερουργος, being bishops of it, not by constraint, but willingly (1 Pet. v. 1, 2). See ELDER.

It seems, by the passages that have been quoted, to be placed beyond a doubt that, in what the apostles said respecting the ministers of Christ's religion, they taught that the ιερουργος and the πρεσβυτερος were the same class of instructors; and that there were, in fact, only two orders pointed out by them, bishops or presbyters, and deacons. This being the case, even although it should be said that the presbytery, which was composed at the 3d Council of Nicaea, and to a period still later, was unknown in the first two centuries. It may be shown that the admission of the distinction is not incompatible with the great ends for which a ministry was appointed, and even in particular cases may tend to promote them; but it is merely a matter of human regulation, not binding upon Christians, and not in any way connected with the vital influence of the Gospel dispensation. The whole of the writers of antiquity might be urged in support of this doctrine of the apostolic institution of bishops. For all, even if private Christian would be entitled to judge for himself, and to be directed by his own judgment, unless it be maintained that where Scripture has affirmed the existence of equality, this is to be counteracted and set at nought by the testimonies and assertions of a set of writers who, although honored with the name of fathers, are very far, indeed, from being infallible, and who have, in fact, often delivered sentiments which even they who, upon a particular emergency, cling to them must confess to be directly at variance with all that is assumed or received as the rule of faith and life in religion. It also follows, from the Scriptural identity of bishops and presbyters, that no Church in which this identity is preserved can on that account be considered as having departed from the apostolic model, or its ministers be viewed, at least with any good reason, as having less ground to hope for the blessing of God upon their spiritual labors; because if we admit the contrary, we must also admit that the inspired writers, instead of properly regulating the Church, betrayed it into error by omitting to make a distinction closely allied with the essence of religious truth; it is this but to say that it is safer to follow the erring direction of frail mortals than to follow the admonitions of those who, it is universally allowed, were inspired by the Holy Spirit, or commissioned by him to be the instructors of the world? It is clear that, being thus, that although bishops and presbyters were the same when the epistles of the New Testament were written, it would be going too far to contend that no departure from this should ever take place; because, to justify such a position, it would be requisite that a fund of injustice should have been given that equality must at all times be carefully preserved. There is, however, no such injustice. Unlike the Old Testament, which specified everything, even the most minute, in relation to the priesthood, the New only refers in general terms, and very seldom, to the ministry; and the reason probably is, that, being intended for all nations, it left Christians at liberty to make such modifications in the ecclesiastical constitution as in their peculiar situation appeared best adapted for religious edification. The simple test to be applied to the varying or varied forms of Church government is that indicated by our Lord himself: "By their fruits ye shall know them." Wherever the regulations respecting the ministry are such as to divert it from the purposes for which it was destined, to separate those who form it from the flock of Christ, to relax their diligent discharge of duty, and to destroy the connection between them and their people, so as to render their exertions of little or no use, there we find a Church not apostolical. But wherever the blessed fruits of Gospel teaching are in abundance produced, where the people and the ministers are cordially united, and where every regulation is calculated to give efficacy to the labors of those who have entered into the vineyard, we have an apostolical Church, or, to speak more properly, a Church of Christ built upon a rock, because devoted to the benefit of objects for which our Saviour came into the world.

Schauf, in his Hist. of the Christian Church (i, 418 sq.), adduces, in favor of the view which denies the apostolic origin of the episcopate as a separate officer or order, the following facts: 1. The undeniable identity of presbyters and bishops in the New Testament, asserted even by the best interpreters among the Church fathers, by Jerome, Chrysostom, and Theodore. 2. Later, in the 21st century, the two terms are still used in like manner for the same office. The Roman bishop Clement, in his first epistle to the Corinthians, says that the newly founded churches, appointed the first-fruits of the faith, i.e., the first converts, ἑκοῦσι ταῦτα τῆς καὶ ἄλλης ἑκοῦσι. He here omits the ἱεραρχεῖς, as Paul does in Phil. i, 1, for the simple reason that they are in his view identical with ἱεραρχεῖς; while, conversely, in ch. ix., he enlarges the family of presbyters or bishops, without mentioning bishops. He says that the episcopate is true, the deaconate, the presbyterate, and the episcopate; but he supposes only a twofold official character, that of presbyters and that of deacons—a view which found advocates so late as the Middle Ages, even in Pope Urban II., A.D. 1091. Lastly, Irénæus, towards the close of the 2d century, though himself a bishop, makes only a relative difference between episcopi and presbyteri; speaks of successions of the one in the same sense as of the other; terms the office of the latter episcopus; and calls the bishops of Rome ἱεραρχεῖς. Sometimes, it is true, he speaks of the priest in a more general sense, for the old men, the fathers. But, in any case, his language shows that the distinction between the two offices was at that time still relative and indefinite. 3. The express testimony of the learned Jerome is that the churches originally, before original errors arose through the instigation of Satan, were governed by the common council of the presbyters, and not till a later period was one of the presbyters placed at the head to watch over the Church and suppress schismus. He traces the division of the presbyters into three classes or in three ranks: the bishop, who rules in a more distinct from divine institution.

1. The custom of the Church of Alexandria was, from the evangelist Mark down to the middle of the 5th century, that the twelve presbyters elected one of their number president and called him bishop. This fact rests on the authority of Jerome, who, in his Episcop donating. The archontes of the Alexandrian patriarch Eutychius of the 10th century."

Kilien, in his Ancient Church, asserts: "Though the senior presbyter presided in the meetings of his brethren, and was soon known by the name of bishop, it does not appear that he originally possessed any superior authority. He held his place for life; but as he was sinking under the weight of years when he succeeded to it, he could not venture to anticipate an extended career of official distinction. In all matters relating either to discipline or the general interests of the brotherhood, he was expected to carry out the decisions of the eldership; so that, under his presidential rule, the Church was still substantially governed by 'the common council of the presbyters.' The allegation that presbyterial government in all its integrity towards the end of the 2d century does not rest on the foundation of obscure intimations or doubtful inferences. It can be established by direct and conclusive testimony. Evidence has already been adduced to show that the senior presbyter of Smyrna continued to preside until the year 165. The earliest episcopal see of which has been preserved, describes the manner in which the rulers of the Church dealt with the heretic Noster. The transaction probably occurred about A.D. 190. It shows that the presbyters then exercised episcopal functions, even to excommunication."

Says Dr. Blaikie (in The Presbyterian Churches throughout the World [Edinburgh, 1877, p. 1]): "It is admitted even by many Episcopalians that, so far as Scripture indicates, the primitive Church constituted under the apostles was governed by elders. The office of apostle was temporary, and some other temporary arrangements were reported to in the peculiar circumstances of the Church. But everywhere in settled churches there was a body of presbyters or elders; the terms presbyters and bishop were applied freely to the same individual; and when the presbyter became a bishop, the apostolical bishops of Ephesus were addressed at Mileth; there was no distinction of one of them having authority over the rest; they were called equally to feed and care for the Church.
over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers.

The offices of presbyter and bishop, according to the Roman Catholic Church, belong, in the first instance, to the divine institution of the episcopate:

"Besides the apostles, the Lord marked out of the troop of his followers seventy (according to the Vulg. seventy-two), whom he sent out before him, two by two, into the cities and towns he intended to visit, with the power of healing the sick and proclaiming the kingdom of God. These seventy men were, in consequence, the assistants of the apostles, but subordinated to them. Soon their number proved insufficient, and the apostles established in every city of some importance, at the foundation of the community, or when it had reached a certain degree of development, besides the bishop, whom they intended for their permanent representative and successor, a number of presbyters, who assisted the bishop in his functions."

The Roman Catholic Church, as she considers the bishops the successors of the apostles, would also have the presbyters to be the successors of the seventy assistants chosen by Christ himself. Inasmuch as they are entitled to perform the highest function of the priesthood, the administration of the Eucharist, they are called also sacerdos (apache): yet this denomination, if not specified, applies only to the bishop: therefore we find frequently the term sacerdos, or sacerdos prae ordinis, i.e., the bishop, thus distinguished from the simple priest, who is sacerdos secundum ordinis. The presbyters of an episcopal church had a share in the government, not individually, but as a college, presided over by the bishop; they had no jurisdiction of their own, and were merely assistants to the bishop. The presbyters took their advice on the admission of higher clerical functionaries, on the management of discipline, especially of penitence, etc. They were themselves amenable to the spiritual jurisdiction of the bishop, and depended on him in the discharge of their duties as teachers and as priests. According to Roman Catholics, the bishop alone possesses the priesthood in its fulness, while the presbyters possess it only in part. The functions, however, which belong to the bishop himself, as well as to the college, are exercised by the bishop and the presbyters. What those functions are will be detailed under the head Pius X (q. v.). It is, of course, an easy matter for the prelatical churchmen to prove that by the end of the 20th century the bishop was above the presbyters of the 2nd century, for the Church had departed from her early simplicity, and the episcopacy became the only prevalent government of the Church, although in some cases, as among the Copts or the Waldenses, government by presbyters continued to prevail during the Middle Ages. The Church of the 3rd and 4th centuries was the superior of the episcopate. Thus Clement of Rome points out clearly three different hierarchical degrees—bishops, priests, and deacons; and Ignatius of Antioch lays particular stress on the superior power of the bishop (Epist. ad Magnes. c. 6; Smyrn. c. 8, etc.). Affirmations of the same kind are given by Tertullian, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Cyprian, etc. "It is true," say the Romanists, "that the bishops, in the fathers as well as in Scripture, are sometimes called merely priests, but there is not one passage in which a bishop is explicitly called bishop." They adopt the authority of St. Jerome for the equality of the bishop and presbyter because he says (Comment. on the Epistle to Timotheus), "Nor priests, nor sacerdotiales sunt dispositione Dominica presbyteri esse majores, et titulus magis haberi, ut formant a half-circle (see the map), or, according to their words, "Reverend father, the holy Catholic"

Church requires that you consecrate the deacon here present for the burdensome office of priesthood. Whereupon the bishop asks the deacon if he knows that they are deserving of it? The archdeacon answers, "So far as human weakness allows me a knowledge of it, I know and declare that they are worthy to take upon them the burden of that office." The bishop says, "God be thanked!" and the ordinands are called to the choir, and the archdeacon says these words: "Beloved brethren! as the pilot of a ship and those who travel on it share together both security and danger, they must in matters concerning their common interest share the same convictions. Not without good reason, the fathers have directed that the people also should be admitted to the choice of those who are to be admitted to the service of the altar; for sometimes a few can give information about the way of life and habits of those who present themselves for consecration not known to the masses, etc. If, therefore, any one have objections of importance, let him step out before God, and for God's sake speak fearlessly; yet let him not forget that he is only a man (that he may err)."

After a short, expectant pause, the people asanting by their silence, the bishop turns to the candidates and addresses them thus: "Consecrando, fidelis dilectissimi, in presbyterio sanctificato, tuto et diligenter suppliantibus, sanctitate laus, sapiencia, et bonitatee, confirmare et regir: cum aliis in eis pontifices, ali minoris ordinis sacerdotis, diaconi et subdiaconi, diocesarum et aliorum ordinum viri consecratus, et ex multis et aliter dignitatis membris unum corpus efficitur. If no deacons or subdeacons have been consecrated, the Litany of All Saints is recited, while the ordinands are on their knees. Hereupon they step in, pairs, into the presence of the bishop, who, standing erect (with the infula), lays both his hands on the head of each of them, without speaking or singing. The same is done by all the priests present, dressed in the stola, and of whom there must be at least three. Then the priests and the bishop hold their right hands extended over the ordinands, and the bishop, standing with the infula, thus addresses the clergy: "Beloved brethren! let us implore God Almighty that he may pour over these, his servants, whom he has chosen for the office of priesthood, heavily gifts in abundance, so that, with his help, they may be able to perform the duties which they have been deemed worthy of assuming. Amen. The bishop lays down the sacred vessels and looks towards the altar, and says, "Omnis dominus." The ministers add, "Fleetamus tua." The response is "Levate!" Then he turns to the ordinands, saying, "Exaudi nos, quassumus, Domine Deus noster." After the conclusion—"in unitate ejusdem spiritali sancti Dei"—he extends his hands, saying, "Per omnia secula, etc." Now follow long prayers, after which the bishop sits down with the mitre, seizes that part of the stola which hangs backwards from the left shoulder of the ordinand, lays it over his right shoulder, and puts both parts crosswise over each other on this chest, saying, "Take the yoke of the Lord upon thee; for his yoke is easy and his burden is light." Hereupon the bishop dresses each of them in the missal garment, which hangs loose in front, but is rolled or pinned up behind, saying, "Take the priestly garment, which makes you holy; for God is mighty to increase love in thee and make thy work perfect." Response, "Thanks be to God." Now the bishop rises, lays down the infula, and prays, while all kneel, "Deus sanctificationem omnium sanctuarium," etc. After this the bishop kneels, facing the altar, and begins the hymn, "Venii Creator Spiritus". A solo voice is sung in the choir, and the first verse is sung the bishop rises, sits down on the chair, with the infula on his head, pulls off his gloves, puts on his ring, takes a white linen towel on his knees, and anoints the hands of each of the ordinands kneeling before him with the oil of the catechumens, passing with his thumb dipped into the holy oil crosswise from the thumb to the little finger on the other, with this prayer: "Consecrate and sanctify, O Lord, these hands by this anointment and our blessing." Then, with his right hand, he makes the sign of the cross over the hands of the candidate whom he consecrates, saying, "Omnis dominus," and the people with these words: "They may bless, may bless, and they may be consecrated and sanctified, in the name of Our Lord Jesus Christ." Each of the ordinands says "Amen." (From this anointment the thumb and forefinger of a priest are called the canonic fingers; and as this anointment is administered to the ordinands, it is said that the priests to whom the last sacraments are administered are anointed on the outside of the hand.) Then the bishop joins the hands of each of them, and one of the ministrants ties them together with a piece of linen. When all hands are anointed, the bishop wipes his thumb with crumbs of bread; then he presents to each of them a chalice with wine and water, with the paten placed over it, and containing a host. The ordinands touch the top of the chalice and the paten with the index and middle finger, and the bishop says to each in particular, "In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, receive the living water, and say mass for the living as well as for the dead, in the name of the Lord." Response: "Amen." Now the bishop washes his hands, returns to his chair, and reads the last verse of the Tractus, and then the Gospel, and proceeds to another consecration. After the ordinands steps in front of the altar with the book of the Gospels, prays the "Munda cor meum," and reads the Gospel, after receiving the benediction thereto. The newly consecrated priests wipe their hands with bread-crumbs, wash them, and dry them with the linen with which they were bound. The water used for washing is poured into the piscina. As all consecrated receive the Eucharist at the hands of the bishop, there must be as many hosts prepared as there are candidates for ordination. After the reading of the offeranture (short prayer preceding the sacriocede of the bread and wine), all those who have been consecrated—first the priests, then the deacons, then the others according to their rank—step in pairs into the presence of the bishop, who sits on his chair with the infula on his head, kneel down, kiss his hand, and present a burning taper as an offering. The bishop, after receiving the offerings, washes his hands, lays down the infula, rises, and, the chair being removed, continues the ceremony of the mass. The consecrated priests kneel down behind the bishop on the prie-dieu prepared for them, each his mass-book open before him. The bishop remains with the deacons, accompanying the offering of the bread and wine, and the whole mass. The bishop speaks slowly and somewhat loud, so that the consecrated priests can at the same time pronounce the same words, especially the words of consecration. The "secrets" (silent prayers) for the consecrated ones is pronounced with the secrets of the mass of the day under one formula of conclusion: "Per Dominum nostrum, etc. The secreta pro ordinandis is, "We ask thee, O Lord! let thy holy mysteries profit us in all things for our salvation. In the name of the Lord, amen. By the disposition, through our Lord Jesus Christ, thy Son," etc. After the paternoster the prayer "Domine Jesu Christe, qui," etc., which follows the "Agnus Dei," the bishop kisses the altar; and after the first of the newly consecrated has done the same, he kisses him at each step, with the words "May you be blessed with you," etc. The new priest, "And with your mind." Each of the consecrated ones gives the kiss of peace to the other person ordained to the same rank and standing next. After the communion of the bishop, the deacons and subdeacons proceed to the choir, etc. As soon as the intoned voice, the bishop, facing them, pronouncing the "Miserere veretii" and "Indulgentiam," if priests only have been ordained, they do not receive absolution, as they perform the sacrifice together with the bishop. fessed to act) as lords of the congregation. The signing of the covenant was followed by a proclamation from the queen regent forbidding any one to preach or administer the sacraments without the authority of the Presbytery or bishop. At length, however, the party of the Reformers triumphed, and in the year 1560 (Aug. 17-24) the Parliament abolished the Roman Catholic worship, adopted a confession of faith agreeing with the confessions of the Reformed churches on the Continent, appointing ministers of the Protestant religion in eight principal towns, and assigned the remaining portions of the country to five other ministers as superintendents, who were to take temporary charge of the interests of religion in their several districts.

In the first General Assembly of the Church of Scotland was constituted in Edinburgh, consisting of six ministers and thirty-four laymen. Up to this period, the Scottish Reformers had followed their rule of worship and doctrine, the Book of Common Order used by the English Church at Geneva. In April, 1560, however, the Privy Council appointed a committee of five persons, including Knox, "to commit to writing their judgments touching the reformation of religion." This First Book of Discipline, setting forth a polity adapted to the national condition of affairs, though adopted by the Church, was rejected by the assembly, and this—confirmed in 1562 by King James, above the sanction of the law of the land,—nothing but the undisputed perseverance of those two eminent men, John Knox and Andrew Melville, succeeded at last in procuring the complete recognition of the Calvinistic faith and the Presbyterian form of government established at the Reformation. The Church of Scotland, which was finally and formally effected by act of Parliament and with the consent of King James (I of England and VI of Scotland) in the year 1592.

The duplicity of the king, however, soon became apparent, for within a few years he intrigued to bring about the establishment of Episcopacy, and to assimilate the two national churches of Scotland and England. In this he was followed by his successors, Charles I, Charles II, and James II. The resistance of the people, the bloody persecutions that ensued, the civil turmoil, and the subsequent downfall of the Stuart dynasty, are matters of history. From 1660 to 1688, the Church was in the wilderness, scourged by such men as Claverhouse (q.v.) and Dalziel (q.v.), but leaving the record of many noble martyrs—as given in the stories of the Witnesses and the Book of Martyrs. See COVENANT AND SOLEMN LEAGUE. Under William and Mary, Presbyterianism again became ascendant. In 1690 an "Act of Settlement" was passed, prorcy was abolished, and the Westminster Confession recognised as the creed of the Church. But the settlement of the Church on this basis was objected to by a small body of earnest men, the "Reformed Presbyterians," who had already distinguished themselves in zeal for the "Covenant" as securities alike for the freedom of the Church and the Christianity of the State, and who now felt unable either to enter into the Church or to give their unqualified adherence to the constitution of the State. Many of the more earnest descendants of the Covenanters (q.v.) protested against the reception of such men into the Church, and, finding their protest in vain, withdrew, and organized the Reformed Presbyterian Church. (See below.) Though this secession took place in 1681, the churches were not finally organized into a presbytery till 1743. Upon the union of the two kingdoms in 1707, Presbyterianism obtained every guarantee that could be desired. Since that time it has continued to be the established religion of Scotland, as much as Episcopacy is that of England.

The only confession of faith legally established before the Revolution of 1688 was that which is published in the History of the Reformation in Scotland, attributed to John Knox. It consists of twenty-five articles and was the confession of the Episcopal as well as of the Presbyterians. During the Commonwealth, adopted the Westminster Confession. At the Revolution this confession was declared to be the standard of the national faith; and it was ordained by the same act of Parliament which settled Presbyterian church government in Scotland, "that no person be admitted or continued hereafter to be a minister or preacher within this Church unless he subscribe the [that is, this] confession of faith, declaring the same to be the confession of his faith." By the act of union in 1707 the same is required of all professors, principal officers, masters, and other officers of the Church.

The Westminster Confession of Faith, then, and what are called the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, contain the publicly recognized doctrines of this Church; and it is well known that these formularies are an embodiment of the Calvinistic faith. No liturgy or public form of prayer is used in the Church of Scotland, the minister's only guide being the Directory for the Public Worship of God. The administration of the Lord's Supper, as a general thing observed four times a year, is conducted with simple form, but is accompanied and followed by special religious services, consisting of prayers and exhortations. A metrical version of the Psalms on the basis of that of Rou (died 1665) is used, and supplementary hymns have recently been introduced.

The provision which has been made by the state authorities for the benefit of the Established Church consists of a stipend, a small glebe of land, and a manse (parsonage house) and office house. By an act of Parliament passed in 1810, £10,000 per annum were granted for augmenting the smaller parish stipends and for religious education. The stipend assigned to a minister of the establishment is £130 sterling, with a small sum, generally £8 6s. 8d., for communion elements. Patronage, in part abrogated at the Revolution, was restored in 1712 by act of Parliament.

Scottish independence rebelled at this, the people claiming the right to elect their own clergy, or at least to exercise a veto over the appointment of an unsatisfactory one; and the controversy which ensued led to secession, which was ushered in first by indifference, and was helped on by the renewal of the old interest. From that time a wide field was opened up for the men of talents, but lax in principle, obtained possession of influential positions; the leaven of modernism—ridiculed in Dr. Witherspoon's Characteristics—set extensively to work; and in the course of time Arminianism, Pelagianism, and liberal views of Church and State, with little attempt at concealment. The result was the secession of several important bodies from the Church. The first who formally withdrew were the Covenanters, or Cameronians, who objected to the interference of the state authorities in Church affairs, and to the Established principle in the existing establishment, as inconsistent with the covenant to which the Church had sworn. See CAMERONIANS. A few faithful men, led by Ebenezer Erskine, endeavoured to breach the tide; but, being deposed by the commission of the Assembly, they were Moderates, they seceded in 1738, and formed themselves into a distinct body, called the Associated Presbytery, more commonly known as Seceders. They became known as the Secession Church. This secession proved a severe blow, and shook the establishment to its foundations. The Church resisted it, grew in 1750, and from it was formed the Presbyterians of Relief, better known as "The Relief Synod." These bodies have since been united, and constitute the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland. Those who remained in the Established Church were divided in opinion on the subject of patronage. The Seceders, to whom it continued to grow because of the indifference of the clergy, for a while modernism held the upper hand, but its reign was dreary. Under the dominant influence tice of principal Robertson, whose studies were more devoted to elegant literature than to the Holy Scripture, the preaching of the Gospel was superseded by moral essays, and Dr. Blair's cold and polished sermons were regarded as models of the highest excellence. This state of things continued till near the close of the 16th century, when Christian Society began to show itself in the making of evangelical principles which then pervaded Great Britain. A positive reaction set in, and gradually new life began to animate the frozen limbs of the Established Church. The evangelical party took heart, and constantly increased in strength. Dr. Andrew Thomson, Dr. Chalmers, and others came upon the stage of action, and under their vigorous lead a new era was inaugurated. The Assembly entered with zeal into the subject of foreign missions, while it multiplied churches to supply the need at home. The burden of patronage was felt to be a great hindrance to the progress of vital piety and active effort, and the autonomy or independent jurisdiction of the Church became a topic of earnest debate.

In 1834 the General Assembly passed the celebrated "Veto Act," giving to the Church courts the power of rejecting nominees for bishops or teinds. This act was set aside by the civil court, and subsequently, on appeal, by the House of Lords, in the Auchterarder case, in 1839. The Assembly yielded so far as the temporalities were concerned, but at the same time unequivocally pronounced the principle of assenting to no patronage as one that could not be given up consistently with the doctrine of the headship and sovereignty of Christ. The Strathbogie case next occurred, bringing the civil and ecclesiastical courts into direct collision, which ended at last in the Dissolution of 1843, under the lead of Chalmers, Cunningham, Welsh, Candleby, and Dunlop; 470 members signed an "Act of Separation and Deed of Demission," and the Free Church of Scotland was organized. Soon after the separation of 1843 an act of Parliament was passed, called "Lord Aberdeen's Act," to define the rights of congregations and presbyteries in the calling and settlement of ministers. But in 1874 this was suspended by another act, whereby patronage was abolished, and the right of electing ministers was vested in the people. Government still reserves, however, the appointment of theological professors. The Free Church carried off about one half the communicants of the Established Church, and became a rival communion in most of the parishes of Scotland. The three denominations—the Established Presbyterian Church, the United Presbyterian Church, and the Free Church of Scotland—constitute the chief Presbyterian churches of Scotland at the present time. See Scotland; Presbyterian Churches of.

The government, discipline, and worship of the Established Church of Scotland are in all respects the same as those of other Presbyterian churches. According to the constitution of the Church, there is a Kirk session in every parish, consisting of the minister and a body of lay elders. All the ministers within a certain district, with each of the Kirk sessions of the Presbytery of that district. The next higher court is the Provincial Synod, which embraces several neighboring presbyteries. The highest court of all is the General Assembly. It is a representative court, consisting of 247 members and 178 elders, the greater part chosen by the presbyteries, but a considerable number of elders chosen by the town-councils and universities. It meets early in May, is presided over by its moderator, and has the presence of a Lord high commissioner, appointed by the crown, who, however, is not a member, and who holds fees up to £100. "Commission of Assembly" meets in August, November, and March, consisting of the members of Assembly, and a minister named by the moderator, to attend to matters remitted to it by the Assembly, or that may arise in the intervals. In consequence of the connection with the state, there are certain peculiarities connected with the support of the ministers which it may be proper to notice. Dr. Jamieson, in his interesting sketch of the "Church of Scotland," contributed to the Cyclopaedia of Religious Denominations, thus describes these peculiarities: "The provision made for parish ministers by the law of Scotland consists of a stipend arising from a tax on land. It is raised on the principle of compensating the "teinds" into a modified charge—the fifth of the land produce, according to a method introduced in the reign of Charles I., ratified by William III., and unalterably established by the treaty of Union. To make this intelligible, we may say that the teinds were appropriated by the crown, with the burden of providing for the minister. In after-times they were often bestowed as gifts on private individuals totally unconnected with the parish, and who thus came so far in place of the crown. These persons received the name of titularies, from being entitled to collect from the heritors the unappropriated teinds; but they were also bound on demand to sell to any heritor the titularship to his own teinds at nine years' purchase. From the collective land-produce of a parish the court of session could order the titulants to pay the minister a stipend, or to give him the support of the minister. This general decree having fixed the amount, a common agent, appointed by the court, proceeds to divide it proportionately among the landholders, and this division, when fully made, is sanctioned by the court, and, by an act of session, and forms the authority or rule according to which alone the minister collects his stipend. According to this system, which has proved a very happy settlement of a question vexata, the burden falls not on the farmer or tenant, as in other countries where tithing exactations are made, but on the landholder or titular of the teinds, to whom a privilege of relief is opened by having them fixed. He may value them, that is, to use the words of principal Hill, 'lead a proof of their present value before the Court of Session, and the valuation, once made by authority of that court, ascertain the quantity of victual or the sum of money in the name of teind payable out of his lands in all time coming.' The advantage of this system is that it enables proprietors to know exactly the extent of the public burdens on their estate; and the teind appropriated to the maintenance of the minister, or to educational and educational uses, being sacred and inviolable, is always taken into account, and deducted in the purchase or sale of lands. But that would not be so advantageous to the minister by fixing his income at one invariable standard were it not that provision is made, in the case of a minister's stipend every twenty years in parishes where there are free teinds. This is done by the minister instituting a process before the judges of the Court of Session, who act as commissioners for the plantation of kirkis and valuation of teinds; and in this process the act of 1806 requires that he shall summon not only the heritors of the parish, but also the moderator and clerk of presbytery as parties. In the event of the minister being able to prove a great advance in the social and agricultural state of the parish, the judges, grant his application, allocating some additional charge on the arguments pleaded appear to them unsatisfactory, they give a small addition, or refuse altogether. In many parishes, however, from the teinds being exhausted, ministers had no prospect of augmentation in the ordinary way; but recently the liberal policy of the late Dr. Percival's government in 1810, who used his influence in procuring an act of Parliament to be passed according to which all stipends in the Establishment should, out of the exchequer, be made up to £150. This, together with an adequate provision for men of a liberal profession, was felt and gratefully received at the time as a great boon. But such is the mutability of human society that these stipends, which in 1810 formed the minimum, are now greatly superior to many which at the same period were considered, for Scotland, rich benefices; but which, being wholly paid in grain, have, through the late agrarian law, fallen far below that standard. The incomes of city ministers are paid wholly in money. Besides the stipend, every parish minister has a right to a manse or parsonage-house, garden, and offices—the style as well as the extent of accommodation being generally proportioned to the value of the benefice and the character of the neighborhood. According to law, the glebe consists of 20 acres of land, in part lying within the manse of the minister; in fact, it generally exceeds that measure; and, besides, most ministers have a grass glebe, sufficient for the support of a horse and two cows. All these, by a late decision of the Court of Session, are exempt from poor-rates and similar public burdens. Ministers in royal burghs are entitled to manse only.

The statistics of the Established Church of Scotland vary very slightly from year to year. The number of parish churches was in 1877, 1,222. In addition to these there are forty-two Parliamentary churches, and a considerable number of chapels of ease and quiet sacred places, which, under a scheme efficiently organized by the Rev. Prof. Robertson, are in course of being endowed and erected into new parishes in the terms of the Act of James IV., passed in 1646. Altogether there are 120 parishes, town and village, in the Church of Scotland. The following are the chief missionary and other benevolent undertakings of the Church:

1. The Home Mission Scheme. It has three departments: (1) Church Extension. Local efforts in places requiring additional church accommodation are supplemented by grants from the funds of the scheme. In 1876, thirty-three churches, providing nearly 32,000 sittings, were thus aided. (2) Mission Churches, designed to be centres of mission work in destitute localities or in the more populous parishes of Scotland. These churches or church-halls, however, with a population of 25,000, are not inhabited by worshippers. The Home Mission Committee insist that they shall be served with invariable regularity. (3) Mission Stations, not having the permanent character of churches, intended as points of evangelical work among the landed, non-church-going, or far-scattered people. There are seventy-seven such stations supplied by licentiates, or students in divinity, or qualified evangelists. Besides these operations, aid is given in certain cases towards the employment of Scripture-readers in the Highlands and Islands. The revenue of the scheme, besides church-collections and legacies, amounted to £11,780.

2. Of undertakings more especially affecting the clergy of the Church may be noticed the Appointment for Augmenting the Smaller Livings, i.e., livings under £200 per annum, in order to make up the standard prescribed by the General Assembly. Also the Ministers' and Professors' Widows' Fund, to which every parish minister and every professor in the national universities is bound to subscribe. The capital sum of the fund amounts to upwards of £12,000. Ministers and professors may subscribe according to one or other of four rates, viz.: £5 3s., £4 14s. 6d., £5 6s., or £7 17s. 6d.

3. A report is yearly presented to the Assembly as to the condition of the Sabbath-schools in connection with the Church. Between 15,000 and 16,000 persons are engaged in the work of teaching 167,000 juvenile scholars, and upwards of 24,000 adults of both sexes.

4. Colonial Missions seek to provide means of grace for Scottish colonists in the various British dependencies and elsewhere. When the scattered communities are organized into churches—some large and influential, as in the dominion of Canada— the aid given by the Home Church is curtailed, if not wholly withdrawn. But the committee have a great sphere of labor in the ever-enlarging and developing colonial empire of Great Britain. Agents of the mission report from British Colonies, New Zealand, Australia, Ceylon, India. Under the Colonial Mission are also included European stations, such as Paris and Dresden, where ministers are maintained for the benefit of resident Presbyterians. The total income of the scheme in 1877 was upwards of £15,000.

5. Missions to India. The effort put forth in connection with this mission are concentrated on Turkey and Egypt. It has agents in Constantinople, Smyrna, Alexandria, Beyrut, and Salonica. The sum of the charge which it operates is upwards of £7,000.

6. Missions to the Hebrides. The success of these missions, comprehending as they do, the so-called "Foreign Missions," are India, Africa, and China. It can scarcely, indeed, be said that a mission exists in China; but steps have been taken to originate a Christian work in that vast empire. The agency in Africa is not yet complete. A station has been formed and is partly occupied by a company of Christian artisans, headed by a medical missionary, in the Highlands of East Africa—the station having received the name of Dr. Livingstone's birthplace, Blantyre. The Indian missions retain the mixed character which Scotch missions in India have hitherto borne—educational and evangelistic. In the Presidencies, the educational institutions are still maintained, and are at present in a state of efficiency. Evangelical efforts are also carried on in connection with the institutions and in native churches. In the Presbyterian towns, the educational institutions are maintained by the native Presbyterians. The committee have visited the Highlands of India at Darjeeling, and outside the British territory an agency is maintained at Chumbi, whose position is that the mission, conducted by Europeans, is kept apart from the Church presented over by natives. The income of these foreign missions for the year ending January, 1876, was upwards of £19,000.

7. Two other agencies may be briefly noted:

(1) Continental and Foreign Missions Committee. Established as the medium of communication between the Church of Scotland and other Churches of the same communion. It is charged with the duty of cultivating friendly relations with such churches, and administering such sums as the liberality of the Church bestows on societies and agencies abroad seeking to spread the pure Gospel of Jesus Christ. For many years the committee have been able to aid the Central Society of the French Reformed Church, and the Evangelization Commission of the Waldensian Church in Italy. From time to time it has aided other agencies. The care of certain chaplaincies on the Continent intended for the benefit of Presbyterian students and residents at foreign universities on this committee. Its income in 1876 was £1,205.

(2) The Army and Navy Chaplains Committee is entrusted with the oversight of chaplains laboring in garrison towns or at the camps. The convener of the committee consists of the Moderator of the Church, with the naval and military authorities.

No church in Europe has taken more prompt and energetic steps for the general diffusion of school education than the Presbyterians of Scotland. As early as 1805 it was enacted that there should be a school founded and a school-master appointed in every parish by advice of the presbyteries, and to this purpose that the heralds do, in every congregation, meet among themselves, and provide a commodious house for a school, and modify a stipend to the school-master, which shall not be under ten marks (£6 1s. 4d.) nor above twenty marks." As almost all the population of the country is Presbyterian, the common-school system has sustained a parochial character. When, in 1843, the Free Church of Scotland was organized, it was resolved to erect schools in connection with the congregations of the Free Church, and the educational scheme which in consequence sprang up was co-extensive with the parochial system of the Established Church. In 1873, of 2,108 schools inspected by the government inspectors, 1,579 belonged to the Established and 557 to the Free Church; while of non-Presbyterian schools, 607 are Episcopal and sixty-six to the Catholic Church. The introduction of the new national system of educa-

Few schools now remain in relation to it. The care of the committee is now chiefly occupied with providing religious instruction in all schools desiring it, and giving grants for excellence in religious instruction. The Scottish Association and the Inverkeithing Institution are in organic connection with the Church of Scotland by means of theological professorships; while at St. Andrew's an entire college, St. Mary's, is appointed solely to the teaching of theology and the languages connected with it. The girls' schools in Edinburgh, and in the principal institutions are the theological faculties of the several national universities. The number of professors is, at Edinburgh, four; Glasgow, four; St. Andrew's, three; Aberdeen, four. Students, 196. Students of divinity are required to attend a full course of arts at the university, and three years more at the Divinity Hall. The sessions in both cases last about five months. Students in this and the other Presbyterian colleges of Scotland have often assistance from bursaries or scholarships, which are allotted chiefly by competition. 2. UNITED PRESBITERIAN CHURCH. — In 1722 the Robert Erskine, as resigning moderator of the Synod of Stirling and Perth, preached a sermon on Christ as the Cornerstone, in which he sharply inveighed against the corruptions and abuses that had crept into the Scottish Church. His sermon gave great offence, and incurred the censure of the synod. He appealed to the General Assembly, who condemned and rebuked him. Upon entering his protest, they hauled his case over to the Commission. The Commission summarily suspended Erskine and three other ministers—Wilson, Moncrieff, and Fisher, who had joined in his protest—and cast them out of ministerial communion. The brethren, deeming this treatment unconstitutional and unchristian, immediately organized themselves into a presbytery, to which they gave the name of the Associate Presbytery, and published their testimony, or vindication of their secession. The next Assembly showed a disposition to make concessions, but the seceders refused to listen. How far they were right in this has been debated. That they were not satisfied to return to the bonds of the Establishment is clear, for they were afterwards succeeded by other congregations and by a professed teacher of theology; and, in consequence of their activity and the popular sympathy, they increased rapidly. The Assembly next proceeded to harsher measures, and in 1740 deposed the seceding ministers, now eight in number. The doors of the churches were closed against them, and some of them, as Moncrieff, preached all winter in the open air. Great difficulty was found in procuring sites for houses of worship. Still they grew, and in 1745 the presbytery expanded into a synod with thirty settled congregations and sixteen vacancies. But now a dispute arose between them, and in 1747 they split into two synods. The General Associate Synod, or Anti-burghers, denounced the oath as sanctioning the Establishment with all its corruptions; the Associate Synod maintained that it only referred to the true Protestant faith, in opposition to popery. After seventy-three years of separation, during which each thrrove and sent offshoots to other parts of the world, both branches reunited (a few only standing aloof) in 1820, under the name of the United Secession Church, when the new body embraced 573 congregations.

The establishment of the church was the result of the 'disapac' deposition by the General Assembly in 1732. He had refused to assist in intruding an obnoxious presentee over the parish of Inverkeithing. After his deposition he continued to preach in Dunfermline, but labored alone for several years. At length, being joined by Messrs. Boston and Colier, the three constituted the Relief Presbytery. Soon after another presbytery was necessary, and in 1775 (Earle says 1779) the two met as a synod. It was characteristic of the Relief Church to maintain free communion with all true Christians, and to disapprove of the very principle of establishments. They founded a dispensary, and increased the number of Relief and Associate Presbyteries, 114 congregations, and 45,000 communicants.

These two bodies, the United Secession and the Relief, having so much in common, for some time contemplated a union, which was at last consummated in Edinburgh, May 16, 1847, in the form of a synod. They took the title of the United Presbyterian Church. In common parlance, they are often familiarly spoken of as the "U. P. Church." They constitute a very popular and powerful body of Christians in Scotland, reporting, as the statistics of May, 1876: number of congregations, 629; of elders, 5075; members, 190,242; Sunday-school teachers, 12,129; Sunday-school scholars, 92,502; total income for 1875, £419,965. In the synod held at Edinburgh May 11, 1876, its sanction was given by a vote of 578 to 45 for the union of the United Presbyterian communion with the English Presbyterian Church; and an animated discussion took place in advocacy of separation of the Church from the State. The following are the articles of the basis as adopted by the two synods:

1. That the Word of God contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments is the only rule of faith and practice.

2. That the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, are the confession and catechism of this Church, and contain the authorized exposition of the sense in which we understand the Holy Scriptures, it being always understood that we do not approve of anything contrary to the Word of God, or which may be supposed to teach, compulsory or persecution and intolerant principles in religion.

3. That Presbyterian government, without any superiority of office to that of a teaching presbyter, and in a due subordination of Church courts, which is founded on and agreeable to the Word of God, is the form of government of this Church.

4. That the ordinances of worship should be administered in the United Church as they have been in both bodies of which it is formed; and that the Westminster Directory of Worship continues to be regarded as a compendium of excellent rules.

5. That the term of membership is a credible profession of the faith of Christ as held by this Church—a profession made with intelligence, and justified by a corresponding character and conduct.

6. That with regard to those members and session members who think that the second section of the twenty-sixth chapter of the Westminster Confession of Faith should declare Christ excoriates free communion (that is, not loose or indiscriminate communion, but the occasional admission to full communion in both the Lord's Supper and the offices respecting which the Christian character satisfactory evidence has been obtained, though belonging to other religious denominations), they shall enjoy what they enjoyed in their separate communions—the right of acting on their consciences convictions.

7. That the election of office-bearers of this Church, in its several congregations, belongs, by the authority of Christ, exclusively to the members in full communion.

8. That this Church solemnly recognizes the obligation to hold forth, as well as to hold fast, the doctrine and laws of Christ; and to make exertions for the universal diffusion of the blessings of his Gospel at home and abroad.

9. That as the Lord hath ordained that they who are called by the Gospel should be one of the body of which they are taught in the Word should communicate to him that teacheth in all good things; that he who are strong should help the weak; and that, having been received, they should freely give the Gospel to those who are destitute of it—this Church assents the obligation and the privilege of its members, influenced by the authority of Christ, to support and extend, by voluntary contributions, the distributions of the Gospel through the respective bodies; and in maintaining the lawful and obligation of separation from ecclesiastical bodies in which dangerous error is tolerated, or the discipline of the Church or the rights of her ministers or members are disregarded.

"The United Church, in their present most solemn circumstances, join in expressing their grateful acknowledgment to the great Head of the Church for the measure of spiritual good which he has vouchsafed to them. They have marked their ecclesiastical management, and their determined resolution, in dependence on the promised grace of their Lord, to apply more frequently to the great principle of Christ, fellowship, to be more watchful in reference to admission and discipline, that the purity and efficiency of their congregations may be maintained. They take this step in the assurance that the collective body may be answered with respect to all within in a spirit of love, all without in a spirit of charity to other members on all other denominations or the world lying in wickedness."

"And, in fine, the United Church regard with a feeling of reverence and love all the faithful followers of Christ, and shall endeavor to maintain the unity of the whole body of Christ by a readiness to co-operate with all its members in all things in which they are agreed."

The United Presbyterian Church is a voluntary Church.

The doctrine of its voluntary condition is not formally contained in any portion of her standards, but it is distinctly implied. She holds to the theology of the Westminster Confession of Faith, and of the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, but she objects to every part of the Westminster Confession "which teaches, or is supposed to teach, compulsory or persecuting and intolerant principles in religion."

"Her creed," says Ewing, "is the scriptural Jesus in the exalted Jesus in the Head of his Church, and that this headship wholly supercedes the patronage and endowment of the Church by civil rulers. She believes, indeed, that Christ is King of nations, and that therefore nations should serve God, and that all rulers and magistrates are bound to glorify him in their respective spheres and stations. But such service and such glorification of God must be in harmony with the revealed mind of Christ; and the duty of enduring Christianiwherewever appears among the statutes of the New Testament. States which establish Churches beyond divine appointment, and contravene the spirituality of that kingdom which is not of this world. It is plain, too, from recent events in Scotland and England, that neither purity nor freedom can exist as it ought in an established Church. Spiritual independence can flourish only in a Church which has no connection with the State." Ebenzer Erskine said in his day, "There is a great difference to be made between the Church of Scotland and the Church of Christ in Scotland; for I reckon that the last is to a great extent drawn into the wilderness by the first; and similar advantages have led us into the wilderness with her, I judge it our duty to tarry with her for a while there, and to prefer her afflictions to all the advantages of a legal establishment." Christ's house, according to Ebenzer Erskine, is "the freest society in the world." It should bear its marks of being a free church 300 years. Accordingly the United Presbyterian Church is a free Church, and will not submit to any law of patronage. The Relief Church had its origin in this grievance; and the Secession Church, while it had a special struggle for doctrine, no less distinctive than that of the people, is therefore chosen by the united voice of the members in full communion; for Christ's ordinances are meant solely for Christ's people. The Presbyterian exercises no control whatever over the popular suffrage. It sends one of its members to moderate in the call, and sees that the call is gone about in a regular way. No canvassing is allowed, and the whole work of the Presbyterian is, in fact, to guard and preserve purity of election. The Presbyterian sustains the call after being convinced that the one will continue it in the presence of the mind of the people. The minister so called may either be one who is or has been in a charge, or he may be what is called a probationer. The vacant churches are supplied by these probationers—a body of men who have finished the educational curriculum appointed by the Church here, who are examined by their respective presbyteries, and licensed as persons qualified to preach the Gospel, and fit, if they shall be called, to take the pastoral charge of a congregation. The probationers are thus a body of lay preachers, authorized candidates for the ministry. They are sent among the vacant churches, and when the people are satisfied, they are admitted as members of the congregation. If there be any objection, it is tried, and sometimes they are located for months together at a missionary station. When a probationer is called, and accepts the call, he appears before the Presbytery in whose bounds the Church calling him is situated, and preaches what are called trial discourses. Such appearances in the Presbytery on the part of the pastor elect is to win the confidence of his brethren. After all the prescribed trials have been gone through and sustained, a day for the ordination is fixed. One of the ministers of the Presbytery is appointed to preside and ordain, and another is appointed to preach. An edict is at the same time appointed to be publicly served in the congregation by the officiating minister or preacher at least ten days before the day of ordination. Upon the appointed time and place, and is constituted by the moderator. The officer is then sent to the assembled congregation to intimate that the Presbytery has met, and requiring all who have any valid objections to the ordination being proceeded with immediately to appear before the Presbytery and state them. The officer having received the objections, the only King and Head of his Church, and that this headship wholly supercedes the patronage and endowment of the Church by civil rulers. She believes, indeed, that Christ is King of nations, and that therefore nations should serve God, and that all rulers and magistrates are bound to glorify him in their respective spheres and stations. constitute the session of the congregation and introduce the minister to his seat there. The whole procedure of the day is entered on the Presbytery's record.

The formula put to ministers on their ordination is as follows:

1. Do you believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the Word of God, and the only rule of faith and practice?

2. Do you acknowledge the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, as an exhibition of the sense in which you understand the Holy Scriptures, and believe that you are not required to approve of anything in these documents which teaches, or is supposed to teach, compulsory or persecuting and intolerance of religious principles in religion?

3. Are you persuaded that the Lord Jesus Christ, the only King and Governor of the Church, has appointed a government distinct from and subordinate to civil government? And do you acknowledge the Presbyterian form of government, as authorized and acted on by the Church, to be founded on and approved to the Word of God?

4. Do you approve of the constitution of the United Presbyterian Church as exhibited in the Basis of Union; and while cherishing a lively sense of brotherhood toward all the faithful followers of Christ, do you engage to seek the patty, edification, peace, and extension of this Church?

5. Are you convinced of the glory of God, in the Lord Jesus Christ, and a desire to save souls, and not worldly interests or expectations, so far as you know your own heart, your motives and chief inducements to enter into the office of the holy ministry?

6. Have you used any undue methods, by yourself or others, to obtain the call of this Church?

7. [The members of the Church being requested to stand up, let any question be put to them.]

8. Do you, the members of this Church, testify your adherence to the call which you have given to Mr. A. B. to be your minister? And do you receive him with all good- ness, and promise to provide for him suitable maintenance, and to give him all due respect, subjection, and encouragement in the Lord?

9. An opportunity will be given to the members of the Church of signifying their assent to this by holding up their right hand.

10. Do you adhere to your acceptance of the call to become minister of this Church?

11. Do you engage, in the strength of that grace which is in Christ Jesus, to live a holy, useful, and Christ-like life, to maintain your own house, and faithfully, diligently, cheerfully to discharge all the parts of the ministerial work to the edifying of the body of Christ?

12. Do you promise to give conscientious attention on the concerns of the United Presbyterian Church, to be subject to them in the Lord, to take a due interest in their proceedings, and to study the things which make for peace?

13. All these things you profess and promise, through grace, as you shall be answerable at the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints, and as you would be found in that happy company?

The Church has one theological institution, with a staff of seven professors, including the principal. The number of students for 1876-77 was 107, and the average for the ten preceding years 136. Students have to pass through a full course of arts at the university before joining the theological hall, and the theological curriculum is over three years, with a session each year from the beginning of November to the middle of April. Very recently a change was made in the management of the theological hall, with a view to the more efficient training of students. It was found that the cost of maintaining the hall should be partly by a capital fund and partly by annual contributions, and the capital fund of £40,000 has already been nearly realized. In connection with the theological hall there is a scheme of scholarships, and a committee who have charge of the distribution of these on competitive examination of applicants. In 1876 eleven special scholarships were awarded of the aggregate value of £275; and from the ordinary fund two of £20 each, ten of £15, and forty-one of £10. In 1876 the number of young people under religious instruction in Sabbath-schools and Bible-classes was 102,750.

The following are among the other undertakings of the United Presbyterian Church:

Home Mission Fund.—This fund is under the direction more immediately of the Home Committee of the Board of Missions. Its object is to supplement the funds of the weaker congregations, to support missionary stations, to aid in the support of catechists, and maintain a scheme of home evangelization.

By the Stipend Augmentation Scheme and its Surplus Fund, including arrangements which have been made with certain denominations in reference to allowances for house-rent where manse accommodation has not been provided, the following general results in regard to the stipends of ministers for the year 1877 have been obtained:

All the other Stipends in the Church are upwards of £200 per annum.

In evangelistic effort and home evangelization £6467 were expended in 1876 under the direction of the Home Committee of the Board of Missions.

The Aged and Infirm Ministers' Fund has a capital fund of £85,585, with a reserve fund of £1000, and provides an annuity of not less than £50 per annum to aged and infirm ministers and missionaries of the Church.

Manse Fund.—For this scheme £57,772 have been raised by subscriptions and donations up to December, 1876, and £43,459 expended up to April, 1877, in grants to 222 congregations; and the conditions on which these grants were offered required the congregations to raise not less than £9,534, as it is stipulated where grants are given that the manse shall be free of duty when the last instalment of the grant has been paid.

The Foreign Mission Fund is to defray the expenses of the foreign missionary operations of the Church. The missions supported out of the fund, nine in number, are situated in Jamaica, Trinidad, Old Calabar, Kaffraria, India, China, Spain, Japan, and Algeria. In these nine missions there are 61 ordained missionaries, 7 European medical missionaries, 2 European male teachers, 21 European female teachers, 22 ordained native missionaries, 91 native evangelists, 212 schoolmasters, 44 native female teachers, 86 other agents, 84 principal stations, 131 out-stations, 13,242 communicants, 3080 inquirers, 197 week-day schools, 13,000 pupils, with a total educated agency of 384. The income of the Foreign Mission Fund for 1887 was £66,527 16s. 4d.

