Among the numerous works written on the subject, we mention in favor of it: Bibliotheca maxima Pontifici, in qua authores melioris notae qui habetens pro S. Romani antiquis terrae, successores continetur, promoventur. Fr. H. Tom. de Roccalerti (Rome, 1689, 21 vols. fol.); A. Duade, Majestas Hierarchic et. Summi Pontificis (Bamb. 1761, 2 vols. 4to); Pet. Ballerini, De Vi de Eccl. Pontificis, etc. (Augsb. 1770, 2 vols. 4to; ed. nov. by Westhoff); J. Roskowagn, De Primatu Romani Pontificis episcopi Juribus (ibid. 1844, 8vo); Rotheneuse, Der Primat des Papstes in allen Jahrhunderten, herausgegeben von Rass und Weiss (Mainz, 1836, 4 vols. 8vo).

Against it: Eiendorg, Der Primat der römischen Päpste (Darmst. 1841 and 1846, 2 vols. 8vo); Barret, Du Pape et ses Dots (Paris, 1841, 2 vols. 8vo); A. H. Oder, Das Papsttum (ibid. 1820); Gosselin, Pours le Pape au Moyen âge (Louvain, 1845, 2 vols. 8vo). These and other works have been extensively used by Phillips in his Canon Law, the fifth volume of which (Ratisbon, 1857) is entirely devoted to the subject of primacy.

Generally the testimony of Ireneus (d. 202) and of Cyprian (d. 258) are especially invoked to show that the primacy of the Roman bishops was accepted in the 2d century. But the former (Adversus Heres. lib. iii, cap. iii), in order to demonstrate the truth of the Catholic doctrine, refers to the Roman bishop's title, which is acknowledged by the apostles; for Italy and the West, he names especially Rome as being the only Occidental see of undisputed apostolic foundation. The potest principalis mentioned by Ireneus designates the political situation of the city, which could not fail to enhance its ecclesiastical importance. In the same way, Constantine, at a later period, took the second place in the hierarchy, as being a second Rome (Concil. Constant. ann. 381. can. 3; comp. Bickell, Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, i, 209 sq.). The ideas of Cyprian are interesting in reference to the relations of the apostles by an apostolic see, and of the first metropolitan of the Roman empire, gave at an early period a great importance to the see of Rome; but the same importance is attributed to the bishop of Alexandria and of Antioch, in the 3d canon of the Council of Nice, in 325. At that council the Roman bishop did not exercise any authority other than the other bishops. This is clearly shown by the acts of the council, signed by two prelates, "instead of our pope," i.e. bishop (see Aneclet Neronii—fragments relating to the Council of Nice—by Harris Cowper [London and Edinburgh, 1857]). It was at a later period attempted to give can. 6 Nic. Conc. another form than the primitive by adding at the beginning the words "Quod ecclesia Romana semper habuit primatum" (see Geseler, Kirchengeschichte, i, § 91). The struggle for the maintenance of the orthodox doctrine was extremely severe, as between the bishops of Rome, and the Council of Sardica (343) emphasized most decidedly the pre-eminence of the Roman see in the Western Church: the Oriental bishops on that occasion protested and left the assembly. The resolutions of Sardica were not at once accepted even in the Western Church. At the request of the bishop Damascus, and of a Roman PRIMACY

SYNOD OF 378, the emperor Gratian issued a rescript in favor of Rome (Tischler, L. E. § 92, n. 1). In 445 an edict of Valentinian III proclaims the primacy of the bishop of Rome over the whole Church—a primacy which, besides the higher rank over the bishops, includes a supreme ecclesiastical legislation and jurisdiction. The significance of this pronouncement on the primacy of Peter ("sedis apostolicae primatum, sancti Petri merition, qui princeps est episcopat corone"), on the political importance of Rome ("Romaei dignitatis civilis"), and on the Synod of Sardica ("sacra synodi auctoria") (comp. Richter, Kirchengeschichte [6th ed., § 22, 23]). But the Church of the East was by means subordinated to the Roman see; the Council of Chalcedon, 451, in can. 28, declares that the see of Constantinople has the same privileges in the Eastern Church which in the Western Church belong to Rome (vid. 1, sec. 17, 18). If, in later times, the first place in the Roman empire is acknowledged to belong to Rome (c. 7, pr. c. 8, C. de Summo Trinitate [1, 1]; Justininian, a. 533, No. ix, cxxxi, c. 2, a. 535, 545, etc.), this was only a distinction of honor without any practical advantage for Constantinople was also the highest instance (c. 29, C. de Episcope. Auctuaria [i, 4], a. 530, No. cxxxvii, c. 5, a. 564, etc.). The ecclesiastical authority of Rome was not contested after that, but its relation to the worldly powers was often a source of friction. Its concur- rence with the newly founded Germanic churches was at first prevented by their Arianism, but became the closer after their conversion to the orthodox faith. The Roman principles about the relations of the Church to the apostolic see prevailed in the Frankish empire by the exertions of Boniface, although their practical consequences were impeded by the independent exercise of the rights of the State in Church mat- ters. With Charlemagne the pope was nothing but the first metropolitan, over whom the emperor had jurisdiction. The king is the supreme judge and legislator, a protector and ruler given to the Church by God, who corrects or approves the resolutions of the synods, and issues himself ecclesiastical ordinances, after taking the advice of the clergy. The proof of this is afforded by a large number of capitulaires. Under the weak suc- cessors of the great emperor there was a change, which the decreets of Pseudo-Isidore turned to the advantage of Rome. It was in conformity with these principles that Nicholas I administered the Church (from 858). The German kings of the house of Saxon not only restored the Roman bishop but were again subor- dinated to the primacy of honor. We see the German bishops, under Otto I, appointed by the emperor him- self, governing their dioceses independently, and the episcopate, in their synods, presided over by the em-peror, exercise jurisdiction over the Roman bishop (deposition of John XII, in 965, by the Roman council). These principles were in force until the middle of the 11th century. The bishop of Rome was then subor- dinated to the emperor and to the body of the episcopate (in 1054 at the Synod of Sutri, by which Benedict VIII, Sylvester III, and Gregory VI were deposed). Under Gregory VII a reaction took place, and the papacy was enabled to obtain the whole extent of authority which Pseudo-Isidore claimed as its own. The hierarchical system of popacy was completed by this Gregory and his successors—Alexander III (1159-1181), Innocent III (1198-1216), Gregory IX (1227-1241), Innocent IV (1243-1254), and Boniface VIII (1294-1303). The so-called Dictatus Hildebrandini, the authenticity of which is proved by the regesta of Gregory VII (comp. Gramont, Regesta, etc., p. 47), contains the following decrees: "Dictatus Gregorii VII registro enendate [Regiment, 1858], p. 5", and the decreets of the popes mentioned, contain the propositions peculiar to this system, the most es- sential of which are: The bishop of Rome is the vicar of Christ on earth ("Romanus Pontifex vicarius Jesus Christi, quod non puri hominis, sed veri Dei vicem gerit in terris" [Innoc. III, in c. 2, 3, x, De Translat. Episcop. i, 7]), the universal bishop ("solus universalia" [Gregorii Dict. No. 2]), to whom alone belongs the title of pope ("quod unicum est nominem in mundo" [ibid. c. 11]). He is possessed of full powers, and he grants part of the temporal dominion to the bishop of Rome ("quia daretur nostris potestas regni terrae," i.e., the dominion over the states). He is to install his bishops ("Quia daretur nostris potentia instituisse episcopos") and to excommunicate ("Quia peccatum sancitum excommunicat") them, as well as to give them their pastoral letters ("Quia episcopos instituit: Cunctum episcopatum in terris"").

It is, of course, his own business how he chooses his assistants; the rights of appointing, deposing, permitting bishops belong to him exclusively; he can draw every cause before the apostolic see, judge it himself, or take it back from the local authority. He has, even, the right to declare a council, to his personal lieutenant, a legate, who, of course, has pre-eminence over all other dignitaries ("Quod illis solus potest deponere episcopos vel reconci- liare... Quod legatus ejus omnibus episcopis prae sit in peccato vel concilio, et praecepit ut omnes...""). Its connection with the newly founded Germanic churches was at first prevented by their Arianism, but became the closer after their conversion to the orthodox faith. The Roman principles about the relations of the Church to the apostolic see prevailed in the Frankish empire by the exertions of Boniface, although their practical consequences were impeded by the independent exercise of the rights of the State in Church mat- ters. The papal system, a product of feudalism, according to which all authority rests in the sovereign, involves, in its last consequence, the political domination. The Dictatus Gregorii contain the following declarations: "Quod solus Papa posit ut imperialis insignis" (No. 8); "Quod solus Papa pedes omnes clericis decernat" (No. 9); "Quod illi libet imperatores depone" (No. 12); "Quod a fidelitate iniquorium subjectos posit abolvere" (No. 27). Boniface VIII, trying to set up to these principles, involved himself in a terrible conflict with Francis, which ended in the defeat of the Roman see. Now, however, Gregory or Berengaria of Burgundy, again of the principles which had prevailed before Gregory VII, on the relations of the Church, and the council which represents her, to the bishop of Rome, and the old principles were reinstated in vigor. The result of the war which has since been waged over the quarrel and vicissitudes, between the pope and the bishops is a modification and practical attenuation of the strict papal or curial system; yet the latter has been victorious, and is now generally acknowledged. The relations of the Roman Catholic Church to the State, the right of granting royal titles (Phillips, L. c. v, 684 sq.), and other prerogatives, by which the rights of sove- reigns were limited or even denied, have long disap- peared from practice; yet the pope never retracted the sate and authentically interpret; and in virtue of the same he orders the resolutions of the provincial synods to be reconsidered and approved by the Congregatio Concilii (Benedict XIV, De Synodo Diocesana, lib. xii, cap. 3, No. 6).

(3) The Highest Ecclesiastical Supervision.—Reports from all dioceses are regularly sent to the pope. The bishops of each diocese, who before their consecration, are bound to appear in person ("Limina apostolorum singulis annum aut me aut me per centum numinis visitabo, nisi—absolvam"); but the visitatio liminum can be replaced by a relatio status dioecesis, which must take place in conformity with an instruction of Benedict XIV, De Synodo Diocesana, lib. xii, cap. 3, No. 6.

(4) The Highest Ecclesiastical Administration (Regimem Ecclesiæ).—It comprises the decision in the causa ardua ac majores. To these belong the causa episcoporum—namely, the confirmation of elected, the admission of postulated bishops; the consecration, ordination, deposition; acceptance of resignations; appointment of coadjutors; foundation, division, fusion, dioceses; collation of the pallium; confirmation and suppression of clerical orders and ecclesiastical institutions; beatification and canonization; the acknowledgment of relics; the permission of general and alumni feasts; the right of decision in reserved cases. In virtue of his supremacy, the pope has also a right, in case of insufficient, faulty administration of the clerical dignities, to take the government in his own hands, and do every other thing which is wanted. On the right of administration is also founded the right of imposing ecclesiastical taxes.

II. Primacy of Honor.—(1) The pope has not only preeminence over the clerical dignitaries, but is tradition ally recognized even by the worldly powers. The political authorities, in their conventions with him, allow his name to stand first. (2) The title and the qualifications connected with it underwent some changes. The name of pope belongs, since Gregory VII's time, exclusively to the bishop of Rome; likewise the designation of Summus Pontifex. Pontifex Maximus was only at a later period reserved for him. Gregory I declined the title of Patriarcha Universalis (see cap. 4, 5, dist. xci), and preferred being called Servus Servorum Dei, a designation which has since become official (comp. Thomasin, Vetus ac Novi Ecclesiae Doctrina, lib. i, cap. 4, 50, No. 14; Ferrari, Biblioth. Canonici, lib. x, v.; Papi, art. ii, Nos. 33-35; Phillips, l.c. 599 sq.). The qualification of sanctus is also, in early times, specially applied to the Roman bishops. In the Dictatus Gregorii VIII, No. 23, we read, "Quod Romanum Pontifex, si captae sacerdotium dignitatis constitutam, sanctum sanctior ecclesiae sanctitatem et lumen sanctitatem sanctitatem, testante S. Eundomii Iapiensi Episcopo, ei multis SS. Patribus favoribus, sicut in decreta B. Symmachii P. continuetur." Therefore the usual address is "sancissime pater" (holy father). (For the homage formerly paid him and his pastoral insignia, see the art. see SUPRAM; for the supremacy of the pope over councils, see SUPRAM; for the relation of the papacy to temporal possessions, see TEMPORAL. POWER OF THE POPE; see also ROMANISM.)

In answer to the Roman Catholic doctrine of the primacy we here subjoin the heads of Barrow's famous argument against it in his treatise On the Supremacy (Works [Lond. 1841], vol. iii). He says there may be "a primacy of worth or personal excellency; a primacy of reputation; a primacy of order or bare dignity and precedence; a primacy of power of decision; a primacy of jurisdiction. 1. The first—a primacy of worth—we may well grant to Peter, for probably he did exceed the rest of his brethren in personal endowments and capacities. 2. A primacy of repute, which Paul means when he speaks of those who had a special reputation, of those who seemed to be pillars in the spiritual government of the Church (Gal. ii. 6, 9; 2 Cor. xi. 5; xii. 11). [This advantage cannot be refused him, being a necessary consequence of those eminent qualities resplendent

PRIMATE

In him, and of the illustrious performances achieved by him beyond the rest. This may be inferred from that renown which his Church was given to enjoy, and likewise from his being so constantly ranked in the first place before the rest of his brethren. 3. As to a primacy of order or bare dignity, importing that commonly, in all meetings and proceedings, the other apostles did yield him the precedence, it may be questioned; for this does not seem suitable to the gravity of such persons, or their condition and circumstances, to stand upon ceremonies of respect; for our Lord's rules seem to exclude all semblance of ambition, all kind of inequality and distance between his apostles. [But yet this primacy of precedence, as being established as probable by the apostles' accounts of use and convenience; it might be useful to preserve order, and to promote expedition, or to prevent confusion, distraction, and dilatory obstruction in the management of things.] 4. As to a primacy importing a superiority in command, power, or jurisdiction, this we have great reason to deny upon the following considerations: 1. For such a power it was needful that a commission from God, its founder, should be granted in absolute and perspicuous terms; but no such commission is extant in Scripture. 2. If so illustrious an office was from the very beginning given to our Saviour, it is strange that nowhere in the ecclesiastical or apostolical history there should be any express mention of that institution. [3. If Peter had been instituted sovereign of the apostolical senate, his office and state had been in nature and kind very distinct from the common office of the other apostles, as the chief of the flock from the other members of the flock; and probably would have been dignified by some distinct name, as that of arch-apostle, arch-pastor, the vicar of Christ, or the like; but no such name or title was assumed by him, or was by the rest ascribed to him.] (4.) There was no office above that of an apostle known to the apostles or primitive Church (Ephes. iv. 11; 1 Cor. xii. 28). (5.) Our Lord himself declared against this kind of primacy, prohibiting his apostles to affect, to seek, to assume, or admit a superiority of power, one above another (Luke xxii. 14-25; Mark ix. 40). (5.) We do not find any peculiar administration committed to Peter, nor any privilege conferred on him which was not also granted to the other apostles (Matt. xx. 23; Mark xvi. 15). (7.) When Peter wrote two catholic epistles, there does not appear in either of them any intimation or any pretence to such arch-apostolical power. (8.) In all relations which occur in Scripture about controversies incident to doctrine or practice, there is no appeal made to Peter's judgment or utilisation of it as decisive, no argument is built on his authority. (9.) Peter now found himself totally dependent on governors or captains, as the only men of rank for consultation, and for judging in such cases [yet where he does himself deal with herdics and disorderly persons, he proceeds not as a pope, decreeing, but as an apostle, warning, arguing, and persuading against them.]. (10.) The considerations of the apostles proceeding in the conversion of people, in the foundation of churches, and in administration of their spiritual affairs will exclude any probability of Peter's jurisdiction over them. [They went about their business, not by order or license from Peter, but according to special direction of God's Spirit.] (11.) The nature of the apostolic ministry—their not being fixed in one place of residence, but continually moving about the world—the state of things at that time, and the manner of Peter's life, render it unlikely that he had such a jurisdiction over the apostles as some assign him. (12.) It was indeed most requisite that every apostle should have a complete, absolute, independent authority in managing the duties and concerns of the office, that he might not anywise be obstructed in the discharge of them, not clogged with a need to consult others, not hampered with orders from those who were at a distance from them. (13.) But Paul, and beloved of Paul towards Peter are evidence that he did not acknowledge any dependence on him, or any subjection to him (Gal. ii. 11). (14.) If Peter had been appointed sovereign of the Church, it seems that it should have been requisite that he should have outlived all the apostles; for otherwise the Church would have sought a head, or them must have been an inextricable controversy who that head was. But Peter died long before John, as all agree, and perhaps before divers others of the apostles. [From these arguments we must see what little ground the Church of Rome has to derive the supremacy of the pope from the supposed primacy of Peter. See Pol.]

Primat, Claude-François-Marie, a French prelate, was born at Lyons July 26, 1747. He studied, at the expense of the Chapter of St. John, at Lyons, and entered the brotherhood of the Oratorians. From the college at Marseilles he went to that of Dijon, where he became professor of rhetoric and theology. At the age of twenty-eight he was ordained a priest, and became a successful preacher. In 1786 he was made curate of St. James at Douai. During the revolutionary agitation he gave his support to the republican cause by taking the required oath. He was made constitutional bishop of the North March 27, 1791, and established the seat of his episcopacy at Cambrai. He resigned office Nov. 13, 1796, and had even the weakness to return to the convention his letters of priesthood. But this step did not prevent him from presiding over a diocesan synod held at Lille in 1797. He assisted at the council held at Vitré at the beginning of that year, and was one of the thirty who accompanied his associates to the bishopric of Rhone and Loire Feb. 1798. At this time he composed a paper to justify his oath of hatred to royalty, which was found in the actions of that council. After the Concordat, he was chosen, April 9, 1802, archbishop of Toulouse, where by his mild measures he triumphed over all obstacles. As primat he was present at the coronation of Napoleon I, and the pallium was conferred upon him Jan. 16, 1805. He was finally chosen senator and count of the empire May 19, 1806; and during the Hundred Days he was called to a seat in the Chamber of Peers, June 4, 1815. He died at Toulouse Oct. 16, 1816. — Hoefer, Nov. Hist. Générale, s. v.

Primatre (Lat. primas; Fr. primat, first) is the title of a grade in the hierarchy immediately below the rank of patriarch (q.v.). In point of jurisdiction the primacys was, historically, developed out of the episcopate by papal decrees or canon rights. The primacies, in this sense of the word, are more particularly an institution of the West; for although the Greek denomination ἐνωπος is generally translated by primas, there are unmistakable differences. The archbishops of the Holy Roman Empire were not officiating bishops, or governors, or paramount in such cases [yet where he does himself deal with herdics and disorderly persons, he proceeds not as a pope, decreeing, but as an apostle, warning, arguing, and persuading against them.]. The primacies, as such, were metropolitanos who enjoyed a pre-emience of jurisdiction over the other bishops of a country. This pre-emience was founded on their right of consecrating the other metropolitans and bishops, of convoking councils, and of confirming all appointments. Originally this dignity was connected with the nomination to a pontifical vicariate, as was the case with the bishop of Arles, and it rested, in general, on an explicit appointment by the pope. There was one exception to that in the person of the bishop of Carthage, who, not assuming the pontifical title, exerts all the rights implied by it in Africa. The relation in which the primacy almost everywhere stood to the national interests, which obliged its bearers, as the first bishops of the State, to take some share in the political concerns, exercised a detrimental influence, and it was soon asserted overbearing pretensions contrary to the authority of the head of the Church. The importance of the primacy has melted away in the course of time, and in most cases nothing remains of it but some exterior distinctions. The chief priestly sees of the West were in Spain—Seville and Tarragona (forwards united in Toledo); in France—Aries, Ibiema, Lyons, and Rouen (among whom the archbishop of Lyons claims the title of primatus des primatis, “primate of the primates”); in England—Canterbury; in Germany—Mainz, Salzburg, and Breslau; in Ireland—Armagh, and in the Pal, Dublin; in Scotland—St. Andrews; in Hungary—Gran; in Poland—Gnesen; and in the Northern kingdoms—Lund.

In the Church of England the archbishop of Canterbury is styled primate of all England; the archbishop of York, primate of England. In Ireland, the archbishshop of Armagh is primate of all Ireland, and the archbishop of Dublin, primate of Ireland. The title of primate in England and Ireland confers no jurisdiction beyond that of archbishop. The name primus is applied in the Scottish Episcopal Church to the presiding bishop.
He is chosen by the bishops out of their own number, without their being bound to give effect to seniority of consecration or precedence of diocese.

Prime (Lat. prima, the first—i. e. hour), the first of the so-called “lesser hours” of the Roman Breviary (q.v.). It may be called the public morning prayer of that Church, and corresponds in substance with the matins and lessons of the other ancient liturgies, allowance being made for Latin peculiarities. Prime com-mates with the beautiful hymn of Prudentius, Jam lucam orto sidere, which is followed by three and occasionally four psalms (xxii, xxxvi, liv, cviii); but the last portion consists of the opening verses of the 118th (psalm) in the A.V. the cxix, 1-92) psalm, which is continued throughout the rest of the “lesser hours.” Prime concludes with prayers appropriate to the beginning of a Christian’s day. See Procter, Commentary on the Book of Common Prayer, p. 167. See Canonical Hours.

Prime, Ebenezer, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Conn., July 21, 1700; graduated at Yale College in 1718, and at the age of nineteen was assistant of the Rev. Eliphalet Jones, pastor at Huntington, L. I., whose colleague he became four years after.
He remained in charge of this congregation until his death, Sept. 25, 1778 (according to another account, Oct. 3). For a period of nearly seven years, from 1766 to 1773, he had an assistant, but during the troubled times of the Revolution the whole charge rested with him, and he was even obliged at one time to flee from his dwelling, and live in retirement for a season in a small house of his own congregation. He is the progenitor of a family of eminent Presbyterian divines.
Mr. Prime published a Discourse on the Nature of Ordination. See Sprague, Amida of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 30 sq.

Prime, John, an English divine of some note, flourished in the second half of the 18th century. He was educated at Oxford University, and held at one time a fellowship. He published, The Sacrements (Lond. 1862, 8vo):——Nature and Grace (ibid. 1568, 8vo):——Sermons (Oxon. 1568, 8vo):——Exposition and Observations upon St. Paul to the Galatians (Lond.
1567, 8vo):——The Confessions of D. David, a sermon on Psa. xxiii, 4 (ibid. 1568, 8vo):——Sermons (ibid. 1568, 8vo).
Prime, Nathaniel Scudder, D.D., an American divine, was born at Huntington, L. I., April 21, 1755, and educated at Princeton, where he graduated in 1804.
He was licensed to preach in the following year in the Presbyterian Church, and was subsequently stationed at Sag Harbor, Fresh Pond, Smithtown, Cambridge, New York, and other places. He also acted as principal of literary institutions at Cambridge, Sing Sing, and Newburgh, and gained distinction as a teacher. He died sudddenly at Mamaroneck, N. J., March 3, 1856, Dr. Prime published a collection of Sermons (1811, 1817, 1850), an Address (1815), and a Charge to the Rev. Samuel Irenaeus Prime (1887), many statistical and other articles in periodicals, and the two following works, Familiar Illusis employed with this specific meaning in Chorleegang's rule, and in the statutes of Amalarius, confirmed by the Synod of Aix-la-Chapelle in 817, where the primicerius appears at the head of the capitulary register, immediately after the archdeacon and archbishop'sler. The functions of the primicerius were strictly to instruct the deacons, subdeacons, and minorits in the choral song, sometimes in the comparable, in the liturgy, and in the functions of the Church; to inform the canons of the order of the office in the choir; to explain to the younger ones the management of the Breviary, etc. There is a very circumstantial enumeration of the duties of the Primicerius in the De Officiis of Isidore of Seville.

When the archdeacons, in the progressive extension of their importance, obtained the lower jurisdiction over the priests and archpriests, the primicerius obtained also the full disciplinary power over the minorits. His situation in the chapter was therefore one of importance; it is sometimes called a dignitas (De canon. i, 4), sometimes a persona (De conc. i, 2), sometimes it is placed among the offices (officium nudo). There was, in general, no uniform distribution of ranks in the different chapters. When the institution of the Minorits was suppressed, the office of the primicerius was also extinguished.

Primus, Prelates. Primus is, with the ancient pagans, the name given to the first-fruits of the field and garden, which were annually brought as offerings to the temples or abodes of the priests. We find this custom among almost all nations of antiquity, and among the Israelites. Like many other religious customs and institutions of the Jews, the study of their exterior worship, considered as a tribute of gratitude for God's blessings, was adopted by the Christian Church, and urgently recommended by the fathers, the kind and quantity of the gifts being left to be determined by the pious feelings of the individual: "Non erat speciali nomine diffinitus, sed offerentium arbitrio dexteretur" (De decim. et prim. iii, 30). They certainly bore the character of free offerings, while the tithe—with the Jews always, since Moses' time; with the Christians at least since Charlemagne's reign—represents a strict right; for, that the ministers of the new religion should live on the same existing diet, and not exceed a fourth of the complete harvest, is only an approximate indication, to be found in Jerome, Comment. in Ezech. c. xvi. With the more general and stricter execution of the laws about the tithe, in the Christian age, the privilege disappeared, little by little, or were preserved only in part, and in a changed form.

Primitive Christianity is the religion of the New Testament as first exemplified after the establishment of the new faith by that ecclesiastical organization called the Church, under State patronage. See Primitive Church. In distinction from this, we have apostolic Christianity, the period that immediately succeeded the labors of the founder of the New Testament dispensation. See Apostolic Church; Christianity.

Primitive Church. An expression used to denote the condition of the Church, as respects doctrine and discipline, in the early steps of its history. Though this term is employed with little precision by ecclesiastical writers, it most frequently refers to the Church of the first three centuries. See Church.

Primitive Doctrine. It is the opinion of some persons that there is a "primitive doctrine," independent of Scripture, "always to be found somewhere in the Catholic and primitive Church," by which Christians, in their infancy, were taught; they seem to suppose that some part of the oral teaching of the apostles might, though in an unwritten form, be yet in the possession of the Church, so that the Church might at any time declare a doctrine not opposed to Scripture, on what is called the unanimous consent of antiquity, to have come down by successive oral delivery from the apostles. The opponents of such views consider that they are incapable of ascribing the text of our liturgies, because it is not possible for us, at this distance of time from the days of the apostles, to know what they did or did not teach orally, or how far what they really did teach may not since have been corrupted. They contend, therefore, that the ancient apostolical writings alone can warrant us for the use of the Epitola in Iudaeorum, the De Officis of Isidore. See Doctrine; Tradition.

Primitive Methodist Connection is the name of a Wesleyan body of believers principally in England and the British colonies.

During the first decade of the present century stirring reports flooded across the Atlantic of the power of God marvellously displayed in the camp-meetings of America. The practice of holding religious services in the open air had much declined among British Methodists, as in all the large towns and many of the villages they now had commodious chapels, and the days of puerile gatherings in Western forests renewed the memory of the days of Wesley and Whitefield. This renewed interest was increased by the visits of Lorenzo Dow to England and Ireland. On the threshold of this movement, a young and studious hand named Hugh Bourne, was suffering intensely through an agonizing conviction of sin. From his sixth to his twenty-sixth year, he seldom went to bed without a dread of being in hell before morning; and morning brought him no relief, for he thought he would be in hell before night. He read the Bible with an intense zeal, but nowhere in his learning did he find saving knowledge. In 1799, when twenty-seven years of age, there fell in his way a volume containing the Life of Fletcher, some of Wesley's Sermons, Alleine's Alarm, and Baxter's Call to the Unconverted. In one of Wesley's sermons he found "more real light than in anything else he had ever read." It taught him that "opinion is not religion . . . even right opinion is as far from religion as east is from west." The time of his redemption drew nigh. As he read Fletcher's letters, his heart was touchèd. The tidings of redemption "rang . . . in my ears with such an intensity as to make me wish to be an instrument of the salvation of the rough lumbermen who were in his employment. On May 31, 1807, Mr. Bourne, assisted by Messrs. William Clowes, Thomas Cotton, and others afterwards prominent in the Primitive Methodist Connection, held a camp-meeting at Mow Cop, a mountain on the border-line between Staffordshire and Cheshire. Though the Connection did not really exist till three years later, this is looked upon as the initial point in its history, and its annalists delight to quote the lines,

"The little cloud increases still Which first began upon Mow Hill."
PRIMITIVE METH. CONNECTION 593 PRIMITIVE METH. CONNECTION

likely to be productive of considerable mischief; and we disclaim all connection with them." This declared jealousy has naturally much weight with the societies in general, and most of the leading Methodists held aloof from the camp-meeting movement. Bourne and a few others, however, held firm, having their meetings recognised by civil authority, and taking precautions for preserving order.

Matters now came to a crisis. The Church authorities felt they could no longer bear with such contumacy, and Bourne and Clowes were expelled from the Connection. The untrammelled of these men from Church bonds, so far from silencing them, had rather the effect of lifting them to a more active level. In this time they lived in Cheshire an old man, named James Crawford, "noted as a man of extraordinary piety and faith." He believed himself called to the ministry, and had prayed and watched for the leading of Providence. In 1805 Hugh Bourne and his brother James hired him to preach in neglected places, for three months, at a salary of ten shillings a week. "This is generally looked upon as the commencement of the Primitive Methodist ministry." In the spring of 1810 several persons were converted in meetings held by Hugh Bourne, and formed into a class which was added to the Cheshire Circuit (Wesleyan); but as they declined to accept them unless they pledged to sever their connection with Hugh Bourne, and as they respectfully declined according to this demand, their application was refused." Bourne then in his charge was formed a distinct society, and the formation of this class may be considered the birth of the Connection. The camp-meeting agency was now more extensively employed, and numerous societies were formed. In September, 1810, there were 10 preachers, 15 preaching places, and 190 members.

In that first general meeting was held, composed probably of preachers and leaders. This conference resolved that money should in future be regularly collected in the societies, in order to meet the necessary expenses; and if this should prove insufficient, recourse should again be had to the benevolence of private individuals. The two travelling preachers, Moures, Crawfoot and Clowes, were to receive their salaries from the societies, and Mr. James Steele was appointed the circuit steward, the first officer of that kind in the Connection. In 1812 theConnection, then employing 10 preachers, formally took the title of Primitive Methodist, and in two years later a comprehensive code of rules was for the first time adopted. From that time till the present the increase of the denomination has been very rapid, being from 1851 to 1872, in the 108 towns of Great Britain, ever increasing.

The three following extracts, from John Angell James, Dr. Beaumont, and Dr. Campbell, respectively, explain the peculiar genius of this denomination:

"In cottages, in barns, and in theaters; in public houses, in market-places, in streets. In lobbies, and by en act, they (the Primitive Methodist preachers) held meetings for prayer and exhortation. They were nourished by personal visits. The first peril of their life; but they persevered, in meekness and in gentleness, and have conquered by their passive power." The "Primitive Methodists are a laborious, and not an idle community; they are a plain, and not an artificial community; they are a useful community." "Every day serves but to confirm us that it is less talents, less culture, less intelligence than required than a thorough and perfect acquaintance with the Word of God—simplicity, affection, fervor, activity, tact, and facility, in adapting actions to circumstances, and employing them in these imply the".

The latest statistics of the Connection are, 17,000 ministers and local preachers, 10,000 class leaders, 59,000 Sunday-school teachers, and 180,000 Church members. They publish several periodicals.

The doctrine of the Connection may be said to be identical with that of other Methodist churches. The form of Church government is substantially Presbyterian, but with a larger mixture of the lay element than is found in Presbyterian or in other Methodist denominations. The official business is transacted by the leaders' meeting, composed of the class-leaders, the society steward, and the travelling preachers of the circuit. No such meeting can be legally held without the presence of the minister or travelling preacher, extraordinary cases excepted." As in other Methodist bodies, there are travelling and local preachers. The latter usually follow some occupation for a maintenance, and preach on the Sabbath as an opportunity to earn a livelihood. They do not receive any pecuniary remuneration for their services. They are chosen to their office by the representatives of the societies which they minister; and their labors prove acceptable to the people generally, their services being "paid." In the transaction of the business of the circuit's quarterly meeting, travelling and local preachers are equal. Between the quarterly meetings, the ordinary business of the circuit is transacted by the "circuit committee," composed of such local preachers, class-leaders, or stewards as are appointed by the preceding quarterly meeting to represent the respective societies. The travelling preachers are ex-officio members of this court. Circuits are sometimes divided into branches, each having its own officials and its regular meetings for business, but subordinate to the circuit committee. "Places visited through missionary labors, and united in one station, are called a 'mission,'" most of which are under the control of the general missionary committee. A "district" consists of a number of circuits, branches, and "missions." The general conference is held at an annual session. It is composed of one delegate from each circuit, the circuits sending a travelling preacher one year and a layman the two following years, so as to secure, as nearly as possible, two laymen to one travelling preacher. This meeting receives statistical reports of all the circuits, inquires into the state of each, and stations the travelling preachers within the district, "subject, however, to appeals from the stations or preachers, and to alterations at conference."

The 'conference' is a yearly meeting of delegates from all the districts in the Connection, of twelve permanent members, and of four persons appointed at the preceding conference, in the proportion of two laymen to one travelling preacher. This is the highest court in the Connection, from whose decisions there is no appeal. A "general committee," composed of ministers and laymen, holding its sessions in London, is appointed to transact the business of the Connection in the intervals of the sessions of conference. A district committee, subordinate to the general committee, is appointed for each district, subject to orders submitted to its examination by the stations within the district.

The Connection is represented in the United States by two conferences, Eastern and Western, having, for the last six years, only fraternal relations with the parent Conference in Great Britain. There are also separate conferences in Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, strictly associated with England. The statistics for the American Conferences for 1876 are as follows:

The Connection has its full share of Methodist zeal in foreign missions. From the report of 1876 we glean the following statistics:

The foreign work is chiefly in British colonies and among English-speaking people. The missionary income for the year was £45,234. The most striking peculiarities of the Connection are—first, the vast amount of unpaid labor performed by laity; 2d, the influence of the laity in Church government; 3d, the devoted and zealous attention paid by the people. In the United States, the Primitive Methodist Connection has established itself, and has especially near the borders of Canada and in the Eastern States, gained a strong footing, so that the American Church is about of equal strength with the Canadian. They support a paper called the Primitive Methodist and the Christian Patriot, a semi-monthly journal. See Petty, History of the Primitive Methodist Connection; Church, History of the Primitive Methodists (8d ed., revised and enlarged); Herod, Sketches of Primitive Methodist Preachers: Memorial of the Centenary of Hugh Bourne; Bar- ran, Gallery of Deceased Ministers; Articles by Rev. W. H. Harrow, in Primitive Methodist Record for 1877.

Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Church of Ireland

This body was formed in 1816, and was the result of a division in the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion in Ireland. In that year the Irish Conference, by a major and a minority of forty-six in a house of ninety, and eighty, resolved to authorize the preachers of the Connexion to administer the sacraments. As a result of this decision, most of the minority separated from the parent body, and, being followed by a large section of the lay members, organized the Primitive Weslyan Methodist Connexion. Until a few years ago they did not assume to be a Church, but merely a society composed of members of the Established Church of Ireland. The great changes produced by the disestablishment of this Church in 1870, together with an increasing desire on the part of the society for the administration of the sacraments at the hands of their own preachers, led to a complete change in the constitution of the body, and the members have now the option of partaking of the ordinances from their own ministers in their churches. The statistics printed in the Conference minutes of 1876 are, 58 effective ministers, 13 superannuants, 144 churches, and 7,518 members of society. An annual missionary income of £70,000 in gold is now devoted to the support of the ministers on the poorer circuits. Over £7,500 is invested in funds for the support of superannuated ministers. Negotiations are at present in progress to effect a union with the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Ireland, the constitution of the two churches being now almost identical.

Primogeniture (denoted in Heb. by יִשְׁמַעֵל; Sept. πρωτότοκος, Gen. xxv, 31, 34; xxvii, 26; Deut. xxvi, 17; 1 Chron. v, 1; in the New Test. only in Heb. xii, 16; A. V. "birthright"). Πρωτότοκος, always rendered "first-born" in the English version, is found in the Sept. in Gen. iv, 4; Deut. xxi, 17, and several other passages of the Old Test., as the representation of the Hebrew יִשְׁמַעֵל, signifying "one who openeth the womb," whether an only child, or whether other children follow. "Primogenitus est, non post quem ali- sed ante quem nullus alias genus" (Pareus). Πρωτό- τοκος is found nine times in the New Test.—viz. Matt. i, 25 (if the passage be genuine, and not introduced from the parallel passage in Luke); Luke ii, 1; Rom. viii, 29; Col. i, 15, 18; Heb. i, 6; xiv, 28; xii, 23; Rev. i, 5. Except in the Gospels, and Heb. vi, 28, the word always stands here as a mark of the New Test., being generally synonymous with keir από της γένεσις and having, in Heb. i, 6, an especial reference to our Lord's Messianic dignity. In Heb. xii, 23, "as the assembly of the first-born," it seems to be synonymous with "elect," or "dearly beloved," in which sense it is also used on one occasion in the Old Test. (Jer. xxxi, 9).

In the 4th century, Helvidius among the Latins, and Eunomius among the Greeks, wished to attach a signification to πρωτότοκος in Matt. i and Luke ii, different from the Old-Test. usage, maintaining, in order to support their hypothesis—viz. that Joseph and Mary had children after the birth of their Lord—that the word πρωτότοκος, as used in the Old Testament, could not be applicable to an only child. Jerome rejected the former by appealing to the usage of the word in the Old Test. (Acts. Helvid. in Matt. i, 9). The assertion of Eunomius was equally refuted by the Greek fathers Basil (Hom. in Nat., viii); Theophylact (in Luc. ii); and Damascenus (De Fide orthodoxa, l. iv). In response to this controversy, Dusius (Ad difficilia loca Nema- c. 6) observes: "Sic sane Chris tus vocatur Πρωτότοκος, licet mater ejus nullus alios postea liberos habuerit. Notet hoc juvantesproper Helvidium, qui ex eae voce in errorem ducere vult Christians naturam pluris filios suscipisse." "Those entitled to the prerogative" (viz. of birthright), observes Campbell (On the Gospels), "were invariably denominated the first-born, whether the parents had issue afterwards or not." Eunomius further maintains, from Col. i, 15, that our Lord was "a creature;" but his arguments were replied to by Basil and Theophylact. Some of the fathers referred this passage to Christ's pre-existence, others to his baptism. In Is. xiv, 30, the "first-born of the poor" signifies the poorest of all; and in Job xcviii, 13, the "first-born of death"—many more words of terrible of death. It is noteworthy that in our Lord's genealogy the line is frequently carried through a younger son (Seth, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, David, Solomon, Nathan, etc.). See First-Born.

Primum Mobile, the primitive moveable element, is, in its proper signification, the original matter of the world (prime materia). The ancients understood by it the exterior hollow sphere which was supposed to include and put in motion the remainder of the universe (fixed stars and planets): a quite arbitrary supposition. Primal mover would be the principle of all motion, or the first moving cause. According to Aristotle, this cause is God, who, while motionless himself, puts all the rest in motion, and is therefore called by the philo- sophers ο Πρώτο το Δημοσιονομος. See Aristotle, Phys. viii, 5; De gener. et corrupt. i, 7; ii, 7.

Prince is the rendering of several Heb. and Gr. words in the A. V.

1. Sār, מֶלֶךְ הָאָדָם (to rule, to have dominion); Sept., Βασιλεύς, Βασιλιάς (kings), the chief of any class, the master of a company, a prince or noble; used of Pharaoh's chief butler and baker (Gen. xl, 2 sq.); of the taskmasters set over the Israelites in Egypt (Exod. i, 11): even of chief herdsmen (Gen. xlviii, 6). It is frequently used for military commanders (Exod. xviii, 21 ["rulers"]; 2 Kings i, 9 ["captain"]; Isa. iii, 3, etc.), and for princes both supreme and subordinate (1 Sam. xix, 3; Job xxxii, 1, 9; Isa. xlix, 7; Jer. ii, 59, etc.).

In Dan. vii, 11 God is called מֶלֶךְ הָאָדָם (Sar kath- tänd). Prince of the host; and in ver. 25 the title מֶלֶךְ הָאָדָם (Sar sarim), Prince of princes, is applied to the Messiah. The "princes of the provinces" (מֶלֶךְ הָאָדָם, seray ham-menithah, 1 Kings xx, 14) were probably the district magistrates who had taken refuge in Samaria during the invasion of Benhadad, and their "young men" were their attendants. The title מֶלֶךְ הָאָדָם (Barzai, a word of uncertain meaning) (1 Kings xvi, 14) was probably the term usually applied to the princes, and the title מֶלֶךְ הָאָדָם (Barzai, a word of uncertain meaning) (1 Kings xvi, 14) was probably the term usually applied to the princes, and the doctrine of tutelary angels of different countries seems to be countenanced by several passages of Scripture (Zech. iii, 1; vi, 5; Jude 9; Rev. xii, 7). Michael and Gabriel were probably the tutelary angels of the PRINCE

Jews. These names do not occur in any books of the Old Test. that were written before the captivity; and it is suggested by some that they were borrowed from the Chaldeans, with whom and the Persians the doctrine of the general administration and superintendence of angels over empires and provinces was commonly received. See ANGEL.

2. Nəfūš, from נפש, to be in front, to precede; Sept. ἄρχων or ἄρχομαι; Vulg. dux); one who has the precedence, a leader, or chief, used of persons set over any undertaking, superintending any trust, or invested with supreme power (1 Kings xiv, 7; Psal. lxxvi, 18; 1 Chron. xvi, 24 ["ruler"]); 1 Sam. ix, 16 ["captain"]; etc. In 1 Kings xiii, 25 it is applied to the Messiah; and in xix, 22 to Helem Philometor, king of Egypt.

3. Nādīb, נדיב (from נדיב), which in Hi. signifies to volunteer, to offer voluntarily or spontaneously—chiefly in poetry; Sept. ἀρχως; Vulg. princeps), generous, noble-minded, noble by birth (1 Sam. ii, 8; Psal. xlix, 10; civ. 40; cxxii, 8; cxxiii, 9; Prov. xxvii, 7, etc.). This word is the converse of the preceding; נדיב means primarily a chief, and derivatively what is morally noble or excellent; נדיב means primarily what is morally noble, and derivatively one who is noble by birth or position.

4. Naši, נashi (from נشاشة, to lift up, Niph. to be elevated; Sept. ἀρχως, ἡγούμενος, ἡγεῖται, βασιλεύς; Vulg. princeps, dux), one exalted; used as a general term for princes, including kings (1 Kings xi, 24; Ezek. xxi, 10, etc.), heads of tribes or families (Numb, i, 44; iii, 24 [A. V. "chief"]; vii, 10; xxxiv, 18; Gen. xxvi, 20; 1 Chron. vii, 40, etc.). In the A. V. it is often rendered "ruler" or "captain." In Gen. xxi, 6 Abraham is addressed by the sons of Heth as נאשיה נאשי (nashi Ekoim), a prince of G, i. e. constituted, and consequently protected, by God [A. V. "mighty prince"]. This word appears on the coins of Judas Maccabaeus (Gemini, Theban, p. 917).

5. Nasik, נסיק (from נסיק, to pour out, moint); Sept. ἀρχως; Vulg. princeps; Psal. lixiii, 11; Ezek. xxi, 80; Dan. xi, 5; "duke," Josh. xiii, 8; "principal," Mic. v, 5.

6. Kuita, קיתו (from קיתו, to cut, to decide; Sept. ἀρχως; ἄρχομαι; Vulg. princeps; Prov. xxv, 13; Dan. xiii, 18; Mic. iii, 1, 9; elsewhere "captain," "guide," "ruler").

7. Rab, רָבָה (usually an adj. "great"); Sept. ἄρχως, ἡγεῖται; Vulg. optimus); only occasional; but used in compounds, e. g. Rab-mag, Rab-saris (q. v.). So its Chald. reduplication Rabboin, רַבַּבִּים, in the pl. (Dan. v, 2; 3; elsewhere "lords").

8. Rozen, רוֹזֶן (participle of רוֹזָן, to rule; Sept. ἀρχέω, ἔχων; Vulg. princeps, legum conditor), a poetical word, used in psalms and in other compositions, e. g. Rab-mag, Rab-saris (q. v.). So its Chald. reduplication Rabboin, רַבַּבִּים, in the pl. (Dan. v, 2; 3; elsewhere "lords").

9. Shkikh, שְׂכָה (apparently from שְׂכָה, three; only Ezek. xxi, 12; elsewhere "captain" [q. v.]).

10. Achaashaphayyad (Chald. plur. נַחֲשַׁפְּתַּיָּהּ; Dan. iii, 2, 3; 27, v, 1-7; Sept. פָּרָאוֹר), a Persian word. Those mentioned in Dan. vi, 1 (see Esth. i, 1) were the predecessors, either in fact or in place, of the satraps of Darius Hystaspis (Herod. iii, 89). See SATRAP.

11. Chashmanim, חֲשָׁמַנִים (plur. literally rich, only in the xviti, 19).

12. Sipawni (a Persian word, used only in the plur. Isa. xi, 25; elsewhere "rulers").

13. Portemis, only in the plur. בְּרַפַּה (another Persian word, Dan. i, 8; elsewhere "rulers").

14. ἄρχων, which in the Sept. appears as the rendering of all the Hebrew words above cited, in the New Test. is used of earthly princes (Matt. xx, 25; 1 Cor. ii, 6), of Jesus Christ (Rev. i, 5), and of Satan (Matt. xxv, 8; xii, 24; Mark iii, 22; John xii, 31, 40; xvi, 11; Eph. ii, 2). On the phrase "prince of the power of the air" in this last passage, see ART.

15. ἀρχοντος, which in Theodotion is the rendering of נוֹיִי (Numb. xiii, 8; xvi, 2); and in the Sept. is the rendering of צִבְי (Judg. v, 15; Neh. ii, 9; Isa. xxx, 4), in the New Test. is applied only to our Lord (Acts iii, 15; v, 81; Heb. ii, 10 [A. V. "captain"]; xii, 2 [A. V. "author"]).

16. "Prince" is used (Matt. ii, 6) in a general sense for a chief or ruler. See GOVERNOR; KING; RULER.

Prince, John (1), an English divine, was born at Axminster, Devonshire, in 1648; was educated at Bransenoe College, Oxford, and became successively curate of Bideford, minister of St. Martin's Church, Exeter, vicar of Totnes, and vicar of Berry-Pomeroy. He died in 1722. He published, Sermons (Lond. 1674, 4to):—The Beauty of God's House, a Discourse on Ps. lxxvi, 1 (1710, 4to)—Dambanuei Orientalia Illustra (1810, 4to)—Sermons on Ps. cxxvi, 1 (1712, 8vo).

Prince, John (2), an American minister of the Congregational Church, was born at Boston, Mass., in 1751; was educated at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1773, and ordained minister of the Congregational Church in Salem, Mass., in 1779, and retained that post until his death in 1836. He published, First Sermon (Salem, 1736)—Sermon before a Charitable Society (1806)—Sermon on the Death of Dr. Barnard (1814)—Sermon before the Bible Society, where he was ordained (1816). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 128 sq.; and for other references, Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Auth. a. v.

Prince, Nathan, an American clergyman of the Church of England, was a native of Massachusetts, and was born about the beginning of the last century. He was educated at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1719, in 1723 was made a tutor in his alma mater, in 1727 fellow, and held that honor until 1742. Subsequently he took orders in the Church of England, was sent as a missionary to the Mosquitoes, and died in the island of Rastan, Bay of Honduras, in 1748. Dr. Chauncey, in his Sketches of Eminent Men in New England, says that "Prince deserves a place among the great men in this country." He is the author of an Essay to Solve the Difficulties attending the several Accounts given of the Resurrection, etc. (Boston, 1794, 4to). See Elliot, Biog. Dict. ii, 483; Report of the Nat. Hist. Soc. x, 165; Pierce, Hist. of Harvard University, p. 191-196; Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Auth. a. v.

Prince, Thomas (1), an American Congregational minister, was born May 15, 1687, at Sandwich, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1707, and after travelling for some years in Europe, during which time he preached in England and was invited to take a station, he returned home in 1717, and was ordained, Oct. 1, 1718, colleague pastor of the Rev. Joseph Sewall at the Old South Church, Boston, where he remained until his death, Oct. 22, 1756. He was an eminent preacher, for his sermons were rich in thought, perspicuous, and devotional, and he inculcated the doctrines and duties of religion as one who felt their importance. In private life he was amiable and exemplary. It was his constant endeavor to imitate the perfect example of his Master and Lord. He was ready to forgive injuries and return good for evil. He published, An Account of the First Appearance of the Aurora Borealis:—A Chronological History of New England in the Form of Annals (1736)—Ditto, vol. ii, Nos. 1, 2, 8 (1755)—Account of the English Ministers on Martha's Vineyard (1749); The Development of the Doctrine of Earthquakes, containing an Historical Summary of the most remarkable Earthquakes of New England (1755)—The New England Psalm-book, revised and improved (1756):—and a number of occasional Sermons; besides which there were six Sermons published from his MSS. by Dr. Erskine of Edinburgh (1783); and twenty-nine single Sermons which Prince published from 1717 to 1756. For an extended notice of his publications, see Sewall, Funeral Discourse. A large portion of his most valuable library is now in the Boston Public Library. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, 1, 304; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Prince, Thomas (2), an American writer and editor, son of the preceding, was born in 1722, and was educated at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1740. He edited the earliest American periodical, The Christian History, containing Accounts of the Religious and Moral State of British and America for 1743 (Boston, 1744-45, 2 vols. 8vo), which was published weekly. He died in 1748. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Princes Sacerdotum (chief of priests). This is a title sometimes applied by Tertullian, Augustine, and others to a bishop, but used in the same sense as archbishop, pontifex maximus, that is, high-priest. See Bishop; Priest.

Princess (πριγκίπισσα, sarßa) occurs but seldom in the Scriptures (1 Kings xi, 3; Lam. i, 1; elsewhere "lady." See also Sarah); but the persons to whom it alludes, the daughters of kings, are frequently mentioned, and often with the expression of their spiritual state. Thus we read of Tamar's "garment of divers colors" (2 Sam. xiii, 18), and the dress of the Egyptian princess, the wife of Solomon, is described as "taiment of needlework," and "clothing of wrought gold" (Ps. xlv, 13, 14). Pringle, Francis, a minister of the Associate Presbyterian Church, was a native of Ireland, and was born about the year 1750. He came to this country some time near the close of the last century, and died in New York City in 1833. He preached a Sermon on the Qualifications and Duties of the Ministers of Christ before the Associate Synod of Ireland (1758), which was published in Ireland and America; and a sermon of his on Prayer for the Prosperity of Zion appeared in the Religious Monitor after his death. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ix, 64 sq.

Pringle, Sir John, a Scotch philosopher and physician, was born in Roxburghshire in 1747. He settled in Edinburgh about 1734, and after 1748 resided in London, where he distinguished himself greatly, and became president of the Royal Society in 1773. He was for a time professor of pneumatics and ethical philosophy in Edinburgh University. He died in 1782. He divided pneumatics into the following parts: 1. A physical inquiry into the nature of such subtle and material substances as are imperceptible to the senses, and known only from their operations. 2. The nature of immaterial substances connected with matter, in which is demonstrated by natural evidence, the immortality of the human soul. 3. The nature of immaterial created beings not connected with matter. 4. Natural theology, or the existence and attributes of God demonstrated from the light of nature. Ethos, or moral philosophy, he divided into theoretical and practical parts, in treating of which the author, he chiefly uses are Cicero, Marcus Antonius, Puffendorf, and lord Bacon. Carlyle describes him as "an agreeable lecturer, though not master of the science he taught." "His lectures were chiefly a compilation from lord Bacon's works; and had it not been for Puffendorf's small book, which he made his text, we should not have been instructed in the rudiments of the science." Nevertheless, we see that he discussed topics which must issue, sooner or later, in a scientific jurisprudence and political economy. See M'Cosh, Scottish Philosophy, p. 109.

Pringle, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Perth, Scotland, in 1750. His parents paid great attention to his early culture, and, after a successful study at the best schools and at the Academy in Perth, he finished his collegiate studies at the University of Edinburgh. He then studied medicine, and, as soon as admitted to practice, emigrated to the United States in 1787, concluding not to practice, he returned to Scotland, studied theology in Glasgow under the Rev. John Dick, D.D., was licensed April 15, 1823, and entered upon his labors as a probationer, and as such preached for some time in Scotland, when he again left his native land, and came to the United States in the year 1837, and soon after joined the Associate Presbytery of Cambridge. In June, 1830, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Associate Congregation of Rye Gate, Vt. He labored faithfully in behalf of this his only charge, and when his health failed him he resigned June 21, 1852, after a ministry of twenty-two years. He died Dec. 14, 1858. Mr. Pringle was a good writer, and some of his sermons bear marks of scholarly attainments. He was engaged during the last few years of his life upon a work called The Cosmography of Scripture. See Wilson, Pred. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 159. (J. L. S.)

Prior, Prioressa, are, according to the constitution of several ecclesiastical orders, the heads of their monasteries and nunneries. The prior is either the first or sole authority in the monastery, or he is subordinate, as second leader, to a higher officer of the same monastery, the abbot (q. v.). The latter case happens when the abbess makes use of his right to appoint in his place an assistant, a temporary vicar (q. v.), who is trusted with part of the prelate's attributes. Sometimes the statutes of the order prescribe that the prior shall be, as the second head of the monastery, elected by the monks, resolving him a peculiar, more or less independent (De Stat. Monast. iii, 35). In other orders, as in that of the Benedictines, and even in some regular congregations, we find only one, or a few, principal monasteries—the mother abbey, to which others owe their origin, or whose subsequent reform they have adopted—subject to the direction of abbots or prelates, i. e. local superiors of the first rank, while the inferior monasteries are administered by priors: the latter exercise the regular jurisdiction over the monks, and are bound only in important matters to obtain the consent of the abbot of the mother abbey. The same distinction subsists in the nunneries—Weiter u. Wehle, Kirchen-Lex. a. v.

Prior, Matthew, an English poet, writer of verse both sacred and profane, whose period of authorship was contemporary with the last years of Dryden and the earliest stage of Pope, was possessed of little vigor or originality, but was remarkable for his skill in versification and his gay and easy grace of imagery and diction. His occasional epigrams, and his lively but indecent tales, are his best productions; though there is merit, also, in his semi-metaphysical poem Alma, or the Progress of the Soul, and in his attempt at religious poetry in an allegory which has been compared to Pope's Essay on Man. It was greatly preferred to Pope's poem by John Wesley, because more consistent with the orthodox theory of human corruption. The design is certainly more poetical, because less tending to the argumentative, than the inferior execution has prevented Prior from attaining the occasion which was the same Redeems parts of Pope's poem from oblivion. Prior's poems were only the recreations of a man actively engaged in public life. He was born July 21, 1664, and was the son of a joiner in London. Accident having directed him to the art of laying out small plots, education was procured for him; and, on leaving Oxford, he distinguished himself, under the government of king William, as a dexterous diplomatist in several foreign missions. Deserting his political party, like so many men of higher rank in that slippery time, he PRIORY

PRIOR

PRIOR is a religious house occupied by a society of monks or nuns, the chief of whom is termed a prior (q.v.) or prioress; and of these there are two sorts: first, where the rule is the same as that of the church by the common governors as in the deaconesses; such were the cathedral priors, and most of those of the Augustinian order. Secondly, where the priory is a cell subordinate to some great abbey, and the prior is placed or displaced at the will of the abbot. There was a considerable difference in the institution of these two classes of priories at different times; for some were altogether subject to their respective abbeys, while others consisted of a stated number of monks, under a prior sent to them from the superior abbey; and those priories paid a pension yearly, as an acknowledgment of their subjection, but acted in other matters as independent bodies, and had the rest of the revenues for their own use. The priories or cells were always of the same order as the abbey on which they depended; sometimes they inhabited parts of a different sex; it being usual, after the Norman Conquest, for the great abbeys to build nunneries on some of their manors, which should be subject to their visitation.

Alien priories were cells, or small religious houses, in one or more combustibles on large religious monasteries. When manors or tithes were given to distant religious houses, the monks, either to increase the authority of their own order, or perhaps rather to have faithful stewards of their revenues, built convenient houses for the reception of their small fraternities of their body, who were deputed to reside at and govern these religious houses.---Hook, s.v.

In the fourth year of Henry V, during the war with France, all the alien priories (that is, those cells of the religious houses in England which belonged to foreign monasteries) which were not conventional were dissolved by act of Parliament and granted to the Crown. About the year 1540 the cathedrals founded for priories were turned into deaneries and prebends.

Priscilla (2 Tim. iv. 19). See Priscilla.

Priscilla (Πρίσκα, dim. from Priscia, Lat. ancien), the wife of Aquila, and probably, like Phoebe, a deaconess. She shared the travels, labors, and dangers of her husband, and is always named along with him (Rom. xvi. 3; Acts xiv. 19; 1 Cor. xvi. s. 1 Cor. xvi. 19; Acts xvi. 54). The name is Priscilla (Πρίσκα) in 2 Tim. iv. 19, and (according to the true reading) in Rom. xvi. 8, and also (according to some of the best MSS.) in 1 Cor. xvi. 19. Such variation in a Roman name is by no means unusual. We find that the name of the wife is placed before that of the husband in Rom. xvi. 2; 2 Tim. iv. 19, and (according to some of the best MSS.) in Acts xvii. 26. It is only in Acts xviii. 2 and 1 Cor. xvi. 19 that Aquila has unequivocally the first place. Hence we should be disposed to conclude that Priscilla was the more energetic character of the two; and it is a particular to be noticed that she took part, not only in her husband's exercise of hospitality, but likewise in the theological instruction of Apollos. Yet we observe that the husband and the wife are always mentioned together. In full phrase it may be said that Priscilla is the example of what the married woman may do, for the general service of the Church, in conjunction with home duties, as Phoebe is the type of the unmarried servant of the Church, or deaconess. Such female ministration was of essential importance in the state of society in the many churches in the early Christian days. Two main humanities were thus formed. The marks of archdeacon Evans on the position of Timothy at Ephesus are very just. "In his dealings with the female part of his flock, which, in that time and country, required peculiar delicacy and discretion, the counsel of the experienced Priscilla would be invaluable. Where, for instance, could he obtain more prudent and faithful advice than hers in the selection of widows to be placed upon the eusemasy list of the Church, and of deaconesses for the ministry?" (Script. Bioth, ii. 296). It seems to more of our purpose to lay stress on this than on the theological learning of Priscilla. "De Prisca non dixit Virgilio, sed Priscilla, Aquisu usor, tunquam feminarum et genti Judaeic æruditam specimine, g. G. Zeltner (Altorf, 1709). See Aquila.

Priscillian, the noted originator or propagator of a heretical body of Christians who bore his name, was the first heretic who was executed after the establishment of Christianity by the Roman state. He was a native of the Iberian peninsula, and of noble birth. He flourished in the second half of the 4th century, possessed much wealth, had great reputation for learning, and was generally revered for his severe austerity. What his early occupation was is not known. He first figures in history as the propagator of the heretical dogmas which a certain Egyptian called Marcus, from Memphis, came to Spain to teach there. Priscillian, by his personal influence, succeeded in spreading them through all Spain, even to Africa, and even to Spain, making a number of proselytes of the female sex, convincing many priests, and even some bishops; among others, two bishops, Instantius and Salvianus, who became zealous defenders of the imported doctrines, which were substantially those of the Apollinarianism (q.v.). He taught the doctrine of Dualism and the Docetism of that sect, and it is charged that he adopted the strictest ascetic austerities in regard to celibacy, etc., by which he had rendered himself obnoxious to the civil authorities in the East and in Africa. There is some doubt as to the precise doctrines which Priscillian taught. As reported, his dogmas are a strange mixture of Gnostic and Manichaean absurdities combined with allegorical interpretations and mystical rhapsodies. He was also Sabellian in tendency in his rejection of a personal distinction in the Godhead, for he denied the reality of Christ's birth and incarnation. Among other things, he maintained that the visible universe was not the production of the Supreme Deity, but of some demon or malignant principle who derived his origin from chaos or darkness; he adopted the doctrine of emol, or emanations from the divine nature; he considered human bodies as compounded according to the twelve signs of the zodiac, and as prisons formed by the author of evil to enslave the mind; he also condemned marriage, and denied the resurrection of the body. This was the true heresy which the Priscillianists adopted was so rigid and severe that the charges of dissolute conduct brought against them by their enemies appear to be groundless. That they were guilty of dissimulation, and deceived their adversaries by cunning stratagems in order to accomplish what they deemed a sacred purpose, is true. Their doctrine was, according to St. Augustine, that deception is allowed to hide one's faith, and to simulate Catholic belief ("jura, perjura, secretum prodere nolit"). Neander (C. Hist. H., 711) observes that the reproach of impious fraud is thrown upon them, but is an abuse which he denies. It is, however, a fact that at least a part of the Priscillianists were addicted to unnatural turbidities, to which such a system must logically lead; but there is no evidence that they avowed that lying and perjury were lawful under all circumstances.

The bishop Hyginus of Cordova was the first to enter the lists against this heresy, and he strove, although without success, to gain back to the orthodox Church the bishops Instantius and Salvianus. Hyginus apprised Iacutus, the bishop of Merida, of the Priscillianic disorder that had arisen, and the hot-blooded zeal of this prelate was still more unsuccessful, and so were the efforts of all the other Catholic bishops. The boldness of the heretics increased every day, and bishop Hyginus himself, displeased with the severe measures inaugurated against them, became their protector. To arrest their progress, A synod was held in October, 380, at Saragossa, to which Instantius, Salvinianus, Kilpaldius, and Priscillianus were also invited. The heresiarchs failed to appear. The synod condemned their doctrines and resolved upon measures to stop their expansion. Catholic witnesses were summoned from amongst the Priscillianist meetings; fasting on Sundays was interdicted; the anathema was launched against such as stayed from Church during the forty days of Lent and the three weeks of Epiphany, or received the Eucharist in the Church without participating at some of the sacraments; the name any man who was proscribed against those who should assume the name and functions of teachers without episcopal approbation; and every clerk who should, out of pride and vanity, clothe himself in the monastic garment, was put under ban. The execution of the decrees against Priscillianists was committed to the bishop Ithacius of Osuna. No worse choice could possibly have been made. He was a mere volupturny, and utterly destitute of all sense for spiritual things.

Excluded from the Church, the Priscillianists now took more decided measures for establishing themselves, and they had the boldness even to cause the consecration of Priscillian as their bishop of Avilla by the bishops Instantius and Salvinianus. Of course, by this step the Spanish Catholic prelates were greatly imbittered, and the Iadicius above mentioned, together with the divine Ambrose, was represented by Sulpicius Severus as a troublesome zealot, was dispatched to the emperor Gratian for the purpose of obtaining an order of banishment against Priscillian, Instantius, and Salvinianus. Gratian having issued the rescript thus demanded, the three heresiarchs repaired to Rome, in order to vindicate themselves before pope Damasus. But the pope refused to justify them. Salvinianus died at Rome, and his two companions went to Milan, where they tried, as unsuccessfully, to persuade St. Ambrose of their innocence. However, they afterwards were induced by one Onisius, called Macedonius, who obtained for them an imperial decree which allowed them to return to Spain and take possession of their sees, and ordered Volventius, vicar of Spain, to examine further into the matter. Priscillian and Instantius returned to Spain, as in triumph; and Ithacius, now in turn accused as a disturber of the public peace, was driven out of Spain. The latter was even on the very point of being arrested in Treves, where he had established himself, and of being transported back to the peninsula for trial, when Maximus, bishop of Treves, under the emperor Maximus, a different aspect. As soon as this new Cæsar arrived at Treves, Ithacius appeared before him against the Priscillianists. Maximus, who desired the whole matter to be disposed of as a purely ecclesiastical affair, ordered a synod to be held, in 384, at Bordeaux, to which the heresiarchs were summoned. Instantius was deposed by the vote of the assembly, and Priscillian, foreseeing a similar fate, tried to prevent it by appealing to the emperor. This step was the cause of his ruin. The emperor now took the matter in hand: Priscillian and his associates were brought to Treves, where Maximus resided at the time, and the most violent adversities of the sect, Iadicius and Ithacius, appeared as accusers. The latter of these two prelates, if Sulpicius Severus is to be trusted, suspected of Priscillianism any man whom he saw studying and fasting much; and, against all precedents, appeared as an impassioned accuser, before a worldly tribunal, in a religious affair. St. Martin, bishop of Tours, a truly pious man, also at the time in the imperial court, held it to be an outrage upon that august and holy man that such a matter should be tried by a secular court—that heretics should become liable to punishment with torture and death—and besought the emperor to leave the affair in the hands of the bishop, or, at least, to decide it without bloodshed. As long as Martin was present, the trial was delayed; on his departure, Maximus promised there should be no bloodshed, but he was induced by Ithacius and two other Spanish bishops, Rufus and Magnus, to break his word. The prefect who tried the case probably employed tortures to obtain avowals. Priscillian, the rich widow Euchochria, and several other members of the bishops were also condemned, not only as false teachers, but also as violators of the civil laws. They were either beheaded or punished with confiscation and exile (365).

The execution of Priscillian by the sword, and of several of his associates, did not run the sect, but seemed rather to give it new life and vigour. The Priscillianists got possession of the bodies of their dead, and brought them to Spain, where Priscillian was honored as a martyr. People swore by his name. The most distinguished bishops, Martin of Tours, St. Ambrose, Theognostus, and pope Stilicho, sternly blamed the cruelty with which Ithacius and his friends had treated the heretics, and marked their abhorrence of the cruelty by separating from the communion of Ithacius and the other bishops who had approved the death penalty for heresy in the Christian Church. But the emperor Maximus went on until his death (387) persecuting the Priscillianists as criminal Manicheans, and was even on the point of sending to Spain a military commission with unlimited powers to pursue the accused and punish the guilty with confiscation and death; and only abandoned the enterprise on the eve of his death.

The gravity of the measures adopted for the punishment of heresy at the time to which we refer obliges us to turn aside to remark (1) that heresy was declared against by the State for the first time under Theodosius the Great, the first emperor who was baptized in the Nicene faith. He was determined to put an end to the Arian interregnum, and therefore proclaimed the exclusive authority of the Nicene Creed, and at the same time enacted the first rigid penalties not only against the pagan idolatry, the practice of which was permitted by the emperor Theodosius, but also against all Christian heresies and sects. The ruling principle of his public life was the unity of the empire and of the orthodox Church. In the course of fifteen years this emperor issued at least fifteen penal laws against heretics (comp. Cod. Theodos. xvi, tit. v, leg. 6-33), by which he gradually deprived them of all right to the exercise of their religion, excluded them from all civil offices, and threatened them with fines, confiscation, banishment, and in some cases (as the Manicheans, the Auliani, and even the Quartodecimans) with death. The passage that dates the State-Church theory of the persecution of heretics and the embodiment of it in legislation. His primary design, it is true, was rather to terrify and convert than to punish the refractory subjects (so Soccone amminta, Hist. Ecclesiæ, lib. vii, c. 12). From the theory, however, to the practice was a single step; and this step his rival and colleague, Maximus, took when he inflicted capital punishment on Priscillian and some of his followers. This was the first shedding of the blood of heretics by a Christian prince for religious opinions. (2) We wish to note also that, while the execution of the Priscillianists is the only instance of the bloody punishment of heretics in this period, as it is the first in the history of Christianity, the propriety of violent measures against heresy was thenceforth vindicated even by the best fathers of the Church (see on this point Augustine's position as marked out by Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 217 sq.; Schaff, Ch. Hist. ii, 144, 145), and soon none but the persecuted parties were heard to protest against religious persecution. We need hardly add that the attitude of the Church, and especially of the Emperor Leo the Great, as its first and clearest representative, became the advocate and executioner of the death penalty for heresy. See HERESY; INQUESTION; ROMANISM.

After the death of Maximus, the emperor Theodosius ordered a synod to be held in 389, to settle the difficulties that had arisen among the bishops of Gaul,
In Egypt it is plain both that special places were used as prisons, and that they were under the custody of a military officer (Gen. xi. 3; xiii. 17). During the wandering in the desert we read on two occasions of confinement "in a ward" (Deut. xx. 13; 1 Sam. xiv. 44); but as imprisonment was not directed by the law, as we hear of none till the time of the kings, when the prison appears as an appendage to the palace, or a special part of it (1 Kings xxii. 27). Later still it is distinctly described as being in the king's house (Jer. xxxix. 2; xxxvii. 11). In the Nehemiah period (Neh. xii. 26) we have the case also at Babylon (2 Kings xxxv. 27). But private houses were sometimes used as places of confinement (Jer. xxxviii. 15), probably much as Chardin describes Persian prisons in his day, viz. houses kept by private speculators for prisoners to be maintained there at their own cost (Voy. vi, 100). Public prisons other than these, though in use by the Canaanitish nations (Judg. xvi. 21, 25), were unknown in Judaea previous to the captivity. Under the Herods we hear again of royal prisons attached to the palace, or in royal fortresses (Luke iii. 20; Acts xii, 4, 10; Josephus, Ant. xviii. 5, 2; Macherus). By the Romans Antonia was used as a prison at Jerusalem (Acts xxiii. 10), and at Cæsarea the praetorium of Herod (ver. 35). The sacerdotal authorities also had a prison under the superintendence of special officers, as at Antioch (1 Macc. iv. 27), and as at Jerusalem (ver. 10). The royal prisons in those days were doubtless managed after the Roman fashion, and chains, fetters, and stocks were used as means of confinement (see xvi. 24, and Job xii, 27). One of the readiest places for confinement was a dry, or partially dry, well or pit (see Gen. xxxviii. 24, and Jer. xxxviii. 6-13); but the usual place appears, in the time of Jeremiah, and in general, to have been accessible to visitors (Jer. xxxviii. 5; Matt. xi. 2, xxv. 36, 39; Acts xxiv, 26).—Smith. From the instance of the Mamertine Prison at Rome (q. v.), in which the same twenty places were sometimes occupied by one prisoner, many have rashly assumed that the Roman prisons generally were subterranean; but at Thessalonica at least, even "the inner prison" (Acts xvi. 24) seems to have been on the ground-floor ("doors," ver. 26; "spring in," ver. 29). See DION.

PRISON. ECLERICAL. A bishop was required to have one or more prisons for criminals in 1261. That of the bishop of Chichester remains over his palace gate; and the bishop of London's gate-house stood at the west side of Westminster Abbey. The southeastern prison, in western Europe (c. 1657); Hefele, Concil. eccl. i. 719; ii. 27 sq.; iii. 18 sq.; Milman, Lat. Christianity, i. 276-78; Pusey, Hist. of the Councils A.D. 51-381 (1875); Alzog, Kirchengesch. i. 872 sq.; Neander, Ch. Hist. ii. 710, 718.

PRISON is represented in the A. V. by the following Heb. and Gr. words: 1. קֹשׁ, רקז, for πεύρα, a "chain," is joined with גָּזַע, and rendered a prison (Sept. οἶκος διώρων; Vulg. carcere). 2. נָבִּים, נָבִים, and נָבִים, with גָּז (Sept. οἶκος φυλακής; Jer. xxxvii. 16). 3. שׁוֹדֵד, from פָּרַד, "burn," or "twist," the stocks (xx. 2). 4. בַּקֵּשׁ, בַּקֵּשׁ, and בַּקֵּשׁ; φυλακή; carcere (Genesis, Theur. p. 879). 5. בְּלַחְצָה; δέχομαινον; carcere. 6. פֶּלֶשׁ; φυλακή; custodia; also intens. οἶκος τῆς φυλακῆς. 7. רַבָּא; αἰσθανόμενοι; carcere. 8. פֶּלֶשׁ; φυλακή; custodia; also intens. οἶκος τῆς φυλακῆς. 9. רַבָּא; διώρω; carcere: properly a tower. 10. מִיִּדְנָה; מִיִּדְנָה; מִיִּדְנָה. 11. מִיִּדְנָה is sometimes "prison" in the A. V. as Gen. xxxix. 20. 11. מִיִּדְנָה; מִיִּדְנָה; carcere; probably the "stocks" (as in the A. V.) or some such instrument of confinement, perhaps understood in the Sept. as a sewer or underground passage. 12. In the N.T. λαβάριον, οἰκεία, θύρα; usually φυλακή.
Prison Reform. Prison discipline has in recent times become a matter of so much moment that its consideration is forced upon every philanthropist, especially the believer of the new dispensation—the law of love. Under the ancient discipline, torture; the exposure in the pillory, and other like dedications of the offender to public vengeance have long been abandoned as barbarous practices. Death—punishment has been much narrowed in its application; and transportation, apart from any question of effectiveness, has been rendered impracticable, except within a very narrow compass.

The movement for the alleviation of the horrors of imprisonment by physical and moral improvement of the conditions of prisoners may be said to be not only Christian, but modern. We get nothing from the prison discipline of our own times, nor from China, nor from the Middle Ages, that accounts for much in the modern systems of prison discipline. In Greece and Rome punishments were inflicted in other ways. It must be borne in mind that among the ancients the institution of slavery rendered the prison system unnecessary. It kept the functions of punishing ordinary criminals from the public administration of the affairs of a state, and placed it in private hands. Hence there was no criminal law, properly speaking. The corpus juris, so full of minute regulations in all matters of civic ritual and law, has very little to do with criminal law, by reason of the criminals became slaves, and ceased to be objects of the attention of the law. In the Roman empire there were houses, called ergastula, for the incarceration of criminals and refractory slaves. The feudal barons had towers in their castles, called dojones (whence our word dungeon), for the confinement of their captive foes or refractory retainers. Sometimes the prison vaults were cut in the solid rock below the surface of the earth.

When imprisonment became a function of the State in the administration of justice, it was often carelessly, and occasionally, exercised. One of the practical cases of awarding it as a punishment arose more rapidly than the organization for controlling its use. In the 15th and 16th centuries the Society of the Brothers of Mercy in Italy paid much attention to the incarcerated unfortunate transgressors of society, and so greatly alleviated their forlorn condition that many of the Brothers of Mercy are reterently spoken of to this day. St. Carlo Borromeo and St. Vincent de Paul are to be especially mentioned. But the earliest instance of a prison managed on any principles of policy and humanity seems to be that of the Castle of La Santé, an example which was soon followed by some of the German towns, especially Hamburg and Bremen. In England, on several occasions, grave abuses have been exposed by parliamentary inquiries and otherwise in the practice of prison affairs. It is well known that the real impulse to prison improvement was first communicated by the celebrated Howard (q. v.), whose sufferings, when taken by a privateer and imprisoned at Brest, during the Seven Years' War are said to have first directed his attention to this subject. The fruits of his observations in his repeated visits of kindness of Europe were given to the world partly in his publications and partly on examination before Parliament. Howard's exertions, and those of Mrs. Fry and other investigators, awakened in the public mind the question whether any practice in which the public interest was so much involved should be left to something like mere chance—to the negligence of local authorities and the personal disposition of jailers. As in other reform movements, so in this, our own country has been most progressive, and Europe has willingly taken lessons from America. The experiences of our prison system by the Freeman's visitors, Messrs. Beaumont and De Tocqueville (in 1834), De Metz and Houtet (in 1837), Dr. Juliens (sent from Prussia), and Mr. Crawford (from England), have certainly contributed very largely to the present state of public opinion on the subject. In 1834, inspectors were appointed to report annually on the state of English and Scottish prisons—a measure which had been earlier adopted with reference to Ireland; and their reports may be consulted with advantage.

The tendency lately has been to regulate prison discipline throughout the world, for the plain reason that too much pain is bestowed on it—that criminals are not worthy of having clean, well-ventilated apartments, wholesome food, skilful medical attendance, industrial training, and education, as they now have in this country. There are many arguments in favor of criminals being so treated, and the objections urged against such treatment are held by those who are best acquainted with the subject to be invalid; for it has never been maintained by any one that a course of crime has been commenced and pursued for the purpose of enjoyment in the scenes of imprisonment. Perhaps those who chiefly promoted the several prominent systems expected from them greater results, in the shape of the reformation of criminals, than have been obtained. If they have been disappointed in this, it can, at all events, be said that any prison in the now recognized system is no longer like the old prisons, an institution in which the young criminals advance into the rank of proficients, and the old improve each other's skill by mutual communication. The system now received is that of separation, so far as it is practicable. Two other systems are: the employment system, and the solitary system. The former imposed entire silence among the prisoners even when assembled together; the latter endeavored to accomplish their complete isolation from sight of or communication with their race. By the separate system, the criminals are prohibited from communicating with each other; but they are visited by persons whose intercourse is more likely to elevate than to degrade—as chaplains, teachers, Scripture-readers, the superior officers of the prison, and those who have the external control over it." See PENITENTIARY.

The history of the American prison is rich in illustration of the principle that the State, and is regarded as the most perfect organization of the kind in the world. According to the annual report, the objects of this society are threefold: 1. Human attention to persons arrested, protecting them from legal sharpers, and securing their impartial trial. 2. Encouragement and aid of discharged convicts. 3. Careful study of prison discipline, observation of the causes of crime, and inquiry as to the proper means of its prevention. The last is considered the most important of its objects. The statistics of the work of the society during the year 1873 showed among the following figures under the first object named above: 98,560 friendless persons visited in the detention prisons of New York and Brooklyn, all of them counseled, and many of them assisted; 25,250 complaints carefully examined; 6148 complaints withdrawn at the instance of the society as trivial, or found on mistake or petition; 7922 persons discharged by the courts on recommendation of the society, who were young, innocent, committed their offenses under mitigating circumstances, or were evidently penitent; a total of 133,922 cases in which relief of discharged convicts was procured. Among the prisoners of New York city, and 3649 provided with permanent situations; a total of 22,448. Aid has also been extended to thousands of persons connected with the families of the prisoners. For some years a few hundred dollars have been annually distributed on New-year's-day among insipient families. By its act of incorporation it is made the duty of the Prison Association to visit, once by the President of the society, every year, the prisons of the State of New York, and annually report to the Legislature their condition." In 1876 the fourth National Prison Reform Congress was held in New York City, and very advanced ground was taken. Those especially interested in this subject will do well to peruse the minutes of these proceedings, and the reports of the congress. This is the situation in German railways: the engines are considered the souls of the trains; the drivers are regarded as the protectors of the public.

Pritchard, Samuel, a Wesleyan missionary, was born in the first quarter of our century. He was converted in 1848, and feeling called of God to preach the glad tidings, he entered the itinerant ranks in 1852, and was sent to Biabou Circuit, in the island of St. Vincent. He was there only two years when he was seized with malignant yellow fever, and died Feb. 28, 1858. During the brief period of his ministerial labors he gained the affectionate regard of the community in which he resided. See Wesleyan Mag. 1855, p. 872.

Prititus is the name of several legendary kings of ancient India. It is, however, especially one king of this name who is the favorite hero of the Puranas. His father was Nimi, his mother Pitikriti, his name endorses were Akshita and Nimi. Vishnu, v. v.) Vishnu passed through his wickedness: for when he was inaugurated monarch of the earth, he caused it to be everywhere proclaimed that no worship should be performed, no oblations offered, and no gifts bestowed upon the Brahmins. The Rishis, or Saints, hearing of this proclamation, entreated the king to revoke it, but in vain; hence they fell upon him and slew him. But the kingdom now being without a king, as Vena had left no offspring, and the people being without protection, the sages assembled, and consulted how to produce a son from the body of the dead king. First, then, they rubbed his thigh; from it, thus rubbed, came forth a being called Nisháda; and by this means the wickedness of Vena having been expelled, they proceeded to rub the right arm of the dead king, and by this fiction engendered Prititus, who came forth resplendent in person, and in his right hand appeared the mark of the discus of Vishnu, which proved him to be a universal emperor, one whose power would be invincible even by the gods. The mighty Prititus soon removed the grievances of the people; he protected the earth, performed many sacrifices, and made gifts to the Brahmins. On being informed that in the interval in which the earth was without a king all vegetable products had been withheld, and that consequently the people had perished, he in great wrath marched forward to assail the earth. The earth, assuming the figure of a cow, fled before him, but seeing no escape from the power of the king, at last submitted to him, and promised to renew her fertility, provided he made all places level. Prititus therefore uprooted mountains, levelled the surface of the earth, established boundaries of towns and villages, and induced his subjects to take up their abode where the ground was made level. Then Prititus caused the earth to appear before his throne in the shape she had assumed, and commanded that any one who should apply to her with a wish, and bring a calf with him to milk her, should be granted his wish. This is the celebrated voice which the Brahmins and the Kshatriyas sought such tremendous battles that the gods found it necessary to intervene. Now the earth resumed her former liberality, the people were relieved of their want, and the young god, presented by Pritius to Vishnu and the Kshatriyas, was called the sun-god with an all-illuminating crown, by the sea-god with a parasol trimmed with pearls, walked through the world a conqueror in every battle, bestowing rain or sunshine at his will. He now prepared for invading the empire of Siva, and for the general war a great sacrifice of horses; but when he was going to offer the hundredth, Indra managed to steal the horse, as the last performance would have secured victory. Prithe's son pursued the robber, who could not otherwise escape him than by changing himself into the form of a penitent friar, wrapped with ashes and bones, and walking with his head bowed down. Indra succeeded in stealing the horse a second time, and only escaped the unerring weapon of his foe by the intervention of Brah. Prithe resigned power in favor of his son, and retired to a solitude, where he was absorbed by the divinity. The legend of Prithe evidently records some historical fact regarding the civilizing influences exerted by a great king of Hindostan antiquity.

Pritz, Johann Georg, a German theologian, was born at Leipzig in 1682. After having been an evangelical minister at Leipzig and at Zerbst, he became superintendent at Schleiz. He was appointed professor of theology at Greifswald, and in 1711 was called to Frankfort-on-the-Main as senior minister. He died in the year 1732. Among his numerous writings we cite the following: De contemptu dictaturn apud antiquos philosophos (Leipsic, 1693, 4to);—De prorogatione sexus masculi et feminei (ibid. 1705, 4to);—De immortalitate hominis contra Aquinatium (ibid. 1700, 4to);—Profeb. de Redissimine (noted for eloquence) (ibid. 1707, 4vo);—Introductio in Novum Testamentum (ibid. 1709, 8vo). He also edited a work of opuscules of St. Macaire, and translated and continued the writings of the fathers in Latin and other English authors.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Private Baptism. The Church, even in her most ritualistic times, has always held that, in case of danger or sickness, baptism might be administered at any time or in any place. In Thessaly, when baptism was restricted to Easter, many died without it, and in consequence the old prohibitions were mitigated, the font being hallowed at Easter and Pentecost for occasional use. Children, if in danger, might be baptized on the day of their birth, by a decree of the councils of Gera. 517, and Winchester, 1071; and the Constitutions of Otho. 1288. According to German Catholic teachings, the vessels in which any have been baptized are to be carried to church and there applied to some necessary use, and not to any common purpose, out of reverence to the sacrament (Lancioni's Constitutions, 1223); and the water with which baptism was ministered was to be thrown into the fire (Helfert). The bishop is to give the church to be put into the font. The vessel, Lyndwood says, was to be large enough to permit immersion, and was to be "burned or deputed to the use of the Church," by Edmond's Constitutions of 1256; that is, Lyndwood explains, the vases used in washing the church. Wooden vessels were burned. In England, in the Anglo-Saxon period, children, if sick, were brought to the priest, by Ælfric's Canons, 597, who was to baptize them, from whose district soever they were brought, without delay.

Private Confession. See CONFESION.

Private Judgment is the right the Protestants claimed in the Reformation movement of the 16th century, and has since become the corner-stone of Protestantism (q. v.). The term signifies the right of man to read the Bible for himself and form his own judgment of its meaning under the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit. In the view of Protestantism, man does not only enjoy this privilege, but is bound to exercise it. But, on the other hand, the Romish Church steadfastly denies this right to any man, and holds the Church alone authority and guide in Scripture interpretation. On this point the Council of Trent thus decrees: "In order that men may learn to distinguish between the One mother Church, whose right it is to judge of the true meaning and interpretation of Sacred Writ, or contrary to the unanimous consent of the fathers, even though such interpretation should never be published. If any disobey, let them be denounced by the ordinaries, and punished according to the laws of the Church. For it is evident that the Church holds that her Church alone is entitled to judge of the true meaning and interpretation of Sacred Scripture. To the same effect the creed of pope Pius IV declares: "I also admit the Holy Scriptures according to that sense which our holy mother the Church has held, and does hold, to which it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Scriptures. Neither will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the fathers. In opposition to such doctrines as these, the Church of England explicitly teaches that every man is bound to judge for himself of the true meaning of Scripture. Thus I Thess. v. 21, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." Acts xvii. 11, "These were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether these things were so." Mark xii, 24, "And Jesus answering said unto them, Do ye not yet know, because ye know not the Scriptures, neither the power of God?" Luke xvi. 29, "Abraham saith unto him, They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them." Dr. Whately shows this in a very striking manner in a passage which he extracts from his Cautions for the Times: "A man who resolves to place himself under a certain guide to be implicitly followed, and decides that such and such a Church is the appointed infallible guide, does decide, on his own private judgment, the one most important point which includes in it all other decisions relative to religion. Thus, by his own showing, he is unfit to judge at all, and can have no ground for confidence that he has decided rightly in that. If, according to his own mind, he will not trust himself, even on this point, but resolves to consult his priest, or some other friends, and be led entirely by their judgment thereupon, still he does in thus resolving exercise his own judgment as to the counsellors he so relies on. The responsibility of forming some judgment is in each person, however, unless we may deem ourselves to bear it, we cannot possibly get rid of, in any matter about which we really feel an anxious care. It is laid upon us by God, and we cannot shake it off. Before a man can rationally judge that he should submit his judgment in other things to the Church of Rome, he must judge, 1. that there is a God; 2. that Christianity comes from God; 3. that Christ has promised to give an infallible authority in the Church; 4. that such authority resides in the Church of Rome. Now, to say that men who are competent to form sound judgments upon these points are quite incompetent to form sound judgments about any other matters in religion is very like saying that men may have sound judgments of their own before they enter the Church of Rome, but that they lose all sound judgment entirely from the moment they hold by the deprival of the Communion, one of the punishments inflicted on offending members of the clerical body during the earlier centuries. Those punishments included suspension, degradation, pricatio communis, or deprivation, corporal chastisement, and excommunication. Pricatio was of two kinds, namely, a restriction to communio peregrini, or to communio laici. The former had reference to the mode in which strangers were treated who did not bring with them living members of some Christian Church: they were looked upon with suspicion, and till they could clearly themselves were not allowed to come to the Lord's table, nor to receive any temporal support from the Church. In this real complaint, such chymen were treated even in their own Church: they were deprived of means of support, and prevented from officiating or being present at the Lord's Supper. Communio laica was a punishment which required a clergyman to communicate as a layman, and among the lay members of the Church. See COMMUNIO LAICA and COMMUNIO PEREGRINA.

Privation is a philosophical term which, according to Plato, is limitation, imperfection, the inherent condition of all finite existence, and the necessary cause of evil. Leibniz (Cours De, § 62, 72; Étude sur la bonté de Dieu, livre partie, § 29, 31; Sieme partie, § 57, 63), after Augustine, Alcalà, and others, held similar views.

PRIVATION, ECCLESIASTICAL, is one of the vindictive, i.e. positive, penalties (in opposition to the censures) which the ecclesiastical laws inflict in the Church of Rome on prebendaries for grave and repeated offenses against the discipline of the Church. It is the suspension of an ecclesiastic from his office and prebend. It differs from the disciplinary transfer by which the delinquent receives, in place of the prebend which is taken from him, another, though inferior one; it also differs from absolute deposition, by which an ecclesiastic is deprived forever of his office and official income, and is declared unable for any further employment, while the privation does not forbid him the hope of getting some time another prebend. The privation, as long as it lasts, deprives its object of the power of performing the ecclesiastical functions of consecration or jurisdic

The person of the clergyman, of whatever degree, was protected from violence by the penalty of excommunication against the offender; by the latter—in England called "benefit of clergy" (q. v.)—the clergyman was exempted from the ordinary civil tribunals, and could only be tried in the ecclesiastical court.—Chambers, s. v.

This privilege was not to be absolutely abrogated, or at least modified. It comprehended the independent jurisdiction of the clergy (privilegium forti), according to which not only all litigious concerns among the clergy themselves, but all personal, and most of the civil concerns against clerks, were brought before, and decided by, ecclesiastical courts; likewise not only their official transmissions, as functionaries of the Church, but also their civil crimes, were tried and punished by clerical tribunals. To the same class of privileges belongs the benefit of competence, in consequence of which, in matters of debts and subhistoire, the clerical person must be left the means of living according to his station. Finally, the clergy obtained at an early period a number of immunities, which were gradually increased. They were, in consideration of the spiritual than by which they might resort to a priest, exempted from the administration of governmental or communal functions, from tutorships and guardianships, from military and other services to which all other citizens of the State are bound (immunitatem personalitatem). With these was connected the immunity from extraordinary contributions (immunitatem rei publicae), necessary for the building of roads, bridges, channels; from lodging soldiers; from purveyances in times of war (immunitatem militiae). Many of these immunities were granted to the clergy by the emperors Theodosius (Cod. Theod. 2, 8, 11, 14-17, 24, 36, De episc. eccl. et cler. xvi, 2) and Justinian (i, 1, 2, 6, 59, Cod. De episc. et cler. i, 3) in the times of the Roman empire; afterwards by the Frankish kings (Copp. Regg. Franc. lib. vii, c. 165, 290, 467); consolidated by the ecclesiastical legislation (c. 65, c. xii, qu. 2; c. 40, c. xvi, qu. 1; c. 4, 7, x, De tonum, eccl. iii, 49; Sextus, c. 1, 8, cod. cxx, 23; Sextus, c. 4, De consensu, iii, 20; Clem. c. 3, cod. cxxi, 15, etc.), and urgently recommended by the Council of Trent to the worldly rulers (Conc. Trid. sess. xxiv, c. 20, De ref.)

In our times most of the civil legislations impose the same regular taxes on all citizens, without exception, and regardless of former immunities. But in many European states the clergy are unconditionally exempted from communal functions, guardianships, and personal prebend, and are also exempted from military service—Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon.

Privileged Days, those signified by peculiar ceremonies. The following are some of the most important: the first, fourth, and fifth Saturdays in Lent, and Easter Eve, Ash-Wednesday, first and fourth Sundays in Lent, Palm-Sunday, Good-Friday, and Holy Week.—Walcott, Sacred Archaeology, s. v.

Privileged Sundays, those on which, in some churches of mediæval times, "histories" (lessons from Holy Writ) were read.

Privilegium Altariæ is a privilege granted by the pope that masses for the dead said before a certain altar may procure an indulgence to the deceased. For ever and for all days (privilegium perpetuum et quotidianum) this privilege has been granted by Benedict XIII (de date 29 July, 1711, "omnibus ecclesiis") to all patriarchal, metropolitan, and cathedral churches for the said altar. Generally it is granted for seven years only (septennium), running from the day of the grant. The indulgence can be obtained for the dead if a mass of requiem (called sometimes a black mass) be said before the privilege is in force, but if the rite of the votive mass, nor, in consequence, of a requiem (f. e. in fes. duplice, coronam exempta, etc.), the application or intension "pro defuncto" is sufficient, as in such a case no mass of requiem can be said even at the privileged altar. On the Day of All-Souls all priests before altars can use
PRIVILEGIO CANONIS 604 PROBABILITY

Privilegium Canonis. (1) Certain exemptions of the clergy from the State. See Privilegium. (2) That privilege of ecclesiastics which makes a real injury to a member of the clergy punishable by the law of the Church with a punishment equivalent to that of the State. Several former canonists had established the principle that such real injuries must, after examination, be punished with excommunication (for instance, can. Si quis de incursis, 22; De propterferiorum, 23, c. 17, qu. 4), the heresy of belonging to the Church and no one else. The Council of Rheims, in 1131, to sanction that extreme penalty. The canon then decreed, commencing with "Si quis sündente diabolo," was made by Innocent II, in 1139, a general law of the Church; and this is the reason why the privilege mentioned above is called Privilegium canonis. In Gratian's decree this ecclesiastical law is given as can. 29, c. 17, qu. 4. It contains some further dispositions, for it states that it is applicable also to real injuries perpetrated against monks, and that abjuration, except in the dying hour, can only be obtained if the excommunication applies to a person apprehended personally in Rome. This canon has received in the course of time an enlarged interpretation for some cases and a restricted one for others. As a matter of course, the term "ecclesiastic" includes all those who received the tonsure; but the term "work" has also an extensive signification, as it includes every member of an order approved by the Church, even the novice. The law is moreover, applicable to cases where the dead body of a clergyman has been the object of some wanton outrage. On the other side, there are cases where a person, though belonging to the clergy, has no share in the privilege; for instance, the ecclesiastic who is degraded acta especially, when he is sentenced to hard labor; the clergyman who dresses in worldly clothes, or persists in a sinful way of life. The canon Si quis sündente speaks only of that kind of real injury which consists in "assault upon an ecclesiastic," but we have, of course, to take a more extensive view of the case: not only he who strikes, etc., the clergyman is to be punished by excommunication, but also the intellectual originator of such an outrage, or he in whose name it is committed, and who approves of it, or he who, being a witness to it, fails to do what is in his power to prevent it. It is necessary that the delinquent should have acted with the intention of injuring a clergyman: he who, ominino eýjaróndo, strikes another person, ignorant that he is a member of the clergy, is not to be excommunicated, but he who is strikes a layman whom he mistakes for a member of the clergy. If the quarrel originated with the ecclesiastic, the law cannot be applied to the person who is in the case of legitimate defence against him; this is also admitted in favor of a woman who defends her chastity against the assaults of a clergyman. An exception is also admitted in favor of the husband, son, father, or brother of a woman found in criminal conversation with an ecclesiastic. The rule that abjuration must be personally applied for in Rome has been restricted in recent times: it is no longer applicable to women, to monks, and other clerics living in community, when they have assaulted each other, or to sick and ailing persons. A report sent to Rome is sufficient in such cases. Sometimes, when the injury is a trifling one (tecta percussio), the bishop may grant a dispensation. In general the modern practice has become milder: it imposes the voyage to Rome as a penance only for injuries against the offender's own curate or bishop; abjuration is bestowed on his return by the bishop. — Wettw. u. Welle, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.

Proast, Jonas, an English divine, flourished in the closing half of the 17th and the early part of the 18th century. He is noted as a controversialist, and wrote, among other works, Letters to the Irish. After several former canons had established the principle that such real injuries must, after examination, be punished with excommunication (for instance, can. Probabilists are those who oppose the doctrine of Probability and assert that man is obliged, on pain of sinning, always to take the more probable side. The Jansenists and the Port-Royalists are of this class. See Probabilism.

Probabilism. The Roman Catholic Church recognizes no standard of ethics except that of her own construction. Protestants look to Scripture and to the rationalist, instead of the Church, for the basis for a legitimate moral decision. The eternal and objective foundations of the moral law are thus exchanged for the subjective view of personal individuals of eminence (see Wutke, Christian Ethics, i, 261-263). Not only is the decision left to the individual, instead of the Church, but that individual whose decision best suits the inquirer (see Sanchez, Op. Mor. i, 9, n. 12 sq.; Laymann, Theol. Mor. [1625] i, 11). Probability is a term used in philosophic parlance, as we may see in the article Probable, but in Christian theology it has become synonymous with Roman Catholic ethics. Though its principal source and advocacy are in the Order of the Jesuits, the whole Church of Rome has by its tacit acceptance of this doctrine become identified with it.

Definition. — Probability designates, in the domain of morals, an object so comprehensive, and including so many different branches, that we shall scarcely be able to delineate it here, even in its fundamental features. In order to define it we must depart from that moral idea which is the centre of the domain in which it moves: this is the certitude and firm conviction of the moral subject about the legitimacy of his acts. It is the opposite of this subjective consciousness which forms the object of all probabilistic questions. As the ground of the doctrine, it is assumed, then, that in human actions and decisions, certainty is not always possible as well as to their lawfulness or unlawfulness. Short of this certainty, the intellect passes through the stages of "doubt" and of "probability." Probability is a state of consciousness intermediate between certitude and incertitude, but approaching more or less to certitude, without reaching it entirely. Consequently, the state of probability, has risen above incertitude. Doubt is a wavering state between two judgments, between negation and affirmation of the goodness or possibility of an action; it excludes every positive approbation, every positive consent, every permanent decision in favor of either term of the moral antithesis. Probability has passed this uncertain wavering; it does not move hesitatingly to and fro; it has found a point of support, though the latter may not be absolutely trustworthy. In consequence, more or less positive decision in favor of one or the other term of the question is possible. Such a decision must not originate in any subjective whim; it must be founded on sufficient objective reasons. This gives us the true idea of the probable conscience: "Probable est id quoque probari potest, hoc est, quod ratione dignum est, ut sit opus conscientiae in matters of conscience thus: it is the decision or consent of conscience in regard to the moral permis-

sibility of an action, a decision founded on sufficient reasons, but not excluding all misgivings to the contrary. To the probable conscientia, then, corresponds, as its opposite, the probable conscientia (probabilita). An opinion as to the legitimacy or illegitimacy of an action is the more probable the stronger the reasons on which it rests. These reasons are either intrinsice, a part of the thing itself and its objective nature, or extrinsice, owing their weight to human authorities. The extrinsic probability of an opinion outsets itself with the repute and confidence enjoyed by the authorities which support it, while the intrinsic probability endeavors to conceive the rational foundation of the opinion in question. But whichever of these forms probability may assume, it can never be at variance with the decisions and doctrines of the Church. Absence of intrinsic and extrinsic contradictions is the negative condition of probability. To establish true and real probability (probabilita vera), a positive element is required, to wit, a more or less evident accord with the objective law, either with its spirit or with its more or less clearly expressed dispositions. It results from the nature of opinion that a variety and diversity of opinions be conceived, which, in regard to their legitimacy, are of equal or unequal value. Moreover, in the conflict of views with each other, it is an equal comparative “safety”; that is, the greater or less danger of moral culpability which they involve; and this greater or less moral “safety” of a view may or may not coincide with its greater or less “probability.” Hence the gradual scale of probable opinions, the highest degree being the opinio probabilissima, but the opinion tenius superior, being entirely excluded. The ascending degrees of the concurrent probable opinions are marked by the opinio more probabilia, que probabilia, and probabilia. The doctrine of probabilism is founded upon these distinctions. It is taught, with some variations, by four different schools, all of which agree in professing that it is lawful, in certain cases, to act upon opinions which are merely probable. These four schools of probabilism are called: Probabilism Simple, Acquisprobabilism, Probabiliorism (from probabilia, more probable), and Tutiorism (from tutor, more safe). The first holds that it is lawful to act upon any probable opinion, no matter how slight its probability. The second requires that the opinion shall be “solidly probable,” but holds that, provided the action is lawful, it is lawful to act upon it, even though the conflicting opinion should be equally probable. The third narrows much more the limits of what is allowed in the conflict of probable opinions, and only permits action on the more probable of the two; but permits the least reliable of the two opinions, the opinio is the “more safe.” The fourth requires that in all cases the more safe opinion shall be followed, even when the less safe opinion is much the more probable. The extreme rigorism which the last class requires has caused its division into absolute and modified tutiorism.

By the certainty of an opinion, says Fuchs, “we are to understand the more or less considerable remoteness of the danger of sin, or of error, or of encroachment on other persons’ rights. The more an opinion removes him who chooses it for his guide from the danger of actual sin, the more certain it is. The opinio tutor is that which declares that an action is not allowed; the opinio minus tuta is that which asserts the legitimacy of the action in question. As being allowed and the not being allowed of an action stand together in the same relation as liberty and law, it may be said that in the first is liberty, in the second law, is favored (libertati favet, legi favet).”

To these probabilistic systems is opposed a system espoused by the more consistent of Romish theologians of the Old Catholic type. It is called Antiprobabilism, and is a sort of anti-socially specific system which is not influenced on man’s actions, even to the most probable opinion. It requires that an opinion shall be absolutely morally certain, in order that it may be lawful for a man to act upon it in the light of Christian truth. But this system has been rejected by papal authority, declaring erroneous the not sequi opinensionem vel inter probabilities probabilissimam.”

History of Probabilism. — It is commonly said that the system of probabilism is modern; but this is only true of the discussions regarding it, for the doctrine itself, in some of its forms, is as old as the study of ethics, even considered as a moral science. The disputes regarding it arose with the science of casuistry, when men, in the 16th and 17th centuries, began to reduce morals to a system. It formed a leading subject of the controversy between the Jesuits and the Jansenists; but even in its modern form probabilism dates back to the close of the scholastic period. At the Council of Constance, in A.D. 1415, a debate had arisen on the subject of the murder of the duke of Orleans, assassinated in Paris Nov. 28, 1407, at the instigation of his political rival, the duke of Burgundy. The Franciscan Jean Petit had endeavored to justify the assembly of French noblemen held at Paris March 8, 1408; but his proposition had been condemned, at the request of chancellor Gerson, by the university and the bishop of Paris. When the matter was brought before the council in behalf of the duke of Burgundy, tried to prevent any conclusions unfavorable to Jean Petit, asserting that several authorities were in favor of Petit, and that, in consequence, his opinion was at least probable, and ought not to be peremptorily disposed of by way of rejection and condemnation. Germain defended a contrary view of the matter, and the council condemned as heretical the doctrine of the legitimacy of murder committed on the persons of tyrants, and stamped with the name of heretic all those who should pertinaciously maintain it (comp. Mansi, Coll. Conc., xxvii, 705, and xxviii, 869). This resolution left probabilism untouched, and condemned only a false application of its principles in a particular case.

The Dominican Bartolomeo de Medina is considered as the founder of probabilism in its usual signification. Through his commentary on the theological Summa of St. Thomas de Aquinas it entered the schools: “Si est opinio probabilis,” he says (quest. 19, art. 6, concl. 8), “licitum est eam sequi, licet opposita probabilior.” Many Thomist theologians adopted this proposition; among them are Lamoignon, Abrahante, and Lopez. Among the Jesuits, the celebrated Vasquez, was the first who (1598) positively took sides with the probabilists, and a number of members of his order followed in his footsteps. From this time forth the Jesuits did not maintain any opposition to the doctrine, and the alterations to which they led. Probabilism came to be synonymous with Jesuitism, so largely were the Jesuits identified with the advocacy of this pernicious dogma. This is, however, easily accounted for. The Jesuits had come on the stage at a time when the Church of Rome was in danger of being broken up, if not of being entirely dismembered. The Reformation had struck her heavy blows, and in some countries she was felled to the ground. Loyola’s order aimed at her recovery and restoration. The bride of Christ they saw endangered, and their mission was the salvation of the Roman Church at any price. In a struggle of life and death, as has been aptly said, one is not very careful in the use of measures; and in all warfare the sentiment holds good, though involving manifold violations of ordinary right, that the end sanctifies the means. The Jesuits were well aware that an essentially new phenomenon of the churchly life—that they stood upon purely human invention and power; it need not surprise us, therefore, that they felt called by their fundamental principles to the development of a new system of morality, a new social code, and the salvation of which is the glory of God through the exaltation of the visible Church, which, of course, is to them the Romish Church. The purpose zealously pursued by the Jesuits in the interest of Romish dominion—of becoming soul-guarding fathers and conscience-councelors, especially for men and women of eminence, required, on the other hand, that the Jesuits should acquire for themselves the highest possible repute in ethics—and hence it was requisite that they should become the literary representatives thereof; and, on the other, that this ethics should be moulded in adaptation to this end—should make itself not disagreeable and burdensome, but should become as elastic as possible in view of different wants—should be a "golden net for catching souls," as the Jesuits themselves were wont to call their own pliability. The more ramified and complex the network of casuistic ethics became, so much the more indispensable were the practiced conscience-counsellers, or, more properly, conscience-advocates; the more stairways and back doors they were able to turn attention to in conscience affairs, so much the more prized and influential they became. This explains the great compass and the peculiar character of Jesuitic ethics. They were but too well aware that it did not harmonize with the moral consciousness of the ancient Church, and they hesitated not to admit that they did not recognize earlier Church tradition as a criterion, but they rather would lay the foundations for a new tradition. The sophistical artifices in the doctrine of right and morality were not then first thought out and invented by Jesuitism; but it learned them by listening to weak, corrupt human nature, as others had here and there done before it. Jesuitism, moreover, was the first to set up these sophisms as rules; first, brought them into an organized system of doctrine, and formed them as methods of the Christian doctrine of morals; first scientifically constituted, authorized, and sanctioned them as leading principles of Catholic morality; and—what is not to be overlooked—has first applied them to the allotment of the moral life to the natural weaknesses of the different ranks and classes, in order that "the kingdom of heaven henceforth may suffer no violence."

We will not forget, however, that after the Theatines, in a general assembly of their order, in 1598, had formally denounced probabilism, several members of the Society of Jesus likewise raised their voice against the abuses of the system: we mention among them the Portuguese Ferdinand Rebelle and the Italian Comitolo. Angrily, wrote the latter, in the name of the order, to Mutius Vletesco, expressed similar opinions in a series of writings. We read in one of them: "Nonnullorum ex societate sententia, in rebus presentium ad mores spectantium, plus nimio libere non modo periculorum, sed etiam sanitatum, Deus universae insignia afferat detrimentis. Omne itinere studio periclitat ut qui docent scribuntur minime hac regula et norma in delicto sententiarium utantur: Tuere quis potest, probabilia est, nuncuro non curat. Verum ad eas sententias accedunt quae tutores, quae graviores majorisque nominis doctorum suffragis sunt frequenter stat: quae bonis moribus conducunt magis; quae denique pietatem alere et prodeunt quae, non vastare, non perdere." The Sorbonne, too, opened fire upon the probabilistic aberrations with the condemnation of the Magus director curatorium, incumbratum, et concussum, ex ordinis partibus, to Bishop Milhail, and the clergy of France continued the battle with praiseworthy zeal. The University of Louvain made similar declarations. In 1538 the Dominicans, in a general chapter held at Rome, joined their voice to these authorities. Again, some Jesuits, among others Cardinal Robert de Lorraine, as soon as they were ensured those of their order who were advocates of probabilism. Yet these antagonistic elements within Jesuitism were the exceptions, not the rule. The rank and file of the Society of Jesus were wedded to their new idols: and as the Jesuits, in the end, the chief representatives of Roman Catholic ethics in the 16th and 17th centuries, those who chose to attack Romanism levelled their guns directly at probabilism; while those who favored Romanism, or were themselves its supporters, but desired the downfall of Jesuitism, directly charged on this particular body of proof. The Jesuits themselves, in order to destroy this their enemies the Jesuits. Pascal, the great, if not immortal, advocate of the Port-Royalists, adopted this method. In his Lettres Provinciales he puts together these aberrations of members of the Jesuitic Order; and as he represents the doctrine of probabilism, it is a curious perversion of the principle of authority—the application of it to legitimize doubt and license. He stigmatized probabilism as the "morals of the Jesuits." The great publicity which the Provincial Letters owed was due, not only to their importunity, especially among the educated classes, an inflexible opinion against Jesuits, which continues to this day. A number of refutations of the Provincial Letters appeared, some of them very awkward. The Jesuit Firoz, in his Apologie pour les Cassiers (Paris, 1657), made the following assertion: If on an old principle, it is sure, and can be followed; surely there is no degree, but is indivisible, so far as the moral action connected with a probable opinion is concerned; in consequence, a less probable opinion is as sure as a more probable one. (Apolog. p. 59). Should not the Jesuits Matthew de Moya, Honoré Lefèvre, and Étienne des Champs (Quæst. Facit de Sententia Theologorum Societatis circa Opiniones probabilis, Paris, 1659). The abest refutation, Réponse aux Lettres provinciales de L. de Montale, ou l'Intérieur de Chine, is due to the Jesuit Daniel, the well-known French historian, who gives a very elaborate account of probabilism. He observes that, according to the doctrine of the Jesuits, two conditions are required for the probability of an opinion: first, it can contradict neither the dogmas and truths taught by the Church, nor any evident reason; secondly, it must be founded on sound judgment, and not set up wantonly against the prevailing doctrine of the competent teachers.

Among these tumultuous contests in the domain of Catholic morals, the Apostolic See could not remain silent. The pope condemned the Provincial Letters (Sept. 6, 1657) on one side, and Piero's Apology on the other (August, 1659). Pope Alexander VII declared against the dangerous excesses of probabilism in a decree of Sept. 24, 1665; and his successor, Innocent XI, strictly enquired of his cardinals about the first-mentioned decree commences with these memorable words: "Our most holy father has heard, not without great sorrow, that several opinions, which weaken Christian discipline and prepare destruction to the souls, have been partly revived and partly started for the first time, and that the unbridled license of curiosity and over-eager minds increases every day, whereby a way of thinking has crept into the Church which is altogether at variance with Christian simplicity and the doctrine of the holy fathers, and which, should the believers make it for ruling in their lives, would produce a great moral corruption." Among the moral propositions censured by these two papal decrees, the following concern probabilism: from the first decree, Prop. 27. "Si liber sit alie inusoria etiorni et moderni, debet opinio censuris probabili. debet, non censuris factum seu habendum esse a Sede apostolica tanquam irremissibilium;" from the latter, Prop. 1. "Non est licitum in sacramentis conferre sequi opinionem probabili de valore sacramento, relicita tuore, nisi id vetet lex, conventio aut periculum gravissimum damni incursurum. Hinc sententia probabili tantum candidatur in utendum, quamvis extra utendum sint, doctae aut episcopia." Prop. 2. "Probabiliter existi mo judicium posse uidere justa opinionem etiam minus probabilis." Prop. 3. "Generatim, dum probabilitate sine intrinseca sine extraexsensa, quantumvis tenui, modo certi, dum probabilitas, sine essentiaque extrinseca, semper prudenter agimus." Prop. 4. "Ab infideitate excusabatur infidelis non credens, ducis opinione minus probabilis." The antiprobabilistic extreme, represented by the rigorism of the Jansenists, was met by Pope Alexander VIII with the condemnation of the proposition referred to above, a condemnation which is even now not altogether dead in its influence. The first consequence of the papal declarations was a sharper separation of the parties. Probabilism found its most redoubtable adversaries in the Carmelite Henry of St. Ignatius, the two Dominicans Daniel Concina (Della Storia del Probabilismo) and Vincent Patuzzi, and in Franzeo and Pet. Bellarmino. But all these efforts did not annihilate probabilism whether inside or outside the Order of the Jesuits, though it had to submit to many restrictions. In their fifth general assembly the Jesuits only protested against making probabilism the doctrine of their order. Oliva, the general of the order (in a letter of Feb. 3, 1669), speaks plainly enough in favor of probabilism; and while he declares certainly and truly probable opinions fit to engender a certain consciencce (conscientia certa), he asserts, on the other side, that the requirement "sequenti semper in omnibus probabilis re partem" would be too heavy a burden upon mankind. It was shown, however, much more clearly how deeply probabilism was rooted in the Jesuitic Order when the Spaniard Gonzalez, the general of the order, took with great decision, in 1694, the defence of the principle that man, in moral matters, must suffer himself to be guided by a sincere love of truth. Hence he draws the inference that we must always choose what we think to be nearest to truth; if objective truth cannot be obtained, we must at least cling to that which, according to our subjective conviction, is highest to it. For that reason we can follow even the less sure opinion, if we are convinced of its greater probability. The work written from this standpoint, and which the author meant to dedicate to the general of the order, Oliva, found its way into publicity only after many years. Perhaps Gonzalez would not have ventured, even while general of the order, to publish it if the same work which the casuists of the order wished to suppress had not been greatly approved of by Pope Innocent XI. Many of the Jesuits claimed that Gonzalez had, by his disapprobation of probabilism, made himself unworthy of his place, and pronounced him self-deposed. Only the protection of the pope saved him (see Wolf, Gesch. der Jesuiten, i, 173). In his Fundamentum Theologiæ Moræ (Rome, 1707), the most of por narrative of the Jesuitic authority system hitherto so predominant by giving the preference to the ethical province as the more appropriate judgment-seat of the appellate court. Two other theologians followed in his footsteps, Giibert and Camargo, representing the probabilistic tendency. Gisbert, in one of his most important works, still more than in his other books, attacks the principle of probabilism, only its vulgar form. He asserts that we are certain not to sin if we stick to the absolute probability either of law or of liberty; if we judge sensibly that something is allowed, after examining it sufficiently, taking thereunto the circumstances into account, and satisfying ourselves of the soundness of our judgment. While Giibert treated the subject in a more speculative way, Camargo, professor at Salamanca, in his treatise De Recta Homestasia Moralis (Naples, 1792), takes a more historical view of the matter, and shows that modern probabilism has not the testimony of antiquity in its favor, and that since its first appearance the most considerable authorities were against it. While the probabilists continued in their attempts to again turn the scales—we shall only mention the Trachtenberg (Prophetic Relations of Religion under the assumed name of Nicuolaus Pegelutus, Louvain, 1708) and the "Criticisms" of Cardenas (Opp. Corden. Ven. 1710) and while the party of the probabilists grew in strength every day, mediating tendencies appeared. Among them works were written in this spirit, e.g., Natale Mariae Alfonso de Liguori. This distinguished Romanist developed a system of morals which may be described as a kind of practical probabilism, in which, by the use of what are called reflex principles, an opinion which objectively is but probable is made subjectively the basis of a certain and safe practical judgment. Liberty, in his hands, is that which we may choose, as much as possible, in accordance with truth; or at least, in the case of a more probable opinion, as near to truth as possible. If it should appear that of two opinions one is more favorable to liberty, the other to law, the latter being at the same time more probable, it must be admitted without hesitation. Liguori, in the case where equally strong reasons speak for law and liberty, professes a somewhat different opinion from Giibert and the rigid probabilists—he decides for liberty. Liguori starts in his demonstration from the proposition that a doubtful law is not binding ("lex dubia non obligat"). A dubious law, he further says, is an uncertain law, and a law of this description cannot engender any obligation ("lex incerta non potest certam inducere obligationem"). For in such a case of doubt, of uncertainty, liberty is in possession. The consequence has the right on its side, according to the axiom "In dubio melior est conditio possidentis." This is the strongest point of Liguori's argumentation, but also the point with which it stands and falls; here it has to fight a decisive battle against probabilism, or against casuistry defined in its most narrow and strict sense (see, for example, Gaisford's treatise, Lond. 1710), takes a similar stand-point between the contending parties, while Charles Emanuel Pallavicini, in his letters on the administration of the sacrament of penance, claims for the confessors the right to choose between probabilism or probabilism, both with proper restrictions. The maxims of the Jesuits disseminated themselves, like an infectious disease, far beyond the circle of their own order, as is shown by the comprehensive works of the Sicilian Augustinian Diana (Rerum Morale, Antv. 1629-37, 4 volumes fol.; Luxemb. 1657; Venet. 1728), who taught, under the express approval of his ecclesiastical superiors, and also of the Jesuits, the doctrine of probabilism in its worst forms. One may act according to a probable opinion, and disregard the more probable one; man is not under obligation to follow the more perfect and the more certain, but it suffices to follow the simply certain and perfect; it would be an undearable burden were one required to hunt out the more probable opinions (Res. Mor. [Antv. 1657] vol. ii, tract. 18; vol. iv, tract. 14). In the background that the Jesuits taught the same thing. In relation to murder, Diana teaches like Ercobor: I am at liberty to kill even him who assails my honor if my honor cannot otherwise be rescued (Res. Mor. iii, 590; Summa, p. 210, 212). When some one has resolved upon a great crime, then one is at liberty to reclaim (to die for) him, of his own accord, because such advice does not relate absolutely to an evil, but to a good, namely, the avoiding of the worse; for example, if I cannot otherwise dissuade a person from an intended adultery than by recommending to him fornication, in that case it is allowable to recommend this to him; not, however, in so far as it is a sin, but in so far as it prevents the sin of adultery. Diana appeals in this connection to many like-judging Jesuit doctors (Res. Mor. [Antv. 1657] vol. iii, tract. 5, 37). If a priest commissaries Petre to kill Catus, who is weaker than Peter, but nevertheless Peter comes out second best and gets killed himself, still the priest incurring no guilt, and may continue in the administration of his office (ibid. vol. iii, tract. 15, 17). He who resolves upon committing all possible venial sins does not thereby involve himself in any certainty in the judgment of God (ibid. vol. iv, tract. 6, 24). He who, so aliusa justa causu, rents a house to another for purposes of prostitution commits no sin (ibid. vol. iii, tract. 6, 46). To eat human flesh, in case of necessity, he holds, with the majority of the Jesuits. When the matter is within the bounds of what is allowable, he holds the same view (ibid. vol. iii, tract. 6, 45). If a promise of marriage, induces a maiden to yield to him, he is not bound by his promise in case he is of higher rank or richer than she, or in case he can persuade himself that she will not take his promise in serious earnest (ibid. [Ant.] vol. iii, tract. 6, 81; in the spirit of Sanchez and Less). This, that rank and social State can be made legitimate by papal dispensation (ibid. vol. iv, tract. 4, 94; sanctioned by several Jesuits).

In such moral perversity of view Diana seems only to have been surpassed by the Spanish Netherland Cisterian Leokokwa (Theol. Mor. 1645, 1652; comp. Fer-ranz, p. 133 that, that requires the spirit of the missionary field he down the moral consciousness, and declares that nothing is evil per se, but only because it is positively for-bidden; hence God can dispense even with all the commandments (comp. the views of Duns Scotus, p. 34) (1626); can e.g., allow whoredom and other like sins, for none of these are evils per se. Monks and priests are at liberty to kill the female misused by them when they fear, on her account, for their honor. This writer declares himself expressly and decidedly in favor of the views of the Jesuits. Also the Franciscan Order became infected with the maxims of the Jesuits, as is proved by the very voluminous work of Barthol. Mastrius de Mandula (ibid. 1626), which was published under the express sanction of the officers of the order, and who justifies restrictiones mentales even in oaths (Hisp. imperialis, ed. Venet. 1723)." Next, also the murder of tyrants (ibid. viii, 27), the murder of the slanderer of an important person, castration, and similar things (ibid. viii, 25, 28; xi, 110 sq.), as well as probabilism.
Jesuit moral system of the Jesuits is, we grant, not, strictly speaking, that of the Romish Church; many of their more extreme maxima the Church has condemned, and the more recent Jesuita themselves find it advise no longer fully to avow their former principies. Nevertheless, Jesuitism, together with its system of morals, is, as has been well said by Wuttke (i, 271, 272), "the ultimate consequential goal of the Church in its turning aside from the Gospel, just as (through in other respects widely different therefrom) Talmud-ism was the necessary goal of Judaism in its rejection of the Saviour. The error consists in the placing of human discretion and authority in the stead of the unconditionally valid, revealed will of God. Even as earlier Catholicism had intensified the divine command by self-invented, ascetic work-holiness into a seemingly greater severity — had aimed at a higher moral perfect, which required by the Jesuits, with like presumption, lowered the moral law, out of consideration to temporal relations, to a merest min-um requirement; contented itself with a much lower moral perfection than the divine law calls for, and went about cunning means for lightening even this minium."
Probabilism, moreover, is not a merely fortuitously discovered expedient, but it is in fact an almost inevitable consequence of the historical essence of Jesuitism. The order itself arose neither on the basis of Scripture or of ancient Church tradition, but sprang absolutely from the daring inventive power of a single man breaking through the limits of ecclesiastical actuality. It is not therefore at all unnatural that it should make the authority of a single spiritually pre-eminent man its highest determining power, and subornate to this the historical objective form of the moral consciousness. This, then, is the distinguishing characteristic of Jesuitical ethics—that in the place of the eternal objective ground and criterion of the moral it substitutes subjective opinion and in its place of an unconditional eternal end a merely conditionally valid one. Jesuit moral system is actual, visible Church against all forms of opposition—that in the place of the moral conscience it substitutes the human calculating of circumstantial and fortuitous adaptation to the promotion of this its highest end; this fact, what is actually valid by a wide-reaching isolating of the means, and by so doing subordinates morality to the discretion of the single subject. "Though the ethics of the Jesuits are lax and quite too indulgent towards worldly, sinful propensities and fashions, yet this is only one phase of the moral system and Jesuitical moral sysystem, in the usual sense, seems but little applicable to the members of a brotherhood the first rule of which is a perfect renunciation of personal will and personal opinion and self-determination, in a word, unconditional obedience to every command of superiors, and which has actually been accomplished in the missionary field he grandi s deeds, and numbers among its members multitudes of heroic martyrs. This lack of strictness in one direction rests by no means on mere worldliness, on pleasure in the delights of this life, but follows, on the one hand, necessity (as also does also the rule of obedience), from the subjectively arbitrary presupposition of the entire order, from the lack of an objective, unshaken foundation, and rests, on the other hand, strictly on calculation; is itself a cunningly devised means to the end; is intended to awaken, especially in the great and mighty of the earth (and the masses of the people are such under some circumstances), a love the Church, to the mild, friendly, indulgent mother." Jesuitical ethics is the opposite pole of monastic ethics; where the latter requires too much, the former expects too little. A Jesuit is made for the sinful world, Jesuitical moralitv seeks to win the sinful world, not indeed for God, but at least for the Church. Monasticism says to God, though not in an evangelical sense, "If I have only thee, then I ask for nothing else, glory to God and earth." Jesuitism says, turns away in indignant contempt from the worldly life because the world is immersed in sin; the latter generously receives the same into itself, and turns attention away from guilt by desiring it. It is true the Jesuits represent also a monastic order, but this order is also a means to an end, and resembles the other nobler orders about as much as wily Reynard resembles the pious prig; and the well-known hostility of the older orders to this brilliantly rising new one was not mere jealousy, but a very natural, and, for the most part, moral protest against the spirit of the same. See Wuttke, Christian Traditions (Latin probabilitas), a curious technical worcl which serves to designate the philosophic dogma that anything which does not admit of demonstration may em admit the probable as proof, if such a course does not involve absurdity or contradiction. "As demonstration," says Locke, "is the showing the agreement or disagreement of two ideas, by the intervention of one or more proofs, which have a constant, immutable, and visible connection one with another, so probability is nothing but the appearance of such an agreement or disagreement by the intervention of proofs whose connection is only apparent and in that apparent connection not perceived to be so, but is, or appears for the most part to be so, and is enough to induce the mind to judge the proposition to be true or false, rather than the contrary. . . . The entertainment the mind gives this sort of proof is in strictness of proposition, not, as is which is admitting or receiving any proposition as true upon arguments or proofs that are found to persuade us a receive it as true, without certain knowledge that it is so. And herein lies the difference between probability and certainty, faith and knowledge, that in all the parts of knowledge there is intuition; each immediate idea, each step, has its visible and certain connection; in belief not so. That which makes us believe is something external to us, a thing we believe, not something not evidently joined on both sides to, and so not manifestly showing the agreement or disagreement of, those ideas that are under consideration" (Essay on the Human Understanding, bk. iv, ch. xv; comp. Reid, Intell. Powers, essay vii, ch. iii). "The worse, the probable," says Mr. Stewart, "does not imply any deficiency in the proof, but only marks the particular nature of that proof, as contradistinguished from another species of evidence. It is opposed not to what is certain, but to what admits of being demonstrated after the manner of the mathematicians. This differs widely from the meaning annexed to the same word in popular discourse; according to which, whatever event is said to be probable is understood to be expected with some degree of doubt.

thesis is the only event that is supposed to evidence knowledge to be certain, it is also applied to events which are called probable by the vulgar. The philosophical meaning of the word, therefore, is more comprehensive than the popular; the former denoting that particular species of evidence of which contingent truths admit; the latter being confined to a small fraction of this evidence as fall short of the highest. These different degrees of probability the philosopher considers as a series, beginning with bare possibility, and terminating in that apprehended infinitality with which the phrase moral certainty is synonymous. To this last term of the series the word probable is, in its ordinary acceptance, plainly inapplicable" (Elements, pt. ii, ch. ii, § 4).

Archbishop Butler, in his treatment of the evidences of Christianity, has had frequent recourse to this theory of the probable, and in consequence has at times laid himself open to severe attacks from the deistical and infidel schools of philosophy. By dwelling exclusively upon the absence of direct contradiction, and sinking the appearance of confirmation, the learned author of the Analogy not unfrequently converts absolute ignorance into the likeness of some degree of positive knowledge. So Campbell, who borrowed from Butler, constructed most ingenious arguments on this paradox. Both these English thinkers seem to have had a confused notion that the improbability is an actual thing which still remains. Thus Campbell, Butler says, e. g., "The chances that a comet will not appear at a given instant in a given place are infinite. The presumption against the statement is therefore as strong as experience can afford; and yet when an astronomer announces the appearance of the comet you unhesitatingly believe him." The object in this statement is to prove that we must depend largely upon testimony built up from experience, and that therefore knowledge is built upon the probable. The result is, of course, a delusive appearance of independent scientific grounds for what is really a partly a priori doctrine. Like methods are now adopted in scientific circles, and what Hume and Condorcet once condemned the theologians for, the latter now have to contend with in the application of scientific querying to the positive in divine laws and institutions. See Usherweg, Hist. of Pithon. (Index in vol. ii); The (Lord) Quar. Rev., Jan., 1873, p. 81 sq.; London Academy, Nov. 15, 1873, p. 455, col. 1; Stephen, Religious Thought in England in the 18th Century, vol. i.

Probation, Ecclesiastical, in the Methodist Episcopal Church and other Methodist bodies, is the period, usually six months, for the candidate for Church membership to determine whether the organization is such as is likely to aid him in his Christian life, and for the Church to determine whether he is a proper person to be received.

Probation, Ministerial, signifies among some English dissenters the state of a student of a minister while supplying a vacant church, with a view, on their approval of his character and talents, to his taking the pastoral oversight of them.

Probation, Monastic, is the year of a novitiate, which a religious must pass in a convent to prove his virtue and vocation, and whether he can bear the severities of the life.

Probation, Moral, is a term used in Christian moralists to denote that state of man in which his character is formed and developed in action preparatory to judgment (q. v.). It is the state antecedent to a state of retribution (q. v.). "More strictly speaking, moral probation is that experimental trial which lays the foundation for approbation or disapprobation, praise or blame, reward or punishment. It involves obligations to obedience, exposure to temptations, commands and prohibitions; promises, on the one hand, to encourage to duty: threatenings, on the other, to deter from sin; and the cause of final retributions according to the character produced under these various means, and visibly proved by the course of action pursued by the individual. This is the state which is denominated moral probation; and in such a state is mankind under the law of God and the mediatorial reign of Christ; or, in the customary language of the New Test., under the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xiii, 10—52)." It is the principal or rather essential doctrine in the independent system of those Christian moralists who wish to prove metaphysically the truth of Christian ethics. It is the favorite basis of Butler in his Analysis. See Butler, Works, i, 109, 128 sqq., 862; Christian Rev. xvi, 541; Harlan, Ethics (see Index). The question whether there be a period of probation after death is more properly a part of the articles Future Punishment and Purgatory, Comp. the Meth. Quart. Rev. April, 1876, p. 355 sq., 857 sq.

Probation is, in the Church of Scotland, a student in divinity, who, bringing a certificate from a professor in a university of his good morals, and his having performed his exercises to approbation, is admitted to undergo several trials before the presbytery, and upon his acquitting himself properly in these, receives a license to preach. See also PROBATION.

Probity: honesty, sincerity, or veracity. It consists in the habit of actions useful to society, and in the constant observance of the laws which justice and conscience impose upon us. The man who obeys all the laws of society with an exact punctuality is not, therefore, a man of probity; for laws can only fix external and definite parts of human conduct; but probity respects our more private actions, and such as it is impossible in all cases to define; and it appears to be in morals what charity is in religion. Probity teaches us to perform in society those actions which no external power can oblige us to perform, and is that quality in the human mind from which we claim the performance of the rights commonly called imperfect.

Probos, a Christian martyr under Diocletian and Maximian, in the beginning of the 4th century, was born at Sida, in Pamphylia. He was repeatedly called up before Maximus, the governor of Cilicia, and commanded to sacrifice to the heathen deities. But he invariably refused, and his conduct was marked by the strongest decision. He was on one occasion scourged, both on his back and belly, which only called forth from the inhuman tormentor the remark, "There, my boy, you suffer and lose blood, the more my soul will grow vigorous and be a gainer." After an ineffectual attempt to destroy him by means of wild beasts, he was finally slain by a sword, rejoicing to suffer persecution for righteousness' sake. See Fox, Book of Martyrs, p. 48.

the Monastery of Slane, Ireland, A.D. 949. His original name was Ceannachair, but, like many Irish scholars and missionaries of that period, he Latinized it. He wrote the first Life of St. Patrick about 600 years after the saint's death. Place had previously written some vernacular lives of St. Patrick, and Muirchru had alluded to him in another work, but the first Life of St. Patrick was from the pen of Probus. He gives no authorities for his statements in this Life, and we know of none then extant that he could have given. He wrote in a dark period of the history of the Church of the Dark Age. He seems to have written from his own fancy, viewing the ecclesiastical affairs of the infant Church of Ireland in the 6th century through the medium of his own times. Bishop Lanigan, the Roman Catholic historian, admits that his facts cannot be distinguished from his fancies. He became a devotee and a high ritualist, and was esteemed in his day a very holy and learned man. When the pagan Danes set fire to the Monastery of Slane, he refused to be separated from the precious MSS. and relics in it, and rushed into the flames and perished with them. His Life of St. Patrick, and still more that of Jocelin, who wrote about 150 years after him, have ever since been the store-house from which the material of every Roman Catholic Life of the Irish saint has been drawn. Jocelin lived in an age of fiction in regard to Ireland, and seems to have written according to his fancy or to the supposed credulity of his readers. He asserted many things about St. Patrick which had never been heard of before and for which he gives no authority, and which intelligent Catholics now indignantly reject. Dr. Colgan, the Irish antiquarian, says that the false of the expulsion of the venomous serpents from Ireland was for the first time put forth by Jocelin. This and similar fabrications being thus boldly and dogmatically asserted in a dark age, and remaining for centuries uncontradicted, thousand and thousand minds received them as historical facts. Dr. Johnson says somewhere, "One may tell a bona-fide lie, and if he shall tell it over ten times, and no one shall contradict him, he will begin to believe it himself." This has been really true in regard to Ireland. Fables and monstrousies remaining thus uncontradicted have been credited by thousands, while others who could not receive them have foolishly and sceptically thrown aside well-attested truths and regarded nearly all Irish history as fabulous. Perhaps the real life and character of no one so long and so thoroughly incorporated in biography as little known as those of St. Patrick. See Moore, Hist. of Ireland; Usher, Religion of the Early Irish. (D. D.)

PROCACCINI, Camillo, an Italian painter who contributed to sacred art, was born in 1546. He received his first instruction in the school of his father, and afterwards visited Rome, where some biographers say that he studied the works of Michael Angelo and Raphael. Procaccini wrought uninterruptedy, and produced paintings at such a rate that his works, though they charm the eye by the simplicity and spirit which characterize them, are greatly deficient in the higher power of impressing the mind and moving the affections. His Deposition from the Cross, exhibited in Dresden, is one of his best works. He died in 1626.

PROCACCINI, Erocle, the elder, was the head of the celebrated family of artists of that name. He was born in 1520 at Bologna, where the greater number of his works still exist. He died about 1591. Authors are divided in opinion respecting his merit: Balthimucci and Il Gesù, its a painter of moderate talent, while Lontazzo esteems him to be a happy imitator of the coloring and grace of Correggio. His design is too minute and his coloring too languid, but he possessed far more taste than most of his contemporaries, and possesses free from mannerism, which eminently qualified him for an instructor of youth. Several eminent artists, among whom were Sannazachini, Sebastiani, Ber- toja, and his own three sons, were his disciples. - Eng. Cyclop. a. v. Those interested in his works may consult Spooner, Bioy. Hist. of the Fine Arts, vol. ii.

PROCACCINI, Giulio Cesare, the best artist of his family, was born in 1548. He renounced sculpture, in which he had made considerable progress, for painting, which he studied in the school of the Caravaggisti. If the works of Correggio were the principal object of his studies, and many judges are of opinion that no painter ever approached nearer to the style of that great artist. In some of his easel pictures and works of confined composition he has been mistaken for Correggio. A Nu- donnica of the Madonna Luigi de' Francioni has been engraved as the work of that master; and some paintings still more closely approximating to this style are in the palace of Savvitali at Rome and in that of Carrega at Genoa. Of his altar-pieces, that in the church of Santa Afera in Brescia is perhaps most like the style of Corre- reggio: it represents the Virgin and Child amid a smil- ing group of saints and angels, in which dignity seems as much sacrificed to grace as in the mutual smile of the Virgin and the Angel in the Nunziata at San Antonio of Milan. He is sometimes blamable for extravagance of attitude and perseverance of San Vincenzo Ferrer. But he is otherwise a picture full of beauties. Notwithstanding the number and extent of his works, his design is correct, his forms and draperies select, his invention varied, and the whole together has a certain grandeur and breadth which he was often required from the Caravaggisti derived from Correggio. He died in 1626. There are many of his works in Milan.

Procedure, Ecclesiastical, or the rules to be followed in the Church of Rome in disciplinary actions. They owe their regulation to Pope Innocent III. Previous to his time, it is true, the official indication had assumed a more definite form in the synodal jurisdiction of the archbishops; but he perfected them, and there are now in the Roman Church five kinds of penal procedures in use: the trial may be instituted in consequence of accusation, inquisition, denunciation, exception, and on account of notoriety. The first and last had existed at an earlier period. There was no need of a formal accusation in the case of notorious transgressions, and the bishop punished them in virtue of his office; of course, after the matter had been sufficiently proved and avowed. The proceedings were not a more formal kind when there was an accusation. Here the proceedings of the Roman law were taken for models. The inquisition or official examination took place when an ecclesiastic was accused of a transgression by a public and plausible rumor, which, acting, as it were, as accusat. To complete the official examination, the judge would, if he thought fit, exact the oath of purgation (purgo- rium ec- onomicum). The former custom of purgation by ordeal now came into disuse. If a plausible denunciation was made, an official examination must take place. If the fault was avowed, the penalty was only a much less severity. Cases of exception were those where a man who was on the point of appearing as a witness or accused, or a person who applied for ordination or for an ecclesiastical office, was stopped by an accusation, which, if proved, unfitted him for bearing witness or office. It is still allowed as occasion for canonical purgation. In these cases punishment was out of the question, and there could only follow an exclusion from the witness-stand, from the right to accuse, from the orders or the function in question. In those parts where the Church has not a superior, the judgment is not to conform to the laws and customs which regulate the penal procedure of the country. PROCESS 611 PROCESIONAL CROSS

Procession. the Heb. term יָּרָאֵב, halitkh, rendered "going" in Ps. lxxviii, 25, means a religious procession, as described in the context, headed by the phylarchers, who preceded the sacred ark, while the instrumental musicians followed it, and a line of females with timbrels accompanied it on either side. On the general subject see the monographs in Volbeding, Index Fratrum Brev. p. 159. See Proc., p. 148.

Procession of the Holy Ghost. that doctrine regarding the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity which teaches that as the Son proceeds (or is born) from the Father, so the Holy Ghost proceeds (or emanates) from the Father and from the Son, but as from one principle. The subject has been fully discussed in its historical relations in the art. Filioque Controversy, and as a theological question in the art. Holy Ghost. But since the writing of those articles the subject has been revived and taken a new historical form — the formation of a new religious body from the ranks of the Romish Church, itself old Catholics (q. v.). At their second annual conference or synod held in Bonn, Germany, in 1875, preparations were made for a "Union Conference" of the Old Catholic, Oriental, and Anglican churches, and such a conference accordingly convened on Bonn on Aug. 12 of that year and lasted five days. Those interested in the schism and nationality of the Church of Rome shelled the attendants will do well to consult the Methodist Quart., Oct. 1875, p. 673-675.

In the last session of that conference a common formula was adopted respecting the doctrine of the Procession, which Westerns and Orientals (q. v.) almost immediately settled, and the controversy is still alive as we write, it is yet a very hopeful sign of an early union of different branches of the Church of Christ which have so little at variance and so much in common. The discussions regarding the subjects were long and animated, and for some time the Orientals held out against the adoption of § 3, but by their final adoption of it an enormous step towards complete understanding has been made. The following are the resolutions:

PRELIMINARY RESOLUTIONS.

1. We agree together in receiving the ecclesiastical symbols and the doctrinal decisions of the ancient undivided Church.

2. We agree together in acknowledging that the addition of the Filioque to the Creed did not take place in an ecclesiastically regular manner.

3. We acknowledge on all hands the representation of the doctrine of the Holy Ghost, as it is set forth by the Fathers of the undivided Church.

4. We receive every proposition and every method of expression in which in any way the acknowledgment of two principles or of μονας or of μίας in the Trinity may be contained.

ON THE PROCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST.

5. We accept the teaching of St. John of Damascus respecting the Holy Ghost, as the same is expressed in the following paragraphs, in the sense of the teaching of the ancient undivided Church:

6. The Holy Ghost goes forth out of the Father (κατ' τον πατέρα) as the beginning (αρχή), the Cause (αίτων), the Source (φρύμα) of the Godhead (De recta Sententia, n. 1: Contra Marc. n. 4).

7. The Holy Ghost goes forth not out of the Son (κατ' τον Υιόν), because there is in the Godhead one beginning (αρχή), one Cause (καταλείπη), through which all that is in the Godhead is produced (De Fide orthodox. 1, 6; καὶ τό ὑπέρτων τῆς αὐτοτύχου καταλείπη του κυρίου τοῦ κτίσεως τῆς διανοίας τοῦ πατρὸς, κατ' τον πατέρα), and the same for the Son (κατ' τον Υιόν).

8. The Holy Ghost goes forth out of the Father through the Son (κατ' τον Υιόν) as the cause (καταλείπη) of the beginning (αρχή), by the Son (κατ' τον Υιόν), through which all that is in the Godhead and the Son is produced (De Fide orthodox. 1, 7: καὶ τό ὑπέρτων τῆς αὐτοτύχου καταλείπη του κυρίου τοῦ κτίσεως τῆς διανοίας τοῦ πατρὸς κατ' τον Υιόν), and also in both the Father and the Son (κατ' τον πατέρα κατ' τον Υιόν).

9. The Holy Ghost is the Image of the Father and the Image of the Son, going forth out of the Father and resting in the Son as the force beaming forth from Him (Idem. 1, 7: καὶ τό πατρίτων ὑπέρτων δυναμική καταλείπη καταλείπη καταλείπη τοῦ Υιοῦ, καὶ τό πατρίτων ὑπέρτων δυναμική καταλείπη τοῦ Υιοῦ, κατ' τον πατέρα κατ' τον Υιόν).

10. The Holy Ghost is the personal Production out of the Father, belonging to the Son, but not out of the Son, because he is in the Spirit of the Month of the Godhead, which speaks forth the Word (De Hymno Triung. 26: καὶ τό μονακάταλείπη τοῦ πατρὸς καταλείπη τοῦ Υιοῦ, κατ' τον πατέρα κατ' τον Υιόν).

11. The Holy Ghost forms the mediation between the Father and the Son, and is bound together to the Father through the Son (De Fide orthodox. 1, 9: καὶ τό μονακάταλείπη τοῦ πατρὸς καταλείπη τοῦ Υιοῦ, κατ' τον πατέρα κατ' τον Υιόν).

N. B.—It is to be noted here that the German preposition κατ' (out of) is used rather for origin or source, whereas the word ἀπό (from) is equivalent to out of or off; while διά (through) denotes dia or per, through the instrumentality of it.

Since that conference the Filioque question has been much agitated in England, and it has been asserted, by High-Churchmen especially, that the exclusion of the Filioque from the Creed was created by Dr. Dillingham and Canon Liddon. What was the doctrine as it had to be stated as a follows: It declared, as Bishop Pearson had already admitted, that the Filioque was inserted in an ocumenical creed by an inadequate authority, and therefore irregularly. It formulated certain propositions which might serve to separate the Westerns from the Latins accept the and the Easterns reject the Filioque; they do not differ, as has been generally supposed; since the Latins reject any assertion of two principles or causes in the Godhead, and the Easterns admit a μεταρρία of the Son, in the eternal procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father. Whatever may have been the hopes and fears of individual members of the conference, no proposition was brought forward respecting the exclusion of the Filioque from the Creed of the Western Church. See Schaff, Creeds (Index in vol. iii.); Forbes, Niesse Creed, Eccl. Eastern Church, 1885-1886; Stanley, Eastern Church: Haag, Hist. des Dogmatis (Index in vol. ii.); Martensen, Dogmatik (see Index); Meth. Quart. Jan. and April, 1876; N. y. Eng., July, 1870. See also Fusey's Letter to Liddon On the Clause "And the Son" (Lond. 1876, 8vo).

Processional. (Lat. processionale), the service-book which contains the prayers, hymns, and general ceremonial of the different processions. Many ancient books of this class have been preserved. The processional approved for common use is that of Rome, of which many editions have been published.

Processional Cross, or Cross of the Station (cruz gestatoria, or stationary), is the cross carried in the ecclesiastical processions spoken of under Processions. It was carried as early as the 4th century and in the 5th century both in the East and in the West. It is mentioned by Socrates, Nicophorus, Cassiodorus, in the Life of St. Porphyry by Durand, and by Baronius under the year 401, and in the Consules of Cleveshoe in 747, when regulating the rotagions. A cross made of ash, silver-plated, engraved or enamelled, without a crucifix, was at an early date, after the introduction of the custom of the churches of Constantinople, carried in processions by the stauroporphors. The evangelistic symbols were usually set at the ends of the arms, which terminated in fleurs-de-lys. In the 4th century it had short handles, and candles were attached to the arms.

Heremus gave authorization to the church of Constantinople at Rome. In the 12th century at Rome a subdeacon (regiornarius) carried down the cross, inclined so that the faithful might kiss it, from the altar to the porch, where he held it upright in his hands during the processions. In England, at Durham, the chief cross was of gold, turned to a silver staff, and the cross used on ordinary days was of crystal. A novice followed it, carrying a benitier. A cross of the 15th century is still preserved in St. John's Lateran; another, of the time of St. Louis, is at St. Denis; a third, of silver and beautiful designs, with statuary and eclesiastics symbols, at Conques; and another at Burgos. In England, no doubt, many were destroyed during the War of the Roses and at the Reformation.

At Chichester the abbey for the cross remains.
In England, from Easter to Ascension, the cross was of crystal or beryl, but in Lent of wood, painted blood-red.
No parish could carry its cross into a monastic church; and in funerals, in a collegiate church, the cross of the latter only is set before the bier.

We append an illustration of the cross now usually carried by Romanists in their processions.

Processional Path (spatium vel via processio-num ad retro altaria; latus pone chorum; Fr. partour de chair, i. e. behind a chair). The transverse aisle in square-ended churches is commonly doubled, as at Lichfield, or even tripled, as at Winchester and at St.
Mary Overgate, in order to provide room for chapels as well as a passage for processions. At Hereford this aisle resembles a low transept. The eastern screens at Fountains, the Lady chapel of Hexham, and the Nine Altars of Durham seem to have been further developments of the same idea, which appears also in the longitudinal new walk of Peterborough. At Canterbury, pilgrims to the martyrium passed up the south aisle of the nave, and through the passage under the platform of the crossing.

Processions. These, as solemn and religious rites, are of very great antiquity, but evidently of pagan origin. With the Greeks and Romans, they took place chiefly on the festivals of Diana, Bacchus, Ceres, and other deities; also before the beginning of the games in the Circus; and in spring, when the fields were sprinkled with holy water to increase their fertility. The priests used to head them, carrying images of the gods and goddesses to be propitiated, and either started from certain temples or from the Capitol. The Romans, when the empire was disturbed, or after some victory, used constantly to order processions, for several days together, to be made to the temples, to beg the assistance of the gods or to return them thanks. Among the Jews, processions were introduced for public prayers when the faithful people went in order to implore the divine help (Josh. vi, 15; 2 Sam. vi, 16; Ezra ii, 12-30; 1 Kings viii, 45; Numb. x, 33-80), with a form at setting out and when halting; or when rendering thanks to God (2 Chron. xx, 21, 27, 28; Matt. xxvi, 9). Certain processions around the altar were (and still are to a certain extent) usual on the Feast of Tabernacles; and from them the Mohammedans have adopted their mode of encompassing the sanctuary seven times at Mecca (q. v.). From this the Musulmans form a prominent part of the Buddhist worship. See Procession.

In the Christian Church the practice was early intrduced and has maintained itself to this day among the Romanists. In the earliest ecclesiastical phraseology the word processio denotes merely the act of fre-quencing a religious assembly, and taking part in public worship. It is distinguished from private offices of devotion, and includes the idea of social worship, but without any additional idea of public ceremony, pomp, or the like. Procedure then meant to go to church, and, a, in short, synonymous with sagrare interesse, sacrum frequentare. This was the meaning given to the word by Tertullian (Ad Lzcor. lib. ii, c. 4) and Jerome (Comment. in Ep. 1 ad Cor. c. 11). In many canons and other ecclesiastical writings we also find the word processione, and still more frequently processio, to mean the act of going to church, and also the sense of a religious assembly (conventus et concilia populi in ecclesia).
The Greek word εἰσαίζος (as well as εὐ-αγγελία, σωληνος, conf. Suicer Thesaur.) is translated sometimes by collecta, sometimes by conventus, and sometimes προς εἰσαγωγήν. When Christian worship began to be conducted openly, and churches were publicly frequented, the meaning of the word processio was exactly equivalent to our term church-going. After the 4th century, especially in later medieval times, the word was applied to processions usual at funerals, mar-rriages, baptisms, as well as to the line of communicants at the Lord's Supper. Processions at festivals and on other occasions were, in course of time, quite common.
Laws to protect such processions from interruption were passed, and any persons found guilty of disturbing them were subject to severe punishment. The first processions mentioned in ecclesiastical history are those set on foot at Constantinople, in the time of Chrysostom.
The Arians of that city being forced to hold their meetings without the town, went thither night and morning, singing anthems. Chrysostom, to prevent their pervert the Catholics, adopted counter-processions in which the clergy and people marched by night, singing hymns, and carrying crosses and torches. From this period the custom of processions was introduced both into the Eastern and Western churches (Chrysost. Or.
Sour. lib. 1, of the Virgin Mary, Ep. 297, al. 62; 40 ad Theodos. n. 14; Augustine, De Civ. Del. i, 22, c. 8; Rufin. Hist. Ecclec. i, 2, c. 38). Even during the percessions of the emperors there were at least some funeral Various ceremonies were observed, according to the objects for which these processions were instituted, the spirit of the times in which they were celebrated, and the countries wherein they took place. The clergy usually attended: if the occasion was one of joy or thanksgiving, they were attired in the most splendid vestments. The clergy put on their best attire, and were adorned with girdles and other ornaments; and the sound of bells and music was heard through the whole line. On occasions of mourning or penitence, the procession was distinguished by plain vestments, bare feet, deep silence, or sounds of lamentation and prayers, and sometimes by the exercise of flagellation. Men and women walked apart; and the line of procession was ranged with reference to the various ranks and classes of the persons who composed it. Lighted wax and tapers were often carried in procession, especially on the festival of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, which was hence called festum or missus contemplation (see Ca-dlemas). Litanies composed for the occasion were sung in Latin as the procession moved. The penitential psalms and the psalms of degrees were employed on the occasion, as well as many Latin hymns.
These processions have always been more common in the Western than in the Eastern Church. The Reformation greatly lessened them even in the Roman Catholic Church. In modern times, processions are less frequent or popular nowadays. They are there either supplicatory processions or cross processions, and are either directed to a certain distant place, to some miraculous image or object, or they are confined to the streets of the cities and the churches. Banners, crosses, and lilies are generally carried in front; the clergy follow; and the people make up the rear, singing hymns or reciting prayers. In some Protestant states they are still permitted, under certain restrictions. The Protestants themselves rarely practice them, excepting the Methodists, who, under the direction of their leaders, carry the crosses, walking immediately before the leader, incense the venerable uninterruptedly with their censers; in this case, also, a baldachin is generally extended over the leader, and borne by four, six, or eight laymen of distinction. It seldom happens that the leader of a non-theophoric procession walks beneath the baldachin: it is then a personal honor, only bestowed on bishops on extraordinary occasions, as on their solemn entrance into a church. In countries where the custom has hitherto existed, it is allowed to spread the baldachin only over the most exalted participants or the sacraments of Christ's passion. The faithful who participate in the procession walk two by two. This may find an analogy in Christ's sending out his disciples two by two to preach the Gospel. Gregory the Great (Hom. 17 in Evang.) declares this to be a symbol of the two loaves, walking immediately before the leader, incense the venerable uninterruptedly with their censers; in this case, also, a baldachin is generally extended over the leader, and borne by four, six, or eight laymen of distinction. It seldom happens that the leader of a non-theophoric procession walks beneath the baldachin: it is then a personal honor, only bestowed on bishops on extraordinary occasions, as on their solemn entrance into a church. two acolytes—one to his right, the other to his left—each with a lighted taper in his hand. The carrying of the images, statues, etc., is committed to the care of the brotherhoods, associations, and partly to the young men and girls of the community; the relics are carried by the clergy and those in honor of the relics, by the leader of the procession. The principal crucifix (see PROCESIONAL CROSS) is generally carried (if possible) by a subdeacon; subdeacons also carry the crucifixes before the chapters, the archbishops, and the pope. The crosses are carried before the pope and archbishops in such a way that the image of the crucified one is turned towards those dignitaries. The principal crucifix opens the procession, unless a flag has been preferred, in which case the crucifix follows at some distance. Brotherhoods and corporations are in the habit of having flags carried before them. The most important of these customs are very old. Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. i, 8, c. 8) and the biographer of St. Cesarius of Arles (Sur. 27 Aug.) knew already of the carrying of crosses or crucifixes (during many centuries naked crosses were alone in use) and of lighted tapers. In former times the bishop of the Greek Church was sometimes carried along with the cross (Vit. S. Porphyr. Ep. Surv. 26 Feb.). Flags, which, it must be observed, are not prescribed, but only allowed, are mentioned by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. i, 4, c. 4). Gregory the Great orients the city of Rome to be carried about as early as 590 (Baron. Annal. ad. 590). In the 4th century, we find processions held for the purpose of transferring relics solemnly to the churches (Socrat. Hist. Eccl. i, 8, c. 16; Augustine, Confes., i, 9, c. 7). The Synod of Braga in 572 (ibid. c. 6) calls this a solemn custom (see Conc. Clovis, a. 747, c. 16). The faithful walk (ibid. c. 6) quietly and devoutly. Idle talk, forward looking around, laughing, showy suits, luxury of dress, etc., shock the pious mind. The men walk bareheaded; the clergy and magistrates alone are, with some restrictions, allowed to wear their head-dresses. The clergy wear the chasuble; only on most sacred occasions, as at the procession of the Corporal Christi, we find the custom that at least some of the subdeacons wear the tunics, some of the deacons the dalmatics, several priests the planets, and the eclecticians of higher rank the pluvial. The subdeacons who carry the crosses wear the tunics, besides the amictus, alba, and cinctum. For the laymen there are no longer any rules in this respect. Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. i, 5, c. 8) speaks of all the faithful bearing burning tapers; we hear of them in other places appearing barefooted with the ark and the satchel (Cassian, h. 33); Charlemagne himself, according to the narrative of a monk of St. Gall, set the example of walking barefooted in procession at Ratisbon (Mart. De Anti. Eccles. Rit. i, 4, c. 27, a. 7); but these are things of the past. The purport of the prayers is in accordance with the purpose of the procession. Yet the Church has given some rules. At theophoric processions, especially that of the Corporal Christi, the hymns in honor of the Eucharist must be sung in preference (Pange lingua, Sacris solemnis, Venite, superum prodeunt; special songs are also prescribed for the procession at Candlesmas and on Palm-Sunday; for the litanies of St. Mark's Day and of the Week of Prayer, the litany of All-saints' and the versicles and orations which follow it in the breviary are prescribed. At the funeral procession of full-grown persons, prayers of intercession; at the funerals of children, thanksgiving prayers are in use.

As extraordinary processions are generally undertaken for a purpose that must be submitted to God in special prayers, regulations have been made for these cases. In the Roman ritual mention is expressly made of the procession ad petendum pluviam, the procession ad postumum sementium, the procession in time of famine, in time of epidemic and plague, in time of war, in any other great distress, the thanksgiving procession, and, finally, that for the translation of relics. Originally the people sang psalms on such occasions (Jerome, Ep. 188, al. 27; Gregory, Nasianz. Or. 10; Vit. S. Porphyri. Ep. Surv. 26 Feb.); only when the purpose of the procession was to obtain some favor from God, it was an early custom to exclaim quite frequently, "Kyrie eleison," or recite other prayers of penitence (Chrysost. Ortat. cour.) or to sing the psalm 'Pro permute' (Greg. Th. 4, c. 4). The Roman ritual has hitherto been little by little composed. The common Roman Ordo says: "Omnis in commune 'Kyrie eleison' decantant, et cum cantionibus cordis Dei misericordiam exorant pro peccatis, pro pace, pro peste, pro conservatione frugum et pro ceteris necessitatibus." Mattheson, in his Orgellum (ed. Grégoire) says that a Roman ritual according to which a hundred "Kyrie eleison," a hundred "Christe eleison," and again a hundred "Kyrie eleison" were to be said kneeling, in such a propitiatory procession. As the psalms ceased little by little to be known by heart, rosary-praying, which has become so general use in our day, took their place. The procession comes out of a place of worship, and, its walk performed, returns to it. If (as at funerals) not all the participants, the clergy, at least, with the chanters and the bearer of the principal cross, always return. Even if a bishop or pope it is sometimes the case that to return to the city is customary for the clergy to start from the church and return thither with that high personage. The procession on Candlesmas-day and Palm-Sunday starts at the call of the leader, "Procedamus in pace," and the chanters begin to sing the hymn Sineolia Marci, which is a part of that litany. In processions (which is often the case in rural communities) the litany of All-saints' is not recited in Latin, the procession commences thus: the ecclesiastical leader kneels on the lowest step of the high-altar, begins to say the rosary, and the procession is led to the church, and there, or thither gives the signal for starting. The litany procession stops frequently at one, or two, or even more places of worship. The clergy (or at least the superiors) of the church where it stops receive it in chasuble and stole, with two acolytes, at the gate of the churchyard, or at the portal of the church, and offer holy water to the clerks and distinguished laymen of the procession. In such places of worship it is customary to sing an antiphony, and a vernicle and oration in honor of the patron of the church; sometimes a high-mass, with or without solemn oratory (Ch. 816). The procession is extremely like at such occasions to sing three times the song of triumph and the little doxology. This stopping, which, especially in Milan, is so extensively in use during the rogations celebrated there in the week that follows Ascension that the procession stops on the first day at twelve, on the second at nine, and on the third at eleven churches (comp. Malibii, Lit. Gallic, p. 159), is a custom of great antiquity. The Gallican liturgy mentions it as a well-known matter (Missale Goticum; Missale Gallic. Vet.; Cod. 806). Gregory of Tours speaks of it as an established custom (Hist. Franc. i, 10, c. 1). The abobed procession of Gregory the Great started from seven churches and stopped at the Church of Our Lady (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. i, 10, c. 1). The reception by the clergy of the church where the procession stops is also a very old custom (Leo III in Lib. Prov. i; it was called "Occurrere." As processions in such cases, especially in the country, have often to walk an hour or more before they reach another place of worship, the Church has found it necessary, from time to time, to warn the faithful not to make of these intervals an occasion for leisurings and tippling (Rit. Rom.; comp. Conc. Clovis, a. 747, c. 16). When the procession walks inside of the places of worship, or in their immediate neighborhood, the bells of the steeple are rung. This reminds one of the procession which followed the body of St. Anastasius, and at which a noise was produced by striking on consecrated woods (Conc. Nim. a. 787, act. 4). Processions of less importance move only inside the walls of the house of worship. Such is the case with all processions in countries where the Catholic religion is still not firmly established. Some are more formal than others. According to the rules, processions should precede the high-mass, but this is practically the case with very few (comp. the Rit. Rom., the Crem. ep. , and the Rubri. cistas).—Aschbach, Kirchen-Lex. a. v.

The origin of processions may have been an imitation of the motion of the heavenly spheres, the courses of the stars, and the revolutions of seasons, and more immediately of ancient religious dances. They were always accompanied by singers, and generally by musicians. Procession is progression, says Durand, when a multitude, headed by the clergy, goes forth in regular order and ranks to implore the divine grace. It represents the pilgrimage of man upon earth on his way to the better land, from the cradle to the grave, as St. Paul says that we are pilgrims and sojourners in this world. Processions found cloisters and cemeteries still more vividly brought before the mind the thought of the last home to which man must come at length, as waters, after the most devious course, are lost in the great sea. In a procession to the altar, in reverse order to that of the procession itself, the cross-bearer, attended on either side by acolytes, carries candles and lighted tapers; then came the censers, or thurifers, the chanters in cope and carrying batons, the subdeacon, deacon, and celebrant; then choir boys, clerks of the second grade, and the more honorable following. In the cathedral the presentor, the sub-chancellor of canons (preambule), and the succesor of vicars (sous-chanteur), each with his chanter's baton, preceded the bishop, carrying his cross, or staff. In the middle of the 15th century the capitular tenants went in procession on St. Peter's Eve at Exeter, preceded by the choristers carrying painted shields of arms.

In England processions were made with litanies and prayers, (1) for the prosperity of the king; (2) for the wealth of the realm; (3) for purity of the air; (4) for the increase of the fruits of the earth. Two processions for the good success of a king were made on Sundays about the church and churchyard, by English canons, in 1339 and 1398. On Ash-Wednesday, after confession in church, there was a solemn procession for ejecting the penitents, who were not readmitted until Maundy-Thursday. The Easter-day was a great procession in memory of the disciples going to meet our Lord in Galilee, and in imitation of it there was a humbler procession on every Sunday. The other great procession was annual, on Palm-Sunday. Bishops were also met with processions of the chapter and vicars, or a convent, at the west door of the church and the cemetery gate, by decree of Honorius III, 1221. In 1471 all curates of the diocese were required to visit the high-altar of Lincoln Cathedral in procession, and make their offerings. In the nave the great processions were arranged. At Canterbury two parallel lines, and at Furness, Lincoln, Chichester, and York two rows of circular processional stones were arranged at proper intervals, and specifically allotted. At Exeter the antiphon was sung daily at the screen, and the procession passed through the north gate of the choir to the vestibule of the Lady Chapel, and then by the south gate of the choir near the throne to the high-altar. It afterwards traversed the nave and cloisters, concluding before the rood-left; and if there was no sermon, the procession returned to the altar. Carpets were strewn all along the way on great feast days. Henry VIII. decreed that he should be buried at Winchester, where the monks stood in procession on Sundays and holydays. These monks, being aggrieved by a bishop, on one occasion went round their cloisters from west to east, out of their usual manner, in order to show that the church of Chichester at Ephesus an image of the Spirit was carried round the church by the dean or senior canon and two vicars.

On WhitMonday the parishioners in the diocese often came to blows about right of precedence, so that bishop Storey made injunctions (1478) for order on this occasion, when the shrine of St. Richard was visited annually. Crosses and long painted rods with which the attending parties had hitherto belabored each other were proscribed, as well as laughing, crowding, and noise. The pilgrims entered by the great south porch and assembled in the choir at 10 A.M. and left the building by it, having duly visited the "chancel and church." In 1584 the primatic conference such dangerous contentions throughout England. As late as 1651 the city companies of London went in procession—the Fishmongers' to St. Michael's, Cornhill, with three crosses, a hundred priests, and the parishioners and members of the guild carrying white rods; and the parish of St. Clement Danes displayed eighty banners and streamers, and was preceded by the city waits. On Easter-Monday at Kinnenal and Wellington the parishioners, adult and children, joined hand-in-hand, surrounded the church and touched it with a general simultaneous embrace, called "clipping the church." They afterwards attended divine service. The procession at Wolverhampton on Monday and Tuesday in Rogation week, in which the children bore poles dressed with flowers and the clergy chanted the "Offertory," only ceased in 1765. At Easter of the Gospel trees or holy oaks where the stations were formed still remain.—Walcott, Sacred Archdeacon a. v. See Middleton, Letters from Rome; Willet, Synops. Pop.; Wetzer u. Prochazka, Francis Faustine, a Bohemian monastic, noted as a writer, was born at Neupaka, Bohemia, Jan. 13, 1749. He studied with the Jesuits of Gieschin and at the University of Prague. In 1767 he entered the Order of Barnabites, where he had for his master the celebrated Durich, who taught him Hebrew and encouraged him in his predilections for the Slavonic literature. When the Barnabites were suppressed in Bohemia (1788), he became successively theological censor, professor and director of the Gymnasia at Prague and library of the university of that city. He published the New Testament in Bohemian with commentaries, an edition of the Bible in that dialect, a reprint of the Chronique de Buzulau:—Commentarius de Securiarum Arieum Liberalium in Moravia Prazi (1784);—Dictionnaire des Littérature (1784, 4vo). This religious man also assisted on the Barnabite Bible, and at the moment of his death was occupied on the valuable Bibliotheca Latina of Durlich. Prochazka died at Prague in 1803.—Hoefer, Nouv. Prochet, Mathieu, a noted modern Italian Protestant theologian, was born in Piedmont in 1806. He was afforded by his Waldensian parents all the educational and religious advantages that might properly fit him for Church service, but on the outbreak of the Franco-Italian-Austrian war in 1859 he took up arms for his country's freedom and greatly distinguished himself by his bravery. In the career of battle he continued his theological studies, and in 1862 was ordained minister in the Church of the Vaudois. He soon rose to positions of distinction, and was repeatedly honored by his ecclesiastical associates in missions to the sister churches of the Continent and of England. He was received to be finally at Geneva in 1873, the second of the Waldensian missions in Italy, and in 1873 was sent to represent his Church in the Evangelical World Alliance at New York. While in this country he spoke frequently and greatly impressed that distinguished body by his piety, simplicity of life, and decision as pastor in Geneva and also professor of theology. On his return voyage from this country he was accompanied by the much-lamented Carasco, the Spanish convert to Protestantism, who was one of his most intimate friends, and with whom he had planned several important polemical treatises against Romanism and her relations to the State. Proclus has a fine, commanding presence, imposing, but not a figure, broadbased, with a quickness in movement and speech, like much of the best of the South: keen in perception, and accurate in his scholarship. His influence is great not only in Italian Protestantism, but in evangelical Christianity. See Report of the Alliance. (1893), (3d. H. W.)

Procris (Πρόκρις), one of the seven deacons, bearing the third on the list, and named next after Stephen and Philip (Acts vi, 5), A.D. 30. No further mention of him is made in the N. T. There is a tradition that he was consecrated by St. Peter bishop of Comedia (Baron. i, 292). In the Magna Bibliotheca Patrum (Colon. Agrippa, 1618, i, 49-60) will be found a fabulous "Historia Prochori, Christi Discipuli, de Vita B. Joannis Apostoli."

Proclamation (προνάσχω, προφέρω, etc., or some form of προορίζω, as in 1 Kings xv, 22; Jer. i, 29), the edict of any governing power, published in a solemn manner. The laws of Moses, as well as the temporary edicts of Joshua, were communicated to the people by means of the scribes, in the Greek language; but the laws of those who subsequently held the office of kings were proclaimed publicly by criers (Jer. xxxiv, 8, 9; Jonah iii, 5-7), a class of persons mentioned by Daniel (iii, 4; v, 29), under the word προφέρω, kerōzé, which our translators have rendered "herald." (q. v.).

Proclamations, Royal. These documents in former times were almost equal in authority to an act of the constitutional legislature. They were often interfered with religion, and dealt largely in reformation of manners. In 1529 King Henry VII issued a proclamation "for resisting and withstanding of most damnable heresies sown within the realm by the disciples of Luther and other hereticks, preverter of Christes reseygyn." In June, 1530, this was followed by the proclamation "for damning or condemning" of erroneous bokes and heresies, and prohibiting the having of holy scripture translated into the vulgar tongues of English, French, or Dutch. "And that having respect to the malignity of this present tyrne, with the inclination of many people to erroneous opinions, the translation of the newe testament and the old into the vulgar tonge of englyshe, shulde rather be the occasion of contynuance or increase of erres in the said people, then any clementy or commodite to the welthe of their soules." It was therefore determined that the Scriptures should only be expounded to the people as heretoffore, and that these books "be clere exterminate and exiled out of this realm of Englynde for ever." Under Edward VI there is a proclamation against such "as innovate any ceremony," and who are described as "certaine private preachers and other lasmen, who rashely attempt of their own and singular wit and mind, not only to persuade the people from the old and accustomed rites and ceremonys, but also themselves liying in newe and strange orders according to their phantasias. The which, as it is an evident token of pride and arrogancy, so it tendeth both to confusion and disorder." There is a proclamation also to abstrain from flesh on Fridays and Saturdays; enforced on the principle, not only that "men should abstain on those days and forebear the pleasures and the meats which they have more delight, to the intent to sublue their bodies to the soul and spirit, but also for worldly policy."

Charles II issued a proclamation against "vicious, debauched, and profane persons!" i. e. "a sort of men of witchcraft—that is those that spend their time in taverns, tippling-houses, and debauchery; giving no other evidence of their affection to us but in drinking our health, and inveighing against all others who are not of their own dissolute temper; and who, in truth, have more discredited our cause, by the license of their manners and lives, than they could ever advance it by their action or by their reason."

It is clear that the introduction of all persons of honor, or in place and authority, will so far assist us in discomfitting such men, that their discretion and shame will persuade them to reform what their conscience would not; and that the displeasure of good men towards them may supply what the laws have not, and, it may be, cannot well provide against; there being by the license and corruption of the times, and the depraved nature of man, many enormities, scandals, and impieties in practice and manners, which laws cannot well describe, and consequently not enough provide against, which may, by the example and severity of virtuous men, be easily discomfited, and by degrees suppressed." Some parties in Scotland who had no objection to national fasts, or even to the royal recommendation of them, yet objected to royal command and dictation as wrote in the usual form, they being charged to keep the fast "as they tender the favor of Almighty God, and would avoid his wrath and indignation." According to counsel learned in the law, obedience to such mandate is not imperative, for it is affirmed—"1. That in England, where by statute the sovereign is head of the Church, as well as of the State, as well as of the State, that jurisdiction applies only to the clergy and members of the National Church, and does not include those who are not of her communion. 2. That in Scotland—where seceding or dissenting churches (except it be the nonjurors) stand not upon any statute of toleration, but upon the free basis and constitution of the country—no such relation exists, but is excluded by the act of 1690 (c. 5), ratifying the Confession of Faith; whereby an antagonistic principle is established, it being declared that there is nowhere the Church, but there lies the Lord Jesus Christ; and that he, 'as King and Head of the Church, hath therein appointed a government in the hands of church-officers distinct from the civil magistrate, who 'may not assume to himself the administration of the Word and sacrament, or the keys of the kingdom of heaven.' " A. In point of fact, proclamations for the observance of national fasts and thanksgivings in Scotland were, for a considerable period after the date of that act, and until the union between England and Scotland, passed by the three estates of the Church of Scotland, as being the privilege of the foreign alone. And, 4. That no statute can be found authorizing such proclamations in Scotland: and the phraseology used in them seems to have grown out of the practice in England, or to be founded on what appears to be an unwarranted extension of the two statutes cited in the 1690 act. The Union of June, 1690, was exclusive to prayers for royal personages, and apply at most to ministers and preachers of two denominations."

Proclanities (or Proclanists) is the name of the followers of Proclus (q. v.). They were extreme Montanists (q. v.), and were spread more especially in Phrygia, Asia Minor. In the close of the 3rd century they formed a most dangerous sect, and greatly disturbed the peace of the churches.

Proclus, styled Διαδίκας, i. e. the Successor, because he replaced Syrusius (q. v.) as the head of that Athenian school of philosophers who were Neo-Platonists, has been called "the Scholastic among the Greek philosophers." Indeed, according to M. Cousin, Proclus is the Greek Philosopher who best reflects in his work the spirit of all the schools; in whom, says the learned Frenchman, "are combined, and from whom shine forth, in no irregular or uncertain rays, Orpheus, Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, Plotinus, Porphyry, and Jamblichus," and who "would be sufficiently ashamed of his own mind, and paid them such equal reverence, that he was, as it were, the priest of the whole universe." This is a compliment, but a compliment ill warranted and belotowed only because M. Cousin perceived in this Neo-Platonist more of kinship with that extravagant class of philosophers than he himself is one, whose method consists in putting forth strings of brilliant propositions, careless about either their consistency or coherence. Indeed, Cousin's adoration for Proclus shows, if we may use the words of one of their own class, "what things men will worship in their extreme need!" (theta 768, 210).

With the beginning of Christianity in its aggressive movements, the heathen world saw itself faced with immediate danger of a proscription that could only end in death. Philo the Jew, anxious to revive the power of the Old Testament, and the ancients, who saw in the pagan world a danger to their own existence, the example in the Son of the Carpenter of Nazareth and the fishermen of Galilee had reared. What Philo failed to accomplish, Ammonius Saccas, also of Alexandria (near the beginning of the 3rd century), and aided by Plotinus his pupil, attempted to effect. See Plotinus. But both master and pupil left their work ere it was fairly begun, and though Porphyry (q. v.) zealously applied himself to bring out the mystical rationality and the religious philosophy of his teachers, of which these teachings were set forth failed to show even a marked progress in the work so long attempted, and it remained for Jamblichus (q. v.) in the 4th and Proclus in the 5th century to give any appearance whatsoever to the edifications of Neoplatonism, which had been so long in construction, destining. If we wish to see Neoplatonism in its incipience, we must go to Philo the Jew. But if we wish to see it in its ripest growth, we must study it in the writings of Proclus the Athenian. The Neo-Platonism he presents us with no longer the outgrowth of Judaism intermixed with Hellenism, but as an independent philosophy, illuminated by the spirit and light of the Gospel of Christ—whether with which it was struggling for the empire of the world (see Ulmann, Der Einfluss des Christentums, in Studien u. Kritiken, 1832, No. 2).

The bewildering conflict of philosophical theories which these five centuries had been fostering, had resulted in the growth of scepticism, and left no resting-place for minds of a religious turn. The Neo-Platonis of the 4th and 5th centuries must naturally have known their refuge in mysticism, where feeling and intuition superseded reason. And it was the intolerance of the intellec-Plotinus was the first to take this refuge. So did it from this time forth all the successors of the Platonis, of whom Gibbon soeursingly says that "Plato would have been the teacher of both philosophy and religion, though they claimed to be philosophers. They played upon the superstitious tendencies of their age rather than upon the intellectual strength that still remained. They sought to persuade by the aid of magic rather than by the clear force of logic. They turned prophets and seers. Though they took part in the higher discussions and conclusions of philosophy, they nevertheless stood opposed to all philosophy, since they did not even profess to rest upon careful inquiries into external laws of the Spirit, but claimed to have a revelation from God. Thus exalted above all such investigations, Neo-Platonism became the poetry as well as the religion of philosophy. It was attached more especially to the system of Plato, and was professed to be an explanation and a development of his views, but it was aimed to bring together the fundamental principles of all philosophical schools, and the ideas which constitute the basis of all popular religions. It was the work of man, and, however ambitious the scheme, it failed absolutely in its mission. Superstition was the centre and support; magic and sorcery the basis and top-stone of together, the fundamental principles of all philosophical and religious faith. And yet it was neither the one nor the other. "The divinity which it presents is exalted above all human apprehension, and was called simply the Self-sufficient One (ro) sw).

From his overflowing fulness proceeded the Divine Intelligenee, and from this the World-deed, by which the whole universe is pervaded with divine life. Evil is only that which is imperfect, and is the most distant reflection of Deity upon matter. The human soul which had been produced by the Divine Intelligenee fell, in consequence of its longing after earthly things, from its original divine life to its present temporal existence. It therefore belongs to the sensual as well as to the intellectual world. But the souls of the good and wise, even in this world, are in their happiest moments reunited with the Deity, and death is to such a complete restoration to their home.
From a pious veneration for an ancestry far back in antiquity, the Grecian gods especially were regarded as the personal manifestations of the divine life in nature.
Some of them were celestial beings, and some ruled here on earth. These earthly powers were the national gods (μπασιοι, Βάσια), subordinate to the Deity, and exalted above all passion. The mystery of the Gods of course, to be explained allegorically. The arts of divination and magic were justified on the ground of the necessary connection of all phenomena by virtue of the unity of the world-principle" (Hase, Church Hist.
(1863), ch. 6, § 40). Where Proclus lived he was per-it was nevertheless a reformation of the old faith.
Though it extended itself over the whole Roman empire, it embraced within itself contradictory elements, and could maintain its existence only long enough to be witnessed and understood, and then to perish in the development of heathenism. The last school to minister to Neoplatonism in these latter hours was that founded by Proclus.

Life.—Proclus was of Lycian origin, and was born in Constantinople in 412. He received his first instruction at Xanthus, in Lycia (where his surname "Lycius"). His philosophic instruction was obtained at Alexandria, where he studied under Arion, Leonaras, Hero, and es-specially under Olympiodorus, with whom he applied himself chiefly to Aristotelian and Platonic philosophy.
Thence he went to Athens, where a certain Plutarch, a philosopher, and his daughter, and later Syrusin, became his instructors. Aeschyleus, a priestess of Eleusis, instructed him chiefly in theurgic mysterytes. The vivid imagination and enthusiastic temperament which in his childhood had led him to believe in apparitions of Minerva and Apollo, naturally convinced him, in the later part of his life, of the false religion into which he, (q. v.) were brought to bear upon him, still more of his immediate and direct intercommunication with the gods; and he distinctly believed himself to be one of those through whom divine revelation reaches mankind. His philosophical knowledge of Socrates and Pisistratus the Pythagorean, and, like him, he had the power to command the elements to a certain extent, to produce rain, to temper the sun's heat, etc. The Orphic poems, the writings of Hermes, and all that strangely mystical literature with which the age abounded, were to him the only source of true philosophy, and he conidered them all more or less in the light of divine reve-nations. That same cosmopolitan spirit in religious matters which pervaded Rome towards her end had spread throughout all the civilized "pagan" world of those days, and Proclus distinctly laid it down as an axiom that a true philosopher must also be a hiero-plant of the whole world. Acquainted with all the creeds and rites of the ancient Pantheons of the different nations, he not only philosophized upon them in an allegorizing and symbolizing spirit, as many of his contemporaries did, but practiced all the ceremonies, however hard and painful. More especially the practice of fasting in honor of Egyptian deities, while on the one hand it flitted him more and more for his hallucinations and dreams of divine intercourse, on the other hand more and more to a marked degree of ascetic piety, and eager to win disciples from Christian

authorities at Athens, who, in accordance with the spirit of religious intolerance and fanaticism which then began to animate the new and successively religious agitations which followed the constant war, besought him from that city. On being permitted to return, he acted with somewhat more prudence and circumspection, and only allowed his most approved disciples to take part in the nightly assemblies in which he propounded his doctrines. He died in 465, in his full vigor, and in the entire possession of all his mental powers, for which he was no less remarkable than for his personal beauty and strength. As a philosopher he enjoyed the highest celebrity among his contemporaries and successors. Minius was not only, but Proclus, completely inspired and to affirm that when he uttered his profound dogmas his countenance shone with a preternatural light. Besides his other philosophical attainments, he was a distinguished mathematician, astronomer, and grammarian.

In style Proclus is much more perspicuous and intelligible than his predecessor Plotinus; indeed, he is on the whole a good writer, and occasionally is almost eloquent. But the matter of his works has not much to recommend it: his propensity to allegorize everything, even the plainest and simplest expressions in the author to which he has recourse, must be largely from his merits as an exponent of other men's thoughts; and but for the interest which attaches to him as the last of a school of philosophy, it is not much to be regretted that his works have slumbered so long in the dust of libraries, and have been either wholly neglected or only carelessly treated. (c. p. 74.)

His Philosophical System. In the writings of Proclus there is collated, arranged, and dialectically elaborated the whole body of transmitted philosophy, augmented by large additions, and the whole combined into a sort of system, to which he succeeded in giving the appearance of strict logical connection. He professed that his design was not to bring forward views of his own, but simply to expound Plato, in doing which he proceeded on the idea that everything in Plato must be brought into accordance with the mystical theology of Orpheus. He looked upon the Orphic poems and Chaldean oracles, which he had diligently studied, as divine revelations, and capable of becoming instrumental to philosophy by means of an allegorical exposition. He therefore wrote a separate work on the coincidence of the doctrines of Orpheus, Pythagoras, and Plato. It was in much the same spirit that he attempted to blend together the logical method of Aristotl and the fanciful speculations of Neo-Platonic mysticism. He called himself, as we have already had occasion to say, the last link of the Hermetic chain, that is, the last of men consecrated to the study of philosophy, in whom, by personal adulation, was preserved the occult knowledge of the Mysteriae. Where reasoning fails him, he takes refuge in the ποιήμα of Plotinus, which is superior to knowledge. He conducts us to the operations of theory, which transcend all human wisdom, and comprise within itself all the advantages of divinations, purifications, initiations, and all the activities of divine inspiration. Through it are united the primary unity, in which every motion and energy of our souls comes to rest. It is this principle which unites not only men with gods, but the gods with each other, and with the one—the good, which is of all things the most credible.

Proclus, held, in all its leading features, the doctrine of emanations from one ultimate, primeval principle of all things, the absolute unity, towards union with which again all things strive. This union he did not, like Plotinus, conceive to be effected by means of pure reason, as even things destitute of reason and energy participate in it, purely as the result of their subsistence. In such a conception, therefore, he must have conceived the ποιήμα, by which he represents this union as being effected, as something which did not involve rational or thinking activity. All inferior existences are connected with the highest only through the intermediate ones, and can return to the higher only through that which is intermediate. And the principle is, in a certain way, particular and impalpable, and everything which comes by partaking of the one (Inst. Theol. c. 3).

Every object is a union of the one and the many: that which unites the one and the many is nothing else than the pure, absolute one—the essential one, which makes everything else partake of unity. Proclus argued that there is either one principium, or many principia. If the latter, the principia must be either finite or infinite in number. If infinite, what is derived from them must be infinite, so that we should have a double infinite, or a quartet; and because it was only finite, so that the principia must be finite in number. There would then be a definite number of them. But number presupposes unity. Unity (ἰόντος) is consequently the principium of principia, and the cause of the finite multiplicity and of the being of all things (Theol. Plat. ii. 1). There is therefore one principium which is incorporeal, for the corporeal consists of parts. It is immovable and unchangeable, for everything that moves, moves towards some object or end, which it seeks after. If the principium were movable it must also be divisible. The good is not divisible, for it is of itself desirable outside of it. But this is impossible, for the principium has need of nothing, and is itself the end towards which everything else strives. The principium, or first cause of all things, is superior to all actual being (οὐσία), and separated from it, and cannot even have any cause. Thus it is not an object of cognition to any existing thing, nor can it be named (L. c. p. 93). But in contemplating the emanation of things from the one and their return into it we arrive at two words, the good, and the one, of which the first is an absolute, positive, the latter negative only (L. c. p. 96). The absolutely one has produced not only earth and heaven, but all the gods which are above the world and in the world: it is the god of all gods, the unity of all unities (L. c. ii. 110).

Everything which is perfect strives to produce something else; the full seeks to impart its fulness. Still more must this be the case with the absolute good, though in connection with that which we must not conceive of any creative power or energy, for that would be to make the one imperfect and not simple, not fruitful through its very perfection (L. c. p. 101). Every emanation is less perfect than that from which it emanates (Inst. Theol. c. 7), but has a certain similarity with it, and, so far as this similarity goes, remains in it, departing from it so far as it is unlike, but as far as possible being one with it, and remaining in it (ibid. 31). What is absolutely one is a multitude, for in the one there is both unity, or of the nature of unity. Thus the first produced things are independent unities (αὐτός αὐτός), of these independent unities some are simple, others more composite. The nearer the units are to the absolute unity, the simpler they are; the greater is the sphere of their operation and their productive power. Thus out of unity there arise a multitude of things which depart further and further from the simplicity of the absolute one; and as the producing power diminishes, it introduces motion and more conditions into things, while it diminishes their universality and simplicity. His whole system of emanations seems, in fact, to be a realization of the logical subordination of ideas. The simplest ideas which are contained in those which are composite being regarded by him as the principles of things.

The emanations proceeded in a curious triadic manner. That which precedes all power, and emanates immediately from the primal cause of all things, is finite. Unity, duality, he considered as identical with limitation (ἰόντος) and boundlessness (ἀνάμετρος). From the principle compounded of these two there arises a third, a compound of the two—substance (as a sort of genus of all substances), that which in itself is abso-lately an existing thing and nothing more (Theol. Plat. l., 138 sq.). Everything, according to Proclus, contains in itself being (οὐσία), life (ζωή), and intelligence ( νοημα). The life is the centre of the thing, for it is both an object of thought and exists. The intelligence is the limit of the thing, for the intellect ( νοημα) is in the thing, but it is not outside of it (οὐσία), and the latter in the former; but the intellect or thought exists in the thing thought of objectively, and the thing thought of exists in the intellect productively ( νοημος).

This accordingly is the first triad—limit, infinity, and the compound of the two. Proclus distinguished the divided the divine unity (the entire mind, and the reproduction of itself into a life (οὐσία) to be intelligible and intelligent, supernatiual and natural; it attributed supernatural efcacy to the name of the Supreme Being, and, like his predecessors, exalted theory above philosophy. The first triad—limit, infinity, and the compound of the two. Proclus taught, is the deity who advances to the extreme verge of the conceivable from the inconceivable, primal deity, measuring and defining all things, and establishes the paternal, concete-

nating, and immeasurable race of gods. The infinite is the inexhaustible power of this deity. The "mixed" is the first and the highest of gods; the mixed comprehends everything within itself. Out of this first triad springs the second. As the first of the units produces the highest existing thing, the intermediate unity produces the intermediate existing thing, in which is contained the unity of the deity, reality, and all the limits of the existent. The middle is non-theirs, something intermediate—power; and something last—the existence in the second grade, conceivable life (νοημα). For there is everything which is the object of thought being (το ον), life (ζωή), and thought ( νοημα). The third of the units, the "mixed", produces the third triad, in which the intelligence or thinking power ( νοημα) attains to its subsistence. This thinking power is the limit and completion of everything which can be the object of thought. The first triad contains the principle of union; the second of multiplicity and increase by means of continuous motion or life, for motion is a species of life; the third, the principle of the separation of the manifold, and of formation by means of limit.

In his treatise on Providence and Fate, Proclus seeks to explain the difference between the two, and to show that the second is subordinate to the first in such a manner that freedom is consistent with it. Both providence and fate are causes—the first the cause of all good, the second the cause of all connection (and connection as cause and effect). There are three sorts of things, the one is the connection of the deity, the other anterior to the deity, others whose substance does not exist, but is perpetually coming into existence, and, between these, things whose substance is eternal, but whose operation takes place in time. Proclus names these three kinds intellectual, animal, and corporeal. The last alone are who advance to the extreme verge of the conceivable from the inconceivable, primal deity, measuring and de-

nating, and immeasurable race of gods. The infinite is the inexhaustible power of this deity. The "mixed" is the first and the highest of gods; the mixed comprehends everything within itself. Out of this first triad springs the second. As the first of the units produces the highest existing thing, the intermediate unity produces the intermediate existing thing, in which is contained the unity of the deity, reality, and all the limits of the existent. The middle is non-theirs, something intermediate—power; and something last—the existence in the second grade, conceivable life (νοημα). For there is everything which is the object of thought being (το ον), life (ζωή), and thought ( νοημα). The third of the units, the "mixed", produces the third triad, in which the intelligence or thinking power ( νοημα) attains to its subsistence. This thinking power is the limit and completion of everything which can be the object of thought. The first triad contains the principle of union; the second of multiplicity and increase by means of continuous motion or life, for motion is a species of life; the third, the principle of the separation of the manifold, and of formation by means of limit.

His Works.—The following of Proclus's writings are still extant: (1) ΕΙΣ την Πλάτωνος Θεολογίαν, in six books. (2) Στοιχείων Θεολογία (Institutio Theological). This treatise was first published in the Latin translation of 16th century. (3) The Greek text, with the translation of Εμ. Portus, is appended to the edition of the last-mentioned work (Hamb. 1618). (5) A commentary on the First Alcibiades of Plato. (4) A commentary on the Timaeus of Plato. Of this Comment. On the Timaeus five books remain, but they only treat of a third of the dialogue. It is appended to the first Basle edition of Plato. (6) Various notes on the Politeia of Plato, printed in the same edition of Plato as the last-mentioned work. (6) A commentary on the Parmenides of Plato, published in Stalbmah's edition of that dialogue. (7) Portions of a commentary on the Cratylus of Plato, edited by Bois-sonade (Leips. 1820). (8) A paraphrase of various difficult passages in the Τηγαλδίδος σύναξις of Ptolemaeus: first published, with a preface, by Melanchon (Basle, 1564). (9) A treatise on motion (Περί κινή-τικός), a sort of preface to the second book of Aristotle's treatise Περί φυσικής ακροασίας. (10) Επιτότων των αστρονομικών υποθέσεων (ibid. 1560). (11) Σφαίρα, frequently appended to the works of the ancient astronomers. There are also several separate tracts and tracts of books in the library, to which are attached various editions of the text of Euclid. (13) A commentary on the «Εργα και ημιρα» of Heidus, in a somewhat mutilated form (Τηγαλδίδος έποιη μαρτιν την Περί των αστρονομικών ιποθέσεων (ibid. 1560). (13) Σφαίρα, frequently appended to the works of the ancient astronomers. There are also several separate tracts. (14) Chρηστολόγια γραμματική, or, rather, some portions of it preserved by Photius (cod. 289), treating of poetry and the lives of various celebrated poets. The short life of Homer which passes under the name of Proclus was probably taken from the time of Theophrastus (which requires the existence of the poetic). (15) Επιτότων των αστρονομικών υποθέσεων (De Astronimia Mundb). (16) De Provincia et Fato, addressed to Theodorus, a mechanician. (17) Deceum Detaetiones circa Provincialem (Περί των υποθέσεων την την Πρώτων ακροασίων). (18) De Malorum Substantiis (Περί των και δακτυλίων αστρονομικών). (19) Two treatises only exist in the Latin translation of Giulielmo M. The works of Proclus are printed entire by Fabricius in his Bibliotheca Graeca, ix, 373, etc. (19) A little astrological treatise on the effect of eclipses, in a Latin translation. (20) A treatise on po-eternity, also in a Latin translation, printed together with a treatise by Chrysobulus (Paris, 1615). (21.) Five hymns. (22.) Some scholia on Homer.

This edition of the chief works of Proclus. The edition of Cousin (Paris, 1820-27, 6 vols. 8vo) contains the treatises on Providence and Fate, on the Ten Doctrines about Providence, and on the Nature of Evil, the commentary on the Alcibiades, and the commentary on the Parmenides. This learned Frenchman has since brought out Procli Philos. Platonic opera inedita (Paris, 1864). There are English translations of the commentaries on the Timaeus, the six books on the Theology of Plato, the commentaries on the first book of Euclid, and the Theological Elements, and the five Bks. Proclus, St., an Eastern ecclesiastical of the 5th century. He was at a very early age appointed reader in the church at Constantinople. He was also engaged as secretary or amanuensis to St. Chrysostom, and was employed in a similar capacity by Atticus (who succeeded Aracius as patriarch of Constantinople), by whom he was invested successively with the orders of deacon and presbyter. He was raised to the rank of bishop of Cyzicus by Sisinius, the successor of Atticus, but did not exercise the functions of his office, the people of Cyzicus choosing another in his place. On the death of Sisinius (A.D. 427) there was a general expression of feeling in favor of Proclus as his successor, but Nestorius was appointed. Proclus continued zealously against the heresy or which the swan was introduced into the Church, combating them even in a sermon preached before Nestorius himself. On the deposition of Nestorius, Proclus was again proposed as his successor; but his elevation was again opposed, though on what grounds does not appear very clearly ascertained. But on the death of Maximianus, who was appointed instead, Proclus was at last created patriarch. In A.D. 438 Proclus gained a great deal of honor by having the body of St. Chrysostom brought to Constantinople. There is still extant a fragment of a Latin translation of a eulogy on St. Chrysostom, by Proclus, delivered at his funeral (Procli in Tim., p. 329). A treatise of Proclus that the custom of chanting the Triasian was introduced into the Church. While in office, Proclus conducted himself with great prudence and mildness. For further details respecting his ecclesiastical career, the reader is referred to Tertullian, De Corrept. Monachi, § 704-718. His extant writings are enumerated by Fabricius (B. G. ix, 505-512). One of the most celebrated of his letters (Παρέξιον παράτησι) was written in A.D. 435, when the bishops of Armenia applied to him for his opinion on certain propositions which had been disseminated in their dioceses, and were attributed to Theodorus of Mopsuestia. The discussion that ensued with respect to these propositions made a considerable stir in the East. Proclus bestowed a good deal of pains upon his style, which is terse and sententious, but is crowded with antitheses and rhetorical points, and is a laborer endeavor to reiterate the same sentiment in every possible variety of form. From the quotations of subsequent authors, it appears that several of the writings of Proclus are lost. The Platonist Theology of Proclus Diadochus has sometimes been described as the 24th book of the works of St. Proclus. The 24th of October is the day consecrated to the memory of St. Proclus by the Greek Church. See Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog, and Mythol., s. v.; Neander, Ch. Hist., ii, 946 sq.; Biddle, Hist. of the Popes, i, 160 sq., 170 sq.

Proconsul. The Greek word προκονσαλτ, for which this is the true equivalent, is rendered uniformly "deputy" in the A.V. of Acts xiii, 7, 8, 12; xix, 38, and the derived verb προκονσαλτος in Acts xvi, 12 is translated "to be deputy." At the division of the Roman legions, the provinces of Asia, the Roman Proconsul was the civil and imperial, the emperor assigned to the senate such portions of territory as were peaceable and could be held without force of arms (Sueton. Oct. 47; Strabo, xvii, 460; Dio Cass. xiii, 12), an arrangement which remained with frequent modifications till the 3rd century. Over these senatorial provinces the senate appointed by lot yearly an officer who was called "proconsul" (ibid., 13), who exercised purely civil powers, had no power over life and death, and was attended by one or more legates (ibid. 14). He was neither a civil nor a military governor, nor wore military dress (ibid., 13). He was chosen out of the body of the senate; and it was customary, when any one's consulate expired, to send him as a proconsul into some province. He enjoyed the same honor with the consuls, but was allowed only six lectores with the fasces before him. Such provinces were in consequence called "proconsular." With the exception of Africa and Asia, which were assigned to men who had passed the office of consul, the senatorial provinces were given to those who had been proconsuls, and were divided by lot each year among those who held this office five years previously. Their term of office was one year. The proconsuls decided cases of equity and justice, either privately in their palace, where they received petitions, heard complaints, and granted writs under their seals; or publicly in the common hall, with the formalities generally observed in the courts at Rome. These duties were, however, more frequently delegated to their assessors, or other judges of their own appointment. As the proconsul had also the direction of justice, of war, and of the revenues, these departments were assigned to the senators who were usually nominated by the senate. The expense of their journeys to and from their provinces was defrayed by the public. Livy (viii and xxi) mentions two other classes of proconsuls—those who, being consuls, had their office continued beyond the time appointed by law; and those who, being privionly in a private station, were invested with this honor, either for the government of provinces or to command in war. Some were created consuls by the senate without being appointed to any province, merely to command the army, and to take charge of the military discipline; others were allowed to enter upon their provincial office before being admitted to the consulate, but having that honor in reserve.

Among the senatorial provinces in the first arrangement by Augustus were Cyprus, Achaia, and Asia within the Illyris and Tauris (Strabo, xvii, 840). The first and last of these are alluded to in Acts xiii, 7, 8, 12; xix, 38, as under the government of proconsuls. Achaia became an imperial province in the second year of Tiberius A.D. 16, and was governed by a procurator (Tacit. Ann. i, 76), but was restored to the senate by Claudius (Sueton. Claud. 25), and therefore Gallio, before whom St. Paul was brought, is rightly termed "proconsul" in Acts xvii, 12. See GALLIO. Cyprus also, after the battle of Actium, was first made an imperial province (Dio Cass. iii, 12), but five years afterwards (B.C. 22) it was given to the senate, and is reckoned by Strabo (xvii, 440) ninth among the provinces of the people governed by σταυροείδους, or Achaia is the seventh. These σταυροείδους, or procurators, had the title of "proconsul," and the provinces were given to the senate in exchange for Dalmatia, and thus, says Dio Cassius (liv, 4), "proconsuls (ἀντικυβερνητές) began to be sent to those nations." In Bockh's Corpus Inscriptionum, No. 2631, is the following relating to Cyprus: "Τάκτων Κοίνων Ιωαδων Κύρων αντικυβερνητός. This Quintus Julius Cornutus appears to have been proconsul of Cyprus before the twelfth year of Claudius. He is mentioned in the next inscription (No. 2632) as the predecessor of another proconsul, Lucius Annius Bassus. The date of this last inscription is the twelfth year of Caligula. The third proconsul of Cyprus in the time of Claudius occurs on a copper coin, of which an engraving is given under CYPRUS. A coin of Ephesus (q. v.) illustrates the usage of the word ἀντικυβερνητός in Acta xix, 38.

