erated English divine of the second half of the 16th century. He was born at Fishoe, Devonshire, in 1549, was educated at Merton College, Oxford, and Corpus Christi College, of the same university; and was chosen probationer fellow in 1556. He finally took holy orders, and in 1558 was promoted to the deanery of Lincoln. In 1598 he was offered a bishopric, and at the same time was called to the presidency of Corpus Christi College. He cared less for distinctions than for scholarly tasks, and therefore gave the preference to the offer of his alma mater. In this new position he became famous beyond seas, as well as in England. His learning and readiness of application gave him a reputation not to lose in England; and the king, who prided himself on his own reputation for scholarship, and desired above all things to maintain this reputation, leaned greatly on this distinguished divinity, and always favored his projects. It is thus that we owe to Rainold the King James Version of the scriptures. It is well known that Rainold urged the vice--chancellor, the undertakers, and demonstrated its necessity. He was a great Hebraist, and made translations c. small portions at first, and, reading these to the king in his private chamber, convinced his royal master of the want, and the good likely to be accomplished as well as the renown to be gained. See English Versions. Rainold died in 1607. Bishop Hall speaks of Rainold as being near to a miracle in his prodigious treasury of knowledge; John Milton refers to him always as "our famous Dr. Rayold;" and Wood, in his Athenae Oxoni., (ii, 18), calls him "the very treasury of erudition." Hallam, in his Constitutional Hist. of England, calls him "nearly, if not altogether, the most learned man in England" (i, 297), and in his Literary Hist. of Europe (i, 560), "the most eminently learned man of the queen's reign." He published a number of separate sermons, treatises against the Church of Rome, and some other theological productions, of which there is a complete list in Wood (Athenae Oxoni., ii, 11-19). We have room here to mention only, See Theses de S. Scriptura et Ecclesia (Lenz, 1589); Regiments; and, in English, 1558, 12mo; (1599, 4to) — The Summary of the Conference between John Rainoldes and John Hart touching the Head and Faith of the Church, etc. (1584, 1588, 1589, 1609, 4to; Latin, Oxon, 1619, fol.) — Orationes duo in Coll. Corp. Christi (1614, 1628, 8vo); the first oration was published in an English translation by J. Leicester (Lond. 1638, 12mo) — The Original of Bishops and Metropolitans (1614, 4to) — Judgment concerning Episcopacy, whether it be God's ancient ordinance (1614, 4to) — Prophete of Hagg, sermons (1649, 4to). Rainor, Menezis, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church near the opening of our century, was admitted to the work of the itineracy in 1730, and travelled in Dutchess (N. Y.) Circuit with Peter Mor tery, under the superintendence of Freeborn Garretson (q. v.). In 1731 he was colleague of Lemuel Smith at Hartford. In 1732 he labored in Mons. Sub dsequently he travelled the Elizabethtown (N. J.) and Middletown (Conn.) circuits. In 1735 he withdrew from the conference, and afterwards from the Church. He was a young man of promise, and acceptable among the people as a preacher. After his withdrawal from the Methodist Church, he joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, and afterwards became a Universalist. See Stevens, Memoirs of New England Methodism, p. 127.

Rainisant, Jean Firmin, a noted French Bene dictine monk, was born at Suippe, near Chalons-sur-Marne, in 1596, and took the monastic vow in 1618 at Verdun. In 1621 he became prior of the monastery attached to the diocese of Rheims, and so distinguished himself by austerity and purity that he was by cardinal Richelieu selected in 1630 as one of the thirty who were to reform the Cluny Congregation. In 1633 he became prs. of Ferrières, in Gâtine; but after the union of the Cluniacs and Maurists ceased in 1644, he gave the preference to the last congregation. In 1645 he was elected prior of the abbey of St.-Germain-des-Prés, at Paris. In 1651 he was elected visitor of the province of Bretagne. On his very first journey in the country he fell from his saddle and broke a leg; from the injuries thus sustained he sickened and died, Nov. 8, 1651, in the convent of Lehon, near Dinan. He contributed largely to the literature on monasticism in later medi teval times; and whatever he wrote is valuable to the student of this subject. Because Rainisant confessed the failings of the ascetics of the Church of Rome, and earnestly sought their reform. We have no room here to insert a list of his writings, but refer to Hoder, Nouv. Études, xii, 497, and Le Cerf, Dictionnaire de l'Église et de la Confraternité de St. Maur.

Rainis (Cebu, Cebu, tomasinas. 1 Sam. xxv, 18; xxx, 20; 2 Sam. xvi, 1; Chron. xii, 20) signifies dried grapes, or rather cakes made of them, such as the Italians still call simonini. Grapes are often thus preserved for food (Numb, vi, 8). See Grape; Vine.
RAISSE, ARNOLD, a French theologian, was born at Douai near the opening of the 17th century. He was canon of the Church of St. Peter, and as such had ample opportunity to explore the vast treasures of this church and neighboring churches and monasteries for the ecclesiastical history of the Low Countries. He died in 1644, leaving a large material for the history of the saints in the Netherlands, and its stores have not yet been fully exhausted. His other writings are of no special interest now.—Hoefcr, Notiz. Bibl. Generale, s. v.

R'ak'm (1 Chron. vii, 16). See Rekem.

Rak'kath (Heb. Rakkath, 'rkk['h, shore; Sept. 'rkk[v, n. Ράκαθ), a fortified city in the tribe of Naphtali, mentioned only in Josh. xxi. 35, where it is grouped between Hammoth and Chinnereth. We may hence infer that it lay on the western shore of the lake of Galilee, not far distant from the warm baths of Tiberias, which are on the site of the ancient Hammath (q. v.). According to the rabbins (Megill. 6a), Rakkath stood upon the spot where the city of Tiberias was afterwards built (see Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 229). See Cinnereth.

Rakkath appears to have fallen to ruin at an early period, or at least it was not a place of sufficient note to be mentioned in history, and the name passed away altogether when Tiberias and Josephus of Jerusalem had the ancient tombs to have been removed to make room for the buildings of Tiberias does not, as Dr. Robinson supposes, make it impossible that the city stood on the site of Rakhe (Josephus, Ant. xviii. 2, 8; Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 389). Rakkath may have stood close on the shore where there were no tombs; while Tiberias, being much larger, extended some distance up the adjoining rocky hill-sides, in which the tombs may still be seen. Thomson (Land and Book, ii, 66) identifies Hammath with the Emmaus of Josephus (Ant. xvii. 5, 3), and supposes Rakheh to be the same name with the Arab Arkeh, at the mouth of the Jordan; but this latter rather represents the ancient Tarichea (q. v.). The enumeration of the towns in the connection requires us to understand this to be the same with the Rackath preceding, i.e., Hammoth-Rakkath. See Naphat-tal, Tribe of.

Rakkon (Heb. An-Rakkon), 'rkk'on, with the article the temple [of the head]. Geera, a well-watered place, first Sept. 'rkk'on, Vulg. Arecos, one of the towns in the inheritance of Dan (Josh. xix. 46). It appears not far distant from Joppa. As it is mentioned between Me-jarkon and Japho, the site is possibly that of the village Kalschock or Kalsheik, marked on the maps as lying north of the Nah Rabin, west of Akir (Ekon).

Rakshas, or Rakshasa, is, in Hindî mythology, the name of a class of evil spirits or demons, who are sometimes imagined as attendants on Kuvera, the god of riches, and guardians of his treasures, but more frequently as mischievous, cruel, and hideous monsters, haunting cemeteries and hallowed places, terrorizing men and demons, and ever ready to oppose the gods and to disturb pious people. They have the power of assuming any shape at will, and their strength increases towards the evening twilight. Several of them are described as having many heads and arms [see, for instance, Ravana], large teeth, red hair, and, in general, as being of repulsive appearance; others, however, especially the females of this class, could also take beautiful forms in order to allure their victims. In the legends of the Mahabharata, Ramayana, and the Puranas, they play an important part. In the Valmiki Ramayana, part of the verse, they are sometimes mentioned as the offspring of the patriarch Pulasya, at other times as the sons of the patriarch Kasyapa. Another account of their origin, given in the Vishnu-Purâna, where, tracing the creation of the world (bk. i. ch. v), is the following: "Next, from Brahma, in a form composed of the quality of foulness, was produced hunger, of whom anger was born; and the god forth with hunger, with hunger, of hideous aspect, and with long beards. Those beings hastened to the deity. Such of them as exclaimed, 'Not so; oh! let him be saved,' were named Rakshas (from ruksh, save): others who cried out, 'Let us eat,' were denounced, from that expression, Yaksha (from yaktah, for, yaktah, eat). This popular etymology of the name, however, would be at variance with the crude nature of these beings, and it seems, therefore, to have been improved upon in the Bhagavata-Purâna, where it is related that Brahma transformed himself into night, instead of a body; thus the Yaksas and Rakshasas seized upon, exclaiming, 'Do not spare it—devour it!' when Brahma cried out, 'Don't devour me (m a m a n a j a k h a t a) — spare me! (rakhati)." (See F. E. Hall's note to Wilson's Vishnu-Purâna, i. 82.) The more probable origin of the word Rakshas—kindled with the Germanderic or Rinnie—is that from a radical rash, "lurt," or "destroy," with an affix sus; hence, literally, the destructive being.

Rakusians is the name of a Christian sect whom Mohammedan writers speak of as having existed among the Arabs in the 7th century. The identity of the sect is uncertain, but it is generally supposed that there were at least two distinct branches of it. Their tenets appear to have been those of the Manichæans (q. v.) or Sabians (q. v.), still further corrupted by Ebonite influence. See Smrger, Mohomed. 1, 41; ii, 155; iii, 387, 395; Weil, Mohomed. p. 249, 386; Ueberweg, Hist. of Philosophr, i, 491.

Rabag, so called by Jews from the initial letters of his name, לֶאָבִי אָבָד (L'ebi Aba'd), and known by Christian writers by the name Magister Leo de Bar-mul or Germonis, was born in 1298 at Rafaels, not far from Gerona, and died about 1345. Little is known about the personal history of this remarkable Hebrew beyond the fact that, by virtue of his residence in Orange and Avignon, he was providentially exempted from the fearful sufferings inflicted upon his brethren in 1306, by the cruel government of Philip the Fair and his successors, and that he was thus enabled quietly to consecrate his extraordinary powers to the elucidation of the Scriptures, as well as to the advancement of science. His principal work, and perhaps the greatest on religious philosophy, is his הבש הפסנתר, The Wars of God (Riva di Trento, 1560; Leipzig, 1866). In this work Gerondys had the audacity to confess the eternity of matter, so that it was ironically called "The Wars with (against) God." But, as free as God's sun, he uttered his convictions, careless of consequence, and without fear of offending this or that path, sect, or established opinions. He believed in the progressive nature of thoughts, and added his to those of his predecessors, leaving the consequence in the hand of God, and believing that "time develops truth." "Truth," he says, "must be brought to light even if it wound me; the revealed law must emphatically: as the Bible is no tyrannical law which intends to impose untruth for truth, but its design is to lead us to true knowledge" (intro. p. 2 b., sect. vi, p. 68 a). This great philosophical work treats: 1. Of the immortality of the soul (on which there are eight chapters); 2. On dreams and prophecy (eight chapters); 3. On the omniscience of God and the conflict between philosophy and religion (six chapters); 4. On Providence, viewed from the philosophical and religious standpoint (seven chapters). The remaining portion of the work deals with the harmony between the statements of the Bible and the phenomena of the universe. That part of his work which treats on astronomy, and which describes an astronomical instrument invented by Gerondys to facilitate observations, was so much appreciated that Pope Clement VI, in 1342, had it translated into Latin; and Kepler, as he says in a letter to John Remus, took much trouble to get the book of rabbi Levi, as he calls him (uunum oapul Rabbinos invenit puerum tractatum K. Levi quinque defensionum Dei). The same work was published by P. de Millot, and by Reuchlin, who quotes largely from Gersonides. Though he began his authorship with philosophical and scientific productions when about thirty (1614), yet he published no exegetical work till he was thirty-seven years of age, from which time he unremittingly devoted himself to the exposition of the Bible. His first commentary is on the book of Job, and was finished in 1325. Twelve months later (1326) he published a commentary on the Song of Songs, and in 1326 a commentary on Cohelet, or Ecclesiastes. About the same time Rabbiag finished his commentary on the first chapters of Genesis, treating on the hexameron; and shortly after issued an exposition of Esther (1329). The Pentateuch now engaged his attention, and after laboring on it eight years (1329-1337), he completed the interpretation of this difficult part of the Old Test. In 1339 he finished a commentary on the earlier prophets—i.e. Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings—with his comment on Proverbs, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. The following are the editions of his exegetical works: היערף ע"ל ח"ש, Commentary on the Pentateuch (first printed at Mantua before 1490, then by Corn. Adolphus, 1634, in the Laws of Maimonides, and in Frankurt's Rabbinc Bible, 1634. 1524-1577). י"ע ח"ש, Commentary on the Earlier Prophets (Leira, and in all the Rabbinc Bibles; latest edition, Koningsburg, 1860)—except of the commentaries on the Pentateuch and the earlier prophets, entitled היערף ע"ל ח"ש, Utility, were published in 1560, and a Jewish-German version of them is given in Jekuteil's German translation of the Bible (Amst. 1676-78): י"ע ח"ש, Commentary on Proverbs (Leira, 1492, and in all the Rabbinc Bibles); a Latin translation was published by P. Ghuguy (Milan, 1620). י"ע ח"ש, Commentary on Job (Ferrara, 1677, and in all the Rabbinc Bibles); a Latin translation of ch. iv-viii was published by L. H. d'Aquino (Vicenza, 1628), and of ch. iv-viii by Chr. Ludovici (Leipzig, 1708) י"ע ח"ש, Commentary on Song of Songs, Esther, Ecclesiastes, and Ruth, with an introduction by Jacob Morkaria (Riva, 1560). י"ע ח"ש, Commentary on Daniel, published in Italy before 1490, in Pratenis's Rabbinc Bible, and in Frankurt's. The commentaries on Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles, which he finished in 1534, were still in MS, Cod. MSS. Op. 193, fol. 623. "As to his mode of interpretation, Rabbiag first gives an explanation of the words מ"ע ח"ש in each section, posterior meaning according to the context, י"ע ח"ש, and finally gives the utility or application of the passage מ"ע ח"ש. RALE (Ralle, or Raale). SEBASTIAN, a French Roman Catholic missionary, was born in 1657 or 1658, in the province of Franche-Comté. Having entered the Order of the Jesuits, he was dispatched to the foreign work in 1689. He arrived at Quebec in the fall of that year, and labored faithfully among the Indians for their conversion to the Catholic faith, and the great success. But his venturesome spirit led him into dangerous paths: he frequently went far beyond the territory of those savages friendly to him, and he finally paid for his daring with his life. He was killed in 1724, while on an expedition with Indians; but not by the savages—he fell pierced with English bullets. He had been guilty of great cruelty to Englishmen who had fallen into the hands of Indians, and this was only a revenge for his treachery to the whites. His death was a loss not only to Roman Catholics, but to the world of learning. He was the first of the tribe to translate the hexameron, and shortly after issued an exposition of Esther (1329). The Pentateuch now engaged his attention, and after laboring on it eight years (1329-1337), he completed the interpretation of this difficult part of the Old Test. In 1339 he finished a commentary on the earlier prophets—i.e. Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings—with his comment on Proverbs, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. Raleigh gained the royal favor, he was made, in 1586, admiral in the expedition against Cadiz, commanded by Howard and the earl of Essex, and was admittedly the main instrument of its success. Also, in the year following, he took part in the attack on the Azores made by the same commanders. In the court intrigues which ended in the defeat of Essex in 1587 and the death of the earl, Raleigh became deeply involved; and certain points of his conduct—as, notably, the sale of his good offices with the queen in behalf of such of the earl’s adherents as would buy them—though easily regarded by the current morality of the time, have been somewhat of a stain on his fame otherwise so splendid. With the death of Elizabeth, in 1603, ends his brilliant and successful career. Her successor, James, from the first regarded him with suspicion and dislike. He had, besides, made powerful enemies; and, when accused of complicity in a plot against the king, though no jott of evidence of his being any way concerned in it was produced at his trial, a verdict was readily procured finding him guilty of high treason. The language of the prosecutor, attorney-general Coke, was outrageously abusive. He called Raleigh “a heathenable atheist and follower of hell,” a “viperous traitor,” etc. Sentence of death was passed, but James did not venture to execute him; and he was sent to the Tower, where, for thirteen years, he remained a prisoner, his estates being confiscated, and made over to the king’s favorite, Carr, subsequently earl of Essex. The literary-minded and religious devotion of Raleigh devoted himself to literary and scientific pursuits, his chief monument in this kind being his History of the World, a noble fragment, still notable to the student as one of the finest models of quaint and stately old English style. Certain of his poetical pieces, giving hint of a genius at once elegant and sententious, also continue to be esteemed. In 1615 he procured his release, and once more sailed for Guiana. The expedition, from which great results were expected, failed miserably. He himself, in consequence of severe illness, was unable to accompany it inland; and nothing but disaster ensued. To add to his grief and disappointment, his eldest and favorite son was killed in the storming of the Spanish town of St. Thomas. He returned to England, broken in spirit and in fortunes, only to die; On the morning of Oct. 29, 1618, he was immolated, nominally on the sentence passed on him sixteen years before, but really, there is reason to suppose, in base compliance, on James’s part, with the urgencies of the king of Spain, who resented his persistent hostility. Raleigh left a record of noble presence, versatile and commanding genius, unquestionably one of the most splendid figures in a time unusually prolific of all splendid developments of humanity. In the art and fineness of the court, the political wisdom of the statesman, and the skilful daring of the warrior, he was almost alike pre-eminent. The moral elevation of the man shines out eminently in the darkness which beset his later fortunes; and the calm and manly dignity with which he fronted adverse fate conciliated even those whom his haughtiness in prosperity had offended. Raleigh’s Life has been written by Oldys, Carevly (Lond. 1690, 2 vols.); and P. F. Tytler (Edin. 1808). His poems were collected and published by Sir E. Brydges (Lond. 1814); his Miscellaneus Writings, by Dr. Birch (1751, 2 vols.); and his Complete Works, at Oxford (1829, 8 vols).

Raleigh,Walter, D.D., nephew of the foregoing, was born in 1586, and was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. He took holy orders, and finally became, in 1620, rector of Chedzoy, Somersetshire. In 1630 he was made chaplain to the king, and won much favor from Charles L. In 1634 he was made prebend of Wakefield. In 1639 he was made bishop of Worcester and later became rector of Streat, with the chapel of Walton, Wiltshire. During the rebellion, he fell under suspicion, and was imprisoned in his house. While thus confined, he was stabbed, one day (1645), in an encounter with the guard, from whose impertinent curiosity he was determined to hide a private letter. England lost in this divine an eloquent preacher and a scholarly man. Chillingworth said of him that he was the best disputant he ever met with. His works are—Reliquiae Raleighanae: being discourses and sermons on several subjects, with an account of the author by bishop of Patrick (Lond. 1670, 4to):— Certain Querries Proposed by Roman Catholica, and Ansewered by Dr. Walter Raleigh (pub. by Howell, 1718, 8vo). See Wood, Athenae Oxoni.; Gentleman’s Magazine (Lond.), 1857, ii, 643; 1858, i, 82.

Raiston, Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born fixed serum in county of Donegal, Ireland, in 1756; studied at the University of Glasgow; and, after entering the ministry, emigrated to this country in the spring of 1784. After itinerating about two years in Eastern Pennsylvania, he went west, and in 1786 became pastor of the united congregations of Mingom Creek and Williamsport (now Monogahela City), where he remained for the rest of his life, being pastor of the latter branch thirty-five years, and of the former forty years. In 1822 he was made D.D. by Washington College, Pa., and died in Washington County, Pa., Sept. 25, 1851. As a religious man he was eminent, and his writings are distinctive, clear, copious, and profound in the exposition and defence of truth. His published works are mostly of a controversial character; among them we find—The Curry-comb (1805)—a work on baptism, containing an objection to its comprizing of the two classes, and letters in reply to his attack upon this review:—A Brief Examination of the Principal Prophecies of Daniel and John:—A Defence of Ecclesiastical Priesthood.—Sprague, Annals, iv, 146.

Ram (Heb. id. דָּאָר, ignis), the name of three men in Scripture.

1. (Sept. 'Apekt, r. 'Aḥādār; Vulg. Arum.) The son of Hezron and father of Amminadab, B.C. cir. 1780. He was born in Egypt after Jacob’s migration there, as his name is not mentioned in Gen. xiv, 4. He first appears in Ruth iv, 19. The genealogy in 1 Chron. ii, 9, 10 adds no further information concerning him, except that he was the second son of Hezron, Jerahmeel being the first-born (ver. 25). He appears in the New Test. only in the two lists of the ancestry of Christ (Matt. i, 4, 8; Luke iii, 39), where he is called Aram.

2. (Sept. 'Pāv, r. 'Pāv, 'Apekt; Vulg. Ram.) The first-born of Jerahmeel, and therefore nephew of the preceding (1 Chron. ii, 25, 27). B.C. post 1780. He had three sons—Maaz, Jamin, and Eker.

3. (Sept. 'Pāv, r. 'Apekt; Vulg. Ram.) Elifin, the son of Barachel the Buzite, is described as “of the kindred of Ram” (Josh. xxi, 2). Rashi’s note on the passage is curious: “of the family of Ram, Abraham; for it is said, ‘the greatest man among the Anakim’ (Josh. xiv); this [is] Abraham.” Ewald identifies Ram with Aram, mentioned in Gen. xxvii, 21 in connection with Huz and Buz (Gesen. l, 44). Elifin would thus be a collateral descendant of Abraham, and this may have suggested the extraordinary explanation given by Rashi.

See Aram.

Ram (בָּשָׂר, dylî; spōc). As this animal, fattened, was a favorite article of food (Gen. xxxvi, 38; Ezek. xxxix, 18), it was considered, when offered as sacrifice, of higher value than sheep and lambs (Gen. xv, 9, Numb. xvi, 5, 6). Certain a 18 sq.; Mic. vi, 7), and the legal rite gave exact directions on the sacrifice of the. The rams were sometimes burnt-offerings (Lev. viii, 18, 21; ix, 2; xvi, 3; xxix, 18; Numb. vii, 15; Isa. lixiv, 15; Isa. i, 11; Ezek. lv, 22, etc.,) sometimes frank-offerings (Lev. ix, 4, 10; Numb. vi, 14, 17; vii, 17; xxvii, 11, etc.), sometimes trespass-offerings (Lev. v, 15, 18, 25; vi, 6; comp. Lev. xiv, 21; Numb. v, 8; Ezr a xx, 19, etc.). The ram, too, appears not only in public and private offerings in general, but especially in the purifying sacrifices of the Nazarite (Numb. vi, 14) and the sacrifices of Priestly Consecration. It was not used as a sin-offering. In 2 Chron. xxix, 21 only the seven he-goats belong to the sin-offering, as ver. 25 shows; the rams, with the other sacrifices, form the burnt-offering. The use of the ram as thank- and trespass-offering is pointed out in Exod. xxix, 22 (comp. Lev. viii, 16; ix, 19; Isa. xxxiv, 6). The Greeks and Romans used rams for sacrifice only exceptionally; yet comp. Pliny, H. N. xxxiv, 19, 19. In Egypt this was more frequent (Wilkinson, v, 191 sq.); and in the Thebais it was imitated, save at the great annual festival of Ammon (Herod. ii, 42). On the symbolic use of the ram in Daniel to signify the Persian empire, see Cattel, N. ii; and on the Battier-ram, see a. The use of ram's skins for covering is alluded to in Exod. xxv, 5; xxxi, 14; xxxvi, 19; xxxix, 34; and is still common in Palestine, where they are also "dyed red" (Exod. xxx, 5) for the use of the shoemakers (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 189). See Sheep.

Ram, Battiering ("Г. 7; Sept. βατήριον; χιερός; Vulg. arius). This instrument of ancient siege operations is twice mentioned in the Old Test. (Ezek. iv, 2; xxii, 22 [27]); and as both references are to the battiering of the Assyrians and Babylonians, it will only be necessary to describe those which are known from the monuments to have been employed in their sieges. With regard to the meaning of the Hebrew word there is but little doubt. It denotes an engine of war which was called a ram, either because it had an iron head shaped like that of a ram, or because when used for battering down a wall, the movement was like the butting action of a ram.

In attacking the walls of a fort or city, the first step appears to have been to form an inclined plane or bank of earth (comp. Ezek. iv, 2—"cast a mount against it"), by which the besiegers could bring their battering-rams and other engines to the foot of the walls. "The battering-rams," says Mr. Layard, "were of various kinds. Some were joined to movable towers which held warriors and armed men. The whole then formed one great temporary building, the top of which is represented in sculptures as on a level with the walls, and even turrets, of the besieged city. In some bas-reliefs the battering-ram is without wheels; it was then, perhaps, constructed upon the spot, and was not intended to be movable, while in others it was probably sometimes unprovided with the ram, but it is probable that it was represented. When the machine contained the battering-ram it was a simple framework and did not form an artificial tower, a cloth or some kind of drapery, edged with fringes and otherwise ornamented, to avoid being thrown horizontally over it. Sometimes it may have been covered with hides. It moved either on four or on six wheels, and was provided with one ram or with two. The mode of working the rams cannot be determined from the Assyrian sculptures. It may be presumed, from the representations in the bas-reliefs, that they were partly suspended by a rope fastened to the outside of the machine, and that men directed and impelled them from within. Such was the plan adopted by the Egyptians, in whose paintings the warriors working the ram may be seen through the frame. Sometimes this engine was ornamented by a carved or painted figure of the presiding divinity kneeling on one knee and drawing a bow. The artificial tower was usually occupied by two warriors: one discharged his arrows against the besieged, whom he was able, from his lofty position, to harass more effectually than if he had been below; the other held up a shield for his companion's defence.

Warrors are not unfortunately represented as stepping from the machine to the battlements. . . . Archers on the walls hurled stones from slings and discharged their arrows in that way. So deep was the artificial tower in the cruel massacre, that the cry of distress went through the whole...
RAMA

land of Benjamin, reaching to the capital of the tribe.

Rama is, in Hindu mythology, the name common to three incarnations of Vishnu, of Parasurama, Rama-chandra, and Balarama. See Vishnu.

Ramadán, the ninth month in the Mohammedan year. In it Mohammed received his first revelation, and every believer is therefore enjoined to keep a strict fast throughout the entire course of the month when the white thread can be distinguished from a black thread to sunset. Eating, drinking, smoking, bathing, smelling, perfumes, and other bodily enjoyments, even swallowing one's spittle, are strictly prohibited during that period. Even when obliged to take a bath, the Moslem will make some kind of amends for it, such as spending a certain sum of money upon the poor. During the night, however, the most necessary wants may be satisfied—a permission which, practically, is interpreted by a profuse indulgence in all sorts of enjoyments. The fast of Ramadán, now much less observed than in former times, is sometimes a very severe affliction upon the orthodox, particularly when the month—being lunar—happens to fall in the long and hot days of summer. The sick, travellers, and soldiers in general, are temporarily released from this duty, but they have to fast an equal number of days at a subsequent period, when this impediment is removed. Nurses, pregnant women, and those to whom it might prove really injurious, are expressly exempt from fasting. We may add that according to some traditions (Al-Bukhari), not only Mohammed, but also Abraham, Moses, and Jesus received their respective revelations during this month. The principal passages treating of the fast of Ramadán are found in the second Surah of the Koran, called "The Cow." See Wellsted, City of the Copts, ii. 245.

Ramah (Heb. Ramah, רַמָּה) signifies a height, or a high place, from the root רָמָה, to be high; and thus it is used in Ezek. xxiv. 24. Very many of the ancient cities and villages of Palestine were built on the tops of hills, so as to be more secure, and hence, as was natural, such of them as were especially conspicuous were called by way of distinction רַמָּה (with the article), the Height; and this in the course of time came to be used as a proper name. We find no less than five Ramahs mentioned in Scripture by this simple name, besides several compounds, and in modern Palestine the equivalent Arab word occurs very frequently. With regard to most of them the traveller can still see how appropriate the appellation was. In the A. V. we have various forms of the word—Ramath (רַמָּת), the status constructus (Josh. xiii. 36), Ramoth (רָמֹת), and Ramathaim (רָמֹתִיאָם), the plural (Josh. xxi. 36; 1 Sam. xxx. 27); and Ramathaim-zophim (רָמֹתִיָּם אֵזוֹפִים), a dual form (1 Sam. i. 1). Remeth (רְמֶת) appears to be only another form of the same word. In later Hebrew, ramah is a recognized word for a hill, and as such is employed in the Jewish versions of the Pentateuch for the rendering of Pisgah. See also ARMATHEA. In the following account we largely follow the usual geographical authorities, with important additions from other sources.

Ramah, Ramasseum, Sept. 'Ramath and Apamá, v. r. 'Ramá, Porpy, Porpy, Pápy, Bajad, Volg, Ramá), frequently mentioned in Scripture. Joshua, in enumerating the towns of Benjamin, groups Ramah between Gibeon and Beeroth (xxvii, 28). This position suits the present Ram-Allah, but the considerations named in the text seem to oblige us to identify this with the other site than er-Rám. It is probably this place which is mentioned in the story of Deborah, "She dwelt under the palm-tree of Deborah, between Ramah and Bethel in Mount Ephraim" (Judg. iv. 5). The Targum on this passage substitutes for the Palm of Deborah, Ataroth-Deborah, no mention to the town of Ataroth.

This has everything in its favor, since 'Atara is still found on the left hand of the road north, very nearly midway between er-Rám and Beitin. Its position is clearly indicated in the distressing narrative of the Levite recorded in Judges xix. He left Bethlehem for his home in the plain of Ephraim in the afternoon. Near Jerusalem, he journeyed northward, and, crossing the ridge, came in sight of Gibeah and Ramah, each standing on the top of its hill; and he said to his servant, "Come and let us draw near to one of these places to lodge all night, in Gibeah or in Ramah." (vii. 5). The towns were on either road on the right, and about two miles apart. The position of these two ancient towns explains another statement of Scripture. It is said of Saul (1 Sam. xxvii, 6) that "he abode in Gibeah under a tree in Ramah." The meaning appears to be that the site of his standing camp was in some commanding spot on the borders of the two territories of Gibeah and Ramah. When Israel was divided, Ramah lay between the rival kingdoms, and appears to have been destroyed at the outbreak of the revolt; for we read that "Ishshah, king of Israel, went up against Judah, and built Ramah." (1 Kings xv. 17). It was a strong position, and commanded the great road from the north to Jerusalem. The king of Judah was alarmed at the erection of a fortress in such close proximity to his capital, and he stopped the work by bribing the Syrians to invade northern Israel (vers. 18-21). The town was never carried off all the building materials (ver. 22). There is a precise specification of its position in the catalogue of the places north of Jerusalem which are enumerated by Isaiah as disturbed by the gradual approach of the king of Assyria (Isa. x. 28-32). At Michmethah he crosses the ravine; and then successively dislodges or alarms Geba, Ramah, and Gibeah of Saul. Each of these may be recognized with almost absolute certainty at the present day. Geba is Jeba, on the south brink of the great valley; and a mile and a half beyond is, directly between it and the main road to the city, the elevation which its ancient name implies. Ramah was intimately connected with one of the saddest epochs of Jewish history. The full story is not told, but the outline is sketched in the words of Jeremiah. In the final invasion of Judah by the Babylonians, Nebuchadnezzar established his headquarters on the plain of Hamath at Riblah (Jer. xxxix, 5). Thence he sent his generals, who captured Jerusalem. The principal inhabitants who escaped the sword were seized, bound, and placed under a guard at Ramah, while the vanguard was burning the temple and palace, and levelling the ramparts. Among the captives was Jeremiah himself (xi, 1, 5, with xxxix, 8-12). Perhaps there was also a slaughter of such of the captives as, from age, weakness, or poverty, were not worth the long transport across the desert to Babylon. There, in that heart-rending scene of captives in chains waiting over slaughtered kindred and desolated sanctuaries, was fulfilled the first phase of the prophecy uttered only a few years before: "A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping: Rachel weeping for her children, refused to be comforted for her children because they were not" (Jer. xxxi, 15). That mourning was typical of another which took place six centuries later. When the infants of Bethlehem were murdered, and the second phase of the prophecy was fulfilled (Matt. ii. 17). As Ramah was in the plains, the prophet introduces Rachel, the mother of that tribe, bewailing the captivity of her descendants. See RAMAH.

Ramah was rebuilt and recolonized by the descendants of its old inhabitants after the captivity (Ezra ii, 26; Neh. vii, 2). The inhabitants of Ramathaim-Zophim were left by some to occupy a different position in the list, and may be a distinct place situated farther west, nearer the plain. (This, and Jer. xxxi, 15, are the only passages in which the name appears without the article.) The Sept. finds an allusion to Ramah in Zech. xiv, 16, where it renders the words which are translated in the A.V.
and shall be lifted up (אֶפְסָר), and inhabited in her place," by "Ramah shall remain upon her place." According to Josephus (who calls it Παπαζων), it was forty stadia distant from Jerusalem (Ant. viii. 12, 3); and Eusebius and Jerome place it in the sixth mile north of the holy city (Onomast. s. v. "Rama"); but in his comment on Josh. vii. 18, Jerome says in septimo locis); and the latter states that in his day it was a small village (id Sophoniam, i, 15).

Modern travellers are right in identifying Ramah of Benjamin with the village of er-Rami (Brocadus, vii; Robinson, Bibl. Res. i, 255), though Maunoir and a few others have located it at Nely Samwil. Er-Rami is five miles north of Jerusalem and four south of Bethel. The site of Gibeah of Saul lies two miles southward, and Gaba about the same distance eastward. Rama is a small, ruined village; but in the walls and foundations of the houses are many large hewn stones, and in the lanes and fields broken columns and other remains of the ancient capital. The situation is commanding, on the top of a conical hill, half a mile east of the great northern road, and overlooking the broad summit of the ridge. A view is intercepted by bare ridges and hill-tops. The whole country round Ramah has an aspect of stern and even painful desolation; but this is almost forgotten in the great events which the surrounding heights and ruins recall to memory. The identity of this Ramah with that of Samuel, see RAMATHEIM-ZOPHEM.

2. RAMAH OF ASHER (Sept. 'Pepa: Vulg. Horuma), a town mentioned only in Josh. xix, 29, in the description of the boundaries of Asher. It would appear to have been situated near the sea-coast, and not far from Tyre, towards the north-east. Eusebius and Jerome mention this place, but in such a way as shows they knew nothing of it further than what is stated by Joshua. In the Vulgate Jerome calls it Horuma, making the Hebrew article π a part of the word; this, however, is plainly an error (Onomast. s. v. "Rama"); and note by Benammi.

Robinson visited a village called Ramleh, situated on the western declivity of the mountain-range, about seventeen miles south-east of Tyre. It "stands upon an isolated hill in the midst of a basin with green fields, surrounded by higher hills." In the rocks are numerous ancient sarcophagi, and the village itself has some remains of antiquity. He says there is no room for question but that this village represents the ancient Ramah of Asher" (Bibl. Res. iii, 64). Its position, however, notwithstanding the住了 which so high an authority, does not at all correspond with the notice in Scripture. The name Ramlah was too common to indicate identity with any degree of certainty. Another Ramleh has been discovered on a little tell, two miles south-east of modern Tyre, and about one mile northeast of Ras-el-Ain, the site of ancient Tyre (Van de Velde, Map and Memoir, p. 512). In position this village answers in all respects to the Ramah of Asher.

3. RAMAH OF GILEAD (2 Kings viii, 29; 2 Chron. xxiii, 6), identical with Ramoth-Gilead (q. v.).

4. RAMAH OF NAPHTALI (Sept. 'Apqul v. r. 'Pqul: Vulg. Arama), one of the strong cities of the tribe, mentioned only in Josh. xix, 36, and situated apparently to the south of Hazor, between that city and the Sea of Galilee. Roland seems inclined to identify it with the Ramah of Asher; but they are evidently distinct cities, as indicated both by ancient geographers and the sacred writer (Palest. p. 963). Eusebius and Jerome record the name, though they appear to have known nothing of the place (Onomast. s. v. "Rama"). Beth-Rimah (בֵית־רְמוֹה), a place in Galilee on a mountain, and famous for its wine, according to the Talmud (Menachoth, viii, 6), is thought by Schwarz (Palest. p. 178) to be the Ramah of Naphtali. About six miles west by south south-west, on the leading road to Akka, is a large modern village called Rimah. It stands on the declivity of the mountain, surrounded by olive-groves, and overlooking a fertile plain. It contains no visible traces of antiquity; but the name and the situation render it highly probable that it occupies the site of Ramah of Naphtali. It was visited by Schulte in 1847 (Ritter, Pal. and Syr. iii, 772), and by Robinson in 1842 (Bibl. Res. i, 78). See also Hackett, Illustr. of Script. p. 240; Thomson, Land and Book, i, 515. See RAMATHEIM.

5. RAMAH OF SAMUEL, the birthplace and home of that prophet (1 Sam. i, 19; ii, 11, etc.), and the city elsewhere called RAMATHEIM-ZOPHEM.

6. RAMAH OF THE SOUTH. See RAMATHEIM-NEGER.

7. A place mentioned in the catalogue of towns re-inhabited by the Benjamites after their return from the captivity (Neh. xi, 33). It may be the Ramah of Benjamin (above, No. 1), or the Ramah of Samuel, but its position in the list (remote from Gela, Michmash, Bethel, ver. 31; comp. Ezra ii, 29, 28) seems to remove it farther west, to the neighborhood of Lod, Hadid, and Ozo. There is no further notice in the Bible of a Ramah in this direction; but Eusebius and Jerome allude to one, though they may be at fault in identifying it with Ramathaim and Arimathaim (Bibl. Res. i, 279; comp. the remarks of Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii, 239). The situation of the modern Ramleh agrees very well with this, a town too important and too well placed not to have existed in the ancient times. The consideration that the Ramah of Samuel was "a city," and Ramah, "a height," is not a valid argument against the site being the legitimate successor of the other, if, so far, the identifications of modern travellers must be reversed. Beit-ar can no longer be the representative of Beth-horon, because ar means "year," while horon means "caves"; nor Beit-lahm, of Bethlehem, because lahm is "flesh," and lamed "bread;" nor el-Aal, of Eleashe, because el is in Arabic the article, and in Hebrew the name of God. In these cases the tendency of language is to retain the sound at the expense of the meaning.

8. RAEMEH in Hammon, called Er-Rameh, or Ramet el-Khalil—Ramah of Hebron, or Ramah of the Friend, i.e. Ramah of Abraham, or the High-place of Abraham the Friend of God. It lies about two miles north of Hebron, a little to the right or east of the road from Hebron to Jerusalem, on an eminence, the top and southern slope of which are covered with ancient foundations, the principal of which are those of a large building, apparently a Christian church. The ruins are described by Wollcot (Bibl. Soc. i, 45), and by Dr. Wilson (Lambs of the Bible, i, 582). The top command the view of the Meonothas through a gap in the mountains towards the north-west. Ramah the Jews call the "House of Abraham," where, they say, Abraham lived when he dwelt at Mamre. But the "plain of Mamre," with the great Simon, or everlasting oak in the middle of it (if not the same, the offspring, most probably, of the tree), under which Abraham entertained the angels, would seem to have anciently lain to the west of Hebron, as Machpelah, which is at Hebron, is said to be before, i.e. to the east of Mamre.

It is very possible, however, that Abraham may have had his habitations or tenant farms at this point in the time he was at Mamre or near Hebron, or which is still more probable, the altar which he erected (Gen. xiii, 18), his high-place, or place of worship, may have been at er-Rameh, or Ramet el-Khalil—"the high-place of the Friend," i.e. of Abraham the friend of God, while he dwelt or had his tent in the plain of Mamre.

Some suppose that this Ramah may be the Ramah of Samuel and the place where Saul was anointed. Wollcot and Van de Velde contend for this. But this place is far too distant from Rachel's tomb (1 Sam. xi, 11-14) to support the notion, not to speak of other insuperable difficulties. The place where Samuel was when he anointed Saul was evidently near or not far from Rachel's tomb (1 Sam. x, 1-11). It is much more probable that Bethlehem, or the high-place of, or near Bethlehem, RAMANANDIS was the place where Samuel anointed Saul. The name of Ramet el-Khalil implies that that place had to do with Abraham the friend of God, and not with Samuel.

Ramanandis, a Hindustan sect which addressed its devotions particularly to Ramachandra, and the divine manifestations connected with Vishnu in that incarnation. The originator of this sect was Ramdass, who is calculated by Prof. H. H. Wilson to have flourished in the end of the 14th or beginning of the 15th century. He resided at Benares, where a math or monastery, of his followers is said to have formerly existed, but to have been destroyed by some of the Mughal princes in the 17th century. The Ramanandis were a sort of heretics, the whole of the incarnations of Vishnu, but they maintain the superiority of Rama in the present age or Kali-Yug, though they vary considerably as to the exclusive or collective worship of the male and female members of this incarnation. The ascetic and mendicant followers of Ramanand are by far the most numerous sectaries in Gangetic India. In Bengal they are comparatively few; beyond this province, as far as to Allahabad, they are probably the most numerous, though they yield in influence and wealth to the Saiva branches. From this province they have no abundant assemblage to encroach the whole of the country along the Ganges and Jumna, in the district of Agra they constitute seven tenths of the ascetic population. The numerous vortaries of the Ramanandis belong chiefly to the poorer classes, with the exception of the Rajputs and a few princely Brahmins.

Ramathaim-zophim (Heb. with the art. ha-Ramathaim Zophim, the two heights, watchers; Sept. Αρμοθιασα τοφημι, Vulg. Ἰερουσαλημ Σωποθι), the birthplace of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam. i. 19), his own permanent and official residence (vii, 17; viii, 4), and the place of his sepulture (xxvii, 1). It was in Mount Ephraim (i, 1). It had apparently attached to it a place called Naioth, at which the "company" (or "school", as it is called in modern times) of the sons of the prophets was maintained (xix, 18, etc.; xx, 1); and it had also in its neighborhood (probably between it and Gibeah of Saul) a great well, known as the well of Has-Sechua (xix, 22). See Sechu. This is all we know of it with any degree of certainty.

Ramathaim, if interpreted as a Hebrew word, is dual -- the double eminence. This may point to a peculiar character in the name or place, or may be an instance of the tendency, familiar to all students, which exists in language to force an archaic or foreign name into an intelligible form. It is given in its complete shape in the Hebrew text and A. V. but once (1 Sam. i. 19). Elsewhere (i, 19; ii, 11; vii, 17; viii, 4; xvi, 54; xvi, 13; xix, 18, 19, 22, 23; xx, 1; xxii, 12; xxvii, 3) it occurs in the shorter form of Ramathaim (q. v.). The Sept., however (in both MSS.), gives it throughout as Ramathaim, and inserts it in i, 9 after the words "his city," where it is wanting in the Hebrew and A. V. In the Ommatsektion of Josephus it is recorded as Ramathaim (Theosaurus, p. 1275); but a comparison of 1 Sam. i. 1 with ver. 19 shows without doubt that the same place is referred to. It is implied by Josephus, and affirmed by Eusebius and Jerome in the Ommatsektion ("Armatheam Seipha"); nor would it ever have been questioned had there not been other Ramaths mentioned in the sacred history. Of the force of "Zophim" no feasible explanation has been given. It was an ancient word on the east of Jordan (Num., xxi, 14), and there, as here, was attached to an eminence. In the Targum of Jonathan it is rendered "Ramath of the scholars of the prophets:" but this is evidently a late interpretation, arrived at by regarding the prophets as watchmen (the root of zophim, also that of mizpeh, having the force of looking out afar), coupled with the fact that at Naioth in Ramathaim Zophim was a school of prophets. The most natural explanation appears to be that Zophim, one of Samuel's ancestors, had migrated from his home in Ephraim (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. vi, 30), and settled in a district to which he gave his own name, and which was afterwards called the land of Zophim (1 Sam. i. 5). Ramathaim, or Ramathaim-zophim, was the chief town of this district, and was hence called Ramathaim-Zophim, that is, "Ramath of the Zophites" (see Robinson, Bib. Res., ii, 7). See Zophim.

The position of Ramathaim-zophim is regarded by many scholars as one of the puzzles of Biblical geography. As the city is one of great interest, it may be well to give the principal theories as to its site, and then to state the data on which alone the site can be determined.

(1) Eusebius and Jerome locate it near Diospolis or Lydda (Damasus, n. v. "Armatheam Seipha"), and identify it with the Arimathea of the N. T. (Matt. xxvi, 57). Jerome's words are: "Armatheam Seipha: the city of Heliana and Samuel. It lies near (παράστασις) Diospolis: thence came Joseph, in the Gospel said to be from Arimathea." So also is Lydda, a modern Lulid, and the reference is, no doubt, to Ramathaim, the well-known modern town, two miles from Lulid. Jerome agrees with Eusebius in his translation of this passage; but in the Epist. Pauli. (vii, 28) he connects Ramathaim with Arimathea only, and places it "about three miles from Lulid." The site may be correct; for the Sept. "Arsamāthia" seems to be the same as the "Armatheam Seipha" of the New-Test. " Arsamathia," and represents the Hebrew אַרְמַתָּה, with the article. There is no doubt there was a city called Armatheam or Ramathaim on the plain near Lydda at an early period; and its modern representative may be Ramle, as suggested by Reland and others (Reland, Palast. p. 598, 599; see, however, Robinson, Bib. Res., ii, 238). But Ramathaim of Samuel could not have been so far distant from Gibeah of Saul; and there is a fatal obstacle to this identification in the fact that Ramlele ("the sandy") lies on the open face of the maritime plain, and cannot in any sense be said to be in Mount Ephraim or any other mountain district. Eusebius possibly refers to another Ramathaim named in Neh. xi, 33.

(2) Some would identify this city with Ramathaim of Benjamin (Genesis, Theaur., p. 1275; Winer, Red-Worterb. n. v. "Rama"); but this Ramathaim seems too close to Saul's residence at Gibeah to suit the requirements of the sacred narrative in 1 Sam. xix, 18. (Yet see below.)

(3) Robinson strongly suggests that Ramathaim may be the city now occupied by the village of Sibba, which stands on a lofty and conspicuous hill-top, about six miles west of Jerusalem. Sibba, he thinks, may be a corruption of the old name Zophim. Its elevation would answer well to the designation Ramathaim. It might be regarded as included in the mountains of Ephraim, or, at least, as a natural extension of them; and a not very wide detour would take the traveller from Sibba to Gibeah by the tomb of Rachel (Bib. Res., ii, 7-9). The arguments are plausible, but not convincing; and it must be admitted that the Robinsons' remarkable geographical knowledge has failed to throw light on the site of Ramathaim-zophim.

(4) Woolcott, seeing on the spot the difficulties attending Robinson's theory, and finding a remarkable ruin, called Ramet el-Khalil, near Sibba, pronounced that this was the site of Samuel's city. A summary of his reasons is given by Robinson in the Biblical Cyclopedia (xiii, 51; see also Bib. Res., ii, 279). They are not more convincing than those advanced in favor of Sibba, yet they have been adopted and expanded by V. van de Velde (Journet, 48-54; Memoirs, p. 341). This is also supported by Stewart (Test and Khan, p. 247).

(5) Gesenius thinks that Jebel Faradul, or, as it is usually called, Frank Mountain, the conspicuous conical hill three miles south-east of Bethlehem, is the true site of Ramah (Thesaurus, p. 1576). This, however, is pure conjecture, without any evidence to support it.

(6.) Ewald is in favor of the little village of Ramah, a mile west of Beeoth (Geschichte, i, 550, note). It is doubtless situated in Mount Ephraim, retains the old name of Ramah, or Ram, "the rood," but it might be an indication of some old, peculiar sanctity; but it is open to the same objections as all others north of Rachel's tomb. Lieut. Conder inclines to this position (Tant Work in Palestine, ii, 116), remarking that near it is a ruined village called Surikeh, perhaps the Scopus of 1 Sam. xix, 22.

(7.) One of the most ancient, and certainly one of the most plausible, theories is that which locates Ramatham-zophim at Neby Samwil. It is most probably to this place Pecopalis alludes in the statement that Josiah caused a wall and a wall to be erected for the court of St. Samuel (2 Esd. 4, 20; 9, 3; comp. Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 459). From the 7th century, when Adamanaus described Pecopalis, and spoke of "the city of Samuel, which is called Ramatha" (Early Travels [Bohn], 195, down through the Middle Ages to the present day, the name of the prophet has been connected with this spot; and the uniform tradition of Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans has made it the place of his birth and burial (see authorities cited in Robinson). The Crusaders built a church over the alleged tomb, which, after the fall of Islam, was converted into a mosque; and its walls and tall minaret are still visible from afar (Quaresmius, ii, 727; Puseoke, ii, 49). Neby Samwil is unquestionably the site of a very ancient city; its position on the summit of a high conical hill would give it a just title to the name Ramah; it probably lay within the region termed the "Mountains of Ephraim"; and it would form an appropriate residence for the great judge of Israel. It is near this place that the great well of Neby Samwil, or New waters, of which the word Samwil is supposed to be a misrepresentation, stands. It has been shown, besides, that Neby Samwil is most probably the site of Mizpah (q. v.).

(8.) Bonar (Land of Promise, p. 178, 594) adopts Jericho, which he places a short distance north of Bethelhem, east of Rachel's sepulchre. Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. Pthor) says that "Rama of Benjamin" is near "Pthor" Bethlehem, where "the voice in Rama was heard," and in our times the name is mentioned, besides Bonar, by Prokesch and Salzburger (cited in Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 8, note); but this cannot be regarded as certain, and we are not told that it is too close to Rachel's monument to suit the case.

(9.) Schwartz (Palest. p. 152-158), starting from Gibeah of Saul as the home of Kish, fixes upon Ramath, north of Samaria and west of Samur, which he supposed also to be Ramoth, or Jarumoth, the Levitical city of Isachar. All that is directly said as to its situation is that it was in Mount Ephraim (1 Sam. i, 1); and this would naturally lead us to seek it in the neighborhood of Shechem. But the whole tenor of the narrative of the public life of Samuel (in connection with which alone, I suppose, the city is restricted to this region of the tribe of Benjamin), and to the neighborhood of Gibeah, the residence of Saul, that it seems impossible not to look for Samuel's city in the same locality. It appears, from 1 Sam. vii, 17, that its annual functions as prophet and judge were confined to the narrow round of Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah—the first on the north boundary of Benjamin; the second near Jericho at its eastern end; and the third on the ridge in modern times known as Scopus, overlooking Jerusalem, and therefore near the southern confines of Benjamin. In the centre of these was Gibeah of Saul, the royal city and the religious and ecclesiastical centre of his kingdom, and the centre of his operations. It would be doing a violence to the whole of this part of the history to look for Samuel's residence outside these narrow limits.

Those Scriptural allusions which tend to indicate the position of Ramath-zophim are the following, and they are our only trustworthy guides. The statements of Eusebius and later writers can have little weight; and, indeed, it appears that all knowledge of the city was lost before their time.

(a.) In 1 Sam. i, 1 we read, "There was a certain man of Ramath-zophim, of Mount Ephraim." From this it would appear, at first sight, that Ramathaim was situated in the district called Mount Ephraim. The construction of the Hebrew, however, does not make this quite certain. The phrase רמא תטרפ ולש לארשי might possibly mean, not that Ramathaim was in Mount Ephraim (which would be expressed rather by נבמל), but that Ekanah was in some way of Mount Ephraim (the Hebrew is נבמל); though residing in Ramathaim. The statement of the text, therefore, does not form a suitable objection to a theory that would locate Ramathaim beyond the bounds of Mount Ephraim.

(b.) In the mouth of an ancient Hebrew, the expression would mean that portion of the mountain allotted to the tribe of Ephraim, or it may have extended so as to include part, or even the whole, of Benjamin. In the catalogue of the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xix, 22), it is placed between Bethel and Ramoth. The palm-tree of Deborah was in "Mount Ephraim," between Bethel and Ramathaim, and is identified with great plausibility by the author of the Targum on Judg. iv, 5, with Araoth, one of the landmarks on the south boundary of Ephraim, which still survives. The name Ramathaim, or Ramath, or Ramathaim-zophim (er-Ram), Bethel itself, though in the catalogue of the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xii, 22), was appropriated by Jeroboam as one of his idol sanctuaries, and is one of the "cities of Mount Ephraim" which were taken from him by Baasha and restored by Aza (2 Chron. xiii, 12; xv, 8). Jeremiah (c. xxiii) connects Ramathaim of Benjamin with Mount Ephraim (ver. 6, 9, 15, 18). It could scarcely have embraced any portion of Judah, since the two tribes were rivals for sovereignty. The allusions to Mount Ephraim in 1 Sam. ix. 4; Josh. xvii. 15, Judges xvii. 1, appear to confine the name to the territory of the tribe.
RAMATHAIM-ZOPHEM 897

RAMATH-MIZPEH

... in Rama." Eusebius, in his Onomasticon (s. v. 'Papad'), characterizes Ramah as the "city of Saul." In any case, there seems to be no insuperable objection against the identity of Ramah of Saul with Ramah of

(c) It is usually assumed that the city in which Saul was anointed (1 Sam. ix, x) was Samuel's own city, Ramah. Josephus certainly (Ant. vi, 4, 1) gives the name of the city as Armatham, and, in his version of the occurrence, implies that the prophet was at the time in his own house; but neither the Heb. nor the Sept. contains any statement which confirms this, if we except the slender fact that the "land of Zuph" (1 Sam. ix, 5) may be connected with the Zophim of Ramathaim-zophim. Robinson admits that "the answer of the maidens (ix, 11, 12) would, perhaps, rather imply that Samuel had just arrived, possibly on one of his yearly circuits in which he judged Israel in various cities" (Bib. Res. ii, 10). It cannot be questioned, indeed, that, apart from all theories, the whole course of the narrative leaves the impression that Samuel was in his own house in Ramah when Saul visited him. He was there when the Lord informed him, apparently on the preceding day (comp. 1 Sam. viii, 4, 22; ix, 15, 16), of his intention to appoint a king. The words of Saul's servant, too, convey the same impression: "When they went out of Ramah, the land of Zuph, let us go back!" but the servant said, "Behold now, there is in this city a man of God ... let us go thither" (ib., 5, 6, 6). This would scarcely apply to a place in which Samuel was but a casual visitor. But, on the other hand, the place of the interview could not have been within the tribe of Benjamin, because [1] the Lord, in foretelling to Samuel the coming of Saul, said, "To-morrow, about this time, I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin" (1 Sam. ix, 16); and [2] Saul, when in search of the asses, "passed through Mount Ephraim, and passed through the middle of the land of Shalim; and he passed through the land of the Benjaminites" (ver. 6). Then they came "to the land of Zuph." The land of Zuph was consequently south of Benjamin. So, in returning home (apparently to Gibeah), the city of the interview, Saul's way led past Rachel's tomb, the site of which is well known, near Bethlehem. It follows, from the minute specification of Saul's route in 1 Sam. x, 2, that the city in which the interview took place was near the sepulchre of Rachel, which, by Gen. xxxv, 15, 12, and other reasons, appears to be with certainty at or near Bethlehem. This supplies a strong argument against its being Ramathaim-zophim, since, while Mount Ephraim, as we have endeavored already to show, extended to within a few miles north of Jerusalem, there is nothing to war-rant the supposition that it ever reached so far south as the neighborhood of Bethlehem. Saul's route will be most conveniently discussed under the head of Saul; but the question of both his outward and his homeward journey, minutely as they are detailed, is beset with difficulties, which have been increased by the assumptions of the commentators. For instance, it is usually taken for granted that his father's house—and therefore the starting-point of his wanderings—was Gibeah. True, Saul himself, after he was king, lived at Gibeah; but the residence of Kish would appear to have been at Zela, where his family sepulchre was (2 Sam. xxi, 14); and of Zela no trace has yet been found. The A. V. has added to the difficulty by introducing the word "meet" in x, 3 as the translation of the term which is more accurately rendered "find" in the preceding verse. A. J. Dillmann accepts the "hill of God" at El-Ela; but with the notion of the Philistines? A notion of the Philistines is mentioned later in Saul's history (1 Sam. xiii, 3) as Geba, opposite Michmash; but this is three miles north of Gibeah of Saul, and does not at all agree with a situation near Bethlehem. The modern rendering of Saul's statement interprets the "hill of God" as "the place where the ark of God was," meaning Kirjath-jearim. There is no necessity whatever for supposing that Samuel was at Ramah when he anointed Saul. The name of the place where Samuel was at the time is not given in the sacred narrative, the language of which rather implies that it was not his regular abode. Cloudy says that he had gone out that day into the city to attend a sacrifice or a feast of the people (1 Sam. ix, 11, 12). The city was most probably Bethlehem, with the inhabitants of which Samuel was connected, being a descendant of Zuph, an Ephrathite, and was likely to have been invited to their feast; and the land of Zuph, into which Saul had come, must have been the region of Bethlehem. That Samuel was in the habit of visiting Bethlehem for the purpose of sacrificing is certain from 1 Sam. xvi, 1-5 (comp. xx, 29). We may therefore conclude that he had come at this time thither from Ramah of Benjamin.

On the whole, Ramathaim-zophim is as likely to have been the Ramah of Benjamin as any other.

Ramathem (Ραμαθέμ) v. r. Ραμαθεία; Josephus, 'Papadai [Ant. xiii, 4, 9]; Vulg. Ramatham), one of the three "governments" (vōnoi và τοποπλανί, which were added to Jubea by king Demetrius Nikator of the Kingdom of Samaria (1 Mace. iii, 84), the others were Aphierea and Lydda. It no doubt derived its name from a town of the name of Ramathaim, probably that renowned as the birthplace of Samuel the prophet. —Smith.

Ramathite (Heb. Ramathiti, רמאתית, an inhabitant of Ramath; Sept. Ραμαθητος, an epithet of the region of Shimei (q. v.) who was over the vineyards of king David (1 Chron. xxvii, 27). The name implies that he was native of a place called Ramath, but of the various Ramaths mentioned none is said to have been remarkable for vines; nor is there any tradition or other clue by which the particular Ramath to which this worthy belonged can be identified. See RAMATH.

Ramath-lehi (Heb. Ramath LEHI (Lehi, רמאתי, "hill of height" [see below]; Sept. Ραιμαθαλει, handheld instrument of mason). The origin of this name, which occurs only in Judg. xvi, 17, forms one of the most romantic episodes in Scripture history. Samson, having been bound with two new cords, was given up to the Philistines at a place called Lehi, a name which signifies "jawbone." When the enemy attacked him, he burst his bonds, seized the jawbone (lehi) of an ass that lay upon the ground, and with this old weapon slew a thousand of them. Then he threw away the jawbone, and, as a memorial of the event, and by a characteristic play upon the name, he called the place Ramath-lehi—that is, the lifting (or wounding?) of the jawbone; and so it is interpreted in the Vulgate and in the Sept. See SAMSON. But Geuenius has pointed out (Theseaur. p. 752 ὡτι to be consistent with this the vocal points should be altered, and the words become רמאתי, and that as they at present stand they are exactly parallel to Ramath-mispeh and Ramath-negev, and mean the "height of Lechi." If we met with a similar account in ordinary history, we should say that the name had already been Ramath-lehi, and that the writer of the narrative, with that fondness for parrhesia which distinguishes these ancient records, had indulged himself in connecting the name with a possible exclamation of his hero. But the fact of the positive statement in this case may make us hesitate in coming to such a conclusion in less authoritative records. For the topography of the place, see RAMATH.

Ramath-mispeh (Heb. Ramath ha-Mispeh, רמאתי מַסֶּפֶּה, high-place of the watch-tower; Sept. Σταυρος τουρανους, v. r. Παπαδιου τουρανους; Vulg. Ramath Mispheh). In defining the boundaries of the tribe of Gad, Joshua states that Moses gave them inheritance ...: "from Heshbon}

Rambach, Johann Jakob, was born at Halde Feb. 24, 1603, and died April 19, 1675, at Giessen, where he was professor of theology and first superintendent. During his comparatively short life he devoted himself to sacred studies, and produced some valuable works. Besides assisting Michaelis in the preparation of his Hebrew Bible, and of his Adnotationes in Hab. in Historiographia, he was the author of Institutiones Hermeneutica Suecorum, of which the eighth edition appeared in 1764: Esercitationes Herenianae, nec p. ii Institut. Herm. (Jena, 1728; 2d ed. 1741).—Comment. Herm. de Semus Mystici Critere (ibid. 1728, 1731). His other works are dogmatical and polemical.

Rambour, Abraham, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Sedan, the seat of a large French evangelical Christianity, about 1500, studied at the academy in that place, and closed his career there by his thesis De Potestate Ecclesia (1608, 8vo). After ordination, he became pastor of the parish of Francheval. In 1561 he was summoned to Paris, and preached there until 1629, when he made a professor in his alma mater. He held the chair of theology and Hebrew, and so greatly distinguished himself that he was four times honored with the rectorate of that excellent Protestant seminary of divinity. He died in 1631, and left his colleagues to mourn the loss of a great and good man. All his writings give proof of profound scholarship, and a more than usual mastery of ancient Bible lore. He was an excellent polemic, and what he wrote as such the Romanists always found unanswerable. We note here, of his writings of this character, De Christo Redemptore (Sedan, 1620, 4to), and Traite de l'Adoration des Images (ibid. 1633, 8vo). His sixty-one theses on different Biblical subjects have been inserted in the Thesaurus Theologic Sedanensis, vol. ii. See Haag, La France Protestant, s. v.—Hoef, Nost. Hist. Generale, s. v.

Rameau, Jean-Philippe, a very celebrated French musician who afterwards became a noted organist, was a native of Dijon. He was born in 1683. His father was also a musician, and was, at the time of Jean-Philippe's birth, organist in the Sainte-Chapelle of Dijon. He was an enthusiast in his love for music and taught his children the classical works long before they knew their letters. After travelling for some time creating everywhere great sensation by his wonderful musical genius, Jean-Philippe settled as organist of the cathedral at Clermont, in Auvergne. In middle life he removed to Paris, and became organist of Sainte-Croix de la Bretone. In 1722 he published his Traite de l'Harmone, which laid the basis of his future renown. He died in 1764. His compositions were mostly of a secular character. One of his operas, Samson, was never permitted to be put on the stage, because, as it was an action of the sacred musical drama, the German D'Alember were personal friends and warm admirers of Rameau. See Hoef, Nom. Hist. Generale, s. v.

Rammelgh, Bartolomeo, an Italian artist of note, usually called II Bagnacavallo, from the place of his birth (Bagnacavallo, on the road from Ravenna to Lugo), which took place in 1484, was a pupil of Raphael, and one of his principal assistants in the Vatican, and, after the death of his great master, carried the principles of his style to Bologna, and assisted to enlarge the character of that school. Raphael was his model and test of excellence, and he did not attempt to look beyond him. Though possessing less vigor than Giulio Romano or Perino del Vaga, Bagnacavallo acquired more of the peculiar grace of Raphael's style, especially in his infants, in which he was much admired by the great scholars of the Caracc. There are, or rather were, works by Bagnacavallo in the churches of San Michele in Bosco, San Martino, Santa Maria Maggiore, and Sant' Agostino agli Scapellatoi in Bologna. He died at Bologna in 1542. See Landi, Lire di Pittori; English Cyclop. s. v.; Spooner, Bong. Dict. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Rameses (Heb. Ramesses, רמאַסֶע, Sept. Ραμανιατος, or Ραμανος, v. r. Ραμασσων), or Rashaem (Heb. Raamases, רמאַסֶע, only in Exod. i. 11; Sept. Ραμασσων), the name of a city (Exod. i. 11; xii. 37; Numb. xxxiii. 3, 5) and district (Gen. xlvii. 11) in Lower Egypt. There can be no reasonable doubt that the same city is designated by the Rameses and Ramasses of the Hebrew text, and that this was the chief place of the land of Rameses, all the passages referring to the same region. The name is Egyptian, the same as that of several kings of the empire, of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties. In Egyptian it was written Ra-aweses or Ramaeses, it being doubtful whether the short vowel understood occurs twice or once. The first vowel is represented by a sign which usually corresponds to the Hebrew letter Nun in Egyptian transcriptions of Hebrew names, and Hebrew transcriptions of Egyptian names. The name means Son of the Sun, such titles being common with the ancient kings of Egypt, one of whom was probably the founder of the city. See EGYPT.

The first mention of Rameses is in the narrative of the settling by Joseph of his father and brothers in Egypt, where it is related that a possession was given them in the land of Ramasses (Gen. xlvii. 11). This land of Rameses (רמאַסֶע, רמאַסֶע) either corresponds to the land of Gozen, or was a district of it, more probably the former, as appears from a comparison of a parallel passage (ver. 6). The name next occurs as that of one of the two cities built for the Pharaoh who first oppressed the children of Israel. "And they built for Pharaoh treasure cities (רמאַסֶע, רמאַסֶע), Pithom and Ramesses" (Exod. i. 11). So in the A. V. The Sept., however, reads πως φηγαν, and the Vulg. urbes terrae Rameses, as if the root had been רמאַסֶע. The signification of the word רמאַסֶע is decided by its use for storehouses of corn, wine, and oil, which. Hezekiah had (2 Chron. xxxii. 28). We should therefore here read store-cities, which may have been the meaning of our translators. The name of Pithom indicates the region near Heliopolis, and therefore the neighborhood of Gozen, or that tract itself; and there can therefore be no doubt that Ra-aweses is "Rameses in the land of Gozen." In the narrative of the Exode we read of Rameses as the starting-point of the journey (Exod. xii. 37; see Numb. xxxiii. 3, 26). See GOSIANNES.

If, then, we suppose Rameses or Ramasses to have been the chief town of the land of Rameses, either Gozen itself or a district of it, we have to endeavor to determine its situation. Lepsius supposes that Abi-Khenen (See RAMSES) is on the west side of Rameses. He places the capital of the Pharaoh in the Sept. Hieropolis is placed in the land of Ramasses (אֲבִי׳ Πυρίνων πόλιν, ἐν γῆς Ῥαμασσῶν, οτί τῆς γῆς Ραμασσῶν), in a passage where the Hebrew only mentions "the land of Gozen" (Gen. xlvii. 28), and that there is a monolithic group at Abi-Khenen representing Tum and Ra, and between them Ramses II, who was probably there worshipped. There would seem, therefore, to be an indication of the situation of the district and city from this mention of Hieropolis, and the statue of Rameses might mark a place named after that king. It must, however, be observed (a) that the region of Hieropolis is a matter of great doubt, and that therefore we can scarcely take any proposed situation as an indication of that of Rameses; (8) that the land of Rameses may be that of Gothen, as already remarked, in which case the passage would not afford any more pre- cise indication of the position of the City Rameses than that it was in Gothen, as is evident from the account of the Exodus; and (c) that the mention of Heliopolis in the Sept. would seem to be a gloss. It is also neces- sary to consider the evidence in the Biblical narrative of the position of Rameses, which seems to point to the western part of the land of Gothen, since two full marches, and part at least of a third, brought the Isra- elites from this town to the Red Sea; and the narra- tive appears to indicate a route for the chief part of directly towards the sea. After the second day's journey they "encamped in Etham, in the edge of the wil- derness" (Exod. xiii. 29), and on the third day they appear to have turned back. If, however, Rameses was where Lep- sius places it, the route would have been almost wholly through the wilderness, and mainly along the tract bor- dering the Red Sea in a southerly direction, so that they would have turned almost at once. Even could it be proved that it was anciently called Rameses, the case would not be made out, for there is good reason to suppose that many cities in Egypt bore this name. Apart from the ancient evidence, we may mention that the Hebrew word ?Bnem?o or "Bnem" in the Hophi (the great province on the west of the Rosetta branch of the Nile), mentioned in the list of towns and villages of Egypt in De Sax's Abd-alatif, p. 604. It gave to its district the name of "Hof-Ren- mes", or Rameses. This "Hof" must not be con- founded with the "Hof" commonly known, which was in the district of Belbelie.-Smith. Of the old transla- tors, only Saadia and Pseudo-Jonathan point out a place for Rameses: the rest all preserve the name from the Hebrew (comp. Arab. of Erpes, On Exod. i, 11). Sadiad (Paschippus) and Tischendorf also (It. i, 176, and Dissert, de Isr. per Murei. Tob. Trans. p. 13 sq) makes to be Rameses, is elsewhere always elided (q. v.), and is expressly distinguished from Rameses by the Sept. (Exod. i, 11; here the Cod. Medi- olan, reads instead ?r zlt ?r, but this amounts to nothing against the Hebrew text). Others (as Hengstenberg, Bible, i, p. 1 sq; Ewald, 1st Greek, ii, 52 sq; Forbiger, Hortafa, 178) understand it as at a city on the Nile (comp. Sept. in Gen. xlviii. 28; where, however, the region of Rameses is spoken of, as above, and it is only asserted that He- liopolis lay in this district). To the same purpose is the view of Clericus, Lamarche (Osserv, Phil., ci, S. 411), who understands it as a city of the district of Rameses is Areop (Gr. Apo, ?Apo), in the Saitic, or, according to Bernard's plausible emendation, the Sethotic district (Ptolomey, iv, 5, 58), a place fortified by the king of the Kyklos (Josephus, Apion, i, 14, 26; comp. Michaelis, Sept. p. 2261). For Aratus (according to Manetho, in Josephus, Apion, i, 26) is the city of Typhon, and this is probably Heliopolis itself (comp. Rosenmuller, Alterth., iii, 261; Ewald, ii, 58) - Winer. The location of Rameses is doubtless indicated by the present Tell Rames, a quadrangular mound near Belbelie. See Red Sea, TAMMUGE OF.

An argument for determining under what dynasty the Exode happened has been founded on the name Rameses, which has been supposed to indicate a royal builder. See PHARAOH. We need only say that the last supposed to whose Rameses was reasonably as- signed (B.C. 1302) is inconsistent with the true date of the Exode (B.C. 1658), although we find a prince of the same name two centuries earlier, so that the place might have taken its name either from this prince, or a yet earlier king or prince Rameses. That the last supposed to whose Rameses was reasonably as- signed is in and identifiable by the occurrence of the name in Gen. xlviii. 11, as early as the time of Joseph (B.C. 1874). See CHRONO- LOGY.

Ramos, Francisco, a Roman Catholic prelate of Mexico, was born in the city of Mexico in 1825. He early decided upon the priesthood, and was educated at home and in Europe, where he became a great favorite with many distinguished ecclesiastics, and therefore en- joyed an honored position in the Curia. After holding several positions of responsibility, he became identified with the opposition against Suarez in politics, and prepared the way for the imperial rule under Maximilian. He was then bishop of Carasis. When the empire had been established, Rames became the emperor's almoner, and subsequently cabinet minister. He made himself an apostolic of Tamaulipas, Mexico. With the downfall of Maximilian, Rames's stay in Mexico became an im- possibility. He escaped to Texas, and lived in obscurity and sat at the San Juan until July 18, 1869.

Ramiides, the followers of Peter Ramus, a French logician known also as the "(successor) of the head of himself by his opposition to the philosophy of Aristotle. From the high estimation in which the Stoic was at that time held, it was accounted a heinous crime to con- vert his opinions; and Ramus, accordingly, was tried and con- demned as being guilty of subverting sound mora- lity and religion. The sole ground of his offence was that he had framed a system of logic at variance with that of Aristotle. "The attack which Ramus made," says the elder M'Crie, in his Life of Morello, "on the Peripatetic philosophy was direct, avowed, powerful, and persevering, and its effect was to possess an age of mind, acquaintance with ancient learning, an ardent love of truth, and invincible courage in maintaining it. He had applied himself with avidity to the study of the logic of Aristotle; and the result was a conviction that it was an instrument utterly unfit for discovering truth in any of the sciences, and answering no other purpose than that of scholastic wrangling and dilapidation. His conviction he communicated to the public; and, in spite of all the resistance made by ignorance and prejudice, he succeeded in bringing over a great part of the learn- ing of Europe to his views. What Luther was in the Church, Ramus was in the schools. He overthrew the infallibility of the Scholastic, and proclaimed the right of mankind to think for themselves in matters of phi- losophy — a right which he maintained with the most unalloyed success. He was regarded as a traitor to the blood. If Ramus had not shaken the authority of the long-venerated Organon of Aristotle, the world might not have seen the Novum Organum of Bacon. The faults of the Ramean system of dialectics have long been acknowledged; but it was an acknowledged master princi- ples of the logic of Aristotle; its distinctions often turn- ed more upon words than things; and the artificial method and uniform partitions which it prescribed in treating every subject were unnatural, and calculated to fetter, instead of forwarding, the mind in the discovery of truth. But it discarded many of the useless specula- tions and much of the unmeaning jargon respecting problematics, predicates, and topics which made so great a figure in the ancient logic. It incited upon its disciples the necessity of accuracy and order in ar- rangements and made them more exact in the science of logic. And as it advanced no claim to infallibility, submitted all its rules to the test of practical usefulness, and set the only legitimate end of the whole logical apparatus constantly before the eye of the student, its faults were soon discovered, and yielded readily to a more improved method, the foundations of which were established by the occurrence of the name in Gen. xlviii. 11, as early as the time of Joseph (B.C. 1874). See CHRONO-LOGY.
tensive favor and acceptance in various countries of Europe. He defined logic to be "are bene disserendi," and like Ciceron considered rhetoric an essential branch of it. It was introduced by Melancthon into Germany; it had supporters also in Italy; and even in France itself, where the logic of the Scaggyrie was held in veneration, the Royal Society, when Mathers was made a freeman, taught the doctrines of Ramus at Glasgow, and his work on logic passed through various editions in England before 1600. The same system was also known at this time in Switzerland, Holland, and Denmark. The most noteworthy of his later works are: Amant Talmes (Talon) and his two disciples, Thomasius Frigius, of Friebourg, and Franciscus Fabricius; Fr. Benchus, Wilh. Ad. Scribonius, and Gaspar Paffrad. There was also a class of ecclesiasts who tried to unite the method of Ramus with the Aristotelian logic of Melancthon. Among these, most noteworthy is Rudolph Goeclesius, who was of service to psychology, and whose pupil, Otto Casman, prosecuted his researches into psychological anthropology. To these may be added the poet John Milton. See Waddington, Ramus (Paris, 1835, 8vo), where a catalogue of Ramus's work is given; J. G. Aretin's Cantor, in Gelerz's Protest, Monatsblätter, Aug. 2, 1867.

Rammohun Roy (also known as Rammohan Roy), a celebrated Hindu convert to Western civilization and a liberal Christianity, was noted especially as the founder of a theistic school of thought among the Hindus, and in a certain sense may be pronounced the father of the modern Hindu Renaissance. He was born about 1774 at Bordman, in the province of Bengal, of Brahmin parentage of high caste. Reared like other youths of India, he enjoyed his elementary training at home, and was then placed under the care of the great masters of the Vedas and the Shastras, and, both at Patna and afterwards at Benares, acquired great proficiency in the sacred writings of Hindustan. His familiarity with the Arabic, Persian, and Sanscrit languages led him to an examination of the religious doctrines of the various sects of India, and finally to those of the West. He had evinced a sceptical turn of mind while yet a youth; and, once led away into these inquiries, he was soon forced to abandon the ground of his ancestry. But instead of accepting the inspired religion of the Christians, he sought the engraving of its ethics upon the old faith of India, and the restoration of Hindustan in its ancient purity, as the first step to this accomplishment. His parents unyieldingly opposed his purpose. His father sent him away and disinherit him. His mother concealed the superstitious basis of her faith from her son, and, at the same time, urged disciples of the Brahmins and superstition, and my interference with their custom of burning widows, and other pernicious practices, revived and increased their animosity against me; and, through their influence with my family, my father was again obliged to withdraw his countenance openly, though his limited pecuniary support was still continued to me." His father died in 1808, and he then published various books and pamphlets against the errors of the Brahmins, in the native and foreign languages. He says: "The ground which I took in all my controversies was, not the Brahmin, but the Brahminism of the time in a perverted form of it; and I endeavored to show that the idolatry of the Brahmins was contrary to the practice of their ancestors and to the principles of the ancient books and authorities which they professed to reverence and obey." In order to deprive him of caste, the Brahmins commenced a suit against him, which, after many years of litigation, was decided in his favor. Of the body of Hindu theology comprised in the Vedas there is an ancient extract called the Vedant, or the Resolution of all the Vedas, written in Sanscrit. Rammohun Roy translated it into Bengalee and Hindustanee, and afterwards published an astronomical translation. Of this abridgment he published an English translation in 1816. He afterwards published some of the principal chapters of the Vedas in Bengalee and English. He was at different times the proprietor or publisher of newspapers in the native languages, in which he expressed his opinion freely against abuses, political as well as religious, especially the burning of widows. He was also, in conjunction with other liberal Hindus, proprietor of the Bengal Herald, an English newspaper. His intimate association with the English, and the constant intercourse with European thought and familiarity with the West generally, led him at last to abandon the old ground entirely, and he brought before his countrymen the excellence of the moral theories of Christianity in 1820 in a work which he entitled Canticle of Peace and Happiness. It was written in English, Sanscrit, and Bengalee, and consists, besides selections from the New Testament, of such commentaries as a Hindoo apostate who abandoned heathenism for baid theory would be likely to produce. The divinity of Christ is ignored, and the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul, which is another portion of the Gospel held to be fundamental in orthodox Christianity; and the simple morality of Jesus is held up as a guide to happiness and peace. The position taken in this work not only encountered the opposition of his abandoned friends; his new association also felt grieved and disappointed, and, in the first hour of disappointment, severely rebuked his false theology. He was replied to, and a controversy opened on the great question of the Trinity. His Appeal, published not under his own name, but as coming from a 'friend of truth,' and, later, his treatise on the unity of God, entitled One Supreme Being, greatly modified his first position, and showed that he took, at least, the advanced ground of a Unitarian of the Old School, and, in the real sense, was not the young advocate of the Reform Bill who wrote that it "would, in its consequences, promote the welfare of England and her dependencies—nay, of the whole world." His society was universally courted in England. He was oppressed with invitations to attend social parties and political and ecclesiastical meetings. His anxiety to see everything and to please all led him to overtask himself to such an extent that his health, long failing, at last broke down. He died at Bristol, Sept. 27, 1833. The adverse circumstances of his birth were such that he might have easily have ended his life in idleness and superfluity, or, still more easily, might have perverted it to selfish ends; but he won his high position by an inflexible honesty of purpose and energy of will, and had he lived he might have become an important factor in the propagation of Christianity in the East. plus of Ramah [q. v.] ; Sept. usually 'Rama', but 'Pa-môd' in Ezra x, 29. 'Râmôd' in 2 Chron. xviii, 2, 3, 5, etc.), the name of three towns in Palestine, and also of one man.
1. (Sept. 'h'Râmôd.) One of the four Levitical cities of Issachar according to the catalogue in 1 Chron. (vi, 73).
In the parallel list in Josb. (xxi, 29, 29), among other variations, JARMUTH (q. v.) appears in place of Ramat. It seems impossible to decide which is the cor-correct reading; or whether, again, Rameth (q. v.), a town of Issachar, is distinct from them, or one and the same.
2. A city in the tribe of Gad (Deut. iv, 43; Josh. xx, 8; xxii, 38; 1 Chron. vi, 80), elsewhere called Ramoth-gilead (q. v.).
3. (Sept. 'Pâmôd.') A city in the tribe of Simeon ("South Ramoth," 1 Sam. xxx, 27). See RAMATH-NEGEB.
4. (Heb. text, Yirmoth', רבעוֹת, marg. re-'Ramatoh', רבעוֹת, and Ramoth ; Sept. 'Râmôd v. t. Mâmôd.) An Israelitish layman of the sons of Bani, who denounced his strange wife at Ezra's instigation (Exra x, 29). B.C. 458.
Ramoth-gilead (Heb. Ramoth Gilead, רבעוֹת הגלְלָ֖ד; Sept.
'Râmôd', רבעוֹד, and 'Râmôd Gâlûd': Ἱορμαθ-γαλαύδ, v. t. Râmôd; Josephus, Ἰορμαθαῖος; Vulg. Ramoth Gilead), the 'heights of Gilead;' or RAMOTH IN GILEAD (יִשְׂרָאֵל גִּלְּד; Sept. 'h'Râmôd iv Gâlûd, ' רומד גאלאד', v. t. Rêmôd; Rêmôd; Rûmôd; Vulg.
Ramoth in Gilead, Deut. iv, 43; Josh. xx, 8; xxii, 38;
1 Kings xxii, 3 [in the A. V. only], also written plemo, רבעוֹד', in 2 Chron. xxix, 5; and simply Ramah, רַמָּה, in 2 Kings viii, 29, and 2 Chron. xxii, 6), one of the chief cities of the tribe of Gad, on the east side of the Jordan. It was allotted to the Levites, and appointed a city of refuge (Deut. iv, 43; Josh. xx, 8). The latter fact would seem to indicate that it occupied a central position in the tribe, and also probably in the country assigned to the Israelites east of the Jordan. Ramoth played for a time an important part in Israelitish history, and was the scene of many a hard struggle. It was apparently a strong fortress, and considered the key of the country. Hence, when taken by the Syrians, the kings of Israel and Judah regarded it as a national loss, affecting both kingdoms, and they combined to drive out the common enemy (1 Kings xxii, 4 sq.). The united attack was unsuccessful, and the king of Israel was mortally wounded in the battle (xxii, 34-37). At a later period, apparently in the reign of Joram (2 Kings ix, 14, 15; comp. Josephus, Ant. ix, 6, 1). Ramoth was taken from the Syrians and held, notwithstanding all the efforts of Hazael to regain it. Joram, having been wounded in the struggle, left his army under the command of Jehu, and returned to Jezreel to be healed (2 Kings viii, 29). During his absence Jehu was anointed by order of Eliah (ix, 1, 2), and commissioned to ex-cecute vengeance on the wicked house of Ahab (ver. 7-10).
Leaving Ramoth, Jehu drove direct to Jezreel. The king, expecting news from the seat of war, had watchmen set on the towers, who saw his chariot approaching (ver. 16, 17). The rest of the story is well known.
See AHAZ; JOSHT. After this incident Ramoth-gilead appears no more in Jewish history.
The exact position of Ramoth is nowhere defined in Scripture. The name (Ramoth, "heights") would seem to indicate that it occupied a commanding position on the summit of the range of Gilead. In 1 Kings iv, 13, we read that when the districts of Solomon's purveyors were arranged, the son of Geber was stationed in Ra-moth, and had charge of all the cities of Jair the son of Manasseh, both in Gilead and Bashan; and these cities extended over the whole north-eastern section of Pale-tine beyond Jordan. Various opinions have been entertained regarding the site of this ancient city. Some would identify it with Jerafs, the old Roman Gerusa, whose ruins are the most magnificent and extensive east of the Jordan (see Benjamin of Tudela, by Asher);
but this is too far north, and Jerafs, besides, lies in a valley. Ewald would locate it at the village of Reiem among the mountains, five miles west of Jerafs (Georg.
Jer. iii, 500). For this there is no evidence whatever.
(Others locate it on a site bearing the name of Jerfil, exactly identical with the ancient Jerpho Gilead, which is mentioned by Seetzen (Reisen, March 11, 1809), and marked on his map (ibid. iv) and that of Van de Velde (1858) as four or five miles north of es-Salt. Schwarz (Filastin, p. 232 sq.) identifies this Ramoth with Kallaf el-Rub, which is situated on one of the highest points of the mountain of Gilead, not far from the Wady Rajib, and west of Ajlun. It is even now strongly fortified, and is visible at a great distance, especially to the northeast. The most probable opinion regarding the site of Ramoth is that which places it at the village of es-Salt.
This is indicated (a) by its position on the summit of a steep hill; (b) by its old ecclesiastical name Saltus Hieraticus, which appears to point to its original "accerdtal" and "holy" character, Ramoth having been both a Levitical city and a "city of refuge" (see Reland,

Re-Salt (Ramoth-gilead. From a photograph by the Editor.)

Palest. p. 213; (c) by the fact that about two miles to the north-west of es-Salt is the highest peak of the mountain-range still bearing the name Jebel Jilad, "Mount Gilad," and (d) by the statement of Eusebius that Ramoth-gilead lay in the fifteenth mile from Phil- adelphia. The situation is so limited and the soil so well-watered that it is not surprising to find traces of ancient dwellings of es-Salt from Rabbanah-Ammon (Onomast. s. v. "Ramoth"). The situation of es-Salt is strong and picturesque. The hill on which it stands is separated by deep ravines from the lofty mountains that encompass it, and its lower slopes are covered with vineyards, while the neighboring hill-sides and valleys abound with olive-groves. On the summit stands the castle, a rectangular building with towers at the corners, and defended by a deep moat hewn in the rock. The foundations appear to be Roman, if not earlier, but the upper walls are Saracenic. In the town itself, which contains some three thousand inhabitants, there are few remnants of antiquity. In the cliffs and ravines beneath it are great numbers of tombs and grottons (Handbook for Sinai and Palestine, p. 308). E-Salt is famous for its vineyards, and its raisins are esteemed the best in Palestin. They are carried in large quantities to Jerusalem (Burchhardt, Syræa, p. 349; Irvy and Mangles, Travels, p. 321; Ritter, Pala. u. Syr. p. 1121-38; Absulfeida, Tab. Syr. p. 92; Buckingham, Travels, p. 20). - Kitto. It is now the only inhabited place in the province of Belesa. It is supplied with a very strong and long fortification, and overawes the Bedawin by a garrison under the pasha of Damascus. Tristram says of it, "Ramoth- gilead must always have been the key of Gilad—at the head of the only easy road from the Jordan, opening immediately on the rich plateau of the interior, and with this isolated cone (the Osha) rising close above it, fortified from very early times, by art as well as by nature. Of the fortress only a tall fragment of wall remains, and a pointed archway, with a sort of large dial-plate, carved deeply in stone, surrounded by a rose-work decoration. It appears to be all modern Turkish work" (Land of Israel, p. 555). There is a plateau, he further tells us, on the road towards Jordan, and there probably the battle was fought where Ahab received his mortal wound—that being the only place where chariots could come into play. Winer and others identify Ramoth-gilead, Ramoth- mishpah, and Mizpah of Gilad. On this, see MIZPÁH;

Rampalle, Jeanne, a French female ascetic of note, was born Jan. 3, 1583, at Saint-Remy; displayed at an early age a tendency to a contemplative life; and when old enough to be admitted to a monastery, joined the convent at Avignon, until, in 1602, she determined to found a home of her own, and established it on the rule of St. Augustine. She then took the name Jeanne de Jésus, provided the constitution and such religious books as she believed her companions to be in need of, e.g. Retraite Spirituelle; Pratique de Dévotion, etc., also hymns and songs. She died July 6, 1636. See Vie de la Made Jeanne de Jésus (Avignon, 1751, 12mo). - Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. - Rampart (רַפָּא), chyf, Lam. ii, 8; Nah. iii, 8; elsewhere "trench," "bulwark," etc., a fortification or low wall surrounding and protecting a military trench (2 Sam. xxv. 15, 16; Isa. xxxvii. 1, etc.; comp. 1 Kings xi. 29; Psa. lxviii. 14). See ARMY; SHIELD. In the Talmud the Hebrew word is applied to the interior space surrounding the wall of the Temple (Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 198). See TEMPLE.

Rampelogo (or Rampeloco), Antonio, an Italian theologian, was born at Genoa and flourished in the second half of the 15th century. He was an Augustinian monk, and passed for a learned controversialist in his day. He was a favorite and intimate friend of the humanistic writers of Rome, Rampelogo was such an eloquent and persuasive disputant that he was called to the Council of Constance in order to convert the Hussites. He is the author of Repertorium Bibliicum, which was put in the Index by pope Clement VIII, but which, nevertheless, has often been printed (Ulm, 1476, fol.; Nuremb. 1481; Milan, 1494, etc.). See Oudin, De Script. Eccles. iii. 2910. - Hoeffer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Rampen, Hans, a Belgian divine, was born at Hui, Nov. 18, 1572. Studied successively at Cologne, Mayence, and Louvain, and taught Greek and philosophy at the college in Lyons. From 1620 to 1637 he taught exegesis of the Scriptures at the university, of which he was several times rector. He finally entered the practical work of the ministry, and secured a canonicate at Breda, but did not like this work, and returned to pedagogy as rector at St. Anne College. He died March 4, 1641. He published Commentarius in Quatuor Evangelia (Lond. 1631-41, 4 vols. 4to). - Hoef er, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ram's Horn (םז' תַּלּ, p'lid), Josh. vi. 4, 13; else-where "jubilee," "trumpet." The Hebrew word keren, i.e. oren, is also used for the crooked trumpet, a very ancient instrument. Sometimes it was made of the horns of rams, rams' horns, and other long and strong horns. It is probable that in later times they were made of metal. They were employed in war, and on solemn occasions (Exod. xix. 13). The latter word is also rendered cornet (Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10-15). See JUBILÉE; MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

Rama's Skins Dyed Red (רַמָּא הָנָּפְשָׁה יָרָדָה קְפָרַר, Josh. xxxv. 5, xxxv. 7). "oroth elam moqodamim, Sept. דֹּרְתֵּה יָרָדָה קְפָרַר פְּרֵרְתֵּה יָרָדָה קְפָרַר Vulg. pellea orientum rubricata) formed part of the materials that the Israelites were ordered to present as offerings for the making of the tabernacle (Exod. xxxv. 5), of which they served as the outer covering, those being under the rams' skins another covering of badgers' skins. See TABERNACLE. The words may be rendered "rams' skins," and then may be understood as the produce of the African aoudad, the Ovis tragelaphus of naturalists, whereof the bearded sheep are a domesticated race. The tragelaphus is a distinct species of sheep, having a short horn and the common species, and incontinent tars-pits. Its normal color is red, from bright chestnut to russochocolate, which last is the cause of the epithet purple being given to it by the poets. Dr. Harris thinks that the skins in question were tanned and colored crimson; for it is well known that when cloth formed of ram's wool, embossed or silver, was manufactured in the remotest ages in Libya, especially about the Tritonian Lake, where the original agin, or goat-skin breastplate of Jupiter and Minerva, was dyed bright red; and the Egyptians had most certainly red leather in use, for their antique paintings show harness-makers cutting it into strips for the collars of horses and furniture of chariots. It is much more probable, however, that the skins were those of the domestic breed of rams, which, as Rashi says, were dyed red after they were prepared." See RAM.

Ramsauer, Otto Heinrich David, a hymnist of the Reformed church, was born Nov. 19, 1829, at Oldenburg. Having made his preparatory studies at the gymnasia of his native place, he went, in 1848, to Zurich, in Switzerland, where the well-known Dr. J. P. Lange especially attracted him. While yet a student he wrote a collection of hymns, entitled Die Freude und die Freude der Kirche, which were edited by his teacher in 1851. In 1852 he was appointed vicar to dean Frei in Trugen, in Switzerland, whom he also succeeded in the pastorate. Three years afterwards, May 27, 1856, he died in the vigor of life. His publications are very fine, but have not yet found a place in any of our modern German hymn-books. See Koch, Geschichte des deutsche Kirchengeschichte, vii, 384; Zuchold, Bibliotheca Theologica, ii, 1027. (B. P.)

RAMASY, James P., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Canonsburg, Pa., Aug. 26, 1809. He graduated from Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., in 1827; prosecuted the study of theology under his venerable father, the late Rev. B. P. Ramasy, professor in the Theological Seminary of the Associate Church; was licensed to preach Aug. 27, 1838, by the Presbytery of Chartiers, and was ordained and installed pastor of the congregation of Deer Creek, New Bedford, Lawrence Co., Pa., July 1, 1835, by the Rev. D. M. Zwole. For about two years he continued faithfully testifying the Gospel of the grace of God among this people. But, his health failing, he subsequently located himself in New Wilmington, and for a time exercised his ministry there. He died Jan. 16, 1862. See Wilson, Penn. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 362. (J. L. S.)

Ramek, Hizzekiah S., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Chatham, Conn., Dec. 4, 1804. When ten years old, the death of his father left him to support himself. At sixteen he was converted, and commenced preaching at nineteen. He joined the Indiana Conference in 1822, and his successive appointments were Needham, Chelsea, Vt.; Craftsbury, Vt.; Isambur, Vt.; Tolland, Conn.; Windsor, Conn.; Tolland and Stafford, Manchester, Conn.; East Putnam, Conn.; Colchester, Conn.; East Putnam, Vernon, Conn.; Vernon and Windville, East Putnam, Conn. From 1823 to 1861, and again from 1868, impaired health prevented him from active work. He frequently spoke on temperance, of which he was an earnest, able advocate. He also served with marked ability in the Senate of the State of Connecticut, and filled various offices of responsibility and trust. Those conversant with his comparatively brief, active ministry speak of him as an able, eloquent preacher, and as equally an indefatigable pastor. In one locality his earnest advocacy of truth raised the anger of some, and they resolved his next visit to tar and feather him. It was no idle threat; the preparations were made; his brethren urged him not to go, but he was fearless, and went. The leader of the mob was awakened, converted, and became his fast friend. Mr. Rameek lived to see his views prevail among his fellows. He died Oct. 29, 1877. See Minutes of the Conference, 1878.

Ramsay, William B., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Rutherford Co., Tenn., March 12, 1831. He embraced religion in 1846, was licensed to preach in 1853, and was admitted on trial in the Memphis Conference in the fall of that year. His health failing in 1854, he entered Andrew College, from which he graduated in 1858. He was readmitted into the Conference the same year, granted a super-numerary relation in 1862, and in 1863 served in the Confederate army as chaplain for four months. He died of consumption, July, 1865. Mr. Ramsay was sweet-spirited, modest, and unassuming.—Minutes of Annual Conference of the Meth. Episc. Church, South, 1865, p. 594.

Ramsey, Petrus, also known by his original name Pierre de la Ramée, was the French philosopher of the 16th century who broke the fetters of barbarous scholastic thought and led men into the clear light of Platonist philosophy. He is usually called one of the founders of modern metaphysics, and this is certainly true in so far as Ramsey prepared the way for Descartes (q. v.) in philosophy, and for Pascal in theology, as we shall see presently. Ramsey was born of very humble parentage at Curb, a village in Vermandois, in 1515. He was obliged, at an early age, to leave the university and begin the humble duties of a shepherd. He loved the broad, open fields, but he loved books more. He studied as much as his humble associations could afford him the means of knowledge, and finally, satisfied that he could only get more away from home, left for the city. He went straight to the capital, though yet a youth of a little over eight. Homesickness compelled him to return to the paternal roof, and he walked home as he had walked to Paris, but only to return soon again to the city where he had found so much to learn, and before he was twelve he was once more at Paris. He could not enter school, being too young, as his parents were empty and his house empty. He hired out as a servant to a rich student at the College de Navarre, and, by devoting the day to his duties, obtained the night for study, and, under his master's guidance and help, made rapid progress. At the age of twenty-one he was ready to pass examination as if he had been within the walls of a college. The indomitably brave spirit of the boy had made a resolute man; and, unlike most students, he had not only learned the dicta of the savans, but had formed an opinion which was his own alone. In presenting himself for the degree of master, he came forward as the champion of reform in the schools of thought. He undertook to prove the then almost impious task that Aristotle was not infallible. He had gradually withdrawn from Aristotelianism as an authority, and pleaded now for the exercise of individual reason as against the "authority," which scholasticism imposed on all students. Enthusiast as he was, he was led to make the extravagant statement in his thesis that "all that Aristotle had said was false" (quoniam ab Aristoteleo dicta esse, commentu tuae). It speaks, however, a great deal for the ability of its author. Based on this occasion, and the studies in which he had engaged since his college days, although himself Aristotelian, were compelled to applaud him. Ramsay was immediately made a teacher in the College du Mans, and along with two learned friends opened a special class for reading the Greek and Latin authors, designed to combine the study of eloquence with that of philosophy. His audience was large, and his success as a teacher remarkable. He now turned his attention more particularly to the science of logic, which, in his usual adventurous spirit, he undertook to reform; and no one acquainted with his system is there that many of his ideas will not seem both rational and beneficial. His attempts excited much hostility among the Aristotelians; and when his treatise on the subject (Dialectica Partitionum) appeared in 1545, it was fiercely assailed by the doctors of the Sorbonne, the Academia of Geneva, the majority of the high-schools of the Continent, which had all, in alliance with the Church, given Aristotelianism the supreme rule. The University of Paris linked itself with jurists, counsellors, the king's ministers, the king himself, to crush the innovator. He was charged with impiety and sedition, and with a desire to overthrow all science and religion through the medium of an attack on Aristotle. On the report of an irregular tribunal appointed to consider the charges made against him, the king ordered his works to be suppressed, and forbade his teaching or writing against Aristotle or in the pain of corporal punishment. Ramsay now devoted himself exclusively to the study of mathematics, and to prepare an edition of Euclid. Cardinals Charles de Bourbon and Charles de Lorraine befriended him, and through their influence he was permitted to begin a course of lectures on rhetoric at the College de Presles, the plague having driven away numbers of students from Paris. He was finally, in 1545, named principal of this college, and the Sorbonne ineffectually endeavored to eject him on the ground of the royal prohibition decree. The decree was cancelled in 1550, through the influence of the cardinal de Lorraine. Ramsay raised the College de Presles from a condition of decay to the height of prosperity, and his reputation went over all the land as an educator as well as a philosopher. In 1561 he became of any service, to perform duties as a shepherd. He loved the broad, open fields, but he loved books more. He studied as much as his humble associations could afford him the means of knowledge, and finally, satisfied that he could only get more away from home, left for the city. Ramsay raised the College de Presles from a condition of decay to the height of prosperity, and his reputation went over all the land as an educator as well as a philosopher. In 1561 he became of any service, to perform duties as a shepherd. He loved the broad, open fields, but he loved books more. He studied as much as his humble associations could afford him the means of knowledge, and finally, satisfied that he could only get more away from home, left for the city. He went straight to the capital, though yet a youth of a little over eight.
and published three grammars successively—Greek, Latin, and French. He also mingled largely in the literary and scholastic disputes of the time, and on account of his bustling activity came under the satire of Kavelais. But though Ramus had innumerable adversaries, he might not have defied them all. That he was highly indignant against him, had his love of "repetition" not displayed itself in religion as well as in logic. In an evil hour (for his own comfort) he embraced Protestantism. He had long been suspected of a leaning that way, and, as we have seen, his intellect was by nature so far inclined towards the spirit of "authoricity," that he had for years secretly conformed to the practices of the Catholic cult, and it was only after cardinal Lorraine, in reply to the Conference of Poissy (1561), frankly admitted the abuses of the Church and the vices of the clergy that he ventured formally to abjure the old faith. The outbreak of the religious wars in France plunged him into the dangers of the time, and he finally perished in the fatal massacre of St. Bartholomew, August, 1572. It is believed that he was assassinated at the instigation of one of his most violent and persistent enemies, Chaperon, rector of the Collège de Pordes. See RAMISTA.

Rancé, Armand Jean le Bouthillier de, the well-known founder of the reformed order of La Trappe, was born Jan. 9, 1628, at Paris, where he was educated. Having taken his degree in the Sorbonne with great applause, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession, he was soon consecrated as a priest, and through the favor of cardinal Richelieu obtained more than one valuable benefice. He possessed as a young man a large fortune, and, notwithstanding his clerical character, was carried away by the gayety and dissipation of Parisian life. At a time, however, having embraced the cause of cardinal Rohan, he was imprisoned and finally forsook the favor of cardinal Mazarin; and being deeply moved by the death of a lady, the duchesse de Montbazon, to whom he was much attached, he withdrew altogether from Paris, resolved to distribute all his property among the poor, and to devote himself exclusively to the practice of pious and penitential works. Finally, he resigned all his preferments (of which, by the abusive practice of the period, he held several simultaneously) with the exception of the abbacy of La Trappe, to which convent he retired in 1652, with the intention of restoring the strict discipline of the religious rule of St. Benedict, in which he was a reformer, and over which he finally died, under the name of Martin. See TRAPIST.

He lived in this seclusion for thirty-three years, during which he published a large number of works, chiefly ascetical. He died Oct. 27, 1700. The only remarkable event of his literary life was his correspondence with Mabillon, in reply to his Études Monastiques, on the subject of the studies proper for the monastic life, which is entitled Traité de la Société des Découverts de l'État Monastique, and his controversy with Arnauld, which drew upon Rancé the hatred of the Jansenists. Rancé's works are numerous. In his youth he edited Analecta in one volume, octavo (Paris, 1639), with a dedication to cardinal Richelieu. His most noteworthy publications of his religious life, aside from those referred to, are: Exégèse sur la Règle de St.-Benoît (Paris, 1679, 2 vols. 4to); — Exégèse sur la Règle des Clérks-Chrétiens: Réflexions Morales sur les Quatre Evangélies (Paris, 1699, 12mo); — Conférences (on the same, 1699); — Réflexions sur la Vie et de la Mort de quelques Religieuses de la Trappe (1696, 4 vols. 12mo), and other works on monastic life and its reforms, etc. See Tillemont, Vie de Rancé (1719, 2 vols. 12mo); Marmollier, Vie (1703); Chateaubriand, Vie; Moreliri, Dict. Hist. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Encyclopédie, s. v.

Ranconnier, Jacques, a French Jesuit missionary, was born in 1600 in the county of Bourgogne, entered the novitiate of the Jesuits at the age of nineteen in Malines, and in 1625 went into the missionary work in Paraguay. He labored very successfully for seven years among the Itatines, whom he converted to Christianity, such as he had to offer, and died among this new people of the Gospel about 1640. He wrote frequent reports of the progress of his work in Paraguay, which are valuable contributions to the history of that South American country. See Sothoff, Bibl. Script. Jesu, p. 209; Charlevoix, Hist. de Paraguay, liv. viii.—Hoefer, Nouv. Encyclopédie, s. v. See also PARAGUAY.

Rand, Asa, an American Congregational divine, born at Rindge, N. H., Aug. 6, 1783, was educated at Dickinson College, where he took his degree in 1806, studied for the ministry, and was ordained, St. James' Church, Me., Jan. 18, 1809, as pastor of a Congregational Church. In 1822 he undertook the editorial care of the Christian Mirror at Portland, Me., and held this until 1825, when he took the principalship of a female seminary at Brookfield. In July, 1826, he accepted the editorship of the Boston Recorder, the Youth's Companion, and the Volunteer, the last a religious monthly. His health, which had for some time been failing, and had originally forced him from the ministry, finally compelled him also to leave the editorial chair, and he connected himself with a book-store and printing-office at Lowell, Mass. He finally went back to editorial work, and started the Lowell Observer, a weekly paper. In 1834 he again began to preach and address public audiences. He took up the slavery question and spoke in behalf of abolition in Maine and Massachusetts. From that point he preached in Pompey, N. Y., then became pastor of the Presbyterian church in Peterborough, N. Y., the home of the celebrated abolitionist Gerrit Smith. His last years Mr. Rand spent at Ashburnham, Mass., where he died Aug. 24, 1871. He was, while at Gorham, a frequent writer for the religious quotient during the struggle for the abolition of slavery, and after removing to Portland for 1814-18, and, besides occasional sermons, put in print a volume of Familiar Sermons:—A Review of Fanny's Sermons:—New Divinity Theology, a vindication of the same:—And a Letter to Dr. Lyman Beecher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vol. 1.

Rand, William, an American divine of colonial times, flourished in the first half of the 18th century. He was a student at Harvard University, class of 1721, then took holy orders, and became pastor at Sunderland, Mass., of a Congregational Church. In 1746 he removed, in the same capacity, to Kingston, N. Y., and died there in 1777. He published a separate sermon (1739-1757). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i. 886.

Randall, John, an English divine of note, was born about the middle of the 16th century. He was educated at Oxford University, in St. Mary's Hall, and Trinity College, and, after taking holy orders, he became rector of St. Andrew Hubbard, London, in 1599. He died in 1622. His published works are: Sermons on Matt. ii. 20, and on 1 Pet. ii. 11, 12 (1620-40);—Sermons on Rom. viii. 38, 39 (1623-40);—Nature of God and Christ (1624, 4to);—Great Mystery of Godliness (1624, 4to);—3d ed. (1640);—The Sacraments (1630, 4to);—Lectures on the Lord's Supper (1630, 4to); Twenty-nine Lectures of the Church (1631, 4to).

Randall, Matthew, a distinguished layman of the Baptist denomination, was born in London. His mercantile tastes led him into business operations, where he met with success. As a merchant, seen in the peace of 1783, he came to the United States, and took up his residence in Philadelphia, where he remained nearly all his life. For two or three years he lived in Burlington, N. J. While in this place he was baptized by Rev. Dr. Stoughton, and continued a member of the Burlington Church until his death, which took place in Philadelphia, Sept. 14, 1833. Dr. Baron Stow says of him that "he was highly esteemed in Christian circles, and his early familiarity with Robert Hall and Drs. Ryland and Stennett was of importance to him in matters of theology, as well as of taste and piety." He Randle, Richmond, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was originally a member of the Tennessee Conference, where he traveled five years. He was transferred in 1836 to the Arkansas Conference, which then included Louisiana west of the Mississippi River. Here he labored efficiently in stations and as presiding elder until the Conference of 1844, when he took a superannuated relation. In 1845 he became again a presiding elder, and so continued until 1861, serving as presiding elder for nine of these years. His sons having volunteered, he accompanied them to the war, soon to die. He was a man of deep and fervent piety, a true friend, a noble and useful preacher.—Minutes of Annual Conf. M. E. Church, South, 1861, p. 829.

Randle, Thomas Ware, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Stewart County, Tenn., April 13, 1815. He was admitted on trial in the Tennessee Conference in 1832, and continued to be an active and very efficient preacher until within two months of his death, which took place Aug. 26, 1859. He was several times a delegate to the General Conference. Mr. Randle was a Christian gentleman, modest and kind. His talents as a preacher were excellent, and his zeal knew no abatement.—Minutes of Annual Conf. M. E. Church, South, 1859, p. 116.

Randle, William, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Brantford, Ont., in September, 1867. He was converted when about thirty years of age, and was received on trial in the Tennessee Conference in 1841. He labored successfully until 1862, when he became superannuated. In 1866 he resumed active work as presiding elder on Cross Plains (on Cross Drain and Fountain Head) district, where he closed his life, May 2, 1869. He was a man of artless simplicity, true sincerity, and ardent zeal.—Minutes of Annual Conf. M. E. Church, South, 1869, p. 349.

Randolph, Francis, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1753. He was made prebend of Bristol in 1791, and died in 1831. He published, Letter to William Pitt on the State Trade (Lond. 1788, 8vo);—Scriptural Revision of Socinian Arguments in Answer to B. Hobhouse (1792, 8vo);—Correspondence with the Earl and Countess of Jersey (1796, 8vo);—Sermons on Adversity (1800, 8vo);—Sermons on Union (1803, 8vo);—State of the Nation (1806, 8vo);—Book of Job (from the Heb. by Elizabeth Smith, with Preface and Annotations by F. R. [Bath, 1810]).

Randolph, John, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Trigg County, Ky., May 3, 1829. He was converted in 1847 (or 1848), licensed to preach Nov. 25, 1850, and admitted on trial in the Louisville Conference in 1851. He filled twelve important fields of labor, continuing his work until the first Sunday in June, 1863. The staple of his preaching, as of all he did, was strong practical sense, sanctified and ordered efficient by deep piety.—Minutes of Annual Conf. M. E. Church, South, 1864, p. 481.

Randolph, Samuel B., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Tennessee. He entered the Tennessee Conference, from which he was transferred in 1869 to the Florida Conference. He enlisted in 1861 with the Lowndes Volunteers, and in three months fell a victim to disease at Camp Alleghany, Va., Aug. 29, 1861.—Minutes of Annual Conf. M. E. Church, South, 1861, p. 345.

Randolph, Thomas, an English divine of note, was born Aug. 30, 1701, at Canterbury, studied at Oxford University, where he was bursar, and after completing his theological course was in 1725 admitted to orders. He was taught for a while at Trin. College, and finally accepted two benefices in Kent. In 1748 he was elected president of Corpus Christi College, and later was given a professorship in theology (1768). He died at Oxford March 24, 1788. Dr. Thomas Randolph published a work on the Prophecies cited in the New Testament compared with the Hebrew Original and the Septuagint Version, which is exceeding rare and scarce. It presents, says Orme, "at one view the Heb. text, the Sept. version of it, and the quotation in the Greek New Test." The substance of the work is incorporated in Horne's Chapter on Quotations.

His son John, who was born July 6, 1748, and was educated at Oxford, became under his father's administration professor of Greek and theology, in 1799 made bishop of Oxford, was transferred to the see of Bangor in 1807, and in 1809 to that of London, where he died July 28, 1813. He was a member of the Royal Society of London, and published several sermons. See Gentleman's Magazine, lxxxiii, lxxxiv, and the biographical sketch prefixed to the collected writings of Thomas Randolph; Saunders, Evesnings with Sacred Poets, p. 251: Hook, Eccles. Bio!. viii, 191. (J. H. W.)

Ranew, Nathaniel, an English divine of the 17th century, noted as a Nonconformist who was ejected at the Restoration, was minister of Little Easheep, London, and his wife was the vicar of Tithebarn. He died in 1673, aged about seventy-two. He published, Solitude Improved by Divine Meditation, etc. (Lond. 1670, 8vo; last ed. 1847, 18mo), a very excellent work in the domain of practical theology:—Account concerning the Saint's Grace, etc., equally devout in spirit and excellent in composition and purpose.

Ranfaing, Marie Elisabeth de, a French lady, celebrated as the foundress of a religious order, and known under the name of Elizabeth of the Cross of Jesus, was born, Nov. 30, 1592, at Remiremont, of a noble Lorraine family, and was noted for her beauty. She was advanced to a man for whom she had not the shadow of affection, and therefore objected to wedlock: and when her parents persisted, she sought the retirement of the monastery. She was, however, brought back to society, and married M. Dubois, by whom she had three children. Her husband's death and other misfortunes led her to determine the founding of a religious community made up wholly of women reclaimed from a life of debauchery. The number of these women having increased, the prince bishop of Toul thought proper to convert them into a religious order, under the name of "Our Lady of Refuge." Mrs. Dubois and her three daughters took the dress belonging to the monastery Jan. 1, 1681. In 1684 Urban VIII gave his approval to this order. It extended over several of the cities of the realm, especially Avignon, Toulouse, Montpellier, and Béziers. They also survived the storm of revolution. The mother of Ranfaing died the death of a saint, Jan. 14, 1649. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio!. Générale, s. v.

Range is the rendering of two Heb. words of marked import, besides one or two in an ordinary sense.

Rangiereas (us), a French cardinal of mediæval times, was born, about 1535, in the diocese of Rheims. St. Bruno sent his pupil to that country as a tutor. One of his pupils was the Count of Châtillon, pope under the name of Urban II. Rangier went to take the habit of Benedictine, to Marmontiers, where he would probably have died in obscurity, had it not been for contention which arose among the monks, and Rangier of Sangerville, abbot of Tours. Rangier's abbot, Bernard of Saint-Venant, charged him with a mission to Rome, to maintain the rights of the abbey. The two ecclesiastics obtained a bull confirmed to their wishes; but Ranieri was kept at Rome by Urban II, who soon made him Archbishop of Reggio. In 1095 he went with the pope to France, and took part in the Council of Clermont, where the first crusade was decided upon. After the Council, Ranieri followed Urban II to Limoges and to Toulouse, and found himself in difficulties with the Archbishop of Marmoutiers. He soon after returned to his own diocese, and left it no more, excepting to assist Pascal II at the Council of Gutasta (1106). Ughelli speaks of him as a man of great power ("vir magus auctoritas").

Ranieri, Sr., an Italian ascetic of medi eval times, was born, in or about the year 1100, of a noble family of Pisa. In his youth, the Romish legends say, he had a vision: an eagle appeared to him, bearing in his beak a blazing light, and said, "I come from Jerusalem to enlighten the nations." But Ranieri refused to heed this call to a religious life, and gave himself up to pleasure. In the midst of his delights, however, he was one day surprised by the visit of a holy man, who persuaded him to desert his sinful life. Soon he embarked for Jerusalem, where he took off his own garments, and wore the schiaccian, or slave- shirt, ever after in token of his renunciation of the world. As a hermit in the deserts of Palestine, and during this time is reputed to have had numberless visions. On one occasion, he felt his vows of abstinence to be almost more than he could keep. He then had a vision of a golden vase, set with precious stones, and full of oil, pitch, and sulphur. These were set on fire, and none could quench the flames. Then there was put into his hands a small ewer of water; and when he turned on but a few drops, the fire was extinguished. This vision he believed to signify human passions by the pitch and sulphur, and the ewer of water, the water of temperance. He then determined to live on bread and water alone. His reverence for water was very great, and most of his miracles were performed through the use of it; so that he was called San Ranieri dell' Acqua. But when he carried with a host who cheated his guests by putting water in his wine, the saint did not hesitate to expose the fraud; for he revealed to all present the figure of Satan, sitting on one of the wine-casks, in the form of a huge cat with the wings of a bat. He did many miracles after his return to Pisa, and made converts by the sanctity of his life and example. He was buried (Jul. 17, 1161), many miraculous manifestations bore witness to his eminent holiness. All the bells in Pisa were spontaneously tolled; and the archbishop Villani, who had been sick in bed for two years, was cured to attend his funeral. At the moment in the funeral service when it was the custom to omit the Gloria in Excelsis, it was sung by a choir of angels above the altar; while the organ accompanied them without being played by any perceptible hands. The harmony of this chant was so exquisite that those who heard it thought they heard the angels. The gates were opened, the gates of the Duomo. After the plague in Pisa in 1356, the life of this saint was painted in the Campo Santo by Simone Memmi and Antonio Veneziano. These frescoes are most important in the history of art, and consist of eight scenes from the life of St. Ronieri: 1. His conversion; 2. His embarkation for Palestine; 3. He assumes the hermit's dress; 4. He has many temptations and visions in the desert; 5. He returns to Pisa; 6. He exposes the fraud of the innkeeper; 7. His death and funeral obsequies; 8. His miracles after death. —Mrs. Clement, Hand-book of Legendary and Mythological Art, a. v.

Ranken, Carl Ferdinand, doctor of theology and philology, was born at Hallstadt in Austria. Ranken was educated at the Gymnasium in Potsdam, where he took his degree in 1822. In 1824 he went to the University of Berlin, where he was influenced by the German and French schools of thought. He was later appointed to the chair of History at the Royal Reald-school, the Royal Elizabeth School, etc. He died March 29, 1876. Ranken was not only an able philologist and pedagogue, but also an excellent Christian, and took an active part in the inner mission and the work of the Bible Society. He wrote, Piau and Rnou des Johanneischen Evangelusen (Berne, 1854) — De Libris Historiae Nori Testamenti (ibid. 1855) — Clemente von Alexandri u. Origines als Interpreten der heiligen Schrift (ibid. 1861) — Das Kaiserspiel der Hebräer (ibid. 1863), etc. As a contributor to Piper's Evangelical Year-book, he wrote on the life of Andrew Baxtor, Charles Lutley Saxon Elders (viii, 139), Timothy (i, 70), Titus (i, 68); on Symphorianus (xix, 60), Perpetua and Felicitas (ix, 56), Saturninus (xx, 63), Aretas (xiii, 129), Eustatus (xvii, 96), Olaf Petersen (xix, 170), and contributed the German translation of Alonzo De' Alva's De la Vida de la Virgen to Piper's monograph on that hymn (xix, 28, 81). See Schneider, Theol. Jahrbuch (1877), p. 227; Literarischer Handvorscher (1876), p. 255. (B. P.)

Ranken, Friedrich Heinrich, doctor of theology and Ober-Conventiakalrat, brother of Carl Ferdinand, was born at Wiche in 1797. Having completed his studies, he labored in various parishes, was appointed to the chair of Theology at the University of Nuremburg, and then as dean at Thurnau. In 1840 he was appointed ordinary professor of dogmatics at the Erlangen University. In 1841 he was made counsellor of consistory at Bayreuth, and shortly afterwards he was appointed Ober-Conventiakalrat. Some years ago he retired from his different offices, and died Sept. 2, 1876. Of his writings we mention, Untersuchungen über den Pentateuch (Erlangen, 1834-40, 2 vols.): — Predigtet — Gebete über Worte der heil. Schrift (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1867): — The Institution of the Lord's Supper (ibid. xi, 81); — In Piper's Evangelische Year-book (viii, 106). See Fürst, Bibl. Ranken, David, a Scotch divine, was a member of the Episcopalian Church of Scotland at Edinburgh in the first half of the 18th century, and was an author of some repute. He published, Three Discourses (1 Pet. iii, 10, 14 (Edin. 1716, 8vo): — Three Discourses (1 Pet. iii, 14, 16 (1716, 8vo): — Sermon, 1 Pet. iii, 13-16 (Edin. 1715, 8vo): — Sermon, 1729, 8vo]: — Three Discourses (Phi. 17, 27, 28, 1729, 8vo).

Ranken, Thomas, a somewhat noted minister of the early Methodist Episcopal Church — one of Wesley's general assistants — was born in Dunbar, Scotland, 1738. He was religiously trained by his parents, and, at an early age, expressed the desire to become a minister of the Gospel. After the death of his father, he formed bad acquaintances, and gave himself up to worldly amusements. When he was seventeen years of age, Dunbar was visited by troops of dragoons, among whom were a number of devout Christians, who held meetings morning and evening. Young Ranken attended, and was deeply impressed. He afterwards removed to Edinburgh, where he came under the personal influence of Mr. Whitefield, and was decided to devote himself to Christian work. With this purpose in view, he prepared to enter the College at Elgin, under the circumstances, however, occurred which prevented his taking a collegiate course; and, by the advice of a friend, he sailed for America, to engage in a commercial enterprise. Wearying of this life, he was glad to find himself once more in Scotland, living in a more congenial religious atmosphere. Shortly after his return, he met a Methodist minister, who saw the unsettled condition of his mind, and invited Ranken to visit, with him, the different Methodist societies of the North. He was even prevailed upon to preach, though he consented with great reluctance, and was so dissatisfied with himself that he retired to 19. 20. 21. 22. it no more. While in this state of mind, he listened to the preaching of Wesley, and from that time had the most admiring admiration for him. After a great spiritual conflict, he sought Wesley, and related his experience of the two preceding years. Wesley advised him to persevere in his religious work, and so removed his doubts that he expressed himself willing to be known everywhere "as a poor, despised Methodist preacher."

He was regularly appointed in 1761 to the Northumberland District, and in the following year to the Sheffield Circuit. At the next Conference he was appointed to the Devonshire Circuit. In 1764 he became assistant-preacher in the Cornwall Circuit. In 1765 he was appointed to spend a part of the year in the Newcastle and a part in the Dale Circuit. In 1766 he was stationed upon the Euphrosine Circuit, and, upon request of the people, was returned the second year. In 1768 he was appointed to labor again in the west of Cornwall. In 1769 he was sent to the London and Sussex Circuit, and also travelled with John Wesley on his preaching tours through the kingdom. In 1770 he accompanied Wesley to the west of England, and everywhere their labors met with great success. In 1771 he was once more stationed with his friends in Cornwall. While at the conference held at Leeds, he met captain Webb, lately arrived from America. Wesley had become greatly dissatisfied with the management of the American mission, and, when the question came up before the conference, intimated his desire to send Rankin as general superintendent. The appointment was made; and he, together with George Shadford, sailed for America in 1773. Soon after his arrival, Rankin called a conference, the first ever held in America, July 4, 1773, at Philadelphia. Asbury had been previously appointed and sent over as the general assistant of the societies in America; but as Rankin had travelled several years longer, he took precedence over Asbury when he reached there. Besides, the displeasure of Wesley against the American work had probably led him to select for the place a man who could claim superiority over Asbury. Rankin, therefore, held the place of "general assistant" while here, and presided at the conferences which were convened while he was in America. He was stationed at New York and Philadelphia alternately, and remained in this country until 1778, when he again appears in England. He visited, while here, many of the churches then within the territory of the Pennsylvania Conference, and would probably have remained, had not the Revolutionary struggle made his stay ill-advised. Immediately after his return to England, he was stationed at London, where he lived two years. In 1783 he asked to be made a superannuate; and after this date he lived quietly in the English metropolis until his death, May 17, 1818.

He was buried in City Road, near Wesley. He was a truly pious man, but too stern and uncompromising to succeed as a leader; and he failed in this country to be of any especial service to Asbury, whom he was intended to assist. He never wavered in difficulties and trials, and showed a truly heroic spirit in the hour of need. His irregular education had probably as much to do with his inconsistencies of conduct as his natural propensity to the severe aspects of life. See Stevens, Hist of Methodists, i, 291; and his Hist of the M. E. Ch. (see Index). 1838. 2 vols. (2nd ed. 1839.), i. 77-124; Wakeley, Lost Chapters (see Index). Surrogate, Annals of the Amor. Pilgrim, vii, 25-54.

Ransom (רמיס, pidyon), Exod. xxix, 30; "redemption," Ps. xlix, 8; or רמיס, pidyon, "redemption," Numn. iii, 49, 51; elsewhere הָרָם, הָרָם, נֵדָד, נֵדָד, to act the part of God (q. v.); נְוֵדָד, נְוֵדָד, a price paid to recover a person or thing from one who detains that person or thing in captivity. Hence prisoners of war or slaves are said to be ransomed when they are liberated in exchange for a valuable consideration. (Col. 3, 22.) A captive may be ransomed or exchanged in compensation for the party is his ransome; but the word ransome is more extensively taken in Scripture. A man is said to ransom his life (Exod. xxx, 30); that is, to substitute a sum of money instead of his life as the penalty of certain offences (Exod. xxx, 12; Job xxxvi, 18). The poll-tax of half a shekel for every Hebrew was deemed the ransome, or atonement money, and was declared to be a heave-offering to Jehovah, to propitiate for their lives (Exod. xxx, 12). See also, in the light of the Levitical and trespases-offering might be regarded as communications or ransoms (Lev. iv, 1-5; v, 1-19).

In like manner, our Blessed Lord is said to give himself a ransome (or all (1 TIM. ii, 6; Matt. xx, 23; Mark x, 45)—a substitute for them, bearing sufferings in their stead, undergoing that penalty which would otherwise attach to them (Rom. iii, 21; 7 Cor. i, 30; Eph. i, 7; iv, 30; Heb. ix, 18). See Redemption.

Ranters is (1) one of the many names by which the Presbyterians designated the most advanced of the mystical radicals of the Cromwellian period. They were Antinomian heretics, and were probably related to the Quakers (q. v.), to whom they are often compared. In Rome's Hibernica, the Ranters are described as making an open profession of lewdness and irreligion; as holding that God, angels, devils, heaven, hell, etc., are fictions and fables; that Moses, John the Baptist, and our Lord were impostors; that praying and preaching are useless; that all ministry has come to an end; and that sin is a mere imagination. He says that in their letters the Ranters endeavored to be strangely profane and blasphemous, uttering atheistical imprecations; and he gives a specimen which quite befits his words. He also alleges that they sanctioned and practiced community of women (ed. 1655, p. 287). Much the same account, also, is given a few years later by Pagitt (Herediography [ed. 1662], p. 259, 294). Baxter also writes respecting them: I have myself letters written from Abington, where, among both soldiers and people, this contagion did then prevail, full of horrid oaths and curses, and blasphemy not fit to be repeated by the tongue and pen of man: and this all uttered as the effect of knowledge and a part of their religion, in a fanatic strain, and fathered on the Spirit of God" (Of Ranting, p. 77). The following passage is found in a Life of Bunyan, added to an imitation of his work which is called The Third Part of the Pilgrim's Progress: "About this time" (in Bunyan's early life), "a very large liberty being given as to conscience, there started up a sort of loose, profane wretches, afterwards called Ranters and Sweet Singers, pretending themselves safe from, or being incapable of, sinning; though, indeed, they were the debauchers and profligate wretches living in their bawdy meetings and revels. For, fancying themselves in Adam's state, as he was in Paradise before the fall, they would strip themselves, both men and women, and so catch as catch could; and to it they went, to satter their lust under pretence of increasing and multiplying" (An Account of the Life and Actions of Mr. John Bunyan, etc. [London, 1692], p. 22). (See Wettenstrom, Revolutions-Kirchen Englanda [Leips. 1868], p. 107 sqq.; Blunt, Dict. of Sects, a. v., 2. (2) In recent times—since 1826—the name of "Ranters" has been given to those Primitive Methodists who separated from the main body of Methodists, and were distinguished by their unusual physical denominations.

Raclo de Flax, a French monastic, flourished near the middle of the 12th century. It is difficult to enumerate definitely his works. He is undoubtedly the author of Commentaire sur le Léxicographe (Cologne, 1536, ed.). The authors of the Literary History of France claim for him a discourse abridged from the Work of Six Days, which is found in a manuscript in the King's Library, No. 647; also a Commentary on the Proverbs, of which they mention a copy at Cambridge in the library of Pembroke College; and a Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul. They add that Raoul de Flaix, who was ordained on Nahum and the Apocalypse.
These glossaries on Nahum and the Apocalypse exist, but under the name of Master Raoul (Magistris Radulti), in a volume of Clairvaux, which is numbered on page 227 in the library of Troyes. But this is a mishap, as a number of such glossaries on the Liber Historiae. A commentary on the Song of Songs, published in some ancient editions of Gregory the Great,
had been attributed to Raoul de Flaix. Lelong and Mabillon having proved that this work is by Robert de Tombelaine, abbot of St. Vign de Bayeux, the authors of the Liber Historiae have thought it necessary, in consequence, to strike the Canticle of Canticles from the list of sacred books annotated by our Raoul. But in that they appear to be mistaken. In fact, the volume of Clairvaux which is to-day preserved in the library of the abbey has these glossaries on the Apocalypse and Nahum, glossaries on the Canticles entirely different from those which have been published under the name of Gregory and restored to the abbey Robert.
Sanders mentions also, among the works of Raoul de Flaix, a theological summation—Summarium de sola Patristica, De laur Cor và Orbis Coráns—works of which we have no other account.—Hoefer, Nov. B. Génerale, s. v.

Raoul de St. Trond, a Belgian monastic, was born at Mouter-sur-Sambre, in the diocese of Liege, study at Liege, and then entered the Benedictine orer at Lix-&-Chapelle. He was there made sacristan, master of a school, and grand provost. He was a very devout man; and, dissatisfied with the lax condition of the monastery at Aix, he left for St. Trond, where, after two years, he was made prior, and introduced the reforms of the Cluniacs. In 1108 he was elected abbot, and took part in the quarrel for the pope which agitated the Liege diocese and resolved in its division.
He went twice to Rome, where he was warmly received and had much influence. He died March 6, 1158.
He wrote: Oratio Abbatum Traditionem Ord. Sancti Ben-decit, a Liber Archiepiscopatus Splicerniae—Discepcionem Puerorum in Monasterio, in Mabillon's Annecta:—Contra Simoniaca, Lib. VII, which is still in MS. See

Raoul de Vaucelle, a French monastic, was born prior of Engion, in Burgundy, and was admitted in the first half of the 12th century, first a monk at Clairvaux, and later as abbot of the new monastery founded at Vaucelle, in the diocese of Cambray, by St. Bernard.
He was renowned both for his magnificence and for his charity. In the time of want, he supported for months as many as five thousand pavers. Charles de Visch, in his Bibliotheca Cisterciensis, counts him among the learned writers of his time, and attributes to him
many works; but, according to Pastoret, these works are lost. He died in 1152.—Hoefer, Nov. B. Générale, s. v.