Under the direction of the synod, the Foreign Mission Board voted, during 1876, the following grants, viz.: (1) To the Union of Evangelical Churches of France, £500; (2) to the Evangelical Society of Lyons, £150; (3) to the Evangelical Society of Geneva, £250; (4) to the Belgian Missionary Society, £200; (5) for evangelistic work in Bohemia, £150; (6) to the Waldensian Church, £250 (including £100 towards the salary of the Rev. J. Simpson Kay of Palermo); (7) to the Free Church of Italy, £100; (8) for evangelistic work at Aix-la-Bains, Savoy, £50; (9) to the French Canadian Missionary Society, £100; (10) for Rev. Ferdinand Cesar's work in Moravia, £75; (11) for outfit and passage of two ministers to Australia, £50; (12) to Rev. David Sadey, Napiar, New Zealand, for salary of evangelist (three years), £150; and (18) salary of Rev. Dr. Laws, of the Nyassa mission of the Free Church. These grants amount in all to £7715. Besides these special grants made directly by the Foreign Committee, the following special contributions have been obtained through the hands of the synod's treasurer: (1) £1580 from the Theological Hall Students' Missionary Society, for pastor Yakopian's work in Cesarea, Cappadocia; (2) £5 for Protestant churches in Bithynia; (3) £1 6s. 6d. for Mount Lebanon Schools; (4) £100 for Protestant Church in Bohemia; (5) £50 for Rev. P. Cesar's work in Moravias; (6) £20 for the Union of Evangelical Churches in France; (7) £45 £4. 4d. for evangelical work at Aixles-Bains, Savoy; (8) £24 for Christian work in Paris; (9) £13 for the Union of Church of the Diable in Ireland; (10) £131 2£. 4d. for the Wallacean Church; (11) £50 for the Free Italian Church; (12) £2 4£.

for Rev. J. S. Kay, Palermo; (13) £5 for Mrs. Boyce's Orphanage, Bordigue; (14) £33 £3. 4d. for Freedmen's Missions Aid Society; and (15) £606 8£. 7d. for the Agra Medical Mission (Dr. Valentine's scheme). These donations, denied by the donors for the objects specified, amounted in all to £2831 5£. 2d., which, added to the grants administered by the Board—viz., £2715—make the total contribution to the Church during 1876, for objects outside the bounds of our Mission, £2506 £2. 2d. The ordinary congregational income of the Church for the year 1876 was £233,114; the missionary and benevolent income £82,297; and the benevolent income not congregational £52,216—total, including the English congregations, up to June, 1876, being £406,204. See Hetherington, Hist. of the Church of Scotland; Cyclop. of Religious Denominations (London and Glasgow); Wilson,

2. THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—This large and usual body of Christians, now numbering nearly a million of people, was organized into a separate religious denomination in May, 1843. The circumstances which led to its formation as a Church distinct from the Establishment have already been detailed in a previous number of this paper. The length terminated in the Disruption had its origin in the two reforming acts passed by the General Assembly of 1834, the one of which, the Act on Calls, asserted the principle of non-intrusion, and the other, usually called the Church Act, asserted the right of the Church to deter-dine who should administer the government of Christ's house. Both of these acts gave rise to lawsuits before the civil tribunals, thus bringing into discussion the whole question as to the terms of the connection between the Church and the State. As the various proccesses went forward in the courts of law, it became quite plain to many, both of the Scottish clergy and laity, that attempts were made by the civil courts to coerce the courts of the Church in matters spiritual. Every encroachment of this kind they were determined to resist, and so far as it was practicable to do so, they constituted the Church of Scotland, as well as an infringement on the privileges secured to her by the Act of Security and Treaty of Union.

Matters were evidently fast hastening onward to a crisis, and in the Assembly of 1842 a Claim of Rights was agreed to be laid before the legislature, setting forth the grievances of which the Church complained in consequence of the usurpations of the courts of law, and declaring the terms on which alone she would remain in connection with the State. This important document was adopted by a majority of 181.
The claim, however, which it contained, was pronounced by government to be "unreasonable," and intimation was distinctly made that the government "could not advise her majesty to acquiesce in these demands." This reply on the part of the supreme branch of the legislature was decisive, and put an end to all hope of averting the impending catastrophe. At the next meeting of Assembly, accordingly, the moderator, instead of constituting the court in the usual form, read a solemn protest, which he laid upon the table, and withdrew, followed by all the clerical and lay members of Assembly by whom it was subscribed. This document protests against the then recent decisions of the courts of law on the following grounds:

1. That the courts of the Church by law established, and the subscribers to the subscription or bequests as lied to be coerced by the civil courts in the exercise of their spiritual functions; and in particular in the admission to the office of the holy ministery, to the ministry of the word of God, and to the services of the Word of God, and to the liberties of Christ's people.

2. That the said civil courts have power to interfere with and interpret the preaching of the Gospel and the administration of ordinances as authorized and enjoined by the Church and the Establishment.

3. That the said civil courts have power to suspend spiritual discipline imposed by the Church, as a part of the Establishment against ministers and probationers of the Church, and to interpret their execution as to spiritual effects, functions, and privileges.

4. That the said civil courts have power to reduce and set aside the sentences of the Church courts of the Establishment against ministers from the office of the holy ministry and depriving probationers of their license to preach the Gospel; and with reference to the imposition of discipline, functions, and privileges of such ministers and probationers—restoring them to the spiritual office and status of which the Church courts had deprived them.

5. That the said civil courts have power to determine on the right to sit as members of the supreme and other judicatories of the Church by law established, and to issue interdicts against sitting and voting therein, irrespective of the judgment and determination of the said judicatories.

6. That the said civil courts have power to supersede the majority of a Church court of the Establishment, in regard to the exercise of its spiritual functions as a Church court, and to authorize the minority to exercise the said functions, in addition to the court itself, and to the important judicatories of the Establishment.

7. That the said civil courts have power to stay proceed-ances of discipline pending before courts of the Church by law established, and to interdict such courts from proceeding therein.

8. That no pastor of a congregation can be admitted into the courts of the Church of the Establishment, and allowed to hold office, save and except in accordance with the decisions of the office of the Head of the Church, nor to sit in any of the judicatories of the Church, inferior or superior, and that no additional provision can be made for the excercise of spiritual discipline among the members of the Church, through any other power or authority, or in any way, except by the same authority as that having a jurisdiction, and without the express consent of the Church.

All which jurisdiction and power on the part of the said civil courts generally above specified, whatever proceeding may have given occasion to the principles, is, in our opinion, itself inconsistent with Christian liberty, and with the authority which the Head of the Church hath conferred on the Church alone.

The document goes on to protest that in the circumstances in which the Church was thereby placed, "a free Assembly of the Church of Scotland, by law established, cannot at this time be holden, and that an Assembly cannot be lawfully constituted in connection with the Church cannot be constituted in connection with the State without violating the conditions which must now, since the rejection by the Legislature of the Church's Claim of Right, be held to be the conditions of the Establishment; they can be holden only in close of this subscription, by subscribing claim to themselves the liberty of abandoning their connection with the State, while retaining all the privileges and exercising all the functions of a section of a Church's visible Church. " And, finally, they declare, while firmly asserting the right and duty of the civil magistracy to maintain and support an establishment of religion in accordance with God's Word, and reserving to ourselves and our successors to arrive by all lawful means, as opportunity shall in God's good providence be offered, to secure the performance of this duty agreeingly, in accordance with the conditions of the establishment of the kingdom of Scotland and the obligations of the Treaty of Union as understood by us and our ancestors, but acknowledging that we do not hold ourselves at liberty to retain the benefits of the Establishment while we cannot comply with the conditions now to be deemed therein as essential, and that we shall, to the extent of which we are placed, it is, and shall be, lawful for us, and such other commissioners chosen to the Assembly
appointed to have been this day holden as may concur with us, to withdraw to a separate place of meeting, for consideration of the purposes and objects set forth as here to us—maintaining with us the Confession of Faith, and standards of the Church of Scotland as herebefore understood—for separating in an orderly way from the Establishment, and thereupon adopting such measures as may be competent to us, in humble dependence on God's grace and the aid of the Holy Spirit, for the advancement of his glory, the extension of the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour, and the administration of the affairs of the Church; and to do now, for the purpose foresaid, withdraw accordingly, humbly and solemnly acknowledging the hand of the Lord in the things which have come upon us, because of our manifold sins, and the sins of this Church and nation; but, at the same time, with an assured conviction that we are not responsible for any consequences that may follow from this our enforced separation from an Establishment which we loved and prized, through interference with conscience, the disbursement done to Christ's crown, and the rejection of his sole and supreme authority as King of his Church. This document, embodying the protest against the wrongs inflicted on the Church of Scotland by the civil power, was signed by no fewer than 203 members of Assembly. When the moderator had finished the reading of the protest, he was followed by a large majority of the clerical and lay members of the court; and the procession, joined by a large body of ministers, elders, and others who adhered to their principles, moved in solemn silence to Tansfield Hall, a large building situated at the northern extremity of the city, in the valley formed by the streams flowing into the Tweed, and near the Union Church of Scotland, which, while renouncing the benefits of an Establishment, continues to adhere to the standards and to maintain the doctrine, discipline, worship, and government of the Church of Scotland. Dr. Chalmers was chosen as their first moderator, and the ordinary business was proceeded with according to the usual forms. On Tuesday, the 23d of May, the ministers and professors, to the number of 474, solemnly subscribed the Deed of Demission, formally renouncing all connection with an Establishment by which they had been held in connection with the Establishment, declaring them to be vacant, and consenting to their being dealt with as such. Thus, by a regular legal instrument, the ministers completed their separation from the Establishment; and the Free Church of Scotland assumed the position of a distinct ecclesiastical denomination, holding the same doctrines, maintaining the same ecclesiastical framework, and observing the same forms of worship as had been received and observed in the National Church. In fact, they had abandoned nothing but the endowments of their superiors. The General Assembly of the Union Church of Scotland, now called the New College, which was completed at a cost approaching £40,000, is provided with a more complete staff of professors than any similar institution in Scotland, and with more effectual means of training an educated ministry for the service of the Church in the United Kingdom. The Free Church has also built a divinity hall in Aberdeen, and a third in Glasgow. The number of theological students in attendance on these colleges amounts in 1878 to 230. In connection with the Free Church, a fund was instituted in 1848 for Aged and Infirm Ministers, which already exceeds £39,000. In addition to the home ministry, which in 1878 numbered 1059, there are nearly 800 settled ministers belonging to this Church in the different departments of the colonial field.
dividend platforms; to maintain lay evangelists, and send out ministerial evangelists from time to time; and to encourage the employment of students and others as missionaries in necessitous districts in large towns. To encourage ministers of experience to undertake mission congregations in populous places, grants of £200 a year and a corresponding amount being diminishing gradually from year to year, till it is extinguished. In other cases the grants are smaller. The income of the fund, derived from a church-door collection thrice in two years, donations, legacies, etc., is between £8000 and £10,000, and the fund is steadily diminishing.

Highland Mission. — This is a somewhat similar scheme, managed by a separate committee of the General Assembly, for districts of the country where Gaelic is spoken. It has a collection every second year. Its average revenue is about £3000.

Church and Manse Building Fund. — This is intended to help congregations in their building operations. At first the principal encouragement, Dr. Guthrie being raised for the General Manse Fund alone about £10900, but of late years its income has been only about £1500. A special Building Fund is contemplated for new charges.

Education Scheme. — Till recently a large proportion of the congregations had day-schools, for which grants were given. Of these are now in the national scheme of education. There are still some schools receiving grants; but the chief remaining part of the scheme is the Normal Schools, of which there are two — at Edinburgh and Glasgow. The instructors receive a salary from a general fund, which is raised by monthly contributions in all the congregations, and which is divided at the end of the year according to a certain scale, proportioned to the qualifications of the respective teachers.

Continental Scheme. — For aiding stations, societies, and churches on the continent of Europe. Revenue about £4000.

Miscellaneous. — For sending out ministers to the colonies and aiding colonial churches, especially in their earlier stages. Revenue about £4000.

The Foreign Misions Scheme. — The late Rev. Dr. Duff, the first missionary to the heathen from the Church of Scotland, went to Calcutta in 1829, and founded the India Mission of the Church of Scotland. In the previous year Dr. Wilson went to Bombay, and later, the Rev. John Anderson to Madras. In 1843 all the missionaries in India adhered to the Free Church, and the old localities were continued. The Foreign Missions of the Free Church embrace India, Africa, Syria, and New Hebrides. In India, there are 6 principal and 12 branch stations in Bengal; 3 principal and 10 branch stations in Western India; 2 principal and 3 branch stations in Central India; and 1 principal and 7 branch stations in Southern India. In South Africa there are 6 principal and 31 branch stations in Kaffraria; 2 principal and 2 branch stations in Natal; and 1 principal station at Livingstonia. In New Hebrides, where the Reformed Presbyterians (who joined the Free Church in 1876) had their field, are 4 stations, on the island of Banks, in Syria, the headquarters are at Swieir, about twenty miles from Beyrut. In all, the Free Church missions embrace 107 stations, 38 European missionaries, 3 European medical missionaries, 21 European teachers, 19 European artisans, 15 native missionaries, 97 Christian teachers, and Christian laborers of various sorts. In the native churches are 2350 communicants, and about 3000 baptized adherents. The number of institutions and schools is 228, and the total number of scholars is 13,109. In the principal Indian stations many of the pupils are undergraduates of the universities. The revenue of this scheme for 1876–77 was £51,217.

Rev. Mr. Mission. — This was begun in 1839, and in 1843 it was continued by the Free Church, all the missionaries having adhered. At present it has stations at (1) Amsterdam, (2) Prague, (3) Veys, (4) Breslau, and a special Church Extension Fund, amounting to £100,000, is being raised, and the greater part of it has been contributed in a few months.

Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland. — This is the only Church which can be legitimately described as the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland in her period of greatest purity, that of the Second Reformation. It was that memorable period of Scottish history between 1638 and 1650 which formed the era of the Solemn League and Covenant, of the Westminster Assembly, of the revolution which deposed the first Charles and asserted those principles of civil and religious liberty which all enlightened Christians and statesmen are now ready with one voice to acknowledge and to admire. For their strict adherence to these principles Cameron, Cargill, and Renwick shed their blood, and to these principles the Reformed Presbyterian Church glo- riol in owing her attachment. As has already been noticed in the article COVENANTERS, on the day after the execution of Charles I was known at Edinburgh, his son, Charles II, was proclaimed king at the public cross by the Committee of Estates, with this promise, however, that "before being admitted to the exercise of his royal power, he shall give satisfaction to this kingdom in the things that concern the security of religion according to the National Covenant and the Solemn League and Covenant of 1643; and he shall not make any law or ordinance as necessary to the maintenance of the constitution of the country, as well as the promotion of the great principles of civil and religious liberty, that it was enacted both by the Parliament and the General Assembly. The document issued by the latter body exhibits, in the clearest manner, their design in insisting upon the subscription by the king. It is dated July 27, 1649, and contains the following important statements: "But if his majesty, or any having or pretending power and commission from him, shall invade this kingdom upon any pretense or pretext of a power, whether temporal or spiritual, or for the purpose of the maintaining or advancing any such power — as it will be a high provocation against God to be accessory or assisting thereto, so it will be a necessary duty to resist and oppose the same. We know that many are so forgetful of the oath of God, and ignorant and careless of the interest of Jesus Christ and the Gospel, that they do little trouble to mind his kingdom and the privileges thereof, and do so much dishonor absolute and arbitrary government for gaining their own ends, and so much malign the instruments of the work of reformation, that they would admit his majesty, or any having or pretending power, or any who are upon any terms whatsoever, though with never so much prejudice to religion and the liberties of these kingdoms, and would think it quarrel enough to make war upon all those who for conscience' sake cannot condescend there- to. But we desire all those who fear the Lord, and mind to keep their Covenant, impartially to consider those things which follow:

"I. That as magistrates and whose power is ordained of God, so are they in the exercise thereof not to walk according to their own will, but according to the law of equity and good conscience, as being the word of God for the safety of his people; therefore a boundless and unlimited power is to be acknowledged in no king or magistrate; neither is it to be submitted to the preaching of his power as long as he refuses to walk in the administration of things according to the established laws of the kingdom, that his subjects may live under him a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and holiness.

"II. There is one mutual obligation and stipulation between the king and his people; as both of them are tied to God, so of each of them is tied one to another for the performance of mutual and reciprocal duties. According to this, it is statute and ordained in the eighth act of first Parliament of James VI, "That all kings, princes, or magistrates whatsoever, holding their place, which hereafter at the time of their coronation and receipt of their princely authority, make their faithful promise by oath, in the presence of the Eternal God, that during the whole course of their lives they shall serve the same Eternal God in the utmost of their power, according to the oath required in his most holy Word, contained in the Old and New Testaments: and, according to the same words, make and subscribe to the same oath and the preaching of his most holy Word, and due and right administration of his sacrament now received and preached within this realm; and shall abhor every doctrine contrary to the same; and shall rule the people committed to their charge according to the will and command of God contained in his holy Word, and according to the audible laws and constitutions received within this realm; and shall not seduce nor entice the people to do any thing contrary to the same." They are bound to the king as his subjects to give him obedience, but not without exceptions. That oath was sworn by king James VI, and afterwards by king Charles at his coronation, and is inserted in our National Covenant, which was afterwards confirmed by the king. The obligations of their majesties in this matter do not stand on a single point, but extend to all the duties inherent to their power. It is consonant to Scripture and reason, and the laws of the kingdom, that they should refer to their subjects for the execution of their government.

"III. In the League and Covenant which hath been so solemnly sworn and renewed by this kingdom, the duty of defending and preserving the king's majesty, person, and authority, and of maintaining the true religion and liberties of the kingdom; and therefore his majesty, subjected himself to the last and majestic obligation, to defend his majesty, person, and authority, and the true religion and liberties of the kingdom, and not to suffer any thing to remove the same. The pope is denounced to be the avowed enemy of the kingdom, and the king is bound to the interest of Jesus Christ, to bring him to the exercise of his royal power, and to promote the welfare of the kingdom, and to promote the cause of religion and the true religion of Jesus Christ, as being the only and true religion.

The stipulation was made known to Charles while he was still in Holland, where he had been for some time residing, but he refused to accede to it. The following year (1650) he set sail for Scotland, and before landing on its shores he consented to subscribe the Covenant, and the test was accordingly administered to him with all due solemnity. On the following August he repeated an engagement to support the Covenant. Yet the Covenant did not succeed in all its objects. But the schemes for the subversion not only of Presbyterianism, but even of Protestantism in Scotland. Again, when crowned at Scone on Jan. 1, 1651, Charles not only took oath to support and defend the Presbyterian Church in Scotland, but the National Covenant and the Solemn League and Covenant having been produced and read, the king solemnly swore them. The imposing ceremonial, however, was only designed, on the part of the profligate Charles, to deceive his Scottish subjects. Nor did the calamities in which he was involved lead to his dethronement and exile for several years in France—produce any favorable change upon his character. No sooner was he restored to his throne in 1660, than he forthwith proceeded to overturn the whole work of reformation, both civil and ecclesiastical, which he had solemnly sworn to support. The first step towards the execution of this determination was the passing of the Act of Supremacy, whereby the king was constituted supreme judge in all matters civil and ecclesiastical. To this was afterwards added the Oath of Allegiance, which declared it to be treason to deny the supremacy of the sovereign both in Church and State. The crowning deed of treachery, however, which Charles perpetrated, was his prevailing upon his Scottish counsellors to pass the Act Rescissory, by which all the acts taken from 1688 to 1650 for the reformation of religion were pronounced rebellious and treasonable; the National Covenant, the Solemn League and Covenant were condemned as unlawful oaths; the Glasgow Assembly of 1638 was denounced as an illegal and seducitious meeting; and the right government of the Church was alleged to be the inherent prerogative of the crown. The result of these acts was, that the advances which the Church and the country had made during the period of the Second Reformation were completely neutralized, and the Church of Scotland was subject to a long series of years to the most cruel persecution and oppression. With such flagrant and repeated violations of the covenant the king had entered with his subjects, it is not to be wondered at that, on high constitutional grounds, this body of the Covenanters, headed by Cameron, Cargill, and others, should have regarded the treacherous sovereign as having forfeited all title to their allegiance. They felt it to be their duty to uphold the truth of the Reformation, and yet own the authority of a monarch who had trampled these principles under foot, and that, too, in violation of the most solemn oaths, repeated again and again. The younger McCrie, in his Sketches of Scottish Church History, alleges that the principle laid down by Cameron's party was, "that the king, by assuming an Erastian power over the Church, had forfeited all right to the civil obedience of his subjects—a principle which had never been known in the Church of Scotland before." Such a view of the matter, however, is scarcely fair to the Covenanters. It was not because Charles had usurped an Erastian authority over the Church that they deemed it their duty to renounce their allegiance, but because he had broken the solemn vow made at his coronation. On that occasion he had entered, as they held, into a deliberate compact with his subjects, and yet, in the face of all his oaths, he had openly, and in the most flagrant manner, broken that compact, thus setting his subjects free from all obligation to own him as king. It is quite true, as the Westminster Confession of Faith affirms, that infidelity or difference in religion do not make void the magistrate's just and legal authority, nor free the people from their due obedience to him; but this remark does not meet the case as between Charles and the Covenanters. They renounced their allegiance not because the sovereign was an infidel, or differed from them in matters of religion, but solely and exclusively because he had broken a civil compact entered into between him and his Scottish subjects on receiving the crown, and confirmed by a solemn religious vow. By his own declaration and confession, as lying under the ban of the Church, he had forfeited his right to rule before they had renounced their obligation to obey. Such were the simple grounds on which Cameron, Cargill, Renwick, and their followers considered themselves justified in disowning the authority of the king, and bearing arms against him as a usurper of the throne and a traitor to the country.

This earnest and intrepid band of Covenanters brought down upon themselves, by the fearful avowal of their principles, the special vengeance of the ruling powers. One after another their leaders perished on the scaffold, and thus the people of God were left to the care of those who found themselves deprived of religious instructors, and wandering as "sheep without a shepherd." In these circumstances they resolved to form themselves into a united body, consisting of societies for worship and mutual edification, which were formed in those districts where the numbers warranted such a step. To preserve order and uniformity, the smaller societies appointed deputies to attend a general meeting, in which was vested the power of making arrangements for the regulation of the whole body. The first meeting of these united bodies, held in Ayr on June 1688, at Logan House, in the parish of Leenahaw, Lanarkshire, where it was resolved to draw up a public testimony against the errors and defections of the times. The name which this body of Covenanters took to themselves was that of the "Persecuted Remnant," while the societies which they had formed for religious improvement led them to be designated the "Society People." They had taken up no new principles," as Dr. Hetherington well remarks: "the utmost that they can be justly charged with is, merely that they had followed up the leading principles of the Presbyterian and Covenanted Church of Scotland to an extreme point, from which the greater part of Presbyterians recoiled; and that in doing so they had used language capable of being interpreted to mean more than they themselves intended. Their honesty of heart, integrity of purpose, and firmness of principle cannot be gainsaid; and the character of men of sound unguarded language, it ought to be remembered that they did so in the midst of fierce and remorseless persecution, ill adapted to make men nicely cautious in the selection and exercise of terms to express their indignation of that unchristian tyranny which was so fiercely striving to destroy every vestige of both civil and religious liberty."

The first manifestation of the views held by the Society People took place during the dissections at Bothwell Bridge, when a body of the Covenanters refused to make a public avowal of their allegiance to the king in their declaration. A rude outline of the declaration was drawn up by Cargill, assisted by Henry Hall, of Haughhead, who was mortally wounded at Queensferry, and the document, being found on his person, received the name of the "Queensferry Paper." It contained some of the chief points held by the Society People; but it unfortunately embodied in it an avowal of dislike to a hereditary monarchy, as "liable to inconvenience, and apt to degenerate into tyranny." Though the paper in question emanated from only a few persons, and its errors, therefore, could not be charged upon the whole of the strict Presbyterian party, yet it was quoted without reserve by their enemies as a proof of diabolical and even treasonable tenets. To counteract the prejudices thus excited against them, the leaders of the Society People drew up deliberately a statement of their principles, which is usually known by the name of the "Sanquhar Declaration." This document, which carefully excluded all reference to a change in the form of government, was, nevertheless, classed by the persecutors along with the Queensferry Paper in all their proclamations, as if they had been identical, and made an excuse for issuing to the army the most ruthless and cruel commands to pursue to the death all who were suspected of connection with the bold declarations. Cameron, Cargill, and ten other persons were proclaimed traitors, and a price was set upon their heads. Nothing daunted, Cargill in 1680 boldly pronounced what is known as the Torwood Excommunication. In a meeting held at Torwood, in Stirlingshire, the intrepid Covenant, after divine service, solemnly excommunicated Charles and his chief supporters, casting them out of the Church, and delivering them up to Satan. This bold act of a Christian hero roused the government to greater fury, and a series of civil and military executions followed, down to the Revolution in 1688.

In the persecutions of this eventful period, the Society People had been subjected to painful discouragement by the loss of their able and devoted leaders. Cameron and Cargill, and many others, had sealed their testimo-were: (1) that as it left the Acts Revisitory in full force, it cancelled the attainments of the Second Reformation, together with the Covenanters; and (2) that the civil rulers usurped an authority over the Church which virtually destroyed her spiritual independence, and was at variance with the sole headship of the Redeemer himself.

The defects of the Revolution settlement were due partly to William's Erastian policy, and his desire to retain the prælatic clergy within the Established Church of Scotland, but partly also to the temporizing policy of the Church itself. "Though the acts of Parliament," as Dr. Hetherington justly remarks, "made no mention of the Second Reformation and the National Covenant, it was the direct duty of the Church to have declared her adherence to both; and though the State had still refused to recognise them, the Church would, by this avowal, have at least escaped from being justly exposed to the charge of having submitted to a violation of her own sacred Covenant. In the same spirit of compromis, the Church showed herself but too ready to comply with the king's pernicious policy of including as many as possible of the presbytery within the National Church. This was begun by the first General Assembly, and continued for several succeeding years, though not to the full extent wished by William, till a very considerable number of those men whose hands had been so freely guilted in persecution were received into the bosom of that Church which they had so long striven utterly to destroy. It was absolutely impossible that such men could become true Presbyterians; and the very acrimony with which many of them subscribed the Confession of Faith only proved the more clearly that they were void of either faith or honor. Their admission into the Presbyterian Church of Scotland was the most fatal event which ever occurred in the strange, eventful history of that Church."

It was not to be expected that the Society People could approach with a spirit of sentiment and feeling, or with the views of the Church in the matter of the Revolution settlement. They occupied, accordingly, an attitude of firm and decided protest against the principles avowed by William and acted on by the Church; and they maintained that there had been a decided departure on the part of both the one and the other from the principles of the Second Reformation and the obligations of the Covenant.

Holding such views, it was impossible for the Society People to incorporate themselves with the Established Church of Scotland. They were compelled, therefore, to separate into a distinct and constantly increasing body, whose constitution was radically vitiated, and as protested against a professedly national government which had violated the most solemn national obligations. Three Cameronian ministers, it is true—Messrs. Shields, Linning, and Boyd—applied for admission into the National Church for themselves and their people, on condition that they might acknowledge breach of Covenant, and purge out the ignorant and heterodox and scandalous ministers who had taken part in shedding the blood of the saints. But every proposal of this nature was met with a reprobation more obstinate than redress, they at last submitted, and the people who had adhered to them remained in a state of disentilment.

For upwards of sixteen years after the avowal of their peculiar principles, the strict Presbyterians had remained without a stated ministry, or without any separate organization as a Church. In 1681, however, societies were formed which, though exercising no ecclesiastical functions, tended to give unity to the body, and to make such arrangements as were necessary for the maintenance of worship and ordinances, encourag making at the same time among the people a devoted attachment to Reformation principles. Availing themselves of these praying societies for nearly twenty years after the Revolution, the people waited patiently until the Lord should send them pastors. At length, in 1707, their wishes and prayers were answered, the Rev. John M'Millan, of Balmaghie, having resigned connection with the Established Church, and joined himself to their body. For a few years before, he had been contending within the pale of the Church for the whole of the Covenanted Reformation; but instead of meeting with sympathy, he was hasted and irregularly deposed. Having joined the Reformed Presbytery, he labored for many years in the work of the ministry among them with indefatigable earnestness and zeal, maintaining the principles of the Second Reformation till his dying day.

Soon after the accession of Mr. M'Millan from the Established Church, he was joined by Mr. John M'Neil, a licentiate, who, having adopted Cameronian views, had also seceded. These two faithful and zealous servants of Christ traversed the country, preaching everywhere, and encouraging the adherents of the Covenant. In 1712 the Covenants were renewed at Auchensawgh. Amid many trials and persecutions the cause went steadily forward; and in 1748 Mr. M'Millan, who had hitherto stood alone as an ordained minister, Mr. M'Neil never having been ordained for want of a presbytery, was joined by the Rev. Thomas Nairn, who, on the suspension of Mr. M'Millan in the Assembly, a con- cession Church in consequence of his having embraced Cameronian views. There being now two ministers, a meeting was held at Braehead on Aug. 1, 1748, when a presbytery was for the first time formed under the name of the "Reformed Presbyterian Church."

One of the first acts of the newly organized Church was to despatch missionaries to Ireland, and by the blessing of God upon the labors of these men, and others who speedily followed, a fully organized and independent section of the Reformed Presbyterian Church was formed in the sister isle.

In Scotland a Declaration and Testimony was published in 1741, and the Covenants were renewed in 1745, at Crawford-John, in Lanarkshire; but notwithstanding these steps, which were so well fitted to promote unity among the people, the year 1749 elapsed when a division took place in the Reformed Presbytery, two of the brethren, Messrs. Hall and Innes, having separated from their communion in consequence of their having imbibed heretical opinions on the subject of the atonement. The two brethren, after seceding from the Presbytery, formed themselves into a new presbytery at Edinburgh, which at length became extinct. The Reformed Presbytery, in reply to their misrepresentations, found it necessary to issue a treatise in defence of their proceedings in the case of the erring brethren, as well as in refutation of the doctrine of an indefinite atonement. In 1761 a very important step was taken by the Reformed Presbytery, the emission of a Testimony for the whole of the Covenanted Reformation as attained to and established in Great Britain and Ireland, particularly between the years 1688 and 1689 inclusive.

From this time the Reformed Presbyterian Church went steadily forward, adhering to their peculiar principles with unflinching tenacity; and amid much obloquy, misunderstanding, and even misrepresentation, from the other religious denominations around them, witnessing both by words and works the separation of the Covenanted Reformation. Their numbers in many parts of Scotland increased beyond the means of supplying them with ministers. This was unhappily the case, for a considerable time, in various districts of the country. But at length such was the increase of ministers connected with the body that in 1810 three presbyteries were formed, and in the year following a general synod was constituted for the supervision of these presbyteries. Since that time so rapidly has the denomination advanced in numbers that in the year 1860 the synod included six presbyteries, which consisted in all of thirty-six ordained ministers and eight vacant congregations. The synod met annually either in Edinburgh or Glasgow. The Divinity Hall met during the months of August and September, when the students, in five sessions, received the instructions of two pro-fensors, one for systematic theology, and the other for Biblical literature and Church history.

In the year 1830 the synod resolved to commence the prosecution of missionary operations. Their attention was first directed to the colony of Van Diemen's Land, in particular to the Canadian. Nor have they been unmindful of foreign missions, three missionaries in connection with the synod being employed in New Hebrides. There has also been a missionary laboring since 1846 among the Jews in the Holy Land. These Presbyterians have been sometimes called Commenziani, from Richard Cameron; but they are otherwise called "M'Millans," or "M'Millanites," from the name of the first minister who espoused their cause after the Revolution. But these, as well as the terms "Whigs" and "Mountain Men," which are also occasionally applied to them, regard as accidental epithets. They are sometimes also called "Covenanters," from their adherence to the National Covenant of Scotland, and to the Solemn League and Covenant of the three kingdoms. Their proper designation, however, or that which they themselves adopt, is that of "Reformed Presbyterians." They hold the Holy Scriptures to be the absolute rule of faith and conduct, and to contain the standard of those both in Church and State. Next to this they adhere to the Westminster Confession of Faith, the Larger and Shorter Catechisms of the Church, the Books of Discipline, and the Westminster Directory for Public Worship. And, lastly, they regard the National Covenant of Scotland as a continuing obligation. To these are to be added the documents published by the body itself in explanation of their principles: namely, their Judicial Act and Testimony, the 5th edition of which was published at Glasgow in 1818; A Short Account of the Old Presbyterian Dissenters, published by authority of the Presbyterian Body in Scotland; and an Explanation and Defense of the Terms of Communion adopted by the Reformed Presbyterian Church. According to the statistical report made at the Synod in Glasgow, March 13, 1876, the Church included 42 congregations with 7500 members, and its annual contributions were £14,000. The synod then, by a vote of 57 to 6, adopted a resolution in favor of union with the Free Church, and such union was finally consummated in the General Assembly of that body, May 25, 1876.

The residuary Reformed Presbyterian Church musters its best ministers who held back, and are still contending about their Church property. Thus the Original Seceders, popularly known as "Auld Lichts" (Old Lichts), are a more considerable body. Though most of these joined the Free Church (as the true Church of Scotland free) in 1843, they have still some thirty congregations of poor but very worthy people, who consider it their mission to hold up the banner of the Covenanters, and to protest against the all but universal defection of their time and country. At the union in 1832, Drs. Candlish and Thomson, of Edinburgh, White, of Haddington, and the younger MacCrie (whose father had been in former days the great pillar of the Old-Light community) were added to the Free Church. The present Old Lichts are notably strict both in doctrine and practice. Unlike the New Lichts, who ultimately went to form the United Presbyterian Church in 1847, they are staunch supporters of the Establishment principle, which the Free Church also upholds in theory. It is chiefly the faithfulness of the latter with respect to the Covenanters which prevents the residuary "Auld Lichts" from joining the communion. See below.

United Original Secession Church. — In common with all true Protestants, the Synod of United Original Seceders acknowledges the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be the supreme and only rule of faith and practice, and also that they be a branch of the Reformed and Covenanted Church of Scotland, and adhere to the whole of the Westminster standards as these were received by the Church of Scotland as standards of uniformity for the churches in the three kingdoms, and feel themselves bound by the sacred pledge given in the Solemn League and Covenant to adhere to them as such. They thus take their stand upon the principles of the first and particularly of the second Reformation, which took place between the years 1588 and 1650, and which embodied in its proceedings and settlement all the valuable attainments of the first Reformation and carried them to a greater extent. They own the morality of public covenanting, and the continued and perpetual obligation of the National Covenant of Scotland, and of the Solemn League and Covenant, upon all ranks and classes in these lands, and acknowledge the duty of renewing these covenants in a bond suited to the circumstances. As Presbyterians, they hold that the Lord Jesus Christ, the alone king and head of his Church, has appointed a particular form of government to take place therein, distinct from civil government and not subordinate to the same, and that Presbyterian Church government is intended to be laid down and appointed by the Lord Jesus Christ in his Word. As they believe that Church communion consists in the joint profession of the truths and observance of all the ordinances which Christ has appointed in his Word, and as the Church in Scotland, in the unity of her visible fellowship, they regard free communion as an obvious violation of that unity, and hold it to be unscriptural, and that the practice encourages persons to continue in corrupt Governments, by leading them to conclude that there is no consciousness of ground of difference between these and the persons who make no scruple of occasionally joining with them in the intimacies of Church fellowship. In the worship of God they make use of the Psalms of David only, believing that they were delivered to the Church by the Holy Spirit to be used as the matter of public praise, and they regard hymns of human composition as unsuitable to the worship of God, and tending to endanger the purity both of the worship and the doctrines of the Church.

The Original Secession Synod dates its rise from 1738, and claims to represent the first seceders who in their testimony published in 1737 were careful to make it known that they were not dissenters from the National Church because of her civil establishment, but seceders from a corrupt and prevailing party in her jurisdiction, in opposition to the clear and pure light from the reformed and covenanting principles. The Original Secession Testimony, published in 1827, applies the principles of the Judicial Testimony to public events that had occurred up to the date of its publication, and like it was designed to be a declaration of the sense of the standards of the Church of Scotland in the way in which it was received by the Reformed and Covenanted Church of Scotland. It is a term of ministerial and Christian communion in the body—that is, office-bearers are required to signify their approval of its principles, and members are not to accede to them, so far as they know and understand them.

The synod has from time to time been lessened by the separation of brethren. At present it consists of 41 congregations in Scotland, England, and Ireland; of these 29 (including one in England) are in connection with the synod in Scotland, and 12 constitute the Secession Synod in Ireland, in full communion with the Scottish Synod. The members and adherents are estimated at 6500. The income of the Scottish Synod last year amounted to about £4000.

The synod owns the Home Mission stations, and also a prosperous Foreign Mission agency at Seoni, in India, under the immediate charge of Rev. George Anderson, who is assisted by two catechists. There is an orphanage in connection with the mission, having eleven children, who are instructed in the Church, and it is expected that the number will shortly be materially increased. A school is also carried on, having 170 scholars, and four teachers in addition to the missionary, and one catechist; the children are instructed in English, Urdu, and Hindi. The synod is desirous of obtaining, and has ample funds for maintaining, another ordained missionary. At present, the Rev. Prof. John Sturrock is carried on under the superintendence of the Rev. Prof. W. F. Atkin, A.M., and the Rev. Prof. James Spenze. The library in connection with the hall has 1400 volumes. Under the editorship of the Rev. John Strurrock a bi-monthly magazine is published having a circulation of 1200 copies.

6. PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN ENGLAND.—In the reign of queen Elizabeth there were two well-defined parties—the Prelatists, favored by the queen, who were satisfied with the reformation begun by king Edward; and the Presbyterians, who desired a simpler form of worship and government, like that set up by Calvin in Geneva. The first adherents of this form of Church government in England were those Protestants who returned from Frankfurt, to which place they had fled for refuge in the reign of queen Mary. There they became acquainted with the Geneva platform, and, returning to their native country in the time of Elizabeth, they at first met in private houses, and afterwards more publicly, on which occasions the worship was conducted agreeably to the forms of the Geneva service. The Puritans who were called Nonconformists were averse from the established liturgy and hierarchy, and Puritans, from their anxiety for purity of life and worship. At the Convocation in 1562, the proposition to dispense with all ceremonies that had not the clear warrant of Scripture was lost by only one vote. Hallam says that the Puritan party outnumbered either the Roman Catholic or the Church of England, and that they composed the majority of Parliament under Elizabeth and her two successors (Const. Hist. Engl. ch. iv. v.). See PURITANS. They were taken up at the time of the vindication of doctrine and discipline, and with resistance to power expressed, as they believed, contrary to the Word of God. But they felt so much the constraint of circumstances, that they paid little heed to the development of their principles in Church government, and certainly had no thought of attempting to constitute a Church on the principles which they maintained, resting satisfied in giving effect to those principles by mere resistance in particular cases in which their consciences were aggrieved. Yet in 1572 a presbytery was formed at Westminster by a number of ministers and laymen, separating from the Church of England; and other presbyteries were soon formed, notwithstanding the extreme hostility of queen Elizabeth. Synods were now held occasionally. The court, looking to the episcopate as the support of its own supremacy, strove with great perseverance to supplant the presbyteries, and enforced with reckless energy the bloody laws enacted against the Catholics on one side and the radical Protestant sects on the other. The king having established a liturgy calculated to set limits to the arbitrary freedom of Puritan worship, the Presbyterians set it down as "worship of Baal" and a quenching of the Spirit of God. The dissension threatened to take the form of civil war, for the Presbyterians of England united with those of Scotland. On July 1, 1643, in obedience to a summons from Parliament (which summons had been issued in consequence of a remonstrance of the Presbyterian divines against prelacy), the Westminster Assembly met in Westminster Abbey. This Assembly was composed of 121 English divines, 10 lords, 20 commoners, with 5 ministers and 5 elders representing the Church of Scotland, and 2 ministers and 3 elders known as the Westminster Confession, a Form of Church Government, a Directory for Public Worship, and two Catechisms, the Larger and the Shorter, which were all approved by Parliament in 1648. Parliament then enacted an ordinance making Presbyterians the established religion of England, without admitting any penalties to nonconformity. A loud cry has been raised against the English Presbyterians on the alleged ground that, at this period of their history, their whole efforts were directed towards the attainment of Church power. "Now, what was this Church power," says the younger M'Crie, "which the Presbyterians in England were for so long time so anxious to secure, and which Neil would represent as 'a civil authority over men's persons and properties'? Will it be believed that it was neither more nor less than the power of keeping back scandalous and unworthy persons from the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper? This was, in fact, the great point in dispute between them and the Parliament; for the Parliament had insisted on having the supreme power in ecclesiastical matters, and had passed a law to the effect that if any person were refused admission to sealing ordinances by the Church courts, he might appeal to Parliament, which might, by virtue of its authority, compel the Church courts to receive him, whatever his character might be. The Presbyterians, as Neil himself admits, 'were dissatisfied with the men in power, because they would not leave the Church of England independent'; and would Mr. Neil himself an independent, have had the Church to be dependent on the State? Would he have had the Presbyterians tamely submit to see the royal prerogatives of Christ assumed by a Parliament, after they had succeeded in wresting them out of the hands of a monarch, for the benefit of whom, for a time, the nation had long been engaged in a bloody war?" The ordinance which they had secured from Parliament in 1648, however, never went into practical operation, for as soon as Cromwell and the Independents rose into power, they showed an uncompromising hostility to the Presbyterians. This was partly owing to the resistance the latter had made to the trial and execution of Charles I, inasmuch that they had to be driven out of the House of Commons by force before those measures could be effectual. The city and its neighborhood were, meanwhile, formed into twelve prebendaries surrounding the Provincial Synod of London, which continued to hold regular half-yearly meetings till 1655, the meetings of presbyteries being continued till a later date; but the whole Presbyterian system was overturned by Cromwell's Committee of Triers, composed of thirty-eight persons of different sects, who were appointed in place of the Assembly for the examining and approving of all persons elected or nominated to any ecclesiastical office. Cromwell's policy aimed at bringing all ecclesiastical matters under the immediate control of the civil power. On the Restoration, Charles II no sooner found himself firmly seated on the throne than he proved false to the Solemn League and Covenant which he had sworn to observe, restored prelacy to its former power, and gave up the Presbyterian, who had fought for his return to persecution. The fruitless Savoy Conference (q. v.) was followed by the Act of Uniformity, which was carried into effect on St. Bartholomew's Day, Aug. 24, 1662. Two thousand conscientious ministers who would not consent to be reduced to the Book of Common Prayer, or to abjure the Solemn League and Covenant, were then ejected from their benefices, and wandered forth to a life of poverty. Sixty thousand of the laity were imprisoned or fined, 5000 of whom died in prison, and the fines, confiscations, and other consequent losses of property amounted to £2,000,000 sterling. See NONCONFORMISTS.

After the Revolution, and the passage of the Act of Toleration in 1689, Presbyterianism revived, chapels sprang up in every part of the kingdom, and within twenty-five years the Presbyterians numbered 800 congregations. They became one of the "three denominations" which received the recognition of the State and were permitted to petition the crown in a corporate capacity, and in the business meetings of deputies from these denominations the Presbyterians numbered two representatives for every Baptist and one Independent. Prosperity, however, proved more injurious than per-section, and there was an abatement of zeal and spirituality. Besides this, another cause operated disastrously. In 1691 the Presbyterians were induced to enter into union with the Independents. As a consequence, Presbyterian discipline began to be relaxed, the system was not carried out, the office of ruling elder was allowed to be dropped, the disuse of Church sessions naturally followed, presbyteries and synods were given up, the churches became virtually independent, and Presbyterianism and the members of the Church of England were allowed not to attend the meetings of the Church. The consequence of the union was a weakening of the discipline of the Church. The negotiations with the Independents had been occupied. The expenditures of the Foreign Mission Committee had been £28,694.

The schemes of the Church, placed under the charge of standing committees, are as follows:

1. Home Missions, including Church Extension, Evangelization, Temperance.

2. Foreign Missions.—Principally in China, where there are 15 European missionaries and 85 native evangelists. In 1876, 258 congregations, distributed into 10 presbyteries, with a membership of 25,740 communicants. The entire income of the Church during that year, both congregational and synodical, inclusive of £6,219.2s. from special sources, was £137,055.

3. Jewish Mission. —The sphere of this work, with one missionary, the Rev. Thomas Meyer, in London. There is a mission-hall, with reading-room. The means used are domestic visitations, public meetings in the hall, prayer-meetings, and meetings with inquirers. Thirty-seven Jews, besides casual inquirers, were more or less under regular instruction in 1877. There were three baptisms.

4. Education. —A theological seminary is maintained in London. It has three professors, the Revs. Dr. Lochner, Dr. Muir, and Mr. Mac. A generous member of the Church, H. Barbour, Esq., of Manchester, having made provision for the endowment of an additional chair, the Church is taking steps for making appointment of another professor in 1878. The committee has assumed the charge of arts and sciences, and is adding a number of schools, especially in rural districts.

5. Sabbath-schools. —The committee reported to the Synod in 1877 848 schools, 5892 teachers, 5,185 scholars on the roll, of whom 29,721 are children of parents belonging to the Church, and 4510 are in senior classes. Much Christian work is done among the young by other means.

6. Sustentation Fund. —This was a scheme in operation, at the date of the union, in the Presbyterian Church in England only—the United Presbyterian Church adding its weaker congregations by another plan. This necessitates now some transitional and imperfect action. The equal dividend for last year to the congregations on the fund was £200, raising the minimum ministerial stipend to that amount. The whole sum paid as salaries was £65,214, of which forty per cent. passed through this fund.

7. Publications. —This committee issues the Messenger and Children's Messenger, monthly periodicals of the Church, and during the past year has prepared a memorial volume containing records of the union. It contemplates the continuance of instructional manuals, of which two have been published for the use of the Church.

Other provisions are: (a) Widows and Orphans...
7. Presbyterians in Ireland.—In Ireland as well as in England there was a strong Puritan section of the clergy holding Presbyterian principles during the earlier years of the 17th century, and the party was considerably strengthened by the settlement of Ulster by Scottish colonists during the reign of James I. Scottish ministers also carried over to Ireland their peculiar views. But the Presbyterian party was not consolidated into a separate denomination until the Civil War broke out in 1641. The first Presbyterian minister who appeared in Ireland after the Reformation was the Rev. Walter Travers, the first regular provost of Trinity College, Dublin. He entered on his official duties in 1644; but, owing to the civil war in which the country was then involved, he did not remain long at the head of the university. Of those ministers who went to Ireland in the reign of James I, the earliest was Mr. Edward Brice, who became rector of Templecorran, near Carrickfergus, in the county of Antrim. About that time a number of Scotch-merchants settled in Ulster, who applied for the presbyteries, which had been brought up in the Presbyterian Church, and who had themselves been originally ordained by presbyters, were not at first disposed to exact conformity to the Episcopal ritual from the Scottish ministers settled around them. Thus it was that the ministers, though refusing to use the Liturgy, were permitted to preach in the parish churches and enjoy the tithes. But when the imperious Wentworth was placed at the head of the government of Ireland, a new policy was inaugurated. All the clergy were obliged to strict conformity; and in a short time the Presbyterians were driven into exile. At the time of the horrid massacre in 1641, not one of them was in the country. Thus they most providentially escaped that catastrophe. In 1662, when a Scottish army arrived in Ulster to put down the rebellion, Presbyterians obtained a permanent footing in Ireland, and, after various struggles, a Presbyterian Church was founded by the formation of a presbytery at Carrickfergus on the 10th of June, 1662. The Presbyterian population of Ulster was greatly increased in number by immigration from Scotland about the middle of the century, and the Presbyterians were driven into exile, from the opposition of presbyters and of the civil power, the Church continued to increase. While the civil war was going on in Scotland great numbers of the Scotch emigrated to the north of Ireland, and these made the country stronger than the Presbyterian population, a strong bond being also established between the two communions. For a time their ministers in Ireland were silenced by Cromwell because they refused to take the &quot;engagement&quot; of fidelity to the commonwealth; but for the last five or six years of his administration he had the Presbyterians of Ireland on a time of the Restoration, 1660. For the restored period, however, was not again ceased to be expected by the Presbyterian ministers. In the reign of William the regime dominus was augmented, although only to the paltry amount in all of £1000 a year. The sum has since, however, been repeatedly augmented. With the disestablishment of the Episcopal Church of Ireland, under Queen Anne's ministry, the regime dominus was discontinued, and the Presbyterian Church of Ireland is entirely relieved from state dependence. It was valued at fourteen years' purchase, and the sum of nearly £60,000 was paid over therefor, thus securing to the Ulster ministry a yearly income of £3000, a year of interest. In 1710 the synod of the Presbyterian Church resolved to institute the preaching of the Gospel to the Irish in their own language. During this period of its history the Irish Presbyterian Church experienced the utmost opposition from the High-Church party. Afterward the divisions raged up and down of it, and these with reference to the most important doctrines. Irish Presbyterians could not escape the influence of the latitudinarian spirit which prevailed during the 18th century. Early in the reign of George I, some of their ministers began to speak ambiguously on doctrinal subjects, and to oppose subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith. In consequence, in 1726, a schism took place among them, and the non-subscribers formed themselves into what was called &quot;The Presbytery of Antrim.&quot; The separatists did not obtain much support from the mass of the Presbyterian population; but not a few who remained connected with the larger body, known as &quot;The Synod of Ulster,&quot; exhibited very little zeal in upholding and propagating the sound theology of their forerunners. Meanwhile the Scotch Seeders, who during the latter part of the 18th century, did much to maintain purity of doctrine in the Northern province. Their congregations rapidly multiplied, and within little more than sixty years after the organization of their first church, there were upwards of ninety Secession ministers in Ulster. In 1781 the Rev. Matthew Lynd, the first Irish Convening minister, was ordained at Vow, near Rhasarin, in the county of Antrim. Owing very much to the growing laxity of doctrine and discipline in the Synod of Ulster, the Covenanters, or Reformed Presbyterians, in the northern province of Ireland, in the 18th century, to make steady progress; and in 1792 their first Irish Presbytery was constituted. But early in the present century indications of a religious revival appeared in the Synod of Ulster, and when Arianism was openly avowed an earnest protest was raised against it. In 1829 the Arian controversy issued in the excommunication of the Unitarians from the great Northern Synod, and immediately afterwards the Irish Presbyterian Church, as if invigorated with new life, commenced a prosperous career. Its congregations rapidly increased; its ministers exhibited, in the face of many difficulties and trials, the most strenuous spirit, and them attracted attention all over the empire as platform-speakers and pulpit orators. In 1835 the Synod of Ulster adopted an overture requiring unqualified subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith from all the members of the Presbyterian ministry; and as the grounds of separation between this body and the Secession Synod were now removed, a union between them was happily consummated in 1840. The united body, which assumed the designation of &quot;The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland,&quot; consisted, at the time of its first session in the year 1843, of 485 Presbyterians. Ever since the date of this union, the Irish Presbyterian Church has occupied a more commanding position in the country. It has at present under its care about half a million of people, including a large proportion of the substantial farmers and merchants of Ulster. Very few of the aristocracy were ever attached to it; but of late its members have been advancing steadily in social position; and at the present time it has in its communion seven members of Parliament, several considerable landed proprietors, and many gentlemen holding the commissions of the Privy Council, and publicly paid, as well as many of the clergy. The Remonstrant or Arian body has not increased in like proportion. After their withdrawal from the orthodox majority in 1829, the Unitarians formed themselves into an association which assumed the name of &quot;The Remonstrant Synod of Ulster.&quot; This body has since maintained a tolerating existence in the north of Ireland; but doctrinal laxity does not flourish among Presbyterians; and though the Unitarians can reckon some forty congregations in the island, their numbers, including the remainder of the Presbytery of Antrim, amount, according to the government census of 1871, only to 3973 individuals.