PROCOPIUS (also known as Procop the greater, the elder, or the elder, or the shaven, in allusion to his having received the tonsure in early life), one of the greatest of the Hussite leaders, and ranks only second to Ziska, whose successor he was among the Taborites. Procop was born of a noble family towards the close of the thirteenth century. His father, a nobleman of Prague. After having travelled for some years through France and Spain, Procop returned to his native country just as the religious wars were breaking out. He had taken holy orders, but instead of entering the ministry he joined the ranks of the insurgents, the Hussites, and, by his military genius, rapidly rose to the first rank. In 1424 Ziska died, and the Taborites elected Procop as their leader. Palacky, in comparing the two great Hussites, says of Procop that if he did not equal Ziska in warlike ability, he surpassed him in the art of political cunning and swindliness. Procop's history from this time till 1427 presents an almost unbroken series of daring attacks upon the Austrians. At the same time, a larger body of Taborites, who called themselves Orphans, and had been overrunning Lusatia and had burned Lauban, under the leadership of a man subsequently known as Procop the lessor (or younger), now, in concert with the more distinguished Procop, attacked Silesia, and took part in those internal feuds of the Hussite factions by which Bohemia was almost wholly ruined. His efforts were not without success. He has been described as the author of the law of protection for the military glory, the religious inflexibility, of Bohemia." See Guillett, Life and Times of John Huss, vol. ii, ch. xvii sq.; Život i život opuštenosti, vii, 565-568; Palacky, Gesch. von Böhmen, iii, 91 sq.

Procop the Younger. See Procop, Andrew.

Procopius of Cesarea, a noted character in the history of the East in the 6th century, is especially distinguished as the writer of a history in which he dwells at large on the ecclesiastical condition of the periods of which he treats. He was born at Cesarea, in Palestine, about the end of the 6th or beginning of the 6th century. After studying rhetoric in his native country, he went to Constantinople, where he gave lessons in rhetoric, and afterwards was called to the court as a linguist for learning and ability reached the court; and the emperor Justin the elder, in the last year of his reign, appointed him assessore (αξιωτάτος) to Belisarius, who was about that time sent as governor to Dara, on the frontiers of Armenia. Procopius afterwards served against the Persians (580), afterwards in that against the Vandals in through Silesia, Moravia, and Hungary as far as Pressburg. In 1429 Procop made inroads into the German states as far as Magdeburg, and returned to Bohemia laden with spoil, and followed by a numerous band of captive nobles. The Emperor Sigismund at this crisis offered to treat with him, but the imperial demand, that the Hussites should submit to the decision of a council, afforded Procop a pretext for breaking off all negotiations with the imperial court. A second German crusading army now advanced in 1451, but was thoroughly defeated at Riesenburg. These successes, which were followed by others of nearly equal importance in Silesia, Hungary, and Saxony, where the princes had to purchase peace at the hands of the two Procopas on humiliating terms, induced the Council of Basle to propose a meeting between the Hussite leaders and ten learned Catholic doctors. The meeting lasted fifty days, but was productive of no good result. Procop himself went before that learned body, and defended, with much spirit, the creed of his party. But failing to receive any acknowledgment of his views, he finally refused further to attend the council, and returned to Bohemia, where, combining his forces with those of Procop the lesser, he laid siege to Pilsen. The Calixtines, who came here in force, had offended Procop by the peace treaty they had made with a delegation of the Council of Basle. The council, on this, passed an act known as the Basle Compact, by which the Hussites were allowed the use of the cup in the Lord's Supper, and the Bohemians were designated by the title of the First Sons of the Catholic Church. The Taborites and Hussites of the Orphans, under the lessor, another proconsul of Cyprus in the time of Claudius occurs on a copper coin, of which an engraving is given under CYPRUS. A coin of Ephesus (q. v.) illustrates the usage of the word ἀντικυβερνητός in Acta xix, 38.
Africa (538–555), and lastly against the Goths in Italy (580–589). During these campaigns he appears to have rendered himself very useful by his ability and ac-tuosity, and he was intrusted with important commissions connected with the service of the army.
In his capacity of censor, he was the general's legal adviser, and he was also his private secretary. In 538 he assisted Antonina, the wife of Beli-sarius, in raising troops in Campania, and in sending some men of a force with which he was then bound.
On his return to Constantinople, about 540, the emperor Justinian made him a senator, as a reward for his services.
In 562 he was made prefect of Constantinople, unless if perhaps it was another of the name who obtained this advantage.
His death is not recorded with any degree of accuracy. He died in that year, but the exact year which was then bound.
He was a man of great ability, and the private year of his death is not ascertainned.
It was during his extensive travels that he gathered the materials for the History of his Own Times (in eight books), translated into Latin by Claude Maitre, a Jesut, under the title Procopius Caesarinus Historiarum sui Temporis Libri Octo (Paris, 1662, fol.; with the Greek text in English, Lond. 1638, fol.). His descriptions of the manners of the various barbarous nations which invaded the Roman empire are vivid and interesting. The first two books of his history concern the Byzantine army, and the third book with the death of Arcadius, and briefly relates the wars between the Romans and Persians under Theodosius the younger, Anastasius, and Justinian, and lastly Justinian.
As he comes down to contemporary times, his history is more full of interesting events.
He died in that year, the third year of Jutician's reign (A.D. 550).
Books iii and iv treat of the wars of the Vandals in Africa, and the reconquest of that province by Belisarius.
The 5th, 6th, and 7th books are concerned with the history of the Gothic kingdom in Italy founded by Theodoric, and the expedition of Belisarius against Totila. The 8th book is of a mixed character; it resumes the account of the Persian wars, then speaks of the affairs of the Roman empire in other quarters—in Africa, on the Rhine, and in Thrace—and at last resumes the narrative of the Gothic war in Italy, the expedition of Narses, the defeat and death of Teiss, and the final overthrow of the Gothic kingdom.—English Cyclop. a. v. As a historian, Procopius took Herodotus for his pattern, and even resembles his master's fatalism in the material conception of his history. The latter, however, views the world as acquit, and as such regards himself as above all positive religion and dogmatic disputes. On account of the cold, unsympathetic manner in which he writes of Christianity, some have not believed him a Christian, but a deist, Jew, or even a heathen. He was, however, at least in outward character, a Christian: in his sermons he appears from Procopius of Gaza, a very respectable Greek sofist of the 6th century, and the first who suffered martydom in Palestine, under the reign of Dociatian.

The precise time of his birth or death is not recorded.
He wrote commentaries on the Octateuch (ed. C. Causier, Tigur. 1555, fol.), the books of Kings, the Chronic-es (ed. J. Murnius, Lugd. Bat. 1639, 4to), Isaiah (ed. J.
Curtius, Paris, 1860, fol.), etc., and opened among the Greeks the explanation of the Catholicon of Eucer.

Procopius, Friedrich P., a Roman Catholic monastic noted especially for his valuable contributions Christian song, was born in the year 1608, of Protestant parents, at Templin, in Brandenburg. At a very early age he joined the Roman Catholic Church, and when eighteen years old he entered the Order of the Capuchins of the Austro-Bohemian province. Having completed his studies, he visited many cities as a preacher and missionary. He soon became known as a famous pulpit orator, but more so by his poetical productions, which gave him the name of "Catholic Meistersinger." Procopius died at Linz in 1680. He wrote, Der Gross-Wunderthaftig Mutter Gottes Maria Hilf Lob-Ge-zog (Passau, 1659):—Herzten-Fried und Seelen-Trost (ibid.
1660, 1661):—Marial Consecatorium rythmo-melodi-

Procraestination, the postponement of a matter from one day to another; according to the maxim of the laok and of the men of pleasure, "Seria in crastiniurn (dium or tempus)." Generally, in such cases, time wears on, and things are not done, at least not in the right time or in the right way: "Cras cras et semper cras et sic dilabitar etas." The system of procrastination, therefore, is to be commended in no respect; but least of all in moral, or, better, religious matters. Ev-every day lost in our moral amendment is an irreparable loss, a loss for eternity, as reformation becomes the more more the more it is delayed.
Proctor (formed by a contraction from the Latin procurator, of a procurator, "he who is authorized to take care of another person's cause in ecclesiastical courts, in the stead of the party whom he represents. It corresponds to attorney or solicitor in the other courts.
In the Church of Rome there are extra-proctors, a class who settle in the name of another a legal business of no litigious character; a more accurate title is mandatory. The title of proctor has been preserved only in some kinds of procurations concerning ecclesiastical affairs. These procurors may act instead of, 1. Bride alis), which, after its acceptance, takes the lawful nature of a betrothal, but the betrothal itself, or the actual contract about the future marriage, can be performed by a procurator in the capacity of procuror (service pro procuratori). Only the proctor must have special powers for the conclusion of a promise of marriage with a determined person (cf. 34, Dig.

the revolution. The mandatory must be present in person, and cannot be represented by a substitute (Secat. c. 9, De Procure, i, 19); and the bride and bridgroom thus united must afterwards give their consent in person. These dispositions of canon law are preserved in the Austrian and Bavarian legislation. Protestant matrimonial law rejects marriage by procuration, but allows an act in favor of type gipers, but not for the procurator. 3. God fathers and godmothers, in baptisms or confirmation, may, if sick or otherwise prevented, choose three persons for their representatives at the holy ceremony (procurator patrii). As, according to the decision of the Council of Trent, the sacramental minister must have a godfather and a godmother (prens et pretia), each of the parties can make choice of a substitute, either male or female, but both mandates cannot belong to the same sex. The real godfather, not his representative, contracts in this case the cognotio spiritualis, and the prohibition of marriage founded on it (Dudder. 2. Conrs. Conc. Trid. May 16, 1680, Aug. 23 and Sept. 1, 1731). 4. Absent electors, if they can sufficiently justify their absence, and are prepared to swear to it (c. 42, § 1, de Elect. i, 6), cannot declare their vote by writing. Electors from foreign countries are entitled to this privilege. Electors from foreign countries are entitled to be present in the secular state. In the English ecclesiastical constitution, proctors are those clergymen who are chosen in each diocese to represent the brethren in convocation. In the universities the name refers to those officers who are chosen to represent the masters of arts, maintain the discipline of the university. The proctors are chosen out of the several colleges by turn. The pro-proctors are the deputies of the proctors.

Proctor. David C., a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1792. He graduated at Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H., in 1818, studied divinity in the Andover Theological Seminary, Mass., was licensed by a Congregational association, and in 1822 was ordained by a Congregational council, and went West under the auspices of the Connecticut Home Missionary Society. His first field of labor was Indiana, Ind.; subsequent to his removal to Kentucky, and took charge of the Church in Springfield and Lebanon. In 1826 he was temporarily called to the presidency of Centre College, Danville, Ky., after which he was without charge for a number of years. He died Jan. 18, 1836, at the age of 44, leaving a wife and two children, and had considerable reputation as a scholar. See Wilson, Prep. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 167. (J. L. S.)

Procuration. Different meanings have been applied to this word. 1. An entertainment given to the archdeacon with provision for seven horses and six men. 2. An equivalent in money; according to Lyndwood, 7s. 6d. to the archdeacon and 1s. to each of the other six at his visitation, to commute for the provision or entertainment which was formerly expected to be provided at the time of visitation. 3. An entertainment made at a visitation for a bishop. In 1386 a money composition was permitted to be offered by pope Benedict XII, but only one procurator could be demanded if several churches were visited in one day. The amount varied in different countries. In England an archbishop received 220 turus, a bishop 150, an archdeacon 50, and an archpriest or rural dean 10. See S. N. O. D.

Procurator. This word does not occur in the Vulgate or in the A. V., nor is it an accurate Greek equivalent, εἰκονομέας (though used by Philo, Leg. ad Cim. and by Josephus, Ant. xx, 6, 2, 8, 5; comp. xx, 5, 1; his office is called εἰκονομεῖα [ibid. xx, 5, 1]), found in this sense in the Greek Testament, where it is rephrased by the yeparxw; by our translators ( governor (Luke ii, 2; Matt. xxvi, 2; xxvii, 14, etc.). ὑγρός also occurs in a perfectly general sense (Matt. x, 18; 1 Pet. ii, 14). In Matt. ii, 6 it is rendered "prince," and corresponds to the Hebrew PROCURATOR. "Governor" in the A. V. is also used for ὑγρός (2 Cor. xi, 82). Δέοματος is another Greek term for procurator. The word ὑγρός, or procurator, is generally applied, both in the original and in our version, to the procurator of the temple (Josephus, Ant. xxvi, 370, etc.), Felix (Acts xxiii, 1), and Festus (xxvi, 80), but it is also used of Cyrenius (Quirinus), who held the more responsible and distinguished office of praeses or legatus Caesaris over the province of Syria (Luke ii, 2). Procurators were chiefly despatched to the imperial, and not to the senatorial provinces. See Provincia. The revenues of the states that were created must be chequered, while those of the former belonged to the fiscus, or privy purse. The procuratores Caesaris were specially intrusted with the interests of the fiscus, and therefore managed the various taxes and imposts, performing similar duties to those exercised by the quaestors in the provinces administered by the senatorial procurators; were, however, sometimes sent as well as questores to the senatorial provinces (Tacit. Amm. xiii, 1; Dio Cass. liii, 15); but these were doubtless offices of less dignity, though bearing the same title. Procurator is also used for the governors of the two ecclesiastical provinces (Ulpian, Dig. 8, 3), regent (Cesar, B. C. liii, 112), etc. They were selected from among men who had been consuls or praetors, and sometimes from the inferior senators (Dio Cass. liii, 13-15). They were attended by six scribes, used the military dress, and wore the sword (ibid. 12). No quaestor held the title of procurator from the time of Augustus, nor any of the property and revenues of the imperial treasury were administered by the rationales, procuratores, and actores of the emperor, who were chosen from among his freedmen, or from among the knights (Tacit. Hist. v, 9; Dio Cass. liii, 10). Sometimes the procurators were invested with the dignity of legati, or procuratores cum jure gildii (τεταραμένοι ιούλοιοι), Josephus, War, ii, 8, 1), and this was the case with the procurators of Judea, which had been made a sub-province of Syria (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 1, 1) since the deposition of the etnarch Archelaus, A.D. 6. There is therefore no inaccuracy in the use of ὑγρός in the New Test., since we find from inscriptions that praeses and procurator were often interchangeable (Gruter, p. 495, b). In one respect, indeed, the ὑγρός were even more powerful than the procuratores themselves (disponabant); for, being regarded as the immediate emissaries and representatives of the Caesar, by whom they were appointed to an indefinite tenure of office (Dio Cass. liii, 15-15), they had the power of inflicting capital punishment on their own districts, or even beyond these (ibid. 10; Josephus, War, ii, 8, 1). They also governed the province when the procurator was dead or absent, "vice proconsulam," as we see from many inscriptions (Murat. p. 907, 4, etc.). In a turbulent and seditious province like Judea, their most frequent functions were of a military or judicial character. The first procurator was Coponius, who was sent out with Quirinius to take a census of the property of the Jews and to confiscate that of Archelaus (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 1, 1). His successor was Marcus Ambibius, then Annius Rufus, in whose time the emperor Augustus died. Tib. Claudius Gratus, who was procurator for eleven years, and was succeeded by Pontius Pilate (ibid. 2, 2), who is called by Josephus (ibid. 3, 1) ὑγρός, as he is in the New Test. He was subject to the governor (praeses) of Syria, for the council of the Samaritans denounced Pilate to Vespasian, who sent him to Rome and put one of his own friends, Marcellus, in his place (ibid. 4, 2). The headquarters of the procurator were at Cesarea (Josephus, War, ii, 2, 2; Acts xxiii, 28), where he had a judgment-seat (xxv, 6) in the audience-chamber (ver. 31, 23), and was attended by a committee of procurators, consulted in cases of difficulty, the assessores (Sueton. Gall. 14), or ὑγρομάχοι, who were mentioned by Josephus (War, ii, 16) as having been consulted by Cestius, the governor of Syria, when certain charges were made against Florus, the procurator of Judæa. More important cases were laid before the emperor (Acts xxv, 12; comp. Josephus, Ant. xx, 6, 2). The procurator, as the representative of the emperor, had the power of life and death (Acts xxvii, 27; Matt. xxvii, 26), which was denied to the proconsul. In the New Testament we see the procurator only in his judicial capacity. Thus Christ is brought before Pontius Pilate as a political offender (Matt. xxvii, 2, 11), and the accusation is heard by the procurator, who is seated on the judgment-seat (ver. 19). Felix heard St. Paul's accusation and defence from the judgment-seat at Cesarea (Acts xxix), which was in the open air in the great stadium (Josephus, War, ii, 9, 2, and St. Paul calls him "judge" (Acts xxiv, 10), as if this term described his chief functions. The procurator (archon) is again alluded to in his judicial capacity in 1 Pet. ii, 14. He was attended by a cohort as body-guard (Matt. xxvii, 27), and apparently went up to Jerusalem at the time of the high festivals, and there resided in the palace of Herod (Josephus, Wars, ii, 14, 8; Philo, De Leg. ad Gaium, c. 57; ii, 589, ed. Lachm.), in which was the praetorium, or "judgment-hall," as it is rendered in the A. V. (Matt. xxvii, 27; Mark xv, 16; comp. Acts xxvi, 35). Sometimes, it appears, Jerusalem was made his winter quarters (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 5, 1). The high-priest was supposed to be removed at the will of the procurator (ibid. 2, 2). Of the oppression and extortion practiced by one of these officers, Gessius Florus, which resulted in open rebellion, we have an account in Josephus (Ant. xx, 11, 1; War, ii, 14, 2). The same laws held both for the government of the imperial and senatorial provinces, that they could not raise a levy or exact more than an appointed sum of money from their subjects, and that when their successors came they were to return to Rome within three months ( Dio Cass. lxi, 15). The pomp and dignity of the procurators may be inferred from the narrative of these trials of the titles of "most excellent" and "most noble" (Πρωτάρης), applied to them by such different lips as those of Claudius Lyssias, Tertullian, and St. Paul; but they were usually chosen from no higher rank than that of the equites, or even the freedmen of the emperor; and the "most noble Felix," in particular, was a mere manumitted slave (Tacit. Hist. v, 9; Amm. xxvi, 54; Suett. Claud. 28). It is satisfactory to find that even in the minutest details the glimpses of their position afforded to us by the New Testament are corroborated by the statements of ancient writers. The diocetes (Luke xiii, 1), the velatio (Acts xxiv, 26), the insolence (John xix, 22), and the gross injustice (Acts xxiv, 27), which we see exemplified in their conduct towards our Lord and his apostles, are amply illustrated by contemporary historians (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 5, 1; Dio Cass. xxv, 12; Comp. Suet. Claud. 28) and we may say, in the main, that they were heavy on the mind of the emperor Trajan that he called the extortions of provincial governors "the spleen of the empire" (comp. Aurel. Vict. Epit. 42). Vespasian (more so) took a more humorous view of the matter, and said that the procurators were like sponges (Sueton. Vesp. 16). The presence of the wives of Pilate (Matt. xxvii, 19) and Felix (Acts xxiv, 24) reminds us of the famous debate on the proposition of Cæcina to forbid the procurals and procurators to be accompanied by their wives (Tacit. Ann. iii, 33, 34). This had been the old and perhaps the wise regulation of earlier days, since the cruelty, ambition, and luxury of these ladies were often more formidable to the provincials than those of the governors themselves. But the rule had often been violated, and had of late been forbidden by the emperor. See, too, the ready handing-over of the prisoner from one authority to another (ἀνώνυμος, remiss, Luke xxiii, 7; Acts xxvi, 82), some trace of that statutory dread of being denounced after their term of office was over, which alone acted as a check upon the lawless of the even the most uncivilized among the provincials. This is seen at first sight so trivial as the tribunal (δικαστήριον), and the tessellated pavement (Ἀπολλονιος) on which it was elevated, derives an interest and importance from the fact that they were conventional symbols of wealth and dignity, and that Julius Caesar thought it worth while to decorate his own (see Suetonius, Aug. 63). See Julius Cæsar, 14, 66. See Sib. De Statu Judeae Præstae, (Franc. 1698; also in Iken, Thea. Nor., ii, 592; Deyling, Observat. ii, 429; Grossmann, De Procuratoren (Lips. 1828); Langen, in the Theod. Probodisa, a body of Antinomian Gnostic heretics, took their name from their founder, Probus, a heretic of the first century, who instituted the sect of the Adaminites. Probodius maintained that he and his followers were the sons of the most high God, a royal race (ζεύγατος), and therefore, in crazy self-conviction, thought themselves bound by no laws. They rejected the Sabbath; dispensed with prayer and all ordinances of external worship, which they considered to be necessary only for those who were under the power of the Demiurges. They indulged in open profanity, calling themselves Adaminites, because they professed to imitate the condition of daily life which many of their first parents beheld them fall. Their maxim was that they were restored by Christ to a state of innocence equal to that which characterized Adam before his transgression; and that, therefore, whenever they appeared together, they should not be ashamed to appear as Adam did in the state of his innocence. The practice of the habit of appealing to the authority of certain apocryphal books which were attributed to Zoroaster. Probodius is placed by Baronius in A.D. 120, before Valentinus. His followers are sometimes identified with the Aedonates, and sometimes with the Bishops. See Clement Alex. Strom, i, 304; ii, 438; viii, 722; Theodoret, Fab. Heret. i, 6; Farrar, Eccles. Dict. a. v.; Neander, Church Hist. i, 451.

Probodius (I), an Athenian philosopher of the school of the Sophists, was a contemporary of Socrates, and forerunner of the latter in the domain of philosophy, insomuch as he prepared the way for the logical and ethical efforts of Socrates. Probodius was a native of Sulis, in the island of Cosae. He went frequently to Athens for the purpose of transacting business on behalf of his native city, and even attracted admiration in the senate as an orator (Plato, Hipp. Mag. p. 292; comp. Philostr. Adv. Cels., 12), although he was apt to fall (Plato, Legg., p. 316, a; Philostr. L. c.). Plutarch describes him as slender and weak (Plut. ad sen. in Resp. c. 15); and Plato speaks of a degree of effeminacy which resulted therefrom (Protap. p. 815, d). Philostratus is the first who taxes him with luxury and extravagance (L. c.; comp. Welcker, Kleine Schriften, ii, 518, etc.). In the Protegorus of Plato, which points to the eighty-seventh Olympiad (any more exact determination is disputable) as the time at which the dialogue is supposed to take place, Probodius is mentioned as having previously arrived in Athens. Still later, when Isocrates (born Ol. 86, 1) is mentioned as his disciple (see Welcker, Prodikos von Keos, Vorgänger des Socrates, published first in the Rhénisches Museum der Philologie, von Welcker and Naeke, i, 1-39, 585-584, afterwards in Welcker's Kleine Schriften, ii, 392-541), and in the account of the death of Socrates, a man by the name of Probodius is still living (Plato, Apol. p. 19, c). The dates of his birth and death cannot be determined. The statement of Suidas (a. v.; comp. Schol. on Plato De Rep, x, 600, c) that he was born to the hemlock cup as a corrupor of the body and spirit of the soul, is of no special or personal significance (comp. Welcker, p. 582). According to the statement of Philostratus (p. 488 — comp. p. 496, ed. Olearium), on which little more reliance can be placed, he delivered his lecture on virtue and vice in Thessaly and Sparta also. The Apology of Plato unites him with Gorgias and the seventy-two critics of things as if he might have been, had he been living in whatever city they might come, they were competent to instruct the youth. Lucian (Vit. Herod. c. 8) mentions him among those who had held lectures at Olympia. In the dialogues of Plato he is mentioned or introduced, not indeed without irony, though, as compared with the other Sophists, with a certain degree of esteem (Hipp. Maj. p. 381; Theaet. p. 161 b; Phaedo, 60; Protag. p. 368 b; Symposium, p. 248; Cratil. p. 384; b; Symposium, p. 177; Enu. of 385). Aristoph.

In the Clouds (II. 560), deals more indulgently with him than with Socrates; and the Xenophonic Socrates, for the purpose of combating the voluptuousness of Aris- tippus, borrows from the book of the wise Prodicus, (Προδίκος | Προδίκος) the story of the choice of Hercules (Mem. ii. 1, § 21, etc.). This separation of Prodoi from the other Sophists has been pointed out by Welcker in the above-quoted treatise (p. 400, etc.). Like Protagoras and others, Prodoi delivered lectures in return for the payment of contributions (Iat: Σαυτοροσ | Σαυτοροσ | Σαυτοροσ). Mem. ii. 1, § 21; comp. Philostr. p. 482; Diog. Laert. ix. 50; ἤρως | ἤρως | ἤρως; Plato, Prote. 314, b; ) of from half a drachma to fifty drachmas, probably according as the hearers limited themselves to a single lecture, or enticed them to a complete course of lectures. (Arist. Rhet. 315, b; Arist. Rhet. iii. 14, § 9; Suid. s. v.; comp. Welcker, p. 414). Prodoi was said to have amassed a great amount of money (Hipp. Maj. p. 382, d; Xenoph. Symp. iv. 62; i, §; on the practice of paying for instruction and lectures, comp. again Welcker, p. 314, 31, etc.

As Prodoi and others maintained with regard to themselves that they stood equally on the confines of philosophy and politics (Enu. p. 305, c.), so Plato represents his instructions as chiefly ethical (Men. p. 96, d; comp. De Rep. x. p. 600, e), and gives the preference to his distinction of ideas—as of those of courage, rashness, boldness—over similar attempts of other Sophists (Lack. p. 197, c.). What pertained to this point was probably only contained in individual show-orations (Diog. Laert. Phil. ii. 22, comp. Prodius), which he usually declined (Philos. p. 492). Though known to Callimachus, they do not appear to have been much longer preserved (Welcker, p. 465, etc.). In contrast with Gorgias and others, who boasted of possessing the art of making the small appear great, the great small, and of expatiating in long or short speeches, Prodoi required that the speech should be neither long nor short, but of the proper measure (Plato, Phaed. p. 267, a; comp. Gorg. p. 449, c; Prot. p. 384, e, 335, b, 336, d; Arist. Rhet. iii. 17), and it is only as associated with his philosophical and educational aims that he makes the weaker cause stronger by means of his rhetoric (Cicero, Brut. c. 8). He paid especial attention to the correct use of words (Plato, Etuid. p. 187, e; Cratyl. p. 384, b; comp. Galen, Hippocr. de Articul. iv. p. 461, 1), and the distinction of expressions related in sense (Lack. p. 197, d; Prot. p. 840, a, 841, a; Charisim. p. 163, d; Mem. p. 75, c; comp. Themist. Orat. iv. p. 113). But he deserves greater remembrance for his parrenatical discourses on moral subjects, among which one of the best known is Hercules at the Cross Roads (Phil. of Mem. p. 384, a; comp. the σύνταγμα προς το Προδίκος). It was entitled ὁ Προδίκος (Suid. s. v. ὁ Προδίκος | ὁ Προδίκος | ὁ Προδίκος). Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. l. 360. Respecting the different explanations of this title, see Welcker, p. 466, etc., who refers it to the youthful bloom of Hercules). To Hercules, as he was on the point, at his entrance on the age of youth, of deciding for one of the two paths of life—that of virtue and that of vice—there appear two women, the one of dignified beauty, adorned with purity, modesty, and discretion, the other of a voluptuous form and mere-} rived from the ἄρρητα, the elevated seat which the bishop occupied in the synod and in the religious assemblies of the people. See Coleman, Ancient Christianity Exemplified (Phila. 1856, 8vo), p. 131, and the references quoted on p. 261; Siegel, Christl. Alterthümer (see Index in vol. iv); Riddle, Christ. Antiquit. p. 211.

Proodrosia, sacrifices, or, as some allege, a festival offered to Demeter or Ceres at seed-time, with the view of securing a bountiful harvest.—Gardner, Faith of the World, s.v.

ιππορίας (ναοειριας), one of the names by which the early Church distinguished the teachers or preachers from the "brethren" (1 Tim. v. 17). Justin Martyr uses the term as synonymous with ἱππορίτης, when he speaks of the ἱππορίκαι as the person whose duty it was to consecrate the elements in the administration of the Lord's Supper (Apocol. II. 67), a duty subsequently performed only by the bishop except in his absence. (Pe- pin's decree, A.D. 755, is as follows: "Nullus presbyter presumat missas celebrire sine jurese episcopi in cujus parochia est." The Council of Aries laid similar restrictions upon the deacons [canon 15].) The title Proostes was translated into Latin by Proconsulatus, whence the English word Procuret (q. v.). See Coleman, Ancient Christianity Exemplified, p. 102 et al.; Siegel, Christl. Alterthümer (see Index in vol. iv); Riddle, Christ. Antiquit. p. 211.

Profane (πρόφανος, chadéph, Jer. xxiii, 11; βιβλικος, Heb. xii, 16). To profane is to put holy things to vile or common use; as the money-changers did the Temple, by converting a part of it into a place of business (Matt. xxi, 12), and as those do who allow secular occupations to encroach any part of the Sabbath under the old, or of the Lord's day under the new dispensation (Exod. xx, 8-10). Esau, for despising his birthright and his privileges, is styled by the apostle "a profane person" (Heb. xii, 16). The term is also used in opposition to holy. Thus the general history of ancient nations is styled profane, as distinguished from that contained in the Bible; profane writings are such as have not been held in the church to have a connection with the sacred books of Scripture, and the writings of Christian authors on sacred subjects.

Professio Fidelis Tridentina is the form of the Roman Catholic profession of faith in which it took shape at the Council of Trent and in which it was afterwards published by pope Pius IV, so that it is sometimes called the Acta Piae V. The general Christian confession of faith had been renewed in the third session of the Council of Trent on Feb. 8, 1546 (decretum de symbolo fidei), but there was need of something for general use in the Church at large, so that all its members might become obdactuated to the Church and its teachings, not only for their own faithfulness, but for their arraig against heretics. Hence Pius IV in 1546 ordered to be prepared a Formula Christiana et Catholica Fidei, and on Sept. 4, 1560, presented it for consideration to the cardinal college. In 1564 it was finally promulgated, and persons on becoming members of the Church of Rome are expected to recite the creed. This profession of faith runs as follows:

"I most steadfastly admit and embrace apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions, and all other observances and constitutions of the same Church.

"I also admit the holy Scriptures, according to that sense which our holy mother Church has held and does hold, to which it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Scriptures: neither will I ever take and interpret anything otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the fathers.

"I acknowledge that there are truly and properly seven sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and necessary for the salvation of mankind, though not for the remission of sins: baptism, confirmation, matrimony, the holy eucharist, penance, extreme unction, holy orders, &c.

"Under penance is included confession, as the Catholic sacrament of penance consists of three parts—confession or acknowledgment of sin, together with the contrition or real sorrow, and satisfaction, by which the hair is shorn, initiatory to the ecclesiastical state.

"I firmly hold that there is a purgatory, and that the souls therein detained are helped by the sufferings of the faithful.

"Likewise, that the saints reigning with Christ to be honored and invoked, and that they offer intercession for God for us; and that their relics are to be had in veneration.

"I most firmly assert that the images of Christ, of the mother of God, and also of other saints, ought to be had and retained, and that due honor and veneration are to be given them.

"I also affirm that the power of indulgences was left by Christ in the apostles, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people.

"I acknowledge the holy Catholic Apostolic Roman Church for theKirche, and of the mother of our Lord Jesus Christ, and I promise true obedience to the bishop of Rome, successor to St. Peter, prince of the apostles, and vicar of Jesus Christ."

Then follow clauses condemnatory of all contrary doctrines, and expressive of adhesion to all the definitions of the Council of Trent.

It is obvious that the Professio Fidelis Tridentina was framed in accordance with the decrees of that council, and has chiefly in view the opinions of those who followed the Reformation. See Möhler, Symbolik; Köllner, Die Symbolik der römischen Kirche, p. 141 sq.; Schaff, Creeds of Christendom (see Index in vol. III); Fisher, Hist. of the Reformation, p. 402.

Profession. Amoung the ceremonies of baptism in the early Church, one of great importance was the profession of faith and vow of obedience. The catechumens first renounced the devil, and then professed to live in obedience to the laws of Christ. See PACTUM.

Christians are required to make a profession of their faith—1, boldly (Rom. i. 16); 2, explicitly (Matt. v, 16); 3, consistently (John xiv. 23); 4, with cordiality, not ostentatiously, but with humility and meekness.

Among the Romanists, profession denotes the entering into a religious order, whereby a person offers himself to God by a vow of inviolably observing obedience, chastity, and poverty.

Professor, a term commonly used in the religious world to denote any person who makes an open acknowledgment of the religion of Christ, or who outwardly manifestis his attachment to Christianity. All real Christians are professors, but all professors are not real Christians. In this, as in all other things of worth and importance, we find counterfeits. There are many who become professors not from principle, from investigation, from love to the truth, but from interested motives, prejudice of education, custom, influence of connections, novelty, etc., as Saul, Jehu, Judas, Demas, the foolish virgins, etc. See CHRISTIAN.

Profesti Dies. Days without any special service, in distinction from solemn or officiating days, which include stations, litanies, fasts, and feast-days or festivals, into two classes, sacred and minor orders. The first consists of some of the suborders of the church, such as tonsure, the daily recitation of the Breviary, and the collection of psalms and prayers, occupying a considerable time. The minor orders are four in number, and are preceded by the tonsure, an ecclesiastical ceremony in which the hair is shorn, initiatory to the ecclesiastical state.
PROFIAT DURAN

Profiat Duran, whose Jewish name was Isaac ben Moses (surnamed Ephedocus from his principal work "Deis Natan") was known as a gifted poet, philosopher, and astronomer. He flourished between 1680 and 1412. In the bitter persecution of 1391 he was driven outwardly to embrace Christianity to save his life. In order to appear as a mask of Christianity, he took the name of love nearly exterminated all his co-religionists, Profiat and a friend, who had become an apostate for like reasons, concluded to go to Palestine to confess Judaism. Profiat Duran left first and went to a seaplace in the south of France, awaiting the arrival of his friend. Meanwhile, Profiat the Ben-Giorno wrote to Paul of Benger (q. v.), who persuaded him to remain steadfastly in his Christian faith. Ben-Giorno wrote a letter to Duran in full praise of the bishop of Burgos, expounding his religious belief and exhorting him at the same time to be also true to Christianity. This imbibed Duran not only against his friend, but especially against the bishop of Burgos, and he answered in a polemical epistle, full of bitter sarcasm and irony, entitled "Be not like thy Fathers," called by Christians Alecta Boteca, who, misunderstanding its purpose, took it as a defence of Christianity, while in reality aimed against it. The whole letter was equivocal. It was believed at first reading that it was an exhortation to stand fast in the religion he had embraced; but the mystery was easily discovered, and it appeared by an attentive consideration that Duran meant to oblige his friend to return to Judaism. This celebrated work was first published at Constantinople in 1577 in a collection of other works. It was later published by A. Gundersburg in the collection "Itinerarium" (Breslaw, 1844). Geiger published a German translation in his "Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift," iv, 452-458 (Stuttgart, 1839), and an English translation was published in the "Jewish Messenger" (N. Y. Sept. 12, 1873). Besides, Duran wrote "The Reproach of the Gentiles," in 12 chapters, which has not as yet been published. An extract of it, as well as the contents of the chapters, is given in the "Catalogue of Michael's Library," p. 364, 365 (Hamburg, 1848); "The Work of Ephedoc," a Hebrew grammar, divided into 32 chapters, with an interesting and elaborate introduction. Endowed with remarkable grammatical tact, he was the first to demonstrate the reflexive or reciprocal instead of the passive meaning of Niphal. His important grammar, which he finished in 1405, of which fragments are printed in the "Bible" of Amstel (1551), is one of the best editions of its kind. It was also published in the "Jewish Times," iv, 42-43 (ed. Ginsburg, London, 1865), but lately been published by Dr. J. Friedlander and J. Kohn, with an introduction, notes, and elucidations (Vienna, 1865):—

PROKOPIVICH

Profft, George Marion, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Yancey County, N. C., about 1835. He professed religion and joined the Church in 1853. He was admitted to the Holston Conference in 1858. His first appointment was to the Cleveland circuit as junior preacher; his second year was spent on Spencer mission; his third, on Sulphur Springs circuit; his fourth, on Newport circuit. His health having failed, he went to Florida, where he died on Sunday, June 5, 1864. He led an exemplary and pious life.

Prognosticator. The phrase "monthly prognosticators" occurs in the A. V. as a rendering of ψευδόνυμος, making known as to the months, in Isa. xxiv, 13, where the prophet is enumerating the astrological superstitious of the Chaldeans. It is known that the Chaldean astrologers professed to divine future events by the positions, aspects, and appearances of the stars, which they regarded as having great influence on the affairs of men and kingdoms; and it would seem, from the present text, that they put forth accounts of the events which might be expected to occur from month to month, like our modern astronomers. Some carry the analogy further, and suppose that they also gave monthly tables of the weather; but such prognostications are only cared for in climates where the weather is uncertain and variable; while in Chaldea, where (as we know from actual experience) the seasons are regularly fixed and known in their duration and recurrence, where variations of the usual course of the weather are all but unknown, no prognosticator would gain much honor by foretelling what every peasant knows. See ASTROLOGY; DIVINATION.

Pro-Hegoumenos, the ex-superior of a Greek convent who has completed his term of office, which is two years, and retires divested of nothing but his authority.—Gardner, "Faiths of the World," s. v.

Pröble, Heinrich Andreas, Dr., a Lutheran minister, who died April 19, 1876, at Hornhausen, near Oeschersleben, in Germany, is best known by his writings in the departments of homiletics, liturgy, and pedagogy. He published, among other works, an "Liturgetische Forme" (Halberstadt, 1846):—Die körperliche, christliche und bürgerliche Schulersziehung (Magdeburg, 1846);—"Leitfaden bei dem Komfirmanden.- Unterrichte, mit einem Vorworte von Claus Harms (q. v.)" (Halberstadt, 1851);—"Liturgetischer Handwörterbuch" (Wernigerode, 1856):—Predigt-Erwürfe für die Evangelien u. Episteln, etc. (ibid. 1856);—Das Halberstädtische Kirchen- und Haus-Grundbuch in seiner erneuerten Gestalt (Oeschersleben, 1856):—Kirchliche Sitten. Ein Bild aus dem Leben evangelischer Gemeinen (Berlin, 1858). This latter work is the most important of his writings. See Zuchold, "Bibliotheca Theologica," iii, 1015; "Literarischer Handwörterbuch" (1875), p. 522; Hauck, "Theol. Jahresbericht" (1866), ii, 734. (B. P.)

Prostamene (προσταμένου) is only another title which was given to the preacher of the early Church. See Phoebus.

Prokmimion (προκκίμιον, something that lies before) is, in the Greek liturgy, the short anthem pronounced previous to the reading of the epistle from the Holy Scriptures, consisting of verse and response usually taken from the Psalms. The purpose is to give a hint as to the way in which the day of the celebration is to be used. Such phrases are, for instance, "Praise ye the Lord," "Give ear to my prayer, O Lord," "Thy mercy, O Lord," "God help me through thy name," "My help comes from the Lord," "O Lord, thou art my protector." Previous to the calling out of the prayer text the deacon exclaims, "Let us listen!"—Wetzer u. Welte, "Kirchen Lex." s. v.

Prokopivitch, Teofan, a Russian prelate of great renown, especially as a pulpit orator, and therefore called the Chrysostom of the Russo-Greek Church, was born at Kief June 8, 1881. Baptized Eleazar, he exchanged, with the consent of St. Basil, in a United Greek monastery of that order in Lithuania. He was sent to Rome to finish his studies, and there he remained three years when he suddenly removed, by force of circumstances not known, and went to Potchefstroom in Volynia, where he renounced his faith, and was translated to the chair of rhetoric in the Academy of Kief. When Peter I passed through the city, after the victory at Pultava, the duty of complimenting him was confided to Prokopovitch. He accompanied the czar in his unequal campaign on the Pruth, and was made abbot of the monastery of Kief. In 1715 he was promoted to the seat of Pakop, although he avowed that he had expressed heretical doctrines at the court and in his writings. The doctors of the Sorbonne, wishing to profit by the visit Peter I had paid to them in 1717, attempted to enter into friendly relations with the Russian Church. Appointed to reply to their address to the czar, Prokopovitch frustrated this attempt; and, yielding himself to all the views of the despot, he composed an ecclesiastical constitution which made of the Church a national institution, and the clergy servants employed by the State—a condition which remains unaltered in the Russian Church to this day. He also, at the emperor’s instigation, consented to the sequestration of the Church domains, and apportioned to the clergy a share of their revenue proportionate to their several ranks. He received from Catherine, whom he had crowned empress, the presidency of the synod and the archbishopric of Novgorod, founded by Theodosius. Prokopovitch crowned Peter II, whose right to the throne he had attacked in a work condemned by a ukase of July 26, 1727, by the then emperor Anna, and encouraged the latter to commit in 1730 the stroke of policy from the effects of which Russia yet suffers the most deplorable consequences. He died at St. Petersburg Sept. 8, 1736. He left a great number of pamphlets and expositions of all sorts, some in impure Russian, some in Latin. Quatrefais admits that the works of this prelate were specimens of the basest adulation.—Hoefer, Nouve. Biog. Génér. s. v. Promise (some form of "εγαίνω", to say, or "εγαίνω", to speak; εγαίνων) is a solemn assurance by which one pledges his veracity that he will perform, or cause to be performed, for the benefit of another, the thing which he mentions. A promise, in the scriptural sense of the term, is a declaration or assurance of the divine will, in which God signifies what particular blessings or good things he will freely bestow, as well as the evils which he will remove. Promises differ from the command of God, inasmuch as the former are significations of the divine will concerning a duty enjoined to be performed, while the promises relate to mercy to be received. The exceeding great and precious promises are applicable to all believers; they appertain to the present and the future life (2 Pet. i. 4). Some particular promises are predictions, as the promise of the Messiah, and the blessings of the Gospel (Rom. iv, 13, 14; Gal. iii, 14—20). Hence the Hebrews were called the "children of the promise" (Rom. ix, 8). So all the true believers in the Lord Jesus Christ are called "children" and "heirs of the promise" (Gal. iv, 20; Heb. vi. 12, 17). There are four classes of promises mentioned in the Scriptures, promises relating to the new covenant, promises relating to the Messiah; 2, promises relating to the Church; 3, promises of blessings, both temporal and spiritual, to the pious; and, 4, promises encouraging the exercise of the several graces and duties that compose the Christian character. The first two of these classes, indeed, are many of them predictions as well as promises. See PROMISE. The mentioning of the others should prove, 1, an antidote to despair; 2, a motive to patience under affliction; 3, an incentive to perseverance in well-doing; 4, a call for prayer.

Promise is a solemn assurance by which one pledges his veracity that he shall perform, or cause to be performed, the new name of the Church. See PROMISE. The consideration of the promises arises from the necessity of the well-being and existence of society. "Virtue requires," as Dr. Doddridge observes, "that promises be fulfilled. The promisee, i.e. the person to whom the promise is made, acquires a property in virtue of the promise. The uncertainty of property would evidently be attended with great inconveniences. By failing to fulfill my promise, I either show that I was not sincere in making it, or that I have little constancy or resolution, and either way injure my character, and consequently my usefulness in life. Promises, however, are not binding, 1, if they were made by us before we came to such exercise of reason as to be fit to transact affairs of moment; or if by any distemper or sudden surprise we are deprived of the exercise of the reason at the time when the promise is made; 2, if the promise was made on a false premise, in which the promisee was not diligent inquired, was imposed upon, especially if he were deceived by the fraud of the promisee; 3, if the thing itself be vicious, for virtue cannot require that vice should be committed; 4, if the accomplishment of the promise be so hard and intolerable that there is reason to believe that, had it been foreseen, it would not have been an accepted case; 5, if the promise be not accepted, or if it depend on conditions not performed." But really this question concerning the possibility and obligation of a promise, given or obtained under false views is a matter that falls within the Curiosity of Ethics—a very uncertain ground. See Grotius, De Jure, lib. ii, cap. xi; Paley, Moral Philosophy, vol. i. ch. v.; Grove, Moral Philosophy, vol. ii. ch. xii, p. 2; Watts, Sermons, ser. 20; Dymond, Essays; Verplanck, On Contracts. See OBLIGATION; PROMISE.

Promises of God are the kind declarations of his Word, in which he hath assured us he will bestow blessings upon his people. The promises contained in the sacred Scriptures may be considered, 1, divine as to their origin; 2, certain as to their number; 3, clear as to their expression; 4, certain as to their accomplishment. The consideration of them should, 1, prove an antidote to despair; 2, a motive to patience; 3, a call for prayer; 4, a spur to perseverance. See Clark, On the Promises; Back, Sermons, ser. 11.

Promissum. See PACTUM.

Promotio per saltum is, in the Church of Rome, the intentional disregard of the legal scale of the different orders. It is the collusion or the obtaining of a higher order by way of skipping one or several other orders, which, according to rule, ought to precede. In consequence, he who has been ordained perhaps cannot perform the functions of the order thus unlawfully bestowed until the next inferior order has been subsequently obtained also (c. um. Dist. ili); this inferior degree the bishop can confer on him, and allow him at once to perform the duties of the higher degree (Cest. Trad. sess. xxiii. c. 14, De Eccl.); while, if the professed ecclesiastical officiates according to the higher order thus illicitly conferred on him without the episcopal dispensation, he becomes irregular, and needs papal dispensation (c. um. x, De Cler. per salt. prom. v. 29). The consecration of a bishop, with omission of the several steps in the order, would not only be illicit, but utterly void (Art. x. 10, fin. x. De excess. protal. pr. 81).—Weitzen u. Jean Henri Roman, a French ecclesiastic, was born on April 7, 1758, at Montauban. He was the eldest of twelve children. After he had finished his classical studies in the little seminary, he was received into the large seminary of Valence, and was admitted to the priesthood two years before the required age, Nov. 5, 1721. At first employed to do curate's duty in the office of his parish, he then taught dogmatic theology in the great seminary of Valence, and ended in doing parochial duty. Having been appointed in 1727 to the chair of philosophy in the College of Tournon, he refused, without being authorized, to have his name added to that required by the professors by the ordinance of 1828, and was deposed. At the end of 1829 he went to Paris, and was attached to M. de Croi, then head chaplain to the hospital of Quinze Vingt, in the capacity of chaplain. He saved that establishment from downfall in 1831. In this humble position the abbé Prompsaut, although scrupulously fulfilling the obligations of priest and chaplain, had yet considerable time to give to study. He put aside the largest share of the receipts of his publications and of his literary pension to buy books, and he formed a library of 25,000 volumes. He began his literary career by publishing a critical edition of the works of Villon in 1832, and in 1835 he published a criticism of an edition of French literature published by Crapelot. This last work engaged him in a lively controversy with Crapelot, in which he defended himself in a work that was really universal, and he was afterwards the character of his polemical writings. He occupied himself for many years with the Latin and Romance languages. In 1857 he published many translations of ascetic works. His principal study was canon law and the civil and ecclesiastical jurisprudence of France. Himself a thorough Gallican he discarded the ultramontane tendencies of the French episcopacy, and advocated the liberties of the Gallican Church. In this spirit he attacked the encyclical of pope Pius IX, and brought such odium upon himself that he was led to retract much that he had uttered against ultra-Romanism, though at heart he always felt his first course to have been the true and proper one. His last years were embittered by remorse, and he died Jan. 7, 1868, neglected by those for whom he had sacrificed his honor.—H. Promulgation or Publication, i. e. proclaimation—usually of a law by the competent legislative power of a nation. The promulgation is the act of communicating a law or ordinance to the public, and is the sole condition of its binding character ("lex non promulgata non obligat").

In consequence, an ecclesiastical law, like any civil law, in order to become obligatory in foro externo must be promulgated in the customary way by the competent authorities of the Church. The binding power of the law rests entirely on the will of the legislator publicly expressed, and begins at the very moment of the promulgation ("lex promulgata statim obligat").

A law has generally no retroactive power ("lex non retro agit"), unless it be merely an explanation or reiteration of a former disposition, or unless retroactive power be expressly given to it. From the moment of the promulgation takes effect also the juridical presumption of the general knowledge of the law, which excludes every excuse of ignorantia legis (Sext. c. 13; De R. T. v, 13), unless the legislator substrates the validity of the ordinance to the observance of the law, and this former presumption has not been observed. Every one whom the law may concern is bound to conform to it as soon as he has obtained, no matter by what means, a knowledge of it. The diocesan ordinances of archbishops and bishops are, as a rule, communicated to the deaneries, and through them, by circuit letters, to the curates, etc., who publish them from the pulpit, or by placards at the church doors.

The papal see used in former times to address its ordinances to the chief ecclesiastical dignitaries of the countries, provinces, or dioceses which they concerned, and had them communicated by them to the subordinate clerical authorities, for further publication, by way of synods and circular letters. Afterwards the custom prevailed of publishing the general prescriptions of the papal see only at Rome, in acte campi Flora, and of posting them at the door of the Vatican. Thus the principle was adopted that the publication was required by the professors by the ordinance of 1828, and was deposed. At the end of 1829 he went to Paris, and was attached to M. de Croi, then head chaplain to the hospital of Quinze Vingt, in the capacity of chaplain. PROPAGANDA

full title is De Propagandâ Fide, i.e. "concerning the propagation of the faith." Its object is to direct and forward the propagation of the Roman Catholic religion, especially among the heathen. Gregory XIII (1572) established the congregation, which is the most zealously for the expansion of the Christian faith, had directed that a number of cardinals should be instructed with the direction of the Oriental missions, and caused catechisms and other religious books to be printed for the use of Oriental Christians. But as the resources required for such a purpose were wanting, the matter could not have its proper development. Pope Gregory XV, desirous that this good work, so well begun, should be continued, established, by a bull of June 22, 1622, a congregation of cardinals, under the name above mentioned, and intrusted it to the direction of the whole Catholic missionary system. Every month they assembled once in the Vatican, and twice at the residence of the eldest. Besides some stipends of less importance, the pope presented the new institution with the 500 ducats which at the death of a cardinal accrue to the pontifical treasury. His successor, Urban VIII (1623-1644), increased its privileges and income, and founded the Seminaria (or Collegium) de Propagandâ Fide, to which young men from all nations are brought at an early age and gratuitously instructed and fitted out for foreign service. This college was subdi- divided entirely to the Congregation, and a splendid palace was built for both institutions. Through the provision of the popes, and pious foundations made by the cardinals and other benefactors, the seminary grew to a most flourishing condition; and even in our days, when the income and foundations which support it have been considerably diminished by the State, under the new order of things, it entertains, instructs, and trains for missionary life nearly 200 young men from all quarters of the world. The alumni pledge themselves to serve God and Church among the heathen, and are consecrated to this function. All rites actually subsisting in the Catholic Church (besides the Latin rite, the Armenian, Greek-Melchite, Syrian, Coptic, Maronite, and Chaldaic rites) are represented in the semi- nary by alumni from the corresponding provinces, and present every year, at the feast of Epiphany (Jan. 6), an imposing spectacle, called the Feast of the Languages. This feast is celebrated by an exhibition of exceeding interest and curiosity, in which are delivered recitations in every language proper to it in the world, and in its mission- aries, amounting often to fifty or sixty. Of this festi- val the celebrated cardinal Mezzofanti (vq.) used to be the guiding spirit, as well as to strangers its chief cen- tre of attraction. It continues to be one of the chief literary sights of the Roman winter. In 1873 the colle- gium published its first statistical report of its missionary and estate and made dependent upon private contributions.

With the congregation and college are connected, 1, a library rich in precious works, especially translations of all kinds of important works in Chinese and Ori- ental manuscripts, 2, a printing-office (richer formerly than it is now), in which the books required by the missionaries and the missionary work are printed in all foreign languages ("Ha questa congregazione una fa- mosa stamparia co' caratteri di tutte le nazioni; ne si troverà altra stamparia che nella varietà di tanti carat- teri l' aggrazia,") Zaccaria, in his book Della Corte di Roma (Rome, 1774); 3, a remarkable museum, filled with a great variety of objects and monuments, mostly from countries visited and converted by the missiona- ries. The congregation, which answers somewhat to a Protestant mission board, consists of a president, managing secretary (all of cardinal's rank), an apostolic prothonotary, twenty-four cardinals appointed for life, one of whom is prefect, and who are assisted by a num- ber of consultants (partly monastics and partly clergy), clerks (minuanti), and other officials. Originally it had no fixed meeting-place, but only gathered together at the pope; now they are monthly, being, however, weekly conferences (congressi) of the prefect, secretary, and consultors; and all important business is submitted to the pope in person by the prefect or the secretary. This congregation conducts the affairs not only of the missionaries, but also of all those— as England, the northern kingdoms, the United States, Canada, South America, etc. — in which the hierarchal organization is not, or has not been, full and formal. To the Propaganda no small part of the ag- gressive power of the Church of Rome is due. It has complete military power, under the pope, over the whole missionary field, not only to send missionaries wherever it is the interest of the Church to send them, but to give them special training adapted to their spec- ial work. There are nowhere to be found better modern maps of the newly settled states of the United States than in the college of the Propaganda, and nowhere men better informed as to the probable points of future importance than the cardinals who compose the congregation of the Propaganda. The work of this congregation is greatly facilitated by coordinate associations for the propagation of the faith, among the most important of which are those at Lyons (France), Vienna, and Bavaria. It supports, besides, another similar institution for the Chinese at Naples. The founder of the congregation has a palaestra in the house of Urban VIII, in Via Viva, both in Rome. It is part of the duties of the pope to superintend this vast and complicated work, and to invite all nations to the communion of the Church. See Erechtu S. Congregations de Fide Cath. Propagation of the Faith, Associations for, Roman Catholic. The earliest and the highest in dignity of these has been already described under the head PROPAGANDA (q.v.); but the present century has produced several private associations, the resources of which arise entirely from voluntary annual contributions, and the organization of which is most complete and most extensive. The first of these is that founded at Lyons, called the Congregatio de Propagatione de la Foi, with a branch at Paris, and subordinate branches in the other Catholic kingdoms. It is under the direction of a council, which communicates as well with the local associations through which the funds are supplied by small weekly, monthly, or yearly contributions. The mission work of the society is carried on in French and in its mission stations and helps, the fund so raised is applied, by an apportionment reg- ulated according to the necessities of each. The piety of contributors is stimulated by the exhortations of the popes, and the granting of indulgences to those who, with the other requisite donations, contribute to the work. The journal of the society, entitled Annales de la Propagation de la Foi, is a very interesting bimonthly collection of letters and reports from the different mis- sions connected with the central body. The receipts of this association for the year 1862 were 4,784,496 fr. 86 c. Of this sum, by far the largest proportion was raised in France—3,307,248 fr. Italy came next, though at a long interval, contributing 429,658 fr.; Belgium gave 271,597 fr.; Germany, 251,678 fr.; the British is- lands, 127,900 fr.; Spain, once the great propagator of the Gospel in the New World, is not now represented; but it is to be observed that Spain maintains for her own missionary enterprises a large and liberal establish- ment in connection with the mission of the Philippines and the South Sea. Another association somewhat later date was that known as the affectation of Vienna in 1829, the chief object of which is to assist the missions of German origin, especially in America.
This association also has its own journal, entitled Berechic der Leopoldiner Stiftung. It is under the presidency of the archbishop of Vienna. A third is that established in Bavaria as an offshoot of the Lyoner association, under the name "Ludwig's Missions-Verein." Like this German association, its chief, also an exclusive object is the support of German missions. The Ludwig's Verein is conducted under the auspices of the archbishop of Munich. All these associations, although quite independent in their management and direction, nevertheless maintain close relations with the Propagation of the Gospel, and are often guided by the recommendations of the cardinal prefect in the distribution of their funds to particular missions.

Proper Names.—The chief names that strike us, on a general view of them all, is that the ancient Hebrews always retained the greatest simplicity in the use of names. In reality there is always only one single name which distinguishes a person. Where it is necessary, the name of the father is added; sometimes that of the mother instead, in cases where women have been more celebrated (thus the three heroic brothers, Job, Abishai, and Asael, are always called after their mother, Zeruiah [1 Chron. ii. 16]); or the line of descent is traced further back, often to the fourth generation, or even further. More epithets, like "David the king," "Isaiah the prophet," always express the actual and significant dignity of a man. The instances in which a person receives two names alternately, as Jacob-Israel, Gideon-Jerubbaal (Judg. vi-x), are casual and rare, and are not to be ascribed to a general custom of the people.

1. The simple names exist in great abundance; and their signification, as to the mere word itself, is generally evident: as גן, Gan, "judge;" יַעֲעִירוּ, Ya’iru, "desired," also an ancient name, according to Gen. xlvi. 10; 1 Chron. ii. 27; ויַעֲעִירוּ, Ya’iru, "desire;" also an ancient name, according to Gen. xlvi. 10; comp. xxxvi. 87; וב, Gebor, "hero" (1 Kings iv. 19). Thus most of them express an honorable sense; although examples are not wanting of the contrary design, as שֹׁכֹן, Shok, "crooked" (2 Sam. xxiii. 26). With what case also feminine names become names for men is shown by cases like רַע, Reu, "vulture" (iii. 7; xxii. 8; comp. Gen. xxxvi. 24). ולֹעַ, Josch, "dove," which are just as applicable to men as to the masculine בֵּית, Beth, "fox." (1 Chron. vii. 36). Diminutives, which are so frequently used as proper names by the Arabs, are rare among the Hebrews; but are by no means wanting, as is proved by בֵּיתָא, Betha, זָבֵל, Zavol, the son of Jacob, and וַעֲעִירוּ, Ya’iru, the singer of David. All those names which are formed with a prefixed god are to be considered as especially ancient, because this nominal formation became entirely obsolete in the languages almost only in proper names, as is shown not only by the well-known names בֵּיתָא, Jacob, בֵּיתָא, Joseph, יִשְׂרָאֵל, Yisra’el;יִשְׂרָאֵל, Yisra’el, also but by a number of less common ones, as בֵּיתָא, Betha (Num. xxvi. 24); בֵּיתָא, Betha (1 Chron. iv. 24); בֵּיתָא, Betha; Jamlech (ver. 34); בֵּיתָא, Betha; Jason (v. 13); בֵּיתָא, Betha (Exod. vi. 18); בֵּיתָא, Betha (2 Sam. v. 15); בֵּיתָא, Betha, Jebsanech (Num. xiii. 6; 1 Chron. vii. 88); בֵּיתָא, Betha, Jerahom (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. viii. 27); and others. There is an ancient adjective-ending, that in בֵּית or בֵּית, which has fixed itself most firmly in proper names, as בֵּיתא, Abzazm (1 Chron. iv. 6); בֵּיתא, Gaszma (Ezra ii. 49; בֵּיתא, Miriam, the sister of Moses, and בֵּיתא, Gerahom, his son; בֵּיתא, Chinkam (2 Sam. xix. 34), which not only exists also in the form יִשְׂרָאֵל, Chinkam (Jer. xiii. 17), but in בֵּיתא, Chinkam (2 Sam. xix. 40), according to customary changes.

2. The compound names, however, are more important for history, because they express more complete and distinct ideas than the simple names. Some of them are altogether isolated, as בֵּיתא, Chinkam, properly "serpentine mouth," the grandson of Abiram; בֵּיתא, Jasuch, the son of Jacob; Oboiah (Exod. xxx. 6), "father's tent," a name resembling the Greek Patricios. But most of them bear a general resemblance to each other, and follow in shools certain dominant opinions and customs; and these last are what we must particularly consider here.

A great number of them owe their origin to the relations of the house, as the sense of the first word of the compound shows. Most of these have the word בֵּיתא, Abi, "father," for their first member, as Abi-zer, Abi-ab, Abigal. First (Handwörterbuch, p. 7, 50) regards these words as names for the Divine Being, rendering such a name as Abi-zer, as B.'s king; Abi-ab, Abi's God; so judge and so Achib, Abi's hand. Others deny any reference to the Deity in these words, but cannot agree whether they are to be taken literally or figuratively. The Easterns use the word ab (father), etc., to express the possession of any quality. The fox is abu Wusaxu ("father of the little fort," i.e., the borrower). The mosquito is abu ’Ya’u’a ("father of the axe"), from its sharp instrument of incision. The camel is abu yyyub ("father of Job"), from his patience. Many therefore think that such a name as Abinaom ("father of kindness") means merely very kind. Others, as Esra, regard the words ab, aci, ən, etc., as at least at one time expressive of real relationship, and think such names exhibit an approach to our family names. It sometimes happens that a person appears with the name both in its simple as well as its compound state. For example, Nadah, as well as Abinadah, Ezer and Abi-zere, Abner ("father of Ner") was son of Ner. This seems to imply that something like the present Arabic practice had begun to prevail among the Hebrews. Certain names become hereditary in a family, and a man in an especial sense to name his male relative the traditional name. To such an extent is this custom carried that a man whose son should have been called "Yusuf" is styled "Abu Yusuf," even if he has no son; and a woman who is childless rejoices in the name uma Masa ("Mother of Moses"); because, had she had a son, he would have borne the name "Muas." In all likelihood these words, ab, etc., have not always the same meaning; the connective vowel i is not always a sign of the genitive, but merely of the construct or state of composition. We could more easily admit a metaphorical sense in the compounds with son, since צא is really often used in a highly metaphorical sense. Beshi-ba is certainly not the daughter of a man named Sheba (2 Sam. xi. 8). Such compound names with son, however, are, on the whole, rare, and are only found in some frequency in 1 Kings iv. 7, 9. See An.; Bex.;

Under this class we may also include יִשְׂרָאֵל, Yisra’el, "man," with which several names are compounded. Another, but a smaller, class consists of names compounded with בֵּית, Am, "people," resembling the many Greek compositions with λαός and διός; and just as in Greek διός is placed first or last (Demosethes, Aristodemos), so also Am is at one time found in the first, and at another in the last place; only that, according to the laws of the Semitic language, the sense of one of these positions is exactly the reverse of the other. As all these compounds must be conceived to be in the state construct, so likewise we are probably to take the names יִרְאוּבָּן, Jeroboam, properly "people's increaser," a suitable name for a prince, and יָשָׁבְוָן, Yashobam, "people's turn," or "as it pleases," for, as we observed above, the simple names are often formed with a prefixed יָדָד; and we actually find יַשָּׁבְוָנוֹ, Yashbona, as a simple name in Numb. xxvi, 29; 1 Chron. vii, 1.

Many compound names endeavor to express a religious sense, and therefore contain the divine name. Here we are at the same time find a new law of formation: as these compounds are intended to portray the thoughts, such as the religious sentiment requires, a name may consist of an entire proposition with a verb, but of course in as brief a compass as possible; and indeed shorter compounds are made with a verb than with a passive participle, as יִשָּׁבְווֹ נְתָנָהָל, Nathanael (in the New Test. נְתָנָאֶל), properly "God-gave," i.e. whom God gave, given by God, Θεοσώκος or Θεοσώκον, sounds shorter than יִשָּׁבְווֹ נְתָנָהָל, Nethaneiel, with the participle, which would certainly express the same sense. But since the finite verb, as also any other predicate, can just as well precede as follow, accordingly a great freedom in the position of the divine name has prevailed in this class; and this peculiarity is preserved, in the same cases, in the following period: but indeed the Greeks use Δωροτίτας as well as Θεοσώκος. Thus יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָהָל, Nethaneiel (1 Chron. ii, 14), or יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָהָל, Elhanan (Jer. xxxvi, 12). The two names are there generally assigned to two different persons; nevertheless, both combinations may form names for the same person, as יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Ammiel (1 Chron. iii, 5), and יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Ekiam (2 Sam. xi, 3), belong to the same individual.

Lastly, many proper names have assumed the derivative suffix -יט, or -ית (which appears to be only dialectically different from -ית, and is chiefly frequent in the later period): and we must certainly consider that, in some cases, this suffix may possibly form mere adjectives, and therewith simple names, as יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Amittai, "ironsman," from יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Emeth, "truth," and בָּשָׁלָת, "iron," the name of a celebrated Gileadite family (Exra ii, 61; 2 Sam. xviii, 27); or that it is derived from a place, as יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Beer ( Hos. i, 1; 1 Chron. vii, 26), "he of the well," or "he of a place known as the well." But it undoubtedly very often also expresses a genealogical relation, like the Greek ending -ῖον, and presupposes a previous proper name from which it is derived; thus the name יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Huri (1 Chron. v, 14), as surely presupposes the above-mentioned Chir, as the Greek Philippi does Philipps, and as Kethibh (ii, 9), one of the descendants of Judah, is connected with the Ketibh in iv, 11. It is remarkable that the genealogical relation appears to be sometimes expressed by the mere יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, motion, as יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Jacobak (ver. 36), which would be equivalently expressed by a German name, Zu-Jacob; יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Ishereiel, De Israel (xxx, 14; comp. vers. 2), and most distinctly in יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Ishchobadah (De Israel), "reckoned to Dan" (Neh. vii, 4; comp. יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Joshekkashah, in 1 Chron. xxx, 4, 5).

Among the names of the women, the oldest as well as the simplest which are found are actually only suited for women, as Rachel, "Ewe;" Deborah, "bee;" Tamar, "Palm-tree;" Hannah, "Favor," the mother of Samuel. Those which express such a delicate and essentially feminine feeling, as גָּרָה Hophra, "box of eye-ointment," (Job xlii, 14), and יָשָׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Hezechiah, "my delight is in her" (2 Kings xxii, 1), betray that they were generally formed in much later times. Indeed it appears to have been customary, at an early period, to form names for women from those of men, by means of the feminine termination; as יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Haggah (2 Sam. iii, 4), besides יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Haggai (Numb. xxvi, 15); יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Meshullumeth, i.e. Pia (2 Kings xxi, 19), besides יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Meshullem, Pia (1 Chron. v, 18; viii, 17), and יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Shelomith, Friederika (Numb. xxiv, 11), besides יִשָּׁבְוֹ נְתָנָאֶל, Shelomoh, Friederich. But we must not overlook the fact that all these are instances of simple names; or of those also in which the masculine has already dropped the second member; for Chananaj and Zabzi, as is shown below, are shortened from Chananaiah, Zobziah: no single example occurs from a compound man's name. As the same thought is here intended to be conveyed as a compound complete and perfect, so a shorter form is often chosen. This is used both for men and women, and as even those very names are applied to women which could not originally have been applicable to any but men, as Abiyyil, Achinoam, accordingly we must assume that the plastic power of the language had already exhausted itself in this remote province, and that, for that reason, the distinction of the feminine was omitted.

II. Symbolical Import of Proper Names.—As the name was the "sign" of the thing, it expressed as nearly as possible its character; it was the expression of the impression which was produced by the beholder on the mind, the name being the shorter and truer the expression was to the impression, and the truer the impression was to the object, the more nearly did the name represent the thing named. Hence the name in Hebrew is used to signify the collected attributes or characteristics of the object named. This is seen in the case with דָּבָר, "The Lord descended in the cloud and proclaimed the name of the Lord." And the Lord passed by him and proclaimed, The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious," etc. (Exod. xxxiv), where all these terms furnish but the exegesis of the word name. The use is similar in the New Test. Our Lord says, "I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world" (John xvii, 6); where name embraces the whole divine nature revealed by the Son, who hath "declared" the Father. In general the name was the result of an effort to embody in language as nearly as possible the nature of objects. When the whole nature could not be taken in, the chief characteristic was seized upon—what struck the eye or any of the senses mainly —and hence arose such names as Esaú ("hairy"). When there was no outstanding attribute to seize and embody, some incident was laid hold of connected with the object named, e. g. Moses ("drawn out of the water"); or some feeling in the mind of the names at the moment of imposing the name, as Benoni ("my son of sorrow"). Even the names of natural objects are full of meaning, or at least full of poetry, often having reminiscences of ancient times and deeds floating about them. The river names are very suggestive. The Jordan (Yarden, yarad, "to come down" [comp. Ganges, Ribe-nus]) is the two rapids, one into the Sea of Galilee, and one into the Dead Sea. The Arnon is the stream that "sings" (runam, to "make a tremendous sound") among the mountains. Jabbok, that which "bevels" ("byoka") through the rocky gorge. The Cherith, that which "cuts" its way. So are the names of mountains. Lebanon is the Mont Blanc of Syria, but perhaps named less from its snowy mantle than its bare white ribs of naked stone. Sirion, the "breastplate" of rock. The whole land is full of Abel (grassy meads), Bera (wells), Ayine (fountains); and in the evening the maidens danced in the meads, and called them Abel-melah (Judg. vii, 22); and the kids announced it, and it was named En-gedi (Josh. xv, 62); and the scissors basked in the sunny slopes, and their haunts were named Akkrabim; and the gazelles bounded across the heights, and men called their favorite resorts Ajabon. See each name above, and its earlier terms in its place.

Proper Psalms, i.e. psalms adapted by their contents to the subjects of particular Sundays or festivals and holydays. St. Chrysostom refers to ancient prescription in this matter, and St. Augustine mentions an old custom the use of Psa. xxii on Good Friday.
Cassian informs us that Psa. xxii with its at matins

Augustine appointed special psalms on certain occa-

Prophecies is the name given to the biblical texts which are read in the Church of Rome on the day before Easter-Sunday, after the consecration of the paschal lamb. They are the following: Gen. 1: 1-2; 2: 23; viii; 21; xxii. 1-19; Exod. xiv. 24; xv. 1; Isa. liv. 17; li; Bar. iii. 9-38; Ezek. xxxvii. 14-14; Isa. iv. 2; Exod. xii. 11-11; Jon. iii.; Deut. xxxi. 22-30; Dan. iii.
1-24. They are called prophesies, inasmuch as they are symbols of the redemption of mankind through Jesus Christ, and have a direct bearing upon the mysteries which the Church is at that period solemnly commemorating. The first prophecy relates the creation of the world: we are to remember here that Christ, by his death on the cross, became the creator of a new, spirituall creation. The second prophecy is the flood; about Noah saved with his family in the ark: it must remind the faithful that the Redeemer saves through the waters of baptism all those who believe in him.
The third prophecy brings before our eyes Abraham, whose faith was as firm as a rock, and is an assurance to similar confidence in our Lord. The fourth prophecy relates the exodus from Egypt and the passage through the Red Sea, showing how Christians should leave the bondage of sin and follow their own God-sent leader. The fifth and sixth prophecies recommend constancy in our purpose, teaching: the former: that we must bestow eternal bliss upon such as follow him; the latter, that rain sinners awake. To give us the necessary forces for the struggle we are to go through, God sends us the Holy Ghost: this is what we are reminded of by the vision of Ezekiel in the seventh prophecy. The eighth prophecy points out the eternal glory which awaits those who fight under the cross. The ninth prophecy is about the Jewish passeover, the tenth about Jonah's preaching in Nineveh, the eleventh about the respect to be paid to the Pentateuch, and the twelfth about the three young men in the oven. William Durand (1, 6, c.
81) knows of four, six, twelve, and fourteen of them.
In some churches five were read, in others eight.

Prophesy. Under this head we propose to treat of certain general aspects of the subject of permanent interest, reserving for the head of Prophesy what relates more personally to the organs or media of true prophecy, as found in the Bible. In doing so we combine the Biblical elements with the best results of modern criticism and discussion.

I Design of Prophecy. In this respect we would define prophecy as "God's communication to the Church, to be her light and comfort in time of trouble and perplexity." Vitringa defines it as "a prediction of some contingent circumstance or events in the future received by immediate or direct revelation." Dr. Pye Smith speaks of it "as a declaration made by a creature under the inspiration and commission of the omniscient God relating to an event or series of events, which have not taken place at the time the prophecy is uttered, and which could not have been certainly foreknown by any science or wisdom of man." Other writers say prophecy is "nothing but the history of events before they come to pass." Dean Magge dissects from this popular but erroneous view. In a lecture on the uses of prophecy he defines a prophet as "the religious teacher of his age, whose aim is the religious education of those whom he addresses." To have received a call and message direct from God, and to deliver it, is the essence of prophet-ism. The Jewish lawyer delivering moral and ceremonial precepts received from God, and our blessed Lord in the Sermon on the Mount, were prophets just as much as when they predicted the future of Israel (M'Caul, Aids to Faith). As a reaction from the general body of writers on prophecy, who exalt the predictive and neglect the moral element of God's communication to man, there have arisen in Germany, and to some extent in our land, writers who maintain there is not only the moral stream of light flowing through prophecy, and deny altogether its predictive character. Both errors will be avoided by bearing in mind that the word of prophecy was profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction, to the first recipients of the message, all for successional ages.
The usual view of prophecy as anticipated history virtually excludes from the roll the great Prophet who was its theme and author, Moses; his distinguished prototype, John the Baptist; his eminent forerunner, Eliezer, Samuel, under the old covenant, as well as the apostles and prophets under the new. According to this view, prophecy is virtually limited to what the Spirit spake unto the churches in the four hundred years between Hosea and Malachi, and by the beloved John, the writer of the Apocalypse. But if we agree to regard the prophet as the forerunner, possessing the munus pradicendi—rather than the forerunner, possessing only the munus propheticum—we see at once how the very highest place is assigned to our Lord and to Moses; how John the Baptist was more than a prophet, as he stood with in the actual dawn of the day of Christ, and as a religious teacher did really more for the religious training of those whom he addressed than any of the prophets of the old covenant. We see, too, how naturally and clearly the earlier prophets were subordinate to Moses, so that the new commission that led Jeremiah and Ezekiel to the lawgiver; and how appropriately the term is applied to the apostles of our Lord and Saviour, as charged by Christ with the whole ordering and establishing of the Church in its institutions, government, and progress. In fact, students of prophecy perpetually use the word in a non-natural sense. Hence the variety and discordancy of their interpretations. Our attention must be rigidly fixed on the natural and proper sense of the terms, if we would gain any satisfactory results.

In all communications from God to man two elements may be traced, the moral and the predictive. Neither element must be pressed or insisted on, so as to depress and exclude the other. Yet the moral element is the foundation, to which the predictive is always subsidiary. The moral element occupies the highest place in the communications made by our Lord by the apostles; the predictive element prevails in those who had the more ordinary gifts, as all their announcements appealed to the revelations made by Moses and by Christ. The testimony of Jesus as the author, and the testimony borne to Jesus as the theme, is the spirit of prophecy. The custom of regarding to this view of the subject, if it was not, the moral element is fundamental, the predictive is entirely subsidiary. All who bore testimony to Jesus before his incarnation were preachers of righteousness, and all who testify that Jesus is come in the flesh exercise the prophetic function.
PROPHECY

II. Value of Prophecy as Evidence of the Truth of Revelation.—Davison, in his Discourses on Prophecy, fixes a "Criterion of Prophecy," and in accordance with it he describes "the conditions which would confer cogency of evidence on single parts of prophecy," as "the truth in the world of a childlike application of the prophecy prior to the event; secondly, the clear and palpable fulfillment of it; lastly, the nature of the event itself—if, when the prediction of it was given, it lay remote from human view, and was such as could not be foreseen by any supposable effort of reason, or be deduced upon principles of calculation derived from probability and experience" (Disc. viii, 378). Applying his test, the learned writer finds that the establishment of the Christian religion and the person of its Founder were predicted when neither religion nor experience could have anticipated them; and that the predictions respecting them have been clearly fulfilled in history. Here, then, is an adequate proof of an inspired prescience in the prophets who predicted these things. He applies his test to the prophecies recorded of the Jewish people, and their actual state, to the prediction of the great apostasy and to the actual state of corrupted Christianity, and finally to the prophecies relating to Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, Egypt, the Ishmaelites, and the Four Empires, and to the events which have befallen them; and in each case he finds proof of the existence of the predictive element in the prophecies.

In the book of Kings we find Micaiah, the son of Imlah, uttering a challenge, by which his predictive powers were to be judged. He had pronounced, by the word of the Lord, that Ahab should fall at Ramoth-Gilead. Ahab, in return, commanded him to be shut up in prison until he came back in peace. "And Micaiah said, If thou return at all in peace (that is, if the event do not verify my words), "the Lord hath not spoken by me" (that is, I am no prophet capable of predicting the future," 1 Kings, viii, 29). The remark is sound as a negative test, and so it is laid down in the law (Deut. xviii, 22); but as a positive test it would not be sufficient. Ahab's death at Ramoth-Gilead did not prove Micaiah's predictive powers, though his escape would have disproved them. But here we must notice a very important difference between single prophecies and the series of prophecy. The fulfillment of a single prophecy does not prove the prophetic power of the prophet, but the fulfillment of a long series of prophecies by a series or number of events does in itself constitute a proof that the prophet is inspired. The more particular instances, and, consequently, that predictive power resided in the prophet or prophet. We may see this in the so far parallel cases of satirical writings. We know for certain that Aristophanes refers to Cleon, Pericles, Nicia (and we should rather say that his satire more of the satirical is, simply from the fact of a number of satirical hits converging together on the object of his satire. One, two, or three strokes might be intended for more persons than one, but the addition of each stroke makes them still more apparent; and when we have a sufficient number before us, it is easier to draw a conclusion than if we have but a few instances on which to base our design. The same may be said of fables, and still more of allegories. The fact of a complicated lock being opened by a key shows that the lock and key were meant for each other. Now the Messianic picture drawn by the prophets as a body contains at least as many traits as these: That salvation should come through the family of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, David; that at the time of the final absorption of the Jewish power, Shiloh (the tranquillizer) shall gather the nations under his rule; that there should be a great Peace, a " Pax deorum," after it, and that the event be to David: A Priest forever, typified by Melchizedek; that he should be born into the world a child to be called Mighty God, Eternal Father, Prince of Peace; that there should be a Righteous Servant of God on whom there should be laid the government of the earth, Messias, Israel, and to David, the Prince should be cut off, but not for himself, that an everlasting kingdom should be given by the Ancient of Days to one like the Son of man. It seems impossible to harmonize so many apparent contradictions. Nevertheless, it is an un doubted fact that at the time seemingly pointed out by one or more of these predictions there was no prefiguration of David, and therefore of the family of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Judah, who claimed to be the object of these and other predictions; who is acknowledged as Prophet, Priest, and King, as Mighty God and yet as God's Righteous Servant who bears the iniquity of all; who was cut off, and whose death is acknowledged not to have been for his own, but for others' good: who has instituted a spiritual kingdom on earth, which kingdom is of a nature to continue forever, if there is any continuance beyond this world and this life; and in whose doings and sufferings on earth a number of specific predictions were minutely fulfilled. Then we may say that we have here a series of prophecies which are so applicable to the person and earthly life of Jesus Christ as to be thereby shown to have been designed to apply to him. If they were designed to apply to him, prophetic prediction is proved.

Objections have been urged: (a) Vagueness.—It has been said that the prophecies are too darkly and vaguely worded to be proved predictive by the events which were they are to be fulfilled. This objection is met with clearness and force by Ammon. He says, "Such simple sentences as the following: Israel has not to expect a king, but a teacher; this teacher will be born at Bethlehem during the reign of Herod; he will lay down his life under Titus, in attestation of the truth of his religion; through the destruction of Jerusalem, and the complete extinction of the Jewish state, he will spread his doctrine in every quarter of the world—a few sentences like these, expressed in plain historical prose, would not only bear the character of true predictions, but, when compared with the authenticated event, would be of incomparably greater worth to us than all the oracles of the Old Testament, taken together" (Christology, p. 12). But to this it might be answered, and has been in effect answered by Hengstenberg: 1. That God never forces men to believe, but that there is such a union of definiteness and vagueness in the prophecies as to enable those who are willing to discover the truth, while the willfully blind are not forcibly constrained to see it. 2. That, had the prophecies been couched in the form of direct declarations, their fulfillment would have been impossible to doubt, but the events are in keeping with, and not improper to, the idea corresponding to the Gospel, and not to the idea corresponding to the Gospel Delivering. 3. That the effect of prophecy (e.g. with reference to the time of the Messiah's coming) would have been far less beneficial to believers, as being less adapted to keep them in a state of constant expectation of the Messiah, than it would have been had prophecy been more distinctly formulated. 4. That the expectation of the Messiah's deliverance could not be so clearly portrayed in his varied character as God and Man, as Prophet, Priest, and King, if he had been the mere "teacher" which is all that Ammon acknowledges him to be. 5. That the state of the prophecies, at the time of receiving the divine revelation, was such that we shall presently have occasion to show as necessary to make their predictions fragmentary, figurative, and abstrat from the relations of time. 6. That some portions of the prophecies were intended to be of double application, and some portions to be understood only on their fulfillment (comp. John xiv, 23; Ezek. xxxvi, 28). (b) Obscurity of a Part or Parts of a Prophecy otherwise Clear.—The objection drawn from "the unintelligibility of one part of a prophecy, as invalidating the proof of foresight arising from the evident completion of those parts which are understood" is not well founded, as it is drawn from a passage of the Bible which is not to be so clearly understood. If it may be answered with the same arguments, to which we may add the consideration urged by Butler that it is, for the argument in hand, the same as if the parts not understood were written in cipher, or not written at all: "Suppose, the writing of part of the prophetic words at length, and that in the part one understood there appeared mention of several known facts—it would never come into any man's thought to imagine that, if he understood the whole, perhaps he might find that these facts were not in reality known by the writer
(1. t. n. 1. ii, ch. vii). Furthermore, if it be true that prophecies relating to the first coming of the Messiah refer also to his second coming, some part of those prophecies must necessarily be as yet not fully understood.
It would appear from these considerations that Da-vision's second "condition," above quoted, "the clear and palpable fulfilment of the prophecy," should be so favourable an addition to the inquiries as to render more, or less great, in recognising the fulfilment of a prophecy which results from the necessary vagueness and obscurity of the prophecy itself.
(c) Application of the Several Prophecies to a more Immediacy Subject.—It has been the task of many Bibl. ical critics to examine the different passages which are alleged to be predictions of Christ, and to show that they were delivered in reference to some person or thing contemporary with, or shortly subsequent to, the time of the writer. The conclusion is then drawn, sometimes scarcely less, and at all times a dangerous one, that the passages in question have nothing to do with the Messiah. We have here to distinguish carefully between the conclusion proved and the corollary drawn from it. Let it be granted that it may be proved of all the prophecies of the Messiah (it certainly may be proved of many) that they are primary, historical and present fact: in that case a certain law, under which God vouchsafes his prophetic revelations, is discovered; but there is no semblance of disproof of the further Messianic interpretation of the passages under consideration. That some such law does exist has been argued at length by Mr. Davison. He believes, however, that "it obtains only in some of the more distinguished monuments of prophecy," such as the prophecies found on, and having primary reference to, the kingdom of David, the restoration of the Jews, the destruction of Jerusalem (On Prophecy, disc. v). Dr.
Lee thinks that Davison "exhibits too great reserve in the application of this important principle" (On Inspiration, sect. iv). He considers it to be of universal aplication; and upon it he founds the doctrine of the "divine prediction," according to which a prediction is fulfilled in two or even more distinct but analogous subjects: first in type, then in antitype; and after that perhaps awaits a still further and more complete fulfillment. This view of the fulfilment of prophecy seems to be quite consistent with the Lord's remark on the Red letter prophecy which is easily accounted for.
The divergence is in the two religions themselves, and is called out by the question whether the predictions for a Messianic to the "chosen race" have been ever fulfilled. Upon this query all turn. The law of the Lord's remnant is the Christian the long-promised divine messenger, either declares it a vain attempt to decipher the prophetic images, if he be a rationalist; or, if he be more faithfully wedded to the canon of the synagogue, patiently sits back, awaiting the final solution of the problem of God's salvation of his people. See Jews; Messiah; Phars-isee; Rationalism.
In the early and mediavel days of Christianity, the Jews did not deny the facts of the Christian miracles, but explained them away, and so nothing remained for the settling of the doctrine of the prophecies and the question of their fulfillment. The first of these the Jew cculated to the Christian, but on the last point a somewhat rich literature of polemics is preserved to us. It begins with the New Test. itself. Paul and other apostles were frequently called upon to argue the Messiasship of Christ. We see the same phase of the contest in the apologue of Justin Martyr (q. v.) against Trypho, to which a new kind of objection expressive of prejudice is added in the discourse which Celsius, as preserved in Origen (Contr. Cel. bk. i and ii), puts into the mouth of Trypho. The Jews" in their controversy to this contest, these Church fathers, and especially Semiisch's work on Justin Martyr and the works on the Jewish Talmudic literature and philosophy, may be consulted. See also, for later continuations of this con-

The Jew contends with the Christian not only for a special spiritual elevation in the prophet—an intense devotion to Jesus, the Messiah, with God given to all who worship him in love and reverence—but for a gift of light vouchsafed to him different from any ordinary endowment. Maimonides remains the chief of the Jewish hermeneutists. "This age of medieval Judaism thus teaches: Prophecy signifies the communication of verities to the human mind from God by the medium of the active reason, with or without the power to foretell future events or to perform miracles. The first point is essential, the other is merely accidental. Prophecy is a capacity of the human mind. All possess it more or less. Like other human capacities, it may remain dormant in this or that mind, or be developed partially or perfectly. In the development of this capacity, it is necessary, in the first place, to cultivate and purify the imagination, i.e. the ability of beholding internally, clearly, and truly things external and distant, either in space or time, and to place the imagination under the control of mental judgment. In the second place, the moral nature of the individual must be trained to purity, goodness, love of the true and the sublime, and the desire to understand and receive the voice of the essential Deity. This cannot be done outside of society, but within it and in its active service. It cannot be done by asceticism and the renunciation of the world and its charms; it must be done in gladness and joy, by chastity, temperance, and a life of moderation, governing and controlling the lower passions and developing the nobler, finer, and higher ones to a harmonious moral character. Passionate, immoral, and wicked persons will hinder their imagination, pervert their judgment, and baffle their reason. In the third place, reason must be fully developed to control all other powers of the individual, without weakening them or disturbing the harmony of the soul, and to elevate him to universal reason, which Maimonides calls the 'active reason,' which enables him to grasp universal truth and to depict it clearly to himself or others by the power of his imagination. Man so prepared, so developed and trained, is a prophet, although he may still receive no special messages from on high, either because his age requires none, or outer influences, climatical or social, disturb the mind. But the man so prepared, and he only, is the prophet of the Lord. So the ancient prophets were prepared for their messages and their missions. Others, also, may conceive original ideas and prophecies; but if the reason predominates over the imagination, they cannot realize or reproduce their own internal visions. If the imagination predominates, they probably err. But the prophet of the Lord is a master, not a visionary, of his prophecies and an expert in interpreting and conforming his messages to the conditions of the times. Moreover, but hear prophetic words addressed to them, not in a dream or vision—not merely sometimes and in a state of ecstasy—but waking, intelligent, and whenever they wish. Albo adds, "If a man has elevated himself to this high state of mind, he should no longer be called a prophet—he is a seer. A seer is one who has not yet received this perfection, except our teacher Moses." PROPHESYING. Religious exercises of the Puri- tan clergy in the reign of queen Elizabeth, instituted for the purpose of promoting knowledge and piety. The ministers of a particular division, at a set time, met together in some church of a market or other large town, and there each in his order explained, according to his ability, some portion of Scripture previously allotted to him. This done, a moderator made his observations on what had been said, and determined the true sense of New Testament, New Testament, and of censure for despatching the whole. These institutions, borrowed evidently from the Controversies (q. v.) of Scotland, like all others, however, it seems, were in England soon marked by irregularity, disputations, and divisions. Archbishop Grindal endeavored to regulate the prophecies and prophecies and in 1568 they be abolished by the court made against them, by enjoining the ministers to themselves must expound; or they see an angel or a person—in themselves, of course—who speaks to them; or they hear a voice without seeing any vision, in which they suppose they have heard God speak. Therefore the prophetic voice is not the same thing with the vision of the writers of Scriptures, and the oracles of some are announced in different poetical forms. The prophet knows how to distinguish divine visions from vulgar ones by the profound impression which the former make upon him, carrying conviction into his mind, and we must know it by the test of reason to which the matter revealed is subjected. All visions recorded in the Bible, Maimonides advances, were subjective, psychological processes. Wherever it is said God appeared, an angel appeared, this or that vision was seen, it must always be understood to have appeared so in the prophet's imagination. Only one prophet received his revelations through and to reason directly, without poetical garbs or visionary assistance, and that was Moses. Only one divine manifestation of this nature did actually come to pass, and that was the revelation on Mount Sinai, and this, also, Maimonides rationalizes in his own way. In all these rational expositions of prophecy, Maimonides refers to the Bible and the Talmud for support. (comp. his Yose- dei Htsorah, which forms the introd. to his Yad-Ha- chak.) Another sage, whose authority the ultra-orthodox prefer to depend upon, is Joseph Albo (q. v.). He has expressed his opinion on the various grades of prophets in his book on Principles (Sepher Ikkarim, ch. x, § 3). It differs materially from that of Maimonides. Albo has four grades of prophets; the first class consists of proph- ets with whom the understanding has no domination over the vision. They receive the prophetic vision in a state of slumber and dream, after an attack of pain and terror. The second class consists of prophets in whom the understanding and the phantasy are well balanced; they receive the prophetic visions without pain or terror, in quiet dreams. The third class consists of prophets with whom the understanding predominates over the phantasy; they see no imaginary visions, as the above two classes do, which must be expounded; they see real objects in their visions, and hear them speak intelligible words; there is neither pain nor terror, nor doubtful visions in the prophetic ecstasy of this class. The fourth class consists of prophets with whom phantasy has no influence whatever upon the understanding, but who receive their visions in the same manner as the second class, they hear prophetic words addressed to them, not in a dream or vision—not merely sometimes and in a state of ecstasy—but waking, intelligent, and whenever they wish. Albo adds, "If a man has elevated himself to this high state of mind, he should no longer be called a prophet—he is a seer. A seer is one who has not yet received this perfection, except our teacher Moses." observe decency and order, by forbidding them to meddle with politics and Church government, and by prohibiting all nonconformist ministers and laymen from being speakers. The queen, however, seeing that they spread the religious notions of the Puritans and estranged the people from all Romanistic tendency, was resolved to suppress them; and having sent for the archbishop, told him she was informed that the rites and ceremonies of the Church were not duly observed in these prophecies; that persons not lawfully called to be ministers exercised in them; that the assemblies themselves were illegal, not being allowed by public authority; that the laity neglected their secular affairs by repairing to these meetings, which filled their heads with notions, and might occasion disputes and sedition in the State; that it was good for the Church to have but few preachers, three or four in a county being sufficient. She further declared her dislike to the number of these exercises, and therefore commanded him peremptorily to put them down. The archbishop, however, instead of obeying the commands of his royal mistress, thought that she made some infringement upon his office, and wrote the queen a long and angry letter, declaring that her command would not suffer him to comply with her commands. The queen was so inflamed with this letter that the archbishop was sequestered from his office, and he never afterwards recovered the queen's favor. Thus ended the prophecies. See Nona, Hist. of the Puritans.

PROPHET, a person who acts as the organ of divine communication with men, especially with regard to the future. He differs from a priest in representing the divine side of this mediation, while the priest rather acts from the human side. The following article therefore discusses chiefly the personal relations of the prophet himself. See PROPHECY.

I. The Title in Scripture.—The ordinary Hebrew word for prophet is נבּ (nabi), derived from the verb נבּ (nab), connected by Gesenius with נבּל (nabl), “to bubble forth,” like a fountain. If this etymology be correct, the substantive would signify anyone who, as it were, involuntarily bursts forth with spiritual utterances under the divine influence (comp. Psa. xiv. 1, “My heart is bubbling up of a good matter”), or simply one who pours forth words. The analogy of the word נבל (nabal), which has the force of “dropping” as honey, and is used by Micah (ii, 6, 11), Ezekiel (xxii, 2), and Amos (vii, 16) in the sense of prophesying, points to the last signification. The verb נבל is found only in the niphal and hiphil, a peculiarity which it shares with many other words expressive of speech (comp. בּנות, בּות, לֹאכֵר, לֹאכַר, לֹאכַר, בּלַדְנוּ, as well as הָבְרִיָה and הָבְרִיָה). Bunsen (Gott in Geschichte, p. 141) and Davidson (Intr. Old Test. ii, 480) suppose nabi to signify the man to whom announcements are made by God, i.e. inspired. Exod. iv. 1-17 is the classical passage as to the meaning of this word. There God says to Moses, “Aaron shall be thy נבּ (nabi) unto the people, and thou shalt be unto him instead of God. The sense is, “Aaron shall speak what thou shalt communicate to him.” This appellation implies, then, the prophet's relation to God: he speaks not of his own accord, but what the Spirit puts into his mouth. Thus נבּ (nabi) is an adjective of passive signification: he who has been divinely inspired, who has received from God the revelations which he proclaims. But it is more in accordance with the use of the word נבל as a signifying (actively) one who announces or pours forth the declarations of God. The latter signification is preferred by Ewald, Hlvernick, Oehler, Hengstenberg, Bleek, Lee, Pusey, McCaul, and the great majority of Biblical critics. We have the word in Barnabas (27 נבּ), which is rendered ὅποιος ρήηζε (Acts iv, 36), one whom God has qualified to impart consolation, light, and strength to others. Augustine says, “The prophet of God is nothing else nisi enunciator verborum Dei omnibus.” So Heidelberger, “Nabi is properly every utterer of the words of another, not from his own, but from another's influence and will.”

Two other Hebrew words are used to designate a prophet—נבּ (nab) and נבּ (chok):—both signify¬ing one who sees. They are rendered in the A. V. by “seer.” In the Sept. usually by בּיָּמָל or בּיָּמָל, sometimes by נקּ (1 Chron. xxvi, 28; 2 Chron. xvii, 7, 10). The three words seem to be contrasted with each other in 1 Chron. xxix, 29. “The acts of David the king, first and last, behold they are written in the book of Samuel the seer (רָדֶּק), and in the book of Nathan the prophet (נֵּבּ), and in the book of Nathan the prophet (נֵּבּ), and in the book of Nathan the prophet (נֵּבּ), and in the book of Nathan the prophet (נֵּבּ), and in the book of Nathan the prophet (נֵּבּ), and in the book of Nathan the prophet (נֵּבּ), and in the book of Nathan the prophet (נֵּרֶדֶק),” נבּ is a title almost appropriated to Samuel. It is only used ten times, and in seven of these it is applied to Samuel (1 Sam. ix, 9, 11, 18, 19; 1 Chron. xxii, 22; xxvii, 28; xxxix, 29). On two other occasions it is applied to Haman (2 Chron. xvi, 7, 10). Once it is used by Isaiah in this connection with no reference to a particular person. It was superseded in general use by the word הנביא, which Samuel (himself entitled הנביא as well as רָדֶּק [1 Sam. iii, 20; 2 Chron. xxxv, 18]) appears to have revived after a period of disuse (1 Sam. ix, 9), and to have applied to the prophets organized by him. The word נבּ, from which it is derived, is the commonest word signifying “a prophet” or “one who utters or utters through God” whence the substantive נבּ (chok) is derived—is more poetical, q. d. “to gaze.” נבּ is rarely found except in the books of the Chronicles, but נבּ is the word constantly used for the prophetic vision. It is found in the Pentateuch, in Samuel, in the Chronicles, in Job, and in most of the prophets. In 1 Sam. ix, 9 we read, “He that is now called a prophet (נביא) was beforetime called a seer (רָדֶּק):” from whence Stanley (Lect. on the Jewish Church) has concluded that רָדֶּק of the heathen designation of the prophetic office, “superseded by הנביא shortly after Samuel's time, when הנביא first came into use” (ibid. xviii, xix). This seems opposed to the fact that הנביא is the word commonly used in the Pentateuch, whereas רָדֶּק does not appear until the days of Samuel. The passage (1 Sam. ix, 20) is of Samuel himself by the prophetic insertion, perhaps made by the הנביא Nathan (or whoever was the original author of the book), perhaps added at a later date, with the view of explaining how it was that Samuel bore the title of רָדֶּק, instead of the now usual appellation of הנביא. To this the days of Samuel were “beforetime,” and he explains that in those ancient days—that is, the days of Samuel—the word used for prophet was רָדֶּק, not הנביא. But that does not imply that רָדֶּק was the primitive word, and that הנביא first came into use subsequently to Samuel (see Hengstenberg, Beiträge zur Einleitung ins A. T. iii, 335). Stanley represents יָבֵא as “another antique title,” but on no sufficient grounds. יָבֵא is first found in 2 Sam. xxiv, 11; so that it does not seem to have come into use until רָדֶּק had almost disappeared. It is also found in the books of Kings and Chronicles (frequently), in Amos (vii, 12), Isaiah (xxix, 10), Micah (iii, 7), and the derivatives of the verb יָבֵאת are used by the prophets to designate their visions down to the Captivity (comp. Isa. i, 1; Dan. viii, 1; Zechar. xxii, 4). The derivatives are however, and, as being prose words, are chiefly used by Daniel (comp. Ezek. i, 1; Dan. x, 7). On examination we find that הנביא existed before and after and alongside of רָדֶּק and יָבֵאת, but that יָבֵאת was somewhat more modern than רָדֶּק.

Whether there is any difference in the usage of these three words, and, if any, what that difference is, has been much debated (see Witsius, Miscell. Sacra, i, 1, § 19; Carpzovius, Introduct. ad Libros Canon. V. T. iii, 1, 2; Winer, Real-Wörterbuch, art. “Propheten”). which was this: that the ministers within a precinct did meet upon a week-day in some principal town, where there was some ancient grave minister that was president, and an auditory admitted of gentlemen or other persons of leisure. Then every day successively, being as he had done the last day, did handle one and the same part of Scripture, spending severally some quarter of an hour or better, and in the whole some two hours. And so the exercise being begun and concluded with prayer, and the president giving a text for the next meeting, the assembly was dispersed.

The meaning of the word is made further familiar to us by the title of Jeremy Taylor's treatise On Liberty of Prophecying. Nor was there any risk of the title of a book published in our own days, On the Prophetic Office of the Church (Oxford, 1830), being misunderstood. In fact, the English word prophet, like the word inspiration, has always been used in a larger and in a closer sense. In the larger sense our Lord Jesus Christ is a "prophet," Moses is a "prophet," Mohammed is a "prophet." The expression means that they proclaimed and published a new religious dispensation. In a similar, though not identical sense, the Church is said to have "a prophetic," i.e. an expository and interpretative, office. But in its closer sense the word, according to usage, though not according to etymology, always has, lastly and always has been its more usual acceptation. The different meanings, or shades of meaning, in which the abstract noun is employed in Scripture have been drawn out by Locke as follows: "Prophets comprehends three things: prediction, singing by the dictate of the Spirit; and understanding and explaining the mysterious hidden sense of Scripture by an immediate illumination and motion of the Spirit" (Paraphrase of 1 Cor. xii, note, p. 121 [London, 1742]). It is in virtue of this last signification of the word that the prophets of the New Testament, as of the Old (1 Cor. xii), by virtue of God's endowment of the sons of Asaph, etc., are said to have "prophesied with a harp" (xxv, 3), and Miriam and Deborah are termed "prophetesses." That the idea of potential if not actual prediction enters into the conception expressed by the word prophecy, which word is used to designate the function of the Hebrew prophets, may be proved by the following passages of Scripture: Deut. xviii, 22; Jer. xxxviii, 9; Acts ii, 30; iii, 18-21; 1 Pet. i, 10; 2 Pet. i, 19, 20; iii, 2. Etymologically, however, it is certain that neither presence nor prediction is included in the phrase "prophet." Whereas this was equivalent to the gift of prophecy (see 2 Pet. i, 21).

The word prophecy is uniformly translated in the Sept. by προφητής, and in the A. V. by "prophet." In classical Greek, προφήτης signifies one who speaks for another, specially one who speaks for a god, and so interprets his will to man (Liddell and Scott, s. v.). Hence its essential meaning is "an interpreter." Thus Apollo is προφήτης, as being the interpreter of Zeus (Theoclymus, Enn. 19). Poets are the Prophets of the Muse, as being their interpreters (Plato, Phaedr. 262 d). The προφήτης attached to heathen temples are so much so removed from their interpreting the oracles delivered by the inspired and unconscious μάντης (Plato, Tim. 72 b; Herod. vii, 111, note [ed. Bühr]). We have Plato's authority for deriving μάντης from μάνωμα (l. c.). The use of the word prophecy in its modern sense is post-classical, and is derived, according to Roemers, from the Hebrew word נביא, because such as he received were in the special form described; so, indeed, in chap. xxv it is expressly stated that divine communications were made to him in visions and dreams. The patriarchs as a class are in the same manner called prophets (Ps. cxv, 15). Moses was a prophet, as being a prophesier of a new dispensation, a reveler of God's will, and in virtue of his divinely inspired songs (Exod. xv; Deut. xxxii, xxxiii; Ps. xc), but his main work was not prophetical, and therefore formally distinguished from prophets (Num. xi. 26) and not placed among the classes of professional seers (v. 10). Aaron is the prophet of Moses (Exod. vii. 1); Miriam (xv. 20) is a prophetess; and we find the prophetic gift in the elders who "prophesied" when "the Spirit of the Lord rested upon them," and in Eldad and Medad, who "prophesied in the camp" (Num. xi. 27). At the time of the settlement of Miriam, the possible existence of prophets is recognized (xii, 6).

When the Mosaic economy had been established, a new element was introduced. The sacerdotal caste then became the instrument by which the members of the Jewish theocracy were taught and governed in things spiritual. Feast and fast, sacrifice and offering, rite and ceremony, constituted a varied and ever-recurring system of training and teaching by type and symbol. To the priests, too, was intrusted the work of "teaching the children of Israel all the statutes which the Lord hath spoken unto them by the hand of Moses" (Lev. x, 11). Teaching by act and teaching by word were alike their task. This office they adequately fulfilled for some hundred or more years after the giving of the law at Mount Sinai. But during the time of the Judges the priesthood sank into a state of degeneracy, and the people were no longer affected by the acted lessons of the ceremonial service. They required less enigmatic warnings and exhortations. Under these circumstances a new moral power was evoked—the regular Prophetic Line. Special functionaries of this kind had from time to time already appeared. In the days of the Judges we find that Deborah (Judg. iv, 4) was a prophetess; a prophet (vi, 4) rebuked and exorted the Israelites when oppressed by the Midianites; and in Samuel's childhood a "man of God" predicted to Eli the death of his two sons, and the curse that was to fall on his descendants (1 Sam. ii, 27). But it was now time for a more formal institution of the prophetic order. Samuel, himself a Levite, of the family of Kophah (1 Chron. vi, 28), and certainly acting as a priest, was the instrument used at once for effecting a reform in the sacerdotal order (ix, 22), and for giving to the prophets a position of influence which they had never before held. So important was the work wrought by him that he is classed in Holy Scripture with Moses (Jer. xv, 1; Ps. cxix, 6; Acts iii, 24), Samuel being thus ranked among the ecclesiastical students to be reckoned among the prophetic order, as Moses was the great legislator and founder of the priestly rule. Nevertheless, it is not to be supposed that Samuel created the prophetic order as a new thing before unknown. The germ of both the prophetic and sacerdotal orders was already given to the Israelites by Moses (Deut. xiii, 1; xvii, 20; xxi, 18), but they were not yet developed, because there was not yet the demand for them. Samuel, who evolved the one, himself saw the evolution of the other. It is a vulgar error respecting Jewish history to suppose that there was an antagonism between the prophets and the priests. There is not a trace of such antagonism. Isaiah may denounce a wicked hierarchy (i, 10), but it is because it is wicked, not because it is a hierarchy. Malachi 'sharply reproves the priests' (xi, 1), but it is in order to support the priesthood (comp. i, 14). Mr. F. W. Newman even designates Ezekiel's writings as "hard sacerdotialism," "tedious and unifying as Leviticus itself" (Hebr. Monarch. p. 330). The prophetic order was, in truth, supplemental, not antagonistic, to the sacerdotal. See SAMUEL.

Brian was enabled to make his work of restoration permanent as well as effective for the moment. For this purpose he instituted companies, or colleges of prophets. One we find in his lifetime at Ramah (1 Sam. xix, 20, 23); others afterwards at Bethel (2 Kings x. 17) and Haarmon (17), and the former may be regarded as the forerunner of the latter. Their constitution and object were similar to those of theological colleges. Into them were gathered promising students, and here they were trained for the office which they were afterwards destined to fulfill. So successful were these institutions that from the time of Samuel to the closing of the Canon of the Old Test., there is no lack of prophet or prophetess, and due supply of men to keep up the line of official prophets. There appears to be no sufficient ground for the common statement that after the schism the colleges existed only in the Israelitish kingdom, or for Knobel's supposition that they ceased with Eliahs (Prophetiamus, ii, 39), nor again for Bishop Lowth's statement that "they existed from the earliest times of the Hebrew republic" (Sacred Poetry, lect. xviii), or for M. Nicolas's assertion that their previous establishment can be inferred from 1 Sam. viii, ix, x (Etudes Critiques sur la Bible, p. 562). We have, however, no actual proof of their existence except in the days of Samuel and of Elijah and Elisha. The apocryphal books of the Maccabees (I, iv, 46; ix, 27; xiv, 41) and of Ecclesiasticus (xxxvi, 15) represent them as extinct. The colleges appear to have consisted of students differing little in age or capacity, but they were very numerous (1 Kings xviii, 4; xxii, 6; 2 Kings i, 16). One elderly, or leading prophet, presided over them (1 Sam. xix, 20), called their father (x, 12), or master (2 Kings i, 2), who was apparently admitted to his office by the ceremony of anointing (1 Kings xiv, 16; 1 Sam. i, 11; 2 Sam. ix, 24; 1 Kings i, 10). Their chief subject of study was, no doubt, the law and its interpretation; oral, as distinct from symbolical, teaching being henceforward tacitly transferred from the priestly to the prophetic order. Subsidiary subjects of instruction were music and sacred poetry, both of which had been connected with prophecy from the time of Moses (Exod. xvi, 20) and the Judges (Judg. iv, 1; v, 1). The prophets that meet Saul "came down from the high place with a psaltery and a tabret, and a pipe and a harp before them" (1 Sam. x, 5). Elijah calls a minister to evoke the prophetic gift in himself (2 Kings iii, 15). David "separates to the service of the sons of Asaph and of Heman and of Jeduthun, who should prophesy with harps and with psalteries and with cymbals. . . . All these were under the hands of their father for song in the house of the Lord with cymbals, psalteries, and harps for the service of the house of God" (1 Chron. xxv, 16). Hymns, or sacred songs, are found in the books of Jonah (i, 2), Isaiah (xiii, 1; xxxvi, 1), Habakkuk (iii, 2). It was probably the duty of the prophetic order to prepare the material for the public preaching (see Lowth, Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, lect. xviii). Having been themselves trained and taught, the prophets, whether still residing within their college or having left its precincts, had the task of teaching others. From the question of who shall be a prophet his husband, "Wherefore will thou go to him to-day? It is neither new moon nor Sabbath" (2 Kings iv, 23), it appears that weekly and monthly religious meetings were held as an ordinary practice by the prophets (see Patrick, Comm. ad loc.). Thus we find that "Elisha sat in his house" engaged in his official duties (2 Kings iv, 2; 2 Kings vii, 13), and the elders sat with him" (2 Kings vii, 32), when the king of Israel sent to slay them. It was at these meetings, probably, that many of the warnings and exhortations on morality and spiritual religion were addressed by the prophets to their countrymen. See PROPHETS, SCHOOLS OF.

The schools of the prophets were thus engaged in what we may call pastoral functions, rather than in the display of things to come; their office was to bring home to men's business and to booming the announcements already made. Derived from the Levitical sacerdotal classes, they performed services chiefly of a priestly character (1 Sam. ix, 13), but presided over devotional exercises and gave spiritual instruction. We may regard Elijah as the type of the whole prophetic order at this his time, "a man of metheors, and endowed with a gift of prolific thought or excellent discourse. Power was given him to smite the earth with plagues (Rev. vi, 6).
PROPHET

When an impression had been made by these extraordinary displays of power, a still small voice was heard to quicken the people to newness of life. If we pass on to the religious teachers who are associated with the name and age of David—Nathan, Solomon, and others, who composed the Psalms—we shall see that these aimed at the religious education of their contemporaries by a pure stream of didactic and devotional poetry. Their object was to advance the members of the ancient covenant to the highest degree of light and purity which was attainable in that state of minority. The predictive element crops out most distinctly in the Messianic psalms, which point to the ultimate completion of the kingdom in David's Lord, and the universal reign of righteousness, truth, and peace. When these efforts failed to stem the tide of corruption and to rescue the chosen people from disorder, ancient prophecy assumed the form of specific prediction. The moral element is chiefly seen in denouncing the iniquity and unrighteousness of the age, but the distinctive characteristic is that, in exposing the evils which prevailed, they directed the eye to the future. This band of religious teachers who are popularly spoken of as "the prophets" commenced with Hosea soon after the ministry of Elijah and Elisha. Hosea's labors commenced in the days of Jeroboam II, king of Israel, and were prolonged to the time of Hezekiah, comprising more than sixty years, so that with him were contemporary Amos, Jonah, Joel, Obadiah, Isaiah, Micah, Nahum. Next to those in order of time came Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Habakkuk, Zephaniah. The last three were Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. From these we derive our ample materials for comparing the anticipations of prophecy with the subsequent events of history. Thus the prophets of the Old Covenant form a regular succession; they are members of an unbroken continuous chain, which one perpetually reaches forth to the hand of the other. See PROPHETS, MAJOR, and MINOR.

In the first book of the Maccabees (i, 17) the discontinuance of the prophetic calling is considered as forming an important era in Jewish history (see Steemann, De Termino Prophetarum [Hest. 1723]), while at the same time an expectation of the renewal in future ages of prophetic gifts is avowed (1 Macc. iv. 46; xiv. 41). After the Babylonian exile the sacred writings were collected, which enabled every one to find the way of living. The immediate revelations to the people of Israel were to cease for a while, in order to raise a stronger longing for the appearance of the Messiah, and to prepare for him a welcome reception. For the same reason the ark of the covenant had been taken away from the enemy. The Church of the apostles, in which earlier times might have been incurred by this withdrawal, was not now to be apprehended. The eternal worship of the Lord was so firmly established that no extraordinary helps were wanted. Taking also into consideration the altered character of the people, we may add that the time after the exile was more fit to produce men learned in the law than prophets. Before this period, the faithful and the unbelieving were strongly opposed to each other, which excited the former to greater exertions. These relaxed when the opposition ceased, and pious priests now took the place of the prophets. The time after the exile is characterized by weakness and dependence; the people looked up to the past as to a height which they could not gain; the earlier writings obtained unconditional authority, and the disposition for receiving prophetic gifts was lost. About a hundred years after the return from the Babylonian exile, the prophetic profession ceased. The Jewish tradition uniformly states that after Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi no prophet arose among the Jews till John the Baptist woke the echoes of a long-lost voice, and the new dispensation was born. For its resurrection under the New-Test. economy, see § x below.

2. Manner of Life of the Prophets.—The prophets went about poorly and coarsely dressed (2 Kings i, 8), not as a mere piece of asceticism, but that their very appearance might teach what people ought to do; it was a "sermo propheticus realis." Comp. 1 Kings xxi, 27, where Ahab does penance in the manner figured by the prophet: "And it came to pass, when Ahab heard these words, that he rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his flesh and fasted" (see Nicolai, De Prophetarum Vaticis [Magdeh. 1746]; Zachariä, De Prophetarum Habitus [Sodin, 1756]). The general appearance and life of the prophet were very similar to those of the Eastern derelivah at the present day. His dress was a hairy garment, girt with a leathern girdle (Isa. xx. 2; Zech. xiii. 4; Matt. iii. 4). He was married or unmarried as he chose; but his manner of life and diet were stern and austere (2 Kings iv, 10; 1 Kings xix, 6; Matt. iii. 4). Generally the prophets were not anxious to attract notice by ostentatious display; nor did they seek worldly wealth, most of them living in poverty and even want (1 Kings xiv, 8; 2 Kings iv, 38; iv, vi. 5). The decay of the congregation of God deeply chagrined them (comp. Micah vii, 1, and many passages in Jeremiah). Insult, persecution, imprisonment, and death were often the reward of their godly life. The expression of the author of the Apocalypse (Rev. iii. 7): "They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword; they wandered about in sheep-skins and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented" (comp. Christ's speech, Matt. xxiii, 29 sq.; 2 Chron. xxiv, 17 sq.). The condition of the prophets, in their temporal humiliation, is vividly represented in the lives of Elijah and Elisha in the books of the Kings; and Jeremiah concludes the description of his sufferings in the 20th chapter by cursing the day of his birth. Repudiated by the world in which they were aliens, they saw in the life of him whom their appearance announced, and whose spirit dwelt in them. They figured him, however, not only in his lowness, but in his elevation. The Lord stood by them, gave evidence in their favor by fulfilling their predictions, frequently proved by miracles that they were his own messengers, or retaliated on their enemies the injury done them. The prophets addressed the people of both kingdoms: they were not confined to particular places, but prophesied where it was required. For this reason they were most numerous in capital towns, especially in Jerusalem, where they were stationed in the Temple. Sometimes their advice was asked, and then their prophecies take the form of answers to questions submitted to them (Isa. xxxvii; Ezek. xx.; Zech. vii). But much more frequently they felt themselves called to be "inwardly conversant with the courts of the high princes," to be the servants of the prince, or other great men, and to be so exclusively employed as to be entirely under the influence of the prince. But the prophets were not afraid to stand forward in places where their appearance, perhaps, produced indignation and terror. Whatever lay within or around the sphere of religion and morals formed the object of their care. They strenuously opposed the worship of false gods (Isa. i. 19 sq.; Hos. xiii. 16 sq.), as the work of the outfit. (iii, 16 sq.). Priests, princes, kings, all must hear them—must, however reluctantly, allow them to perform their calling as long as they spoke in the name of the true God, and as long as the result did not disprove the pretensions to be the servants of the invisible King of Israel (Jer. xxxviii, 15-21).

As seen above, there were institutions for training prophets; the senior men instructed a number of pupils and directed them. These schools had been established by Samuel (1 Sam. x. 11), and at a later time there were such institutions in different places, as Bethel and Gilgal (2 Kings ii, 3; iv, 38; vi, 1). The pupils of the prophets lived in fellowship united, and were called "sons of the prophets;" while the formation of the several new dispensations was in connection with their spiritual parents, and were styled fathers (comp. 2 Kings ii, 12; vi, 21). Samuel, Elijah, and Elisha are mentioned as principals of such institutions. From them the Lord generally chose his instruments. Amos relates of himself (vii, 14, 15), as a thing uncommon, that he did not belong to the prophets, but was a herdsman, when the Lord took him to prophesy unto the people of Israel. At the same time, this example shows that the bestowal of prophetic gifts was not limited to the school of the prophets. Women also might come forward as prophetesses, as instanced in Miriam, Deborah, and Huldah, though such cases are of comparatively rare occurrence. We should also observe that only as regards the kingdom of Israel we have express accounts of the continuance of the schools of prophets. What is recorded of them is not directly applicable to the kingdom of Judah, except, as stated above, prophecy had in it an essentially different position. We cannot assume that the organization and regulations of the schools of the prophets in the kingdom of Judah were as settled and established as in the kingdom of Israel. In the latter, the schools of the prophets had a kind of monastic constitution: they were not institutions of general education, but missionary stations; which explains the circumstance that they were established exactly in places which were the chief seats of superstition. The spiritual fathers traveled in their evangelization, the pupils had their common board and dwelling, and those who married and left ceased not on that account to be connected with their colleges, but remained members of them. The widow of such a pupil of the schools of prophets who is mentioned in 2 Kings iv, 1 sq., considered Elisha as the person bound to care for her. The offerings which, by the Mosaic law, were to be given to the Levites were by the pius of the kingdom of Israel brought to the schools of the prophets (iv, 42). The prophets of the kingdom of Israel thus in some sort stood in a hostile position to the priests. These points of difference in the situation of the prophets of the two kingdoms must not be lost sight of; and we further add that prophecy in the kingdom of Israel was much more connected with extraordinary events than in the kingdom of Judah: the history of the latter offers no prophetic deeds equaling those of Elijah and Elisha. Prophecy in the kingdom of Israel not being grounded on a hierarchy venerable for its antiquity, consecrated by divine miracles, and constantly flavored with divine protection, it needed to be supported more powerfully, and to be less liable to be discredited. It may be observed that the expression "schools of the prophets" is not exactly suited to their nature, as general instruction was not their object. The so-called prophets' schools were associations of men endowed with the spirit of God, for the purpose of carrying on their work, the able-bodied members being directly and strengthened by those of a higher class. To those who entered these unions the Divine Spirit had already been imparted, which was the imperative condition of their reception. See Prophets, Sons of. The prophets of these, there have already been in part glanced at, but the importance of the subject demands a fuller exposition. To belong to the prophetic order and to possess the prophetic gift are not convertible terms. There might be members of the prophetic order to whom the gift of prophecy was not vouchsafed. There might be inspired prophets who did not belong to the prophetic order. As we have seen above, the inspired prophet generally came from the college of the prophets, and belonged to the prophetic order; but this was not always the case. In the instance of that prophet, whose exception to the rule are both manifested. When Amaziah, the idolatrous Israelitish priest, threatens the prophet and desires him to "flee away into the land of Judah, and there eat bread and prophesy there, but not to prophesy again any more in Bethel," it was not a prophet, neither was it a prophet's son; but it was a herdsman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit: and the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and the Lord said unto me, Go prophesy unto my people Israel" (Amos vii, 14). That is, though called to the prophetic office, he did not belong to the order, and had not been trained in the prophetical colleges; and this he indicated, was an unusual occurrence (see J. Smith On Prophecy, ch. ix.).

1. In a general way, we may indicate that the sphere of action of the prophets was absolutely limited to Israel, and there is only one case of a prophet going to the heathen to preach among them—that of Jonah sent to Nineveh. He goes, however, to Nineveh to shame the Hebrews by the reception which he meets with there, and acting upon his own nation was thus even in this case the prophet's ultimate object. Many predictions of the Old Test. concern, indeed, the events of foreign nations, but they are always uttered and written with reference to Israel, and the prophets thought not of publishing them among the heathens themselves. The conversion of the pagans to the worship of the true God was indeed a favorite idea of the prophets; but the Divine Spirit told them that it was not to be effected by their exertions, as it was connected with extensive future changes, which they might not forestall. That the Lord would send such prophets was promised to the people by Moses, under a special law (Deut. xviii, 1) securing to the authority and office of ordinary servants and teachers, God appointed the priests: the characteristic mark which distinguished the prophets from them was inspiration; and this explains the circumstance that, in times of great moral and religious corruption, when the ordinary means no longer sufficed to reclaim the people, the number of prophets increased. The regular religious instruction of the people was no part of the business of the prophets: their proper duty was only to rouse and excite. The contrary—viz. that a part of the regular duty of the prophets was to instruct the people—is often argued from 2 Kings iv, 23, where it is said that the Shunammite on the sabbaths and days of new moon used to go to the prophet Elisha; but this passage applies only to the kingdom of Israel, and admits of no inference with respect to the kingdom of Judah. As regards the latter, there is no proof that prophets held meetings for instruction and edification on sacred days. Their position was here quite different from that of the prophets in the kingdom of Israel. The agency of the prophets in the kingdom of Judah was mainly to be found in their relations to the people as active agents in the establishment and maintenance of the kingdom. They were not the ordinary servants of the king, but the members of the royal household. The priestly order, which was the peculiar glory of the kingdom of Israel, had no existence in the kingdom of Judah. The office of the prophet in the former was a distinct and special rank in the kingdom; he was an office full of weight and authority, and enjoyed great privileges. The kingdom of Judah was the subject of the prophet's office, and the prophet was the instrument of the divine mind to maintain and establish the kingdom. The prophet was the representative of the divine will, and the means by which God intended to preserve the kingdom of Judah. The prophet was the mediator between God and the people, and the instrument by which God intended to communicate his will to the people. The prophet was the founder of the kingdom, and the instrument by which God intended to establish the kingdom. The prophet was the protector of the kingdom, and the instrument by which God intended to preserve the kingdom. The prophet was the promoter of the kingdom, and the instrument by which God intended to advance the kingdom. The prophet was the reformer of the kingdom, and the instrument by which God intended to reform the kingdom. The prophet was the legislator of the kingdom, and the instrument by which God intended to establish the law. The prophet was the counselor of the kingdom, and the instrument by which God intended to guide the kingdom. The prophet was the Helmsman of the kingdom, and the instrument by which God intended to steer the kingdom. The prophet was the watchman of the kingdom, and the instrument by which God intended to preserve the kingdom from the encroachments of its foes. The prophet was the advocate of the kingdom, and the instrument by which God intended to vindicate the kingdom. The prophet was the prophet of the kingdom, and the instrument by which God intended to establish the kingdom. See King, Prophecy, Prophecy, Prophets, Prophets, Sons of.
to which it refers, from which it derives its sanction, and with which it is fully impressed and sanctified. There is no chapter in the prophets in which there are not several references to the law. The business of the prophets was to explain it, to lay it to the hearts of the people, and to make its vital spirit live in the hearts of the people. It was, indeed, also their duty to point to future reforms, when the ever-living spirit of the law would break its hitherto imperfect form, and make for itself another: thus Jeremiah (iii, 16) foretells days when the ark of the covenant shall be no more, and (xxvi, 31) days when a new covenant will be made with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah. But for their own times they never once dreamed of altering any, even the minutest and least essential precept, even as to its form; how much less as to its spirit, which even the Lord himself declares (Matt. v, 18) to be immutable and eternal! The passages which some interpreters have alleged as opposed to sacrifices as instituted by the Mosaic law have been misunderstood; they do not denounce sacrifices generally, but only those of the Canaanites, with whom sacrifice was not even a form of true worship, but opposed to the genuine and spiritual service of God.

2. More specifically, the sixteen prophets whose books are in the Canon have that place of honor because they were endowed with the prophetic gift as well as ordinariness (so far as we know) belonging to the prophetic office. There are hundreds of prophecies contemporaneous with each of these sixteen prophets; and no doubt numberless compositions in sacred poetry and numberless moral exhortations were issued from the several schools, but only sixteen books find their place in the Canon. Why is this? Because these sixteen had what their brother collegians had not—the divine call to the office of prophet, and the divine illumination to enlighten them. It was not sufficient to have been taught and trained in preparation for a future call. Teaching and training served as a preparation only, when the schools were over, then the instrument of power, whose work was done, Moses had an external call at the burning bush (Exod. iii, 2). The Lord called Samuel, so that Eli perceived, and Samuel learned, that it was the Lord who called him (1 Sam. iii, 10). Isaiah (vi, 8), Jeremiah (i, 5), Ezekiel (ii, 4), Amos (vii, 15), declare their special mission. Nor was it sufficient for this call to have been made once for all. Each prophetic utterance is the result of a communication of the divine to the human spirit, received either by what we call inspiration, or by the word of the Lord (Deut. xi, 1). (See Aida to Faith, essay iii. "On Prophecy.") What, then, are the characteristics of the sixteen prophets thus called and commissioned, and inwrought with the messages of God to his people?

(1.) They were the national poets of Judaea. We have said, that poetry, chants and hymns, were a main part of the studies of the class from which, generally speaking, they were derived. As is natural, we find not only the songs previously specified, but the rest of their compositions, poetical, or breathing the spirit of poetry. Bishop Lowth ("Sacred Poetry," Lect. xxi). The book of Isaiah poetical, a few passages excepted, which, if brought together, would not at most exceed the bulk of five or six chapters, "half of the book of Jeremiah," "the greater part of Ezekiel." The rest of the prophets are mainly poetical, but Haggai is "epigram," and Jonah and Daniel are plain prose ("Sacred Poetry," Lect. xxi). The prophetical style different from that of books properly called poetical, whose sublimity it all but outvies, only in being less restrained by those external forms which distinguish poetical language from prose, and is more frequenting than prose does play upon words and thoughts. This peculiarity may be explained by the practical tendency of prophetical addresses, which avoid all that is unintelligible, and studiously introduce what is best calculated for the moment to strike the hearers. The same appears from many other circumstances, e.g. the union of music with prophecying, the demeanor of Saul when among the prophets (1 Sam. x, 5), Balaam's description of himself (Num. xxiv, 8) as a man whose eyes were opened, who saw the vision of the Almighty, and heard the words of God, the established phraseology to denote the inspired prophet, the writing of the word of the Lord was "written upon him" (Ezek. iii, 14; comp. Isa. viii, 11; 2 Kings iii, 15), etc. (See vi, below.)

(3.) They were preachers of patriotism; their patriots being founded on the religious motive. To the subject of the theocracy, the enemy of his nation was the enemy of God, the traitor to the public weal was a traitor to his God; a denunciation of an enemy was a denunciation of a representative of evil; an exhortation in behalf of Jerusalem was an exhortation in behalf of God's kingdom on earth, "the city of our God, the mountain of holiness, beautiful for situations, the joy of the whole earth, the city of the great King" (Psa. xxiv, iii, 5).

(4.) They were preachers of morals and of spiritual religion. The symbolical teaching of the law had lost much of its effect. Instead of learning the necessity of purity by the legal washings, the majority came to rest in the outward act as in itself sufficient. It was also, as in the case of the law, to look up before the eyes of their countrymen a high and pure morality, not veiled in symbols and acts, but such as none could profess to misunderstand. Thus, in his first chapter, Isaiah contrasts ceremonial observances with spiritual moralities: "Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth: they are a trouble unto me: I am weary to bear them ... Wash ye, make ye clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek judgment; relieve the opprobred, stablish the afflicted; judge the fatherless, plead for the widow" (Isa. i, 14—17). He proceeds to denounce God's judgments on the oppression and covetousness of the rulers, the pride of the women (ch. iii), on grasping, profligacy, iniquity, injustice (ch. v), and so on throughout. The system of morals put forward by the prophets, if not higher or sterner or purer than that of the law, is more plainly declared, and with greater, because now more needed, vehemence of diction. "Magna fides et grandia audacia prophetarum," says St. Jerome (In Ezra). This was their general characteristic, but that gifts and graces might be discerned is proved by the cases of Balaam, Jonah, Canticles, and the disobedient prophet of Judah.

(5.) They were extraordinary, but yet authenticated, exponents of the law. As an instance of this we may take Isaiah's description of a true fast (lxxvii, 7—7); Ezekiel's explanation of the sins of the father being visited on the children (ch. xviii); Micaiah's preference of "doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with God," to "thousands of rams and ten thousands of rivers of oil" (vi, 6—8). In these, as in other similar cases (comp. Num. xix, 19), it was the task of the prophets to restore the balance which had been overthrown by the Jews and their teachers dwelling on one side or on the outer covering of a truth or of a duty, and leaving the other side or the inner meaning out of sight.

(7.) They were a political power in the state. Strong in the safeguard of their religious character, they were able to serve as a counterpoise to the royal authority when wielded even by an Abah.

(8.) They had something more than national poets and annalists, preachers of patriotism, moral teachers, exponents of the law, pastors, and politicans. We have not yet touched upon their most essential characteristic, which is that they were instruments of revealing God's will to man; as in other ways, so specially, by predicting future events, and, in parcicular, by foretelling the incarnation of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the redemption effected by him. There are two chief ways of exhibiting this fact—one is suitable when discoursing with Christians, the other when arguing with unbelievers. To show that the truth of the New Testament and the truthfulness of its authors, and of the Lord himself, are bound up with the truth of the existence of this predictive element in the propheta. To the unbeliever it is necessary to show that facts have verified their predictions.

(a) In Matthew's Gospel, the first chapter, we find a quotation from the prophet Isaiah, "Behold a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel;" and, at the same time, we find a statement that the birth of Christ took place as it did "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet," in those words (i, 22, 23). This means that the prophecy was the declaration of God's purpose, and that the circumstances of the birth of Christ were the fulfillment of that purpose. Then, either the predictive element exists in the book of the prophet Isaiah, or the authority of the evangelist Matthew must be given up. The same evangelist testifies to the same prophecy having "spoken of" John the Baptist (iii, 3) in words which he quotes from Isaiah xxvi, (i, 13, 14). Jesus came and dwelt in Capernaum "that other words "spoken by" the same prophet (ix, 1) "might be fulfilled." He says (viii, 17) that Jesus did certain acts "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet" (Isa. iii, 4). He says (xii, 17) that Jesus acted in a particular manner "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet" in words quoted from xiii, 1. Then, if we believe Matthew, we must believe that in the pages of the prophet Isaiah there was predicted that which Jesus some seven hundred years afterwards fulfilled. The prophecy cannot be escaped by pressing the words τα προφητείας, for if they do not mean that certain things were done in order that the divine predetermination might be accomplished, which predetermination was already declared by the prophet, they must mean that Jesus Christ knowingly moulded his acts so as to be in accordance with what was said in an ancient book which in reality had no reference to him, a thing which is entirely at variance with the character drawn of him by Matthew, and which would make him a conscious impostor, insincerely predicting as to the prophecies. Further, it would imply (as in Matt. i, 22) that God himself contrived certain events (as those connected with the birth of Christ), not in order that they might be in accordance with his will, but in order that they might be agreeable to the declarations of the ancient book—than which nothing could well be more absurd.

But, further, we have not only the evidence of the evangelist; we have the evidence of the Lord himself. He declares (Matt. xiii, 4) that in the Jews of his age "is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith—" (Isa. vi, 9). He quotes (Mark ii, 7), "Esaias well prophesied of them" (Isa. xix, 18). Then, if we believe our Lord's sayings and the record of them, we must believe in prediction as existing in the prophet Isaiah. This prophet, who was cited between fifty and sixty times, may be taken as a sample; but the same argument might be brought forward with respect to Jeremiah (Matt. ii, 18; Heb. viii, 8), Daniel (Matt. xxiv, 15), Hosea (Matt. ii, 15; Rom. ix, 25), Joel (Acts ii, 17), Amos (Acts vii, 42; xvi, 10), Jonah (Matt. iv, 10), Micah (Matt. xiii, 7), Habakkuk (Acts xiii, 41). But this does not end our work of distinguishing the facts. The subject appears from Numb. xii, 6 sq., where Moses, who enjoyed divine inspiration in his highest grade, is represented as differing from those called prophets in a stricter sense, and as standing in contrast with them. Divine inspiration is given not only to the general body of the prophetic office, to which other elements must be added, especially the gift of that inspiration in a formal manner and for a specific purpose. This will become still more clear from the considerations adduced under the next heads.

IV. Test of the Prophetic Character. As Moses had foretold, a host of false prophets arose in later times among the people, who promised prosperity without repentance, and preached the Gospel without the law. The writings of the prophets are full of complaints of the mischief done by these impostors. Jeremiah significantly calls them "prophets of the deceit of their own heart"—i.e. men who followed the suggestions of their own fancy in prophesying (Jer. xxiii, 26; comp. ver. 16, and ch. xiv, 14). All their practices prove the great influence which true prophetism had acquired among the people of Israel. But how were the people to distinguish between the true and the false? This question is decided partly by positive or negative criteria, and partly by certain general marks.

1. In the law concerning prophets (Deut. xviii, 20; comp. xiii, 7-9) the following enactments are contained:

(1) The prophet who speaks in the name of another PROPHET

gods—i. e., professed to have his revelations from a god different from Jehovah—is to be considered as false, and to be punished capitally; and this even though his predictions should come to pass.

These enactments established a peculiar right of the prophets. He who prophesied in the name of the true God was, even when he foretold calamity, entitled to be treated as a prophet in this respect; and his failure of accomplishment. He might then be imprisoned, but could not be put to death, as instanced in Jeremiah (xxvi, 8-16), who is apprehended and arraigned, but acquitted: "Then, said the princes and the people unto the priests and the prophet. This man was not worthy to die, for he has spoken to us in the name of the Lord our God." Ahab is by false prophets encouraged to attack Ramoth-gilead, but Micahias prophesied him no good; on which the king becomes angry, and orders the prophet to be confined (1 Kings xxii, 1-27): "Take Micahias and put him in prison, and feed him with bread of affliction, and with water of affliction, until I come in peace." Micahias answers (ver. 28), "If thou return at all in peace, the Lord has not spoken by me." Until the safe return of the king, Micahias was put to prison; after that, he shall be put to death. The prophet agrees to it, and the king goes up to Ramoth-gilead, but is slain in the battle.

(3.) From the above two criteria of a true prophet flows the third, that his addresses must be in strict accordance with the laws. Whoe'er departs from it cannot be a true prophet, for it is impossible that the Lord should contradict himself.

(4.) In the above is also founded the fourth criterion, that a true prophet must not promise prosperity without repentance; and that he is a false prophet, "of the deceit of his heart," if he does not repose the sins of the people, and who does not inculcate on them the doctrines of divine justice and retribution.

2. In addition to these negative criteria there were positive ones to procure authority to true prophets. First of all, it must be assumed that the prophets themselves received, along with the divine revelations, assurance that these were really divine. Any true communion with the Holy Spirit affords the assurance of its divine nature, and the prophets could, therefore, satisfy themselves of their divine mission. There was nothing to make them feel in this respect that their gifts were bestowed on them with the gift of prophesying. Their own native disposition was often much averse to this calling, and could be only conquered by the Lord forcibly compelling them, as appears from Jer. xx, 7-9: "Since I spoke, the word of the Lord was made a reproach unto me, and a derision daily. Then I said, I will not make mention of him, nor speak any more in his name, but his word was in mine heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with bearing, and I could not stay." Now, when the prophets themselves were at once convinced of their divine mission, they could in various ways prove it to others whom they were called on to enlighten.

(1.) To those who had any sense of truth, the Spirit of God gave evidence that the prophecies were divinely inspired. This testimonium Spiritus Sancti is the chief argument for the reality of a divine revelation; and he who is susceptible of it does not, indeed, disregard the other proofs suitting the wants of unimproved minds, but lays less stress on them.

(5.) Part of the predictions of the prophets referred to proximate events, and their accomplishment was divine evidence of their divine origin. Whoever had been once favored with such a testimonial, his authority was established for his whole life, as instanced in Samuel. Of him it is said (1 Sam. iii, 19): "The Lord was with him, and did not withdraw his hand from him until he fulfilled them; and all Israel knew (from this) that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord." Of the divine mission of Isaiah no doubt could be entertained after, for instance, his prophecies of the overthrow of Sennacherib before Jerusalem had been fulfilled. The credentials of the divine mission of Ezekiel were certified when his prediction was accomplished, that Zedekiah should be brought to Babylon, but should not see it, for the king was made prisoner and blinded (Ezek. xii, 12, 18); they were further confirmed by the fulfillment of his prediction concerning the destruction of the city (ch. xxiv).

(6.) Sometimes the divine mission of the prophets was also proved by miracles; but this occurred only at important crises, when the existence of the kingdom of Israel was in jeopardy, as in the age of Elijah and Elisha. Miracles are mentioned as criteria of true prophets (Deut. xiii, 2), still with this caution that they should not be trusted alone, but that the people should inquire whether the negative criteria were extant.

(5.) Those prophets whose divine commission had been sufficiently proved bore testimony to the divine origin of their mission. It is one of the characteristics of the prophetic office that there was a certain gradation among the prophets; the principals of the colleges of prophets procured authority to the "sons" of prophets. Thus the deeds of Elijah and Elisha at the same time authenticated the hundreds of prophets whose superior they were. Concerning the relation of the true prophets to each other, the passage 2 Kings ii, 9 is remarkable: Elisha says to Elisha, "I pray thee, let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me." Here Elisha, as the first-born of Elijah in a spiritual sense, and standing to him in the same relation as Jesus to John, raised to Elisha one of his spiritual inheritance, alluding to the law concerning the hereditary right of the lawfully begotten first-born son (Deut. xxi, 17). This case supposes that other prophets also of the kingdom of Israel took portions of the fullness of the spirit of Elijah, and that, as already mentioned, it is plain, then, that only a few prophets stood in immediate communion with God, while that of the remaining was formed by mediation. The latter were spiritually incorporated in the former, and, on the ground of this relation, actions performed by Elisha, or through the instrumentality of one of his pupils, were at once ascribed to Elijah, e.g., the anointing of Hazael to be king over Syria (1 Kings xix, 15; comp. 2 Kings viii, 13); the anointing of Jehu to be king over Israel (1 Kings xix, 16; comp. 2 Kings ii, 1, 14); the writing of the letter to Joram, etc. Thus in a certain sense it may be affirmed that Elijah was in his time the only prophet of the kingdom of Israel. Similarly of Moses it is recorded, during his passage through the desert, that a portion of his spirit was conveyed to the seventy elders (Num. xii, 17). The history of the Christian Church itself offers analogies; look, e.g., at the relation of the second-class Reformers to Luther and Calvin.

(6.) It hardly needs to be mentioned that before a man could be a prophet he must be converted. This clearly appears in the case of Isaiah, "whose iniquity was taken away, and was pardoned," and who, in a religious sense, acted as a mediator between God and his people. The passage quoted from the covenant.
PROPHET

For a single momentary inspiration, however, the mere beginning of spiritual life sufficed, as instance in Balaam (Num. i, 10; xvi, 13).

3. As to prophecy in its circumscripted sense, or the foretelling of future events by the prophets, some expositors would explain all predictions of special events; while others assert that no prediction contains anything but general promises or threatenings, and that the prophets knew nothing of the particular manner in which their predictions might be realized. Both these classes deviate from the correct view of prophecy: the former often resort to the most arbitrary interpretations, and the latter are opposed by a mass of facts againing to a contrary view. It seems necessary to contend, e.g., when Ezekiel foretells (xii, 12) that Zedekiah would try to break through the walls of the city and to escape, but that he would be seized, blinded, and taken to Babylon. The frailty of the people, under the Old Test., required external evidence of the real connection of the prophets with God, and the predictions of particular forthcoming events were to them empyrean, signa.
These were the more indispensable to them, because the ancients generally, and the Orientals in particular, always had a tendency to the exploration of futurity, which tended to foster superstition and forward idolatry. All other methods of knowing future events by necromancy, conjuration, passing through the fire, etc., had been strictly forbidden (Deut. xviii, 10, 11), it might be expected that the deep-rooted craving for a knowledge of futurity could be gratified in some other and nobler manner. The success of a prophet depended on the gift of special knowledge of futurity; this, it is true, was granted comparatively to only few, but in the authority thus obtained all those abhored who were likewise invested with the prophetic character. It was the seal impressed on true prophecy, as opposed to false. From 1 Sam. ix, 6, it appears that, to incline unenlightened minds with the sense of divine truths, the prophets stopped occasionally to disclose things of common life, using this as the means to reach a higher mark. On the same footing with definite predictions stand miracles and tokens, which prophpects of the highest rank, as Elijah and Isaiah, volunteered or granted. These also were requisite to confirm the free will faith of the people; but Ewald justly remarks that with the true prophets they never appear as the chief point; they only assist and accompany prophecy, but are not its object, not the truth itself, which supercedes them as soon as it gains sufficient strength and influence.

Interpreters, misunderstanding passages like Jer. xviii, 8; xxvi, 13, have asserted, with Dr. Köster, (p. 226 sq.), that all prophecies were conditional; and have maintained that their revocability distinctvisted the true predictions (Weispora) from sooth-saying (Wohranung). But beyond all doubt, when the prophet denounced the divine judgments, he proceeds on the assumption that the people will not repent, an assumption which he knows from God to be true.
Were the people to repent, the prediction would fail; but because they will not, it is uttered absolutely. It does not follow from this, that the prophets knew nothing of repentance and exhortations are useless. These serve "for a witness against them;" and besides, amid the ruin of the mass, individuals might be saved. Viewing prophecies as conditional predictions nullifies them. The Mosaic criterion (Deut. xviii, 22), that he was a false prophet who predicted "things which followed not nor came to pass," would then be of no value, since recourse might always be had to the excuse that the case had been altered by the fulfillment of the condition. The fear of in-roducing fatalism, if the prophecies are not taken in a conditional sense, is not felt by the oriental, for his foreknowledge, does not establish fatalism, and from divine omniscience simply is the prescience of the prophets to be derived. The prophets feel themselves so closely united to God that the words of Jehovah are given as their own, and that to them is often ascribed what God does, as slaying and reviving (Hos. vi, 5), rooting out and rebuilding (Isa. i, 29; xlii, 7; Ezek. xxxii, 18; xxxiii, 3), which proves their own consciousness to have been entirely absorbed into that of God.

V. The Prophetical State of Inspiration. — We learn from Holy Scripture that it was by the agency of the Spirit of God that the prophets received the divine communication. Thus, on the appointment of the seventy elders, "The Lord said, I will take of the Spirit which is upon thee, and will put it upon them. . . . And the Lord . . . took of the Spirit that was upon him, and put it upon them . . . to the intent . . . to pass that when the Spirit rested upon them, they prophesied and did not cease. . . . And Moses said, Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them" (Numb. xi, 16, 29, 25). Here we see that what preceded the seventy prophesy was their being endowed with the Lord's Spirit by the Lord himself. So it is the Spirit of the Lord which made Saul (1 Sam. x, 6) and his counselors (xiv, 20) prophesy. Thus Peter assures us that "prophets previous to the old testament time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake, being moved d(4) by the Holy Ghost" (2 Pet. i, 21), while false prophets are described as those "who speak a vision of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord" (Jer. xxiii, 10), "who prophesy out of their own hearts, . . .
and who follow not the Spirit but the carnal mind" (Ezek. xiii, 8). Hence the emphatic declarations of the Great Prophet of the Church that he did not speak of himself (John vii, 17, etc.). The prophet held an intermediate position in communication between God and man. God communicated with him by his Spirit, and he, having received this communication, was "the spokesman" of God to man (comp. Exod. vii, 1, and iv, 16). But the means by which the Divine Spirit communicated with the human spirit, and the conditions of the human spirit under which the divine communications were received, have not been clearly defined to us. They are, however, indicated. On the occasion of the sedition of Miriam and Aaron, we read, "And the Lord said, Hear now my words: If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house: with him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches, and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold" (Numb. xii, 6-8). Here we have a clear division of those communications in which the revelations of God are made to man: 1. Direct declaration and manifestation — "I will speak mouth to mouth, apparently, and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold;" 2. Vision; 3. Dream. It is indicated that, at least at this time, the vision and the dream were the special means of conveying a revelation to a prophet, while the higher form of direct declaration and manifestation was reserved for the more highly favored Moses. Joel's prophecy appears to make the same division, "Your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions," putting the two methods in which the promise, "your sons and your daughters shall prophesy," is to be carried out (ii, 28).
Of Daniel we are told that "he had understanding in all visions and dreams" (Dan. i, 17). Can these phases of the prophetic state be distinguished from each other?
and in what sense do they consist?

According to the theory of Philo and the Alexandrian school, the prophet was in a state of entire unconsciousness at the time that he was under the influence of divine inspiration, "for the human understanding," says Philo, "is enveloped and swallowed up in the Spirit, and on the removal of the latter again returns to its home, for the mortal must not dwell with the immortal" (Quis Rev. Div. Hist. i, 511). Balaam is described by him as an unconscionable instrument through whom God spoke (De Vind Mosia, lib. i, vol. ii, p. 124). Josephus makes Balaam excuse himself to Balak on the same principle: "When the Spirit of God seizeth us, it uttereth whatsoever sound and words it pleases, without any guidance out of which we would arrange into us, there is nothing in us which remains our own" (Ant. iv, 6, 5). This theory identifies Jewish prophecy in all essential points with the heathen maieutic, or divination, as distinct from propheta, or interpretation. Montanism adopted the same view: "Defiluminus, causa non prophetarum, gratia est dexteram, id est amenitatem, convenire." In spiritu enim homo constitutus, praeceter illum gloriare Dei convicti, vel cum per ipsum Deus loquitur, necesse est excitat sensu, obumbraturn nollecit virtute divina; de quo inter nos et Psychicos (catholicos) (in veste est) (Tertullian. Aen. Marcion, iv, 29). According to the belief, then, of the heathen, of the Alexandrian Jews, and of the Montanists, the vision of the prophet was seen while he was in a state of ecstatic unconsciousness, and the enunciation of the vision was made by him in the same state. The fathers of the Church opposed the Montanist theory with great unani- mity. In Eugubinus's History (v, 17) we read that Miltiades wrote a book Proi tov μη δινος προφητην in icaetatit aiavita. St. Jerome writes: "Non loquitur prophetas in icaetas, ut Montanos et Frisica Maximalius, quia spiritusque prophetarum et liber est visio et visiones intelligens universa quia loquitur" (Prolog. in Nahuam). Again: "Nec vero ut Montanos cum insanias feminas somniat, prophetae in ecstazi locuti sunt nec exserein quid loquenterum, ut cum aliqui eruditi ipsi ignorantem quid dicerent" (Prolog. in Ezek.). Origin (Conf. Col- um, vii, 4) and St. Basil (Commentary on Isaiah, Pro- rem, c. 5) contrast the prophet with the soothsayer, on the ground of the latter being deprived of his senses. St. Chrysostom draws out the contrast: Τοῦτο γὰρ μάντως θέω, τὸ ξενάγητα, τὸ ἀνάγγελυ υπομνῄ- σται, τὸ γὰρ συνιστᾶναι τὰ κατάπασας, καὶ τις δὲ φτιαγεῖται, φωνὰς ἀνάκτο καὶ φοί- τα της ἀληθεῖας κατεδίδεται γνῶρις τῶν μάντων καὶ τῶν προφητῶν (Hom. viii in Epist. ad Corinth.). At the same time, while drawing the distinction sharply between heathen soothsaying and Montanist prophesying on the one side, and Hebrew prophecy on the other, the fathers use expressions so strong as almost to represent the latter not necessarily inspired on by the Power of God. Thus it is that they describe them as musical instruments—the pipe (Athenagoras, Leg. pro Christianis, c xx; Clem. ALEX. Cohort. ad Gent. c i, il.; the lyre (Justin Martyr, Cohort. ad Graec. c viii; Epiphanius Rhet. Heteroclit. xxxii; Chrys. Hom. Apol. Antioch. ii, 61.); the harp (St. Greg. Magn. Prof. in Mor. in Job). Expressions such as these (many of which are quoted by Dr. Lee, On Inspiration, Appendix G) must be set against the passages which were directed against the Montanists. Nevertheless, there is a very appreciable, difference between the view that and that of Tertullian and Philo. Which is most in accordance with the indications of Holy Scripture?

It does not seem possible to draw any very precise distinction between the prophetic "dream" and the prophetic "vision." In the case of Abraham (Gen. xv, 1) and of Daniel (Dan. vii, 1), they seem to melt into each other. In both the external senses are at rest, reflection is quiescent, and intuition energizes. The action of the ordinary faculties is suspended in the one case by natural, in the other by supernatural or extraordinary causal agencies, the "state into which the prophet was occasionally, at least, thrown by the ecstasy, or vision, or trance, is described poetically in the book of Job (iv. 13-16, xxxiii, 16), and more plainly in the book of Daniel. In the case of Daniel, the "vision" is described by its accom- panying terror (vii, 17, 8). Then he is raised up- right (vii, 18) on his hands and knees, and then on his feet (x, 10, 11). He then receives the divine revelation (vii, 19, x, 12). After this he falls to the ground in a swoon (x, 15, 17); he is faint, sick, and astounded (vii, 27). Here, then, is an instance of the ecstatic state; nor must we doubt that he did not find it in the New Testament accompanied by such vio- lent effects upon the body. At the Transfiguration, the disciples fell on their face, being overpowered by the divine glory, and were restored, like Daniel, by the touch of Jesus' hand. Peter fell into a trance (torre- ncia) before he received his vision, instructing him as to the admission of the Gentiles (Acts x, 10; xi, 5). Paul was in a trance (in icaetas) when he was commanded to devote himself to the conversion of the Gentiles (xxii, 17), and when he was caught up into the third heaven (2 Cor. xii, 1). John was probably in the same state (in iveauet) when he received the message to the seven churches (Rev. i, 10). The prophetic trance, then, must be acknowledged as a scriptural account of the state in which the prophets and other inspired per- sons, sometimes, at least, received their revelations. It would seem, in particular cases, to have been of the following nature: (1) The bodily senses were closed to external objects in deep sleep; (2) The reflective and discursive faculty was still and inactive; (3) The spiritual faculty (sou) was awakened to the highest state of energy; (4) The phenomena of which we are described by the prophets as "seen" or "heard" by them, for the spiritual faculty energizes by immediate perception on the part of the inward sense, not by in- ference and thought. Thus Isaiah "saw the Lord sitting" (Isa. vi, 1). Zecharias "laid up his eyes and saw" (Zech. ii, 1); "the word of the Lord which Micah saw" (Mic. i, 1); "the wonder which Habakkuk did see" (Hab. i, 1). "Peter saw heaven opened and there came a voice to him" (Acts x, 11). Paul was "in a trance, and saw him speaking" (xxii, 19). John "behold, I saw seven golden candlesticks" (Rev. i, 12). Hence it is, too, that the prophets' visions are not connected and fragmentary, inasmuch as they are not the subject of the reflective, but of the percep- tive faculty. They described what they saw and heard, not what they had themselves thought out and systematized. Hence, too, succession in time is disregarded or unnoticed. The subjects of the vision being, to the prophetic's sight, in juxtaposition or enfolding each other, some in the foreground, some in the background, are not necessarily "seen" by the prophet; in this, too, the imagery with which the prophetic writings are colored, and the dramatic cast in which they are moulded; these peculiarities resulting, as we have already said, in a necessary obscurity and difficulty of interpre- tation. But though it must be allowed that Scripture lan- guage seems to point out the state of dream and of trance, or ecstasy, as a condition in which the human instrument occasionally received the divine com- munications, it does not follow that all the prophetic revelations were thus made. We must acknowledge the state of trance in such passages as Isa. vi (called ordinarily the vision of Isaiah), as Ezek. i (called the vision of Ezekiel), as Dan. vii, viii, x, xi, xii (called the visions of Daniel), as Zech. i, iv, v, vi (called the visions of Zecharias), as Acts x (called the vision of St. Peter), as 2 Cor. xii (called the vision of St. Paul), and similar instances, which are indicated by the language used. But it does not seem true to say, with Hengstenberg, that "the difference between these prophecies and the rest is a vanishing one, and if we but possess the power and the ability to look into them, the marks of the vision may be discerned" (Christology, i, 417). This view is advocated also by Veltheim (De Opificio Rerum Futurorum Descriptione), Jahn (Eiselsl. in die gotthlichen Bücher des A. B.), Tholuck (Die Propheten und ihre Wirken, ii, 68), and others, who call these "vocations" or "visions" (2 Cor. xii, 1). In the books of Moses "speaking mouth to mouth" is contrasted with visions and dreams" (Numb. xii. 8). It is true that in this last-quoted passage "visions and dreams" alone appear to be attributed to the prophet, while "speaking mouth to mouth" is reserved for Moses. But when Moses was dead, the cause of this difference would cease. During the era of prophecy there were none numerically. In the present day, when the Holy Ghost see us, we may suppose, communicate more openly than the prophets. We should expect, then, that they would be the recipients, not only of visions in the state of dream or ecstasy, but also of the direct revelations which are called speaking mouth to mouth. The greater part of the divine communications we may suppose to have been thus made to the prophets in their waking and ordinary state, while the visions were exhibited to them either in the state of sleep or in the state of ecstasy. "The more ordinary mode through which the word of the Lord, as far as we can trace, came, was through a divine impulse given to the prophet's own thoughts" (Stanley, p. 420).

Hence it follows that, while the fathers in their opposition to Montanism and mania were pushed somewhat too far in their denial of the ecstatical state, they were yet under which the greater part of the prophetic revelations were received and promulgated. No truer description has been given of them than that of Hippolytus and that of St. Basil: "Оς γὰρ εἰ ἰδία δυνάμεις φαίνονται, οὐδὲ ἢπειρα ἢπειρα ταῦτα ἐπηφανεύονται ἢπειρα πρὸς ἑαυτούς ἔχουσαν ὅσδικα, ἐνταξεὶ ἐν ἐπαράμεναι προδέχοντο τὰ μὴ καταλαβόντα εἰς τὰ παντα ἢπειρα τὰς ἐπηφανείας τὰς πρὸς ἑαυτούς τὰς ἡμῶν." (St. Basil, De Antichristo, c. ii). With preservation of a καλοῦντα καὶ ἀκούειν ἕκαστο ἣπειρα ἀκούειν τὰς ἢπειρας τῆς ἡμῶν, τὰς ἡμῶν ἐπηφανείας τὰς "ὑπερήφανες τῆς ἡμῶν" to speak the word of God in a manner of time, as was prescribed to them, was not inherent in the divine inspiration generally; and some of the latter times, which the angel in the latter part of the prophecy of Hosea (xvi. 1) is to be interpreted. However, we may well believe, understood in his own words no more than a reference to the historical fact that the children of Israel came out of Egypt. But Hosea was not the author of the prophecy—he was the instrument by which it was promulgated. The Holy Spirit intended something further, and what this something was he informs us by the evangelist Matthew (Matt. ii. 15). The two facts of the Israelites being led out of Egypt and of Christ's return from Egypt appear to Prof. Jowett so distinct that the reference by Matthew to the prophet Hosea is understandable, and does not constitute a mistake on the part of the evangelist (see Jowett, Essay on the Interpretation of Scripture). A deeper insight into Scripture shows that "the Jewish people themselves, their history, their ritual, their government, all present one grand prophecy of the future Redeemer" (Lec, p. 107). Consequently "Israel" is one of the forms naturally taken in the prophetic vision by the idea "Messian." It does not follow from the above, however, that the prophets had no intelligent comprehension of their ordinary significations. These, so far as at least the primary reference is concerned, were mere symbols to their own mind, although the future and full significance was of necessity dim and imperfectly apprehended. Time, in the order of providence, is God's own best exponent of prophecy.

While the prophets were under the influence of inspiration, the scenery might produce deep, absorbing, or elevated emotion, which would sometimes greatly affect their physical system (Gen. xv. 12; Numm. xxiv. 16; Dan. x. 8; Ezek. i. 28; Rev. i. 17). Still they had an intelligent consciousness of what they were describing; they recognized their divinity, but they did not utter frantc ravings like the prophets of Beal. Undoubtedly, as the prophecies are a revelation from God, the prophets well understood, at least in a general way, the predictions they uttered; but they did not necessarily testify or know anything respecting the time.

when the events predicted should happen (Dan. xii. 8, 9; 1 Pet. i. 10-12). Occasionally even this was revealed to the prophet (Zech. xi). The symbols which were often exhibited to the prophets described as they came before them in succession, and in some instances they were subsequently favored with a more full and particular explanation of the scenery which passed before them (Ezek. xxxvi. xi). Though the prophetic office was a dignified one, it needed not, and should not, be supposed that at all times and on all occasions the prophets spoke and acted under the special aid and guidance of the Holy Spirit. So much was not true of even the apostles of Christ. It is enough that at all due propriety of circumstances, they were specially guided and aided by the Spirit of God. Nor is it necessary to assume that all the prophets were endowed with miraculous powers. Such was not the case even with Christian prophets (1 Cor. xii. 10). See INSPIRATION.

VI. Form and Peculiarities of the Prophetic Utterances.—1. Verbal Modes of Delivery.—Usually the prophets promulgated their visions and announcements in public places before the congregated people. Still some portions of the prophetic books, as the entire second and third books, and the description of new world people (Ezek. xl-xlviii), probably were never communicated orally. In other cases the prophetic addresses first delivered orally were next, when committed to writing, revised and improved. Especially the books of Hosea and Habakkuk contain, for the apocryphal parts, not of separate predictions, independent of each other, but form, as they now are, a whole—that is, they give the quintessence of the prophet's labors of their authors. In this case it is certain that the authors themselves caused the collection to be made. But it is so likewise in some cases where their books really consist of single declarations, and in others it is at least highly probable. Further particulars concerning the manner in which prophetic rolls were collected and published we have only respecting Jeremiah, who, being in prison, called Baruch "to write from his mouth his predictions, and to read them in the ears of the people" (Jer. xxxviii. 4-14).

There is evidence that the later prophets sedulously read the writings of the earlier, and that a prophetic canon existed before the present was formed. The predictions of Jeremiah throughout rest on the writings of earlier prophets, as Isaiah had established in his Jeremias Librorum Sacrorum Interpretationes (Vindobonae, 1837). Zechariah explicitly alludes to writings of former prophets; "to the words which the Lord has spoken to earlier prophets, when Jerusalem was inhabited in its first glory." (Zech. viii. 14).

In all probability we have complete those predictions which were committed to writing; at least the proofs which Ewald gives (p. 43 sqq.) for his opinion, of prophecies having been lost, do not stand trial. The words "as the Lord hath said," in Joel ii, 32, refer to the predictions of Joel himself. In Isa. ii and Mic. iv nothing is introduced from a lost prophetic roll, but Isaiah borrows from Micah. Hosea alludes (viii, 12), not to some unknown work, but to the Pentateuch. In Isa. xcv and xvi the prophet repeats, not another's prediction, but his own, previously delivered, to which he adds a supplement. Obadiah and Jeremiah do not avail themselves of the written address of a former prophet, but Jeremiah makes the prophecy of Obadiah the groundwork of his own. The opinion that in Isa. lvi, 10; lvi, 11, there was inserted, uncentered, a long remnant of an older roll is founded on erroneous views respecting the time of its composition. The same holds good of Isa. xxiv, where Ewald would find remnants of several older rolls. The very circumstance that in the prophets there nowhere occurs a tenable ground for maintaining that they referred to rolls lost and unknown to us, but that they often allude to writings which we know and possess, clearly proves that there is no reason for supposing, with Ewald, that a great number of prophetic compositions have been lost, "and that of a large tree, only a few blossoms have reached our time." In consequence of the prophets being conscious of the dispensations of God, much care was bestowed on the preservation of their publications. Ewald himself cannot refrain from observing (p. 56), "We have in Jer. xxvi, 1-19 a clear proof of the exact knowledge which the better classes of the people had of all that had, a hundred years before, happened to a prophet—of his words, misfortunes, and accidents."

2. Symbolic Actions.—In the midst of the prophetic declarations symbolic actions are often mentioned which the prophets had to perform. The opinions of interpreters of these actions, they were carried out by the prophets themselves, that they always, at least generally, were really done; others assert that they had existence only in the mind of the prophets, and formed part of their visions. See HOSEA.

Another symbolic action of Jeremiah prefigures the people's destruction. He says (xiii, 1-10) he had been by the Lord directed to get a linen girdle, to put it on his loin, to undertake a long tour to the Euphrates, and to hide the girdle there in a hole of the rock. He does so, returns, and after many days the Lord again orders him to take the girdle from the place where it was hidden, and wither it nothing. In predicting the destruction of Babylon and a general war (xxvi, 12-38), he receives from the Lord a wine-cup, to cause a number of kings of various nations, among whom the sword would be sent, to drink to destruction. He says (xiii, 4) with this cup to the kings of Egypt, Arabia, Persia, Media, and many other countries. When the prophet Ezekiel receives his commission and instructions to prophesy against the rebellious people of Israel, a roll of a book is presented to him, which he eats by the direction of the Lord (Ezek. ii. 3). He next ordered to lie before the city of Jerusalem on his left side three hundred and ninety days; and when he had accomplished them, on his right side forty days. He must not turn from one side to the other, and he is ordered to bake with dung of man the bread which he eats during this time (iv. 4, 4, 12). Isaiah is ordered to walk naked and barefoot, for a sign upon Egypt and Ethiopia (Isa. xx, 2, 3). But, however we may understand these directions, we cannot refer all symbolic actions to internal intuition at least, of a false prophet we have a sure example of an extraordinarily performed symbolic action (1 Kings xxii, 11), and the false prophets always aped the true ones (comp. Jer. xix, 1 sqq.). These undoubted instances of a literal action warrant the presumption that in the other cases likewise there was a spatial fact as the basis of a spiritual symbolism. See VISION.

In the case of visions the scenery preceded or came after the mind, something like a panoramic view of a landscape, gradually unfolding; in symbolic imagery, forms of glory or of gloom; accompanied with actions of a corresponding character, not uncommonly exhibiting, as in actual occurrence, the future and distant events. The prophets occasionally beheld themselves as actors in the symbolic scenery. In the visionary pageant many objects would appear to be grouped, or lying near together, which were in fact separated by considerable intervals of time; so that it is not to be expected that the prophets would describe what they saw in their connections and relations. See SYMBOL.

3. Prophetic Style and Diction.—The idea of prophecy as anticipated history has given rise to many erroneous views of prophetic language. No prophecy can be rightly interpreted which does not illustrate the name of God in the elements of his character, the principles of his government, his purposes of mercy and judgment towards men. The human race presents the only proper object of more or less limited Jehovah's judgments; and blessings are announced upon states and kingdoms, to have respect upon the territory rather than the inhabitants to merge the spiritual in the natural. The promises which are associated with Mount Zion, and the threatenings uttered against Edom, belong not to the locality, but to the people, and to all who imitate the Edomites in their policy.

The mission of the prophets was the religious education of the Jewish people. They were raised up, according to the exigencies of the times, to preserve them from error, and to prepare their minds for the future development of the kingdom of God. Their object was twofold—to maintain the Church in due allegiance to prescribed rites, institutions, ordinances, and yet to prepare the people for a further manifestation of the blessings of the new covenant. By their writings they designed to impart to future ages an explanation of the vast events of the present order which they lived, and to confirm the divine origin and authority of the new order of things. The prophetic style and diction exactly accord with this view of their design. This will account for the various hues of light and shade which streak the scroll of prophecy.

If the future course of events had been clearly marked out and formally laid down, all motives to present duty would have been oblitered; no room would have been left for the exercise of faith, of hope, of fear, and love; all thoughts, all feelings, all desires, would have been anesthetized, and the prophecies would have been analogous to the dreams of a dreamer. But enough is revealed to support faith and animate hope. The remoter future is seen afar off in promises indistinct yet glorious. Confidence is bespoken for these distant predictions, by the clear and precise terms which portray some nearer event, fulfilled in that generation as a sign and token that all shall be accomplished in its season. Heathen divination, when it refers to any event which is near at hand, uses language remarkable for its ambiguity, but speaks distinctly of those matters which are reserved for the distant future. Those who spake in the name of Jehovah pursue the directly opposite course. Their language is much more express, distinct, and clear when they speak of events in the nearer future than in describing what shall take place in the latter days. Prophecy of this nature would not raise its voice at all times, lest that voice from its familiarity should be unheeded; but at every critical and eventful period prophecy led them on—"a pillar of cloud in the brighter daylight of their purer and better times; a pillar of fire gleaming in the darker night of their calamity or sin" (Dean Magee).

(1) The future is described in terms of the past. The known is made use of to give shape and form to the unknown. We have a striking instance of this in Hos. (vii, 13; ix, 5): that is, the Assyrians shall return to Egypt. The old state of bondage and oppression should come back upon them. The covenant whereby it was promised that the people should not return was virtually cancelled. They had made themselves as the heathen; they should be in the condition of the heathen. For in Hos. x, 5 we read: "He shall not return into the land of Egypt, but the Assyrian shall be his king; because they refused to return." They would not have God for their king; therefore the Assyrian should be their king, and a worse captivity than that of Egypt should befall them. In accordance with this, the teachers of false doctrine and the abettors of corruption in the Asiatic churches are spoken of as a re-suscitation of Jezebel and Balaam (Rev. xi, 14, 20).

(2) Prophecy made great use of the present, and especially of the standpoint and personal circumstances of the agent, to illustrate the future. Ezekiel describes the coming glory of the Church under the gorgeous and elaborate description of a temple. All the images in the nine concluding chapters are taken from this one analogy. Ezekiel gives his own life up like the prophet's sentiment with the significant hint, "The name of the city from that day shall be, The Lord is there." The Apocalyptic seer, living when the Temple was laid waste, and all its rites and institutions were superseded, describes the prophet of the new Jerusalem as if it seemed to be directly contradictory (Rev. xxi, 22), "I saw no temple therein;" but in entire harmony with Ezek. xlviii, 35, the Spirit testifies, "The Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it." Both Ezekiel and John speak of the same glorious future in language and imagery perfectly natural and appropriate in the times and circumstances in which they were placed.

(3) Frequentially the prophetic style received its complexion and coloring from the diversified circumstances of the parties addressed, as well as from the standpoint of the prophet. This is peculiarly the case with the language of Daniel, which presents such an approximation to the style of history that some have rashly assigned his writings to a date long posterior to the captivity of Babylon. The specific form which a portion of his prophecies assumes may be accounted for by considering the scene and the condition of the people on resuming their residence in Judaea; the anomalous and shattered condition of the theocratic constitution when the ark of the covenant, the Urim and Thummim, the kingly rule and government, were gone, when the visible state of the kingdom, as the formal order remained. This is the time selected for setting forth the external aspect of God's kingdom to one who w as well conversant with political revolutions, who stood at the centre of the world's power and glory when earthly monarchies began to aspire after universal dominion. The visions granted to Daniel (vii, 17), though plain to us who read them after the event, were far from being clear to himself or to others (vii, 27; xii, 4, 8, 9). In the symbols he employs we have a reflection of his own peculiar position and political experience; and in the detailed exhibition of the coming future, in the explicit predictions of the changes and vicissitudes which were at hand, the children of faith felt that the God of their fathers was still in the midst of them. Prophecy is always a revelation of specific events, when the events spoken of are to be fulfilled in the immediate future. The picture presented to the Church was minutely portrayed in a historical dress whenever the hope of the faithful required special and immediate support. (See § viii, below.)

(4.) The divine impulse under which the prophets spoke, though it was supernatural, acted in harmony with personal characteristics and native susceptibilities. The supernatural ever bases itself upon the natural. Constitutional tendencies are moulded by the plastic influence of divine grace, but are never entirely obliterated. The prophets never lost personal consciousness, or any characteristic of light and feeling, even when they were raised into an ecstasial condition. Extraordinary impressions of divine light and influence affected the rational as well as the imaginative power. The false lights which pretended to prophecy were impressions of the imagination, the imagination itself, "whose conceptions ran only in a secular channel, as the sect of diviners, enchanters, dreamers, and soothsayers" (J. Smith). The lowest degree of prophecy is when the imaginative power is most predominant, and the scene becomes too turbulent for the rational faculty to discern clearly the mystical sense. The highest is where all imagination ceases—as with Moses, "whom God knew face to face"—where truth is revealed to the reason and understanding.

(5.) The poetical element of prophecy arises from the ecstasial condition of the constitutional tendencies. But as the primary aim of the religious teachers of the Hebrews was to influence the heart and conscience, the poetical element, though never entirely suppressed, was held in restraint, to further the higher ends of spiritual instruction. Hence, as Ewald remarks, "Prophehtical discourse has a form and impress of its own, too elevated to sink to simple prose, too practical in its aim to assume the highest form of poetry." Of the two ideas involved in rules, the poetical ruled the poetical. The poetical element of the prophecy is to be thus expressed: as the prophet's aim was to work upon others in the most direct and impressive manner, he was at liberty to adopt any form or method of representation; but as the immediate aim of the poet is to satisfy himself and the requirements of his art, he cannot vary his definite manner, and change his mode of address at pleasure, in order to work upon others. The poetical elevation appears most vividly in the idealistic and imaginative form, when the patriarchal hearts of the Jewish nation, their sacred formulae, Jerusalem, their religious and political centre, are addressed as living personalities present to the mind and eye of the prophet. A vivid instance of this personification occurs in Jer. xxxii, 13. Rachel weeping for her children, refusing to be comforted. It was at Ramah that the Chaldean conqueror assembled the last bands of captives (xl, 1): the prospect of perpetual exile lay before them. On their departure the last hope of Israel's existence seemed to expire. In the bold freedom of Eastern imagery, the ancestral mother of the tribe is converted into a wondering maiden, and the second as raising a loud wall of distress. This scene was substantially repeated in the massacre at Bethlehem. The cruel Edomite who then held the government of Judaea aimed what was meant to be a fatal blow against the real hope of Israel. "Though it was but a handful of children that actually perished, yet as among these the Child of Peace was slain, so it well seemed as if all were lost" (Fairbairn). See Prophecy.

VII. Interpretation of Predictions. In addition to the hints given above and below, we have here only space for a few rules, deduced from the account which we have given of the nature of prophecy. They are, (1.) Interpose distances of time according as history may show them to be necessary with respect to the past, or inference may show them to be likely in respect to the future, because, as we have seen, the prophetic visions are abstracted from relations in time. (2.) Distinguish clearly between the prophet's promises to the Church (which represents the idea of the removal of all obstacles from before God's people in the form of the Lord's destroying the tongue of the Egyptian sea, and smiting the river into seven streams). (3.) Distinguish in like manner figure from what is represented by it, e. g., the reference previous to that quoted do not understand literally "They shall fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines" (ver. 14). (4.) Make allowance for the imagery of the prophetic visions, and for the poetical diction in which they are expressed. (5.) In respect to things past, interpret according to the apparent meaning, checked by reference to events; in respect to things future, interpret by the apparent meaning, checked by reference to the analogy of the faith. (6.) Interpret according to the principle which may be deduced from the examples of various prophecies, both of the Old and New Testament, the principle which may be deduced from the examples of prophecies interpreted in the New Testament. See Interpretation.

VIII. Use of Prophecy. Predictions are at once a part and an evidence of faith: at the time that they are delivered, and until their fulfilment, a part after they have been fulfilled, an evidence. An apostle (2 Pet. i, 19) describes prophecy as "a light shining in a dark place," or "a taper glimmering where there is nothing to reflect its rays," that is, throwing some light, but only a feeble light as compared with what is shed from the Gospel history. To this light, feeble as it is, "you do well," says the apostle, "to take heed." And he warns them not to be offended at the feebleness of the light, because it is of the nature of prophecy until its fulfilment (in the apocalyptic predictions of which he is speaking, described as "until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts") to shed only a feeble light. Nay, he continues, even the prophecies are not to be limited to a single and narrow interpretation, "for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." This is in entire keeping with the above views (§ vii) of the character of the prophetic utterances, and was the use of prophecy it, e. g., its influence—to act as a feeble light in the midst of darkness, which it did not displace, but through which it threw its rays in such a way as to enable a true-hearted believer to direct his steps and guide his anticipations (comp. Acts xxii, 27). But after fulfilment, Peter says, "the use of prophecy" becomes "more sure" than it was before, that is, it is no longer merely a feeble light to guide, but it is a firm ground of confidence, and, combined with the apostolic testimony, serves as a trustworthy evidence of the faith; so trustworthy that even after he and his brother apostles are dead, those whom he addressed will feel secure that "they had not followed cunningly devised fables," but the truth.

As an evidence, fulfilled prophecy is as satisfactory as anything can be, for who can know the future except the wise diviner? And from whom can one prediction except from him who knows the future? After all that has been said and unsaid, prophecy and miracles, each resting on their own evidence, must always be the chief and direct evidences of the truth of the divine character of a religion. Where they exist, a divine power is proved. Nevertheless, they should never be rested on alone, but in combination with the general character of the whole scheme to which they bear witness, its moralities, its sublimities, its condescensions, its miracles, its moralities, and its adaptation to human needs, are the chief evidences of Christianity. None of these must be taken separately. The fact of their conspiring together is the strongest evidence of all. That one fact with which these evidences are delivered is to serve in an after-age as an evidence on which faith may reasonably rest is stated by our Lord himself: "And now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass, ye might believe" (John xiv, 29).

See PROPHET.

As prophecy came for many parts and in many modes (Heb. i, 1), we need not be surprised to find a relative disregard of time in its announcements. The seers beheld things to come as much as we look upon a starry sky. To the natural eye all the orbs that bespeak the firmament seem to be at the same distance from the earth. Though the monarchies of Daniel are successive, yet in a certain way they are described as co-existent; for it is only on the establishment of the last that they seem to disappear. As the precise time of individual events is not revealed, the accuracy of the representation is rather in space than in time; the whole appears foreshortened; perspective is regarded rather than actual distance; as a common observer would describe the stars, grouping them as they appear, and not according to their true positions. Prof. Payne Smith well observes, "The prophets are called seers, and their writings visions. They describe events passing before their mental eye as simple facts, without the idea of time. A picture may represent the past, the present, or the future; this we may know from its accessories. But an eye cannot reproduce to the mind an event without seeing corruption (Ps. xvi). In Ps. lxxix, the sons of Korah and Solomon describe his peaceful reign. Between Solomon and Hezekiah intervened some 200 years, during which the voice of prophecy was silent. The Messianic conception entertained at this time by the Jews might have been that of a King of the royal house of David who would arise, and gather under his peaceful sceptre his own people and strangers. Sufficient allusion to his prophetic and priestly offices had been made to create thoughtful consideration, but not in the letter of the system of him in these characters. It was reserved for the prophets to bring out these features more distinctly.

The sixteen prophets may be divided into four groups: the Prophets of the Northern Kingdom—Hosea, Amos, Joel, Jonah; the Prophets of the Southern Kingdom—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Obadiah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah; the Prophets of the Captivity—Ezekiel and Daniel; the Prophets of the Return—Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. In this great period of prophethood there is no longer any chronological development of Messianic prophecy, as there was before the end of Solomon. Each prophet adds a feature, one more, another less clearly: combine the features, and we have the portrait; but it does not grow gradually and perceptibly under the hands of the several artists. Here, therefore, the task of tracing the chronological progress of the revelation of the Messiah comes to an end: its culminating point is found in the prophecy contained in Isa. lii. 18-15, and liii. We here read that there should be a Servant of God, lowly and despised, full of grief and despising, suffering, oppressed as a malefactor, and put to death. But his sufferings, it is said, are not for his own sake, for he had never been guilty of fraud or violence; they are spontaneously taken, patiently borne, vicarious in their character; and, by God's appointment, they have an atoning, reconciling, and justifying efficacy. The result of his sacrificial offering is to be his exaltation and triumph. By the path of humiliation and expiatory suffering, he is to reach that state of glory foreshown by David and Solomon. The prophetic character of the Messiah is drawn out by Isaiah in other parts of the book, as the Heb. has. By the time of Hezekiah therefore (for Hengstenberg, Christology, vol. ii, has satisfactorily disproved the theory of a Deutero-Isaiah of the days of the captivity) the portrait of the David-Servant—once King, Priest, Prophet, and Redeemer—was drawn in all its essential features. soundly discussed by Hengstenberg, Christology of the Old Testament, in T. T. Clark's transl. (Edinb., 1854). Other German works of importance on the subject are those of Umbrecht, Die Propheten des A. Test. (in the Supplementa Patristica, vol. ii., 1858, p. 104 to 114, 1859); and H. Tholuck, Die Propheten und ihre Weissagungen (1868); transl. in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1883, p. 361 sq.

The subject is likewise discussed more or less fully in all the introductions (s. v.) to the Old Test. See also Bibl. E. H. D. (Index, s. v.). One of the latest and most specious productions is that of Prof. Kuenen (of the University of Leyden), The Prophets and Prophecy in Israel (transl. by Milroy, Lond., 1877, 8vo); it reiterates with ingenious array all the difficulties, contradictions, and failures alleged by hostile writers, and refuted or explained again and again by orthodox scholars. Propheta (προφητας), prophēta, progýrate, Exod. xvi, 20; Luke i, 36). Among the remarkable women who appear to have exercised the gift of prophecy, we find Miriam (Exod. xv, 20); Deborah; Hannah (1 Sam. ii, 1); Huldah (2 Kings xxii, 14); the wife of Isaiah (Isa. viii, 3); Anna (Luke ii, 36); and the four daughters of Philip (Acta xx, 8, 9). Miriam, Deborah, Huldah, and others were called prophetesses, not because they were supposed to be gifted with a knowledge of futurity, like the seers, but because they possessed a poetical inspiration; and inspired (especially sacred) poetry was always deemed of supernatural and divine origin. See Prophecy.

Prophecy, False. As Moses had foretold, a host of false prophets arose in later times among the Hebrews, who promised prosperity without repentance, and predicted after "the deceit of their own hearts" (Deut. xiii, 1-5; Jer. xiv, 14-16; xxxii, 9-27). According to Deut. xxi, 20-22, a false prophet was punished capitually, being stoned to death. There were two cases in which a person was held convicted of this crime, and consequently liable to its punishment: 1. If a prophet spoke in the name of Jehovah, he was tolerated, so long as he remained unconvicted of imposture, even though he threatened calamity to the state. He might be im-

The kingdom of Israel for a century and a half to the hundred prophet of Baal at a time (1 Kings xiv, 21). It was in still later times false prophets, uttering the suggestions of their own imagination, abounded in the Church, and did much mischief (Matt. vii, 15; xxix, 11; Mark xii, 27; Luke xvi, 2); 2 Pet. ii, 1; 1 John iv, 1). See Mis-

Prophets, Major and Minor. We have in the Old Testament the writings of sixteen prophets: that is, of four greater and twelve lesser prophets. The four greater prophets are Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel. The Jews do not properly place Daniel among the prophets, because (they say) he lived in the splendor of temporal dignities, and led a kind of life different from other prophets. The twelve lesser prophets are Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malach. The collectors of the canon arranged the prophets chronologically, but considered the whole of the twelve lesser prophet books as one unity, in which Hosea placed after Jeremiah and Ezekiel, inasmuch as the last three lesser prophets lived later than they. Daniel, as above observed, was placed in the Hagiographies, because he had not filled the prophetic office. The collection of the lesser prophets themselves again intended to be chronologically disposed; still Hosea is on account of the extent of his work, allowed precedence before those lesser prophets who, generally, were his contemporaries, and also before those who flourished at a somewhat earlier period. It is the opinion of Hengstenberg (Christology, iv, 239) and Maurer, The Prophets, pt. i, introd.) that the writings of the Minor Prophets are actually placed chronologically. Accordingly, the first arranges the list of the prophets as follows: Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Isaiah (the principal prophetic figure of the first or Assyrian period of canonical prophethood), Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, "the principal prophetic figure in the second or Babylonian period of canonical prophethood"), Ezekiel, Daniel, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. Calmet (Dict. Bibl. s. v. "Prophet") as follows: Hosea, Amos, Isaiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Obadiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Haggai, Malachi, Zechariah, Malachi. Stanley (Lect. xix.) in the following order: Joel, Jonah, Hosea, Amos, Isaiah, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Obadiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Haggai, Malachi, Zechariah, Malachi. Hence it appears that Stanley recognises two Isaiahs and two Zechariahs, unless "the author of Isa. xi-lxvi is regarded as the older Isaiah transported into a style and position later than his own time" (p. 428). Obadiah is generally considered to have lived at a later date than is compatible with a chronological arrangement of the canon, in consequence of his reference to the capture of Jerusalem. But such an inference is not necessary, for the prophet might have thrown himself in imagination forward to the date of his prophecy (Hengstenberg), or the words which, as translated by the A. V., are a remembrance as to the past, may be really but an imperative as to the future (Pusey). For the various questions relating to each person and book, see the several names in their alphabetical places. See also Bibl. E. H. D. getical helps on the prophets in general: Jerome, Commentarii (in Opp. vol. v. ed. Basili); Abrahanel, הגדת (written in 1497, and frequently printed and translated in various forms and portions); Kimchi, David (first printed in the Rabbinical Bible, Ven. 1548, fol.); (Exo-erally chose the prophets whom he inspired out of these schools. Amos, therefore, speaks of it as an extraordinary case that though he was not one of the sons of the prophets, a herdsman, "yet the Lord took him as he followed the flock, and said unto him, Go, prophesy unto My people Israel." This was very unusual for some of these schools, or at least for their tutors, to be endued with a prophetic spirit, appears from the relation of the prophecies concerning the ascents of Elijah, delivered to Elisba by the sons of the prophet, both at Jericho and at Bethel (I Kings ii. 3, 5). PROPHETS, SONS OF THE. The disciples, or scholars, of the prophets were thus called, agreeably to the Hebrew idiom; they were instructed in the knowledge of religion and in sacred music, and were thus qualified to become public teachers (1 Sam. x. 11). See Prophets.

Propitiation. The Greek word ἀναπτυγμός (ἀναπτυγματικός), rendered propitiation (Rom. iii. 25; I John ii. 4, 10 and mercy seat (Heb. ix. 5), is used in the Septuagint as the translation of the Hebrew word מְכַס, i.e. covering, properly the lid or cover of the ark of the covenant in the most holy place, which was overlaid with pure gold, over which the cherubim stretched out their wings, and where Jehovah communed with the Lord Yahweh (Exod. xxxii. 34). It is ordinarily supposed (not with no good reason) that it is of these tombs our Lord speaks when he says: "Woe unto you! for ye build the sepulchres of the prophets, and your fathers killed them" (Luke xi. 47). PROPITIATORY SACRIFICES Propitiatory Sacrifices include both trespass-offering and sin-offering. See Sacrifice. In this place we are to examine the disputed question what the Israelites held before them as their object in offering their beasts of sacrifice; that is, whether they wished merely to offer a gift to the offended Deity (Velser, p. 296); or (as Mennonites, Mos., and Rhein. Prec., p. 446) it was considered as a municipal penalty, a kind of fine; or, finally, as a substitute for the sinners presenting it, who had themselves properly deserved death. The last is the view of many rabbins (see Outram, De Sacrific. p. 251 sq.) and Church fathers (Theodor, Quast. 61 ad Exod.; Euseb. Deor. Ev. i, 10, etc.,) and lately of Baur (Theol. d. N. T. iv, 124 sq.), De Wette (Bibl. Theol. p. 98 sq.; comp. Opusc. p. 23 sq.; Genesius (Zu Is. ii, 189), Heugstenberg (Theol. i, 265), Scholl (in ib. Stud. etc. v, ii, 146 sq.), and Tholuck (2. Hist. d. Brief., a. d. Hebr. p. 78 sq.; comp. Col's Bible, Theol. i, 270 sq., for many others). This meaning of the sin-offerings seems at first view the most natural, significant, and most accordant with ancient testimonies. Yet Klaiber (Studien der Wissenschaft. Gesell. VIII, ii, 10 sq.) has recently combated both and has offered several objections to it. Many other interpretations, some very monstrous, but offered with philosophical pretension, are referred to by Scholl (op. cit. p. 153 sq.) Early opposition to the usual view is found in Levy, iv, 20, "And the priest shall make an atonement for them, and it shall be forgiven them," repeated in xxvi, 5, 10, or that in Lev. v, 10, "And the priest shall make an atonement for his sin that he hath sinned in one of these, and it shall be forgiven him," or the similar words in the 18th verse, do not make it certain that a substitution is to be thought of in the case of the sin-offering. The laying of the hand on the animal, too, though on the day of atonement (Lev. xvi, 21) it certainly implies the laying of guilt upon it, does not in general determine this point, since it was also customary in other sacrifices. Further, that the sin-offering was considered unclear, which would only be possible in case the uncleaness of the sin sinner passed upon the sacrifice in the act of the atonement, is not to be inferred from Exod. xxix, 14; Lev. xvi, 28, etc. (as Klaiber has well shown), but would seem to contradict Lev. iv, 12; vi, 27 (see below). On the other hand, (1.) Lev. xvii, 11, unless it be interpreted in a very forced sense, can scarcely be understood to mean anything else than that the life of the sacrifice, which is in the blood, and is poured out with the blood, was offered instead of the life of him who presented it. It is not necessary to lay stress upon the rendering of הָעִם (kippėr, to expiate, to atone); but the parallelism between the נֶפֶשׁ or "life of the flesh" and the נֶפֶשׁ or soul for which it is given as an atonement is certainly not without force. (2.) The sprinkling of the blood of the sin-offering shows that the mere death of the sacrifice, and the burning of pieces of its flesh on the altar, were not the object here as in other sacrifices. What other meaning could the sprinkling have then but that in the blood the life is poured out and scattered, and thereby destroyed? The pouring-out of the blood was not in this case, as elsewhere, merely a means of killing the animal, but was the real object in view. But it could only be an object when the sprinkling of the blood symbolizes the institution of the sacrifice for the offerer, who has forfeited his life by sin. (3.) The idea that one man could suffer as a substitute for another (and hence, according to the Israelitish view, even be punished by God in his stead) is not only expressed by 2 Sam. xii, 15 sq.; xxiv, 10 sq.; Isa. iii, 4 (see Prov. xxvi, 18), but the representation is transmitted of guilt appears in Deut. xxiv, especially verse 8; in the symbolic meaning of the covenant-sacrifice (Jer. xxxix, 18 sq.; comp. Gen. xv, 17), and in the ritual service with the scapegoat (Lev. xvi, 21). See especially also Isa. xlix, 3, where, too, the word הָעִם (kippër, ransoms), so common where the sin-offerings are mentioned, is used. (Klaiber is right in saying that הָעִם, kippër, from הָעִם, kuphar, properly means corder; and hence points out the removal of guilt, without detriment to the method. Yet it is indubitable that this word kippër (covering over), elsewhere only used in the sense of expiation, is used here when the subject is penal substitution. Was it so easy and natural for the Israelites to view expiation as an act of substitution? Nor must we omit to remark that הָעִם (chittith [Gen. xxxi, 39], meaning properly to alone for) is used for making compensation, and Klaiber's explanation of the passage is awkward. (4.) There can be no doubt that the representation of expiatory substitution by sacrifices was prominent among other ancient nations (Herod. ii, 39; Cass. Sol. Gal. vii, 16; Ovid, Fast. vi, 180; Porphyry, Aeliax, iv, 10). The remnants of the sin-offerings were accounted uncleans, seems to have no great weight, since the eating of pieces of flesh from most of sin-offerings might be urged for the contrary view; and certainly that idea did not appear in the case of the trespass-offerings (see Bahr, op. cit. p. 388 sq.). On the offering of men for propitiation, in case of public misfortune (2 Kings iii, 37) among the Greeks, comp. Schoel. in Aristoph. Plat. 454; Wachsmuth, Heil. Aelther. ii, 530 sq. The self-offerings of the Romans are not at all belonging here. The children of Saul (2 Sam. xxii, 6 sq., comp. Lament. Die Sühnepf. der Griechen und Römer [Würzburg, 1841]). (5.) Lastly, a circumstance which speaks strongly for the common explanation of these sin-offerings is that all others which have been suggested are far less natural, simple, and appropriate. We need not refer especially to the homely interpretation of Michaelis. The idea that blood passed for the principle of sensuality, and hence of sin, that thus the shedding of blood became the symbol of the putting-away of sin, does not appear in the Old Test., nor, indeed, in the New. Steidel's supposition is that the gracious acceptance by God of the offering of reconciliation was the essential element, and that the various forms of sacrifice were only intended to impress on the mind the abominable nature of sin and to lead to a true repentance; but this view strangely barren. Klaiber supposes that clean animals without blemish were to awaken in the worshipper the sense of the law's requirement from him and of his imperfection. But this leaves out of sight all the peculiar forms appropriated to the sin-offering, and dwells on a simple circumstance which was common to all the other sacrifices, and not even confined to sacrifices. It is impossible to sacrifice the common view, which is quite satisfactory, in favor of such schemes as these. The interpretation of Menken has been sufficiently answered by Bahr (op. cit. p. 292 sq.). See Propitiation.

Propositiones Damnatiæ is, in theological language, every thesis which contains either a dogmatical assertion or one intimately related to dogma, in the form of an authoritative reprobation, supported by the usual arguments founded by Scripture, the dogmas of the Church, etc. The doctrinal opinions of those who diverge in any way from the belief of the Romish Church are also called propositions, and the de-proceeds of divergence is indicated by corresponding qualifications. If the authorities of the Church (general councils, or the pope himself) positively reject those propositions, they are condemned propositions, i.e., pro-positiones damnatae. The doctrines expounded, especially in writings, can be rejected summarily (in globo) without previous examination of each single proposition. In the latter case each condemned proposition is described by an adjective, which indicates its relation to the belief of the Church: heretical, heretical, erroneous, false, blasphemy, dangerous, immoral, etc. Such sentences have been pronounced against the Reformation, among others, against the works of Luther, M. Bajus, Ozenius, Hus, etc. See HERESY; INDEX EXCOMMUNICATUS.

Proctors are assistants of proctors (q. v.).

Procorit, a Slavic deity, was represented with four heads on a common trunk. He carried a fifth head on his chest, and held in such a way that his eyes could see through the intervals of the fingers. Many explanations of this extraordinary figure have been proposed, and all is by, or contrasted with the spirit of the Slavic religious; all these surmises are based on the similitude of the image with that of Janus quadridorsa.

Proser is the service-book containing the form of the prose (q. v.).

Prosal or Prosal (προσαλ) is the name of a legal enactment instituted by Hillel I, or the Great (q. v.). Whether the word is equivalent to the Greek προσάλος or προσαλoς, or, as Sache prefers, προσάλ or προσαλo, which latter is preferred by Jost and Grätz, cannot be decided. The reason for this curious legal provision, which, though contrary to the law of Moses, was necessitated by the time, and on the whole a very wholesome one, was that because, according to the law (Deut. xxvi), the claiming of debts was unlawful during the Sabbath year, the rich would not lend to the poor during that year, which seriously impeded commercial and social intercourse. Hillel found that under these circumstances the warning contained in Deut. xvi, 9 was disregarded, and in order to do away with this evil he introduced the prosal or prosal, i.e., a declaration made before the court of justice at the time of lending not to remit the debt in the Sabbath year. The formula of this legal declaration was as follows:

Προσαλος ε ἡμιδυναμηδων λεγοντες λειτονας ἀλληλοι—i. e., "A B deliver to you, the judges of the district C, the declaration that I may call in at any time I like all debts due to me," and it was signed either by the judges or witnesses. Prose (Lat. Pros), the French name for the Sequence. (1.) The prayer sung in the Mass after the Gloria and before the Gospel on great festivals. It required the license of the bishop or the superior of a monastery before it could be used. (2) A canticle in which no metre is defined. An expression, in loose measure, of the principal circumstances of a festival to be added to the psalm or adapted to its notes. St. Cosmasius of Arles required the laity in the diocese to sing prose and antiphons in church.—Some in Greek and some in Latin—aloud like the clergy, in order to introduce among the people a love of psalmody and hymns. These compositions, called prose, are in rhyme, but ignore the law of measure and quantity established by the ancient Greeks and Roman. At a time after the Gradual or Introits, they were likewise called Seguato (q. v.). The use of prosing began near the close of the 9th century. Notker, abbot of St. Gall, cir. 880, composed and favored the use of prose, but certainly did not invent them. He says that he found one in an antiphon book of Benedictine Abbey near Rome, which had been burned by the Normans in 841. Pope Nicholas first authorized their use. Proses in the Middle Ages were written in the vulgar tongue for the edification of the people. These prose, having become exceedingly numerous, and in some places even ridiculous, were retemned by the Council of Cologne in 1536, and of Rheims in 1564. The four prose used since the time of Pius V are Victima Paschali Laudes, for Easter; Fili Creator Spiritus, appointed by pope Innocent III, at White Monday; Ascensio Simi Balsulorum, for Corpus Christi, 1264, written either by Gratian or St. Thomas Aquinas; and Dies Irae, Dies Illa, used in the commemorations of the dead, and attributed to Thomas de Celano, or Salerno, a Franciscan, cir. 1230, cardinal Ursin (who died 1294), cardinal D'Aquaporta (who died 1309), and Humbert, general of the Dominican (who died 1277), Augustus Buzenelius, or Bonaventura. The Stobat Mater Dolores, written by pope Innocent III, or Giacomo da Toda, a Minorite, in the 14th century, is a prose. Possibly the chants used by St. Althelm, bishop of Sherborne, sitting on the bridge of Malmsbury, to win the attention of the pasers-by, were of the nature of prose. In the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries rhythmical chants were sung at the end of a banquet which the pope gave to his clergy. At Aem, Lyons, Paris, and Rouen prose were in fretent use (unlike the Roman custom), but they were mere rhapsodies, as we have in one instance preserved to us "Alle—nec et perenne celeste—lucia." After the prose, the Mass-book is removed from the Epistle to the Gospel side, to represent the translation of authority from the Aaronsiah to the apostolic priesthood.—Walcott, Sacred Archology, s. v.; Barney, Hist. of Music, s. v.

Proseleyt (προσεληνός, one who has joined a new faith) occurs only in the A. V. of the New Test. (Matt. xxii, 15; Acts ii, 10; vi, 5; xiii, 43); but the Greek word is occasionally used in the Sept. (1 Chron. xxii, 22, etc.) as a rendering of the Heb. "y. gérer (a stronger, as usually rendered; sometimes Grecoised in the Sept., ἠσσαραγ [Exod. ii, 19] from the Aramaic form נסהרג). (The following article is substantially based upon Leyrer's treatment of the subject in Herzog's Real-Enzyklopädie, with additions from other sources.) See ALLIN.