Rapaport, Salomo Judah Löw, a noted Jewish scholar, was born at Lemberg, in Austrian Galicia, in 1790. He first attracted attention among his congenialous by notes to a Talmudical work of his father-in-law, and subsequently rose to the highest rank among the Hebrew writers of the age by critical-historical sketches of Sandia Gaon, Rabbi Nathan, Hai Gaon, the poet Eleazar Kalir, etc., in the Bikkure ha-Itoim (Vienna, 1828-31); by contributions to the Kerem Chened (Vienna and Prague, 1863-48); and by numerous other dissertations in Hebrew and German, inserted in various other publications. He translated into Hebrew verse Racine's Esther, entitled דובשת (Vien-nan, 1827). He also published, under the title of מ"ש §", a linguistic and archaeological lexicon, of which only one part has as yet appeared (Prague, 1852).
Boetticher continued Racinet's work on the Bikkure ha-Itoim by the cipher מ"ש. Having officiated for some time as rabbi at Tarnopol, he was elected, in 1840, to fill a similar office at Prague, where he died, Oct. 16, 1867.
Besides his numerous essays, which are to be found in the different reviews and periodicals, he published, in 1861, a criticism on Frankel's Darke ha-Mishna, entidled דיבר סדרה סדנה חלק א. In the Litera-

Rafer, William H., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Western Pennsylvania, Sept. 24, 1793. He was first brought to notice by the service he rendered his country in the second war with England. In 1819 he was received on trial in the Ohio Conference, and remained in the effective ranks for about thirty years. He served the Church in various positions, and always acceptably. He was honored by being sent to several general conferences, and had many admirers and friends. He died while travelling with bishop Morris to Aurora, Ind., Feb. 11, 1852. Mr. Raper was a profound theologian, of amiable social qualities, fearless and earnest.—Minutes of Annual Conf. of M. E.

Rapha (Heb. Raphah, רפא, as in 1 Chron. viii, 2), or Raphah (Heb. Raphah', רפוא, as in 2 Sam. xxii, 16, meaning giant [q. v.], as translated in 1 Chron. xx,
4, 6, 8; 2 Sam. xxii, 16, 18, 20, 22; Sept. Rapach, v. r.
R.papai and Rapah, the name of two men. See also Raper.

1. The last of the five sons of Benjamin, son of Jacob (1 Chron. viii, 2, "Rapha"). B.C. post 1237.
The name does not occur in the original register of the family (Gen. xli, 21); but at Num. xiii, 3, Rapha was the name of the father of the person chosen from Benjamin to spy out the land of Canaan, as having a name, or something similar, to have belonged to the tribe. Rapha is apparently but a variation of the name of Rosh (q. v.). See Jacob.

2. The son of Binea, and father of Elessah, eight in lineal descent from David's friend Jonathan (1 Chron. vi, 37, "Raphah"). B.C. post 1000. He is called Raphaiah in 1 Chron. ix, 43.

Raphaël (Avrappheh = רפאים, "the divine healer")
"one of the seven holy angels which ... go in and out before the glory of the Holy One" (Tob. xii, 15). Acccordance to another Jewish tradition, Raphael was one of the four angels that stood round the throne of God
—Michael, Uriel, Gabriel, Raphael. His place is said to have been behind the throne, by the standard of Ephraim (comp. Num. ii, 18); and his name was interpreted as foreshadowing the healing of the schism of Jeroboam, who arose from that tribe (1 Kings xi, 26; see Buxtorf, Lex. Rabb. p. 47). In Tobit he appears as the guide and counsellor of Tobias. By his help, Sara was delivered from her plague (Tob. vi, 16, 17), and Tobit from his blindness (xi, 7, 8). In the book of Enoch he appears as "the angel of the spirits of men" (xx, 3; comp. Dillmann, ad loc.). His symbolic character in the apocryphal narrative is clearly indicated when he is described himself as "Azarias the son of Ananiah" (Tob RAPHAEL

v. 12), the messenger of the Lord's help, springing from the Lord's mercy. See Tobit. The name, in its Heb. form, occurs in 1 Chron. xxvi, 7 as that of a man. See Raphael.

Raphael, Sr. (Lat. Sanctus Raphael; Ital. San Raffaello; Fr., St. Raphael; Germ., Der Heilige Raphael), the same with the above, is considered the guardian angel of humanity. He was sent to warn Adam of the danger of sin, and its unhappy consequences.

"Be strong, live happy, and love! but first of all live, for love is to obey, and his great command. Take heed lest passion swerve Thy judgment to do aught which else free-will would not till it is built, Thine and of all thy beings... The woe or woe in thee is placed. Beware!" (Milton).

He was the herald who bore to the shepherds the good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people. He is especially the protector of the young, the pilgrim, and the traveler. In the apocryphal romance, his watchful care of the young Tobias during his eventful journey is typical of his benignity and loving consideration towards those whom he protects. His countenance is represented as full of benignity. Devotional pictures portray him dressed as a pilgrim, with sandals; his hair and beard and a diadem or a sash, the staff in his hand, and a wallet, or panetierre, hung to his belt. As a guardian spirit, he bears the sword and a small case, or vase, containing the "flabby charm" (Tob. vi. 6) against evil spirits. As guardian angel, he usually leads Tobias. In painting, in the St. Raphael, in the Kunsthistorisches Museum, represents him as the guardian angel of a bishop who appears as a votary below. St. Raphael is commemorated in the Church of Rome on Sept. 12.

Raphael, or Raffaello Santi or Sanzio, called by his countrymen "Il Divino," i.e., the "Divine," is ranked by almost universal opinion as the greatest of painters. He was created by the Academies of the learned and of the nobles of the glories of art and form and color. He was born at Urbino April 6, 1483. In 1497, on the death of his father, Giovanni Santi, who was his first instructor, he was placed under Pietro Perugino (q. v.), the most distinguished painter of the period, who was then engaged on important works in the city of Perugia. The profound feeling, the mystic ecstasy, which characterized the Umbrian school while yet under the leadership of its founder, the Perugian, and before it degenerated into the coarse fatuity at which Michael Angelo sneered, took possession of the soul of Raphael. He soon acquired a wonderful facility of execution. He showed such great talent that Perugino employed him on his own works; and so well did he perform his task that it is difficult now to separate the work of the master from that of the pupil. In 1504 Raphael visited Florence, and improved his style by studying composition and expression in the works of Masaccio, the sweet and perfect modelling of Leonardo da Vinci, and color and effect in those of Fra Bartolommeo. He seems to have lived in Florence till 1508, when he went to Rome, on the invitation of pope Julius II. His celebrated frescos in the Vatican, and numerous important works, were then commenced. Julius died in 1513, but his successor, Leo X, continued Raphael's services, and kept his great powers constantly in exercise. Raphael and Rome are synonymous terms in the history of Italian art of the 16th century. Though Michael Angelo labored at Rome, and the impress of his genius is everywhere in the avenues of Roman art, yet by common consent the Roman school of art owes its origin and life to Raphael. It became the grandest of all the Italian schools of painting, and gave concrete reality to the aspirations and longings of his predecessors by carrying art to a height all but ultimate. The Roman school combined the virility and boldness of Flanders with the delicacy; and the devotional sweetness of Umbria and Siena; in short, all Italian excellences Raphael gathered in his Roman creation; but with the artist who gave it birth the school alone can be identified, and, illustrous as were many of its pupils, his own death marks the fading hour of the Roman school. Of all the Roman painters, it was Raphael alone who in his art works not less to be the measure and frame of all the knowledge, philosophy, and poetry of his time than witnesses to his genius and vouchers for what we call the immortality of his fame. He achieved the labors of a demigod; his successors wrought like mere men. Raphael had scarcely reached his prime when he was struck down by an attack of fever on the anniversary of his birth, in 1520. "The works of Raphael are generally divided into three classes: his first style, when under the influence of Perugino's manner; his second, when he painted in Florence from 1504 to 1508; and his third style, which is distinguished in the works executed by him after he settled in Rome. Each of these styles has its devoted admirers. Those who incline to art employed in the service of religion prefer the first manner, as embodying purity and religious feeling. His last manner, perfected for classical learning and art was strongly excited by the discovery of numerous valuable works of the classic period, is held by many connoisseurs as correctly embodying the highest art; while his middle, or Florentine, style is admired by some as exemplifying his powers freed from the restraint of the rules which they deem the right and easy way to build a Perugino, and untaught by the conventionalism of classic art. In all these different styles he has left works of great excellence. The Coronation of the Virgin, in the gallery of the Vatican, and the Sposalizio, or Marriage of the Virgin, in the Beata Vergine gallery at Milan, which is an improved version of Perugino's Sposalizio, painted in 1495 for the cathedral of Perugia, belong to the first period. The St. Catherine, in the National Gallery, London; the Entombment, in the Barghese Gallery, Rome; La Belle Jardiniere, in the Louvre, belong to his second period. The Sistine Chapel, at Bologna; the Madonna di San Sisto, at Dresden; the Caritosa, at Hampton Court; the Transfiguration, and all the Vatican frescos, except Theology, or the Dispute on the Sacrament, the first he executed on his arrival from Florence, are in his third manner, or that which peculiarly marks the Roman school in its highest development" (Chambers). The two great Madonnas of Raphael are the Madonna della Sedia and the Madonna di San Sisto. The former, which is at the Piti Palace, Florence, is, according to many, the best of all the same painter who have failed to obtain universal popularity. But as a representation of the Roman school of the Holy Family, nothing could be more beautifully expressed. We see only a happy mother bending over the lovely child in the intimacy of her affectionate home. The child is seen from the picture with a strange glance of conscious superiority. The Madonna di San Sisto cannot be described, and no copies of it, photographs or engravings, can convey a correct idea. In this work Raphael reached the perfection of his type, humanity raised to divinity. The grace and beauty of the Virgin seem apart from and above earthly associations. In the solemn, thoughtful, yet childlike expression of the infant Christ there is the foreshadowing of the sufferer, the Saviour, and the Judge. It is singular that this painting, until 1837, when the picture was cleaned, were the innumerable heads of angels surrounding the Virgin discovered. The Transfiguration, which was Raphael's last and also his greatest work, he left unfinished. It seems as if he had labored while already on the way to heaven, and we do not wonder that Vasari, in his ecstasy of joy over this work by human hands, with so much of heavenly skill in it, is led to exclaim, "Whosoever shall desire to see in what manner Christ transformed into the Godhead should be represented, let him come and behold it in this painting." The heavenly and the devotional, the common consent placed at the head of his art, not because he excelled all others in every department of painting, but because no other artist has ever possessed the vari-

RAPPISTS

Rapha'hu (Heb. 'Rapha', רפָּחִיק) a name given to Judah (Judith 1:1) as that of the son of Gideon and father of Acitho in the ancestry of Judith. It is evidently כַּנַּח = Rapha' (q. v.).

Rapha'hu. He was a German rabbi, born at Stockholm, Sweden, in September, 1798. He was educated at the Jewish college in Copenhagen, and was so precocious that in his thirteenth year he received the Hebrew degree of Chalib Socius (analogous to the B.A. degree of the English university), which entitled him to the honorable designation of Rabbi. In 1812 he went to England, where he remained for six years, devoting himself to the study of the English language. The next six years he spent in travelling and studying in Europe. On his return to England in 1819 he married a Jewish lady and took up his residence in London. In 1832 he gave some lectures on the Biblical poetry of the Hebrews, and in 1834 commenced the publication of the Hebrew Review, the first Jewish publication ever issued in England. When this had reached its seventh volume, ill-health compelled him to relinquish it. In 1840 he acted as secretary of Dr. Solomon Herschel, the chief rabbi of London, and in 1841 he was appointed rabbi preacher of the synagogue at Birmingham, England. He was also the chief instrument in founding the first national school in England for the Jews, of which he acted as headmaster. In 1849, having previously received the degree of Ph.D. from the University of Giessen, he was called to New York as rabbi preacher to the Anglo-German congregation Etem Judah, where he died, June 23, 1866. His main work is his Post-Biblical History of the Jews (N. Y. 1866; 2 vols.), and the translation of Eighteen Treatises of the Mishna, in connection with D. A. de Sola (2d ed. London, 1845). Besides, he translated into English from the works of Maimonides, Albo, and Wesely, which translations are found in the Hebrew Review. (S. M. A.)

Raphael, Georg, a German Lutheran divine of some note, who was born in 1673, and was later the superintendent of Lüneburg. He died in 1740. He was one of the best commentators of that class of exegetists who have attempted to illustrate the Bible from classic authors. His Annotationes in Sacram Scripturam contains historical illustrations of some passages in the Old Testament, and philological explanations in many of the New, chiefly taken from Xenophon, Polybius, Arrian, and Herodotus. He also edited the Greek homilies of Chrysostom, with a Latin translation and notes, annexed to the edition of the Annotations published by Levison (1747, 2 vols. 8vo). See Ortelius, Bibliotheek, Bibl. s. v.; Home, Intro. to the Scriptures.

Rapha'nu (Rapha'nu; Alex. and Josephus, Rapha'nu; Peskitio, Rapphon), a city of Galilee, under the walls of which Judas Macabeus defeated Timotheus (1 Macc. vi, 37 only). It appears to have stood on the eastern side of an important wady, and at no great distance from the modern Shihertah. It may have been identical with Rapha, which is mentioned by Pliny (Nat. Hist. vi, 16) as one of the cities of the Decapolis, but with no specification of its position. Nor is there anything in the narrative of 1 Macc. (ch. ii), or in Josephus (Ant. xii, 8, 3) to enable us to decide whether the torrent in question is the Hieromax, the Zerka, or any other. In Kiepert's map, accompanying Wattenstein's Hauran, etc. (1860), a place named Er-Rafe is marked, on the east of Wady Hrân, one of the branches of the Wady Mandur, and close to the great road leading to Samâneh, which last has some claim to be identified with Acre of the Bible. In our present ignorance of the district this can only be taken as mere conjecture. If Er-Rafe be Rapha, we should expect to find large ruins.

Rapha'nu (Rapho'nu, רפה'נו). See Rapha'hu.

Rap'nu (Rapha'nu, רפה'נו), eldest; Sept. 'Rap'nu) father of Paltib, which latter was sent with Caleb and Joshua as a spy into the promised land; representing the tribe of Benjamin (Num. xiii, 9). B.C. ante 1650.

Rappists, also known as Harmonists, are a Christian people living in community of goods, and in celibate state, at Economy, Pa., in the vicinity of Pittsburgh, and hence also not infrequently called Economites. They owe their origin to George Rapp, a German, who was born at Iptingen, in Württemberg, in October, 1757, of humble parentage, and had enjoyed only a moderate education. Having always been a devout Christian and a close reader of the Bible, he became convinced that the lifeless condition of the churches was ill in accord with the vital character of apostolic Christianity, and in 1787 began to preach among those of like mind with himself. In the little sect he thus formed, he was then living. The clergy resented this interference with their office, and both Rapp and his adherents were visited with all manner of persecution, and denounced as "Separatists", a name which they bore ever after while in Germany, and which they themselves accepted gladly. In the course of six years the Rappists numbered not less than 800 families, scattered over a distance of twenty miles from the home of George Rapp. The consistent manner in which the Separatists bore themselves gave little opportunity for positive accusation, yet they were constantly annoyed with the clergy and congregation, and in 1808 finally determined to end all strife by emigration to a land of freedom. Rapp, accompanied by his son and two other followers, came to this country in advance to select a home for all like-minded with himself. In the course of one year 600 persons came over, and were settled by Rapp in different parts of Pennsylvania and Maryland, where he himself, with several skilful mechanics and ingenious persons, prepared for a family home for the Separatists the land he had purchased in Butler County, Pa., along the Conquesting Creek, Feb. 15, 1803, the future home of Rapp's town with Rapp, and such others as had followed thither, organized themselves formally and solemnly into the "Harmony Society," agreeing then to throw all their possessions into a common fund, to adopt a uniform and simple dress and style of house, to keep thereunto all things in common, and to labor for the common good of the whole body. Later in the spring they were joined by fifty additional families; and thus they finally began with what must have made up all together less than 750 men, women, and children. But these were all accustomed to labor, and with such a leader as Rapp then was—in the prime of life, only forty-eight years old, of robust frame and sound health, with great perseverance, enterprise, and executive ability, and remarkable common-sense—the society got on very successfully. In the first year they erected between forty and fifty log-houses, a church and school-house, a grist-mill, a barn, and some workshops, and cleared 150 acres of land. In the following year they cleared 400 acres more, and built a saw-mill and a tannery, and planted a small vineyard. The distillery was also a part of this year's building—a thing not so very strange in those days of general tendency towards strong drink among the laboring classes—though they themselves indulged only very moderately in any intoxicating liquors. Rapp was the general in all departments. He planned for all, he was the ablest tanner, carpenter, and mason, and the best keeper.

Until 1807 community of goods and the hope of the approach of the millennial reign alone distinguished the Rappists from other Christians; but in that year an unusual religious awakening led them to determine upon a still closer life with God, and, having become persuaded that it was the duty of the followers of Jesus to conform their lives to the teachings of Christ and his apostles, the Rappists, in the spirit of the apostle Paul, that "He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord; but he that is married careth for the things of the world, how he may please his wife," forsook marriage, and since that time celibacy is one of the distinguishing tenets of the Harmonists, and they that have wives do truly live "as though they had none." A member writing on the constancy of the Rappists to the decision of 1807, in 1862, says, "Convinced of the truth and holiness of our purpose, we voluntarily and unanimously adopted celibacy, altogether from religious motives, in order to withdraw our love entirely from the lusts of the flesh, which, with the help of God and much prayer and spiritual warfare, we have succeeded well in doing now for fifty years."

In 1814 the Rappists determined to remove to Indiana, and the unanimity of feeling which prevailed when the council so ordered proved how well organized and how sincere they all were. They settled in the Wabash Valley, on a tract of 27,000 acres, and called the place "New Harmony"—a property which, in 1824, they sold to Robert Owen (q.v.), who settled upon it his New Lanark colony—and bought and removed to the property they still hold at Economy. For some years the society was in a most flourishing condition, and, by frequent accessions from Germany, maintained their ground remarkably until 1831, when an adventurer—Bernhard Muller by right name, who had assumed the title Graf, or count, Maximilian de Leon, and had gathered a following of visionary Germans—joined the Economists, and sowed the seed of discord. In 1835, determined upon a dissolution, and 250 members—about one third—the Economy for Philadelphia, where they settled, to break up in a short time, and finally to furnish a small quota to the Bethel Community in Missouri. Thereafter the Economists no more sought for accession. But they have steadily increased in wealth in spite of all their removals and numerical decadence; and now own, besides their village and estate at Economy, much property in other places, having a large interest in coal-mines and oil-wells, and railroads and manufactories, and controlling at Beaver Falls the coal conveyed by the Union_Stream to the United States.

At present the town of Economy contains about 120 houses, very regularly built, and it is well drained and paved. It has water led from a reservoir in the hills, abundant shade-trees, a church, an assembly hall, a store, and different factories. The house which the society built for their founder is a sort of museum, and serves also as a pleasure resort to all that remain of the Rappists, who, according to Nordhoff, number about 110 persons, most of whom are aged, and none under forty, with some 85 adopted children, and an equal number living there with parents who are hired laborers in the number of 100. The whole population is German, and German is the medium of communication on the street and in the church, as well as in the houses. Most of the men wear for week-day dress blue "roundabouts," like boys' spencers, and pantaloons of the same color and broad-brimmed hats; and are full of quiet dignity and genuine politeness. On Sunday the men wear long coats. The women are dressed quite as oddly as the men, with their short loose gowns, kerchiefs across the shoulders, and caps that run up to the top of a high back-corn. The predominant color is blue. Harmony was founded by Rapp and his associates when they came to this country, and continued from choice by them and their successors.

The agreement, or articles of association, under which the "Harmony Society" was formed in 1805, and which has been signed by all members henceforward, reads as follows:

"Whereas, by the favor of Divine Providence, an association or community has been formed by George Rapp and many others upon the basis of Christian fellowship, the principles whereof, being faithfully derived from the Sacred Scriptures, include the government of the patriarchal ages, unchangeable, which consist of the days of the apostles, and wherein the simple object sought is to approximate, so far as human imperfections may allow, to the ideal of the will of God, we, from the love of those affections and the practice of those virtues which are essential to the happiness of man in time and throughout eternity, and whose essential life is the spirit of love, in order that our effort as a community be clearly understood, and that the rights, privileges, and duties of every individual therein should be regulated as to prevent mistreatment on the one hand, and contention or disagreement on the other;" Thereby it is known to all whom it may concern that we, the undersigned, citizens of the county of Beaver, in the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, do severally and distinctly, each for himself, or, mutatis mutandis, agree and, to and with the said George Rapp and his associates:

"Article 1. We, the undersigned, for ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, do hereby give, grant, and forever convey to the said George Rapp and his associates, and to their heirs and assigns, all our property, real, personal, and mixed, wheresoever situated, testaments, goods and chattels, money or debts due to us, jointly or severally, in possession, in remainder, or in reversion, or vested, or unvested, whatsoever and wherefore, to be exempt from all right of evasion, qualification, or reserve, as a free gift or donation, for the benefit and use of the said association or community, and we will, and do hereby consent and set the same, not only by the said George Rapp and his associates, but by all others who now or hereafter may be under our control.

"Article 2. We do further covenant and agree to and with the said George Rapp and his associates that we will severally submit faithfully to the constitution and by-laws of said community, and will at all times manifest a ready and cheerful obedience towards those who are or may be appointed by the superintendents of the said association, or by any of the apprentices, as superintendents of the said association, and to place the said property at the full disposal of the superintendents of the said community without reserve and prejudice.

"Article 3. If, contrary to our expectation, it should so happen that we could not render the faithful obedience aforesaid, and should be induced from that or any other cause to withdraw from the said association, then in such case we do expressly covenant and agree to and with the said George Rapp and his associates that we will never claim or demand, either for ourselves, our children, or their heirs, or representatives, nor, directly or indirectly, any compensation, wages, or reward whatever for our or their labor or services rendered to the said community, or to any of the said superintendents; but whatever we receive jointly or severally shall or may do, all shall be held and considered as compensation for services voluntary and gratuitous.

"Article 4. In consideration of the premises, the said George Rapp and his associates do, by these presents, adopt the constitution and by-laws jointly and severally, as the special conditions of the said community, whereby each of them obtains the privilege of being present at all religious meetings, and of receiving not only for themselves, but also for their children and families, all such instructions in church and school as may be reasonably required, or, both for their temporal good and for their eternal felicity.

"Article 5. The said George Rapp and his associates further agree to supply the undersigned severally with all the necessities of life, as clothing, meal, drink, lodging, etc., for themselves and their families. And this provision is not a substitute for their days of health and strength, but when any of them shall become sick, infirm, or otherwise unable to work, they shall be allowed as before, together with such medicine, care, attendance, and consolation as their situation may reasonably demand. And if at any time any of them shall become members of the association, the father or mother of a family should die or be otherwise separated from the community, the husband or wife shall not be left orphans or desolate, but shall be provided with rights and means to support life as long as they remain in the association, as well in sickness as in health, and to such extent as their circumstances may require.

"Article 6. And if it should so happen, as above mentioned, that any of the undersigned should violate or their agreement, or that we would or could not, under any circumstances, conform to the laws and regulations of the Church or the community, and for the violation of other cause should be excluded from the said association, then the said George Rapp and his associates agree to refund to him or them the value of all such property as he or they may have brought into the community,
In compliance with the first article of this agreement, the said value to be refunded without interest, in one, two, or three annual installments, as the said George Rapp and his assigns may direct. On account of the said indemnity in the event of their separation, so withdrawing themselves were poor, and brought nothing to the land; and from the time that they do part openly and regularly, they shall receive a donation in money, according to the length of their stay and to their contribution as such, and they may require, in the judgment of the superintendents of the association.

In 1818 a book in which was recorded the amount of property contributed by each member to the general fund and was destroyed. In 1836 a change was made in the formal constitution or agreement above quoted, in the following words:

"1. The sixth article [in regard to refunding] is entirely annulled and made void, as if it had never existed; all others to remain in full force as heretofore. 2. All the property of the society, real, personal, and mixed, in law or equity, and however controlled or acquired, shall be deemed, now and forever, joint and indivisible stock. Each individual is to be considered to have finally and irrevocably parted with all his former contributions, whether in lands, goods, money, or labor; and the same rule shall apply to all future contributions, whether they may be in new stock or any individual withdraw from the society or depart this life, whether he, in the one case, or not the representative of the other, shall be entitled to any demand or account of said contributions, or to claim anything from the society as a matter of right. But it shall be left absolutely in the discretion of the society to decide whether any, and if any, what allowance shall be made to such member or his representative as a donation."

On the death of "Father" Rapp, Aug. 7, 1847, the arrearage due him by the widow, her son, and two trustees and seven elders were put in office to perform all the duties and assume all the authority which their founder had relinquished with his life.

Under this simple constitution the Harmony Society has flourished for sixty-nine years; nor has its life been threatened by disagreements, except in the case of the count de Leon's intrigue. It has suffered three or four lawsuits from members who had left it, but in every case the courts have decided for the society, after elaborate, and in some cases long-continued trials. It has always lived in peace and friendship with its neighbors.

Its real estate and other property was, from the foundation until his death in 1834, held in the name of Frederick (Reichert) Rapp, who was an excellent business man, and conducted all its dealings with the outside world, and had charge of its temporalities generally, as well as of its spiritual business. Upon Frederick Rapp's death the society formally and unanimously imposed upon father Rapp the care of the temporal as well as the spiritual affairs of the little commonwealth, placing in his name the title to all their property. But, as has been seen, this interference with his spiritual functions, and as, besides, he was then growing old, being in 1834 seventy-seven years of age, he appointed as his helpers and subagents two members, R. L. Baker and J. Henri, the latter of whom is still, with Mr. Jonathan Lenz, the head of the society, Mr. Baker having died several years ago.

The theological belief of the Harmony Society naturally crystallized under the preaching and during the life of father Rapp. It has some features of German mysticism, grafted upon a practical application of the Christian dogmatics and theory. At the foundation of all lies a strong determination to make the preparation of their souls or spirits for the future life the pre-eminent business of life, and to obey in the strictest and most literal manner what they believe to be the will of God, as revealed and declared by Jesus Christ. In the following paragraphs is given a brief summary of what may be called their creed:

1. They hold that Adam was created "in the likeness of God"; that he was a dual being, containing within his own person both humanity and divinity, the latter being the deific element in him. In confirmation of this, the text (Gen. 1, 26, 27), "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion;" and the created man, in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them; which they hold to denote that both the Creator and the first created were of this dual nature. They believe that had Adam been content to remain in his original state, he would have increased without the help of a female, bringing forth new beings like himself to replenish the earth.

2. But Adam, being so constituted, withdrew from God separated from his body the female part, and gave it him according to his desire, and therein they believe consisted the fall of man.

3. From this they deduce that the celestial state is more pleasing to God; that in the renewed world man will be restored to that which he did like and Adam and Adam will live.

4. They hold that the coming of Christ and the renovation of the world are near at hand. This nearness of the millennium is a cardinal point of doctrine with them; and father Rapp firmly believed that he would live to see it. He wished that the residence of Christ in the world were to remain in the same language as the one which they held to be the last of the great commandments of Jesus, as the latter had delivered these with their lives. The truth was belief in him that it led some of his followers to loudly fancy that father Rapp would not die in the midst of his coming; and with touching story of the old man that when he felt death upon him, at the age of ninety, he said, "If I did not know that the dear Lord meant I should present you all to him, I should think my last moments come." These were indeed his last words. To be in constant readiness for the reappearance of Christ is one of the aims of the society; nor have its members ever faltered in the faith that this great event is about to come.

5. Jesus they hold to have been born "in the likeness of the Father;" that is to say, a dual being, as Adam before the fall.

6. They hold that Jesus taught and commanded a community of goods, and refer to the examples of the early Christians as Christ's church.

7. They believe in the ultimate redemption and salvation of all mankind; they hold that only such dwellers in the celestial life, and otherwise conform to what they understand to be the commandments of Jesus, will come at last into the bright and glorious companionship of Christ and his companions; that offenders will undergo a probation for purification.

8. They respect and detest what is commonly called "Spiritualism."

Raratongan Version. Raratonga, the largest and most important of the Harveys Islands, between 300 and 600 miles west of Tahiti, and discovered by the Rev. John Williams, of the London Missionary Society, in 1823, is inhabited by about 3500 inhabitants. The language of Raratonga is spoken throughout the other six islands of the Harvey group; and although it has a close affinity to the Tahitian and Marquesian idioms, yet a distinct version of the Scriptures was found necessary. The Raratongan version, mainly devoted on Rev. John Williams, and in 1830 the Gospel of St. John and the Epistle to the Galatians were printed. In 1836 an edition of 5000 copies of the New Testament was published in London by the British and Foreign Bible Society. In 1844 a second edition of the Acts was printed, and in 1851 the entire Scriptures were published by the same society, having availed itself of the Raratongan version prepared by Mr. Buzaecott, a missionary at Raratonga. Of the first edition 5000 copies were printed, but in 1854 a subsequent edition of 5000 copies was necessary, which is still in course of circulation. The good effects of reading this version, and the change thereby produced in the state and character of the natives of Raratonga, have been thus described by the martyred Williams: "In 1825 I found them all heathen; in 1834 they were entire Christians. At the former period I found them with idols and marae; these, in 1834, were destroyed. I found them without a written language, and left them reading in their own tongue the wonderful works of God." Rashba (S. רשק), the initials of Rabbi Solomon ben-Abraham Ibo-Sdrat, a native of Barcelona, who was born about 1280, and died in 1349. He was under Nachmaniades (q.v.), and in 1280 he was acknowledged president of the school of Barcelona, and a kind of oracle with the East and the West, with which he maintained an extensive correspondence. He was an acute thinker, an enemy to all equivocation, and an advocate of the open truth. He wrote a large collec-RASHABAM (ר"ת של רבי סימון בן-זאמה ד"ר), the initials of RASHI. Simon ben Zemach Duran, who belonged to a family which, originally of Provence, was then settled in Spain, and ultimately emigrated to Algiers. In the persecution that took place in 1351, Simon Duran, with a number of his coreligionists, emigrated to Algiers, where, from his profound learning, he obtained the title of The Rabbi of the Great. Here he succeeded Ribash (q. v.), who also had fled from Spain, as the head of all the Jewish congregations, which position he occupied until his death, in 1444. He wrote various works, some so violent against Christianity and Moslems that they have very probably been suppressed or lost. One of the works that have been preserved is ה"㬪, The Lover of the Just, a commentary on Job, with an introduction on the principles upon which it should be expounded; edited by José Malcaho (Venice, 1590), and reprinted in Frankforter's Rabbinic Bible: — ר"ו, Shield of the Fathers, a great theological work, in three parts, treating of different subjects, especially of the fundamental articles of religion; to be found in the Bodleian and in the Oppenheimer collection. The second part is a commentary on the tractate Abodah (Livorno, 1762; Leipzig, 1855), while the third part, which is very severe against Christians and Turks, has been published by his son under the title שליחוה ר"ו, Bow and Shield. He was also famed for his medical abilities, and practiced with great reputation in Aragon. His profound erudition in Rabbinical lore, philosophy, and medicine procured for him the esteem of the learned Israelis of his time. His learned solutions of upwards of 700 points of law are consulted at the present day. See Forst, Bibl. Rashi (ר' שמעון בן-חמד), formed of the initials of Rabbi Solomon Leizakhi, or Isaak ben Isaac, the great Talmudic scholar and commentator, founder of the Germano-French school of Biblical exegesis, and succesor to Rashi, called Jarchi, was born in 1040 at Troyes, in Champagne, and not at Luneul, in Perigianon. He was the grandson of a thorough Talmudist, and thus from his youth imbued an insatiable desire to become master of Rabbinic lore. He was a pupil of R. Isaac ben-Jakar, the greatest pupil of Rabbi Gershon (q. v.). As to the extent of his scholarly institutions, it is a matter of dispute. Basanone terms him one of the most learned of the rabbis, while Jost takes a low estimate of his scientific and literary attainments. However this may be, he was certainly a man of great erudition in the ordinary learning of his people, the Holy Scriptures, and the whole cycle of Talmudic lore. He spent much of his life in wandering from place to place, visiting the different seats of learning in Italy, Greece, Palestine, Egypt, Persia, and Germany, giving lectures and maintaining disputations in the Jewish schools. At Wiesbaden they may still show, as they could a few years ago, the chamber where he taught a class of students, and the stone seat hewn in the wall from which he dispensed his instructions. His famous lectures secured for him the distinction of Rabbi in the ordinary meaning of that term (ד"нятиית, i.e., Interpreter of the Law), which is the name of one of Haman's sons (Esther ix, 7). Under the title שליחוה ר"ל, E. Le wrote a commentary on thirty treaties of the Talmud, printed in the editions.

of that work, and the several books separately in many different editions; they are also published with supercommentaries and glossaries: — מִדְרַשִּׁים לֶאֱדוֹנִי יִבְשָׂם, תּוֹעַבָּה יִבְשָׂם, א Kas par excellence, in all the Rashi commentaries. The following are the most important and generally accessible:

1. A Commentary on the Mishnah, condemned from that on the Talmud (Berlin, 1716).— A Commentary on the 100 Chapters of the Bereshith Rabba (Venice, 1566).— A collection of Halachoth, entitled מִדְרַשׁ מִשְׁנָה (Constant, 1802);— penitential hymns, or Selichoth. Besides these, and other works too many to be enumerated, he also wrote on the Old Testament, under the general title of מִדְרַשׁ וַיְסֹרֵךְ, מִדְרַשׁ וַיְסֹרֵךְ, מִדְרַשׁ וַיְסֹרֵךְ, מִדְרַשׁ וַיְסֹרֵךְ, which, for the most part, is found in the Rabbinic Bibles. They have also been published in different portions in numerous editions, with and without the text, especially that on the Pentateuch, a good and critical edition of which has been edited by Dr. A. Berliner (Berlin, 1866). Various parts have also been translated into Latin by different authors, but more extensively by B. J. F. Breithaupt, 1719—1721;—b. J. F. Breithaupt, 1719;— P. J. Prophets, Job, and Psalms, 1719), who also accompanied the translation with a very learned and extensive annotation, besides giving the supercommentaries entitled מִדְרַשׁ לְיִשְׂרָאֵל by Löwe (Prague, 1758), and מִדְרַשׁ לְיִשְׂרָאֵל by Sabatiai Bassi. Rashi, having been long engaged in writing annotations on the Talmud, formed the habit of composing after the manner of that work, in an extreme concise and obscure style, and with the frequent use of its terms and idioms. He condensed as much as possible, and endeavored to give the precise original thought by a natural method of interpretation, by explaining the grammar of the passage, by paraphrasing its meaning, by supplying the wanting members of elliptical forms, and by sometimes rendering a word or expression into the French of that day. At the same time, he did not fail to bring forward the received interpretations of the Talmud and Midrashim, and to point out the support which the Rabbinical Halachoth receive from such passages as he thought available. The rigid brevity of his style, which often leaves the reader in perplexity as to his meaning, has served to call forth a number of supercommentaries on his works by several Jewish authors, which are enumerated in his works. In the Rashi, he combines the traditional exposition contained in the Talmud and Midrashim with a simple and liberal explanation of the text, and does not see any inconsistency in putting side by side with the Halachic and Haggadic interpretation of the Talmud, which are sometimes at variance with tradition. Though unacquainted with the labors of the Spanish grammarians and expositors, he incorporates in his commentaries all the lore contained in the cabbalistic Jewish tradi-

Raskolnikis (that is, Schismatics), the general name used to denote the various sects which have dissented from the Russian Orthodox Church. The first body that left the Russian Church was the sect of the Strigolniks, which arose in the 14th century. Another more remarkable sect appeared in the latter part of the 15th century in the republic of Novgorod, teaching that Judaism was the true religion, and that Christianity was a usurpation because the Messiah was not yet born. The chief promoters of this sect were two priests called Dionysius and Alexius, the protopapas of the cathedral of Novgorod, together with one named Gabriel, and a layman of high rank. These secret Jews conformed outwardly to the Greek Church with so great strictness that they were permitted to be exempted from some saints, and one of them, Zosimus by name, was raised in, 1490, to the dignity of archbishop of Moscow, and thus became head of the Russian Church. By the open profession of adherence to the Establishment Church of the country, the members of this Jewish, or rather Judaizing, sect managed to conceal their principles from public notice; but they were at length dragged to light by Gennadius, bishop of Novgorod, who accused them of having altered their images of the saints; of having planted these images in the places of the real saint; of having cut off their teeth; of having spit upon the cross, blasphemed Christ and the Virgin, and denied a future life. The grand duke ordered a synod to be convened at Moscow on Oct. 17, 1490, to consider these charges; and although several of the members wished to examine the accused by torture, they were obliged to examine themselves with anathematizing and imprisoning them. Those, however, who were sent back to Novgorod were more harshly treated. "Attired," says count Krainski, "in fantastic dresses intended to represent demons, and having their heads covered with high caps of bark, bearing the inscription, 'This is Satan's militia,' they were placed backwards on horses, by order of the bishop, and paraded through the streets of the town, exposed to the insults of the populace. They had after wards their caps burned upon their heads, and were confined in a prison—a barbarous treatment, undoubtedly, but still humane considering the age, and compared to that which the heretics received during that as well as the following century in Western Europe."

The metropolitan Zosimus, finding that the sect to which he secretly belonged was now no longer heretical, resigned his dignity in 1494, and retired into a convent. About the beginning of the 16th century, a number of these Judaizing sectarians fled to Germany and Lithuania, and several others who remained in Russia were burned alive. The sect is said to have existed about this time; but there is still found, even at the present day, a sect of the Raskolnikis which observes several of the Mosaic rites, and are called Sabbnitici, or Saturday-men, because they observe the Jewish instead of the Christian Sabbath.

Soon after the Reformation, though Protestant doctrine was of none unknown in Russia, a sect of heretical Raskolnikis arose who began to teach that there were no sacraments, and that the belief in the divinity of Christ, the ordinances of the councils, and the holiness of the saints was erroneous. A council of bishops convened to try the heretics condemned them to be imprisoned for life. Towards the middle of the 17th century various sects arose in consequence of the emigrations introduced into the text of the Scriptures and the Liturgical books by the patriarch Nicon. This reform gave rise to the utmost commotion in the country, and a large body both of priests and laymen violently opposed what they called the Nicomian heresy, alleging that the changes in question did not correct, but corrupt, the sacred books and the true doctrine. The opponents of the amended books were numerous and violent, particularly in the north of Russia, on the shores of the White Sea. By the Established Church they were now called Raskolnikis. They propagated their opinions throughout Siberia and other distant provinces. A great number of them emigrated to Poland and even to Turkey, while the remainder numbered numerous settlements. Among the most fanatical of these was a king of France, who, while in the course of a voluntary suicide, through means of what they called a baptism of fire; and it is believed that instances of this superstition occur even now in Siberia and the northern parts of Russia.

The Raskolnikis are divided into two great branches, the Poporoschi and the Bezpoporoschi, the former having priests, and the latter none. These again are subdivided into a great number of sects, all of which, however, are included under the general name of Raskolnikis. The Poporoschi are split into several parties in consequence of a difference of opinion among them on various points, but particularly on outward ceremonies. They consider themselves as the true Church, and regard it as an imperative duty to retain the uncorrected text of the sacred books. They consider it to be very sinful to shave the beard, to eat hares, or to drive a carriage with one pole. The separation between the Raskolnikis and the Established Church was rendered complete by Peter the Great, who insisted upon all his subjects adopting the civilised customs of the West, and one of which was the shaving of the beard. Peter's memory is in consequence detested by the Raskolnikis; and some of them maintain that he was the real Antichrist, having shown himself to be so by changing the times, transferring the beginning of the year from March 1st to July 1st, abolishing the reckoning of the time from the beginning of the world, and adopting the chronology of the Latin heretics who reckon from the birth of Christ.

The most numerous class of the Raskolnikis are adherents of the old text, who call themselves Storovertizi (those of the old faith), and are officially called Storoberdizi (those of the old rites). There are very numerous sects also included under the general denomination of Bezpoporoschi, but these are without any priests. The most remarkable are the Sptizti, or Unuchiti, the Kherestochi, or Flagellantu; the Malokun, and the Iuchodosti. But the purest of all the sects of Russian dissenters are the Martinita, who arose in the beginning of the present century, and have solemnised themselves by their heathenism and pure morality. See RUSSIAN SECTS; RUSSO-GREEK CHURCH.

Rasponi, Cesare, an Italian cardinal, was born at Ravenna, July 15, 1615, of noble family, and lived at Rome in his youth. He studied under the Jesuits with such success that they made him head of their school at fourteen years of age. Urban VIII gave him, among other presents, an abbey with a rent of 300 crowns. A poem entitled Princps Hiero-politicus, dedicated to the pope, testified to the gratitude of the young beneficiary. He studied Greek; wrote some poetry, both serious and comic, in Italian; and, by the advice of cardinal Barberini, he abandoned his studies of antiquity for canonical law. Admitted to the degree of Doctor, he took possession, in 1636, of a prebendaryship of the Collegiate Church of St. John Lateran. The office of keeper of the records of that chapter gave him the opportunity to collect materials for the history of that church, which he published in 1656. He showed so much zeal and prudence in fulfilling the important duties with which he was intrusted that Innocent X., enemy of the Barberini, loaded him with additional favours. During a voyage which he made to France, he recognised cardinal Barberini with the pope, and was so happy as to put an end to the division which had existed so long between these two families, arresting the marriage of the niece of Innocent X. with Maffeo Barberini. There is a curious manuscript of this voyage in existence. Commencing Nov. 5, 1648, and ending March 19, 1649. Being appointed health officer by Alexander VII, he saved the pontifical domain from the pestilence and famine which ravaged the neighboring countries. In the great quarrel which happened between the Corin- cian guards and the duke de Cruxy, and the murder of the king of France, his action was most beneficial to the interests of the pope. He showed such a spirit of conciliation that, after the treaty of Pass, concluded in 1664, the pope accorded to him the cardinal's hat (1666), and called him to the government of the duchy of Urbino, which he kept in spite of that badly suffering. He died at Rome, Nov. 21, 1675. His tomb is in the Church of St. John Lateran. He left a large part of his wealth to the hospital of the catacombes. We have of his works Historia Italice S. Ioannis Laterani; he also left in manuscript. Memoires sur sa Vie, Descri des des Statuts, etc.—Heuveler. Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Rasponi, Felice, an Italian nun, was born at Ravenna in 1528 of an illustrious house, which, since the 12th century, had given prelates, captains, senators, and magistrates to several little Italian states. She was but three years old when the death of her father, senator Zocchi, left her to the care of a motherless boy, her brother, with great rigor. In order to divert her mind from the severe treatment she had to endure, she learned the Latin language; studied, in the translations, Aristotle and Plato; and made the works of the holy fathers the object of her constant meditation. She was sent to the convent of Saint Andrea di Ravenna. Her learning and beauty were celebrated by many poets of the time. She was chosen superior of the convent in 1607. She died July 3, 1573. She left a Traite de la Connaissance de Dieu, and a Dialogue sur l'Excellence de l'Etat Monacal. See Heuveler. Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Rasapos, Children of (ποιο Ποζωνί), Vulg. filii Tharsis, one of the nations whose country was ravaged by Holofemes in his approach to Jutland (Judith ii. 25 only). They are named next to Lud (Lydia), and apparently south thereof. The old Latin version reads Thurus quidem, and Thar, Tharsis, with some reservation, as in the Peshito. Both are in agreement before the present corruption of its text. Wolff (Juss Huc Judith) [1681], p. 95, 96 restores the original Chaldean text of the passage as Thars and Rassos, and compares the latter name with Rhous, a place on the coast, near the mouth of the Rasos (modern Ros). The name is frequent in the region between the Rasos (modern Scopus, and Iakendorf, or Alexandria). If the above restoration of the original text is correct, the interconnection of Meshech and Rassos, as connected with Thar, or Tharsis (see Gen. x. 2), is very remarkable; since if Meshech be the original of Muscorius, Rassos can hardly be less remarkable than that of Rassos—Rassos—Smith. The Vulg. reads Tharsis, which has led some to suppose that the original was ἱππος, and that Tharsus is meant. Friztache proposes to find the place in

John, a learned London printer of the first half of the 16th century, deserves a place here for his controversy with John Frith, which resulted in his becoming a Protestant. He was educated at Oxford, and he died in 1536. Though he printed, edited, and translated as well as composed many books, he is principally known in connection with his Three Dissourses, of which the New Boke of Purgatory (1530, fol.) was answered by Frith; his Apology against John Frith; and The Church of John Rastall. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth. ii, 1734; Wood, Athenae Oxon. i, 100.

Rastenburg, Conversation at. This was a religious conference, held in 1581, to consider the rights of the Anabaptists. On the Lutheran side, the debate was conducted by Polander (q. v.), Speratus (q. v.), and Brismann; on the part of the Anabaptists, Peter Zenker (q. v.), preacher at Dantzic, replied. Duke Albert was present, and finally decided against the Anabaptists, who were banished peremptorily from the country. The Conversation at Rastenburg had been preceded by a synod, held there in 1530, on which occasion Zenker had presented his confession of faith.

Rastignac, Armand Anne Auguste Antonin Sicaire, de Chapt de, a French prelate, nephew of Louis Jacques (q. v.), was born in 1726. He had scarcely reached the degree of D.D. when he was made vicar-general of the archbishop of Arles. In the conference of the clergy in 1755 and 1769, he voted for the refusal of sacraments to the opponents of the bull Unigenitus. Three times he refused the bishopric; and when, in 1773, his uncle, marshal Biron, obtained for him, without his knowledge, the Abbey of Saint-Mesmain, in the diocese of Orleans, he hastened to resign a priory which he held in commendam. He was deputed by the clergy to the States-general in 1789; but in August, 1792, he was imprisoned, and on the 8th of September his nomination was made a question of public interest. His works are: Questions sur la Propriete des biens-fonds Ecclesiastiques en France (Paris, 1789, 8vo) — Accord de la Revolution et de la Raison contre le Dieu (ibid. 1791, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Rastignac, Aymeric, de Chapt de, a French prelate, was born about 1315. He was a descendant of an ancient family, originally from Limousin. After filling various important episcopal posts, he became, in 1359, bishop of Volterra, Tuscany. In 1361 he was transferred by Innocent VI to the bishopric of Boulogne, and at the same time he was made governor of that city. In 1364 the emperor Charles IV conferred on him the title of "prince of the empire." While chancellor of the University at Boulogne, he made for it a name which it preserved for a long time. In 1371 George XI transferred him to the bishopric of Limoges, and in 1372 the duke of Anjou made him governor-general of Limousin. He died at Limoges, Nov. 10, 1390. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Rastignac, Louis Jacques, de Chapt de, a French prelate, was born at Rastignac in 1684. He was the third son of Francois de Chapt, marquis of Rastignac. In 1714, after having been made prior of the Barbonne, and also grand vicar of Lyon, he received the degree of D.D. In 1720 he was made bishop of Tulle; and in 1725 the king gave him the abbey La Couronne, in the diocese of Angouleme, and, two days afterwards, transferred him to the archbishopric of Tours. Pope Benedict XIII excommunicated him in a short speech in 1725, on account of the zeal which he showed in opposing the Jansenists: but the many dissections which he afterwards had with the Jesuits caused him to favor the Gallican body, and even the Jansenists. He had displayed so much talent in the meetings of the clergy in 1725, 1724, and 1724 that he was chosen to preside over those of 1745, 1747, and 1748; and the speeches which he delivered during the different sessions are monuments of his knowledge and eloquence.

In 1746 he established the foundling hospital, Madeleine, at Tours. By a mandamus, in 1747, he condemned the book of père Fichon, L'Esprit de l'Eglise: and, in order to counteract the pernicious principles in this book, in 1748 and 1749 he wrote three works—one upon repentance, one upon communion, and the third upon Christian justice in relation to the sacraments of penance and the eucharist. So many complaints were made that Cardinal Rohan, by order of the king, instructed four bishops to examine the work. They wrote to M. de Rastignac, asking for explanations, but he refused to make any. He used the greater part of his income in assisting the poor. He died Aug. 2, 1750. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Ratcliffe, William P., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Williamsburg, Va., Feb. 18, 1810. He was admitted to the ministry in the fall of 1834, and was transferred to the Arkansas Conference at its first session, 1836. He labored faithfully for more than thirty years, not only filling circuits, stations, and districts, but also serving as Bible agent. He died in the village of Mount Ida, Montgomery Co., Ark., May 1, 1868. — Min. of Annual Conf., M. E. Ch., South, 1868, p. 274.

Ratel, Louis Jean Baptiste Justin, a French priest, was born at St. Omer, Dec. 14, 1758. He was the son of a hatter, and was placed by his uncle, a dignitary in one of the abbeys of Artois in the Seminary of the Thirty-three at Paris, where he studied theology. Having taken license, he was, while yet very young, appointed to the living of Dunkirk. But, although French, this parish was dependent on the Dutch diocese of Ypres, and each new prelate was an occasion of litigation. The abbot Ratel defended this benefice when the Revolution broke out. Having taken up arms in 1792, he did not wait to be exempted from the service on account of the weakness of his sight; and, during the terror of the period, he took refuge with his family in the village of La Roche-Guyon. He afterwards returned to Paris, and organized and directed the correspondence with the Venetians and the Norman Federation. He aided, also, the famous English admiral Sir William Sidney Smith to escape from the Jacobins. The family arms which attracted attention, particularly that one which related to the coup d'état of 18th Brumaire. Concealed in Boulogne, he there secretly fulfilled the duties of agent of count d'Artois, then succeeded, amid a thousand dangers, in escaping to England, where he was long known under the names of Dubois and Lemoine. His relations with lord Castlereagh and the principal members of the English cabinet enabled him to be of great service to French emigrants. It was also by his mediation that Ticherevo and Moreau were reconciled. Although absent, he was accused of various conspiracies; and he was condemned to death, and a price set on his head. He was long searched for by the imperial police. He did not return to his native city till April, 1814. During the Hundred Days he retired to Ypres, where he fell sick; and, after the return of the Bourbons, he went to live on his place at Maigiral, where he died. Jan. 26, 1816. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Generale, s. v.

RATHBUN, VALENTINE, an American divine of colonial days, flourished near the opening of the 18th century as pastor of a Baptist Church at Pittsfield, Conn., and later at Naugatuck, Conn., where he died in 1725.
He was at one time a member of the Shaker community, but three months sufficed to satisfy him that his place was in other folds. He published a tract against the Shakers, entitled Some Brief Hints of a Religious Scheme, etc. (Harford, 1781, 12mo, and ofen).
Rathke, WOLFGANG CHRISTOPHER, a German educator, born as a writer on his patron, was born at Selitz, April 12, 1683; was educated at Jena; and, after teaching privately, was, in 1689, made professor of Hebrew at the gymnasium at Bayreuth, in 1697 eclectiasial superintendent of Neustadt, and in this position sagaciously opposed all inroads of the Pietists.
He died June 26, 1729. Among his works of interest to us is De Bibliotheca Patrum (Neust, 1726, fol.).—Hoefer, Rathenius (Racherus) of Liege, a monastic of medieval times, was born of a noble family, probably in 850.
He was reared in the convent at Leuven, in the discovery of Leuven after his father's death. In 926, when his friend Hilduin, also a monk, went to Ito-ly to visit his nephew, king Hugo, Rathenius accompanied him. Hilduin was made first bishop of Verona (931), and shortly after archbishop of Milan; and upon this promotion, his friend Rathenius was placed in the vacated see of Verona. In 934, when Arnold of Bavaria invaded Italy, Rathenius sided with the invader;
and when Arnold was successfully disposed of, Rathenius was promptly deposed and imprisoned at Pavia.
During his incarceration he wrote his Prologiwi on six books. By the intercession of powerful friends he was put into the custody of the bishop of Arno, and thence escaped, in 939, to Southern France. He was private tutor for a time, and in 944 returned to Leuven. He was full of ambition, and pined for the opportunity to return to Italy. Finally, made bold by hope of regaining the king's favor in open confession, he hasteted to Hugo's presence, and really secured the forfeited place. But though restored to the see, he could not recover the favor of his patronizers, and, after various years of usefulness, he returned to his dwelling-place of his youth once more. In 952 Otto the Great called him into the vicinity of his brother Bruno; and when he was elevated to the archbishopric of Cologne, Rathenius was made bishop of Liege. He proved, however, very soon that the disappointments of life had told upon his whole character to fit him any longer for great responsibilities. He failed in all his undertakings, politically and ecclesiastically; and the discontent in the see so great and widespread that the emperor felt compelled to dismiss him, and retire to the little abbey of Alba, a dependence of Liege. Even here he made himself extremely unpopular by his overzealous defence of the sacramental view of Paschiasius Radbertus. In 961, for the third time, the see of Verona was given to him, but the clergy of the diocese succeeded in effecting his removal. He was once more after this a monk at Leuven and abbot at Alba. He died before he had secured the Abbey of Leuven, for which he strove finally as if an honor to be coveted. He died at the house of the count of Namur, April 25, 974. His writings, which are numerous and valuable, are collected in one edition by P. and H. Hallerini (Verona, 1765). See Vogel, Rathenius von Ver-

Rathmann, Herrmann, a German theologian of the Pietistic tendency, was born at Lubeck in 1583; studied at Leipsic, Rostock, and last at Cologne, where he became master of the philosophical faculty; and delivered philosophical lectures at Frankfort-on-the-Main and Leipsic until 1612, when he became dean of St. John's Church at Danzic. In 1617 he took a Ph.D. position at Gottingen; in 1618 he was made pastor of St. Catharine's. He died June 30, 1628. He got into a controversy with his zealous Lutheran colleague, John Corvinus (q. v.), regarding Mysticism and Osiandrianism. Rathmann was a very devout man, and rejected the mere profession of faith as sufficient to entitle a person to Christian fellowship. He also distinguished between the mere letter of the Holy Word and its inner meaning, regarding the former as a dead, fruitless instrument ('instrumentum passivum, lumen instrumentale historicum'), which could only take life by the influencing influence of the Holy Spirit. The Königsberg theologians (Osiander school) accused him of Schweflenkidianism; those of Jena, of Calvinism; only Rostock accepted his theology as orthodox. See Dorner, Gesch, der deutschen us), "the story-writer" (1 Esdr. ii, 16, 17, 25, 30), the same as "Rehum the chancellor" (Ezra iv, 8, 19, 17, 23).

Ratich, WOLFGANG, a distinguished German educator, was born in 1571, at Wilstein, in Holstein. A difficulty in speech compelled him to give up the ministry, for which he had intended fitting himself; and he applied himself to the study of the Hebrew and Arabic languages and mathematics. He claimed to be the in-vventor of a new system of instruction, vastly superior to the prevailing ones, and in 1612 addressed a memorial to the Diet of Frankfort, in which he asserted that not only every educated young man in Germany was expected to learn Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, philosophy, theology, and the arts and sciences, but that uniformity of language and religion could be introduced into the whole empire. Several princes were led to interest themselves in his scheme. Professors Helwig and Jung, of Giessen, and Granger, Brendel, Walter, and Wolf, of Jena, were invited to investigate it. They judged it excellent in theory, and made a favorable report upon it.
Ratich agreed with prince Ludwig of Anhalt-Köthen and duke John Ernest of Weimar to instruct children both in the religious system, and also to make teachers to give instruction in any language, in less time and with less labor than by any other method used in Germany. A printing-office was furnished him in Köthen, and his books were printed in six languages. A school was established for him, with one hundred and thirty-five scholars. But Ratich proved incompetent to give practical effect to his theories.
He became unpopular, and, being an earnest Lutheran, fell under the ban of the religious prejudices of a com-community attached to the Reformed faith. His school failed in a short time. Prince Ludwig quarreled with him, and, in 1619, imprisoned him; but he was released in 1620, after having signed the declaration that " he had claimed and promised more than he knew or could bring to pass. His system was now attacked by some who had been his friends. The countess Sophia von Schwarzburg-Budsladt, however, recommended him to the Swedish chancellor, Oxenstierna. At the request of that statesman, Dr. Brückner, Meyfar, and Ziegler examined his method; and they again made a favorable report upon it in 1654. Ratich, without doubt, had an idea of the conception of a non-education. He preferred to give instruction in those branches which could be made useful in life rather than to pay so much attention to the dead languages. In his memorial to the Diet at Frankfort, he held that a child should first learn to read and speak the mother-tongue correctly, so as to be able to use the German

Bible. Hebrew and Greek should then be learned as the tongues of the original text of the Bible, after which Latin might be studied. His views were embodied in a number of rules, or principles, the chief of which are: 1. Everything should be presented in its order, a due regard being paid to the course of nature. 2. Only one thing should be presented at a time. 3. Each thing should be often repeated. 4. Everything should be taught at first in the mother-tongue; afterwards other languages may be taught. 5. Everything should be done without compulsion. 6. Nothing should be learned by rule. There should be mutual conformity in all things. 8. First thing by itself, and afterwards the explanation of it; that is to say, a basis of material must be laid in the mind before any rules can be applied to it. Thus, in teaching geometry the teacher should be present, and then he should make an immense amount of labor on the teacher, without seeming to call for a corresponding degree of exertion on the part of the pupil. Comenius, after reading his book, remarked that he "had not ill displayed the faults of the school, but that in practice the defects might be corrected." Ratier's works were written in Latin, and are diffuse, tedious, and somewhat pedantic. He died in 1633. See Biographie Universelle, s. v.

Ratier, Vincent, a French preacher of note, was born in 1634. At sixteen years of age he entered the Order of the Dominicans, and in 1650, he was made superior-general of the order in France. He resigned this position in 1698, and died near the opening of the 18th century, greatly respected on account of his indefatigable zeal. He had preached with great success in the principal cities of France. He wrote, Octave Angélique de Saint-François de Sales (Orleans, 1697, 8vo.);—Oraison Funèbre de Jeanne-Gabrielle Davout des Marrets, Abbé du Mont-Notre-Dame, près Prorina (Orleans, 1699, 4to.).

Ratification is, in the Book of Common Prayer, used to indicate the act of confirming and sanctioning something previously done by another, as in assuming the obligations of baptism at the reception of confirmation.

Rationable. (1.) The science of theology and philosophy (during the scholastic ages) were often one and the same, since from which the doctrines of Aristotle were expounded as the rationales of theological and moral-truth. "There cannot be a body of rules without a rationale, and this rationale constitutes the science. There were poets before there were rules of poetical composition; but before Aristotle, or Horace, or Boileau, or Pope could write their arts of poetry and criticism, they had considered the reasons on which their precepts rested, they had conceived in their own minds a theory of the art. In like manner, there were navigators before there was an art of navigation, and in the art of navigation, there could be the methods of finding the ship's place by observations of the heavenly bodies, the science of astronomy must have explained the system of the world."—Anthony Sparrow, Bishop of Exeter, is the author of a work entitled A Rationale upon the Book of Common Prayer.

(2.) A peculiar form of the bishop's pallium (pectora, koyios), appropriated by the bishops of Rome to themselves from the time in which they began to assume the mitres of pontiffs, or metropolitans of the high-priests of the Old Testament. It was some- times sent by the Roman pontiffs to other bishops as a mark of distinction and favor. It was in the form of a trefoil, quatrefoil, or oblong square, like the piece of stuff worn by the Arian high-priest. It appears in English on bishop Gifford's monument at Worcester in 1501. It was worn, perhaps for the last time on record, at Rheims. The pope has a formal, and cardinals and Italian bishops wear superb brooches to clasp their cope. The Greek παραρθέων, worn by patriarchs and metropolitans over the chasuble, is an oblong plate of gold or silver, jeweled with a diamond.

The word rationale is also the name of a treatise explaining the meaning, and justifying the continuance, of that ceremonial which it was thought fit to retain in the Church of England in the year 1641. The members of the committee to whom this subject was intrusted were warmly attached to the spirit of the Roman ritual, and, of course, made few alterations. The collects in which prayers were offered for the pope, and the offices for Thomas Becket and some other saints, were omitted; but so slight were the changes introduced that in many churches the missal and breviary already in use were retained. The Rationale Dicticorniun officiorum of Durand, bishop of Mende, written in the latter part of the 18th century, gives the "reasons" of the forms and ceremonies of Roman worship. See Coller, Examen, Hist. v. 184; Burnet, Hist. of the Ref. 1. 68; Riddle, Christian Antiqu. (see Index). Rationalism, a term applied to a specific movement in theology which assumed definite shape about the middle of the 18th century, and culminated in the first decades of the 19th. Its chief seat was in Protestant Germany; and the rationalism then prevailing was erecting the human understanding into a supreme judge over the Word of God, and thus, by implication, denying the importance, and even necessity, of any miraculous revelation whatever. But a tendency to rationalism has existed to some degree wherever human thought has made the least advances. Especially are its outbreaks distinctly recognizable at several points along the course of the history of theology; and in several countries it had existed as a clearly defined movement even before its full development in Germany. (In the chief features of this development, we shall follow the account of Dr. Tholuck in Herzog's Reuss-Encylop. xii. 587-584.)

I. English Rationalism.——Sporadic tendencies towards rationalism existed among the Averhoists in the Middle Ages, and among the anti-Trinitarians of the 16th century; but these were largely of a speculative or mystical type. But in English deism the tendency became definitely theological and anti-Biblical. In reaction against the confessional persecutions and intolerance of the 17th century, not a few gifted minds were led to look for a really tenable position only in the elementary form of the tenets of deism, the rationalizations, and even to all religions whatsoever. This led gradually to a denial of the necessity of revelation, and to an exclusive reliance upon the light of nature (lumen naturae). This lumen became thus both the source and the judge of all religious truth. This movement was variously styled naturalism, deism, and occasionally also rationalism. English deism differs, however, in this respect from German—that it proceeded mainly from non-theologians, and was openly hostile to the Bible; whereas (German rationalism sprang from theologians eminently in the church), and it professedly honored the Scriptures as a valuable summary of the highest religious truths. The former, according to Nitzsch (System, § 28), was largely a denial of revelation; the latter was a philosophical exegete. But as the former relied, in the last instance, on the lumen naturae, and the latter on the so-called "sound human understanding," the ultimate result was identical.

II. Rationalism in the Netherlands.——This arose simultaneously with English deism. Here, also, the toleration of different confessions led to latitudinarianism. The tendency was further promoted by a revival of classical humanism. Forerunners of rationalism appeared before the middle of the 17th century. Voetius (Disput. Theol. l. 1) mentions a work (of 1633) which did not hesitate to hold thus: Naturale ratio imdet et norma fidet. The tendency was systematically prepared for by the Cartesian philosophy. Without directly touching the foundations of faith, it yet silently underlined them by the fundamental maxim, De omnibus dubitandum. This maxim, though reverently intended, yet resulted, in practice, in a thoroughly anti-Biblical drift. Ducis and Roel hold that human reason is as infallible as God, its author; and that if it ever errs, this result from mere lack of attention to its inner light. The influence of Spinoza was in the same direction. In his Irenous Theologico-politicus, he had subjected the Bible to a philosophical interpretation which was fatal to its positive validity. His disciple, L. Meyer, taught unhesitatingly (1666), "Quid-quid rationi contrarium, ille non est credendum." Also from the time of Spinoza forward there appears, even among devout theologians, a tendency to break loose from orthodox traditions. This is further promoted by the works of gifted French refugees—Bayle, Le Clerc, and others.

III. German Rationalism.—This subject falls natu-really into the following five subdivisions: the period of preparatory discussion (1600-1700); the period of the historical-critical movement (1750-1790); the period of the philosophical-critical movement (1780-1800); the period of the so-called rationalismus vulgaris (1800-1814); the period of the philosophical-rationalism (from Kant to Feuerbach).

It was in the latter period that foreign rationalism attracted the attention of German theoologists before the close of the 17th century. The earliest assistant of Herbert of Cherbury and of Spinoza was Meurerus, in 1667 and 1674. But a German basis for rationalism had already been laid. In the midst of the violence against orthodox Baldwin (1583), Calixtus had laid the foundations for a less rigid tendency. The Thirty Years' War (1618-1648) had spread immorality among the masses and indifference among the nobility. The successing years of material prosperity and of French luxury made the German upper class undermine the power of the old orthodoxy. But the Lutheran Church still firmly held its old position till towards the close of the century.

The Reformed Church was the first to be affected. Duisburg became the rallying-point of suspected Cartesians from all quarters. Here H. Holstius (1688) defended the principle of Roel, that reason is the ul-imate judge in matters of faith, and substituted syllogistic argumentation for the testimonium internum. He also declared that the theology was the handmaid of philosophy, instead of the converse. The same views were found later on in the rationalistic circles of Wheaton, in a dissertation (Zerbst, 1727), that reason is the test d of faith, and that none but fanatics appealed to a testi-monium spiritus. Similar sentiments soon found place in Lutheran schools, though not in the theocetical faculties. Thomassius, first at Leipzig, then at Halle, was the first to give them much prominence. His main endeavor of life was the "dissipation of prejudices" from every field of thought or inquiry, and the criterion of his efforts was a prudential regard for the "useful"; and as the only judge of the "useful" was the so-called com-mum-sense of the educated classes, it is plain that the rationalistic foundation was already fully laid. But the name rationalism was as yet almost wholly unknown, and in outward form the authority of the Scriptures
was still almost universally admitted.

Inside of the German Church of the 17th century, and down to the middle of the 18th, there prevailed
two parallel streams of life—the subjective devotion of pietism, and a subjective proclivity to individual criicism—both of them having this in common, that they opposed the objective validity of formal orthodoxy. On the part of pietism, this position was not consciously intended; but in laying such exclusive emphasis on the Bible as opposed to creeds, and on the witness of the Spirit as opposed to pious guidance, it actually did so in fact. Thus the venerable Michael Lang of Altdorf, allowed himself to live by his name for vital, viz., to dignify the orthodox symbols as sac-Bibles and sac-rect documents. Spener found the yoke of these symbols insupportable in some points; Joachim Lange and others actually disregarded them on occasion. Hsufering seriously objects to the formula that good works spring from faith. The pious Rambach virtually renounced the orthodox tenets of inspiration. The form of dogmatics began to undergo a change. Breithaupt (1700) and Freylinghausen (1738) purposely avoided the traditional philosophy in their systems of theology. And this tendency from within the Church was promoted by influences which came from without—Holland and Italy.
The force of this influence may be judged of by the opposition it at first met with. Litelental mentions, between 1680 and 1720, no less than forty-six works against atheism, twenty-seven against rationalism, and fifteen against indifferentism. The forms of the opposition varied all the way from a natural desire for a clear understanding of the grounds of faith to an ab-солute indifference, or even a frivolous atheism.
The eminent Leipsic pastor Zeidler (1735) thought to honour the Bible by the utmost contempt of systems of doctrine. Out of piety there sprang a number of warm-hearted mystics, who laid exclusive stress on the "inner spark, the inner word," thus opening the path to every sort of vagary. Under the guidance of this "inner word," Dippel presented, in 1677, a very free criticism of pietism. But Spitta, professor and ex-teacher complained, in 1725, that even good theologians were falling into the danger of insisting simply on Christian love and morals, and forgetting the danger from as-sults of false teachers. In the same year, an eminent publicist called for a consolidation of the Lutheran Reformed confessions, asserting that, after all, peace and love were the only things essential. Edelmann began, in 1735, with slight variations from strict orthodox,
and ended, with Spinoza, in denying the personality of God and the immortality of the soul. The aged Lo-thes often summed up the condition of the middle to seven years of faithfulness, the condition of theology and of the Church was only growing worse and worse; and saddler still is the lament of Koch, in 1754, that the Bible had almost lost all respect on the part of the cultured classes, and that it was abandoned to the government as a collection of childish fables.

All the preceding inroads upon orthodox tradition had been carried out under the demands of the so-called sound human understanding. It was mostly the work of non-theologians. But from the beginning of the 18th century, those who professed to serve the interests of rationalism, Leibnitz and Wolf, throw out thoughts that powerfully contributed to end which their authors were very far from intending.
Leibnitz's distinction of doctrines into those which can be rationally proved and those which are above reason was used to cast positive suspicion upon the whole of the latter class. Wolff's distinction of theology into the two parts, natural and revealed, was turned to the same service. As natural theology could give a reason for its dicta, and revealed theology could not, it came to pass that almost the whole stress was laid upon the former. But this incoherent undermining process was as yet hardly felt outside of the professional circles. The pulpit remained almost unaffected. The most eminent example of the union of the old with the new tendencies was in the case of Matthew Piaf, professor in Tubingen (1716), then in Giessen (1756), who died in 1760.
Holding fast to the chief old landmarks, yet he relaxed much more from confessional rigidity, and earnestly labored for the union of the two German churches. The me-tion of Piaf brings us to the close of this first phase of German rationalism.

2. The Period of Historical Criticism.—The condition of theology, and, indeed, of science and art also, about the middle of the 18th century, was that of a mummy-like stiffness and a shallow systematization. The vital contest between the old and the new introduced a scepticism of Spinozistic origin into pietism and orthodoxy, that lost its vigor and died away.
RATIONALISM

The second generation of Halle pietists had left the stage, J. H. Michaelis in 1788, J. Lange in 1744; G. Francke outlived his age—until 1770. So, also, had departed the last champions of the old orthodoxy—Wernarod in 1749, Cyprian in 1740, the last of all, Wolf, having outlived the vitality of his own system, departed in sadness in 1754. The superficial and pedantic Gottsched still held his mastery in the fine arts. An unproductive, compounding spirit prevailed in science and theology. Most of our preachers," says Eresius, "gave too little attention to the teaching of collected facts, to the suppression of curiosities, stamps, and old coins." There was wanting a fresh wind to fill the weary sails of life. But just now the lacking stimulus was abundantly supplied; it was furnished by the fervor of criticism which broke out first on the field of history, then on that of philosophy.

Although Thomasius and others had already done something in the field of historical criticism, this was only from a superficial, empirical standpoint. It was only when historical criticism assumed a thorough and systematic form that it wrought its full clarifying and revolutionary effects on the whole field of theology. New investigations were now instituted; every nook and corner of antiquity, linguistics, and science of every form was subjected to a searching and sifting such as had never before been paralleled; and the results attained were of a magnitude to revolutionize the whole circle of the religious sciences. It is true the main motive which inspired the critical movement was devoid of deep religious character, and hence many of its boasted results have proved disappointing; but many others are admitted, and accepted by all parties as absolutely unassailable.

Also, on this critical field, English deism had been in the advance, and had contributed no insignificant results. Toland, Collins, Tindal, and Bolingbroke had unsettled the popular faith in the authenticity of the canon, and in the infallibility of the preachers of the age. They propounded, some of them accepted by the fathers, threw doubt upon all the others; that many passages in the Gospels were manifestly spurious; that the time of the settlement of the canon was absolutely unknown; that the genuine sacred books of the Jews had perished in the time of the Exile, etc. Hobbes gave lengthy reasons for disbelieving the Pentateuch; Collins threw discredit upon Daniel; Morgan gave to the views of Toland and Bolingbroke an attractive rhetorical expression, thus disseminating them among the uneducated. Collins assailed the apostles as impostors—men of the movement—to wit, the prophecies—insisting that the predictions of the Old Testament relate, when properly interpreted, to very different things from those to which the New-Testament writers apply them. Only in one of the Prophets did the relation to Christ, not to the religion; and to political events. Moreover, these prophecies of Daniel "were written after the events."

In Germany the full tide of revolutionary criticism takes systematic form in Semler of Halle. By Semler almost the whole circle of orthodox landmarks was thrown into confusion; the Bible-text was assailed; the pertinency of standard proof-texts was denied; the genuineness of Biblical books was contested; the foundation was dashed away from numerous usages and dogmas which had hitherto passed as absolutely unassailable. Although many of the points which Semler made were subsequently further developed and accepted as sound, yet the immediate effect in his case was to doubt into the whole arsenal of orthodoxy.

The general effect was to set in motion an unparalleled tide of literary and polemical兴奋. The Church and of doctrine, were speedily enriched and enlarged. In Halle, Semler found an able and like-spirited pupil in Gruner, at Leipzig labored the cautious but pensive Bieber, and the head of the movement at Göttingen (since 1750); Griesbach, Didlerlein, Eichhorn, at Jena; Henke at Helmstedt; Tüllner, Steinbart, at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Under the labors of these and kindred critics there was scarcely a single dogma that remained unassailed. But the general inspiration of criticism was not the overturning, but only the clarification, the correct construction, of the Biblical teachings. Even the authority of the Church is held fast by to Semler, though in a peculiar manner. The symbols and forms of the Church are useful in preserving external unity and uniformity. The Church is simply the right of the people to judge of the individual. His position seemed practically to involve a doubt of the possibility of attaining to objective truth; his radical mistake was the assumption that religion can exist without a doctrinal basis. Starting out from the warm atmosphere of Pietism, he gradually descended until he had little more reverence for the oracles of God than for the fables of Ovid. Holding that the inner conviction of our own truth-loving heart is the sole test as to the inspiration of a book, he decided against the claim of Ruth, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Canticles; he doubted the genuineness of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, and Daniel; he held that the Pentateuch is but a collection of legendary fragments. The New Testament is better than the Old, though some of its parts are positively pernicious; the Apocalypse is the fabrication of Gnostic and Essene sects. It was not only one which is useful for the modern Church. There are two elements in the Bible, the transitory and the eternal. It is the prerogative of criticism to sift among the chaff and select out the scattered grains of pure truth. Much of the Bible was written simply for local or party purposes: it was never intended for general use. A principle of which Semler made large use was the celebrated "accommodation theory." He insisted, namely, that Christ and the apostles taught many things by way of mere accommodation to the whims and prejudices of the time; he maintained that these were false views that prevailed, but that they partially accepted them, though planting within them a substratum of absolute truth. To sift out this truth from the encumbrance of rubbish is the privilege of the clear-sighted modern critic. In the field of dogmatics Semler was almost ferocious in his iconoclasm. For the Protestant or even the apostolical fathers he showed the most thorough disrespect. One after another of the central dogmas of orthodoxy fell under the hammer of his criticism, and seemed to be dissipated forever. And what Semler did at Halle, a bold innovator of like-minded men did in other parts of Germany.

Of very considerable influence in this second half of the 18th century were translations of the works of English and Dutch rationalists and deists. Semler himself acknowledged great debt to the works of Clarke and Le Clerc. The biographies of the day are full of references to the wide influence of Toland and Tindal. The same fact is evinced by the scores and scores of clerical attempts at refuting these scribes.

From the lawless subjectivism of Semler the descent was easy to the most absurd and degrading consequences. Two theological writers especially carried out the logical consequences in both their writings and their lives. Edelmann took up the tradition of Thomasius, and constructed his whole system of theology from a superficial utilitarian standpoint. Not what is true, but what is of use to the subject, was his whole inquiry. The result was that he simply reduced Christianity to a feasible and insipid dream. But the climax was reached in Bahrdt. This man used his eminent popular talents to ridicule the Bible, to denounce the church, and to degrade to the very lowest infamy the name of theologian. His popular treatises were read by the ten thousand, and produced great evil. But his career as a whole marked a turning-point in the tide of rationalism. Criticism, when left unguided by any fixed principle of objective truth, was found to be fruitless and to lead only to destruction. It became necessary to look about for some corner-stone of truth upon which to stay the tottering edifice of theology and religion. The various attempts to discover this constitute—

3. The Period of Philosophical Criticism (1780-1800).

After the decline of the rationalism of Wolff, the vitality of philosophy in Germany stood at the zero point. So long as philosophy was represented by the feeble eclecticism of Mendelssohn, Garve, Sulzer, Meiners, Platner, Reinhard, and Flatt, the criticism of the Semler school could flatter itself with standing upon philosophical grounds for the construction of the old rationalism. The one principle of the so-called "sound human understanding." But when Kant came, both systems were overturned at a blow. Kant showed that our transcendental knowledge reaches no further than our experience, and that our knowledge of supernatural objects is indefensible only as postulates of the practical reason. Philosophy and theology must concede that the proofs for the existence of God avail no further than simply to establish a probability. The subjective morality of utility was overthrown by the principle that no morality is possible save where it is grounded upon a purely objective "ought." It was shown that the whole duty of theology was, by the help of religious ideas, to contribute to the supremacy of the "ought" in human society. But also the philosophy of Kant took on somewhat of the coloring of the old rationalism, and the old rationalists incorporated it as favorable to them. Thus the three Kantian postulates of the practical reason were metamorphosed into mere hypotheses of the theoretical reason. The subjective character of the doctrine of religion was identified with Kant and Kantianism, as the chief foundation in religion" was said to be the very essence of the old subjectivism. But there were two phases to the matter: while one current of rationalistic theology welcomed Kant and vainly hoped to force the new wine into the old bottles, another current mocked at it as mere mysticism, or metaphysics, or rationalistic jargon. Only a few deep-minded men, such as Schmitt, Vogel, and Tiefenbrunck, saw the folly of both of these positions—saw that the new was utterly subversive of the old.

4. The Period of the So-called Rationalismus Vulgaris (1800-1833).—The attitude of the theology dominant at the dawn of the 19th century was thus: The Holy Scriptures rationally interpreted were still revered as the code of a rational religion and morality. But with every advance step in what was called historical exegesis, the discrepancy between the traditional sense of the text and the new constructions endeavored to put upon it became more strikingly apparent. Semler's accommodation theory was made to apply to every narrative and every doctrinal statement of the whole Bible. Every passage in the Scriptures was placed into a new system, so as to be rendered necessary a great deal of clarification before the sense could be reached. The New Testament citations from the Old were thought to be totally misapplied. Jesus was thought by some to have been a veritable fanatic. John the Baptist regarded him as a sinner; but did Jesus think so himself? The myth itself began now to play its rôle. L. Bauer published in 1800 a Hebrew mythology of the Old and New Testaments; the miracles were explained away as mere natural events.

As early as 1794 the aspect of matters was thus summed up by Rien: "The champions of the religion of pure reason have already advanced so far that all the best theologians are going over to them, and all candidates for position hold them in great honor. It has already come to be a settled matter that reason is the currency of the age, and that this coin will not decide against itself is easy to see." A writer in 1792 had said: "The truth of a doctrine rests upon rational grounds. If it can stand the test of reason, if it does not contradict any of the results of science and experience; if it is founded in all rational men, then it is true, and no fanatic can prove the contrary." Krug went so far in 1796 as to deny to Christian truth any more permanent worth than that of the teachings of any other transitory system of philosophy. "Let no one say that God could make none other than a perfect revelation. There is no such perfect revelator as the one you impugn. The attainment of holy men springing up from their souls just as the utterances of other men; hence they necessarily bear the coloring of the environment from which they sprang." Such sentiments were legislatively condemned in some parts of Germany; but not so in Prussia. Here the chief Church council adhered to, on being asked whether any positive confession was any longer to be exacted of candidates for Church membership, replied that, apart from baptism and the eucharist, no other yoke was to be imposed on the contrary, every applicant was to be unhesitatingly received with its simple formula: "I baptize thee upon thy confession of Christ, the founder of a more spiritual and more joyous religion than that of the society [the world] to which thou hast hitherto belonged."

With the changed phase of things at the close of the 18th century, the term "rationalism" came into more frequent use. At first it was chiefly used by opponents. Men like Gehler contrasted rationalism with the fundamental principle of Protestantism, to wit, the normative authority of the Bible, showing the utter inconsistency of the system with the superficial notions of the "sound human understanding." It was never cordially accepted by those to whom it was applied.

As soon as rationalism became clearly conscious of its attitude towards revelation, it felt more fully than ever the need of the breach in its fundamental principles. Also an external stimulus urged it to this step. Hibernus it had peaceably reclined its head on the bower of each successively rising system of philosophy; but since the rise of the speculative systems of Fichte and Schelling, such an alliance was impossible. The hackneyed systems were no longer adequate to meet the superficial reasonings of the "sound human understanding." Also, even rationalism stood aghast at the bottomless abyss of the pantheistic mysticism of Schelling; and numerous works of rationalistic source assailed the new "atheism." But the empirical tendencies of rationalism met with only ridicule and sneers from the new lords of the intellectual world. Fichte, Schelling, and Goethe agreed in stigmatizing the best principles and the whole system of the rationalists as commonplace and vulgar.

At last, however, there appeared a system of philosophy under the wings of which the rationalists felt that they could flee for refuge; this was the faith-philosophy of Jacobi. The radical weakness of the old rationalism was that it gave no scope to the spontaneities of sentiment and religious experience. Fichte and Schelling were dressed in the cold, dry processes of argumentation. It was utterly ungenial, unpoetic; a mere probability was the highest word it could say in behalf of the most central truths. The system of Jacobi remedied this. It supplemented the coldness of mere intellectual speculation by the immediate certainty of feeling; it restored to faith its coeternity with knowledge. Accordingly, all the better representatives of honest rationalism hailed the faith-philosophy of Jacobi, and used it to rescue the sinking bark of the current theology. Notably was this the case with Gehler, who now urged as the deepest proof of the truth of religion a "Nobigungsefühl mit Uraussprüchen der allgemeinen Vernunft"—that is, he held that religious truth commends itself directly to our inner consciousness with all the compelling force of intuition. From this time forward it became common to lay greater stress on the evidence of the heart, the immediate evidence of the practical reason, and to style it the faith of reason (Vernunftglauben). This procedure was partially justified by Kant himself, who claimed to have set limits to reason only in order to give greater play to faith. It was still more justified by the faith-rationalists, such as Boetticher, who derives after the imitation from a so-called truth-feeling and truth-faith. This is the philosophic ground upon which are based the definitions of reason and the understanding as given in the theology of Bretschneider and Wegscheider; to wit, that reason is the faculty for generating ideas directly out of consciousness without the intervention of the discursive activity, and the understanding the faculty for confirming and elucidating these ideas.

Thus rationalism has, since the beginning of the 19th century, made considerable advances beyond its previous dry and shallow common-sensicism. It was helped to this by the philosophy of Fichte, by his doctrine of faith and insight, placed reason in antagonism to the understanding; and still more so when this philosophy was adopted by the gifted and noble-minded De Wett.
For a long while yet—into the third decade—the tone and fold of rationalism remained largely the same as those given to it by the abstract, shallow proponies of Niccolai and of Teller, of Semler, and in some respects of Gabler. Röh and Paulus follow in the steps of Teller; Bretschneider and Wegscheider reproduce much of the loose syncretism of a Semler. The chief scientific weak-nestness of all is the undiscovered depth of its understanding of a depth of absolutely fixed ideas and in its avoidance of decided utterances. He asserts: "In rebus gravissimis ad religiorem pertinentibus convenire ommes gentes." Hase raises the question whether any real student of the history of ideas can consider this as a genuine rationalism.
Wegscheider only defence is to timidly assert a fer ommes. He reiterates the old demonstrations of the existence of God;
and when Kant's antinomies stare him in the face, he concedes that, taken singly, these demonstrations are not conclusive, but thinks that they are so when taken all together. Hahn declares that deism and naturalistic rationalism are identical. Wegscheider indignantly protests, inasmuch as rationalism accepts revelation thus far:
"That God endowed the founder of Christianity with extraordinary inner gifts, and gave him many outward to the sense of special marks.

At this point there rises the so-called supernaturalist school. It includes those who protested against the absolute autonomy of reason in matters of religion;
and though many of its adherents still clung to views irreconcilable with due reverence for the Bible, still it formed the platform upon which a higher and more Biblical standpoint was subsequently reached. Among these supernaturalists were men like Storr and Flatt in Wür-temberg, and Reinhard in Dresden. But by the begin-nning of the second decade of the century even these few men of supernaturalism seemed to remain solitary and victorious upon the field of battle. Yet the dry crumbs of rationalism could not depict the sad deaths of the German nation; the stimulus to a deeper insight and a richer faith came from without. It was from the thunder-strokes of the Leip-sic and the Waterloo victories that the rejuvenation of German life went forth. This rejuvenation brought in its train a restoration of life, first in the German Church and then in German theology. Inside of theology the rationalistic movement continued until 1825. Among its early associations was the so-called Council of Tübingen, but outside of the schools many signs indicated that its reign was over. The new policy of the Prussian government discomfited it; the religious and patriotic enthusiasm occasioned by the tercentenary of the Reformation (1817) was uncongenial to it, the theses of Harms and the disputation of Leipzic (which had the courage to summon the rationalistic clergy to resign their clerical positions) were of the same purport. In 1830 the new Kirchenzeitung of Hengstenberg went so far even as to call for the expulsion of rationalistic professors from its universities. As a matter of course, it was but a small band who opposed rationalism. But they had the courage of faith and the vitality of truth on their side, and their influence was very deeply felt.

Just at this time the decisive influence of Schleier-
macher came to the help of the opponents of rationalism. With all its rationalistic methods, the system of this great theologian was hostile to rationalism as a whole. It promoted a positive faith in a positive Christianity: it was powerfully influential in implanting a reverence for positive religion in the higher and learned classes of German life; it regarded religion as one of the essential necessities of understanding the human nature of the Christian Church an organization essential to the nurture of religion. The period was now past when faith and culture were regarded as unconnected to each other. In effecting this change in public sentiment, Fichte and Schelling were the chief agents, and the rationalistic mob to the potent influence of Schleiermacher. The very last scientific effort of rationalism was made on the appearance of Hase's Hutterus Redivivus. In this book Hase transports himself into the sphere of ancient Protestant orthodoxy, and attempts such a presentation of it as shall harmonize with the rich fruits of modern culture. The school of Rohr assailed (1833) this book with desperate earnestness; but the very choice of its weapons betrayed the forbore hope of the case. The reply which Hase made to these assaults may be regarded as having given the rationalistic world the death-blow to which it was in its definition of fixed ideas and in its avoidance of decided utterances. He asserts: "In rebus gravissimis
ad religiorem pertinentibus convenire ommes gentes."
Hase raises the question whether any real student of the history of ideas can consider this as a genuine rationalism.
Wegscheider only defence is to timidly assert a fer ommes. He

and when Kant's antinomies stare him in the face, he

macher came to the help of the opponents of rational-
hagen. Lutche, Umbret, Sider, Hagenbach, Gieseler, Bleek, Tholuck, Rothe, and their disciples. In the hands of these men Christian theology has been raised to the dignity of the noblest of sciences; and supreme reverence for Christ and the Bible have been shown to consist in the profoundest learning and the greatest speculative ability.

But the scattered echoes of German rationalism were long in entirely dying away. Faint imitations of the movement went out over all the other Protestant nations. It invaded modern Holland and England and France and America. But in these countries it was but a foreign importation, and it has shown no vital power of original production. And even in Germany there are individual representatives of the real system. But these are without popular power or scientific significance. They are simply echoes from a buried past.

Ratisbon, a city of Germany, is noted in ecclesiastical history as the seat of several important Church councils (Concilia Ratisponenses). The first of these was held in 792. In this council the errors of Felix, bishop of Urgell, who maintained that Christ is only the adoptive Son of God, were condemned. He was afterwards sent to Rome to pope Adrian, before whom he confessed and abjured his heresy in the church of St. Peter; he maintained, with Eulipandi, that Christ, as to his human nature, was the Son of God by adoption only. See Lass, Conc. vii, 1010. See also Feiltamn.

A second council was held in 796. Gregarious com-theologians even in the Church of Rome who maintain the position assumed by Ratramnus as defensible. Against Hincmar of Rheims Ratramnus defended Godschaleus in the dispute over the trina deitas; but this apart, Paulinus a taut book is his Libre de De, quod Christus ex Virgine natus est, in which it is not questioned that Mary, utero clauso, conceived, but rather the opinion which sprang up at about that time, that the conception had been incerto tramite. Ratramnus gained most renown among his contemporaries by his work on Homo Christi, which he, together with the arguments of Photius in 867, and defended the Oriental Church and her dogmas. In the Migne edition, these works are in the Patrologie, cxxi, 1-946 and 1155-1156. See Mabillon, Beneditinum Assamum, vol. ii and iii; Hist. Littéraire de la France, v, 322-331; Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für Theol, 1858, p. 544 sq.; Baur, Dogmengesch, vol. ii; Gieseler, Eccles. Hist.; Soames, Hist. of the Reformation, iii, 118 sq.

Ratte, Guttard de, a French prelate, was born at Montpellier in 1592. He was a master clerk in the Parliament of Toulouse. When imprisoned with the president, Duranti, he showed such opposition to the government that his house and library were pillaged, and he was condemned by Parliament to be executed. Henry IV interceded Ratte by giving him the abbey of St. Blaise, and a monastery of 12,000 francs for his fidelity to the king, he afterwards received the abbey of Val-Richer, in the diocese of Bayeux, and that of St-Chinian, in the diocese of Saint-Vincent. He was made vicar-general at Montpellier and archdeacon of Valence, and in 1596 bishop of Montpel-lier. On his way to Toulouse he was attacked by three large dogs, and mortally wounded. He died July 7, 1602. See Hoefer, Now. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Rattles (Fr. *crêcelle, tarturrelle; Lat. crotalum). Prior to the introduction of bells (q. v.), rattles of wood or of iron were struck or shaken by the hand to summon the people to worship. The Celtic cloc, which preceded the use of bells, was a board covered with knocker. The Greeks used the δαυσιστροφ (sacred iron), a mallet and plate of iron, and the δαυς (sacred wood), two clappers, as a summons to prayer. The latter are mentioned by John Climacus as used for rapping the doors of the cell-dwells in the monasteries of Palestine, in the 6th century, as a night signal and waking-hammer. At University and New colleges, Oxford, fellows are summoned to a meeting in common room by the blow of a hammer at the stai-foot. By the rule of Pachomius, a trumpet was used. In many churches the clappers are called matraxa; in Italy, serangola; and in some parts of France, soumendra, which sound for service between the Mass on Maundy-Thursday and the Gloria in Excelsis, sung on Easter eve in the Mass after None, when the bells are disused, in memory of the Lord's silence in the tomb, and the speechless timidity of the apostles—a custom dating from the 8th century. At Caen the ceremonial gives the signal for counting with tablets. Neogorgus says that boys carried rattles in the procession of Good Friday.

Rattray, Thomas, D.D., an English prelate, flourished in the first half of the 18th century. He was educated at Oxford University, took holy orders shortly after graduation, and, after filling various ecclesiastical preferments, became in 1727 bishop of Dunkeld, and in 1733 bishop of Sodor and Man. He died in 1745. Edin., 1728:—The Ancient Liturgy of the Church of Jerusalem (Lond. 1744, 4to);—Some Particular Instructions concerning the Christian Covenants (ibid. 1748).

Ratz[u]nberger, Matthias, a physician at the court of the elector Joachim in the Reformation period. He is one of the most pointed movements that he deserves a place here. He was born at Wangen, in Wurttemberg, in 1501, and was educated at the University of Wittenberg, where he was the constant companion of Luther; and when, by the decision of the court of the elector Joachim, where he was court physician, he was obliged to aban- don a most lucrative position and practice, he was, by the intercession of his dear school friend, made body physician of the court of Mansfeld, and held this position until, in 1538, the elector John Frederick of Saxony made him his court doctor. He was also the house physician of the great Duchess Christiana of Cleve, and thus, by recon- ciliation of Hincmar of Rheims, he opposed the encyclical of Photius in 867, and defended the Oriental Church and her dogmas. In the Migne edition, these works are in the Patrologie, cxxi, 1-946 and 1155-1156. See Mabillon, Beneditinum Assamum, vol. ii and iii; Hist. Littéraire de la France, v, 322-331; Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für Theol, 1858, p. 544 sq.; Baur, Dogmengesch, vol. ii; Gieseler, Eccles. Hist.; Soames, Hist. of the Reformation, iii, 118 sq.

Rau, a name common to many literati, of whom we mention the following:

1. Christian, was born Jan. 25, 1618, at Berlin, studied at Wittenberg, and was made magister in 1536. He then went to Königsberg, Leipsic, Rostock, Hamburg, and Upsala, where he offered a pastorate, which he declined. In 1638 he visited England, and in 1639 set out for the Orient, and resided a short time at Smyrna, where he learned Turkish, Persian, Italian, Spanish, and Modern Greek. In Constantinople he made a valuable collection of old books, and in 1642 was made professor of Oriental languages at Oxford. In 1644 he was called to Utrecht; in 1645 he lectured at Amsterdam, in 1650 at Upsala, in 1669 at Kiel, and finally settled at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder in 1671, where he died, June 21, 1677. His best work is Concordantiarum Hebr. et Chaldeae Interpretationes (Berlin and Frankfort, 1667). A number of other works are enumerated in Jöcher's Gelehrten-Lexikon, iii, 126. See Furst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 198; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Literatur, p. 121, 721; Steinheinscher, Bibliographisches Handbuch, p. 114.

5. JÖHANN WILHelm, doctor and professor of theology, was born at Rentweinsdorf, in Franconia, March 9, 1745. In 1776 he was rector at Göttingen; in 1778 was made rector and professor of theology at Dortmund, and in 1779 ordi- nary professor of theology at Erlangen, where he died, July 1, 1807. He wrote, Nomina ad Question. an Orationis Montis Apostolor. Inclusor. Nostra dicta in Christ. Rauch, Christian Daniel, one of the most dis-tinguished German sculptors, and noted for his work in the latter years of his life in sacred art, was born at Arolse, the capital of the principality of Saldeck, in 1777. He began the study of sculpture as a boy, but the death of his father in 1797 obliged him to accept the humble but profitable position of valet to Frederick William II, king of Prussia. Under Frederick William III, he conceived a great liking for young Rauch, facilities for designing and modelling statues were afforded him, and he was even recommended as a pupil in the Academy of the Fine Arts. A statue of Endymion and a bust of queen Louisa of Prussia, executed at this time, convinced the king of Rauch's abilities; and although his request for dismissal had been repeatedly refused, he was now granted his request, and given a small pension in order to be enabled to proceed to Rome for further improvement. He spent six years in that city, working at his profession, and enjoyed the friendship of Thorwaldsen, Canova, and of William Hamilton, at that time Prussian minister there. Among his works at this time were base-reliefs of Hippolytus and Phedra, a Mars and Venus wounded by Dionys, a colossal bust of the king of Prussia, a bust of the painter Raphael Mengs, etc. In 1811 he was called by the king of Prussia to Berlin, to execute a monumental statue of queen Louisa. This great work obtained for Rauch a European repu- tation. It is in the mausoleum of the queen in the garden of Charlottenburg. Not quite satisfied with this triumph, he commenced the statue of the queen, which he finished eleven years afterwards, and which is allowed to be a masterpiece of sculpture. It is placed in the palace of Sans-Souci, near Potsdam. Rauch, af- ter this, lived principally at Berlin, but occasionally visited Rome, Carrara, and Munich. He labored indefatigably in his profession, and by 1824 had executed seventy busts in marble, of which twenty were of colossal size. He died at Dresden, while on a visit there, Dec. 3, 1857. His greatest secular work is the magnificent monument of Frederick the Great, which adorns Berli. His greatest work in sacred art is his famous Moses Group, in the entry of the Friedensruhe (Church of Peace) at Potsdam. It was begun in 1843 and finished in 1855, and is really his last great work. Noteworthy are also his group of the first two Polish kings—

RAUCOURT, LOUIS MARIE, a French prelate, was born in 1743. He entered the Benedictine Order, and studied theology in many of its monasteries. In 1768 he was made abbot of one of the Cistercian monasteries of France, in 1773 prior, and in 1783 abbot. He died in 1825, having preached the Resurrection, and greatly increased the library. Being expelled during the Revolution, he fled to-- Rauhe Haus (Germ. for Rough House), this, a great juvenile reform institution at the little hamlet of Hern, three miles from the German port of Hamburg, owes its origin to John Henry Wichern, the founder also of the German Home Mission Work. See INNER MISSION. The peculiar name which it bears (Rough House) is not due to any peculiar feature of the institution, as one might suppose, but rather to an awkward translation of the German poise into the classical language. The house in which the institution was first located was built some hundred and fifty years ago by a certain Mr. Hugi, a gentleman of wealth and culture, and in every sense quite contrary in character to the name given him in classical German. People of Hamburg's suburbs always knew the place by the name of the "Ruge House," and so the institution was called Rauhe Haus when it first opened on Nov. 1, 1883, by Wichern, with the assistance of his mother, he being then but a young man of twenty-five, and as yet not even in social relations with the opposite sex. For years previous to this event Wichern had conceived a plan for the amelioration of the condition of the lower classes. While at the university his mystical tendencies were noted. He frequently gave himself up to practices of great personal self-denial, and he formed an association of young men for self-improvement and religious edification. There was a constant longing for entire and unconditional consecration to God's service in this band, who all recognised the great fact that Christianity is only a truth to those who experience it. An acquaintance with Dr. Julius, then well known as a philanthropist, who had visited England and America in the interests of prison reform, only quickened Wichern in his purposes, and when, on his return from the university to Hamburg, he was placed in charge of a Sabbath-school in the religiously neglected suburbs of St. George, Wichern conceived a plan that should enable him to begin the task for which he felt himself called of God. Though poor himself, his father having died while he was yet scarcely out of the years of infancy, and his mother having depended upon him for years, he yet set about to realize his purpose. All the difficulties that arose in his way only acted as fresh incentives to exertion. His enthusiasm knew no restraints nor barriers. Finally he succeeded in interesting the syndic Seieving, a man of warm heart and fine pocketbook. A house upon his estate which was occupied by a gardener was vacated for Wichern as a place in which to try his schemes by actual experiment. It was a small space for so vast an undertaking, but Wichern was quite content to let his enterprise have a small beginning. Full of faith, and encouraged by what was already gained, he made immediate arrangements for the occupancy of the Rauhe Haüs (see illustration), small and poor as it was, and however uninviting its little windows, and thatched roof, and low ceilings appeared. With the help of a few interested friends, such repairs as were absolutely necessary were made, he entering the premises himself as an inmate. The day of opening was marked by the admission of three boys; in a short time the number increased to twelve, and thus humbly began, backed by the roof of straw, on the Seieving estate, a movement for the neglected youth of Germany whose influence is seen and felt not only in that country, but all over the Continent and far beyond it, and whose results can never be estimated by mortal man. A careful examination shows that, so far as the children of the Rauhe Haus alone are concerned, the more moderate estimate gives eighty per cent. of them as saved from what would inevitably have been a life of vice or crime. Describing this most Christian charity, Elishu Burritt says:

"These boys had been treated or regarded as a species of human vermi, baffling the powers of the authorities to suppress. They had slept under carts, in doorways, herding with swine and cattle by night, when begging or thieving hours were past. Such were the boys that found themselves looking at each other in wonder and surprise the first evening they gathered around the hearth-stone of that cottage-home. There was no illusion about this sudden transformation in their experience. In their midst was that bands, benevolent man, with his kind eyes and voice, looking and speaking to them as a father to his children. And there with his mother, with the law of kindness on her lips, in her looks, in every act and word; and he called her mother, and They call her mother; and the first evening in their commencement life they showed, felt, the mother of their love and veneration; and they, rogues, forswenken, hopeless castaways, conceived in sin and shaped in sinfulness, became the children of the chief of the city and its haunts, with its bright fire by night and its white beds under the moonlight; and its glee and its fun, and its Sing-Bible and its songs, and its great Bible and its little Psalm-books, was to be their home. The great chestnut-tree that threw out its arms over it, and all the little trees that played about the little banks, and bushes of that acre, were their own. . . . The feeling of home came warming into their hearts like the emotions of a new existence. The father opened the house door, and we entered our house, our trees, our cabbages, turnips, potatoes, pigns, and greese and ducks, which we will grow for our comfort."

The boys at once set to work. At the end of the first week they had made a year's progress in this new life and its hopes and expectations. The faith that they could do something, be something, and own something grew daily within them. "So eager did they become," says the first report of the institution, "to accomplish the undertaking that they frequently worked by lantern-light in the evening, rooting up bushes and trees, in spite of snow or rain."

As the number of pupils increased, and there seemed danger that the physical needs of the family would seriously affect its domestic character, Mr. Wichern divided the company into households, containing from twenty to fifteen each—the children themselves, as each new house was required, performing a large part of the work. The first colony, "under the care," as the report says, "of an earnest young disciple of the law of love, who had come from a distance to discipline his heart and life to the régime of kindness, and who had lived in their midst as an elder brother," commenced their separate family life with affecting ceremonies. On a bright Sabbath morning, and in the presence of several hundred friends, the new cottage was dedicated "to the Good Shepherd, through whose love and help twenty-seven boys had already been gathered into a sheltering fold."

With the assistance of many and ressources and resources, and unpretending character were built in a semicircle around the Rough House. Girls were admitted, and separate cottages were constructed for them; and a new building was erected which afforded a more commodious residence for the superintendent, a chapel, kitchen, and other apartments for the general use of the little community, which grew to be quite a village. In 1851 Mr. Burritt found a considerable cottage-village, with workshops, dwelling-houses, a little chapel, a wash- and drying-house, a printing-office, bake-house, and other buildings. There were in all about seventy boys and twenty-five girls, constituting four families of boys and two of girls. Each family-house was under the charge of a superintendent (Oberlehrer), who was assisted by two brothers, or more, who they are called—the superintendent being ordinarily a candidate for the ministry. The brothers are young men of the best character, who undergo a training of three or four years, after which they devote themselves to the care of similar institutions now rising all over Germany, quickened into life by this blessed experiment; or they become city missionaries, carrying the Gospel personally to the neglected and wretched. From thirty to forty brothers are inmates of this institution at one time, receiving no remuneration but their living, superintending the industry and aiding in conducting the moral discipline of the establishment. In its daily life this singular village is separated into three important divisions: domestic, educational, and industrial. Each family is to some extent an independent community. The members eat and sleep in their own dwelling, and the children belonging to each look up to their own particular father or mother as home-born children to a parent. Each household has thus its individual character, its peculiar interest and history, and each belongs to the possession of its own, such as the Beechens, the Dove's-nest, and the like. The bond of union is the loving father at the head of the whole institution; closely drawn by the morning and evening gatherings for prayer in the chapel or mother-house, and the celebration in common of the many festivals of the Church. The superintendents of the several houses meet the chief weekly to render their reports, and to discuss all questions of discipline. In their turn, each separate family visits him once a week in his study; and the record of each member, whether good or bad, is fully considered and passed upon—any good and being admitted at the close of the interview, to private conference with him, a privilege that is often improved. The children were told at the beginning that labor is the price of living, and that they must earn their own bread if they would enjoy it. Mr. Wichern did not point them to ease and affluence, but to an honorable poverty, which they were taught was not in itself an evil. In illustration of this, the dress, food, and furniture of the cottages are of the simplest character. The secular education given is of the most rudimental description, reaching about the middle of the primary schools; three quarters of the weekly recitations being devoted to the study of the Bible Catechism, Church history, and to music. The principal labor, farming, is carefully taught in all its branches; in addition, instruction is given in sewing, book binding, and other trades. The boys remain at the Rough House about four years, and the girls five. They are then apprenticed to service, chiefly in the city of Hamburg, whenever the work of redemption is sufficiently confirmed to admit of their exposure again to temptation. But it must not be inferred from the duration of their term of reform that the Rough House holds its inmates by force. As they come voluntarily, so they stay until dismissed by their own choice. The simple means relied upon for the accomplishment of this great reform work are prayer, the Bible, singing, affectionate conversation, severe punishment when unavoidable, and constant, steady employment in useful labor. "In a peculiar manner," says Dr. Peirce, "Wichern relied upon the Word of God. He made the whole Bible the familiar companion and food of the pupil. The whole Scripture was made to appeal to their minds, in an impressive series of readings, like a mine of priceless metal—reaching a climax in the Evangel of the New Testament. The thought that, miserable, wicked, despised as they were, Christ, the Son of God, loved them—loved them enough to suffer and die for them, and still loved them, even to feel their hearts, and gave them both hope and a strong incentive to reformation."

RAUMER

As the Raue Haus is now constituted, it is partly a refuge for morally neglected children, partly a boarding-school for the moral and intellectual education of those children of the higher classes whose vicious or unmanageable character puts them for training by such competent hands as the Raue Haus superintendents; lastly, a training-school for those who wish to become teachers or officials in houses of correction, hospitals, etc., in promotion of the objects of the Home Missionary Society of the Evangelical Church in the United States. Its trained men are employed in positions of trust, such as prison directors, stewards of estates, and superintendents of charitable houses. It was founded in 1845, and is a kind of conventual house. Entrance into this institution is limited to the age of twenty to thirty. Besides religious belief and good character, freedom from military duties, bodily and mental health, some scholastic acquirements, and a knowledge of some craft or of agriculture are required. The boarding-school was established in 1851, and at the same time a seminary was founded, in which twelve brethren of the Raue Haus are especially prepared for school-work. A printing-office, a bookbinder's shop, and bookbinding, form part of the institution also. The last named has its principal depot at Hamburg, and from it trade with the whole American Continent. The press has brought out numerous publications, and all these enjoy a very large sale. A monthly periodical called Fleische Blätter, devoted to the Inner Mission, is printed, edited, and circulated by the Raue Haus. It may be added also that during the recent German wars the inmates furnished the principal organizers of what was like our "Sanitary Commission" in the war with the South. Dr. Wichern is still living as we write (1878), but he has retired from all active connection with the Raue Haus. See Amer. Education, Monthly, Jan., 1888, art. ii.; Lee, Rev. J. J., 1874, p. 129; Repository, Dec. 1878, art. iii.; Hurst's Hagerbach, Church Hist. of the 18th and 19th Centuries (see Index).

Raulin, Hippolyte, a devoted Minim, was born about 1560, at Kethel. For many years he preached with great success, and was considered one of the most eloquent men of his day. In the capacity of provincial of his order he governed the province of Lyons; afterwards that of Lorraine. He wrote, Pasquier Orthodoxe, Mystérieux, et Prophétique sur l'Antiquité, Dignité, Noblesse, et Splendor des Fleurs de Lys (Paris, 1687), and other works. See Biog. Générale, s. v.

Raulin, Jean, a French preacher, was born at Toul in 1443. After finishing his studies, he received the degree of D.D. Before this time he had composed a commentary upon the Logic of Aristotle. In 1481 he was made president of the college at Navarre, and so acquitted himself that he was greatly esteemed. De sireing to live a more seduced life, he entered the Abbey of Cluny in 1497, and by his exemplary life led many others to follow his example. Under the direction of cardinal Amboise, he greatly aided in reforming the Order of St. Benedict. Raulin enjoyed the same reputation as Cardinal Millay and Menota. His sermons were plain, methodical, and replete with citations made from sacred writings and scholars. He wrote, Epistola (Paris, 1520): — Doctrinale de Triplici Morte, Naturale, Cœpe, et Gelennum (ibid., 1520). His Sermones in Latini were published in Paris in 1642. He died February 5, 1514. Raumer, Frederic von, the accomplished German historian, was born at Wodziitz, in Anhalt-Dessau, in 1781. In 1811 he was appointed professor of history at Breslau, and in 1819 he was called to Berlin. In 1859 he was released from the duty of lecturing, but he still continued till near his death, June 18, 1873. He was one of those to whom the New Testament was the key of all the living German professors. He is the author of the well-known History of the Hohenstaufen Dynasty (1822-
RAUMER, Karl Georg von, doctor of philosophy and theology, brother of the well-known historian Frederic (q. v.), was born April 7, 1738, at Wurtzlst, in Anhalt. He was educated in the Gymnasium in Berlin, he went to Göttingen for the study of languages, history, and poetry. From Göttingen he went to Halle in 1800, where he attended the lectures of Wolf and Becker, and where he also made the acquaintance of Steffens, who introduced him in 1805 to the famous geologist Werner at Freiberg. In 1808 we see Raumer at Paris, in 1810 at Berlin; in 1811 he is professor and member of council for mining at Breslau. The Franco-Prussian war, in which he acted as adjutant to general Greisener, being over, he was called to Leipzig in 1815 and in 1816 he was called to a professorship in Halle and remained till 1823, being obliged to leave the place in consequence of distrust aroused against him. He then acted as tutor in the Dittmar Educational Institution at Nürnberg, when, in 1827, he was called as professor to Erlangen, which position he held for nearly thirty years. RAUMER, Rudolph von, professor of languages and son of Karl Georg von Raumer, was born April 14, 1815, at Breslau. He prepared himself at the Gymnasium in Erlangen, Nürnberg, and in 1836 entered the University of Erlangen, continuing, however, his studies at Göttingen and Munich. In 1840 he commenced lecturing at Erlangen, in 1852 was made professor in ordinary, and died there Aug. 30, 1876. He wrote: Die Einwirkung des Christenthums auf die altdeutsche Sprache (Stuttgart, 1845), which he concludes with the remarkable words: "the destiny of our (the German) people will always be connected with Christianity":—"Ein Wort der Verständigung über die Schrift: die Erscheinung der christentums, etc." (ibid. 1845);—Geschichte der germanischen Philologie, vorwiegend in Deutschland (ibid. 1870). RAUSG, Lucas, one of the earlier Lutheran ministers in this country, was born in 1725 in the city of Hermannstadt, in Transylvania. He was the son of Lucas Rau, an eminent German divine, under whose careful training he enjoyed the best opportunities for mental and moral culture. Designed for the Christian ministry, his talents were early and prominently discovered at the universities of Leipzig and Jena. He immigrated to the United States in 1750, and at once identified himself with its interests. He commenced his labors in Philadelphia, and, as there were few organized Lutheran churches at the time and the members were scattered, his work was very much of an itinerant character. In 1754 he removed to York, Pa., where he continued to reside until his death, which occurred July 11, 1788. Mr. Raus enjoyed the reputation of being an accomplished scholar, particularly in the department of the Latin, Greek, and Oriental languages. He conversed with great fluency in several modern languages. His descendants are still numbered among the citizens of the United States so long labor. See Luth. Observer, April 19, 1876.

RAUSCHER, Joseph Otmar, one of the most prominent ecclesiastical princes of Austria and of the 19th century, was born Oct. 6, 1797, at Vienna, being the son of an imperial officer. He first intended to study law, which he did for three years, but afterwards bestowed himself to the study of theology, and, almost twenty years of age, he was ordained priest Aug. 27, 1823. For two years he labored as vicar at Hitteldorf, not far from Vienna, but he was soon called to Salzburg as professor of canon law and Church history. Here he commenced the elaboration of a comprehensive Church histroy, of which the first two volumes, reaching down to Justinian (Salzburg, 1824—29), promised so well for the young author that he undoubtedly would have become one of the brightest stars among the Roman Catholic historians were he left in his position; but in 1829 he was appointed in the capacity of imperial librarian at Vienna, and from that time on he was invested with different offices, to which also belonged the instruction of the present Austrian emperor and his brothers. In 1849 the metropolitan archbishop of Salzburg, prince von Schwartzburg, his former pupil and now his friend, appointed Raucher to the bishopric of Seckau. For four years he discharged his episcopal duties, amid great difficulties, in the most zealous and happy manner, when, in 1853, the emperor appointed him to the archiepiscopal see. In his new position the emperor intrusted to him a mission which connected his name with the Church history of Austria, viz. the negotiation of a concordat between Austria and the Apostolic See, which, unhappily for Austria, was signed Aug. 18, 1855. For this deed Raucher was made cardinal, Dec. 17 of the same year. For twenty years Raucher moulded the ecclesiastical as well as political affairs of Austria; for his position made him not only the intimate counsellor of the emperor, but also a prominent member of the House of Peers. It would be too long to enumerate his numerous special contributions to letters, which are all distinguished both by the depth of thought as well as by their rhetorical and noble language. He also took a prominent part in the last Vatican Council, and died Nov. 24, 1875. See Literarischer Handwiss, 1875, p. 470; Kurz, Lehrbuch der Kirchen- geschichte (Stuttgart, 1874), ii, p. 244 sqq. (B. P.)

RAUTENSTRACHT, FRANZ STEPHAN, a German theologian of the Romish Church, was born at Platten, Bo... hemia, in 1734, became a Benedictine monk at Braunan, and was there teacher of philosophy, theology, and canon law. In 1773 he was made prelatus of the convent and director of the theological faculty at Prague, and in the following year was called to Vienna to assist in the Ministry of Education. He died at Erlik, Hungary, in 1806. He was a more than ordinary man, and as a Romanist enjoyed the confidence of all liberal-mined men. He was a favorite at the court of the scholarly emperor, and was the intimate friend of Huntheim (q. v.), whose liberal ideas he favored; but on these very accounts he had much to suffer from the enmity of the Jesuits. He prepared the scheme for the course of instruction for the theological faculty in the Austrian universities, and published several minor works.
On the occasion of the visit of pope Pius VI in Vienna,
he wrote Patriot. Betrauchungen, etc.; but he is best known by his Synoptik Juris Ecclesiasticii (Vienna, 1776). See Sabriick, Kirchenrecht, seit der Reformation, vii, 144 sq.—Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Ravana (from the causal of the Sanscrit rv, ery, alarm; hence literally he who causes alarm) is the name of the Rākṣasās (q. v.) who, at the time of Raṅga, ruled over Lankā or Ceylon, and, having carried off Sīva, the wife of Raṅga, to his residence, was uttimerically conquered and slain by the latter. Ravana is described as having been a giant with ten faces, and, in consequence of aesthetics and devotion, as having obtained from Sīva a promise which bestowed upon him unlimited power, even over the gods. As the promise of Sīva could not be revoked, Vishnu evaded its efficacy in becoming incarnate as Raṅga, and hence killed the demon-giant.—Chambers’s Encyclop. s. v. See VisMūc.

Ravelin, Pierre, a French Protestant theologian, was born about 1690. He was a descendant of the cel-berated Jean Mercier. He was pastor of a church at Raven (C. corone, ‘orē; Sept. and New Test. τῶν κοινῶν, Vulg. corone), the well-known bird of that name which is mentioned in various passages in the Bible. There is no doubt that the Heb. ‘orē is correctly translated,

the old versions agreeing on the point, and the etymolyogy, from a root (C. corone) signifying “to be black,” favoring this rendering. A raven was sent out by Noah from the ark to see whether the waters were abated (Gen. viii, 7). This bird was not allowed as food by the Mosaic law (Lev. xi, 15); the word ‘orē is doubtless used in a generic sense, and includes other species of the genus Corvus, such as the crow (C. corone), and the hossed crow (C. cornix). Ravens were the means,
under the divine command, of supporting the prophet Elijah at the brook Cherith (1 Kings xvii, 6, 6). They are expressly mentioned as instances of God’s protecting love and goodness (Job xxxviii, 41; Luke xii, 24; Ps. exilv, 9). They are enumerated with the owl, the bittre, etc., as marking the desolation of Edom (Isa. xxxiv, 11). “The locks of the beloved” are compared to the gloomy blackness of the raven’s plumage (Cant. v, 11).
The raven’s carnivorous habits, and especially his readiness to attack the eye, are alluded to in Prov. xxx, 17. See Ostr. The Sept. and Vulg. differ materially from the Hebrew and our A. V. in Gen. viii, 7; for whereas in the Hebrew we read “that the raven went forth to and fro [from the ark] until the waters were dried up,” in the two old versions named above, together with the Nestor, the raven is represented as “returning, until the waters were dried from off the earth.” On this subject the reader may refer to Houbigant (Not. Crit. i, 12), Bochart (Hieroz. ii, 801), Rosenmüller (Schol. in 1
T.), Kalisch (Genesea), and Patrick (Commentary), who shows the manifest incorrectness of the Sept. in representing the raven as keeping away from the ark while the waters lasted, but as returning to it when they were dried up. The expression “to and fro” clearly proves that the raven must have returned to the ark at intervals. The bird would doubtless have found food in the floating carcasses of the deluge, but would require a more solid resting-ground than they could afford. See Dukan. The subject of Elijah’s sustenance at Cherith by means of ravens has given occasion to much fanciful speculation. It has been attempted to show that the ‘orēbin (“ravens”) were the people of Orba, a small town near Cherith; this theory has been well answered by Reland (Pudeli, ii, 913). Others have found in the ravens merely merchants; while Michaelis has attempt-to show that Elijah merely plundered the ravens’ ests of hares and other game! Keil (Comment. on 1 Kings xxiv) makes the following, just observation: “The text knows nothing of bird-catching and nest-robbing,
but acknowledges the Lord and Creator of the creatures,
who commanded the ravens to provide his servant with bread and water.” It has also been well replied that an animal unfit for food or sacrifice did not necessarily den what it touched. “An ass was as unclean as a raven;
yet no one was polluted by riding on an ass, or by eating that which an ass had carried.” An objection more to the point would be that the flesh which ravens would bring would leave the prophet no opportunity of being satisfied that it was such as he could legally receive;
either that it was the flesh of a clean beast, or, if so, that it had not died with the blood unstrained. But to this, too, the answer is obvious: if Jehovah could so restrain and overrule the instincts of these voracious birds as to make them minister to his servant, he could also take care that they should select nothing but what was fit, and he could give Elijah confidence that it was so. Some, however, understand 2 rula to be there meant.
See Elijah.

The raven belongs to the order Curaeae, family Corvidea. The raven is so generally confounded with the carrion crow that even in the works of naturalists
the figure of the latter has sometimes been substituted for that of the former, and the manners of both have been mixed up together. They are, it is true, very similar, belonging to the same Linnean genus, Corvus, and having the same intensely black color; but the raven is the larger, weighing about three pounds; has proportionately a smaller head, and a bill fuller and stouter at the point. Its black color is more iridescent (hence the comparison to the bridegroom’s locks, Cant.
v, 11), with gleams of purple passing into green, while that of the crow is more steel-blue; the raven is also the gifted with greater sagacity; may be tended to articulate words; is naturally observant and solitary; lives in pairs; has a most acute scent; and flies to a great height. Unlike the crow, which is gregarious in its habits, the raven will not even suffer its young, from the moment they can shift for themselves, to remain within its brunt; and, therefore, though a bird fond in nearly all countries, it is nowhere abundant (Bo-chart. Hieron, ii. 796 sq.; Kimchi on Psa. xiv. 7.) Whether the raven of Palestine is the common species, or the Coreuus montanus of Temminck, is not quite determined; for there is of the ravens, or greater form of crows, a smaller group including two or three others, all similar in manners, and unlike the carrion crows (Corvus corone, L.) which are grageorous and seemingly identical in both焚烧 and in the time of year that ravens will descend without fear among a flight of crows, take possession of the carrion that may have attracted them, and keep the crows at a distance till they themselves are gorged. (Comp. Horace, Ep. i. 16, 48; Aristophanes, Fr. 929.) The habits of this whole genus is typified by the name вор render it unclean in the Hebrew law; and the malignant, ominous expression of the raven, together with the color of its plumage, powers of voice, and solitary habits, are the causes of that universal and often superstitious attention with which mankind have ever regarded it.

In the mythological history of the Gentiles, we find the appellation of Ravens bestowed upon an ecclesiastical order of priesthood. In Egypt, it seems, the temples of Ammon were served by such—perhaps those priests that occur in their catacomb paintings are ravens, and dressed in black. More than one temple in Greece had similar ravens. It was the usual symbol of slaughter among the Scandinavians; and a raven banner belonged to the Danes, and also to the Saxons; one occurs among the emblems of the Norsemen in the Bayeux tapestry; and it was formerly a custom in the Benedictine abbeys on the Continent to maintain a very large cage of a couple of ravens, where several are recorded to have lived above fifty years. The Raven of the Sea, that ominous bird in Northern mythology, is properly the corvus or corvus corone of the Copts. Jewish and Arabic writers tell strange stories of this bird and its cruelty to young; hence, say some, the Lord's express care for the young raven after they had been driven out of the nests by the parent birds; but this belief in the raven's want of affection to its young is entirely without foundation. To the fact of the raven being a common bird in Palestine, and to its habit of flying restlessly about in constant search for food to satisfy its voracious appetite, may, perhaps, be traced the reason for its being selected by our Lord and the inspired writers as the especial object of God's providing care. There is something weird and shrewd in the expression of the raven's countenance; a union of cunning and malignity, which may have contributed to give it among widely separated nations, and in remote centuries, the name of the emissary of evil. Its black hue—the hue of night and of mourning—its reclusive, solitary suspicion, and its harsh croak have no doubt increased its uncanny reputation. Certain is it that the "infausta corvus" has long been feared and hated as the messenger of evil and the prognosticator of death, while the Romans dedicated it to Apollo as the god of divination. An anonymous writer familiar with the habits of the bird has ingeniously suggested an explanation of its divining power.

"The smell of death is so grateful to them that they use it with a loud croak of satisfaction instantly on perceiving it. In passing over sheep, if a tainted smell is perceptible, they cry vehemently. From this propensity the raven to announce his satisfaction in the smell of death has probably arisen the common notion that he is aware of its approach among the human race, and foretells it by his croakings. I have no doubt the idea is founded in truth, although I think the coming event is not communicated to the raven by any immediate or supernatural means, but that in its animal or human habitation from which a sickly or cadaverous smell may escape, it is perfectly natural for him to announce his perception of it by his cries." (Zoologist, p. 217.) The shepherd had a better reason for calling the raven a bird of ill omen. A more vigilant or more cruel enemy to the flock can hardly exist, and it frequently makes its ferocious assaults on the yet living victim. See Wood, Brit. Animals, p. 439 sq.; Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 198 sq.

RAVENNA, an important city of Central Italy, forty-three miles east-southeast from Bologna, and four and a half miles from the Adriatic, with a population of nearly 60,000 people, was once the capital of the empire (from A.D. 401), and is not only a very ancient city, whose history is of great interest to Christianity on account of its early relation to the Church, but more particularly on account of the different ecclesiastical councils which have been held there, and the disputes which the metropolitan claims of Ravenna maintained in early mediaval days with the bishopric of Rome, especially in the 7th century, Under Constans (666), in the 8th against pope Hadrian, and in the 9th, when in 861 the strife was finally put at rest at a synod in Rome. Aside from the council of bishops in 419, called by Honorius to decide upon the choice of popes between Boniface and Eulalius, the following councils of Ravenna (Concilia Ravennata) are noteworthy:

(L.) Held July 22, 877, by pope John VIII, at the head of forty-nine bishops (Holstenius and Labbe say the number of bishops was 130). This council was held to remedy the disorders of the Church. Nineteen chapters remain to us, relating to the discipline and privileges of the Church; also a letter confirming the possession of a monastery to the bishop of Antun.

Chap. 1. Enjoys the metropolitan to send to Rome for the pallium within three months after his consecration, and forbids him to exercise any of the functions of his office until that be done.

2. Enjoys all bishops elect shall be consecrated by their metropolitans within three months after election, under pain of excommunication.

3. Forbids metropolitan to make use of the pallium except on great festivals and during massa.

5, 6, 7, and 8. Excommunicate and anathematize those who rob the Church, injure ecclesiastics, and commit various other crimes.

9. Declares those persons to be themselves excommunicati who voluntarily communicate with the excommunicati.

10. Excommunicates those who absolve themselves from their juridical church on three Sundays successively.

19. Forbids Judges and royal commissioneers to hold courts and to lodge in churches.

-Labbe, Concil. ix. 299.

(II.) Held in 896 (or 904, according to Labbe) by John IX, in the matter of Formosus and Stephen; the emperor Lambert being present and seventy-four bishops. Ten regulations were approved.

1. Enacts the new ecclesiastical canons of the fathers, and all that is contained in the capitularies of Charlemagne, Louis le Debonnaire, Lothaire, and Louis II.

2. Confirms the privileges granted to the Church of Rome by the emperors.

4. Approves all that had been done in the Council of Rome, A.D. 896, in the matter of Formosus.

5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10. Relate to the political circumstances of the Roman see.

-Labbe, Concil. ix. 507.

(III.) Held in April, 967. In this council the emperor, Otho I, yielded to the pope, John XIII, the city and territory of Ravenna. Heroldus, archbishop of Salzburg, was deposed and excommunicated; the act of deposition being subscribed on April 25 by the emperor and fifty-seven bishops, including the pope. Lastly, Magdeburg was erected into an archbishopric: this, however, was not completed until the following year.

-Labbe, Concil. ix. 674.

(IV.) Held May 1, 967, by Gerbert, archbishop of Ravenna, and eight suffragans. Three canons remain of which

1. Condemns an infamous custom which existed in the cathedral of Ravenna of selling the holy eucharist and chrism.

-Labbe, Concil. ix. 766.

(V.) Held April 30, 1014, by the new archbishop, Arnold, to remedy the abuses caused by the long vacancy of eleven years, and the intrusion of Adalbert, who had unlawfully conferred holy orders and dedicated certain churches. It was determined that those upon whom orders had been thus conferred should remain suspended until the matter could be minutely considered; and that the consecrations of churches and oratories made by Adalbert were null and void.—Llabèe, Concil. ix, 853.

(F.) Held by the cardinals of St. Anastasia, in 1126. Here the patriarchs of Aquileia and Venice, or Grade, were deposed, having been convicted of favoring schismatics.—Pagi; Llabèe, Concil. x, 936.

(VII.) Held in 1296, July 8, by Bonifacius the archbishop, who presided, assisted by eight bishops, his suffragans; no canons were published.

3. Exhorts the clergy to almsgiving, and grants indulgences to those who feed and clothe the poor.

4. Relates to the dress of the clergy; and forbids them to carry arms without the bishop's permission.

5. Orders that the usual daily distributions shall be made only to those canons who attend the holy office.

Llabèe, Concil. xi, 1238.

(VIII.) Held in 1310 by Rainaldus the archbishop, in the matter of the Templars. Present, eight bishops of the province, three inquisitors, two preaching friars, and one Minorite: seven Templars were brought before them, who constantly affirmed their innocence. On the following day it was determined that they were not confessors from a fear of torture only should be considered innocent; nevertheless, there were five who went through the canonical ordeal.—Llabèe, Concil. xi, 1333.

IX.) Held in 1311 by Rainaldus the archbishop, five bishops and thirteen professors attending. Thirty-two canons were published.

6. Orders mass to be said daily for the souls of the other bishops in behalf of a bishop deceased.

7. Orders, yearly, on July 29, a solemn service shall be said for the deceased bishops; and that on that day twelve poor persons shall be fed.

8. Orders that all things be done on behalf of patrons and benefactors of churches.

9. Orders that the sacraments be administered fasting.

10. Orders that alms be given to the poor every Sunday, after the gospel and oratory, of the festivals and fast-days of the coming week.

11. Orders that the form of baptism shall be publicly said in church three times a year.

12. Orders that the canon "omnibus unigenitis sexis" shall be published at Advent and Lent. That medical men shall not visit a patient a second time if he have not called in the priest.