The Covenanters, or Reformed Presbyterians, who are all strict Calvinists, are considerably more numerous. There are besides a few congregations in Ireland connected with the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, as well as a few others known by the designation of Seceders; but they form a very small item in the national census. The Irish Presbyterian Church now consists of about 600 congregations, and has not only dissolved the connection of Presbyterianism in Ireland, but also of Christianity in other parts of the world. Immediately after its formation, the General Assembly inaugurated a Foreign Mission. India was selected as the scene of its missionary operations, and its agents have ever since been laboring there with encouraging success in Gujarat and Katiavvar. Connected with it are now 10 ordained European missionaries, assisted by a staff of native catechists, colporteurs, and school-teachers. Within the year 1872 the mission and the total number connected with the native Church amounted to 2158 individuals. The mission has been maintained during the year 1888 at an expense of £13,654. Its operations have been recently extended to China, where three mission stations have been established. In 1876 the mission the Presbyterian Church of Ireland supports a Jewish mission, a Continental and Colonial mission, and a mission for Soldiers and Sailors. In 1876 the Presbyterian Church in Ireland reported five synods, thirty-six presbyteries, 639 ministers, 74,445 families, and 107,362 communicants. The subscription fund amounted to £122,000; the total ministerial income for the previous year was £518,000. The average salary of the ministers was £870. In the schools of the National Board of Education, the Presbyterian children, in 1874, numbered 115,558, equal to about 11 per cent. A Presbyterian college (Magee College) was opened at Londonderry Oct. 10, 1865. In 1846, Mrs. Magee, widow of the Rev. William Magee, a Presbyterian minister, left £20,000 in trust for the erection and endowment of a Presbyterian college. This sum was so large as to accumulate in some years, until eventually the trustees were authorized, by a decree of the lord-chancellor, to select a convenient site at or near Londonderry. The Irish Society have granted an annual endowment of £250 to the chair of natural philosophy and mathematics, and £250 for five years towards the maintenance of six professors, at £250 each, leaving £500 to defray the expense of management. The government, on the passing of the act, granted a sum of £4,376 as compensation; and the interest of this sum, together with that at £3000 subscribed by friends of the institution, made up the annual income. Patrons have recently added prizes, worth from £20 to £50 per annum. A most valuable agency sustained by the Church and of comparatively recent establishment is the Orphan Society, which already supports 2400 poor children deprived of one or both of their parents, and has an annual revenue of about £2900. See Ireland.

8. PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD OF SIECEDERS IN IRELAND.

This denomination of Christians was formed by a union, which was effected in 1818, between the two sections of the Synod of Scotland in Ireland, the Burgbiers, and the Free and Antiburghers. For a hundred years previous to the present century negotiations had been carried on with a view to the accomplishment of this most desirable object; but such negotiations had uniformly failed, from the circumstance that the Antiburghers, who were subject to the general synod in Scotland, had been prevented by that court from taking effectual steps in the matter. At length, however, they resolved to act independently of the Scotch judicator, and the two synods of Seceders in Ireland, having agreed upon a basis of union, met at Cookstown July 9, 1818, and formed themselves into one body under the designation of The Presbyterian Synod of Ireland, distinguished by the name Seceders. The ministers of the united synod at this period amounted in number to 97. The basis on which the union rested consisted of the six following points:

1. To declare their constant and inviolable attachment to their ancient and recognised Presbyterian Church. From the same motive, the Westminster Confession of Faith, Larger and Shorter Catechisms, and the Directory for Worship, are adopted as the fundamental articles of the Presbyterian Church government, with the Original Scots Testimony.

2. That, as they unite under the banner of a testimony, they are determined, in all times coming, as their forerunners have set them the example, to assert the truth when it is injured or profaned, and to contend for it against error and immorality whenever they may seem to prevail.

3. To cancel the name of Burgher and Antiburgher forever, and to unite the two synods into one, to be known by the name, The Presbyterian Synod of Ireland, distinguished by the name Seceders.

4. To declare their unqualified submission to the General Synod of the Church of Scotland, at the same time they do hereby signify their hearty inclination to hold a correspondence with their sister Church in Scotland or elsewhere, for their mutual edification; but think it expedient not to lay themselves under any restrictions as to the manner of said correspondence.

5. To allow all the presbyteries and congregations in their connection to bear the same name, and, in the meantime, stand as they were before the constitution.

6. Carefully to preserve all the public records of the two synods from their formation in this kingdom till the present day.

This union was the means of imparting considerable strength and vigor to the Secession Church in Ireland. A home mission was now commenced, and the cause of Presbyterianism began to flourish in various towns and villages where it had hitherto unknown. The session of the grand assembly of the whole province of the Synod of Ireland, held at Edinburg, was by a high regard to purity of doctrine and the advancement of vital religion. The Irish Presbyterian Church, on the contrary, had long been hindered in its progress by the prevalence of Arian and Socinian doctrines, both among its ministers and people. By the division, however, they were at length enabled to rid themselves of the New-Light party; and, to secure uniformity of teaching in the Church, they passed an overture requiring absolute subscription to the Confession of Faith. The general synod was now, in almost all respects, assimilated to the Irish Secession Church, and the proposal of a union between the two was seriously entertained. An arrangement in regard to the regium domus made in 1838 paved the way for its completion, government having in that year agreed to equalize the bounty, and on certain conditions to grant £75, late Irish currency, per annum, to every minister connected with the two synods. Being thus placed on an equal footing by the government, and agreed both in doctrine and Church polity, the great obstacles to a complete incorporation of the two churches were removed.
established among themselves a united prayer-meeting. The desire for union, and a strong feeling of its propriety, rapidly spread both among ministers and people. Memorials on the subject, accordingly, were presented to the Synod of Ulster, and the Secession Synod, at their respective meetings in 1689. Committees were appointed by these bodies, respectively, to talk with the rulers of the two secessions, and the preliminaries and other matters of the union were a great deal considered and preliminarily adjusted, the final act of incorporation took place at Belfast, on July 10, 1840, the united body taking itself the name of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. See IRELAND.

9. Wesleyan Calvinistic Methodists.—This body of believers is sometimes ranked among Presbyterians, because its form of Church government is a modified Presbyterianism. Each Church manages its own affairs, admits or expels members by the vote of the majority of those who belong to it, but this is rather Congregational than Presbyterian. It, however, allows an appeal from the decision of the individual Church to the monthly meeting of the county or presbytery to which it belongs, and then there is an appeal from the monthly meeting to the quarterly association of the province. Meetings are held for instruction and study, and for the discussion of topics relating to South Wales by the South Wales Association, and so of the North; but a few years ago a General Assembly of the whole connection was established, and the two associations may agree to refer matters to that body, which has the final decision. Its Confession of Faith is, of course, strictly Calvinistic. See Methodism (Vol. vi, p. 156, col. 6).

10. Presbyterian Church in the United States.—The denomination commonly known by this name, both on account of its numerical superiority and its priority of organization, derived its origin from the Presbyterians of Scotland and Ireland, and particularly the latter, with a considerable infusion of French Huguenots, Dutch and German Reformed emigrants. Many fugitives from persecution in the mother country took refuge in American colonies, in New England, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, New Jersey, Virginia, and the Carolinas. Francis Makemie, who may be called the founder of American Presbyterianism, was an Irishman, who several years before the close of the 17th century had gathered churches in Maryland. For several years before the organization of the first presbytery, his most intimate ministerial friend was Jedediah Andrews. The earliest traces of Church organizations of a trustworthy character indicate a congregation gathered in Upper Marlborough, Md., in 1698, and others collected by Mr. Makemie in Maryland in 1699, and the first Presbyterian Church organized in the United States as early as 1684—one in Freehold, N.J., called the Scotch Meeting-house, in 1692; and one in Philadelphia, under the care of Mr. Andrews, in 1698. The Presbyterian of Philadelphia is supposed to have been formed about the year 1705, if not before, this uncertainty arising from the first page of the manuscript minutes being lost. It was composed of seven ministers—Samuel Davis, John Hampton, Francis Makemie, and George McNish, from Ireland; Nathaniel Taylor and John Wilson, from Scotland; and Jedediah Andrews, from New England. The growth was rapid, and the formation of the Synod of Philadelphia, consisting of three presbyteries. The presbytery of Philadelphia had six ministers and six churches; that of New Castle six ministers and churches; that of Snowhill three ministers and churches; and that of Long Island two ministers and several churches—in all twenty-three ministers and more than that number of congregations. The Adopting Act was passed in 1729, designed to announce the Westminster Confession and Catechisms as the standards of the Church more formally than had ever been done. The history of this act has been of late years sharply discussed. It may be found in the printed minutes. It was a compromise measure accepted in consequence of the agitation which had been occasioned by the Irish presbytery. These had been in the midst of an exciting controversy against the introduction of Arian principles into the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, and had come over determined to suffer no loosening of subscription to the standards of faith. The Adopting Act occasioned, therefore, not a little controversy. The non-subscribers in sentiment disliked even the general terms of the Adopting Act, while the others were divided as to whether the act had been fully carried out. Though the measure was finally compromised, it failed to set differences at rest. They continued to develop, and became manifest in connection with certain synodical action on ministerial education, and ripened into a schism until they resulted in one or two secessions, which prepared the way for the establishment in this country of a branch of the Associate Presbyterian Church. In 1738, party feelings were revived by the visit of Whitefield, and the synod was divided into those who were known as friends or enemies of the revival. By 1741 the controversy resulted in a schism, by which the body was rent into two synods—that of the Old Side party, called the Synod of Philadelphia; that of the New, called the Synod of New York. The principal cause of the division was the insisting of the Old Side on a thorough and unqualified Calvinistic orthodoxy on the stress on pietistic zeal. There was no difference of opinion as to doctrine or discipline. Gilbert Tennent, the friend of Whitefield, was the leader and master-spirit of the New branch, and published several sermons, addresses, and pamphlets in the course of seventeen years, to the renovation of thirteen years, passion and party feeling cooled down, the leaders were disposed to make mutual concessions, past errors and mistakes were frankly confessed, and the two synods became again united, May 29, 1756, under the style and title of "the Synod of New York and Philadelphia," comprising ninety-four ministers. During the half century of existence that had now closed, the Church had taken some important steps. It had committed itself, for instance, to a polity distinctly Presbyterian, it had adopted Calvinistic doctrinal standards, and had set up a high standard of ministerial education. Nor were these things needless, or done too soon. A stream of population was rapidly flowing westward, having on its front line settlers of very diverse characters. Some were men of such lawless habits that they could no longer stay in orderly communities; others loved the wild excitments of frontier life, and others thought only of bettering their temporal condition by obtaining homes in the new lands. All classes were very poor. Indians were numerous, causing the preacher to carry his rifle as well as his Bible—while State and Church opposed the extension of the work of the Presbyterian evangelist. Only men of education—men of energy, full of zeal and of varied resource, could have even held their own in the face of such hindrances. Such men the Presbyterian Church desired to have in its ministry, nor desired in vain. Many of its early preachers—the Tennents of New Jersey, Braintree of the Indian Mission, Davies of Virginia, and a host of others, have been pre-eminent for ministerial efficiency, and will assuredly be held in everlasting remembrance. While the Church was thus supplying the Gospel in every direction, it was also spreading by a rapid influx of persons in every direction, it was led to enter into such relations with the Congregationalists as materially influenced its after-course. For some years before the Revolution, the Colonial Episcopal Church had sought to obtain a legal establishment. Fearing the success of this aim, the synod agreed in 1766 to meet in annual convention with the General Association of Connecticut, "to unite their endeavors and counsels for spreading the Gospel and preserving the religious liberties of the churches." This arrangement was carried out until the outbreak of war in 1776 which interrupted the plan.

When the war of the Revolution broke out, the Presbyterians, to a man, arrayed themselves on the side of the patriots—which may, at least in part, be explained by the fear, which they shared in common with the Congregationalists of New England, that there was a design to introduce bishops and establish an oppressive and odious hierarchy in the colonies. During the Revolutionary war, in common with all religious interests, the Presbyterian churches and their church buildings were destroyed, and not a few congregations disorganized, yet its vitality remained unbroken. Rallying quickly on the return of peace, new interest in religious ordinances was manifested by the people, and synodical meetings were better attended by the ministers.

In 1785, steps were taken for revising the standards of the Church and organizing a General Assembly. A committee consisting of Drs. Witherspoon, Rodgers, Robert Smith, Patrick Allain, Samuel Stanhope Smith, John Farrar, Robert Cooley, James Madison, the George Duffield, and Matthew Wilson, was appointed "to take into consideration the constitution of the Church of Scotland and other Protestant churches," and to form a complete system for the organization of the Presbyterian Church in the United States. In May, 1786, the Synod convened and resolved itself into a General Assembly, which had its first meeting the following year, embracing four synods (New York and New Jersey, Philadelphia, Virginia, and the Carolinas), 17 presbyteries, 419 presbyters, 790 elders, and 809 ministers. The Westminster Confession of Faith was adopted with three slight alterations (in chapters xx., xxxii., and xxxvi.), and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms with but a single alteration, while the form of government and discipline of the Scottish Church was so modified as to discountenance the right of the civil magistrate to interfere in the affairs of the Church except for the purpose of protection alone. Shortly after the war, the Presbyterian ministers renewed their friendly relations with the Congregationalists. In 1792 the General Assembly and the Association of Connecticut agreed that each denomination should be represented in the annual meetings of the other by three commissioners, an agreement that afterwards embraced the general associations of Vermont, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts. In 1794 these representatives were allowed to vote on all matters under discussion. All these measures prepared the way for the adoption, in 1801, by both parties of the "Plan of Union." Under this arrangement a congregation, in polity, might have installed as its pastor a Presbyterian minister who still retained his seat and was represented thereto, and be itself represented in that court not by an elder, but by a commissioner or delegate chosen from its membership. On the other hand, a congregation Presbyterian in its polity, connected with a presbytery and represented therein by an elder, might have vested its whole property and authority as a congregation in the hands of a Presbyterian minister who remained a member of some Congregational association.

This procedure was the fruit partly of the co-operations of the previous years, but it made Presbyterianism less systematic in its movements and less submissive in its administration, as shall presently be seen.

During the earlier years of the present century, there appeared in the southern and western portions of the Church striking manifestations of religious interest, having, in many cases, singular physical accompaniments. In connection with these, zeal outstripped discretion; strange doctrines were soon taught; presbyterian order was violated, and confusion became widespread. Ultimately those things led to the withdrawal of some of the offenders and the removal of others from the Presbyterian Church, and the formation in 1811 of what is now known as "The Cumberland Presbyterian Church." (See No. 11 below.)

The increase of the Church was rapid, and by 1884 it contained 22 synods, 111 presbyteries, and about 1900 ministers. But only four years later (in 1888) Presbyterianism encountered a severe reverse by a widespread schism, for which the materials had been gathering for several years. In 1822, the Synod of the Associate Reformed Church having been brought, under the lead of Dr. John M. Mason, to favor union with the Presbyterian Church, that union took place; but a very considerable minority refused to acquiesce in the measure, and the church was split into two. In the fifteen years that followed, the growth of the Church was unprecedentedly rapid. New churches and presbyteries were multiplied in the Middle and Western States. Already measures had been adopted (1812) which resulted in establishing Princeton Seminary, Union Seminary in Virginia, and, though unenforced, the Southern and Western at Maryville, Tenn. Auburn followed in 1816; the Western at Allegheny City and Lane at Cincinnati in 1827-29; Columbia, S.C., and Danville, Ky., in 1828; and Union at New York in 1835. The accession from New England to the West in full career, the sympathy of the Presbyterian Church, were provided for by the "Plan of Union" agreed to by the General Association of the Presbyterian and the General Assembly in 1801. It aimed to secure the rights and the harmonious co-operation of two denominations of the same field. For nearly a quarter of a century no fault was found with it; but it led to the representation in Presbyterian and General Assembly of committees of communion from Congregational churches, and these were found to be favor volently an impositions in the assembly's control. Of these societies, that for home missions, within a few years after its organization in 1826, had several hundred missionaries under its patronage. Most of these were from New England, and many of them were alike opposed to Church boards and in sympathy with the "New Haven theology." Parties were thus formed in the Church, and the agitation on the subject of slavery, springing up at that time, tended to increase the alienation.

The crisis came in 1837. Two parties were arrayed against each other, and the Church was divided. In general, it may perhaps be said that the division was one of sentiment between the more progressive and the more conservative members of the Church. In the Old there was more of a leaning to the strict views of the Scotch Church on doctrine and discipline; in the New, the preference was as decidedly in favor of the laxer and more latitudinarian practice of New England, from which region many of the party had originally come. The New Lights wished to bear a decided testimony against slavery; the Old Lights thought that duty did not require any such action of the Church on that subject; the former wished to unite with other denominations in Christian work through voluntary societies; the latter believed that such work could be more efficiently and economically conducted by their denomination through boards which should be sustained as an organ of the Church. All these considerings and heart-burnings now prevailed; the General Assembly was an arena of constant strife; each party, as it obtained an accidental majority, set itself to work to nullify the measures of its opponents. The Old School made ineffectual attempts to try and contain the Dr. Dabney, Beecher, and Duffield for publishing heterodox opinions; the New School stood up for "substance of doctrine," and for the Great Voluntary or National Societies in opposition to denominational action. Confident in superior numbers and strategy, the latter anticipated an easy victory, and refused any concessions. The Old School, crippled on every side, and chagrined at being cast into the shade, held conventions to decide upon their future course. In 1838 appeared "The Act and Testimony," drafted by Rev. Robert J. Breckinridge, denouncing the increasing of doctrinal errors, the relaxation of discipline, and the violation of Church order. The signatures amounted to 2075. In 1837 another convention, meeting a week before the General Assembly, prepared a testimony and memorial to be laid before the Assembly, in which they testified against the sixteenth doctrinal errors having been in the Presbyterian order, and five declensions in Christian discipline, and proposed a method of reform. The Old-School... party, finding themselves that year (the first for five years) in the majority, adopted the suggestions of the memorial as a basis of action, and pressed matters to a speedy issue. The Board of Foreign Missions, dissolved the Elective Affinity Presbytery, abrogated the Plan of Union of 1801 with the Congregational bodies, and disowned (or, as the New-School party termed it, excised) the four synods of (Genessy, Geneva, Utica, and Western Reserve as un-Presbyterian in their character); and the next year (1858) both parties made strenuous exertions for the ascendancy in the Assembly. Upon calling the roll, it was found that the delegates from the four synods were not recognized, nor would the moderator, Dr. Elliott, entertain any motion in their behalf. Hereupon, according to a concerted plan, the commissioners from the four synods and those who sympathized with them protested against the moderator's decision, and proceeded to make a new organization and elect new officers, after which they withdrew in a body to another place, and there held their sittings as the true Constitutional Assembly, and, among other things, elected several trustees of the property of the corporation. These trustees, being subsequently refused admission into the board, instituted legal proceedings, and received a verdict in their favor. The case being taken up by the Court of Chancery of the State of Pennsylvania, Chief Justice Gibson ordered a new trial. This, however, was never had, the rulings being such as to completely set aside the decision of Judge Rogers in the inferior court, and after a few years the suit was withdrawn. The New School later satisfied the moral effects of the trial, and with a later decision of the chief justice in the York case. The two bodies went on as separate denominations, though each claimed to have the genuine constitutional succession, and employed the same style and title, "The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America." Both of these churches were extended over the whole of the United States, and both of them had missions in different parts of the heathen world, their collections for missions forming a large part of the contributions for that object from the United States of America. The Old-School Presbyterians possessed the following theological seminaries: Princeton (Princeton, N.J.), Western (Allegheny City, Pa.), Columbia (Columbia, S.C.), Danville (Danville, Ky.), and North-west (Chicago, Ill.). The New-School Presbyterians held the Union College, a seminary in New York; Lane Seminary (Cincinnati, O.), Blackburn (Carlinville, Ill.), and Lind (Chicago, Ill.). The Old and New School Presbyterian churches were reunited in 1871. At that time the former comprised 2281 ministers, 7240 churches, and 258,568 communicants, the latter 1268 ministers, 1681 churches, and 172,560 communicants.

The theological history of the Old-School Presbyterian Church for the thirty-two years of its separate existence may be presented in a very few words. It was left by the separation in a state of almost unprecedented doctrinal homogeneity. One may well doubt whether any other Christian communion of equal size has ever excelled it as to unity in the reception of an evangelical creed of such extent as the Westminster Confession and Catechisms. Differences of opinion, even among its ministers, have, of course, existed; but these differences were comparatively trifling, or of very little prominence or prevalence. If in any quarter serious error was adopted, for the most part it must have been kept secret, or have been known to but a few. No agitating discipline on this ground was exercised, or, to the knowledge of any student of theSynodology," as it has often been called, was, beyond question, almost universally prevalent among the Old-School Presbyterians. If opposing systems must take a modern nomenclature, there may be no harm in making Presbyterianism the synonym of the Synod of the Old and the New Divinity: but it should be remembered that the text-books of Princeton have certainly been the simple Westminster symbols, and such long and generally approved systematic presentations of the reformed theology as the 'Instituto Theologia Elenchi' or 'Synopsis'. The Synod of Philadelphia has been slow to admit the idea of any possible improvement in the generally received system of Gospel truth. Recognizing fully the recent progress made in Biblical criticism and exegesis—the fact, too, that from time to time fuller and more exact statements of Christian doctrine may be arrived at, elaborated and by no means maintaining that any uninspired man has been wholly free from error, they have, nevertheless, rejected with singular unanimity the assumption that any part of the substance of the Gospel had lain hidden in Holy Scripture until modern times, or that the Church of Christ has new discoveries to make as to the system of truth in Jesus. A well-known Presbyterian quarterly publication—one identified with it from the beginning—has lately said, "It has been the honest endeavor of its conductors to exhibit and defend the doctrines of our standards, under the shield of Francis' book: it is the doctrine of the Synod of Philadelphia and it has produced within the time period so many theological books of standard value. A deep conviction of the Church's duty to carry on, through strictly ecclesiastical agencies, the work of foreign missions, had led the Synod of Pittsburgh, as early as 1831, to organize itself for this purpose as the Western Foreign Missionary Society. The New School had refused to consummate the desires and plans of the Old, by taking this enterprise under the care of the whole Church; but the Assembly of 1837 accepted the trust, establishing in New York City the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. The Board of Publication was appointed, to which were transferred the property and business of the Presbyterian Tract and Sabbath-school Book Society, organized by the Synod of Philadelphia a few years before. The Assembly of 1839, then, having having now, in 1838, the building of Synodical Hall, and the Board of Missions, this supreme judiciary had first convened, recommend ed the second Sabbath of December for a semi-centenary celebration, a day of jubilee and thanksgiving for past mercies, and the offering at that time, by all the members of the Church, of gifts for the endowment of the new board. The fund raised reached the sum of $40,000. This sum, with about $22,000 donated for building purposes a few years later, has been the nucleus of all that board's permanent property. Before the division, two boards had been organized—the Board of Missions, now of Domestic Missions, for the home work, in 1816; and, in 1819, the Board of Education, to aid candidates for the ministry; both located in Philadelphia. These had been fostered by the Old School, while, as a party, the New School had preferred the American Home Missionary Society and the American Education Society, voluntary associations in which Philadelphia had not participated. The Board of Missions had, in 1844, the business of church extension or church erection added to its other operations. This was carried on by a special committee, which, ten years afterwards, for greater effect, was transferred to the Synod. Now a military board of committee of church extension was established at St. Louis, the name of which was changed, in 1860, to that of the Board of Church Building, then the Board of Church Extension. Two other departments of Christian liberty and effort have been committed to similar agencies. For many years and a long while the Presbyterian Church has systematically raised funds for the relief of disabled ministers and their families. But in 1849 the General Assembly ordered collections for this purpose to be disbursed by the Board of Publication, a business transferred in 1862 to its own trustees; and in 1861 a separate department was founded to devote its time mainly to this enterprise, which has since more prosperously advanced. In 1864, the condition of the freedmen at the South demanding immediate attention, two committees—one in Philadelphia, the other in Indianapolis—were organized, and a large amount of educational and evangelistic work among this class; and the next year, in place of the two, a single committee on freedmen was established and located at Pittsburgh. Various arrangements and changes have been made to secure to the boards the advantage of periodical publications to disseminate intelligence of their work through the churches. The latest accounts show a circulation of 16,000 copies of the Monthly Record; nearly 100,000 of the Sabbath-School Visitor of the Month; and 5000 of the pamphlet, with almost 52,000 of the newspaper edition, both published in Philadelphia, besides many thousands of the several yearly reports and of various occasional issues. From about 1849 the project of a weekly religious paper, like the Methodist Advocate, was pressed upon the Assembly for several years successively, but without result. The New School Church has years always acknowledged the unanswerable importance of religious papers, many of which have been established by private enterprise.

The several departments of self-development in the New-School section at the time of union were as follows: (1.) The Presbyterian Committee of Home Missions. "It steadily increased in efficiency. Its receipts the first year were $27,244, and the number of its missionaries 195. In 1889 it had 1629 missionaries and an income of $885,518. Its missionaries reported 1603 new churches formed during the year; 12,000 hopeful conversions, and 10,400 added to the churches on profession of their faith. The freedmen's department, organized in 1865, received and expended during the year 1888 $113,082; and reported 573 teachers employed, 20 of whom are appointed, all in the Southern States. (2.) The "Trustees of the Church Erection Fund," organized in 1854, were incorporated by the Legislature of the State of New York in the year following. The original basis of their operations was the permanent fund of $100,000, raised by contributions from the New-School Church, and intended to be employed in the promotion of the church in the way of loans. The establishment of this fund operated as a strong bond of union in the Church. In the year 1866 the basis was enlarged and an annual contribution and free disbursements were ordered. Since that time this organization has been rapidly growing in importance, and now stands in the very first rank of the evangelizing agencies of the Church. In 1889 it reported an income of $125,205, and number of churches aided 185. (3.) The "Permanent Committee on Education for the Ministry," organized in 1856, came slowly into operation, moulding its plans gradually and embarrassed by the remnants of the old voluntary system. In 1889 its amount to $155,943, and the number of its benefactors—viz., 356 in the theological, 387 in the collegiate, and 59 in the preparatory department. (4.) The "Committee on Doctrinal Tracts," organized in 1852, became the "Presbyterian Publication Committee." In 1889 its income from all sources was $337,787, of which $25,087 was expended in its purely benevolent work. The Trustees of the Presbyterian House, located in Philadelphia, and incorporated by the Legislature of Pennsylvania to care for a valuable property purchased chiefly by donations made by individuals in the city of Philadelphia, now estimated to be worth more than $100,000. Under their charge has been placed the Ministerial Relief Fund, managed by an executive committee of the New School. The contributions for 1864. In 1889 they reported $127,502 received from ordinary sources, and $595,784 as a special donation towards a permanent fund; also 228 disabled ministers, 361 widows, and 33 families of orphans aided. The average age of the ministers was 76 years, and of their widows 82 years. The fund has also sustained a Permanent Committee on Foreign Missions, whose functions were not the raising and distributing of funds or the conducting of reports, but the supervising of the work and reporting the results to the Assembly. From their report in 1889 it appears that contributions for that year to the American Board were, in money, about $707,735, and in labors 71—viz., 52 male and 19 female missionaries. In 1867 the contributions were $110,175; in 1888, $110,602.

The beginning of a theological school for the education of ministers for the Germans, in which instruction is to be given both in German and English, has been made at Bloomfield, N. J., with encouraging success. The periodical literature of the New-School Church deserves honorable mention. Besides other local papers, the American Theological Review, with its warm zeal for Church interests, and the New York Evangelist has done excellent service. Much credit is due to the Presbyterian Reporter, a monthly published at Alton, Ill., for the ability and faithfulness with which it served the interests of the Church in the Northern States. During the ten critical years from 1852 to 1862, the Presbyterian Quarterly Review, ably conducted by an association of ministers in Philadelphia, defended the Church's cause and was an honor to Christian intelligence. The American Theological Review, founded in 1859 on a basis of denominational endorsement, and published with the Presbyterian Review in 1863, combining the names and objects of both, under the charge of the late Prof. H. B. Smith. It was merged in the Princeton Review, published since 1878 in New York City. The New Presbyterian Review was founded in 1890.

Prior to the separation of the Church in 1888, a session had taken place from it in Kentucky (1810), in consequence of a dispute between the Presbyterian of Cumberland, in that state, and the Kentucky Synod of the Presbyterian Church. The Presbyterian Church, on the basis of the ordination of persons who had not passed through the usual educational curriculum, but whose services the Presbytery regarded as demanded for the ministry by the exigencies of the times. In doctrine this branch of the Church does not very materially differ from the New-School Church. In 1854, the ten articles of faith are a modification of the Westminster Confession of Faith. It still exists as a separate organization. (See No. 11 below.)

In 1838 the New School experienced a defection of its Southern adherents. The 1837 the commissioners from the Southern section, who had attended the Assembly at Cleveland, O., proposed to withdraw and constitute the United Synod. This was organized at Knoxville, Tenn., April 2, 1838. In connection with the synod were over 100 ministers and about 200 churches, widely scattered over the Southern States. This body continued a separate organization until Aug. 24, 1854, when it was merged in the General Assembly formed by Southern ministers and churches previously in the Old-School connection. In 1861 the Old School suffered a like defection by the outbreak of the civil war. This defection caused the Southern body of Old-School Presbyterians, aggrieved by the Assembly's resolution on the state of the country, withdrew their connection and united to the organization of a "General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America," Dec. 4, 1861, at Augusta, Ga. The Southern Assembly was reorganized at Montgomery, Ala., May 1, 1862, since which time the meetings of the Assembly have been annually held.
concomitantly with those of the Northern assemblies. In 1876 fraternal relations were sought for the first time between the two bodies. (See No. 17 below.) Presbyterianism has never prevailed extensively in New England; but it has had such a distinct and independent in New England of its peculiarities dates back to about the year 1718, when a large number of Presbyterians, with four ministers, emigrated to this country from the north of Ireland. For some time, in cases of difficulty, the ministers and elders were wont to assemble informally, and hold what might be called pro re nata meetings; and where they were unable to reach a satisfactory result, they sometimes asked advice of the Synod of Ireland. On April 16, 1745, the Rev. Messrs. John Morrice, of Boston; David McGregor, of Londonerry, N. H.; and Ralph Abercombie, of Pelham, with Messrs. Jonathan Andrus of Concord, and John Jemmings and James Hughes, met in Londonerry, and "constituted themselves into a presbytery, to act, as far as their present circumstances will permit them, according to the Word of God and the constitution of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland," and the body so formed was called the Boston Presbytery, and met, according to adjournment, in that town Aug. 19, 1745. From the close of the year 1754 till October, 1770, there is a chasm in the records; but at the last-mentioned period the Presbytery consisted of twelve congregations and as many ministers. At a meeting held in Seaforth, N. H., on May 31, 1776, the Presbytery resolved to divide itself into three distinct bodies, viz., the presbyteries of Salem, of Londonerry, and of Palmer: these were then formed into the Synod of New England, which held its first session at the town of Hookey, Me., on June 27, 1771, a new presbytery was erected called the Presbytery of the Eastward, consisting of three ministers and four ruling elders, representing four churches. It had no connection with the Boston Presbytery, and its origin is said to have been in some way connected with the removal of the Rev. John Murray to Boothbay. It never exhibited on its roll more than eight ministers. Its last recorded adjournment now known was to meet at New Boston, N. H., on the first Wednesday of October, 1792. The only relic of this presbytery preserved to the extent, as far as can be ascertained, printed in 1783, with the following title: Rhet-Kol. A Voice from the Wilderness. Being an humble Attempt to support the sinking Truths of God against some of the principal Errors reigning at this time. Or a Joint Testimony to some of the Grand Articles of the Christian Religion, judiciously delivered to the Churches under their care, By the First Presbytery of the Eastward. In September, 1782, the Synod of New England, finding their numbers considerably reduced in consequence of existing difficulties, agreed to dissolve and form themselves into three separate presbyteries. Each of these years this Presbytery met regularly in Massachusetts proper, but after this its meetings were held in the district of Maine. Its last meeting was held at Gray Sept. 14, 1791. The Third Associate Reformed Presbytery, afterwards called the Associate Reformed Presbytery of Londonerry, was formed in Philadelphia Oct. 31, 1782, and held its first meeting at Londonerry on Feb. 11, 1783. It ceased to belong to its original denomination in 1802, and was thereafter an independent presbytery till 1809, when it was received into the Synod of Albany, and has since continued under the name of the Presbytery of Londonerry. The Presbytery of Newburyport was formed by the concurrent action of the Presbytery of Londonerry and the Synod of Albany. It held its first session in Boston on Oct. 27, 1826, and its last on Oct. 29, 1847, when it became reunited to the Presbytery of Londonderry. The Presbytery of Connecticut, consisting of several ministers and churches previously belonging to the Presbytery of New York, was constituted by the Synod of New York Oct. 15, 1850, and held its first meeting at Thompsville on Oct. 29, 1850. (a) Foreign Missions. The home mission work of the Presbyterian Church may date from the year 1707, when it was resolved "that every minister of the Presbytery supply neighboring destitute places where a minister is wanting and opportunity of doing good offers." Since that period this work has continued to be one of its most important enterprises. At the beginning in the hands of the presbyteries, the Assembly took charge of it in 1802, appointing a "Standing Committee of Missions," to which the presbyteries were to report. During the fourteen years that followed this appointment the Church sent out 511 missionaries, and collected $49,349. In 1810 this committee was changed into a General, "with full power to transact all the business of the missionary cause," reporting annually to the General Assembly. Under this arrangement the home missions of the Church entered on a new course of prosperity. Jabez Chamberlain, Jun., of Northampton, and James Hughes, met in Londonerry, and "constituted themselves into a presbytery, to act, as far as their present circumstances will permit them, according to the Word of God and the constitution of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland," and the body so formed was called the Boston Presbytery, and met, according to adjournment, in that town Aug. 13, 1745. action to that of so-called union societies. Before eighteen months had elapsed, twelve missionaries had been appointed to different fields of heathen labor. In the following year sixteen more were sent out, while $16,246 had been contributed towards their expenses.
In 1837, mission stations in Northern India, West Afrika, Smyrna, China, and among the Indian tribes of the West
were under its charge, conducted by forty-four agents, for whose support $40,266 were contributed during that year. Such results strengthened the hands of those in the Church that desired denominational agencies. In 1837, therefore, the Assembly severed its connection with the American Board, and established its own "Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church," to which the Western society at once transferred all its agencies and property. During the period of the division, the Old-School Assembly extended its foreign mission staff, forming, on heathen soil, synods and presbyteries by means of native converts. The New-School Church at first continued to send its contributions of men and money to the American Board,
but in 1854 appointed a standing committee on missions, changing this in 1855 into a permanent committee, who should "superintend the whole course of for-ign missions in behalf of the Assembly." On the reunion, in 1857, the directors of the two societies were brought together, while the reunited Church received from the American Board a number of mission stations that previously it had sustained.

The Presbyterian Church, from the earliest period, has been an earnest worker and strenuous advocate for education; and one of the chief causes of the secession of the Cumberland branch was the tenacity with which the General Assembly insisted on high educational qualifications for ministers. As early as 1739, a proposition was brought before the Synod of Philadelphia for the erection of a school or seminary of learning. The synod approved of the design and appointed a committee to carry it into effect, and in 1744 a synodical school was established. The College of New Jersey at Princeton, chartered in 1746 and opened in 1747, was founded under the auspices of the Synod of New York. Other institutions have been organized under Presbyterian auspices, as follows: Washington and Jefferson College (Washingon, Pa., 1838), Denison College (Cincinnati, Ohio, 1845), Maryville College (Maryville, Tenn., 1819), College of Danville, Ky., 1823), Hannon College (Hannon, Ind., 1827), Lafayette College (Easton, Pa., 1831), Walash College (Crawfordsville, Ind., 1832), Lincoln University (Oxford, Pa., 1838), University College (San Francisco, Cal., 1859), Blackburn University (Carlinville, Ill., 1867), King College (Bristol, Tenn., 1860), Emory and Henry College (Emory, Va., 1892), and University (Evans, Col., 1874), and Parsons College (Fairfield, la., 1878). Three colleges are jointly under Presbyterian and Congregational control: namely, Knox,
at Galesburg, Ill., 1841; Beloit, at Beloit, Wis., 1847; and Olivet, at Olivet, Mich., 1869. The academies and ladies' colleges under the auspices of the denomination are numerous.

Not until 1812 did the Presbyterian Church make any provision for the theological education of persons seeking the ministry. In that year it organized its first theological seminary, locating it at Princeton, N. J., already well known for its college, which had been founded in 1746. Since then seminaries have been es-tablised in different parts of the country by Presbyterians or by synods. Of these institutions the appointing the professors, the arranging the length of the curricuum, and the prescribing the course of study—the entire control, in fact—has remained in the hands of their founders. This state of things was so unsatisfactory and so unprosbyterian that, on the reunion in 1859, the assembly, in the persons of the directors, resolved, by reserving to themselves the general control, the Assemby should in future have a veto power over the appointment of every professor, and should receive from the directors an annual report of their administration.

The Church has thirteen theological seminaries, as follows: at Princeton, N. J., 1812; at Auburn, N. Y., 1820; Western, Allegheny City, Pa., 1827; Lane, Cincinnati, O., 1832; Union, New York City, 1836; at Danville, Ky., 1839; Theological Seminary of the Northwest, Chicago, Ill., 1839; Blackburn University (theological department), Galat, 1867; at San Francisco, Cal., 1871; German, Bloomfield, N. J., 1809; German, Dubuque,
Ia., 1870; Lincoln University (theological department), 1871; and Biddle Memorial Institute (theological department), Charlotte, N. C., 1867. Of these, the last two are for colored people, and the two immediately preceding them for Germans. In 1875-76 they had, in all, 56 professors and 578 students. The number graduating that year was 134. The board of education of the Church in 1876 received $72,040, and gave financial aid to 456 students (222 theological, 218 collegiate, and 16 academical), and the same year 65 men were actained, for freedmen, 93 day schools, with 6 teachers and 3176 pupils and 5 higher schools, with 938 students, of whom 43 were preparing for the ministry. See Gil-

II. CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—In the beginning of the present century there was a very extensive revival of religion in the south-western part of Kentucky, within the bounds of the Presbyterian of sylvania. It is frequently called "the Great Western Revival of 1800," and is regarded by some as one of the most important religious movements in the history of the Protestant Church of the United States, as it firmly fixed the people of the valley of the Mississippi in the Christian faith. The supply of preachers was still insufficiate, the Presbytery appointed at different times a number of lay exhorters, and, after trial of their gifts, licensed some to preach. They did not require of them the usual course of classical studies, and permitted them to except the latter, according to the principle of divinie volving the idea of Fatalism. In October, 1802, the Presbytery was divided, and the Presbytery of Campberland was formed, covering the region just named. In April, 1863, the new Presbytery met, and ordained two of the licentiates—Finis Ewing (who had formerly been an elder) and Samuel King—and licensed one other, for which permission had been granted by the General Assembly, laid before them of irregularity on the part of the Presbytery, appointed a commission of ten ministers and six elders, clothed with full synodical powers, to visit this remote region and investigate the whole matter. Accordingly the commission, when convened, summoned the Presbytery and the church, and the presbytery ordained the licentiate in or ordained persons, and endeavored to induce the latter to submit to an examination. This, with the sanction of the Presbytery, they refused; whereupon the commission prohibited them from teaching or administering ordinanances in virtue of any authority derived from Cumberland Presbytery until they should submit. It was aftertwards contended that, as the authority to preach had been originally conferred by the Presbytery of Transylvania, this prohibition was technically powerless in the case. It may also be observed that it seems now generally agreed by writers on both sides that the main objection was not to the illiterate character of the licentiates, but to their alleged unsoundness in doctrine. The Revival members (as they were called) of the Cumberland Presbytery after this met as a council and absolved the ministers from charges. They incorporated the General Assembly, but in vain. The assembly sustained the synod, and exhorted the recusants to submit and act regularly. The synod, being directed to review their proceedings, complied, and on review confirmed all that had been done, and further dissolved the Cumberland Presbytery and re-annexed its members to the Presbytery of Transylvania. The council made an ineffectual effort to bring about a reconciliation, and offered to submit the licentiates to an examination; but as they required that all should be received in a body, the proposed conciliation failed. On Feb. 4, 1864, Finis Ewing and Samuel King (ordained ministers, but silenced by the commission), and Samuel M'Dow, an aged minister, met and organized themselves into a presbytery under the name of the Cumberland Presbytery. In April following the Presbytery of Transylvania suspended Mr. M'Dow for his schismatical conduct.

The progress of the new body was rapid. In three years a synod was necessary, with 3 presbyteries and 60 congregations, and in 1829 a General Assembly was consulted. In 1846 the General Assembly created the convention 96 presbyteries, 927 ministers, 1188 churches, 82,138 communicants, and 24 educational institutions. In 1814 the synod published an edition of the Westminster Confession and Catechisms, altered to suit their system, which was not published until 1839. The Synod of Calvinism and Arminianism. It rejects eternal reparation, limited atonement, and special grace, teaching that the atonement was made for all mankind, and that the operation of the Spirit is coextensive with the atonement. Other points: Calvinism, as the necessity of the Spirit's work in regeneration and the perseverance of the saints, are retained. The Cumberland Presbyterians are warm advocates of revivals and camp-meetings.

An evidence of the altered state of feeling towards this body of Christians as contrasted with the deliverance of the General Assembly of 1814—to the effect that they could be treated with not as a body, but only as individuals—it may be added that first the New-School General Assembly entered into correspondence with the Cumberland Synod; and again, in 1869 the Old-School Assembly also took this step. The Cumberland Presbyterians have increased very rapidly. The minutes of the forty-sixth General Assembly, 1876, show 26 synods, including nearly 125 presbyteries, extending over the territory between the Great Lakes and the Gulf of Mexico, the Ohio and Allegheny Mountains, on the east, to the Pacific Ocean, on the west.

The following statistical summary is approximately correct: Ministers, 1375; licentiates, 290; candidates, 220; congregations, 2000; elders, 6750; deacons, 2000; total communicants, 100,000; persons in the Sabbath-schools, 55,000; value of property, $7,000,000. The money contributed during the year, $350,000. The following are the principal institutions of learning under the control of this Church: Cumberland College (Princeton, Ky., founded in 1829, discontinued in 1861), Cumberland University (Lebanon, Tenn., founded in 1842, which has the leading university of the Missouri Conference (McKenzie, Tenn., 1847), Wayneburg College (Wayn-seburg, Pa., 1850), M'Gee College (College Mound, Mo., 1853, now suspended), Lincoln University (Lincoln, Ill., 1856), Trinity University (Tehasca, Texas, 1870), Cane Hill College, Boonborough, Ark., 1892). The General Assembly, in 1876, approved the establishment of a Union Medical College, in connection with the three universities of the Church: namely, Cumberland, Lincoln, and Trinity. It is to be located at St. Louis, or some other large city. Wayneburg, Lincoln, and Trinity admit young ladies on equal terms with young men. There are also several institutions exclusively for girls, owned by, or under the patronage of, the Church.

The colored Cumberland Presbyterian Church has been formed by the amicable separation of colored members from the whites, who have organized their church and their organization into an independent body. The first number of their newspaper organ, The Banner of Light, was published in September, 1876. It stated that the number of members of the colored Cumberland Presbyterian Church in the states of Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, and Kentucky was, in May, 1874, 3925; that the number of ministers at that time was seventeen; and that the value of church property was $12,550. Since that time the Presbytery of Missouri had added 240 members, and the same presbytery had reported 26 members for Arkansas for the year 1874 than for 1873 did not come from the other states.

12. The Reformed Presbyterian Synod.—During "the persecuting times," some members of the Cov-enanting or Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland settled in Pennsylvania. In 1743 these met at Middle Octora, and again solemnly subscribed the Old Scottish Covenant. In 1752 the Scottich Church sent the Rev. John Cuthbertson to be their minister. In 1770 he was joined by the Rev. Messrs. Linn and Dobbie from the Reformed Presbytery of Ireland, when a Reformed church of Pennsylvania was organized. In 1782 the General Assembly and the Reformed Synod of 1782 these three ministers and a portion of the people joined with the Associate Church in forming "The As-cociate Reformed Church." The members who were opposite to this union kept together as praying societies in the state. In 1812 a synod was formed, and a committee of their number to take the oversight of them judicially. In 1738 a presbytery was organized at Philadelphia, and in 1808 the question of slavery forced itself upon the consideration of the newly organized "Reformed Presbyterian Church of the United States of America," when it enacted that no slaveholder should be retained in its communion, a position since then faithfully maintained. In 1806 it issued a Testimony defining its position on several points not mentioned in the Westminster Confession. In the following year it undertook the theological education of its ministry by opening a seminary at Philadelphia, and in 1809 organized itself into "The Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in America," with three constituting prebyteries. Subsequent to the war of 1812 the relations of this church to the federal government were much discussed. A variety of sentinments was apparent as to the extent to which the severance between the Church and that other ordinance of God—the State—should be carried. The result of these discussions was a rendering of the Church in 1830, and the formation of several churches in the Appalachian Mountains, on the east, to the Pacific Ocean, on the west.

While heartily accepting the Westminster standards as their symbolical books, this Presbyterian gave prominence to the distinctive doctrines of the Marrow divines. See Manuscript Chronology. Its members held the gospel as the highest gift of God, and that salvation to sinners of mankind as such—all having a common interest in him—faith to be a person's real persuasion that Jesus Christ is his—that he shall have life and salvation by Christ, and that whatever Christ did for God in his behalf, he did for him. Stress was also laid on the doctrine of the binding obligation of the Scottish covenanters—National and Solemn League. While the origin and doctrinal views of the Associate Presbyterian restricted its sphere of labor, inside of the United States, it grew rapidly, congregations being formed in New York, Virginia, and the Carolinas.

In 1776 a second presbytery, that of New York, was formed—like that of Pennsylvania, in subordination to the Scottish Synod. In 1784 Rev. Thomas Clark, minister of Baltimba, in Ireland, belonging to the Bughby Synod of Scotland, with the greater part of his congregation emigrated to this country, and settled in Salem, Washington County, N. Y. Two other ministers of the same communion followed them two years after, though some of them subsequently returned to Scotland. The Bughby ministers here have been engaged in the formation of a separate organization on this side of the Atlantic, united with their brethren; but the union was disturbed by the refusal of the Scottish synod to approve of it. The revolution of 1776 was chiefly instrumental in bringing about the existence of the Associate Reformed Church.

During the progress of the war several conventions were held between the members of the Associate and the Reformed presbyteries with a view to union. Their three presbyteries met in Philadelphia in October, 1782, and formed themselves into a synod, under the name of "The Associate Reformed Church in America," on a basis consisting of the following articles:

1. That Jesus Christ died for the elect.
2. That there is an appropriation in the nature of faith.
3. That the Gospel is addressed indiscriminately to sinners of mankind.
4. That the righteousness of Christ is the alone condition and ground of eternal life.
5. That civil government originates with God the Creator, and not with Christ the Mediator.
6. That the administration of the kingdom of Providence is given into the hands of Jesus Christ the Mediator, and magistrates exercise their authority appointed by him, to the end that in the world to be the prop of civil order among men, as well as other things, is rendered subservient by the Mediator to the glory of his kingdom, the spiritual kingdom of God, and has sanctioned the use of it and of every common benefit, through the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Spirit of grace.
7. That the law of nature and the moral law revealed in the Scriptures are substantially the same, although the latter embraces the will of God more evidently and clearly than the former, and therefore magistrates among Christians ought to be regulated by the general directory of the Word as to the execution of their office.
8. That the qualifications of justice, versatylty, etc., required in the law of nature for the being of a magistrate, are more explicitly revealed as necessary in the Holy Scriptures, but a religious test, any farther than an oath of fidelity, is not to be essential nor be essentially necessary in the being of a magistrate, except when the people make it a condition of government.
9. That the Lord's ordinances, when united, shall adhere to the Westminster Confession of Faith, the Catechisms, the directory for worship, and propositions concerning Church government.
10. That they shall claim the full exercise of Church discipline, without depending upon foreign judges and rules.

On this basis all the members of the Reformed presbyteries here in the United States, together with the Associate Presbyterians who sympathized with the Scottish Seceders applied to them for a minister, but at that time none could be sent. The application was renewed in 1750, but the first minister sent to this country by the Secession Church of Scotland was Alexander Geddes, who, however, did not arrive until 1753. He was from 1758 presbytery was organized under the name of "The Associate Presbyterian of Pennsylvania, subordinate to the Associate Synod of Scotland."
by ministers sent out from Scotland, and also by the return of a considerable part of those who had previously joined the union. In 1784 this Church put forth a Testimony intended to supplement the Westminster Confession of Faith, and to draw the members of the Separate Synod, public covenanting, the exclusive use of the Psalms in praise, and against private oaths, that is, secret societies. The first institution for the purpose of educating students in theology by this body was established in 1783, under the care of the Rev. John Anderson, D.D., of Beaver County, Pa. The Presbytery of Pennsylvania, being unable to meet the applications for preaching which were made from Kentucky and Tennessee, directed the applicants to apply directly to the Synod of Scotland for missionaries. They did so; and Messrs. Armstrong and Andrew Fulton arrived in Kentucky in the spring of 1788, and in November formed the Presbytery of Kentucky. This accession of strength enabled these presbyteries to form themselves into a synod; and accordingly the synod, or court of review, designated as "The Associate Synod of North America" was constituted at Philadelphia in May, 1801. The synod consisted of seventeen ministers, who were divided into the presbyteries of Philadelphia, of Clarion, of Kentucky, and of Cambridge. Until the year 1818 appeals might be made to this Synod, but at that time it was declared a coordinate synod by the General Associate Synod of Scotland. Between the years 1838 and 1840 serious ecclesiastical difficulties arose, and several ministers were deposed or suspended. These, with a number of ministers and congregations in sympathy with them, at once organized separately, having several presbyteries, who constituted a synod and claimed to be the true Associate Synod. This painful division was afterwards adjusted, and a union was effected in 1854. To the Associate Church belongs the distinction of being one of the earliest churches on the American continent to take up a decided position on the subject of slavery. As early as the year 1800 the Presbytery of Pennsylvania issued a warning on the subject to the members of its churches, declaring slaveholding to be a moral evil and unjustifiable. This declaration was repeated in 1811, while in 1813 the synod judicially excluded slaveholders from its communion—an action which cost it all its congregations in the Southern States. The loss thus sustained was made up by the formation of new congregations and new presbyteries, and by the annexation of the West Synod. In 1858, previous to the union with the Associate Reformed Church, the Associate Synod comprised 21 presbyteries, 231 ministers and licentiates, 231 congregations, and 25,505 communicants.