1. Historical Development of this Class.—The existcence, through all the stages of the history of the Israelites, of a body of men, not of the same race, but holding the same faith and adopting the same ritual, is a fact which, from its very nature, requires to be dealt with historically. 1. During the Patriarchal Age.—The position of the family of Israel as a distinct nation, with a special relig-ous character, appears at a very early period to have exercised a power of attraction over neighboring races. The slaves and soldiers of the tribe of which Abraham was the head (Gen. xvii, 27), who were included with him in the covenant of Sinai, perhaps were classed as proseleutes in the later sense. The case of the Shechemites, however (ch. xxxiv), presents a more distinct instance. The converts were awayed partly by passion, partly by interest. The sons of Jacob then, as afterwards, required circumcision as an indispensable condition (xxxiv, 14). This, and apparently this only, was required of proselytes in the pre-Mosaic period.
PROSELYTE

3. From the Exodus to the Monarchy.—The life of Israel under the law, from the very first, presupposes and provides for the incorporation of men of other races. The "mixed multitude" of Exod. xii, 38 implies the presence of proselytes more or less complete. It is recognized in the earliest rules for the celebration of the Passover (xii, 19). The "stranger" of this and other laws in the A. V. answers to the word which distinctly means "proselyte," and is so translated in the Sept., and the prominence of the class may be estimated by the frequency with which the word recurs: nine times in Exodus, twenty in Leviticus, eleven in Numbers, nineteen in Deuteronomy. The laws clearly point to the position of a convert. The "stranger" is bound by the law of the Sabbath (xx, 10; xxiii, 12; Deut, v, 14). Circumcision is the condition of any fellowship with him (Exod. xii, 46; Num. ix, 14). He is to be present at the Passover (Exod. xii, 11), the Feast of Weeks (Deut. xvi, 11), the Feast of Tabernacles (ver. 14), the Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi, 29). The laws of prohibited marriages (xviii, 26) and abstinence from blood (xvii, 10) are binding upon him. He is liable to the same punishment for Moloch-worship (xx, 2) and for blasphemy (xxi, 16), may claim the same right of asylum as the Israelites in the cities of refuge (Num. xxxvi, 16; Josh. xx, 9). On the other side he is subjected to some drawbacks. He cannot hold land (Lev. xix, 10). He has no jas consabili with the descendants of Aaron (xxi, 14). His condition is assumed to be, for the most part, one of poverty (xxiii, 22), often of servitude (Deut. xxvi, 11). For this reason he is placed under the special protection of the law (x, 18). He is to share in the right of gleani (Lev. xix, 10), is placed in the same category as the fatherless and the widows (Deut. xxiv, 17, 19; xxvi, 12; xxvii, 19), is joined with the Levite as entitled to the tithe of every third year's produce (xv, 29; xxvi, 12). Among the proselytes of this period the Kenites (q. v.), who under Hobab accompanied the Israelites in their wanderings, and ultimately settled in Canaan, were probably the most conspicuous (Judg. i, 16). The presence of the class was recognized in the solemn declaration of blessings and curses from Ebal and Gerizim (Josh. viii, 59).

The mention of the conquest of Canaan was not favorable to the admission of proselytes. The people had no strong faith, no commanding position. The Gibeonites (ch. ix) furnish the only instance of a conversion, and their condition is rather that of slaves compelled to conform than that of free proselytes. See Note at v, 1.

3. The Period of the Monarchy.—With the introduction of royalty, and the consequent fame and influence of the people, there was more to attract strangers from the neighboring nations, and we meet accordingly with many names which appear, still in the presence of another race conforming to the faith of Israel. Dagon the Edomite (1 Sam. xxi, 7). Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam. xi, 9). Araham the Jebusite (xxiv, 29). Zelek the Ammonite (xxiii, 87). Ithnah the Moabit (1 Chron. xi, 46)—these being in spirit of an express law to the contrary (Deut. xxiii, 3)—and at a later period Shelshua the scribe (probably; comp. Alexander on Isa. xxii, 15), and Ebed-Melech the Ethiopian (Jer. xxxviii, 7), are examples that such proselytes might rise even to high offices about the person of the king. The Cherethites and Pelethites (q. v.) constitute probably the possession of foreigners who had been attracted to the service of David, and were content for it to absorb the religion of their master (Ewald, Gesch. i, 330; iii, 183). The vision in Psa. lxxxvii of a time in which men of Tyre, Egypt, Ethiopia, and Cush rose to the great cities of the earth, registers among the citizens of Zion, can hardly fail to have had its starting-point in some admission of proselytes within the memory of the writer (Ewald and De Wette, ad loc.). A convert of another kind, the type, as it has been thought, of the later proselytes of the gate (see below), is found in Naaman the Syrian (2 Kings v, 15, 18) recognizing Jehovah as the Lord; but not binding himself to any rigorous observance of the law.

The position of the proselytes during this period appears to have undergone considerable changes. On the one hand, men rose, as we have seen, to power and fortune. The case for which the law provided (Lev. xxv, 47) might actually occur, and they might be the creditors of Israelites as debtors, the masters of Israelites as slaves. It might well be a sign of the times in the later days of the monarchy that they became "very high," the "head" and not the "tail" of the people (Deut. xxviii, 43, 44). The picture had, however, another side. They were treated by David and Solomon as a subject class, brought (like Perioci, almost like Helots) under a system of compulsory labor from which others were exempted (1 Chron. xxii, 2; 2 Chron. ii, 17, 18). The statistics of this period, taken probably as the measure of a purpose, give their number (i.e. apparently the number of adult working males) at 153,600 (ibid.). They were subject at other times to wanton insolence and outrage (Psa. xxvi, 6). As some compensation for their sufferings they became the special objects of the care and sympathy of the fathers of the family, who claim the "goodly fellowship" pleads the cause of the proselytes as warmly as that of the widow and the fatherless (Jer. vii, 6; xxiii, 3; Ezek. xxiii, 7, 29; Zech. vii, 10; Mal. iii, 5). A large accession of converts enters into all their hopes of the divine kingdom (Isa. ii, 2; xi, 15; xli, 8-6; Mic. iv, 1). The sympathy of one of them goes still further. He sees, in the far future, the vision of a time when the last remnant of inferiority shall be removed, and the proselytes, completely emancipated, shall be able to hold and inherit land even as the Israelites (Ezek. xxli, 29).

4. From the Babylonian Captivity to the Destruction of Jerusalem.—The proselytism of this period assumed a different character. It was for the most part the conformity, not of a subject race, but of willing adherents. Even as early as the return from Babylon we have traces of those who were drawn to a faith which they recognized as holier than their own, and had "separated themselves" unto the law of Jehovah (Neh. x, 29). The presence of many foreign names among the Nethinim (vii, 46-55) suggests that it is not to be believed that those who were called converts dedicated themselves specially to the service of the new Temple. With the conquests of Alexander, the wars between Egypt and Syria, the struggle under the Maccabees, the expansion of the Roman empire, the Jews became more widely known, and their power to proselytize increased. They had a strong religious devotion, and the spirit of martyrdom was followed naturally by propaganda. Their monotheism was rigid and unyielding. Scattered through the East and West, a miracle and a potent, won wonder at and admired, attracted by repelling, they presented, in an age of shattered creeds and corroding doubts, the spectacle of a faith, or at least a dogma, which remained unshaken. The influence was sometimes obtained well, and exercised for good. In most of the great cities of the empire there was kept a board of proselytes (in the place of the "sibyls") who had been rescued from idolatry and its attendant debasements, and brought under the power of a higher moral law. It is possible that in some cases the purity of Jewish life may have contributed to this result, and attracted men or women who shrank from the unutterable abhorrence of a mode of life to which they lived. The converts who were thus attracted joined, with varying strictness (see below), in the worship of the Jews. They were present in their synagogues (Acts xii, 42, 43, 50; xvii, 4; xvii, 7). They came up as pilgrims to the great cities, and not infrequently by itself the influence was often stronger and better. Even Roman centurions learned to love the conquered nation, built synagogues for them (Luke vii, 5), fasted and prayed, and gave alms, after the pattern of the strictest Jews (Acts x, 2, 30), and became preachers of the new faith to their countrymen (ver. 7). Such men, drawn by what was best in Judaism, were naturally among the readiest receivers of the new truth which rose out of it, and became in many cases the nucleus of a Gentile church.

Proselytism had, however, its darker side. The Jews of Palestine were eager to spread their faith by the same weapons as those with which they had defended it. Had not the power of the empire stood in the way, the religion of Moses, stripped of its higher elements, might have been propagated far and wide by force, as was afterwards the religion of Mohammed. As it was, the Idumeans had the alternative offered them by John Hyrcanus of death, exile, or circumcision (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 9, 3). The Idumeans were converted in the same way by Aristobulus (ibid. xiii, 11, 3). In the more frenzied fanaticism of a later period, the Jews under Josephus could hardly be restrained from seizing and circumcision two chiefs of Trachonitis who had come as envoys (Josephus, Life, 28). They compelled a Roman centurion, whom they had taken prisoner, to purchase his life by accepting the sign of the covenant (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 1, 11, 3). What was not in their power (the "velut Judaei, cogenum" of Horace, Sat. i, 4, 142, implies that they sometimes ventured on it even at Rome), they obtained their ends by the most unscrupulous fraud. They appeared as soothsayers, diviners, exorcists, and addressed themselves especially to the fears and superstitions of women. Their influence over these became the subject of indignant satire (Juvenal, Sat. vi, 543-547). They persuaded noble matrons to send money and purple to the Temple (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 3, 5). At Damascus the wives of nearly half the population were induced to sign contracts with Judaism (Josephus, War, ii, 10, 2). At Rome they numbered in their ranks, in the person of Poppea, even an imperial concubine (Josephus, Ant. xx, 7, 11). The converts thus made cast off all ties of kindred and affection (Tacitus, Hist. v, 9). Those who were most active in proselytizing were precisely those from whose teaching all that was most true and living had departed. The vices of the Jews were ingrained on the vices of the heathen. A repulsive casuistry released the convert from obligations which he had before recognized, while in his new creed he was afforded an unhealthy superstition. The Law of the Corban may serve as one instance (Matt. xv, 4-6). Another is found in the rabbinic teaching as to marriage. Circumcision, like a new birth, cancelled all previous relationships, and the converts, who were thus cut off from their former ties, were therefore no longer incestuous (Maimon. ex Jesh. p. 582; Selden, De Jure Nat. et Gent. ii, 4; Ussor Hebr. ii, 18). It was no wonder that the proselyte became "twillowed more the child of Gehenna" (Matt. xxiii, 15) than the Pharisaes themselves.

The position of such proselytes was indeed every way pitiable. At Rome, and in other large cities, they became the butts of popular scurrility. The words "curtus," "verpest," met them at every corner (Horace, Sat. i, 4, 142; Martial, vii, 29, 34, 61; xi, 53; xii, 37). They had to share the fortunes of the people with whom they had cast in their lot, might be banished from Italy (Acts xviii, 2; Suet. Claud. 25), or sent to die of malaria in the most unhealthy stations of the empire (Tactius, Ann. ii, 85). At a later time, they were branded as the profession of their conversion, and to pay a special tax (Sueton. Domit. xii). If they failed to do this and were suspected, they might be subject to the most degrading examination to ascertain the fact of their being proselytes (ibid.). Among the Jews themselves their case was not much better. For the details of the inscriptions of the Jewish sect of the "Jesus people" we are indebted even from those who gloried in having brought him over to their sect and party. The popular Jewish feel-converts, or, if with a specific meaning, were applied to the full proselytes of righteousness (comp. a full examination of the passages in question by N. Larrinher, On the Decree, pp. 583-584, etc.). The two tendencies were, at all events, at work, and the battle between them was renewed afterwards on holier ground and on a wider scale. Ananias and Eleazar were represented in the two parties of the Council of Jerusalem. The germ of truth had been quickened into a new livelihood and was emancipated from the old tradition. The decrees of the council were the solemn assertion of the principle that believers in Christ were to stand on the footing of proselytes of the gate, not of proselytes of righteousness. The teaching of St. Paul to righteousness and its conditions, its dependence on faith, its independence of circumcision, stands out in sharp, clear contrast with the teachers who taught that that rite was necessary for salvation, and confined the term "righteousness" to the circumcised convert.

5. From the Destruction of Jerusalem downwards. — The teachers who carried on the rabbinical succession consolled themselves, as they saw the new order waxing and their own glory waning, by developing the decaying system with an almost microscopic minuteness. They would at least transmit to future generations the full creed of their fathers. In proportion as they ceased to have any power to proselytize, they dwelt with exhaustive fulness on the question how proselytes were to be made. To this period accordingly belong the rules and decisions which are often carried back to an earlier age, and which may now be conveniently discussed. The precepts of the Talmud may indicate the practices and opinions of the Jews from the second to the fifth century. They are very untrustworthy as to any earlier time.

II. Debatable Questions. — The points of interest which present themselves for inquiry are the following: 1. The Classification of Proselytes. — The whole Jewish state was considered as composed of the two classes — Jews, and strangers within their gates, or proselytes. In later years this distinction was observed even to the second generation; a child of pure Jewish descent on both sides being designated Ἐκσπασός ἢ Ἐκσπασώμ. a "Hebrew of the Hebrews" (Phil. iii, 5), while the son of a proselyte was denominated Ἱππερο, "son of a stranger;" and if both parents were proselytes, he was styled by the rabbins ηυκρις, a contraction for Ἰουδαιος Ἱππερος (Firkke Abou, c. 5). Subordinate to this, however, was a division which has been in part anticipated, and was recognized by the Talmudic rabbins, but received its full expansion at the hands of Maimonides (Hic. i, 7). They defined for it a remote antiquity, a divine authority.

1. The term Proselytes of the Gate (ἡυκρις ήπειρος) was derived from the frequently occurring description in the law, "the stranger (ἡμῶν) that is within thy gates" (Exod. xx, 10, etc.). They were known also as the sojourners (ἡπέρος ήπειρος), with a reference to Lev. xxv, 47, etc. To them were referred the greater part of the precepts of the law as to the "stranger." The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan have given this law as the equivalent in Deut. xxiv, 21. Convents of this class were not bound by circumcision and the other special laws of the Mosaic code. It was enough for them to observe the seven precepts of Noah (Otho, Lex. Rabbi, & c. Noachida; Selden, De Jur. Nat. et Gent. i, 10, i. e. the six supposed to have been given to Adam—(1) against idolatry, (2) against blasphemy, (3) against bloodshed, (4) against uncleanliness, (5) against theft, (6) of obedience, with (7) the prohibition of "flesh with the blood thereof" given to Noah. The proselyte was not to claim the privileges of an Israelite, might not redeem his first-born, or pay the half-shekel. He was forbidden to study the law under pain of death (Otho, L. c.) The later rabbins, when Jerusalem had passed into other hands, held that it was unlawful for him to reside within the holy city (Maimon. Bath-hacher, vii, 14). In return they allowed him to offer whole burnt-offerings for the priest to sacrifice and to contribute money to the Orphan of the Temple. They held out to him the hope of a place in the paradise of the world to come (Levrat). They insisted that the profession of his faith should be made solemnly in the presence of three witnesses (Maimon. Hic. Mel. viii, 10). The Jubilee was the proper season for his admission (Muller, De Pros. in Ugino, xxii, 841).

All this seems so full and precise that we cannot wonder that it has led many writers to look on it as representing a reality, and most commentators accordingly have given to these proselytes of the gate the exaltation, εὐπληρώματα, ἐνσηματικός, κοινωνία τῶν Θεον of the Acts. It remains doubtful, however, whether it was ever more than a paper scheme of what ought to be, disguising itself as having actually been. The writers who are most full, who claim for the distinction the highest antiquity, confess that there had been no gate since the two tribes and a half had been carried away into captivity (Maimonides, Hic. Mel. i, 6). They could only be admitted at the jubilee, and there had since then been no jubilee celebrated (Muller, L. c.).

All that can be said of these proselytes is flatly denied in the New Test. We have independent evidence (ib supra) of the existence of converts of two degrees, and that the Talmudic division is the formal systematizing of an earlier fact. The words "proselytes" and ἐνσηματικοὶ τῶν Θεον were, however, in all probability limited to the circumcision.

2. (2) In contrast with these were the Proselytes of Righteousness (ἡπέρος ήπειρος), known also as Proselytes of the Covenant, perfect Israelites. Some writers use the Talmudic phrase proselyti tracti (ἡμῶν ήπειρος) is applied to them as drawn to the covenant by spontaneous conviction (Buxtorf, Lex. s. v.), while others (Kimchi) refer it to those who were constrained to conformity, like the Gibeonites. Here also we must receive what we find with the same limitation as before. That there were, in later times especially, many among the Jews who had renounced the grosser parts of heathenism without having come over entirely to Judaism, is beyond all doubt; but that these were ever counted proselytes admits of no certain. Certain it is that the proselytes mentioned in the New Test. were all persons who had received circumcision, and entered the pale of the Jewish community; they were persons who, according to the phraseology of the Old Test. had become Jews (ἡπέρος ήπειρος, joined, Esth. viii, 17). It is probable that the distinction was not as early mentioned as in the later rabbinical, the sake of including among the conquerors of their religion those who, though indebted probably to the Jewish Scriptures for their improved faith, were yet not inclined to submit to the ritual of Judaism, or to become incorporated with the Jewish nation. That this, however, was not the ancient view is clearly apparent from a passage in the Babylonian Gemara, quoted by Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. et Talm. in Matt. iii, 6), where it is said expressly that "no one is a proselyte until such time as he has been circumcised.

First, himself a Jew, confirms our suggestion; for in a note upon the word ἡμῶν, in his Concomitante Libb. V. T., he says: "The Jews, interpreting dogmatically rather than historically, refer the word to him who has embraced the Jewish religion; and, as he supposed itself to be bound to this law, in fact both extent the observations of the authors, in fact both extent the observations of the authors, indeed, speaks of such a distinction, but the late sense of the period at which he flourished (A.D. 1169), and the absence of any scriptural authority, require us to consider his assertions as referring to a time much later than that of which his treatise is an idea," says bishop Tomline, "proselytes were those, and those only, who took upon themselves the obligation of the whole Mosaic law, but retained that name till they were admitted into the congregation of the Lord as adopted children. Gentiles were allowed to worship and offer sacrifices to the God of Israel in the outer court of the Temple; and some of them, persuaded of the sole and universal sovereignty of the Lord Jehovah, might renounce idolatry without embracing the Mosaic law and its ceremonies. This became especially effective in the Christian church. The convert was quickly baptized, and this was a symbol of his dying and rising with Christ. The Scriptural word for baptism is πολύτιμος (polýtimo), which means "precious." It is derived from πολύς (poly's), "much," and τιμή (timē), "worth." The practice of baptism was immediate and was performed in various ways, depending on the circumstances of the convert. The arguments on the other side are ably stated in Townsend, "Chronological Arrangements of the New Testament," i, 115, etc., Lond. ed.

2. Ceremonies of Admission.—Here all seems at first clear and definite enough. The proselyte was first catechized as to his motives (Maimonides, ut sup.). If these were satisfactory, he was first instructed as to the divine protection of the Jewish people, and then circumcised. In the case of a convert already circumcised (a proselyte), the circumcision process is not necessary in the New Testament. However, it is a common practice in Christian history to require that a person who chooses to become a Christian be circumcised. The convert was then instructed in the Jewish Law and the Jewish traditions. The instruction took place in a special place, the synagogue, where the instructions were given. The convert was also instructed in the Jewish customs and practices. The instruction was given by the rabbis, who were the Jewish leaders. The instruction was given in the Hebrew language, and the convert was expected to learn and understand it.

3. Antiquity of these Practices.—Was this ritual observed as early as the commencement of the 1st century? If so, was the baptism of John or that of the Christian church borrowed from it? This is a question that has been much debated in the history of the church. The answer is not straightforward, but it is believed that the baptism of Jesus and the baptism of the early Christians were similar in many respects. The baptism of Jesus was a sign of his death and resurrection, and the baptism of the early Christians was a sign of their commitment to Christ. The baptism of the early Christians was performed by immersion in water, and it was performed by the local church leaders. The baptism of Jesus was performed by John the Baptist, and it was performed by the early Christians in the name of Jesus Christ.

4. The negative argument drawn from the silence of the Old Testament, of the Apocrypha, of Philo, and of Josephus, is almost decisive against the belief that there was in their time a baptism of proselytes with as much importance attached to it as it has in the Christian church.

5. It remains probable, however, that there was a baptism in use at a period considerably earlier than that for which we have direct evidence. The symbol was in itself natural and fit. It fell in with the disposition of the Philistines to the east of the Dead Sea. The rites were performed by the Philistines and the Philistines were a seafaring people. The symbol of the Washing (βαπτίσματι, Mark vii, 4) of all kinds. The tendency of the later rabbis was rather to heap together the customs and traditions of the past than to invent new ones. If there had been a baptism before the 1st century, there would have been no initiatory rite at all for female proselytes. The custom of baptizing proselytes thus arose gradually out of the habit which the Jews had of purifying by ablation whatever they deemed unclean, and came to be raised for the first time to the importance of an initiatory ordinance after the destruction of the Second Temple. The rite of circumcision had been a part of the Jewish law, and it was a sign of Jewish identity. The rite of baptism was a sign of the spiritual identity of the Christian.

tive evidence. 1. We have, in the first place, the unam-uous tradition of the Jewish rabbinis, who impute to the practice an antiquity commensurate almost with that of their nation. 2. We have the fact that the baptism of Jesus was not regarded by the Jews and some of John's disciples about purifying was apaparently a dispute as to the competing claims of John and Jesus to make proselytes (iii, 25 sq.). 3. We have the fact that on the day of Pentecost Peter addressed to a multitude of persons collected from several different and distant countries, Jews and proselytes, an exhortation to "reptent and be baptized" (Acts ii, 38), from which it may be fairly inferred that they all knew what baptism meant, and also its connection with repentance or a change of religious views. 5. We have the fact that, according to Josephus, the Essenes were accustomed, before admitting a new convert into their society, solemnly and ritually to purify him with waters of cleansing (War, ii, 8, 7), a statement which cannot be understood of their ordinary ablutions before meals (as some have supposed), but only in connexion with his Exon on the "Rule of Baptism," p. 67); for Josephus expressly adds that even after this allusion two years had to elapse before the neophyte enjoyed the privilege of living with the proficients.

6. We have the mode in which Josephus speaks of the baptism of John, when, after referring to John's having exhibited the people to virtue, righteousness, and godli-ess, as preparatory to baptism, he adds, "For it ap-ppeared to him that baptism was admissible not when they used it for obtaining forgiveness of some sins, but for the purification of the body when the soul had been more royally cleansed by it than the body could be by the way of sweating, 5, 28, 5." This conclusion, which seems to indicate the conviction of the historian that John did not introduce this rite, but only gave to it a peculiar meaning. Yet John's proceeding was not an act of initiation into any new system of faith, much less comparable to a conversion from paganism; for the subjects were Jews already. It was rather a general ablution, in token of wiping off a long-accumulated score of offences. See JOHN THE BAPTIST.

(4.) The history of the New Test. itself suggests the existence of such a custom. A sign is seldom chosen under any circumstances but it has a meaning and a force to whom it is addressed. The fitness of the sign in this case would be in proportion to the associations already connected with it. It would bear witness on the assumption of the previous existence of the proselyte-baptism that the Christian church from the then condition of Judaism to the dominion of God was as great as that from idolatry to Judaism. The question of the priests and Levites, "Why baptizest thou then?" (John i, 25), implies that they wondered, not at the thing itself, but at its being done for Israelites by one who disclaimed the names which, in their eyes, would have justified the introduction of a new order. In like manner the words of Christ to Nicodemus (iii, 10) imply the existence of a teaching as to teaching like that above referred to. He, "the teacher of Israel," had been familiar with "these things"— the new birth, the gift of the Spirit—as words and phrases applied to heathen proselytes. He failed to grasp the deeper truth which lay beneath them, and to see that they had a wider, a universal application. See

REGENERATION BY WATER.

(5.) That the Jews directly borrowed this custom from the Christians is an opinion which, though supported by De Wette (in his De Morte Christi expiratorid), cannot be for a moment admitted by any who reflect on the implications of which the Jews for many centuries regarded Christianity, its ordinances, and its presence. It is, however, improbable that there may have been a reflex action in this matter from the Christian upon the Jewish Church. The rabbinis saw the new society, in proportion as the Gentile element in it became predominant, throwing off circumcision, relying on baptism only. They could not ignore the very existence of the outward sign, their belief that it was all but identical with the thing signified. There was everything to lead them to give a fresh prominence to what had been before subordinate. If the Nazarenes attracted men by their baptism, they would show that they had baptism as well as the circumcision. The existence of the church after the destruction of the Temple would also tend to give more importance to the remaining rite. The reader will find the whole subject amply discussed in the following works: Selden, De Jure Nat. et Gent., ii, Kuiniln, Com. in Libro N. T. Hist. ap. Matt. iii, 6;

and Dr. Halley's recent volume on the Sacraments (Lond., 1844), p. 114 sqq, all of whom contend for the antiquity of Jewish proselyte-baptism, while the following take the opposite side: Wernsdorff, Contra. de Bapt. Recens. § 18; Carpzov, Apparat. p. 47 sqq.; Paulus, Comment. i, 279; Bauer, Gottdessendi. Verfassung der Alten Heb. ii, 392; Schneckenburger, Lib. sub. civ.; and the Moser Schiesl. Bib. Rep. No. 10. See also Bible Reader, i, 38 sq. See also BAPTISM.

4. Two facts of some interest remain to be noticed in this connection. (1.) It formed part of the rabbinic hopes of the kingdom of the Messiah that then there should be no more proselytes. The distinctive name, with its brand of inferiority, should be laid aside, and all, even the Nethinim and the Manzermünzen (children of mixed marriages), should be counted pure (Schöttgen, Hor. Heb. ii, 614). (2.) Partly, perhaps, as connected with this feeling, partly in consequence of the ill-repute with which the Jews were regarded in the New Test., a sedulous avoidance of it. The Christian convert from heathenism is not a proselyte, but a vægeroc (v. Tim. iii).

PROSELYTES. This word is employed in modern language to designate such individuals as have abandoned their faith and embraced another, and who, in general, devote all their energy to the expansion of their new creed. The endeavor to gain others to one's own convictions, either by illicit or illicit means, is calld proselytism. Biblical representatives of this system are the Pharisees, to whom Christ said, "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte; and when he is made, ye make him twofold the child of hell than hath fallen into the mischief of the devil that is not yet brought into the snares of the devil himself; ye must feel impelled to propagate its creed; the followers of a discipline to whom it is indifferent whether the nom of those who share it with them increases or decreases, have no true faith. The Christians are especantly active in winning converts to their religion, but this spirit is due entirely to a selfish desire enlarge their borders and increase their numbers, but to give to all the world the great truths to establish which Christ came into the world in the form of man and to make his word known. It is the right of the Jews to be the chosen people of God. They drew to consider themselves the armor-bearers of divine truth, and if they felt impelled to carry "the law and the prophets" to the strangers (2 M 3:2), it was only a reasonable consequence of the divine revelation which they had enjoyed. But it was by the fair means employed that they could best indicate the moral sublimity of divine teachings over philosophical schemes and heathenish systems of religion. When, therefore, the Jews, after the establishment of Maccabean rule, compelled, under Hyscanaus, the Idumaeans, and, under Aristobulus, the Idumeans, to embrace the Jewish faith and to subject themselves to circumcision, there was an adoption of religious forms for which the Old Testament dispensafurnished no warrant; and though it may be conceded that their object was probably to advance the interests of true religion, they yet, by the adoption of unauthorized measures, evinced an unrighteous zeal which must have been underlaid by a selfish purpose. Thus the Roman Censorship have constantly acknowledged the propog-ation of the Christian faith by measures wholly unwarranted and not in uniformity with the lofty state of its ethics.

The Jesuit Sambaga says, in defence of the Jesuitic proselytism: "The matter of proselytism in priests is no mania, but a holy zeal." The prince-cardinal von Hohehofer approves of this defence in his Lichblüte und Erlebnisse aus der Welt und dem Priestereiben (Ratisbon, 1836, 8vo), p. xxxix. But this defence is, after all, a simple Jesuitic sophism. The matter of proselytism is a mania, and because priests are subject to it, it does not become therefore a holy zeal; or else we must admit that anything done by avaricious and ambitious priests of all persuasions (Christians and pagans) was holy, or was the result of a holy zeal, and therefore not blameworthy, but, on the contrary, praiseworthy and commandable. When proselytes are gained in such a way or violent manner as that resorted to by Jesuits; when the means employed are money and promotions on one side, threats and persecutions on the other, we perceive in it the evidence of a most unholy zeal, against which the fathers and teachers of Christianity pronounced anathema in his condemnation of the priests of his time, the doctors of the law, and Pharisees. For this very reason Christ called them "children of hell." See ROMANISM. It is a curious fact worth remembering that one of the main features of the times of the Messiah was to be, according to Jewish tradition, the utter abolition of proselytism, and the entire ceasing of all distinctions of an opprobrious nature among men. The evil repute into which the term proselyte had fallen in the times of Christ also caused the early converts to Christianity to adopt the name of Neophytes (newly planted) instead.

Proseucha (προσευχή), a word signifying "prayer," and always so translated in the A. V. It is, however, applied, per meton., to a place of prayer—a place where assemblies for prayer were held, whether a building was erected for the purpose, or not. It occurs in Luke vi, 12, where it is said that our Saviour went up into a mountain: to pray, and continued all night in the proseucha of God (ἐν τῷ προσευχῷ τῷ Θεῷ), which can very well bear the sense our translators have put upon it, "in prayer to God." Yet Whitby and others infer, from the use of parallel phrases, such as "the mount of God," "the bread of God," "the altar of God," "the lamp of God," etc., which were all things consecrated or appropriated to the service of God, that this phrase might here signify "an oratory of God," or a place that was devoted to his service, especially for prayer. In the sense, however, in which the word here is used, it may be understood in Acts xvi, 18, where we are informed that Paul and his companions, on the Sabbath day, went out of the city, by the river side, unto προσευχήν προσευχήν ὄνας, which the A. V. renders "where prayer was wont "to be made." But the Syriac here has, "because there was perceived to be a house of prayer."

"a certain place which was supposed to be a place of prayer." In both these versions due stress is laid upon προσευχήν, where there was taken, or supposed to be —or, where, according to received custom, there was, or where there was looked for by law—a temple, or church, or chapel; and where, therefore, they expected to meet an assembly of people. Boe conveys (Exercit. Philol. ad loc.), however, that the word προσευχή is redundant, and that the passage ought simply to be, "where there was a proscheia;" but in this he is clearly opposed by Emerson (Obser. Sac. at ad loc.). See PRAYER.

That there really were such places of devotion among the Jews is unquestionable. They were mostly outside those towns in which there were no synagogues, because the laws or their administrators would not admit any This was, particularly the case in the colonies and colonies (and Philippi, where this circumstance occurred, was a colony); for Juvenal (Sat. iii, 296) speaks of proscheia, not synagogues, at Rome. They appear have been usually situated near a river or the seashore, for it is given for instance of ablution (Jer. xiv, 10, 28). Josephus repeatedly mentions proscheia in his Life, and speaks of the people being gathered into the proscheia (44, 45). Sometimes the proscheia was a large building, as at Tiberias (I. c. 54), so that the name was sometimes applied even to synagogues (Vitr. Varr. de Leg. I. v. 11). Proscheia are frequently mentioned as buildings by Philo, particularly in his oration against Flaccus, where he complains that the proscheia of the Jews were pulled down, and that no place was left them in which to worship God and pray for Caesar (Phil. in Flacc. Op. p. 722). But, for the most part, the proscheia appear to have been placed in the open air, in a grove, or in shrubberies, or even under a tree, although always, as we may presume, near water, for the convenience of those ablutions which with the Jews always preceded prayer; as, indeed, they are among the proverbs among the Moesians at the present day. The usages of the latter exhibit something answering to the Jewish proscheia in the shape of small oratories, with a niche indicating the direction of Mecca, which is often seen in Moesian MSS., and the side of a house, or a wall, or a large water-jar, which is daily replenished for the use of travellers (Whitby, De Dies et Wettstein, Kuimil, on Acts xvi, 13; Jennings, Jewish Antiquities, p. 383-382: Prideaux, Connection, ii, 556).—Kitto.

"Questions have been raised," says the late Dr. M'Far-lan, of Renfrew, "as to the origin of these, and their being or not being the same with the synagogue.
Phi-
lo and Josephus certainly speak of them and the synagogues as if they were substantially one. The former expressly declares that they were places of instruction. The places dedicated to devotion, says he,
"which are commonly called proscheia, what are the they but schools in which prudence, fortitude, temperance, righteousness, piety, holiness, and every virtue are taught—everything necessary for the discharge of their duties, whether human or divine." As the writer's observations were chiefly confined to the Jews of Alexandria and other parts of Egypt, this description will chiefly apply to those. But there is no doubt, on the other hand, that such synagogues existed, and especially in Judea, that the Jews were there are therefore very much disposed to concur in the opinion that the oratory was substantially and in effect a synagogue. But the latter was the more perfect form, and required, for its erection and support, special means. There was in every synagogue a local court, deriving its authority, at least in Judea, from the Sanhedrin; and there were office-bearers to be maintained; whereas in Christian churches the clergy have been neither very fixed or necessary form of procedure. These might, for aught that appears, have been all or substantially all which belonged to the synagogue, or it might be little more than what we would call a prayer-meeting. Hence, perhaps, the reason of the prevalence of the one—the synagogue—in Judea, and of the other in Egypt and other countries not subject to Jewish laws.

It is highly probable that prosnechē existed long before synagogues. It is remissible, continues Mr. McFarlan, "that the only places where Daniel is said to have been favored with visions, during the day, were by the sides of rivers (Dan. viii. 2, 16; also x. 4; xii. 5, 7; and ix. 21), the very places where oratories were wont to be. Ezekiel also received his commission by the rivers of Babylon, and when 'among the captives' of Israel (Ezek. i. 1). And he afterwards mentions his having received visions in the same circumstances (iii. 15, 16). And Ezra, also, when leading back Israel to the land of their fathers, proclaimed and observed a fast with them as the way, and, as to keep up the same tender associations, he assembled them by the river Ahava, where they remained three days (Ezra viii. 15, 32). But the very finest illustration which occurs is that contained in the 137th Psalm.—'By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down; yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof. For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song; and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion!' (1-3). The people of Israel were accustomed, in after-times, to make choice of the banks of rivers for their oratories, and this point of agreement is one of the grounds on which we are proceeding. But it will hold equally good, whether the Israelitish captives followed, in this, the example of their fathers, or whether, as is more probable, their circumstances in Babylon led to this choice. It is not unlikely that this led to a similar choice in after-times, and particularly in foreign countries. The poor captives of Babylon had perhaps no other covering or even enclosure than the willows of the brook; and thus might be driven to do the things which we are familiar with when the God of their fathers, into the woody margins of Babylon's many rivers. Meeting in such places, as they had been accustomed to do in the oratories of their native land, it is not wonderful that many tender associations should be kept up."

After the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, synagogue worship was much enlarged and improved, while oratories gradually diminished in number and importance. Hence, in later times, oratories were chiefly found in countries beyond the land of Israel. Under the Roman government synagogues were disestablished, but oratories, or places of meeting for devotional exercises, were generally permitted all over the empire. Dr. Lardner thinks that the synagogue mentioned in Acts vi. 9 was really an oratory; and Josephus speaks of a very large one in the city of Tiberias. But it was chiefly in foreign parts that prosnechē in later times were found. Josephus, in detailing the decree passed in favor of the Jews at Halicarnassus, says, "We have decreed that as many men and women of the Jews as are willing so to do may celebrate their solemnities and pass through their holidays according to the Jewish laws; and may make their prosnechē at the sea-side, according to the custom of their forefathers." PROSPER, St., surnamed Aquitanus or Aquilanus, from the country of his nativity, was a distinguished theologian of Gaul, and flourished in the first half of the 5th century. He settled as a young man in Provence, and there became the intimate companion of a certain Lusius of Narbonne. He is said to have held a certain rank of bishop in a certain town of Aquitania. The two friends studied and wrote together in defense of orthodox Christianity in general, and of Augustinianism in particular. Yet, although a staunch defender of the doctrines and person of St. Augustine, he was no priest, still less a bishop, as has been frequently asserted since the 7th century, but a married layman, pious and well versed in divine lore, who had been impelled by the miseries of his time to devote himself to an austere way of life (see Simond, not. ad viii, ep. 15; Sidon. Apoll. and Bolduc, Collect. Sanctorum, in Augustinianis. Constant readers and zealous disciples of St. Augustine, especially in the doctrine of grace, Prosper and Hilary displayed great zeal in defending his doctrines against the attacks of the Semi-Pelagians (see Pelagianism); but finding that they were making very little headway against the heretics, who had largely weakened orthodoxy in Southern Gaul, Prosper wrote, about 427 or 428, a letter entitled Epistola ad Augustinum de Reliquiis Pelagianarum Heresiae in Gallia (considered one of the most important among the works of a Semi-Pelagianism), in which he informed the illustrious bishop of Hippo that a number of priests and monks at Marseilles asserted, contrary to the Augustinian theory, that man must himself take the first step towards his justification and salvation (ep. 225 and 226 inter Ep. Aug.). Thus Prosper not only himself acted as defender of the catholic doctrine against the Semi-Pelagians, but gave occasion to St. Augustine to write his two works on the predestination of the saints and on the gift of constancy (De Predestinatione Sanctorum, and De Dono Remittendi). But not all those whom Prosper names as adversaries of St. Augustine were, like Cassian, Semi-Pelagians. The heresies of this Cassian Prosper exposed in a work which he subsequently (about A.D. 430) composed: De Gratia Dei et Libero Arbitrio contra Collatorum. Prosper, still before St. Augustine's death, wrote several works against the Pelagians, and especially the Semi-Pelagians. To these works of controversy belong his poem De Ingratia, so highly admired by the Jansenists, and a letter to a certain Rufinus. After the death of St. Augustine, his works, especially his master and admirable treatise on worshipping the God of their fathers, into the woody margins of Babylon's many rivers. Meeting in such places, as they had been accustomed to do in the oratories of their native land, it is not wonderful that many tender associations should be kept up."

If we believe Gennadius (De Viris Illust. c. 64), Prosper was, after 448, called Thessalonian by pope Leo I., and became the secreyary of that pontiff. We have no positive knowledge of the year of his death; it falls between 455 and 468. There are other writings of Prosper, among which we mention 106 small poems (epigrams), in which are numerous moral and religious reflections on the Sacraments and Sacramentals. The most important work is the 'De Benedictice' by Lebrun de Marette and Magunrat (Var. 1711, fol.). Prosperity, the state wherein things succeed according to our wishes, and are productive of abundance and ease. However desirable prosperity be, it has its manifest disadvantages. It too easily softens the soul from God, excites pride, exposes to temptation, hardens the heart. Occasions idleness, promotes effeminacy, damps zeal and energy, and in general has a baneful relative influence. It is no wonder, therefore, that the Almighty in general withholds it from his children, and that adversity shall be their lot rather than prosperity. Indeed, adversity seems more beneficial on the whole, although it be so unpleasant to our feelings. "The advantages of prosperity," says Bacon, "are to be wished, but the advantages of adversity are to be admired. The principal virtue of adversity is temperance: the principal virtue of adversity is fortitude, which in morality is allowed to be the most heroic virtue. Prosperity best discovers vice; adversity best discovers virtue, which is like those perfumes which are most fragrant when burned or bruised. It is not, however, to be understood that prosperity in itself is unlawful. The world, with all its various productions, was formed by the Almighty for the happiness of man, and designed to endear him to us, and to lead our minds up to him. What, however, God often gives us a blessing, by our own folly is often converted and turned into a curse. Where prosperity is given, there religion is absolutely necessary to enable us to act under it as we ought. Where this divine principle influences the mind, prosperity may be enjoyed and become a blessing; for "while bad men match the pleasures of the world as high as they can find in it, the proprietor of the world, the righteous sit quietly down to the feast of life, under the smile of heaven. No guilty fears damp their joys. The blessing of God rests upon all they possess. Their piety reflects sunshine from heaven upon the prosperity of the world; it unites in one point of view all the pleasing aspect both of the powers above and of the objects below. Not only have they as full a relish as others of the innocent pleasures of life, but, moreover, in them they hold communion with God. In all that is good or fair they trace his hand. From the beauties of nature, from the improvements of art, from the enjoyments of social life, they raise their affections to the source of all the happiness which surrounds them, and thus widen the sphere of their pleasures by adding intellectual and spiritual to earthly joy." Spiritual prosperity consists in the continual progress of the mind in knowledge, purity, and joy. It arises from the participation of the divine blessing; and evidences itself by frequency in prayer, love to God's word, delight in his people, attention on his ordinances, and patience in both the sufferings and the fulness in his Church, and increasing abhorrence of everything that is derogatory to his glory (8 John ii). See Blair, Sermons, vol. i, sect. iii; Bates, Works, p. 297.

PROSPER, LORENZO D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was a native of New York State, and was born in 1803. He was early converted, and joined the Church as a mere youth. In 1827 he was received into the Pittsburgh Conference, and successively appointed to the following circuits, namely: Butler, Grand River, Mercer, Hartford, Twinsburg, Windsor, and Columbiana. In 1846, when the Erie Conference was formed, he fell into its bounds, and received from it his appointment to the following fields of labor, namely: Ellsworth, Cleveland, Harmonsburg, M'Kean, Wesleville, Carhton, Chagrin Falls, Wesleville, Edinborough Mission, M'Kean, Albon, and Springfield. This last appointment he held in 1862. The next year he became a terminer, and continued in that relation until his death, April 13, 1869. He was of a nervous temperament, and his burning zeal led him often to exert himself beyond his strength. His preaching was with power, and at times his exhortation was overwhelming. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869.

Prostitute, (a) female, in Hebrew נגשה, נמשה, נמשש, נֳמֶשׁ (on the last see Genesis. Thes. iii, 1167); (b) male, in Hebrew נַמשוֹן. While all sexual intercourse between others than married persons was for-bitten by the Mosaic law, especial prohibition was laid upon Israelitish women from hiring themselves as prostitutes (Lev. xix. 29; comp. xxxi. 9); and, with special reference to the Levites, they were forbidden to abandon themselves to the use of men (Deut. xxiii. 17). The "hire of a whore" (גַּלְגָּלָל) comp. also Ezek. xvi. 33, and Rosenmuller, ad loc.) must not be accepted by the priests as the subject of a vow, or a gift of devotion in the Temple (Deut. xxiii. 18); this hire, consisting in a piece of money or a kid (Gen. xxxvii. 17), if presented at the Temple for a sacrifice, and received as among other and honest nations, would have seemed to allow prostitution (comp. Mishna, Terumoth, vi. 2; Mover, Phonik i. 680). In Paphos, a kid was offered to the goddess of love (Tacitus, Hist. ii. 8). The Heterae were used to bring to Aphrodite Pandemos the sacrifice of a goat (Lucian, Dialog. Metr. vii. 1). The trade of prostitutes was sometimes very profitable among the ancients (Herod. ii. 90). In spite of all prohibitions, there were always public prostitutes among the Hebrews—probably, who, as among the Arabs and Persians, practiced dancing and music (Baruch vi. 8, 43; Wisd. ix. 14; 1 Kings ii. 6; Prov. vi. 20, 22, 23; Amos ii. 7; vii. 17; Hosea i. 2); and may have been in part foreigners (Mover, Phonik i. 53), as did the Phoenicians and Syrians (Judg. xvi. 1). Syrian harrlots travelled in the time of the Roman empire, and were called Amena (Sueton. Nero, 27; Vest. Lat. i. 2, 1), because they were sometimes skilled in playing on the harp (see Heindorf, Horace. L. c.; comp. Apuleius, Metam. viii. 182, ed. Bipp). But the Hebrew name קָנֵבָה perhaps means not a stranger, but the strange woman, like קָנָה; hence, adulteress.

The harlots walked in public, adorned and veiled (Gen. xxxviii. 14; Petron. Satyr. xvii. 1; but see Pococke, Eust. i. 729, 526). They even went thus, and with seductive gestures, strove to lead aside travellers (Gen. xxxviii. 14; Baruch vi. 43; comp. Dougaii Amenae i. 42 sq.). We may well suppose that the harlots could be in some way recognised in dress, gait, etc., even when they put on a show of modest behavior (comp. Hartmann, Hebr. ii. 492 sq.). It is not probable that the ceiling ever distinguished the harlots from chaste women. See Velt. (Comp. Buckingham, Meos p. 65.) In the brothels the girls bore peculiar names which had been assigned to them (Seneca, Contraf. i. 2, 84, ed. Bipp). Some would interpret in allusion to this the words in Rev. xv. 5, but see Ewald, ad loc. At the time of the division of the Hebrew kingdom, whoredom was practiced, especially among the ten tribes, under the Syrian influences then pouring in on them, first from the north, then from the west, and was condoned by the gods, especially of Ashtarot (Hosea iv. 17; 1 Kings xiv. 24; xv. 12; xxii. 47; 2 Kings xxiii. 7; comp. Baruch vi. 43; Herod. l. c.; Justin, xviii. 5; Irenaeus, Cont. haer. i. 95; Origen, Cont. haer. iv. 29; *Clement. *Corinth. i. pervicax de s. v. g. c. 52; *Clement. *Corinth. i. pervicax de s. v. g. c. 52). The practice of prostitution was therefore prevalent, even among the Jews, especially the higher classes (Rom. ii. 22; John viii. 7; see in general Michaelis, Nova Rechenschaft der Juden. Among the nations of the ancient world it was a common practice of combining immorality with the worship of the gods appears to have continued down to the days of Constantine, as is evident from a passage in his life, written by Eusebius, where he mentions it in a very vigorously as the practice of Venus, at Aphroessa on Mount Libanus. Sacred prostitution forms a part in the religious rites of heathen nations both in ancient and modern times. Among the Phoenicians, Babylonians, and other Eastern nations, it was the custom to erect adjoining the temples of their gods (especially the goddess Ishtar) chapels for courtesans, to accommodate them to the deities. Strabo says that no fewer than 1000 of these abandoned females were attached to the temple of Aphrodite in Corinth, and were considered as indispensable part of the retinue of the goddess. Among the Hindus we have the Linga worship, etc. See also Adultery; Forgery; Harlot; Sodomy.

Protagoras ([Προταγόρας]), the first of that class of Greek philosophers who took the name of Sogenkatai (q. v.), flourished near the opening of the 5th century B.C. He was a native of Abydus, according to the concurrent testimony of Plato and several other writers (Protag. p. 309, e.; De Rep., x. p. 606, e.; Herculei zodiaecr., *Sext. Cont. ap. am. vi. 51, ed. Furtw. c. 52; Servius viii. 578; I. c. 655; Val. Max., ii. 6; 15; August. De thren. 10; Theo. p. 174, ed. 164; *Euseb. *Ev. XXI. 50; Philo, Ad Callistum, *Ad Herod. *II., c. 48). The existence of companies of prostitutes in the sacred groves and high-places of the ancient Jews may serve to account for the rendering which the Sept. gives to the expression "high-places" in Ezek. xvi. 39, by a term which in Greek denotes a place of indecent resort. The Sukkah bethn, literally "tabernacles of daughters," which the men of Babylon are mentioned in 2 Kings xxi. 23 to have established, are probably places of the same kind, being haunts of wickedness. According to Josephus (Ant. iv. 8, 23), all intercourse with a prostitute was illegal, which is natural, since even the sons of public harlots could never attain citizen's rights among the Jews (Deut. xxiii. 2), and had no claim to share in their father's inheritance (comp. Judg. xi. 1). Among the Greeks, however, the question of the appearance of Christianity, prostitution had become a great social evil. The cause of this lay by no means alone in the excessive worship of certain divinities (see Wisd. xiv. 28, sq.), but in the frivolity of the times and the general decay of morals. In Rome harlots were legally tolerated (Zimmermann, Rom. Reichsrichter i. ii. 489; comp. Schottgen, Hor. Hebr. i. 468, sq.). The laxer the principles of men in general were on this subject in its various forms, and the more boldly they avowed it (comp. Terence, Adelphi, i. 21, 21 sq.; Eunuchius, iii. 6, 85 sq.), the more openly were they tolerated and even espoused by the nobility who wished to oppose unchastity where it had entered the Christian Church (1 Cor. i. 7, sq.; 2 Cor. xii. 21; 1 Thess. iv. 3; 1 Tim. i. 10). The apostolic decree in Acts xx. 29 (comp. xxii. 25), which has often been denounced as not genuine (Deymey, *Oeuvr. ii. 499, sq.; Kantorowicz, Polit. Bd. i. 521, sq.), was sufficiently called for by the character of the times (comp. Tholuck, in Neander's Duskwurd, i. 143 sq.). The practice of prostitution was then prevalent, too, among the Jews, especially the higher classes (Rom. ii. 22; John viii. 7; see in general Michaelis, Nova Rechenschaft der Juden. Among the nations of the ancient world it was a common practice of combining immorality with the worship of the gods appears to have continued down to the days of Constantine, as is evident from a passage in his life, written by Eusebius, where he mentions it in a very vigorously as the practice of Venus, at Aphroessa on Mount Libanus. Sacred prostitution forms a part in the religious rites of heathen nations both in ancient and modern times. Among the Phoenicians, Babylonians, and other Eastern nations, it was the custom to erect adjoining the temples of their gods (especially the goddess Ishtar) chapels for courtesans, to accommodate them to the deities. Strabo says that no fewer than 1000 of these abandoned females were attached to the temple of Aphrodite in Corinth, and were considered as indispensable part of the retinue of the goddess. who called himself a sophist and taught for pay (Plato, Protag. p. 349; a; Diog. Laert. i. 52). He must have come to Athens before B.C. 445, since, according to the statement of Herodotus Ponticus (Diog. Laert. ix. 95), he is said to have been with Harmodius and Aristogiton in the period that was probably adapted for the use of the new colonists, who left Athens for the first time in that year, the laws which had been drawn up at an earlier period by Charondas for the use of the Chalcidic colonies (for, according to Liv. xii. 11, 5 and others, these laws were in force at Thurii likewise). Whether he himself removed to Thurii, we do not learn, but at the time of the plague we find him again in Athens, as he could scarcely have mentioned the strength of mind displayed by Pericles at the death of his sons in the way he does (in a fragment still extant, Plutarch, De Consol. ad Apoll. c. xxxiii. p. 118, d) had he not been an eye-witness. He had also, as it appears, returned to Athens, after a long absence (Plato, Protag. p. 501, c), at a time when the sons of Pericles were still alive (ibid. p. 314, c; 329, a). A somewhat intimate relation between Protagoras and Pericles is intimated also elsewhere (Plut. Pericles, c. xxxvi. p. 172, a). His activity, however, was by no means restricted to Athens. He had spent some time in Sicily, and acquired fame there (Plato, Hipp. Maj. p. 292, c; 309, b), and this, his being a sophist of other Greek cities through which he had passed (Plato, Protag. p. 315, a). He was accused of atheism by one of his scholars, and was consequently impeached for what he had written in his book On the Gods, which began with the statement, "Respecting the gods, I am unable to know whether they exist or do not exist" (Diog. Laert. ix. 51, etc.). The impeachment was followed by his banishment (ibid. i. 52; Cicero, De Nat. Deor. i. 23; Euseb. Prep. Evang. xiv. 19, etc.), or, as others affirm, only by the burning of his book (Philos. Vit. Soph. L. c; Josephus, C. Apion. ii. 37; Sext. Emp. Adv. Math. i. 56; Cicero, Diog. Laert. ii. 52). Ueberweg says that it would seem Protagoras left Sicily after his condemnation and was lost at sea (Hist. Philos. i. 74).

Writings.—From the list of the writings of Protagoras, which Diogenes Laertius (ix. 55) doubtless borrowed from one of his Alexandrine authorities (he describes them as still extant, istori dawmpowma autwv Biblia raitov: comp. Wecker’s account of Prodicus, in his Kleine Schriften, ii. 447, 450), and which he gives probably as a list of his writings, we see that they comprised very different subjects: ethics (Περὶ ἀρετῶν καὶ Περὶ τῶν οἰκίων τῶν ἔρωτος τῶν προσαρμοσμένων, Περὶ φιλοσοφίας, Περὶ τῆς ἐν ὑπόκτυσι δοκιμασίας), political (Περὶ πολιτικῆς, Περὶ τῆς ἐν προφητεία καταρτισθέντων, comp. Frag. p. 182, etc.), or literature (Ἀντιλόγων ἐως, ἡγίστατα, οἰκονομία, ἐστίν, Περὶ ἀνθρώπων, Περὶ τῶν ἐν ἔλεος), and, after subjects of a different kind, legal (Περὶ ἀνθρώπων, Περὶ τῶν ἐν δόλω). The works which, in all probability, were the most important of those which Protagoras composed—Truth (Ἀλήθεια, and On the Gods (Περὶ θεῶν)—are omitted in that list, although in another passage (ix. 51) Diogenes Laertius refers to them. The first contained the theory refuted by Plato in the Theaetetus (p. 161, c; 162, a; 166, c; 170, e), and was probably identical with the work on the Existence (Περὶ τῶν ὄντων), attributed to Protagoras by Porphyry (in Euseb. Prep. Evang. x. 8, p. 468, Viger). This work was directed against the Eleatics (Πρὸς τῶν ἐν τῷ νῷ λόγους), and was still extant in the time of Porphyry, who describes the argumentation of the book as similar to that of Plato, though without adding any more exact statements. The other work, which he left behind him in Athens may have been the one of which Protagoras obtained the most complete acquaintance from the Theaetetus of Plato, which was designed to refute it, and to clear up the true meaning of the quotations in which it is confirmed by the much more scanty notices of Sextus Empiricus (Col. p. 217, b; 218, a). Of this work, and of the last, no abstract remains, as the points of the fundamental presupposition of Heraclitus that everything is motion and nothing besides or beyond it, and that out of it everything comes into existence; that nothing at any time exists, but that everything is perpetually becoming (Plato, Theaet. p. 156, 152; Sextus Empiricus inaccurately attributes to him matter in a certain order of nature, and the perpetual state of motion is probably substituting for the author’s Platonism). He then distinguished two principal kinds of the infinitely manifold motions, an active and a passive; but promised that the motion which in one concurrence manifested itself actively will in another appear as passive, so that the difference is, as it were, a fluctuating, not a permanent one (Theaet. p. 156, 157). From the concurrence of two such motions arises sensation or perception, and that which is felt or perceived, according to the different velocity of the motion; and that in such a way that where there is homogeneity in such things as exists, as between seeing and color, hearing and sound (ibid. p. 156), the definitiveness of the color and the seeing, of the perception and that which is perceived, is produced by the concurrence of corresponding motions (ibid. 156, d; comp. 158, c). Consequently, we can never speak of being and becoming absolutely, but only for something (τινί), or of something (τινώς), or to something (τινῷ τι, p. 160, b; 156, c; 152, d; Arist. Metaph. ix. 8; Sext. Emp. Hyp. i. 216, 218). Therefore there is or exists for each only of that which he has, and of what he has not, which he perceives is true for him (Theaet. p. 152, a; comp. Cratyl. p. 386; Aristotle, in Euseb. Prep. Evang. xiv. 20; Cicero, Acad. ii. 46; Sext. Emp. L. c. and Adv. Math. viii. 63, 369, 588, etc.) so that as sensation, like its objects, is engaged in a perpetual change of motion (Theaet. p. 152, b; Sext. Emp. Hyp. i. 217, fol.), opposite assertions might exist, according to the difference of the perception respecting each several object (Arist. Metaph. iv. 5; Diog. Laert. ix. 5; Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 674, a; Senec. Epist. 88). The conclusions hitherto discussed, which he drew from the Heraclitean doctrine of eternal becoming, Protagoras summed up in the well-known proposition: 'The man is the measure of all things; of the existent, that they exist; of the non-existent, that they do not exist' (Theaet. p. 152, a; 160, d; Cratyl. p. 386, c; Arist. Metaph. x. 1; xi. 6; Sext. Emp. Adv. Math. vii. 60; Pyrrhon. Hyp. i. 218; Arist. Metaph. Prep. Evang. xiv. 20; Diog. Laert. ix. 51); and understood by the man, the perceiving or sensation-receiving subject. He was compelled, therefore, likewise to admit that confusion was impossible, since every affirmation of assertion, if not thereby self-contradictory, was onaly justifiable (Plato, Euthyd. p. 186, d, etc.; Isocr. Helen. Enc. p. 231, Bekk.; Diog. Laert. ix. 53); but, notwithstanding the equal truth and justifiableness of opposite affirmations, he endeavored to establish a distinction or preference of better or worse condition of the perceiving subject, and promised to give directions for improving this condition, i. e. for attaining to higher activity (Theaet. p. 167; comp. Sext. Emp. Adv. Hyp. i. 218). Already, before Plato and Aristotle (Metaph. iv. 4; comp. the previously quoted passages), Democritus had applied himself to the construction of this sensuality of Protagoras, which annihilated existence, knowledge, and all understanding (Plutarch, Adv. Colot. p. 1109, a; Sext. Emp. Adv. Math. viii. 588).

It is not every pleasure, but only pleasure in the beautiful, to which Protagoras, in the dialogue which bears his name (p. 354, b), allows moral worth; and he refers virtue to a certain sense of shame (αἰσθήσεως) implanted in man by nature, and a certain conscious feeling of justice (ἐλεγχόν), which are to serve the purpose of securing the goals of connection in private and political life (ibid. p. 352, c, e, etc.; comp. 340, c). He is not able, however, to define more exactly the difference between the beautiful and the pleasant, and at last speaks with the greatest difficulty and confusion of the idea of enjoyment or enjoyment is the proper aim of the good (p. 354, etc.). In just as confused a manner does he express himself with respect to the virtues, of which he admits five (honestas, securitas—and four others), and with regard to which he maintains that they are distinguished from each other in the same manner as the arts of the countenance (ibid. p. 349, b; 329, c, etc.). As in these ethical opinions of I'agoras we see a want of scientific perception, so do we perceive in his conception of the Heraclitean doctrine of the eternal flow of all things, and the way in which he carries it out, a sophistical endeavor to establish, fresh from the letters of science, his subjective notions, setting aside the Heraclitean assumption of a higher cognition and a community of rational activity (λόγος λόγος) by means of rhetorical art. That he was master of this in a high degree, the testament of the ancients leave indelible. His endeavors, moreover, were mainly directed to the communication of this art by means of instruction (Plato, Protag. p. 312, c), to render men capable of acting and speaking with readiness in domestic and political affairs (ibid. p. 318, c). He would teach how to make the weaker cause the stronger (νόμος ἐκ λόγου εἰρημένος τιτούλος, Aristot. Rhet. ii, 24; A. Gellius, N. A. v, 3; Eudoxus, in Stephan. Byz. a. v. Αἰγύπτιος: comp. Aristoph. Nub. 113, etc., 245, etc., 873, 874, 879, etc.). By way of practice in the art he was accustomed to make his pupils (κομματίς) on opposite sides (antinomically) (Diog. Laertius, ii, 52, etc.; comp. Suid. a. v.; Dionys. of Halicarnassus, loc.; Timon, in Diog. Laert. ix, 52; Sext. Emp. Adv. Math. i, 57; Cicero, Brut. 12) an exercise which is also recommended by Cicero (Ad Att. iii, 7; Quintilian, x, 6; 90). The mean of doing so was probably unfolded in his Art of Discourse (γρυγοί ἀπειρίστας; see above). But he also directed his attention to language, endeavored to explain difficult passages in the poets, though not always with the best success (Plato, Protag. p. 306, c, etc.; comp. respecting his and the opposed Platonic exposition of the well-known lines of Simonides, Frey, p. 122, etc.). Protois and Gervais. Sra., flourished in the first century of the Christian era, and were martyred at Milan towards the year 68. These two brothers were sons of St. Vital and St. Valeria, and their martyrdom appears to have taken place in the last years of the reign of Nero. Their memory was forgotten, until a vision revealed the place of their sepulture to St. Ambrose, when about to dedicate the Cathedral of Milan. The two martyrs were buried in the Church of St. Nabor and St. Felix, and upon the representations of St. Ambrose their coffins were discovered. Their names were plainly inscribed on their coffins, as St. Ambrose announced only what he had learned by revelation. The bones were transferred to the Basilica, and legends report many miracles done by them during their transfer, which from the 6th century was celebrated at Milan and in the African Church. The worship of these two saints spread rapidly in the 7th century in a church at Milan, and they were transferred to that at Paris. This church has been several times restored, and exists yet in that city. The feast of St. Gervais and of St. Proterius is celebrated on the 19th of June.—Hoefr. Novv. Biogr. Générale, a. v. Protaosof, Ambrrose, a Russian prelate, distinguished by a talent of oratory unusual in the Russian Church, was born in 1769 at Moscow. He became a monk at twenty-five, and was made archimandrite of a monastery near St. Petersburg; subsequently rector of the seminary of that capital, and in 1804 was invited to the episcopal see of Seula, from whence he was transferred in 1807 to Kazan and Smirsk. He died in 1808 in Tver. His sermons evince a tolerant spirit. Some have been published in Le Maçon de l'Europe, others in Le Fils de la Patrie, but have never been collected in separate form. — Hoefr. Novv. Biogr. Générale, a. v. Protection of the Church, a sort of right of asylum within or near sacred precincts, which prevailed in 1064 in England from Advent to the octave of Epiphany, from Septuagesima to the octave of Easter, from Ascension to the octave of Pentecost, and Ember weeks, throughout Sunday, on the vigils and feasts of apostles and saints which were hidden on the previous Sunday, All-Saints, the dedication-day of a church, in going to synods, chapters, on pilgrimage, to a consecration, or to church cemeteries.

Protectores Cardinales. Every Roman Catholic state of first rank enjoys the right of being represented in the College of Cardinals at Rome by one or several members who have been exalted to that high dignity as natives or naturalized citizens of that state. At the time of the universal domination of the popes, when the Roman see was mixed in all the political concerns of the European states, and before the permanent office of the nuncio had become the regular channel of communication between Rome and the Catholic rulers, the cardinals were the natural representatives of the ecclesiastical and political interests of their respective countries, and their position was, of course, one of considerable importance. But even in recent times their influence has not entirely vanished; for as they are supposed to be best acquainted with the institutions, manners, customs, and language of the nations they represent, they are more capable of giving the necessary information about the ecclesiastical situation of those nations, they are still, in the different congregations of which they are members, intrusted with the revision of all accounts and reports on the religious affairs of their respective states, but especially of the cardinal, the worthiness of the elected or nominated archbishops and bishops. Hence their name protectores nationum. With these must not be confounded the clerici nationum, or prelates, who occupy in the College of Cardinals the situation of secretaries, and must be alternately French, Spaniards, Germans; nor the cardo-cardinale, i.e. the archbishops and bishops who are proposed for the cardinalate by the ruler of their country, nominated by the pope, and who received the red biretta from the hand of their Catholic sovereign, but must go to Rome to receive the red biretta. The cardo's own hands, the right of cardinals and protectores reside in their metropolitanae, but have a right, on the decease of the pope, to give their vote in the election of his successor, and are themselves eligible to the papacy. As not every country has one of its natives in the College of Cardinals, a cardinal frequently unites in his hands the protectorate of several countries.—Weitzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lex. a. v.

Proterius (also called Bertaros—probably his name, but euphonized into the name by which he is better known), an Eastern prelate of some note because he provoked a schism which continues to the present day in the church of Melchisides (q. v.) and Melchisdech (q. v.). He flourished about the middle of the 6th century, and suffered martyrdom for the Church. He had been a priest by Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, who was well acquainted with his virtues. On the death of Cyril, the see of Alexandria was filled by Dioscorus, who, knowing the reputation of Proterius, did all in his power to gain his confidence and interest, that he might, through him, accomplish his designs. But Proterius, in his turn, determined to secure the see of Alexandria. He sent envoys to Jerusalem, with a commission to secure the influences of the Church there. The Church was next his heart, and no worldly preferment could bribe him to forego his duty. Dioscorus, being condemned by the Council of Chalcedon for having embraced the errors of Eutyches, was deposed, and Proterius was chosen to fill the vacant see, and appointed by the emperor to the bishoprick of Alexandria. This occasioned the resurrection of the apostle, and the city was divided into two factions. Much mischief was done on both sides, and Proterius was brought into the most imminent danger. The civil authority was set at naught, violence was resorted to, and men were selected to the office of emperor, and the emperor was selected by the people. Upon the death of Marcian's, the exiles returned to Alexandria, and seemed resolved to be revenged for what they had suffered in the last reign. Timothy, the chief of the conspirators against him, in the absence of Dionysius, seized on the great city of Alexandria, and occupied it, and was eventually expelled by the emperor, and was removed to another see by two bishops of his faction, who had been deposed for heresy. On the return of Dionysius, the incendiary Timothy was driven from the city, which so enraged the Eutychians that they assaulted the house of Proterius, who fled to the neighboring church and took refuge in the baptistery, thinking that the holiness of the place and of the season (for it was Good-Friday) would protect him. But he was pursued to the church, treated with every indignity, murdered in cold blood, and his body was dragged about the city, torn in pieces, burned, and the ashes scattered in the sea. Proterius was so highly esteemed that his writings were collected at once and recommended as profitable for study to the clergy. His memory is celebrated on Feb. 28; possibly on that day, says Neale, because his name was then restored to the diptych. See Neale, Hist. of the East Ch. (Patriarchate of Alez.), ii. 5–13; Fox, Book of Martyrs, p. 77. (J. H. W.)

Protestant Episcopal Church. This is the legal title of one portion of the Church of Christ which has its local habitation in the United States of America. The first part indicates its position relatively to the Roman Catholic Church, as protesting against the errors and repudiating the claims of that Church to supremacy in doctrine, discipline, and worship; the second part of the title expresses its attitude toward other Christian bodies who have rejected episcopacy on the ground of divine origin, and, therefore, not universal and permanent. The history of the Protestant Episcopal Church is consequently of more than ordinary interest, since, on the one hand, it has been compelled to resist the Roman Catholics and their progress, and, on the other, has been forced to maintain its position among Protestants, without being able to form any union or engage in any concert of action with them. In the present article it will be the writer's aim to give a tolerably full account of the history and progress of this Church, together with some supplementary statements and remarks in regard to its peculiar claims and adaptedness for the great work of evangelizing our country and helping to make the Gospel known throughout the dark places of the earth where heathenism prevails.

I. History.—Here a natural division suggests itself faith of Christ, and to educate them in accordance with this faith. Mr. G. Thorpe, a man of good parts and breeding, was appointed head of the new institution, and it was confidently hoped and expected that the red men would be taught the true religion and become Christians and members of a civilized community; but a rude shock was given to this hope by the Indians, who, hating and fearing the intruders, as they considered the whites to be, resorted, in 1622, to a bloody massacre; this, it may be noted, would have been complete extermination, had not a Christian Indian disclosed the plot the night before, and thus prevented its entire fulfilment. The deplorable result was, the imbittering the feelings of all towards the Indians and a fierce war of retaliation; so that, for the time, the college, missionary labors, and Christian education were abandoned. In 1626 Virginia became a royal colony, and though its religious concerns were not so zealously looked after as under the charter, yet the people as a whole remained steadfast in their attachment to the Church of England, and their determination to sustain it in every way in their power.

Virginia, too, where many cavaliers sought refuge, was loyal to the exiled monarchy when Cromwell came into power, while New England, on the other hand, sympathized heartily with the "lord protector" and his work. After the Restoration, in 1660, the colonial legislature, under the new governors, gave early attention to the repairs and building of churches, the canonical performance of the liturgy, the ministration of God's word, the baptizing and Christian education of the young, etc. It is, however, safely true that religion had greatly declined among the people; violent contests occurred between the governors and the assembly of the people; the ruling party was intol erant; popular discontent increased; and rebellion actually broke out. So injurious were these disturbances and the wicked passions to which they gave rise that almost of necessity the godly life and conversation declined; and the Church became weakens to such an extent that, it is recorded, out of fifty parishes, nearly all were destitute of glebe, parsonage, church, and minister, and there were not more than ten in holy orders left. In 1665 Rev. James Blair came as missionary to Virginia. Four years later he was appointed commissary of the bishop of London, a position of great responsibility and trust, especially with regard to discipline of both clergy and laity. He also held a seat in the council, and continued at his post as commissary for more than half a century, doing much good and contributing to the advancement of the Church and the good work of the Church. It was through his energetic efforts and well-directed zeal that the College of William and Mary was chartered in 1692. Its design was to provide a college in Virginia for the education of young men and may be furnished with a seminary of ministers of the Gospel; that the youth may be piously educated in good letters and manners; and that the Christian faith may be propagated among the Western Indians, to the glory of Almighty God." Blair became president of this the second college founded in America, and lived to a very advanced age.

The neighboring colony of Maryland, founded in 1634 by lord Baltimore, a Roman Catholic, with some two hundred families and two or more priests of that Church, was not so successful in opening its doors to every person professing to believe in Jesus Christ. The colonial assembly in 1634 declared, in the words of Magna Charta, that "Holy Church within this province shall have all her rights and privileges." Whether by this term was meant the Church of England or not, it is certain that the influence and membership of that Church were greatly extended. The general progress of the colony was so successful that at lord Baltimore's death, in 1676, there were in Maryland ten counties and about sixteen thousand inhabitants, the largest part of whom were Protestants. At this day a letter was addressed to the archbishop of Canterbury by a clergyman named Yeo, complaining of the low state of morals in the colony, and of the fact that the clergy of the Church of England had no settled incomes like their brethren in Virginia, and that consequently their position was such that it was impossible for them to effect good as it ought to be. Efforts were made to induce the proprietary to provide maintenance for the Church; this, however, he wholly refused. Seditious movements thereupon were set on foot against him as being a "papist," and it was maliciously rumored that the Roman Catholics, with the complicity of the Indians, were purposing to massacre the Protestants. On the accession of William of Orange in 1688, a so-called "Protestant revolution" took place, and for three years the government was in the hands of the insurgents. Lord Baltimore having been deprived of his rights as proprietary, a royal governor was sent into Maryland, and in 1692 the Church of England was established by law; the province was divided into thirty parishes, and tithes were imposed for support of the clergy upon every inhabitant, no matter what might be his religious opinions. The Roman Catholics and Quakers opposed this with all their might, and with more or less success. In 1696 new laws were made, which still, however, recognized the Church of England as by law established as entitled to all its rights, privileges, and endowments. The governor and council, with the freedom of the house, begged the bishop of London to send them a commissary at least (since they were not allowed to have a bishop), "to redress what was amiss and supply what was wanting in the Church." Dr. Thomas Bray, a very estimable and truly godly man, was the one chosen to fill this important position. At great personal sacrifice he accepted it. He secured as many pious and devoted clergymen as he could to go with him to America, and was soon enabled to increase the number of those laboring in Maryland from three to sixteen; he also obtained for the new Church a willing and as one step led to another, and as he perceived how great was the need and how important was the result of combined action on the part of the members of the Church, he conceived the noble idea of founding the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. The latter was chartered in June, 1701, the former in 1698. Early in March, 1700, Dr. Bray arrived in Maryland, and entered at once with zeal and diligence upon his work. He assembled the clergy, delivered charges, administered the sacraments, and exercised the influence of his office, and the laws passed by the legislature for the settlement and maintenance of the parochial clergy. By this bill it was provided "that the Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments, with the rites and ceremonies thereunto annexed, should be used in the Church of England, the Psalter and Psalms of David, and morning and evening prayer, therein contained, be solemnly read by all and every minister or reader in every church or other place of public worship within this province." Despite some opposition, the king gave the enactment his sanction, and it became law. Although Dr. Bray's stay in Maryland was terminated in 1701, he never ceased his efforts in behalf of the Church there; and it is on record that out of some thirty thousand inhabitants in Maryland at this date, the majority were regular members of the Church of England. The Carolinas and Georgia were among the later colonies in the southern part of America. Several ineffectual efforts had been made from 1630-60 to found settlements in the region of Albemarle Sound; but it was not till after the restoration of Charles II that a body of colonists under the leadership of George Machamer took the task and met with success. "Being excited," as they declared, "by a landable and pious zeal for the propagation of the Gospel, they begged a certain country in the parts of America not yet cultivated and planted, as only by this the honor and blessings of him who has no other pledge of God." This letter allowed entire freedom of religious opinion, and no one was to be disturbed on these matters by the public authorities. We are sorry to say, however, that, notwithstanding the pious and proper language quoted above, the noble proprietaries made no provision for the spiritual interests of the religious faith of the colonists. The famous John Locke's "grand model" of government (1670) turned out to be a grand failure, and was abolished in 1698. George Fox, the founder of the Quaker denomination, visited Carolina and gave quite an impulse to the peculiar notions in religion which he entertained. The religious condition of the colony at the close of the century was on the whole very unsatisfactory, and ungodliness prevailed to a lamentable extent. Early in the 18th century the majority of the colonists were dissenters, yet acts were passed in 1704-6, establishing the Church of England as the religion of the province. This produced trouble and resistance of course, and was of no real advantage to the Church. The Society for Propagating the Gospel sent missionaries into the Carolinas, and some, though mostly ineffective, struggles were made to stay the floods of ungodliness, fanaticism, and semi-heathenism; it was a hard and almost hopeless contest during the greater part of the century. Georgia owed its origin to Oglethorpe's benevolent designs and efforts from 1732 onward. Religious privileges were freely accorded. The Georgia Assembly decided that the first settlers to arrive should be the clergy. A small company of Jews came also; and a body of Scotch Highlanders founded New Inverness in 1736. At this date, too, John and Charles Wesley were in Georgia. John Wesley was parish minister in Savannah, and for a while matters went on very well and satisfactorily; but ere long the strictness of Wesley in enforcing the rubrics, and the dissatisfaction of the colonists who were very restive under Church discipline, led to dissension and irreconcilable differences; so that Wesley "shook off the dust of his feet," as he phrases it, and left Georgia in 1742. The first Methodist society after came to Georgia, and though he was continually itinerating to and from England and through the northern colonies, stirring up great excitement by his fiery zeal and energy, yet his labors in Georgia as a clergyman of the Church of England met with fair success. The same statement may here be made as in the case of the Carolinas, that missionaries of the Society for Propagating the Gospel did what they could in behalf of religion and the Church; but they were far too few and ill-supported to accomplish much. The religious condition of the colonies, where, as in Virginia, the Church of England was planted at the date of the earliest settlement in America, and where it flourished despite the fact of being deprived of an essential element in the life and growth of the Church, viz. episcopal presence and supervision, we may next glance at the more northerly portion of the continent. New York (formerly New Netherlands) was first colonized by the Dutch in 1615 onward, and of course was in its religious character Presbyterian, like the Hollanders at home. In 1664 it was seized by the English, and became the English part of the colonial empire of England. After a time the Church of England obtained precedence, and for a while was supported by public tax. Trinity Church was founded in New York city in 1698; the Rev. W. Vesey was its first rector, and was also for fifty years commencement of the bishop of London; it is probably the wealthiest church corporation in the United States. New Jersey (New Sweden), in like manner, and the banks of the Delaware from the mouth inland, were settled by Swedes in 1638. In 1655, the Quakers in Delaware had settled Quakers in the colony, and though in religious profession the inhabitants were principally Presbyterians and Quakers, yet there was open toleration to all other Christian believers. Missionaries of the Society for Propagating the Gospel were at an early day earnestly and zealously at work, at several points in New Jersey, and besides the names of Talbot, Beach, and others, that of Dr. T. B. Chandler, of Elizabethown, must ever be held in grateful memory by churchmen. The Protestant Episcopal Church has always been comparatively strong in New Jersey. Pennsylvania was founded by William Penn in 1681-82, and, so far as the Quakers were concerned, to all of every name. It deserves to be mentioned, too, that, as in the early history of Virginia, kindness and gentleness were displayed towards the native tribes, and no Quaker blood was ever shed by the Indians. The first Episcopal Church built in Pennsylvania was Christ's Church, Philadelphia, in 1695; and several points the missionaries of the Society for Propagating the Gospel were, during the early part of the 18th century, actively engaged in preaching the Gospel. Great ungodliness prevailed in all directions, and fanaticism, in its most offensive, hurstful form, displayed itself; but the clergy labored on, amid every discouragement, and their labors were blessed to a large extent. In all the colonial enterprises thus far, as we have seen, the Church of England was allowed a reasonably fair and just privilege of ministering to the wants of its own people, and extending its boundaries and influence, as best it could in accordance with the rights of others. But when we look at New England, and see what treatment the Church met with there, the contrast is striking indeed. Here, as is well known, it met with the first set of theocratic measures in the history of the time Puritans. They were men who had been engaged in long and fierce contentions with the established Church in England. They were men also of stern and unyielding natures, and among them, the leading ones at least, for good reasons, as they held, hated the Church with as nearly a perfect hatred as is possible for man to attain. There was no term in the vocabulary of reproach which they did not heap upon the Church and its clergy and members, as well as its liturgy and services. They refused to allow two clergymen of the Church of England to reside in New England, 1623-24, to preach and labor in any way in their vocation; and the brothers Browne, two of the original patentees of the Massachusetts Bay Company, who desired to enjoy the services of the Church of England, and that too only in a private dwelling, were shipped off in 1629, without ceremony, by Endecott, the governor, on the ground that they were "factious and evil-conditioned." Thus was begun that series of oppressive actions and intolerant disregard of the rights of others which resulted in the judicial murder of the Quakers. In a letter, dated from April 7, 1638, a body of Puritans were embarking from England under Winthrop and Saltonstall, they spoke of themselves as men "who esteem it an honor to call the Church of England, whence we rise, our dear mother; and we cannot part from our native country, where she specially resided, without much sadness of heart, and many tears in our eyes; ever acknowledging that such hope and part as we have obtained in the common salvation we have received in her bosom, and sucked it from her three breasts. And these chosen men and their successors, with strange and painful distinction, have no plain meaning of their words, resolved upon and put in practice intolerance in its most venerable form. They had suffered, as they averred, bitter persecution and grievous wrong in England from the "lord bishops" in authority there, who gave no heed to the scruples and scruples in Church matters; but, so far from showing forth love and gentleness and kindness and liberality as regards other people's consciences, they seem, when the power fell on their own hands, to have become, in all matters relating to their religion, as hardened as the rocks; and, with a spirit of unpiety and hateful as that of the Inquisition itself, they determined that no man, woman, or child, where they had strength to stop it, should ever hold any opinion or have any religious faith which they, the "lord brethren" of New England, did not approve. They fined, imprisoned, or banished recusants of all sorts. "God forbid," said they, through Endicott, an impersonation of bigotry, "that our love of truth should be so cold that we should tolerate errors!" They allowed no one who differed from them to live among them. Convicted Anabaptists were "sent in irons," Congregationalists with fanatical violence defied the magistrates and ministers, were sentenced, after the first conviction, to lose one ear; after the second, another; after the third, to have the tongue bored through with a red hot-iron; and several of them were put to death; but in 1661 Church II, by a peremptory order, forbade further outrages of this kind. As to the Indians, though the colonists were under chartered obligation to treat them well and endeavor to convert them to Christianity, these were looked upon as having no rights to be respected, as wolves, savages, heathen, and doomed, like the Canaanites of old, to utter excision as speedily as possible. It was only such men as Roger Williams in Rhode Island, and the estimable John Eliot, the Apostle to the Indians, and the comparatively few who sympathized with them, that helped to relieve New England bigotry and intolerance from being denounced as utterly detestable. The Puritans, in carrying out their principles, organized what they called churches on the same plan of independency as that employed in civil matters. They looked upon themselves as under no restraint, and under no obligation to anyone, or to any "denomination, sect, or mother, the Church of England," and they thought and acted as if they could just as readily have—to use a pet phrase of later days—a church without a bishop as a state without a king. Of course, under such a condition of affairs, and with such antagonism and prejudice against the Church and all appertaining to it, it could make little or no progress in New England; and it is a fact to be noted that for some sixty years after the landing on Plymouth rock there was not a single Episcopal church in all that part of the country. It was not until 1672 that Church II, in the form of a representation of some of the inhabitants through the bishop of London, caused a church to be built in Boston. William of Orange subsequently settled an annual bounty of £100 for endowment.

From this time onward, however, owing to the unwearied and judicious efforts of the Society for Propagating the Gospel, something began to be accomplished, in despite of penal enactments and bitter, uncompromising hatred. Missionaries were sent out to various parts of New England as well as to the other colonies (except Virginia and Maryland); and as they were honest, faithful men, abounding in labors, travelling over large districts, and ministering the Gospel to all whom they met with, they deserve all honor, and their labors were not without fruit. Had the Church of England listened to that supplication for bishops which went up continually and earnestly, and had she been permitted to send out worthy men for the episcopal office, the growth and prosperity of the Church in America would have been vastly greater and more secure: but the ungodly, the capitalists, the hammer condition of the Established Church, and the active opposition of the Puritans in New England and of the dissenters in England as well as their special friends in America, always succeeded in overpowering the cry of the destitute and the numerous and powerful remonstrances of the Society for Propagating the Gospel. At one time there were two nonjurors bishops in America, viz. Dr. R. Walton and Dr. J. Talbot (1722), the former in Philadelphia, the latter in Burlington, N. J.; but they were not allowed to exercise episcopal functions except by the government, when they were placed, with other interference, and put an entire stop to all action on their part. As early as 1704, a missionary of the society took up his residence in Newport, R. I., and continued there nearly half a century. During his ministry, and that of several helpers in the work, he could not but note the depressing effects of schism and heresy, there being then quite as many denominations in Rhode Island as there have been in subsequent days. Bishop Berkeley deserves to be named in this connection for his noble disinterestedness and zeal. In 1725 he entered upon his great philanthropic and Christian enterprise of erecting a college at Charlestown near Providence, for the education of the children of the planters, and suitable ones from among the natives as missionaries in order to convert the savages to Christianity. In 1726 Berkeley was in Rhode Island, and had not the government of Walpole kept him out the £20,000 voted, he would probably have accomplished his beneficent design. The next year he returned to England, and reluctantly gave up his cherished plan. Some eighteen years later he caused to be sent as a gift to the library of Harvard College a very valuable collection of books, containing such authors as Hooker, Pearson, Barrow, Hammond, Clarendon, etc., and these no doubt helped to leave the minds of some in New England, who, weary of the despotism of independency, and grieved and distressed at there being multitudinous sects of all kinds and characters, were disposed to seek and did seek, refuge in the sober, staid, and godly ways of the Church of England. It is also worthy of note here that early in the 18th century, about thirty-five years before Berkeley's donation to Harvard College, a library of books, similar in character and value to those just named, was given to Yale College, and the college was established in New Haven. At this date there was not a single Episcopal Church in Connecticut, and very few families of Church people. There were, however, in this region, several earnest seekers after truth, disenchanted and cheerless in their then position, among whom may be named especially Timothy Cutler, an accomplished scholar, and president of Yale College; Daniel Brown, one of the tutors; and Samuel Johnson, a Congregational preacher at West Haven. These, in company with others in like condition of mind, set to work to examine the books sent to Yale, and felt the need of a Church and doctrines of the apostolic and early Church. The result was, rather to the astonishment and alarm of most of their associates, a thorough conviction on their part that there was no valid ministry except through the laying-on of the hands of a bishop, and that the doctrines set forth in the Prayer-book are the true and full expression of the truth of the Gospel. Of course, Messrs. Cutler and Brown could not stay any longer in Yale College, which neither recognised nor tolerated the Church of England in any shape, but, in common with Congregationalists generally, as well as with others who entertained fears lest the introduction of Episcopal worship into the colony should have a tendency gradually to undermine the foundations of civil and religious liberty. Accordingly these gentlemen resigned their positions, and, accompanied by Mr. Johnson, they sailed for England in November, 1722, were ordained to the ministry, and (except Mr. Brown, who died of small-pox) returned to America as missionaries of the society the following year. Dr. Cutler became rector of Christ's Church, Boston, and Dr. Johnson, who settled at Windsor, Conn. Both of them were among the foremost men in the colonial Church, and were of especial service in defending its claims, warding off attacks, and promoting its growth and welfare. Both, too, lived till nearly the close of the colonial period, Dr. Cutler dying in 1765, Dr. Johnson in 1772. The Church in Connecticut was more than ordinarily blessed, and we find that, prior to the Revolution, it was comparatively vigorous and zealous in good works. The names of Beach, Seabury, Jarvis, Hubbard, and others abundantly evince the activity of churchmen. It may here be stated that down to the outbreak of the Revolution, the Society for Propagating the Gospel maintained, on an average, thirty clergymen in the New England states, and about fifty in the other colonies. One list of churches which was sent home by a missionary in 1748 makes the number in New Hamp-Shire two, in Rhode Island five, in Massachusetts twelve, in Connecticut seventeen—total, thirty-six. It must be borne in mind that this was placed in the centre of an extensive district, and supplied as far as possible the spiritual wants of the people, whom oftentimes he could reach only by long and even dangerous journeys to and from distant settlements. The Society did all that its means allowed in sending missionaries into the wilderness. This was a direction in which it was already and properly be noted of its work that when it began its operations in the colonies, it found but five churches; and when compelled by the revolt of the colonies to close its labors, it left the country with some two hundred of its clergy. It was the life and soul of the life and growth.

The Church of England in America was peculiarly unhappy in its position just before and at the period of the Revolution. It had no popular favor to fall back upon in those days of trial. It was small in proportion to other Christian bodies, especially in the north, and it was hated and despised by the ill-informed multitude, which regarded it as virtually identical with priestcraft and tyranny. A considerable number of its clergy, particularly those who were English-born, felt compelled by their own convictions to adhere to the cause of the king. The work that was on them and the Church likewise; for when the disputes with the mother country reached that crisis which culminated in the war of the Revolution, there could be no longer any hesitation as to the side which every man must take. The Church was not neutral; it was on the side with the king or with the king's party; he must be a patriot, heart and soul, or he must be branded with and suffer with the odious Tories. The result was the abandonment of their fields of labor by most of the clergy in the employ of the Society for Propagating the Gospel, who found their only safety in flight to England or the British provinces; the closing of nearly all the churches; and, worse than all, the disgraceful ruin and defilement heaped upon many church edifices.

It was none the less hard and unjust to American churchmen to be forced to bear all this in addition to the trials of war, insomuch as it is only simple justice to put it on record, to the perpetual honor of the Church and the vindication of its members against the freely circulated charge of lack of patriotism in the great struggle against the tyranny of the English government. The Church stood forth, in the words of our forefather, the churchman, and the first chaplain of Congress was William White, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

2. History subsequent to the Revolution, including the full organization and entrance on its work of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States—When, at last, the war was over, and the independence of the United States was acknowledged (1783), it became a matter of immediate concern to those who had heretofore been dependent on England for ordination of clergy, and for efficient and steady help from the Society for Propagating the Gospel, to ascertain what was now to be done. Here they were, few in numbers comparatively; cut off from all direct connection with the English Church; having not even the small comfort of being considered as any part of the Church of London; with no means of helping themselves; no bishops, few clergy, and those scattered over a large surface of country; in great perplexity as to the proper course to be pursued; and reduced pretty nearly to the condition of hopeless uncertainty. In Virginia, for instance, at the beginning of the Revolution, there were 164 churches and chapels and 91 clergymen; at the close of the great struggle a large number of these churches had been destroyed; 95 parishes were extinct or forsaken; of the remaining 72, three-quarters were without parochial Wesley; while of the 91 clergy only 29 remained. But, bad as the state was of affairs, it was not altogether desperate. The great Head of the Church did not abandon his people in their trouble. Those brave and honest men who had tried for years and years to induce the government and Church of England to show a toleration to them were thoroughly conscious that they must not now give up in despair. The mean and paltry reasons of state, and the venal prejudice that had been stirred up from this side of the water against the continuous supplication for a bishop during nearly a century just past—these could not but wear out the patience of the people. There was a new nation in the world, in no wise hampered by any union of Church and State; now it could not be pretended that there was any danger to public liberty from the Episcopal Church having and enjoying what it regards as an essential to its being and growth. To us, at this day, when a century of existence has been granted to the United States, and the Protestant Episcopal Church has proved its right to be what it has now become, it seems almost incredible that it could ever have been seriously urged against that Church that its having bishops of its own was (in some strange, unaccountable way) hurtful and dangerous to liberty and true patriotism. However singular it may appear that such an opinion should prevail among fair-minded, intelligent persons, the fact is indisputable; this opinion did not thrive in the great war; it was not propagated; and when the crisis came, all the new growth and suffering to the Church in America. All that can be said is, that as prejudice is usually utterly unreasonable, and will listen to nothing which militates against its preconceived conclusions, so we have no alternate explanation but that on one side to the Government and protection to the Episcopal Church to this hard, stern prejudice; while it is almost certain that a large part of the opposition arose from settled hatred towards the Church and a determination to prevent its growth and influence. Bishop White's testimony is instructive in this connection. Writing in 1816, he may have seen the wonderful change the author lived to witness in reference to American episcopacy! He remembers the ante-revolutionary times, when the presses profusely emitted pamphlets and newspaper disquisitions on the question whether an American bishop were to be endured; and when threats were thrown out of throwing such a person, if sent among us, into the river, although his agency was advocated for the sole purpose of a communion submitting itself to his spiritual jurisdiction... The order has existed among us for nearly the half of a century, and the ecumenical, and we cannot but be thankful that the Church of England, and the other denominations of our country, have been able to preserve and maintain the constitution of the Church, and to provide for its administration. The Church of England in America was established by law, meetings, consisting of a large number of the clergy and laity, and the state so as to hold and retain its rights of property in churches, glebe lands, etc. A general willingness was expressed of uniting with Episcopal churches in other states; but ground was taken in regard to bishops and their office and position which alarmed the Northern churches. The Virginia nation was to receive a bishop to the lowest possible point, to use him simply for ordaining and confirming, to make him serve as a parish minister, and be amenable to the convention, etc. In Maryland, a special effort was made to secure a bill of rights for the Episcopal Church, for objects similar to those of Virginia: "a declaration of certain fundamental rights and liberties of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Maryland" was set forth; and Dr. William Smith was chosen to go to England for the purpose of obtaining episc... cogual orders. It may be mentioned here that, for various and sufficient reasons, Dr. Smith did not obtain the proper papers, and was never consecrated. Farther south, a convention, consisting of a small number of clergy and laity, was held in Charleston, S. C., in 1785-86. The feeling against the Church of England was very bitter in that part of the country, which had suffered greatly from the ravages of the British armies. This convention, acknowledging the need of the three orders in the ministry, was willing to go so far as a general approval of union, but stipulated that there was to be no bishop settled in that state without the consent of the convention. In January, 1784, Dr. Beach, of New Brunswick, N. J., made a suggestion to Dr. White, of Philadelphia, and Dr. Provost, of New York, that a conference of as many of the clergy as could be conveniently got together be held, to take into consideration the condition of Church affairs. Previously to this, in August, 1789, before the recognition of American independence, and when it seemed as if the ministry of the Church were almost annihilated, Dr. White had issued a pamphlet, entitled "The Case of the Episcopal Churches in the United States Considered." In which the writer, apprehending the possibility of the Church being compelled to go forward without obtaining the succession from England, advocated the formation of a new body, without bishops in the regular line of succession, but without ordination. This, however, was only in case absolute necessity required such a course, and, as bishop White himself subsequently stated, it was suggested only for such a possible state of affairs. The writer was, in reality, too good a churchman not to embrace joyously the opportunity which was offered three years later of obtaining the succession in the English line. A meeting of several clergymen from New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, members of the Corporation for the Relief of Widows and Children of Clergymen, was held in New Brunswick, May 11, 1784. At this meeting a number of laymen were also present, and another meeting was appointed for October in the same year in New York. Accordingly, Oct. 6, 1784, some fifteen clergymen from New England, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, and eleven laymen from the same states, assembled in New York. The result of this meeting, besides the making of some important recommendations, such as, that there be a General Convention of the Episcopal Church; that each state send clerical and lay deputies; that the doctrines held by the Church of England be adhered to; that the bishop and the altered order be in full exchange demand, that in any state having a bishop, he be, at the convent, a member of the convention; that the clergy and laity deliberate together, but vote separately, was thus and in quorum; that the first meeting of a general convention be held in Philadelphia on Tuesday before the Feast of St. Michael, in 1785, etc. Probably the most important benefit secured by the action of this body was a recognition of the value and need of lay representation as not only right in itself, but also in admirable harmony with the constitution of a republican form of government. England, on the other hand, was more strongly laid against the having a lay element in Church councils, and for a few years it appeared as if serious discord might arise, and hinder the union of the churches in the several states; but, happily, the point was conceded, though with some reluctance, by the Connecticut bishop and clergy in 1789. One other point of difference existed at the time. The Connecticut sentiment was decidedly in favor of securing a bishop first, and then proceeding to act as a fully organized Church, in passing laws, revising the liturgy, etc., and such was the course adopted in that state. Dr. Samuel Smith, the bishop-elect, meeting with annoying difficulties and delays in England, was consecrated by Scotch bishops, in November, 1784, and, on his return home early in the summer of 1785, entered at once upon his duties as bishop of Connecticut. The churches in the middle and more southern portions of the country held an opposite opinion to that entertained in Connecticut and Massachusetts, and in accordance therewith went forward, and took various steps antecedent to the obtaining of the succession from England. The first meeting of clergy and laity which can properly be considered as approaching to a general convention was held in Philadelphia in September and October, 1785. Seven states were represented by 16 clergymen and 26 laymen. It was hoped that bishop Seabury and some of the New England clergy might be present; but, as their health was precarious, they declined attending. Dr. White was chosen president, and Dr. Griffith, of Virginia, secretary, and the convention proceeded promptly to the work of organization and revision. A plan for obtaining the episcopal succession, and an address to the archbishops and bishops of the Church of England were discussed and agreed upon. These papers were mainly the production of Dr. White, and were manifestly dignified in tone and statement. A draft of alterations of the liturgy, in order to adapt it to the existing condition of civil affairs, and to a considerable extent of consideration, the writer, apprehending the possibility of the Church being compelled to go forward without obtaining the succession from England, advocated the formation of a new body, without bishops in the regular line of succession, but without ordination. This, however, was only in case absolute necessity required such a course, and, as bishop White himself subsequently stated, it was suggested only for such a possible state of affairs. The writer was, in reality, too good a churchman not to embrace joyously the opportunity which was offered three years later of obtaining the succession in the English line. A meeting of several clergymen from New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, members of the Corporation for the Relief of Widows and Children of Clergymen, was held in New Brunswick, May 11, 1784. and to various features in "the Ecclesiastical Constitution," as it was then arranged. Renewed and distinct assurances were obtained from the American Church that there was no intention whatever on its part of departing from the Church of England in doctrine, or in discipline and worship, except in so far as changed civil relations made it necessary, before the venerable Prelates were willing to part, as was the case.

The three Funder's unpleasant feeling expressed by an examination of several members of the convention (Provoost and R. Smith especially) to throw doubt upon the validity of bishop Seabury's orders, obtained from the line of the Scotch nonconformist, was not appreciated; its good sense and discretion by refusing to take any action inimical to the bishop of Connecticut or his position; a resolution simply was passed advising the churches then represented in convention not to receive ministers ordained by any bishop in America, during the application pending to the English bishops for episcopal consecration. "A General Constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States," freed from some serious former objections, was agreed upon, as also an answer to the letter from the archbishops and bishops of the British Church. By the letter, with the constitution, it was hoped and expected would give entire satisfaction. At an adjourned meeting held in Wilmington, Del., in October, 1786, the letter just before received from the archbishops and bishops, with former letters and resolutions annexed allowing the consecration of bishops for foreign countries, were read, and appropriate action was taken. A declaratory "Act of the General Convention of Clerical and Lay Deputies of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and the District of Columbia," authorizing the consecration of bishops for foreign countries, was adopted, and an address was taken. A clergyman voting in its favor. Testimonials were signed in behalf of Dr. White, Dr. Provoost, and Dr. Griffith, bishops elect respectively of Pennsylvania, New York, and Virginia. The convention refused to give a like testimonial in favor of Dr. Alexander, bishop elect of Maryland. On Nov. 2, 1786, Drs. White and Provoost embarked for England, and arrived on the 20th; Dr. Griffith, for personal reasons, was unable to accompany them. Then they reached London, they were unable to have a conference with the American minister, John Adams, who, as bishop White says, in his Memoirs, "in particular, and in every instance in which his personal attentions could be either of use or as an evidence of his respect and kindness, continued to manifest his concern for the interests of a Church of which he was not a member." After some little delay, owing to Parliament not being in session, the consecration took place, Sunday, Feb. 4, 1787, in Lambeth chapel. The two archbishops, and the bishops of Bath and Wells and of Peterborough, united in the solemn act of giving the apostolic succession to the American Church. The new bishops very soon left England for home, and, after a long voyage of seven weeks, arrived in New York on the afternoon of Easter-day, April 7. Thus, at last, was secured for the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States the long and earnestly-sought-for privilege of having its organization rendered complete; thus, too, from this date it took its place as a distinct national branch of the Church of Christ, with all the privileges and duties and responsibilities thereunto attached.

The General Convention of 1789 assembled, July 28, in Philadelphia, bishop White presiding; bishop Provoost was absent. There were present sixteen laymen present from seven states, including South Carolina; but none came from New England. An application was made by the clergy of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, asking for the consecration of the Rev. Edward Bass as bishop. This application was placed on the ground that there were no bishops (the proper canonical number) in America, and that consequently they were fully able to act in the premises. A resolution was unanimously passed "that, in the opinion of this convention, the consecration of the Right Rev. Dr. Seabury and of the other clergy in regard to this general sentiment was strongly in favor of compliance with the request of the Massachusetts clergy. There was, however, an obstacle which hindered this compliance at this time, viz., the obligation which bishops White and Provoost felt themselves to lie under to the English bishops, not to consecrate any to the episcopal office until there were three in the English line in the United States. Dr. Griffith, in May, 1789, relinquished his appointment as bishop elect of Virginia, and died in Philadelphia during the session. Hence, it was thought that there was not the necessary compliance from Massachusetts. A body of canons, ten in number, was adopted; a General Constitution of the Church was agreed upon in substance; an appropriate address was prepared, thanking the archbishops of Canterbury and York for their urgent appeal; an authorizing the consecration of bishops for foreign countries, was adopted, and an address was sent to the President of the United States, which was courteously answered by Washington; and the convention adjourned, August 8, to meet again in the same place, Sept. 29. An important part of the object of this adjourned session was to secure the union of the churches of the United States with those already joined together. This was now happily accomplished. Bishop Seabury appeared, and took his place as a member of the convention, as did also deputies from Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. The third article of the constitution was modified so as to secure to the bishops the right to assemble and act as a separate house, in originating measures, etc.; they also were to have from this time a negative on the action of the lower house, unless adhered to by a four-fifths vote. The bishops then withdrew and organized as a house. Bishop White being absent on account of illness, bishop Seabury took the chair. From this date there have been two houses, whose concurrent action is necessary to the adoption of any legislation, the bishops also (since 1808) having the full negative. The American minister, John Adams, who, as bishop White says, in his Memoirs, "in this particular, and in every instance in which his personal attentions could be either of use or as an evidence of his respect and kindness, continued to manifest his concern for the interests of a Church of which he was not a member." After some little delay, owing to Parliament not being in session, the consecration took place, Sunday, Feb. 4, 1787, in Lambeth chapel. The two archbishops, and the bishops of Bath and Wells and of Peterborough, united in the solemn act of giving the apostolic succession to the American Church. The new bishops very soon left England for home, and, after a long voyage of seven weeks, arrived in New York on the afternoon of Easter-day, April 7. Thus, at last, was secured for the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States the long and earnestly-sought-for privilege of having its organization rendered complete; thus, too, from this date it took its place as a distinct national branch of the Church of Christ, with all the privileges and duties and responsibilities thereunto attached. The English liturgy was made the basis, and though entire independent action was claimed by the House of Deputies, as if there were no book of any authority or obligation now in existence, yet there was, after all, a sense of the propriety and fitness of varying as little as possible from the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England. Five committees were appointed, to whom were assigned different portions of the work, and they discharged their duties with as much expedition as was practicable. The result, as soon as agreed upon by the house, was sent to the bishops for their action. The alterations were principally verbal, and for the purpose of adapting the Services to the needs and uses of a Church situated as the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States was and is. An office of Visitation of Prisoners, a service for Thanksgiving Day, and an order of Family Prayer were added, as also Selections of Psalms to be used instead of those for the day, and some parts of the Psalms, and some hymns in metre. One noticeable change was made in the Communion Office, i.e. putting in their proper place the oblative and the invocation of the Holy Spirit, as found in the first Prayer book. The Act also established the Episcopal Commission, this was due mainly to bishop Seabury, who was under some degree of a pledge to the Scottish bishops to secure this change, if possible. The meekness and wisdom of bishop White were clearly evident in this matter, as in everything. He was always ready to yield where principle was not violated, and he puts it on record that his discussions with bishop Seabury were entirely amicable and satisfactory to both parties. "To this day," he says, "there are recollected with satisfaction the hours which were spent with bishop Seabury on this subject before him, and especially the Christian temper which he manifested all along." The Apostles' and Nicene Creeds were adopted with hearty assent by the convention. A rub-ic was prefixed to the former, as follows: "And any churches may omit the words 'he descended into hell,' or may, instead of them, use the words 'he went into the place of departed spirits,' which are considered as words of the same meaning in the Creed." Bishop Seabury desired much to have the Athanasian Creed inserted, not as obligatory on all, as in the Church of England, but as a choice, as in the Scotch Church, which was.

bishop White states, the House of Deputies "would not allow of the creed in any shape." The consideration of the "Articles of Religion" was postponed to a subsequent convention. The Book of Common Prayer was formally ratified by the bishops, clergy, and laity in convention June 16, 1789: "This Convention has in their present session, set forth A Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, do hereby establish the said Book; and they declare it to be the Liturgy of this Church, and require that it be received as such by all the members of the same; and this Book shall be in use from and after the first day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety." A number of canons were passed in regard to episcopal visitations, publishing a list of the clergy, observance of the Lord's day, etc. The consecratior of Dr. Bass was deferred. Dr. Madison, of Virginia, was consecrated bishop in England, Sept. 19, 1790; and thus the full number of bishops was secured through the English line. Two years later the consecration of Dr. Coke, as bishop of Maryland, united both lines in the American episcopate, bishop Seabury being present and joining in the solemn act.
The convention of 1792 met in New York Sept. 11.
There were five bishops, nineteen clerical and fourteen laity deputies, who had been chosen in the elections of the year, which met first in the city of New York, on the 1st of July. The Ordinal was revised and set forth, the alterations being few. An alternate form at the ordination of priests was furnished; instead of "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands; whom thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained. And be thou," etc.; the bishop ordering is allowed to say, "Take thou authority to execute the office of a priest in the Church of God, now committed to thee by the imposition of our hands; whom thou dost forgive," etc. The consideration of the Articles was further posponed. An act was passed "for supporting missionares to preach the Gospel on the frontier of the United States," in which it was recommended that annual sermons be preached in all the churches, that collections be made, and missionaries be sent out as soon as may be, these being under the canonical jurisdiction of the bishop of Pennsylvania. "Agreeably to the requirement of a canon adopted at the last convention, a list of the clergy of the Church is printed in the book. Including the bishops, the number given is one hundred and eighty-four, no lists having been handed in from New Hampshire and Massachusetts, and there being no mention of the number of clergymen at that time in North Carolina and on the Western frontiers. With every allowance there would not have been more than the half of the representatives of nearly two thousand who, with English orders, had labored on the American continent since its earliest attempted settlement, two hundred and fifty years before" (Perry). One other matter deserves to be put on record here, not only because of the importance of the object had in view, both as regards one of the most influential denominations in the United States and the Protestant Episcopal Church, but also because of the entire failure at that date of so earnest and truly Catholic a movement. We give it in the original language, which was communicated to the author, on their journey from Philadelphia to New York, a design which he had at much at heart—that of effecting a reunion with the Methodists; and he was so sanguine as to believe that by an accommodation to them in a few instances, they would be induced to give up their peculiar dogs of war and come to the leading parts of the doctrine, the worship, and the discipline of the Episcopal Church. It is to be noted that he had no idea of comprehending them, on the condition of their continuing embodied, as at present. He refers to an interview with Dr.
Coke, an intercourse held with Dr. Coke, one of the superintendents of that society which might have shown to bishop Madison how hopeless all endeavors for such a juncture must prove. Nevertheless, he persisted in his well-meaning design. The result of this was his introducing a proposition for the union of the two bodies, which his brethren, after some modifications, approved of the motive, but expecting little as the result of it, conceived to send to the other house." The proposition (as given by bishop White) was placed on a broad and liberal basis, leaving most of matters to future discussion and settlement at a subsequent convention.
"On the reading of this in the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies, they were astonished, and considered it as altogether preposterous; tending to produce distrust of the stability of the system of the Episcopal Church, without the least prospect of embracing any other religious body. The members generally stated, as a matter of indifference, that they would permit the withdrawing of the paper, and no notice to be taken of it.
A few gentlemen, however, who had got some slight informations, thought, in the whole, that it did not in Dr. Coke's mind, the author, who would have been gratified by an acaccommodation with the Methodists, and who thought that the paper sent was a step in measures to be taken to that effect, spoke in favor of the proposition. But it was not adopted, and we drew it, agreeably to leave given." Bishop White gives, in addition, the letter of Dr. Coke, and an account of several interviews had with him. The letter is an instructive one in many respects, and shows what Dr.
Coke thought of his supposed "episcopal" character, derived from John Wesley; bishop White's remarks and statements also are worthy of grave consideration.
The subject has been more than once agitated, and sometimes men have become sanguine of being able to effect the end desired; but as the question of ordination still remains obscure, and it was on the 23rd of May, and the Methodist ministers almost certainly not be brought to acknowledge the obligation of being ordained by our bishops in order to officiate in our churches, we apprehend that there never has been any real probability of bringing the Methodists to a sense of the duty and propriety of becoming reunited to the Church at whose altar John Wesley always ministered, and which he at least was never willing to abandon.
Owing to the prevalence of epidemic disease in Philadelphia and its vicinity, the convention of 1798 was not held, but then adjourned. Another convention was held in 1798. A special convention, however, met in Philadelphia, June 11, 1799. Eight states were represented, nineteen clerical and ten lay deputies being present. Bishop Seabury, who had died in 1786, was succeeded by bishop Jarvis, consecrated Sept. 18, 1797. Dr. R. Smith was made bishop of South Carolina in 1795, and Dr. Bass of Massachusetts in 1797. At this convention an attempt was made to obtain its approval of Dr. U. Ogden, bishop elect of New Jersey; but the electors withdrew and Dr. Jarvis, bishop of New York, was elected in their place. Eight years later Dr. Jarvis joined the Presbyterians. A proposition was made to hold General Convention every five years; a form of consecration of a church or chapel was set forth; and seventeen articles were reported and read. These were ordered to be laid over, and printed in the journal. The electors withdrew and the convention adjourned without the election of any bishop, and twelve clergymen. At the convention of 1801, held at Trenton, N. J., Sept. 8, it was announced that bishop Provost had resigned his jurisdiction as bishop of New York. Under the circumstances it was deemed right to consecrate Dr. Benjamin Moore as his assist ant, the principle being distinctly stated that bishop Provost was bishop during his life, and that bishop Moore was simply assistant or coadjutor, competent to all episcopal duty, but still to act in concurrence with bishop Provost. The principal work of the convention was the journal of the convention and the articles of religion. The printing of the seventeen articles, in the journal of 1799, produced one good result, viz., showing how difficult it was and would be to agree upon a new set of articles for the Protestant Episcopal Church, and that the entire matter was reduced to the reading acceptance of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. It was bishop White's view that these articles were really "the acknowledged faith of the Church" all along, and that the safest and most satisfactory course was to make certain necessary changes, arising out of the actual condition of affairs, and then to adopt the Thirty-nine entire. This was accordingly done, and, as bishop White states, the articles "were adopted by the two houses of convention, without their altering even the obsolete diction in them..." The change of the general situation had rendered necessary." Article VIII was amended by leaving out the Athenian Creed. Article XLI, on general councils, was omitted, the reason being given in a note, "because it is partly of a local and civil nature, and is provided for, as to the remaining parts of it, in other articles." The XXXIVth Article, on the homilies, was retained, with a note added suspending "the order for the reading of said homilies in churches until revision of them may conveniently be made, for the clearing of them, as well from obsolete words as from distortion of thought." The article XXXVI was altered so far as to set forth that the ordinal of 1792 contained the Church's views and principles on this important point. Article XXXVII in the English Prayer-book was omitted, and a new one substituted, "Of the Power of the Civil Magistrate." The articles as a whole were then ratified by both houses of convention, and they have ever since held their place in the Prayer-book and standards of the Church. Bishop White's remarks, in this connection, deserve to be quoted: "The object kept in view, in all these changes, was the perpetuating of the Episcopal Church on the ground of the general principles which she had inherited from the Church of England; and of not separating from them, except so far as either local circumstances required, or some very important cause rendered proper. To those acquainted with the system of the Church of England, it must be evident that the object here stated was accomplished on the ratification of the Articles." 8. History of the Protestant Episcopal Church since the beginning of the century. — The standard of the Church having thus been adopted and, so to speak, in the final setting-forth of the Book of Common Prayer, its history and progress since that date are those of a completely organized branch of the Catholic Church. That it did not at once expand itself and cover the land is simply true, and that it has had in later years its times of sore trial and despondency is equally true. There was unhappily in the early part of the century a lack of thorough education in Church principles; there were the prevalence of sectarianism, jealousy felt by the various Protestant denominations, the sleepless enmity of the Roman Catholic Church; and the last years of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars were sufficient to create in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and wide-spread ungodliness on every hand, resulting in spiritual torpor and almost death. For a time it seemed (as Dr. Hawks says of Virginia) as if naught but "gnominy darkness" enveloped the Church. By a strange combination of circumstances, the act of the legislature of New Jersey in 1808 for confounding the glebes and Church property, which was resisted on the ground of being clearly illegal, became law by the death of the presiding judge in the court of appeals the night before he was to deliver the decision, all written out, securing to the Church its just rights. The effect upon the Church in Virginia was fearful and well-nigh disastrous, especially in the ruin and utter abandonment of church edifices and the dying-out of religion in every shape among the people. Even when, in 1814, a brighter day began to dawn, "the Church at the time was the 'New York and New England Church.' Bishop Keppler was elected to show the presence of but seven clergymen and seventeen laymen. We look back upon the past, and are struck with the contrast. Seven clergymen were all that could be convened to transact the most important measure for the restoration of the Church, which was called upon to perform, and in this a territory where once more than ten times seven regularly served at the altar. We look back still farther, and find the Church, after the lapse of two hundred years, numbering as many ministers as she possessed at the close of the first eight years of her existence" (Hawks). In Maryland and its neighbor Delaware, matters were hardly any better. "In 1808 there was a spirit of indifference to religion and the Church too extensively prevalent in the parishes; nearly one half of them were vacant; and, in some, all ministerial support had ceased. Some few of the clergy had deserted their stations; and of the residue, several, disheartened and embarrassed by inadequate means of living, had sought subsistence in other states. Infidelity and fanaticism were increasing; and, on the whole, there never was a time when ministers were more needed, or when it was more difficult to obtain them" (Hawks). Such was the state of things in general at the South in the early part of the 19th century. Further North, in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and much of New England, the prospects were more promising. Thomas Jefferson, Henry Hobart as assistant to bishop B. Moore of New York, May 29, 1811, and of Alexander Viets Griswold for the eastern diocese (i.e. Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, and Vermont) at the same date, were indications of healthy growth. The former became especially prominent, during his episcopate of nearly twenty years, as the representative of what are called "High-Churchmen" in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and his influence on the character, claims, and position of the Church in the United States, in the estimate of his contemporaries, and in the estimation of the Christian bodies among whom he lived, can hardly be overvalued. No one could possibly, or did, misunderstand him, and he was so resolute withhold in the open avowal of his principles and convictions, and so ready to defend them on all occasions, even that "unchurching" dogma, as many like to call it, that it may be said the bishop or clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church...

PROTESTANT EPISC. CHURCH 678 PROTESTANT EPISC. CHURCH

has ever done so much as John Henry Hobart in defining the position and claims, and educating, so to speak, the whole Church to the adoption of fixed and settled views on this important subject. Bishop Hobart's personal character and devotion to his work, his unquestionable purity of purpose, in all that he has said, his all too long free and cordial correspondence with bishop White (whom no one ever charged with being a High-Churchman), strengthened, undoubtedly, his influence, and even those who differed with him, and represented what are called 'Low-Church' views and principles, could not but respect a high consideration and a devout veneration of principles to which they were, with equal conscientiousness, totally opposed. It is not, probably, too much to affirm that the steadfast adherence of the Protestant Episcopal Church to its standards of doctrine, discipline, and worship, and its fixed and often expressed determination (through the General Convention and its action), never to recede from its attitude towards either Rome or Protestants of various names, are due in great measure to the labors, teaching, and publications of bishop Hobart, and the large number of clergymen and laymen who have been educated in the Church principles with which his name is associated.

The action of the General Convention, from this time onward, has been devoted to legislating for the best interests of the Church, and as far as possible to taking such steps as would promote the welfare of the Church, in God's blessing, under the practical guidance of the Church, which is to promote the increase of faith and holy obedience, to guard against the intrusion of error and unsound doctrine, and to place various matters of doubt or difference of opinion on such a footing that the largest tolerance be allowed, in these respects, consistent with preserving the faith once delivered to the saints and the maintenance of apostolic truth and order. In 1804 a "Course of Ecclesiastical Studies" was set forth by the bishops, and it still remains in its original shape, notwithstanding that many and valuable works, in the several branches of the Church, have since been published, and are in use in our seminaries and schools of divinity. The General Convention of 1871, in its canon on examinations for orders, says: "In all these examinations reference shall be had, as closely as possible, to the course of study established by the House of Bishops, and to the books therein recommended, or equivalent works of more recent date." In 1808 the bishops, in a message to the House of Deputies, who had asked for the enactment of the English canon concerning marriages, expressed their doubts as to the propriety of enacting the canon. In 1837 and 1846 there were two reports of committees presented on this subject, the majority adverse to legislation, the minority in favor of enacting the canon. Thus the matter stands, the civil law being supreme, except in regard to marriage of divorced persons, which is as follows: "No minister of this Church shall knowingly, after due inquiry, solemnize the marriage of any person who has had a divorced husband or wife still living, if such husband or wife has been put away for any cause arising after marriage; but this canon shall not be held to apply to the parties who are only divorced from another country, by a foreign or ecclesiastical authority of any foreign country." The result of this declaration was, some twelve years later in Vermont, where the Society for Propagating the Gospel had formerly owned lands, "that all the material points of law were settled in favor of the Church." —At this session also the constitution of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church was perfected, and the American Church has since done much —though not so much as it might and ought to have done— in preaching the Gospel in the East, and in the West, and in the South, west of the Appalachian mountains, and in the North, west of the Allegheny mountains. The result of this Church has been to extend the light of Christian truth and power to heathen lands and peoples. From this date the Church seems to have experienced more fully than before the goodness and grace of God in sending his grace upon it, and to have given plain indications of healthy increase in the Church throughout the country. Following the uniform plan, adopted under bishop White's gentle but firm guidance and influence, of keeping clear of entanglements, the convention, in 1820, refused to allow the officiating of persons not regular members of the Church, by the priests of the Protestant Episcopal Church. —In 1814 the subject of a theological seminary was discussed, and the need of such an institution began to be evident. Three years later its organization was resolved upon, and initiatory measures were adopted. Its officers, course of study, etc., were finally agreed upon in 1820, and it began its work. The seminary is situated in New York, and the next year it was finally established as "The General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States." By this action, however, it was distinctly understood that there was to be no hindrance to any seminary or diocese establishing a separate institution of its own. The bishops exercise the wisdom of this policy of non-interference; for, in consequence of the vast extent of territory of the United States, it is found to be simply impossible to gather all the candidates for orders in the Church within the walls of the seminary in New York. We may mention here that there are divinity schools or seminaries in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Wisconsin, and other Western states and dioceses. At this convention the identity of the Protestant Episcopal Church with the Church of England was declared in the following terms: "It has been correctly stated to the House of Bishops that on questions in reference to property devised, before the Revolution, to congregations belonging to the 'Church of England,' and to uses connected with that name, some doubts have been entertained in some parts of the Church; and, when the two names have been applied, the House think it expedient to make the declaration, and to request the concurrence of the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies therein, that 'The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America' is the same body heretofore known in these states by the name of 'The Church of England; the change of name, although not of religious principle in doctrine, or in worship, or in discipline, being induced by a characteristic of the Church of England, supposing the independence of Christian churches generally, can be published, and are in use in our seminaries and schools of divinity. The General Convention of 1871, in its canon on examinations for orders, says: "In all these examinations reference shall be had, as closely as possible, to the course of study established by the House of Bishops, and to the books therein recommended, or equivalent works of more recent date."

diocese may venture to do in such cases in the way of inviting ministers of various sorts into their churches, it is always to be borne in mind that they do it of their own will and pleasure, and in violation of the canon which they have promised to obey. As a further illustration of the Church policy it may be added that, in 1823, an offer was made by the Colonization Society that the Episcopal Church should send a delegate to act with that society in its benevolent plans. It was deemed inexpedient to accept the offer, because holding that the objects of this society were "more of a political nature, and not in harmony with the principles of our Church," Bishop Chase in his "Plan for Shortening the Morning Service", in respect to the Psalmist, the Lessons, Litany, etc., and also for improving and rendering more effective the confirmation service in the Prayer Book. Quite unexpectedly, considerable excitement followed this proposal, and three years later, when the sense of the state conventions became known as adverse to any changes in the services, the plan was quietly dismissed from all further consideration. So strong is the conservative element in the councils of the Church that no attempt was made to make any changes in the Prayer Book, which had become a part of the life of the Church. Among the clergy who were devout and zealous in their duty, many would gladly welcome a permission of the Church to make changes in the services, as well as in the discipline of the Church, with a view to the improvement of the Church in its service to the world.

In the "Great West", as it is used to be called, the Church had a work of extraordinary interest and importance to perform. The rapid filling-up of the states west of the Alleghenies, and the fact that in the race for life and increase of wealth and power, religion, in any and every form, was almost wholly ignored, caused no little anxiety and concern to thoughtful men in the Church, who saw the need of not only more, but better, work in the West. It was clearly seen that if the Church were to be abandoned to chance efforts and the zeal of a few religious men here and there, the result would be that that portion of the country would grow up into might and wealth virtually heathen or infidel, and would be without the restraining bonds of Christian faith and morals, and the civilizing and elevating influences of the Gospel of Christ. In the good providence of God, there was a man, named Philander Chase, whose heart was turned in this direction. After considerable experience in missionary labor, he was chosen to be the first bishop in the West. He determined to give himself to the work of an evangelist in that part of the United States. His labors were blessed, and he seemed to be the very man for the work to be done; hence, in 1819 he was consecrated bishop of Ohio. Every kind of labor and toil came upon him, but he bore up under it all. Yet the deep consciousness that, if the Gospel was to be preached, there must be men to do it—men, too, educated and trained for this special work, in a new country and among new settlers—pressed heavily upon his mind, and caused him to resolve anxiously what he was to do in such a state of affairs. He concluded to visit England, and to beg for means to found a college and seminary in Ohio for the education of young men for the ministry. The voyage was undertaken (though its expediency was doubted by many), and Bishop Chase obtained in all some thirty to forty thousand dollars in aid of his much-cherished object. He returned home in July, 1824, and during the next two years was busily engaged in laying the foundation of Kenyon College and the Theological Seminary at Gambier (both names being derived from prominent donor of money to the cause). For ten years he labored in the ministry, not only as president of the college, but also as bishop of Ohio. This was in September, 1831, and the case of his resignation of the diocese came before the General Convention of 1832. The House of Bishops pointedly censured the Church for having under such circumstances; but, in order that the Church should not suffer harm, the bishops united with the other House in approving the election of Dr. C. P. Mallivaine, who was consecrated bishop of Ohio, Oct. 31, 1832. Bishop Chase, we may mention here, continued his church work, and was invited to the Church at Lambeth in 1835. He visited England again, received further liberal donations in aid of the cause of Christian education, and founded another institution, which he called Jubilee College. For this he obtained, in 1847, a charter of incorporation from the state of New York. Even to the Pacific Ocean, there are heralds of the cross engaged in its sacred vocation. The episcopate, since 1835, has been coextensive with the boundaries of the United States; and the Church, in its complete organization, has been, and is, striving to bring men to the knowledge of God, and the salvation of their souls.

The venerable William White, in the fiftieth year of his episcopate, was called away to his rest, July 17, 1866. His name will ever be held in grateful memory by the Church in America, as well for the long-continued and earnest labors in its behalf which he was permitted to perform, as for the wisdom and judgment of his counsels on all occasions during a life extended far beyond the ordinary limit allotted to man. Meekness and gentleness, a large-hearted liberality, a spirit of genuine toleration, a willingness to yield for peace sake in all matters where principles of religion are not to be involved—these and the like qualities fitted him admirably for the station he was called upon, in God's providence, to fill; and we may with reverent thankfulness trace the indications of God's goodness and mercy to his Church in America, that such a man was raised up to take large share in its early struggles and history, and to live to so great an age as to see the "little one become a thousand," and the grain of mustard-seed grow up, and become a tree, and shoot out great branches. Bishop White's biographer and intimate friend, Dr. B. H. Latrobe, who occupied the same position in his Church as the former did in his, has given us the Church divines, as they were called in England, of the established Church in that country," and the good bishop has been claimed as representing that portion of the clergy in the Protestant Episcopal Church to whom the same title has been applied in England, of the Church, bishop White was not what is termed a "High-Churchman"; for, though he was on terms of great intimacy with bishop Hobart (of whom we have before spoken), and entertained for him warm affection and sincere respect, yet he was never willing to express his assent to all the views of bishop Hobart on the subjects of the ministry, and the necessity of the apostolic succession in order to constitute a lawful ministry in the Church. He held episcopacy to be of divine origin, and therefore, of course, the best form and mode of Church government; but, in view of the condition of the Protestant

"it is exceedingly desirable that the minds of such persons should be calmed, their anxieties allayed, and the Church disburied of the charge of holding, in her Articles, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper under the emblems of bread and wine. All the views and opinions expressed in said Oxford writings, and should thus be freed from a responsibility which does not properly belong to her." But the house did not agree to any of the resolutions offered in this shape. It was, however, finally "Resolved, That the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies consider the Liturgy, Office, and Articles of the Church sufficient exponents of the essence of the essential doctrines of Holy Scripture; and that the canons of the Church afford ample means of discipline and control over all who depose from iniquity." Further, that the General Convention is not a suitable tribunal for the trial and censure of, and that the Church is not responsible for, the errors of individuals, whether they are members of this Church or otherwise." Thus the house disposed of the question; and the bishops, on their part, in compliance with certain memorials sent to them, gave expression to their godly counsel and warning in the pastoral letter which was soon after issued. In December, 1844, bishops Meade, Otey, and Elliott made a formal protest against the action of the Synod of New York, "as being guilty of immorality and impurity." The trial was held in the city of New York. There were seventeen bishops present, constituting the court, viz. P. Chase, Brownell, Ives, Hopkins, Smith, McVeyaine, Doane, Kemper, Polk, Delaney, Judson, Whitingham, Lee, Long, Bishop, and Freeman; also the three presenters, and bishop Onderdonk as respondent. The trial began December 10, and was continued from day to day till January 3, 1845, when bishop Onderdonk was pronounced guilty by eleven votes, and sentenced to suffer the loss of his bishop and from all the functions of the sacred ministry. Bishop Onderdonk protested in the strongest terms his innocence, and published a Statement of Facts and Circumstances in regard to his trial. It may be mentioned that the condemned bishop never acknowledged himself to be in any wise guilty (died 1861). The "Prayer of the Diocese of New York to the House of Bishops for relief from sufferings consequent upon the sentence of the Episcopal Court, January, 1845," was made September 25, 1850; but this and all other efforts put forth to have a compromise effected, and a new canon having been adopted applicable to the case of a diocese with a suspended bishop, Dr. J. M. Wainwright was consecrated provisional bishop of New York, in November, 1852. During these years, since the General Convention of 1844, the trallactary controversy gradually subsided. In 1866, a new vote was taken, and nearly everything had been said which could be said. A number of eminent men in the Church had put their views into written shape (as Jarvis, Seabury, Hawks, McVeyaine, Hopkins, Smith, and others); and after a while, the storm was lulled, the atmosphere became purified, and the Church was gladdened with a return of sunshine and comparative peace and quiet.

The disturbed condition of the country, in consequence of the succession from the Union of several of the Southern states, caused no little anxiety to the hearts of many of the Church's members, lest the Protestant Episcopal Church too, should suffer harm in the great and terrible struggle which had been begun in 1860-61, and was to be fought out to the bitter end. It was but natural that the bishops in the Southern dioceses should begin to meet and act separately, as if the dismemberment of the United States was a completed fact. They did so by organizing a council, framing a constitution and canons, etc.; and for a time there was grave apprehension lest the Church should be deprived of its union and communion as heretofore. The General Convention of 1862 met in New York, with much reduced numbers, of course; and this subject came before the convention, and was fully debated. Resolu-choirs, additional vestments freely used in some churches, and such like; and they recommended the appointment of three bishops, three presbyters, and three laymen to consider and report upon these matters to the convention then in session. Such a committee, consisting of able and well-tried men, was appointed, and, through bishop Whittingham and Dr. W. C. Mead on behalf of the committee, reported a "covenant of ritual. In this proposed law it was inserted that "this Church recognizes no other law of ritual than such as it shall itself have accepted or provided;" and the provisions for ritual in this Church were stated to be (1) the Book of Common Prayer, with the offices and orders there contained; (2) the laws of the Church of England in use in the American provinces before 1780, and not subsequently superseded, altered, or repealed by legislation, general or diocesan, of this Church; (3) the legislative or judicial action or decisions of this Church in its conventions, general or diocesan, or by its duly constituted authorities. Animated discussions followed in the House of Deputies. Amendments and substitutes were proposed again and again, and though the House of Bishops passed the canon reported by the joint committee, the lower house did not see fit to agree to the compromise. It was attempted to postpone indefinitely the whole matter, but without success. The favorers of ritualism endeavored to get the convention committed to some action in accordance with their views; the opponents of the movement were equally eager in seeking to obtain legislation directly condemnatory of numerous acts and observances peculiar to the ritualistic party. A very prominent advocate of the system (Dr. De Koven, of Wisconsin) made a speech against the canon as adopted by the House of Bishops. He called strange and even offen- sive the language in support of his sentiments and opinions, and challenged any one who pleased so to do to present him for trial, he having boldly adopted and uttered as his own the words of one of the most ultra-ritualists in England: "I believe in the real, actual presence of our Lord, under the form of bread and wine, upon the altars of our churches. I myself adore, and would, if it were necessary or my duty, teach my people to adore, Christ present in the elements under the form of bread and wine." The discussions, though exciting and continued from day to day, were conducted with good temper and general fairness. As on the whole, where neither side in a controversy is willing to yield, it is usually found to be the easiest way to get out of present difficulty to pass some comprehensive resolutions, which may mean more or less according to the manner in which the days of the day are divided. Such was the case. It passed the course now adopted. It was finally "Resolved, that the House of Bishops concurring, that this convention hereby expresses its decided condemnation of all ceremonies, observances, and practices which are fitted to express a doctrine foreign to that set forth in the authorized standards of this Church. Resolved, That, in the judgment of this house, the paternal counsel and advice of the right reverend fathers, the bishops of the Church, are deemed sufficient, at this time, to secure the suppression of all that is irregular and unseemly, and to promote greater uniformity in conducting the public worship of the Church and in the administration of the holy sacraments." Thus, as we have intimated above, the real question at issue was postponed rather than ad- judicated. Ritualism went on its course with additional vigor and confidence, and its opponents became more and more dissatisfied with the existing state of things. Consequently the struggle, as was to be expected, was renewed again when the General Convention met in New York in October, 1874. Memorials were presented from various quarters on this subject, resolutions were introduced bearing directly upon it, and legislation was earnestly called for in order to restrain what was termed excess of ritual in the public service of the Church. In the House of Deputies the question of confirmation of the bishop elect (Dr. G. F. Seymour) of Illinois came up. He was charged with being an active member of the ritualistic party, but the advances of three bishops, three presbyters, and three laymen to consider and report upon these matters to the convention then in session. Such a committee, consisting of able and well-tried men, was appointed, and, through bishop Whittingham and Dr. W. C. Mead on behalf of the committee, reported a "covenant of ritual. on the other, they may reasonably be expected to shrink from pressing too severely upon those who carry ritualistic practices to more or less of excess. The opinion may here be expressed—simply as an opinion, without reference to the merits of the questions at issue—that ritualistic observances are liable to have been made that considerable, perhaps even great, good has resulted and may yet further result from this movement, it will not be likely again to assume any special prominence in the history of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The bringing of this question to the reader in continuous order, from its rise to the present time, has necessarily led to the omission of a number of interesting historical facts and incidents in the progress of the Church of late years: these are herewith succinctly presented in their proper sequence and connection. On a previous page has been noted the action of the General Convention on the subject of liturgical relaxation and Church comprehension. This was in 1856 and 1859. At the convention of 1868 various "memorials" were presented pleading for larger latitude in the use of the Book of Common Prayer. This was reported against by the House of Bishops, and the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "Resolved, That, in the opinion of this house, such latitude in the use of the Book of Common Prayer as the memorialists ask could not be allowed with safety, or with proper regard to the rights of others." The result of all these turned services came up, but no definite action was had. The convention expressed its sense by resolution simply, "That nothing in the present order of Common Prayer prohibits the separation, when desirable, of the Morning Prayer, the Litany, and the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper into distinct services, which may be used independently of each other, and either of them without the others: provided that when used together they be used in the same order as that in which they have been commonly used and in which they have been approved by the last General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church."

The next convention (October, 1877), the committee on canons in the House of Deputies reported in favor of an "order concerning divine service," more especially for shorter services on other days than Sundays and the greater festivals and fasts. To the bishops declined to agree, and by general consent a joint committee was appointed to sit during the recess on the matter of providing shortened services, by rubric or otherwise, this committee to report in 1890. In a country such as ours, where laws regulate and divorce differ considerably in different states, the defects of most necessarily cause much perplexity and annoyance to the clergy, unless they have some law of the Church to guide and control their action. This was long felt throughout the Protestant Episcopal Church, and in hope of some remedy or aid the matter was brought before the General Convention of 1868. A canon was enacted forbidding a clergyman to solemnize a marriage where there is a divorced wife or husband of either party still living, with a proviso in favor of the innocent party in a divorce for the cause of adultery. In 1877 the canons was put in its present shape, as follows: "No minister, knowingly after due inquiry, shall solemnize the marriage of any person who has a divorced husband or wife still living, if such husband or wife has been put away for any cause arising after marriage; but this canon shall not be held to apply to the innocent party in a divorce for the cause of adultery, or to parties once divorced seeking to be united again. If any minister of this Church shall have reasonable cause to doubt whether a person desires of being admitted to holy orders shall be taken, and all such church and civil communication that has been married otherwise than as the Word of God and discipline of this Church allow, such minister, before receiving such person to these ordinances, shall refer the case to the bishop for his godly judgment thereupon: provided, however, that no minister shall, in any case, refuse the sacraments to a penitent person in imminent danger of death." Questions touching the facts of any case named in the former part of the canon are to be referred to the bishop, and he is required to make inquiry such as he deems expedient, and to deliver his judgment in the premises. At the same convention (1877), an effort was made to have the term "United Degrees," contained in the English Prayer-book, inserted in the American Book of Common Prayer, but it did not meet the approval of the convention. Some extravagant and unwarranted assertions having been made at various times as to the meaning of "regenerate," and its effects, etc., in the offices for infant baptism, there was issued, at the General Convention of 1871, the following "declaration of the bishops in council:" "We, the subscribers, bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, being asked, in order to the quieting of the consciences of sundry members of the said Church, to declare our conviction as to the meaning of the word regenerate in the offices for the administration of baptism of infants, do declare that, in our opinion, the word regenerate is not there so used as to determine that a moral change in the subject of baptism is wrought in the sacrament" (signed by all the bishops present, forty-eight in number).

The movement begun in Germany in 1870-71 by Dr. Dillingen and others has been watched by the Protestant Episcopal Church with deep interest and earnest hope that it might be that the Church in the provinces would follow. Continental churches now in communion with Rome. In the convention of 1871, the bishops recorded their hearty sympathy with the heroic struggle then being made for religious liberty on the part of the Old-Catholic Congress recently assembled in Munich; and in 1874 it was "Resolved, That this house, with renewed confidence, reiterates the expression of its sympathy with the bishop and synod of the Old-Catholic communion in Germany, and the promise of its prayers for the divine blessing and direction on their work; also, that these bishops have no objection to this house to keep up fraternal correspondence with the bishop and synod, for exchange of information and consideration of overtures for reconciliation and intercommunication between kindred churches."

The course pursued by the highest legislative authority on the subject of churches or congregations established in foreign lands in communion with the Protestant Episcopal Church illustrates the views and principles on which this Church deems it right to act. Twenty years ago, the Rev. W. O. Lamborn began services in Paris, specially to serve foreign countries, and their friends. The Church has been there ever since, intending to visit that city. The General Convention of 1859 recognised the propriety and lawfulness of having Protestant Episcopal churches abroad. Congregations accordingly have been organized during the interim since 1859 in Rome, Florence, Dresden, Geneva, and Nice, making six in all at this date (1874). At the General Convention of 1877 the matter was carefully regulated by canon, which says, "It shall be lawful, under the conditions hereinafter stated, to organize a church or congregation for the foreign country (other than Great Britain and Ireland, and the colonies and dependencies thereof), and not within the limits of any foreign missionary bishop of this Church." In order to secure proper and legitimate action, and also suitable control over these foreign churches or congregations, the canon goes on to state fully the mode in which they may be organized and conducted—viz., they must recognise their allegiance to the constitution of the American Church; must produce, proper certificates; must be in canonical submission to a bishop, who is in charge of all such churches in the communion; must be under the direction and control of some bishop, who has been specially appointed; and they must conform to the provisions laid down for discipline, in case it become necessary. The bishop in charge at this date (1878) is the Rt. Rev. Dr. Littlejohn, of Long Island.

An association taking its rise in Europe, and calling itself the "Evangelical Alliance," held its sixth General CONFERENCE IN NEW YORK, OCT. 2-12, 1873. It was composed of delegates from various Protestant denominations, foreign as well as American, who claim to be considered "evangelicals" in the proper and precise sense of the term, and the leader of the movement was the Very Rev. R. Payne Smith, D.D., dean of Canterbury, who brought with him a letter of sympathy from his grace, Dr. Tait, archbishop of Canterbury. The dean took part in the work of the Alliance, as did also a very few of the American Episcopal clergy; having fraternized with the Presbyterians at a public communion service, he was called to account by Dr. Tozer (recently an English missionary bishop in Africa, and just then on a visit to New York), and was censured through the minutes of the Assembly of the American Unitas Fratrum of Kentucky by Dr. Cummins, likewise joined in this irregular service, and thereby foreshadowed what soon after took place —viz., the commencement of the schism to which his name has been attached. He had become greatly discontented with the state of affairs in the Protestant Episcopal Church; he was impressed with the fact, as he esteemed it, that this Church is too exclusive and in continual danger of going over to Rome, and so he made up his mind to abandon it to its fate and set up a new organization of his own, a sort of half-and-half Episcopalian and Protestant Methodist. Under date of Nov. 10, 1873, he addressed a letter to bishop Smith, his diocesan, in which he enumerated various reasons or causes for the course he had resolved upon. He declared that his conscience was burdened with being compelled to officiate as bishop in ritualistic churches in Kentucky; that he had lost all hope of seeing eradicated from the Church's standards and services acerb-dotalism and ritualism; that he was much hurt at being blamed for sharing in the service above alluded to in a Presbyterian place of worship, and that, consequently, he had determined to transfer his "work and office" to another sphere. Dr. Cummins was entirely right in abandoning the Church if he could not stay in it with a clear conscience, and labor in it in accordance with his solemn vows at ordination, one of which was especially, "With all faithful diligence to banish and drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrine contrary to God's Word." Inasmuch, however, as he had abandoned his post, and was soon after degraded from the ministry, he had no "office" to carry with him, though he assumed that he had, and under that title, or as the successor to the former, he addressed Bishop Smith of Kentucky (who was also senior bishop), on receiving Dr. Cummins' letter, immediately in- stituted proceedings in accordance with the canon; Dr. Cummins was at once suspended from all exercise of the ministry; and the six months of grace allowed for retraction having passed away, the formal deputation took place June 24, 1874 (ratified afterwards in full house of Bishops at General Convention in October, 1874). See REFORMED EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The "Cheney case," as it has been called, may properly be dealt with in connection, especially as Mr. Cheney has become quite prominent in the schismatical body which Dr. Cummins originated. The case, in substance, is as follows: The Rev. C. E. Cheney, of Christ's Church, Chicago, Ill., having mutilated the service for public baptism by omitting the words regenerate and regeneration wherever they occur, was brought to trial and suspended by bishop Whitehouse, February 18, 1871, the suspension to last until he should repent and amend. Mr. Cheney refused obedience; and the vestry of Christ's Church having invited him to continue with them, he continued to serve them, according to their wishes. The result was that he was tried by an ecclesiastical court for contumacy, and, on the 24th of June, was finally degraded. But the vestry continuing to hold on to the property of Christ's Church, contrary to law and justice, Mr. Cheney has the right of the property, as the holder of such church lands, as well as the followers of Dr. Cummins and his movement. The question of the right to the property being a very serious one, as involving the whole subject of the right of religious bodies to hold property and prevent its alienation, the case of Christ's Church, Chicago, was carried to the courts, where, in accordance with precedent in like cases, the lower court was reversed, and judgment was given in favor of the vestry and congregation as against the diocese. So far as this particular piece of property is concerned, the matter is of no great importance; but the principle involved is of the greatest moment. It has been decided, over and over again, that all ecclesiastical organizations shall possess the power to be governed by their own laws, so long as those laws do not interfere with the established law of the land; and, consequently, that all property belongs, of right, to those who adhere to and sustain the laws and principles of their respective organizations. If church property, by the action of vestries and congregations, can be legally diverted from its rightful ownership, in the way in which this in Chicago has been taken away from the Church, then there is no tenure safe, and every church property issue has aroused attention among other Christian bodies, who are quite as much interested as the Protestant Episcopal Church can be in the fundamental question at issue. It is to be hoped that the Supreme Court of the United States will be called upon to interpose, and settle fully and clearly a point of so great moment to all Christians or religious associations of every name.

In regard to the "provincial system," so called, we may briefly state that, as early as 1850, a motion was made in the House of Bishops by bishop Delaney to appoint a committee of five bishops, five clergymen, and five laymen, "to report to the next triennial General Convention on the expediency of arranging the dioceses, according to geographical position, into four provinces, to be designated the Eastern, Northern, Southern, and Western Provinces, and to be united under a General Convention or Council of the Provinces, having exclusive control over the Prayer-book, Articles, Offices, and Homilies of this Church, to be held every twenty years." In 1859 no action was had; but the committee was continued, and the matter handed over to the next General Convention, to which it was indefinitely postponed by the bishops. The subject was brought up again in 1874, was warmly discussed, and again indefinitely postponed. In 1877 a preamble and resolution were offered in the House of Deputies expressing a desire to obtain "an authoritative recognition of the provincial system," and to establish a special committee on canons "to inquire into the expediency of repealing the prohibition against suffragan bishops, and making such canonical provisions as will enable dioceses (just before described) to give the name and style of provincial or co-provincial bishops to such bishops who may be elected and consecrated to assign- ed districts within their respective jurisdictions." The resolution was adopted; but in the House of Bishops the entire subject was again committed to a special committee, to report at the convention of 1880. Then the matter comes up to the present. It remains to be seen whether the Church will deem it best to adopt this system, or to continue under the arrangement now in existence. A canon was adopted in 1866 authorizing federal councils, as follows: "It is hereby declared lawful for the bishops in their capacity as such, within the limits of any state or commonwealth, to establish for themselves a federal convention, or council, representing such dioceses, which may deliberate and decide upon the common interests of the Church within the limits of such dioceses; and to the proceedings of such convention, or council, shall be had, the powers proposed to be exercised thereby shall be submitted to..."

the General Convention for its approval. Nothing in this canon shall be construed as forbidding any federal council from taking such action as they may deem necessary to secure such legislative enactments as the common interests of the Church in the state may require.

No definite action under this canon has as yet been carried in the Council of any state. The subject has been discussed, quite largely, and the various propositions connected with it now rest with the same committee who have the provincial system in hand and are to report in 1880. An earnest and interesting communication to the present Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Maryland was made in 1871, by Bishop Wilberforce, of Winchester, in relation to the work then commenced in England for the revision of the authorized version of the Holy Scriptures. At the General Convention held the same year, it was, in the House of Bishops, Resolved, That the Rev. the Presiding Bishop be, and hereby is, requested to return to the Rev. the Lord Bishop of Winchester a courteous and brotherly acknowledgment of his communication relating to a revision of the English of the Holy Scriptures, stating that this house, having given all the attention we were capable of giving to this said work of revision, is not at present in a condition to deliver any judgment respecting it, and at the same time expressing the disposition of this house to consider with candor the work undertaken by the Convocation of Canterbury, whenever it shall have been completed. The attitude thus taken by the bishops in behalf of the Church is one of cautious reserve, but perhaps not too much so, considering the importance of the subject.

The Protestant Episcopal Church having made considerable progress in Hayti (numbering eleven clergy in 1874), and needing episcopal supervision and aid, was supplied with a bishop, under the arrangement of a "Covenant" entered into with the Church in that republic, and the Rev. Dr. J. T. Holly was consecrated as first bishop, in November, 1874. The terms of the covenant made it the duty of the Church in the United States to extend its nursing care to the Church in Hayti during its early growth and development; and four bishops, with the bishop of Hayti, were constituted a commission to take episcopal charge of the Church in Hayti, and secure its maintenance of the doctrine, worship, and discipline of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, until such time as there should be three bishops resident in Hayti, and exercising jurisdiction in the Church there. When that time arrives, this Church will draw from all further charge or care of the Haytian Church.

The General Convention of 1877 met in Boston, Mass., on Oct. 3 for the first time that it met in that city since its organization after the civil war. It was very largely attended, and was marked by a spirit of good-will and earnest effort to promote in every way the interests of Christ's kingdom here on earth. There were no specially exciting topics on hand (as ritualism, etc.); and the action of the convention, so far as our present purpose is concerned, can be summed up in a brief space. Probably the most important step taken was the reorganization of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society. Heretofore there had been a Board of Missions (a very large and rather cumbersome body), appointed triennially, and acting in the respective departments at home and abroad. After much discussion, the following canon was adopted: "Constitution of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, as established in 1830, and since amended at various times.”

"A. Art. I. This society shall be denominated,” etc.

"A. Art. II. This society shall be considered as comprehending all persons who are members of this Church.

"A. Art. III. There shall be a Board of Managers of such society, composed of the bishops of this Church, and the members for the time being of the House of Deputies of this Church, bishops and deputies sitting apart as in General Convention, or together when they shall so desire. The Board of Missions thus constituted shall convene on the third day of the session of the General Convention, and shall sit from time to time as the business of the board shall demand.

"Art. IV. There shall be a Board of Managers, comprising all the bishops as members ex officio, and fifteen prebendaries and fifteen laymen, to be appointed by the General Convention, at its next meeting, to manage the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who shall have the control and management of the general mission of this Church, and shall remain in office until their successors are chosen, and shall have power to fill all vacancies which may occur in their number. Eight clerical and eight laymen shall constitute the Board of Managers.

This board shall, during the recess of the convention, exercise all the corporate powers of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church, and shall make and do all report to the General Convention, constituted as a Board of Missions, on or before the third day of the session of the General Convention.

"Art. V. The Board of Managers is authorized to form, from its own members, a committee for domestic missions and a committee for foreign missions, and such other committees as it may deem desirable to promote special missionary work, and is also authorized to appoint such officers as shall be needful for carrying on the work.

"Art. VI. The Board of Managers is intrusted with power to establish and regulate such missions as are not placed under episcopal supervision, and to erect and stock, which it may deem expedient, new bishoromatic appointments, and for the government of its committees; provided always that, in connection with all diocesan and missionary jurisdictions and activities, the bishops having such jurisdiction shall be made in gross to such diocesan and missionary jurisdictions, to be disburmd by the local authorities thereof. The board shall not be entitled to the fees and expenses of the Episcopal Church in the United States for missionary work.

"Art. VII. The Board of Managers is authorized to promote the formation of auxiliary missionary associations, whose contributions, as well as those specially appropriated by individuals, shall be received and paid in accordance with the wishes of the donors, when expressed in writing. It shall be the duty of the Board of Managers to arrange for public missionary meetings, to be held at the same time and place as the General Convention, and at such other times and places as the board may determine upon, to which all auxiliaries approved by the Board of Managers, may send one clerical and one lay delegate.

"Art. VIII. The Board of Managers may be authorized at any time by the General Convention of this Church. All canons, and all action by or under the authority of the General Convention, so far as the constitution and provisions of this canon and such amended constitution, are hereby repealed. This canon shall be in full force and effect shall in any manner impair or affect any corporate rights of the said society, or any vested right whatever. This canon shall take effect immediately.

The principal and immediate effect of this reorganization was, on the part of the Board of Managers, a resolution to reduce central expenses connected with the mission work. Thus the department of home missions to colored people was assigned to the care of the committee on domestic missions; a very considerable reduction in the amount of expenses was made in connection with the work among the Indians; several officers were dispensed with, and in answer to the will of the donors, when expressed in writing. The result was a saving of some $12,000 per annum. It deserves also to be stated here that the American Church Missionary Society, the special agency of those of the clergy and laity who were in former connection with the Board of Missions, now accorded to the wish long before expressed by the board. The society continued its organization as a society; the work in Mexico, which had been very largely sustained by it, was handed over to the foreign committee. The work on the continent of North America was resolved that, in general, its members should hereafter act in concert with the Board of Managers of the newly organized Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church. This was deemed a happy resolve on their part, and excellect results are expected to follow in consequence.

For some years past there has been a growing desire to add greater effectiveness to the labors of godly and devoted women in the Church. The matter was brought up at the General Convention of 1874, but no action was obtained. In 1877 it came again before the convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and after three critical and three long debates, to inquire and report to the next General Convention what legislation may be necessary and expedient for the authorization and regulation of women working in this Church under the name of deaconesses or sisters. Thus the matter lies over till 1880.

As the Church of England recently adopted a new Lectionary, it was deemed advisable by the convention of 1877 to place this revised Table of Lessons for Sundays and holydays before the Protestant Episcopal Church. Accordingly, it was formally resolved by both houses that the Lectionary be permitted to be used until the next General Convention. This Table, therefore, not only of Lessons for Sundays and holydays, but also of Daily Lessons, and Lessons for Lent and for Ember Days and Rogation Days, is allowed to be used by any clergyman in place of those in the calendar in the Prayer Book, either at his own discretion or at the instance of any clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Whether it will be found to be so great an improvement upon the existing Table of Lessons as has been supposed by many may be doubted. The trial, however, of three years will lead to some settled agreement upon a matter so largely affecting the question of how to obtain the greatest edification in the reading of Holy Scripture in the public worship of the Church.

At the close of the convention of 1877 a joint resolution in the convention was adopted, the purpose of which was to extend the important benefits of a secular education to all our citizens, and of discussing side by side with these as many of the influences and institutions as are possible to supplement them with thorough Christian teaching elsewhere, and to add proper Church schools and tuition for the whole, and more complete work of education, wherever they are needed and the means for their support are commanded.

Resolved, That it is the solemn conviction of this General Convention, in both houses, that it is the duty of the clergy and laity of the Church to take, so far as the opportunity is afforded them, an active interest in the public schools, with the purpose of extending the important benefits of a secular education to all our citizens, and of discussing, side by side with these as many of the influences and institutions as is possible to supplement them with thorough Christian teaching elsewhere, and to add proper Church schools and tuition for the whole, and more complete work of education, wherever they are needed and the means for their support are commanded.

Resolved, That, with the concurrence of the House of Deputies, a joint committee, consisting of two bishops, two clergymen, and two laymen, be instituted to consider this matter during the recess of the convention, to collect facts and prepare suggestions for the next General Convention, and to promote, by any means deemed advisable, the general work of Christian education.

II. Fundamental Principles, Constitution, Government, etc.—From what has already been stated, it is clear that the Church of England, while holding in common with other Christians evangelical doctrines—as the incarnation, the divinity of our Lord, the atonement, the inspiration of Holy Scripture, salvation through faith in Christ, and all such like—at the same time takes the ground that it is the American branch of the "one holy Catholic Church" spoken of in the Nicene Creed. It was planted on these Western shores, under God's good providence, to be what it aims to be—the National Church of the United States. It is a historical Church. It traces its lineage through the Church of England directly back to the apostles of our Lord; and it gives, as its deliberate judgment, that "it is evident unto all men, diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the apostles' time there have been these several orders of ministers in Christ's Church—bishops, priests, and deacons. It is not a new or recently formed denomination, and in this respect differs from the great bulk of Protestant Christian bodies, whatever titles they may give to their respective organizations. Its creed is the same creed which has been in use substantially in the same form since the very beginning—viz., that which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed. It has not been altered in the United States in the 4th century, and received everywhere by all throughout the Catholic Church. Its liturgy is the very concentration of the deep piety, soundness in the faith, earnestness, zeal, and fervor of the wise and holy and good of all ages. It contains the reading of the scriptures, services of prayer and praise, combining the use of this liturgy with the continual and frequent reading of Holy Scripture in men's ears, are in the truest and highest sense of the word evangelical, and calculated to set all the longing of the pious soul for spiritual communion with God our Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, and through the quickening energy of the Holy Ghost.*

The position of the Protestant Episcopal Church relatively to Protestantism, on the one hand, and Romanism, on the other, is somewhat peculiar, but yet daily marked out and defined. It cannot consistently exist, recognise the validity of the ministry of the great body of Protestant denominations, whether Presbyterian or Congregational, for it distinctly enunciates that the only lawful ministry is that in the three orders. Hence it cannot have communion with them, or interchange of services, or similar arrangements of any kind. It is true, the validity of the episcopate in the Roman Catholic Church, but at the same time it positively and unequivocally repudiates the errors in doctrine and worship of that system. It is true, the validity of the presidency in the Episcopal Church in Italy, but also wherever, in violation of the ancient canons, it has spread itself. The Protestant Episcopal Church has no sympathy with, but is in direct antagonism to, the claims of Rome in regard to the denial of the sufficiency of Scripture, the ultra-sacrament of transubstantiation, sacrifice of the mass, purgatory, celibacy of the clergy, elevation of the Virgin Mary into a sort of goddess to be worshipped, the absolute supremacy of the pope by divine right over all the world in civil as well as religious matters, etc. Hence it cannot act in any concert with the Roman Church, or further its plans and purposes in any wise.

The constitution, framed for the purpose of uniting the Church in working together as one body, we give in full. It was adopted in October, 1879, and has remained unaltered, except for a few alterations which became necessary in consequence of the growth of the Church, the increase of the episcopate, and the formation of several dioceses within the limits of the larger and more populous states.

Art. I. There shall be a General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America on the first Wednesday in October in every third year, from the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, and in such place as shall be determined by the convention; and in case there shall be an epidemic disease, or any other good cause to render it necessary to alter the place fixed on for any such meeting of the convention, the presiding bishop shall have it in his power and discretion to appoint another convention in any place as he shall think proper; and in case there shall be an epidemic disease, or any other good cause, at any other times, in the manner hereafter to be provided for; and this Church, in a majority of the dioceses which shall have adopted this Constitution, shall be represented before they shall proceed to business, except that the representation from two dioceses shall be sufficient to adjourn the business of the convention; and when there shall be no debate shall be allowed.

Art. II. The Church in each diocese shall be entitled to a representation of both the clergy and the laity. Such representation shall consist of not more than four persons, and of the following description: three persons to be the representatives of the resident clergy, and of the bishop, dean, or warden of the diocese; and two persons to be the representatives of the residents in the diocese, and chosen in the manner prescribed by the convention thereof; and in all questions when there shall be more than one diocese represented from any diocese, each order shall have one vote; and the major vote of the convention shall be necessary to a determination.

to dates are added, so that any particular canon upon any subject legislated upon by the Church may be traced from its origin through all its modifications to the present time. Title I is "Of the Orders in the Ministry, and of the Doctrine and Worship of the Church." There are twenty-four canons under this Title, and they cover fully and explicitly all questions relating to candidates for orders, examinations, ordination of deacons, owakening of priests, general regulation of ministers and their duties, qualifications, consecration and work of bishops, domestic and foreign missionary bishops, modes of securing an accurate view of the Church, the use of the Book of Common Prayer, etc. Title II is "Of Discipline." There are thirteen canons under this Title, relating to offences for which ministers may be tried and punished, dissolution of pastoral connection, renunciation of the ministry, abandonment of the communion of the Church by a bishop, the trial of a bishop, judicial sentences, regulations respecting the laity, etc. Title III is "Of the Organized Bodies and Officers of the Church." There are nine canons under this Title, having reference to meetings of General Convention, stand-ning committees, trustees of the General Theological Seminary, congregations and parishes, organization of new dioceses, etc. Title IV relates to "Miscellaneous Provisions." It has four canons, in reference to repeated orders of ordination, etc., of the Church, and when new canons take effect. Our limits do not admit of printing these canons in full, nor is it necessary, inasmuch as they are readily accessible to all interested in their contents.

From the Church Almanac, we learn that in 1869 there were nearly 8800 parishes, with churches and chapels, in the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

Baptisms during the year (in infant and adult). 68,534
Confraternies during the year. 18,646
Marriages. 15,420
Sunday-school teachers. 42,000
Baptized children. 40,000
Communicants. 87,457
Contributions for missionary and church purposes. 614,488,841

Home missionary bishops nine, exercising jurisdiction in the great territories as well as several of the Western states, in Texas, and on the Pacific coast. Their salaries and travelling expenses (amounting to at least $30,000 per annum) are paid by the domestic committe. There are over 200 missionaries at work in these fields. Foreign missionary bishops three—one in China, one in Japan, one in Africa (to which added bishop in Haiti). There are in these jurisdictions, in addition to the bishops, thirty-five other clergymen (foreign and native), together with about 200 assistants, mostly native catechists, lay readers, and teachers.
The mission work in Greece is simply educational, and is conducted by 12 native lay readers. In the Mexican Church there are at work the Rev. H. C. Riley, D.D., and P. G. Hernandez (bishiops elect), with four other presbytery, two ladies, and 79 lay readers. The number of communicants in foreign fields is about 4000. There are also 81 day-schools with 1800 scholars, and 18 Sunday-schools with 861 scholars.

Theological seminaries and schools (in 15 dioceses and 1 missionary jurisdiction). Church colleges (in 12 dioceses and 3 missionary jurdictions). Academic institutions (in 26 dioceses and 3 missionary jurisdictions). Other educational institutions (in 13 dioceses). Church hospitals (in 20 dioceses and 3 missionary jurisdictions). Church orphan asylums (in 20 dioceses and 3 missionary jurisdictions). Church boarding schools (in 12 dioceses). Periodicals devoted to the interests, support, and defence of the Protestant Episcopal Church: The Churchman (weekly), New York; The Southern Churchman (weekly), Alexandria, Va.; The Episcopalian (weekly), Philadelphia, Pa.; The Western Churchman (weekly), Cleveland, O.; The Church of the Cross (weekly), Milwaukee, Wis.; The Pacific Churchman (weekly), San Francisco, Cal.; Our Dioceses (weekly), Detroit, Mich.; The Spirit of Missions (monthly), New York; The Church Magazine (monthly), Brooklyn, N. Protestant Episcopal Church of Ireland.

Until 1671 this body formed an integral part of the United Church of England and Ireland. It is still called by a majority of its members the Church of Ireland.
Its official title is "The Irish Church."

Of the first introduction of Christianity into Ireland we have written under the article IRELAND (q. v.). It has been noted before that the Roman Church did not succeed in establishing her hierarchical power in the 12th century, and that even after the Reformation in England the Irish Church remained attached to Rome, and only by the influence of the bishop of Rome, first felt in the island through the Danes, who made their earliest settlements on the east coast at the close of the 8th century. Bishop Malachi, who filled successively several sees in Ireland, and who was full of enthusiasm for papal authority, strove hard to induce the Irish bishops to accept palms from the pope. But it was not till after his death in 1152 that, at the Synod of Kells, the four archbishops received these honors, which, though ostensibly marks of distinction, were in reality badges of servitude, binding Ireland to the feetotul of the paarchy. Three years later, pope Adrian IV, the only Englishman ever to be crowned triple crown, sent Henry II of England a bull, authorizing none to invade Ireland. What the papal see then thought of the relig-ous condition of the Church of Ireland may be learned

* The above article was originally written for our pages by the Rev. J. A. S. Jameson, D.D., of New York city, and was afterwards thoroughly revised and corrected, in another work which he was then editing. We have slightly modified one or two expressions to which many of our readers might take exception.—Eo. from a bull published in 1172, confirming that of 1158. The pope states the object of permitting the invasion of Ireland to be that "the filthy practices of the land may be abolished, and the barbarous nation which is called by the Christian name may, through your clemency, be established in Christ's faith." It was also declared that when the Church of that country, which has hitherto been in a disordered state, shall have been reduced to better order, that people may by your means possess for the future the reality as well as the name of the Christian faith.

In the reign of Henry VIII, papal supremacy was abolished in Ireland, the bishops and clergy all accepting the king as head of the Church. Queen Mary re-established the pope's authority, but Elizabeth's reign gave a distinctively Reformed character to the Church. Many rebellions occurring among the native Irish during this reign, and Rome stoutly throwing all her weight against England, the Reformation came to be regarded as essentially English, though the leading clergy of the time assozzed to the change. The pope took advantage of the anti-English feeling by sending to the island multitudes of missionary bishops and priests, who succeeded in holding the native Irish within the pale of Roman Catholicism. During the two following centuries, the Protestant Episcopal Church (to which we now give this name, as during this period the Protestant Church had no distinct existence) suffered many vicissitudes; but by the Revolution of 1688 and the battle of the Boyne it was placed in a position of assured stability as a Protestant body. Still, the very intimate connection between the Church and the government, necessitated by the hostile elements with which both had been surrounded, had exercised upon the former a very unwholesome influence. The Church had been treated as little more than a mere department of government. "Many of the bishops, during this period, seem to have held High-Church views; and, with some, the excessive influence of the government in religious matters prevailed, and along with it an indisposition to tolerate dissent in any shape whatsoever. This deadness of religious life characterized all the churches in the reigns of Anne and the Georges, though bright examples may be cited of the contrary spirit. The names of Richardson, Atkin, and Brown may be mentioned with honor as those of clergymen who, in the early part of the 18th century, took an active interest in the work of evangelizing the native Irish. Among these, the Augustan Bishop Boulter, bishop Berkeley, and others may be noted among the members of the Episcopal bench who exhibited an earnest spirit of devotion and practical godliness. Wesley and his followers among the Methodists did much by their labors, first in Ireland and then outside the Church, to awaken evangelical life among all ranks of the national clergy. But English influence was, during this period, too often used in a wrong direction. English clergymen were frequently thrust into the best Church livings in Ireland, and Irish bishops were filled with Englishmen, while the earnest parochial clergymen of the land were neglected and despised. Dean Swift's witty description of the honest clergymen nominated to Irish bishoprics was waylaid and murdered by highwaymen on Quinnaval Heath, who then seized on their 'letters patent,' came to Ireland, and got consecrated in their room, shows what was thought, in some quarters, of many of the men who, at this dark era, bore spiritual rule in the Church of Ireland." (Wright's Lecture on the Church of Ireland.)

There is no other Church in Christendom so much influenced by the Wesleyan revival of religion. The evangelical leaven imparted at that time, assisted by an intense antipathy to Romanism, has spread through the whole Church, so that Ritualistic and Broad-Church elements are almost unknown within its bounds. This fact is the more striking as some of the most influential prelates have been, and are, Englishmen of High-Church tendencies.

By Gladstone's disendowment act, known as the "Irish Church Act, 1869," it was provided that on and after Jan. 1, 1871, the "Church of Ireland" should cease to exist as a body corporate. At this time, "the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland," was appointed, to which body were intrusted all the temporal affairs of the Church, until such time as the representative body of the Church should supersede them. This commission was endowed with extensive powers for carrying out the purposes of the act. They were freed from all restraints of the courts of law, and received all the powers and privileges of the High Court of Chancery. The Commissioners were ordered to ascertain the amount of yearly income which any person, lay or clerical, derived from the Church, and to pay each year to every such holder an annuity equal to the amount of yearly income so ascertained. This annuity was to continue, even though the annuitant should become disabled from attending to the duties of his office, "by age, sickness, or permanent infirmity, or by any cause other than his own willful default." All laws were repealed which would hamper the Church in exercising the utmost freedom in self-government. The ecclesiastical laws existing at the time of the disestablishment, including "articles, doctrines, rites, rules, discipline, and ceremonies," were abrogated, and neither the members of the Church, as if subsisting "by contract," except that nothing in these laws "should be construed to confer on any bishop, etc., any coercive jurisdiction whatsoever." It was also provided that no change should be made in the laws of the Church, so as to deprive any person of his annuity.

By a convention of bishops and representatives of the Church, held in Dublin in 1870, a constitution was agreed upon. The preamble asserts a belief in the inspiration of the Bible, and a determination to preserve the "three orders of priests, deacons, and bishops." It contains also a protest "against all those innovations in doctrine and worship which, at the Reformation, this Church did disown and reject."

The supreme court of the Church is the General Synod. It consists of three orders, viz., bishops, clergy, and laity. It is also divided into two houses, viz., the House of Bishops and the House of Representatives; the former consisting of all archbishops and bishops, and, of the latter of 200 representatives, 111 of the representatives of the laity, all these to be elected for three years. "The bishops shall vote separately from the representatives; and no question shall be deemed to have been carried, unless there be in its favor a majority of the bishops present, if they desire to vote, and a majority of the clerical and lay representatives present, voting conjointly or by orders; provided always that if a question affirmed by a majority of the clerical or lay representatives, voting conjointly or by orders, but rejected by a majority of the bishops, shall be affirmed at the next ordinary session of the General Synod by not less than two thirds of the clerical and lay representatives, it shall be deemed to be carried, unless it be negative by not less than two-thirds of the then existing order of bishops." The General Synod has power to alter, abrogate, or enact canons, and to control any regulation made by a diocesan synod, so far as may be necessary to provide against the admission of any principle inexpedient for the common interest of the Church.

The Diocesan Synod consists of the bishop of the bishopric and licensed clergymen of the diocese, and at least one layman, called synodman, for each parish in the diocese. The bishop, clergy, and laity sit and debate and vote together; but six members of either order may call, upon any question, for a vote by orders. If the bishop dissent from the other two orders with respect to any proposed act of the synod, all action thereupon is suspended until the next annual meeting of the synod; and should such act be then reaffirmed by two thirds of each of the other orders, and the bishop still dissent, it is submitted to the General Synod, whose decision is final.

The representative body consists of the archbishops and bishops, of one clerical and two lay members for each diocese, and of such number of other persons elected as shall be equal to the number of dioceses. This body is a Board of Trustees, holding the temporalities of the Church.

There is a Committee of Patronage in each diocese, consisting of the bishop, one lay and two clerical members. In each parish there are three persons named parochial nominators. When an incumbent is to be appointed, the Committee of Patronage and the parochial nominators form a Board of Nomination, presided over by the bishop, who has an independent and also a casting vote. This board nominates a clergyman to the bishop, who, if he decline to institute the nominee, must give him, if so required, his reasons in writing for so declining. Bishops are nominated by the diocesan synods, and confirmed by the Bench of Bishops.

The diocesan Church has already taken advantage of its freedom to revise carefully the Book of Common Prayer. Some extracts from the preface to the Revised Prayer-book, to be printed during this year (1875), will show the objects and aims of the revision: "When this Church of Ireland ceased to be established by law, and thereupon some alteration in our public liturgy became needful, it was earnestly desired by many that occasion should be taken for considering what changes the lapse of years or exigency of our present times and circumstances might have rendered expedient." "We now afresh declare that the posture of kneeling prescribed to all communicants is not appointed for any purpose of adoration of Christ's body and blood, but only for the sake of bread and wine, but only for a signification of our humble and grateful acknowledgment, and for the avoiding of such profanation and disorder as might ensue if some such reverent and uniform posture were not enjoining." "In the Office for Visitation of the Sick we have deemed it fitting that absolution should be pronounced to penitents in the form appointed in the Office for the Holy Communion."

The portions of the Apocalypse which were in the Table of Lessons have been expunged, and the rubric has been omitted which directed the use on certain days of the Roman Canon.

The following are the numerical statistics of the Irish Protestant Episcopal Church as compared with other religious denominations in the island. The total number of clergymen is about 1900.

The only divinity school in Ireland available for theological students of the Protestant Episcopal Church is that of Trinity College. The Church has no official voice in the management of this school, but, under certain conditions, it accepts the theological degree from it, without signing the Thirty-nine Articles. In Nov., 1876, a statute was passed by the senate of the university abolishing this test and admitting even laymen to degrees. The board of Trinity College has also lately provided by Christian Church of the land may establish a theological faculty alongside that of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The act of disestablishment technically decreed also disendowment, but by far the greater part of the endowment of the Church was absorbed by the compensations granted. Most of those who were entitled to annuities commuted their income, or compounded with the ecclesiastical commissioners for a sum arranged as to leave a large capital sum for church endowment, and this endowment was augmented by large donations, amounting, in the first five years of disestablishment, to £1,180,106. As an example of composition, the town of Down in Derry was entitled to an annual income of £13,781. Upon compounding, he received £101,493, leaving a balance to the Endowment Fund of the Church of £200,288. The present endowment of the Church is upwards of £7,000,000.

Protestant Episcopal Free-Church Association. This body, formed in 1875 within the pale of the Protestant Episcopal Church, advocates the freest system for houses of worship, and has grown to so large a proportion that it is necessary that it should be beyond its originally intended mission and assumes the work of Church extension also, i.e. it affords help to feeble churches, provided they do not rent or sell pews. The secretary of the society reported at its third annual meeting (May 13, 1876) 286 clerical, 12 life, and 126 annual contributors. Twenty-one of the bishops of the Church are patrons.

Protestant Union of Germany is a body composed of the members of the Evangelical Protestant Church. It has been in existence since 1863. Its aim is the complete separation of the Church from the state: a synodal Church system for all Protestant Germany: the union of religion and intellectual culture, faith and science, i.e. the advancement of the Christian religion in harmony with free investigations and ever-advancing intellectual culture, and the warring against the existing hierarchical as well as against the radical denials of religion. It was projected in 1863 in the duchy of Baden, and in 1864 its headquarters were established at Heidelberg, where the annual meetings of the Union, called

The Protestant Union, so held and all business of the body was transacted. At present the headquarters of the Union are at Berlin, and since the unification of Germany the purpose is to organize a German National Church, for which all application of the tax upon every member and recognise the organisation by collecting the tax so obtained. Every person belonging to this Church of the nation is to enjoy liberty of thought and utterance, giving even greater breadth of freedom than the members of the Anglican communion enjoy. Protestantism. See Protestant Union of Germany.

Protestantism is the advocacy of the authority of the Sacred Scriptures above and without any other. The Romanist and Jew hold to tradition (q. v.) as having the warrant of authority, but the Protestants refuse to look to authority above the Bible. It proceeds directly back from the sacred Word of God. There arise, of course, various questions as to what this Word is, and how it is to be interpreted. In regard to the former, the Protestant holds that the Holy Bible is composed only of the canonical writings of the Old and New Testament [see CANONS], while the Roman Catholics also ascribe canonical authority to the so-called Apocrypha of the Old Testament. See APOCYPHTA. The right of interpretation the Roman Catholic Church claims to be hers alone, while the Protestant Church concedes this right in a stricter sense to every one who possesses the requisite gifts and attainments, but in a more comprehensive sense to every Christian who seeks after salvation, proceeding upon the principle that Scripture is its own interpreter according to the analogia fidei. See ESTABLISHMENT. The principle of the authority of the Roman Catholic Church that the Vulgate version, which it sanctions, is to be preferred to all other versions as the authentic one, and is thus to a certain extent of equal importance with the original, while Protestants regard the original only as authentic.

The name Protestantism repels everybody on whom it falls from that ecclesiasticism which the primitive Church was unaccustomed with, and which owes its origin and development to the medieval Church. "The Reformation, viewed in its most general character," says Ullmann (Reformer before the Reformation, i. 18), "was the reaction of Christianity as Gospel against Christianity as law." It is therefore inconsistent for Anglican High-Churchmen and their followers on this side of the Atlantic to assert that Protestantism is simply negative. It is positive enough, for it only discards one interpretation of Christianity, but expounds another. It denies the right of the Church to stand in authority of the individual, but it gives a circumscribed and well-defined liberty to the individual—not absolute license. "The liberty which the Reformers prized first and chiefly," says Prof. Fisher (Hist. of the Ref. p. 2), "was not the abstract right to choose one's creed without constraint, but a liberty that flows from the enforced appropriation by the soul of truth in harmony with its inmost nature and its conscious necessities." The nature of Protestantism is to be found in the principle that in the Protestant Church is freedom, but freedom only from the restraints of man, from a tyranny of conscience, from all systems which had previous to the great Reformation been imposed upon man without any divine warrant. It is freedom on the basis of obedience to God and to his holy Word. It is that freedom which consists in the cheerful and ready obedience to the divine Word and to the divine Will. It is the freedom of the republic, and not the license of the commune; it is the liberty of common-sense, and not the enthusiasm of the idealist. The principle of Protestantism is the highest expression of the philosophical idealism of the “Romantic movement.” This idealism is of two kinds: (a) a negative idealism, expressed in the thought of Schaff, "is evangelical freedom in Christ, its aim to bring every soul into direct relation to Christ. Romanism puts the Church first and Christ next; Protestantism reverses the order. Romanism says, Where the Church is (meaning thereby the papal organization), there is Christ; Protestantism says, Where Christ is, there is the Church; Romanism says, Where the Catholic tradition is, there is the Bible and the infallible rule of faith; Protestantism says, Where the Bible is, there is the true tradition and the infallible rule of faith; Romanism says, Where faith is, there is justification and good works. Protestantism throws Mary and the saints between Christ and the believer; Protestantism goes directly to the Saviour. Romanism proceeds from the visible Church (the papacy) to the invisible Church; Protestantism from the invisible Church (the true body of Christ) to the visible; Romanism works from without, and from the general to the particular; Protestantism from within, and from the individual to the general. Protestantism is a protest against the tyranny of man on the basis of the authority of the Bible, to be explained by the rule of Christian faith and practice, and teaches justification by grace alone, as apprehended by a living faith. It holds up Christ as all in all, whose word is all-sufficient to teach, whose grace is all-sufficient to save. Its mission is to rescue the true Church of God and kingship of all believers by bringing them all into direct union and fellowship with Christ" (Christian Intelligencer, Jan. 14, 1869). Dr. Hagenbach objects to this reduction of Protestantism to one fundamental principle, and offers three as its basis—viz. (1) the real principle, living faith in Christ; (2) the formal principle, the authority of the Scriptures as a rule of faith; (3) the social principle, forming a community, of which Christ is the individual head, and of which all the members are priests unto God (see Theol. Studien u. Kritiken, January, 1854). In this exposition every essential characteristic of Protestantism seems to have been considered by this master theologian.

Romanists charge against Protestantism that its rebut too often the step of aggression from the Protestants. (5.) The disjointed condition of Protestantism; its constant warfarings of brother with brother; the absence of a tolerant spirit for difference of opinion in non-essentials, that is, in the advancement of their common salvation, still further strengthened by persecution.

(6.) The inability of Protestantism to turn to the best account the wide diversity of talents and character which is constantly developing in evangelical Christianity. In Romanism Ignatius and Bellarmine can vie with the greatest Protestant Whedon and Whitefield must become the founders of new sects.

(7.) The disposition of races. Montesquieu, in his Esprit des Lois, remarks that Protestantism is prevalent in Northern Catholicism in Southern Europe, and explains most judiciously, "C'est que les peuples du nord ont un esprit d'indépendance et de liberté, que n'ont pas les peuples du midi."

An interessant problem, if it has its interest in its successes. These are well set forth in the following extract from Prof. Fisher's address at the Evangelical Alliance Congress, 1874:

(1.) Its whole character is favorable to civil and religious freedom and the promotion of the multiplied advantages of the Reformation spirit. The man of New Testament Catholicism man was deprived of his personal rights under Protestantism he regained them. The progress of civil liberty after a step of history is marked by the growing respect paid to the rights of the individual, and the idea is afforded for unfoldng of the power for the realization of his aspirations. A new sense was something imposing in those huge despotisms—England, Spain, and so forth, the most powerful and multifarious human beings were welded together under an absolute master. Such empire were an advance upon a primitive state of things, where every man's hand was against his neighbor. Yet they were a crude form of crystallization, and it was the spirit of the didactic cities of Greece, with their freer political life, and the larger scope which allowed for the activity and the culture of the individual, and the separation of mind and body that formed the match for the colossal might of the East. Among the Greeks and Romans, however, although governments of law and reason were in the horizon, the State was the end and to the State the individual must yield an exclusive allegiance. It was a great gain when the Christian Church arose, and when the individual became conscious of an allegiance of the soul to a higher kingdom—an allegiance which did not supersede his loyalty to the civil authority, but limited while it sanctioned this obligation. But the Church itself at length erected a supremacy over the State, the Church made the State subject to the free action of reason and conscience, and even stretched that supremacy so far as to make it the great central power. It reared its thronocracy, and subjected everything to its unlimited sway. The Reformation gave back to the individual his proper autonomy, and infused in his intellect a new interest in intellectual activity, a development of inventive capacity and of energy of character, which give rise to such achievements in the life of the Church as are found in political and in every other line of men where self-sufficiency and personal force are called for. And again, if a nation is to be made, the mind of man, the welfare of the nation, the power of the nation is what counts. In the period immediately following the Reformation, signals proofs were afforded of this truth. The little states of Holland, for example, proved their ability to cope with the Spanish empire, to gain their independence, and to acquire an opulence and a culture which recalled the best days of the Greek republics. They beat back their invaders from their soil, and sent forth their victorious navies upon every sea, while at home they were educating the common people, fostering science and learning, and building up universities famous throughout Europe. England, France, and Spain, in the past, and England in the present, have been evidencing the same ascendancy; the period, likewise, of Shakespeare, Bacon, and Raleigh. Who can doubt that the United States of America are, not indeed wholly, but in great part, indebted for their position, as contrasted with that of Mexico and all the political communities of South America, to this expansion of the power of the individual, which is the uniform and legitimate fruit of Protestant principles?

(2.) The spirit of Protestantism favors universal education. To possess the Scriptures, to take part in the administration of government in the Church, must not be an illiterate people. The rights and privileges under the Protestant system, are indispensable. The weight of personal responsibility for the culture of his intellectual and spiritual life, rests upon every individual. If education is to be a matter of universal concern. Far more has been done in Protestant than in Roman Catholic countries for the instruction of the whole people. It is enough to refer to the communicational system of Holland, of New England, and to Protestant Germany, to show how natural it is for the disciples of the Reformation to provide for its great national foundation.

"The free circulation of the Bible in Protestant lands has disseminated among all classes of the population, as of religious improvement, the good effect of which is immeasurable. As a repository of history, biography, poetry, ethics, temptation, and a guide to heaven, the Bible has exerted an influence on the common mind, to all Protestant nations, which it would be difficult to equal if not in the influence but in the extent of its circulation. The Bible and of exploring its pages for fresh truth affords a mental stimulant of a very high order. Many writers have the Scriptures carried into the cottage of the peasant a breadth and refinement of intellect which otherwise would never have been acquired, and which are not produced by the Roman Catholic system, in relation to the same social class, has ever been able to engender.

(3.) That Protestantism should be more friendly to civil and religious liberty than the Roman Catholic system would be unanswerably proved from the nature of the two forms of faith. Protestantism involves, as a vital element, an assertion of personal rights with respect to religion, the highest concern of man, that Protestantism casts off the yoke of priestly rule, and puts ecclesiastical government, in due measure, into the hands of the laity. We have already said, that the Church against the laity against a usurped ecclesiastical authority. The Church of England is now, under the ancient binding duty is to bow with unquestioning docility and obedience to their heaven-appointed superiors. How is it possible to give the people a sense of mind which is incompatible with a patient endurance of tyranny at the hands of the civil power? How can a people who have been accustomed to fail to bring it, eventually at least, a corresponding respect for all kinds of arbitrary power, and a readiness to submit to the exercise in legislation? How can men who are accustomed to judge for themselves and act independently in Church affairs maintain a slavish spirit in the political sphere? On the contrary, the habit which Roman Catholicism nurtures, tends to beggar men to servility in the obedience to the ruler as long as an alliance is kept up between sovereign and religion and personal freedom can accommodate itself to any of the various types of political society. Her doctors have at times preached an extreme theory of popular rights and of the sovereignty of the people. While the State is subordinate to the Church, of any government of form, may he be tolerable there may be an interest in the part of the priesthood in inculcating political theories which operate, in their judgment, to weaken the obligations of loyalty towards civil magistrate, and to exalt by contrast the divine authority of the Church. When the civil magistracy presumes to exercise prerogatives, or to ordain measures, which are deemed fraught with the ecclesiastical interest, a radical question of the doctrine of the Church is raised. It is feared that the philosophy, and in the pulpit of the most conservative of religious bodies. Generally speaking, however, the Church of England, in the exercise of a perfect influence on the political institutions, is left free to exercise all kinds of tyranny, without any check from the ecclesiastical. The State, it is said, proves omnipotent; the civil magistrate is delivered from the wholesome dread of ecclesiastical censure, and is left free to exercise all kinds of tyranny, without the powerful restraint to which he was subjected under the mediceo system. He may even violate the rights of conscience with impunity. The State, it is sometimes said, when released from its subordinating influence in the Church, a good example of her people was reinforced in a remarkable degree by the stimulus derived from the peculiar genius of the Protestant system of the period with which she was supplying her naval ascendency; the period, likewise, of Shakespeare, Bacon, and Raleigh. Who can doubt that the United States of America are, not indeed wholly, but in great part, indebted for their position, as contrasted with that of Mexico, as the political communities of South America, to this expansion of the power of the individual, which is the uniform and legitimate fruit of Protestant principles?"

tichristian institution. The fact that a layman can be as good a Christian as a priest is overlooked. The Christian layman who has to rely on the commonwealth, on the Christian magistrates who are set over them, are quite as able to dispose of his rights, and he can do it for the common weal, as if they were subject to an organised priesthood. Since the Reformation a layman has his Church in the Bible Church State, and civil magistrates in England have borne a part in ecclesiastical government. Without entering into the question of the righteousness or expediency of establishments, or broaching any of the controverted topics connected with the doctrine of Zwingle about the Eucharist shall be prohibited; (3) the Anabaptists shall not be tolerated; (4) libels against religious parties and about religious matters are interdicted. These articles did not meet the pretensions of Luther's followers. The Lutheran states asserted that in matters of faith a majority of votes was not decisive, and that the resolutions of 1526, unanimously voted, could only be abrogated by a unanimous vote. They, in consequence, protested against the resolutions of the diet, and it was thus that the followers of the Reformation were in derision called Protestants. They declared their readiness to abandon their emperor and the diet in all "suitful and possible matters," but against any order considered by them repugnant to "God and his holy Word, to their soul's salvation, and their good conscience," they appealed to the emperor, to the free council, and to the imperial parlements. The essential principles involved in the protest against this decree and in the arguments on which it was grounded were (1) that the Catholic Church cannot be the judge of the Reformed churches, which are no longer in communion with her; (2) that the authority of the Bible is supreme, and above that of councils and bishops; (3) that the Bible is not to be interpreted and used according to tradition, or use, and wont, but to be explained by means of itself, its own language, and connection. As this doctrine—that the Bible, explained independently of external tradition, is the sole authority in all matters of faith and discipline—is really the foundation-stone of the Reformation, the term Protestant was extended from those who signed the Spires protest to all who embraced the fundamental principle involved in it. The protesting parties were as follows: John, the elector of Saxony, the landgrave of Hesse, the marquess of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, a prince of Anhalt, a number of Frankish and Suabian imperial cities—Nuremberg, Ulm, Kempten, Nördlingen, Horb, and Oriental parts of Germany, Brandenburg, Windsheim, Strasburg, Constance, Lindau, and Memmingen. The four last named had joined the protest on account of the interdict of Zwingle's doctrine, which interdict met with the entire approval of Luther and his adherents, excepting the article against the Anabaptists, and, while Luther approved of the protest, he exhorted at the same time the Protestant powers to destroy the impious Anabaptists with fire and sword, and accept the resolutions of the diet in this respect. Now, the new doctrines being in possession of a name which indicated their common hostile relation to the Roman Church, the schism became less curable, and reconciliation was therefore less practicable than ever. See Reformation.

The term Protestant, which thus came to be synonymous with non-Romanist, was applied, first, as a convenient historical term designating collectively all who deny the usurped supremacy of the pope; secondly, as a term of controversy implying (1) a condemnation of alleged Romanist errors and superstitions, and sometimes (2) a yet further restriction of certain tenets supposed to be of the essence of Protestantism. The principle of Protestantism is the sufficiency and authority of the Scriptures as a religious rule of faith and practice. Those, on the one hand, who deny its sufficiency are not in principle Protestants. The former include not only all members of the Roman Catholic church, but also the authority of the Church to speak for God, either in adding to the doctrines of the Bible or in giving them a blending and authoritative interpretation; and those, on the other hand, who deny its divine authority are not properly Protestants; and the latter embrace all those who think that man alone can make the all-sufficient guide and standard in religious faith and practice, and that the Bible is only to be used like other books—as a light, but not as an authority. In 1659 it was stated in Milton's "Treatise of Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes" that the so-called "all sound Protestant writers that neither traditions, councils, nor canons of any visible Church, much less edicts of any magistrate or civil session, but the Scripture only, can be the final judge or rule in matters of religion, and that only in the conscience of every Christian to himself." Therefore, in the name of Protestantism, had never been recanted this doctrine, which prefers the Scripture before the Church, and acknowledges none but the Scripture sole interpreter of itself to the conscience. If by the Protestant doctrine we believe the Scripture—not for the Church's saying, but for its own word as the Word of God—then ought we to believe in what we believe the Church to say, though the visible Church with all her doctors gainsay. To interpret the Scripture convincingly to his own conscience none in the way of the Holy Ghost, guided by the Spirit, and under the light of the Word so guided, more than be to himself can be a worse deceiver. This is not the doctrine of the Church of England. If the Church have authority in controversies of faith, it is a matter of conscience to submit one's private judgment to that authority. There exist in the world two authorities mutually corroborative, and independent of each other, and, so far as individual interpretation of each, mutually corrective of each other—the inspired Word and the inspired Church; the inspired Word receiving its canonicity, its interpretation, from the Church, and the inspired Church tested in its development by the inspired Word." (Bishop Forbes, on Thirty-nine Art. p. 95). Of course, since Protestantism recognizes the right of private judgment in the interpretation of Scripture, it allows a wide divergence of theological views, and such a divergence actually exists. At the same time, the differences in the belief of the various Protestant sects generally relate to minor points, as of worship, ceremonial, and form of ecclesiastical government, nearly all the great Protestant denominations being substantially agreed respecting the fundamental points of doctrine as taught by the Word of God. Mr. Chillingworth, addressing himself to a writer in favor of the Church of Rome, speaks of the religion of the Protestants in the following excellent terms: "Know then, sir, that when I say the religion of Protestantism is to be preferred before yours, on the one side, I do not understand by your religion the doctrine of that which is not taught by any other body of Christians. I do not mean the doctrine of the Sarbonne, or the Jesuits, or of the Dominicans, or of any other particular company among you, but that wherein you all agree, or profess to agree, the doctrine of the Council of Trent; so, accordingly, on the other side, by the religion of Protestants, I do not understand the doctrine of Luther, Calvin, or Melanchthon, or the Confession of Augsburg, or Geneva, or the Catechism of the Church of England. No, nor the harmony of Protestant confessions: but that in which they all agree, and which they all subscribe with a greater harmony, as a fect rule of faith and action—that is, the Bible. The Bible I say—the Bible only—is the religion of Protestants. Whatever else they believe beside it, and the plains, the intransigent, inadmissible consequences of it, well may they hold to the utmost height, and still entertain a terror of opinion; but of an authority, or a matter of faith and religion, neither can they with their conscience to their own grounds believe it themselves, nor require belief of it of others. With which high end, nor other, nor any other, are the Scriptures taught the doctrine of predetermination and others connected intimately, if not necessarily, with it. From him sprang the Arminians, who, as a sect, are reduced to an insignificant number. The Socinians, or Unitarians, are accepted in the main by the Methodists, by most of the Episcopalians, and by many in other denominations. The Socinians denied that the doctrines of the Trinity, the atonement, and the proper deity of Jesus Christ were to be found in the Bible. They thus revived the views of the earlier Arians, while at the same time they carried their denials much further. Their views have found expression in one wing of the Unitarian and Universalist churches of the present day. Their most general acceptance is in New England and in parts of Great Britain; but there are some churches in this country—so far as to secure its independence of the church, and the movement was too deep and powerful for him to control; but the royal and ecclesiastical influence combined to retain the Episcopal form of government and the union of Church and State. Both are still preserved in the Church of England, and the former in the Episcopal Church of this country. Its symbols of doctrine are equal in importance to Armenians and.t Smith's civil and religious controversies which, a few centuries later, plunged England into civil war, gave impetus to the idea of absolute ecclesiastical independence. The result was the organization of churches which were mainly Calvinistic in belief, but in which the absolute right of the people of each Church to manage their own affairs was maintained. In England they took the name of Independents, in the United States that of Congregationalists. As early as the days of Luther, the Reformers were divided on the question of baptism; those who maintained that baptism should be administered only by immersion and to adults took the name of Baptists, which they retain to this day. The 18th century witnessed a general revival of religious spirit, especially in England and the United States, differing from that which characterized the Reformation in that it was less a battle against error in doctrine, and more a simple awakening of Christian zeal to use for the redemption of the masses the truths which the Reformation had brought to light. Out of this awakening grew Methodism, which is essentially Arminian in doctrine and Episcopal in government, and differs from the Episcopal Church, from which it came out, rather in the spirit and character of its adherents than in theology. These churches represent the chief forms of Protestantism. There is also a large number of minor groups, and most of them are offshoots from these great branches.

The total Protestant population of the world is estimated in 1890 to be more than 120,000,000, a little more than half the Roman Catholic population. It is thus divided:

- United States: 35,000,000
- British America: 2,000,000
- Mexico: 9,000
- South America: 70,000
- Dutch American possessions: 25,000
- Danish and Swedish possessions: 55,000
- Haiti: 12,000
- Spain: 9,000
- Portugal: 1,000
- France: 2,000
- Austria: 8,000
- Prussia: 15,949,528
- Rest of Germany proper: 11,134,440
- Italy: 103,000
- Switzerland: 1,667,195
- Holland: 2,831,330
- Great Britain and Ireland: 24,000,000
- Denmark: 9,080,000
- Sweden and Norway: 6,580,000
- Russia: 4,000,000
- Turkey: 15,000
- Greece: 3,000
- Austro-Turkish India: 45,000
- China: 24,500
- Japan: 30,000
- East and Farther India: 400,000
- United States: 20,000
- Persia: 1,500
- Arabia: 2,000
- English Africa: 1,000
- Algeria: 9,000
- Egypt: 9,000
- Abyssinia: 50,000
- Madagascar: 100,000
- Australia and Polynesia: 2,000,000

The population connected with or under the influence of Protestant churches at the close of 1874 was about as follows:

- America: 33,000,000
- Europe: 71,000,000
- Asia: 1,000,000
- Africa: 1,000,000
- Australia and Polynesia: 1,000,000

Total: 119,000,000

Protevangelium, a spurious gospel ascribed to James, containing an account of the birth of Mary and of Christ. It is supposed to have been written in repro.

Prothode, Sr., a French prelate who flourished near the opening of the 7th century; he died before 625. He has been called son of the patrician Prothode, but without proof. It is at least certain that he was the successor of St. Nicephore in the metropolitan see of Besançon. He compiled a ritual for the use of the two cathedral churches at Besançon—St. Étienne and St. Jean, which has not reached us without interpolations; it has recently been published by the abbé Richard.

Prothero, AMOS SUMMERS, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Clarke County, Ind., April 17, 1832. He went to Iowa when quite young, and with his parents settled near Libertyville, Jefferson County. He was converted in 1846, and at once joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. His convictions of duty pointed him to the ministry as a life-work, and, the better to fit himself for the sacred office, he entered the Mount-Pleasant Collegiate Institute, afterwards the Iowa Wesleyan University, in 1852, where he continued his studies until 1857, when he graduated. He was licensed to preach while at college. After graduating he was immediately employed on the Dodgeville Circuit by the presiding elder, and in 1857 joined the Iowa Conference. His appointments were Denmark, Wapello, Dodgeville, Grand View, Crawfordsville, New London, Kossuth, Montezuma, New Sharon, and Birmingham. At the last-named place he died, April 1, 1873, greatly respected by his own people and the Church generally.

Prothéseis (1), a small altar in Greek churches corresponding to the credence table. The name is taken from the shew-bread, which was called ἡ πρόθεσις τῶν ἄρτων—the setting-out of the loaves. (2) A small side-altar in a Cucigna church, on the epistle side, at which the ministers of the altar, on Sundays and festivals, partake of both kinds, using a silver calamus to drink of the chalice.

Protonotary, a word that has a different signification in the Greek Church from what it has in the Latin; for in the first it is the name of one of the great officers of the Church of Constantinople, who takes rank next to the patriarch, and writes all despatches he sends to the grand seignior; besides which he is empowered to have an inspection over the professors of the law, into purchases, wills, and the liberty given to slaves; but in the Roman Church they were formerly called protonotaries who had the charge of writing the acts of the martyrs and circumstances of their death, a title of honor whereunto are ascribed many privileges, as legitimizing bastards, making apostolic notaries [see Protonotarius Apostolicus], doctors of divinity and of the canon and civil law: they are twelve in number.

Proto (from). This adjective is prefixed to the name of several officers in the Greek Church, denoting that he who holds it is the chief or classe.

Protodiacon. The protodiacon, or archdeacon, holds the first rank among the deacons employed in the Episcopal Church to assist the bishop during worship and in the exercise of his office. He is next in rank to the bishop near the person of the bishop or archbishop, and stands at his side while he is performing the liturgical rites or conferring holy orders. The splendor of the episcopal dignity reflected on this office, and the influence which the archdeacons in all times exercised upon the bishop, made of the protonotary the arch-deacon in the Greek-Russian Church a very important person. In larger parishes several deacons are employed, but only the first deacon of an episcopal church is distinguished by the honorary title of archi- or proto diaconus.

Protonotarius Apostolicus is a notary appointed by the papal see. The qualification of πρωτοπήγα (primus) is but honorary. In the apostolic chancery rules the word "protope" is regularly employed, but the papal bulls and rescripts call the same functionary "notarius apostolicae." The papal notaries appointed in the city of Rome (in curia), and forming, twelve in number, a special college of prelates, are distinguished by the addition "Notarii "de numero participantium" from those appointed abroad (extra curiam), who are simply notarii or protonotarii, sometimes with the specification "extra numerum." The former are the regular and paid, the latter the extraordinary and titular notaries. The origin of the papal notariate is assigned to the 1st century, for pope Clement I is said to have employed seven of them in noting the memoriabila of the Church, and composing trustworthy accounts of the various manners in which the martyrs were brought to death. In later ages it became the business of the protonotaries to write the biographies, canons of the councils, draw up autographs of the acts of the Consistory of Cardinals, especially in cases of Beatification, canonization, etc. Their college was increased to twelve members and endowed with great privileges by pope Sixtus V. They precede in the papal chapel at different solemnities the Auditorius R. Rotae, all cameral ecclesiastics and lower prelates, and the genera of orders. Formerly they often enjoyed precedence over bishops, but Paul II declared that at Rome and abroad they should step after the episcopate. Only in public consistories and in processions the cavalesc for protonotaries take their place immediately after the assistant bishops of the pontifical chapel, and consequently in front of the episcopate. They are, moreover, not subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinaries, but are placed under the immediate protection of the pope; they can freely dispose by testament even of their beneficial fortune to the amount of 2000 ducats; they receive all messages and graces of the pope free of tax and stamp; they have free access to the papal chancery, to the public consistories, and to the cardinal consistories, debates of the emperor, or beatification or canonization. They are entitled, under certain restrictions, to use portable altars in saying mass, and at certain festivals to wear the pontifical badges (comp. Sixt. V, Const. "Romanus Pontifex" and "Laudabilis"). They have also the peculiar privilege of creating annually six doctors, who enjoy all the rights of regularly graduated doctors; but only residents of Rome can be thus promoted (Bened. XIV, Const. Inter Consipicuos, d. iv Cal. Septbr. 1744). These distinctions belong exclusively to the regular protonotarii appointed by the pope himself. Those "extra statum," and the titular notaries, who can be appointed not only by the pope, but also by his legate a latere, and, with some restrictions, by the college of real protonotaries, occupy in the scale of rank the degree next to the canons of a cathedral, and only if they are theologically provided with a canonical have they precedence over the other members of chapters. They wear the violet talarium, with the mantel of the same color. In the performance of Church functions they are permitted the ring, but without jewel.—Wetzer u. Wele, Kirchen Lexicon, a. v.