13. Forbids to give a benefice to any one who cannot read or chant.

14. Orders annual synods.

15. Orders that Jews shall wear a distinguishing badge.

16. Orders that canons be punished for striking, maltreating, and driving the clergy from their churches.

—Llabèe, Concil. xi, 1569.

(X.) Held in 1314 by the same archbishop, assisted by six bishops and four deputies. Twenty canons were published.

17. Forbids to ordain to the priesthood persons under twenty-five years of age; also to ordain a deacon under twenty, and a sub-deacon under sixteen years.

18. Orders that the church bells shall be rung when a bishop presides, that the people may come out to receive his blessing upon their knees; also regulates the form to be observed by the chapter of a cathedral upon the bishop's visit.

19. Orders, under pain of excommunication, that no monks, or other persons, can claim exemption from episcopal visitation upon plea of prescriptive right, or any other plea.

20. Enacts that the clergy shall be soberly dressed; that they shall carry carms, nor dress in colored clothes; that they shall wear a close cassock, observe the tresses, and keep their hair cut short, etc.

21. Forbids men to enter the monastic houses of females.

22. Orders curates to teach their people the form of baptism once a year.

23. Orders fasting and almsgiving on the three days before the visit of provincial councilors.

24. Revokes the permission given to monks to preach indulgences.

For the Council of Ravenna held in 1317, see Bologna.

Ravenscroft, John Starkz, D.D., an Episcopal minister in America, afterwards bishop of North Carolina, was born near Blandford, Prince George County, Va., in 1772. He entered William and Mary College in 1789, but with little profit; and, on his return from Scotland soon after, settled in Lunenburg County. In 1810 his mind was changed, and he joined the "Republican Methodists," and became a lay elder in their Church. He was subsequently ordained in the Protestant Episcopal Church, became assistant minister at Richmond, and was elected bishop the same year. In 1820 he retired to Williamsburg, and was from ill-health, and on his return to North Carolina, died March 5, 1850. He published several Sermons and Charges:—also, The Doctrine of the Church Vindicated, etc. —Revealed Religion Defended against the No-Comment Principle. Sixty-one Sermons and a Memoir (2 vols. 8vo) were also published after his death. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 617.

Ravenscroft, Stephen, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born of pious and respectable parents at Staffordshire, England, March 6, 1803, was converted very young, and licensed to preach in his eighteenth year by the Wesleyans. In 1838 he entered the ministry of the English Congregational Church. He was a strong opponent of the connection of the church with the government, as a minister of republican institutions, and as loyal a citizen as ever breathed the free air of America. In 1839 he was admitted into the Indiana Conference, and appointed to Booneville. His subsequent appointments were Mount Vernon, New Lebanon, Carlisle, Spencer, Blanchfield, and Little Egypt. In 1840 he was called away from his charge his health failed, and he was located at his own request. He moved with his family to Point Commerce, and supplied Linton and New Albany circuits. He afterwards travelled as a Bible agent in Clark and Floyd counties until his health became so poor that he had to give up the work entirely. He then moved to Rockport, Ind., where, as a supply, he ended his nine years' service as a local preacher. In 1859 he was re-admitted into conference and placed on the superannuated list, which relation he sustained until his death. In 1869 he moved to Worthington, Ind., and in 1879 to Petersburgh, Ind., where he was appointed postmaster, and where he died, Oct. 20, 1871. See Minutes of Conf. 1872, p. 79.

Ravenscroft, Thomas, an eminent English musical composer, deserves a place here for his devotion to sacred subjects. He was born in 1592, received his musical education in St. Paul's choirmaster, and had the degree of bachelor of music conferred on him when only fifteen years of age. In 1611 appeared his Melismata, Musical Phanais, a collection of twenty-three part-songs, some of them of great beauty; and three years later he brought out another collection of part-songs under the title of Brief Discourses, with an essay on the old musical modes. Turning his attention to psalmody, he published in 1621 a collection of psalm-tunes for four voices, entitled The Whole Book of Psalms, composed into Four Parts by Soundy Authors, to which Tunes have been annexed, usually sung in England, Scotland, Wales, Germany, Italy, France, and the Netherlands. This was the first publication of its kind, and all similar works of later date have been largely indebted to it. Among the contributors to this collection were Tallis, Morley, Dowland, and all the greatest masters of the day; the name of John Milton, the father of the poet, appears as the composer of York and Norwich tunes; while St. David's, Canterbury, Bangor, and many others which have since become popular, are by Ravenscroft himself. Each of the psalm-tunes has a distinctive title assigned to it. Two collections of secular songs similar to the Melismata, and entitled Pammelia and Deutervocala, have been assigned to Ravenscroft; but it is probable that only a few of these songs were composed by him, while he may have revised and edited the whole. melia, and Deuteronomia was printed by the Roxburghe Club in 1823. He died about 1840.—Chambers. See also Eng. Ch. Register, vol. i; Amer. Quar. Ch. Rec. Jan. 1871, p. 526.

RAVESTYN, Josse (in Latin Tilletanus), a Belgian theologian, was born about 1506 at Tielt, Flanders. He was educated at Louvain, and taught theology there. He was sent by Charles V to the Council of Trent (1551), then to the Colloquy of Worms (1557), and disputes were had at these ecclesiastical councils by his knowledge and moderation. In 1559 he replaced Ruard Tapper in the charge of the monks who had the care of the hospital of Louvain. He had twice been elected rector of the university of that city, and held divers benefices. He was a zealous defender of the Church, and much opposed to the errors of the Calvinists, whom he regarded as his most ardent adversary. He died at Louvain Feb. 7, 1571. His principal writings are: Confessionis edita a Ministris Antverpiae Confessiti (Louvain, 1557, 8vo); the Confession of the pastors had already been refuted by William of Linda.—Apologia Catholica Confessitionis, etc. (ibid. 1568, 8vo); directed against the Centuries de Magdeburg, of which Matthew Flach Francowitz was the principal author.—De assumeda apol. de Ecclesii Triumfentia de Sacramentis (ibid. 1568-70, 2 vols. 12mo). He left several works in manuscript.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ravignan, GUSTAVUS FRANCIS XAVIER DELACROIX de, one of the most celebrated of Roman Catholic preachers of our times, and also a distinguished member of the Jesuit Order, was born at Bayonne Dec. 2, 1723. He studied in the Lycee Bonaparte at Paris, and was by his parents intended for the legal profession, which he also entered by obtaining his degree and being named auditor of the Cour Royale at Paris. In 1741 he received an appointment in the Tribunal of the Seine. The prospect thus opened for him, however, lost its attraction after a change of views in religion had made him serious about the future, and in 1782 he formed the resolution of relinquishing his career at the bar, and entering the Church. Having spent some time in the College of St. Sulpice, he soon passed into the novitiate of the Jesuits at Montmore, and thence to Dole and St. Acheul for his theological studies, at the termination of which he was himself appointed a professor. The religious fervor of his soul found expression in many of the material forms which prevail so generally among the Romanists of our country. Thus, for example, he wore for a long time, as a mark of penance, a leather girdle stuck full of needles, around his waist, on the bare body. On the expulsion of the Jesuits from France in 1800, father Ravignan withdrew to Freiburg, in Switzerland, where he continued to teach in the schools of his own order; but after some time, when he was supposed to have gained sufficient notoriety by the afflicting discipline of his body, he was transferred to the more congenial duty of preaching, first in several of the Swiss Parishes, and afterwards in Savoy, at Chambery, at St. Maurice, and other places. In 1803, in 1853, he appeared in the pulpit of the cathedral of Amiens. In the following year he was chosen to preach the Leuten sermons at the church of St. Thomas d'Aquin in Paris; and finally, in 1857, was selected to replace Lamennais at Notre Dame de Paris in the duty of conducting the special "conferences" for men which had been opened in that church. For ten years father Ravignan occupied this pulpit with a success which has rarely been equalled, and his Conferences are regarded as models of orœsætical eloquence. In 1842 he undertook, in addition, to preach each evening during the entire Lent; and it is to the excessive fatigue thus induced, as well as to the many trials imposed, that the premature break-down of his strength is ascribed. To the labors of the pulpit he added those also of the press. He published an Apology of his order in 1844; and in 1846 a more extended work with the same view, Clement XIII et Clement XIV (2 vols. 8vo), which was intended as a reply to the Life of Clement XIV by the Oratorian father Theiner. These, with some occasional Sermons and Conferences, constitute the sum of the publications issued during his life. In 1855 he was invited by the emperor Napoleon III to preach in the Lent at the Tuileries. He died Feb. 26, 1858, in the convent of his order at Paris. None of the Jesuit preachers of our times have so zealously labored among the Protestants as father Ravignan, but, alas! too frequently he employed measures in no way adding honor to the already overcast name of the Jesuitical order. His Memoirs have been published by his brethren, and a collected edition of his works and remains has been for some time in progress. The Memoir has been translated into English, under the title of The Life of Father Ravignan, by father De Ponlevoy (Dublin, 1862; N. Y. 1863).

Rawle is, in ecclesiastical language, the name of a cloak worn by women mourners. See MOURNING.

Rawlett, JOHN, an English theologian, was born about 1642, and was a lecturer in divinity at Newcastle-upon-Tyne at the time of his death, in 1686. He published, Explication of the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer (Lond. 1672, 8vo; 1706, 8vo);—Dialogue between Two Protestants (1691, 8vo) and The Dissenter Monitor, in Welsh (Oxon. 1689, 8vo);—Treatise of Sacramental Coemmentation (5th ed. Lond. 1692, 8vo).

Rawley, WILLIAM, an Anglican divine of some note, was born about 1648, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he was made fellow in 1667. He frequently took part in the polemics of the late 18th century. In 1719 became rector of Bowthorpe, Norfolk; in 1716, vicar of Hunstanton, Norfolk. He was chaplain and amanuensis to Lord Bacon, and subsequently chaplain to Charles II and Charles II. He wrote prefaces and dedications to some Bacon's works, and translated several of them into Latin. In 1698, after Bacon's death, he published them in folio form; and in 1657 he published, under the title of Resuscitatio, several other of Bacon's tracts, with a memoir of the author prefixed. In 1661 he republished the Resuscitatio, with additions. He died in 1667.

Rawlin, Richard, an English Independent divine, was born in 1687, and flourished as pastor of an Independent congregation in Fetter Lane, London. He died in 1757. He published, Christ the Righteousness of His People, seen Discourses on Justification by Faith in Him (1741, 8vo; 1722, 1797, 12mo).

Rawlings, CHARLES, a Wesleyan preacher of some note, was born at Cheltenham, in 1784. He was destined for mercantile life, but finally, brought under the influence of the Wesleyans, he was converted and taken into the Church. In 1836 he entered the ministry, and for twenty-nine years filled some of the best circuits in the connection. He last held the appointment of superintendent of the Swansea (English) Circuit. He died July 14, 1865. See Cambria Daily Leader (of that date).

Rawlinson, George, an English divine, noted also as a scientist, was born in 1819, and was educated at King's College and Emmanuel College, Cambridge. In 1844 he was made fellow of St. Mark's, and in 1849, of St. Mary's, in the University of London. In 1856 he was appointed professor of applied sciences at Elphinstone College, Bombay, where he remained until his death in September following. He published in 1857, at Bombay, a work on dynamics. His Elementary Descriptive Geometry, edited by Elgood, was published at Cambridge and London (1861, 8vo). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Rawlinson, John, D.D., an English divine, noted also as an educator, flourished in the first half of the 17th century. He was at one time principal of St. Edmund's Hall. He published, Three Sermons (Lond. 1699; 11;
Raymond of Magnolione, a French medieval prelate, flourished near the opening of the 12th century. It is supposed that he was of the family of the nobles of Montpellier. He was bishop from 1128, but not without opposition. The count of Toulouse, finding the choice of Raymond contrary to his views, for revenge, tried to destroy the church of Magnolone; but the constancy of Raymond triumphed over this opposition, and forced the same Bernard to make public confession of his error. Raymond, with many of the acts mentioned or published by the Italia Christina and L'Historie de Languedoc of M. Vaissete. He died in November, 1159.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Raymond of Penafort (Saint), a Spanish Dominican, was born in 1175 at the château of Penafort in Catalonia, and belonged to one of the noble families of Spain allied to the royal house of Aragon. He was educated at Barcelona, and made such progress that at the age of twenty he taught the liberal arts at that place. He went to perfect himself at the University of Bologna, where he received the title of doctor in civil and canonical law. Attracted by his munificence, which was still rising, Béanger, bishop of Barcelona, on his returning to his church from Rome, went to see him at Bologna, and succeeded in persuading him to return with him to Spain. He did not, however, content himself with the mere discharge of his duties of canoni- cate and his archdeaconry in the Barcelona cathedral, but was very much occupied with all manner of good works. He finally felt persuaded to take the Dominican habit, April 1, 1222. His example was followed by several physicians, and sole pastor on church at removal of his father to Enfield. He occupied this position for ten years, and then became pastor of the Broadmead Chapel in Bristol, and at the same time president of the Baptist Institute in that place. Here he continued until his death, May 23, 1825. Brown University conferred the degree of D.D. on Dr. Rayland in 1772. His sermons, etc., were collected, published, and in two volumes. The funeral ser- mon of Dr. Rayland by Robert Hall presents a most charming portrait of this excellent man. (J. C. S.)

Raymond, Sr. (Spanish, San Raymond), a Roman Catholic prelate who flourished in Spain in the first half of the 13th century, is frequently called by his sur- name Navarre, as if he owed to that country the title he afterwards took of the body of his mother after her death by the Cesaréan operation. He was thus born at Portel, in Catalonia, in 1204, and was of a gentleman's family of small fortune. His early life was spent in the moun- tain fastnesses of his native country; but when he had attained to the years of a maturer youth, he set out for the court, and there attracted attention. The dismis- sion of his royal associates disgusted him, and he sought the retirement of the cloister. He joined the Order of Mercy, which aimed at the redemption of captives from the Moors. He was admitted by the founder finding St. Peter Nolasco (q. v.). While in Algiers he was taken up by the authorities, and punished with excori- ating tortures of the body; but he bore all meekly, and even continued his work after his release. The story goes that, when informed of the sentence of death of one of his companions, he put his hands to his hair, and his lips were bored through with a red-hot iron and fastened with a padlock. He was released after eight months' imprisonment, and taken back to Spain by friends of his, and under direction of the pope of Rome, who shortly after made him a cardinal. He was also made the general of his order, and as such was invited to visit Rome. On his way thither he fell sick at Cordova, only six miles from Barcelona, and died Aug. 81, 1240. Both pope Gregory IX and king James of Aragon assisted at his funeral. Pope Alexander VII inserted Raymond's name in the Martyrology in 1657. See Butler, Lives of the Saints, viii, 567 sq.
he wished even to raise him to the metropolitan see of Tarragona, but Raymond preferred the solitude of Barcelona to all the advantages which his friends had hoped for him. Nominated general of his order in 1236, he gave up his charge two years later, and contributed much by his zeal and zeal to the establishment of the Order of Mercy. Peter Nolasccus was one of his converts, and so were many other distinguished characters of that period. Indeed, his influence is said to have been so great that the expulsion of the Moors from Spain is principally credited to his agency. Raymond was also the spiritual director of the king of Aragon, and he persuaded his royal master James to favor the establishment of the Inquisition in his kingdom and in Languedoc, and the popes permitted him to provide for the offices of this tribunal. Pope Clement VIII canonized him in 1691. We have of his works a collection of Decretals, which forms the fifth volume of the canon law. This collection is in five books, and the author has joined several decrees of the councils to the constitutions of the popes—a Summa on.devotion and marriage, which he dedicated a theology of his aborigine of this work, and divers other works which have not been printed, and which do not merit it. Raymond de Penafort died at Barcelona Jan. 6, 1753. He is commemorated Jan. 23.—Hoefler, Nativ. Bipg. Geneal. s. v. See Butler, Life of the Saints, 2d ed.; sq.; Mrs. Jameson, History of Myths and this (I., 168,); in the Academy of Decretals, (1769), which contains the 4th and 5th centuries, he was solicited to fill it. But he was far from being pleased, and even prepared to return to Lyons. He did not again revisit Savoy until 1639, and then only to his unhappiness. He had, during his seclusion at Chambery, contracted a close friendship with father Pierre Monod, his companion; and when he heard of his detention in the fortress of Montmellon, he tried in every way to have it brought to an end. Richelieu took offence at this ardent affection, which was natural between friends, and not being willing to permit relations between Raymond and a priest in residence, he solicited and obtained from the court of Savoy the arrest of the unfortunate Jesuit. At the end of three months he was released, and sought refuge at Carpentras, which then belonged to the Papal States. But the aversion of his enemies would not leave him long undisturbed. By order of the cardinal-legate Antonio Barberini, he was conducted to Avignon, and locked in a chamber of the pontifical palace. With difficulty released, he left for Rome, with the manuscript of Heteroelus Spiritualibus, which he had prepared, suspended, submitted it for examination to father Alem ague, and obtained the authority to publish. In 1645 he returned to Rome in company with cardinal Fed erigo Sforza, and was presented to the pope and the Sacred College as one of the most ardent champions of the papal rights. He afterwards made two journeys to the Eternal City, the first time in 1647, and there occupied for some time a theological chair; the second time in 1651, when he assisted at the general assembly of his order. He afterwards obtained permission to establish himself at Lyons, and there passed the rest of his life in teaching and composing his works. He died Oct. 31, 1668. Father Raymond had all the qualities of a good friar: he was sober, pious, and very charitable; but by his pen he did not spare his adversaries, and showed himself severe and irascible. He wrote a great many works, which, though extravagant in style, curious, and trivial, were nearly all received with favor. Tiraboschi was unable to forbear comparing them to "one of those vast magazines full of merchandise of all kinds, good and bad, ancient and modern, useful and useless, in which one could find in any taste and patience, everything which suited him." The writings of père Raymond worth mentioning here are, Theologiae Naturalis (Lyons, 1622, 1637, 4to);—Splendor Veritatis Moralis (ibid. 1627, 8vo; under the name of Stephani Emonenii)—Morali Disciplina (ibid. 1629, 8vo).—Indiciiis Sanctorum Ludoveni (ibid. 1629, 12mo).— Calcismus, Vestarum Religio (Paris, 1630, 12mo; under the name of Riviére) — De Commune pro Moribus (Lyons, 1630, 8vo); he pretends that the sacraments have been perverted so that those who receive them are censured by the Church of Rome: — De Martyrio per Pestem (ibid., 1630, 8vo); in the index of this book he tried to show that those who exposed themselves voluntarily to the plague in assisting those who had it were the real martyrs: — Nova Libertatis Explicatio (Paris, 1630, 8vo); against the papal bull, In deo Gratiae. — Meta- morphosis Latronum in Apostolos Apostolique in Latro- nem (Lyons, 1634, 2 vols. 8vo); followed by several other treatises: — De Orti Infantium contra Natura, per Sectionem Canarium (ibid., 1637, 8vo); a singularly curious book; — Hippocratis de Religione Negotiorum (Francisca [Chambery], 1642, 8vo); a satirical work, translated into French (Chambery, 1645, 8vo) by Tri- pier, teacher of the natural children of the duke of Savoy; and Amsterdam (1761, 12mo) — Depicta Mariani (Grenoble, 1643, 4to); — Mala Bonorum Ecclesiasticorum (Avignon, 1645, 8vo); a dissertation written upon the dead body of a woman which was found in 1642 at Carpentras without any signs of decomposition, although it had been buried for a long time; Raynaud pretended that the body was still alive, and died under natural causes, not to the artifices of the devil, but to God himself; but adds, he as this last supposition is far from being demonstrated, it will be well to find what God himself has decreed on this subject: — Interrocalta Spiritus (Paris, 1646, 8vo; Lyons, 1644, 4to); a collection of the extraordinary practices which superstition and ignorance have introduced into religion: — Vite Martia Humanarum Terminarum (Orange, 1646, 8vo); he had not then reason to doubt, following the author, that God has fixed the term of life for the good and the wicked; but ordinarily the length of the life of men and their death depend upon natural causes: — Triunus Patriarcharum (Lyons, 1617, 8vo); notices upon Sime- on Stylites, Francis de Paulo, and Ignatius de Loyola: — Eregione de Maia ac Bonis Libris, deque Justitia et Injusta coronund Congregatione (ibid., 1640, 4to); this work, full of research, is an answer to an attack on his De Mortuio per Pestem: — Theologia Patrum (Antwerp, 1652, fol.); — De Sobria Alerius Seruæ Speculationis per Sacros et Religiosas Homines (Lyons, 1653, 8vo): — De Fide et Erudienda Capitula Terminarum, tamquam Prospectam (Lyons, 1655, 4to); — Evneuchi, Nati, Forti, Mystici, ex Sacer et Humanæ Literaturae Illustrati; Puerorum Emunserius ab Musicam quo loco Habendi (Dijon, 1655, 4to); under the name of Jean Heibert, he treated, in a subtle manner, the subject of euthanasia; but he had forgotten the most essential point, whether they were able to marry; this question was very fully treated in his work Traicitur Evneæus (1707, 4to) — Hercules Commodus (Aix, 1655, 8vo); under the name Honor- atia Lebost; it is a virulent satire against Jean de Lavo- nei — Trivs Fortium Darit (Lyons, 1657, 4to); re- marks upon Robert d'Arbrisel, St. Bernard, and Cesar of Bas — Missa Evangelica ad S. James, Jupitanam et Oraz Corpus (Antw. [Lyons], 1659, 8vo); under the name of Laurens Quintin: — O Paracruceorum (Lyons, 1651, 4to); — Husa P. Gallicus (ibid. 1662, 8vo); — De Inimicitia Auctorum Cacorum ac Insensatorum (ibid., 1662, 8vo); see Dupin, Bibliothèque des Auteurs Eccles.; Nic- ron, Mémoires, vol. xxxi. Rascis (Pozīg, Vulg. Rasinos), "one of the elders of Jerusalem," who killed himself under peculiarly terrible circumstances, that he might not fall "into the hands of the wicked" (2 Mac. xiv. 37-46). In dying he is reported to have expressed himself in a remarkably typical confession (ver. 46)—a belief elsewhere characteristic of the Maccabean conflict. This act of suicide, which was wholly alien to the spirit of the Jewish law and people (John viii. 22; comp. Ewald, Alterth., p. 198; Groius, De Jure Belli, II, xix, 5), it has been the subject of considerable discussion. It was quoted by the Donatists as the same fact in Scripture which supported their fanatical contempt of life (Augustine, Ep. 104, 6). Augustine denies the fitness of the model, and condemns the deed as that of a man "non eligens mortis sapientia, sed ferendae humiliatis impatience" (Augustine, l. c. ; comp. Zeller, Grund, i. 6-32, 60). Later times, in fact, with which the writer of 2 Mac. views the conduct of Rasis—a fact which Augustine vainly denies—was urged rightly by Protestant writers as an argument against the inspiration of the book. Indeed the whole narrative breathes the spirit of pagan heroism, or of the later zealots (comp. Josephus, War, iii, 7; iv, 1, 10), and the deaths of Samson and Saul offer no satisfactory parallel (comp. Grimm, ad loc.)

Razor is the rendering in the A. V. of the following words: 1. πολύζων, morkāh (Sept. πολυζων; Vulg. nunculato), ferrum: from πολύζων, "scrape," or "swipe." Genesis connects it with the root πολύ, "to tear" (The- saur., p. 819). This word occurs in Judg. xiii. 5, xvi. 17; 1 Sam. i. 11. 2. τάφθρα, t'ar (Sept. posathepa; Vulg. glandis: from πολύζων, to long bone), a more general term (Numb. vi. 5; Psal. iii. 2; Isai. vii. 20; Ezek. v, 1) for a sharp knife, which is mentioned in Jer. xxiv. 1 ("sheath," 1 Sam. xvii. 51, et al.; although many regard this as a different word of the same form). The barb is designated by ζωον, gollab (Sept. konzeph; Vulg. tonsor, 2 Sam. xx. 8). Besides other usages, the prac- tice of shaving the head after the completion of a row must have created among the Jews a necessity for the special trade of a barber (Numb. vi. 9, 18; iv. 7, 17; Judg. xiii. 5; Isai. vii. 20; Ezek. v, 1; Acts xviii. 18). The instruments of his work were probably, as in modern times, the razor, the basin, the mirror, and perhaps, also, the scissors, such as are described by Lo- cian ([Ador. Jud., i. 295, ed. Amst.; see 2 Sam. xix. 26). The process of Oriental shaving, and especially of the head, is minutely described by Chardin (Fig. iv. 144). It may be remarked that, like the Levites, the Egyptian priests were accustomed to shave their whole bodies (Herod. ii. 38, 37). The Psalmist com- pares the tongue of Dog to a sharp razor (Ps. lii. 2) starting aside from what should be its true operation to a cruel purpose and effect. In the denuncia- tion of the woes that were to be brought upon Judah in the time of Ahaz by the instrumentality of the Assy- rians, we have an extraordinary iteration of the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor that is hired, namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of As- syria, the head, and the hair of the feet; and it shall also consume the beard" (Isa. vii. 20). It seems likely that there is here an implication of contempt as well as suffering, as the office of a barber ambulant has seldom been esteemed of any dignity either in the East or West. To shave with the hired razor the head, the feet, and the beard is an expression highly parabolical, to denote the utter devastation of the country from one end to the other, as the plundering of the vanguard from the highest to the lowest by the Assyrians, whom God em- ployed as his instrument to punish the rebellious Jews. See Barber.

Raz, John, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in the village of Tully, Ireland, in 1772. He emigrated to the United States in 1799, and, after remaining at Philadelphia for some time, "I left that place, 1804, and travelled mostly alone through the wilderness, red, gloomy, and desolate, until, after many days, I arrived west of the Alleghany Mountains, stopping at the house of Mr. Porter, a Presbyterian minister." He now le- beraled and straddled a horse all day, before he could secure a literate course of education, teaching school and studying alternately, until he graduated with honor at Jefferson College, when it was only a small school kept in a log-cabin near Canonsburg, Pa. He studied theology under the direction of Dr. John McMillan, who was licensed by the Ohio Presbytery in June, 1803, and, after itinerating awhile in the wilderness of Eastern Ohio among some Indian camps, he was united, in 1804, to supply the newly organized church of Beechsprings, and pastored Crabapple, over which he was ordained and installed pastor in 1805. The country was settled rapidly, and his charges grew as fast, so that it soon became necessary to have the relation between these two churches dissolved, which he might labor all his time. He moved to the Beechsprings. "So untiring and devoted was this servant of Christ that, besides constantly ministering to his own large congregation, he found time to be instrumental in raising up some six or seven separate societies that went out as colonies from the mother church, and are now self-sustaining and prominent congregations." He died, after a ministry of fifty-two years, Feb. 12, 1855.

Dr. Nca was pastor of the Church at Beechsprings forty-five years, and the history of the Presbyterian Church in Eastern Ohio is closely connected with his biography. He was theudent and persevering student, clear in the arrangement of his subject, original in his thinking, and independent in thought and expression. See Wilson, Pred. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 198. (J. L. S.)

Read, Francis H., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Harrison County, Va., Nov. 25, 1812, was converted in his youth, joined the Church in 1834, and was in the time of the formation of the New Testament. To the holy minister, entered the travelling connection within the bounds of the Pittsburgh Conference, Pa. When the West Virginia Conference was formed, he became united with it, and there laborated until 1856, when he was located. He removed to Illinois, and shortly after entered the Rock River Conference, and was appointed to the Newark Circuit. After two years of active work in the Field in 1858 he again took a location, and removed to Iowa. In 1859 he was admitted into the Iowa Conference, and afterwards, by the formation and division of territory, he fell first into the Western Iowa, and then into the Des Moines Conference. His appointments in these conferences were Hopeville Circuit, Oneida, Clarion, Ottawa Circuit, Corning, and the Atlantic District. In this field truly "he died as his post." His death occurred at a Residence near Fort Calhoun, Iowa, Aug. 1, 1871. See Minutes of the Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 218, 219.

Read, Henry Clay, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Stanford, Lincoln County, Ky., Jan. 30, 1826. He graduated at Centre College, Danville, Ky., in 1849, and at the theological seminary at Princeton, N. J., in 1850; was licensed by Transylvania Presbytery June 27, 1850, and began his labors at Lagrange, LaGrange, and Ballardville, Ky. In 1851 he moved to Glasgow, Ky., and was ordained over that Church April 2, 1852. In 1858 he moved to Columbia, Ky., and engaged as Joint principal of the high-school in that place, during which period he preached half of his time to the Church there, and the churches of Edmonton and Munfordsville. In 1859 he took full charge of the Church and school, but discontinued the school in 1862. He was a commissioner to the General Assembly of the Presbytery Church which met in Peoria, Ill., in 1860. He died Oct. 17, 1862, at the age of thirty-six years. He was the son of Robert Read, an exemplary Christian, a man of sound judgment, and a good preacher. See Wilson, Pred. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 191. (J. L. S.)

Read, Thomas Buchanan, an American artist of some renown, deserves a place here for his distinction in works on sacred subjects. He was born in Chester County, Pa., March 12, 1826. With a yearly stipend he attended the studio of a sculptor in Cincinnati, intending to devote himself to sculpture for life; but painting soon proved the more attractive to him, and he practiced sculpture only as an amateur. In 1841 he went to New York, then to Boston, and settled in Philadelphia in 1846. He visited Europe first in 1856, and since which time he has lived in Florence and Rome, passing some intervals in Cincinnati. His pictures and his poems have the same characteristics, as might be expected. They are full of aerial grace and delicacy; an exquisite refinement and an ideal charm mingle in all. And yet he sometimes wrote with the spirit we find in Sheridan's Ride, and passed as seen in Sheridan and his Horse. Among his most charming pictures is his Star of Bethlehem. He died in Europe, where he had resided for over five years, while on his way home, May 11, 1872.

Reader, one of the five inferior orders of the Church of the Reformation. The reader is of great antiquity in the Church, dating as far back as the first century. It is, however, abundantly evident that it was not a distinct order, the reader (in the Latin Church at least) never having been admitted to his office by imposition of hands. According to the Council of Carthage, the Bible was put into the hands of the apostles, in presence of the people, with these words: "Take this book, and be thou a reader of the Word of God, which office thou shalt faithfully and profitably perform. Thou shalt have part with those who minister in the Word of God." And since this office of the Reformers was admitted in churches and chapels for which no clergyman could be procured, to the end that divine service in such places might not be altogether neglected. The office, or rather the name, is still continued in the Church of England. The following is the pledge to which, at the time of the Reformation, the readers were obliged to subscribe:

"In præstis, I shall not preach or interpret, but only read that which is appointed by public authority. I shall not minister in the extreme unction or other public rites of the Church, but bury the dead, and purge women after their childbirth. I shall keep the register-book according to the injunctions. I shall receive the alms in church, and especially in the church at common prayer. I shall move men to quit the sabbath, and not give the word of offence. I shall bring in to my ordinary testimony of my behavior from the honest of the parish where I dwell, within one half year next following. I shall give place, upon convenient warning, so thought by the ordinary, if any learned minister shall be placed there at the suit of the patron of the parish. I shall claim no more than the fruits sequestered of such cure where I shall serve but as it shall be thought meet to the wisdom of the ordinary. I shall daily, at the least, read one chapter of the Old Testament, and one other of the New, with good advisement, in the absence of the ordinary, and with regard to the room of the house, and the noise or other inconsiderate abstinence, I shall not read but in poorer parishes, desultot of incumbents, except in the time of divine service, or for other extraordinary resolutions to be allowed by the ordinary. I shall not openly meddle with any artificer's occupations, as covetously to seek a gain thereby, having in ecclesiastical offices the sum of twenty nobles, or above, by the year.

In Scotland also, at the Reformation, readers were appointed to read the Scriptures and the common prayers—that is, the forms of the Church of Geneva. They were not allowed to preach or administer the sacraments. The readers were tempted now and then to overstep these limits, and were as often forbidden by the General Assembly, till, in 1581, the office was formally abolished. The First Book of Discipline says: "To the clergy where no ministers can be had presbytery must be appointed the most apt men that distinctively can read the common prayers and the Scriptures, to exercise both themselves and the Church, till they grow to greater perfection: and in process of time he that is but a reader may attain to a farther degree, and, by consent of the Church and his minister, be appointed to minister the sacraments; but not before that he be able somewhat to persuade by wholesome doctrine, beside his reading, and be admitted to the ministry, as before is said. . . Nothing have we spoken of the stipend of readers, because if it have been of a less degree than that neither they nor judges may be called nor judged true ministers, and yet regard must be had to their labors; but so that they may be espoused for what they do, both in virtue, and not grudged to the publick. They are appointed for their reading in the below estate. This reader, if he do not read a book or more, or less, as parishioners and readers can agree, is sufficient: provided that he teach the children of the parish, which he must doe, besides the reading of the comrone, prayers, and books of the Old and New Testament. If from reading he begin to exhort and explain the Scriptures, then ought his stent to be augmented, till finally he comes near the end of the book. If he be found unable after two years, then must he be removed from that office, and possibly direc-ted to another, that another may be proved as long; for this alway is to be avoided, that none who is judged unable to come at any time to some one of his houses, may through the silence of the Kirk, be perpetually sus-tained upon the charge of the reader. Further, it must be avoided that no child, nor person of weak understanding, be within the (two-)two years of age—be admitted to the office of a reader.

The name occurs, however, in Church records long after that period, for in many places the office was tacitly permitted. Some successor sometimes bore it; and ex-treme persons—persons who read the Scriptures and added a few words of remark—were found in various towns. See PRECEPTOR.

Reading, Oriental Mode Of (Heb. מַעַן, to call aloud; ἀναγινώσκω). Mr. Jowett remarks, in his Christian Researches in Syria, etc., that "when persons are reading privately in a book, they usually go on reading aloud with a kind of singing voice, moving their heads and bodies in time, and making a monotonous cadence at regular intervals, thus giving emphasis, although not such an emphasis as would please an English ear. Very often they seem to read without perceiving the sense, and to proceed with themselves without turning one leaf of the book, as it were, through the mechanical art of reading in any way." This practice may enable us to "understand how it was that Philip should hear at what passage in Isaiah the Ethiopian eunuch was reading before he was invited to come up and sit with him in the chariot (Acts viii. 29, 31)." The eunuch, though probably reading to himself, and not particularly designing to be heard by his attendants, would read loud enough to be understood by a person at some distance. See Book.

Reading, Councils Of (Concilia Redimovana). The first of these was held in July, 1279, by archbishop Peckham of Canterbury, assisted by his suffragans. The twelve following constitutions were published:

1. Renews the twenty-ninth constitution of Othobon against pluralities, and directs bishops to cause a register to be kept of all incumbents in their dioceses, with all particulars relating to them and their living.

2. Relates to commentaries, and declares such as are hostile to the Christian religion, or contradicted in the Council of Lyons, 1274, to be in vain. The constitution concerning baptism at Easter and Pentecost, and that concerning consecrables at the four principal rubrics of the Mass, being first prefixed.

3. Orders that children born within eight days of Pentecost and Easter shall be received into the Church at the time, if they be found living at the time; but that children born at other times shall be baptized at once, for fear of sudden death.

4. Orders the eighth constitution of Othobon (1265) against consecriatry priests to be read openly in the four principal rural chapters, and declares that such reading shall be taken as a monition. If the dean or his deputy neglect this, he is directed to fast every Friday on bread and water.

5. Orders the church: orders that what remains of the old chancel shall be burned when the new is consecrated; declares that priests shall be bound to fetch the chancel for their churches every year from their bishops before they dare to use any other than the new chancel, under the heaviest penalties.

6. Orders that the consecrated host be kept in a fair pyx, within a tabernacle; that a fresh host be consecrated every Lord's day; that it be carried to the sick by a priest in surplice and stole, a lantern being carried before and a bell sounding; that the people may "under a humble admission wherebyever the King of Glory is carried under the cover of bread." A B, declare that I will conform to the liturgy of the United Church of England and Ireland, and the Acts and Articles of that church, in all points, and particularly in praying according to the form prescribed in and by the book intituled the Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the Use of the Church of England, with the Psalter or Psalms of David, printed as they are set out in the Psalter or Psalms of David, in the Form and Manner of Making, Ordaining, and Consecrating Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. And that immediately after reading the aforesaid service, the said A B did openly and publicly, before the congregation there assembled, declare his abjuration of all things wherein content and consent to all things therein contained and prescribed, in these words, viz. 1. A, B, do declare our unfeigned assent and consent to all things contained and prescribed in and by the book intituled the Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the Use of the Church of England, with the Psalter or Psalms of David, printed as they are set out in the Psalter or Psalms of David, in the Form and Manner of Making, Ordaining, and Consecrating Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. And these things we promise to testify openly and constantly, and should be daily called upon so to do. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands, the day and year first above written."

Reading, John, an English theologian, was born in 1588, in the county of Buckingham. He was curate at Dover, and afterwards chaplain of Charles I, but he manifested so much zeal in defending the cause of the king that in 1642 he was cast into prison, where he remained for several months. Archbishops Laud and having conferred upon him, during his detention at the Tower, the parish of Chatham and a prebend at Canterbury, the king would not allow him to take possession of either of these benefices; and he even had a new imprisonment to undergo. When in 1660 Charles II was restored at Dover, it was Reading who was first congratulated, upon his return, on the renown of the city. We have several religious works written by Reading, among others, A Guide to the Holy City (Oxford, 1651, 4to);—An Antidote to Aneompias (1654, 4to); also several sermons. Reading died Oct. 26, 1667, at Chatham, Kent. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Reading, William, an Anglican divine, flourished in the early opening of last century as keeper of the Library of Sion College, London. He prepared an edition of the early ecclesiastical historians (Eusebius, etc.) in Greek and Latin, with notes (Cantab. 1720, 4to; 1714, 4to). He published, also, Sermons preached out of the first lessons of the Sunday in the Year, with an Appendix of Six Sermons (4 vols. 8vo—1, ii, 1728; iii, iv, 1730; 1755, 4 vols. 8vo); very rare; condemned by D'Oyle and Maret in their Commentary on the Bible:—Sermons (1711, 8vo)—Tracts (London, 1759, 8vo).

Rea's (1 Chron. v. 5). See Reaiah.

Rea's (Hebr. ראה', רָאָה', seen of Jehovah), the name of three Hebrews.

1. (Sept. Pādā v r. 'Pa'id') A "son" of Shobal son of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 2). B.C. post 1568. He is apparently designated by the epithet Haroch (חָרֹךְ), ka-Rōkh, the seer; Sept. 'Apa'n, Vulg. qui vidit ebat; evidently a mere corruption of Reaiah. See Shobal.

2. (Sept. Pygš) The son of Micah and father of Reaiah (see above). The view that the "Reaiah" seen long before the invasion of Tidgath-Pileser (1 Chron. v, 5, A. V. "Reaiah"). B.C. ante f20.

3. (Sept. 'Pa'id v. "Pa'id, etc.") One of the Nethi-
cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but it is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthrown by the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions." Instead of this—he is a corporeal presence by the change of the elements into the natural body and blood of Christ—she goes on to assert that "the body of Christ is given, taken, and applied only after a heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten is in the supper is faith" (Article XXVIII). See Waterland, Works, vol. vi; Willet, Sym. Realino, Bernardino, an Italian Jesuit scholar, was born Dec. 15, 1530, at Carpi. Son of a gentleman in the service of Luigi di Govazza, he received an excellent education at Modena, and graduated at Bologna. He studied jurisprudence, and made himself known by a commentary upon the Nuptials of Theod and Pelagis of Catullus (Bologna, 1551, 4to), when one of his parish began an unjust lawsuit to take away part of his fortune. The affair lasted a long time, and was finally left to the verdict of an arbitrator, who hastened to decide against Realino without even hearing him. About the time of the encounter at Carpi, this arbitrator disappeared, and his letter which contained the very strong words in great wrath Realino gave him a sword-cut in the face. Condemned for this bold action, the young man fled to Bologna. Made doctor of law in 1558, he obtained in the same year the office of magistrate of Felizzano, a borough of Milan; after this he became attorney of Alessandria, and, the marquis of Peschiera gave him control of the vast domains which he possessed in the kingdom of Naples. At the age of thirty-four he gave weary of the world, arranged his affairs, and entered, at Naples, the Society of Jesus (1564). He there distinguished himself by his simplicity and austerity, and a charity which, he was always consistent. Having received, in 1574, the order to lay the foundation of a college at Lecce, he did it just before his death. An inquiry was started to establish his rights to canonization, but the court of Rome refused the application. Realino composed quite a number of small books, mentioned by Sotewil; his notes upon ancient authors have been inserted in vol. ii of the Thesaurus Criticus of Gruter. — Hoefer, Nova. Blog. Général, s. v.

Realism is a distinct and readily apprehended doctrine in the higher ranges of metaphysics, characterized by the scheme of speculation with which it may be associated. A Realist is one who maintains this doctrine. Realism asserts that General Terms, or Ideas, as they are called by Plato, such as Man, Horse, Plant, have a substantive, or real, existence independent of their actual and individual manifestations. This dogma early encountered opposition, which became so violent in the 12th and ensuing centuries as to distract philosophy, and to excite controversies that disturbed creeds and kingdoms, and that still survive, though in disguised forms and with greatly diminished virulence. The controversy was frequently pressed to blows and slaughter. Excommunication often attended the less popular side. Tracts, pamphlets, and formidable volumes were sustained or resisted with carnel andican guarnary weapons. Communities were divided by the bitter logomachy into hostile factions. The Church swarmed with dissensions. Universities were arrayed against each other, or were torn by intestine dissensions. Cities were opposed to cities; states to states; one religious order to another; and the conflict between the temporal and spiritual sovereignty was exacerbated and widened by the metaphysical strife. Brutes, and multitudes less cognizant than he of the influence of metaphysical conclusions on the condition and conduct of governments and societies, have superciliously sneered at these envemoned and long-enduring contentions, as merely the blind sophistries of men bewildered by vain abstractions or futile fantasies. But a philosophical problem which has remained unsolved for thousands of years, which engrossed and embattled the most acute intellects for centuries, and which has not yet ceased to produce perplexity and division; which enlisted the zeal alike of the scholar and the people, the priest and the prince, was recognized by the few who dare to discern the intellectual forces and associations by which the progress of the world is moulded. Sir William Hamilton, indeed, doubts the continued existence of any Realistic doctrine, and regards it as "a curious only in a historical point of view; but this opinion appears to result from inattention to the transformations which speculative tenets undergo, and to the vitality of old doctrines through the instrumentality of new disguises. There is a true metempsychosis of metaphysical questions: "Nece manet ut fuerit, nec formas servat eadem, Sed tamen ipsa eadem est: animam sic semper eadem Rese, sed in varia doceo migrare figurae." Sir William Hamilton's scant notices of Realism and Nominalism are ingenious, subtle, delicate, but they want compass, completeness, and depth.

Twin doctrines Realism was Nominalism (q. v.), its direct opposite, which strenuously denies the reality of General Terms, and maintains that they are names only, logical entities, convenient artifacts of expression (nomina mea, voces meae, factae voces, articulato ait, "en re et per se non sunt," f. Springing, s. v.). Springing, as the nominalist views do, from the weakness of the human mind, which is unable to comprehend the primordial origin of being, and which is inevitably inclined to consider its imperfect knowledge complete and conclusive, the opposition between the two schemes of speculative speculation, accompanied its development, and acquired predominance in the ages characterized by dialectical earnestness and verbal precision. The contradictory tenets were upheld by rival sects of Hindu philosophers; they produced a wide severance of opinion in the brightest age of Greek philosophy; they remained irreconcilable, though at times indistinct, in the schools of Alexandria: they burst out into clamorous fury in the Middle Ages, when the loftiest intellects were employed in laying the foundations of systematic theology and of orthodox expression.

Between the extreme and contradictory schemes of Realism and Nominalism was interposed, chiefly by the keen perspicacity of Abelard, but in accordance with the probable views of Aristotle, a doctrine of compromise which has been designated Conceptualism (q. v.). Theo. and Others, General Notions, or Versus, have a real existence in individuals, but no real or substantial being without them. It recognises their positive existence in the mind, which derives them by abstraction and generalization from particulars, and employs them as the signs or names of the classes of concrete realities to which they are applicable. The Realist doctrine is that, before Socrates, Plato, and Phaedo, or any other individual men existed, Men, as an abstract idea, had an essential and immutable reality, and that Socrates, Plato, and Phaedo, can be regarded as men solely in consequence of possessing this ideal manhood—σώμαν ὑπάρχον. The Nominalist, on the other hand, alleged that humanity existed only in Socrates, Plato, Phaedo, and other individuals; that the term was only an intellectual device for indicating the common properties characteristic of Socrates, Plato, and Phaedo; and that the general name Men, and thus embracing them in one class. The Conceptualist agreed with the Nominalist in refusing an absolute existence to the general term Men, and in assigning to it a real existence only in conjunction with Socrates, Plato, and Phaedo, and he endeavored to satisfy the demands of the Realist by admitting that the conception Men, attained by abstraction and generalization from individuals, had an actual existence, and was an intelligible reality in the mind apprehending it. Thus Abelard was antagonist at once to Willism of Champsaur and to Boecellinus. Employing the quaint but precise language of the schoolmen, the Realists held universale esse ante rem; the Nominalists, universale esse post rem; the Conceptualists of various types, universale esse in re. To the last should be added the Pragmatists. These distinctions may appear shadowy and impalpable, but metaphysics deals amid such "airy shapes," and these have had a marked influence and serious consequences in politics, law, morals, philosophy, and religion: "inclusas animas, supernumque ad lumen iustae." Nominalism has simply met with due consideration. See Nominalism. The present notice will consequently be confined to Realism, except so far as Nominalism and Conceptualism may be inextricably entwined with it.

I. Origin of Realism.—It would be misplaced industry and, inconsistent with the brevity required here, to investigate the Realist doctrines which were entertained and developed in the philosophy of the Hindus. But the medieval dogma is so intimately connected with the tenor of Greek speculation that a reference to its roots is necessary, lest the modem day should be debarred from the light of the past. The controversy between Realism and Nominalism did not become predominant in speculation till the close of the 11th century, but the antagonism was distinctly declared from the times of Plato and Aristotle. The systematic metaphysics which were the bedfellow of the great teacher and his greater pupil in their explanation of the intelligible universe (mundus intelligibilis) were plainly manifest to the successors of those great heresiers. The doctrine of Plato and the earnest opposition of Aristotle may be best appreciated by the careful consideration of the multitudinous passages in the text of Aristotle referred to in the index of Lonitz (Aristotelis Opera [ed. Acad. Berolin.], vol. iv) under the head of "Plato, 2." Evidence not merely of the continued antagonism of the Academic and Peripatetic schools, but also of the recognition of the gravity and the consequences of this antagonism, are abundant in the subsequent ages. It may suffice to refer to Florius (Ennead, III, i, 1; V, v, 1; IX, iii, 10), to a passage in Porphyry which will soon require to be cited, and to Hesychius Milesium (F. 7, ii, 58, Fraum. Histor. Græc. iv, 173), who has stated clearly and precisely the Platonist thesis ("Esti et eis eandem in iustam dici eis et inius et homines et diem tria cias," etc.) and the principles of the theory in general. He speaks of "Universe," or "general universally," and to abstract notions generally, remained an indeterminate disputatio in the Hellenic world, and was not raised to supreme importance till it passed, in the medieval period, from transcendental ontology to dialectics and theolology. The germ of the grand debate is found in one of the associates of the Neo-Platonic schools, but it scarcely vegetated till the scholastic period. Porphyry had said, in his introduction to the Categories of Aristotle (Schol. Aristot. sp. Aristot. Opera [ed. Acad. Berolin.]), "I, 1), that he abstained from determining the nature of the recondite inquiries, and aim only at a concise presentation of the simpler topics. "For," he proceeds, "I will decline to speak of the essential character of genera and species, or to inquire whether they are substantially corporeal or incorporeal, and whether they are separable or existent only in perception, since this is a most profound investigation, and requires other and deeper examination."

The Greek of Porphyry was almost entirely unknown to medieval speculators, but the Latin paraphrase of Boethius was familiar to them and constituted, as it were, a text-book of elementary logic. Thus the question of the nature of "Universae" was distinctly raised, and the opposite views which were entertained on the subject divided reasoners into hostile camps, and led to those passionate controversies which have been already alluded to. It was only gradually, however, that the opposition became clear and well marked, and connected itself closely with the gravest interests that have occupied the minds of men. In the first half of the 9th century, Rabanus Maurus, commenting on the text of Porphyry just quoted, but using the version of Boethius, recognises the conflict of opinion (Commen. in pra. Cense, i, 272; etc.) and is supposed to have formulated the Nominalistic side (Caraman, Hist. des Rév. de la Philosophie, i, 249). It would probably be more correct to conclude that he sought a ground of conciliation between the two extremes. The difficult problem was, however, brought forward into distinct contemplation. If there was any tendency in Rabanus Maurus to what was afterwards known as Nominalism, the reaction showed itself promptly. In the next generation, the philosophy of Johannes Scotus Erigena, which was founded on an imperfect acquaintance with the Neo-Platonic teachings, ran into decided Pantheism, in accordance with the results of those teachings, as developed by Plotinus. Regarding God as the source whence all things proceed, by which all things are sustained, and to which all things return—representing creation as the self-evolution of the first principle—the Pantheist, in his vision, he rendered God all things and all things God. The basis of his whole scheme was involved in the Platonistic theory of ideas [see PLATONIC PHILOSOPHY], and in the Realist tenet universale ante rem. Not merely as the foundation of the systems of these remarkable philosophers, but as an essential part of the metaphysical dogma to be unfolded by its acolytes into its ultimate logical consequences, which reveal the extravagances and the hazards of the position. It is the inevitable tendency of such revelation to arouse antagonism, and to suggest security in the opposite extreme. By such oscillation between contradictory tenets, the human intellect is kept from stagnation, and research and meditation are constantly stimulated. The Pantheism of Scotus Erigena annihilated individual existence and individual responsibility; and it obliterated the boundaries between the realms of divine and human action. The refutation of his errors was sought in the examination and denial of his premises, as well as in the repudiation of his conclusions. His views had been founded on the supposititious writings of Dionysius the Areopagite, which were steeped in Neo-Platonism (q.v.). Their antidote was expected from the school of Aristotle, whose logical opinions were gradually disseminated throughout Western Europe, through Saracen and Jewish channels, and which had been partially known through Boethius during nearly all medieval times. But the latter part of the 9th, the whole of the 10th, and most of the 11th century were eminently unfavorable to diligent study and tranquil speculation. It was the period of Arab ravage and encroachment in the Eastern Empire; the period of the ruthless depredations of the Danes and Northmen in the Western; the period when the reigning dynasties of France and England were changed; when Italy was distracted by invasions and by wars between contending emperors; and when the fierce strife between the adherents of the Gregorian and Antipope became peculiarly acrimonious. As the result of these wide-spread disturbances, discord and anarchy, lawlessness and rapine, general wretchedness and insecurity prevailed. Two centuries thus elapsed before the great question of Universae distinctly emerged out of the earlier discordances of opinion. Towards their conclu-

alone, a purely theological question had arisen, which recalled eager inquiry into the nature of Universals. This was the denial of transubstantiation by Berengarius on grounds which implied Nominalism. About the same time, the doctrine of Nominalism was explicitly attacked and defended at the Council of Constance. He has been usually regarded as the founder of the sect, but may have been preceded by his master, Johannes Surdus (John the Deaf), of whom very little is known. Roscellinus held that "genera and species are not realities, but only words denoting abstractions;" that "there are no such things as universals, but only individuals." Realism is thus directly contradicted. These speculations pointed towards dangerous heresies in theology. Roscellinus, denying all but individual existences, assaulted the unity of persons in the Trinity, and thus maintained Tritheism. The Church was at once aroused. Numerous confutations were propounded, the most celebrated of which was the tractate of Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, De Fide Trinactivas. Anselm holds the Realist doctrine of Universals, and is occasionally betrayed into extravagance. His politics is, in fact, rational or metaphysical. He attacks perilous errors in religious belief, and assails speculative opinions only incidentally. Rémusat, while considering him a decided Realist, deems that his prominence in the controversy began only after Nominalism had been exaggerated (Résumat, St. Anselme, pt. ii, ch. iii, p. 494). Efforts were made to reconcile the conflict between the discordant doctrines, but they only rendered the issue and the antagonism more pronounced. William de Champeaux (De Cambellius) held that "the Universal or genus is something real; the individuals composing the genus have no diversity of essence, but only of accidental elements." This is the first precise avowal of Realism in medieval philosophy. With William de Champeaux, the essence of things is ascribed to the genus, rather than reduced to accidental accidentals. With Roscellinus, the individuals alone exist, and they constitute the essence of things. With Champeaux, the essence of things is in the genera to which they belong, so far as they are individuals they are only accidents (Caraman, Hist. des Rés. de la Phil. vol. ii, ch. ii, p. 48). Thenceforward the great controversy proceeds with increasing ardor, and furnishes the battle-field for the rival schools and rival schoolmen of the Middle Ages. The further consideration of these speculations belongs, however, to a more intimate discussion of the question, related to the development of scholasticism. See SCHOLASTICISM.

II. Nature of Realism.—The general character of Realism has been exhibited sufficiently to render its origin and evolution intelligible. A fuller explanation is needed to enable us to understand the importance which it assumed in mediæval speculation. Cicero has said that "there is nothing so absurd as not to have been maintained by some of the philosophers." It is easier to ridicule than to appreciate the reveries of philosophy. The aberrations of metaphysics and the paradoxes of dialectic are only the zealots and inadequate expression of far-reaching truths imperfectly apprehended. We certainly should not complain of either the excesses or the blindness of the schoolmen, in an age which is inclined to accept propoalism as a sufficient explanation of all life, and evolution as a complete exposition of creation, or a substitute for it. Yet, even in these cases, much is charged upon the hierophants which they do not accept as part of their doctrines. Realism was the mediæval and dialectical reproduction of the Platonic idea of the sensible world and its general tenets such as Memes, Horae, Tree, Flower, etc., were not merely logical devices, creatures of abstraction, ingenuities of language, but were realities, separable (κατάρα) from the being of individual men, horses, trees, flowers, etc. In Plato and the Platonic school these ideas were supposed to have a real, primordial, changeless, and eternal existence in the Divine Mind, as the archetypes of all things that are made. It demands no extraordinary range of intellect to point out the presumption of attempting to determine the contents of the Divine Mind and the modes of its procedure in ordering the creation. It is the unaided effort to reconstruct the practical incongruities of representing Socrates as a transitory accident; having no real existence except so far as he partakes of the one, universal, ideal Man, who is immortal, incorporeal, immaterial, and unchangeable; communicated and communicable to all men, past, present, and future; composed in each, yet abundant for all, and independent of each and of all. These objections blink or evade the subtleties of the problem. These sneers do not reach the difficulty with which the greatest philosophers have struggled, and struggled in vain. No doubt our knowledge of genera and species is attained (so far as the human mind is capable of ascertaining the process of attaining knowledge) by abstraction from individual things observed, and by combination of their accoutant characteristics. No doubt the abstract terms, so arrived at, are the instruments of linguistic and logical classification, which we employ unsuspiciously in reasoning and conversation. But is this all? Is this a complete solution of the enigma? Is it not a mere screen which conceals the real enigma from us? There is a general, not an individual, resemblance in all these. They are alike in the conception of the Creator — nihil simili simoni quam homo. They are alike in consequence of their participation in a common humanity. Our knowledge of this humanity may be—must be—derived by generalization from the common characteristics of all men. But, again, it should be asked, Is this all? Does our knowledge proceed or follow this possession of a common humanity? Does it do anything more than recognise its presence? How does the common humanity come into existence? How does it continue in existence? How is it to be interpreted? Is there not an inner or internal design in the purposes of the Creator? Is everything spasmodical, momentary creation, with observance of antecedent forms? Whence, then, such observance, and the maintenance of uniformity, and all the characteristics of preordination? How does it occur that the earth proceeds over to "bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind," if the several kinds and genera and species are mere abstractions, pure figments of the generalizing faculty? Did this unvarying observance of the type as a whole come about without of Realism, or by the accidental collision of atoms in all the infinite variety of their hypothetical contacts, and by survival of the fittest, through self-adaptation to their shifting surroundings? No permanent forms, transmitted from generation to generation, from age to age, could thus be maintained. The unmutilated repudiatio of Realism leads straight to the acceptance of the creed of Leucrætius and Darwin and Herbert Spencer.

Nam certe neque consilio Primordiae rerum Ordinis seque sequentem regem sagacis locum venit: Nec quoque saepe darent motus pepergere producto; Sed quata multimultae molles, multae, mutatae, per Omne Ex humana excutitur percipere plagis. Omne genuus motus, et cosce experimendo, Taudium deuinent in tabulis dispositis. Qualibus hae rebus consexit summæ creata; Et multis eiam magnos servata per annos. Ut semel in memos conjcta et membro sensus.

The answer of the Epicurean herd will not solve the riddles proposed. Realism offered a very different solution, which, however inadequate and unsatisfactory it may be deemed, did not affect to treat the questions as shallow or trite. The gods, such as Memes, Horae, Tree, Flower, etc., were not merely logical devices, creatures of abstraction, ingenuities of language, but were realities, separable (κατάρα) from the being of individual men, horses, trees, flowers, etc. In Plato and the Platonic school these ideas were supposed to have a real, primordial, changeless, and eternal existence in the Divine Mind, as the archetypes of all things that are made. It demands no extraordinary range of intellect to point out the presumption of attempting to determine the contents of the Divine Mind and the modes of its procedure in ordering the creation. REALISM at least, of the error of Realism—for neither its whole truth nor its whole error can be distinctly grasped and periscopically expressed—consisted in presenting these important conclusions in an exaggerated form, so that they contradicted the partial truth equally involved in Nominalism: that individuals have a real as well as an actual existence, and that the generic and specific terms which are habitually employed, and are indispensable in language, are modes of classifying our perceptions and conceptions, and are used altogether independently of any ulterior suggestions which may be implicated in them.

The Nominalist denied a metaphysical truth because it was not embraced within the sphere of his logical requirements. The Realist assailed the logical truth because it failed to embrace an ontological explanation, and appeared to be at variance with it.

Bitter contradictions and acrimonious hostilities necessarily resulted from the antagonism, in consequence of the inevitable association of the conflicting doctrines with adverse parties and interests in theology, in Church and in State.

III. Literature.—The historians of philosophy, who embrace the philosophy of the Middle Ages, necessarily pay much attention to Realism and Nominalism. More special sources of information are, Caraman, Histoires, the reason is that they may lose none of their straw, which is generally very short, and necessary for the sustenance of their cattle, no hay being here made. I mention this," he adds, "because it seems to give light to that expression of the Psalms (cxxxix, 6), "which withereth before it be plucked up," where there seems to be a metaphor of respect to the "straw" of the mind. This unhappy doubtless is the correct meaning of the expression; and the real allusion is lost sight of by the rendering in the A. V., "before it groweth up." It grows, but withers before the plucking-time comes—an emblem of the present decay and fruitlessness of the wicked. See Agriculture.

Reason denotes that function of our intelligence which has reference to the attainment of a particular class of truths. We know a great many things by immediate or actual experience. Our senses tell us that we are thirsty, that we hear a sound, that we are affected by light. These facts are truths of sense or of immediate knowledge, and do not involve the reason. Reason comes into play when we know a thing not immediately, but by some indirect process; as when, from seeing a river unusually swollen, we believe that there have been heavy rains at its sources. Here the mind is not only that the river is high. It is by certain transitions of thought, or by the employment of our thinking powers, that we come to know the other circumstance—that in a remote part of the country there have been heavy rains.

In ascertaining these truths of reason or of inference, as they are called, there are various steps or operations described under different names. Thus we have (1) Deduction, or Syllogism; (2) Induction; and (3) Generalization of notions, of which Abstraction and Definition are various phases. These are well represented by the four fundamental principles of the science. The nature of the functions or faculty denominated Reason, or the Reasoning Faculty, can be explained by showing how it results from the fundamental powers of the intelligence.

There is another and peculiar significance attached to the word reason, growing out of the philosophy of Kant (q. v.), which maintains a distinction between reason and understanding, the latter being that faculty called by the Greeks νοῦς, and by Hamilton called the "Regulative Faculty." See Fleming and Krauth, Vocab. of Philosophy, s. v.

Reason, Use of, in Religion. The sublime, incomprehensible nature of some of the Christian doctrines has commonly belied the understanding of many pious men as to make them think it presumptuous to apply reason in any way to the revelations of God; and the many instances in which the simplicity of truth has been corrupted by an alliance with philosophy confirm them in the belief that it is safer, as well as more respectable, to resign their minds to devout impressions than to exercise their understandings in any speculations upon sacred subjects. Enthusiasts and fanatics of all different names and sects agree in decreeing the use of reason, because it is the very essence of fanaticism to substitute the inventions of the human understanding for the Word of God. In this respect, the extravagant fancies of a disordered imagination, and to consider these fancies as the immediate illumination of the Spirit of God. Insidious writers in the deistical controversy have pretended to adopt those sentiments of humility and reverence which are inapplicable from true Christians, and even that total subjection of reason to faith which characterizes enthusiasts. A pamphlet was published about the middle of the last century that made a noise in its day, although it is now forgotten. It was not Professed Reason, but Foundation on Argument, which, while to a careless reader it may seem to magnify the Gospel, does in reality tend to undermine our faith by separating it from a rational base; and Mr. Hume, in the spirit of this pamphlet, concludes his Essay on Miracles with calling those dangerous friends or disguised enemies to the Christian religion who have undertaken to defend it by the principles of human reason. "Our most holy religion," he says, with a distinctness very unbecoming his respectable talents, "it founded on faith, not on reason;" and "mere reason is insufficient to convince us of its veracity." The Church of Rome, in order to subject the minds of its votaries to the authority of the Church, has, in matters of religion. She has revived an ancient position, that things may be true in theology which are false in philosophy; and she has, in some instances, made the merit of faith to consist in the absurdity of that which was believed.

The extravagance of these positions has produced, since the Reformation, an opposite extreme. While those who deny the truth of revelation consider reason as in all respects a sufficient guide, the Socinians, who admit that a revelation has been made, employ reason as the supreme judge of its doctrines, and boldly strike out of their creed every article that is not altogether conformable to those notions which may be derived from the exercise of reason. These controversies concerning the use of reason in matters of religion are disputes, not about reason, but about the nature of Christianity. But a few plain observations are sufficient to ascertain where the truth lies in this subject.

The first use of reason in matters of religion is to examine the evidences of revelation; for, the more entire the submission which we consider as taken, the more certain it is that, if it is revealed, we have the more need to be satisfied that any system which professes to be a divine revelation does really come from God. See Faith and Reason.

After the exercise of reason has established in our minds a firm belief that Christianity is of divine origin, the second use of reason is to learn what are the truths revealed. As these truths are not in our days communicated to any by immediate inspiration, the knowledge of them is to be acquired only from books transmitted to us with satisfying evidence that they were written by men seventeen hundred years ago in a remote country and foreign language, under the direction of the Spirit of God. In order to attain the meaning of these books, we must study the language in which they were written; and we must study, also, the manners of the times and the state of the countries in which the writers lived, because there are circumstances to which an original author is often alluding, and by which his phraseology is generally affected; we must lay together different passages in which the same word or phrase occurs, because without this labor we cannot obtain in its purest and most unadulterated condition the distinctive style and manner which characterize different writers; because a right apprehension of their meaning often depends upon attention to this difference. All this presupposes the application of grammar, history, geography, chronology, and criticism in matters of religion; that is, it supposes that the reason of man had been previously exercised in pursuing these different branches of knowledge, and that our success in attaining the true sense of Scripture depends upon the diligence with which we assail ourselves of the progress that has been made in them. It is to be noted, also, that the reason of every Christian is not capable of making this application. But this is no argument against the use of reason, of which we are now speaking; for they who use translations and commentaries rely only upon the reason of others instead of exercising their own. The several helps which have been applied in every age by some persons for the benefit of others; and the progress in sacred criticism which distinguishes the present times is nothing else than the continued application, in elucidating the Scripture, of reason not founded on Argument, or on Scriptural knowledge, and very much improved in this kind of exercise by the employment which the ancient classics have given it since the revival of letters.

After the two uses of reason that have been illustrated, a third comes to be mentioned, which may be considered as compounded of both. Reason is emi-
REASON

REBAPTISM

The use in repelling the attacks of the adversaries of Christianity. When men of erudition, of philosophical acuteness, and of accomplished taste, direct their talents against the religion of their time, it is best to rely on an unskilful defender. He cannot unravel their sophistry; he does not see the amount and the effect of the concessions which he makes to them; he is bewildered by their quotations; and he is often led, by their artifices, upon dangerous ground. In all ages of the Church there has been weak and not very decided opposition; and the only triumphs of the enemies of our religion have arisen from their being able to expose the defects of those methods of defending the truth which some of its advocates had unwarily chosen. A mind trained to accurate and philosophical views of the nature and the amount of evidence, enriched with historical knowledge, accustomed to throw out of a subject all that is minute and irrelevant, to collect what is of importance within a short compass, and to form the comprehension of a whole, is the mind qualified to contend with the learning, the wit, and the sophistry of infidelity. Many such minds have appeared in this honorable controversy during the course of this and the last century; and the success has corresponded to the completeness of the furniture with which they engaged in the combat. The Church has defended itself with a clear and masterly exposition from various misrepresentations; the arguments for its divine original have been placed in their true light; and the attempts to confound the miracles and prophecies upon which Christianity rests its claim with the same time of truth and been effectually repelled. Christianity has in this way received the most important advantages from the attacks of its enemies; and it is not improbable that its doctrines would never have been so thoroughly cleared from all the corruptions and subtilties which had attached to them in the progress of ages, nor the evidences of its truths have been so accurately understood, nor its peculiar character been so perfectly discriminated, had not the zeal and abilities which have been employed against it called forth in its defence some of the most distinguished masters of reason. They brought into the service of Christianity the same weapons which had been drawn for her destruction, and, wielding them with confidence and skill in a good cause, became the successful champions of the truth. See Rationalism.

The fourth use of reason consists in judging of the truth of religious proposals. Everything which is revealed by God comes to his creatures from so high an authority that it may be rested in with perfect assurance as true. Nothing can be received by us as true which is contrary to the dictates of reason, because it is impossible for us to reconcile the truth of a proposition with the falsehood of a proposition. But many things are true which we do not fully comprehend; and many propositions, which appear incredible when they are first enunciated, are found, upon examination, such as our understandings can readily admit. These principles embrace the whole of the subject, and they mark out the steps by which reason is to proceed in judging of the truths of religion. We first examine the evidences of revelation. If these satisfy our understandings, we are certain that there can be no contradiction between the doctrines of this true religion and the dictates of right reason. If any such contradiction appear, there must be some mistake. By not making a proper use of our reason in the interpretation of the Gospel, we suppose that it contains doctrines which it does not teach; or we give the name of right reason to the judicious, who, by improper reductions and more enlarged knowledge will dissipate; or we consider a proposition as implying a contradiction, when, in truth, it is only imperfectly understood. Here, as in every other case, mistakes are to be corrected by measuring back our steps. We must examine each and every passage of a doctrine, as it appears to contain the doctrine; we must compare them with one another; we must endeavor to derive light from the general phraseology of Scripture and the analog of faith; and we shall generally be able, in this way, to separate the doctrine from all those adventitious circumstances which give it the appearance of absurdity. If a doctrine which, upon the close examination, appears unquestionably to be taught in Scripture, still does not approve itself to our understanding, we must consider carefully what it is that prevents us from receiving it. There may be preconceived notions hastily taken up which are inconsistent with the doctrine; or the pride of understanding that does not readily submit to the views which it communicates; or reason may need to be reminded that we must expect to find in religion many things which we are not able to comprehend. One of the most important offices of reason is to recognize its own limits. She never can be moved, by any authority, to receive as true what she perceives to be absurd. But if she has formed a just estimate of human knowledge, she will not shelter her presumption in rejecting the truths of revelation under the pretense of contradictions that do not really exist; she will readily admit that there may be in a subject some points which she knows, and others of which she is ignorant; she will not allow her ignorance of the latter to shake the evidence of the former, but will yield a firm assent to the opinions of the understanding that which she cannot deny what is beyond her comprehension. Thus, availing herself of all the light which she now has, she will wait in humble hope for the time when a larger measure shall be imparted.

Reay, Stephen, an Anglican divine, was born at Montrose, New Brunswick, in 1782, was educated at St. Alban's Hall, Oxford, and was Laudian professor of Arabic from 1840 till his death. He published, Observations on the Defence of the Church Missionary Society against the Objections of the Advocate of Bath, by Pileus Quadratus (1818, 8vo);—Narratio de Josepho et Sacro Codice (1822);—Textus Hebraicus (Lond. 1822, 1840, 12mo).

Reay, William, an English divine of the Establishment, flourished near the middle of the 18th century. He was curate and lecturer of Wordsworth in 1755. He died in 1756. He published Sermons, with Preface by T. Church, D.D., prebend of St. Paul's (Lond. 1755, 8vo).

Re'ba (Heb. id. 72, four; Sept. Ποβή in Numb., 'Pōbī in Josh.; Vulg. Rode), one of the five kings of the Midianites slain by the children of Israel in their avenging expedition when Balaam fell (Numb. xxxii, 8; Josh. xiii, 21). B.C. 1556.

Rebaptism. The ancient Church, if it did not openly declare that the repetition of baptism, certainly refused to rebaptize, and supported its position by assigning, not one, but many reasons. It especially maintained that there is no example of rebaptization in Scripture; and as baptism succeeds to circumcision, which was the entrance and seal of the old covenant, and could not be repeated, so baptism, being the sign and seal of admission to the new covenant, the breaches of this covenant are not to be repaired by repeated baptisms. There were in the early Church some heretics who rebaptized, such as the Marcionites; but the Catholic Church disapproved of the practice. In one of Cyprian's epistles there is a question referred to Stephen, bishop of Rome, whether it was necessary to rebaptize heretics who sought admission to the Catholic Church; or whether it should be deemed sufficient, proceeding upon the same principle, to receive them with the simple ceremony of imposition of hands and ecclesiastical benediction. The Roman bishop acceded to the latter opinion. The African bishops, on the other hand, declared the baptism of heretics to be necessary, and would not recognize their confirmation at the hands of a Catholic bishop as being sufficient for their reception into the Church. They demanded another baptism, to be followed by the usual
It has been conjectured that she died during his sojourn in Padan-aram; for her name appears to have left Isaac's dwelling and gone back to Padan-aram before that period (comp. xxiv, 59, and xxxv, 6), and Rebekah is not placed there. The mention is made by Genesis xxvii, 7 (q.v.). See Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, ii, 364 sq.; Hoffling, Lehrer von der Taufe (Erlangen, 1846). Also see ANABAPTISTS; BAPTISM.

Rebe'coa (Phibne's), the Grecised form (Rom. ix, 10) of the name Rebec'ah (q. v.).

Rebekah (Heb. Ribcah, 'rib'kä), a name, i.e. en- scarer; Sept., New Test., and Josephus, 'Phibne's', the daughter of Bethuel (Gen. xxii, 23) and sister of Laban, married to Isaac, who stood in the relation of a first cousin to her father and to Lot. She is first presented to us in the account of the mission of Eliezer to Padan-aram (ch. xxiv), in which his interview with Rebekah, her consent and marriage, are related. B.C. 2023. The elder branch of the family remained at Haran when Abimelech, the king of the Philistines, was driven out to the land of Canaan, and it is there that we first meet with Laban, as taking the leading part in the betrothal of his sister Rebekah to her cousin Isaac (xxiv, 10, 29-60; xxvii, 43; xxix, 4). Bethuel, her father, plays so insignificant a part in the whole transaction, being in fact only mentioned once, and that after his son (xxiv, 50), that various conjectures have been formed to explain it. Josephus asserts that Bethuel was dead, and that Laban was the head of the house and his sister's natural guardian (Ant. i, 16, 2), in which case "Bethuel" must have crept into the text inadvertently, or be supposed, with some (Adam Clarke, ad loc.), to be the name of another brother of Rebekah. Le Clerc (in Pent.) mentions the conjecture that Bethuel was absent at first, but returned in time to give his consent to the marriage. The mode adopted by Prof. Blunt ('Unedged Coinscences', p. 35) to explain what he terms "the consistent insinuation of Bethuel," viz. that he was incapacitated from taking the management of his family by age or imbecility, is most ingenious; but the prominence of Laban may be sufficiently explained by the circumstances of the country, which we see now (see Nibuh, quoted by Rosenmiller, ad loc.), gave the brothers the main share in the arrangement of their sister's marriage and the defence of her honor (comp. Gen. xxxiv, 13; Judg. xxxii, 22; 2 Sam. xili, 20-23). See BETHUEL.

The whole chapter has been pointed out as uniting most of the circumstances of a pattern marriage—the sanction of parents, the guidance of God, the domestic occupation of Rebekah, her beauty, courteous kindness, willing consent and modesty, and success in retaining her husband's love. For nineteen years she was childless; then, after the prayers of Isaac and her journey to inquire of the Lord, Esau and Jacob were born; and, while the younger was more particularly the companion and favorite of his mother (Gen. xxvi, 19-28), the elder became a grief of mind to her (xxvi, 35). When Isaac was driven by a famine into the lawless country of the Philistines, Rebekah's beauty became, as was apprehended, a source of danger to her husband. But Abimelech was restrained by a sense of justice such as the conduct of his predecessor (ch. xx) in the case of Sarah would not lead Isaac to expect. It was probably a considered time of betrothal when Rebekah suggested the deceit that was practiced by Jacob on his blind father. She directed and aided him in carrying it out, foresaw the probable consequence of Esau's anger, and prevented it by moving Isaac to send Jacob away to Padan-aram (ch. xxvi, 21 sq.), which he owned (21 sq.), (xili, 12). B.C. 1927. The Targum Pseudo-Jon. states (Gen. xxxv, 8) that the news of her death was brought to Jacob at Allan-bachuth.
lishing corrected editions of the Holy Scriptures, though they seldom gave an account of the materials they used. The history of the printed text is important as showing the manner in which in our present copies of the Hebrew Bible were edited, and the sources available for obtaining the exact words of the original. In order to do this we must follow the different editions, we must know the text which they contain; we must know the different degrees of relationship in which the editions stand to each other; in a word, we must have the genealogy of the present editions.

After the history of the printed text, we must mention, first, the editions of different parts of the Old Testament, which formed the basis of later editions. The first part of the Hebrew Scriptures which was published is—

(I.) Marcianus, i.e. Bar Kanabon (1490, 4to, and in folio, sine loco).

This very rare edition is printed on 140 folio pages, each page containing forty lines, but without division of verses, in majuscular and minuscule letters. Only the first four psalms have the superscriptio of Marcianus, which are not found in later editions. At the end two epitaphs are printed, one in rime, the other in prose. See on this edition, F. Rosi, Art. 60, in Borri, Bibliotheca Typographica, p. 14; and in De Hebræis Typographis, 1736, 2 vols., and in Hei-

The text is much better than any previous edition, and it is divided into five books, as can be seen from the super-scriptions to Ps. xii, xlix, ci, and civ. As to the commentary, it is very valuable, because it contains all the post-biblical commentaries of Marcianus, which are not found in later editions. At the end two epitaphs are printed, one in rime, the other in prose. See on this edition, F. Rosi, Art. 60, in Borri, Bibliotheca Typo-dependently, etc.; and Samuel Ockley, in his Introduction, ad Lingua Orient. cap. ii. p. 84, says: "Hinc Roberti Stuphanus edicto palmaria quidem characteris illustratur. Sed in aliqua parte mendosus scatur, quod liber palmarum antiquius postulatur fudurum." III. The third main recension was the Bombergian text of 1522. A newer recension of the text, which has more influence than any on the text of later times, was Bombergus' own, printed at Venice, 1532. It was revised and corrected by Jacob ben-Chashim (Venice, 1535–36, 4 vols. fol.). See Bacherius. This edition was followed by—

4. A. G. C. d'A. d'Arba's edition, published at Venice, 1568, 16 mo; an edition in 4to, 1586: c. R. Rabini (Venice, 4 vols. fol.) (see Barzinaus). This edition was followed by—
6. Croce's, printed at Wittenberg in 1598 and 1602.
8. Brugadin's editions, published at Venice, viz.: a. an edition in 4to and 16 mos (1613–15), & a Rabbinic Bible (in 4to, 1626) (see Barzinaus). This edition was followed by—
9. The Paris, 1619, 4to. See Poretschka; Bacherius.
10. The London, or Walton's Polyglot. See Polyglott Bible.
11. Plantin's Hebrew-Latin Editions (Antwerp, 1571, 1589). In the first edition, in Gen. 3, 15, where the Vulg. has "ipsa contenter caput," with reference to the Virgin Mary, we read גית instead of נינס, with a little circle above to indicate a different reading in the passage (גית). But this corruption was not made by Aris Montanus, the Latin translator.
V. Hutter's Text. Several older editions contributed to Hutter's Bible:
1. Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (incomplete); only the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, and Ruth (Nuremberg, 1569). Hutter's Hebrew Bible was reprinted in Niese's edition (Ludwig Batsatorus, Straits, 1569, large 4vo, 1696, and 1697 with new title-pages).
2. Biblia Sacra Hebraeae: ad Optimum Edita Romana, etc. (Oxford, 1586). This edition—of good reputation for its accuracy, but about the same beauty and distinctness of type—deserves special attention as constituting our present fassus recipient. The text was chiefly formed on that of Athanas: no MS. was used for it, but it has a collection of various readings from printed editions at the end. The Masoretes readings are given in the margin. In spite of all the excellences which this edition has above others, there are still a great many mistakes to be found therein, as Brons has shown in Richard's Bibliotheca, xi, 23 sq. The following editions are either printed from or based on Van der Brouck's text.
RECEPTIONS

Van der Hooght's text is found in all English editions of the Hebrew Bible published by Ducange or Bagster, and is also made the basis of—

19. The Hexaplaton (see Polyglott Bible) (Loud. 1876), vol. 1, p. 186. (v. n. 128.
18. Hahn's Edition, published at Leipzig in 1831, 1829, 1838, and 1863; the last is superior to the former, as can be seen from the preface. Hahn's text has also been published in the edition prepared by Bickell (1847, and often). There is also a small edition of Hahn's Bible (in the size), with a preface by Rosenmüller, in small bibles and pocket bibles, which was published in 1868.

Thiele's Editions (ibid. 1846; 4th ed. 1857). This edition may be regarded as one of the best Hebrew Bibles according to Van der Hooght's recension. Wright, in his 1875 edition of the Geneva in Hebrew (Loud. 1879), has followed Thiele's text.

XII. Optima Editions, or Biblias Hebraicas cum Optima Interpretatione, etc. Studio et Opera D. H. Opitii (Kilnott, 1760-4). O'pik compared for this edition of the Codex Turesk. Three different editions, which are enumerated in the preface. This text was reprinted in—

XIII. Editions with a Revised Text. With Van der Hooght's edition, the textus receptus was given, which was corrected and improved from time to time. But the more the Masorah and ancient Jewish grammarians were studied, the more we found that the present text, while on the whole correct, did not come up to the requirements and the conclusions of the Masorah. As De Littac observes, in the edition of the Old Test., the most points must be observed, trifling and pedantic details. The textus receptus is an imperfect text, yet a ه. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. ن. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. N. thought suggested itself to Bengel that the mass of materials might be definitely classified in conformity with such a view. The same idea afterwards occurred to Semler. Bengel classified all the documents from which various readings are collected into two nations or families—the Asiatic and the African. To the former belonged the Codex Alexandrinus as the chief; to the latter the Greek-Latin codices. And first that eminent critic does not seem to have had a very distinct apprehension of the subject; and therefore he speaks in general terms of it in his edition of the Greek Testament published in 1734; but in the posthumous edition of the Apparatus Criticus (1763, edited by Burkoius) he is more explicit. Semler was the first to use the term recension of a particular class of MSS. In his Hermeneutische Vorbereitung (1765). This critic, however, though acquainted with Westen's labors on the text of the New Testament, had nothing more than a dim notion of the subject. He followed Bengel without clearly understanding or enlarging his views. Griesbach was the first scholar who treated the topic with consummate learning and skill, elaborating it so highly that it became a prominent subject in the criticism of the New Testament. But he had the benefit of Westen's abundant treatises and of the researches already made into MSS. quotations by ancient writers, and versions of the Greek Testament bearing an affinity to one another in characteristic readings, became a classical word in his hands, and has continued so. The appellation is not happily chosen; or, rather the term or process would have been more appropriate; but recension suggests the idea of revision, which is inapprroplicable. If it be remembered, however, that the word denotes nothing more than a certain class of critical documents characterized by distinctive peculiarities in common, it matters little what designation is employed.

The sentiments of Griesbach, like those of Bengel, developed and enlarged with time. Hence we must not look for exactly the same theory in his different publications. In his Disseratio Critica de Codicibus Quatuor Evangeliorum Origine (pars prima, published in 1771), he says that there are, perhaps, three or four recensions into which all the codices of the New Testament might be divided (Opuscula Academica, edited by Gabler, i. 239). In the preface to his first edition of the Greek Testament (1777), he states that at the beginning of the 3d century there were two recensions of the gospel, the Alexandrian and the Western. In the prolegomena to the first volume of his second edition of the Greek Testament, the matured sentiments of this able critic are best set forth. There he illustrates the Alexandrian, the Western, and the Constantinopolitan. The first two are the more ancient, belonging to the time in which the two collections of the New Testament, the εικοναγλωσσα and ἀναγλωσσα, were made. The Alexandrian was an actual recension arising at the time when the two portions in question were put together; the Western was simply the accidental result of carelessness and arbitrary procedure on the part of transcribers and others in the MSS. current before the ἀναγλωσσα, or epitiles, were collected. The Constantinopolitan arose from the intermingling of the other two, and, like the Western, is no proper recension, but was rather the result of a condition of the documents brought about by the negligence and caprice of copyists or meddling critics. The Alexandrian is presented by the MSS. C, L, 38, 102, 106, and B in the last chapters of the four gospels; by the Perpinian, Ethiopic, Armenian, and Philoxenian versions; and the quotations of Clements Alexanderinus, Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, Cyril of Alexandria, and Isidore of Pelusium. The Western accords with the Graeco-Latin codices, with the Alex-Moscow Latin version, and with B in the gospel of Matthew; also with 1, 13, 69, 118, 124, 131, 157; with the Thebaic and Jerusalem-Syriac versions, and the quotations of Ireneus in Latin, Cyprian, Tertullian, Ambrose, and Augustine. The third or Constantinopolitan is shown in A, E, F, G, H, S, of the gospels, the Moscow codices of the Pauline epistles, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Pauline epistles of such fathers as lived during the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries in Greece, Asia Minor, and the neighboring provinces. The text in Chrysostom is described by Griesbach as a mixed one; and of P, Q, and T he says that they are sometimes like the Alexandrian, sometimes like the Western. The Alexandrian recension sought to avoid and change whatever might be offensive to Greek ears; but the Western preserved the harsher genuine readings when opposed to the genius of the Greek language; Hebratizing ones; readings involving solemnism or puerility they retained; they sought sometimes to illustrate words and phrases rather than the sense; the Western endeavored to render the sense clearer and less involved by means of explanations, circumlocations, additions gathered from every side, as well as by transpositions of words and sentences. It also shews the readings which are more full and verbose, as well as supplements taken from parallel passages, sometimes omitting what might render the sense obscure or seem repugnant to the context or parallel passages, in all which respects the Alexandrian is purer. The Alexandrian, a grammatician, the Western an interpreter of an interpreter. In all these points Griesbach asserts that the Constantinopolitan commonly agrees with the Alexandrian; but with this difference, that it is still more studious of Greek propriety, admits more genuine than the Alexandrian, and preserves Western readings, which differ from the Alexandrian, or else readings compounded of Alexandrian and Western. No recension is exhibited by any codex in its original purity (Prolegomena in Novum Testamentum [3d ed. by Schulte], vol. i, p. lxx sq.).

Michaelis thinks that there have existed four principal editions: 1. The Western, used in countries where the Latin language was spoken. 2. The Alexandrian or Egyptian, with which the quotations of Origen coincide and the Copitc version. 3. The Edessene edition, embracing the MSS. from which the old Syriac was made. 4. The Byzantine, in general use at Constantinople after that city became the capital of the Eastern empire. This last is subdivided into the ancient and the modern (Introduction to the New Testament, translated by Marsh, ii, 173 sq. at 2d ed.).

Assuredly this classification is no improvement upon Griesbach's.

Somewhat different from Griesbach's system is that of the Hug, which was first proposed in his Eisleitung in das neue Testament (1808). 1. The συναγλωσσα, i.e. the collections made in the 3d century, and consisting of a concordance of all the 23 legible MSS. in the 2d century, found in D, 1, 13, 69, 124, of the gospels; in D, E, F, G, of Paul's epistles; in D, E, of the Acts; and in the old Latin and Thebais versions. The Peisito belongs to this class of text, though it differs in some respects from D. 2. About the middle of the 8th century, Hesychius, an Egyptian bishop, made a recension of the συναγλωσσα. To this belong B, C, L, of the gospels; A, B, C, 40, 30, 367, in the Acts; A, B, C, 40, 367, in the Catholic epistles; A, B, C, 46, 367, 17, of the Pauline epistles, and A, C, of the Apocalypse. It appears in the citations of Athanasius, Marcus and Macarius the monks, Cyril of Alexandria, and Cosmas Indicopleustes. This recension had ecclesiastical authority in Egypt and Alexandria. 3. About the same time, Lucian, a presbyter of Antioch, in Syria, revised the συναγλωσσα as it then existed in the Peisito, comparing different MSS. current in Syria. In this way he produced a text which did not wholly harmonize with the Hesychian because he was less studious of elegant Latinity. It appears in E, F, G, H, S, of the gospels, in the Alex-Moscow Latin version, and in B, c, d, m, k, (Mattathai), of the Acts; in g, (Mattathai), f, k, l, m, c, d, of the Pauline and Catholic epistles; in r, k, p, l, o, of the Moscow MSS. of the Apocalypse; in the Gobie and Slavonic versions, and the quotations of Theophylact, though his text is no longer pure. A fourth reception Hugo attributes to Origen during his residence at Tyre. To it belong A, K, M, 42, 106, 114, 116, and 10 of Matthei in the gospels, the Philoxenian Syriac, the quotations of Theodoret and Chrysostom. From the fifth century onward, however, Hugo agrees substantially with the Western reception of Griesbach. It is more comprehensive, as including the Peshito, with the quotations of Clement and Origen.

The Hesychian reception of Hugo coincides with the Alexandrian of Griesbach.

Eichhorn's system is substantially that of Hugo, with one important exception. He assumed an unrevised form of the text in Asia, and, with some differences, in Africa also. This unrevised text may be traced in its two forms as early as the 2nd century. Lucian revised the first, Hesychius the second. Hence, to use a formula, the text of the third century, there was a threefold phase of the text—the African or Alexandrian, the Asiatic or Con-stantinopolitan, and a mixture of both. Eichhorn denied that Origen made a new reception (Eindung in der Origenischen Text) as Hugo proposed.

In 1815 Nulan published an Inquiry into the Integrity of the Greek Vulgate, in which he propounded a peculiar theory of receptions. He divided all the documents into three classes—the Palestinian, equivalent to Gries-bach's Alexandrian; the Egyptian, identical with Gries-bach's Byzantine; the third, containing the forms of the text are represented, as he assumed, by the Codex Vaticanus and Jerome's Vulgate, with the Codices Vercellensis and Brixianus of the Latin version.
The last two contained a more ancient text than that rep-gresented by the version of Jerome. The Palestinian reception, which he attributes to Eusebius of Caesarea, is greatly censured as having been executed by this father with arbitrariness and dishonesty, since he tampered with passages because of their opposition to his Abbasite opinions. At the end of the 5th century this reception was introduced into Alexandria by Euthymius, and was circulated there.

Scholz made two classes or families—the Alexandrian or Occidental, and Constantinopolitan or Oriental.
Griesbach's Western class is contained in the former.
He referred to the Alexandrian several of the ancient MSS., and a few later ones—the Mystemphic, Thebaisic, Ethiopic, and Latin versions, and the ecclesiastical writers belonging to Western Europe, with those of Africa.
To the Constantinopolitan he referred the MSS. belonging to the Asiatic or Oriental text object. It is opposed to the Egyptian, especially Constantinople, with the Philoxenian, Syriac, Geotic, Georgian, and Slavonic versions, besides the fathers of these regions. To the latter he gave a decided preference, because of their alleged mutual agreement, and also because they were supposed to be written with great care after the most ancient exemplars; whereas the Alexandrian documents were arbitrarily altered by obvious grammarians. Indeed, he traces the Constan-tinopolitan to the autography of the original writers.

Ruck in agrees with Scholz in classifying all documents numbered by the Constantinopolitan and the Oriental; the former exhibited in A, B, C, D, E, F, G, in the epistles, the latter containing the curative MSS.
The former he subdivides into two families—the Alexian (A, B, C) and the Latin codices (D, E, F, G). He finds in it the result of arbitrary correction, ignorance, and carelessness.

Tischendorf's view, given in the preludium to the seventh edition of his Greek Testament, is that there are two pairs of classes—the Alexandrian and Latin, the Asiatic and Byzantine. The oldest form of the text, he says, was denied that Origen's use of the conception, is presented in A, B, C, D, L, P, Q, T, X, Z, \( \Delta \), perhaps also R, in the gospels. A later form, bearing more of an Asiatic complexion, is in E, F, G, H, K, M, O, S, U, V, W, \( \Gamma \), \( \Delta \). For the Acts and Catholic epistles the oldest text is given in A, B, C; for Acts probably D and I also. For the Pauline epistles the oldest text is represented by A, B, C, H, I, D, F, G, the first five being Alexandrian, the last two Latin; D standing between the two classes. A and C in the Apocalypse have a more ancient text than B.

Lachmann disregarded all systems of receptions, and proceeded to give his own text. From among the ancient and modern texts he selected such as he considered to a definite time—the text which commonly prevailed in the 8th and 4th centuries, drawn from Oriental MSS.—with the aid of Occidental ones in cases where the former disagree among themselves. In his large dition he follows the Western text, and, as far as the original itself, as he would have given it. For this reason his edition contains readings which, in his own opinion, could not have been original. His object was therefore somewhat different from that of most editors.
But he set an example of rigid adherence to the task proposed, and he was able to give the text in a true form of text from ancient documents of the time, evincing the talents and skill of a master. Since his time it has been the fashion among inferior critics and imitators to attach undue weight to antiquity. Unical MSS. and their readings have been too implicitly followed by some.

Tischendorf more recently adopted the same views
as those of Lachmann, holding that the most ancient text alone should be edited, though it may not always be what the sacred writers wrote. This principle being laid at the basis of his eighth edition, lately completed, made a considerable difference between it and the seventh. The internal goodness of readings, the context, and sound judgment are thus excluded, and this at the expense of something more valuable; for more outward and ancient testimony can never elicit
what ought to be an editor's chief object—the presentation of a text as near as can be procured.
The oldest text of the best MSS. and versions is valuable only so far as it assists in attaining that object. It is opposed to the Alexandrian, especially from \( \gamma \) (\( \gamma \) \( \gamma \) \( \gamma \)) in John 1, 18 has been given in the text of a recent edition. The same excessive veneration for antiquity has led to the addition of \( \gamma \) (\( \gamma \) \( \gamma \) \( \gamma \)) in (John 1, 8) in modern times. Lachmann is exceeded by smaller followers, not in his own exact line, but in his method.

To Griesbach all must allow distinguished merit.
He was a consummate critic, ingenious, acute, candid, tolerant, and learned. His system was elaborated with great ability. It exhibits the marks of a sagacious mind, and is supported by a mass of evidence, the combined attacks weakened its basis. In Germany, Eichhorn, Berthold, Hugo, Schulz, Gabler, and Schott made various objections to it. In consequence of Hugo's acute remarks, the venerable scholar himself modified his views. He did not, however, give up all three recensions, but still maintained that the Alexandrian and Western were distinct. He admitted that the Syriac, which Hugo had put with \( \gamma \) (\( \gamma \) \( \gamma \) \( \gamma \)) was nearer to that than to the Alexandrian class; but he hesitated to put it with the Western because it differed so much. He taught that Origen used, if at all, the Alexandrian, which existed before his time, was that which he employed. He conceded, however, that Origen had a Western copy of Mark besides an Alexandrian one; that in his commentary on Matthew, though the readings are chiefly Alexandrian, there is RECESSIONS

most copious in his praises of Origen, speaks strongly against the critical studies of the Alexandrian father in the New-Test. text. We believe, therefore, that the recession system of Hug is sustained by historical data. Succeeding critics have refused to adopt it. Griesbach himself was attacked by his contemporaries, and was also assailed by Schott, Rinck, Gabler, and others. Mr. Norton, too, opposed it.

Nolan's system is fundamentally wrong. There is no evidence that the Codex Brixianus contains the Latin version in its oldest form, and therefore the assumed connection of it with the Byzantine text fails to show that the latter is the most ancient and best representative of the original Greek. The Codex Brixianus, on the contrary, is itself a revision of the old Latin text. Nolan thinks that the Codex Vercellensis has a text corrected by Eusebius of Vercelli after that which he brought from Egypt on his return from exile. But this form of the text circulated in the West before Eusebius, and the Palestinian recession, which he supposed to have been introduced into Alexandria by Euthalius, was there before; that the system was ingeniously elaborated by the critic is historically erroneous. It introduces arbitrary and baseless conjectures into the department of criticism, ignores facts, and deals in unjust accusations against ancient writers, such as Eusebius of Cesarea, who worked as a historian in the service of the Byzantine text. All attempts to maintain the most recent in opposition to the most ancient text must necessarily fail. Thoroughly erroneous as Nolan's theory is, it was eagerly welcomed by some advocates of the received text in England. Mr. Horne could say of it, even in the ninth edition of his Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Scriptures, "The integrity of the Greek Vulgate he has confessedly established by a series of proofs and connected arguments the most decisive that can be reasonably desired or expected."

With respect to the codex which is collated with Bengel's, it may be preferable to Griesbach's so far as it allows but two classes of documents; it is certainly simpler. His estimate, however, of the value of families is erroneous. He failed to prove that the particular form of the text current in Asia Minor and Greece during the first three centuries was the same as that presented by the Constantinopolitan MSS. of a much later date. He did not show that the Byzantine family was derived from the autographs of the original writers in a very pure state, and he was obliged to admit that the text which he had collated with those of Constantine and Constance was collated with the Alexandrian, a circumstance which would naturally give rise to a mingling of readings belonging to both. Eusebius states that he made out fifty copies of the New Text, for the use of the church; the Constatines of Constantine; and as we know that he gave a decided preference to Alexandrian copies, it cannot be doubted that he followed those sanctioned by Origen's authority. Constantinopolitan codices differ in their characteristic readings from the Alexandrian, but the preference belongs to the latter, and not to the former. Junior should be placed above older documents? Antiquity may be overbalanced by other considerations, and certainly the Constantinopolitan MSS. are neither faultless nor pure. But the Byzantine and later MSS. are more corrupt. Numbers must not be considered decisive of right readings in opposition to antiquity, yet numbers had an undue influence on Scholal's mind. Rinck has refuted his supposed proofs of the superiority of Constantinopolitan MSS., and Tischendorf has more elaborately done the same in the preface to his first edition of the Greek Testament. In fact, the names of the Codex Brixianus are not better than the names of those who undertook to revise the Καισαριανός. It is true that Jerome appeared as editor of Origen undertook to revise the Καισαριανός. It is true that Jerome appeared as editor of the New Test. selected with care, and probably corrected them in various places, but he did not undertake in his old age the laborious task of making a peculiar revision. The silence of ancient writers, especially of Eusebius, who is great number of such as are Western, and which therefore appear in D, 13, 28, 69, 124, 131, 157, the old Italic, Vulgate, and Syriac. Thus Origen had various copies at hand, as he himself repeatedly asserts. Griesbach also conceded that Clemens Alexandrinus had various copies at his disposal in the form of his own texts. Hence his citations often agree with the Καισαριανός and D. Thus Origen and Clement cease, in some measure, to be standart representatives of the Alexandrian recession. The concessions of Griesbach, resulting from many acute observations made by Hug and others, amounted to this, that the nearness of MSS. and recensions to one another was greater than he had before assumed; that his two ancient recensions had more points of contact with one another in existing documents than he had clearly perceived. The line between his Alexandrian and Western classes became less perceptible. This, indeed, was the weak point of the system, as no proper division can be drawn between the two. In the application of his system he professed to follow the consent of the Alexandrian and Western recensions, unless the internal marks of truth in a reading were so strong as to outweigh this argument. But he departed from his principle in several instances, as in 1 Cor. iii. 4; Gal. iv. 14: Phil. iii. 8; 1 Thess. ii. 7; Heb. iv. 2.

In the year 1814 Dr. Laurence published objections to the system, many of which are unfounded. Some of his observations are pertinent and fair; more are irrelevant. He does not show much appreciation of the comparative value of MSS. and texts, and reasons in a sort of mechanical method against Griesbach. It is evident that he was somewhat prejudiced against the Alexandrian recession. Observations like the following show an animus against the German critic: "Too much dazzled, perhaps, by the splendor of intricate and perplexing research, he overlooked what lay immediately before him. When he threw his critical bowl among the hares of his predecessors, he too hastily attempted to set up his own without having first totally demolished theirs, forgetting that the very nerve of his criticism was a principle of hostility to every standard text" (Remarks upon the Systematic Classification of MSS. adopted by Griesbach, p. 57). The pamphlet of the Oxford scholar is now almost forgotten, yet it produced considerable effect at the time of its appearance, when the reprinting of Griesbach's Greek Testament in England was associated with the active dissemination of Unitarian tenets, and the accomplished German himself not only with learning but with similar views. In America, Mr. Norton subsequently animadverted upon the same system with considerable acuteness and plausibility. It is evident, however, that he did not fully understand all Griesbach's sentiments; he had not studied the peculiar readings of MSS. or quotations of the fathers, and the characteristics of ancient versions, yet he has urged some objections forcibly and conclusively against the adoption of the system.

Hug's theory of recensions, so far as it differs from Griesbach's, is without foundation. It makes Origen use the Καισαριανός, whereas his usual text agrees strongly with the Alexandrian. The Hezychian recession was employed at least a hundred years previously by Clement of Alexandria, and that Hesychius was really the author of a recession is historically baseless; he may have corrected, in some places, a few copies which he used. The recession attributed to Lucian is also destitute of historical proof. The basis of this is supposed to have been the Καισαριανός as it existed in Syria. Again, it is very improbable that Origen undertook to revise the Καισαριανός. It is true that Jerome ap-ppeared as editor of the New Test. selected with care, and probably corrected them in various places, but he did not undertake in his old age the laborious task of making a peculiar revision. The silence of ancient writers, especially of Eusebius, who is more families of documents; others, with less acuteness or ingenuity, will rest satisfied with classes more strongly marked by the number of materials they involve, as the breadth of territory over which they were supposed to circulate. There is no possibility of arriving at precision. The collating of readings has obliterated many peculiarities in the progress of time, though enough has been left to form the basis of a rough classification.

It is more difficult to classify the ancient versions, such as the Peshito-Syriac, because their texts have suffered frequent interpolations and changes. In the quotations of the fathers we must make allowance for the memorior citation without expectation of exactness of the attache to the letter. Griesbach, however, denies that Origen quoted from memory—and none has investigated the citations of the Alexandrian father with equal labor—but the state of his commentaries is far from being what we could wish, and the original is often lost or corrupted.

The term recension is sometimes applied to the Old Test. as well as to the New Test. There the materials hitherto collated all belong to one recension, viz. the Masoretic. Sometimes, however, the specializations of the critics to which we have referred have had one advantage, viz. that they have made the characteristic readings of MSS. better understood, and enabled us to group together certain documents presenting the same form of text. Thus in the gospels, A, B, C, D, L, F, Q, T, X Z present an older form of the text than E, F, G, H, K, M, S, U, V, F. Among the former, A, B, Z have a text more ancient and correct than that of others.

Matthew repudiated the whole system of recensions as useless and absurd. We question whether he was warranted by learning, penetration, or judgment to use the contemptuous language which he applied. His industry in collating MSS. and editing their text was praiseworthy, but he had not the genius to construct a good text out of the materials within his reach. He overestimated his Moscow codices, and looked on Griesbach's merits with envious eye; hence his diatribe on recensions shows more ardent zeal than discretion.

What sentence can show the spirit of the man better than this?—Griesbach has been hammering, filing, and polishing for thirty years at this masterpiece of uncriticism, unbelief, and irreligion. It is said by Semler's recension-manufactory ("Ueber die gegenwartigen Recensionen, welche der Herr Abt Bengel, der Herr Doctor Semler, und der Herr Professor Mathäus in dem Texte des N. T. wollen entdeckt haben", p. 28).

Prof. Lee employed language equally strong with Mattathias's, but not so scurrilous, though of the same tendency: "Ingegnio illae familiarum fabrisc, ut mihi videtur, in unum tantummodo finem feliciter extruxit sunt; ut rem in speciam baud valde obscuram, tenebris Egyptianis obscuriorum reddant; Editoresco eois qui se omnino rem acut et diligiae pertun, supra mortalia labendi statum, necio quantum, everebe" (Prolegomena in Biblia Polyglotta Lundensine Minoriz, p. 89).

Neither is sufficiently eminent to be called wise. Bengel has been hammering, filing, and polishing from which masters in criticism like Griesbach would refrain. Hear the veteran scholar, in his last publication, speaking of Hug: "Dubitationis ignitus causas exponere mihi liceat, sed paucis et modeste, nec eo animo, sum tum voce docetum quem permagni me facere ingenu proferre, decertem, sed ut tum aliquis harum rerum peritos, tum in primis iisum excitam et humanissimi invitem ad novum instituendum cause, que in universa re critica Novi Testamenti maximi momenti est, examen, quo ea, siullo modo fieri id possit, ad liquidum tandem, etiamsi propter nonnulla in Novi Testamenti Recensionibus, particula ii, p. 42.

The preceding observations will help to account for the varying schemes of different critics. Some may look for greater exactness and nicety than others, hence they will make corrections it underwent in different places at different times, the methods in which it was copied, the principles, if any, that preceded it, the exactness of the materials, both ancient and modern—"every thing is too meagre to build up a secure structure. The subject must therefore remain in obscurity. Its nature is such as to give rise to endless speculation without affording much real knowledge; it is vague, indefinite, shadowy, awakening curiosity without satisfying it. Yet we are not disposed to reject the entire system of classification as visionary. It is highly useful to arrange the materials. The existence of certain characteristic readings may be clearly traced in various manuscripts of the text, and other faults, on the speeial causes, it is true that in several cases it is very difficult to distinguish the family to which a particular reading belongs, because its characteristics may be divided between two classes, or they may be so mixed that it is almost impossible to detect the family with which it should be united; the evidences of its relationship may be so obscure as to render the determination of its appropriate recension a subtle problem. It is also unquestionable that no one MS, version or father exhibits a recension in a pure state, but that each form of text has been modified by the specializations of the critics to which we have referred. In one MSS. we have the Speculator or Masoretic. Sometimes, however, the specializations of the critics to which we have referred have had one advantage, viz. that they have made the characteristic readings of MSS. better understood, and enabled us to group together certain documents presenting the same form of text. Thus in the gospels, A, B, C, D, L, F, Q, T, X, Z present an older form of the text than E, F, G, H, K, M, S, U, V, F. Among the former, A, B, Z have a text more ancient and correct than that of others.

Reception

Rechabite

Receveur, François Joseph Xavier, a French priest and historian, was born at Longeville (Doubs) April 30, 1766. His family had received his orders when he was sent to Paris (Oct., 1824) to fill a senator in the cabinet of the minister of ecclesiastical affairs and of public instruction. From June, 1828, to June, 1829, he was head of the bureau of secretariat to the same minister. Afterwards appointed a teacher in the theological faculty of Paris (May 1, 1861), he became the precursor of more important works. He was a member of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences (1841, 1841), and dean of the faculty Dec. 6, 1850. He had not long been relieved from these last duties when he died in his native country, May 7, 1854. The various positions which he filled permitted him to devote his labors to several important works. We have: Études Philosopliques sur le Fondement de la Cer titude (Paris, 1821, 12mo) ;—A de la Foi avec la Raison, ou Exposition des Principes sur lesquels repose la Foi Catholique (ibid, 1830-33, 12mo) ;—Essai sur la Nécessité de l'Amé, sur l'Origine des Idees et le Fondement de la Cer titude (ibid, 1834, 8vo) ;—Tractatus Theologicus de Justitiis et Contradictis (ibid, 1835, 12mo) —Introduction à la Théologie (Besançon, 1839, 8vo) ;—Histoire de l'Église depuis son Établissement jusqu'au Pontificat de Grégoire X (Paris, 1840-47, 8 vols, 8vo). As an editor, abbé Rece veur has given a new life to Théologique Doctrinale et Morale de Bailly (1830), and another of the Théologique Morale de Liguori, to which he has added some notes (1833). Collector for the Nouvelle Bibliographie Générale, he died a short time after having contributed the articles Saint-Cyrus and Saint-Cyrilla, in the Dictionary of the Church. One of his chief subjects was the Rechabite (Heb. Rechab, נָּצָּה כ, a rider; Sept. Παγάς, the name of three men. 1. The first named of the two "sons of Rimmon the Beerothite," "captains of bands," who murdered Ish booth in his bed in order to gain favor with David, but were put to death by him, with expressions of abhorrence for their crime (2 Sam. v, 5-12). B.C. 1046. Josephus calls him Thomas (Ant. ii, 2, 1). The other's name was Banab (q. v.). 2. The "father" of Jehonadab (or Jonadab, Jer. xxxvi, 20), who was Jehu's companion in destroying the worshippers of Baal (2 Kings x, 15-22). See Jonas da B.C. ante 882. He was the ancestor of the Rechabites (q. v.). 3. The father of Malchiah, which latter was ruler of part of Beth-haccerem, and is named as repairing the dung-gate in the fortifications of Jerusalem under Nehe miah (Neh. iii, 14). B.C. ante 446. Rechab'ite [properly Rechab'ite]. (Heb. always is the plural, and with the art. ha-Rekobim, ינָצָּה כ, a pastoral from Rechab; Sept. Panaííers, Panaííers, etc.), a tribe who appear only in one memorable scene of Scripture (Jer. xxxiv, 2-18). Their history before and after it lies in some obscurity. We are left to search out and combine some scattered notices, and to get from them what light we can. 1. In 1 Chron. ii, 55 the house of Rechab is identified with a section of the Kenites who came into Canaan with the Israelites and retained their nomadic habits, and the name of Nehemiah is mentioned as the patriarch of the whole tribe. See HEMM. N.H.), 4, 14. B.C. ante 446. The house of Rechab belonged to a branch of the Kenites settled from the first at Jabez, in Judah. See JEHONADAB. The fact, however, that Jehonadab took an active part in the revolution which placed Jehu on the throne seems to indicate that he and his tribe belonged to Israel rather than to Judah, and the late date of 1 Chron., taken together with other facts (infra), makes it more probable that this passage refers to the locality occupied by the Rechabites after their return from the captivity. In confirmation of this view, it may be noticed that the "shearing-house" of 2 Kings x, 14 was probably the known rendezvous of the nomad tribe of the Kenites with their flocks of sheep. See SHEARING- HOUSE. Of Rechab himself nothing is known. He may have been the father, he may have been the remoter ancestor of Jehonadab, or he may have been an individual who made it probable enough that it was an epitaph passing into a proper name. It may have pointed, as in the robber-chieft of 2 Sam. iv, 2, to a conspicuous form of the wild Bedouin life; and Jehonadab, the son of the Rider, may have been, in part at least, for that reason, the companion and friend of the fierce captain of Israel who drives as with the fury of madness (2 Kings ix, 20). Another conjecture as to the meaning of the name is ingeniously enough to merit a disinterment from the forgotten learning of the 16th century. Boulcuc (De Eccles. ante Leg. iii, 10) infers from 2 Kings ii, 12: xiii, 14, that the two great prophets Elijah and Elisha were known, each of them in his time, as the chariot (227) Rekeb) of Israel, i.e. its strength and protection. He infers from this the special disciples of the prophets, who followed them as their graduates, were known as the "sons of the chariot," Bene-Rekeb; and that afterwards, when the original meaning had been lost sight of, this was taken as a patronymic, and referred to an unknown Rechab. At present, of course, the different vowel-points of the two words are sufficiently distinctive; but the strange reading of the Sept. in Judg. i, 19 (for 'Psial' daréicara, which the A. V. has "because they had chariots of iron") shows that one word might easily enough be taken for the other. Apart from the evidence of the name and the obvious probability of the fact, we have an apparent (quantum eundem) of John of Jerusalem that Jehonadab was a disciple of Elisha (De Instit. Monach. c. 25).

II. The personal history of Jehonadab has been dealt with under that name. Here we have to notice the new character which he impressed on the tribe of which he was the head. As his name, his descent, and the part which he played indicate, he and his people had all along been worshippers of Jehovah, circumcised, and so within the covenant of Abraham, though not reckoned as belonging to Israel, and probably therefore not considered the same as the Nazarites bound by the basic law and ritual. The worship of Baal introduced by Jezebel and Ahab was accordingly not less offensive to them than to the Israelites. The luxury and license of Phoenician cities threatened the destruction of the simplicity of their nomatic life (Amos ii, 7; vi, 5-6). A protest was needed against both evils, and, as in the case of Elijah, and of the Nazarites of Amos ii, 11, it took the form of asceticism. There was to be a more rigid adherence than ever to the old Arab life. What had been a traditional habit was enforced by a solemn command from Heaven. Jehonadab is that most Approved of idolatry, which no one dared to transgress. They were to drink no wine, nor build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any. All their days they were to dwell in tents, as remembering that they were strangers in the land (Jer. xxxv, 5, 7). This was to be the condition of their retaining a distinct tribal existence. For two centuries and a half they adhered faithfully to this rule; but we have no record of any part taken by them in the history of the period. We may think of them as presenting the same picture which other tribes, united in their faith, sacrifices, and religious austerity, have presented in later periods.

The Nabataeans, of whom Diiodorus Siculus speaks (xix, 94) as neither sowing seed, nor planting fruit-tree, nor using nor building house, and enforcing these transmitted customs under pain of death, give us one striking instance. The fact that the Nabataeans habitually drank "wild honey" (μελί αυλαίον) mixed with water (Diiod. Sic. xix, 94), and that the Bedouin as habitually still make locusts an article of food (Burchardt, Bedouins, p. 270), shows very strongly that the Baptist's life was familiar to the Bedouin as well as to the Nazarite. Another is found in the prohibition of wine by Mohammed (Sale, Koran, Pr. trim. Diss. § 5). A yet more interesting parallel is found in the rapid growth of the sect of the Wahabis during the last and present century. Aby-ul-Husayn, as the sect takes its name, still preserves the old type of character in all its completeness. Anxious to protect his countrymen from the revolting vices of the Turks, as Jehonadab had been to protect the Kenítes from the like vices of the Phoenicians, the Bedouin reformer felt the necessity of returning to the old austerity of Arab life. What wine had been given to the earlier preachers of the gospel was not the outward sign and incentive of a fatal corruption, opium and tobacco were to the later prophet, and, as such, were rigidly proscribed. The rapidity with which the Wahabíe became a formidable party, the Puritans of Islam, presents a striking analogy to the strong political influence of Jehonadab in 2 Kings x, 15, 23 (comp. Burchardt, Bedouins and Wahabis, p. 283, etc.).

III. The invasion of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar in B.C. 607 drove the Rechabites from their tents. Possibly some of the previous periods of danger may have led to their settling within the limits of Judah. Some inferences may be safely drawn from the facts of Jer. xxxv. The names of the Rechabites show that they continued to be worshippers of Jehovah. They are already known to the prophet. One of them (ver. 3) bears the same name. Their rigid Nazariteh life gained for them admission into the house of the Lord, into one of the chambers assigned to priests and Levites, within its precincts. They were received by the sons or followers of a "man of God," a prophet or devotee, of sanctity (ver. 4); they were not tempted, and are proof against the temptation, and their steadfastness is turned into a reproof for the unfaithfulness of Judah and Jerusalem. See Jer. xxiv. The history of this trial ends with a special blessing, the full import of which has, for the most part, not been adequately apprehended: "Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me forever" (ver. 19). Whether we look on this as the utterance of a true prophet, or as a vaticinium ex eventibus, we should hardly expect at this precise point to lose sight altogether of those of whom it was spoken, even if the words pointed only to the perpetuation of the name and tribe. They have, however, possibly been the extent of the new blessing. The Rechabites were solidly adopted into the families of Israel, and were recognised as incorporated into the tribe of Levi. Their purity, their faithfulness, their consecrated life, gained for them, as it gained for other Nazarites, that honor. See Psal. 69, 9. In Lam. iv, 7 we may perhaps trace a reference to the Rechabites, who had been the most conspicuous examples of the Nazariteh life in the prophet's time, and most the object of his admiration.

It may be worth while to refer to a few authorities agreeing in the general interpretation here given, though differing as to details. Vatabulus (Crit. Sac. ad loc.) mentions a Jewish tradition (R. Judah, as cited by Kimchi; comp. Scaliger, Elench. Tribufes. Serr. p. 26) that the daughters of the Rechabites married Levites, and that they thus were maintained by the Temple, while Clarus (ibid) conjectures that the Rechabites themselves were chosen to sit in the great council. Sanctius and Calmet suppose them to have ministered in the same way as the Nehirim (Calmet, Diss. sur les Rech. chap. 1726). Scaliger identifies them with the Essenes; Scaliger (loc. cit.) with the Chasidim, in whose name the priests offered special daily sacrifices, and who, in this way, were "standing before the Lord" continually.

IV. It remains for us to see whether there are any traces of the name of Rechabite in the Sept.-version (טבש, ouest 755) of the name, which, however, is evidence merely of a tradition in the 5th century B.C. indicating that the "sons of Jonadab" shared the captivity of Israel, and took their place among the Levitical psalmists who gave expression to the sorrows of the people. The psalm itself belongs to David's time. See Ps. 79:1. 2. There is the significant mention of a son of Rechab in Neh. iii. 14 as co-operating with the priests, Levites, and princes in the restoration of the wall of Jerusalem. 3. The mention of the house of Rechab in 1 Chron. ii, 55, though not without difficulty, points, there can be little doubt, to the same connection. The Rechabites have become scribes (ךר, suraphim). They give themselves to a calling which, at the time of the return, from Babylon, if not chiefly, if not exclusively, in the hands of Levites. The other names (Tirathites, Shimeathe- lites, and Suchathites in the A.V.) seem to add nothing to our knowledge. The Vulg. rendering, however (evidence of a traditional Jewish interpretation in the time of Jerome), gives a translation based on etymology, more or less accurate, of the proper names, which strikingly confirms the view now taken: "Cognominous quaeque scribarum habitantium in Jabe", canones atque resonantes, et in tabernacularis commorantes." Thus interpreted, the passage points to a resumption of the outward form of their old life and its union with their new functions. The etymology on which this version rests, is so confused, very doubtful. Scaliger (Elench. Tishkar. Serrur. e. 29) rejects them with scorn. Pelican and Calmet, on the other hand, defend the Vulg. rendering, and Gill (ad loc.) does not dispute it. Most modern interpreters follow the A.V. in taking the words as proper names. It deserves notice also that while in 1 Chron. ii, 54, 55 the Rechabites and Netophathites are mentioned in close connection, the "sons of the singers" in Neh. xii, 28 appear as coming in large numbers from the villages of the same Netophathites. The close juncture of the Rechabites with the descendants of David of 1 Chron. iii, 1 shows also how in honorable an esteem they were held at the time when this book was compiled.

4. The account of the martyrdom of James the Just given in Acts xii, 22, does not, in any case, mention the name of the Rechabites once more before us, and in a very strange connection. While the scribes and Pharisees were stoning him, "one of the priests of the sons of Rechab, who are mentioned by Jeremiah the prophet," cried out, protesting against the crime. Stanley "Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age," p. 333, struck with the seeming anomaly of a priest, "not only not of Levitical, but not even of Jewish descent," supposes the name to have been used loosely as denoting the abstemious life of James and other Nazarites, and points to the fact that Epiphanius (Hier. lxxxviii, 14) ascribes to Simeon, the brother of James, the words which Hegesippus puts into the mouth of the Rechabite, as a proof that it denoted merely the Nazarite form of life. Calmet (loc. cit.) supposes the man to have been one of the Rechabite Netophathites. Eusebius, who is in ignorance for a priest. The view which has been here taken presents, it is believed, a more satisfactory solution. It was hardly possible that a writer like Hegesippus, living at a time when the details of the Temple services were fixed in the memories of as should have thus spoken of the Rechabim unless there had been a body of men to whose name was commonly applied. He uses it as a man would do to whom it was familiar, without being struck by any apparent or real anomaly. The Targum of Jonathan on Jer. xxxvi, 19, indicates, as has been noticed, the same fact. We may accept Hegesippus therefore as an authority witness to the existence of the Rechabites as a recognised body up to the destruction of Jerusalem, sharing in the ritual of the Temple, partly descended from the old "sons of Jonadab," partly recruited by the incorporation into their ranks of men devoting themselves as did Jehoiada and Simeon, to the consecrated life. The form of austere holiness presented in the life of Jonadab, and the blessing pronounced on his descendants, found their highest representatives in the two brothers of the Lord. 5. Some later notices are not without interest. Benjamin of Tudela, in the 12th century (ed. Asher, 1840, i, 112-114), mentions that near El Jubar (=Pun- bitheba) he found Jews who were named Rechabites. They tilled the ground, kept flocks and herds, abstained from wine and flesh, and gave tithes to teachers who devoted themselves to studying the law and weeping for Jerusalem. They were 100,000 in number, and were governed by a prince, Salomon han-Nasi, who traced his genealogy up to the house of David, and ruled over the city of Tiberias. A later traveler, Dr. Wolff, gives a yet stranger and more detailed report. The Jews of Jerusalem and Yemen told him that he would find the Rechabites of Jer. xxxvi living near Mecca (Journ., 1829, ii, 334). When he came near Senaa he came in contact with a tribe, the Beni- Kharib, who identified themselves with the sons of Jonadab. With one of them, Mosa, Wolff conversed, and he recounts the dialogue as follows: "I asked him, 'Whose descend- ants are you?' Mosa answered, 'Come, and I will show you,' and read from an Arabic Bible the words of Jer. xxxvi, 5-11. He then went on, 'Come, and you will find us 60,000 in number. See the words of the prophet have been fulfilled: Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man to stand before me forever'" (ibid. p. 335). In a later journal (ibid. 1835, p. 389) he mentions a second interview with Mosa, describes them as keeping strictly to the old rules, calls them now by the name of the Beni-Abrad, and says that the Beni-Abrad of the tribe of Dan live with them. A paper On Recent Notices of the Rechabites, by Sigmond Pierotti, was read at the Cambridge meeting of the British Association (October, 1862). He met with a tribe calling themselves Rechabites and the descendants of Jonadab from the south-east from it. They had a Hebrew Bible, and said their prayers at the tomb of a Jewish rabbi. They told him precisely the same stories as had been told to Wolff thirty years before. The details, however, whether by the Beni-Abrad (E. iii, 22) or the Beni-Abbad, are more than a Rechabites. They are described as living in caverns and low houses, not in tents—and this in Arabia, where Bedouin habits would cease to be singular; nor are any of the Rechabite rules observable in them except that of refraining from wine—an absten- tiveness which ceases to be remarkable in Arabia, where no one drinks wine, and where, among the strongholds of Islam, it could probably not be obtained without dan- ger and difficulty. There were large numbers of Tal- mudical Jews in Arabia in the time of Mohammed, and these supposed Rechabites are probably descended from a body of them. See Wittius, Dissert. de Rechabites, in Miscell. Sacra, ii, 176 sqq.; Carpusov, Apparat. p. 148; Calmet, Dissert. sur les Rechabites, in Commentarius Lit- eral. vi, 18-21. RECHAB. JEAN GIFFER DE (whose religious name was Jean de Sainte-Marie), a French Dominican, was born at Quillezau, Aug. 25, 1601. He took the habit of a monk, and taught Greek and Hebrew at Paris, then at Bordeaux, and then (1630) as a missionary in Greece. He travelled in the Greek monas- tories, and visited the island of Scio and Constanti- nople. Returning to Paris about the end of 1631, he became in 1637 prior of the convent of the Domin-cians at Rouen, and devoted himself with success to preaching. Being sent to Bordeaux in 1640, he collected numerous materials for the history of his order; and when, in 1656, the monks of St. Dominique founded several houses in France, he was charged with the erection of divers novitiates. He died April 9, 1660. We have of his works, Les Vies Exercices Solitaires et Prolongées de la Vie Spirituelle et Religieuse (Rouen, 1638-40; 4 vols. 12mo); Vie de Saint-Hyacinthe (Paris, 1643; 12mo).—Les Vies de Trois Bienheureux de Bretagne, Yves Miseireau, Éclogue de Remes, Abone de la Roche, Pierre Quintin (ibid., 1648, 12mo);—Vie de Renauld de Saint-Gilles, Doyen de Saint-Agnus d'Orléans (who died in 1293) (ibid., 1648, 12mo).—Vie de Saint-Cyris (ibid., 1648, 12mo).—Vie de la Fondation de tous les Convents des Frères Précheurs de l'Un et de l'Autre France en France et dans les Pays-Bas (ibid., 1647; 4to).—Les Vies et Actes Mémorables des Saintes et Bienheureuses de l'Ordre des Frères Précheurs (1655, 2 vols. 4to).—And a great number of other works printed or in MS., among them Propriétés de Nostradamen expliquées (Paris, 1656, 12mo), published without the name of the author.—Hoefer, Neue Biog. Rechah (Heb. Rekah, רַכָּח, hindermost; Sept. 'Ραχάα, v. r. 'Ραχάα). In 1 Chron. iv, 12, Beth-rapha, Paseah, and Tehinnah, the father, or founder, of Ira-bashah, are said to have been "the men of Rechah." In the Targum of R. Joseph they are called "the men of the Great Sambadir," the Targumist apparently reading הָרָא. Schwarz regards it as the name of a place inhabited by the posteriority of Judah, and identifies it with "a village Roashah, three English miles to the south of Hebron" (Polœst. p. 116).

Rechëch, Johann Wilhelm, the main representative of the Kantian rationalism in the Lutheran Church of the Rhine countries, was born at Lennep, in 1796 he became pastor of the newly organized Lutheran church at Hückeswagen, and in 1796 pastor at Mülheim-on-the-Rhine, where, during the Revolution, he published a translation of Marcus Aurelius's philosophical treatise Tu ciir ècuric (1797), in order to show how a man should become a stoic. After the taking of the Rhine countries by Prussia, he became a member of the consistory of Cologne, which in 1826 was dissolved. In 1860 he retired from the ministry to his country-seat at Wenning, between Cologne and Bonn, being dissatisfied with the political moveiments of his time, and died as an angry philosopher Jan. 9, 1855. He published some hymns, which, though of little value, are, however, found in some of the modernized German hymn-books. He also published a collection of sermons in two volumes, which are enumerated in Zinzendorf's Bibliotheca Theologica, ii, 403 (comp. also Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenleides, vi, 259). (B. P.)

Rechenberg, Karl Friedrich Wilhelm, a Lutheran minister, was born Feb. 10, 1817, at Barnickow, near Königsberg, in Prussia. From 1835 to 1840 he studied in the seminary of the Berlin Missionary Society, and in 1841 he came to this country to work among his countrymen. His first pastorate was at Saratoga, N. Y., where he labored for about fifteen years. In 1855 he was called to Albany, at which place he remained three years. He then went to Canada, where he labored for about thirteen years in Toronto and for five years at Montreal. Among his converts he was a prominent member, and was the first president of the Canadian synod. He also edited for a long time the paper of his denomination, and was president of the Missionary Board he cared for his countrymen with wond and sacrifice. His bodily infirmities obliged him to retire from his large field of labor, and he accepted the call of a small congregation at Port Chester, N. Y., in 1875, where he died Dec. 13, 1877. (B. P.)

Reclusus (Lat. recluse, also inclusus, "shut up"), a class of monks or nuns who, from a motive of special penance, or with a view to the more strict observance of Christian perfection, remained shut up from all converse, even with members of their own order, in a small cell of a hermitage or other place of strict retirement. This practice, which was a kind of voluntary imprisonment, either from motives of devotion or penance, was not allowed except to persons of tried virtue and by special permission of the abbot; and the recluse, who took an oath never to stir out of his retreat, was, with due solemnity locked up in the presence of the abbot or the bishop, who placed his seal upon the door, not to be removed without the authority of the bishop himself. Everything necessary for support was conveyed through a window. If the recluse were a priest, he was allowed a small oratory with a window which looked into the church, through which he might make his offerings at mass, hear the singing, and answer those who spoke to him; but this window had curtains before it, so that he could not be seen. In later mediæval times the recluse was allowed a small garden near his cell for the planting of a few herbs and for recreation in fresh air. If he fell sick, his door was opened by the authorities for the sake of affording assistance. The celebrated mediæval theologian Rabanus Maurus was a recluse when elected archbishop of Mentz. Nuns also were found to practice the same voluntary seclusion, especially in the Benedictine, Franciscan, and Cistercian orders. A rule specially designed for female recluses was composed by Ælfræd of Rerehit, and is preserved by Holstenius in his Codex Regularum Monasticorum, l, 418 sq. In a wider sense, the name recluse is popularly applied to all cloistered persons, whether men or women—even those who live in community with their brethren. The inmates of the celebrated French retreat for Jansenists—Port-Royal—were also called recluses. See Wetzer and Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon (art. "Inclusi"); Cults, Senses, and Characters of the Middle Ages (Lon., 1879).

Recollet (Lat. recolléctus, "gathered together") is the name given to the members of certain reformed bodies of monastic orders, whether of men or women, in the Roman Catholic Church. Among orders of men, an offshoot of the Augustinian hermits, which, under Louis de Montoya, in 1530, obtained considerable popularity in Spain, was called by this name, and the order still exists at Medina Sidonia, Leon, and Pamplona; but outside of Spain, this order is better known under the title of the Reformed Franciscans, who separated about 1592, and were established in France under Henry IV and Louis XIV, and spread thence into Belgium, their houses in these countries and Germany becoming so numerous that they reckoned no less than ten provinces. In the Province of Lyons, the Reformed Franciscans were used to administer the sacrament. A reform of the Cistercian order of monks in Spain was also called by the same name (Chambres). See Histoire du Clergy Seculier et Regular, ii. 367 sqq.; Weitzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lex. ix. 71.

Reconciliatio Penitentium is the act by which offenders of the Church are restored to ecclesiastical rights and privileges. See Penitents.