2. Associate Reformed Church. The earliest settlement of the Associate Reformed Church was in Pennsylvania, within the Cumberland valley; but colonies from these emigrated to South Carolina and Georgia, New York, Kentucky, and even to New Hampshire and Maine. One of the first acts of the synod, after its organization in 1682, was the adoption of a series of articles, afterwards published under the name of "The Constitution of the Associate Reformed Church"; but these articles were severely attacked both by the Seceders and Covenanters, and were finally laid aside for a fuller exposition of the Church's faith. The result was that the Westminster Confession and Catechisms, after a careful revision at several successive meetings of synod, in the articles relating to the power of the magistrate, were published in a volume in 1799, entitled "The Constitution and Standards of the Associate Reformed Church in North America," with the exception of the Old Testament and New Testament, which were inserted into it as a separate synod, with four subordinate synods—New York, Pennsylvania, Scioto, and the Carolinas. In 1804 the plan of the theological seminary was framed. Dr. John M. Mason was chosen professor of theology; and in 1805, the first class was graduated. The Associate Reformed Synod of the same year in the city of New York. This was the second theological seminary established in the United States. Dr. Mason's work on Catholic Communism, published in 1816, was regarded as being in conflict with the Church's principles and practices; and this, in connection with some other grounds of complaint, led the entire Synod of that communion to withdraw from the superintendence of the General Synod. In 1821 the Synod of the Carolinas petitioned the General Synod to be erected into an independent synod, on the ground that they were so distant from the place at which the General Synod usually assembled that it was impossible that they should be represented in it. The request was granted. For many years after that the Southern Synod gained but little in numbers, though in later years it became more prosperous; while the Scioto Synod rapidly extended itself and became more vigorous every year. About the time of the separation of this Western Synod, an unsuccessful attempt was made to unite the Associate Reformed and the Reformed Dutch churches, under the name of "The Reformed Protestant Church of North America." Immediately after this, that is, in 1821, a union was effected between the Associate Reformed and the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church; the consequence of which was that a portion of the former Church became incorporated with the latter, and the library of the Associate Reformed Church was immediately removed from New York to Princeton; though, as the result of a legal process, it ultimately fell back into the hands of its original owners. The act of union by the General Synod of the Associate Reformed Church was irregular, being contrary to the express will of a majority of the presbyteries. However, many of the ministers and congregations who had remained under the care of the General Synod went into this union. The Synod of Pennsylvania with but few exceptions was merged in it, and that synod never met again. The Synod of New York, however, survived the dissolution of the General Synod, becoming separate and independent, like its two sister synods of the West and South. But its interests languished till 1829, when it resolved to revive the seminary, whose operations had been suspended in 1821, and to establish it at Newburgh, under the care of the Rev. Joseph M'Carroll, D.D., who was at the same time chosen professor of theology. An attempt was made in 1827 to revive the General Synod on the old footing, but it proved a failure. However, the Synod of the West, having divided into two, erected a General Synod, which first met in 1841, and which has been the New York Synod since. In 1855. This united body numbered 4 synods, 28 presbyteries, 235 ministers and licentiates, 367 congregations, and 51,284 communicants. Its name then became "The General Synod of the Associate Reformed Church." They added to the Westminster standards as adopted in the Testimony of 1779, and held the doctrines of close communion, anti-slavery, and the exclusive use of the Psalms in praise.

In May, 1858, the Associate Reformed and the Associate churches, having been separated for more than three-quarters of a century, were reunited upon a common basis, under the name of "The United Presbyterian Church in North America," a Church which is now the largest representative of those distinctive views for which all the preceding churches have more or less contended. In addition therefore to its acceptance of the Westminster standards, which it modified, it has issued a Testimony whose adoption is a condition of communion both with ministers and members. In this Testimony are articles adverse to slavery and to secret societies, and in favor of close communion, the exclusive use of the Psalms and of old in the duty of covenanting. A few years ago a new metrical version of the book of Psalms was adopted by this body. A small number protested against the union, and have since then continued under the name of "The Associate Synod and General Assembly of North America." (See the section on "The United Presbyterian Church of North America" embraced a General Assembly, 8 synods, 56 presbyteries, 753 ministers, 866 congregations, and 101,858 communicants. It has theological seminaries at Newburgh, N. Y.; Allegheny, Pa.; and Xenia, O.; and missionary seminaries at Osaka and Ramleh, Egypt.
Wesleyan, Mountie, and Oberlin colleges and the Oberlin colleges are also under its charge. It has boards of Foreign Missions, of Home Missions, of Publication, of Church Extension, of Freedmen, and of Education, with mission stations in India, Egypt, and Syria. The Mission to China, which was instituted as a memorial of the "union" of the different bodies in 1858, has been transferred to California. Its missionary contributions were, in 1876-77, for foreign, $77,126; home, $29,750. Its periodical publications are one monthly, one semi-monthly, and two weekly newspapers.

The Associate Reformed Synod of the South has still its separate organization. Cordial in its relations with the United Presbyterian Church, it has one missionary now laboring together with the missionaries of the latter Church in Egypt; and, slavery having ceased to be an object of contention, is now considering the propriety of organic union with that body. In 1875 a plan of co-operation was proposed between this Church and the United Presbyterian Church, North, which provides that "the presbyteries of each Church shall sustain the same relation to those of the other that they do to the corporate officers of their own body; that the ministers and licentiates of each shall be eligible to appointments and settlements in congregations of the other; that the courts of each shall respect the discipline of the other; that ministers and members of the two bodies be required to cultivate friendly relations and Christian fellowship with each other; that the existing relations of the two churches (actual cooperation) in the work of foreign missions be continued: that a friendly co-operation of help and non-interference be permitted in home missions and Church Extension; that the two bodies co-operate in building and sustaining the Normal or Training School of the United Presbyterian Church for the Freedmen, established at Knoxville, Tenn.; and that in the work of publishing the Associate Reformed Synod co-operate with the Board of Publication of the United Presbytery-ian Church. These provisions were adopted by the synod. The committee on correspondence with the United Presbyterian Church was reappointed, but was instructed to take no direct steps towards union without further representations from the Southern Synods. The Southern Synod of New England has a liter. ary association named Erskine College and a theological school, both at Due West, S. C. It numbers about 70 ministers, nearly one third of whom are in South Carolina, the rest in other Southern states.

The Southern Synod of NORTH AMERICA is composed of some who declined to enter into the union with the Associate Reformed Synod in 1858 (see No. 14 above), and consists of the presbyteries of Iowa, Clarion, Muskingum, and Northern Indiana; and had, in 1876, 12 ministers, 2 licentiates, 94 congregational charges or stations, and 110 communicants. The total contributions were $679,45.

16. THE UNITED SYNOD OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, SOUTH.—In 1857 the New-School Presbytery of Lexington affirmed slavery to be right and scriptural in principle. The Assembly (1857) replied by condemning the position, and refused to allow either the principle or the practice. The delegates from the Southern churches protested, and, declaring this action to be an "indirect excision" of their congregations, withdrew;
and in 1859, at Knoxville, Tennessee, organized themselves as "The United Synod of the Presbyterian Church, South," consisting of some 100 ministers and about 200 congregations. A proposal for union with the Old-School Presbyterian Church was declined by this latter body because coupled with the condition that the Associate Reformed Synod cede to the Old-School Synod the United Synod reported 14 presbyteries, 118 ministers, 187 churches, and 12,123 communicants, of whom 322 were colored. In 1864 the synod joined the Presbyterian Church, South.

17. THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, SOUTH, dates its organization from Dec. 4, 1861, when the commissioners from a number of scattered Presbyterian bodies,
within the Confederate States met in Augusta, Ga., and organized as a General Assembly. The style and title then chosen was, The Presbyterian Church of the Confederate States of America; but after the overthrow of the Confederacy the word united was substituted for Confederate, and of America was dropped.
The Presbyterian Church, South, disavows all connection with political matters, and holds to strictly eco-societal labor. In 1876, at the Assembly held in Savannah, Ga., when the appointment of delegates to the Pan-Presbyterian Council of Edinburgh in 1877 was considered, all expressions used in the different courts
during the exciting times of the civil strife were re-sinded as inconsistent with the platform of 1862. The report then adopted closed with the following declarations:

"1. We solemnly reaffirm the explicit and formal statement set forth at the time of the organization of our General Assembly in 1861, in an Address to the Churches of Jesus Christ throughout the Earth. This document clearly and forcibly details our position concerning the nature and the mission of the Church as the formative body, and, therefore, "non-sectarian and non-political."

"2. Inasmuch as some incidental expressions, uttered in times of crisis, have been taken by others as impugning our records, and have been pointed out in the report of the committee aforesaid, which seem to be ambiguous or incompletely expressed, the above declaration and of like import, this Assembly does hereby disavow them whenever found, and does not recognize such as forming any part of the well-considered, authoritative teachings or testimony of our Church."

At that time this Church consisted of 12 synods, 92 presbyteries, 1821 churches, 1079 ministers, and 112,183 communicants. Their contributions amounted to $1,183,681. The Assembly conducts its benevolent operations through three general committees (the work of foreign missions and of sustentation being united under the same committee), viz. the Executive Committe of Foreign Missions and Sustentation of Education, and of Publication. Foreign missions are maintained in the Indian Territory, Mexico, South America, Greece, Italy, India, and China, and domestic missions in new and destitute localities in the South, at an annual cost of $71,121, supporting 75 missionaries in foreign fields, 21 assistant missionaries, all from the United States;
9 ordained ministers and 25 assistant missionaries are natives of the countries in which they labor. With these foreign missions are connected 22 churches, with 1200 members and 1500 communicants. A publishing house is maintained at Richmond, Va., and, with a capital of about $40,000, issues Presbytery-ian books for ministers and congregational and Sunday-school libraries. It also aids in the education for the ministry of young men of limited means, and in the publication and dissemination of a religious and doctrinal literature.

In all educational work, this branch of the Presbyterian Church has always held very advanced ground. It declares in its constitution that "because it is highly reprehensible to religion, and dangerous to the Church, the Presbytery shall try each candidate as to his knowledge of the Latin language and the original languages in which the Holy Scriptures were written. They shall also examine him in the arts and sciences." The first committees of this character were organized in 1858. The Inhabitants of Madagascar, on testa on some common head in divinity." The common requirement in its presbyteries is equal to the curriculum.
in most American colleges. The demands of the Church for the education of its ministry and its own youth have ever been made in the patrimony of learning and engaged it in the founding of institutions for higher education. It has been the pioneer of education in nearly all the older Southern communities. During the civil war, many of the institutions of learning founded and endowed by the Presbyterian Church in the South perished by the loss of endowments in the general financial wreck. Among them were Oglethorpe University, Ga.; Oakland College, Mias.; LaGrange College, Tenn.; and other valuable institutions of less prominence. Centre College, Ky., was lost through decisions of the United States courts. It was more educational in its character than the Westminster Ern., than a large portion of the Northern churches, who came nearer the Congregational influence of New England. It was the united opposition of the Southern churches to what claimed to be a more liberal Presbyterianism which in large part caused the division of 1867 into Old and New School bodies. Since the separation in 1861, the Southern body has grown even more strict in its views of the standards, and the Henderson character of Church government. But, with all their zeal for a strict construction of the standards of doctrine and order, the Southern churches have ever been distinguished for their interest in protracted meetings and services of religion. The custom is almost universal of holding protracted services of several days' or weeks' duration in the churches at one or more communion services in the year, as the indication of the great love of worship and the great interest in the greatest; and most frequently at such meetings there is a revival in the hearts of God's people, and awakenings of greater or less extent among the unconverted. The special labors of evangelists such as Moody and Sankey, Dillinger and Whittles, have been spread to a great extent in the Southern churches. It is an opinion generally accepted among the Southern ministry that there is great advantage, especially in a sparsely populated region but partially supplied with the means of grace, in bringing the Gospel to bear for successive days upon the minds of men. In this way their thoughts can be more effectually withdrawn from their worldly connections and pleasures, and fixed more intensely upon the great matter of salvation. Hence the evangelists found that neither their methods nor their preaching of the Gospel of salvation by grace only, through faith, was much of a novelty to the Southern Presbyterian churches.

It has proved to be a great drawback to the proper influence of the Southern Presbyterian Church that, owing partly to the separations of professors from the government ability and learning—Union Seminary, at Hampden Sidney, Va.; and Columbia Seminary, at Columbia, S. C. It has recently established a third, at Tuscaloosa, Ala., for the education and training of colored men for the ministry; and for this it is now gathering an endowment. There are no Presbyterian schools or colleges for girls in the South endowed beyond the provision of buildings, apparatus, and libraries; but there are many institutions under Presbyterian control or auspices in which every reasonable comfort is provided with advantages for the thorough education and accomplishment of girls. Among these are many colleges, collegiate institutes, and seminaries which afford a high grade of instruction to young ladies, and are widely esteemed for general excellence and thoroughness.

The work of education for the ministry is conducted by the General Assembly, through an executive committee located at Memphis, Tenn. In the last ecclesiastical year, the committee received from the churches, for this purpose, $15,181, from which $8 young men, provided with assistant professorships at various colleges and theological seminaries, received assistance.

The standards of the Southern Presbyterian Church are the Westminster Confession (with the chapter "Of the Civil Magistrate" amended), the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, and the Westminster Form of Government and Directory for Public Worship, with the circumstances of the Church, with "Rules of Discipline," or "Forms of Process," gathered from the usages and laws of the Scottish Church. These standards are adopted by every minister at his ordination, in answer to the questions put to him publicly by the presiding minister, but are not required to be adopted by subscription to any written formula.

Anterior to the division of the Church into Northern and Southern churches, the Southern churches were disposed to adhere more closely to the standards, and were more careful to have these teachings in full standing by the Westminster Ern., than a large portion of the Northern churches, who came nearer the Congregational influence of New England. It was the united opposition of the Southern churches to what claimed to be a more liberal Presbyterianism which in large part caused the division of 1867 into Old and New School bodies. which is covered by it, and the hundreds of thousands of poor ignorant negroes, ever tending backward to heathenism, who must depend upon this Church very largely for a form of the Gospel that will enlighten and civilize them, no body of Presbyterians in the world has a greater work to do, or, in proportion to the work to be done, less financial ability to sustain it.

The Church of Scotland had some from 1620 to 1654. In this British dominion the Presbyterians are in point of numbers the third among the religious denominations, being only exceeded by the Roman Catholics and the Church of England. Presbyterianism dates in Canada at least from the conquest, in 1629. Its first exponent in a settled way was the Rev. George Henry, who appeared in Quebec as early as 1676, and was the chaplain of a British regiment stationed there. In 1784 the Rev. Alexander Spark went there, and in 1797 the first Presbyterian congregation was organized. It was composed principally of soldiers. In 1790 the Rev. Thomas Bethune, a minister of the Kirk who had come from Scotland as chaplain of a Highland regiment, preached first in Montreal, and afterwards organized several congregations in the county of Glengarry. In Montreal it was Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. These were organized in 1790. They built St. Gabriel Street Church, which is still used as a Presbyterian church, and is the oldest Protestant church in Canada. Previous to the completion of their own structure they worshipped, by permission of the Recollet Fathers, in a Roman Catholic church. These men were supported by the Synod of the Reformed Dutch Church. One of the principal laborers thus sent was the Rev. Robert M'Dowell, who was appointed by the classis of Albany as their missionary to Canada in 1790. He itinerated throughout the greater part of Upper Canada, forming and fostering congregations in various places. He died at a very advanced age in 1841. The Rev. W. Smart, who was sent out from England in 1811, and who labored long and faithfully in Brockville; the Rev. W. Bell, sent out from Scotland in 1817; the Rev. William Jenkins, originally from Scotland, who went to the United States in 1817; the Rev. Robert Boyd, from the Synod of Ulster, ordained in 1821; and the Rev. James Harris, also from Ireland, who began his labors in 1820 as pastor of the first Presbyterian church in York (now Toronto), were among the founders of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. To Kingston and a few other places ministers were, on application, sent out by presbyteries in Scotland, the Rev. John Barclay being the first minister of Kingston. In 1825, the Glasgow Colonial Society was formed, which sent out many ministers to Lower and Upper Canada, as well as to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. These missionaries were all of the Church of Scotland. In 1827 bishop Strachan, of Toronto, published an ecclesiastical chart of Upper Canada, in which the Church of England was said to have thirty ministers, while two only belonged to the Church of Scotland—"one of whom," it was further alleged, "had made application to be received into the Anglican Communion." A change, however, was at hand. The tide of immigration had begun to flow in the direction of Canada, bringing large numbers of Presbyterians from Scotland and the north of Ireland. Scotland to the Church of Scotland—"for promoting the religious interests of Scottish settlers in British North America." Presbyterianism had taken root in Canada; it now began to make rapid progress. The supply of British ministers being necessarily cut off, owing to the ecclesiastical condition of the country, these provinces were at this time thrown almost entirely on their own resources. In 1829 the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. On its first roll were 25 ministers. "The United Synod of Upper Canada," consisting chiefly of ministers of the Associate Synod of New Brunswick, was formed about 1819, but in 1840 was amalgamated with the synod in connection with the Church of Scotland, and then numbered 82 ministers. Several ministers from the Secession Church of Scotland came to Canada about 1820, and the number was increased from time to time. They were organized into a separate Church of Scotland, the United Secession Church, and known afterwards as the Synod of the United Presbyterian Church in Canada. In 1844, the year after the disruption of the Church of Scotland, a division took place in the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland; 25 ministers agreeing with the Free Church of Scotland withdrew, and formed themselves into "The Presbyterian Church of Scotland." The synod formed immediately a theological hall at Toronto under the name of the "United Synod of Canada." The Presbyterians also instituted a theological hall at London. The synod in connection with the Church of Scotland, having in 1841 obtained a royal charter for Queen's University and College at Kingston, set themselves to work for its better equipment. Then began a struggle between the free church and the general church for pre-emption of the lands in the new university. The Synod of the Church. With varying success, each maintained a separate existence for seventeen years. To Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the first Presbyterian ministers were sent from Scotland by the Burgher and Anti-Burgher synods. A missionary was also sent in 1788 by the United synods of New York and Philadelphia. About 1789 the real work of building up a Presbyterian Church in Nova Scotia may be said to have begun, the Rev. David Smith and the Rev. Daniel Cock having been sent out by the Burgher or Associate Synod of Scotland. Seventeen years afterwards, the Rev. James McGregor was sent out by the Anti-Burgher or General Associate Synod. From these beginnings grew up the Synod of Truro (Burgher), established in 1786, and the Synod of Pictou (Anti-Burgher), in 1796. In 1817 these united, forming "The Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia." This was the first colonial union of which there is any record. Ministers from the Church of Scotland came at a later date. This Church was first represented in these provinces by the Rev. Samuel Russe, called to be pastor of St. Matthew's Church, Halifax, in 1784. But thirty-two years intervened before it could be said to have effected a permanent lodgment. In 1833 seven ministers of the Church of Scotland formed themselves into the Synod of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island (the Presbytery of New Brunswick, however, declined to enter into the compact, and in 1835 constituted itself the Synod of New Brunswick). The Synod of Nova Scotia grew space, and when the division came, in 1844, it had outnumbered its elder sister. But now it was well-built, and as it is, both in Scotland and in New Brunswick, others joined the Free Church in these provinces. Three only maintained their former connection. The synod became defunct in 1848, and was not resuscitated till 1854, when it again put forth energetic efforts to recover its lost ground. In Canada the new body, founded in 1844, in sympathy with the Free Church of Scotland, took, as we have said, the name of "The Presbyterian Church of Canada." In 1861, after several years spent in negotiations, this body and the United Presbyterian Church in Canada united under the name of "The Presbyterian Church of Canada," forming the corresponding bodies in the Lower Provinces uniting under the name of "The Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces." "The Synod of the Canada Presbyterian Church" entered on a prosperous career, with a roll of 268 ministers, of whom 128 had belonged to the Canada Presbyterian Church and 68 to the United Presbyterian Church. In 1870 the supreme court of this Church was for the first time constituted as a General Assembly, and the dominion of Canada for comprehensive union. In September, 1874, there were (omitting a few congregations connected with organizations in the United States) four Presbyterian bodies in the Dominion of Canada, viz.: the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland; the Canada Presbyterian Church; the Church of Scotland in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and adjoining provinces; and the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces. In the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland there were 51 presbyteries and 123 ministers; in the Canada Presbyterian Church, 19 presbyteries and 329 ministers; in the Church of Scotland in Nova Scotia, etc., 6 presbyteries and 31 ministers; and in the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces, 10 presbyteries and 118 ministers. There were theological colleges in Toronto, Montreal, and Quebec, and 7 in the Presbyterian Church; at Kingston and Quebec, to the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland; and at Halifax, to the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces. Nearly one half of the ministers in the several provinces have been supplied by the theological colleges of the country. From the date of the union above referred to, overtures having reference to a yet more comprehensive union began to engage the attention of the supreme courts of all the churches in British North America, increased facilities for intercommunication were provided, and a closer and more direct supervision was exercised over the work of the churches, with at least as great a prospect of accomplishment. The confederation of the provinces which now form the Dominion of Canada having been consummated in 1867, there naturally followed a strong desire for that ecclesiastical union which had long been contemplated. This desire was shared by many who had previously opposed such a union. Formal negotiations were commenced in 1870 in all the provinces, culminating in the union which was happily consummated June 15, 1875, in the city of Montreal, when the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, the Canada Presbyterian Church, the Church of the Maritime Provinces in connection with the Church of Scotland, and the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces, declaring their belief that it would be for the glory of God and the advancement of the cause of Christ in that section, do formally and thus form one Presbyterian Church in the Dominion, were formally united under the name of "The Presbyterian Church in Canada." The aggregate of the United Church at that date was 834 ministers, 1,119 congregations, 90,653 communicants, and a population under its jurisdiction of about 650,000. Statistics of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, as they were reported to the General Assembly in June, 1876, then showed it to contain 4 synods, 83 presbyteries, 1076 congregations, 664 ministers, 92,186 communicants, and 58,949 Sabbath-schoolers. The contributions for all purposes amounted to $939,690; of this sum $148,058 were paid for the support of the ministry, $25,472 for home mission work, $116,173 for foreign missions, and $111,219 for missions among the French Canadians.

The work of the Church is co-extensive with this vast dominion. Their history is simply the history of the Church itself—one of continuous, steady progress. In the early years of Presbyterianism in Canada, owing chiefly to the lack of ministers, many came in their 1st with those branches of the Church whose ministers they thought they would most appeal to, and others, filled with romantic attachment to the Church of their fathers, waited long and patiently, and instances are not wanting of "vacant congregations" assembling themselves for public worship for years together to hear sermons read by one of their elders, or to be excused by the pastor and recognized as their temporary leaders. The work divides itself into two distinct departments: 1, the opening up of new fields, and supplying ordinances to purely mission stations; 2, to aid weak congregations in the support of their ministers. The number of purely mission fields occupied in the western section in 1876 was 150, including 300 preaching-stations, with 3000 communicants. The average Sabbath attendance at these stations was about 16,000 in the aggregate. There were also 78 supplemented congregations with settled pastors receiving grants from $20 to $300 each per annum from the home mission fund. The number of missionaries employed was as follows: 36 ministers and licentiates; 69 theological students; 44 catechists; 12 lay catechists—in all 150 missionaries. The grants made for 1877 to home mission fields amounted to about $25,000, to supplemented congregations $10,000, and for contingencies $2500, making in all $32,500. The eastern sections, although small in comparison with the immense territory assigned to the Western Committee, have a mission field which is neither very limited, very compact, nor very easily worked. It is a group of stations requiring missionary services. The greater part of the work is done by student catechists, of whom many were employed in 1877. In addition to these, eight Gaelic catechists are employed in the Cape Breton, and other parts of Nova Scotia. An interesting mission field was recently entered upon in New Brunswick. It is known as "The New Kincardine Colony," and is described as "a little bit of Scotland transplanted bodily into the forests of New Brunswick." Another has been opened in a long-neglected mission field, that of Newfoundland. The total number of home missions in this section is about 8500, and for supplementing the stipends of ministers in weak congregations about $4000.

In addition to the work above mentioned, missions of a special character are maintained. Of such is the mission to the lumbermen, instituted seven years prior to the union by the branch of the Church in connection with the Church of Scotland. The object of this mission is to supply the ordinances of religion to the large number of men employed in the forests during the winter season. There are ministers, missionaries, and student catechists. They supply the Scriptural and other literature in French and English. The average number annually employed in this branch of industry, in the valley of the Upper Ottawa, is about 5000 men. The amount expended on this behalf in the last five years is about $10,000 per annum.

Perhaps in no department of Church work are there more hopeful and encouraging signs of progress than in that under the care of the Assembly's Board of French Evangelization, which has for its herculean task the emancipation of 1,200,000 French Roman Catholics. Previous to 1875 missionary efforts in this direction had been conducted on a limited scale by the several churches. Since the union a great impetus has been given to the work, which is now assuming large proportions. In the service of the board there are at present forty missionary, colporteurs, and teachers, several of whom were at one time priests of the Church of Rome. In Nova Scotia an ordained missionary labor in a wide field with a fair measure of success. He reports 125 Romanists having embraced Protestantism through his labors. In the province of New Brunswick there are three French missions, each making steady progress. In the province of Quebec there are twelve rural missions, maintaining Sabbath-schooals, besides the ordinary services. In Ottawa, the capital of the Dominion, the board employs two missioners, who minister to about 2000 members of the Quebec city—the stronghold of popery in Canada—a church

2. The staff of foreign missionaries consists at present of ten ordained ministers, one catechist, who acts as superintendent of schools, and three female missionaries. These are assisted by a large number of trained native teachers. The salaries of the ordained missionaries average about $1200 each; their assistants receive from $400 to $600 each per annum. The Church contributes annually towards the expenditure, in connection with the mission-ship Day-spring, $1200. The fields are four in number:

1. The New Hebrides. — This is the oldest and most distant. It originated in the mind of Rev. John Geddie, formerly a minister of the United Presbyterian Branch of the Church at Cavendish, Prince Edward Island, who landed on the island of Aneityam on July 18, 1848. This is no place to enter upon the details of Dr. Geddie's life work. Few missionaries have been more successful, and no higher encomium need be associated with his name than these touching words inscribed on a tablet recently erected to his memory on the wall of the chapel where he was wont to preach: "When he came here there were no Christians, and when he went away there were none but Christians." Since the commencement of this mission twelve missionaries, with their wives, have gone from Nova Scotia to labor in this field.

2. Trinidad. — The mission to the Coolies of Trinidad was begun in 1869 by the Rev. John Morton, also a minister of the Church of the Lower Provinces. In 1875 the Rev. J. F. Grant became superintendent of the mission, and in 1880 the Rev. Thomas Christie. Fifteen schools have been opened. Churches have also been built, and a number of native assistants take part in the work, which, notwithstanding many difficulties, is making satisfactory progress. The number of Coolie children under instruction is 500, and the missionary reports that 15 in one school can repeat the whole of the Shorter Catechism. The number of Coolies on the island is about 15,000.

3. Formosa. — This is one of the Church's most promising foreign mission fields. It was begun in 1873 by the Rev. G. L. McKay, of the Canada Presbyterian Church. In 1875 he was joined by the Rev. J. B. Fraser, M.D., a medical missionary. In these five years there have been erected ten chapels and two mission-houses, and 69 of the natives have renounced idolatry, and regularly attend Christian services. Seventy-five have, after careful preparation and examination, been admitted as communicants. There are five schools with native teachers, and nine native students are under training for missionary work.

4. Japan. — Ten of the union of the Canada Presbyterian Church and the Church in the Maritime Provinces in connection with the Church of Scotland had each broken ground in India by sending female missionaries. In 1874 the Rev. J. F. Campbell, a minister of the last-named Church, offered himself for foreign mission work. He has since proceeded to Madras as a missionary of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. At the same time the Rev. James Douglas also accepted an appointment to labor in Indore.

Next to the New Hebrides, the Japanese Mission in India, instituted by the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, is the oldest foreign mission of the Church. It was originated twenty-five years ago, and has always been supported by a number of Sabbath-schools and the voluntary offerings of a few friends. The annual contributions received by the treasurer have been steadily increasing for some years. Besides supporting four Zenana day-schools and a Bible-woman, this juvenile agency provides for the education of about forty orphan children in India.

5. Colleges. — Queen's University and College at Kingston, founded in 1840, is the oldest. It was projected by the branch of the Church formerly in connection with the Church of Scotland, and is the only one that possesses the power of granting degrees. It combines the features of arts and theology. Since its establishment Queen's has educated more than 100 ministers for the Presbyterian Church. The combined resources and equipment of the Canadian Presbyterian colleges may be summed up as follows:

The General Assembly authorizes an annual collection to be made in all the congregations on behalf of its theological colleges. In addition to the above-mentioned theological colleges, there is a collegiate institute at Winnipeg, the capital of the province of Manitoba; it is controlled by the General Assembly, and supported by the funds of the Church. This institution has two professors — one of science and literature, and one of classics; also a lecturer in philosophy.

4. Periodicals. — Each of the churches previous to 1875 published a monthly magazine for the diffusion of missionary information and general religious intelligence. So that at the time of the above there were four such magazines — two in the maritime provinces, one in the province of Ontario, and one in the province of Quebec. Three of these had outlived more than a quarter of a century. The General Assembly agreed that there should be but one periodical in the whole Church, issued under its sanction, to be called The Presbyterian Record, and to be published monthly in the city of Montreal, at the rate of twenty-five cents per copy per annum. The first number of this periodical was published in January, 1876. Before the close of the year it had attained a circulation of 50,000 copies monthly.

5. A few ministers of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland refused to enter into the union with the Canada Presbyterian Church, and, after the union was consummated, declared themselves to continue the Church in connection with the Church of Scotland. This synod met in Montreal in June, 1876. The Rev. David Watson was appointed moderator. Trustees were appointed for the various funds of the synod, and the usual committees were also appointed. A petition was presented from the congregation of West King, praying for ordinances in connection with the Church of Scotland, and complaining of the proceedings which had resulted in their being deprived of their Church property. A list was presented of congregations in similar circumstances. It was agreed that a committee with synodical powers should be appointed to watch such cases, and, if that were called for, to appoint a deputation to proceed to Edinburgh and attend the next General Assembly, or the meetings at any time of the Colonial Committees of the Church of Scotland. 19. PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES OF COLONIES OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE. — Besides the above in Canada, there are the following. In the account of these we oblige to follow the report of the late Pan-Presbyterian Council of Edinburgh, which we have largely used in the preceding details:

1. Australian Presbyterian Church. — In 1888, while this country was still ruled for political reasons, the Presbyterian denomination found its exponent in Victoria in the person of the Rev. Mr. Cow, a retired chaplain of a Highland regiment. In 1888 a missionary preacher was sent by the Church of Scotland to Melbourne, and soon others went over, and, until 1846, Presbyterianism in this colony was wholly dependent on the Kirk. Af-der discovery of gold in 1851, and the consequent mass migration of the colony, the Irish Presbyterian Church sent a number of ministers; and, by 1859, when a union of the different Presbyterian churches was proaposed, there were congregations representing the regular Kirk, the Free Church, and the United Presbyterian, besides many smaller bodies. A complete union of all these various Presbyterians was finally effected in 1867
on the abolition of state aid.

The Presbyterian Church in Victoria has been formed on the Scottish model. In all its distinctive principles it remains loyal to the parent Church. While it has accepted an independent position by the adoption of the Westminster Confession and Catechisms, and the Second Book of Discipline, as its standards. Some var-rations have been admitted on administration. For example—(1) The General Assembly is not a representative body. (2) The Commission, which meets six months after the Assembly, deals not only with matters sent to it, but with all matters of which due notice has been given; but its decisions in these latter are subject to review by the next General Assembly. (3) It has no synods. (4) And no deacons’ courts. The secular administration of the church by a minister’s or elders’ congregation, one half of whom retire every year. (5).
Adeherents as well as communicants are allowed to vote for the first minister of a newly formed congregation.
(6) The use of hymns and of instrumental music has been allowed, and congregations have almost without exception, and with wonderful unanimity, availed themselves of the allowance. The hymn-book of the English Presbyterian Church has been sanctioned and recommended. (7) Further, the Assembly has sanction-ted a “Book of Prayers for Social Worship,” which has been compiled with the view of assisting Christian men in the bush to hold service where a minister is not available.

The following statistics will give an approximate

Income for all purposes, 1873–74

£250,000

Capital funds held in trust for various schemes £50,000

The schemes of the Church embrace two departments, ministerial and missionary.

(1) Ministerial. In order to make suitable provision for the ministry, the following funds have been established—(a) A capital fund for the endowment and support of a theological hall, established in 1865, with cars—Systematic Theology, Apologetics, Church History, and Exegetics—held provisionally by four ministers of the Church, and attended by fifteen students, of whom five are studying with a view to mission work.
£200,000 will be required for the endowment of these four chairs. £1,400,000 are now in the hands of the Church, yielding an annual revenue of £200. Two university scholarships of £500 and £1,000 respectively
have been founded for intending theological students,
and two theological scholarships of the same amount.
But the larger of these is not confined to Presbyterian students. It is open to all denominations. The Assembly raises additional scholarships, when needed, by subscription. (b) A sustentation fund, for the more adequate support of the ministry, aims at securing a minimum stipend of £100 to every minister. Congregations lodge their monies monthly in the postoffice savings bank. Their ministers draw the deposits once a quarter, and keep it for the current year. The balance that remains undrawn, if any, accrues to the general sustentation fund, which is distributed among ministers whose stipend falls short of the minimum,
with the proviso, however, that no congregation receives more than £50. Last year 88 out of 122 ministers participated in the fund. The income received from the following sources: Congregational subscriptions, £866; donations of £100 each from eight gentlemen, £200; small donations and legacy, £187; interest from savings bank, £95, in all £2075. (c) A capital fund, for the support of aged and infirm ministers; ins tituted not only in the interest of ministers, but as empathically of congregations, to relieve them, in some measure, at least, from a very painful burden, and to insure their enjoying the ministrations of men in the prime and vigor of life. It is raised by voluntary contributions, and by a payment of £2, spread over five years, from every minister. The allowance is £50 per annum, with £2 for every year beyond five that the annuitant has held a charge. (d) A fund for the support of the widows and orphans of deceased ministers, raised annually by subscription of a minister’s congregation, is added to the general congregational collection. In 1876 these two sources of income yielded £990. Interest on capital, 10½ per cent; in all £2055. Annuities to twenty widows and twenty-four orphans, £965. The annuity is £50, with £10 for each child below eighteen. The latter is doubled when both parents are dead. By these and respective speccies provision is made for the ministry in its four states
—when training for work, when at work, when past work, and when finally done with work.

(II.) Missionary.—Comprised under two branches—home and foreign missions. The home mission is charged with—(1) securing a supply of ministers; (2) admitting accredited ministers from other churches; (3) assisting presbyteries in supplying vacancies; and (4) fostering mission-stations. As the Church, in planting herself in a new land, is essentially a home mission, and as the demand for ministers has always been ahead of the supply, little has been attempted outside its own community. One or two of the larger congregations have, however, been vigorously prosecuting, while others are commencing territorial work at their own hand.
The committee is recommending a system of sending missionaries from the home churches in the way of ministerial supply. But the need is by no means abated. At this moment at least twelve men are urgently required. (b) The heathen mission embraces three departments: (1) The Teachers. Many Chinese, of whom there are about 17,000 in Victoria. They are scattered in groups of two or three hundred over the colony. They are generally of an inferior type, but are very accessible to the teachings of the Gospel, which are given them at various points by the Christian churches. The Presbyterian Mission has taken the form of a quarterly report of a semi-annual Chinese catechists. It is conducted by one of the ministers of the Church, assisted by Mr. Cheong, a Chinese student. (2) The Aborigines, now reduced to about 1000. Charles Kingsley and others have put the natives of Australia at the bottom of the scale of rational beings, "if indeed they are entitled to be called men." It seemed as if they were likely to furnish a link in the ascending development of humanity. The Presbyterian Mission at Rossill has exploited this notion. It is under the charge of two Missionaries, and furnishes delightful proofs of the elevating influence of Christianity even upon the most degraded savage, while the children of the school have outrivaled all their competitors in the State schools of Victoria. (3)
The New Hebrides, in conjunction with other churches in Scotland, Canada, and New South Wales, Presbyterian Church of Victoria maintains a contingent of two missionaries on this interesting field. The children of the Sabbath-schools are pledged to collect £500 per annum for the maintenance of the Day-spring, missionaries. The total contributions to the home and Indian missions in 1875 amounted to £2230. The capital invested funds of the Church, Sept. 30, 1876, were as follows:

1. Theological Hall endowment ........................................ £14,290
2. Ormond and Patrick Hamilton scholarships .................. £2,000
3. The Cramond Missions ................................................ £3,000
4. Intra-Ministers' Fund .................................................. 8,368
5. Widows and Orphans' Fund ......................................... 16,768
6. Bible Fund (Home-mission) ........................................ 2,000
7. Loan Fund for church and manse building (be- ing the accumulation of five years' state aid) .................. 15,000
8. Free Church Loan ....................................................... 60,663

There are two colleges in connection with this Church—one for boys, under the principalship of Dr. Morison, which has run a long and prosperous career; the other for girls, under the charge of the Rev. George Tait, which was but recently opened.

2. Presbyterian Church of New South Wales.—In 1822 about a dozen Presbyterian families, living on the banks of the Hawkesbury River, resolved to meet for the worship of God according to the forms of their fathers, though they had no minister. A Mr. James Mein ministered to them as catechist. At a cost of £250 they built a church, which bore the appropriate name of Ebenezer. In 1828 Dr. Lang went to the colony, the first Presbyterian minister. Considerable additions were made thereafter, but the history of the Church was harmonious, and various divisions took place. At length, in 1865, a general union took place through the amalgamation of separate bodies corresponding to the Church of Scotland, the Free Church, and the United Presbyterian; the new body being called "The Presbyterian Church of New South Wales." According to the articles of union the Word of God is the supreme arbiter of the governing rule of faith and practice for the Church; the Westminster Confession of Faith, Larger and Shorter Catechisms, the Form of Presbytery Church Government, the Directory for the Public Worship of God, and the Second Book of Discipline, are the subordinate standards of this Church; explanations are then given as to the relative authority of the subordinate standards, the renunciation of intolerant principles, and the recognition of the spiritual independence of the Church; the jurisdiction of the Church is declared to be independent of other churches, and churches of the Free Presbyterian Church are admissible if they afford satisfactory evidence of their qualifications and eligibility, and on their subscribing the formula. The Church has prospered since the union, but not in proportion to the growth of the colony. It now consists of 7 presbyteries, 68 ministers, 70 charges, and 108 church-buildings. It has schemes for Church Extension, Foreign Missions, Sabbath-schools, Sustentation Fund, and Church and Manse Fund; its foreign missions are to the New Hebrides and the Chinese; it has three theological tutors, and its estimated total income for 1876 was £15,000. The minimum stipend is £200 with, or £250 without a manse. It is expected that £300 will now be reached through the Sustentation Fund. The legislature having passed an act for the establishment of denominational colleges affiliated to the University of Sydney, St. Andrew's Presbyterian College has sprung into existence. It affords a home for young men attending the university, and the means of theological education for students of divinity. The General Assembly has enacted that one of 1875 note but graciously shall be admitted as candidates for the office of the ministry.

3. Mission Work.—Three classes are recognised: the aborigines, the Polynesian tribes, and the Chinese in the gold-fields. The aborigines are so widely scattered that efforts among them have been chiefly desultory. A desire of the missionaries to work successfully among their countrymen at Sydney. The New Hebrides Mission has a share of support from this Church, which at one time supported the Rev. James D. Gordon, who, after returning to Eromanga, was murdered in 1872.

4. Presbyterian Church of Queensland.—In 1859 the District of Queensland was declared a separate Missionary Field, called Queensland. The first Presbyterian minister had arrived in 1847. In 1863 the separate congregations belonging to the different sections of Presbyterianism united as "The Presbyterian Church of Queensland." The basis of union was the Westminster Confession, and all the Presbyterian congregations in the colony were embraced. There are 8 presbyteries, 24 charges, and 20 ministers. The General Assembly meets the first Monday of May. There are committees for Sabbath-schools (2410 scholars), Home Mission and Church Extension, Sustentation, Training Young Men for the Ministry, and the Support of Aged and Orphaned Ministers. The Presbyterian population of the colony is 22,000. The annual contributions are about £9000.

5. Presbyterian Church of Tasmania.—The first Presbyterian minister arrived at Hobart Town in 1826. In 1828 the first church was built, the property of Van Diemen's Land, and the Scotch Church was placed on an equality with the English. In 1845 an attempt was made by the bishop of the English Church in Van Diemen's Land to obtain authority over all the inhabitants, but the Presbyterians succeeded in blocking this, and in getting a resolution limiting the power of the English bishop in these colonies to the superintendence of his own clergy. The Presbyterian Church has not been equally prosperous in this as in other colonies, and there is still a division in the ranks. The Presbytery of Tasmania and the Free Presbyterian Church of Tasmania indicate this division. There are 17 charges in all, and 18 ministers.

6. Presbyterian Church of South Australia.—The first Presbyterian Church began in Adelaide in 1859, and for some years ministers from the different Presbyterian bodies continued to drop in. In 1865 a union was effected. There are now 11 ministers and 13 charges. Union College is supplied by an independent professor of Church history; a Baptist, of the Greek Testament; and a Presbyterian, of theology.

7. New Zealand.—The Presbyterian Church in New Zealand was first planted here about the year 1840; at least the first minister went there then. The Church has made good progress, and has been geographically divided into The Presbyterian Church of New Zealand and The Free Church of Otago. In 1875 the Church in the northern section had 7 presbyteries, 57 ministers in charges, and 4 unattached. The Otago branch, founded in 1848 by a Free Church colony from Scotland, had 45 ministers, but in both sections there is a great demand for more. Besides the ministers there is a considerable number of evangelists who strive in some degree to make up for the want of a stated ministry. The New Zealand Churches present the same interesting spectacle as other young colonial churches, striving after an organization on the model of Scotland, and having committees and schemes organized for that purpose. Much has been done by the Presbyterian Church for general education, and the chair of moral philosophy in the University of Otago was endowed by them. The effort to obtain a well-educated ministry is conspicuous in its struggles, and in Otago a beginning has been made toward the establishment of a theological institute in one of which a professor of divinity and various tutors appointed. In other parts of the colony efforts have likewise been made to supply an educated ministry. But the difficulties in this direction have been great; many Presbyterians have labored successfully among the Chinese, the aborigines, and the Maoris, the work having been done by the churches at home. Much is done in the way of Sunday-schools. Young Men's Christian Assoc.
PRESERVATIONISM

Some congregations do little or nothing for missions; others are much interested in them.

The New Hebrides Mission receives a good share of help, and recently something has been attempted for Fiji. There are committees for Sustentation, Church Extension, etc., and similar objects in both sections of the Church, betting no small amount of activity and earnestness.

8. Presbyterian Church in South Africa.—When the Cape became an English colony in 1654, an application was made to the Church of Scotland for ministerial supply, and in 1659 and following years eleven ministers joined the Cape Church. In 1860 eight more Scotch ministers joined this Dutch Reformed body. There are, besides, nine Independent Presbyterian congregations in Cape Colony and Natal, numbering about 1000 members.

9. Other Colonial Churches.—In connection with the Church of Scotland, there are:

- In South America: 14 ministers
- In West Indies: 0 ministers
- In Ceylon: 0 ministers

Connected with the Free Church of Scotland are:

- In South Africa: 5 ministers
- In Natal: 4 ministers
- In other places: 9 ministers

10. Presbyterian Church in Japan.—This body was organized in 1874 by a union of all Presbyterian missions in Japan. For doctrine, the Westminster Catechism, the canons of the Synod of Dort, the Shorter Catechism, and the Heidelberg Catechism were adopted.

The constitution of the American Presbyterian Church was chosen as the model for administration.

See, besides the works already quoted in different sections of this article, Smith, Tables of Church History; Gardner, Faiths of the World, vol. ii; The American Cyclop. xiii, 809 sq.; Schenck, Cyclop. of Education, s. v.; Marble, Westminster, or Christian Churches and Sects, ii, 109 sq.; and Bleeker's Report, all of which have been freely used.

Presbyterianism, in its narrowest sense, is commonly understood as the synonym of Anti-Prelacy. But, in truth, there are three systems of religious opinion, by no means necessarily affiliated, which are, with a noticeable uniformity, found in combination under this name. These are, a Calvinistic theology, the Parity of the Clergy, and Pseudobaptism. See PRESERVATION CHURCHES. All branches of Presbyterianism organized themselves into a Presbyterian Alliance in London in 1875 on the bases of the London, Edinburgh, and Dublin Confessions and of the United Presbyterian government, and held the first council at Edinburg in 1877. The next will convene in Philadelphia in 1880.

I. Doctrines.—The doctrines espoused by Presbyterians, in Great Britain and America, are found in the Confession of Faith of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, together with the Catechisms, Larger and Shorter, thereto appended. As a system, they are the doctrines generally known as Augustinian or Calvinistic. Presbyterianism coincide with other orthodox bodies in the reception of the Apostles' Creed, the Trinity, Redemption through Christ, Regeneration by the Holy Spirit, the Resurrection, and Eternal Judgment. They are distinguished specially by opposition to Arminianism, Pelagianism, and semi-Pelagian tenets. The decisions of the Synod of Dort on the "five points" of Presbyterianism, Particular Atonement, Original Sin, Special Grace, and the Perseverance of the Saints, have usually been acknowledged as settling forth their views. But while there is a substantial unity on these points, there are shades of difference, from High or Hyper Calvinism to Moderate Calvinism; from Supralapsarianism to Sublapsarianism; from Hopkinstianism to Baptisterianism; from the unbending Covenanters to the laxer Cumberlands; from the strict Old School with Scottish predilections to the more flexible New School with New England leanings. Though consenting to be called Calvinistic for purposes of convenience, Presbyterians do not receive all Calvin's views without qualification; neither do they admit within their system to the Genevan re- former, for they claim for it a higher antiquity, reaching even beyond the great champion Augustine to no less ancient a figure than Melancthon, who, according to their view, was the author of the points named, as appears from the harmony of the Augsburg Confession, the Heidelberg Catechism, the Helvetic Confession, the Scotch Confession, the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, the French Confession prepared and fixed by the Thirty, and the Scotch Confession, and the Decrees of the Synod of Dort in 1618.

The Westminster Confession, rejecting the Aporcypa, recognizes Holy Scripture as the only infallible rule of faith and practice. Hence every position is supported by proof-texts. The Confession teaches that there are in the godhead three persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, the same in substance, equal in power and glory. To God are ascribed the works of creation, providence, and redemption. Man having fallen, the Covenant of Works is replaced by the Covenant of Grace, of which Christ is the Mediator, the head and administrator for his elect people. Divine sovereignty and man's free agency are both fully and equally admitted, without attempting to explain this high mystery, but rather requiring it to be handled with special providence and care. The doctrine of the Divine Providence, of Free Will, Predestination, or Foro-ordination, is guarded from fatalism or perversion in several ways: it is explicitly stated that neither is God the author or approver of sin; nor is violence offered to the will of the creature; nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established; and they who perish are punished for their sins. The Covenant of Works having been broken by the first man, who was the federal head, representative, and root of his race, a consequent corruption of nature, a disability of the will to spiritual good, and a liability to subjection to death, temporal and eternal, were conveyed to all his posterity. Effectual calling consists in the special grace of God operating on the minds and hearts of all those whom he has predestinated to eternal life, in the reception of which grace men are passive, yet submit most freely, being made willing by his power. Elect infants dying in infancy, and other elect persons who are incapable of the outward call, are nevertheless regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who worketh when, where, and how he pleaseth. That all infants dying in infancy come under the above circumstances through a dispensation of the grace of God is the ground of the belief of many Presbyterians, so far as can be collected from their published writings. (See Chalmers, Rom. lect. xxiv, xxvi, Cumming, Infant Sale, p. 25; Smyth, Bereaved Parents, p. 18; Junkin, Justification, pp. 148; Hodge, System of Theology [see Index].) Justification consists, not in inherent righteousness, nor in imputing the act of faith or any other act as righteousness, but in the pardon of sin for Christ's sake, and the accepting as right- eous by imputing the righteousness of Christ received by faith. Adoption and sanctification accompany justification. Salvation being the sovereign grace of God, is shown to be sincere and active by repentance and good works, as evidential of regenerating grace. The perseverance of the saints is not owing to anything in them, but to the grace of God, which will not suffer them finally to fall away. Personal assurance does not belong to the essence of faith, and may be dimmed or lost, but it is a high privilege, and every believer should strive to attain it. It does not lead to laxity of morals, for the law, though no longer a covenant of works, is still binding as a rule of life and conduct.

III. Worship.—The Presbyterian forms of worship are extremely simple. The reading of a portion of Scripture, extemporaneous prayers, the singing of two or three psalms or hymns, a sermon or exhortation, and the pronouncing of the apostolic benediction at the close by the minister, comprise the entire service.
When no preacher is present, the people conduct the meeting themselves, an elder presiding and directing the several parts of reading, prayer, and praise. Nothing can be simpler or more flexible, capable of adapting itself to the necessities of the missionaries; like a master of ceremonies, the Presbyterian preacher, as well as to the wants of the most cultivated audiences. But while the Presbyterian Church neither uses nor condems a liturgy, she provides for the dignity and propriety of divine service by means of a Directory for Public Worship as a guide, and by requiring ministers among them and as for this duty, no less than for that of preaching, by reading, presidemation, and habitual communion with God in secret.

Presbyterians keep the Sabbath-day strictly as a day of rest and devotion; but they have conscientious scruples against the obligatory observance of such days as Christmas, Good-Friday, and Easter. The key to their practice in this and other respects (as declining to bow at the name of Jesus, avoiding the sign of the cross in baptism and its form in church architecture, refusing sponsors and confirmation, not marrying with a ring, disowning clerical vestments, etc.) is to be found in the adoption by the early Presbyterians of the principle that nothing is allowable in divine worship but what is divinely commanded, in opposition to the principle that everything is allowable except what is forbidden by God and prohibited by divine warrant—baptism and the Lord's Supper. Dipping or immersion is not in so many words forbidden, but is pronounced not necessary, and the ordinance is considered to be rightly administered by pouring or sprinkling—purification, not burial. Hence the idea symbolized thereby. The infant children of one or both believing parents have a right to baptism in virtue of the Abrahamic covenant, which, being anterior to Moses, was unaffected and unrepealed by the abrogation of the Mosaic law. Baptism being regarded as a public Church ordinance, no excuse or fitness of the case or necessity, are discouraged. The Lord's Supper is only a commemoration with bread and wine, and the idea of a sacrifice or of the real presence is carefully repudiated. At the same time, the spiritual presence of Christ, his special nearness to worthy receivers, and a peculiar blessing are as strongly maintained. To avoid the appearance of adoration of the elements, as well as better to conform to the supposed original posture of the apostles, this sacrament is taken sitting, either in the adjacent pews or around long tables provided for the purpose. Under the closest inspection, honey tumblers, a sort of jorum, or vessel for liquid, are admitted as having on profession their faith in Christ been received into the membership of the Church by the session, or such other persons as are known to be in good Church standing elsewhere. During the field-preaching of the Scotch Presbyterians, and subsequently, several neighboring congregations often joined together to observe the communion. On such occasions there were several successive celebrations of the Supper, called the first, second, or third "table," and so on. A small pewter token bearing a certain number was given to each worshipper, sealed, and put into the care of the person at which his bearer was expected to communicate. Sentiment congregations thus came to employ the token in their own services. Latterly the token has been replaced by a card on which the communicant writes his name and address, keeping in this manner the pastor aware of his residence. This using of a card at the same time exhibits the Presbyterian opposition to open or indiscriminate communion, while the welcome given to members of other evangelical churches shows equally opposition to close communion, so that the doctrine of the Church is that of restricted communion as an exercise of a privilege to brethren of known Christian character.

III. Government. Presbyterianism is the government of elders, being derived from the Greek ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, presbyter, or elder. It is conceived to be analogous to that of the Hebrews, the Synagogue of the Greeks, the senatus of the Romans, the aldermen of the Anglo-Saxons, and, so, to be founded in the necessities, instincts, and common-sense of human nature as well as in Scripture itself. Presbyterians acknowledge no other head of the Church than Christ. Instead of giving to the pastor or to presbyterian the right different from and superior to presbyter, and maintaining a distinction of ranks among the ministers of religion, it holds, on the contrary, that both in Scripture and the constitution of the Primitive Church bishop and presbyter are of equal rights and that there is complete equality in point of office and power among those who preach and administer the sacraments, however they may differ in age, abilities, or requirements. The argument as between the Presbyterians and Episcopalian is treated in the articles Bishop and Presbyter, and as between the Presbyterians and Congregationalists, or Independents, in the articles Elder and Ordination.