Protopappas is the archpriest in the Greek Church who stands on the left hand of the patriarch (q. v.), his dignity consisting in the administration of the holy sacrament to the patriarch at all high and solemn masses, and receives it from him. He is the head ecclesiastical dignity not only with respect to his peculiar privileges, but to his right and title to precedence.

Protoprobyter (πρωτοπροβυτερος, usually called protopope) is in the Russo-Greek Church an immediate decree between the bishop and the simple priest. The situation and functions of the protopresbyter are essentially the same as those of the former archpriests of the episcopal cathedrals, and of the deans in the country. Each cathedral has its protopresbyter, but the same dignity exists in other important churches of large cities where several popes are employed. The title belongs also to such popes of the first rank as exercise some rights of supervision and administration over several surrounding parishes; for every diocese or eparchy in Russia is divided into several protopopes (as in the Roman Catholic Church into deaneries). This class of dignitaries forms, in litigious and disciplinary matters of ecclesiastical resort, the first instance in the diocese. In important cities the protopopes are generally employed as counsellors, assessors, or secretaries in the episcopal consistories or other ecclesiastical colleges. The distinguishing garment of the protopopes is the so-called epigonation. The protopresbyterate is the most influential of the lower clerical functions, and the highest degree open to a secular ecclesiastic; for in the Greek Church the episcopate, and the still higher dignities, can only be occupied by unmarried priests, or such as are separated from their wives by death or voluntary renunciation, and who belong to the monastical order, mostly archimandrites (aboba) and hegumenos (priorm).—Wetzer u. Wele, Kirchen Lexicon, a. v.

Protopsaltes is the chief singer or master of the choir in Greek churches.

Protosynceulius is the vicar or assistant of a Greek patriarch, who generally resides along with him in his palace.

Protosynthinos is in the Greek Church, the name of the first bishop of an ecclesiastical province; he holds the first rank after the patriarch or after the metropol. At the death of either of these latter dignitaries, the protosynthinos assumes his jurisdiction until a successor is installed.

Prototypos is a term used in theology to designate the original type (q. v.) or form of anything, and especially in the following dogmas: The prototypal form is which Adam was created was the image of God; is Christ that image is restored; and it is the hope of the Christian that this form will be his also when he wake up after God's likeness and is satisfied with God. It is therefore, that has an anthropological, Christological, and a eschatological character, as referring to Adam, to the Redeemer, and to the redeemed. Now, in what does that likeness consist? Not surely in outward form, but in spiritual attributes, for God is Spirit. But those attributes pertain to the soul invested in body, which God has not; therefore the likeness of God must be restricted to such divine attributes as are reflected in man independently of his material nature, such as a love for all that is good and holy, right, reason, and free-will, which constitute in him the "likeness and glory" of God (1 Cor. xi, 7; see Glory), and exclusive of other attributes that serve only to mark the imperfection of the creature. When Irenæus, therefore (c. Haer. v, 6, speaks of the image of God as being similitudo of a bodily character, he may express correctly the philosophical idea of God the Deity, and therefore the divine likeness, as derived from ancient schools, but he hardly speaks with the authority of Catholic antiquity on a point which had as yet received but little consideration. Our only safe guide is the apostle, who expresses himself with self when he says: the image of God is the very "image of God" (2 Cor. iv, 4), "in the form of God" (Phil. ii, 6), and the "express image of his Person," as well as the "brightness of his glory" (Heb. i, 9), Seminary in 1826. After a brief pastorate at Newburyport, Mass., he was elected professor of ancient languages in the University of the City of New York, where he remained from 1838 until 1838. He then spent some time in Europe, and in 1841 accepted the professorship of Latin and Greek literature in the University of Cambridge. In 1854 his chair was confined to Greek literature alone. He resigned in 1851, and transferred his ecclesiastical relation in 1864 to the Presbyterian Church.

After a second protracted residence in Europe, he enlisted in the service of his country, and his war was an exceedingly devoted and useful chaplain to the soldiers of the U.S. Army, being located on Bedloe's Island, in New York Harbor. After his return from the war he lived in New York City. He was a sincere and devout believer in the religion which he preached. His daily walk seemed to be "close with God," until, at last, "God took him." He died of pneumonia, March 3, 1870, after a very short illness, perfectly submissive to the will of the Lord and happy in the prospect of heaven.

Dr. Proudfit was an eminent classical scholar and divine. His mind was highly cultivated, his tastes were refined, and his public life was distinguished by his devotion to literary and theological pursuits. He was a frequent contributor to religious newspapers, and to the Princeton Review and other serial publications. At some time he was a contributor to the Brunswick Quarterly Review. In these periodicals he was actively engaged in the discussion of the exciting controversies connected with what is known as "Mercersburg theology." He edited an edition of Plautus and other classical works. His scholarship was far greater than the ability as a practical teacher of youth. His sermons were always carefully elaborated in style, elegant in expression, and evangelical in spirit, but his quiet delivery failed to give them the power to which their real merits entitled them. Some of these were published by request, among which may be noted: "Harvards Discourse to the Graduating Class of 1841 in Rutgers College," one of the best specimens of his pulpits efforts. Dr. Proudfit was unusually tall and slender, dignified in appearance, with an intellectual head, benevolent face, and polished manners. He excelled as a conversationalist, being full of anecdote and illustration, and happily interweaving his reminiscences of public men and incidents of travel in foreign lands. He took a deep interest in the evangelization of the papal nations of Europe, and was familiar with the great religious questions of those lands. (W. J. T.)

Proudfit, Robert, D.D., an eminent American divine and educator, was born at Hopewell, Pa., June 6, 1777, and graduated at Dickinson College, Pa., in 1788. In 1801 he was ordained, and installed as pastor of the Associate Reformed Church at Brooklyn, N.Y., in which charge he continued until 1818, when he accepted an invitation to the professorship of Greek and Latin at Union College, Schenectady, which situation he filled with distinguished ability until 1849, when, by an act passed by the board of trustees of that college, he was relieved from active duty, and assumed the title of emeritus professor in the same institution. During the whole time in which he was in active duty as professor, Dr. Proudfit did not neglect the call of his sacred profession, and, while his health permitted, he ceased not to preach the Gospel whenever he had opportunity. The zeal and earnestness with which he labored for the Master's cause gained him many admirers. Dr. Proudfit's memory is in the hearts of many made happy by his agency. He died at Schenectady, N.Y., Feb. 11, 1882. See Wilson, Prebys, Hist. Almanac (1882), p. 506.

PROUDHON, Pierre Joseph, a noted French socialist, was born of humble parents, July 15, 1809, at Besançon.

After a rudimentary education, he engaged in printing, and soon became an authority on "Essai de Grammaire Générale," for which he received a pension. In 1840 he published his work entitled Que'est-ce que la Propriété, which eventually became infamous from the answer which it gave to that question—"La Propriété, c'est le Vol!" and caused him the loss of his pension. During the Revolution he edited an inflammatory paper, which was soon suppressed, but gave him such popularity that he was elected to the Assembly. His notorious principles of anarchy prevented his being heard in the debates, and the papers which he issued in revenge were suppressed for their insurrectionality. In 1849 he started a Banque du Peuple to carry out his communist ideas, but it was closed by the authorities, and he fled to Geneva, but on his return to Paris he was imprisoned. During his three years of incarceration he made the acquaintance of several eminent political works. He died in obscurity at Paris, Jan. 19, 1865. His social theories are of the most extravagant and dangerous character, greatly resembling the radical and immoral principles of the communist revolutionists who are now agitating Europe and this country. Provender (מִכְַלָם, milap), fodder for cattle (Gen. xxiv, 23, 32). In the account of king Solomon's stables, in 1 Kings iv. 26, we read, "barley, also, and straw for the horses and dromedaries, brought they unto the place where the officers were, every man according to his charge." Harmer remarks upon this passage: "Besides provisions for themselves, the Orientals are obliged to furnish for the beasts of burden which they ride or carry their goods. That food is of different kinds. They make little or no hay in these countries, and are therefore very careful of their straw, which they cut into small bits, by an instrument which at the same time threshes, as in the corn; this chopped straw, with barley, beans, and balls made of bean and barley meal, or of the pounded kernels of dates, are what they are wont to feed with. The officers of Solomon are accordingly said to have brought, every man in his mouth, barley and straw for the horses and dromedaries; not straw to litter them with, there is reason to think, for it is not now used in those countries for that purpose, but chopped straw for them to eat, either alone or with their barley. The litter they use for them is their own dung, dried in the sun, and bruised between their hands, which they heap up again in the morning, sprinkling it in summer with fresh water, to keep it from corrupting. In some other places we read of provender and straw, not barley and straw; because it may be other things were used for their food anciently, as barley now, besides barley and chopped straw, belli, one of the words used for provender (Isa. xxx, 24), implies something of mixture, and the particle of the verb from which it is derived is used for the mingling of flour with oil; so the verb in Judges xix. 21 may be as well translated 'he mingled [food] for the ass's as 'he gave him provender,' signifying that he mixed some chopped straw and barley together for the ass. Thus also barley and chopped straw, as it is just after reaping, unseparated in the field, might naturally be expressed by the Hebrew word we translate provender, which signifies barley and straw that had been mingled together, and accordingly seems to be so. 'They reap every one his corn in the field' (Job xxiv, 6), 'Hebrew, mingled corn or dregle,' says the margin. What ideas are usually affixed to secondary translation I do not know, but Job apparently alludes to the provender, or heap of chopped straw, lying mingled together in the field, to be gleaned unites the threshing instrument, to which he compared the spoils that were taken from passengers so early as his time by those who lived somewhat after the present manner of the wild Arabs, which spoils are to them what the harvest and barley are to us. With this agrees the passage of Job where this work occurs (xxi, 6), 'Will the ox low in complaints over his provender? or [fodder], as it is translated in our version, when he has not only straw enough, but mixed with barley.' Travellers in the East, wherever they mention the subject, use much the same terms as Walpole, who, in his Journals, remarks, 'Neither the Turks, nor oasis are known to the Turks; for any nation in the East ever used them for their homes.' See FODDEN.

Provensale, David ben-Abraham, who flourished in the 16th century, was a preacher at Mantua, and was so eloquent that he was styled נבוי ומל, יואל כפרסי, i.e. the prince of preachers in his generation. He wrote: ד"ה יתנ, a commentary on the Pentateuch from an archaological point of view: יתנ ומכ, a commentary on the Song of Songs: יתנ ומכ, a comparative lexicon, Hebrew, Latin, Greek, and Italian: יתנ ומכ, a Hebrew grammar. Proverb. מָחֵץ, mashāḥ, rendered in the A. V. 'by-word,' 'parable,' 'proverbi' (rapaḇolāj, ḫāḇūrōj), expresses all and even more than is conveyed by these its English representatives. It is derived from a root מָחֵץ, mashāḥ, 'to be like' (Arab. makhāth, to 'resemble'), and the primary idea involved in it is that of likeness, comparison. This form of comparison would very naturally be taken by the short, pithy sayings which passed into use as popular sayings and proverbs, especially when employed in mockery and sarcasm, as in Mic. ii. 4; Hab. ii. 6, and even in the more developed taunting song of triumph for the fall of Babylonia in Isa. xiv. 4. Probably all proverbial sayings were at first of the nature of similes, but the term mashāḥ soon acquired a more extended significance. It was applied to denote such short, pointed sayings as do not involve a comparison directly, but still convey their meaning by the help of a figure, as in 1 Sam. x. 12; Ezek. xii. 22, 25; xvii. 2, 3 (comp. waḵaḇolāj, Luke iv. 23). From this stage of its application it passed to that of sententious maxims generally, as in Prov. i. 1; x. xxxv; x. 1; xxxv; x. 7, 9; Eccles. xii. 9; Job xii. 12, many of which, however, still involve a comparison (Prov. xxx. 3, 11, 13, 14; xxxi. 1, 2, 3, etc.). Such comparisons are either expressed, or the things compared are placed side by side, and the comparison left for the hearer or reader to supply. Next we find it used of those larger pieces in which a single idea is no longer exhausted in a sentence, but forms the germ of the whole, and worked out into a didactic piece. Many instances of this kind occur in the first section of the book of Proverbs; others are found in Job xxxvii and xxxix, in both which chapters Job takes up his mashāḥ, or 'parable,' as it is rendered in the A. V. The 'parable' of Balaam, in Num. xxiii. 7-10; xxxiv. 5, 15, 18, 20, 21-22, 23-24, are prophecies conveyed in figures; but mashāḥ also denotes the 'parable' proper, as in Ezek. xxi. 2, xx. 49 (xxi. 5); xxxiv. 3. Lowth, in his notes on Isa. xiv. 4, speaking of mashāḥ, says: 'I take this to be the general name for poetical style for the Hebrews, including every sort of it, as ranging under one, or other, or all of the characters, sententious, figurative, and sublime; which are all contained in the original notion, or in the use and application of the word mashāḥ. Parables or proverbs, such as those of Solomon, are always expressed in short, pointed sentences; frequently figurative, being formed on some comparison, both in the matter and the form. Such, in general, is the style of the Hebrew poetry. Balaam's first prophecy (Num. xxiii. 7-10) is called his mashāḥ, although it has hardly anything figurative, and is written in that beautiful sententious style, and, from the very form and manner of it, has great spirit, force, and energy. Thus Job's last speeches, in answer to the three friends (ch. xxvii-

xxxii, are called maskulit from no one particular character which discriminates them from the rest of the poem, but from the sublime, the figurative, the sententious manner which equally prevails through the whole poem, and makes it one of the first and most eminent examples extant of the truly great and beautiful in poetic style." Sir W. Jones says, "The moralists of the East have in general chosen to deliver their precepts in short, sententious maxims, to illustrate them by sprightly comparisons, or to inculcate them in the very ancient forms of agreeable apologues; there are, indeed, both in Arabic and Persian, philosophical tracts on ethics written with sound ratioincation and elegant perspicuity. But in every part of the Eastern world, from Pekin to Damascus, the popular teachers of moral wisdom have imperiously been poets, and their works would be no end of enumerating their works, which are still extant in the five principal languages of Asia." See PARABLE. Our Lord frequently employed proverbs in his public instructions; and the illustration of these proverbs has occupied many learned men, who proceeded partly by the aid of similar passages from the Old Testament, and partly from the ancient writings of the Jews, especially from the Talmud, whence it appears how much they were in use among that people, and that they were applied by Christ and his apostles agreeably to common usage. The proverbs contained in the New Testament are collected and illustrated by Drusius and Anastasius Chocius, whose works are comprised in the ninth volume of the Critici Sacri, and also by Joachim Zehrer, who elucidated them by parallel passages from the fathers, as well as from heathen writers, in a treatise published at Leipsic in 1601. The proverbs which are found in the New Testament have been illustrated by Vorstius and Viscar, as well as by Lightfoot and Schöttgen in their Nora Hebraica et Talmudica, and by Buxtorf in his Lexicon Chaldeicum Talmudicum et Rabbinicum, from which are quoted Bicknell, Mezulain, Dr. Whitby, Dr. Adam Clarke, and other commentators, who have derived their illustrations of the Hebrew parables and proverbs. See Kelly, Proverbs of all Nations (Lond. 1839, 8vo); Sterling, Literature of Proverbs (ibid. 1860, 8vo); Bohm, Book of Proverbs. See Proverbs, Book of.

Proverbs, Book of, the 20th book of the Old Testament, according to the arrangement of the English Bible, where it is placed between the Psalms and Ecclesiastes, doubtless from its presumed relation to the other works of Solomon; and which, while it is likewise follows the Psalms as part of the Kethubim, or Hagiographa. In the German MSS. of the Hebrew Old Testament, the Proverbs are placed between the Psalms and Job, while in the Spanish MSS., which follow the Masoretic, the order is Psalms, Job, Proverbs. This latter is the order observed in the Alexandrian MS. of the Sept. Melito, following another Greek MS., arranges the Hagiographa thus: Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Job, as in the list made out by the Council of Laodicea; and the same order is given by Origen, except that the book of Job is separated from the other by the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Daniel, and Ezekiel. But our present arrangement existed in the time of Jerome (see Pref. in Liber Regum, iii:1:1: "Tertius ordo dyuōγεσεν posse: et primus liber incipit ab Job, Sequenda a David... Tertius est Solomon, tres libros habens: Proverbin, quum illi parabolis, id est Maashaloth appellat: Ecclesiastes, id est, Coeleth: Canticum Cantorum, quem titulus Sir Asirim promotori"). In the Peshito Syriac, Job is placed before Joshua, while Proverbs and Ecclesiastes follow the Psalms, and are separated by one of the Long Songs of Solomon, and Gregory of Nazianzum, apparently from the exigencies of his verse, arranges the writings of Solomon in this order: Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Proverbs. Pseudo-Epiphanius places Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs between the two last, 2d book of Kings and the minor prophets. The following article treats of the book both from an internal and an external point of view. See Bible. I. Title.—As in the Pentateuch, the book of Proverbs takes its Hebrew title from its opening words—רֶוֶם מִלָּהָה הָרֶוֶם, or רֶוֶם מִלָּהָה, mislish, simply. From this are directly derived the titles it bears in the Sept. (εὐεργεθείσας Μαιά, and Vulg. *Liber Priscus, Liber Priscus, Libri Priscus, Hebræi, Μιᾱς appellavit, and the name by which it is universally known in English. Another title, perhaps more appropriate to the book as a whole, is derived from its chief subject, "Wisdom." In the Targum to Baba Bathra (fol. 14 b), we find Proverbs and Ecclesiastes combined under the name רֶוֶם מִלָּה, "the book of wisdom," and this title appears to have passed thence into the early Church. Clemens Rom. (Ep. ad Cor. i., 57) when quoting i, 23-31 says, εὑρέθηνεν αὐτὸς λευκὸς τὸ παράδει γος σοφία, a name which, according to Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22), was adopted by Hegesippus, Ireneus, and "the whole band of the ancients," following the unwritten Jewish tradition, and by Clem. Alex. (Strom. ii. 23). It is styled by Gregory Naz. (Orat. xi) πατριαγωγική σοφία, and by Dion. Alex. σοφία βιβλική. In the catalogue of canonical books compiled by Melito of Sardis preserved by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 26), we find Πατρι αγωγική σοφία, εὐεργεθείσας Μαιά, as well as Semiparous, a name which, as we have seen, is of frequent occurrence in the early fathers (see Cotelier in Clem. Rom. L. c.; Vales. ad Eusch. L. c.), though by no means restricted to the book of Proverbs, being equally used, as Cotelier proves, of "Ecclesiasticus" and "The Wisdom of Solomon," a circumstance from which some confusion has arisen.

The word רֶוֶם, maschil, by which the so-called "Proverbs" of Solomon are designated (Prov. i, 1, 6; x, 1; xxv, 1; and 1 Kings iv, 82 [v, 12]), is more appropriately translated in the Vulgate "parabolam." It is akin to the verb רִכָּה, corresponding with the Arabic matathah and the Syriac mathah, "to be like," and primarily signifies "a comparison," or "a similitude," "parable" (Ezek. xxvii, 2; xxiv, 31; whence it easily passed to those pithy, sententious maxims so often in the East appearing in the form of a terse comparison, of which many are to be found in the book before us—e.g. xxvi, 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 14, 17—and then to "proverbs" in general, whether containing a similitude or not (1 Sam. x, 12; xxiv, 18 [14]; Ecclus. xii, 9). Its scope was still further enlarged by its application to longer compositions of a poetical and figurative character—e.g. that of Ballam (Numm. xxxii, 7, 18, etc., and Job xxvii, 1; comp. Ps. xliii, 5; lxvi., ii, 2), and the occasional taunting songs of the soldiers against their fallen enemies—e.g. against the king of Babylon (Isa, iv, 4), the Chaldeans (Hab. ii, 6; comp. also Mic. ii, 4; Deut. xxvii, 97; 1 Kings ix, 7). See Proverbs.

But the book of Proverbs, according to the introductory verses which describe its character, contains, besides several varieties of the maskulit, sententious sayings of other kinds, mentioned in i, 6. The first of these is the שֵּׂפֶת, chiddah, rendered in the A. V. "dark saying," "dark speech," "hard question," "riddle, and once (Hab. ii, 6) "proverb." It is applied to Samson's riddle (Judg. xiv), to the hard questions with which the queen of Sheba tried Solomon (1 Kings x, 6; Comp. Job, i, 1), and is used almost synonymously with maskulit in Ezek. xvii, 2, and in Ps. xliii, 4 (5); xxxivii, 2, in which last passages the poetical character of both is indicated. The word appears to denote a knotty, intricate saying, the solution of which demands much thought and skill: that it was obscure is evident from Num. xii, 8. In addition to the chiddah was the addressing, melethah (Prov. i, 6, A. V. "the interpretation," marg., "an eloquent speech,"") which occurs in Hab. ii, 6 in connection both with chiddah and maskulit. It has been variously explained as a mocking, taunting speech (Ewald); or a speech dark and involved, such as needed a melitah, or interpreter (comp. Gen. xlii, 28; 2 Chron. 29, 2; 2Chron...

xxiii, 31; Job xxxvii, 28; Isa. xxxii, 27); or again, as by Delitzsch (Der Prophet Habašuk, p. 59), a brilliant or splendid saying ("Glowes- oder Wohlkreden, orato splen-didum, elegans, luminosus ornatu.") This last interpretation is not altogether free from the use of the aorist in modern Hebrew, but it certainly does not appear appropriate to the Proverbs; and the first explanation, which Ewald adopts, is as little to the point. It is better to understand it as a dark, enigmatical saying, which, like the moral, might assume the characters of sarcasm and irony, though not essential to it. See "PAREMAE."

As might be expected from the nature of the work contemplated, the proverbs before us almost exclusively bear reference to the affairs of this life; but while a future existence is not formally brought to view, yet the consciousness of such an existence runs throughout, and forms the basis on which many of the strongest, most decisive, and oft-repeated declarations are made. For example, ch. xi, 7 has no meaning except on the supposition that the writer believed in a future life, where, if not here, the hope and expectation of good men should be realized. If death were, in his judgment, annihilation, it would be equally the overthrow of the expectation of the righteous as of the wicked. See also,
as affording similar indication, ch. xiv, 32; xxiii, 17; xliii, 21. See "IMMORTALITY."

II. Canonization.-The canonical authority of the book of Proverbs has never been called in question, except among the Jews themselves. We learn from the Talmud (Shabbath, fol. 90 b) that the school of Shammai, thus early adopting the principle of the free handling of Scripture, was led by some apparent contradictions in the book (e.g. Prov. xxvi, 4, 6) to question its inspiration, and to propose to cast it out of the canon.
It is indeed certain, if we credit the Jewish tradition, that it did not at once take its place on a level with the other canonical Scriptures, but, like the Antilegomena of the New Testament, remained for a time in suspense. According to Wolf (Bibl. Hebr. i, 119) and Zunz (Gott.
Vorträge, p. 14), it was not till the period of the Persian rule that "the men of the great synagogue" admitted it to an equal rank with the other Hagiographa. In the remarkable passage of the Talmud, however, which contains the most ancient opinion of the Jews on the formation of the Old-Test. canon (Baba Batra, p. 14, apud Westcott, "Bible in the Church," p. 36), its recognition is fixed earlier: the Proverbs ("Meshebaim") being included in the "mother" ("Shir Hashirim"), and Eccelesiastes ("Koheleth") in the "father." The latter, however, the inscription, and to propose to cast it out of the canon.

I. History of the Text.—The variations from the existing Masoretic text of the book of Proverbs presented by the versions of the Sept., the Peshito-Syriac, the Targum, and to some extent by the Vulgate, bear witness to the former existence of copies differing in many and not unimportant points from that which has become the authoritative text. The text, as preserved in these ancient versions, differs from that of our Hebrew Bibles both in excess and defect. They contain clauses, verses, and sometimes paragraphs not to be found in our extant copies, for the existence of which it is difficult to account, unless they formed part of the book which was before the translators; while other portions are wanting, for the absence of which no sufficient account can be given, except that they were not read in the ancient Hebrew MSS. they employed. The very large number of minor discrepancies, both in language and arrangement, by which we meet with in the versions form this view, and it well deserves consideration what quotations; in the others there is a more or less direct allusion. See "WISDOM PHYSICIZED."

III. Divisions.—The thirty-one chapters of the book of Proverbs may be roughly divided into four sections:
1. The Proverbs of Solomon (i-ix); 2. The first collection of "the Proverbs of Solomon," properly so called, with its appendices (x-xxiv); 3. The second collection, compiled by Hezekiah's scribes (xxxv-xxxvii); 4. An appendix by different writers.
PROVERBS 701 PROVERBS

Influence those variations, which every student knows are not confined to this book, should have on the ordinarily received hypothesis of the integrity and purity of the present Hebrew text. This, however, is not the place for the prosecution of this investigation. We shall content ourselves with pointing out the principal points of the discussion.

1. To commence with the Sept., the earliest of the existing versions. The translation of this book, like that of Job, proves a more competent acquaintance with the Greek language and literature than is usual with the Alexandrian translators. The interpretation is more formal than literal, giving what the writer conceived to be the general spirit of the passage without strict adherence to the actual words. Bertheau remarks that the version of this book appears to have been undertaken rather with a literary than a religious object, as it was not read in the synagogues or required for their internal regulation. It is to this freedom of rendering that not a few of the apparent discrepancies are due, while there are others which are attributable to carelessness, misconception of the writer's meaning, or even possibly to a difference in the text itself. In some instances it has been thought necessary to condense or abbreviate the original, and to add some words that are not in the Hebrew. The result is that the Sept. represents a middle ground between the Greek of the LXX and the Hebrew, and therefore deserves consideration for the history of the text.

In the first division (i-ix) these variations are less considerable than in the second. Two verses appended to ch. iv remove the abruptness of the close and complete the sense. To the simile of the ant (vi, 8), that of the bee is added. The insertion after viii, 21 seems out of place, and disturbs the continuity. In ch. ix there are two considerable additions to the description of the wise and foolish women, which seem to complete the sense in a very desirable manner. The variations are much more considerable in the section x-xvii. A large number of verses are wanting (xi, 4; xii, 6; xvi, 1-4; xvi, 23; xiv, 1-3; xiv, 14-19; xvi, 5; xvi, 6; xvi, 11; xxv; xxv, 23—which comes in very awkwardly in the Hebrew text; xxv, 8); the arrangement of others is dislocated—e.g. ch. xv closes with ver. 29, ver. 30, 32, 33 standing at the beginning of ch. xvi, while a verse very similar to ver. 31 is found after xvi, 17; xix, 8 stands as the last verse of ch. xviii; in ch. xx. ver. 22 comes between ver. 19 and 20. The most extraordinary dislocation, hardly to be ascribed to anything but an error in the translation, is that of xv, 16. After xv, 16 is introduced xvi, 27, to which succeed four district descriptive of the wrath of a king and urging attention to the writer's words, not found in the Hebrew. We then find xxi-xxxi, 9 (i.e. the prophecy of Agur and of Lemuel), with the remainder of ch. xxiv, fused in between ver. 14, 15 of ch. xxx. The remainder of ch. xxxi, the ascription to a virtuous woman, stands in its right place at the end of the book. The additions in this section are also numerous and important. We find proverbs intercalated between the following verses: x, 5, x, vi, 11; xiii, 4, 5; xiv, 12; xiv, 13, 14; xvi, 1-4; xvi, 5, 6; xvi, 11, 12; xvi, 13, 14; xvii, 16, 17; xvii, 20; xvii, 21, 22; xviii, 5, 8, xii, 1, 2, 9 (found with slight variations in 2 Cor. i, 7); xii, 9, 10; xii, 14. In the dislocated ch. xxvi five or perhaps six new proverbs appear. Intercalated proverbs are also found in the section xxv-xxix—e.g. xvi, 10, 11; xxvi, 11, 12 (found also in Eccles. iv, 21); xxvii, 20, 21; xxvii, 21; xxviii, 25, 26. Besides these, a careful scrutiny will discover a large number of interpolations throughout, many of which are only explanatory clauses.

To specify the words and clauses which vary from the Hebrew would carry us far beyond our limits. For these and the comparison of the two versions generally, the student may be referred to Jeger, Observ. in Prov. Salom. vera. Alex., and Schlesser, Opusc. Critic. In many of these cases the Sept. has probably preserved the true reading (e.g. x, 10, b), but, on the whole, Ewald and Bertheau agree that the Masoretic text is the better and purer.

2. The Peshito-Syriac version, like the Sept., while it is agreed with the Hebrew text generally, presents remarkable deviations in words and clauses, and contains whole verses of which there is no trace in the Hebrew. Some of the variations only prove a different interpretation of the text, but others are plainly referable to a difference in the text itself—e.g. xiv, 5, 14; xv, 4, 15; xvi, 20; xxii, 16; xxiv, 21, etc.), and thus confirm the view that at the time the version was executed—i.e. anterior to the 4th century—the present Hebrew text was not universally recognised.

3. The Vulgate translation of Proverbs, hastily executed by Jerome in three days (together with Ecclesiastes and Canticles), offers largely the same phenomena as the Sept. version. Many of the additions of the Sept. are to be found in it—e.g. g. x, 4; xii, 11, 13; xv, 5, 27 (comp. xvi, 6); xvi, 5, etc.; and in one or two places Jerome has translated words which are, in the Masoretic text, xvi, 1, 20, etc.). Its similarity to the Peshito is too remarkable to be accidental (i, 2, 8, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 13; ii, 9, 10, 18-15; iii, 2-9, etc.), and is probably to be accounted for by the suppression of a subsequent recension of the text, which is very corrupt, based upon that version. See Wolf, Biblioth. Hebr. i, 1176; Dathe, De Rat. Consens. vera. Chald. et Sph. Prov. Salom.; Zunz, Gotth. Akadem. Vorträge.

V. Form and Style. 1. The difference of style and structure between the first and second divisions is apparent on the most cursory perusal. Instead of the detached gnomes of the latter, we find a succession of homiletic addresses, varying in length and differing in subject, though for the most part on the same plan and treated with the same spirit. After viii, 10, the whole does not so much define wisdom as enlarge upon the blessings to be derived from its possession, and the lasting misery which is the consequence of the violation of its precepts, and in the most powerful and moving language urges the young to the earnest pursuit of it as the best of all good things. Whether originally written as a proem or introduction or not, it is certainly well fitted to occupy its present place, and prepare the mind of the reader for the careful consideration of the moral and practical precepts which follow. The style is of a much higher and more significant character than in the succeeding portions, the language is more rhythmic; it abounds in bold personifications and vivid imagery. The concluding chapters (viii, ix) are cast in the grandest mould of poetry, and are surpassed in true sublimity by few portions of Holy Scripture. At the same time, when this portion is viewed as a whole, the poet's poetical skill is discoverable. The style is sometimes diffuse and the repetitions wearisome. The writer returns continually on his steps, treating of the same topic again and again, without any apparent plan or regular development of the subject.

As regards the form, we find but little regularity of structure. The paragraphs consist sometimes of no more than two or three verses (i, 8-9; iii, 11-12; vi, 1-5, 6-11, 12-15, 16-19); sometimes the same thought is carried through a long succession of verses, or even an entire chapter (ii, 1-22; v, 1-20; vi, 20-85; vii, viii, ix). A very favorite arrangement is a paragraph of ten verses (i, 10-19; ii, 1-10; 11-20; iv, 10-19; viii, 12-21; 22-31), a form which, if we may trust the Sept. version, existed also in the copies employed by them in iv, 20-27; v, 6-11; and, according to the Feshito-Syr., in iv, 8-9, a circumstantial expression like a daggers for times maintained, but frequently neglected. The parallels are usually synonymous (e.g., 8, 9, 11, 12, etc.). The antithetical parallels found in iii, 32-35 belong to a series of gnomes which disturb the harmony of the passage, and appear to belong in their appropriate place. It may be remarked that the name "Elohim" occurs only six times in the whole book, and twice in this section (ii, 5-17; iii, 4). The other places are, xxv, 2; xxx, 5-9. Other unusual words are דְּנָרִים, "wisdoms," for wisdom in the abstract (i, 20; ix, 1; found also in xxiv, 7); יִזְרִי, "the strange woman," which occurs repeatedly (e.g., ii, 16: v, 3, 20, etc., found nowhere else save in xxii, 14; xxiii, 23); and הַיְּלִים, "the stranger" (ii, 16; vii, 5, etc.; found also in xx, 16; xxii, 27; xxvii, 18); or in the pagan prostitute, then a term now lurking at the dark corners of the streets, taken as the representative of the harlot sense seducing the young and inexperienced from true wisdom. Ewald also notices the unusual construction of וְנַעֲשֵׂה, a dual fem. with a verb in the masc. plur. (v, 2); while in the next verse it has properly a fem. plur., and the usual plur. וְנָעֲשֵׂה (viii, 4).

2. In the second division, "the Proverbs of Solomon," which form the kernel of the book, (x-xii, 17), we find a striking similarity of structure throughout. Every verse (reckoned by Delitzsch at 373) in its normal form consists of two members, each containing three, four, or more rarely five short words. (The one exception to this rule [xix, 7] is probably due to the loss of a member, which is supplied by the Sept.) Every verse is independent, with no necessary connection with those that precede or follow, and, generally speaking, no attempt at arrangement. Ewald's theory of a continuous thread of connection running through this collection in its original form, and binding together the scattered sayings, has absolutely no evidence in its favor, and can only be sustained by supposing an almost total dismemberment of this portion of the book. It is true, as Ewald says, that the proverbial form recurs in two or three successive verses (e.g., x, 2-5; 18-21; xi, 4-8; 24-26), but these are the exceptions, and only occur, as Ewald elsewhere allows, when, from the studied brevity of the proverbial form, a thought cannot be expressed in a single sentence. The cases in which the same characteristic word or words recur in successive proverbs are more frequent (e.g., x, 7; 8; 10; xi, 5, 6; 10, 11, etc.). But in every instance each verse gives a single definite idea, nor do we ever meet with two verses so connected that the latter contains the reason of the counsel, or the application of the illustration given in the former.

Nearly the whole of the proverbs in the earlier part of this division are antithetical; but after the middle of ch. xv this characteristic gradually disappears, and is almost entirely lost in the concluding chapters. A large number are synonymous (e.g., xi, 7, 25, 30; xii, 14, 28; xiv, 13, 17, 19, etc., some aphoristic (e.g., xi, 31; xiii, 14), especially with the comparative and יִבְּלָל (e.g., xii, 9; xv, 16, 17; xvi, 8, 9, etc., or יִבְּלָל, "much more" (e.g., xii, 31; xv, 11; xviii, 7). Others are synthetic (x, 18; x, 29; xiv, 17, etc.); only two are parabolic (x, 26; xi, 29, 29). The style is lower and more prosaic than in the former section. Ewald regards it as an example of the most ancient and simplest poetical style, full of primitive terseness, and bearing the visible stamp of antiquity in its language and imagery without any trace of later coloring. He remarks very justly that the proverbs in this collection are not to be looked upon as a collection of popular sayings, embodying mere prudential wisdom, but that they belong to the higher life, and are as broad in their grasp of truth as in their range of thought. The germ of many of them may have been found in popular sayings: but the skill and delicacy with which they have been shaped is in the highest degree wonderful, though of the simplest kind, display the hand of a master.

Ewald remarks the following peculiar phrases as occurring in this section. "Fountain of life," x, 11; xii, 14; xiv, 27; xvi, 29 (comp. Psalms xxxxi, 9 [10]): "tree of life," i, 18; x, 20; xiii, 12; xvii, 2, 4: "sorrows of death," xiii, 14; xiv, 27 (comp. Psalms xxxii, 5 [6]): and the following favorite words—בַּעֲלָה, "healing," in various similes and applications, xiii, 18; xiii, 17; xvi, 24 (but this also occurs in the former section, iv, 22; vi, 15) יִכְרֹשׁ, "destruction," x, 14, 15, 29; xiii, 3; xiv, 28; xviii, 7; xiii, 15; and only in four other places in the whole Bible: יַעֲבֵר, from the root יָבִא, "to blow," xii, 17; xiv, 5, 20; xiii, 5-9 (comp. vi, 19; Psalms xii, 6; xxvii, 11): the unfrequent roots צִכְבַּר, "perverseness," xi, 8; xv, 4; and the verb צַכְבַּה, "to pervert," "to destroy," xiii, 6; xii, 5; xii, 12; xii, 12: the phrase הַיּוֹם הַגֹּאֵל, "the day of retribution," xii, 4; xiii, 5 (comp. xxvi, 20; vii, 29: נָעֲשֵׂה, "we shall render", xi, 19, 21; xii, 21; xxv, 9; x, 7 (comp. xxviii, 19), and nowhere else. Ewald instances also as archaic phrases not met with elsewhere, יִכְרֹשׁ, "but for a moment," xiii, 19: יִכְרֹשׂ, "hand join in hand," xi, 21; xv, 5: יִכְרֹשׂ, "meddled with," xii, 14; xviii, 1; xx, 3: יִכְרֹשׂ, "whisperer," xii, 28; xviii, 8 (comp. xxvii, 20-22). The word יִכְרֹשׁ, "there is," though frequent elsewhere, scarcely occurs in Proverbs, save in this section, xi, 24; xii, 18; xiii, 7; xiv, 12, etc.

8. With xii, 17, "the words of the wise" (comp. i, 5), we are carried back to the style and language of the proem (ch. i-i), of which we are also reminded by the continued address in the second person singular, and the use of "my son." There is, however, a difference in the phrasingology and language; and, as Maurer remarks, the distinction is not unfelt in the rugged and awkward, and somewhat labored. Parallelism is neglected. The moral precepts are longer than those of ch. x-xii, but not so diffuse as those of the first section. We find examples of the diisich, xxii, 28; xxvii, 8; xxviii, 7-10: the tristich, xxi, 29; xxiv, 29: but the most frequent is the favorite form being that in which the second member gives the grounds of the first, xxi, 22, 23; 24, 25; 26, 27, etc., etc. We also find proverbs of five members, xxiii, 4, 5; xxiv, 3, 4: several of six, xiii, 1-3, 12-14, 19-21; xxiv, 11, 12: and one of seven, xxvii, 6-8. We have a longer strain, xxiii, 28-35, against drunkenness.

4. The short appendix, xxiv, 28-34, comprising more "words of the wise," can hardly be distinguished in style or form from the preceding. It closes with a "proverb" in the form of the proverbs on the evils of sloth.

5. The second collection of "the Proverbs of Solomon" (ch. xxv-xxvii), transcribed (יִכְרֹשׁ, Sept. יֵכְרֹשׁ, Aq. μεταφΘαρμός; Gr. Μεταφάρμασθαι; comp. Pusey, Daniel, p. 882 note) by the scribes of Hebrewia, closely resembles the former one. They are, according to Pusey, "identical in language." It has, however, some very decided points of difference. The "parable" proverb is much more frequent than the "antithetical," the two members of the comparison being sometimes set side by side without any connecting link (e.g., xxv, 12, 18), which is in other cases given merely by "and," or "or," "so" (xxvi, 1, 2, 18-19; xxvii, 8, etc.). The parallelism is sometimes strict, sometimes lax and free. There is a want of the sententious brev-it of the former collection, and the construction is looser and weaker. The proverbs are not always completed in a single verse (xxv, 6, 7; 9, 10; 21, 22; xxvi, 18, 19); and more frequently than in the former section we have series of proverbs with an internal connection of subject (xxvi, 23-25; xxvii, 15, 16, 23-27), and others in which the key-word recurs (xxvi, 5-12; 13-16). This is not found so often after xxvii, 8; but a close examination of the text suggests the idea that this may be due to a disturbance of the original order (comp. xxvii, 7, 9; xxviii, 4, 7, 9; xxix, 8, 10, etc.).

Ewald discovers a want of the figurative expression of the earlier collection, and a difference of language and phraseology, while Rosenmüller remarks that the meaning of the proverbs is more obscure and enigmatical. The greater part of them are moral precepts. "The earlier collection may be called 'a book for youth' that height and dignity wanting the use of the term καλοί (comp. Isa. xiii, 1; Hab. i, 1, etc.) applied to them. In the words of king Lemuel we find much greater regularity. The parallelism is synonymous, and is maintained throughout. The alphabetical ode in praise of a virtuous woman—a golden A B C for women (Döderlein)—has all its verses of about the same compass. The parallelism is very similar to that of the Psalms, especially those in which the same alphabetical arrangement is found.

VI. Authorship and Date. On these points the most various opinions have been entertained, from that of the rabbins and the earlier school of commentators, with whom some modern writers (e.g. Keil) agree, who attribute the whole book to Solomon (even ch. xxx, xxxi) to the authorship, to the work of his hand (Deut. xxxii, 12); to others, to the authorship of Agur, to whom the teacher replies. The difference between the enigmatical sayings of Agur (which find a counterpart in the collections of Oriental proverbs) and the simple admonitions of Lemuel's mother is very great if we assign them to one author. In ch. xxx we have, in Ewald's words, instead of moral aphorisms, a succession of elegant little pictures illustrative of moral truths, evidencing a decay of creative power, the skill of the author being applied to a novel and striking presentation of an old truth. The ancient terse proverbial form is entirely lost sight of, and the style is bright and dignity wanting the use of the vocabulary of wisdom (comp. Isa. xiii, 1; Hab. i, 1, etc.) applied to them. In the words of king Lemuel we find much greater regularity. The parallelism is synonymous, and is maintained throughout. The alphabetical ode in praise of a virtuous woman—a golden A B C for women (Döderlein)—has all its verses of about the same compass. The parallelism is very similar to that of the Psalms, especially those in which the same alphabetical arrangement is found. From the earliest times as to give any sufficient grounds for questioning the accuracy of the superscription (xxv, 1). The title itself informs us that the compilation was not made till four centuries after Solomon, and the differences are not greater than might be looked for in sayings that had been so long floating about among the common people, and thereby subjected to disfiguration and change. The indications of an altered state of society and a decrease of confidence in the rulers, in which Ewald discovers such unmistakable proofs of a later date, are hardly adequate to throw much light on to himself. We know too little of the internal economy of Solomon's reign to enable us to pronounce authoritatively that such and such expressions are inconsistent with the state of the people and tone of thought at that period.

The objection brought by Eichhorn and others against assigning the proverbs in the two collections to Solomon, that the genius of no one man, not even one as divinely gifted with wisdom as Solomon, is sufficient for the production of so large a number, is perforce in the extreme. Those who concede to any thousand ascribed to him (1 Kings iv, 32), and scarcely give twenty for each of the forty years of his reign. The general didactic tone of the book is asserted to be more consistent with the character of a prophet or priest than that of a king (Davidson). To this it is replied that this is true of kings in general, but not of such a king as Solomon, to whom God gave a wise and understanding heart, whose proverbs are eminently didactic, and who has in 1 Kings viii discussed on the divine economy towards man in a way that no prophet or prophetess has surpassed. The grace of monogamy, and the strict injunctions against adultery, are urged by Berthold as reasons why Solomon, a polygamist himself, and Bathsheba's son, could not be the author of this section. It is, however, a remarkable feature of the Old Testament, in general, and not peculiar to this place, that polygamy, however generally practiced, is never praised; that invariably where the married state is spoken of in terms of praise it is the union of one man to one woman that is held up to honor. Besides, the force of this objection is considerably modified by the reflection that precepts are here given for the mass of men, with whom monogamy is the general rule, though polygamy may be common among the richer classes (Wilkinson's Egypt, ii, 62); and also that the contrast here drawn (Prov. v, 16, etc.) is not between monogamy and polygamy, but between the marriage tie and adulterous connection. As to the supposition that the repeated warnings against adultery could not come from one whose own mother fell into that sin, no great weight can be attached to it; for a moral and religious teacher must be prepared to consider the sin which would influence other men. The allusions to deeds of violence (i, 11-12; ii, 12, etc.) are supposed by Ewald to indicate a state of confusion inconsistent with that state of peace and social security which marked the reign of Solomon (1 Kings iv, 20). To this it is replied that a condition of great private wealth, such as was the condition of Solomon's times, always tempts needy and unprincipled men to acts of unlawful violence; and that nothing beyond crimes which are committed in the most civilized and best-regulated countries are referred to in the passages. Besides, Judaism is always afforded in its caverns and wildernesses peculiar facilities for robbers (Judg. vi, 2; 1 Sam. xxiv, 1). From a supposed degeneracy of style, Ewald attributes this section to the earlier part of the 7th century B.C. But other critics do not see this. Davidson thinks it indicates a flourishing state of Hebrew literature, and refers it probably to the 9th century B.C., an opinion in which he coincides with Hitzig. The grounds on which Ewald relies for his alleged degeneracy of style seem weak. Thus, he asserts that the plural ishah (Prov. viii, 4) is so rare as to indicate a very extraordinary, and certainly very unusual, for it occurs only three times (First). From these, however, we cannot argue as to the date, as the one is in Isaiah, another in Psa. cxli, 8, attributed to David, and the third in the passage above referred to. Similar and equally futile objections have been based, by Berthold and others, on the familiarity displayed in the proverbs with circumstances and conditions in life with which it is supposed that Solomon as a king could have had no experimental acquaintance. For example, it is maintained that Prov. xvi, 8-11, 14, 20, 21, 24, 25, 28, 29, 30, 31; xv, 8-11; xxii, 11, 12, 13, etc., must have been written by a landowner or husbandman; x, 15, by a poor man; xi, 14; xiv, 19, by a citizen of a well-ordered state; xi, 26, by a trader; xii, 3, 4, by one who was not a polygamist; xiv, 1-4, 25; xvi, 11; xvi, 2, 4, 12, 16, 31; xix, 18, 14; xx, 10, 14, 18, 20, by an ordinary citizen; xxv, 2, 7, 9, by a king, but by one who had lived some time at a court; xxvii, 11, by a teacher of youth; xii, 23-27, by a scribe who lived a nomadic life; xxviii, 16, by one free from those errors which weakened Solomon's throne, and robbed his son of his kingdom. With such points as these, the weakness of these fancied arguments which would affect no one who had not a theory of his own to support. They are akin to those which have been used with as little success to prove that no one man could have written the plays of Shakespeare, and they display the most marvellous ignorance of that many-sidedness and keenness of perception and insight which are characteristic of the highly gifted among mankind.

As little weight is to be assigned to the objections drawn from the repetitions. It is true that we find the same idea, and even the same words, recurring not only in the ten collections, but also in the twenty-four (xv, 8; xvii, 22; xxiii, 3, xxvii, 12; xlii, 18, xlv, 13; xix; 24, xlv, 15; xix, 1, xxviii, 6), but in the same collection (e.g. xiv, 12, xvi, 25; x, 1, xv, 20; xvi, 1, xx, 2; x, 2; x, 3; xii, 14, xiv, 27; xxvi, 12, xxix, 20). This latter is, however, more an Umbricht remark, than is natural in such a compilation, in the formation of which one is very apt to forget what had already been set down; while the former class of repetitions is easily to be accounted for by the anxiety of the collectors to lose nothing which had the stamp of Solomon's authorship, even though the same idea had already been expressed in the earlier collection; and it goes far to confirm the view that Solomon was the composer of the whole.

The internal evidence—derived from language, construction, ideas, historic background, and the like—varies with every successive critic, and is entirely inadequate to warrant any decisive verdict. Its precariousness is proved by the opposite results to which the same data lead various commentators. Kilgoby maintains that every part of the book, with the exception of the last two collections, speaks the corresponding to ch. i-xxix; while Ewald, Hitzig, and Bertheau, and other minor critics, arrive at conclusions expressed with equal confidence and at variance with these and with one another. There is, however, one evidence which speaks strongly in favor of an early date—the entire absence of all reference to idolatry. The form of religion appearing throughout is purely Jewishistic (as we have elsewhere said occurs only four times in the body of the work), and false gods and foreign faiths are not even referred to.

The above remarks refer chiefly to the collection of proverbs properly so called, which we have no difficulty in ascribing, on the whole, to Solomon as their ultimate author. We may, if we choose, suppose that the men of Hesekiah made a collection of unwritten proverbs current among the people, and by them supposed, truly or not, to have come down from Solomon; but the men of Hesekiah, or whoever wrote the superposition of the last two collections, must have been content with the words written, or the material from written records. Assuming this to be the correct view, the difference between these proverbs and those which went before is, that whereas in Solomon's time the latter were arranged as we have them, the former were in Hesekiah's time selected from more ancient written records and added to the existing collection. It gives us the idea, which is itself an extremely probable one, that voluminous records were made in Solomon's time of the wise king's sayings, either by himself or by scribes. This idea derives considerable confirmation from the notice in 1 Kings iv, 20-24, of 1 Kings ix, 20-24, that the king of Israel, and under his inspection, the choice would naturally fall upon him. The weakness of this might be made by their actual author, these would tend to bring them into a still more finished form. Accordingly, we find in the more ancient collection a certain tastefulness and polish which the others do not possess. In the former each verse contains its own perfect sense, and this usually comprised in a certain number of words, varying from seven to nine, beyond which they very rarely extend. In the latter, while the sense is generally contained in one verse, it not infrequently runs through the bulk of the chapter. Expansion from them might easily be produced as concise and perfect in form as the others (e.g. xxv, 3, 14); but very commonly the sense is brought out in a much more diffuse manner (e.g. xxv, 6, 7, 10, 21, 22; xxvi, 18, 20; xxvii, 15, 16, 25). In the former case one also has occasion sometimes a far greater number of words than are ever admitted into those of the older collection (e.g. xxv, 7, 29); and the parallelism, which never fails in the verses of the earlier, is often wanting in those of the later division (xxv, 5, 21, 22; xxvi, 10; xxvii, 1). This agrees with the idea which we think portrayed by a comparison of xxv, 1 with 1 Kings iv, 32, 38, that the proverbs in this collection are probably much as they fell from Solomon's lips, and were first committed to writing by himself or others under him; and that while the former collection received his own final corrections, the men of Hezekiah simply copied from the text before them, but did not venture upon any alteration in the form.

The case is somewhat different with regard to the introductory chapters (i-ix), and there is more ground for the discussion of opinion as to their date and authorship. It is certainly quite possible that the whole or a considerable portion of this section may have been written by Solomon. The differences of style, of which Ewald makes much, are, as Bertheau has shown, somewhat exaggerated by him, and are in many cases no greater than may be accounted for by the different nature of the compositions. The terse simplicity of a proverb would be out of place in a series of homoratical addresses such as those which characterize this section. Ewald dwells with emphasis on the internal evidence of a later date afforded by the state of society, and the tone of thinking thus portrayed. But we repeat our former remark, that we know too little of the internal history of Judaean times to allow us to speak with so much confidence on these points, and express our conviction that the conclusions drawn by Ewald are not warranted by the premises. The imagery all points to a large and populous city, such as Jerusalem may well have become during the middle of Solomon's prosperous reign; and the vivid representation of the habits of the foreign pleasure-seekers, its freebooters with their streets of jinling, its streets is hardly more than could have been attained by one who, like Hardin Alarisch, was fond of laying aside his kingly state and visiting his city in disguise.

It is evident, from what we have remarked in a former section, that we regard the poem (ch. i-ix) in its present form a composite work, the imitative passages proceeding from one pen. The similarity of style, subject, and treatment, is strongly in favor of unity of authorship, while the internal evidence favors the view that it is compiled of various disconnected members, collected and arranged subsequently to the time of their composition. The date of this compilation it is impossible to fix. The evidence on this point is faint and untrustworthy, and has led different investigators to very opposite conclusions. Ewald places it in the 7th, Hitig in the 5th century B.C., while Keil, as we have seen, assigns it to the time of Solomon. The resemblance that may be traced in this portion of the work to the spirit and teaching of the book of Job, and the recurrence of some of the words and images found there, is employed both by Hitig and Ewald to aid in determining the date of this section (comp. Job xxv, 7 with Prov. viii, 25; Job xxi, 17, Prov. xiii, 9; Job xxviii, 18, Prov. viii, 16; Job v, 17, Prov. iii, 11; see Pusey, Daniel, p. 523, note 7). But as there is no unanimity as to the date of the composition of Job, little help is to be expected from this source, nor can we be surprised at the diversity of opinion among those who have employed it: Ewald maintaining that the writer of Proverbs had read and made use of Job: Hitig, on the contrary, believing that the former is the earlier work, and that the author of Job borrowed from Proverbs. The adoption of such evidences proves most forcibly the complete want of any decisive and true test which will enable us to arrive at any trustworthy conclusion as to the date of this section. In the midst of this uncertainty, the above solution is as probable as any other,—namely, that it is due to Solomon's authorship out of materials existing at his time.

The similarity in style between i-ix and the appendix to the first collection of proverbs (xxii, 17-xxiv) appears to favor the view that this supplement is due to the same person by whom the poem was prefixed to the book. Ewald enumerates several reasons for assigning the whole of it to the same writer (p. 42), all of which decide against the unity of authorship. The proverbs themselves, designated as 'words of the wise,' are evidently distinguished from those of Solomon, and are probably to be regarded as the adages of other sages, which the compiler of the work thought too valuable to be lost, and therefore appended to his larger collection. The short supplement (xxiv, 23-34) is accounted for by Umbreit on the supposition that the compiler had laid aside his work for a time, and took it up again on the discovery of fresh sayings worthy of preservation. He renders דַּפְנֶה, 'for,' not 'of the wise,' and regards them as directed to the compiler's scholars. Ewald, Bertheau, Delitzsch, etc., defend the received translation.

It only remains for us to speak of the threefold supplement (xxx, xxxi), with regard to the authorship and date of which again nothing can be determined. It would be hardly profitable to discuss the marvellous fabric of fanciful history and biography which has been evolved from the scantiest materials by Hitig, Bunsen, and Bertheau. Those who desire it may refer to their works to see the grounds on which 'Massa' (A. V. 'the prophecy') is identified with a district in Arabia (Gen. x, 30; xxxv, 14; 1 Chron. i, 50) of which Lemuel was king, and Agur with a descendant of the Simeonites, who in the reign of Hezekiah drove out the Amalekites from Mount Seir (1 Chron. iv, 42); or, again, on which it is sought to prove that Agur and Lemuel were brothers, sons of the reigning queen of Massa. We would rather commend to our reader Eichhorn's sensible words that 'Agur should remain Agur, and belong to the wise men of the old world of whom history gives us no further information,' and with him deprecate 'spinning a long thread of tedious conjectures about a name, which does not advance us an inch towards a right insight into the literature of the old world, or any profitable learning.' As little to the purpose is the fancy of Dörderlein that the opening part of ch. xxx is a dialogue: that Ithiel is a heathen: Agur a much valued servant of Ithiel, to whom, as his master, his prayer (v, 7-9) is addressed. Many are content with saying that Agur was an unknown Hebrew sage, the teacher of Ithiel and Ucal—names from which, also, many unprofitable speculations have been built—and that he lived subsequently to the reign of Hezekiah. Still more probable do we regard the view which identifies him with Solomon himself under a fanciful name. See Agur; Massa.

Lemuel—'to God,' 'devoted to God,' after the analogy of בַּגַּי, Numb. iii, 24 (Pusey)—may certainly be regarded as a figurative name descriptive of an ideal king, 'a monarch as he should be' (Ewald; Eichhorn; comp. Pusey, Lect. on Daniel, p. xiii, note 1, p. 529, note 6). See Lauxmus.

The alphabetical lay which concludes the whole has usually been thought to belong to the latest period of Hebrew poetry, and hardly to be placed higher than the 7th century. Its style and language seem to distinguish it from the words of Lemuel, with which it has sometimes been confounded, but it is armed against the precariousness of such grounds of argument as to authorship.
The results of our inquiry may be thus summed up. The nucleus of the book is the larger collection of proverbs (Hezxi, 16). These may safely be regarded as really what they profess to be, "the proverbs of Solomon." Whether they were arranged as we now have them and published by him, there is not sufficient evidence to determine. It is probable, however, that the collection was completed either contemporaneously or not long subsequent to him. The greater part of the hortatory introduction (i-x) may also be, with great probability, ascribed originally to Solomon, though we incline to the belief that its present form is due to a later compiler, who collected the admonitions of the wise king, and prefixed them to his name. The earliest part of this book of proverbs also appears to have added the appendix (xxii, 17; xxiv, 22), containing proverbs of which Solomon was not the proper author, but perhaps only the earliest collector, and after this from similar sources were supplied the few supplementary sayings (xxiv, 23-34). The time when this was done cannot be fixed, but there are cogent arguments in favor of a late date. The second collection, as its name declares, was formed by the scribes of Hezekiah, cir. B.C. 725. The last two chapters contain neither of these periods seems due to Solomon, for which nothing certain can now be known. They, too, may have been in some important sense due to Solomon, but were probably inserted by a later editor.

It will not be worth while to enumerate the many and widely varying theories of recent critics as to the date and composition of the different parts of this book, and the time when it assumed its present form. One or two of the most characteristic may be specified. Suffice it to say that Ewald would place the publication of x-xii, 16 about two centuries after Solomon, and i-x in the first half of the 7th century. Not much later the second collection of proverbs (xxv-xxix) was added, the sections xxii, 17-xxiv being due to the same compiler. Hitzig, on the contrary, views i-x as the earliest part of the book; x-xii, 16 and xxvi, 17-xxix being added about B.C. 750. Twenty-five years later Hezekiah’s collection followed; the gaps being filled up and the volume completed by some unknown compiler at a later period. The theory of Delitzsch (Hertzog, Eucalyptos, a. v. Sprichle) is marked by mere calm sense, but even this is not without a little fanciful or conjectural. Strictly regarding x-xii, 16 as the kernel of the book, and mainly composed by Solomon, he divides the whole into two portions (1) i-x, xxiv, 22 put forth in the time of Hezekiah; the introduction (i-x) and appendix (xxv, 16-xxiv, 22) being written by him; and in the latter of whom he regards a highly gifted didactic poet, an instrument of the spirit of revelation,” and (2) xxiv, 23-xxixi, published in the reign of Hezekiah; the introductory and closing portions (xxiv, 23-34, and xxxi, xxxi) being set on either side of the collection of Solomon’s proverbs to serve as a kind of foil. The two periods which are generally selected in opposition to the above views of the Solomonic authorship for the composition of various parts of the book are the reign of Hezekiah and the times subsequent to the captivity. These latter scenes seem to suit the general character of Proverbs at all as well as the reign of Solomon. Hezekiah found his kingdom in great domestic misery—immersed in idolatry and subject to foreign rule. At home his pre-eminent character was that of a social and religious reformer, struggling against the sins and evils of his times; abroad the most active period of his reign was distinguished by a series of wars, during some of which his kingdom was reduced to the verge of ruin, the whole land overrun by hostile armies, its fenced cities taken, and the king forced to submission. The result was an Asian invasion to hang over the land for years. The later period of his reign, indeed, was peaceful; but the evils of preceding reigns were far from being eradicated, and he had before him the certain prospect, conveyed by prophecy, of the utter proscription of his kingdom. His chief works seem to have been the making a pool and conduit to bring water to Jerusalem. On his death Judah relapsed into idolatry. The times subsequent to the captivity were marked by equally strong characteristics, and chiefly of a mournful kind—a feeble, struggling, and too often languid and depressed remnant, striving amid many difficulties to maintain what they could from time to time disencourage. With neither of these periods does the general character of Proverbs agree. Royalty marks it throughout, sharply distinguishing it from any period subsequent to the captivity; as by other marked features it bears the impress of a time different from Hezekiah’s. Its warnings are as if the same as those which grace that period, nor are its consolations suited to the public trials which were threatening to bring both king and kingdom to the ground. It pointed allusions to a powerful monarchy, a numerous and wealthy people, and such sins as readily spring up in a time of plenty; its fine lines of Egypt, its high places thronged, its roads covered with travellers, its gates and cities crowded and rejoining, its precious stones and fine gold and architectural illustrations, its people living beneath the eye of their monarch and subject to his good-will, all seem to mark a reign when an absolute monarch ruled over a great and wealthy people, who lived at ease at home, and had no dreaded enemy on their borders; who traded to distant lands and brought their products into common use; and when the worship of Jehovah prevailed in a spirit of due veneration and love; when wisdom sat on the throne, personified in Solomon, and the evils which must ever exist while man is a fallen being were evils inapprehensible from any condition of humanity, and especially from one abounding with the elements of material prosperity. See Solomon.

VII. Commentaries.—The following are the special exegetical helps on the whole book; a few of the most important of them are designated by an asterisk: Origen, Commentary in (Opp. vol. iii); also Scholias in (Bibl. intervals, the currents of the atmosphere shift to their ever-changing conditions, the endless procession of life keeps pace with the dead-march of decay, and all the varied phenomena of the world disappear. Viewing these wonderful complications in the light of their necessary dependence upon the self-existent, God's handwork is plainly evident in the complexities of their multi-form evolutions, the equipose of their contending forces, and the continuity of adjustment, which proclaim unceasing watchfulness and care.

(3.) From the moral faculties of men. Conscience, which utters its authoritative "ought" or "ought not" concerning suggested actions, must be delusive, if there be no Providence to note its verdict. But if our sense of responsibility be false, and we must hereby disregard the affirmations of our highest faculties concerning ourselves, then is all truth visionary and all knowledge misleading.

Further, we have a faculty the legitimate expression of which is worship; hence all nations have their forms of devotion. But to stand in awe of the Creator's justice, to trust in his goodness, to submit to his will, to pray to him for the supply of our wants, to depend upon his wisdom for direction—all these acts of worship are not only unauthorized but absurd, and our noblest instincts in the colloquy of them, by being superseded and supplied by the Providence by which his responses may be indicated.

(6.) From the system of compensations which prevails, embracing recompense for suffering, compensation for loss, and retribution for wrong. In this system, the compensation includes the natural benefits of discipline, and such compensating provisions of grace as the reason recognizes as matters of fact in present human experience. The compensation comprises the reparative processes by which loss in one direction is made up by increased efficiency in another, as in the added keenness of the sense of hearing and touch attending the loss of sight. The retribution comprehends not only the natural operation of the law, "As a man soweth, so shall he reap," but all those special illustrations of that law in marked and impressive judgments upon wrong-doing which occasionally occur, and which bear such likeness to the sin that men agree to call them retributions. In all these a Providence is implied. The doctrine is further proven—

2. From the Scriptures. (1.) By a class of passages which declare in general his preserving power (Gen. xiii, 2), Job vii, 20; xlix, 12; xxxii, 18; xxxvi, 5; xxxvi, 6; lxix, 9; Isa. xlvi, 8—Matt. x, 29; Luke xii, 6; Acts xvii, 29; Col. i, 17).

(2.) By a class of passages which assert God's control of the regular operations of nature (Exod. ix, 18; xxxii, 13; John vii, 26; Jer. xxvii, 22; xxxvi, 24—27; xxxvi, 29-32; xxxvii, 6-16; xxxviii, 25; Ps. lix, 17; lxix, 9, 10; Prov. xxvii, 24—30; cv. 82; cxxxv, 6-7; cxxxvii, 25; cxiv, 15—16; cxvii, 8-9; cxviii, 8; Isa. xlv, 4; Jer. xxxii, 24—27; xxxii, 25-28; xxxviii, 1-9; xxix, 10; xxxiv, 11-15; Ps. xcv, 1; Zech. xiv, 1; Matt. vi, 26—28; Acts xiv, 17).

(3.) By a class of passages which specifically declare his sovereignty over birth (Gen. xxxviii, 5—8; xviii, 9; Josh. xxiv, 3, 4; 1 Sam. i, 27; Job x, 19; Ps. lxvi, x, xxviii, 15-16; Isa. xi, 3, 9; Jer. viii, 7, 10; 2 Sam. xii, 22; Job vii, 1, 6; xv, 4—9; xxx, 1-7; Ps. xxi, 24; xxxii, 1-12; Eccl. ix, 17; 1 Cor. xii, 34, 35; 1 Cor. xxi, 2).

(4.) By a class which aver his government of chance and accident (Exod. xvi, 3, 5, compared with Deut. xix, 4—5; 1 Kings xxii, 54, 38, compared with xx, 15; Prov. xxxi, 33).

(5.) By a class which proclaim his use of noxious animals for the purposes of his government (Exod. xxxii, 38; Lev. xxvi, 21—22; Deut. vii, 20; Josh. xiv, 12; Job x, 23; Jer. v, 6; Hos. ii, 2; Joel iii, 25; Amos iv, 9; v, 11).

(6.) By a class which affirm his righteous retributions (Lev. x, 3; xxxvi, 14—39; Deut. xxv, 17—19; xxvii, 23—24; 2 Sam. iii, 39; 2 Kings i, 30, 31; xiv, 25—26; 2 Chron. vii, 15—27; Jer. v, 13; x, 14; xxxiv, 11; Psa. xxxv, 6—8; lxv, 6—8; xxxvii, 30—32; xcv, 23; civ, 33—34; Isa. v, 11—16, 22; xxv, 13—14; xiii, 11; xxviii, 15. Comp. xxix, 6; Jer. xxii, 21—22; Ezek. xxi, 21; xxvi, 2—21; xxxv, 1—15. Dan. v, 18, 30; Amos iv, v; Obad. 10—15; Zeph. i, 17; ii, 8—10; Hag. i, 10—11).

(8.) By a class which declare his supreme authority over men (Psa. vii, 8; ix, 8; x, 16, 28; xxxvii, 2—7; 2 Sam. ii, 24, 25; xxvi, 2—3; Isa. i, 10; xxxix, 9—10; Eccl. i, 1; Isa. x, 5; xiv, 26—27; Ezek. xiv, 4; Dan. iv, 36; Rom. vii, 21).

(9.) By a class which affirm his dominion over national prosperity and adversity (Exod. xv, 14; xxiii, 23—30; Deut. vii, 15; 2 Sam. xx, 15; Ezra x, 12; Ps. xxvii, 14; Isa. v, 3—9; xili, 1, 6, 8—9; xiv, 7; Jer. xxvii, 8—12, 18; xlix, 16; Dan. i, 20, 21, 35, 37, 58, 59, v, 21; Amos iii, 6; Obad. 1—4; Hag. ii, 17; Zeph. i, 14—18; ii, 1–15; iii, 14—20; Acts xvii, 26).

(10.) By a class which declare that he sends bad laws and base rulers, as well as good, and sends adversity (Judg. xx, 23; 1 Kings xi, 14, 23; xix, 15; 2 Kings vii, 11; xvii; xxiv, 25; xxiv, 20; 2 Chron. xvi, 5—6; Ps. xxv, 20; Isa. xxi, 17—19; xxxvii, 26, 27; Jer. xxvii, 6, 7; xxviii, 14; xliv, 11, 12; iii, 8; Lam. ii, 7; Ezek. xx, 24—26; Dan. iv, 17; Hos. xiii, 11; Mic. i, 12).

The teaching of the more than five hundred passages cited might be confirmed, were it necessary, by nearly as many thousands more, showing with what emphasis the Scriptures proclaim the doctrine of divine providence.

II. The Doctrine Explained. 1. As Preservation, or that by which all things are kept in being, with their several essences and faculties, and are enabled to act according to their respective natures (Heb. i, 3).

2. As the organic relation of all the several spheres of being and acting, and directing them to the ends which he proposed to himself in their creation. This government is—

(1.) Immediate; as in the direct control of the material universe by those modes of operation called forces of nature, such as gravitation, electricity, etc.

(2. Mediate; as (a) in the vegetable world, by the laws which regulate the germination, growth, and decay of its organizations; (b) in the animal kingdom, by their controlling instincts; (c) in intelligent and moral creatures, by means of motives. This last is evidently the most important, as well as the most incomprehensible field of divine providence.

The motives which a righteous and benevolent Being places before his creatures can be only those which will direct them to secure their happiness and happiness. But, as freedom of the will, in the sense of possible alternative moral action, is one of the endowments of such creatures, as it is well the motives are so constructed as to surpass them in value. Hence it follows that those holy motives may be disregarded. But there must be no abandonment, or punitive and reformatory measures must be instituted that will originate a different class of motives to reinforce those which have proved insufficient. Hence, the system of natural evil is placed over against creature-freedom, both as a check and a corrective, and in itself no arrangement of God's goodness, since it is a necessary means to a higher good. But the very fruit of freedom in the volition in man is the vexed question of the ages; yet, in point of principle, it is settled in the fact of the creation of intelligent beings with a capacity to sin and liability to become sinners. Hence the vindication of the divine character is legitimately the work of Theophysics, while the doctrine of providence need only explain God's conduct.

All moral evil consists in a wrong determination of a free will. God's purpose to preserve his creatures pledges his concurrence in such action of the will only so far as such concurrence may be necessary to enable the will to act according to its freedom. The moral character of the determination is fixed by the creature, and he alone is responsible for it. But when the choice is made, the moral character of the determination is complete; and neither the occurrence nor non-occurrence of a resulting outward action can change, add to, or take from the moral quality of the original volition wherein the sin originated and was completed. As soon, however, as the execution of a determination is attempted, the creature steps outside of his own independent and responsible sphere, and enters the realm of God. From that moment the problem of all events is involved.

The actions of men (in distinction from their determinations), his control of the Church and of nations, special providences, the course of nature, and the works of grace are all included under the general term events, for which God takes the absolute responsibility. Hence it will be seen that the distinction often drawn between the permissive and active providences of God is of no practical value; and if any such distinction be allowed, it must be by confining the word "permissive" strictly to the free volitions of the will, and extending the word "active" to the conscious acts of God, acting of his own will.

In this way alone can the emphatic statements of the Scriptures, as classified above, be explained in harmony with other passages which distinctly deny his complicity with evil, i.e. in the sense of moral wrong. We first bring fully into view the seeming impeachment of his attributes contained in the classes of passages above referred to, which may be epitomized, in principle, as follows: Exod. iv. 21; vii. 13; x. 1, 20; xiv. 7; Deut. ii. 30; xiii. 1-3; Josh. xi. 20; 1 Sam. xvi. 14; xvii. 1-5; 1 Chron. xvii. 22; 22, 27; Ps. Ixxviii. 49; cv. 25; Isa. vi. 9; x. 10; xiv. 14; xvii. 14; Jer. vi. 21; Ezek. iii. 20; iv. 9; Amos iii. 6; Zech. viii. 10; 2 Thess. ii. 11, 12; 1 Pet. ii. 8; Rev. xvii. 13. In striking contrast with these stands the revelation of his character and works in the following: Lev. xi. 46; Deut. xxxiii. 4; 1 Sam. vi. 20; Job viii. 3; xxxiv. 10, 12, 23; xxxvi. 3; Ps. v. 4; xi. 7; xxxiii. 5; lxxxix. 14; xcii. 15; xviii. 2; cxix. 137; Isa. v. 16; Ezek. xviii. 39; Hab. i. 13; Zeph. iii. 5; Rom. ii. 2, 5, 6; James i. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 15, 16; Rev. xvi. 7.

Truth cannot be inharmonious, much less contradictory; therefore, there must be some possible reconciliation of these apparently conflicting statements. We find that reconciliation in the divided sovereignty which allows man to be supreme within the sphere of his volition, and attributes all outside of the mere mental fact of free-will determinations to the will and operation or cooperation of God. Upon any other hypothesis it is not possible to draw the dividing line between divine and human responsibility; and therefore, if this be denied, the idea of the two-in-one doctrine of divine providence must be abandoned.

III. Some Objections Considered.—Objection 1. If providence be the care exercised over his creatures by a God of infinite goodness and purity, he cannot be implicated in the wicked actions of men. Answer. As a matter of fact, he is concerned in them, else they could not exist; for, were he to refuse the concurrence of his upholding power, men would drop into non-existence. Again, the objection is destroyed by considering that actions have no moral character whatever, as between the creature and the Creator, such character being vested entirely in the will, and the will with the results. Therefore, God can use the wicked actions of men as he does any other indifferent thing, provided that his own purpose in using them be right, which no one disputes.

Objection 2. God's majesty is degraded by the assumption contained in the doctrine of providence, viz. that he is interested in all the minutiae of nature. Answer. If he has created faculties or forces, nothing that they can evolve can be unworthy of his care; besides, things which seem to men most insignificant are often causatively linked with stupendous results. Again, the revelations of the microscope prove that the infinitesimal are embraced within the sweep of the same laws that pervade the infinite, and hence are under the same benign care. Further, the impression of the grandeur of the Infinite Intelligence, comprehensive as it may be, from the contemplation of the rolling spheres and interlocking systems of the universe, is, after all, less profound than that which results from tracing his handiwork in the conformation of the beautifully wrought shells of the animals, and their exquisite life-appliances and adjustments, which only the most powerful glasses can reveal to human sight.

Objection 3. The prosperity of the wicked and the affections of the righteous are inconsistent with the supposition of a just and holy providence. Answer. The equal dispensation which the objection assumes to be necessary under the government of God is an impossibility; for the affections and interests of men are so interlinked that exact justice could rarely, if ever, be meted to the transgressor without involving consequences to others which would be undeserved. Again, the prosperity of the wicked, if it should be due to evil courses, is always a curse to them in the end; and God's processes should not be condemned until their final issue is known. On the other hand, the adversities of the righteous have attending or following compensations which satisfy them that all is right; and if those who are chiefly interested are content, the objection of the mere observer should be esteemed of little weight.

Objection 4. It is alleged that the laws of nature sufficiently account for the order and necessity of the world; hence providence is not necessary. Answer. The laws of nature are only the regular order which is found to subsist, termed laws because of the uniformity of the changes which occur, and signify certain results of power, but not power itself—effects, but not their causes. These uniformities are, therefore, only modes in which the self-existent controls the contingent, the manner in which God manipulates his material creation.

IV. History of the Doctrine.—The idea of a superintending or controlling Providence has appeared under various forms, sometimes scarcely recognizable, depending largely upon the culture of the age and the state of philosophical speculation at the time.

1. The primitive view, held during the childhood of superscription, identified the gods with the elements of nature. Thus Zeus, or Dis, originally meant sky, and was worshipped as a god, afterwards known as Jupiter, or Jove, and by the Canaanites and Babylonians called Baal, Bel, or Belus. The earth was also worshipped as Demeter and Cybele, called by the Anglo-Saxons Hertha; the sea as Neptune; the sun as Phoebus, or Apollo; the moon as Selene; and the stars as the Muses. Fire as Agrild and summer heat as Dormer, or Thor, are other instances, in various localities, of the worship paid to the elements or forces of nature as gods, each being accredited a providence of its own. In the childhood of Occidental philosophy also, the Ionian philosophical physicists of Greece, in their search for the principle whose to which he belongs, Schweizer and Dr. Emmons, classifies them practically with the Occasionalists.

6. Leibnitz rejected the concursus and Cartesian views, and proposed a new view of the Providence. He eschewed the "pre-established harmony" somewhat akin in its radical idea to the "Anima Mundi" of Pythagoras, Plato, and the Alexandrian School; the "Archéis" of Cornelius Agrippa, Paracelsus, and Von Helmont; the "principium hylarchicum" of Henry More; the "plastic nature" of God worth, and the "pre-established harmony" lately advocated by Dr. Laycock and Mr. Murphy. This theory holds that there are two worlds, matter and mind, each incapable of acting upon the other, yet both so adjusted to each other by a divinely pre-ar ranged harmony that volition and muscular contraction are contemporaneous. The volition would exist just the same without the contraction, and the muscular movement would take place just the same without the volition, each being moved by a force within, but the prearranged harmony secures that they shall seemingly stand related as cause and effect. God is a being of infinite perfections, and the imperfections of creation are accounted for by the nature of the monads of which souls and bodies are composed.

7. Durandus, in the 14th century, proposed the mechanical view of the universe. He held that the activity of God's creatures in the use of powers given to them at their creation—like a wound-up clock which goes of itself. It has been advocated by Scotus, Richard Baxter, and others. Closely akin to this is the theory of such writers as Prof. Tyndall, Dr. H. Bence Jones, and Dr. Bastian, connecting "molecular attractions and repulsions communicated to matter at the creation." Its extreme pantheistic development is found in the "self evolving powers of nature" of Owen, Huxley, and Baden Powell.

8. Another view represents God as an all-perfect being, the upholder of all things, but denies his interference with the laws of nature in miracles, and maintains that his only interposition is by using natural causes to effect his purposes. Thus providence is law, and no interpositions are possible unless provided for in the nature of the uniformities. Thus Hippocrates, the contemporary of Socrates, regarded all phenomena as both divine and scientifically determinable. Anaxagoras, in his "Arranging Intelligence," held substantially to this view. Duncanson (Providence of God) is a strong modern disciple of this theory.

9. The Mind-efficiency Theory denies that there are any physical forces apart from mind, either divine or created. The only efficiency in the material universe is the ever-operating will of God. Dr. Samuel Clarke, Dr. Le Bœuf, Samuel Secker, Arnaud, Remonstrants, Harris, Young, Whedon, Channing, Martineau, Hedge, Whewell, Bascom, Prof. Tulloch, Sir John Herschel, the duke of Argyll, Mr. Wallace, Proctor, Crockett, and many among the ablest recent writers have defended this view.

10. The true doctrine represents God as a being of infinite perfections, upholding all things by a direct exercise of his potency; the uniformities of nature as his ordinary method of working; its irregularities his method upon occasional conditions; its interferences, his method under the pressure of a higher law, which is the necessary manifestation of his own nature. It thus adopts the Judaic view of God's perfections, and the complete subervience of nature to his will: admits the general concursus, especially as it relates to the freedom of the finite will, accepts the Law theory in its application to miracles, and sustains the Mind-efficiency theory, with the distinct disclaimer of pantheistic leanings in the admission of the separate existence of material substance.

IV. Upon Particular Providences.—Providence has been defined as the wisdom and power which God continually exercises in the preservation and government of the world for the ends which he proposes to accomplish. Special providence consists in such particular exhibitions of his wisdom and power in emergencies as are calculated to awaken the conviction of his interest in and guardianship over his creatures.

1. PROVIDENCE.—29. It exists for his interpositions. Abraham, after Mount Moriah; the three Hebrews, after the fiery furnace; Daniel, after the lions' den; Eliajah, after Cherie's cave, never failed to look for other deliverances in the time of need.

2. It gives the assurance that all is right in our present circumstances, in view of the discipline needed; and the final adjustment of rewards and penalties.

3. It leads to cheerful trust in all trials, and thus sweetens the bitter draughts of life.

4. It inspires with hope in emergencies, and thus enables the believer to meet unforeseen exigencies with all his resources of mind and faith at hand, confident, buoyant, and if possible conquering.

5. It imparts a patience that outlasts adversities, a fortitude that yields to no disaster, and a confidence that emerges unfathered from all furnaces of trials—

Providence, Nuns of, a community of young women at Paris, established about the year 1647 by Madame Palisson for the reception of poor virgins who might otherwise be exposed, through poverty, to the temptations of the world. This pious lady, having formed the design, was discouraged from prosecuting it by several persons, who represented to her that she had not a fund sufficient to carry it on; to whom she replied that Providence should be her fund; and accordingly, having succeeded in her undertaking, she gave to her community the name of The Nuns of Providence.

Providence, properly an outlying portion of an extended empire as the Persian of old; but intended here to do more than indicate the points of contact which this word presents with Biblical history and literature.

1. (.buf, medijah; Sept. χωπά; Vulg. provinciaria.) In the Old Test. this term first appears in connection with the wars between Ahab and Ben-hadad (I Kings xv, 14, 15, 19); and between the king of the former and the king of the latter: "by the young men of the princes of the provinces," i.e. probably of the chief tribes of the Gilead country, recognising the supremacy of Ahab, and having a common interest with the Israelites in resisting the commands of the king. 30. Now the inhabitants of Samaria were specially distinguished in verse 13 from "the children of Israel." Not the hosts of Ahab, but the youngest warriors ("armor-bearers," Keil, ad loc.), of the land of Jephthah and Eliezer, fighting with a fearless faith, were to carry off the glory of the battle (comp. Ez哇d, 32, 21). But just as in refining, it is easy to see, in the inducting itself of the nail, character at once must be, so it was necessary for the Sanbedrim to gain Pilate's consent to the execution of our Lord (John xviii, 31). The strict letter of the law forbade governors of provinces to take their wives with them, but the cases of Pilate's wife (Matt. xxvii, 19) and Drusilla (Acts xviii, 24) show the facts are the same. Tacitus (Ann. iii, 33, 34) records an unsuccessful attempt to revive the old practice. See PROCONSUL.

PROVINCIAL. The local superior of the monasteries (abbot, guardian, prior, etc.) stands under the supervision of the district superior, or dekanizates; these are subordinate to the governors of the province, or provincial, who are themselves under the direction of the general of the order, the head of the whole community.

PROVINCIAL COUNCILS are the name given to the synods held by the bishops of a single ecclesiastical province, and presided over by the metropolitan. The ecclesiastical superior of the province convokes the council. The council, under the presidency of the king's councilors (βουλευτες, the ἄγγελος of Herod. viii, 98) conveyed his letters or decrees (Esth. i, 22, 13). From all provinces concumbences were collected for his harem (ii, 8). Horses, mules, or dromedaries were employed on this service (viii, 10). (Comp. Herod. viii, 98; Xenoph. Cyrop. viii, 6; Herren's Peritia, ch. ii.) The word is used, it must be remembered, of the smaller sections of a sestry rather than of the sestry itself. While the provinces are 127, the sestries are only 20 (Herod. iii, 89). The Jews who returned from Babylon are described as "children of the province" (Esth. ii, 1; Neh. vii, 6), and had a separate governor (see DIASPORA) of their own race (Esth. ii, 68; Neh. vi, 14; viii, 9), while they were subject to the sestry (τηντός) of the whole province west of the Euphrates (Esth. v, 7; vi, 6).

2. (Ἐπαρχία.) In the New Test. we are brought into contact with the administration of the provinces of the Roman empire. The classification given by Strabo (xvii, p. 84) of provinces (ἐπαρχίες) supposed to need military control, and therefore placed under the immediate control of the Censor, and those still belonging theoretically to the republic, and administered by the senate, and of the latter again into proconsular (ἐπαρχίαι) and praetorian (στρατηγαις), is recognised, more or less distinctly, in the Gospels and the Acts (see PROCONSUL). Cyrenius (Quirinus) was the ἐπαρχῆς of Syria (Luke ii, 1), the word being in this case used for preses or proconsul. Pilate was the ἐπαρχῆς of the sub-province of Judaea (Luke iii, 1; Matt. xxvii, 2, etc.), as procurator with the power of a legatus; and the same title is given to his successors, Felix and Festus (Acts xxiii, 24; xxv, 1; xxvi, 30). The governors of the senatorial provinces of Cyprus, Asia, and Africa, on the other hand, are rightly described as διάθεσιν, proconsuls (Acts xiii, 7; xviii, 12; xix, 38). In the two former cases the province had been originally an imperial one, but had been transferred to Augustus (Dio Cass. liv. 4), Asia by Claudius (Sueton. Claud. 25)—to the senate. The στρατηγαις of Acts xvii, 22 (A. V. "maggistrates"), on the other hand, were the διωμυστερια, or praetors, of a Roman colony. The duty of the legati and other provincial governors to report special matters is recognised in Acts xxv, 20 and furnished the groundwork for the spurious Actus Pilati. See PILATE. The right of any Roman citizen to appeal from a provincial governor to the emperor as asserted by Paul (xxv, 11). In the council (συνεδρίασις) of Acts xxv, 12 we recognise the assessors who were appointed to take part in the judicial functions of the governor. The authority of the legati, proconsul, or procurator, extended, it need hardly be said, to capital punishment (subject, in the case of Roman citizens, to the right of appeal), and, in most cases, the death of a person was inflicted judicially. It was necessary for the Sanhedrim to gain Pilate's consent to the execution of our Lord (John xviii, 31). The strict letter of the law forbade governors of provinces to take their wives with them, but the cases of Pilate's wife (Matt. xxvii, 19) and Drusilla (Acts xviii, 24) show the facts are the same. Tacitus (Ann. iii, 33, 34) records a unsuccessful attempt to revive the old practice. See PROCONSUL.

PROVISION. (Lat. provvisorio) is, in canon law, the bestowal of an ecclesiastical benefice (q. v.).

1. In the Roman Catholic Church it involves the regular collation (q. v.) of the ecclesiastical functions. Any of its ecclesiastical offices can only be thus lawfully obtained from a competent superior.

2. Extent and Classification. (1.) The "provision" includes three stages—(a) the designation of the person on whose behalf the benefice is bestowed (provisor persona); (b) the collation of the office itself (collatio sive institutio canonical); for higher offices by papal confirmation, for inferior functions by episcopal institution; and (c) the act of putting the nominee in possession of the office or of confirming the provision, when he is a canon or other prebendary, installation. The election or designation confers on the candidate only a right of priority: the complete lawful possession can only be acquired by the canonical confirmation or institution.

2. There is an ordinary and an extraordinary, a free and an obligatory, a full and a partial provision. (a) When, as the rule requires, higher functions are conferred by the pope, lower ones by the bishop, this is called ordinary provision (provisorio ordinario); but if by some special lawfull title, a third person, or by the law of deposition the successor super legatus clerical function, or in consequence of special reservation the pope is possessed of the right of collation, this is an extraordinary provision (provisorio extraordinario). of those attributes, he has only a partial right (jus provisionis minus plenum).

2. Requisites. An ecclesiastic function can only be bestowed on a person possessing certain qualities, and must be occupied within a certain period and in a certain manner.

(a) In regard to the qualifications of the candidate, the canons require that he be capable and worthy (ideos et dignus); that not only he have an unimpeached reputation, but also the required age, the necessary orders, and the instruction demanded by the office. The required qualifications are as follows:

(1) The candidate must belong to the clergy, and, in consequence, must be at least tonsured, and be advanced enough to be able to get the necessary orders within a year (Clem. c. 2, "De Act. et Qual."); Conc. Trid. sess. xxii. c. 4, "De Ref."). In ancient law the candidate, if his office required higher orders than those of a subdeacon, could receive a dispensation for seven years, to give him time to complete his scientific education, and the benefice meanwhile might be administered by a vicar (Sext. c. 34, "De Elect."); 6). The modern law reduces this term to one year, which runs from the day of possession fully obtained (Sext. c. 35, "De Elect."); 6). If during this period the orders have not been conferred, the benefice is held over (Sext. c. 35, "De Elect."); 6), otherwise only after previous warning (c. 7, x, "De Elect."); 6; Sext. c. 22, cod. i, 6); but in the latter case the bishop may grant a second dispensation of one year (Conc. Trid. sess. vii. c. 12, "De Ref."). To get into possession of a bishopric, the elected person or nominee must have obtained the subseconatea six months before his election or nomination (Conc. Trid. sess. xii. c. 2, "De Ref."). Abbotts, holders of dignities, and functions with which jurisdiction and charge of souls are connected must be priests (c. 2, x, "De Act. et Qual."); 14), and archbishops and all principal chapters, half of the canons must be prebendaries (Conc. Trid. sess. xxiv. c. 12, "De Ref."), although in the time of the Council of Trent already many chapters—for instance, those of Cologne, Tréves, etc.—were exclusively composed of priests, which is now always the case. (c) The candidate must possess the scientific requirements required by the office. The Tridinium decrees declare that the bishop must have shown his capacity at some university (or lyceum) as a teacher, or by degrees obtained in theology or canon law, or other academic studies (Conc. Trid. sess. xxii. c. 2, "De Ref."). The functions of several canon scholars, of penitentiaries, and in general of all dignities and half of the canons, can only be bestowed upon graduates (ibid. sess. xxii. c. 18, xxxiv. c. 8, 12, "De Ref."). For candidates to prebends implying charge of souls (curates, preachers) a trial is instituted, and held by the bishop or his vicar-general and at least three other examiners chosen by the diocesan synod and put under special oath (Conc. Trid. sess. xxxiv. c. 18, "De Ref."); comp. Pli V "In Conferendis," d. 18. May, 1666. The trials of the member of the benedictine sisterhood "Clem. ii. d. 14 Dec. 1742.". As the diocesan synods, the collatio, the consistorium, the insti- tution and collation, have only been revived of late, the papal see has conferred full powers on the bishop (modo provisionis), and, until the regular synods should be re-established, to nominate himself, these synodal examiners and take their oath. Besides this examination required by the Church, most civil governments in Germany prescribe a similar examination for the candidate to the functions of curate or preacher.

(b) In regard to the time and manner of the provision, the following is the law generally; the newly established clerical function must first be endowed; an office subsisting already must not be only really, but lawfully vacant. Even to give expectancies, or promises of provision in case of vacancy, is prohibited. Every clerical office must be filled in a given period of time—higher offices within three months; inferior offices, the provision of which is left to the free collation of the Bishops or chapters, six months (c. 2, x, "De Concessa. Prerb."); 8) from the day their vacancy was first known (c. 3, x, "De Suppl. Negl. Prerb."); 10). If the offices to be filled are patronal benefices, the lay patron is allowed a term of four months (c. 3, x, "De Jun. Patron."); 10). By making his presentation, the clerical patron a term of six months; the latter being lawful even in cases where a layman has transferred his right of presentation to a church or ecclesiastical corporation (Sext. c. un. "De Jur. Patron."); 19), where the patronate is mixed. However, the civil legislation of several countries disagree in many cases with these rules. If the election, postulation, nomination, or presentation have not taken place within the allotted term, it is, for this case, lost to the patron, and devolves upon the superior clerical authority. (b) The benefice must be filled according to the canons; consequently, with complete independence both of the collator and the receiver (c. 2, x, "De his qua VI."); 40), without diminution or heavier taxation of the prebend (c. un. x, "Ut Benefice sine Diminut."); 12), and without simony. The admission of the state, and, often of individuals, to a share in the provision of ecclesiastical benefices gave rise in the mediæval Church to the contention for insti-tuutum (q. v.), and remains as yet unsettled. In some countries it was set at rest by concordat; in others it is still unregulated, though the principle of the right of free provision is not lost. The right of the pope is long to the pope. In most Roman Catholic countries the crown elects to bishoprics, and the pope is bound to confirm the nominee of the crown, unless canonical cause of rejection should appear. In Germany, the contest with the papacy has on this account left vacant several important provisions.

3. Form of the Provision. (1) Concerning the ordinary collation (n) of higher offices. Archiepiscopal and episcopal sees, abbacies, and other prelatures are filled by election, postulation, or nomination. (b) The other offices are filled by collation, and consequently the pontiff is the only one who can bestow benefices and benefices are only bestowed, not by the pope, of which the right of filling the vacant places is entirely free, or it is more or less circumscribed by the rights of third persons or by the peculiar situation of the chapter, especially by the right of presentation of the patrons. (2) An extraordinary provision takes place (n) or jure decolato, when the person entitled to fill the vacant office does not fulfil the canonic conditions of the provision, or jure reservato, when the prebend is one of those the collation of whom is reserved to the pope.

4. Institution and collation. (1) The lawful collation of the office in question by the competent clerical superior, which alone entitles to the possession of the office and to the exercise of the rights of consecration and jurisdiction connected with it, is made, for episcopates and prelatures, by the pope, by confirmation of the elected or postulated person or nominee; for other functions, by the bishop (c. 3, x, "De Inst.""); iii. 7; Conc. Trid. sess. xxiv. c. 13, "De Ref."); through canonic institution. The phrase institutum canonicum appears in Sext. c. 1, "De Reg. Jur.""); 12, and has since prevailed; the expression Benedicti XIV, "Cum illud," d. 14 Dec. 1742). As the diocesan synods, the collatio, ins- titutio verbis, institutio vocatoriam, institutum, are somewhat erroneously employed as synonymous with it. Collatio beneficis ought to be used only for prebends freely conferred by the clerical superior, as here the collation of the office makes one with the presentation, both being included in the decree of collation. If the office belongs to that class to which third persons (physically and morally qualified) have a right of election or presentation, then institutio is the right word, and, better, the following, to indicate that this institution is made by the competent clerical superior is alone the lawful collation; or institutio collatutis, to indicate that the office is really conferred only by the institution; institutio verbis, to distinguish this verbal delivery of the office from the act of putting a person in possession of it (instalation). While the liber cargo was always, and is, an absolately personal right of the bishop, neither the vicar-general (sede plena) can perform it without special powers, nor the chapter, nor the capitular vicar appointed by it (sede aequitatis). The institutio canonicus, or colectio, or cerebula, was formerly a regular official right of the archdeacon (c. 6, x, "De Instit. ii, i, ii), and is still a right comprised in the general powers of the vicar-general. This right of institution to offices connected with no charge of souls can exceptionally belong even to other ecclesiastical persons or corporations, either in consequence of special favor or of prescription (c. 18, x, "De Praes. ii, 26; c. 2, § 2, "De Privill. v, 83). By this canonical institution the nominate obtains the full right to his office and to the attributes of jurisdiction over possesses distinctions connected with it, but no right to take charge of souls: for this he needs a special authorization, for which he must apply within in a period of two months from the day when the decree of presentation or collation has been received (II V "In Conferenda," d. 8 Mart. 1667); and this is called the institutio, in a narrower sense, or institutio auctoriosissima, i.e. the special collation of the charge of souls. The collation of the cura aminarum is, again, so exclusively a right of the bishop that neither the archdeacon nor the vicar-general, unless he be well pleased, can confer it (c. 4, x, "De Off. Archidic."") ii, 28), nor, in general, any third person even possessed of the full right of provision. Now the institutio auctoriosissima goes regularly together with the institutio collatio, and is given at the episcopal residence (Conc, Trid. sem. xii, c. 13, "De Ref.) and approbation, by means of symbolic performances, by dressing the candidate in the chasuble and barret (hence the name institutio), receiving his profession of faith and oath of obedience, and delivering the benefice a deed thereof, called "letter of investiture." This institutio auctoriosissima can be made by the bishop himself for his vicar-general, who needs no longer a special mandate for it (Benedict XIV "De Syn, Dioc."") ii, ii, c. 8), and, sede vacante, the chapter, or the capitular vicar appointed by them (Sext. c. 1, "De Instit. iii, i, 6), (2.) The introduction into the office and prebend, or putting into possession (institutio corporalis), is called (a) for the bishop inunctionem, and consists in this, that the consecrated bishop, in his badges, takes solemn possession of his cathedral or an assigned residence. It is combined, if the bishop be consecrated in his own church, into one act with the consecration; but if the consecration take place extra diocese — in the metropolitan church, or cathedral, of the consecrate delegate by the pope, then, according to the traditional custom and practice in pastoral hands, the bishop, or the diocesan vicar, is received at his arrival in the benedict of his seat by the chapter and the clergy of the city and surrounding country, and escorted to some church situated in the neighborhood, where, after a short prayer, he is clothed in the pontifical robes and badges, he is seated on the solemn procession, all bells ringing into his cathedral. Here he is greeted with the hymn Ecce sanctus magnum, and while the clergy and the people sing the Te Deum, he takes his seat, gives the episcopal benediction, and is then escorted to his residence, the cross being carried before him. (b) The solemn admission of a canon of a cathedral or collegiate chapter is called installment. The beneficiary, in the house of the chapter, is clothed in the choir garments, and the capitular cross is appended to his neck, whereupon he recites the Credo and swears the capitular oath. He is then led to his seat in the chapter (sedes in capitulo), escorted to the church, and here, also, shown his place in the choir (salmum in choro, hence installatio). (c) With canons and other beneficiaries, the institutio corporalis (not called installation) is performed at the place of residence, the introduction into the office (immissio in spiritualibus beneficii) by a legate of the bishop, and the putting in possession of the prebend (immissio

In Austria, every ecclesiastical, upon getting into office, after receiving spiritual investiture at the hands of the bishop, has, before his installation, to sign a written declaration to the effect that he does not belong, nor will ever belong, to any secret society. The spiritual installation is performed, in the name of the ordinariate, by the vicar of the district or dean the first holyday after the arrival of the ecclesiastic at the place of his benefice; the worldly installation, in the name of the government, by a higher functionary commissioned thereto; in pastoral prebends by the patron, according to the prevailing custom. In Prussia, the prebendary is generally put into possession of the spiritual investiture in common with the patron or with the Landeshof, if the curacy be one of those to which the government has the right of nomination. The deed of confirmation is read in the presence of the community, the curate is introduced, and put in possession of his residence with approbation. A new curate in the oath is exacted, after which the dean proclaims to the spiritual performance in the church, where he introduces the new curate to his community. From the church he is led again to his residence, where he is introduced to the community by the royal commissary. Then the people are dismissed, and the same ceremony, in the presence of the episcopal plenipotentiary and the civil functionaries and church trustees, delivers the keys of the house to the new curate. In Baden, the curate is put in possession, in the name of the grand-duke, by the grand-ducal commissary; in the district, but only mediately, by a written order of these officers; but a solemn institutio corporalis takes place in the church in the presence of the archiepiscopal dean. Similar dispositions prevail in Wurttemberg in the kingdom of Saxony and Grand Duchy of Hess, and in Nassau—Wetzlar u. Wels, Kirchen-List, etc. II. In the Church of England, the bishop is nominally elected by the chapter; but, in reality, the members of the chapter are only permitted to name the particular person whom the crown presents to them for election with the congé d'élire. In the Roman Catholic Church of England and of Ireland, the parochial clergy, together with the canons, recommend three candidates, one of whom is commonly, although not necessarily, appointed by the pope. III. In the Russo-Greek Church, the candidates are presented by the holy synod, and the cæsar names the bishop from among them. See Harewood, Hist. of the Reformation, 1, 350.

Provisor. (1) a chamberlain; (2) the Cluniac bailiff of the ville or manor and receiver of rents—Walcott, Sacred Archeprology, &c.

Provisors, Statute of. Clement V, in the beginning of the 14th century, went beyond all his predecessors by declaring that the disposal of all ecclesiastical benefices belonged to the pope. The pope accordingly made reversionary grants, or provision, as they were called, during the lives of the incumbents; and he reserved such benefices as he thought fit for his own peculiar patronage. England in particular suffered greatly from these grants. These encroachments during the reign of Henry III. The parliament assembled at Carlisle in the thirty-fifth year of Edward I sent a strong remonstrance to pope Clement V against the papal encroachments. But this remonstrance produced no effect. The first prince who was bold enough to assert the power of the legislature to restrain these encroachments was Edward III. After complaining ineffectually to Clement VI of the heinous abuse of papal reservations, he procured the famous statute of Provisors (25 Edw. III, stat. 6) to be passed (A.D. 1350). This act ordained that all elections to any ecclesiastical benefices should from henceforth be made by the court of Rome of any archbishopric, bishopric, dignity, or other benefice, the king
The same Prowe, it is believed, was also worshipped under a different form: he stands on a column, his nude form in a pair of boots; a bell lies at his feet. This is asserted by the chronicle of Botho, which calls the god Prowo, and speaks of him as being the idol of Atenburg or Stargard. This may possibly be mistaken for Pervul, this booted deity with Prowe: other idols besides the latter may have been worshipped at Stargard; perhaps the chroniclers mistook one of them for the god of Justice.

Proventius (from Greek προφετής, for, εὐφή, learn, i.e. for learned bread) is a term meaning correctly, respectfully, by the Western Church to the adherents of the Greek Church because they contended for the use of leavened, or common, bread in the Eucharist. The Latin Church were Asynites (q. v.). See also Eucharist.

Præhemia, the first fabulous duchess of Bashem, the husband of the celebrated Libussa. His name is synonymous with that of Prometheus: it means he who thinks in advance, probably because Præhemia was a seer, a great prophet.

Præhippægas, a warlike deity in Slavic mythology, sanguinary as were his priests and all the gods of the Slavonians. The Christian prisoners were beheaded in front of his image, and their blood was presented to him to drink.

Puorden, Nechemiah, a New England minister of the Gospel, flourished near the close of the last and the opening of this century. He was born about 1750, and was educated at Yale College. He became pastor of a church at Enfield, Conn. He died in 1816. He is the author of Moral and Divine Letter of a Deacon (1810); Sermom to a Missionary Society (1815). See Bacon, Hist. Discourses, p. 55 sq.

Prudence is the act of selecting words and actions according to the circumstances of things, or rules of right reason. Cicero thus defines it: "Est rerum expetendarum vel fugiendarum scientia"—the knowledge of what is to be desired or avoided. Grove thus: "Prudence is an ability of judging what is best in the choice both of ends and means." Mason thus: Prudence is a conformity to the rules of reason, truth, and decency, at all times and in all circumstances. It differs from wisdom only in degree; wisdom being nothing but a more consummate and prudential habit. Prudence is a lower degree or weaker habit of wisdom. It is divided into, 1. Christian prudence, which directs to the pursuit of that blessedness which the Gospel discovereth by the use of Gospel means; 2. moral prudence, which has for its object peace and satisfaction of mind in this world, and the greatest happiness after death; 3. civil prudence, which is the knowledge of what ought to be done in order to secure the outward happiness of life, consisting in prosperity, liberty, etc.; 4. munificent, relating to any circumstances in which a man is not charged with the care of others; 5. economical prudence, which regards the conduct of a family; 6. political, which refers to the good government of a state. The idea of prudence, says one, includes due consultation—that is, concerning such things as demand consultation—in a right manner and for a competent time, that the resolution taken up may be neither too precipitate nor too slow; and a faculty of discerning proper means when they occur. To the perfection of prudence these three things are further required, viz. a natural sagacity; presence of mind, or a ready turn of thought; and experience. Plato styles prudence the leading virtue; and Cicero observes that "not one of the virtues can want prudence;" which is certainly most true, since, without prudence to guide them, piety would degenerate into superstition, zeal into bigotry, temperance into austerity, courage into rashness, and prudence itself into folly. The labours of men were performed till an advanced hour of the night.

Gottschalk. Although Prudentius put his name to these "quatuer capitula," he soon afterwards endeavored to refuse them by writing a Tractatus Epistola adr. 4 Capit. Convent. Curia. It is possible that he signed his name at Chieri by demand of king Charles the Bald.
In the later development of this contest, Prudentius seems to give up his position. For, up to his death in 861, and is revered as a saint in Troyes. The Bolland-ists do not recognise his title to sanctity. Although Prudentius held himself against opposing heresies, and particularly against the doctrines of the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians, he felt, and some authors have to conceal the truth in the profession of error, and Les Annales de St. Berlin accuse him of having written articles against the faith. From a letter of Sertorius Lupus to Prudentius, we learn (Fp. 63) that these two men were sent by king Charles to visit and reform the monastery of France. See Gallia Christi-

Prudentius, Aurelius Clemens, one of the earliest himnists of the Latin Church, is greatly celebrated in ecclesiastical history, though generally overrated. Bendley calls him "the Horace and Virgil of the Christians," not even qualifying them as Latin Christians. There were certainly many himnists previ-sious to Prudentius, and they sang in the tongue of Homer, Plato, and the New Test. The very thoughts, and frequently in the very words, of evangelists and apostles.
The homilies of Ephraim the Syrian had the sound as well as the sense of those of the children of Jerusalem;
and Clement of Alexandria, Gregory of Nazianzum, and the unknown earliest singers of the Oriental Church linked the passing hours with heaven by the sublimity of their language and the simplicity of their faith. As the truths of Christianity first flowed in Greek from inspired lips, so the songs of the Church came first in Greek. When, finally, the mighty new thought had been fitted to the comparatively stiff and narrow mold of human speech, it was not the tongue of Pru-udentius that gained around it the most dissiastic associations of centuries. The rugged grandeur of expression, the calm and steady glow that wins for the majesty of heaven, came rather in the Latin hymns of Ambrose, Augustine, and Hilary of Poitiers. In the words of an eminent critic, "The fire of Berelva-trion, in its strong and simple energy, by which, as it were, it rends the rock, and bursts the icy barriers of the human heart, predominates in those oldest pieces of the sacred Latin poesy which are comprised in the Ambrosian hymns."

Life—Prudentius was born in A.D. 348, probably at Saragossa, in Spain. Nothing is known regarding him except what he has himself told in a poetical autobiog-ography prefixed to his works. From this we learn that he received a liberal education, was admitted to the Roman bar, practised it as a pleader, and some authors have distinguished himself in his profession, as high civil offices were twice offered to him. He was even called upon to occupy a military post at the court of the emperor Theodosius I. He was already fifty years of age, when, in a fit of passion, he took a vow to renounce all ties to the world. At times, he was agitated by earnest misgivings as to "what all the honors and joys of this world might do for him in eternity. In them he could not find God to whom he belonged" (Prof. Cathem., v, 28-34). Hence the resolution: "Let the soul, at the boundaries of life, renounce her folly and sin. Let her praise her God at least by her songs, as she cannot do it by her virtues. Let the day be spent in sacred hymns, and let not even night interrupt the praises of God. I will struggle against her, and I will boast that I resist the sacrifices of the pagans, destroy thy idols, O Rome. I will praise in my songs thy martyrs, glorify the apostles (L. c. ver. 35-42). These words indicate all the different tendencies in his literary productions, which reflect them.

Works. — We have from Prudentius's pen between 385 and 388 poems, a number of which bear Greek titles. The principal are — 1. Cathemerinon Liber (Book i.e. of hymns) for Daily Use), being a series of twelve hymns, the first half of which were reckoned by the author suitable for devotional purposes at different parts of the day, and which the Latin Church has preserved in some of its collections. 2. Apotheosis, Αψυστος (a defence of the doctrine of the Trinity against heretics, which are being intermingled various discussions on the nature of the soul, on original sin, and on the resurrection). 3. Hymnariaen, Αψυστος (On the Origin of Evil, a polemic, in verse, against the Marcionites and Manichaeans). 4. Psychomachia, Ψυκομαχια (The Combat of the Mind against the Passions, or the Triumph of the Christian Graces in the Soul of a Believer, Liber 1, Contra Symmachum, Liber 2 (a polemic against a petition of the Roman senator Symmachus for the restoration of the altar and statue of victory cast down by Gratian). Prudentius supports in these two poems the arguments set forth by Ambrose against the proposition of Symmachus. The first book shows the shameful origin of the old idolatry, exposes the absurdity and abominations of the heathen mythology, the corruption resulting from the want of a moral check, and how happily Rome was insulted by a Christian. The second book he examines the reasons alleged by his adversary, eloquently descants upon the cruel practice of gladiators' combats for the amusement of the people, and, in order to show their brutalizing influence, he instances a vestal attending in the amphitheatre, and witnessing the struggles and agonies of the fallen gladiators in the arena, exclaiming with joy that such sights were their delight, and giving without compunction the signal to dispatch the fallen. Ambrosius (bk. iv. 14) says that he left the vestal upon the vestalas. As, in both books, the subject was of a nature to allow full scope to the genius of the poet, being eminently favorable to enthusiastic apology, this is the best of all his apologetical poems. 5. The Enchoriolum ætusque Testamenti s. Dionysii (forty-eight poems of a devotional character, of which the walls of a uniform tenor, relating to some of the most remarkable events of the New and Old Test., as Adam and Eve, Abel and Cain, Joseph recognised by his brothers, the announcement, the shepherds taught by the angels, etc. Gennadius includes 70 verses under the other poems of Prudentius (De Script. Eccles. 13); but its authenticity has been questioned, chiefly because it is less abundant in ideas than the others. The following are decidedly authentic, and, besides, excellent compositions: 8. Fourteen poems, Hymni S. Vergili, Peri Stephanon Liber, in honor of the martyrs for the faith — Laurentius, Eulalia, Vincent, Hippolytus, Peter and Paul, Agnes, etc.; full of warm feeling and splendid narratives. To the Christian lyrical poetry belong, 9, the twelve songs Κανδυμα τος, mostly destined for the daily prayer-hours, which were exactly observed in olden times. The first relates to the dawning of the day (as galli cantum); Christ, the rising light of the world, chases the dark powers of night. Let him banish them also from our heart and pour new light into our souls! The second is likewise a morning-song. The third and fourth, the middle-prayer, 10, the fifth is to be recited at the lighting of the candles; the sixth upon retiring for the night; the seventh and eighth while and after fasting; the ninth, an encomium on the Saviour, at all hours. To these are added Songs for Exequies (on the Resurrection), on the feast of Christmas ("octavo Calendias Januarii") and Epiphany, and which reflect the Christian spirit; they show the rich symbolism of the Christian life of old, and are therefore of great archaeological importance. Several passages of them and of the hymns Hymni Vergili have been put into the Breviary among the Church hymns. Prudentius cultivated, as we have seen, the two fundamental kinds of Christian poetry, the didactic-panegyric and the lyric, which were the necessary consequences of the historico-dogmatic and mystical character of Christianity, and borrowed their forms from the ancient Roman poetry, which is also chiefly didactic-panegyric or panegyric. The poetical form was employed at a very early period for the popular interpretation and defence of the Christian dogmas against pagans and heretics. Prudentius achieved in a short time a great reputation in the Church. Sidonius (Epist. 41) compares him with Horace, who was his chief model in a formal point of view; yet Prudentius moves in the classical forms with incomparably greater ease than his predecessors, Juvenal and Victorinus; he borrows more than the theme from the ancients, and gives to the Latinity, to keep the expression of his thoughts free from all pagan coloring. His phrases, it is true, show the decay of letters and of good Latin, yet many parts of his poems display taste as well as delicacy; for instance, his stanzas, Sabina, flores maritimae, to be found in the Roman Breviary for the feast of the Holy Innocents. We are, however, at a loss to understand how any scholars of our critical age can bestow unqualified praise on Prudentius, and place him first in the list of Christian versifiers. Nor are we ready to shut our eyes to the fulness of all beauty in Prudentius's verse, and declare his hymns simply "didactic essays, loaded with moral precepts and doctrinal subtreasures." His lyric style is good, and his hymns are good specimens of the best Christian song of the Latin Church in that early age. "The stanzas," says Milman (Hist. of Latin Christianity, viii, 290), "which the Latin Church has handed down in her services from Prudentius are but the flowers gathered from a wilderness of weeds." Prudentius, even in Germany, was the great popular author of the Middle Ages; no work but the Bible appears with so many glosses (interpretations or notes) in High German, which shows that it was a book of Groksleitung (comp. Raumer, Einwirkung des Christentums auf die Althochdeutsche Sprache, p. 222). Had Ambrose lived earlier, Prudentius would not have been remembered at all; but as his contemporary he deserves a place beside that other great poet of the Middle Ages, beyond excelled, but sometimes equalled as a hymnologist. The earliest edition of Prudentius's works is that of Deventer (1472). By far the best is that of Faustinus Arrevalius (Rome, 1788-89, 2 vols, 4to), but excellent editions are also those by Valin (Hamburg, 1829); 23 editions (in usum Delphini, Paris, 1867, 4to); and Gallandius, Bibl. Patr., vol. viii. The newest and handiest is that of Obbiansis (Tubing, 1844), whose Prolegomena embrace a large amount of information condensed into a small compass. Prussia (Ger. Preussen) is a kingdom of the new German Empire, virtually embracing within its own limits the story of the whole empire in which it is the guiding and ruling power. Before its recent aggrandizement, it consisted of two large tracts of land extending from Russia on the east to Holland and Belgium on the west, south of the Baltic and north of Saxony, Thuringia, Bavaria, etc., but separated from each other by the kingdoms of Hanover, the duchies of Mecklenburg and Oldenburg, the electorate of Hesse-Cassel, duchy of Nassau, and some minor states. In 1866, Prussia received large acquisitions of territory, having annexed the kingdom of Hanover, the duchies of Hesse-Cassel, Nassau, and Silesia and Holstein, the free city of Frankfurt, and some districts of Bavaria and Hesse-Darmstadt. The area of Prussia was thus increased from 108,212 Eng. sq. miles to 137,066, and the population from 19,304,943 to 24,106,847, of whom 23,746,790 formed the civil population, and 916,056 the military; the literacy of the latter was 76 per cent, and of the former 72 per cent.

The variation in density is considerable, the greatest being in the manufacturing district of Dusseldorf, in the Rhine province, where it is four times the average, and smallest in the district of Kiel in Schleswig-Holstein, where it amounts to three fifths of the average. Prussia is now divided into eleven provinces and three annexes with a population, according to the official census for 1885, as follows:

About 88 per cent. of the population are Germans. Of the Slavonic tribes, the most numerous are Poles, numbering two and a quarter millions. In Brandenburg and Silesia there are about 85,000 Wends, and in East Prussia upwards of 147,000 Lithuanians; while Wends and Lithuanians have largely more than doubled by the use of the German language, intermixed in its general German population, and Silesia has nearly 59,000 Bohemians or Moravians—making in all two and a half millions who do not use the German language, or who employ it only as secondary to their native tongues.

Three distinct classes are recognised in Prussia—namely, nobles, burghers, and peasants. To the first belong about 177,000 persons, including the high officials of the state, although that number does not comprise the various mediatised houses, of which sixteen are Prussian, and others belonging to different states, but connected with Prussia by still existing or former territorial sessions. The burgher class includes, in its higher branches, all public-office holders, professional men, artists, and merchants; while the peasantry—to which being Tolstoyan where engaged in agricultural pursuits are divided into classes, depending on the number of horses employed on the land, etc.

1. History and Religion.—The lands bounded by the Baltic and now constituting East Prussia, and the adjoining territory on that side of the Oder, form the origin of the Prussians with which they now occupy. These lands were early occupied by Slavonic tribes, nearly allied to the Lithuanians (q. v.) and the Letts. It is conjectured that they were visited by Phcenian navigators in the 4th century B.C., but beyond the fact of their having come into temporary conflict with the Goths and other Teutonic hordes prior to the great exodus of the latter from their northern homes, little is known of the people till the 7th century, when they first appear in history under the name of Borussi, or Prussians. They were then a small but vigorous nation, and had made their homes in the Oder, and their neighbors by bold inroads, when the race of the heroes and sea-kings arrived from Norway and Sweden. Scandinavian Goths settled in the country, and the southern shores of the Baltic sounded with the praise of the exploits of Skarkodder and Ragnar Lodbjorg.

1. Mythological Period.—In the oldest historic times, doubtless, the primitive inhabitants—Prussians, Lithuanians, Umlaragusians, Curlanders, Livonians, etc.—were shipwrecked the sun, the moon, the stars, and the powers of nature generally. The Scandinavians, who were the first advanced in the arts of war and of peace, better armed, and skilled in agriculture, then brought in new gods, among whom the three supreme rulers, Perkuno, Poivrepo, Pikolos, and most probably all their other deities. Much has been written and argued on the question whether the three mentioned names, or gods to whom they are said to have belonged, really existed, or whether they were mere inventions of some imaginative chroniclers. There are even writers who have discovered in them the three persons of the Holy Trinity. We shall not speculate on this speculative theory, but believe that the three gods are, or at least were, what we positively know of the ancient mythology of a people which occupies such a high rank among the nations of Europe. Besides the three mentioned, there was another important deity, called Curko, the giver of food. His image stood at the foot of a holy oak. There was one at the place where the city of Heiligenbeil was afterwards built. The apostle of the Prussians cut the venerable tree with a hatchet, and this circumstance gave the town its present name. There were spread over the whole country sacrificial stones, crosses, to which animals, fish, meat, etc., were offered to the god. Every year his image was made anew, out of wood, on the consecrated spots; it was clothed in goat-skins and crowned with herbs and ears. Then it was carried about amid the shouts of the populace; dances and sacrifices ensued. The inferior gods, in large number, have been divided, not, perhaps, very properly, into gods of the heavens, of earth, of the water, of men, of the cattle, of the lower world, into gods of labor, gods of trade, into good and bad gods. This was, no doubt, a kind of worship of nations, in which Wallonians and Russianized nations. The holiest place in the land was Romwe. Only a priest was allowed to approach it. There were but few exceptions. Thus, by special favor, a powerful ruler was permitted to come near the consecrated spot, and to speak to the gizwe, or high-priest. But not even those great personages were suffered to come near the sanctuary, the ever-verdant oak, and the gods that stood below it; for it was surrounded with a fence formed by long pieces of white linen, something like a most primitive tabernacle. To a great distance the land around the circle was not circled, it was consecrated. No one could enter this forest, which occupied many square miles; and if, unwittingly, some wretch put his foot into it, his life was forfeited to the offended deities. No tree was felled there, no wild animal chased. Besides the celebrated Romwe, there were other places of the same kind spread all over the country, and whose names, commencing with Romas, and partly preserved to our day, are expressive of calm and holiness. We find quite a number of such names in Lithuania. In Prussia the trees were held holy, as among the ancient Germans, the Anglo-Saxons, the Rugians, Holsteinians, and kindred peoples. There existed also single oaks and Linden-trees which were held in particular estimation as being the seats of some divinity; they were approached with pious horror and deep reverence. The oak of Heiligenbeil, with a circumference of forty feet and a diameter of nineteen, was the most celebrated. Some mountains enjoyed the same honors. The best-known of them was near Brandenburg, at a short distance from the Friesche Haft. Near the holy woods and trees there was always a rich deposit of gold and silver poured by the plough. We also find holy springs, from which no one could take water unless he previously offered a sacrifice: their water was believed to be a sure medicine against certain diseases. There were also holy lakes, either in a separate place or connected with the sanctuaries and forests: no one was allowed to fish in their waters.

The gods adored in those consecrated places were, besides those already named: Okopins, the god of the air and of temperate; Sopins, the god of the stars; a most important god in the North, with its long winter nights; Bankowitsa, the god of the sea; Antrimo, the angry god, who excites the waves; Wurkselte and Stwezamborte, the protectors of cattle and poultry, worshiped extensively in the whole country; Gurdelsa and Jomotekite, the protectors of oxen and sheep; Per dosits, the god of trade, who made the sea propitious to the mariner, and was especially honored on the sea-coast; Puskowitsa, the god of woods and trees, who lived under the foliage, and whose dwelling-places were held particular honor by the god; and through the country, number of sanctuaries, where he was attended by a multitude of strange, dwarf-like beings, which the imagination of the people had fitted out and ornamented in the most fantastic manner. Peryouboris gave fertility to the fields; Zonewitsa strewed the earth with seeds, and covered it with flowers and herbs; Polaritsa filled with riches the houses and the barns; Aunewitsa was the god of health, restored to the sick and invalid.

To these must be added quite a number of female deities. Joweleno, watched over the germination and growth of all plants, and caused flowers and gardens with herbs and grass; Struita was the goddess of the flowers; Gojoginsa was the goddess of riches and opulence; Guze led the wanderers through deserts and gloomy forests; Sveeianskow; the bride of the star-god, directed the heavenly bodies on their path; Laima was the obstetric goddess, and fixed the destinies of the new-born. The bad goddesses were, the sanguinary Gittine, who brought painful death; Mgolda, the wrathful deity, who visited cruel misfortunes upon those whom she disliked; Laune, who intervened in human affairs—now sparingly, now cruelly. The wild, the feral, and the savage, were—all was fair—this was the case. The act of killing and consumption of the flesh of these monsters was in honor of the three great gods; the throwing of the cup was the sacrifice brought to them, which human hands durst not touch. After this ceremony the cup circulated from mouth to mouth. Each worshipper took it between his teeth, emptied it, and with his teeth on the neighbor took it from him. Finally, the benediction was given to the people; a banquet ensued, in which intoxicating beverages were so plentifully tasted that the solemnity generally ended in bloody work, as is the case, even in our days, with Poles, Lithuanians, and other nations.

2. Introduction of Christianity. We here substantially give the account found in Wetzer u. Weltc, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.

"Several attempts to introduce the Christian religion into Prussia had been fruitless. St. Adalbert, bishop of Prague, died April 25, 997, a martyr to his faith, while endeavoring to convert the people to Christianity, from the family of the Barons von Querfurt, who, after removing his cause and entering the Benedictine congregation of Hirsau, had repaired to Poland, with a view to preach there the Gospel and convert those pagan tribes, also suffered martyrdom (Feb. 11, 1000). The endeavors to Christianize the Prussians by force were still more unsuccessful. As the acceptance of the Christian religion had been made a condition of peace by Boland, duke of Poland, about 1018, they considered the Christian communion as an ominous consequence of unhappy persons, in the capacity of Christ and they shook it off every time when they felt strong enough to do so. Thus the dispensation to the Prussians continued to increase continually, until it reached the very pitch of of Westphalian birth, was not only a distinguished warrior, but also a scholar and statesman of the highest worldly matters; a plumed knight, too, who during a space of ten years had administered the possessions of the order in German and other countries assigned to him, with the full confidence of the grand-master. All other high Prussian families were considered to be inferior to equality sons, who, with a few knights and a considerable body of knights, set out on their way to Prussia. They arrived in 1228 in the Dienzenhofen, and in the north as well as in the south, as their host, yet the Prussians counted a thousand warriors where they counted one. Conrad could resist them with his own, but not with the Prussians, who, under the influence of his forces, his weakness being the very cause which was turned to his advantage, had made their attack by its unceasing troubles, and, besides, engaged in pertual warfare with their neighbors. Pomerania itself oftered no resistance to the Prussians; they were welcomed but hostile relations with Conrad, and with Poland in general. It was a terrible harbinger in the Teutonic Order to engage in their expedition under such unfavorable cir-stances. They began the war without delay, joined by use of the crossing forces through the XIX part of a warfare on crusade against Prussia with unswerving zeal.
The land of Calm was occupied, with the help of Swantepol of Pomerania, in spite of the desperate resistance of the Prussians. The order, at the same time that it constructed forts to secure the new conquests, helped German colonists in building cities in well-protected and fertile places. Thoro was reared first, soon afterwards Calm, both in 1233. In 1238, the Catholic Christianity had been introduced into Pomerania and Li-va, and an order of Christian knighthood had been formed for its furthering and maintaining. The prospects for Prusa also seemed to brighten. Although the exercitions of Gottfried, abbot of the monastery of Cystersian of Tannenberg, and of fellow-monk Philip, who suffered martyrdom, were not attended with any results, the efforts of the initiative princes converted. A few years afterwards appeared the man who was reserved the glorious achievement of introducing Christianity to Prussia. It was the Cistercian monk Christian, of the monastery of Oliva, a man distinguished by every virtue, and speaking fluently the German, Latin, Italian, and French languages. In 1230 he had obtained permission from pope Innocent III to go to Prussia to convert the heathens. The pope and his efforts were crowned with such brilliant success that in the fall of 1234, or at the beginning of 1235, he was appointed bishop of Prusien. The battle was a bloody one, and the spot where it had raged was, long after the event, called 'The Field of the Deeds.' At the same time, his bitterest enemies, the members of the order, were committed to the pastoral care of the archbishop of Gne-osen. The number of the converted Prussians was considerable and two of the princes, Warpod, the bishop of Landsau, and Swabuofo, who reigned in the land of Lobos, had made provisions for the maintenance of the bishop.

This partial triumph of Christianity excited the anger of the heathenish Prussians, who, were, besides, amassed by the expeditions of Conrad, duke of Masowia. Help from abroad was sorely needed. Crusades, however, continued to be.put off. The monks of the order led the Knights of Christ, called also Brother-knights of Do-brin, engaged in the conversion of Lithuania. The pattern of the Knights of the Sword, was no match for the savage fury of the Prussians: at the very beginning, even if the knights, were stalled in a battle bottle near the spot where Strasbourg was afterwards built. By bishop Christian's advice, the Teutonic Order was divided into four grandes of bishops. In 1238, Hermann von Salza, asked consent of Frederick II, who was not a bishop, but also he had been elevated to bishop, and confirmed the donations of land formally made in the order by duke Conrad of Masowia. After four years of negotiations, duke Conrad made a solemn grant to the order of the whole land of Calm, between the Vistula, Drewenz, and Ossa, with all the conquests they should add to it; while a another a bishop, the Bishop Christian, Gäther, bishop of Plock, renounced in their favor all their possessions, revenues, and patronal rights in those countries, reserving only their episcopal jurisdiction and their pontifical. At the same time the pope, Gregory IX, had arranged the IV in 1234, the order and and future conquests of the order of the papal see the work of confession, was selected for the diocese of Cölln. From the time of his election, a friend and companion of Heidenreich, who had, like him, worked many years for the expansion of Christianity, was selected as his vicar-general. The brother-priest of the Teutonic Order, Henry of Stratech, was appointed bishop of Ermeland. The diocese of Ermeland received in 1245 a new chapter of canons at Fliechmühlen, then in 1250 at Königsberg. The bishops, owing to various impediments, did not occupy their seats at a regular pace. The diocese of Ermeland, as far as I can ascertain, was consecrated by the pope himself at Lyonna, probably in the course of the year 1245. By this time the legate, William of Modena, had arrived also at the court of Rome, and was soon promoted to the episcopate of Salis. It was no easy matter to find a successor to a man who had played such a prominent part in the religious organization of the north—in Prussia, Livonia, Courland, and Estonia, and displayed as much zeal, independence, and energy in the most intricate affairs. The bishops of Prussia needed, above all, a man who had insight and influence enough to draw positive limits between the dioceses, and render final decisions in a number of concerns where no rules had as yet been agreed upon. In the year 1244, pope Innocent IV thought he had found such a person in the person of the admiral and lord of the diocese of Liebe, Eberhard—formerly bishop of Armg, livonia, and Estonia, and, still earlier, bishop of Prussia of Prussia, Livonia, and Estonia. That the new bishop might have an influence proportionate to his power, was formally committed to him by his episcopal see of Chios, of which he had just become vacant, and enjoined the bishop of Salzburg to deliver into the hands of the future bishop of Prussia, Livonia, and Estonia. Towards the end of April, 1246, the pope sent him the following letter:

"Be it therefore known to the people of Russia, and the church of Liebe: Forasmuch as there was no time left for the bishop of Prussia, Livonia, and Estonia, that the new bishop might have an influence proportionate to his power, was formally committed to him by his episcopal see of Chios, of which he had just become vacant, and enjoined the bishop of Salzburg to deliver into the hands of the future bishop of Prussia, Livonia, and Estonia. Towards the end of April, 1246, the pope sent him the following letter:

"Be it therefore known to the people of Russia, and the church of Liebe: Forasmuch as there was no time left for the bishop of Prussia, Livonia, and Estonia, to make use of it during his sojourn in Russia, and in the church of Liebe: But this right was not to be extended to the church of Liebe. At the same time Ebert wanted to return to Russia, to promote the fusion of the Russian and the Roman Church; and pope Innocent IV recommended to him also the goal of the Teutonic Order, and in such cases both parties were to express this in writing by appointing one of the priests of their order to one of the positions in the diocese. For the purpose of this mission, the pope took the administration of the diocese. The country had been devastated and neglected, was scantily populated, and churches were rare and separated by large intervals. The bishop had to induce colonists to settle in his diocese, and as the result of five or six years he could think of the establishment of a cathedral church. The cathedral was consecrated at Culf in 1247, and received the same of the Holy Trinity; at the same time a chapter was founded, under the rule of St. Augustine, and so richly endowed that, as soon as the remains of the bishop could be collected, a cathedral might be built. Besides the churches, the number of which was continually increasing in church and village, there were also the houses of the more important Augustinian, for instance, a Dominikan monastery at Culf, and a Franciscan cathedral of the bishops of Pomesania is little known in the first years of its existence: we only know that it had been possession of the Teutonic Order, An- selm, who had had a considerable share in the work of conversion and in the victories of the order. The division of the land was made in 1225: the bishop chose the middle part, in which the city of Brandenburg was situ- ated. Bishop Anselm displayed indefatigable activity in the discharge of his duties: took wise measures for the education of the clergy, and made provision for the admission of cripples, etc. The bishops of Prussia lived for a long time in very dis- trict, and owing to the seclusion of the city, Brandenburg, was situated. the countries of the Baltic a firmer support, bishop William of Sabina directed, in the pope's name, that the seat of church in Bremen, which was in many respects the most important and finest city in those parts. After the death of this bishop, in 1510, how- ever, it seems to have been vacant for a long time, and again in 1514, and perhaps even earlier, the See became vacant, in all other words, the Church of Bremen should become archiepiscopal, and be transferred to the Prussian territory, which could be ins- talled in the situation of the bishop of Riga, and the arch- bishop should exercise in his diocese only his archiepiscop- cal rights. It is true, bishop William of Sabina was appointed in 1514, and 1515, established himself in Livonia, and resigned into the hands of the

But in Prussia, his ordinances in ecclesiastical matters were not immediately carried out. The old, legal, and ancient rights of the church went on, with some obstacles: there were the liberties and privileges granted to the order by the popes; there were the privileges of the CHAPTERS, the rights of the bishops, the old feudal laws, with which they were in fact as old as the land itself. The grand-master of the Teutonic Order, margrave Albert von Brandenburg, endeavored in 1515 to shake off the control of the feudal enperors of the Teutonic Order, and the Hohen zu Brandenburg, according to Luther's advice, "the foolish, nonsensical rule of the order," taking a wise, and understanding Prussians a wisely principality, induced him, after the peace of Cracow, in 1525, to accept Prussia from the crown of Po- land as a new state.

Freeseing that an example so momentous to the ecclesiastical dignities of Germany could not but bring many advantages against him, duke Albert looked about for allies, married the daughter of the king of Denmark, in 1526, and, by promising Roman Catholic, entered into the closest relations with the Protestantism of Germany. Under the protection of King Sigismund of Poland he could stand firm. He could not have created a new state and of the members of the order, spoiled of their rights was just as ineffectual as the "Acht" pronounced against the Pope in 1520 by the Diet of Augsburg. In the next reign, the confusion increased: the countships of Ravensberg, the Mark, and Limburg, and the possession of the duchy of Prussia, now known as East Prussia, became incorporated with the Brandenburg territori

Prussia (1619-40), was distracted by the miseries of the Thirty Years' War, and the country was alternately the prey of the Bohemian and Dutch. In this, in the succession of George Wilhelm's son, the great elector Frederick William (1640-88), the electorate was reduced to the lowest depths of social misery and financial embarrassment. But so wise, prudent, and vigorous was the government of the prince, and so successful were his policies, that in 1660 the number of the population of one and a half million, and an area of 42,000 square miles, had been raised by his genius to the rank of a great European power ("chambery"). His successors, Frederick III (1688-113) and Frederick William I (1713-40), each in his own way increased the power and credit of Prussia, which had been united and strengthened to the title of a kingdom — a most significant change not only in the secular, but also in the ecclesiastical history of that country. Sweden had been at peace with the eminence of the Swedes had for a time the leading Protestant power in the North; Prus

3. Reformation Period. — The religious history of this early period of Prussia's aggrandizement is as full of interest as the secular. Its people, among whom, even in the 16th century, heathenish customs maintained their place side by side with Christian usages, were among the first to look upon the movement upon the new Gospel movement. The German order they had learned to despise, and, looking upon Christianity and knighthood as synonymous, they had steadfastly opposed conversion. But now, when a gospel was preached dispensing and opposing the papacy and all its agencies, the people became ready converts; and the princes, accepting this great popular movement as insurmountable, suffered themselves to be borne along with the tide. In Prussia the priests even favored the new departure. "From the success of the Reformation the princes expected the forfeited property of the Church, which their expected wives, and the people freedom." So says Marx (Ursachen der schnellen Verbreitung d. Ref, [Mayence, 1834]).

In Prussia, even the bishop of Samland, George of Polentz (q.v.), and soon afterwards Queis, bishop of Pomerania (q.v.), but the former finally placed himself at the head of it, and proclaimed on Christmas-day, 1529, in the cathedral of Königsberg, with great joy, that the Saviour had been born once more for his people. In 1525 the progress of the new opinion was so great that when the country was converted into a secular duchy the entire populace signified their cordial acquiescence, and rejoiced to rank themselves among the followers of Luther. A German liturgy was soon afterwards introduced, adhering as closely as might be to the ancient forms; the convents were changed into hospitals; and by the help of pastors (q.v.), or expository discourses on the epistles and gospels, regularly sent from Wittenberg, the doctrines of the clergy were kept in general harmony with each other, and also with the tenets advocated in the Lutheran metropolis. The two bishops, together with three evangelical pastors of the city of Brandenburg, Spiegler, Seren, and Ponander — had prepared a Church discipline (Lepold), and caused its adoption, under the title "Artikel der Cernemonien u. anderer Kirchenordnung," by Parliament (Landtag) in December, 1525. In 1540 the discipline was further augmented and ele in 1530 a confession of faith, consisting of eleven articles, was promulgated, under the title "Art domhill Locupletati," by a general synod at Königsberg. This was the first corpus doctrinale. While the "De Agudio Confusione" (published 1530-31), Albert sent for a copy and caused it to be introduced into the Prussian Church by episcopal decree. But in 1544 Al bert determined upon the future independence of the Prussian Church from Wittenberg, and to this end en courage the Reformation in Germany. It was to be a high school which was destined not only to play a great part in the history of Prussia and of Germany, but of Poland also; for from this university much Scriptural knowledge spread to Poland, and gave rise to a strong reformatory movement there (comp. Krasinski, Hist. of the Ref. in Poland, vol. 1., p. 178). This movement was the source of a very serious theological controversy, which came very near destroying the Protestant Church of Prussia and seriously damaging the evangelical cause in all Germany. We refer to the Osiaender (q.v.) controversy. It began in 1549. Osiaender was that year lecturing at Konigsberg de lege et evangelio, and next year de justificatione. He died in 1552, but his son law, Funk, continued to espouse Osiaender's views, and in the controversy which ensued so much bad blood was raised that in 1553 the leaders of opposition were obliged to leave the country; and the title turned against the Osiaandrians, Funk himself and two other leaders paid for their distinction with their lives, in 1556. See Funk; J. H.; Möhring, Joachim.

Duke Albert then set about restoring the peace of the Church, and thus himself able to undertake the far-reaching theological, anthropological, and soteriological questions which the Osiaender controversy had raised. He had as suddenly turned from one side to the other as the prosperity of the Church seemed to demand. He had unsettled all and settled none, but he had, at least, the satisfaction of seeing one good result from the agitation. It made evident the need of a generally accepted "Confession," and he intrusted its preparation to Möhring and Chemnitz, and in 1567 they brought out the Corpus Doctrinae Protestantiae, also called Reptatio Corporis Doctrinae Christianae, which became the symbolical text-book of Prussia. Although it had been intended to abide, so far as the cultus was concerned, by the regulations of 1544, a revision was called for after the publication of the Reptatio, and in 1568 was brought out another Kirchenordnung u. Ceresmonier wie es in Uebung geht (1568), with a number of commentaries.

In 1549 the reforming party in Prussia was greatly strengthened by the arrival of multitudes of Hokian brethren, who were ordered, under most severe penalties, to leave their country within forty-two days (May 4, 1548). Duke Albert offered them an asylum in his states, whither they migrated under the guidance of Mathias von Simson, the bishop of the whole community.

Polish or West Prussia, together with the minor states of Courland and Livonia, gradually underwent a similar transformation, owing to many favorable influences. Luther's pamphlets, exposing the weaknesses of the papacy and of Romanism, had free entrance in these countries. The bishop of Ermland, Fabian, not only raised no opposition himself, but, as the Romanists claim, was even anxious that the reform movement should succeed. Then the government of the Polish sovereign, Sigismund Augustus, by granting plenary freedom of religion to the town of Danzig, Thorn, and Glogau, gave a great step towards the triumph of Protestant opinions, which was effected about the year 1566. Germany, at last, had conquered for herself by the Reformation the valiant Prussians, and in the borders of Slav and Roman influence had firmly planted the seed of German culture and German Protestantism, which will never die out and spread so marvellously. The evangelical Church of Prussia, which was always after close intercourse and most active co-operation with German Protestantism, to which it owed its origin, had nevertheless its own peculiar formation, and took for its development its own peculiar way. Most remarkable is the fact that the prince under whom the Prussian evangelical Church first arose and lived itself to see it rooted and grounded in doctrine, cultus, and discipline. Duke Albert died March 20, 1568.

4. Modern Period.—Frederick I was distinguished for his rigid economy of the public money and an extraordinary penchant for tall soldiers, and left to his son, the great Frederick II, a compact and prosperous state, a well-disciplined army, and a sum of nearly nine million thalers in his treasury. Frederick II (1740-86) desperately availed himself of the extraordinary advantages of his position to raise Prussia to the rank of one of the great political powers of Europe. In the intervals between his great wars, he devoted all his energies to internal improvement, by encouraging agriculture, trade, and commerce, and reorganizing the military, financial, and judicial departments of the State. By his liberal views in regard to religion, science, and government, he inaugurated a system whose results reacted on the whole of Europe; and in Germany, more especially, he gave a new stimulus to thought, and roused the dormant patriotism of the people. Frederick was not over-scrupulous in his means of enlarging his dominions, and it is said that in 1743 he and the Archduke Joseph of Austria were the first to put an end to the partitions of Poland in 1772, when he obtained as his portion nearly all West Prussia and several other districts in East Prussia. His nephew and successor, Frederick William II (1786-97), aggrandized his kingdom by the second and third partitions of Poland in 1792 and 1795. Frederick William III (1797-1840), who had been educated under the direction of his grand-uncle Frederick the Great, succeeded his father in 1797, at a time of extreme difficulty, when Continental rulers had no choice beyond being the opponents, the tools, or the victims of French revolution. By endeavoring to maintain a neutral attitude, Prussia lost her political importance, and gained no real friends, but many covert enemies. But the calamities which this line of policy brought upon Prussia roused Frederick William from his apathy; and, with an energy, perseverance, and self-denial worthy of all praise, he devoted himself, with his minister, count Hardenberg, to the reorganization of the State.

In the ten years which succeeded the battle of Waterloo, Prussia underwent a complete reorganization. Treaties were concluded with various commercial treaties made with the maritime nations of the world; the formation of excellent roads, the establishment of steam and sailing packets on the great rivers, and, at a later period, the organization of the customs treaty, known as the Zollverein, between Prussia and the other states of Northern Germany, and through the formation of an extended network of railways. The most ample and liberal provision was made for the diffusion of education over every part of the kingdom and to every class.

In like manner, the established Protestant Church was enriched by the newly inaugurated system of government supervision, churches were built, the emoluments of the clergy were raised, and their dwellings improved; but, not content with that, the king wished to legislate for the Church in accordance with a set plan, and determined to force a union of the Lutherans and the Reformed, whose unhappy separation was painful to the devoted king. This union scheme was not new. A union tendency had shown itself early in the German Church, and attempts were made to bridge over the gulf by concordats, treaties. The union proposed in the Reformed in consequence of the differences on the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. The so-called Concordia of Wittenberg in 1536 and the Augusta Varista of 1540, with which also the Reformed Synod agreed, are properly regarded as the foundation of this. For nearly half a century, John Durm (died 1650), an eminently zealous and an apostle of union, travelled about for the accomplishment of his great object; but each of the three great Protestant churches—Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican—contended not only for a faith in the Christ revealed in the Scriptures, which was the only basis of their union instinctively by its dogmas, but for its ecclesiastical institutions which separated it from the others. An agreement for mutual ecclesiastical recognition (tolerantia ecclesiastica) was formed on the principles of Calvin at the religious conference at Cassel in 1661, and resulted in the transfer of the University of Rostock to the Reformed Church. But notwithstanding these concessions, which gave the appearance of a unionistic and tolerating tendency, the Lutheran divines, according to Tholuck, declared that they would rather hold communion with the pacifists, and regarded the hope that even Calvinists might be saved as a temptation of the devil (Gratet u. luth. Theol. Wittenberga, p. 115, 169, 211). Yet, after the Peace of Ryswick, when it became urgently important to have fraternal connections between the Protestant nations as a security against the dangerous exaltation of the Catholic powers, the house of Prussia took upon itself the task of adjusting the disunities which prevailed, principally among the Lutherans, by a union of the two Protestant churches. The elector John Sigismund of Brandenburg, while accepting the Reformed creed in 1614, did nevertheless adhere to the Augsburg Confession. His son, the Augsburg Confession, on the other hand, was an active supporter of the Hesian theologians at the Leipsic colloquium in 1631—and his successors, the princes of Brandenburg and Prussia, who remained in the Reformed communion, always cherished a desire to bring their evangelical people to a better understanding, and, if possible, a union in the government and worship of the churches. The appointment of a few bishops constituted a part of the ceremonial at the coronation of the first king of Prussia (1700), but this suggested the idea of a union by the introduction of the form of government which prevailed in the Anglican Church. Temples of peace and union churches were, however, consecrated in vain. Leibnitz succeeded in breaking off the negotiations. There was, none the less, full confidence that the object would one day be brought of itself to a successful conclusion.

The wars with France ended so favorably, the king thought the day auspicious for the consummation of the dream of his reigning anacy, and by royal decree of Sept. 27, 1817 (the Jubilee of the Reformation), king Frederick William III declared the union effected. But the various nationalities of the kingdom, the hostility in the Utopian union prescribed for them. New difficulties arose. The tendency to over-legislation was long the predominant evil feature of Prussian administration. The State, without regard to the incongruous elements of which it was composed, was divided and subdivided into governmental departments, which, in their turn, under some head or other, brought everyone individual act under governmental supervision, to the utter annihilation of political or mental independence. The people, when they gradually began to comprehend the nature of this administrative machinery, saw that it made no provision for political and civil liberty, and demanded of the king the fulfillment of the promise he had given in 1815 of establishing a representative constitution for the whole kingdom. This demand was evasively met by the king, who professed to take high religious views of his duty as a sovereign; its fruits were strenuous efforts on his part to check the spirit of liberalism. Every measure taken by other sovereigns to put down political movements was vigorously abetted by him. siding with the pietists of Germany, many of whom he cultivated, the Count officers and Landsknechte, or provincial estates, organized in accordance with the system of the Middle Ages, were the sole and adequate mode of representation granted to Prussia in that reign, notwithstanding the pledge made to the nation of a general representative form of government. A further attempt made forcibly to unite Lutheran and Reformed churches by royal decree of Feb.

PRUSSIA

28, 1834, excited universal indignation, while the imprisonment, at a later period, of the archbishops of Cologne and Gnesen for their conduct in regard to the vexed question of mixed marriages involved the king in a long and power struggle with the pope. In this issue of ecclesiastical regulations, the king was generally assisted by the gentle Altenstein, his minister for public worship, with whose preferences for the Hegelian philosophy in the Church and in the schools he was often displeased, but whom he never would quite abandon. When the powers of the Holy See were to be employed in Germany, it was the leaders of the Liberal movement who were the leaders of the Church. In 1817, a law was passed for the establishment of provincial consistories, whose duties were confined to matters exclusively spiritual, and did not include the location of clergymen; district and provincial synods, composed only of clergymen, and sequestered within a narrow circle of duties, but intended to be an introduction to an imperial synod; and a ministry for public worship, which was to be the organ through which the royal authority was exercised over the Church. The oath which the clergymen were to take bound them to be the servants of the State as well as of the Church. The development which had taken place in the principles of Protestantism, and the modes of speech occasioned by the new scientific and literary education of the people, next rendered some alteration of the language of the Church services necessary. New liturgies were therefore introduced into some established churches without attracting much attention. A common form of worship seemed to become necessary by the union which by the year 1821 had been outwardly effected. The theological commission appointed for composing such an instrument in Prussia accomplished nothing. The king then published an Agenda which had been adopted by his cabinet (1822) for the use of the court church, gave orders that it should be introduced into the garrison churches of his kingdom, and recommended it to all the churches of the realm; instead of the confessional and arbitrary forms which had previously been used in the different provinces. But it met with much opposition. The Reformed complained that it savored too much of the old ecclesiastical formula. They objected, too, to the burning of candles in broad daylight, and the kneeling and singing of the preacher before the altar, and the like, which seemed to them to betray a Roman Catholic spirit. The rigid Lutherans complained that it was not sufficiently orthodox, and was too much reformed. On the other hand, the adherents of the Evans of Hamburg, and it too orthodoxy, too much in sympathy with the old ecclesiasticists. They did not perceive in it their own theological opinions, but just the reverse; and it was from their standpoint that they very properly hesitated to make use of confessions and ceremonies with which they could connect no other sense than one contradictory to their convictions. Some, also, were displeased with a heterogeneous political element which they discovered in it. But no general opposition to it was apparent until the government took some steps to draw over the churches by various means or by coercion, and some authors contended that a strict conformity to the liturgy should be required by a law on the territorial system. In the midst of this confusion, no synodal constitution was carried into effect; for even the victorious political party took no pleasure in a measure which so forcibly reminded them of the promised representative system. It was only in Westphalia and the Rhenish provinces that a synodal form on the basis of ancient usages was introduced (1835), but even then there the system left as much to be desired as it actually fulfilled. The establishment of general superintendents (1829), with means at command for a very extensive sphere of personal influence, was looked upon as a restoration of the titular bishops to their former prelatical position, and hence as the commencement of a Protestant episcopacy. This movement became now legal, and the pastors and theologians promoted the different controversies in answering the question as to how far the king, as the prince of the country, was authorized in prescribing his ecclesiastical usages to the people and in foisting a particular service upon them. It was only after new negotiations and a new understanding of the question that consideration was shown for personal wishes and the traditions of the country, that the liturgy entered into full force (1830) as that of the United Evangelical State Church. By the union it was opposed even after this; and, as we have already seen, a second decree was necessary (1843) to enact the government's will as far as to the effort. The result was a public outbreak. In Silesia, especially, there was much trouble, and the refractory spirit assumed an alarming form. Removals, military force, and emigration were the sad results; and finally there were the proceedings of the synod, and the dissensions of the Lutherans themselves—some yielding to the force of circumstances, others pushing their cause to the utmost, and still others going to ruin in sectarianism. See Lutheranism.

The accession of Frederick William IV, in 1840, seemed to open a better prospect to the friends of constitutional freedom, but the reality was scarcely equal to the expectations which had been warranted by the professions of the government. Still, new hopes and requirements had been excited, and a new life was infused into every department of the State. Every branch of science and the arts of life was stimulated by the attentive consideration of the sovereign, who professed to be actuated by a love of universal progress. He made similar professions in regard to religious toleration, but the Pietistic tendencies of his government exerted a forced and prejudicial influence in public administration everywhere. The king, at an early period of his reign, the king had expressed his determination to allow the Church, over which the crown had acquired supreme power during the Reformation, freely to form for itself its own external organization, and to subside under the Protestant constitution, and to the province of the government, was in 1843, composed of the superintendents of each of the six eastern provinces, and a clergyman chosen from each diocese, the king called a General Synod at Berlin—not of representatives, but of distinguished persons in the Church, thirty-seven of whom were clergymen and thirty-eight were laymen. The synod held its sessions in public worship, during a session continued from June 2 to August 8, 1846, "this body," says Hase, "which made no pretensions to a legal authority, but had no restraint on the expression of its opinions, and acted on conclusions drawn therefrom, presented its views of the existing wants of the Church. Its plan for a future ecclesiastical constitution combined the consistorial administration proceeding directly from the crown with the synods proceeding directly from the congregations in regularly ascending circles. The assembly had not been convened without some reference to its nature, and only a single voice was raised in it in behalf of undisguised rationalism. But as the great majority there, as well as in the previous provincial synods, declared itself against not only unconditional freedom of instruction, but the compulsory obligations of creeds, the party led by the Evangelical Church Journal found itself in a decided minority. The moral impossibility of compelling men to adhere to the old creeds was conceded; and yet it was thought indispensable to the completion of the union that a confession of faith should be formed, to serve as a formula for instruction. But the confession then composed expressed only those sentiments which are essential to Protestant Christianity in Scriptural language, and without the precision of theological science. The orthodox minority (fifteen to forty-eight), therefore, had reason to complain, notwithstanding all that was said for their satisfaction at the adoption of the new confession was a virtual abrogation of the old. The only concession to those congregations and patrons who were especially attached to the Lutheran or the Reformed type of doctrine or worship was the assurance given them that they should have no immediately hostile persecution or interference in the legislation and existence of the union, to use their respective confessions, if they wished, in a regular manner, to bring those clergymen whom they called under obligation to some creed. But the orthodox opposition from without, in whose eyes such a body seemed a robber-synod, in which Christ was denied, was powerful enough, at least, to postpone the execution of these enactments, although the ecclesiastical authorities had given them a unanimous concurrence, and had pronounced them of urgent importance. The superior Consistory was the only court finally formed under them (January, 1848), but as this was not sustained by any contemporary synodal regulations, it was looked upon as a mere party authority.

While the government and the Church gained so little, the people became more and more restless. There was a general displeasure against the bureaucratic spirit of over-governing which characterized the administration and became daily more irksome to the nation. In the Church it resulted in the successful formation of free churches. Protestant communities espousing the interests of a rational form of Christianity, with the equalitarian excitement which had arisen in the Roman Catholic Church, as the result of the schismatic movement due to the stand taken by the chaplain Ronge on the exhibition of the so-called holy cloth (q.v.) at Treves, further complicated the ecclesiastical relations. In the State, revolution ensued. The king and his advisers, undertaking the importance of the movement of 1848 in Germany, thought they had satisfied the requirements of the hour by granting a few important reforms such as the abolition of guild ordinances. When at length, however, the citizens and troops came into collision, and blood was shed, Frederick William came forward as the proposed regenerator of his country, offering to lay down his royal title and merge his kingdom in the common fatherland, for the salvation of which, he recommended a confial union of all German princes and people in one bond, and proposing himself as the leader and guide of this new German. His own subjects, and at first many Germans in other states, were carried away by these Utopian schemes. The power and influence of public opinion in this liberal ministry, the recognition of a civic guard, the retirement of the prince of Prussia, the heir presumptive — with whom every arbitrary measure of government was believed to originate — and the summoning of a representative chamber to discuss the proposed constitution — all tended to lay aside the general discontent. But when the National Assembly at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, in 1831, in disregard of the wishes of the Prussian king, declined to accept his proffered services, and elected the archduke of Austria as lieutenant-general of Germany, his influence in the conduct of affairs ceased, his pledges to his own subjects were evaded as long and as completely as the occasion permitted, and his policy became more strongly tinged than before with the jealousy of Austria. His powerful co-operation in putting down the insurrection in Poland and the democratic party in Baden gave, however, ample proof of his determined opposition to every popular demonstration against absolutism. The only exception during his reign is the action of the Prussians in the war of the Slavonic Holstein duchies, when the Prussians, acting in concert with the Dutch and the United Provinces of the Netherlands, occupied the ducal provinces in the name and on behalf of the diet. But this was the work rather of him who is now emperor of Germany, and is capable of explanation even from a ultra-royalistic standpoint. The latter years of the reign of Frederick William IV were characterized by great advance in the material prosperity and internal improvement of the country. Extensive lines of railway and post-roads were opened, the river navigation was greatly facilitated, treaties of commerce were formed with foreign countries, great expansion was given to the Prussian and North German Zollverein, the army was put upon the modern footing with its unprecedented efficiency of arms and artillery, and the educational system of the country was still further developed. The political freedom of Prussia cannot, however, be said to have made equal advances. The Chambers which met for the discussion and framing of a constitutional mode of government were continually interrupted and obstructed in the prosecution of their task; and the constitution, which is now established by law, was modified every year between 1850 and 1867, until it may be said to retain few of its original features.

In the Church also the great storm of 1848 wrought destructively. An ecclesiastical administration became odious, and count Schwerin, the minister for public worship, saw himself obliged to keep watch over the actions of the consistory, which finally so displeased him that he dissolved the superior consistory. He then appointed a committee to devise a synodal constitution, to be submitted to an imperial synod which should soon after be convened, that thus the Church might construct her future organization for herself. The outline of the electoral law for the appointment of synods was published, and defended by the publication of a pamphlet on the ecclesiastical law. It proposed that the deputies should be elected by the congregations, but that the existing synods should be made use of in the western provinces, and that district and provincial synods should be arranged so as to serve for electoral bodies in the eastern. Before the appointed synod could have its meeting, the revolution was throttled, and the government again abandoned all these liberal measures. It even denounced the clamor for a synodal constitution as an ill-conceived fury of the people, and the statement of the reason why the people as a demigod of God (1). The constitution of Jan. 31, 1850, retained, with respect to religion, the whole essential spirit of the German fundamental laws. A collegiate supreme ecclesiastical council to decide internal affairs of the Church was formed by order of the king from the evangelical portion of the ministry of public worship, and a system of rules for the regulation of congregational affairs was bestowed upon the six eastern provinces. The supreme ecclesiastical council from that period governed the Church in the king's name, and Von der Goltz, as president of the council, in the presence of the Chambers, declared that the new doctrine was that the Evangelical Church exercises her constitutional right independently to regulate and administer her affairs, by entire separation from and consequent independence of the State, and by government according to her ancient constitution by the sovereign as her most prominent member. By this happy thought anxiety for the independence of the Church was tranquillized, and the Chambers succeeded in repelling all complaints about violations of those articles of the fundamental law of the nation which relate to the independence of the Evangelical Church. The plan for congregational government, which was looked upon as the basis of true ecclesiastical freedom, contained a suspicious limitation of the power of choosing the vestries and an extraordinary requisition that the private members should be bound by the three principles of the confession of the Reformation, and certain general laws for the Church which were yet unknown. In some of the eastern provinces this plan was protested against by parties opposed to each other, but it was at last gradually admitted into the constitution of Denmark, occupied the ducal provinces in the name and on behalf of the States. It was called the work of the regency of Frederick William IV, and is capable of explanation even from a ultra-royalistic standpoint. The latter years of the reign of Frederick William IV were characterized by great advance in the material political societies. These proceedings were partially confirmed by the judicial courts; but some measures of the police seemed so inconsistent with the freedom of conscience guaranteed by the fundamental laws that inquiries were instituted respecting them even in the Chambers (1852), where the government had avowed its determination to exterminate by every legal means the whole system of dissent. The supreme ecclesiastical council communicated all the free congregations, without reference to the various tendencies among them, and proscribed their baptism invalid, while the civil courts punished every official act of their ministers as an invasion of the clerical office. Still there was conflict between civil and ecclesiastical authorities, and the crown saw itself perplexed daily with the disadvantages of dissent. By royal edicts of March 6, 1852, and July 12, 1853, the union movement was again given a new lease of life, the king having determined to do away with religious differences among all Protestants. The result was far from gratifying. In the very next fall (October, 1853) Dr. Rupp started a new congregation, in which the Bible was accepted as the original source of truth, and the imitation of Christ was made the supreme end of life. All ecclesiasticism was ignored. In 1856 (Nov. 4-Dec. 5) a general conference assembled to remedy these dissensions, but it failed to do anything. The king remained summo episcopo, but the Protestants retained by the constitution of Jan. 31, 1850, tit. ii, art. 12, liberty of conscience, and the more recent immigrations from foreign lands have made Prussia the home of Protestants of all shades of religious opinion.

The obvious benefits of the presidential and synodal constitution in the Rhenish and Westphalian churches, the fuller co-operation there of ministers and elders, the greater activity of the laity, the room afforded for the exercise of discipline, the variety of home mission work, and the necessity for checking rapidly the rationalistic tendencies, which had given the Rhenish and Westphalian branch of the Prussian Church so great a power and influence, were so apparent that it would have been impossible for the leading authorities of the Prussian Church not to desire to extend this form of government, modified by the constitutional constitution, over all her old provinces. Consequently a royal order of June 29, 1850, introduced the institution of the general Church courts, and by another of Sept. 10, 1873, it became definitively the platform for the congregations and synods there, while an extended general synod for these provinces was announced. This synod was appointed by royal decree, to consist of the eleven general superintendents, of twelve deputies of the theological and the juridical faculties, of thirty members to be elected by the king, and of 150 members of the eight provincial synods, who were to be composed of not less than one third laity and one third ministers. This general synod met for the first time from Nov. 24, to Dec. 18, 1875. The new ecclesiastical constitution of Prussia provides for a regular meeting of this general body at the call of the king every six years, and is represented in it by the president of the Oberkirchenrath, the highest Church tribunal in the state. The jurisdiction and competency of the general synod, as summarized by a correspondent of The Central Christian Advocate, are shown by the following, which indicates also the nature of the connection between Church and State:

1. The general synod co-operates with the king's functions for promoting the interests of the State Church on the one hand and the ecclesiastical rights and ecclesiastical law on the other.

2. Laws enacted by the king, as head of the Church, must have its assent. It may also propose new measures, but there can be no laws, laid before the king for his assent until the ecclesiastic minister has examined them and found nothing incriminating to the interests of the State in them. It legislates exclusively on the amount of liberty of teaching within the Church; religious qualifications and ordination of the ministers and of the laymen of the ministry; liturgies, hymnals, and catechisms; holy days to be introduced or abolished; and the form of discipline for refractory Church members and ministers.

3. It controls the funds which the Oberkirchenrath had, and also the expenditure of the appropriations for the Church from the national treasury, which has been in the hands of the Church since 1817. Regular and periodical budgets upon the congregations for Church purposes can only be levied by its consent. It can substitute in the king's commissions (Oberkirchenrath and consistories) to greater activity by taking the initiative in proposing new measures as are conducive to the Church's welfare. The Oberkirchenrath cannot reject them without giving its motives. It preserves the union of the free churches by invoking any such conditions of a prominent synod as may be incompatible with the Church at large.

The Advocate continues as follows:

"The king, as summo episcopo, governs the Church indirectly through its consistories—one in each province—composed entirely of theologians, except the president, who is a layman elected by the Free Church, and directly through the Oberkirchenrath—the highest Church tribunal, in the state—to whose consistories are responsible.

Between the sessions of the general synod a cabinet, composed of seven members, carries out the measures of the general synod, and conforms with the Oberkirchenrath respecting new measures.

It is not difficult for the members of the Lutheran and the evangelical few Reformed churches in Prussia to meet in the same synods, because the union movement has not only given rise to a common legislative and administrative basis, but prepared the members and congregations, notwithstanding all the value they assign to theireditary distinctions, to feel the sense of that which they have in common than upon that on which they differ. The Lutheran churches have the Consistor Augustanae Incurantiae from June 25, 1580 (or the Augustanae Varianta from 1540), the Apologia Confessionis Augustanae, the Articuli Smalcaldici, the Confessionis Augustanae Minor and Major Lutheri, and the Confessio Concordiae (1577). The Reformed Church has the Heidelberg Catechism (1563), which it highly values. The authority of these creeds—the Minor Catechism and the Confession Augustana perhaps excepted—is not binding upon the synods, and so the same body, the Oberkirchenrath, whose only function is to give a declaration of allegiance to the symbols is expected from the young minister, so that some of the creeds have nearly disappeared. So thoroughly has the old spirit of division died out that there is no longer any opposition to communion of the two bodies in the same church. Nor is this practice confined to the United Church of Prussia; it is equally prevalent in the other union churches of Germany, in the former duchy of Nassau, in Anhalt-Bernburg, Dessau, Birkenfeld, Bades, in the former electorate of Hesse, in Saxe-Weimar; in some, as in the electoral Hesse, the differences between these provinces were behind the duchy of the grand-duchy of Hesse. In East Friesland the union has extended only to the government, and not to worship or doctrine. In Rhenish Bavaria, in the union deed, stress is laid on the common scriptural grounds of the common life of God's people. With the accession of king William I, Prussia's most brilliant page of history opens. The civil and ecclesiastical affairs of that country now became the history of a united, prosperous, and powerful people. Though Bismarck, as premier, himself controls pretty much all the essential ecclesiastical affairs of the state, the king is indicated by his lines of action a policy of absolutism and bureaucracy, time has unfolded a liberal and practical tendency in the government, and the only real opposition now encountered is from the low social democracy—in this country known as Communism—and from the ultra-Romish subjects, who wage war against the repressive measures adopted by the government against Ultramontanism and Jesuitism, because of the dangers they brood against the State. See Ultramontanism. The war of 1866 with Austria established the superiority of Prussia in Germany; the war with France in 1870 solidified the work of the intervening years, and gave to the little kingdom the imperial power on the 170th anniversary of the day when the elector of Brandenburg assumed the crown of Prussia.

II. Religion. From Statistics, and General History. According to the census of 1865, of the 28,818,470 inhabitants of Prussia, 18,244,405 returned themselves as belonging to the Evangelical National Church: of these, 13,266,620 are of the United Church, 2,905,250 Lutherans, and 465,129 of the Reformed Church. Of these latter, 24,580 are of the Reformed Church of Westphalia, 40,630 Lutherans, 33,000 Reformed, 7,518 Moravians, 3,028 Irvingites and Baptists, 36,668 Mennonites, 4693 Anglicans, Methodists, etc., 9,620,326 Catholics, 1487 Greek Church, 10,860 German Catholics, 21,825 Freethinkers, etc., 366,576 Jews, and 2584 of various other bodies. The Old Catholics are mentioned below. The Roman Catholic population of Prussia decreased so rapidly after the introduction of Protestantism that at the accession of Frederick II in 1740 there were only 50,000 Catholics in a population of 2,150,000 souls; the proportion of the Catholics to the Protestants was, in other words, one to forty-three. The kings did not recur to coercive measures, but the majority of the inhabitants of Prussia hated Romanism, and caused it to undergo heavy trials. When Prussia acquired Silesia, and after the division of Poland, it was less of a Protestant power. The number of the Catholics was so considerably increased, especially after the treaty of Lunéville (1801), that both communions were represented by nearly equal numbers. This was again changed by the treaty of Tilsit, the cession of Polish and Posen between 1795 and 1807 to Russia. At present the Evangelical Church constitutes a majority in the provinces of Schleswig-Holstein (99 per cent.), Pomerania (57), Brandenburg (95), Saxony (93), Hanover (87), Hesse-Nassau (70), and Prussia (70); the Roman Catholic Church in Hohenzollern (80 per cent.), the Rhine provinces (73), Posen (84), Westphalia (55), and Silesia (51). Of the Jews, fully one half live in the eastern (formerly Polish) provinces. The members of all churches recognised by the government enjoy equal civil rights. The Old Catholics (q.v.) have been recognised as a part of the Roman Catholic Church, and the bishop elected by them as a bishop of the Catholic Church. Other denominations (Baptists, Methodists, German Catholics, and Free Congregationalists) are barely tolerated, though the constitution guarantees full religious liberty. The Greek Church is also represented in Prussia. One of the Greek communities belongs to the Philippians (q.v.), a branch of the Greek Raskolniks, who seceded in the 17th century from the Orthodox Greek Church. Like the Mennonites, they refuse the military service. Their principal colony is at Alt-Utko, in the kingdom of the Grand Duke of Hesse-Cassel. The Greek government has restricted their privileges; they cannot increase their real estate, because the military service is in contradiction with their religious opinions. They are in consequence in a state of emigration, and their number decreases. Since 1830 there were 22 Greek churches. The Evangelical Churches of Jesus Christ are the subjects of the Roman Catholic Church is directed by the two archbishops of Poznan and Gnesen, and Cologne, under whom stand the four bishops of Culm, Minden, Paderborn, and Treves. The two episcopal sees of Breslau and Ermland are directly under the jurisdiction of the pope; while the diocese of Glatz, in Silesia, belongs to the archbishopric of Prague, and Katscher, in Upper Silesia, to that of Olmutz. In 1864 the Protestants had rather more than 3000 licensed places of worship, with 6500 ordained clergymen; and the Roman Catholic Church nearly 9000 churches and chapels, with upwards of 6000 priests. In 1867 there were 24,362 churches of all denominations, and 224 monastic or conventual establishments, with 5619 inmates, mostly devoted to purposes of education, or nursing the sick. 2. Education. — Education is compulsory in Prussia, and its management and direction are under the control of the State. In no country are better or cheaper means supplied for the diffusion of knowledge among all classes of the community. Prussia has nine universities, viz., Königsberg, Berlin, Halle, Heidelberg, Bonn, Kiel, Göttingen, Strasburg, and Marburg, with 12,823 students, and two Catholic colleges at Braunschweig and Minden. At the close of 1889 there were in Prussia 87,000 schools and educational establishments of every kind, exclusive of the universities; and of these 787 were colleges or gymnasia, about 1000 classical private schools, 58 normal, about 700 art, trade, and industrial schools, and about 50,000 private schools. The total number of teachers and about 4,000,000 scholars. (See below.) The management of the elementary national schools is in the hands of the local communities; but the State appoints the teachers, and in part pays their salaries, the remainder being supplied by the public. In addition to the libraries of the several universities, there is the Royal Library of Berlin, with 750,000 volumes and about 16,000 MSS. Among the numerous scientific, artistic, and literary schools and societies of Prussia, the following may be mentioned : the most distinguished: the Academy of Arts, founded in 1699; the Academy of Science; the Natural History, Geographical, and Polytectnic societies of Berlin; the Antiquarian Society of Stettin; the Breithaupt Natural History and Historical societies, etc. 3. Church. — Prussia has a large number of benevolent institutions, towards the maintenance of which the State gives annually about £16,000 sterling. In 1661 there were about 1000 public civil and military infirmaries, in which upwards of 170,000 patients were under treatment, and about 7700 nurses. In Prussia there are 7000 houses; while 800,000 poor received support through these institutions or by extra-religious charity. Prussia is supplied with asylums for the deaf and dumb, the blind and the maimed, and has good schools for training midwives, nurses, etc. 4. Churches. — We append a sketch of the principal German churches, because it will in some manner enrich the article, and will, besides, greatly add to what has been said in the article Germany. The sketch and the statistics are taken from the report of the Pan-Presbyterian Council in Edinburgh in 1877. 1. Constitution. — Each German state and each free city has a Church of its own, in which the royal magistrates, by whose cooperation the churches are reformed, have to some extent, since the Diet of Speyer in 1826, enjoyed the supreme administrative power. This power they generally exercise by proxy, i.e. through the minister of worship (Prussia, Baden, Saxony, Mecklenburg, Grand-duchy of Hesse, Mecklenburg, Würtemberg), in other cases through the Supreme Church Council, or Oberkircherrat (Prussia, 1849, 1860; Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 1849, Baden), or through the general superintendents, the consistory, and superintendents. To some extent, likewise, for the twenty-one German states which some governments have shared the administration of the Church with the district bishops, and general superintendents (Prussia, Württemberg, Baden, Bavaria, Oldenburg). This form of Church government is called the consistorial (Konsistorialreform). The German churches have derived much benefit from the breadth of the Church, and the requirement that each church exercise the right of control has often hindered the development of the energies, the liberality, and the practical sense of the lay element and the members of the congregations at large, as well as prevented the co-operation of the ministers and the people in Church work. Like the noble King Frederick William IV of Prussia, who longed to resign his episcopal functions into the proper hands, some of the best minds have felt the necessity of giving more self-government and liberty to the churches, and the presbyterian and synodal constitution in the newly developed form in which it has been given in Prussia is an endeavor in this direction. In some of the Reformed churches, as in the Palatinate, the mode of government is similar to that of the Lutheran churches; but in others the presbyterian and synodal constitution is adopted. The presbytery and synodal constitution was transplanted by fugitives, members of the French and Walloon congregations, who migrated to Prussia, where-butch John Calvinesque uses were accepted according to the form he had set up in East Friesland, to the lower part of the Rhine, to the duchies of Jülich, Cleves, Mark, and Berg, which make up the western half of Rhinish Prussia, and a part of Prussian Westphalia; it was adopted and developed in the Church of Weel (1626) and the Synod of Emden (1711), was introduced into the duchy of Nassau (Synod of Hildesheim, 1656), and with modifications in the 18th century, adopted even by the Lutherans in the territories of Cleves and Mark. This form of Church government was in 1835 confirmed by the Kirchenordnung for the churches in Rhein-
PRUSSIA

PRUSSIA

In Prussia and Westphalia. These churches, the Lutherans as well as the Reformed, are essentially Presbyterian. In the Lutheran parishes, each congregation has a body of elders and one deacon. The duty of the elders is, among other things, to watch over the spiritual welfare of the ministers, elders, and deacons. But despite the close relationship of the ministers, elders, and deacons, the congregation is the church body, and the clergy are elected from among the congregation. Besides the presbytery, there is, in larger congregations, a more numerous representative body (the Representatives), which varies according to the size of the congregation, and may amount to sixty, seventy, or more members. This body has the power to consult and deliberate in matters affecting the church. The members, especially the elders or deacons, are elected by the congregation. In the Reformed Calvinistic Lippe, for example, such a representative body was instituted besides the presbytery.

In each Prussian province there is a synod, and the Evangelical churches in the eight old provinces are again divided into synods under the presbyterian order. In the Synod of Rhenish Prussia, with its headquarters at Halle, there are 81 superintendents. In the other three synods there are 30 superintendents. Each minister has an average of 1511, each church 1116 Evangelical ministers, and 1516 superintendents.

1. Statistical Notices. (a.) Churchmen. (1) Evangelical Church. - In 1751, there were 1,771,711 Prussian Evangelicals, or 118,466 Evangelical parishes, 1,116 Evangelical ministers, and 164,859 electors of the Evangelical Church in Prussia. In 1867, there were 5,667,215 electors, or 1,013,859 Evangelical parishes, or 1,116 Evangelical ministers, and 164,859 electors. In 1867, there were 5,667,215 electors, or 1,013,859 Evangelical parishes, or 1,116 Evangelical ministers, and 164,859 electors.

2. Catholic Church. (a.) Roman Catholic. - The Roman Catholic Church in Bavaria is the Church of the Roman Catholic Church, with 183,611 parishes, and 1,116 Evangelical ministers; each has the average of 1,116 Evangelical ministers, and 164,859 electors. In the Synod of Rhenish Prussia, with its headquarters at Halle, there are 81 superintendents. In the other three synods there are 30 superintendents. Each minister has an average of 1511, each church 1116 Evangelical ministers, and 1516 superintendents.
In Bavaria, 16,110; in Hesse, 10,948; in Oldenburg, 2,449; in Württemberg, 2,352. Of these, 32 were in Prussia 32 congregations, 3,050 independent members, and 18,700 persons in Baden, 35 congregations, 4,571 independent members, and 14,500 persons in Saxony, 18,000 persons; in Germany, 15,000 independent members, 47,373 persons; 54 missionaries.

Universities.—In the winter session of 1875-76 there studied theology at Leipzig 357; at Tübingen 737; at Berlin 1,757; at Halle 746; at Bonn 46; at Münster 1; at Jena 56; at Strassburg 30; at Munich 46; at Konstanz 44; in Breisach, 39; Greifswald, 33; Kiel 32; Göttingen, 7; Heidelberg, 9, together 2,087. In the summer session of 1875 there were 1,037 students of the degree.

In the German Empire are 20 universities, which had in 1880, 48,580 students; the polytechnic schools had 860 students.

In the Russian universities, the academy at Munich, and the lyceum at Braunschweig, there were, in the winter session of 1875-76, 970 teachers and 8,926 students; in Berlin alone, 2,490; in Breisach, 1,219; in Göttingen, 991; in Halle, 854; in Bonn, 793; in Tübingen 25; 450 studied Evangelical theology, 274 Catholic theology, 4,385 law, 1,392 medicine, 1,044 philology; and besides the students, 2,024 bearers attended the lectures.

2. High Schools.—The kingdom of Prussia has, according to Dr. Wiese's historical statistical work on the higher education in Prussia, 182 Educational, 250 Catholic, 104 mixed, 337 Gymnasia, 36 Realschulen (in which languages, the arts, and sciences are taught)—17 Evangelical, 27 Catholic, 210 mixed. In the other middle-class or lower-class schools, provided with trade-schools, 91 seminaries for young teachers (61 Evangelical, 19 Catholic, 11 mixed), 57 schools for young ladies (the German term is used also for schools for girls), 35 institutions for the deaf and dumb, 14 for the blind, 5 social (or what are called social), 173 other schools—1,218 in all. Of these, 153 are in Berlin, 250 in the province of Brandenburg, 236 in Silesia, 236 in Hanover, 230 in Hesse-Nassau, and 123 in the Palatine. The number of gymnasia and Realschulen in these high schools amounted in 1874 to 128,000, of which the teachers of 69,890; the cost was 3,194,079.

3. Christian Associations.—(1) Mission to the Heathen. Germany has eight of the sixty-three Evangelical Mission Societies for the heathen, of which only the Moravian Mission stands in an immediate connection with the Church. Of the 539 mission stations and 1,133 mission societies, Germany supports 274 stations and 470 mission societies; Germany and German Switzerland, 593 mission societies. Germany contributed for mission purposes in 1872-73 £31,700.

In 1890 the German mission had— visit the people from house to house, go to the poor and the sick, help the ministers in large parishes, hold Bible-classes, sing in church, attend Sunday School and Young Men's Associations, and other meetings. The Evangelical Society has now 22 colporteurs and city missionaries, and some traveling preachers. It has in its last year begun popular apologetical lecture in large towns with much success, and it is quite certain that much more could be done by it if more money could be raised.

"It is encouraging to think that about 45 ordained ministers in the German Protestant Church in that province are in many ways corrupt and unfaithful. They objected particularly to the Lutheran view of the sacraments, altars, images, and candles which the Lutherans retain; to the prevalent neglect of the doctrine of redemption, and the rejection of the king as chief bishop of the church. Not being prepared to join the Reformed Church of East Prussia, in consequence of their principles, and for fear of censures and discipline, they formed themselves into the Free Evangelical Church of Germany. There are ministers of this Church, who have just formed themselves into a presbytery. There are deacons and elders in the congregations, and a presbyterical conference has adopted the Westminster Shorter Catechism. The members of this church aim at the conversion both of Jews and Gentiles. The church has been fostered by one, himself a convert of the Jewish mission at Breslau, who takes a deep interest in Jewish missions."

Prynne, William, famous in the history of English Puritanism, was born of a good family at Swanswick, in Somersetshire, 1600, and became a barister-at-law and member of Lincoln's Inn at the time when Dr. Preston, a celebrated Puritan divine, was lecturer there. It was the period when the illegal operations of the Star-chamber and the courts of high commission had reduced England to a despotism equal to that of France, while the manners of the age were a scandal to religion and good morals. Marshal, Manton, Calamy, Burton, and other divines in London kept alive the spirit of earnest piety and love of freedom which soon after produced the Commonwealth, when the mere sight of Burton, as Neale remarks, was a sermon against oppression. Prynne was a person of sour temper and austere practices, remarkable for his indefatigable devotion to his book, and the same severity appears in his reports of his time, and he never practiced at the bar to any considerable extent. He applied himself principally to the study of controversial divinity, and became a devoted follower of Dr. John Preston (q. v.). In ac-accordance with the doctrines of the Puritans respecting religious freedom, he opposed the Courts of Oyer and Terminer, to which some of his friends came to Lincoln's Inn, several tracts against Arminianism and against prelatical jurisdiction, by which, as well as by promoting and encouraging motions in the superior courts for prohibitions to the High Commission Court, he greatly exasperated archbishop Laud and the clergy against him. He was himself universally regarded as Prynne was as unspiritual in his religion, and as unsympathizing with the amenities of human nature. He tried all things by the dry logic which was to him all-sufficient. Sometimes he would find a terrible sin in the wearing of long curls—love-locks, as they were called—by men, sometimes in wrong opinions on the subject of predestination. In 1632 he suddenly made his appearance with a virulent treatise entitled Hiatri-mastik, or a Scourge of the Stage-players, a tedious work of more than a thousand pages, full of learning and curious quotations, and written against plays, masks, dancing, and especially against women-actors. There was much room for the scourge of the satirist in the degraded state of the morals of the stage. Vile indecency tainted the highest dramatic efforts of the time, and no man of sense had ever been introduced upon the stage unless they were smothered in a foul moras of seething corruption. But Prynne's work was too severe and too general in its sweeping denun-ciations to convince any one not convinced already. Bringing every challenge under the sun to the players indifferently, he held them responsible for every sin which the pages of history revealed to have been committed by their predecessors in Greece or Rome; but all this could not have brought the sad consequences that followed. Some passages in this work were supposed to be leveled against the queen, who had acted in a pastoral performed at Somerset House; and the language of the book was certainly, like most others of that age, anything but refined and complimentary. The real cause of offence, in the eyes of the archbishop Laud, who originated the prosecution against Prynne, was, of course, far other than this libellous matter—namely, the oppression of Prynne and his entire party to the Arminian system and the jurisdiction of the bishops. The information included both the aspersions of the author against the queen and the lords of the council in the divination of the stationers, and his commendation of "factious persons." The cause was tried before the Star-chamber, and the condemnation of Prynne was a matter of course. After a full hearing, he was sentenced to have his book burnt by the common hangman, to be debarred from all public service, and turned out of the society of Lincoln's Inn, to be degraded at Oxford, to stand twice in the pillory at Westminster and Cheapside, and to lose one of his ears at each place, to pay a fine of £2000, and then to be imprisoned for life. This must have been a moderate sentence in the eyes of some of the lords of the council, for the earl of Dorset addressed the prisoner in these words: "Mr. Prynne, I declare you to be a schis-maker in the Church, a sedition-sower in the commonwealth, a wolf in sheep's clothing; in a word, the name of avaricious sanguinary. I shall fine him £10,000, which is more than he is worth, yet less than he deserves. I will not set him at liberty, no more than a plagiarist, or a mad dog, who, though he can't bite, will foame. He is so far from being a social soul that he is not a reponsible man. He is no son of Coriolanus to give the spirit of prey as wolves and tigers like himself; therefore, I condemn him to perpetual imprisonment: and for corporal punishment I should have him branded in the forehead, slit in the nose, and have his ears chopped off."

Prynne's sentence, outrageous as it was, under the current general relation which it would have called forth two or three years later. The final of Court, who had been rouzed by his wholesale condemnation of the drama to spend thousands of pounds on a gorgeous mask, which they presented to the king, and some who afterwards took the foremost part in resistance to the court, joined now in approval of their master's easement. The Prince of Wales, who lived at his new house in the City of London, had nothing to do with Pryne's enormous folly, however, in nowise tamel this most obstinate and narrow-minded of men. Three years afterwards, while in the Tower under the above sentence, he issued from its walls a new tract, attacking the bishops as elevating vultures and lords of Lucifer. It was entitled "News from Ypresich," and sorely reflected upon Laud and the hierarchy generally. For this publication he was again prosecuted in the Star-chamber, and sentenced to pay a fine of £5000, to be set in the pillory, to be branded on both cheeks with the letters S. and L. (Seditionis Libeller), to lose the remainder of his ears, and to be closely imprisoned for life in Caernarvon Castle. The usual consequence of undue severity appeared in the popular sympathy and party spirit which these outrageous sentences excited. The Puritan friends of Pryneocked to Caernarvon Castle in such numbers that it was thought unnecessary to change the scene of his confinement; and after he had been at Caernarvon about ten weeks, he was illegally removed, by a warrant from the lords of the council, to the castle of the Monte Orgueil, in the island of Jersey. Here he remained until the beginning of the Long Parliament, and then, upon his petition to the House of Commons, he was released by a warrant from the Speaker, and resolutions were passed declaring, very truly, both the sentences against him in the Star-chamber to be contrary to law. Clarendon and Anthony Wood describe the extraordinary demonstrations of popular feeling in his favor on his landing at Southampton and on his journey to London ("History of the Rebellion," i, 199; "Athena Ozonienese," iii, 848). Soon afterwards he was returned as a member of Parliament for Newport, in Cardiff, and about the same time he made a benefice at Lincoln's Inn. Besides, Parliament voted him, and the famous preacher Burton, and the physician Bastwick, two Puritans who were included with Pryne, money in compensation; but this they never got, in consequence of the disturbed state of the times. One of the principal fruits of this high-handed proceeding of the law was the raising of the nation to indignant protests against those in authority, and preparing the way for the changes of government that ensued; yet to the credit of Pryne he said that, notwithstanding all the injustice done to him, he was well satisfied with the result. He took no part in the violent proceedings of the later years of the Long Parliament. Quite to the contrary, immediately before the king's trial Pryne was ordered into the custody of the sergeant-at-arms for "denying the supremacy of Parliament" in a pamphlet entitled "The Memento" (Rushworth, "Collections," ii, 1389). On Dec. 6 he was arrested by the army, and, together with many of his party, ejected from the House of Commons. From this time he became a bitter enemy of Cromwell and the army party; and in consequence of his writings against them, he was again imprisoned for several years at Dunster Castle, in Somersetshire, and Pendennis Castle, in Cornwall. He was expressly disabled by Parliament "to officiate or be in any office concerning the administration of justice within the commonwealth." In the early part of the year 1660, having returned to his seat in the House of Commons as an excluded member, he is said, in a letter to General Monk (Winwood, "Memo- rials," vol. iii), to have "exceedingly asserted the king's right," but with so much of his characteristic bitterness and arrogance that Monk sent for him and admonished him to be quiet. Upon the dissolution of the Parliament, in March, 1660, he was elected to serve in the new Parliament for the city of Bath. Soon after the Restoration he was appointed keeper of the records in the Tower, an office for which his habits of study peculiarly fitted him, and which furnished him with the opportunity of compiling his laborious and useful collections respecting constitutional and parliamentary history. He died in that office in 1669. Wood calculates that he wrote a sheet of MS. for every day of his lifetime at that occupation. His custom was, when he studied, to put on a long quted cap, which came an inch over his eyes, serving as an umbrella, to defend them from too much light; and seldom eating a dinner, would every three hours or more be munching a roll of bread, and would read and then refresh his exhausted spirits with ale. To this (says the editor of Neale) Butler seems to allude in his address to his muse: 'Thou that with ale or viler liquors Didst quench Thine Withers, Pryne's Pears, And teach them, though it were in spite Of nature and their stars, to write.'

Prytanæum (pripæz) was the common house of an ancient Greek city or state in which a sacred fire was kept constantly burning in honor of Vesta. It was an appropriate building, where, in the name of the city or state, the magistrates, known as the Prytanes, brought suitable offerings to the venerable goddess. The fire-service observed in honor of Vesta was distinguished by the name of Prytanemis. The temple which was called prytanæum was of a round form, in order, as some have supposed, to represent the figure of the earth, and, according to others, to represent the centre of the universe. "It was called a "march through to the reign of Eliyas,' says the same writer, 'that Numa built the temple of Vesta, where the perpetual fire was to be kept, in an orbicular form, not intending to represent the figure of the earth, as if that was meant by Vesta, but the frame of the universe, in the centre of which the Pythagoreans place the element of fire, and give it the name of Vesta and Unity, because they suppose not to be without motion, nor situated in the centre of the world, but to make its revolution round the sphere of fire, being neither one of the most valuable nor principal parts of the great machine. Plato, too, in his old age, was reported to have been of the same opinion, assigning the earth a different situation from the centre, and leaving that, as the place of honor, to a nobler element." If the sacred fire in the prytanæum was accidentally extinguished, or even if it continued burning, the vestal virgins invariably renewed it every year on the calends of March by collecting the solar rays in a concave vessel of brass. From the fire which was kept burning in the prytanæum of the parent state, the sacred fire was supplied to each of its colonies or auxilia. Thucydides says that, before the time of Theseus, a prytanæum was to be found in every city or state of Attica. The prytanæum of Athens was originally built on the Acropolis, but afterwards it stood near the agora, or forum.

Psalm. See PSEDOMY; PALMS, BOOK OF.

Psalmenazar, George, a remarkable impostor in the religious and literary world, was born, probably, in the year 1650, and was of French origin. He received emotion, we do not restrict it to praise, although praise is the most natural and prominent form of it. Deep sorrow and earnest prayer may also find their fitting expression in musical song. Augustine thus defines the meaning of a liturgical hymn: "Hymnus est cantus cum laude Dei; si cantus est et non laudas Deum, non dicis hymnum; si laudas aliquid quod non pertinet ad laudem Dei, non dicis hymnum" (Ps. citiviii). Church song is restricted to lyrical poetry, for this alone can express the untrammeled emotion of a congregation. It excludes, therefore, didactic poetry, which expounds doctrine or analyzes feelings or incites duties; and it excludes dramatic poetry, which expresses passion by action. It is also more than mere lyrical poetry: it is lyrical poetry which assumes the pure truth of God, and gives expression to the deep religious feeling which it excites. A hymn is an outburst of religious life.

In its form, worship-song may be either rhetorical or metrical; the former was its primitive and more uncultivated form; the latter is its subsequent and more artistic form. The former is exemplified in the Hebrew psalms and the Greek Christian hymns; the latter in the Latin hymns of Ambrose and Gregory, and in the subsequent hymnology of the Western Church. Each of these requires a special treatment. The rhetorical hymn, a musical and ad libitum recitative, closing with a cadence, technically known as a "chant": the metrical hymn, a metrical tune. The anthem differs from both, in that it consists of certain rhetorical or metrical words set to specific music, which seeks to bring out their special emphasis, and is incapable of being used to any other. The anthem is, characteristically, the performance of choirs, and not the worship of the congregation. In public worship, sacred song may be either the singing of a choir to which the congregation are auditors, or the union of the entire body of worshippers, the choir and organ simply leading and accompanying it. Without denying to the former the character of worship, it is obvious that it is worship only in a very restricted and imperfect sense. It is worship of a much higher and more catholic character for the whole congregation to unite in the utterance of religious feeling. Hence, as a rule, no composition should be allowed in congregational worship too artistic or too intricate for congregational use. On the other hand, every kind of composition is legitimate that a congregation can use, which in the unison or by parts, expresses the emotions of its spiritual life. Neither rhetorical psalm nor metrical hymn has any natural or legislative prerogative or sacredness in the Church of God.

The manner of singing, again, whether unisonal, as in the early Church, or in parts, as in the modern Church; whether antiphonal, between choir and congregation, or between one part of the congregation and another, as in many of the Jewish psalms, or universal and continuous by the whole congregation, is immaterial, so long as the best expression of religious feeling is secured.

In the Bible, the use and importance of sacred song are fully recognised, and large provision for it is made. The earliest fragment of song in the Bible is not sacred. Lament expresses himself in a snatch of song which has all the characteristics of later Temple poetry.

The Jews seem almost to have restricted their use of poetry and music to divine worship, probably because their theocracy so identified their national and their religious life as that the expression of the one was the expression of the other. Music and song were joined in every way: there was no such thing as a mass-sung liturgy. This is the earliest specimen of choral song that the world possesses. It was probably sung antiphonally—Miriam and the women on the one side, answered by Moses and the men on the other.

We have minute accounts of the musical service of the Tabernacle and of the Temple, as recorded by David and Solomon; and especially of the great musical celebration at the dedication of the latter, when we are told that Jehovah especially responded to the invocation of worshipping song (2 Chron. v, 12-14).

Beyond all question the Temple service was the most magnificent choral worship that the world has seen. On great occasions the choir consisted of four thousand singers and players (1 Chron. xxviii, 5; xxv); the statements of Josephus (Ant. viii, 3) are evidently greatly exaggerated. Its psalmody would consist, first, of such compositions as had been written by Moses and others, with those of David, Asaph, etc. Some of David's early psalms seem to have been adapted for Temple use (comp. Ps. xviii with 2 Sam. xxii). Others were doubtless composed specially for it. Hence most of David's psalms, in the collection of Hebrew poetry so designated, are inscribed "To the chief Musician." From time to time fresh contributions of sacred song would be made. As we possess it, the book of Psalms was certainly not the Temple psalter. It is a collection, or rather a combination of four or five separate collections, of Hebrew poetry, both lyric and didactic, containing the Temple psalms, but containing also many pieces neither meant nor fit for being sung. Hence the ritual and religious absurdity of singing indiscriminately through the whole. Hippolytus, writing in the 3rd century, assigns the various characters of the collection as a reason why no author's name is affixed to it (Hippolytus On the Psalms, quoted by Bunsen, Christianity and Mankind, i, 458; see also ibid, ii, 176; Josephus, Ant. vii, 12, 3).

From the structure of some of the psalms, as well as from some expressions contained in them, it is certain that they were sung antiphonally, probably by two choirs responding to each other. Some of the psalms, the 24th, for instance, were evidently alternated between the priests and the people. Among the various suppositions concerning the meaning of the word "Selah," one is that it is the sign of a great chorus-shout of the people. See also 1 Sam. xviii, 6; Neh. ix; Ezra iii, 10; Ps. vi, 1-3; bishop Louth On Hebrew Poetry, lect. xix; Wheatley On the Common Prayer, ch. iii, § 9.

From 1 Chron. xxv, 7 it appears that Church music in Egypt was formally taught in the Jewish schools. The re-establishment of the East is implied in the ironical request of the Babylonians that their poor captives would "sing them one of the songs of Zion."

It is to be observed that the singing of the Temple was not part of the Levitical ritual; it was a fitting worship, independent of the specific economy with which it was connected. It has, therefore, a certain permanent authority as a scriptural precedent of worship-song.

Concerning the music used in the Jewish Temple we have no certain traditions. The various musical accents in the book of Psalms is unknown. Carl Engel (Music of the most Ancient Nations, ch. vi) supposes that the musical system of the Hebrews, as indeed of all the East, was derived from the Assyrians, concerning whose musical knowledge, hitherto unsuspected, much interesting information has been derived from the sculptures discovered by Mr. Layard and Mr. Botta. It is probable that David, who was musician as well as poet, composed music for the use of his psalms in public worship. From the structure of Hebrew poetry, this would be impossible, and yet there would be a music hinted at or "chant;" and as adapted for the use of worshipping thousands, it would probably be very simple in character. Whether the Jews had any form of written music or not, or whether the music of their Temple psalms was transferred or transmitted from generation to generation, is unknown. Certainly no trace of written music has come down to us. It is... to be presumed that the music originally set to David's psalms would be perpetuated from age to age; and that therefore the music to which our Lord and his disciples sang the Hallel (the "laudation on which he was betrayed," and the music to which Paul and Silas sang their prison songs, would be the old traditional Temple music. The tradition is that the Peregrine Tone was the music to which the lesser Hallel was sung. All this, however, is pure conjecture. There is not a particle of historical proof to throw light upon it. Nor is this to be wondered at, considering the dispersions and the unparalleled sufferings of the Jews, and when it is remembered that we are equally ignorant of the music of the Greeks and the Romans.

At the dispersion, Temple-song ceased. Burney says, some Hebrew high-priest being his informant, "that all instrumental, and even vocal performances have been banished from the synagogue ever since the destruction of Jerusalem; that the little singing now in use there is an innovation and a modern license; for the Jews, from a passage in one of the prophets, think it unlawful, or at least unfit, to sing or rejoice before the coming of the Messiah, till they when they are bound to mourn and repent in silence" (Hist. of Music, i. 251). It is probable, however, that although at the dispersion the Temple music was discontinued, yet that synagogue worship would be speedily restored, and that, as far as possible, its services would be based upon the old Temple prayers and psalms, and that the traditional melodies of the latter would be sung to them.

The characteristic uninspired psalmody of the synagogue is not earlier than the 10th century, when San- dadiah Gaon first introduced rhymed into Hebrew poetry. On this subject, see Prayers of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews, with English Translation, by the Rev. D. A. de Sola; Steinschneider, Jeth. Lit. (Lond. 1857); Charal, Jewish Lit. from the 9th to the 18th Century, ch. xviii.

No existing Jewish melodies can be proved to be of any antiquity, compared with some Christian melodies. Purely traditional, their origin is unknown. The most that can be said is that for some four or five centuries they have been handed down memoriter. As we possess them they are unmistakable in modern forms; but then it is possible that beneath these modern forms there may be a very ancient substance. The H. D. A. de Sola (Ancient Melodies of the Liturgy of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews) says that a tradition exists that the "Birchat Cohanim" is identical with the melody used in the Temple for the blessing of the priests (Numb. vi. 22-25), and that it is supported by great probability, almost amounting to direct proof. The "Ysra" is the other supposed to be the melody sung by Miriam. But this is pure conjecture. See also Maimonides, ch. xiv, § 14; Lightfoot, Temple Service; Bingham, Antiquities, vol. xiv; Carl Engel, Music of the most Ancient Nations, ch. vi.

In the Sept., the word פסנוץ and its cognates are used as representing several Hebrew words; but in almost every case the reference is to songs of praise or thanksgiving to God. In the New Test. this is the variable usage of the terms.