Reconciliation (usually some form of ἀφίκειν, to cover sin, καταλαλλάγη is making those friends again who were at variance, or restoring to favor those having fallen under displeasure. Thus the Scriptures describe the disobedient world as having been at enmity with God, but “reconciled” to him by the death of his Son (Rom. v. 11). Reconciliation and “making peace” necessarily suppose a previous state of hostility between God and man, which is reciprocal. This is sometimes called enmity, a term, as it respects God, rather unfortunate, since enmity is almost fixed in our language to signify a malignant and revengeful feeling. Of this the copiousness of the doctrine of the state in which we stood before we came to reconcile ourselves to God and to the control of his law. But this is far from expressing the whole of that relation of man in which, in Scripture, he is said to be at enmity with God, and so to need a reconciliation—the making of peace between God and him. That relation is a legal one, as that of the high priest, in his judicial capacity, and a criminal who has violated his laws and risen up against his authority, and who is therefore treated as an enemy. The word ἐνεχθήσαν is used in this passive sense, both in the Greek writers and in the New Test. So, in Rom. xi. 28, the Jews, rejected and punished for refusing the Gospel, are said by the apostle, “as concerning the Gospel, to be enemies for your sakes”—treated and accounted such; but, as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers’ sakes.” In the same epistle (v. 10) the term is used precisely in the same sense, and in the same relation. See the reconciliation by Christ: “For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son,” i.e., when we were objects of the divine judicial displeasure, accounted as enemies, and liable to be capitally treated as such. Enmity is the sense of malignity and the sentiment of hatred, is added to this relation in the case of man, but it is no part of the relation itself, it is rather a case of it, as it is one of the actions of a corrupt nature which render man obnoxious to the displeasure of God and the penalty of his holy law, and place him in a condition of an enemy. It is this judicial variance and opposition between God and man which is referred to in the term reconciliation, and in the phrase “making peace,” in the New Test.; and the hostility is therefore, in its own nature, mutual.

But that there is no truth in the notion that reconciliation means no more than our laying aside our enmity to God may also be shown from several express passages. The first is the passage we have above cited: “For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God” (Rom. v. 10). Here the act of reconciliation is ascribed to God, not to us; but if it were otherwise. For if the apostle is speaking of a benefit obtained for us previous to our conversion appears evident from the opposite members of the two sentences—“much more, being justified, we shall be saved from wrath through him”—“much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life.” The apostle argues from the greater to the less. If God were so benign to us before our conversion, what may we not expect from him now we are converted? To reconcile here cannot mean to convert, for the apostle evidently speaks of something greatly remarkable in the act of Christ. But to convert sinners is nothing remarkable, since none but sinners can be ever converted; whereas it was a rare and singular thing for Christ to die for sinners, and to reconcile sinners to God by his death, when there have been but very few who have died for sinners. In the next place, conversion is referred more properly to his glorious life than to his shameful death; but this reconciliation is attributed to his death as contradistinguishing from his glorious life, as is evident from the antithesis contained in the two verses. Besides, it is from the latter benefit that we learn the nature of the former. The latter, which belongs only to the converted, consists of the peace of God and salvation from wrath (Rom. v. 9, 10). This the apostle afterwards calls receiving the reconciliation. And what is it to receive the reconciliation by faith? (Rom. v. 2). To receive conversion is a mode of speaking entirely unknown. If, then, to receive the reconciliation is to receive the remission of sin, and in effect to be delivered from wrath or punishment, to be reconciled must have a corresponding signification.

“God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them” (2 Cor. v. 19). Here the manner of this reconciliation is expressly said to be not our laying aside our enmity, but the non-imputation of our trespasses to us by God; in other words, the pardoning of sin, without his executing the punishment of sin. The promise on God’s part to do this is expressive of his previous reconciliation to the world by the death of Christ; for our actual reconciliation is distinguished from this by what follows, “and hath committed to us the ministry of reconciliation,” by virtue of which, when men were, by the apostles, treaeted and besought to be reconciled to God. The reason, too, of this reconciliation of God to the world, by virtue of which he promises not to impute sin, is grounded by the apostle, in the last verse of the chapter, not upon the laying aside of enmity by men, but upon reconciliation by Christ: “For he hath made him to be sin” (a sin-offering) “for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.” And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby” (Eph. ii. 16). Here the act of reconciling is attributed to Christ. Man is not spoken of as reconciling himself to God; but Christ is said to reconcile Jews and Gentiles together, and both to God, “by his cross.” Thus, says the apostle, “he is our peace; but in what manner is the peace effected? Not in any instance, by subdued the enmity of man’s heart, but by removing the enmity of the law.” “Having abolished it,” or by, “his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments.” The ceremonial law only is here probably meant; for by its abolition, through its fulfillment in Christ, the enmity between Jews and Gentiles was taken away. But still it was not only necessary to reconcile Jew and Gentile together, but also to "reconcile both unto God. This he did by the same act; abolishing the enmity between them by being himself all its sacrifices and thus, by the sacrifice of himself, effecting the reconciliation of all to God, "slaying the enmity by his cross," taking away whatever hindered the reconciliation of the guilty to God, which, as we have seen, was not enmity and hatred to God in the human mind only, but that judicial hostility and variance which separated God and man as Judge and criminal. The feeble criticism of Socinus on this passage, in which he has been followed by his adherents to this day, is the reflection cast by Goodwin on this passage the difficulty of reconciling the thing it says, to God, only be governed by the very expression τιμοΰσατο, that he might reconcile; for the interpretation of Socinus, which makes to God stand by itself, or that to reconcile to God is to reconcile them among themselves that they might serve God, is distorted and without example. Nor is the argument valid which is drawn from thence, that in this place Paul properly treats of the peace made between Jews and Gentiles; for neither does it follow from this argument that it was beside his purpose to mention the peace made for each with God. For the two parties with whom he joined and so joined among themselves that they should be primarily and chiefly joined by that bond; for they are not united among themselves, except by and for that bond. Gentiles and Jews, therefore, are made friends among themselves by friendship with God.

Here also, a cautionary remark will be appropriate. The above passages will show how falsely it has been asserted that God is nowhere in Scripture said to be reconciled to us, and that they only declare that we are reconciled to God; but the fact is, that the very phrase of our being reconciled imports the putting away of his wrath from us. Whitby observes, on the words καταλαλάγης καταιχηθής, "that they naturally import the reconciliation of one that is angry or displeased with us, both in profane and Jewish writers." When the Philistines suspected that David would appear the anger of Saul by becoming their adversary, they said, "Wherewith should he reconcile himself to his master? Should it not be with the heads of these men?" Not, surely, how shall he remove his own anger against his master? but how shall he remove his master's anger against him? shall he restore himself to his master's favor? "If thou bring thy gift to the altar and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, not that thou hast aught against thy brother, first be reconciled to thy brother," i.e. suppose that in the records was in fact an angry import "See that thy brother be reconciled to thee," since that which goes before is, not that he hath done thee an injury, but thou him. Thus, then, for us to be reconciled to God is to avail ourselves of the means by which the anger of God towards us is to be appeased, which the New Testament expressly declares to be meritoriously "the sin-offering" of him "who knew no sin," and instrumentally, as to each individual personally, "faith in his blood." See PROPITIATIONS.

"We know," says Farrar, "that God cannot literally feel anger, or any other passion; nor can he be literally grieved and pained at anything man can do, since (as the 1st article of our [Anglican] Church expresses it) he is without body, parts, or passions; though in Scripture words and eyes and often bodily matters are figuratively attributed to him, as well anger, repentance, and other passions. But all these are easily understood as spoken in reference to their effects on us, which are the same as if the things themselves were literally what they are called. It is well known to astronomers that the heat of the sun, as well as the heat of the vulcan, speak familiarly of the sun's rising and setting without any mistake or perplexity thence arising, because the effect on this earth—the succession of light and darkness—are exactly the same as if the sun did literally move round it daily. In like manner, when the Scriptures speak of God's wrath, fierce anger, etc., against sinners, it may be that he literally feels angry passions, but that the effect on men will be the same as if he did. And, similarly, when 'reconciliation' with God is spoken of, it is to be understood as meaning that the effects of the death of Christ are such as to cause men to be regarded by God with that favor with which he would regard them if literally returned from a state of enmity to a state of reconciliation."

Recordare Sanctus Crucis is the beginning of a passion-hymn composed by the "Seraphic Doctor," St. Bonaventura (q. v.). This is his best poem, and consists of fifteen stanzas, the last bearing a strong resemblance to the next to the last of the Stabat Mater Dolorosa. There are two English translations of this hymn—one by Dr. H. Harlbaugh in the Mercersburg Review, 1858, p. 481 ("Make the Cross your Meditation"); another by Dr. J. W. Alexander, of which the first stanza runs thus: "Jesus' holy cross and dying; Oh, remember, ever e'ry dwelling Endless pleasure's pathway here; At the cross be thine meditation. Keep, and still in meditation All unsat per seerere."

It has also been translated into German by Simrock, in his Lauda Zion Salvetorem, p. 209; by Rambach, in his Anthology, t. 9, "An dich, Herr Jesus, Kreuz zu denken," which is now generally found in German hymn-books, by Stadelmann, in Bessler's Auswahl allerschönster Hymnen, p. 118, "Woll des heiligen Kreuzes denken:" by Konigfeld, in his collection of Latin Hymns, t. 101, "An des Herrn Kreuzenzeiden." The English of Alexander is given in Shaw's Christ in Song, p. 105. (B. P.)

Recorder (μακσκηρ, a remembrancer; Sept. ἰματοποιον, ἰματοποιοφός), an officer of high rank in the Jewish council, exercising not simply of an annalist, but of chancellor or president of the privy council (I sa. xxxvi, 3, 22). The title itself may, perhaps, have reference to his office as adviser of the king; at all events, the notices that prove that he was more than an annalist, though the superintendence of the records was doubtless intrusted to him. In David's court the recorder appears among the high officers of his household (2 Sam. viii, 16; xx, 24; 1 Chron. xviii, 15). In Solomon's he is coupled with the three secretaries, and is mentioned last, probably as being their president (1 Kings iv, 9). Under Hezekiah, the recorder, in conjunction with the prefect of the palace and the secretary, represented the king (2 Kings xviii, 18, 37). The patronymic of the recorder at this time, Josiah the son of Asaph, makes it probable that he was a Levite. Under Josiah, the recorder, the secretary, and the governor of the city were intrusted with the superintendence of the repairs of the Temple (2 Chron. xxxiv, 8). These notices are sufficient to prove the high position held by him. The same office is mentioned as existing in the Persian court, both ancient and modern, where it is called scribes arbar; and also in the time of the Roman emperors Arcadius and Honorius, under the name of magister memoriae. In Ezra iv, 15, mention is made of "the book of the records," and in Esth. vi, 1; x, 2, of "the book of records of the chronicles," written by officers of this nature. Many of the royal annals of Egypt and Assyria were sculptured on the obelisks, slabs, and monuments, and are still in fine preservation; and already they have contributed to the illustration of the inspired records. See Scrinia.
Records, a frequent name for the books and papers of a Church, which contain a record or account of the history and temporal business of the parish. In these books are written, from time to time, all such transactions as relate to the election of officers, the purchase and sale, etc. of Church property, the erection of buildings, the engaging of ministers, the support of public worship, and other matters connected with the temporal affairs of the Church. Under the name of "parish records," or "Church records," may also be included the register, containing the minister's account of baptisms, marriages, etc. See Register.

Rectitude (or Uprightness) is the choice and pursuit of those things which the mind, after due inquiry and attention, clearly perceives to be fit and good, and the eschewing of those that are evil. "Rectitude of conduct," says Whately, "is intended to express the term κατάδουσας, which Cicero translates recta affectio; κατάδουμα he translates rectum factum. Now the definition of κατάδουμα was νόμου πράστασις, 'a thing commanded by law' (i.e., by the law of nature, the universal law). Antonius, speaking of the reasoning faculty, how, without looking further, it rests contented in its own energies, adds, 'for which reason are all actions of this species called rectitudes (κατάδουσάς κατά ἄποθήκη, right, right doing); as denoting the strictness of their progression right onwards' (II. Harris, Dialogue on Happiness, p. 73, note). "Goodness in actions," says Hooker (Eccles. Pol. bk. i, § 8), "is like unto straightforwardness; whereby which it is done well we term right, for, as the straight way is most acceptable to him that travelleth, because by it he cometh nearest to his journey's end, so, in action, that which doth lie the evenest between us and the end we desire must needs be the fittest for our use." If a term is to be selected to denote that in action and in disposition of which the moral faculty approves, the most precise and appropriate is rectitude, or rightness. "There are other phrases," says Dr. Reid ( Aristotle, Essay v, ch. vii), "which have been used, which I see no reason for adopting, such as, acting contrary to the relations of things—contrary to the reason of things—to the fitness of things—to the truth of things—to absolute fitness. These phrases have not the authority of common use, which, in matters of language, is great. They seem to have been invented by some authors with a view to explain the nature of vice; but I do not think they answer that end. If intended as definitions they are insufficient; for the sense they convey is not expressive of the most favorable sense they can bear, they extend to every kind of foolish and absurd conduct as well as to that which is vicious." But what is rectitude, or rightness, as the characteristic of an action? According to Price and others, rectitude is a simple and primitive idea, and cannot be explained. "It might as well be asked what is truth, as the characteristic of a proposition? It is a capacity of our rational nature to see and acknowledge truth; but we cannot define what truth is. We call it the conformity of our thoughts with the reality of things." It may be doubted how far this explanation makes the nature of truth more intelligible. In like manner some explain rectitude by saying that it consists in a congruity between an action and the relations of the agent. It is the idea we form of an action, when it is in every way conformable to the relations of the agent and the circumstances in which he is placed. On contemplating such an action we approve of it, and feel that if we were placed in such circumstances and in such relations, we should be under an obligation to perform it. Now the circumstances and relations in which man derives his nature from the state of things in general; and hence it has been said that rectitude is founded in the nature and fitness of things, i.e., an action is right when it is fit or suitable to all the relations and circumstances of the agent, and of this fitness a distinction can be made by the judgment. Conscience or prudence, says the judge, do not constitute the relations; these must arise from the nature of man and the nature of things. But conscience or reason judges and determines as to the conformity of actions to these relations; and these relations arising necessarily from the very nature of things, the conformity with them, which constitutes rectitude, is said to be eternal and immutable (Krauth's Fleming, Vocab. of Philos. n. v.).

Rector (Lat. rector, a ruler), the title of several classes of clerical and collegiate officials, some of which are referred to under their respective heads. 1. As regards clerical rectors, the title, in its most ordinary English use, is applied to the clergyman who holds a settled or independent charge in a parish. This use, however, is a departure from the canonical signification of the title, which meant rather a clergyman who was appointed to govern a parish where the chief parochial jurisdiction was vested in a religious corporation or in some non-resident dignitary. The office of vicar is an outgrowth of the rectorate, on the appropriation of benefices to monasteries and other religious houses of old; and the distinction between rector and vicar, which is therefore to be noticed here, is as follows: The rector has the right to all the ecclesiastical dues in a parish, whereas the vicar is generally an appropriator or impropriator over him, who is entitled to part of the profits, and to whom he is, in effect, only perpetual curate, with an appointment of glebe and generally one third of the tithes. See Vicar.

2. In certain of the monastic orders, the name rector is given to the heads of convents, as it is.

3. Also given to the heads of universities, colleges, seminaries, and similar educational corporate institutions.

Reckon. "A rector or parsonage," says Spelman. "is a spiritual living, composed of land, tithe, and other oblations of the people, separate or dedicated to God in any congregation, for the service of his Church there, and for the maintenance of the governor or minister thereof, to whose charge the same is committed."

Recurrent is, in English law, a person, whether Papist or Protestant, who refuses or neglects to attend at the worship of the Established Church on Sundays and other days appointed for the purpose. The offence may be dated back in its origin to 1534, when king Henry became head of the Church; but, as a legal one, may be held to date from the house in the house in the year 1542, when the two or more classes punishable under the statutes against recusancy: simple "recusants;" "recusants convict," who absent himself by reason of his being Roman Catholic; and "popish recusants convict," who absent themselves before conviction; "popish recusants," who absent themselves because of their being Roman Catholic; and "recusants convict," who absent themselves after conviction. It was against the last two classes that the statutes were mainly directed. In addition to the general penalties of recusancy, the popish recusants, for willfully hearing mass, forfeited 100 marks (£66 13s. 4d.); and for saying mass, 200 marks, or £193 6s. 8d., in addition (in both cases) to a year's imprisonment. They were disabled, unless they renounced popery, from inheriting, purchasing, or otherwise acquiring lands; and they could not keep or teach schools under pain of perpetual imprisonment. Popish recusants convict could not keep a house; could not keep arms in their houses; could not appear within ten miles of London under penalty of £100; could not travel above five miles from home without license; could not bring any action at law or equity; could not have baptism, marriage, or burial performed except by an Anglican minister—all under penalties of forfeiture and imprisonment. Protestant dissenting recusants were relieved from the penalties of recusancy by the Toleration Act of 1689. See Memorable (in the Church).
The Red Sea, the usual designation of the large body of water separating Egypt from Arabia. The following account of it is based upon the Scriptures and other ancient and modern authorities. See Sea.

1. Names. The sea known to us as the Red Sea was by the Israelites called the sea (yāḥōn) Exod. xiv. 2, 9, 16, 21, 22; xxv. 1, 4, 6, 10, 19; Josh. xxiv, 6, 7; and many other passages; and specially by the name of Sīḥah (יִשְׁחַה), which was used by the Egyptians (Exod. xix. 12, 13; xxxiv. 19, 22; xxii. 81; Numb. xiv. 25; xxvi. 4; xxxiii. 10, 11; Deut. i. 40; Jer. xii. 4; Josh. ii. 10, iv. 23; xxiv. 6; Judg. xix. 16; 1 Kings ix. 28; Neh. ix. 33; Psa. ciii. 7, 9, 22; cxxxvi. 13, 15; Jer. xlix. 21). It is also perhaps written Saphhah (םַפָּח).

2. The Sept. (Sept. Ζώβηθ) in Numb. xx. 14, rendered "Red Sea" in the A. V.; and in like manner, in Deut. i. 1, Safah (םַפָּה), without "כָּה. The Sept. always renders it יוֹסָפְדוּת שָׁדָאָנָא (except in Judg. xi. 16, where Safah is preserved). See, too, in the New Test. (Acta vii. 36; Heb. xii. 28). The name of this sea is found in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. iv. 9; Wis. x. 18; xix. 7; and Josephus (Ant. viii. 6, 4). By the classical geographers this appellation, like its Latin equivalent Mare Rubrum or M. Erthymas, was extended to all the seas washing the shores of Arabia, as well as the peninsula itself, the Indian Ocean: the Red Sea itself, or Arabian Gulf, was יוֹסָפְדוּת בָּוכָסָה יָבָנָא (which, however, is also read יוֹסָפְדוּת בָּוכָסָה שָׁבָנָא). The Gulf of Suez was specially the hero-political Gulf, Ηηρωοπολική ψαρίαν, Συρία Ηηρωοπολιτική, or S. Heroopolitis. Dr. Beke (Sium in Arabia Lond. [1878.] p. 361 sq.) contends (in keeping with his wild notion that the Mitzram of the Bible was not Egypt, but the peninsula of Arabia) that the Gulf of Akabah, and not that of Suez, was the Yam-Saph of the Hebrews, chiefly on the rash assumption that the former only was known to the Israelites, whereas the itinerary of Moses clearly distinguishes Eziongeber on the one from the crossing at the other (Numb. xxxiii. 8, 10, 55, 26). Among the peoples of the East, the Red Sea has for many centuries and lost its old names: it is now called generally by the Arabs, as it was in mediavial times, Bahr-el-Kulsum, "the Sea of El-Kulsum," after the ancient Cyrena, "the sea-beach," the site of which is near, or at, the modern Suez. In the Koran, part of its old name is preserved, though it is now used in the account of the passage of the Red Sea (see also El-Beydawi, Comment. auf die Koran, vii, 192, p. 341; xx, 81, p. 602). These Biblical names require a more detailed consideration.

3. Fām, F.⁸ (Coptic, σωμός; Arabic, گیسم), signifies "the sea," or any sea. It is also applied to the Nile (exactly as the Arabic bahr is so applied) in Neh. iii. 8, "Art thou better than populous No, that was situated among the rivers (γεφύρ), [that had] the waters round about it, whose rampart [was] the sea (γαλήνη), and her wall was from the sea (γαλήνη)"? See also Isa. xxii. 5, 19.

4. Yāḥōn, יַחְוַן; in the Coptic version, pialmos makās; A. V. "Red Sea." The meaning of sīḥah and the reason of its being applied to this sea, have given rise to much learned controversy. Gesenius renders it rush, reed, sea-seed. It is mentioned in the Old Test. almost always in connection with the sea of the Exodus. It also occurs in the narrative of the exposure of Moses in the same sense (the

5. Sea off. [and] the brooks (yāḥōn) of defence (or of Egypt?) shall be emptied and dried up: the reeds and flags (ṣāhā) shall wither. The passage will read: and the brooks (yāḥōn), by the mouth of the brooks (yāḥōn), and everything sown by the brooks (yāḥōn) shall wither, be driven away, and be no [more]. The fishers also shall mourn, and all they that cast angle into the brooks (yāḥōn) shall lament, and they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish. Moreover, the depth closed round about, the weeds (ṣāhā) were wrapped about my head." With this single exception, which shows that this product was also found in the Mediterranean, sīḥah is Egyptian, either in the Red Sea or in the yāḥōn, and this yāḥōn in Exod. ii. it was in the land of Goshen.

6. The significations of yāḥōn, sīḥah must be gathered from the foregoing passages. In Arabic, the word with this significatio (which commonly is "wool") is found only in one passage in a rare lexicon (the Makomos MS.). The author says, "Sīḥ-el-bahr (the sīḥ of the sea) is like the wool of sheep. And the Araba have a proverb, 'I will come to thee, O Virginia, and I will cease to taste the sīḥ;' i.e. never. The Sīḥ el-bahr seems to quite certain, is a sea-seed resembling wool. Such sea-seed is thrown up abundantly on the shores of the Red Sea. Fryer says, s. v. yāḥōn, "Ab Ethiopiaus herba quaedam suphko appellabatur, que in profundo Maria Rubri crescit, que rubra est, rubrumque colorem continent, pannis tingendis inservientem, teste Hieronymo de qualitate Maria Rubri" (p. 47, etc.). Diodorus (iii. c. 19), Artemidorus (ap. Strabo, p. 770), and Agatharchides (ed. Muller, p. 136, 137) speak of the weed of the Arabian Gulf. Ehrenberg enumerates Fucus littoralis on the shores of this sea, and at Sues *Fucus cirratus, F. trinodis, F. turbinatus, F. papillulosus, F. diaphanus, etc., and the specially red weed Trichodermium erthymas. The Coptic version renders sīḥah by shari (see above), supposed to be the hieroglyphic of shaph (sea). The second have the same sound as the sēri of Pliny (see next paragraph), we must conclude that shari is the sea-seed, or sea-seed, was both marine and fluvial. The passage in Jonah proves it to be a marine product, and that it was found in the Red Sea the numerous passages (in which that sea is called the sea of sīḥah leave no doubt.

7. The "Red Sea," yāḥōn, Sīḥah da‘ōn. The origin of this appellation has been the source of more speculation even than the obscure sīḥah, for it lies more within the range of general scholarship. The theories advanced to account for it have been often puerile and generally unworthy of acceptance. Their authors may be divided into two schools. The first have ascribed it to some natural phenomenon, such as the singularly red appearance of the mountains of the western coast, looking as if they were covered with Brazil nut or brick-dust (Bruce), or of which the redness was reflected in the waters of the sea (Gosselin, ii. 78-84); the red color of the water sometimes caused by the presence of zoophytes (Salt; Ehrenberg); the red coral of the sea; the red sea-weed; and the red storks that have been seen in great numbers, etc. (Beauvoir, L'Espece Rodier, Jules, Miscell. i, 59-117) argues that the epithet red was applied to this and the neighboring seas on account of their tropical heat; as, indeed, was said by Artemidorus (ap. Strabo, xvi. 4, 30), that the sea was called red because of the reflection of the sun. The second have endeavored to find an etymological derivation. Of these the earliest (European) writers propused a derivation from Edom, "red," by the Greeks translated literally. Among them were Fuller (Miscell. Sacr. iv. p. 29); be-

The Red Sea is in most places sand and stones from Suze as far as Jiddah, and thence to the strait it is commonly mud. The deepest sounding in that excellent Admiralty chart is 1054 fathoms, in lat. 22° 30'.

Journeying southwards from Suze, on our left is the peninsula of Sinai; on the right is the desert coast of Egypt, of limestone formation, like the greater part of the Nile valley from Egypt, with others, sea-margin stretching landwards in a great rocky plateau, while more inland a chain of volcanic mountains (beginning about lat. 28° 4' and running south) rear their lofty peaks at intervals above the limestone, generally about fifteen miles distant. Of the most importance is Jebel Ghurib, 6000 feet high; and as the Strait of Jiddah is passed, the peaks of the primitive range attain a height of about 4500 to 6000 feet, until the "Elba" group rises in a huge mass about lat. 22°. Farther inland is the Jebel ed-Dukhkhan, the "porphyry mountain" of Potamian (iv, 5, § 27; M. Claudianus, see Müller, Geogr. Misc. Atlas viii), 6000 feet high, about twenty-seven miles from the coast, where the porphyry quarries formerly supplied Rome, and where are some remains of the time of Trajan (Wilkinson, Modern Egypt and Thebes, ii, 383); and besides these, along this desert southwards are "quarries of various granites, serpentines, breccia verde, slates, and micaeous, talcose, and other schists" (ibid. p. 382). Jebel ez-Zeit, the "mountain of oil," close to the sea, abounds in petroleum (ibid. p. 385). This coast is especially interesting in a Biblical point of view, for here were some of the earliest monasteries of the Eastern Church, and in those secluded and barren mountains lived very early Christian hermits. The convent of St. Anthony (of the Thebais), "Deir Mār Antunyius," and that of St. Paul, "Deir Mār Būlus," are of great renown, and were once important. They are now, like all Eastern monasteries, decayed; but that of St. Anthony gives, from its monks, the patriarch of the Coptic Church, formerly chosen from the Nitrian monasteries (ibid. p. 381). South of the "Elba" chain, the country gradually sinks to a plain, until it rises to the highland of Jiddah, lat. 15°, and thence to the strait extends a chain of low mountains. The greater part of the African coast of the Red Sea is sterile, sandy, and thinly populated; first beyond Suze by Bedouin chiefly of the Mār Tribe; south of the Kusair road are the 'Abbāsī and beyond, the Bishārī, the southern branch of whom are called by Arab writers Bejā, whose customs, language, and ethnology demand a careful investigation, which would undoubtedly be repay by curious results (see El-Makrizi's Khilāt, Deacr. of the Bejā, and Deacr. of the Desert of Eugkab); Quatremère's Ensaies on these subjects, in his Mém. de l'Égypte, ii, 134, 152; and the Generale, end of Man, ed. p. 109); and then, coast-tribes of Abyssinia.

The Gulf of el-`Akbah (i.e. "of the mountain-road") is the termination of the long valley of the Gbbr or 'Arabah that runs northwards to the Dead Sea. It is itself a narrow valley; the sides are lofty and precipitous, and the bottom of it is a river-like sea, running nearly straight for its whole length of about ninety miles. The northerly winds rush down this gorge with uncommon fury, and render its navigation extremely perilous, causing at the same time strong counter-currents; while most of the few anchorages are open to the southerly gales. It has the appearance of a narrow deep ravine, extending nearly a hundred miles in a straight direction, and the circumjacent hills rise in some places two thousand feet perpendicularly from the shore" (Wellsted, ii, 108).

The western shore is less impregnable. This Arabian chain of mountains, the continuation of the southern spur of the Lebanon, skirts the eastern coast, and rise to about 3500 feet; while Jebel Teibet-Alli, near the strait, is 6000 feet. There is no pastureage and little fertility, except near the 'Akabah, where are date-groves and other plantations, etc. In earlier days this last-named place was, it is said, famous for its fertility. The island of Grain, Jezireh Far'ah, once fortified and held by the Crusaders, is near its northern extremity on the Sidonian sea. These, on its dangers and sterile shores, is entirely destitute of buildings.

The Arabian coast outside the Gulf of the 'Akabah is skirted by the range of Arabian mountains, which in some few places approach the sea, but generally leave a belt of coast country, called Tihamah, or the Ghur, like the Lebanon in altitude, sandy and parched plains, thinly inhabited, these characteristics being especially strong in the north (Niebuhr, Descr. p. 305).

The mountains of the Hejaz consist of ridges running parallel towards the interior, and increasing in height as they recede (Wellsted, ii, 242). Burckhardt remarks that the descent on the eastern side of these mountains, like the Lebanon and the whole Syrian range east of the Dead Sea, is much less than that on the western; and that the peaks seen from the east or land side appear mere hills (Arabia, p. 321 sq.). In clear weather they are visible at a distance of forty to seventy miles (Wellsted, ii, 242). The distant ranges have a rugged pointed outline, and are granite; at Wajh, with horizontal veins of quartz; nearer the sea, many of the hills are fossiliferous limestone, while the beach hills are covered with colored sandstone, formed by and containing large quantities of shells and masses of coral (p. 248). Coral also enters largely into the composition of some of the most elevated hills.

The more remarkable mountains are Jebel 'Ein-Umm (or 'Umma') in the north 6090 feet high near the strait; a little farther south, and close to Mo'elia, are mountains rising from 6380 to 7700 feet, of which Wellsted says: "The coast is low, gradually ascending with a moderate elevation to the distance of six or seven miles, where it rises abruptly to hills of great height, those near Mowathah terminating in sharp and singularly shaped peaks. Mr. Irwin [1777] has styled them Bullock's Horns. To me the whole group seemed to bear a great resemblance to representations which I have seen of enormous icebergs" (ii, 176). Reference may also be made to the Gebel Mi'a, a little north of Yembo, a remarkable group, the pyramidal mountains of Agatharchides; and beyond, about twenty-five miles distant, rises Jebel Radwa. Further south Jebel Subah is remarkable for its magnitude and elevation which is greater than any other in the Yemen or Jiddah; and still farther, but about eighty miles distant from the coast, Jebel Ras el-Kurn rises behind the holy city Meckheh. It is of this mountain that Burckhardt writes so enthusiastically (how rarely is he enthusiastic!), contrasting its verdure and cool breezes with the arid heat of the desert, p. 60 etc.

The chain continues the whole length of the sea, terminating in the highlands of the Yemen. The Arabian mountains are generally fertile, agreeably different from the parched plains below and their own bare granite peaks above. The highlands and mountain summits of the Yemen, "Arabia the Happy," the Jebel as distinguished from the desert, are described by Niebuhr, Descr. p. 161, with many towns and villages in their valleys and on their sides. The coast-line itself, or Tihamah, "north of Yembo," is of moderate elevation, varying from fifty to one hundred feet, with no beach. To the southward [to Jiddah] it is more sandy and less elevated; the inlets and harbors of the former tract may be styled coves, in the latter they are lagoons" (Wellsted, ii, 244).

The coral of the Red Sea is remarkably abundant, and beautifully colored and variegated. It is often red, but the more common kind is white; and of hewn blocks of this many of the Arabian towns are built.

The earliest navigation of the Red Sea (passing by the prehistoric Phenicians) is mentioned by Herodotus. "Soscessitis (Rameses II) was the first who, passing the Arabian Gulf in a fleet of long vessels, ascended under his authority the inhabitants of the coast bordering the Erythrean Sea. Proceeding still farther, he came to a sea which, from the great number of its shoals, was not navigable; and after another war against Ethiopia he set up a stela of victory a hundred cubits in height, near the strait of the Arabian Gulf. Three centuries later Solomon's navy was built "in Eziongeber, which is beside Eloth, on the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom" (1 Kings ix, 26). In the description of the Gulf of el-'Akabah, it will be seen that this narrow sea is almost without any salt. Shemshen, the 12th of the Mountain Directory of Dira, near the strait of the Arabian Gulf. Three centuries later Solomon's navy was built "in Eziongeber, which is beside Eloth, on the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom" (1 Kings ix, 26). In the description of the Gulf of el-'Akabah, it will be seen that this narrow sea is almost without any salt. Solomon, who is evidently constructed by Phenician workmen of Hiram, for he "sent in the navy his servants, shipmen that had knowledge of the sea, with the servants of Solomon." This was the navy that sailed to Ophir. We may conclude that it was necessary to transport wood as well as men to build and man these ships on the shores of the Gulf of the 'Akabah, which from their natural formation cannot be supposed to have much altered, and which were, besides, part of the Wilderness of the Wandering; and the Edomites were pastoral Arabs, unlike the sea-faring Himyrites. Jehoshaphat also "made ships of Tarshish to go to Ophir for gold; but they went not, because the ships were broken at Eziongeber" (1 Kings xxii, 48).

The scene of this wreck has been supposed to be ed-Dhabah, where is a reef of rocks like a "giant's backbone" (Eziongeber) (Wellsted, ii, 158), and this may have been the situation of the ships of Jehoshaphat were manned by "his servants," who, from their ignorance of the sea, may have caused the wreck. Pharaoh-necho constructed a number of ships in the Arabian Gulf, and the remains of his works existed in the time of Herodotus (p. 159), who also tells us that these ships were manned by Phenician sailors.

The fashion of the ancient ships of the Red Sea, or of the Phenician ships of Solomon, is unknown. From Flinn we learn that the ships were of papyrus and like the boats of the Nile; and this statement was no doubt correct in some measure. But further than this, the information has been very different from those employed in the Indian trade. More precise and curious is El-Makrtzi's description, written in the first half of the 15th century, of the ships that sailed from Edhhab on the Egyptian coast to Jiddah: "Their 'belies' ('bilin'), Quatremères, Mémoires, ii, 154, calls them 'gelves'), which carry the pilgrims on the coast, have not a nail used in them, but their planks are sewed together with fibre which is taken from the coccanut-tree, and they call them with the flowers of the wood of the date-palm; then they 'pay' them with the oil of the trees and the fat of the kish (Squilla carcariata; Forskål, Descr. Asiat. p. viii, No. 19). . . . The sails of these jelebehs are of mats made of the döm palm" (The Kislat, Desert of Edhhab). The crews of the latter, when not exceptionally Phenicians, as were Solomon's and Pharaoh-nehoe's, were without doubt generally Arabians—chiefly Egyptians—the Levantine and Egyptian Arabs whose ships carried all the wealth of the East either to the Red Sea or the Persian Gulf. The people of Omân, the south-east province of Arabia, were among the foremost of these navigators (El-Medill's Golden Meadows, 815, and The Accounts of Two Mohammedan Travellers of the 9th Century). It was customary, probably to avoid the dangers and delays of the narrow seas, for the ships engaged in the Indian trade to transship their cargoes at the Strait of Bab el-Mandeb to Egyptian and other vessels of the Red Sea (Agath. § 108, p. 190; anno. Peripl. passim). The Red Sea, indeed, appears to have sailed about the autumnal equinox, and returned in December or the middle of January (Pliny, H. N. vi, c. xxii, § 26; comp. Peripl. passim). Jerome says that the navigation was extremely tedious. At the present day the voyages are periodical and guided by the seamen; but the old skill of the seamen has nearly departed, and they are extremely timid, rarely venturing far from the coast.

The Red Sea, as it possessed for many centuries the most important sea-trade of the East, contained ports of commerce of vast importance, and the highly valuable spices and other new products of the East, and hence alone appear to be mentioned in the Bible. The Heroopolitic Gulf is of the chief interest—it was near to Goshen; it was the scene of the passage of the Red Sea; it was also the seat of the Egyptian trade in this sea and to the south. Heroopolis is to this day the same as the Heracleopolis of modern Egypt, and the Heracleopolis of the Bible is near the head of the gulf. The site of the town of the ancient city has been greatly altered, and the original town has been almost destroyed by the development of the modern town. The town of Hermopolis Magna was built on the ruins of the ancient town, and was in the Middle Ages, and emigrated with all his family to Egypt, then the most highly cultivated land on earth. The most fertile part of the country, they had grown to a population of some two millions of souls. Divine Providence had specially fostered them. But now, for about sixty years, the Egyptian government, under a new and jealous dynasty, had adopted a severe policy towards them, and they were gradually reduced to a condition of servitude. Nevertheless, Jehovah had not forsaken them. Moses had been in process of training all these later years as an instrument for their deliverance, and the time had at length arrived for their emancipation. We need not here review the mighty acts of divine interference by which the Egyptian court were finally compelled to grant the release of the Hebrews. We will come at once to the scenes of their exit from Egypt. The Red Sea was, in this instance, an object of the ancient Hebrews, and the whole of the Red Sea was, in fact, a great gulf, the eastern part of which is called the Gulf of Suez, and the western part of which is called the Gulf of Aqaba.

The commerce of the Red Sea was, in very ancient times, unquestionably great. The earliest records tell of the ships of the Egyptians, the Phenicians, and the Arabs. Although the ports of the Persian Gulf received a part of the Indian traffic, and the Himyaritic maritime power had a good share of the trade of Arabia, the kingdom of Sheba, the trade with Egypt was, we must believe, the most important of the ancient world. That all this traffic found its way to the head of the Heroopolitic Gulf seems proved by the absence of any important Pharaonic remains farther south on the Egyptian coast. But the shoaling of the head of the gulf rendered the navigation, always dangerous, more difficult; it destroyed the former anchorage, and made it necessary to carry merchandise across the desert to the Nile. This change appears to have been one of the main causes of the decay of the commerce of the Red Sea. And, indeed, we have seen that the long-voyaging ships shifted their cargoes to Red-Sea craft at the strait; and Ptolemy Philadelphus, after founding Arsinoe and endeavoring to reopen the old canal of the Red Sea, abandoned the upper route and with remains of antiquity in its vicinity. The other is probably represented by Tell Ramesis, a quadrangular mound on an arm of the Nile opposite the modern village of Belbeis, located on the Damietta branch of the railway, about seventeen miles south-west of the former place. The canal which conveys the sweet water of the Nile from Cairo to Suez passes through both these villages, parallel with the railway, by way of Ismailia, pursuing very nearly the same line as the ancient one constructed for the same purpose, but choked up and obliterated for many centuries. By this route small craft, during the Roman period and the Middle Ages, used to furnish a communication with the market at Memphis for the citizens of Clyisma, which was situated in the immediate vicinity of Suez, as traces of the name still attest. The Suez Canal, which was opened in 1869 for navigation between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, has made this neighborhood public to thousands of persons travelling across the isthmus to India and China, as large steamers sail directly through it from European ports to these distant lands. Those who wish to see more of Egypt can disembark at Alexandria, take the cars for Cairo, and thence back by way of Ismailia, intercepting their vessel again at Suez. Thus most of the spots rendered memorable by the exodus of the Israelites have been rapidly seen, at least from a distance, by multitudes of passengers on their way to and from the more distant East. The abrupt contact of modern improvements with these ancient scenes is calculated, perhaps, to dissipate some of the romantic haze which the imagination of Bible-readers usually throws around them, but deepens rather than lessens their interest by the familiarity of approach.

After these preliminaries, we are prepared to follow the Hebrews in their exit from the land of their bondage. On the eve of the Passover, corresponding to our Easter, they had rendezvoused, by divine appointment, at Ramesses. Memphis, the capital, was forty miles distant, and hence Moses' final interview with Pharaoh, when the Israelitish leader uttered the ominous words, "Thou hast spoken well, I will see thy face again no more," must have taken place at some nearer point. The sacred meal was eaten in haste, the destroying angel at midnight smote all the first-born, and by the morning light the Israelitish host were on their march. As it is expressly stated that "God led them not by the way of the land of the Philistines, . . . but by the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea" (not the desert between Cairo and Suez, as Palmer thinks [Sinai from the Monuments, p. 144], but the great desert of et-Tih itself), we are sure that they took the direct south-easterly route towards the head of the Gulf of Suez, doubtless corresponding substantially with the modern pilgrim road. This way would lead them out of the fertile valley of Goshen across a rolling gravelly plain between low hills of shifting sand the whole distance. There was no obstruction to their journey, and they would make rapid progress. They had but little household stuff, for Orientals, especially those of nomadic habit, such as the Israelites inherited from their tent-dwelling forefathers, are not apt to encumber themselves much with furniture. Rain-water would be abundant in the pits and rocks along their path at that time of the year, and they carried with them provisions enough to last several days. Their first day was a long one, and they, no doubt, were anxious to fall as soon as possible into the main Haj road. Their first camp is called Succoth, or "booths" (Exod. xii. 37; xiii. 20; Num. xxxiii, 56), probably a rough khan, like those established in all ages along this thoroughfare. The present Derb el-Bān, a northern branch of the great pilgrim route, leads direct from Belbeis, south-west down the valley by way of Rubeihy and Aweitet, and falls into the main Haj road at the castle of Ajrud, sixty miles from Belbeis. Ajrud has been thought by many to correspond to the next station of the Israelites, "Etham, in the edge of the wilderness" (Exod. xiii. 20; Num. xxxiii, 6). It is a long-established Egyptian outpost.
on the frontier of the desert. The whole air of the sacred narrative gives us the impression that this was a great personal privilege, for it formed the first or immediate point of destination for the Hebrews on their journey. If this be Ethem, it will be necessary to allow thirty miles for each day's journey, which, under the prevailing circumstances, is not extravagant, although an order of twenty miles in caravans is only a very short forty. See ETHAM.

At Etham the Israelites received this divine command: "Turn and encamp before Pihahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon: before it shall ye encamp by the sea" (Exod. xiv, 2). This description has been accurately examined, the text and context are not meant to carry us through the actual crossing-place of the Red Sea by the Israelites. It is substantially repeated in ver. 9, wherein the Egyptians are said to have overtaken the Hebrews "encamping by the sea, beside Pihahiroth, before Baal-zephon." Of the names of these localities no trace at present exists; their identification, therefore, must depend upon a comparison of the circumstances of the narrative, with some slight corroborations from the etymology and historical application of the names. Three or four places have been selected from old writings as rivulets for the honor of this remarkable crossing, and their claims have been somewhat hotly contested at times. We propose calmly and carefully to discuss their respective merits, and to be guided by the explicit terms of the Biblical account, irrespective of any purely theological considerations as to whether the miracle involved may thus be enhanced or lessened. We take them up in their geographical order.

1. On the Mediterranean Shore.—M. Brugsch has recently discovered a new crossing-place for the Israelites on their passage out of Egypt, which, on account both of the fame of the author and his confident announcement, has attracted no little attention (L'Étoile et les Monuments Égyptiens: Discours prononcé à l'occasion du Congrès International d'Oristiatistes à Londres, par Henri Brugsch-Bey, délégué de son Altesse Imael Premier, le Khédive d'Égypte; accompagné d'une carte [Leipsic, J.C. Hinrichs, 1872, 8vo], p. 36). He conceives that they did not cross the Red Sea at all, but a noted morass—the Sibnonian Bog of antiquity, the modern Sebounie, a shallow lake along the Mediterranean coast, on the confines of Egypt towards Palestine. He thinks he has found all the names of the Biblical account in the Egyptian papyri, and that he has succeeded in identifying them with modern localities. Thus On he sets down as equivalent to Anu, a city, according to the text of Holm; Hiercon, a town, and, according to the Crock, a mountain; Pihahiroth or Hahiroth, is, of course, Tell-Bast. Goshen he traces, through the hieroglyphical Phacousa, to the modern Käs or Focas; and in the Sethotic name on the north of this he finds mention of Pitian and Sukkorth, with Pi-rames, or Ramses, in the same neighborhood. Etham he conjectures to be Khatam, noticed as another of those ancient stations in this latter region of Tanis-Rameses; the remaining one adjoining being Migdol, which, of course, must be the Magdolium of classical writers, and the present Tell el-Kebir. Baal-zephon, Baal-Casuia, and Pihahiroth is the entrance upon the narrow sand-beach separating the Mediterranean from the Sibnonian Lake just east of Pelusium. Many of these identifications, which M. Brugsch gives with great brevity, and without the detailed authority, the reader might reasonably object, both on the ground of strained etymological resemblance and inadequate historical data for position. But we prefer to call attention to a few palpable discrepancies with the scriptural narrative, which seem to put this locality utterly out of the question. The inhabitants of the author's country accord. To be sure, the Hebrews, on this theory, simply threaded their way along a narrow beach till they came to a bar which allowed them an easy crossing-place over the marsh, and M. Brugsch candidly admits (p. 82), "The miracle, it is true, then ceases to be a miracle; but let us acknowledge, with all sincerity, that Divine Providence sustains its place and authority." What childlike faith!

In the first place, it certainly was the Red Sea that the Israelites crossed on this occasion. True, the history in Exodus does not explicitly name the body of water, but the immediate context and other passages of Scripture most definitely (Exod. xv, 22; Deut. xi, 4; Josh. iv, 23; xxix, 6; Ps. cvi, 9; cxxxvi, 13, 15, etc.). Josephus distinctly understands it so (Ant. ii, 15, 1), and the New-Test. writers are equally clear (Acts xii, 36; Heb. xi, 29). Even M. Brugsch himself, in his map to call the Sibnonian Sea Fûm Shîf, the Hebrew name exclusively applied to the Arabian Gulf, thus committing a twofold blunder.

In the next place, the route which this theory selects for the Israelites on setting out is one which they avoided. "And it came to pass, when Pharaoh had let the people go, that God led them not through the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near... but God led the people about through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea" (Exod. xiii, 17, 18). Moreover, an unbroken course of actual and supposed ruin turn, or rather retrogression, on their way in order to reach the sea (Exod. xiv, 2).

Finally, this view is wholly unsupported by any local tradition, and requires a displacement of the well-worn positions of Marah, Elim, etc. The latter are supposed to be near, not far from Suez, but Brugsch locates at "the place which the Egyptian monuments designate by the name of Alaim or Tentilim; that is to say, 'the city of fishers,' situated near the Gulf of Suez, in a northerly direction." Moses, however, speaks of no "city there, much less so large a one as Heropolis, which M. Brugsch sets down there on his map; but only of some wells and palms.

This view of the Red-Sea crossing M. Brugsch reiterates in his latest work (Gesch. Ägyptens, Leipzig, 1867), but "he has not won a single Egyptologist of note to a theory which demands so many conjectures in geography and such fanciful analogies in philology" (Dr. J. P. Thompson, in the Bibliotheca Sacra, July, 1877, p. 544).

2. At the Salt Lakes.—These are a series of shallow ponds of brackish water, some of them of very considerable extent, stretching as intervals from the head of the Gulf of Suez to the Mediterranean. They are supposed to have formerly constituted a continuous water connection between these two great seas, which has since been broken by a change of level, leaving these isolated basins partly salt from the remnant of sea-water. Notwithstanding the physical theory has been adduced, the most palpable of which is the fact that sea-shells, of the same character with those now thrown up by the Red Sea, may be seen along the shore of these lakes (see Dr. Harman, Egypt and the Holy Land, p. 161). This would seem to indicate a continuity of these bodies of water in earlier times. (See further in Laborde, Commentaire Géographique sur l'Étoile [Paris, 1841, fol.], p. 79 a.)

The great bed of the Salt Lakes extends in a north-easterly direction, and becomes, Mount Sinai separating from the Red Sea by a sand-bank 4000 to 5000 meters long, which is seldom more than one meter higher than the sea. It is forty to fifty lower than the water-level of the sea basin, and from plain indications was once covered with the sea (Du Bois-Aimeé, in the Deser. de l'Egypte, Mod. i, 188 sq., 1st ed.). Before it ascended the slopes of the Nile by means of the well-known canal and thus received fresh water, its waters were bitter (Strabo, xvii, 804). It is a favorite theory that it was originally embraced in the Heropotamian Gulf (Sickel, in the Stud. u. Kritik, 1872, p. 23). According to this scheme that the ancient Heropolis was situated in the inner corner of the Arabian Sea (Strabo, xvi, 767; xvi, 866; Pliny, vi, 33), and that vessels sailed thence (Strabo, xvi, 768); but more probably this city was located far north of Cypsa, the modern Kolsum, near the present Suez (Proleny, iv, 5, 14, and 54; Itinerar Aust. p. 107, ed. Weiss), namely, somewhere about the modern Abu-Kheisah, or Mufkar (Knobel, Commentar zu Exodus, p. 140 sq.). Its ruins are still visible there (Champlin, Egypt, ii, 88). Its importance gave name to the entire district of Israel and rendered it a strategic spot. Both were likewise more properly designated from Arsinoe, which was situated near the present head of the bay (see Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Geography, s. v. "Arsinoe"). This latter seems to have been the official designation of the place which was popularly termed Cypsa (beautifica, thy elkhayia [Keldan, Palatini, p. 472, 556]).

A rise of the intermediate land has been inferred from the stoppage of the ancient canal along this line; but this can readily be accounted for by the drifting-in of sand and the neglect of the banks. On the other hand, no material change of level has taken place in this region in modern times seems to be proved by the fact that the fresh-water canal now actually conveys water from the Nile to Suez, just as it formerly did, for its present route is not a cutting for that purpose.

The brackishness of these lakes merely argues a con nection at some period with the Mediterranean, and not necessarily with the Red Sea likewise, and the shell and other marine indications are probably traces of this connection only. In fact, the immense lagoon of Lake Micropolis 13°42'15" 25°20'18" (ibid. 461) is a principal or deepest of the Bitter Lakes, and there is nothing but flats and marshes in this direction; whereas southwesterly the Suez Canal required extensive excavations for its continuance to the Gulf of Suez, cutting in some places, not through sand and salt debris merely, but through firm strata of clay and crystalline alabaster. This theory rests upon so problematical a foundation that it has not been much resorted to in this discussion except for the purpose of strengthening the location of the Israeliite crossing at Suez, by way of showing that the water at the latter point was deeper anticiantly than now, and so preserving the greater appearance of a miracle in the case. It is thus incidentally alluded to by Calmet and Robinson, and by several later writers. But for this purpose, if it proves anything, it proves too much; for if at the time of the Exodus the Red Sea extended thus far north, there is no occasion to seek for any other place of crossing, so far as a sufficiency of water is concerned.

Aside from these geological and theological speculations, there is in favor of this crossing-place only the shorter distance from Belbeis, rendering it an easy three days' journey of only fifteen miles per day to any port that might be selected in the vicinity of Ismaïlia. The attempt of Furst (Hebrew Lexicon, p. 786) to identify Baal-Zephon with Heroopolis is mere conjecture; and his remark that Migdol is the Magdol of Herodotus (ii, 159) is founded on a mistake (repeated in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Geography, ii, 246), for Megiddo in Palestine is doubtless there intended. (See Rawlinson, Herod. ii, 267.) The Magdolus of Egypt was probably due to the readiness of the translators (see Autolycus, comment, on p. 14), entirely too remote for the precise indication of locality in the Mosaic narrative.

Against the location of the miracle at the Bitter Lakes are the following facts in the Biblical text: (1) In order to go round the head of the sea (if thus far north) the Israelites would be obliged to start, not by the "way of the wilderness," as the text states, but precisely by that direct "way of the land of the Philistines" which the text expressly says they did not take (Exod. xiii, 17, 18). (2) There would be no change of their course required possible in order to get to this point as the word "turn" (xiv, 2) demands; they were already going on the direct and only route they could well have taken. Indeed, if the region of Lake Timshah were then so low as to be filled from the Red Sea, it is difficult to see how the water from the Mediterranean on the other side could have been kept out, and then there would be a continuous lake from sea to sea, and a miracle would have been necessary, at all hazards, in order to effect the passage anywhere. The Hebrews had no occasion to "turn" at all, for that matter. (3) In that case Pharaoh's observation (ver. 5, 4), "The children of Israel have left us," implies that they had already shut them in," would have been very inapt; at least, its force is not at all clear; for, go which way they might, the material obstacle would be the same, viz. the water merely. (4) There is no local or historical tradition confirmatory of this spot; in short, circumstances on this theory are all so uncertain (and ill-defined that we may safely dismiss it as altogether hypothetical. If we are to determine anything definite concerning the place of the transaction, it must be based upon the known relations of the localities as they now exist.

Rahlfs thinks (Comment. on Exod. ad loc.) that the Israelites turned northwards; but in that case likewise, as Shaw long since observed (Travels, p. 311), they could not in any proper sense have become "entangled in the land" nor "shut in by the wilderness," for they would have been free before they could escape; in fact, they would have been only pursuing a more direct route to Canaan.

3. At Suez.—This location of the event in question has a far greater array of names in its support, among the most notable of whom is Dr. E. Robinson (in the Biblical Repository, 1832, p. 253 sq.) and Dr. Res, ii, 80), who followed in the wake of Niebuhr (Travels in Arabia, translated by Heron [Edinb. 1782], i, 198, 451), and whose views have been substantially reproduced by the latest writers. Important authorities on the same side are Laboree (Commentaire Géographique, p. 77), who cites, as having adopted it with some modification, the earlier writers, Le Clerc, G. Baer, Du Bois Aimée, Salvator, etc., to whom we add the author of Murray's Hand-book for Egypt (ed. 1875), p. 279; Keil, Commentaries on the Holy Bible (Keil and Delitzsch's translation, Edinb., 1866, 3 vols. 8vo), ii, 46 sq. The obvious purport of the arguments adduced in favor of this as the place of the Israelites' passage is, notwithstanding the disclaimer of most of its advocates, to reduce the miracle to its minimum terms, and to find a spot where it is practicable by merely natural forces. This has created a prejudice against it in the minds of most readers, and induced a controversy not always temperate or logical. Let us look at the arguments on both sides from scriptural sources purely.

In favor of this view we may say that—(1) The distance from Belbeis (assuming that to correspond substantially with the site of Rameses) sufficiently agrees with the requirements of a three days' march, being about fifty miles in a straight line. (2) The general direction is about the required one for the Israelites at the outset. (3) The adjoining localities are thought to correspond with those of the Scripture account; thus it is generally agreed that Migdol (the tower) answers to some fortress on Jebel Atakah. (4) There are shoals reaching nearly or quite across the channel at this point, so that an east wind might readily stop it; and it is, moreover, so narrow that the Israelites could easily cross in the few hours presumed to have been occupied in the passage.

Other features of this locality do not well tally with the requirements of the case, and some might absolutely to contradict the Biblical statements. Even the above coincidences—especially the last—when more closely examined, do not prove satisfactory. (1) The direction to "turn" from the regular course hitherto pursued by the fugitives does not admit of an adequate explanation on this view. The word is an emphatic one, not the ordinary יְדֵה, or יְדֵע, to turn aside or weary, but יְדֵע, to return, turn back, viz. actually retrograde. (Ewald, who treats the record in his usually arbitrary and irrelevant manner, is yet too a scholar not to feel the force of this expression, which he construes by saying that Moses "led the host half-way back" [Hist. of Israel (translated by Martineau, London, 1869, 5 vols. 8vo), ii, 691]. At least a marked digression or detour is required to meet the significance of this term. But Suez is directly on the beaten track of all ages, and precisely in the line which the Israelites had already been pursuing. It is true the immemorial Haj route does not actually come down to the village of Suez itself, as, of course, it does not cross the head of the gulf
there; it passes a mile or two above, so as to avoid the water. But this small divergence would be quite inconsiderable in the direction of a whole day's march; for the order to "turn," be it observed, was given at Etham before setting out the third day, not near its close, or in the vicinity of the sea, where the difference in direction might have been more perceptible. This last consideration is, therefore, altogether too insignificant to justi-fy the Hebrew term. (2) None of the places given in the Biblical account as fixing the spot determine it at Suez. Even Jebel Atakah, if Migdol, is too far away to be naturally selected for such a minute specification of the immediate scene. Any point from Ras Atakah to the south end of the Bitter Lakes would be "east" (of or "before") that mountain in this general sense.
As for Pi-hahiroth (whether Hebrew for mouth of the vines, or, as is more likely, Coptic for the sedge-plot), it finds no special adaptation to any place in that neighborhood. The attempt to identify it with Ajrud fails utterly, for the Hebrew and Arabic have no radical letter in common. Equally unsatisfactory is every effort to discover Beal-zephon in any prominent landmark north of Jebel Atakah. (Some writers refer Migdol to Makkala, but this seems to be an error for the pass Muntzalah, and therefore fails of verbal corresdondence.) There is in that direction nothing but a flat, monotonous tract of sand, with no striking name or object to fix upon. (8) At Suez the Israelites, so far from being hemmed in by barriers on either side and an impassable sea in front, as the Biblical situation evidently was, had nothing to do if they wished to escape
but to act just as every caravan at Suez now does, simply keep on across the open plain around the head of the bay—an easy, free, and direct passage of some three or four miles at farthest. At Suez it was impossible for them to be either "entangled in the handkerchief or shut in by the wilderness." The way was clear, so far as natural obstacles or intricacy

be water enough left in the bay itself to prevent an enemy from surrounding the passing host on that side, but on the north there would be no such protection. Thus, even on the supposition that the term "wall" is used in ver. 22 in the sense of defence, the explanation clearly fails to meet the language of the text: "The waters were a wall unto them on the right hand and on the left." We desire to insist on this fact, and to us it appears decisive of the whole issue. But the phraseology seems to us to be stronger even than this interpretation. The term "wall" (יָדִּים) is rarely, if ever, used in this metaphorical sense of protection, but invariably (1 Sam. xxx, 16 is, we believe, the only doubtful instance) signifies some physical barrier, whether of stone or other material, placed more or less vertically for the purpose of protection. Its meaning is by no means fulfilled in the supposition of a vague water-line, shelving away at a distance on one side. Surely nothing but a desire to minimize the preternatural element in the discussion could lead to the adoption of so inadequate an interpretation; for the language, it must be remembered, occurs not in a poetical or figurative connection, but in a plain, prosaic history. The poetical version of the transaction (Exod. xv, 8) uses much stronger language: "The floods stood upright as a heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea." But the phraseology here, although figurative, no doubt correctly represents the facts as seen by an eye-witness. Ps. lxxviii, 13. "He made the waters to stand as a heap," shows the same traditional interpretation, and 1 Cor. x. 2 confirms it, "Baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea"—that is, wet with the spray.

For these reasons, even if we could find no better crossing-place for the Israelites, we should be disposed to reject the one at Suez as not fairly meeting the scriptural requirements in the case.

4. At Ras Atâkah. This place has been preferred as that of the crossing by the great majority of writers and travellers, including Pococke, Joly, Monconys, Shaw, Ovington, Sicard, Bruce, Arundale, Rainbow, Kitto, Olin, Wilson, Durbin, Bartlett, Porter, Bonar, Murphy, etc. It seems to us to meet the demands of the Biblical account more perfectly than any other. This cape is situated about six miles, in a direct line, south of Suez, opposite the southern end of Jebel Atâkah. It is a tongue running out more than a mile into the water beyond the average shore-line, and continued nearly a mile farther by a shoal, over which the water at ordinary low tide is not more than fourteen feet deep. Beyond this again stretches, for nearly a mile and a half in the same direction, a lower shoal, covered nowhere by more than twenty-nine feet of water at low tide. Opposite this point there reaches out, for about two miles from the eastern shore, a similar shoal, only thirty feet under water at its deepest place. The entire width of the sea at this point is about five miles, while the space where it is not over fifteen feet deep is but three and a half miles, and the channel itself not over fifty feet deep, is less than three quarters of a mile wide. The sea immediately above and below this spot, in the channel, is about seventy feet deep. Here, then, is a place where a strong and continued east wind, of the preternatural character implied in the sacred narrative, might open a passage suitable for the occasion, and leave a mass of water fitly comparable to a "wall on either hand." Moreover, the Israelites would, in that case, emerge on the shore near Ayūn Mīṣa (Wells of Moses), the very name of which, in addition to other local traditions, represents the scene of the event.

A close examination of the text itself confirms this view of the transaction. It says (Exod. xiv, 21), “Jehovah caused the sea to go (נָתָן, made it walk) by a strong east wind all night, ... and the waters were divided (ֶ֖נֶַּלָּֽוּ, were split).” Similar is the language in ver. 16: “Divide it (the sea), and the children of Israel shall go ... through the midst of the sea.” The statement that the wind blew “all night” gives no just countenance to the inference that the Israelites did not begin the passage till near morning, and therefore could have gone but a very short distance in all, or, at least, when the wind lulled and the miracle ceased. For aught that appears, they may have already walked many miles, or even have continued their march some time the next forenoon if necessary in order to cross. True, the text says (ver. 27), “The sea returned at the turning of the morning (נָחַד, at daybreak; comp. Judg. xix, 25, 26) to its usual bed (נָתַ֫לְתָּן, to its perennial flow),” but it does not necessarily follow from this that the Israelitish host had at that time all reached the opposite shore. Indeed, rather the contrary is intimated by the statement, given subsequently to this, that “the children of Israel walked upon dry land in the midst of the sea” (Exod. xiv, 29), as if they continued their march some time after the overthrow of the Egyptians in their rear. Nor is it certain from ver. 20 that both camps remained quiet all the night, although such might be the inference at first sight. The true state of the case appears to have been about this: the Egyptians overtook the Israelites about midnight, just as they were about to encamp (נָתַ֫לְתָּן, in the act of pitching their tents, or preparing to do so) near the shore of the sea (ver. 9), and marched down directly upon them (ver. 10). In their dismay at the prospect of instant destruction, Moses ordered them to press forward immediately (ver. 13, וּלְכַ֫לְלָן, and they shall pull up stakes, that is, break up their preparations for camp). While they were doing this the wind sprang up, which did not lull till daylight. As they were marching to the beach the guardian pillar took its position in their rear (ver. 19), and so followed them all night as a light to their steps (ver. 20). When they had reached the middle of the sea (ver. 21), and the Egyptians were not far behind them (ver. 22), the morning began to dawn (ver. 24), and to prevent the enemy from overtaking the fugitives the march of the Egyptians was miraculously retarded, so that they, in their panic, were about to retreat (ver. 25). This they would hardly have thought of doing had they been nearly across, or had it been but a little way to the opposite shore: indeed, every reference to their destruction shows that they were yet in the middle of the sea. So, too, was Moses apparently at this juncture, when, at his extended rod, the water behind the host—who had gained somewhat by the delay of the enemy—began to fall, and the Egyptians actually turned to flee, but were overtaken in the heart of the sea (ver. 27), while the Israelites continued their march through the channel, still open in front of them (ver. 29), till they reached the shore, which the following waves soon strewed with the corpses of the foe (ver. 30). From this recital of incidents in the exact order of the text, it appears that the march really lasted some part of the night, and we consequently require a considerable width of water for its occurrence.

Ras 'Atākah, too, seems to correspond to the geographical features of the case. The point where the Israelites struck the western coast-line of the Red Sea is (as we have seen above) explicitly defined in three passages of the sacred itinerary, which we translate literally: “Speak to the sons of Israel, and they shall return (נהַלְתָּן) and encamp before (נָתַ֫לְתָּן) Pi-ha-Charith, between Migdol and the sea; before (נָתַ֫לְתָּן) Baal-Tsephôn, opposite it (םַעַלְתָּן) shall ye encamp upon (נָתַ֫לְתָּן) the sea” (Exod. xiv, 9). “... and they [the Egyptians] overtook (נָתַ֫לְתָּן) them [the Israelites] encamping upon the sea; upon (נָתַ֫לְתָּן) Pi-ha-Charith, which is before Baal-Tsephôn (ver. 9). “... and they [the Israelites] removed from Etham, and he [Israel] returned (נהַלְתָּן) upon (נָתַ֫לְתָּן) Pi-ha-Charith, which is before Baal-Tsephôn; and they encamped before Migdol” (Numb. xxxiii, 7). The meaning of Pi-ha-birihot, if it be Hebrew, can only be mouth of the gorge (root תעִ֫בַּה, to bore); or, if Egyptian (as Genienius and Frurst prefer), it is doubtless sedgy spot (Coptic, πι-ακ-ερόσ, "the place of meadows," according to Jablonski). In either etymology it would most probably designate a grassy shore, as at the opening of a valley with a brook into the sea. Such a spot is found in the reedy plain (sometimes called Badesh) at the mouth of a wide valley just south of Jebel 'Atākah. The writer's Egyptian dragoon, who was thoroughly familiar with these localities, called it Wady Ghubbeh ("cane-valley"); Robinson calls it Wady Tawrāt, others Wady Mīṣa, and still other names are assigned to it. Baal-zephôn is doubtless a Hebrew rendering of the name of a place "sacred to Typhon," the Greek form of the Egyptian malignant deity, of whose haunt in this vicinity there are traces in ancient writers (see the Hebrew lexicographers). In that case it was probably a mountain, or at least an eminence, in accordance with the heathen preference for hills as sites of shrines. Migdōl is the common Hebrew word for a tower, and was, therefore, most likely also a commanding position. It occurs, however, as the name of a town in this quarter of Egypt (Jer. xliv, 1; xlv, 14), and may be nothing more than a Hebraized form of the Coptic megidōr, "many hills" (see the authorities in Genienius). In Ezek. xxix, 10; xxx, 6, it recurs in the phrase רַמְלָּן בְּהֵמָּה, which may most naturally be rendered from Magdol of Sevenes: in the English Bible, "from the tower of Syene," after the Vulg. a turre Syene; but the rendering of the Sept., אָוֶּת מַגְּדוֹל יֵרְאֶה [once xai] סְבָרִים, suggests that the latter name should be pointed הָרָעָר, to סְבָרִים, thus marking out the natural limits of Egypt from Magdol on the north to Assuan on the south, precisely as today; and this conclusion is generally adopted by modern scholars. First, in his Hebrew Lexicon, gives a curious interpretation of this whole geographical question: "From Magdol a road led to Hæst-sphenon, the later He rolipolis on the Red Sea, and therefore the Red Sea is mentioned with it, Exod. xiv, 2; Num. xxxiii, 7. Most readers, however, will prefer to see in these texts, so carefully worked in almost exact agreement with each other, a precise indication of the very spot where the Israelites crossed; and if the above reason be correct, we ought to find on each side of the crossing-place a conspicuous landmark, probably a mountain. This we exactly have at the valley in question, with Jebel Atākāth ("hill of liberty") on the north, and Jebel Abb Durrānī on the "valley of wandering," which terminates in the wady in question, thus intercepting the Israelites, who could not escape along the narrow, rocky margin of the shore around the point called Rās Atākāth. The writer tried to travel through that rough coast and found it impracticable enough, Small companies, as was the case with Dr. Dürbin, may, indeed, pass slowly along it, but not so great and encumbered a multitude as the Israelites. Besides, it is about a day's march by this route from Rās Atākāth to Suez, and the Egyptians might readily have intercepted the fugitives by sending a detachment around the other side of the mountain.

The particular path by which the Israelites reached Rās Atākāth from Ajrūd has not been agreed upon by the advocates of this point of crossing. Some think they came down Wady et-Tīth from Memphis; but this, as we have seen, is not at all likely. Most others suppose that they came first to Suez, and then along the shore. But if they came that way, why might they not escape by the same? As we have just seen, they could do this; but if they then, as the Israelites presumably did, passed around partly behind and across Jebel Atākāth, this exactly tallies with the command to "turn" back from Etham. From Ajrūd the route would thus be not merely a deflection, but in part an actual retrogression, as the accompanying map shows. A path is laid down on several of the maps of this region between the highest and westernmost summits of Jebel Atākāth, which the fugitives would most naturally take. By this route the distance for the third day's march from Ajrūd to the spring on the shore at the mouth of Wady Ta wārīk would be about thirty-eight miles ("the valley of wandering," in the Av); but the maximum age allowed above for each of the previous day's travels. Thence to the extremity of Rās Atākāth is not quite ten miles, and thence to Ayūn Māsā is scarcely seven miles more. The journey does not seem to us to be an impracticable one under the urgency of the circumstances. It might be materially shortened for each of the succeeding days, especially the last, by locating Etham on the Haj route, somewhat to the west of Ajrūd—a sup position not at all forbidden by any known fact.

Kurtz (History of the Old Covenant [Clarke's transl. Edinb. 1847], 2 vols. small 8vo) observes on the observation on the time that elapsed upon the route from Rameses to the Red Sea, which he argues must have been more than the three days that appear in the narrative (by implication only, however, for there is no express statement to that effect). We condense his statements into the following points: (1) Jewish tradition assigns seven days, and this seems to have been the origin of the Passover week. (2) The term סְבָרִים, "journey," denotes only an encampment, while the successive days of travel are expressed by בָּרָא יָמִים, or "day's journey." (3) In Numb, x, 33, we find stations three days apart, with no locality named between (the same, we may add, is the case in xxxiii, 8, 16). (4) It would have been impossible for the Israelites all to rendezvous at one place and start together, especially as they all kept the Passover in their own homes the preceding night, and were not allowed to leave till morning (Exod. xii, 22). (5) The distance, under any calculation, was too great for a three days' continuous march. (6) The message to Pharaoh of their movements at Etham (xiv, 5) requires at least four days from that point to the Red Sea—two for him to get the information, and two more for his army to be got ready and take over the Israelites. To these arguments we may add the fact that a whole month was consumed (Numb, xxxiii, 5; Exod. xvi, 1) in making the first eight stations (Numb, xxxiii, 10) for an estimated direct march—but ten days of marching. As the remainder of the time could hardly have been all spent in camp—of which, moreover, there is no mention in the account—there arises a suspicion that the most prominent stations only are named, or those where more than one night's halt was made from some noteworthy incident occurred. Of course the fugitives would travel faster, longer, and more continuously, till they were escaped from Egypt, and more leisurely after the event at the Red Sea had relieved them from danger. Be all this as it may, it is in any case clear that they could as easily journey from Ajrūd to the mouth of Wady Ta wārīk in one day as they could from Tell Ramals to Ajrūd in two.

5. Capt. Moreseby (in Aitton's Land of the Messiah, p. 118 sq.) is of the opinion that the Israelites crossed at Rās Tarafneh, south of Mount Abb-Duraj, some sixty miles below Suez, where the sea is twenty miles wide and two hundred and fifty feet deep. This accords with certain traditions of the Arabs of the Desert, who name the warm springs in the rocks opposite after Pharaoh. The induction, however, to this view seems chiefly to be a desire to exaggerate the miracle.

6. The last and most preposterous theory broached is that of Dr. Beke (Sinai in Arabia [Lond. 1873]), who contends that the eastern arm of the Red Sea, i.e. the Gulf of Akabah, and not the Gulf of Suez, is that which formed the end of the Egyptian possessions. The hypothesis is supported by his chimerical idea that Mount Sinai is not the traditional mountain in the peninsula, but Jebel Baghīr, east of 'Akabah. See Sinai.

Among the localities named, the choice really lies between Suez and Rās Atākāth, and of these we decidedly prefer the latter.

Besides the works cited above, and the commentaries on Exodus, the question has been discussed by the following among the more modern writers: Kitto, Pictorial History of the Jews (Lond. 1843, 2 vols. small 4to), i, 187 sq.; Lachbruck, Die ägyptischen Reise (ibid. 1838, 8vo), p. 29 sq.; Raumer, Beiträge zur biblischen Geographie (Leipz. 1843, 8vo), p. 1 sq.; Sharpe, in Bartlett's Forty Days in the Desert (Lond. 2d ed. large 8vo), p. 28 sq.; Wilson, The Lands of the Bible (Edinb. 1847, 2 vols. 8vo), i, 149 sq.; Olin, Travels and Journeys (N. Y. 1843, 2 vols. 12mo), i, 642 sq.; Dürbin, Observations in the East (ibid. 1841, 2 vols. 12mo), i, 120 sq.; Porter, in Murray's Hand-book for Syria (Lond. ed. 1868, 12mo), i, 9 sq.; Palmer, Desert of the Exodus (N. One of the most recent monographs on the subject—that of Unruh, Der Zug der Israeliten aus Agypten nach Canaan (Langenalz, 1889, 8vo)
Redemption, a frequent rendering of the Heb. נט, which strictly means the nearest kinsman. It is thus applied to Christ, as he is the avenger of man upon his spiritual enemy, and delivers man from death and the power of the grave, which the human avenger could not do. The right of the institution of נט was only in a relative—one of the same blood—and hence our Saviour's assumption of our nature is alluded to and implied under this term. There was also the right of buying back the family inheritance when alienated; and this also applies to Christ, our נט, who has bought back the heavenly inheritance into the human family. Under these views Job joyfully exclaims, "I know that my Redeemer (my נט) liveth," etc. See Goel; Jesus Christ; Mediator.

Redemption, in theology, denotes our recovery from sin and death by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, who on this account is called the "Redeemer" (Isa. lix, 20; Job xix, 25). "Being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Rom. iii, 24). "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us" (Gal. iii, 13).

Redemption, according to depend upon the blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (1 Pet. i, 18, 19). "And ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price" (1 Cor. vi, 19, 20).

By redemption those who deny the atonement made by Christ do to understand deliverance merely, regarding only the effect, and studiously putting out of sight the cause from which it flows. But the very terms used in the above-cited passages, "to redeem" and "to be bought with a price," will each be found to refute this notion of a gratuitous deliverance, whether from sin or punishment, or both. "Our English word redemption," says Dr. Gill, "is from the Latin, and signifies buying again; and several words in the Greek language of the New Test. are used in the affair of our redemption which signify the obtaining of something by paying a proper price for it; sometimes the simple verb αγορασκο, to buy, is used; so the redeemed are said to be αγορασκοι, bought back, made free by the blood of Christ. Sometimes the compound verb αγορασκον, to be bought, or to be bought from the earth, and to be bought from among men, and to be bought with a price—that is, with the price of Christ's blood (1 Cor. vi, 20); hence the Church of God is said to be purchased with it (Acts xx, 28.) Sometimes the compound verb αγορασκον, to buy, or to be bought, is used, which signifies to buy again, or out of the hands of another, as the redeemed are bought out of the hands of justice, as in Gal. iii, 13, iv, 5. To redeem literally means 'to buy back;' and σαρκαν, to redeem, and αγορασκον, redemption, are, both in Greek written and in the New Test., used for the act of setting free a captive by paying λατρευω, a ransom or redemption price." Yet, as Grotius has fully shown by reference to the use of the words both in sacred and profane writers, redemption signifies not merely "the liberation of captives," but of man himself; the deliverance of man from the state of sin in which we must be freed; and σαρκαν signifies everything which satisfies another so as to effect this deliverance.

The nature of this redemption or purchased deliverance (for it is not gratuitous liberation, as will present itself) is as follows, and is therefore, as the circumstances of those who are the subjects of it. The subjects in the case before us are sinful men; they are under guilt, under "the curse of the law," the servants of sin, under the power and dominion of the devil, and "taken captive by him at his will," liable to the death of the body and to eternal punishment. To the whole of this case the redemption—the purchased deliverance of man as proclaimed in the Gospel—applies itself. Hence in the above-cited and other passages it is said, "We have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, being delivered from the curse of the law, deliverance from sin, that we should be set free from sin;" deliverance from the power of Satan; from death, by a resurrection; and from future "wrath" by the gift of eternal life. Throughout the whole of this glorious doctrine of our redemption from these tremendous evils there is, however, not in the New Test., a constant reference to the λατρευω, the redemption price, which λατρευω is as constantly declared to be the death of Christ, which he endured in our stead. "The Son of man came to give his life a ransom for many" (Matt. xx, 28). "Who gave himself a ransom for all" (1 Tim. ii, 6). "In whom we have redemption through his blood" (Eph. i, 7). "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ" (1 Pet. i, 18, 19). That deliverance of man from sin, misery, and all other penal evils of his transgression, which constitutes our redemption by Christ, is not, therefore, a gratuitous deliverance, granted without a consideration, as an act of mere prerogative; the ransom—the redemption price—was exacted and paid; one thing was given for another—the precious blood of Christ. But on the contrary, the price of all the same import are those passages which represent us as having been "bought" or purchased by Christ. Peter speaks of those who "denied the Lord, saying, I am not his disciple," which price is expressly said by John to be the blood of Christ: "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God (αγορασκον, hast purchased us) by thy blood" (Rev. v, 9). The ends of redemption are, that the justice of God might be satisfied; his people reconcile and adopt and sanctify, and bring to glory. The properties of it are these: (1) it is agreeable to all the perfections of God; (2) what a creature never could merit, and therefore entirely of free grace; (3) it is special and particular; (4) full and complete; (5) it is eternal as to its blessings. See Edwards, Hist. of redemption.
REDEEMPTORISTS

Redemptorists, Order of, or "The Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer," was established by Alfonso Maria di Liguori (q. v.) in the city of Scala in 1732, and spread first in the kingdom of Naples and in the Papal States. The end of this institute was the association of missionary priests who should minister by special services to the spiritual wants of the abandoned in cities and villages, and in particular parochial duties. After St. Alfonso had founded several houses of his community, pope Benedict XIV solemnly approved of his rule and institute, under the above title, Feb. 25, 1749. The order rapidly found favor in all the churches of Europe, and was officially established through the instrumentality of Clement Maria Hoffbauer. This man, the first German Redemptorist, was born in Moravia Dec. 26, 1751. He became a baker, and exercised his profession for some years in the Premonstrant convent of Bruck. Here he obtained the favor of the abbots, who made him commence his studies. After studying four years very actively, he left the convent in 1776 with a view to turn hermit, and spent two years at the renowned shrine of Mühlfrauen. When the hermitages were abolished, he went to Vienna, where he supported himself by working at his former trade. In company with his friend Peter Emanuel Kunzmann, who eventually joined the Liguorians as a lay-brother, he made several pilgrimages to Rome, and subsequently completed his studies at Vienna. Here he became acquainted with John Thaddaeus Hebel, who was afterwards his most zealous follower and firm friend. The two friends visited Rome, and together entered the convent of the Priests of the Most Holy Redeemer. The rector of the convent designated them some time after to go to Germany to establish the order there, and thus to suppress the Jesuits, whom he expected to be pressed by the revolution of July, 1830. But as there was no prospect of Joseph II allowing their order to be established in Austria, they turned their attention to Poland. Through the mediation of the papal nuncio Saluzzo, they obtained the church of St. Benno at Warsaw and a dwelling-house, and from this their followers subsequently received in Warsaw the name of Bemontites. The priests of the new order, during the first years of their establishment, were in the habit of preaching every Sunday and feast-day in the open air; but as this was subsequently forbidden by the civil authorities, they commenced preaching every Sunday in their church of St. Benno two sermons in Polish, two in German, and one in French. Their activity was rewarded by great success, for in 1796, shortly after they had commenced, the number of their communicants had reached, it is said, 19,000. Natives of Poland, in large numbers, entered the order; and Hoffbauer, during his sojourn in Poland, even opened a seminary for the clergy. In 1799 he went to Mitten, invited to Livonia, and Hoffbauer sent three priests to establish it there. In Warsaw they obtained a second church—that of the Holy Cross. In 1799 the order numbered twenty-five members in that city. As they were at a great distance from Rome, Francis de Paula had, in 1785, given Hoffbauer full power to establish colleges, receive members, give dispensations, etc. In 1797 he was appointed by the pope his vicar-general. In 1801 or 1802 they were invited to Switzerland, and in 1803 some of them were sent there. They settled at first on the estate of the duke of Schwarzenberg at the frontier of Switzerland, and after 1824, in the village of Jestetten, on Mount Taibor. In August 1838, Hoffbauer went towards Poland, and thence to Mount Taibor. While at the latter place he received a request to send a member of his order to the church at Tryberg, in the Black Forest, a place of pilgrimage. Still the two establishments at Mount Taibor and at Cre Tavera were unsuccessful, and were subsequently abandoned. In 1806 Hoffbauer returned to Warsaw; but the very next proceedings were instituted against the society, their papers searched, and finally the community was suppressed by the military authorities. The fathers were imprisoned in the fort of Klustern, where they were retained one month, and then sent back two by two to their native country. Hoffbauer retired to Vienna, where he sought to reunite his order. In 1818 he was appointed confessor and ecclesiastical director of the Ursuline convent of St. Joseph, and the order was restored, but it was not until his death. The church of the convent was soon transformed into a mission church, Hoffbauer's reputation as a confessor became considerable, and he preached, besides, every Sunday in the church of St. Ursula. As he died at Vienna in March 1835, he is chiefly known through the instrumentality of Clement Maria Hoffbauer. The Liguorians now named for the king of Bavaria until driven out of it in March, 1849. In Bavaria the king authorized, March 11, 1841, fifteen to twenty members of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer to establish themselves at Alt-Oetting. On the other hand, the government became satisfied in 1848 that the Redemptorists and their doctrines would prove dangerous to Bavaria. They were therefore replaced by the Benedictines. The authorities gave as their reasons for this change that the fathers were instilling fanatical views among the people by means of the confessional, and that their preaching excited the lower classes to disorder. A part of the members of the society removed to America after its dissolution, others went to Austria, and some became secular priests. In France the Redemptorists established themselves first at Vichy, then at Altenberg, in the Saar, from which they were expelled. After they had finished the necessary studies, they were ordained. They went in 1875 to Vienna; but as there was no prospect of Joseph II allowing their order to be established in Austria, they turned their attention to Poland. Through the mediation of the papal nuncio Saluzzo, they obtained the church of St. Benno at Warsaw and a dwelling-house, from this their followers subsequently received in Warsaw the name of Bemontites. REDENBACHER

Redford, George, D.D., an English Congressional minister, was born in London Sept. 27, 1778, and was educated at Hoxton College and the University of Glasgow. His first settlement as a minister was at Uxbridge, where he remained fourteen years. In 1825 he became pastor of the Congregational church at Worcester. In 1855 he was transferred from his carriage, and suffered a fall. He was then 85 years of age. He retired to Edgebaston, near Birmingham, and his congregation at Worcester allowed him £100 per annum. He died May 20, 1860. He was a man of great industry and talent. Faithful in his pastoral work to a remarkable degree, he gave himself largely to literature. He was for some years editor of the Congregational Magazine, and was a frequent contributor to the Eclectic and to the British Quarterly Review. He published, besides a number of minor writings, the Pastor's Sketch-book (12mo); — Holy Scriptures Verified, the Congregational lecture for 1837 (8vo); — Finis Triumphant (1841, 12mo); — The Great Change, a treatise on conversion (1843, 16mo); — Body and Soul Considered (1847, 8vo); — Life of the Rev. W. J. — Life of the Rev. A. James (1860, 12mo). He was made D.D. by the University of Edinburgh and LL.D. by the University of Glasgow in 1834. — English Congregational Year-Book, 1861.

Redman (Redmayne), John, D.D., an English divine, flourished in the first half of the 16th century. He was a native of Yorkshire, and was probably born in 1499. He was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and at Paris. He became public teacher at the university, master of King's Hall, first master of Trinity College, archdeacon of Taunton, prebend of Wells and of Westminster, and died in 1551. He was one of the most learned men of his age, according to bishop Burnet, and says that he divided himself between both religions; but on his death-bed he certainly professed to embrace the cardinal doctrines of the Reformers. He published nothing; but after his death appeared, Opus de Justificatione (Antw. 1555, 4to); — Hymnus in qua Precator Justificationem venus fecit Imagine describatur; — The Complaint of Below (1556, 8vo); — Resolutions concerning the Sacrament, etc.

Reece, Richard, a preacher of Methodism in England, who travelled without interruption for a longer period than any other Methodist preacher — no less than fifty-nine years —and thus figured at one time as the oldest living Methodist preacher in the world, was born about the year 1765. In 1823 he visited this country with John Hannah as a delegate of the Wesleyans to the Methodist Episcopal Church; and he spent some time here visiting the societies, from Lynn, Mass., to Winchester, Va., and by his and Hannah's profound interest, attracted the general unity of all Methodists. In 1846 he was obliged to take a supernumerary relation, and he died in 1850. “He was a good, if not a great, preacher,” says Stevens, “and a most amiable man. He is still generally remembered, by both English and American Methodists, for his perfect courtesy and his venerable appearance. His person was tall, his complexion ruddy, his head silvered with age, his voice commanding, his language flowing and pertinent, his piety tranquil, and his wisdom in counsel always reliable. He lived to share in the centenary celebration of Methodism, and by proposing that it should be signalized in England by the contribution of a million dollars for its public charities, excited the suspicion that his usual good judgment had suffered from the effect of age; but the people justified his calculation by giving seventy thousand dollars more, and sending a deputation with an election to the presidency of the Conference.” See Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, ii, 315, 316; iii, 256, 308; West, Sketches of Wesleyan Preachers (N.Y. 1848); Wesleyan Magazine, 1850, p. 652. (J. H. W.) count we employ the usual Scriptural and scientific authorities on the subject.

1. Usually κανέχ (κανέχ; Sept. καλάμος, καλανσός, καλάμος, πτηνός, ἄγεως, φυσιγ, τριγμήν; Vulg. culmus, culmus, arundo, flanda, statiera), the generic name of a reed of any kind. It occurs in numerous passages of the Old Test., and sometimes denotes the "stalk" of wheat (Gen. xii. 5, 22), or the "branches" of the candlestick (Exod. xxxv and xxxvii); in Job xxxi, 22, κανέχ denotes the bone of the arm between the elbow and the shoulder (as humerus); it was also the name of a measure of length equal to six cubits (Ezek. xii, 8; xl, 5). The word is variously rendered in the A. V. by "stalk," "branch," "bone," "calamus," "reed."

In the New Test. the corresponding Greek word, καλαμος, may signify the "stalk" of plants (Mark xv, 38; Matt. xxvi, 46, that of the hyssop, but this is doubtful), or "a reed" (Matt. xi, 7; xii, 20; Luke vii, 24; Mark xv, 19), or a "measuring-rod" (Rev. vi, 1; xxi, 15, 16), or a "pen" (3 John 13).

Strand (Flor. Palest. p. 28-30) gives the following names of the reed plants of Palestine: Sacccharum officinale, Cyperus papyrus (Papyrus antiquorum), C. ronduae, and C. cocculus, and Arrundo scapitosa; but no doubt the species are numerous. See Bove (Voyage en Palest., Annal. des Science, Nat. 1834, p. 165): "Dans les déserts qui environnent ces montagnes j'ai trouvé plusieurs Sacccharum, Milium arundinaceum et plusieurs Cyperacea." The Arrundo donax, the A. Egyptiacus (7) of Bove (loc. cit., 22), is common on the banks of the Nile, and may perhaps be "the staff of the bruised reed" to which Sennacherib compared the power of Egypt (2 Kings xvii, 21; Ezek. xxix, 6, 7). See also Is. xlii, 3. The thick stem of this reed may have been used as walking-staves by the ancient Orientals; perhaps the measuring-reed was this plant. At present the dry culms of this huge grass are in much demand for fishing-rods, etc. See METHODOLOGY.

Some kind of fragrant reed is occasionally denoted by the word κανέχ (Is. xlii, 24; Ezek. xxvii, 19; Cant. iv, 14), or more fully by κανέχ βιεως (κανέχ βιεως) (see Exod. xxx, 23), or by κανέχ χατ-λόβ (κανέχ χατ-λόβ) (Jer. vi, 20), which the A. V. renders "sweet cane," and "calamus." Whatever may be the substance denoted, it is certain that it was one of foreign importation, "from a far country" (Jer. vi, 20). Some writers (see Sprengel, Com. in Deccor, i, xvii) have sought to identify the κανέχ βιεως with the Acorus calamus, the "sweet sedge," to which the καλάμος of the Psalmists (Is. i, 17), the καλάμος τοῦ ἔθνος of Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. iv, 8, § 4), which, according to this last-named writer and Pliny (H. N. xii, 22), formerly grew about a lake between Lyamus and another mountain of no note," Strabo identifies this with the Lake of Gennesaret (Geop. xvi, p. 735, ed. Kramer). Burchardt was unable to discover any sweet-scented reed or rush near the lake, though he saw many tall reeds there. "High reeds grow along the shore, but I found none of the aromatic reeds and rushes mentioned by Strabo (Geop. xvi, p. 739), but whatever may be the "fragrant reed" intended, it is certain that it did not grow in Syria, otherwise we cannot suppose it should be spoken of as a valuable product from a far country. Dr. Royle refers the καλάμος ἀρωματικός of Dioscorides to a species of Androropogon, which he calls A. eunomus aromatica, a plant of remarkable fragrance, and a native of Central India, where it is used to mix with ointments on account of the delicacy of its odor (see Royle, Illustrations of Himalayan Botany, p. 415, t. 57). It is possible this may be the "reel of fragrance," but it is hardly likely that Dioscorides, who under the term οἰνημος, gives a description of the Androropogon schaenanthus, should speak of a closely allied species under a totally different name. See CANK.

"The beasts of the reeds," in Ps. lxvii, 30, margin, literally from the Hebrew, but rendered in the text of the A. V. "the company of spearmen," probably means the crocodiles. Yet for other interpretations see Rosenmüller ad loc. Gesenius, on Is. xxxvi, 1, understands ἰσθήλες. See Crocodilus.

2. Αροθ (Ἀροθ; Sept. ῥόθος οῦ Χαλαρα Πατήρ) is translated "paper-reed" in Is. xix, 7, the only passage where the plural noun occurs. There is not the slightest authority for this rendering of the A. V., nor is it at all probable, as Celsius (Hierob. ii, 230) has remarked, that the prophet, who speaks of the paper-reed under the name γίννη in the preceding chapter (xviii, 2), should in this one mention the same plant under a totally different name. "Aroth," says Kimchi, is the name to designate pot-herbs and green plants. The Sept. (as above) translates it by "all the green herbage." The word is derived from άρος, "to be bare," or "destitute of trees;" it probably denotes the open grassy land on the banks of the Nile; and seems to be allied to the Arabic arra (lucus opertus, spatiatus). Michaelis (Suppl. No. 1973), Rosenmüller (Schol. in Jes. xix, 7), Gesenius (Theol. a. v.), Maurer (Comment. a. v.), and Simon (197. Heb. a. v.) are all in favor of this, or a similar explanation. Vitringa (Comment. in Isaitum) was of opinion that the Hebrew term denoted the papyrus, and he has published a dissertation on this subject (De αροθ, hoc est de Papyrus Frutice [Lips. 1731, 4to]). See PAPER-REED.

3. In one passage (Jer. lii, 92) οπαί (Ὁπαί; Sept. εἰς-εραγα) Vulg. palus) is rendered "reed" (but elsewhere "pond" or "pool"), and there is thought to designate a stockade or fort enclosed by palisades.

II. Other Hebrew words representing, more or less accurately, various kinds of reedy plants are the following:

1. אָרֹנָה (Arornh), which is mentioned in opposition to the palm-branch (Isa. ix, 13; xix, 15), and is translated "rush" in the A. V., does not rather mean reed. Both were, and are, used for making ropes (Somnini, Trar. ii, 416; Pliny, xix, 9; comp. Job xl, 26). See Gesenius, Kaland, Knobel, and others; also Celsius, Hierobol, i, 465 sq. See Rush.

2. The Hebrew אָרֶך (Ark), originally an Egyptian word (see Jerome, ad Isa. xix, 7; comp. Jablonski, Opusc. i, 45; ii, 160; Gesen. Theaur. i, 67), occurs in (Hebr. xi, 2; Job viii, 11; in the first place the A. V.
has meadow, in the second rush.
It seems to mean, not i, 340 sq.). On the other hand, suppl. τεράς, Exod. ii, 3, 5, growing on the Nile, but distinct from kaneh, may be the same (Pliny, xiii, 46). See Pla. poëma. NT. Gr. βασιλος, the poppy.Button, pooper-reed (so rendered, according to the old interpreters, by the Sept.; Job loc. cit.; Isa. xxvii, 2; Vulg. Is. xxvii, 2; Syr. Isa. xxvii, xcvv.; Arab. Exod. ii, 3. In the Talmud this word means rush; comp. Mishna, Erubin, x, 14. The leaves were used for binding wounds), does not belong to the genus Arundo, and is not a proper reed (called by Pliny, xxvi, 45, sabin to the reed).
It is the Cyperus pooper of Linnaeus, Class. iii, Monogynia.
This plant, anciently so important, grew abundantly in the Egyptian swamps (even perhaps in those of the Nile, Pliny, xiii, 46; comp. v, 8. Hence Ovid, Metaph.
iv, 753; Tit. iii, x, 27, calls this river pooper-reed:
comp. Mart. x, 139), and is mentioned Isa. xxxvi, i; Job viii, 11; Exod. ii, 8; Isa. xxviii, 2. The A. V. has rush in the first two places, bulrush in the others. It is now rarely met with in Egypt (according to Minutoli, Abhned.
Verm. Isakila, Bartolotti, 1801), vol. ii, No. 7, only at Damietta on the coast of Egypt (Pliny, xxvi, 53, says it does not now grow in Egypt), but in Palestine it is occasionally found at the Jordan (Von Schubert, iii, 259).
It has a three-edged stalk, which below bears hollow, arrow-formed leaves, covering each other; it grows to a height of ten feet or more, and has above a flower cup of reddish leaves, out of which a thick body of hair-like shoots spring up (comp. Theophr. Plunt. iv, 9). The root is as thick as a man's arm, and is used as fuel (Dioscor., i, 115); vessels were framed of the stalks (Exod. ii, 8; Isa. xxviii, 2; Pliny, vi, 24; vii, 57, p. 417; Har. Marsh., 182; Latr. Pharm., 186). Be Cittania, Monument. Cir. ii, 124; Wilkinson, iii, 185 sq.), which sailed very fast (Heliod. Athiop. x, 4). Sails, shoes, ropes, sieves, mattresses, wicks, etc., were made of the green rint (Pliny, xiii, 22; xxvii, 29; xxviii, 47; Herod.
i, 37; Veget. Veterae, ii, 57; Philo, Op. ii, 492; comp.
Wilkinson, iii, 62, 146), but especially paper, on the mode of preparing which comp. Pliny, xiii, 53 sq. (see cides, i, 219 sq.). See phyrna. The plant is now called bera or ber by the Arabs (so Job viii, 11, in the Arabic). See Papyrus.

III. It will thus be seen that the reeds named in the Bible may be popularly distinguished as three,
1. The water-reed in pools, marshes, and on the shores of rivers, as of the Nile (Exod. ii, 3, 5) and of the Jordan (Isa. xlii, 11; Jer. v, 5). The most common species are Arundo phrygiana and Arundo calamos ourica (comp. Oken, Botany, i, 805) See Bulrush.
2. The stronger reed, adapted for staves and canes, and as measuring-sticks (Exek. xi, 8 sq.; Apoc. x, 1, xxi, 15 sq.; 2 Kings xxi, 21; Isa. xxxvi, 6; Ezek.
xxix, 6; Matt. xxvii, 29; Mishna, Skob. xxvi, 3; Dios.
Laert. Proem. 6), the Arundo demus, whose hard, woody stem reaches a height of eight feet, and is thicker than a man's thumb. This, too, is very frequent on the banks of the Nile (Forsk. Flor. p. 24; comp. Descr. de l'Egypt., xix, 74).
3. The writing-reed (Arundo scriptroria) (3 John 13;
see Mishna, Skob. viii, 5). It grows in the marshes between the Euphrates and Tigrit; at Heilah, in the Personi, the reeds are planted, then dried, and when properly cut and split make tolerable pens.
Formerly the writing-reed grew in Egypt, in Asia
Minor, and even in Italy (Pliny, xvi, 64; Martial, xiv, 36; comp. Beckmann, Gesch. der Erfindungen, ii, 48 sq.; see on the Hebrew name, Celsius, Hierobol. i, 812 sq.). See Psev.

Reed, Alexander, a Baptist missionary, was born in Chesterfield, Mass., in 1807. He pursued his studies at the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution (now Madison University), N. Y., and was appointed Aug. 3, 1835, as a missionary by the American Baptist Missionary Union to labor among the Chinese living in Bangkok, Siamese.possessing a knowledge of the language,
he took a floating-house on the Meinann, two miles above Bangkok, and began his evangelical labors among the Chinese. While thus occupied, he was stricken down by disease, and died Aug. 29, 1837.
(J. G. S.)
Reed, Alexander, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Washington, Pa., Sept. 26, 1802. He was the son of the Hon. Robert R. Reed, a child of the convenient dedicated to God in baptism, and early instructed both by precept and example in the ways of religion.
His preparatory education was received in the English department of Washington College, and he graduated at that institution in 1823. He went to Georgia and engaged in teaching, and while there joined the Church on a profession of religion under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Baker, an esteemed evangelist.
In 1835 he entered the Western Theological Seminary at Pittsburgh, Pa., and was graduated in 1856. The following year he was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Octorara, Pa. Here his labors were greatly blessed, and the bonds of affection between him and his people greatly strengthened, until the year 1844, when they were dissolved to enable him to accept the pastoral charge of the church in Philadelphia.
This call removed him to a wider sphere, and brought him to a more responsible position in a great city at one of the most critical periods of our national history. His sympathetic nature, ready and effective oratory, very soon attracted attention, and other duties than those merely of the pastorate were soon laid upon him. He was active and influential in the organization of the "Christian Commission," the spirit and object of which appealed to his sympathies and patriotic impulses, and some of his most stirring and powerful addresses were made in behalf of this great interest. He was not only alive to all the duties connected with his pastorate, but to all the general social and moral interests of the community. He gave to all the boards of the Church his zealous and faithful support, and at one time his personal attention was the object of the Board of Ministerial Relief and also the Board of Publication. In the year 1873 Dr. Reed was called to the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., and in acccepting this call he threw himself with all his accus-tioned ardor into the labors of his new field. Toward the end of two years he was obliged, from declining health, to resign his charge. With the hope of regaining his health, he spent a year and a half in Europe, but he returned without any perceptible change for the better.
Thinking that the dry and bracing air of Colorado might prove beneficial, he accepted the pastorate of the church in Denver City. Though in feeble health, he labored among those people, and greatly endeared himself to them by his affectionate nature and eminent pulpit ability.
But his work was evidently done, and he was called to his reward. The church was in distress, then dried off, and when properly cut and split make tolerable pens.
Formerly the writing-reed grew in Egypt, in Asia
Minor, and even in Italy (Pliny, xvi, 64; Martial, xiv, 36; comp. Beckmann, Gesch. der Erfindungen, ii, 48 sq.; see on the Hebrew name, Celsius, Hierobol. i, 812 sq.).
prayer. He devoted himself wholly to the work of the ministry because he loved it. All his faculties were already at hand for the best part of his life, so he was engaged. By his strong power of will he seemed to hold the forces which were moving upon life's citadel in check until his brother, Dr. T. B. Reed, who was on his way to visit him in his distant home, might reach him. When he arrived, and he had committed to him the charge of his beloved wife and children, in perfect peace he laid himself down to die. He died at Denver, Colo., Nov. 18, 1878. (W. P. S.)

Reed, Andrew, D.D., an English Independent divine, noted as one of the greatest philanthropists of our time. He, according to his father, a pious man, was a watchmaker in Butcher Row, St. Clement's Danes. Many a time, it is said, Andrew's mother would keep the shop while his father was off on a preaching tour; for he was much given to itinerating in the suburban towns, proclaiming among the benighted "the truth as it is in Jesus," and so interested became he in this glorious work that Mrs. Reed found it needful to provide for the family herself by opening a chinshop, which she kept for twenty years in Chiswell Street. Young Andrew was brought up in the trade of his father, and at eighteen a year, after five years' leave as a watchmaker to go on the same errand as his father. He sent to a school in Islington to get such an education as was needful for an ordinary artisan. Andrew evinced a prelection not only for all study, but especially for the study of Greek and Hebrew. The careful mother, anxious to prevent her son's detention—for she hoped from him support in the business his father had so much neglected—took him finally from school and apprenticed him to a master. The temptation of books was a very harmless one compared with the temptations of another kind that awaited Andrew in his new situation. His master's son was a wild youth, and the young apprentice entered on his diary the following: "By the wicked behavior of my master's son I was made still worse. I went twice or thrice to the secured play-houses." On this account he got his indentures cancelled and returned to the parental roof. Working the usual hours at watchmaking, in his leisure he kept his mother's books, instructed his sister, and taught a little orphan girl, their servant, to read and write—thus early beginning his orphan work. Books and every more books were the choice friends of his leisure hours; and though he worked well at his trade, his good mother in her diary might well write down, "These are things which, if the last be for business, show too much taste for study." She sent him to the same school to study Greek and Hebrew, and sacred to secular pursuits. Andrew Reed's Hebrew and Greek studies led him to theology, and his joy knew no bounds when it was decided in the family counsel that he might go to college. He dismantled his little workshop, sold his tools, and laid out the money in books. He entered Hackney Seminary, a collegiate and theological school of the Independents. It is needless to say that when he was ready to graduate his record was already begun as a preacher. He had many invitations to settle. Among other calls was that of colleague to the celebrated preacher, Matthew Wilks (q. v.), at the Tabernacle. But Reed gave the preference to the church in the New Road, East London, where he remained the pastor for half a century. He resigned the place on Nov. 27, 1861, the anniversary of his birth and of his ordination. He died Feb. 25, 1862, happy to the last and conscious of his Master's love. Rarely, if ever, was such a record closed as this event ended. More than most men—even Christian ministers—Dr. Reed seems to have lived in the presence of some great public purpose, and to have consecrated, or rather sacrificed, all things to its accomplishment. Thus we read in the Memoir published by his sons (Lond. 1863) that at times he was so engrossed that he would not dine with his family for a week. "In the last four years," he writes in his diary, "I have been four hundred times to Earlswood [asylum for idiots]; each time has consumed the best part of the day, so that it has cost me a whole year." Indeed, nothing less than a consecration like this could have accomplished Dr. Reed's work. He must, moreover, have combined the physical strength of a giant with the powerful will of the Christianauthoress. He was one of the most successful and popular preachers of his day—the laudatory pastor of one of the largest churches in the metropolis; and yet he found time to originate not only the Hackney Grammar-school, but five great national benevolent institutions—viz. the London Orphan Asylum, the Infant Orphan Asylum, the Orphan Asylum for the Industrious, the Orphan Asylum for Fatherless Children at Reatham, the Idiot Asylum at Earlswood, with its branch establishment at Colchester, and the Hospital for Incurables. The aggregate cost of their erection was £129,520; they accommodate 2110 objects of charity; and their total receipts under his administration amounted to the respectable sum of £1,043,566 13s. 1d. Emphatically was his a life, with deeds to crown it." Andrew Reed began his work among the seafaring population of London. He befriended the parents, established schools for the children, and formed societies for the poor. Besides these stupendous works of faith and labors of love, he founded a Home for Incurables; and, not forgetting the interests of education while employed in helping the helpless, he was the friend of the Hackney Grammar-school and endowed schools for Sabbath and day schools for the children of the industrial classes. He not only refused all remuneration for his great services, but contributed, besides, a large part of his yearly income in charity. The five asylums that he founded alone received from his hand £4,540. When he opened a chapel he was ready with his £10, £20, and even £50, to encourage its friends to discharge a debt incurred in its erection. He lived in the most simple way, that he might have the more to give to him that needed. His remarkable success in his vast and varied enterprises he owed to his extraordinary business powers, his great sagacity, and his determined will. Few men saw more clearly what was to be done, or knew better how to do it. One record strikingly exhibits the stern kind of discipline that he was wont to exercise upon himself, and the resolute determination with which he carried out his work: "The measure of mercy is the measure of obligation. Of the course I should take at present I see nothing. All is dark, very dark. Work which I had thought to do is now abandoned; now one thing is left. I am too old for it. For discipline I will do it. I have naturally a love for the beneficent labors of the Church; but I am too old for it. I am firm and deformed. The thing I would not do is the thing I am now resolved to do. Alas! poor idiot! while he is the greater sufferer, I am the greater sinner." His benevolence was both a natural enthusiasm and a sacred religious duty, and whatever his warm heart prompted, his clear head conceived and his strong hand executed. A keen discriminator of character, he knew how to bend the wills of others to his purpose. As a speaker, he was endowed with very great power of eloquence. After the fashion of his generation, he was somewhat rhetorical and magniloquent, but there was a mighty power of passion in him. His Sermons and Charges, recently published, contain specimens of a very high order of pulpit eloquence; and few sermons of modern times have produced a greater effect than his missionary sermon at Surrey Chapel. His power in the pulpit was attested by his own crowded chapel, and by the large numbers whom he admitted to his Church fellowship. He was a polemic of no mean power—"a sharp thrashing-instrumamt having teeth;" and perhaps even Russell never went so far as to make a storm of rhetoric than at the British and Foreign School meeting in Exeter Hall, when Dr. Reed claimed him as a leader in opposition to Sir J. Graham's Factory Bill. Dr. Reed's power of work was immense; his recreation was change of benevolent employment, either the energetically prosecutes of some philanthropic scheme or a campaign of provincial preaching. Amid all his literary and other labors, he did not think of writing his life. One of his sons, perceiving that his venerable father was fast failing, asked him if he ever had arranged any memoir. Dr. Reed replied by writing the following note:

"To my many boy who said he would write my life, and asked for what title:

A. R.

I WAS BORN YESTERDAY;

I SHALL DIE TO-MORROW,

AND I MUST NOT FUND TO DAY

IN TELLING WHAT I HAVE DONE,

BUT IN DOING WHAT I MAY FOR HIM

WHO HAD NO NAME FOR ME.

I SPRANG FROM THE PEOPLE; I HAVE LIVED FOR THE PEOPLE—

THE MOST FOR THE MOST HAPPY;

AND THE PEOPLE, WHEN THEY KNOW IT, WILL NOT ALLOW ME TO DIE OUT OF LOVING REMEMBERANCE."

What can be added to such a summary? "It is not surprising that the sons of Dr. Andrew Reed should wish to publish the history of his life of goodness and active benevolence—though, in fact, the permanent records of his character and works exist in the many institutions which owe their existence to his activity and devotion."

These are the words of the queen of England in referring to him who was the honored instrument of doing such a vast amount of good that his name undoubtedly ranks among the first philanthropists of the age. Dr. Reed wrote many works in practical theology, principally on practical religion—all of which have a wide and extensive circulation, and of which a list is given in Allibone. Dr. Reed is the author of many hymns among which is the one beginning "There is an hour when I must part." In 1833 he visited this country as a representative of the Congregational Union of Britain, and made many friends here. On his return home, he wrote on his Visit to the American Churches, and the work was republished here (N. Y. 1835, and often). See, besides, the Memoir (Lond. 1863, small 8vo; 3d ed. 1867); London Reader, 1863, ii, 724; London Patriotic, Dec. 17, 1863; Eclectic and Congregational Rev. Reed, Caleb, an American divine, who belonged to the New Jerusalem Church, was born in 1797. He entered the ministry, but was finally made editor of the New Jerusalem Magazine, and continued its management. He died in 1854. His publications were of a secular character.

Reed, Fitch, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose memory is precious in all the communities where he has resided, was born March 28, 1753. His early Christian training was under Calvinistic influences, but, in his nineteenth year, while studying medicine, he was converted under the labors of the Rev. Marvin Richardson, and accepted Armenian doctrines as preferable. In 1815 he was licensed to preach, and was employed upon a circuit by Dr. Nathan Bangs, then presiding elder. In 1817 he was admitted into the New York Conference, and was sent to the extreme eastern point of Long Island. His second appointment was Dunham Circuit, in Canada East, which offered him all the hardships which the severity of a northern winter, a new country, unimproved and sometimes almost inaccessible, a poor people, and ill-constructed log-huts could afford. Of this he himself told, as follows, in a semi-centennial sermon: "I did at first wonder that my lot had fallen just here, and thought that possibly, after all, the bishop had made a mistake; yet the harsh climate, the hard work, and plenty of it, and harder fare were just what my infinite Wisdom saw needed. I praise the Lord to this day for Dunham Circuit, it saved me from an early grave." His next field of labor was in the wilderness lying north of Lake Ontario. To this region he was sent as the first minister of the Gospel, within about twelve months after the first settlement had been made. He established his appointments, organized his circuits, and went about as a circuit rider, carrying the message through the trackless forest by the aid of a compass, and, when twenty-eight years of age, was appointed presiding elder of Susquehanna District. After eight years he was again transferred to New York Conference and stationed at Rhinebeck, and subsequently in New York city, Brooklyn, Poughkeepsie, and other important fields of labor, including New Haven District. In 1848 he was transferred to Oueida Conference, to which he gave fourteen years of effective service, including seven years in the office of presiding elder. In the year 1852 he was compelled by increasing bodily infirmities to retire to the superannuated relation, and thereafter, though his love for the work never abated, he preached only as health and opportunity would permit. He died Oct. 10, 1871, leaving behind the record of a life well spent in the service of his heavenly Master. See Christian Advocate, Dec. 9, 1871.

Reed, John (1), D.D., an American Unitarian divine, was born in Framingham, Mass., Nov. 11, 1721, and was educated at Yale College, class of 1722. He studied for the ministry, and became pastor at Bridgewater, Mass., in 1780. He finally took interest in political affairs, and was a member of Congress from 1784 to 1789. He died Feb. 17, 1831. He published various sermons and theological treatises of passing value. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 143.

Reed, John (2), D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Wickford, R. I., about 1777. He had his thoughts early turned towards the New Jerusalem Church, and went to Union College with a view to greater efficiency in the sacred work. On May 27, 1806, he was made a deacon, and on June 17, 1808, priest. His first pastorate was at St. Luke's Church, Catskill, N. Y. In 1810 he became rector at Christ Church, Poughkeepsie, and there preached for thirty-three years, in his last five of which he was having the aid of an assistant. He died July 6, 1845. A tablet, erected in the church by the vestry, records the high respect and veneration in which he was held by his parish. He was a careful observer, a diligent student, a man of God, and an acceptable preacher. In a whole devoted life Dr. John Brown, of Newburgh, N. Y., at the funeral service, "showed that his [Reed's] best treasure was in heaven." He published a small work in defence of episcopacy, and two or three separate Sermons. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 505-508; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. c. (J. H. W.)

Reed, Joseph, a Roman Catholic priest, was born at Waterbury, Conn., about 1845. In 1869 he was ordained at Troy, N. Y., and, after supplying a mission at Birmingham, Conn., and serving as a curate at the cathedral in Providence, R. I., was appointed secretary and chancellor of the diocese of Hartford, Conn. He died in 1877.

Reed, Nelson, a pioneer minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Ann Arundel County, Md., Nov. 27, 1751. Nothing positive is known of his early history. In 1779 his name appears on the minutes of a missionary preacher, as he was called at that time, and thus preached for four years. His appointments were, in 1779 to Fiuavana; in 1780, Amelia; in 1781, Calvert; in 1782, Little York; in 1783, Caroline; in 1784, Dover. From 1786 to 1756 he had the charge of districts in Maryland and Virginia. In 1796 he was stationed at Foll's Point, in Foll's Point district; in 1799, on Baltimore Circuit. In 1800 his name is found among those "who are under a location through illness of body or family concerns," and it disappears now from the minutes until 1803, when we find him again on the Baltimore Circuit. The next year he was placed in charge of the Federal and Annapolis Circuit. In 1807, 1808, 1809, and 1810 he presided over the Baltimore District, which included the time some of the strong men of the itinerancy. In 1811, 1812, 1813, and 1814 he presided over the Georgetown District. In 1815 we find him on the Baltimore District again, where he presided four years. In 1819 he stands connected with the Baltimore Circuit as a supernumerary. In 1820 his name appears on the superannuated list; in this relation he continued till the close of his life. At the time of his death, which occurred Oct. 20, 1840, he was the oldest Methodist preacher in Europe or America. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1840; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 68-70.

Reed, Sampson, a Swedishbordian of note as a writer especially, was born at West Bridgewater, Mass., in 1800, and was educated at Harvard College, class of 1818. He became editor of the New Church Magazine and co-editor of the New Jerusalem Magazine, and died in 1875. He published Observations.

Reed, Samuel, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Union County, N.C., Nov. 18, 1816. He entered the ministry in 1838, and was sent to the Peru Circuit as a supply. He was admitted into the Conference, and travelled Auburn Mission in 1839-40. Frankfurt in 1841-42, Vincennes in 1843, Evansville in 1844, Bedford in 1845, North Indiana Conference, Covington in 1846-47. This fall he went to St. Louis and remained one year, returned with impaired health, and was superannuated for five years following. He was again made effective and appointed to New Harmony in 1853, to Petersburg in 1854, to New Albany in 1855, and to Bedford in 1856, where he remained to the close of that conference year, when he was superannuated a second time. He declined in health, but lingered on until Feb. 6, 1869. Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 187, 188.

Reel'lah ('Heb. Reel'lah, נֶלֶךְ, τρέχων; fr. Sep. Piel'lah), one of the "children of the province" who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 6; Neh. vii, 7) by the synonym Raamiah (q.v.).

Reil'hu (Pielox v.r. Bapolox), one of the Israelites who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (1 Esdr. v, 8); inserted in place of the B'elai of the Hebrew lists (Ezra ii, 2; Neh. vii, 7) by confusion for the Reel'lah of Ezra's list.

Rees, Abraham, D.D., a dissenting minister who held a distinguished rank in the literary and scientific world, was the son of a Welch Nonconformist minister, and was born at Montgomery in 1743. Intended for the ministry, he was first placed under Dr. Jenkins, of Carrmarthen, whom he removed to the Hoxton Academy, founded by Mr. Coward, where his progress in his studies was so rapid that in his second year he was appointed mathematical tutor to the institution, and soon after resident tutor, in which capacity he continued upwards of twenty-two years. In 1768 he succeeded Mr. Read as pastor to the Presbyterian congregation of St. Thomas's, Southwark. On the death of Mr. White, in 1768, Rees accepted an invitation to become minister of a congregation in Jewin Street, Cripplegate, where he continued to officiate till the time of his death, June 9, 1825. On the establishment of the dissenting seminary at Hackney in 1786, Dr. Rees, who had, in conjunction with Drs. Savage and Kippis, secured from that at Hoxton two years before, was elected to the situation of resident tutor in the natural sciences. This position he held till the dissolution of the academy, which took place on the death of Dr. Kippis (q.v.). It is, however, in a literary capacity that Dr. Rees is principally and most advantageously known. In 1768 he was applied to by the proprietors of Chamber's Encyclopaedia to superintend a new and enlarged edition of that valuable compilation, which, after nine years' incessant labor, he brought to a conclusion in four folio volumes. The success of this work stimulated the proprietors to still further exertions. A new undertaking, similar in its nature, but much more comprehensive in its plan, and printed in quarto size, was projected and carried on by him; and he had at length the satisfaction to see the new Cyclopaedia now generally known by his name, advance from the publication of the first volume in 1802 to its completion in forty-five volumes with undiminished reputation. His other works, besides those of a secular character, are, Practical Sermons (1809-12, 2 vols.); The Principles of the Protestant Disestablished and Deistsicated—besides a variety of occasional discourses. See Jones, Christian Biography, p. 357; Annual Biography, 1825; London Gentleman's Magazine, 1825.

Reese, E. Yates, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, but especially noted as a writer, was born about the year 1820. He early entered the ministry, and, after filling many positions of prominence in the pastorate, became editor of the Methodist Protestant newspaper at Baltimore, and was in this position till 1849, in a fit of mental and physical languishment, he committed suicide. The Lutheran of Philadelphia thus commented at the time: "Dr. Reese was one of the noisiest and most genial of men. His paper was among the very best of the denominational organs in our country; and so much more than a denominational organ, immeasurably more than a sectarian one. He drew around him many amiable writers, not only of his own Church, but of other churches, but no pen among them all was so versatile, so happy, as his own. He was a poet and an orator, who consecrated every gift to the service of the Saviour of men. His consecration had a wonderful charm. His delicacy of feeling, his fine tact, his generosity and large catholicity of feeling, made him very dear to all that knew him." Such testimony from another denomination is surely rare; and is reprinted within the walls of the Messenger of the German Reformed Church, and thus given still further approval than the bounds of one outside denomination.

Reese, Levi R., a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Harford County, Md., Feb. 6, 1806, enjoyed a general preparatory education, and was sent to school for a while after he was seventeen. When about twenty years of age he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, but shortly after the agitation opened which resulted in the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church, he was, it is said, the first preacher appointed by the new body. The first three years of his ministerial life were spent at Philadelphia and New York. In 1833 he was appointed by the Maryland Annual Conference to labor in Alexandria, Va., and there succeeded so well that he was successively given "every important position in the church, and the official position of the body with which he was connected." He was for two years president of the church, and repeatedly a candidate for the vice-presidency. In 1837 and 1838 he was chaplain to the United States Congress. He died in Philadelphia Sept. 21, 1865. He was highly esteemed as a man and a preacher, and the whole church is made up all through Maryland. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 751-754.

Reese, Thomas, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1742, was educated at the College of New Jersey, class of 1768, and became the pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Salem, S. C., and subsequently

Reeve, Thomas, D.D. An Anglican divine of the 17th century, flourished as a preacher of Waltham Abbey. He was appointed Bishop of Salisbury (1682, 4to) and was active in the persecution of the nonconformists. He published Sermons (1647, 4to) and Public Devotions (1651, 12mo) and The God's Plea for Nincher, or London's Preserver for Mercy, delivered in certain sermons, etc. (1651, fol.).

Reeves, William (1668-1647), a man of more than ordinary learning, was born in 1668, and was educated at King's College, Cambridge, of which he was made a fellow. He took holy orders, and was in 1692 chaplain to the rector of Cranford, Middlesex, and in 1711 vicar of St. Mary, Reading. He died in 1692. He published, Sermons (1704, 4to) and The Apologies of Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Minucius Felix in Defence of the Christian Religion, with the Commemoration of Vincentius Lirinensis concerning the Primitive Rule of Faith (transl. and a preliminary discourse upon each author, Lond. 1709-10, 2 vols. 8vo), in which he answered the value of work upon the same subject (Orme). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth.

Refectory, the dining-hall of a monastery, college, etc. The internal arrangements and fittings were very similar to those of the ordinary domestic halls, except that it was usually provided with a raised desk or pulpit, from which on some occasions one of the inmates of the establishment read to the others during meal-time. There are remains of old English refectories at Chester and Worcester now used as a schoolhouse, at Cambridge and Durham as a library, and at Beaulieu as a church. Portions of the beautiful arcaded walls of one remain at Peterborough. It was usually, as at Lanercost and Rievaulx, raised upon cellarium, which at Cluny contained the bath-rooms; and in Benedictine friars' and regular canons' houses it lay parallel to the minster, in order that the noise and fumes of dinner might not reach the sanctuary; but in most Cistercian houses, as Beaulieu, Bland, Ford, Netley, Tintern, Rievaulx, Furness, and Kirkham, Maulbronn, Clairvaux, Baisieux, Savigny, and Benso, it stood at right angles to the cloister, as it did in the Dominican convents of Toulouse and Paris. A few foreign monastic refectories were of two aisles, as Tours, Alcobaca, the Benedictines', and St. Martin des Champs at Paris. At St. Alban's an abbey, on his resignation, went to reside in a chancel which he had fitted up as a refectory. The usual dinner-hour was three P.M. The small bell rang and the monks came out from the parlor and washed at the lavatory, and then entered the hall, two and two, taking their appointed places at the side-tables. At the high-table on the dais the superior sat, in the centre of the large dinner table, over a cross, a pillar, or the boone, or the Last Supper, having the squilla-ball on his right hand, which he ran at the beginning and end of dinner. Usually the number of each mess varied between three and ten persons. Each monk drew down his cowl and ate in silence. While the bedchambers or servers of the week laid the dais, the reader of the week began the lection from Holy Writ or the lives of saints in the wall pulpit. During dinner all the gates were closed, and no visitors were admitted. After dinner the broken fragments were sent down to the almsery for the poor and sick, and the brethren either took the meridian sleep, talked in the calefactorium, read, or walked, but in some houses remained in procession in the cloister, divided into several small groups, and prayed a while bareheaded among the graves of the brotherhood. At Durham the frater-house was used only on great occasions. It was fitted with benches and mats. The ordinary fare was pulse, fruit, vegetables, bread, eggs, cheese, wine, or ale; and the evening meal, the sestinal, consisted of bread and wine, and was followed by prayer in church before bedtime. The dinner-hour at length became put back to noon, and the supper was continued at the old time, about five P. M. At the entrance of the hall there was a large ambo for the mazers, cups, and plate. The Chaucerian distributed the unseemly hosts in hall. The Last Supper of Leonardo da Vinci, painted for the Dominicans of Milan, represents the high table of a refectory of the order. French or Latin only were allowed to be spoken in hall at canoe, and in 1347 meat was not served on Wednesdays and Saturdays during Advent, or from Septem- gisima to Easter-day. The hall of a guest-house was lined with beds at Cluny and Farfa, for men on one side and for women on the other, while movable tables down the centre were laid out at meat-time.

Refine, the art of refining, as referred to in Scripture, was of two different kinds, according as it was applied to liquids or to metals; and the processes, in themselves quite diverse, are expressed by different words. In respect to liquids the primary idea was that of *strain*nsg or filtering — the primary discourse was F?F? (Isa. xxv, 6); but in respect to metals it was that of melting, and thereby separating the ore from the metal. And for this the word was ?W? , tur?rph. But the first word also in the course of time came to be used of gold or other metals, to denote their refined or pure state (1 Chr. xxviii, 18; xxix, 4; Job xxviii, 1; Ps. xii, 6; Mal. iii. 3). In figurative allusions, however, to the idea of refining, while both words might have been employed, we find almost exclusive use made of that which points to the more searching process of purification by fire (Isa. i, 25; xi, 19; xlviii, 10; Zech. xiii, 9; Mal. iii. 2, 3). Hence the term "refiner" or smelter (*?W? , *?W? , ?W? , metorrph, Mal. iii. 2, 3) denotes a worker in metals, specially of gold and silver (Prov. xxx, 4), a founder (Judg. xvii, 4), a goldsmith (Isa. xii, 7). That the ancients acquired, in comparatively remote times, some knowledge and skill in this art, as in the working of metals generally, admits of no doubt. See METAL. The Egyptians carried the working of metals to an extraordinary degree of perfection, as their various articles of jewelry preserved in museums evince; and there is no doubt that the Hebrews derived their knowledge of these arts from this source—though there is evidence that the art of working in copper and iron was known before the flood (Gen. iv, 22). The Egyptian monuments also give various representations on the subject, and in particular exhibit older persons blowing at the furnace, while others of metal on it, in order to raise it to a melting heat. See HELLOWS. The creation of a heat sufficiently intense for the purpose was the chief element in the process of refining, although, probably, borax and other substances were applied to facilitate and perfect the results. The refiner's art was especially essential to the working of the precious metals. It consisted in the separation of the dross from the pure ore, which was effected by reducing the metal to a fluid state by the application of heat, and by the aid of solvents, such as alkali ("A. V. "purely," Isa. iii, 25) or lead (Jer. vi, 29), which, amalgamating with the dross, permitted the extraction of the unsulphurated metal. The Hebrews evidently understood the process of melting the metals, not only to make them fluid for the purpose of casting, but also for separating from them the impurities present in them or adhering to them. The metal, being dipped in water, would form a silver lead ore with which it was combined (Ezek. xxxii, 18-22; xxxiv, 11). The instruments required by the refiner were a crucible of furnace (ם"א) and a bellows or blowpipe (ל"ת). The workman sat at his work (Mal. iii, 3; "He shall sit as a refiner"); he was thus better enabled to watch the process, and keep the metal run off at the proper moment. See MINT. The notices of refining are chiefly of a figurative character, and describe moral purification as the result of chastisement (Isa. i, 25; Zech. xii, 9; Mal. iii, 2, 3). The failure of the means to effect the result is graphically depicted in Jer. vi, 29: "The bellows blow with the fire (become quite hot from exposure to the heat); the lead (used as a solvent) is expended (ץ"כ ל"ת [khet]); the refiner melts in vain, for the refuse will not be separated." The refiner appears, from the passage whence this is quoted, to have combined with his proper business of assaying metals: "I have set thee for an assayer" (ת"ד י. "a tower," ver. 27). See FISSION.

Reformation LEGEM ECCLESIASTICÆREM, a code of Church law, first projected by Cranmer at the commencement of his primacy, and accomplished, after various interruptions and collision (1551), by a body consisting of bishops, divines, canonists, and secular doctors of the law. It was ready to be submitted to King Edward, but his sudden death prevented the royal confirmation, and so the project came to an end. The work, consequently, is neither solid nor of any authority; but it is of valuable record, as throwing a clear light on the views of the Reformers. It not only reveals their plans with respect to canonical jurisprudence, but their opinions on Christian doctrine.

Reformation, this is the name commonly given to the religious and ecclesiastical movement of the 16th century which resulted in the overthrow of the then all-powerful authority of the Roman popes in a large portion of the Christian world, and in the construction of a number of new religious organizations. The name itself is highly significant, and points to the importance of the new departure in the history of Christianity which then began. It has come into quite general use even among Roman Catholic writers, although the theologians of that Church have attempted to substitute for it other terms, like the "so-called Reformation," and the "separation of the Church." We have already had occasion in numerous articles of this Cyclopædia to refer to detached portions of the Reformation. The Church history of no important country of Europe could be complete without a mention of its reformatory movements, whether they were successful or unsuccessful, and the great names of the greatest fathers of the Reformation consist chiefly of an account of their labors in behalf of the reconstruction of the Church upon a new basis. The present article treats of the great turning-point in the history of Christianity as a whole.

1. Forerunners of the Reformation. Like most of the great events of mankind, the Reformation has had its preparatory history, in which attempts of a similar nature were made for the same purpose, meeting with no or but partial success, but yet smoothing the way for the marvelous changes which were achieved by the victorious reformation of the 16th century. All the Reformed churches which have sprung from the movements of the 16th century are agreed in regarding the undue power which the bishops of Rome at an early time began to arrogate to themselves, and the centralization of which the consequence was forced upon the Christian Church, as of the main deviations from the doctrines of the Bible and the practice and the life of the apostolic age. In a wider sense of the word, all the efforts, therefore, which have been made to repress and abolish the arrogant and encroaching power of the Roman popes, and to bring back the Church to its purity in the time of her founder and his first disciples, might be called preparatory and forerunning movements of the great Reformation. These movements have been manifold and widely different in their origin, progress, and ramifications, and each of them has to be individually judged by its own character and history. Indeed, throughout the Middle Ages, even when the power of the papacy was most despotic and absolute, a reformatory tendency was pervading the Church, often confining itself to secrecy and occult labors, but frequently bursting the bonds of the Church, proclaiming its reformatory principles in public and defying the rule of man and hierarchy. Some of these outbreaks ran smoothly on in the channels of a purely evangelical belief; others became impregnated with fanatical, sometimes even anti-Christian, elements, and threatened with a common overthrow both the State and the Church. Among the more prominent reformatory movements in the earlier part of the Middle Ages were those of the Albigenses, the Cathari, and the Waldenses, to all of which (and many others) this Cyclopædia devotes special articles.

In the latter part of the Middle Ages, the deviation of the ruling Church from Scripture and primitive Christianity became more and more glaring, and the corruption among all classes of the clergy, from the highest to the lowest, more and more general. The call for a "reform in the head and members" spread rapidly, and even great nations began to look upon the reformation of the Church as a national cause. It has been justly remarked that the meaning given to the term "reformation in the head and members" was by no means uniform, and that "every one understood it to mean primarily that he was most desired—the removal of what seemed to him most oppressive and unchristian." All malcontents, however, appeared to agree in regarding the administration of the Christian Church by the papal court as utterly depraved, and as subservient of true Christianity.