According to the views of Presbyterians, there ought to be three classes of officers in every completely organized Church—viz. at least one teaching elder, the bishop or pastor, a body of ruling elders, and deacons. The first is designed to minister in word and doctrine and to dispense the sacraments, the second to assist in the inspection and government of the congregation, and the third to manage its financial affairs. They disallow all jurisdiction or interference on the part of the civil ruler in the Church, and yet do not allow of no less jealous of ecclesiastical encroachments, and boldly assert that synods and councils may err, and have erred; that all Church power is only ministerial and declarative; that no Church judicature has the right to make laws to bind the conscience by virtue of its own authority; that God alone is lord of the conscience; and that the right of private judgment is universal and inalienable. They maintain the purity of the clergy, and protest against prelacy or episcopacy, or the one-man power, as a usurpation finding no warrant in the New Testament writings, and of which none of them are nearest to their time. They less disapprove of the opposite extreme of Indepedency, or the complete autonomy of each separate congregation. They view the whole collection of believers as one body, constituting the universal or catholic Church (meaning by "catholic" not confined to one nation, as before under the law), though distributed into particular congregations for the purpose of meeting together more conveniently.

Though Presbyterian churches hold the doctrine of a parity of ministers, they have, when fully organized, a gradation of able assistants from the elders, deacons, and other officers in the church, and discipline, and the Presbyterian system is thus further distinguished from others by this ascending series of appellate courts. The first or lowest court is the Church Session, consisting of the pastor and ruling elders chosen for the purpose. In the next, several elders chosen by the church, and so on. These in some cases are chosen and ordained for life, although, either of their own motion or that of the people, they may resign and cease to be acting elders. The next court above is the Presbytery, which is the only ordaining body, meeting twice or oftener in the year, and consisting of all the ministers and elders of each church within a given district. The Synod, which meets but once a year, comprises a number of adjacent presbyteries (those within a state, for instance), and is composed of all the ministers, and one elder from each church session, within those bounds. (For the peculiar authority and character of the synods in the state establishments of the Continent, see the article Synod.) The General Assembly, which meets annually, is the fourth and highest court in order, and embraces all the presbyteries in the connection. It is entirely a delegates body, in which an equal representation of elders or ministers and ruling elders elected by the presbyteries to represent them, the ratio being determined by the size of the body, and care being taken to prevent its becoming unwieldy. Each superior court or judicature has the constitutional right of reviewing, in the case of its own, the doings and decisions of the court below. A moored question or a judicial case may thus be removed successively from one court to another, till the collective wisdom of the whole Church, represented in the court of final resort, free from local prejudices or partialities, has an opportunity of deciding upon it. The General Assembly, through its councils, directories, committees, or committees, a general jurisdiction over the common finances, theological seminaries, foreign and domestic missions, education for the ministry, publication, church building, and correspondence with foreign churches.

It only remains to add that though Presbyterians maintain that truth is in order to goodness, and are fantastic of what they understand to be the teaching of Scripture, they are, at the same time, neither bigoted nor exclusive, and to represent them as such they consider unfair in the extreme. They do not unchurch other denominations, but are ready to extend the hand of fellowship wherever they discern substantial truth and the image of Christ. Their standards explicitly say, "We embrace in the spirit of charity those Christians who differ from us, in opinion or practice, on these subjects. . . . There are truths and forms with respect to which men of good character and principles may differ; and in all these they think it the duty, both of private Christians and societies, to exercise mutual forbearance towards each other." (Form of Gov., bk. i., ch. i., p. 8.) See Hagenbach, Hist. of the Ref. Conf. (1877); Lewis, Presb. Manual, containing Forms for the Records of the Session Presbytery and Synod, and the Judicial and other Ecclesiastical Proceedings required by the Policy of the Presb. Church; and the Theod. Index. See also the Indexes of the Westminster Assembly; Hist, of Confessions; Miller, on Presbyterianism; Smyth, Works and Tracts on Presbyterianism; Schaff, History of the Reformed Churches, vol. iii.; and the Theod. Index. (E. H. 47.)

Presbyterians, as derived from the peculiar Church government which is advocated (see Presbyter and Presbyterianism), designates a large body of Protestant Christians not bound together in one large denomination, but associated in independent churches. As, however, the term Congregationalist embraces not merely the denomination which assumes that title, but also those whose principles of government are the same though their doctrines may be diverse, as the Baptists, the Christians or Campbellites, the Unitarians, etc., so the Presbyterian has been extended to all those who accept the Presbyterian principles of government, even though there be some differences in their theological beliefs. All Presbyterian or Reformed churches may in general be said to be divided into three classes—those who hold to government by or through bishops, i.e. to an Episcopal government; those who hold to government directly by the members of the Church without the mediation of any representatives, i.e. to a Congregational or Independent form of government; and those who hold to government by a board of elders or presbyters, i.e. to a Presbyterian form of government. Presbyterianism, variously modified, is the form of Church government observed by many Presbyterian churches, but is most perfectly developed in Britain and America. In Britain it prevails chiefly in Scotland, although during the Commonwealth in the 17th century it was for a very short time in the ascendant in England also. In the "General Presbyterian Council" held at Edinburgh in July, 1677, the German state establishments and the French and Dutch Reformed churches, as well as other bodies that admit of certain features of Presbyterianism in government, were represented; and in 1846, a Report on Presbyterian Churches, which was submitted and approved by the Pan-Presbyterian Council at Edinburgh, treats of all these churches as Presbyterian bodies. In most, if not all of these churches, while there is a consociational system that connects them with the state, giving the latter considerable control, there is also a true Presbyterian and synodal constitution. In virtue of the former, these churches have in some cases a general oversight of all matters affecting the moral and religious well-being of the community, and in the exercise of the latter they deal more especially with spiritual and moral matters. These churches are not all affiliated or advocated by the Scottish Reformers, and still exhibited to some extent by the presence in the General Assembly of the Scottish Established Church of a representative of the sovereign called the lord high commissioner, authorized to bring its sessions at any time to a close should the proceedings conflict with the royal prerogatives—by the presence as members of the Assembly not only of elders chosen by the churches, but of elders appointed to be there by the town councils of such places as are possessed of royal charters, and hence called royal burgesses, and by the wide range of social as well as of religious questions that it considers. In Presbyterian churches not connected with the state, whether in Great Britain, on the continent of Europe, in this country or elsewhere, the jurisdiction being over only their own members and civil representatives unknown, the discussions are confined to matters directly affecting the interests of religion, and a more purely spiritual type of Presbyterianism in consequence prevails. See the articles Belgium; Bohemia; France; Holland; Hungary; Italy; Prussia; Russia; Spain; Sweden; and Schaff, History of the Reformed Church. The system is more nearly Presbyterian than the German, and is not perfectly so only from the pressure of the civil power. In other churches, also, as well as in the Protestant Church of France, Presbyterianism is more or less modified by the relations of the Church to the State. See Reformed Churches.

The Presbyterians are for the most part Calvinistic in doctrine. They generally accept the Westminster Assembly's Confession of Faith as their symbol of belief, and every minister in the Presbyterian Church of the United States is required to declare his personal belief in it as an embodiment of the truths taught in the Scriptures. They do not agree, however, in their interpretation of that standard, and are divided into strict Calvinists and modernist Calvinists. See Calvinsim. This division in sentiment, combined with other circumstances, divided the Presbyterian Church of the United States into two bodies for a time, as we have already seen; but the division has been healed and a reunion effected, the theological differences having slanted. See Paxson, History of Presbyterianism. See also the Index. The Church in America not Calvinistic is the Cumberland Presbyterian. There was at one time, however, a serious defection in England, many of the churches becoming Socinian in doctrine; but the Unitarian churches in England at this day are nearly all Congregational in their polity. Calvin is generally regarded as the founder of Presbyterianism; but it should be borne in mind that government by a board of elders was maintained by certain bodies, as the Waldensians, from a very early date. Of course, we are ready to grant that he adopted the form, combined with other circumstances, which he believed to be "founded on and agreeable to the Word of God." Calvin may be regarded as the founder of Presbyterianism in the sense that he was the first to organize the Reformed Church on a Presbyterian model, just as he was the first to frame the Reformed faith of Southern Europe in a clear, distinct, and affirmative form. Says Blaikie: "It is not correct to say that Calvin originated the Presbyterian system. But in connection with it he rendered very essential service both in theory and in practice; he unfolded the idea more distinctly than any person before him, and the struggle he set it in actual operation in Geneva. What he thus established became the model on which the Reformed Church in France and other countries was formed." (Report, p. 7.)

PRESBYTERIUM

PRESBYTERIUM

(1) A name sometimes given to the bishops, or in a portion of an ancient document, because it was the place in which the presbyters sat and discharged their functions. See CHANCEL.

(2) The name also of the senate formed by the presbyters and deacons of the episcopal residence, with whom the bishop deliberated about the most important affairs of his diocese. Although the government of the Church was claimed by the episcopate, as inherited from the apostolate, yet the spirit of community, koinonia, which prevailed in the Church required that the bishop, when important business was to be transacted, should take the advice of the presbyters and deacons. The limits of the respective attributes, however distinctly they might be traced, were neglected where the common care of the interests of the Church made it desirable, and the superiority of the episcopal dignity stood the less in the way, as even the apostles, in their humility, had called themselves presbyters (1 Pet. v. 1, διδασκάλους; 2 John 1; 3 John 1, ὁ πρεσβύτερος). Irenæus gives the name of presbyters not only to the disciples of the apostles (Papias, in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. v. 29); but also to the bishops of his time (Iren. Ep. ad Phil. v. 17, in Euseb. v. 20): ταύτα δὲ διάγνησιν οἱ πρεσβύτεροι, οἱ Παπίαντες τὰς λαθέσεις τῶν αὐθηναίων ἄνεγκριτον καὶ παράδειγμα πρεσβύτερος. Hence, it is clear that the presbyterate was a part of the higher clergy, as is proved by the phrase βοηθεία ἐκκλησίας θεοῦ, by which Origen (cf. Origen, Adv. Cels. i. 10) designates the presbyterate. In a sense, all the people constituted the presbyters and deacons of the archiepiscopal city formed in the first five centuries the higher clergy, which, with its bishops, was considered as one body, as Thaumaturgus, Vetus et Nova Ecclesiae Disciplinae (Mogunt. 1797), iii. 82: Ἐργο πρεσβυτερίου diaconique civilium episcopaliun, quae est superior dioecescum — in unum corpus, in unum senatum constitutioneque cum episcopo collatis, cum omne principio et capite suoe, clericis populosque diocesii omnibus moderabantur. As this presbyterate forms the council of the bishop, it is said to be associated with the bishop along with the bishop. Thus, in the Council of Antioch, can. 1: "Si quis sacerdos, qui praebet ecclesiam, aut episcopus, aut presbyter, aut diaconus, si cum pontifici, haud propriis ministeris, aut aliis ecclesiasticis ordinibus laudati habeat, sed cum sacerdotibus, episcopis, et presbyteribus, et diaconis, et omni ecclesiasticis concilii communitate etiam in ecclesia imperiti," and consequently to the governing clergy. In the ecumenical Council of Ephesus, pt. i. c. 31, 84, and act i, we find several letters of the bishop Cyril of Alexandria, addressed to the presbyters and deacons, and to the people of Alexandria. When Theodosius I consecrated the heresy of Jovinian, he took the advice of his priests and deacons: "Fatto ergo presbyteri consilium Christiane legi esse contraria. Omnium nostrorum, tam presbyterorum quam diaconorum, quam etiam totius ecclesiae, et aliquarum clericarum una suscipta fuit sententia." Pope Felix proclaims his sentence against Petrus Enotheus, the unlawful bishop of Antioch, under the formula: "Firma sit hanc sua deposicio a me et ab his, qui mecum apostolicum dictum nuntium regunt." The presbyters and deacons of Rome deliberated in the Roman synods with the bishops who happened to be at Rome on all matters which were of interest to the Roman see. In a Roman council under pope Hilary, the transmutation of a Spanish bishop being in question, the account says: "Residuit etiam universa presbyteratus, adstantibus quoque concilio," and at the end of the council: "Ab episcopis universalibus et presbyteris acclamatum est, ut disciplina servetur, ut canones custodiantur, rogamin." The college of the cardinals is by the Romanists claimed to be a true picture of these presbyters of the apostolic Church. If in the experience of the Church in general the advice of the presbyters was requested, this was still more natural where the special business of the several bishoprics was concerned. The fourth Council of Carthage prescribes, can. 22: "Ut episcopus autiam in quocumque concilio suorum clericos non ordinaret," and in can. 23: "Ut episcopus autiam in quocumque concilio suorum audiat abeque presentia clericorum suorum." irrita eit sententia episcopi, niai clerorum suorum majorum sententia confirmitur." St. Jerome says (In Ps. 1, 8): "Et nos sanctos Patres ad Petrum presbyterorum;" and Basil, Ep. 310, calls this senate του πρεσβυτηρίου το ν η την πωλει. St. Cyprian transacted no business of any consequence without consulting his presbytery. In the matter of the fallen ones, in the imitation of the only one constillobus cum episcope, presbyteria, diaconias, confessoriebus pariter astantibus laicis factis, laicorum tractare ratioem. In lib. iii, ep. 10: "Ad id vero, quod scripturam compresbyteri nostri, solus rescribere nihil potuit, cum a primordio episcopatis mei statutum, nihil sine consilio vestro. Qui enim in plebe res publicae partes in suis factis sententiae gerere. St. Ignatius (Ep. ad Trallianos) calls the presbyters the counsellors of the bishop: συμβουλη η αν ιν η των επιστροφων ς ς των συνεδριων των απόστολων. The difference between the presbyteries and the cathedral chapters, which were of later institution, is thus defined by Theodossin (c. 1, p. 36, nr. 8 sq.): "1. Non constat clericus ille nasi presbyteria et diaconia. 2. Presbyteri et diaconi hi, parochii ipse erant et pastores omniun civitatis ecclesiastici, aut si neodium essent divulgis a cathedrali parochii, in eo ipsi parochii, pleno potestate tribui. 3. Sacram omissae conversionis hunc gradum et hunc dignitatem consequentur. Nam presbyteratus et diaconatus per se episcopatus beneficia erant, non ordinum tantum; et id genus erant beneficia, quibus Incumbent salutis animarum cura, pro sua manu, a Christo mediante ministeriis ecclesiasticis formam pro se fert splendidissimam expressissimamque eunies cleri, qui olim singula in cathedralibus ecclesiis episcopo copulabatur. Constat enim pontificis clericis presbyteris, diaconisque cardinalibus, seu titularibus, ecclesiis omniun Romae parochialibus, parochiis, cum pontificis, et sub pontifici conscriptis et collaborantibus Romano in consistorio, de negotiis omnibus, que ex pontificii spiritualis ditiione, ex universal, inquam, Christiano orbe referuntur." A consequence of the participation of the presbyters in the administration during the lifetime of the bishop was that they governed alone during the vacancy of the see. After the death of pope Fabian, the clergy of Rome wrote to the clergy of Carthage (Ep. 29 ap. Cypri): "Omnes nos decret, pro corpore totius ecclesiae, suæ per varias quasque provincias membra digesta sunt, excubare." Only the decisions about the most momentous concerns were postponed till after the new occupancy of the see. Thus the clergy of Rome say (Ep. 81): "Quanquam nobis differente bus rei majoris natura necinbat, quibus post excessum Fabiani nullus est episcopus proprius rerum." And St. Cyprian (Ep. 10) says to his presbyters and deacons: "Hortor et mane, ut vos vos mutue, quern obsero operet, fungaminii circa ea gerenda quas administratio religiosa deposcit." And lib. ivr, ep. 6: "Officium meum diligentia vestra presentet, et faciat omnia, quae fieri operet circa eos." Thus St. Hilarius, in his petition to the emperor Constantius, states that he has administered his diocese through his presbyters: "Licet in exilio permans et ecclesiae adiacun communionem per presbyteros meos distribuens." But at an early period the bishops commenced to appoint vicars for the despatch of all their business at the time of their absence. Their authority over the other members of the clergy was increased with the secularization of the church. St. Eusebius of Vercelli and St. Augustine, to promote Christian life in their presbyters, had already given them monastic constitutions. Other cathedral churches imitated this arrangement; and in the empire of the Franks the institution of canons life, after the model of the institutions founded by bishop Ouen of Mesc, was rapidly extended. In consequence of the confirmation of the rule proposed by the descom Amalarius at the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (816), the innovation was accepted in all episcopal churches. The bishops of those times, in the absence of the pope, relied on the advice and importance without their canons. We have an example of it in the business transacted concerning the lease of some real estate between Hincmar of Rheims and a Thuringian abbot. But if the cathedral chapter was the privileged part of the clergy in this respect, yet the bishop was not, in fact, independent of the other members both of the secular and regular clergy. Thus bishop Jonas of Autun, who wished to raise the income of his canons, insured the "consensus presbyterorum, diaconorum, ac totius sequentia ordinis ejusdem ecclesiae." When, in the 10th century, the canonic common life was given up, the canons continued to form the senate of the bishop. According to the decretales, the canons are the born counsellors of the bishops. Calixtus II forbids archpriests and archdeacons to interdict clerics: "Proter episcopos et totius capituli canonicos." Alexander III binds them to administer the patriarchal Jerusalem for appointing and deposing abbots and other prebendaries without consulting his chapter, and upon the mere advice of foreigners. Yet, as a rule, the bishop is not bound by the vote of the chapter, although there are exceptions. The Holy Council of Trent also, in sess. xxiv, c. 13, calls the cathedral chapter the senate of the bishop. He has to take its advice for the appointment of a lector of the Holy Scriptures (Conc. Trid. sess. v, c. 1); for the fixing of the holy orders, to be requested in those who are to be promoted to the dignities and canons of the cathedral (sess. xxiv, c. 12); for the establishment of seminaries (sess. xxiii, c. 18); for any addition to the number of the canons (sess. xxiv, c. 15). But the presumption is always in favor of the episcopal independence. Thus, when the chapters of the ecclesiastical province of Milan endeavored to increase to an unlawful extent the number of the cause majora, in which the bishop has to obtain the consent or take the advice of the canons, St. Bonomus declared, in the fourth Council of Milan, that the bishop was bound to have the approbation or to take the advice of his chapter only in such cases as are stated by law. The litigations about these cases had become of quite frequent occurrence since the dissolution of the community of goods in the chapters, and the latter had consequently reduced their rights as to regard to the bishop as independent corporations. In many places the bishop had become a simple member of the chapter. Up to the year 1808 the chapters of Germany held the same time two sharply defined positions: they constituted, first, as of old, the senate of the bishop, and subordinated to him; and, secondly, they were independent corporations. The secularization of 1803 deprived this latter position. The reorganization of the Church in Germany makes the chapter simply an episcopal council. The papal see has resolutely fought against all pretensions to binding the bishop to the consent of the chapter.

Presbytery is (1) the place in the choir of a church in which the bishop is placed; the name is sometimes extended to the whole choir. See CHANCEL. It is (2), in Scotch law, an ecclesiastical division of the country, as well as a court. (On the Continent this is known as the classic.) In its local sense it includes a bishopric, with its cathedral city and the coadjutor bishopric, and the general assembly of the Church of Scotland has power to vary the size. — Chambers, a. v. See SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF. The presbytery is composed of the teaching elders of the churches of a given geographical.
Presbytis

Prescience (presbytis). This word, in the various forms presbytis, presbytera, presbyterian, is of frequent occurrence in ancient writers, and denotes either the wife of a presbyter or a deaconess in the Church. Sometimes it denotes the matron of a cloister, and an abbess. See Deaconess.

Prescience (Lat. praecipio, to know before it happens) is an attribute of God popularly known under the term Foreknowledge, and ascribed to him in different degrees and extent by Arminians and Calvinists. The doctrine is deduced from the perfection of God's nature. But it must be noted that analogical figurative expressions, if they are possible, and not impossible, for us to conceive of God's prescience. Man's knowledge of what is future is so obscure and inferential that it is in vain to fathom God's beholding of all things. Yet in the attempt made there arises the great question, how to reconcile the prescience of God with the liberty of man; and hence the doctrine becomes of vast importance to theologians of both the Arminian and the Calvinian schools.

1. False Theories. Three leading theories have been resorted to in order to evade the difficulties which are supposed to be involved in the opinion commonly received.

1. Chevalier Ramsey (Philosophical Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion (Glasiog, 1748, 2 vols. 4to)), among his other speculations, holds it a matter of choice in God to think of finite ideas, and similar opinions, which have been accepted, whether true or false. In substance these opinions are, that though the knowledge of God be infinite as his power is infinite, there is no more reason to conclude that his knowledge should be always exerted to the full extent of its capacity, than his will is to the development of his omnipotence; and that if we suppose him to choose not to know some contingencies, the infiniteness of his knowledge is not thereby impugned. To this it may be answered (1) that the infinite power of God is in Scripture represented, as in the nature of things it must be, as an infinite capacity, and not as infinite in act; but that the knowledge of God is never represented to us as a capacity to acquire knowledge, but as actually comprehending all things that are and all things that can be. (2) That the notion of God's choosing to know some things and not to know others supposes a reason why he refuses to know any class of things or events, which reason, it would seem, can only arise out of their nature and circumstances, and therefore supposes at least a partial knowledge of them, from which the reason for his not choosing to know them arises. The doctrine is therefore somewhat contradictory. But (3) it is fatal to this opinion that it does not at all meet the difficulty arising out of the question of the consistency of divine prescience and the free actions of men, since some contingent actions—for which men have been made accountable, we are sure—have been foreknown by him as the cause by his Spirit in the prophets they were foretold; and if the freedom of man can in these cases be reconciled with the prescience of God, there is no greater difficulty in any other case which can possibly occur.

2. A second is this: the church states that contingent events being in its own nature impossible, because it implies a contradiction, it does no dishonor to the divine Being to affirm that of such events he has, and can have, no prescience whatever, and thus the prescience of God as to moral actions being wholly denied, the difficulty in question is got rid of. To this the same answer must be given as to the former. It does not meet the case so long as the Scriptures are allowed to contain prophecies of rewardable and punishable actions. The great fallacy in the argument that the certain prescience of a moral action destroys its contingent nature lies in supposing that contingency and certainty are the opposites of each other. It is, perhaps, unfortunate that a word which is of figurative etymology, and which, consequently, can only have an ideal application to such subjects, should have grown into common use in this discussion, because it is more liable, on that account, to present itself to different minds under different shades of meaning. If, however, the term contingent in this controversy has any definite meaning at all, as applied to the moral actions of men, it must mean freedom, and stand in the same relation to certainty, but to necessity. A free action is a voluntary one; and an action which results from the choice of the agent is distinguished from a necessary one in this, that it might not have been, or have been otherwise, according to the self-determining power of the agent. It is with reference to the particular occasion that the term contingency is used: it might have been otherwise—in other words, it was not necessitated. Contingency in moral actions is, therefore, their freedom, and is opposed, not to certainty, but to constraint. The very nature of the term presupposes freedom; and this is precisely the meaning of the term. The question is not, in point of fact, about the certainty of moral actions—that is, whether they will happen or not—but about the nature of them, whether free or constrained, whether they must happen or not. Those who agree that the care not about the certainty of actions simply considered, that is, whether they will take place or not: the reason why they object to a certain prescience of moral actions is this: they conclude that such a prescience renders them necessary. It is the quality of the action for which they conclude, not that they will not. If contingency meant uncertainty, the sense in which such theorists take it, the dispute would be at an end. But though an uncertain action cannot be foreseen as certain, a free, unceesitated action may, for there is nothing in its nature that should in any way affect its nature. Simple knowledge is in no sense a cause of action; nor can it be conceived to be causal, unconnected with exerted power: for mere knowledge, therefore, an action remains free or necessitated, as the case may be. A necessitated action is not made a voluntary one by its being foreknown: a free action is not made a necessitated action by being foreknown: it will no longer be free, therefore, cease to be contingent. But how stands the case as to their certainty? Precisely on the same ground. The certainty of a necessary action foreknown does not result from the knowledge of the action, but from the operation of the necessitating cause, and, in like manner, the certainty of a free action does not result from the knowledge of it, which is no cause at all, but from the voluntary cause—that is, the determination of the will. It alters not the case in the least to say that the voluntary action might have been otherwise. Had it been otherwise, the knowledge of it would have been otherwise; but as the will which gives birth to the action is not dependent upon the previous knowledge of God, but the knowledge of the action upon foresight of the choice of the will, neither the will nor the act is controlled by the knowledge, and the action, though foreseen, is still free or contingent. The foreknowledge of God has then no influence upon either the freedom or the certainty of actions, for this plain reason, that it is knowledge, and not influence; and actions may be certainly foreknown without their being rendered necessary by that knowledge. But if it is said, "But the result of an absolute contingency be certainly foreknown, it can have no other result, it can happen otherwise." This is not the true inference. It will not happen otherwise; but it may be asked, Why can it not happen otherwise? Can an expression of potentiality—it denotes power or possibility. The objection is that it is not possible that the action should otherwise happen. But why not? What deprives it of that power? If a necessary action were in question, it could not otherwise happen than as the necessitating cause should make it so. And if it is said, if God, in order to prevent the necessitating cause solely, and not from the prescience of the action, which is not causal. But if the action be free, and it enters into the very nature of a voluntary action to be unconstrained, then it might have happened in a thousand other ways, or not have happened at all; the foreknowledge of it no more affects its nature in this case than in the other. All its potentiality, so to speak, still remains, independent of foreknowledge, which neither adds to its power of happening otherwise nor diminishes it. But then we are told that the prescience of it is not the cause, that it happens of itself. But anyone can prove that the divine prescience is unable to dart through all the workings of the human mind, all its comparison of things in the judgment, all the influences of motives on the affections, all the hesitations and halting of the will; it is final cause; such knowledge is too wonderful for us, but it is the knowledge of him "who understandeth the thoughts of man afar off." "But if a contingency will have a given result, to that result it must be determined." Not in the least. We have seen that it cannot be determined to a given result by mere recognition, for we have evidence in our own minds that mere knowledge is not causal to the actions of another. It is determined to its result by the will of the agent; but even in that case it cannot be said that it must be determined to that result, because it is of the nature of freedom to be unconstrained: so that here we have an instance in the case of a free agent that he will act in some particular manner, but it by no means follows from what will be, whether foreseen or not, that it must be.

3. The theory amounts, in brief, to this: that the foreknowledge of God must be supposed to differ so much from anything of the kind which we perceive in ourselves, and from any ideas which we can possibly form of that property of the divine nature, that no argument respecting it can be grounded upon our imperfect knowledge of things; for if we take any subject connected with it is idle and fruitless. But though foreknowledge in God should be admitted to be something of a "very different nature" from the same quality in man, yet as it is represented as something equivalent to foreknowledge, whatever that something may be, since it is a kind of shadow, as a "map of China is to China itself," remains in full force. The difficulty is shifted, but not removed.

II. Extent of Prescience.—It may, therefore, be certainly concluded, if, at least, the Holy Scriptures are to be our guide, that the omniscience of God comprehends his certain prescience of all events, however contingent: and if anything more were necessary to strengthen the argument above given, it might be drawn from the irrational, and, above all, the unscriptural consequences which would follow from the denial of this doctrine. These are forcibly stated by President Edwards: "It would follow from this notion (namely, that his mighty doth not foreknow what will be the result of future contingencies) that as God is liable to be continually repenting what he has done, so he must be exposed to be constantly changing his mind and intentions as to the events which are to happen in the world; relinquishing his old designs, and forming new schemes and projects. For his purposes, even as to the main parts of the scheme (namely, such as belong to the state of his moral kingdom), must be always liable to be broken through want of foresight, and he must be continually putting his system to rights, as it gets out of order, through the contiguity of the actions of moral agents: he must be a Being who, instead of being absolutely immutable, must necessarily be the subject of infinitely the most numerous acts of repentance and changes of mind which are to happen in the world, and for this reason, that his vastly extensive charge comprehends an infinitely greater number of those things which are to him contingent and uncertain. In such a situation he must have little else to do but to mend broken links as well as he can, and be rectifying his disjointed frame and disordered movements in the best manner the case will allow. The supreme Lord of all things must needs be under great and miserable disadvantages in governing the world which he has made and has the care of, through his being utterly unable to find out things of which he is the chief inventor, and act, in your phrase, which, if he did but know, he might make reasonable provision for. In many cases there may be very great necessity that he should make provisions in the manner of his ordering and disposing things for some great events which are to happen in the world, and endless consequences to the universe, which he may see afterwards, when it is too late, and may wish in vain that he had known beforehand, that he might have ordered his affairs accordingly. And it is in the power of man, on these principles, by his devices, purposes, and actions, to dispose of himself and all his measures, make him continually to change his mind, subject him to vexation, and bring him into confusion."

III. Speculations on the Subject.—Some of the ancient philosophers denied that God could foreknow events depending on free will (see Cicero, De Diut. et vol. 4, 5; answered by Augustine, De Civitate Dei, v. 9, 10). Socinian (Proœct. Theol. c. 8-11) and his early followers would not allow that God possesses any knowledge of future contingencies. The schoolmen, in reference to this species of knowledge in God, invented the word "scientia memo" (see also Foxe, Acta Molitor, Mme), which they define as "that by which God knows, and condition, of men or angels will do according to the liberty which they have when they are placed in these or those circumstances, or in this or that order of things." It was said that these comments found that his opinion concerning the object of reprobes.
tion was dogged with this absurdity—that it made God to be the author of Adam’s sin—he very astutely took refuge in this conditional foreknowledge, and in his corrected theses on predestination, published after the death of Arminius, he describes it as “that by which God, through the infinite light of his own knowledge, foreknows in every event what is to come, and not what is to be placed under a certain condition.” Walaeus, the celebrated antagonist of Episcopius, had recourse to the same expedient. This distinction has been adopted by very few of those who espouse the doctrines of general redemption, and to show that every event is conclusive as to the creature, he adduces an argument with respect to God, certainly foreknown. An old English divine thinks that “in the sacred Scriptures certain not obscure vestiges are apparent of this kind of knowledge of things that will happen thus or otherwise, on the supposition of the occurrence of this or that circumstance. Omitting the well-known example of David in Keilah (1 Sam. xxiv, 12), and of Chorazin and Bethsaida (Matt. xi, 21; Luke x, 13), consult, among other sayings of the same description, Christ’s answer to the chief priests and scribes who asked him, ‘Tell us, and he said unto them, ‘If I tell you, ye will not believe.’ In the subsequent verse he adds, ‘If I also ask you, ye will not answer me, nor let me go’ (Luke xxii, 67, 68). You have here three events specified which yet will not occur even on the supposition of Christ our Lord—His own death, the resurrection of his apostles and others—and yet all these will be included in that of scientia visionis, because the latter ought to include, not what God will do and what his creatures will do under his appointment, but what they will do by his permission as free agents, and what he will do, as a consequence of this, in his character of Governor and Lord. But since the presedentarians had confounded scientia visionis with a predestination decree, the scientia media well expressed what they had left quite unaccounted for, and which they had assumed did not really exist—the actions of creatures endowed with free will and the acts of Deity which from eternity were consequent upon them. If such actions do not take place, then men are not free; and if the rectorial acts of God are not consequent upon the actions of the creature in the order of the divine intention, and the endowments of the creature is consequent upon the foreordained rectorial acts of God, then we reach a necessitating eternal decree, which, in fact, the predesentarian contends for; but it unfortunately brings after it consequences which no subtleties have ever been able to shake off—that the only actor in the universe is God himself, and that the only distinction that exists is that one class is brought to pass by God directly and the other indirectly, not by the agency, but by the mere instrumentality of his creatures.—Watson. Prescription. I. This expression, borrowed from the civil law, has in the Roman Catholic Church a canonistic meaning. In order to put limits to the contests about mine and thine in rights, obligations, and possessions, that Church has fixed terms which invest with legality the possession of rights and goods, unless proof be produced that these rights or goods are of an alienable kind, or have been acquired by illegal means (usurpation or theft time does not consecrate). If the lawful term be elapsed, the possessor is confirmed in the possession of said rights or goods, and he who is bound by the same obligation to the same cannot contest it, but he who has no exception. The term of prescription varies with the nature of the object: movable property prescribes quicker than immovable, the property of adults quicker than that of minors, the property of those present quicker than that of absentees; ecclesiastical property is prescribed only after forty years. According to the rubric in the diocesan and, the possessor of an ecclesiastical office, after a three-years’ possession, if it be not obtained by violence or simony, cannot be lawfully expelled from it. There is prescription in his favor.

If. Tertullian transplanted this expression to the theological domain by his work on prescriptions against heretics, a kind of argument against erroneous doctrine. This is what he means: The Catholic Church enjoys, in her doctrines and discipline, the right of prescription; what she teaches, what she practices at the present hour she has taught and practiced from times immemorial. She has taught it from the apostles, as the apostles learned from Christ, as Christ had it from the Father. The catholic doctrine is the true one, because it is the old and original one, and rests on the divine revelation; the doctrines of heretics and others—these may sometimes be true; but they have not been revealed by the Lord, because new, because they have not prescription in their favor, and consequently are not founded on divine revelation. Irenæus taught similarly. It is easy to see that this proof by prescription is much the same as the proof by tradition, and that this mode of arguing can have no acceptability in Protestantism, where the Bible alone is regarded as the true test, and the apostolic or early Church practices have only an advisory influence, not authority. Of course, High-Churchmen, by their ritualistic tendency, can hardly be said to come under the full influence of Protestantism, and are therefore not to be considered as included in the exponents of evangelical Christianity. See Elliott, Delimitation of Roman Catholicism, p. 61, 65, 407. See also Authority.

Prescription is also a law adopted in Presbyterian churches. If a scandal is not noticed for five years after it happens, it cannot be revived, but is then said to be prescribed.

Presence means, in canonical law, the uninterrupted personal residence of every regularly ordained ecclesiastical at the seat of his office; a duty emphatically imposed on him by the laws of the Church. It means also the personal attendance at the common choral prayer, to which the laws of the Church obligate all members of a monastic community, as well as the canons and choir-vicars of the cathedral and collegiate congregations.

Presence-money is the small daily payment in specie made by Roman Catholics to the canons for their presence in the choir at definite cathedral or collegiate churches. It is the diocesic and monastic life of those ecclesiastics, the bulk of the revenue of the chapters was divided into individual portions, to be distributed partly as daily stipends, called distributiones quotidiana, or quotidiana stipendia, in opposition to the prebends, which went by the name of fructus grossi or annuit. The purpose of this daily stipend was to induce the canons to a stricter obedience to the law of residence, and to more assiduous attendance to the public choir-prayers, as only those canons came in for their share who were either present in the choir or were officially during the service. Yet there were some grounds on which their absence could be excused without loss of their share. (These legal exceptions are formulated in the canonical regulations in De cler. agr. iii, 6; De cler. non resid. iii, 8; Conc. Trid. sess. xxii, c. 3, and sess. xxvi, c. 8 fin. De rcf). The Council of Trent directed that in those cathedral or collegiate congregations where there existed no presence-money, or where it reached but an insignificant amount, a third of the whole revenue of the chapter should be set apart and used for such distributions (Cose. Trid. sect. xxi, c. 3, De ref.). The personal claims of the canons absent without reasonable excuse were to be divided among the members present pro rata, or given to the fabric of the church, if it stood in need of such help, or employed for any pious purpose the bishop might devise (Cose. xxii, c. 3, De ref.). It was not always the negligence of the canons, but the hardness and partly abusive composition of the chapters, which was the cause that their members so frequently dispensed with personal service in the choir, and were represented in it by simple vicars. The personal obligation of the canons has been insisted on by the most ancient canonic rules, by the Council of Trent, and by the last circumscriptum bull for the reorganization of the German bishoprics. Special presence-money is no more in use; for as the donation of the restored bishoprics and chapters is not founded on immovable property, as the prebends flow, in the future, or distant times, out of the public revenue, the division of the Council of Trent that a part of the revenue should be set apart and used for such distributions is not acted upon. Present. See Gift.

Presentation, in ecclesiastical law, is I., in the state-established churches, one of those forms of canonical collation of the prebends by which the rights of the bishop are limited, inasmuch as he cannot himself nominate an occupant to the vacant office, but must be content with confirming the nominee of the patronus beneficis. The right of presentation is therefore the right of the patron to designate to the bishop the successor elected by the council of the beneficary, the bishop being obliged to confirm the candidate if he be worthy, capable, and proposed according to canonical rules. This right of presentation is the first and most important of all patronal rights. The patron, in the exercise of his right, is bound by the general conditions of a canonical provision: he has to propose a capable and worthy person gratuitously, and within the legal limits of time. If the patronate be an ecclesiastical or a mixed one, the time is six months; if it be a worldly one, four months: yet there are departures from this rule. In Austria the patron can choose his nominee out of a list drawn up by the patronate; if he be at home, within six months; if he be abroad, within three months, from the day of the receipt of the list. In Prussia six months are allowed to the lay patron, as well as to the ecclesiastical patron, from the day of the vacation of the office; or, if the beneficiary die abroad, from the day on which the news of his death is received. In Baden the time is limited to three months, except in the case of insurmountable hindrances. If the right of presentation belong to several persons individually, they can agree upon a common choice, or cast each his own card in the hat, leaving the choice to the bishop; or the matter may be decided by the majority of the votes; and in case of an equality of votes in favor of each candidate, the decision may be left again to the bishop. The same rules obtain when the right of a patron has been transmitted to the heirs, in which case, of course, the heirs of one patron can give only one vote. If the right of presentation belong to a college or a juridical person, the case is settled by the statutes of the corporation; or if regulations on the subject be wanting, by a collegiate vote. In the remainder, the right of the patron is unlimited: he can propose his nearest relation, but not himself, although he could, "via gratiam," present a request for his own admission (gratiaem petere admissione). He can submit several candidates to the choice of the bishop; if he be a layman, he can, so long as the legal term is not elapsed and the canonical collation has not taken place, propose successively several other names. This jur. riendii is not allowed to an ecclesiastical patron. Here the first presentation, according to the principle "Tempore prior potior iure," makes null and void all subsequent nominations, providing the latter is not a representation, or if the presentation has not been made gratuitously, the nomination in that case is lost to the patron, and belongs exclusively to the collator. The same happens when an ecclesiastical patron wittingly proposes an unworthy subject, while the lay patron is allowed another trial of his right. But if the patron, whether layman or ecclesiastic, has unwittingly proposed an unworthy candidate, he obtains a new term of four or of six months. The Prussian law allows, after the expiration of the primitive term, only a supplementary term of six weeks. In Baden the patron, if his proposition have been rejected by the ordinariate, is allowed another presentation, to be made in the space of four weeks, and the same term is allowed him a second time, but not further. The presentation is made by letter, for which many ordinaries prescribe a fixed form. The document contains the names of the persons about the patronal rights are, according to decretal law, subject to the ecclesiastical courts; but modern legislation has almost everywhere added it to the competency of the worldly tribunals. If the patronal right itself be not granted, but the actual possession of the "munus presentandi," and the nomination resulting from the use he makes of it is not invalidated by his being afterwards defeated in the lawsuit. But if the right to hold the goods with which the patronate is connected should itself be questioned, then the right of presentation is suspended, and the bishop in this case enjoys a free right of collation. The winner of the suit may then, to ensure his privilege, confirm the nomination made by the bishop; but if he should refuse his consent, this can have no influence on the situation of the nominee. See Schlatter, V. Theaum. jur. Civ., 194 sq.; Martini, Codicil. i. 288 sq.; Richter, Kirchenrecht, § 128; Gerlach, Das Präsentationerecht (Regensburg, 1855). II. In the Established Church of Scotland the minister intended for a living by a patron must be presented to the presbytery for inquiry into his qualifications and for induction if these are satisfactory. If the patron fail to present within six months, the right then devolves on the presbytery, tanquam iure devoluto. See Jus Devolutum. When a presented is objected to by the major part of the presbytery, whether by reason of the "nominatio debita," the General Assembly of the Church formerly claimed the right to declare that he should not be inducted or entitled to the benefice. This declaration was contained in an act of Assembly, dated 1685, called the Veto Act. But after the decision by the courts of law that such Veto Act was ultra vires and void, and this decision led to a succession of many ministers and people from the Established Church, and to the formation of a new dissenting Church, called the Free Church (q. v.). The law is now settled so far as it is, leaving the choice to the people, who are to judge of the reasonableness of any objections made to the presenter, for which purpose reasons and objections are heard on both sides, and a wide discretion is exercised by the presbytery. If the presbytery dissolves the objections, they then have with or without the trial and induction (q. v.) of the presenter. The following is the form of a Scotch presentation, and is a copy, indeed, of the one which led to the disputes and processes that ended in the disruption of the Scottish Church:

"The right honorable Thomas Robert Drummond Hay, Earl of Selkirk, dread patron of the church and parish of Auchterarder, lying within the presbytery of Auchterarder and sheriffdom of Perth, considering that the said parsonage of Auchterarder, vacated by the late Mr. James Paton, is now vacated by his late death, and become vacant by a gift and presentation by and through the depth of the Rev. Charles Stewart, late minister of the Geopel at the PRESENTATION OF THE VIRGIN FEAST of the English dean's deputy, usually the senior residential or vice-dean, who in his absence corrects offences, besides acting as president in chapter (q.v.), and choragus, or director of the services, when there is no dignitary; also the precentor.

Presiding Elder. The name given in the Methodist Episcopal Church to an officer whose functions are those of a superintendent within limited jurisdiction. These elders serve under the bishops, and, together with them, constitute in their respective conferences a cabinet, in which resides the appointing power over the membership of itinerant preachers. The office is one of very great responsibility and far-reaching influence. Within the territory over which such an elder presides every minister is amenable to this officer, who visits the different charges three or four times during the year, usually at what is called the holding of the Quarterly Conference (q.v.). He has full power and authority over all the business of the charge disposed of. He also presides at the District Conferences, where literary and ecclesiastical culture is aimed at, and the licensing of candidates for the ministry takes place. Usually the territory of an elder is that of the Conference or the bounds of the Conference, and corresponds somewhat in extent to the average county in an Eastern state.

The office of presiding elder was created in the early history of Methodism in this country, and appears to have originated with John Wesley, who in 1739 was its origin. The bishops whom John Wesley employed as helpers. He had what we might call junior preachers at the circuits or districts into which he divided his work, and an assistant in charge of the whole. These assistants were then invested with nearly the same authority over the help which the great founder of Methodism himself exercised, and hence they had an authority akin move to the bishopric of American Methodism. When, in 1784, Mr. Wesley caused the election of Ashbury and Coke as superintendents or bishops, there were several assistants in office thus made subject to two great superintendents. The question has arisen whether the twelve elders who were elected at the Christmas Conference of 1784 were simply travelling elders or assistants of the superintendents. See METHODISM.

As the presiding elders are now episcopal appointees, the answer to this query becomes important. There are two opinions. One party, advocating the elective eldership, insist that these twelve men were then elected by the Conference for the assistants work, and base their opinion on Dr. Emory's interpretation. He says, in his History of the Discipline, p. 125, "All elders were elected at first as presiding elders and 'travelling elders' was not made until 1792. Section v. of 1789, it would seem, proves the correctness of Dr. Emory's statement. The following is a part of the section on elders:

"Ques. 2. What is the duty of an elder?
"Ans. 1. To visit his general district.
"2. To administer baptism and the Lord's Supper, and perform all other services of the church.
"3. In the absence of a bishop to take charge of all the deacons, travelling and local preachers, and exhorters.
"4. To administer communion or suspend members.
"5. To direct the transaction of the spiritual business of his circuit.
"6. To take care that every part of our discipline be enforced.

"7. To aid in public collections.
"8. To attend his bishop when present, and give him, when absent, all necessary information by letter of the state of his district.

That every elder, in the absence of the bishop, was equal in point of supervisory office and duty is evident also from the fact that the third duty in this section gives an elder no authority to take charge of elders, but simply of deacons travelling, and local preachers, etc., seeing they were equal in authority. It was not until 1792 that a distinction was made between presiding elders and travelling elders, and those were then put under the charge of presiding elders. It was at this date that presiding elders were chosen by the bishop from the body of elders, and those elders not chosen by the bishops were disrobed of office as presiding elders, and placed for the first time under the care of presiding elders (see p. 126, 1792).

"Ques. 6. By whom are the presiding elders chosen?
"Ans. 6. By the bishop. Among the duties of the presiding elder, one is to take charge of all the elders, deacons, etc., of his district.

At this date, there was a made a distinction between presiding elders and travelling elders, and not before. All the elders previous to 1792, therefore, were elected and appointed to the office and duties of presiding elder by the Conference, and each had equal authority in charge in the absence of the bishop.

Against this position, those who approve of the existing practice of the appointing of presiding elders by the bishop urge, first, that from 1760 to 1792 there were such elders, as travelling elders; secondly, that the presiding elders were appointed to their districts, and that the appointment was by the bishop; and, thirdly, that if the bishops did appoint elders to preside over other elders, the Conferences not calling the bishops to account convenient to the change, and thereby made it valid; and that it was the practice of the Church from 1784 to 1792, notwithstanding the disciplines required otherwise (see letter by Dr. D. Sherman in Zion's Herald, March, 1876); and that Dr. Emory and others interpreted the letters of the early Methodist Church in America (comp. Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, ii, 222, 224). The presiding duties which made of an elder a presiding elder did not, in the practice of the Church, belong to this new order in the ministry as soon as it was constituted. They belonged to the assistants, and were gradually transferred to the elders; and when, after the practice of nearly two years, they were actually transferred, the custom was legalized, the office of assistant was abolished, and the word disappeared from the minutes (see the Minutes and Discourses, A.D. 1786). The idea of this transfer originated in the mind of bishop Asbury, who found, after the eldership was instituted, as he says in his Notes on the Discipline, "that this order was so necessary" that he would make them rulers. Even his idea of the presiding eldership was not contemporaneous with the institution of the order of elders, but came, as he says, when he "afterwards found that" they would be useful in ruling (see Notes on the Discipline, by Coke and Asbury). His idea was not put in practice until the Annual Conferences of 1785, when, as Lee (History, p. 120) states, the presiding eldership originated, but only in an inchoate form. This was months after the order of elders had been instituted. When, in 1786, the first law was made relative to the presiding eldership, it was made possible by the Discipline for every elder to become a presiding elder, as far as the duties were concerned, and here is where Emory and others have been misled. But as the bishop always appointed the ruling or presiding elders from the order of elders (Lee, History, p. 150), the practice was never to make all the elders ruling or presiding elders. Hence, from 1785 to 1792, the law of the Discipline never entirely agreed with the practice in the appointments, for there were hosts of elders who were never presiding elders. In the Conference of 1792, however, the law was made to harmonize with the practice. In the ancient Church the chieftains (monarchoi) filled an office which must have given Mr. Wesley the suggestion for the assistant for the bishop called into office. See Emory, Hist. of the Discipline, p. 136 sq.; Sherman, Hist. of the Discipline, p. 153; Bingham, Eccles. Antiquities, i, 56, 68; Porter, Compendium of Methodism; Math. Press (πρῆσς, parás; καπνός). Among the Israelites this was a large trough, usually hewn out of stone (Isa. vi, 2; Matt. xxi, 33: comp. Nonnii, Dionys. xii, 220). In the earth and walled up (Harmar, iii, 117). The text is usually translated as a trench or a gully below. This trough was called goth, גות (in the Talmud also גותש), or parash, παράση (Isa. lixii, 3); and in the grapes were trodden by men (usually five work together in Persia still; Kämpfer, Ann. p. 577). Hence the phrase to tread the wine-press (Job xxvi, 11; Lam. i, 15; Isai. ii, 9). The juice (Heb. terah, תרָה) flowed through the opening into a vat, usually in the earth (called yakh, יַחָך; Gr. χαράμμα, Isa. vi, 2; or υδρονυμῖος, Isa. xvi, 10; Mark xii, and simply λαος, Matt. xxi, 33; Lat. leane mansueta, Column, xii, 18; in Job xxvi, 11; this word means, however, the trough or press itself). From this it is taken for fermentation in earthen vessels. These presses, which are still common in the East and the Levant (Aristeus iv, 272 sq.; Kämpfer, ut supra), were the method of the tribe of Simeon in the vineyards or on mountains (Zech. xiv, 10; Isa. vi, 2; Matt. xxi, 38; Mark xii, 1; Rev. xiv, 20). The slaves must usually trodden the press, as it was hard labor (Isa. lixii, 1 sq.). They were cheered in it by singing and music (see Isa. xvi, 10; Jer. xxv, 50; Judg. ix, 15; 27; xvi, 31; 2 Chr. xxxi, 4; 2 Esdr. ii; Itp. Heb. vi, 14 sq., in his Thesaur. xxxii). See Oll. Wink.

Presby. Ebenezer Erskine, D.D., a Presbytery divine, was born near Cedar Spring, Abbeville District, S. C., in 1808. His parents, of the good old Scotch-Irish stock, were remarkable for their piety and intellectual attainments. He was early dedicated to the work of the Christian ministry. He pursued his pre-

Pressly, John T., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, died July 26, 1860. Dr. Pressly was a man of more than ordinary talent, and a good general scholar. In the position of president of the college he was greatly beloved by his pupils. Possessed of excellent executive ability, and of special aptness to teach, much of the success of the college and seminary, in the early periods of their history, was traceable to his influence. Though an interesting writer, he had a singular aversion to appearing before the public as an author, and hence he never published anything except an occasional sermon. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 276. (J. L. S.)