In the Christian Scriptures very little is said concerning sacred song. Matthew and Mark very touchingly record the conformity of our Lord, not to any divine command, but to a traditional custom, when he and his disciples, after the institution of the Supper, "sang a hymn" (γενέστηκας) before they went out to the Mount of Olives (Matt. xxvi. 30; Mark xiv. 26). There is every reason to believe that what was sung on this occasion was the latter part of the Hallel, the usual Pasover psalms of thanksgiving (Psa. cxxv - cxviii). See Hallel. When Paul and Silas were imprisoned at Philippi, at midnight they praised and sang praises unto God (Acts xvi. 25). Whether what they sang were some of the ancient psalms or spontaneous utterances of adoration and worship we have no means of determining. See Hymns. In his epistles to the Ephesians (v. 19) and to the Colossians (iii. 16), the apostle Paul recognizes and enjoins the use of sacred songs of praise, as a means of sanctification. Other passages of the New Testament, such as those in Hebrews and others suppose that such passages as Acts iv. 24-30 are fragments of apostolic hymns. The Apostles' Creed contains some of the most magnificent bursts of worship-song. In the passages just cited of Ephesians and Colossians the apostle enjoins the use of hymns in the social worship of Christians, clasping, with them the psalms and spiritual songs (ψαλμοι καὶ ἵμνοι καὶ ἥμνους πνευματικοὺς). In what relation these stood to each other is a question which has occasioned considerable differences of opinion. According to some, the distinction between them was one of form, having respect to the manner in which they were sung; while others contend that the source whence they were derived, and the general character of the composition; determined the difference between them. Under these opinions, endless differences of minor opinion have been advocated. Of those who adopt the first opinion is St. Jerome, who thinks that the hymn was devoted to the celebration of the divine majesty and goodness, that the psalm was occupied with themes of an ethical nature, and that the musical style was more as above, and the sublime discussion of the concert of the world, and the order and concord of creation (Comment. in Epis. v. 19). Others, again, who hold the same general view state the difference thus: The psalm belongs to other dimensions of faith, as setting forth redemption, to theodicy; and the ode, as celebrating the works of God in creation and providence, to natural science (Thomasius, In Profectionum, p. 255). All this, however, is purely arbitrary. The second opinion was held by Augustine, Basil, Hilary, and others of the Christian fathers, and has been adopted by several in more recent times. By some who take this view, the distinction is supposed to lie in this, that the ψαλμοὶ were compositions which were chanted to the accompaniment of an instrument, the ψαλτὶς, the εὐαγγελία, the ἵμνοι songs of adoration uttered by the voice alone, and the ψαλτὴς, short chants uttered also by the voice (Augustine, Enarrat. in Ps. iu. 3; Basil. Mag. In Ps. xix.; Greg. Nyss. Tr. ii in Psalmos, ch. iii, etc.) while others think that the distinction is to be determined by reference to the Hebrew terminology בֵּית הַגּוֹתִּים, בֵּית הַנּוֹחֵי, יִשְׂרָאֵל, which is in fact determining nothing, as the distinction between these is itself entirely uncertain. The third opinion is that of Bena (Nov. Test. ad loc.) and Grotius (Comment. ad Matt. xxvi), who think that by psalms are designated the sacred songs bearing that name collectively in the Old-Test. sense; by hymns such extemporary songs of praise as we have in the utterances of Deborah, Hannah, Zacharias, and Mary, and such as the apostle and his companion sang in the prison at Philippi; and by odes premeditated compositions of a more elaborate nature and stricter form than hymns. To this, in the general, most subsequent inquirers have given their consent; only some think that the term "psalms" should not be restricted to the composition bearing that name in the Old-Test., but should be extended to all of a similar character which might be composed for the use of the Church in later times; and that by "spiritual odes" are to be understood specifically all sacred songs, of whatever kind, composed by special inspiration of the Holy Ghost (Stenerius).

The form of this modifications is rendered almost imperative by 1 Cor. xiv. 26; and the latter by the general sense of the adjective πνευματικὸς in the New Test. Not a few, despairing of satisfactorily discriminating these three kinds of sacred song, have contended that the psalms are merely an edifice of song, and a mask of force, and that no distinction between them is to be sought (Clem. Alex. Paedag. ii, 4, 565; Cericens, In Not. epist. Hesychios, ad loc., etc.); but this otolose method of disposing of the difficulty has been repulsed by most.

For all these early hymns of the Church were composed, we have no means of even approaching a certain conclusion. Among the Jewish Christians the chanting of the psalms was familiar, and it would be easy for them to compose hymns that could be sung to their accustomed tunes; but with the Gentile converts it would be somewhat different. Among the Greeks and Romans poetry had fixed metrical forms, to which the tunes of the Hebrews could not be adapted. There is no reason, however, to believe that the early Gentile Christians followed these metrical forms in their aspired poetry. The Chryselephantine says:—

"The hymn to Christ, preserved by Clemens of Alexandria; the evening hymn, referred to by Basil as in his time very ancient, handed down from the fathers (De Spir. Sanct. c. 29); and the morning hymn, which has been incorporated with the liturgy of the Church of England—have no traces of a metrical character, but are, like the Biblical hymns, adapted only for being chanted in recitative with a few and simple cadences."

Such singing would no doubt be in keeping with the Gentile converts, but it would be speedily learned; and as they probably had very little sacred music of their own, they would haul with delight this accession to their sources of enjoyment, which served at the same time as a vehicle of the Gospel doctrine which had been kindled within them.

It has been suggested that in I Cor. xii. we have an apostolic hymn, and in Eph. v. 14; 1 Tim. iii, 16; James i, 17; Rev. i. s, 6; xv. 8, etc., fragments of hymns sung in the apostolic churches; but this is mere conjecture, though not without some probability.

The early Christians used the Jewish psalms in their worship, which would almost certainly be sung to their traditional Temple music. G. B. Martini says (Storia della Musica, i, 551):—

"This is the Hebrew chant of the psalmody which ever since the time of David and Solomon has been transmitted from one generation to another, and [therefore] goes beyond the first half of the first age of the Church. These have not materially varied, but have been substantially preserved by the Hebrew nation. Is it not, then, sufficient to convince us that the psalmsongs as brought up in the customs of their nation, went to frequent the Temple and engage in the prayers and divine praises therein recited—should retain the same method and use the same chants with which the people used to respond to the Levitical choir."

Förkel (Geschichte der Musik, ii, 188.) says:—

"The most common modes of singing with cantillation or chant has been adopted in the Christian Church from the Temple, and is still preserved in the mode of chanting the collects, responses, etc."

See also Dr. Schlabitz, Geschichte und Würdigung der Musik bei den Hebrewern, p. 61.

Thus, while the destruction of the Temple and the dispersion of the Jews suspended Jewish worship, the singing of the psalms and the traditions of their melodies would be preserved in the Christian Church. If, therefore, we possess any vestiges of Jewish music at all, they are to be found in the Ambrosian or Gregorian tunes. The Rev. J. W. Blakeley (Four Months in Algeria, p. 36) visited a synagogue in Algiers, and was surprised to find that:—

"the air to which the psalms were chanted coincided almost exactly with one of the Gregorian tunes." Hardly can we suppose that the early Christians either originated a new music or adopted heathen music.

We have no record of the introduction into the Christian Church of uninspired hymnody. It would be only very gradual that Greek hymns, with corresponding music, would come into use. At first, probably, Christian hymns would be little more than cantos of the Hebrew psalms, or evangelical imitations of them, or compositions after their model—the angels' song at the nativity, and the songs of Zacharias and Simeon leading the way. The earliest Christian hymns seem to have been simple glorifications of Christ.

Eusebius intimates that private individuals wrote hymns to Christ as God, which were generally sung (H. E. v. 38; vii. 24; ii. 17). In his letter to Trajan, Pliny says, "The Christians are accustomed to sing alternately between themselves, and to praise Christ as a god" (Pliny, Epist. lib. x, ep. 93), alluding probably to the Gloria in Excelsis, the morning hymn of the early Church.

The earliest extant fragment of Greek hymnody is found in the Antiphonary of Alexandria (E. P. p. 312, 313, Potter's ed.). Bunsen says, however, that this was never used in the public worship of the Church (Christianity and Mankind, i, 156).

Three early Christian hymns are preserved in the venerable Alexandrian MS. as an appendix to the Old-Test. psalms. The first is the morning hymn of the primitive Church, commencing with the introductory verse of the nativity song of the angels, hence called the Angelical Doxology. It is found in the liturgy of the Greek Church, whence, about the year 500, it was transferred by the Emperor Justinian to the communion service of the Latin Church; thence again to the communion service of the English Church.

The other two are another short morning hymn in which the verse occurs, "Vouchsafe, O Lord, to keep us this day without sin," afterwards incorporated in the Te Deum; and an evening psalm, consisting of a cento of verses of the Old-Test. psalms.

Besides these, there is an evening hymn of the Greek Christians, "Τυμχος του λαμπρου," the "Hymn of the Kindling of the Lamp," corresponding to the "Ave Maria" hymns of Italy, concerning which Basil says, it is "so ancient that he knows not who is the author of it" (Bingham, bk. xiii, ch. v, § 5, 6).

The Ter Sanctus, or Serapheric Hymn, also belongs to the first three centuries, and is found in almost all the ancient liturgies. It is little more than the Trisagium of the seraphim in Isa. vi. See Palmer, Origines Liturgici, ii, 126.

These are the only fragments of Greek hymnody that have been preserved to us. Of course they are rhythmical, and would require a rhythmical tune or chant. Much of early Christian hymnody has probably antiquity (Sozocrates, H. E. vi, 8; Theodorot, H. E. ii, 24; as also Hahn, Ueber den Gesang in der Syrischen Kirche, p. 54).

The hymnody of the Syrian churches was much more copious. They had an ampler music and poets of higher inspiration. Its invention is attributed to Ephraem Syrianus (Ephraem Syrus), and the traditional form, with cantillation or chant has been adopted in the Christian Church from the Temple, and is still preserved in the mode of chanting the collects, responses, etc. See also Dr. Schlabitz, Geschichte und Würdigung der Musik bei den Hebrewern, p. 61.

Great use was made of hymnody by the early heretics; by the Gnostic Bardians, who endeavored to supersede the Hebrew Psalms by one of his own, containing also 150 psalms (Theodorot, Heret. Fab. 269); by Paul of Samosata, who largely beguiled the faithful by his captivating hymns (H. E. vii, 30); and by the Donatists in Africa, who adapted their hymns to common airs of a wild and passionate charac-
PSALMODY

Psalms were often sung as part of the liturgy, with the Psalter being a central text. The Psalter, or collection of Psalms, was central to the liturgical and devotional life of the Church.

The Psalms were used in various ways:
- As a basis for religious songs and hymns.
- As a form of private prayer.
- As a source of inspiration for moral and ethical living.

The use of the Psalms in the liturgy was significant:
- They were used during Holy Week, particularly on Good Friday.
- They were sung during the Mass, particularly before the consecration of the Eucharist.

The Psalms were also used in various forms of devotion:
- The Psalter was used for devotional reading and meditation.
- The Psalms were sung in various forms of devotional song, such as the Responsorial Psalm.

The use of the Psalms in the Church was significant because it helped to unite the faithful in the expression of their faith. The Psalms were a way of expressing the praises of God, and the singing of the Psalms was a way of expressing the joy and gratitude of the Church.

The Psalms were also used in various forms of liturgical reform:
- During the time of the Council of Trent, the use of the Psalms was emphasized as a means of reforming the liturgy.
- The Psalms were used as a way of promoting the use of vernacular languages in the liturgy.

The Psalms were a central part of the liturgical and devotional life of the Church, and their use was significant in the expression of the faith of the Church.

For more information on the Psalter, see the book "The Psalter in the Latin Church" by John B. Haggard, or the book "The Psalter in the English Church" by John H.格雷尔. Both books provide a comprehensive study of the Psalter and its use in the liturgy of the Church. some and meaning; thereby pleasing the ear, without raising the affections of the soul. Thus the Egyptian abbot Pambo, in the 4th century, inveighed against the introduction of heathen melodies into the psalmody of the Church. About this time Church music began to be sung in various churches of the Eastern Church, not in the Psalter and canonical singers, Church choristers were appointed, who sang sometimes alone, sometimes inter changeably with the choirs of the congregation. In the 6th century the custom began to be introduced into some churches of having a single person lead the psalmody, who began the verse, and the people joined in the close. See ACHOSTIC; HYPOSTASMA. This individual was called the phonous or precentor, and he was mentioned by Athanasius as existing in his time in the Church of Alexandria. But difficulties and abuses arose from the growing neglect of musical culti vation; and, with a view of restoring public decency and order, the Council of Laodicea, in the year 363, considered it necessary to forbid the laity to sing in church at all, except in certain simple chants of a popu lar description. One principal reason was probably the adoption of the Arians of hymnology as a means of spreading their heresy. At first the difficulty had been overcome by providing similar compositions for the orthodox. Augustine himself made a psalm of many parts, in imitation of the 119th, to preserve his people from the heresy of the Donatists. Ambrose likewise made many hymns, which were sung in their respective churches. (A complete collection of all the ancient hymns, etc., in use in the different services of the Romish Church has been published by Hermann Adalbert Daniel, entitled Thestaurus Hymnologicus, etc. [Halle, 1841 sq.] Down to the Reformation, the music of the Church was thus pretty much surrendered to the clergy and trained musicians, and there were obstacles besides the moral influences of the Church. The words of the songs were in Latin, and the music was of a nature so elaborately complex that none could take part in it unless they had studied music as a science. Yet psalmody was not entirely lost during the dark ages. The study of sacred music received peculiar attention in the 6th century, schools for instruction in this important art having been established and patronized by Gregory the Great, under whom they obtained great celebrity. From these schools originated the famous Gregorian Chant, which the choir and people sang in church. Such was the simplicity of this system, and at length became common in various parts of Europe, particularly in France and Germany. The prior, or principal, of these schools was held in high estimation, and possessed extensive information. In the 8th century pope Adrian, in return for the services which he had rendered to the pope, had paid a visit to Rome, where he kept Easter with the pope, received from the hands of his holiness the Roman Apsiphon, which was presented to him, and which was brought into his dominions. About the end of this century all opposition to cathedral music ceased, and for several centuries thereafter Church music underwent little or no change in the Church of Rome. It is a remarkable fact, however, that from the 8th till the middle of the 13th century, not only was it considered a necessary part of clerical education to understand the principles of harmony and the rudiments of singing, but the clergy were generally proficient both in vocal and instrument al music.

The Eastern Church, where sacred music, as we have seen, had its origin, there arose in the 8th century a remarkable man, John of Damascus (q.v.), who was not only a noted theologian, but a most accomplished musician. On account of his great skill in the art of vocal music, he was usually styled Melodos. To this noted master of music the Eastern Church is indebted for those beautiful airs to which the Psalms of David are sung in our day. The Greek word ψαλμός is applied among the Greeks of modern times exclusively to sacred music, which in the Eastern Church has never been any other than vocal, instrumental music being unknown in that Church, as it was in the Western Church. Sir John Hawkins, following the Roman writers in his erudite work on the History of Music, makes pope Vitalian, in A.D. 660, the first who introduced organs into churches. But students of ecclesiastical and general archeology are generally agreed that instrumental music was not used in churches till a much later date; for Thomas Aquinas, A.D. 1250, has these remarkable words: "Our Church does not use musical instruments, as harps and psalteries, to praise God withal, that she may not seem to Judeize." From this passage we are surely warranted in concluding that there was no ecclesiastical use of organs in the time of Aquinas. It is alleged that Marius Sanutus, who lived about A.D. 1290, was the first that brought the use of wind-instruments into churches, and hence he received the name of Torellus. In the East, the organ was in use in the emperor's courts, probably from the time of Julian, but never has either the organ or any other instrument been employed in public worship in Eastern churches; nor is mention of instrumental music found in all their liturgies, ancient or modern. Towards the time of the Reformation, a number of sacred music from abroad Europe, owing, as is generally supposed, to the encouragement which pope Leo X gave to the cultivation of art. It is no doubt true that Leo was himself a skilful musician, and attached a high importance to the art as lending interest, solemnity, and effect to the devotional services of the Roman Church. But to no single individual can be traced the prevailing love for sacred music in the 16th century, for, besides Leo X, we find Charles V in Germany, Francis I in France, and Henry VIII in England, all countenancing sacred music, and treating musicians with great respect.

At the Reformation a greater part of the services of the Romish Church was sung to musical notes, and on the occasion of great festivals the choral service was performed with great pomp by a numerous choir of men and boys. That abuses of the most flagrant kind had found their way into this department of Romish worship is beyond a doubt, as the Council of Trent found it necessary to issue a decree on the subject, in which they plainly state that in the celebration of the mass, hymns, antiphons, and other orders of chant were inserted into the service, and given great scandal to professors of the truth. By this decree of the council, while it arranged the choral service on a proper footing, freeing it from all extraneous matter, gave it also a sanction which it had hitherto wanted. From this time the Church of Rome began to display that profound veneration for choral music which she has continued to manifest down to the present day.

The Reformers, observing the excessive attention paid to musical services, endeavored to return to the more orderly and public, the plainness of spoong music, and to make the services of the Church more conformable to the simplicity of primitive times. There had previously been repeated efforts at such a transformation. "The Albigenses, during the hottest season of persecution, are stated to have solaced themselves, in the very prospect of death, with singing the psalms and hymns of their Church. Psalmody was cherished by the disciples of Wycliffe. The Bohemian Brethren published a handbook with musical notes, from which it appears that the melodies they used originated in the chants to which the ancient Latin hymns of the Western Church were sung" (Conder, The Poet of the Sanctuary, p. 6). That psalmody was cultivated to the persecutors of Huss's teaching is evident from the fact that a large manuscript collection of their psalms and hymnus is preserved in the library of Geneva (Monastier, Hist. de L'Eglise Vaudoise, i, 124). But it was the Reformation in the 16th century which restored to the people their right to participate in this primitive and edifying part of public worship. Psalm-singing was taken up by the Reformers, first for private devotion, and soon as a part of the service of the Church, Luther and Calvin restoring to the people the right of participating in public worship, and furnishing them with the means of performing it. From the time that psalm-singing was adopted by the Reformers, it was disowned by the Roman Catholics, and soon came to be regarded as a badge of Protestantism. Metrical versions of the Psalms of David were executed in the principal vernacular languages of Europe; and some of the venerable Reformers were regarded as having applied themselves to the study of music in order that they might be enabled to compose plain and solemn tunes in which all would be able to join. The melody qualified for leading the first psalmody of the Reformation. Not only was he a great poet and musician, but he was full of fervid spiritual life. His hymnology, and that of his confreres—Hans Sachs, Michael Weiss, Johann Kugelmann, Johann Schop, Johann Grtiger, Paul Spenerius, Justus Jonas, Nicholas Decius, and other contemporary divines and Reformers—were characterized and illustrated by some dozen magnificent chorals, which excited great enthusiasm. But psalmody, in the more modern sense, began in the 16th century, when Clement Marot, the courtier of Francis I. of France, translated fifty-two of the Psalms into French verse, dedicating them both to his royal master—whom he likened to the Hebrew psalmist—and to the ladies of France. The sacred song-book, on its first appearance, not being accompanied by music, it became the practice to sing the psalms to favorite tunes—often those of popular ballads, and for a considerable time psalm-singing became a favorite fashion among the gay courtiers of Francis. Marot's collection was continued and concluded by Theodore Beza, the psalm which had the advantage of being set to music. Beza having in this the assistance of Calvin, who secured the best composers of the day to unite his sacred songs with beautiful and simple airs of a devotional character. Luther and Calvin differed, however, in their ideal of psalmody: the former was favorable to harmony in parts, while the latter confined himself to the bare, unaccompanied melody. In 1526 Luther published his first Salmus Book for the Congregation, which was printed by Joseph Klug in Wittenberg, whence it was also called the Klugsche. This collection contained most of Luther's hymns, which may be read in an English rendering in Luther as a Hymnist (by the Rev. B. Pick, Phils., 1875).

Prior to Luther, the Moravian Brethren had published a collection of hymns (1504) compiled by their archbishop, Lucas—the first example of a hymn-book constructed of original compositions in the vernacular to be found in any Western nation which has since assumed the supremacy of Rome. Some of its hymns, composed in the Bohemian and German languages, are of older date than the Reformation, and were highly commended by Luther himself for their scriptural and devotional character. In the renewed Church of the Brethren psalms and hymns continue to form an integral part of every religious service. Count Zinzendorf, who eminently contributed to its revival in 1722, was himself a Christian poet of no common order. The German hymn-book in general use among the churches of the Brethren was completed in 1778 by bishop Gregor, and has passed through numerous editions: it contains many hymns derived from the Lutheran Church, and some even from the primitive Christian Church. Some of the best hymns in this collection have been translated into English verse, and, with the addition of some, the English hymn-book constitute the hymn-book now in use among the congregations of the Brethren in this country. The latest edition, comprising 1260 hymns, is entitled Liturgy and Hymns of the Protestant Church of the United Brethren [Lond. 1849, 8vo]. The liturgy of the Church, and the number of hymns, were limited to the Psalms. As early as 1542 the La Forme des prières et Chants... qui sont dans la Manière, etc., by Marot, was published. This collection contained only twenty-five psalms, to which Theodore Beza added several others. In 1561, at the command of the council, the reformers appeared, with the title and the title of their edition, the first printed edition of the complete Psalms in verse appeared in France in 1561, with the royal privilege, and 10,000 copies were immediately dispersed. These were speedily set to music, and were generally sung in the Protestant churches of France, Geneva, and French Switzerland, notwithstanding their condemnation by the college of the Sorbonne. Some expressions having become obsolete, the task of retouching them was undertaken, first by Valentine Convart, the first secretary of the French Academy, and by one of the elders of the church at Charlemont; and afterwards by the pastors of Geneva, who revised their undertaking, and almost restored the work of Marot and Beza. So dear, however, was the memory of these first two poets of the French Reformation that it was found necessary to preserve the names of their stanzas and the quantity of syllables of their rhymes, and the ancient form of the 16th century is to this day adapted to the singing of the revised and corrected psalms (Musée des Protestant Célèbres, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 11, 12). Of late years the Protestant churches in France have paid much attention to the improvement of their psalmody. To the metrical version of Marot and Beza they have added collections of hymns, with music, for various occasions. The French version of Marot and Beza was translated into Dutch metre by Peter Dathan, pastor of the first Reformed church of Frankfort-on-Main, about the year 1660, and adapted to the French tunes and measure. A new Flemish metrical version of the Psalms was executed by Philip de Marnix, lord of St. Aldegonde. A Bohemian version by Stryx, said to be of high merit, was published in 1590; and a Polish version by Bernard W מוי olanka, of Cracow, was printed at Bresz, in Lithuania, about the year 1563, under the auspices of prince Radziwili (Bayle, Dictionnaire, par Des Maizeux, iv. 124; Milner, Life of Dr. Isaac Watts, p. 350, note). What Marot and Beza were to the Reformed Churches of France and Friesland was to the Reformed Church of Germany, German Switzerland, and Holland. None of the strictly Calvinistic communities have a hymn-book daring back to the Reformation. David's Psalter was the first hymn-book of the Reformed or Genevan Church. The book of Psalms, the first and only hymn-book published by any of the churches in France, Switzerland, Holland, Italy, Germany, and Scotland, adapted to grave and solemn music, in metrical translations, whose one aim and glory were to render into measure which could be sung the very words of the old psalms, was translated for the Church of England, by Myles Coverdale, bishop of Exeter, during the reign of king Edward VI. 1 published a metrical version of thirteen Goatsly Psalms and Spiritual Songs drawn out of the Holy Scripture. The first verse of each psalm is accompanied by an English hymn, and all the verses of the English hymn are such that they were designed to be sung (Coverdale's Remains, p. 533). The next attempt to verify the Psalms in English was made by Thomas Sternhold, a native of Hampshire, groom of the robes to king Henry VIII and to king Edward VI, who published nineteen psalms, most probably in 1549. This translation received a certain disapprobation by many of the clergy, who looked upon it as done in opposition to the practice of chanting the psalms in the cathedrals. It was increased to thirty-six by 1558, which was the year in which they were translated by John Hopkins; to eighty-seven, most probably in 1561, by Sternhold and Hopkins; and in 1563 was published the entire book of Psalms, translated by Sternhold, Hopkins, and others. This version seems to have been authoritatively intoned and into the service of the Reformed Church of England, being sanctioned both by the crown and convocation; and it soon became exceedingly popular.

Vocal psalmody was soon after introduced into the church service, the choral mode of singing being still retained in cathedrals. This has since been maintained, and the liturgical hymns being retained in the Prayer-book. Public singing of psalms by the whole congregation began in the month of September, 1559, at the parish church of St. Antholin, in the city of London, whence it spread first into the neighboring churches, and from thence into distant towns. Bishop Jewell, in a letter to Peter Martyr, dated March 5, 1560, says: "You may sometimes see at Paul's Cross, after the service, six thousand persons, old and young, of both sexes, all singing together and praising God" (Zurck Letters, p. 71). Although the practice was very prevalent in the principality of Wales, we39;re well aware that the old version was published with the royal license, by archbishop Parker (1560), Henry Dod (1603), George With (1623), King James I (1631), and George Sands (1631), the "old version" of Sternhold and Hopkins continued to be used, and have been translated into the Mohawk language, but no large opposition. The following year, the book was published, and into the language of the Munceys, a native tribe of North Americans, by the Rev. Richard Flood, a missionary to them from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Admiringly as many of the psalms are adapted to general use in public worship, it was yet felt, in the English churches, that some other metrical expressions of those astonishing hopes and consoling promises which the new dispensation has given to man in the N. T. would not be altogether inappropriate. The great German Reformer had written hymns, and many of the other Continental divines of the revived faith in Christ had done likewise. Yet no English People's Hymn-book was brought out until the closing years of the 18th century, i.e. none that was placed on cottage tables beside the Bible, and none for use when Christmas trees and chanted beside the grave, although they had the Te Deum and Magnificat and the Psalms. Bishop Malby published A Selection of Psalms and Hymns before his elevation to the episcopate. Various selections were made and published by various dissenting bodies (as it appears) since the year 1770, and these selections are derived from Dr. Watts's Imitation of the Psalms of David in the Language of the New Testament (1707), and from his Hymns (1719); the Hymns of the Rev. Dr. Doddridge; those of the Rev. John Newton; and the sacred compositions dispersed through the works of the British poets of the 18th century. The Wesleys, however—so it seems—were the first who really gave a People's Hymn-book to England, unless that of Dr. Watts, published about the beginning of the 18th century (in 1709), may be called so. "To Dr. Watts," says a modern biographer, "must be assigned the praise of beginning, in our language, a class of productions which have taken a decided hold upon the universal religious mind. On this account Christian worshippers of every denomination, and of every English-speaking land, owe him an incalculable debt of gratitude. Mason, Baxter, and others had preceded Watts as hymn-writers; but their hymns were not used in public worship. Prejudice prevented the use of anything beyond the Psalms, and those not yet in their Christian rendering; but Watts made the Christian hymn part of modern public worship." As a supplement to Dr. Watts's hymns, Dr. Doddridge published a collection entitled Hymn Founded on Various Texts in the Holy Scriptures (1755). After these came the two Wessleys, whose hymns are sung up to this day, and John Newton and Cowper, who produced the Olney Hymn-book.

Of the state of psalmody among the Puritans at the close of the 17th and the first part of the 18th century, we have no certain information. During the commonwealth, William Barton published a metrical version in 1644, reprinted in 1645 with the license of the Protector Cromwell. This version was received with much favor, and appears to have retained its popularity for many years. In 1646, Francis Roux, the Presbyterian provost of Eton College, published his version of the psalms, sanctioned by the imprimatur of the House of Commons, in pursuance of the recommendation of the Westminster assembly of divines. This version was subsequently revised by William Barton for the optional use of churches in England; but it never became popular. But the greatest improvement in psalmody, not merely among Protestant dissenters, but among all English congregations, was effected by the two Mr. W., that is, Mr. W. Doddridge, and Mr. Rev. Dr. Hodges. For a just appreciation of the value of his publication the reader is necessitatedly referred to Mr. Conder's Poet of the Sanctuary, pp. 48-105, in which work will be found notices of some eminent versifiers of psalms and hymns, both Episcopalian and Nonconformist, who preceeded Dr. Watts. The best compositions of the learned and pious friend the Rev. Dr. Doddridge, are found in every selection of psalms and hymns which has been published since the year 1770. All the great bodies of dissenters from the Church of England now have denominational hymn-books, containing the best versions or imitations of the Psalms of David, together with hymns selected from the most eminent modern devotional poets.

A curious controversy on psalmody arose among the dissenters in the end of the 17th century. Whether singing in public worship had been partially discontinued during the times of persecution to avoid informers, or whether the miserable manner in which it was performed gave persons a distaste for it, it appears that in 1691, Mr. Benjamin Keach published a tract entitled The Breach Repaired in God's Worship; or, Psalms, Hymns, etc., proved to be a Holy Ordinance of Jesus Christ. To us it may seem strange that such a point should be disputed; but Mr. Keach was obliged to labor earnestly, and with a great deal of prudence and caution, to obtain the consent of his people to sing a hymn at the time of the Lord's Supper. Six years more, they agreed to sing on the thanksgiving-days; but it required still fourteen years more before he could persuade them to sing every Lord's-day, and then it was only after the last prayer, that those who chose might withdraw without joining in it! Nor did even this satisfy these scrupulous consciences: for, after all, a separation took place, and the inharmonious seceders formed a new church in May's Pond, where it was above twenty years longer before the praises of God were to be sung. Dr. Watts endeavored, during this period to believe it; but Mr. Ivimey quotes Mr. Crosby as saying that Mr. Keach's was the first church in which psalm-singing was introduced. This remark, however, must probably be confined to the Baptist churches. The Presbyterians, it seems, were not quite so unmusical; for the Directory of the Westminster divines distinctly stated that "it is the duty of Christians to praise God publicly by singing of psalms together in the congregation." And besides the old Scotch Psalms, Dr. John Patrick, of the Charter-house, wrote which were in very general use among dissenters, Presbyterians, and Independents before it was superseded by the far superior compositions of Dr. Watts. These Psalms, however, like those of the English and Scotch Establishment, were dawdrled out in notes of equal length, without accent or variety. Even the introduction of the triple-paced tunes, probably about the time of Dr. Watts's psalms, gave also great offence to some people, because it marked the accent of the measure. Old Mr. Thomas Bradbury used to call this time "a long leg and a short one." The beautiful compositions of Dr. Watts, the Wessleys, and others produced a revolution in modern psalmody. The versions of the Psalms, and many excellent collections of hymns, are now in use, and may be considered as highly important gifts bestowed upon the modern Church of God.

In Scotland, the early Reformers, while they banished instrumental music from churches, paid great attention to singing. In John Knox's Psalter, arranged for use in churches, the metrical psalms are set to music in harmony of four parts. Several early translations of the Psalms were produced in North Britain, that of Sternhold and Hopkins was used in worship from 1561 down to the middle of the 17th century. In 1632 an attempt was made by Charles I to supersede it by King James's version was more resolutely and decidedly opposed than in England. During the commonwealth, the opinion of the Presbytery of State was Gaits. The probably a reference made to them in August, 1649, issued on the 23rd of November following their decision in favor of the revised version of Francis Roux, a member of Cromwell's council, which Parliament had in vain endeavored to bring into general use in England. It was adopted by the Synod of State and was the only version of the Psalms for the Kirk of Scotland, not only in congregations, but also in families. Though somewhat rough and uncouth, it is sometimes expressive and forcible, and perhaps nearer the original than any other metrical translation of the Psalms. A few paraphrases and hymns have since been added, by authority of the General Assembly, and form together the psalmody in use in Presbyterian worship in Scotland. In 1706 the assembly commended the Scripture songs of Mr. Patrick Symson for use in private families; and to prepare them for public use the act was renewed in the following year, and in 1708 the commission was authorized to compare the remarks of presbyteries on these songs. Thus matters passed on for years. In 1742 the assembly anew expressed a wish for an addition to the psalmody, and in 1744 a new and fuller collection was made, twenty-two being added to the previous forty-five selections. This collection, though never formally sanctioned by the assembly, is that now in use and printed along with the Psalms in the Scottish Bible. After the Reformation, a new hymnbook was adopted in 1561. In 1564 a committee of the General Assembly, duly empowered, published a selection of Paraphrases in Verses; Several Passages of Scripture, to be sung in Churches. It retained, in substance, the translations which had been published in 1745, under the authority of the General Assembly, and which had been in use in several churches; and a considerable number of new paraphrases were added, chiefly from the psalms or hymns of Mr. Watts, Doddridge, and Blacklock, and Mr. Logan. In 1747 a sufficient version of the psalmody of the Church of Scotland, in the Gaelic language, was made by the Rev. John Smith, by whom it was revised and published in 1783. From 1807 to 1842 the subject of a revision of the metrical psalms was before every assembly. Sir Walter Scott, when appointed to work on the project, "for the Psalms," said he, "often possessed a rude sort of majesty, which would be ill exchanged for mere elegance." In 1869 an addition to a collection of paraphrases was published by the General Assembly. The Relief Synod published a Hymn Book in 1824, and a new version of the Psalms in 1822. The Burgher branch of the Secession had, in 1748, requested Ralph Earkine, the author of the Gospel Hymns, to undertake the duty of enlarging the psalmody, but the proposal led to no result. The United Presbyterian Church, after some years' preparation, published, in 1851, a hymn-book for the use of their churches. The most of the paraphrases are incorporated into it. In addition to what is stated in the previous portion of this article about psalmody in Scotland, it may be mentioned that there was published at the period of the Reformation a Compendious Book of Godly and Spiritual Songs. Many of these are not sung or used now. Many are confounding songs (prophane satan) metamorphosed. The Koshmic clergy published a canon against this book—such was its popularity—and the fifth Parliament of queen Mary passed an act against such rhymes.

The first song ascribe to Almighty God in the English language, on our New-England coast, was raised by the Pilgrim fathers when they landed on Plymouth Rock. Cold, ice-bound, without a roof over their heads, they remembered their first Sabbath-day to keep it holy— 10 of December, on the Sabbath day, were rested; is the simple and impressive record of their journal.

"A mid the storm they sang,
And the stars heard, and the sea,
And the sounding aisles of the dim woods rang
With the anthem of the free."

As the first book ever printed with movable metal types was the Bible, so, as if to keep up the sacred parallel on this continent, the first book printed here was a portion of the inspired volume "done into metre." The first volume of Psalms was put up at Cambridge in 1638, by Stephen Day. His first book was The Psalms in Metre, faithfully translated for the use and edification of the saints in public and private, especially in New England (printed at Cambridge in 1640). This version was made from the Hebrew by Thomas Wolfe, of Roxbury; Richard Mather, of Dorchester; and John Eliot, the Apostle of the Indians. They were a committee appointed by the Congregational or Independent churches as early as 1638. In their preface they say, "We have respected rather a plain translation than to smooth our verses with the sweetness of any paraphrase, and so have attended to conscience rather than to elegance, and fidelity rather than poetry, in translating Hebrew words into English language and David's poetry into English metre." Three hundred acres of land were granted to Stephen Day, "being the first that set up printing." Eliot's Indian Bible, in the Nipmuck language, was printed at Cambridge in 1668, the whole of the type being set up by an Indian, and the Psalms "done in common metre"—of which the first verse from the 19th Psalm may suffice as a specimen—

<4Koov-kokottamahmon God ssussoummoom Mmamahheekeekew kurnunthkon Gohana kunnouk.>

1718 Dr. Cotton Mather issued his Psalterium Americanum: the Book of Psalms in a translation exactly conformed unto the original, but all in blank verse, fitted unto tunes commonly used in our churches. From this curious book we extract a few lines, as printed:

"PSALM XXXII.—A Psalm of David.

1. My Shepherd is th' eternal God: I shall not be in any want.

2. In pastures of a tender grass; He [even] makes me to lie down in green pastures; He leadeth me beside still waters.

3. My flesh and my wandering soul: He [kindly] doth fetch back again; in the plain paths of righteousness.

4. He leadeth me beside still waters; and guideth me along; because He knoweth me, and the name that is upon me."

In a Consideration concerning the Tunes, Dr. Mather states that "the director of psalmody need only say, 'Sing with the black letter,' or 'Sing without the black letter,' and the tune will be sufficiently directed" (see Belcher, Historical Sketches of Hymns and Hymn-writers, p. 47). Work which contains much interesting information on the whole subject of church psalmody, hymnology, and music. These and other primitive efforts to furnish an American psalmody and hymnale were not followed with success. Between the years 1706 and 1757 the version of the Psalms of 1640 was carefully re-edited by the Rev. Thomas Prince, M.A., and published in 1758. In 1783 Mr. Joel Barlow, an American statesman and poet, published a corrected and enlarged edition of Dr. Watts's version of the Psalms, and a collection of hymns, with the recommendation of the General Assembly of the Congregational Ministers of Connecticut, at whose synod this work was recommended. Many of the psalms were altered, several were written anew, and several, which had been omitted by Dr. Watts, were supplied. This collection was in general use in that state until the bad character of the author (who died a wretched indigent) brought them into disuse; and in 1808, the Rev. Thomas Dwight, D.D., president of Yale College, published a revised edition of Dr. Watts's version of the Psalms (in which he versified upwards of twenty psalms omitted by Watts), with the approbation of the General Assembly of Ministers in the state of Connecticut, at whose request it had originally been undertaken. This edition, with the contributions of Dr. Dwight, has never been adopted by the Congregationalists of this country. Many of the leading denominations in the United States of America now have their own separate psalm- and hymn-books.

In 1789 the publication of the Parthenacre, Tate and Brady was adopted entirely by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, with the addition of a few hymns. Since the year 1826 a collection of 212 hymns has been in use under the authority of the General Convention of Protestant Episcopal dioceses of the House of Bishops and of clerical and lay delegates; and since October, 1832, under the same authority, 124 selections of entire psalms, or of portions of psalms, from the new version (with certain necessary alterations or corrections, and occasionally with the substitution of a better version) has been in use in all the churches of that denomination.

The constitution of the Reformed Church in America declares that "No psalms or hymns may be publicly sung in the Reformed (Dutch) churches but such as are approved and recommended by the General Synod." The manifest reason of this prohibition is to be found in the vital relation that subsists between the psalmody and the theology of that Church. This is further illustrated by a rule of its General Synod which forbids the issue of any edition of the psalms and hymns of this Church without the concurrence of that body, the Catechism, and the Liturgy. The history of the hymnology of this denomination, which dates back to the period of the Reformation, makes an interesting chapter of the general subject. From an elaborate report made to the General Synod in 1826 by the committee for the expense of the 'Hymns of the Church,' we condense a brief narrative: "The Church Orders ratified by the National Synod of Dortrecht (A.D. 1618–19), which are still 'recognized' as containing the distinctive and fundamental principles of our Church government, declare that the one hundred and fifty psalms of David, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Twelve Articles of the Christian faith, the songs of Mary, Zacharias, and Simeon, versified only, shall be sung in public worship. The churches are left at liberty to adopt or omit that which is not in the liturgy, or that which is not common to the whole system. Praise books are prohibited. This usage, prevailing in the Netherlands, was transferred to this country. Several copies of the psalm-books which the fathers brought with them are in the hands of the committee. They are invariably bound up with the Bible, the New Testament at least, the Catechism, and Liturgy. These Psalms in Dutch are the version of Peter Dathe, the eminent Biblical scholar and critic, by whom they were translated; however, not from the original, but from the French. This was the first book in use in the Reformed Church in America. It contains, besides the Psalms, the Ten Commandments, the Song of Zacharias, the Song of the Virgin Mary, the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Articles of the Christian faith (translated from the German by Jan Uytenhoven), the Morning Prayer, the Evening Prayer, the Prayer before Sermon, Prayer before Eating, Prayer after Eating, the Evening Prayer entitled Christs qui Luz es et Dies, and a translation by Abraham Van der Meer, from the Greek Bible, of the 151st Psalm of David. Every version of prayer book contains prayers which are a set to music of a simple recitative character, in which all might join, by Cornelius Leeuw. This book was in use in all the Dutch churches in this country, until the consistory of the Reformed Dutch Church of the city of New York found it necessary to have divine service performed in the English language; and on Nov. 9, 1767, approved and recommended for the use of their Church and schools an English psalm-book, published by their order, "which is greatly indebted to that of Dr. Bray and Mr. Tate; some of the psalms being transcribed verbatim from their version, and others altered so as to fit them to the music used in the Dutch Church" (prefatory note). This book contains, besides the Psalms of David, fifteen pages of "hymns"—viz. the Ten Commandments, the Song of Zacharias, the Song of the Virgin Mary, the Song of Simeon, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer. It was so set to the music in which all the people joined, so that the compiler could truthfully say, "A great part of divine worship consists in harmonious singing." This first book in English was the second book in use in our churches. The "Articles of Religion," in 1744, made the use of psalmody, but agree to "abide in all things" by the regulations of the Synod of Dort, herebefore quoted. In 1773 a new version of the psalms and hymns was compiled and adopted in the Netherlands, and was soon introduced into some of the Dutch churches in America, constituting the third book thus used. It differs from the preceding chiefly in the higher critical character of the psalms. In 1787 the General Synod appointed a committee to compile a psalm-book "out of other collections of English psalms in repute and received in the Reformed Church of Dort, however, to give the name of canon thereto where that of the New-York consistory is in use." Additional instructions were given the next year to print "some well-composed spiritual hymns in connection with the psalms." After approval by the Synod of 1789, this book was speedily published. It contains besides the Psalms of David, a century of hymns, of which "1 to 52 are suited to the Heidelberg Catechism, 53 to 73 are adapted to the holy ordination of the Lord's Supper, and Hymn 74, to the end, on miscellaneous subjects." Among these are such titles as "Exultation," "Ascension," "Resurrection," "Ascension," "Whitmaitude," "New Year," etc. This book, prepared by order of the General Synod, being the fourth book used in their churches, is without music, as have been all subsequent books until this time. This selection continued in use for full a quarter of a century, and is still an admirable one. In 1912, on petition of the Classis of New York, the General Synod requested the Rev. Dr. John H. Livingston to prepare an improved and enlarged selection of psalms and hymns. This was reported to the Synod of 1815, and by its order was "entirely to be exchanged into all our churches." Its use was recommended also to "all families and individuals in place of the book hitherto in use." No radical change has been made in the psalmody of the Reformed Church from that day to this—the fifth book sanctioned in the churches. It embraced 375 more hymns than the former collection. Additions, however, were made, in 1831, of 172 hymns, and published as Book II. Rev. Dr. Thomas De Witt was chairman of the committee which prepared it. This is the sixteenth book. In 1843 a book of Sabbath-school and Social Hymns, 301 in number, was published by order of the Synod. In 1845-46 a committee, of which Rev. Dr. Isaac Ferris was chairman, prepared, by authority of the Synod, a new arrangement of psalms and hymns, embracing 342 additional selections. This was soon published, and constituted the seventh book thus used in the Reformed Church in America—containing, in addition to the psalms, 788 hymns. An edition with music has been published within three or four years past, under the title of The Book of Praise. In 1862 the Fulton Street Hymn-book, which is used in the celebrated daily service in love, and numbering 826 hymns, was published, and "recommended to the churches" by the Synod. In this chronological sketch no reference has been made to books in the French and German languages; but so long ago as 1792 the Synod approved and recommended, in the German language, the psalms and hymns compiled by Theodoric de Beza and La Morat; and in the German language, the psalms and hymns, published at Marburg and Amsterdam, used in the Reformed churches in Germany, in the Netherlands, and Pennsylvania. In October, 1865, a valuable and large collection of hymns in the German language was printed by order of the General Synod, for use in the German churches of this denomination. It was compiled by the late Rev. John C. Gudin, of New York, Rev. Joseph F. Berg, D.D., and Rev. Abraham Berk. Since then a German Reformed Church has been organized, and a German hymn-book has been issued. The General Synod of 1869 sanctioned a new volume, entitled Hymns of the Church, with tunes, which is now coming in use in many congregations. The full history of the preparation of this elegant volume is given in the article under that head. In addition to its beauty, it is the most admirable collection of hymns for public worship now in use among Protestant denominations. It numbers 1007 hymns, together with many chants, sentences, etc. The music, which is designed to promote congregational singing, is of a very high order. The wide range of topics, the rich selection from the most celebrated devotional lyrics of all ages, and its fine adaptation to the great purpose of the praises of God, entitle it to a foremost place among modern collections. The committee who made the compilation were Rev. John C. Gudin, Rev. D. G. Vermilye, D.D., Rev. Alexander R. Thompson, D.D., with whom was associated, as a prominent co-laborer, the Rev. Zachary Eddy, D.D. This book and the previous one are now both in use in the Reformed Church in America. It has also been introduced into a number of churches of other denominations.

The hymn-books of the various other Christian denominations embrace a large proportion of the psalms and hymns which have become the property of the Church universal, and of these it is necessary only to give the name of each, giving a separate list of the psalm-books. But there are hymns and hymnals characteristic of the particular doctrines, ordinances, and spirit of the Methodists so distinctive in these respects that we append a history of their hymn-books, recognizing therein by the general assertion that their hymns and tunes have been among the greatest instrumentalities of their immense successes.

The origin of the first collection of hymns in use among the Methodists of this country cannot be satisfactorily ascertained. In 1778 one of Wesley's publications, divided into four books for Sunday-schools, with music, was issued. There is also an edition "revised and improved," copyrighted in 1802 by Ezeekiel Cooper. This contains 250 hymns. In 1788 a supplement was added by bishop Asbury, containing 357 hymns, the whole being published in two books. This was revised under the suprevision of Nathan Bangs in the year 1820. To this again a supplement was added in 1836. The General Conference of 1846 appointed a committee to carefully revise the then existing book, and to "judiciously multiply the number of hymns." Their work was completed, and approved by the Book Committee, the editors of whom were W. B. Martin, J. P. Chapman, and E. P. Bunker, whose name is on the title page of the book, which was a joint effort. The publication of the 1850 supplement brought the hymn book to its present form. The number of hymns was increased from 280 to 405, and the addition of a supplement brought the total to 450. This book was revised and published in 1885, with the addition of a new preface.

6. Reformierte und German Presbyterian.—Deutsches Gesangbuch, von P. Schaaf. This is one of the best German hymn-books in this country.

During the American Civil War (1861-65) many new patriotic and Christian songs resounded through the camps of the contending armies. The religious ser(hee), the labor of the chaplains and army missionaries, and of the sanitary and Christian commissions, and other voluntary organizations for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the military and army forces, and for hospital service, were all attended with the cheering influence of patriotic song. Few of these new songs, whether patriotic or religious, sur-led in the homes and churches of the soldiers in happier times rang out their inspiring strains, and stirred all the deepest sympathies and memories of peace and love. Two of the little books and songbooks among these are before us as we write—one printed for the Union and the other for the Confederate army.

Both of them contain a majority of the same familiar psalms and hymns, both end with "Lord, dismiss us with thy blessing," and both have the exhortation of the "Let us offer unto God our Thanksgiving," the same hymn.
This, therefore, is not a conventional or popular book.
It may be proper here to allude to the large addition to our psalmody in consequence of the labors of evangelists, such as Blis and Sankey. These have produced numerous books of hymns, chiefly with the music attached, which contain, along with much that is merely ephemeral, some songs and tunes which are destined to survive the occasions that have called them forth.

We close this article with a brief reference to the great increase of hymns and tunes for children, and especially for Sabbath and mission schools. It is the more interesting in the light of the city and home missionary and Sunday-school system of the times. Advantage has been taken of the demand to flood the market with books which are utterly unworthy of their authors and unfit for use—full of trashy verses, and of tunes that are no better. But a happy reaction has begun, which will soon result in elevating the standard, purifying the taste, and ennobling this delightful branch of Christian instruction and worship. The best poetical and musical talent of the country is now engaged in the work, and we may soon look for its ripe fruit. The songs of the children, like books and addresses for them, must not be childish nor weak. If they are to bear their part in the religious training of the rising race, and in an age like this. The hosannas which were sung to Jesus in the Temple by the youthful throng were in full unison and of equal grandeur with those of the multitudes that was that followed him, and spread their garments in the way, and cried, saying, " Hosanna to the Son of David!" " Hosanna in the highest!" See Sunday School.

In the preparation of this article we have freely used the labors of other reference books. We have also had valuable contributions in sections from the pen of eminent writers. Dr. W. J. R. Taylor has greatly enriched our treatment of American psalmody, especially that treating of the Reformed Church. The Rev. Dr. Pick has aided in the bibliography. Those desiring fuller information will consult the list of works quoted in this article Hymnology.

Psalm, Book of, one of the most important of the Biblical components, standing in the English Scriptures at the beginning of the practical or experimental books, and in the Hebrew Bible of the Kethubim, or Hagiographa. In the following accounts we follow the line of the Biblical interpretation; but we have thrown some new light, we trust, especially upon the difficult questions connected with the titles of the several Psalms. See Bible.

1. General Title of the Book.—This collection of sacred poetry received its English name, Psalms, from the GreekTHEURIOS, or Hagiographa. It is the consequence of the lyrical character of the pieces of which it consists, as intended to be sung to stringed and other instruments of music. The word (from ψαλλω, to touch or strike a chord) is aptly defined by Gregory of Nyssa (Tract, ii, in Psalmos, c. 8) as melody produced by a musical instrument. Another name, Psalter, was given to this book from the Greek ψαλτηριον, the stringed instrument to which its contents were originally sung. See Psalter.

It does not appear how the Psalms were, as a whole, anciently designated. Their present Hebrew appellation is תהלים, Tehillim, elsewhere rendered "Praises." But in the actual superscriptions of the psalms the word תהלים is applied only to one, Ps. cxxix, which is indeed emphatically a praise-hymn. The Sept. (as above noted) entitled them ψαλμοι, or "Psalms," using the word ψαλμος at the same time as the translation of תהלים, miszmor, which signifies strictly a rhetorical composition (Lowth, Profect, iii), and which was probably applied in practice to any poem specially intended, by reason of its rhythm, for musical performance with instrumental accompaniment. But the Hebrew word is, in the Old Test., never used elsewhere in the plural; and in the superscriptions of even the Davidic psalms it is applied only to some, not to all; probably to those which had been composed most expressly for the harp. The Hebrew title, תהלים (Rabbinic form, with מ added, שיר לשלום, or תהלים, or תילים or תילות), signifies ἡμνημα or πρασιμ, and was probably adopted on account of the use made of the collection in divine service, though only a part can be strictly called songs of praise, nor a few being lamentations and prayers. There is evidently no proper correspondence between the title in the two languages, though each is suitable. The word answering to שיר is ἡμνημα, and not ψαλμοι, which rather (as above noted) corresponds to מזמור, psalms, or lyrical odes—a name which, though so plainly appropriate, does not appear to have been generally given to the book, at least so far as the Hebrew usages now can be ascertained. This is the more singular, insomuch as no fewer than sixty-five of the songs distinctly bear the title of מזמור, while only one (Ps. cxix, i) is styled שיר.

That the name מזמור did, however, obtain in ancient times, rather than the present title, שיר, may be presumed from the use of ψαλμοι in the Sept. and the New Test., and of מזמור in the Peshitta. See Psalms.

In Ps. lxxxi, 3, we find all the preceding compositions (i.e. the so-called Proverbs of David), because many of them are strictly prayers. And "prayer" is the preface to the most ancient of all the psalms, that of Moses (Ps. xc). But the same designation is in the superscriptions applied to only two portion of the Greek and Syriac Psalms.

The other special designations applied to particular psalms are the following: "Shir," "Song," the outpouring of the soul in thanksgiving, used in the first instance of a hymn of private gratitude (Ps. xxx); afterwards of hymns of great national thanksgiving (Ps. xlv, xlviii, lxxv, etc.); מזמור, "Instruction" or "Homily" (Ps. xxxii, lxxiv, etc.; comp. the מזמורי, "I will instruct thee," in Ps. xxxii, 3); מציון, "Private Memorial," if from the root מציון (perhaps also with an anagogical allusion to the root מציון, "to support," "to maintain"; comp. Ps. xvi, 5) (Ps. xvi, lvi-lxi); מכתיב, "Testimony" (Ps. lx, lxxx); and מיקוד, "Irreligious or Dithyrambic Ode" (Ps. vii). The strict meaning of these terms is in general to be gathered from the earlier superscriptions. Once made familiar to the psalmists, they were afterwards employed by them more loosely. (See § 4, below.)

II. Numeration of the Psalms.—The Christian Church obviously received the Psalter from the Jews not only as a constituent portion of the sacred Book of Holy Scripture, but also as the liturgical hymn-book which the Jewish Church had regularly used in the Temple. The number of separate psalms contained in it is, by the concordant testimony of all ancient authorities, one hundred and fifty; the avowedly "supernumerary" psalm which appears at the end of the Greek and Syriac Psalters, "on David's victory over Goliath," being manifestly apocryphal. This total number commends itself by its internal probability as having proceeded from the last sacred collector and editor of the Psalter. In the details, however, of the numbering, both the Greek and Syriac Psalters differ from the Hebrew. The Greek translators joined together Ps. ix, x and Ps. cxxiv, cxxv, and then divided Ps. cxvi and Ps. cxxv: this was perpetuated in the versions derived from the Greek, and among others in the Latin Vulgate. The Syriac so far followed the Greek as to join together Ps. cxvii, cxviii, and to divide Ps. cxvii. Of the three divergent systems of numbering, the Hebrew (as followed in our A. V.) is the best. The large collection consisting in Ps. cxvii (Carmov, Julius Dusia, etc., ii, 107). But that the second was originally distinct from the first book is proved by the repetition of one or two pieces; thus Ps. iii is plainly the same as Ps. xiv, with only a notable variation in the divine name, Elohim, God, being used in the former wherever Hashshon, Jehovah, Lord, is found in the latter. So also Ps. lxxv is but a repetition of Ps. xli, 13-17, with the same singular variation in the divine name. This division appears by the date of its latest Psalm (Ps. lxxvii) to have been compiled in the reign of King Hezekiah. It would naturally comprise, first, several or most of the Levitical psalms anterior to that date, and, secondly, the remainder of the psalms of David previously uncompiled. According to others, this collection was not made till the period of the captivity, on the ground that Ps. xlv refers to the days of Jeremiah. The third book (lxxiii-lxxix) consists chiefly of Asaph's psalms, but comprises apparently two smaller collections—i.e., the first Asaphic (lxxiii-lxxix), the other mostly Korahitic (lxxxvii-lxxxiii). The collector of this book had not the same art to bring together aPsalm as the second was brought together by David, and therefore he put the above notice at the end of the second book (see De Wette, Psalmen, Einleitung, p. 21). This book, the interest of which centres in the times of Hezekiah, stretches out, by its last two psalms, to the reign of Manasseh: it was probably compiled in the reign of Josiah. In the opinion of others, the date of this collection must be as late as the return from Babylon, on the supposition that Ps. lxxxviii implies as much.

The fourth book (xc-cvi), containing the remainder of the psalms up to the date of the captivity; and the fifth (cvi-vc), comprising the psalms of the return, are made up chiefly of anonymous liturgic pieces, many of which were composed for the service of the second Temple. In the last book we have the Songs of Degrees (cxx-cxxiv), which seem to have been originally a separate collection. There is nothing to distinguish these two books from each other in respect of outward decoration or arrangement, and they may have been compiled together in the days of Nehemiah.

The five books may, with some propriety, be thus distinguished: the first Asaphic, the second Korahitic, the third Asaphic, and the two remaining liturgic. (Comp. § v, below.)

The ancient Jewish tradition as to this division is preserved to us by the abundant testimonies of the Christian fathers. Of the indications which the sacred text itself contains of this division, the most obvious are the doxologies which we find at the end of Ps. xli, lxxvii, lxxxviii, cvi, and which, having for the most part no special connection with the psalms to which they are attached, mark the several ends of the book. Four of the five are alike, and it suggests itself at once that these books must have been originally formed at different periods.

This conclusion is by various further considerations rendered all but certain, while the few difficulties which stand in the way of admitting it vanish when closely examined. Thus there is a remarkable correspondence between the several books in their use of the divine names Jehovah and Elohim to designate Almighty God. In book i the former name prevails: it is found 272 times, while Elohim occurs but fifteen times. (We here take Oehler's list of occurrences, nor yet of the occurrences of Elohim when prefixed with a possessive suffix.) On the other hand, in book ii Elohim is found more than five times as often as Jehovah. In book iii the preponderance of Elohim in the earlier is balanced by that of Jehovah in the later psalms of the book. In book iv the name Jehovah is more extensively employed; and so also, virtually, in book v, Elohim being there found only in two passages incorporated from earlier psalms. Those who maintain, therefore, that the psalms were all collected and arranged at once, contend that the collector distributed the Psalms according to the titles of the songs to which they severally exhorted. But to this theory the existence of book iii, in which the preferential use of the Elohim gradually yields to that of the Jehovah, is fatal. The large appearance, in fact, of the name Elohim in books ii and iii depends in great measure on the period to which many of the psalms of those books belong—the period from the reign of Solomon to that of Hezekiah, when through certain causes the name Jehovah was exceptionally disused. The preference for the name Elohim in most of the Davidic psalms which are included in book ii is closely allied with that character of those psalms which induced David himself to exclude them from his own collection, book i; while, lastly, the sparing use of the JeHo\-\-vah in Ps. lxxviii, and the three introductory psalms which precede it, is designed to cause the name, when it occurs, and above all Joh, which is emphatic for JeHo-\-vah, to shine out with greater force and splendor.

IV. Super-Captivations.—All the Psalms, except thirty-four, bear supercaptivations. According to some, there are only twenty-five exceptions, as they reckon ἱλλοί, ἱλλοί, a title in all the Psalms which commence with it. To each of these exceptions the Talmud (Babyl. Cod. Abodi Saruh, fol. 24, col. 2) gives the name ἱλλοί, τάξιν, οὐρανός, Orphan Psalm. It is confess-ably very difficult, if not impossible, to explain all the terms employed in the inscriptions; and hence critics have differed exceedingly in their conjectures. The difficulty, arising no doubt from ignorance of the Temp-ple music, was felt, it would seem, as early as the age of the Sept.; and it was felt so much by the translators of our A. T. that they generally retained the Hebrew words, even though Luther had set the example of translating them to the best of his ability. It is worth observing that the difficulty appears to have determined Cowperdale (1555) to omit nearly all except names of authors; thus in Ps. ix, which is his in version, he gives only a Psalm of David.

The authority of the titles is a matter of doubt. By most of the ancient critics they were considered genuine and of equal authority with the Psalms themselves, while most of the moderns reject them wholly or in part. The difficulties have been largely rejected in the last century by Theodor of Mopsuestia, one of the ablest and most judicious of ancient interpreters (Rosenmüller, Hist. Interpretationis Librorum Sacerorum, iii, 296). On the other hand, it deserves to be noticed that they are received by Tholuck and Hengstenberg in their works on the antiquity of the antitypical doctrine, and there can be no question, for they are found in the Sept. They are supposed to be even much older than this version, since they were no longer intelligible to the translator, who often makes no sense of them. Their obscurity might, however, have been owing not so much to their antiquity as to the translator's residence in Egypt, and consequent ignorance of the psal-mody of the Temple service in Jerusalem. At any rate, the appearance of the titles in the Sept. can only prove them to be about as ancient as the days of Ezra. Then it is argued by many that they must be as old as the Psalms themselves, since it is customary for Oriental poets to prefix titles to their songs. Instances are found in Arabic poems, but these are very unlike the Hebrew inscriptions. Much more important traces of the custom may be seen in Is. xxix, xxxiii, vi, 5; Neh. iii, 1, and in 2 Sam. i, 17, 18 (Tholuck, Psalms, p. xxiv). The other instances commonly appealed to in Exod. xv, 1; Deut. xxxi, 30; Judg. v, 1; 2 Sam. xxii, 1, furnish no evidence, since they are not proper titles of the songs so much as brief statements connecting them with the verses. In 2 Sam. xxviii, 3 there is strong proof of the usage, if, with Tholuck, we take the verses as inscriptions, and not as integral parts of the songs, which most hold them justly to be from their poetical form.

The following considerations seem to militate against the genuineness of the titles: (1.) The analogy between them and the supercaptivations to the apocryphal epistles. The latter are now universally rejected: why not the former? (2.) The Greek and Syriac versions exhibit them with great and numerous variations, often altering the Hebrew (as in Ps. xxxvii), and sometimes giving a heading where the Hebrew has none (as in Ps. xxii-xcvii). Would the ancient translators have taken such liberties, or could such variations have arisen, if the titles had been considered sacred like the Psalms themselves? At any rate, the existence of these glaring variations is sufficient to induce a distrust of the titles in their present form, even though they had been once sanctioned by inspired authority. If ever Ezra settled them, the variations in versions and manuscripts (Eichhorn, Lexicon, iii, 450, 495) have tended since to make them doubtful. (3.) The order for a special occasion thought to be at variance with the contents of the Psalms. Sometimes the author is believed to be incorrectly given, as when David is named over psalms referring to the captivity, as in Ps. xiv, 7; xxv, 22; li, 20, 21; lxix, 36. It is not unlikely, however, as Tholuck has shown, that these references were added during that period to the genuine text of the royal singer. Others, as Calvin and Hengstenberg, with far less probability, take these passages in a figurative or spiritual sense. Also Ps. cxxix, it is supposed, cannot well be David's, for its style is not free from Chaldaisms. Then sometimes the occasion is incorrectly specified, as in Ps. xxx, unless, indeed, this refers to the dedication of the sacer Temple (1 Chron. xxii, 1), as Rosenmüller, Tholuck, and Hengstenberg think after Venema. The real solution of the controversy lies in the answer to this question: Do they, when individually stated, approve themselves so generally correct, and as so free from any single fatal objection to their credit, as to claim our universal confidence? This cannot be fully discussed here, although intimations are given below calculated to confirm the accuracy of the titles as found in the Hebrew and English Bible, especially as to authorship and occasion. We must simply avow our conviction, founded on thorough examination, that they are, when rightly interpreted, fully trustworthy, and that everywhere within the limits of the 40th and 45th century, and even by some of those of the 40th century, the correctness of any one of them can be fairly met. Moreover, some of the arguments of their assailants obviously recall upon themselves. Thus when it is alleged that the contents of Ps. xxxiv have no connection with the occasion indicated in the superscription, we reply that the fact of the superscription renders it improbable that the superscription should have been prefixed by any but David himself.

Of the terms left untranslated or obscure in our Bible, it may be well to offer some explanation in this place, referring to them in the alphabetical order for a special elucidation. On this subject most commentators offer instruction, but the reader may especially consult Rosenmüller, Scholia in Comp. Redacta, iii, 14-22: De Wette, Commentar über die Psalmen, p. 27-37; Ewald, Poet. Aeschyl. i, 163-180, 195. The following summary exhibits the literary and musical systems of notation found in the individual titles to the Psalms at one view, classified under the several terms and particles used to point out their bearing and significance:

I. With the preposition l, to (or by):
   a. The author: namely,
   b. Levinet: (1.) Korahites only: xiii, xiv-xv, lix, lxiv, lxxiv, lxxvii.
      (2.) Azel (else), especially as a branch of the Korah-1, xiii-xxxii.
V. The species of poetical composition:

1. נִפְרָדָה (niphārādah), simply an ada or lyrical piece: xvi, xlix
2. מִזְגֵּר (mizgēr), an instrumental, xlvii
3. מִזְגֵּרָא (mizgērāa), a stringed instrument: xlvii
4. מִזְגֵּרֶה (mizgērēh), an instrumet: xlvii
5. מִזְגֵּרִי (mizgērī), a stringed instrument: xlvii
6. מִזְגֵּרּוֹ (mizgērō), ascribed to David: the psalms prefixed to the book of Kings, are the most striking proofs of their unscriptural judgment. The Talmudists (Cod. Pescinius, x, 117); Augustine, who is never a good critic (De Cret. Dei, xvii, 14), and Chrysostom (Prod. ad Paulinam). But Jerome, as might be expected, held the opinion which now universally prevails (Epist. ad Sophronum). The titles and the contents of the Psalms most clearly show that they were composed at different and remote periods by several poets, of whom David was only the largest and most eminent contributor.

1. David, the sweet psalmist of Israel (2 Sam. xxiii, 1). To him are ascribed seventy-three psalms in the Hebrew text (not seventy-four, as De Wette and Tholuck state; nor seventy-one, as most others have counted), and at least eleven others in the Sept.-namely, xxxii, xlix, lvii, xciv, xcvii, cxxviii, ccxxvii; to which may be added Psa. 1, as it forms part of Psa. xxv in that version.

To these psalms the collector, after properly appending the single psalm of Solomon, has afforded the notice that “the prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended” (Psa. lixxii, 20). He is indirectly implying, at least on the prismatic view, that no more compositions of the royal psalmist remained. How, then, do we find in the later books—iii, iv, v—further psalms yet marked with David’s name? Some have sought to answer this question by a reference to the authorship assigned in the superscriptions of other psalms. If (as we shall presently see) in the times posterior to those of David the Levitical choir prefixed to the psalms which they composed the names of Asaph, Heman, and Ethan, out of a feeling of veneration for their memories, how much more might the name of David be prefixed, and to the utterances of those who were not merely his descendants, but also the representatives for the time being, and so in some sort the pledges of the perpetual royalty of his lineage! The name David is used to denote, in other parts of Scripture, after the original David’s death, the then head of the Davidic family: and so, even in the Messiah of the seed of David, who was to sit on David’s throne (1 Kings xii, 16; Hos. iii, 5; Isa. lv, 3; Jer. xxx, 9; Ezra xxxiv, 23, 24). Thus some seek to explain the meaning of the later Davidic superscriptions in the Psalter. The psalms to which these behests are thought to have been written by Zechariah, by Josiah, by Zerubbabel, or others of David’s posterity.

This view is supposed to be confirmed by various con-
2. Asaph is named as the author of twelve psalms—viz. I, lxxiii.—lxxviiii. He was one of David’s chief musicians. All the poems bearing his name cannot be his, for in Ps. lxxxviii., vii can ill: this is not reconciled with the historical circumstances of any period of David’s life, but suits exactly with those of the opening of the reign of Josiah. Some of these psalms—Ps. lxxxvi., civiti., cxxi.—are compacted of passages from previous psalms of David. Lastly, the Hebrew text [used for the Greek] in the version of the Targum of the Tenach is much fuelled by grammatical Chaldaisms, which are entirely unparalleled in Ps. i.—lxxii., and which thus afford strong evidence of a comparatively recent date. They cannot, therefore, it is claimed, be David’s own; yet it is held that the superscriptions are not on that account to be rejected as false, but must rather be properly interpreted, on the ground of the improbability that any would, carelessly or presumptuously, have prefixed David’s name to various psalms scattered through a collection, while yet leaving the rest—at least in books iv., v.—altogether unsuperscribed. Ingenious is this explanation, we prefer to adhere to the simple and obvious meaning of the titles as ascribing the psalms in question to David himself, and we do not feel constrained to seek other authors by the nature of the contents.

3. In considering secondly David’s eminence as a poet, and the delight he took in sacred song, we cannot wonder that he should be the author of so many of the Psalms—no fewer, in all likelihood, than half the collection: the wonder rather should be that we do not find more of it. It is certain he wrote some which are not in this book; see in 2 Sam. i., 19—27 his lament over Saul and Jonathan, and in xxi., 1—7 his last inspired effusion. His character and merit as the father of Hebrew melody and music—for it was in his hands and under his auspices that these flourished most—are thus set forth by the son of Sirach (xviii., 8—10). “In all his work he gave thanks: To the Holy and Most High he sang songs with all his heart in words of praise (pli: part: di: Ec.), and he loved his Maker. He set singers also before the altar, and from their music (pfi: ou) sweet melody resounded. He gave splendor to the feast, and adorned the solemn times unto perfection (pfi: ou ov:v: avx:ia avx:ia), in that they praised his holy name, and the sanctuary pealed with music from early morn.”

David’s compositions are generally distinguished by sweetness, softness, and grace, but sometimes, as in Ps. xii., i., ii., the devotional and the elevating strains are plaintive, owing to his multiplied and sore trials, both before and after his occupation of the throne. How often in his beset with dangers, harassed by foes, and chastised of God! Under these circumstances, how was he to be cheered, and gave songs of joy and sorrows on the saddened chords of the lyre! But in the midst of all he generally found relief, and his sorrow gave place to calm confidence and joy in God. What wonder that a soul so susceptible and devout as his should manifest emotions so strong, so changeful, and so various, seeing that he passed through the greatest vicissitudes of life? God took him from the shepherds to feed Jacob his people and Israel his inheritance (Ps. lxxviii., 70, 71). See Herder, Getat der ebr. Poete, ii., 257—301; and especially Thuduck (Poeunen. Einleitung, § 8), who gives a most admirable exhibition of the psalmist’s history and services. See David.

The example and countenance of the king naturally led others to cultivate poetry and music. It appears from Amos vi., 5 that lovers of pleasure took David’s compositions as a model for their worldly songs: how much more, in reference to the psalmist’s diurnal duties, may we infer from him producing sacred songs and hymns! The fine psalm in Hab. iii. is an exact imitation of his style as seen in Ps. xviii. The celebrated singers of his day were men, like himself, moved by the divine afflatus more than by the admiration of praise. These of the psalmists the names of several are preserved in the titles. of Heman, “Maschil of Ethan,” have simply a convenient purport—the one psalm having been written, as, in fact, the rest of its superscription states, by the sons of Korah, the choir of which Heman was a member; and the others correspondingly proceeding from the third Levitical choir, which owed its origin to Ethan or Jeshurun. See Jeshurun.

Many conjectures have been formed respecting other writers, especially of the anonymous psalms. The Sept. seemingly gives, as authors, Jeremiah (Psa. cxxxviii), and Haggai and Zechariah (Psa. cxxxviii). But these conjectures are too uncertain to call for further notice in this place. Hitzig (Comment. über die Psalmen) ascribes to Jeremiah a large number of the elegiac or plaintive psalms.

More particularly, the Psalms may be arranged, according to the intimations of authorship contained in the titles, as follows:

A. Exclusively Davidic—xxxiii, xxxiv, xxxv, xxxvi, xxxvii, xxxviii, xxxix, lxxl.
B. Exclusively Levitical—xxx, xxxi, xxxii, xxxiii, xxxiv, xxxv, xxxvi, xxxvii, xxxviii, xxxix.
C. Chiefly Davidic—xxxvii, xxxviii.
D. Chiefly Levitical—xxxv, xxxvi, xxxvii, xxxviii.
E. Shorter—xxxvi, xxxvii.
F. Miscellaneous—xxxviii, xxxix, lxx.

VI. Dates and Occasions of the Psalms.—The dates of the Psalms, as must be obvious from what has been stated, are of the most various, ranging from the time of Moses to that of the captivity—a period of nearly 1000 years. In the time of king Jehoshaphat (about B.C. 896) Psa. lxxiii, setting forth the dangers of the nation, as we read in 2 Chron. xx, i–25, was composed, either by himself, or by some. Moses, and possibly, according to the title, by Jahaziel, “a Levite of the sons of Asaph,” who was then an inspired teacher (see ver. 14). In the days of Hezekiah, who was himself a poet (Isa. xxxix, 9–20), we may date, with great probability, the Korithie Psalms xlv and xlvii, which seem to celebrate the deliverance from Sennacherib (2 Kings xix, 35). In the period of the captivity we have evidently written such laments as Psa. xlv, lxxix, cii, and cxxxvii; and after its close, when the captives returned, we must manifestly date Psa. lxxiv.

Some have maintained that several psalms, especially lxxiv, were written even in the days of the Maccabees; but this is contrary to every probability, for, according to all accounts, the Canon had been closed before that time (see 2 Chron. xxxix). Moreover, the hypothesis of a Maccabean authorship of any portion of the Psalter can ill be reconciled with the history of the translation of the Septuagint. But the difficulties do not end here. How for we shall not here discuss the theories of Hitzig and his followers Lengerke and Justus Olshausen, who would represent the greater part of the Psalter as Maccaean—though it be—how that which we ascribe most naturally assign to the Maccaean period meet us not in the close, but in the middle (i.e. in the second and third books) of the Psalter? The three named by De Wette (Eicht. in das A. T. § 270) as bearing apparently a Maccaean impress are Psa. xlv, lx, lxxiv; and, in fact, these together with Psa. lxxiv, are perhaps all that would, when taken alone, seriously suggest the hypothesis of a Maccaean date. Whence, then, arise the early places in the Psalter which these occupy? But even in the case of these the internal evidence, when more narrowly examined, proves to be in favor of an earlier date. In the first place, the superscription of Psa. lx cannot possibly have been invented from the historical books, inasmuch as it disagrees with them in its details. Then the mention by name in that psalm of the Israelitish tribes, and of Moab and Philistia, is unsuited to the Maccaean epoch. In Psa. xlv the complaint is made that the tree of the nation of Israel was no longer spreading over the territory that God had assigned. Is it conceivable that a Maccaean psalmist should have held this language without making the slightest allusion to the Babylonian captivity as the cause of the complaint as if the tree's growth were now first seriously impeded by the wild stocks around, notwithstanding that it had once been entirely transplanted, and that, though restored to its place, it had been weak ever since? In Psa. lxiv it is explained that there was no prophet. Would that be a natural complaint at a time when Jewish prophecy had ceased for more than two centuries? Lastly, in Psa. lxix, the mention of “kingdoms” in ver. 6 ill suits the Maccaean time; while the way in which the psalm is cited by the author of the first book of Maccabees (vii, 16, 17), who omits those words which are foreign to his purpose, is such as would have hardly been adopted in reference to a contemporary composition.

The superscriptions, and the places which the psalms themselves severally occupy in the Psalter, are thus the two guiding clews by which, in conjunction with the internal evidence, their various occasions are to be determined. In the critical results obtained on these points by those scholars who have recognised and used these helps there is, not indeed uniformity, but at least visible tendency towards this. The following pages exhibits all that can with probability be ascertained on this head as to each psalm.

VII. Canon and Use.—The inspiration and canonical authority of the Psalms are established by the most abundant and convincing evidence. They never were, and never can be rejected, except by impious impugners of all divine revelation. Not to mention other ancient testimonies, we find complete evidence in the N.T., where the book is quoted or referred to as divine by Christ and his apostles at least seventy times. No other writing is so frequently cited, Isaiah, the next in the scale of quotation, being cited only about fifty-five times. Twice (Luke xx, 42 and Acts i, 20) we find distinct mention of the Book of Psalms (Bιβλιον Παλαιων). Once, however (Luke xxviii, 44), the name Psalms is used, not simply for this book, but for the Hagiographa, or the whole of the third division of the Hebrew Scriptures because in it the Psalms are the first and chief part, or possibly, as Haverbeck suggests (Einstellung, § xiv, p. 78), because the division consists mainly of poetry. It deserves notice that in Psa. cxvii the psalm begins, taken from the anonymous Psa. xxv, the book is indicated by David, most likely because he was the largest and most eminent contributor, and also the patron and model of the other psalmists. For the same reasons many ancient and modern authors often speak of the book as the Psalms of David (Carpzov, Introd. ii, 98), without intending to ascribe all the productions to him.

In every age of the Church, the Psalms have been exalted for their excellence and their use for godly edifying (Carpzov, L. c. p. 109–116). Indeed, if Paul's estimate of ancient inspired Scripture (2 Tim. iii, 15–17) can be justly applied to any single book, that book must be the Psalms. Even in the N. T. there is scarcely a work of equal practical utility. Basil the Great and Chrysostom, Basil, expatiates most eloquently, and yet judiciously, on its excellence, and the close of Basil's eulogy is to this effect: “In it is found a perfect theology (κατακεχομένης τῆς θεολογίας θεοτροφίας): prophecy of Christ's sojourn in the flesh, threatening of judgment, hope of resurrection, fear of retribution, promises of glory, revelations of mysteries—all things are treasured in this book, as in some great and common storehouse.” Among the early Christians it was customary to learn the book by heart, that psalmody might enliven their social hours, and soften the fatigues and sooth the sorrows of life. They employed the Psalms, not only in their religious as secular services, of which use we find probable mention in 1 Cor. xiv, 26, but also at their meals and before retiring to rest, as Clement of Alexandria testifies (Παλαιός Θεός, τῶν ἴδιων εἰς ψαλμοδίαν, πρὸ τῆς κοι-πῆς). Of their use at meal we find an example also in the institution of the Lord's Supper (Matt. xxvi, 30). For their modern liturgical use, see PSALMODY; PSAL-TE.

VIII. Classification. Various classifications of the Psalms have been proposed (Carpzov, Introd. ii, 182–184). Tholuck would divide them, according to the matter, into songs of praise, of thanksgiving, of complaint, and of instruction. De Wette suggests another method of sorting them ion, or the expression of some truth or maxim (Ps. i. xv, xxii, xxxiii, lxxvi, cxxxi, xxxiii). This is a numerous class.

4. Elegiac psalms, containing complaints under affliction and the persecution of enemies, and prayers for succor. This class, which comprises more than a third of the whole collection, has several subdivisions: (1) The lamentations or complaints of particular individuals (Ps. vii, xvii, xxii, lii, lii, iv, lv, cix). (2) National lamentations, mostly in a religious point of view (Ps. lixiv, lixxix, lxxx, cxxxvii). Some are both individual and national lamentations (Ps. lixiv, lixxvii, cii). Most of these psalms are of a late date.

(3) General psalms of complaint, reflections on the wickedness of the world (Ps. xx, cxxii, lixiv, xxxv). Didactic psalms, representing the goodness of God, the condition of the pious and of the godless (Ps. lixvi, lixix, lxxxii, lixiii).

5. Psalms relating to the king, patriotic hymns, etc. (Ps. xx, cxxii, lixiv, cx). 6. National psalms, containing allusions to the ancient history of the Hebrews and of the relation of the people to Jehovah (Ps. lixviii, cv, cxi, cxiv).

The Messianic psalms ought properly to constitute another separate class (Ps. ii, xxii, xl, lxxiii).

(Einleitung, p. 3), somewhat as below. It is obvious, however, that no very accurate classification can be made, since many are of diversified contents and uncertain time. The following distribution, while, perhaps, best comprise them in their general import.

1. Hymns in praise of Jehovah — Ichilim, in the proper sense. These are directed to Jehovah, from various motives and views, e.g. as the Creator of the universe and Lord of all (Ps. viii, xix, lxv, cvii, cviii, cxxix); as the Protector and Helper of Israel (Ps. xxvii, xxxii, lxvii, lxviii, lxv, lxvi, lxvii, lxxvi, lxxvi, cxxv, cxxvi); or as the Helper of individuals, with thanksgiving for deliverance (Ps. xxxvii, xxxiv, xxxiv, xl, cxxviii); while others refer to them or special attributes of Jehovah (Ps. xxvii, cxxix). These psalms contain the most sublime thoughts respecting God, nature, the government of the world, etc.; they also furnish the sources of many doctrinal ideas.

2. Temple hymns, sung at the consecration of the Temple, the entrance of the ark, or intended for the Temple service (Ps. vi, xxv, lxix, lxxvi, lxxvii, cxxvi, cxxv, cxxvi). So also pilgrim songs, sung by those who came to worship at the temple, etc. See Domo.ka.

3. Religious and moral psalms of a general character, containing the poetical expression of emotions and feelings. The subject, in that only right and therefore in God (Ps. xiii, xliii, xlii, xci, cxxvi, cxxv, cxxvi); longing for the worship of the sanctuary (Ps. xiii, xlii); and prayers for the forgiveness of sin (Ps. ii). So, also, didactic songs relating to relig-

Ewald, Tholuck, and others, pronounce the poetry of the Psalms to be of the lyric order. 'They are,' says De Wette (Einführung in die Psalmen, p. 2), "lyric in the proper sense; for among the Hebrews, as among the ancients generally, poetry, singing, and music were united, and the inscriptions to most of the Psalms determine their connection with music, though in a way not always intelligible to us. Also, as many of these compositions deserve to be called lyric. The essence of lyric poetry is the immediate expression of feeling, and feeling is the sphere in which most of the Psalms move. Pain, grief, fear, hope, joy, trust, gratitude, submission to God—everything that moves and elevates the heart is there expressed. Most of these psalms are the lively effusions of the excited, susceptible heart, the fresh off-spring of inspiration and elevation of thought; while only a few are spiritless imitations and compilations, or unpoetic forms of prayer, temple hymns, and collections of proverbs.' For fuller information on this subject, see Porat.

X. Prophetic and Messianic Significance.—The moral struggle between godliness and ungodliness, so vividly depicted in the Psalms, culminates, in Holy Scripture, in the life of the Incarnate Son of God upon earth. It ought not to be forgotten that the Psalms themselves definitely anticipated this culmination. Now, there are in the Psalter at least three psalms of which the interest evidently centres in a person distinct from the speaker, and which, since they cannot, without violence to the language, be assigned to any but the Messiah, may be termed indirectly and exclusively Messianic. We refer to Ps. ii, xlv, cx, to which may, perhaps, be added Ps. lxix.

It would be strange if these few psalms stood, in their prophetical significance, absolutely alone among the rest; the more so, as much as Ps. ii forms part of the preface to the first book of the Psalter, and would, as such, be entirely out of place, did not its general theme virtually extend itself over those that follow, in which the interest generally centres in the figure of the suppliant or worshipper himself. Hence the impossibility of viewing the psalms generally, notwithstanding the historical drapery in which they are outwardly clothed, as simply the past deviations of the historical David or the historical Israel. Other arguments to the same effect are furnished by the idealized representations which many of them present: by the outward points of contact between their language and the actual earthly career of our Saviour; by the frequent references made to them both by our Saviour himself and by the Evangelists; and by the view taken of them by several Fathers of the Church in several treatises of the Targum. There is yet another circumstance well worthy of note in its bearing upon this subject. Alike in the earlier and in the later portions of the Psalter, all those psalms which are of a personal rather than of a national character are marked in the superscriptions with the name of David. It results from this that, while the Davidic psalms are partly personal, partly national, the Levitical psalms are uniformly national. Exceptions to this rule exist only in appearance: thus Ps. lxxii, although couched in the first person singular, is really a prayer of the Jewish faithful against the Assyrian invaders; and in Ps. xlii, xliii, it is the feeling of an exiled company rather than of a single individual to which utterance is given. It thus follows that it was only those psalms which were types of Christ by external office and lineage as well as by inward piety that were charged by the Holy Spirit to set forth beforehand, in Christ's own name and person, the sufferings that awaited him and the glory that should follow. The national hymns of Israel are, indeed, also prospective; but in general they anticipate rather the struggles and the triumphs of the Christian Church than those of Christ himself.

We annex a list of the chief passages in the Psalms which are in anywise quoted or embodied in the N. T., showing more or less clearly this anticipative character:

Ps. ii. 1, 2, 7, 8, 9; iv. 4; v. 9; vi. 5, 8; viii. 2, 4–6; x. 7; xiv. 1–9; xvi. 8–11; xviii. 4, 49; xix. 4; xxii. 1, 8; xxiii. 5, 6, 7; xxvii. 12; xxix. 12; xxx. 8, 12–16, 20; xxxii. 9; xxxvi. 1; xxxvii. 11; xl. 6–8; xii. 9; xlv. 22; xlvii. 6, 7; xlviii. 2; li. 4; lvii. 18; lxxx. 4, 9, 22, 23, 25; lxxvii. 8; lxxix. 22, 24; lxxxi. 6; lxxxi. 9; lxxxi. 10; lxxxi. 20; xc. 4; xci. 11, 12; xcii. 7; xiv. 11; xcvi. 22; cxii. 5; cxiv. 8; cxv. 1, 6; cxx. xvi. 10; cxvii. 6, 24; cxvii. 20, 25, 26, 28; cxviii. 5; cxix. 3. See Quotations.

XI. Moral Characteristics of the Psalms.—The great doctrines and precepts embodied in the Psalms—what views they give of God and his government, of man and his sinfulness, of piety and morals, of a future state, and of the Messiah—are most ably set forth by Tholuck in his Einführung, § 4.

Foremost among these meets us, undoubtedly, the universal recourse to communion with God. "My voice is unto God, and I will cry" (Psa. lxviii. 1), might well stand as a motto to the whole of the Psal-ter; for, whether immersed in the depths, or blessed with greatness and comfort on one side, it is to God that the psalmist's voice seems ever to soar spontaneously aloft. Alike in the welcome of present deliverance or in the presentiments of its accomplishment, he dresses himself straight to God as the object of his praise. Alike in the persecutions of his enemies and in the deserts of his friends, in wretchedness of body and in the agonies of inward repentance, in the mo-terms of distress and in the voice of apparent despair, it is direct to God that he utters forth his applications. Despair, we say; for, such as the description goes, is the psalmist's state in Psa. lxxxviii. But meanwhile he is praying: the apparent impossibility of deliverance cannot restrain his Godward voice; and so the very force of communion with God carries him, almost unsawers to himself, through the trial.

Connected with this is the faith by which he everywhere lives in God rather than in himself. God's mercies, God's greatness, form the sphere in which his thoughts are ever moving. Even when, through excess of affliction, reason is rendered powerless, the naked contemplation of God's wonders of old forms his effectual support (Psa. lxxvii).

It is of the essence of such faith that the psalmist's view of the perfections of God should be true and vi-lid. The Psalter describes God as he is; it gives his testimonies to his power and providence, his love and faithfulness, his holiness and righteousness. Correspondingly it testifies against every form of idol which men would substitute in the living God's place, whetber it be the outward image, the work of men's hands (Psa. cxxv), or whether it be the inward vanity of earthly comfort and beauty, to be purchased at the cost of the honor which cometh from God alone (Psa. ivv). The solemn "See that there is no idol-way (2 X X 11) in me" of Psa. cxxxix—the striving of the heart after the very truth, and taught besides—is the exact anticipation of the "Little children, keep yourselves from idols" of the loved apostle in the N. T.

The Psalms not only set forth the perfections of God; they present to us by way of warning him by the acknowledgment and adoration of his perfetions. They encourage all outward rites and means of worship: new songs, use of musical instruments of all kinds, appearance in God's courts, lifting-up of hands, prostration at his footstool, holy apparel (A. V. "beauty of holiness of his house"). Among these they recognise the ordinance of sacrifice (Psa. iv. v, xxxii. ii) as an expression of the worshipper's consecration of himself to God's services. But not the less do they repudiate the outward rite when separated from that which it was designed to express (Psa. xi. lix.): "by brokenness of heart, from erring man, the genuine sacrifice which God requires (Psa. ii)."

Similar depth is observable in the view taken by the psalmists of human sin. It is to be traced not only in its outward manifestations, but also in the inward workings of the heart (Psa. xxxvii), and is to be primarily ascribed to the influence of our ancestors (Psa. lii). It is the natural outcome of the utter corruption of the ungodly world (Psa. xiv); on the other, the encouragement to genuine repentance, the assurance of divine forgiveness (Psa. xxxii), and the trust in God as the source of complete redemption (Psa. cxxx).

With regard to the last, the psalmist, while warmly acknowledging the excellency, feels yet that it cannot so effectually guide his own unassisted exertions as to preserve him from error (Psa. xii). He needs an additional grace from above, the grace of God's Holy Spirit (Psa. li). But God's Spirit is also a free spirit (ibid.); led by this, he will discern the law, with all its precepts, to be no arbitrary rule of bondage, but rather a charter and instrument of liberty (Psa. cxxx).

The Psalms bear repeated testimony to the duty of instructing others in the ways of holiness (Psa. xxxii, xxxii, ix, ixi). They also indirectly enforce the duty of love to one's neighbor, by bidding them to love their fellow-creatures (Psa. lxvii, cix, cixi; Prov. 4). On the other hand, they denounce, in the strongest terms, the judgments of God on transgressors. We here particularly notice what are called the vindictive psalms — namely, those which contain expressions of wrath and invocations against the enemies of God and his people, such as Psa. lix, cxiv, cxix, and which, in consequence, are apt to shock the feelings of some Christian readers. In order to obviate this objection, most of our pious commentators insist that the expressions are not melodictions or imprecations, but simple declarations of what will or may take place. But this is utterly inadmissible; for in several of the most startling passages the language in the original is plainly imperative, and not indicative (see Psa. lix, cxiv, cxviii, 23, 25; cxix, 6). The truth is that only a morbid benevolence, a mistaken philanthropy, takes offense at these psalms; for in reality they are not opposed to the spirit of the Gospel, or to that love of enemies which Christ enjoined. Resentment against evil-doers is so far from being sinful that we find it exemplified in the meek and spotless Redeemer himself (see Mark ii, 5).

If the expression is used in the scriptures with any especial reference to how could Paul (1 Cor. xvi, 22) wish the enemy of Christ to be accursed (καὶ ἀνατρικέονται), or say of his own enemy, Alexander the coppersmith, "The Lord reward him according to his works" (2 Tim. iv, 14); and, especially, how can the spirit of the good be the devil's? The very words of Scripture authorize, (Ps. xiv, 17;Prov. 13, 19;Is. 11, 4;Jer. 17, 5;Eph. 4, 31;Phil. 4, 8;Col. 3, 8;Rom. 15, 13;1 Peter 3, 9;James 1, 27;2 Peter 3, 13). These passages illustrate the common meaning of the word, and are in harmony with the divine law which God has given to man to judge his fellow-man in the fear of God. It is the duty of the Christian, therefore, to use wisdom and prudence in exercising this right of judgment, that he may be guided to the spirit of charity and mercy, and not to the spirit of revenge.

In the American Bibliotheca Sacra for February, 1844. Such imprecations in the Psalms, however, are usually levied against transgressors as a body, and are uniformly uttered on the hypothesis of their wilful persistence in evil, in which case the overthrow of the sinner becomes a necessary part of the uprooting of sin. They are in no inconsistent with any efforts to lead sinners, individually, to repentance. See IMPRECATION.

This brings us to notice the faith of the psalmists in a righteous recompense to all men according to their deeds (Psa. xxxvii, et seq.). They generally expected that men would receive such recompense, in great measure, during their own lifetime. Yet they felt wished that it was not then complete; it perpetuated itself to their children (Psa. xxxvii, 25; cx, 12, et seq.); and thus we find set forth in the Psalms, with sufficient distinctness, though in an unattuned, and consequently imperfect, form, the doctrine of a retribution after death.

XII. Commentaries. — The following are the special expository helps on the whole book; we designate a few of the most important by an asterisk, and we omit many that are merely practical, homiletical, and literal:

- Orig. Seleta (in Opp. ii, 510); also Scholica (in Galland's Bibl. Patr. vol. xiv); Eusebius, Commentarii (Gr. and Lat. in Montfaucon's Collecta Nota, vol. i); Athanasius (in Tsaritsyn's); also shows itself alike in deeds, in words (Psa. xxvii, cxii), and in thoughts (Psa. cxxx); nor is even the believer able to discern all its various ramifications (Psa. xix).

- Connected with this view of sin is, on the one hand, the picture of the utter corruption of the ungodly world (Psa. xiv); on the other, the encouragement to genuine repentance, the assurance of divine forgiveness (Psa. xxxii), and the trust in God as the source of complete redemption (Psa. cxxx).

- The Psalms bear repeated testimony to the duty of instructing others in the ways of holiness (Psa. xxxii, xxxii, ix, ixi). They also indirectly enforce the duty of love to one's neighbor, by bidding them to love their fellow-creatures (Psa. lxvii, cix, cxix, cxixi; Prov. 4). On the other hand, they denounce, in the strongest terms, the judgments of God on transgressors. We here particularly notice what are called the vindictive psalms — namely, those which contain expressions of wrath and invocations against the enemies of God and his people, such as Psa. lix, cxiv, cxix, and which, in consequence, are apt to shock the feelings of some Christian readers. In order to obviate this objection, most of our pious commentators insist that the expressions are not melodictions or imprecations, but simple declarations of what will or may take place. But this is utterly inadmissible; for in several of the most startling passages the language in the original is plainly imperative, and not indicative (see Psa. lix, cxiv, cxviii, 23, 25; cxix, 6). The truth is that only a morbid benevolence, a mistaken philanthropy, takes offense at these psalms; for in reality they are not opposed to the spirit of the Gospel, or to that love of enemies which Christ enjoined. Resentment against evil-doers is so far from being sinful that we find it exemplified in the meek and spotless Redeemer himself (see Mark iii, 5).

- If the expression is used in the scriptures with any especial reference to how could Paul (1 Cor. xvi, 22) wish the enemy of Christ to be accursed (καὶ ἀνατρικέονται), or say of his own enemy, Alexander the coppersmith, "The Lord reward him according to his works" (2 Tim. iv, 14); and, especially, how can the spirit of the good be the devil's? The very words of Scripture authorize, (Ps. xiv, 17;Prov. 13, 19;Is. 11, 4;Jer. 17, 5;Eph. 4, 31;Phil. 4, 8;Col. 3, 8;Rom. 15, 13;1 Peter 3, 9;James 1, 27;2 Peter 3, 13). These passages illustrate the common meaning of the word, and are in harmony with the divine law which God has given to man to judge his fellow-man in the fear of God. It is the duty of the Christian, therefore, to use wisdom and prudence in exercising this right of judgment, that he may be guided to the spirit of charity and mercy, and not to the spirit of revenge.

- In the American Bibliotheca Sacra for February, 1844. They are in no inconsistent with any efforts to lead sinners, individually, to repentance. See IMPRECATION.

- This brings us to notice the faith of the psalmists in a righteous recompense to all men according to their deeds (Psa. xxxvii, et seq.). They generally expected that men would receive such recompense, in great measure, during their own lifetime. Yet they felt wished that it was not then complete; it perpetuated itself to their children (Psa. xxxvii, 25; cx, 12, et seq.); and thus we find set forth in the Psalms, with sufficient distinctness, though in an unattuned, and consequently imperfect, form, the doctrine of a retribution after death.

Psalter. This word is often used by ancient writers for the book of Psalms, considered as a separate book of Holy Scripture. It obtained among later Church writers a more technical meaning as the book in which the Psalms are arranged for the service of the Church. The Roman Catholic Psalter, in fact, does not follow the Scriptural order of the Psalms, but arranges them for the various services in a different manner. In the English Psalter, as it exists in the Book of Common Prayer, the Psalter is arranged in such a way as to give a reading for every day in the month, and there are also special selections to be used in the discretion of the minister. The translation is not that of the King James Version [*i.e., our common Bible], but the earlier version of Cranmer's Bible, which accounts for the difference between the Psalms of the Prayer-book and those of the original version of the Bible. The use of the Psalter as a system of psalmody seems to have been borrowed from the synagogue. The Psalter was always a favorite book, and was obtained as a most extensive use both in private and public. It was regarded as an epitome of the Bible, and as especially adapted to the use of youth and the people at large. The clergy were required to commit this book to memory. In later times, when the Bible as a whole was denied to the people, the Latin Psalter was left in their hands; and at the time of the Reformation the penitential psalms were in the hands and mouths of the people.

Sometimes the book, for the sake of convenience, was divided into five portions, to correspond with the Pentateuch, and was used in different classes according to their character, as hallelujahs, baptizal, penitential, burial psalms, etc. In the time of St. Augustine and St. Chrysostom the burial psalms were xxii., xlii., xliii., lix., cl.; in the Roman Church they are xxii., xxx., xcvii., and the seven penitentials; in the English Ch.
opened to him, and he entered like a father in the house of his sons (viii, 15-20). Once in the city, he also took the castles and became the ruler of Jerusalem with the battering-rams (viii, 21: ii, 1). Jerusalem was trodden down by the heathen (ii, 20); even the altar of God was desecrated (viii, 14: ii, 5). Three of the most prominent men and sages of the council were killed, and the blood of the inhabitants of Jerusalem was shed like the water of impurity (viii, 23). The inhabitants of the country were carried away as captives into the West, and the princes for a desolation (xiv, 10-16). At last, the dragon who took Jerusalem was killed at the mountain of Egypt on the sea (ii, 29). It hardly needs any further explanation that all these events fully agree with the history of Pompey. The princes who arrogated to themselves the throne of David are the Ausonians (v, v.), who, since the time of Aristobulus I, called themselves kings. The last princes of this house, Alexander Janneus and Aristobulus II, favored the Sadducees, and in the eyes of the Pharisaic author they are sinners and unlawful. The "foreign and strong men" whom God brings from the ends of the earth is Pompey. The princes who meet him are Aristobulus II and Hyrcanus II; the adherents of the latter admit Pompey into the city, and he soon takes the other part with force (iv, xiv, ii, 1), which was held by Aristobulus's party. All the other circumstances fully agree with the history of Pompey's campaign in Palestine; and the fact that the 2d Psalm speaks of the manner in which Pompey died, in B.C. 48, fully proves the assumption that it was written soon after this event, while the 8th and 17th psalms, as well as the greater part of the others, may have been written between 68 and 48.

The spirit which runs through these psalms is that of Pharisaic Judaism. They breathe an earnest moral tone and true piety; but the righteousness which they preach, and the absence of which they deplore, is the one which can only be attained by keeping the Pharisaic law. They are the work of a century after the death of Jesus, and are written in a century which is an encouragement to assert that the psalms were not written at Alexandria, but in Palestine.

Psalterium Marianum is the name by which the devotion of the rosary is sometimes indicated, because in it (excepting the initial prayers), instead of the 150 psalms of the Scripture, the Ave Maria, in honor of the Virgin Mary, is recited 150 times.

Psaltery, an Anglicism of the Greek ψαλτήριον, is used in the A. V. as the rendering of two Hebrew words, both of which signified stringed instruments of music to accompany the voice. In our treatment of them we observe a strictly archaeological line of investigation. See Kitto's note on Ps. xxii, 3, in his Pictorial Bible; Bible in Cyclop., i, 70, 218; and comp. Musical Instruments.

1. 29, or 2/2, nœd, is so rendered in the A. V. in all passages where it occurs, except in Isa. v. 12; xiv, 11; xxii, 24 marg.; Amos v. 28; vi, 5, where it is translated viol, following the Geneva Version, which has viola in all cases except 2 Sam. vi. 5; 1 Kings x. 12 ("psaltery"); 2 Esdr. x. 21; Zacch. xii. 21 ("psaltery"); Isa. xxii, 24 ("musick"); and Wisd. xix, 18 ("instrument of musike"). The ancient viol was a six-stringed guitar. "Viol had six strings, and the position of the fingers was marked on the finger-board by frets, as in the guitar of the present day" (ChapPELL, Pop. Mus. i, 246). In the Prayers for the Sick, the word Gratulatur (xiv, 1) is rendered "lute." This instrument resembled the guitar, but was superior in tone, "being larger, and having a convex back, somewhat like the vertical section of a gourd, or more nearly resembling that of a pear.... It had six strings, the number of which was never more than any other, the first, or treble, being sometimes a single string. The head in which the pegs to turn the strings were inserted receded almost at a right angle" (ChapPell, i, 102). These three instruments—the psaltery or psalterium, the viol, and the guitar—were mentioned in the old English poets, and were clearly instruments resembling each other, though still different. Thus in Chaucer's Flower and Leafe, p. 857—

"And before hem went ministrées many one, As harpes, pipes, lutes, and saytry;" and again in Drayton's Polyolbion, iv, 356—

The word psaltery in its present form appears to have been introduced about the time of the 16th century, for it occurs in the unmodified form postrary in two passages of the Geneva Version (1560). Again, in North's Plutarch (Them. [ed. 1566], p. 124) we read that The mistoicale, "being mocked ... by some that had studied humanitie, and other liberall sciences, was driuen for revenge and his owne defence, to conquer with graver and stoute words, saying, that in deed he could no skill to tune a harpe, nor a viol, nor to play of a psaltery; but if they did put a citie into his bands that was of small name, weake, and little, he knew wares enough to take it with the string of his gun, the grave ψαλτήριον, from which our word is derived, denotes an instrument played with the fingers instead of a plectrum or quill, the verb ψαλειν being used (Erasp. 4. 294, p. 274) of strumming the bowstring (comp. ψαλειν το λιθον, Erasp. Ion, p. 173). But it only occurs in the Sept. as the rendering of the Hebrew נָאֶב in Neh. xii, 27.
Isa. v. 12, and in all the passages of the Psalms, except Ps. lxxvi. 22 (כָּלַחַים) and Ps. lxxvi. 2 (אָדוֹן), while in Amos v. 23; vi. 6, the general term דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא employed. In all other cases דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא represents דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא or דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא. These various renderings are sufficient to show that at the time the translation of the Sept. was made there was no certain identification of it, or Hebrew instrument with any known to the translators. The rendering דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא commends itself on account of the similarity of the Greek word with the Hebrew. Josephus appears to have regarded them as equivalent, and his is the only direct evidence upon the point. He tells us (Ant. vii. 12, 3) that the difference between the συνάρτα (Heb. דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא, טְוֶנָּר) and the דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא was that the former had ten strings and was played with the plectrum, the latter had twelve notes and was played with the hand. Forty thousand of these instruments, he adds (Ant. vii. 8, 6), were made of electrum by Solomon for the Temple choir. Rashi (on Isa. v. 12) says that the דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא had more strings and pegs than the טְוֶנָּר. That דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא was a foreign name is evident from Strabo (a, 471) and from Athenaeus (iv, 176), where its origin is said to be Sidonian. Beyond this, and that it was a stringed instrument (Athen. iv, 176), played by the hand (Ovid, Ars Am. iii, 327), we know nothing of it; but in these facts we have strong presumptive evidence that דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא and דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא are the same: and that the דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא and פַּדְּשֵׁר אֶרֶב are identical appearances from the glossary of Philoxenus, where דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא = פַּדְּשֵׁר אֶרֶב, and דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא = פַּדְּשֵׁר אֶרֶב, and from Suidas makes פַּדְּשֵׁר אֶרֶב and פְּדָשֶׁר אֶרֶב synonymous. Of the psaltery among the Greeks there appear to have been two kinds—the ρήριας, which was of Persian (Athen. xiv. 638) or Libyan (ibid. p. 635) origin, and the μυκάδα. The former had only two (ibid. iv. 183) or three (ibid.) strings; the latter as many as twenty (ibid. xiv. 634), though sometimes only five (ibid. p. 637). They are sometimes said to be the same, and were evidently of the same kind. Both Isidore (De Orig., iii, 21) and Cassiodorus (Pref. in Paul. c. 4) describe the psaltery as triangular in shape, like the Greek Δ, with the sounding-board above the strings, which were struck downwards. The latter adds that it was played with a plectrum, so that he contradicts Josephus if the psaltery and דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא are really the same. In this case Josephus is the rather to be trusted. St. Augustine (on Ps. xxxvii. 13) makes the position of the sounding-board the point in which the cithara and psaltery differ; in the former it is below, in the latter above the strings. His language implies that both were played with the plectrum. The distinction between the cithara and psaltery is observed by Jerome (Paul. c. 4). From these conflicting accounts it is impossible to say positively with what instrument the דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא of the Hebrew exactly corresponded. It was probably of various kinds, as Kimchi says in his note on Isa.

xxii. 24, differing from each other both with regard to the position of the pegs and the number of the strings. In illustration of the descriptions of Isidorus and Cassiodorus reference may be made to the drawings from Egyptian musical instruments given by Sir Gard. Wilkinson (Ant. Eg. ii. 266, 267), some one of which may correspond to the Hebrew דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא. Munk (Palialtor, pl. 16, figs. 12, 13) gives an engraving of an instrument which Niebuhr saw. Its form is that of an inverted Delta placed upon a round box of wood covered with skin. Abraham de Porta-Leone, the author of Shitte Huppogborin (c. 6), identifies the דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא with the Italian liuto (the lute), or rather with the particular kind called liuto chiavironato (the German mundoline), the thirteen strings of which were of gut or sinew, and were struck with a quill. See Harp.

The דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא (Ps. xxxiii. 2; xcvii. 3 [4]; cxliv. 9) appears to have been an instrument of the psaltery kind of a peculiar form or number of strings (Forkel, Gesch. der Mus. i. 183). Aben-Ezra (on Ps. cl. 3) says the דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא had ten plates; so that he must have considered it to be a kind of pipe. As the latter term signifies ten, and never occurs but in connection with the דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא, the conjecture is natural that the two instruments may have differed from each other only in the number of their strings, or the openings at the bottom. Hence we meet with the Sept. translation by ἑκάστυ, and in the Chaldeer, Syriac, and Arabic words expressing an instrument of ten strings, which is also followed in the A. V. (Ps. xxxiii. 2; cxliv. 1). We see no reason to dissent from this conclusion. Pfeiffer was inclined to think that the דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא may have been the quadrangular lyre which is represented in different varieties in ancient monuments (figs. 1 and 2 of the accompanying cut), and which has usually ten strings, though sometimes more. See Viol.

Miscellaneous Ancient Stringed Instruments.

From the fact that דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא in Hebrew also signifies a wine-bottle or skin, it has been conjectured that the term when applied to a musical instrument denotes a kind of bagpipe—the old English cornemate, French cornemuse; but it seems clear, whatever else may be obscure concerning it, that the דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא was a stringed instrument. In the Mishna (Kilam, xvi, 7) mention is made of a case (םַלְכָּה לָא) in which it was kept. See Bottle.

The first appearance of the דִּקְדְּקַבּ לָא in the history of the Old Test. is in connection with the "string" of prophets who met Saul as they came down from the high place (1 Sam. x. 5). Here it is clearly used in a religious service, as again (2 Sam. vii. 5; 1 Chron. xiii. 8) when David brought the ark from Kirjath-jearim. In the Temple band organized by David were the players on psalteries (1 Chron. xv. 16, 20), who accompanied the ark from the house of Obad-edom (xx. 28). They played when the ark was brought into the Temple (2 Chron. v. 12); at the thanksgiving for Jehoshaphat's victory (xx, 28); at the restoration of the Temple under Herod (xxix, 25), and the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem after they were rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. xii, 27). In all these cases, and in the passages in the Psalms where allusion is made to it, the Psaltery is associated with religious services. (2) Amos vi, 2; Ezek. x, 22.) It had its part also in private festivities, as is evident from Isa. v, 12; xiv, 11; xxii, 24; Amos vi, 5, where it is associated with banquetts and luxurious indulgence. It appears (Isa. xiv, 11) to have had soft, plaintive tones. The instrumenstaries of David were made of cypres (2 Sam. vi, 5), those of Solomon of algum or almug trees (2 Chron. ix, 11). See Psal.

MOBY.

2. Among the instruments of the band which played before Nebuchadnezzar's golden image on the plains of Dura, there were the "psaltery" (Παιστρυβον, Dan. iii, 5, 10, 15; Παιστρυβον, Psaumier). The Chaldean word appears to be merely a modification of the Greek Παιστρυβον. Attention is called to the fact that the word is singular (see Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1116), the termination "ον" corresponding to the Greek "ον". This, in a more narrow and exact sense, denotes an instrument like the cikara (Lemprid. Al Serer), played with both hands, and called the magadis, paryc (Acts iv, 33, 39); but according to Jerome (Proem. in Psalm.) it was the later Greek name for the navbar or sekel above. See Music.

PASTYRHIANS or Pastryrians, a sect of Arians, who were followers of Theocritus, a zealous paquot-cook (ψαυτρολογος) of Constantinople, who maintained the heresy of Arius in the form that the first person in the Trinity existed before the Son had a being; thus denying the eternal generation of Christ. Brought to trial in the Council of Antioch, A.D. 360, they maintained that the Son was not like the Father as to will; that he was taken from nothing, or made of nothing; and that in God generation was not to be distinguished from creation. They were also called也成为 They. See Theodorus, Hier. Hist. vol. iv.

Pisthene, NICHOLAS, a French prelate, was born in 1518 at Chaumont-sur-Aine, dioce of Verdun, of very humble parentage. He was educated by his uncle, Francois Pashane, abbé of St. Paul of Verdun, who sent him successively to the universities of Paris, Orleans, and Poitiers, and was made a priest in his favor in 1538. Soon after Nicholas took the habit of the Premonstrants. In 1548 the cardinal Jean de Lorraine abdicated in his favor the bishopric of Verdun. He assisted at the Council of Trent in 1550 and in 1562, arguing against the abuse of the regular benefices, and made for himself some enemies. He died at Verdun, Aug. 19, 1578. He gave to the world Collectio Actorum et Decretorum Concilii Tridentini (Etival, 1725), a curious journal of all that was done at the council from Nov. 11, 1562, until its conclusion, which was published by F. Hugel, abbe of Etival: Pratissel Longe de la Chane Psarographa (ψαυτογραφος) means those writings the title (ψαυτογραφος) of which names a false author instead of the true one. This designation is often applied to the Apocrypha, although there are many Apocrypha which name no author at all in their title. A number of Protestant theologians restrict the term psarographa to such writings of the O. T. as were composed in the Greek language shortly before or after Christ, and falsely attributed to the patriarchs and prophets of the Old Covenant, as, e.g., the testament of the twelve patriarchs, the book of Enoch, etc. They designate by the name of Apocrypha the writings falsely attributed to the apostles and disciples of Jesus. See APOCRYPHA.

Psuedodox (ψαυτοδοξια, from ψευδος, false hood, and δοξα, opinion) designates a false or deceptive opinion, and hence is employed for superstition and idolatry. The term pseudodoxa is often confused with pseudodoxi (from διασυνειδεια, instruction); as he who holds erroneous opinions (ψευτοδοξος), if he communicates them, becomes a false teacher (ψευτοδοξασκος). The opposite of these two expressions ought to be orthodoxy and orthodoxi, but the latter two words are used in a somewhat different sense. See Heresy.

The word pseudos is of recent formation, and means a general inclination to the false, which shows itself in thoughts, words, and doctrines, as well as in acts and in the social intercourse of life.

Psuedolatry (ψευτολατρεια, from ψευδος, false hood, and λατρεια, service) designates a false worship of which the Christian writers, who seem to have first formed this word, accused the pagans, on account of their polytheism. Pseudolatry has also penetrated into the Christian Church; for wherever we find the worship of images (iconolatry, or idolatry), there is pseudolatry present.

Psedolosy and Pseudomomancy (ψευδολογια, ψευδομαντια, from λογος, speech, and μαντια, prediction) are in the mutual relation of species and genus. The former refers to false and deceptive speaking in general; the latter to the foretelling of future events, in which, in this case, there is neither truth nor freedom. The same relation exists between the pseudologist and the pseudomaniast, called also pseudo-prophet. See Prophecy. Comp. also Lucian's Pseudomastia, by which title he designates an impostor of his time called Alexander (Alexander Impostor). Pseudomancy would be simulated fortune (manta); for men were simulated as well as bodily. Both pretences are mean, the former still more than the latter: for he who pretends to be mentally disengaged plays the part of a being deprived of reason and freedom. Criminals sometimes recur to this artifice to escape the responsibility of their actions; lawyers like, in desperate cases, to resort to the plea of insanity. The judge must, where such an excuse is attempted, take the advice of the physicians, who have to examine how far such a plea is warranted by the facts, else this mode of defense would lead to the imposition of all criminals, even the most dangerous.

The words ψευδολογια and ψευδομαντια are both unknown to antiquity, although ψευτολογια was employed. Instead of ψευδολογια, the ancients used also ψευτομαντια (from μοντος = λογος); hence it would be a mistake to suppose that men who dealt in false fables, although myth is synonymous with fals.

Psalmanziers are those who maintain the extreme form of Unitarian doctrine that Christ was merely (γιος) a man (ατριφος), and not God and man (γιος ατριφος) in one person.

Psychic and Pneumatici (ψαχνοις, and πναιματοις, scil. ατριφος) are often contrasted in such a manner that the former word is employed in a lower sense, the second with a more refined and noble significance. The Montanists thus designated the orthodox, because they rejected the prophecies and pretended inspirations of their founder, and would not receive his rigid laws respecting fasting. Hence this term is constantly used by Tertullian, after he had fallen into the errors of the Montanists. He calls his own party the spiritual, and the orthodox the carnal. Tertullian, who ranged himself with the Pneumaticists, wrote a book Contur Psychicas, s. Orthodromos. But the term psychic is here used in a very proper meaning, as it is employed in our times. See ORIGIN. The latter found in the Scriptures a somatic, psychical, and pneumatical meaning, because man is composed of body, soul, and mind. The name appears to have originated with the Valentinians, who styled themselves the spiritual and the perfect, and said they had no need of abstinence and good works, which were unnecessary for them that were perfect.

Psychism (a new formation, from ψυχή, soul) is the opinion that everything is soul. The followers of this doctrine are called Psychists. Although poets put a soul in every inanimate object, they do not belong to this sect of philosophers; for they do not think in the least of suppressing all distinction between the somatic and the psychical nature. Michel Petrus, a Hungarian, published in 1833 (Pesth, 8vo) a book in which he attempts to prove that the so-called bodily world is composed of nothing but souls. He divides the souls into two classes, the living and the dead; the latter, in a state of aggregation, constitute the bodies. This opinion is not so new as it would appear at first sight. It bears a striking resemblance to Leibnitz's monadology, and may be a branch of that tree. Leibnitz considers the whole universe as composed of monads, which he divides into conscious and unconscious, or slumbering; he also holds bodies to be aggregations of the second kind of monads. If they are consistent, the strict idealists will likewise be compelled to consider all that exists as soul or spirit, as they hold the bodies to be mere representations or ideas, to which the thinking mind lends objective existence. M. Queene (Lettres sur le Psychisme [Paris, 1802, 8vo]) teaches that there is a fluid diffused throughout all nature, animating equally all living and organized beings, and that the difference which appears in their actions comes of their particular organization. The fluid is general, the organization is individual. This opinion differs from that of Pythagorians (q. v.), who held that the soul of a man passed individually into the body of a brute. While M. Queene holds that, though the body dies, the soul does not; the organization perishes, but not the psychical, or psychical fluid. See Krug, Philos. Wörterbuch, s. v.

Psychology (from ψυχή, the soul, and λόγος, a discourse) is that branch of metaphysics which treats of the nature of relation and the relations of the human spirit. It has been divided into rational, or speculative, and empirical, or practical. (See Fleming and Krauth, Vocab. of Philos. s. v.)

Biblical Psychology is a term lately applied to the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures on the subject, especially as to the distinction between the rational and immortal soul in man (Gen. 2, 7), and the animal, sensitive, and affectional spirit (Deut. 18). The subject has been treated with great acumen by Delitzsch (Biblical Psychology, tr. from the German, Edinb. 1867); but the results are rather curious than satisfactory. (See Brit. Quatr. Rev. Jan. 1878, p. 162; New-Englander, July, 1878, art. iv.) In fact, the Bible has no scientific nomenclature, and the attempt to reduce its terms to the strict definitions of modern classification, especially on so obscure and abstract a subject, must necessarily prove abortive. See Mind.

Psychomancy (from ψυχή, soul, and μανιατίς, prediction) is the pretended art of summoning the souls of the deceased, and the psychical nature.

Psychometry (a new formation, from ψυχή, soul, and μετρέω, measure) is the art of measuring souls. It cannot give an account with mathematical exactitude of the powers of the soul and its effects; it must content itself with an approximate valuation, the soul being a quantity inexpressible to the senses, which cannot be measured like bodies. Ch. Jul. Sim. Portius, a teacher in Leipsic, invented an instrument of psychometry, which he thus describes: "The psychometer is an instrument which shows what a man is in respect to his temperament, mind, and heart. One hundred and ten different impressions can be made on the instrument. The impression made by the person whose soul is measured shows by which of the one hundred and ten qualities enumerated on a board — and most arbitrarily and illogically, as to that — "this person is distinguished from others." We may ask, Only those by which he or she is distinguished from, not also those which he has in common with, other people? But, then, the instrument could not indicate any of those one hundred and ten qualities, as each of them must be held in common by several persons. See the description of this psychometer by its author (Leipsic, 1833, 8vo).

Psychopannychism (ψυχή, soul; πᾶν, all; and νύξ, night — the sleep of the soul) is the doctrine to which Luther, among divines, and Forney, among philosophers, were inclined, that at death the soul falls asleep, and does not awake till the resurrection of the body. Calvin wrote a treatise against this view in 1534, and there is much against it in Henry Moris's Works. Pagett says, in his Heresiography, written about 1638, that this "heresy" revived in his time through the publication of a work entitled Man's Mortality. See Soul-Sleep.

Psychopneumones were those who maintained the opinion that the souls of the good, after death, became angels, and the souls of the evil became devils. See Augustine, Harres. ch. lxxviii; Pradest. Harres. ch. lxxviii.

Ptolemaus, or Ptolemy (Πτολεμαῖος, i.e. "the warlike," from πτολέμας = πολέμας), the dynastic name of the Greek kings of Egypt (A. V. "Ptolemee" or "Ptolemeus"), and hence employed also by many private persons. The name, which occurs in early legends (I. iv. 220; Pausan. x, 5), appears first in the historic period in the time of Alexander the Great, and became afterwards very frequent among the states which arose out of his conquests. For the following, which are the only persons of the name mentioned in the Scriptures (and in these in the Apocrypha alone, although referred to in Daniel), we adopt the statements found in the standard authorities. For the civil history of the Ptolemies the student will find ample references to the original authorities in the articles in Smith's Dict. of Classical Biography, i, 581, etc., and in Pauly's Real-Encyklopädie. The literature of the subject in its religious aspect has been discussed under Alexander; Democritus. A curious account of the literary activity of Ptolemy Philadelphus is given (by Simon de Magistris) in the Apologia sent. Pat. de LXX Virga, appended to Daniel sec. LXX (Rome, 1772); but this is not always trustworthy. More complete details of the history of the Alexandrine libraries are given by Ritzel, Die Alexandriinischen Bibliotheken (Breslau, 1838); and Parthey, Das Alexandr. Museum (Berlin, 1838). The foregoing table gives the descent of the royal line as far as it is connected with Biblical history. See Egypt.

1. PTOLEMY I, Soter (Striptzi, soteri), known as the son of Lagus, a Macedonian of low rank, was generally supposed to be an illegitimate son of Philip. He distinguished himself greatly during the campaigns of Alexander; at whose death, foreseeing the necessary subdivision of the empire, he secured for himself the government of Egypt, where he proceeded at once to lay the foundations of a kingdom (B.C. 323). His policy during the wars of the succession was mainly directed towards the consolidation of his power, and not to wide conquests. He maintained himself against the attacks of Perdiccas (B.C. 321) and Demetrius (B.C. 312), and gained a precipitate footing in Syria and Phoenicia. In B.C. 307 he suffered a very severe defeat at sea off Cyprus from Antigonus, but successfully defended Egypt against invasion. After the final defeat of Antigonus, he was obliged to divide the dominion of Seleucus and Ptolemy II to Seleucus; and during the remainder of his reign his only important achievement abroad was the recovery of Cyprus, which he permanently attached to the Egyptian monarchy (B.C. 256). He abdicated in favor of his youngest son, Ptolemy II Philadelphus, two years before his death, which took place in B.C. 283.

Ptolemy Soter is described very briefly in Daniel (xi, 5) as one of those who should receive part of the empire of Alexander when it was divided towards the four winds of heaven. "The king of the south [Egypt] shall be strong; one of his princes [Seleucus Nicator, shall be strong]; and he [Seleucus] shall be strong above him [Ptolemy], and have dominion." Seleucus, who is here mentioned, fled from Babylon, where Antigonus sought his life, to Egypt in B.C. 316, and attached himself to Ptolemy. At last the decisive victory of Ipsus (B.C. 301), which was mainly gained by his services, gave him the command of an empire which was greater than any other held by Alexander's successors; and "his dominion was a great dominion." (Dan. iv. 20, 41) very strongly refers the latter clause of the verse to Ptolemy Philadelphus, "whose empire surpassed that of his father." The whole tenor of the passage requires the contrast of the two kingdoms on which the fortunes of Julian hung.

In one of his expeditions into Syria, probably B.C. 290, Ptolemy treacherously occupied Jerusalem on the Sabbath, a fact which arrested the attention of the heathen historians Agatharcides (ap. Joseph. C. Ap. i, 22; Ant. xii, i); I. carried away many of their gods and images captive to Alexandria; but, aware probably of the great importance of the good-will of the inhabitants of Palestine in the event of a Syrian war, he gave them the full privileges of citizenship in the new city. In the campaign of 192 B.C. he attempted to tear the fruits of his liberal policy; and many Jews voluntarily emigrated to Egypt, though the colony was from the first disturbed by internal dissensions (Josephus, as above; Hecat. ap. Joseph. C. Ap. i. c.).

2. PTOLEMY II, Philadelphus (Philadelphus, i.e. brother-loving), the youngest son of Ptolemy I, was made king two years before his death, to confirm the irregular succession. The conflict between Egypt and Syria was renewed during his reign in consequence of the intrigue of his half-brother Magas, "But in the end of the days the kings of Syria [the kings of Egypt] joined themselves together [in friendship]. For the king's daughter of the south [Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus] came as bride to the king of the north [Antiochus II], to make an agreement" (Dan. xi. 6). But the marriage of the king with one of the daughters of Antiochus II, and the political events of the reign of Ptolemy, who, however, retained possession of the disputed provinces of Phoenicia and Cœle-Syria, offer no further points of interest in connection with Jewish history.

In other respects, however, this reign was a critical epoch for the development of Judaism, as it was for the intellectual history of the ancient world. The liberal encouragement which Ptolemy bestowed on literature and science (following out in this the designs of his father) gave birth to a new school of writers and thinkers. The critical faculty was called forth in place of the creative, and learning, in some sense, supplied the place of original speculation. Eclecticism was the necessary result of the concurrence and comparison of dogmas; and it was impossible that the Jew, who was now become as true a citizen of the world as the Greek, should remain passive in the conflict of opinions. The origin and influence of the translation of the Sept. will be considered in another place. See SEPTUAGINT. It is enough now to observe the greatness of the consequences to the union of the Greek and Hebrew worlds, with Jewish thought. From this time the Jew was familiarized with the great types of Western literature, and in some degree aimed at imitating them. Exechiel (the πώς τον οδηγεῖτο της θριαμβίας του τιμητής, Clem. Alex. Strom. i, 28, § 165) wrote a drama on the subject of the Exodus, of which considerable fragments, in fair readable lines still preserved (Eus. Prop. Ec. ix. 20, 24, 29) convey no satisfactory notion. Another epic poem, On the Jews, was written by Theodorus, and as the extant passages (Isid. ix, 22) treat of the history of Sichem, it has been conjectured that he was a Samaritan. The work of Aristobulus on the interpretation of the law was a still more important result of the combination of the old faith with Greek culture, as forming the groundwork of later allegories. While the Jews appropriated the fruits of Western science, the Greeks looked towards the East with a new curiosity. The histories of Berosus and Manetho and Hecataeus opened a world as wide and as novel as the conquests of Alexander. The legendary sibyls were taught to speak in the language of the prophet. The name of Orpheus, which was connected with the first rise of Greek polytheism, gave sanction to verses which set forth nobler views of the Godhead (ibid., xiii, 12, etc.). Even the most famous poets were not free from interpolation (Ewald, Greek, iv, 277, note). Everywhere the intellectual approxi-mation of Jew and Gentile was growing closer, or at least more possible. The later specific forms of teaching to which this syncretism of East and West gave rise have already been noticed. See ALEXANDRIA. A second time, and in a new fashion, Egypt disciplined the people of God. It first impressed upon a nation the firm unity of a family, and then in due time reconnected a matured people with the world from which it had been called out.

3. PTOLEMY III, Euergetes (Eugyperiences, i.e. well-doer), was the eldest son of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and brother of Berenice, the wife of Antiochus II. The repul-sation and murder of his sister furnished him with an occasion for invading Syria (B.C. cir. 246). He "stood up, a branch out of her stock [sprung from the same parents] in his [father’s] estate; and set himself as [the head of] his army, and came against the fortresses of the king of the north [Antiochus], and dealt against them and prevailed" (Dan. xi, 7). He extended his conquests as far as Antioch, and then eastward to Babylon, but was recalled to Egypt by tidings of seditions which had broken out there. His success was brilliant and complete. "He carried captive into Egypt the gods [of the conquered nations] with their sacred images, and with their precious vessels of silver and gold" (ver. 8). This capture of sacred trophies, which included the recovery of images taken from Egypt by Cambyses (Jerome, ad loc.), earned for the king the name Euergetes—Benefactor—from the superstitious Egyptians, and was specially recorded in the inscriptions which he set up at Adulis. (Cosmas Ind. ap. Clinton, F. H. p. 392, n.) After his return to Egypt (B.C. cir. 243) he suffered a great part of the conquered provinces to fall again under the power of Seleucus. But the attempts which Seleucus made to attack Egypt terminated disastrously to himself. He first collected a fleet, which was almost totally destroyed by a storm; and then, "as if by some judicial intimation," he came against the realm of the king of the south [having defeated] himself to his own land [to Antioch] (Dan. xi, 2; Justinian, xxvii, 2). After this Ptolemy "diedd some years from [attacking] the king of the north" (Dan. xi, 8), since the civil war between Seleucus and Antiochus Hierax, which he fomented, secured him from any further Syrian invasion. The remainder of the reign of Ptolemy seems to have been spent chiefly in developing the resources of the empire, which he raised to the highest pitch of its prosperity. His policy towards the Jews was similar to that of his predecessors, and on his occupation of Syria he offered sacrifices, after the custom of the law, in acknowledgment of his success, in the Temple at Jerusalem, and added gifts worthy of his victory" (Joseph. C. Ap. ii, 5). The famous story of the manner in which Joseph, the son of Tobias, obtained from him the lease of the revenues of Judaea is a striking illustration both of the condition of the country and of the influence of individual Jews (id. Ant. xii, 4). See ONIAS.

4. PTOLEMY IV, Philopator (φιλόπατρος, i.e. father-loving). After the death of Ptolemy Euergetes, the line of the Ptolemies rapidly degenerated (Strabo, xvi, 12, 15, p.798). Ptolemy Philopator, his eldest son, who succeeded him, was, to the last degree, sensual, effeminate, and debased. But, externally, his kingdom retained its power and splendor; and when circumstances forced him to action, Ptolemy himself showed ability not unworthy of his race. The description of the campaign of Raphia (B.C. 217) in the book of Daniel gives a vivid description of his character. "The sons of Seleucus [Seleucus Ceaunius and Antiochus the Great] were stirred up, and assembled a multitude of great forces; and one of them [Antiochus] came, and lowered, and passed through [even to Pelusium; Polyb. v, 62]; and he returned [from Seleucia, to which he had retired during a faithless truce; Polyb. v, 66]; and they [Antiochus and Ptolemy] were stirred up in war even to his [Antiochus’] fortress. And the king of the south [Ptolemy] was stirred up to war, and came forth and fought with him at Raphia; and he set forth a great multitude; and the multitude was given into his hand [to lead to battle]. And the multitude raised itself [proudly for the conflict]; and his heart was lifted up, and he cost down ten thousand (comp. Polyb. v, 86); but he was not exasperated" (Daniel xii, 6). After this decisive success, Ptolemy Philopator visited the neighboring cities of Syria, and, among others, Jerusalem. After offering sacrifices of thanksgiving in the Temple, he attempted to enter the sanctuary. A sudden paralyzis hindered his design; but when he returned to Alexandria, he determined to inflict on the Alexandrian Jews the vengeance for his disappointment. In this, however, he was again hindered; and eventually he confirmed to the Jews the full privileges which they had enjoyed before. See Maccabees, The Third Book of.

The recklessness of his reign was further marked by the first insurrection of the native Egyptians against their Greek rulers (Polyb. v, 107). This was put down, and Ptolemy, during the remainder of his life, gave himself up to unbridled excesses. He was succeeded by his only child, Ptolemy V, Epiphanes, who was at the time only four or five years old (Jerome, ad Dom. xi, 10-12).

Oecotrich of Ptolemy III.

5. PTOLEMY V, Epiphanes (Eupiphanes, i.e. illustrious). The reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes was a critical epoch in the history of the Jews. The rivalry between the Syrian and Egyptian parties, which had for some time divided the people, came to an open rupture in the struggles which marked his minority. The Syrian faction openly declared for Antiochus the Great when he advanced on his second expedition against Egypt.

and the Jews, who remained faithful to the old alliance, fled to Egypt in great numbers, where Onias, the rightful successor to the high-priesthood, not long afterwards established the temple at Leontopolis. (Jerome [ad Dan. xi, 14] places the flight of Onias to Egypt and the foundation of the temple of Leontopolis in the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes; but Onias was still a youth at the time of his father's death, B.C. cir. 171.) See Onias. In the strong language of Daniel, "The robbers of the people exalted themselves to establish the vision" (Dan. xi, 14) — to confirm by the issue of their attempt the truth of the prophetic word, and at the same time to forward unconsciously the establishment of the heavenly kingdom which they sought to anticipate. The accession of Ptolemy, and the confusion of a disputed regency furnished a favorable opportunity for foreign invasion. "Many stood up against the king of the south," under Antiochus the Great and Philip III of Macedonia, who formed a league for the dismemberment of his kingdom. "So the king of the north [Antiochus] came, and cast up a mount, and took the most fenced city [Sidon, to which Sopas, the general of Ptolemy, had fled: Jerome, ad loc.], and the arms of the south did not withstand" [at Paneas, B.C. 198, where Antiochus gained a decisive victory] (Dan. xi, 14, 15). The interference of the Romans, to whom the regents had turned for help, checked Antiochus in his career; but in order to retain the provinces of Cilicia-Syria, Phoenicia, and Judaea, which he had reconquered, really under his power, while he seemed to comply with the demands of the Romans, who required them to be surrendered to Ptolemy, "he gave him [Ptolemy, his daughter Cleopatra] a young maiden" [as his betrothed wife] (Dan. xi, 17). But in the end his policy only partially succeeded. After the marriage of Ptolemy and Cleopatra was consummated (B.C. 198), Cleopatra did "not stand on his side," but supported her husband in maintaining the alliance with Rome. The disputed provinces, however, remained in the possession of Antiochus; and Ptolemy was poisoned at the time when he was preparing an expedition to recover them from Seleucus, the unworthy successor of Antiochus, B.C. 181.

These campaigns, which are intimately connected with the visits of Antiochus to Jerusalem in B.C. 170, 168, 167, and 164, are before us in the story of the siege of Jerusalem (2 Macc. vii, 18). "The [Antiochus] shall stir up his power and his courage against the king of the south with a great army; and the king of the south [Ptolemy Philometor] shall be stirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army; but he shall not stand: for they [the ministers, as it appears, in whom he trusted] shall forecast devices against him. Yes, they that feed the portion of his meat shall destroy him, and his army shall melt away, and many shall fall down slain. And both these kings' hearts shall be to do mischief, and they shall speak lies at one table [Antiochus shall profess falsely to maintain the cause of Philometor against his brother, and Philometor to trust in his good faith]; but it shall not prosper [the resistance of Alexandria shall preserve the independence of Egypt]; for the end shall be at the time appointed. Then shall be [Antiochus] return into his land, and his heart shall be against the holy covenant; and he shall do exploits, and return to his own land. At the time appointed he shall return and come towards the south; but it shall not be as the former, so also the latter time. [His career shall be checked at once.] For the ships of Chittim [Cyprus, Acts xxiv, 24: the ships of Chittim shall come against him: therefore he shall be dismayed and return and have indignation against the holy covenant.]" After the disappointment of Antiochus, Philometor was for some time occupied in resisting the ambitious designs of his brother, who made two attempts to add Cyprus to the kingdom of Cyrene, which was allotted to him. Having effectually put down these attempts, he turned his attention again to Syria. During the brief reign of Antiochus Epiphat he seems to have supported Philip against the regent Lysias (comp. 2 Macc. xi, 29). After the murder of Eupator by Demetrius I, Philometor espoused the cause of Alexander Balas, the rival claimant to the throne, because Demetrius had made an attempt on Cyprus; and when Alexander had defeated and slain his rival, he accepted the overtures which he made, and gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage (B.C. 150: 1 Macc. x, 51-58). Yet, according to 1 Macc. xi, 1, 10, etc., the alliance was not made in good faith, but only as a means towards securing possession of Syria. According to others, Alexander himself may have desired the life of Ptolemy; and so, Ptolemy (comp. 1 Macc. xi, 10), which caused him to transfer his support to Demetrius II, to whom also he gave his daughter, whom he had taken from Alexander. The whole of Syria was quickly subdued, and he was crowned at Antioch king of Egypt and Asia (1 Macc. xi, 12). Alexander made an effort to recover his crown, but was defeated by the forces of Ptolemy and Demetrius, and shortly afterwards put to death in Arabia. But Ptolemy did not long enjoy his success. He fell from his horse in the battle, and died within a few days (1 Macc. xi, 18), B.C. 145. Ptolemy Philometor was the last king of Egypt who was noticed in sacred history, and his reign was marked also by the erection of the temple at Leontopolis. The coincidence is worthy of notice, for the consecration of a new centre of worship placed a religious as well as a political barrier between the Alexandrian and Palestinian Jews. Henceforth the distinction was again divided. The history of the temple itself is extremely obscure, but even in its origin it was a monument of civil strife. Onias, the son of Onias III (Josephus, in one place [War, vii, 10, 2], calls him "the son of Simon," and he appears under the same name in Jewish legends; but it seems certain that this was a mere error, occasioned by the patronymic of the most famous Onias [comp. Herzfeld, Gesch. d. Judenl., ii, 557]), was murdered at Antioch B.C. 171, when he saw that he was excluded from the succession to the high-priesthood by mercenary intruders. He went, as it seemed, to his death or upon the transfer of the office to Alcimus, B.C. 162 (Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 7). It is probable that his retirement must be placed at the later date, for he was a child, τοῖς ἁγίοις Ὑπάρχουσιν (Josephus, Ant. xii, 5), at the time of his father's death. It was, however, one of those who actively opposed the Syrian party in Jerusalem (Josephus, War, i, 1). In Egypt, he entered the service of the king, and rose, with another Jew, Dositheus, to the supreme command. In this office he rendered important services during the war which Ptolemy Philometor waged against his brother; and he pleaded these to induce the king to grant him a ruined temple of Diana (ἡ ἄπραξ Ὑπάρχουσιν) at Leontopolis as the site of a temple which he proposed to build "after the pattern of that at Jerusalem, and of the same dimensions." He also asked that the body of the body, who were at the time "divided into hostile factions, even as the Egyptians were, from their differences in religious services" (Josephus, Ant. xii, 3, 5). In defence of the locality which he chose, he quoted the words of Isaiah (Isa. xix, 18, 19), who spoke of "an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and, according to one interpretation, mentioned "the city of the Sun" (Ἡλίας ἔχουσαν) by name. The site was granted and the temple built, but the original plan was not exactly carried out. The συνοδαμή "like a tower to the height of sixty cubits" (Josephus, War, vii, 10, 3, πῦργῳ παρακλήσιστοι . . . ἡ ἑξακοσίων πυργίς ἀνοστομέτρο) of the altar and the offerings were similar to those at Jerusalem, but in place of the seven-branched candlestick was a single lamp of gold suspended by a golden chain. The service was performed by priests and Levites of pure descent; and the temple possessed considerable revenues, which were devoted to their support and to the adequate celebration of the divine ritual (Josephus, War, vii, in, 3, 4, Ant. xii, 3, 5). The object of Ptolemy Philometor in the foundation of Leontopolis was not less the same as that which led to the erection of the "golden calve" in Israel. The Jewish residents in Egypt were numerous and powerful; and when Jerusalem was in the hands of the Syrians, it became of the utmost importance to weaken their connection with their mother city. In this respect the position of the temple on the eastern border of the kingdom was peculiarly important (Jost, Gesch. des Judenthums, 1, 117). On the other hand, it is probable that Onias saw no hope for the elizabethan Judaism of a poor province; and the triumph of the Maccabeans was still unachieved when the temple at Leontopolis was founded. The date of this event cannot, indeed, be exactly determined. Josephus says (War, vii, 10, 4) that the temple had existed 945 years at the time of its destruction, A.D. 71; but the text is manifestly corrupt. Eusebius (ap. Hieron. viii, p. 567, ed. Migne) notices the flight of Onias and the building of the temple under the same year (B.C. 162), possibly from the natural connection of the events without regard to the exact date of the latter. Some time at least must be allowed for the military service of Onias, and the building in later times whether the service were not idolatrous (Jerus. Josua, 43 d, ap. Jost, Gesch. des Judenthums, i, 119); but the Mishna, embodying, without doubt, the old decisions, determines the point more favorably. "Priests who had served at Leontopolis were forbidden to serve at Jerusalem, but were not excluded from attending the public services." A "vow might be discharged rightly at Leontopolis as well as at Jerusalem, but it was not enough to discharge it at the former place only" (Menach. 109 a, ap. Jost, as above). The circumstances under which the new temple was erected were evidently exaggerated into an excuse for the irreligious worship. The connection with Jerusalem, though weakened in popular estimation, was not broken; and the spiritual significance of the one Temple remained unchanged for the devout believer (Philos., De Monarchia, ii, 2, etc.).

The Jewish colony in Egypt, of which Leontopolis was the immediate religious centre, was formed of various elements and at different times. The settlements which were made under the Greek sovereigns, though the most important, were by no means the first. In the later times of the kingdom of Judah many "traded in Egypt," and took refuge there (Jer. xiiii, 6, 7); and when Jeremiah was taken to Tahapanes, he spoke to "all the Jews which dwell in the land of Egypt, which dwell at Migdol and Tahapanes, and at Noph, and in the country of the Pharaohs" (Jer. xlii, 2, 3). The spirit of commerce must have contributed to increase the number of emigrants; but the history of the Egyptian Jews is involved in the same deep obscurity as that of the Jews of Palestine till the invasion of Alexander. Their spirit, however, is hardly doubted as to the power and influence of the colony; and the mere fact of its existence is an important consideration in estimating the possibility of Jewish ideas finding their way to the West. Judaism had secured, in old times, all the treasures of Egypt, and thus the first instalment of the debt was paid. A preparation was already made for a great work when the founding of Alexandria opened a new era in the history of the Jews. Alexander, according to the policy of all great conquerors, incorporated the conquered in his armies. The Jews of Samaria and Judea (Josephus, Ant. xii, 6) were put to death (Josephus, Ant. xi, 8, 5; Hecat. ap. Joseph. C. Ap. i, 22) are mentioned among his troops; and the tradition is probably true which reckons them among the first settlers at Alexandria (Josephus, War, ii, 18, 7; C. Ap. i, 4). Ptolemy Soter increased the colony of the Jews in Egypt both by force and by policy; and their numbers in the next reign may be estimated by the statement (Josephus, Ant. xii, 2, 1) that Ptolemy Philadelpheus gave freedom to one hundred and twenty thousand. The position occupied by Joseph (Josephus, Ant. xii, 4) at the court of Ptolemy Euergetes implies that the Jews were not only numerous, but influential. As we go onward, the legendary accounts of the persecution of Ptolemy Philopator bear witness at least to the great number of Jewish residents in Egypt (3 Macc. iv, 15, 17), and to their dispersion throughout the Delta. In the next reign many of the inhabitants of Palestine who remained faithful to the Egyptian alliance fled to Egypt to escape from the Syrian rule (comp. Jerome, ad Dan. xi. 14, who is, however, confused in his account). The consideration which their presence was to him thus gained, was the rank which a Jew, Aristobulus, is said to have held under Ptolemy Philometor as "tutor of the king" (vid. supra, 2 Macc. i. 10). The later history of the Alexandrian Jews has already been noticed. See Alexandria.

They retained their privileges under the Romans, though they were exposed to the illegal oppression of individual governors, and quietly acquiesced in the foreign dominion (Josephus, War, vii. 10, 1). An attempt which was made by some of the fugitives from Palestine to create a rising in Alexandria after the destruction of Jerusalem entirely failed; but the attempt gave the Romans an excuse for plundering, and afterwards (B.C. 71) for closing entirely, the temple at Leontopolis (Josephus, War, vii. 10).

7. The son of Dorymenes (1 Macc. iii. 38; 2 Macc. iv. 45; comp. Polyb. v. 61), a courtier who possessed great influence with Antiochus Epiphanes. He was induced by a bribe to support the cause of Menelaus (2 Macc. iv. 45-50), and afterwards took an active part in forcing the Jews to apostatize (2 Macc. vi. 8, according to this conjecture). When Judas had successfully resisted the first assaults of the Syrians, Ptolemy took part in the great expedition which Laomedon organized against him, which ended in the defeat at Emmaus (B.C. 166); but nothing is said of his personal fortunes in the campaign (1 Macc. iii. 38).

8. The son of Agoras (Ath. vi. p. 246 C), a Megalopolitans, named Macron (2 Macc. x. 12), was governor of Cyprus during the minority of Ptolemy Philometor. This office he discharged with singular fidelity (Polyb. xxvii. 12); but afterwards he deserted the Ptolemaic party to join Antiochus Epiphanes. He stood high in the favor of Antiochus, and received from him the government of Phoenicia and Cœle-Syria (2 Macc. viii. 8; x. 11, 12). On the accession of Antiochus Eupator, his conciliatory policy towards the Jews brought him into suspicion at court. He was deprived of his government, and in consequence of this disgrace, he poisoned himself, B.C. cir. 164 (2 Macc. x. 13).

Ptolemy Macron is commonly identified with Ptolemy the "son of Dorymenes," and it seems likely, from a comparison of 1 Macc. iii. 38 with 2 Macc. viii. 8, 9, that this son of Dorymenes is the person referred to in the latter account of the war. But the testimony of Athenaeus distinctly separates the governor of Cyprus from the "son of Dorymenes" by his parentage. It is also doubtful whether Ptolemy Macron had left Cyprus as early as B.C. 170, when the "son of Dorymenes" was at Tyre (2 Macc. iv. 45); though there is no authority for the common statement that he gave up the island into the hands of Antiochus, who did not gain it till B.C. 168.

9. The son of Alabus, who married the daughter of Simon the Maccabee. He was a man of great wealth, and, being invested with the government of the distant city of Jericho, formed the design of usurping the sovereignty of Judea. With this view he treacherously murdered Simon and two of his sons (1 Macc. xvi. 11-16; Josephus, Ant. xiii. 7, 4; 8, 1, with some variations); but John Hyrcanus received timely intimation of his design, and escaped. Hyrcanus afterwards besieged him in his stronghold of Dib; but in consequence of the occurrence of the Sabbatical year, Ptolemy was enabled to make his escape to Zeno Cotylas, prince of Philadelphia (Josephus, Ant. xiii. 8, 1).

10. The father of Lysimachus, the Greek translator of Esther (Euth. xiii.). Whether this is the same Ptolemy who is mentioned in the same verse as the carrier of the book to Egypt remains uncertain. See Lysimachus.1

"Ptolemais" (Hiero§ma), the name of two places in Scripture.

1. The same as Accho (q. v.). The name is, in fact, an interpolation in the history of the place. The city which was called Accho in the earliest Jewish annals, and which is again the Akko or St. Jean d'Arc of crusading and modern times, was named Ptolemais in the Macreidian and Roman authors for the former of these periods; it was the most important town upon the coast, and it is prominently mentioned in the first book of Maccabees (v. 13, 55; x. 1, 58, 60; xii. 48). In the latter its eminence was far outdone by Herod's new city of Caesarea. It is worthy of notice that Herod, on his return from Italy to Syria, landed at Ptolemais (Josephus, Ant. xiv. 15, 1). Still in the New Test. Ptolemais is a marked point in Paul's travels both by land and sea. He must have passed through it on all his journeys along the great coast road which connected Caesarea and Antioch (Acts xi. 20; xii. 25; xv. 2, 20, 25; xviii. 22); and the distances are given both in the Antoinian and Jerusalem itineraries (Wesseling, Itin. p. 158, 584). But it is specifically mentioned in Acts xxi. 7, as containing a Christian community, visited for one day by Paul. On this occasion he came to Ptolemais by sea. He was then on his return voyage from the third missionary journey. The last harbor at which he had touched was Tyre (ver. 8). From Ptolemais he proceeded, apparently by land, to Caesarea (ver. 8), and thence to Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 6-8).

2. A place described as οἰκοπόρος, rose-producing (3 Macc. vii. 17), and supposed to be the οἰκοπόρος of Ptolemy (iv. b. 57), in Central Egypt, in the Antonite nome, a district still abounding in roses (Mannert, Geogr. der Griechen u. Römer, x. 1, p. 419; Ritter, Erdkunde, i. 789, 797).

Ptolemais, a branch of the Gnostic sect of the 3rd century, d.ributed by Ireneus as a "check from the Valentinians," takes their name from their leader Ptolemy (q. v.), who differed in opinion from Valentinian with respect to the number and nature of the souls, as well as the authorship and design of some portions of the Old Testament. See Ptolemy.

Ptolemeis, Ptolemois'us, Ptole'mee, forms of the name Ptolemy sometimes found in the Apocryphal books of Esther and Maccabees. See Ptolemeis.

Ptolemy. See Ptolemeis.

Ptolemy was a Gnostic philosopher, in whom, according to St. Ireneus (Pref. ad lib. i., Adv. Haer.), the system of Valentinianism was developed. Ireneus gives a full exposition of it in his work Adv. Haer., lib. i. c. 1, 8. Ptolemy is also named by Tertullian, but without any particulars of his history (Contra Faustum, c. xxvii.), and in a very few words by Philaster (Hier. c. xxviii.), Augustine (Hier. c. xiii.), Prol. Contra Prud. (Hier. c. xii.), and the continuator of Tertullian (Pseudo-Tertullian, Hier. c. xii.). St. Epiphanius, in his great work on heresies (Hier. lib. xxx. c. iii.), communicates a letter of this Ptolemy to Flora, in which the former explains to the lady the fundamental features of his doctrine, and the difference between the Ptolemaic and the Valentinian systems. Ptolemy is in particular named by that of Hiero-Neon as regards a duplex system of four. See Heroeon.

tem, and that neither the authenticity nor the integrity (except one marginal note in cap. 1, § 6) of the former can be questioned.—Wetter u. Welte, Kirchen-Leizikon, a. v.

Pu'ah (Numb. xxvi, 23). See Phuvah.

Pu'ah, the form in the A. V. of the name of two men and one woman, each different in the Hebrew.

1. (Heb. Pu'ah, ὑβαον, I Chron. vii, 1.) See Phuvah.

2. (Heb. Pu'ah, ὑβαον, thought by Gesenius and First to be for ὑβαον, éπισελεία; Sept. Φωσι, Vulg. Ποεα.) The last named of the two midwives to whom Pharaoh gave instructions to kill the Hebrew male children at their birth (Exod. i, 15). B.C. cir. 1740. In the A. V. they are called "Hebrew midwives," a rendering which is not required by the original, and which is regarded by many as doubtful, both from the improbability that the king would have instructed the execution of such a task to the women of the nation he was endeavoring to destroy, as well as from the answer of the women themselves in ver. 19, "for the Hebrew women are not like the Egyptian women;" from which we may infer that they were accustomed to act upon the latter, and were themselves Egyptians. If we translate Exod. i, 18 in this way, "And the king of Egypt said to the women who acted as midwives to the Hebrew women, this difficulty is removed. The two, Shiphrah and Puah, are supposed to have been the chief and representatives of their profession. Aben- Ezra says, "They were chiefs over all the midwives: for no doubt there were more than 500 midwives, but these two were chiefs over them to give tribute to the king of the hire." According to Jewish tradition, Shiphrah was Recheba, and Puah Miriam; "because," says Rashi, "she cried and talked and murmured to the child, after the manner of the women that lull a weeping infant." The origin of all this is an imaginary play upon the name Puah, which is derived from a root signifying "to cry out," as in Isa. xxxii, 14, and used in Rabbinical writers of the bleating of sheep.—Smith. Josephus (Ant. ii, 9, 9) intimates that these were Egyptian women; but when it is considered that no Egyptian woman was likely to pollute herself by rendering such offices to a Hebrew woman; that Puah and Shiphrah are described as serving Jehovah, and Puah and Shiphrah shorn; that Moses intended to convey the other meaning, he will have written הָתְנְדָה שִפְרָה שִפְרָה, reason will be found for preferring the opinion that they were Hebrew women.

3. (Heb. Pu'ah, ὑβαον, perhaps i. q. πελογ. mouth; Sept. Φου, Vulg. Ποεα.) The father of Tola, who was of the tribe of Issachar, and judge of Israel after Abimelech (Judg. x, 1). B.C. ante 1319. In the Vulg., instead of "the son of Dodo," he is called "the uncle of Abimelech," and in the Sept. Tola is said to be "the son of Phua, the son (ψιης) of his father's brother;" both versions being apparently inapplicable, as he is spoken of as a Hebrew, and that though the words הָתְנְדָה שִפְרָה שִפְרָה may be translated "midwives of the Hebrews," they more probably mean, as the A. V. gives them, "Hebrew midwives;" and that had Moses intended to convey the other meaning, he would have written הָתְנְדָה שִפְרָה שִפְרָה, reason will be found for preferring the opinion that they were Hebrew women.

Public Worship is the service of the different religious bodies open to all worshippers, and is so designated in distinction from minor services intended simply as auxiliaries to the devoted in their religious life. It is usually performed in the presence of the clergy, though it need not be thus limited. It is at any rate supposed to embrace a public address in behalf of the truth espoused by the congregation convened. In the Christian Church the outward forms of religion tended in her very infancy to the imposing. From the ancient temples the incense and many customs of heathenism were transferred to the churches. By the use of tapers and perpetual lamps, the solemnity of nocturnal festivals was combined with the light of day. The people were called together by a piece of metal struck by a hammer, until this method led to the adoption of bells in the 7th century. Soon after the word of God came into use, and added to the spectacular action of Christian worship. But notwithstanding this unwarranted tendency towards the dramatic, the exalting of Holy Scripture and prayer formed a principal part in early worship. In the Roman Church the practice of public worship consisted in the sermon, though it was often only a rhetorical amusement rewarded by the clapping of hands. As the Church had been formed under the Roman empire, it retained many Roman usages. The first to protest against the peculiarities of the Roman clergy were the Christians of Britain, who worshipped in the simplicity of apostolic times. But no effectual check was put upon ecclesiastical usages until the great Reformation movement which resulted in restoring the beautiful and impressive order of the service of his disciples. See Worship. Nearly all Protestant churches have regulations regarding the form and order of public worship. In the Anglican service-book the rubrics (q. v.) present it. According to article xx, the Church has power to decree rites or ceremonies that are not contrary to God's Word, and according to common authority, "it is not necessary that traditions and ceremonies be in all places one, or utterly like; for all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners; so that nothing be ordained against God's Word." But in this same article provision is also made against unscriptural (popish) innovations, as well as against the abandonment of those regulations instituted by the proper authority.

"Whosoever, through his private judgment, willingly and purposely does any trembling to break the tranquillity of any ceremonies of the Church, which be not repugnant to the Word of God, and not decreed, and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly (that others may fear to do the like), as he that offends against the common order of the Church, and hurts the authority of the magistrate, and wounds the concord of weak brethren. Every particular or national Church hath authority to ordain, change, and廢 the ceremonies of the Church, ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying."

Canon 6 provides: "Whoever shall affirm that the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England by law established are wicked, or not Christian, or not very useful and orderly, and shall not be allowed to any college, hall, house of learning, or hospital, and every public professed and reader in either of the universities, or in every college elsewhere, and every vicar, and every person in holy orders, and every schoolmaster keeping any public or private school, and every person instructing or teaching any youth in any house or private family as tutor or schoolmaster, who shall be incumbent, or have possession of any cure of soul in any church or chapel, or who shall teach any youth as tutor, or schoolmaster, shall be subject to be removed from his admission to be incumbent, or having possession aforesaid, subcribe the declaration following: 'I, A. B., do declare that I will not desist from the use of the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, as it is now by law established'" (13 and 14 Charles Ill. c. 4, 8, 8, and 1 William, sess. 1, c. 8, 8). And no form or order of common worship, sacraments, rites, or ceremonies, shall be openly used in any church, chapel, or any house, which is not that which is prescribed in the service book (11).
PUBLIC WORSHIP

Canon 4. "Whoever so shall affirm that the form of Government of the Church of England, established by law, and contained in the Book of Common Prayer and Administration of Sacraments, is a corrupt, superstitious, or God-denying form, or that such anything in it, as that is repugnant to the Scriptures, let him be excommunicated from the Church, and put out of the Bishop's place, or the ministry, till he retract and publicly recant the said error.

If any minister, after he hath subscribed to the Book of Common Prayer, shall omit to use the form of prayer, or any of the orders or ceremonies prescribed for in the Book, such omission and neglect shall be considered and punished as if he had been suspended; and after a month he do not reform and submit himself, let him be excommunicated, and then if he shall not submit himself to be suspended for the space of another month, let him be dismissed from the ministry.

"Thus it requires that "no man shall cover his head in the church or chapel in the time of divine service, except he have some infirmity, in which case let him wear a headgear or cap.

All manner of persons then present shall reverently kneel upon their knees, when the general confession, litany, or other prayers are read; and shall stand up at the saying of the Believers, according to the rules that in that behalf prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer. All persons then present shall devoutly hear the Lord's prayers, and all the supplications that are therein mentioned, due and lowly reverence shall be done by all persons present, as it hath been accustomed; truly, 'tis a duty that a priest, in manner of service, in the church, in the presence of the people, in the spirit of New Testament, and in the manner of divine service and worship, is his main end. And as none, either man, woman, or child, of what calling soever, shall be otherwise at such times but with reverence, with the face toward the Church, and in such a posture as to hear the marks, and understand that which is read, preached, or ministered: saying in their due places andisly, with the mouth of the Gospel, the Church's order, and the Creed, and making such other answers to the public prayers as are set down in the Book of Common Prayer: neither shall they disturb the service or sermon by walking or talking, or in any other way; nor depart out of the church during the time of divine service or sermon without some urgent or reasonable cause."

Canon 14. "The common prayer shall be said or sung distinctly and reverently, upon such days as are appointed to be kept holy by the Book of Common Prayer, and their eyes, and in convenient and unobstructed places, and in the presence of the people, and the common prayer shall be said in the churches, as the bishop of the diocese or ecclesiastical order of the place shall think meet for the largeness or straitness of the same, as the people may be most edified. All ministers likewise shall observe the orders, rites, and ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, as well in reading the Holy Scriptures and singing of prayers as in the administration of the sacraments, without either diminishing in regard of preaching or in any other respect, or adding anything in the matter or form thereof."

The Book of Common Prayer: "All priests and deacons are to say daily the morning and evening prayer, either privately or openly, not being let by sickness, travel, or other urgent cause, and the curate the minister serves in every parish church or chapel, being at home, and not being otherwise reasonably hindered, shall say or cause to be said the morning and evening prayers in the parish church or chapel where he ministereth; and so shall serve a bell to be tolled thereunto, a cord or bell-rope before he begin, and the people may come to hear God's Word, and to pray with him."

The American reviewers omitted from the Prayer-book the 46th canon of 1662, which enjoins that "every minister, after he has served and lectures, and on all other occasions of public worship, use the Book of Common Prayer as the same is or may be established by the authority of the General Convention of this Church. And in performing the Liturgy, no other prayer shall be used than those prescribed by the said book."

The Westminster Directory enact: "Let all enter the assembly, not irreverently, but in a godly manner, taking their seats or places without adoration, or bowing themselves towards one place or other. The congregation being assembled, the minister shall, according to the custom of the church, give the worshippers of the great name of God, to begin with prayer. The beginning of the prayer the people are wholly to attend upon it, for bearing to read anything except what the minister is then reading or citation: and abstaining much more from, to cease from what is no way fit for the congregation, or doing reverence to any person present, or coming in; as also from all gazing, sleeping, and other indecent behavior, which may hinder the people, or hinder themselves or others in the service of God. If any, they shall be publicly admonished to this present at the beginning, they ought not, when they come into the congregation, to betake themselves to their private devotions, but remain still with the congregation, and join with the assembly in that ordinance of God which is then in hand."

This injunction to begin with prayer has been universally departed from in Scotland, and the reason assigned is this: "The reader or preacher began the service with reading a chapter, and gave out a psalm as the minister, also that the minister, the psalm being sung, began with prayer. But the preacher's function has ceased since the middle or towards the end of last century, and the minister now begins with prayer, doing himself what was used to be done by his subordinate. See PREACHER; READER.

In most of the American churches the principal object of public worship is the expounding of the Word of God by the minister in a sermon. This is usually preceded by song and prayer and the reading of the Scriptures, and followed by prayer and song. The order of the service differs, being uncertain, and is immaterial. See CHURCH; CLEANSING; LITANY; PRAYER; WORSHIP.

PUBLICAN (πολιτικός). The word thus translated belongs only, in the New Test., to the three Synoptic Gospels. The class designated by the term were employed as collectors of the Roman revenue. The Latin word from which the English of the A. V. has been taken was applied to a higher order of men. It will be necessary to glance at the financial administration of the Roman provinces in order to understand the relations of the publicans to one another and the grounds of the hatred and scorn which appear in the New Test. to have fallen on the former.

The Roman senate had found it convenient, at a period as early as, if not earlier than, the second Punic war, to appoint the king of one of the independent cities of the Carthaginians, and the portorius (customs, including the oneris on goods carried into or out of cities) to capitalists who undertook to pay a given sum into the treasury (in publicum), and so received the name of publicani (Livy, xxi., 7). Contacts of this kind fell naturally into the hands of the equites, as the richest class of Romans. These knights were an order instituted as early as the time of Romulus, and composed of men of great consideration with the government—"the principal men of dignity in their several countries," who occupied a kind of middle rank between the senators and the people (Josephus, Ant. xii., 4). Although these officers were, according to Cicero, the ornament of the city and the strength of the commonwealth, they did not attain to great offices, nor enter the senate, so long as they continued in the order of knights. They were thus more capable of devoting their attention to the collection of the public revenue. Not unfrequently the sum bidden went beyond the means of any individual capitalist, and a joint-stock company (societas) was formed, with one of the partners, or an agent appointed by them, acting as manager (Livy, xxi., 7; Plut. Philip, 9). Under this officer, who commonly resided at Rome, transacting the business of the company, paying profits to the partners and the like, were the submagistri, living in the provinces. Under them, in like manner, were the portorici, the actual custom-house officers (decemviri), who examined each bale of goods exported or imported, assessed its value more or less arbitrarily, wrote out the ticket, and enforced payment. The latter were commonly natives of the province in which they were stationed, as being most familiar with all classes of the population. The word publican, etymologically might have been used of the publicani properly so called (τοιοῦτοι, ὡς ὅμοιοι), was used popularly, and in the New Test., exclusively of the portorici. The same practice prevailed in the East, from which an illustration of it has been preserved to us by Josephus. He tells us that on the marriage of Cleopatra to Ptolemy, the latter received from Antiochus as his daughter dowry Czale-Syria, Samaria, Judea, and Phoenicia; that "upon the division of the taxes between the two kings, the portion assigned to Antiochus was paid in the cities of the countries, paying to the kings the stipulated sum; and that "when the day came on which the king was to let the taxes of the cities to farm, and those that were the principal men of dignity in their several countries were to bid for them, the sum of the taxes together of Cœle-Syria, and Phoenicia, and Judaea, and Samaria, as they were designated large sums of money to the State, and towards the close of the republic they were so generally members of the equestrian order that the words equites and publicani were sometimes used as synonymos (Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Antiq. a.v. v.).
The publicani were thus an important section of the economy of the empire, the money thus raised being put at the disposal of the state for political purposes, to court that order, might describe them as "flos equitum Romanorum, ornamentum civitatis, firmamentum Reipublicae" (Cicero, Pro Flacco. 9). The system was, however, essentially a vicious one—the most detestable, perhaps, of all modes of managing a revenue (comp. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, vol. ii), and it bore its natural fruits. The publicani were banded together to support each other's interest, and at once re-pected and defied all interference (Livy, xxv, 3, 4).
They demanded severe laws, and put every such law into exection. Impunity was produced in consequence of the most vexatious or fraudulent exactions, and a remedy was all but impossible. The popular feeling ran strong even against the equestrian capitalists. The Macedonians complained, as soon as they were brought under Roman government, that they were treated not with clemency and justice, but with usury and extortion.
"Aut jus publicum vanum, aut libertas societas nulla" (Livy, xiv, 18). Cicero, in writing to his brother (Ad Quinti i, 1, 11), speaks of the difficulty of keeping the publicani within bounds, and yet not offending them, as the hardest task of the governor of a province. Tacitus counted it as one bright feature of the short life of a people unlike his own that there "nee publicanis atterri" (Germ, 29). For a moment the capricious liberalism of Nero led him to entertain the thought of sweeping away the whole system of portoria; but the conservatism of the senate, as well as the interest of the state, forbade the scheme (Tacitus, Ann., xxiii, 50), and the "immodestiae publicanorum" (ibid.) remained unchecked.
If this was the case with the directors of the company, what was the situation of the lower classes of its members? They were considered whenever they had an opportunity (Luke iii, 18). They brought false charges of smuggling in the hope of extorting hush-money (ibid. xii, 8). They detained and opened letters on mere suspicion (Tertullian, Tharna, 2, 39; Plautus, Trismum, ii. 3). They were in the habit of extorting money from themselves, in most cases the subject of complaint (Cicero, Ad Quinti, i, 1, 11). It was the basest of all livelihoods (Cicero, De Off., i, 42). They were the wolves and bears of human society (Stobæus, Serm., 34). Ουδέραν ἀρχον, μετέξας ἀπομάκρυναν had become a proverb, even under an earlier regime, and it was truer than ever now (Xenoph. Com. ap. Dacier.
Meineke, Frag. Com. iv, 596). Of these subordinate officials there appear to have been two classes, both included by us under the general name publican—the δροσφαζόμενοι, or "chief of the publicans," of whom we have an instance in Zacchæus; and the ordinary publi-cans (ταλαπτικοί), the lowest class of servants engaged in the collection of the revenue, and of whom Levi, afterwards the apostle Matthew, is an example. The former, the δροσφαζόμενοι, appear to have been managers under the publicani proper, or associations of publicans, already spoken of. They were intrusted with the su-ervision of a collecting district, and if they were its duty to see that, in that district, the inferior officers were faithful, and that the various taxes were regularly gathered in. Their situation was thus one of much greater consequence than that of the ordinary "publican" of the Gospels. They seem to have possessed a much higher character, and many of them became wealthy men.
Zac-
chéus is the only example of an ἄρχοντας mentioned in the New Testament, and it is the ordinary ταλαπτικοί, whom the government had engaged either to keep the dependants whom they employed, but a still lower class of servants, who most interest us. These were not the publicani, but the portoria of the Roman empire, who derived their name from levying the taxes known as the portoria. The portoria included the duties upon the imported and exported goods, and upon merchandise passing through the country—one important source of the wealth of Solomon: "Besides that, he had of the merchants, and of the traffic of the spice merchants" (1 Kings x, 19). They included also the tribute or the tribute levied from individuals for personal vices or tolls which appear to have been exiguous for the use of roads and bridges. They thus extended over a large number of particulars, and, however honorably and gently the function of the portorius had been discharged, it would have been impossible for him to avoid that which the tax-collector seldom escapes from the taxployer. But the office, invidious enough in itself, was in the ancient world rendered still more hateful, as we have seen, by the inquisitorial proceedings and the unscrupulous exactions of those who discharged its duties.
The frightful and protracted persecution of the Jews by the governors who were sent to rule them are well known to all; but the same system of abuse marked the whole army of officials from the highest to the lowest, only that the lowest came in contact with the great mass of the people, and that their hardships, their severities and severities must have been felt, under one form or another, by almost all. To such an extent, indeed, did these exactions proceed, even in the very neighborhood of Rome, that at one time the Roman government, as the only means of introducing a remedy, abolished all the import and export duties in the ports of Italy
All this was enough to bring the class into ill-favor everywhere. In Judæa and Galilee there were special circumstances of aggravation. The employment brought out all the besetting vices of the Jewish character. The strong feeling of many Jews as to the absolute unlawfulness of paying tribute at all made matters worse.
The Scribes who discussed the question (Matt. xxii, 15) for the most part answered it in the negative. The Galileans or Herodians, the district in which Galilea lived, were the most turbulent and rebellious (Acts v, 37). They thought it unlawful to pay tribute, and founded their refusal to do so on their being the people of the Lord, because a true Israelite was not permitted to acknowledge any other sovereign than God (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 2). The Galileans were thus in a position to mention by the subjection of the Jews to the Roman emperor was perpetuated, and the paying of tribute was regarded as a virtual acknowledgment of his sovereignty. They were also noted for their impositions, rapine, and extortion, to which they were perhaps more especially prompted by having a share in the farm of the tribune, as they were thus tempted to oppress the people with illegal exactions that they might the more speedilly enrich themselves. Theocritus considered the bear and the lion the most cruel among the beasts of the wilderness, and among the beasts of the city the publican and the parasite. In addition to their other faults, accordingly, the publicans of the New Testament were regarded as traitors and apostates, defiled by their frequent intercourse with the heathen, willing tools of the oppressor.
They were classed with sinners (Matt. ix, 11; xi, 19), with harlots (xxi, 31, 32), with the heathen (xviii, 17).
In Galilee they consisted probably of the least reputable members of the fisherman and peasant class. Left to themselves, men of decent lives holding aloof from them, their vanity and loose conversations, as well as those like them, were outcasts from the world's law. Scribes and people alike hated them.
The Gospels present us with some instances of this feeling. To eat and drink "with publicans" seems to the Pharisaic mind incompatible with the character of a spiritual leader (Matt. xi. 19). They spoke in the name of the Father, not of a man, as was the case with our Lord as the friend of publicans (xi. 19). Rabbinc writings furnish some curious illustrations of the same feeling. The Chaklee Targum and R. Solomon in "the archers who sit by the waters" of Judges v. 11, a description of the ravens sitting on the banks of rivers or seas as an ambush for the wayfarer. The custom of the Talmud enumerates three classes of men with whom promises need not be kept, and are three murderers, thieves, and publicans (Nedar, iii. 4). No money known to come from them was received in any way, according to the command of the Temple (Baba Kama, x. 1). To write a publican's ticket, or even to carry the ink for it on the Sabbath, was a distinct breach of the commandment (Shabb. viii. 2). They were not fit to sit in judgment, or even to give testimony (Sukkot, fol. 52, 2). Sometimes there is an exceptional notice in their favor. It was recorded as a special excellence in the father of a rabbi that, having been a publican for thirteen years, he had lessened instead of increasing the pressure of taxation (Bab. It is the early Christian fathers who take up the same condemnation of the publican or officer, exclaiming, Tusculum, and from the exhausted vocabulary of Chrysostom they have heaped upon them every epithet of abuse. See the passages bearing upon this point in Wettstein's note on Matt. v. 46; also Sozomen's Theaetysis, v. 4; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 28; and Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. ad Matt. xvii. The class thus practically excommunicated furnished some of the earliest disciples both of the Baptist and of our Lord. Like the outlawing, so-called "dangerous classes" of other times, they were at least free from hypocrisy. Whatever moral or religious value there was in them, it was not in the formal convention. We may think of the Baptist's preaching as having been to them what Wesley's was to the colliers of Kingswood or the Cornish miners. The publican who cried in the bitterness of his spirit, "God be merciful to me a sinner" (Luke xvii. 18), may be taken as the representative of those who had come under this influence (Matt. xxv. 82). The Galilean fishermen had probably learned, even before their Master taught them, to overcome their repugnance to the publicans with whom they had been sharers in the same baptism. The publicans (Matthew perhaps among them) had probably gone back to their work learning to exact no more than what was appointed them (Luke iii. 13). However startling the choice of Matthew, the publican, to be of the number of the twelve may have seemed to the Pharisees, they were no trace of any perplexity or offence on the part of the disciples.

The position of Zacchaeus as an ἀρχηγός (Luke xix. 2) implies a position of some importance among the persons thus employed. Possibly the balsam trade, of which Jericho was the centre, may have brought larger profits; possibly he was one of the ἑμβολεύοντα in immediate communication with the bureau at Rome. That it was possible for even a Jewish publican to attain considerable wealth we find from the story of John the ἡγιασμένος (Josephus, War, ii. 14, 4), who acts with the leading Jews and offers a bribe of eight talents to the procurator, Gessius Florus. The fact that Jericho was at this time a city of the priests—12,000 are said to have lived there—gives, it need hardly be said, a special significance to our Lord's preference of the house of Zaccheus. When Jesus visited the house of Zaccheus, who appears to have been eminently honest and upright, he was assured by him that he was ready to give one half of his goods to the poor, and if he had taken anything from any man by false accusation, to "restore it fourfold" (Luke xix. 6). This was in reference to the Roman law, which required that when any farmer convicted of extortion he should return four times the value of what he had fraudulently obtained. There is no reason to suppose that either Zacchaeus or Matthew had been guilty of unjust practices, or that there was any exception to their characters beyond that of being a sinner in the opinion of the world, as the other examples of this occur. Suetonius (Vesp. 1) mentions the case of Salamin, a collector of the fortieth pennies in Asia, who had several statues erected to him by the cities of the province, with this inscription, "To the honest tax-farmer." See Bibia Eaductor, iii. 193. For notes on the publicans see Matthew's Sources, Index Programmatum, p. 56, 57. See Tax-Gatherers.

PUBLICIUS, English Waldenses (q. v.), of whom Rapin, in relating the transactions of the council of Henry II, gives the following account, on the authority of archbishop Usher: "Henry ordered a council to meet at Oxford in 1166, to examine the tenets of certain heretics, called Publiciuni. Very probably they were disciples of the Waldenses, who began then to appear. When they were asked in the council who they were, they answered they were Christians and followers of the apostles. After that, being questioned upon the Creed, their replies were very orthodox as to the Trinity and incarnation. But (says Rapin) if the historian is to be depended on, they rejected baptism, the Eucharist, marriage, and the communion of saints. They showed much more simplicity and meekness in their whole behavior. When they were threatened with death, in order to oblige them to renounce their tenets, they only said, 'Blessed are they that suffer for righteousness' sake.' There is no difficulty in understanding what were their sentiments on these heretical points. When a monk says to the Eucharist, it is because they rejected the doctrine of transubstantiation; when he says they rejected marriage, he means that they declared it to be a sacrament, and maintained it to be a civil institution; when he says they rejected the communion of saints, nothing more is to be understood than that they refused to hold communion with the corrupt Church of Rome; and when he says that they rejected baptism, we understand by it that they rejected the baptism of infants. These were the errors for which they were branded with a hot iron in their foreheads. See Irvine, History of the Baptists, i. 56 sq.

Publius (Greekized Πούλιος), the chief man—probably the governor—of Melita, or Malta, who received and lodged Paul and his companions on the occasion of their being shipwrecked off that island (Acts xxvii. 1-21). It soon appears that Publius was entertaining an angel unaware, for Paul gave proof of his divine commission by miraculously healing the father of Publius of a fever, and afterwards working other cures on the sick who were brought to him. Publius possessed property in Melita: the distinctive title given to him is "the first (πρώτος) of the island," and two inscriptions—one in Greek, the other in Latin—have been found at Civita Vecchia, in which that apparently official title occurs. An inscription found in Malta designates the governor of the island by the same title. (See Lewin's St. Paul, ii. 209, where the originals are given, showing this to be the only natural interpretation.) Publius may perhaps have been the delegate of the Roman praetor of Sicily, to whose jurisdiction Melita, or Malta, belonged. The Roman martyrologies assert that he was the first bishop of the island, and that he was afterwards appointed to succeed Dionysius as bishop of Athens. Jerome records a tradition that he was crowned with martyrdom (De Viris Illustr. xix.; Baron, Amul. i. 554). See Walsh, De Pudbo sanitatem (Jen. 1755).

PUCCI, FRANCESCO (Lat. Franciscus), an Italian theologian, noted as the founder of a heretical school, born in the 13th century when any farmer convicted of extortion he should return four times the value of what he had fraudulently obtained. There is no reason to suppose that either Zacchaeus or Matthew belonged to a noble and ancient family which produced three cardinals. He went to Lyons to engage in commerce, but having assisted in the religious disputes 0 frequent at that epoch, he left his country to give himself to the study of theology. From Lyons he went to England, and in 1574 he took the degree of master of arts at Oxford. In adopting the greater part of the opinions of the Reformation, he expected to make ample use of that most precious conquest, liberty of search; he found himself in those limits from which he could not escape each that which best accorded with his own mind, naturally bold and restless. This independence created for him enemies and disputes in all the countries which he visited; he led a wandering life, and instead of passing, for a person of troubled mind in search of truth, he was loaded with imminent perils. At Oxford, being a candidate for a chair, he was advised to write a thesis De Fide in Deum quae et gualla sit, and raised the opposition of all his future colleagues, less by the scruples which he had shown of the method of comprehending God than because he had openly combated the dogmas of Calvinism. Pucci then went to Basle, and there made the acquaintance of Faustus Socinus, but a dispute that he had with him about the first man, and his ideas of universal mercy, exposed him anew to persecution. Exiled from Basle in 1576, he returned to London, where his own religious views caused him to be imprisoned. After his release, he took refuge in the Low Countries; but always studying, writing, and disputing, he did not find his halting-place until he reached Poland. At Cracow he encountered two Englishmen—John Dee and Edward Kelley, companions of John á Laski; they won Pucci to the study of occult science, and persuaded him that by familiar intercourse with spirits he would have the privilege of discovering much that was unknown. The attraction of the marvellous, and the novelty of the phenomena that John Dee seemed to control, were strong enough to attach Pucci for four years. The papal nuncio at Prague became acquainted with Pucci, and by his personal influence drew him into the bosom of the Rohan Church in 1586. In 1592 Pucci wrote a book dedicated to pope Clement VIII, under the title De Christi Salutaris Officium (Gouda, 1592), in which he used new arguments in support of the doctrine of the universal atonement as follows: "Christ having made an atonement for all men by his death, no other means are now necessary for salvation than those which are provided by natural religion, and not only those who bear the name of the Saviour, but all honest men, can be saved, even in paganism." The doctrine thus espoused was not likely to please the pontiff, though he was honored by the dedication, and Pucci was made so uncomfortable that in 1595 he came from the Rohan Church to the Augustinian order. He then received sacerdotal ordination, and became secretary of cardinal Pompey, with whom he passed the last years of his life in peace. He died in 1600. He had composed the following couplet which was engraved upon his tomb:

"Inveni portam:-spea et fortuna, valte!\nNil mihi voluptas, iadie nunc ales."

Some authors have asserted without proof that Pucci was sent to Rome and burned. See "University Quarter," July, 1874, art. i.; Ittig, De Puccianismo; Schmid, Dr. F. Pucio in Naturalia et Indifferentiati Rerum (Lips. 1712, 4to); Bayly, Hist. Dict. a. v. (J. H. W.)

Pucelle, ABSU., a French ecclesiastic who flourished in the first half of the 18th century, is noted as one of the ablest defenders of the Gallican liberties. He was born at Paris in 1656, and was in Parliament in 1714 when a vote of non-acknowledgement of the bull Crepusculum, which aimed at the destruction of the Jansenists (q. v.), was discussed, and he most vigorously opposed this act on the part of the French state. He was then one of the clerical counsellors of the "Grand Chamber." In 1730, also, after the archbishop of Paris, De Vintimille, attempted to enforce the Unigenitus, and the king had suffered the "lit de justice" to strengthen the papacy, Pucelle stood strong, and caused the councillors to keep their places and assert the independence and supremacy of the temporal power of France over Roman ecclesiasticism. They contended that it does not belong to ecclesiastics to define the limits from which they must not diverge, each that which best accorded with his own mind, naturally bold and restless. This independence created for him enemies and disputes in all the countries which he visited; he led a wandering life, and instead of passing, for a person of troubled mind in search of truth, he was loaded with imminent perils. senators—one the host of St. Peter and friend of St. Paul, martyred under Nero; the other the grandson of the former, living about A.D. 150, the father of Novatus, Timothy (who is said to have preached the Gospel in Britain), Praxedes, and Pudentiana, whose house, in the valley between the Viminal hill and the Esquiline, served, in his lifetime, for the assembly of Roman Christians, and afterwards gave place to a church, now the Church of Sta. Pudentiana, a short distance at the back of the Basilica of Sta. Maria Maggiore. Earlier writers (as Baronius, Ann. 44, § 61; 53, § 18; 162) are disposed to believe in the existence of one Pudens only. About the end of the 16th century it was observed (F. de Monceaux, Excl. Christian. Vetror Britonum Eccles. Tournay, 1614; Estius, or his editor; Alp. Parker, De Antiquitat. Britann. Exc. 1605; M. Alford, Anales Ecc. Brit. 1665; Camden, Britannia, 1686) that Martial, the Spanish poet, who went to Rome A.D. 66 or earlier, in his twenty-third year, and dwelt there for nearly forty years, mentions two contemporaries, Pudens and Claudia, as husband and wife (Ap. iv, 13), that he mentions Pudens or Aulus Pudens in i, 32; iv, 29; v, 48; vi, 58; vii, 11, 97; Claudia or Claudia Rufina in viii, 60; xi, 53; and, it might be added, Linus, in i, 76; ii, 54; iv, 66; xi, 25; xii, 49. That Timothy and Martial should each have three friends bearing the same names at the same time and place is at least a very singular coincidence. The poet's Pudens was his intimate acquaintance, an admiring critic of his epigrams, an immoral man if judged by the Christian rule. He was an Umbrian and a soldier. First he appears as a centurion aspiring to become a primitius; afterwards he is on military duty in the remote north, and the poet hopes that on his return thence he may be raised to equestrian rank. His wife Claudia is described as of British birth, of remarkable beauty and wit, and the mother of a flourishing family. A Latin inscription found in 1733 at Chichester connects a [Pud]ens with Britain and with the Claudian name. It is as follows, if we fill out the usual abbreviations: "[N]eptuno et Minervae templum [pr] salute domus divinæ auctior is Tiberii Claudii [Co]cidubini regis legrati Augusti in Brit. [cole] giam faburum et qui in eo [sacrie] sunt de suo dedicaverat, donante aequal [Pud]ento, Pudentinì filio." A corner of the stone was broken off, and the letters within brackets have been inserted on conjecture. The inscription thus commemorates the erection of a temple by a guild of carpenters, with the sanction of king Tiberius Claudius Cogidubnus, the site being the site of [Pud]ens, the son of Pudentinus. Cogidubnis was a native king, appointed and supported by Rome (Tacit. Agricol., 14). He reigned with delegated power probably from A.D. 52 to A.D. 76. If he had a daughter, she would inherit the name Claudia, and might, perhaps as a hostage, be educated at Rome. Another link seems to connect the

of Pudentiana. The same fact is said to be affirmed by Damasus in the latter part of the 4th century. These may be mere repetitions. The Acts of Pastor locate the house of Pudens in the Vicus Patricius, which corresponds with the modern Via di Sta. Pudentiana. In this street still stands a church, which is reputed to be the oldest in Rome. It is named Sta. Pudentiana, and is supposed to be located where Pudens and his family once dwelt. The text of the Acts of Pastor is unsettled, and is not free from anachronisms. The documents cannot have come in their present form, or forms rather, from their reputed author, or from the 2d century. Since Tillemont's learned criticism, they have fallen into disrepute. Theollandist writer in the Acta Sanctorum is compelled to propose alterations of the text without authority, and to suppose the existence of two persons, each named Pudens, one either the Romanizing Briton of that time with Claudia Rufina and with Christianity (see Musgrave, quoted by Fabricius, Liv. exegesis, p. 702). The wife of Aulus Plautius, who commanded in Britain from A.D. 43 to A.D. 52, was Pomponia Gracinae, and the Ruft were a branch of her house. She was accused of a capital charge of "foreign superstition;" she was acquitted, and lived, for nearly forty years, in a state of austere and mysterious melancholy (Tacit. Ann. xiii, 32). We know from the Epistle to the Romans (xvi, 13) that the Ruft were well represented among the Roman Christians in A.D. 55. Modern researches among the Christianumbia at Rome, appropriated to members of the imperial household, have brought to light an inscription in which the name of Pudens occurs as that of a servant of Tiberius or Claudius (Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology, iv, 76).

In certain ancient documents, called the Acts of Pastor, it is recorded that Pudens, after the death of his wife, desired that his house should be consecrated as a church, and that this was done; that subsequently, at his daughters' request, a baptistery was constructed there; that these daughters gathered together their slaves, both from the city and from their country possessions, and gave liberty to those who were Christians, and exhorted those who were not believers in the holy law of Christ, and that the act of monanomia was celebrated in the tithe (church) established by Pudens; that there, also, in a time of persecution, Praxedes and Pudentiana sheltered those who through their instrumentality had become believers; that afterwards, when the latter, and her brother Novatus also, were dead, his property, with the consent of Timothessa, passed into the hands of Praxedes, by whose request the thranor, or baths, of Novatus, which are described as spacious and no longer in use, were consecrated as a church, in the name of Pudentiana, by Pius (bishop of the Church in Rome, A.D. 189-196). In 1733, it is further reported, Pius also consecrated a baptistery. Here, moreover, after the great persecution arose, numbers of Christians were concealed by Praxedes, and nourished with food and with the word of God. Pudens and his daughters, it is also narrated, were buried in the cemetery of Priscilla, on the Via Salaria. Anastasius, librarian of the Vatican in the 5th century, also asserts that Pius dedicated the thranor of Novatus as a church in the grandfather or the paternal uncle of the other. Nor does anything preserved in the interior of the present church of Pudentiana carry us back decisively to the first generations of Roman Christians; the older portions of the edifice, however, do contain such indications.

One of the earliest. Church of St. Pudentiana attended a Roman synod in the year 499, and was enrolled as "Presbyter Tituli Pudentiana" (Presbyter of the Church of Pudens). The building was repaired or rebuilt under Adrian I (A.D. 772-795); but portions of an older structure remain. The north aisle runs back much more than the choir and its apses. In its side towards the choir there is a slab with the inscription SIRICIUS EPISCOPVS. Siricius was bishop A.D. 384-396. It is thought that at this time, and in that of Innocent I (402-417), an old hall, or basilica, of a family mansion which had been used as a church, and was called "Titulus Pudentiani," was taken down, and a new church constructed. One wall, however, was left standing—the one at the end of the north aisle and in the rear of the choir. It is now the outer end wall of the church. This, according to competent judges, is a construction of the 1st century, and a part of some great palace. Its large hall windows can be readily distinguished. Made in the 1st century, they are now filled up with brickwork of the 2d. At this time the hall seems to have been divided by pillars and Howson, and other lines distinct from its primary design. The present church stands in the original hall of the palace. Probably long before its construction the hall itself was a place of assembly for Christians in Rome. There are, also, some subterranean chambers, said to have been first opened in 1366. Here are three long, narrow, vaulted rooms, now opened into each other, but originally separated by brick walls. The walls are regarded as 1st-century work; but the openings which throw together the three chambers were evidently made subsequently, and apparently in the 1st century, 1389, by Soccius, 1389, the construction of the arches. In the original or 1st-century wall may still be seen hot-air flues, such as belong to thermae. The cutting of the arches would have spoiled the baths. It secured an assured accommodation for the meetings of a Christian Church in troublesome times. The combined chambers made a spacious room, remote from the street and below its level. Its windows were apertures in the clear-story, and opened into an inner area. Worship could be conducted without attracting attention. The testimony of the walls and the bricks of the arches thus tally with the ancient tradition that the disused baths of Novatus, the son of Pudens, were dedicated about the middle of the 2d century as a Christian church. It is thought that in still another room of this subterranean portion of the tradition of Pudens there was a baptistery. Tradition may present another point of contact with these baths. In Justin Martyr's examination by the prefect of Rome (about A.D. 166), the following dialogue is reported.

"Prefect. Where do you assemble?"
"Justin. Where each one chooses and can. . . . The God of the Christians is not circumscribed by place, but, being in heaven and earth, is everywhere worshipped and glorified by the faithful."

"Prefect. Say, where do you assemble, or into what place do you collect your disciples?"
"Justin. I dwell above one Martinus, at the Timotheus Baths. . . . I know of no other meeting than his."

"Prefect. Are you not, then, a Christian?"
"Justin. Yes, I am a Christian."

In the Roman tradition, the house of Pudens was the place where Christians coming to Rome were freely entertained. Meals were held in Justin's time, Christian assemblies.

On the Via Salaria a cemetery called after Priscilla, the traditional mother of Pudens, which bears unmistakable signs of having been used by persons of the same name, as well as by the descendents of Roman Christians. These evidences are sufficiently indicated in Northcote and Brownlow's "Romani Suttemres," and need not here be specified. It may be added, however, that, in the lower story of this catacomb, imprints have been found of the seal of a pudens Felix upon the cement which closes a loculus or grave (De Romi, Images de l.'T. Savoie choisies dans les Catacombes de Rome [Paris, 1863], p. 17). Two roguous men suits exactly the tradition that the Pudens family belonged to the gens Cornelia (Cornelius Sulla being the first who took the surname Felix), and the further uniform tradition that this cemetery was their burial-place. The traditions are thus confirmed which represent a Pudens family of wealth and distinction to have been very early connected with the Christian Church in Rome. They increase so far the coincidences in favor of the identity of Martial's friends with the Pudens and Claudia of Paul's Epistle. The resemblance is one of family distinction, as well as of name, time, and place. See The House of Pudens in Rome: A Lecture Delivered to the Royal Archaeological Institute, June 2, 1871, by John Henry Parker, C.B., F.S.A., etc.; reprinted from the Archaeological Journal.

On the whole, although the identity of St. Paul's Pudens with any legendary or heathen name is not absolutely proven, yet it is difficult to believe that these facts add nothing to our knowledge of the friend of Paul and Timothy. The identity is favored by Alford, Conybeare, Howson, and Lillie. Other objections have been raised against the story do not seem to be inoperable. The difficulty is that so much is pure conjecture. In The Acts of Pastor, the wife of Pudens, and mother of his children, is named Savinilla. The Welsh legends are said to assert Pudens's marriage with Gladys, the daughter or niece of Caractacus. The facts and arguments are treated at great length in a pamphlet entitled Claudia and Pudens, by archbishop Williams (Llandover, 1848), p. 88; and more briefly by dean Alford, Greek Testament (ed. 1856), iii, 104; and by Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul (ed. 1866), i, 528; also by Lechler, Gesch. der Kirch. i, 528; and by Bp. Howson, Life of St. Paul, p. 197, 197. It is ingeniously woven into a pleasing romance by a writer in the Quarterly Review, xcivi, 100-105. See Prof. Smyth in the Biblioth. Sacra, 1873, p. 174 sq.; also Usher, Eccl. Brit. Antiquitates, § 8, and Stillwell, Antiquitates.

Pudentiana, Sr. Among the Roman families who, in the 2d century, embraced the Christian faith, of the most distinguished seems to have been that of the senator Pudens, his mother Priscilla, and his two daughters Pudentiana and Praxedea. Pudens is frequently alleged to have been a disciple of the apostles Peter and Paul, and there is really a Pudens named in the second letter to Timothy; but this Pudens seems not to be identical with the father of Pudentiana and Praxedea. According to the Bollandists, our Pudens was converted by pope Pius I, who lived in the middle of the 2d century. After the death of his wife, the new convert had his house transformed into a church. He taught his two daughters the doctrines and all good works of Christianity, in which they so distinguished themselves, converting to their new faith, with the assistance of the pope, who used to say mass in the new consecrated building, not only the members of their family and inmates of their house, but a large number of other pagans. We do not know how his holy daughters died. Pudentiana, as well as Praxedea, had churches in Rome in the earliest times. See The Bollandists on May 19, where a learned commentary is given about Pudens and his two daughters, with the documents relating to them. See Pudens.

Pudicitia (Pudice), a personification of modesty, was worshiped by the Greeks and Romans. Pudicitia was an altar dedicated to her (Pausan. I, 17, § 1). At Rome two sanctuaries were dedicated to her, one under the name of Pudicitia patria, and the other under that of Pudicitia plebeia. The former was in the Forum Boarium, near the temple of Clitunno, and the patrician Virginia was drawn from this sanctuary by the other patrician women, because she had married pufer, John M., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Richmond, Va., Jan. 29, 1835. From a child he was noticeably correct in his habits, and showed himself well fitted for a life of self-reliance. His mother died young, and his education was at an early age. His educational opportunities were limited to the district school and a few terms at the academy. He was converted in 1852, and united with the Methodists. He was licensed to preach in 1856. The following year he entered the Troy Conference, and filled the following appointments: Johnson and Hyde Park, under the presiding elder: Essex, Milton, and Pittsford, one year each; Essex, N. Y., two years. By a change of conference boundaries he went into Vermont Conference in 1863, and was stationed at Grand Isle two years; at St. Albans’ Bay, one year; at Highgate, Waterbury Centre, Randolph, and Chelsea, two years each; and at Barre, his last appointment, which he served only the fraction of a year, when called from toil to reward. He died Jan. 7, 1874. Puffer labored with great acceptability, and almost literally “seized as once to react to the sin of himself, on the text, “If a man die, shall he live again?” —Conference Minutes, 1874, p. 96.

pufer, Reuben, D.D., an American divine of note, was born at Sudbury, Mass., in 1756, and was educated at Harvard College, class of 1778. He then studied divinity, and became pastor a Congregational church in Bolton; (afterwards called Becket,) where he held this place until his death, in 1826. He published: Election Sermon (1803) — Dedication Lecture in Harvard College (1808) — Conversion Sermon (1811) — Two Sermons (1826); and some secular addresses. See Spurgeon, Annals of the American, 206, 299 sq.

puget, Pierre, called the Michael Angelo of France, on account of his ability in painting and architecture, as well as in sculpture, and perhaps also on account of a kindred enthusiasm and decision of character, was born in 1622 at Marseilles, where his father practiced as an architect and sculptor. It was from him that he received his first instructions in art, after which he was placed under a shipwright, or builder of galleys, to learn to carve the ornaments used in these vessels. Disgusted with the drudgery of such workmanship, he set out for Italy, and passed a considerable time at Florence, where he pursued his studies as a sculptor with great success. He arrived there, however, he was attracted by the fame of Pietro di Cortona. He became the pupil of that artist, but made such progress that he accompanied him to Florence as assistant to paint the ceilings of the Pitti palace. He suddenly resolved upon returning to France, and did so, and was commissioned to design a vessel of extraordinary magnificence. Puget proceeded a second time to Rome, and there spent between five and six years: what afterwards because of his valuable collection of drawings is not known. On his second return from Italy he painted; but excessive application so weakened him that he confined himself thenceforth to architecture and sculpture. His talents met with employment at Tos- kin and Marseilles, and for the latter city he projected many embellishments, which established his reputation as an architect; and he further gave proof of great skill in engineering by different ingeniously and inventions. He was sent by Fouquet to Genoa for the purpose of selecting marble for some of the works proposed to be executed at Marseilles; but that minister being short of funds did not do so. Returning home, Puget preferred returning to Genoa, where he produced some of his most noted pieces of sculpture, the two statues of St. Sebastian and St. Ambrozie, and the grand bas-relief of the Assumption, in the chapel of the Albergo de’ Poveri, besides various architectural ornaments of monasteries. By the last was obtained for him a pension of 1300 crowns, in consequence, it is said, of the earnest recommendation of nini. That the patronage of the one and the recommendation of the other were not discredited is proved by his two celebrated performances at Versailles, the Milo of Crotona and the group of Persians and Aemandra, the former of which is generally reckoned the chefd'oeuvre of his life, and the other the concludes his compari-tion with the antique. He died at Marseilles, where he spent his last days, Dec. 2, 1694.—Engl. Cyclop. a. v.;

Pugin, Augustus Northmore Welby, one of the most distinguished of modern ecclesiastical architec-tors, was the son of a French gentleman who fled to England at the period of the Revolution. He was born in 1811, and commenced his professional career as a scene-painter and decorator at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, and then devoted himself to decoration in furniture, etc.
Joining the Roman Catholic Church, he determined therefore to devote his best energies to ecclesiology, and during the few years that he lived to practice his profession he was called upon to erect a larger number of Roman Catholic churches, chapels, convents, and schools than has probably fallen to the lot of any Englislian since the Reformation. The following list includes his chief works: the cathedral church of St. Marie at Derby, one of his earlier and more pleasing works;
St. Chad's, Birmingham; three churches at Liverpool; St. Wilfred's, Manchester; church and convent at Edgehill; churches at Oxford, Cambridge, Reading, Kennworth, Stockton-on-Tees, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Pres ton, Kington, Chester, Rugby, Northampton, Stoke-upon-Trent, Brewd, Wollwich, Hammersmith, Fulham, Pontefract, St. Edward's near Ware, Buckingham, and St. Wilfred near Alton, a church, and a convent and chapel at Nottingham; convents of the Society of Mercy at London, Birmingham, Liverpool; a private chapel in New Bath; colleges at Radcliffe and Rugby; improvements at Maynooth; and cathedrals, with schools and priests' houses attached, at St. George's (Southwark), Killarney, and Enniscorthy. To these must be added the extensive and costly works executed for his great patron, the earl of Shrewsbury, consisting, besides the alterations made in the mansion, of a church, school-house, and monastery at Alton Towers; and a church at Cheadle, which has the most splendid interior of any of his others. He was a very great man at the Oxford and Cambridge Colleges, Oxford, is one of the very few works executed by him for any Protestant body; indeed, he is said to have refused to accept any commissions for Protestant places of worship. The list of works given above would in truth seem to have been more than sufficient to exhaust the time and energies of a man who ceased laboring at the age of forty; yet he was chiefly employed during his last years in designing and superintending the ornatmenting of the New Palace of Westminster, which probobly owes its somewhat extravagantly mediaval and ecclesiastical character to Pugin's Diocesan consecrations.
But, besides the practice of his profession, he found time to add to its literature a second and revised edition of his Contrasts; a treatise on the True Principles of Pointed or Christian Architecture (1841); — An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture (1847); — A Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornament (1844) — a treatise on Florirated Ornament (1849); — and a treatise on Chancel Screen (1851). As he advanced in life his religious feelings took more and more entire possession of him.
In 1850 he wrote and published An Address to the Inhabitants of Liverpool: A Protest — An Essay on the Revival of the Ancient Plain Song; — The Present State of Public Worship among the Roman Catholics; and other pamphlets of a religious character. At length, overtasked with all this excessive labor and excitement, his intellect began to give way, and in his fortieth year he was removed to a lunatic asylum. For a brief space his mental powers were so far restored that it became practicable for him to return to his home at Ramsgate; but he expired there Sept. 14, 1852, three days after his return. He was buried in a vault of his own church of St. Augustine, which he had built on his own acres. Pugin was a man of extraordinary industry and energy, and he possessed a very unusual amount of knowledge and great ability. He attempt-med, however, too many things, and he worked too much and too fast to produce many great works, even had he been a man of original power. In truth, his was not a creative mind, and he lacked comprehensive thought.

name from the Virgin of the Cathedral of La Puy, to which pilgrims greatly resorted. They yearly elected a prince, who was crowned with garlands or circlets, like those still used on certain occasions by the city companies; the loving name was gaily passed at the election, and the author of the best ballad royal was also crowned. They had a chaplain-priest to sing masses, maintained a great feast annually, and kept a common hutch for the contributions of the brotherhood.
There was a chapel of St. Mary de Pul at Westminster.
No woman was ever admitted to their meetings. Perhaps Puets, another form, may allude to the Song of Solomon (14, 15).