The efforts made for putting an end to papal misrule and achieving a reformation of the Church were chiefly of two kinds. The one class found the seat of the degeneration not so much in a departure from the doctrine of the papacy, but in the disregard of the popes of greater power than belonged to them by divine and Church right. These men strongly believed in the continuity of the visible Church; they rejected the right of separation and accension, and looked upon the ecumenical councils of the Church as the only medium through which the needs of the Church should be adjusted and acted upon. This school had for a long time a centre in the most famous literary institution of the Church—the University of Paris. Its chief representatives were Peter d'Ailly, the chancellor, his pupil Gerson, and Nicolas de Clichy, rector of that university. The hearty support of many of the foremost princes of the age, including several emperors, was secured, and at the three great councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basle the majority of the assembled bishops and theologians expressed their concurrence in these views, and earnestly endeavored to effect a radical reformation on this basis. The joyous hopes which had been raised in the Church by these reformatory efforts were, however, sorely disappointed when the pope succeeded in dissolving the Council of Basle.

Much more thorough than this class of reformers were a second, which not only turned against papal innovations in the government of the Church, but also by a study of the Scriptures were led to look upon the entire doctrinal system of the Church, as it had gradually developed under the misguidance of the popes, as an apostacy from the Christianity of the Bible. The Church believed that her reformation in its head and members, the Church needed a reformation in its spirit and doctrines. The foremost representatives of this school were Wycliffe in England, and Huss in Bohemia. To Wycliffe the papacy appeared as anti-Christianity, and the papal power, in his opinion, was not derived from God, but from the emperor. He rejected altogether the existing hierarchical constitution of the Church, and advocated the substitution for it of the presbyterian constitution. He believed it to be in existence in the apostolic age. To the traditions of the Church he absolutely denied an authoritative character, and declared the whole Scripture to be the only source and rule of religious knowledge. Huss derived his views of Church reform largely from Wycliffe, and in 1410 was excommunicated from the Church as a Wycliffite. One of the central doctrines of the reformation of the 16th century rose, however, in his system to greater prominence, and he also resembled his great followers more than Wycliffe by arousing the masses of the people in behalf of reform. Neither Wycliffe nor Huss succeeded in carrying through a reformation. When the English government, which had protected Wycliffe during his lifetime from personal injury, began a bloody persecution against his followers, most of whom were found in the humble walks of life, the more reformatory movement in England came to a sudden standstill. The reformatory ideas of Huss appeared for a time to gain complete control of an entire country, and thus to establish a stronghold of evangelical Christianity in the centre of Europe. But internal dissensions and the appearance of Hussism in the German empire in 1434 the prospects of the Hussite movement, which dwindled down into a small sect called the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren. Numerically too weak to exercise a missionaries influence upon the remainder of Christian Europe, this religious denomination will yet always be counted among the ripest and most delicious fruits of the reformatory tendencies of the Middle Ages.

Nothing shows better the vast difference between the two classes of reformers who have been characterized in the above lines than the fact that Loomon, the most gifted representative of the first named, was the leading spirit at the Council of Constance which sentenced Huss to be burned at the stake. Besides these two broad currents of reformatory movements which are visible in the Church history of the latter part of the Middle Ages, there were a large number of theological writers who bravely contended for bringing the corrupt Church of their times back to the purity of Jewish Christianity, and who more or less discussed all the great reformatory questions which agitated the world in the 16th century. Among the most celebrated of these reformers were John Carthusian, a monk of Mechin, John Wessel (Gansfort), called by his friends Ludi Mondi, and John (Ruenrath) of Wesel. Though many of these writers made undisguised assaults upon the received doctrines of the Church, their views, if not directly addressed to the people, were frequently tolerated as learned opinions of the school. One of the most gifted reformatory preachers of the Middle Ages appeared towards the close of the 15th century in Italy. With a rare eloquence and boldness he attacked the immoral life prevailing in both Church and State, and demanded a radical reform of both. Though few reformatory preachers have ever succeeded better than Savonarola in swaying the emotions of large masses of the people, he did not lay the foundation of any reformatory organization; and when he was burned at the gibelet, there was no one to continue the work of his life.

2. At the close of the 15th century, the Church had succeeded in repressing all the reformatory movements of the Middle Ages, at least so far as to prevent, mostly by the power of the German emperor, the consolidation and extension of any of these movements into a powerful ecclesiastical organization, like that of the Eastern Church. But her triumph, after all, was more apparent than real. Her authority had been thoroughly undermined, and remained shaken in every country of Europe. The threats of the Church might extort reluctant recantations from a number of intimidated reformers; but her very successes of this kind had the effect of spreading the latent discontent with a religious organization which so palpably cared more for power than for the purity of Christian doctrine and Christian life. Other powerful agencies were needed to aid in this process, already begun in the 16th century, in the organization and extension of the reformation in the Church. The most influential among them was the school of the Humanists, who used the revival of classical studies for promoting a general literary culture, which not only fully emancipated itself from the guardianship of the Church, but frequently assumed an antithetical position to it with regard to Christianity. Especially in Italy, humanism became an enthusiastic worshipper of pagan antiquity, and it became quite common that high dignitaries of the Church were in the circles of their friends and acquaintances known as ardent atheists. Even pope Leo X was credited with the remark—and, whether true or not true, it was regarded as credible by his contemporaries—"It is generally known how much we and ours have profited by the fable of Christ." While in Italy many of the leading humanists entertained the highest degree of Christian belief, though they had no objection to retaining their pagan habits which were often of the highest rank, in the Church, the chief patrons of the classical studies in the Teutonic countries were mostly men of earnest Christian convictions, who cultivated them with a view to strengthening the cause of the Christian faith. Thus the interest in ancient literature, especially the community of the Brothers of the Common Life who founded a number of excellent schools, in which the highest attainments in the revived classical studies, and an education in the principles of earnest, puritan Christianity, were aimed at. Though the community as a whole never entered into an opposition attitude with regard to the Church, but rather, like its greatest member, Thomas à Kempis, limited itself to teaching, preaching, and practicing that which in the system of the ruling Church appeared to be unobjectionable to earnest and pious Christians, its teachers and pupils generally favored the idea of a Church reformation, and in the 16th century many of them became enthusiastic co-workers in the reformatory labors of Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin.

The labors of such men could not fail to kindle in Germany still more the desire for a reformation, and to strengthen the expectation that in resuming the work of reformation on a grand scale the German nation would take the lead. As early as 1457, chancellor Mayer of Zeil wrote to Jan Zizka, one of the famous Hussite leaders: "The German nation, once the queen of the world, but now a tributary handmaid of the Roman Church, begins to arouse herself out of a dream, and is resolved to throw off the yoke." This spirit of preparing for the overthrow of the papal yoke and the purification of Christianity at the proper time was jointly nurtured by hundreds of learned and pious men in the latter part of the 16th and the beginning of the 16th century; and when at length the right leader appeared at the fulness of time, he found hundreds of thousands ready to fall at once into line as combatants in the grand army of reform.

II. Luther's Reformation in Germany.—While the forerunners of the Reformation diffused in the Church the yearning for a radical purification of Christianity, and while the humanists were educating a race much better fitted for the standard-bearer of reformation than were the reformers of preceding centuries, a number of other great events co-operated for bringing the medieval history of mankind to a close, and for ushering in a new era. Maritime discoveries of unparalleled magnitude, the consolidation of wealth and wealth and led to a rapid growth of commerce, to an increase of manufactures, and a greater and more general diffusion of wealth. The invention of the art of printing diffused knowledge among the masses of the people to an extent which former generations would have regarded...
ed as impossible. Feudalism and medieval chivalry collapsed before the rise of the wealthier and more informed bourgeoisie, settling down in the North and, by the other hand, the consolidation of powerful states under centralized governments, on the other. The new forces which obtained a controlling influence upon modern society were not always, and not by necessity, hostile to the ruling Church; but it is still more true that when Church movements they were a considerable aid in raising up more formidable oppositions to the popes and their Church than those which had been put down in the Middle Ages. Soon after the beginning of the 16th century, Germany, then the soil most favorable to religious reform, produced the man who succeeded in carrying through the reforms which the preceding centuries had so often in vain attempted, who dealt to the papacy a heavier blow than it had received since the separation of the Eastern Church, and whose name, forever associated with "The Reformation," stands at the portal of modern history as one of its greatest pillars. No one disputes the eminent position which Martin Luther occupies in history, nor the extraordinary qualities which elevated him to it. The Manual of Church History, by Dr. Alzog, which has been an authority for early Latin literature and is very extensively used in the theological schools of the Roman Catholic Church, says of Luther: "If we look upon his aggregated, eventful life, we must count him among the most remarkable men of all centuries, although he grasped his mission in the most rash and blind manner, being in the most unlikely position, and in opposition with the most brilliant feature of his system." A Protestant Church historian (Kurtz) justly calls Luther a religious genius, who was called to his great work by the rarest union of the necessary qualifications and gifts of the intellect, sentiment, character, and will; who was trained and educated by a providential guidance of his life; who, in his own life, had passed through the entire essential course of reformation, had tested in himself its divine power, and then could not but make the holiest and dearest experience of his life serviceable to all the world.

1. The origin of the German Reformation was quite humble and indefinite. Pope Leo X., of whom even Roman Catholic writers must say that "he does not appear to have experienced the blessing and power of the Church," had at first turned to him the "highest affair of life," had arranged for a very extensive sale of indulgences. It was not deemed worth while to assign for such an outrage upon the religious sentiment of pious Christians a more spirited protest than that the proceeds of the sale were intended for a war against the Turks and the erection of St. Peter's church. The real destination of the money, it was quite commonly believed, was to defray the exorbitant expenditures of the pope's court and to serve as a marriage dowry of his sister. Archbishop Albert of Mento, of whose Christian belief as little was known as of that of the pope, authorized the sale in Germany on condition that fifty per cent. of the gross income should flow into his own pocket. A Dominican friar (Tetzl) carried on the trade with an effrontery which outraged the sentiments of thousands of earnest Christians. Among those who were urged by their conscience to rise against this profanation of Christianity was Luther, then a young monk in an Augustinian convenant. When a young student, he had been driven by his anxiety for the salvation of his soul to study with the Augustinians. Long doubts and mental troubles, he had derived from a profound study of the Scriptures, and of the writings of Augustine and Tauler, the consolatory belief that man is to be saved, not by his own works, but by faith in the mercy of God in Christ. When he became a doctor of the Sacred Scriptures, he was deeply impressed with the truth that the human soul is too weak and polluted to be lifted by its own efforts to God, and the occasion of teaching and making known to the world the truths of Christianity. Both as an earnest Christian, who sincerely believed in the Christianity of the Scriptures, and as a conscientious teacher of theology, Luther felt himself impelled to enter an evangelistic protest against the doings of the Church of Rome. In accordance with the decrees of the Council of Rome, he wrote to several neighboring bishops to stop the sale of indulgences, and only when this appeal remained unheeded he determined to act himself. On the eve of All-Saints' Day, Oct. 31, 1517, he affixed to the tower of Wittenberg his celebrated ninety-five propositions, which are generally looked upon as the beginning of Luther's reformation. Both Protestant and Roman Catholic writers are agreed that these theses involved no more than Luther's part in a conscious renunciation of the Roman Catholic faith. Luther himself showed this clearly by his subsequent appeal to the pope; but Dr. Hase justly remarks that Luther certainly must have been aware that he had thrown out a challenge to the most powerful prelates and monks. On the other hand, the opposition to the Pope was in Italy, where the sale of indulgences was very extensively used as an object for public charity, and the emperor was not disposed to interfere, as it would have endangered the chance of the union of Italy under the papal standard. Luther was soon followed by the religious reformers of the Church. We must also recognise his courage, though it frequently degenerated into defiance—his untiring activity, his popular, irresistible eloquence, sparkling wit, and disinhibitedness. He did not lack a profound religious sentiment, which yearned for satisfaction, and which constituted the fundamental character and the most brilliant feature of his system." Reformation 984 Reformation
turned from a journey to Rome with a bull which declared Luther a heretic and ordered the burning of his writings. Luther, on the other hand, systematized his views in three works, all of which appeared in 1520: To his Imperial Majesty and the Christian Nobility of the German Nation: On the Bondage Captivity of the Church in the World and the Freedom of a Christian. Finally he broke away from the last bridge of retreat by publicly burning (Dec. 10, 1520) the papal bull with the papal canon law. The pope succeeded in prevailing upon the German emperor and the German Diet of Worms (1521) to proceed against Luther; and when the latter firmly refused to recant, and avowed that he could yield nothing but to the Holy Scriptures and reasonable argument, he was placed under the ban of the empire; but so great was the discontent in Germany with Rome that the same assembly that condemned Luther for opposing the faith of his ancestors presented 101 articles of complaint against the Roman see. The ban of the empire involved serious dangers for Luther, for it gave permission to any one to assault his person and seize upon his property; but he was saved from these dangers by the advice of his friends at the university of Warburg, to which disguised horsemen, according to a previous understanding with the elector, but against his own desire, had conducted him. Far from the turmoil of political agitation, he found time not only to issue several powerful polemical essays (against particular confessional points of the Augsburg Confession, against the new calendar of the archbishop of Maynooth), but to refute the rumor that he was dead, but to conceive and partially execute the plan of translating the Bible into the native tongue. During the absence of Luther from Wittenberg, the Reformation under the leadership of men who were more impetuous and practical, but less circumspect and theological, assumed a more aggressive turn against Rome. Several priests renounced celibacy and were married; Karlstadt administered the Lord’s supper in both kinds, and in the German language. To these changes Luther made no objection; but when Karlstadt began to commit open acts of violence in disturbing the public worship of the Roman Church—when enthusiastic prophets appeared from Zwicky, who boasted of immediate divine revelations, rejected infant baptism, and denounced Church, State, and science—he emerged once more from his seclusion, silenced by powerful sermons his adversaries at Wittenberg, and once more placed himself at the helm of the movement. In intimate union with Melanchthon, he resumed the struggle against the papal system of the Church which had ceased to regard itself upon the basis of his reformatory movement. Luther himself gave his chief attention to continuing the translation of the Bible in German, which was completed in 1534, and constitutes in every respect one of the master-productions of the reformers, while Melanchthon, in his celebrated work on theological science (Loci Communes Reform Theologicae), gave to the theological leaders of the new Church a hand-book of doctrine which, as a literary production, ranked with the best works that the Church had hitherto produced. In Rome, Leo X had meanwhile (1521) been succeeded by Adrian VI, the son of a mechanic of Utrecht, who, while strongly attached to the continuity of the external Church and opposed to the separation already produced by Luther, was at the same time sincerely and honestly devoted to the cause of a religious reform. The energy displayed by him and the success obtained were, however, by no means commensurate with the honesty of his convictions. During his short administration (1521-23) he was neither able to arrest the anti-Church policy of Luther nor to smooth the way for the introduction of any reforms within the Church. The latter were hated in Rome no less than the former, and when Adrian died he was succeeded by a humanist, Clement VII, who, like Leo X, was anxious to preserve the splendor and power of the papal court, and showed not the least interest in the purity of the religion.

In Germany, during this interval, the protracted absence of the emperor had prevented the adoption of any stringent measures for the suppression of the Reformation, and allowed the latter to strike deeper roots in the nation. Several local movements against the Reformation were not yet willing to part with the religion of their fathers, and to identify themselves with the movement which they thought represented their beloved ancestors as heretics. They mistrusted Rome, however; persisted in demanding reforms; contented themselves with resolving at several successive diets that the Edict of Worms should be carried out as much as possible, and thus enabled the princes and free cities which were friendly to the Reformation to consolidate it within the boundaries of their states. When the papal legate Campeggio succeeded at the Diet of Ratisbon, in 1524, in bringing about an alliance between Ferdinand of Austria, the dukes of Bavaria, and most of the bishops of Southern Germany for the preservation of the old faith and for carrying out the Edict of Worms, landgrave Philip of Hesse, in the meantime, of a meeting held at Gotha, took the initiatory step for a counter-alliance of the friends of the Reformation. Luther and Melanchthon were at first opposed to the conclusion of any offensive and defensive alliance, on the ground that God’s cause could not be defended by carnal weapons. When, however, the danger became imminent, a defensive alliance between the landgrave and the elector was concluded in 1526 at Torgau, and was soon joined by a number of other princes. As the emperor became involved in a new foreign war in which the pope was on the side of his enemies, the Diet of Spire unanimously agreed upon the decree that until the meeting of a free general council every state should act with regard to the Edict of Worms as it might venture to answer to God and his imperial majesty. This decree gave to the states which were friendly to the Reformation time to reorganize the churches of their territories on the basis of the Reformation. The lead was taken by the elector John the Constant of Saxony. Melanchthon drew up the articles of visitation, in accordance with which, in 1529, a general Church visitation of ecclesiastical and lay councillors took place. Among the results of this visitation were the compilation of two catechisms by Luther for more efficient instruction of the children in the elements of religion, the appointment of superintendents to exercise spiritual supervision, and the introduction of an ecclesiastical organization and disciplinary system of model for the churches in the other German states. Luther, in the meantime (1525), had followed the example of many of his clerical friends and married. As the continuing centre of the entire movement, Luther exerted a powerful influence in many directions as professor and author by an extensive correspondence far beyond the borders of Germany, and by supplying the churches with a great number of excellent Church hymns in the native tongue. By these Church hymns, as well as by his translation of the Bible, Luther at the same time occupied so prominent a position in the religious literature that Germany as a nation appeared to be under the greatest indebtedness to him, and its further progress to be closely linked to the success of the Reformation. A number of theological controversies into which Luther was drawn, and of which the most engaging Henry VIII of England, with Erasmus, with Carlstadt, and Zwinglei were the most important, belong more to the personal history of Luther than to that of the Reformation.
demand, decreed that the Edict of Worms should be carried through in the states which had hitherto acknowledged its authority, but that no innovations should be required in the remaining provinces; that none should be obstructed in celebrating the mass; and that the privileges of every spiritual estate should be respected. Against this reccess, which of course was disastrous to the church, the pope made a further protest against the Reformation impossible, Ecclesiastical Saxony, Hesse, Lüneburg, Anhalt, the margrave of Brandenburg, and fourteen imperial cities entered a protestation, from which they were henceforth called Protestants. They appealed from it to the emperor as the supreme sovereign of Christendom. At the Convention of Schwabach, Luther had drawn up, on the basis of the articles of Marburg, the so-called seventeen Schwabach articles, which the Zwinglian cities were requested to sign as conditional of their admission to the Council; it was the Augsburg Confession, and the convention remained without result. At the next Diet of Augsburg (1530) the emperor intended to put an end to the religious strife. The elector of Saxony therefore requested his theologians to draw up a brief summary of the evangelical faith, and they accordingly presented to him a revision of the Schwabach articles at Torgau (the Torgau articles). The elector was accompanied to Augsburg by Spalatin, Melanchthon, and Jonas. Luther, who was still under the ban of the empire, remained behind at Coburg. The emperor's arrival was delayed, and Melanchthon used the time up to the opening of the diet (June 20) for composing, on the basis of the Torgau articles, the famous Confession of Augsburg (q. v.), the first of the symbolic books of the Lutheran Church, which, after being approved by Luther, was signed by the states. It had been drawn up both in Latin and in German; and although the emperor desired the Latin text to be read, it was at the request of the elector publicly read to the diet in German (June 25). Some of the princes admitted that they had derived from this document a clearer conception of the Reformation than they had had from the Schwabach articles, and desired to sign; but the emperor commissioned the Catholic theologians Faber, Eck, Cochlaeus, and Wimpina to prepare a "confutation" of the Confession, which was read on Aug. 3. The emperor declared that he was determined to stand by the doctrines laid down in the confession; that he expected the same from the princes; that he was the patron of the Church, and not willing to tolerate a schism in Germany. He refused to receive the "Apology of the Augsburg Confession," which had been composed by Melancthon in reply to the "confutation." The state of the empire at Session 22 announced that the confession of the Protestants had been refuted, but that time for consideration would be given to them until April 15 of the next year; until then all should refrain from differing their heresy by writing or preaching; and within six months a general council would be called for the ultimate settlement of the matter. The Edict of Worms was to be carried out, and the imperial court was to proceed against the disobedient. As soon after the close of the diet, a legal process was actually begun against the Protestant states for having espoused the doctrine of the Church, the Protestant powers met at Smalcald, and concluded (1531) a defensive alliance for six years, at the head of which the electors of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse were placed. Fortunately for the new alliance, the emperor was soon again involved in a war with the Turks, who threatened an invasion of Austria and Germany, and his desire to obtain the aid of the Protestant churches once more disposed him favorably towards toleration. New negotiations resulted in the conclusion of the religious peace of Nuremberg (July 28, 1532), which enjoined upon both parties mutual frienship; but this had no effect on the opposing council. Pope Clement VII so far yielded to the demands of the emperor that he promised in 1538 to convocate a council within the space of a year at Mantua, Bologna, or Piacenza; but he demanded, at the same time, from the Protestants a previous unconditional submission to the decrees of the council. In 1536 the Protestants naturally refused to give, though they were ready to attend the council and plead their cause. The power of the Protestants in the meanwhile was greatly strengthened by the accession of the dukes of Pomerania and Württemberg, and by a union with the cities which favored the Zwinglian Reformation; and which, after a religious colloquy, held at Cassel in 1535, between Melanchthon and Bucer, agreed in May, 1536, upon the Wittenberg Concord, by which the cities unequivocally accepted the Augsburg Confession. When in July, 1536, the pope actually declared war on the Protestant states met again for consultation at Smalkald. They accepted and signed the "Articles of Smalkald" which had been composed by Luther, and which presented the doctrines of the Reformation in much stronger terms than the Confession of 1529; but they remained unanimous in the resolve not to attend an Italian council, at which the pope would appear both as a party and as a judge. The council did not meet, but in 1538 a "holy league" for the suppression of Protestantism was formed at Nuremberg by the archbishops of Mentz and Salzbourg, the dukes of Bavaria, George of Saxony, and Henry of Brunswick. But the next year George died, and was succeeded by his Protestant brother Henry, who found it easy to carry through the Reformation; and a few years later (1542), Henry of Brunswick was driven from his dominions, into which his conquerors likewise introduced the Reformation. The emperor of Brandenburg, Joachim I., a decided enemy of Luther, was likewise (1535) succeeded by a Protestant son. Thus gradually the Reformation gained over to its side nearly all the secular princes of Germany, with the exception of the duchies of Bavaria and the house of Hapsburg, which found it necessary to adhere to the old faith on account of its connection with Spain, Belgium, and Italy. Several new attempts were made to effect a reconciliation of the contending parties. The Reformation Colloquy of Worms was held, and de facto, that the church was finally prevailed upon by the emperor to open (Dec. 18, 1546) the long-promised council at Trent, a city of the German empire. The emperor still adhered to the plan to force the pope into a Catholic reformation of the Church, and the Protestants into submission to the Church. Another council at Ratisbon was to lay down a basis of union to be submitted to the council, but it remained without result. At the same time, the emperor was determined to break the political power of Protestantism by annihilating the Smalkald alliance, and made amends against the Scanians, whose landgrave were declared guilty of high treason, and in the ensuing Smalkaldic war, in which duke Maurice, though himself a Protestant, fought from political motives on the side of the emperor, both princes were defeated and made prisoners. The other members of the league, with the exception of a few cities, submitted. The emperor was anxious not to give to his expedition the name of a religious war, but the pope accorded a plenary indulgence to all who would aid in the extermination of the heretics. Shortly before the beginning of the siege, the emperor was at Eisleben, where he had been invited to act as umpire between the counts of Mansfeld. In order to prevent the participation of the Protestants in the council, the pope caused the immediate condemnation of some important Protestant doctrines in the first session of that body; and to escape the reformation pressure of the emperor, he transferred the council (March, 1547), on the pretext that in Trent it was threatened by the pestilence, to Bologna, where it soon dissolved. The emperor was greatly dissatisfied, and determined to go on with his own reformatory policy for preserving the religious unity of Christendom. At his request, the conciliatory and noble-minded bishop of Naumburg, Julius von Pflugk, and the court preacher of the elector of Brandenburg, John Agricola, drew up the Augsburg Interim (1548), which was adopted by the diet, and was to serve as the standard according to which all religious questions should be decided. The Interim was intended to be valid for both Protestants and Catholics, but it really remained in force only among the former, to whom it conceded the right of election to the lower clergy, the use of the cup in the sacrament, and some indefinite constructions of particular doctrines of the Catholic Church. The Protestants submitted to the Interim with great reluctance; and even the emperor's ally, Maurice of Saxony, did not risk its unconditional introduction, and at his advice the Leipzic Interim (1548) was drawn up by Melancthon, in which the greater part of the Catholic ritual was declared to be indifferent (indulphorum), and therefore fit to be retained. It also declared that the power of the pope and of the bishops might be acknowledged so long as they agreed with the doctrine of the Church. But even this more Protestant Interim gave no satisfaction, and the fermentation continued until the new pope, Julius III, reconvened the Council of Trent for May 1, 1551. The emperor demanded that the Protestants should attend the council, but Maurice made the attendance dependent upon the condition that Protestants should receive the right of voting, that the former resolutions against the Protestants should be annulled, and that the pope himself should be subject to a general council. Melancthon elaborated the basis for the Reformation of the Church, the Concordia Saxoniae, or Deorpetio Confessamur Augustane. Protestant deputies from Württemberg, Brandenburg, Saxony, and Strassburg appeared at Trent, and Melancthon, accompanied by several theologians of Wittenberg, set out to join them. The situation of the Reformation was radically changed when Maurice concluded a secret alliance against the emperor with a number of Protestant princes and the Catholic king of France, to whom, for his assistance, the three German bishops of Metz, Toul, and Verdun were treacherously betrayed by the allies. Maurice, in a short and decisive war (1552), completely defeated the emperor, who was sick at Innsbruck, and compelled him to agree to the Treaty of Passau (July 30, 1552), which set the Januarie of Hesse at liberty (the elector of Saxony had been liberated previously), opened the imperial council to the adherents of the Reformation, promised a diet for the settlement of the religious differences, and provided a permanent peace for at least all those who sympathized with the Augsburg Confession. The continuance of the war between Germany and France during the last years of the emperor, the Estates of the Diet, Feb., 1555. Both parties in Germany had arrived at the conviction that the hope of terminating the religious controversy by means of religious colloquies or by a general council must be abandoned for the present, and that peace and order in the empire could only be maintained by mutual forbearance. After long orga-

III. Zwingli's and Calvin's Reformation in Switzerland.—Next to Germany, Switzerland became the principal source of the Reformation. But it sent forth two currents which have never fully united, though many connecting canals have been built between them, and both are now usually acknowledged as belonging to one comprehensive system, which is commonly designated as the Reformed Church. One of the movements originated in German, the other in French, Switzerland. At the height of the dispute for the doctrine of the other John Calvin. The thirteen cantons which constituted Switzerland at the beginning of the 16th century were still in nominal connection with the German empire; and the same causes, therefore, which have been referred to in our account of Germany favored the growth of the Reformation in Switzerland. Dissatisfaction with and contempt of Rome were, moreover, promoted in Switzerland by the large number of mercenaries who were employed in the military service of the popes, and who naturally brought with them a knowledge of the utter corruption prevailing in Rome, but by their own unworthy lives helped to bring Rome into disrepute. 1. Ulrich Zwingli, who gave the first impulse to the Reformation in German Switzerland [see ZWINGLI], had received his education at the universities of Vienna and Basle, and in the latter place had joined himself to a circle of enthusiastic admirers of ancient learning and of enlightened religious views who gathered around Erasmus. It was more classical education and scientific study of the Holy Scriptures than, as in the case of Luther, religious experience which made Zwingli an earnest advocate of religious reform, although, like his teacher Erasmus, he continued to hope for a reformation within the Church by the ecclesiastical authorities themselves. Such views were entertained quite generally in Switzerland; and though Zwingli in 1518 raised his voice against the effrontery of a trader in indulgences, the Franciscan monk Bernardin Sanson, he was appointed papal chaplain by the papal legate. His preaching against the corruptions prevailing in the Church had been made known at Augsburg, and he was appointed, in 1519, "Lent priest" in Zurich. The influence proceeding from Luther did not remain without effect upon him, and he began to be looked upon in Zurich as a Lutheran at heart. When he designated the rule of fasting as an ordinance of man, the Council of Zurich, in 1529, took his part against the bishop of Constance.
Zwingli's first reforming work, Von Erkiesen und Freyheit der Spuyen, which was published at this time, gave a new lease of life to the movement in Unterwalden, Luzern, Valais, Uri, and Zurich. In Zurich, in the name of the reformation party among the clergy, addressed the Diet of Lucerne and the bishop of Constance in behalf of a free preaching of the Gospel; he also demanded the abolition of priestly celibacy. In accordance with Zwingli's wish, the Council of Zurich charged all the preachers to preach the pure Gospel in the churches, and in 1526 there was held a national conference for an efficient colobarer in his reformation efforts by the appointment of Leo Judae as Lent prior at Zurich. Several events signalized at this time the steady advance of the cause. The council allowed mints to leave their convents, several of the clergy married without hindrance, a German baptismal service was introduced, and the cathedral chapter, at its own request, received new and suitable ordinances. In other cantons, especially in Lucerne, Frisboug, and Zug, a violent opposition was manifested against the Reformation, but in Zurich its success was undoubted. A national conference was held on April 26, upon images and the mass, to which all Swiss bishops and cantons were invited, but only Schaffhausen and St. Gall sent delegates. No champion for images and mass was found at the conference, and the spirit of the Reformation was reinvigorated. The reformation of the canton by diffusing the proper instruction in the country districts, for which purpose Zwingli, the abbot of Cappel, and Conrad Schmidt, commander of the knights of St. John at Kusmacht, were appointed. With the consent of the council, Zwingli published his On the Mass, which was no easy task to the people more fully the meaning of the religious Reformation. Soon new reformation measures were adopted by the council. The shrined pictures in the churches were shut up, and every priest was left free to celebrate mass or not as he chose (Dec. 1523). On Whit-Sunday, 1524, the work of removing the images from the churches was begun, and it was completed in thirty days. The abolition of many other usages followed in rapid succession; and the transformation in religious service was completed by the celebration in April 15, 14, and 16, 1525, of the Lord's supper in its original simplicity in the great minster. The publication of Zwingli's De Vera et Falsa Religione and the first part of the Zurich translation of the Bible likewise gave a favorable impulse. Be yond the Alp, and even within it in the Morat, and in some cases within the cantons of Uri and Schwyz, the Reformation was begun by the preaching of the prudent Berchtold Halbr; in Basel, Wolfgang Fabricius, Bishop of the Reformation, the Reformation continued to make progress. In the summer of 1526, the Girsons granted religious freedom; and in April, 1527, the Reformed party obtained a majority in the Council of Berne (Dec. 15, 1528), officially introduced the Reformation. Decisive measures for securing the preponderance of the Reformation were taken in 1528 by St. Gall, and in 1529 by Basle and Glarus. As the most zealous of the Catholic cantons, especially Schwyz, Uri, Unterwalden, Luzern, Valais, and Zurich, Zwingli, in the name of the reformation party among the clergy, addressed the Diet of Lucerne and the bishop of Constance in behalf of a free preaching of the Gospel; he also demanded the abolition of priestly celibacy. SECOND HELVETIC CONFESSION

The Second Helvetic Confession, the most important among the symbolic books of the Reformed Church, which was compiled by Bullinger in Zurich, published in 1566, and recognized in all Reformed countries, completed the superiority of Calvin's principles over those of Zwingli.

3. Although the majority of the German Protestant churchmen adhered to the Lutheran Reformation, a German Reformed Church which wore a moderately Calvinistic aspect sprang up in several parts of Germany. In 1560 the elector Frederick III. of the Palatinate embraced the Reformed creed, and organized the Church of his dominions according to Reformed principles. By his authority, Urrais and Olevianus composed the Heidelberg Catechism, which soon came to be regarded not only as the standard symbolic book of the German Reformed Church, but was highly esteemed throughout the Reformed world.

In Anhalt, Calvinism was introduced chiefly from attachment to Melanchthon. Thus in North Germany, introduced the Heidelberg Catechism in consequence of its relation to the house of Orange. The most important accession to the Reformed Church of Germany was that of John Sigismund, elector of Brandenburg, who on Christmas day, 1618, in the presence of the Lord's supper in the heavenly court church of Berlin according to the Calvinistic ritual. Although he tried, as all princes of these times did, to induce the people to follow his example, the overwhelming majority of the country continued to remain Lutheran. Among the free imperial cities, it was especially Bremen which adopted the Reformed creed.

IV. THE ENGLISH REFORMATION—In England the writings of Luther were warmly welcomed by many, especially by those who secretly adhered to the doctrines of Wycliffe. King Henry VIII, who was a great admirer of St. Thomas & Becket, wrote against Luther (1521) the work Declaravit Unum Deum, for which he received from the pope the title Defender Fidelit. He also wrote the emperor of Germany a letter in which he called for the extirpation of the heretics. But Lutheranism found faithful adherents even at the English universities, and an English translation of the Bible (1525) by Frith and Tyndale, members of the university of Cambridge, had a decisive effect. Soon the king fell out with the pope, because the latter refused to annul Henry's marriage with Catharine of Aragon, the niece of Louis X the Great of France (1550). The king then signed a law that his marriage with Catharine, his brother's widow, was open to objections, laid the matter, by advice of Thomas Cranmer, before the Christian universities; and when replies were received declaring the marriage with a brother's wife as null and void, the king separated from Catharine, married Anne Boleyn, and fell under the papal ban.

The English Parliament concluded the connection between England and Rome, and recognized the king as the head of the Church. Henry was desirous of obtaining the influence of the pope over the Church of England, to which, in order to preserve the continuity of its Catholic character, the clergymen were subjected to a visitation in 1555, and totally abolished in 1556; and the Bible was diffused in the mother tongue (1538) as the only source of doctrine; but the statute of 1539 imposed distinct limits upon the Reformation, and, in particular, confirmed subordination, priestly celibacy, masses for the dead, and auricular confession. A considerable number of those who refused to comply with the religious changes introduced into England were executed. A powerful party, headed by Thomas Cranmer, after 1533, Edinburgh and Canterbury, and Thomas Cromwell, after 1534 royal vicar-general for ecclesiastical affairs, exerted a strong influence in behalf of a nearer approach towards the Reformed churches of continental Europe. They met with little success during the reign of Henry, but obtained a majority in the regency which ruled England during the minority of Edward VI. Peter Martyr, Ochino, Bucer, and Fagius were called to England to aid Cranmer in carrying through the Reformation. The basis was laid in the Book of Homilies (1547), the new English liturgy (1549), the Book of Common Prayer (1549). The Articles (1552); but the labors of Cranmer were interrupted by the death of Edward VI (1553). His successor, Mary, the daughter of Henry and Catharine of Aragon, was a devoted partisan of the Church of Rome, during whose reign Cranmer and from three hundred others were burned on account of their religion. A papal nuncio appeared in England, and an obsequious parliament sanctioned the reunion with Rome; but the affections of the people were not regained, and the early death of Mary (1558) put an end to the official restoration of the Papal Church.

Queen Elizabeth, the daughter of Henry and Anne Boleyn, whose birth, in consequence of the papal decision, was regarded by the Roman Catholics as illegitimate, resumed the work of her father, and completed the English Reformation, as distinct both from Calvinism and from the Reformation of Germany and Switzerland. The Book of Common Prayer which had been adopted under Edward was so changed as to be less offensive to Catholics, and by the Act of Uniformity, June, 1559, it was made binding on the whole nation of England, and all English and all Latin Catholices conformed: of 9400 clergy, their benefices were only lost by fourteen bishops, fifteen heads of ecclesiastical corporations, fifty canons, and about eighty priests.

Matthew Parker, the former teacher of the queen, was appointed archbishop of Canterbury. The validity of his ordination, which was not sanctioned by the pope, nor made according to the Roman rite, was once disputed in numerous Catholic writings, but has also found some Catholic defenders, as Le Courayer. The Confession of Faith which had been drawn up under Edward in forty-two articles was reduced to thirty-nine articles, and in this form it was adopted by a convocation of the clergy at London in 1562, and by Parliament made, in 1571, the rule of faith for all the clergy. According to the Thirty-nine Articles, the Scriptures contain everything necessary to salvation; justification is through faith alone, but works acceptable to God are the necessary fruit of this faith; in the Lord's supper there is a communion of the body of Christ, which is spiritually received by faith; and predestination is apprehended only as it is a source of consolation. Supreme power over the Church is in the king, who reserves to himself the right to appoint bishops to the vacant sees. His power is limited by the statutes. Bishops continued to be the highest ecclesiastical officers and the first barons of the realm. Subscription to the articles was made binding only on the clergy; to the laity freedom of conscience was allowed. The adoption of the Thirty-nine Articles completed, in the main, the constitution of the Episcopal Church of England. Some parts of the Church government and the liturgy, especially the retaining of sacerdotal vestments, gave great offense to a number of zealous friends of a radical religious reformation; and owing to the numerous changes, the Church of Mary, and, while excels, has become strongly attached to the principles of strict Calvinism. They demanded a greater purity of the Church (hence their name Puritans), a simple, spiritual form of worship, a strict Church discipline, and a new and simplified form of the Thirty-nine Articles. The Act of Uniformity (1559) threatened all Nonconformists with fines and imprisonment, and their ministers with deposition and banishment. When the provisions of the act began to be enforced, a number of the Nonconformist clergy formed separate congregations in communion with presbyterianism (1561). ship, or led others to do so, should be imprisoned and sentenced, and after three months be banished; and again in 1580, they swept away all the religious Catholic and anarchic Sabbath laws to the Christian Sunday, and when Calvin's doctrines respecting predestination excited animated disputes.

A much more uncompromising opposition than that by the Puritans was made to the Established Church
by Robert Brown, who embraced (from 1580) Calvinism in its strictest form, denounced the English Church as a false Church, and demanded that, in accordance with the apostolic example, every congregation should be an independent Church. His adherents, who were variety of opinion, and were called Puritans and Congregationalists, denounced all fellowship with the Church of England, and met with great success, though Brown himself returned to the Church of England. In 1588 there were about 20,000 Independents in England: those who fled to Holland founded a number of churches there, and from Holland the Pilgrim fathers brought this branch of the English Reformation over to the New World.

The Stuarts entertained immediate opinions as to the royal authority in Church and State. James I, the son of Mary Queen of Scots, remained, in spite of the government in the Netherlands, bitter and passionately opposed to Puritanism. The Catholic element in the Established Church was greatly strengthened, and an attempt was even made to restore episcopacy in Scotland. A bond of union was, however, given to all Scottish bishops in 1600 by the declaration that the Bible was to be translated into English, with which King James's name is honorably connected. Charles I followed in the footsteps of his father, and as the bishops sided with him in his conflicts with Parliament and his endeavors to enforce the divine right of kings, the king's overthrow, which ended in his execution (1649), involved the overthrow of the supremacy of the Episcopalian Church. The Parliament summoned an assembly of divines at Westminster—the Westminster Assembly (1643-49)—and, in accordance with the proposition of this assembly, introduced a Presbyterian form of government and a Puritanic form of worship. Soon after the death of Cromwell, however, the Stuarts were recalled (1660) and the Episcopalian Church was re-established. The Test Act (1673) prohibited every one from holding any public office unless he had acknowledged the king's ecclesiastical supremacy and had received the sacrament of the Lord's supper in an Episcopal church. In consequence of the adherence of James II to the Church of Rome, there arose one more conflict between the English king and the Episcopal Established Church; but whom the English Parliament became king, the constitution of the Church was definitely settled (1689). The Church of England retained the Episcopal form of government, and Ireland was placed under the jurisdiction of the Church of England. This connection between the Established Church of England and the Established Church of Ireland remained until 1870, when the latter was disestablished and its official connection with the Church of England severed. The "Church of Ireland" then takes an independent, self-governing body; whereas the Scottish Episcopal Church, the Church of the Episcopal Church of the United States agree with the religious creed of the Church of England, but frame their Church laws with entire independence.

V. The Presbyterians of Scotland. The first knowledge of the Reformation began in continental Europe was brought to Scotland by several Scotch students of the Wittenberg. They tried to circulate Luther's writings, but found the ground not favorable to a reformation, because King James V had intimately allied himself with the clergy for the purpose of curbing the power of the nobility. Strident voices were raised against the reformation. The first victim was Patrick Hamilton (March 1, 1528), a youth of royal blood, who, while studying in Germany, had imbibed a love of the Reformation. Two more Reformers were burned in 1584; in 1589, five in Edinburgh and two in Glasgow.

Nevertheless, the adherents of the Reformation steadily increased in number, and in 1592, when the second Sectarian Assembly met, the number of the adherents of the theological leaders of the Reformation, rallied the reformatory party anew. Under the guidance of John Knox they began to advance more firmly, and to develop their ecclesiastical affairs more definitely. As both Knox and Wishart had been educated at Ossian, and were firmly addicted to the Reformed Confession,
the reformed type of the Reformation now obtained in Scotland a decided and lasting ascendancy over the Lutheran. The Reformed party allied itself with the English government, the Catholics with that of France. The latter sent to the Exiles in the Low Countries and to Stuart, to France for education, where she was subsequently married to king Francis II of France, and imibed an enthusiastic attachment to the Church of Rome.
In 1554 the fanatical dukes of Guise, the brother of the widowed queen, became king of France. The French influence was strongly used for the repression of the reformatory party, which, on the other hand, was benefited by the accession to the English throne of Mary, daughter of Henry VIII. Protection was af-
-fored to the English Protestants who had fled on account of their religion, and freedom of worship was again sec-cured by the native friends of the Reformation. John Knox, who in 1546 had had to flee from Scotland, returned in 1558 to strengthen the Reformed faith and to urge on the nobility and the people to an unceasing contest against the idolatries of Rome. Dissatisfied, however, with the feeble support which he found, Knox returned in 1556 to Geneva, in which city he received from the Scotch bishops the sentence to the stake which had been passed against him. The stirring letters which he wrote to Scotland from Geneva led (1557) to the formation of a defensive league of the Protestant nobility—the "Congregation of Christ." The accession of Elizabeth to the English throne was followed in Scotland by the adoption of new measures against the Reformation, which French troops were ordered to put through. This led to a virtual separation of the Church of Scotland, and was a breach of the Reformed party.
John Knox once more returned, the Covenant of May 31 was signed, a new alliance with England was concluded, and the widowed queen was declared as regent.
The iconoclastic devastation of Catholic churches and clo-ters began at Perth and rapidly spread over the kingdom. A civil war which ensued was concluded by the
- treaty of Edinburgh (1560), which recognised the rights of the Reformed. The Scotch Parliament, which met soon after, immediately abolished the papal jurisdiction over Scotland, and declared the Protestants to be the entirely Calvinistic Confession (Confessio Scoto-Holland). In the next year (1561) the Presbyterian Church government was set in order in the Book of Discipline. These acts of the Parliament were, however, not sanctioned by the government until 1567, after the overthrow of Mary Stuart, who, notwithstanding her fanatical zeal in behalf of Rome, had been unable since her return from France (1561) to arrest the complete victory of the Reformed party. While the theology of the Scotch Con-
-ession was strictly Calvinistic, the episcopal benetices were allowed to continue, the majority of the minority of James VI, and still more James himself, had a strong personal interest in their preservation. Melville, the successor of Knox, induced the Assembly of 1578 to adopt a strictly Presbyterian Church constitution, which admits no Church office except the four recognised by Calvin—of pastor, doctor, elder, and deacon. The sanction of this Church constitution (the Second Book of Discipline) by Parliament and the youthful king was not obtained until 1592. James was, however, perspicacious enough to find a strong adherent of an episcopal form of government. He left no means untried, especially after he had united the crown of England with that of Scotland, to force an episcopal form of government upon the Church of Scotland. Charles I went still further than his father, and gave to the Scotch a liturgy which the Presbyterians denounced as a service to Baal. The union of Scotch Presbyterians with the Puritans and Independents of England led to the overthrow of Charles I. In 1648 a new league and covenant was adopted, and in 1645 Scotland received the Westminster standards. After the execution of Charles I, the Scotch, from opposition to Cromwell, proclaimed Charles II, who signed the covenant, as king. This led, however, to a serious and lasting division among Scotch Presbyterians. Other divisions, from various causes, followed in the course of time, and ever conduced to the time (1729) Scotch Presbyterianism is split up into a large number of divisions. The Presbyterian character of the people has, however, remained unimpaired. Cromwell, who several times defeated the Scotch, did not allow the assembly to meet, but in no other respect interfered with the freedom of the Scotch Church. Charles II relapsed into the Stuart tendency to introduce Episcopalianism; but on the expulsion of the Stuarts in 1669, the Church constitution of 1592, and the Westminster Confession were definitely restored. To the adherents of an Episcopal Church an act of 1712 granted freedom of worship, and in 1792 they received the full enjoyment of civil rights.

VI. The Reformed Church of Holland—Nowhere did the Reformation find a more favorable soil than in the Netherlands, which were closely united with Germany, being both a part of the empire and of the League of the Netherlands. The people were noted for their industry and love of freedom, and were therefore inclined to an earnest opposition to every form of ecclesiastical and civil despotism. Besides, the Brethren of the Common Life, the Beghards, and other religious communities had awakened and fostered an interest in a purer, more scriptural form of Christianity, which, at the beginning of the 16th century, was far from being extinct. Therefore Luther’s writings, although they were condemned by the University of Louvain, were enthusiastically received in the flourishing cities of Dutch and Holland. As the Netherlands were the hereditary land of the emperor Charles V, he made the utmost efforts to suppress the reformed movement and the penal law which was issued at Worms in 1521 was carried out with greater earnestness in the Netherlands than in Germany. In 1529, two Augustinian monks, Henry Vos and John Ech, were executed at Brussels—the first martyrs of the Reformation. Other edicts against the Protestants followed, and with them new executions. The progress of the Reformation was, however, not checked; but, in consequence of the closer connexion of the people with the empire, it took a Reformed rather than a Lutheran type. The rigor of the persecution during the reign of Charles was somewhat mitigated by the mild disposition of the two stadholders, Margaret of Savoy, and Mary, widow queen of Hungary, the latter of whom, a sister of the emperor, was even suspected of a secret sympathy with the Reformation; and in many places the execution of the obnoxious decrees was even prevented by the outspoken personal inclinations of municipal and provincial authorities. An effort made by Charles V (1536) to establish a regular inquisition, after the pattern of the Spanish, was not successful. Philip II did not shrink from measures of the utmost cruelty to enforce submission to the laws and to the Council of Trent; but, instead of submitting, the people rallied for the defence of their religious and civil liberty. A Calvinistic conception of faith (Confessio Belgica) was in 1562 drawn up by Guido de Bres, and in 1566 it was recognized by a synod of Antwerp as a symbolical book of the Reformed churches of the Netherlands. In the latter year a defensive league, the Compromiss, was also concluded by the Protestants, which spread with great rapidity. The name of Genez (Haarlem), by which the last and most decided of the confederates, was received by the people as a title of honor, and served as a rallying-point for a great national movement towards freedom. When the stadholder Margaret of Parma felt unable to curb any longer the rising opposition, the Dutch Protestants undertook to extinguish the Reformation with fire and sword. In the southern provinces he was successful; but seven of the northern provinces formed, in 1579, the Union of Utrecht, and renounced allegiance to the king of Spain. A long and bloody war of independence followed, which terminated in the establishment of the independent Dutch Republic. In the southern provinces, which remained under the crown of Spain, the Reformation was wholly extinguished. The Dutch Republic, though only one of the smaller Protestant states of Europe, soon became the strong fortress of the Reformation by the conspicuous position it occupied in regard to literature and art, to civilization and to maritime conquest. In the inner history of the Reformed churches, the Arminian controversy [see ARMINIANISM] and the Synod of Dort, which settled the polity of the Synod of Dort led for a time, both in Holland and in the Reformed churches of several other countries, to a complete victory of strict Calvinism over a party which demanded more biblical simplicity and less rigid conformity with the system of any theologian, even if it be Calvin; but soon strict Calvinism lost more ground in Holland than in any other country. The Reformation in the Netherlands was mainly a local movement; but the situation of the country was such that influence from abroad was felt in the tragic fate of the North Dutch Church. The Reformed churches of the northern provinces separated from the latter and constituted a Free Reformed Church. The Dutch Reformed Church has planted large and flourishing offshoots in North America and several countries of South Africa, and thus contributed an important share to the ascendency which Protestantism enjoys in these regions. In Belgium, under the cruel rule of the Spaniards, but very few and small Reformed congregations were able to continue their existence. After the expulsion of Charles V, in the 19th century, the reunion of the country with Holland began an era of greater freedom and of progress, which continued after the erection of Belgium into an independent kingdom. Now Belgium has again a National Reformed Church, which is still one of the smallest Reformed national churches of Europe, but is recognized by the State, enjoys a steady progress, and the out-spoken sympathy of many of the foremost statesmen of the country.

VII. The Lutheran Reformation in the Scandinavian Kingdoms.—At the time when Luther began his reformation, Christian II ruled over all the Scandinavian countries—Denmark, Norway, Iceland, and Sweden. He was an unprincipled tyrant, who favored the Reformation in Denmark in order to strip the bishops of their political power, while in Sweden he executed a large number of Protestants under the plea that they were under the papal ban. As early as 1519 he called Martin Reinhard from Wittenberg to Copenhagen into the theological faculty, and in 1521 he issued a decree encouraging the marriage of the priests. When, in 1522, a papal delegate appeared in Denmark, Christian took his revenge on the marriage of the priests. He was, nevertheless, deposed in 1523, and among the grounds of the deposition which the estates brought forward was, that he had infected his wife with the Lutheran heresy, and introduced promoters of this same heresy into the Catholic kingdom.
Iceland had become a part of the Danish kingdom by the Calmar Union of 1397, and the decree of the Danish Diet of 1836, which declared the Evangelical Church as the State religion of Denmark, became also valid for Iceland. For several years the two bishops of the country successfully neutralized the efforts of the Danish government to enforce them. In 1839 Gifur Einnason was banished from his see. In 1842, when Gifur Einnason was in Wittenberg, became bishop of Skálholt, and began the introduction of the Reformation. His successor, Martin Einarsen, worked in the same direction, but was violently opposed by the other bishop, John Aresen, of Holar, who even took him prisoner, and had Gifur’s bones dug up and interred in an un-Christian fashion. But finally bishop Aresen was overpowered, and in 1850 executed as a rebel. This ended all opposition to the Reformation in Iceland. The entire population, as in Denmark and Norway, has ever since belonged to the Lutheran Church.

In Sweden the Reformation was hailed as a useful ally in the struggle for shaking off the yoke of Denmark and re-establishing the national independence. The bishops and higher clergy were the strongest supporters of Danish rule, and when Gustavus Vasa achieved the freedom of Sweden (1523) by the Diet of Strenigis he was looked upon by the bishops as a dangerous enemy. The king, who needed part of the immense wealth of the clergy to relieve the people of their taxes, at first endeavored to gain pope Adrian VI’s co-operation, but the pope’s council was not attained, the predominance of the Lutherans was now fully decided, and the king openly ranged himself on their side. On the death of Frederick I the bishops used the political power which had been left to them for a last attempt to put down the Reformation, but it was of no avail. The new king, Christian III, by energetic and violent measures, soon destroyed the last remnant of the old Church and completed the victory of the Reformation. Immediately after his accession to the throne, he confirmed the freedom of religion. On Aug. 20, 1526, all the bishops were imprisoned. A diet held at Copenhagen decreed that the bishops should thereafter be deprived of all secular power, and that the Church property should be confiscated, and divided among the king, the nobility, and ecclesiastical and charitable institutions. When the imprisoned bishops declared their willingness to renounce their dignities, they were restored to liberty; only Rönov, bishop of Roeskilde, refused, and died in prison. At the invitation of the king, John Bugenhagen came to Denmark, crowned (1537) the king and the queen, consecrated the archbishop, and took a leading part in the framing of a new Church constitution, which was published on Sept. 2, 1537, and sanctioned by the Diet of Odense in 1539. From that time all Denmark has firmly adhered to the Lutheran Church. For many years no other worship was allowed; and, even after the establishment of complete religious liberty in 1849, more than ninety-nine per cent. of the entire population continue to be classed as Lutherans.

On the progress of the Reformation in Norway we are but imperfectly informed. A monk Anthony, who was a missionary who preached the Gospel in Bergen. The majority of the bishops and the clergy appear to have been opposed to the Reformation, which was almost unknown until the reign of Christian III; then the Danish government began to introduce the Reformation. Olaf Egelbrechtsen, archbishop of Drammen, soon abandoned his opposition to the Danish king and fled (1537) with his treasures to the Netherlands, and resistance to the new Church constitution soon ceased. Many of the bishops and clergy, however, left their positions; though a few, such as the clergy at Orelø, preserved for a long time showed a marked preference for Catholicism. But when the people had become settled in their new belief they became strongly attached to the Lutheran Church, with which now fully ninety-nine per cent. of the population are connected.
REFORMATION

tendent of all the clergy of the kingdom, with a number of custodians and religious councillors as overseers of particular provinces. This arrangement was received with general disfavor, and led to a number of conspiracies. At the death of the king (1560) the ecclesiastical condition of the kingdom was quite undecided. The old nobility, under the leadership of Count Eric XIV, removed some more Catholic elements from the new constitution of the Swedish Church, and gave a hospitable asylum to persecuted Protestants of every creed; the orthodox Lutherans suspected him of an inclination toward the Roman Church, which, however, he did not gain any ground in Sweden. Eric's brother and successor, John III, was prevailed upon by his Catholic wife, who was a Polish princess, and by the hope of succeeding to the Polish throne, to attempt the re-establishment of a closer connection with the Church of Rome. The king was willing to recognize the supremacy of the pope, but demanded a number of concessions for the Swedish Church. The archbishop of Upsala was gained for the plan, a strongly Romanizing liturgy was introduced, but the boldness of the Jesuits incensed clergy and people against the counter-reformation, and the king finally took offense at the refusal of the pope to accept his proposition. The death of the Catholic queen and the king's second marriage with a Lutheran princess put an end to the negotiations with Rome, though the king continued to receive the new liturgy. While John was wavering between Catholicism and Protestantism, his younger brother Charles, who was regent of South Ermland, was an unyielding protector of the Reformation, and did not hesitate to incur the anger of his royal brother by offering a place of resort to the Lutheran clergy who had been expelled from the royal dominions for their unwavering character. King John was succeeded (1592) by his son Sigismund, who was already king of Poland and had been brought up a Catholic. Popular opinion by this time had undergone a great change, and the king recognized Sigismund, a guarantee of the Lutheran State Church. An ecclesiastical council at Upsala (1588), which was convened by duke Charles as regent, decreed, even before the arrival of Sigismund, the exclusion of Catholicism from Sweden, and the official authority of the Confession of Augsburg. In 1596 the Diet of Söderköping declared the Lutheran Church as the only tolerated State Church. In 1599 duke Charles was appointed administrator, and in 1604 he was elected king. The new king was somewhat inclined to Calvinism, but he confirmed the resolutions of the Augsburg Confession, which was the constitution of the Lutheran State Church, which since then has retained full control of the kingdom.

VIII. Protestantism in the Austrian States.—In the various states governed by the house of Hapsburg both the Lutheran and the Reformed Reformation spread with great rapidity. Great enthusiasm was awakened by Luther's Reformation in Bohemia, where deep-rooted opposition to Rome still pervaded the masses of the people. Both the Bohemian Brethren and the Calixtines entered into communion with the German Reformer. Though a full union between Luther and the Brethren, who had never returned to the communion with Rome, was not effected, there was a mutual recognition as evangelical Christians; and the Brethren, whose number now increased again rapidly, and who in 1535 banded in their confession of faith to Ferdinand, helped to strengthen the reformationist body in Europe. Among the Calixtines, so large a number adopted the doctrines of Luther that an assembly of the Estates in 1524 declared in favor of a continuation of the reformation begun by Huss in the way just followed in Luther. At the time of the Smalkald war, a majority of the Bohemians were attached to the Reformation; the Estates denied to king Ferdinand the aid of their troops, and united with the elector. When they had finally to submit, the king gave orders that in future only Catholics and Utraquists should be tolerated in the royal domains, and a large number of the Brethren deemed it best to emigrate to Poland and Russia. In the last years of his life Ferdinand showed a greater moderation towards Protestants, and his son Maximilian II was even, by Protestants as well as Catholics, regarded as a secret friend of the Reformation; but he was unable to prevent the persecutions instigated by the Jesuits. In 1575 the Calixtines and Brethren united and presented a common confession of faith, and received from Maximilian an oral pledge of recognition. In 1609 the king was forced to give a more formal promise to the elector of Saxony, that he would grant his equal rights with the Catholics; but practically the persecutions continued. When the Estates of Bohemia refused to recognize Ferdinand as their king, and elected the Protestant elector of the Palatinate, Frederick V, the Thirty Years' War broke out, in the course of which appeared the fatal decree of 1627, that left to the people only the alternative of becoming Catholics or leaving the country. Notwithstanding the rigorous persecution, which lasted for more than a hundred years, several thousand Protestants maintained themselves secretly in the Lower Austrian and Moravian provinces, and the Moravians and Bohemian Protestants numbered sixty per cent. of the Moravians and ninety-five per cent. of the Moravians and Bohemians were connected with the Church of Rome.

In the southern provinces of Austria the Reformation was generally refused to the elector, and the Lutherans read their writings were eagerly read in Vienna as early as 1520. In 1528 more than one third of the nobility of the archduchy of Austria were evangelical. The Estates demanded freedom of religion in 1542 at Innsbruck, in 1548 at Augsburg, and in 1566 at Vienna, and bishop Naunz, of Vienna, intended to resign because the government tolerated the appointment of Lutheran professors at the University of Vienna. Under Maximilian the Estates called the Lutheran theologian David Chytryus to Vienna to compile a Book of Religion and a Church Agenda, and to establish a Lutheran university. Lower Austria was at once almost wholly won over to Protestantism; but the numerous and bitter doctrinal controversies of the Protestants made it easy for the Jesuits to enforce a counter-reformation. Gradually stringent laws demanded here, as in Bohemia, either a return to the Catholic religion or emigration; but how generally the people continued to be secretly attached to Protestantism became apparent when the victorious Hungarians and Transylvanians compelled the government, in 1596, to promise religious toleration. Whole towns were forced to renounce Protestantism, and in 1610 the emperor Matthias had to recognize the equal rights of the churches. The reviving hopes of Protestantism were, however, cruelly destroyed by the Thirty Years' War, which led to the utter extinction of the Protestant congregations. In Austria, and as in all other countries, the Reformers paid a special attention to the promotion of education; and for the ignorant South Slavic tribes in particular, where Primus Truber displayed a remarkable literary and reformationary activity, he was known as the father of Slavic literature. With the suppression of the Reformation, the Slavs relapsed into the utmost ignorance, from which only now an efficient system of State education is gradually extricating them. In thoroughly Protestant Germany the government in 1601 had passed a law condemning the translation of Latin to Slavonic, and declared it illegal to teach Latin in Moravia, Lower Austria, and Carinthia, and in Silesia. The number of Hungarian students at Wittenberg at the time when Luther began his reformation was so great that his reformationary views became at once widely known in Hungary, and found many friends. As early as 1516 several adherents of the Reformation were burned. The diet of 1529 passed a decree that all Lutherans and their patrons should be seized and burned. But the number of Protestants was already considerable: in Hermannstadt they had in 1523 the upper-hand; a new bloody law passed in 1524 remained ineffective, and the number of Protestants increased during this period. The reformation in Transylvania—issued laws of persecution, they were unable to carry them out. The number of influential preachers rapidly increased. As the first preacher, Thomas Preussner, of Kásmsk (about 1520) is mentioned, among the most distinguished were Matthias Devay (called Lutherus Ungaricus), Leonhard Stöckel, who drew up the Confesio Pentapostolica, which the free cities of Upper Hungary in 1549 presented to the king, and John Hunter, who had studied in Basle and worked in his native city, Kromstadt, as a preacher and at a printing-press. In 1529 Hermannstadt expelled all priests and monks, and Kromstadt soon followed this example. The episcopal see which became vacant after the battle of Mohacs were partly not filled, and partly came into the hands of friends of the Reformation. Several bishops, including that of Kempten, and Andrew Duthith, who had attended the Council of Trent, openly became Protestants; and even the primates of Gran, Nicholas Olah, approved Stöckel's Confession of Faith. The widow of king Louis II, to whom Luther wrote a letter and dedicated his translation of the Psalms, appointed an evangelical court preacher. Neither Ferdinand, who by the peace of 1536 was confirmed in the possession of the throne, nor John of Zapolya, who was to retain during his lifetime the royal title, Transylvania, and a portion of Upper Hungary, regarded the cities of Dunauerring and Transylvania as objects of special care. But it is clear that the Reformation had been strengthened in Transylvania by the efforts of the Protestants. The widow of John, Isabella, who, after John's death, endeavored to retain her husband's possessions, with the aid of the Turks, for her son John Sigismund, favored the Protestants; and in that part of the country which was subject to the Turks the Reformation advanced without any obstruction. Thus the Reformation obtained a decided ascendency in all Hungary and Transylvania. At one time only three families of magnates were Catholic; the archbishop's see of Gran remained vacant for twenty years; the whole Szeben line of the Turks was now set in its place. In the period of Medvecs (1544), adopted the Confessio Augsburg, which for a long time remained a bond of union for all the Protestants of Hungary and Transylvania. Among the Magyars, however, Calvinism finally obtained the ascendancy, and in 1566 all the Hungarian Reformed churches united to the Helvetian Confession. In Transylvania, in 1564, a Lutheran superintendent was appointed for the Saxons, and a Reformed for Magyars and Szeklers. In 1571 religious freedom was also extended to the Unitarians; and from this time Transylvania has always had far more religious freedom recognized by the State (religious recepta). In Hungary the Jesuits succeeded in arresting the further progress of Protestantism, and in instigating new and bloody persecutions. Repeatedly the Protestant princes of Transylvania, aided by the Hungarian Protestants, compelled the kings by force of arms to confirm anew the religious freedom of Protestantism; but each time these promises were immediately broken. In 1534 the majority of the Hungarian Diet had again become Catholic, and from that time persecutions naturally became all the more oppressive. Throughout Hungary the Protestants maintained themselves; they constitute at present only a minority of the population—about twenty-three per cent. in Hungary proper, and twenty-four per cent. in Transylvania.

X. Protestantism in Poland, Prussia, and Lithuania—Towards the close of the Middle Ages the kings of Poland showed a firmer attachment to the Papal See than any other government of Europe. As, however, the powerful nobles were almost independent of the king, those of them who favored a religious reformation were able to give an asylum to many persecuted heretics during the first years of the Reformation. The Hussite movement excited a great deal of sympathy, and a Polish translation of the Bible came into wide circulation. Luther's doctrines were favorably received by a large portion of the Polish nobility, which at that time was distinguished for its scholarship, and especially by the large German commercial cities of Polish Prussia. In the neighboring grand-mastership of Prussia, the domain of the Teutonic Order, the grand master Albert of Brandenburg called himself in 1523 two Lutheran preachers to Königsberg. The two bishops, and soon the grand master himself, confessed the Reformation, and in 1525 Albert took the duchy of Prussia in fief from Poland. The Reformation was soon generally accepted.

The success of the Reformation in Livonia was equally rapid, notwithstanding the determined opposition of the archbishop of Riga. The city of Riga took the lead, and in 1538 joined the League of Smolkaid. Nearly all the population soon followed. The grand master Conrad Kettler followed the example of Brandenburg, and in 1561 assumed the title of duke of Courland and Semigallia, and to the throne of Livonia in 1572. The Reformation in Livonia was liked by the Polish Czars, and in 1572 the Council of Trent confirmed the Reformation in Lithuania. The two bishops, and soon the grand master himself, confessed the Reformation, and in 1525 Albert took the duchy of Prussia in fief from Poland. The Reformation was soon generally accepted.

The success of the Reformation in these two fiefs encouraged its friends in Poland proper. King Sigismund, who died in 1548, was opposed to Protestantism, but unable to arrest its progress. His son, Sigismund Augustus, favored the Reformation, entered into negotiations with Calvin, and granted religious liberty to the cities of Danzig, Thorn, and Glogau, one of the Polish fiefs; that part of Livonia which was situated on the other side of the Dvina was united by a special treaty with Poland on condition that it should be permitted to profess the Confession of Augsburg.

mation of the Church had, however, organized societies in Rome, Venice, and other cities, and the writings of the German and Swiss Reformers met therefore with a great deal of sympathy in all parts of Italy. One party of Italian reformers, which counted among its members several cardinals, like Contarini and Carafa, was adverse to a separation from the Church, and hoped for an evangelical regeneration of the old Church. Another party came out in favor of a thorough reformation, first in Ferrara (under the protection of the duchess Renata, a French princess), then in Modena and many other cities. A prominent centre of reformatory movements was subsequently in the city of Naples, where the Spanish nobleman Juan Vázquez displayed a remarkable activity, and where two of the greatest preachers of Italy—Bernardino Ochino, the general of the Capuchinos, and the learned Augustinian Peter Martyr Vermigli—were gained for the Reformation. Translations of the principal writings of German and Swiss Reformers, mostly under assumed names, found a wide circulation, and the Italian reformers themselves published a large number of writings, the most celebrated of which is the work entitled On the Benefits of Christ. Under Paul III the evangelical Catholics, like Contarini and his friends, had for a time a leading influence upon the government of the Church; but in 1542 a decided reaction began when the pope, by the advice of cardinal Caraffa, who had for many years been a friend of Contarini, approved an impartial solution for the suppression of Protestantism. Many of the leading friends of the Reformation fled to foreign countries; among them Ochino, Vermigli, Verggero (bishop of Capo d'Istria), and Caraccioli, a nephew of cardinal Caraffa. When Caraffa became pope, under the name of Paul IV, the persecution extended also to the Catholics of evangelical sentiments, including a number of cardinals and bishops. Under Paul V an Index Libro-rum Prohibitorum led to the suppression of all literature friendly to Protestantism. In Spain, as in Italy, the Jesuits, who had been divided into two parties, a Jesuit and a Carthusian, with a prevailing inclination to the latter; and Anti-Trinitarian followers of Servetus had likewise become numerous, although they had to keep their opinions secret. The division of the Protestants weakened their power of resistance, and before the end of the century the Inquisition had destroyed all vestiges of Protestant communities. Among the distinc-guished martyrs of the Reformation were Carcecechi and Palaeus; two Waldensian congregations in Calabria, the first, and perhaps the last, for a time, to give up to a terrible gauntlet. In 1570, however, the king, chiefly through the influence of cardinal Tournon, ceased to manifest any sympathy with the cause of the Reformation. With it the connection of Frenchmen with the Lutheran Reformation seems to have come to an end, until, at a later period, the conquest of German territories gage to France a considerable number of Lutheran congregations.

The friends whom bishop Briçonnet had called to Meaux to assist him in his reformatory work remained mostly, like himself, within the old Church, contending themselves with the articles of doctrine and discipline among Catholics. Leftvire (Faber Stupendialis), after having fled to Strasbourg on account of the charges of heresy brought against him, was recalled by Francis I appointed librarian at Blois, where he translated the Old Testament, and spent the end of his life at the court of Margaret of Navarre. Etoulard Rousset, with whom Leftvire had Strasbourg, became subsequently bishop of Oloron, where he introduced important reforms, but never ceased to be suspected of heresy. Even Margaret of Navarre, the zealous patron of all friends of the Reformation, demanded the Reformed, under Frédéronnet, took on the state according to evangelical principles, never regarded it necessary to separate externally from the Catholic Church. Her course was disapproved by Calvin, but her work was continued by her daughter Jeanne d'Al-

be subdivided into a number of minor sects, and in many of them, at times, the old doctrinal platforms of the founders of the Reformers appeared to have been abandoned, leaving nothing but the name of the Church as a bond of communion with the denomination of the 16th century. The very name, however, has contributed to the maintenance of consciousness of a live connection with the great movement of the 16th century, thus proved elements of great conservative force, and have been largely instrumental in keeping the territory which the three great branches of the Reformation conquered in the 16th century undiminished up to the present day. While it has been the prevailing tendency in the history of the subdivisions to develop independent life-organisms illustrating the vitality of the principles and theories which led to their separate existence, attempts have never been wanting to strengthen the bonds of union connecting them.

Many subdivisions which had been formed in consequence of disagreeing views on particular points of belief or church government had been reunited on the basis of the points common to all, allowing the right to disagree on points of minor importance. In modern times, attempts have even been made to find a permanent bond of union for all the subdivisions of the large groups of the Protestant churches. Thus, all the bishops of the churches in doctrinal conformity with the History of the Church of England, the Episcopal Church, and the Pan-Anglican councils. All the Reformed and Presbyterian churches met in 1877 for the first time in a Pan-presbyterian Council in Edinburgh. The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church took, in 1876, the first step towards the convocation of an Ecumenical Council of Methodists.

While the large majority of the millions which in the 16th century rose up against and separated from the Church of Rome rallied around three large centres, it was but natural that many in the search of a pure form of Christianity, around the claims of St. German, and several fortresses as a guarantee of the peace; but two years later (1572), St. Bartholomew's Eve was the beginning of the most terrible ordeal through which they passed in their entire history, more than 30,000 of being massacred during one month. King Henry III was driven by the arrogance of the Guises into the ranks of the Huguenots, and was soon assassinated by the Dominican Clement. Then the first Protestant, Henry of Navarre, ascended the French throne. To save the Protestant cause in the Church, he carried out the great principle, he asserted the rights of the Reformation of the 16th century to the best of their understanding, and to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience. About the middle of the present century (1845), an attempt was made to unite in one association, called the Evangelical Alliance, Christians belonging to all denominations collectively called evangelical, and to represent, on a larger scale than had ever been attempted before, the unity of all these churches in the more important articles of faith, notwithstanding their separation by external organizations. A list of these articles was drawn up, to which it was thought, all Christians wishing to be regarded as evangelical might be expected to assent. In the list of these articles were included the inspiration of the Bible, the Trinity, the utter depravity of human nature, justification by faith alone, the eternal blessedness of the righteous and the eternal punishment of the wicked, the divine institution of the Christian ministry. According to this programme, it could and did become a rallying-point for Lutherans, Reformed, and Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, Baptists, Moravians, the evangelical or Low-Church party of Anglican churches, and a number of minor denominations. It was objected to by the so-called high and strict Church parties among Anglicans and Lutherans, by Unitarians and Universalists, by the Friends, by the Anti-Trinitarians, and by all the anti-Trinitarian and the Reformed churches. The subdivisions have again
FORMATION.—The parties which withdrew from the Church of Rome in the 16th century and tried to restore a purer form of Christianity took different roads and arrived at different conclusions; yet there was one point on which they all agreed, and which may be declared to be preeminently the central principle of the Reformation—this was the absolute authority of the Holy Scriptures. Every Reformed Church charged the Church of Rome with holding doctrines and usages which the former deemed antisciriptural, and which on that ground it rejected. The three large divisions of the Reformation were all more intent upon eliminating from the creed of Christendom what could be proved to be anti-scriiptural than to undertake the revision of every article of the creed by a scriptural test exclusively. Thus they all retained what the early councils had defined on the essence of the Godhead and the person of Christ. Gradually other parties arose which demanded a greater prominence for the necessity of the scriptural affirmative proof, and that not too great a stress should be laid upon the testimony of the early Church. Hence many doctrines which the great Reformed churches of the 16th century agreed in continuing in their creeds were by other Christian inquirers declared to lack the foundation of a clear scriptural proof, and on that ground either rejected or held as insufficient by which Bibles Christians had a right to disagree. All these parties, however, held fast to the fundamental principle that the Bible was the supreme authority for the believer in Christ. Other sects and parties have made a distinction between the written Word of God and the Word of Christ, and placed the latter above the former; others, again, have found a hidden sense in the Bible besides the literal; yet all these parties concur in recognising the central principle of the Reformation. A total change of the basis of the Reformation was attempted by the Rationalists of the 18th and 19th centuries, who, wanted to have the Bible regarded and interpreted as any other book, recognising what appeared to agree with sound reason, and claiming the right to reject all the remainder. The divergence between this view and the central principle of the Reformation is so apparent and so radical that the long-continued coexistence of both views in many of the European State churches can only be explained from the fact that the churches were enslaved by the State, and treated not as forms of religion, but as a division of the State administration. The introduction of self-government into the churches rapidly leads to this separation towards the complete separation between the Rationalistic and the Biblical conception of Christianity.

Theologians have sometimes called this principle the formal principle of the Reformation, or the principium conditionale, which, distinguished from it the material principle, or principium essendi, which proclaims the justification of the sinner by faith alone. Both are intimately connected. When the Church is no longer viewed as the infallible teacher of the true Christian doctrine, but the inquirer after Christian truth is pointed to the Bible and to Christ himself, the soul's salvation can only be found in a direct relation between Christ and the Christian soul. The doctrine occupies, however, a somewhat different position in the doctrinal systems of different Protestant churches. See JUSTIFICATION.

XIII. The Reformations Place in the History of the Christian Church and in the History of the World.—It is agreed on all sides, and not even denied by the Catholics, that the Reformation is one of the great turning-points in the Christian Church, and that with it begins an entirely new era. The compulsory uniformity of the Church was forever at an end. Church history, henceforth, has not to deal only with one predominant and all-powerful Church, but with a number of rival churches, the number of which has steadily increased. For a time, the leading reformatory churches in close alliance with the governments of the countries in which they prevailed endeavored likewise to enforce conformity with their doctrines and laws; but this course was gradually recognised to be untenable, and religious toleration, and subsequently the freedom of religious confession, has become one of the characteristic features of the Reformation principle in which all agreed up to the present day to brand the principle of religious liberality as a heresy of modern times; but it is a notable fact that nearly all the Catholic countries which nominally continue to adhere to the doctrine of the Churchdieted legislation which their Church declares to be the Christian principle, and have introduced Protestant principles of religious freedom into their legislation.

In universal history, the Reformation is by all historians designated as one of the great movements which mark the transition from the Middle Ages to modern times. The characteristic feature of the countries which adopted the Reformation is the progress towards political freedom, and the separation between Church and State. The Catholic Church in the Middle Ages claimed a far-reaching influence upon civil legislation. It claimed the sole right of legislating on marriage affairs, exempted priests and monks from civil jurisdiction, and accumulated within its hand a very large proportion of the nation's wealth. Though the Reformed State churches pursued different courses in reforming the civil codes, the tendency to make all citizens equal before the law can be traced in all of them. Although the Catholic Church still has a larger membership than all the Reformed churches combined, the power and the commanding influence upon the destinies of mankind are more and more passing into the hands of states which have separated Church and State, and which are separate from Rome. In the New World, the ascendency of the United States and British America, in both of which Protestantism prevails, over the states of Spanish and Portuguese America is not disputed even by Catholics. In Europe, England has become the greatest world-power, and in its wide dominions new great Protestant countries are springing into existence, especially in Australia and South Africa. In Germany, the supreme power has passed from the declining Catholic house of Hapsburg to the Protestant house of Hohenzollerns, and the new Protestant German Empire marks an addition of the greatest importance to the aggregate power of the Protestant world. The combined influence of the three great Teutonic peoples—the United States, Great Britain, and Germany—continues to be cast in a steadily increasing ratio for the defence of that freedom from the disturbance of religious church and state which the Reformation set up. That freedom is now not only fully secured against any possible combination of Catholic states, but the parliaments of most of the latter, as France, Italy, Austria, Portugal, are as eager in the defence of this freedom as the Protestant states. The existence of about 560 years, the Reformation has totally annihilated the influence of Rome upon the laws and the government of the civilized world.

XIV. Literature.—A great many works which are sources for the history of the Reformation have been mentioned in the articles on the Reformers and on particular churches. The following list contains works which more specially treat of the history of the Reformations:

REFORMATION, FESTIVAL OF THE. This is an annual commemoration in Germany of the great event of the 16th century. It is held on Oct. 31, to remind of the opening of the Reformation by the nailing of the ninety-five theses on the church doors at Wittenberg (Oct. 31, 1517). It is first celebrated as a secular feast, and on the following Sabbath as an ecclesiastical commemoration.

REFORMATION RIGHTS (justa reformandi) are the privileges granted to the different princes of the Reformation compact at the Augsburg Interim in 1555 to introduce into their states either the Catholic or Protestant faith, and to maintain it as the faith of the people. The peace of Westphalia, in 1648, brought in modifications, but modern events have made so many changes in the rights of the Reformed Church that it is only in name. At present it is religious liberty which each state concedes to its subjects, and the only question remaining is whether Church and State shall have any interdependence. See State.

Reformed Baptists. See Campbellites.

Reformed Churches, the name usually given to all the churches of the Reformation. In a conventional sense, it is used to designate those Protestant churches in which the Calvinistic doctrines, and still more the Calvinistic polity, prevail, in contradistinction to the Lutheran (q. v.). The influence of Calvin proved more powerful than that of Zwingli, which, however, no doubt considerably modified the views prevalent in many of these churches. The Reformed churches are very generally known on the continent of Europe as the Calvinistic churches, while the name Protestant Church is in some countries almost equivalent to that of Lutheran. One chief distinction of all the Reformed churches is their doctrine of the sacrament of the Lord's supper, characterized by the utter rejection not only of transubstantiation, but of consubstantiation; and it was on this point mainly that the controversy between the Lutherans and the Reformed was long carried. The doctrine of the Lord's Supper is also one of the important reasons for their rejection of the use of images and of many ceremonies which the Lutherans have thought it proper to retain. Among the Reformed churches are those both of England and Scotland (notwithstanding the Episcopalian government of the former and the Presbyterianism of the latter), the Protestant Church of France, that of Holland and the Netherlands, many German churches, the once flourishing Protestant Church of Poland, etc., with those in America and elsewhere which have sprung from them. See Protestantism; Reformation.

Reformed (Dutch) Church in America, one of the oldest and most influential bodies of Christians in this country.

1. Name.—The former title of this denomination indicated its historical relations, "the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church in North America." It is "Reformed" as to Lutheranism; "Protestant," as professing against Rome; "Dutch," as expressing its origin in Holland. In 1687, by an almost unanimous vote of its General Synod, with the concurrence of the great majority of the classes, the name of the Church was restored to its original and original form—the Reformed Church. The history and reasons of this change are fully presented in an elaborate report, which is appended to the minutes of the General Synod of 1867. The word "Dutch" was originally introduced to distinguish the Church from the "English" Church, by which the Episcopalian denomination was generally known, in the State of New York, after the Dutch government had surrendered to the British in 1664. The Hollanders who settled New York and Albany, and intermediate places, came over as members of the "Reformed Church of the Netherlands" and representatives of the Reformed Religion. It was not until thirty years after the cession of the province to the British that the word "Dutch" was incorporated in the style and title of a single Church when William III of England gave a charter to the Netherlands Reformed Congregation in the city of New York as the "Reformed Protestant Dutch Church." In resuming its original title, the Church has lost none of its historical associations, and has only dropped what had long been regarded by many as a hindrance to her advancement.

II. Reformed Church in Holland.—The Reformed Church of the Netherlands was a legitimate outgrowth from the great Reformation of the 16th century. The conflict for civil and religious liberty in the Low Countries was preceded by the labors of those "Reformers before the Reformation," Wessel Gaasewoort and Rudolph Agricola. Both of these illustrious men were nates of Groningen. They were students of the Bible, who, fifty years before Martin Luther, came to a clear knowledge of the great doctrines of the faith with which he shook the world. But it was not until many years after he had taken his positon that he saw the writings of Gaasewoort, and then he felt constrained to make the fact public, lest his enemies should use their agreement of views to his own disadvantage. Gaasewoort was an eminent teacher at Heidelberg, Louvain, Paris, Rome, and at last, as he made a celebrated conversion, it is his native country where he was born and died in 1489. Agricola was professor in the University of Heidelberg, and was noted for his classical and scientific attainments, and especially for his skill in the use of the Greek New Testament. The labors of these great and good men mightly prepared the way for the civil and religious conflict which followed under Charles V and his son Philip II of Spain. Evangelical truth struck its roots deep down into the hearts of the people. Confessors and martyrs for Christ were never wanting for the persecutions of the government and the Inquisition. The people called themselves the "Churches of the Netherlands under the Cross." They worshipped privately for many years, in scattered little assemblies, until they crystallized into a regular ecclesiastical organization. The ban of the empire and the curse of the Roman Church could not deaden the rising spirit of the heroic believers in Christ and liberty. Every new act of tyranny fanned the sacred flame. Popular field-preachers, like Herman Strijker and Jan Arentzen, gathered thousands of people beneath the open sky to listen to their powerful eloquence. The whole country was stirred to its depths. The synods of Beza and Clement Marot, translated from the French, rang out the pious enthusiasm of the multitudes. Babes were brought for baptism, and alms were collected for the poor. At length three pastors were set apart to the ministry of the Church in Amsterdam, deacons and deaconesses were appointed to distribute alms to the needy saints, and churches were organized. In 1563 the Synod of Antwerp was held, which adopted the Beligic Confession, and laid the foundations of that noble Church to which subsequent synods only gave more form and emphasis. The church schools and universities, her pure faith and holy living, her active zeal and martyr spirit, gave the Reformed Church of Holland the leading position among the sister churches of the Continent. Her catholic feeling and religious life reached not only the Reformed churches of other lands. The Waldenses and the Huguenots, the Scotch Covenanters and the English Puritans, found a welcome at her altars; and John Robinson and the voyagers of the Mayflower learned in Holland some of the ordinances which they brought with them to Plymouth Rock.

111. History of the Reformed Church in America.—1. Origin.—The Reformed Church in America was founded by emigrants from Holland, who formed the colony of the New Netherland, and by the authorship of the State-Governor, and after the auspices of the Dutch East India Company. Hendrick Hudson arrived in New York harbor Sept. 11, 1609, in the Half Moon, and proceeded as far as Fort Orange (now Albany). Trading-posts were established there and on Manhattan Island (New York) in 1624. The emigrants came for trade, but they did not neglect religion and the public worship of God. They had no ordained minister and no organized Church for several years; but two "kraan-besoeckers," or "zieken-troosters"—literally "comforters of the sick," pious persons who were often commissioned as aids to the ministers of the Gospel in the mother-country—came over with governor Minuit in 1626. These were Jansen Krol and Jan Huyck. They met the people on Sundays in an upper room above a horse-mill, and read the Scriptures and the creeds to them. This was the beginning of public worship in the New Netherland. There is evidence, however, that "a considerable Church was organized in that city as early as 1619," and that "a list of members in full communion of the Church of New York is still extant, dated 1622." (Life of Dr. John Flavel, page 79, note.)

The first minister of the Gospel who came to this country from Holland was the Rev. Jonas Michaelis, a graduate of the University of Leyden, and afterwards a missionary in San Salvador and Guinea. He preached in New Amsterdam from 1628 to 1633, and then returned to Holland. See MICHAELIS. In the spring of the same year his successor, the Rev. Everardus Bogardus, arrived, bringing with him the first schoolmaster, Adam Roelandsen, who organized the parochial school of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church. This school is still in existence, without a break in its succession of nearly two hundred and fifty years. It is sustained by the Collegiate Church, and has always been "an instrument of much good to the Church and to the community." A history of it has been published in a small volume by its present principal, Mr. Dunham, in a collection of sermons and addresses of the school, which bears the name of the Rev. Jonas Michaelis. The school is characterized by the early Reformed churches, and it antedates the claim of priority made by the New England Puritans by several years. The upper room in Francis Molemaker's horse-mill was reincorporated into the first schoolhouse, and the school was founded by John Loeve. The Rev. Jonas Michaelis, in 1683, and a plain, frail wooden church building and a parsonage were erected near what is now Old Slip, on the East River. In 1642, at the suggestion of the famous navigator David Petersen de Vries, funds were raised for the erection of a stone edifice within the fort (now the Battery), where the people worshipped until the church was finished in Garden Street in 1699. A church was planted in the colony of Renellensweck (Albany) under the patronage of Killian van Rensselaer, a pearl-merchant from Amsterdam, who founded a colony upon the large tract of land of which he was the first patron. In 1642 he secured the services of the Rev. Johannes Megapolensis, whose call states that "by the state of navigation in the East and West Indies a door is opened through the special providence of God, and in the name of the Gospel of Jesus Christ for the salvation of men, as good fruits have been already witnessed there through God's mercy." He was also the first Protestant missionary to the Indians in this country, preceding the labors of John Eliot near Boston by three or four years. See MEGAPOLENSIS. His successors Dillius and Lydius did the same good work.

2. First Period.—"The Dutch rule in Manhattan lasted fifty years from the establishment of the first trading-station. The Church had been organized about thirty years. The city of New Amsterdam, at the date of the surrender of 1664, contained only 1500 inhabitants; there were but five Reformed churches in the whole province—New York, Albany, Flushing and Flatlands, Esopus (or Kingston), and Breuckelen (Brooklyn). There were six ministers—the two Megapolenses, Drius, Schell, and Polyhend, and Bishop. They were men of thorough education, and, as far as we can learn, diligent in the ministry. There were also a church at Bergen, which was the first of any denomination in New Jersey, organized in 1660, and one at New Amstel, Del., which subsequently dropped out of the connection. The Holllanders numbered about 10,000 souls. This first period of the Church was necessary one of very small beginnings. The churches were planted in the wilderness. They encountered all the difficulties of new colonies—surrounded by savage tribes, separated by long distances from each other, and dependent entirely upon Holland for their clergy and school-teachers. Civil affairs were sometimes unhappily mixed up with religious interests, and the growth was slow indeed.

3. The second period covers nearly three quarters of a century (1672 to 1757), during which about sixty churches were added to the denomination. Of these fourteen were in New Jersey, about twenty on the banks of the Hudson River, about half as many in the valleys of Schoharie, Orange, and Ulster, and a half-dozen on the west side of the long island, Long Island, and Staten Island. The first church established in New Jersey began their labors, some of them only remaining a short time, among these churches; and at the close of the period there were sixty churches, and seventeen ministers of Hollandish extraction in America. When the English rule began in New York, emigration from Holland almost ceased. Frequent collisions occurred with the British governors of the province. Governor Andros sent a minister of the Church of England [see VAN RYSELJERK, NICHAU] to Albany to take possession of the Dutch church there; and Governor Fletcher, failing to impose the use of the English language by law upon the Hollanders, procured the passage of a bill by the Assembly settling a maintenance for ministers, which was so worded that, while it might apply to dissenters, it practically subserved the Church of England, and made it substantially the Established Church in the colony. New York, Kings, and Westchester. Church-rates were exacted by the government for the support of these episcopalian ministers. The line of separation between the Dutch and English gradually became more distinct. Many of the Hollanders, through fear of these new regulations, turned to New Jersey, and settled principally in Middlesex, Somerthey would adhere to the Heidelberg Catechism, the Palatinate Confession of Faith, the Canons of the Synod of Dort, and the Rules of Church Government of Dort. The Reformed Church in America was formed by the direction and under the jurisdiction of the Synod of Holland, which charged the Classis of Amsterdam with the supervision of the affairs of the German Church in America, which then extended among the German settlements in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, the Carolinas, New Jersey, and New York.

This relation subsisted forty-six years, until 1739, when the cedus asserted its independence of the Church in Holland. See German Reformed Church in America. In Schuyler and Columbia counties, and in the valley of the Mohawk, the German and Dutch elements have, to a great degree, united in the Reformed churches.

4. The third period in this history dates from the first effort of the Dutch churches to secure an independent organization—1737 to 1792. Their entire dependence upon the Church in Holland for ministers, their growth in numbers and their distance from the mother country, the necessities of a new country, and the lack of facilities for educating their clergy, the delays, expense, and anxieties occasioned by the necessity of sending their ministers to Holland for theological instruction, and other good reasons growing out of their position and the ecclesiastical restrictions of the Classis of Amsterdam, led to the organization of a cedus, or ecclesiastical association, in New York in 1737. A plan was carefully framed, submitted to the churches, and sent to Holland for approval by the classis. This plan embraced a yearly meeting of clerical and lay delegates for the transaction of ecclesiastical business only, to promote the welfare of the churches, and in entire secession from the Classis of Amsterdam. A committee was appointed to pass upon it, and they passed it before that body gave its sanction. The first meeting of the cedus was held in September, 1747, and the first German cedus in the same month.

The powers of this body were too limited to make it effective. It had no authority to ordain any man to the ministry without special permission, nor to decide finally upon any question. But these restrictions only roused the spirit of independence in the younger ministry, and generated the powerful opposition of the adherents of the policy of the mother Church. In 1753, measures were taken for forming an American Classis, which was organized in 1755. This event caused the withdrawal of the conservatives, who were thereafter known as the "Confessent," the Dutch word for the Latin cedus. From this time until 1771 the conflict between these parties rent the Church asunder. The Classis of Amsterdam, which had hitherto been the only recognized ecclesiastical authority, was divided, and the cedus was formed as a rival body.

5. Causes of Slow Growth.—It has often been a matter of surprise to persons unacquainted with these and other facts that the introduction of Protestantism in this country has been of such slow growth. The reasons are self-evident. The Dutch rule in New Amsterdam lasted only about thirty years; and when it ceased, the population of the city was but 1500. The English Episcopal Church rose almost to the power of a state establishment. "The Presbyterians of Ireland and Scotland, for a hundred and twenty-five years, were practically excluded by the continued use of the Dutch language from the Church assemblies of the Reformed, and they established their own churches not until the latter part of the 17th century before an English word was heard in a Dutch church." The introduction of English preaching by the Rev. Dr. Laidlie, who was called by the Church of New York for this purpose, was the result of a long strife, and the commencement of a longer struggle against the use of this restrictive tongue. The dependence of the American church upon the Church in Holland for more than a hundred and fifty years also produced its natural results.
neither publicly nor privately propose, teach, or defend the same, either by preaching or writing, until they have first revealed such sentiments to the consistory, classis, or synod, that the same may be there examined; being always ready cheerfully to submit to the judgment of the consistory, classis, or synod, under the penalty of refusal, ipso facto suspended from office." Other provisions, however, guard the rights of conscience and of individual judgment against any harsh or unjust treatment.

Ministers are regarded as bound to the service of the sanctuary for life, and are not at liberty to secularize themselves "except for great and important reasons concerning which the classis shall inquire and determine." Supernumerated and disabled ministers may be declared emeriti, and be excused from all further service in the Church during such infirmity. In the case of pastors thus incapacitated and retired, congregations are required to provide a reasonable support, with the approval of the classis.

The parity of the ministry is effectually secured by the following article of the constitution: "All ministers of the Church are equal in rank and authority. All are bishops or overseers in the Church, and equal stewards of the mysteries of God. No superiority shall therefore be ever claimed or acknowledged by one minister over another, nor shall there be any lords over God's heritage in the Reformed churches." art. ii. § 16.

Licensure is required of all ministers of churches with which the Reformed Church holds correspondence are received upon the usual certificates of dismissal from those bodies; unless there be grounds of presumption against their doctrines and morals; and then inquiries are to be proposed to satisfy the classis as to the propriety of proceeding freely in each case. Foreign ministers must present their credentials before the classis prior to invitation by any consistory to preach in its church: and no classis can receive any such minister without strict observance of the rules of the Church provided for these cases. Ministers coming from non-corresponding bodies must always be examined respecting their theological views before they can be received.

2. Teachers of theology, or professors in the theological seminary, are to be appointed only by the General Synod—the one for life, or during good behavior—"and that to such a synod a professor of theology shall always be amenable for his doctrine, mode of teaching, and moral conduct." He is also required to sign a constitutional formula expressing fidelity to the Church and her theological principles, etc. And, to complete the independence and personal responsibility of the professor to the General Synod, it is provided (art. iii. § 4) that "no professor, while in office, shall have the pastoral charge of any congregation, or be a member of any ecclesiastical assembly or judicatory; but, as a minister of the Gospel, may preach and administer, or assist in administering, the sacraments in any congregation, with the consent of the minister or consistory." Six months' notice of intention to resign his office must be sent to the president of the General Synod before it can be accepted or rejected. Most of these provisions regarding teachers of theology are peculiar to the Reformed Church. Their practical effect has been excellent.

VI. Judicatories. These are:

1. The Consistory.

2. The Classis.

3. The Particular Synod.

4. The General Synod.

1. The Consistory is the primary ecclesiastical body, corresponding to the presbytery of the Presbyterian Church. It is composed of the minister, elders, and deacons of a Church. To the elders, with the minister, are committed the chief spiritual functions of the Church, especially in admitting persons to the communion, in maintaining discipline, and in choosing delegates to the classis. To the deacons is confided the care of the poor. "When joined together in one board, the elders and deacons have an equal voice in whatever relates to the temporalities of the church, and the calling of a minister is by the choice of their own successors, in all which they are considered the general and joint representatives of the people" (art. vi., § 2). In New York and New Jersey the minister, elders, and deacons constituting the consistory are the legal trustees of the corporate rights and property of the particular Synod, chosen from the congregation, and are often composed of two or more ministers and General Bodies. These meet annually. The first synodal assembly was only provisional; it possessed and exercised the right to examine students of theology for license until the year 1800. This function was afterwards devolved upon the classes alone. The particular Synod is a court of appeal in judicial cases which are carried up from the classes. It has power to form new classes, to transfer congregations from one class to another, and has a general supervisory power over its classes. It also confirms the nominations of the classes for delegates to the General Synod. It meets annually, and has met at least 143 times, the last session held in 1879. The Synod is composed of four ministers and four elders from each class.

The four particular synods now existing are those of New York, organized in 1800, composed of nine classes; Albany, organized in 1800, composed of ten classes; Chicago, organized in 1856, composed of seven classes; New Brunswick, organized in 1869, composed of nine classes. At the session of the General Synod held in 1869 the particular synods were reorganized upon the basis of a plan which is intended to increase their previously limited powers, and to bring them into more systematic and effective coöperation. Each class is to have a synod, a provincial and a General Synod assembly—a sort of ecclesiastical bridge over which the Church passed from her dependence upon the mother Church in Holland to her condition of real independence and separate American organization. At first it was a conventional assembly, consisting of the ministers in the class with an elder from each separate Church. It met triennially. In 1800 it was made a delegated body, consisting of eight ministers and eight elders from each of the two particular synods of New York and Albany, which were constituted in that year, only two ministers and two elders being admitted from each class. In 1809 the delegation was increased to three ministers and three elders, who are nominated by each class and confirmed by their respective particular Synods. By the present Constitution, each class having more than fifteen members is entitled to one additional delegate for each additional five members. In 1812 the sessions were made annual. This body meets on the first Wednesday in June, and it continues in session about ten days. It exercises a general supervision over the entire Church. It is the court of last resort in appeals of judicial cases from the lower bodies. It has power to form and change the particular synods. It elects professors of theology and has supreme control of the theological seminaries. The benevolent boards of the Church are its creations. It corresponds with the various ecclesiastical assemblies of other denominations. It has no power to alter or amend the Constitution of the Church, but can only recommend such changes, which must be submitted, through it, to

... the classes, and can be adopted only by the votes of a majority of these bodies. The General Synod was incorporated in 1818 by an act of the Legislature of the State of New York.

The first consistorial of the whole Church are managed under this charter by the Board of Direction of Corporation, which is elected annually by the General Synod, and consists of a president, three directors, and a treasurer. The personal and real estate and all the synods' property are confined to the custody of this board, which is in charge of the confidence agents of the Church. Their affairs are reported annually to the synod. For more than sixty years it has managed its large trust with the most exemplary diligence, fidelity, and success, and with scarcely the loss of a dollar from all its investments. The board reported in 1878 that the assets in the hands of the treasurer, June 1, amounted to $451,411.69; this was in addition to the large real estate owned by the synod at New Brunswick, N. J., in the buildings and grounds of the theological seminary, and in those of Hope College, at Holland, Mich.

VII. Liturgy.—1. Made of Worship.—All the Reformed churches of the Continent adopted liturgies for the observance of public worship, including the offices for the administration of sacraments, the ordination of ministers, elders, and deacons, and for the infliction of discipline. Even the Scottish Reformer John Knox prepared a liturgy for the Church of Scotland which was used for some time, but which was ultimately swept away by the same anti-ritualistic storm in which Puritans and Presbyterian were driven to the opposite extremes of bold simplicity in public worship. The liturgy of the Reformed Church of Holland—with the omission only of a prayer in the marriage service and an article on the consolatio of the sick—is accurately given in the English translation, which is now in use in the Reformed Church of America. It was first adopted: was in 1668 and substantially as when first adopted in 1658 by the Synod of Wessel. Like all the Reformed liturgies, it is based on that of John Calvin. But its shape was given chiefly by John Alsaco, the popular pastor of the Reformed Church in London, which numbered, under his ministry, over three thousand members, who were refugees from persecution in their native land. This Church still exists. Alsaco also prepared a new liturgy, using his old one and that of Strassburg, a translation of which, from the French, was published by Solomon, Calkins' successor who founded a Church at Glastonbury, England. It was written in Latin, and then, in 1551, translated into Dutch by John Uytenhove, an elder of the Church in London. The liturgy of the Reformed Church in the Netherlands was prepared by Peter Dathem, an eminent minister, who, while living in London, settled with some of his fellow-exiles in the Palatinate at Frankenthal, near Heidelberg. He translated the Heidelberg Catechism into the Holland language, and also the psalms of Beza and Marot from their French originals. He dedicated the volume containing those symbols (psalms, catechism, and liturgy) "'to all the churches and ministers of Jesus Christ sitting and mourning under the tyranny of antichrist. Subsequently, the "Form for Adult Baptism," and the "Consecration of the Sick and Dying," and the "Compendium of the Christian Religion," a condensation of the Heidelberg Catechism—which was in place of another brief catechism—for persons who intended to unite with the Church, were issued. In 1574 the Synod of Dordrecht directed the liturgy to be used in all the churches. For a full account of the Presbyterian and Congregational, see ch. xi; and Prof. Domare's History and Ecclesiastical Characteristics of the Ref. Ch. ch. vii.

The liturgy is officially declared to be a part of the Constitution of the Reformed Church (Minutes of Gen. Synod, 1871, p. 426). The office of baptism and the Lord's supper, for ordination of ministers, elders, and deacons, and those for excommunicating and for readmitting the excommunicated are also declared by the Constitution to be essential, and must be used. The forms of prayer, marriage-service, etc., are not essential, but simply remain as formulas and specimens, which the ministers may not be used by the minister. The prayers were used for a time, but always in connection with extemporary prayer. Since the latter part of the 17th century they have been dropped in public worship in Holland. When English preaching had been established in the Church of New York, three years after Dr. Judie's advent, a translation of this liturgy into English—which is more accurate and faithful than elegant in style—was procured and introduced by the collegiate consistory. The same year also (1677) singing in the English language was commenced in that Church. The volume used was an amended edition of Brady and Tate's version, in which the old music was retained and the rhyme adapted to it. See Psalmod.

Several attempts have been made to revise the liturgy, all of which have failed of final adoption by the classes, to whom, under the constitution, they were referred for final decision.

2. Other Customs (essential and non-essential).—In 1814 the General Synod adopted a report of a committee on this subject which is still the law of the Church. The essential customs which were necessary to be continued in the Church are expressed in the explanatory articles of the constitution; such as singing the psalms and hymns approved of and recommended by the General Synod; preaching from the Heidelberg Catechism; observing the forms in the administration of baptism and the Lord's supper, etc., as contained in the liturgy, etc. "Other customs and usages prevail in the Church which are deemed non-essential, and in many instances are either wholly dispensed with or partially retained in our congregations, according to the taste and judgment of the members. The arrangements observed in the performance of public worship—the number of times of singing psalms and hymns; reading sermons and preaching them from memory or extemporaneously; sprinkling in baptism one or three times; sitting or standing in receiving the Lord's supper; preaching on Ascension-day, Good-Friday, and other days which have long been observed both in Holland and America" (Minutes, 1814, p. 31, 32). In the Constitution adopted in 1832, however, "for the purpose of uniformity, a directory is set forth which to be observed in all the churches." In Holland all the clergy wear the official pulpit dress or gown during their performance of public worship. In this country the custom prevails chiefly in the cities of Philadelphia, New York, Albany, Newark, and Providence. In some of the country and village churches.

VIII. Institutions.—1. Colleges.—Zeal for the training and perpetuation of an educated ministry—which produced the unhappy division of the Church in the last century—soon led to various plans for the establishment of proper schools for that purpose in this country. Few ministers came from Holland; and the time, cost, and dangers, the difficulties and disappointments, incurred in sending youth to be educated in the universities of the mother country were too great to furnish a supply from this source. The number of churches rapidly outgrew the pastors. In 1754, in order to defeat the movements of the centus for independence, a plan was adopted, by a provision which was inserted in the charter of King's (now Columbia) College, in New York, giving the consistory of New York the privilege of electing a professor of theology in that institution. But, fearing that such an arrangement would produce an episcopalian defection, the Rev. Theodore Frelinghuysen, of Albany, projected an academy or seminary, in which the Dutch language should be adopted and the advantages of both the German gymnasium and the university system. In 1759 he sailed for Es-
The Science of Revealed Truth Impeachable, as shown by the Argumentative Failures of Infidelity and Theoretical Geology. All of these lectures have been published under the general title of The Vedder Lectures.

"Hope College," located at the city of Holland, Mich., was chartered in 1856, and grew out of a flourishing academy which was conducted as a civil and parochial school in the infancy of the colony of Hollanders, founded by the Rev. Dr. Albertus C. Van Raalte, on Black River and lake, in that state, in the year 1846-47. This institution embraces a preparatory school, collegiate, scientific, and theological departments, under the ecclesiastical supervision of General Synod. The General Synod retains immediate charge of its council and faculty. It possesses ample college grounds, good buildings, an endowment of funds which are augmenting yearly, a tract of land called "the James Saydam farm of Hope College," after a great benefactor, and many appliances for a liberal training. The course of instruction is thorough, and will be expanded with the demands of the times. The faculty consists of a president and five professors, with subordinate teachers. The whole number of pupils in June, 1878, was 98, of whom 65 were in the preparatory department, and 33 in the internal. The seventeen-year period was celebrated, with appropriate services, at the commencement held in June, 1870. A large endowment has been secured. The course of instruction has been greatly enlarged and the standard of scholarship elevated.

2. Theological Seminaries.—A professor of theology, Dr. John H. Livingstone, was chosen in 1874, and at the same time Dr. Hermanus Meyer was appointed professor of languages, and two years later, also, as lector in the Kirkpatrick Professorship in theology. In 1878-79 were appointed additional professors of didactic theology. Other appointments were subsequently made—Rev. Drs. John Bassett, Jeremiah Romeyn, and John M. Van Harlingen. All of these professors and lectors originally taught their students at their own places of residence. The seminary proper, under Dr. Livingstone, was located in 1796 at Flatbush, L. I., and in 1804 was transferred to New York, where it remained until its final location, in 1810, at New Brunswick, N. J.

These facts substantiate the claim that the Reformed Dutch Church in America was the first of all her Protestant sisters to reduce theological education to a system, the first to demand that it be in charge of a professional instructor, and the first to appoint a theological professor. But for the outbreak of the Revolutionary war, her theological seminary might have been started in the year of American independence, 1776. Dr. Livingstone occupied the professorial chair from 1784 to 1825; and previous to the removal to New Brunswick he and his colleagues sent forth 91 students to the ministry. After the death of Dr. Livingstone the efforts to secure a proper endowment, the professorship was merged in Queen's College by a covenant between the synod and the trustees of that institution. In the year 1825, the seminary had three resident theological professors, and was fully organized. Additional articles of agreement were now entered into with the trustees, by which a theological college was organized, and the name changed from Queen's to Rutgers. Three years later, a Board of Education was established to care for beneficiaries. In 1865 another theological professorship was added, and the covenant between the synod and the trustees of Rutgers College formally annulled. The following year, Hope College was organized in Holland, Mich., and in a twelvemonth more a theological department in the same place. In the year 1856, Mrs. Anna Hertzig, of Philadelphia, donated $5,000 for the establishment of a suitable edifice for the use of the seminary, upon the condition that it should bear the honored name of her deceased husband, "the Peter Hertzig Theological Hall." The building was speedily erected—three stories in height, 126 feet long, and 67 feet wide, with double rooms for reading and study purposes, to accommodate about sixty students; lecture-rooms for the professors, rector's residence, and refectory. It stands in the midst of seven acres of land, which were also donated for the purpose by Messrs. James Neilson, David Bishop, and...

The site is commanding. Three professors’ houses have been built upon it, and another one, directly opposite, has been bought and presented to the General Synod by Messrs. James Suydam and Gardiner A. Sage, of New York, at a cost of $18,000. Mrs. Hertzog also left by will, the interest in two trust funds, the income of which is to keep the hall in repair. By the munificence of its friends the building has been thoroughly refitted and furnished in the best manner to make it a pleasant Christian home for the students. In 1874 the James Suydam Hall was opened for use. The large, spacious, commodious, and costly building, containing a chapel, lecture-rooms, museum, and gymnasium, was the gift of the late James Suydam of New York, who laid its cornerstone but did not live to see it completed. Mr. Suydam also endowed the professorship of didactic and polemic theology which bears his name, in the sum of $60,000; and these, with various gifts and legacies to the theological seminary and other specific Church purposes, amount to more than $250,000. This was in addition to other bequests to the American Bible and Tract society, and the seminary and the Bible society were also made his equal residuary legatees. A bronze statue of Mr. Suydam, somewhat larger than life size, the gift of friends, was unveiled on the day of dedication of the hall. The Gardner A. Sage library building is the gift of the generous founder whose name it bears, who superintended its erection and has provided for its maintenance and support. It is perfectly fire-proof, and combines every modern arrangement for heating, ventilation, light, and security from dust and other annoyances. It has room for about 100,000 volumes. The library at present numbers over 80,000 volumes, to which additions have been constantly made by donations, and principally from a fund of $35,763, of which a balance of about $10,000 remains unexpended. The selection of books is confined to a competent committee, under the supervision of the General Synod, in cooperation with the theological professors. The library has a very complete Biblical critical apparatus, including fac-similes of the Sinaitic, Vatican, and other MSS.; the Acta Somtorum (Bollandist), 60 vols.; Migne’s Patrology, 320 vols., embracing all the fathers, Greek and Latin; and many of the best and rarest editions of standard works imported from Europe.

The permanent endowment of the seminary, which is still in progress, now amounts to over $200,000, besides the real property held for its uses. There are four professors, and the number is now in its class, while the hall is filled with other young men of the college and preparatory school who are on their way to the ministry. The course of instruction is thorough, and embraces the usual departments of theological study in similar institutions, with the addition of those subjects which are specially related to the Reformed Church, such as the Confession of Faith, Canons of Dort, Heidelberg Catechism, the ecclesiastical polity, and the constitutional law of the denomination. The whole number of graduates from its establishment in 1816 to 1873 is 609. The faculty of the seminary is vested in the General Synod and meets annually. A standing committee of the synod has the charge of its temporal affairs.

The Theological Seminary in Hope College” had for its first professor Rev. Cornelius E. Cripelli, D.D., who was elected by the General Synod in 1867 to the chair of didactic and polemic theology, and the other professors in Hope College were invited to act as lecturers. In 1869 two additional professors were added. There is a Board of Superintendents, which consists of the Council of Hope College, with duties and prerogatives like those of the seminary at New Brunswick. The endowment of this institution has been begun. In 1878, on account of financial embarrassments, the theological department was suspended and the students went to other institutions. A few young men have gone out from its walls to preach the Gospel, two of them as foreign missionaries.

3. Parisian Schools.—A few of these are aided by the Board of Education. They are almost exclusively confined to the German and Holland Churches.

4. Foreign Missions.—The Reformed Churches, her ministers gave special care to the evangelization of the heathen Indians. During the existence of the United Foreign Missionary Society, she steadily contributed to its funds; and when that organization was dissolved, and its stations transferred to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, she continued her efforts in connection with it. In 1832 the General Synod appointed its own Board of Foreign Missions, proposing to organize missions of their own Church to be conducted through the medium of its prudential committee. In 1856 the first band of missionaries went out to seek a settlement in Northern India, but subsequently located in the island of Borneo. After working a long while harmoniously in this relation, prompted by a desire to accomplish the utmost that might be gained by an independent American missionary society, and other motives, it was considered desirable to sever the connection existing between their society and that of the American Board. This was accordingly done in 1858. The number of members is twenty-four—one half being laymen, and one third elected annually by the General Synod. A number of missionaries, several times, under the care of the board, have been sent out to China, India, and Japan. Chief among the missionaries of the Church in the foreign field were the Rev. John Scudder, M.D., of the Madras Mission: the Rev. David Abeel, D.D., the first American missionary to China; and the Rev. Dr. Cornelius V. A. Van Dyck, the translator of the Arabic Bible, who, although in the employ of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, yet retains his relation to the Reformed Church, from which he went out as a missionary. The Mission to the Dyaks in Borneo was given up in 1849, some of the missionaries having been transferred to Amoy in China, and the others returned to America.

The China Mission was organized at Amoy in 1844, at the original suggestion of the Rev. David Abeel, D.D., who visited that city in 1842, just after it had been declared one of the five open ports. The first missionaries were Rev. Messers. William J. Pohiman and Elisha Day. Its prosperity has been wonderful. The Mission now (1879) consists of seven churches and seventeen stations, comprised of over 2,000 members, and membership of 598 communicants. Over these in Amoy and adjacent cities are now four missionaries and four assistants, with three native pastors settled over and sustained by two churches in the city of Amoy and the Church of Kang-than and Opi. The Mission is divided into Congregations which are specially related to the Reformed Church, such as the Confession of Faith, Canons of Dort, Heidelberg Catechism, the ecclesiastical polity, and the constitutional law of the denomination. The whole number of graduates from its establishment in 1816 to 1873 is 609. The faculty of the seminary is vested in the General Synod and meets annually. A standing committee of the synod has the charge of its temporal affairs. The Theological Seminary in Hope College” had for its first professor Rev. Cornelius E. Cripelli, D.D., who was elected by the General Synod in 1867 to the chair of didactic and polemic theology, and the other professors in Hope College were invited to act as lecturers. In 1869 two additional professors were added. There is a Board of Superintendents, which consists of the Council of Hope College, with duties and prerogatives like those of the seminary at New Brunswick. The endowment of this institution has been begun. In 1878, on account of financial embarrassments, the theological department was suspended and the students went to other institutions. A few young men have gone out from its walls to preach the Gospel, two of them as foreign missionaries.

The Arcot Mission in India was organized in 1854, being composed of the sons of the celebrated missionary the Rev. John Scudder, M.D., of Madras, with their families. The Classis of Arcot was formed in 1854, with the clerical missionaries and three native elders. According to the report of 1877, the classis is composed of twenty churches, with a membership of 1750 communicants. With them are connected 86 native pastors, 23 assistant pastors, and a number of regular attendants upon the means of grace being 4396. Contributions for religious and benevolent purposes in 1889 amounted to $7556 in gold. There are 8 missionaries and 6 assistants in this important field of labor, with 2 native pastors and 21 catechists, 22 Bible readers, 29 teachers, and 19 colorteurs. There are 4 seminars for males and females, a preparand school for training native catechists and pastors, and 97 day-schools with 2508 scholars. The missionaries and native helpers make frequent tours into the surrounding country. The statistics of this work for 1889 were, 18,006 sermons preached to 297,979 hearers, and 14,000 books and tracts distributed.

The press is used freely to print the Scriptures, catechisms, and practical, religious, and educational works. The hospital and medical dispensary at Arout has received the highest official praise from lord Napier, the governor general, and is esteemed all the same one of the government. The number of patients treated in 1889 was 63,586, an average of 17 per day. A medical class of young natives is connected with it. The Gospel is daily preached to all comers, and portions of the Scriptures, tracts, and good books are offered to all who can read. A simple and brief story of Christ's love to fallen man is carried away by every patient on the printed ticket given to him on his first application, and which he must show at each subsequent visit.

A missionary held a meeting at the Quebec Convention for prayer for missions held in Feb., 1889, in the South Reformed Church, New York, when one elder offered to give $800 per year to support a missionary in Japan, another made a similar promise, and the Church pledged itself for a third like sum. On May 7, 1889, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Committee of Correspondence—Rev. Samuel R. Brown, M.D. (who has been a missionary in China for several years), Rev. Guido F. Verbeck, and D. Simmons, M.D., with their wives, and Miss Caroline E. Adriance—who reached Nagasaki Nov. 1 of that year. Rev. James H. Ballagh was sent out in 1862, and Rev. Henry Stout in 1868. Dr. Simmons and wife resigned in 1860, and Miss Adriance went to Amoy, where she became an assistant missionary, and died in 1863. She always bore her own expenses as a volunteer missionary. The missionaries engaged chiefly at Yokohama, Nagasaki, and Tokio in teaching the government schools, translating the Word of God, circulating the Scriptures, tracts, and books in Chinese, and instructing inquirers in the way of salvation. Mr. Bal-lagh began a Japanese religious service in 1866, the average attendance being about twenty persons. The first two native converts, Wakasa, a nobleman, and Ayabe, his younger brother, were baptized by the Rev. G. F. Verbeck, May 20, 1866, the day of Pentecost, at his residence in Yokohama. Wakasa's attention was first drawn to him by a copy of the New Testament in English, which some Japanese picked up out of the water in the bay of Nagasaki, and which was probably lost overboard from an American or English ship. He did not rest until, five or six years after, he procured a Chinese translation of it, which he eagerly read. Thus this "bread cast upon the waters" was found "after many days" in the soul of the first Japanese convert to Christianity. In March, 1872, the first native Christian Church was organized by the Rev. James H. Ballagh at Yokohama with eleven members. In 1874 it had had a Baptist Church, located in Yokohama, in which it worshiped cost about $6000, of which the first thousand was given by the native Christians of Honolulu, Sandwich Islands. It seats about 450 persons. In 1889 there were 2 stations and 19 out-stations, and preaching-places with communicants enrolled to the number of 1800 belonging to this mission. The entire native contributions amounted to $8234.70. The mission has been very successful in the last three years. The present missionary force of this Church in Japan consists of 9 missionaries and 11 assistant missionaries, all of whom are catechists or teachers. There is one academy at Yokohama, the Isaac Ferris Seminary, for girls, of whom there were 153 at latest date. A theological class or school of 32 young men is also established, under the instructions of the Rev. James L. Amerman.

Another school for girls is at Nagasaki. The Rev. Dr. G. F. Verbeck has been for many years connected with the Imperial University at Yedo, under the auspices of the government, and he has also been engaged with Mrs. Brown, Hepburn, and others in the work of translation of English works into Japanese and of Japanese works into English. Of the large number of Japanese youth who came to this country for education, a score or more were students at Rutgers College and its grammarsch. Several of them have united with Christian churches in the United States, and some have gone back to Japan to preach the Gospel and to serve Christ in other stations. The Oriental interest in the work in Japan is full of promise. Dr. Brown has long been engaged with Dr. Hepburn and others in translating the Bible into Japanese.

In addition to these Oriental Missions, the board has also co-operated with other missionary boards in the plan of Indian agencies under the government of the United States. The tribes assigned to it are the Pimas, Maricopas, and Papagoes; the Mohaves on the Colorado River Reserve; and the Apaches on the White Mountain Reservation, north of the Mexican line.

The Women's Board of Foreign Missions, an efficient auxiliary to the Synod's Board, was organized in February, 1875. It has between fifty and sixty auxiliaries; is devoted to the increase and maintenance of woman's work for women in heathen lands; and contributes liberally to the support of foreign missions in Amoy, Nagassaki, Japan, where it has undertaken to establish a female seminary; and it has also begun to labor for China. It has published in an elegant volume, with maps and many illustrations on wood, a very complete Manual of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Dutch Church in America (8vo, 326 pp.).

The ordinary appropriations of the Board of Foreign Missions for the year ending June 1, 1879, were $56,600.

5. Home Missions—The Board of Domestic Missions consists of twenty-four members, half of whom are laymen, and one third are elected annually by the General Synod. It was reorganized in 1849, with a corresponding secretary exclusively devoted to its service. Previous to this, for a number of years, the duties of that office were performed voluntarily by settled pastors. All the Reformed churches were on missionary ground until the independent organization of the denomination was secured in 1771. Soon after this event, ministers and elders were occasionally sent out upon tours of exploration among the Western settlers in the West. In 1862, the General Synod, and to establish mission stations and churches. As the result of these labors, a few new churches were organized—one in Virginia, six in Kentucky, six in Lower Canada, and elsewhere in the regions of the Delaware and Susquehanna rivers, and Central New York. It was then determined to concentrate efforts nearer home, and the distant churches—some of which yet live in other denominations—were left alone. In 1822 the "Missions Society of the Reformed Dutch Church" was organized in the city of New York. A Northern Board was organized in 1827, in which it worshiped cost about $6000, of which the first thousand was given by the native Christians of Honolulu, Sandwich Islands. It seats about 450 persons. In 1889 there were 2 stations and 19 out-stations, and preaching-places with communicants enrolled to the number of 1800 belonging to this mission. The entire native contributions amounted to $8234.70. The mission has been very successful in the last three years. The present missionary force of this Church in Japan consists of 9 missionaries and 11 assistant missionaries, all of whom are catechists or teachers. There is one academy at Yokohama, the Isaac Ferris Seminary, for girls, of whom there were 153 at latest date. A theological class or school of 32 young men is also established, under the instructions of the Rev. James L. Amerman.

the West, and two in the South. The number of families in the Mission churches was 6787 and 8896 Church members, of whom 1040 were received during the year. There were 134 Sabbath-schools, with 11,339 scholars. The income from all sources for the missionary operations of the Church, since 1852, more than three hundred churches have been organized—about half of these in the single decade of 1850-60—and many of these under the auspices of this board. Thousands of Hollanders, most of whom are in this denomination, have settled in Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, and adjoining states during the last thirty years. These have formed a beneficent element in the missionary growth and extension of the Church in the North-west. Of its nearly 79,000 members, about 11,000 are Hollanders.

6. The Board of Education, which was organized as a voluntary society in the city of New York in 1829, was adopted by the General Synod in 1832. It consists of twenty-four members, who are elected for three years each, one third of whom are elected annually. It has the immediate care of all the beneficiaries and educational interests of the Reformed Church, including such beneficiaries as receive aid from the Van Benschoten and Knox funds, which are held by the trustees of Rutgers College. Every beneficiary must be a member in good and regular standing in the Reformed Church, and must also have been a member of some Protestant Church for at least two years to make him a candidate for aid. He must be recommended to the board by the pastor and consistory of the Church, and by the classis to which said Church belongs, after sustaining a satisfactory examination as to his need of assistance, and physical, mental, and spiritual qualifications for study and for the holy ministry. Every precaution is taken against the introduction or continuation of improper candidates. Repayment of all money received from the board is required from those who do not complete their course of ministerial preparation, unless they are, in the judgment of the board, rendered thereby impaired. The board will accept from all beneficiaries after their licentiate two years' service under the care of the Board of Domestic Missions, as a full satisfaction for all aid rendered to them by the Board of Education. This is a wise provision, which has secured many excellent young laborers in the home missionary field. All the students are considered as under the pastoral care of the corresponding secretary. In 1865 the powers of the board were enlarged to enable it to co-operate with the various academies and classical schools within their bounds. The board was incorporated in 1870, to enable it to hold legal possession of its funds and to secure others that may be deeded to it by will. In addition to the Knox Fund ($20,000), the Van Benschoten Fund ($20,818.57), the Smock Fund ($200), the Maderveille Fund ($29,000), and the Voorhees Fund ($26,000), which are held by the trustees of Rutgers College, and the interest of which is paid out to beneficiaries of this board, it holds twenty-five scholarships, ranging from $1700 to $10,000, in all a capital of $29,000, besides the Reformed Church collections and private donations, amounting in 1877-78 to $11,299.74—all for the education of young men for the ministry. It also holds certain trust funds for Hope College, and receives moneys for parochial schools which are under its care. The total income for the year ending June 1, 1878, was $53,268; and the total number of young men under its care for the same period was eighty-three.

About one third of the present ministry of the Church have been aided by this board in their studies for the sacred ministry. Donations go to institutions that are distinctly literary institutions, but must study theology in one of the seminaries of the Reformed Church.

7. The Board of Publication was organized in 1855 by authority of the General Synod. It consists of twelve ministers and twelve laymen, one third of whom are elected annually by the Synod. To it are "intrusted, with such directions as may from time to time be given by the General Synod, the superintendence of all the publications of the Reformed Church, and the circulation of such works pertaining to the history, government, doctrines, and religious literature of said Church and of other denominations which are for the benefit of the Church, which, when properly approved," it has a corresponding secretary and general agent, and a depository located in the city of New York. Its printing and binding are done by contract. It publishes a semi-monthly newspaper called the Sower and Gospel Field, which is the accredited organ of the beneficiaries of the Board. The catalogue of its books and tracts, for denominational and general uses, is large, and constantly receiving new additions. Sales are made at a moderate profit. Gratuities distributions and liberal discounts are made to weak churches, poor Sunday-schools, and for missionary purposes. During the civil war in the United States, it sent forth large gratuitous supplies into the armies of the Union; and since the cessation of hostilities it has done a good and large work of benevolent circulation in the South, particularly among the freedmen. In India it has published the Reformed Church in Ceylon a schism in Tamil during the year ending June, 1870; and a supply of its elementary books for Sabbath-school and general instruction has been asked for and sent to Japan for use in the government schools under the care of the missionaries. The minutes of the board, June 1, 1878, were reported to the Synod as $12,243.64. Receipts for the year, $9,102.39.

8. The Widow's Fund, or Relief Fund, for disabled ministers and the widows and orphaned children of deceased ministers, was organized in 1857. Its benefits are limited to subscribing ministers who may pay $20 in full, or $10 or $5 annually, and who shall receive, pro rata, the annuities which may be due upon personal disability, or, at their own decease, by their families. Congregations are urged to secure an interest in the fund for their ministers by making the requisite contribution yearly. The funds, which are intrusted to the Board of Direction of Corporation, are invested in bonds and mortgages and in government bonds. One half of the annual payments by ministers, and donations, when specially directed by the donor, are considered income; the other half of the annual payments by ministers, all other donations, and church collections, are considered as principal, and the interest thereof only is used as income. The maximum amount to be paid to parties interested in the fund are: to a minister disabled by sickness or old age, $50 per year; to disabled widows, $200; to children of clergyman, both of whose parents are deceased, $75 per year each until they are sixteen years of age. Other provisions regulate minor payments. The amount of each annuity is of course dependent upon the number of annuitants, and may vary yearly. The maximum may be increased when the state of the fund shall warrant it. The amount of this fund June 1, 1878, was $49,807.99; and the sum paid to annuitants during the previous year was $2,559.99.

9. The Board, besides the Annual Collections, has, in the annual meeting of 1856, established the Annual Fund, which makes it possible for a class who cannot avail themselves of the Widow's, or Relief, Fund, was organized in 1855, under the title of the Seminarian Fund. It is also in trust of the Board of Direction of Corporation. Its moneys are to be kept invested, and to be "used for the support of disabled ministers and the families of deceased ministers, such use may be in need." Applications for aid are made through and recommended by the classes to the applicants belong. Contributions which are donated specifically for principal are so used; all other contributions are applied toward the interest which remains is carried to principal and placed at interest upon first-class securities. Aged and infirm ministers are thus assisted, and also the needy families of deceased clergyman. The amount of this fund reported June 1, 1878, was $15,614.65, of which $14,222 was appropriated to its beneficiaries.
10. The Church-building Fund is held in trust and dispensed by the Board of Domestic Missions at its discretion. Aid is given from it only to churches which shall have no debt after receiving assistance from this fund. A first bond and mortgage is taken from such church, and the Domestic Board may remit the interest thereon; but in no event shall the church be annually contributed for the fund; and every church aided is to pay back the aid received as soon as practicable. The receipts for the year ending June 1, 1878, were $8,659.80.

IX. Correspondence. — The General Synod holds official correspondence by interchange of delegates (or by letter) and letters to and from the general assemblies of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in the United States; the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States; the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church; the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church of North America; the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States (South); the General Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in the United States; and the General Council of the Reformed Episcopal Church. With this correspondence has been published in pamphlet form, with the exception of the Waldenses of Piedmont, occasional correspondence is held by letter, and also with the Free Church of Scotland and other ecclesiastical bodies in Europe. The spirit of this correspondence is well described by one of the ministers of the Church in these words, respecting her catholic sentiments and action:

"Our Church has been distinguished by a steady and united adherence to her standards and order, and at the same time friendly and friendly to other evangelical denominations. She has enjoyed peace within her own bosom, while agitation questions have troubled, and even rent, other churches. She has borne a full proportionate share in contributions to Christian benevolence large, both in the heart, as the American Bible Society, the American Tract Society, and others. She is dexterous and anxious, in a sense of privilege and responsibility, to employ her influence for increasing the degree and extent of her influence in all she can for the spread of the Gospel and the salvation of souls. Her pectoral character, her freedom from the niggardliness of the day, her evangelical principles, the peculiar features of her government and order, and the attitude in which she stands in the Church, show the 'peace and prosperity of Christ.'"

X. Statistics. — 1. Numbers and Funds. — In June, 1878, the Reformed Church embraced 4 particular synods, 33 classes, 503 churches, 542 ministers, 6 candidates for the ministry, 39,197 members, 7,106 communicants, of whom were received during the previous year 3,943 on confession and 1,666 by certificates; baptisms of infants, 3,674; of adults, 1,044; catechumens, 24,445; Sabbath school scholars, 80,109; contributions for religious and benevolent purposes, $308,103; for congregational purposes, $788,222. In July, 1889, there were returned 546 churches, 568 ministers, 6,812 communicants.

2. Periodicals. — The Christian Intelligence, weekly, owned and edited by private individuals; the Soeur and Gospel Field, semi-monthly paper, organ of the Church board; and The Churchman Monthly, published by the Board of Foreign Missions.

XI. Denominational Literature. — The following are some of the most important publications:

Reformed Episc. Church 1008  Reformed Episc. Church
delbert Catechism, translated by Prof. J. F. Berg, D.D. (Philadelphia, 1854, 1 vol. 8vo). Dr. Berg also published several volumes on prophecy, the Second Advent, Church and State, etc.; Centennial Discourses, a series of twenty-two sermons delivered in their 1873-1874 order by the General Convention, was set forth in the form of the Reformed Church to liberty and to faith and education, and other topics appropriate to the Centennial year of the republic (8vo, 601 pp.). Reformed Episcopal Church, the official designation of a distinct body of Christians in America and Great Britain.