Pressly, John B., a Presbyterian minister, noted also as a classical teacher, was born in Abbeville District, S. C., in 1794. His means for acquiring the rudiments of a Latin education were very limited, and, when he was only five and a half the manhood of manhood he had not enjoyed very fully the advantages of the common school. In 1812, however, he moved to the State of Ohio, and during a stay of three years in the Northwestern States he underwent much cultivation and hard labor in his endeavor to acquire knowledge. About the close of the year 1815 he was prostrated on a bed of suffering with a painful illness; a kind Providences brought him the medical services of Dr. Joseph Gilberis, who, on his recovery, suggested to him the desirability of a classical education, and proposed to furnish him with the necessary books. Thus encouraged, and accepting the doctor's kind offer, he entered Church Hill Academy June 19, 1816; in 1819 he entered South Carolina College, and spent two years there. In 1822 his career as a classical teacher began, and in this field of usefulness he has been an author, during the balance of his life, he attained an inviable reputation. His first charge was Union Academy, in the southern part of Abbeville District, S. C. Among his pupils here were the late Rev. E. E. Pressly, D.D. Rev. J. T. Pressly, D.D., Hon. T. C. Perrin, and J. A. Cathron, Esq. In 1835, he was called at Cambridge to serve as coadjutor to the latter in Laurens District. In 1838 he took charge of Church Hill Academy, but his labors there were soon interrupted by his being elected to the State Legislature of South Carolina by the people of Abbeville District. In 1835, at the close of his political career, he was invited to take charge of the high school at Due West, S. C., just founded by the Associate Reformed Synod of the South, where he continued to labor till 1859 with great success. At last released from all engagements connected with teaching, he turned his attention to the study of Philology; attended one session in the seminary of the Associate Reformed Church at Oxford, Ohio; was licensed in 1840; and after attending during the ensuing session in the Associate Reformed Seminary at Alleghany City, Pa., he was employed until 1842 as a presbyterian schoolmaster in the vicinity of the bounds of the synod. Subsequently he was settled for five years as pastor of Bethel and Ebenezer churches, Ga.; the remainder of his life until 1851 was spent in teaching and missionary work. He died June 1, 1863. Mr. Pressly as a man was social and companionable: as a teacher he was a splendid disciplinarian, and skill in imparting classical knowledge had few superiors. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Almanac (1867), p. 396. (J. L. S.) noted as a professor in divinity and an author, was born in Alberville District, S. C., in 1808. He studied for the ministry at the Theological Seminary in New York under Dr. John Mason. His first pastorate was in his native village, from which he was called to a professorship in the Theological Seminary, and the charge of the First Associate Reformed (now United Presbyterian) Church in Allegheny, Pa., both of which stations he filled with distinguished ability and success for nearly forty years. He died at Allegheny Aug. 13, 1870.—Appleton's An-

PRESSY, FRANÇOIS-JOSEPH-GASTON DE PARTE DE, a French prelate, was born in 1712 at the castle of Écure (diocese of Boulogne). He was one of the most distinguished pupils of Saint-Sulpice. He was called, Dec. 25, 1742, to the episcopal see of Boulogne. He administered his diocese during nearly forty-seven years with unwremitting zeal, and spent considerable sums for the ransom of the Christians captive among the Mohammedans, and for the expansion of the faith by foreign missions. In 1752 he joined a protestation addressed to the king (June 11), by twenty-one bishops, against parliamentary encroachments on ecclesiastical authority. A mandement which he subsequently published on the subject was suppressed. He died at Boulogne Oct. 8, 1789. His principal writings are, Statuta synodala (1746, 4to);—a collection of Instructions pastorales and Désertations théologiques (2 vols. 1737, 4to);—Le Rite du Docteur Boulogne (Boulogne, 1780, 4to); and a.prayer-book in French, under the title of Heures (Lille, 1829, 8vo). See Gallia Christiana, t. v.; Gazette de France, 1742-89; Fisquet, France Postfiscale (not published);—

PRESTON, John, D.D., a noted English Puritan divinity, was born at Heyford, Northamptonshire, in 1587, and educated at King's College, Cambridge; University of Cambridge, was made fellow and tutor of Queen's College, and finally became chaplain to Prince Charles. In 1622 he was appointed preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and subsequently lecturer in Trinity Church, Cambridge. He became so celebrated as a speaker that the towns-people went to his lectures on week-days as he would to his sermons on Sunday, and he was complained of by those who looked with envy upon his fast-growing reputation. He also became noted as an able advocate of Calvinism, and in a controversy with the family, was thought to have set them the example, and to have been the occasion of the rise of the famous Geneva theory with much adroitness and boldness. He was certainly a man of great leaning, a popular preacher, and a powerful writer. He died in 1628, greatly lamented not only by Calvinists, but by all lovers of the good cause. He was himself out with work; and when his friends would remonstrate, his answer was always, "Our life, like iron, consumes with rust, as much without as by employment; that every one cannot be said to have lived long that is old, as seven years in the life of some men are as much as seventy in others; and therefore the question is not so much How long have I lived as How I have lived." He was naturally reserved, and only figured in public because his zeal for the doctrines of Calvin would not suffer him to go unanswering those who maintained the opposite theories. Of his works (pub. by five persons) only one is collected, an abridgment by William Tennent was published in 1658 (1648 also [7]), 12mo. The best-known of his publications are, The New Covenant, fourteen sermons (Lond. 1629, 4to; ninth ed. 1638, 4to; again in 1655, 4to);—The Bread of Life, eighteen sermons (1630, 4to; 5th ed. 1634, 4to);—Life Eternal, eighteen sermons (1631, 4to; 4th ed. 1634, 4to):—The Saint's Daily Exercise, five sermons on Prayer (1635, 4to; 9th ed. 1635, 4to):—The Saint's Qualifications, ten sermons on Humiliation, nine on Sanctification, and the life of Benjamin Serluus (1637, 4to);—

Four Treatises (sermons): 1. Consecrations; 2. Spiritu-

"nal Death and Life (separate in 1633, 4to); 3. Self Den dial (separate in 1632, 4to); 4. Lord's Supper (together in 1635, 4to; 4th ed. 1636, 4to):—Sermons before his Majestie, etc. (5th ed. 1637, 4to);—Sinners Over-try, or More than Meant (1631, 4to);—Remains (three treatises): 1. Judas his Repentance; 2. Saint's Spiritual Strength; 3. Paul's Conversion and Sermons, etc. (2d ed. 1637, 4to):—The Golden Serp cure, etc. (1638, 4to):—Doctrines of the Saints’ Intermediaries, a sermon (1638, 4to);—A Lively Life, a sermon (4th ed. 1641, 4to);—A Funeral Service for Us, etc. (1640, 4to):— Divine Love of Christ, five sermons (1640, 4to): Two Treatises (1641, 4to):—Thesis de Gratia Converse mutatione Irresistibilis (1639, 8vo; in English, 1634):—Riches of Mercy to Men in Misery (1638, 4to). Preston, William, D.D., an eloquent American divine and educational author, was born in Montgomery, Mass., May 29, 1765, was educated at Brown University, where he graduated in 1806. After having studied law and practiced in that profession for a few years, he studied for the ministry, and was in 1811 ordained and became pastor of a church at Providence, R. I., where he preached until 1825, when he was chosen president of the University of Vermont. In 1829 he removed South for the benefit of his health, and in 1831 accepted the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church in Savannah, Ga., and there remained until his death in 1866. He published, Farewell Sermon at St. Albens, Mass. (1811);—Sermons (1817).—Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Au-

Prescription, as it relates to the mind, is a supposition formed before examination. As it relates to the conduct or moral action, it implies arrogance or irreverence. As it relates to religion in general, it is a bold and daring confidence in the goodness of God, without obedience to his will.

Presumptuous sins must be distinguished from sins of infirmity, or those failings peculiar to human nature (Eccl. vii, 20; 1 John i, 8, 9); from sins done through ignorance (Luke xii, 48); and from sins into which men are hurried by sudden and violent temptation (Gal. vi, 1). The ingredients of guilt under such an accusation are knowledge (John xv, 22), deliberation and contrivance (Prov. vi, 14; Psa. xxxvi, 4), obstinacy (Jer. xlv, 16; Deut. i, 13), inattention to the remonstrances of conscience (Acts vii, 51), opposition to the dispensations of Providence (2 Chron. xxxvii, 22), and repeated commission of the same sin (Psa. lxxiii, 17). Presumptuous sins are numerous, such as profane swearing, perjury, theft, adultery, drunkenness, Sabbath-breaking, etc. These may be more particularly considered as presumptuous sins, because they are generally committed against a known law, and are so often repeated. Such sins are most heinous in their nature and most pernicious in their effects. They are said to be a reproach to the Lord (Numb. xvi, 3); they harden the heart (1 Tim. iv, 2); draw down judgments from heaven (Numb. xxxi, 51); and even when repentent of, they are seldom pardoned without some visible testimony of God's displeasure (2 Sam. xii, 10). As respects professors of religion, one observes, they sin presupsumptiously (1) when they take up a profession of religion without principle; (2) when they profess the high and holy duties of religion, yet pass over the forbidden courses; (3) when they do not take religion as they find it in the Scriptures; (4) when they make their feelings the test of their religion, without considering the difference between animal passion and the operations of the Spirit of God; (5) when they run into sin with such a quick and free spirit; (6) when they indulgently suppose their confidence and self-complacency; (7) when they bring the spirit of the world into the Church; (8) when they form apologies for that in some which they condemn in others; (9) when professing to believe in the doctrines of the Gospel, they live licentiously; (10) when they create, magnify, and pervert their troubles; (11) when they arraign the conduct of God as unkind and unjust.

PRETAS, sprites or hobgoblins among the Buddhists in Ceylon. They are believed to inhabit a hell called Lokanatarika. In appearance they are extremely attenuated, like a dry leaf. There are some pretas that haunt the places near which they once lived as men; they are also found in the suburbs of cities, and in places where four ways meet. Their bodies are represented as being twelve miles high, and they have very large nails. On the top of the head there is a mouth about the size of a needle's eye. They continually think with sorrow on their fate, from not having acquired merit in former births; they are now tormented without ceasing by hunger and thirst, and have not the power of obtaining merit.

Preternatural stands generally for supernatural, because we suppose that that which is preter naturam is also supernatural. Yet the former is sometimes used for unnatural, preter naturam being the synonym of contra naturam. Neither preternaturale nor supernaturale, or, as some say, supranaturale, is a good Latin word. They are, at least, not to be found in the classics.

Pretextatus, Sr., a Gallic prelate of the 6th century, occupied towards 550 the metropolitan see of Rouen, and as such devoted himself to Monreos, the second son of Chilperic. Towards 576 Bruneaud, the widow of Sigebert, was exiled to Rouen by Chilperic, who was under the influence of Frédegunde. Monreos, who was in that city, fell violently in love with the charms of the queen of Austria, his aunt, and Pretextatus was induced to grant a dispensation for their union, and married them. At this intelligence Chilperic repaired to Rouen, transported with wrath, and ordered the bishop to be arrested. A council assembled at Paris in 577, and in spite of the exertions of Gregory of Tours, who ventured alone to defend Pretextatus, was compelled by the vote of forty-four prelates. He was banished to the island of Jersey, where he devoted his time to prayer and study. In the meantime a creature of Frédegunde, the Gaul Melantius, was established in the episcopal see of Rouen. In 581, Pretextatus was recalled, and in 584, a deputation of the clergy and people of Rouen repaired to Jersey to request Pretextatus to resume the administration of his diocese. On the 5th of May an assembly of Frankish noblemen, held at Rouen, pronounced his rehabilitation. Frédegunde, who lived in a kind of retirement at Louviers, went often to Rouen; she found herself frequently face to face with the bishop, whom she accused of not showing her much deference. In her wounded pride she once let escape some threatening allusions to the past: Pretextatus improved the occasion to exhort her to repentance and reformation. The enraged queen avenged herself in a manner worthy of her past life. She, Melantius, and an archdeacon of the cathedral, gave two hundred gold dollars to one of the serfs of the domain of the church, and promised him his own emancipation and that of his wife and children, for the murder of Pretextatus. On the Monday-Sunday, while in prayer at the foot of the altar, he was stabbed, and died an hour afterwards in a chamber contiguous to the church, whither a few of the faithful had carried him, and where Frédegunde, in the company of the duke, received the body. Thus expired the pious, and her last moments, April 14, 566. Pretextatus had attended the third Council of Paris in 557, the second Council of Tours in 566, and the second Council of Mâcon in 568. During his exile he composed some writings, which have not reached us. His name is inscribed in the Martyrology under the date of the 27th of February, although he did not shed his blood for the faith. PREVOST, Matia, called il Calabrese, a painter of the Neapolitan school, was born in 1613 at Tavurna, in Calabria. His brother Gregorio, about whom very little is known, who was honored in his life-time with the title of prince of the Academy of St. Luke, was Mattia's first master; subsequently he studied with Lanfrance and Guerino. Previt took from Caravaggio those dark and violent hues which impair the charm of his compositions. He delighted in retracing martyrdoms, murders, and other reenes of desolation. He painted with prodigious rapidity: a contemporary says that to see him handle the brush one would have thought that he was drumming. He painted the frescoes of the Church of St. John in Modena, which are in a very good state of preservation. In 1657 he returned to Rome, but was compelled to flee, having killed one of his rivals. At Naples, again, whither he repaired, he killed a soldier who had stopped him on some forbidden ground, and was ordered for his punishment to paint the patron saint of Naples on the doors of the city. From Naples he went to Malta, where his works were rewarded with the title of knight and the commandery of Syracuse. In his last years he worked only, but with unremitting diligence, for the church. He died at Malta in 1669. His works are not with in great number in Italy. The Louvre has his Martyrologium of St. Andrew, St. Paul, and St. Anthony the Hermit; the Museum of Dresden the Martyrologium of St. Bartholomew, the Incrédulity of St. Thomas, and the Deliverance of St. Peter; the Pinkothen of Munich a Repenting Mephistopheles; the Museum of Vienna an Incrédulity of St. Thomas, etc. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v. (J. H. W.)

PRETORIUM. See Pretorium.

Prevent (some form of Perver, παραφέρω, both meaning to precede or anticipate) is understood, in our translation of the Scriptures, only in the old Latin sense, as denoting. 1. To come before one is expected or sought (Job xxx, 27); 2. To go before, or be sooner (Psa. cxxix, 147). One is happily disappointed when favors come unsought (Job iii, 12; Psa. xviii, 18), or unhappily, when snares and afflictions come unexpectedly (2 Sam. xxii, 6).

Prevention is an ecclesiastical term denoting the right of a superior dignitary of the Church to interfere with the business of the congregation, or to control the acts of the clergy, according to the right of the pope, in the nomination to ecclesiastical offices, to pass over the proper collator and give away the benefices himself. The Gallican Church has never recognised this papal prerogative. See Provosts.

PREVOST, Claude, a French monk, was born at Auxerre Jan. 22, 1628. He taught Gregory of Tours in the abbey of Sainte-Geneviève, and the care of the library was afterwards intrusted to him. In this employment, which he retained to the end of his life, he made use of the knowledge which he had acquired in the Greek, Italian, and English languages, and collected abundant materials, which he did not, however, publish. They were prepared for the instruction of Louis, duke of Orleans, son of the regent, who lived at the abbey of Sainte-Geneviève. The principal MSS., which this monk has left concerning the history of the Old and New Testament, are, Library of Regular Canons:—Liber of Holy Canons, both Secular and Regular:—and History of all the Houses of Regular Canons. His last work was A History of the Abbey of Sainte-Geneviève. It is from this last work that the following paragraphs are taken. All that they have said of this house in vol. vii. of the new Gallia Christiana. Prevost furnished the material to the abbot Lebeuf, his countryman, for the catalogue of the writers of Auxerre inserted in The History of Auxerre.—Hoefler, Novum. Biogr. Generale, s. v.

Prevost, Pierre Robert de, a French pulpit orator of some note, was born at Rouen in 1675. From his youth he displayed a marked propensity for preaching, and in 1719 he applied himself after the model of celebrated orators. Sought after with eagerness in the city, he was no less a favorite at court, where he preached statelyly from Advent from 1714 to 1727, and in 1718 during Lent. At this last date he was provided with a canonship at Chartres. The reciters of sermons, published by Lottin (Paris, 1765), contains those of the cardinal of Fürstenberg (of which Fletcher speaks with eulogy); of Godet of Maillas, bishop of Chartres; of Louis XIV and of the duke of Berri; sermons, and a panegyric of St. Louis. He died in 1736 at Chartres.—Hoefler, Nouv. Biogr. Generale, s. v. See Vinet, French Lit. p. 116 sq.

Price, Henry, a minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Ireland, was born in Dromore, Antrim County, Ireland, Jan. 30, 1802; was converted at seventeen, was made a local preacher about the year 1821, and entered the itinerant ministry at the Conference of 1823. He was an able and judicious preacher; "he was mighty in the Scriptures," reasoning out of them, and having a remarkable talent for apposite and convincing quotations from Holy Writ. He was a zealous and effective advocate for Christian missions, a section of evangelical efforts, and Irish Methodism, paying more attention and devoting more labor than does any other Christian Church. While Mr. Price adored the Gospel of God's favour in all things, there were especially noticeable, in his childlike simplicity, a transparent sincerity, an uprightness which scorned to countenance of the funerary and low or mean, charity "which thinketh no evil," and an unselshness "which seeketh not its own." Sweeping revivals occurred on many of the circuits on which he was stationed. He was specially attentive to the sick and afflicted, and his visits to them were frequent. Sympathizing, and consoling. He was truly "a brother beloved," and his brethren in the ministry manifested their high appreciation of his character and talents by electing him repeatedly to fill the highest offices in their gift, and on all occasions he proved himself worthy of their esteem and confidence. He was active and practical, always ready to carry out every arrangement intrusted to his care with punctilious exactness. Never had Irish Methodism a more faithful son, or a minister of more perfect singleness of aim, purity of intention, or exemplary fidelity. Mr. Price died in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

Price, John (1), an English scholar of much renown, was born about the year 1600, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He was of Protestant parentage, but after leaving college he joined the Romanists and went to Italy during the civil wars, as he found himself the object of much hatred and persecution. He settled in Florence, after having resided for a while in Paris; but when a professorship was offered him at Pisa, he removed thither, and there lived for some time. He subsequently retired to the St. Augustine convent at Rome, where he died in 1676. He was the author of the following works: Notae et Observationes in Apologia L. Apuleii Mardianus Philosphi Pallontae (Paris, 1635, 4to; very rare, but republished in the Gouda ed. of Apuleius, 1650, 8vo);—Mathesou ex Sacra Pagana, Sanctus Patriarch, etc., illustratus (Paris, 1646, 8vo);—Adnotationes in Epist. Jacobi (1646, 4to);—Additiones in Sacra Pagana, etc., illustrata (1647, 8vo);—Commentarii in Novi Testamenti Libros; hoc acceptus Adnotationes in Psalmorum Librum (London, 1660, fol. The notes on the New Testament, or some of them, had been published before separately [supra], and Orme says that those on the Psalms had also appeared before). Price brought to his expositions of the Scriptures an extensive knowledge of classical literature, and, imitating Grotius's method, frequently illustrated by profane authors, especially the Greek and Roman. See Orme, Bibl. Biblicar., s. v.; Gris. Sueci, vol. v; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Price, John (2), D.D., an English clergyman, flourished in the second half of the 17th century, and was chaplain to general Monk during the civil wars. Dr. Price published, Serm. of Thanksgiving for the Success of General Monk (London, 1660, 4to);—Serm. on Matt. (1661, 8vo);—Serm. on Matt. (1661, 16vo);—Serm. on Eccles. xvi, 17 (1661, 8vo);—Serm. on Heb. xiii, 16 (1661, 8vo);—Serm. on Phil. iv, 5 (1663, 4to);—The Mystery and Method of his Majesty's Happy Restoration laid open to Publick View (London, 1660, 8vo).

Price, Jonathan D., a physician and missionary to Burmah in the first half of this century, was ordained in Philadelphia May 20, 1821, and immediately set out for his field of labor. He arrived early in the next year at Rangoon. When his medical knowledge became known at court, he was ordered to repair to Ava, the capital, where he was introduced to the king, who gave him a special commission when the British invaded Burmah. He and Mr. Judson were thrown into prison June 8, 1824. He was confined and subjected to dreadful sufferings till February or March, 1826, when he was released and employed to negotiate a treaty with the British, who had advanced near to the capital. After the war he resided at Ava, Upper Burma, for a time, and then returned to Rangoon. He spoke the Burmese language very well and wrote several native works, and by his lectures hoped to shake the foundation of Buddhism. He fell a victim to pulmonary consumption Feb. 14, 1828, dying in the hope of that precious Gospel he wished to impart to the Burmese. See Bp. Mgr. Burm. Soc. Ser. Bpt. Mag.; Memoir of Mrs. Judson; Allen, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Price, Rice. See Price, Thomas.

Price, Richard, D.D., an eminent English divine, noted for his scholarly attainments, his philosophical and mathematical contributions, his general devotion to truth in its highest forms, and a most consistent life, was born at Tynton, Glamorganshire, Wales, Feb. 23, 1725. His father, of whose second marriage Richard was the sole offspring, was a rigid Calvinistic minister, remarkable for his intolerance, who spared no pains to impute his son with sound Calvinistic doctrine. Richard, however, began early to claim the privilege of thinking for himself, and by his scrupulosity, and by the anger of his parent. The latter died in 1739, and by his will the bulk of the property, which appears to have been considerable, came into the possession of one son; the widow and six other children being left in straitened circumstances to provide for their own maintenance. The widow and her eldest son lived, however, only a few months longer, and shortly after their death Richard, then in his eighteenth year, set out for London in the hope of qualifying himself for the clerical profession. The heir of his father's fortune provided him with both house and servant as far as Cardiff, but left him without the means of performing the rest of the journey except on foot or in a wagon. He chose the former as the most ready means, and thus made his way to the metropolis of England. His education during his father's lifetime had been superintended by several Dissenters of his persuasions, but Richard, after reaching London, was obtained, through the kindness of a paternal uncle, admission to a Presbyterian academy, where he pursued studies in mathematics, philosophy, and theology. In 1748 he was engaged as chaplain and companion to the family of Mr. Streathfield, of his mother's brothers, who resided for thirteen years, the death of his employer only terminating the engagement, but not without a recognition of faithful service rendered. In the disposition of Mr. Streathfield's property Price came in for a share, and by this aid and his appointment as morning preacher of the chapel at Newington-Green, he was placed in independent circumstances. He had previously been made pastor of a congregation at Hackney, but he preferred the appointment at Newington Green, married in 1757, and lived there until the death of his first wife, 1760. Meanwhile his life had been one of considerable literary and scientific activity. His Review of the Principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals was somewhat heavy, and designated by Brown as "very elaborate, very tedious, and not very clear," seems to have established his reputation as a metaphysician and a moralist. It is considered the ablest defence of the system of Hudgell and Clarke. It is an attempt to revive the intellectual theory of moral obligation, which seemed to have fallen under the attacks of Butler, Hutcheson, and Hume, and was made before that of Smith. Sir J. Mackintosh has briefly noticed it in his Preliminary Dissertation to Encyclop. Brit. (re-published in his Works [ed. 1834.] i, 158, 159).

In 1789 Price published his Treatise on RecreationalPayments; this was followed by the compilation and publication of the celebrated Northampton Mortality Tables, and various other works relating to life-assurance and annuities, forming most valuable contributions to the branch of science to which they refer. In 1776 appeared the Observations on the Civil Liberty of the Protestant Dutch and People of the West Indies. This work 60,000 copies are said to have been sold in a few months. So greatly it was admired in the United States that, in 1778, the American Congress, through Franklin, communicated to him their desire to consider him a fellow-citizen, and to receive his assistance in regulating their finances—an offer declined principally on the ground of age. On the termination of the war with the colonies, Mr. Pitt sought Mr. Price's advice as to the best mode of liquidating the British national debt, the result of which, it is said, was the adoption of the sinking fund. When the French revolution broke out, the doctor distinguished himself by a sermon, "On the Love of Country," in which he hailed that event as the commencement of a glorious era. This drew upon the preacher some strong animadversions from Mr. Burke in his celebrated Reflections. Besides many papers in the Transactions of the Royal Society, of which he was a fellow, he published sermons and pamphlets, which established his character as a sound advocate for civil liberty and a profound master of financial calculation. He died April 18, 1791. One of his most interesting and popular readers is his Four Dissertations on Providence, Prayer, the State of Virtuous Men after Death, and Christianity (1766-68). His views respecting the Son of God were what called Law or semi-Arian. Mr. Price was a believer in the immortality of the soul, holding, according to the teaching of the Sacred Scriptures, it remains in a dormant state between death and resurrection; and because of these opinions he was led into a controversy of some celebrity with his friend Dr. Priestley, maintained by correspondence in 1778, and given to the public by the latter under the title of A Free Discussion of the Doctrine of Materialism and Philosophical Necessity. This friendly controversy shows how decided were his views on the philosophical aberration of the age, and how earnestly he desired to place moral and metaphysical truth upon a deeper and truer foundation. "Almost the only writer," says Morell, "of this (the rationalistic) school whose works are likely to form a part of our standard philosophy is Dr. Richard Price." In this high estimate of the merits of Price's philosophical writings, Mr. Morell is not alone. Price investigated with acuteness and ability many important questions relative to morals, and controverted the doctrine of a moral sense as irreconcilable with the unalterable character of moral ideas, which, as well as those of substance and cause, he maintained to be eternal and objectively independent of the divine will" (Tennemann). "If, in England, you only look at London in the 18th century, you will doubtless see little else than sensuality. But even at London you would find, by the side of Priestley, Price, that ardent friend of liberty—that ingenious and profound economist, who renewed and finally sustained the Platonistic idealism of Cudworth. I know that Price is an isolated phenomenon at London, but the whole Scotch school is more or less spiritualistic" (Cousin). But Mackintosh (ut sup.) by no means shares in this enthusiasm; he even says, in his Life of John Locke, that Sir James's estimate of the characteristics of Price will be found in the Edinburgh Review, June, 1815, p. 171, 172. See also The London Mon. Rev. lxxiii, 77; and Boston Christ. Disciple, ii, 194. Dr. Price's moral character appeared to have been a statistically beautiful one. "Simplicity of manners," says Dr. Priestley, "with such genuine marks of perfect integrity and benevolence, diffused around him a charm which the forms of politeness can but poorly imitate." Price, Thomas, one of the most distinguished Welsh scholars of his age, was born Oct. 2, 1787, at Penoserel, in the parish of Llanfawr, near Builth, in Brecknockshire. His father, the Rev. Rice Price, originally a stonemason, at the age of seventeen formed an attachment to Mary Bower, the descendant of a long line of clergymen; acquired, by incessant diligence and frugality, the means of attending the college-school at Brecknock; and finally obtained a benefice from the bishop of St. Davids, and, in 1784, the hand he sought, after a courtship of twenty years. He was so fortunate as afterwards to be presented to three livings; but his income, like that of some other Welsh pluralists, was never believed to exceed forty pounds a year. He had two sons, both of whom were brought up to the Church, the elder taking his degree at Oxford, while the second, Thomas, was obliged to finish his studies at the college of Brecknock. Welsh was the language that he first heard composed in rhyme; English they acquired at their second school; the elements of Latin and Greek were learned subsequently; and, from some French officers who were prisoners of war at Brecknock, Thomas acquired an excellent knowledge of French. In 1812 he received holy orders, and in 1825, after performing for thirteen years the duties of various curacies near Crickhowel, he was appointed to the vicarage of Cwmdu. This was his last preferment. The rest of his life was passed in historical and archaeological studies of his country. He was regarded by his countrymen as one of the most accomplished champions of the Welsh language and literature. He died at Cwmdu Nov. 7, 1848. His writings are not of special interest to theological readers. Many of his English compositions are collected under the title of Literary Remains of the Rev. Thomas Price, with a Memoir by Jane Williams (London, 1848, 2 vols. 8vo). A memoir of Price is found in the Lond. Gentleman's Mag. Feb. 1849, p. 212; see also Engl. Cyclop. p. v.

PRICKETT, MARMADUKE, an English clergyman, was born about the year 1603. He was educated at Cambridge University, and held the appointment of one of the Fellows of Peterhouse College, which he stepped up in 1639. He published, Some Account of Barnwell Priory, in the Parish of St. Andrew the Less (Camb, 1637, 8vo);—An Historical and Architectural Description of the Priory Church of Bridlington (Lond, 1631, 8vo; 1846, 8vo). PRIDGEN, JOHN, an English clergyman, was born in the year 1758 in London, and was educated at Queen's College, Oxford. After filling various appointments, he finally became rector of St. George's, Botolph Lane, London. He died in 1825. His publications are of a peculiar character only, and those interested may consult Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, ii, 1861.

Pride is inordinate and unreasonable self-esteem, attended with insolence and rude treatment of others. 1. "It is sometimes," says a good writer, "confounded with vanity, and sometimes with dignity; but to the former passions, resembling pride, and many circumstances it differs from the latter. Vanity is the parent of loquacious boasting, and the person subject to it, if his pretences be admitted, has no inclination to insult the company. The proud man, on the other hand, is naturally silent, and wrapped up in his own importance, seldom speaks but to make his audience feel their inferiority." Pride is the high opinion that a poor, little, contracted soul entertains of itself. Dignity consists in just, great, and uniform actions, and is the opposite to meanness. 2. Pride manifests itself by raising our selves, adoring our persons, attempting to appear before others in a superior light to what we are; contempt and slander of others; envy at the excellences others possess; disuse to gain applause; distress and rage when slighted; impatience of contradiction, and opposition to God himself. The evil effects of pride are beyond computation. It has spread itself universally in all nations, among all characters; and as it was the first sin, as some suppose, that entered into the world, so it seems the last to be conquered. It may be considered as the parent of discontent, ingratitude, covetousness, poverty, presumption, passion, extravagance, bigotry, war, and persecution. In fact, there is hardly an evil perpetrated but pride is connected with it in a proximate or remote sense. 4. To suppress this evil, we should consider what we are. "If we could trace our own history," says the Sermon, "we should find all slaves to come from princes, and all princes from slaves. To be proud of knowledge is to be blind in the light; to be proud of virtue is to poison ourselves with the antidote; to be proud of authority is to make our rise our downfall." The imperfection of our nature, our scanty knowledge, contracted powers, narrow conceptions, and moral inability are strong motives to excite us to humility. We should consider, also, what punishments this sin has brought on mankind. See the cases of Pharaoh, Haman, Nebuchadnezzar, Herod, and others; how particularly it is prohibited (Prov. xvi, 18; 1 Pet. v, 5; James iv, 6; Prov. xxix, 23); what a torment it is to its possessor (Esther v, 13); how soon all things of a sublunary nature will end; how disgraceful it renders us in the sight of God, angels, and men; what a barrier it is to our felicity and communion with God; how fruitful it is of discord; how precludes our usefulness, and renders us really contemptible. See the pl. 86; thimideaux, Humphrey, D.D., a learned English divine, noted as a historian, was born at Padstow, in Cornwall, May 8, 1648. He was educated first at Westminster School and later at Christ Church, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1672. While at the university he published an ancient inscription from the ancient Chersonesian Greek marble, under the title of Sarcófago Ossenisea, which recommended him to the patronage of the lord-chancellor Finch, afterwards earl of Nottingham, who gave him in 1679 a living near Oxford, and afterwards a prebend in Norwich cathedral. While there he became engaged in some severe contests with the Roman Catholics, the result of which was the publication of his work The Validity of the Orders of the Church of England made out (1688). He also took an active part in resisting the arbitrary proceedings of James II which affected the interests of the Established Church. In 1688 he was promoted to the archdeaconry of Suffolk; but it was not without much consideration that he could bring himself to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary. But when once decided, he acted in good faith, and treated all non-jurors with a kindness and respect. In 1691, upon the death of Dr. Pococke, the Hebrew professorship at Oxford was offered to Dr. Pridaeux, but he refused it, though he afterwards repented of his refusal. In 1697 he published The Life of Mahomet, which he had received three editions of it before the first edition. This Life was only a part of a greater work which he had long designed to write, and that was A History of the Saracens Empire, and with it The Decay and Full of Christianity in the East; but, for certain reasons, he dropped this design, and only published that part which contained The Life of Mahomet, to which he annexed A Letter to the Deists, wherein he undertook to prove the truth of Christianity by contrasting it with the impostures of Mohammedanism. In 1702 he was made dean of Norwich. He died Nov. 1, 1724. He published, The Original Right of Tythes,—Directions for Churchwardens, and other small pieces for the service of the Church; also two tracts of Maimonides, with a Latin version and notes, under the title of De Jure Pauperis et Pergrinis apud Judaeos, as an introduction for Hebrew students to Rabbinical language. But Dr. Pridaeux's great work was The Connection of the History of the Old and New Testament, the first part of which was published in 1716, the second in 1718. Both parts were received with the greatest approbation, and were translated into eight editions in French, Latin, and three or three in Dublin, before the end of 1720. The best of the many excellent editions which have appeared of this work since the death of its author are probably the 22d, with An Account of the Rabbinical Authorities by Rev. A. M'Caul, D.D. (1845, 2 vols. 8vo), and the 25th, which, with an Account, contains an Account of the Text and analysis, and Introductory Review by J. Talboys Wheeler (Lond. 1856, 2 vols. 8vo). The last named is by far the most desirable of all, as it contains, in addition to the excellent work done by the M'Caul, the notes, etc., by Wheeler, who also edited Shute's Connection of Sacred and Profane History (1858, 2 vols. 8vo) and Russell's Connection of Sacred and Profane History (1865, 2 vols. 8vo), the three embracing the entire period from the Creation to the time of Christ. Prideaux's Connection was translated into French (Ams. 1728, 8 vols. 12mo), and, with John Diebold's annotations, into Dutch. Le Clerc published a critical examination of it, which appeared in English (Lond. 1722, 8vo). "The Connection," says Orme, "contains a large mass of erudition, and accurate information on every topic of Jewish history and antiquities, and all the links which connected that peculiar people with the surrounding nations. It is indispensable to the Biblical and interesting to the general scholar.... Le Clerc's exceptions are not of great importance" (Bibl. Bib., s. v.). This history was the affair of many years, and occupied all the other Eastern nations, as well as of the Jews; and likewise those of Greece and Rome, so far as was necesary for giving a distinct view of the completion of the prophecies which relate to the times comprehended in it. The author has also set in the clearest light some passages of profane history which before lay dispersed and buried in confusion, and there appears throughout the whole work such an amiable spirit of sincerity and candor as sufficiently atones as well for the few mistakes which escaped his diligence as for some weaknesses arising from his individual temperament. About three years before his death he presented his collection of Oriental books, more than three hundred in number, to the library of Clare Hall, Cambridge. Several of his posthumous Tracts and Letters, with a Life of Dr. Prideaux, were published in 1748 (8vo). Dr. Prideaux was tall, well-built, and of a strong and robust constitution. His qualities were very good, solid rather than lively, and his judgment excellent. He possessed great moral worth, and more ardent piety than was usual in his generation. As a writer he is clear, strong, intelligent, and learned. See, besides the works above mentioned, Biog. Brit. s. v.; Gentleman's Magazine, vol. lxx.; and especially the excellent article in Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, ii, 1681, 1692.

Prideaux, John, D.D., an English prelate of much note, was born of humble parentage at Stowford, near Ivybridge, in Devonshire, Sept. 17, 1758. While yet in his boyhood he was a candidate for the office of parish-clerk at Ugborough, a neighboring village; but he did not succeed, and to his failure he attributed his early death. He led a pious and virtuous life. In 1795, a notice appeared in a local paper of a lady of the parish, who, seeing that a boy of only common educational training attempted so much, felt persuaded that he would surely rise if given greater facilities; and she supported him at school till he had acquired a knowledge of Latin, and was ready to go to Oxford, where he was admitted a poor scholar at Exeter College in 1596. He was elected probationer fellow of his college in 1602, being then a B.A. In the following year he received holy orders, and, having become noted for his profound knowledge of divinity as well as his great learning in general, he was elected rector of his college upon the death of Dr. Thomas Holland in 1612. In 1615 he succeeded Dr. Robert Abbott, then promoted to the see of Salisbury, as regius professor of divinity, canon of Christ Church, and rector of Ewelme. He afterwards held the office of vice-chancellor for several years.

“The rectorship of his college,” says Wood, “he carried himself so winning and pleasing by his gentle government and fatherly instruction that it flourished more than any house in the university with small expense. As a great as of many foreigners that came purposely to sit at his feet to gain instruction.” He no less distinguished himself in the divinity chair, which he occupied for twenty-six years. Although he maintained his decided convictions against the Socinians and Arminians, and was a most stout defender of the Calvinistic tenantry, he was yet popular with all his hearers, and none failed to do him reverence, however widely they might differ from him. Though the university was agitated deeply by the controversy of those times, Prideaux happily escaped all partisan imbroglio, and in 1641 was elevated to the bishopric of Worcester. On account of his adherence to the king, he found his dignity neither pleasant nor profitable. He became so impoverished as to be compelled to sell his books, and so was, as Dr. Gower in his lives of the learned calls him, ‘veneris liberorum hollus.’ Having continued Wood’s, first, by indefatigable studies, digested his excellent library into his mind, he was afterwards forced again to devoul his books with his teeth, turning them, by a miraculous faith and patience, into bread for himself and his children, to whom he left his books, except a paper on Peter (2 Pet. 1:12, 13), and a father’s prayers.” He died at Bredon, in Worcestershire, July 12, 1650. He was a man of most unsparing and gentle manners; of excellent conduct, and great integrity and piety of mind; quite regardless of worldly concerns, and careless and often imprudent in worldly matters. He was an excellent linguist, possessing a wonderful memory, and so profound a divine that some have called him “Columna Fidei Orthodoxo et Maleus Hereticorum,” “Patrum Pater,” and “Ingenia Scholae et Academiae Oraculum.” His works were as much esteemed as his learning. They were numerous, and mostly written during a long residence in Paris, on bodily health, politics, theology, and other subjects. Some of these works were also printed in Latin, and had a great sale.

Prieur de Sancerre was a French cardinal, born in 1451, of a noble family. He was successively, by the favor of cardinal George D'Amboise, his cousin, grand archdeacon of Bourges, archdeacon of Blois, dean of St.-Hilaire-de-Poitiers, apostolic prothonotary, abbot commendatory of Landais, of Saint-Aubin, of Beaune, of Oloron, of Landun, etc., and, at last, almoner to the king. He was raised to the bishopric of Bayeux, on the express recommendation of Louis XII, Sept. 17, 1498. He was shortly after sent to Spain to subscribe to the treaty concluded in 1499 with Henry VII, king of England. He accompanied, a little while after this, Louis XII in his expedition against the Genevese, and was promoted to the cardinalate by Julius II (May 17, 1500). When that pope took up arms against Louis XII, he prevented de Prie from leaving Rome, under pain of being deprived of his livings (1500). In spite of the pontifical inquisition, the cardinal quitted Rome, and, together with some other prelates attached to the interests of France, opened at Pisa (Nov. 1, 1511) a council against Julius II, who, on Oct. 24, had declared him deposed from the cardinalate. In the interval he had been raised to the archbishopric of Limoges (1510), and two years after he was provided with the bishopric of Lectoure. Seeing the chair of Limoges contested, de Prie made an arrangement with his competitors (Aug. 16, 1513) by which he relinquished his rights to the bishopric of Lectoure to William of Mornay, who in his turn resigned the bishopric of Limoges to Foucaud de Bonnivial, then obtained the bishopric of Soissons. René de Prie, who had in the meantime been created cardinal by pope Leo X, celebrated at St. Denis the funeral ceremonies of Anne of Brittany (Jan. 29, 1514); then witnessed the marriage of Louis XII and Mary of England (Sept. 14); held at Bayeux a diocesan synod, where he published the laws (April 15, 1515); and resigned his two bishoprics of Limoges and of Bayeux Sept. 18. While at Milan, in 1512, when the Council of Pisa had been transferred, the University of Paris declared against him in a work of Thomas de Vio (cardinal Cajetan), On the Authority of the Pope, wherein the doctrine of Gerson was attacked, which he had espoused. Cardinal de Prie died at Lyre Sept. 9, 1519.—Hofler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Prie-Dieu is a term in ecclesiastical architecture designating a small lectern (q. v.), or book-deck, which was introduced in the 15th century.

Prierias, Sylvester, a Roman Catholic theologian of the time of the Reformation, and noted for his antagonist views on the new movement, was born in 1440. His family-name was Masolino, but he was called de Prieria, surnamed Petria, Prieria, Prieres, and Prieri, and a father's prayers. He died at Bredon, in Worcestershire, July 12, 1650. He was a man of most unassuming and gentle manners; of excellent conduct, and great integer and ready exposition, he was surrounded by a crowd of pupils at the Gymnasium of Bologna, of which he had become the director. At the request of the Senate of Venice he was called up for a few years to be professor of theology at Padua, and was then prior at Milan, Verona, and Como. In 1508, in an assembly of the members of his order from both Lombardy, held at Mantua, he was elected vicar-general; two years later he was elected prior at Bologna. His resolution and the commission of Doctor Hallerius, bishop of Ponte, induced pope Julius II to call him to Rome in 1611 as public lecturer on theology. Upon the death of the Magister Sacri Palutii, Frater Joannes de Raffanella (generally called De Ferraria), in 1515, Priarisa was promoted to the vacant dignity. He was stationed in Florence, Gen. xii (4), 22, xxi, 20) while others remain afar off, and is applied accordingly, for the most part, to the sons of Aaron, as those who were alone authorized to offer sacrifices. In some remarkable passages it takes a wider range. It is applied to the priests of other nations or religions, to the Levites (Lev. xiii, 12, 21), with whom it is buried in the church of St. Mary ad Minervam. He was the first non-German theologian who took up the pen against Luther. In 1518 he published Dialogus in praesumptuosa Martini Lutheri conclamatione de potestate Pau- pe and his Replicas in Lutherum; then in the following years his Errata et Argumenta Lutheri recutita, detecta- tata, et copiosaissima trito, and his Epistola Responsionis ad eundem Lutherum. The style is quite scholastic, and his defense of the papal primacy not without ability from a Romanist standpoint. But Luther, in his blunt and personal attacks, shows the weaknesses of his papal pretension as to make the defence of Priarisa contemptible. The pope himself saw the inferiority of his defender in the contest, and admonished Priarisa to silence; though he appointed him one of the judges of Leibnizius, what he uttered false- ly to Priarisa are the works of a later magister of the order, Franciscus Sylvester. After his death appeared under his name some satires, composed after the fashion of the Epistola obscura.—vix, Modus solusam et auctilicicos ad quos libenter et consensumus Luthemus caiul nece- ssarium, et le Tractatus de arte et modo inservendi karectios. I. General Considerations.—1. The Name. (1.) The English version of the word in the Sept. and of the Test. term presbyter (πρεσבύτερος, elder), the meaning of which is, however, essentially different from that which was intended by the ancient terms. It would come nearer if derived from προτερήματα or προσπέρασμα, "to be before," etc. It would then correspond to Artio- tistius's definition of a priest, "presiding over things relating to the gods" (Polit. iii, 14), and with the very similar one in Heb. v, 1: "Every high-priest taken from among men is constituted on the behalf of men, with respect to their concerns with God, that he may present both gifts and sacrifices for sins." It would then adequately represent the iepiscos (ἐπισκόπος) of the Greeks, and the sacerdos (σακσιοイς) of the Latin. See PRIESTS.

(2.) It is unfortunate that there is nothing like a comprehensive interpreters as to the etymology of the above Hebrew word hên'. Its root-meaning, uncertain as far as Hebrew itself is concerned, is referred by Gesenius (Thesaurus, a. v.) to the idea of prophecy. The hên' delivers a divine message, stands as a mediator between God and man, represents each to the other. This meaning, however, belongs to the Hellenic, not to the Hebrew form, and Ewald connects the latter with the verb הוּלָלָה (hên'), to array, put in order (so in Isa. xli, 10), seeing in it a reference to the primary office of the priests as arranging the sacrifice on the altar (Aller- thum, p. 272). According to Saalschütz (Archdol. der Hebr. c. 78), the primary meaning of the word is to minister, and he thus accounts for the wider application of the name (as below). Bähr (Symbolik, ii, 15) connects it with an Arabic root = כֹּל, to draw near.

Of these etymologies, the last has the merit of answering most closely to the received usage of the word. In the prescription of the law, it is used of one who may "draw near" to the Divine Presence (Exod. xix, 22; 33, 20) while others remain afar off, and is applied accordingly, for the most part, to the sons of Aaron, as those who were alone authorized to offer sacrifices. In some remarkable passages it takes a wider range. (2.) It is unfortunate that there is nothing like a comprehensive interpreters as to the etymology of the above Hebrew word hên'. Its root-meaning, uncertain as far as Hebrew itself is concerned, is referred by Gesenius (Thesaurus, a. v.) to the idea of prophecy. The hên' delivers a divine message, stands as a mediator between God and man, represents each to the other. This meaning, however, belongs to the Hellenic, not to the Hebrew form, and Ewald connects the latter with the verb הונלא (hên'), to array, put in order (so in Isa. xli, 10), seeing in it a reference to the primary office of the priests as arranging the sacrifice on the altar (Aller- thum, p. 272). According to Saalschütz (Archdol. der the Sept. gives ἱππής. It is noticeable that this use of the title is confined to the reigns of David and Solomon, and that the synonym "the king's hand" of 1 Chronicles 6:42, and "the hand and priest" and priests are considered as synonymous. Yet by this the specific object of the priesthood, in contradistinction to the two other theocratic offices of prophet and king, is by no means sufficiently expressed. The prophet is also a mediator between God and man, since he speaks for the latter in the name of the former; while the king is the mediator of the judicial and executive power of God among his people, acting in the name of Jehovah. The priest also was clothed with representative power (Deut. xvi, 5); but this power was mainly directed to represent the people as a holy people in the presence of Jehovah, and to prepare a way by which they themselves might approach God.

Israel was the full-grown family of God, and the domestic priesthood was to become a nation of priests, a royal priesthood (1 Pet. ii, 9; 1 Pet. ii, 5; Num. xvi, 3). But that Israel was chosen to be the royal priesthood with respect to other nations, like many other things, was only expressed in idea, and not actually realized in fact. Israel was incapacitated by its natural infirmities, and its ignorance and transgressions of the very law through the fulfilment of which it was to be sanctified, to penetrate into the immediate presence of God (Exod. xix, 21). Hence the necessity of the nation having individual representatives to mediate between them and Jehovah. As a separate element the priesthood represented the nation as yet unfit to approach God. The people offered their gifts to God by means of a separated class from among themselves, and in connection with the propitiatory sacrifices this was calculated to keep alive the consciousness of their estrangement from God. The very place assigned to the priests in the camp was expressive of this idea, that they keep "the charge of the sanctuary for the charge of the children of Israel" (Num. iii, 88).

The insufficiency of the priesthood was expressed by the fact that the king being excluded from the most holy place. Only the high-priest, in whom the idea of this typical institution concentrated, could penetrate thither; and he only as the type of the future Mediater who was absolutely to lead us into the most holy of the world of spirits. Because the priests were not altogether removed from men, the people, even the chiefpriest, had access only once a year to the most holy, and that just on the day when the entire guilt of the nation was to be atoned for. He had on that occasion to confess his own sin, and bring a sin-offering; to lay aside his magnificent robes of office, and to officiate in a plain linen garment. Moreover, when he entered the dark, narrow space of the most holy, the cloud of incense was to cover the mercy-seat "that he die not" (Lev. xvi, 13).

The idea of mediation between God and the people is expressed by the priest presenting the atonement for the congregation, and the gifts of a reconciled people (2 Chronicles xix, 17; Lev. xvi, vii); Num. vii, 1; Deut. vii, 5). Again, he brings back from God's presence the blessing of grace, mercy, and peace (Lev. ix, 27, etc.; Num. vi, 22-27). In the earliest families of the race of Shem the offices of priest and prophet were undoubtedly united; so that the word originally denoted both, and at last the Hebrew idiom kept one part of the idea and the Arabic another (Genenium, Hebräisches und Chaldäisches Handwörterbuch [Leips., 1893]). It is worthy of remark that all the persons who are recorded in Scripture as having legally performed priestly acts, but who were not strictly sacerdotal, come under the definition of a prophet, viz.

persons who received supernatural communications of knowledge generally, as Adam, Abraham (Gen. xxv, 7), Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Job, Samuel, Elijah (comp. Luke i, 70). The relations of Ahasaph and the sacerdotal may be sufficiently comprehensive: A man who officiates or transacts with God on behalf of others, statedly, or for the occasion.

1. Ahasaph or ahasaph, (as in Exod. xvi, 22, for the Sept.) signifies "prophesying" under their head or father, and of the relation of Asaph himself to David in the choral service of the Temple.

2. Essential Idea of the Hebrew Priesthood.—This may be called mediation; hence the fact that in the epistle to the Hebrews [6:1-20] God and his office are considered as synonymous. Yet by this the specific object of the priesthood, in contradistinction to the two other theocratic offices of prophet and king, is by no means sufficiently expressed. The prophet is also a mediator between God and man, since he speaks for the latter in the name of the former; while the king is the mediator of the judicial and executive power of God among his people, acting in the name of Jehovah. The priest also was clothed with representative power (Deut. xvi, 5); but this power was mainly directed to represent the people as a holy people in the presence of Jehovah, and to prepare a way by which they themselves might approach God.

Israel was the full-grown family of God, and the domestic priesthood was to become a nation of priests, a royal priesthood (1 Pet. ii, 9; 1 Pet. ii, 5; Num. xvi, 3). But that Israel was chosen to be the royal priesthood with respect to other nations, like many other things, was only expressed in idea, and not actually realized in fact. Israel was incapacitated by its natural infirmities, and its ignorance and transgressions of the very law through the fulfilment of which it was to be sanctified, to penetrate into the immediate presence of God (Exod. xix, 21). Hence the necessity of the nation having individual representatives to mediate between them and Jehovah. As a separate element the priesthood represented the nation as yet unfit to approach God. The people offered their gifts to God by means of a separated class from among themselves, and in connection with the propitiatory sacrifices this was calculated to keep alive the consciousness of their estrangement from God. The very place assigned to the priests in the camp was expressive of this idea, that they keep "the charge of the sanctuary for the charge of the children of Israel" (Num. iii, 88).

The insufficiency of the priesthood was expressed by the fact that the king being excluded from the most holy place. Only the high-priest, in whom the idea of this typical institution concentrated, could penetrate thither; and he only as the type of the future Mediater who was absolutely to lead us into the most holy of the world of spirits. Because the priests were not altogether removed from men, the people, even the chiefpriest, had access only once a year to the most holy, and that just on the day when the entire guilt of the nation was to be atoned for. He had on that occasion to confess his own sin, and bring a sin-offering; to lay aside his magnificent robes of office, and to officiate in a plain linen garment. Moreover, when he entered the dark, narrow space of the most holy, the cloud of incense was to cover the mercy-seat "that he die not" (Lev. xvi, 13).

The idea of mediation between God and the people is expressed by the priest presenting the atonement for the congregation, and the gifts of a reconciled people (2 Chronicles xix, 17; Lev. xvi, vii); Num. vi, 1; Deut. vii, 5). Again, he brings back from God's presence the blessing of grace, mercy, and peace (Lev. ix, 27, etc.; Num. vi, 22-27). In the earliest families of the race of Shem the offices of priest and prophet were undoubtedly united; so that the word originally denoted both, and at last the Hebrew idiom kept one part of the idea and the Arabic another (Genenium, Hebräisches und Chaldäisches Handwörterbuch [Leips., 1893]). It is worthy of remark that all the persons who are recorded in Scripture as having legally performed priestly acts, but who were not strictly sacerdotal, come under the definition of a prophet, viz.

persons who received supernatural communications of knowledge generally, as Adam, Abraham (Gen. xxv, 7), Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Job, Samuel, Elijah (comp. Luke i, 70). The relations of Ahasaph and the sacerdotal may be sufficiently comprehensive: A man who officiates or transacts with God on behalf of others, statedly, or for the occasion.

3. Origin of the Sacerdotal Order.—The idea of a priesthood connects itself, in all its forms, pure or corrupted, with the conscience of more or less cleansed sin. Men feel that they have broken a law. The power above them is holier than they are, and they dare not approach it. They crave for the intervention of some one of whom they can think as likely to be more acceptable to the one to whom they render prayers, thanksgivings, sacrifices. He becomes their representative in "things pertaining unto God." He may become also (though this does not always follow) the representative of God to man. The functions of the priest and prophet may exist in the same person. The reverence which men pay to one who bears this consecrated character may lead them to acknowledge the priest as being also their king. The claim to fill the office may rest on characteristics belonging only to the individual man, or confined to a single family or tribe. The conditions of the office may demand the continuous presence of the priests, as they are among the most conspicuous facts of all religions of the ancient world, so do they occupy a like position in the history of the religion of Israel.