Pul (Heb. id. בוע [for derivation, see below]), the name of a people and of a man.

1. (Sept. פּוּד v. פּוד; Vulg. Africa.) A country or people located at a great distance from Judea, and named once (1 Sam. iv, 19) between Tarsim and Lud:
"The nations (כּלּ הַנָּהוּ) to Tarshish, Pul, that draw the bow, to Tubal and Javan, to the tiles afar off." Hitzig, Knoch, and some others suppose that the true reading is בּוּד, Pul, which is elsewhere joined with Lud (Ezek. xxvii, 10; Jer. xiv, 9; A. V. "Libyans") and which is sometimes rendered in the Sept. פּוד (Gen. x, 6; 1 Chron. i, 8), the same form which occurs here in that version; for this, however, there is no MS. authority, and we are therefore bound to receive the Masoretic reading as correct. Gesenius observes (Thesaur. a. v. בּוּד) that PULYA could be easily changed to FOYA by a error of a copist. See Pul.
If a Mirzaitude (q. v.) is intended in this connection, Pul may be African. It has accordingly been compared by Hocart (Phaleg, iv, 26) and Michaelis (Spicileg. i, 256; ii, 114) with the island Philae, called in Coptic Pelak, Pilak, Pslack: the hieroglyphic name being Elek, P-ôlek, or Olék, (Quatremère, Mémoire sur l'Égyp t, i, 367 sq.). This island was inhabited jointly by Egyptians and Ethiopians (Strabo, vii, 516; Diod.
Ric. i, 22; Flinders v, 10; Polomyi, iv, 5, 74; comp. Mannert, X, i, 235 sq.), and Bochart supposes the name to be. like Elephantine, derived from a word meaning elephant (עָלִים). But it must be kept in mind that the other names here mentioned are those of great countries, while Philae is a very small island. Isaiah would scarcely speak of the Jewish people being driven to it. It seems much more probable that Pul was the name of some distaneous province of Africa: and perhaps the suggestion of Genesius (Theoscur, p. 1094) may be right, that we have a vestige of the old name in the word Pleo which appears on inscriptions (Champlain, Grammairt, p. 159). Hitzig (Die Geschichte der Juden, p. 71) finds a Phœl not far from Punicus. This only adds to the uncertainty. See Egypt.

2. (Sept. Φωλ κ. τ. Φωλάη, Φωλάν, Φωλάν, Φάλες; Vulg. Phœl.) A king of Assyria, and the first of these monarchs who is mentioned in the Bible (2 Kings xv, 19, 20; 1 Chron, v, 26). Menahem, having succeeded in mounting the throne of Israel, proceeded to make himself master of the whole territory belonging to that kingdom. Settling forth from Tirzah, he attacked and took by storm Tiphah, or Thapsacus, on the Euphrates, which city has never been one of a border town of Israel by the conquests of Jeroboam II, whose victorious career had restored the ancient boundaries of the land in that direction as they had been in the days of Solomon (2 Kings xv, 16; xiv, 25, 28; 1 Kings iv, 24). He appears to have thus drawn on himself the notice of Pul, B.C. 769. Menahem is thought by some to have inherited a kingdom which was already included among the dependencies of Assyria; for as early as B.C. 880 Jehu gave tribute to Shalmaneser, according to the inscription on the black obelisk [see Shalmaneser]; and if it is true as it seems to have been, a regular tributary from the beginning of the reign of Assur-pal (B.C. 837), Samaria, which lay between Judea and Assyria, can scarcely have been independent. Under the Assyrian system the monarchs of tributary kingdoms, on accepting the throne, were obliged to pronounce in their kingdoms to the lord paramount, and only then became established on receiving it. We may gather from 2 Kings xv, 19, 20 that Menahem neglected to make any such application to his liege lord. Pul—a name which would have been regarded as a plain act of rebellion. In the campaign against Tiphah, we must regard Menahem as having attacked the Assyrians, and deprived them for a while of their dominion west of the Euphrates. However this may have been, it is evident that Pul looked upon Menahem as an enemy. He consequently marched an army into Palestine for the purpose of punishing his revolt, when Menahem hastened to make his submission, and having collected by means of a poll-tax the large sum of a thousand talents of gold, he paid it over to the Assyrian monarch, who consented thereupon to “confirm” him as king. See Menahem.

There is great difficulty in determining what Assyrian king is referred to under the name Pul. He must have ruled over Assyria as the immediate predecessor of Tiglath-pileser II, for this latter monarch, according to Sir H. Rawlinson (Athenaeum, No. 1782), is recorded to have received tribute in his eighth year from Menahem, whose reign occupied only ten years. For some time Sir H. Rawlinson identified him with a king whose cuneiform name he has variously represented as Isaahu, Pilahu, and Tama-zulo-khus (Uguru, Hez-lil-khus), and who reckoned among the countries tributary to himself—he of Khurmri or Samaria (Rawlinson, Herodotus, i, 467). [Smith revives this theory (Assyrian Eponym Canon, p. 187) of the identity of Pul with Vulniri (as he reads the name), which, according to his dates, invaded Damascus in B.C. 773.] This identification, however, Rawlinson gave up on ascertaining that the lately deciphered Assyrian canon interposed the reigns of three kings, comprising thirty-seven years, in addition to a probable interregnum of two or three years between this king and Tiglath-pileser (Athenaeum, No. 1808). Subsequently he supposed that one of the same individual is denoted by the names Pul and Tiglath-pileser in the sacred narrative. His chief argument for this is that in 1 Chron, v, 26 the same event—namely, the deposition of the tribes beyond the Jordan—is attributed to the two kings associated together as if they were one and the same individual (Athenaeum, No. 1809). But, as already remarked by Winer (Boeke, ii, 259), the passage in 1 Chron. does not necessarily ascribe to the two kings the accomplishment of the same measure. Pul is mentioned in it as the first Assyrian king who came into collision with the Israelites, and thus probably the way for the subjection of the transjordanic tribes. But that this measure is attributed solely to Tiglath-pileser, as in 2 Kings xx, 29, is manifest from the use of the singular נבוגו [Nebogu]. Dr. Julius Oppert, who accepts the account of Ctesias, and takes it to refer to the subversion of the first Assyrian empire, supposes Pul to be the Babylonian Beluga. The eminent Assyriologist Dr. Hincks supposes that “Pul became king of Babylon, holding Assyria in subjection, in 787 B.C. Tiglath-pileser revolted from him and established an independent kingdom of Assyria in 788 B.C.” (Atheneum, No. 1180). The main difference between this view and that of Dr. Oppert is that Dr. Hincks supposes a considerable interval to have elapsed between Beluga, the conqueror of Nineveh, and Pul. It certainly appears the most plausible opinion; and it seems safest to acquiesce in it until further discoveries of cuneiform students lead to a more exact determination. It is difficult to reconcile with the Sacred chronology, and it falls in with what we can glean of Assyrian history from classical and monumental sources. The account of Ctesias, as found in Diodorus Siculus (Hist. ii), though rejected by Sir H. Rawlinson and his followers (comp. especially Rawlinson, A. M. of ii, 521), has received the support of many eminent modern critics. It has been shown to be reconcilable with the narrative of Herodotus (Hist. i, 102, 106), which contains intimations that there had been a subservial of the Assyrian empire prior to its final overthrow attributed to that historian (see Winer, Reised, i, 104). It is admitted that the Assyrian canonic, in the period between Iva-lush IV and Tiglath-pileser II, gives indication of “troubled times and of a disputed, or, at any rate, a disturbed succession” (Rawlinson, A. M. ii, 388). The writer last cited also asserts that the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser II “support the notion of a revolution and change of dynasty in Assyria at this point of its history” (Rawlinson, Herodotus, i, 468). That Pul was a Babylonian holding rule in Assyria at this time is confirmed by the notice of Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb. Chron. i, 4): “Post hos at exandris Caesaribus est secundum Phülus erat;” and also by the form of the name. The name Pul, while having, according to Prof. Rawlinson, its counterpart among known Babylonian names, is wholly alien to the rules on which Assyrian names are formed. It is evidently “always composed of two, three, or more characters” (A. M. iii, 388, note). The name is probably the same as the Sanscrit Pula, lofty, highest; hence lord, king; perhaps the same as Bid, i.e. lord. The same syllable is found in the names Sardanapalus and Nabopolassar. Pul is also mentioned in the extracts of Alexander Polyhistor, in Eusebius (Chron. A. D. i, 41), but not elsewhere. Eusebius adds, “Polyhistor says that Senecheribus was king after him;” but this is not to be understood of immediate succession. See Assuria.

Pulaha, a divinity of Indian mythology. Brahmas created Pulahans from different parts of his body. At the same time Sunyambhu, Brahmas son, created the ten celebrated rishis, or forefathers, of all existing beings. These are identical with the nine Brahmas mentioned, and one of them is Pulaha. He was so pious that he could, by his prayers, create men, animals, and gods.

Pulcheria, elf, one of the most celebrated saints of the Greek Church, was an empress. She was the eldest daughter of the emperor Arcadius, and was born between 388 and 400. In early youth she showed rare intellectual gifts and a fervent piety. Her wisdom was an object of general adoration. She was also reen when she came to assist her younger brother Theodosi.

suius II in the government. Pulcheria then made a vow of eternal chastity, prevailed upon her sisters to follow her example, and gave to the Byzantine court the purity which should prevail in a monastery. Some writers charge that this chastity was feigned from political reasons, Pulcheria desiring to prevent the marriage of her sisters, and thus avoid controversy on the claims to the throne. By her wisdom and piety the prosperity of the empire was certainly promoted: she seemed to be its good guardian. She defended zealously the purity of the Christian faith against the doctrines of Nestorius and Eutyches, and became the foremost advocate of the Nicene Creed. Her eloquence was most beneficial at the synods of Ephesus and Chalcedon. St. Cyril of Alexandria sent her his celebrated work De Fide ad Pulcheriam. She was in correspondence with the popes, especially with Leo I. This great pope, in many letters, praises her wisdom and kindness. He entreats her, in 449, to take measures against the heresy of Eutyches (Jaffé, Reg. Pontif. n. 203, 204, p. 37); rejoices at the vigor and energy of her faith (ibid. n. 226, p. 339), and praises her activity in suppressing Eutychianism (451; ibid. n. 357, p. 40). There are in all ten letters extant from Leo I to Pulcheria. In 449, Bishop James of Cyrrhus, also praised her attachment to the Church, and interceded with her for his city, heavily burdened with taxes (Theod. Ep. 48; Baron. ad ann. 444). All her contemporaries praise her benevolent influence. She dissuaded her brother Theodosius from Nestorianism, and celebrated the victory of the orthodox creed over this heresy by building a splendid church in honor of the Virgin Mary (Nicom. H. E. xiv, 2; Baron. ad ann. 481). She sent valuable presents to Jerusalem, and built a number of new churches (Baron. ad ann. 449, 455). She was several times exposed to the plots of the courts, which tried to destroy her good understanding with her brother and his wife Eudocia. In 446 she retired entirely from the court: but her absence was soon felt. After the death of Theodosius, Pulcheria and Marcianus, who had been honored with the title of Augustus, and whom she had welded, took the reins of the empire. She had married for the good of the empire, and with the stipulation that she should be allowed to keep her vow of virginity. After benefiting the Church in many ways as empress, and opposing Eutychianism with the same decision as she had previously Nestorianism, she died, Sept. 11, 453. Her sainthood is recognised by the Latin as well as by the Greek Church. Baronius (ad ann. 458) and the Bollandists (vol. i, July) erected liturgical memorials to her memory. Benedict XIV permitted, by decree of the Congregation of the Rites of Jan. 8, 1752, to the regular canons of St. Augustine in Portugal, and to some houses of Jesuits, the celebration of her feast on July 7, sub voto duplici: soon afterwards, Feb. 11, the same year, this permission was extended to the whole company of Jesus. These decrees of the pope and mass of Pulcheria, are in the appendix of Benedict XIV’s work De Sanctorum Canonizatione. The oration of the feast praises the chastity of the saint, and her zeal for the purity of the faith. See Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Bio. and Mythol. s. v.; Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, vol. xii, s. v.; Herberstein, Mem. of the Turks, vol. ii; Alzog, Kirchenlex., iii, 809; Milman, Hist. of Latin Christianity, ii, 243 sqq.

Pulicar, or Ganesha, a deity of Indian mythology, was the son of Siva, Parvati. She lived with him, without the co-operation of her husband, by shaping into the frame of a youth what was washed away from her body during her bath. Siva thought of himself betrayed by Parvati, and in his wrath he struck off the head of the young god. When he found out his mistake, he wished to heal his victim; but the head had been carried away by the waters of the Ganges, and had been eaten by fishes. Siva solved this difficulty by telling the son of his wife to cut off the head of the first creature he should meet and put it on his shoulders: as misfortune would have it, this creature was an elephant. Therefore Ganesha is always represented with an elephant’s trunk. Ganesha sits astride of a mouse, which is nothing else than the metamorphosed giant Siddhajanyashurim, vanquished by him while warring against the gods. Ganesha is incredibly strong, and therefore of great use to the gods in their perpetual warfare against the demons. He is a great eater, and would eat the whole world if he had his own way: it is only in the sea of sugar, in which he has a floating abode, that he can, in some measure, satisfy the cravings of his hunger. Being the favorite son of Siva, he is worshipped like that god himself, and invoked first before every sacrifice. The Indians believed that he could at his will accumulate or remove obstacles: all Indian books commence with a prayer to him. His image is frequently found painted on the house doors, and almost every family has his statue in bronze, marble, or clay. Pulicar is his name as god of marriage: it was the natural question of his father at his first appearance in the world—Pulicar, I.e. Whose son?

PULIAHS

Pulgar, Isaac, a Jewish convert to Christianity, flourished at Avila, in Spain, about 1500 to 1549. He was a friend of Aboer of Burgos, better known (after his baptism) as Alphonso of Valladolid, against whom he afterwards wrote a polemical work entitled "The Book of Answers." He also wrote, besides some other works which are still in MS., a work under the title אביו של פיירו, "A Contest between an Orthodox and a Philosopher," wherein he endeavors to reconcile the difference between philosophy and faith, and which was reprinted with a Paris M. in the "און מִשְׁרָא יְבַשְׁמֵהוּ," of E. Ashkenasi (Frankl. a. M. 1849), p. 1-19. Pulgar was the first to say that "the belief in the Messianic redemption is not an essential point of Judaism, with which it stands or falls, although many passages in the prophesies speak of the coming of the Messiah." See Furst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 110 sq.; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico degli Autori Ebrei, p. 266 (Germ. transl. by Hamburger); the same, Bibliotheca Judaica Antichristiana, p. 98; Grätz, Geschichte der Juden, vii, 337 sqq., 485 sqq. (2d ed. Leips. 1873); Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. i, 1259. (B. P.)

Puliahs, the lowest of all Indian castes, or, rather, the scum of the lowest, being still more despised than the Pariahs. They are not allowed to walk on the regular roads, but must, at the distance of a hundred paces, warn every wanderer of their vicinity by uttering a well-known yell. They are not even allowed to dwell in huts, but live at a great distance from all inhabited places, in dense forests, where they build their nests on trees, like monkeys.

 Pulleyn, Rosker, an English Roman Catholic prelate of the 12th century, was born, according to Fuller, in the county of Oxford. After having studied in Paris, he returned to England in 1130, and found the University of Oxford devastated and almost ruined by the Danes, and he zealously contributed to restore it to its previously flourishing condition. In the reign of Henry I he was charged with the work of explaining the writings of, and commenting upon, Aristotle, and he acquainted himself in this double task to the great satisfaction of the scholars and the King, his constant patron. He received as recompense the archdeaconry of Rochester.

 After a short time he returned to Paris, and taught theology at the Sorbonne. In vain his bishop summoned him to return to England, and in order to compel him to seize the revenues of his benefice, Pulleyn appealed against these proceedings to the pope, who decided in his favor. Such was his renown that Innocent II summoned him to Rome, and there received him with great honor. In 1144 Celestine II created him cardinal, and soon after Lucius II made him chancellor of the Roman Church. He died in 1160, Pulleyn wrote several works. The one which remains to us is the Sententiarum Liber (Paris, 1655). From it is evident that he preferred the authority of the Bible and of reason to the testimony of the fathers or to the subtleties of the scholastics. Pulleyn belonged to the Abbeard school of theology, and inclined to free dialectic discussion. He advocated the doctrine of free will, but did not admit gratia irresistible. "Through pride," he writes, "man fell; his salvation must proceed from the opposite quarter. The rational man, who was designed to rule over nature, must humble himself before the sensible elements to receive grace through them." But this was a lowering of the idea of humility to an outward act. He favored, strangely enough for one so liberal in many things, the withholding of the cup from the sick, and he taught, "that the blood might not be spilled again," and supported the doctrine of indulgences (q. v.) in a most extreme manner. But the most eccentric of all his theological notions was the absurd question he raised as to the exact moment at which, and the manner in which, the union of the divine nature of the Son with the human assumed in the womb of Mary had taken place; and that on the cross only Christ's body had died, but not the whole man Christ. Pulleyn appears to have written also on the Apocalypse. There are still twenty of his sermons preserved among the Lambeth MSS. See Wright, Pleas Brit., ii, 183; Hardwick, Church Hist. of the Middle Ages, p. 263, 364; Neander, Dogmas, ii, 486, 521, 524, seq. et al.; Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, i, 14, 41, 65, et al.

 Pulling, Alonso B., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Rockfield, Conn., Nov. 29, 1818. He experienced religion in the summer of 1840. He was licensed to preach March 1, 1846, was received into the New York Conference in the following May, and appointed to Ponssett and Killingworth Circuit, which he served two years. He was admitted to full membership, June 21, 1848, and, in 1853, was stationed at Southington and Winport, Ansonia, Seymour, New Milford, Nichol's Farms, Roxbury, East Village, and Riverside. In 1867 failing health compelled him to take a superannuated relation. He died Jan. 12, 1878. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, 129.

 Pulilah is the name of the temple of the Grand Lama at Deshesho. It signifies "the temple with the golden roof." In this temple dwell, when the Dalai Lama is present, 800 priests, exclusively employed in his service. In the interior, it is said, there is a multitude of statues, every one representing a woman with a child in her arms. These are probably the mothers of as many former dalai lamas.

 Pulpit (סָפָר, migdol, Neh. viii, 4, properly tower), an elevated stage, whence Ezra read the law unto the congregation (comp. ix, 4). See Bible Educator ii, 263.

 PULPIT (Lat. pulpētum; Fr. chaire, poupure meaning a lectern, lection being a book-desk), an elevated place from which sermons are delivered. Ezra read from a raised stage, the law, on a pulpit of wood high above the people (Neh. viii, 4); and Solomon prayed on a brazen scaffold (2 Chron. vi, 18). In mediæval times the word designates the roof-loft. Becom uses it in its modern sense. It is said to remind the hearers of Christ going up on the mountain to preach his Sermon of Beatitudes. Originally, it would appear to have been used chiefly for the singing, chanting, or recitation which forms part of the public service, and was a kind of stage sufficiently large to accommodate two, or even more, chanters. For the convenience of the hearers, this stage began to be used by the bishop, priest, or deacon, in the delivery of the homily; and thus, by degrees, a tribune expressly suited to the latter use alone came to be introduced. The earliest pulpit was the ambo, tribune, or tribunal, as it is called by Prudentius. Epiphanius says that St. Chrysostom usually preached from the ambo; so did St. Ambrose and St. Augustine; and Nicephorus records that Macedonius, patriarch of Constantinople in 489, mounted the ambo when he desired to clear himself of a charge of heresy. In some of the older churches, the ambo, or altar, is still used for this purpose, and is called the Gospel and Epistles. The ambo was placed in the centre of the church by the Greeks; it is in the middle of the nave at St. Pancras's, at Rome, on the left side, but on the right at Milan and Ravenna. At St. Clement's, Rome, the ambo table is on the steps of the sanctuary, and the office of the propylæa on the right. At Chartres, Bayeux, and Rouen the main lections were sung on the left side of the choir-entrance, and the desk was called the legam. At Bourges, an eagle stood in front of the main altar. A pulpit at Orleans and Chartres-sur-Marne was used for reading the Epistle, Gradual, Tract, and Alleluia; the Gospel was sung on the west side of the jube at Chartres, Châlons, and Lyons, that for the lections facing the east. At Bayeux and Noyon there were several desks. At Lyons and Vienne, theGregoryian chant was in the lower part of the choir, and the Epistle from the ambo; but the latter was used at both times at Rheims, Cambrai, Tours, Rouen, Sens, Châlons, Laon, Soissons, Noyon, Amiens, Beauvais, Senlis, Orléans, Meaux, Tournay, Bayeux, and St. Denis. The desk for reading the Gospel was called the pulpit; the lectern held the choir-books. The former was movable, so as to be transferred from the one side to the other of the choir, and used by the subdeacon for reading the Epistle; whereas the lectern stood in the centre of the choir as a fixture, and was common to all the cantors in time of divine service. The common ornament, the symbol of St. John Evangelist, were called the Eagle; and it appears on the ambones of Pisa.
PULPIT

toja of the 18th century, and in three ancient churches at Rome. The deacon, taking the Book of the Gospel, richly bound in ivory, metal, and jewelry, carried it processionaly, preceded by thurifers and taper-bearers, to the north side, where the pulpit stood. Fulke, abbot of Lobbes in the 9th century, made a wonderful eagle, on which burned four tapers in the form of a cross; a censer was contrived in its neck, which poured fragrant smoke from the beak and flaming eyes of the bird; and the head and wings were movable, for the convenience of turning the book. Often the other three evangelists were represented as writing the words sung by the deacon; at Messina there is one with the pelican, as the symbol of the Saviour, above all. At Narbonne, in the cathedral, there is a movable pulpit of the 14th century, consisting of two iron supports set salientwise, and supporting a bookstand of supple leather. Those of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, and Bury St. Edmund's, mentioned in the 12th century, were movable until the 14th century. In Belgium, the ambo or a saldostal, set before the altar, served as a pulpit. According to John de Garlande, who wrote at the close of the 11th century, a pulpit is the ascent of steps to the lectern, upon which the chant- or reading-book was laid. The double pulpits of Milan, Narni, and Perugia connect the tradition with the ambones; those of Toledo are of bronze, and those at Seville are still used for singing the Gospel and Epistle. In three of the ancient churches at Rome, the Epistle ambo is square, and stands on the north; while that for the Gospel is round, and stands on the south side, with flights of stairs leading up to it. The ordinary pulpit also stood on the south side, as at Toledo, because the Gospel was preached from it. The jube for the gospel and epistle in large churches took the place of the ambo, and within two centuries was used by the preacher at Rouen; but in smaller churches a pulpit was used, yet there is no existing example or record of such furniture until the 18th century. Pulpits were formerly placed not only in churches, but also in the refectories of monasteries, as at Beverly, Shrewbury, Chester, etc.; in the cloisters, as at St. Dizé, in France; and occasionally in public thoroughfares, as on the north side of the church of Notre Dame; at St. Lô, in Normandy, and in the outer court of Magdalen College, Oxford. In France there are several overlooking cemeteries. In churches the pulpits were formerly always placed in the nave, attached to a wall, pillar, or screen, and the ecclesiastics and others who occupied the choir during the mass removed into the nave to hear the sermon; this custom was continued at Ely until quite recently.

The church pulpit is usually hexagonal or octagonal, and of wood, possibly in allusion to Christ’s preaching from the boat (Luke v. 1). In Roman Catholic churches the pulpit is generally distinguished by some religious emblems, especially by the crucifix; and the pulpits of the Low Countries and of Germany are often masterpieces of wood carving, the preaching-place in some of them forming part of a great artistic group, as of the Conversion of St. Paul, the Vocation of Peter and Andrew, the Temptation of Adam and Eve, and other similar subjects.

Beaulieu, Hunt.

Early pulpits were, no doubt, movable, and kept in corners until required for use, like that still preserved at Hereford; and at Bury, the analogium, or pulpit, we know, was removed from the chapter-house into the church when it was necessary. This, no doubt, is the cause of their present rarity. There are fine examples of pulpits at King’s Sutton, Kingsbury Episcopi, Wolvercote, North Kilworth, Dartmouth, and Frampton (which has images of saints). Those of Sudbury, Southwold, Hereford, and Winchester are of wood, and of the 16th century. The earliest Jacobean example is at Sopley (1606). There are stationary pulpits of stone at Wells of the 16th century, at Worcester (1504), Ripon, Cambe, Nantwich, and Wolverhampton. The oldest wooden pulpit is at Fulbourne (cir. 1500). In Italy there are examples of the 13th and 14th centuries at Siena and St. Minias, Florence; in Germany there are stone pulpits at Freiburg and Ulm of the latter part of the 15th century; at Avignon, in France; and Nieuport, in Belgium. There is a Byzantine pulpit, said to have been brought from St. Sophia’s, Constantinople, at St. Mark’s, Venice. Romanesque pulpits may be seen in St. Ambrose’s, Milan; St. Mary’s, Toscanelle; and St. Sabino’s, Canova. There is an octagonal pulpit, dated 1482, at Hatfield; that of Kidrich is cir. 1491. An hexagonal pulpit is at St. Andrew’s, Pistoja. The hexag-
PULPIT ELOQUENCE

A pulpit of Perugia is used for giving the benediction. There is a superb 18th-century pulpit on seven pillars in the baptistery at Pisa, with lecterns for the Gospel and Epistle on the stairs. Abbot Wygmore's pulpit, Gloucester, was on the north, and placed against the third pillar westward of the choir. The south, to the east of the middle of the nave, was the common position as at Wells, Chartres, Harleam, Aix, and formerly at Winchester, Peterborough, Gloucester, and Worcester. In England the pulpit was copied from those of the reformed, and as such stood in the open air. In cathedral churches the pulpit was often large enough to contain several persons, as the bishop, when preaching, was accompanied by his two archdeacons. Gilding and color were not employed on pulpits until the 15th century. Many of these pulpits were highly enriched with carving; that of Worcester has the New Jerusalem, from which John Capistran preached a Turkish crusade in 1451. At Durham there was an iron pulpit, or ambo, in the gallerie, from which the Sunday sermon was preached to women. There is another on the north-west at San Gil, Guatamala, of two life ambones with desks, in the 15th century, flanked the screen of Zamora. The two pulpits of Milan are of metal, and circular. At Aix the choir pulpit is silver-gilt and jewelled. At Lugo, one of the two metal ambones has an eagle on the south. The pulpit (in Arabic, mubara) forms one of the scanty appliances of Mohammedan worship.—Walcott, Sacred Architecture, s. v.; Parker, Glossary of Architecture, s. v.

Pulpit Eloquence. As pulpits in churches are constructed for the convenience of preachers and preaching, so the term pulpit, by a common form of metonymy, is often used to signify the collective body of the clergy or those who use the pulpit, and by a slight variation of the same principle, the term is also made to signify the collective agency of preaching, as seen in the phrases "influence of the pulpit" and "power of the pulpit." In a signification which, to some extent, blends both the above meanings, the term pulpit is often used in the figurative, metaphorical sense, as in the expression "Let the pulpit speak," "The voice of the pulpit must be heard." The word is thus used in the well-known passage of Cowper:

"I say the pulpit (In the sober use Of that peculiar power) Must stand acknowledged while the world shall stand, The most important and effectual guard, Support, and augmentation of virtue." From such uses as a substantive, the same word derives its significance as an adjective; it being often used in the expressions "pulpit orator," "pulpit eloquence," and the like. The term pulpit eloquence has, in fact, come into general use as designating (1) the quality and character of the eloquence produced from the pulpit, and (2) the body of the most brilliant productions now in preservation as representing the utterances of preachers of the present and past generations.

No just treatment of eloquence in any of its phases can ignore the fact that its highest character and results can only be secured from the expression of the living speaker. There must be voice for the ear, action for the eye, and a certain projection of the sentiments, the sympathies, and the emotions of an animated soul upon the minds and hearts of others. Nor can it be denied that the sympathy of numbers in an audience reacts upon the speaker and augments within him the power of moving those whom he addresses. Hence, whether eloquence be considered subjectively as that subtle power which enables an orator to influence men by uttered language, or objectively in the effects produced upon those to whom he speaks, it needs to be heard and felt in order to be appreciated in its completeness. Nevertheless, this fullest realization of eloquence has its limitations, for when once heard and felt it is in that sense ended. It can neither be repeated nor transferred to persons, times, or places. In view of this condition of eloquence we must more fully appreciate the eloquence of written or printed language, which is to some extent independent both of speakers and hearers, and which may, in a partial but yet not wholly unsatisfactory degree, represent to persons distant, both in time and space, the utterances of eloquent men. To this end, writing and printing are conservative agencies of essential importance and of estimable value. By means of them the orations and sermons of one age are handed down to ages following, and, so far as reading is substituted for hearing, the audiences of orators and preachers are multiplied without limit. It is therefore to what is preserved in books that any article upon the eloquence of the past must chiefly refer.

In order to rightly comprehend the character and relative importance of pulpit eloquence, reference must be made to preaching (q. v.) as a divinely appointed agency for the promotion of Christianity in the world. When it was so appointed by the Lord Jesus Christ (see Matt. xxviii., 19; Mark iii., 14; xvi., 15), a new and peculiar function was conferred upon human speech in making it the chief agency for the spread of that truth which was designed to make men free from sin and to prepare them for the heavenly world. The very nature of this high appointment indicates that the pulpit, as representing the public utterances of Christian ministers, affords unrivalled opportunities for the production and employment of eloquence in its best forms. 1. It demands capacity, convictions, and moral power on the part of preachers, which should go very far towards making them eloquent men from the first and furnishing them with recurring and highly favorable occasions for addressing assemblies. For that object it assigns itself of the consecrated time of the holy Sabbath and of the sanctuary as a hallowed place for the delivery of its message. 3. The themes which it appropriately discusses are all of an elevating and inspiring character, having an intrinsic importance superior to that of any earthly interest, being also invested with the authority of divinely revealed truth. It was in the light of such considerations that John Quincy Adams declared that "the pulpit is especially the battlefield of modern eloquence. Certainly, neither the bema of the Greeks nor the forum of the Romans ever afforded such an agency of power over human minds and hearts. Nor is this agency limited in its exercise to any narrow routine of forms or circumstances. It is as much in place and as full of power in the catacomb as in a cathedral; on the shores of Galilee as in the synagogues of the Jews; in the sequestered glens where persecuted worshippers gather as in churches where kings and magistrates assemble. Indeed, its greatest triumphs have often been in circumstances outwardly and outwardly most pitiful, and preservation in any earthly record was impossible. Hence, while the function of preaching has been in exercise for nearly nineteen centuries by countless thousands of preachers, but a very small proportion of the sermons that have been delivered have been, or could have been preserved in the reading world; yet the combined literature of the ancient and modern pulpit is of immense extent.

It is by no means assumed that all printed sermons are eloquent in any superlative sense. Many, no doubt, are far less so than thousands that have vanished with the breath of one who died them or of the memory and lives of those who heard them. Nevertheless, study and criticism are limited to those products of the pulpit which have been preserved from the oblivion of the past and made accessible to persons living in subsequent periods. But of these there is an ever-increasing abundance, so that the task of the student is necessarily one of selection. A general or comprehensive view of pulpit eloquence can only be obtained by the study of the subject in chronological order, beginning with the apostolic age and descending to the present period, the proper reference to the characteristics of successive periods. The limits of the present article only admit of a summary outline.

I. The Period of the Apostles and Early Fathers.—Notwithstanding the brevity of its record, the New Testament is by no means silent as to the subject of preaching. The Gospels only contain our Lord’s Sermon on the Mount, but many fragments of the addresses or sermons which he delivered to his disciples and the multitudes. The Acts of the Apostles report in brief several of the discourses of Peter and Paul, while the Epistles may be understood to be summaries of the discussions and instructions which the different apostles were accustomed to give in their discourses as preachers. The specimens of preaching contained in the New Testament are, in fact, more full and satisfactory than any found in ecclesiastical history for several centuries after the close of the apostolic age. Indeed, our chief mode of forming any judgment of the preaching of those early centuries is from the fruits following. Even Eusebius, who wrote in the early part of the 4th century, acknowledges himself indebted to tradition for all that he knew of the lives of the apostles who had “spread the seeds of salvation and of the heavenly kingdom throughout the world far and wide.”

During most, if not all, of this period, pulpits were not in existence, and even churches, as separate religious edifices, were unknown, or, at most, only beginning to exist. Worsippers, instead of assembling in large numbers, met by twos and threes wherever they could escape the surveillance of persecutors. Such circumstances would necessarily control, to a very small extent, the form of address employed by Christian ministers and teachers. The propaedeutic of the Gospel, making especially necessary personal address to individuals wherever a listener could be found. Moreover, as the New-Testament Scriptures only existed in fragmentary manuscripts, it would be necessary to employ a part of the time allotted to pastoral instruction in reciting and explaining such portions of them as were in the possession of the several pastors and teachers.

The prevailing form of ministerial address during the period referred to must, therefore, have been that of explanation and exhortation; but of its efficiency in the best sense, we know only the unanimous testimony of men to abandon error and embrace the truth—the progress of Christianity during that period of abounding paganism is the best possible proof. The power of the early preachers of Christianity, like that of the apostles themselves, must have consisted chiefly in a straightforward utterance of the truth—the direct witness of the Gospel and its appeal to the human heart. There is no reason to think that oratory was studied, or perhaps thought of; but the influence of Christian truth and life was in plain words brought to bear upon the thoughts and lives of those present as well as upon the errors and superstitions of heathenism.

II. The Period of the Later Fathers, or the Oratorical Period of the Ancient Church.—During and following the age of Constantine, Christian churches became common, and the canon of Scripture having been completed, copies were multiplied by transcription. But as manuscripts were costly, they could rarely be possessed by individuals, not always even by churches; hence a great part of the work of preachers was to expound consecutively the several parts of the sacred text. Thus homilies or familiar expositions of Scripture became the form of pulpit address which primarily characterized that period. Voluminous and valuable examples have come down to us in the homilies of Athanasius, Ephraem Syrus, Basil, the Gregory of the Cyrus, Hilary, Ambrose, Chrysostom, and Augustine.

The same period was also marked by the cultivation, among the more prominent preachers, of the Grecian style of oratory. Several of the most distinguished fathers having not only been students, but teachers of rhetoric, they did not neglect opportunities offered them for sacred oratory and panegyrics. The latter style of address, in fact, became very common in the honorings of the martyrs and in celebrations of the great feasts of the Church.

The best specimens of the Christian oratory of this period have been much eulogized, and having been often pointed out as models for study and imitation, have exerted no little influence on the preaching of modern times, more particularly in France and on the continent of Europe. Even the historian Gibbon, in a paragraph which severely, but not without justice, censures certain serious errors into which many of the teachers of the Church had already fallen, says, “But the compositions of Gregory and Chrysostom have been compared with the most splendid models of Attic, or at least of Asiatic, eloquence.”

That the mistakes of the preachers of the ancient Church came largely from ignorance, and that the tendency of education and enlightenment was to increase the influence of truth and the power of the pulpit, is sufficiently evident from the edict of the apostate emperor Julian, which prohibited the Christians from teaching or being taught the right use of books. The motives which prompted the edict are thus set forth by Gibbon: “Julian had reason to expect that (under the influence of his edict) in the space of a few years the Church would relapse into its primate simplicity; and that the theologians who possessed an adequate share of the learning and eloquence of the age would be succeeded by a generation of blind and ignorant fanatics incapable of defending the truth of their own principles or of exposing the various follies of polytheism.”

Notwithstanding the early death of Julian and the restoration of the civil rights of the Christians, through a series of untoward events, to which prevailing corruption in the Church greatly contributed, the evils of general ignorance and the degradation of preaching and of the clergy came only too soon and remained too long. From the first development of ceremonialism in the Church there was manifested a tendency to limit preaching to bishops only. This tendency grew with the multiplication of ceremonial observances, until it resulted in a general transposition of preaching from its primary design as an ever-active agency of evangelization into a ceremony, in which result springs its degenerate oratorical power. When the number of preachers was reduced to a minimum, the chances for the development of the talent of eloquence were correspondingly diminished, and the more so since an election to the office of bishop would do little towards conferring the gift of eloquence upon men previously unaccustomed to preach. Thus it may be seen that what has been called the oratorical period of the ancient Church derived that character from a comparatively few men of extraordinary ability, rather than from the general prevalence of preaching power among the orders of the clergy, the latter part of that period witnessed a serious decline in the spirit and practice of preaching, which was destined to project itself forward into centuries following.

III. The Period of the Middle Ages.—The terms “Middle Ages” and “Dark Ages” have long been nearly synonymous; but historians have not often pointed out with sufficient clearness the extent to which the darkness of those ages was chargeable to the incompetence and unfaithfulness of those who, as Christian teachers, ought to have been the lights of the world. The causes of the prevailing ignorance and degradation were numerous and complicated, but nothing would have more certainly or powerfully tended to remove them than true and zealous utterances from the clergy in the character of Christian preachers. Churches, and even cathedrals, existed in great numbers, but the idea of preob-
PULPIT ELOQUENCE

The term pulpit, primarily meaning a note upon a text or texts (postillas), came to designate a religious text following the reading of the Gospel and Epistle of the day at public mass. The term itself was diminutive, showing that preaching was regarded as of small account in comparison with the ceremonials of worship. The postillae in its best form—that of a running comment on the verses of a Scripture lesson—resembled the homily. It continued in use, both among Roman Catholics and Protestants, for several generations after the dawn of the Reformation. Persons specially skilful in delivering postillae were called postillists, or postillas. Specimens of the postillae abound in the ecclesiastical literature of the period and are of much consideration, but few of them are of much present value. The best sermons of the period that have come down to us are several discourses delivered by bishops in connection with the festivals of the Church, such as the Advent, Whitsun-tide, Christmas, the Crucifixion, and the Ascension. As these topics involved Scripture narration, they rose in character far above those treated in connection with the festivals of the saints, of which tradition furnished the staple material. The most tangible, though not the most useful results of preaching in the medieval period were the so-called preachers of the Crusades. Those results were not the peaceable fruits of righteousness, but passion, strife, and bloodshed. Peter the Hermit, a fanatical monk of the 11th century, was the preacher and prime instigator of the first Crusade. On this was based the hatred and antipathy that was to follow. How important the Crusades were to the country, enlisting high and low in his desperate scheme. He even induced pope Urban II to join him in haranguing a vast multitude assembled at Clermont, in the south of France, preparatory to the first great movement towards the Holy Land. It was the hortatory speech of Urban that the multitude cried out Deus aedificans, and thus initiated the war-cry of all the Crusades. Bernard of Clairvaux, subsequently canonized as St. Bernard, preached the second Crusade. He was not only appointed by Louis VII, king of France, for that purpose, but commissioned by pope Eugenius III to offer plenary indulgence to those who would join the new Crusade. He also provided himself with badges in the form of a cross to be attached to the shoulders of all who would enlist. Whereas Peter stirred the lowest dregs of the populace, Bernard succeeded in enlisting kings, emperors, barons, and knights to attempt "to rescue the home and sanctuary of David from the hands of the Philistines." Parliaments and mass-meetings were held and addressed by Bernard from a lofty pulpit, and at these the response to his appeals was the reiterated shudder throughout the land. In such circumstances, and backed by such influences, it was said that the eloquence of Bernard "raised armies and depopulated cities." According to his own statement, towns were deserted so that the only people left in them were widows and orphans whose husbands and fathers were yet living. The third and fourth Crusades were set in motion by the ordinary influences of papal power and kingsy authority, without any special co-operation of the pulpit. The fifth, however, was brought into action by a preacher named Fulk, a Frenchman. As a result of previous disasters, the spirit of crusading had so far declined that for two years the preaching of Fulk seemed unavailing. But at length it began to be said that miracles attested his exhortations, and soon after pope Innocent III sent to his aid numerous nuncios, who traversed Europe offering absolutions and indulgences to stimulate enlistments. Robert de Courillon, an Englishman by birth, was the preacher of the sixth Crusade. He had been an assistant to Fulk, under whom he had learned the art of exciting the people. Although inferior in talents to the other preachers of the Crusades, he was equal to any of them in zeal and fanaticism, and if history does not misrepresent him, he at length became so unconquerable as to embezzeG the alms of his followers. The seventh and eighth Crusades followed like receding waves of the sea, growing smaller and weaker as the impulses of fanaticism abated. They were without any preachers of distinction, and may be regarded as results of the earlier agitation.

The general decadence of preaching throughout the Roman Church became a pretext, during the latter part of the medieval period, for the organization of several preachers orders of monks. Had these orders devoted themselves to intelligent activity in proclaiming the truths of God's Word and the practical duties of Christianity, the best of results might have been expected. But their zeal was devoted to very different objects. It was, in fact, absorbed in efforts to excite persecution against the Albigenses and other sects, and to unite with general exhortations to promote the schemes of the papacy and the inquisition. Hence it is not surprising that the preaching orders as such failed to make any valuable contributions to the eloquence of the pulpit or to stimulate activity in preaching among the clergy at large. Of the ecclesiastical celebrities of the medieval period, few can be mentioned on account of distinguished ability as preachers. The two men who, perhaps, more than others deserve such mention were Antony of Padua, subsequently canonized as a saint, and the Jesuit preacher Robert Bellarmine. The former, of the order of the Jesuits, has been described by his friends as "his rare talents as a preacher caused him to be employed on unceasing missions through the north and centre of Italy, especially in the neighborhood of Bologna and Padua." We have the account of Antony's homily on the Ascension from the country, enlisting high and low in his desperate scheme. He also provided himself with badges in the form of a cross to be attached to the shoulders of all who would enlist. Vieyra was born in 1608, later than the usual limit of the period under consideration; nevertheless, from his style and general character, he has been usually considered as "called to the Order of the Jesuits," a part of his life was spent in Brazil, though for a time he served as court preacher at Lisbon. During that period he visited various cities of Europe, and even preached at Rome in the Italian language. His labors as superior of the missions in Brazil, often requiring him to travel thousands of leagues on foot through the wildest regions, and to traverse immense rivers in canoes; yet he was ever ready to preach to a few natives through an interpreter, or to persons of rank and influence in society. His great talent was satire, which he did not scruple to employ both in and out of the pulpit. At Maranha, one of the northern cities of Brazil, he preached a noted sermon "To the Fishers," after the method of Antony of Padua. It was based upon the text " Ye are the salt of the earth." In style and ingenuity it is not unlike his book entitled The barcode of Stebling, which is regarded as a species of classic in the Portuguese language. Vieyra lived to an advanced age and died at the city of Bahia, having, in circumstances where printing was difficult, published not less than three famous works, which were followed by two others after his death.

IV. The Modern Period.—The beginning of the great Reformation was characterized by a revival of preaching. It was by preaching that the Reformers sought to expose the errors and corruptions into which the Church had fallen, as well as to set forth the doctrines of the Word of God. Thus Peter Waldo in the south of France, Wycliffe in England, Huss and Jerome of Prague in Bohemia, and the famous John Melanchthon in Germany, Zwingli in Switzerland, and Farel and Calvin in Switzerland and France, pursued similar courses and with similar success. Wherever such men were not overborne and crushed by opposition, they were sustained and followed by an ever-increasing number of the people. Hence it may be said declaringly that the Reformation preaching has been in all Protestant countries a universal accompaniment of public worship. It has not only been maintained at a single service on the Lord's day, but usually twice or thrice in each church, and often at other times during the week. This custom has called into action a vast number of preachers, and developed the preaching talent of the Church more thoroughly than it had ever been previously cultivated subsequent to the apostolic age.

As attack prompts defense, so the zeal of Protestant preachers called out new activities and enlisted new talent among the preachers of the Roman Catholic Church. The preaching orders became greatly stimulated. Preaching ceased to be confined to bishops. Priests and curates began to preach, at least to the extent of endeavoring to soothe the people by the supply of a few general sections of Christendom a new prominence was given to the preaching office. It is true that among Roman Catholics the mass still held the precedence and preaching did not universally become a part of Sabbath services. Nevertheless, in Protestant countries Roman Catholics came by degrees to maintain preaching in about as great frequency as the Protestants around them. Even the seating of churches and cathedrals for the convenience of auditors—a custom still unknown in Roman Catholic countries—has come to be common among the people of England and France.

It may thus be seen that the influence of the Reformation tended to increase in various ways the activity and power of the pulpit. It certainly secured for preaching a degree of prominence and frequency unknown to any previous period following the days of the apostles. While the impulse thus given to pulpit eloquence has never died out, its effects have been variable in different countries and at different periods. In Germany, for example, after the Reformation became so far established as to be incorporated into the political institutions of the people, preachers have held a preeminent power from which it has not even yet fully recovered. The causes of that decline were numerous, involving the influence of Jesuitic opposition, false philosophy, scepticism in various forms, and, worst of all, a prevalent indifference to the power of religious truth and the necessity of a personal religious life.

In France the most celebrated epoch of pulpit eloquence occurred during the reign of Louis XIV, a monarch who, notwithstanding personal vices and official cruelties that have made his name detestable, was a zealous prelate. Through his command and example, attendance upon court preaching was made fashionable in a dissolute age, and it cannot be doubted that the influence of his patronage greatly stimulated the study and practice of pulpit oratory among the Catholic clergy of his day. It is not less true that his influence fostered among the preachers that appeared before him a spirit of servility and adulation wholly unworthy of the ministerial office. The extent to which such truly great men as Bossuet, Maslell, le Bas, and Bouhours, with volumes of eloquent sentiment, not to say flattery, in their sermons before the king and the aristocracy, is equally offensive and amazing to readers of the present day. When to the names just mentioned that of Fénelon is added, we have a representation of the highest phase of pulpit oratory known to the Catholic Church of France in any age. The Protestant Church of France, including Switzerland, has furnished many distinguished preachers. Calvin and Farel, of the period of the Reformation, were worthy succeeded by such men as Du Moulin, Faucheur, Daillé, Claude, Superville, Saurin, Vinet, Monod, and many others. The names of the day in the English Church, though obscure, and their circumstances often greatly embarrassed by persecution; yet the specimens of printed sermons by which they are represented to succeeding generations compare favorably with any to be found in their own or other languages. During the current century, Roman Catholic preachers have given a very rare in France. Beyond Lacadure, Ravignan, and Hyacinthe, few can be named as having attained a national reputation.

Great Britain may be said to be the home of modern pulpit eloquence. Taking England, including Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, into one view, it may be doubted if any country of the world has produced more or better sermons during the last three hundred years. Since the days of Wycliffe, preaching in Great Britain has been common among all classes and conditions of men. Successive generations have been educated to look upon it as so familiar a part of their religious life that it has not only not been free to speak, but the masses of the people have been disposed to hear. The British pulpit, moreover, has been favored above that of any other European country in two auxiliary conditions: The great importance which was attached to the use of the Word of God and the religious observance of the Lord's day. Without the former, there is no valid basis for pulpit instruction or appeal, and hence the sermon usually degenerates into a mere oration. Without the latter, hearers are wanting, or at least irregular in attendance, a circumstance that deprives preachers of one of the most inspiring motives for diligent preparation and high effort. More truly than in any other country, unless possibly in the English-speaking portions of North America, the pulpit of Great Britain has been and is the terror of the religious life and sentiments of the people. Its utterances have consequently been greatly diversified at different periods and in different circumstances. In times of religious indifference, and in those portions or branches of the Church in which religious sentiment has run low, preaching has declined to its lowest grade of influence; whereas in periods of religious awakening, and in the more evangelical sections of the Church, pulpit eloquence has attained its maximum power, not only in the sermons of a few men of extraordinary talent, but in the average ability and power of the whole body of the people. In one case, it has not only had a free pulpit, but also a free press, has furnished a body of sermon literature unsurpassed in quality and extent by that of any other country in the world.

The more distinguished preachers of Great Britain may be classified by epochs and religious associations. The names of Wycliffe, Latimer, Knox, and Jewell represent the great preachers of the Reformation. A similar selection for the 17th century would embrace the names of Jeremy Taylor, Barrow, Baxter, Bunyan, Howe, Chernock, Tillotson, South, and possibly many others.

In the 18th century, religion and piety, with the names of extraordinary zeal and effectiveness, were instrumental in awakening a religious movement which extended not only throughout Great Britain, but, in fact, throughout the English-speaking world. One of its results was to improve the tone and quality of preaching in all the churches. The number of great preachers who have adorned the British pulpit in the course of the 18th and 19th centuries is beyond enumeration. The following are representative names, and associated with them by names of masters of oratory and eloquence: Chalmers, Wardlaw, Richard Watson, Robert Newton, Duff, Guthrie, F. W. Robertson, Stanley, Melville, Punshon, and Spurgeon. To this list might be added the names of a large number of other preachers of no less moral and intellectual worth, and of nearly equal though somewhat more local celebrity.
PULPIT ELOQUENCE

The freedom of the English pulpit, and, in fact, a greater freedom than was enjoyed in England at that day, came to America with the Pilgrim Fathers. Having been by them established on the Atlantic coast, it has been an indissoluble part of our civilization until the whole continent has felt its power. The pulpit in America, as in Great Britain, has been greatly aided in the accomplishment of its mission by the general observance of the Christian Sabbath and a free use of the Holy Scriptures. The importance of preaching has also been recognized from the first in the Church architecture of America. All edifices constructed as places of worship, from the log structures of the frontier to the great tabernacles of crowded cities and the Roman Catholic cathedrals, have been seated for auditors. In these and other conditions of society, not excepting that of all churches being alike thrown upon the voluntary system of self-support, the Christian pulpit has had in America one of its fairest and widest fields of effort. It would not have been creditable if in such circumstances pulpit eloquence had not been extensively and successfully cultivated. That it has been will appear from the long list of good and great preachers who have adorned the American Church, many of whom have given to the world volumes of published sermons. Probably in no country has the average grade of pulpit eloquence been equalled by the highest State in America; and, owing in part to its vast extent, in no country is it more difficult to determine who may justly be said to have attained a national reputation as preachers. The truth is that each great denomination of Christians forms, in a certain sense, a world of itself, within which the principal preachers are far better known than in other similar worlds surrounding. Nevertheless, there have not been wanting a goodly number of men whose reputation for pulpit eloquence has transcended all denominational boundaries and become indeed national. Without attempting a catalogue of names, it may be said that the names of Jonathan Edwards, Jonathan Mayhew, John Trumbull, John Witherspoon, Thomas Jefferson, and William Ellery Channing, Francis Wayland, Stephen Olin, Henry B. Bucum, Charles P. Millar, George W. Bethune, Stephen H. Tyng, and Matthew Sewall are among the preachers whose names have been at the time present; but since there is no absolute standard of determination, it is deemed preferable to incur the risk of error by diminution rather than by excess.

In this connection, it is only just to remark that in modern times the press serves as an important factor in the creation of public reputations, both local and national. Hence those preachers who have availed themselves of its agency as a means of giving their sermons to the public, and others whose friends have been zealous to do a similar office for them, have become much more widely known than many of equal and perhaps greater ability who have not been thus represented. But as mere publicity does not secure reputation, it is also true that the reputation of some men has been more lasting than helped by the publication of their sermons. It is, in fact, no uncommon thing that published sermons wholly fail to convey to readers the impression they produced upon their hearers when delivered. Hence, to form historic judgments of the ability of preachers, attention should be given both to the influence of the appropriate circumstances and to the matter they employed in their sermons, as tested by the established principles of criticism. It was not our intention to include among the preachers named above any who have not favorably passed the double test. That many others have already done so will not doubt be the opinion of some; but time, which tries all things, will enable readers at a future day better to determine.

Even a cursory survey of the varied character and results of pulpit eloquence during the nineteenth centuries of its history is suggestive of important lessons. A few may be noted.

1. There are different kinds of pulpit eloquence. In order to be intelligently studied or judged, sermons must be classified. Some are didactic, having for their chief object instruction in Christian truth. Some are hortatory, having for their object the enforcement of truth already familiar. Some are axiological, seeking to expand the meaning of the Scriptures. Some are illustrative, seeking to create an interest in Christian truth by exhibitions of its correspondences in nature, in human consciousness, and in the facts of history; while some are composite, seeking to blend the above characteristics into a harmonious whole. Each of these different kinds of pulpit address demands a style of language and discussion adapted to its special object.

2. Attention to this fact might lead to gross misjudgments on the part of critics, and equal mistakes on the part of preachers. A man who is not able to spoil a didactic discourse, while the coolness of didactic address would render an exhortation powerless. An essential element, therefore, in determining whether a given sermon is eloquent is a just consideration of its object. Accepting the etymological, and in fact the scriptural, idea of eloquence—namely, that of speaking well (Exod. iv, 14)—it must be conceded that a certain degree of eloquence must be recognised in sermons well adapted to the promotion of the most common and familiar objects of Christian discourse. But inasmuch as the high degree of eloquence in Christian discourse is a challenge of admiration not accorded to well-doing in more common matters, so it is customary to restrict the term eloquence to those higher and more unusual qualities of speech which excite emotions and control actions. In fact, one of the best definitions of eloquence states it to be the language of emotion. This definition implies that it is easier to instruct the mind and convince the judgment than to move the sensibilities of men. Nevertheless, instruction and conviction are essentially dependent upon strong emotions. Few preachers accomplish the latter without the use of those conditions as antecedent agencies.

3. The natural temperament of preachers governs in a great measure the kind of eloquence in which they may excel. Sons of thunder and sons of consolation have each their own characteristic and their own standard of strength or adopt the style of the other is to hazard failure. Nevertheless, mere natural endowments are insufficient to ensure success without studious self-cultivation; whereas laborious efforts in right lines tend to the highly successful development of ordinary talents. As an instance in point is that of Thomas Guthrie, the distinguished preacher of the Free Church of Scotland, than whom no man ever wielded the power of illustration more effectively. Yet, as shown in his biography, that power was acquired by diligent and continuous efforts after his entrance into mature ministerial life, and as a result of personal experiences convincing him of its importance.

3. Successful pulpit addresses demand a wise choice of subjects, the vivid presentation of thought, and the use of language adapted to the comprehension of hearers. The character and influence of the Christian pulpit have at times been greatly lowered by the introduction of improper topics-topics either trivial in themselves or out of harmony with the spirit and truths of the Gospel. But even when the themes of discourse have been appropriate the important objects of preaching have often been neutralized by language ut-terences, or by styles of expression ill adapted to the comprehension of the hearers addressed. The expression — the general statement — is rather to speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue” (1 Cor. xiv, 19), elucidates an important principle of all true eloquence. No matter how eloquent a man may be in his own estimation, if others fail to comprehend his efforts will be to them either an enigma, or at best a vain show. In short, all genuine pulpit eloquence must be in harmony with those principles of human nature on which the success of secular eloquence depends. It was critically pointed out long ago that the triumphs in eloquence secured by Demosthenes were won by his “handling in succession a variety of topics all calculated to strike his audience.” So the successful proclamation of the Gospel depends largely upon the capacity of its preachers to present in striking forms, and in proper succession, the great truths of God’s Word and providence.

4. The higher degrees of pulpit eloquence are not attained apart from deep religious feeling on the part of preachers. All who are sincere in their hearts and love in the grade of their religious opinions and experience neither choose the themes that strike the deep chords of the human soul, nor are capable of treating them in the most affecting and moving manner. Whereas men who have a profound sense of the divine presence and authority, who live a vivid conception of the reality of eternity, the value of immortal souls, and the power of Christ as the Saviour of the perishing, they, and they only, have the proper moral basis for effective, and hence, in the most important sense, eloquent religious address to their fellow-men. “Out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh.” When, therefore, the heart is full of God’s truth and love, it gives forth its sentiments in impressive utterances, and makes objective to others the eloquent feelings that glow within it. When the emotions of the speaker are not enlisted—in other words, when subjective eloquence is wanting on his part—the objective results of eloquence cannot be produced in the minds and hearts of hearers.

5. The higher effects of eloquence depend largely upon accessories favorable both to speakers and hearers. It is not sufficient that an orator relite in himself the qualities and conditions essential to eloquence. He also has need of all available agencies as helps in the task of transferring his thoughts and emotions to others. His first requisite is language, as a common medium for the expression and reception of thought. But the force of his language may be greatly weakened by indistinct articulation, by feeble utterance, by uncoordinated gestures, and other faults of delivery. On the other hand, it may be greatly intensified by a corresponding physical expression, in which not only the tongue addresses the ear, but the eye, the countenance, the attitudes, and the action of an earnest speaker fix the gaze of his auditors and concentrate the magnetism of his presence and purposes upon the reception and sympathy of his hearers. That the full effect of such an address can be secured, the auditors must be comfortably placed, and within easy range of his voice, since any form of discomfort, or any effort to understand, detracts their attention and weakens the impression they will receive. When, in circumstances like these, the thoughts and emotions of an eloquent man flow into the souls and kindle the emotions of a mass of hearers, their presence, in turn, reacts upon him, quickening his mental powers, and rousing his sensibilities to a degree unattainable in other circumstances. This mutuality of emotion rises with the increase of numbers and the unity of sentiment that pervades the mass. It may be said, therefore, that when speakers are equal in their task, large audiences are important, if not essential, to the higher effects of eloquence. Favorable expectancy on the part of hearers is also another condition greatly helpful to a speaker. It relieves him of the necessity of creating a bond of sympathy between himself and persons ignorant of him, or perhaps prejudiced against him. It is in this respect that a speaker’s reputation may become to him an auxiliary of great value. While the conditions above specified, and others of like character, are not always within the control of ministers of the Gospel, and are sometimes due to contingencies quite beyond their control, nevertheless a diligent discharge of ministerial and pastoral duty tends to create them. It was a precept of the ancient rhetoricians that the orator must be a good man, and a German writer has published a book to demonstrate that eloquence is in a large measure deprived of its force by the presence of profane or immoral people thus sanctioned that extensive personal acquaintance, a high moral and religious character, and a reputation based on faithful labor and habits of doing good, all challenge sympathy, attract hearers, and awaken hopeful expectation.

6. The influence of the Holy Spirit is the crowning auxiliary of pulpit eloquence. Apart from this the preacher is like any other man. But, over and above all merely human aids, a Christian preacher of the right character and spirit is entitled to expect the influence of the Holy Ghost added to the truths he presents in increased impressiveness, and to his hearers increased sensitivity.

It is only under this last-named condition that pulpit eloquence can be hoped to attain its highest power. But this is a condition that no indolent man can reasonably hope to enjoy. It neither follows in the train of religious presumption, nor of an undue reliance upon genius or personal ability, but rather comes in answer to “the fervent, effectual prayer of a righteous man.” He, therefore, who as a minister of the Gospel would, according to the apostolic injunction, study to show himself “approved, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed,” should be equally diligent in the acquisition of sacred knowledge, and in the highest possible cultivation of his powers of expression, that he may with confidence ask for the unction of the Holy One as a means of rendering his utterances as a preacher of Christian truth in the highest degree efficacious. In view of this supreme object, the diligent study of pulpit eloquence, whether in its history, its principles, or its diversified illustrations, both in the published sermons and in the biographies of distinguished preachers, is of equal interest and importance.

Pulse (πόλυς), serom, and πολυσμ, serom; Sept. δόρσια; Thess. πεσίματα; Vulg. legumina occurs only in the A. V. in Dan. i, 12, 16, as the translation of the above plural noms, the literal meaning of which is "seeds" of any kind. The food on which "the four children" thrived for ten days is perhaps not to be restricted to what we now understand by "pulse," i.e., the genus of leguminous vegetables; the term probably involves edible seeds in a variety of forms. This variety makes the words "vegetables, herbs, such as are eaten in a half-fast, as opposed to flesh and more delicate food." Properly the term denotes uncooked grains of any kind, whether barley, wheat, millet, vetches, etc.

Our translators have also inverted in Italian the words "pulse" as one of the "parched" sorts of provision which Barzillai brought to king David (2 Sam. xii. 28). In this they are probably right. Leguminous seeds roasted are still used in the East; and in his commentary on Matt. v. 22 Jerome mentions roasted chick-pease, along with raisins and apples, as the small-wares in which the huckster fruitiers used to deal: "Frumentum, ouveque passus, et poma diversi generis." Allusions in Plutarch and Horace show that parched peas were a familiar article of diet among the poorer Romans.

Pulton, ANDREW, a Roman Catholic divine of the Society of Jesus, flourished in the second half of the 17th century, and is noted as a zealous defender of his order and Church. He was quite a pulpfit orator, but he was more successful still as a polemic. He published in 1667 Against Tolerance, Nunnivocatur, etc. (Lond. 1667, 4to)—Reply to a Challenge (1668)—Total Defeat of the Protestant Rule of Faith (4to). Pumbeditha (Pumbeditha), a name celebrated in Jewish literature as the home of one of the great schools of Judaism, was located in Babylonia, and derived its name from its situation at the (pums) mouth of the Bab.

R. Jehudah ben-Jecheeskel, one of the most distinguished disciples of Abba Areka, also called Rab (q. v.), it flourished until towards the beginning of the 11th century, thus moulding, shaping, and influencing the life and literature of the Jews. Many of the rectors of this academy acquired a great renown for their Rabbinic learning, and were well-known in this Cyclopedia, or will be treated in the succeeding volumes. The following list, giving the names of the famous teachers at that academy, prepared after a careful and diligent perusal of the best authorities, we hope will aid the student of Jewish literature, since it is not easy to bring the membra disjecta into a chronological order out of the rudis indicetque mole of the different sources:

1. R. Jehudah ben-Jecheeskel 297-399
2. Chana of Kafr 399-399
3. Rabba ben-Nachman 399-399
4. Joseph ben-Chiba, the Blind (q. v.) 380-380
5. Abaj ben-Cajil 380-380
6. Rabba bar-Joseph bar-Chama 380-380
7. Nachman ben-Isaac 380-380
8. Chana of Nachmae 380-380
9. Zedib ben-Ushaja. 376-376
10. Bina of Silluna 376-376
11. Roffen ben-Papa 376-376
12. R. Chana 376-376
13. R. Harka 376-376
14. Acha ben-Raba 376-376
15. Gehaza of Be-Kati 376-376
16. Roffen II. 376-376
17. Nachumal, or Nachmuchai 376-376
18. R. Harka 406-414
19. R. Joae 414-415

At this time the final redaction of the Babylonian Talmud (q. v.) was made, and, according to Jewish tradition, to R. Jose, who forms the end of the Amoraim (Soph Haranah), the honor is assigned of "completing to written" the Secpanies of Gentle of the Great of the Synagogue and rabbinical dignity, in the year from the creation 4260, and 311 years from the sealing of the Manna." After the death of R. Jose, the chronological chain is interrupted, and, with the exception of a few names which have come down to us, it is difficult to say who filled the space up to the year 5760, for there is a long interval of persecutions of those times, the names of those famous teachers have been forgotten. With Mar Rabbi, who belonged to the so-called Gaonic period, the chronological order can again be followed down to the last of the R. Chama of Pumbeditha, whose death sealed the closing of that famous academy forever. The following are the names:

1. Mar Rabbai 670-670
4. R. Chiba of Meseve 740-710
5. Mar-Rabbai 740-710
7. Mar-Rabbai 740-710

Punchao was the greatest of the Peruvian gods, the lord of the day, the creator of light.

Pundek (Puinde), a village of the tribe of Dan mentioned in the Talmud (Schwart, Palest, p. 144); now the village Fandek, about midway between Nablus and the shores of Lake Tiberias, on the north side of the road (Robinson, Later Researches, p. 156). Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 840.

Pungel, Nicolaus, Dr., a Roman Catholic divine, was born at Munster in 1802. Having completed his studies, he was ordained priest in 1825, and for several years labored as chaplain in Riesenbeck and Munster. From 1825 to 1830, he supervised the parish of Schu-benbeck, in the meantime pursuing his studies. The result was his work on Gerson's tract, De Parvulis ad Christianum Tractandis, together with a Vita Gersonii, which he published in 1853, and thus became a privat-docent at the University of Münster. He soon became professor of pastoral theology, and died April 24, 1876, as senior of the chapter. — Literarischer Handzettel, 1876, p. 238.

Punishment (most properly expressed in Hebrew by a form of אָדַר, pākād, strictly "to visit," and in Greek by σκλαστ or σκυπρωσ, but frequently denoted by other terms). The following account is based upon the Scripture statements, with illustrations from ancient and modern sources. See CORPORAL ILLNATITIONS.

1. Historical Review of Bodily Ilinations among the Hebrews. — The earliest theory of punishment current among mankind is doubtless the one of simple retaliation, "blood for blood" [see BLOOD AVENGE], a view which in a limited form appears even in the Mosaic law. Viewed historically, the first case of punishment for crime mentioned in Scripture, next to the fall itself, is that of Cain, the first murderer. His punishment, however, was a substitute for the retaliation which might have been looked for from the hand of man, and the mark set on him, whatever it was, served at once to designate, protect, and perhaps correct the criminal. That such was the spirit of punishment for murder appears plain from the remark of Lamaceh (Gen. iv. 24). In the post-diluvial code, if we may so call it, retribution by the hand of man, even in the case of an offending animal, for blood shed, is clearly laid down (ix. 5, 6); but its terms give no sanction to that "wild justice" executed even to the present day by individuals and families on their own behalf by so many of the uncivilized races of mankind. The prevalence of a feeling of retribution due for blood shed may be remarked as arising among the brethren of Joseph in reference to their fratricidal crime (xxi. 21). The punishment of death appears among the legal powers of Judah, as the head of his family, and he ordered his daughter-in-law, Tamar, to be burned (xxxviii. 24). It is denounced by the king of the Philistines, Abimelech, against those of his people who should injure or insult Isaac or his wife (xxxvi. 11, 29). Similar power seems to have been possessed by the reigning Pharaoh in the time of Joseph (xii. 13).

Passing onwards to Mosaic times, we find the sentence of capital punishment, in the case of murder, plainly laid down in the Deut. laws, that he must be put to death, even if he should have taken refuge at God's altar or in an asylum city, and the same principle was to be carried out even in the case of an animal (Exod. xxi. 12, 14, 28, 36; Lev. xxiv. 17, 21; Num. xxxix. 31; Deut. xix. 11, 12; and Josh. ii. 28, 29; xxiii. 26). The law did not allow parents to be put to death for their children, nor children for their parents (Deut. xix. 16), as did the Chaldaans (Dan. vi. 24) and the kings of Israel (comp. 1 Kings xxii. 2; 2 Kings ix. 20).

The extensive prescription of capital punishment by the Mosaic law, which we cannot consider as a death letter, may be accounted for by the peculiar circumstances of the people. They were a nation of newly emancipated slaves, and were by nature perhaps more than commonly intractable; and if we may judge by the laws enjoined on them, which Mr. Hume well remarks are a safe index to the manners and disposition of any people, we must infer that they had imbibed all the degrading influences of slavery among heathens. Their wanderings and isolation did not admit of penal settlements or remedial punishments. They were placed under the immediate hand of the government and superintendence. Hence, wilful offences evinced an incorrigibility which rendered death the only means of ridding the community of such transgressers, and this was ultimately restored to in regard to all individuals above a certain age, in certain cases, might enter Canaan (Num. xiv. 29, 32, 55). If capital punishment in Chris-
PUNISHMENT

Bouching holy things illegally (Num. iv, 15, 18, 20; and see 2 Sam. vii, 7; 2 Chron. xxxii, 21).

In the foregoing list, which, it will be seen, is classified according to the mode to be taken by the law of the principle of condemnation, the cases marked with * are (a) those which are expressly threatened or actually visited with death, as well as with cutting off. In those (b) marked †, the hand of God is expressly named as the instrument of execution. We thus find that (a) there are in class i seven cases, all named in Lev. xx, 9-16; in class ii, two cases; in class iii, two cases; while of (b) we find in class ii four cases, of which three belong also to (a), and in class iii one case. The question to be determined is, whether the phraseology means death in all cases; and to avoid that conclusion Le Clerc, Michaelis, and others have suggested that in some of them—the ceremonial ones—it was intended to be commuted for banishment or privation of civil rights (Michaelis, Lxv of Moses, vol. iii, § 257, p. 486, trans.). Rabbinical writers explain "cutting off" to mean excommunication, and laid down three degrees of severity as belonging to it (Selden, De Sym. i, 6). See ANATHEMA. But most commentators agree that, in accordance with the præma-facie meaning of Heb. x, 28, the sentence of "cutting off" to be death, or punishment of some sort. Saalschütz explains it to be premature death by God's hand, as if God took into his own hand such cases of ceremonial defilement as would create difficulty for human judges to decide. Knobel thinks death-punishment absolutely is meant; so Corn. à Lapide and Ewald. John explains that when God is said to cut off, an act of divine providence is meant, which in the end destroys the family, but that "cutting off" in general means stoning to death, as the usual capital punishment of the law. Calmet thinks it means privation rather than punishment of some sort. It may be remarked (a) that two instances are recorded in which violation of a ritual command took place without the actual infliction of a death-punishment: (1) that of the people eating with the blood (1 Sam. xiv, 32); (2) that of Uzzaiah (2 Chron. xxxvi, 19, 21), and that in the latter case the offender was, in fact, excommunicated for life; (b) that there are also instances of the directly contrary course, viz. in which the offenders were punished with death for similar offences: Nadab and Abihu (Lev. x, 1, 2); Korah and his company (Num. xvi, 33), who "perished of the congregation"; Uzzah (2 Sam. vi, 7); and further, that the leprosy inflicted on Uzzaiah might be regarded as a virtual death (Num. xii, 12). To whichever side of the question this case may be thought to incline, we may perhaps conclude that the primary meaning of "cutting off" is a sentence of death to be executed, in some cases, without remission, but in others voidable (1) by immediate atonement upon the offender's part; (2) by direct interposition of the Almighty, i.e. a sentence of death always "recorded," but not always executed. It is also probable that the severity of the sentence was produced in practice an immediate recourse to the prescribed means of propitiation in almost every actual case of ceremonial defilement (Num. xx, 27, 29). See Saalschütz, Arch. Hebr. x, 74, 75, vol. ii, 299; Knobel, Calmet, Corn. à Lapide on Gen. xvii, 15, 14; Keil, Bibl. Arch. vol. ii, p. 594; § 153; Ewald, Gesich. App. vol. iii, p. 158; Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 257.

III. Penalties.—Punishments, in themselves, are twofold, capital and secondary; and in the cases we are considering they were either native or foreign. Of the foreign, the possibility of Hebrew, the following only are prescribed by the law.

1. Stoning, which was the ordinary mode of execution (Exod. xxvii, 4; Luke xx, 6; John x, 31; Acts xiv, 5). We find it ordered in the cases which are marked in the lists above as punishable with death; and we may remark further that it is ordered also in the case of an offending animal (Exod. xix, 13; xx v, 29). The false witness, likewise, in a capital case would, by the law of retaliation, become liable to death (Deut. xix, 19; Mosaic, i, 1, 6). In the case of idolatry, and it may be presumed in other cases also, the witnesses, of whom there were to be at least two, were warned to the first stone (Deut. xiii, 9; xvii, 7; John viii, 7; Acts vii, 58). The Rabbinical writers add that the first stone was cast by one of them on the chest of the convict, and if this failed to cause death, the bystanders proceeded to complete the sentence (Sanhedr. vi, 1, 4; Goodwyn, Moses and Aaron, p. 121). The body was then to be suspended till sunset (Deut. xxi, 23; Josh. x, 26; Josephus, Ant. iv, 8, 24), and not buried in the family grave (Sanhedr. vi, 5).

2. Hunger is mentioned as a distinct punishment (Num. xiv, 4; 2 Sam. xi, 6, 9), but generally, in the case of Jews, spoken of as following death by some other means. Hungering alive may have been a Canaanitic punishment, since it was practiced by the Goérons on the sons of Saul (2 Sam. xxi, 9).

3. Burning, in pre-Mosaic times, was the punishment for unchastity (Gen. xxxviii, 24). Under the law it is ordered in the case of a priest's daughter (Lev. xxv, 9), of which an instance is mentioned (Sanhedr. vii, 2); likewise in case of incest (Lev. xx, 14); but it is also mentioned as a capital punishment (Josh. xix, 25), and some have thought it was never used excepting after death. Among the heathens this merciful preliminary was not always observed, as, for instance, in the case of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego (Dan. iii). The Rabbinical account of burning by means of molten lead poured down the throat has no authority in Scripture.

4. Death by the sword or spear is named in the law (Exod. xix, 13; xxxvii, 27; Num. xiv, 7), although two of the cases may be regarded as exceptional; but it occurs frequently in the Gospels (Judg. ix, 5; 1 Sam. xxvi, 33; xxii, 18; 2 Sam. i, 15; iv, 12, xx, 22; 2 Kings ii, 25, 34; xix, 1; 2 Kings x, 7; 2 Chron. xxii, 4; Jer. xxvi, 23; Matt. xiv, 8, 10)—a list in which more than one case of assassination, either with or without legal forms, is included.

5. Strangling is said by the rabbinists to have been regarded as the most common but least severe of the capital punishments, and to have been performed by immersing the convict in clay or mud, and then strangling him by a cloth twisted round the neck (Goodwyn, M. T., xxxvii, 229; Josephus, Ant. vii, 219; Suidas; D. E. Michaelis, De Judicia, ap. Pott, Syll. Comm. iv, § 10, 12). This Rabbinical opinion, founded, it is said, on oral tradition from Moses, has no Scripture authority.

Besides these ordinary capital punishments, we read of others, either of foreign introduction or of an irregular kind. Among the former, 1. Crucifixion (q. v.) is treated separately, to which article the following remark may be added, that the Jewish tradition of capital punishment, independent of the Roman government, being inherited for forty years previous to the Destruction, appears in fact, if not in time, to be justified (John xviii, 31, with De Wette, Comment.; Goodwyn, p. 121; Keil, ii, 264; Josephus, Ant. xx, 9, 1, 5).

2. Drowning, though not ordered under the law, was practiced at Rome, and is said by St. Jerome to have been in use among the Jews (Cicero, Pro Stat. Resol. Rom. ii, 25; Jerome, in Comm. on Matt. lib. iii, p. 138; Matt. xviii, 6; Mark ix, 42). Josephus records that the Galileans, revolting from their commanders, drowned the partisans of Herod (Ant. xiv, 15, 29). 3. Sawing asunder or crushing beneath iron instruments. The former is said to have been practiced on Isaibah; the latter may, perhaps, not always have caused death, and thus have been a torture rather than a capital punishment (Ant. xii, 31, and perhaps Prov. xxvi, 26; Heb. xi, 37; Just. M. T. Title, 120). The process of sawing sander, as practiced in Barbary, is described by Shaw (Tract, p. 254).

4. Pounding in a mortar is alluded to in Prov. xxvii, 22, but not as a legal punishment. It is mentioned as a Cingalese punishment by Sir E. Tennant (Ceylon, ii, 88), and something similar to this, beating to death (τρυφεόνωσιν), was a Greek punishment for slaves. It was inflicted on a wooden frame, which probably derived its name from resembling a drum or timbrel in form, on which the criminal was bound, and beaten to death (2 Macc. vi, 19, 29; comp. ver. 30). In Josephus (De Macc.) the same instance, his κραταία γόργια, to be understood, hence, to beat upon the tympanum, to drum to death, is similar to “breaking on the wheel” (Heb. xi, 35). David inflicted this among other cruelties upon the inhabitants of Rabbah-ammon (1 Chron. xx, 3).

5. Precipitation, attempted in the case of our Lord at Nazareth, and carried out in that of captives from the Edomites, and of St. James, who is said to have been cast from “the pinnacle” of the Temple; also said to have been executed on some Jewish women by the Syrians (2 Chron. xxxv, 12; 2 Macc. vi, 10; Luke iv, 29; Euseb. H. E. ii, 23). This punishment resembles that of the Tarpeian rock among the Romans.

6. The Persians had a singular punishment for great criminals. A high tower was filled a great way up with sages, the criminal was thrown into it, and as the sages fell into the fire, the criminal perished under them and raised above him till he was suffocated (2 Macc. xiii, 4-6).

Criminals executed by law were buried outside the city gates, and heaps of stones were flung upon their graves (Josh. vii, 23, 36; 2 Sam. xviii, 17; Jer. xxix, 19). Mohammedans, to this day, cast stones, in passing, at the supposed tomb of Abasalim (Fabri, Itinerarium, 1, 409; Sandys, Trav. p. 189; Raumer, Paladin, p. 272). (C.) Of secondary punishments among the Jews, the original principle was, “Eye for eye, tooth for tooth.” Retaliation, the lex talionis of the Latins, and the διεξοσθος of the Greeks, is doubtless the most natural of all kinds of punishment, and would be the most just of all if it could be instantaneously and universally inflicted; but when delayed, it is apt to degenerate into revenge. Hence the desirability that it should be regulated and modified by law. The one-eyed man mentioned by Diodorus Siculus (xiv) complained that if he lost his remaining eye, he was not excused from his victim who would still have one left. Phavorinus argues against this law, which was one of the twelve tables, as not admitting literal execution, because the same member was more valuable to one man than another; for instance, the right hand of a scribe or painter could not be so well spared as that of a singer. Hence that law, in later times, was administered with the modification, “Nicum eo pacato,” except the aggressor came to an agreement with the mutilated person, de tulione redimenda, to redeem the punishment by making compensation. Moses, according to the principle, but not, it is to be observed, did Moses (Exod. xiii, 15), and he was not qualified to apply it to all classes of cases. The criminal, moreover, was not to be attended on in these cases, but was to be thrown into a dungeon, and there to be kept till he had expelled all the enmity that his victim would feel” (Josh. vii, 23, 36; 2 Sam. xviii, 17; Jer. xxix, 19). Mohammedans, to this day, cast stones, in passing, at the supposed tomb of Abasalim (Fabri, Itinerarium, 1, 409; Sandys, Trav. p. 189; Raumer, Paladin, p. 272).

7. Stripes, whose number was not to exceed forty (Deut. xxv, 3); whence the Jews took care not to exceed thirty-nine (2 Cor. xi, 24; Josephus, Ant. iv, 8, 21). This penalty was to be inflicted on the offender lying on the ground in the presence of a judge (Lev. xix, 20; Deut. xxi, 18). In later times, the convict was stripped to the waist and tied, in a bent position, to a low pillar, and the stripes, with a whip of three thongs, were inflicted on the back between the shoulders. A single stripe in excess subjected the executioner to punishment (Macevith, i, 1, 2, 8, 13, 14). It is remarkable that the Assyrian punishment for this offense was nothing more than twenty (276). We have abundant evidence that it was an ancient Egyptian punishment. Nor was it unusual for Egyptian superintendents to stimulate laborers to their work by the persuasive powers of the stick. Women received the stripes on the back, while sitting, from the hand of a man; and boys also, sometimes with their hands tied behind them. The modern inhabitants of the valley of the Nile retain the predilection of their forefathers for this punishment. The Moslems say, “The stick came down from heaven a blessing from God.” Moses describes the usual punishment inflicted on criminals and by masters to servants or slaves of both sexes (Exod. xxi, 20). Scourging was common in after-times among the Jews, who associated with it no disgrace or inconveniency beyond the physical pain it occasioned, and from which no station was exempt (Exod. xxi, 20; comp. x, 13; Jer. xxxvii, 15-20). Hence it became the symbol for correction in general (Psa. lxxxix, 32). Solomon is a zealous advocate for its use in education (Prov. xiii, 24; xxiii, 13, 14; comp. Ecclus. xxx, 1). In his opinion, “God is a wondrously just and holy judge; who wastes away evil, and stripes the inward parts of the belly” (Prov. xx, 30). It was inflicted for ecclesiastical offences in the synagogue (Matt. x, 17; Acts xxvi, 11). Among torturing or tedious penalties, 4. Scourcroy with thorns is mentioned (Judg. viii, 16). Reference to the scourge with scorpions, i. e. a whip or scourge armed with knots or thorns, occurs in 1 Kings xii, 11. So in Latin, scorpio means a knotted or thorny swish. The stocks are mentioned (Jer. xx, 2); passing through fire (2 Sam. xxi, 1); mutilation (Judg. i, 6); 2 Sam. xi, 9; and Philistia, plucking out hair (1 Sam. i, 6; Neh. xiii, 25); in later times, imprisonment, and confiscation of estate (Ezra vii, 26; Jer. xxxvii, 15; xxxviii, 6; Acts iv, 3; v, 18, xii, 4). Imprisonment, not as a punishment, but custody till the royal pleasure was known, appears among the Egyptians (Gen. xxxix, 20, 21). Moses appointed it for like purposes (Exod. xlii, 12). It appears as a punishment inflicted by the kings of Judah and Israel (1 Kings xxii, 27; 2 Chron. xvi, 10; Jer. xxxvii, 21); and during the Christian era, as in the instance of John (Matt. iv, 12). Another kind of imprisonment of debtors and debtors were also committed to prison, and the latter “tormented till they paid” (Matt. xviii, 30; Luke xxii, 19). A common prison is mentioned (Acts v, 18); and also an inner prison, or dungeon, which was sometimes a pit (Jer. xxxviii, 6), in which were “stocks” (Jer. xx, 2; xix, 26; Acts xiv, 24). Prisoners are allotted to Job iii, 18), and stocks (xiii, 27). Banishment was inflicted by the Romans on John (Rev. i, 9). As in earlier times imprisonment formed no part of the Jewish system, the sentences were executed at once (see Exarchus, De Syn. xiii, 15; xxiii, 880). Before death, a grain of frankincense in a cup of wine was given to the criminal to intoxicate him (ibid. 889). The command for witnesses to cast the first stone shows that the duty of execution did not belong to any special officer (Deut. xvii, 7).

The sentence of death, especially non-capital, inflicted by other nations we have the following notices: In Egypt, the power of life and death and imprisonment rested with the king, and to some extent also with officers of high rank (Gen. xl, 3; xxii; xlii, 20). Death might be inflicted for the crime of slavery (xlii, 19; xliii, 3, 8). The law of retaliation was also in use in Egypt (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii, 214, 215, 217). In Egypt, and also in Babylon, the chief of the executioners, Rubb-Tubbaschim, was a great officer of state (Gen. xxxvii, 36; xxi; xlii, 19; xliii, 10; xlii, 6; iii, 15, 16). Dan. iii, 14; Mark vi, 27; Michaelis, Mos. Rechts, iii, 412; Josephus, Ant. vi, 3, 5. He was sometimes a eunuch (Josephus, Ant. vii, 5, 4). See CHRETHTHEM.

Putting out the eyes of captives, and other cruelties, as flaying alive, burning, tearing out the tongue, etc., were practiced by the Assyrians and Babylonian conquerors; and parallel instances of despicable cruelty are found in abundance in both ancient and modern times in Persia and other nations. The execution of Haman and the story of Daniel are pictures of summary Oriental procedure (2 Kings xiv, 7; Esth. vi, 9, 10; Jer. xxix, 22; Dan. iii, 6; vi, 7, 24; comp. Herod. vii, 89; ix, 112, 118; see Chardin, Voy. vi, 21, 118; Layard, Ninevah, ii, 869, 874, 377; Niebuhr, p. 456, 457). The duty of counting the numbers of the victims, which is there represented, agrees with the story of Jehu (2 Kings x, 7), who commanded the execution of 400 of the sons of Ahab at Mira, by Bar Porter (Travel., ii, 524, 525; see also Burckhardt, Syria, p. 57) and Malcolm, Sketches of Persia, p. 47).

With the Romans, stripes and the stocks, πυθωροτατος τον ξεκολον, mecer and cubilatam, were in use, and imprisonment with a chain attached to a soldier. There were also the λεβάρα κυτσια in private houses (Acts xvi, 23; xxii, 24; xxvi, 16; comp. Xenoph. Hel. iii, 3, 11; Herod. i, 87; Plautus, Rud. iii, 6, 80, 84, 88, 50; Aristot. E. Σφεδ. Bekker) 1044; Josephus, Ant. xvi, 7, 6; xix, 6, 7; Sallust, Cat. 47). The sword was a usual weapon.

The obvious fact that the sufferings of the wicked in this life are not in proportion to their sins has led even the heathen of all ages to the belief in a state of retribution after death. The Scriptures abundantly confirm this position, so that few in the present day deny its truth in some form. The only question that need be raised is the case of the just, and its duration. The former of these points has been discussed under HELL PUNISHMENTS; the latter we will briefly consider here.

1. No one approaching the New Testament without preconceived opinions could get any other impression from its language on this subject than that the punishments of the wicked in hell are to be everlasting. (For special passages, see Matt. xii, 28; xxv; xxvi, 24; Mark iii, 29; ix, 48; Rev. xiv, 9, 10.) Moreover, apart from special passages, the general tone of the New Testament points to the final and irrevocable ruin of those who persist to the last in sin and in the rejection of Christ the Saviour.

2. In the ancient Church, the Alexandrian theologians were the first to teach that there could be an end to the punishments of hell. Yet this change of plan and reformation was the only end of punishment, so that it could not be eternal; the final end is æternum æternae æternitatis, the entire freedom from evil. Hence Clement says, "If in this life there are so many ways for purification and repentance, how much more should there be after death!... whatever is separated from the body, will be easier. We can set no limits to the agency of the Redeemer; to redeem, to rescue, to discipline, is his work; and so will be continue to operate after this life" ( Stromata, vi, 638). Clement did not deem it proper to express himself more fully respecting this doctrine, because he considered it a part of the Gnosis. Hence he says, "As to the rest, I am silent, and praise the Lord" (ibid. vii, 706). Origen infers from the variety of ways and methods by which men are led to the faith in this life that there will be a diversity in the divine modes of discipline after death; notwithstanding this, however, he considers it extremely important that every one should in this life become a believer. Whoever neglects the Gospel, or after baptism commits grievous sins, will suffer so much heavier punishments after death (In Joannis, vi, 267). The doctrine of a general restoration was found explicitly in 1 Cor. xv, 28. Yet he reckons this among the Gnostic (or esoteric) doctrines; for he says, "It would not be useful for all to have this knowledge; but it is well if at least of a material hell keep them back from sin" (ibid. 264). "But, in opposition to these, the doctrine of the eternity of future punishments was affirmed by other equally distinguished teachers, e. g. Basil, John of Constantinople, among the Greeks, and, among the Latins, by Jerome, Augustine, and others." Gregory of Nyssa, however, defended the restorationism (διαστορισμος) of Origen. Augustine, on the other hand, opposed it strenuously; the whole spirit of his system, and his full and strong conception of the justice of God, were fundamentally opposed to restorationism. "The doctrine of the original sin of Adam, and the condemnation of all men with him (Catharina, A.D. 399), and afterwards by many other councils, and the doctrine of the eternity of future punishments was established as the faith of the Church" (Knapp, Theology, § 168). The doctrine of purgatory soon grew up to take the place of the theory of restorationism. "The doctrine of the limited duration of future punishment fell into very ill repute in the Western Church, on account of its being professed by some of the enthusiastic and revolutionary parties in the 16th century (e. g. the Anabaptists), and from its being intimately connected with the most violent sentiments and speculations; the profession of the doctrine came to be regarded as implying assent to the other extravagances of these parties, and as the signal for rebellion. Hence it is rejected in the symboical books of the Lutheran Church as an Anabaptistical doctrine (Anabaptismus, 1618); and in the form in which this doctrine was held by these sects it deserves the most unmingled disapprobation. Again, among the ill-famed Christian free-thinkers—e. g. the Socinians—there were some who professed it. In modern times it has been the same. This doctrine has been advocated in the Protestant Church both by men who have stood in suspicion of enthusiasm (e. g. Peterson, Lavater, and others) and by some of the free-thinkers in philosophy and theology, although for very different causes and on very different grounds by these two classes" (Knapp, at sup.). Punjabi and Sikh Version. A version of the New Test. for the people inhabiting an extensive country of North-west Hindostan called Punjab was commenced in 1807 at Serrapmore, but the fonts of type were destroyed by fire. The loss, however, was soon replaced, and in 1818 the Gospels and Acts were announced as finished. In 1815 the entire New Test., in an edition of 1000 copies, was completed, and in 1832 a second edition was undertaken. The translation of the Old Test. was also undertaken, and in 1820 the Penta-touch and historical books were issued, and now the whole Bible, published by the Serrapmore Mission, is read in Punjabi, as the seventy-third report of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1877) shows. (B. P.)

P'unon (Heb. P'non), פְּנָון, darkness [Genesis]; one of the spies sent by Shôpâh (Num. xxxiii, 42), on the east side of the mountains of Edom, and perhaps belonging to that district, since a duke of Pnun is mentioned (Gen. xii, 10; Num. xxxii, 41; 1 Chron, i, 52) among the chiefest of the Edomites. It lay next beyond Zalmonah, between it and Oboth, and three days' journey from the mountains of Abiram, which formed the boundary of Moab. By Eusebius and Jerome (Onom., p. 413) its name is identified with the modern Tuluh (Burchardt, ii, 477; see Ramer, Zug der Israel, p. 46): but on the Kabsat Phen'am of Setzeen (Zachi's Mouvat. Correspond. xvii, 187) we must await more particular intelligence. See EXOD.

Puni Version. The Punti, or Canton Colloquial, as it is sometimes called, is a dialect spoken by a large population which is to be found in and around Canton, in China. Into this dialect only portions of the Bible were translated, viz. Mark's Gospel, by the Rev. G. Piercy, and published in 1872, with the title 王之言 in chuen. Luke's Gospel was translated in the same year by the Rev. T. Ricks, Missionary, and published in 1867, with the title De Evangelium dei in Volksliediste der Punti Chuen, John's Gospel was translated by the Rev. C. F. Preston, and published at Canton on wooden blocks, under the title Tâ han cheon Fâ yoga shoo. In 1872 St. Paul's Epistles—Galatians to Philemon—were published, under the title Pau la di hauy siewn shoo, as translated by Mr. Piercy: while the Acts of the Apostles were also published in the same year, with the title She oleh hing chuen, in the translation of Mr. Preston. These are all the parts of the New Test. published in that dialect, of which St. Mark and St. Luke have been reprinted by the American Bible Society, changing the term for "God." Of the Old Test., the book of Genesis was translated by the Rev. G. Piercy, and published in 1873, under the title K'te rî cheung shê k'ô, to which the book of Psalms must be added, which has been translated by the Rev. A. B. Hutchinson, of the Church Missionary Society, and was published in 1876. Comp. the annual reports of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1877. (B. F.)

Puipila (pupil of the eye) is a clerical manual written by John Burgh. It was very popular during the 18th and 16th centuries.

Puppet-plays (Lat. pappe, a girl; Fr. poupée, a doll) are exhibitions in which the parts of the different characters are taken by miniature figures worked by wires, while the dialogue is given by persons behind the scenes. These plays are of very ancient date, and, originally intended to gratify children, they ended in being a diversions of the ladies. In China, the puppets are still made to act dramas, either as movable figures or as shadows behind a curtain. In Italy and France puppet-plays were at one time carried to a considerable degree of artistic perfection; and even Lessing and Goethe, in Germany, thought the subject worth their serious attention. In England, they are mentioned under the name of motions by many of our early authors; and frequent allusions to them occur in the plays of Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, and the older dramatists. The earliest exhibitions of this kind consisted of representations of stories taken from the Old and New Testaments, or from the lives and legends of saints. They thus seem to have been the last remnant of the moralities of the 16th century. See MYSTERIES. We learn from Ben Jonson and his contemporaries that the most popular of these exhibitions at that time were the Prodigal Son and Nineweh with Jonas and the Whale. Even the Puritans, with all their hatred of the regular stage, did not object to be present at such representations. The most noted exhibitions of the kind were those of Robert Powel, in the beginning of the 18th century (see Dymock, Barrow, Dibdin, and Dibdin, ii, 187). These performances were soon of the time of Goldsmith, scrip tural "motions" were common; and in The Stoops to Conquer reference is made to the display of Solomon's Temple in one of these shows. The regular performances of the stage were also sometimes imitated; and Dr. Samuel Johnson has observed that puppets were so capable of representing even the plays of Shakespeare that Macbeth might be represented by them as well as by living actors. These exhibitions, however, much degenerated, and latterly consisted of a wretched display of wooden figures, barbarously formed, and decorated without the least degree of taste or propriety, while the dialogues were jumbles of absurdities and nonsense.

Purâna (literally, "old," from the Sanscrit purâ, before, past) is the name of that class of religious works which, besides the Tanastras (q. v.), is the main foundation of the actual popular creed of the Brahminical Hindu (q. v.). According to the popular belief, these works were compiled by Vyâs (q. v.), the supposed arranger of the Vedas (q. v.), and the author of the Mahabharata (q. v.), and they extend beyond an age anterior to the reach of historical computation. A critical investigation, however, of the contents of the existing works leads to the conclusion that, in their present form, they do not only not belong to a remote age, but can barely claim an antiquity of a thousand years. The word Purâna occurs in some passages of the Mahabharata, the law-books of Yajnavalkya and Manu (q. v.); and it is even met with in some Upanishads and the great Brahmanic portion of the White-Yajur-Veda; but it is easy to show that in all these ancient works it cannot refer to the existing Purânas: and therefore that no inference relative to the age of the ancient can be drawn from the modern. There are, however, several circumstances tending to show that there were a number of works called Purânas which preceded the existing, and were the sources whence these probably derived a portion of their contents. The oldest known authority for a Sanscrit vocabulary, Amara-Sinha, gives as a synonym of Purâna the word Pomecha-lakshana, which means "that which has fire (pomecha) characteristic marks" (lakshana); and the scholars of that vocabulary agree in stating that the lakshanas are: 1. Primary location; or cosmogony; 2. Secondary creation, or the destruction and renovation of worlds; 3. Genealogy of gods and patriarchs; 4. Mamecaturas, or reigns of Manus; and, 5. The history of the princes of the solar and lunar races. Such, then, were the characteristic topics of a Purâna at the time, if not of Amarasinha himself—which is probable — at least, of his oldest commentators. Yet the distinguished scholar most conversant with the existing Purāṇas, who, in his preface to the translation of the Viṣṇu-Purāṇa, gives an account of their chief contents (Prof. H. H. Wilson), observes, in regard to the quoted definition of the commentators on Amara-Sinhas, that in no one instance do the actual Purāṇas conform to it exactly; that "to some of them it is utterly inapplicable, to others, it only partially applies." To the Viṣṇu-Purāṇa, he adds, it belongs more than to any other Purāṇa; but even in the case of this Purāṇa he shows that it cannot be supposed to be included in the term explained by the commentators. The age of Amara-Sinhas is, according to Wilson, the last half of the century preceding the Christian era; others conjecture that it dates some centuries later. On the supposition, then, that Amara-Sinhas himself implied by Pancha-lakshana the sense given to this term by his commentators, there would have been Purāṇas about 1500 years ago; but none of these has descended to our time in the shape it then possessed. Various passages in the actual Purāṇas furnish proof of the existence of such older Purāṇas. The strongest evidence in this respect is that afforded by a general description given by the Matagya-Purāṇa of each of the Purāṇas (which are uniformly stated to be eighteen in number), including itself; for, leaving aside the exceptional case in which it may be doubtful whether we possess the complete work now going by the name of a special Purāṇa, Prof. Wilson, in quoting the description from the Matagya-Purāṇa, and in comparing it with the real extent of the great majority of Purāṇas, the completeness of which, in their actual state, does not admit of a reasonable doubt, has conclusively shown that the Matagya-Purāṇa speaks of works which are not those we now possess. We are, then, bound to infer that there have been Purāṇas older than those preserved, and that their number has been eighteen; whereas, on the contrary, it will be hereafter seen that it is very doubtful whether we are entitled to assign this number to the actual Purāṇa literature.

The modern age of this latter literature, in the form in which it is known to us, is borne out by the change which the religious and philosophical ideas taught in the epic poems and the philosophical Sūtras have undergone in it; by the legendary detail into which older Purāṇas have been expanded by the expansion of the numerous religious rites—not connoted by the Vedic or epic works—which are taught; and, in some Purāṇas at least, by the historical or quasi-scientific instruction which is imparted in it. To divest which, in these Purāṇas, is one of the great tasks of Sanscrit philology which has yet to be fulfilled; but even a superficial comparison of the contents of the present Purāṇas with the ancient lore of Hindu religion, philosophy, and science must convince every one that the picture of religion and life unfolded by them is a caricature of that afforded by the Vedic works, and that it was drawn by priestcraft, interested in submitting to its sway the popular mind, and unscrupulous in the use of the means which had to serve its ends. The plea on which the composition of the Purāṇas was justified, even by great Hindu authorities—probably because they did not feel equal to the task of destroying a system already deeply rooted in the national mind, or because they apprehended that the nation at large would remain without any religion at all, if, without possessing the Vedic creed, it were deprived of that which the Purāṇas—this plea is best illustrated by a quotation from Sāyana, the celebrated commentator on the three principal Veda-s. He says (Rig. ed. Müller, vol. i. p. 83): "Women and Śūdras, though they, too, are in want of knowledge, have no Veda; the Vedas are deprived of [the advantage of] reading it, in consequence of their not being invested with the sacred cord; but the knowledge of law or duty and that of the supreme spirit arises to them by means of the Purāṇas and other books of this kind."

Yet, to enlighten the Hindu nation as to the reasons for these details, as clearly as times are even called a fifth Veda—teach that religion which is contained in the Vedas and Upanishads, there would be no better method than to initiate such a system of popular education as would reopen to the native mind those ancient works, now virtually closed to it.

Though the results of a comparison of the Purāṇas with the oldest works of Sanscrit literature, it is a poor justification of the origin of the former; and though it is likewise indisputable that, even at this time (the middle of the 19th century A.D.), they were, as they still are, not merely an authoritative source of religion for "women and Śūdras," but for the great majority of the males of other castes also, it nevertheless explains the great variety of matter of which the present Purāṇas are composed—so great and so multifarious, indeed, that, in the case of some of them, it imparts to them a kind of cyclopaedic character. They became, as it seems, the source of all popular knowledge; a substitute to the masses of the nation not only for theological literature, but for scientific works, the study of which was superfluous to them. Thus, while the principal subjects taught by nearly all the Purāṇas are cosmogony, religion (including law), and the legendary matter which, to a Hindu, assumes the value of history, in some of them we meet with a description of plants which goes to the character of geography; and one, the Agni-Purāṇa, also pretends to teach archery, medicine, rhetoric, prosody, and grammar; though it is needless to add that its teaching has no real worth.

One purpose, however, and that a paramount one, is not included in the list of which Śāyana endeavored to account for the composition of the Purāṇas; it is the purpose of establishing a sectarian creed. At the third phase of the Hindu religion, two gods of the Hindu pantheon especially engrossed the religious faith of the masses—Viṣṇu (q. v.) and Śiva (q. v.), each being looked upon by his worshippers as the supreme deity, to whom the other, as well as the remaining gods, was subordinate. Moreover, when the power or energy of these gods had been raised to the rank of a separate deity, it was the female Šakti, or energy, of Viṣṇu, or of Śiva, which was held in peculiar awe by a numerous host of believers. Now, apart from the general reasons mentioned before, a principal object, and probably the principal one, of the Purāṇas was to establish, as the case might be, the supremacy of Śiva or Viṣṇu, or both. This was assumed, of the female energy of Śiva, though the worship of the latter belongs more exclusively to the class of works known as Tantras. There are, accordingly, Viṣṇu-Purāṇas, or those composed for the glory of Viṣṇu; Śiva-Purāṇas, or those which extol the worship of Śiva; and by one or two Purāṇas, perhaps, but merely as far as a portion of them is concerned, will be more consistently assigned to the Śakti worship, or that of Durgā, than to that of Viṣṇu or Śiva.

The invariable form of the Purāṇas," says Prof. Wilson, in his preface to the Viṣṇu-Purāṇa, "is that of a dialogue, in which some person relates its contents in reply to the inquiries of another. This dialogue is interspersed with others, which are repeated as having been held on other occasions, between different individuals, in consequence of similar questions having been asked. The immediate narrator is commonly, though not constantly, Lomaharshaṇa, or Bo-maharṣaṇa, the disciple of Viṣṇa, who is supposed to communicate what was imparted to him by his predecessor as he had heard it from some other sage... all of whom are the same person, Sūtras, that is, a bard or panegyrist, who was cre-

according to the Vayu-Puranam, to celebrate the exploits of princes, and who, according to the Vyāyu and Puráṇa Purāṇas, has a right, by birth and profession, to narrate the Purāṇas, in preference even to the Brahmas.

In other lists, the Aiyu-Purāṇa is omitted, and the Vyāyu-Purāṇa is inserted instead of it; or the Gauda and Brahmaná are omitted and replaced by the Vyāyu and Nrisiha Purāṇas. Of these Purāṇas, 2, 3, and 5, are clearer and more explicit. They are not a purgatorial fire, where the souls of the righteous are purified by a temporary punishment (definitum tempus cruciatum expiatur), that entrance into the holy house of the gods, or salvation (sākṣipta), by the means of the sūtra, that enthrone an epic works, the Mahābhārata (q.v.) and Ramáyana (q.v.), more especially to the former of them.

But the Purāṇas are for a considerable portion of their contents largely indebted to the two great epic poetical works, the Mahābhārata (q.v.) and Ramáyana (q.v.), more especially to the former of them.

The Purāṇas, the original text of three has already appeared in print: that of the Bhagavata in several native editions, published at Bombay and Calcutta; and partly in a Paris edition by Eugène Burnouf, which remained incomplete through the premature death of the distinguished scholar; that of the Markandeya-Purāṇa, edited at Calcutta in the Bibliothèque Indica, by the Rev. K. M. Banerjee; and that of the Linga-Purāṇa for Bombay; for, regarding a fourth, the Gauda-Purāṇa, edited at Benares and Bombay, it seems doubtful whether that work is the same as the Purāṇa spoken of in the native list. Besides these, small portions from the Purāṇa, Shudra, Bārhabhutā-Purāṇa, Markandeya, and other Purāṇas have been published in India and Europe. Of translations, we have only to name the excellent French translation by Burnouf of the first nine books of the Bhagavata, and the elegant translation of the whole Vāiku-Purāṇa, together with valuable notes, by the late Prof. H. H. Wilson, which is now in course of republication in his Works, in a new edition, amplified with numerous notes, by Prof. E. F. Hall.

For general information on the character and contents of the Purāṇas, see especially Wilson's preface to his translation of the Vaiṣṇava-Purāṇa (Works, vol. vi, Lond. 1864); Burnouf's preface to his edition of the Bhagavata (Paris, 1840); Wilson, Analysis of the Purāṇas (Works, vol. iii, Lond. 1864, edited by Prof. R. Pura was, according to the Indian mythology, the first man—the father of the human race; his wife, the first woman, Prakriti, gave birth to the ancestors of the Indian castes.

Purcell, Henry, an English composer of great note, celebrated especially as the author of church music, was born at Westminster in 1658. He was the son of a musician attached to the chapel of Charles II. At the age of six, having lost his father, he was admitted into the choir of boys at the royal chapel. His masters were Cooke, Fellham, Humphrey, and Dr. Blow. He was remarkable for precocity of talent, but, what was better, he seconded the liberality of nature by his zeal and diligence. His progress was so rapid that, while still a member of the choir, he produced several anthemian of his own composition, which were widely sought for almost as soon as written; and at eighteen he received the fullest recognition of his ability, by being chosen organist of Westminster Abbey (1676) to succeed Dr. Christopher Gibbons. In 1682, Purcell was granted the place of organist of the royal chapel, and this position he held until his death, in 1695. Purcell was the first English composer who introduced the lute into the church to support the voice, which, until then, the organ had alone accompanied. The original character of his music, the variety of its forms, the majesty of its style, and upon all this pressed the seal of his greatness. One is autor: at the great fulness of his genius, when it is wondered how young he died. It is said of Purcell that "his anthems far exceed in number those of any other composer, and would alone have furnished sufficient employment moderately active mind and a life of average duration.

It is to be regretted, however, that his ambition was lessative.
He attempted to bring back to a period in the midst of religious influences, and if confined to the English church, he would have stood out as its cur- tor and propagator in the modern Church. His efforts in several directions weakened any one line he undertook to cover, and he failed to attain that perfection which he aspired to. His own countrymen so greatly revered his memory that they buried him in the mausoleum of their greatest. He rests in the north transept of Westminster Abbey. His epitaph was composed by Dryden. A part of the music written for the theatre has been published in the collection of Airs composed for the Theatres and on other Occasions, by Henry Purcell (Lond. 1697). All his sacred works, which have retained their place to the present day, and include fifty anthems, besides the Te Deum and Jubilate, with orchestral accompaniments, a complete service in seven numbers of hymns and psalms, have been collected by M. Vincent Novello, who has published them in seventy-two numbers, under the title of Purcell's Sacred Music (Lond. 1826—56). This publication is preceded by a notice of the life and works of the composer and his portrait. See Ambros, Gesch. der Musik (Leips. 1878, 8vo), vol. iv.

Purchas, John, an Anglican divine, noted especially in the department of belles-lettres, was born at Cambridge in 1623, received his preparatory training at Rugeby, and then studied at Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1640, and afterwards at Oxford (1644). Entered in 1644 in the Church of England, Mr. Purchas became curate of Ellsworth, Cambridge, in 1651, remaining there two years. In 1656 he was appointed curate of Orwell, in the same county, and remained until 1659. In 1661 he went to St. Paul's, in West Street, Brighton, and soon became notorious for his ritualistic propensities. He was appointed perpetual curate in St. James's Chapel, Brighton, becoming incumbent in 1686. His mode of conducting public worship culminated in his trial in the Court of Arches, the case being subsequently carried by appeal before the judicial committee of the 17th General. The final result of these trials was that Mr. Purchas was admonished to discontinue the use of certain vestments, lighted candles, incense, wafer bread, and the ceremonies he had practised in the regular services. He failed to obey; however, and was in consequence suspended as officio on Feb. 7, 1672, a sequestration being levied upon his lay property to defray the costs of the proceedings. He contemplated thereafter entering the Roman Catholic Church, but was probably prevented by his sudden illness of October, 1672, which, published by him were the Directions Anglicanæ, which forms the text-book of Anglican ritualism. His other works are: The Miser's Daughter, a comedy and poems (1839); —Poems and Idylla (1846); —Book of Fasts, a series of sermons (1838); —The Death of Earl of Northumberland; preached at St. Paul's, West Street, Brighton (1856).

Purgatory, in the English church, is a concept that describes the aftermath of death, where the souls of those who have not reached perfection are purified before entering heaven. The Purgatory of the souls is a common theme in Christian art and literature, and its depiction varies greatly across different cultures and traditions. In the Roman Catholic Church, Purgatory is considered a necessary stage for souls to prepare for the Beatific Vision. It is often depicted as a place of purification, with various levels of suffering and purification. The idea of Purgatory is rooted in the belief that all souls are in a state of grace, and that their souls are purified through the intercession of the saints and the prayers of the faithful.
Purgatory

The Church has also distinguished purgatory, so that there remains no guilt of temporal punishment to be done away in this world, or that which is to come in purgatory, before the passage can be opened into heaven, let him be secured. Elsewhere it is said, "There is a certain purgatory, which is not in the divine order, and is not the eternal and consolatory punishment of earthly sins, but is a place of affliction, help by the sufferings of the faithful, but principally by the sacrifices of the acceptable altar"—a statement obviously vague and indefinite. It leaves the most important inquiry undetermined—viz. whether the souls in purgatory are in a state of happiness or misery: they are "detained," but not "punished" as the text states.

By referring, however, to the Catechism of the Council of Trent, drawn up by order of the fathers there assembled, we get a clearer and more explicit definition: "There is a purgatorial fire, where the souls of the righteous are purified by a temporary punishment [ad definitum tempus cruciatus expiandur], that entrance may be given them into their eternal home, where nothing that is defiled can have a place. And of the business of this doctrine, which holy councils declare to be eternal and liquid, it may instigate many to repentation; in this condition, the pastor will have to declare more diligently and frequently, because we are fallen on times in which men will not endure sound doctrine." (Catech. Trident., sess. vi, can. 30; sess. xxxv, § 1; Catech. Eccl., c. vi, qu. 3.) The indefinite meaning is given to the purgatorial fire and the souls of the faithful are punished for a defined period till their sins are expiated. The almost universal belief prevailing among Roman Catholics—though they do not consider torment by fire as being de jure, but only the most probable opinion—is that purgatory is a place of suffering or punishment for imperfect Christians. Thus Dr. Vilmer, though he says that "in the Council of Trent all is contained that is necessary to be believed on this subject," yet afterwards defines purgatory as "a place of temporary punishment", which is not asserted by, and goes beyond, the decree of the council. (End of Controversy, p. 178, 174.) Bellarmine says, "Purgatory is a certain place in which, as in a prison, the souls are purged after this life which were not fully purged in this life—such as, that they may be able to enter into heaven, where no unclean thing can enter;" and elsewhere, "that the fathers unanimously [sic] teach that the pains of purgatory are not 'severe or terrible'" (De Purgatorio, 164).

The bar. Advanced for purgatory are these: 1. Every one who dies in grace, more than an idol, as it is an offence to God, deserves punishment from him, and will be punished by him hereafter, if not cancelled by repentance here. 2. Such small sins do not die eternal punishment. 3. Few depart this life so as to be totally exempt from spots of this nature, and from every kind of guilt due to God's justice. 4. Therefore, few will escape without suffering some from his justice for such debts as they have carried with them out of this world, according to the rule of divine justice by which he treats every soul hereafter according to his works in this life, according to the state in which he finds it in death. From these positions, which the advocates of the doctrine of purgatory consider so many self-evident truths, they infer that there may be some third place of punishment; for since the indigence of sin has not even nothing in heaven that is not clear and pure from all sin, both great and small, and his infinite justice can permit none to receive the reward of bliss who are yet not out of debt, but have something in justice to suffer, must, of necessity, be placed some place where souls departing this life, pardoned for their mortal and venial sins, are purified and purified before they are admitted into heaven. Those in purgatory are relieved by the prayers of their fellow-members here on.

For such souls and masses offered up to God for their souls. Such as have no reason to pray for them, or give alms to procure masses for their relief, are remembered by the Church, which makes a general commemoration of all the faithful departed in every mass and in every one of the canonical hours of the divine office. But there are two arguments, the following Bible passages are alleged by them in support of these views: 2. Matt. xxi, 46 (on which they rely, on the supposition of its being inspired); Matt. v, 25 (the 'prison' therein referred to being interpreted by some to mean purgatory); xxi, 32; 1 Cor. xi, 11-15; xv, 22; Rev. xxi, 14; as well as certain less decisive indications contained in the language of some of the Psalms, as xxxvi (in the A. V. xxviii), i; lxv, 12; lat. iv, 14; xxxii, 14; Mal. iii, 8. Respecting all these passages as containing the doctrine of a purgatory, arguments are drawn not alone from the words themselves, but from the interpretation of them by the fathers.

T. Direct testimonies cited by Roman Catholic writers from the fathers to the belief of their respective ages as to the existence of a purgatory are very numerous. The following is a very important instance, which may instigate some to repentation: 'Hom., vi, c. 5, in Jeremiam; vi, Hom. in Exod.; xiv, Hom. in Levit.; xxviii, Hom. in Num.; Euseb., De Fide Constant., iv, 71; Athanasius, Quast., xxxvii, ad Antioch.; Cyril, Epist. 13, ad Jerusalem; vi, ad Epist. 3, in Rom., v, 7; Gregory of Nazianzen, xi, Orat. de Laude Athanasii; Gregory of Nyssa, Orat. de Bapt.; as also Epiphanius, Ephraem, Theodoret, and others. Among the Latins, Tertullian, Cyprian, Arnobius, Lactantius, Hilary, Ambrose, and, above all, Augustine (from whom many passages are cited), Paulinus of Nola, and Gregory the Great, in whom the doctrine is found in all the fulness of its modern detail. The epistles of the catacombs, too, occasionally supply Romish controversialists with some testimonies to the belief of a purgatory, and of the value of the intercessory prayers. The history of the purgatory not merely repose, but relief from suffering for the deceased; and the liturgies of the various rites are still more declative and circumstantial. Beyond these two points, Romish faith, as defined by the Council of Trent, does not go. The council expressly prohibits the popular discussion of the "more difficult and subtle questions, and everything that tends to curiosity or superstition, or savors of filthy lucre." Of the further questions as to the nature of purgatory, there is one of great historical importance, inasmuch as it constitutes the dividing line between the Greek and Latin churches. As to the existence of purgatory, both these churches are agreed, and they are further agreed that it is a place of suffering; but, while the Latins commonly hold that this suffering is "by fire," the Greeks do not determine the manner of the suffering, but are content to regard it as "through tribulation." The decree of union in the Council of Florence (1439) left this point free for discussion. Equally free are the questions as to the situation of purgatory; as to the duration of the purgatorial suffering; as to the probable number of souls there; and as to the mode of their admission into the state in which they are to find it in death. From these positions, which the advocates of the doctrine of purgatory consider so many self-evident truths, they infer that there may be some third place of punishment; for since the indigence of sin has not even nothing in heaven, which is not clear and pure from all sin, both great and small, and his infinite justice can permit none to receive the reward of bliss who are yet not out of debt, but have something in justice to suffer, must, of necessity, be placed some place where souls departing this life, pardoned for their mortal and venial sins, are purified and purified before they are admitted into heaven. Those in purgatory are relieved by the prayers of their fellow-members here on.

Purification
in a state of suffering; for even then he would rest from the sorrows and trials of life, and have the assured hope of eternal life. Still, where there is no direct allusion (as in the Mozarabic and Gallican missals) to the suffering of the departed, we cannot fairly and reasonably suppose that a state of suffering is implied in the pain mentioned above, or that the faithful are said to be lost. Such an expression must be taken in its ordinary meaning as denoting a more or less perfect happiness. (The theory of the early Church, which may be called the "Judgment-day Purgatory," we treat of below.) See Bellarmine, De Purgatorio; and on the Greek portion of the subject, De Aliturgetia, De Erwiteuse Eclesiae in Dogmate de Purgatorio Perpetuo Consensiae.

The mediæval doctrine and practice regarding purgatory were among the leading grounds of the protest of the Waldenses and other sects of that age. The Reformers as a body rejected the doctrine.

In the modern Romish Church the doctrine of purgatory has led to others more directly injurious and corrupting. By the terror which it inspires it gives the preposterous power to impose penances; it leads to indulgences (q. v.) and prayers for the dead, for it is held that the sufferings in purgatory may be greatly mitigated and shortened by the prayers, the services, the masses, the masses, the charities, and other works of supererogation of their friends upon the earth. The extent to which this doctrine has been carried and the increasing importance of the income of the Church receives a significant illustration in one singular fact. There exists a purgatorial insurance company which, for a certain premium paid annually, insures the payor a given number of masses for his soul in the event of his death, and the certificates of this insurance company may be seen hung up on the walls in hundreds of rooms in the tenement-houses of our great cities, especially of New York.

Protestantism, in rejecting the doctrine of purgatory, has found that it is indispensable to depend upon any authority outside of the Bible and not in harmony therewith. It not only, however, refuses to admit the authority of tradition or the testimonies of the fathers, but, at the same time, alleges that most, if not all, of the passages quoted from the fathers as in favor of purgatory are in themselves insufficient to prove that they held any such doctrine as that now taught by the Roman Catholic Church, some of them properly relating only to the subject of prayer for the dead (q. v.), and others to the doctrine of Limbo of the Fathers. The doctrine of purgatory is the final development of that which maintains that prayer ought to be made for the dead, Protestants generally acknowledge, but refuse to admit that the fathers carried out their views to any such consequence. For Origen says, "Prayers and intercessions of this present life, hope to be in the highest heavens," not in purgatory. So Chrysostom, "Those that truly follow virtue, after they are changed from this life, are truly freed from their frightings, and loosed from their bonds. For death, so much as live honestly, is a change from worse things to better. From this transitory to an eternal and immortal life that hath no end." Macarius, speaking of the faithful, says, "When they go out of their bodies, the choirs of angels receive their souls into their proper places, to the pure world, and so lead them to the blessedness of life. Hence Athanasius says, "To the righteous it is not death, but only a change, for they are changed from this world to an eternal rest. And as a man comes out of prison, so do the saints go from this troublesomely to the good things prepared for them."

Certainly, these fathers were no purgatorians, since they unanimously look upon the dead as being outside of purgatory. The closure of the gate and the eternal meeting point of the church and the moment of God's presence are said to be the state of the soul after death. The entrance into the beatific vision and the time of the living without the body, is the only state which the Church doctrine would preserve; and that there are some sins which are to be purged away by the prayers and good works of others. To name no more, the Gospel represents Lazarus as at once conveyed to a state of comfort and joy (Luke xvi, 22, 23); Christ promised Nebat, all such shall go "to be made whole in the kingdom of heaven" (Luke xiv, 14). This day shall thou be with me in paradise" (Luke xvi, 22, 23); with Christ's coming or the Day of Judgment (see Psa. i, 3; Isa. iv, 4; Dan. vii, 9; Zech. xii, 9; Mal. iii, 2; 3, 4; iv, 1). Many of the Church fathers are cited in support of the belief that Christians must pass through the fire on the Day of Judgment, though all will not be injured by it.

In his judgment day purgatory doctrine about purgatory bids him not to be so hasty, for he might depart and yet not be with Christ; he might pass from death, and yet not to life; he might and must be absent from the body a while before he can be present with the Lord; he might go from earth, yet not to heaven, but to purgatory, a place St. Paul never dreamed of.

The Bible passages quoted by Romanists as in direct support of the doctrine of purgatory, Pro testants simply set aside as a ridiculous attempt at malpractice in exegesis. First it is answered that the books of Macabees have no evidence of inspiration, and that the second of these books, whence the supposition is purported to come, is far from being one of the best books of the Apocrypha (q. v.); besides, that the passage referred to rather prove that there is no such place as purgatory, since Judas did not expect the soul to be parted from sinners to reap any benefit from the sinners till the resurrection. The texts quoted from the Scriptures have no reference to the doctrine, as may be seen by consulting the context, and any lucid commentator upon it; the texts are cited with the sole view of proving the doctrine.

The text Matt. xix, 22 is explained as relating to the final judgment; and I Cor. iii, 11, 15, as relating to a trial of works, and not of persons; while I Cor. xv, 51-57, is having nothing more to do with the course (Lev. xv, 19; I Sam. vii, 3) of all things in the body as affected by pestilence, disease, and the like. Moreover, the passage clothes the whole of the doctrine; for how clothes that touched the carcass of sin all of these or eating or carrying the carcass of a clean b(6, 1867) had a natural death (Lev. xvi, 20, 40); none of both of the person and of the defiled garments in order of ger zemarah (Jer. vi, 16, 17)—the ger seder (15) in the nearest of the above instances to the Lev. xvi, 17, on which the uncleanness was not incurred. A high degree of uncleanness resulted from prolonged ger seder in males and menstruation in women: in these cases a probationary interval of seven days war them allowed to follow the course of the symptoms the more evening of the seventh day the candidate with evening performed an ablation both of the borrowed by the garments, and on the eighth (on, that matter is devoted to two or young pigeons, one for was to rise, it must other a burning (ver. 4, 5-12) or five purification— with persons in the above states, or with the burning of any or furniture that had been used by or of God revealed in states, involved uncleanness in a, a corresponding mor—absorbed by the abation of the day of the abation of the day—without (ver. 5, 11, 23) but in the Lord—must have a great interval of seven days (ver. 6, 9) of the doctrine; for how the sacrifice was increased ho heathen, possessing yet with a pigeon or turtle-dove new faith, and with most of ing made in favor of the, clinging about them, be pro—same offering as in the (in the presence of God? Probably it was a strong Christian feeling of this sort: that determined the reception of the doctrine of purgatory into the creed of the Roman Church, rather than any Gnostic philosophizations, though the Neo-Platonic theories of Alexandria are the Roman Church, rather than prayer for the fire (1 Cor. iii, 11-15). In proof of this doctrine is also quoted the frequent use of the word fire in connection Purgatory; vid. Homil. vi. in Exod.). St. Basil, in his Commentary on Isaiah (iv, 4), says that baptism may be understood in three senses—in the one, of regeneration by the Holy Spirit; in another, of the punishment of sin in the present life; and in a third, of the trial of judgment by fire. They who have committed deadly sins after they have received the knowledge of the truth, need the judgment which is by fire (τὰς ἐν τῷ καταχθέντας εἰρήνας) (Basil. Opera, t. i, ad loc. Gaume). In his work on the Holy Spirit, illustrating the passage "Shall he not baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire," he calls the trial of judgment a "baptism of fire;" as the apostle says, "the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is" (ibid. iii, p. 40). Gregory of Nazianzum, speaking of the Novatians, says: "Perchance in the future world they shall be baptized with fire, the baptism more severe and long continued, which devours as grass the stubble, and consumes every vestige of wickedness (λαυκάς πᾶσας καταγιώσας)" (Greg. Naz. Opera, t. ii, c. 588, Migne). Also in one of his poems he speaks of standing in fear of the fiery river of judgment (μισθὸς φόβων ἐπερημμένας) (ibid. t. iii, c. 1429). Gregory of Nyssa says, speaking of infants who die unbaptized: "How shall we judge of those who thus died? Shall that soul behold its Judge, and shall it be placed with others before his tribunal? Shall it be judged, and shall it receive a deserved recompense, purged by fire according to the teaching (区管委会) of the Gospel, or refreshed by the dew of benediction?" (Greg. Nyss. t. iii, c. 161). So he teaches, in another oration, that "we must either be purged in this present life by prayer and the love of wisdom (παθειακά), or after our departure hence in the furnace of the purging fire" (ibid. t. iii, c. 496). Purgatory, Rabbinic. The doctrine of purgatory (q. v.) is not only a peculiarity of the Romish Church, but also of orthodox Judaism. The latter maintains that the souls of the righteous enjoy the beatific vision of God in paradise, while the souls of the wicked are tormented in hell with fire and other punishments. It teaches that the sufferings of the most atrocious criminals are of eternal duration, while others remain only for a limited time in purgatory, which does not differ from hell with respect to the place, but to the duration. They pray for the souls of the dead, and imagine that many are delivered from purgatory on the great day of expiation. They suppose that no Jew, unless guilty of heresy, or certain crimes specified by the rabbins, shall continue in purgatory after a year, and that there are but few who suffer eternal punishment. Maimonides (q. v.), Abrabanel (q. v.), and other celebrated Jewish writers maintain the annihilation of the wicked. Others suppose that the sufferings of hell have the power of purifying souls and expiating sin, and will be made the more clear when we examine some of the writings bearing on this subject. Among the prayers of the Feast of Tabernacles we find the following declaration and prayer: "It is customary among the dispensers of Israel to make mention of the souls of their departed parents, etc., on the day of atonement, and the ultimate days of the festivity; for the Jewish prays for the souls of their fathers. May God remember the soul of my honored father, A. B., who is gone to his recompense; for that I now solemnly vow charity for his sake; in reward of this, may his soul be bound up in the bundle of life, with the souls of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; Sarah, Rachel, and Leah; with the rest of the righteous males and females that are in paradise, and let us say Amen. May God remember the soul of my honored mother; etc." In the Jewish ritualistic work called Joreh Deah, by Joseph Karo (q. v.), p. 376, we read: "For before the custom is for twelve months to repeat the prayer called Kaddish, and also to read the lesson in the prophets, and to pray the evening prayer at the going-out of the Sabbath, for that is the hour when the souls return to hell; but when the son prays and sanctifies the public, he redeems his father and his mother from hell." The doctrine of the Talmud is that those who die in communion with the synagogue, or who have never been Jews, are punished for twelve months, but that Jewish heretics and apostates are doomed to eternal punishment. Thus the Gentiles, descend into hell, and are judged there for twelve months. After the twelve months their body is consumed and their soul is burned, and the wind scatters them under the soles of the feet of the righteous, as it is said: 'Ye shall tread down the wicked, for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet' (Mal. iv. 5). But heretics and informers, and Euphrasius, who have denied the law or the resurrection of the dead, or who have separated from the customs of the congregation, or who have caused their fear in the land of the living, or who have sinned, or caused much evil, or who have done that which all such go down to hell, and are judged forever" (Rosh Hashanah, p. 17, a). According to rabbinical law, the dying Israelite ought to expect twelve months of torment, and his surviving son ought to repeat the prescribed prayer for twelve months; but the rabbinists have commanded that the prayer should be repeated only six, or seven months, to intimate that the deceased was not culpable, as to be obliged to remain all the time of torment, is not the custom to say to Kadish more than eight in a month, so as not to cast a reproach upon the dead person. Israelites are not to think of the mother as if they were dead, for twelve months are the term appointed for wicked" (Joreh Deah, i, l.). As to the prayer use of it is found in all Hebrew prayer-books, and runs thus: 'Blessed be the name of the great name be exalted and sanctified throughout the world, as it was created according to his will. May he establish his kingdom in our lifetime, and in the lifetime of the whole house of Israel, soon, and in a short time, and say ye Amen, Amen. May his great name be blessed and glorified for ever and ever. May his hallowed name be praised, glorified, extolled, and most excellently adored; blessed is he that exceeding all blessings, hymns, praises, and beatitudes that are repeated throughout the world, and say ye Amen. May ye prayer be accepted with mercy and kindness. May the prayers and supplications of the whole house of Israel be accepted in the presence of that Father, who is in heaven, and say ye Amen. Blessed be the name of the Lord from henceforth and for evermore. May the fullness of peace from heaven, with life, be granted unto us, and all Israel; and say ye Amen. My help is from the Lord, who made heaven and earth, who is my rock, and my high place, who is my refuge in the days of trouble, my strength, and my shield. He delivereth me from danger, and my flesh from destruction, and say ye Amen." See Adams, Hist. of the Jews, ii, 249 sq.; McCaul, Old Paths, i, 256 sq.; Hamburger, Hist. des Jyfs (Taylor's trans.), p. 380; Boedewadt, Glossen zur Verfassung der heidn. Juden, iii, 78 sq. (B. F.) Purification (םיקתפ, tohordh, ἱεροποιησία), a ceremony enjoined in the Mosaic law for the purpose of cleansing from pollution or defilement (Num. xix, 9).

Purifications were, for the most part, performed with water, sometimes with blood and with oil (Heb. ix. 21, 22; Exod. xxx. 26-29; Lev. viii, 10, 11). Sometimes fire was used in the purpose of purifying (Isa. i, 25; x, 26; Zech. xiii. 9; Mal. iii, 3).

In its legal and technical sense, the term is specially applied to the ritual observances whereby an Israelite was formally absolved from the taint of uncleanness, whether evidenced by the presence of the uncleanness, or connected with man's natural depravity. The cases that demanded it in the former instance are defined in the Levitical law [see UNECLEANNESS]: with regard to the latter, it is only possible to lay down the general rule that it was a fitting preliminary to any nearer approach to the Deity; as, for instance, in the admission of a proselyte to the congregation [see PROSLEYTE], in the baptism (אֱפֶלֶת, John iii, 25) of the Jews as a sign of repentance [see BAPTISM], in the consecration of priests and Levites [see LEVITE; PRIEST], or in the performance of the various religious acts (Exod. xii, 4; 2 Chron. xxxix, 19). In the present article we are concerned solely with the former class, insomuch as in this alone were the ritual observances of a special character.

The essence of purification, indeed, in all cases, consisted in the use of water, whether by way of ablution or of personal contact with the "muratoria delicti of the uncleanness, sacrifices of various kinds were added, and the ceremonies throughout bore an expiatory character. Simple ablution of the person was required after sexual intercourse (Lev. xv, 18; 2 Sam. xi, 4): ablution of the clothes after touching the carcass of an unclean beast, or eating or carrying the carcass of a clean beast that had died a natural death (Lev. xi, 25, 40): ablution both of the person and of the defiled garments in cases of gonorreae dormientiam (xv, 16, 17)—the ceremony in each of the above instances to take place on the day on which the uncleanness was contracted. A higher degree of uncleanness resulted from prolonged gonorreae in males and menstruation in women: in these cases a probationary interval of seven days was to be allowed after the cessation of the symptoms; on the evening of the seventh day the candidate for purification performed an ablution both of the person and of the garments, and on the eighth offered two turtledoves or two young pigeons, one for a sin-offering, the other for a burnt-offering (ver. 1-15, 19-30). Contact with persons in the above states, or with clothing or furniture that had been used by them while in those states, involved uncleanness in a minor degree, to be abated by ablution on the day of infection generally (ver. 5-11, 21-25), but in one particular case after an interval of seven days (ver. 24). In cases of childbirth the incubus increased to a lamb of the first year, with a pigeon or turtledove (xii, 6), an exception being made in favor of the poor, who might present the same offering as in the preceding case (ver. 8; Luke ii, 22-24). The purification took place forty days after the birth of a son, and eighty after a daughter, the difference in the interval being based on physical considerations. The uncleannesses already specified were comparatively of a mild character: the more severe were connected with death, which, viewed as the penalty of sin, was in the highest degree contaminating. To this head we refer the two cases of (1) touching a corpse, or a grave (Num. xix, 16), or even killing a man in war (xxxi, 19); and (2) leprosy, which was regarded by the Hebrews as nothing less than a living death. The ceremonies of purification in the first of these two cases are detailed in Num. xix, 16.

A peculiar kind of water, termed the water of uncleanness (םיקתפ, A. V. "water of separation"), was prepared in the following manner: an unblemished red heifer, on which the yoke had not passed, was slain by the eldest son of the high-priest outside the camp. A portion of its blood was sprinkled seven times towards (םיבובלו, the sanctuary; the rest of it, and the whole of the carcass, including even its dung, were burned in the sight of the officiating priest, together with cedar-wood, and scarlet, and scarlet. The ashes were collected by a clean man and deposited in a clean place outside the camp. Whenever occasion required, a portion of the ashes was mixed with spring-water in a jar, and the unclean person was sprinkled with it on the third and again on the seventh day after the contact.

It is important to note that the water of purification was not a sacrament, but the repetition of the ceremony had symbolical significance appropriate to the object sought. The sex of the victim (female, and hence life-giving), its red color (the color of blood, the seat of life), its unimpaired vigor (never having borne the yoke), its youth, and the absence in it of spot or blemish, the cedar and the hyssop (possessing the qualities, the former of incorporation, the latter of purity), and the scarlet (again the color of blood)—all these symbolized life in its fulness and freshness as the antipode of death.

At the same time the extreme virulence of the uncleanness is taught by the regulations that the victim should be wholly consumed outside the camp, whereas generally certain parts were consumed on the altar, and the offal only outside the camp (comp. Lev. iv, 11, 12); that the blood was sprinkled towards, and not before, the sanctuary; that the officiating minister should be neither the high-priest, nor yet simply a priest, but the presbyste high-priest, the office being too impure for the first and too important for the second; that even the priest and the person that burned the heifer were rendered unclean by reason of their contact with the victim; and, lastly, that the purification should be effected, not simply by the use of water, but of water mixed with ashes which served as a lye, and would, therefore, have peculiarly cleansing qualities. See PURIFICATION-WATERS.

The purification of the leper was a yet more formal proceeding, and indicated the highest pitch of uncleanness. The rites are thus described in Lev. iv, 4-32: The priest having examined the leper and pronounced him clear of his disease, took for him two birds "alive and clean," with cedar-wood, and hyssop. One of the birds was killed under the priest's directions over a vessel filled with spring-water, into which its blood fell; the other, with the adjuncts, cedar, etc., was dipped by the priest into the mixed blood and water, and, perching on the unclean person, the number of seven times sprinkled with the same liquid, was permitted to fly away "into the open field." The leper then washed himself and his clothes, and shaved his head. The above proceedings took place outside the camp, and formed the first stage of purification.

The next interval of seven days was then allowed, which period the leper was to pass "abroad out of his tent": on the last of these days the washing was repeated, and the shaving was more rigidly performed, even to the eyebrows and all his hair. The second stage of the purification took place on the eighth day, and was performed "before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation." The leper brought thither an offering consisting of two he-lambs, a yearling ewe-lamb, fine flour mingled with oil, and a log of oil. In cases of porous leprosy the offering was reduced to one lamb, and two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, with a less quantity of fine flour, and a log of oil. The priest slew one of the he-lambs as a trespass-offering, and applied a portion of its blood to the right ear, right thumb, and great toe of the right foot of the leper; he next sprinkled a portion of the oil seven times upon the Lord, applied another portion of it to the parts of the body already specified, and poured the remainder over the
the other hand, the ewe-lamb, or the two birds, as the case might be, were then offered as a sin-offering and a burnt-offering, together with the meat-offering. The significance of the cedar, the scarlet, and the hyssop, of the running water, and of the "life (full of life) and clean" condition of the life referred to in the text is variously described.

The two stages of the proceedings indicated, the first, which took place outside the camp, the readmission of the leper to the community of men; the second, before the sanctuary, his readmission to communion with God. In the first stage, the slaughter of the one bird and the dismemberment of the other symbolized the punishment of death deserved and fully remitted. In the second, the use of oil and its application to the same parts of the body as in the consecration of priests (Lev. viii, 23, 24) symbolized the readedication of the leper to the service of Jehovah. See PURIFICATION-OFFERING.

The ceremonies to be observed in the purification of a house or a garment infected with leprous were identical with the first stage of the proceedings used for the leper (Lev. xiv, 83-85). See LEPROSY.

The necessity of purification was extended in the period between the death of the owner to a variety of unauthorized cases. Cups and pots, brazes vessels and couches, were washed as a matter of ritual observance (Mark vii, 4). The washing of the hands before meals was conducted in a formal manner (vii, 3), and minute regulations are given for the washing of the hands in the various parts of the Mishna entitled Yadaim. These ablutions required a large supply of water, and hence we find at a marriage feast no less than six jars containing two or three firkins apiece, prepared for the purpose (John ii, 6). We meet with references to purification after childbirth (Luke ii, 29), and after the cure of leprosy (Matt. viii, 4; Luke xvii, 14), the sprinkling of the water mixed with ashes being still retained in the latter case (Heb. ix, 13). What may have been the specific causes of uncleanness in those who came up to purify themselves before the Passover (John xi, 55), or in those who had taken upon themselves the Nazarite's vow (Acts xxii, 24, 26), we are not informed; in either case it may have been contact with a corpse, though in the latter it would rather appear to have been a general purification preparatory to the accomplishment of the vow.

In conclusion, it may be observed that the distinctive feature in the Mosaic rites of purification is their expiatory character. The idea of uncleanness was not peculiar to the Jew: it was attached by the Greeks to their conception of a real distinction, the term and divinity of the Eurip. Iph. in Taur. 383), and by various nations to the case of sexual intercourse (Herod. i, 198; ii, 64; Pers. ii, 16). But with all these nations simple ablation sufficed: no sacrifices were demanded. The Jew alone was taught by the use of expiatory offerings to discern to its full extent the connection between the outward sign and the inward fount of impurity. See ABABT.

PURIFICATION IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. The Protestant Church recognises no ceremonial purifications, as a rule, seeking for raising emblems of piety to the necessity of holiness in the people of the Lord. Christ taught purification of the heart only, and so the evangelical Christians teach purity of heart as the fit condition in which to approach the Deity in worship; the blood of the Son of God having cleansed from all sin those who accept of his atonement in righteousness. See IMPURITY; SIN.

In the Roman Catholic Church and the Greek Church, as well as some of the ultra-rhetic churches which still cling to Protestantism, acts of purification prevail to some extent. There is, firstly, the act of purification after the communion in the mass. It relates (a) to the purification of the chalice; some wine is poured into it by the servant of the altar, and slightly shaken with a circular motion, to take in all particles of the holy blood; then the chalice is emptied in two draughts, the mouth touching the same place from which the holy blood has been drunk. During this performance the prayer Quid ore sumpsit is recited: this prayer stands in an old Gothic missal of Charlemagne's time as Postcommunion.

In the oldest times of Christianity the purification of the chalice was done with water, which was afterwards poured out into the sacrificial vessel placed on the altar, and called piscina (q. v.). It was Innocent III who directed that the purification of the chalice should be done with wine. (b) To the periodical purification of the chalism (q. v.), which is performed after the partial taking of the host at Mass, there is added the purification of the chalice, by gathering with wine the rest of the holy blood left in the chalism, and emptying it as before, and then wiping out its inside with the purificatorium (q. v.). There is, secondly, the act of purification for women, which has been derived through rather than from the Jewish rite (Lev. xi). It is based upon the practice of the Blessed Virgin Mary, whose compliance with the demand of the Jewish ceremonial law is related in Luke ii, 22-24. The Romish Church has in commemoration of this purification act instituted a festival called Feast of Purification of the Blessed Virgin, and, by the Levitical law the ceremony was appointed for the fortieth day after childbirth, the feast is put in February (reckoning from Dec. 25, the Nativity of Christ). As on the same occasion the Holy Virgin compiled also with the festival, a litany being preserved. On the redemption of the first-born, the festival is also called by the name of the Presentation of the Child Jesus, or the Feast of Simeon, and sometimes, also, of the Meeting (occurrus), in allusion to Simeon's meeting the Virgin Mother, and taking the child into his arms (Luke ii, 27). The date of the introduction of this festival is uncertain. The first clear trace of it is about the middle of the 6th century, during the reign of Marcia, and in the Church of Jerusalem. Its introduction in the Roman Church, in 494, was made by Pope Gelasius the occasion of transferring to a Christian use the festivities which at that season were annexed to the pagan festival of the Lupercalia.

In the Church of England, the restoration of woman to the privileges of the Church is accompanied by a solemn thanksgiving for deliverance in her great danger. The title of the service, The Thanksgiving of Women after Childbirth, was adopted in 1552 to bring this point into prominence. The old Sarum title, Ordo ad Purificationem Mulierem post Partum, and that in the Prayer-book of 1549, The Order of the Purification of Women, are preserved in the Sarum service removed. The Puritans objected to the use of the service for this very reason—"For what else do this churching imply but a restoring her unto the Church, which cannot be without some bar or shutting forth supposed?" They complained, too, against such individualizing of prayer and praise (see the controversy between Cartwright and Whitgift and Hooker, in Reb. 84 ed. of Hooker's Works, ii, 434-438). In the Sarum use the service was read at the church door, ore cathum eccele; in the book of 1549, 'nigh unto the quire or ante-chamber, and there a convenient place." The solemn readmission of the woman to divine service of the Sarum use has been wholly discontinued. The Book of Common Prayer requires of the woman to be "decently apparelled," which means that she shall appear at church veiled. Hooker gives an instance where a woman appeared unveiled and was therefore excommunicated, and when the case was appealed to the bishops they confirmed the decision. Palmer says that all the Western rituals and that of Constantinople had offices for this rite. A service of the Sarum use is given in the Sarum Ordo, Proton. ii, 1941, cxxvii: "Benedictio Purpurae secundum usum Æthiopum." The anointing the forehead of the woman and child, aucta unctio, the imposition of hands, the reception of holy communion, the giving of incense, are parts of this rite. See Siegel, Christliche Alterthümer (Index in vol. iv.); Riddle, Christian Antiquities (see Index); Brit. Qu. Rev., July, 1871, p. 110. See also Ablution.

Purification-offerings were such as the law enjoined upon those who had been raised from leprosy, unclean issues, hemorrhages, and childbirth. See Pollution. Those for lepers were the most burdensome, since a trespass-offering was among them.

1. The purifying offerings of menstrual women and of women after childbirth were the same (Lev. xv.). And the eighth day after the cure was certain, each brought two turtle-doves, or young pigeons, to be slain by the priests—the one as a sin-offering, the other as a burnt-offering (xxv, 14 sq., 29 sq.). Drink-offerings are not expressly mentioned in connection with these. See Woman.

2. The offerings of purification of women after childbirth (Lev. xxi, 8-6), offered thirty-three or sixty-six days after confinement, consisted in a yearling lamb as a burnt-offering, and a young pigeon or a turtle-dove as a sin-offering. In case of poverty, two turtle-doves or young pigeons sufficed—the one as a burnt-offering, the other as a sin-offering (comp. Luke ii, 24). See Child.

3. More extended was the purifying ceremony of birds and oxen (Lev. xii, 6-8, 16-21; xxv, 1-5, 9-13, 16-21). The ritual is composed of two parts: (a) vs. 2-8. The healed leper brought to the priest for cleansing must present two small birds, alive and clean (according to the ἁγιάζω, xiv, 5, it must be in form, size, and value precisely alike and bought at the same time); but this was not necessary; comp. Lutsch, De Dubia. Avv. Purgat. Leprosi Destin. Lavori, Mystere. [Hal. 1737]). The one was to be slain over an earthen vessel filled with fresh spring-water (and then buried; ἁγιάζω, xiv, 1), and the living bird, together with a bunch of myrrh and a priestly garment (a coat, and a girdle) was dipped into the vessel, now containing water and blood mixed together, and the leper was sprinkled with it seven times. The priest then let the living bird loose into the open air (perhaps bearing away the guilt). See EXpiATION. Then the man healed was required to wash, shave off all his hair, and bathe. He was now so far cleansed as no longer to render unclean the place he occupied (ἁγιάζω, xiv, 2), and might again abide in the city, but was required to "larry abroad out of his own tent" or house. This is referred by the rabbins, as a metonomy, even in those cases but without reason. (yet Bähr follows them; Symbol, ii. 520 sq.). The ceremony with the two birds is not a sacrifice, but a mere symbol of the purifying of the blood from the humors of the disease, and the return of freedom on the part of the leper again to associate with men (otherwise explained in Bähr, op. cit. p. 515 sq.). (b) Vers. 9-31. On the seventh day, the leper was required again to shave his whole body with the utmost care—not even sparing the eyebrows—to wash, and to bathe. A special chamber was provided in a corner of the women's court-yard of the second Temple for this purpose (Joh. viii, 49 sq.; comp. ἁγιάζω, xiv, 8). Bähr is mistaken, and contradicts Lev. xiv, 9, in referring this washing to the eighth day). On the eighth day he presented two lambs and a yearling sheep. The lamb was first slain as a trespass-offering, and the healed man was touched with its blood in three places—on the right ear, the right thumb, and the great toe of the right foot. Then the priest took the oil offered by the leper, and, after sprinkling it seven times "before the Lord," touched the leper with it in the same places, but washed with the oil and poured the remainder over his head. Finally, the sin-offering and the burnt-offering were slain. Poor persons were allowed to bring for these two turtle-doves or young pigeons. See Leprosy.

The putting of the blood on the body, as well as touching it with oil, in this second service, is considered as a ceremony expressing reconciliation; but the rabbinic consider the final anointing with the oil as the essential part (Nag. xiv, 10), because in this connection alone is mention made of "an anointing before the Lord" (Lev. xiv, 18). In other respects, the whole ceremony strongly resembles the consecration of priests (Bähr, op. cit. 621 sq.). The cutting of the hair was also the same (Lev. xiv, 19). The hair brought to the medical police of the law, for the leprosy conceals itself most easily under the hair, and hence the last traces of the disease could thus be detected. On the ceremonies of purification in consecrating priests and Levites, see those articles. See Natzahli.

Purification-waters (περιοικός, mey nisdād) properly waters of uncleanness, i.e. of purification; Sept. ἐκατοπτρίζεται, water of sprinkling, after the Chaldean usage; comp. nedāk, ἐκθέσις, to sprinkle [see Rosenmüller, on Num. xix, 9]). This was a holy water of cleansing, which was mixed with the ashes of a red or reddish-brown heifer—one which had never been under the yoke (comp. Deut. xxvi, 9; Bochart, Hieroz. i, 328; on the age of this heifer the interpreters of the law do not agree; see Para, i, 1; Jonathan, on Num. l. c., speaks of a two-year-old). With this water those who had contracted impurity by contact with a corpse or otherwise were sprinkled by means of a spring or branch of hyssop, and thus cleansed (Num. xiv, 4 8,75, 19 sq.; Heb. ix, 18; Josephus, Ant. iv, 4, 6; comp. the Talmudical tract Pará, in the 6th part of the Mishna). The ceremony of burning the heifer, which was accounted a sin-offering (Num. xix, 9, 17), was as follows according to the law (comp. Mishna, Pará, vi, 4): A priest, who had set himself apart and purified himself, for this work for seven days previous (ibid. iii, 1; Josephus ascribes the duty to the high-priest, which may have been the custom in his time, although the Mishna usually speaks only of a priest, iii, 5, 10; comp. Philo, On the Laws, p. 202; Josephus, Ant. ii, 8). One priest (through the east dór, Mishna, Middoth, i, 8) before the city (on the Mount of Olives, Pará, iii, 6), slew it, and burned it entire, with its flesh, skin, blood, and dungs (Num. xix, 5), on a fire fed with cedared-wood, scarlet wool, and hyssop (comp. Lev. xiv, 6). The ashes were then gathered, and kept in a clean place outside the city (according to the Pará, iii, 2, they were divided into three parts, one of which was kept in a court outside the Temple, the second on the Mount of Olives, and the third was given to the priests). A heifer was burned, thus anew rendered unclean for the iniquity committed. The Pará (iii, 6) tells us that only nine in all were ever burned, and only one of them before the captivity (Jerome, Ep. 108 ad Eustach., says that one was burned yearly). A part of these ashes was mixed with fresh water (comp. Pará, viii, 8) and a clean person sprinkled with it the unclean on the third and on the seventh day after the contraction of uncleanness. With it, too, the house of the dead and the vessels rendered unclean by a corpse were sprinkled. He who burned the heifer, the priest who slew her, and the man who collected the ashes were sprinkled with it (Num. xix, 7, 8, 10). The same took place in the use of the water; he who sprinkled it on the unclean, and all that touched it, were unclean until evening (xix, 21 sq.). This is analogous to Lev. xvi, 24, 26, 28; although in that case the uncleanness contracted by contact with the goats was considered as removed immediately after the required washings. Clericus properly remarks on this passage in Numbers, "The victim was considered as uncleann through the sins which the prayer of the priest made away with. Thus, of this victim cleansed the unclean by taking his pollution; but they also defiled the clean, because no pollution could seem to pass from them to the water." The last clause, however, is not clear.

The whole ceremony is peculiar, and suggests many questions which have never been fully solved. In particular, the symbolic meaning of the details is still unsettled, as the disagreement of recent expositors shows (Bähr, Symbol. ii, 438 sq.; Hengstenberg, Moers und Egypten, p. 181 sq.; Anonymous, Evang. K.-Z. 1848, No. 19; Baumgarten, Comment. zum Pentateuch, ii, 833 sq.; Philipson, p. 721 sq.; in the Stud. u. Krit. [1846], iii, 629 sq.). We cannot here dwell upon this unfruitful investigation, but will refer singly to the principal points.

1. The purification of those made unclean by a corpse was effected, not by the usual means of cleansing—pure water—but by this sharp fluid, because this kind of uncleanness was considered very deep and sad. The reason of this is obvious. Hence the means of cleansing is a kind of lye, which is strong in its action. We find ashes and hyssop among the means of purification not merely by the Romans (Virgil, Eclog. viii, 101; Ovid, Fast. iv, 689, 725, 738; Amob. Genn. vi, 82), but by the old Persians, who made their most powerful cleansing stuff out of water and ashes by means of fire (Zenda-rasta, iii, 216; another kind of sacred water used by Egyptian priests is mentioned in Zilan. Antis. vii, 45). Besides, this lye among the Israelites was made, not out of ashes in general, but from the ashes of a sin-offering, and from that which alone remained of this sin-offering.

2. A heifer, not a bull (Lev. iv, 14), is used, perhaps (Bähr, p. 489) because the female sex is that which brings forth life (comp. Gen. iii, 20; otherwise Hengstenberg and Baumgarten—the former interpreting too outwardly, op. cit. p. 182; the latter too artificiously). But the object may have been simply to distinguish this particular sin-offering, when the animal was made a means to a hallowing purpose, from that in which it was presented to Jehovah in his sanctuary as a sacrifice of reconciliation. Yet physical uncleanness is always less burdensome than sin against the moral law (comp. Philo, p. 765). Why a red heifer? The explanation of Spencer (Leg. Ritu. ii, 15, 2, 6), that a red heifer was chosen in token of opposition to the Egyptian custom of sacrificing red cattle to Typhon, who was fancied to be of a red color (Plut. Isid. ii, 22), is worthless. The recent expositors of the symbols water between red as the color of life (Bähr, Kurta) and of sin and death (Hengstenberg). According to the rabbins, Solomon did not know the reason, and no ancient tradition respecting it has reached us. The secret will never be discovered. If it be said that red heifers were chosen for sacrifices, which rendered them prized in the East (Reland, Antig. Sacri. ii, 5, 28; Amvlkies [ed. Lette], p. 74), the answer is only rendered more difficult. Rarity is not made an object in the directions given. Perhaps the dark color is simply selected as a conspicuous mark of antithesis in the work in hand, and as a means of aiding to keep the removal of sin steadily before the eye. White heifers were unsuitable for this purpose: black ones are very rare in the East. As the accompaniments—cedar-wood, hyssop, and scarlet wool, which Maimonides in his time already felt the difficulty of explaining—have never yet been fully accounted for, Bähr's explanation is the most intelligent (p. 602 sq.), while Baumgarten's is absurd. See Hyssor.

3. The twofold sprinkling on the third and seventh days has an analogy in two other places (Lev. xii, 2 sq.; xiv, 8 sq.). That terrible impurity was not to be removed in a moment; its serious nature demanded two periods of effort. Three and seven, too, are significant numbers in themselves. The seven, or week, is also a liturgically complete period, and with it the ceremony of purification ends. Perhaps why the heifer was burned without the holy city, and the persons occupied in this work were accounted unclean, is not the impurity of the sacrifice in itself (as Bähr has well remarked), but in the fact of its relation with the most unclean things—death and the consequent purity.

The Purificatorium is a piece of linen folded several times, which is used in drying the chalice and wiping the paten during the mass. It was originally a towel fastened to the piscina, or vessel placed at the side of the altar. Only in later times it took the present simpler form—probably at the time when the priest himself drank at the chalice, which had been used for the purification of the chalice and the ablation of the fingers. The cleaning of the purificatorium, as it comes in immediate contact with the consecrated forms, must, by prescription of the canon, be done by the priest himself. Its length and width must be about half an ell, and as it is exclusively employed for the ritual use, it must be consecrated and marked in the middle with a cross. The Greeks use a sponge for the cleaning of the chalice and paten—a custom mentioned by Chrysostom (Hom. in Epist. ad Ephes.).—Weisser u. Weise, Kirchen-Lez. a. v.

Purim (פּוּרִים), Purim; Sept. Φούρπαι v. r. Φούρπαι, etc.; also פּוּרְסָה יבשא, days of the Purim, Esth. ix, 26, 28), the annual festival instituted by Mordecai, at the instigation of Esther, to commemorate the wonderful deliverance of the Jews in Persia from extermination with which they were threatened through the designs of Haman (Esth. ix; Josephus, Antiq. x, 6, 28). (The following article is substantially compiled from Biblical and Rabbinical authorities. See FESTIVAL.

1. Name of the Festival and its Signification. The name פּוּרְסָה יבשא (singular פּוּרְס), which is derived from the Persian pars, cognate with pars, part, and which is explained in Esther (iii, 7; ix, 24) by the Hebrew פּוּר, lot, has been given to this festival because it records the casting of lots by Haman to ascertain when he should carry into effect the decree which the king issued for the extermination of the Jews (Esth. ix, 24). The name Φούρπαι, which, as Schleusner (Lexik. in LXX. s. v.) and others rightly maintain, is a corruption of Φούραι, is the Greek pronunciation of the Hebrew term. In like manner, the modern editors of Josephus have emended the term they have otherwise preserved in the Heb. פּוּר (Esth. iii, 7). They gave the name Purim, or Lots, to the commemorative festival because he had thrown lots to ascertain what day would be auspicious for him to carry into effect the bloody decree which the king had issued at his instance (ix, 24).

Ewald, in support of his theory that there was in patriarchal times a religious festival at every new and full moon, conjectures that Purim was originally the full-moon feast of Adar, as the Passover was that of Nisan, and the New-Year festival that of Tammuz.

II. The Manner in which the Feast was and is still observed. All that the Bible tells us about it is that Mordecai ordered the 14th and 15th of Adar to be kept annually by the Jews, both nigh and afar; that these two days are to be made days of feasting and of joy, as well as an innumerable of presents and of sending gifts to the poor, and that the Jews agreed to continue to observe this festival every year in the same manner as they had begun it (Esth. ix, 17-24). No further directions are given about its observance, and the Bible says nothing about the Jews assembling in places of assembly to develop themselves with the circumstances of the nation. It is not easy to conjecture what may have been the ancient mode of observance, so as to have given the occasion something of the dignity of a national religious festival. The traditions of the Jews, and their modern usage respecting it, are curious. It is stated that eighty-five of the Jewish elders objected at first to the institution of the feast, when it was proposed by Mordecai (Jerus. Gem. Megillah; Lightfoot, on John x, 21). A preliminary fast was appointed, called "the fast of Esther," to be observed on the thirteenth of Adar, in memory of the fast which Esther and her maids observed, and which she enjoined, through Mordecai, on the Jews of Shushan (Esth. iv, 16). See MORDECAI.

The following is the mode in which the festival of Purim is kept at the present day. The day proceeding—i.e. the thirteenth of Adar—is kept as a fast-day, and is called "the fast of Esther" (פורים ביום אסתר), in accordance with the command of this Jewish queen (Esth. iv, 5, 6); and sundry prayers expressive of repentance, humiliation, etc. (אף שלום), are introduced into the regular ritual for the day. As on all the fast-days, Exod. xxxii, 11-14; xxxiv, 1-11, are read as the lesson from the law, and Isa. lv, 5-6; lv, 3, as the Haphtaroth. If the thirteenth of Adar falls on a Sabbath, the fast takes place on the Thursday previous, as no fasting is allowed on this sacred day, nor on the preparation-day for the Sabbath. Some people fast three days, as Esther enjoined at first. On the evening of this fast-day—i.e. the one closing the thirteenth of Adar and introducing the fourteenth, as soon as the stars appear—the festival commences, when the candles are lighted, and all the Israelites resort to the synagogue, where, after the evening service, the book of Esther, called, kar' ḫok̄im, the Megillah (תֵאֵזוֹפִים, the Roll), is read by the praelector. Before commencing to read it he pronounces the following benediction: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and hast enjoined us to read the Megillah! Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast wrought miracles for our forefathers in these days and at this time. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast preserved us alive, sustained us, and brought us to this season!" The Megillah is then read. The praelector reads in a histrionic manner, suiting his tones and gestures to the changes in the subject-matter. As often as he pronounces the name of Haman the congregation stamp on the floor, saying, "Let his name be blotted out. The name of the wicked shall rot!" while the children spring rattle. The passage in which the names of Haman and his sons occur (Esth. ix, 7, 9) is read very rapidly, and if possible in one breath, to signify that they were all hanged at the same time, the congregation stamping and rattling all the time. It is for this reason that this passage is written in the MSS. in larger letters than the rest, and that the names are arranged under one another. After the Megillah is read through, the whole congregation exclaim, "Cursed be Haman; cursed be Mordecai. Cursed be Zeresh (the wife of Haman); cursed be Esther. Cursed be all idolaters; blessed be all Israelites, and blessed be Harbonah who hanged Haman." The volume is then solemnly rolled up. Lastly, the following benediction is pronounced by the reader: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast contended our contest, judged our cause, hast avenged our wrongs, required all the enemies of our souls, and hast delivered us from our oppressors. Blessed art thou who hast delivered thy people from all their oppressors, thou Lord of salvation!" All go home and partake of a repast said to consist mainly of milk and eggs.

On the morning of the fourteenth of Adar the Jews again resort to the synagogue, insert several appointed prayers into the ordinary daily ritual; Exod. xvi, 8-16 is read as the lesson from the law, which relates the destruction of the Amalekites, the people of Agag (1 Sam. xv, 8), the supposed ancestor of Haman (Esth. iii, 1), and the Megillah or the Book of Esther as the Haphtaroth, under the same circumstances as those of the previous evening. The rest of the festival is spent in great rejoicings: presents are sent backwards and forwards among friends and relations, and gifts are liberally forwarded to the poor. Games of all sorts, with dancing and music, commence. In the evening a quaint dramatic entertainment, the subject of which is connected with the occasion, sometimes takes place, and men frequently put on female attire, declaring that the festivities of Purim, according to Esth. ix, 22, suspend the law of Deut. xxi, 5, which forbids one sex to wear the dress of the other. A dainty meal then follows, sometimes with a free indulgence of wine, both unmixed and mulled. According to the Gemara (Megillah, vii, 2), "tenetar homo in saeculo Purim eo uque inbibit..."

From the canons which obtained in the time of Christ, we learn that the Megillah had to be written in Hebrew characters, on good parchment, and with ink (Mishna, Megilla, ii, 2); that if the 14th of Adar fell on a Tuesday or Wednesday, the inhabitants of villages read the Megillah on the Monday in advance, or on Thursday, because the country people came to town to attend the markets and the synagogues in which the law was read and tribunals held (Megilla, i, 1–3); that any one was qualified to read it except deaf people, fools, and minors (ibid., ii, 4), and that it was lawful to read it in a foreign language to those who understood foreign languages (ibid., ii, 1). But though the Mishna allows it to be read in other languages, yet the Megillah is generally read in Hebrew.

The rejoicings continued on the 15th, and the festival terminates on the evening of this day. During the whole of the festival the Jews may engage in trade, or any labor, if they are so inclined, as there is no prohibition against it. When the month Adar used to be doubled, in the Jewish leap-year, the festival was repeated on the 15th of Adar, and was called Adar II.

It would seem that the Jews were tempted to associate the Christians with the Persians and Amalekites in the curse of the synagogue (see Cod. Theod. vi, 8, 18). Hence probably arose the popularity of the feast of Purim in those ages in which the feeling of enmity was excited between Jews and Gentiles, and which seemed to be identified between Jews and Christians. Several Jewish proper names are preserved which strikingly show the way in which Purim was regarded, such as, “The Temple may fail, but Purim never.” “The Prophets may fail, but not the Megillah.” It was said that no books would survive in the Messiah’s kingdom except the law and the Megillah. This affection for the book and the festival connected with it is the more remarkable because the events on which they are founded affected only an exiled portion of the Hebrew race, and because there was so much in them to shock the principles and prejudices of the Jewish mind. So popular was this festival in the days of Christ that Josephus tells us that, “even now, all the Jews that are in the habitable earth keep these days festivals, and send portions to one another” (Ant. xi, 9, 13), and certainly its popularity has not diminished in the present day.

III. Did Christ celebrate this Feast?—It was first suggested by Kepler that the iojpy 16ow of John v, 1 was the feast of Purim. The notion has been pursued and exposed by Paul Otter, Lamy, Hug, Tholuck, Lücke, Olshausen, Stier, Wieseler, Winer, and Anger (who, according to Winer, has proved the point beyond contradiction), and is favored by Alford and Elliotte. The question is a difficult one. It seems to be generally allowed that the opinion of Chrysostom, Cyril, and most of the fathers, which was taken up by Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, and Bengel, that the feast was Pentecost, and that of Gocceius, that it was Tabernacles (which is countenanced by the reading of one inferior MS.), are precluded by the general course of the narrative, and especially by John iv, 55 (assuming that the words of our Lord which are there given were spoken in a single time) compared with v, 1. The interval indicated by a comparison of these texts could scarcely have extended beyond Nisan. The choice is thus left between Purim and the Passover.

The principal objections to Purim are, (a) that it was not necessary to go up to Jerusalem to keep the festival; (b) that it is not very likely that our Lord would have made a point of paying especial honor to a festival which appears to have had but a very small religious import, and which seems rather to have been the means of keeping alive a feeling of national revenge and hatred. It is alleged, on the other hand, that our Lord’s attending the feast would be in harmony with his deep sympathy with the feelings of the Jewish people, which went further than his merely “fulfilling all righteousness” in carrying out the precepts of the Mosaic law. It is further urged that the narrative of John is best made out by supposing that the incident at the pool of Bethesda occurred at the festival which was characterized by showing kindness to the poor, and that our Lord was induced, by the enmity of the Jews to the Gentiles, to go up to Jerusalem till the Passover, mentioned John vi, 4 (Stier).

The identity of the Passover with the feast in question has been maintained by Ireneus, Eusebius, and Theodoret, and, in modern times, by Luther, Scaliger, Grotius, Cornelius, Neander, and Robinson, and the majority of commentators. The principal difficulties in the way are, (a) the omission of the article, involving the improbability that the great festival of the year should be spoken of as “a feast of the Jews;” (b) that as our Lord did not go up to the Passover mentioned John vi, 4, he must have abstained himself from Jerusalem for a year and a half that is, till the feast of Tabernacles (John vii, 2). Against these points it is contended that the application of iojpy without the article to the Passover is in keeping with what is said in John xiv, 4 (see John xviii, 39); indeed, it makes but little difference in Hellenistic Greek whether the article is present or absent with a noun thus in regimen with a following genitive; that it is assigned as a reason for his staying away from Jerusalem for a longer period than usual, that “he did not go up” (John vii, 3); that this long period satisfactorily accounts for the surprise expressed by his brethren (John vii, 5); and that, as it was evidently his custom to visit Jerusalem once a year, he went up to the feast of Tabernacles (vii, 2) instead of going to the Passover. A still more conclusive argument in favor of the Passover is the use of the peculiar epithet δια αυτων πασχαλις in Luke vi, 1, for the Sabbath following, which can mean no other than that occurring after the Paschal week. Moreover, the fact of the ripe but unharvested barley at that time leads to the same conclusion. See Passover.

The arguments on one side are best set forth by Stier and Olshausen on John v, i, by Kepler (Eccles. Chronicon, Frankfort, 1615), and by Anger (De Temp. in Act. Apost., 64); also, in Hugh’s Introd. (p. 5, i, 64), and in Lücke’s Comment. on St. John’s Gospel (see the English translation of Lücke’s Dissertation in the appendix to Tittman’s Meditamenta Sacra, or a Commentary on St. John’s Gospel, in Bib. Comment. vol. xvi); those on the other side, by Hengstenberg (Christology vol. ii, 341, 546, and in Lücke’s Comment. on St. John’s Gospel); see the English translation of Washington, 1889; Robinson, Harmony, note on the “Second Passover;” and Neander, Life of Christ, § 143. Puritanism, a name given to a large party in the reign of queen Elizabeth, who complained that the Reformation in England was left in an imperfect state, many abuses both in worship and discipline being still retained and others introduced, and which seems rather to have been the frequent assertion of those who composed the party that the Church of England was corrupted with the remains of popery, and that what they desired was a “pure” system of doctrine and discipline; but the English word "Puritans" happens accidentally to represent the Greek name "Catharoi" which had been assumed by the Novatians, and which had been adopted in Germany during the Middle Ages in the vernacular form "Ketzer" for the Almarginants of the Church. It first came into use as the designation of an English Church party about the year 1564 (Fuller, Ch. Hist. ix, 66), but after a few years it got to be used also as inclusive of many who had separated from the Church of England. It was gradually extended as regards the latter by the names of their various sects, as Independents, Presbyterian, Baptists, etc., and as regards the former by the term "Nonconformists." At a still later time, towards the end of the 17th century, the Church Puritans were represented by "Low- Churchmen," and the Non-Church Puritans by "Dis- senters."

The presence of a Puritan party in the Church of England is, however, traceable for two centuries before the name of "Puritan" was assumed. In the 14th century the common people had become alienated from their parish priests by the influence of the friars, who had authority from the pope to preach and to receive confessions wherever they pleased, and quite independently of the ordinary clergy. This extra-parochial system of the friars was a serious weakness of the Church upon the point at large; and, when the friars themselves began to lose their influence, alienation from the clergy developed into alienation from the Church. Thus arose the Lollards of the 16th century, a party which made no attempt to set up separate places of worship or a separate ministry, but which introduced its antiscerficial principles into many parish churches, and made many of the clergy as strong opponents of the existing ecclesiastical system as were Wycliffe himself. During the trying times of the Reformation the party was considerably augmented by those whose opposition to Romish abuses had, by a similar excess, developed into opposition to the whole of the established ecclesiastical system—men who thought that "pure" doctrine and "pure" worship could only be attained by an utter departure from all that had been believed and practiced during the times when the Church of England had contracted impurities of doctrine and worship through popish influences. While Luther's movement was at its height, the party which thus became the progenitors of the Puritan party was formed into a society under the name of "The Christian Brethren," which seems, from the faint view we get of it, to have been very similar to that organised by John Wesley two centuries later. The head-quaarters of the Brethren party, which by 1540 had gained a footing at both the universities, apparently among the undergraduates and younger graduates. As early as the year 1528, a body of Cambridge residents met at once at a house called 'The White Horse' to confer together with others, in mockery called Germans, because they conversed much in the books of the divines of Germany brought thence. This house was chosen because those of King's College, Queen's College, and St. John's might come in at the back and so be the more private and undiscovered" (Stryte, Eccles. Mem. i, 569, ed. 1822). Among those mentioned as so meeting are the names of Barnes, Arthur, Bilney, Latimer, and Coverdale, familiarly known as precursors of the Puritan movement in Edward VI's and queen Elizabeth's reign. A few years later, in 1537, similar gatherings were detected at Oxford, where the names of Frith, Taverner, Udall, Farrar, and Cox, Edward VI's tutor, are found among those who met together for the same purpose (ibid. i, 569). Among the Oxford party the men of Wolsely's college held a conspicuous position, and their levity towards all who were brought before them, was a matter of wonder and jesting. The principles which were developed among the more extreme section of these early Puritans may be seen by an extract from a work written by William Tyndale (himself a friar and a priest), who was their representative man. Writing of the ministerial office, he says: "Subdeacon, deacon, priest, bishop, cardinal, patriarch, and pope: these names are as they should be, and not sacraments. There is no promise coupled therewith. If they minister their offices truly, it is a sign that Christ's Spirit is in them; if not, that the devil is in them. . . . O dreamers and natural beasts, without the seal of the Spirit of God, but sealed with the mark of the beast, and with cankered consciences, . . . By a priest understand nothing but an elder to teach the younger, and to bring them unto the full knowledge and understanding of Christ, and to minister the sacraments which Christ ordained, which is also nothing but to preach Christ's promises, . . . According, therefore, as every man believeth God's promises, longeth for them, and is diligent to pray unto God to fulfil them, so is his prayer heard; and as good is the prayer of a cobbler as of a cardinal, and of a butcher as of a bishop; and the blessing of a baker known. The truth is as good as the blessing of our most holy father the pope. . . . Neither is there any other manner of ceremony at all required in making our spiritual officers than to choose an able person, and then to rehearse him his duty, and give him his charge, and so put him in his room" (Obls. of Christ. Mem [Park Soc. ed.], p. 254-259).

These floating elements of Puritanism had, however, very little compactness and unity except in the one particular of opposition to the principles and practices which then prevailed in the Church of England. But in the latter years of Henry VIII's reign, Calvin was consolidating a system of doctrine, worship, and ecclesiastical discipline which was explicitly calculated to unite in a wieldy form the individual particles which had previously been too garrisoned for want of cohesion. Calvin gained some personal influence in England by means of pertinent letters addressed to the king, the protector Somerset, and archbishop Cranmer; but the principles of his system were chiefly propagated through the introduction of some of his foreign disciples into positions of influence in the Church of England. Thus an Italian named Pietro Vermigli, who had been an Augustinian friar, was made regius professor of divinity at Oxford, and is known to history as Peter Martyr (q. v.). A similar appointment was made at Cambridge, where the deacon and professor of divinity was a German named Martin Bucer (q. v.), who had been a Dominican friar. Paul Büchler, or Pagius, a companion of Bucer, was destined for the professorship of Hebrew at Cambridge, but died in 1549. Bernardino Ochino, who was an Italian, and had taken the Capuchin friars and confessor to pope Paul III, came from Geneva with Peter Martyr, and was made canon of Canterbury, being afterwards banished from place to place on the Continent for his Socinianism and his advocacy of polygamy. John a Laseo, the Pole, was an inmate of Lambeth Palace, when he and his foreigner formed a kind of Calvinistic private council to Cranmer; and John Knox (A.D. 1556-72), the Scotch preacher, was at one time carrying out his duties as chaplain to the young king, and at another going on a puring commission to preach down the Church in Northumberland, Durham, and the other northern counties (Jackson, Works, iii, 273).

It was not to be expected from his character that Henry VIII, though he rescued the kingdom from the papal yoke, would proceed far in reforming the religion of the country. His successor, however, Edward VI, a young prince of earnest piety, was likely, had his valuable life been spared, to have carried out a real reform, which would have rendered the Church of England more simple in her ritual and discipline; more in her discipline that she has ever had in her power to be. But Mary succeeded to the throne, and the ancient superstitions were restored. Several congregations of German Protestants, fleeing from Continental persecution, had found an asylum in England. One of the principal of these was settled in London under the patronage of John & Lasco, a man of great repute, the friend and patron of Erasmus; while another was placed by the duke of Somerset, the protector during the king's minority, at Glastonbury, upon the lands of the famous monastery then recently dissolved. The influence of the foreigners in matters of religion, however important this threat was not known as to excite suspicion, for they were commanded to leave the kingdom without delay. Nor did they retire alone. A furious burst of persecution drove with them a thousand Englishmen, who felt that to remain at home was to be excluded from the society of the heathen world. The Low Countries, the free cities of the Rhine, and Switzerland were now filled with these wanderers. Frankfort, Basle, Zurich, and Geneva particularly attracted them; for there the doc-tories of the Reformation had taken the strongest hold, and there its most eminent professors dwelt. Mingled with these were the leaders of the Continental Reformation. The English refugees had constant intercourse with Calvin, with Gualter, with Peter Martyr, and John & Lasco, and, above all, with Henry Bullinger.

On the death of Mary, the English exiles returned home in great numbers, bearing nothing back with them; says Ful-er, "but much learning and some experience." It is likely that they were influenced by the manners of the German churches. On their return to England, the contrast between the splendor of the English ceremonials and the simplicity of this abroad was the more striking. Their opponents never ceased to attribute much of the discontent that followed to the Genevan exile. They were for the most part Zwinglai-gospelers at their going hence," says Heylin, "and became the great promoters of the Puritan faction in their coming home." The Puritans themselves were never unwilling to own their obligations to the German Reformers, still, however, founding their scruples rather upon what they themselves conceived to be the absence of scriptural simplicity than upon the practice of other Christians.

The question of the habits, or, as it has since been termed, the vestiarium controvergy (q. v.), most unsettled them, and it then began to wear an anxious, if not a threatening aspect.

It was urged by the dissatisfied party that the imposition of the vestments was an infringement of their Christian liberty. They were called under the Gospel to worship God in spirit and in truth; and no outward forms or splendors could contribute in any measure to assist the devout mind in a service so spiritual and exalted. On the contrary, the tendenciess to heighten the gaudiness was to distract the worshipper, and to debase his devotions by an admixture of these sentiments which are allowed no place in spiritual things. The Church of Christ was only safe in its simplicity, and such was its inward glory that any attempts to decorate would but in fact degrade it. They objected, too, that the vestments against which they were contending had a Jewish origin, and belonged not to the Christian ministry, but to the priesthood of the house of Aaron. To introduce them into the Church of Christ was to pervert their meaning. They were a part of the divinely appointed constitution of the Jewish Church, and had passed away, together with the rest of its figurative and mystic ceremonial.

It was a further objection, and one that appealed not only to divines but to confectioners, but the complaint of the common people, that the vestments were identical with all the superstitions of popery. They were looked upon as the badge of antichrist; and those who wore them were regarded with suspicion, as men either indifferent to the cause of the Reformation, or not yet convinced of the necessity to reform. The sinfulness of approaching the most distant confines of a system which ought to be avoided with alarm and horror. "If we are bound to wear popish apparel when commanded, we may be obliged to have drawn crowns, and to use oil, and cream, and spittle, and all the rest of the papistical additions to the ordinance." The accession of Elizabeth, after the brief but bloody reign of Mary, revived the hopes of those who had been longing for a day of more complete reformation.

But it soon became quite apparent that the queen, though opposed in principle to popery, was resolved, nevertheless, to retain many of its practices, and to make religious matters as might be possible. A meeting of convocation was held in the beginning of the year

1562, at which the proposal for a further reformation was seriously discussed. Six alterations in particular were proposed; and these were Sabbath and those relating to Christ; that in prayer the minister should turn his face to the people; that the signing of the cross in baptism should be omitted; that the sick and aged should not be compelled to kneel at the communion; that the passing of the surplice should be sufficient; and that the use of organs should be laid aside. By a majority of one, and that the proxy of an absent person, these proposed alterations were rejected.

From this time the court party and the Reformers, as they were now called, became more decidedly opposed to each other. The difference in their views is well described by Dr. Hetherington in his History of the Westminister Assembly. "The main question," says he,

"on which they were divided may be thus stated: whether it were lawful to retain the external aspect of religion a close resemblance to what had prevailed in the times of popery, or not? The court divines argued that this process would lead the people more easily to the reception of the real doctrinal changes, when they might observe appearances so little altered, so that this method seemed to be recommended by expediency. The Reformers replied that this tended to perpetuate in the people their inclination to their former superstitions, led them to think there was after all, little difference between the Reformed and the Papal churches; and, consequently, that if it made them quit popery the more readily at present, it would leave them at least equally ready to return to it should an opportunity offer; and for this reason they thought it best to leave as few traces of popery remaining as possible. It was urged by the court party that every sovereign had authority to correct all abuses of doctrine and worship within his own dominions; this, they asserted, was the true meaning of the Act of Supremacy, and consequently the source of the Reformation in England. The court party of these officials for a long time the security of the queen's explanation given in the

Injunctions, but could not admit that the conscience and the religion of the whole nation were subject to the arbitrary disposal of the sovereign. The court party recognized the Church of Rome as a true Church, though rejecting in some points of doctrine and government; and this view it was thought necessary to maintain, for without this the English bishops could not trace their succession from the apostles. But the decided Reformers affirmed the pope to be antichrist, and the Church of Rome to be no true Church; nor would they risk the validity of their ordinations on the idea of a succession through such a channel. Neither party denied that the Bible was a perfect rule of faith; but the court pary did not admit it to be a standard of Church government, and this did not to the feeling that it was an deference to the judgment of the civil magistrate in Christian coun-dies to accommodate the government of the Church to the policy of the State. The Reformers maintained the Scriptures to be the standard of Church government and discipline as well as of doctrine; to the extent, at the least, that the civil power might not be seasonably limited which was not expressly contained in, or derived from them by necessary consequence, adding that if any discretionary power in minor matters were necessary, it must be vested, not in the civil magistrate, but in the spiritual office-bearers of the Church itself. The court Reformers did not hold that the Church of England for the four or five earliest centuries was a proper standard of Church government and discipline, even better suited to the dignity of a national establishment than the times of the apostles; and that, therefore, nothing more was needed than merely to remove the more modern innovations of popery. The true Reformers wished to keep close to the Scripture model, and to admit neither office-bearers, ceremonies, nor ordinances, but such as were therein appointed or sanctioned. The court party affirmed that things in their own nature indifferent, such as ceremonies, and vestments, might be appointed and made necessary by the command of the civil magistrate; and that then it was the bourned duty of all subjects to obey. But the Reformers maintained that what Christ had left indifferent no human laws ought to make necessary; and, besides, that such rites and ceremonies as had been abused to idolatry, and tended to lead men back to popery and superstition, were no longer indifferent, but were to be rejected as unlawful. Finally, the court party held that there must be a distinction between the ancient usages of the Church and the new. The king, the queen, and the Parliament, said they, were the supreme and the laws of the land. The Reformers regarded the Bible as the only standard, but thought compliance was due to the decrees of provincial and national synods, which might be approved and enforced by civil authority.

But these were not the opinions of the two parties; it is plain that, though the use of the ascendant vestments formed the rallying-point of the whole controversy, its foundation lay deeper than any mere outward forms. The queen gave strict orders to the archbishop of Canterbury that exact order and uniformity should be maintained in all external rites and ceremonies. Nay, so determined was she that her royal will should be obeyed that she issued a proclamation requiring immediate uniformity in the vestments on pain of prohibition from preaching and deprivation from office. Matters were now brought to a crisis by this decided step on the part of the queen. Multitudes of godly ministers were ejected from their churches and forbidden to preach anywhere else. Hitherto they had sought reformations within the Church, but now, their hopes from that quarter being wholly blasted, they came to the resolution in 1566 to form themselves into a body distinct from the Church of England, which they regarded as only half reformed.

Elizabeth was enraged to see her royal mandate so disregarded, and no longer the veneration of the multitude took strong ground, and, having separated from the Church as by law established, they published a treatise in their own vindication, boldly declaring that the imposition of mere human appointments, such as the wearing of particular vestments by the clergy, was a decided infringement on Christian liberty, and, being it was not only lawful but a duty to resist. In the face of persecution, and under threats of the royal displeasure, the Puritans, who, since the Act of Uniformity had been passed, in 1561, were sometimes called Nonconformists, continued without their priestly meetings. Their main attempt to engage in public worship was rudely interrupted by the officers of justice, and under color of law several were sent to prison and were afterwards tried. The party, however, continued to increase, and so infected were the younger students at Cambridge with the Puritan doctrines that the famous Thomas Cartwright, with three hundred more, threw off their surplices in one day within the walls of one college.

The religious condition of England at this time was truly deplorable. The Churchmen, says Swayne, in his History of the Church of England, explains that many benefited upon themselves, and resided upon none, neglecting their cures; many of them alienated their lands, made unreasonable leases and wastage of their woods, granted reverys and advowsons to their wives and children, or to others for their use. Churches ran greatly into dilapidations and decay, and were kept nasty and filthy, and in a large Church in the City of London there was little devotion. The Lord's day was greatly profaned and little observed. The common prayers were not frequented. Some lived without any service of God at all. Many were mere heathens and atheists. The queen's own court was a horror for epicures and atheists, and a kind of lawless place, because it stood in no parish. Which things made good men fear some sad judgments impending over the nation. To provide a remedy for the ignorance and inefficacy of the clergy, associations were established in different dioceses for the purpose of conducting "prophecyings," as they were called, or private expositions of difficult passages of Scripture. These meetings, however, excited the jealousy of the queen, who issued an order for their suppression. The Parliament seems to be somewhat disposed to mitigate the sufferings of the Puritans, and in 1572 two bills were passed having that object in view. Encouraged by this movement in their favor, they prepared a full statement of their grievances under the title of the "Articles of the Parliament," and in this document, which is understood to have been the production of Cartwright, the Parliament was urged to reform the church. Instead of obtaining redress, several of the leading Puritans were imprisoned and treated with great severity. The decided opposition of the queen led to the church reform in the Church finally led the Puritans to surrender all hope of any legislative act in favor of their views; and being most of them Presbyterians in principle, those of them resident in London and its neighborhood formed themselves into a presbytery, although the step thus taken called forth from the queen another proclamation enforcing uniformity.

In 1572, a Presbyterian Church was formed and a meeting-house erected at Wandsworth, in Surrey. Field, the lecturer of Wandsworth, was its first minister, and several names of consideration with the Puritans, including those of Travers and Wilcox, were among its founders. Presbyteries were formed in other parts of the kingdom, and numerous secret meetings were held in private houses, which gave more alarm to the government, or at least a stronger pretext for severity. Even moderate men began to express anxiety. To meet the danger, the High Court of Commission was now first put in motion. It empowered the queen and her successors, by their letters patent under the great seal, to authorize, or at least a master to prevent for safety. One of its first acts was the violent suppression of the Presbyterian meeting at Wandsworth; its subsequent labors were of the same character. Notwithstanding these severities, Puritanism continued to increase; for the persecution which does not exterminate a religion never fails to spread it. And while the cause was gaining strength in London, it was taking firm root in the great seats of learning.

The Puritans were now effectually separated from the Church of England, and were organized under a different form of Church polity. But the same attitude which they had thus assumed rendered them only the more obnoxious to the queen and the High-Church party. Stronger measures were accordingly adopted to discourage them and destroy their influence; many of them were silenced, imprisoned, banished, and "otherwise oppressed in every manner. In the latter part of 1585 an act passed prohibiting the publication of such books or pamphlets as assailed the opinions of the prelates and defended those of the Puritans. This was followed in the same session by another act authorizing the infliction tion of heavy fines and imprisonment upon those who absented themselves from "church, chapel, or other place where common prayer is said according to the Act of Uniformity."

The effect of these harsh and rigorous enactments was to embolden and more deeply minded. No longer limiting their complaints against the Established Church to merely outward rites and ceremonies, some of them even went so far as to renounce her communion, and to declare her as scarcely titled to the name of a Christian Church. Political discussion broke in upon religious inquiry. The hi-ernarchy was assailed, the Prayer-book vilified, and ministers who had been silenced for their irregularities were listened to, perhaps with the greater satisfaction because of their nonconformity, in the prophecyings.
The general religious condition of the country meanwhile suffered greatly. In many counties scarcely one preacher could be found. In some dioceses there were two or three; there was a general thirst for religious instruction, but the people, as the archbishop told the queen, were allowed to perish for lack of knowledge.

Grindal resolved to take the "prophesyings" under his own care, and at the same time to remove the causes of objection. He therefore forbade the introduction of politics, the speaking of laymen, or ministers suppressed, and the allusions, hitherto not unfrequent, to the property of the Church, and in addition to the office of a chairman lected by the societies, he placed the meetings for the future under the care of the archdeacon, or of some grave divine to be appointed by the bishop. Ten bishops heartily approved of the prime minister's decision, and encouraged the prophecyings in their dioceses. But the queen regarded them with great dislike, and the court resolved on their suppression. It was in vain the faithful prime minister remonstrated with the queen. "Alas!
madam, is the Scripture more plain in any one thing than that the Gospel of Christ should be plentifully preached and acted on, with all humility, and yet, plainly, to profess that I cannot with safe conscience, and without offence to the majesty of God, give my assent to the suppressing of the said exercises." In vain did the earl of Leicester and the lord-treasurer Burleigh, who presented the remonstrance, add the weight of their intercessions. The queen was enraged, and the prime minister, who was old and sick, was ordered to consider himself a prisoner in his own house, and would probably have been deprived of death if death had not stopped in him. He died July 6, 1568. Preaching fell into contempt, and the Church of England has never since entirely recovered from the blow. There has always since this event been a party in the Church which has regarded this divine ordinance with real or well-pleased contempt.

One of the leaders of the extreme section of the Puritan party was Robert Brown, who is thought to have been the founder of the Independent or Congregational Church in England. See BROWN. The greater number of the Puritans, however, were either Presbyterians, or still retained their connection with the Church of England. But in all circumstances they were the objects of the most bitter and unrelenting hostility on the part of Elizabeth. The tide of persever-cation ran high and strong. In vain did the House of Commons attempt to throw the shield of their protection over the poor oppressed Puritans; the queen was inexorable, and parliament was compelled to yield.

In this state of matters all hope of a legislative remedy was abandoned, and the Puritan ministers set themselves to devise plans for their own usefulness and efficiency. Many of them, however, when taken before many of the Puritans thus formed separate sects, a very large proportion of them still continued in the Church; and very subtle measures were taken by some of their leaders a few years later, under Cartwright's advice and direction, for the inoculation of the country with Presbyterian principles in such a manner as to avoid the forfeiture of their benefices. On May 8, 1569, sixty clergymen from the eastern counties met at Cockfield, in Suffolk, of which parish one of them—Knewstowe—was vicar (oddly enough, Cockfield is within a short distance of Hadleigh, where the earliest plans of the Trac-tarians were laid), to consult about the ordinary Puritan plans of a «collection, manifold forms of jurisdiction." etc. They adjourned to Cambridge, and from thence to London, "where they hoped to be concealed by the general resort of the people to Parliament." At length, under the guidance of Cartwright, the latter's enemies, the president of Travers, afterwards Hooker's opponent, and who was at the time domestic chaplain and tutor in the family of lord Burleigh, this convocation of Puritan clergy framed the following systematic plan for grafting their new system on that of the Church. The document is of sufficient importance to be given in full length:

"Concerning Ministers. — Let no man, though he be a university man, offer himself to the ministry; nor let any man take upon him an uncertain and vague miniistry, though it be offered unto him.

"But such as be called to the ministry by some certain Church societies, and whereby themselves are, or else unto some greater Church assembly and if such shall be found fit by them, then let them be appointed by their letters unalt by the bishop, that they may be ordained ministers by him.

"The articles of the Book of Common Prayer which, being taken from popery, are in part ought to be omitted and given over, if it may be done without doing wrong; but if being put from the place of their use, there be any imminent danger to be deprived, then this matter must be communicated to the Synod in which that Church is, by the judgment thereof it may be determined what ought to be done.

If any objection is made to the Articles of Religion and to the Book of Common Prayer shall be again urged, it is thought that the Book of Articles may be subscribed unto, according to the statutes 15 Eliz., c. 29, which are only as contain the sum of Christian faith and doctrine of the sacraments. But, for many weighty causes, neither this nor the Articles in that form may be subscribed unto. The Articles of Common Prayer may be allowed; so, though a man should subscribe thereunto, the Synod in which he is, by the judgment thereof it may be determined what ought to be done.

Concerning Churchwardens. — It seemeth that churchwardens and collectors for the poor might be thus ruled in their business:

"When they are to be chosen, let the Church have warning fifteen days before the time of elections, and the ordinances of the realm be placed; but especially of Christ's ordainance touching appointing of watchmen and overseers in his Church, who are to oversee this house of scandal do arise in the Church; and if any such happen, that by them it be only abolished.

Of Clerks of the Poor, or Deacons. — And touching deacons of both sorts viz., men and women the Church shall be ministering what is required by the apostle; and that the common deacons shall be chosen for the poor, or of riches, but for their faith, zeal, and integrity; and that a poor woman be not to pray in the meeting or be directed that they make choice of them that be meet.

Let the names of such as are chosen be published the next Lord's day, and thereafter their duties and functions, and the Church's towards them, shall be declared; then let them be received unto the ministry to which they are chosen with the general prayers of the whole Church.

Of Classes. — The brethren are to be requested to make a distribution of all churches, according to these rules that be set down in the Synodical Discipline, touching classical, provincial, continental, or such remembrances as are to the whole kingdom.

The Classes are to be required to keep acts of memorable matters as they are delivered to the com-tial assembly, that from thence they may be brought by the provincial assembly.

They are to deal earnestly with patience to present fit men whenever any Church is fallen void in that Class.

The comitial assemblies are to be admired to make collections for the relief of poor parochial scholars, but especially for the relief of such ministers here as are put to it; and also to subscribing to the articles rendered by the bishop; also for relief of Scottish ministers and others, and for other profitable and necessary uses.

All the members of the synods must consider, when meet to deliberate, in time to appoint the keeping of their next provincial synods, and for the sending of chosen persons with certain qualifications unto the next national synod, to be held whenever the Parliament for the kingdom shall be called.

A Book of Discipline was prepared for their direction in their pastoral work; and this document was Puritans, was continued; subscription to canons and articles was enforced with the utmost rigor, and those ministers who refused to subscribe were silenced or deposed. Thus insulted and oppressed, both by the government and their co-religionists, the Puritans felt it to be important that their true principles should be thoroughly understood by the people. With this view a treatise was published, entitled English Puritanism, which afforded a full and impartial statement of their peculiar opinions.

The extent to which James was disposed to push the royal prerogative was well fitted to awaken alarm both in the Parliament and the people. Both civil and religious liberty were evidently in danger, and Parliament prepared to interfere and to demand redress of grievances which were now becoming intolerable. "But the king," says Dr. Hetherington, "met all their remonstrances and petitions for redress with the most lofty assertions of his royal prerogative, in the exercise of which he held himself to be accountable to God alone, affirming it to be sedition in a subject to dispute what a king might do."

The Puritan party, however, were not silenced by the king’s action. The Parliament repeated the assertion of their own rights, accused the High Commission of illegal and tyrannical conduct, and advocated a more mild and merciful course of procedure towards the Puritans. Offended with the awakening spirit of freedom in England, the king, by the advice of Bancroft, dissolved the Parliament, resolved to govern, if possible, without parliaments in future. This arbitrary conduct on the part of James aroused, in the mind of England, a deep and vigilant jealousy with regard to his sovereign’s intentions, which rested not till, in the reign of his son, it broke forth in its strength and overflowed the monarchy.

Deprived of all hope of redress, numbers of the Puritans fled to the Continent, and some of them, having got there, never returned. The party which had as its stronghold the universities, returned to introduce that system of Church polity into England. Thus arose a body of Christians which e re long assumed a prominent place both in the religious and political history of the kingdom. The king, though a professed religiousist, was still more a politician; and so completely was the former character merged in the latter that he had come to rank as Puritans who dared to limit the royal prerogative or to uphold the rights and liberties of the people as established by law and the constitution of the country.

To the maintenance of which these Puritans contributed; the nation, however, was also the fostering of a novel theology in the Church, avowing his hostility to the Calvinistic views in which he had been reared in Scotland, and bestowing his favor upon those of the English clergy who were beginning to teach Arminian sentiments. The condition of the country, both in a political and religious aspect, was every day becoming more agitated, and matters were fast ripening for a great national convulsion, when the death of James, in 1625, and the accession of his son Charles I., arrested the revolutionary tendencies for a time. Additional cruelties, however, following soon after the Puritans under the new reign; fresh ceremonies of a thoroughly Romish character were introduced by Laud with the royal sanction; and, in consequence, numbers who refused to conform were obliged to seek refuge in other countries.

A few years before the new reign had commenced, a body of Puritans, unable longer to endure the persecution to which they were exposed, had emigrated to exile, seeking a new home on the western shores of the Atlantic, and had formed a settlement in New England, destined to be the foundation of a new empire. This colony of the Pilgrim fathers (q.v.) received vast accessions in consequence of the arbitrary measures of Laud. An association for promoting emigration to New England was formed on a large scale. Men of rank and influence and others had been long interested in promoting the emigration, and a grant of land from the government was applied for. The king was not opposed to the design, and a patent was obtained for the government and company of Massachusetts Bay. Emigrants to the number of 200 set sail, and, landing at Salem in 1629, established a new colony there. Next year 1500 left the shores of England, including many both of wealth and education. The desire for emigration on the part of the oppressed Puritans continued to gather as much strength, and year after year larger numbers of them proceeded to New England. Neal alleged that had not the civil power interfered to check the rage for emigration, in a few years one-fourth part of the property of the kingdom would have been taken to New England. The government then alarmed, and a proclamation was issued "to restrain the disorderly transporting of his majesty's subjects, because of the many idle and refractory humors, whose only or principal end is to live beyond the reach of authority." Next day an order appeared to "stay eight ships now in the river of Thames prepared to go for New England," and the passengers, among whom was Oliver Cromwell, were obliged to disembark. Notwithstanding the check thus given to emigration, it is calculated that during twelve years the emigrants amounted to no less than 24,210 persons.

The tyrannical conduct of Charles and his minions, both in the government and the Church, soon precipitated the country into all the horrors of a civil war, which ended in the death of the king by the axe of the executioner, and in the establishment of the Commonwealth under the protectorate of Cromwell. By the act of Sept. 10, 1642, it was declared that prelacy should be abolished in England from and after Nov. 5, 1643, and it was resolved to summon together an assembly of divines in order to complete the necessary reformation. In the meantime, various enactments were passed for the suppression of some of the most crying evils, and for affording some support to those Puritan ministers who had been ejected in former times for nonconformity, or had recently suffered from the ravages of the king's army. It was a religious age; and though the people had trampled the crown beneath their feet, they showed no disposition to deprive the office of the clergy. During the heat of the war the Puritans, who almost to a man sided with the Parliament, preached to large congregations; and, in all the great towns at least, they had the implicit ear of the people. Episcopacy being at an end, they acted, for a while, according to the dictates of conscience or mere taste; the surplice was generally laid aside; and extemporary prayer was used in the parishes before the ordination of Parliament. The Independents, appearing, in 1645, forbidding the Book of Common Prayer. The old Puritanism, however, was now passing away. A generation had arisen in whose eyes the principles of Cartwright were crude and imperfect. They no longer contended against the forms and vestments, but against the constitution of the Church of England. Prelacy, by which we understand the episcopacy titled and associated with civil authority, was detested; all forms of prayer were decried; and episcopacy, even in its mildest forms, was thought unscriptural. Thus Puritanism, properly so called, became extinct because the grounds of the old contention no longer existed. The later Puritans appeared and immediately fell into two great parties, Presbyterians (q. v.); and Independents (q. v.). For nine months after the passing of the act for the abolition of prelacy there was no settled and legalised form of Church government in England at all. Even Charles had consented to the removal of the bishops from the House of Lords; and though he had not sanctioned the abolition of the hierarchy, yet a large party regarded the measure as called for in the circumstances. In the state of matters the Westminster Assembly of Divines was convened, consisting largely of Puritan preachers who had gradually become attached to Presbyterianism. The Independent or Congregational party in the Assembly, however, though few in point of number, yet had sufficient numbers to prevent any statute from being established in England. Throughout the early years of the Commonwealth Puritanism existed in the form chiefly of Independency. On Dec. 25, 1655, Cromwell issued a proclamation that thenceforth no minister of the Church of England should dare to preach, administer the sacraments, or perform any other office of the Church on pain of imprisonment or exile. After the Restoration of Charles II, in 1662, the name of Puritan was changed into that of Nonconformist, which comprehended all who refused to observe the rites and subscribe to the doctrines of the Church of England. The Church was nominally re-established; but the power of the Church was nominally re-established; but the power of the Church was suspended. By this act nearly 2000 ministers of the Church of England were ejected from their charges and thrown into the ranks of the Nonconformists (q. v.).