I. History. The ecclesiastical organization took its rise in the city of New York December 2, 1873. The Rt. Rev. George David Cummins, D.D., assistant bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the diocese of Kentucky, separated from that Church, in a letter to presiding bishop Smith dated November 10, 1873. Within one month from that date, the Reformed Episcopal Church was organized, with Dr. Cummins as its first bishop. Bishop Cummins was born December 11, 1822. He was related on the maternal side to the celebrated bishop Asbury, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, but was of Episcopal descent on both sides. He was educated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, in 1841, in the nineteenth year of his age. In the year 1843 he became connected with the Episcopal Church, and in 1845 was ordained to the diaconate by bishop Alfred Lee, of the diocese of Delaware. After a ministry of great eloquence, power, and success in different prominent fields of labor during twelve years, he was consecrated to the episcopate as assistant bishop of the diocese of Kentucky in 1866. During October, 1873, the Evangelical Alliance met in New York city. Bishop Cummins was in attendance, and on the eighth day of that month delivered an address on the subject—Roman and Reformed Doctrines on the Subject of Justification, Contrasted. On the 12th, Sunday, the bishop participated in a joint communion in the Presbyterian Church of which Dr. John Hall is the pastor, delivering an address and administering the cup. The storm of adverse criticism that followed this act served to mature and intensify the conviction that had been gathering form and volume before in the bishop's mind that the Church he had loved and served so well had fully and finally drifted from its old evangelical and Calvinistic teachings. He was convinced that all the points which we do not know, that the thought of a separation from the old Communion arose, and ripened into fixed purpose. The first outward movement looking towards the organization of a separate Communion took place October 30. An account of the meeting then held is here given in the language of a prominent clergyman—Rev. Dr. B. B. Leacock—who was present and participated in its deliberations:

"By invitation of bishop Cummins, five clergymen and five laymen were brought together at the residence of Mr. John A. Duke, of New York city. The bishop startled them by announcing his determination of withdrawing from the Protestant Episcopal Church, and he then urged to reconsider his decision, he promptly stated that this was not a sudden act—that it was a conclusion between himself and God, and as such he had settled it, and that his determination was unalterable. He then said that his object in calling together was to advise as to his future. There were two propositions before him. He had been invited to go to Mexico, and give himself to the work of the mission and building up of the Church of Jesus. Should he do this? or should he remain in this country, and take the course of a bishop and the episcopal office? Those who felt free to speak advised his remaining in this country by all means, and then there and determined that he be ordained and should he be the 'apostolic labor,' to which he would transfer his 'work and office.' Steps were taken before the adjournment of this meeting looking towards the ordination and building up of the Church of Jesus. Should he do this? or should he remain in this country, and take the course of a bishop and the episcopal office? Those who felt free to speak advised his remaining in this country by all means, and then there and determined that he be ordained and should he be the 'apostolic labor,' to which he would transfer his 'work and office.' Steps were taken before the adjournment of this meeting looking towards the ordination and building up of the Church of Jesus. The Rev. Charles Edward Cheney, of Chicago, was elected bishop, his consecration to the office taking place later in the same month. In justification of the action, written in the interest of the Reformed Episcopal Church to the actual state of the Evangelical Church or party in the Protestant Episcopal communion. The errors and excesses of the Tractarian school had been in process of development for a period of nearly forty years. Open and thoroughly confessional and the groundwork of scriptural argument, they were not to wide and moral and strength to be as far absorbing all the vital forces of the Church. They had become prescriptive, and, by legislative enactment and judicial trials, were repressing evangelical life and energy. Efforts had been made to procure the condemnation and expulsion of these errors from the Church. The results were of so partial and inadequate a character as to encourage rather than discourage the repetition of similar instances, and to prevent immediate abandonment of error and superstition. Then efforts were made to secure revision of the Prayer-book, but only with humiliating failure. Petition after petition to the General Convention was treated with scarcely concealed contempt. Even the professions of liberty to use alternate phrases in the Baptismal Office was unceremoniously denied to a numerously signed petition. In these efforts to obtain relief many participated who are not as yet in the Reformed Episcopal Church, but whose action shows how deeply and earnestly men who loved the pure truth of the Gospel then felt on the subject. Thus, at a meeting in Chicago, June 16 and 17, 1869, among others who strongly advocated revision of the Prayer-book was Rev. Dr. Andrews, of Virginia, one of the ablest presbyters of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and a member of the General Convention. Rev. Dr. Andrews is, indeed, the present rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Philadelphia, introduced the following resolutions:

Resolved (as the sense of this Conference), That a careful revision of the Book of Common Prayer is needful to the best interest of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Resolved, That all words and phrases seeming to teach that the Christian ministry is a priesthood, or the Lord's anointed, or that the Church is regenerative or that regeneration is from baptism, should be removed from the Prayer-book.

These resolutions were unanimously adopted. But neither these nor any other efforts to obtain redress were of any avail. An imperious and haughty majority bound and held every conscience, and the Church followed the sacramentarian drift uncheckked. Those who organized the Reformed Episcopal Church were, convinced by a long course of stubborn facts, that the cause dear to God, as the case of the true Gospel of Christ, was at stake; that they must either sacrifice the truth or go outside of the old organization to defend and propagate it. Conviction and conscience led them to their action.

The Church thus taking shape in ecclesiastical history, though yet comparatively a small body, has, during the five years of its existence, grown, it is believed, with almost unexampled rapidity. Its apologists emphasize certain facts in this growth:

1. The Extent of Territory it Covers.—Christian denominations have not at such a late period in the early stages of their history, as the causes out of which they have sprung have been local. The imperative need of this Church is shown by the fact that it sprang up almost simultaneously in remote parts of the land, as from a soil quite prepared for the seed. Wherever the Episcopal Church was in existence, the reaction towards medieval corruptions in doctrine and ritual was more or less pronounced; and the recoil from these developments of error equally decided. The Reformed Church took immediate and strong hold of many and was recognized early as a true and weighty means, and as the means and ministers which the infant communion could supply. Within two years from its origin it held positions at various points from South Carolina to Vancouver's Island, on the extreme west of the British North American possessions. The Church is now planted firmly in fifteen states in this country, in the maritime provinces and the various larger cities in the Dominion of Canada. In May, 1877, the General Council resolved, in answer to repeated solicitations, to introduce its work into Great Britain and Ireland. Already that work has extended to two or three missionary stations, and the means and ministers which the infant communion could supply. Already that work has extended to two or three missionary stations, and the means and ministers which the infant communion could supply.

2. The Friendliness with which this Church has been received by Protestant Christians and Churches. — The old Protestant Episcopal Church had met with opposition in many places, and the habitual complaint of its ministers and missionaries was that the growth of the Church was hindered by the prejudices and unfriendly criticism of the people. The Reformed Episcopal Church finds no such difficulty. The people everywhere seem willing that it should take its place in the sisterhood of churches, and gather from all communities its appropriate elements. The freedom from assumption in this Church thus has an inviting, mediating, and constructive effect upon the path of progress which it is, believed, leads on to a great future.

3. The Overruling Hand of God in Harmonizing Internal Differences among the Leading and Influential Minds in the Church. — It is no easy thing, under the most favorable auspices for a number of men who come into connection with an old organization and constructing a new, to agree together in anything like a moderate position. In this case the difficulty was enhanced by the circumstances of the separation. The men who left the old Church, though actuated by a common opposition to particular errors in that body, held views, in many cases, divergent in regard to the positive principles to be incorporated in the new organization. These differences have at times appeared so grave that no human wisdom could find a path through them along which all could go. The General Convention has, however, in the person of a number of able leaders, shown a way to meet the difficulties; others with an equally strong tendency to reach out towards the true ideal of a Church for the age we live in; and all men, by the very necessities of their stand, of a somewhat independent tone of mind, it was found by them hard to yield individual and personal views and prejudices for the sake of a common structure of the doctrinal organic structure. In every case of difficulty in the councils arising from these causes, however, the Spirit of the Lord appeared to lead the way. His presence and agency was at times so manifest as to awaken lively emotions of wonder and gratitude. Though in this Church at present, as in all others where intelligent men are free to think and to maintain their views, all do not think alike in everything, there is perhaps as much harmony as can be found in any, and much more than marks most other, communions. In this fact of special divine guidance, this Church seems to see the pledge of future growth and success in its work.

II. DOCTRINES AND USAGES. — 1. Speaking generally, the doctrines of the Reformed Episcopal Church may be identified as those of Orthodox and Evangelical Protestantism. The men who organized the Church were of that class of clergymen and laymen in the old Protestant Episcopal Church who had been largely associated with the Christians of other Protestant Churches, and harmonized with them in belief and practice. In their judgment, the then existing “Article of Religion,” and their refusal to adopt “Articles of Religion,” entitled “Of Election, Predestination, and Free Will,” runs thus: “While the Scriptures distinctly set forth the election, predestination, and calling of the people of God unto eternal life, as Christ saith, ‘All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, and I will bring them to eternal life, and I will raise them up at the last day.’ These Scriptural statements, taken together, do positively affirm man’s free agency and responsibility, and that salvation is freely offered to all through Christ.” This Church, accordingly, simply affirms these doctrines as the Word of God sets them forth, and submits them to the individual judgment of its members, as taught by the Holy Spirit; strictly charging them that God commandeth all men everywhere to repent, and that we can be saved only by faith in Jesus Christ." This is the only distinct effort we are aware of to unite in one article of religion the two hemispheres of truth that lie, one on the side of faith, the other on the side of man's freedom and responsibility. How far this effort has been successful, the judgment of Christian men must decide. One result of it, however, is evident. The general course of conviction among the clergy of this Church runs nearer the line of separation on these higher points than in most other Communions. The freedom to differ rather constrains to harmony than ministers to license. With but little disposition to censorious criticism, its ministers of either tendency of doctrinal thought find a fair field for united and harmonious action in extending and building up the kingdom of Christ.

In adopting the Nicene Creed as one of its symbols, this Church takes its stand on the historical Church doctrine of the Trinity, asserting not a mere modal distinction, but an essential, tri-personal distinction in the divine nature. Justification by faith, as held and taught by the clergy generally, is not a mere negative state of the remission of sin, but positive, resulting from the imputation of Christ's righteousness. The doctrines that cluster around these, as in a measure dependent upon them, are stated in the articles in harmonious and systematic order.

2. Among the distinctive usages of this Church, the following may be specially designated:

(a) Worship. — The Reformed Episcopal is a Liturgical Church. Those who organized and those who, since its organization, have come into it and helped to form its system and direct its course in history, have been men either trained in the old Protestant Episcopal Church, where they had long practical experience of the value of liturgical forms in public worship, or convinced from experience in churchmanship in any extemporaneous form of importance of a liturgy from the actual lack of it. They have been convinced that the evils connected with liturgic services in the old parent Church are not justly chargeable to a liturgy as such, but to certain doctrinal corruptions retained in those services at the era of the Reformation. During the reign of Edward VI, rapid strides were made in the line of a thorough Protestant revision of the Service-book. Under Mary the reforming work was undone, and the Romish worship restored. Elizabeth, in the spirit of the statecraft, enforced a revision that was more true to her heart than to scripture, and into worship both the Reformed and the Roman Catholic classes of her subjects. The two streams of doctrine were forced into one channel of Church liturgy, where they have been confined in inorganic mixture ever since. Out of the stream thus formed, and flowing down through history, the exhalations of sacramentarianism and ritualism in this age have risen. In the revision of the Reformed Episcopal Church, it is claimed, these elements of erroneous doctrine have been taken out of the stream. The liturgy in this Church embodies the richest and best content, which, for the most part, is the Church's history, shorn of the accretions of superstition and error gathered in the descent. Though it does not claim to be perfect, it does claim to be Protestant, evangelical, scriptural. As such, its use is made obligatory on occasions; and, by usage that is almost common law, is seldom omitted on any occasions of regular public worship. Yet provision is made for free prayer. Meetings for extemporaneous prayer are encouraged, when the stately services of the liturgy are laid aside, either wholly or in part. Each man, or, at most, his conscience, it is, of regular public worship. The minister is free to add, extemporaneously, the prescribed prayer. Dignity and propriety are thus united to that warmth and earnestness which a more unscripted way of approach to God is suited to engender. Thus the continued use of liturgical forms, with their chastening and educating influence, is secured by law, and also that liberty for times and seasons when, by rising out of the limits of prescription, worship can be adapted to all the demands of evangelistic and revival work. This, it is believed, is as near an approach as can be made to a perfect system of worship.

(b) Government. — The government of this Church of Law. Neither in the individual membership, nor in the relations of the separate churches, nor yet in the connection of the larger ecclesiastical divisions is the bond of union that of mere association, under any proper conception of that term. Opinion, whether it refer to doctrine, to polity, or to discipline, forms no barrier to communion on the face of the council. In this way, in free debate, it passes by vote into particular law under the collective expression in the constitution; and then all, whether sections or persons, are bound by the law. The legal system is a body of canons like the old historical episcopal canon law, simply shorn of those arbitrary and tyrannical features of the old system derived from monarchical institutions in the State and autocratic episcopal rule in the Church. The application of a system of government, whether strong or weak, to actual life in a Church is not easy; but there is a tendency under ecclesiastical rule either to arbitrary severity or to the entire relaxation of discipline, according to the temper of persons and times and the class of influences that prevail. But it is believed important not to leave the advantage of this system of government to chance or mere law. It is stable government. That system, which is historical, having stood the test of the ages in the stress of human passion and the strife of opinion and interest, cannot but be strong and conservative. Canon law has ruled nearly all the Christian ages, adjusting itself to each age and growing into greater definiteness of form in each. If, in the purification of the doctrines of the Church, wisdom dictates, not the destruction, but the cleansing and reforming, of the system, it would seem to follow that the same wisdom teaches a people like ours to avoid the straw and take away its tyranny; in place of its arbitrary and unequal distribution of powers and functions, introduce the checks and balances of enlightened statesmanship, and you have in the Church a fair analogy to law in the State, where the principles and forms of the Roman law are not arbitrarily thrown aside, but enlarged, purified, developed into that grand system that secures the rights of men under the Christian civilization of this modern age. Such is the work this Church has sought to do. It has purified and adapted the old system of canon law to its own ends, and by that done what might be called steadfaithfulness and liberty in its scheme of government.

This system of government by canon law is a safeguard against the spread of error. Where the churches of an ecclesiastical organization are independent, or only connected by certain rules of association having no other than moral force, there is apt to be less jealousy and less exciting debate in the meetings of association, because the tendency of opinion and the results of controversy cannot crystallize into forms that bind under penalty. But this very fact is apt to lead to looseness and weakness on the part of the Church's history, shorn of the accretions of superstition and error gathered in the descent. Though it does not claim to be perfect, it does claim to be Protestant, evangelical, scriptural. As such, its use is made obligatory on occasions; and, by usage that is almost common law, is seldom omitted on any occasions of regular public worship. Yet provision is made for free prayer. Meetings for extemporaneous prayer are encouraged, when the stately services of the liturgy are laid aside, either wholly or in part. Each man, or, at most, his conscience, it is, of regular public worship. The minister is free to add, extemporaneously, the prescribed prayer. Dignity and propriety are thus united to that warmth and earnestness which a more unscripted way of approach to God is suited to engender. Thus the continued use of liturgical forms, with their chastening and educating influence, is secured by law, and also that liberty for times and seasons when, by rising out of the limits of prescription, worship can be adapted to all the demands of evangelistic and revival work. This, it is believed, is as near an approach as can be made to a perfect system of worship.

(c) Constitution and Relations of the Ministry of this Church. — In common with the parent Church, the Reformed retains a threefold distinction in the ministry—that of bishops, presbyters, and deacons. There is, however, this difference between the two communions in regard to the recognition of ordination. In the Old Church it is generally regarded as a threefold distinction in orders. The prevailing view among the representative writers of that Church is that the Christian ministry is divinely constituted on the Jewish pattern, and answers, in the relations of the New-Test. Church, to the orders of high-priest, priest, and Levite in the Old-Test. economy. The Reformed Church rejects this view as unscriptural and unhistorical. The episcopate it regards as an office rather than a divine order. The opinion that the bishop is an apostle in the scriptural meaning of that term, and as such the divinely ordained fountain of Church authority and Church life, and that the presbyterate descends from the episcopate in virtue of this inherent power to create it and to constitute it as a separate order, is rejected by the Reformed Episcopal Church. Looking at the subject historically, it finds the precise opposite of this to be the true statement. In the earliest infancy of the Church, under apostolic agency, deacons and elders were ordained and their respective functions assigned. About the close of the apostolic age, the emergencies of the growing Church demanded that such a council hold itself up as the representative of individual flocks by the presbyters as settled pastors, but of the general Church, both pastors and flock. This want was supplied by a gradual process, in which able and prominent presbyters were elevated to a general superintendence of the churches. Thus they became bishops, overseers by pre-eminence, presbyters in order, bishops in office. The Reformed Episcopal Church observes this distinction. Its episcopate, as in primitive times, is an office of supervision, not an order of divine command, separated from the presbyterate and with independent control.

According to this scheme, the bishop has no inherent and necessary rights and powers above the legislative control of the Church. He cannot fall back upon essential, divinely given, irresponsible authority to rule. His office and its functions are, under God, wholly from the Church, to which, therefore, he is, in the entire range of his official position and work, responsible. Episcopal tyranny is well-nigh impossible in a system like this. Yet the episcopate is not degraded because deprived of the claim to inherent divine right. The bishops cannot by ordinance put the Church under their sway. They draw to themselves not only personal respect and reverence for their characters, but intelligent official regard. In ordination and confirmation they are the priests, because the Church makes them so. In the difficulties and exigencies of the Church, their acts of discipline according to canon law have full force, and have already settled troubles which, under another scheme, would have been formidable. They are evangelists so far as, in the infancy of the Church, they can be spared from parochial charges, and thus become a more important agency in Church extension.

The deacon in this Church is a subordinate order. In theory the deacon is the helper of the presbyter; in practice his position is, thus far, only a sort of preparatory school for the presbyterate. Just what the office will become in the growth and development of the Church as it passes further into history can hardly be foreseen. Perhaps its relation to the general ministry will not differ greatly from that which prevails in the old Protestant Episcopal Church. This historic ministry is prized, not because of any belief in the notion of an "apostolic succession" in the sense of a doctrine or a fact, but partly because the historic element in a Church is always important, since Christianity itself is a historical religion, and partly because the peculiar mission of this Church is in the line of the English Church. The Reformed Church has kept its unbroken connection with that of the English Reformers; the Reformed Episcopal Church has the basis for its development and work. The Church thus constituted, identical with that of the English Church, gives the Church a vantage-ground where it can stand on an equal basis with the old communion, while it is purified from its errors, and is free to recognise the ministry of other Evangelical Churches as equally valid with its own. It stands in the gap, never here-tofore bridged, between Episcopal and Presbyterian churches. It has the ministry of both. It may be destined to be the medium of reconciliation between them, as it does not arrogate superiority to the one, and lacks nothing the other justly claims.

(d.) Church Councils.—These are of three grades, corresponding to the threefold organization of the Church—Parochial, Synodal, and General. (1) The individual parish is organized by charter under civil law, and is, in that relation, conditioned by the laws of the state in which it is situated. But in its own internal structure it is composed of rector or pastor, as the case may be, two wardens, and a certain number of vestrymen. The control of the temporal affairs of the given congregation outside of the pastor's immediate agency as the shepherd of the flock. It is possible this organization of the parish council may not be permanent in its present form, as there is some diversity of opinion on the subject in the Church. But either it is to remain in form or by violating the wardens ex officio with the functions now restricted to the council elected by the communicants of the parish, this feature of polity will unquestionably become historic in the Church.

(2) The Synodical Council is yet in its incipient stage, as the synod has not thus far taken practical existence and form in more than one or two instances. Provision is made for a certain number of parishes to form themselves into a synodical body under a bishop, who, though he may be nominated by the synod, must be confirmed by the synod, and wholly subject to its action at its will. As the synods multiply in numbers, and their field of work and their immunities become clearly discriminated in the general system of the Church, there will be stated conciliar assemblies at which all legislation and routine business pertaining to the jurisdiction it covers will be transacted. Probably the basis of representation will be so modified that instead of appointments from the several churches, as now, the synodical councils will elect representatives to the General Council.

(3) The General Council is the largest representative body of the Church, and is vested with supreme authority of legislation. It meets, as yet, annually, as its relations in the infancy of the Church are directly, not mediatelY, to the parishes. Already, however, steps have been taken looking to a change in the system of representation in the council, decreasing its number of members and lengthening the intervals of meeting. Eventually this council will, it is believed, meet not oftener than, if so often as, once in three years, and confine its deliberations to the general questions of doctrine and polity that affect the Church.

(4) There is looming up through the mists of the near future a representative assemblage of a still wider and more comprehensive character—something like an ecumenical council. It is the policy of this Church, in the spirit of its mission, to maintain the unbroken succession of unchanging truth through the lines that separate states or nations. It is evident, however, that this can only be done by a large and liberal allowance for the peculiarities of peoples living under contrasted systems of civil government, and growing up with tastes and social habits and modes of thought of distinct types. The Reformed Episcopal Church in America and in England is the same Church, yet the streams that flow out of the one spring into the several nationalities, are immediately modified by the civil, social, and ecclesiastical soil and climate they find. Identical in doctrine, spirit, and organic life, they vary somewhat in the forms of organization and worship that adapt themselves to their respective spheres. Only a policy is taking shape by which each national Church shall enjoy a limited independence of legislation, discipline, and worship, thus to work out its own history and destiny. Just what shall constitute the basis, the vital ligament that shall make the Church, however widely extended, a unit, an organic body, cannot yet be identified. Such, however, will undoubtedly be the connection that it will embrace provision for the meeting of a council within a certain term of years, and having under its control those wide questions that affect the characters of the local Churches. The London Church was not organized for a day or for a place, but for the world and for time.

These statements in regard to doctrines, orders, worship, discipline, and general usages are little more than the original declarations of principles adopted at the organization of the Church, Dec. 2, 1878, which is given as a comprehensive summary:

I. The Reformed Episcopal Church, holding "the faith once delivered to the saints," declares its belief in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the word of God, and the sole rule of faith and practice; in the creed commonly called the Apostle's Creed; in the divinity of the several persons of the Godhead; and in the Lord's supper; and in the doctrines of grace substantially as they are set forth in the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

II. This Church recognizes and adheres to episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and desirable form of Church polity.

III. This Church, retaining a liturgy which shall not be imperious or repressive of freedom in prayer, accepts the Book of Common Prayer, as it was revised, proposed, and recommended for use by the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, A.D. 1869, reserving full liberty to alter, abridge, enlarge, and amend the same, as may seem most conducive to the edification of the people, "provided that the substance of the faith be kept whole.

IV. This Church condemns and rejects the following erroneous and strange doctrines as contrary to God's Word:

First, That the Church of Christ exists only in one order or form of ecclesiastical polity.

Second, That Christian ministers are "priests" in another sense than that in which all believers are a "royal priesthood."

Third, That the Lord's table is an altar on which an oblation of the body and blood of Christ is offered anew to the Father.

Fourth, That the presence of Christ in the Lord's supper is a presence in the elements of bread and wine.

Fifth, That regeneration is inseparably connected with baptism.

III. Statistics.—The statistics of this Church thus early in its history are necessarily few and simple. If, however, they are carefully noted, they will, it is believed, indicate wider extension and more rapid growth than have marked most other ecclesiastical bodies in the beginning of their history.

I. The Number of Clergymen as reported to the council of 1878 was eighty-eight, of whom six were bishops, sixty-one prebendaries, and twenty deacons. Already the list has swollen to more than one hundred, and is increasing as rapidly as places and means of support can be supplied to the clergy already ordained; while the number of applicants for orders and for admission from the ministry in other churches, against whom the door is necessarily closed for want of ability to sustain them, is larger than ever before. The tabular report of the Committee on the State of the Church, covering other items made at the council, May, 1878, was very imperfect, as many of the parishes had failed to report. In its statement of the number of communicants it is thought to be very much below the actual number. It is as follows:

"This exhibit shows an increase of more than $172,000 over the amount reported in 1877, notwithstanding the perhaps unparalleled depression of the past year." In July, 1890, there were returned 109 churches, 120 ministers, 10,100 communicants.

2. Literary Institutions.—Of these the Reformed Episcopal Church can, as yet, boast but one, and that only in the infancy of what is hoped will, in due time of maturity, be a vigorous and influential life. The University of the West is at present organized substantially on the plan of the London University. Non-student professors prepare questions on which students are required to stand rigid examinations by written answers. In this university scheme, only the Martin College of Theology is thus far in organized working order. The whole is under the able charge of the Bishop of the Church in the education of its ministry. The times demand a ministry not only of thorough scholastic attainments, but well taught in theology in connection with the peculiarities of the Church they are to labor in. The Church seeks to compass this end by selecting all students in theology to a uniform system of questions in all departments of theological learning. The present plan may be modified when a sufficient endowment fund shall have been secured to meet the requirements of a local institution. Through the munificent liberality of a gentleman of New York, Edward Martin, Esq., the Church is in possession of landed estate in the suburbs of Chicago of large present and much larger prospective value. On this property the authorities of the university propose, eventually, to erect suitable buildings for the several colleges as they shall, from time to time, take form. It is their purpose, as the ability of the Church increases, to spare no pains to make the institution worthy of the Church and of the country.

8. Church Architecture.—The Reformed Episcopal Church supports two papers that set forth its principles and defend its interests. The Episcopal Recorder, published in Philadelphia, is a weekly paper which has become historic. It was the oldest weekly issue in the Protestant Episcopal Church, in which, during more than a half of the century, it advocated those principles of ecclesiastical polity and Christian life and doctrine that are still emblazoned on its banner. Transferred to the Reformed branch of the Church, it but continues its old work in new relations, and proves a highly important agent in the defence and extension of the truth in the newly organized communion. The Chicago Episcopalian, published in Chicago and New York, and issued bi-weekly. While aiming solely to meet the needs of the Church in the great West, it has extensive circulation in all parts of the land; and, though only about three years of age, displays much energy and ability. Its editor-in-chief is the present presiding bishop, Dr. Samuel Fallows, and he is aided by an efficient staff of clergymen of large ability and culture. This paper exerts wide influence in the Church. So early in its history, and with the time and energy of clergy and laymen, it has performed a parochial work, this Church has not as yet produced literary or theological works of extensive and standard character. Its ephemeral productions, however, from the nature of the case largely apologetic, are already numerous. Nearly all the prominent clergymen of this Church have been forced by attacks, often from the highest sources, to defend both their Church and their personal action in conforming to it. These writings constitute a body of argument, doctrinal and ecclesiastical, to sustain their Church with entire confidence, and the more so since, so far as is known, there has been no attempt to confute any single one of the many publications in question.

Such, in brief, are the history and principles of the Reformed Episcopal Church—a organization called into existence, its advocates believe, by the providence and spirit of God, and destined to exert a very deep, extensive, and lasting influence, not only in the country of its birth, but in the world. Reformed German Church. See GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH.

Reformed Methodist Church, an American offspring of the Methodist Episcopal Church, had its origin in 1814, and was started by a body of local preachers and exhorters, the most prominent and influential of whom was the Rev. Elijah Bailey, an ordained local preacher in the Vermont Conference. They had become dissatisfied with the polity of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and especially that part of it which relates to the powers and prerogatives of the episcopacy. They decided upon an organized body, as it exists in the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and set up the following standards and purposes:—

"To form a church, where the members have the right of nominating, electing, and discharging their own officers, as also their own members; to propagate the gospel in the Gentile world, and to extend the church of Christ in the heathen nations; to form and establish the government of the church, as also the system of discipline and worship; to form and establish a sound, clear, and simple system of doctrine; to maintain the moral and religious character of the church; to maintain a proper regard for the ordinances of Christ, and to promote the personal salvation of all men;"—with more.

The Reformed German Church was organized in 1814, at the Philadelphia Conference, and its constitution contains the following provisions:

"In the formation of a community of goods on a farm which they purchased at Bennington, Vt., and sustained for about two years. But the attempt to retain them as a community proved abortive, and the members of it soon scattered to different parts of the state of Vermont and New York, and to Upper Canada. In the British territory they succeeded in raising up a number of Reformed societies. In the States, however, their success was small. The dispersion of the community above alluded to operated favorably to the interests of the Church as a whole, as, after that period, they were favored from time to time with gracious revivals of religion. Thousands, no doubt, in following years have been converted and brought to a constant attendance of the services of the preachers of this Church. As a denomination, however, they did not prosper like other organized orthodox churches. They suffered much from dissensions in their own ranks and important secessions from their numbers. About half of their ministers and many of their societies left them in this state of things. This was the case with the Protestant Methodists; and at one time an entire conference of Reformed preachers went over to that denomination. At the time of their greatest prosperity they had five annual conferences and about seventy-five ministers and preachers, and from three to four thousand members. After the organization of another Methodist conference in the United States (the Wesleyan), most of the ministers and members of the Reformed Church came identified with that branch, and finally the body was merged into the so-called Methodist Church."

Doctrines.—In all matters of theology the "Reformers" are, or were, Methodist, if we except their belief in the gift of healing, by which physical maladies might be removed through the power of faith. This belief had gained for the Reformers the names of fanatics and enthusiasts; but they have used the compliment by accusing their calumniators of scepticism and infidelity.

Church Government.—The form of Church government selected by the Reformers was strictly congregational, with an administrative department, annual conferences; the former body not meeting periodically, but only at the call of the latter bodies. Their general rules are similar to those of the parent body, with the addition of some forbidding war, slavery, etc.

The only periodical published under the auspices of this Church at any time was the Luminous and Reformer, edited by Mr. Bailey, a son of the founder of the Church. The paper, however, has for years been discontinued. See Methodism (20).

Reformed Presbyterian Church. This body, like many others, is known by different names; its members have been designated as Mountain Men, Old Dissenters, Cameronsians, and Society People; but their most common designation is Covenanters. The name of "Mountain Men" was given them because they are a remnant of those who were driven to hills, moors, and other unheinhabitable places by persecutions and hardships inflicted by the Stuarts in Scotland. They are called "Cameronsians" from Richard Cameron, one of their leaders during that persecution. They were called "Society People" because they were often confined to prayer-meetings in private as their only means of social intercourse. The leading points in which they differ from other Presbyterian bodies.

1. A prominent feature is their separation from the State. In this country, as well as in the British isles, they withhold their vote, and to their religious observation, for the purpose of gaining a large number of ready, active laborers for their new organization, they resorted to the formation of a community of goods on a farm which they purchased at Bennington, Vt., and sustained for about two years. But the attempt to retain them as a community proved abortive, and the members of it soon scattered to different parts of the states of Vermont and New York, and to Upper Canada. In the British territory they succeeded in raising up a number of Reformed societies. In the States, however, their success was small. The dispersion of the community above alluded to operated favorably to the interests of the Church as a whole, as, after that period, they were favored from time to time with gracious revivals of religion. ereignty of Christ, and each, in its sphere, to be regulated, in a Christian land, by the written law. Where this law is either entirely disregarded or flagrantly violated, they refuse to take any part either in Church or State.

They lay great stress on the witnessing character of the Church (1sa. xiii, 10: "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord"). This idea enters largely into the constitution of the New-Test. organization—Acts i, 8: "But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Spirit is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.

This presents the double aspect of the Church's work—one, the salvation of men; one, the glory of God; both harmonizing in the services of ministers and people together (Acts i, 21; iii, 32; iv, 15; iv, 33; v, 22; x, 29; xiii, 31; xx, 21; xxi, 15, 18; xxvi, 16, 22; xxviii, 23; Rev. i, 2, 9; vi, 9; x, 3, 12; xii, 11, 17; xiv, 10).

This feature is presented often in the epistles, and implies three things: (a) setting forth the whole truth of God, keeping nothing back; (b) applying that truth to the persons addressed; (c) pointing out the common denominating evil. Following out this idea, Covenanters have, besides their Confession (d), a Testimony specifying the evils of the time.

Among other things, they speak of the practical testimony against moral evil in the Constitution of the United States. In one important particular the Constitution has already been amended—the clauses bearing on slavery. In this amendment Covenanters rejoice, and take courage to labor for further advance. In the antislavery conflict they stood among the foremost: they preached, they wrote, they labored in all available ways against the slave-holding interest. The articles which they still wish to see amended are such as the following:

(1.) In all the Constitution there is no recognition of God, the government of the world and Source of all authority and power. Justice Bayard and other authors labor earnestly in offering apologies for this defect; but all these apologies are set aside by the Declaration of Independence. In the simple fact that the Supreme is repeatedly acknowledged in that memorable document as nature's God, the Creator, as Divine Providence, and as the Judge of the world; as One on whose protection the nascent empire could exercise a "firm reliance" while struggling for existence. When independence was achieved and a prosperous career fairly entered, his people neglected and forgot the Creator: a change not made by the document, but by the people. In fact, Benjamin Franklin could not succeed in having prayer offered in the convention that framed the Federal Constitution. We think this is the first nation known to history that has set up a government without acknowledging any deity whatever. True it is that many of their deities were not worth the honor, while we as a nation have refused to honor "the God in whose hand our life is, and whose are all our ways."

Considerations: (a) He is not only the Creator of men, but he is the Author of national blessings. He gave the nation its existence at the first, and holds the entire control of all its destinies. (b) Civil government is one of his institutions for the good of men and for his own glory among men. Not only did he direct the people of Israel to set up judges and officers, but in the New Test. he recognizes such officers as his ministers, and their power as his influence. He claims obedience to them as his representatives, and that honor shall be given to them for his sake, while he tells all nations that there is no authority unless it be of God (Rom. xiii, 1-7; 2 Pet. ii, 13-17; Tit. iii, 1). All Christians are agreed that civil government set up on moral principles is the "ordinance of God.

requires even, an acknowledgment of him in the Constitution as well as elsewhere. (c) There are many very solemn services in the exercise of civil rule. Take one of many: A fellow-mortal is charged with murder, and must be dealt with, whether he be a citizen or not. This is in the sight of God: (i) whether we let him loose on society; (ii) whether we hang him up by the neck until he is dead; (iii) whether he is sent to the penitentiary for life; (iv) whether he is found guilty or innocent of the charge. In any and all of these cases civil rulers have the destiny of life and death, and act as an influence which may reach, for good or for ill, to eternity. This responsibility cannot be evaded, and it can be properly met in the fear of God only. So of war and peace, where thousands are involved at once. So of sanitary regulations. So of license to sell strong drink, gunpowder, and poisonous drugs. (d) He severely threatens and awfully punishes the nations that will not honor and serve him. (e) He has given abundant promises to nations who will serve him. (f) There is the same responsibility on a nation that there is on an individual; to the former it is not more than the latter. (g) The United States have received such favors from God, in quality and quantity, as have never been bestowed on any other nation, not even on the chosen family of Israel. Why should we not acknowledge in the most solemn and public manner the hand of God that gives?

(2.) The qualifications for rulers are very defective in the Constitution of the United States. Some officers are required to be of a certain age, and born in the country. It is taken for granted that they will be men of ability. This is as far as it goes; but the Constitution is to be regarded as the minister of God, some degree of moral character ought to be required, and the Constitution is the proper place to begin; then the people can select men of the highest order of Christian morality.

(3.) The government is supreme, set aside, superseded by three provisions: (a) the will of the people as stated in the preamble; (b) the Constitution itself as the expression of that will; (c) laws of Congress and treaties with foreign powers in carrying out the Constitution, art. vi, § 3. If these provisions meant no more than the relation to particular states, it would not be objectionable; but there is no allusion to a higher law in any part of the document.

6. Covenanters claim the universal application of the divine law to all the institutions of men, and to the man in every situation; all civil, military, commercial, financial, legislative, judicial, social, and all possible connections of man with man. They take no stock in street-car or railroad companies, or any institutions which degrade the Sabbath or otherwise trench on any of the ten commandments. They have always excluded freemen from their fellowship.

7. They hold the Old Test. as still the word of God, and of equal authority with the New.

8. In praise they use exclusively the book of Psalms. They also approve of instrumental music in church.

9. They claim that the praying-men, by which ministers and people stand on the same level, is a divine ordinance as much as family worship and public preaching. On this item they and the Methodists were long the only witnesses. For some twenty-five years the idea has been spreading, until all respectable bodies have their prayer-meetings, to say nothing of irregular associations. While other denominations regard rather the utility, propriety, and expediency of these meetings, Reformed Presbyterians stand for their divine institution, and claim obedience to their representatives, and that honor shall be given to them for their sake, while they tell all nations that there is no authority unless it be of God (Heb. x, 20; Col. iii, 16; Mal. iii, 16; John xx, 19; Acts xvi, 13).

10. Besides their adherence to the Scottish covenant, they hold that covenanting is an ordinance of the New Test. as well as of the Old. They thus find hold forth in prophecy (Isa. xvi, 10-21; xlv. 5; xlii. 4; Jer.

Refugee. See ASYLUM; CHURCH.

Refugee, Cities of. See City of Refuge.

Refugee (Fr. refugé), a name given to persons who have fled from persecution or political persecution in their own country and taken refuge in another.

The term was first applied to those Protestants who found an asylum in Britain and elsewhere at different periods, first during the Flemish persecutions under the duchess of Alva in 1567, and afterwards, in 1565, when Louis XIV of France revoked the Edict of Nantes and drove so many of the Huguenots (q. v.) into involuntary exile. Of the numerous French artisans who settled in England on this last occasion, the most part Anglicized their names, as by substituting Young for "le Jeune," Taylor for "Tellier," etc.; so that their posterity can now hardly be recognized as of foreign origin.

According to Lower (Patronymica Britannica), De Preux became Deprose, and "Richard Despair, a poor man," buried at East Grimstead, was, in the orthography of his forefathers, Despard. There were also refugee families of a higher class, some of whose descendants and representatives came to occupy a place in the peerage. The Bovaries, earls of Radnor, are descended from a French refugee family. The refugee family of Blaquière was joined to that of the Earl of Coleraine. Shaw Lefevre (lord Eversley) is the representative of a family of Irish refugees. The military employment offered in Ireland after 1688 maintained a considerable number of foreign Protestants. General Frederick Armand de Schomberg was raised by William III to the peerage, becoming eventually duke of Schomberg. A Huguenot officer of hardly less celebrity was Henry Massue (marquis de Ruvigny), created by William III earl of Galway. Lord Ligonier was also of a noble Huguenot family, and England has had at least one refugee bishop in Dr. John Goddard, bishop of Chester, and afterwards of Bangor. Among other refugees of note may be enumerated Sir John Houbon, lord mayor of London in 1695, one branch of whose family was represented by the late lord Palmerston; Elias Douberay, or Boireau, D.D., whose descendant was created a bishop as Sir Richard Borough of Haselden Park, Berkshire; as well as Martinneau, Bosanquet, and Papillon, whose descendants have attained more or less eminence in the country of their adoption. The first French Revolution brought numerous political refugees to England, and Great Britain is not the foremost of Europe for affording a ready asylum to refugees of all classes, both political and religious. See Weiss, History of the French Protestant Refugees, from the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes to the Present Time, translated by Hanman (Lond. 1854); Burns, History of the French, Wallace, Dutch, and other Foreign Protestant Refugees settled in England (Lond. 1846); Smiles, The Huguenots, their Set-ttlements, Industries, etc., in England, Ireland, and America (N. Y. 1868).

Regali, the name given to the privilege by which the king of France claimed to enjoy the revenues of a seat during its vacancy. See REGALIA.

Regalia (or REGALIA), Right of, is the possession of some of these privileges in ecclesiastical things. As the regaliæ Petri we distinguish the various rights and high prerogatives which, according to Romanists, belong to the pope as a kind of universal sovereign and king of kings. Under regale, however, is generally understood the right which sovereigns claim in virtue of their royal prerogative. The question as to the extent of these privileges has frequently been the subject of controversy between kings and popes. It involved several points as to presentation to benefices, most of which formed the object, from time to time, of negotiation by concordat; but the most serious conflict arose out of the claim made by the crown to the revenues of vacant benefices, especially bishoprics, and the co-ordinate claim to keep the benefice or the seat vacant for an indefinite period, in order to appropriate its revenue.
This plainly abusive claim was one of the main grounds of complaint on the part of the popes as to the practice of laying (q. v.), and it assumed its height in England under the first Norman kings, especially William Rufus. The most memorable conflict, however, on the subject of the regalia was that of Innocent XI (q. v.)
with Louis XIV, which was maintained with great per-tinacity on both sides for several years, the king extending the claim to some of the French provinces which had until then been exempt from it, and the pope refusing to confirm any of the appointments of Louis to the seats which became vacant as long as the obnoxious claim should be persisted in. The dispute continued till after the death of Innocent, Louis IV having gone so far as to seize upon the papal territory of Avignon in repiusal; but it was adjusted in the following pontificate, the most obnoxious part of the claim being practically abandoned, although not formally withdrawn. The contest grew out of the interpretation of French canon law which gives the right to the kings of France to enjoy the revenues of all bishoprics during their vacancy, and also to present to their prebends and all other their dignities without cure of souls. Such presentations might be made whether the dignity were vacant both de jure, by death, as by death, or only either de jure as if the incumbent were convicted of a crime or had accepted another dignity, or de facto, as if the regale should open after the presentation of an incumbent, but before he had taken possession. The regale lasted till a new admission to the bishopric was fully completed by taking the oath of allegiance, when a mandate was issued by the Chambre des Comptes to the commissary of the regale to restore the revenues. This right had one or two singular privileges: it occurred not only on a vacancy, but also when a bishop was made a cardinal, and lasted till he resigned the gift of an alienation; it lasted thirty years as regarded patronage, so that if the king should leave a dignity vacant and the new bishop fill it up, the king might appoint a fresh incumbent at any time within this date; it was absolutely in the king's discretion, and subject to no other constitutions whatever. The regale was at different times deprived of much of its original extent: certain bishoprics, as those of Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphine, claimed exemption; and though a decision of Parliament pronounced at one time that the right extended over the whole kingdom, this was afterward quashed, and the question remained undecided. Abbeys which were formerly subject to the regale were discharged, and an attempt to replace them under it quite failed. Finally all right to the revenues was resigned by Louis XIII and that of patronage was retained. See Commentarii de M. Dupuy sur la Traité des Libertés de M. Picon, i, 146. See also SUPREMACY, PAPAL.

Regalia (perhaps from rigabello, an instrument used prior to the organ in the churches of Italy), a small portable finger-organ in use in the 16th and 17th centuries, and perhaps earlier. Many representations exist of this instrument, including one sculptured on Melrose Abbey. The tubes rested on the air-chest, which was filled by the bellows; the bellows were managed with one hand, and the keys with the other.

Regem (Heb. id. דִּקָּם, friend; Sept. Ρύγιον v. r. Payrij), the first named of six sons of Jabsah (q. v.), apparently of the family of Caleb (1 Chron. ii, 47).
Ed. post 1568.

Reinemelch (Heb. Re'īm Mel'eh; friend of the Sept.
Αφίτριον v. r. Aphiōtēnos), the name of a person who, in connection with Sherezzer, was sent on behalf of some of the captive youth to make inquiries at the Temple concerning fasting (Zech. vii, 2). B.C. cir. 517.
In the A. V. the subject of the verse appears to be the captive Jews in Israel, and Bethel, or "the place of God", is regarded as the accusative after the verb of motion.
The Sept. takes "the king" as the nominative to the verb sent, considering the last part of the name Re-ptomelch as an appellative, and not as a proper name.
What reading the Sept. had is difficult to conjecture.
In the Vulgate, Sherezzer, Reinemelch, and their men are the persons who sent to the house of God. The Peshito-Syrac has a curious version of the passage:
" And he sent to Bethel, to Sherezzer and Rab-mag; and the king sent and his men to pray for him before the Lord." Sherezzer and Rab-mag being associated in Jer.
xxxix, 3, 13. The Hexaplar-Syrac, following the Peshito, has "Rab-mag." On referring to Zech. vii, 5, the expression "the people of the land" seems to indicate that those who sent to the Temple were not the captive Jews in Babylon, but those who had returned to their own country; and this being the case, it is probable that in ver. 2 "Bethel" is to be taken as the subject: "and Bethel," i.e. the inhabitants of Bethel, "sent." From its connection with Sherezzer, the name Reinemelch (lit.
"king's friend," comp. 1 Chron. xxxvii, 33) was probably an Assyrian title of office. See Rab-mag.

Regeneratio, a term applied to baptism because when any one becomes a Christian he enters upon a real and new spiritual life. See BAPTISM.

Regeneration (φαναγραγνια, Tit. iii, 5, a bening born again), that work of the Holy Spirit by which we experience a change of heart. It is expressed in Scripture by being born anew (John iii, 7; "from above"); be-going quenched (Eph. ii, 2): by Christ being found in the heart (I John iv, 19): a new creation (2 Cor. v, 17): a renewing of the mind (Rom. xii, 2): the washing, i.e.
the purifying of regeneration (Tit. iii, 5); a resurrection from the dead (Eph. i, 6): a putting off the old man, and a putting on the new man (iv, 22-24). And the subjects of the change are represented as begotten of God (John i, 18; 1 Pet. i, 8); begotten of the Spirit (John iii, 8); begotten of water, even of the Spirit (ver.
5): new creatures (Gal.vi,15): and partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. i, 4). The efficient cause of regeneration is the divine Spirit. Manifestation of regeneration (John i, 12, 18; iii, 4; Eph. ii, 8, 10); the instrumental cause is the word of God (James i, 18; 1 Pet. i, 22; 1 Cor. xiv, 15). The change in regeneration constitutes in the recovery of the moral image of God upon the heart, so as to love him supremely and serve him ultimately as our highest end. Regeneration consists in the implantation of the principle of love to God, which obtains the ascendency and habitually prevails over its opposites. Although the inspired writers use various terms and modes of speech to describe this change of mind, styling it conversion, regeneration, a new creation, etc., yet it is all effected by the word of truth or the Gospel of salvation gaining an entrance into the human mind and the heart. The second, the understanding, is the will, and to reign in the affections. In a word, it is faith working by love that constitutes the new creature or regenerate man (Gal. v. 6; 1 John v. 1-5). Regeneration, then, is the recovery of the moral image of God, and consequent of spiritual life, to a soul previously dead in trespasses and sins. It is the work of the Holy Spirit, opening the eyes of the mind, and enabling the sincere penitent to believe the Gospel and receive Christ as his only Saviour. This process is accomplished, as it is chiefly summed up in the character of the Holy Spirit and with the constitution of man; hence, by no violence is done to any physical, intellectual, or moral law or mode of action in human nature. The change is produced in the will, or heart, that is, in the moral, and not the natural, faculties of the soul. As depravity is wholly in the will and heart, the source and seat of all moral action, the divine operation consists in renewing the heart, and communicating a change of views, with a relish for the things of the Spirit. As justification places us in a new relation to God, so regeneration produces a new state of mind. In the case of children dying in infancy, they, of course, need regeneration to fit them for the eternal world. And there can be no difficulty in conceiving that they are regenerated by the Holy Spirit, in virtue of Christ's death, in the same sense in which they are deprived in consequence of Adam's fall. The disposition to sin is removed, the disposition to holiness is implanted, and thus their salvation is secured. The evidences of regeneration are conviction of sin, holy sorrow, deep humility, knowledge, faith, repentance, love, and devotedness to God's glory. The properties of it are these: 1. It is a receptive work, and herein it differs from conversion. In regeneration we receive from God; in conversion we are active and turn to him. 2. It is a powerful work of God's grace (Eph. iii. 8). 3. It is an instantaneous act, for there can be no medium between life and death; and here it differs from sanctification, which is progressive. 4. It is a complete act, and perfect in its kind; a change of the whole man (2 Cor. v. 17). 5. It is a great and important act, both as to its author and effects (Eph. ii. 4, 5). 6. It is an internal act, not consisting in the outward forms (Ezek. xxxvi, 26, 27). 7. Visible as to its effects (1 John iii. 14). 8. Delightful (1 Pet. i. 8). 9. Necessary (John iii. 3). See CONVERSION; NEW BIRTH.

Our Lord in one instance (Matt. xix, 28) uses the term regeneration. Accordingly, Dr. Campbell translates it "the renovation," and remarks that the relation is here to the general state of things in the future world, when all things will become new. See NEW CREATION; RESTITUTION.

REGENERATION BY WATER. In our Lord's discourse on the subject of regeneration (Matt. xviii, 19): "He that believeth and is baptized shall receive new life."

Nicolaites, the sect which professed to be Baptists, and who were not content with the outward forms of the Gospel, were called by the apostles "Baptizers." The influence of this office is to bring the following words of the apostle Paul to mind: "But whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things" (Phil. iv. 8).

5. Our Lord himself dispensed with baptism in the admission of at least one member into his kingdom, namely, the dying thief (Luke xxiii, 42, 43).

6. Christ certainly does mean to attach importance to water-baptism as an initiative rite into his Church or kingdom. The body of believers exists under two aspects, the visible and the invisible—the outward or nominal, and the inward or real. Baptism is as imperative a mark of admission to the former as spiritual new birth is to entrance into the latter. In order to a full recognition of its significance, the true meaning of the term is truly essential. This doctrine, which orthodox ecclesiastics have always maintained, is thus strictly in accordance with the tenor of the text in question.

Reggio, Isaac Samuel, a Jewish writer, was born Aug. 15, 1784, at Goetz, in Illyria. As the son of a rabbi, he received a thorough Jewish education, and with his brilliant powers he soon became master of Jewish literature, and acquired an extraordinary knowledge of Hebrew. His talents and fame secured for him the appointment to the professorship of mathematics at the Lyceum when Illyria became a French province. He succeeded his father in the rabbinate of his native place, and died Aug. 29, 1855. Of his many writings, we mention, הֵיטוֹפְלָיִיתִוּת, a treatise on the inspiration of the Mosaic law, incorporated in the introduction to the Pentateuch (Vienna, 1818); דַּרְשָׁה לַמִּצְוֹת, an Italian translation of the Pentateuch, with a Hebrew commentary and a more elaborate introduction, in which he gives an account of 148 Hebrew expositions of the Pentateuch of various ages (ibid. 1821, 5 vols. 8vo); On the necessity of having a Theological Seminary, in his writings in Italian (Venice, 1822); in consequence of which the Collegium Rubinitianus was opened at Padua in 1829, for which he had drawn up the constitution: Contrattualita di Religione e Filosofia (Vienna, 1827)—a dissertation, Whether Philosophy is in Opposition to Tradition, תְּאָדוֹתַד הָעָנְתָא (Leipsic, 1840):—Il Libro d'Inizi, Versione poetica fatta sull'originale Testo Ebraico (Vienna, 1843)—a historical-critical introduction to the book of Esther, entitled הַנִּֽתִית הַנְּיִּֽהָה (ibid. 1841). Besides these, Reggio wrote numerous treatises on various points connected with the Hebrew Scriptures and literature in the different Jewish periodicals.

Regina Coeli (Lat. for Queen of heaves), an application given by the ancient church to June.

Region-round-about, (גָּדוֹלַחַר), this term had perhaps originally a more precise and independent meaning than it appears to a reader of the A. V. to possess. It is used by the Sept. as the equivalent of the singular Hebrew word הָעָנְתָא (חָנָת, literally "the round"), a word the topographical application of which is not clear, but which seems in its earliest occurrence in the singular Hebrew word הָעָנְתָא (חָנָת, literally "the round"), a word the topographical application of which is not clear, but which seems in its earliest occurrence in the singular Hebrew word הָעָנְתָא (חָנָת, literally "the round") of the "cities of the Circum" (Gen. xii, 10-12; xix, 17, 25, 28, 29; Deut. xxxiv, 3). Elsewhere it has a wider meaning, though still attached to the Jordan (2 Sam. xxvii, 8; 1 Chron. iv, 17; Neh. iii, 22; xii, 24, 26, etc.), and in this less restricted sense that הָעָנְתָא occurs in the New Test. In Matt. iii, 5 and Luke iii, 3 it denotes the populous and flourishing region which contained the towns of Jericho and its dependences in the Jordan valley, enclosed in the amphitheatre of the hills of Quenausta, a densely populated region, and important enough to be reckoned as a distinct section of Palestine—Jerusalem, Judea, and all the "region of Jordan" (Matt. iii, 5; also Luke vii, 17). It is also applied to the district of Gennesaret, a region which presents certain similarities to that of Jericho, being enclosed in the amphitheatre of the hills of Hattis and bounded in front by the water of the lake, as the other was by the Jordan, and also resembling it in being very thinly populated (Matt. xiv, 35; Mark vi, 55; Luke vi, 57; xvi, 17). It is perhaps nearly equivalent to the modern Arabic appellation of the גָּדוֹלַחַר. See Topographical Terms.

Regiuntari, one of the three classes of subdecons at Rome, appointed in the 11th century, and employed in various occupations in the several regions or districts of that city. The other classes were called Pallatinus (q.v.) and Stationarius (q.v.).

Regius, Jean Baptiste de, a French Jesuit and geographer, was born at Istres, in Provence, in 1725, and was sent as a missionary to China about 1700. His scientific attainments gained him a place at court and the favor of the emperor Hang-he, who, in 1706, placed him at the head of a commission of Jesuits to make a survey and draw up a map of the Chinese empire. His labors were interrupted in 1724 when the emperor Yung-ching proscribed the Christian religion. He wrote a full history of his labors, a condensation of which may be found in Du Halde's Description de la Chine. He translated into Latin the Yih-kung, edited by Julius Nies (Nütsch und Tullaengen, 1854, 2 vols.). The MS. is in the National Library, Paris.

Registrers. See Dyptichs.

Registrars of Ordination were first ordered to be preserved in 1257 in the bishop's house or in the cathedral.

Registrers, Parish, were required to be kept as a record of baptisms, marriages, and burials in 1338 by Cromwell, by the royal injunctions of 1474, and the 70th Canons of 1638.

Regium Donum, a sum of money annually allowed by the crown to dissenting ministers. It originated in a donation, made in the way of royal bounty, by George II, in the year 1723, consisting of £500, to be paid out of the treasury, for assisting first of all the widows, and afterwards either ministers or their widows, who were in want of assistance. The first minister to receive it was Mr. Daniel Burgess, who had had for some time been secretary to the princess of Wales, and was approved by Lord Townshend, secretary of state, and Sir Robert Walpole, chancellor of the exchequer, who entered readily into the measure because the Dissenters proved themselves very friendly to the house of Brunswick, and he wished to reward them for their loyalty. When the money was paid, a strict charge was given that the matter should be kept very secret. Some few years after, the sum was raised to £1,500 half-yearly; and at present, though no longer a regular donation, it is still annually granted by Parliament, amounting to about £5,000, but including the relief granted to "Poor French refugee clergy, poor French Protestant laity, and sundry small charitable and other allowances to the poor of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, and others."

REGIUM DONUM, Irish, a pecuniary grant, voted annually by the British Parliament, out of the national exchequer, to aid certain bodies of Presbyterians in Ireland by providing stipends for their ministers. This grant, which now amounts to about £40,000 a year, is divided among six different bodies of Presbyterians, viz. 1. The Remonstrants, or Unitarian Synod of Ulster. 2. The Presbyterian Assembly. 3. The Synod of Munster. 4. The Synod of Ulster. 5. The Synod of Monriver. 6. The Parliament of Munster. During the reign of Queen Anne, this grant was only allowed to the Presbyterians of Ireland, and under the mild sway of Usher their clergy became incumbents of parishes, and were permitted to enjoy tithes and other emoluments. But after the accession of Charles II they were wholly dependent upon their grants. In 1672 a king gave Sir Arthur Forbes £600 to be divided among them. William III issued an order, June 19, 1690, authorizing the payment of £1200 to Patrick Adair and six other clergymen. In the following year this bounty was removed from the customs, and made payable out of the Irish exchequer.
Such was the origin of the Regium Donum in its present permanent character. There was this important change made, however: the power of allocating the amount was taken from the trustees and transferred to the Lord lieutenant. In 1631 the grant was placed on the English miscellaneous estate and the annuity principle was abandoned, and £75 Irish currency was promised to every minister connected with the Synod of Ulster and the Secession Synod, with the proviso (1640) that he was to receive at least £35 of yearly stipend. The amount required was increasing at the rate of £40 a year, to meet the demands of new congregations. The Regium Donum was withdrawn by the act of 1689, which came into force Jan. 1, 1671, disallowing the Irish Episcopal Church.

Regius, the Latinized name of Urban König, a learned theologian, preacher, and writer, and also an influential promoter of the Reformation. He was born in 1490 of parents in moderate circumstances, and resident at Langenargen, near Lake Constance. At the age of seventeen he was evagelized, and in 1498 he went to Basle as a student of theology, and by his application and progress won the favor of his professors; but an injudicious defense of the disputations of John Eck, later the noted opponent of Luther, led to his suspension from the university in 1498 and his removal to Basle. After a brief sojourn in Basle, he was called to the chair of poetry and oratory in the University of Ingolstadt, where Eck was likewise employed as professor of theology, and where a circle of humanists were then striving to bring the classics into honor. Regius distinguished himself to such a degree as to receive from the hands of the emperor Maximilian a laurel crown in recognition of his services, and saw his classes grow continually. But his success was interrupted by the neglect of patrons to settle bills which he had contracted, and some years were his pupous, so that, in utter discouragement, he became a soldier in the imperial army—a situation from which he was fortunately delivered by the interference of Eck, who secured his discharge from the army and also the payment of his debts, as well as an increased salary for the future.

Regius, however, began to dislike the studies in which he was engaged, and to manifest a growing predilection for theology. He was especially impressed with the influence of the Wittenberg reformational movements, and from the increase of the synthesis of the papal party against him, and compelled his removal; but he soon returned, and labored with great energy for the extension of the evangelical doctrines, from 1522 to 1530, by presenting them to the people in sermons from the pulpit of St. Ann's Church, and by disputations and controversial writings. Luther came to regard him as the principal supporter of evangelicalism in Swabia, while Eck charged him with black ingratitude, and prosecuted him with passionate hatred and malicious cunning. It was perhaps owing to the bitterness of such experiences that he concluded to imitate the example of other Reformers and establish for himself the refuge of a home. He married Anna Weisbrücke, a native of Augsburg, who sustained him faithfully while he lived, and by whom he became the father of thirteen children.

The fame of Regius had in the meantime become so extended that his counsel and aid were frequently sought even by distant cities and countries. Duke Ernest of Lüneburg, summoned the Confessor, urged him to assist in introducing the Reformation into that territory, and Regius pledged his services to that end, removing to Celle, and exercising all the functions of the new position. He was soon appointed general superintendent over the whole duchy, and in that position was enabled, by judicious counsels and restless activity, to rapidly advance the interests of the Reformation. Two years were spent in superseding the Roman clergy and their services with an evangelical ministry and worship, in improving the schools and gymnasium of the country, and also in establishing the infant Church on a legal foundation, and in securing the transfer of the confiscated goods of monasteries to the use of the Church and of schools. A call to return to Augsburg at this time (1532) was declined, and his life was thenceforward spent in the service of the prince and people of the duchy of Lüneburg, though he took an active part in the introduction and development of Protestantism in other places: e.g. the county of Hoya, to which he was appointed in 1534, Hanover, Brunswick, Minden, and Hörster, the territory of Schaumburg, etc. He also responded to the request of count Enno for evangelical preachers by sending Martin Onderkam and Matthias Gündich to East Friesland. He ranks, accordingly, as one of the most active promoters of the Reformation in Germany. In 1537 he accompanied duke Ernest to the convention at Smalcald, and signed the Smalcald Articles; in 1538 he was present at the Convention of Brunswick, and in 1540 at Hagenau, where an abortive attempt at reconciliation between the papal and the evangelical parties was made, and where the king, Ferdinand, issued a decree for a religious conference at Worms. Physical inability prevented Regius from participating in the proceedings of the latter diet. A severe cold incurred on his return from Hagenau resulted in a dangerous sickness, and on May 23, 1541, he ended his useful life. The veneration of his contemporaries proved his worth.

In appearance, Regius was a man of medium height and spare and delicate figure, easy and yet resolute in his bearing, and characterized by an air of intelligence and moral earnestness. His writings breathe the same Christian spirit which belonged to his personality. They number ninety-seven different works, which were published at Nuremberg in 1562, the German in four parts, and the Latin in three. His exegetical works deserve special attention of the student of the fundamental and thoroughness and skill with which the sense of Scripture is developed in them; and, in addition, the following are worthy of note: Formulse quadam caute et citra Scandimum Logendi de Praeceptis Christianae Doctrinae Loca (1535), which has almost reached the position of a standard work in the English language;—Catechismus Minor (1536), and Catechismus Major (1537), which are peculiar in that the questions are placed in the mouth of the pupil, and the answers are assigned to the teacher:—Erklaerung der zwey Artikel des christlichen Glaubens (1525); and others among them several works on Church discipline, which have been often reprinted.

Regnum, a name for the crown or diadem of the popes, encircled with three crowns. It is (says Innocent III. cir. 1260) the imperial crown, representing the pope's power and plenitude, absolutely unwavering. According to some authors, Hornisclus first wore a crown which had been sent to him as a mark of fealty by the emperor Anastasius, to whom Clovis had presented it in 550, while some refer it to a gift of Constantine to pope Sylvester. At the entrance of a church the pope, when borne on a litter, laid aside the regnum and put on a precious mitre, but resumed when he left the building. Paul II made a new regnum, and enriched it with precious stones, when its use had long lapsed. At first it was a round or conical cap, ending in a round ball, and wreathed with a single gold crown, representing regal and temporal power. It is mentioned in the 11th century. In the 9th century, on mosaics, Nicholas I is represented wearing two circles, the lower labelled "The crown of the kingdom, from God's hand," and the upper inscribed "The crown of empire, from St. Peter's hand." Boniface VIII (1294-1303) added a second or spiritual crown, while Benedict XII (1334), others say John XII or Urban V, contributed the third coronet of papal sovereignty, and about that time the ornament assumed an oval form, and was called the papal ring. The papal tiara is a triple tiara, representing three crowns on the tiara. On putting on the tiara, the cardinal-deacon says to the pope, "Receive the tiara, adorned with three crowns, and know that thou art father of kings and princes, the ruler of the world." The crowns represent the three realms of heaven, earth, and purgatory, according to Baur; but as Jesus explains it, the three divisions of the earth—Europe, Asia, and Africa. Pope Adrian VI's effigy at Viterbo has no crowns on the tiara. See TIARA.

Regula Fidéi. See FAITH, RULE OF.

Regular Canons (Lat. Canonici Regularis, canons bound by rule), the name given, after the reform introduced into the system of cathedral clergy in the 11th century, to the members of those canonical bodies which adopted that reform. They were thus distinguished from the so-called "secular canons," who continued exempt from rule, and who are represented down to modern times by the canons, prebendaries, and other members of the cathedral clergy, in those churches in which the full cathedral system of the Roman Catholic Church is maintained. The rules of the regular canons being variously modified in different countries and ages, a variety of religious orders arose therefrom—Augustines, Premonstratensians, etc. See CANONS, REGULAR.

Regular Clerks are modern religious orders founded for preaching, medicine, or education. The principal are the Theatines (q. v.), founded by Paul IV, and the Oratorians (q. v.), instituted in 1550 by Philip Neri, of Florence. See CANONS, REGULAR.

Regulars or Regulærs. During the 4th and 5th centuries it was not customary to place monks, as such, on equal footing with the clergy; nor were they regarded as part of the clerical body until the 10th century. Before this they were distinguished by the name of religious or regulæers, and afterwards a distinction was carefully made between clerici secularis, i.e. parish priests and other secular clergy, who were charged with the care of souls, and clericæ regulæ, i.e. those belonging to monastic orders. This name was applied to the latter because they were bound to live according to certain rules (regulae).—Riddle, Christian Antig.

Rehab'ïah (Heb. Rehob'ah, רֶהָבָא, enlarged by Jehorah; also, in the prolonged form, Rehob'ah, רֶהָבָא, 1 Chron. xxiv. 21; xxvi. 25; Sept. Pashi'ah or Pash'ia, v. r. Pash'ia or Pash'ia, the only son of Eli-

Rehearse, in the Prayer-book, is understood to imply distinctness of utterance, in opposition to a low and hesitating manner, as in the catechism. Sometimes the word simply denotes saying or reading, or a recapitulation; as where Latimer remarks in a sermon, "I will therefore make an end, without any rehearsal or recital of that which is already said." See REHEARSE.

Reh经查, Carl Dr., a Jewish rabbi, was born Feb. 9, 1792, at Aldorf, in Breisgau. When fifteen years of age he went to Yverdon, in Switzerland, to attend the lectures at the Pestalozzi Institution there. He then entered the lyceum at Rastatt, and after due preparation was enabled to attend the lectures at the Heidelberg University, where he was promoted, Aug. 25, 1834, as doctor of philosophy. Having completed his studies, he was appointed preacher of the Jewish congregation at Heidelberg, where he died, Feb. 18, 1842. He translated into German the శాసనాచర్య, a Jewish ritual used for the sick, etc. (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1834). Besides, he published a number of school-books. See Forst, Bibl. Jud. (Berlin, 1837), and Kornmoller, Die Juden in Deutschland, p. 558 sq.; Steinschneider, Bibliothek. Heinen, p. 115; Zunz, Die Monatsschr. der K. J. Gesellschaft (Berlin, 1872; Engl. transl. by Rev. B. Rechob (Heb. Rechob, רֶכֶךֹב, [twice רֶכֶה, 2 Sam. x. 8; Neh. x. 11], a street, from its width: Sept. Padd'ash, Padd'iss, Padd'iss, etc.), the name of two men and also of three places in the north of Palestine.

1. The father of the Hadadezer, king of Zobah, whom David smote at the Ephrathites (2 Sam. viii. 3, 12). B.C. ante 1045. Josephus (Ant. vii. 5, 1) calls him Arous (Aroos), and the old Latin version Aronas. The name possibly had some connection with the district of Syria called Rehoboam, or Beth-rehob (2 Sam. x. 6, 8).

2. A Levite who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. vi. 11). B.C. 440.

3. The northern limit of the exploration of the spies who explored Canaan (Num. xi. 21). It is specified as being "as men come unto Hamath," or, as the phrase is elsewhere rendered, "at the entrance of Hamath," i.e. at the commencement of the territory of that name, by which in the early books of the Bible the great valley of Lebanon is meant. Rechabaha of the modern Arabs, seems to be roughly designated. This, and the consideration of the improbability that the spies went farther than the upper end of the Jordan valley, seems to fix the position of Rechob as not far from Tell ed-Dûd, the ruins at the head of the Wady Kady, and Banias. This is confirmed by the statement of Judg. xix. 28, that Laish or Dan (Tell el-Kady) was "in the valley that is by Beth-rehob." Dr. Robinson (Later Bib. Res. p. 571) proposes to identify it with Haman, an ancient fortress in the mountains north-west of the plain of Halieh, the upper district of the Jordan valley. But since the names of Kuebeh, of a valley, and Jeir-Rehob, of an Arab mine, are found near Banias, Thomson (Land and Book, i. 591) prefers that vicinity. There is no reason to doubt that this Rechob or Beth-rechob was identical with the place mentioned under both names in 2 Sam. x. 6, 8, in connection with Maachah, which was also in the upper district of the Huleh. See BETH-REHOB.

4. One of the towns allotted to Asher (Josh. xix. 28), and which from the list appears to have been in close proximity to Zidon. It is named between Ekron, Abdon, and Hammon. Schick, however, gives it a position seven and a half miles east of Tyre, on the river Leontes; referring, perhaps, to the modern village Reich or Harsyek.
Asher contained another Rehob (Josh. xix. 30). One of the two was allotted to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 31; 1 Chron. vi. 75), and of one its Canaanitish inhabitants (Josh. xi. 27, etc.) the mention of Aphiq in this latter passage may imply that the Rehob referred to was that of Josh. xix. 30. This, Eusebius and Jerome (Epist. confess. a. v. “Hodh”) confounded with the Rehob of the spies, and place it four Roman miles from Scythopolis. The place they refer to still survives as Rehob, three or four half miles south of Beisan, but their identification of a town in that position with one in the territory of Asher is obviously inaccurate. The Rehob in question is possibly represented by the modern Tell Kurdayyin, south of the river Belus, near the north-western corner of the sea of Galilee where there is a splendid spring (Robinson, Late Bib. Rev. p. 104).

Rehoboam (Heb. Rechab, רכזם, enl. of the people [see Exod. xxxvi. 24, and comp. the name Ephroim]; Sept. Pojoua: Josephus, Pojouamoc. Ant. viii. 8,1), the only son of Solomon, by the Ammonitish princess Naamah (I Kings xiv. 21, 31), and his successor (xii. 43). Rehoboam’s mother is distinguished by the title the (not as, as in the A. V. Ammunito. She was therefore one of the foreign women whom Solomon married in his kingdom (II Kings xi. 19). In the Sept. (I Kings xii. 22, 24, answering to xvi. 31 of the Hebrew text) she is stated to have been the “daughter of Ana (i.e. Hana) the son of Nahash.” If this is a translation of a statement which once formed part of the Hebrew text, and which was preserved as authentic history, it follows that the Ammonitish war into which Hanan’s insurrection had provoked David was terminated by a re-alliance. Rehoboam was born B.C. 1014, when Solomon was but twenty years old, and as yet unanointed to the throne. His reign was noted for the great political scheme which he attempted, and which continued to the end of both lines of monarchy.

From the earliest period of Jewish history we perceive symptoms that the confederation of the tribes was but imperfectly cemented. The powerful Ephraim could never break a position of inferiority. Throughout the book of Judges (viii. 1, xii. 1) the Ephraimites show a spirit of restless jealousy when any enterprise is undertaken without their concurrence and active participation. From them had sprung Joshua, and afterwards (by his command) the tribe was never to be considered theirs; and though the tribe of Benjamin gave to Israel its first king, yet it was allied by hereditary ties to the house of Joseph, and by geographical position to the territory of Ephraim, so that up to David’s accession the leadership was practically in the hands of the latter tribe. The Ephraimites of the north, in fact, were always threatened to be a formidable rival. During the earlier history, partly from the physical structure and situation of its territory (Stanley, Syr. and Palest., p. 162), which secluded it from Palestine just as Palestine by its geographical character was secluded from the world, it had stood very much aloof from the nation [see Judah, Tribe of], and even after Saul’s death, apparently without waiting to consult their brethren, “the men of Judah came and anointed David king over the house of Judah” (2 Sam. ii. 4), while the other tribes adhered to Saul’s family, thereby anticipating the final disruption which was afterwards to rend the nation permanently into two kingdoms. But after seven years of disaster a reconciliation was forced upon the contending parties; David was acknowledged as king of Israel, and soon after, by fixing his court at Jerusalem and bringing the tabernacle there, he transferred from Ephraim the greatness which had attached to Shechem as the ancient capital and to Shiloh as the seat of the national worship. In spite of this he seems to have enjoyed great national popularity among the Ephraimites, and to have treated many of them with special favor (1 Chron. xii. 30; xxvii. 10, 14), yet this roused the jealousy of Judah, and probably led to the revolt of Absalom (q. v.). Even after that perilous crisis was passed, the old rivalry broke out afresh and almost led to another insurrection (2 Sam. xx. 1, etc. [comp. Ps. lxxxviii. 60, 67, etc., in illustration of these remarks]). Solomon’s reign, from its severe taxes and other oppressions, aggravated the discontent, and latterly, from its irreligious character, alienated the prophets and provoked the displeasure of God. When Solomon’s strong hand was withdrawn, the crisis came (B.C. 973). Rehoboam selected Shechem as the place of his coronation, probably as an act of concession to the Ephraimites, and perhaps in deference to the suggestions of those old and wise counsellors of his father whose advice he afterwards unhappily rejected. From the present Hebrew text of 1 Kings we cannot get the exact details of the transactions at Shechem are involved in a little uncertainty. The general facts, indeed, are clear. The people demanded a remission of the severe burdens imposed by Solomon, and Rehoboam promised them an answer in three days, during which time he consulted first his father’s counsellors, and then the young men “that were grown up with him and which stood before him,” whose answer shows how greatly during Solomon’s later years the character of the Jewish court had degenerated. Rejecting the advice of the elders to conciliate the people at the minimum and to promise them “no more burden than the Egyptians,” he “sent word in their behalf to say, My father’s burdens will I increase on you; my son’s burdens will I add to your burdens; and I will chastise you with scorpions” (i.e. scourgies furnished with sharp points; so in Latin, scorpio, according to Liddell [Orig. v. 27], is “vircg nodosa at aculeata, quia arcuato vulnere in corpus inflictur” [Faciolati, s. v.]). Thereupon arose the formidable song of insurrection, heard abroad in the land before the tribes quarrelled after David’s return from the war with Absalom:

“What portion have we in David? What inheritance is Jesse’s son? To your tents, O Israel! Now see to thy own house, O David!”

Rehoboam sent Adoram or Adoniram, who had been chief receiver of the tribute during the reigns of his father and his grandfather (1 Kings iv. 6; 2 Sam. xx, 24), to reduce the rebels to reason, but he was stoned to death by the people; and his attendants, when his chariots were returned to Jerusalem, were slain in the streets. This was in the days of Rehoboam, when the land was not yet divided into the two kingdoms.

Israel heard that Jeroboam was come again, and they sent and called him unto the congregation and made him king.” We find in the Sept. a long supplement to this 12th chapter, possibly ancient, containing fuller details of Jeroboam’s biographical or the Hebrew. See Jeroboam. In this we read that after Solomon’s death he returned to his native city,Charlotte, which he fortified, and lived there quietly, watching the turn of events until the long-expected rebellion broke out, when the Ephraimites heard (doubtless through his own agency) that he had returned, and invited him to Shechem to assume the crown. From the same supplementary narrative of the Sept. we might infer that more than a year must have elapsed between Solomon’s death and Rehoboam’s visit to Shechem, for, on receiving the news of the former event, Jeroboam requested from the king of Egypt the right to return to his father’s country. This the king tried to prevent by giving him his sister-in-law in marriage; but on the birth of his child Abijah, Jeroboam renewed his request, which was then granted.
It is probable that during this year the discontent of the northern tribes was making itself more and more manifest and that this led to Rehoboam's visit and intimated inauguration. The comparative chronology of the reigns determines them both as beginning in this year.

On Rehoboam's return to Jerusalem he assembled an army of 180,000 men from the two faithful tribes of Judah and Benjamin (the latter transferred from the side of Joseph to that of Judah in consequence of the position of David's capital within its borders), in the hope of reconquering Israel. The expedition, however, was forbidden by the prophet Shemaiah, who assured them that the separation of the kingdoms was in accordance with God's will (1 Kings xii, 24). Still, during Rehoboam's lifetime peaceful relations between Israel and Judah were never restored (2 Chron. xii, 15; 1 Kings xiv, 30). Rehoboam now occupied himself in strengthening the territories which remained to him by building a number of fortresses of which the names are given in 2 Chron. xi, 6-10, forming a girdle of "fenced cities" round Jerusalem. The pure worship of God was maintained in Judah, and the Levites and many pious Israelites from the North, came to the city-solitary introduced by Jeroboam at Dan and Bethel, in imitation of the Egyptian worship of Men-Kheper, came and settled in the southern kingdom and added to its power. But Rehoboam did not check the introduction of heathen abominations into his capital. The lascivious worship of Astarte was allowed to exist by the side of the true religion (an inheritance of evil doubtless left by Solomon), "images" (of Baal and his fellow-divinities) were set up, and the worst immoralities were tolerated (1 Kings xiv, 22-24). These evils were punished and put down by the terrible calamity of an Egyptian invasion. Shortly before this time a change in the ruling house had occurred in Egypt. The twenty-first dynasty of Thiniteis, whose last king, Pisham or Pussennes, had been a close ally of Solomon (iii, 1; vii, 8; ix, 16; x, 29, 29), was succeeded by the twenty-second of Bubastites, whose first sovereign, Sheshak (Sheshonk, Sesonchis, Zauaraxis), was himself connected, as we have seen, with Jeroboam. That he was incited by him to attack Judah is very probable. At all events, in the fifth year of Rehoboam's reign the country was invaded by a host of Egyptians and other African nations, numbering 1200 chariots, 60,000 cavalry, and a vast miscellaneous multitude of infantry (B.C. 959). The line of fortresses which protected Jerusalem to the west and south was forced, Jerusalem itself was taken, and Rehoboam had to purchase a temporary peace by delivering up all the treasures with which Solomon had adorned the Temple and palace, including his golden shields, 200 of the larger and 300 of the smaller size (x, 16, 17), which were carried before him when he visited the Temple in state. We are told that after the Egyptians had retired, his vain and foolish successor was comforted by substituting shields of brass, which were solemnly borne before him in procession by the body-guard, as if nothing had been changed since his father's time (Ewald, Geschichte der Volks Israel, iii, 346, 404). Sheshak's success is commemorated by sculptured monuments of Champollion on the outside of the great temple at Karnak, where among a long list of captured towns and provinces occurs the name Judah Malek (kingdom of Judah). It is said that the features of the captives in these sculptures are unmistakably Jewish (Rawlinson, Herodotus, ii, 376, and Bampton Lectures, p. 126; Benson, Egypt, iii, 242). After this great humiliation the moral condition of Judah seems to have improved (2 Chron. xii, 12), and the rest of Rehoboam's life to have been unmarked by any events of importance. He died B.C. 956, after a reign of seventeen years, having ascended the throne at the age of forty-one (1 Kings xiv, 21; 2 Chron. xii, 13). In the addition to the Sept. already mentioned (inserted after 1 Kings xii, 24) we read that he was sixty years old at his accession—a misstatement probably founded on a wrong interpretation of 2 Chron. xiii, 7, where he is called "young" (i.e. new to his work, inexperienced) and "tender-hearted" (ךְֵצֶט לוֹ, wanting in resolution and spirit). He had eighteen wives, sixty concubines, twenty-eight sons, and sixty daughters. The wisest thing recorded of him in Scripture is that he refused to waste away his sons' energies in the wretched existence of an Eastern zemina, in which we may infer, from his helplessness at the age of forty-one, that he had himself been educated, but dispersed them in command of the new fortresses which he had built about the country. Of his wives, Mahalath, Abihail, and Maachah were all of the royal house of Jesse. Maachah loved best of all, and to her son Abijah he bequeathed his kingdom. See Kiesling, Hist. Rehoboam (Jena, 1793). See JUDD, KINGDOM OT.

Rehoboth [many Rehboth] (Heb. Re'ebôth), רֶהֶבֹּת [once רֶבִּי, Gen. x, 11], outside places, i.e. streets, as in Prov. i, 20, etc., the name of three places.

1. Rehoboth the Well (Sept. Ἰωράπερα: Vulg. Latitudine), the third of the series of wells dug by Isaac in the Philistines' territory (Gen. xxvi, 22). He had dug several wells before, but was obliged to abandon them in consequence of the quarrels of the Philistines. When this one was completed they did not strive for it. He celebrated his triumph and bestowed its name on the well in a fragment of poetry of the same nature as those in which Jacob's wives gave names to his successive children: "He called the name of it Rehoboth (room) and said,

"Because now Jehovah hath made room for us, and has opened our way before us.""

The name was intended to indicate the fact that the patriarch had at length got space to rest in. Most of the ancient versions translate the word, though it must evidently be regarded as a proper name. Isaac had left the valley of Gerar and its turbulent inhabitants before he was born, and he had been reared in the well of Beer-sheba (ver. 22). From it he, in time, "went up" to Beer-sheba (ver. 23), an expression which is always used of motion towards the land of promise. The position of Gerar has not been definitely ascertained, but it seems to have lain a few miles to the south of Beer-sheba and nearly due east of Beer-sheba. In this direction, if anywhere, the wells Sinna, Essel, and Rehoboth should be searched for. The ancient Jewish tradition confined the events of this part of Isaac's life to a much narrower circle. The wells of the patriarch were shown near Askelon in the time of Origen, Antoninus Martyr, and Eusebius (Reland, Polist., p. 580); the Samaritan version identifies Gerar with Askelon; Josephus (Ant. i, 12, 1) calls it "Gerar of Ptolustrium," i.e. of Philistia. It is a remarkable fact that the name clings to the spot still. In the wilderness of Elath, about twenty-three miles south-west of Beer-sheba, is a wady called er-Rahisibeh, in which and on the adjoining heights are remains of antiquity thus described by Robinson: "In the valley itself is the ruin of a small rough building with domes built in the manner of a mosque. On the right of the path is a confused heap of hewn stones, the remains of a square building of some size, perhaps a tower. On the acclivity of the eastern hill we found traces of walls, a deep cistern, or rather cavern, and a fine circular thresholding floor, evidently antique. On ascending the hill on the left of the valley then we were astonished to find ourselves amid the ruins of an ancient city. Here is a level track of ten or twelve acres in extent entirely and thickly covered over with confused heaps of stones, with just enough of their former order remaining to show the foundations and form of the houses, and the course of some of the streets. The houses were mostly small, all solidly built of bluish limestone, squared and often hewn on the exterior surface. Many of the dwellings had each its cistern, cut in the solid rock; and these remain quite entire. Once, as we judged upon the spot, this must have been a city of not less than twelve or fifteen thousand inhabitants" (Bib. Res. i, 106). This identification is adopted by Rowlands (in Williams, Holy City, i, 465), Van de Velde (Memor., p. 341), Stewart (First and Khan, p. 13), and others. Dr. Leake was reluctantly led to the conclusion that the ancient city was not the one here pointed out by Robinson. But from an examination of the city and from the results of excavations in the neighborhood of Askelon, the Samaritans distinctly assert that Askelon is the true site of the ancient city. The site is remarkable for the excellence of its archaeological ruins and the general symmetrical arrangement of its streets. This identification is supported by a number of inscriptions which indicate that Askelon was of very ancient date.

2. REHOBOTH THE CITY (Heb. rehoboth' 'Ir, רֶהֶבֶּה יָרוֹן, i.e. Rehoboth of the River; Sept. Pousos ['v. t. Powsos] ή πόσα πάθησα; Vulg. de fercio Roboth, or Rehoboth, que justa annem sae eest], the city of a certain Saul or Shaul, one of the early kings of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi, 37; 1 Chron. i, 48). The appellation "the river" fixes the situation of Rehoboth as on the Euphrates, emphatically "the river" to the inhabitants of Western Asia (see Gen. xxxii, 21; xv, 18; Deut. i, 7; Exod. xxxii, 31). The Targum of Onkelos adds, "Rehoboth, which is on the Phœnix." There is no reason to suppose that the limits of Edom ever extended across the river, and it is probable that the name of the city was derived from the name of the kings of Edom possibly a trace of an Assyrian incursion of the same nature as that of Chedorlaomer and Amraphel. At all events, the kings of Edom were not all natives of that country. Schultens in his note (Index Geogr. in T. Saldan, v. "Rahabah") identifies it with Rehoboth of Gen. xxxvi, 37; and this is the view of Bochart (Opp. i, 225), Winer, Genesiou (Thesaur., p. 1291), and others; but as the Euphrates was far distant from the site of Nineveh, there is a strong probability that against this opinion (Rehoboth was also mentioned by Abufida. In his day there was a small village on the site. The name still remains attached to two spots on the Euphrates—the one, simply Rahabeh, on the right bank, eight miles below the junction of the Khabur, and about three miles west of the river; the other, five miles farther on the left bank. The latter is said to be called Pahabay-malik, i.e. "royal" (Kalisch, Kapian), and is on this ground identified by the Jewish commentators with the city of Saul. The existence of the second locality, however, rests, not on direct evidence, but on the map in Layard's Nineveh and Babylonia, and is mentioned by the two Jewish authorities quoted above; but it does not appear on the map of canal Cheshm.
The other locality is unquestionably authentic. Chesney says, "On the right bank of the Euphrates, at the north-western extremity of the plain of Shanir, and three or half a miles south-west of the town of Maydin, are extensive ruins around a castle still bearing the name of Reboth" (i, 119; ii, 222).

Rebum (Heb. and Chald. Rebcm, Ῥηβµ, compassionante; Sept. Ροσπα, but in Neh. iii, 17 'Ροσποι), the name of five men.

1. One of the "children of the province" who returned from the Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 2) B.C. 536. In the parallel passage (Neh. vii, 7) he is called Nehum.

2. One of the priests who returned from Babylon at the same time (Neh. xii, 3). B.C. 536. In a subsequent verse (ver. 15) he seems to be called Hamin (q.v.).

3. A Persian officer in Samaria, joint author with Shinsalai of a letter which turned Antiochus against the building-plans of the Jews (Ezra iv, 8, 9, 17, 23). B.C. 535. "He was perhaps a kind of lieutenant-governor of the province under the king of Persia, holding apparently the same office as Tattai, who is described in Ezra v, 6 as taking part in a similar transaction, and is there called 'the governor on this side the river.' The Chaldee title, ἱβικελὲν, literally 'lord of decrees,' is left untranslated in the Sept. Baalkel and the Vulg. Bedleum; and the rendering 'chancellor' in the A.V. appears to have been derived from Kimchi and others, who explain it, in consequence of its connection with 'scribe,' by the Hebrew word which is usually rendered 'recordor.' This appears to have been the view taken by the author of 1 Esdr. ii, 25, ὅ γραφων τὰ προσώπιον, and by Josephus (Ant. xi, 2, 1), ὁ πάντα τὰ προσώπια γράφων. The former of these seems to be a gloss, for the Chaldee title is also represented by Baalkešecq.'

4. A Levite, son of Ban, and one of the builders of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii, 17). B.C. 445.

5. One of the chief Israelites who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x, 25). B.C. 410.

Reth (Heb. Ῥηθ, Ῥθ, friendly; Sept. Ρήθ v. τ. 'Ρηθ), one of David's officers, who refused to rebel with Adonijah (1 Kings i, 6). B.C. 1015. "Jerome (Quast. Hebr. ad loc.) states that he is the same with 'Hiram the Zairite,' i.e. Era the Jairite, a priest and prince upon person of the David. Ewald (Grisez, iii, 201 infra) pointing on the occurrence of Shimei in the same list with Ret, suggests that the two are David's only surviving brothers, Rei being identical with Raidai. This is ingenious, but there is nothing to support it, while there is the great objection to it that the names are in the original extremely dissimilar, Rei containing the Ain, a letter which is rarely exchanged for any other, but apparently never for Deltur (Genesiach, Theaur, p. 976)."

Reichardt, John Christian, a minister of the Episcopal Church, was born at Ruhrtort, on the Rhine, in 1838. He was educated first at the public school in his native place, and afterwards pursued his studies at the gymnasium at Duisburg. Feeling a desire to devote himself to missionary work, he was recommended to the missionary society at Barnem, which received him, and he was sent by it to the excellent Jäncke's Missionary Institution at Berlin. Jäncke had no funds at command to enable him to send forth missionaries, but the missionary societies in England, in Holland, and elsewhere were thankful to avail themselves of those who had been trained under the venerable pastor in Berlin. In the year 1824 the London Missionary Society agitated the Gospel among the Jews appointed Mr. Reichardt for the mission in Poland, in connection with Mr. Becker, a former pupil of father Jäncke. During 1825 and 1826 he travelled extensively through Poland; from 1827 to 1829 he was engaged in frequent missionary journeys in Holland and Bavaria, and in 1831 he was active, together with the late Rev. M. S. (afterwards bishop) Alexander, in preaching the Gospel to the Jews in London and the principal towns of England. From that time his permanent residence was at London, in prosecution of the missionary work in behalf of his society. In October, 1857, Mr. Reichardt left England on a special mission to Jerusalem, where he also remained for a time. After his return from Jerusalem, his time and efforts were mainly directed to the work of the society in England, with occasional visits to various missionary stations. His main work, however, was the revision of the text of the Hebrew New Test., which was printed and published several times, and in correcting for the press multiplied editions of the Test., which the London Society for Prop. to the Hebrew, as well as the British Bible Society, published. He also took part in the training of candidates for missionary employment, and, after he was permitted to labor until his death, March 31, 1873. In connection with his missionary work, he published a number of pamphlets, which have been translated by his fellow-laborers into Dutch, French, etc., viz., Proofs that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of David (Lond. 1851, and often), or Proofs that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of David, is also the Son of God (ibid. 1851) and often; The Scriptural Doctrine of the God of Israel (ibid. 1851, and often); and The Two Coronations, or Messiah and Christianity (2d ed. ibid. 1857). — Investigation of the Prophet Joel with Special Reference to the Coming Crisis (ibid. 1867). — See Jewish Intelligence, 1851, p. 427 sq.; Janz, May, 1873; Dörre Emeth, oder Stimme der Nahrung (Breslau, 1873), p. 97 sq.; Delitzsch, Starn auf Hoffnung (1873), x, 228 sq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 143; Zuchb, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1044. (B. P.)

Reichel, John Frederick, a distinguished bishop of the Moravian Church, was born at Leuna, in Alltenburg, Germany, May 16, 1731. His father and grandfather were both Protestant clergymen, and the latter was expelled from Bohemia on account of his faith. Reidel studied theology at the University of Jena, and entered the ministry of the Lutheran Church at the age of twenty-one. About the middle of April, 1758, he joined the Moravian community, the members of which were at that time the only Moravians in the United States.

Reidy, Joseph, a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1824, near Romeo, Mich. He was of Scotch parentage and received a careful religious training. He was graduated at the University of Michigan in 1844, and has spent the greater part of his life in theological training in Union Seminary. He was regularly ordained, and went to Kansas to enter the missionary field. At a place called Manhattan, and the region around, he spent five years of arduous toil, when he returned to Michigan, that he might be near his parents and comfort them in their age.

Reidy, Thomas, a celebrated Scotch divine and metaphysician, was born in 1720 at Strachan, Co. Down, N. I., and educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, and became its librarian, a position which he resigned in 1786. In 1779 he was appointed professor of logic and metaphysics in the above-named college in 1752. In 1764 he succeeded Adam Smith as professor of moral philosophy in the University of Glasgow, retiring in 1781. He died Oct. 7, 1796. He published, Essays on the Powers of the Human Mind (Edinb. 1781, 3 vols. 8vo), Inquiry into the Human Mind (Edinb. 1781; 4th ed. 1812, 8vo). These and numerous other Essays, etc., were collected and published under the title of The Works of Thomas Reid, D.D., now fully Collected, etc. (6th ed. Edinb. 1868, 2 vols. 8vo). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. See Scott's Philosophy.

Reidy, William Shields, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in West Nottingham, Chester Co., Pa., April 21, 1778, and graduated with honor at Princeton College in 1802. He was then for about two years assistant teacher in an academy in Georgetown, D. C., afterwards in Shepherdstown, Va.; then, about 1804, he became professor in Hampden-Sidney College, and finally president of that college some two years later. He was licensed by the Presbyterian Church in the spring of 1806, and dissolved his connection with the college about eighteen months afterwards. In 1808 he settled at Llewellyn, Pa., and opened a school for males as a means of support, and at the same time labored to build up a Presbyterian Church in the village. In this he succeeded, and was installed as pastor in 1822. Still, his principal field of labor was his school, which after a while became a boarding-school for young ladies, and stood first among similar institutions in Virginia. Here his labors for the good of his charge were crowned with distinguished success. Having become incapacitated for public labor, he resigned his charge in 1848, and lived in retirement till his death, June 29, 1853. —Sprague, Memoir of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 388.

Reidy, James Ross, a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in Meyertown, Lebanon Co., Pa., Oct. 31, 1788. He began his theological studies with Dr. Becker, of Baltimore, Md., in 1809, was li- censed as an elder in 1812, and became pastor of churches in Rich- man's Valley, Dauphin Co., Pa. In 1813 he was sent as an exploring missionary to North Carolina, after which he returned to his charge. He was called to Ha- gerstown, Md., in 1819; resigned in 1823, to accept the pastorate of churches in Vincennes, Ind., in 1825; in securing aid from the Reformed Church there for the endowment of the Theological Seminary of the German Reform Church and collecting books for its library. In this he was successful, returning in November, 1826. He became pastor in York, Pa., in 1827. His health failing, he resigned in July, 1831. He now supported himself in a secular calling amid continued ill-health, and died March 18, 1844. Mr. Reily was a man of great energy and originality, and withal somewhat eccentric; in the pulpit he was grave, earnest, and more than ordinarily eloquent. He preached in German and English.

Reilly, John, a minister in the Reformed Presbyterian Church, was born in Ireland about 1770, and came to this country when about seventeen. He engaged in teaching in Philadelphia and vicinity for several years, but studied theology, and was licensed to preach by the Special Presbytery at Philadelphia, May 24, 1809. He was taken on trial Aug. 15, 1812, ordained in 1818, and sent as missionary to South Carolina, Kentucky, and Ohio. He had not been long in South Carolina before he was installed as pastor of the united congregations of Beaver Dams and Waterford, where he labored with great acceptance and success until his death, August 1820. Mr. Reily was a man of childlike simplicity, godly sincerity, singleness of purpose, and undaunted intrepidity.—Sprague, Amusa of the Amer. Pulpit, i. 60.

Reimarus, Hermann Samuel, a learned German philologist, was born in Halle, Germany, in 1713, and studied first under his father and afterwards under Wolf and Fabricius. He next went to study at Jena, and later at Wittenberg. After having traveled over Holland and England, he was appointed rector at Weimar in 1728, and in 1729 was called to Hamburg as teacher of Hebrew in the gymnasium. He died there, March 1, 1765. His theological writings are a Disseratio de Assessoribus Synodi Magni (Hamb. 1751, 4to):—Das vornehmsten Wahrheiten der natürlichen Religion (ibid. 1754), and a few others of less importance. He is espe- cially noted with the editorship of the famous Wolfenbüttel Fragments (q. v.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Reinbeck, Johann Gustav, a German theologian and philosopher, was born Jan. 25, 1683. His father, Andreas, was superintendent at Brunswick, and published two enormous volumes on the Hebrew accents. Johann studied theology at Halle, pursuing Hebrew under Michaelis, and philosophy under Wolf. He was called in 1709 as preacher to the Friedrichswender Church in Berlin, and in 1718 became pastor of the Church of St. Peter at Cologne. He was a favorite with the Elector, and is also reckoned to be a great poet. He died Aug. 21, 1741. Reinbeck is the author of several Biblical, homiletical, and philosophical works, which are enumerated in Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Reinccius, Christian, a Lutheran divine, was born Jan. 22, 1668, at Grossmutlingen, in Zerbst, and died Oct. 18, 1702, at Weisenfels, where for about thirty years he had acted as rector of the academy. Reineccius was a voluminous writer, and his Dissertations, which he published as rector of Weisenfels, are still very valuable. Besides his edition of Lankisch's Concordius Bibliorum Germanico-Hebraico-Graeco (Lipsiae, 1718), and of Vetus Testamentum Græcum in Versum Septuaginta Interpretatum, sua cum Libris Apocryphi, etc. (ibid. 1730-57), he published Ebole Hebraico, ad Optimorum Codicum et Editionum Fidei Recensita, etc. (ibid. 1725). In the preface we are told, as is already indicated in the title-page, that in editing this Bible MSS. have been perused, but their use is nowhere pointed out. An alphabetical table of the Parashoth and a table of the Haphtaroth are given at the end. The text is correct. A second edition of the Hebrew Bible was published in 1739, which is but a reprint of the first, repeating even its mistakes, and making still greater ones. A third edition was pub- lished in 1756, after Reineccius's death, by C. G. Pohl, who also wrote the preface, in which he speaks of the changes made by him. In 1758, Dörriensie and Meisner published Reineccius's Oeum Vetus Testamento- bus ex Ingeni Codicis Copiae a C. G. Renuccio et B. J. de Rossii Collatorum, which is very valuable. It was republished by Knapp (Halle, 1818). Reineccius also wrote, Index Memorialis, quo Voci Hebraici et Graeci, quae ab Hebraice dictae sunt, etc. (Lipsia. 1737, and often), which is appended to some editions of his Hebrew Bible:—Manuale Bibliicum ex Concordantia Graecis et Aram, in quo Voci Greco-Osmes in LXXX Interpretatione Versione Bibliorum Graecae et in Apocrypica V. T. See nos in Test. Orig. Graece N. T. Occurrant, etc. (ibid. 1734):—Biblia Sacra Quadrupl. in V. T. Hebr., giving the He- brew, Greek (according to Graebe's text), the German of Luther, and Latin translation of Sebah. Schmidt, 3 vols., the three containing the Apocrypha in Greek, Latin, and German and (ibid. 1751):—Jnvoe Hebraico Lingua V. T. etc. (ibid. 1704; last ed. by Hechhoph, 1788). See First, Bibl. Jud. iii, 144 sq.; Rosenmeiller, Handbuch der philologis.- Litteratur, i. 236 sqq.; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Literatur, i. 85, 89, 47, 120, 521, 557, 591; ii. 726; Theol. Reinhard, Franz Volkmann, an eminent Ger- man Philologist, was born in Schleswig, in the Province of Schleswig in 1758. He studied with his father, a deacon, until he was sixteen, when he entered the gymnasium of Ratisbon. Here he remained five years, and in 1778 removed to the University of Wittenberg. In 1780 he was called to the chair of printed professor of Hebrew, and in 1784 preacher to the university and assessor of the consistory. In 1792 he was preacher to the court at Dresden, ecclesiastical counsellor and member of the supreme consistory, and held these positions until his death, Sept. 6, 1812. He published, Sermones (Sulzbach, 1811, 8vo),—Christian Ethics (5 vols.),—Confe- dations, etc.

Reinhard, Lorenz, a German doctor of theology, was born Feb. 22, 1700, at Hellingen, in Franconia. After the completion of his studies, he was first tutor and afterwards professor at the gymnasium in Hildburg- hausen. In 1727 he was called as deacon and professor of the gymnasium to Weimar, and in 1741 as superin- tendent to Butzdorf, where he died, Nov. 18, 1752. He wrote, De Libro Secundum non Canonicum, etc. (Witten. 1719):—Die Theologie der Patristischen vor und nach der Sühnezeit, etc. (Hamb. 1737):—Observationes Philol. ad Bibliorum Hebraicos, Graecos, et Lati- nos, cum Breviar. Controversiar. cum Reformatis, etc. cum Bre- viario Contrarever. cum Armeniniis (Weimar, 1735):— Chrono- tactis Conciiti Conciitorum Solarum, etc. (ibid. 1741):—Commentario de Assumps, etc. (ibid. 1742):—Exkzer und Zerlederung des Buches Bisch. (etc. cap. 1749—50). See Winer, Handb. der theolog. Literatur, i. 247, 358; ii. 727; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 147. (B. P.)

Reins, a name for the kidneys, derived from the Latin renes, and in our English Bible employed in those passages of the Old Test. in which the term for kidneys (תַּלָּדְיוֹן, talad'tôn) is used metaphorically, i.e. except in the Pentateuch and in Isa. xxxix, 6, where this word is rendered kidneys. In the ancient system of physiology the kidneys, from the sensitiveness of that part of the person, were believed to be the seat of desire and longing, which accounts for their often being coupled with the heart (Psa. xvii. 9; xxxii. 2; Jer. xi. 20; xxvi. 10, etc.). See Kidneys.

The word "reins" is once used (Isa. xi. 5) as the equivalent of בְּעֵשָׂבָא, chalad'tav, elsewhere translated "loins" (q. v.).

Reischl, Wilhelm Carl, a German Roman Catho- lice divine, doctor and professor of theology at Munich, was born in that city Jan. 18, 1818. Having completed his studies in his native place, he was made a priest in 1835, and, after having occupied several positions as priest and chaplain, he was promoted in 1842 as doctor of philosophy. For some years he lectured at Munich, but in 1845 went to Amberg, occupying the chair of professor of dogmatics and exegesis. In 1851 he was called to Regensburg as professor of Church history and canon law, till he was recalled to his native city in 1867 as professor of patrology, where he died, Oct. 4, 1873. In connection with others, he published a commentary on the Holy Bible, the New-Testament part being his sole work. See Biographie de l'abbé Tisserant, 1873, p. 494. (B.P.)

Reiser, Anton, a German theologian, was born at Augsburg, March 7, 1628. He was first preacher at Schermzitz, and in 1659 became pastor of the Lutheran church at Freiburg. Having in 1672 espoused Calvinism, he was thrown into prison and at length banished. Eventually, however, he served as rector of the gymnasium at Augsburg, preacher at Oerlingen, and after 1678 as pastor of the Church of St. James at Hamburg, where he died, April 27, 1686. He was the author of a number of theological treatises, enumerated in Hoëter, Novis. Biog. Générale, &c.  (B.P.)

Relasmann, Johann Valentin von, a German doctor of theology, and bishop of Wurtzburg, was born Oct. 12, 1807, at Allersheim, in Lower Franconia. He completed his studies at the University of Wurtzburg, which honored him with the degree of doctor of philosophy and theology. Towards the end of the year 1830 he was ordained priest and appointed to Volkach, but in 1834 he was called to Wurtzburg as ordinary professor of exegesis and Oriental languages. This prominent position he occupied till Dec. 7, 1846, when he became a member of the chapter, and for a number of years he stood at the head of the diocesan government. In 1861 he was made provost of the cathedral; and when, in 1870, his bishop died, he was appointed by the king of Bavaria, Oct. 28, 1870, bishop of Wurtzburg, and confirmed by the pope in the following year. He occupied the episcopalsee as a few years, and died Oct. 17, 1876. See Biographie de l'abbé Tisserant, 1876, p. 58 sq. (B.P.)

Reiter, Ernst Anton, a Roman Catholic priest, was born in 1821 at Arnberg. He received holy orders in 1846, and came in 1854 as missionary to the United States. In 1859 he was appointed pastor of the German church of the Trinity at Boston, Mass., and died May 5, 1875, at Erie, Pa. He wrote a very important work on the statistics of the Roman Catholic Church of the United States, entitled Schmeratismus der katholischen deutschen Geistlichkeit in den Ver. Staaten Nordamerikas (N. Y. 1865). See Literarischer Handwörter für das katholische Deutschland, 1869, p. 465 sq.; 1873, p. 271. (B.P.)

Reiter, William, a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., Sept. 13, 1787. After his youth in Westmoreland County, Pa., he studied theology privately with several ministers successively in Stark County, O., preaching meanwhile in the way of missionary tours under their direction. He was ordained in 1819, and took charge of a number of German Reformed congregations in Tuscarawas County, O., in whose service he continued up to the time of his death, May 8, 1826. He was a diligent student, and a minister that had much of the true missionary spirit.

Reithmayr, Franz Xavier, doctor and professor of theology, a Roman Catholic divine of Germany, was born in 1809 at Dillingen, near Regensburg. In 1822 he was made priest; in 1836 the Munich University made him doctor of theology; in 1837 he was extraordinary professor; in 1841 ordinary professor of the New Testament, exegesis, and died Jan. 26, 1872. Reithmayr was one of the most prominent theologians of the Roman Catholic Church, and published in 1858 a work on patrology, in 1859 a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (Regensb. 1854). In 1862 he published his Introduction to the Canonical Books of the New Testament (Ibid.); and in 1865 a Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians. His last great work was the edition and edition of the fathers, which he edited in connection with others, and which is still in the course of publication at Kempten, under the title Bibliothek der Kirchenlehrer. Re'kem (Heb. יָרֵךְ, יָרֵק), a description, or perhaps i.q. of the root, the name of three men, and of a city.

1. (Sept. 'Rqem; A.V. Rcem, the name being cains "in pasture," יָרֵק) Brother of Ulam, and a descendant of Machir, the son of Manasseh, by his wife Maachah; apparently a son of Sheerah (1 Chron. vii. 16). B.C. ante 1619.

2. (Sept. 'Rqem v. t. 'Rqem). One of the five kings of the Midianites slain by the Israelites along with Balaam (Num. xxiii. 8; Josh. xiii. 21). B.C. 1818.

3. (Sept. 'Rqem, Rqem v. t. 'Rqem). The third named of the four sons of Hebron, and father of Shammai, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 43, 44). B.C. 1818. "In this genealogy it is extremely difficult to separate the names of persons from those of places—Ziph, Maresah, Tappuah, Hebron, are all names of places, as well as Maon and Beth-zur. In Josh. xviii, 27, Rekem appears as a town of Benjamin, and perhaps this genealogy may be intended to indicate that it was founded by a colony from Hebron"

4. (Sept. 'Rqem). A city in the territory of Benjamin, mentioned between Moazah and Irpeel (Josh. xiii, 27). Josephus, in speaking of the Midianitish kings slain by Moses (Jast. iv. vii. 1), mentions a city named after Rekem (No. 2, above), which was the chief city of all Arabia, and was called 'Apxaqm, Atarne, by the Arabs, and Petra by the Greeks. This is, of course, different from the Rekem of Benjamin. As the latter is in the group of the south-eastern tribe, the site was possibly that of the present ruins called Deir Yasin, about three miles west of Jerusalem (Robinson, Researches, i., 141; Bâdeker, Palestina, p. 298).

Reland, Adriaan, a celebrated Orientalist, was born July 17, 1676, at Ryn, a village in Northern Holland, where his father was pastor. He early devoted himself to the study of Oriental languages under Leusden, with the aid of Henry Sicke. After staying six years for this purpose at Utrecht, he went to Leyden to finish his theological studies. He was soon afterwards offered a professor's chair at Liége, but he preferred to return to his aged father. In 1699 he was made professor of philosophy and Oriental languages at Harderwyck, and two years afterwards was called to teach Oriental languages and ecclesiastical antiquities at Utrecht, a position he held during the last years of his days, having in 1713 refused a professor's chair at Frankenberg, and in 1716 another at Leyden. He died of small-pox, Feb. 5, 1718. Reland is admitted to have been by far the greatest Orientalist of his day, and his writings display an exhaustiveness of learning, the most pains-taking accuracy, and sound judgment. He was also not lacking in imagination, as some of his earlier proclamations showed. To these admirable qualities he added great affability of manners and a noble sweetness of Relica. By this term are usually understood the bodies or clothes of saints and martyrs, or the instruments by which they were put to death or suffered torment, which were so revered in the Romish Church as to be worshipped and carried about in procession. The honoring of the relics of saints, on which the Church of Rome afterwards founded her superstitious and lucrative use of them, as objects of devotion, as a kind of charms, or amulets, and as instruments of pretended miracles, appears to have originated in a very ancient custom that prevailed among Christians, of assembling at the cemeteries or burying-places of the martyrs for the purpose of commemorating them and of performing divine worship. Here they displayed their affection for their saintly fellow-sufferers, and thus were dictated by fervent affection and were consistent with the principles of religion.

In the 4th century the boundary between respect and worship was passed. Helena, the mother of Constantine, made a journey to Jerusalem and there discovered, as she supposed, the wood of the true cross, a part of which she gave to the city of Jerusalem, and sent the other part to Constantine, who encased it in his own statue and regarded it as the palladium of his new city. When the profession of Christianity obtained the protection of the civil government, under Constantine the sacred shrines of the martyrs were erected. Sepulchres, and the names and memories of the departed were treated with every possible token of affection and respect. This reverence, however, gradually exceeded all reasonable bounds; and those prayers and religious services were thought to have a peculiar sanctity and virtue which were performed over their tombs; hence the practice which afterwards obtained of depositing relics of saints and martyrs under the altars in all churches. This practice was early thought of such importance that St. Ambrose, in the 4th century, would not consecrate a church because it had no relics; and the Council of Constantinople, in Trullo (A.D. 692), ordained that those altars should be demolished under which were found no relics. Such was the rage for them at one time that even Mabillon, the Benedictine, justly condemned, as he was later to be, was led to deposit over suspected relics, numerous spurious ones being everywhere offered to the piety and devotion of the faithful. He adds, too, that bones are often consecrated which, so far from belonging to saints, probably do not belong to Christians. From the catacombs of Italy, Sicily, and other places which had served as the burial-places of the primitive Christians, although the catacombs have both before and since been used for other purposes, numerous relics have been taken. Even as early as 386 Thesleſius was urged to pass a law forbidding the people to dig up the bones of martyrs or traffic in their remains. The superstition grew until, in the 9th century, these relics were not only treated with veneration, but were supposed to have the virtue of healing disorders of body and mind and defending their possessors against the devil. Not was this efficacy destroyed or lessened when the relic was distributed in fragments. In the 11th century relics were tried by fire, and those which did not consume were reckoned genuine, and the rest not. Relic-collecting has been carried to a great extent in Europe, both in Roman and in Greek churches, especially being full of fictitious relics. The following is only a sample of those in the Church of Santa Croce de Jerusalem: three pieces of the true cross, the title placed over the cross; two thorns from the crown of our Lord; the sponge extended to our Lord with vinegar and gall; a piece of the veil and hair of the Virgin; a chip from the true cross where the devil bit the shin of Jesus; some of the manna gathered in the desert, etc.

Relics of saints were regarded as the palladium of cities, as St. Martin's body was carried out to the gates of Tours in 845 to repel a siege by the Danes. St. Werburgh's relics were borne in procession to quell a fire at Chester, and the canons bore them through the diocese to invite alms for the erection of Salisbury Cathedral. At Lichfield the bells were rung at their departure and return. In the 6th century the custom of swearing upon relics, as later upon the Gospels, began. Relics were, and still are, preserved on the altars whereon mass is celebrated, a square hole being made in the middle of the altar large enough to receive the hand, and therein is deposited the relic, being first wrapped in red silk and enclosed in a leaden box. In Catholic countries these relics are popularly esteemed the most precious treasures of the churches, and in earlier times they had even a high marketable value, large sums having been often raised by necessitous princes by the sale or mortgage of pieces of the "true cross." Before the Reformation relics were in demand in Scotland, and their sale was a fertile source of revenue for the church. They were forbidden to be brought into England by several statutes, and justices were empowered to search houses for them and to deface and destroy them when found. This folly has not been without learned and laborious defence, antiquity and scripture both having been appealed to in its support. Bellarmine cites the following passages: Exodus, xiii, 19; Deut. xxxiv, 6; 2 Kings, xii, 21; xxxii, 16-18; Isa. xi, 10; Matt. ix, 20-22; Acts, xii, 12; xix, 11, 12. But there is no doubt that the worship of relics is an absurdity, without the guarantee of the Catholic Church. The problem of the primitive Church, and irreconcilable with common-sense, Latin monographs upon relics and relic-worship have been written by Cellarius (Helm. 1656), Jung (Hanor. 1768), Kurrholtz (1680), Morellius (Rome, 1721), Seger (Leips. 1688), Batii (1655), Kirselin, Rambach (Halle, 1722). Religion (Lat. religio, religio). This word, according to Cicero (Div. Instil., 4), is derived from, or rather compounded of, re and ligere, to read over again, to reflect upon or to study the sacred books in which religion is taught. With suspicion of the devil, re and ligere, to read, were joined to make religio, from re-ligere, to bind back, because religion is that which furnishes the true ground of obligation.

Religion has been divided into natural and revealed. By natural religion is meant that knowledge, veneration, and love of God, and the practice of those duties to him, our fellow-creatures, and ourselves, which are discoverable by the right exercise of our rational faculties, from considering the nature and perfections of God, and our relation to him and to one another. By revealed religion is understood that discovery which he has made to us of his mind and will in the Holy Scriptures. As respects natural religion, some doubt whether, properly speaking, there can be any such thing; since, through the fall, reason is so depraved that man cannot attain to the greatest darkness and misery, as may be easily seen by considering the history of those nations who are destitute of it, and who are given up to barbarism, ignorance, cruelty, and evils of every kind. So far as this, however, may be observed, it is the light of nature that furnishes the ideas of God, nor inform us what worship will be acceptable to him. It does not tell us how man became fallen, sinful creature, as he is, nor how he can be recovered. It affords us no intelligence as to the immortality of the soul; and, therefore, a future state of happiness and misery. The apostle, indeed, observes that the Gentiles have the law written on their hearts, and a law unto themselves; yet the greatest moralists among them were so blinded as to be guilty of, and actually to countenance, the greatest vices. Such a statement, indeed, would seem to be religious which leaves man in such uncertainty, ignorance, and impurity. See NATURAL THEOLOGY. Revealed religion forms the correlate of natural religion, or the religion of reason. It is not the result of human invention, but the result of human dependence upon a personal and unique communication from God, is therefore infallible; where as, on the contrary, all processes of human thought are more or less subjected to error. Hence we can explain why it is that religion gives itself out to be, not a product of the reason merely, not anything which originated from human inquiry and study, but a result of a divine revelation. The religious feeling is undoubtedly a propension of human nature; yet without a divine revelation the mind would sink in dark and perpetual disorder. Of the whole family of man, existing in all ages, and exposed to the hold of ignorance or error, there is not one well-authenticated exception to the fact that moved by an inward impulse, and guided by revelation or tradition, man worships something which he believes to be endowed with the attributes of a superior being. Even the Germans, for instance, who, on the one hand, are among the various idolatrous systems are but the traditions of ancient revelations, more or less corrupted, which have descended from the first worshippers. Revealed religion comprehends, besides the doctrines of natural religion, many truths which were beyond the reach of human reason, those not contained in the revered, and are the knowledge of which we are indebted directly to the Old and New Testaments. While other religions had been variously accommodated to the peculiar countries in which they flourished, Christianity was so framed as to be adapted to the whole human family. It is the one thing needful for the elevation of our race, and is destined alike to universality and perpetuity.

In all forms of religion there is one part, which may be called the doctrine or dogma, which is to be received by faith; and the cult or worship, which is the outward expression of the religious sentiment. By religion is also meant that homage to the Deity in all forms which pertain to the spiritual life, in contrast with theology, the theory of the divine nature and government. See Theology.

RELIGION, PRACTICE OF. Far in the distance, beyond Buddhism, Brahminism, Zoroastrianism, Confucianism, and all the ten religions so graphically set forth by Freeman Clarkson, there lies a primitive faith of great power, to which our attention is called in Heb. xi, 2: "For by it the ancients obtained a good report." To this primitive religion all the others are so entirely related, and of idolatry, with all the mixtures of good and evil pertaining to religions now ancient, owe their origin, whether we can or cannot trace the genealogy. The faith of all the patriarchs anterior to the call of Abraham may be reckoned to this early form of the knowledge, fear, love, and service of the true God. How it came that deceiving descendants of the stock of Heth precipitated men blinded into ignorance, crime, and abominable idolatry, we are told in Rom. i, 28: "And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind." Thus they lost that faith in which they had been instructed by Noah during three centuries, after whom they were called to be religious which leaves man in such uncertainty, ignorance, and impurity. See Natural Theology. Revealed religion forms the correlate of natural religion, or the religion of reason. It is not the result of human invention, but the result of human dependence upon a personal and unique communication from God, is therefore infallible; whereas, on the contrary, all processes of human thought are more or less subjected to error. Hence we can explain why it is that religion gives itself out to be, not a product of the reason merely, not anything which originated from human inquiry and study, but a result of a divine revelation. RELIGION, PHILOSOPHY OF, the science of religion; the application of philosophical principles to the discussion of its general character, origin, and claims. and Philel the general, came to Isaac and renewed their covenant of peace at the same place where they had made it with his father. During the time of Jacob we find no friendly association with the Philistines. In Joshua’s time their land was to be given to Israel. During the period of the Judges we find only hostility, conflicts, and wars. Worship in the temple was the office of the government. The worship of God and other idols had now supplanted every vestige of the ancient faith. Beelzebub was the god of Ekron. David burned the images that he found in the conquered camp. The overthrow of Saul was published in the house of their idols, and his armor deposited in the temple of Ashtaroth. Their overthrow is noted by Isaiah (ii, 6). The illegal associations formed with Ashdod in the days of Nehemiah were most damaging to the people of the Lord. God diddef the God of Israel, and cursed David by his gods.

III. Conununiah.—Another illustration of the primitive religion we have in Melchizedek and his people. He was king of Salem, priest of the Most High, and a very eminent type of the expected Deliverer. While Melchizedek lived, and others of the same faith, in suffering, their influence on the heathen nation, it was announced to Abraham that the iniquity of the Amorites was “not yet full.” Some four hundred years were yet allowed them to improve or misimprove their privileges. A very few, like Rahab of Jericho, were willing to obey the word of God and be saved. The seven nations, as such, had, who apostatized to the god of this world, almost probable, that there was still some regard for the true religion among those known as Jebusites, although they did not surrender to Joshua. The following considerations are in their favor: (a.) They were long spared after the other nationalities had been broken up. They held their capital till the time of David. (b.) This capital was the ancient seat of Melchizedek, where we might expect the truth to be kept in families when the nation had given it up. (c.) Arunah the Jebusite is handsomely noted in the history of David, after their capital had surrendered. (d.) At Arunah’s threshing-floor the destroying angel suspended his work. (e.) He made to David a noble offer—victims for the sacrifice, and wood to burn it from his farming implements. (f.) He is living in Jerusalem, not as an idolater, but apparently like the people around him. (g.) In 2 Sam. xxiv, 23, the Hebrew reading is, “All these did king Arunah give to the king.” This would indicate that he was a lineal descendant of the royal line of Melchizedek, and was king of the Jebusites when they surrendered, and as such met the consessor of the ark, though a conquered subject; and he readily fell in with the new religion, although it was an advance on that of his ancestors. For some such reasons, he readily sold the old homestead—the floor for fifty shekels of silver, the farm for six hundred shekels of gold.

IV. Melopotamia.—Terah and his sons, Abram, Nahor, and Haran, in Ur of the Chaldees, were brought up in this primitive religion; but it had become corrupted by idolatrous excesses, and although they belonged to the witnessing line, they became involved in the idolatries of the land (Josh. vi, 22). “They served other gods.” To preserve yet a faithful testimony, Abraham was called out of that land when he was about seventy years old, had the covenant of God renewed to him, and commenced a renovated service on the basis of the old faith, with new revelations. Abraham, after the death of his father, removed to Canaan, leaving a resident at Haran, where he had resided five years. Thus freed from all family connections, except those under his own control, he carried down the true religion in its purity to Isaac and Jacob, with their adherents, all living beyond the Euphrates in a foreign country. The ancient religion still received new developments of the coming Deliverer, superadded to all former revelations; nor was it a new religion, but a new edition of the old, that was given to Moses. Meantime, the old religion retained, in the family of Nahor, some at least of the old corruptions. The teraphim, for example, Rachel wished to introduce into Jacob’s family. Laban called these his gods; the Sept. calls them idols. On what terms of religious observance Jacob lived in Laban’s family we have nothing specific; but after the parting we find that each had his own distinct religion. Laban swears by the gods of his father, and the gods of his father, and the God of their father. Jacob appeals to the God of Abraham, and the Fear of Isaac (Gen. xxxii, 43, 53). The memorial pillar points to him who is the Rock of Ages, while the heap of gathered stones seems to indicate the Church’s concerns about ineradicable truths, on which we all hold communion with one another and with God in his ordinances. How long this imperfectly organized Church continued in Padaan-aram we have no indication, but we know that the Aramites were no friends to Israel in the days of the kings. A very interesting item on the religion of Bethuel’s family is connected with the visit of Abraham’s prime minister. The friends of Rebekah recognize Jehovah, the covenant God; and they give their farewell blessing in the name of the promised Deliverer: “Let thy seed possess the gate of those who hate him.” Excepting Luther, translators have made and work with this verse (xxxiv, 60).

Perhaps to this connection belongs Balaam the soothsayer; from Aram, from the mountains of the east, from the river of his people, from the thorn of Aram-naharaim. From some passages it seems he had obtained a profound knowledge of God and of his ways; yet so perveted was his heart that he endeavored to bring all that knowledge to effect the destruction of Israel. From the tops of the rocks he could see the Deliverer coming, yet so deep was his malignity that he could meet death in this world and damnation in the next rather than have this man rule over him. He furnishes an awful example of those who hold the truth in unrighteousness.

V. Midianites.—In those days we have brought up a most beautiful lamp of the holy peaceful faith, by the prince and priest of Midian. It is true that the Midianites were descended from Abraham by Keturah; but their relations with Isaac and his descendants would not have kept up, and did not keep up, the faith of Abraham in its advanced stages. All that they received directly from Abraham needed some kind of support after they were sent away from Isaac; this support could come only from the scattered fragments of primitive religion floating among their new associations, and collected into a focus by such a man as Jethro. So long as the Midianites held that his son Hobab has joined the camp of Moses, we find no more faith among the Midianites, nor any friendship for the people of the Lord.

VI. Magians.—In the court of Persia, as late as the captivity, we find traces of the primitive religion. Not only was Cyrus individually called for special service, but there was much favor shown to the Jews by native Persians, while foreign satraps, like Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geahem, used all their craft, as well as their power, to frustrate the labors of Nehemiah in restoring the city. How often the following are repeated, “They serve, or they are to be told here; nor does this invalidate the idea of friendly relations when these could have fair play. Writers like James Freeman Clarke, after tracing far into antiquity the Zoroastrian faith, are unwilling to recognize an ancient faith to which belong the sacred fire, the sacred tree, and other items, while traces of it are found mixed in with later observances. Such writers can see any religion only as the philosophical outgrowth of the human mind, but not as a divine revelation. Of a different cast is a late writer in the Rev. and Col., Rev. and Col., J. Murray, Mitchell, LL.D. When treating of another, though ad-
RELIGION

The ancient religion of Persia." See the Methodist Quarterly Review, January, 1879. India itself? Is there not evidence through the medium of Moos and medium by which they were carried far beyond the period of the Vedas? To say nothing of moral precepts, a Creator, a Triad—Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva—the Incarnation of Vishnu in the ten Avatars, these and other items claim our attention as elements of a spiritual creed.

However much like they may have learned from the return of Balaam's retinue, after he was killed in battle (Num. xxxi, 8), certain it is that the primitive religion furnished a healthy stock on which to engraft the "Star of Jacob" in Persia and all over the East, whose name is traced from Babylon to Jerusalem when Christ was born in Bethlehem of Judaea.

VII. Arabian.—Among the very interesting details of the ancient religions we find Job and his friends. Without going into minute inquiry, let us place him somewhere about the period of the Babylonian, the father of Arabian. He is classed with the "sons of the East," yet we cannot locate him in the East like the Persian Magi. His own name, and the names of his friends, resemble more than any other the names of the Semites, among whom, in later times, Esau and his posterity intersected in many lines. In such a way we find the names Tamar, Job, Shadrach, Teshach, with others not identical, but of the same general cast as the names of Job's associates. The faith of these godly men, wherever they may have lived, is of a very high order; the purity of their life, the number of their ways, is of the highest degree. Neither by Job nor by any of his friends is there the least allusion to the covenant of Abraham. Whatever mistakes they labored under, they are recognized as true worshippers, and God deals with them as his own.

VIII. Assyrian.—Late discoveries by Layard and Rawlinson have brought us into contact with the ancient Assyrians in much of their religion, as well as war and civil policy. Among the sculptures exhumed, none are more interesting than the winged quadrupeds finished off with a human head, or the human form with eagle's head and wings. These convey us back to the early ch vendor, the forms of which must have been preserved by Noah and his sons. At first sight these Assyrian images may seem no more than mere idols—false gods; but they were not made by human hands, nor were they coated with any color. It is quite possible that they were set up by the Assyrians, who venerated them as the symbols of the gods of the Semites, as well as the Semites of the Semites, as well as the Semites of the Hebrews, who were more deeply involved, and went still further from the truth till the days of Sardanapalus, Nebuchadnez- zar, and Belshazzar. Whether in the Arabian line there was kept any physical type of the original cherubim and seraphim is not certain; but there are some hints worthy of our serious consideration. (a) Behemoth went somewhere to inquire of the Lord and received a specific answer. May not this have come from sacred utensils still in the custody of Abraham? (b) Before Moses had set up the new tabernacle there was some kind of tabernacle in use (Exod. xxviii, 7). A sacred chest belonged to many of the ancient idolatries. Was it copied from a true original? (c) In the higher rank of families the teraphim were long retained in connection with the true religion. Not only did the Mosaic law forbid them; but when they were kept by them with whom God had dealings, as with Michal brought one into David's; and they are classed with recognized symbols in Hose. iii, 4. On the other side they are classed with idols, and were used by the king of Babylon for idolatrous purposes. May they not have been like the brazen serpent, at first a mere memorial of truth, afterwards turned into an object of false worship. See Teraphim.

IX. Inferences.—Other ancient religions we must pass over here in order to take a survey of the leading features of the primitive, from which they are all derived, and from which they have inherited some features in common, while each seems to have dropped other matters, according to their various tastes and circumstances (see Princeton Rev. July, 1872; Taylor Lewis, The Primitive Greek Religion).

On what foundation did the primitive faith rest its confidence?

1. The knowledge, fear, and reverence which Adam retained even after the fall. Let it be fairly admitted that Adam, by transgression, was lost—lost to all spiritual good accompanying salvation; that the first of all the commandments—love—was completely obliterated in his heart; that he was dead in trespasses and sins. Still the apostle tells us that where the law of love had been written there was still left to ἀγάπη τοῦ πάντων ἔργων, the "work" of the law, which work is still written in the heart of even the heathen (Rom. ii, 14, 15). This work he places largely in the domain of knowledge, and even conscience, yet it is not in any degree the law of love (i, 32): "Who, knowing the judgment of God, that they who commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them." This by nature is our own moral state; yet, blessed be God, knowledge, memory, reason, conscience, have not been entirely destroyed, though conscience has been seared, and all the faculties greatly debilitated. Adam, on leaving the garden, still retained some semblance of it, as in the great variety, now lost! lost! lost forever through the former channel. With all that he had lost, who is there among us that would not travel a long, long pilgrimage to hear him tell the beauty of the garden inside; the perfect satisfaction of everything he saw, heard, felt, while innocent; the nature of that holiness which is only now to be regained by incessant labor, suffering, and watching; unimpeached communion with God. Darwin himself, and the modern race of scientists, are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have retained even then. Acquaintance with God! Fellowship of the Spirit! Seeing him as he is! Social worship in the holy family! The first Sabbath-day!

2. The promise of a Seed, a coming Deliverer, while as yet he had no child. Modern theologians can see in the first promise a deliverance, but many of us cannot see a personal Deliverer. It was not so with Eve, the mother of all living (Gen. iv, 1): "I have obtained a man, the Lord." What if she were mistaken in the time, the individual, and many other material considerations? What if she was unutterably deceived in the "Seed"? Such can be found under brighter skies to-day.

* The particle IN here, however, is correctly rendered "from" in the English version.—En.
She had faith in One who is able to save to the uttermost. See SEED OF PROMISE. Through all those ancient faiths noted above there are traces of the coming One. Some of them retain this idea while they have lost many others, and sunk into dark paganism. Witness the ten Avatars of Vishnu, as well as the "Desire of all the gods" (Isa. lii. 5).

3. The institution of sacrifice. This needs not here to be discussed; how early it was observed, how extensively propagated, however altered and perverted, it held a place in all ancient religions, teaching in some sense or other the doctrine of atonement by blood, as well as of purification by blood and water. See ALTAR; ATONEMENT; SACRIFICE.

4. The cherubim. For the structure and uses of these, see the word. For their spiritual meaning, see LIVING CREATURES; SERAPHIM. Set over against the sword of flame, they were the symbols of mercy to those reconciled by the sacrifice. Their place in the ancient religion is well known, even after those religions had departed far from primitive rectitude, both in ritual and moral code.