No trace of a hereditary or caste priesthood meets us in the worship of the patriarchal age. (For its occasional appearance in a general form, see § iii.) Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob perform priestly acts, offer sacrifices, "draw near" to the Lord (Gen. xii, 8; xviii, 22; xxvi, 25; xxvii, 20). To the eldest son, or to the favored son exalted to the place of the eldest, belongs the "goodly raiment" (xvii, 15), the "coat of many colors" (xxvii, 8), in which we find perhaps the earliest trace of a sacerdotal vestment (comp. Blunt, Script. Ceremon. i, 1; Ugelino, xiii, 189). Once, and once only, does the word kōhēn meet us as belonging to a ritual earlier than the time of Abraham. Melchizedek is "the priest of the most high God" (xiv, 18). The argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews has a historical foundation in the fact that there are no indications in the narrative of Gen. xiv of any one preceding or following on that office. The special divine names which are connected with him as the priest of "the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth," render it probable that he rose, in the strength of those great thoughts of God, above the level of the other inhabitants of Canaan. In him Abraham recognized a faith like his own, a life more entirely consecrated, the priestly character in its perfection. See Melchizedek. In the worship of the patriarchs themselves, the chief of the family, as such, acted as the priest. The office descended with the birthright, and might apparently be transferred with it. As the family expanded, the head of each section probably stood in the same relation to it. The thought of the special consecration of the first-born was recognized at the time of the Exodus (see below). A priesthood of a like kind must continue to exist in other pastoral tribes. The Book of Job, whatever may be its date, ignores altogether the institutions of Israel, and represents the man of Uz as himself "sacramentary" his sons, and offering burnt-offerings (i, 5). Jethro is a "priest of Midian" (Exod. ii, 16; iii, 1). Balak himself offers a bullock and a ram upon the seven altars on Pisgah (Nums. xxiii, 2, etc.).

In Egypt the Israelites came into contact with a priesthood of another kind, and that contact must have been for a time a very close one. The marriage of Joseph with the Egyptian wife (Gen. xli, 45) and that of Joseph to Asenath (Gen. xxxvii, 46) which we may infer from her name, of the goddess Neith—(Gen. xii, 45) [see Asenath] the special favor which he showed to the priestly caste in the years of famine
The training of Moses in the palace of the Pharaohs, probably in the colleges and temples of the priests (Acts vii, 22)—all this must have impressed the constitution, the dress, the outward form of life upon the minds of the lawyer and his contemporaries. Little as we know of the life of Moses during this remote period, the stereotyped fixedness of the customs of that country warrants us in referring to a tolerably distant past the facts which belong historically to a later period, and in doing so we find coincidences with the ritual of the Israelites too numerous to be looked on as accidental, or as the result of forces which were at work independent of each other, but taking parallel directions. As circumcision was common to the two nations (Herod. ii, 37), so the shaving of the whole body (ibid.) was with both part of the symbolic purity of the priesthood, once for all with the Levites of Israel (Numb. viii, 7), peace-offerings (xxiv, 5) either as the first-born or as representing in the freshness of their youth the purity of acceptable worship (comp. the analogous case of "the young man the Levite" in Judges, xvii, and Ewald, Alterthümer, p. 278). On the principle, however, that difference of title must not be made, it must not be assumed that it appears more probable that the "young men" were not those who had before performed priestly acts, but were chosen by the lawyer to be his ministers in the solemn work of the covenant, representing, in their youth, the stage in the nation's life on which the people were then entering (Keil, ad loc.). There are signs that the priests of the older ritual were already dealt with as belonging to an obsolescent system. Though they were known as those that "come near" to the Lord (Exodus xix, 22), yet they are not permitted to approach the Divine Presence on Sinai. They cannot "sanctify" themselves enough to endure that trial. Aaron alone, the future high-priest, but as yet not known as such, enters with Moses into the thick darkness. It is noticeable also that at this transition-stage, when the old order was passing away, and the new was not yet established, there is the proclamation of the truth, wider and higher than both, that the whole people was to be "a kingdom of priests" (ix, 6). The idea of the life of the nation was that it was to be as a priest and a prophet to the rest of mankind. They were called to a universal priesthood (comp. Keil, ad loc.). As a result, they had to submerge discipline before they could make the idea a reality. They drew back from their high vocation (Exodus xx, 18-21). As for other reasons, so also for this, that the central truth required a rigid, unbounding form for its outward expression, a distinctive priesthood was to be to the nation what the nation was to mankind. The position given to the ordinances of the priesthood indicated with sufficient clearness that it was subordinate, not primary, a means and not an end. Not in the first proclamation of the great acts of God's eternal covenant (Deuteronomy xx, 1-17), nor in the application of the chief contingencies of the people's life in the wilderness, does it find a place. It appears together with the ark and the tabernacle, as taking its position in the education by which the people were to be led towards the mark of their high calling. As such we have to consider it.

II. Personal Characteristics of the Hebrew Priesthood.

1. Consecration.—The functions of the High-Priest, the position and history of the Levites as the consecrated tribe, have been fully discussed under those heads. It seems to us, however, that the place connected with "the priests, the sons of Aaron," as standing between the two. Solemm as was the subsequent designation of the other descendants of Levi, that of the priests involved a yet higher consecration. A special word (קֹדֶשׁ, kadish) was appropriated to it. Their old garments were laid aside. Their bodies were washed with clean water (Exodus xxix, 4; Lev. viii, 6) and anointed with the perfumed oil, prepared after a prescribed formula, and to be used for no lower purpose (Exodus xxix, 7; xxx; xxxiii, 2). The sons of Aaron, it may be noticed, were simply sprinkled with the precious oil (Lev. viii, 30). Over Aaron himself it was poured till it went down to the skirts of his clothing (Lev. viii, 12; Psal. cxxxxiii, 2). The new garments belonging to their office were then put on them (see below). The truth that those who intercede for men themselves have been reconciled was indicated by the sacrifice of a bullock as a sin-offering, on which they solemnly laid their hands, as transferring to it the guilt which had been attached to them (Exodus xxix, 10; Lev. viii, 10). The total sacrifice of no priest was permitted by the ram slain as a burnt-offering, "a sweet savour" to Jehovah (Exodus xxix, 18; Lev. viii, 21). The blood of these two was sprinkled on the altar, offered to the Lord. The blood of a third victim, the ram of consecration, was used for another purpose. With it Moses sprinkled the right ear, that was to be open to the divine voice; the right hand and the right foot, that were to be active in divine ministrations (Exod. xxix, 20; Lev. viii, 23, 24). Lastly, as they were to be the exponents, signers, and witnesses of the nation's life, but of the praise and thanksgiving, Moses was to "fill their hands" with cakes of unleavened bread and portions of the sacrifices, which they were to present before the Lord as a wave-offering. This appears to have been regarded as the essential part of the consecration; and the Heb. "to fill the hand" is accordingly used as a synonym for "to consecrate" (Exod. xxix, 9; 2 Chron. xiii, 9). The whole of this mysterious ritual was to be repeated for seven days, during which they remained within the Tabernacle, separated from the people, and not till then were they to "set things in order" (Exod. xxvii, 19), that is, the meaning of all these acts. Bahr. Symbolik, vol. ii, ch. 2, § 2). Moses himself, as the representative of the Unseen King, is the consecrator, the sacrificer throughout these ceremonies; as the channel through which the others receive their office, he has for the time a higher priesthood than that of Aaron (Selden, De Synedr. 1, 16; Ugolino, xii, 3). In accordance with the principle which runs through the history of Israel, he, the ruler, solemnly divests himself of the priestly office and transfers it to another. The fact that he had been a priest was merged in his work as a law-giver. It is only in the time of a later period, that word kohèm applied to him (Psa. cxix, 6).

The consecrated character thus imparted did not need renewing. It was a perpetual inheritance transmitted from father to son through all the centuries that followed. We do not read of its being renewed in the case of any individual priest of the sons of Aaron. Only when the line of succession was broken, and the impiety of Jeroboam intruded the lowest of the people into the sacred office, do we find the reappearance of a like form (2 Chron. xiii, 9) of the same technical word. The previous history of Jeroboam and the character of the worship which he introduced make it probable that, in that case only, the ceremonial was, to some extent, Egyptian in its origin. In after-times the high-priest took an oath (Heb. vii, 23) to bind him, as the Jews say, to a strict adherence to established customs (Mishna, Yoma, 1, 5).

Dress. The "sons of Aaron" thus dedicated were to wear during their ministrations a special apparel—attire at other times apparently worn the common dress of the people. The material of the sacred garments was to be linen, and not wool (Exek. xli, 17; Lev. xxvi, 1-10); but Ewald (Alterthümer, p. 917), Josephus (Ant. iv, 8), and the rabbits (Mass., Kläim, p. 9) maintain that the holy garments were made of a mixture of wool and linen, called ἕττον (shaturn); and a typical meaning is found in this by Braun (Vest. Soc. Hebr. § 80), as if it was to signify the imperfection of the Levitical priesthood; while Ezek. xli, 17, which restricts the material to linen, was considered significant of the simplicity of the New Test. See HETEROGENEOUS. The prohibition in Lev. xix, 19; Deut. xxii, 11 against the people generally wearing any garments of such "mingled" material was hence explained by Josephus that they might not assume what was characteristic of the priests (Ant. iv, 11). But the more satisfactory and natural view is that the priests only wore linen, and that the Israelites were prohibited from wearing the mixture to teach them that even in garments they should avoid all needless artificiness, and to respect the creation of God in the simplicity of the material. See LINEN. It is well known that the Roman poets speak of the Egyptians as the inordinately the wearers of linen (Juvenal, Sat. 6; Ovid, Met. i). The reason for fixing on this material is given in Ezek. xli, 18; but the feeling that there was something unclean in clothes made from the skin or wool of an animal was common to other nations. Egypt has already been mentioned. The Arab priests in the time of Mohammed wore linen only (Ewald, Alterthümer, p. 289). As there were some garments common both to the priest and the high-priest, we shall begin with those of the former, taking them in the order in which they would be put on. See HOLY MANUSCRIPTS.

(1.) The first was ἄμμος ἱματία, "linen breeches," or drawers (Exod. xxviii, 42; Sept. περιτόμην ἑλεά; Vulg. feminula lina). These extended from the loins to the thighs, and were to "cover their nakedness." The reverence of the Hebrew ritual in this and in other places (Exod. xx, 25; xxviii, 42) was probably a protest against some of the fouler forms of nature-worship, as e.g. in the worship of Peor (Maimonides, Moreh Nêtochim, iii, 45; Ugolino, xiii, 385), and possibly, also, in some Egyptian rites (Herod., ii, 60). According to Josephus, whose testimony, however, of course relates only to his own time, they reached only to the middle of the thigh, where they were tied fast (Ant. iii, 7, 1). Such drawers were worn universally in Egypt. In the sculptures and paintings of that country the figures of workmen and servants have no other dress than a short kilt or apron, sometimes simply bound about the loins and lapping over in front; other figures have short loose drawers; while a third variety of this article, fitting closely and extending to the knees, appears in the pictures of some idols, as in the cut. This last sort of drawers seems to have been peculiar in Egypt to the gods, and to the priests, whose attire was often adapted to that of the idols on which they attended. The priests, in common with other persons of the upper classes, wore the drawers under other robes. No mention occurs of the use of drawers by any other class of persons in Israel except the priests, on whom it was enjoined for the sake of decency. See BREECHES.

(2.) Over the drawers was worn the "coat of fine linen" (בֵּין פְּלִיל, kethîmeth shêkâ, tunica linaria), Exod. xxxix, 27), a close-fitting shirt or casacker, such as was worn by men in general (Gen. xxxvii, 3), also by women (2 Sam. xiii, 18; Cant. v, 3), next to the skin. It was white, but with a diamond or chevron pattern on it (Bahr, Symbolik, vol. ii, ch. iii, § 2). This came nearly to the feet (τὸ γαλατάνιον χιτών, Josephus, Ant. iii, 7, 1), and was to be worn in its garment-shape (not cut out and then sewed together), like the χιτών ἐπεκτείνος of John xix, 23, in which some interpreters have even seen a token of the priesthood of him who wore it (Ewald, Gesch. v, 177; Ugolino, xiii, 218). Here also modern Eastern customs present an analogy in the woven, seamless thrones worn by the Mocce pilgrims (Ewald, Alterthümer, p. 299). Josephus further states that it sat close to the body, and had sleeves, which were tied fast to the arms, and was girded to the breast a little above the elbows by a girdle. It had a narrow aperture about the neck, and was tied with certain strings hanging down from the edge over the breast and back, and was fastened above each shoulder (Ant. iii,
7, 9, 17). But this garment, in the case of the priests and high-priest, was to be broidered (Exod. xxviii, 4), "a broidered coat," by which Gesenius understands a coat of cloth worked in checkers or cells. Braun compares it to the reticulum in the stomach of ruminant animals (De Vestit. i, 17). The Sept. gives χιτών ἐν ζωικοβάρτι, and seems to refer to the tassels or strings; Vulg. laceri stricto, which seems to refer to its close fitting.

(5.) The whole tunic was gathered at the waist by the "girdle" (σακάτη, ουδή, Exod. xxviii, 40; Sept. ليذ, Vulg. iudae, comp. Ezek. ii, 29). This was also worn by magistrates (Iam. xxii, 21). The girdle for the priests was to be made of fine twined linen, and blue and purple and scarlet of needlework (xxix, 29). Josephus describes it as often going round, four fingers broad, but so loosely woven that it might be taken for the skin of a serpent; and that it was embroidered with flowers of scarlet red, purple, and blue, but that the warp was nothing but linen. The beginning of its circumference was at the breast, and when it had gone round it was there tied, and hung loosely down to the ankles while the priest was not engaged in any laborious service, for in that position it appeared in the most agreeable manner to the spectators; but when he was obliged to assist at the offering of sacrifices and to do the appointed service, in order that he might not be hindered in his operations by its motion, he threw it to the left hand and bore it on his right shoulder (A. n. iii, 7, 2). The mode of its hanging down is illustrated in Fig. 4, where the girdle is also richly embroidered, while the imbricated appearance of the girdle (ギοδανάς ἐν ζωικοβάρτι) may be seen very plainly in Fig. 1. The next cut (Fig. 8) of a priestly scribe of ancient Egypt, offers an interesting specimen of both tunic and girdle. See Girdle.

(4.) Upon their head they were to wear a turban (ギοδανάς, migbédh; Exod. xxviii, 40; Sept. ι καταρα ὑπερ βαρε, Vulg. tiera; A. V. "cap or" bonnet," which two words are there synonymous) in the form of a cup-shaped flower, also of fine linen (xxix, 28). In the time of Josephus it was circular, covering about half the head, something like a crown, made of thick linen swathes doubled round many times and sewed together, and surrounded by a linen cover to hide the seams of the swathes, and sat so close that it would not fall off when the body was bent down (A. n. iii, 7, 3).

These garments they might wear at any time in the Temple, whether on duty or not, but they were not to sleep in them (Josephus, War. v, 5, 7). When they became soiled they were not washed or used again, but torn up to make wicks for the lamps in the Tabernacle (Selden, De Synedr. xiii, 11). In Ezek. xiii, 14; xlv, 17-19, there are directions that the priests should take off their garments when they had ministered, and lay them up in the holy chambers, and put on other garments; but these directions occur in a visionary representation of a temple, which all agree has never been realized, the particulars of which, though sometimes derived from kingly customs, yet at other times copied over from them widely. The garments of the inferior priests are to have been kept in the sacred treasury (Ezra ii, 69; Neh. vii, 70). They had besides them other "clothes of service," which were probably simpler, but are not described (Exod. xxxi, 10; xxi, 14). In all their acts of ministration they were to be barefooted. This is inferred (a) from the absence of any direction as to a covering for the feet; (b) from the later custom; (c) from the universal feeling of the East. Shoes were worn as a protection against defilement. In a sanctuary there was nothing that could defile. Then, as now, this was the strongest recognition of the sanctity of a holy place which the Oriental mind could think of (Exod. iii, 5; Josh. v, 15), and throughout the whole existence of the Temple service, even though it drew upon them the scorn of the heathen Jews. Sat. vi, 15, especially affected this view of the priests (Ugolinus, viii, 976; xiii, 405), it was scrupulously adhered to.

The dress of the high-priest was precisely the same with that of the common priests in all the foregoing particulars; in addition to which he had (1) a robe, γαλατή, mell (Exod. xxviii, 4, νοθήμ, tunica). This was not a mantle, but a second and larger coat without sleeves; a kind of surplice worn by the lity, especially persons of distinction (Job i, 20; ii, 12, by kings; 1 Sam. xv, 27; xxviii, 4; xxiv, 5-12). This garment, when intended for the high-priest, and then called "the robe of the ephod," was to be of one entire piece of woven work, all of blue, with an aperture for the neck in the middle of the upper part, having its rim strengthened and adorned with a border. The hem had a kind of fringe, composed of tassels, made of blue, purple, and scarlet, in the form of pomegranates; and between every two pomegranates there was a small golden bell, so that there was a bell and a pomegranate alternately all round (Exod. xxviii, 31-35). The use of these bells may have partly been that by the high-priest shaking his garment at the time of his offering incense on the great day of expiation, etc., the people without might be apprised of it, and unite their prayers with it (comp. Ezech. xiv, 19; Luke i, 10; Acts x, 4; Rev. viii, 8, 9, 3). Josephus describes this robe of the ephod as reaching to the feet, and consisting of a single piece of stuff parted where the hands came out (John xix, 23). He also states that it was tied round with a girdle embroidered with the same colors as the former, with a mixture of gold interwoven (A. n. iii, 7, 4). It is highly probable that this garment was also derived from Egyptian usage. There are instances at Thebes of priests wearing over the great-coat a loose sleeveless robe, which exposes the sleeves of the inner tunic. The fringes of bells and pomegranates seems to have been the priestly substitute for the fringe bound with a blue ribbon, which all the Israelites were commanded to wear. Many traces of this fringe occur in the Egyptian remains. The use assigned to it, "that looking on this fringe they might remember the Lord's commandments," seems best explicable by the supposition that the Egyptians had connected some superstitious ideas with it (Numb. xv, 37-40). (2.) The ephod, τό έφοδος, τούτοις, superhumeralia (Exod. xxviii, 4). This was a short cloak covering the shoulders and breast. It is said to have been worn by Samuel while a youth ministering before the Lord (1 Sam. ii, 18); by David while engaged in religious service (2 Sam. vi, 14); and by inferior priests.

(1 Sam. xxii, 18). But in all these instances it is distinguished as a linen ephod, and was not a sacred but an honorary vestment, as the Sept. understands it in 2 Sam. vi, 14, ἐκλύγαν Ἠσσάλων. The ephod of the high-priest was to be made of gold, of blue, of purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, with cunning work, ἡσσάλων. Though it probably consisted of one piece, woven throughout, it had a back part and a front part, united by shoulder-pieces. It had also a girdle; or, rather, strings went out from each side and tied it to the body. On the top of each shoulder was to be an onyx stone, set in sockets of gold, each having engraved upon it six of the names of the children of Israel, according to the precedence of birth, to memorialize the Lord of the promises made to them (Exod. xxviii, 6-12, 29). Josephus gives sleeves to the ephod (Ant. iii, 7, 5). It may be considered as a substitute for the leopard-skin worn by the Egyptian high-priests in their most sacred duties, as in Fig. 4, where the ephod appears no less plainly. In other figures of Egyptian priests, the shoulder-pieces were equally apparent. They are even perceptible in Fig. 1. The Egyptian ephod is, however, highly charged with all sorts of idolatrous figures and emblems, and even with scenes of human sacrifices. The Sept. rendering of ἡσσάλων, "cunning work," is ἱρακνή ἐφαντο πουειλτοφ, a woven-work of the embroiderer, a word which especially denotes a manufacturer of tissues adorned with figures of animals (Strabo, xviii, p. 574, Sieh.). In the earlier liturgical costume, the ephod is mentioned as belonging to the high-priest only (Exod. xxviii, 6-12; xxxix, 2-5). At a later period it is used apparently by all the priests (1 Sam. xxii, 18), and even by others, not of the tribe of Levi, engaged in religious ceremonial (2 Sam. vi, 14). See Ephod. Then came (3) the breastplate, ἄμμωτος, ἁδάκης (Sept. περιαργατής, ἄμμωτος; Vulg. rutilus); a gorget ten inches square, made of the same sort of cloth as the ephod, and doubled so as to form a kind of pouch or bag (Exod. xxix, 9), in which were to be put the Urim and Thummim, which are also mentioned as if already known (xxviii, 80). The external part of this gorget was set with four rows of precious stones—the first row a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle; the second, an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond; the third, a figure, an agate, and an amethyst; and the fourth, a beryl, an onyx, and a Jasper—set in a golden socket. Upon each of these stones was to be engraved the name of one of the sons of Jacob. In the ephod, in which there was a space left open sufficiently large for the admission of this pectoral, were four rings of gold, to which four others at the four corners of the breastplate corresponded; the two lower rings of the latter being fixed inside. It was confined to the ephod by means of dark-blue ribbons, which passed through these rings; and it was also suspended from the onyx stones on the shoulder by chains of gold, or, rather, cords of twisted gold threads, which were fastened at one end to two other larger rings fixed in the upper corners of the pectoral, and by the other end going round the onyx stones on the shoulders, and returning and being fixed in the larger ring. The breastplate was further kept in its place by a girdle, made of the same stuff, which Josephus says was sewed to the breastplate, and which, when it had gone once round, was tied again upon the seam and hung down. Here is another adaptation and correction of the costume of the higher Egyptian priests, who wore a large, splendid ornament upon the breast, often a winged scarabaeus, the emblem of the sun, as in the cut, Fig. 5, which exhibits the connecting ring and chain to fasten it to the girdle. (4.) The remaining portion of dress peculiar to the high-priest was the mitre, πεπρωθόν, semeléth (Sept. κύδασος; Vulg. cædastis, Exod. xxviii, 4). The Bible says nothing of the difference between this and the turban of the common priests. It is, however, called by a different name. It was to be of fine linen (ver. 29). Josephus says it was the same in construction and figure with that of the common priest, but that above it there was another, with swaths of blue, embroidered; and round it was a golden crown, polished, of three rows, one above another, out of which rose a cup of gold, which resembled the calyx of the herb called by Greek botanists hyoecyamus. He ends a most labored description by comparing the shape of it to a poppy (Ant. iii, 7, 6). Upon comparing his account of the bonnet of the priests with the mitre of the high-priest, it would appear that the latter was conical. The cut, Fig. 6, presents the principal forms of the mitres worn by the ancient priests of Egypt, and affords a substantial resemblance of that prescribed to the Jews, diversified of idolatrous symbols, but which were displaced to make way for a simple plate of gold, bearing the inscription, "Holiness to Jehovah." This plate (יווה, tis; Sept. περαστος; Vulg. lumen) extended from one ear to the other, being bound to the forehead by strings tied behind, and further secured in its position by a blue ribbon attached to the mitre (Exod. xxvii, 36-39; xxxix, 30; Lev. viii, 9). Josephus says this plate was preserved to his own day (Ant. iii, 5, 8; see Reuben, De Spod. Templi, p. 132). Such was the dress of the high-priest: see a description of its magnificence in corresponding terms in Exod. 1, 5-16.

Fig. 5. Ancient Egyptian Priestly Mitres.

Josephus had an idea of the symbolical import of the several parts of the pontifical dress. He says that being made of linen signified the earth; the blue denoted the sky, being like lightening in its pomegranates, and in the noise of its bells resembling thunder. The ephod showed that God had made the universe of four elements, the gold relating to the splendor by which all things are enlightened. The breastplate in the middle of the ephod resembled gold, and, excepted, was the middle place of the world. The girdle signified the sea, which goes round the world. The sardonyxes declare the sun and moon. The twelve stones are the twelve months or signs of the zodiac. The mitre is heavy, because blue (Ant. iii, 7, 7). He appears, however, to have had two explanations of some things, one for the Gentiles, and another for the Jews. Thus in this section he tells his Gentile readers that the seven lamps upon the golden candlesticks referred to the seven planets; but to the Jews he represents them as an emblem of the seven days of the week (War, vi, 5, 5; Whiston's notes ad loc.). It was not always worn by the high-priest. It was exchanged for one wholly of linen, and therefore white, though of similar construction, when on the day of expiation he entered into the holy of holies (Lev. xvi, 4, 25); and neither he nor any other priest wore their appropriate dress, except when officiating. It was for this reason, according to some, that Paul, who had been long absent from Jerusalem, did not know that Aanias was the high-priest (Acts xxiii, 5). Bahr (Symbolik, vol. ii, ch. iii, § 1, 2) finds a mystic meaning in the number, material, color, and shape of the priestly vestments, discusses each point elaborately, and dwells in § 3 on the differences between them and those of the Egyptian priesthood. According to Fairbairn (Typol. of Scrip.), the garments represent the office, and the person who was officially invested was to have them sprinkled with a mixture of oil and sacrificial blood (Kurtz, Opfercurius, p. 292). These garments, which were first worn at the consecration, and which were preserved in the Temple when not actually required, were not allowed except to such as were legally consecrated for service, though they belonged to the house of Aaron. These garments were "holly garments" (Exod. xxviii, 4), made "for glory and for beauty;" but they were not only for a glorious ornament, for the whole of the vestments bore a symbolical meaning; and the inscription on the golden plate who addressed the words of the high-priest, "Holiness to Jehovah," might be properly applied to all the holy garments. The four pieces of the priestly attire were each and all of them required, none was to fail; nor was it permitted to wear more than was prescribed; and the warning "that he die not" (ver. 46, 48) seems to have been upon an omission of the divine command in this, no less than in other things. The shining white of the linen garments typified that the servants of him who covers himself with light as with a garment (Psal. cii, 2; Dan. ii, 22; vii, 9), and who dwelteth in light which no man can approach unto (1 Tim. vi, 16), are clothed typically in light (Exod. xxxiv, 29); so that the ministers should minister in the earthly sanctuary in the same livery as his ministers wear in the heavenly sanctuary (Dan. xii, 6; Ezek. x, 2, 7; Matt. xvii, 2; xxviii, 5; Acts x, 9). But light (consequently white, as the most perfect reflection of light) is universally the type of salvation (Job xviii, 5, etc.; Psal. xxvii, 1; Isa. lix, 9), of righteousness (Psal. xxxvii, 6; Mal. iv, 2), of purity and holiness (1 John i, 5, 7); just as darkness, black, is the type of wickedness, uncleanness, etc. (Isa. v, 20; Lam. iv, 7, 8; John iii, 19; Rom. iii, 12; 2 Cor. vi, 14). It is not without meaning that the priests, like the angels, are specially called the holy ones.

5. Regulations.—The idea of a consecrated life, which was thus asserted at the outset, was carried through a multitude of details. Each probably bore a symbolic meaning of its own. Collectively they formed an education by which the power of distinguishing between things holy and profane, between the clean and the unclean, and so ultimately between moral good and evil, was awakened and developed (Ezek. xliii, 20). Before they entered the tabernacle the priests were to wash their hands and their feet (Exod. xxx, 17-21; xl, 80-82). During the time of their ministration they were to drink no wine or strong drink (Lev. x, 9; Ezek. xliii, 21). Their function was to be more to them than the ties of friendship and of blood, and, as the nearest relationships (six degrees are specified, Lev. xxvi, 1-5; Ezek. xliii, 25), they were to make no mourning for the dead. The high-priest, as carrying the consecrated life to its highest point, was to be above the disturbing power of human sorrow even in these instances. Public calamities seem to have been an exception, for Josias the high-priest, and the priests, in such circumstances, ministered in sackcloth with ashes on their mitres (Judith iv, 15; comp. Joel i, 18). Customs which appear to have been common in other priestly orders were probably forbidden by this ordinance to them. They were not to shave their heads. They were to go through their ministrations with the serenity of a reverential awe, not with the orgiastic wildness which led the priests of Baal, in their despair, to make cuttings in their flesh (Lev. xix, 28; 1 Kings xvii, 39), and carried those of whom Arys was a type to a more terrible mutilation (Deut. xxxi, 1). The same thought found expression in two other forms affecting the priests of Israel. The priest was to be one who, as the representative of other men, was to be physically as well as liturgically perfect. The idea of the perfect body, as symbolizing the holy soul, was, as might be expected, wide-spread among the religions of heathenism. "Sacerdos non integrus corporis quasi maius omnis res vitanda est" (Seneca, Contr. iv, 2). As the victim was to be without blemish, so also was the sacrificer (comp. Bahr, Symbolik, vol. ii, ch. ii, § 8). The law specified in broad outlines the excluding defects (Lev. xxi, 17-21), and these were such as impaired the purity, or at least the dignity, of the ministrant. The morbid casuistry of the later rabbins drew up a list of not less than 144 faults or infirmities, which were excluded by the ceremony of twenty-two which involved temporary deprivation from the priestly office (Carpenz. App. Crit. p. 92, 93; Ugo- lino, xii, 54; xiii, 908); and the original symbolism of the principle (Philo, De Vic. and De Monarch. ii, 5) was lost in the pruriens minuteness which, in later times, often makes the study of rabbinic literature a somewhat repulsive task. If the Christian Church has sometimes seemed to approximate, in the conditions it laid down for the priestly character, the rules of Judaistic law, it was from a desire to reject the Jewish principles, and to rest its regulations simply on the grounds of expediency (Comm. Apos. 77, 78). The marriages of the sons of Aaron were, in like manner, hedged round with special rules. There is, indeed, no evidence for what has sometimes been asserted, that either the high priest (Philos, De Monarch. ii, 11; ii, 229, ed. Mang.; Ewald, Alterth. p. 302) or the other sons of Aaron (Ugolino, xii, 62) were limited in their choice to the women of their own tribe, and we have some distinct instances to the contrary. It is possible, perhaps, that the priest's daughter was more or less intimated, and it is certain that they were forbidden to marry an unchaste woman, or one who had been divorced, or the widow of any but a priest (Lev. xxii, 7, 14; Ezek. xlv. 22). The prohibition of marriage with one of an alien race was assumed, though not enacted in the law; and hence the reforming zeal of a later time compelled all who had contracted such marriages to put away their strange wives (Ezra x, 18), and counted the offering of a priest and a woman taken captive in war as illegitimate (Josephus, Ant. iii, 10, x, 4; c Apion, i, 7), even though the daughter was his own child and born under the same circumstances of Captivity (Ugolino, xii, 924). The high-priest was to carry the same idea to a yet higher point, and to marry none but a virgin in the first freshness of her youth (Lev. xxii, 18). Later casuistry fixed the age within the narrow lines of twelve and twelve, or rather twelve and a half (Carmov. Appo. Crit. p. 88). It followed, as a matter of necessity, from these regulations, that the legitimacy of every priest depended on his genealogy. A single missing or faulty link would vitiate the whole succession. To those genealogies, accordingly, extending back unbroken for 2000 years, the priests could point, up to the time of the destruction of the Temple (Josephus, c. Apion, i, 7). In later times, wherever the priest might live—Egypt, Babylon, Greece—he was to send the register of all marriages in his family to Jerusalem (ibid.). They could be referred to in any doubtful or disputed case (Ezra ii, 62; Neh. vii, 64). In them was registered the name of every mother as well as of every father (ibid.; comp. also the story already referred to in Suidas, a. v. Iosepic). It was the distinguishing mark of a priest, not of the Aaronic line, that he was imnirup, dumb. (Hab. ii, 14.) The law knew no other than the lawful father or mother named as the head of his title. The age at which the sons of Aaron might enter upon their duties was not defined by the law, as that of the Levites was. Their office did not call for the same degree of vigilance, and nor was help other than fire recorded in the ritual of the Tabernacle (Numb. viii, 24 and 28) and in that of the Temple (1 Chron. xxiii, 27) the appointed age for the latter, the former were not likely to be kept waiting till a later period. In one remarkable instance, indeed, we have an example of a yet earlier age. The boy Aristobulus at the age of seventeen ministered in the Temple in his pontifical robes, the admiral of all observers, and thus stirred the treacherous jealousy of Herod to remove so dangerous a rival (Josephus, Ant. xv, 3, 8). This may have been exceptional, but the law of the rabines indicates that the special consecration of the priest's life began with the opening years of manhood. As soon as the down appeared on his cheek the young candidate presented himself before the Council of the Sanhedrim, and his genealogy was carefully inspected. If it failed to satisfy his judges, he left the sanctuary clad in black, and had to seek another calling; if all was right so far, another ordeal awaited him. A careful inspection was to determine whether he was subject to any one of the 144 defects which would invalidate his priestly acts. If he was found free from all blemish, he was attired in the white garments of the priests, and entered on his ministrations. If the result of the examination was not satisfactory, he was relegated to the half-miental office of separating the sounding wood for the altar from that which was decayed and worm-eaten, but was not deprived of the emoluments of his office (Lightfoot, Temp. 251, ch. xii). It is, therefore, more capable of expansion—altered, as it has been shown [see Levities], from age to age; and those of the priestes continued throughout substantially the same, whatever changes might be brought about in their social position and organization. The duties described in Exoduses and Levities are the same as those recognised in the ritual of Chronicles, the vision of the prophet-priest Ezekiel sees in his vision of the Temple of the future. They, assisting the high-priest, were to watch over the fire on the altar of burnt-offerings, and to keep it burning evermore both by day and night (Lev. vi, 19; 2 Chron. xiii, 11); to feed the golden lamp outside the vail with oil (Exod. xxvii, 20, 21; Lev. xxiv, 2); to offer the morning and evening sacrifices, each accompanied with a meal-offering and a drink-offering, at the door of the tabernacle (Exod. xxix, 38-44). These were the fixed, invariable duties; but their chief business was to attend the sacrifice, to do the priest's office for any guilty, or penitent, or rejoining Israelite. The worshipper might come at any time. If he were rich and brought a bullock, it was the priest's duty to slay the victim, to place the wood upon the altar, to light the fire, and stoke the air with the blood (Lev. i, 6). If he were poor and brought a pigeon, the priest was to wring its neck (i, 15). In either case he was to burn the meal-offering and the peace-offering which accompanied the sacrifice (ii, 5; 9; iii, 13). After the birth of every child, the mother was to come with her sacrifice of turtle-doves or pigeons (Lev. xii, 6; Luke ii, 22-24), and was thus to be purified from her uncleanness. A husband who suspected his wife of unfaithfulness might bring her to the priest, and it belonged to him to give her the water of jealousy as an ordeal, and to pronounce the formula of execration (Numb. v, 11-31). Leper were to come, day by day, to submit themselves to the priest's inspection, that he might judge whether they were clean or unclean, and when they were healed perform for them the ritual of purification (Lev. xiii, xiv; comp. Mark i, 41). All the numerous acts of the priest at his ministrations or sins of ignorance had to be expiated by a sacrifice, which the priest of course had to offer (Lev. xv, 1-30). As they thus acted as mediators for those who were laboring under the sense of guilt, so they were to act as the representatives of the congregation and the season, the higher standard of a consecrated life. The Nazarite was to come to them with his sacrifice and his wave-offering (Numb. vi, 1-21). In the final establishment at Jerusalem it belonged to the priests to act as sentinels over the holy place, as to the Levites to guard the wider area of the precincts of the Temple (Ugolino, xiii, 1052). Other duties of a higher and more ethical character are hinted at, but were not, and probably could not be, the subject of a special regulation. They were to teach the children of Israel the statutes of the Lord (Lev. x, 11; Deut. xxxiii, 10; 2 Chron. xiv, 8; Ezek. xlv, 28, 24). The "priest's lips" (in the language of the last prophet looking back upon the ideal of the order) were to "keep knowledge" (Mal. ii, 7). Through the whole history, with the exception of the periods of national apostasy, these acts, and others like them, formed the daily life of the priests who were on duty. The three great festivals of the year were, however, their seasons of busiest employment. The pilgrims who came up by tens of thousands to keep the feast came each with his sacrifice and oblation. As the festival went on, on some occasions at least, beyond the strength of the priests in attendance, and the Levites had to be called to help them (2 Chron. xxxix, 84; xxxv, 14). Other acts of the priests of Israel, significant as they were, were less distinctively sacerdotal. They were to bless the people and pronounce blessings. As the acts of this part of their office never fall into dispute, a special formula of benediction was provided (Numb. vi, 22-27). During the journeys in the wilderness it belonged to them to cover the ark and all the vessels of the sanctuary with a purple or scarlet cloth before the Levites might approach them (iv, 5-10). As the people started on each day's march they were to blow "an alarm" with long silver trumpets (x, 1-8)—with two if the whole multitude were to be assembled, with one if there was to be a special council of the elders and princes of Israel. With the same instruments they were to proclaim the commencement of all the solemn days, and days of gladness (x, 10); and throughout all the changes in the religious history of Israel this adhered to them as a characteristic mark. Other instruments of music might be used by the more highly trained Levites and the schools of the prophets, but the trumpets belonged only to the priests. They blew them (but in that case the trumpets were of rams' horns) in the solemn march round Jericho (Josh. vi, 4), in the religious war which Judah waged against Jeroboam (2 Chron. xiii, 12), when they summoned the people to defend Jerusalem (fast Josh. ii, 1, 15). In the service of the second Temple there were to be never less than twenty-one or more than eighty-four blowers of trumpets present in the Temple daily (Ugolino, xiii, 1011). The presence of the priests on the field of battle for this purpose, often in large numbers, armed for war, and sharing in the actual conflict (1 Chron. xii, 23, 27; 2 Chron. xx, 21, 29), led, in the later periods of Jewish history, to the special appointment at such times of a war-priest, deputed by the Sanhedrim to be the representative of the high-priest, and standing next but one to him in the order of precedence (comp. Ugolino, xiii, 1081 [De Sacerdote Cas- trensi]; xiii, 871). Jos. (Judeut., i, 158) regards the war-priest as belonging to the ideal system of the later rabbins, not to the historical constitution of Israel. Deuteronomy xx, 2, however, supplies the germ out of which such an office might naturally grow. Judas Maccabaus, in his wars, does what the war-priest was said to do (1 Macc. iii, 56).

Other functions are intimated in Deuteronomy which might have given them greater influence as the educators and protectors of the people. They were to xiix (whether individually or collectively does not distinctly appear) as a court of appeal in the more difficult controversies in criminal or civil cases (Deut. xvii, 8-13). A special reference was to be made to them in cases of undying enmity, where they were thus to check the vindictive blood-feuds which it would otherwise have been likely to occasion (xiii, 5). It must remain doubtful, however, how far this order kept its ground during the storms and changes that followed. The judicial and the teaching functions of the priesthood remained probably for the most part in abeyance through the ignorance and vices of the priests. Zealous reformers kept this before them as an ideal (2 Chron. xvii, 7-9; xiii, 8-10; Ezek. xlv, 24), but the special stress laid on the attempts to realize it shows that they were exceptional. The teaching functions of the priest have probably been unduly magnified by writers like Michaelis, who aims at bringing the institutions of Israel to the standard of modern expediency (Comm. on Laws of Moses, i, 55-59), as they have been unduly depreciated by Saalschütz and Jastrow.

At first Aaron was to burn incense on the golden altar every morning when he dressed the lamps, and every evening when he lighted them, but in later times the common priest performed this duty (Luke i, 8, 9); to offer, as the Jews understand it, daily, morning and evening sacrifices, and the priestly blessing (Num. vi, 21), of his consecration (Exod. xxxix); to perform the ceremonies of the great day of expiation (Lev. xvii); to arrange the shewbread every Sabbath, and to eat it in the holy place (xxv, 9); but he must abstain from the holy things during his uncleanness (xxix, 1-3); also if he became leprous, or by reason of the sin of ignorance. If he committed a sin of ignorance, he must offer a sin-offering for it (iv, 3-18); and so for the people (ver. 12-23). He was to eat the remainder of the people's meal-offerings with the inferior priests in the holy place (vi, 10); to judge of the leprosy in the human body (xii, 1), to adjudicate legal questions (Deut. xvii, 12). Indeed, when there was no divinely inspired judge, the high-priest was the supreme ruler till the time of David, and again after the Captivity. He must be present at the appointment of a new ruler or leader (Num. xxvii, 18), and ask counsel of the Lord for the ruler (ver. 21). Eleazar, with others, distributes the spoils taken from the Midianites (Numb. xxxi, 21, 26).

To the high-priest also belonged the appointment of a maintenance from the funds of the sanctuary to an incapacitated priest (1 Sam. ii, 36, margin). Besides these duties, peculiar to himself, he had others in common with the inferior priests. Thus, when the camp set forward, "Aaron and his sons" were to take the tabernacle to pieces, to cover the various portions of it in blasts of various colors (iv, 6-15), and to appoint the Levites to their place in the service (xvi, 19), and to number the people in the form prescribed (vi, 23-27), to be responsible for all official errors and negligences (xviii, 1), and to have the general charge of the sanctuary (ver. 5).

5. Ministration.—Functions such as these were clearly inimical to the common activity of the chief (whether first the small number of the priests must have made the work almost unintermittent, and, even when the system of rotation had been adopted, the periodical absences from home could not fail to be disturbing and injurious, had the priests been dependent on their own labors. The serenity of the priestly character would have been disturbed had they had to look for support to the lower industries. It may have been intended (see above) that their time, when not liturgically employed, should be given to the study of the law, or to instructing others in it. On these grounds, therefore, a distinct provision was made for them. The later rabbins enumerate no less than twenty-four sources of emolument. Of these the chief only are given here (Ugolino, xiii, 1124). They consisted, (1) of one tenth of the tithes which the people paid to the Levites—i. e. one per cent, on the whole amount of the produce of the soil, and paid as a special tithe every third year (Deut. xiv, 29; xxvi, 12). (8.) Of the redemption-money, paid at the fixed rate of five shekels a head, for the first-born of man or beast (Num. xix, 14-19). It is to be noticed that the law, by recognizing the sanctity of the birthright, kept the first-born, and ordering payment only for the small number of the latter, in excess of the former, deprived Aaron and his sons of a large sum which would otherwise have accrued to them (Num. iii, 44-51). (4.) Of the redemption-money paid in like manner for men or things specially dedicated to the Lord (Lev. xxvii). (5.) Of spoil, captives, cattle, and the like, taken in war (Num. xxxiii, 25-47). (6.) Of what may be described as the perquisites of their sacrificial functions, the shewbread, the flesh of the burnt-offerings, peace-offerings, trespass-offerings (Num. xvi, 8-14; Lev. vi, 20, 29; vii, 6-10), and, in particular, the heave-shoulder and the wave-bread (Lev. x, 12-15). (7.) Of an undefined amount of the first-fruits of corn, wine, and oil (Exod. xxiii, 19; Lev. ii, 14; Deut. xxxvi, 1-10). Of some of these, as of most holy place but the priests were to take (Lev. vi, 29). It was lawful for their sons and daughters (x, 14), and even in some cases for their home-born slaves, to eat of others (xxii, 11). The stranger and the hired servant were in all cases excluded (xxii, 10). (8.) On their settlement in Canaan the levites are sometimes placed in the third cities of the "suburbs" or pasture-grounds for their flocks (Josh. xxii, 13-19). While the Levites were scattered over all the conquered country, the cities of the priests were within the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, and this concentration was not without its influence on their ascendant history. See Lev. xvi. 15. These provisions were obviously intended to secure the religion of Israel against the dangers of a caste of pauper-priests, needy and dependent, and unable to bear their witness to the true faith. They were, on the other hand, as far as possible removed from the condition of a wealthy order. Even in the ideal state contemplated by the book of Deuteronomy, the Levite (here probably used generically, so as to include the priests) is repeatedly marked out as an object of charity, along with the stranger and the widow (Deut. xii, 12, 19; xiv, 27-29). During the long period of national apostasy, tithes were probably paid with even less regularity than they were in the more orthodox period that followed the return from the Captivity (Neh. xiii, 10; Mal. iii, 8-10). The standard of a priest's income, even in the earliest days after the settlement in Canaan, was miserably low (Judg. xvii, 10). Large portions of the priesthood fell, under the kingdom, into a state of abject poverty (comp. 1 Sam. ii, 86). The clinging evil throughout their history shows not that they were too powerful and rich, but that they sank into the state from which the law was intended to prevent it. The tithes were the principal source of the Levitical revenue (Neh. x, 11; comp. Saalschütz, Archäologie der Hebräer, ii, 844-855).

It will be noticed that neither the high-priest nor common priests received "any inheritance" at the distribution of Canaan among the several tribes (Num. xix, 20; Deut. xviii, 1, 2), but were maintained, with their families, upon certain fees, dues, perquisites, etc., arising from the public services, which they enjoyed as a common fund. Perhaps the only distinct prerogative of the high-priest was a tenth part of the tithes assigned to the Levites (xviii, 29; comp. Neh. x, 86); but Josephus represents this also as a common fund (Ant. iv, 4, 4).

6. Classification and Statistics.—The earliest historical trace of any division of the priesthood and corresponding cycle of services belongs to the time of David. Jewish tradition indeed recognizes an earlier division, even during the life of Aaron, into eight houses (Gem. H.iers. Taanith, in Ugolino, xiii, 878), augmented during the period of the Shiloh-worship to sixteen, the two families of Eleazar and Ithamar standing in both cases on equal footing. It is hardly conceivable however, that there could have been any rotation of service while the number of priests was so small as it must have been during the forty years of sojourn in the wilderness, if we believe Aaron and his linage descendants to have been officiating. The real difficulty of realizing in what way the single family of Aaron were able to sustain all the burden of the worship of the tabernacle and the sacrifices of individual Israelites may, it is true, suggest the thought that possibly in this, as in other instances, the Hebrew idea of a kinsman by adoption may have extended the title of the "Sons of Aaron" beyond the limits of linage descent, and, in this case, there may be some foundation for the Jewish tradition. Nowhere in the later history do we find any disproportion like that of three priests to 20,000 Levites. The office of supervision over those that "kept the charge of the sanctuary," intrusted to Eleazar (Numb. iii, 92), implies that some others were subject to it besides Ithamar and his children, while these very keepers of the sanctuary are identified in ver. 58 with the sons of Aaron who are encamped with Moses and Aaron on the east side of the tabernacle. The allotment of not less than thirteen towns and there is a list of the cities of those who bore the name, within little more than forty years from the Exodus, tends to the same conclusion, and at any rate indicates that the priesthood were not intended to be always in attendance at the tabernacle, but were to have houses of their own, and therefore, as a necessary consequence, fixed periods only of service. Some notion may be formed of the number on the accession of David from the facts (1) that not less than 8700 tendered their allegiance to him while he was as yet reigning at Hebron over Judah only (1 Chron. ii, 39); (2) that the wages were sufficient for all the services of the state and more frequented worship which he established. To this reign belonged, accordingly, the division of the priesthood into the four-and-twenty "courses" or orders (Sept. επιστολοι, ἕμπωσις, 1 Chron. xxiv, 1-19; 2 Chron. xxiii, 8; Luke i, 5), each of which was to serve in rotation for one week, while the further assignment of special services during the week was determined by lot (Luke i, 5) under a subordinate prefect (2 Kings xxi, 6). The numbers are taken from the great festivals (2 Chron. v, 11). The first of these courses was that which had Jehoiarib at the head of it. It was reckoned the most honorable. Josephus values himself on his descent from it (Life, § 1). Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, descended from it (1 Macc. ii, 1). Abijah was the head of the eighth course, to which Sacheriah, the father of the Baptist, belonged (Luke i, 5). Each course appears to have commenced its work on the Sabbath, the outgoing priests taking the morning sacrifice, and leaving that of the evening to their successors (2 Chron. xxv, 14, 16). Abijah, however, the two great priestly houses did not stand on an equality. The descendants of Ithamar were found to have fewer representatives than those of Eleazar (a diminution that may have been caused partly by the destruction of the Temple, and partly of the daughters of Phinehas [Psa. lxxix, 64]), partly by the massacre at Nob, and sixteen courses accordingly were assigned to the latter, eight only to the former (1 Chron. xxiv, 4; comp. Carpzov, App. Crit. p. 98). The division thus instituted was confirmed by Solomon, and continued to be recognized as the typical number of the priesthood. It is to be noted, however, that this arrangement was to some extent elastic. Any priest might be present at any time, and even perform priestly acts, so long as he did not interfere with the functions of those who were officiating in their course (Ugolino, xiii, 881), and at the great solemnities of the year, as well as on special occasions like the opening of the Temple, they were present in great numbers. On the return from the Captivity there were found but four courses out of the twenty-four, each containing, in round numbers, about a thousand (Ezra xi, 52); but the number at the great festivals the twenty courses were reconstituted, bearing the same names as before, and so continued till the destruction of Jerusalem (Josephus, Ant. viii, 14, 7). If we may accept the numbers given by Jewish writers as at all trustworthy, the proportion of the priesthood to the population of Palestine during the century of their existence as an order must have been far greater than that of the clergy has ever been in any Christian nation. Over and above those that were scattered in the country and took their turn, there were not fewer than 24,000 stationed permanently at Jerusalem and 12,000 at Jericho (Gemar. H.iers. Taanith, fol. 67, in Carpzov, App. Crit. p. 100). It was a Jewish tradition that it had never fallen to the lot of any priest to offer incense twice (Ugolino, xiii, 18). Oriental statistics are, however, always open to some suspicion, those of the Tal- mud not being the less, and it is not among the number, the computation of Josephus, who estimates the total number of the four houses of the priesthood, referring apparently to Ezra ii, 86, at about 20,000 (c. Apion. ii, 7). Another indication of number is found in the fact that a "great multitude" of their own, and all the "sect of the Nazarenes" (Acts vi, 7), and so have cut themselves off, sooner or later, from the Temple ser-VICES, without any perceptible effect upon its ritual. It was almost inevitable that the great mass of the order, under such circumstances, should sink in character and reputation. Poor and ignorant, despised and oppressed by the more powerful members of their own body, often robbed of their scanty maintenance by the caprice of the high-priests, they must have been to Palestine what the clergy of a later period has been to Southern Italy—a dead weight on its industry and strength, not compensating for their unproductive lives by any services rendered to the higher interests of the people. The rabbinic classification of the priesthood, though belonging to a somewhat later date, reflects the contempt into which the order had fallen. There were (1) the heads of the twenty-four courses, known sometimes as apsugpeis; (2) the large number of reputable officiating but inferior priests; (3) the plebeii, or (to use the extreme formula of rabbinic scorn) the “priests of the people of the earth,” ignorant and unlettered; (4) those that, through physical disqualifications or other causes, were non-efficient members of the order, though entitled to receive their tithes (Ugolino, xii, 19; Jost: Judenk. i, 150).