It may be proper to mention, in conclusion, the doctrinal Puritans. These formed, in fact, the moderate church party during the reign of Charles I. Their leaders were bishops Davenport, Hall, Williams, and Carleton. The title of doctrinal Puritans was fastened upon them by the Laudian party. They held and taught the doctrines of the Reformation, in opposition to the dangerous tendencies of the Church of England, and were called by that name. They entertained no scruples as to the forms and ceremonies of the Church of England, to which they willingly conformed. But they rejected with indignation the innovations of the Laudian party, who, in their return, branded them with the name of Puritans. It was an entirely new application of the word, and one against which they did not fail to protest. It seems to have been first used about 1625 by bishop Montague in a controversy with Carleton, and the latter exclaims, "This is the first time that I ever heard of a Puritan doctrine so practical, and I have lived longer in the Church than he hath done. I thought that Puritans were only such as were factious against the bishops, in the point of pretended discipline; and so I am sure it hath been understood in our Church." The controversies which have ever since existed within the bosom of the Church of England now for the first time appeared. The construction of the baptismal offices became a subject of contention, and the whole question of baptismal and sacramental grace. The doctrinal Puritans adhered to the ancient forms of worship, and for doing so were severely harass ed. The Laudian party maintained "that whatever rites were practiced in the Church of Rome, and not expressly abolished at the Reformation, nor disclaimed by any doctrine, law, or canon, were consistent with the Church of England," and the Church of England was re-established. It introduced a multitude of ceremonies—such, for instance, as bowing to the east and placing candles on the altar, now gorgeously decorated once more—which had long been dismissed as badges of popery. Thus in a short time a difference was apparent between the two parties both in their doctrine teaching and in visible forms. To complete the quarrel, the Laudians were of the Arminian school, while the doctrinal Puritans were moderate Calvinists. For twenty years the doctrinal Puritans were subjected to all manner of annoyance; but they remained steadfast in their attachment to the Church, and when the storm burst upon it they were exposed to all its fury. They took no share in Laud's convocation of 1640, and greatly disapproved of its arbitrary measures. But the popular rage made no distinctions, and the Church of England suffered just as much as their old opponents of the high prelatic party. The Church itself was overthrown; and in the darkness and confusion that ensued they disappear from sight during the civil war. The literature of the Puritans, as a religious party, is vast. There were those who devoted themselves to the study of theology, in the consistencies of practical theology. The medium and in all of its is conferred by friendship and foe. As Whitgift and his disciple Hooker exhausted the argument in favor of episcopacy and a liturgical Church, so did Cartwright and Travers that in behalf of Presbyterian discipline. The student, after a wide search among the combatants of later times, finds, to his surprise, how insignificant are all their additions to a controversy opened, and, as far as learning and argument can go, finally to the by-ways the names of the greatest men of the reigns of James, Charles I, and the Commonwealth present themselves as in a greater or less degree connected with the Puritans. Selden, Whitchurch, Milton, with their pens; Rydcard, Hampden, Vane, in Parliament; Owen, Marshall, Calamy, Baxter, and a host of others, in the pulpit; Cromwell, Essex, and Fairfax, in the field—all ranged themselves under the Puritan cause. Never was a party more distinguished in its advocates; never was a cause lost amid more hopeful prospects, or when to human eyes its triumphs appeared most complete, than in 1660 it was in the summit of its pride and power, with the Church of England at its feet. Ten years afterwards its influence had passed away; and, in the persons of the Presbyterians who crossed over to propitiate the young king at Breda, it was thought advisable to place, not a leader, but men like,

PURPLE

Purples, purple, argaman, from the Sanscrit raga, red; see Grec. Thea, a. v.; Chald. argesin, from the same root, in 2 Chron. ii. 7; Dan. vii. 16, 29; Sept. and Greek Test. πασσία, Vulg. purpura) occurs in Exod. xxv, 4; xxxvi, 1, 31, 86; xxvii, 16; xxviii, 5, 6, 8, 16, 33; xxxv, 6, 20, 25; xxxvi, 8, 10, 13; xxxix, 18, 24, 29; Numb. xiv, 13; Judg. viii, 26; 2 Chron. ii. 13; iii, 11, 14; Esth. i, 6; vii, 9; Prov. xxxi, 22; Cant. iii, 10; vii, 5; Jer. x, 9; Ezek. xxvii, 7, 16, Ecles. xiv, 10; Bar. vii, 9, 12; 1 Macc. ii. 35; viii, 14, x, 29, 62; 2 Macc. ii. 38; Mark xiv, 17, 20; Luke xvi, 19, John xiv, 2; Acts vi, 4; Rev. xvii, 1; xviii, 12, 16.

In many of these passages the word translated “purple” means “purple cloth,” or some other material dyed purple, as wool, thread, etc.; but no reference occurs to the means by which the dye was obtained, except in I Kings vii. 2. We have the same Hebrew word, תֵּא, translated “purple of the sea” (comp. Diod. Sic. iii, 68; Josephus, Warr. v, 5, 4). There is, however, no reason to doubt that it was obtained, like the far-famed Tyrian purple, from the juice of certain species of shell-fish. Different accounts are given by the ancients respecting the date and origin of this invention. Some place it in the reign of Phenix, second king of Tyre, B.C. 500; others at the time that Minos I reigned in Crete, B.C. 1489, and consequently before the Exodus (Suidas, a. v., ῥυαῖς, ii, 75). But the person to whom the invention is ascribed by the Tyrians, Herodotus, says that it was invented by the Phenicians, when a dog, it is said, instigated by hunger, broke a certain kind of shell-fish on the coast of Tyre, and his mouth becoming stained of a beautiful color, his master was induced to try its properties on wool, and gave his flocks and herds of sheep and goats a taste of this coloring-juice so much that he restricted the use of it by law to the royal garments (Pollux, Onom. i, 4; Achilles Tatius, De Clitoph.; Pausanias, in Chron. Pashcal. p. 43). It is remarkable that though the Israelites, as early as the first construction of the tabernacle in the wilderness, appear to have had purple stuff in profusion (Exod. xxv, 1-4), they which had most likely brought with them out of Egypt, yet no instance occurs in the pictorial language of the Egyptians, nor in Wilkinson's Ancient Monuments and Customs, of the actual process of dyeing either linen or woollen, although dyes similar to the Tyrian were found among them. These facts agree, at least, with the accounts which ascribe the invention to the earliest of these two periods, and the pre-eminent trade in it to the Tyrians. The Greeks attributed its first introduction among them to the Phenicians (Paus. iv, 32. 3), and in the wars of Phoenicia with Tyre (Paus. iv, 1497). Their word φοινίξ, Phenix, means both Pheniciun and purple. The word πασσία is, according to Martinus, of Tyrian origin. Though purple dyes were by no means confined to the Phenicians (comp. Ezek. xi, 23, 24: "the house from the house of Eliah," supposed to mean "Elisha," and "from Syria," ver. 10); yet violet purples and scarlet were nowhere dyed so well as at Tyre, whose shores abounded with the best kind of purples (Pliny, Hist. Nat. ix, 60, p. 524, ed. Harduin), and which was supplied with the best wool by the neighboring Shepherds. The ancients, and its various shades, were obtained from many kinds of shell-fish, all of which are, however, ranged by Pliny under two classes: one called "buccinum," because shaped like a horn, found, he says, in Lampsacus and the yielding a sullen blue dye, which he compares to the colour of a horn in a tempest; the other called "purpurea," or "pelagia," the proper purple shell, taken by fishing in the sea, and yielding the deep-red color which he compares to the rich, fresh, and bright color of deep-red purple roses and to congealed blood, and which was chiefly valued (ibid. c. 61, 62). The latter is the Muræus trunculus of Linnaeus and Lamarck (see Syst. Nat. p. 1215, and A. in leugre saxa Vertebr. [Paris, 1822], vii, 170). Both sorts were supposed to be as many years old as they had spiral rounds. Michaelis thinks that Solomon alludes to their shape when he says (Cant. vii, 5). "The hair of thine head is like purple," meaning that the streams (Sept. πλάκαν κυμάσει, Vulg. como cupida) were tied up in a spiral or pyramidal form on the top. Others say that the word "purple" is here used like the Latin purpurina, or the Greek purpureus, to denote a "purple color," "a beautiful swan's" of Horace (Carmin. iv, 1, 10), and the "purpureus capillus" of Virgil (Georg. i, 405); but these phrases are not parallel. The juice of the whole shell-fish was not used, but only a little this liquor called the "downy substance" in the tinctor vessel in the neck. The larger purples were broken at the top to get at this vein without injuring it, but the smaller were pressed in mills (Aristot. Hist. An. v, 15, 75; Pliny, Hist. Nat. ix, 60). The Muræus trunculus has been demonstrated to be the species used by the ancients. The shells of the Muræus trunculus, and of the shells in some of the ancient dye-pots sunk in the rocks of Tyre (Narrative [Dublin, 1840], i, 482). It is of common occurrence now on the same coasts (Kirke, Physical History of Palestine, p. 418), and throughout the whole of the Mediterranean, and even of the Atlantic. In the Mediterranean, the countries most celebrated for purples were the shores of Peloponnesus and Sicily, and in the Atlantic the coasts of Britain, Ireland, and France. Horace alludes to the African (Carmin. ii, 16, 36). There is, indeed, an essential difference between the purple of the Tyrians and that of different coasts. Thus the shells from the Atlantic are said to give the darkest juice; those of the Italian and Sicilian coasts, a violet or purple; and those of the Phenician, a crimson. It appears from the experiments of Pliny, and that this coloring-juice is perfectly white while in the vein; but when being laid on linen, it soon appears first of a light-green color, and, if exposed to the air and sun, soon after changes into a deep green, in a few minutes into a sea-green, and in a few more into a blue; thence it speedily becomes of a purplish color, and in an hour more of a deep purple red, which, upon being washed in scalding water and soap, ripens into a most bright and beautiful crimson, which is permanent. The ancients applied the word translated "purple" not to one color only, but to the whole class of dyes manufactured from the juices of shell-fish, as distinguished from the vegetable dyes (coloreras herbes), and comprehending not only what is commonly called purple, but also light and dark purple, and almost every shade between. Various methods were adopted to produce these different colors. Thus, a salt-solution was obtained from the juice of the buccinum alone; a plain red, yet also deep and brown, from the pelagia; a dark red by dipping the wool, etc., first in the juice of the purpura, and then in that of the buccinum; a violet (which was the same as the thistled color, and obtained by the dyer) by working the process; and another, called a rose variegated and admire of all—the tyriamethystus—by again dipping the amethyst in the juice of the pelagia. This Pliny calls amphaka Trysis; so named, he says, because “its tincta” (Hist. Nat. ix, 39). No reference to this process occurs in the Scriptures, but it is oftenalluded to in Roman authors. Thus, Horace (Epod. xii, 21): “Mu rarum Tyri Rhodum pelagias haud.” Other varieties of shellfish (Malus is the ancient name for the Tyrian purple double dyed). Other varieties of color may have been produced by the use of various species of mollusks, and of those from different coasts. The Phoenicians also understood the art of throwing a peculiar lustre into this color by making other tints play over it, and producing what we call a shot color with the Tyrian purple double dyed). Other varieties of color may have been produced by the use of various species of mollusks, and of those from different coasts. The Phoenicians also understood the art of throwing a peculiar lustre into this color by making other tints play over it, and producing what we call a shot color with the Tyrian purple double dyed). Pliny records a similar use of it among the Jews: “Diis sacrificii placidantibus” (Hist. Nat. ix, 60; Cicero, Epist. ad Atticum, ii, 9). The Babylonians arrayed their idols in it (Jer. x, 9; Bar. xii, 72). Homer speaks of it if it were almost peculiar to them (II. iv, 144; 1 Macc. vii, 14). Pliny says it was used by Romanus and the succeeding kings of Rome, and by the consuls and first magistrates under the republic. Strabo relates that Julius Caesar prohibited its use by Roman subjects, except on certain days; and that Nero forbade it altogether, upon pain of death. The use of it was bestowed by kings upon favorites, etc.; Josephus says it was used by Pharaoh on Joseph (Ant. ii, 5, 7). It was given by Ahasuerus to Mordecai (Esth. viii, 15); to Daniel by Belshazzar (Dan. vii, 16, 29). It was the dress of an ethnarch or prince, and as such given by Alexander to Jonathan (1 Macc. x, 20, 62, 64, 65; comp. 2 Macc. iv, 38). In the last chapter of the Proverbs it is represented as the dress of a matron (Prov. xi, 4), and used by the ancient ladies and rich men (Livy, xxxiv, 7, and Valerius Max. ii, 1). See also the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvi, 19). In Esth. i, 6, it appears as part of the royal furniture of Ahasuerus; and in Cant. iii, 10, as the covering of the royal chariot; and Pliny refers to its general use, not only for clothes, but carpets, cushions, etc. (ix, 39). The robe in which the Pretorian guard arrayed the Saviour, called χαλκός κοσκίνη by Matthew (xxvii, 28), and πορφύρα by Mark (xv, 17, 20), and ἀφρατόν πορφυρον by John (xix, 2), and which appears to have been the cast-off garment of one of their officers, was no doubt scarlet—that is, proper crimson, as will hereafter appear—of a deeper hue and finer texture than the sanguin or chalmys of the common soldier, but inferior in both respects to that of the emperor, which was also of this color in the time of war, though purple during peace. The adjectives used by the evangelists are, however, often interchanged. Thus a vest, which Horace (Sat. ii, 6, 102) calls “rubro coccio cincta,” in l, 106 he styles “purpurea.” Brau nius shows that the Romans gave this name to any color which he found dyeing the Sueri or Sueri musum (Hist. Nat. 1680), i, 14). Ovid applies the term “purpureas” to the cheeks and lips (Amor, i, 3). In Aesch. x, 14, reference is found to Lydia, of the city of Thyatira, a seller of purple cloth. The manufacture seems to have decayed with its native city. A col ony of Jews which was established at Thebes in Greece in the 12th century carried on an extensive manufac tory for dyeing purple. It ultimately became superceded by the use of indigo, cochineal, etc., whence a cheaper and finer purple was obtained, and free from the disagreeable odor which attended that derived from shellfish. (Max. 59, 39). With the ancients in preparing and applying it, and other particu lars respecting its history, uses, and estimation, are most amply detailed by Pliny (Hist. Nat. ix, 36-42). The best modern books are Amati, De Restitutio Purpurarum (Rome, 1784); the compilation by Ca pelli, De Authigia et Nepure Purpurea, with notes by and Don Michaele Ross, Dissertatione delle Porpere, etc. (1768). for a whole summer to the solar rays in a south window, they almost vanished. The application of alkali to the acidulated color always restores it to its primitive state, and it is as readily changed again by mineral acid (Montagu, Tectcuts Brit. Supp., p. 192). The circumstance that the fluid diffused by Jambhina and Scularia is purple from the first is conclusive against its being the purple dye of the ancients, who tell us distinctly that this was white or cream-like while within the vein. This agrees accurately with the genera Murex and Purpuraria, as may be readily tested in the case of P. lapillus, the common dog-whelk of the British coast. Montagu thus records the result of his experiments on this species: "The part containing the coloring-matter is a slender longitudinal vein, just under the skin on the back, behind the head, appearing whiter than the rest of the animal. The fluid itself is of the color and consistency of cream. As soon as it is exposed to the air it becomes of a bright yellow, speedily turns to a pale green, and continues to change imperceptibly, until it assumes a bluish cast, and then a purplish red. Without the influence of the solar rays, it will go through all these changes in the course of two or three hours; but the process is much accelerated by exposure to the sun. A portion of the fluid, mixed with diluted vitiolic acid, did not at first appear to have been sensibly affected; but, by more intimately mixing it in the sun, it became of a pale purple, or purplish red, without any of the intermediate changes. Several marks were now made on fine calico, in order to try if it were possible to discharge the color by such chemical means as were at hand; and it was found that after the color was fixed at its last natural change, nitrous no more than vitriolic acid had any other effect than that of rather brightening it; aqua regia, with or without solution of tin, and marine acid, produced no change; nor had fixed or volatile alkali any sensible effect. It does not in the least give out its color to alcohol, like cochineal, and the succus of the animal of Turbo (Scularia) clathrus; but it communicates its very disagreeable odor to it most copiously, so that opening the bottle has been more powerful in its effects on the olfactory nerves than the effluvia of asafoetida, to which it may be compared. All the markings which had been alkali and acidulated, together with those to which nothing had been applied, became, after washing in soap and water, of a uniform color rather brighter than before, and were fixed at a fine unchangeable crimson" (Test. Brit. Supp., p. 106). The changes of color are absolutely dependent on the stimulus of light. Dr. Bancroft found that linen stained with the fluid of the Purpuraria might be kept for years shut between the leaves of a book without any visible change, which at the expiration of its incarceration presently passed through all the changes, under the influence of light, to a glowing purple (in Perinn. Col. i. 145). Reaumur asserts that the immature egg-capsules of the same mollusk will yield the dye more abundantly, and with more facility, than the animal itself (Hist. Acad. Sci. 1711). It would appear as if the knowledge of this art had never been lost, but had been perpetuated even in Great Britain from the classical ages. Bede, in the 8th century, alludes to it familiarly; and with admiration of the brilliancy and permanence of the hue (Hist. Eccles. Ang. i. 1); and Richard of Glastonbury speaks of it in the 14th (Deacr. of Brit., p. 26). About the same time the following description was given in a translation of Higelin's Polykronicon: "Ther is alse of sheel that we dyesh with ynce reede. The redness thef of is wondre fayre and stable and steyneth neyvr with colhe ne with hete ne with drie but ever the eldere the hue is fayvere" (Of Bretagne, i. 88). Three hundred years later the art was practiced for profit by persons on the coast of Ireland, who guarded it as an heirloom secret. Cole, however, found that the Purpuraria lapillus was the shell employed. See Bible Educator, iii, 327 sq.; iv, 217; and comp. Color.

N. J, and Γ of the Gospel), a beautiful uncial MS. of the Greek Gospel, of which only twelve leaves remain: four of these (containing Matt. xxi. 57-65; xxvii. 26-34; John xiv. 2-10; xv. 15-22) are in the Cotton Library (Codex Cottonianus, the "J" of Wetstein) of the British Museum; two (containing Luke xiv. 18-21, and 29-39) are in the British Library at Vienna ("N" of Wetstein and others); and six (containing Matt. xix. 6-13; xx. 6-22; xx. 29-31) are in the Vatican Library at Rome (called "Γ" by Scholla). These are written in silver letters (now turned black), occasionally in gold letters, on purple vellum, in a large rounded hand, and in two columns, with the Ammonian sections and Eusebian canons in the margin. The date is of the end of the 6th or the beginning of the 7th century. Some of the fragments were collated in part by Wetstein and Scholla, and the whole was published by the late Archbishop of York, in his Monumenta Sacra Inedita (Lips. 1846). Purpose of God. The word purpose is commonly used and preferred to the word decree when God's determination regarding man's salvation is referred to. The word purpose owes its use to the fact that it is more comprehensive and expresses the idea of intelligent design, and therefore more clearly and with less of prejudice sets forth the true scope of the divine government. Purse (δημιοσ, kis, Prov. i. 14; "bag" for money). Isa. xlii. 6, or for weights, Deut. xxv. 18; Prov. xvii. 11; Mic. vii. 11; 6, but箱子, Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8, is the "girdle, as elsewhere rendered." The Hebrews, when on a journey, were provided with a bag, in which they carried their money (Gen. xiii. 35; Prov. i. 14; vii. 20; Isa. xlii. 6), and if they were merchants, also their weights (Deut. xxv. 13; Mic. vii. 11). Purva, one of the four main divisions of the Vedas. The Purva-brâhmana (as above) ; νοον, τετραγωνος; and διπλωμα, charit. The last occurs only in 2 Kings v. 23 ("bags"); Isa. iii. 22 (A. V. 'crespingpins'). The latter is supposed to refer to the long, round form of the purse. The money-bag is described in the New Test. by the terms παλασίον (as above), peculiar to Luke x. 4; xlii. 33; xlii. 35, 36), and γλαυκόσκορπον (peculiar to John xii. 6; xlii. 29). The former is the Latin term (Plato, Comen. xlii. 190, c. στεφάνιστα (παλασίον); the latter is connected with the classical γλαυκοσκορπίον, which originally meant the bag in which musicians carried the mouthpieces of their instruments. In the Sept. the term is applied to the chest for the offerings (2 Chron. xxiv. 8, 10, 11), and was hence adopted by John to describe the common purse carried by the disciples. The girdle also served as a purse, and hence the term γυνε- occurs in Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8. See Girdle. Ladies wore ornamental purses (Isa. ii. 23). The Rahabnits bore one of these in passing through the Temple with stick, shoes, and purse, these three being the indications of travelling (Mishna, Berachoth, 9, § 5). See Bag: Money.

Purtenance (ζηνεν, κερεδ, мohet, or inner part) stands improperly in one passage of the A. V. (Exod. xii. 9) for the sicerer, or "inwards" (as elsewhere rendered) any one passing as relation to eternity to the ordained victim.

Pun, in Hindu mythology, was the son of Jajata and of Devajani, the daughter of a Brahmin. He was the boldest warrior in the army of the Devas during their struggles against the daemons and giants: he distinguished himself by the terrible use he knew how to make of his war-hatchet. There was another Puru-, the first king of India from the family of the Children of the Moon: his father, Buddha, was the son of the Moon. He is the forefather of the whole dynasty of the Children of the Moon, who were all celebrated rulers, and seemed to have founded on the upper Ganges an eternal empire. The kings of Paurava, Purva, Purva, etc., belonged to this family, in which Krishna was born several times.

Purva, in Hindó mythology, was the name of the first man created, the Adam of the Indians. The name of his wife was Pargute. See Puru.

Purver, Anthony, a Quaker preacher of great note for his remarkable literary attainments, especially his exegetical knowledge, was born at Upwood, in Huntingdonshire, in 17th, about 1702. He was originally apprenticed to a shoemaker, but later he was employed in keeping sheep. Though his early education was very limited, his capacity and inclination for the acquisition of learning were very great. He found leisure for study, and his curiosity being excited by the perusal of a tract in which some inaccuracies of the A. V. were pointed out, he determined to study the original languages of the Scriptures. He secured the assistance of a Jew in the acquisition of Hebrew, Chaldee, etc., and other aid for learning Greek and Latin. He became a member of Friends, and preached among them. While laboring as a schoolmaster at Andover, he occupied himself in preparing a new version of the Scriptures; and this, after spending more than thirty years over it, he published by the aid of Dr. Fothergill, who gave him £1000, and carried it through the press at his own expense. It appeared in 1764, entitled A New Translation of the Old and New Testaments, with Notes, Critical and Explanatory, in two volumes folio, beautifully got up. Notwithstanding the enormous labor bestowed upon it by its author, and though it is now and then a better rendering to be found in it than in the A. V., Purver's translation, as a whole, is not of much critical value. The style is crude and bombastic, the very reverse of what might have been expected from a member of the society whose language is so simple; while the notes, though containing much valuable matter, while the notes, though containing much valuable matter, and in contemptuous expressions about the labors of others in the same department. Purver's Bible is therefore deservedly scarce. He died in 1777. See Orme, Biblioth. Bibl. s. v.; Ritto, Bible Dict. s. v.; Alli- bone, Dict. of Rel. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. H. W.)

Purver, John, the friend and fellow-laborer of Wycliffe, with whom he lived in his latter years. His denunciations of the errors of the Roman Church, as well as his endeavors to make the Bible accessible to the people at large by translating it into English, drew upon him the severest penalties which it was in the power of the hierarchy to inflict. He was forbidden, by a mandate of the bishop of Bristol, dated August, 1387, to preach in the diocese where he officiated after the death of Wycliffe; his books were declared to be erroneous and heretical, and were among those which the bishops of Worcester, Salisbury, and Hereford were author-the assistance of several fellow-laborers he (1) corrected the Latin text by comparison of Bibles, doctors, and glosses; (2) studied the text thus corrected with the gloss and other authorities, particularly De Lyra on the Old Testament; (3) made special reference to the works of the Fathers and the glosses for the meaning of difficult words and passages; and (4) did not translate literally, but according to the sense and meaning as clearly as he could, taking care to have many persons of ability present at the correction of the translation. He inserted numerous textual glosses in the Old Testament and in a large number of passages in the New Testament. He published his translation, but made no such insertions in the New Testament, and carefully excluded all the glosses which were introduced into the former version. That he improved upon Wycliffe's translation is beyond doubt, as may be seen from a comparison of the following passages in the respective versions: Gen. ix. 13; Exod. xxiii. 2; Deut. xxxii. 2; xxxiii. 7; Josh. x. 15; vi. 25; Job x. 1; xi. 12; xiv. 12; Matt. xii. 5; xiii. 52; 1 Cor. iii. 13-15; which are pointed out by the erudite editors, the Rev. Joseph Forshall and Sir Frederic Madden, who for the first time published this early English version, together with Wycliffe's translation, in an entire form, in parallel columns, 4 vols. 4to, Oxford University Press, 1850. Purvey's translation of the New Testament was first published by Lewis (Lond. 1871, fol.) as Wycliffe's translation; it was then superseded by the work of Baber (Lond. 1820, 4to), and by Bagster in the English Hexapla. Comp. Foxe's The Acts and Monuments, Towns-end's (Lond. 1844), iii. 285, 292, 822, 823; and the elaborate preface by Forshall and Madden to their edition of Wycliffe's and Purvey's translation of the Bible.

Purseveyor. This word is not found in the A.V. although it would perhaps represent the meaning of the Heb. צָלַל, צָלָל, in 1 Kings iv, 5, 7, rather than the word כָּלַע, כָּלָע, of the similar "officer" of our version. The Hebrew word, however, is the Niphal (passive) participle of the word צָלַל, צָלָל, to put or station, and is literally translated by the Greek, which has the same meaning, the appointed. Solomon divided his kingdom into twelve parts, and these men were placed one over each province, to procure provisions for the king's household. Thus he was enabled to entertain foreigners, and to support a vast number of wives, servants, and attendants (Patrick, Comment, ad loc.). The number twelve refers, not to the tribes, but the months of the year, each being required to furnish the provisions for the king's household. These collections probably corresponded to tax-gathering among the moderns. Patrick thinks the officers were merely purchasers; but Kitto regards this as an error (Kitto, Pict. Bible, ad loc.). Rosemulliner calls these officers head collectors of taxes (Alt. u. a. Morcagend, iii. 160), and Ewald thinks they were stewards of the royal domains; but Theophyl (Ezra, Handb, ad loc.) holds that they were officers of higher rank, of whose duties the supply of the royal table formed only a part. Josephus calls them מַעֲמוֹן (Ant. viii, 2, 4). See PALESTINE; SOLOMON.

Puseyism is one of the names by which the ritualistic movement of the Church of England and her offspring is sometimes designated, but it is properly descriptive only of the followers of the much-celebrated Oxford professor in theology, the Rev. Dr. E. B. Pusey. Though he was by no means alone in originating the movement to which his name has been given, the Puseyites now form a very different class from that which organized and kept alive what is known as the Tractarian movement, and of which we have treated in the art. OXFORD TRACTS (q. v.).

The Tractarians advocated the acceptance by the Church of England of the doctrines of the Churchits return to apostolical succession, Priestly Absolution, Baptismal Regeneration, the Real Presence, the Authority of the Church, and of Tradition. "Scripture and tradition," says one of the Tractarians, "taken together, are the joint rule of faith" (No. 78, p. 2, English ed.). "Conscient "patristical tradition," says Keble in his Sermons, "is the record of that oral teaching of the apostles which the Holy Spirit has impressed upon the Church." These Tractarians held that the New Testament is an infallible interpretation of Scripture and test of doctrinal truth, they understood the voice of Catholic antiquity, or the voice of the theologians of the Nicene age, of the 4th century; and yet as far as the majority of the Church is concerned, this is a doctrine of Arian heresy. For example, Frod Sho. says, "You find the principles about Scripture being the sole rule in fundamentals, I nauseate the word" (i, 413). Thus, having broken away from the corner-stone of Protestantism, it was easy for them to accept the Roman view of the sacraments (q. v.), restoring also the old Roman number of seven (Tract 90), and affirming with the Church of Rome that "the sacraments, and not preaching, are the sources of divine grace," says Mr. Dennison, "I understand the Tractarian doctrine of the sacraments to be this:

1. That man is 'made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven,' in and by baptism.

2. That he is 'made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven,' in and by baptism, is renewed from time to time in holy communion.

3. That a 'death unto sin and a new birth unto righteousness' are communicated to every adult Christian, in and by the outward visible sign or form of baptism, in water in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.'

4. That the gift may be received, in the case of adults, worthily or unworthily, but that it is always received.

5. That the body and blood of Christ, as given to every one who receives the sacramental bread and wine.

6. That the gift may be received, worthily or unworthily, but that it is always received.

Antiquity," wrote the author of Tract 90, "continually affirms a change in the sacred elements" (p. 78). Palmer, in his Letter to a Protestant Catholic, declared that "the bread and wine are changed by the consecration of the priest and the operation of the Holy Ghost, and become the very body and blood of our Lord." (p. 50). "The table is properly an altar," said their organ, the British Critic, "and altar presume a propitiatory sacrifice" (July, 1841, p. 24). With such views of the sacraments, evangelical views on regeneration were impossible for the Tractarians, and there need be no surprise that they stigmatized the grand Protestant doctrine of justification by faith alone as a "Lutheran heresy." Whether any one heresy," says the Critic, "has ever infested the Church so hateful and unchristian as this doctrine [of justification], it is perhaps not necessary to determine: none certainly has ever prevailed so subtle and extensively poisonous. We must plainly express our conviction that a religious heathen, were he really to accept the doctrine which Lutheran language expresses, so far from making any advance, would sustain a heavy loss in exchanging fundamental truth for fundamental error" (No. Ixvii, p. 391). Again, speaking of the Tractarian party, this open confession is made: "We cannot stand where we are; we must go back as far as possible, and it will surely be the latter. As we go on, we must be more and more from the Church, if any such there be, of the English Reformation" (No. Ixix, p. 45). "The Reformation," says Frod Sho. (i, 433), "was a limb badly set; it must be broken again, in order to be righted." "Utterly reject and anathematize the principle of the Reformation, and with all its forms, sects, and denominations," says Palmer (Letter to Godly, p. 9).

* This reference is undoubtedly correct, and as Christ is not sacrificed in Protestant churches, the table on which the sacramental elements are placed ought not to be termed an altar, but be regarded as an altar to the spirit of Protestantism; and as the thing was wisely discarded by the Reformers, the name also should be dropped.
The Tractarian movement terminated with Newman's secession to Rome, but its effect remains in several buildings both of the Church of England and of the High-Church party, which still maintains, to a great extent, the principles advocated in the Tracts; the introduction of various alterations in the mode of performing divine service, such as the use of the surplice instead of the gown, uniting the prayers and singing the responses, the elevation of the communion-table into an altar, the substitution of low, open benches for high pews; a remarkable impulse given to the building and restoration of churches, and the revival of Gothic architecture in all parts of England; the secession of many Episcopal churches from the Church of England; the introduction of Sacramentalism; the supreme ability and distinction, to the Church of Rome; and the establishment of colleges and sisterhoods, and other religious and charitable institutions, under Episcopalian auspices.

Dr. Pusey himself, in his earlier years, inclined to that Protestant view of Christianity according to which all things and ceremonies acting on the senses must be removed from the Church (see his Rise and Decline of Rationalism in Germany). But he gradually turned away from that system in which the heart and soul are supposed to be primarily controlled by logical ideas, and came to accept another which is dependent upon the outward actions of the body — one which abounds in observances, reaching the heart through the medium of the senses, and encouraging a habit of devotion. This change in Pusey's ideas was attributed to the influence of his friend, John Henry Newman, and in the year 1833 Pusey accepted the confession of faith and practice drawn up by Newman. The publication of writings called Tracts for the Times was in 1841 interdicted by the bishop of Oxford, but the ninety-three that appeared published gave a clear insight into the new religious tendencies. Newman, Pusey, and their friends wished no fusion with the Roman Church, some of the tenets of which filled them with actual horror; but they tried to introduce into the English Church, the origin of which they did not approve and the decay of which they acknowledged, such doctrines as the Romish Church has distinctively preserved. Newman tried, in consequence, to conciliate the Thirty-nine Anglican Articles with the resolutions of the Council of Trent, in which, of course, he did not succeed, as he could satisfy neither of the parties, Catholics or Anglicans. Newman was made aware that his position between the two churches was a false and untenable one, and he passed over to Romanism. His example was followed by several ecclesiastics and professors, and he was accused by the English Church of breaking the communion, the first families of the kingdom. Pusey, however, has persevered in his former career. He and his followers have remained to this day in the Anglican Church, the situation of which they do not despair of mending. But they discard the name by which they are generally designated as a class. In 1870, Dr. Pusey himself wrote respecting this party-name as follows: "I never was a party leader, I never acted on any system. My name was used first to designate those of us who gave themselves to revive the teaching of forgotten truth and piety, because I first had occasion to write on baptismal regeneration; but it was by opponents, and not by confederates. We should have thought it a note against us to have deserved any party name, or to have been anything but the followers of Jesus, the disciples of the Church, the sons and pupils of the great fathers whom he raised up in her. I never had any temptation to try to form a party, for it was against our principles. . . ."

Then, personally, I was the more exempt from this temptation, because God has given me neither the peculiar organizing abilities which tempt men to it, nor any part of the spirit of that of an archdeacon — which would entitle me directly to counsel. . . . My life, contrary to the character of party leaders, has been spent in a succession of insulted efforts; bearing, indeed, upon one great end—the growth of Catholic truth and piety among us, or, contrariwise, resistance to what might hinder, retard, or obscure it; but still insulated" (Elenchus, iii, 338).

The Puseyites have adopted from the Romish Church, without assenting in a general way to her dogmas, a number of ritual institutions, and even some points of faith. They affix to their churches portable crosses; have burning tapers on their altars; adorn chasubles and Prayer-books with crosses; have a Latin choir; and, what is more than these exterior conformities, they have declared for the Romish doctrine about the situation and power of the Church, and about the sacraments, the number of which they increased; they have introduced auricular confession. In the doctrine of justification, where it was first intended to deviate from the Roman Catholic tenets, the resolutions of the Tridentineum were finally admitted as a base. The Puseyites went even the length of acknowledging in the pope a pre-eminen ce of spiritual honor and authority; they say that, as patriarch of Rome, not only his spiritual, but also his temporal authority extends over Italy; that the Church of England is bound to recognize it; and that all decrees of the Council of Trent may be authorized by him, and is not to be considered heretical, or even acceptable to the Anglican Church. The Puseyites call themselves Catholicks, a branch of the universal Catholic Church: they object most decidedly to being called Protestants. They regard the Church as one organic body, and primitive Christianity as one germ or seminal principle, to be developed and properly matured in the progress of ages. They adopt as such legitimate additions to Biblical Christianity obvious gross corruptions, which gained currency in the Church in different centuries, and were taught by leading fathers or councils — a proceeding which shows an uncertainty about the lineaments of Christianity, and opens the door for every species of error that designing men may be inclined to adopt, while it enables the so-called Catholic Church to justify every one of her errors, both doctrinal and ritual" (Schmucker). Another gross appendage sometimes associated with this theory of development is that Christ has placed himself in some kind of physical connection or concorporation with the mass of his disciples, the Church, by which his body nourishes them in some mystical manner through the Eucharist, and nourishes the germ of their resurrection body. Though Newman, still before his perversion, recommended, in the Ninetieth Tract for the Times, the acceptance of the doctrines of purgatory, of the invocation of saints, and of papal authority, Pusey has persisted in rejecting them. He also accepts the doctrine of the Real Presence of Latin in the mass, and the communion in one form (comp. Pusey, A Letter to his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury [Oxf. 1842], and The Holy Eucharist [ibid. 1843]). As Puseyism is in progress among the cultivated classes of England, especially among the clergy, and as it is thought to be only a forerunner of Catholicism, it is combated by the English bishops with admonitions, speeches, and disciplinary measures. They do not tolerate the rites introduced by the Puseyite ecclesiastics, and pronounce them a "mixture of Romanism or popery." They ordain no student of divinity suspected of Puseyistic tendencies. At the University of Oxford, the seminary of the High-Church clergy, the antagonism of Puseyites and anti-Puseyites has broken out so openly that there is a storm of both parties on every vacant professorship. Puseyist tendencies pervade the most influential literary papers: the Quarterly Review has published a series of articles in favor of the Puseyite innovations. The chief adversaries of the Puseyites, or Anglo-Catholics, are the Evangelicals, a party which originated in Methodism — the latter being opposed both by the Puseyites and by the Episcopalians. If we compare the judgment of the English papers of different colors on the religious situation of Great Britain, and especially on Puseyism, we find Pusillanimity is a feebleness of mind, by which one is terrified at mere trifles or imaginary dangers, an attribute of the most distant probability.

Püstrich, an ill-shaped Slavonic idiom: it is of bronze, and hollow. It represents a small, chubby boy holding a bottle. The bottles have been made with two holes, one at the top, the other at the place of the mouth. It is believed that the priests used this figure to terrify the people by the spectacle of an infuriated deity. It was filled with water, and, the holes being stopped, put on a fire: in due time the stoppers were driven out of the holes with considerable noise and tremendous eruption of steam and boiling water. Other more modern investigations would lead to the conclusion that the chubby god was nothing but an instrument of distillery.

Puteol (Gracized Phoroiou (Acts xxviii. 13), but in classical Greek often Phoros, a well, on account of the Wells or springs of a volcanic origin, with which the volcanic town of Campania, in Italy, on the northern shore of the bay of Naples, and about eight miles north-west from that city. Here Paul landed on his way to Rome (Acts xxviii. 13). As above noted, it derived its name from the wells or springs, of which the springs which now exist is now called Terra di Lavoro. The earlier name of Puteoli, when the lower part of Italy was Greek, was Diaerarchia; and this name continued to be used to a late period. Josephus uses it in two passages (Jos. xvii. 12, 7; xviii. 7, 2); in a third (Esth. 5, 2), he speaks of himself (after the shipwreck which, like St. Paul, he had recently gone through) as ἢ πεθανοῦσα τοῦ Ιουνίου, τοῦ Ποταμίου τῆς Τάρατος καλομένην. So Phile, in describing the curious interview which he and his fellow Jewish ambassadors had here with Caligula, uses the old name (Legat. ii. 6, 521). Its Roman history may be said to have begun with the Second Punic War. It was a favorite watering-place of the Romans as its numerous hot-springs were judged efficacious for the cure of various diseases. It was also the port where ships usually discharged their passengers and cargoes, partly to avoid discharging the pollution of Circium, and partly because there was no commodious harbor nearer to Rome. Hence the ship in which Paul was conveyed from Melita landed the prisoners at this place, where the apostle stayed for a week (Acts xxviii. 13). In connection with Paul's movements, we must notice its communications, in Nero's reign, along the mainland with Rome. The coast road leading northward to Sinuessa was not made till the reign of Domitian; but there was a cross-road leading to Capua, and... there joining the Appian Way. See Three Taverns.

The remains of this road may be traced at intervals; and thus the apostle’s route can be followed almost step by step. We should also notice the fact that there were Jewish residents at Puteoli. We might be sure of this from its mercantile importance; but we are positively informed of it by Josephus (Ant. xvii, 12, 1) in his account of the visit of the pretended Hend-Alexander to Augustus; and the circumstance shows how natural it was that the apostle should find Christian "brethren" there immediately on landing. From this port it was that the Roman armies were dispatched to Spain, and here the ambassadors from Carthage landed.

It had the privileges of a colony from a very early period, and these were successively renewed by Nero and Vespasian, the latter bestowing on the place the title of Colonia Flavia. Puteoli was at that period a place of very great importance. We cannot elucidate this better than by saying that the celebrated bay a part of which is now "the bay of Naples," and in early times was "the bay of Cumae," was then called "Sinus Puteolanus." The city was at the north-eastern angle of the bay. Close to it was Baiae, one of the most fashionable of the Roman watering-places. The emperor Caligula once built a ridiculous bridge between the two towns; and the remains of it must have been conspicuous when St. Paul landed at Puteoli in the Alexandrian ship which brought him from Malta. See Castor and Pollux; Miletus; Rhodes; Syracuse. In illustration of the arrival here of the corn-ships we may refer to Seneca (Ep. 77) and Suetonius (Nero, 38). No part of the Campanian shore was more frequented. The associations of Puteoli with historical personages are very numerous. Scipio sailed from hence to Spain. Cicero had a villa (his "Puteolanum") in the neighborhood, Here Nero planned the murder of his mother. Vespasian gave to this city peculiar privileges, and here Hadrian was buried. In the 5th century Puteoli was ravaged both by Alaric and Genesius, and it never afterwards recovered its former eminence. It is now a fourth-rate Italian town, still retaining the name of Pozzuoli.

The remains of Puteoli are considerable. The aqueduct, the reservoirs, portions (probably) of baths, the great amphitheatre, the building called the temple of Serapis, which affords very curious indications of changes of level in the soil, are all well worthy of notice. But our chief interest here is concentrated on the ruins of the ancient mole, which is formed of the concrete called Puteolanum, and sixteen of the piers of which still remain. No Roman harbor has left so solid a memorial of itself as this one at which St. Paul landed in Italy. Here, too, was the statue erected to Tiberius to commemorate his restoration of the Asiatic cities destroyed by an earthquake, and of which statue the pedestal with its inscription remains almost entire to this day. Putil (Heb. Putil', 4 M)., afflicted of God; Sept. οφναλή, the father of the wife of Eliezer the priest and the mother of Phinehas (Exod. vi. 25). B.C. cir. 1619. In modern Jewish traditions Putil is confounded with Jethro the Midianite, "who fatted the cattle for idolatrous worship" (Targum Pseudo-Jon. On Exod. vi. 25; Genesis of Sota by Wayneggeli, c. viii. § 6).

Putnam, Franklin, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Marietta, O., July 22, 1801. After receiving a good academical training, he entered Athens College, O., and graduated with honor in 1825. During the last three years of his college course he was converted, and though up to this time the law had been the object of his studies, the Gospel now became his all-absorbing hope. He entered the Theological Seminary at Auburn, N.Y., and in 1826 was licensed by Onondaga Presbytery, N.Y. In 1832 he removed to Ohio, and was appointed to labor as a missionary and evangelist among the dealing churches in Springfield, Urbana, and Buck Creek, O. Subsequently he accepted a call to Springfield Church, and was ordained and installed pastor by Dayton Presbytery: here he labored for eighteen months, when he accepted a call to the Church in Dayton, O., at the division in the Church, he resigned, and accepted a call to Circleville, O., where he continued to labor for over six years, when, by reason of paralysis of one half of his body, he resigned his charge, and removed to Delaware, Ohio. Here he devoted care on the part of his family, his health was restored, and he resumed preaching and ministered to the Church at Delaware, and subsequently at Tiffin, Greenville, and Republic, O., and Thomontown, Ind. He died at the latter place Oct. 11, 1850. Mr. Putnam was a logical thinker, and full of zeal for the cause of Christ; an excellent pastor, ever ready in sorrow to administer comfort and consolation. See Wilson, Prep. Hist. Alumni, 1861, p. 162. (J.L.S.)

Putnam, George, D.D., a Unitarian minister of the Old School, was born in Massachusetts in 1808, and was educated at Harvard University, class of 1828. He early entered the ministry, and finally became pastor at Roxbury, Mass., where he sustained the pastorate of nearly half a century, enjoying not only the warm affection of his own people, but the highest respect and confidence of the whole community. Away from home also Dr. Putnam wielded a very wide influence in all directions, and he was beloved by men of every religious school in an eminent degree. Dr. Putnam was more than an ordinary man. He was not only possessed of the most noble personal characteristics, but was endowed with excellent scholarship, remarkable intellectual power, and great wisdom in judgment. He was always vigorous, fresh, and often very eloquent in his pulpit discourses. For years his fast-day and Thanksgiving services were largely attended by visitors from what was then the adjoining city (Boston), to listen to his thought and powerful discussions upon public and national questions. A study of his writings in 1827 warned him that the period of his vigor was terminating; and he was obliged to consent to have a younger associate with him in the pastorate. For the last two years before his death, which occurred in 1827, he was able to render service only on the occasion of motions of some one of his beloved parishioners, who, in these joyful and painful domestic events, especially welcomed even the trembling voice of their old pastor. From 1849 to 1856 Dr. Putnam was editorially connected with the Christian Examiner. He published a number of separate sermons, orations, etc.

Putnam, Jonathan W., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Leyden, N.Y., July 31, 1812. He was converted at the age of twelve, and was received into the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was licensed to exhort in 1835; in 1836 he received license to preach. He travelled four years in the New-Jersey Conference, and then went to the Wisconsin Conference. In 1856 he was transferred to the East-Geneese Conference, and stationed at East Palmyra. Afterwards he was successively appointed to Tyrone, Catharine, Southport, Jackson, Canton, Prattsburgh, Dresden, and Middlesex. He had just begun the work of the second year on this last charge, with good promise of success, when death overtook him on Sept. 8, 1871. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 120, 131; Northern Christian Advocate, 1871.

Putsha, in Hindû mythology, is the name of the small, bloodless sacrifices, consisting of fruits and flowers, which were offered to the genii, as well as to the three great gods of the old Hinduism. Putshuli, in Hindû mythology, is the name of the Brahmins who, after twelve years' study, determine to devote their lives entirely to the gods, and in consequence attach themselves to some pagoda.

Puxis is the box in which the consecrated hosts for the sick are preserved. See Pux.
The Greek πυγμαχος denotes an animal with a "white rump," and is used by Herodotus (iv, 192) as the name of some Libyan deer or antelope. Αλιαν (vii, 19) also mentions the πυγμαχος, but gives no more than the name; comp. also Juvencii (Sat. xi. 189). It is usual to identify the pygmy of the Greek and Latin writers with the addax of North Africa, Nubia, etc. (Addax nasomaculatus), known to the ancient Greeks under the same title (Oryx addax, Lichl.), which has been recognised as a beast of chase in the old Egyptian sculptures. It is widely spread over Central Africa, extending to the borders of the Nile in Nubia, and is well known to the Arabs, who still distinguish it by its ancient name, with the familiar prefix of Abu, or father - Father Addax. The addax is a coarse and heavy antelope, three feet high at the withers, with a large clumsy head and stout legs. The horns exist in both sexes, are long, twisted outwards, covered with rings nearly to the points, which are sharp; the tail is long and tufted. The head and neck are of a deep reddish brown color, with a band of white across the face; the forehead and throat are clothed with coarse black hair, and all the rest of the body and limbs is of a whithish gray hue. It is one of that group of antelopes in which we may clearly discern an approach to the bovine race. See Ox.

Addax Antelope (Oryx addax).

Against this identification of the diakon with the addax, however, there are some considerable objections. In the first place, this antelope does not actually exist at all, and the required characteristic implied by its name; and, in the second, there is much reason for believing, with Rippell (Atlas zu der Reise im nörd. Afrika, p. 21) and Hamilton Smith (Griffith's Cuvier's Anim. Kingdom, iv, 195), that the addax is identical with the strepsicerus of Pliny (N. H. xi, 87), which animal, it must be observed, the Roman naturalist distinguishes from the pygmy (vii, 53). Indeed, we may regard the identity of the addax and Pliny's strepsicerus as established; for when this species was, after many years, at length rediscovered by Hempich and Rippell, it was found to be called by the Arabic name of akus ot adax, the very name which Pliny gives as the local one of his strep sings. The pygmy, therefore, must be sought for in some animal different from the addax. The required characters seem to be found in a group of antelopes described by Mr. Bennett (Trans. Zool. Soc., vol. i). They have many peculiarities in common with the group which includes the spring-bok (Antidorcas euchore) and the houte-bok (Damalis pygargus), those fine white-rumped species of South Africa, but are distinguished by the characters of the horns, which are larger, thicker, more bovine, and of broader curvature, turning first almost horizontally backwards, and then hooked abruptly forwards. The legs are long, the neck long and slender, and there is a white patch on the throat in all the species. The group is confined to the northern half of the African continent. The best-known species is the mhorr (Antilope mhorr, Bennett), which stands two feet eight inches high at the croup. The horns are ringed from the base about half-way up, whence to the tip they are round, smooth, and obtusely pointed. The expression of the face is gentle; the eye large, dark, and liquid. The tail is long, close-haired at the base, but tipped with a tuft of long black hair—a very ox-like character. The general hue of the coat, which is short and sleek, is a deep brownish red; the line of the belly and the inner surface of the limbs are white. But the whole region around the base of the tail is pure white, abruptly separated from the dark red of the flanks; the patch running forwards in a point on each hip, and downwards on the posterior surface of the thighs. The strong contrast of the two colors has a very singular effect, and would probably be seized on to form a descriptive appellation. Two males of this beautiful species were sent to the Zoological Society from Morocco; they were not, however, indigenous to that country, but had been brought from the eastern side of the desert. The species is hunted by the Arabs for the sake of the stomatal characteristic called becour, to which it is peculiarly subject, and which is so highly valued in Oriental pharmacy. These stones are called in Morocco beid el-uchor, or mhorr's eggs. There is, however, another species, considerably larger than the mhorr, but having the same general form and the same distributions of the colors. It is the addra (A. effugialis), a fine beast found in the wastes of Nubia by Rippell, and by Hempich and Ehrenberg in Dongola. This animal stands about three feet three inches high at the croup, and is five feet four inches in length. It is seen in considerable flocks on the borders of the Great Desert, and may well have been the pygmy of the ancients. See Tritrastum, Natural History of the Bible, p. 126; Wood, Biblia Animata, p. 141 sq.; Bible Educator, ii, 24, 183, 167. Comp. Antelope.

Pygmies of Western Africa. The existence of pygmy races of human beings in Africa has often been asserted, and many circumstances less easily credible than their diminutive size have been reported. Du Chaillu has recently discovered the actual existence of a pygmy race, but of whom the diminutive size is the only remarkable characteristic. He found them in the mountainous country on the east of the southern great branch of the Ogooué. They are called kongoos, and live in the midst of negro tribes of ordinary stature. They showed extreme timidity on being visited by a white man. In size they are only about three feet and a half. They subsist chiefly on animal food, but partly also on the roots, berries, and nuts which they find in the forests. In their mental calibre, these pygmies vary as greatly as ordinary races. Hence there is no settled theory as to their religious tendency, some of them comprehending their religious need, while others seem to be almost void of any religious consciousness. See Pre-Adamic; Religion.

Fyle, Thomas, an eminent Anglican divine, was born at Stodye, near Holt, Norfolk, in 1674. He was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, and, after taking holy orders, distinguished himself as minister of St. Margaret's parish in King's Lynn. He was made prebendary of Salisbury by Dr. Hoadly for his services in the Bangor Convener Controversy. His Paraphrase on the Acts and all the Epistles is an excellent work, often reprinted. He published, besides, Paraphrase of the Books of the Old Testament (London, 1717-25, 4 vols., 8vo). The Scripture Preservative against Popery (ibid., 1785) and three volumes of Sermons. He died at Lynn in 1757, greatly respected and highly admired in all England for his excellency in purpose and superiority in scholarship. See Hook, Eccles. Rugs., vi, 172; Gentleman's Magazine (London, 1786), p. 659, 692; Nichols, Literary Anecdotes.

Pynchon, William, an English divine, was born in the second half of the 16th century, and, after migrating to this country, settled at Roxbury, Mass., in 1630, aged 71 or 73. In 1657 he removed to Springfield, Mass. He finally returned to England, and died at Wraybury, Buckinghamshire, in 1662. He published, The Merciful Device of Christ's Redemption (London, 1650 and 1655, 4to), which was so heretical in tendency that it offended the Puritan fathers, and was burned on the Common by order of the authorities of Massachusetts:—The Jesuit's Synagogue (1652, 4to):—Time and Eternity how the First Sabbath was Ordained, etc. (1654, 4to).

Pyne, Smith, D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was a native of Ireland, and was educated at Eton and Oxford, England. After arriving in this country he studied theology, and was admitted to holy orders by bishop Hobart in 1826. He was in turn rector of a parish at Elizabeth, N. J.; Christ Church, Middletown, Conn.; St. John's Church, Yonkers, N. Y.; Calvary parish and St. John's Church, Washington. In the latter position he remained upwards of twenty years. During the war, Dr. Pyne worked in the camps and hospitals and among the soldiers. He was at one time a trustee of the General Theological Seminary, and of Trinity College, Hartford. He died in New York Dec. 7, 1875.

Pyramid (πυραμίς, perhaps from the Egyptian br), a structure of the shape of the geometric figure so called, erected in different parts of the Old and the New World, the most important being the pyramids of Egypt and Mexico. Those of Egypt were considered one of the seven wonders of the world. They are in all seventy in number, of different sizes, lying between 29° and 30° N. lat., and are masses of stone or brick, with square bases and triangular sides. Although various opinions have prevailed as to their use, as that they were erected for astronomical purposes, for resisting the encroachment of the sand of the desert, for granaries, reservoirs, or sepulchres, the last-mentioned hypothesis has been proved to be correct in recent times by the excavations of the late general Howard Vyse. They were all the tombs of monarchs of Egypt who flourished from the fourth to the twelfth dynasty, none having been constructed later than that time, the subsequent kings being buried at Abydos, Thebes, and other places, in tombs of a very different construction. The picture of a pyramid forms a part of the hieroglyphic name of Memphis, and the immutability of most things in Egypt leads us to infer, from this circumstance, that the foundation of the pyramids was coeval with that of the city. It is probable that the title of being the builders of them, and the honor of being buried in them, were given to the monarchs by whom they were finished. The pyramids are solid mounds raised over the sepulchral chambers of the kings, the first act of an Egyptian monarch being to prepare his future "eternal abode." For this purpose, a passage of the size of the intended sarcophagus was first hollowed in the rock at a suitable incline to lower it, and at a convenient depth a rectangular chamber was excavated in the solid rock. Over this chamber a cubical mass of masonry, of square blocks, was then placed, leaving the orifice of the shaft open. Additions continued to be made to this cubical mass both in height and breadth as long as the monarch lived, so that at his death all that remained to be done was to face or smooth the exterior of the stepped mound. But in some cases the masses of stone passed beyond the orifice of the shaft, which involved the construction of a new shaft, having its orifice beyond it. The pyramid was faced by adding courses of long blocks on each layer of the steps, and then cutting the whole to a flat or even surface, commencing from the base. The outer masonry, however, or casing, as it is called, has in most instances been partially stripped off. Provision was made for protecting the vertical joints by placing each stone half way over another. The casing is admirably finished, and the mechanical means by which such immense masses of stone were transported to their places has long been a mystery: the discovery, however, of large circular holes in some of the stones has led to the conclusion that they were wound up by machines. The stones were quarried on or near the spot: sometimes, however, granite tacts from the quarries of Syene was partially employed. The entrances were carefully filled up, and the passage protected by stone portcullises and other contrivances, to prevent ingress to the sepulchral chamber. There appears to have been also a door, or pylon, at the entrance of the shaft, ornamented with Egyptian sculptures and hieroglyphs. The sides of the pyramids face the cardinal points, and the entrances face the north. The work of the larger pyramids was executed by corvées of laborers.

The most remarkable and finest pyramids are those of Gizeh, situated on a level space of the Libyan chain at Memphis, on the west bank of the Nile. The largest three are the most famous. The first of Great Pyramid, as appears from the excavations of Vyse, was the sepulchre of the Cheops of Herodotus, the Chamber, or Chem, of Diodorus, and the Sphynx of Manesto and Eratosthenes (Shufa 1. R.C. 218. 2186). The name of the founder of the Great Pyramid has been detected in a small tomb in its immediate vicinity. It is written in Greek by Manesto, Sphynx, which is said by Eratosthenes to mean in Egyptian squa, "one who has much hair." The hieroglyphic name, Sayh, has also the same meaning as in the Coptic, "much hair." Its height was 480 feet 9 inches, and its base 764 feet square, having an area of about 13 acres. Its slope or angle is 51° 50'. It has, however, been much spoiled and stripped of its exterior blocks for the building of Cairo. The original sepulchral chamber, called the Subterranean Apartment, 46 feet by 27 feet, and 11 feet 6 inches high, has been hewn in the solid rock, and was reached by the original passage, 320 feet long, which descended to it by an entrance at the foot of the pyramid.

The excavations in this direction were subsequently abandoned on account of the vast size attained by the pyramid, rendering it impracticable to carry on the entrance on a level with the natural rock, which had been cut down and faced for that purpose. Accordingly a second chamber, with a triangular roof, was constructed in the masonry of the pyramid, 17 feet by 18 feet 9 inches, and 20 feet 3 inches high. This was reached by a passage rising at an inclination of 36° 18', terminating in a horizontal passage. It is called the Queen's Chamber, and occupies a position nearly in the centre of the pyramid. The monument—probably owing to the long life attained by the monarch—still progressing, a third chamber, called the King's, was finally constructed, by prolonging the ascending passage of the Queen's Chamber for 150 feet farther into the very centre of the pyramid, and, after a short horizontal passage, making a room 17 feet 1 inch by 34 feet 3 inches, and 19 feet 1 inch high. To diminish, however, the pressure of the superincumbent masonry on the flat roof, five small chambers were made vertically in succession.
above the roof, the last one pointed, varying in height from 1 foot 4 inches to 8 feet 7 inches, the apex of the top one being rather more than 69 feet above the roof of the King's Chamber. The end of the horizontal passage was finished in a superior style, and cased with red syenitic granite; and in the King's Chamber was the granite sarcophagus of the king. Cheops, 7 feet 6 inches long, 3 feet 3 inches broad, and 3 feet 5 inches high, for whom the pyramid was built. As the heat of this chamber was stifling, owing to want of ventilation, two small air-channels, or chimneys, about nine inches square, were made, ascending to the north and south sides of the pyramid. They perfectly ventilate this chamber. After the mummy was deposited in the King's Chamber, the entrance was closed with granite portcullises, and a well made at the junction of the upward-inclined and horizontal passages, by which the workmen descended into the downward-inclined passage, after carefully closing the access to the sepulchral chambers. The changes which took place in this pyramid gave rise to various traditions, even in the days of Herodotus, Cheops being reported to lie buried in a chamber surrounded by the waters of the Nile. It took a long time for its construction—100,000 men being employed on it for thirty years. The operations in this pyramid by general Vyse gave rise to the discovery of marks scratched in red ochre in a kind of cursive hieroglyphs on the blocks brought from the quarries of Turah. These contained the name and titles of Shufu (the hieroglyphic form of Cheops); numerals and directions for the position of materials: with them were mason's marks.

Hieroglyph of Cheops.

Section of the Great Pyramid of Gizeh.

The second pyramid is situated on a higher elevation than the first, and was built by Shufu II, or Chephren (B.C. 2166-2163), the son of Shufu I. His name reads Shepré: he is called Sophis II by Manetho, and Cephrenes by Herodotus. It is inscribed on a beautiful tablet in the British Museum, which was brought from one of the tombs near Memphis, and was engraved in memory of a personage who acted as superintendent of the building of the pyramid. This pyramid has two sepulchral chambers, and appears to have been broken into by the caliph Alaziz Othman ben-Yusuf, A.D. 1196. Subsequently, it was opened by Belzoni. The masonry is inferior to the first, but it was anciently cased below with red granite. The casing still remains at the summit.

Hieroglyph of Mycerinus.

The third pyramid, built by Mencheres, or Mycerinus (brother of Chephren, B.C. 2163-2130), is much smaller than the other two, being only 218 feet high by 324 feet 6 inches square. It also has two sepulchral chambers, both in the solid rock. The lower sepulchral chamber, which held the sarcophagus of rectangular shape, of whinstone, had a pointed roof, cut like an arch inside; but the cedar coffin, in shape of a mummy, had been removed to the upper or larger apartment, and its contents there rifled. Among the debris of the coffin and in the chambers were found the legs and part of the trunk of a body with linen wrapper, supposed by some to be that of the monarch, but by others to be that of an Arab, who had cut off the lower right knee. This body and fragments of the coffin were removed to the British Museum; but the stone sarcophagus was unfortunately lost off Carthagena, by the sinking of the vessel in which it was being transported to England. There is a hieroglyph very beautifully engraved on the fragment of the coffin, containing a royal name, which reads Menkau-re. The masonry of this pyramid is most excellent, and it was anciently case half-way up with black granite.

The second pyramid has a line of chambers cut in the rock, and on its eastern side are the ruins of a temple. The third has a similar temple and avenue; and, indeed, the eastern face of the Great Pyramid has traces, though more indistinct, of a similar structure; but the second temple, that of Chephren, is distinguished by having the Sphinx ranged in front of the centre of its eastern face, bearing all the marks of having been connected with it by communications cut through the rock under-ground. Between the paws of the Sphinx temple was discovered, a few years ago, by Belzoni, on clearing away the sand by which it had been choked up for ages.

There are six other pyramids of inferior size and interest at Gizeh: one at Abu Rûbê, five miles to the north-west of the same spot, is ruined, but of large dimensions; another at Zowre el-Arriana, ruined, and made of limestone, is still more ruined; another at Rihah, a spot in the vicinity of Abûstr, also much ruined, and built for the monarch User-en-Ra, by some supposed to be Ptolemais. There are five of these monuments at Abuâr, one with a name supposed to be that of a monarch of the third dynasty; and another with that of the king Sahura. A group of eleven pyramids remains at Sakkarî, one with a doorway inlaid with porcelain tiles, and having a royal name. Five other pyramids are at Dabûr, the north-west of which, built of brick, is supposed to be that of the king Apsichis of Herodotus, and has a name of a king apparently about the twelfth dynasty. Others are at Mârtûn and Ilahân; and two at Bâmu, at Meînet el-Fayûm, apparently the sepulchres of the last kings of the twelfth nasty. Some small brick pyramids of the kings of the eleventh dynasty are at the Drah Abu Negru at Thebes. In Nubia, the ancient Ethiopia, are several pyramids, the tombs of the monarchs of Meroë, and of some of the Ethiopian conquerors of Egypt. They are taller in proportion to their base than the Egyptian pyramids, and generally have no spiral staircase, with their original wall paintings and sculptures, which faces the east. The principal groups of these pyramids are at Bege Ranie, or Begromi, 170 N. lat., in one of which gold rings and other objects of later art, resembling that of the Ptolemaic period, were found.

In Assyria, the Birs Nimrod, or Tower of Belus, was a kind of step-shaped pyramid of seven different-colored bricks, dedicated to the planetas by Nebuchadnezzar. See BABER. The Mujilibe, another mound, was of pyramidal shape. The pyramid also entered into the architecture of the tomb of Sannadarius at Tanis, and of the mausoleum of Artemisia at Halicarnassus. A small pyramid, the sepulchre of C. Cestius, imitated from the Egyptian in the days of Augustus, still exists within the wall of Aurelian at Rome. Temples and other monuments of pyramidal shape were found in India, China, Java, the Polynesian Islands, and elsewhere. The Toltec and Aztecs erected temples in Mexico, called Teocalli, or abodes of gods, of pyramidal shape, with steps or terraces by which to ascend and reach an altar, generally of the sun-god. Some of them performed human sacrifices and other rites. These, however, are not true pyramids, the pure and simple form of which is restricted to Egypt. The pyramid entered extensively into the architecture of the Egyptians, and appears on the tops of obelisks and tombs as a kind of roof. Small models of pyramids, with inscribed adorations to the sun, or having royal names, were also placed in the tombs. Pyrrker, Johann Ladislav of Egal-Eris, a Roman Catholic prelate, and a poet of some talent, was born Nov. 2, 1772, at Langk, in Hungary. His father was the manager of an estate. John studied first at the gymnasia of Stuhlweissenburg and the academy of Fürthkirchen, and then decided to enter the service of the State. His application for admission in the chief chancery at Oen having met with a refusal, he accepted a situation as private secretary in the house of a count at Palermo, but never performed these functions; for, while on his journey back to Vienna on the point of passing over to Sicily, he suddenly changed his mind and returned. On his journey home he escaped an ambush of pirates, which circumstance gave origin to the tale that he was taken by pirates, sold at Algiers, and escaped to Genoa. The aspect of the South exercised an animating influence upon Pyrrker's poetical talent. On his return through Venice and Vienna, he made the acquaintance of a former Cistercian monk, and applied for admission to that order. His request was granted at Lillenhof (Lower Austria), Oct. 18, 1792. He studied theology at St. Pölten, received holy orders in 1796, and subsequently exercised several monastical functions. In 1807 he became curate of Tiriž. In 1811 he was recalled to his monastery as prior, and in 1812 he was elected abbot of Lillenhof. In 1818 he was appointed bishop of Zips, where he founded a seminary for country teachers. In 1820 he became patriarch of Venice, and in the ensuing year primate of Dalmatia, chaplain of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, etc. In 1827 he was called to the archiepiscopal see of Eia, which post he held until his death, at Vienna, Dec. 2, 1847. Pyrrker was a man of amiable manners, a conscientious and exact writer, with a fatherly heart, a son of the poor, an ornament to science, and enjoyed general esteem and affection. His heart rests in the cathedral at Eia; his body, in conformity with his will, in a spot of the cemetery of Lillenhof chosen by himself. His epitaph, carved on a simple slab of marble, is also of his own composition: Deo l. L. P. Patr. Archiv. Aegipti. recognoscit in pace. Of his works, we consider it appropriate to mention here only Perlen der heiligen Vorzeit (Vienna, 1821; 2d ed. 1826)—Bilder aus dem Leben Jesu und der Apostel (Leips. 1842-43);—Legenden der Heiligen (ibid. 1842). His complete works were published at Stuttgart (1842-43, 3 vols.; new ed. 1848). Severe critics miss in Pyrrker's poems creative freshness and the charm of an original fancy; but they cannot deny the power and beauty of his poetical pictures, the pronounced relief of his characters, and his masterly management of the language and rhythm. See Ignaz Hub, Deutshlands Balladen- und Romanszen- Dichter (Carlsruhe, 1849, 2d ed.), p. 188; Winer, Handb. der theol. Literatur, ii, 351, 718; but especially Braith, Gesch. der kath. Literatur, Deutschlands (Vienna, 1861), p. 540 sqq.

Pyrrhus, John Christopher, a Moravian itinerant and missionary among the Inuits, was born April 25, 1718, at Paama, in Swabia, graduated at the University of Leipzig, and immigrated to America in 1740. After having spent a part of the year 1743 in the Mohawk country, in order to learn its language and customs, he opened a so-called "Indian monasteries" and the Illinois, Pa., in which he prepared young men for missionary service among the aborigines, and, in particular, taught them the Mohawk tongue. The illustrious David Zeisberger (q. v.) was one of his pupils. He continued such instructions at Gnadenhütten, a missionary settlement in Pennsylvania, whether he removed in 1747, taking part at the same time in the work of the mission. Besides translating a number of hymns into the Mohawk, he wrote three valuable treatises on this language, which, however, were never printed. The MSS. are deposited in the library of the American Ethnological Society, Philadelphia. In 1751 he went to England, where he labored in the ministry for nearly twenty years. He died at Herrnbut, Saxony, May 28, 1785. (E. de S.)

Pytho (Πῦθος), a Greek philosopher of much eminence, is especially noted as the founder of the Pyrrhonian or first Sceptic school of Greece. He was the son of Pleistarchus, or Pleistocrates, and a native of Elis, a town of Peloponnesus. He lived about the time of Philip and Alexander of Macedonia, and was originally a poor painter; but, after having learned the elements of science from Dryson, he followed Alexander the Great in his Eastern expedition, and thus became acquainted with the doctrines of the Indian, Egyptian, and Persian magi (Diog. Laer. ix, 11, 2). He was also an ardent admirer of Democrates. During the greater part of his life he dwelt in quiet retirement, abstaining from pronouncing any decided opinion upon anything, and endeavoring to possess the greatest possible wisdom and composure in whatever circumstances he was placed. Notwithstanding this apparently inactive and indolent mode of life, he was highly honored by his countrymen, who not only made him their high-priest, but, for his sake, decreed that all philosophers should be exempt from payment of the chisel tax. Later (Diog. Laer. xi, 11, 2), the Elysian (vit. 24, 4) saw his statue in a portico at Elis, and a monument erected in honor of him at a little distance from the town. The Athenians honored him with the franchise of their city. He died at the advanced age of ninety. Cicero (not so far wrongly either) ranks him among the Socrates; and, indeed, he was as much opposed to the pretensions of the Sophists as Socrates himself, though from a different point of view. An undisputed peace of mind (ευνοήμων) appeared to Pyrrho the highest object of philosophy; and, thinking that this peace of mind was disturbed by the dogmatical systems of the schools and the disputes of all other philosophical schools, he was led to scepticism; but he was by no means of that class of thorough-going scepticism which is usually associated with his name, and which is synonymous with absolute and unlimited indubitability. He simply considered what was a real scientific knowledge of things to be altogether impossible. His fundamental principle was, that there is nothing true or false, right or wrong, honest or dishonest, just or unjust; that there is no standard in anything, but that all things depend upon law and custom, and that uncertainty and doubt belong to everything. Yet, like the eminent modern German thinker, he appears to have tenaciously maintained the obligations of morality, and he declared virtue to be the only thing worth striving after (Cicero, De Fin. iv. 16). On all occasions, therefore, he answered his opponents, 'What you may say be true, but I cannot decide.' This and other similar expressions drew upon him the ridicule of his adversaries; and most of the absurd anecdotes respecting his conduct in the common occurrences of life, which Diogenes repeats with all the credulity of a gos PYTHAGORAS (Πυθαγόρας) is a Greek name given in the best MSS. as the name of the father of Sopater, Paul's companion (Acts xx. 4). See SOPATER.

PYTHAGORAS, one of the earliest and most celebrated sages of Greece, the alleged originator of the name the procession of philosophers, and the founder of a school which enjoyed great and enduring reputation. Notwithstanding the numerous fables which are interwoven with the traditionary accounts of his career, it is certain that none of the elder philosophers of Greece attained higher eminence in speculation, impressed himself more forcibly on the contemplatory world, or influenced more widely and more permanently the character of subsequent investigation. Engaged equally and simultaneously in abstract inquiry and in scientific research, at once to theorists and practical politicians, and predominant wherever his efforts were directed, he was regarded as the judge of society, the arbiter of the law, the interpreter of the spirit of the age, the exponent of the social, the protector of the cause of liberty, and the watchman of the commonwealth. With his political acumen, his political ascendency was by a potent influence during a considerable part of his life, and was prolonged, in a mitigated and disguised form, through successive generations. He seems to have discovered the peculiar circumstances which had favored its original establishment and the violent catastrophe which crushed the primitive association, and, after his characteristic doctrines had been accepted, with modifications and additions, by other schools, devoted itself with marked earnestness to the public and private ethics which had chiefly attracted the regards of the master. His discoveries, or happy conjectures, in mathematics, in astronomy, in music, etc., fascinated Plato, and were largely incorporated into the all-embracing system of Aristotle. Even in cases in which they were questioned, rejected, or almost forgotten by later antiquity, they have been revived by modern philosophy, and may frequently be recognised as furnishing the germ of future philosophic erudition. The speculations of Pyrrho and his followers are called Pyrrhonism—a name which in subsequent times has been applied to any kind of scepticism, though the Pyrrhonian philosophy in reality is, as we have seen above, only one particular, and an elementary, form of scepticism. Cicero, in several passages, speaks of the philosophy of Pyrrho as long exploded and extinct. Pyrrho himself is said by some ancient authors to have left no works behind him; the tropes or epochs, or fundamental principles, of his philosophy, being justly ascribed to one or other of his followers. But Sextus Empiricus (Ad. Math. i. 290) says that he wrote to Alexander the Great, for which he was richly rewar d and Athenaeus (x. p. 419) quotes a passage from a work by Pyrrho, the character of which is entirely unknown. The first writer on the scepticism of Pyrrho is said to have been Timon, his friend and disciple, whose life is written by Diogenes Laertius. See English Cyclop. s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Class. 1. Life and Labor. —The details of the life and opinions of Pythagoras, as transmitted to us by the ancients, are so confused and contradictory, and are so blended with fantastic fables, that it is impracticable to extract from them a plain trustworthy, and consistent account (Bruckner, Crat. Phil. i, 991). The fourth of the Greek age, of a secret society at once religious and political, philosophical and scientific, afforded an apt frame on which to hang the exaggerations of admiring disciples and the credulous fancies of his own and of other generations. We have no authentic remains and no contemporary memorials of the Samian philosopher. The relics attributed to his earlier followers are not acknowledged to be genuine. The special works of Aristotle and of his pupils, Diogenes, Aristocles, and Theophrastus, of their subject of the Pythagoreans, are not conserved. A few scattered notices survive in Herodotus, Heraclitus, Xenophon, Isocrates, Plato, and Aristotle; but our chief sources of information are the later writers Diogenes Laertius, Porphyry, and Lamblichus. Whatever materials may have been accessible to them, they cannot be supposed to have possessed credible authorities for their compilations. The loose and uncritical habits of Diogenes do not invite confidence, whilst the mythical and theaumatical proverbs of the Neo-Platonists do provoke constant suspicion. These miraculous agents are proud and greedy of their own lusts; and would not be scrupulous about adding embellishments or fictions of their own to the tales of wonder which they might find already in circulation. We are singularly unfortunate in regard to this pioneer in philosophy. Antiquity has bequeathed to us so much in regard to him which is absurd as well as incredible; it has left little that can be received without hesitation, to form a portrait of the man, or to furnish an adequate scheme of his doctrines.

The birthplace of Pythagoras is placed by Mullah in the first year of the 43rd Olympiad (B.C. 580), on the strength of a legend reported by Eratosthenes and cited by Diogenes Laërtius. The same date is deduced, with some uncertainty, from a statement made by Antiquus and preserved by Clements Alexandrinus. The nativity of Pythagoras is brought down nearly forty years later by accepting the declaration of Aristeus that he left Samos at the age of forty, in the reign of Polycrates. The difference between these estimates is sufficient to destroy any confidence in either, and distrust is increased by the position of Aristeus in Thucy- dy; yet each of these deductions has been espoused by eminent scholars. Bentley and Larcher are on the side of Mullah; Dodwell attaches himself to the declaration of Aristeus; Grote, apparently convinced of the inconclusiveness of all reasoning on the subject, aims at the golden mean, and places the birth of Pythagoras about B.C. 580. The only safe conclusion is that the philosopher began to flourish in the second half of the 6th century before Christ.

The birthplace of Pythagoras, if less doubtful than that of Homer, has been more variously determined. He is usually designated the Samian. This rests, primarily, upon a passage in Herodotus, in which the curious story of Zabolix is related. Grote considers the passage decisive. On referring to the text, it will be found that the character of Lyconius supposed positively, by the philosopher's place of birth. The general belief of antiquity, however, accredited Pythagoras to Samos, and it is only this belief that is attested by Isocrates (I. 256). Aristeus represented him as a Tyrrhenian from Lemnos or Imbros. By some writers he was represented as the son of a Phliasian refugee and settled in Samos. Neanthes regarded him as a Syrian or Tyrian; Theopompos and Aristarchus entertained the opinion of Aristoxenus; Hippobotus and Herme- pus endorsed the common belief.

Contradictions continue to multiply. There is no agreement in regard to the paternity of Pythagoras. The accepted tradition presents him as the son of Men- scrus; Justin, however, names his father Demaratus. Those who assigned a Phliasian origin to his father gave him the name of Tzetze, with which Tzetze and Fa- ber think that Justin blunderingly converted into De- matus. Tzetze, a very late author indeed, calls his mother Pythalis. His father is variously reputed to have been an engraver of gems and a rich merchant; he may have been both or neither. Two brothers, older or younger, Pythagoras and Thamyris, according to other accounts, Eunostes, and Tyyrhenus. These names are very suspicious.

These confusions and perplexities are noticed, not with any desire of exhibiting the numerous opinions which prevailed in relation to the birth of Pythagoras, but to show how uncertain and unauthenticated, even in antiquity, were those points in his history which were least apt to provoke diversity of statement. If there were such differences in such matters, there is little reason to expect trustworthy accounts in regard to more important concerns, where enforced secrecy pro- moted fanciful conjecture, where the love of the mar- vellous might indulge itself without check or fear of detection, and where the character of the school cherished the wildest inventions and encouraged their ac- ceptance. The story is, throughout, involved in fable and in superfluations of fable.

Tradition has been wholly unrestrained in relating the education of Pythagoras. Several teachers have been assigned to him. He is said to have been placed by his uncle Zelus under the charge of Pherecydes in the island of Lemnos. He is reported to have after- wards attached himself to Hermodamas, or Leodamas (both names are given), the grandson of Creophylus, the cyclic poet. He is alleged to have been the disciple of Thales, of the Milesian Anaximander, and of the Cretan Epimenides, who is even a more shadowy per- sonage than the Titan. The true and probable com- bination of names may probably be found in the disposition of later times to regard Pythagoras as in- structed in all the learning of the Greeks. Yet the accumulation of Hellenic knowledge was not considered a sufficientequipment for his career. He is supposed to have set out, while still young, on extensive travels through the Oriental world, just as the medieval sages were believed to have gathered their stores of learning from the Saracen schools in Spain and in the East.

Egypt seems to have been the first foreign country visited by Pythagoras. The testimony of Herodotus (II. 12) to the widespread use of astrology throughout Asia and the Near East makes it probable that he visited Egypt, where he was received at Memphis, and possibly even by the gods. It is possible that this visit was prompted by his desire to learn the secrets of the Egyptian religious system, or by his interest in the Pythagorean school of thought. In any case, his travels were instrumental in spreading the influence of Greek philosophy and astronomy throughout the Mediterranean world.

In the early period of his life, Pythagoras is known to have taught in Samos, where he established a school of philosophy. His influence spread rapidly, and he is said to have been invited to edit the law code of Cyrus, king of Persia. This was a significant move, as it allowed him to establish his ideas in the heart of the Persian empire and to spread his influence throughout the region. His teachings were also disseminated through his students, who traveled extensively and spread his ideas to new audiences. In this way, Pythagoras's influence continued to grow, and his ideas became an integral part of the intellectual landscape of the world.

After a long and uncertain absence, Pythagoras re- turned to Samos, and opened a school, at the request of his countrymen, for the dissemination of the marvels of learning which he had collected in his extensive travels. His pupils were few and listless, and his method of teaching—by signs and symbols—irritated rather than enlightened his acolytes. To add mystery to his instructions and a divine sanction to his wisdom, he vis- ited Delos and other oracular shrines. To these jour- neys may be assigned his appearance at the Olympic Games, and his celebrated invention of the name of "Philosopher," though this is also referred to a conversation with the Tyrant of Platus, and probably did not originate with him.

Having, by these journeys, by frequent intercourse with the divinities, by the pretension of a divine origin and of marvelous gifts, and also excited in the congresses of men, extended and height- ened his reputation, Pythagoras came back to Samos, and reopened his school under brighter auspices than before. He gave public instruction in ethical and po- litical philosophy, and from the famous oracles consulted him in regard to the government of the is- land. But, besides conducting this public academy, he provided a retreat for those who sought and were deem- ed worthy of more recondite education. Outside of the city he procured a cave, to which he retired with his more select disciples. Here he spent much of the night, as well as of the day, in esoteric instruction, and espe- cially in teaching the wonders of mathematical science. He added the arts of the charioteer to the learning of the scholar and the wisdom of the sage.

Samos, however, proved an uncongenial abode. Whether his philosophical vocation was too much interru- perted by the embassies and public duties imposed on him by his countrymen, or the Samians displayed too little aptitude for philosophy; whether he was of- fended by the tyranny of his friend Polycrates, or im- perilled by that of Syloco, the brother and successor of Polycrates, it is vain to inquire. It is sufficient to know, from the universal testimony of antiquity, that Pythagoras abandoned Samos, and migrated to South- ern Italy, where he professed singularly hospitable to philo- sophy. But there is no minute description of the time when this migration took place as in regard to other circumstances in the life of the Samian teacher; it is placed about B.C. 531 by Fynes Clinton, in 529 by Ueberweg, and other dates are given.

Crotona received the emigrant. He was soon surrounded by numerous admires belonging to the wealthier and more influential part of the population. He is said to have united these, to the number of three hundred or more, in a secret organization. Among the earliest consequences of his residence in Crotona is mentioned the complete reformation of the manners and morals of the people, produced by his persuasive address, by the authority of his divine pretensions, by his imposing demeanor, and by his judicious counsels. His disciples were of the rich and noble class, and, by converting them to a more sober and abstemious life, he was necessarily subjected to the attacks of luxury and sensuality; for these are not the vices of poor laborers and "rudd mechanicals." Moreover, as the political control was still in the hands of the aristocracy, though already contested, political interest might complicate with religious enthusiasm and philosophical convictions in facilitating a reform requisite to maintain a doubtful ascendency. That aristocratic rule was confirmed by the action of Pythagoras was the belief of later times; and that Crotona was strengthened by the reformation is shown by its subsequent victory over Sybaris, under Pythagorean leadership. As the Pythagorean rule was internationally political, how far Pythagoras directed his secret society to political aims, cannot be ascertained, and has been diversely determined. It has been well observed that a select body of influential men, interested in the necessities of a specific policy, bound together by the closest ties of opinion, sentiment, and affectionate regard; united, moreover, by secret obligations, would necessarily employ concerted action in public affairs. It should also be observed that the Greek schools, until the close, or nearly the close, of Plato's career, had always a decided political inclination. It may well be supposed that Pythagoras, who had already tested, at Samos, the efficacy of supernatural claims, would avail himself of like arts to establish his predominance in a new land. He had previously presented himself as a son of Phæbus, and he is said to have been worshipped in Italy, after his death, as the offspring of the Hyperborean Apollo; his golden thigh had been shown to Abaris at the Olympic Games as evidence of his divine descent. The claim was consonant with the whole tenor of Greek genealogy, and is illustrated by the striking parallelism of Greece and in other lands. He offered, in confirmation of his doctrine of the transmigration of souls, his recognition, in the temple of Juno at Argos, of the shield of Euphorbus, slain in the Trojan War, whose body he had then in his custody.

"Isee ego (iam meminit) Trojani tempore bellis, Pantholides Euphorbus eram" (Ovid, Met, xv, 160, 161).

To the earlier years of his residence at Crotona may be assigned his death, burial, and resurrection, and his report of the wonders of the nether world; to the same time may be referred (though there is really no chronology in these matters) his familiar intercourse with animals, his handling snakes with impunity, his prediction of earthquakes, his control over tempests, his removal of pestilences, etc. To the closing years of his life must be referred his remarkable apparition to his friends at Metapontum and Tarentum simultaneously, and his public conversation with them. It is scarcely surprising that the Neo-Platonists, by whose biography was composed (or consacrinated), should have presented him at the court and rival of Crotona. It is natural that these miraculous endowments should be regarded as the bold inventions of late pagans; but this solution is not satisfactory, as some of them are evidently of much earlier origin, and all of them appear, in modified forms, in other myths in widely separated regions. The one common to the Pythagoreans which appear to be only late survivals of primitive superstitions and delusions.

The high and various endowments of Pythagoras, real and fictitious, rendered him singularly successful in the institution of his school at Crotona. The most important, the most credulous, or the most zealous of his pupils were constituted as a secret society, were subjected to the most stringent discipline, and to the most absolute obedience to their inspired teacher. According to some traditions, the property of all was surrendered for the common use. This is scarcely probable, as the age of communism had not yet arrived. The statement may simply indicate that the means of the members were freely employed for common objects, and that the wealthier brethren generously ministered to the requirements of the poorer. The society seems to have been divided into two classes: the more advanced, or esoterical, and the neo-phores, or exoterical. Other divisions are also mentioned, as into Pythagorici, Pythagorei, and Pythagoristae, according to their progress in the studies of the sect, and the intimacy of their communion with their common superior.

The candidates for admission were carefully scrutinized, and great attention was paid to physiognomy and the external indications of moral and mental qualities. If accepted, they had to pass through a long period of probation, and if found suitable, they had to maintain silence for five years; that, during this period, they were not allowed to behold the face of the master; and that they were required to undergo other tests of fitness for membership. Silence, or the government of the tongue (μυστος), was prescribed as earnestly as by St. James; but the length and degree of the silence required were not uniform in all cases. The fellows of the guild received instruction in all the knowledge then existing, either directly from the scholar himself, or through the intervention of his more instructed pupils. The systematic studies which had been differently supposed to have been the political theories and the political projects of Pythagoras, and the mystic religious rites, or orges, which rendered the society a theosophic sect; they were probably the latter.

The publication of the characteristic Pythagorean doctrines was absolutely prohibited; and when these were published by Philolaus, in a later age, the procedure was regarded as a grave infraction of Pythagorean proprieties. Daily self-examination, which presupposes habitual meditation, was a constant requirement.

"Τραγούδησε ο Πήδιος της Δαίας Ἐκείνη της προάτες." Such reverence was paid to the declarations of the master that all contradiction, cavil, and doubt were unknown. Every difference of opinion was promptly settled by the democratic dictum, Διαίτητα ὢν, ἀρνήται ἔπειτα." In the midst of the luxury, sensuality, idleness, and extravagance for which Crotona, like other cities of Magna Grecia, was noted, the greatest restraint was imposed on the elect in regard to all those vices which undermine or fetter awaymorality. Modesty and simplicity in dress, decorum in behavior, abstemiousness in food, abstinence from meats, beans, and other articles of food, and moderation in all things, were earnestly inculcated. The institutions of Pythagoras appear to have been, in many respects, an anticipation of the monastic life of the early medieval Benedictines. Healthful recreations for mind and body, music and gymnastics, each of which embraced a large and varied sphere, were zealously prosecuted.

The members of the association were segregated from "the vulgar herd, not merely by their secret organization and higher culture, but also by the pride of learning, of creed, of power, and by the haughty contempt for inferiors which usually attends such pride. The mystic secrecy and the careful separation from the multitude were maintained by signs and emblematic symbols, which enabled Pythagoreans to recognize each other with certainty and without display.

The best and the latest investigators of the perplexand the instructor of Simmias and Cebes, he belonged to the Socratic era; and, as Lysis was the teacher of Epaminondas, he may be regarded as the contemporary of Plato. The interval must have been considerable between Pythagoras and Philolaus, as Archytas, the instructor of the latter, was regarded together as the last of the Pythagorean school. Yet the distinctive doctrines of Pythagoras must have been bruited abroad long before the publication of Philolaus; for we find among the fragments of Xenophanes an epigram on the Pythagorean doctrine of metempsychosis, and Xenophanes was born before the death of Pythagoras. But the doctrines of Pythagoras, deducible from earlier and later writers, cannot be regarded as even a fragmentary exposition of a definite system constructed by them. They are only the mutilated expression of his leading principles, as interpreted and expanded by those who claimed to be representatives of his teachings.

The remnants of the early Greek inquirers, whether dialectic or speculative, exhibit their disposition to employ terrestrial aphorisms for the utterance of their views. This is the tendency of all primitive speculation. While recognizing the unmediated and the immediate as the essential, the exponents of the exposition thence resulting, it is well also to remember the communion and employment of the same mode of communication by Francis Bacon in a period of much amplier knowledge and more diffused intelligence.

Gathering from the unities of the Pythagorean philosophy, that remain the distinctive doctrines of Pythagoras, they appear to these: The soul is, in its nature, immortal, and akin to divinity. It consists of two parts: the rational, which is alone immortal; and the sensuous, or irrational, which is ultimately mortal. Plants possess the latter. In this distinction may be found the germ of the Aristotelian dogma of three souls: the intelligent, the animal, and the vegetative. The rational soul is pure: the irrational, impure, because immersed in matter: both are united in man. The former attains modification in his divine nature and endows him with a divine and governing material frame, with which it is united in life, and through which it is diffused. Death is the withdrawal of this complex soul from the corporeal involucrum in which it has been enclosed, and which it has animated. The spirit, thus released, descends in the circumambient air, retaining, in shadowy guise, its former shape, visible as a ghost, or intervening in the affairs of men through dreams and other influences. Souls that have divested themselves in life of the taint of their irrational companion, and of their corporeal environment, enter into the divine Blake, and become the divine, apparently without loss of individual nature.

Soul not liberated from the vices and passions of the lower soul, or from the impurities and temptations of their material vessel, floats for a time in the air, tormented by the Furies and the ministers of vengeance, till they are allowed a new form, and are subjected to a new ordeal, by passing into new creatures, human or bestial.

"animam sic semper caudam Reae, sed in varias doceo mihi surgere"

(Ovid, Met. xvi, 171, 172).

The air is always full of souls, undergoing the penal consequences of their sins, and awaiting their descent into new bodies.

"peritqque necesse est Multa dis concreta mollis insensae mirae"

(Virgil, Æn. vi. 737, 738).

This is the noted metempsychosis of Pythagoras, which is usually conceived to have been of Hindu origin, but is often referred to an Egyptian source, this little correspondence with the metempsychosis or the anastaseis of Egyptian mythology. It is much more reasonable to consider it a philosophical adaptation of the primitive beliefs in regard to spiritual existence after death (see Tylor, Primitive Culture).
It is an obvious deduction from the doctrine of metempsychosis that animal life should be scrupulously regarded, and that animals should not be slaughtered for food. The butcher is a homicide, if not a murderer. It is a natural consequence from the doctrine of dissimilar bodied spirits that Pythagoras should have attached great importance to dreams and other spiritual communications. The sanctity of all life, and the consideration of human life as a probation and as a progress to a higher existence, explain his strong condemnation of suicide.

"The Everlasting had fixed His canon 'gainst self-slaughter.'

(See Thom. Aquin. Summa Theolog. II, ii, qu. xxiv, artv.)

Not only the spirits of men are divine, according to Pythagoras, but those of the sun, moon, and stars, which move at such musical intervals from each other, and in such regulated concord, as to produce the music of the spheres—a doctrine welcome to the poetic imagination of Plato.

"Such harmony is in immortal souls, / Both grossly close the ill in, we cannot hear it."

The ontology of Pythagoras was intimately associated with his transcendental theory of numbers. It can scarcely be determined which suggested the other, or by what series of reciprocal reactions both were produced. The cosmogony attributed to him is much more manifestly an evolution from the numerical fantasy which has always been held to be the most distinctive part of Pythagoreanism.

Mullach justly observes that the exposition of the significance and potency of numbers in the Pythagorean theory would require an ample volume; hence he notices them very briefly. The like course must be adopted here, and a summary, abridged from an abridgment by Baring-Gould, must suffice.

"1. The unit, or Monad, is the beginning and end of all; it is the symbol of existence, identity, equality, conservation, and harmony (comp. Philolal. Fragm. 15).

"2. Two, or the Dyad, is the origin of contraries, the symbol of diversity, division, change, disorder.

"3. Three, or the Triad, is the first of unequala. It represents God and the soul of man.

"4. Four, or the Tetrad, is the most perfect of numbers; the root, or origin, of all things, whence the soul derives its earlier earthly structure of decay.

"5. Five, or the Pentad, is everything supplying the principle of everything, and repelling evil spirits.

"6. Six, or the Hexad, is the number of good fortune.

"7. Seven, or the Heptad, is a sacred number, generating good and evil.

"8. Eight, or the Octad, the first cube, is a perfect number.

"9. Nine, or the Ennead, being the square of three, is sacred.

"10. Ten, or the Decad, the sum of the first four numbers, contains all numerical relations. All science proceeds from it and returns to it (comp. Philolal. Fragm. 10, 13)."

Whether numbers constituted the esse of things, or were only simulacra, or symbols, is still in dispute, and was, perhaps, never clearly determined. The language of Aristotle (Met. I, v) is vague and indistinct. That they were generally employed in a symbolic sense is apparent. The monad was the first principle of all things, or nothing at all, hence all things commenced; it was at once the odd and the even, the limited and the unlimited, God and the universe. The dyad, or first evolution of number, was the even, and represented the interval between limiting extremes. The triad generated the progressive scale of numbers. The tetrads were the unit, or of the dyad with itself, and indicated geometrical body. The pentad was physical body, with its properties and accidents of sense. Numbers, again, represented points; by the procession of points, lines are formed; by the movement of lines, surfaces; by the progress of surfaces, bodies. From these last arise all bodies, and the four elements of earth, air, water, fire, which undergo constant change and reciprocal conversion.

"Nature specus: aulae maner: rerum non naturae / Ex ales: alias separat Natura figurae. / Nec perspicuum est, quid sit, mithraeum, mundi, sed variar, faciendae noae" (Ovid, Met. XV, 590-590).

A fifth element was added by thepentad; this was the upper air, the surrounding ether, the Quintessence. These five cosmic elements were also symbolized by the five mathematical bodies. The cube was the earth; the pyramid, fire; the octahedron, air; the dodecahedron, space, or ether; and the icosahedron, water. All were contained within the enveloping sphere. Such are the bare outlines of the Pythagorean cosmogony.

Much less influential than this intellectual development of Greece was the moral instruction, which long continued to form a large part of Pythagorean speculation. Morals were divided into two departments: disciplinary, or ethical, for the perfection of the individual; and political, for the furtherance of the common welfare. In both parts, great stress was laid upon the obligation and the benefit of friendship, which extended, also, to the metaphysical and to the material constitution of the universe, producing the harmony of the former, and the attractions, combinations, and absorptions of the latter. The efficacy of the Pythagorean friendship is exemplified by the well known story of Damon and Pythias. The Pythagorean Symbols belong mainly to practical morals, and exhibit a decided advance on the contemporaneous sentiments of the Greek world. They are unauthentic. Many belong to a later date, many are simply ceremonial, and others are general and traditional precepts.

Condensed and inadequate as is this summary of the alleged career and teachings of Pythagoras, it reveals the powerful influence exercised by him on the communities with which he was associated, and on the later generations who professed the adoption of his alleged philosophy. Admitting the utmost confusion and uncertainty in the chronology of both his biography and his doctrines, and the fabulous nature of much that was ascribed to him, it yet remains degrading to the reputation he left behind him, and is still "claram et venerabile nomen."

III. Literature.—All the historians of ancient philosophy, and all the extended histories of Greece, necessarily treat of Pythagoras with more or less fondness and with more or less discernment. Brucker, as usual, provides an ample accumulation of materials; Ueberrwerg is brief but perspicacious; while Ritter is very copious and discreet. Grotje's observations are valuable. Of more special sources of information may be enumerated: Mullach, Pythagoras (Camerum Commentarius, Lips. 1834); Aristotle, Metaphysics, lib. i, x, xii, xiii; Diogenes Laertius (ed. Hubner, Lips. 1828-31, 2 vola.); Forrhvittii, Pythogores Vitae; Iamblichii, Pythagora VITA (ed. Kiesling, Lips. 1813); Fabricii Bibliotheca Graecae, i., 750-804; Mason, ed. Smith, Dict. Greek and Roman Biog. and Myth. s. v.; Schiller, Doss. de Discipij Pythagoria; Terpstra, De Solis et Solarium Pythogori, Origine (Utrecht, 1824); Wendt, De Reti; Pauinus Soc. Pythagori (Lips. 1827); Ritter, Geschichte der Pythag. Philosophie (Hamburg, 1826); Krische, De Societate a Pythag. condito Scop. Pythag. (Gottingen, 1800); Bechmann, De Pythagore, Religio (Berlin, 1844); also Questions Pythagories (Brussels, 1832-1836); Langel, Pythagoras, sa Doctrine et son Histor. in the Rerum du Deux Mondes (Paris, 1864); Zeller, Pythagoras und die Pythagorassagen (Leips. 1865); Bialer, Pythagoras der Weise von Samos (Northhausen, 1865); Rambger, Grossreichenden und Pythagorasis (Gotha, 1866); Chaignet, Pythagore (Paris, 1873); Montes, Quelques Miscons sur le PHILOSOPHIE PYTHAGORAIS (Dousi, 1876).

Python occurs in the margin of Acts xxvi. 16, a spirit of Python, where the text of the A. V. reads a spirit of divination. The word Python (Πυθων in Greek mythology) is the name of a serpent or dragon slain by Apollo, then transferred to Apollo himself; in later times used for diviners, soothsayers, held to be inspired of the Pythian Apollo (Plutarch, De Defjet.; Orac. c. q.). The Pythones, like the obéd, “familiar spirits,” among the idolatrous Hebrews (Lev. xix, 31; 1 Sam. xxvii, 3, 7, 8, 9), were called enturiales epecies because the god or spirit was supposed to be in them, and to speak from their bellies without any motion of the lips. See NICROMANCY.

Pythianism (from Pythonica, a prophetess) inspired by the Pythian god in Delphi, Apollo, who killed the serpent Python in the country called Python, near Mount Parmassus) is the ecstatic straining after supernatural enlightenment, in order to be able to foresee the future: it is oracular mania. This degeneracy of the natural instinct of curiosity is well described by an anonymous author in the writing Une Pythonaise Contemporaine (Paris, 1835, 2vo). This book relates the adventures of a young lady of noble extraction, who is inveigled by the arts of a modern Pythoness, and, by her superstitious regard for the insane oracles of her teacher, gets from aberration to aberration, and falls at last into all kinds of turpitudes—into crime, vice, and misery. Pythianism is also called Sibylinism.

Pyx (πυξ, the box-tree; hence a box, properly boxwood) was in the Roman Catholic Church to contain the consecrated eucharistic elements, which are preserved after consecration, whether for the aim of the sick or for the devotion of the faithful.

Quadragesima (fortieth day) is a name sometimes applied to the Lenten season, or more properly to the first Sunday of Lent (q. v.). It is so called by analogy with the three Sundays which precede Lent, and which are called respectively Septagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima. The whole period of Quadragesima is in the Roman Catholic Church accounted as tempus clausum.

Quadrangle is an architectural term used to describe a square or court surrounded by buildings. The buildings of monasteries were generally arranged in quadrangles. See also Quadratum.

Quadramas. See FARTHING.

Quadratum (squared), a name which was given to the nave of a church because of its square form. See CHURCH; NAVE; QUADRANOLE.

Quadratus, bishop of Athens, flourished under the government of Antoninus Pius. Quadratus is reputed to have been a disciple of the apostles and a native of Athens. Under emperor Adrian, while Fulvius was bishop of Athens, the Christians were persecuted and the congregation scattered. When Quadratus later succeeded to the episcopate of Athens, he wrote, for the purpose of ending the persecution of his co-religionists, an Apology for the Christian Faith, and presented it to the emperor. This Apology, which had the desired effect, was extant in Eusebius's time, who tells us that it showed the genius of the man and the true doctrine of the apostles; but we have only a small fragment preserved by Eusebius in the fourth book of his history, wherein the author declares that “none could doubt the truth of the miracles of Jesus Christ, because the persons healed and raised from the dead by him had been seen, not only when he wrought his miracles, or while he was upon earth, but even a very great while after his death; so that there were many,” says he, “who were even yet speaking of our time.” The empress and others upon his authority, make of this Quadratus a different person from Quadratus the bishop of Athens; but this assertion is generally rejected. Jerome affirms that the Quadratus of Athens and the one reputed to have lived at Magnesia were the same. Nothing certain can be collected concerning the death of Quadratus; but it is supposed that he was banished from Athens, and then put to a variety of torments, under the reign of Adrian. See Eusebius, Hiat. Eccles. iv, 3; Cave, Hiat. Lit.; Donaldson, Literature of the Early Centuries; Lardner, Works; Hook, Eccles. Biol. viii, 178; Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biol. a. v.

Quadrato, Francesco Savero, a learned Italian Jew, was born in Valletina, Dec. 1, 1655. He was of an infirm and susceptible temper, which involved him in sundry broils and disappointments, in consequence of which he sought and obtained leave to quit the Order of the Jews and assume the garb of a secular priest or abbe. He died at Milan, Nov. 21, 1756. He is noted principally as a secular writer. His historical and descriptive work on his own country, which he dedicated to pope Benedict XIV—Dissertazioni Critico-storiche intorno alla Resin, di qua dalle Alpi oggi detta Valletina (Milan, 1755, 3 vols. 4to)—is the best account extant of that secluded region. But the principal work of Quadrato is his general history of poetry in all ages and countries; Storia e Regione d'ogni Poesia (Bologna and Milan, 1741-52, 7 vols. 4to), a laborious work, containing a vast deal of information not found collected in any other compilation; and, notwithstanding several mistakes and imperfections, is a very useful library book. Its composition occupied the author a considerable part of his life. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Générale, a. v.

Quadratrante is the technical term for the divisions of a vault into four triangular spaces.

Quadrissacramentarianism is a controversial name for some German reformers in Wittenberg and vicinity who maintained that there are four sacraments necessary to salvation, viz., baptism, the Lord's supper, absolution, and holy orders. See Melancthon, Loc. Comm., and other SACRAMENTARIANS.

Quadrivium (quatuor, four, and via, a road), the name given, in the language of the schools of the West, to the higher course of the mediæval studies, from its consisting of four branches, as the lower course, for an analogous reason, was called Trivium, or "Three Roads." The quadrivium consisted of arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy. It would carry us beyond our limit to detail the nature and extent of each of these branches as pursued in the mediæval schools. The reader will find much curious and new matter on all questions of this nature in the volumes of the works of Roger Bacon, lately edited in the series issued under authority of the Master of the Rolls, as also in the introduction prefixed to the volumes.

Quail (יוֹדָע, יַעַר, סֵלָד; Sept. ἑρμομηκία; Vulg. coturnix) occurs in Exod. xv. 13; Numb. xi. 31, 32; Ps. civ. 40, where it is mentioned as food of the Israelites while they were in the desert. According to Schultens (Orig. Heb. i. 201), the Hebrew שֵׁלָד is derived from an Arabic root "to be fat." The round, plump form of the quail is eminently suitable to this etymology; indeed, its fatness is proverbial. Josephus (Ant. iii. 15, 5), too, expressly names the bird referred to here oryx, ὄρυξ. In fact, the Hebrew word שֵׁלָד is unquestionably identical with the Arabic شَلَاد, a "quail." Nevertheless, various opinions have been held as to the nature of the food denoted by the Hebrew שֵׁלָד, which distinction was supposed to the Israelites in the wilderness (see Exod. xvi. 13, on which occasion the people were between Sin and Sinai, and Numb. xi. 31, 32, when at the station named, in consequence of the judgment which befell them, Kibroth-hattaavah). Ludolf, for instance, an author of high repute, has endeavored to show that the שֵׁלָד were locusts (see his Dissertatio de Locustis, cum Distributis, etc. [Franc. ad Moen. 1694]). His opinion has been fully advocated and adopted by Patrick (Comment. on Numb. xi. 31, 32). The Jews of Arabia also, as we learn from Niebuhr (Johannes confer. Arab. p. 172), are convinced that the birds which the Israelites ate in such numbers were only clouds of locusts, and they laugh at those translators who supposed that they found quails where quails were never seen. Rudbeck (Ichthyol. Bibl. Spec. i.) has argued in favor of the שֵׁלָד being suitable to this etymology; some species of the genus Eremocetes. Michaelis at one time held the same opinion, but afterwards properly abandoned it (see Rosenmüller, Not. ad Bocch. Hieroz. ii. 619). A later writer, Ehrenberg (Geograph. Geisch. i. 86), from having taken the number of "flying-fool" (gurmands, the genus Trikala of Oken, Dactyloptera of modern ichthyologists) lying dead on the shore near Elin, believed that this was the food of the Israelites in the wilderness, and named the fish Trikala Israelitarum. Hermann von der Harth supposed that the locust bird (Pistor rosae) was intended by שֵׁלָד; and recently Mr. Forster (Voice of Israel, p. 98) has advanced an opinion that "red geese" of the genus Casarca are to be understood by the Hebrew term. A similar explanation has been suggested by Stanley (S. and P. p. 82) and adopted by Tenmout (Cypr. i. 487, note): this is apparently an old conceit, for Patrick (on Numb. xi. 31) alludes to such an explanation. Some writers, while they hold that the original word denotes "quails," are of opinion that a species of sand-grouse (Pterocles alchata), frequent in the Bible lands, is also included under the term (see Rosenmüller [Not. ad Herod. ii. 949], Faber [in Harms, ii. 442], and Genuesen [Theol. s. v. שֵׁלָד]). It is usual to refer to Hasselquist as the authority for believing that the Kutta (sand-grouse) is denoted: this traveler, however, was rather inclined to believe, with some of the writers named above, that "locusts," and not birds, are to be understood (p. 448); and it is strange that he means by Trikala Israelitarum. Linnaeus supposed he intended by it the common "quail." In one paragraph he states that the Arabians call a bird of a "grayish color and less than our partridge" by the name of Kutta. He adds "An Selaw?" This cannot be the Pterocles alchata. The view taken by Ludolf may be dismissed with a very few words. The expression in Ps. lxxviii. 27, of "feathered fowl" (בּוֹרֶא פַּר), which is used in reference to the שֵׁלָד, clearly denotes some bird, and Ludolf quite fairly supposes that it may include winged insects. Again, there is not a shadow of evidence to support the opinion that שֵׁלָד can ever signify any "locus," this term being used in the Arabic and the cognate languages to denote a "quail." As to any species of "flying-fool," whether belonging to the genus Dactyloptera or to that of Eremocetes, being intended, it will be enough to state that "flying-fool" are quite unable to sustain their flight above a few hundred yards at the most, and never could have been taken in the Red Sea in numbers sufficient to supply the Israelite host. The interpretation of שֵׁלָד by "wild geese" or "wild cranes," or any "wild fowl," is a gratuitous assumption without a particle of evidence in its favor. The Casarca, with which Mr. Forster identifies the שֵׁלָד, is the C. albula, a bird of about the size of a mallard, which can by no means answer the supposed requisite of standing three feet high from the ground. The large red-legged cranes of which Prof. Stanley speaks are evidently white storks (Ciconia albus), and would fulfill the condition as to height; but the flesh is so nauseous that no Israelite could ever have done more than have tasted it. With respect to the Pterocles alchata, neither it, nor indeed any other species of the genus, agrees with the Scriptural account of the שֵׁלָד. The sand-grouse is a bird of strong wing and of unwearied flight, and never could have been captured in any numbers by the Israelite multitude. It is at all times a tenant of the wilderness far from water, and, strictly taken, is perhaps not a clean bird, all the species subsisting, for the most part, on larvae, beetles, and insects. We must question, moreover, whether the people would have eaten to excess—for so much the expression translated "fully satisfied" (Ps. lxxviii. 29) implies—of the flesh of this bird, for, according to the testimony of travellers, from Dr. Russell (History of Aleppo [2d ed.], ii. 194) down to observers of to-day, the flesh of the sand-grouse is hard and tasteless. The ἑρμομηκία, or "quail-moth," of the Sept., should not be passed over without a brief notice. It is not easy to determine what bird is intended by this term as used by Aristotle and Pliny (ortypaemeta). According to the account given of this bird by the Greek and Latin writers on natural history just mentioned, the ortypaemeta precedes the quail in its migrations, and acts as a sort of leader to the flight. Some ornithologists, as Belon and Fleming (Brut. Anim. p. 98) have assigned this term to the "land-mill" (Ceris promeris), the Rois des Cailleux of the French, Ré de Quaglio of the Italians, and the Waclowicz of the Germans, but without making out what he means by Trikala Israelitarum. Probably the Sept. uses the term as a synonym of שֵׁלָד, or to express the good condition in which the birds were, for Hexebychus explains ἑρμομηκία by ὄρνιθ.
QUAIL

See Partridge.

The objections which have been urged by Patrick and others against "quails" being intended are very easily refuted. The expression "as it were two cubits [high] upon the face of the earth" (Numb. xi. 31) is explained by the Sept., by the Vulg., and by Josephus (Ant. iii. 1, 5) to refer to the height at which the quails flew above the ground, in their exhausted condition from their long flight. As to the enormous quantities which the least successful Israelite is said to have taken (viz., "ten homers") in the space of a night and two days, there is every reason for believing that the "homers" here spoken of do not denote strictly the measure of that name, but simply "a heap;" this is the explanation given by Onkelos and the Arabic versions of Sadias and Erpenius in Num. xi. 31. Indeed, the inspired historian has himself shown that a complete covering of the ground with a compact mass is out of the question. For he has informed us that the people "spread them all abroad for themselves round about the camp." This was in order to dry them in the sun for keeping, and it would require to be performed before the decomposition had begun to set in; therefore the ground about the camp was free and clean for the drying process, which could not have been if it had been covered a yard deep with birds, twenty bushels to the square yard. As it was, however, the store they collected in thirty-six hours lasted them for a whole month. The bodies, after having been split and cleansed, may have been simply dried in the sun without any antiseptic; for desiccation having once taken place, which a few hours of sunshine would be sufficient to accomplish, the stock would be preserved in the arid climate of the desert for an indefinite period. Thus the flesh of animals taken in hunting is simply sun-dried in South Africa, and thus the stock-dash of the Norwegians is prepared from the cod, without salt. It is possible that a portion of the preserved meat may have been salted. The Egyptians used a large quantity of salt provisions, particularly fish and fowl; and the processes of splitting and salting geese are well depicted in the paintings of the tombs. The Hebrews would thus be sufficiently familiar with the art; and we know, from the ordinances concerning sacrifices (Lev. ii. 18), that they carried salt with them. But that they had, or could on the spur of the occasion procure, salt enough for the curing of a hundred millions of bushels of quails (allowing twenty millions to have been consumed in the fresh state), is altogether improbable. A comparatively small quantity may have been so preserved, but the bulk was doubtless simply sun-dried. The Egyptians similarly prepared these birds (see Herodotus [ii. 77], and Maillet [Lettres sur l’Egypte, ix. 21; iv. 130]). See Exodus.

Common Quail (Coturnix coturnix). Quails form a subdivision of the Tetraonidae, or grouse family, being distinguished from partridges by their smaller size, finer bill, shorter tail, and the want of a red naked eyebrow and of spurs on the legs. There are several species, whereof the common, now distinguished by the name of Coturnix coturnix, is abundant in all the temperate regions of Europe and Western Asia, migrating to and from Africa in the proper season. Thus it crosses the Mediterranean and Black seas twice a year in vast numbers; but being a light bird of heavy flight, the passage is partially conducted by way of intermediate islands or through Spain, and in the East, in still greater numbers, along the Syrian desert into Arabia, forming, especially at the spring season, an innumerable host. The quail, till that species of the genus known to migrate, has, in fact, a very wide geographical range, being found in China, India, the Cape of Good Hope, and England, and, according to Temminck, in Japan (see Col. Sykes’s paper on The Quails and Hempsols of India [Trans. of Zool. Soc. vol. ii]). Enormous flocks of this bird, after crossing an immense surface of sea, are annually observed at the spring and fall to take a brief repose in the islands of Malta, Sicily, Sardinia, Crete, in the kingdom of Naples, and about Constantinople, where on those occasions there is a general shooting-match which lasts a whole week. This always occurs in the autumn. The birds, starting from the Crimea about seven at night, and with a northerly wind, before dawn accomplish a passage of above sixty leagues in breadth, and alight on the southern shore to feed and repose. In the vernal season the direction of the flight is reversed; but it is more than probable that this is done in a similar condition on the Russian coast. The same phenomena occur at Malta, etc.; and as gregarious birds of passage are known to guide their course by given landmarks, which they distinguish with unerring precision, and which, unless they have been driven out of their usual direction by storms of wind, they invariably arrive at or over before they take a new flight, so also quails congregate in Arabia in numbers proportionate to the surface of Western Asia, whither they are proceeding. The providential nature of their arrival with in and around the camp of the Israelites, in order that they might furnish meat to a murmuring people, appears from the fact of its taking place where it was not to be expected; the localities, we presume, being out of the direction of the ordinary passage; for, had this not been the case, the dwellers in that region, and the Israelites themselves, accustomed to tend their flocks at no great distance from the spot, would have regarded the phenomenon as a well-known periodical occurrence. Aristotle (Anim. viii, 14) mentions the habit; and Pliny (Hist. Nat. x. 25) states that they sometimes alight on vessels in the Mediterranean, and even in the Nile. Beadon found quails alight in autumn on a vessel bound from Rhodes to Alexandria; they were passing from the north to the south, and had wheat in their crates. In the preceding spring, sailing from Zante to the Mores, Buffon relates that M. le Commandant Godlew saw quails constantly passing Malta during certain winds in May, and repassing in September; and that they flew by night. Tournefort (Voyage, i. 329) says that all the islands of the Archipelago in certain seasons of the year are covered with these birds. Col. Sykes states that such quantities were once caught in Capri, near Naples, as to have afforded the bishop no small share of his revenue, and that in consequence he has been called Bishop of Quails. The same writer mentions also (Trans. Zool. Soc. vol. ii. 190) that 100,000 quails have been netted in one season on this little island. M. Temminck says that in spring such prodigious numbers of quails alight on the western shores of the kingdom of Naples, about Nettuno, that one hundred thousand are taken in a day (Vaccari, Rer. aves, v. 404). It is interesting to note the time specified: "it was at even" that they began to arrive; and they, no doubt, continued to come all the night. Many observers have recorded that the quail migrates by night, though this is denied by Col. Montagu.
Quaini, Luigi, an Italian painter, the son of Francesco, was born at Bologna in 1643. After having acquired the rudiments of the art and a knowledge of perspective from his father, he became a disciple first of Giuretto, and afterwards of his relation Carlo Cignani, in whose school he was contemporary with Marc Antonio Franceschini. His improvement was so great that in a few years he was employed, as well as Franceschini, to assist Cignani in the execution of some of his great works. Their method of handling and coloring was so similar that it was difficult to determine what part of any work was executed by either of them. In Cignani's principal works, however, it seems that Quaini painted the landscape, the architecture, and other ornaments, and Franceschini the figures. After Cignani's death the two artists continued to work together. They were employed at Bologna, Modena, Piacenza, Genoa, and Rome, where they painted the cartoons for a cupola in St. Peter's, which has since been executed in mosaic. Quaini also painted many historical subjects from his own compositions, which were executed by himself. In the church of St. Joseph at Bologna there is a picture of the Visitation; in La Carità, the dead Christ Supported by the Virgin; and in the church of St. Nicholas the principal altar-piece is by Quaini—it represents St. Nicholas in the Piazza Vittorio and an Angel, and is favorably spoken of by Lanzi. Quaini died in 1717.

Quam despectus, quam despectus, is the beginning of a passion-hymn, written by the doctor seraphicus, St. Bonaventura (q.v.), of which the first stanza runs thus:

"Quam despectus, quam despectus, Hoc coronarium set effectus,
Ut salvatur seculum;
Beantit et substitit,
Patris et genceus vivat Ueque ad patibulum."

This beautiful hymn has been translated into English by P. S. Worsley, and from the Lyra Musicana, p. 275, we subjoin the first stanza:

"Oh, what shame and desolation, Working out the world's salvation,
Deigned the King of Heaven to bear!
See him bowed with sorrow's endless,
Hungry, thirsty, poor, and friendless,
Even to the cross repair."

For the original, see Trench, Sacred Latin Poetry (London, 1864), p. 159 (B. P.).

Quam dilecta tabernaculâ is the beginning of a prose of Adam of St. Victor (d. about 1192) for the dedication of a church. "This hymn," says Mr. Trench, "of which the theme is the dignities and glories of the Church, as prefigured in the Old Testament and fulfilled in the New, is the very extravagance of typical application, and were it only as a study in mediæval typology, would be worthy of insertion; but it has other and higher merits, even though it must be owned rather that the poet's learned stuff masters him, than that he is able effectually to master it. Its title indicates that it was composed for the occasion of a dedication of the services of which time were ever laid out for the carrying of men's thoughts from the temple made with hands to that spiritual temple, on earth or in heaven, whose builder and maker is God." We subjoin the first verse:

"Quam dilecta tabernaculâ
Domini virtutem et aetia Quam electi architecti, Plens, optans, et ostens,
Que non movent, immo forest, Venus, flumin, pluvia!"

There are two English translations of this prose, one by W. B. Flower, in Lyra Mystica, p. 211 sq.; "How loved thy halls and dwelling-place"—and the other by Nasee, in his Medieval Hymns, p. 146 sq., with explanatory notes. A third translation, but only of the last stanza, is given by Mr. Bonar in the Sunday at Home (Jan. 1787), which, for their beauty, we subjoin:

"Quam dilecta tabernaculâ
This our day of grace displays!
On the couch with our beloved
We bring rest, and sing, and praise,
Now the bridal day has come!

Days of which the silver trumpets
Of the ancient feasts first told;"
QUANDT

Day of days, whose promised glory
Israel's holy psalms unfold, Giving voice to solemn sound.

"Thousand, thousand are the praises
To the Bridgeway which they raise:
With one voice in triumph singing
Through the everlasting days, Hallelujah, without end."

Quandt, Johann Jacob, a Lutheran theologian, doctor and professor of theology, was born March 27, 1666, at Königberg, in Prussia, where he also died Jan. 17, 1722, as church-counsellor and general superintendent. Quinian Version. The Quines, a wandering people, for whom this version is made, inhabit that most northerly portion of Lapland which is called Finmark or Norwegian Lapland. This dreary region, having for its northern boundary the Arctic or Frozen Ocean, is the habitat of about 6000 people, called the Quines, who till within the last half century were left without any version of the Scriptures in their vernacular dialect. The Bible Society of Finland sent them copies of the Finnish Testament, but this version was unintelligible to them, and even so the Lappish Testament, although they speak a dialect of Laplandish. In 1822 the British and Foreign Bible Society voted £200 to promote a version in Quinian, and it was not till the year 1829 that arrangements for the immediate translation of the New Testament were made by the Norwegian Society. The execution of the translation was committed to Mr. Stockleth, a missionary of eminent devotedness, who in 1829 was laboring as a pastor among the uncivilized tribes of Laplanders under the seventy-first degree of north latitude, and during ten months of the year, the sun never rises. In 1840 the translation of the New Testament was completed, and an edition was published at Christiania, under the superintendence of the Norwegian Bible Society. See The Bible of Every Land, p. 324. Quanwon is, in Japanese mythology, an embodiment of the goddess Amida. She is represented with a multitude of hands, each holding a different object, probably things useful to men, whom she has undertaken to make happy. Her temples are splendid, of extraordinary dimensions, and filled with idols: 33,333 are said to be contained in the temple of Mioko; hence its name, San san San Tein, which signifies the temple of the 33,333 images. A large number of children are represented around her in pictures: they are the gods themselves looking up to her with love and veneration.

QuARRANTA. In the mountainous wilderness between Jerusalem and Jericho, in which, according to tradition, our Lord's temptation took place, there is a very high mountain, one of the highest in Judea, called Quarranta (by the Arabs Karanta), in allusion to the forty days' fasting of Jesus, and which is supposed to be the mount alluded to in Matt. iv, 8 (see Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 450; Wilson, Bible Lands, ii, 12); but by some it is identified with the Rock of Kimmern, where the defeated Benjaminites took refuge (Judg. xx, 47). "The mountain rises precipitously, an almost perpendicular wall of rock, twelve or fifteen hundred feet above the plain, crowned with a chapel on its highest point. The eastern front is full of grotts and caverns, where hermits are said once to have dwelt in great numbers. At the present day, some three or four Abydonians are said to come hither annually to pass the time of Lent upon the mountain, living only upon herbs. There is nothing else remarkable about this naked cliff to distinguish it from the other similar ones along the Ghor and the Dead Sea farther south. The tradition which regards the mountain as the place of our Lord's temptation, as well as the name Quarranta, appears not to be older than the age of the Crusades" (Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 803).

Quare impedit (i. e. why he is hindered) is the title of an English action whereby a person who has purchased an advowson, or right of presentation to an ecclesiastical benefice, sues any one who disturbs or hinders him in the exercise of his legal right.

Quare incumbavit (why he has cumbered or taken possession). During a plea between two persons for the possession of an advowson [see QUARE IMPEDE], if the bishop admits the presence of one of them within six months, the other can have a writ of this form against the bishop.

Quare non admisit (why he has not admitted). When one has recovered an advowson, and the bishop refuses to admit his presence, such a writ may be employed.

Quarrel (Fr. carré, square) is a technical term employed in architecture to describe a diamond-shaped pane of glass, or a square one placed diagonally. It is also the name of a small piercing in the tracery of a window. A wax taper (q. v.) used in churches is also called "quarrel."

Quary (Sisq. pasti, but only in the plur.; Sept. ἄμια, Vulg. ibida). In the account of the exploit of Ehud in Judg. iii, 19, 26, for the "quaries that were by Gilgal" of our version, or, as the Syriac and the Chaldee read, stone-pits or quarries, the primary signification of images of false gods may be intended, as in Deut. vii, 25; Isa. xliii, 8; Jer. viii, 19; ii, 52; Hos. xi, 12, etc., and it is so understood by the Sept. and the Vulg. in the above text. We have no knowledge of any quarries at Gilgal, in the plain of Jericho; and Boothroyd conjectures that idols might have been erected at Gilgal by Eglon, and that the sight of them there inspired Ehud with new ardor to execute his purpose. Rosenmüller, after Rashii, adheres to the above inter-prestation of quarries, and in this Fürst and Keil agree. The last-named interpreter remarks that the Gilgal intended cannot be the one near the Jordan, but that in the hills of Ephraim. See Gilgal. Gesenius regards Pasilim as the name of a place. Casel, in Lange’s Commentary, understands it by boundary-stones, i.e. “termi ci of the ancient Canaanites. These nations had extensive quarries is evinced by the cyclopean blocks at the foundation of the temple at Baalbek (q.v.).

Quartodecimani, a name in ecclesiastical history for those Christians of Asia Minor who, in the first ages of the Church, annually commemorated the death of Christ at the 14th of Nisan, the time when the Jews celebrated the Passover [see Paschal Controversy], and three days after the resurrection of Jesus, totally ignoring the regard for the day of the week usually taken as the one on which this event is believed to have occurred. This difference it was determined to adjust at the Council of Nice in A.D. 325, when it was decreed that the practice of observing Friday as the day of crucifixion (q.v.), and the following Sunday as the day of ascension (q.v.), should prevail. Those who refused to accept this decision of the council were denounced Quartodecimans, because of the motive of possessing for the fourteenth day of the first Hebrew month as the proper time for observing Easter, quartodecima luna, on the fourteenth day of the moon. They are sometimes called Paschics. The Aeulians, Montanists, Novatians, and other sects were Quartodecimani. See Schaff, CA.Hist., vol. ii; Riddle, Christian Antiquities; Waterland, Works, vol. vi.

Quartus (Greekized Coptic, for the Latin quartus, fourth), a Christian resident at Corinth, and, from his name, apparently a Roman, whose salutations Paul communicated to the Church of Rome in his epistle thereto (Rom. xvi, 23). A.D. cir. 50. There is the usual tradition that he was one of the seventy disciples; and it is also said that he ultimately became bishop of Berytus (Tillemont, i, 384).

Quas laudes tibi nos, Pater, casernus, is beginning of one of the hymns written by the “preceptor Germanicus,” Philip Melancthon (q.v.). It was composed in the year 1527, and is based on Ps. cxiii. It is one of his other poems, of which he composed about 400, in Bretschneider’s Corpus Reformatorum (Hal. Sax. 1842), vol. x. A selection of about fifty-one, together with a German metrical translation, was published by Oberhöf, Melanchthon’s Gedichte, ausg. und übersetzt (Halle, bei Mahlmann, 1602). See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenleides, i, 259 (B. 1).

Quaser. The Scandinavian Edda tells us that the divine families of the Asas and Vanas, having warred against each other for many years, felt tired at last of these never-ceasing disputes, and determined to create a being on whom the wisdom they might safely rely, and whom they would take for their empire. The Asas and Vanas spat into a common vessel, and formed Quaser. He was so wise that no one could ask him a question which he was not able to answer. Therefore, having pronounced his sentence in the quarter of the gods, he travelled about the world to impart his wisdom to men. But two gnomes, Flalar and Galar, killed him, mingled his blood with honey, and thus prepared a de cious meal, which made poets of all those who tasted it. In the gods’ court, some pronounced some anxiety as to what had become of the great sage, the gnomes managed to spread the rumor that Quaser had been choked by his own wisdom (a phrase which has become proverbial in the north), as nobody could relieve him of it by his questions. Shortly afterwards the same dwarfs killed the giant Gilling and his wife by crushing them with a mili-stone while sleeping. The giant Suttung, Gilling’s son, avenged his father by exposing the murderers on a deserted island, to die there of starvation. In this extremity they offered him, to ransom their lives, their poetical meal. Suttung listened to their proposition, set them free, and had the precious liquid carefully guarded by the giantess, and poured it into the interior of a mountain. Odín, by a stratagem, penetrared into the mountain, gained the favor of the young giantess, and drank the mead to the last drop.

Quasi-modogenitis is a term sometimes used to denote the first Sunday after Easter. It is of comparatively late origin, and is derived from the Latin version of 1 Pet. ii, 2: “Quasi modo geniti infantes, etc.”—“As new-born babes,” etc. See Easter.

Quatember are fasts observed in the Church of Rome, and by other ecclesiastical bodies, among them the Church of England. According to Jewish custom, the four seasons of the year were observed as occasions for fasting. These were the four fast-weeks: one after Ash-Wednesday, Pentecost, the Crucifixion (Sept. 14), and after Lucia (Dec. 15). The fast-days were Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. Wednesday was the day on which the churches customarily offerings were made, and it was principally called Quatember-day. In the German Protestant Church these fasts were for a long time observed also.

Quater-nion (verpāsō, a body of four). “A quartemion of soldiers” (Acts xii, 4) was a detachment of four men, which was the usual number of a Roman night-watch (Veget. De Re Mūlit., iii, 8; Philo, In Flacc. p. 98; Polyb. vi, 38, 87). See Soldier. Peter, therefore, was guarded by four soldiers, two within the prison, probably attached to his person, and two outside the doors of the dungeon. The watch was usually changed every three hours, it was necessary that the “four quartemions” mentioned in the text should be appointed for the purpose. See Prison. Or one set of sentinels may have been posted at the door of the cell (which was probably thought to be so secure as not to require a guard within), and another at the outer gate (Walch, De Vincula Petri, in his Dissert. ad loc.). See Peter.

Quatre-mère, Étienne Marie, a celebrated French Orientalist, was born at Paris, July 12, 1782. He began his studies at a very early age, and as a youth was noted for his remarkable attainments. In 1807 he was employed in the Imperial Library, and in 1809 was called to the professor’s chair at Rouen. In 1815 he was appointed to the Academy of Inscriptions, and in 1819 instructor of Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac at the College of France. He succeeded the venerable Persian of Persia. He was now known as one of the greatest Orientalists in the world, and was especially noted as an Egyptologist, and how well he deserved this distinction appears from his publications in this line of study. In his religious pro cilities he was Gallican and Jansenist. He used his pen freely against the innovations of the papists and against their assumptions. We have not room here to mention his severe satires against the Ultramontanes, but refer the reader who desires to study them to Renan’s Essays. Quatre-mère died Sept. 16, 1857.

Quaw James E., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in the United States. He was graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1828, and was engaged during his ministerial life chiefly in missionary work among feeble churches in New York and Michigan. He was the author of two remarkable books—The Cold Water Fountain, an Exposition of the Bible Baptism, or the Immerger Instructed from Various Sources. The latter has passed through a number of editions, and is a real treasury of information, and of learned, acute, and valuable discussion of the mode of baptism. The object is to place before the reader the results of learned investigation, and to prove that immersion is not the only scriptural mode of baptism; that sprinkling is scriptural, and that infants are proper subjects of that ordinance. The individuality of the author's character, life, and ministry, and his independence of thought and treatment of his subject, may be gathered from his preface statement: 'Many of the manuscripts of ancient writers were lost, and others corrupted, while the author was travelling in primitive apostolic style in different parts of the great American valley. In these, his ministerial journeys, he usually preached six or eight times a week, while he often travelled on foot without purse or scrip; two roads, sometimes with scarcely one, often for days without bread and occasionally without water. But the mighty God of Jacob was always with him. . . . This book was written in a Western log-cabin, in a room which at one and the same time answered for a study, a parlor, a sitting-room, a dining-hall, bedroom, and kitchen. The hours which, for six or eight months the author could spare from the discharge of the duties of a New-Testament bishop, he has, in this rather romantic study, devoted to this work.' Mr. Quay was lost on Lake Erie in the dreadful wreck of the steamship Otsego in 1845. He was a godly, self-denying man, peculiar in appearance and manner, a faithful missionary to the needy, and an able writer. (W. J. R. T.)

Quedara Wardon is a Hindu festival in honor of the goddess Paravati (q. v.). It imposes on him who has once celebrated it the obligation of celebrating it every year subsequently; the posthumous corpse is distinguished by a yellow string, which they carry around their arm. They fast the whole day of the feast.

Queddi is a Hindu feast in honor of the goddess Mariatali. The performances are the same as those of the goddess Mariyamma. Mariatali is probably identical with the latter.

Quedlinburg, Sxronon of. Several ecclesiastical councils were held in this German city in mediæval times. The first took place in 1085. The bishops who sided with pope Gregory VII assembled it immediately after Easter, and it was presided over by the papal legate Otto di Ostia. Among those who attended were archbishops Gebhard of Salzburg and Hartwick of Magdeburg; the bishops Adalber of Würzburg, Altmann of Passau, Bernard of Meersburg, Günther of Zeis, St. Benno of Meissen, Albert of Worms, Burchard of Halberstadt, Herrmann of Metz, Reformhard of Minden, Wigold of Augsburg, Gebhard of Constance, and Hartwig of Hamburg. The council recognized, first, the primacy of the pope, whose decisions it was allowed to no one to alter or to criticize. In conformity with the decrees of former popes, the consecration of the bishops unlawfully established by Henry IV, Wenzel of Mentz, Siegfried of Augsburg, Gebhard of Chur, etc., was declared null, and likewise all other ordinations and consecrations of the same kind. The synod rejected the erroneous assertions of Wenzel of Mentz in regard to excommunication. Excommunications are only valuable when they are pronounced against a king or a church. The following resolutions are of a general kind: The sixth canon recommends to the priests, deacons, and subdeacons perpetual continence; the seventh canon prohibits the lays from touching the altar-pails and holy vessels; according to the eighth canon, the lays shall not take hold of the dimes without having the consent of the legitimate owners; the ninth canon directs that the spring fast of Quatember shall be held in the first week of Lent, the summer fast in the week of Pentecost; the tenth canon decrees no one shall eat eggs or cheese during the forty days of Lent; the eleventh canon declares that the choice made by the legate Otto of Gebhard as bishop of Constance, and everything done by the legate in that city, is approved by the council. At the close of the council the anathema was pronounced, with burning tapers, against the anti-pope Wilbert (pseudo-Clemens III), the heresiarch; against the apostate Hugo of Alba, who had presided at the Council of Worms in 1076; against Johannes (Petrus), archbishop of Porto, and against Petrus, late chancellor of the see; against archbishop Liemar of Bremen, Udo of Hildesheim, Otto of Constance, Burchard of Basle, and others; against the usurping bishops Wenzel, archbishop of Mentz; Siegfried, bishop of Augsburg; Norbert, bishop of Chur, and all their followers. See Labbe, Concil. x; Hardouin, Concil. vii; Hartzmnik, Conc. Germ.; Blutner, Deutsche Conc. vol. iii; Fliche, Histoire eccl. 1855, vol. i, pp. 303, 306. Quedua was, in Hindu mythology, the son of Kasriaka and Siugfrieda. He and his brother Rahu were dreadful giants and wicked demons. They tried to prevent the gods from preparing the beverage of immortality, the amrita. The gods having succeeded in their enterprise, by causing the Mandar Mountain to rotate in the middle of the milk sea, the two giants robbed the vessels containing the liquid. They were defeated and slain. The sun and moon had been witnesses to the robbery: they denounced it to Vishnu, who cut off the heads of the giants at the very moment when they carried the immortalizing liquid to their lips. A drop of the amrita had already made the two heads immortal; they flew towards the sky and became the seven stars in the zodiac; these seven stars are only visible at the time of eclipses. They are fierce enemies of the sun and moon, which they pursue and try to swallow.

Queen. The Hebrews had no word properly answering to our term queen in the sense of a female sovereign, either in the title, the dignity, or the power; to which that dignity denotes. Of the three Hebrew terms used as the equivalents of "queen" in the A. V. (יָשָּׁר לְאֶלֹהִים: יָשָּׁר לְאֶלֹהִים), the first (malakáh) alone is applied to a queen regnant; the first and second (shegedh) equally to a queen consort; without, however, implying the dignity which in European nations attaches to that position; and the third (gebiráh) to the queen mother, to whom that dignity is transferred in Oriental courts. The etymological force of the words accords with their application. Malakáh is the feminine of melék, "king;" it is applied in its first sense to the queen of Sheba (1 Kings x, 1), and in its second to the church (Mal. iv, 2, compared with 1 Cor. xii, 28; Heb. x, 22 sq.); Gebiráh is the feminine of gebir, "queen," and is applied to Solomon's bride, to the queen of Sheba, to the church, to the personification of Mary, the mother of Jesus, to the queen of the Chaldean and Persian monarchs (Dan. v, 2, 8; Neh. ii, 6). Gebiráh, on the other hand, is expressive of authority; it means "powerful" or "mistress," being the feminine of נָשָּׁר, gebir, "master," or "lord." The feminine is to be understood by its relation to the masculine name, which is not applied to kings or churches, but to general authority and dominion. It is, in fact, the word which occurs twice with reference to Isaac's blessing of Jacob: "Be lord over thy brethren;" and "I have made him thy lord" (Gen. xxvii, 29, 37). It would therefore be applied to the female who exercised the highest authority in the state. As this is in the line of the legitimate owners, it is not the wife, but the mother, of the master. Strange as such an arrangement at first sight appears, it is one of the inevitable results of polygamy: the number of the wives, their social position previous to marriage, and the precariousness of their hold on the affections of their lord combine to annihilate their influence, which is transferred to the mother, as being the only female who occupies a fixed and dignified position. Hence the application of the term gebiráh to the queen mother, the extent of whose influence is well illustrated by the narrative of the interview of Solomon and Bathsheba, as given in 1 Kings ii, 19 sq. The term is applied to Maachaiah, Asia's mother, who was deposed from her dignity in consequence of her idolatry (1 Kings xv, 13; 2 Chron. xv, 16); to Jezabel as contrasted with Joram (2 Kings x, 13, "the children of the king and the children of the queen"), and to Bathsheba (Jer. xiii, 18; comp. 2 Kings xxix, 12; Jer. xxix, 2). In 1 Kings xi, 19, the text perhaps requires emendation, the reading followed in the Sept., יתלע"א, "the elder," according better with the context. The limited use which is made even of the restricted term gebirhad is somewhat remarkable. It is only employed twice with reference to the wife of a king: in one of these two cases it is applied to the wife of the king of Egypt, where the condition of the royal consort was not queenly (in 1 Kings x, 19; comp. Wilkinson, loc. cit. Egypt. ii, 59; iii, 64; v, 29); and in the other to Jezabel, the wife of Ahab, who, as the daughter of a powerful king, appears to have enjoyed peculiar privileges in her matrimonial state (2 Kings x, 13). In two other places it is noted that the king's wife or his father is intended (Jer. xiii, 18; xxix, 2); and in the remaining passages it is pointedly referred to the king's mother in such terms as clearly show that the state which she held was one of positive dignity and rank (1 Kings xv, 13; 2 Chron. xv, 16). See W. A. The absence of all inquiry into the subject seems to show that among the Jewish kings the usages bearing on this point were not different from those which are still exhibited in Western Asiatic courts. Where woman never becomes the head of the State, there can be no queen regnant; and where polygamy is allowed or practiced, there can be no queen consort. There will, however, be a chief wife in the harem; and this is no doubt the rank indicated in the Bible by the words which we render "queen." This rank may be variously acquired. The first wife of the king; or the first whom he took after his accession, usually obtained it; and if she is both of high birth and becomes the mother of the first son, her position is tolerably secure; but if she possesses neither of these advantages, she may be superseded in her position as head of the harem by a wife of higher birth and connections subsequently espoused, or by one who becomes the mother of the heir apparent. The king, however, will sometimes act according to his own pleasure in this matter, promote any favorite lady to this dignity, and also remove her from it at his pleasure; but more generally it is convenient to follow the established routine. The daughter of the king of Egypt was doubtless, from her high rank, the chief wife of Solomon; as was Jezabel, for the same reason, the chief wife of Ahab. In like manner the high-born mother of Absalom was probably the chief wife of David, although it is possible that the mother of the eldest son, Amnon, at first enjoyed that distinction, which, we may safely presume, eventually devolved on Bathsheba, after her son Solomon had been recognized as the heir. In one of Mr. Morier's amusing books (Hiiss Robe in Langleys), there is a passage which strikingly illustrates this matter. The court of Persia is there represented as being perplexed how to answer a letter which, in ignorance of Eastern customs, had been addressed by the queen consort of England "to the queen of Persia." The cause of the dilemma thus created was that..." Although the shah's principal wife is called the banou harem, or head of the seraglio, yet her situation in the State bears so little affinity to that of the queen of England as one may say the she-buffalo kept in the enclosure for food and milk has to the echo of the eagle to the Hindu." Our law forbids killing and create banous at pleasure, whereas the queen of England maintains her poet till the hand of fate lays her in the grave" (comp. Chantin, Voyages [ed. Langley], vol. vi, ch. xii; Thornton's Turkey, ii, 204-280). Very different was, and is to this day, in Western Asia, the position of the king's mother, whose state is much the nearest to that of a European queen of any with which the East is acquainted. It is founded on that essential principle of Oriental manners which in all cases considers the mother of the husband as a far superior person to his wife, and as entitled to more respect and reverence than herself. This principle should be clearly understood; for it extends throughout the Bible, and is yet entirely different from our own social arrangements, under which the mother, as soon as she becomes widowed, abandons her place as head of the family to the daughter-in-law. Mr. Urquhart has admirably illustrated and developed this principle in his Spirit of the East (ii, 387 sq.); and his remarks, although primarily illustrative of Turkish manners, are, with some unessential limitations, applicable to the ancient and modern East. In p. 300 there is an anecdote of the late Ibrahîm Pasha, who is represented as staying a whole week in the harem of his mother, waiting to find a favorable opportunity of pressing a request upon her; and when admitted, kissing her feet, refusing to be seated, and standing an hour and a half before her with his arms crossed behind his back, all according to the suit which he—the conqueror of Syria and the victor of Konieh—preferred to an aged woman. The arrangement in the seraglio of the more magnificent Hebrew monarchs was probably similar to that of Turkey, with this difference, that the chief women in the harems of the Jewish sovereigns entered it as wives, and not as slaves. The grand signior, from an indeterminate number of female slaves, selects his favorites, who are distinguished by the title of esnub, which, as it means "lady of the house," seems nearly equivalent to the Hebrew gebirhad. The number of these is said to be limited to seven, and their rank seems to correspond to that of the "wives" of the Hebrew seraglio, whose number was unlimited. The mother of a boy is called ha-sheky, unless the boy die, in which case she descends to her former rank. The esnubus, or wives, of a deceased or deposed sultan are all removed from the imperial harem to a separate palace, with the single exception of the valide sultan, the mother of the reigning sultan, who has her liberty, a palace, and revenues to support a suitable establishment. But the hasekis, or those who have a son living, are treated with marked respect, as in the natural course of events they may become sovereigns. The title of sultan (for the Turkish has no distinction of gender), though from courtesy it may be given to the hasekis, is strictly speaking, appropriate only to the sovereign's mother, and to the sons and daughters of the imperial family (Engl. thor, ii, 276; Urquhart, ii, 433). This statement, especially the last point of it, strikingly illustrates the view we have taken as to the more generous position of the king's mother than of his wife in the Jewish and other Asiatic courts. It must be clearly understood that this position is by no means peculiar to the modern East, or to the Jews among the ancient Orientals. Heeren, indeed,

thinks that the power of the "queen mother" was even more considerable among the ancient Persians than among the modern Turks (Hist. Researches, i, 400); and the narratives of Herodotus and Constantine respecting the tyrannical influence exercised by Pyrrus, Amnias, and others bear ample testimony to this fact. The careful reader of Scripture will easily be able to trace the same ideas respecting the position of the king's mother among the Israelites. In how marked a manner does the mother of Solomon come forward at the end of her husband's and the beginning of her son's reign? She takes an active part in securing her son's succession; it is in the conviction of her commanding influence that Adonijah engages her to promote his suit, alleging "he will not say thee nay," and then, when Bathsheba appears before her son, the monarch rises from his place, advances to meet her, bows himself before her, and seats her on the right hand of his throne (1 Kings i, ii). That the king's mother possessed high dignity is further evidenced by the fact that Assaf found it necessary to remove his mother, Maachah, "from being queen," on account of her abuse of the power which that character conferred (1 Kings xv, 13). Jezebel, as was already stated, very powerful in the lifetime of her husband; but it is only under her son that she is called "the queen (q̄ēneth);" and the whole history of his reign evinces that she was the chief among the women of affairs (2 Kings ix, 22, 30, 37; x, 13). Still more marked was the influence which her daughter Athaliah exercised in Judah during the reign of her son Ahaziah, which was, indeed, such as enabled her at his death to set herself on her own head, and to present the anomaly in Jewish history of a regent queen (2 Kings xii). See Woman.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN. In Jer. vii, 18; xiv, 17, 18, 19, 23, the Heb. מְלֶכֶת הַשָּׁבָּה, melēkeh hash-shabh, is thus rendered in the A.V. In the margin is given "frame or workmanship of heaven," for in twenty of the Hebrew pulpit translations this is the translation, and the same is the case in fourteen MSS. of Jer. xiv, 18, and in thirteen of Jer. xiv, 19. The latter reading is followed by the Sept. and Peschito Syriac in Jer. vii, 18, but in all the other passages the received text is adopted, as by the Vulg. in every instance. Kimchi says "It is wanting, and it is as מְלֶכֶת הַשָּׁבָּה = workmanship of heaven, i.e. the stars; and some interpret 'the queen of heaven,' i.e. the great star which is in the heavens." Rashi is in favor of the latter; and the Targum renders throughout "the star of heaven." Kircher was in favor of some constellation, the Pleiades or Hyades.

It is generally believed that the "queen of heaven" is "queen of the heavens," "siderum regina," "hora, Cram. Sec. 35," and "regina colui," Apul. Met. xi, 657, worshipped as Ashtoreth or Astarte, to whom the Hebrew women offered cakes in the streets of Jerusalem. Hitzig (Der Prophet. Jeremia, p. 64) says the Hebrews gave this title to the Egyptian Neith, whose name in the form Ta-nith, with the Egyptian article, appears with that of Baal Hamman, on four Carthaginian inscriptions. It is little to the purpose to inquire by what other names this goddess was known among the Phoenician colonists; the Hebrews, in the time of Jeremiah, appear not to have given her any special title. The Babylonian Venus, according to Harpocrates (quoted by Selden, De Die Sya. s. c. 127), moreover, is the important part with which the queen of heaven," Mr. Layard identifies Hera, the "second deity mentioned by Diodorus, with Astarte, Mylitta, or Venus," and with the "queen of heaven," frequently mentioned in the sacred volumes. . . . The planet which bore her name was sacred to her, and in the Assyrian sculptures a star is placed upon her head. She was called Belit, because she was represented in the guise of the great divinity, or Baal; the two, there is reason to conjecture, having been originally but one, androgynous. Her worship penetrated from Assyria into Asia Minor, where its Assyrian origin was recognised. In the rock tablets of Pterium she is represented, as in those of Assyria, standing erect on a lion, and crowned with a tower or mural coronet, which, we learn from Lucian, was peculiar to the Shemitic figure of the goddess. This may have been a modification of the high cap of the Assyrian bas-reliefs. A figure of Astarte found in Krituria represents her as winged (Rawlinson, Hierod. ii, 404). To the Semites she was known under the names of Astarte, Ashteroth, Mylitta, and Alitta, according to the various dialects of the nations among which her worship prevailed (Ninerg. ii, 454, 456, 457). It is so difficult to separate the worships of the different nations from one another, that we may have a mistaken idea of the planet Venus in the Assyrian mythology when introduced among the Western nations that the two are frequently confused. Movers believes that Ashtoreth was originally the moon-goddess, while according to Rawlinson (Hierod. i, 921) Ishtar is the Babylonian Venus, on whom the punic practices, which the Hebrews called "inscriptions is "the mistress of heaven and earth" (see Onias, De Scopus i, 1666). See ASHTORETH.

With the cakes (יוֹקֵר, yōqer; Sept. χαυανίας) which were offered in her honor, with incense and libations, Selden compares the πύρπα (A. V. "branch") of Ep. of Jer. 48, which were burned by the women who built and welcomed near the idolatrous temple of the goddess, for the purposes of prostitution. These πύρπα were offered in sacrifice to Hecate while invoking her aid for success in love (Theocr. ii, 83). The Targum gives יוֹקֵר כַּרְדוֹת (kardōt), which elsewhere appears to be the Greek καρδονίς, a sleeved tunic. Rashi says the cakes had the image of the god stamped upon them, and Theodoret that they contained pine-cones and raisins. See CAKE.

QUEEN OF THE SOUTH. See SHEBA.

Queen Anne's Bounty is the name given in England to a fund appropriated to increase the income of the poorer clergy. It was created out of the first-fruits and tithes which before the Reformation were exacted by the pope from the clergy. These were funded by a statute in Queen Anne's time; hence the name. Queensferry Declaration. After the defeat at Bothwell Bridge, the stricter and more violent portion of the Covenanters drew off from the main body, and adhered exclusively to the ministers Cameron and Cargill. An outline of their opinion had been composed, and the document was found in possession of Hall of Haughhead, on his apprehension at Queensferry on June 3, 1690. Hall was mortally wounded as he was defending himself, and Cargill, his companion, escaped. This document, unsigned and unfinished, and named after the place where it was seized, after affirming adherence to the Scriptures and the covenanted work of reformation, goes on, however, to say: "We do declare that we shall set up over ourselves, and over what God shall give us power of, government and governors according to the Word of God; that we shall no more commit the government of ourselves, and the making of laws for us, to any one single person, this kind of government being most liable to inconveniences, and aptest to degenerate into tyranny." This bold avowal of revolution was soon charged against the entire Presbyterian body, and increased persecutions was the result. See COVENANTERS; RUTHVEN'S DECLARATION; SAMOHRAN DECLARATION.
QUEISS, EBERHARD VON, a German prelate of the Reformation period, flourished near the opening of the 16th century. In 1523 he was made bishop of Pomerania, but in the following year he fell constrained to announce his abandonment of the old faith and became Protestant. In 1527 he resigned his worldly power (the episcopates of Germany then holding secular as well as ecclesiastical sway) into the hands of the duke of Pomerania. Having abandoned the life of a prelate, and in every way he identified himself with the Protestant cause. He was overshadowed by the greatness of his predecessor in the see, George von Polenz (q.v.), and little is known of Queiss after 1527. Probably his death only two years later was the reason for this obscure page in his life's history.

Quelen, Hyacinthe Louis de, a French Roman Catholic prelate of note, was born at Paris, Oct. 8, 1778, and was educated at the seminary in St. Sulpice. In 1807 he was ordained to the priesthood, and made shortly after secretary of cardinal Fesch. When this noted dignitary fell out with Napoleon, Quelen accompanied his eminence to the court of the Restorers; he became general vicar of Talleyrand, took an active part in the establishment of the concordat, and was rewarded for his valuable services by the bishopric in Paris by Napoleon in 1819. When Talleyrand was elevated to the patriarchate of Paris, Quelen was made his coadjutor cum sede vacante, and on Oct. 20, 1821, succeeded Talleyrand in the primacy of France. He made many journeys and busied himself greatly with religious controversies (Francis de Sales, Vincent de Paul); but his most advocacy of Ultramontanism and the Jesuits, whose expulsion from France in 1828 he vainly endeavored to prevent, made him very unpopular, and he was subjected to repeated attacks in his palace by the mob of Paris in 1830 and 1831. He lived on, however, until 1859, when sudden death ended the ignominious rôle of his great ecclesiastic. See Beurton, Vie et Travaux Apostoliques de M. de Quelen; D'Azurville, Vie d'Abrégé; Clavel, Histoire des Diocèses de France, etc.

Queensedt, Johann Andreas, a German theologian, was born at Quedlinburg in 1617, studied at Helmstedt under Calixtus and Hornejus, and in Wittenberg under Leyer. Won to the theology of the latter high-school, he became in 1646 its theologian under the Restorers, and in 1649 extraordinary, and in 1660 ordinary professor of theology at Wittenberg, and always distinguished himself as a most ardent Lutheran. He died in 1688. His most celebrated work, Theologia Didactico-polemica, a Systema Theologicum, 1697, is a most elaborate treatise of Lutheran scholasticism, and constitutes one of the best polemics of its distinguishing dogmas. Other works of his of note are, Dec administravit veterum (ibid. 1648, 8avo, and later); — Dialogus de Patris Illustrium Doctrina et Scriptura Virorum (ibid. 1654, 4to) — Disputations Eclectica in Epistolam ad Colossenses (ibid. 1664, 4to); — Ethica Pastorialis (ibid. 1678, 8vo, and later); — Antiquitates Bibliicae et Ecclesiasticae (ibid. 1688, 4to, and later). Personally Queensedt was a mild, unpretentious character, and even his polemics are not often zealous. He appeared on the stage when the period of dissolution had touched Lutheranism, and rejuvenated the old orthodox spirit, and gave it new and attractive form. His power was not only with his pen, but in the university. See Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctr. (2d Index); Buecher, Allgem. Griechen- ler, s. v.; Tholuck, Wittenberger Theologen, p. 214 sq.; Gass, Geschichte der protest. Dogmatik, i. 357 sq. (J. H. W.)

Quental, Bartholomew de, a Portuguese theologian, was born of noble parentage, Aug. 22, 1626, in the Isle of St. Michael, Azores. In 1643 he was sent to Portugal to study theology and other Portuguese high-schools, and after taking holy orders became one of the confessors of the king. He greatly served papal interests, and was distinguished by pope Clement XI with the title of "the venerable." Quental introduced the Congregation of the Oratory, and in other ways strengthened Romanism. He died at Lisbon, Dec. 28, 1708. His principal works are, Methodicis (Liss. 1665, 6 vols. 8vo) — Sermones (ibid. 1692, 4to). See Niezny, Memoires, vol. xlli. Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xlii. 800.

Querat, Mathurin, a French controversialist, was born at Sens, Aug. 1, 1614, studied theology at Paris, where he obtained the doctorate, and was attached to the Sorbonne. In 1643 he was a Jansenist in the sense that in 1666 refused to abandon the Port-Royalists even on the threat of being ousted from his professorship. He was rewarded for his consistency by the archbishop of Sens, who made Querat one of his grand vicars and placed him at the head of his theological seminary. On the death of his protector, Querat was obliged to retire to Troyes, and became prior of St. Quentin. He spent the remainder of his life, like the Port-Royalists, in retirement and penitence. He died Sept. 9, 1686.

Quercus, Synod of. In the year 403 a council was held at a place in the neighborhood of Chalcedon. The report is found in the Liber Episcoporum to the see of Rome, and the council is therefore known as the Concilium ad Quercum. It was presided over by Paul, bishop of Hieracles. Theophilus of Alexandria here succeeded in effecting the deposition of his archenemy St. John Chrysostom, which was decreed by the thirty-six bishops present, among whom were bishops of Bera, Severino of Greece, in Syria, Antiochus of Ptolemais, and Cyprian of Chalcedon. St. Chrysostom was cited, but refused to appear, unless Theophilus, Arcadius, Antiochus, and others of his declared foes withdrew. The emperor Arcadius, yielding to the entreaties of his wife Eudoxia, determined the ruin of Chrysostom, confirmed the judgment of the council, and banished him to Bithynia. However, an earthquake, which occurred on the very day of his departure, terrifed the empress to such a degree that he was instantly brought back, and re-entered Constantinople in triumph. See CHRE- TOSTOM.

Querini, Angelo Maria, an illustrious Italian prelate of the Church of Rome, was born at Venice, of noble parentage, in 1690. He first studied under the Jesuits, and at the age of seventeen entered the Benedictine order. He became some well acquainted with the Greek, Hebrew, and Biblical learning, he was made instrutor of the novices, for whom he wrote a dissertation, De Municipio Historiae Præstantiae. He afterwards travelled four years in France, England, Holland, and Germany, and enjoyed the society of some of the most distinguished men of those countries. In his Commentarii de Rebus ad se Pertinentibus, he gives some account of what he saw and the conversations he had with many learned men. On his return to Italy he published several works on liturgical antiquities: Reservi Ommia Quadrageminalis Graecum; — Distributio ad Pape, Pater- nis Officii; — De Ecclasticiorum Officiorum apud Graecos Antiquitate; — De Hymmis Quinquageminulis Graecorum; — De Aliis Cantus Quadrageminalibus. In 1721 Querini was made archbishop of Corfu, and he wrote on the antiquities and history of that island. In 1728 he was transferred to the see of Brescia, and soon after he was made a cardinal and librarian of the Vatican. It was after his promotion to the see of Brescia that he wrote his literary history of Brescia. He also published the Liber de Papi II (q. v.) and Paul III (q. v.), in the latter of which he gives the history of that pope from the charges of Plutarch and other historians; and he edited a collection of the epistles of cardinal Reginald Pole. His other works consist of diassertations upon literary subjects, both sacred and profane, and of numerous epistles, chiefly in Latin. Cardinal Querini was in every respect one of the most distinguished prelates of the Roman Church in the 18th century. Spotless in his morals, modest and simple in his appearance, and dignified by the elevation he had acquired, he cultivated the esteem of men of all countries and opinions. Frederick the Great wrote to him in the most flattering terms. Voltaire dedicated to him his tragedy of Semiramis and other works. Querini labored particularly to improve the town of Brescia, of which he was bishop. He completed the structure of its handsome cathedral, founded a clerical college, a house for female instruction in the Val Canonica, and, lastly, he established the public library of Brescia. He died in 1759.

Quesnel, Paquier, a celebrated French priest of the Oratory, was born of Scottish descent, at Paris, in 1634. He studied at the Sorbonne, and in 1657 entered the Congregation, to which his two brothers belonged also. Those were times that tried men's souls. All France was agitated by the controversy which threatened the exodus of Holland from the domain of Romanism. The heresy of Jansen had found warm advocates in France also, and Quesnel was himself one of the most ardent of these. In 1671 he brought out his Abrégé de la Morale de l'Évangile, which constitutes only the opening of a series of volumes containing his Nouvayes Testament en Français, avec des Réflexions Morales (first complete ed. Paris, 1687, and often since). This work most unequivocally condemned much in the Mass, and advocated a great bodily many holy features of Jansenism. Voltaire says that thirty pages of this book, properly qualified and softened, would have prevented a great deal of the disturbance which Jansenism created in France. In 1675, Quesnel made the breach wider by his publication of the works of Leo I and of St. Hilary of Arles, greatly enriched by marginal notes, in the interest of the doctrine of the Gallican Church. Of course, the book was placed on the Index, and its author proscribed at Rome. The superior of the Oratorians, père Abel de Saint-Marte, was himself an enthusiastic Jansenist, and positively endorsed Quesnel. But when the archbishop of Paris, De Harlay, exiled Saint-Marte, Quesnel found France a very undesirable home, and he determined to go beyond its borders. In 1681 he was not even left to make his choice, for he was in that year driven from Paris. At first he went to Bruges. His persistent refusal to abandon Jansenism made him uncomely there also. In 1684, finally, his order promulgated an anti-Jansenistic formula and demanded the signature of all its members. Quesnel refused to comply, and, feeling insecure, retired to Brussels, where he found the great Arnauld living, also in exile, on account of his Jansenistic proclivities. The two theologians became intimate companions and wrought much together, until the death of Arnauld, in 1694, terminated their relations. One of the most telling labors in defence of Jansenism brought out at Brussels by Quesnel was his Réflexions Morales. Notwithstanding its favorable treatment of Jansenism, the work, by its spirit of devotion and fervor, attracted many readers and warm admirers. Its beauties made even the moderate Ultramontanes forget the Jansenistic proclivities of the pen that wrote it, and all bestowed high encomiums on it. Several bishops were loud in its praises. Even the ultra-Jesuits would read it to catch its holy influences; and Voltaire (Siècle de Louis XIV, vol. ii) asserts that it was freely read at Rome. He tells the story that the abbé Renaudot, one of the most learned men in the French metropolis, who lived during the pontificate of Clement XI, at one time visited this pope, who loved men of letters, and who was himself a man of learning, and found him reading Quesnel's book. "This," said his holiness, "is an excellent performance; we have no one at Rome capable of writing in this manner. I wish I could have the author near me." Yet this very pope in 1708 published a decree against it, and afterwards, in 1713, issued the famous bull Unigenitus, in which were condemned a hundred and one propositions extracted from it. We must not, however, look upon this condemnation of Clement XI as a contradiction to the encomium he had before given; it proceeded entirely from reasons of state. The warmest advocate of the Réflexions was cardinal de Noailles (q. v.). While still bishop of Chalon he had defended Quesnel's works. Later, in the archiepiscopal see of Paris, he was a chief cause of the trial of the Portuguese Royalists, and, of course, of Quesnel. In 1656 he even brought out an edition of the Réflexions at Paris. But the Jesuits were at work, and they finally succeeded in securing the pope's disapproval of the work, and in blackening the character of its author. They accused him of plotting against the authorities and as a dangerous and seditious person. In 1708 Quesnel was arrested by order of king Philip V, at the instigation of the archbishop of Malines, and put in prison. He was rescued, however, by Jansenist friends, and made good his escape to Amsterdam, where he spent the remainder of his days building up Jansenism in Holland and strengthening it in France and Belgium also. He died in 1719. The titles of all his writings fill in Moret's several columns. Question. Modern is, in Scotland, "Whether it be the duty of all to whom the Gospel is preached to repent and believe in Christ?" and it is called modern because it is supposed to have been brought into use in the early part of the last century. It originated in Northamptonshire, in the churches in which Mr. Davis of Rothwell preached, though it does not appear that he took an active part in it. The question thus started was pursued by inferior writers of the first half of the 18th century; and it was at the time of Andrew Fuller, who very ably supported the positive side of the question, namely, that faith is the duty of all men, although, through the depravity of human nature, men will not believe till regenerated by the Holy Spirit. On the other side it was contended "that faith was not a duty, but a grace," the exercise of which was not required till it was bestowed. On this subject Mr. Fuller published The Gospel Worthy of All Acceptation; or, The Duty of All Men to Believe in Jesus Christ. Thereupon Fuller was attacked by Mr. Lee. The latter was supported by a large number of the Scotch Presbyterians, and, among the rest, by Mr. Daniel Taylor, an Arminian, on the other, to whom he replied A Defence of his former tract.

Quetzalcoatl, a Mexican divinity, represented by the green-feathered serpent, is the god of the air. He was, while on earth, a high-priest in the city of Tula, and was so immensely rich that his houses were built with nothing but gold and precious stones. He was, at the same time, a legislator of incredible wisdom; his commands were published from the top of a mountain by a herald whose voice could be heard at a distance of three hundred miles. It was to him that useful inventions were due; he was, besides, a favorite of the gods, who, for his sake, loaded the land with blessings of all kinds. He was the first to come an ear of corn; he was of such a size that it was no light burden for a strong man. But as the country, through him, grew happy to excess, and as the gods were well aware that such unmixed felicity was not to the advantage of the people, they caused him to emigrate. He did so; went to Choluha, where the people were happy and content for their ruler. His reign was as prosperous as could be expected. After his death he was worshipped as god of the air. Almost all peoples, even those hostile to Choluha, recognized his divinity and built temples in his honor.

Quevedo y Villegas, Francisco Gomez de, a Spanish author of note, was born in Madrid, Sept. 26, 1589; was educated at the university at Alcalá, and when only fifteen years of age took his degree in theology. He would probably have risen to great distinction in the Church had not his hot temper involved him in strife and controversy, which ended in a duel and exile. He removed to Italy and there also led a restless and eventful life. He died at Villanueva de los Infantes in 1645. Many of his writings were confiscated by the government, but among those that reached the public we are interested in the treatise on the Providence of God:—God's Politics and Christ's Government, in which he attempts a complete body of political philosophy based upon the example of the Saviour:—On a Holy Life:—The Militante Life of a Christian, etc.

Quintau, in the mythology of the Hindoos, the conceiving force resting (therefore sterile, ineffectual) in Brahma. It is called his wife, and as such is opposed to the prolific goddess, Saraswati. The latter is the feminine element of Brahma in its exterior appearance; Quintai is the same resting in himself.

Quichés, Kichés, or Uiticacens, a semi-civilized nation of Guatemala, occupying, at the time of the conquest, the greater part of what is now called Los Altos, or the highlands, of Guatemala, including the districts of Quiché, Totonicapán, and Quetzaltenango. Their traditions indicate that they sprang from the Toltec stock. Their records, as written out by members of the royal house immediately after the conquest, give a long array of kings, and imply a high antiquity. It seems that the Kachipus and Zutugui were the rulers of the land in the time of the ancient Kachipus, in which the name of the Quichés is preserved in the name of Quiché. These three divisions subsequently becoming hostile, were easily conquered by the Spaniards.

varado encountered his most vigorous resistance in Quiché, where the king, Tecum-Usma, went out to meet him, according to the chroniclers, with 220,000 men. They fought with great bravery; but musketry and cannon, and, above all, the terror inspired by the Spanish horses, brought about the fall of the native arms. The Spaniards rode in the midst of resistance at their command. The battle lasted six days, the Indians fighting desperately as they fell back. The king at last was slain by Alvarado, and the subjugation of the Quichés was completed. The ruins of the city of Quiché, described by Mr. H. C. Martius, attest the grandeur and power of this people, and give a fair support to the early accounts of their numbers. The district which they occupied is the best-populated portion of Guatemala, and is almost purely Indian, the ancient language being still in general use. The people are described by Arthur Morelet as an "active, courageous race, whose heads never grow gray, persevering in their industry, skilful in almost every department of art, good workers in iron and the precious metals, generally well-dressed, neat in person, with a firm step and independent bearing, and altogether constituting a class of citizens who only require to be better educated to rise equal to the best." Their language is regarded as a purer dialect than either the Kachiquel or Zutugui, with which it is compared by Fray Ildofonso Flores, in his Historia del Estado de Guatemala, y Zutugui (Mexico, 1596, 4to). Much has recently been done for a better knowledge of this people by Brassier de Bourbourg, especially in his Grammaire de la Langue Quichèe mise en Parallèle avec les Deux Dialectes Cakchiquel et Tzutujil, avec un Vocabulaire, serré d'Introduction au Motif d'Enseignement, Drame Indigene (Paris, 1862); and Jugem Yok, le Livre Sacré et les Mythes de l'Antiquité Américaine, avec les Lirees Héroïques et Historiques de Quiché (1861).—The Amer. Quichuas, the dominant people in the empire of Peru under the Incas, who made their language the general one of their territory. The Quichuas extended from Lake Titicaca to Quito, and towards the coast to the territory of the Chinchas and Yuncas. The Ayarquas, extending from Lake Titicaca to what is now the southern limit of Bolivia, were first reduced by the Quichuas under the Inca. The Quichuas are gay, cheerful, energetic, and, under the wise sway of the Inca, seem to have risen rapidly in many arts. They were assiduous cultivators of the soil; maize and other grains raised in Titicaca were sent to all parts of the empire as a tribute and the Inca's sustenance, a ready example of the honor of agriculture. They soon and the wool of the llamas, vicuna, and alpaca; they worked mines of gold, silver, and copper; built suspension bridges; erected adobe houses with gables, niches, and arches, and temples of the same material; made delightful saddles, cutting and fitting the blocks with an accuracy and finish that cannot be excelled; made sterile tracts productive by a wise and extended system of tigueyos and aqueducts, and also by cultivating till moisture was reached. In astronomy they had not reached as high a degree as the Mexicans; and in literature, though preserving records mainly by quipus, or knotted cords, they cultivated poetry, and had dramas, as well as touching songs, that won the admiration of the Spaniards. The incas claimed to descend from the sun, and introduced the worship of that luminary. They reduced the Chances and Huancas, apparently intrusive eastern tribes, and then attacked the Yuncas, the people of the coast, whose capital was at Chimu, near Trujillo, and who worshiped Pachacamac, creator of the world (of whom there were a famous idol at temple at the place that bears his name), and the Rimas (who had a famous oracle near Lima), and other deities. After a long and bloody war, the incas Capac Yupaqui overthrew Chonqui Manca, king of Chimu, and reduced the Yuncas. They were compelled to accept the sun-worship; but the worship of Pachacamac continued in the Inca. As the name was spread through most of South America. There are remnants of the Yuncas still extant in their language as Mocho and Elen., and it is entirely different from the Quichua. The priests of the sun dressed in white, and practiced celibacy and fasts. Near each temple was also a convent of virgins of the sun. The men wore woolen tunics and leggings, the women long skirts and short cloaks, joined by gold, silver, or copper clasps. The incas were distinguished by the llauta, a fillet with a ball desending between the eyes. After the Spanish conquest, the Incas lost much of the arts they had gained, and retrograded generally. A desperate effort was made by the Quichuas in the last century. The original pilot, however, the leader Tupac Amaru, a descendant of the inca, was taken and torn in pieces by horses in the plaza of Cuzco in 1780. There is a series of grammars of the Quichua, beginning with that of Fray Domingo de San Tomas (Valldolid, 1680), and coming down to Markham, Contributions towards a Grammar and Dictionary of Quichua (London, 1864). Olmenayo, a Quichua drama, and several songs of the baracues, or bands, have been published.

Quick, John, an English Presbyterian divine, was born at Plymouth in 1636. Having determined to enter the ministry, he was ordained in 1658. When the Nonconformist turmoil of 1662 was perceived, he joined the conforming party, and was subjected to imprisonment. After his release, he went to London, and became the pastor of a Presbyterian congregation. He also interested himself in the French Protestants, and cared for those of the Huguenots who touched London on their way to a refuge from the intolerance of their own countrymen. He even wrote in their defence Symodicon in Gallia Reformata (London, 1692, 2 vols., fol.), being a history of the Reformed Church in France; and James Sacre Gallice, a biography of fifty Reformed French preachers, interrupted by the death of Quick, which occurred in 1706. He left in manuscript several sermons and treatises, which all evince a superior mind. See Allibone, Dict. Brit. and Amer. Auth. s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Bury, viii, 183.

Quickand, the (Σ Σύριας, Vulg. Syria), more properly, The Syria (Acts xxvi, 17), the broad and deep height on the North African coast between Carthage and Cyrene. In the above passage it is stated that when the ship in which Paul was embarked was driven past the isle of Clauda on the south, the mariners, as would now be said, struck the sails, and sculled under bare poles, lest they "should fall into the quickands." There they deliberated how they should proceed, or shal, dangerous to navigation, drawn, or supposed to be drawn (from σπούρω, "to draw"), together by the currents of the sea. According to others, the name is derived from ααρτιος, an Arabic word for "desert." For two reasons this region was an object of peculiar dread to the ancient navigators of the Mediterranean—partly because of the drifting sands and the heat along the shore itself, but chiefly because of the shallows and the uncertain currents of water in the bay. Josephus, who was himself wrecked in this part of the Mediterranean, makes Agrippa say (War, ii, 16, 4), "et Νανας έποιησα Σύριας. So notorious were these dangers that they became a commonplace with the poets (see Horace, Odes, i, 22, 5; Ovid, Fast. iv, 499; Virgil, Ass. i, 111; Tibull. iii, 4, 91; Lucan, Phars. ix, 431). It is to most of our purpose here, however, to refer to Apollonius Rhodus, who was familiar with all the notions of the Alexandrian sailors. In the fourth book of his Argonauta, 1232-1237, he supplies illustrations of the passage before us more respects than one—in the sudden violence (σαράκιος) of the terrible north wind (δυσα) Boreas Styllen, the boreal, whose very name means "the conqueror of the North") Νανας ομοιος και τοις φηρ ερει, and in the terror which the sailors felt of being driven into the Syria (Προαρ Μαλ Ινδις Σύριας, ου ουτε κνησ δημοσιω η ηνώμη πελα). See CLAUDIA; EUBOELYDIA. There were properly two Syree— the eastern, or larger, now called the Gulf of Sidon, and the western, now the Gulf of Cotes. It is the former to which our attention is directed in this passage of the Acts. The ship was caught by a north-easterly gale on the south coast of Crete, near Mount Ida, and was driven to the island of Clada. This line of drift, continued, would strike the greater Syris, whence the natural apprehension of the sailors. See STRV. The danger was not so imaginary in this case, we apprehend, as Dr. Falconer (Disc. on St. Paul's Voyage, p. 13) conceives; for the apprehension does not appear to have been entertained by the sailors driven past the isle of Clauda, which, as we take it, is mentioned merely as the last point of land which had been seen till the ship was wrecked on the isle of Melita. The position of that island must be regarded as indicating the course in which they were driven; and if that were Malta, it is clear that, had that course not been arrested by the intermediate shipwreck, they would, in all probability, have been driven upon the Syris Minor, which we may therefore conclude to have been the subject of their apprehension. That apprehension only becomes "imaginary" when Melita is set in the Atlantic instead of on the island of Clauda, as Dr. Falconer himself takes it, for the Melita of Scripture. It may, therefore, be added to the arguments in favor of Malta that its identification with Melita gives reality to the fear entertained by the mariners, which, under the other alternative, must be supposed to have been imaginary. See MALTA. The best modern account of this part of the African coast is that which is given by Admiral Smyth (in his Memoir on the Mediterranean, p. 87-91, 186-190), who was himself the first to survey this bay thoroughly, and to divest it of many of its terrors. See SHIPWRECK.

Quicquen vult. These are the initial words of the symbol known as the Athanasian Creed. The real composer of this ancient formula being unknown, its origin is a mere matter of conjecture. A cursory notice of its history in ancient and modern times is all that can be here attempted. It probably had its origin in the Gallican Church. It was first used in that Church. Gallican councils and bishops have always treated it with especial deference. Churches which received the Gallican Psalter received with it this "exposition fidei." The oldest known translation into the vernacular was Gallican, as prescribed by Hincmar of Rheims to his priest. The first writers who cite its words were Avitus of Vienne and Cæsarius of Arles; the oldest commentator upon its text was Venantius Fortunatus. The compiler, or at least the editor, was so abundant or so ancient as in Gaul (Waterland). This "Creed," to use its scholastic title, first appeared in Latin, the Greek copies that exist being independent versions from that language. The age also of the oldest Latin MSS. exceeds that of the Greek exemplars by several centuries. The oldest Latin copy is referred by archbishop Usher to the beginning of the 7th century, and was in the Cottonian collection (De Symb. Prof. ii, 8). The Treves MS., aschapel, is of nearly equal antiquity. Five MSS. of the 8th century are known: the Ambrosian of Milan, the Roman in Long. Standan's Psalter, referable with certainty to A.D. 708, and professing to be "Fides St. Athanasii Alexandrensi;" the Colbertine, copied in Saxon character from the Treves MS. shortly after the middle of the century, and, like the original, imperfect at the beginning. The MS. of equal date, also in Saxon character; and the copy written in letters of gold which was presented by Charlemagne, while only king of France, to Adrian I on his accession to the pontificate, A.D. 772. It is still preserved at Vienna. The Greek copies are of much later date, and Montfaucon found three as recent as more than three hundred years old (Dissert., p. 727).

The earliest form in which this "expositio fidei" is found is the commentary of Venantius Fortunatus in the middle of the 6th century, showing that it was then of popular use. The fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 638) adopted many of its more striking expressions. Home, distrustful of novelties, only admitted it after long delay, as Waterland says, about A.D. 680. Thus it was accepted by the churches of the West "as soon as, or sooner than, the Nicene Creed." That adoption has since borne weighty bearing on the Apollinarian error, which was condemned by pope Damasus, A.D. 375. This heresy had much in common with the Eutychian error of the middle of the 5th century; but the latter had certain distinguishing features of which no mention is made, and for this reason the clauses that contravene both errors may be safely applied to Apollinarian notions: we need not look for its origin therefore so low as the Eutychian period (Harvey, Hist. and Theol. of Creeds, p. 549-557), in which the dying embers of Apollinarianism kindled up again. Neither can its production range later than the Nestorian controversy, which commenced with the first year of the patriarchate of Nestorius (A.D. 428), and led to the Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431); otherwise the crucial term Storius must as certainly have found its way into the official creed of the Church as Lysius was made the "lapis Lydus" of orthodoxy by the Nicene fathers; hence this "expositio fidei" must have been written before the year A.D. 428 (Waterland, Harvey). But how many years did it anticipate the council? There are undeniable points of resemblance between many of the expressions and the terminologies and phraseology used by Augustiniae in his work De Trinitate (A.D. 416; Harvey, p. 562-564); which furnished the copy, the father or the Creed? Waterland affirms the former, but reasons quite as cogent point to the latter conclusion. Augustine says that the phrases used by him in defining the three persons of the Godhead were adopted also by catholic writers his predecessors; and, in fact, the writer of the Creed may have borrowed the corresponding terms, in some few cases, from Tertullian, but abundantly from Ambrose. The Creed, then, so far as its phraseology is concerned, is quite as likely to have been written between A.D. 381, when Ambrose completed his work De Spiritu Sancto, and A.D. 416, when Augustine put forth his work De Trinitate, as after this latter date.

Further, the rudimentary statements of the Creed are more fully developed in the work of Augustine. The Creed simply says, "The Holy Ghost is of the Father and the Son; neither made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding." The most unblending Greek theologian would have allowed the statement to pass unchallenged; e.g., Cyril of Alexandria in his days of the Holy Spirit. "For in Him is termed the Spirit of Truth, and Christ is truth: and He proceeds (παντοτιτόν) from Him, in as fact he does from God and the Father." (Ep. Synod.; comp. Harvey, Vindex Cath., i, 188). Thus also Basil says the Spirit proceeds from the Father, not by generation as the Son, but as the Spirit of His mouth; where it is manifestly intended that as the Spirit proceeds from God the Father, so also He proceeds from God the Word. Ambrose makes the matter more plain: "Dei Spiritus et Spiritus Christi et in Patre est et in Filio, qui a Patre Spiritum dicit, et Deum Patrem, a quo procedit Spiritus, et Filium, quia Filii quoque est Spiritus, nuncupasti" (ibid.). The third person was universally acknowledged to be of the Father and of the Son, and his origination was allowed to be by procession; that which was denied was the procession from the Son as well as the Father, instead of from the Father by the Son. But the work De Trinitate originated all the discussion that followed, and the reason why this heresy became so strong in the East and of the West which has never again been healed. Augustine expresses himself with his usual roundness and perspicuity upon a point that was a result of scriptural reasonings collected into one focus of light (De Trin. iv, 29; xv, 47). The concluding chapters of his work are filled with statements of the procession of the Holy Spirit, and a comparison of these with the more shadowy lines of the Creed satisfies the judgment that Augustine was indebted to the Creed, and not the Creed to Augustine. Then again the Creed instances by way of illustration the union of a spiritual and a material substance in the individual, a reasonable soul and flesh is one man, so God and Man is one Christ." The illustration is exactly to the point; but Augustine follows out the idea in a strain of subtle argumentation that runs through six books of his work; finding proofs of analogy between the doctrine of a Trinity in Unity and the unity of the mind existing in different states; and falling into modes of expression that are exactly square with others in the Creed: "Hec igitur tria, memoria intelligens, voluntas, quoniam non sunt tres vitae sed una vita; nec tres sentientias una mens; consequenter unique unius substantiae sunt una substantia" (De Trin. x, 18). Both the Creed and Augustine argue from man's bodily and mental constitution, but the convincing simplicity of the former and the strained scholastic reasoning of the latter combine to draw a marked contrast between the two.

It should be borne in mind once more that the Apollinarian heresy is the latest form of error of which the Creed takes cognizance. But that heresy never took root in the churches of the West; therefore no newly appointed Gallican bishop would have gone out of his way to condemn it, as Waterland supposes Hilary to have done on his appointment to the see of Arles. "It is hardly in keeping with the mild 'credos' of a newly installed prelate. But in the year A.D. 401 we can point to a most popular and zealous bishop of Western Gaul, apostolic in his labors among the bereaved population of the Nervii and Morini (Pass. de Calais) as well as in his self-inflicted poverty (Paulin. NoL. Ep. 18 ad Victricius). who was accused publicly of teaching heresy, and that evidently of Apollinarius: who also gave account of his faith in a confession that, without any great degree of improbability, may be identified with this exposition of the catholic faith. This eminent son of the Church was Victricius, confessor and bishop of Rouen, who at the close of the 4th century was considerably advanced in years" (Harvey, Hist. and Theol. of Creeds, p. 157). The controversy is sketched out by Paulinus of Nola (Lips. Ep. 17 et 24) and they harmonize remarkably with those of the Creed (ibid. p. 6, 8). There are historical reasons for believing that this confession was presented at Rome between A.D. 800 and 402 when Anastasius was pope (Harvey, Hist. and Theol. of Creeds). But the name of Victricius was in time expunged, and it then stood as the production of Anastasius. Hence, since one commentator terms it Fides Anastasii, and a codex ascribes it to Ananas, it is highly probable that this was the name and date of an earlier draft of the earlier draft than that of Anastasius, into which it easily passed. The name of Anastasius is first placed at the head in a copy of the 8th century, which leaves a wide margin of three hundred years for the change of title. The earliest MS. (Comtan. now lost) assigned the name to the Creed, but simply styled it Fides Catholicae, as also also Venantius Fortunatus in his commentary. The reasons for assigning it to Victricius have been thus summed up:

(1) Its careful, well-considered terms are more consistent with the mature age of Victricius, who had shown that he attained a high place as the churchmen of the East and of the West has never again been healed. Augustus expresses himself with his usual roundness and perspicuity upon a point that was a result of scriptural reasonings collected into one focus of light (De Trin. iv, 29; xv, 47). The concluding chapters of his work are filled with statements of the procession of the Holy Spirit, and a comparison of these with the more shadowy lines of the Creed satisfies the judgment that Augustine was indebted to the Creed, and not the Creed to Augustine. Both the Creed and Augustine argue from man's bodily and mental constitution, but the convincing simplicity of the former and the strained scholastic reasoning of the latter combine to draw a marked contrast between the two.

(2) Its style, though not that of an apology in vindication of the writer's faith, agrees well with the supposition that he was accused of the errors that he anathematizes. (3.) He must not be entirely paralleled with the subjects upon which Victorinus, if we may judge from the expressions of Paulinus, was called to defend himself. With respect to both of these particulars, the supposition that Hilary should have been the author is singular to the judgment to the contrary. His exposition of faith upon entering upon his episcopal office would scarcely have been pointed with anathemas which the history of his time persuades us were not required. Indeed, the Creed can only be assigned to Hilary upon the supposition that Apollinarism infested the Gallican church, and that his appointment to the see of Arles—a supposition wholly contrary to fact. But since we know that Pelagian tenets had then taken a firm root in the south of France, we know also the direction that any inaugural exposition by Hilary must have taken. (4.) Again, if Hilary had been the author of the Creed, his name must have commanded respect, and he would scarcely have met with such hard words from pope Leo I as may be found in his epistle to the French bishops, A.D. 445: e.g. 'Non est hoc ... salubritatem impendere diligentia pastoralis, sed vim infestationis.' (5.) His excommunication from Dioscorus, and the ideas behind his anathemas, are in the sound doctrine of St. Ambrose, 'Iam nos vestra sanctitatis animus Hilarus pro suo more mentiri' (Leo, Ep. 10). On the other hand, the highly probable communication between Victorinus and Anastasius, and the preparation of a confession of faith by the Gallican church, and the fact that it has its mythical, miraculous questions, i.e. its theological department; and (8) and, finally, the advice of the scholar in this kind of religion to submit himself implicitly to a spiritual guide—his yaro. Of these articles, this, fourth, fifth, and sixth give quietism, properly so called; and it is a question whether the manifestation of this doctrine in Christianity adds anything essential to the definition of article five, so as to save Christian quietism from the pantheistic conclusions of articles three and four.

In the Christian Church this mystical theology is defined by its professors to be that doctrine which reveals to man the hidden essence of God's Being. The way to this wisdom is in three stages, the purgative, the illuminative, the unitive; the first purging the will from low affections, the second communicating to the intellect the knowledge of God, and the third leading the soul to pure union and deification. The table at head of page 846, and taken from Arnold's 'Historia Theologiae Mysticae,' gives this theology in outline. Some parts of it need an initiated interpreter.

It is evident that this scheme, if at all carried out to its legitimate consequences, leads directly to the error of those enthusiasts who supposed the kingdom of Christ to be an earlier and inferior dispensation, the reign of the Spirit the later and perfect dispensation. Men are taught by it, not the superiority of knowledge in St. Paul's sense, but that they may become more perfect by disregarding the knowledge of an earlier state, by becoming again children in understanding. To that earlier state are referred the power of Christ's resurrection and the sacrament of the holy eucharist. What the higher sacrament of unction does not appear. In working out this scheme, Molinos taught as follows: 1. The perfection of men, even in this life, consists in an uninterrupted act of contemplation and love, which contains virtually all righteousness; that this act once effected lasts always, even during sleep, provided that it be not expressly recalled; whence it follows that the perfect have no need to repeat it. 2. In this state of perfection the soul ought not to reflect either on God or on itself, but its powers ought to be annihilated, in order to abandon itself absolutely to God. 3. Perfect prayer is this state of quietude, in which there should be absolutely no thought or wish or hope. Vocal prayer, confession, all external things, are but hindrances. 4. In prayer the first act of faith, the first intuition of resignation, prevails to constitute the whole an act of worship. "One may persevere in prayer though the imagination be carried about with various and involuntary thoughts. These are not to be actively resisted, but merely neglected. 5. The violent and painful suggestions of impatience, pride, glutony, luxury, rage, blasphemy, cursing, despair, and an infinite number of others, are God's means for purifying those whom he calls. The soul ought not to be dissected on account of them.

An example of pure quietism may be quoted in illustration of these principles: "Gregory Lopez having for the space of three years continued that ejaculation, Thy will be done in time and in eternity, repeating it as often as he breathed, God Almighty discovered to him that infinite treasure of the pure and continued act of faith and love, with silence and resignation; so that he came to say that, during the thirty-six years he lived afterwards, he always continued in his inward man that pure act of love, without ever uttering the least petition, ejaculation, or anything that was possible or sprung from nature" (Spiritual Guide [transl. 1699], p. 75).

Molinos is charged by Romanists with teaching antinomianism. The charge does not appear to be well founded, but that his teaching regarding evil thoughts is most dangerous there can be no doubt. At the same time, the truth of which it is a perversion is very discernible.

Molinos proceeds to his doctrine of self-annihilation through what he calls infused contemplation. The means whereby the soul ascends to infused contemplation are two—the pleasure and the desire of it. The steps of it are three—satiety when the soul is filled with God; intoxication, an excess of mind and elevation of soul arising from satiety of divine love; security, when the soul is so drenched with love that it loses all fear, and would willingly go to hell if it knew such to be the will of God. Six other steps there are—fire, union, elevation, illumination, pleasure, and repose. But there are many other steps besides, as ecstasies, raptures, melting, delequiums, glee, kises, embraces, exaltation, union, transformation, espousals and matrimonies; "which," Molinos says, "I omit to explain, to give no occasion to speculation." Madame Guyon, however, does explain: "The essential union is the spiritual marriage, where there is a communication of substance, when God takes the soul for his spouse, unites it to himself, not personally, nor by any act or means, but immediately reducing all to a unity. The soul ought not, nor can, any more make any distinction between God and itself. God is the soul, and the soul is God" (Expos. du Cont. des Cont.).

Molinos passes through annihilation to the same result of deification. The soul that would be perfect passes, with the divine aid, into the state of nothingness: from the spiritual death the true and perfect annihilation derives its original; insomuch that when the soul is submitted to its will and understanding, it is properly said to have arrived at the perfect and happy state of annihilation, which is the last disposition for transformation and union. The soul no longer lives in itself, because God lives in it. The soul being in that manner the nothing, the Lord will be the whole in the soul.

Quietism aims at an entire abstraction from all externals, and seeks to put the spirit of man into direct and immediate union with the very nature of the Godhead. From this there inevitably results, instead of the Christian faith of the communication of the divine life, a doctrine of a pantheistic identification of the creature with the Creator, and an ultimate absorption of the soul into the substance of God. The Quietists call it indeed a vulgar error to say that in the prayer of rest the faculties operate not, and it is idle and inaccurate; but they assert at the same time that the soul operates neither by means of the memory nor by the intellect, nor by ratiocination, but by simple apprehension (Molinos, Spiritual Guide, I, 12). What an active apprehension is when none of the powers of the mind are exercised is not explained. The Quietists think to attain that repose of the mind which is the result of exertion, and that quiet rest in God which follows from the earnestness of meditative prayer, by altogether surceasing from the exertion and superseding the earnestness. Consequently, the mind being reduced to inactivity, the body has sway; and the state of perfect quietude, supposed to be a waiting for the divine access, becomes that state (which may be produced by "mesmeric" process) in which the body suffers or simulates catalepsy, and the mind asp res a divine trance. Quietism becomes mental sleep.

There is a remarkable similarity between the mysticism of the Quietists and of the Plotinian school of philosophy. The aim of Plotinus was to enter into the immediate vision of Deity. "Unconditioned Being, or the Godhead, cannot be grasped by thinking or science, QUETISM

The real founder of quietism in the Church is thus reputed to be Molinos (q.v.), a Spanish priest, whose opinions, published at Rome against the things transient and variable, to raise ourselves to this simple essence, to take refuge in the absolute, this must be regarded as the highest aim of all our spiritual efforts" (Prof. C. A. Brandis, in Smith's Biol. Dict. art. Plotinus, p. 427). Plotinian contemplation may find a place also in the works of John Smith and Henry More, but it may also pass as readily into the reveries of Molinos. It is to be considered whether the tendency of such contemplation is not to reduce the Father manifested in the Son to the cold abstraction of the Plotinian Deity.

In the Church there have been two kinds of mysticism, one a churchly mysticism, which allies itself with the ordinances and rites of the Gospel; the other subjective or inward, which gradually rejects more and more all that is external, and even at last passes beyond the contemplation of the humanity of our Lord, and the sacraments which make men partakers of his body, to seek a resting-place beyond all that is created in the Logos as he existed prior to the incarnation and creation (Dorner, On the Person of Christ, II, i, 288). This uncritical acceptance of the doctrine that the Logos without its central figure, this removal of God Incarnate from the mystery of godliness, as the result of a perverted or depraved mysticism, is exhibited more than once in the history of the Church. The words quoted from Dorner on the subject were used regarding Maximus Confessor. We may resume and continue them. "True love and knowledge unite to seek a resting-point beyond all that is created, beyond even the humanity of Christ: their final goal is the pure and bare (γονιας) Logos, as he existed prior to the incarnation and creation. It is clear that in the last instance Christ is hereby reduced to the position of a mere theophany, and that the historical significance of his person is destroyed. The same thing appears also from his application to the professes highest stage of the words. Even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now know we him no longer. So far was Maximus Confessor from attributing eternal significance to the God-man that he regarded the humanity of Christ rather in the light of a hindrance to the full knowledge and love of the pure God—a hindrance which must be surmounted by those who aim to reach the highest stage" (Dorner, l. c., and see note 48 there referred to). So in Italy, Mersiliius Ficinus and John Pico of Mirandole turned Christianity in many respects into a Neo-Platonic theosophy.

In the article Mysticism (q.v.) this subject is more opened, and the schools of mysticism of the Greek and Latin churches classified. In the article Hesychasts (q.v.) is related the quietism of the Greek Church. The directions of the abbot Simon for producing the visions of quietism (supposed to have been written in the 11th century) are still in existence: "Alone in thy cell, shut thy door, and seat thyself in a corner; raise thy mind above all things vain and transitory; recline thy body and chin on thy breast; turn thy eyes and thy thoughts towards the middle of thy belly, the region of the navel; and search the place of the heart, the seat of the soul. At first all will be dark and comfortless; but if you persevere day and night, you will feel an ineffable joy; and no sooner has the soul discovered the place of the heart than it is involved in a mystic and ethereal light." At present it is only necessary to point out that these Hesychasts had the same rule as the Hindū Quietists, viz., that to produce the state of abstraction the eyes must be steadily fixed on some particular object. The Hindū presented the tip of the nose, the Hesychast the navel.

In German medieval mysticism a quietistic element is met with. It; however, borders on pantheism, very much as the pantheism of Dionysius the Areopagite borders on quietism.

QUINQUAGESIMA

The name by which the Sunday before Lent (q.v.) is designated. The first Sunday in Lent being called Quadragesima, this being further from Easter was called Quinquagesima (or fiftieth Sunday), reckoning the distance from Easter in round numbers. It was sometimes called Quinquagesimae or Quinquagesima, in order to distinguish it from the other Quinquagesima, or interval between Easter and Whit-sunday, called Quinquagesimus posthelas, or latitudine. It is also called Shrove-Sunday (q.v.). In ordinary years Quinquagesima is the forty-ninth day before Easter; in leap-years it is the fiftieth.

Quinquaria, an ancient Roman festival celebrated in honor of Minerva on March 19. Some writers allege that its observance was limited to one day; others, however, say that it lasted for five days. This last is the opinion of Oviedo, who considers it to have been a festival held in commemoration of the birthday of Minerva; and hence it was customary for women on that day to consult diviners and fortune-tellers.

Quinquennalia, games celebrated among the ancient Romans in imitation of the Greek festivals at the end of every four years. On these occasions keen competitions were carried on in music, gymnastics, and horse-racing. Quinquennalia were observed in honor of Julius Caesar, and also of Augustus; but they seem to have been celebrated with peculiar splendor under Nero, from whose time they were discontinued, until at length they were revived by Domitian in honor of Jupiter Capitolinus.

Quintillani were a sect of Montanists who appeared in Phrygia about 189. They were so called from their prophetess, Quintilla of Carthage. One of the peculiar tenets of this strange sect was that women are by the Scriptures entitled to perform episcopal and other ministerial duties. They attributed extraordinary gifts to Eve, in consequence of her having eaten of the forbidden fruit. They also quoted the history of Miriam, and the four daughters of Philip, who were prophetesses, in vindication of their proceedings. In their assemblies virgins appeared in white robes, personating prophetesses. The errors of this sect were condemned in the Council of Laodicea in 320. Tertullian charges the Quintillani with having opposed baptism, and wrote a work on that subject.

Quintus Matus, sometimes called the Father of Art and Artificers for having been transformed into a blacksmith to a painter by the force of love. He had followed the trade of a blacksmith and farther near twenty years, when, falling in love with a painter's daughter, who was very handsome, and disliked nothing in him but his profession, he quitted his trade and betook himself to painting, in which art he was assisted by a good natural taste, a master, and the power of love into the bargain, he made a very uncommon and surprising progress. He was a painstaking, diligent imitator of ordinary life, and much better at representing the defects than the beauties of nature. One of his best pieces is a Descant of the Cross, in the chapel at the Cathedral of Antwerp, for which and a multitude of other histories and portraits, he gained many admirers, especially for his laborious neatness, which, in truth, was the principal part of his character. He died in 1525. His works are dispersed through Europe with hope.

Qui proceédit ab Utrisque (who proceeded from both, i.e. from the Father and the Son) is the beginning of a sequence of Adam of St. Victor to the Holy Spirit, omitted entirely by the compilers of Songs of the Spirit.

The first verse runs thus in the original: "Qui procedit ab utroque, Genitore, Genitori, Patris, Patrisce, Redde ligatas elongantes, Pacis ferventia in te mentes Flamma tua divine."

There is an English translation by S. Wranger, in the Lyra Mystica, p. 170 sq., and by Casswell, in Hymns and Poems, Original and Translated, p. 156 sqq. Quirk is an architectural term for a small auxa channel or recess much used in mouldings.

Quisqueja. This island, one of the Great Antilles, now called St. Domingo or Hayti, was, at the time of the discovery of this part of the world, inhabited by a pacific and harmless population, who were soon annihilated by Spanish cruelty. They adored the sun (Tontika) and the moon (Tona). Both luminaries were held at first on the earth, in the island of Quisqueja, of course, where a splendid cave was their mansion. Finally, they went to Turrii (the heavens), thence to diffuse their light among the world. The cave is still shown; it has a diameter of 200 feet, and is 180 feet high. Its beauty is such as to induce the writers of the ancient times to build temples here. Figures of gods, genii, guardian spirits, are engraved in the walls. In a large number of places idols must have stood in ancient times. This supposition is in accordance with the opinion of Quirinus, and was written a work on that subject. with the scanty traditions that have reached us. More than a thousand idols were distributed at intervals in the recesses of the caves, representing the sun and moon, stood at the entrance. This seems to have been the only temple of Quiaqueja, for multitudes of worshippers flocked to it every day from all parts of the island. They believed that their country was the cradle of the human race. The first men were shut up in two caves of the Kauta mountain, and there watched by a giant. The jailer, having once ventured out of this recess, was changed into stone by the sun, whose rays were too powerful for him. The captive men, thus liberated, came forth in their turn. Many were those who shared the giant's fate, being transformed into animals, stones, or plants. Little by little those denizens of darkness became used to the light of day. The souls of men repair to the mountains which cover the middle part of the island, and there, in a cool country, rich in springs, they feed on the savory fruit of the hovenmy-tree, called by the Spaniards arpitaca of St. Domingo. The living men piously abstain from tasting those fruits, so as not to deprive the souls of their subsistence.