The temples of Babylon and Egypt; the griffins of Assyria, Persia, Egypt, Greece, and Rome; the seraphim of Egypt, Greece, and Rome; the apes of Egypt; the Moloch of Moab and the Ammonites; the baals of Syria, in all their variety; the ox of Bengal; the five; buffalo of Central India; the sacred bull; and hundreds of other sacred images, including the teraphim—these all were derived from the original cherubim at the east of Paradise. At first these imitations may have been considered as mere memorials of the early devotion of honored and godly ancestors; but, in process of theological improvements, they became associated with the sun, moon, stars, fructifying and other general powers of nature, as well as with the more spiritual demands of man's higher nature, till they are seen clothed with the attributes of deity, and worshipped and served more than the Creator. To the tradition of the early cherubim, we think, more than to the inventive genius of any priesthood, must be traced these homogeneous idols with all their diversities of aspect. The true symbol of the cherubim belonged to the universal and primal religion; the isolated imitations had their diversities from human fancy. This will account for the worship of the golden calf, to which the Israelites themselves were so easily seduced. Of all the deprecated forms of the early cherubim the Assyrian quadrupeds are the most complete. Layard passes high encomium upon this judgment of the inventors (?) of selecting the four highest forms of mundane life to represent the higher sphere of existence, while he utterly ignores the divine originals from which they were copied.

The cherubim at the Garden of Eden set over against the sword of flame, as well as those seen by Ezekiel evolved from a mass of fire, evidently were intended to symbolize that mercy which rejoices against judgment and delivers from wrath to come.

5. The flaming sword kept before the mind of worshipers, to be endured. Whether we trace this to the sword of flame, the death of the victim, or the universal conscience, it is equally a portion of the primitive religion. The soul that sineth deserves to die (Rom. i. 32). And we know no better symbol that could have been introduced to exhibit the wretchedness of those who are twice dead.

6. The tree of life, untouched, waved its laden branches in the garden long after the expulsion of our first parents. While this emblem must of necessity call up the feeling of deep regret, it would, at the same time, after the door of mercy was opened, be for all the joy and all the effort that belong to a well-grounded hope. That tree could never be regained, perhaps not desirable now that it should be; but another Tree of Life in a higher paradise yields its fruit every month (Rev. xxi). Here it may be proper to observe that each of these early emblems of man's recovery is, from the very gate of Eden, carried uninterruptedly down the stream of revelation till we come to the last chapter of the last book; while other emblems have been added as occasion might demand. The rainbow had an early place, and holds it still after the flag till the last (Gen. x. 14). 7. Occasional revelations made to such men as Enoch, Noah, and perhaps Lamech, the father of Noah (Gen. v. 29), were still added to the former stock, and thus were all advances made to rest on the word of God. Before the use of writing, and even now, we find appeals made to what had been taught to the ancestors, whether by Providence or by revelation (Job viii. 7; xx. 10, 18; Deut. iv. 31; xxxii., 7; Psa. xlix., 1). We think that none of these revelations that God has made has ever been lost.

X. Features.—Having seen the sure basis of this early religion, it is proper to glance at some of its characteristics.

1. It was a universal religion, adapted to man as such in every climate and for all time, having its primary relation to the first man. It was the world, as it is now, to top off and add to the truth of God till they had as many religions as languages throughout the world.

2. It was monotheistic: one Lord, one faith, one Spirit. It is, one Mediator, one Advocate. The question whether the Persians borrowed from the Hebrews or the Hebrews from the Persians has no place here: the origin of both from one primitive source is sufficient to account for all the items of similarity, or even identity, in the two religions. So, also, we may reckon of the Hebrews and Egyptians, the Hebrews and the Greeks, and all affinities of this kind. While the primitive religion was monotheistic, there are many indications of a plurality of persons, as in Gen. i. 1, where a singular verb is joined with נְגָדָה, as in a thousand other instances. So, too, ch. i. 24 and iii. 22.

3. Delight in all that God has revealed of himself—the fact, as well as the doctrines, of inspiration. Adam was extensively a prophet—a seer. Not merely had the institution of the Deliverer, but there was given to him the future history of the whole race—the standing, irrepressible conflict, the numerous progeny, the heavy labor, the sore pain, the deep sorrow, all ending in the death of the body and its return to dust. On the other hand, the productivity of the soil for constant support, acceptances of his service, occasional victories over evil, final triumph over sin and Satan in the One Seed. The third chapter of Genesis is too little studied. If John the Baptist could point to the Lamb of God, Adam had the first intimation of his coming, whether Adam was born of woman or not. So happily and largely are the words of inspiration connected with our redemption that Christ is pleased to wear the happy name, the Word of God.

But here, again, while the nations in separating from one another took, each one, some degree of respect for the Word revealed, or for some part of it, it was imparted to one nation only to preserve it pure and entire. "To the Jews were committed the oracles of God." Other nations retained a glimmering tradition, a tetragrammaton, a holy phrase, of which they knew not the meaning and used it merely as a charm—a σωτηρίων. How the true believer in every age and country appreciates the word, we may learn, if not by happy experience, by Psa. cxix. Under these beams of the Sun of Righteousness, Enoch walked with God. Light and life and love were again restored. If we come to the particular doctrines of this primitive religion, we have many scattered hints of, say, acceptance with God, in the sacrifice of Abel; a higher life, in the translation of Enoch; retribution, in the consciousness of Cain: calling on the name of the Lord, in the days of Enoch: judgment combined with mercy, in the deluge and the cities.

1033

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Religious liberty, a term applied, until the 16th century, to those who led a monastic life, to distinguish them from the clergy and laity; and justly, for they were also called Ca nunci and Regulares (q. v.).

Religious, in a general sense, is something that relates to religion; and, in reference to persons, that which indicates that they give their attention to religion, and are so influenced by it as to differ from the world. It was also applied to members of monastic orders. See Religious.

RELIGIOUS CORPORATIONS. In the United States, as there is no civil patronage to the Church, societies for public worship are incorporated in accordance with the statutes of the several states. In most of them there is a provision enabling any body of personscomposed of five or more members to incorporate themselves a corporation, and to elect trustees to hold and manage the property in its behalf. Some of the older denominations are incorporated under special acts and with particular regulations. A convenient digest of these laws is given in the Laws of Religious Corporations (N. Y., 1876, 8vo). In many states there are likewise general laws for the incorporation of most kinds of benevolent, literary, and other bodies of a religious and social character. See Church and State.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION. Both nature and revelation teach that it is the duty of parents to care for the religious education of their children. The mind of the child is in a receptive condition, and the first light it receives should be light from heaven, the first truths those that are eternal and immutable, never to desert them. The mind of the child cannot be shut up until he is of an age to investigate and determine for himself. It becomes, therefore, a high duty to furnish the expanding intellect with truths such as piety cherishes. The apostle says, "Fathers, bring up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord" (Eph. vi. 4). In the education of children, the separation of Church and State must be avoided: (1) That the habits of childhood only are to be regarded, and that, in time, principles will follow of course. Habits, without principles of piet, are nothing better than a citadel ungarrisoned and uncommanded. (2) That many of the subjects in Religious Education are beyond the capacity of children, and that, therefore, to instruct them in Christianity is only to load their memories with words. Yet we do not defer other kinds of instruction till their nature and use can be completely understood by the pupils. But, in fact, many of the truths of religion are some of the most simple and intelligible which can be proposed to the human mind. (3.) That to furnish children with religious ideas is to infuse them with prejudices. But we must be careful to discriminate between religious ideas and prejudices, for the latter is an unexamined opinion. And, further, by this very conduct we prejudice him against religion as something unworthy his concern, or beyond his comprehension. We do not so treat literature, politics, or science. (4.) That the child will acquire in school and the public institutions of the Gospel an adequate sentiment and knowledge of religious truths. But if the love or natural interest of the parent in the child does not stimulate him to this duty, can it be expected that it will be voluntarily assumed by others? The institution of Sunday-schools does not diminish, in the least, the responsibility of those having charge of children to train them for God. See PEDAGOGICS.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY is the absolute freedom of religious opinion and worship based upon the fact that all men are bound by the laws of God and are responsible to him. From this primary and supreme obligation, the conscience cannot be exempt. If the government has a right to hinder any form of religion, nor to support any to the injury of others. This implies the equality of all churches, religious associations, or persons in the matter of protection or restraint by the civil Religious Societies 1034

Religions Societies, associations for the promotion of personal piety established among members of the Church of England about 1678, and which existed until the rise of the Methodist movement. They began with a few young men who had been impressed by the preaching of Dr. Humeck, preacher at the Savoy, and of Mr. Smithies, lecturer at St. Michael's, Cornhill. The organization was somewhat similar to the societies of St. Vincent de Paul in Paris, or like those of the Collegians and other pietistic communities in Holland and Germany. The members met once a week for religious conference and devotion, the meetings being conducted with singing, Scripture reading and exposition, and with special preparation for the holy communion. They added also practical works of charity, the establishment and maintenance of schools, the visitation of the poor, and support of missions in America. They were closely connected with the Society for the Reform of Manners, established in 1691, and efficient allies to the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge. That at Oxford was joined by John and Charles Wesley, and by George Whitefield. One of the last of the annual meetings of the London religious societies was held at Bow Church in 1796. See Woodward, Rise and Progress of Religious Societies; Nelson, Respect to Persons of Quality; id., Festivals and Fasts (Preface); Blunt, Hist. of Sects, etc., s. v.

We must not confound religious liberty with religious toleration, for the latter is the assumption of the right by civil process to regulate religious affairs; and to permit implies the right to prevent. This secession of spiritual and civil affairs is emphatically taught by our Lord: “My kingdom is not of this world” (John xviii, 36). A distinctive American principle of government is that what is religious is necessarily, from its very character, beyond the control of the civil government. In the United States, therefore, religious liberty is an absolute personal right. All denominations, churches, and religious faiths are equal and free in the eye of the law, none receiving gratuities, none subjected to inequalities. There is, thus, an entire divorce of Church and State. The Constitution of the United States contains these two articles: “No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States” and “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” The state constitutions are equally emphatic, and generally more specific in the expression of their jealousy of ecclesiastical ambition and sectarian intolerance. This example was set by Rhode Island, which has the honor of being the first state in the world to incorporate its organic law, and to practice, absolute religious liberty. Under the influence of this American principle of government much change has been wrought in other countries. Toleration is becoming general, and the tendency is towards unrestrained liberty of worship. France bestows patronage upon several denominations; Germany, though claiming the management of ecclesiastical affairs, interferes but little with the right of worship. In Russia, Spain, and Italy there is less of former exclusiveness, and in the two latter countries different forms of faith are entitled to protection. Under English rule the colonies enjoy perfect religious liberty; the Anglican Church has been dissolved in Ireland, and there is in Great Britain no public position, not ecclesiastic, for the tenure of which a particular religious belief is required, except the throne and governorship of a few colleges. The connection of Church and State is increasingly regarded as corrupting to the Church, destructive of the purity and spirituality of religion, and antagonistic to the rights of men. See Brooks, History of Religious Liberty; Madison, Memorial and Remonstrance; Wayland, Discourses.

RELY

perception he preached a finished salvation, called by the apostle Jude "the common salvation." The Relynites are the observers of ordinances such as baptism and the sacrament, but profess to believe only in one baptism, which they call an immersion of the mind or conscience into truth by the teaching of the Spirit of God; and by the same Spirit they are enabled to feed on Christ as the bread of life, professing that in and with Jesus they possess all things. They inculcate and maintain good works for necessary purposes, but contend that the principal and only work which ought to be attended to is the doing real good without religious ostentation; that to relieve the miseries and distresses of mankind according to our ability is doing more real good than the superstitious observance of religious ceremonies. In general they appear to believe that there will be a resurrection to life and a resurrection to condemnation; that believers only will be among the former, who as first-fruits, and kings and priests, will have part in the first resurrection, and shall reign with Christ in his kingdom of the millennium; that unbelievers who are after raised must wait the manifestation of the Saviour of the world under that condemnation of conscience which a mind in darkness and wrath must necessarily feel; that kings, queens, popes, cardinals, and bishops, will be made the medium of communication to their condemned brethren, who, like Joseph to his brethren, though he spake roughly to them, in reality overflowed with affection and tenderness; that ultimately every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that in the Lord they have righteousness and strength; and thus every enemy shall be subdued to the kingdom and glory of the Great Mediator. Rely was succeeded (in 1781) by an American preacher, Elhanan Winchester, who had been a Calvinistic Baptist, but the congregation in London was left to working up. This movement, or Rely's was the first attempt to consolidate a sect of which Universalism should be the leading tenet. A Mr. Murray belonging to this society emigrated to America, and preached these sentiments at Boston and elsewhere. Mr. Rely published several works, the principal of which are:

Union.—The Trial of Spirits.—Christian Liberty.—One Baptism.—The Sult of Sacrifices.—Antichrist Restored.—Letters on Universal Salvation:—The Chromatic Mythology. See Universalists.

RELY, JEAN DE, a French preacher, was born about 1490. He was made doctor of theology at Arras, and became successively canon, chamberlain and archdeacon of Notre Dame at Paris, and rector of the university. In this capacity he drew up in 1461 the Remonstrances which the Parliament presented to Louis XI. for the maintenance of the Pragmatic Sanction, written with real dignity of style and often reprinted both in French and in Latin. In 1485 he was deputy to the States-General of Tours, and presented to Charles VIII the result of their deliberations. In 1490 he became canon of St. Martin of Tours, and in Dec., 1491, he was elected bishop of Angers. He accompanied Charles VIII to Italy, where he was charged with several duties near pope Alexander VI. Rely died at Saumur March 27, 1499. Besides the Breviary of St. Martin of Tours, he revised by royal command the translation of the historical books of the Bible by Guyart de Moulins (1495, fol.),—Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Remali'ah (Heb. Remalai'ah,ı̂m ְלַעֲדָה, protected of Jehovah; Sept. Ρεμαλαίς of Ραμαλαίς, v. Ραμαλία), the father of Pekahiah, who was the son of Israel (2 Kings xv. 25, 27, 30, 32, 37, xvi. 1, 5; 2 Chron. xxvii. 6), probably a man whose character was such as to make his name a reproach to his descendants (Isa. viii. 4, 5, 8, 8.), B.C. ante 756. See Pekahiah.

Rembrandt, commonly called Rembrant or Elsys, was born in Leiden, 1578, and was buried in his father's mill on the banks of the Rhine, between Leydertorp and Koudekerk, near Leyden, June 15, 1606 (or 1608). The former date rests on the authority of Orler, Description of Leyden (1641). The latter date rests on the painter's marriage certificate, lately discovered, dated June 10, 1604, in which Rembrandt's age is stated to be twenty-six. He became the pupil of Pieter Lastman at Amsterdam, and Jacob Pinas at Haarlem. He settled at Amsterdam in 1630, and appears to have died there, according to Immerezel, July 19, 1664; but no register of his burial has yet been discovered. Rembrandt was equally distinguished as an etcher and a painter. His etchings amount to nearly 400, and they are dated from 1628 to 1661. The chief characteristic of his works is forcible light and shade. Among his most remarkable historical paintings are Moses Destroying the Tables of the Law;—The Sacrifice of Abraham:—The Woman Taken in Adultery:—The Descent from the Cross:—The Nativity:—Christ in the Garden with Mary Magdalene:—And The Adoration of the Magi. There are 640 of his paintings specified in Smith's Catalogue. The best of these are still owned in Holland. He is well represented in the National Gallery, and his influence has been more direct upon the British school of painters than that of any other master. See Immerezel, Annuaire-Tempeur de la Levrevede, Rembrandt, also De Levens en Werken der Hollanders en Vlaamseke Künstlers, etc. (1453); Bartch, Le Peintre-graveur; Burnet, Rembr. and his Works (1448); Mitchell, Etched Work of Rembr. (Lond. 1879).

Rem'th (Heb. רְמֵת, remet, height; Sept. Ρεμαίμ v. r. 'Pamayim), a city in the territory of Issachar (Josh. xix. 21), called, as it seems, Ramoth (q. v.) in 1 Chron. vi. 76. As the place is named in the first of the above passages next to Enumim (Jezreel), the site is possibly represented by a tell with ruins south of Zerin (Jezreel) between Sundela and Mukeileh. Dr. Porter (in Kitto's Cyclop. s. v.) suggests that the place may be identical with the ruined fortress and village called Weraz, occupying the northern slope of the face of Mt. Gilboa (Robinson, Researches, iii. 157, 169; new ed. iii. 339).

Remi. See Remigius.

Remigius of Auxerre was a learned French Benedictine monk in the 9th century, and was brought up in the abbey of St. Germain, Auxerre. He was appointed teacher to the schools belonging to the monastery, afterwards taught at Rheims, then went to Paris and opened the first public school in that city after learning had sunk under the ravages of the Normans. His works are, Commentaries in Omer Dursia Paulinus (Cologne, 1506), Commentations in Passio et Vita et Miracula SS. M. Prophetarum (Antwerp, 1545), with the Commentaries of Eucherius on the Acts and Epistles, and those of Arethas on Revelation:—and Expositio Missae. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Remigius, or Remi (St.), of Lyons, a celebrated French archbishop in the 9th century, and grand almoner to the emperor Lothaire, succeeded Amolus in the above see about the year 835 or 845. It is supposed to be this St. Remigius who, in the name of the Church of Lyons, wrote an answer to the three letters of Hincmar of Rheims, and others, in which he defends St. Augustine's doctrine of grace and predestination. This answer may be found in the Vindicatio Predestinationis et Gratiae (1650, 2 vols. 4to), and in the library of the fathers. He presided at the Council of Valencia in 855, and of others of the same kind; and, after founding some pious institutions, he died Jan. 333. He is one of the most celebrated of the fathers, and in the library of the fathers are attributed to him. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.
REMMIGIUS, or REMI, or STRASBURG, a bishop known only for having founded the monastery of Aschau. He died in 903. He is often confounded with pope Remi of Munster, who died in 768. See Hoefer, Notor. Biogr. Graec. s.v.

Remisaciore (rememor), a name sometimes given to the second Sunday in Lent, from the first word of the Introit, "Remember, O Lord, thy tender mercies," etc. (Ps. xxv. 6).

Reming, Franz Xaver, a Roman Catholic divine, was born in 1803 at Edenkoben. In 1827 he was ordained a priest, and in 1832 he became a member of the chapter of the University of Munich, which appointed him as corresponding member, and in 1836 the Munich University honored him with the degree of doctor of philosophy. He died June 28, 1873. He wrote, Das Reformationswerk der Piffl (Mannheim, 1845).—Geschichte der Bischöfe zu Speyer (Mainz, 1853–54, 2 vols.).—Erkundenbuch zur Geschichte der Bischöfe von Speyer (ibid. 1852, 1853 sq.). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1054; Literarischer Handwörterbuch, 1865, p. 443 sq.; 1866, p. 298; 1873, p. 480. (B.P.)

Remoboth and Sarabaimes, names given to associations of hermits in the early Church who refused to submit to the monastic regulations of the Rule of Remoboth, whose name originated in Syria, are mentioned as belonging to this class by Jerome (Ep. 18 ad Eutociachum, De Custodis, Virginiae). He says that they were more numerous than other monks in Syria and Palestine; that they lived in the towns in complete independence, and in companies of not more than two or three persons; that they supported themselves by labor, and often quarreled among themselves. A similar class of hermits, living in Egypt, is mentioned in Cassin (Collatio, xviii, c. 7) under the name Sarabaimes, said to have been applied to them because they separated themselves from the monasteries and personally made provision for their needs. Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Rémond (or Ramond), Florimond de, a French historian, who was born about 1540, and died in 1602, is noteworthy here only for his spleen against the Huguenots, which was vented especially in his Antichrist. He also wrote in refutation of the story of the popess Joan (v. c.), as did likewise his son, abbé Charles Rémont, among other things. See Hoefer, Notor. Biogr. Générale. s. v.

Remonstrance, a complaint framed by the Commons of England in 1628, and addressed to Charles I, setting forth the increase of popery in consequence of the relaxation of the penal laws, the preference given to papists; and a commission being issued to compound for the penalties incurred by papist recusants. It also described the discouragement shown to orthodox preachers and teachers, and the prohibition of their books. The king attempted to suppress this remonstrance, and afterwards published an answer to its allegations.

Remonstrants, a name given to the Arminians (v. c.) by reason of a remonstrance which, in 1610, they made to the States of Holland against the decree of the November Synod of Dort, which condemned them as heretics. Episcopius and Grotius were at the head of the Remonstrants. The Calvinists presented a counter-address, and were called Controversomonstrants.

Rem'phan (擢甫毘 v. t. 擢甫毘) is named in Acts vii. 43 as an idol worshipped by the Israelites in the desert, intoned by Stephen, from Amos v. 9, where the Sept. has 擢甫毘 v. t. 擫甫毘, for the Heb. דִּיצָר, Chiasm. In the following discussion we review the various explanations given of this word. Much difficulty has been occasioned by this corresponding occurrence of two names so wholly different in sound. The most reasonable opinion seemed to be that Chium was a Hebrew or Semitic name, and Remphan an Egyptian equivalent substituted by the Sept. The former, rendered Saturn in the Syriac, was compared with the Arabic, Armenian, and Persian planets; and Saturn, and, according to Kircher, the latter was found in Coptic with the same signification; but perhaps he had no authority for this, excepting the supposed meaning of the Hebrew Chium. They, indeed, occur as such in the Coptic-Armenian Lexicon of Kircher (Ling. Egypt. Retic. i. 49; Copt. Mag. i. 386); but Jablonski has long since shown that this and other names of planets in these lexicons are of Greek origin, and drawn from the Coptic versions of Amos and the Acts (Jablonski, Remphan Egyptian in Opusc. ii. 1 sq.). Epigraphy, however, moves, shown that this is not the true explanation. Among the foreign divinities worshipped in Egypt, two, the god Renpu, perhaps pronounced Rempu, and the goddess Ken, occur together. Before endeavoring to explain the passages in which Chium and Remphan are mentioned, it will be desirable to speak, on the evidence of monuments of the foreign gods worshipped in Egypt, particularly Renpu and Ken, and of the idolatry of the Israelites while in that country. Besides the divinities represented on the monuments of Egypt which have Egyptian forms or names, or both, others have foreign forms or names, or both. Of the latter, some appear to have been introduced at a very remote age. This is certainly the case with the principal divinity of Memphis, Ptah, the Egyptian Hephastus. The name Ptah is from a Semitic root, for it signifies "open," and in Heb. we find the name דִּיצָר, and its cognates, "he or it opened," whereas there is no word related to it in Coptic. The figure of this divinity is that of a deformed pygmy, or perhaps un- born child, and is unlike the usual representations of divinities on the monuments. In this case there can be no doubt that the introduction took place at an extremely early date, as the name of Ptah occurs in very old tombs in the necropolis of Memphis, and is found throughout the religious records. It is also to be noticed that this name is not traceable in the mythology of neighboring nations, unless, indeed, it corresponds to that of the Egyptian Ishtar, who, according to Herodotus, were the figure-heads of Pharaonic ships (iii. 87). The foreign divinities that seem to be of later introduction are not found throughout the religious records, but only in single tablets, or are otherwise very rarely represented, and two out of their four names are immediately recognized in the antelope. They are Renpu, and the goddesses Ken, Anta, and Astarta. The first and second of these have foreign forms; the third and fourth have Egyptian forms: there would therefore seem to be an especially foreign character about the former two. (1.) Renpu, pronounced Rempu (?), is represented as an Asiatic, with the full beard and apparently the general type of face given on the monuments to most nations east of Egypt, and to the Ebre or Libyans. This type is evidently that of the Semmites. His hair is bound with a fillet, which is ornamented in front with the head of an antelope. (2.) Ken is represented perfectly naked, holding in both hands corn, and standing upon a lion. In the last particular the figure of a goddess at Maltheiyeh, in Asyria, may be compared (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 212). From this occurrence of a similar representation, from her being naked and carrying corn, and from her being worshipped with Khem, we may suppose that Ken corresponded to the Syrian goddess, at least when the latter had the character of Venus. She is also called Ketesh, which is the name in high-epochal times for the great Hirte town on the Orontes. This in the present case is presumably a title, דִּיצָר; it can scarcely be the name of a town where she was worshipped, applied to her as per-sonifying in (3). Anata appears to be Anaitis, and her foreign character seems almost certain from her being jointly worshipped with Renpu and Ken. (4.) Astarte is of course the Ashtoreth of Canaan. On a tablet in the British Museum the principal subject is a group representing Ken, having Khem on one side and Renpu on the other; beneath is an adoration of Anata. On the half of another tablet Ken and Khem occur, and a dedication to Renpu and Ketsch.

We have no clue to the exact time of the introduction of these divinities into Egypt, nor, except in one case, to any particular places of their worship. Their names occur as early as the period of the 18th and 19th dynasties, and it is therefore not improbable that they were introduced by the Shepherds. Astarte is mentioned in a tablet of Amenoph II, opposite Memphis, which leads to the conjecture that she was the foreign Venus there worshipped, in the quarter of the Phoenicians of Tyre, according to Herodotus (ii, 112). It is observable that the Shepherds worshipped Sutekh, corresponding to Seth, and also called Bar (that is, Baal), and that he is the older king. Appear he was the male god of the foreigners. Sutekh was probably a foreign god, and was certainly identified with Baal. The idea that the Shepherds introduced the foreign gods is therefore partly confirmed. As to Renpu and Ken we can only offer a conjecture. They occur together, and Ken is a form of the Syrian goddess, and also bears some relation to the Egyptian god of productiveness, Khem. Their similarity to Baal and Ashtoreth seems strong, and perhaps it is not unreasonable to suppose that they were the divinities of some tribe from the east, not of Phoenicians or Canaanites, settled in Egypt during the Shepherd period. The naked goddess Ken would suggest such worship as that of the Babylonian Mylitta, but the thoroughly Semitic appearance of Renpu is rather in favor of an Arab source. Although we have not discovered a Semitic origin of either name, the absence of the names in the mythology of Canaan and the neighboring countries, as far as they are known to us, inclines us to look to Arabia, of which the early mythology is extremely obscure.

The Israelites in Egypt, after Joseph's rule, appear to have been little interested in these deities. It is only twice distinctly stated and once alluded to (Josh. xxiv, 14; Ezek. xx, 7, 8; xxiii, 3), but the indications are perfectly clear. The mention of Chiu or Remphan as worshipped in the desert shows that this idolatry was in part at least, that of foreigners, and no doubt of those settled in Lower Egypt. The golden calf, at first sight, would appear to be an image of Apis of Memphis, or Mnevis of Heliopolis, or some other sacred bull of Egypt; but it must be remembered that we read in the Apocrypha of "the heifer Baal" (Tab. i, 5), so that it was possibly a Phoenician or Canaanish idol. The best parallel to this idolatry is that of the Phoenician colonies in Europe, as seen in the idols discovered in tombs at Cimnus in Rhodes by M. Saladnak, and those found in tombs in the island of Euboea (of both of which there are specimens in the British Museum), and those represented on the coins of Miletus and the island of Euboea.

We can now endeavor to explain the passages in which Chiu or Remphan occur. The Masoretic text of Amos v, 26 reads thus: "But ye bare the tent [or "tabernacle"] of your king and Chiu your images, the star of your gods [or "your god"], which ye made for yourselves." In the Sept., we find remarkable differences; it reads, Καὶ ἕνα ἀντρον τοῦ Ιοβ ὑμῶν Ῥεμφαν, τοὺς τίτους αὐτὸς ἐν τῷ ἔσχατῳ τῶν ἡμερῶν. The Vulg. agrees with the Masoretic text in the order of the clauses, though omitting Chiu or Remphan. "Et portastis tabernaculum Molocho vestro, et imaginem idolorum vestrorum, sidus dei vestri, que fecistis vos." The passage is cited in the Acts almost in the words of the Sept.: "Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Molocho, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them" (Καὶ ἔνα ἀντρον τοῦ Μολόχ, καὶ τὸ ἄστρον τοῦ Ιοβ ὑμῶν Ῥεμφαν, τοὺς τίτους αὐτὸς ἐν τῷ ἔσχατῳ τῶν ἡμερῶν). A slight change in the Hebrew would enable us to read Molech (Melcam or Milcom) instead of "your king." Beyond this it is extremely difficult to explain the differences. The substitution of Remphan for Chiu cannot be accounted for by verbal criticism. The Hebrew does not seem as distinct in meaning as the Sept.; and if we may conjecturally emend it from the latter, the last clause would be "your images which ye made for yourselves;" and if we further transpose Chiu to the place of "your god Remphan," in the Sept., and do not see an unwarrantable conjecture that τοῖς τίτους αὐτὸς cor- responds in position to τοῖς τίτους αὐτων, and it does not seem a mistake written in the place of cuer by some copyist, καὶ ἔνα ἀντρον τοῦ Μολόχ was also transposed. It appears to be more reasonable to read "images which ye made" than "gods which ye made," as the former word occurs. Supposing these emendations to be probable, we may now examine the meaning of the passage.

The tent or tabernacle of Molocho is supposed by Gesenius (Theoseor. s. v. Ρεμφαν) to have been an actual tent, and he compares the σφήνι τιμὴς of the Carthaginians (Diod. Sic. xx, 65). But there is some difficulty in the idea that the Israelites carried about so large an object for the purpose of idolatry, and it seems more likely that it was a small model of a larger tent or shrine. The reading Molocho appears preferable to "your king;" but the mention of the idol of the Ammonites as worshipped in the desert stands quite alone. It is perhaps worthy of note that there is reason for supposing that Moloch was a name of the planet Saturn, and that this planet was evidently supposed by the ancient translators to be intended by Chium and Remphan. The correspondence of Remphan or Rai pam, with Chium is certainly remarkable, and can, we think, only be accounted for by the supposition that the Sept. translator or translators of the prophet had Egyptian knowledge, and being thus acquainted with the ancient joint worship of Ken and Remphu, substituted the latter for the former, as they may have been unwilling to repeat the name of a foreign Venus. The star of Remphan, if indeed the passage is to be read so as to connect these words, would be especially appropriate if Remphan were a planetary god; but the evidence for this, especially as partly founded upon an Arabic or Persian word like Chium, is not sufficiently strong to enable us to lay any stress upon the agreement. In hieroglyphics the sign for a star is one of the two composing the word Seb, "to adore," and is undoubtedly there used in a symbolical as well as a phonetic sense, indicating that the ancient Egyptian religion was partly derived from a system of star-worship; and there are representations on the monuments of mythical creatures or men adoring stars (Ancient Egyptians, pl. 30 a). We have, however, no positive indication of any figure of a star being used as an idolatrous object of worship. From the manner in which it is mentioned, we may conjecture that the star of Remphan was of the same character as the tabernacle of Moloch, an object connected with false worship rather than an image of a false god. According to the Sept. reading of the last clause, it might be thought that these objects were actually images of Moloch and Remphan; but it must be remembered that we cannot suppose an image to have had the form of a tent, and that the version of the passage in the Acts, as well as the Masoretic text, if in the latter case we may change the order of the words, gives a clear sense. As to the meaning of the last clause, it need only be remarked that it does not oblige us to infer that the Israelites made the images of the false gods, though they may have done so, as in the case of the golden calf; it may mean no more than that they adopted these gods. It is to be observed that the whole passage does not indicate that distinct Egyptian idolatry was practiced by the Israelites. It is very remarkable that the only false gods mentioned as worshipped by them in the desert should be probably Moloch and Chium and Remphan, of which the latter two were foreign divinities worshipped in Egypt. From this we may reasonably infer that while the Israelites sojourned in Egypt there was also a great stranger-population in the Lower Country, and therefore that it is probable that then the Shephelah still occupied the land. Renaissance. (Fr. new birth), a term used alike in architecture, sculpture, and ornamental art, to designate a revival period or style after the Middle Ages. The Renaissance had its origin in Italy, where, at best, Gothic architecture secured but a precarious hold. The discovery (early in the 15th century) of the productions of the ancients in statues and painting, and the bringing to light of long-hidden stores of Greek and Latin MSS. (as, for instance, Vitruvius on the architecture of the ancients), could not fail to bring Roman buildings into prominent notice, and to predispose the public mind in favor of the classical style. A new system was consequently developed, during the first stages of which (namely, the Transition period) the elements of Roman architecture came again into use, although the forms which belong to the Later-Romanic period—such, for instance, the division of the window-arches by mullions—were not entirely abandoned. Starting in Italy, this new style reached its zenith in that country in the course of the same century. Although derived from that of Italy, each country had its peculiar Renaissance, described accordingly as French, German, and English Renaissance, preserving a general likeness, but each exhibiting traits exclusively its own.

1. Italian. At the early epoch of its existence, the new style of architecture displays not so much an alteration in the arrangement of the spaces and of the main features of the buildings as in the system of ornamentation and in the aspect of the profiles. During the early period the endeavor was maintained to adapt classical forms with more or less freedom to modern buildings, while later (in the 16th century), a scheme based on ancient architecture was universally prescriptive. Two distinct styles belong to this first period, viz. the Early Florentine and the Early Venetian. In the Roman Renaissance, the system of the second period, which confines itself more closely to classical elements, is more prevalent. The decoration of the interiors of the buildings of the Renaissance is copied from ancient Roman architecture. The rooms are either vaulted or have flat ceilings; but in both cases they are adorned with paintings, after the manner of those discovered in the Baths of Titus. Ornamented panels were employed in large palaces for horizontal ceilings, as also in churches, though in the latter case they were more often applied to cupola vaultings, as notably in St. Peter's. See ROM.

2. French. France was the first to introduce the new style north of the Alps. Fra Giocondo, an Italian artist, having been summoned thither by Louis XII. Giocondo erected for cardinal D'Amboise, the minister of that monarch, the celebrated Château Gaillon. At this time the Flamboyant (q. v.) style was still in its vigor, and the consequence was that a blending of the two styles... temporarily prevailed. After the period of Phillibert Delorme, who completed the chapel of the Château d'Étampes in 1555, the Gothic style was, as a rule, abandoned. At the same time, the general arrangement of the Gothic churches was retained, and it was only the Renaissance system of decoration which was substituted for the Gothic. The ground-plan, the proportions, and the whole structure, with its flying buttresses, pinnacles, clustered columns, and deeply recessed portals, are borrowed from the pointed style.

It was only in the details and in the ornamentation that the Renaissance was followed. The Tulleries, as built for Catherine de Medicis, is a great example of French Renaissance where the new style is developed. In its elevation richness is perceptible without excess, and symmetry is attained without stiffness: in fact, it presents a design in which aesthetic laws are fully considered, and the details harmoniously, if not magnificently, executed.

3. German.—The Renaissance style was not employed in Germany before the middle of the 16th century, and the most noteworthy instances of it are the Belvedere of Ferdinand I on the Harraschin at Prague, and the so-called Otto Henry buildings at Heidelberg Castle. In Germany, as in other countries, the elements of the preceding style are mingled with those of the Renaissance during the early period of its prevalence. The fault of the German Renaissance style is a certain heaviness—an exuberance, not to say extravagance, in its constructive character and decorative details.

In Spain an Early Renaissance style appears, a kind of transitional Renaissance, belonging to the first half of the 16th century. It consists of the application of Moorish and pointed-arch forms in conjunction with those of classical antiquity. In this way a conformity was produced which was peculiar to Spain, and the style is characterized by bold lightness, by luxuriance in decoration, and by a spirit of romance. In the reign of Charles V, this ornate Early Renaissance style gave place to a later one, which, in reality, belongs to the Rococo style. Among the Renaissance edifices of Spain may be mentioned the upper gallery of the cloister of the Convent of Huerta, the townhall of Saragozza and of Seville, and the Alcazar at Toledo.

5. English.—The Italian Renaissance style was introduced into England about the middle of the 16th century by John of Padua, the architect of Henry VIII. English buildings of this style are distinguished by capricious treatment of forms, and generally exhibit a deficiency of grace and dignity, both in detail and ensemble, which lend a peculiar charm to Italian structures. Thus, in English style, Longleat, Wiltshire, and Wollaton Hall are specimens of this style. See English Cyclop. & v.; Rosengarten, Architectural Styles. See Rococo; Romanesque Architecture.

Renaudot, Évrard, a French savant, was born at Paris, July 20, 1646. His early studies were carried on among the Jesuits, and in the College of Harcourt. On their completion he entered the Congregation of the Oratory, but without taking orders. Though he remained but a short time in this institution, the whole of his life was passed in similar ones, and was devoted to his favorite studies of theology and Oriental literature. His knowledge of ecclesiastical affairs caused him to be employed in many negotiations with foreign countries, and his talent made him a favorite at court. In 1700 abbe Renaudot went to Rome, and received from Clement XI the priory of Frossay, in Brittany. During his whole career he endeavored to re-establish the printing of the Oriental classics, and interested the duke of Orleans, but it was not accomplished. He died at Paris, Sept. 1, 1720. Renaudot's writings were numerous, though he published nothing until a few years before his death. We mention, Défense de la Perpétuité de la Foi, etc. (Paris, 1708) := Grenaditi Patriarcha homilia de Eucharistia, etc. (ibid. 1709) := La Perpétuité de la Foi de l'Eglise sur les Sacraments, etc. (ibid. 1718) := Histoire Patriarchales de l'Alexandrin de Jacobitum, etc. (ibid. 1713). This is the most complete work ever written upon the history of Egyptian Christianity. It is based upon the Arabic narrative of bishop Severus, and contains a complete list of the Jacobite patriarchs from Cyril to John Touski, who lived early in the 18th century. —Liturgium Orientalium Collectio (ibid. 1715-16) := Anciennes Religions des Indo et de la Chine, etc. (ibid. 1718). Besides these, he left works upon purely literary subjects, and several valuable MSS. —Histoire de Saladin := Histoire des Patriarches du Saint-Empire := Notes de Travail de l'Eglise d'Ethiopie. See De Beri, Hist. de l'Acad. des Inscrip.; Nicerson, Memoires, xii and xx. —Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Renard is the translation of several Heb. and Gr. words in the Bible. The following only are of special significance.

1. The rendering (רֵנַּר, ῥήγαρ) of one's clothes is an expression frequently used in Scripture as the token of the highest grief. Reuben, to denote his sorrow for Joseph, rent his clothes (Gen. xxxvii, 29); Jacob did the like (ver. 34), and Ezra, to express the concern and uneasiness of his mind, and the apprehensions he entertained of the divine displeasure on account of the people's unfaithfulness. It is said to have fallen on the garments and mantle (Ezra ii, 3), that is, both his inner and upper garment. This action was also an expression of indignation and holy zeal; the high-priest rent his clothes, pretending that our Saviour had spoken blasphemy (Matt. xxvi, 65), and so did the apostles when the people intended to flay them divine honors (Acts xiv, 14). See Clothing.

To rend the garments was in Eastern countries and among ancient nations a symbolic action, expressive of sorrow, fear, or contrition. (See the monographs on the subject in Latin by Grünwold [Haan. 1708]; Hiliger [Witten. 1716]; Böhrensee [ibid. 1668]; Schrüder, [Jen. 1716]; and Wickmanhausen [Witten. 1716]). The passage in Joel (ii, 13), "Rend your hearts, and not your garments," is in allusion to this practice. But the phrase here is a Hebrewism, meaning "rend your hearts rather than your garments," or "rend your hearts, and not your garments only:" for the prophet does not forbid the external appearances of mourning, but he cautions them against a merely hypocritical show of sorrow, and exhorts them to cherish that constitude and broken spirit which is acceptable in the sight of God. See Buñuel: Mourning.

2. In the prophet Jeremiah (iv, 80), when he denounces the divine judgments upon the people, it is said, "Though thou rendest (רֵנַּר) thy face with painting:" the Hebrew has, instead of face, "eyes," and the expression is an allusion to the Eastern practice of painting the eyes, which we have explained under the words Eye and Paint.

Rendu, Louis, a French prelate, was born at Meyrin, Dec. 19, 1789. He entered the priesthood and spent his life in teaching and scientific research. In 1833 he published a work entitled De l'Influence des Lois sur les Mœurs et des Mœurs sur les Lois. This gained for the author a wide reputation. He was second cousin to the Bishop of Annecy. His works were entirely scientific—on geology, meteorology, chemistry. He died Aug. 18, 1880. See Mgr. Louis Rendu, by the abbé M. Mermillod. —Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Renée d'Este, duchess of Ferrara and princess of France, whose career was closely interwoven with the history of her native country and the life of her time. She was the second daughter of John XXII of the Este family, born at Ferrara, Oct. 11, 1318, and married in 1236 to King Louis X, King of France, her first husband, and in 1248 to King Louis XII, King of France, her second husband. She was married July 30, 1272, to Duke Hercules of Burgundy. She was also the mother of a number of children, including the Duke of Orleans, the Duke of Burgundy, and the Duke of Savoy. She was a patron of the arts, and a friend of the poet Dante. She was also a patron of the arts and sciences, and a friend of the poet Dante. She was buried in the church of San Pietro in Montorio, in Rome.
of Ferrara, and became the mother of five children; and in the exercise of her tastes for literature and art she made the court of Ferrara a centre of culture which emulated that of Florence and the Medici. Her sympa-thy with the Italian Reformers penetrated her whole being; she endeavored to instruct everything in the traditions of her family and her early education, were with the Reformation. She encouraged Brucioli to prepare an Italian version of the Bible, and allowed him to dedicate to her the first edition (1541), and when she afforded a refuge to fugitive Protestants. Calvin availed himself of this asylum in 1543, and this began a relation which was of great value to the duchess while he lived. He was allowed to pray and expound the Scriptures in a chapel which is still shown, until reminiscences from Rome induced the duke to banish him, and with him all the Protestant friends of his consort, down to the servants brought with her from France. The same influence led to the persecution of Renée in person. The relations of Ferrara with France had been broken off, and political added to religious prejudices aggravated the situation; but beyond restraints and disrespect she suffered little, until in 1545 the Inquisition was established in Ferrara and the reconquest of the land to Romanism began. The co-operation of Henry II of France was secured; Renée was compelled to listen to sermons in denunciation of her principles; her husband, angered at her heresy, imprisoned her with two of her women, and placed her daughters Leonora and Lucrezia in a convent. These measures broke her spirit and brought her to confession and attendance on the mass. She was restored to liberty Dec. 1, 1554, after an imprisonment of two and a half months. She had enjoined the counsel of Protestant friends during much of her period of trial: Calvin had written frequent letters, and had sent Francis Moré (of Collangies) to act as her spiritual adviser; and her former secretary, Leon James, had also sustained her faithfully; but, in the heat of a persecution in which but few stood firm, her resolution gave way. The unfailing fidelity of the whole of her subsequent life stoned for that single and temporary lapse. The experience of Renée was sufficiently trying in other respects as well. Her daughter Anna was married, against the earnest protest of her mother, to the chief opponent of the Protestant cause, duke Francis of Guise (Sept. 29, 1548). Her eldest son, Alphonso, quarreled with his father and fled the country in 1552. Her husband died Oct. 8, 1559, after exacting from her an oath that she would love his son no less than her own. She succeeded in her latter wish, obedient to Calvin, from which she was, however, absolved by Calvin. Alphonso succeeded his father, and, influenced by pope Pius IV, at once compelled his mother to renounce his country or her faith. She chose the former alternative, and returned to France in September, 1560, leaving her children in a period troubled with the disputes of Navarre and Conde with the Guises, and Conde lay in prison awaiting death. Renée did not hesitate to censure the diabolic cruelty of the Guises; and when their power was broken, on the death of Francis II, she became the open protector of the Reformation. She invited Protestant clergymen into the country and caused Protestant worship to be held at her seat of Montargis and wherever she might make a temporary home in other places; but she was none the less earnestly engaged in promoting peace between the contending parties. At Montargis she so complicated their disputes that they were definitely laid aside. Her charities and her counsels were expended upon applicants of every class. When her won-in-law, the duke of Guise, began the war which during thirty years drenced France with blood, she determined that Montargis should be a refuge to all Protestant fugitives. Francis of Guise died Feb. 24, 1563, and the peace of Amboise was declared in March of the same year; and, as she was thereafter forbidden to celebrate the worship of her God, she retired to her own house, in her own home, permanently to Montargis, though she subsequently accompanied Charles IX on his tour through the kingdom.

She founded a school, enlarged and beautified the town, and took a lively interest in the translation of the New Testament into Spanish. At this time she received a last letter from Calvin, written (April 4, 1564) while he was on his death-bed, by the hand of his cipher; from this period the records of her life become rare. The second religious war (Sept., 1567, to March, 1568) did not disturb her. She was at the Hôtel de Laon in Paris during St. Bartholomew's Night, but was exempted from the general massacre, and succeeded in rescuing several of her eloquent champions, who had been condemned and aided to effect their ultimate escape. She ended her noble life June 12, 1575. An eloquent testimony to her faith was included in her will. Her remains were interred in the church at Montargis. Renesse, Ludwig Gerard Van, a Dutch ascetic, author, was born at Breda, May 11, 1599. As an evangelical minister he preached at Maestricht. From time of Utrecht. In 1638 he was called to Breda, where he founded a college, of which he was the first director and professor of theology. The University of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of doctor of theology. He was a fine linguist, and corresponded with the most celebrated theologians of his time. His principal works are, Paëntz Jecelb (1654) —Treatises on the Cure, Authority, and Duty of Elders in the Church (1659-64) —and Meditations on religious subjects. These are all written in Flemish.—Hoeft, Now. Begr. Geneal., s. v.

Rennell, Thomas (1). D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1574, and was educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge. He became curate of Barmack, and prebendary of Winchester (resigned 1637); rector of St. Magnus's, London Bridge, in 1792; master of the Temple from 1797 to 1827; dean of Winchester in 1805; rector of Alton, Hants, in 1809; vicar of Barton Stacey, Hants, in 1814. He died in 1840. He published, single Sermons (Lond. 1788-98), and a volume of Discourses (ibid. 1801). Mr. Pitt styled him "the Democritus of the Deity." See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. s. v.

Rennell, Thomas (2). D.D., a learned English divine, son of the above, was born at Winchester in 1767, and was educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge. He became Christian advocate at Cambridge and vicar of Kensington in 1816; and master of St. Nicholas's Hospital and prebendary of Salisbury in 1825. He died in 1824. Mr. Rennell was one of the editors of and contributors to the (Eton) Miniature and the British Critic. He published, Paæntz Morilis —Aminations en Le Visiteur Voulant la Nouvelle Grande, (1811, 8vo); Remarks on Sorciere, (1819, 12mo; 6th ed. 1824) —Proofs of Inspiration, etc. (1822, 8vo); —Sermons (3d ed. Renniger, or Rangger, Michael, was born in Hampshire, 1529, and was educated at, and a fellow of, Magdalen College, Oxford. He embraced the principles of the Reformation, resided chiefly at Strasbourg during the reign of Mary, and was made chaplain to Elizabeth on her accession. He became prebendary of Winchester in 1560, precentor and prebendary of Lincoln Cathedral in 1567, and dean of the same in 1568. He died Aug. 26, 1609, and was buried in the church of Crawley. He wrote: Car-

Renwick, James, a noted Nonconformist divine, was born at Dumfriesshire, Scotland, Feb. 15, 1662. He was an uncompromising Covenanting Presbyterian, and was executed Feb. 17, 1688, for "denying the king's authority, owning the covenants," etc. He wrote, with Alexander Shields, An Informatory Indication of the Covenanters (Edinb. 1744, small 8vo) — A Choice Collection of Prefaces, Lectures, and Sermons, etc. (Glasgow, 1777, 8vo).

Reoordination, the repetition of the sacramental ordinance of ordination, has ever been held to be contrary to the true theory of sacraments, and has been forbidden by the Church under pain of severe penalties. The ground of this prohibition is well expressed by Mou- "In the sacrament of ordination, as in baptism, a character is conferred which cannot be effaced or taken away." The historical evidence as to both the doctrine and practice of the Church is full and complete. The 68th apostolical canon condemned it, and pronounced severe sentences of deposition against the ordained. The third Council of Carthage (canon 59) forbade it along with robbery. Whether the ordinations of heretics and schismatics are to be held valid, and whether those who have received them are on their reconciliation to be received in their several orders, is a question in respect to which the practice of the Church has varied considerably. The Council of Nice decreed that those who had been ordained by Meletius should be admitted to serve the Church by reordination. The 68th apostolical canon, while condemning the reordination of those once ordained in the Church, allows that of those who had only received heretical ordination. The second Council of Sardica (A.D. 552) ratifies the baptism of the Arians, but condemn their ordinations. In later times the practice of the Roman Catholic Church has also been very contradictory. Thus the ordinations of such persons were declared valid to all by Stephen VI, considered valid by John IX, and again declared invalid by Sergius III. The modern Roman practice of reordaining those ordained in the Church of England is not based on any decree of the Church, and has not been invariable. The custom of the Church of England forbids reordination in the case of those ordained within the Church, and asserts the indebility of the ordination character. Repairs of Churches. Canon 85 of the Church of England enacts, "The churchwardens or quæstors shall take care and provide that the churches be well and sufficiently repaired and maintained, and so from time to time be well and maintained," etc., specifying the work upon windows, floor, churchyard, walls, and fences. They are also to "see that at every meeting of the congregation peace be well kept, and that all persons so communicant, and so doth the same, be kept out of the church." Canon 86 adds, "Every dean, dean and chapter, archdeacon, and others which have authority to hold eclesiastical visitations by composition, law, or prescription, shall survey the churches of his or her jurisdiction once in every three years, or cause the same to be done," etc. Usually the repair of the church belongs to the rector, and that of the nave to the parishioners.
REPENTANCE

The repairing of the Established churches in Scotland belongs to the heritors, who, if they resolve to build a new church, must build it so large as to accommodate two thirds of the examinable permanent population, or persons above twelve years of age. The presbytery can ordain the means to make the necessary repairs, can appoint a visitation to a decayed church, receive the report of the tradesmen, and come to a decision. Undivided congregations build and repair their own places of worship.

Repentance (παραστάσας, παραστάσας) signifies a change of the mind from a rebellious and disaffected state to that submission and thorough separation from iniquity by which converted sinners are distinguished (Matt. iii, 2-8). Repentance is sometimes used generally for a mere change of sentiment, and an earnest wishing that something were undone that has been done. In a sense analogous to this, God himself is said to repent; but this can only be understood of his altering his conduct towards his creatures, either in the bestowing of good or the infliction of evil—where change in the divine conduct is founded on a change in his creatures: and thus, speaking after the manner of men, God is said to repent. In this generic sense also Esaú "found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears," that is, his father did not repent of what he had done, or to recall the blessing from Jacob and confer it on himself (Heb. xii, 17; Rom. xi, 29; 2 Cor. vii, 10). There are various kinds of repentance, as (1) a natural repentance, or what is merely the effect of natural conscience; (2) a national repentance, such as the Jews in Babylon were called unto, to which temporal blessings were promised (Ezek. xlviii, 30); (3) an external repentance, or an outward humiliation for sin, as in the case of Ahab; (4) a hypocritical repentance, as represented in Ephraim (Hos. vii, 16); (5) a legal repentance, which is a more work of the heart and the effect of convictions of sin by it, which in time wear off and come to nothing; (6) an evangelical repentance, which consists in conviction of sin, accompanied by sorrow for it, confession of it, hatred to it, and renunciation of it. A legal and an evangelical repentance are distinguished thus: 1. A legal repentance flows only from a sense of danger and fear of wrath, but an evangelical repentance produces a true mourning for sin and an earnest desire of deliverance from it. 2. A legal repentance arises from unbelief, but evangelical repentance is always wrought by faith. 3. A legal repentance consists of an aversion to God and to his holy law, but an evangelical flows from love to both. 4. A legal repentance ordinarily flows from discouragement and despondency, but evangelical from encouraging hope. 5. A legal repentance is temporary, but evangelical is the daily exercise of the true Christian. 6. A legal repentance does at most produce only a partial and external reformation, but an evangelical is a total change of heart and life. The author as well as object of true repentance is God (Acts x, 31). The subjects of it are sinners, since none but those who have sinned can repent. The means of repentance is the Word and the ministers of it; yet sometimes private consideration, sanctified afflictions, conversation, etc., have been the instruments of repentance. The blessings connected with repentance are pardon, peace, and everlasting life (xi, 16). The time of repentance is the present life (Isa. lv, 6; Eccles. ix, 50). The evidences of repentance are faith, humility, prayer, and obedience (Zech. xii, 10). The necessity of repentance appears evident from the evil which it removes, and the benefit which it involves to society; the commands given us to repent in God's Word; the promises made to the penitent; and the absolute incapability of enjoying God here or hereafter without it. Repentance, a term for State holidays.

Repentation. Our Lord in his sermon on the Mount (Matt. vi, 7) cautions his followers against using vain repetitions (παραστάσας) in prayer. See Prayer, Forms of. It is well to distinguish that this is not directed against simple repetitions, which may often arise in the fervor and urgency of earnest supplication, but against the vain repetitions of such as think, whether in theory or practice, "that they shall be heard for their much speaking." The idea that a prevailing merit was attached to much speaking in prayer with multitudinous repetitions has been, and is, found in most of the false systems of religion. Perhaps we find it among Baal's worshippers, who "called upon the name of Baal from morning to noon, saying, O Baal, hear us!" (1 Kings xviii, 26). The practice was certainly common among the classical heathen, and is noticed by some of their more serious writers with disapprobation and laughed at by their satirists. If we may judge by the hymns of Homer, Orpheus, and Callimachus, we may suppose that the pagan prayers were so stuffed up with synonymous epithets and prerogatives of the Deity as to be justly liable to the censure of "vain repetitions." The Jews also were not without these, but it was greatly against them that the great number of them was a universal custom, and that it was one of their maxims, "He that multiplies prayer shall be heard." The same idea was inculcated with much earnestness by Mohammed, and is at this day exhibited in full force among his followers. Witness the following from the Makhad ut-HaKeem: "The prophet said, Shall I not teach you an act by which you may attain the greatness of those who have gone before you, and by which you shall precede your posterity, excepting those who do as you do? Then they said, Instruct us, O prophet of God. He said, Repetition after a prayer, and the people of Allah! [O most pure of God!] eleven times, and Allah akeen [God is very great] eleven times, and Alhando lildahi [praise to God] eleven times." Compare this puerility with the sublime instructions of our Saviour. But again: "Whoever says Subhan Allah and Bismillah a hundred times a day, his faults shall be silenced, though they be as great as the waves of the sea. Whoever says, morning and evening, Subhan Allah and Bismillah a hundred times, no one will bring a better deed than his on the day of resurrection, except they who have said like him, or done a like thing thereto." To these precepts the Mohammedans have been most attentive. There are those among Christians, especially Roman Catholics, who repeat the Lord's Prayer and other forms a great number of times, and vainly think that the oftener the prayer is said the better is the effect. This is, i.e., if repeated two hundred times it will be twice as good as if repeated only one hundred times. (See a literature in Volbeding, Index programmatus, p. 33; Hase, Leben Jesu, p. 229.) See Ave Maria; Pattensoner; Rosary.

Repetitions in the Liturgy. An objection has been made to the Liturgy of the English Church that involves vain repetitions and a useless prolixity. It is replied, repetition is one thing, but a vain repetition quite another. The repetitions in the Liturgy are principally in the cry "Have mercy upon us," and in the use of the Lord's Prayer twice, or at most thrice, in the longest service of the New Year, and three times in the Decalogue. Reference is also made to the example of our Saviour who prayed thrice in Gethsemane, saying "the same words" (Matt. xxvi, 44). Further, the petitions which we address to Heaven must, for the most part, have the same general drift; and there can be no advantage in arranging them in a perpetually changing dress, nor will they be the better received because of their novelty.

Ro'phael (Heb. Raphaie, רפַּחְא, healed of God;
REPHAH (Heb. "Rephah"). a son of Simeon, the Levite, of the house of Obad-edom, an able-bodied porter in the service of the house of God in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvi, 7). B.C. cir. 1015.

REPHAIH (Heb. "Rephaihu", רְפַחִי, header of Jeborah; Sept. "Rapha" v. "Rapha", the name of five Israelites. 1. A double name of six sons of Toba, head of a family in Issachar (1 Chron. vii, 2). B.C. ante 1668. 2. Son of Binea, and eighth in lineal descent from Saul's son Jonathan (1 Chron. ix, 43). B.C. last post 1000. He is also called Rapha (1 Chron. viii, 57). 3. Son of Ishi, and one of the chieftains of the tribe of Simeon, in the reign of Hezekiah, who headed the expedition of five hundred men against the Amalekites of Mt. Seir and drove them out (1 Chron. iv, 42). B.C. cir. 725.

The name of Hur, and ruler of "the half" of Jerusalem. He aided in rebuilding the wall (Neh. iii, 9). B.C. 445. 5. Son of Hananiah and father of Aman, among the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii, 21); the same with Herson (q. v.) of the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii, 27).

REPHAIIM (many Rephaim) (Heb. usually with the art. the "Rephaim"). כְּרֶפַךְ (see before), a name which frequently occurs, and in some remarkable passages, as that of a race of unusual stature, who originally dwelt in the country east of the Jordan. The earliest mention of them is the record of their defeat by Chedorlaomer and some allied kings at Ashteroth Karnaim (Gen. xiv, 5). They are again mentioned (xx, 20); their dispersion recorded (Deut. x, 20, 20), and Og the giant king of Bashan said to be "the only remnant of them" (iii, 11; Josh. xii, 4; xii, 12; xviii, 15). Extir- pated, however, from the east of Palestine, they long found a home in the West; and in connection with the Philistines, under whose protection the small remnant of them may have lived, they still employed their arms against the Hebrews (2 Sam. xxii, 18 sq.; 1 Chron. x, 4).

In the latter passage there seems, however, to be some confusion between the Rephaim and the sons of a particular, but not of that, nation named Rapha. Such a name may have been conjectured as that of a founder of the race, like the names Ion, Dorus, Tent, etc. (Böttcher, De Infeririis, p. 96, note): Rapha occurs also as a proper name (1 Chron. vii, 25; viii, 3, 27). It is probable that they had possessed districts west of the Jordan in early times, since the "valley of Rephaim" (םֹעְלֵה רַמוֹת תָּירָם; 2 Sam. v, 18; 1 Chron. xi, 18; Isa. viii, 5; κ. τ. γίγαντων, Joseph. Ant. vii, 4, 1), a rich valley south-west of Jerusalem, derived its name from them. That they were not Canaanites is clear from there being no allusion to them in Gen. xx, 15-19. They were probably one of those aboriginal peoples to whose existence the traditions of many nations testify, and of whose genealogy the Bible gives us no information. The few names recorded have, as Ewald remarks, a Semitic aspect (Gesch. der Volker Isr. i, 811); but from the nature, existing between them and both the Canaanites and Hebrews, some suppose them to be Japhethites, "who comprised especially the inhabitants of the coasts and islands" (Kalisch, on Gen. p. 581). See CANAANITE.

REPHAIIM is rendered by the Greek versions very variously (Sept. Ραφαηλι, γίγαντας; γιγαντας, Σπαθαρος, Τιρανος, and Ταρταρος [Psa. lxxvii, 10; Isa. xxvi, 14, where it is rendered with Σπαθαρος] v. Gen. 1, 23, and sometimes ζευς, τερατοις, especially in the later versions). In the A. V. the words used for it are "Rephaim," "gigants," and "the dead." That it has the latter meaning in many passages is certain (Psa. lxxviii, 10; Prov. ii, 18; ix, 18; xxi, 16; Isa. xxvi, 14, 19). The question arises, how are these meanings to be reconciled? Genesius gives no derivation for the national name, and derives "gigants" from γιγαντας, and the proper name Rapha from an Arabic root signify "sharpen," that to seeming to sever all connection between the meanings of the word, which is surely most unlikely. Masius, Simon, etc., suppose the second meaning to come from the fact that both spectres and giants strike terror (accepting the derivation from γιγαντας, reminisci, "unstrung with fear," R. Bechall, on Deut. xi); Virgina and Miller from the notion of length involved in stretching out a corpse, or from the fancy that spirits appear in more than human size (Miller, Syntagma, Hermen. p. 202; Virg. Aen. ii, 772, etc.). J. D. Michaelis (ad Loebel S. Poes. p. 460) endeavored to prove that the Rephaim, etc., were traglogydes, and that hence they came to be identified with the dead. Passing over other conjectures, Böttcher sees in γιγαντας a double root, and thinks that the giants were called レフア (languagefici) by a euhemerism; and that the dead were so called by a title which will thus exactly parallel the Greek καμπτος, κατημπτος (com. Buttman, Lex. ii, 287 sq.). An attentive consideration seems to leave little room for doubt that the dead were called Rephaim (as Genesius also hints) from some such word as being stretched out. Of the fallen spirits or buried giants. The passages which seem most strongly to prove this are Prov. xxii, 16 (where obviously something more than mere physical death is meant, since that is the common lot of all), Isa. xxvi, 14, 19, which are difficult to explain without some such word (comp. Gen. xiv, 49 sq.; Isa. xiv, 5 sq.; comp. Gen. Lxxvii, 18 sq.; Deut. ii, 1, 27). The word יונית (Sept. או יונית תיגי, if taken in its literal meaning of goats, may mean evil spirits represented in that form (comp. Lev. xvii, 7), and especially Job xxxii, 5, 6. "Behold the grancies (A. V. "dead things") grown under the waters" (Doverav version), where there seems to be clear allusion to some subaquatic prison of rebellious spirits; like that in which (according to the Hindo legend) Vishnu the water-god confines a race of giants (comp. παράρχος, as a title of Neptune, Hesiod, Thucy. 782; Nork, Bambrian, and Rabb. p. 319 sq.). See GIANTS. Branches of this great unknown people were the following:

1. EMIM (גָּםְיָמִים; Sept. 'Omeim, 'Itmaim), smitten by Chedorlaomer at Shaveh Kiriathaim (Gen. xiv, 5), and occupying the country afterwards held by the Moabites (Deut. ii, 10), who gave them the name יונית, "terror." The word rendered "tall" may perhaps be merely "haughty" (גייום). See EMIM.

2. ANAKIM (אַנָקִים), the imbecile terror of the spies exaggerated their proportions into something superhuman (Numb. xiii, 26, 33), and their name became proverbial (Deut. ii, 10; ix, 2). See ANAKIM.

3. ZIZIM (זִיִּים), whose principal town was Zab (Gen. xiv, 5), and who lived between the Arnon and the Jabbok, being a northern tribe of Rephaim. The Amnonites who defeated them called them Zizanim, יונית (Deut. ii, 20 sq., which is, however, probably an early gloss). See Jour. Soc. Lit. Oct. 1851, p. 101 sq.; Jan. 1852, p. 268 sq.; Apr. 1852, p. 55 sq.; July 1852, p. 302 sq.; Oct. 1852, p. 87 sq., Jan. 1853, p. 279 sq.). See ZIZIM.

REPHAIM, VALLEY OF (Heb. 'Elmek Rephaim; הָרְפָאִים, "Rephaim", the head of the "Rephaim", the head of the "Rephaim"), in Josh. v, 7; Judges iv, 1; after Joshua's death the whole of the region east of the Jordan was inhabited by the Rephaim (Gen. xxv, 3-8; Judg. i, 7). The valley appears to derive its name from the ancient nation of the Rephaim. It may be a trace of an early settlement of theirs, possibly after they were driven from their original seats east of the Jordan by Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 5), and before they again migrated northward to the more secure wooded districts in which we find them at the date of the partition of the conquest (Josh. x. 35). In this case it is a parallel to the “mount of the Amalekites” in the centre of Palestine, and to the towns bearing the name of the Zemaraim, the Avim, the Ophnites, etc., which occur so frequently in Benjamin. The wall of Bethlehem is first mentioned in the description given by Joshua of the northern border of Judah. The passage is important: “The border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite: the same is Jerusalem; and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward, which is at the end of the valley of the giants northward” (xx. 8). The last clause in the Hebrew is not quite clear (מייסוֹ דַיָּם). It may mean that the boundary-line was north of the valley, or that the valley was north of the boundary. The latter construction is possible; but the former is unquestionably the more natural, and is supported by support of the Sept., and by most commentators. If this interpretation be admitted, the situation of the valley is certain: it lay on the south of the hill which enclosed Hinnom on the west. This view is further strengthened by the notice in Josh. xviii. 10, that the city of Adullam was hiding from the war in the cave of Adullam, as it were, the Philistines, no doubt taking advantage of intestine troubles, invaded the mountain fastnesses of Israel. A band of them pitched in the valley of Rephaim, and at the same time seized and garrisoned Bethlehem, David’s native place (2 Sam. xxiii. 13; 1 Sam. xxvii. 7). It was then that David’s warriors, to gratify a wish of their chi.-fr.: broke through the enemies’ lines and drew water from the well by the gate of Bethlehem. The narrative shows clearly that the valley of Rephaim could not have been far distant from Bethlehem, which is close (Josh. xvii. 14; Jer. ii. 19). The “hold” (ver. 14), in which David found himself (though it is not clear) to have been the cave of Adullam, the scene of the commencement of his freebooting life; but, wherever situated, we need not doubt that it was the same fastness as that mentioned in 2 Sam. v. 17, since in both cases the same place is marked, with the same “wells,” and that not a usual one, is employed. The story shows very clearly the predatory nature of these incursions of the Philistines. It was in “harvest time” (ver. 13). They had come off the ripe crops, for which the valley was proverbial (Isa. xxi. 5), just as at Pico-lam-Ach (31) we find them in the parcel of ground full of barley, at Lehi in the field of lentils (2 Sam. xxiii. 11), or at Keilah in the threshing-floors (1 Sam. xxiii. 1). Their animals (7777) were scattered, among the rife corn receiving their load of plunder. The “garrison,” or the officer in charge of the expedition, was on the watch in the village of Bethlehem. On two other occasions, soon after, the king, the Philistines invaded the mountains and drew up their armies on the same plain; they were at once attacked by David’s veterans and routed with great slaughter (2 Sam. v. 18, 22; 1 Chron. xiv. 9-13). The destruction inflicted on them and on their idols was so signal that it gave the place a new name, and impressed itself on the popular mind of Israel with such distinctness that the prophet Isaiah could employ it, centuries after, as a symbol of a tremendous impending judgment of God—nothing less than the desolation and destruction of the whole earth (Isa. xxvi. 21). See PERRAM, MOUNT.

But from none of these notices do we learn anything of the position of the valley. Josephus in one place (Ant. vii. 4, 1) says that the valley of the giants was near Jerusalem; and in another place (vii. 12, 4), when narrating the story of the drawing of water from the well at Bethlehem, in which he makes a strange blunder, he says the valley extended from Jerusalem “to the city of Bethlehem.” Eusebius and Jerome, on the other hand, place it on the north of Jerusalem (Onomast. s. v. “Rephaim”), and in the territory of Benjamin (ibid. s. v. “Izareo” [Jebus]; “Eumer Hec.” xv. 10); but this is unsatisfactory (see Onomast. s. v. “Celus Titanus,” and the excellent note by Bodmer). A position north-west of the city is adopted by Florus (Hist. c. 4, 383 b), apparently on the ground of the terms of Josh. xix. 8, and xvii. 16; which certainly leave it doubtful whether the valley is on the north of the boundary or the boundary on the north of the valley; and Tobler, in his last investigations (Dritte Wanderung, p. 202), conclusively adopts the Wady el-Javid (W. Mahlker, on Van de Velde’s map), one of the side valleys of the great Wady Beit Hamra, as the valley of Rephaim. This position is open to the obvious objection of too great distance from both Bethlehem and the cave of Adullam (according to any position assignable to the latter) to meet the requirements of 2 Sam. xxi. 13. Since the latter part of the 16th century the name has been attached to the upland plain which stretches south of Jerusalem, and is crossed by the road to Bethlehem—the Beit Kish of the modern Arabs (Tobler, Jerusalem, ii. 401). Dr. Robinson says: “As we advanced (towards the holy city) we passed on the right hand side of the road, to the left the cultivated valley or plain of Rephaim, or the giants, with gentle hills beyond. This plain is broad, and descends gradually towards the south-west until it contracts in that direction into a deeper and narrower valley, called Wady el-Herod, which unites farther on with Wady Ahmad, and finds its way to the Mediterranean. The plain of Rehaim extends nearly to the city, which, as seen from it, appears to be almost on the same level. As we advanced the plain was terminated by a slight rocky ridge, forming the brow of the valley of Hinnom” (op. cit. p. i, 219). It is thus that this valley has more of the nature of a plateau or plain considerably elevated than a valley in the ordinary sense. But on the south-west it does partake more of this character (see Donar, Land of Promise, p. 177), and possibly in designating so wide and open a tract by the name of the Rehaim valley there was a sort of popular race with which it was associated, as if it, like them, must set at naught ordinary dimensions. South of Mount Zion—the most southern part of the valley of Gilon—is called Wady Refaith by the Arabs, which corresponds with the valley in Hebrew. Dr. Robinson infers that this is the true valley of Rehaim, though usually taken for that of the son of Hinnom (Pales- tan, p. 240). See JERUSALEM.

Repha’ims, so the Hebrew plural Rephaim (q. v.) is incorrectly pluralized again in English in the A.V. (Gen. iv. 5; xxv. 20). Rephid’im (Heb. Rephidhîm, רפִּידוֹת), supports, i.e., perhaps, resting-places; Sept. and Josephus, Pago- sia, a station of the Israelites on their journey through the Arabian desert to which they passed from the Desert of Sin (Exod. xvii. 1), situated, according to Numb. xxxiii. 14 sq., between Alash and the wilderness of Sinai. Here the Amalekites attacked Israel, but were repulsed (Exod. xvii. 8, 9). Here also Moses struck the rock, from which the fountain of water leaped forth; to which the later Jewish traditions added many other wonders, as that the rock itself followed the people in their journey, supplying water always (see Wettstein and Schottgen, on 1 Cor. x, 4; Buxtorf, Exercit. p. 391 sq.). The knowledge of this miraculous gift of water reached the Roman empire, Nerva having alluded to it (Juv. Met. v, 258), and the emperor Trajan imposed that Moses was guided by wild ass, and then by the green pasture, to the exact spot where water was concealed (comp., in the Grecian mythology, especially Pausan. ii. 66, 8: but the legend of Hippocrene [Ovid, Met. v, 298] may have borrowed it from the Bible), and gave it (as of arianship). The most definite indication as to the situation of Reph-idim is incidentally supplied in the Scripture account of the above miracle. While encamped at Rephidim, "there was no water for the people to drink," and they murmured against Moses. He was therefore commanded to "go on [בָּאָשׁ, pass. i.e. cross the desert shore] before the people," and with his rod to smite "the rock in Horeb," upon which (ץָּבַע, the towering cliff bounding the range et-Tih) Jehovah stood. (This admirably suits the entrance of Wady Hibrân, but is utterly vague and inapt if spoken of the interior.) In consequence of this, Rephidim was called Massaah ("temptation") and Meribah ("contention"). As the Israelites, though encamped in Rephidim, were able to draw their needful supply of water from "the rock in Horeb," the two places must have been adjacent. Assuming Jebel Misa to be Sinai (or Horeb), and that the Israelites approached it by Wady es-Sheik, which is the only practicable route for such a multitude coming from Egypt, it follows that Rephidim was not more than one march—and apparently a short one—distant from the mountain. Notwithstanding this indication, however, the position of Rephidim has created much discussion among the theologians. Josephus appears to locate it very near to Sinai, and states that the place was entirely destitute of water, while in their preceding marches the people had met with fountains (Ant. iii. 1, 7, and 5, 1). Eusebius and Jerome say it was near Mount Sinai, and it forms part of the Cosmography of Ptolemy, which places it at the distance of six miles, which agrees pretty nearly with that of Nehemiah (Topographia Chris- tiana, v. 207 sq.). Robinson removes it some miles farther down Wady es-Sheik to a narrow gorge which forms a kind of door to the central group of mountains. He gets over the difficulty in regard to the proximity of Horeb by affirming that that name was given, not to a single mountain, but to the whole group (Itib. Res. i, 120). See Mose. Mr. Sandie places Rephi- dim at the extreme end of Wady er-Râbâh, and identifies it with a Wady Kathleen. He supposes that the Israelites marched from the coast plain of el-Kâa by Wady Daghshâlah (Horeb and Jerusalem, p. 159). This route, however, would scarcely be practicable for such a multitude. Lepsius (ed. Bohn, p. 310 sq.), Stewart (Test. and Klauw.), Bitter (Pal. and Syr., i. 738 sq.), Stanley (Syr. and Pal., p. 40 sq.), and others, locate Rephidim in Wady Feirân, near the base of Mount Serbal, especially at the oasis of el-Hessheh or the rock Hezy el-Khatatun (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, p. 136). The great dis- tance from Sinai—more than four eternal miles from the abysmal depths of Wady Feirân—will be fatal to this theory. No spot in the whole peninsula has such a supply of water, and Feirân is on this account called "the paradis of the Bedawin." The position of Rephidim, it is thus seen, largely depends upon the route which the Israelites may be supposed to have taken from the Desert of Sin to Mount Sinai. Murphy (Comment, on Exod., p. 174 sq.) regards that by way of Wady Hibrân as being out of the question, partly on account of its length (whereas it is really little, if any, farther than either of the other practicable ones, especially the northern one by way of the Debet er-Râmîch, which he prefers); and partly on account of the narrow and difficult passes (especially Nagb Ajâmeh) along it, which, however, are no worse than many others in different parts of their identified route (see Palmer, Desert of the Exodus [Amer. ed.], p. 229). Keil, who likewise prefers the same northern route for reaching Sinai, observes (Comment, on Pent. Clarke's ed. ii, 75) that Rephidim lay at only one day's distance from Sinai (Exod. xix. 2). He therefore locates Rephidim at the point where the Wady Feirân crosses the road of the Israelites. But though this would be almost at the foot of Sinai, and past several fountains which would have relieved their thirst without the need of a miracle. If, on the other hand, we should place Rephidim at the other end of the Wady es-Sheik, this, according to Keil's own showing, would be about as far from Sinai as the mouth of Wady Hibrân, which last is, after all, only twenty miles, following the windings of the valleys. The great objection to the access by way of the Debet er-Râmîch is that although this (as the name signifies) is in the main a sandy plain, yet there are not wanting springs at various points and at its course—a circumstance which, in the Arabic, 1. e. the green), being situated just at its junction with Wady es-Sheik (Robinson, Bib. Res. i, 125). By the way of the plain el-Kâa and Wady Hibrân, on the contrary, there is total drought, so that the Israelites, as the narrative requires, would have exhausted the stock brought probably from Elim, without having been mean- while in a region where their scouts could have procured water within any reaching distance. For the same reason, the most natural route of all—by way of Wady Feîrân—must be suspected, which, as already said, is the best watered and most fertile of all in that vicinity (ibid. i, 126). There is still another route from the Red Sea at Ras Abu-Zenimah (where the Israelites evidently encamped) to Sinai—namely, by way of Sarabet el-Khadim. This, although not so smooth as by wadies Feirân and es-Sheik, is quite practicable, and is often taken by modern travellers. This is advocated by Knobel, Keil, Cook (in his Speaker's Com- mentary), and others, who find the Desert of Sin in Debet er-Râmîch, Dophkah in Wady Tih, and perhaps Ashw in Wady el-Esh. The water supply on this route is somewhat present, but may be, as there are many springs at the mines in Sarabet el-Khadim, a grave ob- jection to its having been followed by the Israelites. There are two tradional spots fixed upon as the scene of Moses' smiting of the rock, and hence called Hajr Misa, or "Moses' Rock." One is pointed out by the Arabs in Wady Feirân, and the other by the monks in Wady Lejâh. The former is too distant and the latter too near for the Biblical account. See מיסא. If the Israelites approached Sinai by way of Wady Hibrân, we should look for Rephidim at the entrance of that valley from the plain along the Red Sea, as suggested under the article EXORD; but if they reached Mount Sinai by way of Wady Feirân, as most writers suppose, or by way of Sarabet el-Khadim, then we must prob- ably look for Rephidim somewhere near the entrance from Wady es-Sheik to the plain er-Râbâh, perhaps at the pass of el-Watîyeh, indicated above by Robinson. This defile was visited and described by Burckhardt (Syria, etc. p. 488) as at about five hours' distance from where issues from the plain er-Râbâh, narrowing be- tween abrupt cliffs, and bordered by the same sandy fields in width. Here is also the traditional "seat of Moses." Within the pass the valley expands, affording ample space for a large camp. The nearest water is in Wady Sheb, two miles distant to the south-west (Porter, Hand-book, p. 63). See Ridgeway, The Lord's Land, p. 57 sq. The arguments in favor of the location of Rephidim at el-Watîyeh are forcibly presented by Mr. Holland in Jerusalem Recovered, p. 420 sq. See סָּלַל.
REPHIDIM

Reposein. 1. A receptacle for the tabernacle in the procession of Corpus Christi. 2. A chapel and shelter for travellers on the way to Rome, located in Italy: one of the 13th centuries is near Fiesma. A pilgrim's chapel remains on Landsum, near Bath.

Repousade, a French artistic term signifying colored wood.

Representation. The theological use of this word by English writers of the 16th and 17th centuries was, in the strict sense of its Latin original, that of "presenting over again" in reality; the subordinate idea was of "putting into the form of." Hence, in all, use by them. Thus when bishop Pearson writes, "by virtue of his death, perpetually represented to his Father, he destroyeth him that hath the power of death," the word refers to our Lord's continual pleading of the sacrifice once offered. It is of importance to remember this use of the term "representation," as it is not unfrequently used with reference to the eucharistic sacrifice; and by losing sight of the sense in which the word was understood by former writers, modern readers have understood "representation" to mean literal imitation rather than a real and actual making present, and offering over again, of that which is present by virtue of the once only offered sacrifice.
REPRESENTATION

Reproof (usually ἀληθής, ἀληθέος), the act of finding fault in opprobrious terms, or attempting to expose to infamy and disgrace. In whatever cause we engage, however disinterested our motives, however laudable our designs, reproach is what we must expect. But it becomes us not to retaliate, but to bear it patiently; and so to love that very charge which against us we be groundless. If we be reproached for righteousness' sake, we have no reason to be ashamed, nor to be afraid. All good men have thus suffered, Jesus Christ himself especially. We have the greatest promises of support. He has a tendency to humble us, detach us from the world, and excite in us a desire for that state of blessedness where all reproach shall be done away.

Reprobation is equivalent to rejection; and by it is usually understood the Calvinistic doctrine, that a portion of mankind, by the eternal counsel or decree of God, has been predestined to eternal death. Conditional reprobation, or rejecting men from the divine mercy, because of their impenitence or refusal of salvation, is a scriptural doctrine. Against the unconditional, absolute reprobation taught by rigid Calvinists, the following objections may be urged: 1. It cannot be reconciled to the love of God. "God is loving to every man, and his tender mercies are over all his works." 2. Nor to the wisdom of God; for the bringing into being a vast number of intelligent creatures under a necessity of sinning and of being eternally lost, teaches no moral lesson to the world; and contradicts all those notions of wisdom in the ends and processes of government which we are taught to look for, not only from natural reason, but from the Scriptures. 3. Nor to the grace of God, so often magnified in the Scriptures. For if it does not, certainly, argue superabounding richness of grace, when ten thousand have equally offended, to pardon one or two of them. 4. Nor to those passages of Scripture which represent God as tenderly compassionate and pitiful to the worst of his creatures; "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth;" "The Lord is long-suffering to usward, not willing that any should perish." 5. Nor to his justice. We may affirm that justice and equity in God are what they are taken to be among reasonable men; and if men everywhere would consider it as contrary to justice that a sovereign should condemn to death one or more of his subjects for not obeying a law, which it was utterly impossible for them to obey, it is manifestly unjust to charge God with acting in precisely the same manner. In whatever light the subject be viewed, no fault, in any right construction, can be chargeable upon the person so punished, or, as we may rather say, destroyed, since punishment supposes a judicial proceeding which this act shuts out. Every received notion of justice is thus violated. 6. Nor to the sincerity of God in offering salvation by Christ to all who hear the Gospel, of whom this scheme supposes the majority, or at least great numbers, to be among the reprobate. That God offers salvation to those who he knows will never receive it, is true; but there is here no insincerity, for the atonement has been made for their sins. 7. Nor with the scriptural declaration, that "God is no respecter of persons." To have respect of persons is a phrase in Scripture which sometimes refers to judicial proceedings, and signifies to judge from partiality and affection, and not upon the merits of the question. "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him" (Acts x, 34, 35). But if the doctrine of reprobation be true, then it necessarily follows that there is precisely this kind of respect of persons with God. 8. This doctrine brings with it the repulsive and shocking opinion of the eternal punishment of infants. The escape from this is either by annihilation of those dying in infancy, or by assuming that they are among the elect. 9. This doctrine destroys the end of punitive justice. That end can only be to deter men from offence, and to add strength to the law of God. But if the whole body of the reprobate is left to the influence of their fallen nature without remedy, they cannot be deterred from sin by threats of inevitable punishment; nor can they ever submit to the dominion of the law of God: their doom is fixed, and threats and examples can avail nothing. Comp. Election.

Reproof (γρηγορία, φρεκτίζω, ἀληθέος), blame or reprehension spoken to a person's face. It is distinguished from a reprimand, when he who reproves points out his fault, and blames him; he who reprimands affects to punish, and mortifies the offender. In giving reproof, the following rules may be observed: 1. We should not be forward in reproving our elders or superiors, but rather to remonstrate and make a personal supplication for redress. What the ministers of God do in this kind, they do by special commission as those that must give an account (1 Tim. vi, 1; Heb. xiii, 17). 2. We must not reprove rashly; there should be proof before reproof. 3. We should not reprove for slight matters, for such faults or defects as proceed from frailty, from inadvertency, or mistake in matters of small consequence. 4. We should never reprove unreasonably, as to the time, the place, or the circumstances. 5. We should reprove mildly and sweetly, in the calmest manner in the gentlest terms. 6. We should not affect to be reprehensive; perhaps there is no one considered more troublesome than he who delights in finding fault with others. In receiving reproof, it may be observed, I. That we should not reject it merely because it may come from those who are not exactly on a level with ourselves. 2. We should consider whether the reproof given be not actually deserved; and whether, if the reprover knew all, the reproof would not be sharper than it is. 3. Whether, if taken humbly and patiently, it will not be of great advantage to us. 4. That it is an illness but pride to suppose that we are never to be the subjects of reproof, since it is human to err.

Reptile, a word not used in the A.V., which designates this class of animals by the term "creeping thing" (q.v.), but covers thereby a much wider range of creatures. The following are the true reptilia mentioned in Scripture. They are almost exclusively consisted of various unknown species of serpents and lizards. (Of course both these classes were unclean to the Hebrews.)

Crocodylus (Tetrapods) — Legatianum.
Cynodon — Leptis.
Battaglia — Croc.
Fratr — Fraternit.
Telesphor — Fusch.
Bono — Chameleon.
Lizard — Lizard.
Zittu — Semeith.
Lisk — Mole.
Mel — Adder.
Akebhu — Adder.
Ephes — Adder.
Draco — Adder.
Echidna — Adder.
Cynodon — Adder.
Tetrapods — Adder.
Serpent — Adder.
Crocodile — Adder.
Reptilia — Adder.

Requiem, a musical mass for the dead in the Church of Rome, so called from the words of the Introit, "Requiem aeternam dona eis, Domine," Give them eternal rest, O Lord, etc. (2 Esd. ii, 34, 35); and the antiphon for the psalms in place of the Gloria Patri.

Reredos (written also lardus, from Fr. larderreidos), the wall or screen at the back of an altar, seat, etc. It was usually ornamented with paneling, etc., especially behind an altar, and sometimes was enriched with a profusion of niches, buttresses, pinnacles, statues, and other decorations, which were often painted with brilliant colors. Reredoses of this kind not unfrequently extended across the whole breadth of the church, and were sometimes carried up nearly to the ceiling, as at St. Alban’s Abbey, Durham Cathedral, Gloucester Cathedral, St. Saviour’s Church, Southwark; Christ Church, Hampshire, etc. In village churches they were generally simple, and appear very frequently to have had no ornaments formed in the wall, though sometimes cornices or niches were provided to carry images, and sometimes that part of the wall immediately opposite the altar was panelled.

Remains of these, more or less injured, are to be found in many churches, particularly at the east ends of aisles, as at St. Michael’s, Oxford; Hanwell and Eton, Oxfordshire; Solihull, Warwickshire, etc.; and against the east wall of the transept, as at St. Cuthbert’s Wells. It was not unusual to decorate the wall at the back of an altar with panelings, etc., in wood, or with embroidered hangings of tapestry-work, to which the name of reredos was given; it was also applied to the screen between the nave and choir of a church. The open reredos was the great city, frequently used in ancient domestic halls, was likewise called a reredos.

Resciassy Act, an act of the Scotch Parliament passed on the restoration of Charles II, annul- ling all acts passed between 1689 and 1650 for re- ligion and the Reformation; denouncing the Solemn League and Covenant and the Glasgow Assembly of 1688, and declaring that the government of the Church, as an essential royal prerogative, belongs alone to the crown.

Rescript, or Codex Rescriptus, a manuscript, the original writing of which had been virtually wiped out, and the works of some saint or father written over it. A codex of this class is called Codex Ephraemi in the Imperial Library of Paris. Several works of the Syrian father were written over both of the Old and New Testaments. It has been published by Tischendorf, with a curious fac-simile of the older and newer handwriting. By the application of a chemical tinture, the original writing of a rescript can now be well deciphered. See EPHRAIM MANUSCRIPT; PA-LIMPSEST.

Resemblance to GOD. See Image of GOD.

Resen (Heb. שֶּׁרֶן, a halter, as in Isa. xxx, 20; Sept. Σαρήν v. Σαρήν), an ancient town of Assyria, described as one of the lying between the Tigris and the Calah (Gen. x, 12). Many writers have been inclined to identify it with the Rhesi or Resena of the Byzantine authors (Amm. Marc. xxiii, 5; Procop. Bell. Pers. ii, 19; Steph. Byz. s. v. Prasieion, and of Proclom (Geograph. v, 18), which was near the true source of the western Euphrates, and which is most probably the modern Rus el-Ain. There are no grounds, however, for this identification except the similarity of name (which similarity is perhaps fallacious, since the Sept. evidently reads שַׁרֶן for יָרָן, but not the Samar.), while it is a fatal objection to the theory that Resen or Reshina was not in Assyria at all, but in Western Mesopo- tamia, 200 miles to the west of both the cities between which it is said to have lain. Biblical geographers have generally been disposed to follow Bochart (Phaleg, iv, 23) in finding a trace of the Hebrew name in Lu- rissas, which is mentioned by Xenophon (Anab. iii, 4, 9) as a desolate city on the Tigris, several miles north of the Lycurus. It is not of the resemblance of the names is too the resemblance of the names is too strong to support the inference of identity; but the situation is not irreconcilable with the scriptural intimation. Ephrem Syrus (Comment. ad loc.) says that Resen, which he substitutes for Resen (the Peshito has Ressina), was the same as the Rishi (fountain-hill) by which Assemani understands him to mean, not the place in Mesopotamia so called, but another Resh-Ain in Assyria, near Saphasphe, in the province of Marga, which he finds noticed in a Syrian monastic history of the Middle Ages (Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. iii, 2, p. 709). It is, however, still uncertain if Resna be the same with Rish- Ain; and, whether it be so or not, a name so exceedingly uncommon (corresponding to the Arabic Ras el-Ain) affords a precarious basis for the identification of a site so ancient. The Lurissa of Xenophon is most cer- tainly the modern Nimrīd. Resen, or Resnā—whichever may be the true form of the word—must assuredly have been in this neighborhood. As, however, the Nimrīd ruins seem really to represent Calah, while those opposite Mosul are the remains of Nineveh, we must look for Resen in the tract lying between these two sites. Assyrian remains of some considerable ex- tent are found in this situation, near the modern village of Selsemiyeh, and it is perhaps the most probable conjecture that these represent the Resen of Genesis (see Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, i, 292). No doubt it may be said that a "great city," such as Resnā is de- clared to have been (Gen. x, 12), could scarcely have intervened between two other large cities which are not twenty miles apart; and the ruins at Selsemiyeh, it must be admitted, are not very extensive. But perhaps we ought to understand the phrase "a great city" rela- tively—i.e., great, as cities went in early times, or great, considering its proximity to two other larger towns. If this explanation seem unsatisfactory, we might perhaps conjecture that originally Asshur (Kalēh-Shergat) was called Calah, and Nimrīd Resen; but that, when the seat of empire was removed northwards from the former place to the latter, the name Calah was transferred to the new capital. Instances of such transfers of name are not unfrequent. The later Jews appear to have identified Resen with the Kalēh-Shergat ruins. At least the Targums of Jonathan and of Jerusalem explain Resen by Tel-Assur (תליוס), or in Tiberian, "the mound of Asshur." See ASSYRIA.

Resentment, generally used in an ill sense, implying a determination to return an injury. Dr. Johnson observes that resentment is a union of sorrow with malignity; a combination of a passion which all en- deavor to avoid with a passion which all concur to de- test. The man who retires to meditate mischief and to exasperate his own rage; whose thoughts are em-played only on means of distress and contrivances of ruin; whose mind never passes from the remembrance of his own sufferings but to indulge some hope of enjoying the calamities of another, may justly be numbered among the most miserable of human beings—among those who are guilty, who have neither the gladness of prosperity nor the calm of innocence.

Reservation, or Restriction, in ethics, is the keeping back in the mind; equivocation, by a phrase which means one thing to the users and another to those who hear it. It may be distinguished as real and mental.

1. Real restriction takes place when the words used are not true if strictly interpreted, but there is no deviation from truth if the circumstances be considered. One man asks another, Have you dined? and the answer given is, No. The party giving this answer has dined, times without number: but his answer is restricted by the circumstances, as to-day, and in that sense is true.

2. Mental restriction consists in saying so far what is true and can be believed, but adding mentally some qualification which makes it not to be so. A debtor asked by his creditor for payment of his debt, says, "I will certainly pay you to-morrow," adding to himself, "in part;" whereas the words audibly uttered referred to the whole amount. —See Fleming and Krauth, Vocabulary of Philosophical Science, a. v.

Reserve in Teaching. This is the suppression, in the instruction of the great mass of Christians, of a portion of those (Gospel) doctrines which are most earnestly set forth in Scripture, as if they were a sort of esoteric mystery of which ordinary believers are unworthy, and which should be reserved as a reward for a long course of pious submission. The maintainers of this system of teaching are ignorant of the highest and most sacred doctrines of Christianity (such as the atonement, the divinity of our Lord, etc.); they regard them as too solemn and divine to be vulgarized by being explicitly and prominently put before the Christian world at large. They would make men "economize" the knowledge of such deep doctrines, reserving them for communication to those worthy of being initiated, meanwhile asserting that the ordinary Christian is put in possession of these truths, and to a certain degree derives virtue out of them, by partaking of the sacraments, etc. It is on the authority of the fathers that the advocates of "reserve" chiefly dwell as most fully and expressly supporting the principle; but they adduce also, in justification of the system, the reverence it has a tendency to bestow for sacred things (as if it were reverence, and not superstition, in those who know not what they are reverencing), and allege that doing thus they are acting a merciful part in keeping those in ignorance who would not make a profitable use of knowledge (just as if they had the power of discerning spirits). They contend that they are imitating the most perfect Pattern of wisdom and mercy, who thus economizes light and knowledge (e. g., concealing the Gospel at first under the veil of the Mosaic ritual), as if it were a system of philosophy of their own they undertook to teach, or as if they were imitating the Deity in concealing what he had revealed. The Father our Lord is appealed to, who, they say, taught openly by parables, but privately explained the mysteries of his kingdom to his disciples: a case quite inapplicable, as our Lord used reserve, not to his disciples, but towards wilful unbelievers. The system is so well guarded by studied confounding it with the gradual initiation of Christians in the knowledge of their religion, and the necessity of gradual teaching; and the care requisite to avoid teaching anything which, though true in itself, would be falsely understood by the hearers, confounded with the system of withholding a portion of Gospel truths from those able and willing to receive it. It is almost needless to add that the entire system is opposed to the Word of God, which commands ministers not to shun to declare to the people "all the counsel of God," and that it is calculated to throw doubt and uncertainty upon the whole Christian religion; for, as in this system of "reserve" there may be an indefinite number, none can ever be sure that he has fathomed the system, and ascertained what is the realmost doctrine of its advocates. See the Rev. Dr. West's Sermon on Reserve in Teaching.

Reserved Cases, among Roman Catholic canonists, are certain sins which are to be dealt with by higher ecclesiastics than the mere priest, who may, however, bestow absolution if the penitent be at the point of death. To this class of sins belong heresy, simony, sacrilege, and certain offences against the priesthood.

Res'heph (Heb. id. ד'ֶס, frame, as often; Sept. Parth. v. r. Zebaph), one of the descendants of Ephraim, a "son" of Beriah (q. v.) (1 Chron. vii. 25). B.C. post 1658.

Residence. In the early Church there were laws regulating the residence of the clergy, and their design was to bind them to constant attendance upon their duty. The Council of Sardica had several canons relating to this subject. The seventh decreed that no bishop should go up, upcountry, to the emperor, or address the emperor by letter called him thither; but if any petition was to be preferred to the emperor relating to any civil contest, the bishop should depute his episcopii, or resident at court, to act for him, or send his deacon, or some other of his clergy, to solicit the matter in his name, that the Church might neither receive damage by his absence nor be put to unnecessary expenses. Another canon of the Council of Sardica limited the absence of a bishop from his church for three weeks, unless it was upon some very weighty and urgent occasion. Another allowed the same affect for a time to a bishop and the revenues of his estate, provided he there celebrated divine service every Lord's day. By two other canons, presbyters and deacons were similarly tied. The Council of Agde made the like order for the French churches, decreeing that a presbyter or deacon who was absent from his church for three weeks should be three years suspended from the communion. By a rule of the fourth Council of Carthage, every bishop's house was to be near the church. The fifth council prescribed that every bishop should have his residence near his principal or cathedral church, which he should not leave, to the neglect of his cure.

In Great Britain, at the present time, residence is now regulated by 1 and 2 Vict. c. 106. The penalties for it, without a license from the bishop, are, one third of the annual value of the benefice when the absence exceeds three but not does exceed six months: one half of the annual value when the absence exceeds six but does not exceed eight months: and when it has been for the whole year, three fourths of the annual income are forfeited. Certain persons are exempted from the penalties of non-residence, as the heads of colleges at Oxford and Cambridge, the warden of Durham University, and the headmasters of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster schools. Privileges for temporary non-residence are granted to a great number of persons who hold offices in cathedrals and at the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge. See Bingham, Christian Antig. bk. vi. eh. iv. p. 7; Eccles. Cyclop. a. v.

Resignation, a patient, unresisting submission to the will of God, acknowledging both his power and right to all. The obligations to this duty arise from: 1. The perfection of the God (Deut. i. 11). 2. The purpose of God (Eph. i. 11). 3. The commands of God (Heb. xii. 9). 4. The promises of God (1 Pet. v. 7). 5. Our own interest (Hos. ii. 14, 15). 6. The prospect of eternal felicity (Heb. iv. 9). See Patience.

RESIGNATION. ECCLISIASTICAL. The ancient Church was very strict in the matter of resignations, and yet there were cases in which they were allowed: 1. When a bishop, through the obstinacy, hatred, or disgust of any people, found himself inability of doing them any service, and that the burden was an intolerable oppression to him; in that case, if he desired to resign, his resignation was accepted. Thus Gregory Nazianzen renounced the see of Constantinople because he was shorn by his people. This was called the resignation. 2. When in charity a bishop resigned, or showed himself willing to resign, to cure some invertebrate schism. Thus Chrysostom announced his willingness to resign if the people had any suspicion that he was a usurper. In such cases canonical pensions were sometimes granted. The following are the rules that the Church of England: It can be made only to a superior, and it must be to such a superior as the one from whom it was immediately obtained; for example, where institution was required, the party having the right to institute is the same to whom resignation is to be made; and in the case of donatives, resignation is to be made to the patron. Resignation must be made personally, and not by proxy: that is, it must be made either by personal appearance before the ordinary, or by an instrument properly attested and presented to him. It must be made within thirty days after the decision of the instrument, it must be made "absolutely et simpliciter," and it must further be, in the words of the same instrument, "sponte et pure." It must also be made voluntarily, and it must not proceed from any corrupt inducement. If an incumbrance, sum of money, or other benefits, directly or indirectly, or for or in respect of the resigning of a benefice having cure of souls, such a transaction is criminal in the view of the law, and both the giver and receiver in it are liable to legal penalties. No resignation can be valid till accepted by the proper ordinary, but the law has provided no remedy if the ordinary should refuse to accept. In as far as legal decisions have hitherto gone, the ordinary is no more compellable to accept a resignation than he is to admit persons into holy orders. When a resignation has been accepted, notice is to be given to the patron, if different from the ordinary; and lapse does not begin to run, as against the patron, until notice of the vacancy has been properly given to him. A Presbyterian minister resigns to the presbytery in whose bounds his charge is. See Bingham, Christian Antiq. bk. v. p. 9; Eden, Thol. Dict. p. 150. Resolutioners, or Resolutionists, were those who approved of the answer given by the commissioners of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland (which met at Perth in the time of Charles II) to the question proposed to them by the Parliament, viz. what persons were to be admitted to rise in arms against Cromwell. The resolution was, that all persons capable of bearing arms were to be admitted, except those of bad character, or obstinate enemies to the Covenant. Those who supported it were called Resolutioners, while those who opposed it were designated Protectors or Anti-Resolutioners.

Respect of Persons (προσωπολογία, Rom. ii. 11; Eph. vi. 9; Col. iii. 25; James ii. 1; a later Greek word) found only in the New Test., and modelled after the use of τιμή with τιμῆσθαι, partiality for individuals. God appointed that the judges should pronounce sentence without respect of persons (Lev. xix. 15; Deut. xvi. 17, 19). They should consider neither the poor nor the rich, the weak nor the powerful, but should attend only to truth and justice. The Jews complimented our Saviour that he told the truth, without respect of persons, without fear (Matt. xxii. 16; Isa. xxxiii. 1-16). Jude (ver. 16), instead of the phrase "to have respect of persons," has "to admire persons." Our English term respect seems to imply some kind of deference or submission to a party; but this is not always the proper meaning to be annexed to it in Scripture. When we read (Exod. ii. 29) "God had respect to the children of Israel," it can only express his compassion and sympathy for them; when God had respect to the offering of Abel (Gen. iv. 4), it imports to accept favorably, to notice with satisfaction. (Comp. 1 Kings viii. 28; Numb. xvi. 15.)

Respond, before the Reformation, was a short anthem interrupting the middle of a chapter; when two or three verses had been read, the respond was sung, after which the chapter proceeded.

RESPOND, a half-partial or pier, in Middle-age architecture, attached to a wall to support the arch, etc. Responsum are very frequently used by themselves, as at the sides of the entrances of chancels, etc., and are also generally employed at the terminations of ranges of pillars, such as those between the body and aisles of churches. In these last-mentioned situations they usually correspond in form to the pillars, but are sometimes different. The name frequently occurs in mediaval contracts, and may have its origin in the notion of the two pilasters responding to, i.e. corresponding with, each other. Thus the breadth of the nave of Eton College chapel between the "responders" was directed by the will of king Henry VI to be thirty-two feet. See Antic.

Responsabili were a sort of residentia in the imperial city in the name of foreign churches and bishops, whose office was to negotiate as procurors at the emperor's court in all ecclesiastical causes wherein their principals might be concerned. The institution of the office seems to have been in the time of Constantine, or not long after, when the emperors having become Christians, foreign churches had more occasion to promote their suits at the imperial court than formerly. However, we find it established by law in the time of Justinian. It does not appear from that law that responsabili were clergyman, but from other writings we may easily collect it. See Bingham, Christian Antiq. bk. iii. ch. xiii. p. 6.

Response. Among the Hebrews the usual response by the people to prayer was by the utterance of the word Amen at the close; and this practice was naturally adopted, or rather continued, by Christians likewise. This word (Ἀμήν), literally "firm, true," was used as a substantive, "that which is true," "truth" (Isa. lxxv. 16). It was employed in strong asseverations, fixing, as it were, the stamp of truth upon the assertion which it accompanied, and making it binding as an oath (comp. Num. v. 22). In the Sept. of 1 Chron. xxvi. 36; Neh. v. 13; viii. 6, the word appears in the form Ἀμήν, which is used throughout the New Test. In other passages the Hebrew is rendered by verbum, except in Isa. lxxv. 16. The Vulgate adopts the Hebrew word in all. Except in the Psalms, where it is translated fiat. In Deut. xxvii. 15-26, the people were to say "Amen" as the Levites pronounced each of the curses upon Mount Ebal, signifying by this their assent to the conditions under which the curses were pronounced. Our English word is a direct translation of the Hebrew. In accordance with this usage we find that among the rabbinis "Amen" involves the ideas of swearing, acceptance, and truthfulness. The first two are illustrated by the passages already quoted, the last by 1 Kings i, 36; John iii, 8, 5, 11 (A. V. "verily"), in which the assertions are made with the solemnity of an oath and then strengthened by the repetition of "Amen." "Amen" was the proper response of the person to whom an oath was administered (Neh. v, 13; vii, 6; 1 Chron. xvi, 36; Jer. iv, 22; 31: 38; 44: 27; and the Deut. vi. 13, from which the appeal is made on such occasions, is called "the God of Amen" (Isa. lxv, 16), as being a witness to the sincerity of the implied compact. With a similar significance Christ is called "the Amen, the faithful and true witness" (Rev. iii, 14). One who shall go before your brethren until the Lord shall give rest to your brethren, as well as to you, and until ye are come into the land whither ye are going to possess it" (Deut. iii, 20). So also Deut. xii, 9: "For ye are not as yet come to the rest and to the inheritance which the Lord your God giveth you," i.e. you are not as yet settled in that land which you are to possess; for someone says to Ruth, "My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee, that it may be well with thee?" (Ruth iii, 1) — i.e. I shall endeavor to procure you a settlement. David, speaking of the ark of the covenant, which till his time had no fixed place of settlement, says: "And the Lord, into thy rest, thou and the ark of thy strength" (Psa. xxxii, 9). Likewise Eccles. xxxvi, 15: "O be merciful unto Jerusalem, thy holy city, the place of thy rest." Rest has the following figurative meanings: to lean, or rest trust is (2 Chron. xxiii, 8); to continue fixed (Isa. ii, 4); to come to an end (Ezek. xvi, 42; xxii, 17); come from near (Josh. xiv, 15).

Rest, like sleep, is in the Scriptures sometimes used as the symbol of death. Thus the patriarch exclaims, "For now should I have lain still and been quiet, I should have slept; then had I been at rest, with kings and counsellors of the earth" (Job iii, 18); and thus a charge is given to Daniel: "Go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days" (Dan. xii, 9). This phrase also occurs in 1 Sam. xxvii, 15; Job xiii, 16; Acts ii, 26; Rom. xi, 9; and is common on Jewish monuments for the dead, as "May his rest be in the garden of Eden, with the other just men of the world." "May his soul rest in peace till the Comforter come." "May his rest be in the garden of Eden, with other just men. Amen, amen, amen, Selah." In a moral and spiritual sense, rest denotes a cessation from carnal trouble and sin (Matt. xvi, 28, 29). Finally, it is used to represent the fixed and permanent state of repose enjoyed by the blessed in heaven; and so to this Psalm is applied as a symbol of the settlement of the Israelites in the Land of Promise: "I will be to them a Father, saith the Lord of hosts, and they shall be to me a people; and in this place will I be their God, and they shall be my people. And they shall sit every man under his vine and fig tree, and none shall make them afraid; for the mouth of the Lord of hosts is spoken" (Hos. x, 10-11). The rest assuredly is a mercy; and intimates that the prayer of the speaker is heard and approved by him who gives this response. (2) Hallelujah. This was adopted from the Jewish psalmody, particularly from those psalms (cxiii—cxviii) which were sung at the Passover, called the Great Hallel, or Hallelujah day. Use of this phrase was not adopted by the Church at Jerusalem, and from this was received by the other churches, and was restricted to the fifty days between Easter and Whitsunday. In the Greek Church it was expressive of grief, sorrow, and penitence, while in the Latin it depicts a joyful spirit. (3) Hosannah. The Church, both ancient and modern, has ascribed to this word a meaning similar to that of hallelujah. The true significance is "Lord save" (Psa. cxviii, 25). (4) "O Lord have mercy"—κύριε ἥλησθον. The Council of Vaison, A.D. 492, canon 8, ordained that this response should be introduced into the morning and evening worship, and into the public religious service. Gregory the Great introduced a threelfold form, "O Lord, " Lord have mercy," "Christ have mercy." (5.) "Glory, glory in the highest," in use on festive occasions in the 5th century, and in general use in the 7th century. (8) "The Lord be with you!" "Peace be with you," ordained by the Council of Braga, A.D. 561, to be the uniform salutation of bishops and prelates when addressing the people. The last-mentioned salutation alone is in use in the Greek Church. See Coleman, Christ Antip. Eccles. Theoph. (1830).

RESPONDS. Psalm means either the repetition of the verses by the people, or the repetition of the last words of the psalm, with the addition of the "amen" or the doxology: or that the psalms were so selected as to correspond to the subject of the lessons which had been read. — Eadie, Eccles. Cyclop. s. v. "Psalmody."
xxi, 22). (2) Twofold, fourfold, and even fivefold restitution of things stolen, and restitution of property unjustly retained, with twenty per cent. over and above. He who, by ignorance, should omit to give to the Temple of the Lord his share in the Produce of the Fruits or first-fruits—was obliged to restore it to the priests and to add a fifth part besides, over and above which he was bound to offer a ram for his expiation. Nehemiah prevailed with all those Israelites to make restitution who had taken interest of their brethren (Neh. v. 10, 11), and Zaccheus (Luke xix, 8) promises a fourfold restitution to all from whom he had extorted in his office as a publican. The Roman laws condemned to a fourfold restitution all who were convicted of extortion or fraud. Zaccheus here imposes that penalty on himself, to which he adds the half of his goods, which was what the law did not require. (8.) If a man killed a beast, he was to make it good, beast for beast (Lev. xxiv, 18). If an ox pushed or gored another man's servant to death, his owner was bound to pay for the servant thirty shekels of silver (Exod. xxii, 32). In the case of one man's ox pushing the ox of another man to death, as it would be very difficult to ascertain which of the two had been to blame for the quarrel, the two owners were obliged to bear the loss between them: the living and the dead are one kind: the dead beast, was to be equally divided by them. If, however, one of the oxen had previously been notorious for going, and the owner had not taken care to confine him, in such case he was to give the loser another and to take the dead ox himself (ver. 50). (4.) If a man dug a pit and did not cover it, or let an old pit remain open, and another man's beast fell into it, the owner of such beast was obliged to pay for the beast and had it for the payment (ver. 33, 34). (5.) When a fire was kindled in the fields and did any damage, he who kindled it was to make the damage good (xxvi, 6). See Damages. Moralist observe respecting restitution: (1.) That where it can be made in kind, or the injury can be certainly valued, we are to restore the thing or the value. (2.) We are bound to restore the thing with the natural increase of it, i.e., to satisfy for the loss sustained in the meantime and the gain hindered. (3.) Where the thing cannot be restored and the value of it is not certain, we are to give reasonable satisfaction according to a middle estimation. (4.) We are at least to give by way of restitution what the law would give, for that is generally the best and most safe. (5.) A man is not only bound to restitution for the injury he did, but for all that directly follows from the injurious act; for the first injury being wilful, we are supposed to will all that which follows upon it. 2. ἀποκαταστάσις, a form which, in its Greek sense, occurs but once in the New Testament, in the phrase "restitution of all things," ἀποκαταστάσεως κάινων (Acts iii, 21). As an event, it is in that passage connected with the "refreshing" (ἰδίκυφες) from the presence of the Lord" (ver. 19). The grammatical construction as well as exegetical interpretation of this and the future life (Morus: the Messianic times), and refers the "times of restitution" (full and perfect fulfillment of prophecy) to the consummation of that auspicious period when all enemies shall be subdued (1 Cor. xx, 25 sq.; Heb. x, 12; 15; comp. 2 Pet. x, 13), and every influence opposed to true religion removed. Many of these interpretations are obviously fanciful, and most of them too vague, although some contain an element of truth. The word ἀποκαταστάσις signifies emendation, restoration to a pristine condition, change to a better state. (So Josephus, Ant. xli, 9, 4; iv, 6; Philo, De Incarnatione, p. 767 b; De Resp. Dom. Per. p. 522 c.) Atonement and Phanerostasis are words used in it by τέλευτας; but the scholiast in the Cod. Nor. ad loc. renders αὐθαίρετας, ἦτοις. In like manner ἀποκαταστάσις signifies complete, bring to a conclusion; see the Sept. at Job viii, 6, where it corresponds with בָּלָם; so in Gen. xli, 13; Jer. xxii, 8; comp. Polyb.
RESTORATION

Iv, 23, 1; Diod. Sic. xx, 54.) By the expression "until the times of the restitution of all things which God hath spoken," etc., Peter means the time when all affairs shall be consummated, all the prophetic announcements shall be accomplished, including the inauguration of the kingdom of the Messiah and its attendant events, the full extension of the Gospel, the resurrection of the just, the last judgment, the end of the world (see Olashausen, De Wette, Hackett, and most others, ad loc.). See ESCHATOLOGY.

Restoration, The, a name generally given to the return of the Church of England to the previously appointed ecclesiastical policy, and to their allegiance to the regular prince, Charles II., which took place in 1660. It has been held by authority, that May 29 in every year shall be kept with prayer and thanksgiving to Almighty God for this event.

RESTORATION OF THE JEWS. This term is applied to two very different classes of prophesies relating to the Hebrew race.

1. Their Return from Captivity. It is maintained by various writers (see, e.g., v. xxi) that the ten tribes intermarried so freely with the surrounding population as to have become completely absorbed; and it appears to be a universal opinion that no one now knows where their descendants are. But it is a harsh assumption to reject entirely the prophecy concerning the ten tribes than with the two; and certainly, in the apostolic days, the twelve tribes are referred to as a well-known people, sharply defined from the heathen (Acts xxiv, 7; James i, 1). Not a trace appears that any repulsive principle existed at that time between the Ten and the Two. "Ephraim no longer envied Judah, nor Judah vexed Ephraim;" but they had become "one nation;" though only partially "on the mountains of Israel" (Isa. xi, 18; Ezek. xxxviii, 22). It would seem, therefore, that one result of the captivity was to blend all the tribes together, and produce a national union which had never been effected in their own land. If ever there was a difference between them as to the books canonized sacred, that difference entirely vanished; at least, no evidence appears of the contrary fact. When, moreover, the laws of landed inheritance no longer enforced the maintenance of separate tribes and put a difficulty in the way of their intermarriage, an almost inevitable result in course of time was the entire obliteration of this distinction; and, as a fact, no modern Jews know to what tribe they belong, although vanity always makes them choose a descent by some tribe of the ancient house of the ten tribes. That all Jews now living have in them the blood of all the twelve tribes ought (it seems) to be believed, until some better reason than mere assertion is advanced against it.

When Cyrus gave permission to the Israelites to return to their own country, and restored their sacred vessels, it is not wonderful that few persons of the ten tribes were eager to take advantage of it. In two centuries they had become thoroughly naturalized in their Eastern settlements; nor had Jerusalem ever been the centre of proud aspirations to them. It is perhaps remarkable that in Ezra ii, 2, 36 (so also x, 18, 25), the word Israel is used to signify what we might call the laity as opposed to the priests and Levites, which might seem as if the writer were anxious to avoid asserting that all the families belonged to the two tribes. (If this is not the meaning, it at least shows that all discriminating force in the words Israel and Judah was already lost. So, too, in the book of Esther, the twelve tribes through all parts of the Persian empire are called Jews.) Nevertheless, it was to be expected that only those would return to Jerusalem whose expatriation was very recent, and principally those whose parents had dwelt in the holy city or its immediate neighborhood. The emigrants, doubtless, consisted chiefly of the priests and the poor; and as the latter proved docile to their teachers, a totally new spirit reigned in the restored synagogues. Why, then, should the anxious Ezra might discern in his comrades, is it no slight matter that he could induce them to divorce their heathen wives—a measure of harshness which Paul would scarcely have sanctioned (1 Cor. vii, 12); and the century which followed was, on the whole, one of great religious activity and improvement. Permanent results on the moral character of the nation. Even the prophetic spirit by no means disappeared for a century and a half; although at length both the true and the false prophet were supplanted among them by the learned and disputing schools of the over-literal or over-figurative critic. In place of a people prone to go astray after sensible objects of adoration, and readily admitting heathen customs; attached to monarchical power, but inattentive to a hierarchy; careless of a written law, and moveable by alternate impulses of apostasy and repentance, we behold them in them a deep and permanent reverence for Moses and the prophets, an aversion to foreigners and foreign customs, a profound hatred of idolatry, a great devotion to pious and Levitical rank, and to all who had an exterior of piety. Now began the term, a slave, called Ezekiel, to deliver a vision of the two houses of Israel, the Assyrian, and the Babylonian, and a future age which was to be a type of the Messiah, and his kingdom (Ezek. xxxvii). It is now, for the first time, that the book of Daniel is read with interest, and the belief in the Messiah was spread among the people (Dan. xii). Now began the time, and that memorable period which was to form the turning point of Jewish history. Now began the time when the Jews might be considered a nation. The time of the Exile is over; and the Jewish period of the Dispersion begins. The Jews are to be a people, a name, and a seed. Whatever else may befall them, they are to be a people, a name, and a seed. Whatever else may befall them, they are to be a people, a name, and a seed. Whatever else may befall them, they are to be a people, a name, and a seed.

2. Their Future Return to Palestine. It is a favorite view with many that the Jewish race, now scattered over the face of the earth, will eventually be brought back to their own land. To this is generally added the belief that they will yet return in a converted, i.e., Christian, state. The final ingathering of the Jews, no less than that of all Gentiles, is to be not only in the Old Testament, but likewise in the New (see Rom. xi, 11-25). But it appears to be an error to infer that, therefore, they will generally be restored to their original home. See SWAIN, OBJECTIONS TO THE RESTORATION.
RESTORATIONISTS

The name assumed by a body of Puritans who, in great extent, were identical with the Unitarians, on the one hand, and the Universalists, on the other. Their peculiar doctrine is that all men will ultimately become holy and happy. They maintain that God created men only to bless them, and that he sent his Son to "be for salvation to the ends of the earth." They further teach that man's probation is not confined to this life, but extends throughout the mediatorial reign of Christ; and that, as he died for all, all will eventually be saved. They consider that punishment is reformatory in its character, and has for its object the conversion of the sinner. Although the Restorationists, as a separate body, have only existed for a few years, their sentiments are by no means new. Some of the early fathers—Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Didymus of Alexandria, Gregory Nyssen, and others—believed and advocated the restoration of all fallen intelligence. A branch of the German Baptists, before the Reformation, held and propagated the doctrine. In Europe many prominent names may be cited as its advocates. It was introduced into America about the middle of the 18th century, but not much taught until about 1780, when John Murray and Elhanan Winchester became its advocates. Afterwards we find Dr. Chauncey, of Boston; Dr. Rush, of Philadelphia; Dr. Smith, of New York; and Mr. Foster, of New Hampshire, as advocates, although most of them continued in the ranks of the various sects. In 1786 a convention was organized at Oxford, Mass., under the auspices of Moses Winchester and Murray; and as all who believed in universal salvation believed that the effects of sin and the means of grace extended into a future life, the term "Restorationist and Universalist" was commonly used, and the convention adopted the latter as their distinctive name. In 1818 the Rev. Hosea Ballou, of Boston, advanced the doctrine that all retribution is confined to this world; to which was added by others the doctrine of the mortality of the soul, that the whole man dies a temporal death, and that the resurrection would introduce all men into everlasting happiness. As a result a distinct sect, by the name of Universal Restorationists, was formed at Mendon, Mass., Aug. 17, 1831; but it soon became extinct. The Restorationists maintain that a just retribution does not take place in this life; that those who are invited to it are invited to reference to a future life; that there are grades of reward and punishment; that it is not death or the resurrection that introduces men into heaven. The Restorationists have never been numerous; they are found more extensively in Massachusetts, although they have a few societies in other states. At one time they published a weekly newspaper, and had from twenty to thirty ministers, with from two to three thousand members. Very many, however, are found in the other sects who entertain the peculiar views of the Restorationists. See Ballou, Ancient History of Universalists; Belcher, Religion; Beccaria, Bonne; foster, Examination of Strong; Hudson, Letter and Reply; Chauncey, Salvation of all Men; Hartley, On Men; Stonehouse, Universal Retribution; Smith, On Divine Government. See Universalism.

Resurrection (ανάστασις) of the Body, the re-

The resurrection of the body after it has been forsaken by the soul at the reunion of the two, which was possessed in the present world. This is one of the essential points in the creed of Christendom. 1. History of the Doctrine.—It is admitted that there are no traces of such a belief in the earlier Hebrew Scripture. It is not to be found in the Pentateuch, in the historical books, or in the Psalms: for Ps. xii. 15 does not relate to this subject; neither does Ps. xiv. 29, 30, although so cited by Theodoret and others. The celebrated passage of Job xix, 25 sq. has indeed been strongly insisted upon in proof of the early belief in this doctrine; but the most learned commentators are agreed, and scarcely any one at the present day disputes, that such a view of the text arises either from an error of transcription or misapprehension, and that Job means no more than to express a confident conviction that his then diseased and drip-culled corrupted body should be restored to its former soundness; that he should rise from the depressed state in which he lay to his former prosperity; and that God would manifestly appear (as was the case) to vindicate his uprightness. That no meaning more reconcileable is to be found in the text is agreed by Calvin, Mercier, Grotius, Le Clerc, Patrick, Warburton, Durell, Heath, Kennicott, Doderlein, Dathe, Eichhorn, John, De Wette, and a host of other learned men; and that it alludes to the time when God will be disposed to take his people to a better life (ch. iii. vii. 7, 8; x. 20, 22; ch. xiv. xvi. 11, 16). 2. It is not proposed as a topic of contention by any of the friends of Job; nor by Elisha, who acts as a sort of umpire; nor by the Almighty himself in the decision of the controversy. 5. The later Jews, who eagerly sought for every intimation bearing on a future life which their Scriptures might contain, never regarded this as such; nor is it once referred to by Christ or his apostles. 6. The language, when exactly rendered, contains no warrant for such an interpretation; especially the phrase "yet in my flesh shall I see God," which should rather be rendered "out of my flesh." See Jon., Book of.

Isaiah may be regarded as the first Scripture writer in whom such an allusion can be traced. He compares the restoration of the Jewish people and state to a resurrection from the dead (xxvi. 19, 20); and in this he is followed by Ezekiel at the time of the exiles (ch. xxxvi.). From these passages, which are, however, not very clear in their intensions, it is not easy to form an opinion on this, as in other matters, the twilight of spiritual manifestations brightened as the day-spring from on high approached; and in Dan. xii. 2 we at length arrive at a clear and unequivocal declaration that those who lie sleeping under the earth shall awake, some to eternal life, and others to everlasting shame and contempt. In the time of Christ, the belief of a resurrection, in connection with a state of future retribution, was held by the Pharisees and the great body of the Jewish people, and was only disputed by the Sadducees. Indeed, they seem to have regarded the resurrection as complete without the body; and so intimately were the two things—the future existence of the soul and the resurrection of the body—connected in their minds that any argument which proved the former they considered as proving the latter also (see Matt. xxv. 35, xxvi. 32). This belief, however, led their course minds into gross and sensuous conceptions of the future state, although there were many among the Pharisees who taught that the future body would be so reformed as not to need the indulgences which were necessary in the present life; and they assented to our psalmist's notion that the risen saints would not marry, but would be as the angels of God (Matt. xxi. 30; comp. Luke xx. 34).

So Paul, in 1 Cor. vi. 13, is conceived to intimate that the necessity of food for sustenance will be abolished in the world to come. In further proof of the commonness of a belief in the resurrection among the Jews of the time of Christ, see Matt. xxii; Luke xx; John xvii, 24; Acts xxiii, 6-8.
Josephus is not to be relied upon in the account which he gives of the belief of his countrymen (Ant., xviii, 2; War, ii, 7), as he appears to use terms which might suggest one thing to his Jewish readers and another to the Greeks and Romans, who quoted the idea of a resurrection of the body. But there were many scriptural books in the library of the Old Testament (Wis. iii, 1, etc.; iv, 15; 2 Macc. vii, 14, 23, 29, etc.). Many Jews believed that the wicked would not be raised from the dead; but the contrary was the more prevailing opinion, in which Paul once took occasion to express his concurrence with the Phar- rai.

But although the doctrine of the resurrection was thus prevalent among the Jews in the time of Christ, it might still have been doubtful and obscure to us had not Christ given it to the sanction of his authority, and declared it a constituent part of his religion (e.g. Matt. xxii; John v, viii, xii). He and his apostles also were careful to correct the erroneous notions which the Jews entertained on this head, and to make the subject more obvious and intelligible than it had ever been before.

A special interest is also imparted to the subject from the manner in which occasion the New Testament represents Christ as the person to whom we are indebted for this benefit, which, by every variety of argument and illustration, the apostles connect with him, and make to rest upon him (Acts iv, 2; xxvi, 3; 1 Cor. xv; 1 Thess. iv, 14, etc.).

II. Scripture Details.—The principal points which can be collected from the New Testament on this subject are the following: 1. The raising of the dead is everywhere ascribed to Christ, and is represented as the last work to be undertaken by him for the salvation of man (John v, 21; xi, 25; 1 Cor. xv, 22 sq.; 1 Thess. iv, 15; Rev. i, 18). 2. All the dead will be raised, without respect to age, rank, or character in this world (John v, 28, 29; Acts xxiv, 15; 1 Cor. xv, 22). 3. This event is to take place not before the end of the world, or the general judgment (John v, 24; 1 Cor. xv, 15; 1 Thess. iv, 15; Rev. xxi, 22-28; 1 Thess. iv, 15; Rev. xx, 11). 4. The manner in which this marvellous change shall be accomplished is necessarily beyond our present comprehension, and therefore the Scripture is content to illustrate it by figurative representations, or by proving the possibility and intelligibility of the leading facts. Some of the figurative descriptions occur in Matt. xxiv; John v; 1 Cor. xv, 52; 1 Thess. iv, 16; Phil. iii, 21. The image of a trumpet-call, which is repeated in some of these texts, is derived from the Jewish custom of convening assemblies by the sound of a trumpet. 5. The possibility of a resurrection is powerfully argued by Paul in 1 Cor. xv, 52 sq., by comparing it with events of common occurrence in the natural world. (See also ver. 12-14; and comp. Acts iv, 2.)—Kitto. 6. The numerous instances of an actual raising of individuals to life by our Lord and his apostles, not to speak of a few similar acts by the Old-Testament prophets, and especially the crowning fact of our Lord’s resurrection from the grave, afford some light on these particulars. (See below.) 7. The fact of the general judgment (v. v.) is conclusive as to the literal truth of the great doctrine.

But although this body shall be so raised as to preserve its identity, it must yet undergo certain purifying changes to fit it for the kingdom of heaven, and to render it incapable of immortality (1 Cor. xv, 35 sq.), so that it shall become a glorified body like that of Christ (ver. 49; Rom. vi, 9; Phil. iii, 21); and the bodies of those whom the last day finds alive will undergo such similar changes without tasting death (1 Cor. xv, 51, 58; 2 Cor. v, 4; 1 Thess. iv, 15 sq.; Phil. iii, 41). To the Subject.—With the soul, between the death and the resurrection of the present body, exists independent of any envelope, we know not. Though it may be that a union of spirit with body is the general law of all created spiritual life, still this view gives no countenance to the notions of those who have attempted to prove, from certain physiological opinions respecting the renewal—even few years—of the human frame during life, and the final transmission of its decomposed elements into other forms of being, that the resurrection of the body is impossible. The apostle asserts the fact that the “dead shall be raised incorruptible,” that is to say, for this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality (1 Cor. xv, 35-58). While this passage affirms the identity of the body before and after the resurrection, it by no means affirms the identity of the constituent particles of which the body is, at different periods, supposed to be made up. The particles of a man’s body may change several times between infancy and old age; and yet, according to our ideas of bodily identity, the man has had all the time “the same body.” So also all the particles may be changed again between the process of death and the resurrection, and the body yet retain its identity (see the Bibliotheca Sacra, iv, 615 sq.). Doubtless the future body will be incorruptible, ineradicable, and capable of being moved at will to any part of the universe. The highest and most enriched exercises of thought and feeling will doubtless be an essential part of our future existence. They will divest us of all the circumstances which so frequently entice and affect the affections from their strength and perfection (see The Brit. and For. Encycl. Rev., April, 1862). But there is no analogy—that the new body will have no connection with the old. In connection with that, in fact, the resurrection of the body is not a doctrine of Scripture—does not appeal to us to have been satisfactorily proved by the latest writers on the subject (Bash, Aenartatia, N. Y., 1865), and we think so highly of his ingenuity and talent as to believe that no one else is likely to succeed in an argument in which he has failed.

Among the speculations propounded as a solution of the problem of the resurrection, the most ingenious, perhaps, as well as fascinating, is the persico theory, which assumes that the soul at death retains a certain ethereal substance (or spirit), which, in this state, is the power of secreting to itself a new body for the celestial life. This is substantially the Swedenborgian view as advocated by the late Prof. Bush, and has recently received the powerful support of Mr. Joseph Cook in his popular lectures. It is thought by this school (see especially by Paul’s language—1 Cor. xv) concerning the “spiritual body” of the future state (ver. 4), and his figure of the renewed grain (ver. 57). This explanation, however, is beset with many insuperable difficulties.

(a) The apostle’s distinction between the psychical (ψυχικόν, “natural”) and the pneumatical (πνευματικόν, “spiritual”) in that passage is not of material (ψωμία, physical) as opposed to immaterial or disembodied; but both are equally called body (σώμα, actual and tangible substance), such as we know our Lord’s resurrection body was composed of (Luke xxiv, 39). It is merely, as the whole context shows (“corruptible—incorruptible,” “mortal—immortal,” etc.), the difference between the feeble, decaying body of this life in its present mortal state, and the glorious, faultless, future world in its transfigured condition hereafter; in short, its aspect as known to us here from natural phenomena, and its prospect as revealed to us in Scripture. This appears from the contrasted use of these terms in another part of the same epistle (1 Cor. ii, 14, 15) to describe the unregenerate as opposed to the regenerate heart, the former being its usual or depraved, and the latter its transformed or gracious, state.

(b) In like manner the apostle’s figure of grain as sown, while it admirably illustrates, in a general way, the possible moral changes in the future life, as that which will take place in the resurrection body, yet—like all other metaphors—was never intended to teach the precise mode of that transformation, and accordingly it fails in several essential particulars to correspond to the revival of the body from the grave. 1. The seed never actually dies, nor any part of it. It is the germ alone that possesses vitality, and this simply expands and develops, gathering to itself the material of the rest of the seed, which undergoes chemical and vital changes fitting it for nutriment until the young plant becomes sufficient to imbibe nourishment from the outer world. This whole process is as truly a growth as that anywhere found in nature; it is, in fact, essentially the same as takes place in the hatching of an egg or the gestation of an animal.