Prideaux (Connexion, i, 129), following the Jewish tradition, affirms that only four of the courses returned from Babylon—Jedidiah, Immer, Pashur, and Harim (for which last, however, the Babylonian Talmud has Josephus because these were not only enumerated in Ezra ii, 36-39; Neh. vii, 39-42. He accounts for the mention of other courses, as of Joarib (1 Mac. ii, 1) and Abia (Luke i, 5), by saying that these four courses were subdivided into six each, so as to keep up the old number of twenty-four, which took the names of the original courses, though not really descended from them. But this is probably an invention of the Jews, to account for the mention of only these four families of priests in the list of Ezra ii and Neh. vii. However difficult it may be to say with certainty why only these four courses are mentioned in that particular list, we have the positive authority of 1 Chron. ix, 10, and Neh. xi, 10, for asserting that Joarib did return; and we have two other lists of courses, one of the time of Nehemiah (Neh. x, 2-8), the other of Zerubbabel (xii, 1-7); the former enumerates twenty-two, the latter twenty-two courses; and the latter naming Joarib as one of them, and adding, at ver. 19, the name of the chief of the course of Joarib in the days of Joakim. Thus there can be no reasonable doubt that Joarib did return. The notion of the Jews does not receive any confirmation from the statement in the Latin version of Josephus (c. Apion. ii, 8) that there were four courses of priests, as it is a manifest corruption of the text for twenty-four, as Whiston and others have shown (note to Life of Josephus, § 1). The preceding table gives the three lists of courses which returned, with the original list in David's time to compare them by. The courses which cannot be identified with the original ones, but which are enumerated as existing after the return, are as follows:

III. Historical Review of the Hebrew Priesthood.——1. In Patriarchal Times.—(1.) We accede to the Jewish opinion that Adam was the first priest. The divine institution of sacrifices, immediately after the fall, seems connected with the event that “the Lord God made coats of skins to Adam and his wife, and clothed them” (Gen. iii, 21)—that is, with the skins of animals which had been offered in sacrifice, for the permission to eat animal food was not given till after the Deluge (comp. i, 29; ix, 3)—expressive of their faith in the promise of the victorious yet suffering “seed of the woman” (ver. 15); and judging from the known custom of his immediate descendants, it is probable that Adam, who became the head and ruler of the woman (ver. 16), officiated in offering the sacrifice as well on her behalf as his own. Judging from the same analogy, it seems further probable that Adam acted in the same capacity on behalf of his sons, Cain and Abel (and possibly of their children), who are each said to have "brought" his respective offering, but not to have personally presented it (iv, 3-5). The place evidently thus indicated would seem to have been the situation of “the cherubim,” at the east of the garden of Eden (iii, 24), called “the face” (iv, 14), and “the presence of the Lord” (ver. 16; comp. Hebrew of Exod. xxxix, 24; Lev. i, 5), and from which Jehovah conferred with Cain (Gen. iv, 9): circumstances which, together with the name of their offering, זָכָר, which, sometimes at least, included bloody sacrifices in after-times (1 Sam. ii, 17; xxvi, 19; Mal. i, 11, 14), and the appropriation of the flesh of the offerer (comp. Lev. vii, 8), would seem like the rudiments of the future Tabernacle and its services, and when viewed in connection with many circumstances incidentally disclosed in the brief fragmentary account of things before the Exodus—such as the Sabbath (Gen. i, 2, 3), the distinction observed between his burnt-offerings upon the altar of clean and unclean beasts (viii, 20), the prohibition of blood (ix, 4), tithes (xiv, 20), priestly blessing (ver. 19), consecration with oil, and vows (xxviii, 18-22), the Levirate law (xxxviii, 8), weeks (xxix, 27), distinction of the Hebrews by their families (Exod. ii, 1), the office of elder during the bondage in Egypt (iii, 16), and a place of meeting with Jehovah (v, 22; comp. xxv, 22)—would favor the supposition that the Mosaic dispensation, as it is called, was but an authoritative re-arrangement of a patriarchal Church instituted at the fall. The fact that Noah officiated as the priest of his family, upon the cessation of the Deluge, is clearly recorded in Gen. viii, 20. Whenever we have an altar built, the ceremonial distinctions in the offerings already mentioned, and their propitiatory effect, "the sweet savor," all described in the words of Leviticus (comp. i, 9; xi, 47). These acts of Noah, which seem like the resumption rather than the institution of an ordinance, were doubtless continued by his sons and their descendants, as heads of their respective families. Following our arrangement, the next glimpse of the subject is afforded by the instance of Job, who "sent and sanctified his children" after a feast they had held, and offered burnt-offerings, "according to the number of them all," and "who did this customally," either constantly, or at every feast (i, 5).
PRIEST

A direct reference, possibly to priests, is in our translation of xii, 19, "he leadeth princes (ὤντες τῶν ἀρχιτεχνῶν); Sept. ἀρχηγοί; Vulg. sacerdotes; a sense adopted in Dr. Lee's Translation (London 1837) away spoiled." May not the difficult passage, Job xxxiii, 23, contain an allusion to priestly duties? A case is there supposed of a person divinely chastised in order to improve him (xix, 22), "If then there be a messenger (τὸν ἀναθηματισμόν), which means priest, Ezech. v, 6; Mal. ii, 6 with him," an "interpreter" (τὸν ἀναθηματισμόν), or mediator general; 2 Chron. xxxi, 9; Isa. xlii, 27, one among a thousand, or of a family, Judg. vi, 15, "my family," literally "my thousand," comp. Numb. i, 16, "to show to man his uprightness," or, rather, "duty," Prov. xiv, 2, part of the priest's office in such a case, Mal. ii, 7; comp. Deut. xxiv, 8), then such a man "in general" is "gracious," or mercy, will supplant for him, and withal, "Deliver him from going down into the pit," or grave, for "I have found a ransom," a cause or ground in him for favorable treatment, namely, the penitence of the sufferer, who consequently recovers (xxv, 29). The case of Abraham and Abimelech is very similar (Gen. xx, 9-17), as also that of Job himself, and his three misjudging friends, whom the Lord commands to avert chastisement from themselves by taking to him bullocks and rams, which he was to offer for them as a burnt-offering, and to pray for them (xli, 28), 40, 41, "sent the elders of Abram in a historical order, who, upon his first entrance into Canaan, attended by his family, "built an altar, and called upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. xii, 7, 8). Upon returning victorious from the battle of the kings, he is congratulated by Melchizedek, the Canaanitish king of Salem, and "priest of the most high God" (xix, 18). For the ancient union of the royal and sacerdotal offices, in Egypt and other countries, see Wilkinson's Monuments and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians (London 1842), i, 245. Abram next appears entering into covenant with God as the head and successor of his seed. For occasion these creatures only are slain which were appointed for sacrifice under the law (Gen. xv, 9). Isaac builds an altar, evidently as the head of his family (xxvi, 25); his younger son Jacob offers a sacrifice, τῷ ἁμαρτωλῷ (xxxi, 54), and "calls his brethren to eat of it" (comp. Lev. vii, 15); builds an altar at Shalem (Gen. xxxiii, 20), makes another, his head and evidences as the head of his household, at Bethel (xxxv, 1), and pours a drink-offering, τῷ ἁμαρτωλῷ (comp. Numb. xxv, 7, etc.), upon a pillar (ver. 14).

(2.) We next find Jethro, priest of Midian, the father-in-law of Moses, probably a priest of the true God (Exod. iii, 1), and possibly his father also (ii, 16), in the same capacity. Exod. v, 1, 4; 15, the whole nation of the Israelites represented as wishing to sacrifice and to hold a feast to the Lord. The first step, though very remote, towards the formation of the Mosaic system of priesthood was the consecration of the first-born, in memory of the destruction of the first-born of Egypt (Exod. xiii, 2), and also as the penalty of these, God afterwards took the Levites to attend upon him (Num. iii, 19). As to the popular idea, both among Jews and Christians, that the right of priesthood was thus transferred from the first-born generally to the tribe of Levi, or, rather, to one family of that tribe, we consider, with Patrick, it is utterly groundless (Commentary on Exod. xii, 22; Num. iii, 12; see Vitringa, Observations Sacrae, ii, 33; Outram, De Sacrificiis, i, 4). The substance of the objections is that Aaron and his sons were consecrated before the exchange of the Levites for the first-born; that the Levites were afterwards given to minister unto them, but had nothing to do with the priesthood; and that the peculiar right of God in the first-born originated in the Exodus. The last altar, before the giving of the law, was built by Moses, probably for a memorial purpose only (Exod. xvii, 15; comp. Jos. xxii, 26, 27). At this period the office of priest was so well understood, and so highly valued, that Jehovah promises as an inducement to the Israelites to keep his covenant, that they should be "a kingdom of priests" (Exod. xix, 6), which, among other homely and simple allusions and designations belonging to the Jews, is transferred to Christians (I Pet. ii, 9). The first introduction of the word priests, in this part of the history, is truly remarkable. It occurs just previous to the giving of the law, when, as part of the cautions against the too eager curiosity of the people, lest they should break through unto the Lord and gaze" (Exod. xix, 21), it is added, "and let the priests which come near unto the Lord sanctify themselves, lest the Lord break through upon them" (ver. 22). Here then, priests are incomprehensibly spoken of as an ancient order, which was to be abolished and remodeled. Nor is this the last reference to these antecedent priests. Selden observes that the phrase "the priests of their sons of Levi" (Deut. xvii, 9) and "the priests of the sons of Levi" (xxi, 5), and even the phrase "the Levites alone" (xxvii, 6; comp. i), are used to include all others who had been priests before God took the sons of Aaron peculiarly to serve him in this office (De Synod. ii, 8, p. 2, 8). Aaron is summoned at this juncture to go up with Moses unto the Lord on Mount Sinai (Exod. xiii, 24). Another remarkable circumstance is then recorded, when Moses, now acting as the law-giver, and ended with an extraordinary commission, builds an altar under the hill, and sends "young men of the children of Israel, who offered burnt-offerings, and sacrificed peace-offerings of oxen unto the Lord" (xxiv, 5). Various instructions are given to the phrase "the young men," but, upon a view of all the circumstances, we incline to think that they were young Levites, purposely selected by Moses for this act, in order to form a complete break between the former priesthood and the new, and that the recommencement and re-arrangement of the priesthood under Aaron and his sons, according to the preceding regulations (Lev. viii). At their first sacerdotal performances (ix) the divine approbation was intimated by a supernatural fire which consumed their burnt-offerings (ver. 24). The general satisfaction of the people with these events was, however, soon dashed.
by the miraculous destruction of the two elder sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, for offering strange fire (x, 1), probably under the influence of too much wine, since the prohibition of it to the priests when about to enter the holy place had been repeated to them at this early date (ver. 9). Moses forbade Aaron and his sons to uncover their heads, or to rend their clothes on this occasion; but the whole house of Israel were permitted to bewail the visitation (ver. 6). The inward grief, however, of Ezekiel and Isaias caused an irregularity in their sacramental duties, which was forgiven on account of the occasion (ver. 16-20). Aaron now appears associated with Moses and the leading men of the several tribes in taking the national census (Numb. i, 5, etc.), and on other grand state occasions (xxvi, 2, 3; xxxi, 18-26; xxxii, 2; xxxvii, 2; xxxix, 17). The high-priest appears ever after as a person of the highest consequence. The dignity of the priesthood soon excited the emulation of the ambitious; hence the penalty of death was denounced against the assumption of it by any one not belonging to the Aaronic family (ver. 10), and it was soon after miraculously inflicted for this crime. This instance proves that the Aaronic line did not establish itself without a struggle. The rebellion of Korah, at the head of a portion of the Levites as representatives of the first-born, with Dathan and Abiram as leaders of the second-born, and Amnon, the first-born of Joachim (Numb. xvi, 11), showed that some looked back to the old patriarchal order rather than forward to the new, and it needed the witness of "Aaron's rod that budded" to teach the people that the latter had in it a vitality and strength which had departed from the former. It may be that the exclusion of all but the sons of Aaron from the service of the Tabernacle drove those who would not resign their claim to priestly functions of some kind to the worship (possibly with a rival tabernacle) of Moloch and Chem (Amos vi, 25, 26; Ezek. xx, 16). The death of Aaron introduces a transition in his succession which appears to have simply consisted in arranging him in his father's pontifical garments (Numb. xx, 28). Thus also Jonathan the Amonite contented himself with putting on the high-priest's habit, in order to take possession of the dignity (1 Macc. xii, 21; comp. Josephus, Ant. xiii, 2, 3). The high estate in which the priesthood was held may be gathered from the fact that it was promised in perpetuity to Phinehas and his family as a reward for his zeal (Numb. xxx, 18). Prominent as was the priesthood by the priests daily march and the hosts of Israel (Numb. x, 8), in the passage of the Jordan (Josh. iii, 14, 15), in the destruction of Jericho (vii, 12-16), the history of Micah shows that within that century there was a strong tendency to relapse into the system of a household instead of an hereditary priesthood. The frequent conquests during the period of the Judges must have interfered (as stated above) with the payment of tithes, with the maintenance of worship, with the observance of all festivals, and with this the influence of the priesthood must have been kept in the background. If the descendants of Aaron, at some unrecorded crisis in the history of Israel, rose under Eli, into the position of national defenders, it was only to sink in his sons into the lowest depth of sacrificial corruption. For a time the prerogative of the line of Aaron was in abeyance. The capture of the ark, the removal of the Tabernacle from Shiloh, threw everything into confusion, and Samuel, a Levite, but not within the priestly family [see Samuel], sacrifices, and "comes near to" the Lord; his training under Eli, his Nazaritical life, his prophetic office, being regarded independently as a spiritual consecration (comp. Augustine, c. Faust. xii, 83; De Civ. Dei, xvii, 4). For the priesthood, as for the people generally, the time of Samuel must have been one of a great moral reformation; while the expansion, if not the foundation, of the schools of the prophet, at once gave to it the support and influence which had been missing under the corruption of the ark, and opposed to the idolatry and paganism of the still persevering Canaanites. The Levites did not form a tribe like that of Levi, for the consecration of a whole tribe is without a parallel in history (Vatke, Bibl. Theol. i, 222). Deuteronomy, assumed for once to be older than the three books which Precede it, represents the Levites as holding the same position as the Levites, standing on the same footing, and the distinction between them is therefore the work of a later period (George, Die älteren jud. Fest. p. 45, 51; comp. Bähr, Symbolik, bk. ii, ch. ii, § 1, whence these references are taken). It is hardly necessary here to do more than state these theories.

(2.) Middle Period.—The position of the priests under the monarchy of Judah deserves a closer examination than it has yet received. The system which has been described above gave them for every week of service in the Temple twenty-three weeks in which they had no ministerial duties. It is intended that they should be idle during this period? Were they actually idle? They had no territorial possessions to cultivate. The cities assigned to them and to the Levites gave scanty pasturage to their flocks. To what employment could they turn? 1. The more devout and thoughtful found, probably, in the schools of the prophets that which satisfied them. The history of the Jews presents numerous instances of the union of the two offices. See LEVITE. They became teaching-priests (2 Chron. xv, 3), students, and interpreters of the divine law. From numerical data, it may be supposed that the more zealous kings to instruct the people (xxvii, 8), or to administer justice (xxxix, 8). 2. Some, perhaps, as stated above, served in the king's army. We have no ground for transferring our modern conceptions of the peacefulness of the priestly life to the remote past of the Jewish people. Priests, as we have seen, were with David at Hebron as men of war. They were the trumpeters of Abijah's army (xiii, 12). The Temple itself was a great armory (xxxi, 9). The heroic struggles of the Maccabees were sustained chiefly by their kindred of the same family (vii, 1). A few chosen ones might enter more deeply into the divine life, and so receive, like Zechariah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, a special call to the office of a prophet. We can hardly escape the conclusion that many did their work in the Temple of Jehovah with a divided allegiance, and acted at other times as priests of the high-places (Ewald, Gesch. iii, 704).

Not only do we read of no protests against the sins of the idolatrous kings, except from prophets who stood forth, alone and unsupported, to bear their witness, but the priests themselves were sharers in the worship of Baal (Jer. ii, 7, of the house of Omri (viii, 1, 2). In the very Temple itself they "ministered before their idols" (Ezek. xiv, 12), and allowed others, "uncircumcised in heart and uncircumcised in flesh," to join them (ibid. 7). They ate of unclean things and polluted the Sabaths. There could be no division of the true idea of the priesthood than a general degradation. Those who ceased to be true shepherds of the people found nothing in their ritual to sustain or elevate them. They became as sensual, covetous, and tyrannical as ever the clergy of the Christian Church became in its darkest periods; conspicuous as drunkards and adulterers (Isa. xxxvii, 7, 8; lv, 10-12). The prophetic order, instead of acting as a check, became sharers in their corruption (Jer. v, 31; Lam. iv, 13; Zeph. iii, 4). For the most part, the few efforts after better things are not the result of a spontaneous reformation, but of conformity to the wishes of a reforming king. In the one instance in which they do act spontaneously—their resistance to the usurpation of the priest's functions by Zedek—their protest, however right in itself, was yet only the compensation for a wrong at the hands of the office which they claimed as belonging exclusively to themselves (2 Chron. xxvi, 17). The discipline of the Captivity, however, was not without its fruits. A large proportion of the priests had either perished or were content to remain in the land of their exile; but those who remained were in the utmost need of restoration. Under Ezra they submitted to the stern duty of repuditating their heathen wives (Ezra x, 18, 19). They took part—though here the Levites were the more prominent—in the instruction of the people (iii, 2; Neh. x, 31). In the work of revising the Scriptures the Levites, standing on the same footing, and the distinction between them is therefore the work of a later period (George, Die älteren jud. Fest. p. 45, 51; comp. Bähr, Symbolik, bk. ii, ch. ii, § 1, whence these references are taken). It is hardly necessary here to do more than state these theories.

The priests of the time of Malachi required payment for every ministerial act, and would not even "shut the doors" or "kindle fire" for naught (Mal. i, 10). They "corrupted the covenant of Levi" (ii, 8). The idea of the priest as the angel, the messenger, of the Lord of Hosts was forgotten (ibid. 7; comp. Eccles. v, 6). The inevitable result was that they again lost their influence. They became "base and contemptible before all the people" (Mal. ii, 9). The office of the priest was recognized as a sacred duty, but it was not the priest but the Levite of the Lord of Hosts was forgotten (ibid. 7; comp. Eccles. v, 6). The inevitable result was that they again lost their influence. They became "base and contemptible before all the people" (Mal. ii, 9). The office of the priest was recognized as a sacred duty, but it was not the priest but the Levite (Exod. vi, 8; 9, 7; vii, 24; Josephus, Ant. xii, 8). The degree to which this recognition was carried was expressed in the immediate successors of Alexander was shown by the work of restoration accomplished by Simon the son of Onias (Eccles. 1, 12-20); and the position which they thus occupied in the eyes of the people, not less than the devotion with which he zeal inspired them, prepared them to make the great struggle which was coming, and in which, under the priestly Maccabees, they were the chief defenders of their country's freedom. Some, indeed, at that crisis were among the apostates. Under the guidance of Jason (the heathenized form of Joshua) they forsook the customs of their fathers, and they who as priests were to be patterns of a self-respecting purity left their work in the Temple to run naked in the circus which the Syrian king had opened in Jerusalem (2 Macc. iv, 13, 14). Some, at an earlier period, had joined the schismatic Onias in establishing a rival worship (Josephus, Ant. xii, 3, 4). The majority, however, were true-hearted; and the Maccabean struggle which left the government of the country in the hands of the high priests, and at once the conquest, with a certain measure of independence, must have given to the higher members of the order a position of security and influence. The martyr-spirit showed itself again in the calmness with which they carried on the ministries in the Temple, when Jerusalem was besieged. They were rescued from the temple by the ruse of sacrificing (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 4, 8; War, i, 7, 5). The reign of Herod, on the other hand, in which the high-priesthood was kept in abeyance, or transferred from one to another at the will of one who was an alien by birth and half a heathen in character, must have tended to depress them.

(3.) Closing Period.—It will be interesting to bring together the few facts that indicate the position of the priests in the New-Test. period of their history. The division into four-and-twenty courses is still maintained (Luke i, 5; Josephus, Life, 1), and the heads of these courses, together with those who have held the high-priesthood (the office no longer lasting for life), are "chief priests" (ἀρχιερεῖς) by courtesy (Carpov. App. Crit. p. 102), and take their place in the Sanhedrin. The number assigned to each of the courses is very small. Of these the greater number were poor and ignorant, despised by the more powerful members of their own order, not gaining the respect or affection of the people. The picture of cowardly selliness in the priest of the parable of Luke x, 31 can hardly be thought of as representative in the order, indicating the estimate commonly and truly formed of the character of the class. The priestly order, like the nation, was divided between contending sects. The influence of Hyrcanus, himself in the latter part of his life a Sadducee (Josephus, Ant. xii. 310, 8), had probably made the tenets of that party popular among the wealthier and better educated classes, and had led the Pharisees of the first Gospels and the Acts, the whole ἀρχιερεύοντα γίγνο (Acts iv. 1, 6; v. 17), were apparently consistent Sadducees, sometimes combining with the Pharisees in the Sanhedrin, sometimes thwarted by them, in persecuting the followers of Jesus because they preached the resurrection of the dead. The great multitude (δι' ὁλοκτονίας) on the other hand, who received that testimony (vi. 7) must have been free from or must have overcome Sadducean prejudices. It was not strange that those who did not receive the testimony which would have raised them to a higher life should sink lower and lower into an ignorant and ferocious fanaticism. Few stranger contrasts meet us in the history of religion than that presented in the life of the priesthood in the last half-century of the Temple—now going through the solemn sacrificial rites and joining in the noblest hymns, now raising a fierce clamor at anything which seemed to them a profanation of the sanctuary, and rushing to dash out the brains of the bold or incautious intruder, or of one of their own order who might enter while uncalled. This change is due to a half-terrifying, half-in-teresting setting fire to the clothes of the Levites who were found sleeping when they ought to have been watching at their posts (Lightfoot, Temple Service, ch. i.). The rivalry which led the Levites to claim privileges which had hitherto belonged to the priests has already been noticed. See Lev. vi. In the scenes of the last tragedy of Jewish history the order passes away, without out, "dying as a fool dieth." The high-priesthood is given to the lowest and vilest of the adherents of the frenzied Zealots (Josephus, War, iv. 8, 6). Other priesthoods are all confounded. It is from a priest that Titus receives the lamps, and gems, and costly raiment of the sanctuary (ibid. vi. 8, 3). Priests report to their conquerors the terrible utterance "Let us depart" on the last Pentecost ever celebrated in the Temple (ibid. vi. 5, 5). It is a priest who fills up the degradation of his order by dwelling on the fall of his country with a cold-blooded satisfaction, and finding in Titus the fulfillment of the Messianic prophecies of the Old Test. (ibid. vi. 5, 4). The destruction of Jerusalem deprived the order at one blow of all but an honorific surname. The Levitical families must have altogether lost their genealogies. Those who still prided themselves on their descent were no longer safe against the claims of pretenders. The jealousies of the lettered class, which had been kept up under the restrictions as long as the temple stood, now fell full play, and the influence of the rabbins increased with the fall of the priesthood. The position of the priest in mediaval and modern Judaism has never risen above that of complimentary recognition. Those who claim to take their place among the sons of Aaron are entitled to receive that portion of the money of the first-born, to take the law from its chest, and to pronounce the benediction in the synagogues (Ugolino, xii. 48).

IV. Relation of the Jewish Priesthood to the Christian Ministry.—The language of the New-Test. writers in relation to the priesthood ought not to be passed over. They recognise in Christ the first-born, the king, the Anointed, the representative of the true primeval priesthood after the order of Melchizedek (Heb. vii., viii), from which that of Aaron, however necessary for the time, is now seen to have been a deception. But there is also a connection with the new Christian society, bearing the name and exercising functions like those of the priests of the older Covenant. The synagogue, and not the Temple, furnishes the pattern for the organization of the Church. The idea which pervades the teaching of the Epistles is that of the universal priesthood. All true believers are made kings and priests (Rev. i. 6; 1 Pet. ii. 9), offer spiritual sacrifices (Rom. xii. 1), may draw near, may enter into the holiest (Heb. x. 19-22), as having received a true priestly consecration. They, too, have been washed and sprinkled as the sons of Aaron were (x. 22). It was the thought of the apostles that a succeeding generation of old and cloddered to the world should be succeeded by others clad in the Priest, priest, and Levites was reproduced in the bishops, priests, and deacons of the Christian Church. The history of language presents few stranger facts than those connected with these words. Priest, our only equivalent for ἱερέας, comes to us from the word which was chosen because it excluded the idea of a sacerdotal character. Bishop has narrowly escaped a like perversion, occurring as it does constantly in Wiclif's version as the translation of ἀρχιερεύοντας (e.g. John xviii. 15; Heb. vii. 1). The hat which was thus expressed, it is true, on Priester, on the broad analogy of a threefold gradation, and the terms "priest," "altar," "sacrifice," might be used without involving more than a legitimate symbolism; but they brought with them the inevitable danger of reproducing and perpetuating in the history of the Christian Church many of the feelings which belonged to Judaism, and ought to have been left behind with it. If the evil has not proved so fatal to the life of Christendom as it might have done, it is because no bishop or pope, however much he might exaggerate his character as a law-giver and as the one desired of making the Christian priesthood hereditary. We have probably reason to be thankful that two errors tend to neutralize each other, and that the age which witnessed the most extravagant sacerdotism was one in which the celibacy of the clergy was first exalted, then urged, and at last enforced.

V. Literature.—For the similarity in the religion of ancient Greece, see Potter, Archaeologia (Lond. 1775), i. 202; of ancient Rome, Adam, Antiquités (Edinb. 1791), p. 298, § Ministri Sacrorum. For the resemblances between the two religions, see id. vi. 8. It is from a priest that Titus receives the lamps, and gems, and costly raiment of the sanctuary (ibid. vi. 8, 3). Priests report to their conquerors the terrible utterance "Let us depart" on the last Pentecost ever celebrated in the Temple (ibid. vi. 5, 5). It is a priest who fills up the degradation of his order by dwelling on the fall of his country with a cold-blooded satisfaction, and finding in Titus the fulfillment of the Messianic prophecies of the Old Test. (ibid. vi. 5, 4). The destruction of Jerusalem deprived the order at one blow of all but an honorific surname. The Levitical families must have altogether lost their genealogies. Those who still prided themselves on their descent were no longer safe against the claims of pretenders. The jealousies of the lettered class, which had been kept up under the restrictions as long as the temple stood, now fell full play, and the influence of the rabbins increased with the fall of the priesthood. The position of the priest in mediaval and modern Judaism has never risen above that of complimentary recognition. Those who claim to take their place among the sons of Aaron are entitled to receive that portion of the money of the first-born, to take the law from its chest, and to pronounce the benediction in the synagogues (Ugolino, xii. 48).

At last the Christian Church was to be established, and the functions of the priest seem to have commonly been discharged by the head of each family; but, on the expansion of the family into the state, the office of priest became a public one, which absorbed the duties as well as the name of the private priest of the Jewish community, and hence the change in the separate families or communities. It thus came to pass that in many instances the priestly office was associated with that of the sovereign, whatever might be the particular form of sovereignty. But in many religious and political bodies, also, the orders were maintained in complete independence, and the priests formed a distinct, and, generally speaking, a privileged class. See EGYPT; HINDUISM. The priestly order, in most of the ancient religions, included a graduated hierarchy; and to the head of whatever order was the title, were assigned the most solemn of the religious offices intrusted to the body. Compare the preceding article.

In the Christian Church the word has been used in place of the two Greek words (1) μέντοιος, which really signifies an elder, and (2) ἰπτσίς, which corresponds to the Latin sacerdos, i. e. one who offers sacrifice—words which are exceedingly dissimilar in meaning, but, used in this indiscriminate manner, convey a false idea as to the respective offices of priest and preacher. The Christian preacher or minister answers rather to the ancient prophet than to the Old-Testament priest. As ἰπτσίς means one who offers sacrifices, and as sacrifices have been abolished since the offering of the one perfect and all-sufficient Sacrifice, it follows that, in the strict and official sense, there are no "sacrificers" under the New-Testament or Christian dispensation. If, therefore, the claims of the ministers of the Church are made to rest upon a precise analogy to those founded upon the priestly functions of an abrogated dispensation, it surely becomes the advocates of such claims to prove from the Christian Institute that the conceived analogy exists there. There is not a single passage in "the book" of apostles and evangelists to support the assumption. Nowhere are the ministers of the Gospel represented as "sacrificers;" nowhere is provision made for such a succession, as in any respect similar to the Levitical, and still less the Aaronical priesthood. To the prophets, and rulers of the synagogue it is admitted that there are allusions descriptive of ministerial duties; for the work of instruction was the appropriate business of these ecclesiastical functionaries, and not performing the services of a prescribed ritual. But ecclesiastical dignities are nowhere ascribed to Christian presbyters.

The priesthood, as a religious order, perished with Judaism. The priesthood was the shadow, and disappeared when the substance came. As a mediator, Jesus Christ is the only priest; as a servant of God, whose duty it is to consecrate his full time and energies and thoughts to the divine service, every Christian is a "priest unto God." The New Testament, therefore, contains no hint of any priest, nor of any officer answering to a priest, in the early Church; and, on the contrary, contains frequent passages which more or less directly and distinctly that the priesthood of the class is merged in the priestly character of Jesus Christ and that of the whole discipleship (comp. Heb. ii, 17; iii, 1; iv, 14; v, 5-10; vii, 27, 28; x, 11, 12; Rev. v, 10). It is very clear that the apostles, when they so plainly asserted the abolition of sacrifices since the offering of the one perfect and all-sufficient Sacrifice, could never intend to institute such an order as a sacrificing priest. When they use the term, they apply it to Christ alone. The office of a Christian pastor is not to ordain, but to preach the atonement. In Rom. xvi, 16 the application of the term by the apostle Paul is figurative. The modern minister answers rather to the ancient prophet than to the ancient priest. At least this is the universal opinion of nearly all Protestant Christendom, though some relics of the old priestly idea of a special priestly order, with peculiar privileges and prerogatives, and possessing peculiar holiness, still linger in the Church.

The advocates of hierarchical claims, whether Romish, Greek, or Protestant Christians, assume that ministers are entitled to be regarded as succeeding to the same relations in the Church with that which was sustained by the priesthood under the Jewish economy. Hence the terms and offices peculiar to the ancient priests are conceived to be analogous to the functions and designations of the Christian ministry. On this assumption, it is contended that the duties performed and the authority exercised under the direct sanction of the Most High are now transferred to those who are duly qualified, by a certain order of succession, to discharge the offices of the ministry under the present dispensation. In the grades of the hierarchy the priestly order is second in order only to that of bishop. Bishops and priests possess the same priestly authority, but the bishop has the power of transmitting it to others, which an ordinary priest cannot do. The priest is regarded as the ordinary minister of the Eucharist, whether as a sacrament or as a sacrifice; of baptism, penance, and extreme unction; and although the contracting parties are held in the modern schools to be themselves the ministers of marriage, the priest is regarded by all schools of Roman divines as at least the normal and official witness of its celebration. The priest is also officially charged with the instruction of the people and the direction of their spiritual concerns, and, by long-established use, special districts, called parishes (q. v.), are assigned to priests, within which they are intrusted with the care and supervision of the spiritual wants of all the inhabitants. The holy order of priesthood can only be conferred by a bishop, and he is ordinarily assisted by two or more priests, who, in common with the bishop, impose hands on the candidate. The rest of the ceremonial of ordination consists in investing the candidate with the sacred instruments and ornaments of his order, anointing his hands, and reciting certain prayers significant of the gifts and the duties of the office. Deus defines the priesthood as "a sacred order and sacrament, in which power is conferred of consecrating the body of Christ, of remitting sins, and of administering certain other sacraments." Accordingly, at the consecration of a priest, after unction and prayer, the chalice, with wine and water, and the patten upon it with the host, are given to him, with these awful words, "Receive power to offer the sacrifice of God, and to celebrate mass for the living and the dead." Moreover, he receives formally the power to forgive sins. The distinguishing vestment of the priest is the chasuble (Lat. planeta). In Roman Catholic countries, priests wear even in public a distinctive dress.
Prayer-book to designate the clerical office. Says Flyder: "The Greek and Latin words which we translate 'priest' are derived from words that signify holy; and so the title of the officiant signifies him whose mere charge and function are about holy things, and therefore seems to be a most proper word to him who is set apart to the holy public service and worship of God, especially when he is in the actual ministation of holy things. If it be objected that, according to the usual acceptation of the word, it signifies him that offers up a sacrifice, and therefore cannot be allowed to a minister of the Gospel, who hath no sacrifice to offer, it is answered that the ministers of the Gospel have sacrifices to offer (1 Pet. ii, 5): 'Ye are built up into a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices of prayer, praises, thanksgiving,' etc. In respect of these, the ministers of the Gospel may safely, in a metaphorical sense, be called priests; and in a more eminent manner than other Christians, because they are taken from among men to offer up these sacrifices for others. But besides these spiritual sacrifices mentioned, the ministers of the Gospel have another sacrifice to offer, viz. the unbloody sacrifice, as it was anciently called, the commemorative sacrifice of the blood of Christ, which does as really and truly show the interest of the Church in those sacrifices under the law did; and in respect of this sacrifice of the Eucharist, the ancients have usually called those that offer it up 'priests.'" Priestley, Joseph, LL.D., one of the most noted of the English divines of the 18th century, and a scientist of great celebrity, was born of humble but honorable parentage at Fieldhead, March 13, 1733, old style. His mother dying when he was six years of age, he was adopted by a paternal aunt, Mrs. Keighley, by whom he was sent to a free grammar-school in the neighborhood, where he was taught the Latin language and the elements of science; he was vacated and devoted to the study of Hebrew under a dissenting minister; and when he had acquired some proficiency in this language he commenced and made considerable progress in the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic. Ill-health, however, led him to forsake his classical studies and devote himself to mercantile pursuits. Though obliged to leave school, he yet continued his studies. Without the aid of a master, he acquired some knowledge of French, Italian, and German. At the age of nineteen (1752) he resumed work as a theological student in the dissenting academy at Darwen. His parents, who were both of the Calvinistic persuasion, as well as his aunt, had omitted no opportunity of inculcating the importance of the Calvinistic doctrine. At the academy he found both the professors and students greatly agitated upon most theological questions which were deemed of much importance, such as liberty and necessity, the sleep of the soul, etc., and kindred articles of orthodoxy and heresy. These were the topics of animated and frequent discussions. The spirit of controversy thus excited was in some measure fostered by the plan for regulating their studies by the Doctrine and Catechism. Certain works on both sides of every question which the students were required to peruse and form an abridgment of for their future use. Before the lapse of many months Priestley conceived himself called upon to re-examine the underlying principles of philosophical and metaphysical opinions which he had imbibed in early youth, and thus, he himself observes, "I came to embrace what is generally called the heterodox side of the question; . . . but notwithstanding the great freedom of our debates, the extreme of heresy among us was Aruanism, and no such rascals as we are, excepting those who are less, or less qualified, of the doctrine of the Atonement." His waywardness did not interfere with his graduation, and in 1756 he became assistant minister to an Independent congregation at Needham-Market, in Suffolk. Here he made himself unpopular by renouncing the doctrine of the Atonement, and in three years left, in rather bad repute because of his heresy. He found a temporary engagement at Nantwich, in Cheshire, but was again unpopular, and next engaged in teaching with some success, and was finally chosen professor of belles-lettres in Warrington Academy. During the ten years following he produced half a dozen thoughtful works on widely varying subjects—which works of themselves would have given him enduring fame. He busied himself in politics, too, and became known as a vigorous lecturer. He was still poor, but by dint of strict economy he had secured an air-pump and a machine, and had already begun his scientific researches.

While at Needham he composed his work entitled The Scripture Doctrine of Remission, which shows that the Death of Christ is no proper Sacrifice nor Satisfaction for Sin without the removal of a Righteous Account of a Personal Repentance of the Sinner. It was published in 1761. He seems to have rejected all theological dogmas which appeared to him to rest solely upon the interpretation put upon certain passages of the Bible by ecclesiastical authority. It does not, however, appear that these doctrinal errors produced any preventable evil results. A visit to the metropolis was the occasion of his introduction to our own celebrated countryman, Dr. Franklin, Dr. Price, and others. To the first of these he communicated his idea of writing a historical and critical work on the discoveries of electricity, and the requisite books. These Dr. Franklin undertook to procure, and before the end of the year in which Priestley submitted to him the plan of the work he sent him a copy of it in print, though five hours of every day had been occupied in public or private teaching, besides which he had kept up an active philosophical correspondence. The title of this work is The History and Present State of Electricity, with Original Experiments (1767; 2d ed. 1775). By his devotion to learning and his persistent scrutiny of nature, Priestley now unraveled the mysteries of the elided mysteries. He was now in the prime of his career and making the most valuable discovery in science of the last century; but as he drew nearer natural truth, he became more and more, though perhaps unconsciously, estranged from revealed truth, and by a hot temper and hasty utterance, he made manifest the conflict between the trustees and professors of the academy led to his relinquishing the appointment at Warrington in 1767. His next engagement was with a large congregation at Mill-Hill Chapel, Leeds, where his theological inquiries were resumed, and several works of the kind were composed, chiefly to counteract the character. The vicinity of his dwelling to a public brewery was the occasion of his attention being directed to pneumatic chemistry, the consideration of which he commenced in 1768, and subsequently prosecuted with great success. His first publication on this subject was a pamphlet on Improving Water with Fixed Air (1772); the same year he communicated to the Royal Society his Observations on Different Kinds of Air, to which the Copley medal was awarded in 1778. He originated other modes of investigation now pursued, and, indeed, nearly all that is known of the subject is due to the discoveries he made. He discovered oxygen gas, nitrous gas, nitrous oxide gas, nitrous vapor, carbonic oxide gas, sulphurous oxide gas, fluoric-acid gas, muriatic gas, and ammoniacal gas. The discovery of oxygen alone rivaled the most important discovery in science by invention by Newton in the preceding century. The pneumatic trough, a vessel by means of which chemists col-ject gas, was also in good part invented by Priestley. He experimented untroublingly, and gave to the world a detailed account of almost every observation he made. For a time he was the idol of men of science. All Europe did him honor. At the height of his reputation he became companion to the earl of Shelburne, with whom he travelled extensively on the Continent. He remained with the earl for only a short time, but he was, in 1789, receiving a pension, he settled in Birmingham, where he proceeded actively with his philosophic and theological researches, and was also appointed pastor to a dissenting congregation. Having been told by certain Persian savans that he was the only man they had ever met who could read their language, and who had not believed in Christianity, he wrote, in reply, the Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever (1786), and various other works containing criticisms on the doctrines of Hume and others.

His public position was now rather a hard one; for while laughed at in Paris as a believer, at home he was thrown away as a scaband, and was very easy about the consequences." While it was a source of wonder to the savans of the Continent that such a man could believe in a God at all, his want of belief shocked the better class of his countrymen, who, although at the time sadly lax in morals, were scrupulous in their adherence to orthodoxy. But he did not confine himself to dealing with churchmen: his object was to obtain for the dissenters what he considered to be their rights, and in the pursuit of which he published about twenty volumes. He attacked certain positions relating to the dissenters in Blackstone's Commentaries with a vigor and acumen which seems to have surprised his adversary. At the same time he was avowedly partial to the French Revolution, and as he was a man of strong speech and stinging pen, he soon excited the hatred of the High-Church and Tory party. The agitation of the populace had already found vent in riots, and in the month of July Dr. Priestley's house, library, manuscripts, and costly apparatus were committed to the flames by an angry mob. His papers, torn in scraps, carpeted the roads around his desolated home, and he was exposed to great personal danger. He moved Birmingham for safety, where he became the successor of his deceased friend Dr. Price (q. v.), and so far as money could restore what he had lost, it was liberally given. But his sentiments were unchanged, and he was none the less outspoken because of the tempest of which, in 1791, receiving a pension, he settled in Birmingham, where he proceeded actively with his philosophic and theological researches, and was also appointed pastor to a dissenting congregation. Having been told by certain Persian savans that he was the only man they had ever met who could read their language, and who had not believed in Christianity, he wrote, in reply, the Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever (1786), and various other works containing criticisms on the doctrines of Hume and others.

The agitation of the populace had already found vent in riots, and in the month of July Dr. Priestley's house, library, manuscripts, and costly apparatus were committed to the flames by an angry moral as correct without austerity and exemplary without ostentation. These estimates are certainly diverse, but possibly they are equally near the truth. Priestley was much more of an experimentalist than a philosopher. In religion as well as in science he sought not for the one thing only, or caprice, as his caprice was as noticeable as his positiveness, and his logical inconsistencies were gross. A queer instance of this is found in his adherence to the theory of "philogeny"—the supposed principle of inflammability, or the matter of the fire in composition with other bodies—the absurdity of which was shown by his own discovery of oxygen. In theology, as we have seen, while maintaining the immortality of the soul, he denied its immateriality. He was never widely trusted as a religious leader; although, because of his ability and unimpeachable morality, and his eminence in science, his pulpit services were eagerly sought. His fame rests principally on his pneumatic inquiries. But he was encyclopedic in the range of his writings, which tend to extend to seventy and eighty volumes. Among them are works on general and ecclesiastical history and biography, on language, on oratory and criticism, on religion and metaphysics. Although many of his opinions were fanciful and manifestly erroneous, there was hardly a subject touched by his pen that was not the brighter and shapelier because of his genius. It is not now, however, that first and last remains that the mistakes are best fitted for prosecuting the labors of experimental philosophy are by no means those from which we expect light to be cast into the more obscure region of metaphysical analysis. "Priestley's mind was objective to an extreme; he could fix his faith upon nothing which had not the evidence of sense in some way or other impressed upon it. Science, morals, politics, philosophy, religion, all came to him under the type of the sensational. The most spiritual ideas were obliged to be cast into a material mould before they could command the judgment or consent. (His intellect) was rapid to an extraordinary degree; he saw the bearings of a question according to its principles at a glance, and embodied his thoughts in volumes, while many other men would hardly have sketched out their plan. All this, though admirable in the man of action, was not the temperament to form the solid metaphysician; nay, it was precisely opposed to that deep, reflective habit, that sinking into one's own inmost consciousness, from which alone speculative philosophy can obtain light and advancement."

As a man of science, he has left his mark upon the intellectual history of the world, in so far as he was a being of a man, science, he aimed at being a metaphysician, a theologian, a politician, a classical scholar, and a historian. With an amazing intrepidity he plunged into tasks the effective performance of which would have demanded the labors of a lifetime. With the charge of thirty youths on his hands, he proposes to write an ecclesiastical history, and soon afterwards observes that a fresh translation of the Old Testament would "not be a very formidable task" (Rutt, Life, i, 42). He carried on all manner of controversies upon their own ground with Horsley and Badcock, with his friend Price, with Beattie and the Scotch philosophers, with Gibbon and the sceptics, and yet often labored for hours a day at his chemical experiments. So discursive a thinker could hardly do much thorough work, nor really work out or co-ordinate his own opinions. It would be in vain, therefore, to anticipate any great force or originality in Priestley's speculations. At best he was a quick reflector of the current opinions of his time and class, and able to run up hasty theories of sufficient apparent strength to keep his party in support of some temporary reaction or midst the storms of conflicting elements. With such tendencies of mind, therefore, and living in an age the whole bearing of which was away from the ideal to the sensational, it is not surprising that Priestley entered with energy into those principles of Hartley from which he hoped to reduce all mental science to a branch of physical investigation.

VIII.-19*
Christianity has been corrupted. Priestley includes among the corruptions the Trinitarian doctrines, which, as he argues, showed themselves, though in a comparatively undeveloped state, among the earliest of the apostolic writers. He concludes the attack upon the authority of the Church fathers, as begun by Daille, and which had then been recently carried on by Midleton and Jortin. He makes Christ a mere man, and places the writers of the New Testament on the same level with Thucydides and Tacitus, while he still believes in the miracles, and quotes texts after the old unhistorical fashion. He is compelled, moreover, to accept the Protestant theory that there was in the earliest ages a body of absolutely sound doctrine, though, in the effort to identify this with Unitarianism, he is driven to great straits, and forced to discover it in obscure sects, and to make inferences from the negative argument of silence rather than from positive assertions. Though he makes free with the reasoning of the apostles, he cannot give up their authority; and, accepting without question the authenticity of the Gospels, labors to interpret them in the Unitarian sense. He did not see that the real difficulty is the admission of supernatural agency, and that to call a miracle a very little one is only to encounter the whole weight of rationalistic and of orthodox hostility. Priestley explains in his work to which he refers, "what circumstances in the state of things" (notice this alphabod style), "and especially of other prevailing opinions and prejudices," favored the introduction of new doctrines. He hopes that this "historical method will be found to be one of the most satisfactory modes of argumentation." (Corruptions, vol. i, Preface, p. xiv.)

Priestley asserts that corruptions appeared, but in practice seems to attribute them to perverse chances rather than to the influence of contemporary opinion, which he professes to trace. Thus in discussing theories of grace, he says, "It is not easy to imagine a priori what could have led men into such a train of thinking" (Ibid. i, 284), as is exhibited in the speculations about grace, free will, and predestination. After some vague handling of the problem, he remembers that the "principal parts of the system were first suggested in the heat of controversy" (Ibid. p. 285)—an explanation which seems to him to throw some light upon the question. Obviously, a writer thus incompetent to appreciate the bearings of the most vital doctrines of Christianity was not a very competent historian of thought. Priestley, however, professed to be influenced by the work of men who were most palatable to his mind. That Platonism had played a great part in the development of Christian dogma. The Platonists, he tells us, "pretended to be no more than the expositors of a more ancient doctrine;" which he traces through Pythagoras, the Cynics, Orpheus, to the secret places of the Egyptian priests. Another stream of tradition had reached the Romans from their Trojan ancestors, who had received it from Phrygia, where it had been planted by Dardanus as early as the 9th century after Noah's flood. Dardanus brought it from Samothrace, where the Three Mansions were worshiped under the name of the Cabirim. Thus the Platonic Trinity, and the Roman Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, were shown to be simply faint reflections of an early revelation communicated to the patriarchs before the days of Moses (Horsley, Tracts, p. 43-45). Priestley, Thomas, an English divine of the Independent body, flourished near the close of the last century. He was the brother of Joseph Priestley, but their theological tenets differed widely. Thomas was the editor of the Christian Magazine, and published, Evangelical Bible, or Paraphrase, Exposition, and Commentary, with copies Notes and suitable Reflections (1791, fol.); Also—Mr. Scott's Life and Death (1791, 8vo)—a Funeral Sermon (1791, 8vo)—Family Exercises (1792, 8vo; 1793, 8vo).

Priests, Marriage of. The obligation of perpetual virginity imposed by the Church of Rome upon those who receive higher orders has been spoken of in another article. See Celibacy. In the ancient Church married men (but no bigamists) were sometimes received into priesthood, without dissolution of their matrimony; but it was never allowed to one who had received higher orders to marry. If such a case occurred, the service of the Church had to be renounced. In the West we find, in the middle of the 19th century, that the ordination of married men was not prohibited. The Council of Trent (sess. xxiv, can. 9) repeated the same declaration, in its view the marriage of the clergy (can. 4, l. c.), punts the orders again into the number of the dissolving impediments to a marriage. The same council decreed, further, that sons of clergymen cannot discharge a clerical function in a place where their father is or was in office (see. xxi, cap. 15, De ref.). The Greek Church imposes celibacy on the higher dignitaries—the bishops—but not on the priests and lower functionaries of the Church. The latter cannot, it is true, marry after receiving the orders, but are allowed to continue in the matrimonial relations contracted before ordination. In many countries this is still the case. The Russian Church, however, refuses ordination to her priests as long as they are unmarried, i.e. ordains only married men. If the priest becomes a widower, he retires to monastic life. In the Greek Oriental Church there are a few exceptions in the persons of the death of their wives, unless they prefer to marry again. In Greece married priests are distinguished from the unmarried ones by their head-gear: the former wear very low round hats. See Les, Sacerdotis Celibatis (Index, under Marriage).

Priests' Rooms. The chaplains in Great Britain have always kept chambers over porches or sacristies, as at St. Paul's, Cornhill, East Oxford; in London, over the vault of the church, as at Cashel, Millhollin, Holy Cross, and Kilkenney; in Scotland, at Inns, over the ailes.

PRIMACY

yri Alexander et Methodii Lycii (ibid. 1766, 8vo.)—

PRIMACY is the office held (1) by him who is the pope of Rome, and therefore highest in the Christian Church, and (2) by him who is next in rank to the patriarch (q.v.). See PRIMACY.

The primacy of Peter, as the pope's office is sometimes styled, Romanists claim to be of divine appointment. They assert that the apostle Peter, by Christ's authority, had a primacy of sovereign authority and jurisdiction over the other apostles. Since the Godman Jesus the Christ, they say, has himself willed the continuance of the Church and her fundamental unity, Peter and his successors were also established by the will of God. The power to bind and to loose [see KEYS, Power of the] was given to the apostles in a body (Matt. xviii, 8); but, in order to preserve their power and unity, Peter was put at their head and endowed with higher honors (Matt. xvi, 16-18; xvii, 4, etc.). He became the primus inter pares, not so much for his own sake as for a precedent; "for it would be unreasonable," says Sauter, "to consider the primacy be held to have died with him, in view of the end for which Christ had appointed him to it. It appears, on the contrary, that Christ instituted the primacy more in view of the necessities and requirements of the apostolic times, when the personal purity of each of the apostles rendered such a measure less necessary" (Fundamenta juris ecclesiastici Catholicorum [3d ed. Rotwille, 1825], § 62; see also Zeitschrift für Phil. und kath. Theologie [Cologne, 1852], iv, 121, 122).

By the example of Peter, Christ showed, in a general way, that some one of the bishops was always to be considered as primate by the others; but, add those who put a literal interpretation on the Romish assertion of supremacy, it is by no means clear from the writings of the Church that the primacy is attached to a particular see or bishop. Circumstances favored Rome, whose bishop was acknowledged by the other bishops as the successor of Peter (in the primacy). The bishops of Rome cannot have the primacy by divine appointment, but in a mediante manner, so that, when the good of the Church demands it, it can be transferred to another of the bishops (Sauter, § 68, 64). But the Ultramontanes maintain that by the same authority by which Peter was set apart for the supremacy his own successors were also established. Peter, it is true, founded the Romish Churches and provided them with bishops, yet no other can be considered as his true successor than he who succeeded him after his death, and this is the bishop of Rome. The Roman bishop had, by his Roman episcopal dignity, a right similar to that in virtue of which the next relation succeeds in worldly principalities, and the Ultramontanes assert that Peter himself chose for his successor, in all his dignities, the same Linus mentioned by Paul in his Second Epistle to Timothy, iv, 21 (Phillips, Kirchenrecht, i, 146). This system of ideas, so simple in appearance, has only by degrees developed the practical and obtained dogmatic sanction in the Latin Church. It is based on facts which have been variously appreciated, and on decisions which have by no means received the same interpretation at all hands. The whole deduction is founded on arbitrary declarations, in as much as the bishops were, and are still, party and judges in the same cause; they, whose title is in question, claim the exclusive right of explaining words and facts, and consider any one who doubts their assertions as being disobedient to Christ and to God. Impartial thinkers of the Roman Church have long been aware that before the middle of the 3d century there was no primacy perceptible in the Church (see Möhler, Die Einheit der Kirche, oder das Prinzip des Katholicismus, dargestellt im Geiste der Kirchenverfassung der dreif Jahrhunderte [2d ed. Tübingen, 1843]); while others, by arbitrary arrangement of historical facts, arrive at the conclusion "that the Roman bishops not only claimed the highest authority in all ecclesiastical matters since the first centuries of Christianity, but that these pretensions, founded on Christ's declarations, were acknowledged by the successors of the apostles" (see Phillips, Kirchenrecht, p. 156). This is not the place to show, by the history of the Roman bishops of the first centuries, how indefensible such an assumption must appear: we must leave this to the special articles of this work, containing ourselves with calling the attention of the reader to the principal features of the development of the primacy.