Their country was, primitively, much larger, and was not an island; but a terrific flood inundated the land, leaving only discovered the tops of the mountains. This happened under the following circumstances: A rich man, called Toja, lost by a sudden death his youngest son, whose mother had died in giving him birth. Not to part from his dear remains, he put them into a large pumpkin. After some time he took off the lid, and saw, to his dismay, that the pumpkin was filled with greenish water, in which a multitude of fishes and aquatic monsters were swimming about. In his terror he had recourse to his friends, and deliberated with them what was to be done. Meanwhile his other children took the pumpkin in their midst to have a look at the sea which, they had heard, was hidden in it. When they saw their father returning from his call, conscious of punishable inquisitiveness, they put the pumpkin roughly on the ground and ran away. The funeral vessel, thus carelessly handled, got a rent, and hence the waters of the sea flowed, without intermission, night and day, until all lower parts of the earth were covered, and the mountain-tops alone protruded from the universal ocean. Those tops became islands in the sea, and the land islands and the islands and the sea and islands and the sky and land and islands and the sea. These gods were thankful for the worship they received, and in return granted the pious people successful fishing and hunting, victory in battle (their images were fastened in battle with a string to the forehead of the combatants), pleasant crops, rain, or sunshine, as circumstances required. The women were blessed with happy children and the girls with pleasant husbands. A great festival was solemnized every year in honor of all these gods. The cacique on that occasion appeared with a shower of precious stones, thrown into the interior of the temple. These gods were thankful for the worship they received, and in return granted the pious people successful fishing and hunting, victory in battle (their images were fastened in battle with a string to the forehead of the combatants). The latter consisted of thin flour cakes, which were broken in the presence of the god, and small portions of them given back to the heads of the families. Those little slices were carefully preserved through the whole year. A general dance followed. It was at this solemn occasion that most of the matrimonial offers and arrangements took place. All traces of this ancient pagan worship were destroyed by the fanatical Spaniards, and the small Indian people was exterminated.

Quishion (pulvinar, cassius, culcitrum), a cushion, usually of velvet, and stuffed with wool or horsehair, for the service-book on the south side of the altar, appears in Henry's VII's Book of the Hours, and was used by Bishop Andregray. In the former it is on the south side, in the latter on the north. Albertus mentions the wooden desk, plated (legile), as a modern substitute. The book was first set on the right side and afterwards moved to the left side of the altar at Mass.

Quishtar, a family of Christian theologians, of whom we mention the following: 1. Bernhard Fe., was born at Rostock, April 11, 1718. In 1758 he was made superintendent, in 1766 doctor and professor of theology, in 1779 general superintendent, and afterwards chancellor and curator of the University of Greifswald, where he died, Jan. 4, 1788. He wrote, Dissertatio Epist. de Aethismo Benedicti de Spinassca (Rostock, 1748).—Diez, Epist. de Collatione Librorum Scripturae Sacrae in Interpretatione S. S. Haud Injusa (ibid. 1786).—Diez, Exegetica—dogmatica cæsa Imag. de Judæis Curde Compendia (ibid. 1749).—Sei in Aethismoror et nach der Stübenhuth haben schreiben können? Diss. de Notione Filiorum et Filiiarii Dei (ibid. 1761).—Diez, de Adoptione Ecclesiastica V. T. 2. Johann (1), was born at Rostock, Aug. 18, 1584. Having completed his studies at his native place and at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, he travelled through Holland, Brabant, and Flanders, and after his return, in 1615, he became professor in his native city. In 1645 he was made doctor of theology. In 1645 he was called as pastor and superintendent of St. Jacob, and died at Dobran, May 2, 1648. He wrote, Annoetationes in Omnes Libros Biblicalos (Frankfort, 1698).—Comment. in Omnes Epp. Pauli:—Castigatio Hebraeorum, etc. See Furs, Bibl. Judaicae, iii, 124 sq.; Winer, Thed. Hebr., p. 428.

3. Johann (2), son of the preceding, was born at Rostock, Feb. 5, 1624. He studied at Greifswald, Königsberg, Copenhagen, and Leyden, was made doctor of theology, and died as rector magistri Dec. 24, 1698. He wrote, Catechismus, later edition, etc. See Jücher, Allgem. Gelehr.-Lexikon, s. v.

4. Johann Nikolaus, son of the foregoing, was born at Rostock, Jan. 6, 1651, studied at his native place and Königsberg, travelled through Germany, Holland, and Denmark, and after his return, in 1678, he was made dean of St. Nicolai, afterwards pastor and superintendent, and finally professor of theology. He died Aug. 9, 1715. His writings, which are very numerous, touch upon almost every department of theology, and are enumerated by Jücher in his Allgem. Gelehr.-Lexikon, s. v. Quintastil, is, according to Mexican mythology, the serpent woman who, at the beginning of the fourth age of the world, populated the earth by the successive birth of a number of twins. The latter are represented on monuments holding in their hands the shells of the eggs from which they have crept.

Quiver is the rendering in the A. V. of two very different Hebrew words. The English word "quiver" is a variation of "cover" (from the French couver), and therefore answers to the second of the two Hebrew words. See Armor.

1. ""ת""ל, tel. This occurs only in Gen. xxvii, 3—"take thy weapons (literally "thy things"), thy quiver and thy bow." It is derived (by Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1504, and Fürst, Handwörterb. ii. 598) from a root which has the force of hanging. The passage itself affords no clue to its meaning. It may therefore signify either a quiver or a suspended weapon—for instance, such a sword as in our own language was formerly called a "hanger." Between these two significations the interpreters are divided. The Sept., Vulg., and Targum Pseudo-Jon. adhere to the former; Onkelos, the Peshito and Arabic versions, to the latter.

2. נָשְׂן, nashan. The root of this word is uncertain (Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 161). From two of its occurrences, its force would seem to be that of containing or concealing (Ps. cxvii, 5; Isa. xlix, 2). It is connected with arrows only in Lam. iii, 13. Its other occurrences are Job xxxix, 23; Isa. xxii, 6; and Jer. vi, 16. In each of these the Sept. translates it by "quiver" (φαργήμα), with two exceptions, Job xxxix, 23, and Ps. cxvii, 5, in the former of which they render it by "bow," in the latter by ἱσσός.

The quiver is a case or box for arrows, which was slung over the shoulder in such a position that a soldier could with ease draw out the arrows when he wanted them (Isa. xlix, 2; Jer. vi, 16). There is nothing in the Bible to indicate either its form or material, or in what way it was carried. The quivers of the Assyrians are rarely shown in the sculptures. When they do appear, they are sometimes richly decorated with groups of figures and fanciful designs. They were worn at the back, with the top between the shoulders of the wearer, or hung at the side of the chariot. The Egyptian war... riors, on the other hand, wore them slung nearly hori-nontal, drawing out from the belt the arm (Wilkinson, Aegypt., abridg'd, i, 354). The quiver was about four inches in diameter, supported by a belt passing over the shoulder and across the breast to the opposite side. When not in actual use, it was shifted behind, or hung at the side of the chariot, like that of the Assyrians. See CHARIOT. Among the ancient Greeks, the quiver was principally made of hide or leather, and was adorned with gold, painting, and braiding. It had a lid (ξύλα), and was suspended from the right shoulder by a belt passing over the breast and behind the back. The presentation was on the left hip, and is so seen in the annexed figures, the right-hand one representing an Amazon, and the left-hand an Aisatic archer.

"Quiver" is also used figuratively for house, and arrows for children (Psa. cxxvi, 6). See ARCHER.

Quoddas is the magic drum used by physicians and sorcerers among the Laplanders to chase the evil spirits which are supposed to be the cause of the diseases. It is covered with figures of animals and mysterious characters, and embossed with divers orna-tmental appendages.

Quod permittat is, in the Church of England, a schedule of the successor of a pastor. The Recover-ry of Pasture by the statute of Edward I, c. 34.

Quolin, the outer angle of a wall.

Quotations, Biblical. The verbal citations contained in Scripture are of three classes: (a) Those which the later writers of the Old Testament make from the earlier. (b) The quotations made by Paul from heathen authors —viz. Acts xvii, 28 from Aratus, Phenomen, 5, or Cleanchus, Hymns, and 1, 2, 3, 4, 10, 12 Manender's Thesis, and Tit. ii, 12 from Callimachus, Hymns, ad Jos. 8, according to Theodoret, or Epimenides according to Jerome, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, and others. To these may be added Gal. v, 23, where the words καὶ ἔστω ὑμῖν μια ταραττότω are identical with the words of Aristotle, Pol. iii, 8 (Gill, Notes and Querries, v, 175). Perhaps also Acts xiv, 17 and James i, 17, from their rhythmical form, may be quotations. (c) Those which the New Testament contains from the Old Testament. The first and third of these classes are the most important, and the only ones demanding special notice here. The following treatment as to both is complied from the various authorities on Biblical introduction and interpretation, with additions from other sources.

1. Parallel Passages of the Old Testament Scriptures. The principal of these are the following: Many sections of the books of Chronicles seem to be quoted from the earlier Scriptures. The historical chapters of the book of Isaiah (xxxvi–xxxvii) are repeated in 2 Kings xviii–xxi. The last chapter of Jeremiah represents xxvii–xxv. Of Ps. xix we have two copies, one in 2 Sam. xxvi. Compare also Gen. xxvi with Numb. xxxvi, and Ezra ii with Neh. vii. Other instances are cited: Hab. ii, 14 from Isa. xi, 9; Jon. ii, 8 from Psa. xliv, 18; ii, 18 from Psa. lixiv, 2; Obad. i, 8 from Jere. xxvii, and several passages in the later Psalms, which are found also in the earlier. The reader will find a list of the variations discovered by a comparison of most of the foregoing passages in the notes to Cappell, Crit. Sac. (i, 80–84 [ed. 1775]). See also Kennicott, Biblia Sacra Vulgatae, ii, 277, etc., and State of Printed Hebrean Text (pt. i).

The question to be determined is, Are we to regard each of the textual variations thus brought to light as a blunder to be corrected in one or other of the parallel Scriptures, or as a deviation (intentional or otherwise) on the part of the later writer from the language of the earlier? Considering this question a distinction must be made between two classes of parallel passages—the one class consisting of those in which the same story is told, or the same sentiments expressed, by two different writers, and the later writer avails himself of the language of the earlier, though it may write at times exactly or servilely, and at other times not exactly, but the other consisting of those in which a public or other document is inserted in two separate records. It would seem that such variations as are met with in passages of the former description are more likely to be designed and original, being probably traceable to the free use of which the later writer made of the materials furnished by the earlier; and that variations met with in passages of the latter description are more likely to be blunders arising from the negligence of transcribers and similar causes. But it is not necessary in all cases to draw the inescapable conclusion that such errors of transcription are found in the former class of passages, and alterations obviously designed are found in the latter. Let us illustrate this by four examples, two of each class.

1. The very remarkable prophecy contained in Isa.

ii, 1–4 is found also in Mic. iv, 1–3. The variations are few and of no great importance. But, such as they are, there is no reason to suppose that the text of either of these passages ever differed from what it is now. It is of no consequence in the present inquiry whether Micah borrowed from Isaiah or Isaiah from Micah, or both from an older prophet. There is no evidence whatever that the later writer made it a matter of conscience to reproduce in every minute particular the language of his predecessor. His heart was too full of the great thought embodied in the language to permit him to minutely attend to the very fold of the sheep's skin of which it had been presented. Possibly, also, the quotation was made from memory; and, if so, the wonder is not that any variety of expression is found in it, but that they are so few and so trivial. In such a case as this, therefore, it would be quite unwarrantable to correct the one passage from the other. The text in both passages is accurate and genuine, and any attempted emendations with the view of bringing the two passages into rigid harmony would certainly be alterations for the worse, not for the better.

2. The prophecy of Nathan in 2 Sam. viii occupies a very conspicuous position in the Old Testament, and, as we might expect, the whole narrative is repeated in 1 Chron. (xvii), not, however, without a very considerable number of alterations. In this case, also, it is quite evident that most of the alterations are to be traced to the author of Chronicles, and cannot be regarded as various readings. As is usual, the later writer makes a free use of the earlier narrative, adapting it and the language in which it is conveyed to the circumstances of his own time. Thus he writes פָּרָשַׁת יִרְיוֹת, prefers פְּרָשַׁת יָרָיוֹת, or פָּרָשַׁת יָרָיוֹת, sometimes substitutes תָּרוֹם לְפָרָשָׂת יָרָיוֹת or תָּרוֹם לְפָרָשָׂת יָרָיוֹת, in royal kingdom, and alters or omits words or clauses which ap-ppear to him obscure or unessential. The most remarkable omission is in ver. 18 as compared with ver. 14 of the narrative in Samuel. Compare also ver. 17 with ver. 19 of Samuel. Still, though it is evident that most of the variations between the two narratives are to be traced to the design of the later author, and cannot be regarded as errors of transcription, we do not think that all of them can be accounted for in this way. Two instances may be given, in one of which the text in Chronicles may fittingly be corrected by that in Samuel; in the other the text in Samuel may be corrected by that in Chronicles. (1.) In 1 Chron. xvii, 18, 19 we read, "What can David speak for the honor of thy servant, *גְּלָדִיד וְעִבְּדֵי גְּלָדִיד וְעִבְּדֵי גְּלָדִיד ... For thy servant's sake, and according to thine own heart hast thou done all this greatness." Not to mention the difficulty in the construction of the Hebrew in ver. 18, it is evident that the spirit of the whole passage is quite out of harmony with the context. Accordingly, according to the corresponding verses in Samuel, we are not surprised to find the sentiment expressed very different indeed, the words being "And what can David say more unto thee ... for thy word's sake, and according to thine own heart," etc. (ver. 29, 31). It is not improbable that we cannot but regard as the erroneous readings in Chronicles are to be traced to the similarity between נָשֵׁל and נָשְׁל and in the former of the two verses, and נָשֵׁל and נָשְׁל in the latter. It may be added that in the Septuagint translation of Chronicles the objectual forms are omitted. (2.) The other instance is in 2 Sam. vii, 25, compared with 1 Chron. xvii, 21.
In the former we read, according to the authorized translation of our version, that one nation in the earth is like thy people, even like Israel, whom God went to redeem for a people to himself, and to make him a name, and to do for you great things and terrible, for thy land, before thy people (גֶּבֶל, from before), which thou redeemedst to thee from Egypt, [from] the nations and their gods?" The text of this verse is obviously very confused; and in order to extract from it some tolerable sense, our translators have rendered גָּבֶל as if it were גֹּפֶל and have inserted from, without any authority, towards the close. Now, without venturing to affirm that the text in Chronicles is to be received as in every particular the text in Chronicles is to be received as in every particular the true and genuine one, we have no hesitation in borrowning from it what we believe to be an important ementation. In the latter verse, without the substitution of גֶּבֶל, to drive out, for בַּעֲלֵית (the words are very similar), for thy land. This will allow us to give גָּבֶל its proper force, and render unnecessary the insertion of the unauthorized from; the meaning of the latter half of the verse when corrected being as follows: "To drive out from before thy people, whom thou redeemedest to thee from Egypt, nations and their gods."
3. The two remaining examples are of a different description, consisting not of historical or prophetic passages freely made use of by a later writer, but of documents of which we have, so to speak, two editions.
The first is David's noble song of thanksgiving; of which two copies we are made acquainted—the one incorporated with the history in 2 Sam. xxii, the other with the psalm-book as Psa. xviii. Now, on comparing these two copies of the same song, we find scarcely a single line of the one exactly identical with the corresponding line of the other, some of the variations being of exremely little importance, others of greater moment.
The question here again arises: How are those variations to be accounted for? How comes it that two copies of the same song, handed down to us in the same volume, should, though identical in the general sentiments expressed, diverge in their order of thought, and in the order of the verses, present so many minute differences in the details of the composition? On first thought, we are disposed to conclude, somewhat rashly, that all the variations must be regarded as errors of transcription, and that in this case there is no room for the hypothesis of design on the part of the author or editor, insomuch as we have here the case not of an independent author adapting to his own purpose the materials furnished by previous writers, but of a collector giving insertion to a document which, one would suppose, it is his duty to present as nearly as possible in the words of the original author.
On comparing, however, the psalm with the history, it is evident that all the variations cannot be accounted for in this way. For example, the very first words of the psalm, "I will love thee, O Lord, my strength," do not appear in the other copy; and of this the only admislatable explanation plainly is that the words in question constitute an authorized addition to the song in its original form, the addition being made probably for the purpose of adapting it more perfectly to liturgical use.
If this explanation be admitted, it follows that of this song the original portion has been transmitted in two editions—the one, which is inserted in the history, presenting the song in its original form; the other presenting it in the slightly altered form which was given to it when incorporated with the authorized hymn-book of the Hebrew nation. In this way a considerable number of the variations may be accounted for, but not by any means, all of them; for, with regard to many of them, it is impossible to discover any useful purpose which could be served by their introduction; and several of them are just the sort of alterations which most usually arise from the mistake of the copyist, and the for example, the interchange of letters of similar form, the transposition of letters, etc. (thus for מַטְרִי, and he was seen, in 2 Sam. xxii, 11, we find in Psa. xviii, 11 [10] מַטְדִּי, and he did see; and for מַטְדִּרֶב in 2 Sam. xxii, 46 we find מַטְדָּרֶב in Psa. xviii, 46 [45].) The text in Samuel is the more antique in form—as, for example, in the more sparing insertion of vowel letters; but that of the Psalm appears to have been more carefully preserved. Thus, there is little doubt that for מַדְבָּר, in 2 Sam. xxii, 26, we ought to read מַדְבָּר, as in the Psalm; and in ver. 26, מַדְבָּר of Samuel ought to be read מַדְבָּר, or מַדְבָּר, as in the Psalm; and in the second clause, also the reading in the Psalm is much to be preferred.
So in vers. 33, 44, 47, 49. On the other hand, in vers. 5, 48, the reading in Samuel may be preferred to that of the Psalm.
4. Our last example is the Decalogue, of which we have two copies in Exod. xx, v. 5, vii, 9, in which there are not a few differences, some of considerable importance. But it is very doubtful whether any of these differences can be laid to the charge of the 抄ist; certainly the more important of them must be traced to the author. They are principally to be found in the fourth and tenth commandments; in the latter, the two first clauses are transposed in Deuteronomy, and a slight addition and alteration made;
and in the former, the remembrancer of Exodus is exchanged for observe in Deuteronomy; thy cattle is exchanged into thy oxen and ass and all thy cattle; and the "resom annexed" in Exodus—"For in six days," etc.—is entirely omitted in Deuteronomy, and another statement substituted for it—"That thy man-servant and maid-servant may rest as well as thou; and remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt," etc.
The other alterations are of less importance. In each of the fourth and fifth commandments, the clause "as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee" is inserted in Deuteronomy, the promise in the latter being also expanded by the addition of the clause "that it may be well with thee," and in the ninth, כְּבַדְתֶּם (for כְּבַדְתֶּם) is inserted in Deuteronomy for כְּבַדְתֶּם; no ot one of these variations which can be certainly traced to the oversight of a transcriber. It is, indeed, on first thought, surprising that any writer, however conscious of the guidance of the Divine Spirit, should have ventured to depart, even in the minutest particular, from the inspired word of a document which had been laid before us in so special a manner with the impress of Heaven.
It is, perhaps, the most remarkable example of that complete mastery of the essential over the accidental, of the spirit over the letter, which distinguishes the entire relation at once of the Old Testament and of the New.
But to explain this point is quite beyond the scope of our present purpose. It is sufficient to remark that most of the variations are evidently to be traced to the first composition of the book of Deuteronomy, and that none of them can with any degree of certainty be placed in the case of Moses, the editor of the Deuteronome-From the four examples of parallel passages which have been under review, the following conclusions have been elicited: (n.) That most of the variations are to be traced to the author or editor, and not to the copyist; and, in all such cases, both forms of the passage must be regarded as preserved two guides to the text. (4.) That, notwithstanding, a considerable number of variations still remain which cannot be accounted for in this way, but probably arose through oversight in transcription. In such cases it is allowable to correct the more faulty text by the more accurate; but, in the absence of any external testimony to the accuracy of the reading which we prefer, such corrections must be introduced with caution, and might, perhaps, with greater propriety be placed in the margin (as was the practice with the ancient Jewish critics) than incorporated with the text. The variations of this class would have appeared still more numerous to the compiler of our examples of parallel passages from those which are occupied with lists of names or numbers. See KENNICOTT, Dissertation on the State of the Printed Hebrew Text, pt. 1.

II. Quotations from the Old Testament in the New—

These form one of the outward bonds of connection between the Testaments of the Bible. They are manifold in kind; but all that we need here to respecting them may be summed up under the following heads:

1. Sources whence the Quotations are made—These are two—the Hebrew original and the Septuagint translation. On comparing the passages, in order to ascertain the quotations between these two sources, we find that by far the larger number are taken, either wholly or chiefly, from the Septuagint, while a very few materially differ from both the Septuagint and the Hebrew. The latter were probably quoted from memory, the occasion requiring a certain degree of accuracy in the translation.

For the most part, the deviations from the text of the Hebrew or the Septuagint are not material. They may be classified as follows:

(1) Changes of person, number, or tense in particular words, in Matt. vi, 31; Luke xxi, 31; Hebrews xii, 25; while the Septuagint gives, πάντως τον ποιμήν, και διασκορπασθήσαιτα το πρόβατα της ποιμήνς; or, while the Septuagint gives, πάντως τον ποιμήν, και διασκορπασθήσαιτα, ε. η. λ. (Zech. xiii, 7) (this is the reading of the Alexandrine Codex; that of the Vatican differs considerably: πάντως τον ποιμήν και θανάσασαι το πρόβατα). John xix, 36, Η ευρέω συντρίβησεν, αύτος, ὁ εὐρέω συντρίβησεν, αύτος, ἵνα ἰδητεί, for, μισθωτοί αὐτοῦ ιδητέοι, for, μισθωτοί αὐτοῦ ιδητέοι, Isa. iii, 5, etc. Comp. also Matt. xi, 10 with Mal. iii, 1; and John xix, 27 with Zech. xiii, 4.

(2) Substitution of synonymous words or phrases for those used in the Septuagint or Hebrew: e.g. John xiii, 18, ὁ τρόφων με' τοῦ τόπου τόπον, εἰπέντε τό, ἤργον τό, σπάσασα τον ποιμήν, και διασκορπασθήσαιτα τα πρόβατα της ποιμήνς; while the Septuagint gives, πάντως τον ποιμήν, και διασκορπασθήσαιτα. Sometimes the words thus substituted are synonymous with those for which they are used only historically; as when Paul (Gal. iv, 30) calls Isaac ὁ νόθος τῆς ἁλεξάνδρας, in a passage quoted from Gen. xxii, 10, where, in the words of Abraham, he is mentioned by name ὁ νόθος τῆς ἁλεξάνδρας. Occasionally, also, this kind of substitution is effected by the use of a word describing a species for one designating the genus to which it belongs; as when Paul, in 1 Cor. iii, 20, substitutes the words τῶν σωφρ. for the more general expression, τῶν αὕτων, used in the passage (Pas. xiv, 11) which he quotes; or as in Matt. iii, 3, where ὁ διάνοιατον is put for ἴδαν, the special kind of strength intended being that of the mind.

(3) Words and phrases transposed: e.g. Rom. v, 19, Ἰσακοῦ τοῦ ἀνέχεται. In Lat. Λατ. εἰκόνας ἀνέχεται τοῦ με ἐκπλήθουσα, for ἤμαρτος ἡ ἡγήμονας τοῦ με ἐκπλήθουσα, εἰκόνος τοῦ με ἡγήμονας, Isa. lx. 1, etc. The Codex Alex. gives this passage exactly as cited by Paul.

(4) Words and clauses interpolated or added: e.g. John vi, 31, ἄρων ἐν τῷ σφαγεῖν ἀνέκειται διὰ του με φαγεῖν, where the words ἐν τῷ σφαγεῖν are an addition, and ἐν τῷ σφαγεῖν is an interpolation, Isa. lxxi. 18. Or, again: ὁ πρῶτος ἀνέκειται ἢ ἀνέκειται, where ὁ πρῶτος ἀνέκειται is added by the apostle (comp. Gen. ii, 7). These additions are sometimes from parallel passages, and sometimes of the writer's own device, for the purpose of rendering the meaning of the passage clearer, or connecting it more readily with the preceding or subsequent context.

(5) Words omitted and paragraphs abridged: e.g. Matt. iv, 6, τοις ἄγγελοις αὐτοῦ ἐντελεία περι σοῦ, and ἔν με χειρῶν ἀφόρυτοι, καὶ μήποτε προσκήνῃ πρὸς λίθον τῶν ποδῶν σου, καὶ τοις ἄγγελοις αὐτοῦ ἐντελεία περι σοῦ, καὶ ἔν με χειρῶν ἀφόρυτοι, καὶ μήποτε προσκήνῃ πρὸς λίθον τ. σ. ρ. Δ. Χ. Χ. Χ., Psa. xxi, 12. Comp. also Matt. xxii, 24 with Deut. xxxii, 5; Rom. ix, 27, 28 with Isa. x, 22, 23; Heb. iv, 4 with Gen. ii, 5, etc.

(6) Passages too paraphrastically rendered, or the general sense only given: e.g. Rom. iv, 25, where we have a paraphrastic rendering of Hos. ii, 28; Rom. x, 6 sqq., a free rendering of Deut. xxxii, 12 sqq.; 1 Cor. i, 31, where the general sense of Jer. ix, 24 is given; comp. also 1 Pet. ii, 22 with Isa. lxxv; 8, etc.

(7) Several passages quoted together, so as to form one connected sense: e.g. in 2 Cor. vi, 16-18 we have a passage made up of no less than three different passages—Lev. xxvi, 11; Isa. iii, 11; Jer. xxxiii, 1. Comp. also Mark i, 2, 3, where Mal. iii, 1 and Isa. xi, 5 are combined; also Matt. xi, 10 and Deut. xiii, 4 are strangely mixed together.

(8) Several of these species of deviations combined together: e.g. Rom. iii, 24, ὁ γὰρ ἀνθρώπος τοῦ θεοῦ ἀδίκος. Here we have a combination of the omission of ἕκαστος ἡμῶν, and the omission of ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ. Comp. also Rom. xi, 8 with 1 Kings xix, 14, for an instance of the conjunction of omission, substitution, and transposition.

(9) Passages rather indicated, or hinted at, than formally quoted: e.g. Eph. v, 1, Ἐγείρω καὶ καθίζω, καὶ ἀνέκαστα ἐν τῷ σωματίῳ, καὶ ἐκτάσσω σοι ὁ Χριστός. The difficulty of assigning this quotation to any passage in the Old Testament, has been felt by all interpreters, and various theories have been proposed for the sake of removing it. The most probable, however, seems that which regards these words as formed upon Isa. ix, 1-5, and the passage as rather hinted at than quoted. Comp. also Heb. xii, 15 with Hos. xiv, 2. To this head may be also referred John v, 38, where no particular passage is quoted, but such passages as Isa. xiv, 3, 4, 11; iv, 1; lviii, ii; Zech. xiv, 8; xiii, 1, are alluded to.

In the quotations of all kinds from the Old Testament, in the New we find a continual variation from the letter of the older Scriptures. To this variation four causes may be specified as having contributed:

First. All the New-Testament writers quoted from the Septuagint, corrected, improved, or left out, especially when it was needful for their purpose: occasionally deserting it altogether; still abiding by it so large an extent as to show that it was the primary source whence their quotations were drawn. Their use of it may be best illustrated by the customary use of our liturgical version of the Psalms—a use founded on love as well as on habit, but which, nevertheless, we forego when it becomes important that we should follow more the accurate version. Consequently, when the errors involved in the Sept. version do not interfere with the purpose of the New-Test. writer had in view, they are frequently allowed to remain in his quotation (see Matt. xii, 9 [a record of our Lord's words]; Luke iv, 18; Acts xiii, 41; xiv, 17; Rom. xv, 10; 2 Cor. iv, 18; Heb. viii, 9; x, 5; xi, 21). The current of apostolic thought, too, is frequently dictated by words of the Sept., which differ much from the Hebrew (see Rom. ii, 24; 1 Cor. xv, 55; 2 Cor. ix, 7; Heb. xii, 15). Or even an absolute interpolation of the Sept. is quoted (Heb. i, 6 [Deut. xxxii, 43]). On the other hand, in conformity with the Sept., they quote from the Hebrew; so, too, in Matt. ix, 18; Luke xxii, 37, there is an effort to preserve an expressiveness of the Hebrew which the Sept. had lost: and in Matt. iv, 16; John xix, 37; 1 Cor. xv, 54, the Sept. disappears altogether.

In Rom. ix, 38 we have a quotation from the Sept. comm-bined with another from the Hebrew. In Mark xii, 30; Luke x, 27; Rom. xii, 19, the Sept. and Hebrew are superadded the one upon the other. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, which in this respect stands alone, the Sept. is uniformly followed; except in the one remarkable passage (Heb. x, 20), which recording neither with the Hebrew nor the Sept., was probably derived from the last-named passage (Rom. xii, 19), wherewith it exactly coincides. The quotation in 1 Cor. ii, 9 seems to have been derived, not directly from the Old Testament, but either from a Christian liturgy or other document into which the language of Isa. lxiv, 4 had been transferred.

Secondly. The New-Test. writers must have frequently quoted from memory. The Old Test. had been deeply instilled into their minds, ready for service whenever needed; and the fulfilment of its predictions, which they witnessed, made its utterances rise up in life before them (comp. John ii, 17, 22). It was of the very essence of such a living use of Old-Test. Scripture that their quotations of it should not of necessity be verbally exact.

Thirdly. Combined with this there was an alteration of conscious or unconscious design. Sometimes the object of this was to obtain increased force; hence the variation from the original in the form of the divine oath (Rom. xiv, 11); or the result of "I quake" substitute for the cause (Heb. xii, 21); or the insertion of rhymes for the sake of beauty (Heb. xii, 26); or the change of person to show that what men perpetrated had its root in God's determinate counsel (Matt. xxvi, 81). Sometimes an Old-Test. passage is abridged, and in the abridgment so adjusted, by a little alteration, as to present an aspect of completeness and yet omit what is foreign to the immediate purpose (Acts i, 20; 1 Cor. i, 81). At other times a passage is enlarged by the incorporation of a passage from another source. Thus in Luke iv, 18, 19, although the contents are professedly those read by our Lord from Isa. lx, we have not only the words of which we read but others introduced from Isa. viii, 6 (Sept.); similarly in Rom. xi, 8, Deut. xxix, 4 is combined with Isa. xxix, 10. In some cases still greater liberty of alteration is assumed. In Rom. x, 11 the word πείσα is introduced into Isa. xxviii, 16, to show that that is uttered of Jew and Gentile alike. In Rom. xi, 26, 27, the "to Zion" of Isa. lxix, 20 (Sept. Σωτήρ Σώφ) is replaced by "out of Zion" (suggested by Isa. ii, 3); to Zion the Redeemer had already come; from Zion, the Christian Church, his law was to go forth; or even from the literal Jerusalem (comp. Deut. xxxv, 9). In all these cases, destroyed the type was still in a measure kept up. In Matt. xviii, 17 the words of Isa. iii, 4 are adapted to the divine removal of disease, the outward token and witness of that sin which Christ was eventually to remove by his death, thereby fulfilling the prophecy more completely. For other, though less striking, instances of variation see 1 Cor. xiv, 21; 1 Pet. iii, 15. In some places, again, the actual words of the original are taken up, but employed with a new meaning; thus the λόγος, which in Hab. ii, 3 merely qualified the verb, is in 2 Peter iii, used as the subject to which any alteration in the quotation itself is the circumstance that inMatt. xxvii, 9 Jeremiah should be named as the author of a prophecy really delivered by Zechariah; the reason being, as has been well shown by Hengstenberg in his Christology, that the prophecy is based upon that in Jer. xviii, 19, and that without a reference to this original source the most essential features of the fulfilment of Zechariah's prophecy would be misunderstood. The same is the case with the Greek of Mark 1, 2, 3, where Mal. iii, 1 is combined with Isa. xi, 3, the name of Isaiah alone is mentioned; it was on his prophecy that that of Malachi partly depended. On the other hand, in Matt. ii, 23; John vii, 45, the comprehensive mention of the prophets indicates a reference not only to the passages more particularly comtemplated, Isa. xi, 1; iv, 13, but also to the general tenor of what had been elsewhere prophetically uttered.

See NAZARENE. On John vii, 58 it may suffice here to remark that perhaps the best solution of the difficulty is to regard our Lord as not making any direct quotation (of which there is no record), but using in metaphorical language, suited to the strain of his previous address (comp. ver. 37), a fact in which in plainer style is unquestionably announced in the ancient prophecies, viz. the abundant possession of divine knowledge by those who should live under the Messiah's reign. The passage James iv, 6 is beset with difficulty. Not only is there doubt as to what "Scripture" is cited, but much obscurity hangs over the meaning of the words themselves so added. We cannot enter into the details of the investigation. Referring for these to Huther's note on the passage in Meyer's Commentator, pt. 15, the substance of which is given by deis Alford in his notes, we content ourselves here with saying that some interpreters understand ἡ σώματα of the human spirit, and translate, "the spirit [temper, feeling of mind] which dwells in us lusts to envy [covetousness];" whilst others understand it of the Holy Spirit, or the Spirit implanted in the soul by God, and translate, either, "The Spirit which dwells in us lusts [desires, inclines] against envy;" or, "The Spirit which is [God's] hath placed in us jealously desireth [us for himself]." 2. Mode in which Quotations from the Old Test. are introduced.—For this purpose certain forms are used, a few of which are illustrated by our extracts. The commonest is a list, Kατά τὸ γεγραμμένον, ἵνα ἰκανονοῦμεν, οἴκημα πάντων. The words are inserted, to a great extent, wherever there is any single passage in the Old Test.; but if the last rendering be adopted, the writer may be supposed to refer generally to those parts of the Old Test. in which God is represented as dwelling in his people (Numb. xxxiii, 54; Ezek. xxxvii, 27), and as desiring with them a jealous affection (Deut. xxxii, 10 sq.). This is far from satisfactory, but it seems the best solution that has been offered.

"The Scripture saith, nothing more is necessarily implied than that which follows is taken from the Old Test.; but when it is said, "This was the Scripture fulfilled which saith," or "This was done that the Scriptures might be fulfilled," we immediately perceive that the writer would intimate a real connection of some sort between the event he is recording and the Scripture; for in the passage quoted the subject of the writer quoting it is treating. Thus, when it is simply said, "The Scripture saith," nothing more is necessary implied than that which follows is taken from the Old Test. ; but when it is said, "This was the Scripture fulfilled which saith," or "This was done that the Scriptures might be fulfilled," we immediately perceive that the writer would intimate a real connection of some sort between the event he is recording and the Scripture; for in the passage quoted the subject of the writer quoting it is treating. Thus, when it is simply said, "The Scripture saith," nothing more is necessary implied than that which follows is taken from the Old Test.; but when it is said, "This was the Scripture fulfilled which saith," or "This was done that the Scriptures might be fulfilled," we immediately perceive that the writer would intimate a real connection of some sort between the event he is recording and the Scripture; for in the passage quoted the subject of the writer quoting it is treating.
there are a considerable number scattered through the writings of the apostles which are inserted in the train of their own remarks without any announcement whatever of their being cited from others. To the cursory reader the passages thus quoted appear to form a part of the apostolic utterance, but on a closer inspection these passages are only incidental or introductory expressions, in one case the introduction of the apostolic text, in the other its conclusion. In the next passage quoted from the New Testament, the fact of their being quotations can be detected.

In the common version every trace of quotation is in many of these passages lost, from the circumstance that the writer seems to have been entirely in sympathy with the principles and truths of our Lord's teaching, while the version of the Old Testament is made from the Hebrew. Thus, for instance, in 2 Cor. viii, 21, Paul says, "καθὼς ὕπαρκτος ἀλλά τοῦ μόνου ἑαυτοῦ μυστήριος, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἑαυτοῦ ἐκδοθέντος," which, with a change in the mode of the verb, is a verbatim citation of the Septuagint version of Prov. iii, 4. Hardly any trace of this, however, appears in the common version, where the one passage reads, "Providing for honest things not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men;" and the other, "So shalt thou find favor and good understanding in the sight of God and man." So also, in 1 Pet. iv, 18, the apostle quotes word for word from the Septuagint version of Prov. xi, 31 the clause οἵ δὲ ἔκτισεν μᾶλλον σάρκα, ὁ ἀνθρώπος καὶ τοιούτῳ ποιοί συνίστημι; a quotation which we should in vain endeavor to trace in the version of the New Testament. Thus the passage in question is rendered, "Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner." Such quotations evidently show how much the minds of the New Testament writers were imbued with the sentiments and expressions of the Old Testament, as exhibited in the Alexandrian version.

5. Purposes for which these Quotations are introduced. — These, as appears from an examination of the passages, are of the following kinds:

(1) For the explanation or proof of some doctrinal position. Thus Paul, for the sake of explaining and confirming his doctrine of the efficacy of faith, quotes repeatedly from Hab. ii, 4 the sentence "The just shall live by faith." So, also, in order to prove that mere natural descent from Abraham did not of itself entitle any one to the divine favor, the same apostle quotes the terms of God's promise to Abraham, in which he expressly declares that in Isaac alone of all Abraham's family, was the seed of Abraham — i.e., the spiritual Israel, to be called Israel — Gen. xlii, 7; xliii, 12, 13, 15, 17, 20, 21; xiii, 19, 20; xiv, 10, 11, etc. It is to be observed that the passages thus added are almost always found in writings addressed to Jews, and therefore are to be regarded as containing argumenta e concessa. They are always applied, if not in the words, at least in the sense, of the original from which they are taken.

(2) For the purpose of pointing out the application of the passage quoted to some statement or description in the context in which it is introduced. From the circumstance that several of the passages thus adduced are in the phraseology of the New Testament, as well as in that of the Rabbinical writings, said to be "fulfilled," it has been hastily inferred by some that they are all to be regarded as designed prophecies of the events to which they are applied. For this opinion, however, no adequate support seems to be afforded by the phrase in question. The general idea attached to the verb ἐτλήθη is that of filling up to its full capacity anything of which it is predicated. Thus the Jews are said by Christ to have fulfilled the measure (ἐτλήθη τὸ μέτρον) of the ancient prophecies: and in the phrase in question consequently is susceptible of application to whatever is thought of as supplying the complement of any given capacity, and that whether it is used in a literal or metaphorical sense. Hence it is appropriately used in the New Testament with respect to passages quoted from the Old Testament in the following cases:

First. When it announces the accomplishment of a prophecy contained in the words quoted. As the prediction is a mere empty declaration, as it were, until the fact predicted has occurred; so that fact, by giving meaning and force to the prediction, is viewed as its completion. To adduce a New Testament example, according to the facts of our Lord's history, when they came to any which formed the subject of ancient prophecy, whether explicit or typical, direct the attention of their readers to the circumstance by adding the prediction and intimating its fulfillment in the fact they have recorded.

Secondly. When it introduces some description or statement which affords a parallel to what the writer has been saying. Such a description being regarded as involving a fact of general applicability to the human race, or to certain portions of it, is thought of as being, so to speak, in a state of deficiency until the measure of its applicability has been filled up. Each new case, therefore, which affords a parallel to that to which the description was originally applied goes so far to supply this deficiency by affording another instance in which the description obtains. And hence the writers are in the habit of quoting such descriptions as having been fulfilled in the cases to which they are applied by them. Thus a passage from the prophecies of Jeremiah, in which a description is given of the desolation caused by the divine vengeance for sins, in the passage in question is rendered, "Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner." Such quotations evidently show how much the minds of the New Testament writers were imbued with the sentiments and expressions of the Old Testament, as exhibited in the Alexandrian version.

Besides the passages introduced as fulfilled, there are others referable to the same general head, which are introduced by others of the formule above mentioned. Of these, some belong to both the classes just described — prophecies of which the New Testament announces the fulfillment, and general descriptions to which something parallel is brought forward. Another class consists of moral and religious maxims, which are adduced as applicable to the state of things of which the writer or speaker is discoursing, and which, though not said to be fulfilled thereby, are quoted under essentially the same idea. Such sentences embody, as it were, certain laws of human nature and conduct, certain general facts in the human economy, of which we are to expect the parallel to be supplied whenever the idea is embodied. Like the laws of physical science, therefore, they are dependent for their verification upon the examination of the phenomena appropriate to that region to which they belong; and as no law of science can be said to lie absolutely beyond the possibility of refutation until every one of the phenomena which it em-
QUOTATIONS

It has appeared to some that the hypothesis of an accommodation of words originally used of one thing to designate another is inconsistent with due reverence to the divine Word. But wherein does the alleged irreverence of the use of Scripture to express low and unworthy ideas, or for the sake of giving point to mere worldly reasonings, is to use them irreverently; but to use them to convey ideas as elevated as those originally attached to them, if not more so (which is the case, e.g., in Rom. x. 18), has but little appearance of treating them with irreverence. The only ground on which such a charge could be maintained is, that words once employed by an inspired writer in a peculiar combination became thenceforth sacred to the expression of that combination of ideas they were first used to denote, whatever others may be susceptible of expressing. But who is there that could seriously attempt to defend such a position as this? If this were the case, every quotation not made expressly as authority would be liable to ensure; and, as the number of such in the New Testament is indubitably considerable, hardly any of its writers would stand clear of blame. See ACCOMMODATION.

The truth is, the practice of making use, in this way, of previous and popular writers is one which was common in T. times; and which can hardly fail to be common wherever an established national literature exists. In proof of this we have only to examine the writings of the later classics of Greece and Rome, which abound in quotations direct and accommodated from their earlier authors. We see the same course pursued by the Rabbinical writers towards both the Old Test. and the New Test., as well as towards the profane classics. Indeed, such quotations form so apt and natural an ornament of style that writers of all ages and countries, who in the sense of doing so exist, have availed themselves of it. Why, then, should we wonder that such a practice should have been followed by the sacred writers, who, in other respects, appear to have obeyed in the preparation of their works the ordinary rules and usages, both grammatical and rhetorical, of literary composition?

QUOTATIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE TALMUD. In order to understand many quotations which are cited in the Talmud from the Scriptures, we must remember that their purposes, arguments, and questions, did not use a MS., but cited from memory—a mode of citation often found in the New Test. Dr. M. Steinschneider, in his essay Jewish Literature, in Erzeh and Gruber's Allem. Erfug. i, 1890, vol. XXXVII, apud apud., states that the influence of the Bible on geonomics in particular is shown in the following step—(1). Biblical precepts were... used unchanged in meaning and expression, as sentiments or favorite sayings of particular persons.* (2) Biblical sentences, unchanged in form, were made by extending or contracting their contents, adding new expressions of various truths which had elsewhere been clothed in known proverbs, so that these last were in some sense deduced from the Bible. A wide field was thus opened for the Midrash; and, finally, the words of the Bible were made into proverbs with an entirely different sense.† (3) Lastly, Biblical phrases and ideas were used more or less intentionally in newly formed sentences,‡ and passed into proverbial forms, as they are to be found in the old Halachah (e.g. Pe'ah, ii, 2).

1. As the ancient rabbins made the Bible their study for so long a time, they knew practically all the Biblical sayings, and when in theological colloquies, they were able to quote a correct Biblical text. And yet we must bear three things in mind, in order not to have a misconception of the matter. This makes it intelligible, we will quote the following examples:

(a. The Talmudists sometimes erroneously attribute a Biblical verse to another context. Thus we read in the Talmud (Pe'ahim, fol. 109, col. 1), "It is every man's duty to rejoice with his household on the feast, for it is written, 'And thou shalt rejoice in thy feast.'"

Deut. xvi, 14, where reference is made to the Feast of Tabernacles. The Tosaphoth on this passage, however, reads, 'And thou shalt rejoice, thou and thine household' (טבש הילא ותבש). Now the original reading was that as in the Tosaphoth, which is found in Deut. xiv, 26, where the second time is spoken of. The rabbins, however, thought that the reading alluded to in the Tosaphoth is found in the section which treats of the Feast of Tabernacles; hence, when the editors of the Talmud found out the mistake, they substituted for the reading קריע תואר התשע תואר of that of תColumnType17="םש ותבש." (b.) Sometimes sentences are quoted in the Talmud as Biblical which are not found in the Bible. In Berakoth, fol. 61, col. 1, in fine, we read: Rab Nachman said Manoah was an ignorant man (אמר עא איה), for it is written, 'He went after his wife' (Judg. xiii, 11). Rab Nachman, the son of Isaac, asked, should this not also apply to Elkanah, for it is written, 'And Elkanah went after his wife;' and to Elijahu, of whom the Scripture says, "And he arose and followed her" (2 Kings iv, 80)? He followed her indeed! Yes, but he followed her words and advice, and so here likewise he (Manoah) went after her words and counsel. The Tosaphoth correctly remarks on what the Talmud says concerning Elkanah and Elijahu: it means a child and a wife respectively (טבש הילא ותבש), i.e. "It is an error, for this verse is not found in the whole Scripture."* To illustrate Stielensnyder's statement, we give the following example. In the Talmud (Nedarim, fol. 61, col. 9) it is said in the school of R. Ishmael, "He will magnify the law and make it honorable" (לנשראנ תוא). In the Talmud (Berakoth, fol. 10, col. 1) the question was raised, how long the judges were obliged to sit at court. R. Sherai answered, "Until mid-day." To which R. Chama said, "Where do you find the law in the Scripture?" The answer was, "It is said, 'Woe to thee, O land! for a child is a child, and a wife is a wife in the morning'" (Eccles. x, 16). R. Jeremiah once engaged himself with R. Sera in the law. When the time for the evening prayer had already advanced, R. Jeremiah besought himself quickly to read it. To this R. Sera replied the passage (Prov. xxviii, 9), "He that turneth away his ear from hearing my law, even his prayer shall be abhorred." (Šabbath, fol. 10, col. 1). Of Rl. Tarphon it is said that when he was told something he rejected it, he would say to use it (סבש⁸ יבש כן), "A knap and a flower in one branch" (Ezod. xxviii, 83); but when the tale was not according to his taste, he used the words (Gen. xxii, 90), "You shall no go down with your (Sabbath Robbas, ch. xxv).

* E.g. "He already drank for thee the cup of consolation," i.e. He already drank for thee the cup of consolation (Sabbath Robbas, fol. 20, col. 3). To be contradicted in another something? The phrase "cup of consolation" is found in Jer. xvi, 1. have seen that in the ancient Book of the Crowns, even though it states in Deut. 18:18 is written with a after the first ב.
   The latter statement proves that our present reading is correct.

Ra‘amah [some Raa‘amah] (Heb. Ramah), רָפָה בָּ֫מָה

Once Rama‘, רָפָה בָ֫מָה [1 Chron. i. 9], a skudding, hence a horse’s mane, as in Job xxxix. 19; Sept. Papyrus, but Paruma [v. r. Paruma] in Ezek. xxvii. 22; Vulg. Roma and Reoma), the fourth son of Cush, and the father of Sheba and Dedan (Gen. x. 7: 1 Chron. i. 9), B.C. post 2518. It appears that the descendants of Cush colonized a large part of the interior of Africa, especially the southern continent probably by the strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. A section of the family, however, under their immediate progenitor, Raamiah, settled along the eastern shores of the Arabian peninsula. There they founded nations which afterwards became celebrated, taking their names from Raamiah's two sons, Sheba and Dedan. See CUSH. Though Sheba and Dedan became nations of greater importance, and notoriety, yet the name Raamiah did not wholly disappear from ancient history. Ezekiel, in enumerating the distinguished traders in the marts of Tyre, says, "The merchants of Sheba and Raamiah, they were thy merchants: they occupied in thy fairs with chief of all spices, and with all precious stones, and gold" (Ezek. xxvii. 22). The eastern provinces of Arabia, (Damas, in all ages for their spices. The position of Sheba (q.v.) is well known, and Raamiah must have been near it.

There can be little doubt that in the classical name Regma (Prus of Potemly, vi, 7, and *Ptyzum of Steph. Byzantium), which is identical with the Sept. equivalent for Raamiah, we have a memorial of the Old-Test. patriarch and of the country he colonized. The town of Regma was situated on the Arabian shore of the Persian Gulf, on the northern side of the long promontory which separates it from the ocean. It is interesting to note that on the southern side of this promontory, a few miles distant, was the town called Datena, evidently identical with Dedan (q.v.). Around Regma Potemly locates an Arab tribe of the Aaurit (Geog. vi, 7). Pliny appears to call them Epimariani (vi, 26), which, according to Porzio (Geog. of Arabia, 323), is just an anagrammatic form of Rammanie, the descendants of Raamiah—an opinion not improbable. Forster traces the migrations of the nation from Raamiah along the eastern shores of Arabia to the mountains of Yemen, where he finds them in conjunction with the family of Sheba (Ibid. p. 66-71). There the mention of the Rammani tribe by Strabo, in connection with the expedition of Gallus (xvi, p. 781), seems to corroborate the view of Forster. Of Sheba, the other son of Raamiah, there has been found a trace in a ruined city so named (Sheba) on the island of Adaw (Marask, s. v.), belonging to the province of Arabia called El-Bahryen, on the shores of the gulf. See SHEBA. Be this as it may, however, there can be no doubt that the original settlements of the descendants of Raamiah were upon the south-western shores of the Persian Gulf. Probably, like most of their brethren, while remaining a permanent nucleus, they wandered with their flocks, herds, and merchandise far and wide over Arabia. For the different views entertained regarding Raamiah, see Bochart (Philog. iv, 5) and Michaelis (Siegenen, i, 185). The tribe of Rammanie (Geog. v, 16) and the "area Rammanie" cannot, on etymological grounds, be connected with Raamiah, as it wants an equivalent for the; nor can we suppose that it is to be probably traced three days' journey from Sanh, the capital of Yemen.

Raamiah (Heb. Raamayh, רָמוֹאָה, thunder of Jehovih; Sept. Poa máy [v. r. Naqem]), one of the chief Israelites who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii, 7), B.C. 445. In the parallel list (Ezra ii, 21) he is laid down with the three above-mentioned equated and similar. A possible explanation of the name in the Sept. of Nehemiah appears to have arisen from a confusion of the two readings, unless, as Burrington (Gewal, ii, 68) suggests, Poa máy is an error of the copyist for Poa Aava, the uncial letters of having been mistaken for m. In 1 Esdr. ii, 7, the name appears as Ezrak.

Rab. See RABBI; RABBINISM.

Rab, properly Arba Arikha, a noted Jewish teacher, was born at Kaphri, a small place between Sur and Nehardea, in Babylon, about A.D. 170. In early life he went in quest of knowledge into Palestine, and became one of the most favorite scholars of Jehudah the Holy (q.v.). On his return to the East he labored, some say for thirty years (between A.D. 188 and 219), at Nehardea as metugenam, or amora, under Shila and Samuel; and at the close of that relationship, he entered upon the higher sphere of school rector and judge at Sura (or Sora), where he exercised those offices till the end of his life. "In this college, which was called Be-Rab (בֶּרַב), being an abbreviation of Beth-Rab (בְּרָב), the school of Rab, the disciples assembled two months in the year—viz. the month of Elul—in the cool air and spring, for which they were denominat Yarche Kallah (יֶרֶךְ קָהָלָה, the months of assembly) and into it all the people were admitted a whole week before each principal festival, when this distinguished luminary delivered expository lectures for the benefit of the nation at large. So eager were the people to hear him, and so great were the crowds, that many could find no house accommodation, and were obliged to take up their abode in the open air on the banks of the Sora River (Succa, 26 a). These festival discourses were denominated Rite (רִית), and during the times in which they were delivered all courts of justice were closed (Baba Rama, 118 a)." After holding the presidency for about twenty-eight years, Rab died in A.D. 247, lamented by the whole nation. The esteem in which he was held during his lifetime is best expressed in the title "Rab," i.e., teacher, by which they called him; just as Jehudah the Holy was called *Rabbi" or "Rabbenu" in Palestine. One of Rab's main works was the systematic exposition of the Mishna (q.v.), a copy of which, as revised and somewhat amended by Rab himself, in his later years, he had brought from Palestine. This second recension of the Mishna became the authorized or canonical form of that work, and, under the Aramaic name of Matica be-Rab, "the Mishna of the School of Rab," constituted the text of the Babylonian Talmud. But, besides his labors as an oral expositor on the Mishna, Rab was the author of two important works which greatly contributed to the advancement of Biblical exegesis. These were, Siphra or Siphry de be-Rab, *"the Book of the School of Rab" (בֶּרַב בֶּשֶר בְּלָדֹת), a Midrash on Leviticus; and Siphre or Siphry de be-Rab (בֵּית רַב בֶּשֶר), a similar commentary on Numbers and Deuteronomy. These works have, indeed, been sometimes attributed to other authors, but the greatest weight of authority assigns them to the doctor of Sura. An analysis of these works is given in the article MIDRAH, where also some of the editions are mentioned. The best edition of the Siphra is that of M. L. Malbim, with the commentaryيثו(2) (De Voland, 1870). But, besides his many Midrashim, Rab was also a highly distinguished expositor of the Hebrew Scriptures. His "Etzeh über die Bücher Siphra" (1878) is certainly the best, but above all, the excellent monograph by Muhlfield, Rab: ein Lebensbild zur Geschichte des Talmud (Leips. 1871). (B. P.)

Rabad (רַבָּד), or Abraham Ibn-Daud, for which the acrostic stands, a noted rabbi, was born at Toledo about 1110, and died as a martyr 1180. He was one of the most renowned Talmudists of his time, highly esteemed for his historical knowledge. He was the author of the הַסֵּכִּים (The Successions of Tradition), written in the form of annals, giving the history of the world from Adam to his own time (1161), and showing the uninterrupted chain of tradition to his day, against the opinion of the Karaites, who denied all tradition. As a supplement to this chronicle, Ibn-Daud wrote a succinct Rabardeau, Michel, a French Jesuit, was born at Orleans in 1572, and became a member of the order in 1595. He had enjoyed the very best educational facilities, and was therefore employed by the Society in its schools. He taught philosophy and moral theology, and became successively rector of Bourges and of Amiens. He died at Paris in 1649. He is celebrated especially for his mastery of casuistry and his intimate knowledge of the canon law. In the domain of the latter he displayed his power in 1640, when Harsaut the Oratorian sought a schism in the Church of France by his work Optati Galli de Creato Schismate, in which Rambaud showed the assumption of the patriarchate. Rabardeau, in his Optatus Gallus Benignus Manus Sectus (Paris, 1641, 4to), defended the cardinal, and tried to prove that such an assumption bore in it no trace of a schism, as the patriarchates of Jerusalem and Constantinople are in no wise interfaced in power with the Pope, and the Roman Popacy and its supreme authority. Of course, at Rome the book was displeasing, and was put into the Index. See Setheh, Bibl. Scriptor. Soc. Jesu.—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Rabaudy, Bernard de, a French theologian, was born in 1801, at Toulouse, of an ancient noble family. At an early age he took the monastic vow with the Dominicans, and, after having completed his education, he taught at Limoges and in the University of Toulouse. In 1706 he was nominated superintendent of the order in France, and in 1716 was made successor to the general of the order at Toulouse. He died there Nov. 3, 1731. He wrote, Exercitationes Theologicae (Toul. 1714, 2 vols. 8vo), and Questions de Deo Uno (ibid. 1718, 8vo). See Échard, Bibl. Script. Ord. Predicat. vol. ii.—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Rabaut, Paul, a French Protestant divine, who was a martyr to the cause of true Christianity in France, was born at Béthune, near Montpellier, in 1718. He was educated at the seminary in Lausanne for the holy office of the ministry, and became one of the "Preachers of the Desert," among whom he soon ranked as first in many respects. In 1743 he was made pastor of the Reformed Church of Nantes, and there became the leader of French Protestantism. This was a time of persecution indeed. The government of Louis XV had taken upon the task of rooting out the heretical doctrines which had flourished their banner in the face of the very man who had given authority to his government by saying "L'État c'est moi." In spite of all opposition, and in the face of a host of plotting enemies, Rabaut maintained his position, and in 1728 he was even emerited. But in 1738, when the great Revolution succeeded, he was arrested as a traitor, and only gained his freedom in 1774 by the reversal of the 9th Thermidor. He died shortly after Sept. 25, 1794. Rabaut took part in the Reform of the Calendars, and in 1791, he wrote a treatise in which he defined the Revolution. He was a man of great wit and courage of that in 1738; and although his heterodox views on many important points made him a pronounced Chiliasm in doctrine and an Episcopalian in government, he was yet so greatly revered for his fortitude, consistency, frankness, and devotion to Protestantism that his leadership was never rejected, but always gladly accepted by the Huguenot successors. He was not a great man. His education was moderate, his power in the pulpit ordinary. It was his sterling qualities of character that made him a leader in the Israel of France. His eldest son, Paul, also called St. Etienne, who was born in 1748, and was both preacher and lawyer, distinguished himself as a leader of the Revolution, to which both he and his wife fell martyrs. It was his influence that carried through the National Council religious equality for all citizens. His novel Te Deum or La Révérence (Lond. 1779; republished at Paris in 1820 and 1826 under the title Le Dieu Céleste) is important for the history of French Protestantism. Another son (the second), Antoine R-Pommer, who was born Oct. 21, 1744, was also a preacher, and likewise distinguished himself in the Revolution. He finally entered the civil service, but in 1815 he was obliged to quit France on account of his having voted for the execution of Louis XVI, and was only allowed to return in 1816. He died at Paris in 1820. He published Amansier Ecclésiastique, et l'Éloignement de Stancrur P. R. de Pess, Francia au XVIIIe Siècle (Lausanne, 1859). Rab'bah (Heb. Rab'baḥ, רַבְּבָה), the name of several ancient places both east and west of the Jordan, although it appears in this form in connection with only two in the Bible. The root is rab, mighty, and hence great, whether in size or importance (Genesis, Thesaur. p. 1254; Fürst, Handwörterb. ii, 347). The word survives in Arabic as a common appellative, and is also in use as the name of places—e.g. Rabba, on the east of the Dead Sea; Rabba, a temple in the tribe of Menash (Yez誼, ii, 107 a); and perhaps also Rabob, in Morocco. In the following account we chiefly follow the usual Biblical and archaeological authorities, with additions from other sources. See Rabbah.

2. A very strong place on the east of Jordan, which, when it was first introduced, was the chief city of the Ammonites. In five passages (Deut. iii, 11; 2 Sam. xii, 26; xvi, 27; Jer. xlix. 1: Ezra xx, 20) it is styled at length יַרְבָּבָה יְבֵנָה יְבֵנָה יָבָה יַרְבָּה יְבֵנָה יְבֵנָה יָבָה יַרְבָּה יְבֵנָה יְבֵנָה Yarbaḥ-ben-Abanain, A. V. "Rabbah of the Ammonites," or "the Children of Ammon;" but elsewhere (Josh. xiii, 28; 2 Sam. xi, 18; Jer. 27, 29; 1 Chron. xxi, 29; Jer. 48, 28; Amos i, 14) simply "Rabbaḥ." The Sept. generally has Ραβάσι, Ραβασίον, or in some MSS. occasionally Ραβάσιον or Ραβασίον. In Deut. iii, 5 it is Ραβάσιον τῶν ἀμώνων in both MSS. In Josh. xiii, 25 the LXX has Ραβάσιον καὶ τὰ σημαντικὰ περὶ τοῦ τοῦ ποταμοῦ τοῦ Ἰωάννου. The first and last words of this sentence seem to have changed places. Other various readings likewise occur.
RABBABH 863  RABBABH

Rabbah appears in the sacred records as the single city of the Ammonites; at least no other bears any distinctive name, a fact which contrasts strongly with the abundant details of the city life of the Moabites. Whether it was originally, as some conjecture, the Ham of Amnon—there were dispersioners of Ammonites (Gen. xiv, 5), will probably remain forever a conjecture. The statement of Eusebius (Onomast. n. v. *'Apddô) that it was originally a city of the Rephaim implies that it was the Ashtaroth Karmaim of Gen. xiv. In agreement with this is the fact that it was in later times known as Antara (Staph. BzS, quoted by Ritter, p. 1155). In this case, the dual ending of Karmaim may point, as some have conjectured in Jerusalemim, to the double nature of the city—a lower town and a citadel. When first named it is in the hands of the Ammonites, and is mentioned as containing the bedstead of the giant Og (Deut. iii, 11), possibly the trophy of some successful war against the more ancient Rephaim. With the people of Lot, their kinsmen the Israelites had no quarrel, and Rabbah—of the children of Ammon remained to all appearance un molested during the first period of the Israelitish occupation. It was not included in the territory of the tribes east of Jordan; the border of Gad stops at "Aroer, which faces Rabbah" (Josh. xiii, 25). The attacks of the Bene-Ammon on Israel, however, brought these peaceful relations to an end. Benjamin, Enc. Bibl. 804, through embassies sent to the west of Jordan in attacking and repelling the Philistines and in pursuing David through the woods and ravines of Judah to prevent his crossing the river, unless on such special occasions as the relief of Jabesh. At any rate, we never hear of his having penetrated so far in that direction as Rabbah. But David's armies were often engaged against both Moab and Ammon. His first Ammonitish campaign appears to have occurred early in his reign. A part of the army, under Abishai, was sent as far as Rabbah to keep the peace, while the main force under Joab remained at Medeba (1 Chron. xix, 7). The following year was occupied in the great expedition by David in person against the Syrians at Helam, wherever that may have been (2 Sam. x, 19). After their defeat the Ammonitish war was resumed, and this time Rabbah was made the main point of attack (xi, 1). Joab took the command, and was followed by the whole of the army. The expedition included Ephraim and Benjamin, as well as the king's own tribe (ver. 11), the "king's slaves" (ver. 1, 17, 24), probably the officers of the old regiments and seven chief captains. Uriah was certainly there, and, if a not improbable Jewish tradition may be adopted, Ittai the Gittite was there also. See ITTAI. The ark accompanied the camp (ver. 11), the only time that we hear of its doing so, except that memorable battle with the Philistines, when its capture caused the death of the high-priest. On a former occasion (Numb. xxxix, 6) the "holy things" only are specified—an expression which hardly seems to include the ark. David alone, to his cost, remained in Jerusalem. The country was wasted, and the enemy was driven with their property (xii, 30) into their single stronghold, as the Bedouin Knites were driven from their tents inside the walls of Jerusalem when Judah was overrun by the Chaldeans. See JEROBOAM. The siege must have lasted nearly, if not quite, two years; since during its progress David formed his connection with Bathsheba, and the two children, which then died and Solomon, were successively born. The sallies of the Ammonites appear to have formed a main feature of the siege (2 Sam. xi, 17, etc.). At the same time it ceded 1 in capturing a portion of the place—the "city of waters," that is, the lower town, so called from its containing the perennial stream which rises in and still flows through it. The fact (which seems undoubted) that the source of the stream was within the lower city, explains its having held out for so long. It was also called the "royal city" (אֶרֶץ הַכִּסָּר), perhaps from its connection with Molech or Milcom—"the king"—more probably from its containing the palace of Hazan and Nahash. But the citadel, which rises abruptly on the north side of the lower town, a place of very great strength, still remained to be taken, and the honor of this capture, Joab (with that devotion to David which runs like a bright thread through the dark web of his character) insists on reserving for the king. "I have fought," writes he to his uncle, then living at ease in the harem at Jerusalem, in all the satisfaction of the birth of Solomon—"I have fought against Rabbah, and have taken the city of waters; but the citadel still remains: now, therefore, gather the rest of the people together and come; put yourself at the head of the whole army, renew the assault against the citadel, take it, and thus finish the siege which I have carried so far," and then he ends with a rough banter (comp. 2 Sam. xix, 6)—"half jest, half earnest,—lest I take the city and in future it go under my name." The waters of the lower city once in the hands of the besiegers, the fate of the citadel was certain, for that stronghold, as we learn from the invaluable notice of Josephus, Ant. vii, 5, but one well of limited supply, quite inadequate to the throng which crowded its walls. The provisions also were at last exhausted, and shortly after, David's arrival, the city surrendered with a very great booty, and the idol of Molech, with all its costly ornaments, fell into the hands of David. We are not told whether the city was demolished or whether David was satisfied with the slaughter of its inmates. In the time of Amos, two centuries and a half later, it had again a "wall" and "palaces," and was still the sanctuary of Molech—"the king" (Amos i, 14). So it was also at the date of the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxxix, 2, 8), when its dependent towns ("daughters") were mentioned, and when it is named in the prophecy of Ezekiel (Ezra xi, 20) that Ammon, with Jerusalem (Ezra xxi, 20). At Rabbah, no doubt Baalas, king of the Bene-Ammon (Jer. xi, 14), held such court as he could muster, and within its walls was plotted the attack of Ishmael which cost Gedaliah his life and drove Jeremiah into Egypt. The denunciations of the prophets just named may have been fulfilled either at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, or five years afterwards, when the Assyrian armies overran the country east of Jordan on their road to Egypt (Josephus, Ant. x, 9, 7). See JEROBOAM, on AMOS i, 41.

In the period of the New Testament, Rabbath-Ammon appears to have been a place of much importance and the scene of many contests. The natural advantages of position and water supply, which had always distinguished it, still made it an important citadel by turns to each side during the contentions which raged so long over the whole of the district. It lay on the road between Hebron and Bozrah, and was the last place at which a stock of water could be obtained for the journey across the desert; while, as it stood on the confines of the richer and more civilized country, it formed an important station for all the incursions of the wild tribes of the desert. From Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 285-247) it received the name of Philadelphia (Jerome, on Ezra xxv, 1), and under this name it is often mentioned by Greek and Roman writers (Pliny, Hist. Nat. v, 16, Philostr. Epiphanus, in Ritter, p. 118, 119), B.C. 218. David. It was taken from the then Ptolemy (Philopator) by Antiochus the Great, after a long and obstinate resistance from the besieged in the citadel. A communication with the spring in the lower town had been made since (possibly in consequence of) David's siege, by a long secret subterranean passage, and had not this been discovered to Antiochus by a prisoner, the citadel might have been enabled to hold out (Polybius, v, 17). During the struggle between Antiochus the Pious (Sidetes) and Ptolemy, the son-in-law of Simon Maccabaeus (B.C. cir. 184), it is mentioned as being governed by a tyrant named Cotylas (Ant. xiii, 8, 1). Its ancient name, though under a cloud, was still used; it is mentioned by Polybius (v, 71) under the hardly altered form of Rabbatammon (Podonerou). About B.C. 50 we hear of it as in the hands of Aretas (one of the Arab chieftains of that name), who retired thither from Judea when menaced by Scaurus, Pompey's general (Josephus, War, i, 6, 5). The Arabs probably held it till the year B.C. 50, when they were attacked there by Herod the Great. But the account of Josephus (War, i, 10, 5, 6) seems to imply that the city was not then inhabited, and that although the citadel formed the main point of the combat, yet that it was only occupied on the instant. The water communication above alluded to also appears not to have been then in existence, for the people who occupied the citadel quickly surrendered from thirst, and the whole affair was over in six days.

At the Christian era Philadelphia formed the eastern limit of the region of Persea (Josephus, War, iii, 5, 3). It was one of the cities of the Decapolis, and as far down as the 4th century was esteemed one of the most remarkable and strongest cities of the whole of Coele-Syria (Eusebius, Onomast.; Ammianus Marc. in Ritter, p. 1157). Its magnificent theatre (said to be the largest in Syria), temples, odeon, mausoleum, and other public buildings were probably erected during the 2d and 3d centuries, like those of Jerash, which they resemble in style, though their scale and design are grander (Lindsay). Among the ruins of an "immense temple" on the citadel hill, Mr. Tipping saw some prostrate columns five feet in diameter. Its colonn is extant, some bearing the figure of Astarte, some the word Herakleion, implying a worship of Hercules, probably the continuation of that of Molech or Milkom. From Stephanus of Byzantium we learn that it was also called Astarte, doubtless from its containing a temple of that goddess. Justin Martyr, a native of Shechem, writing about A.D. 140, speaks of the city as containing a multitude of Ammonites ( Dial. with Trypho), though it would probably not be safe to interpret this too strictly.

Philadelphia became the seat of a Christian bishop, and was one of the nineteen sees of "Palestina tercia" which were subordinate to Bostra (Reland, Palest., p. 228). The church still remains in excellent preservation with its lofty steeples (lord Lindsay). Some of the bishops appear to have signed under the title of Bakatha; which Bakatha is by Epaphnius (himself a native of Palestine) mentioned in such a manner as to imply that it was but another name for Philadelphia, derived from an Arab tribe in whose possession it was at that time (A.D. cir. 400). But this is doubtful (see Reland, Palest., p. 1157).

When the Moslems conquered Syria, they found the city in ruins (Abulfeda in Ritter, p. 1158; and in note to lord Lindsay); and in ruins remarkable for its extent and desolation even for Syria, the "land of ruins," it still remains. The ancient name has been preserved among the natives of the country. Abulfeda calls it Ammon (Talb. Syr., p. 19), and by that name it is still known. The prophet Ezekiel foretold that Rabba should become a "stable for camels," and the country a "couching-place for flocks" (Ezek. xxx, 5). This has been literally fulfilled, and Borchardt, in his Notes of Syria, tells that a party of Arabs had stabled their camels among the ruins of Rabba. Too much stress has, however, been laid upon this minute point by Dr. Keith and others (Evidence from Prophecy, p. 150). What the prophet meant to say was that Ammon and its chief city should be desolate; and he expressed it by reference to facts which would certainly occur in any forsaken site in the borders of Arabia; and which are now constantly occurring not in Rabba only, but in many other places. Rabba lies about twenty-two miles from the Jordan at the eastern extremity of which Hebron and es-Salt form respectively the southern and northern points. It is about fourteen miles from the former and twelve from the latter. Jerash is due north, more than twenty miles distant in a straight line, and thirty-five by the usual road (Lindsay, p. 278). It lies in a valley which is a branch, or perhaps the main course, of the Yarmuk, usually identified with the Jabbok. The Moab Ammon, or water of Ammon, a mere streamlet, rises within the basin which contains the ruins of the town. The main valley is a winter torrent, but appears to be perennial, and contains a quantity of fish, by one observer said to abound (see Borchardt, p. 588; G. Robinson, ii, 174; a perfect fish-pond," Tipping). The stream runs from west to east, and near the point of its confluence with the Jordan is the citadel on its isolated hill. The public build-fragments are said to be Roman, in general character like those at Jerash, except the citadel, which is described as of large square stones put together without cement, and which is probably more ancient than the rest. Among the ruins are chiefly noticeable a spacious church, built with large stones, and having a steeple; a temple, with part of the side walls and a niche in the back wall remaining; a curved wall along the water-side, with many niches, and in front of it a row of large columns, four of which remain, though without capitals; a high-arched bridge over the river, still perfect, apparently the only one that had existed. The citadel on the hill, a structure of immense strength, and the theatre have been referred to above. The remains of private houses scattered on both sides of the stream are very extensive. They have been visited, and described in more or less detail, by Burchhardt (Syria, p. 357-380), Seetzen (Reisen, i, 186; iv, 212-214), Irby (June 14), Buckingham (E. Syria, p. 68-82), lord Lindsay (5th ed. p. 278-284), G. Robinson (ii, 172-178), lord Claud Hamilton (in Keith, Edin. of Prov, ch. vi), De Saulcy (Dead Sea, i, 387 sq.), Tristram (Land of Israel, p. 544 sq.), Porter (Handb. for Pal., p. 392), Budeker (Palastina, p. 319), and the Rev. A. E. North-ern, in the Quart. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," April, 1872, p. 57 sq., where a plan is given.

2. (7277, with the definite article; Sept. Ζωνιαίδα v. r. 'Aposiaiá; Vulg. Ardeba) a city of Judah, named, with Kirjath-jearim, in Josh. xv, 60 only. It lay among the group of towns situated to the west of Jerusalem, on the northern border of the tribe of Judah (Keil, Comment, ad loc.). It is probably only an epitaph for Jerusalem itself, which otherwise would not appear in the list. See JUDAH ( Tribe of ).

3. In one passage (Josh. xi, 8) Zidon is mentioned with the affix Rabbath—Zidon-rabbath. This is preserved in the margin of the A. V., though in the text it is translated "great Zidon."

4. Although there is no trace of the fact in the Bible, there can be little doubt that the name of Rabbath was also attached in Biblical times to the chief city of Moab. Its Biblical name is "Ar," but we have the testimony of Eusebius (Onomast. a. v. Moab) that in the 4th century it possessed the special title of Rabbath-Moab, or, as it appears in the corrupted orthography of Stephanus of Byzantium, the colon, and the Ecclesiastical Lists, Rabbathmohr, Rabbothmoum, and Ratha or Robba Mochita (Roland, Palaut., p. 226, 957; Seetzen, Reisen, iv, 227; Ritter, p. 1229). This name was for a time displaced by Areopolis, in the same manner that Rabbath-Ammon had been by Philadelphia: these, however, were but the names imposed by the temporary masters of the country, and employed by them in their official documents; and when they passed away, the original names, which had never lost their place in the mouths of the common people, reappeared, and Rabbath, like Amman, still remains to testify to the ancient appellation. Rabbath lies on the highlands at the south-east quarter of the Dead Sea, between Kerak and Jibbel Shihin. Its ruins, which are unimportant, are described by Burchhardt (July 15), Seetzen (Reisen, i, 411), De Saulcy (Jan. 18), and Porter (Handb. for Pal., p. 297 sq.). See AR.

Rabbath of the Children of Ammon, and of the Ammonites. (The former is the more accurate, the Hebrew being in both cases יְרָבָת. יְרָבָת. Sept. יָרָבָת אֲרוֹם יְרָבָת אֲרוֹם; Vulg. Rabbath filiorum Ammon.) This is the full appellation of the place commonly given as RABBATH (q. v.). It occurs only in Deut. iii, 11 and Ezek. xxii, 20. The th is merely the Hebrew "construct state," or mode of connecting a word ending in ah with one following it. Comp. GIMATH; KIRJATH; RAMATH, etc.

Rabbenu Gershom, or, more properly, Rabbi Gershon bens-Jeshua, the reputed founder of the Franco-German Rabbinical school, in which the studies of that of Babylonia were earnestly revived, was born about 960, and died in 1028. He was called "The Ancient," "The Light of the Exile," and was the founder of monogamy and other "institutions" among the Jews, which were for a long time disputed and rejected, and himself was placed under ban for attempting to abrogate the Mosaic precept respecting the marriage of a man with the childless wife of his deceased brother. Gershom also wrote a commentary on the Talmud, and some hymns and penitential prayers, which are extant in the Mezuzah. For reasons unknown he went to Mayence, where he founded a college, which soon attracted the youth of Germany and Italy. See Furst, Bib. Jud. i, 328; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. trans.), p. 114; Grätz, Gesch. der Juden (Leips. 1871), v, 364 sq.; Braunschweiger, Gesch. der Juden in den romanischen Staaten, p. 82 sq.; Jost, Gesch. d. Rabbi ('Pa'ysi, 'Pa'ysi'), a title of honor given by the Jews to their learned men, authorized teachers of the law, and spiritual heads of the community, and which in the New Test. is frequently given to Christ. In the following article we combine the Biblical and Talmudical statements on the subject, with additions from later sources.

I. Different Forms, and the Signification of the Title.

—The term 'Pa'ysi, Rabbi, is a form of the noun 'Pa'ysi, Rab (from 'Pa'ysi, to multiply, to become great, distinguished), which in the Biblical Hebrew denotes a great man; one distinguished either for age, position, office, or skill (Job xxxii, 9; Dan. i, 3; Prov. xxvi, 10); but in the canonical books it does not occur with this suffix. It is in post-Biblical Hebrew this term is usually used as a title, indicating sundry degrees by its several terminations for those who are distinguished for learning, who are the authoritative teachers of the law, and who are the appointed spiritual heads of the Jewish community. Thus, for instance, the simple term 'Pa'ysi, Rab, without any termination, and with or without the name of the person following it, corresponds to our expression teacher, master, i.e., rashi, and is the lowest degree; with the pronominal suffix first person singular—viz. "Pa'yi, Rabbi", 'Pa'ysi, my Rabbi (Matt. xxiii, 7, 8; xxvi, 25, 49; Mark ix, 5; xi, 21; xiv, 45; John i, 38, 49; iii, 2, 26; iv, 31; vi, 23; ix, 2; vi, 8)—it is a higher degree; and with the pronominal suffix first person plural—viz. "Rabbi, our teacher, our master" in the Chaldee form—it is the highest degree, and was given to the patriarchs ('Pa'ysi, or 'Pa'ysi) or the presidents of the Sanhedrin. Gamaliel I, who was patriarch in Palestine A.D. 30-50, was the first that obtained this extraordinary title, and not Simon ben-Hillel, as is erroneously affirmed by Lightfoot (Harmony of the Four Evangelists, John i, 38). This is evident from the following statement in the Aruch of K. Nathan (s. v. 'Pa'ysi): "We do not find that the title Rabbi began before the patriarchs rabbin Gamaliel I, rabbin Simon his son (who perished in the destruction of the second Temple), and rabbin Johanan ben-Zakkai, the last of whom were present." Lightfoot's mistake is all the more strange since he himself quotes this passage elsewhere (comp. Hebrew and Talmudical Exercitations, Matt. xxiii, 7). 'Pa'ysi, however, which, as we have said, is the noun 'Pa'ysi, with the Chaldee pronominal suffix first person plural, is also used in Aramaic as a noun absolute, the plural of which is 'Pa'ysi and 'Pa'ysi (comp. Chaldee paraphrase on Psa. xxxi, 11; Ruth ii, 2); pronominal suffix second person singular 'Pa'ysi (Song of Songs vi, 4); pronominal suffix third person plural 'Pa'ysi and 'Pa'ysi (Psa. xxxii, xi, 12). Accordingly 'Pa'ysi, in Mark x, 51, which in John xx, 16 is spelled "Pa'ysi, is the equivalent of "Pa'ysi, Rabbi, my master, giving the Syriac pronunciation to the Kameset under which the title is interpreted by the evangelists (Tob. i, 29, 30; 6, 16; Matt. xxiii, 8).

II. Origin and Date of these Titles.—Nathan ben-Jechei (q. v.) tells us, in his celebrated lexicon denominated Aruch (s. v. "Pa'ysi", which was finished A.D. 1001, that Mar Rab Jacob asked Sherira Gaon, and his son Hai, the co-Gaon (A.D. 990), for an explanation of the origin and import of these different titles, and that these spiritual heads of the Jewish community in Babylon replied as follows: "The title Rabbi ('Pa'ysi) is Babylonian, and the title Rabbi ('Pa'ysi) is Palestinian." This is evident from the fact that some of the Tannaim and Amo-raim are simply called by their names without any title—e.g. Simon the Just, Antigonus of Sobo, Jose ben-Johanan, Rab, Samuel, Abaye, and Rabbi; some of them bear the title Rabbi ('Pa'ysi)—e.g. rabbi Akiba, rabbi Jose, rabbi Simon, etc.; some of them have the title Mar ('Pa'ysi)—e.g. mar Ubka, mar Januka, etc.; some of the title Rab ('Pa'ysi)—e.g. rab Hana, rab Jehudah, etc.; while some of them have the title Rabbi ('Pa'ysi)—e.g. rab Gamaliel, rabbin Johanan ben-Zakkai, etc. The title Rabbi ('Pa'ysi) is that of the Palestinian sages, who received there of the Sanhedrim the laying-on of the hands, in accordance with the laying-on of the hands as transmitted in unbroken succession by the elders ('Pa'ysi), and were denominated Rabbi, and received authority to judge penal cases; while Rab ('Pa'ysi) is the title of the Babylonian sages, who received the laying-on of hands in their colleges. The more ancient generations, however, who were far superior, had no such titles as Rabbi ('Pa'ysi), Rabbi ('Pa'ysi), or Rab ('Pa'ysi), either for the Babylonian or Palestinian sages, as is evident from the fact that Hillel I, who came from Babylon, had not the title Rabbi ('Pa'ysi) attached to his name: and that of the prophets, who were very eminent, it is simply and simply 'Pa'ysi, and on the whole, the name up from Babylon, etc., without the title Rabbi being affixed to their names. Indeed, we do not find that this title is of an earlier date than the patriarchate. It began with rabbin Gamaliel the elder (A.D. 30), rabbin Simon, his son (who perished in the destruction of the second Temple), and rabbin Johanan ben-Zakkai, all of whom were patriarchs or presidents of the Sanhedrin ('Pa'ysi, or 'Pa'ysi). The title Rabbi ('Pa'ysi), too, comes into vogue among those who received the laying-on of hands at this period—as, for instance, rabbi Zaddok, rabbi Eliezer ben-Jacob, etc., and dates from the disciples of rabbin Johanan ben-Zakkai downwards. Now the order of these titles is as follows: Rabbi is greater than Rab; Rab, again, is greater than Rabbi; while the simple name is greater than Rabbin. No one is called Rabbin except the presidents." From this declaration of Sherira Gaon and Hai, that the title Rabbi obtained among the disciples of Johanan ben-Zakkai, the erudite Gritz concludes that "we must regard the title Rabbi, which in the Gospel, with the exception of that by Luke, is given to John the Baptist and to Jesus, as an anachronism. We must also regard as an anachronism the tradition put into the mouth of Jesus against the ambition of the Jewish doctors who become by this title, and the admonition to his disfiples not to suffer themselves to be styled Rabbi — kai filoian (οἱ γραμματίζοις) ... καὶ λεγομένοι κατά τοὺς ἱεροσόλυμας ἑταῖροι. Γαίρεις ἐν μὴ ἐλαχιστοτερεῖ ἑαυτόν (Matt. xxiii, 7, 8). This, moreover, shows that when the Gospel were written down the title Rabbi stood in so high a repute that the fathers could not but transfer it to Christ ("Geschichte der Juden" [Berlin, 1855] iv, 500). But even supposing that the title Rabbi came into vogue in the days of Johanan ben-Zakkai, this would by no means warrant Gritz's conclusion, inasmuch as Johanan lived upwards of a hundred years, and survived four presidents—viz. Hillel I (R.C. 30-10), Simon I (A.D. 10-30), Gamaliel I (A.D. 30-50), and Simon II (A.D. 50-70), and it might therefore have obtained in the early days of the Sanhedrin, which would be shortly after the birth of Christ. The Tosaphoth at the end of Edgylah, however, quoted in the Aruch in the same article, gives a different account of the origin of this title, which is as follows: "He who has disciples and has disciples again, his disciple is called Rabbi; when his disciples are forgotten (i.e. if he is so old that his immediate disciples already belong to the past age), he is called Rabbin; and when the disci- ples of his disciples are also forgotten, he is simply called by his own name." This makes the titles coeval with the origin of the different schools, and at the same time accounts for the absence of them among the earliest doctors of the law.

Some account of the rabbins and the Mishnaical and Talmudical writings may be found in Pridaux's (Con- nection, pt. i, bk. 5, under the year B.C. 446; pt. ii, bk. 8, under the year B.C. 37); and a sketch of the history of the school of Rabbinical learning at Tiberias, founded by rabbi Judah Hai-kadosh, the compiler of the Mishna in the 2d century after Christ, is given by Robinson (Biblical Researches, ii, 391). Rabbino Bibles, also called Mikraoth Gedolah (םיקרות גדולות), or Great Bibles, is the name given to the following Hebrew Bibles, which, besides the original text, also contain the commentaries of sundry Jewish rabbins.

1. הַרְבֵּינוּתָהּ הָשָׁているָהּ וְשָׁטִים הָאָנָפִים לָמֶלֶת יְדֵי תָּלְמִידִים וּלְדוּתִים וְקָרָאתִים וּלְרַבְּרַבִּים. This is the first Rabbinic Bible published by Bomberg, and carried through the press by Felix Pratensis (q. v.) (Venice, 1516-17) (724 = 278). It consists of four parts, with a separate title-page to each, and with the following commentaries:

a. The Pentateuch, with the Caldean paraphrase of Onkelos (q. v.) and the commentaries of Rashi (q. v.).

b. The Prophets, with the Chaldee paraphrase of Jonathan ben-Uziel (q. v.) and the commentaries of Rashi (q. v.).

c. The Haftorahs, viz., the Psalms, with the Targum of Joseph ben-Chaja (q. v.) and D. Kimchi's (q. v.) commentary: Proverbs, with Joseph's Targum and David Huc- Jachja's (q. v.) commentary; Job, with Joseph's Targum and the commentaries of Nachmanides (q. v.) and Farris-... could not be got into the margin of the text in alphabetical order. Jacob ben-Chajim’s directions: 2; the various readings of Ben-Asher and Ben-Naphtali, and the Eastern and Western cod. 3; and, 4, a treatise upon the points and the various readings. The first edition must still thank the printer and the editor of this work, and Richard Simon, in his Histoire Critique de 1. P. 518, certainly does great injustice when he says: “Bien qu’il pretende que son edition est plus exacte que les autres, les Juifs cependant ne l’existent pas beaucoup, à cause des fautes qui s’y rencontrent.” 5. Concerning the revision and the translation of the Massorot, seeinfra. 6. Le Longchamps, Bible, ii. 363 sq.; Le Longchamps, Bible, i. 350 sq.; Rosenmuller, Handbuch der bibl. Literatur, i. 249 sq.; Steinschneider, Catalogus Librorum Heb., in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, col. 6 sq.; Ginsburg, in Kuts. 7. See FRANKFURTER.

2. A revised and improved edition of the second Bombergian Bible was published at Venice in 1546-48, under the supervision of Cornelius Adelkind. The changes made in this edition consist in omitting Aben-Ezra’s commentary on Isaiah and the Minor Prophets, while Jacob ben-Asher’s (q.v.) commentary on the Pentateuch and Isaiah in Trani’s (q.v.) commentary on Judges and Samuel are inserted. 3. Bomberg’s fourth Rabbinic Bible, by Joan de Gori, was carried through the press and corrected by Isaac ben-Joseph Halevi and Isaac ben-Gershom Treves (Venice, 1568, 4 vols. fol.). The correctors remark at the end that they have not revised in this edition the portion of the Masorah which was omitted in the edition of 1546-48. Appended is the so-called Jerusalem Targum on the Pentateuch. Wolf (Biblia Sacra Hebr. ii. 574 sq.) elsewhere states that this Targum was printed in Venice in 1585, codicim Hebr. Bibl. Bodleian, 537. It is not a Targum, but a commentary on the Hebrew text, and the references to the Targum in the text are incorrect. 4. Bomberg’s fifth Rabbinic Bible, published at Venice in 1617-19 (4 vols. fol.) by Pietro and Lorenzo Bragadin, and edited by the celebrated Leon di Modena (q.v.), and Abraham Chabr-Tob ben-Solomon Chajim Sopher. It contains the whole matter of the foregoing edition, and is preceded by a preface written by Leon di Modena. This edition, however, is of less value to the critical student, is printed by the Institute, under whose authority it was published, and consequently the censorship it was published, as may be seen from the remark of the censor at the end: “Visto per me, Fr. Rettato da Mod. a 1626.”

5. As a rule, the Hebrew text is printed in the middle of the page, and the comments of Rashi, and the Targum, and the Misnagdim, and the Rabbis, are printed in the margin. The text is divided into lines, and each line has a number, and the numbers are arranged in order, and the numbers are used in the margin. The text is divided into paragraphs, and each paragraph has a number, and the numbers are used in the margin. The text is divided into sections, and each section has a number, and the numbers are used in the margin. The text is divided into chapters, and each chapter has a number, and the numbers are used in the margin. The text is divided into verses, and each verse has a number, and the numbers are used in the margin. The text is divided into sentences, and each sentence has a number, and the numbers are used in the margin. The text is divided into words, and each word has a number, and the numbers are used in the margin. The text is divided into letters, and each letter has a number, and the numbers are used in the margin.

Great Maschit, the variations of the Eastern and Western Recensions (so-called), and the treatise on the acccents.
Each of the assistants in the work is celebrated in Hebrew

According to Wolff, this edition of the Rabbinical Bible is the most copious and the best. Some interpolations from MSS. have been introduced, in some instances entirely, in others by way of commentaries. Verses 37 and 38 of Josh. 32, have been rejected, and this is marked in the margin, which states that they exist in some MSS., but not in the manuscripts designed for the use of Christians. Tychendorf has remarked that the Chaldee of Oukelos and Jerusalem on the Pentatuch, the Chaldee on the prophets and Hagiographa, and the second Tarquam on Esther. Of commentaries, it contains that of Rashi on the whole Bible; Aaron on the Pentateuch; J. H. Abkach on the prophets and Hagiographa; D. Kimchi on the later prophets; Rablai on Joshua, Kings, Proverbs, and Job; Is. di Trani on Judges and Samuel; S. Oceda (q. v.) on Ruth and Lamentations; Eliezer ben-Elia Harohe on Esther; Sadasso on Daniel. It also contains the Masorah Magna and Parva, as a text-parallel and accent, and the various readings between Ascher and Naphtali, and the introduction of Jacob ben-Chajim. This edition is recomended by the greatest Jewish authorities in Poland, as Meisels, of Warsaw; Muscat, of Prague;

Rabbinical Dialect. By this term we understand that form of the Hebrew language in which the principal Scripture commentators among the rabbis wrote, as Kimchi, Aben-Ezra, Abrahabal, Rashi, together with the Mishna, the Jewish Prayer-books, etc. Books in this dialect are generally printed in a round character, resembling the ordinary square Hebrew letters; but the power, value, and pronunciation of the letters are precisely the same as in Biblical Hebrew. The Rabbinical characters are given below. Although substantially Hebrew, yet this dialect has so many peculiarities as to require a separate study.
The principal work on the subject is by Eliezer ben-Shah Leija (1840, 3 vol.). A classic Hebrew of the Holy Scriptures would be unable to read the first two lines in the Talmud without an especial indoctrination in its grammatical forms, aside from the difficulty of explaining words derived from the Greek, Latin, or Parva, as the like. The orthography, too, of this dialect has, to the reader of pure Hebrew, often an uncouth, and at first sight unintelligible, appearance. This is caused by the habit of inserting the letters נ, כ, כ כ instead of using the corresponding vowel-points, and thus נ stands for כ, כ for נ, י for י, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ל, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ל for ل, א for א, ד for ד, ה for ה, ل for ل, א for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, ل for ل, أ for أ, د for د, ه for ه, L

RABBINISM is the development of Judaism which, after the return from Babylon, but more especially after the ruin of the Temple and the extinction of the public worship, became a new bond of national union, and the great distinctive feature in the character of modern Judaism. After the captivity, in the Babylonian captivity, the Mosaic constitution could be but partially re-established. The whole structure was too much shattered, and its fragments too widely dispersed, to reunite in their ancient and regular form. The Levites who had returned from the captivity, it is true, were the officiating priesthood, and no more. They were bound to be acquainted with the forms and usages of the sacrificial ritual; but the instruction of the people and the interpretation of the law by no means fell necessarily within the bounds of the Levites. From the captivity the Jews brought with them a reverential, or, rather, a passionate, attachment to the Mosaic law; and this it seems to have been the prudent policy of their leaders, Ezra and Nehemiah, to encourage by all possible means as the great bond of social union, and the unifying principle of separation from the world. By degrees, attachment to the law sank deeper and deeper into the national character: it was not merely at once their Bible and their statute-book; it entered into the most minute detail of common life. But no written law can provide for all possible exigencies. Whether general and comprehensive, or minute and multifarious, it equally requires the expositor to adapt it to the immediate case which may occur, either before the public tribunal or that of the private conscience. Hence the law became a deep and intricate study. Certain men rose to acknowledged eminence for their ingenuity in explaining, their readiness in applying, their faculty in quoting, and their clearness in offering solutions of the difficult passages of the written statutes. Learning of the law became the great distinction to which all alike paid reverential homage.

The first stage of development appears in the work of the so-called Sopherin, the last of whom was Simon the Just (q. v.); and their work will be more fully described in the art. Scriptura. The Sopherin were followed by another class of men, known as the Tanaim, or teachers of the law (v. v. t. q. l. a. k. a. n. t. n.), comprising a period from B.C. 200 to A.D. 220. While we reserve a description of their work for the art. Scriptura, we will only mention that from this school proceeded the oldest Midrashim, as Mechina, Siphra, and Siphri [see Midrashim], and the Mishna (q. v.). The most distinguished rabbins of the Tanaim (who are in part given already, or will be given, in this Cyclopaedia) were: 1. Antonius of Soho (b. C. 200-170), whose famous maxim—

"Be not like servants who serve their master for the sake of receiving wages, but be like servants who serve their master without expecting to receive wages; and let the fear of the Lord be upon you" (Abot, i. 3)—a maxim preserved by Josephus in his Jesus Christ: Anticens, Ais Times, etc. (as) [a noble and almost evangelical one.] truly a most beautiful maxim, and one denoting a legitimate reaction from the legal formalism which was in process of development—"is said to have given rise to Judaism; and to his companion, Jose ben-Jochanan, of Jerusalem; 3. Jo- chanan, the high-priest (commonly called John Hyrcanus, q. v.); 4. Jehoshua ben-Pe-rachi, the reputed teacher of Christ, and his colleague, Nathai of Arbela (q. v.); 5. Johanan ben-Tal-Et (or Tal El); 6. Shemaja (q. v. and Abtalian); 7. Hillel I (q. v.); 8. Simon ben-Hillel (q. v.); 9. Gamaliel I (q. v.); 10. Simon II ben-Gamaliel (q. v.); 11. Joshuah ben-Sacaliah (q. v.); 12. Gamaliel II, of Jabne (q. v.); 13. Simon II ben-Ga- mali (q. v.); 14. Joshua ben-Nathan, the so-called Jose (q. v.); 15. Jehudah I the Holy (q. v.); and, 15. Gamaliel III.

The Tanaim were followed by the Amoraim, or later doctors of the law; and the fruits of their work are laid down in the Talmud (q. v.), the compilation of which (about A.D. 500) terminated the period of the Amoraim, to be opened by that of the Saboraim, or the teachers of the law after the conclusion of the Talmud. To this period (A.D. 500-657), perhaps, belongs the collection, or final redaction, of some of the lesser Talmudic treatises (q. v.).

The Talmud became the so-called Gemara, or the last doctors of the law in the chain of Rabbinic succession, comprising a period from A.D. 657 to 1040. The work of these different schools, together with the biographies of the most distinguished men, will be treated more fully in the art. Scandal.

On the dissolution of the Babylonian schools, Spain, Portugal, and Southern France became the centre of Rabbinism. As early as about A.D. 1000 the Talmud is said to have been translated into Arabic. In Spain, the most flourishing school was that of Cordova, founded by Moses ben-Chanoq (q. v.). Besides Cordova, Rabbinism flourished in Granada, then in Lucena, the most famous representative of which was Isaac ben Jacob Alfasi (q. v.). To the 11th and 12th centuries belong especially Jehudah ha-Levi ben-Samuel (q. v.), Aben-Exra (q. v.), the Kitchens (q. v.), and Solomon Parchon (q. v.). In France flourished Gericho ben-Jehudah, or Rabbenu Gericho (q. v.), and Rashi (q. v.). But the most distinguished of all was Moses Maimo- nides (q. v.), of Cordova, whose philosophical treatment of tradition divided Judaism, after his death, into two hostile parties; and the Spanish and French schools were divided for some time. When, in 1305, Asher ben-Jechiel, of Germany, came into Spain, he succeeded in bringing the French school, which was hostile to the philosophy of Maimonides, back to the path described by him. But there was another kind of philosophy—if it deserve that name at all—which was especially cultivated in these times—the so-called Cabala, as it especially appears in the Sopher (q. v.). As the foremost representatives of this branch of literature, we may mention Meir ibn-Gabbai (q. v.), Joseph Karo (q. v.), Salomo al Kabez, Moses Cordovero (q. v.), Isaac Loris (q. v.), Moses Galante (q. v.), Samuel Laniado (q. v.), Jacob Zemach, and Hajim Vidal. The invention of the art of printing produced a new activity in the Church as well as in the Synagogues, the first printed edition of the Talmud, in 1520, at Venice; the edition of the second Bomberg Rabbinic Bible, by Jacob ben-Chajim, in 1526; and the writings of Elias Levita (q. v.), are the first Jewish fruits of the art. Rabbinism was again revived in the schools of Bredy, Lemberg, Lublin, Cracow, Prague, Firth, Frankfort, Venus, and Amsterdam. The pious spirit which, in former ages, was represented in the Spanish and French schools was revived in the Protes- tant sects. Solomon Mendessohn (q. v.), and his friends—as Hartwig Wessely, David Friedlander, and others—opened a new ep- och, and endeavored to enlighten their coreligionists; but the chasm was not healed. On the contrary, a final division was produced; and Reformed and Orthodo Judaism are the two antipodes of the present day. As a religious system, "Rabbinism," says the late Dr.

McCaul, "has fared like all other religious systems: it has had prejudiced assailants to attack, and over-zelous admirers to defend it. The former have produced whatever they could find objectionable; the latter have carried it further to its disadvantage. The truth is, that it is a mixed system of good and bad. Founded on the inspired writings of Moses and the prophets, it necessarily contains much truth and wisdom; but, expounded and enlarged by prejudiced men, it presents a strange mixture of materials." See "Rabbinism" in Herzog's Real-Encyk.; the same art. in Theol. Universe-Leckion; Wsren der Rabbinismus, in Just, Gesch. d. Judenthum, u. s. Secten, i, 257 sq.; McCaul, Sketches of Judaism and the Jews Rabbith (Heb. רַבְבִּית, Rabbith) [always with the art.], medite.; Sept. Ἐράββις y r. Ἰάπωτος, a city in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. xix. 20).—Schwarz (Pleist, p. 166) found a village, Arubuni, three English miles west of Beth-shan, which he is disposed to identify with the Rebbah of Jeroboam, and the Rabbith of Joshua. But this is beyond the bounds of Issachar.

Possibly the locality in question is in the north-east part of the tribe, possibly at the ruins Avith (Avathr). (2 Sam 9.)

Rabbiling, a term employed to denote the summary ejcction, on Christmas-day, 1668, of Episcopalian clergymen and their families by the Scottish populace, after the Revolution. The incumbents were turned out of their houses, and often into the snow; the church doors were locked, and the key was taken away. These measures were certainly harsh and uncalled for; but the people had been exasperated, especially in the west country, by twenty-five years of bloodshed and persecution. Though they were "rule, even to brutality," yet, as lord Macaulay says, "they do not appear to have been guilty of any intentional injury to life or limb." The better part of the people put a stop to the riotous proceedings on the part principally of the Cameronians; but a form of notice, or a threatening letter, was sent to every curate in the Western Lowlands.

RABBING: ACT, a law passed by the Scottish Parliament, in 1698, to prevent disturbance and riots at the settlement of ministers. The Episcopalians in the North rabbled the Presbyterians, especially on the day of an ordination; for they did not like to see their incumbents supplanted. So violent were these measures that the legislature had to interfere to arrest them. See REVOLUTION SETTLEMENT.

Rabbo'nî (Pa'ﾗ�英勇, or Pa' ///英勇, for Chaldaic 곶, my master), the title of highest honor applied by the Jews to the teachers of the law. See Rabb. In Mark x, 51 (where it is translated "Lord"), and John xx. 16, it is applied to Christ; but, as it seems to us, rather in its literal acceptation than with reference to the conventional distinction which it implies (it is a distinction then existed) in the Jewish schools. There were but seven great professors, all of the school of Hillel, to whom the title was publicly given. There is some difference as to their names, and even in the Talmud varies in its statements. But the only one there whose name occurs in Scripture is Gamaliel, unless, indeed, as some suppose, the aged Simeon, who blessed the infant Saviour (Luke ii. 25), was the same as the Rabban Simeon of the Talmud. See SIMON.

Rab'mag (Heb. רַבִּמָג, Rab-mag, chief magelion: Sept. Ρᾶβμαγ or Ρᾶβμαγις, a word found only in Jer. xxxvii. 3, as a title borne by a certain Nergalsharerzer who is mentioned among the "princes" that accompanied Nebuchadnezzar to the last siege of Jerusalem. Nergal-sharerzer is probably identical with the king, called by the Greeks Nergilissar, who ascended the throne of Babylon two years after the death of Nebuchadnezzar. See NERGAL-SHAREZER. This king, as well as certain other important personages, is found commonly identified with the word "Magus" (Gesenius, ad voc. מָגַע; Calmet, Commentaire Littéral, vi. 203, et seq.; but this identification is somewhat uncertain, since an entirely different word—one which is read as Magaui—is used in that sense throughout the Behistun inscription (Oppert, Expédition Scientifique en Mésopotamie, ii. 209). Sir H. Rawlinson inclines to translate empas by "priest," but does not connect it with the Magi, who in the time of Nergilissar had no footing in Babylonia. He regards this rendering, however, as purely conjectural, and thinks we can only say at present that the office was one of great power and dignity at the Babylonian court; and probably a sacerdotal office in the same sense as the word is used in the rubric of the Ashurian liturgies.

Rab'saces (Pa' ///英勇, a Grecized form (Eccles. xlviii, 18) of the name Rab-shakeh (q. v.).

Rab-saris (Heb. רַבָּשָׂרִי, Rab-Saris), a name applied to two foreigners, but probably rather the designation of an office than of an individual, the word signifying chief eunuch; in Dan. i, 3, Ashpenaz is entitled the master of the eunuchs (Rab-sarisim). Lether translates the word sar, "the places where the king's body, his name, office, the arch-chamberlain (der Erzklämmerer, der oberste Kämmerer). Josephus (Ant. x, 8, 2) takes them as the A. V. does, as proper names. The chief officers of the court were present attending on the king; and the instance of the eunuch Names would show that it was not impossible for the Rab-saris to possess some of the qualities fitting him for a military command.

In 2 Kings xxy, 19, a eunuch (מָגַע, Stasis, in the text of the A. V. "officer," in the margin "eunuch") is spoken of as set over the men of war; and in the sculptures at Nineveh "eunuchs are represented as commanding in war, fighting both on chariots and on horseback, and receiving the prisoners and the heads of the slain after battle" (Layard, Nineveh, ii, 325). But whether his office was really that which the title imports, or some other great court office, has been questioned. The chief of the eunuchs is an officer of high honor and dignity in the Oriental courts; and his cares are not confined to the harem, but many high public functions devolve upon him. In the Ottoman Porte the Kišlar Ağa, or chief of the black eunuchs, is one of the principal personages in the empire, and in an official paper of great solemnity solemnly by the sultan the most illustrious of the officers who approach his august person, and worthy of the confidence of monarchs and of Sovereigns (D'Olasson, Tob. Gen. iii, 308). It is, therefore, by no means improbable that such an office should be associated with a military commission; perhaps not for directly military duties, but to take charge of the treasure, and to select from the female captives such as might seem worthy of the royal harem. See EUNUCH.

1. (Sept. Pa' ///英勇 v. r. Pa' ///英勇.) An officer of the king of Assyria sent up with Tarshish and Rab-shakeh against Jerusalem in the time of Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii, 17). B.C. 718.

2. (Sept. Nāṣīwāqīq v. r. Naḥbāqīq.) One of the princes of Nebuchadnezzar, who was present at the capture of Jerusalem, B.C. 588, when Zechariah, after endeavoring to escape, was taken and blinded and sent in chains to Babylon (Jer. xxxix, 3). Rab-saria is mentioned afterwards (ver. 18) among the other princes who at the command of the king were sent to deliver Jere-mom from the power of the Invested. It is not improbable that we have not only the title of this Rab-saria given, but his name also, either Sarsechim (ver. 8) or (ver. 13) Nebu-shakin (witness of Nebo, Isa. xiv, 1), in the same way as Nergal-shar-ezer is given in the same passages as at the time of the Rab-mag.

Rab-shakeh (Heb. Rab-shakeh, רַב-שַׁקָּה), Sept.-Pseudo-v. v. Pseudo-v. Petiebr, an Aramaic name, signifying chief cup-bearer, but applied to an Assyrian general (2 Kings xviii, 17, 19, 26, 28, 57; xix, 4, 8; Isa. xxvi, 2, 4, 12, 13, 22; xxvii, 4, 8). B.C. 718. Notwithstanding its seemingly official significance, it apppears to have been used as a proper name, as Butler with us; for the person who bore it was a military chief in high command under Sennacherib, king of Assyria. Yet it is not impossible, according to Oriental usages, that a royal cup-bearer should hold a military command; and the office itself was one of high distinction, in the same way as Rab-saria denotes the chief eunuch of Ahasuerus, possibly the chief priest. See Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, ii. 440. Luther, in his version, is not quite consistent, sometimes (2 Kings xxviii, 17; Isa. xxxvi, 2) giving Rab-shakeh as a proper name, but ordinarily translating it as a title of office—arch-cup-bearer (der Erzessizer). The word Rab may be found translated in many other English versions; for instance, 2 Kings xxv, 8, 20; Jer. xxxix, 11; Dan. ii, 14 ((אֶרֶב-שַׁקָּה), Rab-tabuschim, "captain of the guard"—in the margin, "chief marshall," "chief of the executioners;" Dan. i, 3, Rab-saraisim, "master of the eunuchs;" ii. 48 ((אֶרֶב-שַׁקָּה), Rab-sginim, "chief of the governors;" iv. 9; v. 11 (אֶרֶב-שַׁקָּה), Rab-khartum
"master of the magicians;" iii. 16, Rab-buchel, "ship-master."
It enters into the titles Rabbi, Rabboni, and the name Rabiah.
See Rabbi.

Rab-shakeh is the last named of three Assyrian generals sent against Jerusalem in the reign of Hezekiah.
Sennacherib, having taken other cities of Judah, was now besieging Lachish; and Hezekiah, terrified at his progress, and seeing, for a time, his firm faith in God, seemed to become reconciled to the conciliatory and tributute. This he strains himself to the utmost to pay, giving for the purpose not only all the treasures of the Temple and palace, but stripping off the gold plates with which he himself, in the beginning of his reign, had overlaid the doors and pillars of the house of the Lord (2 Kings xxvii, 16; 2 Chron. xxviii, 3; see Rawlinson, Buntmann Lectures, iv. 141; Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 145). But Sennacherib, not content with his—cupidity being excited rather than appeased—sends a great host against Jerusalem under Tartan, Rab-saria, and Rab-shakeh; not so much, apparently, with the object of at present engaging in the siege of the city as with the idea that, in its present disheartened state, the sight of an army, combined with the threats and specious promises of Rab-shakeh, might induce a surrender at once. In Isa. xxxvi, xxxvii, Rab-shack alone is mentioned, the reason of which would seem to be that he acted as ambassador and spokesmen, and came so much more prominently before the people than the others. Keil thinks that Tartan had the supreme command, inasmuch as in 2 Kings he is mentioned first, and, according to Isa. xxx, 1, conducted the siege of Ashdod. In 2 Chron. xxxii, where, with the addition of some not unimportant circumstances, there is given an abstract of these events, it is simply said that (ver. 9) "Sennacherib king of Assyria sent his ser-qui seraient obtenus par la soumission. Many have instanced the familiarity of Rab-shakeh with Hebrew, that he be other was a Jewish deserter or an apostate captive of Israel. Whether this be so or not, it is not impossible that the assertion which he makes on the part of his master, and that Sennacherib had even taken the council and command of the Lord Jehovah for his expedition against Jerusalem ("Am I now come up without the Lord to destroy it? The Lord said to me, Go up against this and to destroy it"); may have reference to the prophecies of Isaiah (viii, 7, 8; x. 6) concerning the destruction of Judah and Israel by the Assyrians, of which, in some form, more or less correct, he had received information. Being unable to obtain any promise of submission from Hezekiah, who, in the extremity of his peril returning to trust in the help of the Lord, is encouraged by the promises and predictions of Rab-shakeh goes back to the king of Assyria, who had now departed from Lachish. See HEBREWS.

Rabulas of Edessa, an Eastern prelate who flourish near the opening of the 6th century, was a student of Theodorus of Mopocastus, and, in 431, was prominently associated with the Anti-christian party in Ephesus. In the following year, however, Cyril of Alexandria succeeded in gaining Rabulas to his side:
and after this we hear of him as a devout orthodox.
He energetically opposed Nestorius, and greatly weaksened the Nestorians. He condemned the bishop of Edessa, and charged the bishops of Diodorus of Tarsus and of The-odorus of Mopocastus, banished and drove off the teachers from the school at Edessa who were reputed favorable to their doctrines, and thus became an unwilling instrument in the founding of the school at Nisibis by Barlaam, and in the spread of Nestorianism in the East. He died in 436. His successor at Edessa was Ibas (q.v.).
Under the name of Rabulas there is extant an old canonical collection of the Syrian Church, pieces of which are contained in the edition of the Nomocanon of Bar-Rabulas.

Rabassier (Rawl.), a French noun, was born Sept. 5, 1634, at Gannat. After having entered monastic life among the Cluniacins, he taught theology in the abbey of St. Martian at Avignon, and St. Martin des Champs at Paris. He was also made twice the general of his order (1698-1705, 1706-14). He died at Paris, Oct. 29, 1708, and wrote works of importance, of which he was the student of his order. See Niecor, Memoires, Raca (Ραξα), a term of reproach used by the Jews of our Saviour's age (Matt. v. 22). Critics are agreed that it is but the Greek form of the Chaldee term Nacc, "regal" (the terminal N being the definite article, used in a vocative sense), with the sense of "worthless," but they differ as to whether this form should be connected with the root פֶּנָא, conveying the notion of emptiness (Genes. Theocr., p. 1279), or with one of the cognate roots פֶּנָא (Tobulac) or פֶּנָא (Ewad), conveying the notion of thinned (Olahabans, De Wette, on Matt. r, 22). The first of these views is probably correct. We may compare the use of פֶּנָא, "rain," in Judg. ix. 4; xi. 3, &c, and of אֶבֶּר in James ii. 10. Jesus contrasting the law of Moses, which could only take notice of overt acts, with his own, which renders man liable for every form of transgression: he was in effect: "Whosoever is rashly angry with his brother is liable to the judgment of God; whoever calls his brother raca is liable to the judgment of the Sanhedrin; but whosoever calls him fool (παραφή) becomes liable to the judgment of Christ. Thus he inflicts the higher criminality here attached to the term fool, which may not at first seem very obvious, it is necessary to observe that while “race” denotes a certain looseness of life and manners, “fool” denotes a wicked and reprobat person; foolishness being in Scripture opposed to spiritual wisdom (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., ad loc.). See Fool.

Racchei is the name sometimes given by mistake to the Zucchi (q.v.).

Racett, Matteo, a noted Jesuit missionary of the 16th century, is closely identified with the Romanizing work of that era in the Chinese empire. The very year which marks the death of Xavier (1552), marks the occurrence of an event which opened China to the Europeans. A party of Jesuit missionaries, at whose head was Racett, in that year landed stealthily at Macao. These missionaries of Rome had determined to win over the Chinese to Christianity by stratagem. They had studied mathematics and natural science, with a view to astonish the natives by their exhibitions. Some objects, common enough in Europe, but unheard of in China, were prepared as presents for the mandarins and others. A clock that showed the rising and setting of the sun and moon; a prism that by the emission of its rainbow-rays was mistaken for a fragment of the celestial hemisphere, and maps which exhibited the world of barbarians, with China filling the east and Europe in the remote west, produced sensations of wonder such as he had never before stirred the placid spirit of the viceroy of Canton. Instead of driving them away from the country, as they feared, he actually detained the Jesuits to exhibit and explain their wonders; for only they had the secret of keeping that curious machine in action, and only they could manage the spectrometer, and expand the new system of geography. Literary men crowded the palace to see the Jesuits and to hear their wisdom, and the missionaries thus gained an influence which they knew well how to utilize. The popularity thus acquired by Racett, Ruggiero, and others was truly astonishing; and by virtue of an imperial edict, Racett took up his residence near the royal palace, and enjoyed the highest reputation for learning. He courted the literati; withheld from their knowledge such parts of the sacred history and doctrine as were likely to offend their prejudices or wound their pride; by his influence at court secured the protection of his brethren in the provinces; and by extreme sagacity surrounded himself with a considerable number of persons who might be variously described as pupils, partisans, converts, or novices. In a secret chapel he disposed of the favored symbols of his worship, yet, so shaped as not to be repugnant to their heathen notions, and intermingled with other symbols from the religion of Confucius. Racett died in 1610, and was honored with a solemn funeral. The remains of the foreigner never before had such a distinction. It is said that both mandarins and the people saluted with a mournful admiration the corpse of the Jesuit as it was taken to the grave by a company of Christians, with a splendid cross going before it; and that it was interred, by the order of the emperor, in a temple dedicated to the true God.

Racconeqian Catechism was a Polish Protestant compilation stating the different articles of the Slavic Reformers. It was published in 1560 at Racovia, a city in the Polish palatinate Sandomir, which owed its origin to the Reformer John Sieminsky, and by his son. The acceptance of the Slavic doctrines became the headquarters of this branch of the Polish Reformed Church. Racovia became the seat of a theological school. The general synods were held there, of which those of 1569 and 1663 are of historic importance, and the printing of the Socinians being done there, the catechism came to be known as the Racovian. It was prepared by Schmalz, Morzowski, and Volkel, and was based on the theological writings of F. Secinus. A Latin edition was published in 1609, dedicated to King James I of England; a German edition in 1608, dedicated to the Wittenberg University. In 1819 Rees made an English version of the Racovian Catechism. An abridgment was published in Polish and German in 1605, 1623; and in 1629 in Latin. See Krasiczyn, Hist. of the Ref. in Poland, ii, 370; Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. vol. iv; Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. vol. iii; Leignon, Diction. of Christ (see Index); Farrar, Critical Hist. of Free Thought, p. 391; Waterland, Works, vol. vii; Hallam, Introd. to Hist. of Lit., 554; ii, 335. (J. H. W.)

Race (prop. ῥάσα, Eccles. ix, 11; ῥασαμός, “course,” but in the A. V. the rendering, likewise, of ῥοδα, a path, and in the New Test. only of ῥασίαν and στρατιάς). Races were evidently known to the Hebrews (Eccles. ix, 11). In the New Test. there are allusions to the various gymnastic sports and games celebrated by the Greeks. So the term “race” is often used in comparisons drawn from the public races and applied to Christians, as expressing strenuous effort in the Christian life and cause; and we are exhorted to strive after the rewards of the Gospel as strenuously as the athletes did in the public games (1 Cor. ix, 24-27; Gal. ii, 2; v, 7; Phil. ii, 16; iii, 14; 2 Tim. ii, 5; iv, 6-8; Heb. xii, 1). Among the principal public games noticed by the historians are the Olympic, which were celebrated every fifth year, the Pythian, Nemian, and the Isthmian. These exercises principally consisted in trials of strength and skill—in running on foot, wrestling, leaping, throwing the dart and discus, also in the horse-race and chariot-race. See Gymnastics.

The stadium in which they took place was an oblong area terminated at one end by a straight line, at the other by a semicircle having the breadth of the stadium for its base. Around this area were ranges of seats rising above one another in steps. After the Roman conquest of Greece, the form of the stadium was often modified, so as to resemble the amphitheatre, by making both its ends semicircular, and by surrounding it with seats supported by vaulted masonry, as in the Roman amphitheatre. The Ephesian stadium still has such seats around a portion of it.

The most strict and laborious preparation was made for these agonistic contests, and the whole course of preparation, as well as the contest, was governed by strict and established rules. The athletes who contended for the prize were divested of clothing; every impediment was removed; the prize was placed on a tripod in the middle of the stadium, in the full view of the competitors; and the crown was placed upon the conqueror’s head the moment the issue was proclaimed by the judges. Those persons who designed to contend in these games were obliged to repair to the public gymnasium at Elis ten months before the solemnity, where they prepared themselves by continual exercises. No man who had omitted to present himself in this manner was allowed to contend for any of the prizes; nor were the accustomed rewards of victory given to such persons, if by any means they introduced themselves and overcame their antagonists. No person who was himself a notorious criminal, or nearly related to any such, was permitted to contend; and, further, if any person were convicted of bribing his adversary, a severe fine was laid upon him. Nor were these precautions alone thought a sufficient guard against evil and dishonorable contracts and unjust practices, but the contenders were obliged to swear that they had spent ten whole months in preparatory exercises; and both they and their fathers, or brethren, took a solemn oath that they would not, by any sinister or unlawful means, endeavor to stop the fair and just proceedings of the games (Potier, Greek Antiq.).

The races themselves were (1) the foot-race, (2) the horse-race, (3) the chariot-race, (4) the torch-race, either (a) on foot or (b) on horseback. Of all these the first was the simplest and the best test of personal capacity. Hence the exercise of running was in great esteem among the ancient Greeks, insomuch that those who prepared themselves for it thought it worth their while to use means to burn or parch their spleen, because it was believed to be a hindrance to them and to retard them in their course. Homer tells us that swiftness is one of the most excellent endowments a man can be blessed withal:

“No greater honor e’er has been attain’d Than what strong hands or nimble feet have gain’d.”

Indeed, all those exercises that conduced to fit men for war were more especially valued. Swiftness was looked upon as an excellent qualification in a warrior, both because it serves for a sudden assault and onset, and likewise for a nimble retreat; and therefore it is not to be wondered at that the constant character which Homer gives of Achilles is, that he was swift of foot; and in the Holy Scripture, David, in his poetical lamentation over those two great captains Saul and Jonathan, takes particular notice of this warlike quality of theirs: “They were swifter than eagles, stronger than lions” (2 Sam. i, 20). See AHIMAAS.

Such as obtained victories in any of these games, especially the Olympic, were universally honored—nay, almost adored. At their return home they rode in a triumphal chariot into the city, the walls being broken down to give them entrance; which was done (as Plutarch is of opinion) to signify that walls are of small use to a city that is inhabited by men of courage and ability to defend it. At Sparta they had an honorable post in the army, being stationed near the king’s person. At some towns they had presents made to them by their native city, were honored with the first place at shows and games, and ever after maintained at the public charge. Cicero reports that a victory in the Olympic games was not much less honorable than a triumph at Rome. Happy was that man esteemed who could but obtain a single victory; if any person merited repeated rewards, he was thought to have attained the utmost felicity of which human nature is capable; but if he came off conqueror in all the exercises, he was elevated above the condition of men, and his actions adorned wonderful victories. Nor did their honors terminate in themselves, but were extended to all about them; the city that gave them birth and education was esteemed more honorable and august; happy were their relations, and thrice happy their parents. It is a remarkable story which Plutarch relates of a Spartan who, meeting Diagoras, that had himself been crowned in the Olympic games, and seen his sons and grandchildren victors, embraced him and said, “Now die, Diagoras; for thou canst not be a god?" By the laws of Solon, a hundred drachms were allowed from the public treasury to every Athenian who obtained a prize in the Isthmian games, and five hundred drachms to such as were victors in the Olympic. Afterwards, the latter of these rewards maintained in the Prytaneum, or public hall of Athens. The rewards given in these games have been thus rendered into

"Greeks, in four games your martial youth were train'd, For heroes two, and for two gods ordain'd: Jove bade the olive round his victor wave; Phoenix in his an apple-garland gave; The pine Palœmon; nor with less renown, Archermus conferr'd the parsley crown."

(Anon. Med. Dial. 9.)

Compare with these fading vegetable crowns that immortal life which the Gospel offers as a prize to the victor, in order to understand the apostle's comparison (1 Cor. ix. 25; 1 Pet. v. 4). See CROWN.

Ra'chal (Heb. Rakal, רָכָל, trade; Sept. Ρακαλ v. r. 'Rakål), a town in the tribe of Judah, and apparently in the southern part: being one of those to which David sent presents out of the spoil of the Amalkeites (1 Sam. xxx, 20). The Vatican edition of the Sept. omits this name, but inserts five names in this passage between 'Eastemsa' and 'the Jerahmeelites.' The only one of these which has any similarity to Rachel is Carmel, which would suit very well as far as position goes; but it is impossible to consider the two as identical without further evidence. See DAVID.

Ra'chel (Heb. Rachel, רָכֶל, a "ewe" or "sheep," as in Gen. xxxi, 38; xxxii, 14; Cant. vi. 6; Isa. lli. 7; Sept. and New Test. Ρακηλ, Iosephus Ρακηλας), the younger daughter of the Aramean grazier Laban (Gen. xxix, 16), whom Jacob, her near blood-relation, earned for his wife, as wages for a second seven-years' service (ver. 18 sq.). B.C. 1290. See LEAH. After a long period of unfruitfulness, she bore him a son (xxx, 31), Joseph (xxx, 22 sq.). She went with him to Canaan, on which occasion she stole the household gods of her father and hid them artfully (xxx, 10, 84), and finally died on the journey, after the birth of Benjamin, not far from Ephrath (xxxv, 16 sq.). See RACHEL'S TOMB.

"The story of Jacob and Rachel has always had a peculiar interest: there is that in it which appeals to some of the deepest feelings of the human heart. The beauty of Rachel, the deep love with which she was loved by Jacob from their first meeting by the well of Haran, when he showed to her the simple courtesies of the desert life, and kissed her and told her he was Rebekah's son; the long servitude with which he patiently served for her, in which the seven years' seemed to him but a few days, for the love he had to her; their mar-

— and has preserved to this day a reverence for her tomb; the very infidel invaders of the Holy Land having respected the traditions of the site, and erected over the spot a small, rude shrine, which conceals whatever remains may have once been found of the pillar first set up by her mourning husband over her grave. Yet, from what is related to us concerning Rachel's character, there does not seem much to claim any high degree of admiration and esteem. The discernment and trenchant invective shown in her grief at being for some childish move, even her fond husband to anger (xxx, 1, 2). She appears, moreover, to have shared all the duplicity and falsehood of her family, of which we have such painful instances in Rebekah, in Laban, and, not least, in her sister Leah, who concerned herself so little in the deception practiced upon Jacob. See, for instance, Rachel's stealing her father's images, and the ready dexterity and presence of mind with which she concealed her theft (ch. xxxi): we seem to detect here an apt scholar in her father's school of untruth. From this incident we may also infer (though this is rather the misfortune of her position and circumstances) that she was not altogether free from the superstitions and idolatry which prevailed in the land whence Abraham had been called (Josh. xxiv, 2, 14), and which still to some degree infected even those families among whom the true God was known. The events which preceded the death of Rachel are of much interest and worthy of a brief consideration. The presence in his household of these idolatrous images, which Rachel, and probably others also, had brought from the East, seems to have been either unknown to or connived at by Jacob for some years after his return from Haran; till, on being reminded by the Lord of the vow which he had made at Bethel when he fled from the face of Esau, and being bidden by him to erect an altar there which he appeared to him, Jacob felt the glaring impiety of thus solemnly appearing before God with the taint of impiety cleaving to him or his, and 'said to his household and all that were with him, Put away the strange gods from among you' (Gen. xxxv, 2). After thus casting out the polluting thing from his house, Jacob journeyed to Bethel, where, amid the associations of a spot consecrated by the memories of the past, he received from God an emphatic promise and blessing, and, the name of the Supplanter being laid aside, he had given to him instead the holy name of Israel. Then it was, after his spirit had been there purified and strengthened by communion with God, by the assurance of the divine love and favor, by the consciousness of evil put away and duties performed—then it was, as he journeyed away from Bethel, that the chastening blow fell and Rachel died. These circumstances are alluded to here not so much for their bearing upon the spiritual discipline of Jacob, but rather with reference to Rachel herself, as suggesting the hope that they may have had their effect in bringing her to a higher sense of her relations to that Great Jehovah in whom was all her hope and in whose faults of character, so firmly believed." The character of Rachel cannot certainly be drawn from the few features given in the history; yet Niemeyer (Charak. ii, 315) thinks that sufficient ground exists for preferring the disposition of Leah to that of her sister.
Those who take an interest in such interpretations may find the whole story of Rachel and Leah, allegorized by St. Augustine (Contra Faustum Manichaeum, xxii, lib. viii, v. 492, ed. Migne) and Justin Martyr (Dialogue with Trypho, c. 134, p. 369; see also Archer, Rachel a Type of the Church [Lond. 1843]).

In Jer. xxxi, 15, 16, the prophet refers to the historical event of the exile of the ten tribes (represented by "Ephraim") under Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, and the sorrow occasioned by their dispersion (2 Kings xvii, 20), under the symbol of Rachel (q. v.), i.e. Rachel, the maternal ancestor of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, bewailing the fate of her children. This lamentation is here another symbol of the early history of our Lord, which met with its fulfillment in the mournful scene at Bethlehem and its vicinity, when so many infants were slaughtered under the barbarous edict of Herod (Matt. ii, 16-18).

Rachel's Tomb (רחל, Kbrath Hachel: Sept. in Gen. for the former half of the title pvepassv, but in Jer. lxxviii, 7, and 2 Kings v, 19, Xeb[pat]a). This seems to have been accepted as the name of the spot [Demetrius in Eus. Ev. Li, i. 21], and to have been actually considered there by a church in the 12th century [Burchard de Strasburg, by Saint-Genois, p. 35], who gives the Arabic name of Rachel's tomb as Cabrata, or Carbata. The present name is Kubet Rahel, i.e. "Rachel's grave". "Rachel died and was buried in the way to Ephrath, which is Bethlehem. And Jacob set a pillar upon her grave: that is the pillar of Rachel's grave unto this day" (Gen. xxxv, 19, 20). As Rachel is the first related instance of death in child-bearing, so this pillar over her grave is the first recorded example of the setting-up of a sepulchral monument: caves having been up to this time spoken of as the usual places of burial. The spot was well known in the time of Samuel and Saul (1 Sam. x, 2); and the prophet Jeremiah, by a poetical figure of great force and beauty, represents the buried Rachel weeping for the loss and captivity of her children, as the bands of the exiles, led away on their road to Babylon, passed near her tomb (Jer. xxxi, 15-17). Matthew (ii, 17, 18) applies this to the slaughter by Herod of the infants at Bethlehem. See Rachel.

The position of the Ramah here spoken of is one of the sites in the topography of Palestine [see Ramah]; but the site of Rachel's tomb, "on the way to Bethlehem", "a little way to come to Ephrath," "in the border of Benjamin," has never been questioned. It is about five miles south of Jerusalem, and half a mile north of Bethlehem. "It is one of the shrines which Mohammedans, Jews and Christians agree in honouring, and concerning which their traditions are identical." It was visited by Maundrell in 1697. The description given by Dr. Robinson (i, 218) may serve as the representative of the many accounts, all agreeing with each other, which may be read in almost every book of Eastern travel. It is "merely an ordinary Moslem velly, or tomb of a holy person—a small square building of stone with a dome, and within it a tomb in the ordinary Mohammedan form, the whole plastered over with mortar. Of course the building is not ancient: in the 7th century there was here only a pyramidal of stones. It is now neglected and falling to decay, though pilgrimages are still made to it by the Jews. The naked walls are covered with names in several languages, many of them in Hebrew. The general correctness of the inscriptions which have fixed upon this spot for the tomb of Rachel cannot well be drawn in question, since it is fully supported by the circumstances of the Circumstantial narrative. It is also mentioned by the Itin. Hieros. A.D. 383, and by Jerome (Ep. lxxvi, ad Eustoch. Epiphat. Pand. in the same century). Since Robinson's visit the site has been enlarged by the addition of a square court on the east side, with high walls and arches (Later Researches, p. 273). Schwarz (Palest. p. 109 sqq.) strongly supports the identity of the true grave of Rachel with the monument which now bears that name (see also Bibliotheca Sacra, 1850, p. 607; Journ. of Sac. Lit. April, 1864). This monument is particularly described by Hackett (Illustr. of Script. p. 101 sqq.). See Bethlehem.

Rachel's Tomb.

Racine, Bonaventure, a French priest and historian, was born at Chauny, Nov. 29, 1708, and was the son of the most illustrious of French poets. He was educated at Paris, in the College Mazarin, and made remarkable progress in the languages and in theology. In 1729 he was placed at the head of the College de la Rambuteau; but in 1731, becoming satisfied of the injustice done the Jansenists in the bull Unigenitus [see Jansenism], he took ground against it, and thereby so displeased the powers that were at Rome and at Paris that he was displaced. The bishop of Moosteller, however, took his part, and gave him the presidency of the college at Lunel. But the Jesuits set the flames of opposition going, and Racine was obliged to quit Lunel in much haste. He went to Paris, and there supported himself by teaching as a private tutor after having been ousted, by order of the cardinal Fleury, from a minor position he had secured at a Paris college. Finally the bishop of Auterne, M. de Caylus, took an interest in Racine, called him into his diocese, and gave him a canonicate in his cathedral. He died May 15, 1755. He wrote much. His principal work is an Abrégé de l'Histoire Ecclésiastique (Paris, 1748-56, 13 vols. 4to), which clearly reveals the position of its author on the important ecclesiastical questions of his time, and is a valuable index to the Jansenistic proclivities of France in the 19th century. His Réflexions sur l'Histoire Ecclésiastique (2 vols. 12mo) are not less valuable. See Feller, Dict. Historique, a. v.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Radbertus. See Pascharius.

Radbod, St., a Dutch prelate of the Church of Rome, flourished in the second half of the 9th century. He was educated at Cologne, and, being of noble birth, was much at the court of Charles the Bald. In 859 he was placed over the church at Utrecht, and he ruled this episcopal charge with great devotion and honor. He died, according to Mabillon, in 918. For his writings, see Histoire Littéraire de la France, vi, 158.

Rad' dal (Heb. Radday), רַדְדַּאֹּל, raddal; Sept. Pddal v. r. Xeb[pat]; the fifth of the seven sons of Jesea, and an elder brother of King David (1 Chron. ii, 14). B.C. 1008. He does not appear in the Bible elsewhere than in this list, unless he be, as Ewald conjectures (Geschichte, iii, 266, note), identical with Rei (q. v.).

Ragdundra, St., daughter of Berthar, a prince of Thuringia, flourished in the earlier part of the 9th century. She is said being carried as a prisoner to France in the twelfth year of her age by Clothaire V, at that time...
king of the district whose capital is now called Soissons, she was educated in the Christian religion, and when she reached a mature age was induced, very reluctantly, to become his wife. Her own wish having been to become a nun, her married life was in great measure given up to works of charity and religion, and Clothaire complained that he "had married a nun rather than a queen." Romansians delight in extolling her virtues, and many curious facts are reported to have been performed by her. Thus they tell that one day, as she walked in her garden, she heard the prisoners, who were only separated from her by a wall, weeping and imploring pity. She thought only of her own sorrows in the past, and she prayed earnestly for them, not knowing how else to help them, and as she prayed her tears burst asunder, and they were freed from captivity. Eventually, about the year 558, Radegunda obtained the king's leave to retire to a monastery at Noyon, where she was consecrated a deaconess by the bishop Medard. Soon afterwards she founded a monastery at Poitiers, in which she lived as a simple sister, but which she endowed richly, not only with money and lands, but also with relics and other sacred objects obtained from the Holy Land and all the more eminent churches of the East and West. It was on the occasion of the translation of the relics of church at Poitiers, a relic of the holy cross that the Christian poet Venantius Fortunatus composed the celebrated and truly magnificent Latin hymn, Vexilla Regis Prodeunt. Radegunda outlived him by more than a quarter of a century, during which she was regarded as a model of Christian virtue; and her life has formed the subject of many beautiful legends, still popular in Germany and France. Her monastery, before her death, which took place in 589, numbered no fewer than 200 nuns. Her feast is held on August 13, the anniversary of her death. In medio peccati painting she is represented with the royal crown, and beneath it a long veil. See Butler, Lives of the Saints, Aug. 13; Montalembert, Moms of the West, vol. ii. b. vi.; Chamber's Encyclop.; Wetzer, Kirchengesch. Deutschlands, vol. ii.

Rader, Matthias, a learned German Jesuit, was born at Jechingen, in the Tyrol, in 1561. He flourished for nearly forty years at Augsburg, then joined the order, and was engaged in various important missions for the Jesuits. He died at Munich in 1634. He published several editions of classical and ecclesiastical writers, and wrote, among others, Fuit Comans (1611); Soli Deo (1615); Soparium Pia (1628).—Virkirius Sanctorum (1604-12).

Radevin, Florentinus, a Roman Catholic of note, was born at Leyeram, in Holland, about 1550. He studied at Prague, and was for some time canon at Utrecht. He became associated with Gerard de Groot, and was one of the founders of the Brethren of the Common Life, and after De Groot's death (1664) was placed at the head of the brotherhood. He died about 1640. He was also the founder of the convent of the regular canons at Windeisheem, near Zwolle, and of the fraternity at Deventer; he thus became, so to speak, the second founder of the Brethren of the Common Life. His Life was written by Thomas a Kempis. See Ullmann, Reformers before the Reformation, ii. 81 sq.; Gieseler, Kirchengesch., ii. 3, 226 sq. (J. H. W.)

Radha Vallabha, a Hindó sect which worships Krishna as Radha Vallabha, the lord or lover of Radha. This favorite mistress of Krishna is the object of adoration to all the sects who worship that deity, but the adoration of Radha is of very recent origin. The founder of this sect is alleged to have been a teacher named Haré Vana, who settled at Vrindavan, and established a matha there, which, in 1822, comprised between forty and fifty resident ascetics. He also erected a temple there which still exists.

Raej, John Dr., a Dutch theologian and philosopher, flourished in the second half of the 17th century, at Leyden. He was a devoted Cartesianist, and distinguished himself greatly as such in 1665 at public disputation. He was in English opposed to the doctrine of philosophy from religion, and had a dangerous tendency to scepticism of the very worst character. See Spanheim, Epistolae, in Opp. i, 999.

Raffaele. See Raphael.

Rafflenhein, Franz, a Dutch theologian of note, was born at Lancy, near Ryssele, in 1589. He was educated at Leyden University, and greatly distinguished himself in the Greek and Oriental languages. He was first made professor of the former at Cambridge, and later of the latter languages at his alma mater. He died in 1597. Rafflenhein corrected the Antwerp Polyglot, and wrote, Lexicon Arab. (Leyden, 1699).—Dict. Chald.:—Grimm, Hebr., and other works.

Raffles, Thomas, D.D., LL.D., an English Independent divine of great celebrity as a pulpit orator and theologian, was born in London in March 1778, of good parentage, and was connected with Sir Thomas S. Raffles. He pursued his theological studies at Homerton College, and in 1809 was settled as a Congregational minister at Hammersmith. In 1812 he accepted a call from the Great George Street Chapel in Liverpool, and remained there until 1828, when he removed to Manchester. He was a colleague as an assistant. In 1820 he resigned his charge, and withdrew from the responsibilities of the stated ministry altogether, his health having become inadequate to any considerable labor, yet he preached at times frequently after that at the temporary and at the request of other similar public occasions. He died Aug. 18, 1863. Probably no minister in the Congregational body in England has been more widely or more favorably known during the last half century than Dr. Raffles. Idealising being one of the most popular preachers in Great Britain, and being called abroad on occasions of public interest oftener, perhaps, than any other one, he has done good service to the cause both of literature and religion by his pen. In 1817 he published a highly interesting volume of Letters during a Tour through Some Parts of France, Surrey, Switzerland, Germany, and the Netherlands. Shortly after the commencement of his ministry he preached a sermon before the London Missionary Society, which attracted great attention and was very widely circulated; and several other of his discourses were published at the request of his friends and with great favor. He was accustomed to celebrate the return of the new year by an appropriate piece of poetry, which was printed and sent forth among his friends as a most welcome remembrance. He has, in addition to these pieces, written many beautiful hymns, some of which the hrich have made their way into some of the collections of sacred song. He is also the author of A Memoir of the life and ministry of his predecessor, the Rev. Thomas Spencer, a work which passed through many editions, and in America it has been several times reprinted. His Lectures on Christian Faith and Practice, though widely circulated, deserve to be better known than they are, being a clear and conclusive exposition and vindication of the Gospel and the rule and motives of morality. He published several separate sermons preached on various public occasions, and contributed frequently to periodicals. See The Patriot (Liverpool), Aug. 20, 1863; N. Y. Observer, Sept. 19, 1863; Princeton Rec., April, 1870, art. iii.

Raffles, Thomas Stamford, Sir, an English philanthropist, born July 5, 1781, was British governor of the island of Java from 1811 to 1816, and, after a visit home, returned to the East as resident at Bencoolen. In Sumatra, and was instrumental in founding a college for the promotion of Anglo-Chinese literature. He died in England, July 4, 1825. He published a History of Java.

Rafin, Gaspari, a French Protestant minister, was born at Revalmont (Tarn), in the first half of the 16th century. He was a devoted Huguenot, and his home Ragau was the rallying-place of French Protestants during the days of oppression and persecution.

1. A place named only in the Apocalypse (Judith i, 5, 15). In the latter verse the "mountains of Ragau" are mentioned. It is probably identical with Rages (q.v.).

2. One of the ancestors of our Lord, son of Phalec (Luke iii, 35). He is the same person with Ricu (q.v.), son of Peleg; and the difference in the name arises from our translators having followed the Greek form, in which the first letter g was frequently suppressed by γ, as is the case in Raguel (which once occurs for Reuel), Gomorrha, Gotholiah (for Atholiah), Phogor (for Peror), etc.

Rages (Ῥάγους, Ῥάγους; Vulg. Rages, Ragau) was an important city in north-eastern Media, where that country bordered upon Parthia. It is not mentioned in the Hebrew Scriptures, but occurs frequently in the book of Tobit (i, 14; v, 5; vi, 9, 12, etc.), and twice in Judith ("Raguel" [1, 5, 15]). According to Tobit, it was a place to which some of the Israelitish captives taken by Shalmanezer (Enememar) had been transported, and thither the angel Raphael conducted the young Tobias. In the Apocrypha it is often made the scene of the great battle between Nebuchodonosor and Arphaxad, wherein the latter is said to have been defeated and taken prisoner. Neither of these accounts can be regarded as historic, but the latter may conceal a fact of some importance in the history of the city.

Rages is a place mentioned by a great number of profane writers. The name is said to have been derived from the chama (gayadz) made in the vicinity by earthquakes (Strabo, i, 13). It appears as Rogha in the Zendavesta, in Isidore, and in Stephen; as Rupi in the inscription of the Tageres in Duria of Samos (Etr. 25). It is made the scene of one of the greatest battles that ever took place, in which the Persian and the Greek armies met (Plut. Artax. 1). Properly speaking, Rages is a town, but the town gave name to a province, which is sometimes called Rages or Rhages, sometimes Rhagiana. It appears from the Zendavesta that here was one of the earliest settlements of the Ariana, who were mingled, in Rhagiana, with two other races, and were thus brought into contact with heretics (Bunsen, Philosophy of Universal History, iii, 485). Isidore calls Rages "the greatest city in Media" (p. 6), which may have been the case in his day; but other writers commonly regard it as much inferior to Ecbatana. It was the place to which Frawartish (Praortotes), the Median rebel, fled when defeated by Darius Hystaspis, and at which he was made prisoner by one of Darius's generals (Dek. Inscr. col. ii, par. 19). See Media. This is probably the fact which the apocryphal writer of Judith had in his mind when he spoke of Arphaxad as having been captured at Rages. When Darius Codomannus fled from Alexander, intending to make a final stand in Bactria, he must have passed through Rages on his way to the Caspian Gates; and so we find that Alexander arrived there, in pursuit of his enemy, on the eleventh day after he quitted Ecbatana (Arrian, Exp. Alci, iii, 20). In the troubles which followed the death of Alexander, Rages appears to have gone to decay, but it was soon after rebuilt by Seleucus I (Nicator), who gave it the name of Europus (Strab. xi, 13, 6 §; Steph. Bry. ad voc.). When the Parthians took it, they called it Aracina, after the Aracae of the day; but it soon afterwards recovered its ancient appellation, as we see by Strabo and Isidore. That appellation has been preserved in the name of Rhey.

These ruins lie about five miles south-east of Teheran, and cover a space 4500 yards long by 3500 yards broad. The walls are well marked, and are of prodigious thickness; they appear to have been flanked with a range of towers, and the city was a lofty citadel at their north-eastern angle. The importance of the place consisted in its vicinity to the Caspian Gates, which, in a certain sense, it guarded. Owing to the barren and desolate character of the great salt desert of Iran, every army which seeks to pass from Bactria, India, and Parthia to Media and Persia, or vice versa, must skirt the range of mountains which runs along the southern shore of the Caspian. These mountains send out a rugged and precipitous spur in about long. 52° 25' E. from Greenwich, which runs far inland, and can only be rounded with the utmost difficulty by a direct passage across this spur of which even the Pyle Caspice of the ancients—and of this pass the possessors of Rhages must have at all times held the keys. The modern Teheran, built out of its ruins, has now succeeded Rhey; and it is perhaps mainly from the importance of its position that it has become the Persian capital. For an account of the ruins of Rhey, see Ker Porter, Travels, i, 357-364; and compare Fraser, Khorasan, p. 286.

Ragged Schools is the popular name for a voluntary agency providing education for destitute children, and so preventing them from falling into vagrancy and crime. Vagrant children, and those guilty of slight offences, are provided for in the English Certified Industrial School; but the two institutions are in Great Britain frequently combined. See INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS. In the 18th century, the ragged schools was almost simultaneous with that which instituted reformatories. John Borgia, an unlettered laboring mason, established a "ragged school" towards the close of the last century, composed of thievish and vagrant children gathered from the streets and by-ways of Rome. A few years later, John Pounds, an uneducated cobbler, for twenty years, till his death in 1839, gathered into his shop the most destitute and degraded children of Portsmouth, and thus instituted the first ragged school in England. Both wrought miracles among the ragged children, by such means as moral, industrial, moral, and religious training which they imparted to the juvenile generation of their time was a work most appropriately honored as "the beginning of the greatest of all social problems." It saved thousands of children from beggary and vice, and raised multitudes from the verge of infamy to the rank of a useful and honored life. The first school in which education was accompanied by offer of food was opened by Sheriff Watson in Aberdeen in 1841, and from thence ragged feeding-schools spread over all the country. London had a ragged school founded by the Hon. Mrs. Burdett, which became a free day-school. Field Lane followed in 1843. The Ragged School Union of London in 1864 numbered 201 day-schools, with 17,365 scholars (of these, 2949 were industrial); 180 Sunday-schools, with 28,560 scholars; and 205 readers. The number of ragged schools throughout the country cannot be ascertained, as they are not officially known. A Privy-council minute of 1866 allowed a capitation grant of £2 10s. to every child fed in the schools. This was withdrawn in 1869, as it was also the grant of one of the last of the material used in industrial training. Many of the existing schools certified under the Act of 1857, as in Scotland under Mr. Dunlop's Act of 1854; but these acts operated very slightly in changing the character of the schools, though introducing the principle of compulsory detention, more fully worked out under recent acts. In the present code of government education, ragged schools are left out. They can obtain grants on the same conditions as other schools—conditions to them often difficult and unnecessary. For industrial teaching, they receive no assistance, but a certificate of industrial is precluded from aid from any quarter. There are still, it is estimated, 25,000 ragged children in the streets of London. Schools for the instruction of poor colored children were established by the Friends of Philadelphia as early as 1776, and their benevolent care has been continued in this respect for an entire century. See also SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.
RAGSTATT

Ragstatt, Friedrich von, a minister of the Reformed Church, was born, of Jewish parents, at Metz in 1648. In the year 1671 he was baptized at Cluses in the faith of the Reformed Church; and his conversion and public confession of the divine truths of Christianity were not less remarkable. Shortly after his baptism, when scarcely twenty-three years of age, he published a Latin apology: Theatum Lucidanum, exhibens Verum Messiam, Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, ejusque Honorem Defendens contra Acusationes Judeorum seu Rabbinorum in Generi, speciisim R. Lipmanii Nizzachon (Amst. 1671), in which the name of the Messiah, our Lord Jesus Christ, was gloriously maintained against the abominable Nizzachon of the Rabbin Lipman (q. v.). Having studied at Groningen and Leyden, in 1680 he was called to the pastorate at Spayk, near Gorcum, in South Holland, where he labored with great blessing, bringing many of his former coreligionists to the foot of the cross. Besides his Thesaurus, he published some other writings. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. Medic., iii, 128 sq.; Jücher, Gelehrten Lexikon, s. v. "Von Weise;" Wolf, Biblioth. Raguel (Heb. Ræuel, רָעֵל; Sept. "Parevōnja," a less correct Anglicism of the name Raguel (q. v.).

1. A prince-priest of Midian, the father of Zipporah, ancestor of the tribe of the Is. i, 21, and of Moses according to Numb. x. 29. As the father-in-law of Moses is named Jethro in Exod. iii. 1, and Hobab in Judg. iv. 11, and perhaps in Numb. x. 29 (though the latter passage admits of another sense), the prima-facie view would be the Jethro, Reuel, and Hobab, to be different names for the same individual. Such is probably the case with regard to the two first, at all events, if not with the third. See Hobab. One of the names may represent an official title, but whether Jethro or Raguel is uncertain, both being appropriately significant (Jethro = "pre-eminent," from בה ב "excellence," and Raguel = "friend of God," from בר ב). Josephus was in favor of the former (Ant., i. 16, 18), and the application of more than one name to the same individual was a usage familiar to the Hebrews. Jethro is also applied to Solomon and Judicial, and other similar cases. Another solution of the difficulty has been sought in the loose use of terms of relationship among the Hebrews; as that chothên (ךֹּתֵן) in Exod. iii. 1, xviii. 11, xumb. x. 29, may signify any relation by marriage, and consequently that Jethro and Hobab were brothers-in-law of Moses; or that the terms db (דבד) and bath (תָּבָת) in Exod. i. 16, 21, mean grandfather and granddaughter. Neither of these assumptions is satisfactory, the former in the absence of any corroborative evidence; the latter because the omission of Jethro, the father's name, in so circumstantial a narrative as in Exod. ii. 12, is inexplicable; nor can we conceive the indiscriminate use of the terms father and grandfather without good cause. Nevertheless, Jethro has a strong claim to the dignity of authority in its favor, being supported by the Targum Jonathan, Aben-Ezra, Michaelis, Winer, and others. See Jethro.

2. Another transcription of the name Reuel, occurring in Tobit, where Raguel, a pious Jew of "Ecbatane," a fact that he is father of Sara and wife of Tobias (Tob. iii. 7, 17, etc.). The name was not uncommon, and in the book of Enoch it is applied to one of the great guardian angels of the universe, who was charged with the execution of the divine judgments on the (material) world and the stars (xx. 4; xxiii. 4, ed. Dillmann).

Raguenau, Frédéric de, a French prelate who flourished in the second half of the 16th century. He was of noble birth, and after taking holy orders, his uncle vacated the bishopric of Marseilles in order to make room for him. He became a zealous and devoted ecclesiastic, and in many instances displayed more than ordinary manliness. As he was suspected of a strong leaning towards Protestantism, the leaguists greatly annoyed him, and he finally quitted the country, as his life was threatened. He took refuge with Christina of Lorraine in Italy, until after the abjuration of Henry IV, when Raguenau returned to France; but he paid for his trust in the change of the times by his life's blood. He was assassinated Sept. 26, 1603, in his castle. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xliii, 473, 474; Arrêt du Parlement de Provence contre les Auteurs de l'Assassinat commis sur la Personne de F. de Raguenau (new ed. Marseilles, 1854, 8vo).

Rahab, the form, in the A. V., of two names quite different in the Hebrew. (Heb. רָחָב; רָהָב; red; Sept. "Pa'ach;" פַּאָח; Josephus, "Păaĥag;" Ant. v. 1, 2.) A woman of Jericho at the time of the Exode, whose name has become famous in that connection (Josh. ii) and in Jewish lineage (B.C. 1618). In the following account of her we chiefly follow the Biblical and other ancient authorities, with additions from modern sources. See Exodus.

1. Her History.— At the time of the arrival of the Israelites in Canaan she was a young unmarried woman, dwelling in a house of her own alone, though she had a father and mother, and brothers and sisters, living in Jericho. She was a "harkot," and probably combined the trade of judge-keeper for wayside travelers. She seems also to have been engaged in the manufacture of linen, and the art of dyeing, for which the Phcenicians were early famous; since we find the flat roof of her house covered with stalks of flax put there to dry, and a stock of scarlet or crimson (דָּשָּׁן, דָּשָּׁן) thread in her house—a circumstance which, coupled with the mention of Babylonish garments at vii. 21, as among the spoils of Judah, points to the existence of a trade in such articles between Phcenicia and Mesopotamia. Her house was situated on the wall, probably near the town gate, so as to be convenient for persons coming in and going out of the city. Traders coming from Mesopotamia or Babylonia and returning through Jericho, situated as it was near the fords of the Jordan; and of these many would resort to the house of Rahab. Rahab, therefore, had been well informed with regard to the events of the Exodus. She had heard of the passage through the Red Sea, of the utter destruction of Shphon and Og, and of the irresistible progress of the Israelish host. The effect upon her mind had been what one would not have expected in a person of her way of life: it led her to a firm faith in Jehovah as the true God, and to the conviction that he would protect his people in the extremity of a trade. When, therefore, the two spies sent by Joshua came to her house, they found themselves under the roof of one who, alone, probably, of the whole population, was friendly to their nation. Their coming, however, was quickly known; and the king of Jericho, having received information of it, was afraid at first, according to Josephus; sent, that very evening, to require her to deliver them up. It is very likely that, her house being a public one, some one who resorted there might have seen and recognised the spies, and gone off at once to report the matter to the authorities, and the king had reason to think that Rahab's suspicious; for she immediately hid the men among the flax-stalks which were piled on the flat roof of her house, and, on the arrival of the officers sent to search her house, was ready with the story that two men—of what country she knew not—had it was true, been to her house, but had left it just before the gates were shut for the night. If they pursued them at once, she added, they would be sure to overtake them. Misled by the false information, the men started in pursuit to the banks of the Jordan, the gate of Jericho, which had been opened to let them out, and immediately closed again. When all was quiet, and the people were gone to bed, Rahab stood up to the house-top, told the spies what had happened, and assured them of her faith in the God of Israel, her recent, but shallow impression of the capture of the whole land by them—an expectation, she added, which was shared by her countrymen, and had produced a great panic among them. She then told them her plan for their escape: it was to let them down by a cord from the window of her house, which looked over the city wall, and that they should flee into the mountains which bounded the plains of Jericho, and lie hidden there for three days, by which time the pursuers would have returned, and the gates of the Jordan be open to them again. She asked, in return for her kindness to them, that they should swear by Jehovah that, when their countrymen had taken the city, they would spare her life, and the lives of her father and mother, brothers and sisters, and all that belonged to them. The men readily consented; and it was agreed between them that she should mark out a white line on the window from which they had escaped, and bring all her family under her roof. If any of her kindred went out-of-doors into the street, her blood would be upon his own head; and the Israelites, in that case, would be guiltless. The event proved the wisdom of her precautions. The pursuers returned to Jericho after a fruitless search, and the spies got safe back to the Israelite camp. The news they brought of the terror of the Canaanites doubtless inspired Israel with fresh courage, and within three days of their return the passage of the Jordan was effected. In order to destroy Jericho which they had ensured, Joshua gave the strictest orders for the preservation of Rahab and her family; and, accordingly, before the city was burned, the two spies were sent to her house, and they brought out her, her father, and mother, and brothers, and kindred, and all that she had, and placed them in safety in the Israelite camp. The narrator adds, "and she dwelt in Israel unto this day: not necessarily implying that she was alive at the time he wrote, but that the family of strangers of which she was reckoned the head continued to dwell among the harlot's children. The Maccabees and forty-five "children of Jericho" mentioned in Ezra ii, 34; Neh. vii, 36, and "the men of Jericho" who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 2) have been their posterity? Their continued sojourn among the Israelites of the tribes of Judah, and the fact that they were in the wilderness: that she became a proselyte when the spies were received by her; and that, after the fall of Jericho, no less a personage than Joshua himself made her his wife. She is also counted as an ancestress of Jeremiah, Micah, and Huldah, the prophetesses. See Talm. Babyl. 2. Rahab's Character. This has been a subject of deep interest and no little controversy. In the narrative of these transactions, Rahab is called מַּרְאֵה, "morah," which our own, after the ancient versions, renders "harlot." The Jewish writers, however, being unwilling to entertain the idea of their ancestors being involved in a disreputable association at the commencement of their great undertaking, chose to interpret the term "morah" less, one who keeps a public-house, as if from מַרְאֵה, "to nourish" (Josephus, Ant. v, 1; ii and vii; comp. theTar- gum, and Kimchi and Jarchi on the text). Christian translators, also, are inclined to adopt this interpretation for the sake of the character of a woman of whom the apostle speaks well, and who would appear, from the narrative, to be as unexceptionable as the woman with whom Salmon, prince of Judah, an ancestress of Jesus. But we must be content to take facts as they stand.
and not strain them to meet difficulties; and it is now universally admitted by every sound Hebrew scholar that הַשָּׁלוֹם means "harlot," and not "hostess." It signifies "harlot" in every other word where it occurs, the idea of "hostess" not being represented by this or any other word in Hebrew, as the function represented by it did not exist. (See Frisch, De Muliere Peregrina op. Heb. [Lips. 1741].) There were no inns; and when certain substitutes for inns eventually came into use, they were never, in any Eastern country, kept by women. On the other hand, strangers from beyond the river might have repaired to the house of a harlot without suspicion or remark: the Bedawin from the desert continued to wander about in their tents throughout the days of the Litra and Bagdad. The house of such a woman was also the only one to which they, as perfect strangers, could have had access, and certainly the only one in which they could calculate on obtaining the information they required without danger from male inmates. This concurrence of analogies in the word, in the thing, and in the probability of circumstances ought to settle the question. If we are concerned for the morality of Rahab, the best proof of her reformation is found in the fact of her subjection to Salmon: this implies the previous conversion to Judaism, for which, indeed, her discourse with the spies evinces that she was prepared. Dismissing, therefore, as inconsistent with truth and with the meaning of הַשָּׁלוֹם and פָּרֹת, the attempt to clear her character of stain by saying that she was only an innkeeper, and not a harlot (רֶשֶׁת, חַנָּיָם, and Chal. Vena), we may yet notice that it is very possible that to a woman of her country and religion such a calling may have implied a far less deviation from the standard of morality than it does with us ("vice genus vitis majis quam flagitiose.") Grotius, and, moreover, that with a purer faith she seems to have endured even more (see Har. xxvii). As a case of casuistry, her conduct in deceiving the king of Jericho's messengers with a false tale, and above all, in taking part against her own countrymen, has been much discussed. With regard to the first, strict truth, either in Jew or heathen, was a virtue so utterly unknown before the promulgation of the Gospel, that so far as Rahab is concerned, the discussion is quite superfluous. The question, as regards ourselves, whether in any case a falsehood is allowable—say to save our own life or that of another—is different, but need not be our concern. The question of Rahab's reference, both to Rahab and to Christians, is well discussed by Augustine, Contra. M. Mendaciorum (Opp. vi. 33, 34; comp. Bullinger, 3d Dec. Serm. iv). With regard to her taking part against her own countrymen, it can only be justified if, as is supposed in the Litra, she was not a Canaanite, but a some, under Gentile rule, and was only a sojourner in Jericho. The Gemara of Babyl. mentions the above-noted tradition that she became the wife of Joshua—a tradition unknown to Jerome (1. de Israel). Josephus (Ant. v. 1) describes her as an innkeeper, and her house as an inn (אֲבָרָהַם), and never applies to her the epithet פָּרֹת, which is the term used by the Sept.

2. (Heb. Rahab, הַשָּׁלוֹם, strength; Sept. Pa 2.) Ps 117, and Ps. xxxii, 4; זֹּרַח, Job xvi, 12; פָּרֹת-אֲסָד, Ps. lxxxix, 10; omits Isa. ii, 9. A poetical name signifying "sea monster," which is applied as an appellation to Egypt in Ps. xlv, 18, 14; lxvii, 4; lxix, 10; Isa. ii, 9; and to the sixty-ninth century of its own people, in order to establish the supremacy either of Brahms or Mohammed.

This view of Rahab's is fully borne out by the references to her in the N. T. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews tells us that "by faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not, when she had received the spies with peace" (Heb. xii, 31); and James applies this doctrine of salvation by works by asking, "Was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way?" (James ii, 25). In like manner Clement of Rome says, "Rahab the harlot was saved for her faith and hospitality" (ad Corinth. xii). The fathers generally ("mire concensus") Jacobonei consider the deliverance of Rahab as typical of salvation, and the scarlet line hung out at her window as typical of the blood of Jesus, in the same way as the ark of Noah and the blood of the paschal lamb were—a view which is borne out by the analogy of the deliverances, and by the language of Heb. xi, 31 (רְאוֹי הַשָּׁלוֹם, "the disobedient"), compared with 1 Pet. iii, 20 (רְאוֹי הַשָּׁלוֹם פָּרֹת). Clement (ad Corinth. xii) is the first to do so. He says that by the symbol of the scarlet line it was "made manifest that there shall be redemption through the blood of the Lord to all who believe and trust in God," and adds that Rahab in this was a prophetess as well as a believer—a sentiment in which he is followed by Origen (in ib. Jen. Hom. iii). Justin Martyr, in like manner, calls the scarlet line "the symbol of the blood of Christ, by which the children of all nations who once were harlots and unrighteous are saved," and in a like spirit Irenæus draws from the story of Rahab the conversion of the Gentiles, and the admission of publicans and harlots into the kingdom of heaven through the way of the scarlet line, which he compares with the Passover and the Exodus. Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine (who, like Jerome and Cyril, takes Ps. lxxvii, 4 to refer to Rahab the harlot), and Theodoret, all follow in the same track; but Origen, as usual elsewhere, carries the analogy further. Irenæus makes the singular mistake of calling the scarlet three, and makes them symbolical of the Trinity! The comparison of the scarlet line with the scarlet thread which was bound round the hand of Zarah is a favorite one with them.

The Jews, as above observed, are embarrassed as to what to say concerning Rahab. They praise her highly for her conduct; but some rabbis give out that she was not a Canaanite, but a some, under Gentile rule, and was only a sojourner in Jericho. The Gemara of Babyl. mentions the above-noted tradition that she became the wife of Joshua—a tradition unknown to Jerome (1. de Israel). Josephus (Ant. v. 1) describes her as an innkeeper, and her house as an inn (אֲבָרָהַם), and never applies to her the epithet פָּרֹת, which is the term used by the Sept.
diles, hippopotami, and other aquatic creatures of the Nile (q. v.). As the word, if Hebrew, radically denotes "fierceness, insolence, pride," when applied to Egypt, it would indicate the natural character of the inhabitants. (Genesis it was probably Egyptian origin, but accommodated to Hebrew, although no likely equivalent has been found in Coptic, or, we may add, in ancient Egyptian (Thesaur. s. v.). That the Hebrew meaning is alluded to in connection with the proper name does not seem to prove that the latter is Hebrew, but this is rendered very probable by its appropriate character and its sole use in poetical books. See BEHEMOTH.

The same word occurs in a passage in Job, where it is usually translated, as in the A. V., instead of being treated as a proper name. Yet many interpreters, comparing this passage with parallel ones, insist that it refers to the Exodus: "He divideth the sea with his power, and by his understanding he smiteth through the proud" [or "Rahab"] (xxvi, 12). The prophet Isaiah calls on the arm of the Lord," [Art] not thou it that hath cut Rahab, [and] wounded the dragon's [Art] not thou it which hath dried the sea, the waters of the great deep; that hath made the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over?" (li, 9, 10; comp. 15). In Ps. lxiv the division of the sea is mentioned in connection with breaking the heads of the dragons and monsters of Leviathan (ver. 13). So, too, in Ps. lxviii God's power to subdue the sea is spoken of immediately before a mention of his having "broken Rahab in pieces" (ver. 9, 10). Rahab, as a name of Egypt, occurs once only without reference to the Exodus: this is in Ps. lxxxvii, wherein Rahab, Babylon, Philistia, Tyre, and Cush are compared with Zion (ver. 4, 5). In one other passage the name is alluded to with reference to its Hebrew signification, where it is prophesied that the aid of the Egyptians should not avail those who sought it, and this sentence follows: פֶּלַל עָפָר נָהָר הָיָה, "Insolence (i.e. 'the insolent'), they sit still" (Isa. xxx, 7), as Ge-"sequence, regarding Jorkoam as a place, of which Raham was founder and prince.

RAHMAUS, FREDERICK A., a German Reformed minister, was born in York Co., Pa., in 1762, of humble but excellent parentage. He was brought up as a weaver, the profession of his father. His early educa- tion was very limited. At the age of twenty-one he went to Hanover, Pa., entered the German Reformed Church, with a Lutheran minister, and then determined to prepare for the work of the ministry. His brother Jonathan greatly aided him, and Frederick Rahmaus pleased as a preacher as soon as he entered upon the ministerial task. He was ordained in 1809, and preached for nearly half a century. He served during this period several large and laborious charges, which are now among the most prosperous and prominent places in the Reformed Church. In those early days all ministers did hard work, for then the fields were large and the laborers were yet fewer than now. His first settlement was at Emmertsburg, Md., in the summer of 1808. This charge, which he served with great acceptance for about eight years, then included Gettysburg, Taneytown, Apples, and other distant points. Some of the congrega- tions were more than ten miles, and twenty miles apart. But during all his hard service his general health was good, so that he rarely failed to meet an appointment. In 1816 he accepted a call to the church at Harrisburg, Pa., to which he ministered till 1819, when he removed to Chambersburg. Considering this charge, he gave his matured and most vigorous labors, and the faithfulness also was attended with success for a period of seventeen years. In 1836 he removed to Tiffin, O., and for four years was pastor of the German Reformed Church in that city. In 1840 he took charge of some country churches in Sandusky and Seneca counties, in a region called the Black Swamp. Here he continued the work of ruling years and failing energies disabled him from the active duties of his office. He lived with his children until his death, July 15, 1865.

RAHEL, a form originally adopted everywhere in the A. V. (in the edition of 1611) for the present fami- liar name Rachel (q. v.), but retained in our present Bible only in Jer. xxxvi, 15, apparently by a mere oversight of the later editors.

Rāhu is, in Indian mythology, the demon who is imagined to be the cause of the eclipses of sun and moon. When, in consequence of the burning of the millet, the gods had obtained the amrita, or beverage of immortality, they endeavored to appropriate it to their exclusive use; and in this attempt they had also succeeded, after a long struggle with their rivals, the Dāityas, or demons, when Rahu, one of the latter, insinuating himself among the gods, obtained a portion of the amrita by tricking detected by the god Indra: when his head was cut off by Viṣṇu; but, the amrita having reached his throat, his head had already become immortal; and out of revenge against sun and moon, it now pursues them with implacable hatred, seizing them at intervals, and thus causing their eclipses. Such is the substance of the legend as told in the Purāṇas, especially in the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Purāṇa (q. v.). In the Purāṇas (q. v.), it is ampli- fied by allowing both head and tail of the demon to ascend to heaven, and produce the eclipses of sun and moon, when the head of the demon is called Rāhu and his tail Ketu, both, more or less being rep- resented in some Purāṇas as the sons of the demons Vīpūrachiti and his wife Sīhika. In the Vāyū Purāṇa, Rahu is also spoken of as the king of the meteors.

Rāj Đāsā, a Hindu sect founded by Rāj Đās, a disciple of Ramānad. It is said to be confined to the emblem, or workers in hides and in leather, and among the very lowest of the Hindu mixed tribes. This cir- cumstance, as Prof. H. H. Wilson thinks, renders it difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain whether the sect still exists.

RAIČFORD, Matthew, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Jefferson Co., Ga., July 12, 1879. He enjoyed the comfortable assurance of grace at or before the tenth year of his age, and joined the Church in his eleventh year. He was licensed to preach March 28, 1816, and was licensed to preach December 12, 1850. He entered the Georgia Conference at the ensuing session, and filled various appointments until 1842, when he ceased to be an effective preacher. He was sorely afflicted for several years before his death, but often spoke of it with calmness and Christian confidence. He died in Monroe Co., Ga., April 16, 1869.

RAIKES, Henry, an Anglican divine of considerable note, was born Sept. 24, 1782, and was the second son of Thomas Raikes, a gentleman distinguished in English civil life. He was educated at Eton and Cam- bridge University, where he graduated at St. John's College, in 1804, with second-class honors. The next three years were spent on the Continent in extensive travels. He enjoyed the society of the most cultured, and with many who had returned, in 1808, to enter the service of the Church with more than usual intellectural and social qualifications. He became curate of Betchworth, in Surrey, and later of Burnham, in Buckingham, whence he removed to Bognor, in Sussex; and finally enjoyed the distinction of holding the chancellorship of Chester for eighteen years. He refused, about 1828, the bishopric of Mer- rist and a valuable prebendary in the North of Ireland and in Lincolnshire. He was attached to his home, and loved the quiet and retirement of his parish. He died in February, 1854. Chancellor Raikes's varied and great learning was scarcely known by his most intimate friends. He was so unpretentious a nature that few were aware that he was one of the ablest in his learning and patristic subjects. His printed productions are his least valuable efforts. Yet among these lesser works and contributions to the religious periodicals of the day, he published a volume of Sermons of a very original type and format. Theology in all its branches included the fate of most works adopted by a party as its manifesto in great temporary popularity and early oblivion. A far more important work, and one of vast influence on the Church, was his Essay on Clerical Education. It materially influenced the universities to the recognition of a higher truth, of a more precious learning than had, at that time, scarcely found a place in the extensive range of university studies and examinations.
It is to be regretted that, besides the repeated publication of series of sermons, the productions of Chancellor Raikes are left in MS. form. He was so well qualified for original work, and did so much of it in certain unexplored fields, that it is to be hoped his writings will, some day, find their way to print in a complete edition.
See Gentleman's Mag. (London), 1855, i, 198 sq. (J. H. W.)

Raikes, Richard, uncle of Henry, was a clergym-man of the Church of England, and flourished near the middle of the 18th century. He was educated at St.
John's College, Cambridge, and held a professorship in that university. After taking holy orders, he was made prebendary of St. David's. He was a man of exact learning and of refinement in taste. He was the early teacher of Henry. The founder of Sunday-schools also received much of his education and encouragement from this divine, who himself published Essays on Sunday-schools.
See Gentleman's Magazine (London), 1855, p. 199.

Raikes, Robert, the noted English philanthropist who founded the modern Sunday-school (q. v.), was a native of Gloucester, England, where he was born Sept.
14, 1735. His ancestors were people of good rank, and some of them are distinguished as clergy and politicians. His father was a printer and an editor. He published the Gloucester Journal, a county Tory newspaper, and the first journal that attempted to give a report of parliamentary proceedings, which was considerated, at the time, so great a breach of privilege that he was arrested and brought before the Commons at the dark days of George I and under the partisanship of lord-chancellor King. Robert was brought up with a view of succeeding his father in business, and enjoyed, therefore, a liberal education. Having finally become proprietor of the Journal, he managed to give his paper a wide influence and respectful reading. He was a truly devout man, and carried his Christianity into every-day life. He was not only scrupulous about his church attendance on the Sabbath, but made it the to rule to frequent early morning prayers on weekdays at the Gloucester cathedral. A man who could thus devote the hours of a working-day to the glory of his God was likely to cherish an interest in his fellows also. Raikes was particularly interested in the lowly and the degraded. He visited prisons and went about the streets seeking to do good wherever there was need of aid or counsel. The improvements in prison discipline at the close of the last century in England are largely due to Robert Raikes. His newspaper was an important agency which he used freely, and thus pow-fully affected the life of suffering and degraded classes of society. In 1781 his attention was directed to the children of the poor. He had, by frequent intercourse with the common people, learned of their low intellectual state and the absolute neglect suffered by rising generation. He set out, as he himself tells it in his letter written in 1784, with the number of wretched children whom he found in the suburbs of Gloucester, chiefly in the neighborhood of a pin manufactory, where their parents were employed, wholly abandoned to themselves, half clothed, half fed, and growing up in the most degrading vices.
The state of the streets was worse on Sunday, when the younger children, who were enrolled on week-days, were joined to their younger associates; and all manner of excesses became the theme of complain on the part of the shopmen and the property-owners generally. Even the farmers near came complaining of the lack of discipline among the juvenile offenders. Raikes determined to provide a remedy for this growing evil. He saw very clearly the surest result in education, and therefore sought the help of four excellent teachers and devoted Christian women, whom he paid a small allowance for their service, and, gathering the children on the Sabbath-day, tried a kind of work which has given shape to the modern Sabbath-school. He procured the help of the clergy, and the enterprise began in such an unpretending manner grew into proportions of which Raikes himself had not had the faintest idea. The instruction was at first confined to reading and writing. Instead of secular text-books, the Bible was the principal readning-book used, and so the children were made familiar with the Gospel's great benefits to man. How he got inside the children with the text he himself tells us in his letter: "I went around," he says, "to remonstrate with numbers of the poor on the melancholy consequences that must ensue from a fatal neglect of their children's morals. I prevailed with some, and others soon followed; and the school began to prosper in numbers. The children were to come soon after ten in the morning and stay till twelve; they were then to go home and return at one, and, after reading a lesson, they were to be conducted to church. After church they were to be employed in repeating the catechism till half-past five, and then to be dismissed with an injunction not to be without making a noise, and by no means to play in the street. With regard to the rules adopted, I only required that they come to the school on Sunday as clean as possible. Many were at first deterred because they wanted decent clothing; but I could not undertake to supply this defect. Although without shoes and in a ragged coat, I rejected none on that account; all that I required were clean hands, a clean face, and the hair combed. If they had no clean shirt, they were to come in that which they had on. The want of decent apparel at first kept many of the children from attending; but gradually became wiser, and all pressed to learn. I had the good luck to procure places for some that were deserving, which was of great use. The children attending the school varied from six years old to twelve or fourteen. Little rewards were distributed among the most diligent; this excited an emulation." The mode of procedure is thus described by himself: "Upon the Sunday afternoon the mistresses take their scholars to church, a place which neither they nor their ancestors ever entered with a view to the glory of God. They assemble at the house of one of the mistresses, and walk before her to church, two and two, in as much order as a company of soldiers. I am generally at church, and after service they all come round me to make their bow, and, if any animosities have arisen, to make their complaint. The great principle1 I inculcate is to be kind and good-natured to each other; not to provoke one another; to be dutiful to their parents; not to offend God by cursing and swearing, and such plain precepts as all may comprehend." Although other schemes may have been proposed on this subject, and with a more romantic interest, none were ever so productive of more extensively beneficial results. The necessity, and the advantages to be derived from the establishment, of such schools seem to have occurred about the same time to several individuals in various parts of the encroachment and communications of Dr. John, and of the late Dr. John, and of the late Mr. VﺶV谋划1.
tion and superintendence of the Sunday-schools in that city, yet, for the energetic development of the principle, for the carrying-out into practical details and bringing it in the most advantageous form before the country so as to render it a prolific source of public benefit, to Robert Raikes, is due all dispute, belonged to the honorable title of the Founder of Sunday-schools. Three years after the inauguration of the Gloucester institution, the inhabitants of an obscure district where he had fixed a school remarked that 'the place had become quite a house of amusement.' So zealous were compared to that it used to be. Schools of the same kind were, ere long, opened in most of the large towns in England. A Sunday-school Society was opened in London under the auspices of such men as Henry Thornton, bishops Barrington, Porteus, and other well-known Christians of the period; and, at a general meeting of that association, held on July 11, 1787, it was resolved unanimously that, in consideration of the zeal and merits of Robert Raikes, he be admitted an honorary member of the society. Within the sphere of his own immediate experience, Raikes had the satisfaction of seeing the happiest fruits spring from the institutions in Gloucester; for, out of all the thousands of poor children who were educated at those Sunday-schools, it was found, after a long series of years, that not one had ever been either in the city or county pauper. See Gentleman's Magazine (London), 1784-1831, pt. ii, 132, 294; Sketch of the Life of Robert, Raikes, and the History of Sunday-Schools (N. Y., 1880); Cornell, Life of Robert Raikes (N. Y. 1864); Jameson, Christian Biography, a. v.

Raikes, Timothy, the grandfather of Robert Raikes, was a clergyman of the Church of England, and of some note. He was born near the middle of the 18th century, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. After taking holy orders, he was vicar of Tickhill. He held the vicarage of Heasle, near Hull, at the time of his death, in 1722.

Raillon, Jacques, a French prelate, born at Bourgoigny, July 17, 1602, was educated for the priesthood at the seminary in Lübeck, in which he had been placed by bishop Mercy of that place. After graduation he made a curate of Montaigu, but was obliged in the Revolutionary period to quit his parish, and lived for some time at Paris, where he took the defence of the priests in his Épui pes au Peuple Catholique (1792, 6 vols.). But he became a royalist, and, by the gravity of that situation, was forced from the country. He lived for a while at Soleur, in Switzerland, then at Venice, in Italy, and only returned to France in 1804. He at once became teacher in the house of Portalis, then minister of cults, and under the influence Raillon was in 1809 made professor of puplit oratory in the theological faculty at Paris, and titular canon of Notre Dame. In the latter capacity he pronounced the funeral orations upon mar-shal Lamarque and other distinguished countrymen of his, and so markedly acquitted himself in this task that he was given the episcopacy of Orleans in 1810. The unpleasant relations then existing between the government of France and the papacy, however, prevented his confirmation, and in 1816 he went into retirement at Paris. The government, however, was unwilling to suffer the loss of such a faithful and efficient ecclesiastic, and in 1829 he was nominated bishop of Dijon and promptly confirmed as such. In 1830 he was made archbishop of Aix, and there he resided until his death, in 1835. On his departure from Dijon a medal was struck in his honour, and the inscription was as he below: The recently expired Dupanloup (1874), who figured as bishop, and more recently as archbishop, of Orleans, at one time involved Raillon in controversy and took offensive ground; but Raillon was universally supported by the French press and a majority of the French clergy, and the bishop Dupanloup changed the direction of his popularity on account of his conduct in this affair. His works are of a secular character, excepting the Histoire de Saint-Amboise (which was to form four or five volumes in 8vo, but of which the MS. was lost). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v. (J. H. W.)

Ralls of the Altar date from the time of bishop Andrews, who calls them "wainscot banisters," and Laud, who intended to preserve the altar from profanation by their use. They are, in fact, a kind of altar rail, resembling the mediaval "reclinatorium," and answer to the primitive altar-veils and Greek ἱεροστάται. At Leicester Priory, St. Germain's, and Wimborne they are covered with a white linen cloth at the time of holy communion, a relic of the custom for communicants to hold the houseline-cloth (see houseline-cloth, for the Lord's body) below their chin for the purpose of retaining upon it any portion of the sacrament which might fall during the administration. The custom was discarded at the coronation of William IV. St. Augustine's and Canons of Arles mention a linen cloth (lincemen) used by women for the same purpose.

Raimondi, Giovanni Battista, a celebrated Italian Orientalist, was born at Cremona in 1540, removed in his youth to Naples, where he studied at the universities of Naples, Sorrento, philosophy, and medicine, and then spent some time in Asia studying Eastern civilization and languages. Returning to Italy, he became engaged in various literary enterprises, and enjoyed the society of the great and the learned. He brought out an edition of the Psalms in Arabic with a Latin interlinear translation (1591), and wrote grammars of Syriac and Arabic. He was also engaged on a polyglot Bible more complete than that of Alcalâ or Antwerp, and only ceased labor when the death of pope Gregory XIII (1567) deprived him of the necessary funds for such an enterprise. He died about 1610. He was engaged after 1587 in the compilation of Oriental MSS. and other like labors. See Tiraboschi, Della Letteratura Italiana.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v. Raimondi, Marc Antonio, an Italian engraver who devoted himself to classical and sacred art, was born at Bologna in 1487. He was a student first of Francesco Francia, but perfected himself under Raphael, who favored him so greatly that Raimondi may be placed by the side of his great master. The two artists worked together, and Raimondi was especially the particular branch of art that the works of that time have never been excelled in drawing and clearness of outline, though much surpassed in gradation of tone and delicacy of modelling. It should be remembered that it was Raphael who first obtained for his pupil the commission of the cartoons for the School of Athens, which Raphael that Marc Antonio worked. He was especially remarkable for the exactness with which he copied; he seems to have been willing to lose himself entirely in the master he reproduced. His life may be said to have been devoted to multiplying the works of Raphael. He also executed a few plates after Michelangelo, Mantegna, Bandinelli, and Giulio Romano. He was imprisoned on account of some plates after the designs of the latter, which were so indecent as to excite Clement VII, and it was with difficulty that his release was obtained by some of the cardinals and Bandinelli. In 1527 Raimondi was in full favor in Rome, when he was driven away by the sacking of the Spaniards. He was plundered, and fled to Bologna. His last work was done in 1558, in which year he is said to have been killed while engraving a picture. He is said to have engraved a second plate of the Murder of the Innocents, contrary to his agreement. His works are numerous, and in selecting them great attention should be paid to the different impressions, for some of the plates have been re touched by those who have had them, until they are greatly changed. The brass plate engraved in his name. Heineken gives a complete catalogue of his prints. Very few collections are in the Louvre and in RAIN. Heb. הָרַע, malak, and also מַגְּרֶש, gezham, which, however, rather signifies a shower of more violent rain; it is also used as a generic term, including the early and latter rain (Jer. v. 24; Joel ii, 23). Another word, of a more poetical character, is רָעָם, râ'âm (a plural form, connected with rub, "many," from the multitude of the drops), translated in our version "showers" (Deut. xxxii, 2; Jer. iii, 3; xiv, 22; Mic. v, 7 [Heb. 6]; Psa. lxv, 10 [Heb. 11]; lxxvi, 6). The Hebrews have the word צְרֵם, tzerem, expressing violent rain, storm, tempest, accompanied with hail—in Job xxii, 8, the heavy rain which heavy down on mountains; and the word מַגְּרֶשׁ, magrash, which occurs only in Prov. xxvii, 15, continuous and heavy rain (Sept. εἰς ηδονήν ἀπαντοῦντος).

Early Rain means the rains of the autumn, הִנְנִי, hinni, yoreh, part. subst. from הִנָּה, he scattered (Deut. xi, 14; Jer. v, 24); also the Hiphil part. הִנְנָה, hinnah, morchel (Joel ii, 23); Sept. εἰς πρωίων.

Latter Rain is the rain of spring, מַגִּיר, magir, (Prov. xvi, 15; Job xxii, 23; Jer. iii, 3; Hos. vi, 3; Joel ii, 23; Zech. x, 1); Sept. εἰς ἐρυθρόν. The early and latter rains are mentioned together (Deut. xi, 11; Jer. v, 24; Joel vi, 24); the latter rain is especially frequent in the autumn and winter (Hosea vi, 4).

In a country comprising so many varieties of elevation as Palestine, there must of necessity occur corresponding varieties of climate. An account that might correctly describe the peculiarities of the district of Lebanon would be in many respects inaccurate when applied to the deep water courses of the almost tropical climate of Jericho. In any general statement, therefore, allowance must be made for not inconsiderable local variations. Contrasted with the districts most familiar to the children of Israel before their settlement in the land of promise—Egypt and the Desert—rain might be spoken of as one of its distinguishing characteristics (Deut. xi, 10, 11; Herodotus, iii, 10). For six months in the year no rain falls, and the harvests are gathered in without any of the anxiety with which we are so far acquainted. In the rest of the months rain comes in storms. In this respect, at least, the climate has remained unchanged since the time when Boaz slept by his heap of corn; and the sending of thunder and rain in wheat harvest was a miracle which filled the people with fear and wonder (I Sam. xii, 18)—so that Solomon could exclaim: "There are two things which are too wonderful for me, both too high for me to reach: one is the ways of the sea, and the one the wind, which will not be known (Prov.xxxi, 6). These are, however, very considerable, and perhaps more than compensating, disadvantages occasioned by this long absence of rain: the whole land becomes dry, parched, and brown; the cisterns are empty; the springs and fountains fail; and the autumnal rains are eagerly looked for, to prepare the earth for the reception of the seed. These, the early rains, commence about the end of October or beginning of November, in Lebanon a month earlier—not suddenly, but by degrees: the husbandman has thus the opportunity of sowing his fields of wheat and barley. The rains come mostly from the west or south-west (Luke xii, 54), continuing for two or three days at a time, and falling chiefly during the night. The wind then shifts round to the north or east, and several days of fine weather succeed (Prov. xxv, 23). During the months of November and December the rains continue to fall heavily, but at intervals; afterwards they return, only at longer intervals, and are less heavy; but at no period during the winter are they entirely cease. January and February are the coldest months, and snow falls, sometimes to the depth of a foot or more, at Jerusalem, but it does not lie long: it is very seldom seen along the coast and in the low plains. Thin ice occasionally covers the pools for a few days, and while Porter was writing his Handbook, the snow was eight inches deep at Damascus. But in the midst of this rain less than an inch thick, Rain continues to fall more or less during the month of March; it is very rare in April, and even in Lebanon the showers that occur are generally light. In the valley of the Jordan the barley harvest begins as early as the middle of April, and the wheat a fortnight later; in Lebanon the grain is sowed, and the plants ripen in rich thickets. Rain continues to fall more or less during the month of June, See Robinson (Biblical Researches, i, 429) and Porter (Handbook, ch. xlviii). See PALESTINE.

With respect to the distinction between the early and the latter rains, Robinson observes that there are not at the present day any particular descriptions of the one or of succession of showers which might be regarded as distinct rainy seasons. The whole period from October to March now constitutes only one continued season of rain, without any regularly intervening term of prolonged fine weather. Unless, therefore, there have been some change in the climate, the early and the latter rains for which the husbandman waited with longing seem rather to have implied the first showers of autumn which revived the parched and thirsty soil and prepared it for the seed; and the later showers of spring, which continue in March and April, and forwards the ripening of crops and the vernal products of the fields (James v, 7; Prov. xvi, 15). In April and May the sky is usually serene; showers occur occasionally, but they are mild and refreshing. On May 1 Robinson experienced showers of rain and lightning (which are frequent in winter), with pleasant and reviving rain. May 6 was also remarkable for thunder and for several showers, some of which were quite heavy. The rains of both these days extended far to the north, . . . but the occurrence of rain so late in the season was as a very unusual circumstance (Biblical Researches, i, 430) [he is speaking of the year 1888]. In 1856, however, "there was very heavy rain accompanied with thunder all over the region of Lebanon, extending to Beirût and Damascus, on May 28 and 29; but the oldest inhabitant had never seen the like before, and it created," says Porter (Handbook, ch. xlviii), "almost as much astonishment as the thunder and rain which Samuel brought upon the Israelites during the time of wheat harvest." During Dr. Robinson's stay at Beirût, the climate of the country, in 1852, there were heavy rains in March, once for five days continuously, and the weather continued variable, with occasional heavy rain, till the close of the first week in April. The "latter rains" thus continued this season for nearly a month later than usual, and the result was afterwards seen in the more than usual moisture of winter grain (Robinson, Biblical Researches, iii, 9).

These details will, it is thought, better than any general statement, enable the reader to form his judgment on the "former" and "latter" rains of Scripture, and may serve to introduce a remark or two on the question, about which some interest has been felt, whether there have been any change in the frequency and abundance of the rain in Palestine, or in the periods of its supply. It is asked whether "these storied hills, these desert valleys," can be the land flowing with milk and honey: the land which God cared for: the land upon which were always the eyes of the Lord, from the beginning of the year to the end of the year (Deut. xii, 12). So far as relates to the other considerations which may account for diminished fertility, such as the decrease of population and industry, the neglect of terrace-culture and irrigation, and husbanding the supply of water, it may suffice to refer to the article on Agriculture, and to Stanley (Sinai and Palestine, p. 120-123). With respect to our more immediate subject, it is urged that the expression "flowing with milk and honey" implies abundant rains to keep alive the grass for the pasture of the numerous herds supplying the milk, and to nourish the flowers clothing the now bare hill-sides, from whence the bees might gather their stores of honey. It is urged that the supply of rain in its due season seems to be promised as continuagence of the people (Deut. xi, 13-15; Lev. xxvi, 5-5), and that as from time to time, to punish the people for their transgressions, "the showers have been withheld, and there hath been no latter rain" (Jer. iii, 3; 1 Kings xvii, xviii), so now, in the great and long-continued apostacy of the children of Israel, there had if upon them the end of their forfeited inheritance a like continued withdrawal of the favor of God, who claims the sending of rain as one of his special prerogatives (Jer. xiv, 22). See Calendar, Jewish.

The latter rains, it is urged, are by comparison scanty and interrupted, the latter rains have altogether ceased, and hence, it is maintained, the curse has been fulfilled, "Thy heaven that is over thy head shall be brass, and the earth that is under thee shall be iron. The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust" (Deut. xxviii, 23, 34; Lev. xxvi, 19). Without entering here into the consideration of the justness of the interpretation which would assume these predictions of the withholding of rain to be altogether different in the manner of their infliction from the other calamities denounced in the Restoration of Israel. Of threatening, it would appear that, so far as the question of fact is concerned, there is scarcely sufficient reason to imagine that any great and marked changes with respect to the rains have taken place in Palestine. In early days, as now, rain was unknown for half the year, and we may judge from the allusions in Prov. xvi, 15; Job xxix, 23, the latter rain was even then, while greatly desired and longed for, that which was somewhat precarious, by no means to be absolutely counted on as a matter of course. If we are to take as correct our translation of Joel ii, 23, "the latter rain in the first (month)"; i.e. Nisan, according to the attending of the latter part of March and the early part of April, times of the latter rain in the days of the prophets would coincide with those in which it falls now. The same conclusion would be arrived at from Amos iv, 7,
"I have withheld the rain from you when there were yet three months to the harvest." The rain here spoken of is the latter rain, and an interval of three months between the ending of the rain and the beginning of harvest would seem to be in an average year as exceptional now as it was when Amos noted it as a judgment of God. We may infer also from the Song of Solomon, ii, 11-18, where is given a poetical description of the bursting-forth of vegetation in the spring, that the winter was past, the rain was also over and gone. We can hardly any extension of the term "winter", bring it down to a later period than that during which the rains still fall. But it may be added that travellers have, perhaps unconsciously, exaggerated the barrenness of the land, from confining themselves too closely to the southern portion of Palestine; the northern portion, Galilee, of such pecunial interest to the readers of the Gospel, is fertile and beautiful (see Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, ch. x, and Van de Velde, there quoted), and in his description of the valley of Nablus, the ancient Shechem, Robinson (Biblical Researches, ii, 275) becomes almost enthusiastic: "Here a scene of luxuriant and almost unparalleled verdure bursts upon our view. The whole valley was filled with gardens of vegetables and orchards of all kinds of fruits, watered by several fountains, which burst forth in the spring, and the air is perfumed in refreshing streams. It came upon us suddenly, like a scene of fairy enchantment. We saw nothing like it in all Palestine." The account given by a recent lady traveller (Egyptian Sepulchres and Syrian Shrines, by Miss Beaufort) of the luxuriant fruit-trees and vegetables at and near the town of Mishmarah's farm in the valley of Urtas, a little south of Bethlehem (possibly the site of Soloman's gardens, Eccles. ii, 4-6), may serve to prove how much now, as ever, may be effected by irrigation (q.v.).

Rain frequently furnishes the writers of the Old Test, with forcible and appropriate metaphors, varying is their character according as they regard it as the beneficent and fertilizing shower, or the destructive storm, pouring down the mountain-side and sweeping away the latter years. Thus Prov. xxviii, 3, of the poor man that oppresseth the poor; Ezek. xxxviii, 22, of the just punishments and righteous vengeance of God (comp. Ps. xi, 6; Job xx, 25). On the other hand, we have it used of speech and fitting, refreshing the souls of men; of words earnestly waited for and heedfully listened to (Deut. xxxii, 2; Job xxix, 23); of the cheering favor of the Lord coming down once more upon the pestilent soul; of the gracious presence and influence for good of the right hand of him who is bearing gifts, and graces of the reign of the Messiah (Hos. vi, 1; 2 Sam. xxiii, 4; Ps. Ixxxii, 6).

Rainbow (Heb. מֶּ֫אָן, me'ah, i.e. a bow which not the arc in the sky, but the peace and order of physical nature, which in the flood had undergone so great a conversion, see Davidson, On Prophecy, lect. iii.

p. 76-80. With respect to the token of the covenant, the right interpretation of Gen. ix, 13 seems to be that God took the rainbow, which had hitherto been but a beautiful, but not a sign of the promise which was made by Noah when he came forth from the ark and consecrated it as the sign of his love and the witness of his promise. The bow in the cloud, seen by every nation under heaven, is an un-falling witness to the truth of God. Was the rainbow, then, we ask, never seen before the flood? Was this "sign in the heavens" beheld for the first time by the eight days that by the Mermaid? There is no reason to suppose that in the world at large there has been such a change in meteorological phenomena as here implied. That a certain portion of the earth should never have been visited by rain is quite conceivable. Egypt, though not absolutely without rain, very rarely sees it. But the country of Noah and the ark was a mountainous country; and the ordinary atmospheric conditions must have been suspended, or a new law must have come into operation after the flood, if the rain then first fell, and if the rainbow had consequently never before been painted on the clouds. Hence, many writers have supposed that the meaning of the passage is, not that the rainbow now appeared for the first time, but that it was now for the first time invested with the sanctity of a sign; that not a new phenomenon was visible, but that a new meaning was given to a phenomenon already existing. The following passages, xiv, 13; 1 Sam. xii. 18; 1 Kings ii. 55, are instances in which יָרֵא, nathen, literally "give"—the word used in Gen. ix. 13, "I do set my bow in the cloud"—is employed in the sense of "constitute," "appoint." Accordingly, there is no reason for concluding that ignorance of the natural cause of the rainbow occasioned the account given of its institution in the book of Genesis.

The rainbow is frequently seen in Palestine in the rainy season, and thus furnishes a common image to the sacred writers. There is a reference to the rainbow, though not named, in Isa. liv. 9, 10; and it is mentioned in other passages. "As the appearance of the bow which is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about" (Ezek. i. 28). "And there was a rainbow round about the throne in sight like unto an emerald" (Rev. iv. 3). "And I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud, and a rainbow was upon his head" (x. 1). These three passages correspond with the direct light upon each other. The rainbow in all of them is the designated token of God's covenant and mercy, and of his faithful remembrance of his promise. "Look upon the rainbow," says the son of Sirach (Eccles. xiii. 11, 12), "and be glad, and be comforted; for that made it: very beautiful is it in the brightness thereof; it compasseth the heaven about with a glorious circle, and the hands of the Most High have banded it." Among the Greeks and Romans, the personified rainbow, Iris, became the messenger of the gods, and the natural rainbow seems to have been conceived as the passage-way on which Iris came down to men (Serv. on Virgil's Æn. v, 610). The Indian mythology made a yet nearer approach to the Biblical view (Von Böhlen, India, i, 287); but the Edda represents the rainbow as a bridge connecting heaven and earth (see, in general, Menzel, Mythol. Forsch. p. 253 sq.). On the physical views of the ancients with regard to the rainbow, see Forbiger, Handb. d. alt. Geog. i, 596 sq. See Schlichter, De Iride ejusque Emblem. (Hal. 1739); Ausfeld, De Iride Dilucis non redituri Signo (Gies. 1756). See Bow.

Scientifically considered, the rainbow is a natural phenomenon which is formed by rays of light from the sun (occasionally the moon) striking drops of falling rain, being refracted in entering them, reflected back, in part, from the opposite side of the drops, and refracted again on emergence. It produces prismatic colors, some of which meet the eye. In the inner or primary bow, the light is refracted downwards, and under-

Rain-makers are, in Kaffreland, a class of crafty and designing men who profess to have supernatural influence and powers. When no rain has fallen upon the land for several months, and the ground is parched and the cattle suffer, the rain-makers become rare; ceasingly scarce, the people apply to the rain-maker, who immediately exerts himself on their behalf, if they bring him satisfactory presents. A large gathering of the people now takes place, an ox is slaughtered, and a large quantity of Kaffree beer is imbibed; and when the rain-maker has become sufficiently animated by the part he takes in the feast, he commences his incantations. He dances round the camp-fire, and exerts himself with such violent gestures that the perspiration streams down his naked body. He then commands the people to go and look towards the western horizon for the appearance of the rain-clouds. If no indication of coming showers is seen, the wily rain-maker tells the deluded natives that the presents which they have brought him are not sufficient. They then go to bring more, the feast is renewed, and the business of the ceremonies are repeated to gain time; and if the foolish exercises are continued till a shower actually falls, the rain-makers triumph in their success. The presence of Christian missionaries in Kaffreland has of late years greatly increased the power and influence of the rain-makers, and bids fair to annihilate the gross deception altogether.

Rainold(e)s (also written Reynolds, Reynolds, and occasionally in the Latin Regulinius), John, was a cele