2. The real identity of the original plant or seed and its subsequent crop is lost in this transmutation, as the apostle himself intimates (ver. 37). It is, in fact, the reproduction of another but similar thing rather than the continuation or renewal of the same. The old plant, indeed, perishes, but it never revive. The seed is its offspring, and thus only represents a parent. Nor is the new plant anything more than a lineal descendant of the old one. We must not confound the resurrection with mere propagation. The young plant may, we admit, in one sense be said to be identical with the germ sown, notwithstanding the great change which it takes on in the process of growth; and this is the precise point of the apostle’s simile. But we must not press his figure into a literal strictness when comparing things so radically different as the burial of a corpse and the planting of grain. The principle of life is continuous in the one as well as in the other; it is a distinct substance, like the soul; it is merely a property of matter, and in the case of the body must cease with physical dissolution.

(c) We would ask those who maintain this theory a simple question: Is the so-called germ or “enawtchement” which is supposed to survive, escape, or be eliminated from the body at death—is it matter or is it spirit? We presume all will admit that there are but these two essential kinds of substance. Which of these, then, is it? It must, of course, belong to the former category. Then the body does not actually and entirely die; it remains for all the known phenomena in the case. The whole theory under discussion is not only a pure begging of the question really at issue, but it is improbable and inconsistent. There is absolutely not the slightest particle of scientific or historical evidence that the body leaves a vital residuum in dissolution, or evolves at death an ethereal frame that survives in any physical sense whatever as a representation. We remand all such hypotheses to the realm of ghostland and “spiritualism.”

(d) In the case of the resurrection of the body of Jesus Christ, there is the only definite instance on record, it is certain that this theory will not apply. Not only is no countenance given to it by the language of Holy Scripture concerning the agency which effected that resuscitation, viz. the divine and miraculous power of the Holy Spirit, but the circumstances obviously exclude such a process. There was the defunct person, entire except that the spark of life had fled. If it be said that there still lingered about it some vital germ that was the nucleus around which reanimation gathered, what is this but to deny that Jesus was truly and absolutely dead? The apostle says he, “my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me here.” He showed them his hands and his feet, which the nail-prints attested to be the same which had hung upon the cross. Our Lord also invited Thomas to thrust his hand into his wound side; and, to remove the last remaining shadow of doubt from the minds of his disciples that it was he himself in the same human body, “he called for food, and he took and did eat before them” (Luke xxi, 22-48; John xvii, 27). The fact is that our Lord passed forty days upon earth after his resurrection, in the same human body in which he was crucified, shows plainly that he did not rise from the tomb in a glorified body. And the evidence is equally strong that he now dwells in heaven in a glorified body (Phil. iii, 21; Col. iii, 4).

Since this event, however, independently of its importance in respect to the internal connection of the Christian doctrine, was manifestly a miraculous occurrence, the credibility of the narrative has from the earliest times been brought into question (Calv. apud Orig. confess., xi. 38; ch. i. 20, “the miracles, disc. vi.” Chubb, Poets, Work. i, 330; Morgan, The Resurrection Considered [1744]). Others who have admitted the facts as recorded to be beyond dispute, yet have attempted to show that Christ was not really dead, but that he became dead and was therefore brought back to life after the appearance of death, and was afterwards restored to consciousness by the cool grave and the spices. The refutation of these views may be seen in detail in such works as Doctor's Essays, 41st. By Dr. [name] and other religious and theological works. The resurrection of Jesus Christ, says Saurin, "was not raised from the dead, it must have been stolen away. But this theft is incredible. Who committed it? The enemies of Jesus Christ? Would they have contributed to his glory by countenancing his resurrection? Could his disciples? It is probably they would not, and it is next to certain they could not. How could they have undertaken to remove the body—fraud and timorous creatures, people who fled as soon as they saw him taken into custody? Even Peter, the most courageous, trembled at the voice of a servant-girl, and three times denied that he knew him. Would people of this character have dared to resist the authority of the governor? Would they have undertaken to oppose the determination of the Sanhedrin, to force a guard, and to elude, or overcome, the forces of animation and edification of the disciples? If Jesus Christ was not risen again (I speak the language of unbelievers), he had deceived his disciples with vain hopes of his resurrection. How came the disciples not to discover the imposture? Would they have hazarded themselves, and for more than an imposture in favor of a man who had so cruelly imposed on their credulity? But were we to grant that they formed the design of removing the body, how could they have executed it? How could soldiers, armed and on guard, suffer themselves to be overreached by a few timorous people? Either (says Saint) Augustine) they were asleep or awake; if they were awake, why should they suffer the body to be taken away? If asleep, how could they know that the disciples took it away? How dare they then dispose that it was stolen? The testimony of the apostles furnishes us with arguments, and there are eight considerations which give the evidence sufficient weight. 1. The nature of these witnesses. They were not men of power, riches, eloquence, credit, to impose upon the world; they were poor and mean. 2. The number of these witnesses. (See I Cor. xv; Luke xxiv. 34; Mark xvi. 14; Matt. xxviii, 10.) It is not likely that a collusion should have been held among so many to support a lie, which would be of no utility to them. 3. The facts themselves which they asow: not suppositions, distant events, or events related to their own persons, but real facts which they saw with their own eyes (1 John i). 4. The agreement of the evidence: they all deposed the same thing. 5. Observe the tribunals before which they gave evidence: Jews and heathens, philosophers and rabbis, counselors and lawyers. If they had been impostors, the fraud certainly would have been discovered. 6. The place in which they bore their testimony. Not at a distance, where they might not easily have been detected, if false, but at Jerusalem, in the synagogues, in the praetorium. 7. The time of this testimony: not years after, but three days after, they declared he was risen; yea, before the rage of the Jews was quelled, while Calvary was yet dyed with the blood they had spilled. If it had been a fraud, it is not likely they would have come forward in such broad day-light, amid so much opposition. 8. Lastly, the motives which induced them to publish the resurrection: not to gain fame, riches, glory, profit; no, they exposed themselves to suffering and death, and proclaimed the truth from conviction of its importance and certainty. Objections have also been raised upon the apparent discrepancy between the Gospel and the narrated events of the event. These discrepancies were early perceived; and a view of what the fathers have done in the attempt to reconcile them has been given by Nieymer (De Evangelistum in Narrando Christi in Viva Redita Dissonione (1824)). They were first collated with much acuteness by Morgan in the work already cited, and at a later period by another scholar. The subjects were edited and supported by Lessing, the object of which seems to have been to throw uncertainty and doubt over the whole of this portion of Gospel history. A numerous host of theologians, however, rose to combat and refute this new argumentation, and the names of Doderlein, Less, Semler, Teller, Maschius, Michaelis, Plessing, Eichhorn, Herder, and others. Among those who have more recently attempted to reconcile the different accounts is Griesbach, who, in his excellent Proflatio Proflusius unde Evangelicae usu de Resurrectione aut Christi testimonio, has shown that all the discrepancies are trifling, and not of such moment as to render the narrative uncertain and suspected, or to destroy or even diminish the credibility of the evangelists, but serve rather to show how extremely stupid they were of truth, and how closely and even scrupulously they followed their documents." Griesbach then attempts to show how these discrepancies may have arisen, and admits that, although unimportant, they are hard to reconcile, as is indeed evinced by the amount of controversy they have excited. The principal one of these discrepancies has been discussed under Appearance.

Reticulated Work (Lat. opus reticulatum = net work), masonry constructed with diamond-shaped stones, or square stones placed diagonally. In the city of Rome this mode of decorating the surface of a wall is generally characteristic of the period of the early empire; it was frequently imitated in Romanesque work in the tympanum of a door-way, especially in Norman work.

1. Those passages which declare that certain sinners shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven (Matt. v. 20; vii. 13, 21, 23; xvi, 3; Mark x. 23–27; Luke xiii. 24, 26; John iii. 3–5; 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10; Gal. v. 19–21; Eph. v. 5; Heb. iii. 19; iv. 1, 13). If some men, according to the law of our Lord, were excluded from heaven, they must necessarily sink to hell; for the Scriptures give us no intimation of a middle state.

2. Those passages which describe the future and final state of man in contrast (Ps. cxvii. 3, 25; Dan. iii. 2; Matt. iii. 12; vii. 13, 14, 21; viii. 11, 12; xxxii. 49–47; 45–50; xxiv. 45–51; xxxv. 25–26; Mark xvi. 16; Luke xvii. 23, 24, 47–49; John iii. 16, v. 29; Rom. vi. 21–23; ix. 21–23; Gal. vi. 7, 8; Phil. iii. 17–21; 2 Thess. i. 5–12; 2 Tim. ii. 19, 20; Heb. vi. 8, 9; 1 Pet. iv. 18). These passages are believed to refer to the final state of man because (1) in several of them the state is expressly called their end. (2) The state of the righteous and that of the wicked are put in exact opposition to each other; and if one is not final, neither is the other. (3) There is a dead silence about any succeeding state; and (4) the phraseology of some of the passages will admit of no other interpretation.

3. Those passages of Scripture which apply the terms "eternal," "everlasting," "eternal," "ever," and "for ever and ever" to this future state (Matt. v. 11; vi. 12, 16; Mark x. 22, 30; Rom. viii. 27; Col. iii. 3; xxv. 26; xxix. 46–47; Mark iii. 29; 2 Cor. iv. 18; 2 Thess. i. 9; 2 Peter ii. 17; Jude 6, 7, 13. Rev. xiv. 10–13; xix. 3, xx, 10). Those passages which express future punishment by phrases which imply its everlasting duration (Matt. x. 28; xii. 31, 32; Mark iii. 29; ix. 43–45; Luke xv. 25, 26; John iii. 36; vii. 21; xvii. 9; Phil. iii. 10; Heb. vi. 2; x. 26, 27; James ii. 18; 1 John vi. 16).

5. Those passages which intimate that a change of heart and a preparation for heaven are confined to this life (Acts x. 24, 25; 1 Cor. vii. 29; xx. 18; Luke xiii. 24–29; John xii. 36; 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2; Heb. iii. 1–10, 13–15; 2 Pet. iii. 12; Rev. xi. 11).

6. Those passages which foretell the consequences of rejecting the Gospel (Psa. ii. 12; Prov. xxvi. 19; Acts xiii. 40–46; xx. 26; xxviii. 26, 27; Rom. x. 12; 1 Cor. i. 18; 2 Cor. iii. 15, 16; iv. 8; 1 Thess. v. 3; 2 Thess. i. 8; 10, 12–13; Heb. ii. 1–3; iv. 11; x. 26–31, 38, 39; xxii. 23–29; James ii. 14; 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18; 2 Pet. ii. 1, 2; 1 Peter. 2–3). The Gospel being the only way of salvation for man (Acts iv. 12), its rejection is that of the only true method of salvation. See Punishment; Everlasting; Universalism.

Rettberg, Friedrich Wilhelm, a German theologian, was born at Cello, Aug. 21, 1805. After teaching in several small institutions, he became professor of theology at Marburg, where he died, April 7, 1849. His works are: De Purbulosia Jesu Christi (Göttingen, 1827); — Caprariusus nach seinem Leben und Wirken (ibid. 1831); — Heilahrer des Christenthums nach den Grundrissen der lutherischen Kirche (Leips. 1838); — Kirchengesellschafts Deutschlands (Göttingen, 1846–48).—Hoefer, Nouv. Retz, Henri de Gondi de, a French prelate, was born at Paris in 1572. He was canon of Notre Dame, and held many rich abbeyes. In 1596 he became coadjutor of his uncle, cardinal Pierre de Gondi, bishop of Paris, with the promise of succeeding to his title. He received the cardinal's hat in 1618, and, as cardinal de Retz, took part in the affairs of State. He published only one work, Ordinances Synodales. He was the last bishop of Paris. His death occurred at Biéziers, Aug. 2, 1622. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Retz, Jean François Paul de Gondi, Cardinal de, often written Rois, a French prelate, was born at Montmirail in Oct. 1614. By birth he was a Knight of Malta, and was destined by his father for the Church, in the hope that he might succeed his uncle as archbishop of Paris. The ecclesiastical life was wholly distasteful to him, and his earlier years were spent in prodigality and excesses of all kinds: but, at the same time, he prosecuted his theological studies with great success, and received valuable benefices. He was made canon of Saint-Denis in 1641, and succeeded his uncle, cardinal de Retz. His ambition and hardihood gained for him the friendship of the count de Saisoons, and by the conspiracy planned by that nobleman he hoped to be released from his ecclesiastical life and enter upon a political one, which was more congenial to his intriguing nature. After the death of the count, he devoted himself with more regularity to his profession, and succeeded in gaining so great a popularity that Louis XIII, on his death-bed, appointed him coadjutor to his uncle, the bishop of Paris. In this position he gained the hearts of the people by his charities and great attention to all the outward requirements of religion. During the war of the Fronde he rendered valuable assistance to the royal cause; but finding that he was distrusted, he finally became the secret leader of the popular party, and the greatest opponent of cardinal Mazarin. He was made cardinal in 1652, and received exempting offers of a position as ambassador of France to the Holy See; but before he had decided to accept this proposition, he was arrested by order of Louis XIV, and was kept closely confined at Vincennes. On the death of his uncle, March 21, 1664, he was appointed the archbishop in his name. By resigning his claims, he succeeded in gaining a change of residence, and was removed to the Château de Nantes. He escaped from his confinement Aug. 6, 1654, and after many adventures reached Spain. Philip IV offered him an escort, and he immediately hastened to Rome, where he declared himself archbishop of Paris, the pope having refused to acknowledge his resignation. Retz subsequently travelled through Europe; and having been prohibited by Louis XIV from occupying his archbishopric in person, he governed it by years and subordinates until 1662, when he formally resigned all claim to it in consideration of receiving other valuable benefices. He was reconciled to the king, and received permission to establish himself at Commercy, where he kept up a petty state, and occupied himself in study and works of charity. He died at Paris, Aug. 24, 1679. His writings are chiefly political, and as such are not of interest here. But his greatest work is his Mémoires, composed during his years of retirement. They were first published in 1717, and have been reprinted in several editions. — See Mémoires du Cardinal de Retz; Lettres de Madame de Séguin; Voltaire, Sûde de Louis XIV.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Retz, Pierre de Gondi de, a French cardinal, was born at Lyons in 1533. After entering the ecclesiastical life, he received many favors from Catherine de Mecdi, and advanced rapidly. He was made bishop of Langres in 1566, and was transferred to the see of Paris in 1570, and became grand — almoner, chancellor, and chief of the council of Charles IX. He was several times ambassador to the Holy See, and in 1561 was created cardinal. He refused to take the oath of allegiance, and explained in a letter, that he considered the rulers of the League were entitled to it. — See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Re'ū (Heb. ῥerde', 17*, friend; Sept. ῥαουνον v. n. 'Peynū, 1 Chron. i. 25), the son of Polg and father of Serug in the human ancestry (Gen. xi. 18, 21; 1 Chron. i. 25). B.C. cir. 1500. He is called Ragun in Luke iii. 35. He lived 259 years. "Bunaen (Bibliaer) says Reu is Rode, the Arabic name for Edema, an assertion which, borrowed from Knobel, is utterly destitute of foundation. The Hebrew and Arabic words are a closer resemblance might be found between Reu and Rhaøe, a large town of Media, especially if the Greek equivalents of the two names be taken.

Reu'ben (Heb. Reuben, רְאוּבֵן, see a son [see below]; Sept. and New Test. Poujdry), the name of one of the Jewish patriarchs and of the tribe descended from him. The following account is chiefly compiled from the Scriptural statements. See JACOB.

1. Reuben was Jacob's first-born child (Gen. xxix, 82), the son of Leah, apparently an unexpectedly fruitful marriage of the verse (31; Josephus, Ant. i, 19, 8). B.C. 1919. This is perhaps denoted by the name itself, whose literal meaning is the obvious signification of its present form — רְאוּבֵן, i.e. "beloved ye, a son!" (Green. Thesaur. p. 1247 b)—or the explanation given in the text, which seems to imply that the original form was רְאוּבָן, רְאוּבָן, "Jehovah hath seen my affliction," or that of Josephus, who uniformly presents it as Rouvel (Poujdry) so also in Ant. ii, 8, 1, and explains it (Ant. i, 19, 8) as the "pity of God."—Deov rōv Θεόν, as if from ὀφθαλμός; (Furst, Heb. Lex. p. 1269). The tribe of Reuben was the second of the Arabic verse of Joshua (chs. xii—xiv) with this last form. Reeloh (Die alttestamentlichen Namen, p. 86) maintains that Reuben is the original form of the name, which was corrupted into Reuben, as Bethel into the modern Beita, and Jezerrel into Zer. He treats it as signifying the "flock of Bel," a deity whose worship greatly flourished in the neighboring country of Moab. In the days of the Judges it had a famous sanctuary in the very territory of Reuben. In this case it would be a parallel to the title, "people of Chemosh," which is bestowed on Moab. The alteration of the obnoxious syllable in Reubel would, on this theory, find a parallel in the Meribaal and Eshkol of Saul's family, who became Mehibaalbeth and Ishibobeth. But all this is evidently fanciful and arbitrary.

The notices of the patriarch Reuben in the book of Genesis and the early Jewish traditional literature are unusually frequent, and on the whole give a favorable view of his disposition. To him, and him alone, the preservation of Joseph's life appears to have been due. B.C. 1895. His anguish at the disappearance of his brother, and the frustration of his kindly artifice for delivering him (Gen. xxxvii, 22); his recollection of the minute details of the painful wound many years afterwards (xlii, 22); his offer to take the sole responsibility of the safety of the brother who had succeeded to Joseph's place in the family (ver. 47), all testify to a warm and (for those rough times) a kindly nature. We are, however, further than this, and more responsible for the safety of Joseph than were the others, and it would seem that he eventually acquiesced in the deception practiced upon his father. Subsequently Reuben offered to make the lives of his own sons responsible for that of Benjamin, when it was necessary to prevail on Jacob to let him go down to Egypt (ver. 37, 38). The fine conduct of Judah in afterwards undertaking the same responsibility is in advantageous contrast with this coarse, although well-meant, proposal. For his adulterous and incestuous conduct in the matter of Bilhah, Jacob in his last blessing deprived him of the pre-eminence and double portion which belonged to his birthright, assigning the former to Judah and the latter to Joseph (xlii, 3, 4; comp. vers. 8-10; xlviii, 5). Of this repulsive crime we know from the Scripture only the fact (xxxv, 22). In the post-Biblical traditions it is treated either as not having actually occurred (as in the Targum Pseudo-Jonathan), or else as the result of a sudden temptation acting on a hot and vigorous nature (as in the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs)—a parallel, in some of its circumstances, to the instance of David with Bathsheba. Some severe doubts as to the occurrence of the temptation must surely have been implied Reuben to an act which, regarded in its social rather than in its moral aspect, would be peculiarly abhorrent to a patriarchal society, and which is specially and repeatedly reproved in the law of Moses. The Rabbinical version of the occurrence (as given in the Targum Pseudo-Jonathan) is very characteristic, and well illustrates the influence of the spirit of late Jewish history. "Reuben went and disordered the couch of Bilhah, his father's concubine, which was placed right opposite the couch of Leah, and it was counted unto him as if he had lain with her. And when Isaiah heard it, he displeased him, and he said, Lo! an unworthy person shall proceed from me, as Ishmael did from Abraham, and Esau from my father. And the Holy Spirit answered him and said, All are righteous, and there is not one unworthy among them." Reuben's anxiety to save Joseph is represented as arising from a desire to conciliate Jacob, and his absence while Joseph was sold, from his sitting alone on the mountains in penitent fasting. These traits, slight as they are, are those of an ancient, impetuous, unbalanced, but not ungenerous, nature; not crafty and cruel, as were Simeon and Levi, but rather, to use the metaphor of the dying patriarch, boiling up (епп. A.V. "unstable," Gen. xlix, 4) like a vessel of water over the rapid wood-fire of the nomad tent, and as quickly subsiding into apathy when the fuel was withdrawn.

2. The Tribe of Reuben.—At the time of the migration into Egypt (or rather at the time of Jacob's decease, for the sons were four (Gen. xlvi, 8)) the tribe of Reuben would, from the general distribution of the population, be in the westernmost part of the land of Goshen. In process of time the northern part of the land of Canaan, after the plague which punished the idolatry of Baal-peor, the numbers had fallen slightly, and were 45,730; Gad was 40,500; and the number in the two in the list is lower than before, Ephraim and Simeon being the only two smaller tribes (xxvi, 7, etc.). During the journey into the wilderness the position of Reuben was on the south side of the Tabernacle. The "camp which went under his name was formed of his own tribe, that of Simeon (Leah's second son), and that of Gad (son of Zilpah, Leah's slave). The standard of the camp—"the eldest son, was Reuben, the shepherd's son;" "rav! the Lord thy God is one Lord!" and its place in the march was second (Targum Pseudo-Jonathan [Numb. ii, 10-16]).

The Reubenites, like their relatives and neighbors on the journey, the Gadites, had maintained through the march to Canaan the ancient calling of their forefathers. The patriarchs were "feeding their flocks" at Shechem when Joseph was sold into Egypt. It was as men whose "trade had been about cattle from their youth" that they were presented to Pharaoh (Gen. xlv, 32, 34), and in the land of Goshen they settled "with their flocks and herds and all that they had" (ver. 32; xvii, 1). Their cattle accompanied them in their flight from Egypt (Exod. xii, 38): not a hoof was left behind; and there are frequent allusions to them on the journey (xxxiv, 9; Numb. xi, 22; Deut. vii, 13, etc.). But it would appear that the tribes who were destined to settle in the confined territory between the Mediterranean and the Jordan had, during the journey through the wilderness, fortunately relinquished that taste for the possession of cattle which they could not have maintained after their difference to the shepherds from the wide pastures of the wilderness. Thus the cattle had come into the hands of Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manasseh (Numb. xxxiii, 1), and it followed naturally that when the nation arrived on the open downs east of the Jordan, the three tribes just named should prefer a request to their leader to allow them to remain in a place so perfectly suited to their requirements. The country east of Jordan does not appear to have been included in the original allotment to the Reubenites, and it was necessary that the land comprised, on the east and west, between the "coast of Jordan" and "the sea." But for the pusillanimity of the greater number of the tribes it would have been entered from the south (xiii, 30), and in that case the east of Jordan might never have been peopled by Israel at all. Accordingly, when the Reubenites and their allies approach Moses with their request, their main objection is that by what they propose they will discourage the hearts of the children of Israel from going over Jordan into the land which Jehovah had given them (xxxiii, 7). It is only on their undertaking to fulfill their part in the conquest of the western country, the land of Canaan proper, and thus satisfying him that their proposal was grounded in no selfish desire to escape a full share of the difficulties of the conquest, that Moses will consent to their proposal.

The "blessing" of Reuben by the departing lawgiver is a passage which has severely exercised translators and commentators. Strictly translated as they stand in the received Hebrew text, the words are as follows:

"Let Reuben live, and not die, let him not be a leper number." As to the first line there appears to be no doubt, but the second line has been interpreted in two exactly opposite ways. 1. By the Sept.,

"And let his men be many in number." This has the disadvantage that it is never employed elsewhere for a large number, but always for a small one (e.g. 1 Chron. xvi, 19; Job xvi, 22; Isa. x, 19; Ezek. xii, 16). 2. That of our own A.V.,

"And let not his men be few." Here the negative of the first line is presumed to convey its force to the second, though not there expressed. This is countenanced by the ancient Syriac version (Peshito) and the translations of Junius and Tremellius, and Schott and Winzer. It also has the important support of Gesenius (Thesaur., p. 968 a, and Pent. Sum., p. 44). It is, however, a very violent rendering. 3. A third and very ingenious interpretation is that adopted by the Veneto-Greek version, and also by Michaelis (Bibel für Unterricht, Text), which assumes that the vowel-points of the word פֶּן, "his men," should be altered to פֶּן, "his dead'"

"And let his dead be few"—as if in allusion to some recent mortality in the tribe, such as that in Simeon after the plague of Baal-peor. These interpretations, unless the last should prove to be the original reading, originate in the fact that the words in their naked sense convey a curse, and not a blessing. Fortunately, though differing widely in detail, they agree in general meaning. The benediction of the great leader goes out over the tribe which was about to separate itself from its brethren, in a fervent aspiration for its welfare through all the risks of that remote and trying situation. Both in this and the earlier blessing of Jacob, Reuben retains his place at the head of the family, and it must not be overlooked that the tribe, together with the two who associated themselves with it, actually received its inheritance before either Judah or Ephraim, to whom the birthright which Reuben had forfeited was transferred (1 Chron. vii, 1).

From this time it seems as if a bar, not only the material one of distance, and of the intervening river and mountain-wall, but also of difference in feeling and habits, gradually grew up more substantially between the Eastern and Western tribes. The first act of the former after the completion of the conquest, and after they had taken part in the solemn ceremonial in the valley between Ebal and Gerizim, shows how wide a gap already existed between their ideas and those of the Western tribes. The pile of stones which they erected on the western bank of the Jordan to mark their boundary-to testify to the fact that they were separated by the rushing river from their brethren and the country in which Jehovah had fixed the place where he would be worshipped, they had still a right to return to it for his worship—was erected in accordance with the unalterable habits of Bedouin tribes both before and since. It was an act identical with that in which Laban and Jacob engaged at parting, with that which is constantly performed by the Bedouin of the present day. But the Israelites west of Jordan, who were fast relinquishing their nomad habits and feelings for those of more settled permanent life, this act was completely misunderstood, and was construed into an attempt to set up a rival altar to that of the sacred tent. The incompatibility of the idea to the mind of the Western Israelites is shown by the fact that, notwithstanding the disclaimer and a most extraordinary and a not surprisingly that disclaimer having proved satisfactory even to Phinehas, the author of Joshua xxii retains the name midbar for the pile, a word which involves the idea of sacrifice—i.e. of slaughter (see Genesis, Thesaur., p. 402)—instead of applying to it the term "qalum," as is done in the case (Gen. xvi, 30) of the precisely similar "heap of witness." Another Reubenitish erection, which long kept up the memory of the presence of the tribe on the west of Jordan, was the stone of Bahan ben-Reuben which formed a landmark on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv, 6). This was a single stone (Eben), not a pile, and it appears to have stood somewhere on the road from Bethany to Jericho, not far from the ruined khaneh so well known to travellers.

The doom, "they shall not excel," was exactly fulfilled in the destinies of the tribe descended from Reuben, which makes no figure in the Hebrew history, and never produced any eminent person. No judge, no prophet, no hero of the tribe of Reuben is handed down to us, unless it be "Adina the Reubenite, a captain of the Reubenites, and thirty with him" (1 Chron. xi, 42). In the dire extremity of their brethren in the days under Deborah and Barak, they contented themselves with debating the news among the streams (328) of the Mishor. The distant distress of his brethren could not move Reuben: he lingered among his sheepfolds, and preferred the shepherd's pipe and the bleating of the flocks to the clanging of the trumpet and the turmoil of battle. His individuality fades more rapidly than Gad's. The elevation of Gadites to a seat on the border at its highest, to join the son of Jesse in his trouble (1 Chron. xii, 8-15); Barzillai; Elijah the Gileadite; the siege of Ramoth-gilead, with its picturesque incidents—all give a substantial reality to the tribe and country of Gad. But no person, no incident, is recorded to place Reuben before us in any one distinctly. The benediction of the great leader goes out over the tribe which was about to separate itself from its brethren, in a fervent aspiration for its welfare through all the risks of that remote and trying situation. Both in this and the earlier blessing of Jacob, Reuben retains his place at the head of the family, and it must not be overlooked that the tribe, together with the two who associated themselves with it, actually received its inheritance before either Judah or Ephraim, to whom the birthright which Reuben had forfeited was transferred (1 Chron. vii, 1).

From this time it seems as if a bar, not only the material one of distance, and of the intervening river and mountain-wall, but also of difference in feeling and habits, gradually grew up more substantially between the Eastern and Western tribes. The first act of the former after the completion of the conquest, and after they had taken part in the solemn ceremonial in the valley between Ebal and Gerizim, shows how wide a gap already existed between their ideas and those of the Western tribes. The pile of stones which they erected on the western bank of the Jordan to mark their boundary—to testify to the fact that they were separated by the rushing river from their brethren and the country in which Jehovah had fixed the place where he would be worshipped, they had still a right to return to it for his worship—was erected in accordance with the unalterable habits of Bedouin tribes both before and since. It was an act identical with that in which Laban and Jacob engaged at parting, with that which is constantly performed by the Bedouin of the present day. But the Israelites west of Jordan, who were fast relinquishing their nomad habits and feelings for those of more settled permanent life, this act was completely misunderstood, and was construed into an attempt to set up a rival altar to that of the sacred tent. The incompatibility of the idea to the mind of the Western Israelites is shown by the fact that, notwithstanding the disclaimer and a most extraordinary and a not of the national government and of the national religion, it is not to be wondered at that Reuben relinquished the faith of Jehovah. “They went after the gods of the people of the land whom God destroyed before them,” and we hear little more of them till the time of Hazael, king of Syria, who ravaged and for a time held possession of their country (2 Kings x, 33). The last historical notice which we possess of them, while it records this fact, records also its natural consequence, that the Reubenites and Gadites and the half-tribe of Manasseh were carried off by Pulu and Togiti-puliser, and placed in the districts on and about the river Khabour, in the upper part of Mesopotamia—“in Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and the river Gozan” (1 Chron. v. 26).

The following is a list of all the Biblical localities in the tribe of Reuben, with their probable identifications. For the boundaries, see Trube.

The country allotted to the Reubenites extended on the south to the river Arnon, which divided it from the Moabites (Josh. xiii, 8, 16); on the east it touched the desert of Arabia; on the west were the Dead Sea and the Jordan. The northern border was probably marked by a line running eastward from the Jordan through Wady Hesban (vers. 17-21; Num. xxxii, 37, 38). This country had originally been conquered and occupied by the Moabites; but they were driven out a short time before the Exodus by Sihon, king of the Amorites, who was in his turn expelled by the Israelites (Deut. ii; Numb. xxxi, 22-31). Immediately after the captivity the Moabites again returned to their old country and occupied their old cities. This is the reason why, in the later prophets, many of the cities of Reuben are embraced in the curses pronounced upon Moab (Jer. xlviii). The territory was divided into sections—the western declivities towards the Dead Sea and the Jordan valley, which were steep, rugged, and bare, with the little section of Jordan (called in Scripture “the plains of Moab”) [Numb. xxii. 1] as their base; and the high table-land stretching from the summit of the ridge away towards Arabia. The latter, from its even surface, as contrasted with the rocky soil of Western Palestine, received from the accursed sacred writers the appropriate name Mahes (q. v.). Under its modern name of the Belka it is still esteemed beyond all others by the Arab shepherds. It is well watered, covered with smooth, short turf, and losing itself gradually in those limitless wastes which have always been, and always will be, the favorite resort of pastoral nomad tribes. The whole region is now deserted; there is not a single settled inhabitant within its borders. Its great cities, mostly bearing their ancient names, are heaps of ruins. The wild wandering tribes of the desert visit it periodically to feed their flocks and herds on its rich pastures and to drink the waters of its fountains and cisterns. REUBENITE (Heb. with the art. ha- Reubeni; אַבְנַי the numerous in the plural, occasionalled as such Poabiy or Peobey, a descendant of Reuben (Numb. xxxii. 1, etc.).

Reuchlin, Johann von, an eminent German scholar, who adopted the Grecized name of Copernicus, was born at Pforzheim in 1454. After serving in different political functions, he became, in 1520, professor of Greek and Hebrew at Ingolstadt, whence he removed to Tubingen, thence to Stuttgart, where he died, Dec. 28, 1521. Besides his memorable services in connection with classical literature and general culture, he may be regarded as the principal promoter of the study of Hebrew in his day. He published a Hebrew grammar and lexicon under the title Ad Dionysium Fratrem suam de Judaica Hebraica Libri III (s. l. 1506, 4to), of which an improved edition, under the auspices of the Seh. Minster, appeared in 1537 (Basel, fol.). Reuchlin wrote also De Aesculapio et Orthographia Ling. Heb. (Hagenau, 1518, 4to).

REL'EL (Heb. Reuel, רְאוּל, friend of God; Sept. 'Pawon'; A. V. Roygut (Numb. x. 29)), the name of three or four men.

1. A son of Esau by Bashemath (Gen. xxxvi. 4, 10; 1 Chron. i, 55, 57); his four sons (Gen. xxxvi. 15) were princes, i.e. chiefs of the Edomites (ver. 17). B.C. post 366. See ESAY.

2. A Midianitish priest and nomadic herdsmen in the wilderness, to whom Moses fled from Egypt, and whose daughter Zipporah he married (Exod. xi, 16 sq.); but in Exod. iii, 1, iv, 18, 19, it is called the law of Moses and, in i, 1, is made priest and herdsmen. Various methods are suggested for meeting the difficulty: (1.) Josephus (Anti. ii, 12, 1) considers Reuel and Jethro as two names of one man. So Lengerke (Kemana, 1, 325) and Bertheau (Israel. Gesch. p. 242). (2.) Aben-Ezra, followed by Joseph, understands Jethro as father in Exod. ii, 18, grandfather. (3.) Edward (Iscr. Gesch. i, 14) thinks “Jethro son of” has fallen out of the text before Reuel in Exod. iii, 18. (4.) Ranke (Penat. i, 8) understands the word chodim, כּוֹדִים, rendered father-in-law, to mean brother-in-law, and compares the ambiguous use of the word γαῖρος. We must suppose that Jethro had succeeded in the priesthood and became of his deceased father (Exod. iii, 1). (5.) Others find a double genealogical tradition (Hartmann, Pestaloz. p. 229 sq.; comp. De Wette, Einleit. ins A. T. p. 196). On this supposition, no. 2. The fourth supposition is forced. If we decide for any particular view, it seems simplest to understand grandson for father (Exod. ii, 18); since Reuel was the father of the house until Jethro acquired independence. See Horab: Ra-guel.

2. Father of Eliashaph, the leader of the tribe of Gad at the time of the census at Sinai (Num. ii, 14). In the parallel passages (i. 14; vii. 42, 47; x. 20) the name is given Deuril (q. v.).

3. Son of Ithuba, father of Shephatiah (1 Chron. ix, 8), of the tribe of Benjamin. B.C. ante 1618.

Reth'mah (Heb. Re'ithmah), יִרְתָּם, elevated [Ge-men.,] or peari [Fürst.; Sept. Pe'eri], a concubine of Na dav, Abraham's brother; and by him mother of Tebah and others (Gen. xxii, 24). B.C. cir. 2040.

Reuss, René VON (Countess), a German hym-nist, was born at Ebersdorf Dec. 15, 1695, where she also died. Aug. 1, 1751. She was a sister of count Henry XXIX of Reuss-Ebersdorf, and of the countess Erdmuth Dorothea, wife of count von Zinzendorf. She was a great poetess, and by her hymnody, which has been translated into English: Komm Sejen aus der Höhe

ReuterdaI, Henrik, a Swedish Protestant divine, was born in 1759 at Malmö, in Sweden. He studied at Lund, and in 1817 commenced lecturing as “pri-vat docent” of theology. In 1818 he was made adjunct to the theological faculty, in 1820 prefect of the seminary, in 1827 member of the chapter, in 1828 librarian, and in 1844 professor of theology at Lund. In 1852 he was appointed state-councillor and head of the department for religious matters, which position he occupied until 1855, when he was made bishop of Lund, and in 1856 archbishop of Upsala. He died in 1870. He wrote:
On the Study of Theology (Lund, 1834):—Introduction to Theology (ibid. 1837):—History of the Swedish Church (ibid. 1858-63, 3 vols.). Besides, he also published since 1828 the Queristologische Quartalblitter, and continued
the Appendix ad Historiam Suedo-Gothicum, commenced by Céleb: His De Fontibus Historiae Ecclesiasti-cae Suecianae, published in 1826, in 4 pts., is of great Reval-Estonian Version of the Scriptures.

This version, which is used by the inhabitants of the north of Livonia, including the three adjacent islands of Ösel, Daggen (or Dagoie), and Mohn, was first printed at Reval in 1739, and partly published at the expense of the celebrated count Zinzendorf. In 1815, through the exertions of the Society for the propagation of the British and Foreign Bible Society, an edition of 10,000 copies of the New Test., was printed. Prior to 1824 the Russian Bible Society published 5100 copies of the Old Test., and some recent editions have been issued at Dorpat. Of late the American Bible Society has undertaken the publication of the whole Bible in the Reval-Estonian, now printing at Berlin, which is probably now ready, having the previous year (1876) issued an edition of 20,000 copies of the New Test., with the Psalms, in 12mo. We subjoin the Lord's Prayer in that dialect from Dalton: Das Gebet des Herrn in den Sprachen

Revelation (dróorduakS), a disclosure of something that has been unknown; and divine revelation is the direct communication of truths before unknown from God to men. The disclosure may be made by dream, vision, oral communication, or otherwise (Dan.
ii, 19: 1 Cor. xiv, 26; 2 Cor. xii, 1; Gal. i, 12; Rev. 1).
Revelation here that is how it should be confounded.
The former refers to those things only of which the sacred writers were ignorant before they were divinely taught, while the latter has a more general meaning.
Accordingly revelation may be defined that operation of the Holy Spirit by which truths which were unknown are communicated to men; and inspiration, the operation of the Holy Spirit by which not only unknown truths are communicated, but by which also men are excited to publish truths for the instruction of others, and are guarded from all error in doing it. Thus it was revealed to the ancients that the Messiah should appear, and they were inspired to publish the fact for the benefit of others.
The affecting scenes at the cross of Christ were not revealed to John, for he saw them with his own eyes (John xix, 35); but he was inspired to write thereof in the Apocalypse. The acts of a priori revelation were kept from all error in his record. It is therefore ture, as the apostle affirms, that every part of the Bible is given by inspiration of God (2 Tim. iii, 16), though every part of the Bible is not the result of immediate revelation. For convenience' sake, we call the whole Bible a revelation from God, because most of the truths
it contains were made known by direct communication from God, and could have been discovered in no other way; and generally it is only the incidental circumstances attending the communication of these truths that would be ascertained by the writers in the ordinary modes of obtaining information.

Concerning a divine revelation, we remark that, 1.
It is possible. God may, for aught we know, think proper to make known to his creatures what they before were ignorant of; and, as a Being of infinite power, he cannot be at a loss for means of communication. 2. It is desirable; for while reason is necessary to examine the matter of revelation, it is incapable, unsolved, of finding out God. 3. It is necessary; for without it we can attain to no certain knowledge of God, of Christ, and of salvation. 4. Revelation must, therefore, be sufficiently marked with internal and external evidences. These the Bible has. 5. Its contents must be agreeable to reason. Not that everything revealed must be within the range of reason; but this may be true, and yet there be no contradiction. To calm dis-passionate reason there is nothing in doctrine, command, warning, promises, or threatening which is opposed thereto. 6. It must be credible; and we find the facts of Scripture supported by abundant evidence from reason and fact. 7. Revelation is also inspiration; for it impressively bears the prevailing impress of the circumstances and tastes of the times and nations in which it was originally given. The Bible, however, though it bears the distinct impress of Asiatic manners, as it should do, is most remarkable for rising above all local and temporary pecularities, and setting on the great principles common to human nature under all circumstances; thus showing that as it is intended for universal benefit, so will it be made known to all mankind. The language of the Bible is the language of men, otherwise it would not be a divine revelation from men to men; and it is the same means and according to the same laws by which all other human language is understood. It is addressed to the common-sense of men, and common-sense is to be consulted in its interpretation.
In a narrower sense, "revelation" is used to express the manifestation of Jesus Christ to Jews and Gentiles (Luke ii, 32); the manifestation of the glory with which God will glorify his elect and faithful servants at the last judgment (Rom. vii, 19), and the declaration of his just judgments in the conduct of the world, and to bring them to the rebuke (ii, 9-16). There is a very noble application of the word revelation to the consummation of all things, or the revelation of Jesus Christ in his future glory (I Cor. i, 7; I Pet. i, 13), see Brown, Compendium of Natural and Revealed Religion: With Prolegomena, by Bickersteth. Revelation Examined; Ellis, On Divine Things; Fuller, Works: Horne, Introduction: Leland, Necessity of Revelation: View of Desistical Writers. See Inspiration; Miracol: Prophecy.

I. Revelation, Book of. This last of the books of the New Testament, according to their usual arrangement, is entitled in the A. V. "The Revelation (Αποκάλυψης, Apocalypse) of [St.] John the Divine (τοῦ Θεολόγου);" but in Codices Alex., Sinait., and Ephr. Recp. it is simply Αποκάλυψης Ιωάννου; and in Cod. Vind. it takes the fuller and more explicit form of Αποκάλυψης Ιωάννου Θεολόγου και Εὐαγγελιστοῦ, thus clearly identifying the author with the writer of the fourth gospel. The true and authoritative title of the book, however, is that which it bears in its own name, without the addition of the Θεολόγου. This has been restored by Tregelles in his critical edition of 1844, and which has been adopted by most of the critical authorities and versions since.

2. Canonical Authority and Authorship.—These two points are intimately connected with each other. If it can be proved that a book, claiming so distinctly as this does the authority of divine inspiration, was actually written by John, then no doubt will be entertained as to its title to a place in the canon of Scripture. We must be justified, then, in the title to the Revelation? This question was first mooted by Dionysius of Alexandria (Eusebius, H. E. vii, 25). The doubt which he modestly suggested has been confidently proclaimed in modern times by Luther (Vorrede auf die Offenbarung, 1522 and 1554), and widely diffused through his influence. Lutke (Einleitung, p. 802), the most learned and diligent of modern critics of the Revelation, agrees with a majority of the eminent scholars of Germany in denying that John was the author. But however bold the belief of the mass of ostensible Christians in all ages has been in favor of John's authorship.

1. Evidence in Favor of the Apostolic Authorship.—This consists of the assertions of the author and historical tradition.

(i.) The author's description of himself in the first and twenty-second chapters is certainly equivalent to an assertion that he is the apostle. (a) He names himself simply John, without prefix or addition—a name which at that period, and in Asia, must have been taken by every Christian as the designation, in the first instance, of the great apostle whom he dwelt at Ephesus. Doubtless there were other John's among the Christians at that time, but only arrogance or an intention to deceive could account for the assumption of this simple style by any other writer. He is also described as (b) a servant of Christ, (c) one who had borne testimony as an eye-witness of the word of God and of the testimony of Christ—terms which were surely designed to identify him with the writer of the verses John xix, 35; i, 14; and i John 1, 2. He is (d) in Patmos for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ: it may be easy to suppose that other Christians of the same name were banished thither, but the apostle is the only John who is distinctly named in early history as an exile at Patmos. He is also (e) a fellow-sufferer with those whom he addresses, and (f) the authorized channel of the most direct and important communication that was ever made to the seven churches of Asia, of which church--- there is very little to weigh against them. (a) Justin Martyr (cir. A.D. 150) says: "A man among us whose name was John, one of the apostles of Christ, in a revelation which was made to him, prophesied that the believers in our Christ shall live a thousand years in Jerusalem" (Tryph. § 81, p. 179, ed. Ben.). (b) The author of the 2nd Fragment of Eusebius (cit. John vi. 26) mentions this among the books of Melito which had come to his knowledge; and as he carefully records objections against the apostle's authorship, it may be fairly presumed, notwithstanding the doubts of Klenker and Lucic (Eisdeu. p. 614), that Eusebius found no doubt as to John's authorship in the book of this ancient Asiatic bishop. (c) Theophilus, bishop of Antioch (cir.180), in a controversy with Hermogenes, quotes passages out of the Revelation of John (Eusebius, H. E. iv. 24). (d) Ireneus (cir. 150), apparently never having heard of any other authorship of the Apocalypse, often quotes the Revelation as the work of John. In iv. 20, § 11, he describes John the writer of the Revelation as the same who was leaping on Jesus' bosom at supper, and asked him who should betray him. The testimony as to the authorship of Revelation as, perhaps, more important than that of any other writer: it mounts up into the preceding generation, and is virtually that of a contemporary of the apostle. For in v. 30, § 1, where he indicates the true reading (666) of the number of the Beast, he cites in support of it, not only the old copies of the Septuagint, but also the oral testimony of the very persons who themselves had seen John face to face. It is obvious that Ireneus's reference for information on such a point to those contemporaries of John implies his undoubting belief that the writer was himself, viewed as the writer of the book. Lucic (p. 574) suggests that this view was possibly groundless because it was entertained before the learned fathers of Alexandria had set the example of historical criticism. But his suggestion scarcely weakens the force of the fact that such was the belief of Asia, and it appears a strange suggestion when we remember that the critical discretion of the Alexandrians, to whom he refers, led them to coincide with Ireneus in his view. (f) Apollonius (cir. 200) of Ephesus (?), in controversy with the Montanists of Phrygia, quotes passages of the Revelation of John, and bears witness to a miracle wrought by John at Ephesus (Euseb. H. E. v. 18). (g) Clement of Alexandria (cir. 200) quotes the book as the Revelation of John (Stromata, v. 13, p. 657), and as the work of an apostle (Pard. ii. 12, p. 207). (A) Tertullian (A.D. 207), in at least one place, quotes by name "the apostle John in the Apocalypse" (Ad. Marcion. iii. 14). (i) Hippolytus (cir. 230) is said, in the inscription on his statue at Rome, to have composed an apology for the Apocalypse and Gospel of St. John the apostle. He quotes it as the work of John (De Arian. §§ 86, p. 756, ed. Migne). (J) Orig. (cir. 233), in his commentary on John, quoted by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 25), says of the apostle, "he wrote also the Revelation." The testimonies of later writers, in the 3d and 4th centuries, in favor of John's authorship of the Revelation are equally distinct and far more numerous. They may be seen quoted at length in Luccic, p. 628-638, or in dean Alford's Prolegomena (N. T. vol. iv. pt. ii). It may suffice here to say that they include the names of Victorinus, Methodius, Ephrem Syrus, Eiph. Phraim, Hilary, Athanasius, Gregory, Didymus, Ambrose, Augustine, and Jerome. All the foregoing writers, testifying that the book came from an apostle, believed that it was a part of Holy Scripture. But many whose extant works cannot be quoted for testimony to the authorship of the book refer to it as possessing canonical authority. Thus (c) Papias, who is described by Ireneus as a hearer of John and friend of Polycarp, is cited, together with other writers, by Andreas of Cappadocia, in his commentary on the Revelation, as a guarantee to later ages of the divine inspiration of the book (Iouth, Rel. Sacr. i. 15; Cramer, Catech. [Oxford, 1840], p. 170). The value of Papias's testimony is weakened by the controversy to which it has given rise, in which Lucic, Bleeck, Hengstenberg, and Rettig have taken different parts. (b) In the epistle from the churches of Lyons and Vienne, A.D. 177, inserted in Eusebius, H. E. v. 1-3, sections 1-10 are quoted or referred to in the same way as passages of books whose canonical authority is unquestioned. (c) Cyprian (Ep. 10, 12, 14, 19, ed. Fell) repeatedly quotes it as a part of canonical Scripture. Chrysostom makes no distinct allusion to it in any extant writing; but we are informed by Sozomen that he received it as canonical. Although omitted (perhaps as not adapted for public reading in church) from the list of canonical books in the Council of Laodicea, it was admitted into the list of the third Council of Carthage, A.D. 397.
he did not understand how John could write in the style in which the Revelation is written, he yet knew of no authority for attributing it, as he desired to attribute it, to some other of the numerous persons who bore the name of John.

A weightier difficulty arises from the fact that the Revelation is one of the books which are absent from the ancient Peshito version, and the only trustworthy evidence in favor of its reception by the ancient Syrian Church is a single quotation which is adduced from the Syriac version of the Apocalypse of Eusebius. Eusebius it is remarkably sparing in his quotations from the "Revelation of John," and the uncertainty of his opinion about it is best shown by his statement in H. E. iii. 89, that "it is likely that the Revelation was seen by the second John (the Ephesian presbyter), if any one is unwilling to believe that it was seen by the apostle." See John The Presbyter. Jerome states (Ep. ad Dardanum, etc.) that the Greek churches felt, with respect to the Revelation, a similar doubt to that of the Latins respecting the Epsilite to the Hebrews. Neither nor his equally influential contemporary Augustine shared such doubts. Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret abstained from making use of the book, sharing it, it is possible, the doubts to which Jerome refers. But they have not gone so far as to express any opinion upon the point of whether it is a genuine book. Eusebius and writers is the latest evidence of any importance that has been adduced against the overwhelming weight of the testimony in favor of the canonical authority and authorship of this book. See Canon of Scripture.

II. Time and Place of Writing. — The date of the Revelation is given by the great majority of critics as A.D. 95-97. The weighty testimony of Ireneus is almost sufficient to prevent any other conclusion. He says (Ad. Haer. v. 30, § 3), "It [i.e., the Revelation] was seen no very long time ago, but almost in our own generation, by John the son of Domitian." The silence of the first three centuries. The date of the Revelation is given by the great majority of critics as A.D. 95-97. The weighty testimony of Ireneus is almost sufficient to prevent any other conclusion. He says (Ad. Haer. v. 30, § 3), "It [i.e., the Revelation] was seen no very long time ago, but almost in our own generation, by John the son of Domitian." The silence of the first three centuries.

Unsupported by any historical evidence, some commentators have put forth the conjecture that the Revelation was written as early as the time of Nero. This is not supported by the evidence from the contents of the book. It is difficult to see in the passages i. 7; i. 9; III. 9; vi. 12, 16; xi. 42, anything which would lead necessarily to the conclusion that Jerusalem was in a prosperous condition, and that the predictions of its fall had not been fulfilled when those verses were written. A more weighty argument in favor of an early date might be urged from a modern interpretation of xi. 10, if that interpretation could be established. Galba is alleged to be the sixth king, the one that "is." In Nero these interpreters see the beast that was wounded (xiii. 3), the beast that was and is not (xvi. 8), the beast "that was and is not, and is and is about to come" (xiv. 11), in the name of Nero the Roman populace believed that he was not dead, but had fled into the East, whence he would return and regain his throne; and these interpreters venture to suggest that the writer of the Revelation shared and meant to express the absurd popular delusion. Even the ability of his critics (Theo. i. 448), by way of supporting this interpretation, advances his untenable claim to the first discovery of the name of Nero Caesar in the number of the beast, 666. The inconsistency of this interpretation with prophetic analogy, with the context of Revelation, and with the fact that the book is of divine origin, is pointed out by Hengstenberg, in an end of his Commentary on ch. xxxii., and by Elliott, Her. Apoc. iv. 547.

It has been inferred from i. 2, 9, 10, that the Revelation was written in Ephesus; immediately after the apostle's return from Patmos. But the text is scarcely sufficient to support this conclusion. The style in which the messages to the seven churches are delivered rather suggests the notion that the book was written in Patmos. See John The Apostle.

III. Language. — The thought first suggested by Hengstenberg, that the Revelation was written in Aramaic, has met with little or no reception. The silence of all ancient writers as to any Aramaic original is alone sufficient answer to the suggestion. Lücke (Eischr. p. 441) has collected internal evidence to show that the original is the Greek of a Jewish Christian.

Lücke has also (p. 448-454) examined in minute detail, after the preceding labors of Donker-Curtius, Vogel, Winer, Ewald, Klothoff, and Hitzig, the peculiarities of language which obviously distinguish the Revelation from every other book of the New Testament. In subsequent times it has been found that the difference between the Revelation, on one side, and the fourth Gospel and first Epistle, on the other, in respect of their style and composition and the mental character and attainments of the writer of each, Hengstenberg, in a dissertation addressed to his Commentary, maintains that they are by one writer. That the anomalies and peculiarities of the Revelation have been greatly exaggerated by some critics is sufficiently shown by Hitzig's plausible and ingenious, though unsuccessful, attempt to prove the identity of style and diction in the Revelation and the Gospel of John. But it is much to be feared that the Revelation has many surprising grammatical peculiarities. But much of this is accounted for by the fact that it was probably written down, as it was seen, "in the spirit," while the ideas, in all their novelty and vastness, filled the apostle's mind, and rendered him less capable of attending to forms of speech. His Gospel and Epistles, on the other hand, were composed equally under divine influence, but an influence of a gentler, more ordinary kind, with much care, after long deliberation, after frequent recollection and recital of the facts, and deep pondering of the teaching of Jesus obscure and in later authorities say that John was banished under Nero.

Unsupportd by any historical evidence, some commentators have put forth the conjecture that the Revelation was written as early as the time of Nero. This is not supported by the evidence from the contents of the book. It is difficult to see in the passages i. 7; i. 9; iii. 9; vi. 12, 16; xi. 42, anything which would lead necessarily to the conclusion that Jerusalem was in a prosperous condition, and that the predictions of its fall had not been fulfilled when those verses were written. A more weighty argument in favor of an early date might be urged from a modern interpretation of xi. 10, if that interpretation could be established. Galba is alleged to be the sixth king, the one that "is." In Nero these interpreters see the beast that was wounded (xiii. 3), the beast that was and is not (xvi. 8), the beast "that was and is not, and is and is about to come" (xiv. 11), in the name of Nero the Roman populace believed that he was not dead, but had fled into the East, whence he would return and regain his throne; and these interpreters venture to suggest that the writer of the Revelation shared and meant to express the absurd popular delusion. Even the ability of his critics (Theo. i. 448), by way of supporting this interpretation, advances his untenable claim to the first discovery of the name of Nero Caesar in the number of the beast, 666. The inconsistency of this interpretation with prophetic analogy, with the context of Revelation, and with the fact that the book is of divine origin, is pointed out by Hengstenberg, in an end of his Commentary on ch. xxxii., and by Elliott, Her. Apoc. iv. 547.

IV. Contents. — A full analysis of the book would involve much that is disputed as to its interpretation. We therefore content ourselves with a few general observations, with the results which the main visions are specified.
The first three verses contain the title of the book, the description of the writer, and the blessing pronounced on the readers, which possibly, like the last two verses of the fourth gospel, may be an addition by the hand of inspired survivors of the writer. John begins (i. 1) by signing from the seven churches of Asia. This, coming before the announcement that he was in the spirit, looks like a dedication not merely of the first vision, but of all the book, to those churches. In the next five verses (i. 2-9) he touches the key-note of the whole following book, the great fundamental ideas; though all our accounts of the great church of the world and the church are built—the person of Christ; the redemption wrought by him; his second coming to judge mankind; the painful, hopeful discipline of Christians in the midst of this present world; thoughts which may well be supposed to have been uppermost in the mind of the persecuted and exiled apostle even before the divine inspiration came on him. a. The first vision, (i. 7-iii, 22) shows the Son of Man with his injunction, or epistles to the seven churches. While the apostle is pondering those great truths and the critical conditions of his church, that church has left a Divine Person resembling those seen by Ezekiel and Daniel, and identified by name and by description as Jesus, appears to John, and, with the discriminating authority of a son and judge, reviews the state of those churches, comes to a decision as to their several characters, and takes occasion from them to speak to all Christians who may desire similar encouragement or similar condemnation. Each of these sentences, spoken by the Son of Man, is described as said by the Spirit. Hitherto the apostle has been speaking primarily, though not exclusively, to some of his own contemporaries concerning the present events and circumstances. Henceforth he ceases to address them particularly. His words are for the ear of the universal Church in all ages, and show the significance of things which we now see as hope or fear, in sorrow or in joy, to Christians everywhere. b. In the next vision (iv. 1-viii, 1), Patmos and the Divine Person whom he saw are gone. Only the trumpet sound is heard again calling him to a change of place. He is in the highest court of heaven, and sees God sitting on his throne. The seven-sealed book or roll is produced, and the slain lamb, the Redeemer, receives it amid the sound of universal adoration. As the seals are opened in order, the apostle sees (1) a conqueror on a white horse; (2) a red horse, and a terrible disease; (3) a black horse of death; (4) the cager souls of martyrs under the altar; (5) an earthquake, with universal commotion and terror. After this there is a pause, the course of avenging angels is checked while 144,000, the children of Israel, servants of God, are sealed, and an innumerable multitude of the redeemed of all nations are seen worshipping God. Next (7) the seventh seal is opened, and half an hour’s silence in heaven ensues. c. Then (viii, 2-xxi, 19) seven angels appear with trumpets, the four horses of the岁以上 is struck with fire from the altar, and the seven trumpets are sounded. (1) The earth, and (2) the sea, and (3) the springs of water, and (4) the heavenly bodies are successively smitten; (5) a plague of locusts afflicts the men who are not sealed (the first woe); (6) the third part of men are slain (the second woe); but the rest are impotent. Then there is a pause: a mighty angel with a book appears and cries out; seven thunders sound, but their words are not recorded; the approaching completion of the mystery of God is announced; the angel binds the apostle to the book, and describes its prophecies with its worshippers, and the outer court given up to the Gentiles; the two witnesses of God, their martyrdom, resurrection, ascension, are foretold. The approach of the third woe is announced, and (7) the seventh trumpet is sounded, the reign of Christ is proclaimed. God has taken his great power, the time has come for judgment and for the destruction of the destroyers of the earth. The three preceding visions are distinct from one another. Each of the last two, like the longer one which follows, has the appearance of a distinct prophecy, reaching far beyond the range of the seven churches of Asia. This second half of the Revelation (ch. xii-xvii) comprises a series of visions which are connected by various links. It may be described generally as a prophecy of the assaults of the devil and his agents (i.e. the dragon, the ten-horned beast, the two-horned beast or false prophet, and the harlot upon the Church and their final destruction. It appears to begin with a reference to events anterior, not only to those which are predicted in the preceding chapter, but also to the time in which it was written. It seems hard to interpret the birth of the child as a prediction, and not as a retrospective illusion. d. A woman (ch. xii) clothed with the sun is seen in heaven, and a great red dragon with seven crowned heads stands waiting to devour her offspring; her child is caught up into God, and the mother flees into the wilderness for 1260 days. The dragon, and her seed on earth by the dragon is described as the consequence of a war in heaven which the dragon was overcome and cast out upon the earth. The Revelator (ch. xiii), standing on the sea-shore, sees a beast with seven heads and ten horns, and ten crown horns, rising from the water, the representative of the dragon. All the world wonders at and worships him, and he attacks the saints and prevails. He is followed by another two-horned beast rising out of the earth, who compels men to wear the mark of the beast, whose number is 666. Next (ch. xiv) the lamb is seen with 144,000 standing on Mount Zion, learning the song of praise of the heavenly host. Three angels fly forth calling men to worship God, proclaiming the fall of Babylon, denouncing the worshippers of the beast. A blessing is pronounced on the faithful dead, and the judgment of the world is described under the image of a harvest reaped by angels. John (ch. xv, xvi) sees in heaven the saints who had overcome the beast, singing the song of Moses and the Lamb. Then seven angels come out of the heavenly temple having seven vials of wrath, which they pour out upon the earth, sea, rivers, sun, the seat of the beast, Euphrates, and the air, after which there is a great earthquake and a hail-storm. One (ch. xvi, xvi) sees last seven angels carry John into the wilderness and shows him a harlot, Babylon, sitting on a scarlet beast with seven heads and ten horns. She is explained to be that great city, sitting upon seven mountains, reigning over the kings of the earth. Afterwards John sees a vision of the destruction of Babylon, portrayed as the burning of a great city amid the lamentations of worldly men and the rejoicing of saints. Afterwards (ch. xix) the worshippers in heaven are heard celebrating Babylon’s fall and the approaching marriage-supper of the Lamb. The Word of God is seen going forth to war at the head of the heavenly armies: the beast and his false prophet are taken and cast into the burning lake, and their worshippers are slain. An angel (xx-xxi, 5) binds the dragon, i.e. the devil, for one thousand years, while the martyred saints who had not worshipped the beast reign with Christ. Then the devil is loosed, gathers a host against the camp of the saints, but is overcome by fire from heaven, and is cast into the burning lake with the beast and false prophet. John then witnesses the process of destruction of the temple of the great harlot, and describes the new heaven and the new earth, and the new Jerusalem, with its people and their way of life. In the last sixteen verses (xxi, 6-21) the angel solemnly ascertains the truthfulness and importance of the foregoing sayings, promises a blessing on those who keep them exactly, gives warning of his speedy coming to judgment, and of the nearness of the time when these prophecies shall be fulfilled.

V. Schemes of Interpretation.—Few, if any, books of the Bible have been the sport of so great differences of view as this, arising largely from prejudice and the passion of the age. The chief divisions of the line of these conflicting opinions, which prevail even to the present day.

1. Historical Review.—The interval between the apostolic age and that of Constantine has been called the Chaldaic period of Apocalyptic interpretation. The visions of John were chiefly regarded as representations of general historical facts, scarcely yet embodied in actual facts, for the most part to be exemplified or fulfilled in the reign of Antichrist, the coming of Christ, the millennium, and the day of judgment. The fresh hopes of the early Christians, and the severe persecution they endured, taught them to live in those future events with intense satisfaction and comfort. They did not entertain the thought of building up a definite consecutive chronological scheme even of those symbols which some moderns regard as then already fulfilled; although from the beginning a connection between Rome and Antichrist was universally allowed, and parts of the Revelation were regarded as the filling-up of the great outline sketched by Daniel and Paul. The process or gradual interpretation in this period are the interpolated commentary on the Revelation by the martyr Victorinus, cit. A.D. 270 (Bibliotheca Patrum Minima, iii, 414, and Migne, Patrologia Latina, v, 518; the two editions should be compared), and the disputed treatise on Antichrist by Hippolytus (Migne, Patrologia Graeca, x, 726). But the prevalent views of that age are to be gathered also from a pas-sage in Justin Martyr (Trypho, 80, 81), from the later books, especially the fifth, of Irenaeus, and from various scattered passages in Tertullian, Origen, and Methodius. The event of the last days of the world in Lactantius, vii, 14-23, has little direct reference to the Revelation.

Immediately after the triumph of Constantine, the Christians, emancipated from oppression and persecution, and dominant and prosperous in their turn, began to lose their vivid expectation of our Lord's speedy advent and their spiritual conception of his kingdom, and to look upon the temporal supremacy of Christianity as a fulfilment of the promised reign of Christ on earth. The Roman empire, because Christian, was regarded no longer as the object of prophetic denunciation, but as the scene of a millennial development. This view, how-ever, was soon met by the figurative interpretation of the millennium as the reign of Christ in the hearts of all true believers. As the barbarous and heretical in-vasion of the Roman empire wavered, they were regarded by the suffering Christians as fulfilling the woes denounced in the Revelation. The beginning of a regular chronological interpretation is seen in Berengaud (assigned by some critics to the 9th century), who treated the Revelation as a history of the Church from the beginning of the world to its end. The original Comment-arv of the abbot Joachim is remarkable, not only for a further development of that method of interpretation, but for the scarcely disguised identification of Babylon with papal Rome, and of the second beast or Antichrist with some universal pontiff. The chief commentators belonging to this period are that which is ascribed to Tichonius (cit. A.D. 390), printed in the works of Augustine; Primasius of Aquitaine in Africa (A.D. 530), in Migne, Patrologia Latina, lxxvii, 1406; Andreas of Crete, in the Gesta(Contact) of Constantine and Eumenius of Thessaly in the 10th century, whose commentaries were published together in Cramer's Catena (Oxon. 1840); the Explanatio Apoc. in the works of Beile (A.D. 730); the Expositio of Berengaud, printed in the works of Ambrose of Milan (Oxon. 1583), first published at Cologne in 1581; a short treatise on the seals by Anselm, bishop of Havelberg (A.D. 1145), printed in D'Achery's Spicilegium, i, 151; the Expositio of abbot Joachim of Calabria (A.D. 1290), printed at Venice in 1527.

In the dawn of the Reformation, the views to which the reputation of abbot Joachim gave currency were taken up by the followers of the school of Halle, as by Wycliffe and others; and they became the foundation of that great historical school of interpretation, which up to this time seems the most popular of all. (For the later commentaries, see § vi, below.)

2. Approximate Classification of Modern Interpretations.—These are generally placed in three great divisions.

(1.) The Prerestorist expositors, who are of opinion that the Revelation has been almost, or altogether, fulfilled in the time which has passed since it was written; that it refers principally to the triumph of Christianity over Judaism and paganism, signalized in the downfall of Jerusalem and of Rome. The most eminent exponents of this view are Alcalas, Grotius, Hammond, Bosuer, Calmet, Wettstein, Kiechel, Hug, Herder, Ewald, Lietke, De Wette, Distelreick, Stuart, Hartle, and Maurice. This is the favorite interpretation with the critics of Germany, one of whom goes so far as to state that the writer of the Revelation promised the fulfilment of his visions within the space of three years and a half from the time in which he wrote the only prophecy for which in all

Agains the Preristorist view it is urged that the prophecies fulfilled ought to be rendered so perspicuous to the general sense of the Church as to supply an argument against infidelity; that the destruction of Jerusalem, having occurred twenty-five years previously, could not occupy a large space in a prophecy; that the supposed predictions of the downfall of Jerusalem and of Nero appear from the context to refer to one event, but are by this scheme separated, and, moreover, placed in a wrong order; that the measuring of the Temple and the publishing of the death of the priests (Revel. xxi), cannot be explained consistently with the context.

(2.) The Futurist expositors, whose views show a strong reaction against some extravagances of the preceding school. They believe that the whole book, excepting perhaps the first three chapters, refers principally, if not exclusively, to events which are yet to come. This view, which is asserted to be merely a revival of the primitive interpretation, has been advocated in recent times by Dr. J. H. Todd, Dr. S. R. Maitland, B. Newton, C. Maitland, I. Williams, De Burgh, and others.

Against the Futurist it is argued that it is not consistent with the repeated declarations of a speedy fulfilment at the beginning and end of the book itself (see i, 8; xxii, 6, 7, 12, 20). Christians, to whom it was originally addressed, would have derived no special comfort from it had its fulfilment been altogether deferred for so many centuries. The rigidly literal interpretation of Babylon, the Jewish tribes, and other symbols which generally forms a part of Futurist schemes, presents peculiar difficulties.

(3.) The Historical or Continuous expositors, in whose opinion the Revelation is a progressive history of the fortunes of the Church from the first century to the end of time. The chief supporters of this most interesting interpretation are Mele, Sir I. Newton, Vitingga, Bennel, Woodhouse, Faber, E. B. Elliott, Wordsworth, Heng-stemberg, Ebrard, and others. The recent Commentarv of John Alford belongs mainly to this school.

Against the historical scheme it is urged that its advocates differ very widely among themselves; that they assume without any argument that the events of the first three chapters are so many years; that several of its applications—e. g. of the symbol of the ten-horned beast to the popes, and the sixth seal to the conversion of Constantine—are inconsistent with the context; that attempts by this school to predict future events by the help of Revelation have been, in repeated instances, disproved.

Two methods have been proposed by which the sta-
The Revelation may escape the incongruities and fallacies of the different interpretations while he may derive edification from whatever truth they contain. It has been suggested that the book may be regarded as a prophetic poem, dealing in general and inexact descriptions, much of which is set down as poetical imagery—mere embellishment. But such a view would be difficult to reconcile with the belief that the book is an inspired prophecy. A better suggestion is made, or rather is revived, by Dr. Arnold in his sermons On the Interpretation of Prophecy: that we should bear in mind that predictions have a lower historical sense, as well as a higher spiritual sense; and that there may be one, no more than one, typical, imperfect, historical fulfillment of a prophecy, in each of which the higher spiritual fulfillment is shadowed forth more or less distinctly. See Double Sense.

In choosing among the various schemes of interpretation, we are inclined to adopt that which regards the first series of prophetic visions proper (ch. iv.—xii.) as indicating the collapse (in part at the time already transpired) of the nearest persecuting power, namely, Judaism; the second series (ch. xiii.—xix.) as denoting the ultimate triumph: the success of the persecutor, i.e. Rome (first in its pagan and next in its papal form); and the third series (xx., 1—10) as briefly outlining the final overthrow of a last persecutor, some yet future power or influence (figuratively represented by a name borne to the earth). The most prominent opponents of Christianity are set forth as successive developments of Antichrist, and the symbols employed are cumulative and reiterative rather than historical and consecutive. For special explanations, see Antichrist; Magog; Number of the Beast, etc.

VI. Commentaries. Most of the above questions are treated in the regular commentaries and introductions, and in numerous monographs, published separately or in periodicals. The following are the exegetical helps solely on the whole book; to the most important we prefix an asterisk: St. Anthony, Expositio (in Opp. p. 645); Victorinus, Scholia (in Bibl. Max. Patr. iii., 414; Galland, Bibl. Patr. iv., 49; also Par. 1549, 1609, 8vo); Berengaud, Expositio (in Ambrosii Opp. ii., 499); Trichonius, Expositio (in Augustini Opp. xvi., 617); Primiuis, Commentarius (in Bibl. Max. REVELATIONS, SPURIOUS. The Apocalyptic character, which is occupied in describing the future splendor of the Messianic kingdom and its historical relations, presents itself for the first time in the book of Daniel, which is thus characterizedly distinguished from the former prophetic books. In the only prophetic book of the New Test., the Apocalypse of John, this idea is fully developed, and the several apocalyptic revelations are mere imitations, more or less happy, of these two canonical books, which furnished ideas to a numerous class of spurious and spurious Christian Church.

We here consider those especially which profess to be of a prophetic character. The principal spurious revelations extant have been published by Fabricius, in his Cod. Pseudep. V. T. et Cod. Apoc. N.T., and their character has been still more critically examined in recent times by bishopshawn (who has added to their number), by Nitzsch, Bleek, and others, and especially by Dr. Liceke, in his Einleit. in die Offenbarung Johan. und die gesammte apokryphische Literatur. (See the preceding article.) Tischendorf, in his Apocolypses Apocryphae Lips. 1863, 8vo, follows path path by the following:

"Apocalypsis Mariae" (Gr. ed. princeps); "Apocalypsis Eusei" (Gr. ed. princeps); "Apocalypsis Pauli" (Gr. ed. princeps); "Apocalypsis Johannae" (Gr. ed. princeps); "Johannis Liber de Dominatione Mariae" (Gr. ed. princeps); "Translatio Mariae" (Lat. ed. princeps); "Another Translatio Mariae" (Lat.); "Ad dimenta ad Acta Apost. Apocrypha." "Ad Acta Andrea et Matthaei, ex codice uncial." "Ad Acta Philippi, ex cod. Parisiensis et Barocci." "Ad Acta Theoum, e cod. Monrealian et Bodleian." "Acta Petri et Andreae, in fine mutila, e cod. Barocci." In the account below we have brought together the most important of these apocryphal works. 1. Pseudo-Rightful Purporting to Refer to Hebrew Character.—These are principally the following:

1. 2. The Apocalypse of Adam and that of Abraham are cited by Epiphanius (Hier. xxxi. 8) as Gnostic productions. They are now wholly lost.

3. The Book of Enoch is one of the most curious of the spurious revelations, resembling in its outward form both the book of Daniel and the Apocalypse; but it is uncertain whether this latter work or the book of Enoch was first written. See Enoch, Book of.

4. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs is a similar apocryphal production. See Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs.

5. The Apocalypse of Moses, mentioned by Syncellus (Chronog.) and Ceddrenus (Comp. Hist.), fragments of which have been published by Fabricius (ibid. supra), is conjectured by Croiset to have been a forgery of one of the ancient Christians.

In addition to this and the above work published by Tischendorf, there has lately been discovered an "Asscension" or "Assumption (Aṣṣūmq) of Moses," in the library at Munich, written in Arabic (Monumenta Sacra [Mediol. 1861]; Hilgenfeld (N. T. extra Canones [Lips. 1866]; Volkmar (Handb. z. d. Apokr. [Leips. 1867, vol. iii]); and Merx (Archiv f. wis. Exegetik, etc. [ibid. 1867, vol. ii]). It represents an interview between Moses and Joshua just before the death of the former, and professes to depict the future history of Israel. It seems to have been written by a Jew of the early Christian times (Ewald, Jahrbücher, 1852, 1853). See Moses.

These are different works from the so-called "Little Genesis." See Jubilees, Book of.

6. The Ascension and Vision of Isaiah (Avētēyēk kai ὁ Προφήτης Ἰσαάκ), although for a long time lost to the world, was a work well known to the ancients, as is indicated by the allusions in Justin Martyr, Origen, Tertullian, and Epiphanius. The first of these writers (Diol. c. Tryph. ed. Paris, p. 349) refers to the account therein contained of the death of Isaiah, who "was seen asunder with a wooden saw—a fact," he adds, "which was removed by the Jews from the sacred text." Tertullian, also (Adversus Marcionem), among other examples of the Scripture, refers to the same event, and in the next (the 8d) century Origen (Epist. ad Africam), after stating that the Jews were accustomed to remove many things from the knowledge of the people which they nevertheless preserved in apocryphal or secret writings, adds as an example the death of Isaiah, "who was seen asunder, as stated in a certain apocryphal writing, which the Jews perhaps corrupted in order to throw discredit on the whole." In his Comm. on Matt. he refers to the same events, observing that if this apocryphal work is not genuine, the account of the prophet's martyrdom, it should be believed upon the testimony borne to that work by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. xi, 37); in the same manner as the account of the death of Zachariah should be credited upon the testimony borne by our Saviour to a writing not found in the common and published books (coiσιν καί διανομωσιν βιβλίων), but probably in an apocryphal work. Origen cites a passage from the apocryphal account of the martyrdom of Isaiah in one of his Homilies (ed. De La Rue, iii, 108). The Apocalypse of the Zealots contains in alphabetical order the books of Moses, Enoch, Adam, and Isaiah as writings of some antiquity.

The first writer, however, who mentions the Ascension of Isaiah by name is Epiphanius, in the 4th century, who observes (Hier. xi. 7) that the apocryphal As occasion of Isaiah was adduced by the Archonites in support of their opinions respecting the seven heavens and the seven angels, and the seven rays of the Egyptian Hieroclus and his followers in confirmation of their heretical opinions respecting the Holy Spirit; at the same time citing the passage from the "Evangelikon" to which they refer (Ascens. of Isaiah ix, 27, 32–36; xi, 82, 83). Jerome also (in Serm. Levis, 4) expressly names the work, asserting it to be an apocryphal production originating in a passage in the New Test. (1 Cor. ii, 9).
St. Ambrose (Opp. ii, 1121) cites a passage contained in it, but only as a traditionary report, "plerique ferunt (Ascens. of Isaiah) v. 4–8; and that of the "Imi-udo for Work Matthew," a work of the 5th century. erroneously attributed to St. Chrysostom (Chrysostom. Op-pos. I), evidently cites a passage from the same work (Ascens. of Isaiah i, 1, etc.). After this period all trace of the book is lost until the 11th century, when Euthymus Zygabenus informs us that the Messalian heretics made use of that "abominable epigraphical work the Vision of Isaiah." It was also used (most probably in a Latin version) by the Cathari in the West (P. Mo-Isaiah was long regarded as canonical and Apocryphal books in a Paris MS. (No. 1789), after the Quast. et Resp. of Anastasius (Cotelerius, P. I. Apotyp. i, 247, 349). Sixtus of Syria (Hed. Sac. 1566) states that the Vision of Isaiah, as distinct from the "Antinonie" as he calls it, had been printed at Venice. Referring to this fact, his last editor, Laurence observes that he had hoped to find in some bibliographical work a further notice of it, but that he had searched in vain; concluding, at the same time, that it must have been a publication extracted from the Ascension of Isai-ach or a Latin translation of the Vision, as the title of it given by Sixtus was "Visio Admirabilis Evanist Prophete
in Sapta Manita, que Divinae Trinitatis Arcana et Lapsi Generis Hominianem Redemtionem contineat." Dr. Laurence observes also that the mode of Isaiah's death is further in accordance with a Jewish tradition recorded in the Talmud (Yoma, iv); and he supposes that Mohammed may have founded his own journey through seven different heavens on this same apocryphal work.
He shows, at the same time, by an extract from the Ro-beth, that the same idea of the precise number of seven heavens accorded with the Jewish creed, is engraved on the fourth (called in the Ethiopic the first) book of Edoras. It is entitled the Ascension of the Prophet Isai-ach, the first chapters containing the martyrdom, and the rest (for it is divided in the MS. into chapters and verses) the Ascension, or Vision, of Isaiah. At the end of the canonical book are the words, "Here ends the prophet Isaiah;" after which follows the Ascension, etc.; concluding with the words, "Here ends Isaiah the prophet with his Ascension." Then follows a post-scriptum, from which it appears that it was transcribed for a priest named Aaron, at the cost of a piece of fine cloth twelve measures long and four broad. The Ascension of Isaiah was published by Dr. Laurence at Oxford in 1819, with a new Latin and an English version. This discovery was first applied to the illustration of Scripture by Iseniuni (Com. on Levan). Some time afterwards the indefatigable Dr. Angelo Mai (Nora Col-two Latin fragments as an appendix to his sermon, Arien. Fragments. Aparentia, which he conjectured to be portions of apocryphal Isaiah. Niebuhr, however, took possession of these fragments. The Ascension and Vision of Isaiah; and Dr. Nitzsch (Nachweisung zweier Bruchstücke, etc., in the Theolog. Stud. und Kritik 1830) was enabled to compare them with the two corresponding portions (ii. 14–15, 12; vii. 1–19) of the Ethiopic version. Finally, in consequence of the more complete and accurate study of the Greek text of the Latin version given by Panzer (Annt. Typog. viii, 473), Dr. Gieseler had a strict search made for it, which was eventually crowned with success, a copy being discovered in the library at Munich. This work, the date of whose impression was 1592, contained also the "Con-mille de Nicodemus et the Letter of Lentulus to the Eoman Senate." The Latin version contains the Vision only, corresponding to the last chapters of the Ethiopic version.

The subject of the first part is the martyrdom of Isai-ach, who is here said to have been sawn asunder in consequence of the visions which he related to Hezekiah, in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of that monarch, different from those in the canonical book. These relate principally to the coming of "Jesus Christ the Lord" from the seventh heaven; he being changed into the form of a man; the preaching of his twelve apostles; his final rejection and suspension on a tree, in company with the workers of iniquity, on the day before the Sabbath; the spread of the Christian doctrine, the last judgment; and his return to the character of the Messiah. Before this, however, the arch-fiend Belial is to descend on earth in the form of an impious monarch, the murderer of his mother, where, after his image is worshipped in every city for three years seven months and twenty-seven days, he and his powers are to be dragged into hell, etc.

The second portion of the work gives a prolix account of the prophet's ascent through seven heavens, each more resplendent and more glorious than the other.
It contains distinct prophetical allusions to the miraculous birth of Christ of the Virgin Mary at Bethlehem; his crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension; and the worship of "the Father, his beloved Christ, and the Holy Spirit." The mode of the prophet's own death is also announced to him. "The whole work," observes its learned translator, "is singularly characterized by simplicity of narration, by occasional sublimity of description, and by richness as well as vigor of imagination." Dr. Laurence conceives that the writer had no design of imposing upon the world a spurious production of his own as that of the prophet, but rather of composing a work, aw-rivably fictitious, but accommodated to the character and consistent with the prophecies of him to whom it is ascribed.

As to the age of this work, Dr. Laurence supposes, from the obvious reference to Nero and the period of three years seven months and twenty-seven days, and again of the ascension of Isaiah and Belial in the year which Berii was to be dragged to Gehenna, that the work was written after the death of Nero (which took place on June 9, A.D. 68), but before the close of the year 69. Lübeck, however (Einleistung), looks upon these numbers as purely arbitrary; and as translated,
and maintains that the dogmatical character of the work, the allusion to the corruptions of the Church, the absence of all reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the Chiliasm view, all point to a later period.
All that can be considered as certain respecting its date is that the first portion was extant before the time of Origen and the whole before Epiphanius. It has been doubted whether the work does not consist of two independent productions, which were afterwards united into one, as in the Ethiopic version; but this is a question impossible to decide in the absence of the original. The Latin fragments discovered by Mai correspond literally with the Ethiopic; while they not only differ from the Venetian edition in single phrases, but the latter contains passages so striking as to induce the supposition that it is derived from a later recension of the original text.

The author was evidently a Jewish Christian, as apppears from the use made of the Talmudical legend already referred to, as well as by his representing the false acquiescer of Isaiah as a Samaritan. The work also abounds in Gnostic, Valentinian, and Ophitic notions, such as the account of the seven heavens and the presiding angels of the first five, the gradual transmutation of Christ until he comes in the end of the world and finally the docetic conception of his history on earth. All this has induced Lücke (ut sup.) to consider the whole to be a Gnostic production of the 2d or 3d century, of which, however, the martyrdom was first written. Dr. Laurence finds so strong a resemblance between the account of the seven heavens here and in the testament of Levi (Twelve Patriarchs), that he suspects the latter to "be a tray a little plagiarism." If this learned divine were right in his conjecture respecting the early age of this production, it would doubtless afford an additional testimony, if such were wanting, to the antiquity of the belief in the miraculous conception and the proper deity of Jesus, who is here called the Beloved, the Lord, the Lord God, and the Lord Christ. In respect, however, to another passage, in which the Son and Holy Spirit are represented as worshipping God, the learned prelate truly observes that this takes place only in the character of angels, which they had assumed.

Dr. Lücke observes that the drapery only of the apocalyptic element of this work is Jewish, the internal character being altogether Christian. But in both form and substance there is an evident imitation, if not of the Apocalypse of St. John, at least of the book of Daniel and of the Sibylline oracles. The use of the canonical Apocalypse Lücke (op. cit. § 16) considers to be undeniable in vii, 45. Comp. Rev. vii, 21–23; xix, 10; xxii, 8, 9. See Isaiah.

7. The Epistle of Baruch is given as the "First Book of Baruch" in the Paris and London Polyglota in Syriac and Latin, the "Second Book of Baruch" being there what is commonly known as the apocryphal book of Baruch. This letter is also contained in the Syriac "Apocrypha" under the title of "Baruch," yet is not given among the books of the Bible in that title. It is a discourse to the people of Israel, written by Jeremiah, and addressed to the king. It is a warning and exhortation to the people to repent and return to the Lord. It is a prophecy of the future, and a record of the past. It is a history of the people of Israel, and a record of their sins and their sufferings. It is a prediction of the future, and a record of the past. It is a history of the people of Israel, and a record of their sins and their sufferings.

(I. The Design of this Epistle is to comfort the nine tribes and a half who were beyond the river Euphrates, by assuring them that the sufferings which they have to endure in their captivity, and which are far less than they deserve, are but for a season, and are intended to stone for their sins; and that God, whose love towards them is unchangeable, will speedily deliver them from their troubles and requite their oppressors. They are therefore not to be distracted by the prosperity of their wicked enemies, but to move on, but to observe the better Moses, and look forward to the day of judgment, when all that is now perplexing will be rectified.

(II. The Method or Plan which the writer adopted to carry out the design of this epistle will be best seen from an outline of its contents. Being convinced of the unchangeable love of God towards his people (1, 2) and of the close attachment subsisting between all the tribes (var. 8), Baruch feels constrained to write this epistle before he dies (var. 4) to comfort his captive brethren (amidst the sufferings of var. 6), which are far less than they deserve (var. 6), and are designed to stone for (var. 7, 8), as well as to wean them from their sins (var. 9), so that God might gather them together again. Baruch then informs them, first of all, that Zion has been delivered to Nebuchadnezzar because of the sins of the children of Israel (var. 11, 12). That the enemy, however, might not boast that he had destroyed the sanctuary of the Most High by the strength of his own arm, God sent angels from heaven to destroy the forts and walls, and also to hide some of the vessels of the temple of Jerusalem (var. 10–16); when upon the enemy carried the Jews as captives to Babylon, and left only few in Zion (var. 17), this being the burden of the epistle (var. 18, 19). But they are to be comforted (var. 20), for while he was mourning over Zion and praying for mercy (var. 21), one angel said to Baruch that he might comfort his brethren, which is the cause of his writing this epistle (var. 22, 24).
the day of judgment which is close at hand (i, 87-41), and the frequent reference to a future life. Ewald (Gesch. Isr. iv, 233) and Fritzsche (Keret. Handb. zu den Apokr. i, 175) contemptuously dismiss it in a few lines, and most unjustly regard it as written "in a profane and senseless style" by a woman. Besides the London manuscript, which contains a translation in the beautiful edition of the Apocrypha just published (Liberi Vetus Testamenti Apocrypha Syriaca, recogn. Paul. Anton. de Lagarde, Lond, 1861), and the Latin may be found in Fabricii Cod. Pseudoepigraph. V. T. ii, 147 sq. See also Barouch, 8.

The Apocrypha of Baruch was discovered in a Syrian manuscript, judged by Cureton to belong to the 6th century, and was first published by Cerrain in 1866 in a close Latin translation (Mon. Sac. et Prof. i, ii, 73-90), and in 1871 in the original Syriac (ibid. v, ii). The last few chapters, however, had long been known as the "Epistle of Baruch" noticed above.

(L) Contents.—The composer of this work has, like the author of the book of Baruch in the ordinary Apocrypha of the Old Test., chosen as the fictitious writer of the received and apostolic writings of Jeremiah. The scene is laid in or near Jerusalem; and the supposed time is that immediately preceding and following the destruction of the city and the transportation of the people to Babylon. The author professes to give to the world a new book, and makes it clear that those who shall subscribe to it, or who shall be worthy to live in that time, shall be a blessing to the world. The book contains many prophecies of future events, and has a Messianic character.

The work divides itself into seven parts, if we treat the letter to the nine and a half tribes as a kind of appendix. Baruch is throughout represented as the speaker, referring to himself in the first person. It is a new and independent work, and opens in the opening of ch. i and lxxviii, which are of the nature of a title.

The first part (ch. i-ix) opens by telling how the Word of the Lord came to Baruch, and warned him of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Babylonians. He was not told of the future glory of Zion, and prophesies vengeance against the victorious land now so prosperous. Having thus given vent to his grief, he again fasts for seven days.

In the second part (ch. x-xii) Jeremiah is sent to Babylon, but Baruch is told to remain amid the desolation of Zion, that God may show him what will come to pass at the end of days. So Baruch sits by the gates of the Temple and utters a lamentation over the fate of Zion, and prophesies vengeance against the victorious land now so prosperous. Having thus given vent to his grief, he again fasts for seven days.

In the third part (ch. xiii-xv) he stands on Mount Zion, and is told that he shall be preserved till the end of times, that he may bear testimony against the nations which oppressed his people. He answers that only few shall survive in those days to hear the word of the Lord, and complains that those who have not walked in vanity like other peoples have derived no advantage from their faithfulness. The Lord answers that the future world was made on account of the just, "for this world is a contest and trouble to them in much labor, and therefore that which is to come is a crown in great glory." In further conversation Baruch is advised not to estimate the blessings of life by its length, and to look upon the corruption of the earth as the beginning. He is then desired to sanctify himself and fast for seven days.

In the fourth part (ch. xvi-xx) he comes from a cave in the valley of Cedron, whither he had withdrawn to the place where God spoke with him before. It is a summary, and he begins to deplore the bitterness of life, and calls upon God to hasten the promised end. In reply he is reminded of his ignorance, and told that the predetermined number of men must be completed, but "that the end is not far distant." Baruch then says that he does not know what will happen to the enemies of his people, or at what time God will visit them. The signs of the last days are accordingly described, and the last time being divided into twelve parts, each with its distinguishing characteristic. These parts, however, are to be mixed together and to minister to one another. The specified signs shall affect the whole earth, and then Messiah will begin to be revealed." A description of the Messianic period follows, on which we need not dwell. With this the conversation terminates, and though the usual fast is not mentioned, the section evidently comes to a close.

In the fifth part (ch. xxxi-xliii) having consolled the people by telling them of the future glory of Zion, he goes and sits upon the ruins of the Temple. While he laments he falls asleep, and has a vision of a vine and a fortress, of which the interpretation is afterwards given to him. The vision relates to the triumph of the Messianic kingdom. Baruch then asks, To whom and to how many shall these things be, or who shall be worthy to live in that time? for many of God's people have thrown away the yoke of the law, but others have left their vanity and fled for refuge under God's wings. God answers this question, and Baruch prays blessings, and to those who despise will be the opposite of this.

Baruch is then commanded to go and instruct the people, and afterwards to fast for seven days, preparatory to further communications.

In the sixth part (ch. xliii-xliv) he calls together his father, his friend Gadeli, and seven of the elders of the people, and tells them that he is going to his fathers, according to the ways of all the earth. He exhorts them not to depart from the law, and promises that they shall see "the consolation of Zion." He goes on to dwell upon the glory of the law, and how the whole world desires them to advise the people, and assures them that, though he must die, "a wise man shall not be wanting to Israel, nor a son of the law to the race of Jacob." He then goes to Hebron, and fasts for seven days.

In the seventh part (ch. xliv-lxxxv) he prays for compassion on this people, the people whom God has chosen, and who are unlike all others. He is told that the time of tribulation must arise, and many of its circumstances are recounted. He deplores such sad consequences that Adam, and inquired if he was informed about the resurrection and its results. At last he falls asleep and has a vision. As this vision (ch. lxxii) and its interpretation (ch. lxxiv), though they bring us to no definite date, throw an interesting light upon the uncertain methods in which history has parcelled out into periods, we may notice them at more length than would otherwise be necessary. A cloud ascended from the great sea, and it was full of white and black waters, and a similitude of lightning appeared at its extremity. It passed quickly on and covered the earth. Afterward he was sent to discharge its rain; but the waters which descended from it were not all alike, for first there were very black waters for a time, and afterwards the waters became bright, but of these there were not many. Black waters succeeded and again gave place to bright, and no other for twelve times; but the black waters were always more than the bright. At the end of the cloud it rained black waters, and these were darker than all that had been before, and fire was mingled with them, and they brought corruption and ruin. Afterward he saw the lightning which he had seen in the extremity of the cloud flashed so that it illuminated the whole earth, and it healed those regions where the last waters had descended. After this twelve rivers ascended from the sea and surrounded that lightning, and were made subject to it. At this point Baruch awoke through fear. In answer to his prayer for the interpretation of the vision, the angel Ramiel was sent to satisfy his request. The cloud symbolized the "angel of the waters". The four black waters were the sin of Adam, with its consequences, including the fall of the angels and the flood. The second—the bright waters—were Abraham and his descendants, and those who were like them. The third (black) waters were the mixture of all the sin-water after the death of those just prior to the entry of the land of Egypt. The fourth (bright) waters were the advent of Moses, Aaron, Miriam, Joshua, Caleb, and all who were like them, in whose time "the lamp of the eternal law shone upon all who were sitting in darkness." The fifth (black) waters were the punishment of the world, and the sins of the Israelites in the days of the judges. The sixth (bright) waters were the time of David and Solomon. The seventh (black) waters were the perversion of Jeroboam, and the sins of his successors, and the time of the captivity of the nine and a half tribes. The eighth (bright) waters were the righteousness of Hezekiah. The ninth (black) waters were the universal impurity in the days of Manasseh. The tenth (bright) waters were the purity of the generations of Josiah. The eleventh (black) waters were the calamity which had just happened to Babylon. The rest of the interpretation is, of course, given in the future tense.

As for the twelfth (bright) waters which thou hast seen, this is the world. For the time shall come after these things when thy people shall fall into calamity, so as to be in danger of all sorts. But nevertheless they shall be saved, and their enemies shall fall before them. And they shall for some time have much joy. And in that time, after a little, Zion shall be again built, and its inhabitants shall be again established, and the priests shall return to their ministry, and the nations shall again come to glorify it, but nevertheless not fully, as in the beginning. But it shall come to pass after these things that there shall be the ruin of many nations. These are the bright waters which thou hast seen. The other waters, which were blacker than all the rest, after the twelfth, belonged to the whole world, and they represented times of trouble and conflict, which are described at some length; and all who survived these should be delivered into the hands of the Messiah. These last black waters are, in the interpretation, succeeded simply by bright waters representing the blessedness of the Messianic time. Baruch, having heard the words of the angel, expressed his wonder at the goodness of God. He is informed that, though he must depart from the earth, he shall not die. But before his removal he must go and instruct the people.

We learn (ch. lxvii) how Baruch went to the people and admonished them to be faithful, holding out hopes that their brethren might return from the captivity. The people promised to remember the good that God had done to them, and requested him to write a letter before his departure to their brethren in Babylon. He promised to do so, and send the epistle by the hands of men, and also to forward a letter to the nine and a half tribes by means of a bird. Accordingly, he sat alone under an oak and wrote two letters. One he sent by three men to Babylon, but the tribes beyond the Euphrates by an eagle which he called. He charged the eagle not to pause till he reached his destination, and, to encourage him, reminded him of Noah's dove, of Elijah's ravens, and how "Solomon, in the time of his reign, whithersoever he wished to send or to seek anything, commanded a bird, and it obeyed him as he had commanded it." Then the letter is subjoined (ch. lxviii—lxix.). It consists of a general exhortation to the captive tribes to be faithful, in the hope of being soon restored to a happier lot. The last (lxix-xlvii) relates how he wrote how he finished and sealed the letter, tied it to the eagle's neck, and despatched it.

In the ancient Latin chiasmus in Cotelarius (Apostolic Fathers), the Apocalypse of St. Peter is said to contain 2070 stichs, and that of John 1290. It is cited as an apocryphal book in the Indicales Scripturorum after the Quaestiones of Anastasius of Nicara, together with the Apocalypse of Ezechias and that of Paul. There is in the Bodleian Library a MS. of an Arabic Apocalypse of St. Peter, of which Nicoll has furnished an extract in his catalogue, and which may possibly be a translation of the Greek book. It is not mutilated and sealed.

The Apocalypse of St. Paul is mentioned by Augustine (Tract. 98 in Ev. Joan), who asserts that it abounds in fables, and was an invention to which occasion was furnished by 2 Cor. xii, 2-4. This appears from Epiphanius (Harv. xxxviii, 2) to have been an anti-Jewish Gnostic production, and to be identical with the 'Anabasei of Paul, used only by the anti-Jewish sect of Gnostics called Caínites. It is said by Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., vii, 19) to have been held in great esteem. It was also known to Theophylact and Eusebius (on 2 Cor. iv. 4) and is mentioned in the Nicene Council (Cod. Th. ii, 354) and Grabe (Spicileg., i, 65). The Revelation of St. Paul, contained in an Oxford MS., is shown by Grabe (loc. cit.) to be a much later work. Theodosius of Alexandria (Epigr. episc. prope Constantinop., ii) says that the Apocalypse of St. Paul is not a work of the apostle, but of Paul of Samosata, from whom the Paulicians derived their name. The Revelation of St. Paul is one of the spurious works condemned by pope Gelasius, together with the Revelations of St. Thomas and St. Stephen.

3. There was an apocryphal Revelation of St. John extant in the time of Theodosius the Grammarian, the only one of the ancients who mentions it, and who calls it a pseudo-apostolic book. It was called what has become of it, until the identical work was recently published, from a Vatican as well as a Vienna manuscript, by Birch, in his Acta Sanctorum, under the title of "The Apocalypse of the Holy Apostle and Evangelist John the Divine." From the silence of the ancients respecting this work, it could scarcely have been written before the 3d or 4th century. Lücke has pointed out other internal marks of a later age, as, for instance, the mention of incense, which he observes first came into use in the Christian Church after the 4th century (although here the author of the spurious book may have taken his idea from Rev. v, 8; viii, 3); also of images and rich crosses, which were not in use before the "4th and 5th centuries." The name patriarch, applied here to a dignitary in the Church, belongs to the same age. The time in which Theodosius himself lived is not certain, but he cannot be placed earlier than the 5th century, which Lücke conceives to be the most probable age of the work itself. Regarding the object and occasion of the work (which is a rather servile imitation of the genuine Apocalypse), in consequence of the absence of dates and of internal characteristics, there are no certain indications. Birch's text, as well as his manuscripts, abounds in errors; but Thilo has collated two Paris manuscripts for his intended edition (see his Acta Thomæ, Proleg., p. lxxxiii). Assemani (Bibl. Orient. III, 1, 262) states that there is a manuscript of it preserved in MSS.

III. Pseudo-Revelations bearing Extraordinary Names.

—Of these the following deserve special notice:

1. The Prophecies of Hysaspes were in use among the Christians in the 2d century. This was apparently a pagan production, but is cited by Justin Martyr, in his Apology, as agreeing with the Sybarine oracles in predicting the destruction of the world by fire. Clemens Alexander (Strom. vii) and Lactantius (Instit, vii, 15) also cite passages from these prophecies, which bear a decidedly Christian character.

2. The collection entitled the Shepherd of Hermas is not without its apocalyptic elements. These, however, are confined to book i, 8, 4; but they are destitute of significance or originality. See Hermas.

3. The Apocalypse of Christiùs is mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., ii, 38), and by Theodoret (Pud. Heli. iii, 3). Eusebius describes it as a revelation of an earthly and sensual kingdom of Christ, according to the heresy of the Chiliasm. Of the Revelations of St. Thomas and St. Stephen, we know nothing beyond their consideration as apocryphal. St. Augustin of Sienna observes that, according to Serapion, they were held in high repute by the Manichæans; but in the works of Serapion which we now possess there is no allusion to this. There is, however, an unpublished MS. of Serapion in the Hamburg Library, which is supposed to contain a more complete copy of his work. See Cas- trius.

4. The Sibylline Oracles is the title of an apocryphal work, evidently of Christian origin, of the early centuries of our era, written as a sort of parody on the famous Roman traditional books of that name. See Sibyl- line Oracle.

Revenge (vexāre, iecideri) means the return of injury for injury, or the infliction of pain on another in consequence of an injury received from him further than the just ends of reparation or punishment require. Revenge differs materially from resentment, which rises in the mind immediately on being injured; but revenge is a cool and deliberate wickedness, and is often engaged years after the offence is given. Revenge is considered as a perversion of anger. Anger, it is said, is a passion given to man for wise and proper purposes, but revenge is the corruption of anger, is unnatural, and therefore ought to be suppressed. It is observable that the proper object of anger is vice; but the object, in general, of revenge, is man. It transfers the hatred due to the vice to the man, to whom it is not due. It is forbidden by the Scriptures, and is unbecoming the character and spirit of a peaceful follower of Jesus Christ. See Anger.

Revelations of the Church. It is clearly taught in the New Test. that it is the duty of Christians to give temporal sustenance to their clergy. The Church was laid down by our Lord (Luke x, 7) that the laborer is worthy of his hire. Paul says, "Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel" (1 Cor. xix, 14). The following passages treat of the relation which subsists between the minis- ters and the Church in this respect: Acts xviii, 3; xxiv, 17; 2 Cor. xi, 7; 8, xii, 18; Phil. iv, 16-18; 1 Tim. vi, 3; Titus i, 11. So we see that the Church is bound to provide for the maintenance of its pastors; but, at the same time, the pastors are bound to make no unnecessary demands upon the Church. These principles were carried out in the apostolic times and subsequently. Fixed stipends were not paid in early times, because the Church did not possess property, and therefore the contributions were voluntary. These voluntary offerings were of two sorts: 1. The weekly or daily ob- lations that were made at the altar; 2. The monthly ob- lations that were cast into the treasury of the Church. And then arose the custom of dividing up the monthly contribution and paying the clergy their share, according to the rule: "One out of every two of the members of the Church pay a half to the clergy, as are arose annually from the lands and possessions given to the Church, which were greatly increased in the time of Constantine, who authorized the bequeathing of prop- erty to the Church. A third source of revenue was the granting to the clergy an allowance out of the public money. Constantine both gave the clergy particular larg- esses, as their occasion required, and also settled upon them a standing allowance out of the exchequer. A fourth source of revenue was the estates of martyrs and confessors dying without heirs, which were settled upon the Church by Constantine. Still later rulers (Theodosius the younger and Valentinian III) settled upon the Church the estates of clergymen dying without heirs. Besides these sources of revenue, there were others, such as the donation of heathen temples and sometimes their revenues, heretical conventicles and the revenues of temporal clergy of heretics and monks who became seculars again. Great care, however, at first was taken not to receive estates donated to the Church to the great detriment of others. Respecting the ancient way of managing and distributing these revenues, we may re- member that the revenues of the whole diocese were in the hands of the bishop, and by his care distributed among the clergy. As a safeguard against mismanagement, he was obliged to give an account of his administration in a provincial synod; after a while this rule obtained in the Western Church. The division was usually into three or four parts—one to the bishop, a second to the rest of the clergy, a third to the poor, and a fourth to the necessary uses of the Church. Suspension from participation in the revenues was one method of punishment, and in some cases, according to the clergy. See Bingham, Christ. Antig. bk. v, ch. vi, p. 1-6.

Reverence (usually some form of σεβασμός, φοβίζω, to fear), a respectful, submissive disposition of mind arising from affection and esteem, from a sense of superiority in the person revered. Hence children reverence their fathers even when their fathers correct them by stripes (Heb. xii, 9); hence subjects reverence their sovereign (2 Sam. ix, 6); hence wives reverence their husbands (Eph. v, 33); and hence all ought to reverence God. We reverence the name of God, the house of God, the worship of God, etc.; we reverence the attributes of God, the commands, dispensations, etc., of God; and we ought to demonstrate our reverence by overt acts, such as are suitable and becoming to time, place, and circumstances. For though a man may reverence God in his heart, yet unless he behave reverentially and give proofs of his reverence by demeanor, conduct, and obedience, he will not easily persuade his fellow-mortals that his bosom is the residence of this divine and heavenly disposition; for, in fact, reverence for God is not one of those lights which burn under a bushel, but one of those whose spirtually lustre illuminates wherever it is admired. Reverence is, strictly speaking, perhaps the internal disposition of the mind, φόβος (Rom. xii, 7); and honor, ὑπαρξία, the external expression of this disposition.

Reverend, a title prefixed by courtesy to the name of any clergyman, though "clerk" (clericus) is the legal and strictly proper description of clergyman, and is, in official documents, placed after (as "Reverend" is before) their names.

In the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal and Roman Catholic churches the title is given to ecclesiastics of the second and third orders, the bishops being styled "right reverend." In some churches ordained abbesses and priresses are called "reverend mothers."

Revision of the Bible. See Authorized Version.

Revivals of Religion, a phrase commonly used to indicate renewed interest in religious subjects, or a period of religious awakening. It comes from revive (Latin rerenere), to arise again, and is often improperly applied to excitations which can hardly be called religious, because they do not apprehend, or propose to revive, the real, inner, spiritual life of the soul, which alone constitutes true religion. Setting out with erroneous views, and an effort to effect a work before he can see the excitations necessarily fall short of its accomplishment.

These words are also used to denote the conversion of sinners as well as the quickening of believers. This arises from the fact that the two events are generally (not always) coincident. Sinners, who withstand God himself, may resist the Church in her best estate; and they are sometimes converted when the Church, as a body, is spiritually asleep. Yet such is the influence of spiritual life, and such the usual sanction given by the Holy Ghost to its loving endeavors to save men, that a real revival of the Church leads directly to the conversion of others. Therefore "a revival is simply an increase of the best desires, affections, and exertions of persons who are already pious and benevolent, such an increase as, by the blessing of Heaven, awakens in the ungodly an anxiety for their salvation. . . . When these events are accompanied by a general repentence, and the conviction of God that they are unequivocally manifested anywhere, it is too late for an impartial observer to doubt that a genuine revival of religion has there commenced." To understand this subject in its bearings upon the different classes to be mentioned, we must examine the effects of the various acts of religion itself; the means of its attainment and abatement, and the evidences by which it is distinguished. These points, with some others necessarily involved, are indicated by the following propositions.

1. That all men reawakened by the grace of God are sinners. Paul represents them as dead in trespasses and in sins, and in conformity with the law of the world, according to the prince of the power of the air, having their conversation in the lusts of the flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and as by nature children of wrath.

2. This being their condition—corrupt in heart and disobedient in practice—they need two important works effected in and for them; namely, the pardon of all their sins, exempting them from the penalty of the law, and the renewal of their souls in righteousness, conforming them to the image of God, and thus fitting them to do his will from the heart here, and enjoy the holiness of heaven hereafter.

3. That the atonement of Christ provided for just these results, as may be seen by the following announcements: "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1 John i, 9). "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God" (1 Cor. vi, 11).

And to show the absolute necessity of this double work, the Lord Jesus said, "Behold, the hour is coming, in which all things that are written of the law and the prophets shall be fulfilled." He, therefore, cannot see the kingdom of God" (John iii, 3). Revivals which aim at anything short of this are not revivals of religion in the proper sense of that word. They may arouse the fears of men and improve their habits, but they do not sure in the Gospel sense, nor will their results be satisfactory to the depraved and guilty sinner, or to any spiritual Church.

4. Another important fact to be remembered is, that this is the work of God. He only can forgive sins, or renew the heart. The object of a true revival is, therefore, not to absolve sinners, but to bring them to God; in other words, to persuade them to accept the terms of reconciliation, that he may save them. Pronouncing them converted on their avowing a "desire" or "purpose" to seek the Lord is unauthorized, and exceedingly dangerous. We should instruct and encourage them to wait in the way of duty till God shall do the work, when they will need no absolution from man. Many, it is to be feared, have been misled at this point, to their eternal sorrow. They have been taught to believe that religion is all their own work, a mere change of opinion on their part, and is often improperly applied to excitations which can hardly be called religious, because they do not apprehend, or propose to revive, the real, inner, spiritual life of the soul, which alone constitutes true religion. Setting out with erroneous views, and an effort to effect a work before he can see the excitations necessarily fall short of its accomplishment.

5. When this work is accomplished, it will be verified, first, by the Holy Spirit witnessing to the fact as it witnesses in conviction to the sinner's guilt, condemnation, and danger of the consequences of the opposite; and secondly, by a joy, peace, long suffering, etc., and aversion to former sins and associations. How does an awakened sinner know that he is a sinner? He feels that he is, and this is confirmed by the uniform conflict of his life and temper with the Word of God. How does a real convert know that he is converted? Because he now feels the same assurance in his heart that he is a Christian which he felt before that he was a sinner, and he knows that he is living a life of obedience: whereas, before, he lived in rebellion. He can say from the heart, with Paul, "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, . . . and rejoice in the hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v, 1, 2); and, with John, "We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren" (1 John iii, 14). Converts who stop short of being saved in joyous faith, who have the evidences of the existence of religion itself, the means of its attainment and abatement, and the evidences by which it is distinguished. These moted by the inculation of the fundamental truths of the Gospel, such as human depravity, natural and acquired; the sinfulness of men in rebellion against God, and in refusing to accept of offered mercy; the certainty of their loss of heaven, and the endurance of eternal punishment; the necessity of an atonement for every one who will deny himself, take up his cross, and follow Christ, according to the light that is in and around him; the ability of sinners, by grace, to so repent and believe as to be saved; and the blessedness on earth and in heaven which God will bestow upon all who shall take him as their Saviour; but neglect its claims from worldly considerations. These obstacles need to be neutralized or removed. This can be more successfully done by showing their triviality in comparison with the tremendous interests at stake, and the religion that has thus exploded all heretical sentiments which their hearers would be glad to have true, but in which they have little confidence.

The most effective suggestion that we can make on this point is, perhaps, that the preacher aim to promote the revival of his Church and the conversion of sinners. Those who fail to do so seldom win souls to Christ. Revivals are not produced by such indifference. Says the immortal Richard Baxter to pastors: "If your heart is not set on the end of your labors, and if you do not long to see the conversion and edification of your hearers, and to rejoice in the white robes of the ninety percent of them, you are not likely to have much success. It is a sign of a false, self-seeking heart when a person is contented to be still doing without seeing any fruit of his labor, . . . He never had the right ends of a preacher in view who is indifferent whether he obtains them or not; who is not grieved when he misses them, and rejoices when he can see the desired issue."

With this aim, and a proper understanding of human nature and the Gospel, one will not seriously err in the selection of subjects. Nor will be preach so much about the matter as is proper. Effective preaching has always been characterized by their directness. Said Nathan to David, "Thou art the man;" and Joshua to Israel, "Choose you this day whom you will serve." When Peter preached on the day of Pentecost, "Let the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ," his hearers were "pricked in their hearts, and said, Men and brethren, what shall we do?"

But revivals must not be left alone to preachers, or preaching. Every talent of the Church should be enlisted in all appropriate ways. Testimony as to personal experience is a powerful agency, and should be largely employed in private, and often in public. The same is true of lay instruction, exhortation, and persuasion. When these means fail, the object may be gained by a tract or book. The printed page has won grand fields inaccessible to living agencies, and where these have failed in vain. Prayer is another powerful means of revivals, which often prevails when everything else fails. Their history glows with the wonders of its power: "Oh, the power of prayer!" And in impressive manners. It attracts and softens many who care little for preaching or prayer. It has always been prominent in this work, but never more successful than at the present time.

7. Revivals are necessary from many considerations. First, because, as a matter of fact, most Christians do backslide more or less from their first love. The history of God's ancient people is little more than a consecutive account of their backslidings and recoveries. The apostolic age was clouded by similar defections, and followed by the "Dark Ages." The slumber of that long night was often penetrated by the sweet sleep of the gospel. The voice of Luther was heard from Wittenberg calling for reform. Even the Puritans of New England declined. Says Mr. Tracy, in speaking of their condition at the commencement of the great revival under Edwards, Whitefield, and others, "Such had been the downward degeneration in New England that there were many in the churches, and even some in the ministry, who were yet lingering among the supposed preliminaries to conversion. The difference between the Church and the world was vanishing away, and yet never, perhaps, had the expectation of reaching heaven at last been more general or confident." That revival changed all this for the time, but in less than half a century there was another and relapse. When the Wesleyans and Whitefield awoke to the claims of religion in England, the new birth was a dead letter, and conversions were scarcely known; when. Drinking, gambling, cock-fighting, and every species of popular vice were patronized by the Church and many of the clergy.

In view of these facts, what would have become of religion but for revivals? Had Joshua, and David, and Joseph, and Moses, and Nehemiah, and John, and Jesus, and Peter, and Paul, and John Wesley, and Whitefield, and other revivists, clung to established customs, and opposed innovations, as some did, and as others do now, the name of God would hardly have been preserved from oblivion.

The same tendency is observable in individuals and some churches now. They are in close fellowship with sin and the world, without God, and without any well-grounded hope.

Revivals are also necessary because there is no other cure for the evils to be remedied. Spiritual life can never spring to its full development until the church experiences revivals: reason, common-sense, and history are all against it. We may fill the Church with man-made converts, who have been coaxed into a profession of religion without having the first elements of a Christian character; but that is not God's work, nor is it religious: it is rather an attempt to cover the wolf in sheep's clothing, to be stripped of his false pretense when it is too late to repent and be saved. Nearly all the religion of the ages is attributable to revivals. Every device to supersede their necessity has failed. It may be added with special reference to the American states: the triumph of moral reforms. Experience has taught many that they cannot reform without the grace of God. Such were their habits of licentiousness, profligacy, intemperance, fraud, sinful amusements, etc., that all attempts at reform were fruitless until they came to God for salvation. They then found deliverance, not from the habitation only, but from all disposition to follow it. This is the only solid basis of reform, when bad appetites, passions, and habits are fully established. God only can save in these tailmiles.

8. Revival measures require great courage, zeal, and decision in their leaders to make them most effective. Because, first, they generally encounter opposition from without, and often from professors of religion. It may be silent, but still it is real and hurtful. Sometimes it is the form of friendship, as in the case of Nehemiah and Sanballat, and suggests damaging complications, which require clear perception and invincible firmness. At others it is outspoken and threatening, which is less hurtful. But not unfrequently genuine but misguided friends of the best deserve restraining to prevent their hindering what they fain would help. To do this successfully often requires much decision and tact. But it must be done. A few weak and fanatical people have sometimes been allowed to neutralize the best efforts. But there seems to be little danger from that quarter at the present time. These measures suffer more from spiritual death than from overaction. And yet with some there is much dread of excitement that they may hastily fight the fires of revival for fear of an explosion. These circumstances call for courage to venture. But many who wish well to the cause have no faith in God or man. They cannot see how success is to be achieved, and therefore they hesitate to attempt it. Here is another call for courage. It is going to stop. This is the more faith in the leader, who will do well to review the book of Nehemiah. Then churches sometimes get weary, and want their evenings for rest, business, or recreation, and propose to suspend the meetings. A proper zeal will suggest some little modification of measures, and strike for new achievements. Revivals have been successfully carried on for years under this policy; not so much by holding meetings every evening as by making every meeting, whether regular or extra, to advance the work.

Revoactus was a Christian martyr under Severus, a catechumen of Carthage, and a slave. On the day appointed for his execution, he was led to the amphitheatre, and, having denounced God's judgment upon his persecutors, was ordered to run the gantlet between the hunters. He was then destroyed by wild beasts, A.D. 205.—Fox, Book of Martyrs.

Excommunication. The name given to that change in the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of England which took place when James II had been expelled from the throne in the year 1688, and his son-in-law, William, prince of Orange, was elected by the voice of the people. The immediate occasion of the Revolution was the question of accommodation between James, under the pretence of extending toleration; but the true object of which was to place all the offices of trust in the hands of the papists, whose hopes had been revived by the death of Charles II. Some Protestant Dissenters were imprisoned by this specious pretence; but the sagacity of the bishops justly apprehending the intended consequences, they strenuously contended and petitioned against the proclamation, and alarmed the fears of Protestants throughout the kingdom.

Revolution Settlement. The settlement of the Church of Scotland under William and Mary is so called. It was dictated by policy, and did not restore the platform of 1688, but adopted the ratification of 1592. Its object was to restore peace and order, to put an end to agitation, and by the appearance of moderation to curb extremes, to take away all pretext for violence and sedition. All classes of the people to exhibit a loyal spirit to the new occupants of the British throne.

Rex Christe, factor omnium, is the beginning of a hymn ascribed to Gregory the Great (q. v.).—Luther is said to have pronounced this to be the best hymn. We subjoin the first verse in both Latin and English:

"Rex Christe, factor omnium, Redempi tor et credulitatem,
Pia cote volo supplementum, Clementissim sulcitem,"

"O Christ, our king, Creator, Lord, Saviour of all who trust thy Word,"

To them who seek thee ever near,
Now to our praises bend thine ear."

This is the translation as given in the Lyra Domestica, p. 206. Into German it has been translated by Simrock, in his Lauda Sion Salvatorem, p. 91, "Christ, König, Schöpfer aller Welt;" by Rambach, in his Anthologia, p. 115, "O Christus, König aller Welt;" by Königfeld, in his Heilige Gesänge, p. 72, "Christi, Schöpfer aller Welt," which is also adopted by Biseler, in his Auswahle achtzehnter Gesänge, p. 67, and by Fortlage, in his Gesänge chistlich. Vorzüg., p. 76, "O Christus, Herr der Majestät." Besides these translations, Koch enumerates a number of others (Opp. ii, 74). (B. P.)

Rey, Claude, a French prelate, was born at Aix, Nov. 27, 1713, and in 1800 he concluded his theological studies at the Seminary of St. Sulpice at Paris, and became secretary to the vicar-general. In 1816 he was titular canon of Aix, and prebend in 1821. In consequence of the stand he took concerning the new heads of the State, not considering it necessary to omit mentioning them in the public prayers of the Church, he was obliged to defend his position by a pamphlet. Notwithstanding this controversy, he was made capitular vicar-general, Nov. 24, 1830. In 1831 he was appointed bishop of Dijon. This was the first bishop appointed by Louis-Philippe, whose candidate for the see was held by the high clergy to be illegitimate. The court of Rome hesitated to confirm the appointment, but finally Gregory XVI preconized Rey, and authorized that he should be consecrated by a single bishop, assisted by a dignitary. But such proceedings against the proceeding that for a long time no one would consent to consecrate him. At last the ceremony was performed by the bishop of Carthage. The episcopacy of Rey lasted for six years, and was a constant contest for the rights of his position. A remonstrance was sent from Paris against his exercising public functions, and he was forced to resign. He left Dijon, June 21, 1838, and retired to Aix as canon of the Church of St. Denis, where he died, Aug. 17, 1858. His writings are, Précis pour la Construction d'un Évêché (1808); Précis historique de Notre Dame d' Aix (1816); Ré flexions sur les Affaires Ecclesiastiques du Diocèse de Dijon, etc.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, n. v.

Reyes, Nathan Abbott, a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born at Tolinton, N. H., Dec. 26, 1807. He graduated at Dartmouth College with honors in 1835, and afterwards studied theology at Andover and a Union Theological Seminary. Having been appointed by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions as a missionary to Syria, he sailed for Beirut in 1840. Political and other disturbances, together with his impaired health, induced him to return, which he did, with the approbation of the board, in 1844. He now spent some time in ministerial labor in Charlemont and South Royalton, Mass.; and in the spring of 1847 was called to the pastorate of the German Reformed Church in Lancaster, Pa., in whose service he continued till 1855, when he resigned and took charge of a church in Prince ton, Ill., and after his return to St. George's at Vienne. At the time of the Revolution he embraced the popular ideas, and in 1792 was elected bishop of Isère. During the Reign of Terror he was arrested and kept in close confinement for nearly a year. He took part in the council of 1797, and was charged with publishing its act. In 1802 he signed the formula of retraction required by the pope, and was consecrated bishop of Dijon. During the empire he advocated the cause of Napoleon, which caused his removal by Louis XVIII, but he afterwards returned Reynas, Caximodos de, a Spanish Hebraist, was born at Seville. He embraced the ecclesiastical life, but renounced it upon leaving his native country. He established himself in Frankfort and engaged in business, which he abandoned to take charge of a French congregation of the Jews. From there he went to Amsterdam, and again lived in Frankfort, where he openly avowed his acquaintance in the Confession of Augsburg. It is supposed he was living at Basel when his version of the Scriptures in Spanish was published. In the preface to this work he makes himself appear a Catholic, in order to secure a greater sale for the book. The title is La Biblia, que es los Sacros Libros del V. y N. Testamento, traducida en Espanol (Basel, 1569, 4to). Reyna pretended to have translated directly from the Hebrew, but it is said that he never saw any original except the Latin version and some criticisms, compiled by John Reina, which was prepared by Cyprian de Valera (Amst. 1596). Another work of Reyna is Annnotations in Loca Selecta or Evangelii Joannis (Frankfort, 1573). Reyna died at Frankfort, March 15, 1594. See Antonio, Bibl. Nova Hispana; Leclerc, Bibl. Sacra. - Hoezel, Nouv. Biog. Générale, &c.

Reynolds, Edward, D.D., an English prelate, was born in Southampton, November, 1599. In 1615 he became postmaster of Merton College, and in 1620 probationer fellow. He was made preacher at Lincoln’s Inn, and rector of Braynton, in Nottinghamshire; but in the following year he was deprived by the Presbyterians. In 1643 he was one of the Westminster Assembly divines, and took the covenant. In 1648 he became dean of Christ Church and vice-chancellor of the University of Oxford. He refused the Engagement (1651) and was ejected from his deanship; was vicar of St. Lawrence’s, Jewry, London; restored to his deanship in 1659, and in 1660 was made chaplain to Charles II. In the same year he was elected warden of Merton College, and made bishop of Norwich. He died in July 1667. He published Sermons, Theological Treatises, Meditations, etc.

Reynolds, Joshua (Sir), considered the founder of the English school of painting as regards its special characteristics, was born at Plympton, in Devonshire (where his father was rector), July 16, 1725. He was intended for the medical profession, but was induced by the perusal of Richardson’s Essays on Painting, etc., to take up painting as a profession. A hand-drawn edition of these essays was in 1773 dedicated to Sir Joshua by Richardson’s son, comprising The Theory of Painting, Essay on the Art of Criticism, and The Science of a Connoisseur. Reynolds’s first master was Hudson, the portrait-painter, with whom he was placed in 1741. He first set up as a portrait-painter at Devonport, but in 1746 settled in London, in St. Martin’s Lane. In 1749 he accompanied Commodore Keppel in the Centurion to the Mediterranean, and remained altogether about three years in Italy. He commenced business again in 1754. In 1755, he revived, “recovery of five who had missed the last stage” (ver. 6); that is, he conquered and held possession of the celebrated town of that name at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, which commanded one of the most important lines of trade in the East. Soon after this he was attacked by Tiglath-pileser II, king of Assyria, to whom Ahaz in his distress had made application. His armies were defeated by the Assyrian host; his city besieged and taken; his people carried away captive into Susiana; and he himself slain (ver. 2; comp. Tiglath-pileser’s own inscriptions, where the defeat of Rezin and the destruction of Damascus are distinctly mentioned). This treatment about £80,000, was inherited by his niece, Miss Palmer, who became afterwards marchioness of Thomond. His collection of works of art sold for nearly £17,000. Sir Joshua Reynolds, notwithstanding his careless and feeble drawing, was indisputably a great painter; some of his portraits are among the first masterpieces of the art, whether as character or as face and expression. For instance, Lord Heathfield, in the National Gallery, of the former class, and Mrs. Siddons as the Tragic Muse, at Dulwich, of the latter. His pictures are necessarily very numerous. Their chief excellence is their natural grace, fullness, tenderness of expression, substance, and frequently a charming richness of color and light and shade. Among the most remarkable are The Cardinal and Christian Virtues, Nativity, and Holy Family. Hiselogium cannot be better expressed than in the words of Burke: “He was the first Englishman who added the praise of the elegant arts to the other glories of his country. The loss of no man of his time can be felt with more sincere, general, and unmixed sorrow.” Sir Joshua has bequeathed to posterity, besides his paintings, fifteen elegant and valuable Discourses, of which a magnificent edition, edited by John Burnet, was published by James Carpenter in 1842. A later edition was published (Hudson, O. 1853, 12mo); and his Life and Discourses (N.Y. 1859, 12mo). There is a full Life of Reynolds by Northcote (Lond. 1819, 2 vols. 8vo).

Reya, Manuel de, a Portuguese Jesuit, was taught at Coimbra, and preached with great power and success. He died at Braga, April 21, 1699. His Sermons were printed at Evora (1717-24).

Reseph (Heb. Reseph, אֶשף, a hot stone, as in 1 Kings xix, 6; Sept. Paris, Ραρις, v. r. Ραπίς), one of the places which Sennacherib mentions, in his taunting message to Hezekiah, as having been destroyed by his precessors (2 Kings xvi, 12); Isa. xxix, 15. He couples it with Haran and other well-known Mesopotamian spots. It is supposed to be the same that Prolemy mentions under the name of Rheapoa (Ῥεαπὰ) as a city of Palmyrene (Greg. v, 15); and this, again, is possibly the same with the Rasapho which Abulfeda places at nearly a day’s journey west of the Euphrates. The name is still a common one, Yako’s Lexicon quoting these two and seven other less important towns so called. See Sennacherib.

Resli’ah (Heb. רועי, עָי, delight; Sept. Parash), the third named of three sons of Ulla, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 39). B.C. perhaps cir. 1618.

Rezin (Heb. Retzin; רֶץ, firm, perhaps prince), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Parash, Ρασσοο) A king of Damascus, contemporary with Pekah in Israel, and with Jotham and Ahaz in Judaea. The policy of Rezin seems to have been to ally himself closely with the kingdom of Israel, and thus strengthened, to carry on constant war against the kings of Jotham. He attacked Jotham during the latter part of his reign (2 Kings xv, 37); but his chief war was with Ahaz, whose territories he invaded, in company with Pekah, soon after Ahaz had mounted the throne (B.C. cir. 740). The combined army laid siege to Jerusalem, where Ahaz was, but “could not prevail against it” (Isa. vii, 1; 2 Kings xvi, 5). Rezin, however, recovered Jerusalem, and made Ahaz in his distress, &c. (ver. 6); that is, he conquered and held possession of the celebrated town of that name at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, which commanded one of the most important lines of trade in the East. Soon after this he was attacked by Tiglath-pileser II, king of Assyria, to whom Ahaz in his distress had made application. His armies were defeated by the Assyrian host; his city besieged and taken; his people carried away captive into Susiana; and he himself slain (ver. 2; comp. Tiglath-pileser’s own inscriptions, where the defeat of Rezin and the destruction of Damascus are distinctly mentioned). This treatment was probably owing to his being regarded as a rebel, since Damascus had been taken and laid under tribute by the Assyrians some time previously (Rawlinson, Herodotus, i. 467).

2. The head of one of the families of the Nethinim who returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 48; Neh. vii. 50). B.C. ante 536.

Re'zon (Heb. Reson', רְעֹנָן, prince; Sept. Παζών v. r. 'Espōū), the son of Eliadah, a Syrian, who, when David defeated Hadadezer, king of Zobah, put himself at the head of a band of freebooters and set up a petty kingdom at Damascus (1 Kings xi. 23). B.C. post 1043. Whether he was an officer of Hadadezer, who, foreseeing the destruction which David would inflict, prudently escaped with some followers, or whether he gathered his band of the remnant of those who survived the slaughter, does not appear. The latter is more probable. The settlement of Rezon at Damascus could not have been till some time after the disastrous battle in which the power of Hadadezer was broken, for we are told that David at the same time defeated the army of Damascus in Damascus, and put garrisons in Damascus. From his position at Damascus he harassed the kingdom of Solomon during his whole reign. With regard to the statement of Nicolaus in the 4th book of his history, quoted by Josephus (Ant. vii. 5, 2), there is less difficulty, as there seems to be no reason for attributing it to any historical authority. He says that the name of the king of Damascus whom David defeated was Hadad, and that his descendants and successors took the same name for ten generations. If this be true, Rezon was a usurper, but the origin of the story is probably the confused account of the Sept. In the Vatican MS. of the Sept. the account of Rezon is inserted in ver. 14 in close connection with Hadad, and on this Josephus appears to have founded his story that Hadad, on leaving Egypt, en- deavored without success to excite Idumea to revolt, and then went to Syria, where he joined himself with Rezon, called by Josephus βασιλεύς (Βασιλεύς), who, at the head of a band of robbers, was plundering the country (Ant. viii. 7, 6). It was Hadad, and not Rezon, according to the account in Josephus, who established himself king of that part of Syria and made inroads upon the Israelites. In 1 Kings xv. 18, Benhadad, king of Damascus in the reign of Asa, is described as the grandson of Hezion; and from the resemblance between the names Reson and Hezion, when written in Hebrew characters, it has been suggested that the latter is a corrupt reading for the former. For this suggestion, however, there does not appear to be sufficient ground, though it was adopted by Sir John Marsham (Chron. Com. p. 346) and Sir Isaac Newton (Chronol. p. 221), as well as by some later translators and commentators (Junius, Köhler, Dathe, Ewald). Against it are, (a) that the number of generations of the Syrian kings would then be one less than those of the contemporary kings of Judah. But then the reign of Ahab was only three years, and, in fact, Jeroboam outlived both Rehoboam and his son. (3) The statement of Nicolaus of Damascus (Josephus, Ant. vii. 5, 2) that from the time of David for ten generations the kings of Syria were one dynasty, each king taking the name of Hadad, "as did the Ptolemies in Egypt." But this would exclude not only Hezion and Tabrimon, but Rezon, unless we may interpret the last sentence to mean that the official title of Hadad was held in addition to the ordinary name of the king. Bunsen (Bibelwerk, i. 271) makes Hezion contemporary with Rehoboam, and probably a grandson of Rezon. The name is Aramaic, and Ewald compares it with Resia.
